The retraining program costs $15 million; on-the-job training, $50 million; federal-provincial loans for job development program, $100 million; works which imply a large proportion of labour, $80 million; the agricultural exhibitions loan program, $10 million; accelerated housing assistance program, $113 million. They altogether amount to $578 million, which are used to train manpower, retrain workers and provide jobs which cannot be filled. But, the amounts engaged are nevertheless spent.

Mr. Speaker, it is sad to see to what extent we lack seriousness or ability.

The other day, I was talking of another case which occurred in my constituency, in Témiscamingue, where the Canadian International Paper was closing down, laying off 540 workers. The government cannot do anything about this. An office is opened in Témiscamingue once a week in order to invite those who were laid off to come and follow a retraining course, so that they may engage in a new job. But, there is no other industry in this area! And the Canadian International Paper has already closed down.

Mr. Speaker, subsidies are however granted to a plant at Port Cartier which will produce exactly the same thing that the Temiscaming plant was producing. The government will perhaps grant $3, $5, $8 million or more to create a new industry which will produce exactly what the CIP company alone was producing at Temiscaming. Now a business is allowed to close on the ground that it will not be able to resume its operations before two or three years. The minister says: The market might be better then. Today there is no market, but the minister or the government is prepared to grant millions of dollars to build new industries.

Thus unemployment insurance benefits would be paid from the funds of the government which come from taxpayers; those funds would be used to pay unemployment insurance benefits to the citizens of those two towns. Such is the inconsistency or incompetence of a government or of ministers who do not go to the root of the problem.

I mention those two localities, but let us take the case of Domtar, in Trois-Rivières, where 800, 900 or perhaps even more workers were laid off because of poor market conditions.

This afternoon, my colleague for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) put a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). There is a surplus of eggs in Canada. My colleague asked the minister why we import eggs from other countries. The minister replied that we do because eggs are less expensive elsewhere. My colleague figured out that imported eggs cost us $1.20 a dozen, while they only bring in 20 cents a dozen to the producers. The ministers lie to us shamelessly in every field of production.

In 1971, Canada produced some $90 billion in goods and services. That is not peanuts. Still, the total Canadian income amounted to $67 billion. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to be a wizard at figures to understand that $67 billion cannot buy a production of $90 billion. There is therefore $23 billion worth of production which we are unable to purchase, because of a lack of purchasing power. The people are without purchasing power.

We hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) tell us: "To give new impetus to the economy, we must spend more." The hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) stated yesterday, I believe: "Canadians must spend more, if we want our economy to regain some strength and if we are to recover control of it instead of allowing it to be dominated by foreign interests".

Mr. Speaker, I think that we must set up a program which would enable the Canadian people to finance their own production and keep full control over their economy. However, we must take the necessary means. It is not by begging and pestering the United States for loans to develop our country or to create new industries that we will succeed, but by using our own resources. In order to produce in Canada we do not use American labour but Canadian labour and Canadian brains. This is what we use for our production. But, when comes the time to control the nation's credit, we are faced with inefficient people who say: We must take the international market into account. The needs of the Canadian people are never taken into account. This is why we always say: Let us use our financial institution called the Bank of Canada. One million or 578 million written with Canadian ink and a Canadian pen on the desk of Louis Rasminsky, Governor of the Bank of Canada, are figures based on our own wealth, on our own production, these figures are just as good as those we are asking for in New York, Chicago, Washington or San Francisco. What is the difference between credits of five, six or seven million issued in Canada, based on Canada's wealth or similar credits issued in the United States based on the same wealth, credits on which we have to pay interest? Why not use the services of the Bank of Canada where we could borrow at a rate of interest that would be no higher than the operating costs of the Bank? That is a solution. But no, the ministers—there is not even one in the House now—when we talk of these matters, say that they are most busy trying to find new jobs.

• (1600)

That is how serious they are. One minister is present. I apologize for my mistake. How many are they now? Thirty-six?

An hon. Member: Twenty-nine.

Mr. Caouette: Twenty-nine. That is too many given the results that we see. Three ministers would be enough.

Mr. Speaker, the same problem existed ten years ago, when the Progressive Conservatives were in power. They were doing what the Liberals are doing now. They went on their knees in pilgrimage to New York City, borrowing from the Americans, begging for permission to develop this country, Canada. However, the problem is still not one of production or creation of productive jobs; this is a matter of giving Canadians consumers a purchasing power enabling them to get available products. And when products are being sold, the industries will not need subsidies to maintain themselves because they will profitably sell their products and be able to administer themselves.

All government grants are now monopolized by the big industries, by corporations, as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) said with reason a few moments ago. We voted against the government which put forward a bill to help industries. It consisted in establishing a program of $80 million to offset the American surtax which was abolished about two months after its implementation and the government went on allocating the remaining of these 80 million even after the surtax had been repealed. They continued to subsidize corporations and the most important which received the $80 million are subsidiaries of American corporations.

This does not mean that we should say to the Americans: Yankee, go home. No, Mr. Speaker, this is not what we want to say. We want to regain control over our economy instead of thinking only of creating productive employment. If we cannot sell out products we have to organize part of consumption. Let us organize Canadians to enable them to spend more, not to the benefit of finance companies but through credits which would be theirs.

This is why we say that the difference between the $90 billion worth of production and the $67 billion of revenues, i.e., $23 billion, should be created and distributed to the people—not to companies—who will go and buy companies which will compete to give us better services, and which will thus create jobs to sell their production. It would be a production ordered, organized and managed not by the government, but by consumers, who are masters in a country like ours.

Then, Mr. Speaker, not only would we have less disorder in this country, but we would find more co-operation and, above all, more understanding. We would have an efficient government instead of a noodle government which sets objectives for itself but never gets any results. Those noodles are not even good enough to make nice soup.

Mr. Speaker, those are the few remarks I wanted to make on the motion before the House. The Progressive Conservatives do not propose anything, they only blame the government for not doing what they themselves failed to do 10 years ago. Let us find an answer: instead of playing from red to blue and from blue to red, let us play "Social Credit", and things may then take a turn for the better.

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully this afternoon to the affable hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) and listened particularly to hear if he would speak to the motion his party has brought before the House. I was not surprised he did not choose to speak to the motion, as I suspect he realized that his party had made a ghastly mistake. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings is a man who, if he has nothing else, has a well tuned political sense. Nor was I surprised that other opposition spokesmen chose to ignore the motion in their speeches. After all, they are opposition party spokesmen and it is not their function to draw attention to the progress of the country. I think the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings knew he would do this if he discussed the motion, and that is why he chose not to debate it. He sensed that the motion would focus attention on the considerable achievements we have witnessed in the country in the last few years.

I am not sure whether the hon. member reads newspapers. He may, and this may have had something to do with his reluctance to deal with the issue. For instance, I am looking at yesterday's Ottawa Citizen. There is a story entitled, "Production up—manufacturers go on a binge". Let me read one paragraph:

• (1610)

Manufacturers went on a sudden binge in April boosting output by 2.6 per cent, or an annual rate of increase of 30 per cent. At the same time, they received orders worth 7.3 per cent more than orders in March.

A similar surge in exports occurred in both April and May, up 7 per cent from March.

I am delighted to see that the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings has resumed his seat. Newspapers reports are replete with stories of increased production, expanded export shipments, higher sales of durable goods. I see a headline here "April Shipments of Paperboard up 19.3 per cent". Here is another. This is from the Montreal Gazette; I am quoting from the issue of June 13.

Canada experienced an export boom last month, with shipments to all countries rising 21.6 per cent to $1.89 billion from $1.56 billion in May last year.

They brought the cumulative total of exports for the first five months of this year to $7.78 billion, up 10.5 per cent from $7.05 billion a year ago.

There was a 21.5 per cent boost in shipments last month to the most important market, the U.S., rising to $1.29 billion from $1.06 billion in May, 1971.

Exports to the United Kingdom rose 25.9 per cent to $167.7 million last month from $133.2 million a year earlier. Japan was again Canada's third best customer last month, with shipments there rising to $107.5 million, up 59.5 per cent from $67.4 million in May, 1971.

I can give many examples of this kind of progress. I intend to give a few more in the course of my remarks, but first I should like to deal with some of the assertions made by the spokesman for the Conservative party. His analysis seemed to go along these lines: there is likely to be a serious problem with respect to slackness in consumer demand—aggregate purchasing power may not have been his phrase; I know it was the phrase used by the spokesman for the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). Well, in my opinion one of the best indices of aggregate demand is retail sales. I have just seen the figures for April. I want to cite these figures and then ask hon. members whether they think there is any weakness in aggregate demand. Retail sales jumped 6.3 per cent on a seasonally adjusted basis in April, the largest monthly gain ever recorded; I repeat, the largest monthly gain ever recorded.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: I ask the hon. member. Is that evidence of weakness of demand? The hon. member then went on to suggest that because he senses this weakness, we should lower taxes on manufacturers immediately as of July 1, without waiting for the end of the year. I have already cited some of the export figures and some figures with regard to the retail trade. Figures respecting sales of durable goods show similar increases and, as I say, I will put further figures on the record in due course.

Mr. Hees: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Gillespie: I think the hon. member wants some figures with respect to industrial output. I will put these on record in the course of my remarks.

Mr. Hees: What I did want to ask the minister was whether he would put on record the latest unemployment figures and then tell me whether he is satisfied with them.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member has had his opportunity to speak—

Mr. Hees: All the question requires is a yes or no answer.

Mr. Gillespie: Nobody in this House is satisfied with the unemployment figures.

Mr. Hees: Well, then, don't tell us everything is fine.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister has the floor. I invite hon. members to direct their remarks through the Chair.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings is an affable person. He is also a compulsive debater; and he is also, I think a confused debater. I say this for a number of reasons. He seems to find difficulty coming to terms with the tax reduction afforded to the manufacturing industry. On one hand he suggests we advance it to July 1, in a few days time, because industry needs the stimulation at this time as a result of concern about consumer demand. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have shown how weak, false and transparent his position is in that respect.

He then went on to say he was not sure whether there should be any tax reduction accorded to the manufacturing industries. He thought we should in some way allocate the funds associated with this reduction to the manufacturers on the basis of the number of jobs created. I ask the hon. member whether he is not taking a leaf out of the NDP book and suggesting a massive exercise in government intervention in the course of which auditors would go in to check the number of persons employed by a company on one day, and the number employed on another day. Perhaps that is what he wants—a job creating bureaucracy.

Mr. Douglas: You could not get a bigger bureaucracy than the one you have already.

Mr. Hees: It would be very simple.

Mr. Gillespie: The motion reads:

> That the House regrets that expenditures for incentives programs have failed to stimulate production and trade in Canadian goods and services and to open increased opportunities for productive employment to Canadians.

I submit this motion is based on three false premises. The first is that incentive programs are expenditures which should be considered in the light of an instant response—that one should expect an immediate pay-off. Surely, on reflection, hon. members on the other side will realize that incentives are an investment in the future.

Mr. Hees: I have been waiting for four years and nothing has happened.

Mr. Gillespie: I will give you the figures. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings had a lot to say about export figures. He seems to forget that when his party was in power between 1957 and 1962, we were running deficits on our trade accounts in the first four years; there was a small surplus in the last two. But in every year save one since the Liberals took over the surplus in the trade account has been greater than in the best year under the Conservatives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillespie: In 1970, this country had a trade surplus of just under $3 billion, roughly 15 times as great as the best single year under the administration of which the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings was a member. He had the nerve, I thought, to suggest that what this government should do is to mount an export drive, and at a time when the figures show clearly beyond any doubt that this government and previous Liberal governments since he was minister of trade and commerce have had surpluses on trade accounts unparalleled in the history of this country. He took a short-sighted look at incentives, as if today's incentives are going to produce something big tomorrow. Everyone who knows what an incentive is and how it should operate knows that it takes time for incentives to work. It is a seed which is planted and then flowers. It is not improved by the use of a watering can in times of drought.

• (1620)

I was reminded of the story by Robert Townsend in a book which perhaps some hon. members have read called "Up the Organization!", in which he referred to the impatient younger executives with whom he had come in contact. He liked to describe their particular actions as rather like the actions of a man who pulled out the flowers to see how the roots were growing. In a major way I think that is the attitude that the Conservative party has taken to incentives. They are not prepared to see the incentives go to work as seed that is planted and then grows.

The second false premise, I submit, is that somehow or other incentive programs operate in a vacuum, that they are separate from all other government policies, that they are separate from tax policies or from in-plant training policies, that they are separate in some way from vocational training or from monetary policies. I think the opposition party has misjudged the nature of incentives and how they work alongside other policies. Some of our incentive policies are aimed at regional disparities—the question of location of employment. Some are concerned with modernization and the question of scale. Some are concerned with new technology and new products. Some are concerned with new markets. All of these incentive programs are aimed at sharing the risk with the manufacturer, in line with a national objective.

There are also incentives policies with respect to savings, and in this regard I should like to refer to some remarks made last week by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to the Investment Dealers Association at Winnipeg. He said:

> While we frequently hear voices complaining about an alleged lack of sufficient incentive for saving in this country, the fact is that the proportion of savings by Canadians is extraordinarily high. During the latter half of the 1960s, total savings in Canada averaged 24 per cent of national income, compared to 18 per cent in the United States and the United Kingdom during the same period. In 1971 alone, personal savings increased by more than 25 per cent and the assets of our major financial institutions rose by 13 per cent.

I mention that only because savings is one aspect of incentives. Others on the government side will deal with our incentive programs in the course of this debate.

There are three other matters I should like to touch on with respect to what I have described as the false premises in this particular motion, one that might best be described as being the wrong subject chosen for the wrong reasons at the wrong time. The motion refers to the need to stimulate production and trade as well as employment. First, let me deal with the premise that employment opportunities in Canada have been sluggish, which I think was the word one or two members opposite used. Surely by now hon. members opposite must know that this government has a record that is second to none in the world when it comes to job creation. More jobs have been created in Canada during the last three years, in relative terms, than in any other industrialized nation. For example, Japan has a population of 100 million and is rated as one of the strongest industrial countries of the world, a country of enormous growth. During the four year period 1967-71 the increase in the Japanese labour force was 741,000. During the same period the increase in the Canadian work force—not labour force but work force—was 700,000, a shade under that of one of the most powerful industrial nations in the world.

As far as job creation is concerned, what has been the history in Europe? How many new jobs have been created by the United Kingdom in the last four years? The answer is that no new jobs have been created; there has been a net reduction of over 600,000. How many new jobs have been created in Germany during the last four years? The answer is no new jobs; in fact, just under 200,000 fewer jobs now exist. How many new jobs have been created in the last four years in Italy? The answer is 164,000, and Italy has a population a shade under three times that of this country. If hon. members have not totalled up the figures, the increase in the Canadian work force within the last four years has been greater than the combined increase in the labour forces of the Common Market countries, the United Kingdom and Sweden.

I think this is an important statistic in light of this resolution, which refers to opening "increased opportunities for productive employment to Canadians". I compliment the drafter of the resolution because it is a positive way of putting it, though I suspect the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings did not compliment his colleague. I can only assume that he chose to ignore the positive aspect of the resolution which emphasizes employment opportunities. As I have said, no industrialized country has a better record than this country regarding job creation.

Turning to the two other aspects of this resolution, may I deal with the question of production and trade, issues that were raised by the lead-off opposition spokesman. He dodged very quickly over the question of price performance. I think he would acknowledge that Canada's price performance is an important part of keeping Canadian goods competitive in world markets. After all, he should know; he was minister of trade and commerce at one time and I have already indicated that his record as minister does not compare with the record of my colleague today. One of the reasons it does not compare is, perhaps, that Canada's price performance during the last three years has been better than most, if not all, of our industrial competitors. The increase in prices in Canada last year was 2.9 per cent.

Let me give the House the history of the last three years. The increase in 1969 was 4.5 per cent, in 1970, 3.4 per cent and in 1971, 2.9 per cent, a very reassuring trend. In 1970, the increase in the United States was 5.9 per cent compared to our 3.4 per cent, and in the United States last year it was 4.3 per cent. The tussle with prices is not one that is ever concluded; it is a continuing one. There is no question that there are many in Canada, including the members of this government, who are concerned about keeping rising prices under control. The preliminary figures I have show that the Canadian performance compares with the best in the world. Every member on this side of the House would compare himself only with the best in the world.

Incidentally, I was interested in the fact that opposition speakers did not seem to want to deal with the Canadian performance in comparison with the performance of other countries. They did not seem to be ready to compare the success story of Canada with the performance of other countries, and perhaps for all too obvious reasons.

Let us deal with the output of goods and services in 1970. There was a general recognition of a slowdown in the international economic community during that period. Canada, being as highly dependent as it is on international trade and the economies of other countries, was not immune. For example in 1970 the increase in real gross national product, that is the over-all real domestic product, amounted to only 2.6 per cent, but that still compares favourably with an actual decline in the United States of around one-half of one per cent.

What about the temporary pause we noted in the first quarter of 1972? Let us not forget that this followed an exceptionally fast growth in 1971. In the most recent half year, the seasonally adjusted volume of industrial production was expanded at an annual rate of 7½ per cent. For manufacturing output alone, the rate of expansion was 6.7 per cent. There was an increase in the industrial production annual rate of 7½ per cent and a manufacturing output of 6.7 per cent. Let me draw the attention of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings, who raised this question, to the fact that both these output rates, manufacturing and industrial production, are well above the average for either the 1960's or the most recent five-year period. Again, it seems to me that the hon. member has chosen to bury himself in his papers rather than acknowledge that important fact.

I have dealt with industrial production, manufacturing output, employment and prices. I could go on at some length in respect of how our index of the volume of industrial production compares with that of other countries. In the United States, for instance, the increase was only 3.7 per cent. In Canada in the first four months of this year it was 6.5 per cent, well above the United States performance. Similar comparisons for the recent 12-month period show an increase of 4.3 per cent for Japan, 1.2 per cent for Germany, so by almost any yardstick the performance of the Canadian economy has to be rated number one, the best in the world.

Let me briefly touch on trade figures. In 1971, we had a surplus of approximately $2.9 billion. We had a trade surplus in the most recent months which was still running at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $1.4 billion. Now, what about this matter of the end product which the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings raises from time to time? There has been a suggestion that our manufactured content is not as high as it should be. Let me give these figures. Apart from undeniable success in the promotion of external trade, Canada has also had considerable success in upgrading the proportion of its goods being sold in finished form. The proportion of end products in Canada's total exports has gone up from 12.3 per cent in 1961 to 38.8 per cent a decade later. Thus far in 1972 the proportion has edged up further to 41.9 per cent of total domestic exports for January-April.

In summing up, it seems to me that not only was this resolution chosen perhaps inadvertently, or certainly mistakenly, it was chosen in respect of the wrong subject, for the wrong reasons and at the wrong time. It has revealed little understanding of the role of incentives in our manufacturing, commercial and industrial economy; and an unbelievable ignorance in respect of the health of our economy.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, this is the fourth or fifth of the six consecutive opposition days in a row designated by the government. This is an important motion before the House today. Unfortunately, because of the rather peculiar rules under which we now operate, this motion will not be resolved but will be left up in the air.

I listened to the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) reply on behalf of the government, and I wondered as I listened to him where his colleagues were; the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), who has a great deal of responsibility and certainly the minister to whom this motion is most applicable, and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), who has a great deal of responsibility in respect of the whole area of incentives. I am sure both these hon. ministers try to do a good job and probably have very good excuses for not being here. I believe debates of this nature which, after all, are intended to replace the traditional supply motions the government had to move from time to time to be in a position to pay its bills, are important. These motions allow us to place grievances, for that is what they are, before the ministers, but they are not in their places to hear the suggestions made by various members who participate. For that reason, I regret the absence of those two ministers today, without meaning to take away anything from the speech made by the Minister of State for Science and Technology.

That minister, in his speech, forgot to mention the fact that we were talking primarily about incentives. When he did touch upon that subject he seemed to be under the illusion that incentives were something new, something brought about by this government in the last budget. The fact is that incentives have been around for a long time. This government has probably used incentives of one kind or another in every single budget it has introduced in the last four years. Likewise its predecessor, the Pearson government, used various kinds of incentives. It is in the light of the experience of these past 10 years that we must examine the results of the various incentive programs of the government. I should like to look particularly at the incentives under the Regional Development Incentives Act as that is the main incentive program of the government.

A few days ago the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) rose in this House to announce that he was extending the life of the designated areas in Canada by another 12 months and in some cases by another 18 months. He made no attempt whatsoever to deal with the criticism levelled at the program, to respond to the critics of his department or indeed to deal constructively with any of the arguments presented. Instead, he took the easy way out. He announced that the life of all designated areas in the country would be extended for another 12 months. We have been saying repeatedly, and we believe it, that there are too many designated areas in this country. We believe the incentives under the Regional Development Incentives Act are too generally applied and, as a consequence, are in fact non-productive in terms of creating jobs, and particularly in terms of ending regional disparity in this country which they were supposedly designed to do.

The Minister of State for Science and Technology talked about the record number of jobs which have been created by his government. He forgot to mention the fact that this was in response to record unemployment created by the same government. We have record-high unemployment in this country. The fact is that the government's incentives program, and more particularly the government's regional economic development program, have failed to respond to the situation. We have, for example, the May figures which show that national unemployment is in excess of 6 per cent. In my own province, the unemployment figure is in excess of 12 per cent. One can examine any designated area across the country in which this incentive program was supposed to be operative and find that it has had appreciably little effect on the unemployment in the region.

An economist who appeared before the Standing Committee on Regional Development, Dr. David Springate, in his evidence as a consequence of a doctoral thesis said that a large number of firms which received grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act were not influenced by these grants in respect of where they located. That paradox, so far as I am concerned, is a complete negation of what this program was intended to do. It was intended not to cope with national unemployment, because after all that can be adequately dealt with only by the fiscal program of the government, but was intended to end regional disparity in this country which is probably a greater threat to the continuing existence of Confederation. It has failed to do that because the government has failed to apply incentives in a way which would influence industries to establish where the need is greatest, where unemployment is greatest and where regional disparity is probably more apparent. That evidence presented to the committee by Dr. Springate has been largely ignored by the government. Instead, the government continues its present program, in spite of criticism from every sector of the economy, from agencies charged by statute with providing the minister with advice—I am thinking of the Atlantic Development Council and the Canadian Council on Rural Development—and from other agencies such as the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

In spite of all the criticism, the minister insists on continuing with this program which has not been effective in meeting the needs of the nation because the regional disparities in the less fortunate areas of this country are being ignored. The theory underlying this program has been described, in my opinion inadequately, as the manure theory. This theory of the government was touched upon by the Minister of State for Science and Technology. He referred to the fact that the opposition is not prepared to allow these incentives, which represent seeds, to grow. I suggest to the minister that probably the basic weakness of the program and the manure theory, as presented by the minister, is that the designated areas in this country stretch from one end of the country to the other, in all ten provinces. The incentives available under the Regional Development Incentives Act are spread so thinly and so broadly that nothing happens.

The government believes that by spreading a little money here and there something will grow every year. That is the manure theory. It may be that a new industry is established here and a new industry is established there. That may very well be one result, but perhaps another result of the present program is the transferring of unemployment from one end of the country to another. That has happened in many cases. I can cite the example of a company called Acme Seeley. On May 24, during a meeting of the Committee on Regional Development, the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) tried to knock down the argument of Dr. Springate. He waited until this very important witness was not present in the room, then recited a story which he claimed would show the naïveté of Dr. Springate's theory. I should like to read exactly what the hon. member said. This is taken from the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Committee on Regional Development, issue No. 12, for May 24, 1972, at page 12:46:

> On May 12 within my constituency a company had an opening, the name of the company is Acme Seeley. It received more than $800,000 from DREE. The president of that company got up at the opening and said he had come to Renfew because it was a beautiful town and the people were nice people and other very pleasant things. He made no reference to the federal government. He was followed by the mayor of the town, Mayor Carswell. He praised the community; he praised the fine people in the new company and the fact that his town officials had brought in this new company.
> —None of them in my opinion were forthright enough to state the obvious, namely that the difference in that community was not the mayor nor the industrial commissioner nor anything else; it was that the federal government had brought in grants.

So, let us examine the facts. This story, if it shows anything, shows the naïveté not of the witness before the committee but of the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton because the facts are as follows: In March, 1971, the Department of Regional Economic expansion announced an offer of $862,850 to Acme Seeley if it would establish a $2,255,000 plant in Renfrew to create 137 new jobs. On May 12, we have the plant opening that the member described. On May 30, we have an announcement in the Globe and Mail business section that Acme Seeley had moved its head office and manufacturing to Renfrew, consolidating operations formerly carried on at plants in Hamilton and Toronto. Checking the Scotts Industrial Directory for 1970-71, we find that these two plants employed 136 people. What then has been the result of the $862,850 DREE incentive grant of which the member was so proud? It has resulted in the loss of jobs for 136 people in Hamilton and Toronto. It has created one net new job in the hon. member's constituency of Renfrew. We can only come to the conclusion that the cost of that one job was $860,000. That is just one instance.

There are many cases in which grants are made to induce industries to locate in various parts of the country at the expense of established industries in other parts of the country. In other words in many instances the result of the program has been the transference of unemployment from one end of the country to the other within designated areas. There is a case currently before the department concerning a grant for a sugar refinery to establish in Cornwall, Ontario. It is a very substantial grant. There are six existing sugar refineries in Canada. Five of them are located in designated regions, four in the city of Montreal and one in the city of Saint John, New Brunswick. Nobody would deny the need which exists in the city of Cornwall which has been struck by industrial shutdowns, plant pullouts and consequent unemployment which is probably the highest in the country. Nobody will deny the need which exists in Cornwall. It is great.

What I am saying, and I have not been satisfied with the answers to questions directed to the minister in committee, is that the opening of this sugar refinery in Cornwall as a consequence of a very substantial grant under the Regional Development Incentives Act, could have adverse effects on the four refineries in Montreal or the refinery in Saint John, New Brunswick. It could very well result in these plants having to cut back operations and laying off men. The net result may be we will be transferring unemployment from Cornwall to Montreal or Saint John, New Brunswick.

There are other examples too numerous to mention and there are probably many which will never come to light. They emphasize what I consider to be one of the basic weaknesses of the program. The concept is good, and it is one which is supported by every member in the House. When the legislation was brought in setting up the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, it passed the House unanimously. The Regional Development Incentives Act also received unanimous support in the House. Under this act, the minister was given wide discretionary powers. What we are saying is that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has failed to use these wide discretionary powers wisely and well. An examination of the record will lead any objective observer to come to that conclusion. All that the minister has done in extending the life of the designated areas under the Regional Development Incentives Act for another 12 or 18 months has been to carry on with this concept which statistics prove has been unsuccessful in meeting the problem it was supposed to meet, namely regional disparity and the unemployment that is consequent upon that situation.

In my own province of Newfoundland, the unemployment situation continues to be critical. It continues to be the highest of any province in the country. The May figures show that the province of Newfoundland had a rate of unemployment in excess of 12 per cent. In other words, over 20,000 members of the work force in Newfoundland were out of work. The province of Newfoundland has received the least benefits under the Regional Development Incentives Act or any other incentive program under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Department of Finance for accelerated depreciation and capital write off.

Employment Incentive Programs

The province of Newfoundland failed to benefit under the Regional Development Incentives Act to such an extent that the Atlantic Development Council felt obliged to commission a study, which they did. This study was released last week. It highlights what we have been saying for a long time, namely that the government's blanket approach, shutdown approach and manure approach to the problem of regional disparity in this country, and the attempt to cope with that problem by thinly spreading incentives all across the country have failed. The study commissioned by ADC has recommended what we have been saying for some time, namely that there are areas in this country which should receive special consideration.

This study points out that Newfoundland could become a regional development laboratory in which the government could try out new innovations and programs. Obviously, the present programs are not working. The study highlights the serious problems which make it impossible for the present policy to work effectively. It highlights the transportation problems which we have in Newfoundland as a consequence of our isolation. These problems are not peculiar to Newfoundland. The four Atlantic provinces have transportation problems. We have these problems and the government fails to respond with a proper regional transportation policy. Instead of that, we have continuous increases in freight rates.

Canadian National Railways have been allowed seven or eight increases in freight rates since the freeze on freight rates under the Maritime Freight Rates Act was lifted two or three years ago. Transportation is obviously a problem. In this regard, I hope that my colleague from Newfoundland, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), will read this report. I think it is a good report in what it says about transportation and the effect that transportation has on our position in confederation, as well as the lagging behind of our economy compared with the rest of the country. I hope the minister will be sufficiently impressed by this report to establish a task force to examine the effect that present transportation policies have on regional development programs and all of the other incentive programs the government may devise. The fact is we are just not in it.

The study also recommends that the government give consideration to what I describe as regional tariffs. That is not to suggest that we should have free trade areas all across this country. For example, I consider the auto pact a regional tariff because it only benefits Ontario. It is an agreement that affects Ontario and the Great Lake states. We could, for example, negotiate regional tariff programs between the Atlantic provinces and the New England states. We could have New Brunswick potatoes go into the state of Maine or New England in exchange for something in the state of Maine or New England. We could have Newfoundland processed fish going into the New England market and so on. These are examples of what I consider to be regional tariffs.

Unfortunately my time has expired. I hope that on another occasion I can continue this argument.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. McGrath.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas)—Energy—Possible pipeline through eastern Arctic—Assurance of majority Canadian ownership—Hypothecation of gas to United States; the hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack)—Transport—Responsibility of railways to people owning land along lines on which service abandoned; the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight)—Veterans Affairs—Inquiry as to amendment of Veterans Land Act.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT'S INCENTIVE PROGRAMS TO STIMULATE TRADE AND CREATE EMPLOYMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hees (for Mr. Baldwin):

This House regrets that the government's expenditures for incentive programs have failed to stimulate production and trade in Canadian goods and services and to open increased opportunities for productive employment to Canadians.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been some discussions and I think you will find there will be agreement that from this point on speeches be limited to 15 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Hon. members have heard the proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It is so ordered.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I enter the debate today somewhat amazed at the failure of opposition members to deal with the motion. I compliment the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) who actually spoke to the motion before us today. I want to tell him that later this day the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Roberts) will be dealing with many of the items he has raised.

The hon. member for St. John's East referred to the fact that some of the grant programs are not sufficiently extensive and do not benefit Newfoundland as much as other parts of the country. We regret that industry in Newfoundland has not developed in the past 25 years since that province came into confederation. However, I want to remind the hon. member that the fact that the economy of Newfoundland is behind that of the rest of the country is compensated to some extent by the fact that Newfoundland gets the highest per capita grants under the equalization grants formula. The government is not, therefore, insensitive to the needs of Newfoundland and has made special assistance available to that province.

In passing I also want to mention to the hon. member that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) was unable to be present in the House for this debate today for the very good reason that he is attending the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs which is dealing with the bill on foreign takeovers.

I want to say something too, about the points raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). He dealt, as usual, with the subject of unemployment. The Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) has fully replied to his comments on unemployment, and has reminded the House that Canada is indeed a very fortunate country in that we have had the highest rate of employment growth of any of the western industrial nations. Our employment growth rate is about double that of the United States. It has not been a failure of government policies on incentive programs that has resulted in high unemployment in Canada. The hon. member knows, as well as everyone else in this House, that unemployment is caused by the fact that we have a very high rate of input into the work force. It is not a failure of the incentives programs. If it is a failure of anything, perhaps it is a failure of our birth control programs 20 years ago.

I want to comment on the hon. member's remarks concerning Dominion Aircraft of Vancouver. He said he was not familiar with the technical aspects of this application. I want to assure him that he is right, that he is not familiar with the technical aspects but that did not discourage him from commenting very fully on the application. I want to tell him that his facts are wrong. The government does not discriminate against the province of British Columbia on the applications of aircraft companies for assistance. I want to remind him of the Trident aircraft that is in production in Vancouver at the present time as a result of incentives offered by the government to that company, and as a result of a good deal of special assistance given to that company in order that it might make an effective application under the PAIT program. So, Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of where a company is located in Canada, and I resent the fact that a British Columbian would stoop to that kind of thing in this House. I resent that he would use innuendo of that kind to suggest that a company from some other part of Canada would get assistance rather than a company from British Columbia.

The hon. member went on to say that small businesses are not getting their fair share of the incentives programs. I have some figures in front of me and I want to refute that statement. Here are the figures under the PAIT program. This is for companies with volumes of sales under half a million dollars. Under the PAIT program, 19 per cent of the grants have gone to companies with sales volumes under half a million dollars. These are small companies. Under the PEP program, 7 per cent of the grants have gone to companies with sales under the half a million dollar volume. Under the IDAP program, 41 per cent of the grants have gone to companies with volumes of sales under half a million dollars, and under the GAAP program, 19 per cent of the grants have gone to companies in that range. These are respectable figures which thoroughly refute the point which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands attempted to make. It is not a point that he can make. It is not substantiated in fact.

I want to comment on another point that the hon. member made, and which he reported to the House with his usual lack of accuracy, that small businesses in Canada pay the full tax and do not get any special benefits from the government. I want to remind him of the special tax incentives that are available under the budget passed a few months ago, which provide that small companies pay a 25 per cent income tax up to the point where they accumulate profits on their books of $400,000. This special incentive was put in for the benefit of small companies and small companies only, to allow them the opportunity of accumulating profits within their businesses, in order that those businesses could expand and become big businesses.

I also want to comment on the points raised by the leader of the Social Credit party. He spoke about a special program that the government used last year to combat the U.S. surtax. He remarked that the program had been in effect for 1½ months. I want to tell him that that is not accurate. The surtax program in the United States was in effect from August 16 last year to December 19 last year. The hon. member went on to say that the government is still making payments under this program. I want to tell him that that also is not true. The payments were finished as of April this year, and the reason they were continued to that point was that all payments were made after the end of the benefit period. It was necessary to determine whether a company had lived up to its commitments on employment before payments could be made.

In passing, I would like to tell the hon. member about eggs, and to correct the record. He made some comment about eggs being imported into Canada at over $1 a dozen. This was for good reason, Mr. Speaker. The reason they are imported at a price of over $1 a dozen, and some eggs are imported at $5 a dozen, is that these are eggs that are used for breeding purposes. They are not available in Canada, and they are imported to improve breeding stocks for Canadian farmers.

Now, I wish to deal with some of the incentives programs offered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to show the effect they have had on the economy of Canada, the employment they produced, and the increase in business that we have been able to determine has resulted from these very effective programs. The mandate given to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has been to promote the establishment, growth and efficiency of manufacturing and processing industries in Canada, to contribute to sound development and productivity generally, and to foster the expansion of Canadian trade. This mandate recognizes that efficient, productive and economically viable industry is the cornerstone of secure long-term employment.

Employment Incentive Programs

The incentives and assistance programs of the department are designed to contribute to the creation and support of competitive industry by stimulating companies to develop technologically advanced products that, because of their unique properties, will hopefully find ready markets at home and abroad. These are the PAIT program, the DIP program, IRDIA program, the IDA program and the PEP program. We have come up with two new ones recently, one called CASE, which was released within the last couple of months. It is a program designed to provide managerial experience and assistance to managers of small businesses who are in need of such assistance. We also have a new management training program that will assist societies involved in management training programs to update their programs and bring along a better class of management personnel in Canada.

Then, we have the EDC, which is designed to encourage companies to get into the export field and provide them with the marketing assistance and financial guarantees that they need in that field. We also have the machinery program called MACH which permits machinery users to acquire capital equipment at the lowest possible cost. It should be noted that these are primarily related to making firms more innovative. Employment is a subsidiary benefit in the programs that I have mentioned. I am now going to speak of some other programs that are designed to improve employment in Canada, programs like GAAP, the automotive assistance program and the shipbuilding assistance program, STAP, that has been so successful. These are all employment promotion programs. The DIP program, defence industry section, has been remarkably successful and produced a total of $6.3 billion in sales which is an estimated sales to government investment ratio of 30 to one.

I should like to speak about the PAIT program because this is what the motion deals with when it indicates that the government programs have been ineffective. The PAIT program is younger but indications are that it will be as successful as DIP. So far, 180 projects involving a PAIT contribution of $15.2 million have been completed and it is anticipated that sales to the end of 1976 will be $475 million. That is a sales to government investment ratio of 31 to one. By 1976, that program is expected to produce directly 5,000 jobs.

Let me take another special example of this program. Lockheed Petroleum Services is carrying out a PAIT funded program. The company has developed and is now testing a system whereby oil production workers can toil in their shirt sleeves at wellhead on the ocean floor. This should interest hon. members from the Maritimes who are trying to get into the oil business. If this program is successful it should be a major advance in technology in a $7 billion market. This would not have come about without the PAIT program.

Another PAIT program gave support of $50,000 to Procor Limited to develop a new bulk-carrying railway car for which the company has received a $3 million leasing contract. Procor leased 100 of these units to the CNR and 25 to the British Columbia Railway over a 20 year period.

[Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary).]

I could go on with numerous examples—IRDIA and IDAP for instance, all programs that have been successful in promoting jobs in a commercial activity in Canada. I am amazed that members of the opposition would promote a resolution of this kind which to me sounds like Don Quixote riding into the windmill—

Mr. Hees: Just remember 6.2 per cent.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member was absent from the House, the Minister of Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) and other members referred to the fact that Canada has the largest rate of new employment in the western world—of any nation in the world.

Mr. Hees: It is a very simple figure to keep in your mind.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The time of the hon. member has expired. The hon. member for Kent-Essex.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House become increasingly tired of listening to the speeches of members of the government trying to defend their record. From time to time we try to bring to the attention of those hon. gentlemen some of the problems facing this country, but when they take part in the debate the sum total of their rebuttal is that Canadians have never had it so good.

Mr. Hees: That is what C. D. Howe used to say before 1957.

Mr. Danforth: The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard) expressed shock and anguish that we on this side of the House would dare to think that perhaps some areas of this country were getting more incentives, more money, more help than others. Mr. Speaker, how ridiculous can he be?

I am only going to quote two or three figures to show exactly what is happening. I have before me the records of his own department and they show that from its inception to December 31, 1971, of the offers of help extended by this government under regional development initiatives and special area legislation, 1,088 were accepted. The province of Quebec received 55 per cent of these offers. In other words, in the province of Quebec 557 offers were accepted and grants given while in Ontario, the next largest province, the number was 76. Let the hon. parliamentary secretary show his anguish now.

In the last four years this program of incentives has cost the Canadian people in excess of $2 billion. Taken with special tax concessions, and accelerated write-offs, the amount given out to stir the economy and provide jobs is astronomical.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Danforth: When I have finished my speech. Mr. Speaker, they boast of their record. The minister who spoke earlier representing the government mentioned the 700,000 jobs that had been created in this country and compared that to the poor records of Germany, Italy and Great Britain.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): What about Japan?

Mr. Danforth: I will include Japan, but that is not comparing the same thing. In Japan, they do not grant money and incentives for people to count canaries crossing a road or to photograph the cooking of spaghetti in colour. In that country, jobs are counted on the basis of productivity and this is where the difference lies. If we had a comparison of job to job and productivity to productivity, this would not reflect credit on the government.

One of the reasons we are in trouble in this country as far as this program of incentives is concerned is that government departments seem to be working at cross purposes. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) brought up the matter of sugar refineries. We have the Department of Revenue criticizing the sugar refineries because they are a cartel and may be fixing prices. Then, we have the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce chastising the sugar companies because they are only running from 62 per cent to 68 per cent capacity. There is a third policy under which the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is granting thousands of dollars for the promotion of new sugar refining capacity in this country. There are three different policies coming from three different departments, so naturally there is uneasiness and confusion.

Mr. Speaker, under the coherent and complete industrial policy suggested by my leader we could make some progress. We are not making progress now because this government is not consistent. Imports of food into this country are growing. Agriculture is a large industry which employs a lot of people, but under the policy of this government we have imports from offshore and labour from offshore and large expenditures of Canadian money are spent in this manner. The policies do not help the industry of agriculture to compete. Indeed, the policy of this government is one of retreat. They say "If we cannot compete let us move the farmers off the farms". They say, "Let us cut down the agricultural industry; let us withdraw support. Let us retreat until the agricultural industry can live with all this importation."

The same may be said of the textile industries. The government thinks it provides incentives to the textile industry when it says, "You cannot compete with the producers of other nations; we will determine what textiles you should produce; and whether your factories may expand and employ more people. Any difficulties with tariffs you may bring to us, and we will determine if you are to be allowed to make a certain product." That is the type of incentive program this government has embarked upon. On programs like that, Canadian taxpayers spend millions of dollars. Actually, we spend $2 billion on incentives, a great deal of money. Mr. Speaker, nobody can imagine $1 billion. I cannot imagine $1 billion. I do not know if you would need a box car or a house to store $1 billion in dollar bills. I know this, however: If you put a person of 18 to work counting $1 billion, and he counted, say, one dollar bills at the rate of 100 per hour, he could retire at 65 without having counted half that money. That is how much $1 billion is. In this country, we have spent $2 billion on incentives. What did we get for our money except the highest unemployment Canada has ever seen. That is what we got.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, we have spent $2 billion, or $100 for every man, woman and child in Canada. That is what this country invested in this government's program, and it is not working. The government has criticized us for bringing forward this motion and for being critical of the incentive program.

Mr. Gillespie: Can the hon. member name one country that has done better than Canada?

Mr. Danforth: The minister asks me to name one country that has done better. If we were as interested in Canadians as we are, and as interested in Canada's future, we should all be better off. Mr. Speaker, I am interested in Canadian jobs, not Japanese jobs, not Italian jobs, not British jobs, not German jobs; I am interested in Canadian jobs, as the government ought to be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: This is the House of Commons, not a campaign platform.

Mr. Danforth: We are buying catastrophe with the money spent. We are telling industries to go where they would not normally establish themselves, because economic conditions are wrong. And what will happen, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Faulkner: I doubt if the hon. member can answer that.

Mr. Danforth: Once we stop giving grants to induce factories and industries to move to submarginal areas, and once economic conditions return to normal, those factories and industries will not stay, because economic conditions will be against them. Every businessman in Canada knows this. I cannot understand why this fact has escaped the government.

My colleague showed that we are not creating new jobs, merely transferring jobs. We increase employment in one region and decrease it in another region, proof of which is this: Our total unemployment is not falling. I suspect we are not being given the true unemployment picture in this country, and this bothers me.

Mr. McCutcheon: Aha! Now, we come to the nub.

Mr. Danforth: The government talks about a 6 per cent unemployment rate. That figure represents only those who are drawing unemployment insurance. Does it include those who are being retrained? I believe 90,000 people are undergoing retraining. Does it include students who are looking for jobs, who have never worked and who, therefore, are not registered as unemployed? Although the government talks about 500,000 or 600,000 people being unemployed, I have as much right as hon. members opposite to suspect that one million Canadians today are unemployed. That figure, I suspect, is closer to the truth than the 600,000 figure.

This government embarked on a policy that no other Canadian government has ever embarked upon. It has used taxpayer money to buy people off the unemployment rolls. That is what it has done—it has bought people off the unemployment rolls. You can say to the government you are mobile and willing to move from A to B, and you will be eligible for an incentive grant because the government wants to take you off the unemployment rolls. It does not matter if the project is productive, if it will add to the gross national product. The government is interested in one thing only, its public record just before an election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: The people of Canada know this. That is why we are debating the matter. Certainly, the opposition is not always right; but it is not always wrong, either.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: We resent the attitude of this arrogant government which says that everything it does is right and not open to challenge. It is because of the government's attitude that we are in our present trouble. It will not accept the simple truth that it may be wrong and that not all its policies are correct.

Government members say the people of Canada never had it so good. I suggest, instead, that never before have they been so uneasy and unsure of their future. The minister said that the people in Canada are spending more money than ever on consumer goods. We know why. In view of the government's tax policies, it does not pay to save. The more you save, the more the government will take of your savings. It is small wonder the people are saying, "We may as well live today, because we will be persecuted tomorrow."

Mr. Hugh James Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's contribution was a remarkable contribution, although I am not sure to what. Certainly, it was indicative of the style we may expect the hon. member to use time after time in his campaign; however, I remind him that this is the House of Commons and we are debating a specific motion. Perhaps he followed the questionable example shown by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) who showed, I suppose, some sort of political acumen in avoiding the whole question.

The motion is specific. It says that the government's incentive programs have failed.

Mr. Danforth: They have.

Mr. Hees: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: That, of course, is the characteristic position of the opposition. Its record is one of complaints and criticisms, indicting the government, without respite, from the very beginning for everything it has done. I suggest to the opposition that, for the sake of its own credibility, it might say once in four years that the government may have done something right.

[Mr. Danforth.]

The opposition again today brought forward one of those negative indictments of the government and government programs. I was interested to note how carefully hon. members opposite avoided dealing with incentive programs, the subject we are debating. I happen to represent an industrial constituency. A number of major plants are to be found in Peterborough, including those owned and run by Canadian General Electric, Outboard Marine and De Laval, Fisher Gauge and many others. I have argued strenuously for more incentive type programs. I have argued that way since first arriving here in 1965 and still remember the discussions that took place in committee at that time. We said the government should support the secondary manufacturing sector. That is what the government has done, and done reasonably effectively. No one on this side of the House, as the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) tried to intimate, says that every one of these programs is perfect or could not be improved. I repeat, no one on this side says that; so, let us dismiss that nonsense and save it for the hustings and campaign platforms because, certainly, it is nonsense. There is no place for such nonsense in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danforth: The hon. member did not listen to the minister.

Mr. Faulkner: During the past four years this government, with incentive programs, has tried to help the secondary manufacturing sector of the economy become more efficient and compete more effectively in order that it may make inroads in export markets and provide the level of employment that we want for Canadians. If the opposition is arguing that these programs have failed, it is incumbent upon them to show where they have failed. Which programs are they talking about? Which programs did the hon. member who moved this motion mention? Not one. It was one of those airy, vague, fuzzy, confused speeches intended for the hustings.

What does the opposition think about some of these programs? What, for instance, does it think about the Adjustment Assistance Program? Is this a program we should scrap, or should it be revised? And if so, in what way? What about the BEAM program? I can remember when this was introduced by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). It was applauded by the opposition. There was no mention of that this afternoon, no word about any way in which it might be improved.

What about the program providing for the remission of duty on new machinery coming into the country to support Canadian manufacturers? Is this a program which should be scrapped, or should it be revised? Not a word, not a suggestion, and no advice from the opposition. What do they think about programs to increase productivity? That is an incentive program, a program developed by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is that a program which should be scrapped or changed? Again, not a word.

It does seem to me as one member who represents an important industrial sector of the economy, as a member who has consistently advocated an enlarged government role in a support position and as one who has consistently declared himself in favour of programs such as PAIT and IRDIA, that this is an excellent use of tax dollars. I would put this to a vote in the city of Peterborough at any time. I could put it to a vote of members of local 524 of the UE.

I could put the question to the steel workers: Do you believe the PAIT or IRDIA should be abolished? Not one of them would agree with such a proposition. They know they are able to place in foreign markets such as Brazil and Botswana the products they are producing because the government has come into these schemes. I would say to the ministers concerned: Keep it up. That is what the people of Peterborough want. They are not concerned with all this nonsense we have heard today from the other side of the House.

I wish to spend a few moments considering one or two areas of effort which particularly concern me. The first is the work of the Export Development Corporation. This may not be described as an incentive program but it is certainly a support program. In 1971, Canadian General Electric—I am thinking particularly of the Peterborough Branch—was financed to the extent of $3.5 million by the agency.

Let us look at the record of the EDC. Exports insured in 1971 amounted to about $392 million in value. These are operations under section 24 of the act. Under section 27, exports insured amounted to a value of $89 million. Speaking from the base I represent, one of the things which has plagued us continually is the problem of concessional financing. The government has gone a long way to meet this difficulty under section 79. In area or export financing, the value of contracts signed amounted to $240 million. Under section 31, the value of contracts signed was $100 million.

At the present time Canadian General Electric Company is seeking to make major inroads into the export market, particularly in the heavy electrical field, and I think it can be said that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the Export Development Corporation in particular, have played an important support role in this effort. Some of these business propositions involve very difficult markets—Roumania, Israel, Poland and New Zealand, for example—and the arrangements which can be made in respect of the financing are often critical in ensuring success.

We are very optimistic about the possibilities of the deal now contemplated with Roumania. The role the corporation and the department are playing has become critical to the success of these ventures. I would therefore have expected to hear more from the opposition with regard to the operations of the Export Development Corporation as one agency with which the government has been associated.

I wish to consider briefly, now, the role played by PAIT. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howard) has touched on it. Again, it is fair to say that in the case of the Canadian General Electric Company, support under PAIT and IRDIA has been offered and accepted. This has led to the carrying out of work for which we are peculiarly adapted in Canada and which has put us in the forefront of technological progress in a number of areas.

I think of the Eel River power development; I think of the work done jointly by the New Brunswick Power Commission and the Canadian General Electric Company; I think of the new high voltage direct current technology which was developed and installed in large measure as a result of the support given to the company by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce under the IRDIA program. Other companies in my area have received the benefit of similar support, including the de Laval Company and the Fisher Gauge Company, a small, totally Canadian-owned and highly successful venture. Again, they have been assisted by the Program for Advancement in Industrial Technology.

In my judgment, these programs put forward by the government have worked to support Canadian manufacturing and Canadian technology. They have made it possible for Canadian manufacturers not only to compete at home against offshore competition but to find new markets abroad. In doing so they have provided the employment with which all of us are deeply concerned. If there is criticism to be directed against these programs, it can only be that they have not gone far enough.

I have studied the development of PAIT. In 1965, PAIT, it seemed to me, was a defective program. It was not as good as it is today. It has been improved. That is true of some of the other programs. If the debate today were to serve any useful purpose, the opposition should have taken a hard look at these programs and produced suggestions for improving them; I am sure the mind of the government is open with respect to considering ways in which they could be improved. To my mind, the debate has been a failure because of the refusal of the opposition to deal specifically with the programs they have brought before the House for criticism. I now turn to a subject I have raised before in this House. I think specifically of the position of the heavy electrical industry of this country. The government's record in support of the heavy electrical industry has been pretty clear. Some of the financing that we have made available to the utilities in the various provinces, and the conditions attached to such financing to the effect that they support Canadian technology, have in fact served the interests of Canadian technology. But the fact remains that the utilities are the creatures of the provinces. Their main interest is to get the generators, the switch gears and whatever heavy electrical equipment they need at the lowest possible price, and apparently up to this point, with very few exceptions, they have been unwilling to really support Canadian technology, Canadian workmen and Canadian manufacturing to the extent they should.

Let me examine the Peace River project. Out of a total of $49 million spent on that project, foreign firms from Japan, the United Kingdom, Switzerland, Sweden and France took over 50 per cent of the orders. I should like to ask, when was the last time Canadian heavy electrical manufacturers were successful in bidding in any of those countries? When was the last time Canadian heavy electrical manufacturers were able to bid in Japan, Sweden or Britain? They are closed markets. They do not accept, through various means, devices and ruses, our manufactures of these products. Yet here are we offering open hunting to these offshore suppliers.

Let us take the Nelson River project. These figures may be dated, but it appears that out of a total of $65.3 million spent, foreign firms have taken over 65 per cent. Even though these figures can be updated, I suspect the proportion is the same. Some years ago Mr. Walter Ward, who at that time was executive vice-president of Canadian General Electric Company, in a very interesting speech entitled "Urgent Need for Co-operative Effort" suggested that the utilities, the federal government and Canadian industry should co-operate in support of the Canadian heavy electrical industry because it was a key industry in this country. I suggest—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret that the time of the hon. member has expired.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, it is distressing for me today to speak in this debate with the full knowledge that neither the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) nor the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) is present. One would have thought that when their departments were being subjected to criticism they would try to be here to reply to the points that are made, that they would try to defend the government's record. I think it is important that they be here and I regret their absence.

In the brief period available to me I want to make some specific criticisms and suggestions. The Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Gillespie) took great pride in the fact that the job creation rate in Canada was something to behold in this modern world. He was followed by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howard) who was just as euphoric in telling us that we must be doing a good job in terms of making grants and tax concessions to further regional development in this country, because after all we are creating a lot of jobs.

I suspect that both the minister and the parliamentary secretary were referring to the OECD study some time ago which provided comparative information about our performance compared with other countries in the western industrial world. It would have been very interesting had he revealed the full import of that study. For example, he covered the last quarter of 1971, but what he neglected to tell us was that in West Germany, for example, one of the countries surveyed, a country governed by a social democratic party, there was an unemployment rate of 0.5 per cent. Indeed, West Germany imported two million foreigners because they have more jobs available than workers to fill them. But the hon. gentleman neglected to mention that.

He also neglected to mention that in Sweden only 2.7 per cent of the population were unemployed. Sweden is another country that is governed by a social democratic party. He could also have mentioned Norway, with unemployment at 1.4 per cent—again, coincidentally perhaps, governed by a social democratic party. However, the point is that their unemployment rates are very low indeed, the lowest in the world, so it would be absolutely absurd for them to have a very high job creation rate. Canada has to have a high job creation rate because we have the highest level of unemployment of all industrial countries in the world. I suggest it is absolute idiocy to say that these other countries do not have the same job creation rate that Canada has, since they have virtually full employment.

During the last quarter of 1971, for example, in the countries surveyed in western Europe there were 1,502,000 unemployed. However, 1,163,000 jobs were available for them. This means that obviously those countries do not need to create more jobs because they have virtually full employment. There was almost one job available for each man looking for a job. The countries in western Europe to which I referred have the highest level of employment, I argue, in man's history. To suggest that their job creation rates are not as good as Canada's is a very poor argument. We need a high job creation rate because we have such high unemployment, for which the government is directly responsible.

Let me refer to some other interesting figures relating to the multitude of programs offered by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to assist private enterprise, the kind of programs that made George Bain write recently in his column in the Globe and Mail that if the welfare state exists in Canada at all, it exists for the corporate sector, not for the ordinary citizen.

I have a list of programs offered by that department, 12 in number, for which the private sector can receive outright grants from the government. During the period 1968-69 you will find that spending under those programs to assist private corporations amounted to $390,593,000. The following year it increased to $399,481,000. In the period 1970-71 the amount was $370,004,000. Last year the government gave out $472,136,000 to the corporate sector. The estimate for 1972-73 is $530 million. This makes a grand total of $2,162,217,000 outright grants to the poor, struggling, private enterprise sector, companies which like to say—out of the other side of their mouths, of course—that everyone should be rugged individualists and that government should not interfere in the daily lives of citizens, except, of course, when giving handouts to them.

A look at the unemployment statistics for that period reveals, not a positive correlation between money going into the private sector but a negative correlation. Average unemployment figures for the previous five-year period reveal that in 1967 the rate of unemployment was 4.1 per cent. In 1968 the rate was 4.8 per cent, in 1969 it was 4.7 per cent, in 1970 it was 5.9 per cent and last year it was 6.4 per cent.

I say to those two ministers who have been boasting so much about job creation as a result of this spending that they should check their statistics. We have spent over $2 billion, and we have an increasing rather than a declining rate of unemployment. I suggest that not only are we providing fantastic sums of money, supposedly for regional development programs intended to create jobs but which do not have any significant impact and conceivably, in some cases, have a negative impact—we in Canada are experiencing a phenomenon that has concerned Senator McGovern of the United States.

I for one hope Senator McGovern gets the nomination, wins the presidency of the United States and goes on to do what he says he will do, because he is moving marginally in the direction about which we are talking in Canada. He recently referred to the "corporate rip-off" in the United States, indicating that the average and poor American citizen is subsidizing the corporate empire in that country to a fantastic degree. If he is elected president, he intends to change that situation.

I suggest this is not occurring just in the United States. If you look at what has happened in the shift of the tax burden in Canada since 1950, what will be seen is a trend that anyone with minimal concern for equity should view with apprehension. In 1950 the personal income tax share of the total tax burden was 26.7 per cent, while the corporate share was 28 per cent, or just about even. In 1953 the personal share went up to 33.5 per cent, while the corporate share went down to 24.3 per cent. In 1956 the corporate share went down to 23.9 per cent, while the personal share remained at 33.5 per cent. In 1957, the last year of Liberal government before the change, the personal share of the total tax burden went up to 37.1 per cent, while the corporation share went down to 20.6 per cent.

Then we had a change of government. We moved from the bad old Liberal days to the good Conservative days! One would think that under the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), coming from the populace that he did, we would have seen a significant shift in the tax burden, with the average citizen paying less and the corporation paying more. We did not see that shift; the same inequitable trend continued. In the first year of the Diefenbaker government the corporate share was 21.8 per cent and the personal share 35.6 per cent. In the next year, the personal share was 38.4 per cent and the corporate share 20.1 per cent. The corporate share declined again in the subsequent year of the Diefenbaker government.

Then we had another switch and the Liberals came back into power. Everybody thought that with a change in government we would get a change in the tax burden. But the same trend continued. The amount of tax paid by corporations in Canada began to decrease significantly.

What is the present situation? Remember that in 1950 corporations were paying 28 per cent of the tax burden and ordinary citizens, through personal income tax, paid 26.7 per cent. In 1973, based on tax rates now, the corporate share of the tax burden will go all the way down to 12.2 per cent, while the personal share of the tax burden will go up to 49.9 per cent. This is a complete reversal in terms of trend which can be noted by anyone who is really concerned about tax equity in Canada. The Liberal government has made no progress in this regard over the preceding Tory government, which in turn made no progress over the Liberal government which preceded it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The more things change, the more they are the same.

Mr. Broadbent: We have, in very significant proportions, what can only be called a corporate tax rip-off in Canada about which neither of the traditional parties in this country seems to be concerned.

What has happened in respect of DREE programs? These have been referred to today as programs to provide jobs but they are having little success. We have spent $1.2 billion on them since 1969. The only study that has been made of DREE programs and is now publicly available suggests this money is being wasted. The study indicates that the money is not being spent in the way it was intended.

The study was made of 72 per cent of the 25 corporations with assets of $20 million or more as of March last year. It was determined conclusively that these corporations were getting a windfall profit. The decisions made to locate in one part of Canada as opposed to another had absolutely nothing to do with the grants being provided by the taxpayers of Canada. In short, the corporations intended to locate where they did locate, but cooked the books and prepared a nice case to get handouts from this government. That is some regional development program and some waste of the taxpayers' money!

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. John Roberts (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to what other speakers have said today in this debate. Unfortunately, I was not able to be here for all of it. Of the speech of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) there is not much that need be said, nor indeed much that could be said. Perhaps the kindest, and cruelest thing that could be said of it is that it was up to his usual standard. The speech of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) was one with which I confess I had some sympathy, particularly the hon. member's emphasis on the necessity of doing more to assist the position of the smaller businessman in our society.

I know the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howard) has already spoken in relation to this problem. I suggest it is not a problem which can be dealt with only through tax concessions in relation to profits made by small enterprises. There are real problems in Canada in finding and providing for small businesses the seed capital which they require to establish themselves. It is all very well to give tax benefits to those who overcome the obstacles of establishing themselves. What we need, however, for I believe our financial system has been inadequate in providing such capital, are institutions supported by government which meet seed capital requirements. Perhaps we might look more closely at what is being done in the United States to make available to business more of the kind of capital needed in what are necessarily high-risk operations.

There was one point made by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on which I should like to comment. He implied—perhaps this is understandable in a British Columbian member—that there is a bias against British Columbia in the making of grants. It was not clear exactly what kind of incentives he was discussing; it was not clear whether he was referring to operations under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce or under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

He contended, for instance, that British Columbia did not receive its fair percentage of grants in comparison to levels of unemployment. In so far as he was referring to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, I put to him that the functions of the department in an incentive program are not simply to combat immediate problems of unemployment. Unemployment is certainly an important factor which we look at in designing our programs. However, there are many other factors which are also important in designing those programs. For instance, there is the extent of investment in an area or province or the per capita level of income in a province. British Columbia, on a per capita basis, is the third richest province in Canada. The fact of that relative wealth must be taken into account when considering where regional development incentives should be concentrated.

I should like to spend some time this evening discussing the comments of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) who has had a long and continuing interest in the activities and programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. In the first part of my remarks you will understand, Mr. Speaker, if I reply to some of the charges he has made. The first was that the minister made no attempt to respond to the criticisms of the department's program. In fact the minister appeared, and so did his departmental officials, at a multiplicity of hearings of the standing committee dealing with this subject.

The committee met 14 times, with a variety of appearances by senior officials and by the minister. Indeed, the committee met so often and the minister met with it so often that the hon. member for St. John's East himself complained that the committee might as well cease its hearings, since the subject had been lengthily covered.

The hon. member for St. John's East contended the government has created record unemployment. No economy in an industrially developed country has a better record in the creation of jobs than Canada over the past four years. It is true that we have high levels of unemployment. However, these are not the result of immediate government policies but are a reflection of structural problems in the Canadian economy, particularly the problem of the very high rate of entry of young people, and increasingly of married women, into the labour force. Indeed, if you look at the job creation side of the Canadian economy, one would have to conclude that the government has done a good job.

But there is perhaps a more fundamental objection to that comment by the hon. member for St. John's East. It is basically this. The problems of regional development, the disparities in regional development in this country have been with us now for something over a century. The activities of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion were not constructed in the belief that we could, through a magic wand, somehow overcome immediately these deep-seated, long-term disparities. The minister has often said he believed it would take perhaps up to 15 years before we could determine whether or not we were having a fundamental, significant impact on the removal of economic disparities in this country.

[Mr. Roberts.]

The charge that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has been operating for three years and that its programs have been a failure is a misunderstanding and a misapprehension of the nature of our approach to the structural problems of regional development. We have never contended that we could, through the immediate application of our programs, raise almost overnight the Atlantic region, from which the hon. member comes, to the level of Ontario or some of our other more developed provinces. We recognize that this is a long-term struggle and is not one which can be solved overnight, not even in these short years.

The hon. member spoke a great deal about what he calls the Dr. Springate thesis. He referred to the brief presented to the regional development committee by Dr. Springate of the University of Tennessee. The conclusions of a study are only as good as its methodology. Dr. Springate himself, volunteered to the committee that he was not satisfied with the methodological base on which his study was made. It was simply too small. The subject groupings were too small and the interview technique was too imprecise. The amount of information he was able to collect was done on the basis of subjective interviews. He made no attempt to cross-check them with objective information that was available. All of this Dr. Springate clearly admitted.

Dr. Springate commented, as did Dr. Brewis who appeared with him before the committee, that he was dismayed with the kind of political use being made of the findings of his thesis. In effect, Dr. Springate's thesis is as valuable to us as a colour landscape painted by a colour-blind man. It indicates some shadowy areas where further study could be usefully carried out. It shows some patches which could be examined in more detail, and more rigorously, than Dr. Springate had time to do. For the hon. member for St. John's East to use this academic document as a universal condemnation is a disservice both to Dr. Springate and to the programs of the department.

The hon. member for St. John's East raised one main point of criticism of the department. He suggested that various groups such as the Atlantic Development Council and the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council had been critical of the department's programs. It is true that on occasion they have been critical of some of the operations we have undertaken. However, in many ways they have expressed their approval for the principles of what we have been doing. They have also suggested ways in which we could improve our activities. Their support for the program is well known, as indeed the hon. member for St. John's East admitted when he said he felt that the concept of the department was a good one.

The hon. member suggested that the incentive areas were spread too thinly across Canada. I can understand that one might reach this conclusion if one simply looks at a map and regards the coloured areas as areas which are eligible for regional development incentives. But we do not simply concentrate on a geographic base in terms of square miles. We concentrate on areas where there are problems of deep-seated economic disadvantage. In fact, a very large degree of our efforts have been undertaken in the Atlantic provinces.

The hon. member referred to two specific cases, one of which was the location of Acme Seely in Renfrew and the other was the project of establishing a sugar refinery in Cornwall. Perhaps I might deal first with the question of locating a sugar refinery in Cornwall. I doubt, Mr. Speaker, whether anyone in this House would be able to convince you that the location of a sugar refinery in Cornwall would not be of some assistance in dealing with the problems of that area. I am sure there is no one in this House more aware than Your Honour of the personal problems which have been created by the very high levels of unemployment, virtually 20 per cent which now exists in the Cornwall area.

I was moved by the eloquent plea of the hon. member for St. John's East who spoke at length and with great sincerity about his concern for the plight of the people in the Cornwall area. He said that he wanted to make it clear he was in no way opposed to assisting the people of Cornwall. He was against the sugar refinery, but he was certainly concerned about the plight, concerns and problems which resulted from the very high level of unemployment in the Cornwall area.

I ask the hon. member, as a member of the Conservative party, if he is not able to contact his colleagues at the level of the provincial government of Ontario. Because at the federal level we have been prepared to assist in the establishment of an Uncle Ben's brewery in the Cornwall area with great financial support from the federal government. We are concerned about the levels of unemployment in that area. It is the hon. member's colleagues in the Conservative government at the provincial level who have refused to come to the joint assistance of that area by supporting that program. I would be more impressed by the crocodile tears which the hon. member shed if he would give us some indication as to whether he will bring pressure to bear on the members of his party who, temporarily I hope, hold the position of government in Ontario.

I hesitate to become too political on an occasion like this, particularly when we have someone from Cornwall in the chair who might find it difficult to bring me to order when I am so eloquently defending the interests of his area.

Mr. Winch: You did not point out that the offer of help came from a British Columbia government.

Mr. Roberts: We appreciate help from wherever it comes, even from such a strange place as the British Columbia government. The hon. member for St. John's East also referred to Acme Seeley and its location in the Renfrew area. Because he made his speech after five o'clock I was unable to get the details of that specific case. However, if the implication of what he suggested is that the effect of regional incentives is not to create new jobs but to take jobs away from one area and place them in another, that insinuation is entirely unwarranted.

It can sometimes be the case that an operation is considering closing down in one area regardless of the assistance that might be provided to it. There have been occasions when assistance under the Regional Development Incentives Act has prevented an operation from leaving a province or the country entirely. I will undertake to get a more specific reply with regard to Acme Seeley. I will make sure the hon. member receives more accurate details than he was able to present to the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this motion moved by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), I feel that in assessing the government's handling of our monetary and fiscal policies there is no better way to start than by referring to the latest figures issued by Statistics Canada. Statistics Canada forecast in large part where our economic problems lie, with considerable evidence that the coming months will not provide the economic growth to absorb the anticipated new entries into the labour force. Until the trade sector improves there does not seem to be any real hope of reducing the relatively high unemployment level of the past year.

I realize that the rate of entry into the labour force is due to drop unless, of course, there is massive immigration, and that within a few years, with a decrease of entrants into the labour force, providing employment, particularly for the youth of our country, will be much easier. However, until that happens Canada must have a high economic growth. The increase in population in the mid-1950s was almost 500,000 per year, while last year it was only 220,000 on a considerably larger population basis.

Statistics Canada shows that our gross national product in real terms expanded by only 1 per cent in the first quarter, which was lower than in any quarter of 1971. The recovery that began in the early part of last year lost its momentum, with the October to March periods being very slow, giving us a high unemployment rate of 6 per cent in the first quarter, indeed in the first five months of this year. In order to meet the forecast growth of nearly 6 per cent, activity will have to increase substantially. Unless there is a considerable increase during the balance of the year, this expected goal will not be met.

One of the weakest areas is our merchandise trade, where the surplus amounted to only $263 million for the first five months of this year, compared with $694 million for the corresponding period last year. Then there has been a slippage in housing starts. All this added up to an increase in unemployment in May over April. There is no doubt that the trade sector is the chief drag on the economy. Imports are being drawn more rapidly into the country. This is evidently due to the 10 per cent appreciation in the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar over the past two years. To no one does the strengthening of the Canadian dollar bring such bad news as it does to the prairie grain producers. As a result of this situation, farmers are getting a much lower price for their exported grain, and selling Canadian grain will prove to be more difficult.

Canada's recent wheat sales to China were in pounds sterling. With most other countries buying in American dollars, the purchasing power of both currencies has been declining in relation to the Canadian dollar. In the past three weeks the British pound has declined 5 cents and the American dollar 1½ cents. Mr. Lockwood, second vice-president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool said:

> The money lost in exchanging the currencies for Canadian money means farmers will get less for their exported grain. Foreign countries don't buy Canadian grain with Canadian money because they don't have enough of it, if any.

Since the Canadian dollar was unpegged two years ago from 92½ cents U.S., the farmer has lost between 15 cents and 16 cents a bushel on exported grain. This has resulted from the rising value of the Canadian dollar on world markets. On sales of approximately $1 billion per year our farmers lost well over $100 million on the sale of grain last year, this at a time when the bushel value of grain was at an all-time low in the markets of the world. This also means it will be more difficult to sell grain because it will be more expensive on the markets of the world. Our grain trade produces for Canada well over $1 billion a year in foreign exchange. If our trade in automobiles and automobile parts is left out, because it largely amounts to an exchange, this shows that our grain trade accounts for almost 10 per cent of our over-all trade. Further, it is especially valuable because it goes to world markets outside continental North America.

We can talk about all the great things we should be doing and how we could work out a great industrial strategy that would bring us prosperity, but unless Canadians show a willingness to get on with the everyday business of doing their job, all our great plans will come to naught. The Montreal port strike is one of the very great question marks in the movement of grain to world markets at this time. Mr. Vogel, the chief commissioner of the Wheat Board, has been quoted in an interview this week as saying, "It has been calamitous to our (grain) movement. Every time there is a delay, we lose a possible further sale." Sales of grain to traditional customers have assured that our export ports will be working to capacity at least until May, 1973. In addition there have been experiments conducted to obtain greater flexibility in sales to other countries.

The continuing strike by the longshoremen has cut by half our grain handling capacity through the St. Lawrence. Last week there were nine boats waiting to be loaded at Sorel, another nine at Baie Comeau and 13 at Port Cartier. These ports have been attempting to take the grain diverted by the strike at Montreal. In this case the vessel owners and buyers of grain are losing millions of dollars, because the Wheat Board is not liable for the cost. As I say, the strike could well cost Canada the loss of future sales. The Montreal port strike has prevented the movement of grain from this country. Now it is almost certain there will not be the record that was anticipated earlier this year. Considering that the price of our grain on world markets is so low, failure to move the grain is all the more disastrous.

The much touted industrial strategy of curbing the export of raw materials or semi-processed materials and replacing them with manufactured goods has a long way to go before it is a viable alternative in the Canadian economy. The government has mismanaged the fiscal policies of the country to a great degree. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner), having set a limit on what the banks can pay for funds, has brought about a situation in which the banks will not have as much money to lend as they had previously. Almost certainly this will mean rationing of money for the major corporate borrowers. Presumably they will not have the ability to go to the banks but will have to bid in the market for outside funds.

The Bank of Canada has been expanding the monetary supply at an annual rate of 25 per cent since the beginning of the year. This follows a two-year stretch in which the expansion of the money supply was estimated at 18 per cent. This monetization of corporate debt, involving the creation of huge liquid claims against the banking system, which forms part of the public money supply, in turn raises the spectre of accelerating inflation. In contrast, the money supply in the United States has been kept down to a much reduced rate of increase of approximately 7 per cent. This in turn has meant that interest rates there have not been raised.

A comparison shows that a rise in the American economy is being successfully carried forward. Using the expansion of the money supply to the extent that it has, our central bank inevitably invites the sort of excesses apparent in an excessive loan demand situation. The banks have taken corrective steps, but the more demanding requirement is for production to catch up to the funds available for financing it.

The conclusions of the Senate Standing Committee on Finance in its report on growth, employment and price stability are of particular interest. The committee concluded: (1) the three big levers of monetary, fiscal and exchange rate policies remain central and indispensable in stabilizing the Canadian economy; (2) co-ordination of fiscal monetary policies and close co-operation between the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada in the exercise of these policies are essential; (3) the Bank of Canada cannot operate monetary policy on the basis suggested by some monetarists. It must be concerned with such important matters as interest and exchange rate levels, liquidity, and the financing of federal government debt. However, it should give more relative emphasis to steadying the growth of the money supply and it should guard against the tendency to be overly reactive to short-term indicators. The Senate Committee also said:

> —in reviewing with our witnesses the post war record of monetary policy in Canada and noting the sometimes quite frequent sharp swings of policy direction within relatively short periods, we are led to question whether there has not been a tendency on the part of policy makers to be overly reactive to short-term indicators and to fall somewhat into the pitfalls of fine-tuning with a blunt instrument.

Needless to say, these views strengthen my contention that the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada must carefully co-ordinate and control the increase in the monetary supply with an eye to its long-term economic implications.

The Senate Committee also noted as follows:

> Recently many central banks in the free world have shifted their efforts towards controlling monetary aggregates such as the supply of money. This move, in my opinion, offers the first ray of hope, that the present world wide inflation will be brought under control.

• (2030)

Finally, the Senate committee said they would——confess to having been much impressed by the thrust and conviction with which monetarists are able to put forward their views, by the obvious scope of their empirical research, . . . and by their undeniable impact on the whole field of professional economics and on the psychology of financial markets.

Mr. Speaker, I contend that this government has not provided a reasonable and good monetary policy.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I find it hard to understand that the opposition can express, as it has today, such indictions of the government's economic policy, specially considering that since the first months of 1970 the government's monetary and fiscal policy has been definitely geared toward development and expansion in Canada and that the government has had to bear a very heavy load of expenses in order to stimulate the economy.

Furthermore, the government brought down, early in May, a budget designed explicitly to cope with the defects mentioned in the motion now before us.

Before considering specific programs, it is appropriate to recall some figures and facts related to our economy. Last year, for instance, our economic growth rate was 5½ per cent and the rate estimated for 1972 is approximately 6 per cent. This growth was certainly felt in the field of good and services.

Reference to figures for 1964 reveals that the value of our exports of finished products was $1,400 million for that year whereas in 1971 this figure was $6,600 million. The difference between those two amounts represents an average annual increase of 25 per cent. Canada's commercial surplus in 1971 was $2,100 million and was second only to that of 1970, which was the highest ever.

If you also consider housing starts for 1971, you realize that 233,000 units were produced, which was an unprecedented achievement.

As a matter of fact, the government has taken very wise measures concerning the economy. However, what many people will not recognize is that sometimes business does not respond immediately to economic indicators and incentives used by governments or by the most aggressive groups in this country.

When economic conditions become more encouraging, there is first an increase in business and industrial productivity, in an attempt to keep pace. However, a certain period of time has to elapse usually before the increase will result in investments and expenditures. I believe it is very important to take into account the adjustment period that extends from the beginning of an economic revival to the beginning of the upswing in investment.

But there is evidence that the economy is in progress and that the government measures show their good effects when we consider that companies report a 36.2 per cent increase in profits for the first quarter of 1972.

As far as the incentives programs are concerned, it is good to look at some of them within the framework of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion policy, which usually highly interests the members of this House.

Employment Incentive Programs

Under the incentives program to industry, a program which promotes and encourages the manufacturing industry in the Atlantic provinces, for instance, at the beginning of February last, 249 grant offers had been accepted.

Under the Regional Development Incentives Act, capital expenditures amounted to approximately $201,000,000, thus contributing to the creation of 9,800 jobs, equal to 19 per cent of the total number of jobs expected under the program for the whole of Canada. This percentage is much higher than the unemployment rate of the Atlantic regions compared with the rest of Canada.

What is unusual is that everybody—liberal members and the liberal government prove it every day—is highly interested in reducing the rate of unemployment and in creating new jobs. It is recognized that the unemployment rate is much too high. In fact, we talk about a rate of 6 per cent but we never mention the other Canadians—the 94 per cent who are employed. We are wont to discuss only what goes wrong, yet there are many people working in Canada and living very well, a fact that makes Canada one of the most advanced countries in the world, and a fact that we are not ashamed to discuss with our colleagues nor with the citizens or groups of citizens of other countries which we occasionally visit.

I would like to mention the FRED program as it applies to northeastern New Brunswick and which is under way for the greater welfare of this area, and the Prince Edward Island development program which, according to the 1969 agreement, provides for a grant of $118,500,000 by the Regional Economic Expansion Department.

In Quebec, the province where I live and where the constituency of Rimouski is located, under the grants to industry program, at the beginning of February, 671 grant offers had been accepted, following attractive requests from industries whose capital expenditures amounted to about $600,000,000, in order to create 29,800 jobs.

In Quebec also, I think we must consider the five special zones created. As to the various community services, under the agreement creating these special zones, in this province as well as elsewhere in Canada, financial arrangements have been agreed upon within the program of assistance to provide secondary services in communities in view of helping already established industries and of attracting new ones; as at last March, these grants amounted to $142,800,000.

I would also like to say a word about what has been accomplished in the Lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé regions towards rural and social development. Instead of being designated "special", that region has been called a "pilot region"; in this way it benefits from a number of grants applicable to special regions; but according to a specific agreement, it is designated as a "pilot region" for the purposes of the FRED program as applied to the Lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé regions. In 1971, when the agreement came under review, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion pumped into it an additional amount of $153 million.

Many other places, too numerous to name, also enjoy similar benefits. I think of the Prairie provinces which, in 1972-73, will receive grants and take advantage of loans; one can also consider the cost of what is known as the farm assistance, which represents about $21 per person. That can be compared with similar per capita amounts—$22 or $28 according to the situation—paid in some regions of Quebec. An amount of $97 per person is granted in the Atlantic region.

Insofar as I know, the Prairie provinces have also benefited from the industrial incentive programs; if one considers the statistics for February, 214 offers had been accepted, taking into account an investment of $180 million, thus creating about 8,150 jobs.

For the whole of Canada, if we consider the old industrial incentives act, administered by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion for the benefit of certain regions, 19,600 jobs have been created. The difference between the number of jobs created and the number anticipated is below 2 per cent, which is a very interesting result.

One could also consider the achievements, the programs and the policy established within the jurisdiction of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. According to one of the latest reports of that department, the budget earmarks an amount of $75,400,000 for grants and various contributions.

There are other statutory programs, of which the general incentive program IRDIA representing $30,100,000, the Automotive Assistance Program, $11 million and the DIP program, to help modernize the Canadian defence program, amounting to some $6,700,000.

Those grants and subsidies amount to a total of $123,200,000.

I shall only mention as well the program the same department adopted to help shipbuilding in Canada; everyone knows that this Department of Industry, Trade annd Commerce program was of immeasurable assistance to the workers in Canadian shipyards.

In closing, I should like to mention an important detail: it seems strange that hon. members of the opposition always seem to see the gloomy side of Canada, while other countries—and the OECD for instance—consider that Canadian economic growth in 1971 ranked amongst the highest in the world. One of the leading newspapers in England, the Times, gave Canada first prize for the best general economic evolution amongst all industrialized countries in the western world.

[English]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity of becoming involved in this debate because I think the motion before the House is meaningful. May I bring to your attention, Sir, something I learned as a result of being involved with the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration when it was dealing with Bill C-183.

When I was asked to become involved in the debate on this motion it suddenly dawned on me that a strange anomaly has developed in this country. On one hand the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has earmarked millions of dollars for innovation—or technological change, if you will—and has been saying to industry and manufacturers, "Come and see us; we will grant you money in order to make you more competitive in domestic and international markets." On the other hand, because technological changes, as defined in the act, are being encouraged the government has said that collective agreements which have been closed may be reopened. In other words, the effects of technological change may be looked into and if labour and management do not reach a new agreement a strike may ultimately result.

That is the anomaly to which I refer. On one hand the government gives money to industry in order to place it in a more competitive position, while on the other hand and at the same time it is strangling industry. If a collective agreement which is closed, is opened and no new agreement is reached, labour can use its ultimate weapon, the strike—the weapon which is being increasingly questioned.

We are all concerned about full employment and economic growth. Now and again, however, we must place our finger on and be concerned about—I say this with all due respect—those who are directly involved in this process. We have discussed this question at length. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I come from an industrial city of which I am proud. Voluminous legislation is produced affecting those in business who must decide how to increase productivity. Businessmen tell me that almost every time they turn around, a new law comes down. For the big company this is fine; it has the wherewithal for high-priced lawyers, accountants, public relations men, lobbies, and so on. Big companies can afford to sit down, peruse and analyse government legislation as it is passed almost each month.

I am concerned about the small chap, the businessman who does not have that sort of wherewithal. How is he to survive? Where is he to get his advice? From the Globe and Mail? From the Hamilton Spectator? Will those newspapers tell him how he is to move and what his rights are? I am greatly concerned about the type of legislation this government passes. I will not discuss this question at great length; I merely wish to put on record my thoughts. This government is hypocritical. It has indicated that it supports full employment, economic growth and helping the helpless whether they be individuals or organizations in the corporate structure; at the same time, however, it has passed legislation that is bound to create frustration, confusion, disenchantment—

Mr. Munro: And consternation.

Mr. Alexander: —and consternation, as the minister says.

An hon. Member: What's his name?

Mr. Alexander: Yes, what's his name?

Mr. MacKay: The minister of wealth and hell fare!

Mr. Alexander: Bills such as the one I referred to, which deal with labour matters, give rise to consternation. I thank the minister for suggesting the word.

Something else bothers many people, particularly those this government expects to carry the load in the private sector. It is this: People feel they are never listened to. They have developed theories and rational arguments which, if heeded, would put this government on the right road. But the government does not listen. I am looking at the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Laing) and I ask, what happens to most of these suggestions? I suggest they wind up in the wastepaper basket. People who try to set this government straight or give it the benefit of their wisdom are engaged for the most part in an exercise in futility.

I am particularly interested in DREE as it affects the city of Hamilton. If we look at the report from the other place, which deals with issues such as this, we find the following:

It appears to the committee that a policy designed to distribute industrial growth more evenly around the regions, desirable as it undoubtably is, should be conceived within the framework of an overall industrial and technological strategy. For instance, using government subsidies to destroy or weaken firms well located in one region by creating new competitors artificially located in another is not in the long term national or regional interest. These artificial growths can damage prosperous areas without establishing a solid basis for industrial expansion in less developed regions, since they cannot be subsidized permanently. In Canada and elsewhere experience shows that this kind of approach leads to a waste of public funds, rising expectations and eventually bitter disillusion in the areas eligible for special assistance.

That applies to instances where industry is brought in to compete with industry which is already established. What concerns me is that the government should have no qualms whatsoever about removing industry from one place in order to create employment in another, thereby causing unemployment in the city from which the industry was taken. Here I make specific reference to Hamilton. The first instance was Aerovox, the second is of recent vintage. This is the one involved with Acme Seeley Business Systems Limited of Toronto.

The hon. member for York North, or from one of the other constituencies in that area, appeared puzzled that the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) should question the government in this connection. I want to let hon. members know what really happened. Acme Seeley Business Systems, as a result of a DREE grant of $862,000 or more, has created 137 jobs in Renfrew. But what did they do? Do hon. members know what was done in the city of Toronto? The subsidiary is Jackson Metal Industries. Through this subsidiary, 136 jobs were involved in Toronto and in Hamilton before the company moved to Renfrew. So what was the gain? One job is gained in Renfrew, and 136 people are turned out of work.

I am here today to raise objection on behalf of the City of Hamilton and other cities throughout the country which have experienced this sort of thing. I see the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) smiling. I do not know whether he is acquainted with this situation but he is a responsible minister, to some extent, and I hope he understands what I am trying to put across. It is impossible for a government to do this sort of thing and remain credible.

The issue which arises is wider than the two cases I have mentioned. How many other cases are there of a similar nature? How many millions of dollars of public funds are being used to deprive people in non-designated areas of their jobs? This is a legitimate question and I hope that at some time it will be answered. If I can give two illustrations arising within the cities of Hamilton and Toronto, it is likely that a great many more can be found within our society.

Mr. Whelan: The environment is better in Renfrew.

Mr. Alexander: Does the hon. member wish to speak? The hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan) can always do so if he wishes.

In the past, when such instances came to light, the minister always managed to give an explanation which he hoped would sound plausible. He would say the firms would have gone out of business had the department not helped them. No doubt we shall get further, supposedly plausible explanations in the days to come, because I understand the minister has a fertile mind.

But why should well-placed, well-established firms find difficulty in surviving? It is not, I suggest, because of their own incapacity; it is primarily the result of the policies of the government. After all, if a manufacturer is producing in a city where housing costs are rising, where confrontation between management and labour rather than negotiation is the rule, where food costs are rising, where property taxes are rising, these are circumstances which have to be met by salary increases. If governments do not move in to alleviate the situation, industry will move to a lower-cost region. So don't let members opposite tell me industry had to move because otherwise it would have gone under. It is up to them to tell me why it would have gone under.

It seems to me that on an increasing number of occasions DREE grants are being used to transfer employment from one region to another. This gives cause for serious concern. One possible deterrent to this being done would be to deduct from the incentive grant an amount based on the reduction of employment at a company's other plants. If within a two-year period following the initial payment of a grant a company were to reduce its employment levels elsewhere in Canada, the repayment of part or all of the grant should be required. At present, a company is only required to make repayments if it reduces employment at the facility in respect of which the grant was made.

Let me deal, now, with another area affecting the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is noted that grants to industry to stimulate innovation have increased from approximately $58 million in 1968-69 to $114 million in the current fiscal year. That amounts to an increase of about 94 per cent in only four years. These grants primarily affect transportation, the metal industries and electrical concerns. But the significant fact, as revealed by Statistics Canada, is that there has been little increase in research and development expenditures by industry since 1969. As a matter of fact, efforts in this direction have been decreasing. In the electrical, transportation and machinery sectors we find that innovation expenditures have fallen from $176 million in 1969 to a predicted $162 million this year. Remember, it is in these sectors that the majority of the grants have been concentrated.

These figures demonstrate the failure of the incentives program to stimulate innovation. This should not surprise us, since the greatest stimulus to innovation is a high level of demand for a company's product. The government has failed to provide this stimulus. The recent budget epitomizes this failure by doing very little to increase consumer demand. We on this side continue to say this could have been achieved by reducing personal income tax payable by the lower and middle income groups. The government can allocate all the grants and subsidies in the world, but if there is no demand for a product it is wasting its time. How is demand to be created? We say it can be done by cutting taxes and putting the money back into the pockets of consumers. But the government says no. To my mind, small firms, even if they could take advantage of incentive and development programs—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

• (2100)

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have been paying attention to this debate and I want to commend the opposition for having raised this particular subject. I would have thought they would have taken advantage of the opportunity to display their knowledge of the subject and to provide alternatives to the existing programs of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Unfortunately, they have been barren in their speeches in putting forward possible alternatives. They really come down to merely repeating monotonous criticisms as if they actually believe they are true.

Mr. Alexander: You did not listen to my speech.

Mr. Reid: When people do not have anything to say, they tend to repeat themselves over and over again so that the full weight of their ignorance can be displayed.

This motion suggests that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, along with all the other incentive programs that are operated by the federal government, have failed to stimulate production and trade. Yet we know that according to the most recent monthly report to Parliament, the net accepted offers under the Regional Development Incentives Act have helped to induce in the designated regions of Canada planned capital expenditures in manufacturing facilities totalling over $1.2 billion.

In addition, the motion also suggests that the incentives program has failed to open up increased opportunities for productive employment. Yet according to the same monthly report, a copy of which all hon. members of the opposition have had, including the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), the projects supported by accepted offers of grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act are expected to create almost 59,000 direct, new jobs. If anything, this is a conservative estimate because it makes no allowance for off-site jobs directly related to assisted projects or for the indirect or multiplier effects on employment, though economists are generally agreed that these are of significant benefit.

We all know that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was created in 1968 to do a number of things. First of all, it was designed to bring under one roof a melange of programs that had been built up, such as ARDA, FRED, the Atlantic Development Council, and so on, in order to try to provide some measure of co-ordination and to make sense out of a variety of approaches that had been developed to meet ad hoc needs.

In addition to the new act that was passed, the government introduced an incentives program to deal with disparity existing between the rich and the poor regions of Canada. Basically, the rich areas of Canada are Ontario, the strongest and richest province of all, British Columbia and Alberta. The main focus of the program was to be on the maritime provinces and that part of Quebec east of Quebec City, including Trois-Rivières.

A look at the figures reveals precisely what the government has done over the last four years. Let me give the House an example. Breaking down the budgetary figures for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the year 1971-72, out of a total of $410 million, 42 per cent was devoted to the Atlantic provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, to an amount of $172 million. In the province of Quebec, 26 per cent of the total budget was spent, amounting to approximately $100 million. In the western provinces, 18 per cent of the budget was spent, amounting to $73 million. In Ontario, 8 per cent of the budget was spent, to a total of $32 million.

Looked at on a per capita basis, this expenditure becomes much more interesting. In the Maritimes approximately $85 per capita was spent by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. On a per capita basis the figure drops to about $18 in the province of Quebec, to about $14 in the western provinces and to about $5 in Ontario. So I think these figures bear out the claim that the government has concentrated its funds where the greatest need and largest area of unemployment has been historically, and still is today; areas where there are extremely severe structural problems both in regard to long-term employment opportunities and in terms of an economy that is losing some of its natural resource base. There is no easy way out of this problem, but I think the government has taken a great deal of unnecessary political criticism for doing precisely what it said it was going to do in order to deal with what is clearly a distinct problem that is unique to Canada.

I should like to make a number of criticisms of this department as I have seen it in operation, notwithstanding the fact that it has been very useful. My criticisms are threefold. The first has to do with the way in which the department was established. When the act was passed establishing the department, a great deal of power was concentrated in the hands of the minister. The argument for this was that it would allow the minister to be more flexible, that it would allow the department to be more flexible, that it would allow programs to be tailor-made for all areas of Canada.

What has been the result of this? In my opinion the department has become the most regulation-bound and least flexible of all departments of government. The reason is that too much power is concentrated in the hands of the minister. The minister is afraid to use his power and to be as flexible as he would like because of the severe political barrage he has been under from members of the opposition during the last four years. What members of the opposition have succeeded in doing is to destroy whatever flexibility was built into the act, and consequently we now have a department that has all the appearances of being able to travel at a fast speed but which in point of fact has a governor on the throttle, which makes the department travel at 50 miles an hour whereas it should be travelling at 150 miles an hour.

It seems to me that the original concept of the department, one that was accurate and precise, of flexibility has given way to political reality and in the result we now have a department that is far less flexible than we desire. It may well be that we should begin to look again at this whole concept and perhaps remove this built-in flexibility so that, paradoxically, the department can be made much more flexible in its approach.

Another criticism that I have is that the incentive program is designed in a way that favours large corporations, not only with regard to the $600,000 application level but also, and perhaps more importantly, because of the way the department have structured their application procedure and the way in which they decide who shall and who shall not receive an incentive grant. This places host communities in a rather unfortunate position. It is true that before a large company comes into an area, the area is suffering from lack of employment opportunities. However, when a sufficiently large company locates in the area, the employment opportunities that are opened up are of a limited kind, usually semi-skilled or unskilled, and perhaps a few skilled positions. But participation in the managerial exercise of operating the company is a prospect that is denied to the community, for the people who run such an organization are imported; the local people do not penetrate the higher echelons of the company.

In other words, while we are providing employment opportunities of a limited kind that are welcome, needed and desirable for the area, in point of fact we are not providing opportunities for communities to develop a cadre of local people with initiative who are sufficiently skilled to set up other businesses in the area. One of the effects of this is that the community that a company enters is left the poorer because there is no opportunity to develop that high level of expertise for which modern management calls. Thus, the host community does not strengthen the economy of the country.

It seems to me that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, in conjunction with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, ought to be paying far more attention to the encouragement of local entrepreneurs. It is often said that three factors are required to make business work—land, labour and entrepreneurship. Unfortunately, in many communities, such as my own for example, the level of entrepreneurship is not highly developed. The dilemma that these people face in obtaining sufficient markets for their products is almost overwhelming.

Unfortunately, because of the way in which our system operates the smaller operator is not given the opportunity of getting that extra expertise. It strikes me there are two approaches to be taken here. One is a management development program in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and particularly restructuring in such a way that grants to smaller firms could be handled through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

It seems to me this could be done in a number of ways. First of all, by expediting grants and demanding, perhaps, less completed work. If you are applying for a loan at the present time, you must have gone to a bank or financial institution for the money in order to get into commercial production. It would be a lot simpler if you were to give smaller operators the money as their plants were in the process of developing, thereby cutting down the expenses they have to incur in order to get loans from Canadian commercial banking facilities.

I have one more point to make. It concerns both large and small companies and their relationship with the Canadian financial community, particularly the Canadian banking system. At the present time these companies which come in with non-Canadian financial support are treated in exactly the same way as those which come in and make an application to DREE with only Canadian financial support. I argue that this discriminates against the company that comes in with only Canadian financial support.

We all know that it is a fact of life that in Canada the financial community is not sufficiently strong to give these people enough financial backing. If you treat those who come in with strong, solid United States financial support in the same way as you treat the companies who have only Canadian financial support, the one with U.S. support will be much stronger. The Canadian financial system is not sufficiently strong and is not prepared to put the kind of money that has to be put into these areas covered by DREE.

I am told that these companies are perfectly sound in that they are building big banking buildings in Toronto and Montreal. But our banking system is perfectly lousy when it comes to financing secondary industry in the outer fringes of Canada, particularly in those areas designated under DREE. Therefore, it seems to me that any company coming to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion with the misfortune of having its financial support in Canada ought to be given a special grant under DREE, perhaps an increased grant of 15 per cent to 20 per cent would be an appropriate figure, in order to help compensate that company whose only source of capital is Canadian.

This is one of the traditional problems of the outer fringes. They are unfortunately faced with lack of capital to begin with, and when they do get that capital it is not even sufficiently strong that the financial institution will support the project to the bitter end, even if it does involve making money. The Canadian banking system is perfectly able to cut losses and run.

In making these criticisms I certainly do not want to deny the very good work the department has done. I do want to point out that to some extent the restriction in terms of secondary industry limits the effectiveness of operations in northern Ontario and northern Quebec where it is not likely that a strong secondary manufacturing industry will suddenly emerge. It seems to me that if we are going to provide assistance through the federal government to these areas, we will have to widen and improve the opportunities available under DREE. For example, I would suggest expanding the section in respect of secondary industry to include tertiary industries such as the tourist industry, hotels and motels in these regions, because this seems to be one of the bright spots in the growth pattern of these particular regions.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I think it is very useful that a motion has been brought forward today which attempts to take an over-all view of the whole range of the government's incentive programs as they are applied through a number of government departments. It can be said that the government's incentive programs do not represent a co-ordinated or a planned program and this is really one of the basic deficiencies. What we have is a patchwork approach which involves the constant plugging of loopholes.

Usually these programs brought forward represent a response to a particular problem or situation. In every case we see demonstrated the government's faith in the infallibility and reliability of private corporations to keep the economy healthy. I suggest there is a very basic conflict in government involved in this situation. On one hand we see that it still wants to demonstrate its faith in corporate capitalism, while on the other hand it has to recognize that it cannot escape the fact that in today's world government must accept final responsibility for the performance of the economy. Of necessity, and no matter whether the government likes it, there has to be a degree of government intervention in the economic affairs of the nation.

Tonight I should like to deal with one particular aspect of the government's incentive program, namely, that carried out through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. We see in this department one of the best examples of the folly of the government's approach. This department, which was created in 1969 in keeping one of the promises made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the last federal election campaign, was designed to do something about the problem of regional disparity in Canada. Over the past three years this department has spent $1.2 billion, and during the current fiscal year it will incur an expenditure of another $500 million. Certainly this department has not had to contend with any restrictions in its budgets. It should be noted that the expenditures to which I refer include millions of dollars spent on programs the government now admits it has to overhaul or has had to overhaul.

Perhaps I should first make reference to some comments of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Roberts). I took careful note of his comments. He was rather critical of our criticisms about the lack of progress in overcoming regional disparity. I think I quote him correctly when I say he suggested that this will take a period of years. None of us has any quarrel with that statement, but surely after three years in operation and the expenditure of the sums of money I have mentioned we have cause to take a look at the progress being made by the government? Is it making any progress in overcoming regional disparity?

We want something in the way of a progress report. On any number of occasions evidence and information has been given to this House to show that the governments policy is not solving regional disparity.

I took note of what the parliamentary secretary said about Professor Springate's testimony before the regional development committee this spring. The comments of the parliamentary secretary represent the first objective analysis of that presentation that I have heard from anybody on the government side of the House. I want to make it clear that I am not necessarily holding a brief for the comments of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), but I would have to agree with what the parliamentary secretary said, that one cannot draw conclusions from Professor Springate's study. Rather, he opened up areas which require further study and investigation. He posed some very serious questions about the operation of the department which require further analysis.

After Professor Springate presented his critical analysis to the committee, with all the qualifications outlined by the parliamentary secretary, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) and government members on the committee did everything they could to belittle Professor Springate's thesis and the PhD he obtained at Harvard University. As a matter of fact, their efforts went to the extent of even calling into question the qualifications and capabilities of the tutoring he received in writing his thesis at Harvard University. That is how desperate government members were to discredit this person who made such a useful contribution in an examination of the government's program in respect of this department.

I think the principal area of criticism of the department's program concerns the industrial incentives program carried on under the Regional Development Incentives Act. This, of course, received top priority in the department's program. In many ways it has been the cornerstone of the department's program. Under this act $250 million have been committed by way of special grants to the end of April. I suggest that the program has been disastrous in its over-all impact. It has not made any significant contribution toward overcoming regional disparities.

I want to make clear that I do not question that there is some place for an incentives program. But if we are to get the best possible value for our money, I suggest such a program should be developed within the framework of a well planned, national, economic plan. I suggest there have been many harmful and inadequate features of this program. In the first place I think it has had the effect of distorting, ruining and hampering many of the other worth-while programs which are being carried on by the department. The industrial incentives program has had top priority on the basis of the minister's statements and on the basis of statements by officials of the department. There have been lavish handouts to industry.

There are other programs such as the Multiplex program in New Brunswick which we would like to see given greater priority, and the agriculture service centre program in the Prairies. These are the type of programs which could make a basic contribution toward establishing a better economic framework to enable the various regions of Canada to overcome the disadvantages they now face.

What happens? In dealing with some of these other programs which are worth while, the department haggles over a few thousand dollars in carrying on negotiations or in reaching agreement, while on the other hand it gives out money by the bucketful to private industry in the giveaway programs. I suggest that if there were more emphasis on infrastructure programs, more planning, more co-ordination and more emphasis on programs of social adjustment, we would have better results.

Certainly we must criticize the passive nature of the program. We wait for private corporations to take the initiative. This program is based on the premise that if given encouragement, private industry will do the rest of the job. In many instances private corporations have created the problem the department is now attempting to correct. There is no plan of action either for regions of this country or for the country as a whole. No program can succeed until there is an adequate framework. We have called for this ever since the department was formed.

I suggest we must criticize this program because of the grants to foreign-controlled firms. I think it has been demonstrated through government studies and various evidence that the high degree of foreign ownership in our country has in fact contributed to regional disparities. It has not helped some of the disadvantaged areas and in fact it has contributed to disparities. Now we find, on the basis of the legislation which is being brought forward, that we have a continuance of handouts to foreign-controlled firms to carry on business as usual.

After a long study we have had the Gray report brought before the House. Then we have the measly foreign takeover review bill which is now before the committee. Let us look at the implications for the regional development program with this foreign takeover review bill. I ask what foreign concern, what foreign firm, would want to take over or merge with another Canadian firm when it can expand its present operations or start new operations with the type of generous help it can obtain under our Regional Development Incentives Act? In addition, they have over half the country to pick from when choosing a location for their operations. The government has completely ignored this, while even the province of Ontario has eliminated its forgiveable loans to foreign-controlled firms.

I suggest that we look at the nature of the program itself and what is happening to it. First, I believe it has become clear from evidence presented that all that happens is that the program speeds up decisions which would otherwise have been taken by firms: it does not affect the basic yes or no decision; all it does is have some influence on the timing. More than that, I raised the question of the legality of the grants, because section 7 of the act specifies that no development incentive may be authorized if it is probable that the facility would be established, expanded or modernized without the provision of such incentive.

Two deputy ministers have said that grants are merely likely to accelerate decisions rather than affect a negative decision. The minister has told us that no legal opinion has been obtained from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) on whether grants can be given under these circumstances, and he gave no undertaking that such legal opinion would be given. In addition, it states in the legislation that grants can be given on the basis of the creation of jobs. I understand "creation of jobs" to mean the bringing in of new jobs which were not there before. In other words, it means that something new is to be done to develop the country.

We find, however, that in some instances this is not the case. This came to light last week when I asked questions in the House of Commons concerning a grant given to Maniwaki Forest Products Limited. I want to make it clear that I have great sympathy for the situation in Maniwaki. I know this situation has concerned the people in that community and their representative in the House of Commons, my friend the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre), who certainly has attempted to do something for his constituency.

I raised this matter in the House of Commons last Thursday because it was stated by the manager, in spite of the announcement that 74 new jobs would be created, that he did not know anything about 74 new jobs and all he knew was that the 74 jobs which are now there will be retained. I asked questions in the House about this and dealt with it during the adjournment debate; therefore I shall not go into the background. I am not questioning the validity of providing help to this firm, but I am questioning the basis on which the government gave $1,500 for each of the 74 jobs that were to be created by this project. I submit this is false, on the basis of the act under which grants are provided.

An hon. Member: You are all wet.

Mr. Burton: The fact, as I have said, is that I have no quarrel with the argument that assistance for this firm is valid and warranted. What I am questioning is the way in which the minister is operating this act, because I believe he is bringing the whole program and the administration of the act into question by the manner in which he is applying it. Not just in this particular case; I am not picking on this particular case. There are a number of cases. The minister and many members on the government side, including the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) said that through the program under the Regional Development Incentives Act, 59,000 new jobs have been created and not just kept in existence. No new jobs were created in that case and I suggest we should look at the operation or we may have other problems in respect of the administration of the act.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested by today's speeches and I am rising for a few minutes only to remind my colleagues of certain facts which they seem to have forgotten.

The government tabled today a summary report of the Prices and Incomes Commission, on inflation, unemployment and economic policy. This report states and I quote:

As compared with most countries, there is in Canada an extremely high number of young people entering the labour market and meeting great difficulties in finding adequate full-time occupations; moreover, a high percentage of workers are salaried people. A high turnover rate and the seasonal nature of employment are further characteristics of Canadian labour markets. And yet we believe that the most important and baffling aspect of this problem is the continuance of regional disparities in unemployment in Canada.

This is a contradiction and a condemnation of what was said today in connection with government policies or initiatives to create employment.

The statement on page 7 is significant:

Moreover, the possibility of ever increasing inflation will exist if people and their elected representatives have an exceedingly optimistic vision about the extent to which this critical unemployment phase has been reduced.

I therefore appeal to reason and realism.

Finally I would like to quote a last sentence condemning the culprit. I am quoting from page 12:

Since governments are responsible for the whole administration of our economy, it is obvious that if they allow any excessive inflation of demand, they must bear the responsibility, whatever might be the direct impact of public expenses as such.

Mr. Speaker, this is something that should give us food for thought.

I said I will not take very long. I wanted only to remind my hon. colleagues that they have all received today a copy of this publication, in both official languages, and that we should well understand that the so-called twin problem of unemployment and inflation still persists in spite of the $578 million granted under the special government program aimed at creating employment and the actions and efforts he has made to this effect.

The government has trodden the wrong path and, today, we recognize that it is mistaken, that it has travelled the wrong track since it favoured an increased production while this has already reached the $100 billion mark, according to information published today by a Montreal newspaper. The problem does not exist at the level of production, but at the level of the ability of Canadians to market it.

I have said and I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the problem in Canada is not one of production or of creation of jobs, but one of consumption. Canadians should have enough purchasing power to buy the products available on the market.

The global purchasing power, the total income of Canadians amounts to $67 billion and the gross national product $100 billion. How is it possible to buy a production worth $100 billion with $67 billion? That is mathematically impossible, Mr. Speaker, and as long as the government will continue to increase those $100 billion and refuse to spend as much effort to increase the consumption power, it will always find itself in the same situation as it is now.

During the weekend, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) said at the Cabano in front of 2,000 persons that he could not meet their request for the establishment of a pulp and paper plant. He told them that he was not sure, according to the studies which he had, that those products alone would sell on the market. Yet, that same government asked those very workers to invest in that industry, to set it up to replace Irving.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Mr. Speaker, today the government says: We cannot help you because we are not sure. Why is the government not sure? It is sure Canadian workers can work, that the goods, the equipment are there. The workers even invested $700,000 of their savings in that new company. The government is not sure the goods will sell on the Canadian market.

If, Mr. Speaker, the problem does not lie in the hearts of the workers of Cabano, in the equipment, in the pulp and paper, but obviously, as the minister said, in the demand, then why not invest as much in the demand as has been invested in the production in the last three years?

Mr. Speaker, there are not two ways open. Again recently, the government announced the sale of bonds for a total of $400 million, asking Canadians to invest in their country. Here is the saddest and, in a way, most extraordinary part: the government sells this $400 million worth of bonds strictly in order to pay back the bonds which have now matured. This means that this government's whole financial policy consists in borrowing in order to pay its old debts, so that the debt of the country, that of the provinces and that of individuals grow heavier.

As a consequence, no matter how many millions the government throws right and left in order to have a clear conscience, it remains that poverty will go on increasing in Canada, that regional disparity will still be an awful reality, that those programs will be nothing but plasters applied to little sores, to what shows most, while obviously nothing will be done about the underlying disease which causes those superficial sores.

Mr. Speaker, we of the Social Credit party do not want to play politics by taking up any more of the time of the House with this matter. I ask my colleagues to give serious consideration to the fact that after four years in power, after establishing boards, one of which condemns it today, after encouraging production in order to curtail inflation and unemployment, the government has met with complete failure.

Several million dollars are paid out to Canadians in order to try and reduce unemployment and inflation. If Parliament is acting in good faith, let it then give to Canadians the opportunity of really sharing in the economic growth of their country so that they may afterwards share in its social development, by giving the Canadian people what is lacking to dispose of the production which we are so anxious to increase, that is the illogical and unacceptable gap between the total national income and the gross national product. If the government ever understands this, we will eliminate the regional disparities from coast to coast, because we will have given to every Canadian, regardless of his language, an equal chance to really participate in the economic growth of his country.

In conclusion, I point out that the motion moved by the Progressive Conservatives blames the government for its failure to stimulate production. This motion makes me laugh because the Conservatives today blame the Liberals for failing to do what they themselves have not done, and they cast a stone at one another.

I hope that in the near future solutions will really be produced in this House, instead of mere criticisms. The Social Credit party suggests an effective solution: giving Canadians sufficient purchasing power to dispose of the production which I trust Canadian industry will supply.

Mr. Florian Côté (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, today's proceedings emphasized all the shortcomings of the present government as a result of a motion brought forward yesterday. I became aware of it only at noon and I saw that it blamed the government for its inability to face its responsibilities during the past four years. In fact, it is said that the money made available to industry for the purpose of coping with regional disparity had not successfully settled the problem of unemployment.

I know there are problems, those which every country has to face for its development are similar to those we have in Canada. However, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Richardson) mentions the efforts made by the Canadian government in the field of employment and in this field we are second to no other country. We have made noble endeavours even though we still have a long way to go. In fact, if it had not been for the present government, the unemployment rate of 6 per cent—which some like to bring up to 7 and 9 per cent—might be 10 or 15 per cent as in other countries.

If we consider some of the formulas suggested today by the movers of the motion, I do not see there, if I understood well, any real solutions; they merely pointed out what they think is wrong with government policies.

Industry was blamed because it did not do well enough in Canada. But industry—and this is normal—is somewhat like a human being; it is born, it can be sick and it can die. What can the State do to avoid this difficulty? It establishes and tries to establish industries in depressed areas in order to keep there those who are seeking a job not too far from their environment.

Therefore, we try to create some new industries. In fact, I have not heard a member of the opposition criticize this policy of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, nor have I heard of anyone refusing the grants and saying: "I refuse these grants because they are not advantageous for my area" Opposition members knew as well that it was impossible for the government to fill up everything it wanted to and that there would still be a bit of room for criticism.

I was somewhat disappointed to hear the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth), of whom I have a very high opinion, begin his speech by saying that he was tired to hear members of the present government repeat what the government had been doing. It is unfortunate that he be tired, Mr. Speaker. I would like him to get some rest, so that he may come back to us in form, after the next election which will certainly take place within a year. I wish he will not be tired enough to fall apart during the election period, because I have a lot of respect for him. If he came back, he might be of some help to us.

He mentioned in his speech the weakness of the agricultural policy as well as the program concerning industrial investments. Now, I noted, during the meetings of the committee on agriculture, which I attended whenever possible, that a proportion of Canadian industries are not as flourishing as I would like them to be, but that they had made tremendous progress, despite the very difficult conditions that agriculture, in every part of the world, had to suffer. We can be proud, as Canadians, to have an agricultural industry that survived somewhat better than elsewhere.

But in order to make this industry even more flourishing, we introduced truly good measures, and provided the establishment of the Marketing Board. Even if my colleagues from the Social Credit party opposed this bill from the beginning, they were compelled to approve it later because farmers have exerted pressures in order to have it passed as soon as possible. This bill was passed within less than one year. We might then have spared this industry some difficulties, assisted it with more effective marketing of products, given farmers a greater purchasing power, as my hon. friends from the Social Credit party usually say. We wanted to do so, but it was not always easy, because the government's policy was ill-understood by the opposition. I would not blame them, because everyone does not possess the ability to grasp and understand the meaning of everything. However, had we enjoyed a little more cooperation there would be fewer hon. members complaining in the House and our constituents would feel a little more proud of us. I admit all these weaknesses.

Mr. Speaker, I am a bit inclined to talk about the Social Credit party, and the reason is not that the other parties are brighter, since they did not show any recognition of the government's efforts. The leader of the Social Credit party for Canada (Mr. Caouette) has not even dealt with the motion. He preferred to rave about the Bank of Canada and his own philosophy, and ended his speech by asking us to play "Social Credit" even though the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) thinks that we do nothing but play in this House. Nobody would forgive us that kind of game.

I feel we must not misinterpret statistics if we are to come to the right conclusions. I fear that the hon. members whom I had already asked to give me figures may misinterpret them. I saw two possible interpretations. Either those figures were misunderstood, or their full meaning was not grasped. I was right. All this came up in the agricultural committee, where I did a great deal of work, as well as in the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

After dealing with agriculture, I will now turn to the question of grants during the few minutes which I have left.

My constituency has taken advantage of our programs, although no more so than other constituencies in the country. I was a bit hurt at hearing today the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) criticize the government for investing several million dollars in Eastern Canada, while it failed to do the same for Western Canada.

Mr. Speaker, whenever a committee sits, or this House discusses a bill, we are given the chance of helping any part of the country. I went out of my way last spring to urge this House to vote as soon as possible the $65 million to be given as grants to the Western Provinces, for I was convinced that Western Canada needed that money more than any other regions. However, whenever Eastern Canada obtains some grants, the sword of Damocles is dangling over our heads, which is deplorable.

In my constituency, industry and commerce are perhaps thriving. The shipyards, thanks to the new policy of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), have provided employment and are in a position to compete against many others who are unable to outdo us. The reason is that in my constituency the government has carried out a policy which makes it possible to meet labour costs and which has created 3,700 jobs last year alone.

I do not therefore understand why we do not give more serious consideration to the programs set up by the government. When government members rise in this House, I wish they could have at least 30 or 45 minutes. This might be fastidious for those listening to us, but we could then at least once or twice a year, tell opposition members what the government is doing and they could in turn go and ask their constituents whether they are really satisfied. Then, the farm organizations which visit the ridings of opposition members—which I, for one, did—would not be so disappointed to find out that citizens are not informed at all about all that the country is doing for them. This is deplorable, and I do think that those who are indulging in political games in this House may soon find out that the achievements of this government prove that the motion introduced today was in no way justifiable.

[English]

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I shall take part in the debate briefly because the area that I represent feels that it has been disadvantaged by the application of the DREE legislation. In this area we feel that we suffer from unfair competition, with many other parts of the country, because of this government's transportation policy. Our railroad costs are high, and now we feel our problem has been compounded by the DREE program.

Many of the points I wish to make have been covered, some of them very well, by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid). In his forthright manner he has a habit of hitting the nail on the head. It was refreshing to have him come out with the honest statement that the DREE legislation was drafted in an effort to discriminate against wealthy areas. As I have said, the people in the area I represent feel that DREE discriminates against them. I think this is completely wrong, Mr. Speaker. Abraham Lincoln was right when he said over a hundred years ago, and I paraphrase him, "You don't necessarily help the poor by tearing down the rich". I would point out to this government that tearing down the "have" parts of the country does not necessarily build the "have-not" parts in view of the conflicts that take place and the wasted effort.

A few nights ago, during private members' hour, the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. McBride) introduced a bill. He told us that in Carleton Place, which is a non-designated area, the Findlay Foundry has shut down completely, with a loss of 200 jobs. It transferred its production to the province of Quebec, in a designated area. Ostensibly, 200 jobs have been created in Quebec but of course there are 200 less in Ontario, so the net gain to the nation as a whole is nil. Indeed, the net loss to the nation as a whole, in my humble opinion, would be the amount of the DREE grant.

I read in a newspaper recently of a $685,000 grant to Catelli Foods, a subsidiary of the American firm, General Foods. This grant was to enable them to build a plant to produce tomato paste from tomatoes imported from Portugal, Spain and Yugoslavia. Mr. Speaker, the area I come from is one of the prime tomato producing areas in Canada, but there it is impossible for a farmer to get a contract to grow tomatoes. However, the government is now subsidizing a company in Montreal to process imported tomatoes.

Farmers from my area have been coming to Ottawa to meet with officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture in an effort to re-establish the sugar beet industry. So far they have not been successful. But there is some discussion of a new sugar refinery to be built at Cornwall, Ontario, which is a designated area, in order to process imported cane sugar. That mill might have gone to Oshawa, Ontario, except that Oshawa is not a designated area. These are the things, Mr. Speaker, that lead the people in my area to feel that we have been discriminated against and, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River pointed out tonight, perhaps this was the purpose behind the legislation.

In the 30 seconds remaining to me I should like to ask some questions about the Opportunities for Youth program and the Local Initiatives Program. What is their purpose? Are they make-work programs? Are they to be permanent? I do not criticize them except to say that I am afraid in many instances they do not encourage positive production. If we had a booming economy, perhaps then we could enjoy that luxury.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY—POSSIBLE PIPELINE THROUGH EASTERN ARCTIC—ASSURANCE OF MAJORITY CANADIAN OWNERSHIP—HYPOTHECATION OF GAS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on June 7 last, as reported at page 2937 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) two questions with respect to the operations of Panarctic Oil Company Limited. As hon. members know, this is one of the commendable things which the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Laing) accomplished when he was minister of Indian affairs and northern development. He set up a consortium of Canadian companies with the government of Canada, which has enabled the Canadian people to hold 45 per cent of the equity in Panarctic Oil Company Limited.

Unfortunately, its operations have been completely shrouded in secrecy. We have not been able to get a copy of the TENNECO agreement under which gas has been hypothecated for export to five American companies. We have not been able to get information about farmouts of some property owned by Panarctic to various other companies.

The two questions I want to ask about this matter are as follows. Since Panarctic has announced that it now has sufficient gas in place to warrant doing an aerial reconnaissance with a view to building a pipeline, who is to build that pipeline: will it be Panarctic? Also will the people of Canada have a 45 per cent equity in that pipeline, apart from any loan capital which may be involved—I am dealing now with equity capital—or is another consortium to be formed in order to build the pipeline and obtain the main benefit from any gas found by Panarctic Oil: will the Canadian people find that the money they have put up to develop Panarctic is to benefit mainly some other consortium?

Also, I want to know what disposition will be made of the gas in the event that it is found, that the pipeline is feasible and that the supply of gas in place is adequate to justify the construction of a pipeline. An article in the Globe and Mail of June 2 which refers to the aerial reconnaissance Panarctic has undertaken reads in part as follows:

> Mr. Hetherington said market considerations indicate that much of the gas involved would go to the United States.

Mr. Hetherington is president of Panarctic Oil. I want to know if the Canadian taxpayers are to be asked to put their money into the expansion of Panarctic Oil. Are we to be asked to put up money for the building of a pipeline in order to hypothecate gas to the United States when, according to the annual report of the National Energy Board, as of June 30 last year there was a deficit in our reserves of natural gas of 1.1 trillion cubic feet?

It will be useless for the parliamentary secretary or a minister of the government to tell me that this matter will be decided when this question is heard by the National Energy Board. The National Energy Board can only deal with those who make an application. If the application is made by a consortium of companies apart from Panarctic Oil, or by a consortium in which Panarctic Oil and the government have a small equity, all the board can do is say yes or no.

The government has the responsibility, first, for deciding what its policy is to be. Is it to continue maintaining a 45 per cent equity not only in Panarctic but in the pipeline as well? Second, it has the responsibility for ensuring that this gas is retained in sufficient quantities in Canada to meet the needs of Canadian gas consumers.

Mr. Benjamin: That will not happen if the Liberals have anything to do with it.

Mr. Douglas: We all remember what happened one year ago last October when the National Energy Board allowed the export of 6.3 trillion cubic feet of natural gas to the United States. A year later it was raising its hands in horror because we had to ration gas and were unable to take orders in certain parts of Canada for customers who wanted gas.

Mr. Benjamin: Shame.

Mr. Douglas: So we have a right to know in advance what the government's policy is to be. If the government does not know, if it is just blundering in the dark, it should tell us. I for one will keep insisting that the government tell us what is going on in connection with Panarctic Oil. So long as that venture was a doubtful proposition, there was no objection on the part of the oil industry to the government's putting up 45 per cent of the equity. Now that Panarctic has come across what promises to be one of the best gas finds in the world, I suspect the government is likely to be crowded out of the picture.

I want a definite statement from the government to the effect that it will stay in the picture, that the Canadian taxpayer will have an equity not only in Panarctic but in the pipeline, and that the gas will be hypothecated mainly for Canadian requirements and will not be diverted before Canadian needs are adequately met.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the questions raised by the hon. member are at this stage hypothetical. As soon as a specific application is placed before the National Energy Board for the Development of a pipeline, the board will need to make certain decisions. The first decision it will have to make is whether there is sufficient gas for Canadian requirements and for export. This decision will be made in light of the best technical knowledge available and there is no reason to question the competence of the board in this respect. I note that the hon. member did not do so.

Mr. Douglas: The board cannot make policy.

Mr. Francis: The fact is that the decision will be made in the first instance by the National Energy Board. After that decision is made, the question of the merits of the application before the board will have to be considered.

The government has made abundantly clear, through its participation in Panarctic and in other ways, its concern for Canadian ownership in the pipelines which will ultimately be built to bring gas and oil from northern Canada. At the time the applications are received it will be the responsibility of the Energy Board to make a recommendation. In the first instance this recommendation will come from the board and then the government will have an opportunity to review the situation. It is certainly premature at this time to announce in detail, as the hon. member apparently anticipates, what policies will be followed. Only a general outline of the principles followed by the government can be given at this stage.

TRANSPORT—RESPONSIBILITY OF RAILWAYS TO PEOPLE OWNING LAND ALONG LINES ON WHICH SERVICE ABANDONED

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I raise a matter tonight pertaining to my question this afternoon to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson). In effect, I asked him whether permission given to the railways to abandon service and rights of way also implied permission to abandon their responsibility toward farmers and landowners with respect to the maintenance of fences and drainage and the cutting of weeds.

I speak tonight on behalf of thousands of Canadians who have been inconvenienced and financially wronged by the frequent failure of the railways to fulfil their responsibilities to the farmers and landowners along rights of way when it comes to the maintenance of fences. I speak especially on behalf of farmers and landowners in the counties of Lanark, Frontenac, Lennox and Addington, as well as Hastings, whose properties border the now defunct and abandoned CP line from Glen Tay to Tweed.

I say to the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that when Mr. Pickersgill and his Canadian Transport Commission, or the Canadian Railway Transport Commission, both of which bodies adjudicate with respect to the abandonment of railway lines, allow railway companies to abandon a line, they should not allow them to abandon their responsibilities to their neighbours along the line. Robert Frost said that good fences make good neighbours. This is true. I have received many complaints from local farmers about the poor condition of the fences, as a result of which cattle stray and are lost. They complain that the railway no longer keeps the fences in order, that it no longer does its share of repair work. One man lost two head of steer.

When I drive along the right of way which is adjacent to No. 7 Highway I think of this strange, new, slack society of which this government is part, and the strange anomalies which result. Here we have a multibillion dollar corporation like the CPR—I used to be one of its great admirers, Mr. Speaker, having spent my early childhood in a community served by that line at Kaladar—branching out into many other lucrative lines of business, luxury hotels, mines and smelters, airlines serving the world, but taking a cavalier and careless attitude to local responsibilities. Fence posts are allowed to rot and break off. In addition, the company neglects to cut the weeds and the seeds are allowed to spread to adjacent farms.

Throughout the area, municipal councils are very concerned about this situation as are the conservation authorities, in particular the member municipalities of the Moira Conservation Authority. The representative for Kaladar township, Mr. Claude McArthur, has given me information in this regard. It has also been pointed out that the railways, along abandoned lines no longer devote any attention to drainage or to keeping ditches and key water courses operable and open. This complete dereliction of duty can no longer be tolerated by the neighbouring farmers and landowners.

Some time ago it was brought to my attention that the CPR intended to give this right of way to the Ontario Department of Lands and Forests to operate as a snowmobile trail. Who would then be responsible for the fences, Mr. Speaker? I cannot go along with this scheme because I do not think the stretch of right of way is adaptable for this purpose. I say that the land should be returned to the farmers and landowners along the right of way, each one to receive the land that fronts along his property.

I do not know what the railway paid for this land in 1880 when their charter was granted, but it should be given back to the farmers for a nominal fee of, say, $1 per parcel to make it legal. Then they could join up their fences across the right of way and have use of what is their land just as their forefathers did before the building of the railway. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, I remind the minister that the deeds to the farmlands pre-date the federal charter to the CPR for this line. Moreover, the right of way land, because of its present condition, is not worth as much as before the line was built.

I respectfully ask the minister to convey my thoughts to the CRTC, the CTC and the CPR in order that this inconvenience to my constituents may be allayed and that justice for them may be obtained.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is proficient in both languages, he will certainly pardon me for replying in French, as he will easily understand my explanations.

As the question he asked today was much more general in scope than that which has been discussed tonight, my answer will not be as precise as he would have liked it to be and as I should myself have wished to make it.

In the meantime, I have been able to contact the officials of the Canadian Transport Commission to check on the limits of its jurisdiction in view of the right of ownership which could affect the discontinuation of railway transport.

When a railway is in operation, it is required by statute—in this case, under section 214 of the Railways Act—to put fences on each side of the track in order mainly to prevent animals to wander into the railway's property.

I want to make it clear that the matter involves farm lands located in rural areas. The purpose of this measure is to protect the land owner. The railway company is also responsible for destroying weeds on its own property and, in some circumstances, it must also insure the protection of animals.

Mr. Speaker, before the Board allows a rail service to be discontinued, it must bear in mind the representations made by the land-owners as well as by any other persons living along the railroad, who believe they are entitled to some consideration.

The major factor is that the abandonment of a rail line cannot affect the rights and responsibilities of farmers nor those of the railway company, since they are joint owners.

There may be some responsibilities resulting from continuing relationships between the railway company and its neighbour, as joint owners, that the Board may be authorized to control.

Had the hon. member had in mind this afternoon more specific points such as those he mentioned tonight, I should have been very happy to reply more adequately to his question, but since it was general in scope, I had to answer in the most appropriate way possible.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF VETERANS LAND ACT

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on June 2, as reported at page 2803 of Hansard, I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Laing) the following question:

In view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture has introduced a bill to amend the Farm Credit Act which will increase the limit on loans, can the minister inform the House whether he will be proposing any amendments or changes to the Veterans Land Act?

The minister responded as follows:

Mr. Speaker, there has been a disinclination on the part of the Department of Veterans Affairs to extend and expand the opportunity for veterans to go into farming. It has been regarded as a phase-out operation.

It is an over-all policy of this government to be disinclined to promote farming, including farming by veterans. The government must come to a full recognition that our veterans sacrificed so much for my generation in order that I might grow up in a democratic society. I would point out to those who may wonder why I speak on this topic that I am the first in four generations of my family who has not had to put on a military uniform to serve in the defence of Canada.

This government should have recognition for the people brought into such service and should consider a number of changes in dealing with veterans, including an amendment to update the Veterans Land Act to cover the veterans of the Korean war. Along with that there should be a number of other changes in the method of dealing with veterans in our society. There should be a greater increase in benefits for the 29,000 war veterans under age 65 whose allowances were increased by only 3.6 per cent in the Turner budget. That is one area in which there could be real improvement.

There should be a change in the Old Age Security Act in terms of reducing the age from 65 to 60 for veterans and non-veterans alike. This would further help enhance employment in Canada. Administration in the department for handling applications should be increased to meet the present backlog of applications before the pension commission. I talk of a backlog of some 7,000 applications which have not been dealt with by that department. In addition a single, 100 per cent war disability pensioner receives $3,500 per year. This should be raised to $4,500 as suggested by the Royal Canadian Legion. Along with that there should be increased domiciliary care facilities for disabled veterans within reasonable distance of their residences. These are some of the things that should be done by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Though the years keep extending the distance from the days when these gentlemen served the needs of this country, ours is the generation and the government that should not forget the services they rendered to Canada. The government should be concerned with bringing in changes to ensure that these people are taken care of in this part of the twentieth century.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a good deal of interest to the various charges against the government by the hon. member. I sat as chairman of the committee which last year was responsible for a report, on the basis of which the government substantially rewrote the veterans' charter. I am of a generation that did serve in the last war. The hon. member said he was the first in four generations of his family who had not been obliged to do so. I hope he is never obliged to do so.

This government has by no means forgotten its obligation to veterans. Let me refer, for example, to Bill C-215, to amend the Pension Act, which will increase the number of staff of the pension commission to deal with the backlog of applications of which the hon. member spoke.

As far as the Veterans Land Act is concerned, this was a specific measure introduced after World War II, designed as part of a package for the rehabilitation of veterans, and it has very substantially served that purpose. Many thousands of veterans have been settled on the land as a result of its provisions. But now the decision has been made to phase it out as a specific veterans measure. As the minister indicated in the House, those measures designed to encourage Canadians to go into agriculture are within the responsibility of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). That legislation has been amended, changed and brought up to date but a terminal date has been put on the Veterans Land Act provisions.

In view of the many thousands of applications under the Veterans Land Act, and the government's decision to phase out this aspect of the legislation, it would not be fair to those who have gone before to have changes brought in for those who come in just under the wire, getting the benefit of substantial changes in ceilings, terms and conditions. I think it is only fair and appropriate that measures designed to encourage Canadians to go into agriculture should be dealt with in that context.

There are other measures benefiting veterans. The hon. member touched upon a wide range of them. If I had had a little notice of the range of points he intended to raise, I might have brought more information to the House. But I want to assure the House that Canada has not forgotten its veterans. Canada is well aware of its debt to its veterans and intends to honour it.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LA SALLE—PROTEST AGAINST INACCURATE NEWSPAPER REPORT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege.

Last Saturday, the newspaper La Presse reported that the hon. member for Joliette had asked for the resignation of the right hon. Prime Minister. I should like to advise the House, and at the same time reassure the Prime Minister, that I have never made such a statement. It is my duty to add that the statement was made by another Roch, who is no relative of mine. I trust this incident did not inconvenience the Prime Minister too much.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REPORT BY MINISTER ON UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON THE HUMAN ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment was a great success. Representatives of 112 nations agreed at Stockholm, often unanimously, to a set of principles, an action plan and an organizational structure which will help mankind to fight pollution on land, in the sea and in the air.

The success of the first UN Conference on the Environment was due, in large measure, to the leadership shown by Canada and by Canadians. The efforts of Secretary General, Mr. Maurice Strong, in laying the groundwork for the conference are well known. Our Canadian delegation, with representatives from the provinces and from industry, helped to frame many important resolutions and to ensure that recommendations important to Canada were embodied in the final action plan. Principles of particular interest to a country like Canada with its long coastline and its proximity to highly industrialized areas in the United States were initiated by us and were endorsed by all other nations at the conference, many of which face pollution problems similar to our own.

Before listing a number of Canadian initiatives which were endorsed by the conference at Stockholm, I would like to pay a special tribute to the work done by our officials. Mr. Allan Beesley, more than anyone else at the conference, helped us to take a giant step forward in the development of international environmental law. Mr. Robert Shaw and Dr. David Munro represented Environment Canada with distinction. Mr. Paul Tremblay and Mr. Geoff Bruce of the Department of External Affairs made sure that our recommendations were always in tune with other developments in the United Nations organization and that our Canadian delegation operated like a team at all stages in the conference's deliberations.

I might note, parenthetically, that the international press rated our delegation as the strongest contingent in Stockholm. Its reporters reached this conclusion mainly because we outlined our objectives at the beginning of the conference and then managed, as a result of a great deal of lobbying and debate, to have them emerge virtually unscathed in the final declaration and action plan.

Our collective accomplishments, Mr. Speaker, cover a broad front. They range from the identification of atmospheric pollutants of global concern to the dumping of toxic substances on the high seas. Provisions were made for the protection of endangered species, of wildlife and for the payment of compensation when the effects of pollution originating in one country were felt in another country.

A world registry of clean rivers is to be set up and the harvesting of renewable resources, including fish, must be placed on an optimum, sustained yield basis.

More specifically, in the area of marine pollution Canada deliberately set out to utilize the Stockholm Conference as a means to the further advancement of international law. We tabled a set of marine pollution principles, all 23 of which were endorsed by the conference.

A statement of objectives was also agreed upon, stressing the need to manage ocean space and the special interests of the coastal state in that management process.

The Stockholm Conference referred to a conference to be held in London later this year draft articles for an ocean dumping convention which provides not only for effective control from an environmental point of view but also for enforcement by all parties, including coastal nations, against "ships under their jurisdiction".

With regard to the special rights of coastal states, the Stockholm Conference took note of them and "referred these principles to the 1973 IMCO Conference for information and to the 1973 Law of the Sea Conference for action".

Canada also tabled, well before the conference, a declaration on the human environment consisting of legal principles analogous to the UN declarations of principles on outer space and human rights. We were the first country to do so. Some states opposed the introduction of legal principles into the Stockholm declaration, but we persisted.

The declaration on the human environment approved at Stockholm last Friday contained the principles introduced by Canada, based on the Trail Smelter case, namely, the duty of every state not to pollute the environment of other states, the duty not to pollute the sea, the air and outer space beyond the jurisdiction of any state, and the duty to develop the law concerning liability and compensation in respect of such damage.

A further consequential principle flowing from these three, the duty of states to consult with or notify states of activities which may have an environmental impact on them, received close to unanimous support but was referred to the twenty-seventh United Nations General Assembly for further consideration.

If I had to identify the area in which I believe our delegation made the greatest contribution, Mr. Speaker, it would have to be on the marine side. Freedom of the high seas must not include the freedom to pollute. That freedom, or licence if you like, has been shaken by the Stockholm Conference. Further deliberations at the international level, including the Law of the Sea Conference in 1973, will be necessary in order to spell this principle out in some detail. But the basic theme is there. Thanks to Canadians, it has been expressed in legal language. Its elaboration in actual practice now only seems to be a matter of time.

Rather than take up further the time of the House, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask your permission to table two documents. One lists, in some detail, the marine principles which Canada initially proposed and which were subsequently endorsed by the conference at Stockholm. The other is a copy of the statement which I made at the opening of the conference and which summarizes the position our delegation took throughout its deliberations. Could I please have permission of the House to table these two documents for inclusion in today's Hansard, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For text of documents referred to above, see Appendices A and B.]

Mr. Davis: That completes my statement on motions.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the best summary of the outcome of the Stockholm Conference appeared on the editorial page of the Christian Science Monitor on Monday, June 19. The lead editorial concluded with the words:

To rally all the participating nations in support of the conference proposals at a meeting lasting only 11 days was something of a tour de force. Much of the conference's success was due to the extraordinary skill and untiring energy of its chief organizer, Maurice Strong of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Aiken: The editorial continues:

But the conference could only have succeeded if the desire to succeed was universal.

The measure of universality achieved at Stockholm is a measure of man's new concern for the future of his planet and of the whole human family.

It was heartening to know that efforts to use the conference for advancement of side issues which might have wrecked it were unsuccessful. The nations of the world have recognized formally the prime concern about global pollution of the oceans, the atmosphere and the earth. The United Nations Organization has not often been able to bring about joint and universal declarations on a major world problem. We can all join with the minister in this brief glow of satisfaction in a successful conference.

But, of course, agreements on principle are a long cry from successful action. We have learned that here in this Parliament where we have had ringing declarations of principle on environmental matters, followed by hopeful legislation and then inability or failure to carry it out. It is even more difficult in the world body where so many divergent interests are involved. It will require constant and continual pressure to carry out the principles agreed upon and we should continue to support Maurice Strong in these efforts.

It was unfortunate that our delegation brought some adverse criticism on its initial abstention on the issue of nuclear testing. However, the subsequent change of position rectified our international standing on the final vote, and the Canadian delegation is generally reported as contributing actively to the conference. While we are glad that our delegation was in evidence, Canadians would really have accepted nothing less.

In conclusion may I say that in view of the activities of Canadians at the Stockholm Conference, outlined by the minister in his statement, it is incumbent on him to enlist the support of his colleagues in an active anti-pollution effort in Canada. We cannot preach abroad with any reality unless we act at home.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the minister back from the conference in Stockholm and we congratulate him for the good press he received. The members of this House are very eager and anxious to hear and see how the minister's successful diplomatic manoeuvering will be translated into action at the international level.

We welcome the statement of accomplishments and the apparent accord of the United Nations on many important aspects of our global environment. Our party fully endorses and applauds the general position taken by the minister and the Canadian delegation on a number of important international environmental issues. We wish, however, that this apparent leadership would extend to those major environmental problems facing us in our own nation. The leadership, planning and action required to implement positive programs are sadly lacking at the federal level in Canada. In my opinion, sound and positive moves on a national scale would not only encourage the world community of nations to tackle global problems but would convince them that we were sincere in calling for a global approach to pollution.

The Stockholm Conference calls for international standards. Why, then, does this government not insist on national standards within our own country? Why do we pass legislation which in effect has fragmented standards from one end of Canada to the other? Why do we allow land use regulations in the northern 40 per cent of our nation to be so watered down through pressure from major economic interests that these regulations cannot adequately do the job of protecting the delicate ecology of the north? Why is the only major portion of Canada where all resources are under federal jurisdiction, namely, the area north of latitude 60 degrees, not included under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Environment?

We talk about international standards and control, but the Minister of the Environment does little when major ecological problems face us such as in the James Bay area. Why did his department not insist on full ecological surveys being made before the project commenced? What about the St. Lawrence River where the water is so badly polluted that it is not safe for bathing? Have we no jurisdictional rights in this area, or are the department and the government afraid to move?

There is one point I would like to raise in connection with the Stockholm Conference, and I will be brief. The tendency of this government to pussyfoot in the face of pressure from powerful lobbies was made clear in Stockholm. A $1 million offer to contribute to research on low pollution alternatives to petroleum sources of energy was withdrawn. The international press claimed that it was due to pressure from powerful oil interests. These same economic interests have forced this government to downgrade its land use regulations needed to protect our northern areas. We find that oil exploration is going on in a large portion of northern Canada without adequate controls.

May I say in closing that we welcome the accomplishments of the Stockholm Conference and the part played in it by Maurice Strong and our Canadian delegation. We are looking forward to seeing this expression of leadership in the international field translated into action. We are going to ride herd on the minister to see that this action is taken.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, we have listened with a great deal of attention to the statement of the hon. Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis). I thank him for sending me a copy of his statement around one o'clock, but I must point out that I did not receive the French translation until 2:17 p.m. exactly. I would have liked one of my colleagues to comment on this statement, but because we did not receive the French translation soon enough, I was forced to select myself to make comments on it. When the minister has statements to make, I wish he would send us the translation soon enough for my colleagues and myself to read them before hand.

Mr. Speaker, we are proud of the role played by Canada at the United Nations Conference on the Environment at Stockholm where the delegates agreed, often unanimously, to a set of principles, an action plan and an organizational structure which will help mankind fight pollution on land, in the sea and in the air.

Mr. Speaker, we are in complete agreement with the minister on these basic principles which will help all mankind but, nevertheless, we must not forget that in Canada, in the provinces and in the municipalities an action plan must also be established to fight efficiently sea, air and land pollution.

Some municipalities and some provinces are asking the central government for help in depolluting the lakes which supply some cities with their drinking water. For example, in Rouyn-Noranda, help has been requested for many years to clean Dufault Lake in order to build an adequate water system. But they always get the same answer that funds are not available, notwithstanding the fact that the government has the financial means to go to Stockholm to decide what will happen on the shores of the United States, of Africa, etc. We are not against this and we are happy that the government's participation is very efficient and that it draws the attention of the world to these problems. However, Mr. Speaker, I would like the government to pay as much attention to the municipalities and provinces in Canada in order to help the population in its fight against pollution of any kind.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST THAT ST. JEAN-BAPTISTE DAY AND DOMINION DAY HOLIDAYS BE OBSERVED ON MONDAYS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O.43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to submit a motion under Standing Order 43, with the request that hon. members kindly listen instead of saying "No" as usual. Since the national holiday of French Canadians and Dominion Day both fall on a Saturday, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott):

That the Mondays following these two holidays be proclaimed holidays for Parliament and all the personnel of that institution.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion submitted by the hon. member for Joliette. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimity. The motion therefore cannot be put.

TRANSPORT

LABRADOR—CONSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that it has now been 838 days since this Parliament unanimously adopted the report of the Standing Committee on Transport relating to road transport in Labrador I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House instructs the government to immediately initiate negotiations with the provinces of Newfoundland and Quebec on construction of a highway system across Labrador linking it with the national highways system; and that the Minister of Transport, who made the initial commitment on March 6, 1970, report to this House on or before the final day of this session on the progress made.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not. The motion cannot be put.

TRAFFIC SAFETY ANNUAL REPORT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It concerns the traffic safety annual report of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson).

In view of the fact that information on motor vehicle defects is organized—I am sure inadvertently—in such a way as to be entirely useless to the motoring public, and in view of the fact that the federal government has an indisputable responsibility to make this information known to the public in the clearest possible form, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan):

That the Minister of Transport take immediate steps to review his department's annual report with the intention of providing the public with clear and comprehensive information on motor vehicle defects.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43, this motion also requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and therefore the motion cannot be put.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO REQUIRE FILING OF MONTHLY REPORTS ON NAMES OF COMPANIES AND AMOUNTS OF GRANTS UNDER CERTAIN PROGRAMS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-219, to amend the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act (public disclosure).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to require the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to file monthly reports on the names of the companies and amounts of grants authorized under programs of the department such as PAIT, DIP, IDAP, PEP and GAAP.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING COMMITMENT OF MONEY IN ANY FISCAL YEAR

On the order: Introduction of Bills.

June 16, 1972—Mr. Broadbent—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act".

Mr. Speaker: The Chair referred yesterday to some procedural difficulties which were perceived in relation to the bill now proposed by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby and indicated the grounds of objections that had come to mind. If the hon. member has any opinion to express in relation to the procedural aspects of this bill I will hear him; otherwise I will express the views of the Chair.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, before doing that I would ask the Chair to clarify which of the two amendments to the Regional Development Incentives Act the Chair is referring to. I am presenting two bills to amend the same act.

Mr. Speaker: This bill has an explanatory note as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to ensure that incentive grants under the Regional Development Incentives Act result in permanent benefits to the economy and the people of designated regions rather than benefits to private enterprise.

I think the explanatory note would identify the bill.

Mr. Broadbent: On the procedural point, Mr. Speaker, I would say that it is certainly not the intention of the bill to increase public spending in this area at all; rather it is intended primarily to redistribute the spending already allocated and approved by the government and to ensure that a greater percentage of the funds goes to Crown corporations as opposed to private corporations. Because the bill involves no increase in expenditure I would think it should be allowed.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for the views he has just expressed. I think he will agree, upon reflection, that it is not only the amount approved or recommended by the royal recommendation that cannot be changed but there is also a prohibition against a redirection of the amount that is approved or recommended to the House in the royal recommendation.

To my way of thinking, the hon. member proposed that any moneys committed under the act are to be redirected in a manner other than that envisaged in the royal recommendation which preceded the bill establishing the Regional Incentives Act. In addition, I suggest to the House, and to the hon. member in particular, that the effect of the proposed bill would be that the government would purchase control of private firms with public funds. I am not sure whether this second aspect is necessarily true. But certainly there is no doubt in my mind that there is a redistribution of funds and that this is contrary to the strict terms of the royal recommendation. In the circumstances, I do not think that a bill proposed in those specific terms ought to be put to the House.

AMENDMENT TO ENSURE THAT PUBLIC FUNDS ARE NOT USED AGAINST INTEREST OF CANADIAN ECONOMIC INDEPENDENCE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-220, to amend the Regional Development Incentives Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to ensure that public funds are not used contrary to the interests of achieving and maintaining Canadian economic independence.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

TRADE BETWEEN CANADA AND SOUTH AFRICA

Question No. 284—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. (a) Since South Africa left the Commonwealth in 1961, has there been an increase or decrease in trade between Canada and South Africa (b) what is the extent of this increase or decrease since 1961?

2. (a) Since South Africa left the Commonwealth in 1961, has there been an increase or decrease in Canadian investment in South Africa (b) what is the extent of this increase or decrease since 1961?

3. What is the extent of the "extensive sanctions" applied by Canada towards South Africa as referred to in the government's review of foreign policy (United Nations Foreign Policy for Canadians, Ottawa, 1970, p. 18.)?

4. Does Canada still accord South Africa the benefit of the British (or Commonwealth) preferential tariff and, if so, is the government considering abrogating this privilege?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. (a) (b) In 1961 total trade between Canada and South Africa amounted to $50.4 million—Canadian exports $37.8 million; Canadian imports $12.6 million. In 1971 this trade totalled $117.4 million—Canadian exports $62.8 million; Canadian imports $54.6 million.

2. The total book value of direct Canadian investment in South Africa in 1961 was $17 million. In 1970, the last year for which figures are available, direct Canadian investment was $70 million.

3. The "extensive sanctions" referred to in "United Nations—Foreign Policy for Canadians", page 18, are applied, not to South Africa, but to Rhodesia (as expressly stated in that document) in compliance with Security Council Resolution 253 of May 29, 1968 and formally enacted by an Order-in-Council on December 28, 1968.

The sanctions cover virtually all transactions with Rhodesia with certain humanitarian exceptions. With regard to South Africa, Canada maintains an embargo on the sale of military equipment and spares. For the rest of our trade with that country, we are governed by our general policy of trading in peaceful goods with all countries and territories regardless of political considerations (also enunciated in Foreign Policy for Canadians, Volume 6, page 19).

4. Canada exchanges preferences by virtue of bilateral agreements with South Africa as it does with Britain, Ireland, Australia, New Zealand and the Commonwealth Caribbean. The consideration of the status of the agreement with South Africa is based on the concept of mutual advantage.

(2) Information is not available on the number of Canadians who served in Allied Forces.

*POST OFFICE SERVICES—THUNDER BAY

Question No. 571—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Has the Postmaster General received a complaint from the Thunder Bay Citizen's Association, dated March 16, 1972, outlining the general deterioration in postal services at Thunder Bay?

2. What action has been taken to resolve the problem?

Mr. Gerald Richard Cobbe (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is, yes. The answer to the second part is as follows: Even though the situation is now back to normal, the Regional General Manager, Ontario Postal Region, is presently reviewing the postal service at Thunder Bay. A detailed report outlining his findings will be submitted to my office on completion.

DEPARTMENT OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION—ADULT OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING ACT

Question No. 573—Mr. Godin:

For the year 1971-72, has the Department of Manpower and Immigration entered into contract with employers or companies pursuant to Section 6 of the Adult Occupational Training Act and, if so (a) how many contracts were signed in the Province of Quebec (b) what were the names and addresses of the contractors (c) in each case, what was the duration of the contract?

Return tabled.

Mr. Hales: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary three questions in my name which have stood on the order paper since March 16. One of them deals with a matter that arose last year. May I remind him that I should like to have the answers as soon as possible.

Mr. Jerome: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 66 is acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions stated by the Parliamentary Secretary, does the House agree that notice of motion No. 66 be deemed to have been carried?

Some hon. Members: Agree.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO INSTALLATION OF CO-AXIAL TELEVISION CABLE, CALAIS, MAINE AND ST. STEPHEN, N.B.

Motion No. 66—Mr. Flemming:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence with the Minister of Public Works relating to the permitted installation and use of a co-axial television cable suspended from the International Bridge between Calais, Maine, and St. Stephen, New Brunswick, which cable is purported to be owned by Acadia Cable TV Limited.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 15 and 20?

COPY OF ALL CORRESPONDENCE AND PHOTOGRAPHS REGARDING ISSUANCE OF PASSPORTS TO YVES GEOFFROY AND CARMEN PARENT

Motion No. 15—Mr. Woolliams:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all documents, application forms, photographs and letters leading to the issuance of passports to both Yves Geoffroy (or in his alias name, if any) and Carmen Parent.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the documents asked for in this notice of motion pertain to a matter that is still sub judice. I suggest that in the circumstances the hon. member might wish to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the motion could stand until the court case is over. It must have been pending for a considerable length of time because the Geoffroy incident and his return occurred some time ago. I ask that the motion stand and, when the court case is over, I am sure the government will bring forward the documents.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

COPY OF STUDY ON FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND THE ARTS UNDERTAKEN IN 1966-67 FOR SECRETARY OF STATE

Motion No. 20—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study on the federal government and the arts undertaken in the fiscal year 1966-67 for the Secretary of State as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move the motion on behalf of the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the present motion is the same motion for the production of papers as that of previous sessions. As has been pointed out, the study referred to was a confidential report to the Secretary of State and as such is considered to be a privileged document. I would therefore request that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Jerome: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

SUPPORT FOR ANTI-POVERTY PROGRAMS—POSSIBILITY OF HIGHER TAXES AFFECTING INCENTIVE OF MIDDLE-INCOME GROUPS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON STATEMENT BY HEALTH AND WELFARE MINISTER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister arising out of comments made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare respecting support for anti-poverty programs having to come from middle-income groups and expressing concern about the possibility of higher taxes damaging the incentives of those who desire to be rich. I ask the Prime Minister whether it is the position of the government that incentives among the middle-income groups are not a matter of concern at the present time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course they are, and I believe that is what the minister was saying.

Mr. Nowlan: Oh, no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the startlingly high unemployment figures published recently for the month of May and in view of the concern just expressed by the Prime Minister about the effect of taxation on incentives, is he considering additional measures to reduce the rate of unemployment and thereby directly fight poverty and directly reduce the burden of maintaining anti-poverty programs upon the middle-income groups?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if we have any announcements to make along those lines further to the ones we made in the budget, we will make them.

Mr. Stanfield: I have one further supplementary, Mr. Speaker, in connection with any information that the Prime Minister might feel free to give. May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether he is considering any additional legislation at this time which would reduce the benefits being received by middle-income groups under present legislation, other, of course, than the 3 per cent increase in income taxation which will come into effect on January 1 and presumably affect all income taxpayers?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I hope the Leader of the Opposition will keep these statements in mind the next time he presses for increased benefits for the poor people of the country.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. As such a high burden of taxation is borne by middle and low-income Canadians now and as the corporate share of the tax burden which was about 45 per cent in 1950 has dropped to about 12.5 per cent under the present government, would the Prime Minister give serious consideration to increasing the share of the burden paid by the corporate sector?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I should not like to concede the premises of the question.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Was the Minister of National Health and Welfare expressing government policy when, in his speech yesterday in Quebec City, he said that the government's policy was to save the rich, soak the middle class and seduce the poor in taxation policies?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as happens invariably with questions from the opposition, they always misstate facts when they are quoting something a minister said outside the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the Prime Minister has just made a very irresponsible statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I may say, if he wants to take issue—

Mr. Drury: Order!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am speaking on a point of order and I will be happy to follow your direction. So far as I know, the President of the Treasury Board is not in charge of the conduct of the proceedings of the House.

An hon. Member: Thank God!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1440)

Mr. Stanfield: I simply wish to say on the point of order that if the Prime Minister wishes to take issue with the way in which any minister has been quoted he has a perfect right to do so, but it is going even beyond the distance he usually goes to besmirch all opposition members as he has just done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is right. I should not have referred to all members but only to those who ask questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the enlightened Prime Minister. As one member of the nobodies—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, all those who clapped are going to be in the nobody class after the next election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: I used the past tense to give full credit to this government which is a past government. All those who clapped—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor for a supplementary. We have been proceeding for a while now without making much progress. We are still on the first question. We appear to be launched on a typical Wednesday question period when members come out of their caucuses in fighting humour, but I hope we can make some progress. The hon. member may ask a supplementary.

Mr. Nowlan: I certainly agree with Your Honour's admonition. To try to help Canadians make progress as to where we are going in this country, I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare was expressing government policy when he said that the middle class was going to bear even more of the tax burden of the land, having in mind that the tax reform bill seemed to be heading that way had other members of the government not come forward and diluted the impact. Is the middle class of this country going to accept and be responsible in a tax way for more of these programs than at present?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is obviously a misquotation of what the minister said.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for one supplementary, continue the round and return to the hon. member if he has further supplementaries on behalf of his group.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary will be very short. Did the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare have a conversation before the Minister of National Health and Welfare made that speech in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Bell: He had one afterwards.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for York South.

CO-ORDINATION WITH OTHER DEPARTMENTS TO ENSURE THAT ACTIVITIES CONFORM TO POLICIES—CONSULTATION RESPECTING NEW RAYONIER PLANT IN PORT CARTIER, QUEBEC

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in this environment I have some questions for the Minister of the Environment. In view of the minister's glowing report about his work in Stockholm—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: When a minister gives a glowing report about himself, I think his colleagues ought to applaud him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: I want to ask the minister whether in his department there is any co-ordinating agency with other departments of government to make certain that activities in which other departments may engage do not have a deleterious effect on the environment contrary to the policies that are supposed to be implemented by his department? Is there any agency in government that oversees that kind of thing?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. There is a co-ordinating agency in the environmental protection service of Environment Canada with officers positioned in five separate regions in Canada.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I am not asking about regions. I will be more specific. Was the minister's department consulted by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion when it agreed to assist in the establishment of an ITT-Rayonier plant in Port Cartier, Quebec, and the receiving of a very large tract of land for cutting? Was his department consulted about this in view of the fact that ecologists at the University of Waterloo suggest this would create a virtual desert in a very important part of the Quebec north shore and destroy wildlife as well as other aspects of the environment there? Did the minister even know—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, in so far as the dedication of large acreages of forest land is concerned, I am sure that is a matter for the province and the provincial forest service to decide. With regard to pollution abatement procedures, in that the federal government was going to make a financial contribution our environmental protection service worked closely with DREE to ensure that the proper clean-up facilities would be included in the new plant at Port Cartier and that they will be capable of operating in such a manner as to meet our new nation-wide pollution standards.

Mr. Lewis: I am concerned about whether there is machinery that can protect the environment before any harm is done. In view of the minister's concern about the salmon fishery in the east, for example, has he looked into the question also raised by ecologists at the University of Waterloo that this entire project in northern Quebec will adversely affect some 30 sources of salmon fishing in a very important part of that province and, indeed, of Canada?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, while the inland waters fishery, in this case salmon fishery, is administered by the province of Quebec, we enjoy the closest possible liaison with the provincial authorities in this regard. I can assure the hon. member that we have been very concerned, as is the province of Quebec, with not only the maintenance but the revival of salmon runs in that province.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South for one last supplementary and then the hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Lewis: Will the minister inform the House whether these matters have in fact been looked into by his department and whether there have been discussions between his department, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the province of Quebec relating to these aspects of the undertaking and any others?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the report to which the hon. member refers, but I can assure him that with respect to those matters he has mentioned today we have been working closely with the province and, of course, with the federal Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

PROPOSED RAISING OF LEVEL OF SOUTH INDIAN LAKE, MANITOBA—REQUEST THAT MINISTER MEET WITH LOCAL REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment. Has the minister received a request from the council or the people of the South Indian Lake area of Manitoba for a meeting with the minister with regard to their concern about the damage that may be caused to the ecology and the environment of the lake and surrounding area because of the recent decision to raise the level of the lake to 850 feet? If so, is the minister prepared to meet with the council as requested?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe we have received such a submission. I am certainly prepared to meet these people. However, I would want to meet with them in the presence of the provincial authorities who I believe have a greater responsibility than the federal government in this connection.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—RESULT OF MEETING BETWEEN MINISTER AND PARTIES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour.

Following the talks he had with the Maritime Employers Association and representatives of the Montreal longshoremen's union, has the minister found that the conflict may soon be settled and when does the minister think that it may be?

• (1450)

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I met with the representatives of the two parties yesterday and I will be meeting again this evening with representatives of the Maritime Employers Association. I trust that we will make good progress at these meetings.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, have both parties already accepted the suggestion of the minister that they should meet with him in order to discuss this problem with a view to settling it?

[English]

Mr. O'Connell: We are in the process of meeting, Mr. Speaker. This afternoon I received a wire from the International Longshoremen's Association accepting the appointment of a commissioner, with the understanding that prior to this the two parties must agree on the conditions of a return to work and the lifting of the suspension, that is to say, resumption of operations at the port. That is understood to be a condition precedent.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—REPRESENTATIONS BY WESTERN GRAIN ORGANIZATIONS FOR ACTION TO END DISPUTE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the statement made by the president of the Alberta Wheat Pool that the tie-up of the St. Lawrence ports has reduced export grain loadings by two and a half million bushels a day and has resulted in the loss of important wheat sales to China and barley sales to Europe, may I ask the minister whether he has received representations from western co-operatives or, indeed, from the National Farmers Union that he take action to bring this tie-up to an end?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have received representations from many economic interests that are concerned about the disruption of facilities in these ports. We are doing all we can to bring the disruption to an end.

Mr. Gleave: May I ask the minister whether, failing an immediate agreement between the two parties, the government will take action to operate the stevedoring firms and see that movement of cargo gets under way and continues?

Mr. Speaker: Order please. That is both hypothetical and a representation. The hon. member for Crowfoot on a supplementary.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—POSITION OF MARITIME EMPLOYERS ASSOCIATION RESPECTING BARGAINING

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. Has the Maritime Employers Association given an indication that it is prepared to bargain in good faith in order to settle this very disruptive longshoremen's strike?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am meeting with the board of directors and the president of the Maritime Employers Association this evening.

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the Minister of Labour has not taken immediate action to settle the strike, does he intend to allow the Quebec Minister of Labour to intervene, as Mr. Cournoyer stated he would if federal action is not taken immediately?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question was asked yesterday.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

APPLICATION OF POLLUTION CONTROL RECOMMENDATIONS BY STOCKHOLM CONFERENCE TO RUSSIA AND OTHER COMMUNIST COUNTRIES—CONTRIBUTION TO ENVIRONMENTAL FUND

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of the Environment. It is reported that at the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment some 200 recommendations on pollution control were made, and, of course, all these measures will have to be ratified by the United Nations General Assembly at its fall session. Since the Soviet Union and other east European nations, with the exception of Roumania and Yugoslavia, stayed away from the conference, will the Stockholm proposals, especially those dealing with oil pollution on the high seas, be applicable to the Soviet Union, and will any special effort be made between now and the fall session of the United Nations to secure agreement from the Communist countries to the conference's recommendations?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am confident that these principles will be adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations and, having been adopted by the General Assembly, I assume that they will be equally binding on those few countries, such as the U.S.S.R., which did not attend. My general impression is that they support the principles. I cannot answer the question as to whether there will be lobbying in the interim; perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs can assist the hon. member.

Mr. Crouse: Canada is reported to have volunteered to donate $7.5 million to a $100 million environmental fund. Will the Soviet Union and the Communist countries be contributing to this fund, and what criteria will be used by the fund's managers to compensate developing countries for trade lost because of the new environmental standards?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the U.S.S.R. or the other Communist bloc countries will be contributing. Half a dozen countries at the Stockholm conference voluntarily named amounts that they would be prepared to commit to this fund to be used basically for new environmental initiatives, not for trade loss compensation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED REQUEST TO GROUP VISITING QUEBEC HOUSE IN PARIS TO REMOVE CANADIAN FLAG LAPEL PINS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister been advised that a group of Canadians, including Councillor Seguin of Hull, on a recent visit to Quebec House in Paris were asked by Quebec cultural delegate, Yves Michaud, to remove Canadian flag lapel pins on the ground that the wearing of these was provocative and that Quebec House was the soil of the province of Quebec? If so, what has the minister said or done about this incident?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have not heard this story before, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF USE OF AUTOMATIC FOGHORNS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport in connection with foghorns with laryngitis. In view of complaints that lives and property are being needlessly endangered by the new automatic type foghorn that the department is installing at certain locations—I cite Leonard Island lighthouse as an example—would the minister undertake an early review of the whole program concerning the use of automatic foghorns and give consideration to whether or not we should return to the old, reliable air horns that everybody had to listen to whether they wanted to or not?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have already initiated this review since quite a number of fishermen on the east coast have made the same complaint to me. The alleged authorities on these matters say that there they are more effective, but the people who actually make use of them are arguing the point and I am trying to resolve these two differing points of view.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION OF AUTOMOBILE ACCIDENT IN WHICH COUPLE FOUND DEAD IN CAR IN WATER DUGOUT INVOLVED

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General. It arises out of the disappearance of an elderly Holden, Alberta, couple last September 4 who were discovered in their automobile in a water dugout in the Peace River district last Sunday. In view of the fact that a motor vehicle accident had occurred and was reported on September 4 in the area where the couple's car was found, plus the fact that evidence now reveals that the couple's car was involved in a motor vehicle accident, may I ask the parliamentary secretary whether the Solicitor General has ordered a full inquiry into this incident in order to determine if there was an element of negligence on the part of the investigating body in regard to its failure thoroughly and adequately to investigate all aspects and details surrounding this accident at the time of its occurrence?

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to take the question as notice but I can assure the hon. member that a complete inquiry will be made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have too much respect for the hon. member to reply off-hand, and without consulting with the Minister of Finance.

REQUEST THAT COMPULSORY RETIREMENT OF MINERS AT AGE 60 BE SUSPENDED PENDING DECISION IN COURT ACTION

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that the president of the Cape Breton Development Corporation has stated certain matters cannot be dealt with because of litigation before the courts, will the minister ask the president to stop compulsory retirement at age 60 in that this question is also before the courts?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the statement by the president of the corporation.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, without going into great detail as to what the president of DEVCO said—and the minister can check it closely—in view of the fact the question of compulsory retirement at age 60 is now before the courts, does the minister not think the families of Cape Breton miners deserve this protection until the court case is decided?

FROST DAMAGE IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO COMPENSATION TO FARMERS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Is he now in a position to make an announcement concerning restitution or any form of payment to the farmers in various parts of southwestern Ontario who had a large part of their crops destroyed by the recent unseasonable frost?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not have anything to add to the statement I made in the House yesterday.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, has the minister received representations from the Ontario Flue-Cured Tobacco Marketing Board, in view of the fact that he failed to turn up at their meeting when he was making his tour to determine the extent of damage suffered by tobacco growers?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, the statement of the hon. member is incorrect. I met with some officials of the Ontario tobacco marketing board and, by the way, a number of them were on the tour and meeting with me to view the damage in the area.

POLLUTION

LAKE WINNIPEG—INABILITY OF MANITOBA TO PROSECUTE CERTAIN FIRMS BECAUSE OF LACK OF AGREEMENT ON WATER QUALITY MANAGEMENT AREAS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the ruling a few days ago by a judge in Winnipeg that two chemical firms accused of contributing to the mercury pollution of Lake Winnipeg could not be prosecuted, in part because the relevant sections of the Canada Water Act have not been brought into force, does the minister intend to bring these sections into force in the near future?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed to ask a supplementary question. I am not sure whether his question was noted.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Minister of the Environment was listening to my question. Perhaps I could rephrase it. In view of the failure of the Manitoba government in its attempt to prosecute firms allegedly contributing to mercury pollution in Lake Winnipeg because a judge has said that no agreement designating water quality management areas has yet been entered into by the government of Canada with the province, does the minister intend to negotiate such an agreement in the very near future?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, these agreements depend not only on the initiative of the federal government but on the willingness of the provinces concerned to enter into such agreements. I have detected no such willingness on the part of Manitoba, for example. I might add parenthetically that had the Fisheries Act as now amended been enforced at the time of that spill—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is in the realm of debate.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of the Environment how many water quality management areas have been set up in Canada in the more than two years since the act was passed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question should be placed on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

GROUNDS FOR TEMPORARY RELEASE OF CHARLES DAVID HEAD FROM PENITENTIARY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Justice. I refer to the question I asked yesterday as recorded at page 3291 of Hansard. My question was as follows:

> Would the minister make a full statement on motions in reference to the granting of the temporary release, indicating whether there was any supervision after the man was released and also setting out the rules, the law and the grounds by virtue of which this person was released in those circumstances?

I was asking for the ground rules applied in the case of temporary release. The Solicitor General answered:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not see any reason why I should comment on the private life of an individual at this time.

Subsequently the minister mentioned on television the history and criminal record of a certain person. In view of the fact that he said there was no question of this man getting a life sentence, I should like the Attorney General of Canada to check a report which appeared back in 1967 in a newspaper in Vancouver which stated that this man received a life sentence from Mr. Justice Gregory.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should attempt to ask a question. I suggest, with respect, to the hon. member that the question might be put more briefly.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I respect your ruling, but if I do not give the minister the facts he is not able to answer. I would ask him to check the record, in view of the fact the Solicitor General made a statement outside the House which he would not make here, in order to determine whether the man in question did in fact receive a life sentence at that time.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that on an appropriate occasion after the Solicitor General has ascertained the facts in regard to the situation he may make a report to the House. In the meantime, I must say I am not helped much by the hon. member's usual combination of accusations and garbling of the facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I see the hon. member for Calgary South laughing. He had a lot to say the other day. But let me put these facts to the Minister of Justice, because he appreciates that criminal records are confidential and are available only to the police or to the minister. I ask him whether—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member. He was recognized for the purpose of asking a question. I did not gather that this was what he was doing but as I was rising he was asking a question and he may proceed.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you for your help, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact the Solicitor General gave facts outside the House which are available only to himself, will the minister check the records to see if the facts stated yesterday are correct?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not think I should comment on what may have been said outside the House by the Solicitor General. I am sure that if the hon. member wishes to put the question properly to the Solicitor General when he is next in the House, it will be clarified.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I now rise on a question of privilege. The Minister of Justice, having said that I garbled the facts—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Just a minute. Take your time and don't get excited. The Minister of Justice said I garbled the facts about the Solicitor General going outside the House and stating what he would not say inside the House. The minister not having checked the facts, I ask who has garbled the facts? When it comes to a question of credibility, the ministers have the records and we do not. Let us find out whether they are prepared to check these facts and give them in the House rather than on television like the Prime Minister does.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course that is debate.

POLLUTION

CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—INQUIRY AS TO STUDY OF COST OF CLEAN-UP AND STEPS TO PREVENT FUTURE OCCURRENCE

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed either to the Minister of Transport or to the Minister of the Environment. I am not certain which minister is responsible. It concerns the Cherry Point oil spill of a couple of weeks ago. Has either the Department of Transport or the Department of the Environment initiated a study of the recent oil spill to indicate the cost of clean-up, the adequacy of the clean-up and the adequacy of protective measures? If so, will a report of the results of this study be made to the House as soon as possible?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a study of this type is now a routine measure in such incidents in order for us to accumulate a body of additional information. There is no good reason why, once the facts have been assembled, they should not be made public.

CHERRY POINT OIL SPILL—UNITED STATES POSITION AT STOCKHOLM CONFERENCE REGARDING SIMILAR OCCURRENCES IN FUTURE

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of the Environment concerning the deliberations at the Stockholm Conference. Did the United States commit itself at Stockholm to any future position which would apply in situations similar to the Cherry Point oil tragedy? Also, can the minister say whether the conference altered in any substantial way the United States policy, and what was the substance of the change, if any?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, a number of the principles endorsed at the conference would have a bearing on circumstances similar to those at Cherry Point both in anticipation and prevention of such incidents in the future, but certainly in respect of contingency plans, clean-up and compensation.

UNITED STATES REPLY TO RESOLUTIONS PASSED BY HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister received any reply from the government of the United States on the resolution passed by the House on June 9 in respect of the oil spill at Cherry Point, on the motion of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East, and also on the resolution unanimously passed by the House on May 15 on the motion of the hon. member for Skeena? If so, would the minister undertake to table copies of the replies from the government of the United States?

• (1510)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the last time I was in the House I did say we had received a reply to the representations which the government made, supported by the resolution of this House, that the question of the movement of oil in the narrow waters of the Pacific coast should be referred to the International Joint Commission. That was turned down by the United States which instead has suggested it be referred to the committee on trans-border environmental problems, which will be presided over by my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, and the chairman of the council on the environment in the United States. So far as the resolutions of this House were to that effect, this is the reply from the United States.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for a last supplementary, but there are only three minutes before the end of the question period and we must try to move along.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he or the Minister of the Environment can give the terms of reference of the committee on trans-border environmental problems. Can the minister tell us when the committee is likely to meet, and will Canada insist that the question of the Cherry Point-Valdez route be an item on the agenda?

Mr. Sharp: My colleague can perhaps answer part of that question, but since he has been away I have had access to the messages received. The United States would like to refer to this committee what we had intended to refer to the International Joint Commission, which does include the question the hon. gentleman mentioned. We are concerned about present and prospective movements of oil in that area and their consequence upon the environment. I think the terms of reference we had in mind for the International Joint Commission will apply to this committee, but of course there is a difference between a committee like this and the IJC.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—ESTABLISHMENT OF INQUIRY COMMISSION—POSITION OF PARTIES

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Labour concerning the labour dispute in the St. Lawrence ports.

Since he met yesterday with both parties involved, I would like to ask the hon. minister if he told them he had proposed the establishment of an inquiry commission to find a solution to this dispute, and when he intends to do it?

[English]

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): The question of the inquiry commission was discussed with both parties. I am meeting again with the Maritime Employers Association this evening for further discussions on this subject, as well as the prior conditions which are to be worked out between the two parties on arrangements for return to work and lifting of the suspension.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—SUGGESTION THAT MINISTER ADOPT GET-TOUGH POLICY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that the minister has used every approach possible, can he assure the House that when he meets with the parties this time he will have a get-tough policy, with government alternatives to settle this whole matter in the event the parties do not come to agreement within the next two days? When he meets with them this afternoon and this evening, does the minister intend to adopt a get-tough stance? Also, in light—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked a question and he should allow the minister to reply.

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we are proceeding on course. I have no intention of committing this Parliament to any action, and if that is what the hon. member is suggesting perhaps he ought to clarify his question further.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have almost reached the end of the question period. The hon. member has a supplementary and will be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised the minister has now placed me on the government side. We will be over there after the next election.

An hon. Member: What a dream!

Mr. Alexander: In light of the fact that public interests are being adversely affected, particularly in the city of Montreal and surrounding area, to the extent of $1 million a day, I again ask the minister whether he will get tough in this situation, because the public cannot afford it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Assiniboia.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—SUGGESTED INCREASED USE OF PORT OF CHURCHILL FOR GRAIN SHIPMENT

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is addressed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the great difficulty in moving grain through ports on the east coast, could the minister inform the House whether action is being taken to extend the use of the port of Churchill?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): To the best of my knowledge, as much grain as can be moved through Churchill is being moved through there. However, if there is a possibility of further shipment through that port we will look into the matter. I was advised by the National Harbours Board that they are looking into the matter of greater movement through Prince Rupert which can be done with the existing facilities.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF TRUSTEESHIP

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

It refers to the question I asked him yesterday about the telegram from the Montreal Port Authority. Now that the right hon. Prime Minister has had time to read this telegram, can he tell us if he recommended to the government that trusteeship measures be instituted if the dispute is not settled soon, or if he intends to do so?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have read the telegram, but I must remind the hon. member that this telegram mentioned trusteeship at the same time as other measures that we should consider, and a choice was given to us. This is exactly what the Minister of Labour has done; he took other measures.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With the consent of the hon. member for Oxford who wishes to rise on a question of privilege, the hon. member for Crowfoot might be allowed to ask a supplementary; then we will go to the question of privilege and call orders of the day.

TRANSPORT

GRAIN MOVEMENT AND PORT FACILITIES—REQUEST THAT HOUSE COMMITTEE STUDY ANNUAL REPORTS OF CNR AND AIR CANADA

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the movement of grain and port facilities. Is the minister now in a position to direct the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to study the annual reports of the CNR and Air Canada so that this whole matter can be gone into before the dissolution of this Parliament?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I would think that would be a matter for the government House leader. I certainly have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before calling on the hon. member for Oxford I think it is my duty to again remind hon. members that the duration of the question period is only 40 minutes. I have the impression that some hon. members come into the House with the feeling that they have the right to ask questions every day. I see them coming into the House armed for the purpose of asking questions. I do not think it is fair to other hon. members that they should have to wait day after day for an opportunity to ask their questions. I think that some day the Chair will have to exercise its responsibility, forget about the first and second rows, and call on other members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I notice that the cheers come from the third, fourth and fifth rows. The hon. member for Oxford on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, my point of personal privilege refers to a question I asked earlier today of the Minister of Agriculture concerning his meeting with the Ontario Flue-cured Tobacco Marketing Board. The minister informed the House that he did meet with the board and that they made certain representations. I have in front of me a copy of the Tillsonburg News for Monday, June 19. It refers to the minister's visit to that area on Friday, June 16 last. The report reads in part as follows:

> Mr. Olson was scheduled to appear at the head offices of the Ontario flue-cured tobacco growers' auction exchange about 4 p.m. on Friday, and there were the chairman and vice-chairman of the board, directors, committeemen, farmers—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly indicate his question of privilege? The hon. member knows that a dispute between members as to fact has nothing to do with parliamentary privilege. I think I should remind hon. members that we are to hear from the Leader of the Opposition in the supply debate this afternoon.

• (1520)

Mr. Nesbitt: The point I am coming to is that the minister misled the House in his reply. There is no argument about that. I asked him a question and I think the minister might like to revise his answer.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Olson: The answer I gave was accurate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again, that is a dispute as to facts. I suggest to the hon. member that it is not a question of privilege. Orders of the day.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I have a suggestion to make regarding the length of speeches today.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster is rising on a point of order regarding the length of speeches. I suggest this can be raised once we have called the order for this afternoon.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, my idea was not to have this time taken out of the opposition day. I am following the example of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who has done this on many occasions. I propose that speeches be limited to 30 minutes in the case of the first speeches by the official opposition and the government, 20 minutes for the major spokesmen of the other two parties and that all other speeches be limited to 15 minutes. I also propose that we negotiate, in the way we have successfully in the last few days, for the remaining time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We agree, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: We are in agreement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. La Salle: I agree, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Apparently there is agreement.

Mr. La Salle: On division.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Joliette agrees.

[English]

There is agreement, and it is so ordered.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO PROCEED WITH POSITIVE LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

> This House regrets the failure of the government to proceed during the current session of Parliament with a positive legislative program; and particularly regrets its failure to carry out the program proposed in the Speech from the Throne on February 7, 1972, and adopted by this House, thus betraying the trust placed by this House in the ministry to provide adequate measures to meet the needs of Canadians.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the issue at stake in this motion is really whether one can place any confidence in the undertakings given by this government, because in going into this session of Parliament the government was committed to action on a number of measures outlined in the Speech from the Throne and in the list of proposed legislation which the government circulated at the time the Speech from the Throne was presented. In addition there were, of course, left-over promises and commitments from the previous session. The major one of these, by the way, seems to have disappeared completely.

As to the previous session, may I remind the House that in the third session of this Parliament 14 bills were introduced but were not passed. In other words, time in the House was consumed during the third session on 14 bills which did not pass. In addition, during the third session of this Parliament, the session previous to this one, there was a total of 21 bills in the list of bills to be introduced but which in fact were never introduced, and most of these have never come to light since then.

In other words, during that session of Parliament not only was a lot of time lost on 14 bills which were taken part way and dropped, but in fact 21 bills which were supposed to be introduced, according to the assurances of the government, were never introduced and for the most part have not been introduced to this day. So it is not just a question of this session, it is not just a matter of the government saying that we are only part way through this session, because we have been here since the middle of February.

Looking at the list of legislation that the government proposed and the other bills that were not on the list, the scoreboard goes something like this in the present session: there were 29 bills on the list; five that were not on the list have been introduced, for a total of 34. Of this total, only five have been passed although we have been here since the middle of February, and others are at various stages ranging from first to third reading. Some of the late arrivals, of course, are obviously being used simply as showcasing for some possible election platform.

The most significant left-over commitment was the one made by the former minister of finance, in the other place to the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee on December 20, 1971. The former minister appeared in the other place at that time in order to seek quick passage of the so-called tax reform bill which was at that time being railroaded through this House by means of closure. The finance minister of that day had indicated to the committee several areas where he said it was——felt that amendments were necessary both along the lines that the Senate committee had indicated and in other areas.

The minister said that these amendments could not be presented during January and February. But here we are, approaching the end of June, and we have not seen any of these amendments yet. The former minister of finance made the commitment that amendments would be introduced in the Commons as soon as possible to cover these areas in the so-called tax reform bill. Such a bill has never appeared and to my knowledge there has been no indication of what the amendments are to be.

It is appalling to me that there seems to be absolutely no concern on the part of the government about the confusion and damage to the economy resulting from this exhibition of bad faith and incompetence. This is a breach of promise, unquestionably, and a serious breach of the trust that members of this House, members of the other place and Canadians generally should be able to place in the intentions of the ministers concerned.

Then we come to the intentions regarding new and revised legislation that were expressed by the government. I do not propose this afternoon to run through the whole catalogue myself but there are a couple of assurances, a couple of measures of a most serious nature which I want to discuss in some detail. Foremost in this regard we have the promise in the Speech from the Throne of an industrial strategy. As reported in Hansard of February 17, it was to be "an industrial strategy prepared for the peculiar character of the Canadian economy".

I want to be fair to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). I am sorry he is not in the House this afternoon. I will not say anything in any way abusive so far as the minister is concerned, although some of my remarks may appear to be critical. He told us in the House on June 6 that such a strategy would be forthcoming later rather than sooner. I can see the minister's difficulty. Designing an industrial strategy for the peculiar character of the Canadian economy is one thing; trying to sell to the public the idea that you have any kind of strategy, taking into account the peculiar state of the Canadian economy after four years of this government, is quite another thing.

Let us consider the state of the economy. "Peculiar" is perhaps too charitable a word. Today unemployment, which we have had for some time, is in excess of 6 per cent, seasonally adjusted. We have consumer prices running some 5 per cent higher than a year ago. And we have the Canadian dollar rising above the level of the American dollar, despite the fact that we also have a deteriorating position in our foreign trade. We have a floating dollar which, it was always said, would give us more ability to pursue an appropriate domestic economy policy. But we have the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce saying that we have no capacity today to increase the purchasing power of Canadian consumers through direct Canadian government policy.

What we have is surely an unparalleled combination of conditions. To achieve all three of these contradictions simultaneously in only one term of office is surely a mark of the brilliance of the government. In sports circles the achievement of these three contradictions at one time could be called a hat trick, but in no circle could it be presumed to be the result of any deliberate economic strategy.

Who could be operating on the basis of such a strategy and end up with high unemployment and a high rate of inflation at the same time, coupled with a rising Canadian dollar, associated with a deterioration in our trade position? The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) tell us that there is absolutely no point in reducing personal income tax in order to put more money in the hands of the Canadian consumer and thus spur job creation in Canada, because they say the increased purchasing power would only be used to buy imported goods. Whose fault is that?

Why are imports currently cheaper than domestically-produced goods? Who ever told us that the floating dollar was supposed to increase our ability to manage our own economy? Who told us, following the last international monetary meeting, that our dollar would not float up to a level that would be injurious to our exporters and at the same time make imports more attractive in price competition with our own products? Who gave us those assurances? Where is the strategy of a government which set up a situation whereby, by its own admission, we now have less capability to take proper stimulative measures to deal with unemployment? The government has brought this about, even though we were told we would have more flexibility to do our own thing.

We have a floating dollar, but according to these ministers we have no capability to expand consumer demand in Canada. The government has reached the stage where it is simply wallowing around in its own contradictions. We not only have unemployment and inflation—we have sort of got used to that—and we not only have our dollar rising, but at the same time we have a deteriorating position in our trade. We are not used to the latter; that is a rather novel condition in Canada. Thirdly, although a floating dollar was supposed to give us the capability in Canada to expand our economy as we saw fit, or contract it, we are now told by the government that we have no such capability today.

It is no wonder that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce now talks about announcing an industrial strategy policy later rather than sooner. But the announcement we are all awaiting, Sir, is the one from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) setting the date for a general election—because based on the record and the state of economic affairs at this time, and the complete incapacity of the government to live up to its undertakings, we can only hope that that announcement will come sooner rather than later.

Surely as a first step toward being able to develop and implement a national industrial strategy a government must have its own house in order. It must have the will and the capability to co-ordinate the whole range of policies involved in such an undertaking.

Mr. Stafford: We have that.

Mr. Stanfield: The government has the capability to create more contradictions in our economy than any previous government in Canadian history. It has exhibited neither the will nor the capability to reconcile the different aims in our country. On the contrary, we have seen example after example that this is likely to be the most unco-ordinated government that ever came to office in Canada. We have seen national economic slowdown policy in conflict with regional development policy. We have seen fiscal and monetary policy in conflict with trade policy. And we have seen a tax reform policy and a so-called competition policy which have unsettled the entire private sector of the economy. Talk about the right hand not knowing what the left hand is supposed to be doing! Here we have a situation where the right foot and the left foot keep colliding in going into the same mouth.

Where do the provinces fit into the government's planning, or lack of planning? Again, in terms of industrial strategy it appears that a number of provinces are trying to shape some basic policies of their own in the absence of any federal initiative or any indication of where the federal government is going. This was the position expressed by the Premier of Alberta in a major address to the legislature of his province. I do not think that premier was being partisanly political in his remarks. His message seemed to me to be very moderate and responsible. His government would like to see some leadership in this area from the federal government, but in the meantime his government would have to make some moves on its own.

Indeed, what else can any province do? The federal government has not even indicated what it means by "industrial strategy." On that score it cannot play the old trick of throwing the ball back to us, because in my remarks during the Throne Speech debate I gave a pretty full accounting of what my party believes this term to involve and the goals we would associate with the pursuit of such a strategy.

But the government, Sir, has not given us any definition, has not given us any idea of what its concept is. I would like to know if the government envisages making a selection of industries which have good futures, or making a selection of certain sectors which it decides have good futures and encouraging those industries or sectors. Is that the sort of strategy the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has in mind? I do not know. But I am certain of one thing at this point, and that is my very frank scepticism of the government's capacity to follow through on its promise in the Speech from the Throne that it was going to present this country with a strategy for economic development.

For example, we were promised "policies for the use of science and technology designed to contribute not only to industry but to the qualitative improvement of the life of Canadians." Where are these policies, Mr. Speaker? Nobody can say. Nobody knows where they are. These days the only spokesman on the government side—I do not know whether he is on the government's side, but he sits on that side of the House—regarding any kind of strategy position is the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans). He says that we have plenty of manpower and a scarcity of capital. I am not overlooking the proposals made by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), but I am referring now specifically to the hon. member for Duvernay.

Mr. Béchard: Take both of them with you.

Mr. Dinsdale: His heart is not over there, either.

Mr. Stanfield: Somebody on the other side is offering both these hon. members to us, but I do not know if he has authority to do that or if he has direction over their decision. I think he had better concentrate on getting some action from this government.

The hon. member for Duvernay says that we have plenty of manpower and a scarcity of capital, and that therefore we should develop labour-intensive industries with a vengeance and withdraw emphasis altogether from the field of resource development. Whatever else it may do, I hope the government will not take this attitude in any extreme way. If this line of thought were followed to its logical conclusion, we would end up as a nation specializing in handicrafts.

The former minister says that we should back off development in our resource industries because they are capital intensive. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask hon. members whether the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta, whose economies are based upon resource development, should be subjected to some kind of limitation in this respect. I should like to ask whether the standards that the people of those provinces have achieved through resource development are in some way considered to run contrary to the national interest.

I would find it difficult to agree that the search for minerals off the coast of the Atlantic provinces and the development of such resources would be contrary to the interest of that part of Canada or to the interest of the country as a whole. Surely discouraging such development is not in the national interest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I think we should recognize, too, that manufacturing is increasingly becoming capital-intensive and that labour-intensive manufacturing operations are finding it more and more difficult to compete with countries which have more labour which costs less than in this country. I suggest that this approach, pushed to any extreme, would be a rather strange way to lead Canada into the technological age. A large proportion of the employment of this country is in the service industries. I suggest that the search for and the development and exploitation of resource industries provides a large market for sophisticated service industries.

I agree that we will see a capital shortage in this country during the 1970s. We have only to look at the requirements for the development of electrical power, the expenditures proposed by the telephone industry and the increasingly capital-intensive nature of our industries generally. There is also the fact that farms are becoming capital-intensive, in addition to the requirements of what we generally refer to in this country as social capital.

There will be a tremendous requirement for capital in this country in the 1970s. I do not think we can allow the inward movement of capital to keep the dollar at a level inappropriate for the development of trade and, therefore, employment. The inward flow of capital that we have seen in recent months is holding up the dollar. It is not due to investment in resources, in manufacturing or in any other kind of industry. Investment in industrial development in 1972 is very little higher than it was in 1971; in fact, it is so disappointing that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) devoted most of his budget to an effort to increase the rate of investment in Canada.

Today we have the rather weird situation of a very high demand for short-term capital which is not associated with any increase in industrial investment. It seems to me that the government has turned the country upside down. This demand for short-term loans is not associated with investment in industry. Our short-term rates are high.

Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance should succeed, what are the government's plans? What shall we do when investment is increased to the rate I would like to see it and the rate that I believe the Minister of Finance would like to see it? We shall need large sums of capital to support this investment which the minister is seeking. How does the government propose to cope with that situation and the effect it may have on the dollar?

How do we establish our priorities so that we can limit this inward flow of capital to levels which will not maintain the dollar at a level that is totally inappropriate for a decent level of employment? We will then have the requirements of industry added to those of the government. While the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Macdonald) has referred to the importance of phasing pipeline development in this country, that is only one aspect of the problem. We recognize that our problem goes far beyond that.

If we are going to talk about economic strategies for development, we have to work out priorities for capital—and not in what I would call the simplistic manner put forward by the hon. member for Duvernay. Despite all its task forces, this government has done no work at all on this program except, perhaps, in consideration of the proposal mentioned by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with regard to phasing pipeline development.

In other words, the government has not only helped create and tolerate contradictions in our economy, but we seem to be moving completely in the dark. Not only is there no indication of an industrial strategy but there is confusion about tax amendments which the government has failed to produce and the commitment of a competition policy which has been deferred until the fall. Nobody knows what is happening in regard to that, and nobody can make any plans about what mergers might be possible to meet our competitive position in the world. This is the kind of confusion that has been created by the government—starting a certain course, giving certain assurances, then backing away and failing to deliver the goods.

One bill that was proposed in the Speech from the Throne and did see the light of day was the foreign takeover legislation. Perhaps this revolutionary and forward-looking piece of legislation is the reason all the other promised pieces of legislation have not materialized. I can imagine the cabinet putting so much time into this one glorious effort that it just could not get around to anything else. I do not want to joke about this, Mr. Speaker. I presume it cannot be easy and it would take years of work and reams of recommendations, including the document prepared by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray), to distil it into relative insignificance.

This task would, understandably, leave no time for the reconsideration of competition policy, for the preparation of income tax amendments or for the job of preparing an industrial strategy. It would leave no time for fulfilling the promise of an amending bill with respect to tax legislation and it would leave no time, of course, for the other matters that will be discussed by other members during the course of this afternoon's debate. This is all very understandable.

As things now stand, I suppose this session would have to be called "the takeover session" in tribute to the government's unique accomplishment in this field, an accomplishment we had looked forward to for so long. With any luck, Sir, an election will come soon. That will be followed by another kind of takeover session and I think most Canadians are looking forward to that.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, under the order the House made earlier today I shall have only 20 minutes in which to deal with the subject of the motion. This debate might be considered, I suppose, as a Throne Speech debate in reverse. I shall not have enough time to cover all the ground I should like to cover.

Mr. Stanfield: Call it a second look debate.

Mr. Lewis: I wish to begin by quoting briefly four passages from the Speech from the Throne. That speech grandiloquently said:

> This country fails in its essential purpose if it does not ensure that its most precious resource, human talent, is not wasted away.

The Throne Speech sounded the bell when it said:

> Job opportunities must be found and income uncertainties overcome if all Canadians are to share in the richness of this land.

They were fine words. The Throne Speech dealt with the north of Canada and it said, with a great beating of its breast, if a Throne Speech may be said to beat its breast:

> —development will not be permitted at the expense of the northern peoples and the northern environment.

Then the Speech from the Throne announced the following:

> Another step, and long overdue, consists of policies to ensure the equality of women in Canadian society. These will be announced this session.

We are still awaiting that announcement. The reason for my repeating these sentences, fine in spirit, banal in thought and meaningless so far as action is concerned, is this: the Throne Speech of last February was another example of the way in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his associates have tried to persuade the people of Canada over the last four years that they can look forward to real progress in achieving a decent, humane, human, just and compassionate society. All these adjectives the Prime Minister has used at one time or another. As I said in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, anyone looking at the country today would be right in saying, as I did, that the Trudeau years have been wasted years.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and the people of Canada to look at Canada in June, 1972, and compare it with the Canada of June, 1968, when the people, with a great deal of hope, said to the present Prime Minister, "You look like a swinger; you look like a modern man. We will vote for you and give you power." Let us look at the country and see what has happened to this swinger in the last four years.

Unemployment in 1972 is very much worse than when the present government took power. Progress in housing has been almost negligible in terms of meeting the needs of the Canadian people for homes.

An hon. Member: That is not right.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Lewis: No progress has been made in setting up machinery for planning our urban centres and avoiding the planlessness, overcrowding and unmanageable pollution from which the larger centres in this country suffer. Consider pollution, a subject we discussed earlier today. In that area we have passed some laws which have not been proclaimed. We have passed some laws that were proclaimed, but the regulations have not been brought down. The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) has been attending a convention in Stockholm and playing the hero there. There has not been—I say this dogmatically, believing it to be true—a single significant step either to stop further pollution or to clean up the pollution of our rivers and lakes across Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: We are no better off in 1972 than we were in 1962.

Let us consider our young people. What has happened to the young people of Canada, many of whom supported the Prime Minister in the mistaken illusion that here was a man who might do something for them, who might break down the disenchantment they felt and bring to an end their feelings of isolation, alienation and that they were not participating in society. How has this Parliament, under the direction of the government, treated the young people of Canada? It has treated them this way: for 24 months, consecutively and continuously, between 40 per cent and 48 per cent of our unemployed people have been under the age of 25. Consecutively, every month for 24 months youngsters of 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and so on have left school, left college, left university and wandered across this country without a place in society, without any feeling that they are part of a social system to which they may contribute.

Consider all the bitterness, resentment and hopelessness which that kind of condition brings. Mr. Speaker, I am not talking about a thousand youngsters, I am not talking about 50,000 youngsters, I am not talking about 100,000 youngsters; I am talking about a quarter of a million and more young Canadians who are under 25 and who find themselves in this hopelessly desperate condition after four years of government by the swinger who fooled the Canadian people into electing him their Prime Minister.

Consider what has happened to the poor people. In any conceivable, real sense has their condition improved? Not at all. They still form approximately 24 per cent or 25 per cent of Canadians who live below the line of poverty. They are in precisely the same bind they were in four years ago; they are not one whit better off.

If you think of the independence of Canada, of the future of Canada as a nation standing on its own feet, what do you see? All you have seen in the last four years is a continuing erosion of Canadian economic independence, a continuing spreading of the foreign takeover of this country, the continuing control of our economy by foreign hands. The proportion of our businesses owned by foreigners has now become greater than it was four years ago. To answer this important, serious and indeed crucial problem affecting the future of Canada the government has brought down a bill that has no meaning, no relevance and no teeth. Indeed, the foreign takeover bill that is now before a committee of this House is without sense.

According to reports I have read in the press, the only amendments the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) has introduced with respect to the foreign takeover bill have been those that the Canadian Manufacturers Association and the Chamber of Commerce have required. These amendments would raise the floor, so that more takeovers can take place or pass even that limping screening process which the government has proposed in that bill.

I, as the leader of my party, in common with other Members of Parliament and in common with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), travel across this country a good deal. I say to the government and to members of the House who are listening to me that I do not say these things with pleasure. My colleagues in my party are not asking me to say these things with any great glee or any degree of pleasure. I say them with sorrow, regret and pain. I say them when I travel across the country.

For a few days near the end of last week I travelled to the area represented by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who apparently will speak on behalf of the government later today. I have visited Cape Breton Island, the province of Nova Scotia and other parts of the country over the years and have found that exactly the same kind of problems beset the people of Nova Scotia and the people of the area which the minister represents. I find that in 1972 the condition of the people of Cape Breton is no better than when I visited the island in 1938. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is worse because in 1938 and for many years after that I spoke to audiences in Cape Breton and in the audiences there would be some young people. It is almost impossible to find young people today on Cape Breton Island, except those still going to school, because there is no opportunity for a young Canadian to build himself a life in that part of the country. The same is true of many other parts of Canada from coast to coast.

When one travels across this country one meets, as I did the other day in Vancouver, groups of old age pensioners who simply cannot live on what they receive from the old age pension, even if they should receive the total guaranteed income supplement. Many of them complain to me that because of the way in which the rules are written and applied it is difficult for them not to try to hide a few hundred or a few thousand dollars which they may have saved throughout a lifetime of work. If they expose this money as being theirs, they will be even worse off than they are now—and they are bad off as it is.

I ask myself, this Parliament and the people of Canada how these things occur. Why has this government failed so miserably and dismally in improving the conditions of the people of Canada? In endeavouring to carry out the first goal which I cited from the Throne Speech, why has this government failed in its essential purpose? It is because it has not ensured that its most precious resource, human talent, is not wasted away.

Why does this happen? Since I only have about five or six minutes left, I will give a brief answer. It is that this government is totally corporation oriented. No matter what piece of legislation it deals with, and no matter what area of activity it enters into, the first consideration of this government is the corporate sector of society and the handouts it can give to that sector. Every time you ask for an improvement in the quality of life for the people of Canada, there is no money available. However, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has no hesitation in bringing down a budget in which he makes a $500 million gift to the corporations of this country one year and $700 million the second year. He has no hesitation in handing out hundreds of millions of dollars to the corporations, but every time one asks for an improvement in the quality of life of Canadians there is no money for it.

I have added up what this government gives to corporations. Including tax write-offs, tax holidays, depreciation write-offs and depletion allowances that it gives to corporations in this country, the government pays out every single year more than $2 billion to corporations.

When speaking to the Social Development Council in the city of Quebec, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) had the nerve to say that we must have selectivity; we cannot have universality and we cannot improve the lot of the poor in Canada sufficiently, because if we try to do that the middle-class will have to carry the tax burden. The people—I use the word "people" in the legal sense—who ought to carry the tax burden in this country and who do not carry their fair share are the corporations. They get away with murder.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Forty-six per cent of the corporations in Canada—I am talking about large corporations—pay not a single, solitary penny in taxes. Poor Shell Oil, the large, poverty-stricken, penniless, multinational corporation,, made $250 million in profits over a period of five years and paid not a single, solitary cent in taxes to the federal treasury! Falconbridge Mines made a similar amount of money over a similar period and paid $15 million in income tax to the federal treasury. That is a rate of about 7 per cent. Having done that, they received a $4 million grant from the federal government.

This is the kind of situation the people of Canada face. This is the truth they have to be told. This government is corporation oriented. If the government would stop giving these handouts to the corporations of Canada, it would have the money to increase contributions to our needy people; it would have the money to cut income tax for those making less than $10,000 a year. These people would spend every penny available to them and really make the economy hum by increasing the total aggregate demand.

It is a government, as it is a system, of corporate rip-off. It is a government whose party is financed by 95 corporations. I say to the corporations that they are smart; they are getting a good return for every one of the $30,000 they give to the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: This government is concentrating on the large private businesses of this country, letting them carry on and depending on them to provide the jobs, goodies and generosity which they have in their good hearts. I do not know where the Minister of Finance or anyone else finds good hearts in the corporations, when I find it difficult to find any heart at all, but they always do. The time has come for the government of this country to become people oriented instead of corporation oriented. The time has come when all the laws and policies of government have to be directed toward the people of this country, particularly those who work for a living in factories, offices, on farms, in the mines, fishing or whatever. The time has come for the government to change its attitude and direction. So long as we have a government of the kind we have across the way, so long will there be failure in Canada doing its major job, which is to make sure that its human talents are not wasted.

My eyes wander along the aisle to the Leader of the Opposition and the people who surround him. I ask myself, are they capable of changing the direction of government in this country? The answer is obviously no. No matter how deep one's regard may be for the Leader of the Opposition, and I have great personal regard for him, he is no different from the Prime Minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: In the Leader of the Opposition there is not the slightest difference from the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Stanfield: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lewis: As far as his policies and philosophy are concerned, there is not the slightest difference. The Leader of the Opposition expresses himself a little differently. His mother tongue is different. He comes from a different part of the country. In opposition he sounds serious about wanting to do something for Canada, just as the Prime Minister sounds serious about wanting to do something for Canada. I say to him, if you want to find a time when unemployment was as high as it is now, you will find it during the term of office of the previous Conservative government. I ask myself what the Leader of the Opposition would do about foreign control of the economy. The answer is obvious: he would appoint Steve Roman, of Denison Mines fame, as minister of industry, trade and commerce to screen takeovers in Canada. He would certainly have the kind of man who would protect Canada's economic independence.

I was not in the House yesterday because I was returning from a western tour, but on looking at yesterday's Hansard I noted that the Tories moved a motion condemning the incentives program of the government. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), who undoubtedly is slated for a portfolio if the people of Canada are blind enough to elect the Conservatives into power—it does not require any more blindness than was the case previously—urged that the corporate tax reduction announced in the budget to come into effect on January 1, 1973, be implemented right away as of July 1, 1972. His corporate friends do not have even the patience to wait until next January. The corporate friends of the Minister of Finance were told they would have to wait six months, but the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings cannot wait that long. He wanted further tax incentives for corporations in order to improve productivity.

When we of the New Democratic Party proposed that pensions be increased to a level of $150 a month, the Leader of the Opposition told a group of pensioners—so I was told in Vancouver—that that figure was too high to be acceptable to him, that the country could not afford it. In my opinion—I say this knowing that it will be offensive, but I cannot help it; I have to speak the truth as I see it—

Mr. Jerome: We know you cannot help it.

Mr. Lewis: —the Liberal and Conservative parties of this country are both corporation oriented. Their concern for the people is secondary, and so long as they are in power it is the people who will suffer.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I just heard the list of future Progressive Conservative cabinet appointees. I could perhaps in turn give that of the future New Democrat cabinet, if that party ever comes to power: Michel Chartrand, Minister of Labour; Marcel Pépin and Louis Laberge at the Department of Education, Yvon Charbonneau to get the provinces to agree with Ottawa, and Raymond Laliberté, probably special adviser to the Prime Minister—undoubtedly the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis).

Mr. Speaker, those shadow cabinets will not change the situation which prevails today in Canada. However, I find very surprising the motion of the Leader of the Opposition, which reads as follows:

> This House regrets the failure of the government to proceed during the current session of Parliament with a positive legislative program; and particularly regrets its failure to carry out the program proposed in the Speech from the Throne on February 17th, 1972, and adopted by this House, thus betraying the trust placed by this House in the ministry to provide adequate measures to meet the needs of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, now the Leader of the Opposition blames the government for not having enacted the intentions expressed in the Speech from the Throne; yet, he was completely opposed to that speech when it was given on February 17 last. The behaviour of politicians is sometimes strange. That is why I was not surprised, yesterday or the day before, to hear that the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition had gone to the zoo in Granby. That is where he won such wonderful support in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne was moved by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) and seconded by the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Lajoie). The Leader of the Opposition, as reported on page 34 of Hansard for February 18 1972, moved the following amendment:

> —we respectfully regret that your government has not only failed utterly to provide an economic climate in which Canadians can have confidence in the future and to give protection to Canadians against the isolation of individuals caused by economic deprivation but, in fact, has deepened the gap between the affluent and those in need.

The amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition was justified. The leader of the New Democratic Party introduced an amendment to that amendment on February 18, as reported on page 45 of the House of Commons Debates. It read as follows:

—and in particular has taken no effective steps to relieve the serious unemployment situation that has affected Canadians in all parts of this country throughout its term of office.

It referred to this government. Mr. Speaker, the amendment was put and the Leader of the Opposition as well as the Progressive Conservative members and those of my party voted in favour of it.

Later on, that is on February 22, we introduced the following amendment to the amendment:

• (1620)

That the amendment be amended by striking out all the words after "economic deprivation" and replacing them with the following:

"resulting from the absence of any monetary reform tailored to the needs of the Canadian society."

It was put on February 23, as recorded on page 195 of Hansard and the Progressive Conservative as well as the New Democratic members voted in favour of the monetary reform which we proposed in order to meet the needs of the people.

On February 23, the amendment of the Leader of the Official Opposition was put. We voted, as the members of the Progressive Conservative party against the Throne Speech. However, the Progressive Conservative members are now asking the government to carry out the measures outlined in the Throne Speech, while they voted against it. We do not find that quite logical.

Something is missing somewhere. It may be sincerity or perhaps understanding. Terms are misunderstood. Something is not going right. You are either for or against something. If you are against it, let us not come back two months later and say: We condemn you for not having applied what we were opposed to.

Mr. Speaker, this is about what is happening. By introducing the amendment, they are saying to this government: You are incompetent, you did not apply the measures contained in the Throne Speech. And yet, the Progressive Conservatives were asking this government not to apply them because they were worthless.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that parliamentarism compels the opposition to say "no" when the government says "yes", in some cases, but I do not think that this is an efficient way of opposing an inefficient government. When a government fails to keep its promises or meet its commitments, it is up to us to tell it so. But if we object to its taking a certain course and then later blame it for not having done so, I am at a loss to understand and can make neither head or tail of it. Let us be consistent.

We voted against the Speech from the Throne because we sincerely felt it did not contain adequate measures to meet the needs of the population of Canada in all fields of economic activity.

In that speech everything was mentioned: taxation, fiscal reform, etc. This last is being applied by way of taking from the haves and giving to the have-nots, purporting to enrich the poor by impoverishing the middle class. Finally, we shall discover that we have yet more poor, that we have no middle class left because it has been taxed into oblivion. We have got to the point where we are taxing taxes.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear that there is a tendency to eliminate the middle class solely for the benefit of the rich people, because the poor do not get anything out of it. Old age pensions have been raised recently. The increase meant only $2.80 more per month for the have-nots, which is not enormous. Old people will not be able to raise their standard of living with that amount, even though pensions from now on are going to be tied in with the cost of living. It means that every time the cost of living will go up 1 per cent pensioners will get an increase of 80 cent a month.

Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne dealt with taxation. We have fought in this House the new taxation which is, furthermore, accompanied by income tax forms which are a hundred times more difficult to understand than the previous ones, to the extent that some accountants are completely baffled. They have to check and recheck time and again their audits. In the budget speech, the government has undertaken to reconsider the tax forms so that they might become more understandable. This is a bureaucratic "gimmick". Yes, it creates jobs.

Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, the Speech from the Throne advocated passage of 34 bills, five of which have been adopted since February while 29 others are still on the order paper and have not yet been dealt with.

For instance a new formula should have been submitted concerning federal-provincial relations, but the government is hesitating. Improvements should have been made in agriculture and increased aid provided to our youth, to the Local Initiatives Program as well as to the retraining of the unemployed to enable them, at least, to become more educated unemployed, but nothing has materialized. Aid to youth has decreased from what it was last year and the problems have not been lessened either.

I said yesterday that of the 17,000 projects under the Local Initiatives Program, only 5,000 had been accepted; that more than 19,000 projects under the Opportunities for Youth program had been submitted to the government and a little more than 3,000 of them had been approved. We are up against a stone wall. We are repeatedly told: We have no money to approve more projects.

Mr. Speaker, the industrial strategy for Canada has been also dealt with and the more we discuss this project, the more plants and industries are closing down, not only in one specific province, but all over Canada. Plants are closing down because products are not being sold. This is what industrial strategy is all about!

And while plants are closing down, workers, such as those of the textile industry in the Eastern Townships are asked to go on pension at the age of 54, not on their present salary, but on part of it in order to make way for younger people.

In the meantime, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) is in China or Japan purchasing textile products to enter into dishonest competition with the Canadian industry. How can one say that this government is honest with the Canadian people?

Mr. Speaker, for other reasons, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce also went to Russia. I think he went to China twice and if he goes a third time, I would not be surprised if he were mistaken for a Chinese.

A moment ago, I heard the Leader of the official opposition say that the government will run out of long and short term capital and he is wondering where it will find such capital. I would ask the Leader of the official opposition where he would find capital if he were the Prime Minister.

Whether short or long term capital is involved, it does not matter since to us capital represents the possibility of developing our industries and our natural resources. And to the extent that the Canadian people will be able to develop our natural resources, the government will have to say to the Bank of Canada: You extend credit according to the natural resources development in Canada. We would then be masters of our own economy and not the Americans' slaves.

Mr. Speaker, the more we advance in life the farther the emergence of this just society promised by the Liberals. The expression "just society" was on the lips of every government member; vote for us and we shall give you a just society. And the more we advance—I hear the applause of two or three colleagues—the less we hear about justice in the economic and social fields.

People are sent to hell; no matter if the people involved are the "Lapalme boys", the young or others who come to meet the Prime Minister of other government members, they are told: if you are not happy, vote against us.

Not long ago in Medicine Hat, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), was challenged by people that were frustrated and the Prime Minister told them: if you are not satisfied, vote against him. Simple all right, but why were they not told to vote against in 1968?

Here, Mr. Speaker, is another issue on which the government has made promises: bilingualism, which we favour all across Canada. The objective is a knowledge of both official languages. However, there are various ways of going about it in order not to discriminate.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that when a 50-year old public servant is told that unless he learns a second language he will lose his job, this is discrimination, and the government does not have the right approach. There is only one way—very easy at that—to make bilingualism a reality in Canada: it is to advocate the teaching of both official languages in schools throughout the country right from the first year, in co-operation with the provinces—since education is a provincial matter—but with the financial assistance of the federal government, which has financed a commission to teach people how to speak English outside Quebec and how to speak French in Quebec.

Mr. Roy (Laval): This is exactly what is being done.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that this is exactly what is being done. It is exactly what is not being done. Name me one school in British Columbia which is subsidized by the federal government so that French may be taught there—although all parents would be in favour of it. This is what I say when I go to western Canada, and I do not hesitate to say it: everybody agrees to have both official languages taught from the first year on, not at the age of 20 or 35. Public servants in Ottawa now have to go on courses to learn French. When are they going to learn it? You do not learn a second language easily when you are 40 years old.

And here, Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Stanfield) on his efforts to learn French—

Mr. Béchard: He was over 40 when he started!

Mr. Caouette: Yes, he was, and this is why he will never speak French fluently. However, he can express himself in French. I for one started learning English when I was 20, and I still cannot speak it properly. I know it.

Mr. Speaker, if we started teaching both languages right from the first year, in less than five years, our young people would be speaking English and French fluently across Canada.

When my two boys were respectively four and five years old, my neighbour in Rouyn was a Ukrainian who had a small boy of the same age. The three children played together. We have members of Ukrainian descent in the House and I am happy to have them; in fact, they are Canadians who speak Ukrainian. My two young sons played with their little Ukrainian neighbour and one night, at supper, the two little ones were speaking together and I could not understand a word they were saying; they were speaking Ukrainian without anyone forcing them to do so, but simply because of their contacts with the small neighbour they were playing with.

This is how we will solve our bilingualism problem in Canada. We must not force a francophone to learn English at age 40 or 50. If he wants to learn it, congratulations, but if he does not wish to do so, he should not be forced. This is a democratic attitude which would promote unity in Canada.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I feel flattered at the opportunity accorded to me to follow the leaders of the three opposition parties in the debate this afternoon. Probably my contribution will be more objective than theirs because my appreciation of events is not dazzled by the elusive prospect they are nourishing, that some day they might head the government of this country. These hopefuls, about to be disappointed and probably decimated, were showing their wares this afternoon and vying with each other concerning why their party is the best. That was very interesting. Because I am not in that position I can approach the motion somewhat more objectively than they can, for the reasons stated.

The motion criticizes the government for not carrying out the program outlined in the Throne Speech. The wording suggests the opposition believes that the measures contained in the Throne Speech were adequate to meet the needs of Canadians. On that basis the motion appears to be a motion of confidence in the government, at least in February. Secondly, the opposition has a measure of responsibility in the discharge of House business. If the opposition has not seen fit to assist the government in carrying out those measures which the opposition believes are adequate measures to meet the needs of Canadians, then the opposition has not fulfilled its duty. From this point of view the motion appears to be a motion of non-confidence in the opposition. Also, if we recall the oft repeated dictum of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), that the government proposes and the opposition disposes, the motion could be interpreted as a condemnation of the tactics the opposition has employed during the current session.

In a general way, as we know, the Throne Speech sets out the broad policy lines of the government's social and economic policies. When these were set out for this session by the government, the opposition, especially the official opposition, disparaged the policies at the time, heaped ridicule upon them and condemned them as being inadequate. Now they condemn the government for not ramming them through the House. The attitude of the opposition was negative, harsh and critical. They took refuge in a smokescreen of bilious platitudes.

The opposition has protested almost every sound piece of legislation brought forward by the government. Now they complain bitterly that some items in the program remain to be dealt with. That point was made very effectively by the leader of the Social Credit party. The official opposition especially condemns what it appears to support and supports what it appears to condemn. The opposition motion is directed to the serious question of the government's program in this Parliament and, in particular, this session.

I should like to answer the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) by relating some information about the legislative process and some documented facts about the tremendous amount of work this Parliament has accomplished, to show that the opposition's excessive abuse of parliamentary time in recent months has delayed the passage of some items of legislation which are part of the Throne Speech.

There is no doubt that time is a limited resource in the legislative process. From the perspective of the government House leader the legislative process is a complex process of anticipating and reconciling conflicting demands in a limited amount of time. This government will not be judged by the last three months alone; it will be judged by its program to date through four sessions of Parliament, ending possibly this session. Compared with the decade of the 1960s, the present Parliament to which we belong in its first two sessions sat longer and passed more bills of a lengthy, complex and technical nature than had been passed in the previous decade. Between the sessions of 1960 and 1968, Parliament sat an average of 142 days per session. During the first two sessions of this Parliemant we sat, on the average, 176 days.

In the previous period to which I referred, Parliament enacted, on average, 46 public bills per session. During the first two sessions of this Parliament we enacted 65 bills per session. The number of pages of enacted legislation has risen from an average of 461 in the period between 1960 and 1968 to 659 in the first two sessions of this Parliament. In other words, this Parliament had to deal with approximately 1½ times as many pages of enacted legislation per sitting day as it did on an average during the sessions from 1960 to 1968.

When we turn to the legislative performance of the third session of this Parliament, last session, it is possible to see an even greater acceleration in business. If we include all the sessions between 1960 and 1970, we get an average of 148 days; but in the third session we sat 243 days. In that session Parliament enacted 65 public bills, whereas the average number of public bills in the last decade was 49. Indicative of the technical and more complex nature of modern legislation, the third session passed, on the average, 1,037 pages of legislation compared with an average of 497 in the sessions between 1960 and 1970.

Mr. Lewis: Am I wrong, or were you minister from 1963 onward?

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member is quite right. I am talking about the productivity of the current Parliament, to which this motion directs itself, in comparison with previous Parliaments. In terms of all the tests that we can apply, in terms of the pages of enacted legislation, of the labour of members sitting in the House and the output of bills, the record of this Parliament has been a good one.

Up to the present session the government has, therefore, been able to complete one of the most comprehensive programs ever put before Parliament. The government has proposed and has completed legislation in every conceivable area—economic growth, social justice and the quality of life. It has acted in the field of social justice by revising and raising old age security pensions and veterans pensions. It has reformed the Canada Labour (Standards) Code to raise the federal minimum wage. It has revised the Unemployment Insurance Act and it has brought before Parliament substantial revisions to the criminal law and generally to the legal system.

The government has responded to new demands, such as the increased concern with environmental matters, in several legislative steps including the creation of the Department of the Environment itself, the Arctic Waters Pollution Prevention Act, the Canada Water Act, and so on.

In addition, during this Parliament the government has been much concerned with the maintenance and strengthening of an effective democratic process. It has put forward revisions to the Canada Elections Act. It put forward the Statutory Instruments Act, and on two occasions it undertook the comprehensive reorganization of government structure. In order to strengthen national unity—the leader of the Social Credit party referred to this matter—it put forward and brought into effect the Official Languages Act. In matters of economic growth the government has produced much important legislation, almost too numerous to outline at the moment, including the Canada Corporations Act revision, the investment companies act, the employment support act, the Regional Development Incentives Act and many other important pieces of legislation.

Despite the words of the Leader of the Opposition about a left-over bill, which I hope will be facing him shortly, this Parliament has undertaken the most extensive reform of the Canadian taxation system in our history. I am not complaining about this. I have noticed, however, that in this session the opposition has spent at least part of its time on political campaigning. In fact, I am told that some of the Leader of the Opposition's colleagues are concerned about how badly he has misjudged the date of the election. Instead of spending his time boning up on the legislative program, he has spent a good deal of time campaigning around the country.

I am not scandalized at the fact that parties should get immersed in politics, but I do not think we should blind ourselves to the effect that that preoccupation has on the legislative program of the House of Commons. I have not complained about it, but I find it a bit galling to have the Leader of the Opposition and his House leader complain about the appalling record of legislative progress, a record which they have extensively participated in creating.

Today is the seventy-eighth sitting day of this session. Let me say first of all that more than 40 per cent of that time has been spent on business other than government legislation. I have personally regretted every single day that was lost to the legislative process, but we did have to meet our parliamentary commitments by spending a day on the Speech from the Throne, which was so popular in February and so unpopular in June—or is it the other way round—eight more days for the address debate, an important debate, and six days on the budget. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was demanding that we complete that debate. Today is the eighteenth day spent on the business of supply, opposition days, and two days—or was it one—were spent on the motion of the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) on that memorable occasion when we accepted his motion in the House of Commons.

All I am saying is that in this session we have had 43 days available for government legislation. And what has happened to these 43 days? On February 17, the Prime Minister tabled a list of proposed legislation for this session. It consisted of 29 items. We have added some since, all items that were popularly received, such as the old age pension increase, the veterans pension increase, the new pension bill that was given first reading yesterday, and one or two others. But of the original 29, the government has made a deliberate attempt to get as many through Parliament as possible. Of those 29 bills only six remain to be brought forward and three of them require the completion of consultation with the provinces or with the private sector as promised in the Speech from the Throne.

I believe that is a pretty good record. It is nothing to be ashamed of, considering the dynamic world in which we are living. We know perfectly well that items of legislation are dying in the House because members find them not very important or refuse to pass them. Since February we have brought forward 23 of these items; they are all on the order paper and available for discussion. What has happened to these bills? Without casting any reflection, I must say that the House has not shown any real readiness to deal with these bills reasonably rapidly. As I have said so often, in the British House they spent a maximum of two days on second reading. Probably they give most bills second reading in a day or less. Of course, if we had done that in this House there would be no need to complain about the legislative pace.

Let us go back to the 43 days. On five of the 43 days we debated second reading of Bill C-4, the CNR financing and guarantee bill. It has not received second reading yet.

Mr. Benjamin: And you know why.

Mr. MacEachen: Of course I know why—because there is a price tag attached to the passage of the bill. I understand that and I accept it. I accept the capability of any person in this House to refuse passage of a bill. I am just pointing out that we have had five days on second reading and the bill is still where it started. We spent at least nine of the 43 days, and probably all of them, on second reading of the Family Income Security Plan bill. That bill is out of committee, at report stage. The federal-provincial fiscal relations bill took four days on second reading and two days at report stage, for a total of six days. Those four bills, Mr. Speaker, only one of which is passed and is now the law of Canada, took 24 of the 43 days that were available for government legislation in this session.

I say this to you, Mr. Speaker, and to all hon. members, harping back to the debate that we had on time allocation, that if the House of Commons takes 24 days to complete one bill and partially complete three others, we are not measuring up to the requirements of modern life and the requirements of a modern legislature.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I leave it at that. I make no complaints; I merely state the facts. As the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert said, this side proposes and that side disposes. That is how that side disposed of these items of government legislation.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. MacEachen: I now want to refer to the days that are set aside so that the opposition may tell Parliament what policies it would like to bring forward. I realize that the opposition must criticize; it must bring the government to task. But surely in our system of government, with an official opposition having had 50 days in this Parliament all to itself to bring forward alternative policies, with that kind of opportunity this House and the country should know where the official opposition in particular stands on all questions of public policy. But we do not. And they do not, which is worse.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: We have had carping criticism. We have had one motion after another repeating the same tired, bilious platitudes. To date we have had fourteen motions on unemployment from the Leader of the Opposition and his party. The same wine has been put in different bottles but we still do not know what kind of draft the Leader of the Opposition is preparing for the people of Canada. We ask, what is their position on economic policy? What is their position on industrial strategy? What is their position on constitutional reform? What is their position on the role of Quebec in Canada? What is the official opposition's position on the guaranteed income, which has been endorsed and disowned so often that it is difficult to know how that party could guarantee anything?

What is the official opposition's position on foreign involvement in the economy? Today the Leader of the Opposition gave the foreign takeover bill hell in the House. A few days ago he said he would vote for that bill, but today it was worthless, insignificant and a charade. Where do they stand on social justice? Where do they stand on questions of social life, the qualify of life in Canada?

There is hardly an aspect of public interest and public policy that this government in the past four years has not legislated upon or on which it has not declared to the public where it stands. There are undoubtedly some remaining issues but no government in the history of this country has done a better job, perhaps too good a job, of telling the people of Canada where it stands on controversial matters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: The Leader of the Opposition—I must give him credit—did bring in a new tax proposal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: He came up with a new policy in the budget debate when he brought forward his constant dollar income tax proposal. Probably it was the only time in this House that confusion was put forward as a major national policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Since then the Leader of the Opposition has dropped that proposal; at least he has not talked about it recently, or today in the House of Commons, because the careless rapture felt by the disclosure of that proposal has now dissipated in the subsequent bleak dawn of practical enlightenment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: It was a rosy scheme in which the taxpayer would pay his taxes in constant 1971 dollars. If it is a good scheme, why restrict it to tax payments? It should work right across the board. Maybe we could give back tax overpayments in constant dollars, or maybe we could pay the members of this House in constant 1971 dollars. But probably we ought to leave aside that question of the Leader of the Opposition for a moment; we do not know what he stands for.

Members of the official opposition have very little to offer, so far as I can make out, except their working over bones of policies and old programs that come back again and come forward again, that are withdrawn only to be put forward once more. One almost expects them to come up with the slogan of Sir John A. Macdonald in his last election campaign: The old flag, the old party, the old leader. But they cannot very well do that either; they are somewhat constrained in that particular situation.

I have listened so often to these speeches on supply days that all I can say is that the performance of that party—here I agree with the leader of the NDP—has been bereft of inspiration. It does not inspire anybody, certainly not in this House. It is devoid of constructive thought. It is really bankrupt of any worth while solution to the problems of Canada. All we get from that party is a long, interminable keening over the state of the nation. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, one can search through the speeches of the Leader of the Opposition, his statements, his pronouncements, his television interviews, his radio interviews for some smidgen of an alternative policy. What would he do, in contrast to this dreadful government? We never hear anything about that. There is no alternative, no proposal. He is like a mourner at the funeral of his own party.

Mr. MacEachen: When I listened to the leader of the New Democratic Party I took exception to some of the things he said. I thought he was a modern man; I thought he lived in the 1970s. I did not believe that his attitudes, his policies and prejudices were still firmly anchored in the 1930s. We have, in the unrehearsed and obviously unprepared address of the leader of the New Democratic Party, a real demonstration from the heart of what he felt. In my view the New Statesman would not even publish it. It was the old hat of the thirties. He tried to tell us that conditions in the area I come from are worse today than they were in 1938. Nobody who lives there and nobody who knows that part of the world would agree with him.

I thought it was rather typical that he should anchor his position so solidly to the thirties and drag out that old stuff about corporations pouring money into the coffers of the Tory party and the Liberal party, and that therefore we are all supine servants of the corporations. Mr. Speaker, there is no more careful defender of the corporations in his constituency than the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). He is very upset if there is any indication that a corporation in the Maritimes is to be helped by this government, because he recognizes as well as I do that corporations provide jobs and if they close their doors in his riding or in Cape Breton it is a serious matter for a Member of Parliament.

We are not corporation oriented; we are not servants of any corporation in this country. Any party that in one session has been able to put on the legislative program the family income security plan, the guaranteed income supplement program, increases for the veterans, the Local Initiatives Program and the Opportunities for Youth program—programs for which such bodies are hardly enthusiastic—is hardly frail or supine.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, it must have given the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) a good deal of satisfaction to get a lot of his frustrations off his chest in one fell swoop. He has had to present some of the bad, poorly drafted legislation that we have had in the last couple of sessions and it must have been difficult for him to persuade so many people to vote for it. In his remarks he neglected to mention that some of the delay has been caused by members supporting the government who were not satisfied with the legislation either. I think we should bear that in mind.

Nevertheless, I enjoyed the remarks of the government House leader. His presentation was very humorous and he managed to conceal the main thrust of the opposition motion, which is that the government has not presented a good deal of the legislation that was promised in the Speech from the Throne. I do not want to carp on this, but in fact our motion refers only to this session and in order to find something positive and productive the minister had to go back through the whole of this Parliament. Only at the end did he come around to this session and give us the reason why there was very little positive legislation. If we have had such an amount of good legislation during this Parliament, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask why the country is in the mess it is today. I think that question is raised by the presentation of the President of the Privy Council.

In the Speech from the Throne on February 17 I was very happy to hear the following words:

—policies designed to promote a related yet distinct sector of the economy, tourism, will be revealed in coming weeks.

That was a simple, straightforward declaration of intention by the government, but unfortunately with the session and undoubtedly this Parliament coming very close to an end we have not yet seen any proposal nor any legislation. This is one item I have picked from the many contained in the Speech from the Throne on which legislation was not even drafted or presented to the House. Certainly the President of the Privy Council cannot complain that we held up legislation which has not been put forward.

This may be one of my last speeches in this House, Mr. Speaker, and it is suitable that I should address myself to the failure of this government to bring out legislation to help the tourist industry. That was the situation I found when I arrived here 15 years ago: tourist business had hardly been discussed in Parliament. For many years this industry had struggled along with very little support or interest from the government. Representing a district in which tourism was of vital importance, I began a campaign, which I think was reasonably successful, for recognition of the tourist industry as valuable to Canada both as a means of revenue and a means of earning foreign dollars.

At the time tourist facilities were outmoded, unattractive and neglected. The operators could get no financial support from the private or the public sector to update their premises and were beginning to lose business to the northern United States where the industry was recognized and supported. In the years 1958 to 1961 the government introduced a series of measures to improve the industry and provide better facilities and more income for Canadians. At that time there were many roadside cabins which had been left over from the war and were outdated. In the early 1960s some of these began to be replaced by motels, lodges and resorts and others were renovated and made more attractive.

[Mr. Aiken.]

The government at that time required the Industrial Development Bank to classify tourism as an industry, which had not been the case previously. The situation has not changed at all, Mr. Speaker. The Industrial Development Bank clings to the old idea that they must get their money back; a borrower has to prove that he can repay a loan or the bank is not interested. This is not why the Industrial Development Bank was established. It was set up to provide capital in places where the private sector would not.

The government of that day said to the Industrial Development Bank, "We must reclassify the tourist industry as an industry coming under your responsibilities." We did that by legislation and then money began to flow to the tourist industry. The Small Businesses Loans Act, passed in 1961, covered in its provisions tourist operations. Here, again, the present government has carried on the policy which was begun then. It has done this successfully. Tourist operators have obtained large sums from the Industrial Development Bank and under the Small Businesses Loans Act for carrying on a reasonably competitive type of business in this country. I give credit to this government for carrying on policies begun under those two pieces of legislation which are now ten years old but are still extremely effective.

Also, the government of that day stepped up its advertising and representation abroad, increased the number of travel bureau offices and showed a real desire to promote new techniques. The present government has carried on those innovations but has not done anything to improve, update or assist the tourist business. For the last nine years we have not seen any new approach or recognition of the needs of the tourist industry on a national scale. Centennial year, 1967, generated a tremendous response from beyond our borders and encouraged travel within Canada. We have been coasting on this wave for the past four years and no effort has been made to maintain momentum.

We have not been given any indication of what the government had in mind when it made the important statement referred to in the Speech from the Throne. It might have had in mind financial support. The industry certainly could use it. Or it might have been thinking of better promotion of Canada abroad, and that certainly would be helpful. It might have been considering package tours from abroad supported by federal efforts. This idea has been talked about over the years. Some agents have inaugurated limited private travel plans.

Mr. Speaker, we want something more, something greater than is represented by a few rich Americans hunting polar bears in the arctic. In large part that has been the type of business which has been generated, and it is not enough for this country. We have not been told what the government had in mind. Perhaps somebody just threw that statement in for effect, so to speak. I hope not. But since no bill has come forward, that is how it looks now, four months later.

My time, unfortunately, is limited. May I read into the record figures relating to our balance of payments. Except for centennial year, 1967, Canada since 1963 has experienced an increasingly worsening balance of payments position relating to travel. In 1964 our balance on travel was in deficit to the extent of $50 million; more went out than came in. In 1966 the deficit was $60 million. In 1968 the deficit decreased to $30 million largely because the previous year, centennial year, had generated a positive inflow of $423 million. In 1970 our deficit with respect to the balance of travel payments was $226 million. In 1971 it was $201 million, slightly less than in 1970 but showing the same general trend. So we have gone downhill very badly in our balance of payments in travel.

Quite a bit of money is involved. After all, we are dealing with foreign funds here. Our travel balance in the first and fourth quarters of the year has been increasingly adverse. There has been a combination of failures. We have failed to promote our greatest asset, winter sports, and more Canadians have travelled abroad. The figures show that we are moving backward with respect to travel. It is obvious that we need policies which are designed to promote tourism, as proposed in the Speech from the Throne. It is equally obvious, Mr. Speaker, that those policies have not been forthcoming.

The government, in the present session or indeed in any further session of this Parliament if there should be one, will hardly find it possible to support and improve one of our best producers of foreign currency. I think it is tragic that this area has been so completely neglected. I have picked one of many. It is unfortunate that no bill in this area has come forward since this session began.

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the motion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is worded as follows:

> This House regrets the failure of the government to proceed during the current session of Parliament with a positive legislative program;—

There is a charge which is not truly founded and if the Leader of the Opposition were a lawyer and if the plea which he made this afternoon were made in court, the judge would not hesitate to dismiss the case.

The remarks made previously by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) demonstrate how groundless the motion of the Leader of the Opposition is.

I have listened, carefully of course, to the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition. I am not at all surprised that he should try to minimize the extremely important effects of the government's legislation. But what makes me particularly sad and disappointed is that in the course of his speech he failed to suggest any new solution to the current problems in Canada.

Mr. Béchard: He has none.

Mr. Ouellet: All he can do is repeat and I would say that his words are a true reflection of his party. It is a real indication of the weaknesses of the Progressive Conservative Party which is old-fashioned, worn and exhausted. I think that the best parts of his speech were those where he repeated the comments of the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans). I find it quite sad to see that the Leader of the Opposition has to take his views from government members when he wants to be interesting.

• (1720)

I would also like to point out some comments previously made by the Leader of the Social Credit party of Canada, the member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette). When he begins to speak, everything is fine, but it always turns for the worse. Indeed, he can never refrain from exaggerating, railing against the government and saying half truths.

The leader of the Social Credit was talking through his hat today when he blamed the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) for going to China. It is true that the minister did so and he may even go back. However, it is wrong to suggest, as the leader of Social Credit did, that the minister is going to China to promote imports of Chinese textile products in Canada. He should have wanted to say—and this is what he should have said—that he goes over there to sell our products to the Chinese.

Mr. Speaker, we know the importance of a dynamic foreign trade for our country. The population of Canada being small, we must export large quantities of goods to maintain our standard of living. This government went to great efforts in order to increase our exports, and they increased, during the last six years, from $8 billion to $18 billion. This is what the government is doing, and what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is also doing when he goes to China; he tries to sell our products. And this is not at all the same thing as what the hon. member for Témiscamingue claims.

To return to the motion before us today, I will remind you that Speech from the Throne of February 17, 1972, was excellent. Its purposes were the following: the government will introduce bills concerning the continuing development of our natural resources, the means of giving more generous help to those among us who are in need, the involvement of a great number of Canadians into community activities which are rewarding, the preservation of our natural heritage, the strengthening of our national identity and of our own image.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, we cannot agree with the second part of the motion of the Leader of the Opposition where he bewails the government's inability to carry out the program outlined in the Speech from the Throne of February 17, 1972. Let us examine together the motions and bills studied and passed by Parliament. Due to the time limit, I will only mention a few.

Since the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) is present, I would like to say a few words on the bill concerning national parks. Thanks to the leadership of this minister, there are now national parks in all ten provinces of Canada. I take this opportunity to congratulate him on the establishment of national parks in the province of Quebec. This has been awaited for a long time, and we should be delighted with the new legislation opening the gates.

I want to say a few words about the bills covering amendments to the Canadian Labour code, to the National Housing Act, to family income security and finally to foreign ownership control.

We now live in a time when strikes are a daily occurrence, when people find it hard to remain composed in the face of such a rising tide of work stoppages occurring every day and the government introduced a bill to revamp the labour legislation, especially in the industrial relations sector. The government wanted to establish legislative measures and mechanisms to help employers and unions better settle their disputes. They tried to adapt their legislative measures to the needs of the 70's.

I believe we can say that people would like the relations between employers and employees to be stable. That is the aim of the bill and that is why we can say that that measure is part of the continuous efforts of the government to promote free collective bargaining and constructive settlements of disputes.

I should like also to point out all the government's efforts to improve housing in Canada. I believe it can be said that most Canadians are now enjoying decent housing. Unfortunately, a few Canadians do live under unacceptable conditions. That is why the government introduced during this session new programs to supplement the ones already inforce, to meet in a better way the housing needs in the various population areas, and also to establish new research mechanisms in the planning and housing fields.

Therefore, housing has priority with the government. They intend to meet the needs not only of young people who wish to have a house of their own at the beginning of their married life but also of retired older people, so that they may have appropriate housing at a moderate cost. The government also intend to meet the needs of middle-income Canadians who work hard in order to provide their family with a small house within their means. It seeks also to satisfy the low income citizens who want something else than public subsidized accommodation where only disadvantaged people live.

In the field of social security, I believe that the government has made extraordinary efforts to fight poverty. Through its proposed bill on family allowances, it wants to implement the principle of selectivity, according to which a fairer redistribution of resources will allow some 2 million low or middle income families to improve substantially their economic situation.

We know that about 75 per cent of Canadian taxpayers earn $7,500 or less a year. It is those people that the government had in mind when it decided to double—or in some cases to almost treble—family allowances. In order to implement that project without increasing taxes, the government suggests a new vertical attribution of the $820 millions earmarked for family allowances. This is surely an extremely improved piece of legislation which will enable about 35 per cent of Canadian families to receive $15 a month per child under 12 and $20 a month per child between the ages of 12 and 17.

Such legislation, Mr. Speaker, is the basis of a guaranteed income plan in Canada. It is the corner stone of the required policy and, I think, the best legislation of the whole administration of the present government for achieving a just society in Canada.

[Mr. Ouellet.]

Finally I would like to say a few words about the very wise policy of the Canadian government regarding foreign investments.

Such investments have been most important in the development of Canada and no doubt they can remain so. It does not mean that we should turn it down, but we should make sure that, in the long run, foreign investment will be beneficial to our country, and that all these take-overs by foreign companies will help Canada.

I think that the policies introduced in the House during this session are meant to help our country develop as fast as possible, taking into account the needs and aspirations of our people, in order that their vital interests are protected.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to mention again, in closing, that the motion before us today, which states that the government failed to do what it should, is unfounded.

The world we live in is troubled, agitated and in full swing. Problems are plentiful.

It is in the light of that complex and challenging reality that we should consider and appreciate the leadership of this government. It can be said that, in these particularly troubled times, the government of Canada remains alert and active. It has succeeded in dealing with problems, with crises, and is more than ever trying to improve the living conditions of every Canadian.

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am excited and happy to be able to say a few words to you and to this hushed, crowded and expectant audience as we finish the discussion on this very important motion. I would not for the world have missed the performance of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). I enjoyed it immensely. It was one of the finest performances he has put forward in all the years that I have known him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Macquarrie: I am reminded, though, of what a French marshal said of the charge of the Light Brigade: It was magnificent, but of course it was not war. It was a fine performance, but it was not exactly what I would call a reasoned argument in defence of that which is indefensible. I was impressed that he found it necessary to level so much attack on the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). I was impressed by it, but not at all offended, hurt or worried; because, as Sir John A. Macdonald once said, when you look in the orchard and see sticks and stones under a tree, that is the tree that bears the good fruit. As Sir John A. Macdonald also said, strong winds blow against high hills. It strikes me that the minister, who is a Nova Scotian, has just come to realize that there is an immense threat posed to the Liberal party by the Leader of the Opposition.

• (1730)

It is very fitting that one of the debates zeroing in on the conduct of this House and the country should be moved by the Leader of the Opposition who, in the discharge of his duties, has proven time after time that he, and not the minister of finance—no matter who he may be—has an understanding of the problems facing this country. If the minister does not believe me, then all he has to do is pick up a document that emerged yesterday, the report of the Prices and Incomes Commission. They have sustained the view that the Leader of the Opposition advanced long ago.

If he does not believe me, he can consult the former minister of finance, who in his great conversion a few months ago has moved to the very points of view that the Leader of the Opposition had been proclaiming across this country month upon month. If he does not find conviction there, he can look at what the Leader of the Opposition said many months ago about the fate of the Canadian dollar. On that matter, too, his views have been verified, underscored, underwritten and sustained.

I have the greatest regard for the President of the Privy Council. He is a fine scholar and a great exponent of the Gaelic people. But I thought that today he might have been following the advice that I am told an old Speaker gave to an incipient orator, that when the going gets tough you should yell like hell. Perhaps that was the advice he was following.

I was also impressed by the hon. member who preceded me. He was obviously a man of immense courage, because in his 15 minutes he actually took time out to say what a wonderful job the present government had done with respect to poverty. Of all things to bring out in the performance of the government! I am inclined to look at the document that the Senate committee produced after careful study, certainly much more time than 15 minutes. They opened their report "Poverty in Canada" with this, alas, much more serious statement:

> Poverty is the great social issue of our time. Unless we act now, nationally, in a new and purposeful way, five million Canadians will continue to find life a bleak, bitter, and never-ending struggle for survival.

In the face of documentation of this kind how can anyone believe that they are credible when they stand up and tell this House and the people of Canada that this country has never had it so good? I notice that the minister complained that on 14 occasions there have been motions on unemployment. Why 14? Because the problem is there. Unemployment stalks this land yet, and the efforts of the government with reference thereto have usually been such as to increase the burden and exacerbate the problem. As they have backed away from one economic policy after another they have finally realized the outrageous situation that they have allowed to develop. For a modern, wealthy, great country to be burdened with the rate of unemployment that Canada has is simply outrageous, intolerable and absolutely unnecessary.

To stand up and proclaim that things are going well would not go very far with the young people of Canada today. Never have more of our young people been so anxious and frustrated about the future. There is not a member of the House who does not hear day after day from the fine young people of Canada-university graduates, high school graduates and graduates from technical institutes. What is their problem? It is that they cannot find word and that they want work.

I am not one who believes that our young people are a mass of lazy louts who want handouts. They want jobs but they cannot get them. Year after years this government has proven its incapacity and inability to provide meaningful employment. As one of my eloquent colleagues says, the government have also revealed their insensitivity to the problem. In their great desire to push inflation around the corner—obviously it has not even been pushed around the corner—they said they would stand all sorts of unemployment and let the people like it. Tell the youth of the day that the country was never better governed! Tell the youth of today that they never had it so good!

Mention has been made of various programs—ad hoc programs, Opportunities for Youth, LIP, and so on. Of course, they do help; with such a terrible burden of unemployment we welcome anything that is an improvement. But what happens when these programs end? What is the situation when the young people are laid off as each little project is completed? The blight on our economy remains. The figures continue to be appalling.

From the very beginning of his career as Leader of the Opposition—and he will not be there very long; he will be going across the floor soon—the Leader of the Opposition has singled out unemployment as the economic crime that must be fought, and he has fought it vigorously, wisely and well. The hon. member who preceded me complimented the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). I love to hear ministers being complimented. He has taken a heck of a long time in getting a second park for Prince Edward Island. This matter has been discussed for five years, so the minister is not responsible for all of the delay.

However, are our native Indian people happy with this government? I have been watching the scene for some years now—I am not as old as I look—and I have never seen greater unrest or more anxiety than I see today among the native people of this country. They are frustrated and uncertain. They are organizing their beefs and their discontent as never before in the land. I am not surprised, because there is far too much cold, callous reaction toward the great needs of these people. I note with satisfaction that they themselves are articulating their problems and pressing their complaints. But much more must be done.

Mr. Chrétien: Never was so much money given them.

Mr. Macquarrie: If the minister is satisfied that they are properly looked after and that there is no problem, then he may live in that dream world. But I do not, and I think the Indian people will agree not with him but with me. The minister from Nova Scotia suggested that the Leader of the Opposition was not sufficiently decisive. Such an allegation from a member of such a government! He is a literal and lineal descendant of Mackenzie King: "conscription if necessary, but not necessarily conscription." "Foreign ownership yes, but foreign ownership no". "Election expenses yes, but election expenses no."

We have had a grand grab-bag of pusillanimous, self-contradictory, internally distorted legislation presented by this government. Would we say that the foreign take-over bill is decisive? It had a delayed pregnancy, perhaps that was the problem, but I would never produce it if I wanted to look at something that was the epitome of decision.

What about the handling of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline? This is a beautiful and magnificent example of a unified, decisive, dynamically united government! Not only do you have to find out which minister is speaking to know what the policy is; you have to check all the speeches of one minister because they are internally contradictory.

I have done quite an exercise in this regard and I hope some student will produce an MA thesis on the lack of government solidarity. This is about the right period if he wants to make first-hand observations. Another issue which is interesting, if you want to talk about being decisive, is that concerning fisheries. Will we tell the fishermen of Canada that this government gives them strong, decisive leadership? Just try telling that to the fishermen on the east coast and the west coast. With all due apologies to the party to the left, the government is waffling, weaselling and pusillanimous. It cannot stand up for our fishermen even against the smallest countries of the world, yet it has the nerve to talk about being decisive.

Another area that might be in someone's mind when we talk about decisions is that of constitutional reform. The minister went back over the whole four years. I will have to cover the same terrain to be consistent with him. What about constitutional amendments and those glorious days when we were going to settle this problem? The four years of the present government have been marked with frustration and non-accomplishment in the constitutional field. This country is no more united than it was in 1968. We have had dominion-provincial conferences one after the other, which have amounted to nothing more than polite failures. We are not even up to the Fulton-Favreau stage on constitutional amendment; in fact, we have gone back.

There were some Canadians in 1968 who thought they mjght be choosing a government which would put some solutions forward to our vexing constitutional problems. The minister spoke about the bleak dawn that was following a rosy period. I say to him that for this government the moonlight reveries of 1968 are long since passed. It is not dawn we are at now, it is high noon, and you know what happens at high noon. He quoted the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and said, "We propose and they dispose". I suggest it will not be us, but the people of Canada who will dispose: they will dispose of the government.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in his hard hitting, well documented speech this afternoon the leader of our party put forth a bill of indictment against this government for its record of legislation which has favoured the wealthy and corporate segments of Canada and shamefully neglected and undermined the well-being of the people in the low and middle income groups. He is not the only one in this country to bring this type of indictment against the government.

At a meeting this week in Quebec City of delegates to the Canadian Council on Social Development, a report was discussed. It was prepared by top civil servants in the federal government and by social workers from across the country. Let me quote some of the things said in this report:

> The federal government through its anti-inflationary policies is seen to be increasing the number of Canadian families in need of public financial assistance—a decision in which the provincial and municipal governments are not included.
> But the federal government contributes only 50 per cent of the increased welfare funds needed by the provinces and the municipalities.

This underlines what the previous speaker pointed out, the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). This government, in spite of the boasts and claims that it was going to clear up the constitutional muddle, has done nothing whatsoever of a tangible nature to get rid of these very severe dislocations which affect people's lives. Let me quote again from this report:

> What has resulted, in Canada, is a fragmented approach to a wide range of possible objectives, accompanied by ad hoc policies involving duplication and conflict—conflict among programs, among government agencies and different levels of government or between private and public interests.
> What is required is a new and comprehensive framework of goals and objectives to serve as a basis for policy planning.

One thing this government will not do is plan a comprehensive framework within which to work. It will not do so because it will not take the only objective which is workable, and that is to orient its policies toward the well-being of people and the environment in which they live, instead of orienting them to suit the large corporations and their profit-making ventures. Consequently, the government does nothing or worse than nothing.

The report goes on to say that in the past 20 years the spread between the richest and the poorest income categories in Canada may have widened by at least 30 per cent. It says there has been no change in the distribution of income during this time. It warns that low income people have lost faith in the government because they feel they cannot exercise influence over the policy decisions of government.

Let me give one example of why I think there has been this loss of faith on a large scale. We have in this country what is known as the National Anti-Poverty Organization. It is an organization of people who have had a rough time in life, people on social assistance in every field you can name, low rents, housing tenants, people concerned with family day-care centres because they must go out to work, single family heads who have to work, young people and a whole range of low income people.

The National Anti-Poverty Organization was formed under great difficulty. However, it has held conferences in British Columbia, Nova Scotia and Manitoba. The organization was fortunate enough to obtain a grant under LIP which was used up at the end of May. These people did not realize that there was a regulation to the effect that any program or project requesting an extension at the end of May could only be funded to June 16. Being anxious for funding, as they were very close to their margin, they put in an application for an extension, only to learn that under the regulations there is no possibility of being funded to September.

What will happen to all the attempts of these poor people who have been trying hard to gain a little confidence in themselves within the framework of law and order in their country and its institutions? Every single thing they have done to date will fall by the wayside. Their attempts to establish day-care centres, information centres and neighbourhood self-help groups will have been to no avail.

I suggest this is symptomatic of the way this government is attempting to handle the matter of unemployment. Instead of coming to terms with the fact that unemployment on a large scale is a feature of our technological society today, and planning accordingly, the government has set up a straw man. It says that young people are unemployed for only two months between college courses or high school years, women are in the labour force to get a bit of pin money and are there for a short time, and there are a lot of part-time people involved.

With this attitude the government is approaching the problem in a very spasmodic way. This is apparent in the Local Initiatives Program as well as in the Opportunities for Youth program. This is one of the great flaws in these two programs. They are fine on a temporary basis for those who are able to get under the wire, but of the 250,000 young people who will be unemployed this summer only 30,000 will be able to obtain benefits under the Opportunities for Youth program. This is a drop in the bucket compared to what is needed.

Far too many young people today are unemployed all year around. They are unemployed not just for one year but for many years. The sooner the government recognizes this fact, the better opportunity these people will have of being able to enjoy a decent life. I believe the government has made a mess of these programs. They could have been good programs. Some of them have helped to a certain extent, but because they are short-range and are hit-and-miss affairs they do not contain any planning. Projects which are put forward by well established people of influence and ability are accepted and funded, while projects from poorer areas which do not have university graduates to help them are not funded although the need may be much greater. I think the Opportunities for Youth program and the Local Initiative Program are far too shortsighted at present. The government has done nothing to save the precious human material to which it referred in the Speech from the Throne.

I wish to move to another matter. Reference was made by an earlier speaker to the needs of the Indian people in this country. In the city of Vancouver there is an Indian friendship centre. The people who operate that centre are native Indians. They are trying to overcome the terrible feeling of prejudice and mistrust which has existed between them and the rest of society. They have gone ahead and have operated this Indian friendship centre. They have applied for grants but have been unable to obtain any help or any funding. Is it any wonder that the Indian people lose faith in the government's ability to respond to their needs? Poverty and unemployment will not go away. If the government knew anything about either poverty or unemployment it would know this because it would be in contact with the people who are chronically in a state of poverty, unemployment or both.

I want to say a word about the legislation which had been promised for women. The Speech from the Throne said:

> Another step, and long overdue, consists of policies to ensure the equality of women in Canadian society. These will be announced this session.

All we have seen in this respect is machinery in the form of white papers and task forces which have considered the problem of women all over again. I know a lot of hard and conscientious work has been done by these various committees. I am not decrying or denigrating it. I want to say, however, that in spite of the promises in the Speech from the Throne there clearly has not been brought forward a single piece of major legislation affecting women during this session.

There are some useful pieces of legislation in the works, but they are not yet complete. I refer to the adult occupational training act amendments, jury duty for women, repeal of the vagrancy section of the Criminal Code, and so on. These are not yet completed and I think it is doubtful whether some of them will get through before this session ends. But what about the main recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women? What about the national day-care act that was called for, which would have provided not only 50 per cent funding for the operation of day-care centres under the Canada Assistance Plan but also 70 per cent of their capital cost for the first seven years?

We cannot get away from the fact that most provinces are unable at the present time to afford day-care centres with their present resources. What has Ottawa done about giving the lead in respect of this matter to ensure the construction of day-care centres? Under the Local Initiatives Program, 90 day-care centres were set up for a short term of a few months. This has been extended for another few months. But these little day-care centres will die like flies unless the government in Ottawa is prepared to fund them on a permanent basis.

Women are becoming sceptical. They are waiting for enactment of the major recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. Not one mention is made in the report brought down the other day by the minister of one of the most important recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, that concerning the repeal of the abortion section of the Criminal Code. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) who spoke the other day pointed this out very clearly.

In respect of family allowances, the Royal Commission on the Status of Women did not recommend the monstrosity we have before us called FISP. It recommended that family allowances be increased. It did not mention this jargon about selectivity, which means a needs test, a means test or whatever form it might take. The things I have mentioned have not been accomplished. These are the things about which people are concerned.

Some mention was made by the parliamentary secretary about housing. I have only a moment or two and will make my comments brief. The best I can do is quote a couple of paragraphs from an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of Friday, June 16:

If the government's commitment to do something about Canada's housing needs was as deep as the one to its own re-election, the new program would have been presented to Parliament much earlier, not in the tag-end days of a session.

Further, the article states:

Until workers start repairs on the first older home in the first city to receive a grant in some distant day, or home ownership becomes possible for more families, the whole program, admirable in theory though it may be, cannot be taken much more seriously than pre-election window-dressing.

My main quarrel with this government is that it has relied on style and window-dressing. The people who have crowded up to the window with their noses pressed against the pane in order to see the goodies inside see that there are goodies in there all right, but not for them. They know there is sufficient money for such things as roads to the north but that there is no money for the needs of the people. The moment of truth for this government is at hand. The people of this country did not elect it to help big business become bigger and more successful. It was elected to help our people in their day-to-day problems, and it has failed lamentably in that task.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being six o'clock it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 58, the proceedings on the motion have expired. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

TEXT OF CANADIAN PROPOSALS ACCEPTED UNANIMOUSLY IN A PLENARY SESSION OF THE UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON THE HUMAN ENVIRONMENT ON THE 14TH OF JUNE, 1972

Governments collectively endorse the following principles as guiding concepts for the Law of the Sea Conference and the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organization (IMCO) Marine Pollution Conference scheduled to be held in 1973.

The twenty-three principles in question are as follows:

1. Every state has a duty to protect and preserve the marine environment and, in particular, to prevent pollution that may affect areas where an internationally shared resource is located.

2. Every state should adopt appropriate measures for the prevention of marine pollution, whether acting individually or in conjunction with other states under agreed international arrangements.

3. States should use the best practicable means available to them to minimize the discharge of potentially hazardous substances to the sea by all routes, including land-based sources such as rivers, outfalls and pipelines within national jurisdiction, as well as dumping by or from ships, aircraft and platforms.

4. States should ensure that their national legislation provides adequate sanctions against those who infringe existing regulations on marine pollution.

5. States should assume joint responsibility for the preservation of the marine environment beyond the limits of national jurisdiction.

6. The states at higher levels of technological and scientific development should assist those nations which request it, for example by undertaking programmes either directly or through competent agencies intended to provide adequate training of the technical and scientific personnel of those countries, as well as by providing the equipment and facilities needed in areas such as research, administration, monitoring or surveillance, information, waste disposal and others, which would improve their ability to discharge their duties consisting of protecting the marine environment.

7. States should discharge, in accordance with the principles of international law, their obligations towards other states where damage arises from pollution caused by their own activities or by organizations or individuals under their jurisdiction and should co-operate in developing procedures for dealing with such damage and the settlement of disputes.

8. Every state should co-operate with other states and competent international organizations with regard to the elaboration and implementation of internationally agreed rules, standards and procedures for the prevention of marine pollution on global, regional and national levels.

9. States should join together regionally to concert their policies and adopt measures in common to prevent the pollution of the areas which, for geographical or ecological reasons, form a natural entity and an integrated whole.

10. International guidelines and criteria should be developed, both by national Governments and through intergovernmental agencies, to provide the policy framework for control measures. A comprehensive plan for the protection of the marine environment should provide for the identification of critical pollutants and their pathways and sources, determination of exposures to these pollutants and assessment of the risks they pose, timely detection of undesirable trends, and development of detection and monitoring systems.

11. Internationally agreed criteria and standards should provide for regional and local variations in the effects of pollution and in the evaluation of these effects. Such variables should also include the ecology of sea areas, economic and social conditions, and amenities, recreational facilities and other uses of the seas.

12. Primary protection standards and derived working levels—especially codes of practice and effluent standards—may usefully be established at national levels, and in some instances, on a regional or global basis.

13. Action to prevent and control marine pollution (particularly direct prohibitions and specific release limits) must guard against the effect of simply transferring damage or hazard from one part of the environment to another.

14. The development and implementation of control should be sufficiently flexible to reflect increasing knowledge of the marine ecosystem, pollution effects, and improvements in technological means for pollution control and to take into account the fact that a number of new and hitherto unsuspected pollutants are bound to be brought to light.

15. Every state should co-operate with other states and with competent international organizations with a view to the development of marine environmental research and survey programmes and systems and means for monitoring changes in the marine environment, including studies of the present state of the oceans, the trends of pollution effects and the exchange of data and scientific information on the marine environment. There should be similar co-operation in the exchange of technological information on means of preventing marine pollution including pollution that may arise from offshore resource exploration and exploitation.

16. International guidelines should also be developed to facilitate comparability in methods of detection and measurement of pollutants and their effects.

17. In addition to its responsibility for environmental protection within the limits of its territorial sea, a coastal state also has responsibility to protect adjacent areas of the environment from damage that may result from activities within its territory.

18. Coastal states should ensure that adequate and appropriate resources are available to deal with pollution incidents resulting from the exploration and exploitation of seabed resources in areas within the limits of their national jurisdiction.

19. States should co-operate in the appropriate international forum to ensure that activities related to the exploration and exploitation of the seabed and the ocean floor beyond the limits of national jurisdiction shall not result in pollution of the marine environment.

20. All states should ensure that vessels under their registration comply with internationally agreed rules and standards relating to ship design and construction, operating procedures and other relevant factors. States should co-operate in the development of such rules, standards and procedures, in the appropriate international bodies.

21. Following an accident on the high seas which may be expected to result in major deleterious consequences from pollution or threat of pollution of the sea, a coastal state facing grave and imminent danger to its coastline and related interests may take appropriate measures as may be necessary to prevent, mitigate, or eliminate such danger, in accordance with internationally agreed rules and standards.

22. Where there is a need for action by or through international agencies for the prevention, control or study of marine pollution, existing bodies, both within and outside the United Nations system, should be utilised as far as possible.

23. States should assist one another to the best of their ability, in action against marine pollution of whatever origin.

APPENDIX B

INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT BY THE HONOURABLE JACK DAVIS TO THE PLENARY SESSION, UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON THE HUMAN ENVIRONMENT, STOCKHOLM, JUNE 5-16, 1972

Mr. President, Mr. Secretary General, Distinguished Delegates, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I bring you greetings from Canada. I bring you greetings from my Prime Minister, the Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, who speaks on behalf of all my countrymen. Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific, are prepared to join enthusiastically in the adoption of measures which will help to improve the quality of life for all mankind.

The main message which I wish to convey to this great assembly today, Mr. President, is simple. It is this. Nature is all important. Nature's laws, themselves, are universal. They are far-reaching. They deal with life. They concern us all.

Man breaks nature's laws at his peril. He breaks them and succeeding generations are the poorer for his lack of foresight, his lack of sensitivity, his lack of statesmanship on the ecological front.

Man-made laws, up until now at least, are different. They differ from place to place. They differ from one country to the next. They differ often markedly, from one continent, or from one part of the world to another.

But nature's laws are more exacting. Like the fundamental truths of biological science, they can not be ignored. Mankind may bend them to suit his convenience. But he will find, in the end, that he is all the poorer for having upset nature in a vain effort to win some short-run economic gain.

What bothers me most is the thought that man, as his numbers and affluence increase, seems bent on creating a dull and uninteresting environment for himself. Mass production, mass consumption, mass disposal, massive refuse heaps—all these are characteristic of an age which has lost sight of the balance of nature, of the revitalizing force which still exists in our great outdoors and which, itself, is threatened by our increasingly pedestrian way of life.

Biology, as a science, is still in its infancy. We know even less about biological phenomenon than we do about economics. All the more reason for going slow. All the more reason to try to unravel the mysteries of nature, to monitor changes in our global environment, to play it safe in the harvesting of our living resources. All the more reason to prepare environmental impact statements before, and not after we launch new projects on a major scale.

I am not one of those, Mr. President, who believes that economic growth and environmental quality are necessarily in conflict with one another. Quite the opposite. I believe that sound economic planning involves environmental statesmanship of the highest order. A good engineer understands the forces of nature; a good economist, because he takes the long view, must also be concerned with nature's biological scheme of things.

New jobs are needed. Challenging new jobs are needed everywhere. But it is often the character of these jobs, rather than their number, which is at issue. They, like the industries to which they are attached, must go with the grain of nature, not against it. We must add to the variety of life. They must help to make the process of living more interesting for everyone everywhere.

Of course we must be careful. We must not make unnatural substances and scatter them around. Produced for one purpose, they may have unfortunate side effects which come back to haunt us in the long run. Hence the emphasis on biodegradation; on the need to replace insidious substances like DDT with other chemicals which are not harmful to living things.

These observations flow from our own experience in Canada. Artificial substances like the poly-chlorinated bi-phenols (PCB's) have had a devastating effect on our salmon runs and our bird life. We have stopped using them for this reason. We have replaced them with other substances which are more effective from an overall, resource management point of view.

We have learned, to our sorrow, that insect sprays which help to preserve certain forests, can also destroy a local fishery. We have learned that new processes using mercury, while they tended to cut the costs of other chemicals, constituted a hazard to man himself. Nor were these effects localized in their extent. Frequently they spread to other segments of our Canadian community, from province to province, and into the international sphere as well.

We moved quickly to contain these substances, to stop their production; either that or recycle them, keep them entirely within the factory fence.

There is an interesting corollary here. In protecting our local environment, we are often protecting the environment of our neighbour. By practicing environmental statesmanship, we are also helping to enhance the quality of life in lands that we will never see. Good neighbourliness, like cleanliness, begins at home. Multiplied by similar actions on the part of others, it can be an environmental boon to all mankind.

The draft Declaration on the Human Environment, which we will be shortly considering, Mr. President, contains certain basic principles which Canada endorses as a desirable code for international behaviour. There is, for example, the principle that each nation accept responsibility for the effects of its environmental actions on others. Too often in the past the interests of our global community have been sacrificed by the short-sightedness, I might even say the callousness, of the few.

"Thou shalt not pollute the environment of thy neighbour, the ocean or the atmosphere". This dictum seems self-evident to me. I trust that it will become a part of our global environmental ethic in the future.

I am a firm believer, also, in environmental objectives and standards, levels of performance, which are based essentially on biological criteria, but criteria which also make economic sense as well.

These global objectives, these global standards, involve a simple test. This test pertains to life itself. Living things must not only continue to survive, they must flourish. If anything they should increase in their number and variety as the years go by.

Remember also, that life in its most sophisticated forms is our own first line of defence. Endanger a single species at the top of the food chain and you are endangering the lives of men, women and children everywhere. Wipe out an animal species like the whale, or a bird like the bald-headed eagle, and mankind may shortly be in trouble too.

These elementary standards, these biological tests, these natural criteria should not be confined to any one country. Properly drawn, they are valid everywhere. They rest on a universal truth and they should, therefore, be global in their application.

Nature's laws are difficult to define. This is why we need more research; especially research on the biological front. But a lack of information should not be allowed to obscure an important point. The case for world-wide standards I believe, is incontestable. It is incontestable, not only because the cost of being clean may not be a cost at all, but because the destruction of all kinds of living things is bound to be destructive from the point of view of society as a whole.

Pollution havens are not for us. They are inexcusable in a comparatively affluent country like Canada. They are inexcusable, also, in the less developed parts of the world. They are inexcusable because they are short-sighted, because they ignore the destruction, close in, of other resources. They are inexcusable because they also tend to make lives of the local population a dull, drab and even painful thing.

Mr. President, a great deal is expected of this Conference; a great deal in the allied fields of research monitoring and resource management. It can also help us to establish the kinds of global standards that I have been talking about. A number of international institutions will have to be set up for this purpose and, above all, to ensure that our man-made rules approximate ever more closely nature's marvelous way of doing things.

And so, Mr. President, I end where I began. Nature's laws, in truth, are universal. Man-made laws, especially in the area of the environment, must become universal as well.

The Declaration on the Human Environment marks a beginning. Hopefully, it will provide us with a framework of laws and institutions which will help us to protect nature in all its forms. Environmental protection can add immeasurably to the quality of life. It can add, tremendously, to life's enjoyment by men and women the world over.

Thank you Mr. President.

IMMIGRATION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF MEASURES TO ELIMINATE BACKLOG OF APPLICATIONS AND PREVENT FURTHER BUILD-UP

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in 1967 Parliament passed the Immigration Appeal Board Act and eliminated elements of the Immigration Act legislated 14 years earlier. At the same time as this new legislation came into force, new immigration regulations were passed by Order in Council. These regulations for the first time allowed visitors to Canada to apply for landed immigrant status while in our country. At the same time, we reaffirmed the advantages such as extra credits for prearranged employment and better preparation for those who applied while still in their home countries, the traditional method of immigrating to a new homeland.

The 1967 legislation refined appeal procedures and included for the first time the right of sponsoring Canadian relatives to appeal on behalf of people still in their home countries. The regulations provided objective selection criteria, based on education, skill, occupational demand, language capability, age and other factors. They eliminated what may have been unintentional discrimination under the earlier systems. A person's race, colour, creed or sex is not a factor in selection as an immigrant.

The 1967 regulations were based on recognition of the fact that an open immigration policy goes hand in hand with the economic and cultural growth of our country. Our present problem in immigration is not the calibre of the thousands of persons applying in Canada to become landed immigrants. It is rather the unexpected volume of desirable and worthy persons from many countries who are caught up in what is, in fact, a very thorough and equitable appeals system. It is interesting to note that in 1971 there were 122,000 immigrants to Canada, of whom nearly 40,000 were landed while here as visitors.

Five years ago no one could have forecast the tremendous impact jet-age world travel would have on immigration. More than 38 million persons visit Canada each year and thousands of these visitors want to settle here permanently after becoming enamoured with this land.

Whatever changes may be desirable in the Immigration Act, and these are being considered with care, are not relevant to solving the problems of today. Those problems must be met by coping with the situation we have. We have not had the administrative flexibility to clear, one way or another, the great number of cases requiring decision. In human decency and fairness, decisions must be given and given soon. Legislative changes are for the future. They can wait.

The result of our inability to cope with the large numbers who could not immediately be granted landed immigrant status has been a large build-up in backlogs at two levels of procedure, that is, in the immigration inquiry system and at the Immigration Appeal Board. Unintentionally, this has created hardship for many people anxious to become Canadians. As an example, abnormally long delays in determining the final status of immigrants have caused financial hardship forcing some immigrants to take employment without authorization. It is our objective to eliminate these delays so that this situation will not arise in the future. While I intend to remove the immediate hardships and eliminate delays, I do not intend to change the basic policy under which persons coming to Canada are prohibited from taking employment without permission.

I want to say that the program we are instituting now is not in the category of a general amnesty such as we have had in former years. Rather, the plan calls for action on two fronts: first, to streamline and improve current procedures to prevent a further build-up of the backlog of cases and, second, to eliminate this backlog of some 13,500 applications now awaiting hearings by special inquiry officers who determine in the presence of the applicant and his counsel whether an applicant should be landed or ordered deported.

The department's field strength is being increased by 260 persons so that backlog cases can be reviewed and be assessed and delays in the handling of current applications can be drastically reduced.

The prospective immigrant's performance in Canada will be reviewed, taking into account how he has been able to adjust to Canadian life while awaiting his departmental hearing. Consideration will be given to his financial stability, trade and language training, participation in community activities and his employment potential.

We hope this will result in the granting of landed status to some 50 per cent of the applicants whose cases have been caught up in the backlog. Those not immediately accepted as landed immigrants will have their departmental hearings continued with full protection of their right of appeal to the independent Immigration Appeal Board.

Each applicant in the backlog will be notified that the department is undertaking a review of his case. He will be informed of the factors on which this review will be based and invited to provide any new information to show that he has in fact successfully established himself in Canada. He will also be asked to produce letters of recommendation from Canadian citizens or other permanent residents of Canada. For purpose of this review, we will be prepared to seek relief by Order in Council from the application of the relevant immigration regulations for those persons who have established themselves successfully in Canada.

In regard to new applications, our objective is that any future applicants for landed immigrant status from within Canada will be assessed within one month, and if a further hearing is necessary it will be held without delay.

It is expected that this rate of processing new applications can be achieved by January 1, 1973. No additions will be made to the existing backlog after that date. A target date of April 1, 1974 has been set to eliminate the remaining departmental inquiry backlog.

Although they cannot be resolved directly by any administrative measures, the department will also re-examine its files on some 10,000 cases now before the Immigration Appeal Board. Since I am a party to all appeals I shall, through my representatives, make submissions and arguments for favourable consideration wherever possible. It must, however, be emphasized that the board as an independent tribunal makes its own decisions on the basis of the law and the evidence adduced in each individual case.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the minister for his courtesy in sending a copy of his statement to me during the lunch hour. This will enable me, I hope, to make a few charitable observations about his initiative in respect of immigration.

I should like to make it clear at the outset that this initiative is most welcome and that the Official Opposition is very happy and relieved for the sake of all those who will benefit from the minister's intention to proceed by way of Order in Council in order to provide amnesty for half or 50 per cent of visitors seeking landed immigrant status. This measure was inevitable and long overdue. We are also glad to see that the number of immigration officers will be increased by 260, which should help greatly in administration. But we are not convinced that the problem is by any means solved. We feel that this is only a stopgap measure that will itself create more problems and more inequities.

We also believe that the statement of the minister this afternoon has sounded the death-knell of the government's point system policy. There remains no equity but only hardship for those who apply from abroad, in the approved manner, to become landed immigrants in Canada. In addition, in our opinion this amnesty will encourage a flood of visitor applications for landed status in Canada and discourage homeland applications, which are the preferred type.

This problem is not just one of today. It is sad that it took so long, and particularly that it took the suicide of a distraught woman, to bring the problem to the minister's attention and force him to act. The problem has been building up since 1967 when amendments were made to the act. It reached crisis proportions some time ago. In fact, the previous minister of immigration promised amendments to the act but he failed to produce any.

At the end of October, 1971, there were 7,443 cases before the Immigration Appeal Board. Today the total has reached the 10,000 mark. It took that magic number of 10,000 to waken the minister and the government to the situation.

The minister says that legislative changes are for the future and can wait. This has been the constant theme song of each of the Trudeau government ministers. The Canadian people will wait forever if they wait for the Trudeau government to perform.

The minister's measures, if they accomplish his objectives, will remove only half of the present backlog of 13,500 applications. Hearings will continue for the others. Therefore they only go half way to meet the problem of clearing the backlog.

The minister is not going to change the visitor entry policy. Until next January 1 new visitor applications will apparently be added to the existing backlog. Therefore between now and then I visualize a flood of visitor entries, urged on by travel agencies and others, seeking to beat the deadline and be accepted under the new easy entry provisions.

What happens to those already under deportation orders? Will there be a review of their cases as well? What is going to be done about work permits for tourists who seek permanent entry into Canada?

Canada needs a new immigration policy because the government's policy and its administration have failed to meet today's needs. This whole subject, I suggest, should be put before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration forthwith.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the minister's statement. The situation had become intolerable. In fact, I described it in the House a few weeks ago as "a horrendous mess". We cannot blame the present minister for it as it is the accumulation of neglect over the years. In throne speech after throne speech new immigration legislation has been promised but has not been forthcoming. The immigration portfolio has been in the hands of ministers such as the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) who was preoccupied with other important offices such as minister of manpower and minister in charge of the Wheat Board.

All interested parties have become familiar with the lengthy delays in special inquiry hearings on deportation cases, particularly in metropolitan centres such as Toronto and Montreal. Owing to a further backlog in the immigration appeals system, it has been estimated that it takes up to eight years to complete the proceedings authorized by law. During part of this period, that is to say, up to the time of an appeal to the Immigration Appeal Board, work permits have been refused. As the minister has indicated, this has had the effect of forcing those who did not have funds to work surreptitiously and to seek to defy the law in order to exist. It no doubt contributed to the sense of desperation which led to the tragic case of the Polish immigrant who committed suicide.

I am glad that in order to resolve this problem the minister has not relied on greater restrictions but, on the contrary, has indicated that greater administrative flexibility is to be exercised. We do not desire to restrict visitors to this country and we do not desire to prevent suitable visitors from applying for and receiving permission to stay in this country. I am quite sure that this so-called amnesty—the minister disclaims that title but it is something of that nature—will not be used to permit the admission to Canada of persons with criminal records and things of that sort.

As the regulations now stand they permit immigration officials to approve the admission of an independent applicant who does not meet the norms set out in the point system if they are of the opinion that there are good reasons why these norms do not reflect the applicant's chance of establishing himself successfully in Canada. Unfortunately, these provisions do not seem to have been used extensively in the past. Most immigration officers seem to have ignored them and relied exclusively on the point system. The point system itself requires review; it has been one of the causes of trouble. One thing that the minister can do is to make sure that his officials pay attention to the regulations.

As much as 15 points out of a total of 50 are allotted to the purely subjective judgment of the examining officer as to the personal qualifications of the applicant. The points to be allowed for occupational demand have been kept a tight secret so that the applicant does not and cannot know the basis on which he is assessed. This practice makes a farce of many special inquiries, and even appeals to the Immigration Appeal Board, because the applicant cannot know the real nature of the case against him.

Another point that needs to be reviewed is the practice of examining officers not to reveal the points they have allotted until the date of the inquiry is fixed. This has the result that applicants and their advisers cannot assess whether they will have a reasonable chance on appeal because they do not know how many points were allotted. This has led to many people entering appeals on pure speculation when the cases were hopeless or might have been seen to be hopeless if the full facts had been disclosed.

Although the minister is to be commended for the amendments and the new policy he has announced, it is only a start. The Immigration Act and the Immigration Appeal Board Act both need revision.

As far as the Immigration Act is concerned, in 1966, six years ago, the government, in the white paper on immigration by the then minister of manpower and immigration who is now Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), proposed detailed changes in the act but nothing has been done. The Immigration Act still contains vague and antiquated provisions. It confers the right to make regulations prohibiting or limiting the admission of persons by reason of nationality, citizenship, ethnic group, occupation class or geographical area of origin, peculiar customs, habits and modes of life, methods of holding property, and so forth.

The white paper in 1966 urged that the provisions in regard to the admission of refugees be codified and made part of the law. This has not been done and cases have been dealt with on a sort of ad hoc basis.

It seems to me that the Immigration Appeal Board Act should be reviewed. It does not seem to me that exclusive jurisdiction to deal with humanitarian and compassionate grounds for not executing deportation orders should be in the hands of the board which is a court of law. Many of these cases could be dealt with far more expeditiously and just as satisfactorily by the minister or his officials. Greater power should be given to the minister and his officials to act on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. I am coming to a conclusion, Mr. Speaker.

There is no doubt that where there is large-scale unemployment, there is bound to arise a public demand for more and more restrictive measures with respect to immigration. In our view, this is not the answer. It is not the immigrants who are to blame for large-scale unemployment and it is not the immigrants who create unemployment. The net effect of immigration in Canada has been not only a great enrichment of the quality of Canadian life but also a larger measure of prosperity and expansion than we could possibly have achieved without immigration—happily, now, from many different quarters of the world.

The temptation of restriction has been avoided, and for this we are grateful. Immigration is not only an economic matter—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must remind the hon. member who has the floor and other hon. members of the restriction imposed by the Standing Order which allows only brief comments on ministerial statements. It seems to me the hon. member is now making a general statement which goes some distance beyond the confines of the statement the minister made, and I hope he will find it possible to bring it to a close.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I had just about come to the last sentence of my remarks. As I said, the temptation of restriction has been avoided by the minister, and we are grateful to him for that. In our view, immigration is not only an economic matter but one which involves the lives of people. There is no reason why Canada cannot be just and generous.

[Translation]

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to thank the minister for sending us the French version of his statement before the beginning of the sitting, and we are much grateful to him for that.

The minister has announced the elimination of some features of the Immigration Act, enacted 14 years ago. That modification of the act will eliminate some delays and improve administrative efficiency.

In his statement, the minister summed up the procedures previously in effect. Once more, one can realize that bureaucracy is almighty and that it needs at times to be put to reason.

I commend the minister who had the strength to repeal some outdated sections of the act and I invite him to continue along those lines in other fields which come under his jurisdiction.

We agree on the modifications announced by the minister, but I wish to remind him that Canada must not make the regulations and the law less efficient, so that the economic expansion of this country not be jeopardized by the entrance of too many immigrants.

We must continue to make a sound selection of individuals who have decided to live in Canada, especially this year when the unemployment rate is rather high.

I therefore urge the minister to be careful when amending the legislation and I ask him to continue to seek the advice of the provinces as partners, since immigration under the constitution comes under the provincial and federal authorities.

I hope that the minister will take those recommendations into consideration when the legislation is amended.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

HANDLING OF ESTIMATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 that is of national and obvious importance. As the time limit makes it mandatory that the total estimates for 1972-73 amounting to $11 billion shall be voted later this day and as many of them have not even been cursorily examined, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather):

That the subject of handling of our future estimates be immediately referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, to provide for legislative control over our tax expenditures.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion requires unanimous consent. Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

KOOTENAY AND ELK RAILWAY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It is of great and pressing concern to a large number of railway workers and other employees in various parts of Canada. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose):

That the matter of the proposed building of the Kootenay and Elk Railway in the East Kootenay area to link up with the Burlington Northern Railway at the U.S. Border for the transport of export coal to the Pacific coast via the Burlington Northern Railway be sent to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for investigation and report as to the effect it will have on employment, on the Canadian economy in general, and on the possible export of other commodities by similar spur lines in other parts of Canada.

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ANNUAL AND SUPPLEMENTARY REPORTS OF CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask the House if it will give unanimous consent, in accordance with consultations, to move the following motion:

That the annual and supplementary reports of the Canadian Wheat Board for the years 1968-69 and 1969-70 and the annual report for the year 1970-71 be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

I understand that the committee is anxious to have this reference. If it is agreed that there will be no debate, we can call it now, with your approval, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, although this motion is debatable, we have agreed to have it passed without debate provided the other parties do the same.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

IMMIGRATION

SPECIAL MEASURES TO ELIMINATE BACKLOG—INTENTION RESPECTING APPLICANTS FROM ABROAD WHO HAVE BEEN REFUSED FOR INSUFFICIENT POINTS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the announced Order in Council amnesty or partial amnesty intended to clear the backlog of visitor applicants for landed immigrant status, is it the intention of the government that the large number of those who have applied from abroad in the approved manner but who have been refused for insufficient points will be given such status as easily as those benefiting from the amnesty?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is very true in the case of all applicants from out of the country who were sponsored by people within the country. It is the purpose always to maintain the incentive and the advantage of making an application from outside Canada rather than within Canada.

SPECIAL MEASURES TO ELIMINATE BACKLOG—INTENTION RESPECTING NEW APPLICANTS

Mr. Ryan: As there is still a large number who apparently will not have the benefit and as there will likely be a flood of visitors who will seek to enter Canada in order to take advantage of the announced amnesty, will the present point system be continued, will the lower standards apply to them as well, or how does the government intend to handle the situation?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the special provisions that I have announced refer only to those cases in what we call the backlog. New people coming into Canada in the manner which the hon. member described will be subject to the usual examination and the usual point system. The dilemma, as is obvious from the members remarks, is that we cannot have it both ways. We either welcome immigrants or we do not. We either eliminate the backlog or we let it continue. I am not quite sure what the hon. member is in favour of.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF ACT

Mr. Ryan: When will the minister introduce the government's long-promised amendments to the Immigration Act?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I said that at the earliest opportunity this fall I intend to bring forward changes in the Immigration Act but that in the interval everything should be done to alleviate the hardships that are obviously caused by the fact there are some people who have been waiting four years for a decision. These measures are designed to deal with those cases, and I would imagine would normally carry the approval of the hon. member.

SPECIAL MEASURES TO ELIMINATE BACKLOG—REQUEST THAT OFFICIALS CONSIDER OTHER PROVISIONS IN ADDITION TO POINT SYSTEM

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the minister specifically call the attention of the officers who are conducting the review to the provisions in the regulations that entitle them to go beyond or overlook the strict point system when it looks as though persons could establish themselves successfully in Canada?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member has a second to look at the document I think he will see that that is precisely on what it is based.

SPECIAL MEASURES TO ELIMINATE BACKLOG—INQUIRY AS TO ABOLISHING OF APPEAL BOARD

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In light of this amnesty, is it now the intention of the government to abolish the Immigration Appeal Board as it will not have any work to do?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is again referring to this as an amnesty. If it was the intention of the government—

An hon. Member: It is amnesty.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I made it very clear that it was not an amnesty. If it were an amnesty, we would simply give permission to all 10,000 cases. The point is that each and every one of the people in the backlog will be assessed according to a different set of criteria. The point system is an assessment of the person's qualities. The present method will take into consideration the applicant's real qualities based on the fact that some of these people have been here two, three or four years. Therefore we can assess them on their performance during that period of time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see five or six members seeking to ask supplementaries. I think that early in the question period I should remind hon. members that today I will attempt to see members who did not have a chance to ask their questions yesterday.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I asked a serious question, whether the minister was going to abolish the Immigration Appeal Board. I asked him to answer yes or no. The minister did not answer. This is just a waste of time. I wish to put that question to him.

SUGGESTED MORE EQUAL DEPLOYMENT OF OFFICERS OVERSEAS—FACILITATING OF ENTRY OF DOMESTICS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In light of the fact that much of the problem results from the unequal deployment of immigration officers overseas, thereby reducing the chances of applicants to have their applications heard readily and causing them to use the quick method, is it the intentioon of the minister to bring about a more equal distribution throughout the world in order that applicants will have an earlier opportunity rather than having to take this second method?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is a current review of the deployment of immigration officers around the world at various points, but I would have to question whether it would be quicker to apply from within the country when some of our cases are four years old.

Mr. Alexander: One last supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to remind hon. members again that we are running into difficulty right at the start of the question period.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I have another matter of concern. Is the minister aware of the legitimate need for domestics in this country and is he in fact attempting to make the regulations or the Immigration Act much easier for entrance by persons of this calibre?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the role of domestics is certainly an occupational skill. I will personally make sure that it is being properly assessed by immigration officials who are processing applications from visitors within the country or would-be immigrants out of the country.

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Does the minister agree that if the Indians had had a better immigration policy some years ago we would perhaps not be having all of these difficulties today?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre for a last supplementary on this subject and return to it later during the question period.

• (1440)

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF DEPORTATION ORDERS WHERE PERSON'S LIFE MAY BE IN DANGER

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration a question without being argumentative or citing examples. In view of previous decisions of the Immigration Appeal Board to issue deportation orders in cases where the life or safety of the persons to be deported may be in danger, would the minister consider asking the board, if he has not already done so, to review cases of this kind? He will be as familiar as I am or more so, with two or three of them.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am not a lawyer, but I am very respectful of courts of law or other organizations or boards having the same status. The Immigration Appeal Board is an independent body set up by law so as to reduce to a minimum political interference and patronage. I respect the wishes of the board and I never make recommendations which would have the effect of questioning the board's decisions.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS IN LIGHT OF PLIGHT OF LAID-OFF NORTHERN ELECTRIC EMPLOYEES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration on another subject. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the plight of some 2,000 employees laid off by Northern Electric and, in particular, to the plight of those who have been forced to go on welfare because their severance and other pay had to be used to pay off loans from the credit union? If his attention has been drawn to these circumstances and to the fact that unemployment insurance benefits will not be available to them for months, is he contemplating taking any action?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am aware of the unemployment policy, or perhaps I should say the employment policy, of Northern Electric. I was concerned to the extent that I personally visited the president of the company two weeks ago and encouraged him to issue a statement which he will be making in a few days jointly with the Minister of Manpower setting out the manpower programs of which Northern Electric will be taking advantage for its own future efficiency and for the benefit of the employees through retraining. He will also indicate Northern's future policy of remaining in Quebec.

As far as unemployment insurance and severance pay are concerned, the situation is not quite as the hon. gentleman describes it. These people owed the credit union $2,000 when they left Northern Electric. The decision to take the $2,000 back was strictly one made by the credit union, and one of the conditions—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lewis: That is exactly what I stated. The credit union demanded repayment. I would ask the minister this: In view of the fact that the definition of earnings is made by regulation, and in view of the fact that the requirement that severance and other pay be exhausted before unemployment insurance benefits become available is a requirement which results from a definition contained in the regulations and, further, in view of the fact that these people—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me we are entering upon a lengthy debate between the hon. member and the minister. The hon. member is asking a rather lengthy question. I realize that the minister's earlier reply was also very lengthy, but I would hope that both hon. members would try to be brief.

Mr. Lewis: It may have been lengthy, but I was setting out the line of my question. In view of the fact that this situation has been produced by the nature of the regulation, and that these people are on welfare because of the demand of the credit union, would the minister not agree to amend the regulations, which does not require any action by Parliament, so that these unfortunate Canadians will not have to be welfare recipients after they have paid into the unemployment insurance fund?

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. gentleman is extremely persuasive. I wish, perhaps, that I were as persuasive as he is. I have been reviewing these regulations for some time.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that the minister now has before him living examples of the unfortunate and distressing results of the present regulations, will he undertake to stop reviewing and start amending them?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Will he advise whether it is government policy that automobile manufacturers, such as Chrysler Corporation of Canada Limited, are not subject to government inspection and government standards in the production of automobiles?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, automobile safety and standards pertaining thereto are under the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of Transport. The question of quality of work under warranty, for instance, is a jurisdictional matter under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Complaints in respect of quality of the products of automobile manufacturers or anybody else are the subject of communications to my department. We often take up the cudgels on their behalf, but we do not enter directly into inspections of that nature.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, will the minister ensure Canadian consumers that Chrysler Corporation of Canada Limited will be required to provide a high standard of quality for their automobiles, and will he also

The police and western Canadians would like to know the answer.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I might begin by saying that any time the right hon. member wants to get pleasure from seeing members on this side he just has to come into the House and he will find us here in great numbers.

Mr. Hees: It is very difficult to get pleasure out of it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REPORT THAT CERTAIN UNSAFE CHILDREN'S CAR SEATS STILL BEING SOLD—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs relating to automobile safety. In view of the action taken by the minister's department under his predecessor a few months ago to remove unsafe car seats for children from the market, and in view of the recent news report that many of these car seats are still being offered for sale and that there is a lack of investigation in regard to the problem, I wonder whether the minister has noted this and whether any action has been taken by his department?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been a series of inspections take place to see whether there was conformity to that regulation which banned the sale of unsafe children's car seats as of June 1, and follow-up action is being taken whenever we discover that such seats are still on the market.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, would the minister indicate whether there is sufficient staff to enforce this regulation effectively, and will he be making a statement to indicate in some detail the nature of these seats that may still be on the market so that consumers who are actively purchasing these items during the summer season may be aware of the dangers involved?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, there has been an attempt made to describe them in various publications issued by my department, in press releases and in speeches across the country. We always wish we could do more. We certainly could use more inspectors, but I do not know what size an army we would really require if that is the only way we could police this.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IMPENDING NUCLEAR TEST BY FRANCE—SUGGESTED PROVISION OF CANADIAN NAVAL ESCORT FOR "GREENPEACE III"

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the Canadian government plan to provide any kind of naval escort protection to the Greenpeace III, a vessel which is under Canadian registry, skippered by a Canadian, and reported to be in the nuclear test zone on the high seas, in order that this vessel will not be apprehended, harassed or in any other way bothered by the government of France?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my information is that the Greenpeace is flying under the Peruvian flag, not under the Canadian flag. Some time ago, long before Mr. Metcalfe sent his telegram to the Prime Minister yesterday, we brought to the attention of the French government the probable presence of some Canadians on the Greenpeace and expressed our concern for their safety. Of course, we cannot prevent any Canadian from travelling on the high seas as he wishes, and if he chooses to go into an area of danger I really do not know what basis in law I would have to prevent him from doing so.

Mr. Rose: Since Canada has protested this nuclear test through a note, and in view of the fact that opposition to nuclear testing is within the four corners of Canadian government policy, and since this is a Canadian vessel on the high seas that is threatened, has the minister any explanation for this appalling external affairs timidity that would embarrass the president of a banana republic?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the hon. gentleman that, far from being timid, this government has made very strong protests to the French government against nuclear weapons testing of all kinds.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not privilege; that is an abuse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will be recognized on a supplementary question, but we are obviously getting into a debate at this point. If the hon. member has a supplementary question he will be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, some members around us have suggested that both the minister and I should be on the Greenpeace.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I should like to proceed with my supplementary question. Since Canada has protested this test through a note, and the minister reiterated that, how can the government in good conscience not protest the conditions surrounding this particular action?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that this is argument, not a question.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST THAT SHERBROOKE BE DESIGNATED AS SPECIAL AREA

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Would the minister tell the House whether Sherbrooke is going to be designated as a "special area", in view of the large number of very poor adjacent parishes located in the western Sherbrooke area?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I believe I made a statement in the House last week concerning this matter. I have nothing to add at the moment.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Would the minister have any particular suggestions in order to include parishes adjacent to Sherbrooke in a "special area", either by separating them from Sherbrooke, or by designating areas on a county rather than a region basis?

Mr. Speaker: I think that this question is more in the form of a representation made by the hon. member, and I believe that he must assume that it has been noted.

INQUIRY RESPECTING DESIGNATION OF NEW SPECIAL AREAS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question.

In view of the statement he made two weeks ago, could the hon. minister tell the House whether discussions are now under way with the Quebec government in order to determine new special areas for the province of Quebec and, in such a case, whether there will be an announcement in the House by the end of this month?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we maintain contacts with the government of Quebec for many reasons. We have made 45 agreements with provinces and we are continuing negotiations with them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I remind hon. members once more that the oral question period will be ending in a few minutes and if they ask five or six supplementaries on each question, we shall never finish. However, the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Lotbinière for a last supplementary on this matter.

DISCUSSION OF DESIGNATION OF SPECIAL AREAS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Can the minister indicate whether or not the issue of designated areas is included in the 45 topics which he is discussing with provincial governments?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will simply refer the hon. member to the statement I made about 10 days ago. I think if the hon. member takes the trouble to read Hansard, he will find the answer there.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED DELAY IN PAYMENTS TO MARIA DOS ANJOS—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO AVOID ADMINISTRATIVE ERRORS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration of which I have given him notice. Has the minister looked into the case of Maria Dos Anjos of Toronto whose unemployment insurance payments were held up for seven months? If so, is he now proposing to take steps to make sure that the administrative errors which brought about this almost unbelievable delay will not take place in the future?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has serious reservations about the advisability from a procedural standpoint of hon. members referring to this kind of individual case. It seems to me that in such circumstances we could, from day to day, spend all of the question period looking into individual cases involving several departments. Perhaps the minister could reply briefly, but I would not wish to encourage hon. members to bring up individual cases in this way.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, since the minister does not seem to want to answer, I might say on a point of order that this case is the most outstanding of a great many similar cases which have arisen in the past few months. I ask the minister to give some indication whether this kind of mess is going to be cleaned up.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FLOODS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ASSISTANCE TO FLOOD VICTIMS—POSSIBLE FEDERAL AID IN CONSTRUCTING CONTROL FACILITIES

Mr. Bruce Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. It concerns the news release today which indicates that the federal government will make a financial contribution to assist flood victims in British Columbia. No mention was made in the news release of any federal assistance toward the creation of better flood control facilities in the affected areas. Has the province of British Columbia requested any assistance for the construction of permanent flood control facilities and, if so, what answer did the federal government give?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did send a telegram to Premier Bennett indicating the ways and conditions under which the federal government would contribute to such cases of damage arising from flood. But on the latter part of the question concerning whether there was any request for flood control building, expenditures or works, there was no such request in the telegram to me. Of course, we have in the past, even in that area of British Columbia, contributed to flood control works and we would consider doing so again if a request were made.

FROST DAMAGE IN SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO ASSISTANCE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the announcement of aid to flood victims in British Columbia would the right hon. gentleman consider aid to those who suffered from heavy frost in southern Ontario?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Crowfoot.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY—POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF REGULATIONS GOVERNING HOURS OF WORK

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Labour. Will the arrangements which are in effect with regard to the trucking industry concerning hours of work be extended past July 1 this year?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): If we are discussing the same regulations, they would come into effect on January 1, 1973.

ALLEGED SEIZURE OF DOCUMENTS FROM PFIZER COMPANY BY RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES COMMISSION

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could direct a further question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Can he tell the House whether the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission has conducted raids or seized documents from the offices of the Pfizer Company in the course of an investigation into price-fixing in the sale of chemicals?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I will do a check, but my opinion now is that it would be improper for me to make any comment. I will, however, check to see if that interpretation is correct.

Mr. Gleave: Would the minister, in the course of his investigation, read an Ontario publication called Farm and Country—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RECOMMENDATIONS IN ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL STUDY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion when we can expect a policy statement on the special study the minister has had now for some time which was commissioned by the Atlantic Development Council on the operation of the Regional Development Incentives Act in the province of Newfoundland? That study contains some very important recommendations. When can we expect some action?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): This is something we are discussing with the government of Newfoundland, and as soon as we reach agreement we will let the hon. member know what we decide.

INQUIRY AS TO BY-ELECTION IN OTTAWA CENTRE

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of local interest for the Prime Minister. Will a by-election be called to fill the vacancy in Ottawa Centre on October 16, the same day as the by-elections in York West and Trinity-Conception?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member's research staff is at least turning up questions now which are founded on fact, which was not the case in respect of his previous question to me a couple of days ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Just answer yes or no.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have—

BARLEY—POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF DELIVERY QUOTA—AVAILABILITY OF BOXCARS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Since the 15-bushel quota for barley will be terminated tomorrow and many points have not had sufficient boxcars to take in the available barley in the area, is there enough barley in the system so that there will not be an extension of that quota, or will there be additional quotas available in lieu of the present quota?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when the Wheat Board increased the barley quota to 40 bushels with the additional 15 bushels and with a short time for delivery I had discussions with the board about the problem of the limited time available for delivery. They indicated they would be watching the situation very closely to try to ensure that every producer did have space and opportunity and that they would consider extensions if that seemed to be necessary to accommodate barley.

• (1510)

[Later:]

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, since many of the elevator points have been emptying annexes which they intend to close down rather than taking in grain in the interval until boxcars are allocated, would the minister take that into consideration and would he spot cars particularly at those points where they have been carrying on that practice?

Mr. Lang: The minister, of course, does not spot cars, but I will certainly bring to the attention of officials the hon. member's concern about the situation.

REPORTED REQUEST TO GROUP VISITING QUEBEC HOUSE IN PARIS TO REMOVE CANADIAN FLAG LAPEL PINS— REPRESENTATIONS BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The minister stated yesterday, as reported at page 3343 of Hansard, that he had no knowledge of the incident which took place in Paris, where members of a Canadian delegation to Quebec House who wore Canadian flag lapel pins were provoked. Would the minister say whether he has now been informed of the incident?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have no more information yet except I understand that the prime minister of Quebec, who is a very good and distinguished Canadian, is looking into this incident himself. I am sure he would not want any unfortunate effect of the report that has been made to continue. As a good Canadian, he would want to be sure that there has been no insult to his fellow Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are only two minutes left before the end of the oral question period. Maybe the hon. member would hurry.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, has the Secretary of State for External Affairs made representations to the Quebec government in order to avoid the recurrence of such incidents and to have the Canadian flag respected in Quebec?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: I would want to be sure of the nature of the incident that took place. I am sure the prime minister of Quebec will be making inquiries along the same lines.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

TAXATION OF MIDDLE-INCOME GROUP AND ANTI-POVERTY PROGRAMS

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, in view of the various questions involving the Minister of National Health and Welfare that were put when he was not here yesterday about the middle-income group and a statement made outside the House, I should like to ask him whether he would advise the House if he honestly believes, as reported, that the middle-income group—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat. The hon. member will appreciate that he is asking the minister a question about a statement made outside the House. The only way such questions can be asked is by directing them to the Prime Minister to ascertain whether such statements represent government policy.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will have to call orders of the day after the point of order.

Mr. Hees: It is not the hon. member's fault, Mr. Speaker. He is simply reading it the way the minister wrote it out for him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might like to rephrase his question.

Mr. Deakon: Mr. Speaker, this happens to be a question of privilege because, I regret to say, in this House a backbencher on the government side rarely has the opportunity to say too much. I was speaking about the middle income group and I was the first member who raised this point. All of a sudden, the opposition finally saw the light.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deakon: I should like to rephase my question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House will appreciate that we have reached the end of the question period. The hon. member was recognized for the purpose of rephrasing the question but he rose rather on a question of privilege. With the consent of the House he might be allowed to rephrase the question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Business of the House

Mr. Deakon: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether it is government policy that the middle-income group should be paying all the taxes in this country?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Hees: Get out your music and sing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro: Inasmuch as various references have been made to the speech I made recently, the hon. member will be pleased to know that the speech contained the statement that the families who will lose all or part of family allowances make up only 28 per cent of the total cost of the family allowance program. That is hardly indicative—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. MacLean: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the President of the Privy Council, in his capacity as House leader, if he would indicate what business the government proposes to place before the House at least for the next two or three days.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise hon. members that tomorrow we will begin government business by dealing with the Canadian Wheat Board bill, followed by the occupational training act, the Pension Act, the Family Income Security Plan, and the Canada Labour Code. In any event, on Monday we will begin with the foreign takeovers bill, and following that we will be able to return to any of these items that might still be uncompleted.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite the consideration of the business of the House, I should like to suggest that the first speaker for our party and the hon. member who will speak in reply be allotted 30 minutes each, that the spokesmen for the two other parties and all other speakers be allotted 20 minutes and we consider revising these rules of debate at eight o'clock tonight.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) that the House follow the provisions of Standing Order 58. In these circumstances, of course, it is not necessary to ask for consent.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—IRRESPONSIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT IN FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval) moved:

That this House regrets the government's responsibility for the deterioration of federal-provincial relations as a result of its uncompromising attitudes and policies, its unilateral decisions and its refusal to meet legitimate needs of Canadian provinces, mainly through not making available to them the funds required for development, economic expansion and welfare of the population.

Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to move on behalf of my party, the Social Credit party of Canada, the motion now before us.

The Social Credit party of Canada is not the only one to take the federal government to task about this. And it is not the first time either that we state economic and financial principles such as these and level such constitutional criticisms.

We of the Social Credit party never missed the opportunity of asserting the fiscal rights of the provinces to enable them to meet the needs of their citizens.

I for one rose on several occasions in this House to urge the successive federal governments to give back to the province of Quebec what they had borrowed during the war and had formally promised to return.

But the federal government always turned a deaf ear and for the last four years we have felt that the more we tried to improve federal-provincial relations the more we stumbled against the stubbornness of this government which seems to do everything possible to disgust the province of Quebec and scuttle the confederation.

A close look at this makes one realize that this government closed the door to all negotiations, so much so that it does not even hear the outcries from the provinces. In Quebec, such an attitude would be understandable if there were a Conservative government in Quebec and a Liberal government in Ottawa, because we would then witness the traditional jousts in which those two old parties have engaged since confederation.

But to our astonishment, we realize that Quebec always suffered the worst political and constitutional setbacks whenever there was a Grit government both in Quebec and in Ottawa. Is it because the provincial premiers blindly put their faith in their Ottawa friends and that the latter turned that to account by pushing forward their centralizing views, or because party interests prevailed over those of the people?

That is a coincidence, some will say; however, it is so striking that any earnest Quebecer could hardly fail to consider it.

How far back should one go to find complaints from provincial governments and municipalities against the federal government? Probably at the very first federal-provincial conference, which took place immediately after World War II when the province of Quebec, among others, asked for the return of its taxation rights which had been irresponsibly surrendered by Premier Godbout who simply wrote to Mr. Mackenzie King without even consulting the Quebec legislature.

At random, I shall refer to the minutes of federal-provincial conferences in order to show that the provinces have always asked for the return of their taxation powers or sometimes have again exchanged them for more funds to be provided as equalization payments.

Therefore, the whole matter revolves around questions of money, taxation and taxes.

The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) said: We have spending powers; therefore, we have taxation rights In turn, the provinces say: We have spending powers; we also have taxation rights. Essentially, in that situation, the citizen reaps only taxation and taxes.

Let us go back to 1963. What did Quebec Liberal Premier Lesage have to say to the Liberal Pearson government about the Fulton-Favreau formula? On November 25, 1963, he said this:

The fiscal arrangements necessary to meet this situation that is the state of war were to be only temporary. At the beginning, it was believed that the spirit of federalism would be reasserted as soon as hostilities were over, but the economic consequences of the war lasted several years longer, years during which the former arrangements were maintained.

But we are now living in 1963. There is no longer a state of war, and the economic problems which confronted Canada after 1950 are not those of today. It is the needs of the provinces which, after all these years, have to take precedence over those of the federal government.

And Mr. Lesage explained his comments thus:

When we say that our needs have to take precedence, we are not expressing a subjective point of view. We are basing ourselves on facts that anyone can verify for himself.

In other words, our needs have not become priority ones because we wished them to be so, but because their nature rendered them thus.

We know that Quebec's needs are essential ones. We have already insisted upon this point. In brief, we have to improve our level of education, since the goal of national self-assertion for which we are now striving would otherwise be ephemeral.

• (1530)

We have to raise the level of public health and social welfare in our province, so that our citizens may play a more efficient part as producers in our economy and so that they may become happier human beings. Finally, it is necessary that the province be henceforth in a position to carry out its responsibilities in the economic sphere.

At the same time as the federal government's reasons for considering its needs as having priority over those of the provinces were losing their validity, another factor was manifesting itself, a factor of which all the countries of the world were aware, and the presence of which completely reversed the situation that prevailed from 1939 to about 1956. This factor is the new direction that must be followed by modern economic policy.

For many years, as we have pointed out, the problem of economic stability and that of inflation rightly preoccupied those who were responsible for the economic development of the country, and led them to adopt the measures that the situation called for. From the very fact of their actions and the cooperation of the private sector, these problems, without having disappeared entirely, have nevertheless been considerably attenuated. The problem that remains today, and in acute fashion, is that of economic development, and this problem is far from being solved; on the contrary, it might very well be the cause of a large proportion of the unemployment that is continuing to plague the economy of Canada and Quebec.

With regard to this problem, which, if it is not a new one, is at least more present than ever before, we only have one question to ask: which, of the federal government or the provincial governments can best find the solution? And our answer is: the two sectors of government can take part in its solution—but it is an undeniable fact that the provinces have a great part to play in this regard.

The reason for this is very simple. Under the Canadian Constitution, the important elements of economic growth and the development of the wealth of the soil, which are but one aspect of the question, fall within the jurisdiction of the provinces. The latter actually control the greater number of factors through which a true development policy can come and can have a chance of success. The provinces are also in a position to influence the rate of their own industrial progress by their actions in the location of secondary industries, by laying out roads and communications to facilitate access to basic resources and by their absolute jurisdiction over municipal structures. Furthermore, they can participate directly in investments for the development of resources and the establishing of industries in places where economic conditions make it desirable. In other words, the provinces are better placed than the central government to initiate a policy of economic development, because they are closer to the particular problems of their people and the regions that make up their territory.

Thus spoke the Quebec premier in 1963. On the other hand, what did the New Brunswick premier, also a Liberal, Mr. Robichaud, have to say? I quote:

The Government of New Brunswick has at no time willingly accepted the terms of the Federal-Provincial Tax Rental Agreement currently in effect. This agreement has been a major step backward in the efforts being made to recognize the economic differences between the provinces.

The financial capacity of the provinces, necessary to provide essential services on an equal basis to the citizens of the whole country, has been seriously handicapped by those agreements. New Brunswick will insist during confederation that those agreements now in effect be renegotiated so that they may reflect more accurately the financial requirements of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, while we attended those conferences as observers and that all seemed to be going just fine, as we say, that everybody seemed to agree, one could hear liberal premiers say that they were opposed to federal government initiatives in the fields under provincial jurisdiction.

Let us refer now to the Victoria federal-provincial conference. What were the premiers saying? We want more money.

Here is how Premier Robarts of Ontario voiced his thoughts:

Let me tell you how we visualize this in Ontario: If we cannot obtain a better share of tax revenues, and if we refuse to overtax our citizens and our industries, we will have to regress in our present programs. Among others, I will mention more specifically education, health, transportation, energy development, resource development, housing, urban renewal, and pollution.

It was then the turn of Mr. Jean-Jacques Bertrand, the then premier of Quebec, to complain of the interference and omnipresence of Ottawa—and I quote:

The present federal government, helped by a tax-sharing system of which it can never be said enough that it is unfair and goes against the legitimate freedom of provinces, discovers areas of responsibility for itself everywhere—in educational radio and television, cultural affairs, urban affairs, offshore mineral resources, securities trade, post-secondary education, university research, water, air and earth pollution, highway transportation, foreign relations even with regard to education or other provincial matters, community development, and even civil law, through the estate tax.

It looks as if, to the federal government, provincial governments are at most administrative divisions of a wealthy, omnipotent, ruling central power.

What was then the reply of Canada's Prime Minister? Here it is:

The second issue of concern to us is spending power. This phrase as such does not appear in the text of the constitution, but we all know that spending power is a prerogative not only of the federal government, but of the provinces as well.

The federal government has used its spending power in connection with programs such as hospitalization insurance, welfare—under the Canada Assistance Plan—medicare, health programs, and several others which I mentioned yesterday. It is this spending power which has allowed for the introduction of such programs through the federal government.

It was for the premier of British Columbia, Mr. Bennett, to bring the debate back to its true proportions. And this is what he had to say:

• (1540)

It is not the spending power which is primarily at stake, but the power of taxation, the power of obtaining income from taxes. If there is money in the government chest, they will spend it even in areas of activities outside their jurisdiction: such is the problem that is eating away the confederation.

This problem has not arisen a century ago; it dates back to World War I. Mr. Thomas White, the then Minister of Finance, ventured for the first time into the income tax field. This did not occur 100 years ago.

He declared then that it was a provincial and not a federal prerogative which would be reviewed when the war ended. During World War II, the federal government laid claim to this whole area of taxation. In the intervening years after the war, Canada has experienced the greatest development in its history and tax income has considerably increased. Instead of surrendering this field of taxation to its rightful owners, the provinces, federal authorities have continued to replenish their chest. They went on exercising this provincial authority, which is the reason why we are now faced with so many problems with Quebec. British Columbia shares Quebec's position in this respect. This is the root of our constitutional difficulties and that is what we should brace ourselves to deal with.

This is where the central government has been guilty of excesses and this is the source of all our difficulties. Provincial governments cannot be certain of any income when the federal administration exercises this power: even municipal property tax is not safe anymore. Excluding the federal government, no province, municipality or city has any jurisdiction over any tax basis. Listen to this: Sir Thomas White states that it is a provincial area of taxation, but the federal government would not desist.

This is the root of the ill and, as premier of the province of British Columbia, I suggest that we should remove this aspect from the taxing powers held by the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, we realize that the premier of British Columbia has made no bones about it and that he was able to deal with the situation.

And as the Social Credit Party of Canada always strived to make constructive criticism, that is by making alternative proposals, I shall quote from a resolution passed by our national council, in April 1971, on our constitutional positions.

Paragraphs 3 and 4 read as follows:

3. However, the Social Credit Party of Canada believes that we must go beyond the present status quo which does not satisfy anybody and grant to provinces the power to be themselves, to develop and flourish according to their needs and aspirations.

Federal-Provincial Relations

4. Therefore, the Social Credit Party of Canada proposes the review and application of a renewed federalism in which provinces or groups of provinces will contribute, through their representatives or governments, to the development of policies relating to the whole country and benefitting all Canadians.

Specifically, the Social Credit Party suggests the drawing up of a new constitution that would be made in Canada, by Canadians, for Canadians, primarily to come back to the spirit of a true confederation, the components of which, namely the provinces, would take back the powers that are rightfully theirs, to safeguard their identity, to ensure the provinces true participation in monetary, fiscal and commercial decisions which, now taken at the federal level, have deep influence on the economy and the policies of the provinces.

The provincial governments should have their say in monetary policy decision-making. The exclusive control of the federal government over money and its extension, that is the credit it grants, its action on the rate of exchange, on the fluctuations of the money supply, on prices and inflation, directly influence the finances of the provinces and local economic development.

For these reasons, the provinces should take part in the development of this policy. In consultation with the central government, they should be allowed to mint their own credit, just as they are now able to borrow on their own credit.

As for customs, the provinces are now unable to protect their industries, whereas the central government may, by exercising its power to decree or negotiate customs tariffs, regulate exports and imports and greatly affect the economy of the provinces.

We feel that the negotiation of customs tariffs and the signing of important trade agreements should be done in consultation with and with the agreement of provincial governments.

What about taxation now? At the beginning direct taxation was reserved to the provinces and this was their only source of income. Policies adopted in wartime first led the central government to deprive the provinces of this source of income; today, the constant presence of the central government in the field of direct taxation results in practically freezing and annihilating the freedom and power of the provinces in this field.

The growing needs of the provinces in the education, social security and industrial development fields entail the restitution to them of their direct taxation power.

Under social security we class family allowances, old age security, health and housing. These fields fall within provincial jurisdiction under the constitution.

We contend that because of the various statutes governing these fields efficient planning it not possible.

On the other hand, as Quebec intends and justly so to keep its constitutional and historic job as guardian of the French Canadian culture it must be able to organize its social life in accordance with its aspirations and its own ideas. We believe however that some machinery should be put in place so that such measures may be applied from coast to coast, the federal government acting as co-ordinator on a national basis.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

As far as education is concerned, it is a field that comes exclusively under provincial jurisdiction and it should remain there.

That, Mr. Speaker, is what the Social Credit suggests as a remedy for the present difficulties we are in, before the country falls into anarchy and revolution.

[English]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, please excuse my hesitancy in rising. Thinking that perhaps the minister might want to speak, I wanted to defer to him in case he rose.

The motion proposed by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) gives us plenty of scope to discuss the constitutional arrangements of our country and permits us to recall that just one year ago we seemed to be at the point of reaching agreement, "we" meaning the government of Canada and the provinces, on proposals submitted at what has become the ill-fated Victoria conference. Since then, the constitutional discussion has lapsed and the secretariat in the Office of the Prime Minister has been put on half pay, so to speak. The argument is pursued by press release and by unilateral statement. Just in the last week, we witnessed the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) approaching the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs, convoyed or shepherded by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). That was an interesting spectacle.

Four years ago, when former prime minister Lester Pearson opened the first federal-provincial conference on reform of the constitution with stirring words which, in the opinion of many, expressed optimism and were a declaration of the seriousness of the purpose of the conference, he said:

There are times in the life of a country when the assurance of good intentions, the discharge of normal duty and acceptance of routine responsibility, are not enough. What such times demand is the exercise of courage and decision that go far beyond the needs of the moment. I believe that this is such a time for Canada."

It is tragic that in the intervening four years we have witnessed what could fairly be termed as a heating up of constitutional debate and, finally, a running down of will, so to speak, on the part of this government and many other governments of this country. That brave spirit has faltered. Because it faltered, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) has put forward his resolution.

• (1550)

The Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution reported on March 16 of this year. It made some 105 recommendations. The first was a series on the constitution, including its patriation. The committee made suggestions about the people of our country, their language rights and what we call their fundamental rights. It discussed federal institutions such as the Supreme Court, Parliament, both its branches, and the head of state. Important recommendations were made about the division of powers. I think it is time to recall some of the recommendations. The second was, and I quote:

A new Canadian Constitution should be based on functional considerations, which would lead to greater decentralization of governmental powers in areas touching culture and social policy and to greater centralization in powers which have important economic effects at the national level. Functional considerations also require greater decentralization in many areas of governmental administration.

I think it is safe to say that when these recommendations were being prepared, we were conscious that the most critical challenge, and I quote from the report:

—focuses on Quebec's role in Confederation. Questions of Quebec's self-expression and development, culture, language, poverty and unemployment are part of this challenge. Its intensity and magnitude alone, with its threat to our very continuance as a state, is enough to justify constitutional reform.

I think it is correct to say that through the formula of centralization of what I might call the economic powers and the decentralization of social responsibilities, we thought there might be a formula for a second century of federalism.

I wish to go on because in the few minutes that are mine this is perhaps the only theme I will have time to discuss. The committee went from that early recommendation to one in Part IV, The Governments; the division of powers. I suppose it is best to number the recommendations for those who will follow me and will want to make use of this speech. I quote:

49. The use of exclusive lists of federal and provincial powers, but with an extended list of concurrent powers, should be continued.

50. Concurrent powers which predominantly affect the national interest should grant paramountcy to the federal Parliament and those which predominantly affect provincial or local interests should grant paramountcy to the provincial legislatures.

51. The Constitution should permit the delegation of executive and administrative powers (as at present), but not of legislative powers, except where expressly specified in this report.

We heard many reasons from all across Canada to support these recommendations. They are listed on page 43 of the report. I would like to share one or two of them because we have not really had a chance to discuss in extenso this report. I quote:

(1) The federal Parliament does not have sufficient power to manage and plan the economy.

(2) The federal Parliament does not have sufficient power to cope with large multinational corporations, international unions, and the overwhelming influence and power of the United States of America.

(3) The citizens of Canada are handicapped by the lack of national standards in education.

We heard about other things such as bilingualism, securities regulation, pollution control, trade regulations and so on. Of course, some of these areas were known to the committee before we started our work. Others were underlined by witnesses whom we heard across the country.

I suggest there is an obligation upon us to try to revise the will of the respective governments to reach some sort of an agreement. I believe that in the area of social policy, the agreement or potential agreement between the government of Canada and that of Quebec is fairly close. What the committee sought to do was to redistribute power. After all, that is what a constitution in a federal state is about, or the main thing that it is about. It can be couched in dull or eloquent language. It can be made impossibly dull by legalism, but really what we are talking about is the distribution of power between those who have the responsibility for government at the federal and provincial levels.

We suggested that the provinces should have more control over social policy ranging all the way from welfare to educational television. The provinces could then fix their own priorities in light of their own cultural and economic development and the government of Canada would be given more power to control the national economy. Of course a spillage, or more than a spillage, a result of this would be the fact that by being able to control the national economy, some of the priorities of the provinces could be adjusted from time to time as the economy picks up, unemployment drops and so on. Incidentally, we have not had a response from the government of Canada on the recommendations of the committee, at least as far as I am aware.

Mr. Pearson expressed the urgency some four years ago in this way, and I quote:

Here the road forks. If we have the resolution and the wisdom to choose now the right course and to follow it steadfastly, I can see few limits to what we may achieve together as a people. But if we lack the courage to choose, or if we choose wrongly, we will leave to our children, and our children's children, a country in fragments, and we ourselves would have become the failures of Confederation.

I do not want to be boastful, but I do say that it was a great privilege to serve on the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution. I felt very strongly gripped by the sense of urgency which one can see if he reads the various recommendations. I certainly hope that the debate in which we are engaged today will provide a forum so that others who feel as I do can expound a bit on this committee report.

The problem of jurisdiction in the field of social policy arises partly from the lack of a clarifying section in the constitution. Responsibilities tend to lie with the government which produces legislation. Both Quebec and Ottawa have legislated in the social field. Both claim the right to do so. I hope in the few minutes remaining to me to discuss the positions taken by the respective governments. If I may put it this way, Quebec's traditional claim that the actions of the federal government are unconstitutional in this field is based on section 92 of the British North America Act dealing with family and educational matters, and the premise that social security measures as a whole bear directly on the culture of a people enabling them to express themselves collectively. Thus, the province asserts a right to complete jurisdiction over all social policies.

• (1600)

At the moment, Quebec exercises complete jurisdiction over workmen's compensation, the Quebec pension plan, its own supplementary family allowance plan and its own schooling allowances. It demands exclusive jurisdiction in the field of income security, manpower, including vocational training, and manpower centres, social services, including those links with the administration of justice, health services, including financial programs such as hospital insurance and health insurance, housing and leisure—what governments may feel called upon to do, though this may seem paradoxical, to fill the "vacuum" which may arise in some cases as a result of the short working week.

I think I can put the position of the federal government fairly, or, at least, I can attempt to do so. It is that federal control in the welfare field is necessary in the national interest to promote equality among all Canadians. For this reason, Ottawa wishes to preserve its involvement in various income support and insurance programs, specifically, in its guaranteed income supplement, old age security, unemployment insurance, family allowances, youth allowances, Canada Pension Plan and veterans pension plans. The specific issue is legislative primacy in the field of family allowances. Ottawa's position on family allowances was articulated after negotiations with Quebec in a letter to Premier Bourassa, dated March 9, 1972. Basically, the plan proposed that the federal government set minimum standards, define income so as to correspond with the definition of the federal Revenue Department, and issue the cheques. The provinces would determine who should receive benefits and to what extent, subject to federally-established minimum rates. Where a recipient was to receive more under a provincial scheme the province could issue its own supplementary cheques or arrange with Ottawa to administer a single, combined payment. Quebec's reaction to the federal plan was not favourable. The question of legislative primacy—the issue most important to the province's future development of its own social policy—was settled in favour of the federal government.

To understand why Quebec clings so tenaciously to its demands for legislative primacy, it is essential to understand the province's conception and definition of social policy. In contrast to Ottawa's narrow definition, including only old age security and income supplement, unemployment insurance, family and youth allowances, and pension plans, Quebec's concept of social policy is a broad, global one. An income security plan similar to the entire group of existing federal plans forms only a base for a wide range of policies pertaining to manpower, health, social services, housing and leisure. Thus, where the federal definition ends, the provincial one only begins.

I suppose I could be accused of failing to contribute very much to this debate, because I am not prepared to say which position is the correct one. I suppose each possesses a measure of correctness; it is merely that the concepts are different. All I ask is that there should be sufficient flexibility in the approach of the Government of Canada toward a very different concept, an unEnglish concept of social development in Canada, if I can put it that way. The situation is perfectly well understood, I believe, by leaders of the Quebec government, but not so clearly understood by the Government of Canada and by many of us in this parliament who have other responsibilities.

What I am saying, really, is that we should continue to go forward together in the same direction and that we ought not to be terribly worried because our concepts are not exactly the same; indeed, we should be encouraged and excited by the fact that these difference exist. On the other hand, Quebec, or any other province, for that matter, which is anxious to pursue its own social policy should remember there must be an overrriding ability on the part of the federal government in the field of manpower, vocational training and so on, to discharge responsibilities which surely must be national in character if we are to maintain a country at all. I hope I shall not become tied up in this argument, but I welcome the opportunity to comment on the report of the Special Committee on the Constitution. Despite its shortcomings it is significant—

[Mr. Fairweather.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in my view the Creditiste party is to be commended for birnging to the attention of the House the constitutional problem which is facing Canada. I must say I feel myself in agreement in many ways with the hon. member for Fundy Royal (Mr. Fairweather), which is not remarkable, perhaps, since we were colleagues on the committee to which he referred. I intend to discuss the constitutional aspect of the motion and to leave to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) consideration of the financial aspects of federal-provincial arrangements, an extremely important aspect and one which is mentioned in the motion.

This debate gives me an opportunity to say that the government greeted the report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada with resounding silence. I suggest this is not good enough. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was elected partly because of his promise to build a strong united Canada and because of his reputation as an outstanding constitutional lawyer who could presumably deal with constitutional matters satisfactorily. He has now taken refuge behind a series of federal-provincial constitutional conferences culminating in the impasse that followed the Victoria conference when Mr. Bourassa refused to accept the federal formula of amendment to the constitution because of differences in respect of family allowances. The Prime Minister has in effect announced a policy of acceptance of the impasse which has resulted in total inactivity on the constitutional front. The learned and distinguished hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) who, as joint chairman of the committee, made a tremendous contribution to the report, has not moved concurrence in the report of that committee. Indeed, until today hardly a word has been said about the report in this House, although I understand there was a debate on it in the other place.

I suggest this is a rather extraordinary situation, because the report did indeed produce a remarkably useful consensus from all regions and all parties of Canada as well as from members of the Senate. The press, indeed, made it appear that the most striking feature of the report was the fact that several members filed minority or dissenting statements. In fact, the emphasis should have been just the other way about. What was remarkable was not the extent of the dissent, but the extent of agreement reached by the members of this committee on a host of difficult subjects profoundly affecting the future of Canada.

In a so-called minority report two members of the committee, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) and myself, did express disagreement on certain issues of the report, but we also expressed our opinion that the report formed a basis for settling urgent constitutional problems facing Canada. We further expressed the opinion that the report could contribute to the future unity of Canada. We had certain reservations on some subjects which I will mention later, but on the whole we found the report an excellent basis for further advance on the constitutional front.

What we find completely unsatisfactory is that the report should be ignored. There may have been some excuse for not dealing with it when an immediate election was in the air, but with the prospects of an election put off at least for some months, some statement of the government's intention in respect of a report of such profound importance ought to have been made. Perhaps some spokesman on the government side will take the opportunity afforded by this debate to state the government's attitude towards the report of the committee.

As the hon. member for Fundy-Royal said, the report contains some 105 recommendations. It comes out sharply and strongly in favour of a new constitution for Canada, although in actual fact it recommends accepting many of the existing arrangements in the present British North America Act. It is not a radical or revolutionary document, but it does propose important changes. We believe there are enough important changes to justify the view that substantial acceptance of the report would, in effect, give Canada a new and modern constitution and eliminate much of what is obsolete, inadequate and offensive in the present British North America Act.

We commend the report for its recommendation that basic and fundamental rights should be entrenched in the constitution. We have long argued that this is fundamental to a free society such as we have in Canada. We think the constitution should recognize, as the report suggests, the special position of native peoples in Canada. We also agree that actual constitutional changes in respect of native peoples should await full consultation with their own organizations, after they have completed the researches in which they are presently engaged.

With regard to the crucial question of the division of powers, we accept the basic proposal in the report that the powers of the provincial legislatures should be enlarged in all areas touching on social and cultural policy, and the powers of the federal Parliament should be clarified and enlarged with regard to important economic policies affecting Canada as a whole. I know such generalities are not easy to work out, but I think this is a useful guideline contained in the report.

The proposal in the report with regard to income support measures seems to me to be ingenious. It proposes to give control over the details and the distribution of these moneys provided as income support to the provincial level, while retaining the federal government's own role of control of the economic aspects.

We particularly welcome in the report the clarification of the paramount federal power in respect of air and water pollution, or the suggestion that there should be clarification. In our view this is an urgent matter and it may well be that even if there is difficulty in getting provincial agreement to some of the recommendations in the report, the provinces generally would welcome these recommendations so as to establish basic responsibility for national standards to prevent air and water pollution. In our view, the battle against pollution clearly requires national standards to be set and maintained even though the provinces and municipalities may have an important role to play.

The report deals with the issue of self-determination. It does not propose a right of secession to be written into the constitution, but it does declare that if the citizens of a part of Canada at some time democratically declare themselves in favour of a political arrangement which is contrary to the continuation of present political structure, this disagreement should be resolved by political negotiation and not by the use of military or other coercive force. This is an extremely important announcement. I doubt if it has ever been enunciated officially before by anybody in Canada. It deserves full debate and we should certainly like to know where the government stands on it. I may say that the members of the committee unanimously endorsed the full statement which appears as recommendation 8:

> We reaffirm our conviction that all of the peoples of Canada can achieve their aspirations more effectively within a federal system, and we believe Canadians should strive to maintain such a system.

I believe that chapter on self-determination should be historical, and it seems odd to me it should pass by with practically no notice in this House.

There is no doubt that the issue of self-determination has an important psychological effect in the province of Quebec. We do not think the issue can just be ignored. We accept in this party the proposition that the unity of Canada must be based on consent and not on military coercion.

There are a few important points on which the hon. member for Selkirk and myself have expressed our disagreement with the report. The report pays lip service to the need for flexibility in the constitution, but it rejects what appears to us to be the most useful method of providing such flexibility, namely the right of Parliament to delegate specific powers to provincial legislatures and the right of provincial legislatures to delegate specific legislative powers to the federal Parliament. This is a technical matter but it is of crucial importance. There are many powers, of course, both federal and provincial in the present British North America Act which cannot and should not be delegated. Delegation is a matter of consent, and unless the federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures consent to the delegation it cannot take effect. There may well be cases, however, where some provinces may wish to delegate powers to the federal government while others would not. We do not think this should be prohibited by the constitution, but in fact that it should be explicitly permitted by the constitution. In our view, failure to deal with this issue is the failure of imagination and the failure to provide the flexibility which is clearly desirable.

A substantial subject of discussion in the report was the detailed proposals to change the powers and the method of selection of the Senate. The report actually proposes to increase the number of Senate members. We made our view very clear, and it is not exactly original, so I will not enlarge on it. Our view is that the Senate should be abolished. Our view is that a non-elected legislative assembly is an anomaly in a modern democracy. The Canadian federal system provides ample checks and balances. A Senate, revised with regard to its method of selection, could turn out to be a source of legislative deadlock, and that would not help the government of this country at all.

We find the recommendation with regard to income control quite inadequate. The recommendation proposes that in cases of national emergency, as defined by the Parliament of Canada, the provinces should delegate to the federal Parliament all additional powers necessary to control wages, prices and other forms of income including rent, dividends and profits. It is my view that the battle against inflation is essentially an economic national and federal concern, and one that should not be exercised only when a national emergency exists, nor should it be by delegation from the provinces. The report has recommended greater centralization of the powers that have important economic effects at the national level. Who can deny that the inflationary spiral has important economic effects at the national level? How and when this power of control over income should be exercised is a subject which I do not think is relevant to this debate. But from a constitutional point of view, Parliament and the provincial legislatures should have concurrent powers in respect of control over inflation and particularly in respect to control over incomes, and the federal power should be paramount.

There are other details in the report on which we will express, and on appropriate occasions will continue to express, our reservations. In particular, we are opposed to recommendation number 17 by what the individual person would be constitutionally protected against the arbitrary seizure of his property, except for the public good and for just compensation. History has demonstrated that similar efforts to protect property constitutionally have been used by courts to frustrate legislative supremacy in respect of social questions. In our view, the Bill of Rights should be confined to human rights and should not attempt to protect property rights. The report, in recommendation number 21, proposes a somewhat vague and general limitation or exception to the rights and freedoms to be recognized in the Bill of Rights. We regard this limitation as unnecessary, and believe that it would prevent the courts from giving full and adequate effect to the provisions of the Bill of Rights itself.

However, despite our reservations we have, as I have already mentioned, found much to commend in the report of the joint committee. As the joint committee points out, its report was the result of extensive research, lengthy public hearings in all parts of Canada and the determined effort by the committee members to grapple with the constitutional problems of Canada. I share with the hon. member for Fundy-Royal the pleasure and pride of having been a part of that committee, the members of which worked together very well. I say it would be a tragedy if the report were to be ignored. I ask the government to take this opportunity to announce its intention with regard to this important report.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Hon. P. M. Mahoney (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with the motion I should like to accept, for a moment, the invitation, to discuss the over-all constitutional aspect. Certainly, the government does recognize the very valuable work and very valuable contribution made by the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, and the work of the members of all parties of both chambers on that committee. The federal government's position on this matter is that it is ready and willing to sit down with the provincial governments the moment there is something substantial forthcoming to discuss. I am sure we were as disappointed as anyone with the failure of the Victoria Charter to gain the support of all governments, something which had seemed so near a year ago. The initiative for the last round of federal-provincial constitutional conferences, of course, came from the provincial level, the impetus being provided by the Federation for Tomorrow Conference convened by the then Premier of Ontario, John Robarts.

It would appear appropriate that the initiative for the next series of meetings, if they are to be held, should come again from the provincial level because, certainly the federal government has done everything it could reasonably be expected to do in order to achieve agreement and has achieved agreement with a majority of provinces. However, it has seen that agreement eroded. The government of Saskatchewan did not, of course, concur in the Victoria Charter because of a change of government at that time and has been silent on the matter since then. The government of Quebec rejected the charter. Regrettably the government of Alberta, since a change of government there, appears to have rejected it and to have reversed a commitment made by the previous government there.

Speaking on behalf of the government in respect of the motion before us, I must object strongly to all aspects of the proposition contained in this motion. To begin with, I do not accept that the present state of federal-provincial relations is bad or that it has deteriorated. Rather it is one where governments are in close touch with each other on a wide range of matters, marked by vigorous efforts to co-ordinate actions and policies in an increasingly complex and inter-related world. Consultation and co-operation—and I will demonstrate that this is the rule rather than the exception—is what we are talking about. At the same time it is seen by the federal government and by most provincial governments that precisely what we are talking about is consultation and co-operation and not abdication of constitutional rights or responsibilities. The right to consult is not construed by either the federal or most provincial governments as a right of veto.

I should like to furnish hon. members with quotations from provincial budget speeches for the current year referring to examples of this co-operation. These extracts come from two provinces, one with a Progressive Conservative government and one with a New Democratic government. First, I quote from the budget statement of March 28, 1972 by the Hon. W. Darcy McKeough, Treasurer of the Province of Ontario. On page 12 of this document, we find the following:

> The Ontario government will introduce this year a property tax credit plan which relates the property tax burden borne by each taxpayer in Ontario to his ability to pay, as determined under the personal income tax system. For three years Ontario has pressed the federal government to incorporate a credit against property taxes within the basic income tax system. Now, the federal government has agreed to administer this plan beginning with the 1972 taxation year, and the Ontario government will finance it for the benefit of Ontario taxpayers. For this positive decision I sincerely thank the Minister of Finance. I would also like to commend the Department of National Revenue which worked closely with us to iron out the administrative and operational details of our property tax credit plan. This is an excellent example of how two levels of government can work together harmoniously.

Secondly, may I turn to the 1972 budget address of the Hon. Saul Cherniack, Minister of Finance of the Province of Manitoba. On page 18 of the published text of his address I find the following statement made with reference to the Manitoba education property tax plan:

We have received excellent co-operation from the federal government and I want to express my appreciation to the former and the present federal Ministers of Finance, to their staffs, and to the Minister and staff of the Department of National Revenue. This is an example of good federal-provincial co-operation which hopefully will continue and grow.

Mr. Speaker, these are only two examples of the numerous ways in which the governments of Canada and the provinces are co-operating with each other. I might give a brief, quantitative analysis to indicate the extent of this co-operation. In 1957, there were five committees of ministers between the federal and provincial governments, that is first ministers or other ministers and of their federal and provincial counterparts. There were 59 federal-provincial committees of officials, for a total of 64 ongoing groups of committees that were meeting on either an ad hoc or on a regular basis. By 1967, the number of ministerial committees had increased to 14, the number of official committees to 105, for a total of 119. By 1970, the number of committees of joint federal-provincial ministers had increased to 18; there were over 200 ongoing federal-provincial committees for a total of well over 220 ongoing committees. In 1967, there was a total of 13 ministerial meetings between federal and provincial officials, that is formal meetings of first ministers and other ministers, and 18 meetings of deputy ministers, for a total of 31. In 1971, there were 20 formal ministerial meetings and 22 deputy ministerial meetings. So in four years the meetings increased from 31 to 42, just as standing committee numbers had increased from 64 in 1957 to 119 in 1967, to over 220 by 1970.

Another method of federal-provincial consultation is, of course, the bilateral consultation in which the federal ministers and their officials consult with their counterparts in all or a majority of the provinces, depending on the interest in important individual subjects. I will give a brief resume of the more conspicuous of these over the last three or four years. The former Minister of Justice visited all provincial attorneys general and justice ministers during the constitutional review. He visited all provincial justice ministers or attorneys general on the subject of the Official Languages Act before it was carried through the House of Commons. The former Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs during that period had discussed security regulations with appropriate provincial ministers. The former Minister of Labour discussed the unemployment insurance legislation with all provincial governments before it was brought forward in the House.

The then Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources discussed the Canada Water Act with the appropriate provincial ministers. The Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) discussed the Clean Air Act similarly. The Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) on separate occasions discussed with the responsible provincial ministers the financing of post secondary education, telecommunications, and the summer employment programs introduced by the government so successfully. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) discussed the housing and urban renewal legislation. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) discussed the costs of health and post secondary education programs with the appropriate provincial ministers. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) discussed with the provincial agricultural ministers the agriculture stabilization legislation, and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) has just completed a round of meetings with provincial cabinet ministers on the subject of the takeover review legislation.

These examples are in addition to numerous private meetings between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and provincial first ministers as they visit Ottawa or between federal ministers and individual provincial ministers on matters of particular interest and concern to them. There are, of course, differences between governments, but it would be an extraordinary thing if this were not the case, having regard to the numerous ways in which the actions of one government can affect the others. The important thing is not that there are differences but that the governments are continually striving to settle these differences, that they are doing so in a spirit of goodwill and co-operation, and that they are succeeding in so many areas.

Mr. Speaker, I must assert that the federal government has not displayed intransigent attitudes or policies; rather, it has explicitly recognized that many of its actions do affect the provinces and has repeatedly sought their views before implementing its own proposals. I could cite many examples where we have consulted with the provinces and have modified legislation in order to take account of the views which we have received from the provinces. Perhaps the most important example in recent years has been the federal income tax reform legislation enacted late in 1971. In this case, as hon. members know, many of the changes which were incorporated in the final legislation were made to meet criticisms received from the provinces at numerous conferences relating to this subject over a span of some years.

Another important illustration is provided by the new federal-provincial fiscal arrangements legislation which was enacted by Parliament earlier this year following nearly two years of discussions with the provinces. These discussions were undertaken at various levels; with ministers looking at broad policies, senior officials examining such matters in depth, and other officials—in working groups or subcommittees—undertaking intensive studies of particular areas.

I should note that one of the problems which inevitably tends to arise in federal-provincial discussions is that different provinces have differing interests and hence frequently opposing views. This is natural in any federation as broad and diverse as the Canadian one. The federal program for equalizing provincial revenues provides one example of this type of situation. The federal government has found that most provinces try to look at matters such as this objectively, including those that derive direct benefits and those which do not. Nevertheless, differing viewpoints will emerge and it falls to the federal government to try to reconcile these and to set a course which will accord as closely as possible with the national interest. At times, this task of reconciliation of the interests of divergent regions can be a difficult one, and any national government which approached this in a spirit of intransigence would be foolish indeed.

Mr. Speaker, I should touch upon the reference in the resolution to unilateral decisions. In one sense, of course, decisions are taken unilaterally. Federal policies are implemented pursuant to federal statutes and these are enacted by the Canadian Parliament. Is this what this resolution means by unilateral? If so, it is being suggested that federal legislation should be enacted by some body other than Parliament? Or is it being suggested that Members of Parliament ignore regional needs when they vote upon an issue? If these viewpoints are being put forward, I must emphatically reject them.

Perhaps, however, the resolution is intended to imply that the federal government is taking unilateral decisions and then somehow forcing these through Parliament. Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept this interpretation. As I have just said, where provinces are affected by federal legislation, there is invariably an opportunity for them to make their views known. Usually this opportunity is provided both before and after legislation is introduced in Parliament. This government will continue to provide these opportunities. This government will not take decisions without ascertaining what provincial views are or without considering how they may best be taken into account. This government will never ignore the views or the needs of the provinces.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I come to the allegation that the federal government is not making enough funds available to the provinces. This is an argument which we frequently hear in Canada. It arises, no doubt, because of the rapid increase in needs for many of the services which are provided by provincial and municipal governments in Canada. Thus during the post war era there have been greatly expanded needs for elementary, secondary and post secondary education, for hospitals, for medical services, for pollution control and various other services which fall primarily to the provinces.

The provinces and municipalities have, in fact, enormously expanded their expenditures to meet these needs. Thus total provincial-municipal expenditures have increased from approximately $2.3 billion in 1951 to $5.4 billion in 1961 to $18.1 billion in 1971. At the same time, their share of total government expenditures has expanded markedly. On a national accounts basis, this share was just slightly over 40 per cent in 1951, increased to nearly 50 per cent in 1961 and reached approximately 60 per cent by 1971. The federal government has not stood in the way of the provinces and municipalities when they looked for funds to finance these rapidly growing expenditures. Rather the federal government has moved on a broad front to provide help. This has been done in many ways. First, the federal government has made tax room available to the provinces by repeated cuts in its own taxes during the past two decades. Thus during the postwar period the reduction in federal personal income tax to make room for the provinces was successively increased from a low of 5 per cent up to 28 per cent by 1967. This reduction was built into the reformed income tax system which went into effect this year. However, the provinces have been free for some years to impose personal income taxes at whatever rates they wished, and not only have we collected this fast growing tax for them but we have done so free of any charge. Other federal taxes have been reduced as well. The reduction in corporation income tax has been doubled from 5 per cent to 10 per cent, and the federal government has terminated its taxes in the field of death duties.

I should like to refer to the U.S. President's Advisory Committee on Intergovernmental Relations which, in a report to the President of the United States just last year, said that Canada's "tax sharing strengthens the fiscal capacity of the provinces within the Canadian federation" and that it has "gone a long way in reducing the general revenue imbalance."

Most of the remarkable gains chalked up by the provinces during the 1950's and 1960's can be attributed to the willingness of the federal policymakers to negotiate with provincial leadership, and the decision to share their prime revenue source with the provinces. Much of the expansion in provincial-municipal revenues has occurred during the period since 1963 when the Pearson government took office in Ottawa. In 1963 provincial-municipal revenues from taxation were $4.8 billion. By 1971 they had increased to $13 billion. That is a remarkable increase, and much greater than that experienced by the federal government itself.

Apart from tax reductions and tax collection services, the federal government has helped the provinces and municipalities through very large increases in transfer payments. These transfers have been of various kinds. Large sums have been transferred under shared cost programs. These programs have enabled the federal government to share approximately one half of the cost of financing those fields where expenditures have been escalating most rapidly, notably including post-secondary education, hospitals, medical care insurance and welfare. Many of these programs were started since 1963, including the Canada Assistance Plan, the post-secondary education program, and medical care insurance. In addition to these shared cost programs there have been various special expenditures or loan programs relating to pollution control, betterment of the environment, housing, and regional economic expansion. Many of these programs were started just in the past few years.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there have been large increases in unconditional transfers, particularly in equalization payments to provinces with below average tax capacity. The equalization program has provided a financial underpinning to seven provinces which are presently in this position and has enabled these provinces to provide their citizens with a level of expenditures closely similar to that of the higher income provinces at reasonably comparable rates of taxation. Expenditures under this program will be approximately $1.1 billion in the present fiscal year and will likely attain $1.5 billion by 1976-77, the last year of the current five year fiscal arrangements with the provinces.

Early this session Parliament passed this new legislation which establishes the over-all framework of fiscal relations between the federal and provincial governments over the next five year period. That act deals with a number of important matters, of which three are particularly relevant in this context. First, it is the basis for income tax sharing between the federal and provincial governments. Most importantly, it provides a basis for these two levels of government to co-ordinate their use of the personal income tax and corporation income tax fields without fixing limits or controls over the rates of tax which each level may impose, and it does this within a unified national tax system. Second, because any given level of taxation provides a greater fiscal yield in some provinces than others, the act provides for equalization payments from the federal government to provinces whose per capita revenue raising capacity is below that of the national average. Equalization payments were started specifically in 1957 and they have been progressively broadened since then. They now represent over 5 per cent of all federal revenues.

From the point of view of the receiving provinces the importance of equalization payments is evident when you know that for three provinces in 1971-72 equalization transfers were equal to between 13 per cent and 16 per cent of gross revenues. For two others the comparable figure was more than 33 per cent, and for the two poorest provinces equalization transfers were equal to 55 per cent and 66 per cent of revenues. Third, the legislation has a provision under which the federal government guarantees to make a grant to any province whose revenues fall below 100 per cent of those received in the immediately preceding year except to the extent that such a shortfall is caused by a reduction in provincial tax rates. While we hope that this will never be operative it is an important assurance against a sudden slump in revenues which might occur in a particular province. Between 1957 and 1969, provincial shares of total governmental revenue collections rose from 18 per cent to 33 per cent, whereas the federal proportion fell from 69 per cent to 52 per cent.

In addition, the federal government co-operates with the provinces in several shared cost programs, of which the largest are in the fields of health, welfare and post-secondary education. Others will deal with health and welfare, but in the case of post-secondary education the federal government transfers an amount generally equal to 50 per cent of virtually all post-secondary education operating expenditures. Last year the transfer totalled over $870 million. This year it is expected that it will total almost $1 billion. On a per capita basis, the amount transferred varies from one province to another, but the national average last year was $44 per capita.

I should again refer hon. members to the record of this government during the 1963 to 1971 period. In 1963, when the government assumed office, total transfers to the provinces and municipalities were running at a level of $1,169 million. By 1968 this had doubled to $2,452 million, and by 1971 it had nearly doubled again to $4,348 million. Mr. Speaker, does this suggest that this federal government has neglected the provinces? Does it suggest that we are insensitive to the well being and needs of their governments and of their populations?

I could cite other facts and make other points at some length. However, that is not necessary. The motion which is before us is barren and lacking in substance. It does not deserve the support of this House. I urge all hon. members to vote against it.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), has dealt quite exhaustively with the constitutional aspects of this motion. I propose to confine my remarks to the financial aspects so far as the provinces are concerned. I am impressed with that part of the motion which reads that the House regrets the government's:

> —refusal to meet legitimate needs of Canadian provinces, mainly through not making available to them the funds required for development, economic expansion and welfare of the population.

There is a reference to the refusal of the government to meet the legitimate needs of Canadian provinces. I am inclined to support the resolution because I come from one of the provinces where the need is great, a province that actually does need help from the federal government. The mover of this motion realizes that action must be taken to reduce the growing gap between the rich and the poor provinces of Canada.

• (1650)

I should like to take this opportunity to place on the record, as clearly and succinctly as I can, the severe economic situation facing the government and the people of my province. I do so in the hope that it may foster a desire on the part of the government of Canada to do something to relieve a very distressing problem immediately. I think it is generally realized that each region of this country must be accepted as an integral part of Canada and each region should be developed according to its special needs and its potential. This matter of reducing the gap between the rich and the poor provinces is a national problem and the major responsibility for solving it must rest with the federal government. That idea has been recognized by the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) who, in a speech on September 14, 1966, made the following statement:

> Where circumstances—whether natural or man-made—have channelled a larger-than-average share of the nation's wealth into certain sections of the country, there should be a redistribution of that wealth so that all provinces are able to provide to their citizens a reasonably comparable level of basic services, without resorting to unduly burdensome levels of taxation.

I think that statement sets out the situation very clearly and conveys the idea that there is a responsibility on the federal government to see that the poorer provinces of Canada are given a chance to maintain a standard of living for their citizens comparable to that of other provinces which are better off. This principle was also recognized by the Rowell-Sirois Commission which in 1940 recommended that:

The national adjustment grants be subject to review by an independent advisory commission every five years, and that this commission would recommend to the dominion an increase in the adjustment grant whenever a provincial government established that it could not supply Canadian average standards of service and balance its budget without taxation (provincial and municipal) appreciably exceeding the national average in relation to income.

I think these two statements set out very clearly the position in which the poorer provinces of Canada find themselves, and the responsibility of the federal government to help those provinces not in a position to help themselves. If that famous promise we heard prior to the last election of a just society is ever going to be anything more than a flimsy and meaningless promise, every citizen must have the right, first of all, to acquire an adequate income and, second, to enjoy those essential public services available in the richer provinces of this country. The federal government must be made to realize that the major burden of financing regional growth problems is its responsibility. Why must it be the federal government's responsibility? It is primarily because money is necessary to do this job and, unfortunately, the poorer provinces just do not have the money nor do they have the opportunity to raise it through taxation.

The hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney) has pointed out some of the grants that are made to the provinces. We recognize and appreciate them, but let us not lose sight of the fact that the federal government alone has access to the growth fields of taxation. The federal government imposes income tax; that is a growth field of taxation because it grows as the incomes of the people grow. The federal government had the right to succession duties until it abandoned that right, whereas the provinces and the municipalities within the provinces are limited to personal and real property taxes. These are not real growth fields, as the amount of money that can be derived from them is very limited. Since the federal government has access to growth fields of taxation, it should be providing the poorer provinces with the money required to ensure their citizens an adequate standard of living. In my province the average annual per capital income is away below the national average, so it is impossible to raise through taxation, the amount of money required to provide, in many cases, even the essential services of government. The unemployment rate is the second highest of any province in Canada.

A study of capital investment within the province will indicate its poor financial situation. I do not have up to date figures, but those I have show that from 1966 to 1969 capital investment decreased. In 1966, new investment stood at $56.9 million; in 1967, it dropped to $45.5 million, almost 20 per cent; in 1968, it dropped again to $43.9 million, a 3 per cent drop and in 1969, it dropped by 12 per cent. This indicates a steady decrease in capital investment within the province. Our business establishments are small and 75 per cent of firms have sales of less than half a million dollars a year. Perhaps the most important aspect of all, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that many of our young people who are just entering the productive years of their lives are leaving the province because they cannot find jobs. When the province entered Confederation in 1873 the population was 97,000 and today, 99 years later, it is 110,000. That is an increase of 13,000 people in 99 years or roughly 130 people per year.

Another very important fact is that of this population of 110,000, 13,347 or 17.93 per cent are 65 years of age and over and that is the highest percentage in any province in Canada. I may suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this group is beyond the productive years of their lives while young men and women are leaving in their most productive years. We rear and educate them at a cost of $23,000 per child. This is the figure issued by Statistics Canada. Just as they reach the age where they are able to contribute to the economy they have to leave for some other province or some other country in order to make a living. Our population is therefore, unfortunately, made up of a disproportionate percentage of the very young and the very old. We know that the very young and the very old, rather than contributing to the public treasury, are in some cases beneficiaries of government programs and are therefore drawing from the Treasury. This is one of the reasons we cannot raise sufficient money through the medium of taxation to provide our people with a reasonable standard of living.

I say that the gap between personal incomes earned in my province and those earned in Canada as a whole must be narrowed, and this can only be accomplished by the generation of income within my region. We must provide some means for generating income within the region itself. The logical way to do this, of course, is by bringing in industry. If industry is to settle in our province, it must be encouraged to do so by the federal government by way of subsidies and monetary assistance of that nature. Unfortunately, we are so situated that practically all the raw materials our industries require must be brought in at considerable cost. The finished product must be shipped out again at considerable cost. For that reason, industry in my province ordinarily has not been able to compete with industry located in the other parts of Canada where, possibly, raw material is available and from where the cost of shipping to the markets of the world is not as great as it is from my own province.

I know and appreciate that the federal government has given a considerable amount of assistance to my province through its famous development plan. That plan was traded for the construction of the causeway. It was originally planned that there would be a connecting link between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. This government saw fit to abandon that idea and it gave us in return its famous development plan. After careful analysis I can only conclude that the federal share of new money, and I am speaking about new money now, that is to be injected into the economy of our province by virtue of the plan is to be practically nil. The plan involves $725 million to be spent over a 15-year period. At least, the agreement calls for $725 million to be spent over a 15-year period. Of that $725 million, only $225 million is to be contributed by the government of Canada; that represents $225 million over a 15-year period, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that we should look at that $225 million, analyze what that money represents and see what is actually involved in this plan.

Of that $225 million, Mr. Speaker, $37 million is a loan from the federal government to the province, and that loan is repayable both as to principle and interest. That money must be deducted from the $225 million, which means that the federal government will be contributing $188 million. Prior to signing the agreement in 1968, Ottawa was contributing to the province by way of joint federal-provincial programs a total of $8.5 million per year. In any event, we would have obtained that $8.5 million a year. If Ottawa were to continue contributing $8.5 million per year, and presumably that contribution would have continued, then Ottawa, at the end of that time, would have contributed apart from the plan altogether 15 times $8.5 million, or $127.5 million. Mr. Speaker, that $127.5 million cannot be considered as new money, because it would have come to us in any event. We were getting those payments even before the plan was signed. So, from $188 million of new money we ought to deduct, I maintain, that $127.5 million. This reduces the federal government's contribution to $60.5 million.

We are told that approximately 400 people will be employed to administer the plan. Many of these have already been hired, at salaries ranging between $15,000 and $25,000 per year. Let us be conservative about the salaries these people will be paid and average those salaries at $10,000 per year. If 400 people are to be employed, according to the figures the government has given, and each of them will earn, say, $10,000 a year, over a 15-year period their salaries will amount to $60 million. So, we are actually reduced to $500,000 of new money that Ottawa will use in the implementation of the plan. The rest of the money, Mr. Speaker, is to be provided by the provincial government. I say very sincerely that the provincial government just will not be able to provide it. Where are we to get $500 million, the amount the province needs to put up if the plan is to be put into operation?

Today, our population stands at 110,000 people. The province's direct debt now is $110 million. That represents a direct debt of $1,000 for every man, woman and child residing in that province. Servicing this debt is costing us over $11 million per year. So, the first thing the provincial government must do, before implementing the development plan and before raising the $500 million it will need to raise, is pay $11 million to service the province's present debt. Mr. Speaker, our people just cannot afford to do this because, as I said before, opportunities for employment are not available to them. I seriously suggest if the government wants to do something truly beneficial for our province and other provinces which may be in a similar situation, it must encourage industry to come to our province and provide employment opportunities for our people. That is what we want, Mr. Speaker. If the federal government were to do this, it would be truly doing something to improve federal-provincial relations.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I consider it my duty to support today the motion which reads as follows:

That this House regrets the government's responsibility for the deterioration of federal-provincial relations as a result of its uncompromising attitudes and policies, its unilateral decisions and its refusal to meet legitimate needs of Canadian provinces, mainly through not making available to them the funds required for development, economic expansion and welfare of the population.

Mr. Speaker, here is a motion that affects a basic problem and a great truth. Canadian federalism has suffered great setbacks under the government headed by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). As a matter of fact, since he came to power four years ago, this government has continually trampled on a number of principles, namely co-operation, good will, consultation, that are absolutely necessary to insure sound and dynamic relationships between the Canadian confederation partners.

For example, let us take the 21st of June to show how to what extent these relations have deteriorated. In fact it is a sad picture given to the public reading these newspapers. In Le Devoir's edition of June 21, it was stated:

"The longshoremen cannot expect anything from Cournoyer", said Mr. Trudeau.

What interest would the Prime Minister of Canada have in "belittling", accusing and besmirching a Quebec minister belonging to his own party? Are such ridiculous accusations liable to promote good relations? Certainly not.

What qualifications does the Prime Minister of Canada have that allow him to assess the qualifications of the provincial minister?

Moreover, Quebec is not the only target of such charges. Let us remember what the Premier of British Columbia said. I will refrain from repeating such coarse words, which are not likely to promote good relations between the partners in our Canadian Confederation.

In Montréal-Matin's edition of June 21, an article signed by Joseph Bourdon, and another one on a different subject by a Mr. Clément Brown, illustrate the problem brought on by an uncompromising policy and unilateral decisions which disregard priorities and the administration of the provinces.

The Montréal-Matin issue of the same date carried an article entitled: "Pour reprendre le débat constitutionnel, la position du Québec devra être claire." (In order to resume the constitutional debate, Quebec's position will have to be stated clearly). In the mind of the right hon. Prime Minister, a clear position means perhaps one entirely in agreement with what he says, if not no dialogue is possible.

Some may say that it is not so, but I will remind them of the many unsuccessful constitutional conferences and especially of the last one in Victoria, which amounted simply to an exchange of threats. Le Devoir of the 21st of June gives details of a report by the Canadian Committee of the International Conference on Welfare, in which it is stated plainly that Canada's welfare policy is confusing because there is no co-ordination between the different levels of government concerning their social security programmes.

Page one carries an article on social security entitled: Marchand seeks to induce Munro and Castonguay to resume dialogue.

Good for Mr. Marchand!

But who broke off the dialogue? How? Why? In what context.

The Prime Minister taxed Mr. Cournoyer with inefficiency and in the event of a dispute between him and his provincial opposite number, for the sake of cutting a good figure, another minister will be sent to mend the fences.

Mr. Speaker, that is a woeful picture. If such conflicts do exist, it is not because federalism is not practicable, but merely because it is being administered by petty politicians, intoxicated with power, financial or otherwise, who force their paltry views on the community, without consultation.

Briefly, Ottawa is a rich centralizer and the provinces, Quebec among them, are poor autonomists.

The conflict has become particularly intense over the past decade. And it is always waged on the financial field.

The federal government never says to the provinces that he wants to invade the fields that come under their jurisdiction: ownership, civil rights, education, social security. It said that it is was purely a financial matter or rather a fiscal matter for nowadays, the government and the treasury are almost synonymous in our country. But if you hold the purse-string, you control everything.

In this fight, Mr. Speaker, which divides unwitting federal centralists and blind provincial autonomists who is the winner? Doubtless it is the central government, especially for the past four years under the Trudeau administration which moreover takes its own decisions, be it in the fields of taxation, social security, budget policy, etc. without any consultations with the Canadian provinces.

The federal government never wins, but it keeps scoring. The autonomists, on the other hand, never yield, but still they keep losing ground. At all events, the gap is widening between those two levels of government; federalism is being questioned and this is unfortunate.

Anyhow, Mr. Speaker, Canadians are concerned over this situation and are losing confidence in these theories. They mistrust both systems because they also have to cope with a financial problem. The constitution, red carpet wrangling or flies are not what people are living on. What they want is to live in peace and security within a progressive social system.

Mr. Speaker, I ask this question: Why are the many constitutional conferences never getting us anywhere? The answer is quite simple: Ottawa, which is quite rich, arrives loaded with money, while provinces are short of cash. It is easy to discuss at a conference when one is rich and loaded with money, but one is necessarily short of cash when one is poor.

Indeed, successive invasions have enriched the invader and improverished the provinces and this resulted in huge regional disparities which divide Canada as a puzzle. And it is really a problem for the government. It has set up the Department of Regional Economic Expansion with a view to eliminating those disparities. However today, after having made attempts and spent hundreds of million for several months, we are still in the same predicament. The Prime Minister said so recently in Victoriaville as well as the Minister of Economic Regional Expansion (Mr. Marchand) in Sherbrooke.

The entire country, Mr. Speaker, should now be called a designated area. In short, everybody and all levels of government are in debt and in a financial strait jacket. If it were untrue, there would not be any Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

• (1720)

The existence alone of such a department shows that there are financial problems at all levels of government from coast to coast.

Mr. Speaker, the provinces, the municipalities and the federal government—the great indebted and stubborn one, which is about to be crushed under its public debt—are held in check by that financial strait-jacket. That is why the federal government, like a monster, levies more and more taxes, further restricting provincial spending powers, which accounts for the financial unrest where the provinces find themselves. The Prime Minister of Canada himself, who is at the head of the most centralizing and most indebted government this country has known and who keeps on adding to his own arrogance by his die-hard attitude, is himself a victim of that strait-jacket.

What is the result of that? Mr. Trudeau—I say that because I firmly believe it—is the best ally of the enemies of Canada's unity and prosperity.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must remind the hon. member that whenever he is referring to a minister or to the Prime Minister, he must identify the latter by mentioning the official title instead of the person's name.

Mr. Fortin: I will not refer to that name anymore, Mr. Speaker, because I know it is a bad word for Canadians.

If they were rich, Quebec or the other provinces could approach the federal government or any interlocutor with a triumphal smile. It is in the field of artificial finance which is controlled by high finance, that centralization appears and develops. A people is born and can live where the financial field corresponds to facts. That is why we specifically blame this government for not having made available to the provinces enough credits to insure the development, economic growth and welfare of the people.

What is the basic problem in all provinces? Money! What is dealt with at all those federal-provincial or interprovincial conferences? The financial problem. What are we waiting for before checking the financial powers and having them serve the equal partners in Confederation?

In a word, we must suppress all causes of conflict in order to have Canada reach real social peace. Since the conflict lies at the taxation level, since it is through taxes that centralists get to their victims and create a situation that all provinces consider unacceptable, why not simply do away with that antiquated method the governments use to finance their administrations?

Instead of emptying the precariously lined purses of the citizens, why not simply draw credits from the huge production and resource potential of Canada?

I cannot build a road or a bridge, or implement this programme because Ottawa has monopolized all hands, materials and skills. Such a stupid statement is never heard, but people always say that such or such a province is delaying the implementation of such or such a project or programme because it has no money.

One never hears a shoe manufacturer say that he could not produce shoes because Ottawa or Quebec ate all available leather. However, the manufacturers say that they can no longer operate their plants because the products do not sell, because the citizens are short of money.

Therefore, let us give the federal government and the provinces the necessary power to finance themselves by means of new credits bases on the real Canadian production, in accordance with the needs of the Canadian people, whatever their language or their geographical location. This is the only solution. Why not leave Ottawa, Quebec and all other provinces carry out their administration within a clever system where cooperation and dialogue will replace arrogance and imposed muteness, and instruct the production system to provide the things that fall within their competence?

Unless we simply wish to see Canada destroyed some day we will indeed have to accept that solution. One of these days the partners in Confederation will have to get together and discuss their problems, that is their financial problems, instead of always hiding and by-passing it.

It will indeed be necessary for our leaders, at all levels, to decide jointly to surrender Canada to Canadians, in the mutual respect of their interests.

It will indeed be necessary for our leaders to find financial solutions to their financial problems, for they cannot go on indefinitely as they are doing now. There is a limit which cannot be exceeded: the taxpayers' ability to pay.

Mr. Speaker, there is no solution other than the interest-free financing formula as advocated by the Social Credit Party of Canada for dealing with the problem of government financing.

In any event, there is a limit to arrogance, and indeed exploitation. When there no longer is any dialogue, there is obviously a danger of rupture. Positive action becomes imperative.

Mr. Speaker, I would naturally have many more things to say but my time is limited. If we had a creditiste government in Ottawa, they would see to it that there be a balance between the issues of money or credit and the goods that exist to meet the needs. Instead of using these credit issues, they would distribute them in one lump sum to the provincial governments on the basis of their respective population leaving them free to spend them as they see fit within their own jurisdictions, according to their respective priorities.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we will soon have that creditiste government!

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, some time ago I saw an amusing cartoon showing a man in a rocking chair looking at television and his wife tapping him on the shoulder, saying "Have you recovered enough from the seven o'clock news to listen to the eleven o'clock news?"

From listening to the speeches of our friends here in the House and outside the House, you would think we are living in an unthinkable country where there is no progress, where things are worse today than they ever were. Really, it would seem to be economic and social slavery. To hear them, the situation is really tragic. They are what I call professional scarecrows, whose only function is frightening others, convinced that in so doing they are attracting them.

Mr. Valade: Cournoyer, Bourassa and Castonguay?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes.

Problems are systematically created, and minor incidents blown up to cause unrest.

In a sound federalist system, Mr. Speaker, there definitely is friction between the different parties. That does not apply only to the Canadian confederation. I was involved in a union movement before coming to the House and there was friction between unions and central councils, between central councils and federations, between federations and the confederation. There was conflict between men, just as there is between municipalities and provincial governments. In all systems, however close-knit, there is always that kind of friction.

The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) is shocked because the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) made a slight dig at the Minister of Labour of Quebec who had meddled in a problem which did not come under his jurisdiction. As Minister of Labour, he could very well have communicated with us, saying: "Listen, we in Quebec are concerned."

We are also Quebecers, Mr. Speaker, and the situation in the ports of Montreal, Quebec and Trois-Rivières, concerns me as it does my colleagues. However, had we made the least untimely remark, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) would have risen and said: By what right does the federal government interfere with the provincial jurisdiction? In my opinion, these are small incidents and to magnify them to such an extent is simply an attempt to cause a useless uneasiness.

In any case, Mr. Speaker, conditions are improving. They are not ideal, of course, but efforts are made every day to correct them. The government that will replace us—if this ever happens—will also try to improve the situation which, however, will never be perfect.

A resolution is dramatically introduced to the effect that federal-provincial relations are deteriorating, that the provinces are slowly dying, that they are exploited, that the federal government centralizes and monopolizes everything while the provinces have nothing. Where is the truth? The truth is that in 1948, I believe, the province of Quebec budget was $180 million as compared with $4 billion today. The Social Credit members who are always talking about the importance of money never mention constitutional problems. They talk only of tax problems, of money and gold. Well, since they keep talking about money problems, here is an eloquent case: A province whose budget was $180 million has one now that reaches $4 billion. On what authority can we conclude that it has less influence now than before?

Mr. Latulippe: The cost of living has been rising.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Of course, the cost of living has increased 30 times since 1948.

What happened to the federal budget during the same period? It has gone up from $4 billion to $12 billion—that is a fourfold increase—while the provincial budget has increased 25 or 30 times.

Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that problems do not exist, but I wonder for what reason people go to such lengths in order to create problems where there are none. Provinces are financially sounder than they ever were. One can do far more with $4 billion than with $180 million, even though the hon. member suggested a moment ago that the cost of living has increased.

I am willing to compare Quebec's financial situation today with what it was in 1948 and it will be realized that this province is far richer than it was. However, this does not mean that is has too much money.

An hon. Member: It has too little.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Of course, it has too little, and so have we. We should very much like to have more money. We could for instance implement guaranteed annual income.

Mr. Speaker, I love my province as much as those who criticize us and tell us: How mean you are! Why don't you give it more? It is as if the government of Quebec were not a full-fledged government which is autonomous within its jurisdiction and has the right to impose taxes in order to collect the needed revenues.

Mr. Latulippe: Why do the unions—

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand; in any case, this question should be addressed to the unions and not to me.

I am only replying to the main argument which states that the important thing is money. Let us give money to the provinces and the problems will disappear. We shall print and distribute the money. Production will be balanced, goods will be consumed and Confederation will work out!

We point out the facts and of course we receive no answer. We are told that the purchasing power must definitely be equal to the national production. And yet I do not know what they do with the newsprint which is sold outside when the market is stagnant. We shall have to go and give money to those people so that they can buy our newsprint. Otherwise, we will never succeed.

Mr. Speaker, the present government is accused of being centralist, not to care for the provinces. I shall give some very simple examples and I shall cite facts. I shall not deliver a speech that scares people.

For example, let's take the case of my department: this is a very simple one. Do you know how many agreements we settled with the provinces? We settled 45 agreements. These are formal agreements, conventions which are under my department's jurisdiction. Nothing is being made without consulting the provinces.

For all the "special areas", considerable amounts—

[Mr. Latulippe.]

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Or a dictatorship.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): If you have any facts to put before the House, then give those facts—but just facts. And stop screaming just because you don't like the facts.

Obviously, these 45 agreements have been negotiated.

For sure, we would not say: Ask for anything you want, we are going to bargain. If, for instance, a provincial government happens to decide that a road is needed to get to some friend's summer camp, our answer would be no; but in the matters under its jurisdiction, we would never implement anything without first asking the province for its consent.

I have here a list of the agreements entered into under ARDA. As the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) should know, we just signed one with Quebec and the other provinces. We came to an agreement with the Quebec government and we are going to contribute our full share.

In Quebec City, a "special area" has been designated some time ago. We have solved a good many problems without any trouble and the same thing happened in The Pas, following an agreement with the province of Manitoba. Everything went on very smoothly, and those same communities in which unemployment previously ran as high as 30 per cent, are today experiencing a shortage of manpower and workers are coming from other areas.

The same applies to ARDA, to the FRED programme for example, in the Gaspé area, where agreements are reached not only with Quebec but also with private associations. It is the same thing in New Brunswick, where we are about to negociate an agreement with respect to the northeastern area. Then, what is this business about taxation and centralization by the federal government? On the contrary, we are always trying to decentralize.

If the honourable member read a little, if he were better informed, then he would make better speeches. He says for instance that the constitutional conference was a failure because it was a matter of money. I should like to mention to the hon. member that I was in Victoria and that if it was a failure it was not for reasons of money but of jurisdiction in the field of family allowances. If you want to bring out the matter of money, then money do it always in the same manner, otherwise it is ridiculous.

Therefore, there are not only problems of money but also of jurisdiction. Immediately following the Victoria conference, we entered into negotiations with Quebec and the other provinces. Clearly hon. members opposite are not aware of this, and besides, they are not interested. In fact, it is much more simple to speak about distributing money but we have actively negotiated at the official level and the departmental level with a view to finding a formula agreeable to both parties, because the country should be taken as it is.

How is it that social security has been centralized in Ottawa? It is because the provinces have made no progress in this field.

Mr. Latulippe: They had no money!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Perhaps they had no money! They only had to raise taxes!

Mr. Latulippe: But they had no money!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): They only had to raise taxes. Anyway, that is what happened.

In 1927 perhaps Mr. Taschereau might have raised taxes and granted old age security pensions. But there was a problem: Quebec did not want to be the only province paying those pensions since it would have been placed in a situation of economic inferiority.

When a problem arises we try to reconcile jurisdictions and reach and agreement on many issues. Obviously disagreements will arise. And of course each time this happens the doom and gloom prophets start spreading the word that the country is about to fall apart and that Ottawa is arrogant. What I say is true because it is published everywhere.

Who is mentioning the 45 agreements we have negotiated with the provinces and which are operating perfectly well? Who mentions them? I never heard the social credit members voice their approval. They do not mention them at all but they say: You are doing nothing since there is no money for the provinces.

I will quote a few examples. First, we have negotiated special agreements which provided the provinces with $108 million in 1970-71; $85 million in 1971-72 and $120 million in 1972-73.

We also entered into agreements concerning road and highway construction, for which we gave four grants of $14 million, $31 million, $36 million, and $37 million respectively. Under the FRED agreement, we granted $22 million, $36 million, $54 million, and $67 million. Under the ARDA program, we granted $25 million, $20 million, $16 million, and $39 million successively. The total of grants made, which was $63 million in 1969-70, rose to $264 million, and the department for which I am responsible, which had a budget of some $100 million only four years ago, will soon have one of $500 million.

This may not be enough, but let not people come and say that nothing is done, that the federal government is not concerned with the problems of underdeveloped areas. Maybe we should do more, and ask the wealthier provinces for more, but let nobody say that no serious effort is made, everyday, in order to try and ensure a better balance in this country's economy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would also like people to learn the meaning of words. When people talk about eliminating regional disparities, this is a bit of an exaggeration, as the objective has never been to eliminate them, but rather to lessen them so that life may be tolerable in all areas of Canada.

Some people may prefer to live in Prince Edward Island, in Newfoundland, or in Nova Scotia, at the Strait of Canso, rather than live in Montreal or Toronto. This is feasible, provided those people have enough to live there, and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion certainly does not aim at having people in the Strait of Canso or in Newfoundland earn as much as people in Toronto. We know this would be neither logical nor feasible. But we want those people, if they decide to live in Prince Edward Island, in Newfoundland, in Nova Scotia, or in New Brunswick, to be able to earn a decent living.

There will always be disparities. Why do people come and say to us: You said you would eliminate disparities but there are more now than ever. This is the main criticism levelled at us. I shall reply in this way but where are they? They do not even bother to provide figures. They should get some information and quote, for such and such region, the unemployment rate compared to the average rate in Canada, stating that it has increased. But those who criticize us cannot provide any figures, even though we pay them a certain amount for their research. If they did some research, they could make speeches which are more than just demagogic exploitation.

Certainly there are problems. There are serious problems in the Lac Saint-Jean area, where the sponsor of this motion comes from. This area has been designated as a "special area", in an effort to attract some business to get established there, and I hope that one of these days our efforts will be successful.

An hon. Member: They want to designate the whole country.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): You see, they talk nonsense. To designate the whole country would of course mean to eliminate everything, for everyone would be on an equal footing, whereas now, a few achievements are still made, even though they are not mentioned very often.

The mayor of St. John's came into my office the other day. He wanted me to go to St. John's because the citizens were so happy about the achievements of my department that they would like to welcome me in their city, and I shall go there. By the way, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) was there.

Now, the hon. member for Lotbinière,—who is smiling because that is probably the only thing he can do—whose riding is not far from Quebec City, will go and see what has been done there, in Place Royale and about Saint-Charles River. He will go and see our achievements as regards water sewage, and parking problem, as well as in the area of tourism. He will go and see as well what we did in the seminary of Quebec City. Just open your eyes and look, and then you may wonder what you could do in our place.

Mr. Speaker, since I am in the government, I expect to be criticized, to make mistakes, which is normal. And I believe that it is the role of the opposition to indicate the mistakes, the weaknesses, to propose new solutions.

The other day, I read in Le Droit the report of an interview given by the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). He was speaking about the relations between the provinces and Ottawa. He thought the Prime Minister was much too rigid, much too inflexible and said: Naturally, there are things which will need to be arranged. It is necessary for us to get together. Obviously everything cannot be given up. But on the whole, I would wish there would be a compromise.

You read that and say: What has he proposed? Nothing at all. He simply said that the Prime Minister was inflexible. Quite the contrary, he is very flexible. It is only necessary to realize the evolution of the discussions, the constitutional debates, to see to what extent the federal government went in order to reach agreements with the provinces.

So, Mr. Speaker, the fields in which there are agreements with the provinces are really many. In spite of all that is said, the provinces are growing stronger and richer, and the same goes for the Canadian people. That does not mean that all is perfect, that there is no unemployment. It is generally known that some go to remote rural areas where they spread rumours: I know, because I have been there after them.

Some people say: in my time, butter cost 25 cents a pount, I myself have known those conditions. We froze in winter, and had to break the ice in the morning to be able to wash up a bit; at night time, we used coal oil lamps. I am sorry, I cannot agree, as I must say that life is now considerably more pleasant than it was 50 years ago. The unemployed suffer less; our welfare system, although not perfect, is obviously superior to the one we had at that time. People are not driven to public begging as they used to be, which does not mean that there is no more destitution, but it is not as serious as the professional scarecrows would like to make us believe.

The motion deals with federal-provincial relations. If we continue to act as we have so far, I am convinced that our federation will operate very well. There will be some conflicts among individuals, whichever federal government is in power. Indeed, some people always interfere with other people's business, but they are told to remain quiet. It is not tragic!

If we had to note all the silly things which are said especially in the province of Quebec by those who protest most strongly, namely the movers of that resolution, we would be surprised! Some people will say: We cannot live side by side, we will go at each other's throat. If we are looking for a speeches stuffed with viciousness and aggressivity, we have only to refer to those delivered by members of the Social Credit Party. Indeed they are the ones who are saying: Dear me, the Prime Minister is so rude; he has been a little rough with the provinces.

Come now, Mr. Speaker, let us be a little more responsible: he is just a man and as such he may knock things over, sometimes.

But on the whole, the provinces can stand on their own two feet. Ontario, British Columbia and Quebec can to stand on their own feet. Hitches are liable to occur, but experience shows that we are civilized enough to live side by side, to pursue common goals and turn our country, not into a paradise, but into the happy place which Social Crediters would never even think of leaving.

• (1750)

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I was particularly anxious to take part in today's debate on the motion introduced by the Social Credit Party. This motion, as the minister put it, is not entirely right, but it does enable several members to show both sides of the story.

The spokesmen for the party which has moved the motion have applied themselves to saying that this government has not done anything. It is truly stupid to state that someone does not do anything. You either do well or badly, but you do something. So, to say that they have made no efforts and assert, for instance, that the situation is worse than it was 30 years ago is hard to believe.

I was very much interested by the remarks of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), who spoke about various agreements reached with the co-operation of the provinces and which are directly related to his department. In that respect, one has nevertheless to admit, objectively, that such agreements have had interesting and beneficial effects on the other provinces and not only on Quebec which had its share, and for that I am glad.

In other areas, the government has also concluded agreements, implemented programs, or handed out to the provinces considerable amounts of money which enabled them to carry out various projects.

These efforts are by no means sufficient. But to say that nothing has been done is hard to justify. In my opinion, the government should be required to do more, and reminded that they must not limit themselves to what has been achieved these past four years. I admit generally that efforts have been made but that it is still not enough.

This motion which nevertheless I think is interesting because it gives us a chance to express our views, brings us back to a very popular topic, namely federal-provincial relations.

It is clear that in the beginning, the Constitution which is directly related to these relationships, was certainly valuable. All hon. members admit that at that time it was apparently an interesting solution. Since then, it has been amended several times. We must recognize that in the last 100 years, some provinces have made greater progress than others depending on circumstances. This is a fact that always prompts the federal government to analyze the feasibility of amending the Constitution periodically, taking into account the changes that occur in every province. Progress having been greater in some provinces than in others, those provinces became stronger and asked for certain powers that others do not want at this time.

There are different viewpoints all across this country. We should acknowledge that Quebec has been recognized as the home of the French-Canadian nation, a fact which differentiates this province markedly from the others.

We are dealing with federal-provincial relations. I was listening to the minister of Regional Economic Expansion who particularly urged hon. members to make an effort and tell the truth. He was perfectly right.

I admit my special interest in the Quebec problem, just as other hon. members will be inclined to describe the problems and achievements of the provinces they represent.

With regard to federal-provincial relations, I must say that every member would benefit from reading over again the briefs submitted in the last ten years to the federal-provincial conferences.

Instead of suggesting that these federal-provincial conferences are not so meaningful, I think that they should be more frequent because, in my opinion, this is how the premiers of the provinces will get to know each other better and will accept more readily some changes suggested by the federal government.

But, with regard to Quebec—must we repeat it a thousand times—in the briefs submitted by four different governments, the same consistent thinking appears with the request for transfer of certain powers made the federal government.

As a Quebecer, I recognize that my first duty is to answer the requests made by the government of my province. I think that these justifiable requests of Quebec would not adversely affect the building of our country, Canada.

Of course, the reluctance shown by federal governments—and I am not indicting only this government—about the requests made by some provinces, Quebec especially—in view of its particularities—has produced, whether you like or not, an independentist party in Quebec.

These things must be said. I mention them because I think that it is important that all hon. members be well informed about Quebec.

It has been said over again that the Parti Québécois only had 7 members elected, but it is giving improper information to the House when you limit yourself to such a statement.

I believe that we should not conceal the truth but openly say that this party has nevertheless won 23 per cent of the popular vote in Quebec in the last election. And that percentage was increased on the occasion of two by-elections a few months later.

To claim that the Parti Québécois in Quebec is unimportant is to be dishonest. To admit that that party could become the official opposition if there is reluctance in meeting certain demands from Quebec, I believe is conceivable.

But such a drive can be slowed down. We should seriously consider the possibility of responding in a positive way to the requests of the present Quebec government, which are the same as those expressed by the three previous provincial governments.

I should like special consideration to be given to the requests from the Quebec minister of Social Affairs who spent ten years devising a plan geared to the future of Quebeckers in a Canadian context. As Quebec representatives, it is our duty to see to it that the Federal government accepts to grant the powers Quebec claims because the Quebeckers future will be conditioned by them.

I was surprised to learn recently that the Federal-Provincial affairs Secretariat had been abolished. As if those federal or provincial problems did not exist anymore. We need a permanent secretariat more and more if those negotiations are to be permanent also. How can federal-provincial relations be improved if we deprive ourselves of a somewhat experienced body that allowed us to maintain regular relations?

Not long ago, Mr. Chairman, considering the present circumstances where certain assertions can be heard either in Quebec or in Ottawa, I had hoped for regular meetings to take place between both groups of Quebec members at the federal as well as the provincial level.

I realize that this suggestion was ratified right away by the Quebec Chamber of Commerce which in a resolution, asked Mr. Bourassa to set up consulting machinery in order to prevent statements such as those which we have heard recently, from causing clashes and engendering a climate where bargaining would become more and more difficult. And I also realize that the Quebec premier yesterday replied positively to the resolution to the effect that it is essential to increase machinery for consultation with Ottawa in order to avoid useless tensions within federalism. For the last three weeks, we have heard such statements, an undeniable proof that some concern exists about the present federalism.

Instead of condemning federalism and being satisfied with criticizing without providing any solution, I should rather urge hon. members to earnestly consider those problems and try to cooperate in finding consulting machinery that would alleviate such clashes and in due course help Quebec members in this House as well as in the Quebec legislature recognize their respective responsibilities and cooperate with a view to ensure that the province of Quebec has a fair, valid and worthwhile representation, which, finally, would benefit the whole country.

Mr. Speaker, I do hope that this debate on federal-provincial relations will result in positive suggestions for the good of all Canadian people.

I note that it is six o'clock and, since my time has not expired, I shall resume my remarks at eight o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair. The House will resume at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the economic problems have priority everywhere in this country.

The motion we are now studying deals with federal-provincial matters and is closely related to these problems. We talk about regional disparities and we try through every means to eliminate them. I also acknowledge that the problem of economic stability is the most important issue if we look at it from the international point of view.

Perhaps we should remember that in the present economic situation, we should not forget that in the province of Quebec the economic problems are very important and of a constitutional nature.

As far as the people of Quebec are concerned, it is impossible not to give very serious consideration to constitutional problems and difficulties. It does not mean that people in Quebec do not wish for economic stability enabling them to have as high a standard of living as anywhere else, but in view of the objectives of the population, we must also consider constitutional changes. This particular situation is not looked upon in the same way by other provinces for other reasons and this is clearly understandable, as we admitted for that matter.

This does not mean that in the last four years Quebec has not received considerable amounts of money under agreements with Ottawa, for the implementation of cost-sharing programs. In my opinion, Quebec has received its share in the last four years. It has received interesting amounts of money, but that is not enough, and I do not believe that mere hand-outs of money would meet the expectations of the province of Quebec.

I would like to call your attention especially on those federal-provincial relations directly connected with constitutional matters, for I know perfectly well that Quebec is after major amendments, namely that certain powers be given back to her. Just how much power is the federal government prepared to yield? I also know that some other provinces have indicated and given notice to Ottawa of their intention of asking that some powers, perhaps not at all the same ones and for reasons different from ours, be handed back to them.

I think it is very important that we give special consideration to those claims. I said it before, there is a special situation existing in Quebec where people are losing confidence in federalism as we have it today. I am not suggesting that the majority of the people in Quebec have no more faith in our kind of federalism; that is not what I meant. But I think that a large percentage should make us consider seriously the possibility of transferring some powers to the province of Quebec and answering favourably the requests made during federal provincial conferences.

I bring this problem before the House because I feel it is extremely important. It does seem that the premier of Quebec has recently confirmed his intention of resuming negociations. It seem obvious that, as far as Quebec is concerned, this is an urgent issue and it would be a serious mistake to deal with it simply by offering money.

The reason for this is a particular situation, a people who, for very valid reasons wishes to obtain certain constitutional guarantees.

However I must admit, as I said earlier that certain amounts of money have been paid to Quebec in the last four years, which pleases me greatly. In fact on several occasions, I have had the opportunity to support programs which enabled Quebec to get that money, but once again I am sorry that there has not been more constitutional progress.

And the poor achievements in the field of constitutionnal amendments have generated a good deal of concern in Quebec and allowed a party advocating secession of the province to progress in spite of what is being said.

I believe that the government's reluctance on the subject of constitutionnal amendments are concerned has been a great help to a party which wants the province to separate.

On the other hand, I am convinced that had the federal government reacted more favourably to the minimum requests made by some ministers during the past few years, the province of Quebec would have had evidence that it is possible in this great country, to be considered as one of the founding nations and be assured of an existence in keeping with its aspirations and wishes.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding my remarks, I would like this House to seriously ponder over what I have said about federal-provincial relations. I believe it is still possible for the province of Quebec to hold an interesting position in Canada but we should put an end to this current procrastinating.

I believe that unanimous agreement will develop among our French-speaking members whose duty it is to keep the country informed about Quebec problems, about the requests that have been coming from this province during the last ten years, and to explain the reasons they should be dealt with favourably. In so doing, I am under the clear impression that we will meet the wishes of a province without hurting the others.

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit Party today blames the federal government for the deterioration of federal-provincial relations.

That judgment seems to me much too hasty and summary, for it simply is the echo of a whole series of statements by Quebeckers who want at any rate the federal-provincial relations to be bad.

There are in this respect prejudices and myths which of necessity must be destroyed. I think that the Créditistes are falling into the trap by presenting that motion today.

It is false to suggest that this govrnment is centralizing more than any other preceding government, but I think that that is exactly what the separatists would nevertheless lead us to believe.

I would not have been surprised to hear the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) take part in the debate. I was not surprised either to see the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) who, like the hon. member for Champlain shows certain separatist tendencies, intervene in this debate. But I have been really disappointed to hear the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), who seems to me a serious and level-headed man, move such a motion.

One wonders who is to blame if federal-provincial relations are not as good as we would wish them to be. I have always thought that there were two sides to the medal and I am amazed to note that the Social Credit party of Canada, which is a federalist party, does not realize at all that a host of factors constantly complicate matters and are perhaps, more than the federal government, at the cause of the deterioration of federal-provincial relations.

First, we should not forget that Messrs. Jacques Parizeau and Claude Morin have been advising the government of Quebec for the last few years and have taken an active part in various constitutional conferences. These men are today members of the Parti Québécois and they openly advocate Quebec's independence. They have ceased to be public servants because they have realized they would not, in their official capacity, attain their objective, that is Quebec's independence. In other words, I do not think that Messrs. Parizeau and Morin have turned separatists because negotiations between Quebec and Ottawa have worn thin. I believe they were separatists even before these nogotiations had started. They have spread confusion all along during the negotiations and, as far as they are concerned, successful negotiations necessarily meant that they should snatch away the whole bite from Ottawa.

Reference was made this afternoon, and the papers have also repeatedly taken up the subject, of a social file that has remained unchanged under the last four provincial parliaments. But let us realize one thing: that this social file of Quebec has been prepared by Mr. Morin himself. Of course, he has always put this file forward at every constitutional conference he has attended.

That is why the picture remains unchanged.

Yet I believe they are forgetting an important aspect of the problem. The situation has changed over the years as a result of agreements apt to be forgotten. For instance, the problem of adult education has been dealt with. The famous problem of universities was also settled in 1966. The situation therefore has changed and it is misleading to claim that it has not.

In the second place, I should like to say that deterioration of federal-provincial relations also takes the form of sensational statements made by some provincial ministers. Of course, some politicians here in Ottawa are guilty of the same. But they do not have the monopoly. How often, over the past years, have we seen provincial politicians, Quebec politicians, unable to resist the temptation of making sensational statements to hit the headlines every time they were confronted with a microphone or a television camera.

In the third place, it should also be said that journalists, whether eager for sensationalism or fanatics of independence for Quebec, have left no stone unturned to blow up any conflicts arising between the federal government and the provinces. In certain quarters, it has come to the point of believing one acquires importance by ranting at Ottawa. That is how Quebec Minister of Agriculture Normand Toupin, according to some journalists, became overnight one of the major ministers of the Bourassa cabinet, just for having attacked the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, I know some excellent Quebec ministers who play, within their departments and respective fields, an extremely important role and yet who do not make headlines in the newspapers. I consider them important ministers in Mr. Bourassa's cabinet, even though they do not give hell to Ottawa, even though the separatist parliamentary reporters at the national assembly overlook them in their articles.

Fourthly, we must not forget, when we speak of federal-provincial relations, that one of the main causes of their deterioration is the activity of the Parti Québécois which make unending efforts to bring the people to believe that everything is going badly. It reminds me of the wellknown French saying according to which lies always leave a trace.

Fifthly, I am also thinking of those wet blankets, François—Albert Angers and Jacques-Yvan Morin who for over a year have been carrying on an underhand fight in university circles and the media to make us believe that we have come to a complete deadlock as far as federal-provincial relations are concerned. Jacques-Yvan Morin is so obsessed by the idea that he has written a book on the Victoria charter saying that it was absolutely essential that Ottawa should not bring out again that famous charter, which would be awful.

Those are, Mr. Speaker, five essential factors which must be taken into account when the record of federal-provincial relations is analyzed. It is unfair to blame this government as being responsible for the deterioration of federal-provincial relations. If it is responsible, you may be sure that it is not the only culprit.

The motion introduced today by the Social Credit states that the federal-provincial relations have deteriorated, especially as a result of the uncompromising attitudes and policies of the federal government. Let us give this a closer look.

First, it is wrong to claim that the Prime Minister is inflexible in the constitutional field. No Canadian Prime Minister has taken the constitutional reform more seriously than he does. Let us remember what has happened. This started with a meeting proposed by the Premiers of Quebec and Ontario, Messrs. Johnson and Robarts, who decided to open the constitutional case. A beautiful conference, full of nice speeches, was therefore held in Toronto.

I suggest, though, that it was the federal government which afterward worked hardest in order to achieve all the original objectives. This government has published, between 1968 and 1970, a series of nine documents covering all the aspects of the constitutional review. In these papers, it clearly stated its position; it stated publicly—what many other governments have not done—what powers it meant to keep as well as the reasons why it wanted to keep them. Neither did he fear to state publicly that he was ready for concessions and to say in which fields he was willing to make them. This is certainly not inflexibility, quite the contrary.

Must I remind hon. members and particularly those of the Social Credit party that despite everything that was said, the Victoria charter had been drafted to accommodate the provinces, Quebec especially. This charter did not intend to give any additional power to the federal government. On the contrary, the federal government had its powers restricted.

As for inflexibility it is mainly displayed by those who think that Ottawa must definitely say yes to all Quebec proposals, otherwise it does not understand anything. And these same persons think that Quebec must flatly refuse all Ottawa proposals, otherwise it disgraces itself and betrays Quebecers.

• (2030)

Do the people who want Ottawa to always agree Quebec also believe that Ottawa should always comply with the requests of the other provinces, particularly when the government of British Columbia asks the federal government to stop its equalization payments?

Mr. Speaker, there is another factor affecting the Province of Quebec especially to which I should like to refer. This is the intransigent attitude adopted several months ago by the newspaper Le Devoir and more particularly by its publisher Mr. Claude Ryan. I have much respect for this man who is certainly one of the most educated minds among Quebec journalists but I do not think that he is fulfilling his role as neutral observer and an enlightened advisor. I do not think that this thinking newspaper is presently playing the role that it could in the Province of Quebec. In my view, this newspaper and its publisher have definitely and deliberately joined the group of those who think that Ottawa is set on saying no to Quebec. They systematically omit to see the federal government's attempts at conciliation for what they are worth, and they even completely ignore any concessions that Ottawa may have made.

Since I am led to mention Mr. Claude Ryan in this House again, I would like to take this opportunity to say that I may have spoken too harshly about him before, during the October 1970 crisis. I think he found himself at that time at the centre of a regrettable controversy which did not do him justice. I hope that my remarks of today will open his eyes and make him realize that there may be people in Ottawa who are not as intransigent as he thinks. I simply ask him to be a little less intransigent himself, and to consider and recognize that this government has shown great flexibility in its negotiations with the province of Quebec in several areas in which observers had said it would be impossible to come to an agreement.

I am thinking particularly of agreements entered into with Quebec concerning international conferences, immigration, and the development plan for the National Capital area, which includes Hull. In other sectors, particularly those of farm products marketing and of taxation, the government invited the provinces to make any suggestions which they thought useful, and later made numerous and substantial amendments in each case, taking their views into account.

I therefore ask Mr. Ryan and all other Quebecers who have some respect for the Canadian experience to reconsider the offer which the Prime Minister made to his counterpart in Quebec in his letter of March 9 last concerning family allowances. This offer represents a major initiative in the field of federal-provincial relations. For the first time, it will be possible for a program established, financed and administered by the federal government to be changed by the law of a province, even if the latter's financial contribution is minimal compared with that of the federal government. This solution provides the provinces with the right to amend the federal plan to meet their individual requirements. It also enables provinces to implement built-in family allowance systems, without disregard for national standards and without jeopardizing the federal function of redistribution. Thus, the citizens' fundamental interests and those of the two levels of government are served this way.

I would also like to see greater interest in the Prime Minister's offer that the principles governing an arrangement over family allowances be extended to other social programs within the framework of a constitutional agreement.

If such principles were entrenched in a new Constitution, Quebec would be provided with the guarantee it is seeking. It is unfortunate and indeed regrettable that the Quebec Government has not as yet given a positive answer to the suggestion made by the Prime Minister of Canada.

Let us consider that suggestion a little more closely. Let the Social Credit Party consider this suggestion more closely. They will then realize that the federal government is far from being inflexible. Let us examine together, for a few minutes, all the concessions and changes made in respect of the federal Family Allowances Act and we will realize that the federal government has shown a great deal of flexibility in its dealings with the Quebec claims.

Quebec said: provincial legislation should have precedence in matters of social policy; the choice given to the provinces, according to the federal bill, will enable them to revamp the system so it will comply with the social priorities of the provinces.

Quebec said: the provinces should control the development of social policy, if not its administration. The choice given the provinces enables them to adjust the system to their own social policies.

Quebec said: the Constitution should provide a permanent guarantee of provincial priority in the field of social policy. The letter forwarded to Mr. Bourassa shows that we are ready to include such guarantees in a revised constitution.

Quebec said: the benefits provided for in the plan and the minimum income should escalate with the increase in prices and wages. The federal bill provides for the periodical readjustment of the maximums and the benefits, by means of Orders in Council, in keeping with the changes in price and wage levels.

Thus, some fifteen suggestions have been made which have been dealt with by the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, these are some instances which clearly show that we are not as inflexible as some people would have us. In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would also like to say that federal-provincial relations could be improved. I think they could be better and that it is possible, amongst men of good will, to agree and, in particular, to find a solution to the Quebec problem.

I am in complete agreement with Mr. Castonguay when he says:

"The coherences needed to govern Quebec are not inconsistent with the coherences required to govern Canada."

When Mr. Castonguay says:

We fight for the right to establish our own priorities—

I reply: "You are right, and the federal government, far from refusing to recognize your claims, is ready to entertain them. Therefore, let us try to agree. This is what the people of Quebec, in particular, want and this is what the federal government is ready to do to better serve the citizens we represent at our respective levels."

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of the motion which was introduced in the House today in order to call our attention to the problems which exist in federal-provincial relations, namely the trouble we have to agree on constitutional matters.

It gives me great pleasure to have the floor after having heard the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) standing up for his government by saying that it is not being obstinate, that everything is rosy and that we have in the prime minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) the most flexible man in the world.

Mr. Speaker, if this government is so flexible, how do you explain the stiffness of the press release following the constitutional conference held in Victoria on June 14 and 16, 1971?

I would like to refer the House to paragraph 2 of the conclusions which appeared in release jointly published and which probably came from the thinkers on constitutional matters of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I quote paragraph 2:

> If the Charter that must be considered as a whole is accepted and that this fact is made known to the secretary of the constitutional conference on Monday June 28th 1971 at the latest, governments will recommend the Charter to their legislatures and, in the case of the federal government, to both Houses of the Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, we had said that the provincial government has been given exactly 11 days to submit all of the foreseen constitutional amendments which included the formula itself and we told the provinces: "This is the subtlety and flexibility of the Prime Minister". It is that subtlety and flexibility that the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) has just told us about.

The Prime Minister of Canada and his team told the provinces that they were giving them a mere 11 days to accept definitely a charter which would bind them all to conditions that they could not accept at that time. They needed time to try and decipher this whole muddle contained in the conditions discussed at the constitutional conference.

If this is what the hon. member for Papineau calls flexibility, I tell him that he cannot read and that he easily confuses flexibility with rigidity and arrogance.

Mr. Speaker, the main reason why the Victoria conference was a failure is that the provincial governments were denied the time to assess and give mature deliberation to the terms of the proposals made at this conference. I say that under these circumstances, it was certainly not flexibility or comprehension but rather arrogance and rigidity, which have led to the confrontation which we are now facing.

Mr. Speaker, the motion now before us not only deserves the support of hon. members but also of the whole population.

Its terms are wide enough in scope that they can encompass a wide range of opinions. This is why the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) engaged in a flight of oratory that was far more emotional than responsible. For 20 minutes, he beat his chest like a buddha and congratulated himself for his so-called administrative achievements, since no one else would do it for him. And like Archimedes he exclaimed, Eureka, I have discovered the principle of the lever. As if the minister had just discovered electric light!

Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion has attempted to persuade us this afternoon of the favours he has done to designated areas by giving millions of dollars. He has obviously omitted to say that these hundreds of millions come from the taxpayer's pocket and not from the present government, and that moreover, these grants became necessary because of the irresponsible economic policies of his government which brought about an unprecedented level of unemployment in the designated areas.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the minister's argument is extremely faulty and is an insult to the provinces, and to the province of Quebec in particular, because I want the minister and his colleagues to know that a constitution is not bought, that it is negotiated in good faith with understanding and in the required spirit of conciliation.

This afternoon, the hon. minister spoke of "verbal stupidities" and on this matter, Mr. Speaker, I would advise him to reread his own statements made in the House and elsewhere during the October crisis and he would find there the true definition of "verbal stupidities". He is not much more deserving than those of his friends he was accusing this afternoon.

The hon. minister accuses those who are concerned about real problems in Canada of being "scarecrows and prophets of gloom" to quote his own words.

Mr. Béchard: It is true.

Mr. Valade: If it is true as the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine says, according to the minister, Mr. Bourassa, Mr. Castonguay and Mr. L'Allier, who are all members of the Liberal government of Quebec are "prophets of gloom and alarmists" because they are the ones who have been complaining for many months, if not many years, about the obstinacy of the Liberal government and of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion's attitude.

If such is the case, Mr. Speaker, if the words of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion must be taken as a serious statement, I say that the minister will have an obligation in the next provincial elections in Quebec to commit itself to fight officially and openly against the government of Mr. Bourassa, or else we shall consider the words he said this afternoon as nonsense and proof of his irresponsibility.

If such is the case, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ouellet: Phoney!

Mr. Valade: Are you finished belching? If you are sick, retire.

An hon. Member: You started it.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should very much like to receive advice from a well-behaved person but if I read the things that the Prime Minister has said about Mr. Cournoyer a few days ago, I have no lessons in politeness to receive from the government.

Federal-Provincial Relations

Mr. Speaker, the motion to draw the attention of the House on the problem of federal-provincial relations also urges the government to act in this field.

The problem is definitely an important one as relations between Quebec and Ottawa and even between the other provinces and Ottawa have never been so bad as they are now.

One of the main reasons for this is the haughty, provoking and insulting attitude the present government has toward Quebec.

An hon. Member: What about the 60's?

Mr. Ouellet: What about the Diefenbaker administration?

Mr. Valade: The present St. Lawrence harbour strike provides a perfect illustration of this arrogance of the government, because of the way the Prime Minister of Canada spoke of the Quebec Minister of Labour in connection with that conflict.

You would have to be quite blind, Mr. Speaker, not to see how impossible it is for most provinces to meet the economic and social needs of their population.

In Quebec some types of welfare benefits for the poor have had to be reduced because of lack of funds. Provincial governments have to assume financial burdens forced upon them by unilateral federal legislation such as the Unemployment Insurance Act, extended to teachers and other groups, the Old Age Security Act and the Family Allowances Act.

This afternoon, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) said: "Not only the provinces, but we also need money." You can't beat that as a self-evident truth.

Of course the government needs money, not to develop meaningful measures, but to dissimulate its economic failure on the eve of a coming election, in a desperate effort to restore its prestige and its credibility in the eyes of the people.

No amount of discourse on the needs of governments at all levels will settle anything.

So long as the federal and provincial governments do not come to an agreement on fiscal distribution, there will be problems. This fiscal distribution between provinces and the federal government is urgent and should be embodied in a new constitution.

The Victoria conference was a failure precisely because the cart was put before the horse. They have discussed about everything except the essential issues and this was similar to asking the minister of Regional Economic Expansion to think before speaking. This is just as impossible as reaching a solution.

Before agreeing to a constitutional structure, the provinces, and mainly Quebec, rightly wanted to know how we could reach some acceptable agreement after having been tied down by a strict procedure.

Are these provincial situations and attitudes logical? It was responsible!

Unless a final agreement is reached on tax distribution, Mr. Speaker, this government will carry on with its centralization policy at the expense of the provincial economical and political balance.

Quebec and some other provinces are growing impatient because of the government's intransigence and for many months all provincial governments have been asking the government to resume the constitutional discussions on basic principles.

Two major events have been rocking Quebec, namely the social crisis which caused massive walk-outs and paralyzed several sectors and also the conflict between Quebec and Ottawa about federal-provincial relations and social security in particular and which almost caused two of Mr. Bourassa's most influential ministers to resign, namely Messrs. Castonguay and L'Allier.

Those events and the situation in Quebec should entice the government to re-open the constitutional debate and to move closer to the aspirations of the Quebec government and those of the other provinces. Quebec is not involved alone. The inability of the government to find a solution to the constitutional problem is at the heart of the present difficulties. That policy of confrontation, particularly towards Quebec, is nearly a national suicide. It sows division between Quebecers and irreparably opens a gap between federalists and separatists.

Therefore, in order to hasten the constitutional revision process and to promote the image of a greater Canada, the government should hold forthwith a constitutional conference based on the attribution of powers. The sharing of tax ressources would also be on the agenda, so as to take into account the increasing needs of the provinces.

The Victoria Charter failed because it did not make of the distribution of powers the focal point of the negotiations, and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion knows it. It is useless to try and make individual arrangements on secondary matters such as the repatriation of the Constitution or the adoption of a bill of human rights until negotiations were started on the basic issue. We must, therefore, regain the spirit which animated the Fathers of Confederation over 100 years ago and consider the constitutional review in its entire context.

The whole field of social security should be re-evaluated according to a criterion which could be as follows: In the context of the seventies, which level of government—provincial or federal—can best assume primary jurisdiction in the various spheres of Canadian activity? This is an important matter, in spite of the cynical smile of the Minister of Reginal Economic Expansion.

Mr. Speaker, areas of jurisdiction obviously need to be clearly defined. Our federal-provincial relations are literally assaulted by the overlapping activities of modern governments.

My suggestion, Mr. Speaker, is a new alternative, and a more constructive way to give a new start to constitutional negotiations, which after five years ended in deplorable failure.

The conference could be held in Quebec City, especially to commemorate the pre-Confederation period. It could meet in camera and on an ongoing basis, and include first ministers or reprsentatives delegated for this purpose, as well as representatives of the opposition parties of all provincial governments.

Such a suggestion, Mr. Speaker, would certainly gain the support of the Quebec governement as well as those of other provinces. It would particularly meet the aspirations of minister Castonguay concerning the approach to constitutional review.

In English Canada, a positive response could be expected. We know that, recently, Ontario and British Columbia advocated a better distribution of powers between governments. The Ontario premier, Mr. Davis, took a position similar to that of his Quebec counterpart concerning telecommunications, respect for provincial priorities, and a new sharing of fiscal resources.

The relations between Ottawa and Quebec are at their lowest, and the Prime Minister will probably try, if he accepts this proposal, to erase the bad impression he left, particularly following certain remarks which he made and which were reported in the Toronto Star.

For himself, premier Bourassa, in the face of Ottawa's intransigence, is re-evaluation—we know it, and the government knows it—his whole relations with the federal government, and he may soon announce a new strategy, even going so far as to indicate that his government could retaliate against the central government.

Mr. Speaker, earlier, the Minister of Regional Economic Exansion expressed concern and accused the leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Stanfield) of having nothing to say on this matter and that all his statements were evasive and general and that he could make nothing out of them.

If the minister understand nothing, it is because he cannot read and does not want to understand. May I remind the minister, Mr. Speaker, that he should refer to the newspaper Montréal-Matin of May 31, 1972—this was not 10 or 20 years ago—and certain things are indicated about the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, and I quote:

> For Mr. Stanfield, the role of the federal government is mainly one of coordination and support and the responsibiliy rests with the provinces and municipalities to make basic decisions on the direction of their politicies in urban development.

That is what the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party said with regard to urban responsibilities, demonstrating clearly that for many years his party has adopted clear and specific positions on particular points instead of making great statements on philosophical principles. Those positions have far more practical consequences than the personal attacks of the member for Papineau against certain journalists who are not here to defend themselves, and which I consider cowardice on his part, attacks that would better be made outside the House where they would be answered.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on a question of privilege.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that he cannot tax me with being a coward when I am here and ask him some questions and tell him, as I did the last time he spoke in the House, that I am ready to tackle him in his riding. He did not invite me today, but I am still willing to go back there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I would ask the Parliamentary Secretary to tell the Chair what is his question of privilege, because his remarks have nothing to do with a question of privilege.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the member for Sainte-Marie has called me a coward. I tell him that I am ready to go and tackle him in his riding and speak to his constituents. That is not cowardice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The Parliamentary Secretary will admit that the point he is raising is not a question of privilege under the Standing Orders. The hon. member for Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, he is welcome in my constituency but he will not be there very long because our people will be expecting him if only to ship him back home immediately.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, and in reply to certain false statements we do realize that this debate should have remained objective, but considering the remarks made by the minister of Regional Economic Expansion it is necessary to set the record straight. The leader of the Progressive Conservative party, unlike what the minister of Regional Development said this afternoon made a statement, not yesterday, not last year, but on May 13, 1968, almost four years ago, stating his position. Let me quote from the speech he delivered in St. John's Newfoundland!

The Liberal government in Ottawa,—

Mr. Béchard: Did that work?

Mr. Valade: That did not work because the Liberals tampered with the whole thing during the last election campaign, by appealing to personal feelings; the Liberal party, as we know, has never been able to discuss political issues because of this "Trudeaumania", a joke that will soon come to an end.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from the remarks made by the leader of the official opposition, (Mr. Stanfield) in St-John, Newfoundland:

> The Liberal government in Ottawa, during the past five years, missed such opportunities and failed in his obligation to assure that essential responsibility of national government.

—That is our theme because we do consult the provinces and we shall consult them soon. The quotation goes on:

> They did not succeed in consulting the provinces on priorities related to economic development and social policy. They refused to adjust national programs to regional needs and objectives.
> They went astern on programs which were useful to the provinces or changed them without sufficient consultation. They tried to force provinces into costly programs which they could not afford, and then, they lectured on the need for restraint.
> This is not a display of strength on the part of a federal government, but rather a display of weakness, thoughtlessness and stupidity.

Mr. Béchard: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Valade: The hon. member will be able to ask his question afterwards.

On page 2 of the same text, Mr. Speaker, we find the following:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the honourable member but his allotted time has now expired although the Chair has allowed him an extra minute because of the question of privilege which was raised.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the motion by the Social Credit party refers to the deterioration of federal-provincial relations and blames it on the unilateral decisions of the federal government and its refusal to meet the legitimate needs of Canadian provinces. I can support that motion because it is obvious today, as it has been for some time, that this is a government which does not believe in consultation. It is a government which makes unilateral decisions regardless of the serious consequential effects of its decisions.

Let me deal with some of these decisions and their effects on people of this country. The most important decision made by this government, one which has had disastrous and divisive effects on our people, was the decision made some 2½ years ago that the most important thing we had to do was fight inflation, and to fight inflation we could afford unemployment. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in a press interview that he would not be deterred from his anti-inflationary policies even if it meant 6 per cent unemployment. He succeeded beautifully, because in almost every month for two years or more we have had 6 per cent or higher unemployment on a seasonally adjusted basis.

I could not help being impressed by the eloquent and passionate speech made earlier this afternoon by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). I was interested, not in what he said but, rather, in what he did not say. It was not an accident. Here is a cabinet minister who came to this House after having served as the president of one of the major labour organizations in the province of Quebec. He made a major speech today and did not mention unemployment.

What is the record? The minister told us how great this country is doing and how wonderful everything is. Well, for May of 1972, 552,000 persons were unemployed. This figure is almost 10,000 more than the figure for May of last year. On a seasonally adjusted basis the unemployment figure was 6.2 per cent, compared to 6.3 per cent for May, 1971. What about the minister's province? He did not talk about it, but in the province of Quebec in May of 1972 there were 206,000 people unemployed. This figure is 10,000 more than the figure for the previous year.

Mr. Osler: How many were there last month?

[Mr. Valade.]

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Osler) is making the same type of useless interjection that he so frequently makes.

Mr. Osler: How many were there last month, compared to the month before?

Mr. Orlikow: There may be members of this House who are more stupid than the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, but they have enough brains to keep their mouths shut. The hon. member knows, or he ought to know if he knows anything, that one compares unemployment by relating one month to the same month in the year before. There were 10,000 more people unemployed in the province of Quebec in May, 1972, than there were in May, 1971. The seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment in the province of Quebec in May, 1972, was 8.1 per cent.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion did not mention a word about this. I want to compare the silence of the minister today with the type of statements he made before he came to this House. I have in my hand a copy of a memorandum submitted by the Confederation of National Trade Unions to the federal cabinet in February, 1964, when the minister was president of that organization. I wish to quote a few paragraphs from the section dealing with unemployment. This memorandum reads:

> In Canada, there is no such thing as the right to work for a great number of citizens. Hundreds of thousands of Canadian workers are either unemployed, insufficiently paid, or worrying about the day when they will be told that their services are no more required.
> It does not seem that the privileged group who is not suffering from unemployment is much disturbed by the chronic aspect of mass unemployment in Canada.

Obviously, the minister is one of the privileged group so he no longer needs to worry about mass unemployment as he did in 1964. Further in the statement we find these words:

> In Canada, and most particularly in Quebec and in the Maritimes, unemployment rates exceeding 7 per cent and 10 per cent merely bring a few compassionate speeches and generous projects—

As I pointed out, unemployment last month in the province of Quebec, on a seasonally adjusted basis, was 8.1 per cent—and we do not even get compassionate speeches from the ex-president of the Confederation of National Trade Unions now that he is a minister. In this statement the minister closes by saying:

> The state should concern itself above all with directing and orienting the economy and the distribution of wealth and with establishing conditions that ensure full employment and social security.

If ever there was a minister who forgot the things he spoke of before he entered politics, it is the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The decision of the federal government, that unemployment was not important, was a unilateral decision. There were provinces which were concerned, and there are now provinces which are concerned. There were provinces which called on the federal government, and there are provinces which are now calling on the federal government, to do something about unemployment. Let me quote one paragraph from a statement made by the Premier of Manitoba to the federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa from November 15 to November 17, 1971:

Our concern with full employment is to ensure that people are saved the humiliation and hardship of involuntary unemployment, and to prevent the great waste of real output that unemployment entails, perhaps $8 billion or more in the period just past. In many of the other areas our fundamental concern is with how the output of the economy is distributed. Our fundamental concern is with equality of the human condition, and to this end we wish to see progress towards economic equality.

Did the Premier of Manitoba receive any co-operation from Ottawa; or was he ignored, as other premiers on other occasions have been ignored? Here, in dealing with unemployment, we have a glaring example of unilateral action by this government. Let me cite several other examples. If we have in Canada a system of universal hospital insurance, it is partly because the province of Saskatchewan, under the premiership of my colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), started such a program. Also, if we have a national program it is because a Liberal government told the provinces it was willing to finance hospital insurance on a 50-50 basis.

Some years later, under another Liberal government headed by Mr. Pearson, this same proposal was put to the provinces in respect of medical insurance. Every province now has a system of universal, government-operated hospital and medical insurance. Until now 50 per cent of the cost of both programs has been borne by Ottawa. These programs, in many provinces—certainly the have-not provinces such as the Maritimes—would never have been started had it not been for the pressure applied, and I commend the government for doing this, to the provincial governments in respect of entering this kind of a program.

Mr. Drury: That is co-operation.

Mr. Orlikow: Exactly. I will come to that in a moment. What has happened? The cost of operating hospitals and a medical insurance plan has been accelerated. Costs have been going up by about 14 per cent per year. Suddenly the co-operation which my friend the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) referred to, the consultation and discussions which the federal government had carried on with the provinces, disappeared. The minister can shake his head, but the ministers of health and the ministers of finance of the provinces know the real facts.

Suddenly the provinces received a proposal from this minister saying that the period in which Ottawa would pick up 50 per cent of the cost of hospitalization and medical insurance had expired. Suddenly they are told that in the new negotiations Ottawa is prepared to agree only to increases in its contribution based upon the increase in the gross national product. We are speaking now of an increase of 6 per cent or 7 per cent a year. What happened to the co-operation of which the President of the Treasury Board speaks? It has gone.

Mr. Speaker, I can tell the President of the Treasury Board that the provincial ministers of finance and ministers of health are just as concerned, or more concerned, than he is about the increase in cost. They want to find ways of slowing up or stopping these increases. Some of them have been proposing that the government's schemes should not simply cover payment of costs for treatment of acute cases in general hospitals but should cover nursing homes, rehabilitation hospitals and other forms of alternative care.

They want to work this out in co-operation with Ottawa, but Ottawa says, "Oh, no. We are telling you that we are only going to increase our contributions in the very near future by an increase in the gross national product," which is approximately half the annual increase of the cost of hospital and medical insurance. That is the kind of co-operation which Ottawa is proposing to the provinces.

Let us look at the whole program of paying for post-secondary education. There has been an explosion in the number of young people who finish high school and go into our universities, colleges, community colleges and technical institutes. That is good; we need much better educated people than we have had in the past. But the costs have been growing at a fantastic rate. This year, Ottawa estimates that it will be paying to the provinces, as its 50 per cent share of the cost of post-secondary education, in the neighbourhood of $534 million. That is a sharp increase over last year and the year before.

Again, the provinces are just as concerned about the rapidly escalating cost of post-secondary education as is the President of the Treasury Board. I am 99 per cent certain that the cost of education in every province in Canada is now higher than the total budgets of these provinces, 15 or 20 years ago. The provinces would be almost as stupid as the President of the Treasury Board if they did not realize that suddenly, in the last couple of years, a university degree is not an automatic guarantee of a job. Suddenly they begin to realize that if you have a BA, a BSc. or a Bachelor of Education you do not necessarily find a job. Suddenly they begin to realize, as they should and as Ottawa should, that we should be taking a good, hard look at the whole question of post-secondary education. Therefore, in the province of Ontario there is a commission, formerly headed by Professor Wright, studying the question of post-secondary education, and in Manitoba there is a task force headed by Michael Oliver, the new president of Carleton University, studying the question of post-secondary education. In other provinces, similar studies are being undertaken, and so they should.

But before these studies have been completed—and they are just beginning—before the findings have been digested, before recommendations have been made, before the provinces can possibly know what they will have to face in the next 10 or 20 years in the field of post-secondary education and what they can do, if anything, to arrest the spiralling cost of post-secondary education, again you have a unilateral decision of the federal government to cut back on the amount of money and on the percentage of the cost of post-secondary education which they have been paying until now.

I say that in these three fields—unemployment, health services both hospital and medical, and post-secondary education—what we have had in the last three years is a hardening on the part of the federal government. Unilateral decisions have been taken, some of them announced and some of them just implied—I presume, to be announced later; probably after the next federal election—that Ottawa is either getting out of shared-cost programs, most of which would not be in operation today if Ottawa had not urged the provinces to get in, if it had not offered the carrot of a 50 per cent payment, or Ottawa is making a unilateral decision to cut back on these commitments made to the provinces.

The President of the Treasury Board knows even better than I do that the projections made as to future revenue sources indicate that the prospects of the federal government—I hope it will be a different government than this one, in fact, I am sure it will be—in terms of revenues as compared to expenses are very good. The federal government in the next few years will likely be facing a surplus. The prospects of the provinces, which have the responsibility in dealing with such major forms of activity as education, health and welfare, are increased deficits and increased taxes. The situation has been exacerbated by the unilateral decision of the federal government to talk to the provinces but not to really consult and not to arrive at decisions on the basis of agreements.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have always found the NDP confusing. I have found them to be mixed up in many of their policies but never have I realized it so much as when I listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) speaking on this motion. On the one hand, the hon. member seems to be the great defender of the provinces. That is how he spoke this evening. The reason he does so is probably because it is politically expedient at this time. The NDP, in the course of the last few months and perhaps the last few years under its new leader, has forgotten all about their principles, all about their famous concepts to save their political skins because they have been so unpopular and have had so many problems. Suddenly they change from one position to the other. On the one hand, tonight they defend the provinces—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Is the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Rose: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) is imputing certain motives to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). I cannot understand why he would do this, because I do not think the hon. member for Winnipeg North or his party threaten the hon. member.

Mr. Breau: That is the problem with the NDP; they can give it but they cannot take it. I have not imputed motives to the hon. member for Winnipeg North; I am just responding to his speech. And I do not only respond to speeches when my constituency is threatened, because if that were the case I would not be speaking very often.

Mr. Rose: You do not speak very often, anyway.

Mr. Breau: I speak just as often as the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose). The hon. member for Winnipeg North and some members of the NDP today suddenly respect the rights of the provinces. But what about their position on foreign control of the economy, for example? Do they respect the provinces? How many provinces support the stand of the NDP on foreign investment? How many provinces support the stand of the NDP on the foreign takeover review act introduced by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin)?

• (2120)

Mr. Orlikow: How many provinces support the government's proposals?

Mr. Breau: Many provinces support the government's proposals. Even the premier of the province from which the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) comes is not that much against this government's proposals.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) knows that the hon. member who has the floor has only 20 minutes in which to make his speech. I think the hon. member should be allowed to make his speech.

Mr. Breau: I point out that they cannot take it, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hon. member for Lotbinière on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, you have just said that the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) would be allowed 20 minutes. Between the Chair and us there has just been an agreement allowing the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) to close the debate and to have 20 minutes for that purpose, which means that the hon. member for Gloucester will not have the floor for 20 minutes, though being allowed to make his speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Nothing tells me that the hon. member is not entitled to his 20 minutes.

Mr. Fortin: I rise on a question of privilege. Your Honour, I do not mean to offend you, but I very respectfully beg you to inquire from your two assistants, who have quite an assignment to meet—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. There is no question of privilege. I have all the information I need to know that the hon. member for Gloucester is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. Fortin: I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Does the hon. member for Lotbinière rise on another question of privilege?

Mr. Fortin: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept that decision and I question it because two hon. members from my party witnessed the agreement that was made with your colleague and we expect that agreement to be observed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order! I have stated my decision; the hon. member who has the floor is entitled to his 20 minutes.

[English]

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I was just trying to point out the differences of opinion that we get from a party like the NDP, depending on the issue with which we are dealing. One day they do not give a heck about the provinces; they have the dogma, the theology, the answer to everything—name it, and they believe in their ideology to solve all problems such as foreign ownership of the economy. But when we talk about an issue on which the provinces are a little firm, the NDP sides with the provinces. I do not see how a party like that can take such stands if it ever dreams of coming to power.

Mr. Rose: Not in your province.

Mr. Breau: You can bet on that. You won't have much support in my province.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to deal briefly with the comments made by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) who spoke before the hon. member for Winnipeg-North (Mr. Orlikow). The hon. member for Sainte-Marie mentioned a press release issued after the Victoria Conference. He was trying to use that press release to show that the federal government's position on the constitutional debate was a rigid and inflexible one and that the right honourable Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was an obstinate man who would not listen to anyone.

Mr. Speaker, had the hon. member taken time to read a little further he would have noted that it had been issued after the Victoria Conference jointly by all the participating governments. It was not a federal government release but a joint federal-provincial one which all the governments represented in Victoria had agreed to.

If the people attending a conference decide upon a joint release in which they state that in 8, 11, 12 or 50 days, they will give out an assessment of a situation, it seems to me they are free to do so, and the hon. member for Sainte-Marie cannot say that the federal government has prompted it.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sainte-Marie said that the Prime Minister was inflexible. I should like to tell him that there is a difference between firmness and inflexibility, between firmness and weakness. The hon. member probably sees our leader as one who controls everything, as his own leader who says one thing in one place and another thing in another one or in the House, according to what he is expected to say.

The Prime Minister has been firm on the constitutional issue; he has listened to the provinces. He has not been inflexible, but firm as the Prime Minister of a country, the head of government ought to be, especially when the matters at hand concern ten provincial governments.

The hon. member quoted two examples of governments which he thought were perfect: those of Ontario and British Columbia. These are two fine governments indeed to quote as examples in the fields of constitution and national unity! Ontario is an economically centralization-oriented government and British Columbia, which opposed the equalization system, accepts moneys from the federal government for introducing bilingualism and simply puts them in its general education funds while neglecting to implement a program approved by the federal government.

These are two fine examples given by the member for Sainte-Marie, a member from Quebec, in the constitutional debate.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy tonight to take part in the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) on federal-provincial relations. This is an important subject and I commend the hon. member for drawing the attention of the House to it.

However, I cannot support his motion because I do not agree with this statement:

—the government's responsibility for the deterioration of federal-provincial relations—

If there is any.

I do not agree because generally speaking I feel that federal-provincial relations are better than ever.

There are many examples of federal-provincial agreements between the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the provinces; I am thinking also of agreements with other departments, the new fiscal arrangements and the new equalization formula which has been accepted by all first ministers, or at least by the constitutional conference of last December. I think it is wrong in view of this to suggest that federal-provincial relations are worse than ever. On the contrary, perhaps they have never been better.

Mr. Speaker, on the question of federal-provincial relations, many Canadians and members of this House consider the federal government, in our political system, as being a mere tax collector who unconditionally distributes his money around to the provinces which have all the necessary ability to administer them better than would the federal authority.

Mr. Speaker, such is not my idea of the part the federal government has to play in our system, nor is it that of my party nor of the government. I support the government's contention that it can handle as efficiently the benefits related to social services and influence the direction of such services provided to Canadians.

I do not intend by these comments to undermine the provinces, because I have always supported them.

Various precedents show that it is not true that the federal government has prevented some provinces to reform their welfare systems. I can even give some examples. When New Brunswick introduced a municipal tax reform within a program aiming at providing equal social services for the people, such program was meeting the needs of the population of New Brunswick.

When he introduced legislation to this effect, Hon. Mr. Robichaud did not come to Ottawa. Nobody in Ottawa could have prevented him from acting. There was no godfather in Ottawa whose permission should have been sought before embarking on a social reform in New Brunswick. Mr. Robichaud decided upon it and implemented it. It is as simple as that.

[English]

The hon. member for Winnipeg North talked about the time when the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The-

Islands (Mr. Douglas) was premier of Saskatchewan. I do not think that that former premier of Saskatchewan—he was also a former leader of the NDP—ever asked Ottawa for permission for anything he wanted to do while he was premier. I do not think Ottawa stopped him from implementing social programs.

Mr. Benjamin: Right! He forced Ottawa to get into them.

Mr. Breau: It would be good if other provincial premiers would do the same. If they were a little more positive and stopped bitching, they might solve their problems.

• (2130)

Mr. Alexander: Explain.

Mr. Breau: When his government decided to implement the hospital insurance program, they did not wait for Ottawa; they went ahead and implemented it.

[Translation]

In the social and economic fields, the provinces do not have to wait for Ottawa's approval. They do not have to blame Ottawa, if they do not try and solve the problems which are their responsibility.

Mr. Speaker, it has become a habit, particularly in Quebec—and the hon. member for Papineau mentioned it before and I should have liked the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) to mention it too—for the federal government to serve as a smoke-screen, a scapegoat, to conceal all the problems. As soon as something goes wrong, it is Ottawa's fault.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North said before, how many premiers have, for the last two years, tried to say that the economic policy of the government has been a handicap in federal-provincial relations? How many premiers answered, when they had problems: Let us blame the federal government anti-inflationary economic policy?

Mr. Speaker, Ottawa has become the scapegoat; instead of solving their own problems, the provinces simply blame the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, I could also speak of the New Democratic Party, but I would like to be as brief as possible.

I simply want to say that many members of this House, who sit on various committees, do not always respect the rights of provinces when talking of Canadian politics. To give only one example, yesterday, the leader of the NDP (Mr. Lewis) asked the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) a question concerning the decision of the province of Quebec to grant a licence to a lumber company.

Is the hon. member for York South not intelligent enough to know that this is a decision which comes under provincial jurisdiction? He knew this very well, Mr. Speaker. And yet, he asked this question, as can be seen on page 3341 of Hansard, thinking that the Minister of the Environment would say to Quebec, like a grandfather or a big brother: No, do not grant a licence to the ITT Rayonier Company. Do not do that. Grandfather Ottawa keeps an eye on everything. This is the concept of federalism of the hon. member for York South, and probably that of the New Democratic Party.

The way they see it, when it comes to resources development they tell the provinces: Hold on because we in Ottawa are more qualified.

Yet, in the field of foreign investment they are siding with the provinces this evening. I doubt if a single province shares their views on that point, even Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Mr. Speaker, absolutely nothing prevents the provinces from deciding which measures are good from the political and economic point of view and from telling companies which develop resources: You must use those resources so that the people in the provinces will benefit from them.

For instance, there are mining operations in my area in northeastern New Brunswick. Right now the government allows Brunswick Mines—a wholly owned subsidiary of Noranda Mines Limited—to export pure zinc to Europe. Should the federal government be blamed for that? Is the federal government going to suggest to the province to stop disposing of its own resources in that way? This example shows that when a province has the will, it can find the way.

In the field of welfare, is it the federal government which has introduced very far-sighted social programs supported by many members in this House, such as Opportunities for Youth and the Local Initiatives program. Why were they not initiated by the provinces? What was holding back the province of Quebec—the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) said that Ottawa was preventing the province of Quebec from introducing social programs—from introducing community development programs, employment programs for the have-nots in environmental improvement projects, training programs of all kinds; including social welfare programs such as the one administered by the minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) to which Ottawa will contribute 50 per cent. No. They just say that Ottawa interferes with provincial affairs.

For myself, Mr. Speaker, I see two sides to the matter of social services. There are, first, the grants given directly to individuals. In my opinion, it matters little to the person who receives it whether the cheque comes from Ottawa, Quebec, Fredericton, or Victoria.

Moreover, there is no provision in the constitution to prevent a province from levying taxes to cover the cost of additional programs. Why do they not do so?

On the other hand, nothing stops provinces from establishing real programs of social development, social motivation, or social commitment. Why do they not do so?

[English]

The hon. member for Fraser Valley West should listen to the translation, because I do not think he understands what I am saying.

[Translation]

I do not know whether it is because of lack of competence—

• (2140)

[English]

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I should like to pose a question to the hon. member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) rises for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. Rose: I was wondering—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hon. member who has the floor has not agreed to accept a question.

[Translation]

Mr. Breau: When the hon. member has the floor I listen to him and I would like the same courtesy extended to me. Let the hon. member resume his seat and try to understand what I am saying instead of interjecting to distort my comments.

Mr. Speaker, nothing is preventing the provinces in the field of social development from—

[English]

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, after I attempted to ask a question, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) cast reflections on my intelligence. Since he has asked several rhetorical questions about why the provinces of Canada did not get extra benefits—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Rose: —I wonder if he would answer his own question—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau).

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand the attitude of the NDP when somebody tries to respond to their problems. Maybe they are so accustomed to being ignored that we should continue to ignore them. Any time I try to rise, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West—

Mr. Alexander: He doesn't like you.

Mr. Breau: —tries to stop me from speaking. I think I am allowed the allotted time to speak, as is any other member.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: How much time?

Mr. Breau: If the hon. member can't stand the heat, he should walk out. Nobody will miss him.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I simply said that in the social and economic field absolutely nothing is preventing the provinces from setting their own priorities, from determining what should be done with both their financial and mineral resources.

I will conclude by saying that this government and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion are an illustration of how the federal government is simply using its taxing and spending power to put funds at the provinces' disposal when they have set their priorities, have planned and have worked at the preparation of projects.

This is an example of our federalism and I do not believe that too many countries can boast of having anything similar.

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on the motion presented by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), which is so interesting that all hon. members would like to talk on it to the extent that we have been practically deprived of our time in favour of others. It is a little like finance, which deprives us of everything.

Mr. Speaker, we wish to talk about Social Credit and the economy. We talk about an economic not a political matter. While all hon. members, particularly on the government side, talk about political questions only, we of the Social Credit limit ourselves to the economy and the autonomy of the provinces.

Autonomy is the right to administer one's self, to adopt one's own laws and to enact one's own regulations. The provinces are not satisfied, because they have become beggars.

Social Credit wants autonomy not only for the provinces but also for the municipalities, for the family and for the individual. This makes the big difference between Social Credit and the various forms of socialism. They both want a reform that guarantees the economic security and the satisfaction of temporal needs, but Social Credit wants each person to keep the right to dispose of himself, whereas socialism wants the state to dispose of them.

That is what we have now with the Liberal party because it has become a socialist organism in a proportion of nearly 100 per cent.

It is very nice to call the family the essential cell of society, to tell parents that they are their own masters at home, to remind everyone that the family must have an opportunity to bloom; but if there is nothing on the table, if access to the products is not related to the number of mouths to be fed instead of the work imposed, the very concept of the family entity is annihilated.

Mr. Speaker, the same applies to the autonomy of the provinces. We certainly have provinces that are rich in human resources and raw materials but also in ideals. And when thousands of young people and almost as many family heads are reduced to destitution in the face of unused wealth, where then is the autonomy? Where is the right of the provinces to legislate themselves with a view to putting the wealth of the province at the disposal of its citizens?

What keeps the governement from placing the fruit of the soil, forests, rivers, sea and mines at the service of the families that are deprived of the most basic things? The lack of the essential element, token money, to which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) referred today.

Here we have a province—Quebec—with a production which meets the needs of some 6 million in habitants, 5 million of whom are leading a very modest way of life.

Federal-Provincial Relations

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) rises a point of order.

Mr. Deachman: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, because I believe there has been some misunderstanding regarding the division of time. If there is unanimous consent, I wonder if the hon. member who now has the floor might be permitted to continue until not later than five minutes to ten in order that he may finish his speech, inasmuch as his party moved the motion which the House is debating.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman). Is it agreed that the Chair shall see the clock at 9.55 p.m.?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. members for having complied with this request, and having been fair enough to allow me to proceed.

If a province is not permitted to make laws for the distribution of the accumulated production so as to meet the needs of all its people, how autonomous is it?

And if the province can only correct the situation by taking something away from some people to give it to others and letting glut go to waste, where is its autonomy? It is a simple matter of money, as some people may say, but we are not responsible for making it so, the system is.

If the government responsible for the common good only had to face the facts, the only requirement would be to meet the needs of the people, and the question of money would not arise.

However, financial regulations complicate the whole situation and cripple the provincial governments most set on autonomy as well as the federal government. Mankind has needs because the Creator wanted it so, and as long as a government is short of money and is unable to cope with the problem, there is no autonomy for the crippled government, for the deprived family, for the individual, who must accept anything or die from hunger.

This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) asked us to open our eyes and to quote figures to prove that this government has done much to balance the economy in a normal and satisfactory fashion.

So, I have before me a copy of the estimates from 1953 to 1973. You can see all the deficits accumulated over that period by the two parties which have in turn been in office, that is the Progressive Conservatives and the Liberals. In 1955, there was a first deficit, and this has lasted until now. In fact, we will have a deficit of about three billions in 1973. And for the last score, we have had deficits 18 years out of 20. But they will tell us that we have a sound administration, that we should produce figures and get down to bed-rock. This is precisely what we are doing.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

Can we go on governing with deficits? Can we go on leaving all the provinces reduced to beggary in our deficit system? Are we right to want to develop a financial system capable of bringing our economy back into balance?

The hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion asked us to give him figures. I shall give him figures, and they are the government's own official statistics.

Here is a list of deficits for the past twelve years: 1961-62, $791 million; 1962-63, $692 million; 1963-64, 619 million; 1964-65, $38 million; 1965-66, $39 million; 1966-67, $422 million; 1967-68, $795 million; 1968-69, $576 million; 1969-70, $393 million; 1970-71, $370 million; 1971-72, $750 million; 1972-73, $800 million.

The net debt on March 31, 1970, was $16,943 million, and on March 31, 1971, of $17,360 million. On March 31, 1972 it was $17,922,400,000.

The net debt increase was $421 million in 1967, $794 million in 1968, $576 million in 1969, $392 million in 1970, $417 million in 1971, $552 million in 1972. This is the type of administration considered as being fine, condensed, balanced, and honest by the minister.

Mr. Speaker, the interest on the debt—

An hon. Member: You distort the facts.

Mr. Latulippe: I am not distorting facts; these are official figures.

The interest on the debt in 1970-71 was $1,880 million, or $5,150,684 per day; in 1971-72, it will be $2,030 million or $5,561,643 per day; in 1972-73, it will be $2,260 million or $6,191,000 per day. These are figures that the minister should know and study.

The minister should go a little further into things because his logics are definitely lacking when he asks that we provide him with statistics. These statistics that I am giving him are authentic because they come from Statistics Canada.

Mr. Speaker, if we had a creditiste government in Ottawa, it would see to it that money and credit issues be proportional to available goods. Instead of using these issues itself it would distribute them in block to the provincial governments proportionately to the population, leaving these governments free to dispose of them as they wish.

Provincial autonomy would be respected as well as family and personal autonomy. It would be respected in social credit provinces but ignored by the Socialist provinces. It is up to the citizens of each province to look after their own future.

Mr. Speaker, the main responsibility of a government is to remove any obstacles in order to allow the lower level administrations to handle their own affairs. This, the government is not doing now. The main obstacle is a financial one and the main responsibility of the government is to have that obstacle removed. Thereafter, its interventions will no longer be required often. The members of the Social Credit party do understand it because, their idea is that the financial obstacle is unjustifiable—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Honey): Order, please. It being after 9.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty, in accordance with section (10) of Standing Order 58, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of any item of business relating to supply before the House, including any bill or bills thereon.

Consequently, the first question is the following:

• (2150)

[English]

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 1, DEPARTMENT OF COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is the following one; the hon. President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) moves:

That Vote 1, in the amount of $16,324,000 of the Department of Communications for Communications—operating expenditures for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1973 (less the amount voted in Interim Supply) be concurred in.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order is based primarily on two parts of Standing Order 58 which is the standing order that governs our supply procedure. Standing Order 58(4)(a) reads, in part:

Twenty-four hours' written notice shall be given of an opposition motion on an allotted day or of a notice to oppose any item in the estimates.

Immediately under item No. 1 on page vii of today's order paper, which Your Honour has just read, is a notice of opposition in the name of my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett). This notice was filed on June 19 in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 58(4)(a), a portion of which I read just a moment ago. I may point out that there are many such notices of opposition on the order paper that is before us tonight, but the points I wish to make with respect to this one apply to all of the others, with the exception of three of them.

The notice that was given by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in relation to item No. 1 which, of course, is before us quite properly because it was given at least 24 hours in advance, was accepted by the Table and is on the order paper. I now draw Your Honour's attention also to Standing Order 58(8) which reads as follows:

Opposition motions shall have precedence over all government supply motions on allotted days and shall be disposed of as provided in sections (9), (10) and (11) of this order.

When one reads sections (9), (10) and (11) of this order, and I do not think it is necessary for me to do so, he finds references therein to opposed items in the estimates.

My principal point of order is this: With the hon. member for Comox-Alberni having given notice of opposition to an item in the estimates, he has the right under Standing Order 58(8) to have his notice of opposition given precedence. However, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) subsequently put down a government notice of motion for the approval of a certain item in the estimates. The fact Your Honour has called that motion first means that it is being given precedence over the notice of opposition presented by my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Perhaps I might be permitted a word of explanation. I know this is not a time for debate and that one has to stick to procedure, but in the notice of motion given by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni he asks that the amount of money under Vote 1 of the Department of Communications, Information branch, be a sum not exceeding $61,000. His reason was that that is approximately one quarter of the amount that is provided for information under the Department of Communications, as will be found on page 3-8 of the blue book of estimates where the figure is given as $244,000.

What my hon. friend wanted this House to do was vote on the reduction of that $244,000 for the information branch in this particular department to $61,000. He placed that notice of motion first. I claim for him the provisions of Standing Order 58(8), but instead Your Honour has now read to us the motion in the name of the President of the Treasury Board which asks us to vote yes or no on a sum of $16,324,000, which is the entire amount of Vote 1 in the estimates of the Department of Communications. What is the value of the Standing Order giving a member the right to give notice of opposition, a right which has been recognized by his notice being put on the order paper, if instead of having the chance to vote on reducing $244,000 to $61,000, we are being asked to vote yes or no on the sum of $16,324,000? I suggest this is making a mockery of such rights as remain to us for the voting of supply as set out in Standing Order 58.

I point out that this is the first time the issue has arisen in this form. In previous sessions, since the new supply procedures came into effect, we have on a number of occasions given notice of opposition to certain votes or items in their entirety. There are three such notices of opposition on the order paper tonight. One is number three, in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis); one is No. 42, which is against the Senate and is in my name, and the third is No. 74 in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir). Each of those three, as I say, is a notice of opposition to the entire amount of an estimate. We have done this in previous sessions and it is quite true that in those sessions our notices of opposition to entire items were countered in each case by a notice of motion by the President of the Treasury Board in favour of an entire item.

Your Honour may ask why we did not raise objection at that time. The answer is that it did not make any difference; instead of our voting to eliminate an item we voted against a motion to pass an item. But tonight, for the first time since this procedure came into effect, we are faced with a different situation because what we are asking for now is not the right to vote against an entire item—we shall get that in the three cases I have cited—but for the right to vote for or against the reduction in the amount of an item. In the case of the first one, as I have made clear, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has asked the House to vote for a notice of opposition under which he seeks to cut the amount of an item under the Department of Communications, namely, $240,000 down to $61,000. Instead, however, Your Honour has put a motion which calls upon the House to vote yes or no on an item of $16,324,000.

My point of order is that before you put the motion in the name of the President of the Treasury Board, Your Honour should be putting the notice of motion in the name of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni because under Standing Order 58 opposition motions on opposition days take precedence over government supply motions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to support very briefly the procedural argument put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I wish to base my argument less on the procedural aspect and more on the grounds of common sense.

Mr. Bell: What rule is that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair would like to hear the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Brewin: I wish to base my argument on the premise that the rules of the House should make sense and should enable hon. members to perform one of their essential, historic functions which is to control the expenditure of the taxpayers dollar.

I wish to give an illustration. Item No. 29 in today's Routine Proceedings gives notice of opposition to voting more than $30 million on the NORAD defence system, an active defence system which has been obsolete for ten years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. With respect, I have to caution hon. members that they should stay strictly within the bounds of the procedural question we have before us.

Mr. Brewin: If Your Honour would permit me to finish my sentence you would see its relevance to the procedural point. I would say that the amount saved to the exchequer would be $120 million, but presumably we are being restricted to voting only on the motion of the President of the Treasury Board that the whole of vote five for National Defence, amounting to $1,448 million, the total operating expenditure on our armed forces, be approved. If the ruling is against what has been urged by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I, and other hon. members of the House, will be deprived of our right to object to an expenditure which is unnecessary or wasteful; we will not be allowed to strike out a clearly wasteful expenditure without voting to strike out the whole of a large item comprising vast expenditures upon the armed forces.

I urge upon you, Mr. Speaker, that there is a basic rule when interpreting any procedural or legal provision, that is, it should be interpreted so as to make sense, not nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, as everyone who has ever participated in any assembly or had anything to do with the law knows, procedural points, procedural provisions, or procedural arguments, always attach themselves to very important substantive considerations. We are not raising these procedural arguments merely for the sake of doing so. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has not raised this point merely to make a speech, to give hon. members opposite an opportunity to chatter while the discussion goes on. We raise this procedural argument because in our view the provisions which now govern the work of the House of Commons in connection with estimates make a mockery of members of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: They make the applications of the rules meaningless as far as our ancient role of exerting surveillance over government expenditure is concerned. It is, in my opinion, totally absurd that hon. members should be prohibited from voting against an expenditure which they consider to be wrong and wasteful, and to be placed in the position of voting against a total item which includes expenditures they may very well support. But this is what the rule brings us to do. This is why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised this procedural argument. He appeals to you, as I do, that you apply subsection eight of rule 58 which clearly states that opposition motions shall take precedence over all government supply motions on allotted days. Our motions of opposition have precedence. The members of this House have a right as well as a duty to vote against what they consider to be wasteful expenditure without being placed in the position of opposing an entire item which contains expenditures they support.

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, members of the House and everyone else, that if your ruling should place us in the untenable position, in the ridiculous position, in the unfair position of having to vote against an entire item because we do not possess the rights we should possess to vote against a portion of an item to which we are opposed, then we shall have no alternative but to vote against the entire item, and to keep voting against item after item after item unless there is some common sense in the rules as applied to us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has to rule on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in respect of which the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) have submitted argument. I might deal first with the argument of the hon. member for York South who has just resumed his seat. I think hon. members will acknowledge that the Chair has the responsibility of carrying out the Standing Orders, the precedents and decisions which are binding upon the Chair. The hon. member for York South has argued very well, but with respect I think he has not argued about the responsibilities of the Chair. He has really been arguing that if the Chair rules against him he will have to take certain other action. Of course, under the Standing Orders, that is his right. I do not wish to comment upon whether the Standing Orders and practices are fair and just. My comment is that the Chair must be guided by the Standing Orders, precedents and practices of the House. That is the basis on which I have to make my decision.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who introduced the point of order, has argued that Item No. 1, the notice of opposition in the name of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), should take precedence over the motion in the name of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). It seems to the Chair that in his argument the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre spelled out the distinctions on which I must base my ruling. He referred to Standing Order 58(4)(a), among others, and I will read the part referred to by the hon. member:

Twenty-four hours' written notice shall be given of an opposition motion on an allotted day—

I want to emphasize this because it then reads:

—or of a notice to oppose any item in the estimates.

With respect, I think one must make this differentiation between a motion and a notice to oppose, because that is made quite clear in the Standing Order to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred. I would agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre if he could convince me that the notice of opposition standing in the name of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is, in fact, a motion. In my respectful submission it is not a motion, and I think this is clear from the Standing Order to which I have referred. It is a notice of opposition and is not, in fact, a motion, and that is quite clear from the Standing Order.

The hon. member referred to page vii of Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day, and we find that the heading there is "Opposed Items in the Estimates". Again referring to Standing Order 58(4)(a), in my respectful submission what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has set down is a notice to oppose an item, not a motion.

In conclusion, because I think it would be helpful to go back to the history of the standing order, I might refer hon. members to House of Commons Journals, 1968-69 at page 429, being the report of the Special Committee on Procedure of the House, specifically the third report of the said committee. Then, turning to page 431 we find under paragraph (i) the following, and I will take a moment to read this:

The final decisions in relation to the main estimates of each department of government would be held over until the end of the third supply period so that the opportunity to debate any department would remain open throughout the session. A Member wishing to vote against an estimate would be required to give notice, and motions for the adoption of unopposed estimates could be consolidated into a single question.

Indeed, that is the situation we have before us. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni has given notice that he would like to oppose a particular item and vote against it. Having given that notice, the estimate is put in the form of a motion to the Chamber, at which time hon. members have the right to vote for or against it.

I make this ruling on what I think is the plain and clear meaning of the Standing Orders. If hon. members feel that the Standing Orders and our procedures are unfair, of course the remedy remains in the hands of hon. members. This is not something of which the Chair can take cognizance at this time. Therefore, with regret, I must rule against the point of order of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Not wishing in any way to cause the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) any difficulty, I think the rule is that once you vote, you cannot change it. I was under that impression.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I recall that in 1926 a Labour member for Nelson, Mr. Bird, went to sleep and voted. He woke up and realized he had voted and said he had made a mistake. If I recall, the Speaker of that day said "You only get one bite of the apple."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure it could not have been at 2.30 in the morning. It seemed to me that the situation was clear, but apparently it is not clear at all. To be very frank, the Chair was under the impression that when members of the official opposition voted, they were voting in opposition to the motion.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate that and recognize that it is 2.30 in the morning. I was just saying what I had thought, but obviously I was wrong. I think what the House would want to take for granted is that the vote registered by members of the official opposition was in favour of the yeas, and that the voting starting with the leader of the NDP were votes in opposition. The hon. member for York South is rising on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, in view of that fact, I think the same privilege should be extended to others changing their minds about voting.

An hon. Member: What minds?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to the point of order. Let me make it clear that the right hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), always has the courtesy when rising of saying he does not want to cause the hon. member for York South any trouble, and then proceeds to say what he has to say. I should like to inform him that I am sure he noticed, as others did, that I did not vote but rose to find out whether Your Honour had called the nays.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My impression of the way the vote has been taken is the way I suggested. Otherwise I think it would be unfair to hon. members of the different parties voting either in support or in opposition to the motion. In any event, I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we have been having some discussions and I wonder if we might not reach agreement on how to dispose of the remaining items up to and including No. 88. It has been suggested that we might deem to have carried all these items, with the exception of item No. 74, on division, and that on item No. 74 Your Honour would call the yeas and nays and, if desired, there could be a recorded division immediately. If that is a suitable arrangement I think we might all benefit from it at this moment.

Mr. MacLean: That is agreed, Mr. Speaker, and I would suggest it is assumed that the members are in and that we would not ring the bells for the recorded vote on motion No. 74.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We agree.

Mr. Peters: Some of us do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the suggestion made. It is the understanding of the chair that we have the unanimous consent of all hon. members that all remaining motions, with the exception of No. 74, are deemed to have been carried on division. Is that agreed?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it further agreed, on the suggestion of the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean), that if a division is required on motion No. 74, the division will be taken without the necessity of ringing the bells?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is so ordered.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 25, DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order because of a ruling made earlier by the Chair to the effect that a member on this side of the House had walked in when the Chair was putting the vote, while at the same time the Chair failed to recognize that the same thing happened on the other side of the House. The Chair's attention was drawn to the fact that during the vote on No. 42 a member on the other side had left his seat. I think at that time there should have been a ruling, because the Chair was very well aware of the fact.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacInnis: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I have put a point of order before the Chair in which the Chair was very much aware of the situation, and according to Standing Order 12(2) the Speaker is obligated to do something about it in that he saw members on the other side and failed to recognize the same violation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit down!

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair would like to hear the hon. member.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I again draw your attention to Standing Order 12(2) and repeat that the rule was used in regard to a member from this side of the House while it was very obvious that violations were taking place on the other side of the House and during the vote on No. 42—

Mr. Duquet: Every time you talk about the rules you are wrong.

An hon. Member: Start all over again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would think that hon. members would co-operate with the Chair and with the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis). In fairness to the hon. member, I think I should rule on this point of order but I am not in a position to do so until I hear the hon. member. I would ask hon. members to hear the point of order.

An hon. Member: Get it straight this time, Donnie.

Mr. MacInnis: At the request of hon. members on the other side of the House, I will repeat it. Standing Order 12(2) has been violated, and the Speaker drew on that rule to remind a member from this side of the House who had to leave, while at the same time the same violation was taking place on the government side of the House. The Speaker's attention was drawn to that fact during the vote on No. 42 and Mr. Speaker should have ruled on the member from the government side as well as members of the opposition.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has asked me to rule on his point of order. I think he will understand, and I think all hon. members will understand, that I am in a position where I cannot rule because I do not have personal knowledge of the matter. I accept the hon. member's word but I am not in a position to rule because the matter to which the hon. member refers is not, in my consciousness, within my personal knowledge.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on another question of privilege. The privilege arises at this time because Your Honour's attention was fully drawn to the fact that this violation was taking place.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has indicated his concern on this point of order. I am not sure if he was referring to the vote which has just finished, when I heard a bit of disturbance in the House. I repeat that I have no personal knowledge that any hon. member has violated our Standing Orders. I must leave it at that.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1972, except those votes concurred in earlier this day, and less amounts voted in interim supply, be concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed to the said motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried on division.

Mr. Drury thereupon moved that Bill C-221, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the year ending March 31, 1973, be read the first time and be printed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Drury thereupon moved that Bill C-221 for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1973, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Fortin: On division.

Bill reported.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, before the bill is read the third time I should like to say that what we have done in passing almost $9 billion in estimates tonight is an indication that the present method of passing estimates is not satisfactory, in the opinion of many Members of Parliament. If some other arrangement for estimates is not made, a procedure such as took place tonight will have to be pursued, but other arrangements should be made so that hon. members can really control in a legislative way the expenditure of Canadian tax dollars.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time.

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Drury moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

An hon. Member: On division.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it. I declare the said bill carried on division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Speaker: It being after ten o'clock, this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock this day.

At 3.06 a.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR SUBMISSION OF METHOD OF DEALING WITH ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE AND ORGANIZATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is too bad that the Minister of Finance is not here so that he could receive similar applause.

I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the experience last night when billions of dollars in estimates were passed in a matter of hours and the experience of the last year and a half during which expenditures do not receive that attention which constitutionally should be given by the House of Commons, and it being now apparent the amended rules have proven to be detrimental to this institution—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, all I can say it that last night the Prime Minister left in disgust over what was happening.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would hope that we would not resume at eleven o'clock the debate that we abandoned at three o'clock this morning. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman might like to ask his question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not easily provoked to answer, but when remarks like that are made I have to do so.

• (1110)

Would the Acting Prime Minister bring to the attention of the government the submission of the rules, particularly with reference to the examination of expenditures, to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization to the end that the rules that were in effect that permitted a proper examination by Parliament will be restored?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman is very much aware, the procedures were changed a few years ago to permit the examination in detail of the estimates of the various departments in committees of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: They have probably received more careful and detailed examination than at any previous time. This has meant that in the House we could devote more attention to other subjects. In addition, the opposition parties have had a number of allotted days. Whether they have used them to the best advantage is for them to judge, not for us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, after this recent experience, which is quite contrary to that described by the minister, will he have consideration given to making this institution once more responsible for the preservation of responsibility with respect to the vast expenditures that are being undertaken?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond is rising on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, my point of order arises from the Acting Prime Minister's reference to what the committees can do with the estimates. I refer to the meetings of the finance committee last week when the chairman of that committee ran the committee in such a way that he maintained the privilege of ruling on his own decisions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot cast reflections on a chairman of a committee or on any member in any capacity. In any event I suggest to the right hon. gentleman, to the Acting Prime Minister and to the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond that this is debate. For the moment I will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who has a supplementary question.

[Mr. Speaker.]

SUGGESTED REVIEW OF WORK OF COMMITTEES ON ESTIMATES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister arising out of his answer to the right hon. member for Prince Albert a moment ago. In view of the reliance the government seems to place on the consideration that is given to estimates in committees, will the government consider the possibility of reviewing the work on estimates that is done in committees to make sure that a more satisfactory accomplishment of our job in this area is achieved?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to pass along these suggestions from the right hon. member, the former Leader of the Opposition, and from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. We are very anxious to improve the rules of the House. All parties, however, agreed with the procedures that we are now operating under.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not so.

Mr. Sharp: After the experience of last night I think our procedures could be improved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Sharp: Therefore I have no hesitation in saying we would like to improve these procedures. But I do reiterate what I said before, and I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will admit it, that the estimates have received at least as careful consideration and even more careful consideration in committees as under the previous procedures.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously we are going to continue the debate and we might as well accept that fact. There are a number of supplementaries. Hon. members will be recognized for that purpose, but I would hope the questions will be for the purpose of seeking information and the responses will be for the purpose of giving information, and that neither will be for the purpose of embarking on debate. The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is seeking information. In considering this matter would the Acting Prime Minister not give consideration to the suggestions made by a very independent and objective witness, the Auditor General, who in his last report referred to the fact that parliamentary control over expenditures is being steadily eroded?

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in light of the answer of the Acting Prime Minister that the committees are doing the work, would he agree, when the government is looking at this question, to look at the experience of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting Films and Assistance to the Arts which deals with the estimates of the Secretary of State amounting to almost $1 billion? These estimates did not get more than six to eight hours consideration in total.

An hon. Member: Whose fault is that?

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct the attention of the Acting Prime Minister to the problems which confronted members of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works. Because of many conflicts the Minister of Public Works appeared before that committee for only two hours on the day before the time for study expired under the rules. That is another committee which should be looked at.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if I could ask a supplementary?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will appreciate that we are getting pretty far from the question period. This is just an ordinary, or perhaps extraordinary, debate during the question period. I will call on the hon. member for Calgary North for a supplementary and then I will recognize the hon. member for York South.

REQUEST THAT ESTIMATES OF SOME DEPARTMENTS BE CONSIDERED BY HOUSE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the Acting Prime Minister's statement that we agreed with the new rules. If he checks the speeches made by myself and others on this side he will see that we asked that the opposition have the right to request during each session of Parliament that four or five departments be brought in so that the pursestrings of the nation would still be controlled by Parliament. Would the Acting Prime Minister accept that suggestion and make a recommendation to the appropriate committee?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know that these suggestions will command the attention of the House leader and the committee that looks after procedures of the House. I have no hesitation in saying that I do not want a repetition of what happened last night and I do not think anyone here would. I believe we have made great advances in the consideration of the estimates. I reject the suggestion put forward that the House does not have—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sharp: —greater control than it ever had before.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is debate. The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Baldwin: Is that why you have only got five bills for Royal Assent?

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASES—REQUEST THAT APPELLANT, DR. LLOYD BROWN-JOHN, BE PROVIDED WITH COPY OF TRANSCRIPT OF PROCEEDINGS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Communications. Some time ago I asked him some questions about the increase in rates granted Bell Canada and drew his attention to the fact that a gentleman in Windsor was appealing those rates. May I ask the minister whether he has completed his study of the various documents filed with the Canadian Transport Commission and whether he has given consideration to assisting this Canadian citizen in his appeal against these rate increases?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his patience. I hope to be able to conclude next week what action, if any, I should recommend on this matter, and perhaps I can convey that to him then. As far as the next part of the question is concerned, I have advised Dr. Lloyd Brown-John that I have a copy of the transcript of the hearings of the Canadian Transport Commission which he is most welcome to use as he wishes and to copy whatever parts of it he may require.

Mr. Lewis: I am not sure that I am patient; I am just not entirely awake, I suspect. May I ask the minister whether he offered to give Dr. Brown-John a copy of the transcript or was it an offer for him to come and study it here? I am asking the question because I think this Canadian ought to be given every possible assistance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The first part of the hon. member's question is acceptable but the second part is, of course, an explanation or representation. The minister might reply to the first part of the question.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I have not offered to supply a copy of the transcript to anyone who might choose to bring an appeal against any decision of the Canadian Transport Commission. I am not sure that would be appropriate. What I have offered is access to the copy that I have, and I am quite willing to have it go to Windsor if that is more convenient to Dr. Brown-John. I have not had any request from him up to this point.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister whether he would lend me his copy of the transcript so that a copy of it may get to Dr. Brown-John?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to have a visit from the hon. member at any time to share all my utmost secrets with him.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

ALLEGED REFUSAL BY INTERNATIONAL TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH CORPORATION TO PERMIT VISIT TO RESOLUTION ISLAND BY NORTHWEST TERRITORIES COUNCILLOR

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. It is based on a very serious report alleging that a member of the Northwest Territories Council while on a visit to his constituency was, when he attempted to visit Resolution Island in Frobisher Bay, forbidden entry to that island by the International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation of the United States. Has the minister heard of this report and has he done anything to convey the view of this Parliament and the view of the government that sovereignty in the Arctic rests in the government and the people of Canada?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could answer that question. That particular article has come to my attention and I have asked that an investigation be made. It may be that entry was forbidden for security reasons. I am not convinced of that and I am having the matter looked into at present.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct a question to the Minister of Labour but in his absence I will direct it to the Acting Prime Minister.

Could he tell the House what is the present situation concerning the St. Lawrence harbours?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that Judge Alan Gold is expected to summon the parties to arbitration imminently. The Minister of Labour has told the press that he expects the arbitration to get under way quickly and to be over quickly.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—POSITION OF PARTIES RESPECTING ARBITRATION—RESUMPTION OF WORK

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

In order to be clearer, could the Acting Prime Minister tell whether the two parties have willingly accepted arbitration and do the longshoremen expect to return to work soon?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I shall try to find out the facts. I would not want to mislead the House in any way. Perhaps later in the question period I could give the answer.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—STEPS TO ASSIST PORT OF MONTREAL TO REGAIN FORMER STATUS

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In light of reports that many shipping firms are pulling their business activities out of Montreal and going to other ports as a result of the dock strike, can the minister indicate what steps he intends to take to help the port of Montreal to regain its former status?

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member of the efforts made by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Rock: Mr. Speaker, I am talking about trade and commerce.

YOUTH

STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR RETURN TO WEEKLY RATHER THAN HOURLY PAY SCALE

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. As the government's career oriented summer work program was designed to assist students financially and as this year's change from a weekly to an hourly pay scale will result in loss of income of up to $130 per student for the summer's work, will the minister consider a return to the former pay scale in order to enable students to save more money toward meeting greatly increased university fees?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look at that question.

Mrs. MacInnis: As this year it was not explained to students applying for this program on the new hourly basis that the summer work week in the government service shrinks to 35 hours, with a resulting loss of salary, will the government make good this lack of explanation by paying these students what they would have received on last year's basis?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a representation.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—INQUIRY AS TO RECONSIDERATION OF RESERVES BY ENERGY BOARD

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises out of the recent public statement by the minister to the effect that he thought reconsideration should be given by the National Energy Board to the quantity of natural gas reserves in Canada, particularly in view of recent discoveries in the Arctic. Because of that statement and because of the application to the National Energy Board by Dome Petroleum for the export of ethane, has the government asked the board to reconsider its judgment with respect to Canadian natural gas reserves which it made last November?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, not in general terms, no. The hon. member will recall that the Dome application is really to determine whether the ethane proposal is separable from the general export of gas. At the moment the government and Dome Petroleum are awaiting the decision of the National Energy Board on that question. On the broader question, the question of reserves would only arise with respect to the possibility of taking into account frontier oil and gas reserves which at the moment are not accessible and are still being proven.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE—PERCENTAGE OF CANADIAN PARTICIPATION—AVAILABILITY OF CANADIAN CAPITAL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In light of reports in the financial pages of the Globe and Mail and other financial papers of Canada and the fact that the minister talks about Canadian participation with regard to the building of a proposed pipeline to transport natural gas from the Arctic to industrial centres in Canada and the United States, will the minister inform the House what percentage of Canadian participation there will be and what guarantee was made in that regard when he met with the American companies which make up about 75 per cent of the consortium?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet met with the new consortium. My objective would be to have majority Canadian equity participation in the pipeline and to have the vast majority, particularly of the consultant and engineering work, done by Canadians operating here in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the fact that in the same article it is reported that if the pipeline were built to join up with the Alberta Trunk gas line or to the lakehead, the one pipeline would cost $3 billion and the other would cost $5 billion, has the minister in his research or investigation considered whether Canada would have sufficient financial resources to put up the majority of the money to build the pipeline in question? Can he assure the country and the House in that regard at this moment?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I do not happen to be an investment dealer and therefore I cannot give the hon. member a forecast on the state of the market this year, next year or in the next five years. However, I would point out that this project will not only be the largest financing project ever undertaken in Canada but the largest financing project ever undertaken in North America. Therefore it is very likely that other than Canadian financing, preferably in debt form, would be required for the project.

TEXTILES—REGULATIONS RESPECTING PENSIONS—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF ACT

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Given the very high standards governing pensions for the employees of the textile industry who must retire at age 55, can the hon. minister tell us if he intends to table amendments to the legislation allowing these pensioners to draw their pension without too much trouble?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this part of the textile industry policy comes under the Minister of Labour and I know that he has received requests to soften the administration of this program. I will see the minister on the matter.

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO PREVENT CLOSURE OF PORT MOODY PLANT OF CASCADE-DELTA BENCO COMPANY

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the minister aware that the recently merged Cascade-Delta Benco Company, a manufacturer of cablevision equipment, has decided to close its Port Moody plant with the loss of some 60 jobs in that area? As the Vancouver metropolitan area's unemployment rate is now running about 9 per cent, will the minister look into this closure and use his good offices to persuade the company not to close that plant?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly look into that.

Mr. Rose: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I did not quite catch the minister's mumbled answer. I wish to ask a supplementary question. Since Cascade-Delta Benco is largely foreign-owned and its principals hold immense interests in cable broadcasting, including public licenses granted by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, will the government urge the CRTC to investigate this company on the grounds of concentration of ownership in the media?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will make a contribution if he will vote in favour of Bill C-201 which would give the government some power in cases of takeovers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—REPORTED UNWILLINGNESS OF UNION TO SUBMIT TO ARBITRATION—POSSIBILITY OF INQUIRY COMMISSION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. It is supplementary to those asked about the labour dispute in Montreal. It concerns the minister's announcement yesterday that the parties to the dispute in the longshoremen's strike in Montreal would submit to arbitration, and an article in today's Globe and Mail which quotes a longshoreman spokesman as saying that all that was discussed with the minister was the setting up of a commission of inquiry and that the union did not want to submit to arbitration.

Exactly what is the situation with regard to getting this strike settled? Can the Acting Prime Minister report to the House at this time?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is in substance much the same as the question already asked by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie. I will try to get an answer before the question period is over.

COMPLAINT AGAINST STATEMENT BY JUDGE THAT USE OF ALCOHOL CAUSE OF PROBLEMS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question of which I have given notice. Has the hon. gentleman received a letter from the British Columbia Association of Non-Status Indians complaining about the conduct, in terms of language, of a British Columbia Supreme Court Justice, Mr. Justice Gould, in the course of a judgment in which he said the problems of Indians arose from alcohol? Is the minister in receipt of this letter calling for an inquiry and the dismissal of the judge in question, and can he advise the House what action he intends to take?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): I have not yet looked at the letter or considered the nature of the complaint. I will do so, of course, and decide at that time whether any action is warranted.

Mr. Alexander: I realize this is a tricky issue, but in view of repeated utterances of such a nature which are certainly affecting the well-being of our native peoples, would the minister take it upon himself to issue a directive or statement for the benefit of the judiciary making it clear that this type of thing cannot be tolerated?

Mr. Speaker: That, of course, is a suggestion or a representation. It is not a question seeking information.

REQUEST FOR GRANT TO HALL OF FAME IN TORONTO

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In his absence I will direct it to the Acting Secretary of State. In view of the fact that large amounts of money are allotted annually on behalf of culture and art, is the hon. gentleman aware of the deplorable fact that the Canadian Sports Hall of Fame in Toronto is reported to be entirely without financial support or assistance to allow for proper maintenance and improvement of facilities? Will the Acting Secretary of State look into this situation and make every effort to provide a moderate source of financial assistance for this worthy project?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will allow someone to reply on behalf of the government but I would think the second part of the question is not really a question but rather a representation. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary might reply to that part of the question which is in order.

Mr. Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to look into it to see, first of all, whether we have a responsibility in this area.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, questions of this kind come before the courts, and I am not sure that it would be appropriate for me to comment on a case which is in a sense sub judice.

Mr. Ryan: Has this question been considered at cabinet level?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that a question such as that is entirely out of order.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec Minister of Industry and Commerce recently stated, according to the newspaper Le Devoir, that his relations with his federal counterpart were extremely harmonious; I would say the same. UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—NUMBER OF AMERICAN COMPANIES MAKING USE THEREOF—POSSIBLE USE OF CUSTOMS REGULATIONS TO IDENTIFY COMPANIES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether the number of United States corporations which have applied for DISC status is now stabilized at around 2,000 or is the number still climbing? May I ask him also whether he has now decided to request the United States government for an official list of the DISC corporations which have been set up?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the last figure I recall was about 2,000. That was at the end of May, and it was going up by 300 to 400 a month. I do not have the latest report. I have said on a number of occasions that we do not intend to ask for a list from the United States because we have good reason to believe we would not get it. We are still working on a procedure by which we would be informed by way of customs declarations of the use of a direct subsidy on exports to Canada from the United States or any other country which uses direct export subsidies.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Minister of National Revenue whether the government has considered using the customs regulations as a means of identifying DISC corporations which may be exporting into Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We are studying this quite actively.

[Later:]

UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—POSSIBLE CONTRAVENTION OF TAX TREATY

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to that posed by my hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether the government has looked into the possibility of the DISCs formed in the United States being in contravention of the tax treaty between Canada and the United States?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I made a few statements on that subject months ago to the effect that I thought this procedure was not in accordance with the GATT, either in letter or in spirit. I expressed the thought, also, that it did not accord very well with the spirit of the auto agreement.

Mr. Burton: My question was: Has the government determined whether DISCs are in contravention of the tax treaty between Canada and the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the tax treaty between Canada and the United States is not concerned with matters of this kind; it is concerned with matters having to do with double taxation. However, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has said, we do contend that DISC is contrary to the trade agreements we have with many countries, including the United States, under the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM—POSSIBLE USE OF CUSTOMS REGULATIONS TO IDENTIFY COMPANIES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue a question arising out of the answer he gave to my colleague. If I understood him correctly he said the government was considering getting information through customs declarations with respect to direct subsidies on exports by all countries. May I ask the minister what gives rise to such a need, considering we are dealing with the effects of DISC legislation by only one country and, second, when may we expect to see the regulations which either the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Minister of National Revenue is preparing?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we want to be sure in any program we put forward that we are able to get information with respect to any possible cases of this type arising from the action of all other countries with whom Canada trades. We are, as I have said, actively studying an appropriate method of doing what my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, has mentioned. As soon as we are ready to announce our conclusions we shall do so.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): I do not think so, Mr. Speaker; the cost would be prohibitive.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

ALLEGED REFUSAL BY INTERNATIONAL TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH CORPORATION TO PERMIT VISIT TO RESOLUTION ISLAND BY NORTHWEST TERRITORIES COUNCILLOR—CANADIAN POLICY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it arises out of the question asked earlier by the hon. member for Spadina. Are there today in the Arctic Islands of our country areas in regard to which the decision whether a Canadian shall enter is determined by military regulations of the United States, and that no one can go on those islands without the consent of the International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation of New Jersey? I ask this question because, if such is the fact, it constitutes a flagrant invasion of the rights of Canadians.

[Mr. Bell.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence is looking into the facts which may or may not be as represented in this newspaper article. I think that until we know what the facts really are it would be imprudent to answer the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to find out what is the basis for the facts. Has the government of Canada under an exchange of notes granted certain rights whereby portions of our northern areas are subject to United States military law and Canadians are denied their right to be in the areas in question? I repeat has there been any such arrangement made with the United States?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I would doubt that there are any arrangements of such a kind in effect except those relating to security. These would affect not only Canadians but anybody else who wanted to enter upon property where matters are secret in the interest of the security of Canada. I am sure the right hon. gentleman would agree that this would be quite appropriate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have asked a simple question. The Secretary of State for External Affairs says that there may be or there may not be such arrangements. During his administration, or that of his predecessor, has the government of Canada agreed that a United States corporation shall determine Canadians' rights to be in the north? Do not excuse it by reason of security.

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER PROTEST TO DENMARK AGAINST HIGH SEAS SALMON FISHING OPERATIONS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the continued intransigence of the Danes with respect to the salmon fishery, has the government made any further protests since the Washington meetings? If so, can the minister give us in a general way the nature of such protestations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have, of course, continued our attitude toward this question but we have not made any further specific representations. We made very strong representations in the past and I am sure that the Danes understand our position very well.

Mr. Lundrigan: Has the government taken any steps to prevent the importation of Danish salmon, which we might say is Canadian salmon, taken on the high seas in view of the fact that this seems to be one of the few sources of salmon this year?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, we have not taken any action of that kind.

IMPENDING NUCLEAR TEST BY FRANCE—RIGHT OF FRENCH TO PREVENT PEACEFUL PASSAGE OF VESSELS—PROTECTION OF "GREENPEACE III"

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the government of Canada accept that the government of France, or for that matter the government of any other nation, has the right to cordon off a section of the high seas and prevent the peaceful passage of vessels of any nation, including Canada's Greenpeace III?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, we deny that right.

Mr. Rowland: In light of the fact that the Greenpeace III is lawfully operating in international waters, has the government of Canada protested against France's announced intention to proceed with nuclear tests in the area, and what steps are being taken by the government of Canada to protect this Canadian vessel and its crew should such tests take place?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have informed the French government of our view of the legal position. We expressed our concern some time ago when we first heard about the possible voyage of some Canadians into that area. So the French government is fully aware of our position both in law and in fact. As I said yesterday, however, Canadians are free to travel anywhere they wish, and if they wish to place themselves in special hazard in this way there is nothing that I can do. I really do not know what measures I can take to prevent them from entering that area.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT PROHIBIT ACTION BY CORPORATION ON MATTERS BEFORE COURTS

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. The Acting Prime Minister has rightly said that the government does not wish to comment on matters that are before the courts. Will the government therefore take action with respect to the Cape Breton Development Corporation, a Crown company, to stop it from acting on matters that are before the courts?

[Later:]

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I direct my question of privilege to the Minister of Justice, since no one else on that side appears to take any interest in justice. A statute was voted on and passed unanimously by this House; yet a Crown company is denying the legal rights of pre-retired people in Cape Breton as well as the rights of widows and orphans. Would the minister examine Bill C-135, the act that set up the Cape Breton Development Corporation, and ask the president of that corporation to act in accordance with that legislation as passed by the House?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Acting Prime Minister that he promised to answer our questions regarding the longshoremen's strike and I wonder if he has something to tell us.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I now have some further information in reply to the two questions asked about the longshoremen's strike. I am informed that the arbitration procedure is a very speedy process which will clear up the matters in dispute and, we hope, permit an early return to work. With regard to the question whether the men have agreed to go back to work during the arbitration procedure, the answer is no, they have not. But the process itself is very speedy and we think it is the best way to deal with the matter at the present time. In respect of the question about a commission of inquiry I am also informed that the offer of the Minister of Labour to set up a commission of inquiry was conditional on neither party going to arbitration. The Maritime Employers Association has now decided to go to arbitration, which therefore takes precedence. We have no recent information to the effect that the union is unwilling to participate in the arbitration.

Mr. Gleave: A supplementary—

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DETERMINATION OF PAYMENT FOR WHEAT—EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO FLAXSEED, RYE AND RAPESEED

The House resumed, from Monday, June 5, consideration of Bill C-204, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture and motion No. 1 (Mr. Gleave).

Mr. Lang: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When this bill was last considered in the House, some question was raised concerning procedural difficulties with this amendment and perhaps the remaining two amendments to this bill. There have been discussions, and I believe there will be found to be general agreement to proceed with the amendments in every way as though they were in order without prejudice to that question. This, of course, in no way implies the acceptance of any particular amendment except for procedural purposes. I believe there will be found to be agreemement to proceed in that fashion at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: In the circumstances, the amendment which stands in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar will be put.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar) moved:

That Bill C-204, An Act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, be amended

(a) by deleting from Clause 5 lines 29 to 37 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"5. Section 35 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"35. (1) The Governor in Council may by regulation extend the application of Part III or Part IV or of both Parts III and IV to any or all of oats, barley, rye, flax seed or rapeseed or to all of them.

(2) Where the Governor in Council has extended the application of any Part under subsection (1), the provisions of that Part shall be deemed to be re-enacted in this Part, except that

(b) the expression "oat products", "barley products", "rye products", "flax seed products" or "rapeseed products", as the case may be, shall be substituted for the expression "wheat products";

(c) the sum certain per bushel to be fixed by the Governor in Council in respect of oats, barley, rye, flax seed or rapeseed may be so fixed basis in storage either Thunder Bay or Vancouver or only Thunder Bay or only Vancouver; and"

(b) by adding immediately after line 5 at page 5 the following:

"(3) The Governor in Council shall make any regulation extending the application of Part III or IV or of both Parts III and IV to any of rye, flax seed or rapeseed after considering the possibility of holding a plebiscite of the producers in consultation with the appropriate representatives of such organizations with co-operative or direct membership that are involved in the marketing or production of these three grains."

(c) by renumbering subsequent subsections accordingly.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this motion I should like first to point out its scope and the reason for it.

It is important to point out to the House that this motion asks that these three grains, flax, rye and rapeseed, or indeed any one of them, come under the jurisdiction and operations of the Canadian Wheat Board. More importantly, however, it asks that the producers of these grains be provided with an opportunity to make a decision, by the device of a plebescite or indeed by some other method if some other method is thought more appropriate, concerning how they wish to have all three of these grains or any one of them marketed. They might wish to continue with the present futures market, as we call it, using Vancouver and Thunder Bay as basing points, or they might prefer to market the grains through the Canadian Wheat Board as is done now in respect of the principal grains, wheat, barley and oats.

I believe it would be appropriate to give some reason for reviewing our methods of marketing and for considering alternatives to what we are doing now. One of the principal reasons for the review is the fact that we are now using quotas for the purpose of marketing all three grains, flax, rye and rapeseed. One has to go back only a few years to find the time when the Canadian Wheat Board did not administer quotas for flax and rapeseed. I am sure I would be perfectly safe in saying that the Wheat Board decided to administer quotas for flax and rapeseed only when it had no alternative. The Canadian Wheat Board felt it necessary to dwell at some length on the necessity for its administration of the quota for rapeseed.

On January 17, 1972, the Canadian Wheat Board issued a little booklet. A significant amount of space in that publication was devoted to the reasons which the Board felt made it necessary to administer quotas. The booklet reads, in part:

> Every effort is being made to ensure that the non-board grains will not jeopardize the movement of the principal grains grown on the Prairies.

Farther along, it reads:

> An equitable allocation of facilities is extremely difficult to achieve during an extended period, such as the present, when a very heavy export program is underway.

I will come back to that later. The producer finds himself in the position of selling his product on an open market with a price which can fluctuate as much as 50 cents per bushel up or down in any given futures market. Yet, when there is a high price in that particular market he cannot sell his product at that price because he likes that price. The producer must deliver the product when a quota permits him to deliver it. This certainly is one of the most important factors in the total equation.

I wish to point out again, as I did when I started, that it has not always been this way in respect of these grains. We have to go back only a short number of years into the late 1950's or following the Second World War when rapeseed became a significant commercial crop on the Prairies. When I first produced rapeseed, one could not deliver it to the local elevator. Instead, it had to be loaded over the platform. The first producers of this grain either did that or trucked it directly to a crushing plant.

The pricing system at that time was a contract pricing system. We used neither the open market nor the Wheat Board. It was a contract system and, if I remember correctly, we contracted through the pool, although they were not the principals. The principals rather were behind the pool and the pool was merely acting as an agent. I believe that Continental Grain was contracting. It was impossible at that time to get price information when you were marketing a particular product. I remember at one time being dissatisfied with the price which we were receiving. Since I was in Ottawa at the time I asked officials in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to find out the price at which the product was actually being sold in Montreal. At that time it was being purchased at twice the price which was being paid to the producer on the contract basis back in Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba, and so on.

The next move that was made was when the grain exchange started listing, pricing or quoting daily prices for rapeseed. At the same time, it established a futures market as well as one basic point for delivery, which was Thunder Bay. At that time there were only Fort William and Port Arthur, so this was an improvement. When the producer had some market information, he could at least look at the prices for that day of the particular product. It did not give him any security in price, which could easily move a $1 a bushel within a season or as much as 50 cents a bushel within a month, as it did last fall between August and November, I believe.

What this motion seeks to have done is an evaluation of the pricing procedures which we have now. I ask that the producer of this product have the opportunity to pass judgment on the present procedure and ascertain whether he would not get better treatment or a more equitable pricing system, one which would be more advantageous, through the Wheat Board rather than on the so-called open market. Over the years I have seen a great deal of heat generated in the Prairies in discussions comparing the Wheat Board market and the open marketing system. Usually more heat is generated than rationality, and that has been one of our misfortunes.

The second thing that happened in the open market under the exchange system was two or three years ago when it was decided that a second basing point would be opened thus establishing two future markets, Thunder Bay and Vancouver. If you look at the price of rapeseed, you will find that the futures are quoted for both Thunder Bay and Vancouver and you will find that they are quoted in different months, to use the term which is current in the trade. So you cannot transfer your interests from Vancouver into the same month in Thunder Bay because the schedule has been shrewdly drawn to eliminate this possibility. This is not the case on the exchange in the United States, where the futures in the different basing points can be transferred from one to the other.

Any marketing system or pricing system has to be judged on the basis of how well it works. The economists have a term for it which I cannot recall for the moment. It is supposed to be a perfect system or as nearly perfect as possible. The present system has demonstrated that it is far from perfect. You only have to examine it or read the comments of those who have examined it, to know that it is not a perfect system. Indeed, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) found it necessary to carry on correspondence with the grain exchange to ask whether the system could not work better, and they told him they would see what they could do about it. The minister tabled the correspondence at the request of an hon. member on this side of the House.

A particular situation really intrigued me, and I must call it to the attention of the House. We have here a very nice picture of the chief commissioner of the Canada Grains Commission, along with a story in the Free Press Weekly of May 6 which tells us that the Winnipeg Grain Exchange has asked the federal government to appoint a supervisor of trading in grain futures. I really wanted to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), in view of the fact that Mr. Pound, the chief commissioner, is responsible to him, whether he was going to comply with the request of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange to appoint a supervisor of trading in grain futures. I wondered, too, what kind of a wizard they would get to do that job. Would he be some kind of a superman keeping track of the switches and turns of the operators on that exchange? I wanted to ask him that but, as often happens to some of us backbenchers, when we want to ask a question it is not always possible.

The other aspect of the story that intrigued me was that there was an act passed to provide for the supervision of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. In 1939, Parliament passed the Grain Futures Act to provide supervision and regulation of trading, but it was never proclaimed. Following the 1930's, when the grain exchange system proved to be altogether incapable of effectively pricing the grains which it then had at its disposal, an act was brought in, but it was never proclaimed. If the government wants to do something about it, all they have to do is to proclaim that act. The story goes on to say that if the act is proclaimed, most likely the Canadian Grain Commission will act as supervisor. I do not know where the newspaper got this idea, but it intrigued me. I did not know that it was a part of the function of the grain commission to supervise or even take a look at the Winnipeg Grain Exchange.

Then, the article reads:

> Already H. D. Pound, chief of the Grain Commission, has made initial studies of the Washington's Commodity Exchange and the Mercantile Exchange and Board of Trade in Chicago.

Apparently somebody chased the Board of Grain Commissioners off to see how well these exchanges are working down in the United States. There is evidence that the government is or has been somewhat concerned about the effectiveness of the operation of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board was concerned enough to write to the exchange and say, in effect, "You are not working very well; tell us how you can do better out in Vancouver."

Unless Mr. Pound acted on his own as chief commissioner, then either the minister in charge of the Wheat Board or the Minister of Agriculture suggested that he take a look at the operations of the exchanges in the United States. Perhaps sometime during this debate the minister will enlighten us as to whether any instructions were given to Mr. Pound. So, Mr. Speaker, this is the situation we are looking at in the marketing of this grain.

I want to return to the quota system. Again, here is what the Wheat Board says about its administration:

> Once the production of a crop such as rapeseed exceeds 50 million bushels a year, quotas to control deliveries are necessary to ensure that the working space in country elevators remains sufficiently fluid to handle the other grains that must move through. The Wheat Board, acting in consultation with the grain trade, makes every effort to ensure that delivery quotas will not exert undue influence in the market for non-Board grains.

So, we have this interruption in the kind of flow that would be essential to let an open market flourish and operate. But this is not the only interruption we have. The other obstacle we have to the effective operation of an open market is the crushing plants that exist in western Canada, because the crushing plants have staked out a special position for themselves. They have said, "We must be assured of access to whatever supplies are within trucking distance of our plants, or as far as people will haul their grain in to us." They have insisted on special quotas that will allow them to get first call. This is also interfering with the pricing system. If a producer is within range of a crushing plant and he needs money, there is pressure on him to deliver to that plant, even though it may be paying him less money per bushel than the market indicates he might be able to get.

I have just pulled out one of the sheets which are issued by the Canadian Wheat Board, showing the situation as of March 27. Rapeseed under ordinary delivery in all blocks was 17 bushels, and as you go down you notice it is marked 7 bushels per quota acre. The crusher could take 20 bushels per assigned acre, and rapeseed, low erucic acid, was 20 bushels per assigned acre. We do not have a simple quota system such as exists for wheat and barley. We have a quota system which is adjusted to accomplish certain things. This is another factor in this pricing mechanism that makes a difference, and that prevents it from being what it might be or from operating as well as an open market system might operate. The producer is the man who carries the load, who wins or loses under this system, which, far from being perfect, is quite imperfect.

The other thing that is preventing an open market system from operating is that there is now a surplus, or a significant part of the crop which cannot be delivered, and which is hanging over the market. The big claim of those who favoured the open market system was that that type of a marketing system would clear the market. If you had an open market system and you allowed the grain merchants such as Continental, who are the international operators, and coming down past them to National Grain, to UGG and to SASK Pool, free access to the market, no restrictions, they could clear the market. But, Mr. Speaker, that balloon has been exploded. They could not meet the hard test of reality. We did not clear the market.

Now, we come to how the system really works. The street price that is established is an agreed price which two committees of grain companies, one for Saskatchewan and Manitoba and the other for Alberta, decide each day as the price. That is the system we have now. When I phoned my delivery point at Biggar the other day, there was a quota price for rapeseed and then there was under the schedule a premium of 17 cents a bushel. I have seen that premium go up and go down. Mr. Speaker, I waited some time last fall to deliver a carload of rapeseed, have it shipped to Vancouver, and sold at that point. It realized me $500 more than if I had sold it the same day at Biggar or, as we use the term, on the street at the elevator. That is a lot of money. A system which takes that kind of toll off the producer at a local point is a pretty poor system.

An official of the Farmers Union did the same thing a year or two ago, made the same kind of money, and made it public. The minister knows it. Anybody who can read knows it. You can get statements from very responsible officials who will confirm this sort of thing. You get a statement such as that made by Mr. Lockwood, the Second Vice-President of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, speaking at the Farm and Home Week in Saskatoon in January, 1972, when he said:

—producers must try to guess the course of a daily changing price that's affected by international events, about which they have only limited information.

He questioned the effectiveness of the method of pricing which we are now using and said:

Suspicion that price manipulation "is possible under certain conditions" with the present system of marketing rapeseed has been voiced by Saskatchewan Wheat Pool.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a statement from a public platform by one of the people whose business it is to act on behalf of the farmers in marketing that particular grain. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that when the Winnipeg grain exchange asks for somebody to supervise it, when a statement such as I have quoted is made by a man responsible for marketing grain, when there is the evidence that I have quoted about the imperfections in price and the correspondence which passed between the minister and the exchange, then there is enough evidence to justify giving the producer the opportunity to make a choice.

I do not claim, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian Wheat Board is infallible, and at times I have criticized it, but it does return to the farmer the price it receives on the market. However, I think it could do a much better job of forward pricing and making forward contracts. I think it could do a much better job than the present futures system. We should explore those alternatives and remedy the present shortcomings.

We know that there will be an excess of grain from time to time, and I think most people agree that there probably is no system which can guarantee to market the total production in any given year. The object is to ensure the best return possible to the farmer and we should seek a method that will accomplish this while giving the farmer the information and the choice. I hope that the parties in this House will achieve that object before this debate ends.

A little over a year ago, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board brought to the House for first reading, and then sent to committee, a bill which would have accomplished this first step. If I recall correctly, he said that it was not the intention of the government to force the pace, that it would be the producers who would make the final decision. However, whether the government got cold feet or whether it was the party to my right, in committee it was decided to take out this provision. Apparently, they did not want to give the farmers the choice.

We see reports emanating from Alberta that an agency of government is thinking of getting into the marketing of rapeseed. A statement from the Alberta government indicated their concern and possible intervention. I think they have decided not to act for the time being, possibly because it is a pretty risky venture for one province to go into the marketing of a grain of the scope and importance of rapeseed. They would need to be able to protect themselves from producers on the other side of the line who might choose to unload. I suppose they decided to back off and look at it again.

Experience has taught us that the most effective way of marketing these grains is on the basis of the total producing region. This holds true whether it is the Canadian Wheat Board or whether you are using the so-called open market system. I am satisfied that one of the reasons for our troubles with rapeseed is the open market system, because two futures markets are being operated, one in Thunder Bay and one in Vancouver. The product should be marketed on the basis of the whole region, if the growers would agree. Of course, if the growers wish to continue with the present haphazard system that is their privilege, but they are paying dearly for it. I know, as does the minister and the second vice-president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, Mr. Lockwood, and many other people, that the system is not working very well. The job of any pricing system is to return the price for the product to the producer through the marketing mechanism. Of course, those who operate it are going to take their normal cut, but the people who operate this system are not satisfied with the normal—every once in a while they reach out for the big bite.

Because of the quota system which is now a part of the total marketing system the producer cannot protect himself against the big bite. The producer cannot gather together enough grain under the quota system, forward the grain by the carload and obtain the price that he should get. As I say, he cannot do that because he is not given a large enough quota. He cannot move sufficient grain at any given point in time. So, because of what we are doing, the grain producer cannot always protect himself and obtain the high price under the system to which he is entitled.

Those who advocate the future's market say, "Look, the producer can buy a future at a certain time and assure himself of a certain price; or, he can sell now, in the present, and assure himself of a certain price." Mr. Speaker, that is all very well, but you need a margin of 25 cents; and that margin only protects you to the extent of 15 cents because, if you are long in the market and the price goes down by 15 cents, the brokers will close you out unless you put up more money. To play this market, the producer must have a fair amount of cash. If he uses that cash, he forefeits the interest on it. Very likely he has borrowed it and would pay, at current rates, between 8 and 9 per cent interest. So, if he is to play the future's market, the interest he must pay on borrowed money will become another charge that his farming operation must bear, and a very unproductive charge it is, Mr. Speaker. If a farmer wants to do this, and very few do, he would probably do it, or need to do it, early in the fall when he is fairly short of cash. So, as I say, he must borrow the money, pay the interest on it, and play this market if he wants to protect himself against falling prices or, as they say in the trade, if he is to insure a price that is going on that particular day. This is a fairly cumbersome system and, so far as I know, not many producers use it.

This House must give the farmer the opportunity to choose; that is all. Let us give him that opportunity. Let the producer decide what kind of system he wants. After all—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the House give its unanimous consent to allowing the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I had practically completed my remarks. In conclusion I say, let the producer choose. Give him the choice. That is what I say in my motion. Let him exercise his choice through his organizations or, directly, through his vote. Let him choose whether he prefers this or that kind of system. The choice should be his. At present, he is not given the opportunity to exercise that choice, and he ought to be given that opportunity. After all, the facts are well known, as I said earlier. One need not hunt for them; they are available for anyone who wants to look at them. A few hours research is all that is needed, because the facts are out in the open.

Let me repeat what I have said. I say to this House and to the minister, give the producer a choice. Do not tell him what to do. Give him the facts and let him make the choice. If you do that for the western farmer he will, from my experience, make a pretty intelligent decision.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I can agree with one important point which the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) made in speaking to his motion, namely, that consideration of this issue concerning the marketing of rapeseed, particularly, deserves reason and rationality rather than the heat which this issue has tended to generate in days gone by. In order to bring about additional understanding of the problem, I appointed a committee to study the rapeseed marketing system. It was a committee composed of two distinguished producers and a member from the rapeseed association. It was directed to look at the way the existing marketing system is operating and to make recommendations for possible changes and improvements.

At all times it had been my position that the manner of marketing rapeseed should, indeed, be chosen by the producers, although that, perhaps, is oversimplifying the position since it is not easy to define a producer or to determine the opinion of the producer on an issue as complicated as this. In any event, it was my position that it was up to the producer to make that marketing decision with respect to his product and that we ought then to co-operate by having available the necessary mechanisms for marketing producers' products in the manner they chose.

The marketing committee I set up came forward with a certain number of recommendations concerning the existing marketing system for rapeseed. Many of those recommendations have since been put into effect. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) referred to an exchange of correspondence with the grain exchange. This was part of a group of discussions and exchanges with the Canadian Wheat Board and other bodies concerned with the grain trade, and all these were in line with the recommendations made by the committee. Many recommendations that committee made have been put into operation, resulting in an improved marketing situation for rapeseed at present.

The committee looked at the question of the board market versus the open market and concluded that, indeed, producers' views should be ascertained on this matter. It concluded that those views ought to be a factor in any decision but that, before producers could properly turn their attention to this question, more work ought to be done in examining alternative systems, namely, board markets, pooling systems, and the open market. Information was needed to which producers might have access in order that they might understand the various alternative systems available and make their choice intelligently.

I trust that the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has read the subsequent report that followed from that recommendation. After receiving the recommendation from what I have always thought was an extremely good committee, I asked the members to turn around, so to speak, analyze the systems mentioned and to produce a summary of that analysis for producers. This has been done and, accordingly, the outcome of the study regarding the various systems of marketing rapeseed, including the presently existing system, is available to producers. Producers' organizations have taken that report and summarized it for wider distribution to producers generally. I recommend it to the hon. member and to all who are interested in this subject. I ought to add that few people have suggested anything other than that the committee did an extremely good job in this field. I recommend the report to all people interested in problems that might be encountered in marketing of this type. Any people so interested, I suggest might with more advantage read that report than the analysis given us by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar—and I say that with all respect.

This is not a simple matter. It is a complicated matter and, therefore, the report is also complicated. For that reason, I have felt it appropriate to take some further time before determining what is the opinion of producers on this issue. It is significant in my mind that producers' organizations have tended to veer from positions they previously adopted. At one time many of them flatly recommended that rapeseed, flax and rye ought to be brought under the Canadian Wheat Board. Many now recommend, instead, the taking of a plebiscite or the obtaining of the views of producers on that issue, partly in recognition of the complexities of the issue and, possibly, because a significant number of producers favour the open market as opposed to the board market system. I, myself, have avoided taking a particular stand, because I wanted it to be clear that I was prepared to do what the producers wanted. I have tried to inform, rather than choose a particular stand with regard to various systems of marketing.

As the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar noted, the bill now before us, when first introduced to this House by myself, contained a provision very similar in purport to that of his amendment. Subsequently in the committee, and I say this because the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar did not seem to appreciate this, the section was removed in an effort to facilitate speedier passage of the very important other portions of the bill. This section was, in effect, stood aside with an indication that a support separate bill would be brought forward with regard to it. This is still my intention at some appropriate time, perhaps after producers' views are in fact known with certainty.

It should be apparent to hon. members that we do not need this amendment to obtain producers' views, when it is decided that the time is right to determine them. At that time, this government and this Parliament will have to take the responsibility in translating and understanding the producer's view and making come true that which hon. members generally support, namely that what producers want to have done in the way of marketing ought to be done for them by us if machinery is required.

At that point in time, we removed this section from the bill in committee. Because of the consideration in committee, I will, and I urge my colleagues to do the same, vote against the amendment, even though it is practically in the words of the original proposition I put forward. I will do that because I am respectful of the committee's wish, what I know was their wish, to have some careful and detailed deliberation and perhaps representations from organizations concerning this section before it is acted upon in Parliament.

Upon determining with clarity the views of the producers, we will take steps to ensure that whatever is required in the way of appropriate legislation for better marketing for producers is available. I say that in a general way because the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar has referred as well to the Grain Future's Market Act. If the open market is continued, and this is a comment in the committee report, some additional supervision may be required.

In examining the matter, the rapeseed committee visited some other exchanges in the world to see what operating system would be appropriate and what sort of supervision would be required. I am afraid, however, that the statute on the books, which has never been proclaimed, would not be adequate to do the job. It certainly could not deal with the matter of proper supervision of rapeseed. If this route is to be followed, we are likely to be faced with the need for legislation in the next session of Parliament to make sure that the open market system works as well as possible.

I should point out to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar that his discussion on quotas is something of a red herring in this area. The special position of crushers with relation to rapeseed is a decision that the Wheat Board has taken in operating quotas. I am satisfied it would act in exactly the same way if it were operating with rapeseed as part of its marketing responsibilities. This is shown by the fact that it is not just for rapeseed that special quotas exist to meet the needs of a crusher in the immediate area. In the case of barley or certain special kinds of wheat where there is a special market and a somewhat similar situation with a crusher or miller, the wheat board has taken special action for such quotas to make sure supplies are available. They have done this even though they recognize that this interferes with the basic principle of full equity; however, it makes sense to provide crushing plants access to supplies in the neighbouring area and an orderly marketing system in that regard. There is a balancing involved. The wheat board makes these decisions with regard to wheat and barley and consistently in the same way.

I say that we do not need this motion to determine the wishes of producers. When we are satisfied and, indeed, when producer organizations indicate that they feel there has been a satisfactory analysis of the rapeseed committee report by producers as well as other information that is available, we will be prepared to determine the wishes of the producers with regard to marketing and proceed with whatever legislation may be required, whether it be of the sort contained in the motion or of the sort that would provide better supervision of the exchange. That is the situation which leads me to vote against a motion which is very much in the words of a section contained in the original bill that I introduced in the House some time ago.

The importance of the bill was the reason we tried to bring it forward into law. It was a vain attempt, but we did try to bring it forward. It is an extremely important bill. It may allow the Wheat Board to price barley out of Vancouver as well as Thunder Bay, and so deal with the problems of the Alberta producers. It may allow the wheat board to set up separate pools with regard to protein wheat and take further steps in connection with the existing protein grading system. It will allow the Wheat Board to have extend quotas through a crop year end and solve some very serious quota problems and, therefore, produce a better equity system. It also introduces a better quota enforcement system, better both in efficiency and in the humanity of its operation.

For these reasons, we wanted the bill brought forward. It would not be fair to the committee deliberations with regard to this particular problem to proceed with this matter now. For that reason, I will oppose the amendment.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I am very appreciative of the minister's comments with regard to this motion. As I remember the events that transpired in committee, in order to facilitate passage of the bill, at least those portions of the bill with which the committee members were in complete agreement, it was necessary to remove the controversial section. That section happens to be similar to the motion moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave). The section was not controversial to the point that it was objectionable, however, there did not seem to be sufficient time for the committee to deal with the proposal.

Upon reflection, I feel that perhaps the committee may have dealt with the whole thing and called witnesses later. However, time having passed and hindsight being better than foresight, the committee hoped that the entire bill could have been proceeded with at the earlier session. Having reached this stage, and having the assurance of the minister that there will not be any wholesale approval of this particular motion by him, we can express ourselves openly as to the whys and whereforces of the suggestion contained in the motion.

I have agreed with the minister on several occasions. The minister accepted the suggestion I made in committee and withdrew the objectionable portion. At that time, I suggested that this amendment should be introduced on another occasion, if for no other reason than to debate the issue. We have always stated that we would not mind a plebiscite, but the minister's original proposal and the present proposal of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar do not suggest that there will, shall or must be a plebiscite. It suggests that there may be a plebiscite. The motion reads and I quote:

—any . . . rye, flax seed or rapeseed after considering the possibility of holding a plebiscite of the producers in consultations with the appropriate representatives of such organizations with co-operative or direct membership that are involved in the marketing or production of these three grains.

These words are not sufficiently clear. The matter was left entirely to the discretion of the minister. We objected to the minister having an unrestricted right to announce, one day, that these grains should be included. That is the position we took then and our position has not changed since. We do not mind the producer having a say, or a vote, on the issue if it is his wish.

My views on this question may not coincide with those of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave). I was somewhat amused to hear him arguing in favour of control by the Wheat Board while at the same time telling us he made $500 on one carload of rapeseed. That, in itself, nullified his argument. I know other farmers who have done likewise. Then again, there are farmers who cannot take a similar advantage because of closed quotas applied by the Wheat Board. I know a producer in my area, he happens to live about 20 miles from my home, who had a long, hard fight with the Wheat Board over this very issue. He arranged for several cars to be spotted at his delivery point. He shipped the rapeseed to Vancouver and paid the storage on it for 42 days, if my memory serves me correctly. He made himself $2.92 on every bushel of rapeseed, amounting to about $800 in all, not $500 as was made by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. In other words, it is possible for any farmer to take advantage, but the restriction is there to the extent that the Wheat Board imposes a quota.

I would point out again for the benefit of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar that the quota restriction itself tends to equalize prices anyway. Why is it that some people seem to like others to do the calculations behind the scenes? They do not complain then. But if they are affected directly they object to it. Why is it necessary to deliver to the pool or to any other agency? I heard the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) say "Hear, hear!" When the statement was made that the elevator companies were gouging the farmers. Well, it happens to be the pool in this case. It is the pool which is speculating. Why are the hon. member and his friends always defending the rights of the pool? I am not objecting to the system of delivery to the pool, but why, all of a sudden, should there be two standards? Why is it that this system has a right to gouge the farmers, apparently without any protest being made? It is perfectly all right, we hear. It is not all right. Every farmer wants to have as much money as possible. It happens that the pool got delivery in the first place, and when they sold, they made a profit.

There is no need for me to go into the philosophy of the pool system because everybody understands it. In this case, 64 per cent of the system happens to be owned by the Saskatchewan Pool. So why are we arguing? There seems to be a great deal of contradiction on the part of members of the New Democratic Party in their approach to the subject. They seem to want one thing while pressing for something quite different. They do not know where to stand. For instance, they are saying there might be a plebiscite. But they are not saying there will be a plebiscite. The words are "after considering the possibility of holding a plebiscite". In effect, they are telling farmers that someone, at some time, may decide if and when there should be a plebiscite. This is the verbiage which was used here. In other words, it is a lot of nonsense. If it were stated that a plebiscite must be held, I would agree readily. But he does not say that. A decision shall be made if and when His Royal Highness pleases. Well, in my estimation the Royal Highness here must be the farmer. But according to the NDP, the Royal Highness here is the minister or some official in the department.

Well, I have delivered rapeseed and so has the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. We have delivered it at high prices and low prices, and he and I know that the very fact that the quota exists prevents us from delivering any more than the Wheat Board has already specified. I can readily understand that the crushers require a continuous supply of rapeseed for their operations. I would hate like Sam Scratch to have the crushers stop their operations until the Wheat Board said it would open up a quota, and somebody had better deliver because the price is at such and such a level. I would want that crusher to be operating every day, if for no other reason than to ensure a continuity of employment and a continuous flow of the product to market.

This whole process is presently in an infant stage in western Canada. It must avoid taking unnecessary chances if it is to become firmly established in world markets. This is potentially a great industry. For hon. members to suggest at this time that we should start putting clamps on the crusher is wrong, because the industry has yet to establish itself. In my area, deliveries have come from a radius of 150 miles of the crusher. I hear many praises from farmers who recognize the benefits produced by this operation. Contrary to what some may believe, deliveries can be made on any particular day a farmer may choose. He can pick up the phone at any time and say "I think the price is right, now". But delivery must be made to the crusher in order that it may continue production. Can hon. members imagine shutting down a plant for two months in the middle of winter—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I was commenting on the fact that the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) had destroyed his own argument about excluding the three grains, rapeseed, rye and flaxseed, from the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board since on his own initiative he said he had made $500 on a carload of rapeseed that he had shipped, and which every farmer is on his own initiative entitled to emulate, requestion the railways to spot a car for him. Having made his $500, the hon. member should not deny other farmers the same privilege. However, there will come a time when the hon. member will not make $500, but will lose a few hundred. In other words, the averaging principle still applies. All that the Wheat Board really does is to average out the quantity delivered by farmers. The farmers deliver their grain to someone else and take their money at the end of the year. They are not concerned about the price at the moment of delivery; rather the initiative is left to another group of people, who may or may not make the right decision.

The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar did make the right decision to sell at that particular time at that particular price. I have already mentioned the fact that a farmer within 20 miles of me made $2.92 on some rapeseed, as of course he was entitled to do. But is it of any comfort to the farmers to know that the wheat pool does all this for them, adding on the delivery charges and the whole cost of the operation? Or is it of greater comfort to the farmers to know that on their own initiative they are able to reveal in many instances the weaknesses of the present system?

If the farmers leave things entirely to the Wheat Board, they come to think that the Board is equivalent to the Almighty, that it is just like belonging to the Roman Catholic church. I happen to be a Roman Catholic myself, but whatever the Roman Catholic church does is perfectly all right. You do not deny the church. However, many people are trying to change the system. Many people are trying to change the Wheat Board or the wheat pool and to come up with a better system. If it is all right to challenge something as sacred as religion then it should be perfectly all right to challenge the Wheat Board system. This is exactly what has happened. No one, except the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) has suggested for one moment that we must use the Wheat Board because it is sacred. He said if we put everything under the Wheat Board, things would run smoothly.

The hon. member gave an example of how he had received $500 on a carload he delivered. I am prepared to give an example of a farmer who received $800. On his own initiative he asked for a car, spotted the car at his own delivery point and delivered to Vancouver. He went through the whole process. At the same time he pinpointed the date at which he would sell the grain. In other words, there are arguments for and against. I shall not dwell in that further, except to point out that there are many examples of this.

I do not think the Wheat Board system is necessarily advantageous. It blinds one to what actually happens. The $500 which the hon. member received could have been more. He does not know this. He is blinded to the fact that there is a system working against him. The hon. member wants the Wheat Board to do everything for him. He admits that on his own initiative he made himself $500. I believe his approach to the whole problem is rather stupid. The Canadian farmer needs a more realistic approach. The hon. member did the right thing, but then he said he wanted the same privilege for everybody else. Nonsense! People are not prepared to share anything with anybody else unnecessarily. The point is that if necessary, others share with the hungry, the needy and so on, but in this case a man struggles for his own existence. If we were speaking of a farming industry which was flourishing, that would be fine and dandy, but this industry is not in that situation.

I shall not dwell any further on this point. The hon. member is not very realistic in respect of his motion. The committee had been asked to interview witnesses, and yet we never had an opportunity to do so. There are persons who may have expressed opinions different from mine who might have convinced me to agree with them. I have bent this way and that. The minister knows very well I have been quite flexible in most of my dealings with him, in an effort to accommodate him. My original position at that time was that if we withdrew this particular clause, the bill could be passed. One does not face reality if he suggests at this particular time that the Wheat Board is the final solution to the problem. Barley is selling for 90 cents a bushel to the feeders in the area of Saskatoon and yet the Wheat Board is buying it for 65 cents a bushel. Who is a stupid fool! The farmers are not delivering their barley.

Mr. Lang: They are.

Mr. Korchinski: The minister is making a vain attempt to prove his point. The farmers are catching on to the fact that it was sold at a very low price, and that they will be able to obtain a better price within a year. I challenge the minister to tell me this is not a fact. Will he rise at this particular time and say it will not be sold at a higher price?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the hon. member whether he is aware of the fact that barley deliveries on the prairies have been running at around 20 million bushels as of the past week and this is something of an all-time record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The time allotted to the hon. member has expired but the minister having raised a question perhaps the House would allow the hon. member an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Korchinski: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I did not hear the minister's question. I threw out a challenge to him which I thought was valid. If the minister said that 20 million bushels have been sold, this does not mean that it has been sold at a higher price. Most farmers realize it has been sold at a very low price. It was given away; this is the point. The farmers know that if they hold it for another year they will obtain far more for their grain. That is why they are holding their barley at this particular moment.

I have not completed my remarks, Mr. Speaker, but I understand my time has terminated.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments I should like to make in respect of this bill. I assure the minister, however, that I will not take up too much time because I am as interested as he is in seeing this bill pass. This would seem an opportune time to make a few comments in respect of quotas as they apply in the country. It seems to me that often the quota arrangements are made by very able and very clever people who in many cases have never actually farmed, and who sometimes are unaware of the effect of these problems on the individual farmer. I wish to talk about terminal quotas. I think that, in general, the minister's idea is a good one. It is not reasonable to expect the railways or the elevators to handle a large proportion of the crop in a period of a few months at the end of the season, as they sometimes attempt to do. I think the minister is bringing at least some common sense into the quota system. I commend him for this. He complains sometimes that we do not give him credit for the good things he does. I wish to go on record in respect of this particular item. I believe it is an improvement.

One concern the farmers have about the terminal quotas is the fact that frequently municipalities have not built roads into their farms. Some farmers have difficulty because they cannot haul grain during the winter time because of snow or because of rain during the summer months. Sometimes the terminal quota will present a problem because some farmers are unable to deliver at the appropriate time. I would urge the minister to use some judgment in respect of the cut-off time. He has shown some indication that he will extend the barley quota if necessary.

I have another comment I wish to make concerning terminal quotas at the end of the year. I think that they should be at least near enough to the year end so that persons do not have to resort to storage if they wish to sell that grain on January 2 instead of in December. Hopefully, farmers will be in a position to pay income tax, and they have the same problem in arranging their business as does anyone else. If you must haul the grain, deliver it and then pay storage on it because of the quota which someone else has arranged for you, I suggest that this power to arrange your business is taken out of your hands. It is not reasonable that this should be so. I would ask the minister to consider setting the terminal quota not on December 10 but on December 16, 18 or 20 so as to take care of this obvious problem.

Now, I would like to speak briefly on another matter. I received a letter from a Peter Kirchgesner at Unity in connection with quotas at domestic crushing plants. I would like to say that the NDP, and I in particular, favour the rapeseed crushing industry in Saskatchewan and on the Prairies; we encourage it. I was a delegate when some of these matters were discussed with the Saskatchewan wheat pool, and I supported the industry. I would like to see more crushing plants for rapeseed. I have received complaints from individual farmers in connection with quotas on delivery to crushing plants. I have here a newsletter from Western Canadian Seed Processors at Lethbridge, stating that they do not seem to be getting enough rapeseed to satisfy their requirements. I will send it across to the minister and ask for his comments. If this is the case, I would like to know why these people cannot get enough rapeseed from the Wheat Board or from the market. Is there some financial difference from which these people would benefit, or is there some other reason?

Now, I should like to comment on the price of wheat, oats and barley under the Wheat Board. I favour the Wheat Board type of marketing, but I am a little perturbed at the low prices we are receiving for these grains. The fact of the matter is that there has been such a big movement of these grains that this might have concealed the poor price. If we had not had a reasonably high production, it would have been very apparent in the Prairies that the prices were much too low. I have been making inquiries in my constituency regarding the amount of grain left, and I have found that there is not as much on hand as the newspapers have indicated. At the moment, I am concerned about the fact that there is drought in some areas, and unless something happens to change the conditions, there will not be a big crop this year, particularly of coarse grains. In view of the quotas established this year, there may not be enough to sell. The low price for barley in particular is a cause for concern. The price of one and a half cents per pound for barley at the elevator is not very high when you consider the cost of producing the grain. I say that as a practical farmer who grows much of it. If you have a good crop, you must grow a great amount of it if you want to meet expenses, let alone make money when the price for barley is only one and a half cents per pound.

I should like to say a few words about the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave). He stated the reasons for giving the farmers a choice, particularly with regard to rapeseed, as to whether they want to sell their grain on the open market or under the Wheat Board. Last winter I spoke to an elevator agent who told me about a farmer who had 3,000 bushels of rapeseed which at that time was priced at $2.46 on the open market. He thought he would hold it until it went up to $2.50. Something happened to the market and the price went the other way. Eventually, he sold out at $2.06. At 40 cents a bushel and with 3,000 bushels to sell, the loss amounted to $1,200. One of the advantages of the open market is that you can always lose money on it.

I must say, in defence of the open market, that it is the best way I know of keeping farmers happy with the Wheat Board. If you talk to a man who has suffered a loss on 1,000 bushels of flaxseed, rapeseed or rye, you will find that he is inclined to think the Wheat Board's method of operation is not so bad after all, despite some problems we have had with it. Any time you meet someone who has lost $1,200, you find that he does not want to tell his wife that he finally sold out at $2.06 when he could have had $2.46, and certainly he does not want to brag about this to his neighbours. My own observation is that all too often farmers tend to lose rather than gain in situations such as this.

I should like to ask the minister and the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar to leave this decision in the hands of the farmers themselves. I know that I would want farmers to decide. A mechanism could be worked out whereby they could decide, and I would be willing to leave it at that. Certainly, at present this is not a happy situation in so far as the two price system for rapeseed is concerned. Quite a few farmers in the north end of my constituency grow rapeseed, and there were times when there was a 15 cents differential between Maidstone and Lloydminster in the price they were receiving. This seems odd when there are just a few miles between the two places and yet there is such a big difference in price. We have spoken to the minister about this before and he has attempted to find a more satisfactory solution. I have just used this as an illustration to point out that we are not completely happy with some of the conditions of the pricing system on the open market. As I recall the history with regard to wheat, oats and barley, small individual shippers had been selling one load to the elevator at a loss versus a carlot price, which was one of the reasons the wheat pools and the Wheat Board were pressured into being formed in the first place. I suggest that the minister consider this problem more carefully. I appreciate the fact that he has done some studying of this matter and had others study it. Perhaps we will get some good answers from them.

I should like to make one other comment in connection with the provisions for sales emphasis. I think the changes in the Wheat Board Act were good and some of the changes in the bill are good. Previously, too much emphasis was placed on controlling the movement of grain within the country and not enough on placing that grain in a position and in a condition for markets. It is a decided improvement, although the provisions in the bill with regard to proteins were a reaction rather than action in advance, but at least they are a good reaction. The fact that there is emphasis on sales in this bill is, in my view, a good move. I think that we should pass this bill and allow the Wheat Board and those in charge of the grain trade to concern themselves more seriously with finding markets that are needed for grain producers in western Canada.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I think all hon. members would be in favour of a producer plebiscite on the question of rye, flax and rapeseed coming under the Canadian Wheat Board, providing it was carried out in the manner suggested at committee stage. That is not really a contentious issue. But I would like to take issue with the amendment proposed by the NDP which calls for the Governor in Council to extend the application of both Parts III and IV to rye, flax seed or rapeseed "after considering the possibility of holding a plebiscite of the producers . . ." We must be careful about the words "after considering." As was pointed out by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), the word "considering" means a great many things to many different people. An amendment such as this should not be passed at this time. When we were discussing a similar piece of legislation at committee stage, we received an indication that between eight and 12 organizations and interested groups in western Canada wanted to come to Ottawa to express their opinions on whether rapeseed should come under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

My third reason for opposing it is that at the present time the Wheat Board has its hands full marketing the crops that presently come under its jurisdiction. The growing of rapeseed has developed at a fantastic rate following its introduction to western Canada, and I believe that a crop such as this must be marketed in the most advanced way. I contend that our present system of marketing, in which futures can be used for selling the product and hedging can be used for purchasing the product, is the best system we know. To back up my argument I quote from the Free Press Weekly report on farming as follows:

> Imports of rapeseed into Japan in 1971 totalled 407,371 metric tons, 405,895 tons of which were supplied by Canada, according to customs clearances in the annual statistical report of Japan Oil and Fat Importers and Exporters Association. Australia and the United States supplied minor quantities.
> Canadian exports to Japan increased over 1970 by about 84,000 metric tons. The 1972 calendar year figures are expected to show a further large increase due to the removal of tariff restrictions on April 1, 1972.

This is the present situation with respect to rapeseed. I firmly believe that to put it under the control of the Wheat Board would jeopardize our marketings of this crop. There are price discrepancies in the futures market, but sales must be the overriding consideration when we are discussing this matter. Everything depends on sales. Import countries want the advantage of hedging their purchases of rapeseed. A perfect example is the American soybean crop, to which the price of Canadian rapeseed is virtually tied. Americans market their soybean crop in a manner similar to our marketing of rapeseed. Many hon. members have said that by putting rapeseed under the control of the Wheat Board we could eliminate price fluctuations and bring about a more stable price. This may not always be the case. I believe that the law of supply and demand must be taken into consideration.

Again, I quote from the Free Press Weekly:

> June rapeseed prices at Vancouver were off from April highs by almost 25 cents in mid-May, and prices for May rape at Thunder Bay were off almost 34 cents from April.

These are great price crops. The cause is to be found in a drop in our export business. As the paper pointed out:

> Much of the price drop was because of a drop in export business. But failing soybean and oil prices depressed the rapeseed market, and the rape—bean price spread was widening, increasing to 86 cents . . .
> Background events in rape included a flurry of activity concerning changes in transportation policy by the Canadian Wheat Board . . .

A rapeseed scare in France over May threatened to have world-wide implications—

In this context, we see that putting rapeseed under the Wheat Board would not solve all our problems. It is a commodity which is traded all round the world, and it is affected by various other oil commodities.

Rye and flax seed are not so significant so far as volume is concerned, or so far as total income of western farmers is concerned, but when we talk about rapeseed we must remember that if we do anything to jeopardize our marketing of it, our traditional customers do not have to buy our rapeseed. There are other oil seed crops which they can buy such as coconuts, palm, and soybeans. When we talk about rapeseed in Canada, we must also talk about soybeans in the United States. They are the overriding factor so far as prices are concerned, and when we come to the crux of the question we are talking about the price received by the producer. Because of the volume of the American soybean crop and the manner in which the Americans market it, they have established a bench mark for oil seed prices, around which the price of rapeseed fluctuates.

Soybeans are sold on what we call a meal market, and rapeseed is sold on what we like to think is an oil market. I am optimistic that in the near future we will be producing various rapeseed varieties that will place us in favourable competition with the meal market in soybeans. When we do that, I believe that we will share an even greater percentage of the total world markets than we do now. I am saying this to stress that we must take a careful approach to ensure western producers the kind of marketing they want. We will need the most flexible kind of marketing system possible, and I contend that the one we have for rapeseed would probably give the best results. A difficult decision must be made and it should receive the consideration of commodity groups in western Canada. It is rather distressing that the rapeseed associations are not showing leadership on this question of marketing. When they decide where they want their industry to go then we, as Members of Parliament, can help to implement the decisions.

I think that everything that can be said was said in committee last spring. We in the Conservative party, would be in favour of a producer plebiscite run by the rapeseed association and other associations involved; if and when this comes about we will work with them to achieve their objectives.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) and, in my usual kind, quiet manner, to make a last effort to persuade the minister and his colleagues. There should not be any argument about the acceptability of the motion. The history of the open marketing of grain from the beginning has been tragic and shameful, and I do not know how anyone can get up in this House and express support for such a 19th century system. It can in no way operate to the benefit of the grain producer because it is designed only to provide profits to the marketing end of the grain business and does nothing to protect the producer as the pricing system has no relation to the value of the product. It does not take into account the cost of production nor the producers' need to make a living.

I was amused at the remarks of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) about the flexibility of this system. He is putting it mildly when prices can fluctuate to the extent demonstrated by his figures as well as those put forward by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. Surely, that is ample evidence to show that there has been a change in the stability of the price of grain now handled by the Canadian Wheat Board compared to the position before it handled the grain. Is has been demonstrated that this is a better system which operates in the interests of the grain producer, providing a measure of price stability even if the prices are inadequate.

Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to understand the reluctance of the minister and the government to accept this amendment, particularly as they originally had something of the sort in the bill. I find it difficult to understand why the minister, the government and the official opposition try to cling to the last remnants of an open-market system that has been proved to be detrimental to grain producers for so many years. I do not want to impute motives or suggest wrong intentions, but it is difficult not to be suspicious.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Don't hold yourself back; let yourself go.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, the minister felt that the amendment should be defeated because he has appointed a committee to look into the whole system of marketing, particularly of rapeseed. He mentioned two or three alternatives and he asked the committee to keep working. He felt that the amendment should not be accepted because the committee will be able to give the farmers more information to enable them to come to a proper decision. I fail to see how incorporating this amendment into the bill would interfere with the work of the committee or prevent it from providing more information to the producers in order to help them decide whether they want this grain or flax or rye brought under the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board. He mentioned that the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar was bringing in red herrings. I suspect this herring is redder than any, and it also smells. The hon. member for Lisgar feels that the Wheat Board has its hands full now. Since it already handles the quotas for grain, I do not see why it could not also handle pricing.

If the arguments put forward by the minister, the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) and the hon. member for Lisgar for not accepting this amendment are correct then it seems to me they must also come to the conclusion that it is reasonable that wheat, oats and barley should not come under the Wheat Board. This makes me even more suspicious that there are some members in the official opposition and the government who do not want an orderly marketing system for grain and who still oppose the Canadian Wheat Board. They still want grains handled under the nineteenth century system involving the open market, the grain exchange, the speculator, the parasite who lives on the backs of grain producers and does not work. The hon. member for Lisgar confirmed my suspicions. His remarks led me to conclude that the official opposition opposes our amendment because it supports discredited policies, opposes the orderly marketing of grain and other aspects of grain handling that would be beneficial to producers.

• (1450)

An hon. Member: You don't believe that, do you?

Mr. Benjamin: I urge the minister to change his mind and accept the motion. I know that many in his constituency who support his party want this amendment.

An hon. Member: This speech is for home consumption.

Mr. Benjamin: Members of farm organizations and farmers individually have, for decades, been asking for the proposal in this motion. It has been the dream of grain producers on the Prairies. They want control of their production. They want to control grain from the time they first plant it until they sell it. The dream of prairie grain growers who have wanted to control the marketing of grain and bring about an orderly marketing system goes back to 1935, when orderly marketing first began under the leadership of the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. He introduced that system as a sort of death bed repentance before the defeat of his government. Over the years it has been developed and now, in the main, has become the best method, I think, for handling our grains and for claiming a reasonable price. Surely, the minister ought to consider the experience of grain farmers under both systems. They have made up their minds and said that these three grains ought to be under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

I hope the minister will have second thoughts and decide that the motion is acceptable. The amendment would in no way set back or interfere with the work of those people whom he has appointed to look into this question. The amendment would allow the farmers, the grain producers themselves, to make the crucial decision. Surely, that is how it ought to be. It is useless suggesting that we ought to wait for another session, perhaps another Parliament, before bringing in an amendment like ours. After all, even the minister must know that, even if we are lucky, the Canadian Wheat Board Act will not be considered again for another three or four years. That might suit those who support the grain exchange and the so-called open marketing system, but it does not suit the grain growers. Again, I ask the minister to accept the amendment and to allow grain producers to make their own decision.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I was struggling against the temptation to speak in this debate but, after listening to the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre, was persuaded that I might make a useful though limited contribution. I was somewhat struck by what the hon. member said about the official opposition supporting discredited policies. I do not accept his contention that the policy he referred to has been discredited. You know, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary for us to show a certain amount of steadiness and consistency in this House. The party the hon. member supports has been discredited at the polls for a good many years, but members of that party keep coming back and, most of the time, they play a useful role. Of course, at times one wonders how useful it is.

Mr. Benjamin: Thank you.

Mr. Baldwin: I do not hold against them the fact that they have been discredited.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We missed the hon. member last night.

Mr. Baldwin: They have a role to play and they play it, even though they support policies which may have been discredited.

May I now speak about the amendment? I do not like the way new section 35(3) as proposed is worded. It reads in part:

> The Governor in Council shall make any regulation extending the application ... after considering the possibility of holding a plebiscite of the producers in consultation with the appropriate representatives—

I would term that as a pretty weak amendment. If it had said there shall be a plebiscite, and the phrasing of such language is not beyond the ingenuity of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), or that there shall be a plebiscite held on behalf of the producers in certain circumstances, we should have been more inclined to give consideration to supporting this amendment, if I may use the language of the hon. member who proposed it. As it is, the language is meaningless. All the governor in council must do is decide whether there is the possibility of holding a plebiscite, in consultation with certain people. I do not think that language has that precise and positive ring which would be needed if we were to support the amendment.

The other reasons for our not supporting the amendment have been eloquently articulated by my colleagues, and their reasoning, I am sure, has persuaded many hon. members to oppose the bill. Any doubts hon. members may have harboured I expect have been resolved by the hon. member for Lisgar and other hon. members.

As to the Wheat Board, I am not opposed to it. The Wheat Board, like many organizations which have been around too long, has suffered from a hardening of the arteries. It was not doing the job it ought to have done and it took some prodding and pushing to compel the Wheat Board to do what it has been doing reasonably effectively in recent months. The prodding and pushing of the Wheat Board from this side of the House has resulted in the Wheat Board showing a great deal more virility than I thought in the last few years it would display. I am still reserving my judgment in that regard.

I have given some reasons which compel me to vote against this amendment. However, there is one more. I think we should postpone doing what is suggested until we have considered other ways of helping the farmers involved, particularly those in the rapeseed industry. An inquiry is going on at present into the possibility of including the rapeseed itself as well as rapeseed products in those items for which cheaper transport rates will apply. I should not have said rapeseed; I ought to have spoken of rapeseed oil and the by-products of rapeseed. The inquiry is to determine whether those products are to be transported at cheaper rates.

Now, I come to the question as to how it was possible for my party a number of years ago to improve the situation of rapeseed growers in this country. I mention this because the hon. member in whose name the amendment stands gave an interesting historical dissertation about the marketing of rapeseed. One cannot disassociate the marketing from transportation. As we know, what happened was this: during the last war rapeseed oil was used, I believe, as a substitute for normal marine lubricants. In the last war, because of difficulties in transportation, certain marine lubricants were withdrawn from Canada and, so, rapeseed oil was developed for that purpose in this country. The Wheat Board—hon. members are at liberty to correct me if I am wrong—undertook to pay, I think, six cents a bushel for rapeseed and undertook to take all of that commodity that farmers during the war years could produce. When the war was over it was possible to bring to Canada again marine lubricants. Consequently, as demand fell, rapeseed was almost phased out of existence. I was interested in this matter because, in the Peace River part of northern Alberta as well as in northern Saskatchewan, many farmers, under strong pressure to diversify their production, had grown rapeseed and became concerned when support was withdrawn. The Liberal government of the day did nothing except sit back and allow the production of rapeseed in this country to decline to nothing at all.

A great many efforts were made by farmers in the west to get the government to act, including a very active intervention by a former Liberal member of this House from the province of Saskatchewan, Mr. Ross, who I think lived in the city of Moose Jaw. Through his intervention I became interested in the matter even before I became a member of this House. When I became a member of the Conservative party, which at that time was in power under the leadership of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), we persuaded the government to declare rapeseed a grain within the meaning of the Railway Act and carry the Crowsnest pass freight rates. This resulted in a substantial saving for rapeseed growers in the west and helped put rapeseed back into production.

We persuaded one farmer to take his case to the Board of Transport Commissioners as it was then constituted. As a member of the bar, I handled the case. A number of Conservative Members of Parliament were called as witnesses and gave evidence. We could not find members of other parties who were prepared to give evidence or help us at that time. The case before the Board of Transport Commissioners concerned whether rapeseed was a grain within the meaning of the Railway Act, because if so it would qualify for a cheaper freight rate to ports for overseas shipment.

We did not win the case but we made such an impression that the then government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert, with the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) as Minister of Transport, became interested in the matter. We ultimately succeeded in persuading the government: it took some pressure but we were able to do it. That Conservative government listened to proposals, something that the present government obviously does not do. The government of the day was persuaded to amend the Railway Act and declare rapeseed to be a grain. As a result, rapeseed in western Canada again became a product of considerable importance. We are back in the same situation, only now the issue concerns the by-products of rapeseed—rapeseed oil, meal, and so on. The important thing today is to develop both a domestic and an overseas market. In order to do this there must be a reduction in transportation rates. That is where the situation stands.

If this government would direct its attention to the matter, and if my friends in the New Democratic Party, who have some interest, would bend their efforts to support us, the necessary legislation would be brought forward. Litigation probably will not be successful; we need a further amendment to the Railway Act to provide cheaper transportation for the by-products of rapeseed. If that is done we will have gone a long way toward solving this problem.

Rapeseed is a very important commodity in western Canada, particularly in my part of the country, in parts of northern Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Through the very assiduous assistance of the Department of Agriculture this crop has advanced to the stage where new strains are being developed. We have eradicated many of the problems which existed in the first stages of rapeseed production.

The minister should persuade his colleagues to introduce legislation in order to obtain cheaper freight rates for rapeseed by-products, both for domestic sale and for export. If this is done the need for amendments such as the one we are considering will probably vanish. If it is not done by this government it will be done by our government after the next election. In that expectation I shall not support this amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-204, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, as reported from the Standing Committee on Agriculture, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Lang moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deachman: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. While the bells were ringing there was discussion and I believe there is agreement on all sides of the House concerning the business for the balance of the day. It is suggested that we now move to the second reading of Bill C-215, to amend to the Pension Act, and when that has been disposed of that we move to Bill C-195, to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan), who has a private member's notice of motion standing in his name today, graciously consented to give up the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deachman: This would permit us to continue with these items of business until the end of the day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the chief government whip has correctly stated what we have agreed upon, with the understanding that if we finish both these items before five o'clock we shall call it five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I assume this to be with the consent of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan).

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate is not giving up anything. His notice of motion will stand until next week; it is to hold its position. I hope this is understood.

Mr. Speaker: It is understood.

PENSION ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE NUMBER OF COMMISSIONERS AND AD HOC COMMISSIONERS

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (for the Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-215, to amend the Pension Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to authorize an increase in the number of commissioners who may be appointed to the Canadian Pension Commission. The need for additional commissioners arises from a sharp increase in the number of applications from veterans for disability pensions, for increases in pensions or for related benefits. The 1971 amendments to the Pension Act provided many additional benefits which were not previously available. They also provided that applications which had been considered and not fully granted could be reopened even if they had previously gone to final appeal.

In the 12 months following these amendments, the Canadian Pension Commission ruled upon some 6,200 claims for pension entitlement and close to 60,000 cases concerning various ancillary benefits. Nevertheless, by late May, 1972, a backlog of 8,000 pension applications were awaiting adjudication. This means that even if no further applications were to be received, it would take the present commissioners about 16 months to process the claims on hand. The commission had anticipated that the flood of new applications would have subsided months ago, but they are still being received at the rate of over 800 each month and there is no indication of any decrease in the rate.

Any applicant who has received an adverse decision in the initial review is entitled to have his claim heard further by an entitlement board composed of three of the commissioners. These entitlement boards are held in various centres in Canada and the applicant may appear with his witnesses and his advocate. The volume of hearings required will mean that at least three boards will be on the road for at least 40 weeks a year. This, of course, will deplete the number of commissioners available to consider initial applications and for other work. If intolerable delays are to be avoided, and they must be avoided, the number of commissioners must be increased.

The present act provides for the appointment by the governor in council of not more than 12 commissioners for terms of up to ten years, and of not more than five ad hoc commissioners for terms of one year subject to renewal. The maximum numbers of both commissioners and ad hoc commissioners are now serving. The new bill will therefore raise the maximum number of commissioners from 12 to 14, and the maximum number of ad hoc commissioners from 5 to 10. The need for this additional number of commissioners is expected to continue for at least five years.

Mr. Speaker, unless the number of commissioners is increased, the situation would reach a point where it would take years before a claim could be adjudicated upon. I am sure hon. members will agree that such lengthy delays would be completely unacceptable and that Canada's veterans are entitled to have their cases heard as expeditiously as can be arranged. Therefore, I am confident that members on all sides of the House will lend their support to this bill.

• (1540)

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the parliamentary secretary need worry about the length of time that we will debate this bill, because it is something we have asked for in committee and it reflects a non-partisan approach to veterans' problems. I asked in committee at the beginning of this session what the backlog was, and I was told it was 7,000 to 8,000 cases. We asked why more members could not be added to the commission.

I am glad that the new minister has taken this step. We commend him for the sympathy he has displayed at committee meetings when the problems of veterans have been brought to his attention. I only wish to ask why the increase is only from 12 to 14 members. I am sure there are a number of retired people who were on pension boards who could come back for a certain length of time to deal with the backlog of 8,000 cases.

For some reason we seem to forget the human consideration that the veterans of World War I are now in the 70 to 75 age bracket and veterans of World War II are now between 50 and 60 years of age. We must deal with the applications that they have submitted. We have established new, relaxed provisions under the benefit of the doubt clause but I fail to see why that clause is not accepted for what it is. The commission is still looking for evidence, but if we are to give veterans who are 70 years old any benefit of the doubt, let us do so.

One section that continues to present a problem to War Amputations of Canada is section 57(3) which deals with veterans who have to wear a prosthesis. There are still many weaknesses in the act. I could mention the exceptional incapacity allowance and the Veterans Land Act, despite which many veterans do not have a house, but I feel that section 57(3) has priority and I will deal mainly with it.

This section of the Pension Act was the subject of considerable discussion when the amendments which were approved on March 30, 1971, were before the House. It is a relatively minor provision, but it has effectively deprived some of our seriously wounded veterans of an exceptional incapacity award. The prime example is the double below-knee amputee who can wear artificial legs. The commission, in applying section 57(3), must take this into account, with the result that under ordinary circumstances no award is approved in these cases.

War Amputations of Canada has been following this matter closely since it was first noted in the draft bill C-203. Members of the committee received a letter from this association; perhaps all members received it. it was dated February 19, 1971, and called the proviso "offending". It stated that the exceptional incapacity allowance "may be decreased if pension authorities decide that the disability can be lessened by wearing a prosthesis". The former minister of veterans affairs replied to this letter on February 25, 1971. I quote from his letter as follows:

—examination of the pertinent provisions in this bill, as amended by the standing committee and approved by the House of Commons, does not reveal any basis for reduction of allowances unless the pensioners unreasonably refuses to undergo medical treatment or use a prosthesis.

I do not know how we go about producing supporting documents, but in the interest of getting this bill through I will not take the necessary action because the letters and representations are on file. This letter arrived while Bill C-203 to amend the Pension Act was before the other place. The War Amputations officials decided, on the strength of the minister's letter, that their fears were groundless and that no deduction would be made unless the amputee unreasonably refused to wear his prosthesis. They had no objection to this latter stipulation.

However, on April 26, 1971, the chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission advised War Amputations of Canada that indeed the new section 57(3) would mean that the commission would pay an exceptional incapacity award to an amputee who could not wear his prosthesis "at face value", but that where the prosthesis was worn this would have to be taken into account in assessing the eligibility of such an award. I have supporting documents in this respect.

The next step was when War Amputations of Canada placed the matter before the newly created pension review board for an interpretation, claiming that during the parliamentary process, including hearings of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, it was not made entirely clear that a deduction would be made if the pensioner wore an artificial limb and that basically the discussion during this process centred around prostheses which were a medical necessity, such as a heart-pacer and a ball-bearing in the hip joint. It is difficult to say more, because this is something that causes veterans much suffering. I am sure that veterans appreciate this fact better than anyone.

Unfortunately, the pension review board had to conclude that the wording of the act is clear, and that unless the act is changed the commission has no alternative but to make a deduction if the man is wearing an artificial limb. At any other time I would introduce an amendment, but I will not do so now and, hopefully, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Laing) will take our representations into consideration in the next session.

The inclusion of the subsection has placed the Canadian pension administration in a ridiculous light before rehabilitation experts throughout the world. In this regard I should like to quote from a letter written by Dr. Henry Kessler of the world renowned Kessler Institute for Rehabilitation in West Orange, New Jersey. The letter is dated December 2, 1971, and reads:

—I am appalled by the action of the Canadian Pension Commission with respect to their deduction of the exceptional incapacity allowance for persons who use prostheses.

Throughout the history of social legislation, particularly workmen's compensation as far back as 1883, various countries concerned with this problem have given a liberal interpretation to the incapacity suffered by individuals who have had double leg, double arm or one leg and one arm amputations.

This has been reflected in the principle which is referred to as "absolute incapacity". On that basis, 100 per cent incapacity was allowed; first determination was generally made with or without prostheses.

The basis of this principle was not so much the vocational incapacity as it was the gross impairment in carrying out activities of daily living or the routine pursuits of life.

I am told that this particular proviso affects possibly 150 to 200 of the most seriously disabled veterans in Canada. It is contrary to all principles upon which our pension law is founded. Our Pension Act is intended to encourage a man to rehabilitate himself, yet we have a subsection of the act which gives more benefits to a man who prefers to stay at home in a wheelchair than to an amputee who puts on an artificial leg and goes out to earn his living.

Secondly, our pension law has always contained an incentive clause which provides, in effect, that if a pensioner tries to improve his financial situation in any way he will not be penalized for pension purposes. Yet we have section 57(3) which provides, in effect, that if the pensioner does persist, despite the discomfort and inconvenience involved, in attempting to walk on wooden legs or to wear a set of iron hooks for hands, his income will be reduced in comparison with the amputee who simply gives up and does not wear his prosthesis. Even in the latter case where the commission could rule that the man unreasonably refused to wear the prosthesis, he would only lose half of his award, whereas the man who struggles to use the prosthesis gets no award at all.

For some reason, Mr. Speaker, we spend years and years dealing with the problems and incapacities of veterans, but after all this we still find there are situations we have overlooked. I share the blame for this, with everybody else in this chamber. However, I feel that Bill C-215, which provides for an increase in the number of people on the pension board, is a good measure, and on behalf of my party I wish to say that we support it.

I hope the Minister of Veterans Affairs will take into consideration what I have said after he reads Hansard and will make the improvements that are recommended by the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. I trust that as soon as possible an amendment will be introduced to the act to take care of our war amputees and the many other cases with which we have not dealt. But we support this bill 100 per cent.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we warmly welcome this bill and we shall be glad to give all the co-operation we can to ensure that it will soon become law. As the hon. member who preceded me pointed out, many of us on the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs began asking quite a while ago for an increase in the number of commissioners to administer the Pension Act so that a serious effort might be made to catch up with the backlog of cases which has resulted because of the improvements in the Pension Act that were made last year.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Francis) has given the appropriate statistics, and there cannot be any question but that this increase in the number of full-time commissioners and in the number of ad hoc commissioners is sorely needed. Like the hon. member for Humber-St. Georges-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), I wonder whether the number should not be even greater. Perhaps we can discuss that when the bill gets to committee. It would seem to me that the number of ad hoc commissioners might be increased to a higher maximum than the ten proposed in this bill. These are the ones who are engaged for a year at a time. In view of the fact that in recent months the backlog has been growing, perhaps we should make a real effort to put enough people on the job to catch up with the backlog. However, as I say, that is a point we can discuss in committee.

Like the hon. member who preceded me, we are terribly conscious of the fact that there are still other things that need to be done for our veterans. Like him, we feel that there should be the most generous administration possible of the exceptional incapacity allowance which was provided in the Pension Act last year. Like him and all other hon. members, we are most anxious that something be done very soon about the basic rates of war disability pensions, and also about the basic rates of the allowances paid under the War Veterans Allowance Act. However, those matters do not come within the purview of this bill, and therefore I shall not transgress the rules by trying to bring them into this debate. This proposal to provide additional commissioners is one we have been asking for; it is commendable. We appreciate the action of the new minister in presenting this bill and we are happy to give it our wholehearted support.

[Mr. Marshall.]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, we are quite happy to support this legislation and we hope that it will benefit all veterans.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to add a word to the debate on Bill C-215, to increase the number of commissioners on the Canadian Pension Commission. As chairman of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, it became very apparent to me during the study of the estimates that the backlog of claims before the commission was getting out of hand. I believe that at the time of the committee hearings in February it was reported that there was a backlog of some 5,000 claims. Today it is reported by the parliamentary secretary that the backlog has grown to 8,000 claims. As a result of the improved benefits provided under the act last year, we now face these additional claims. Also, there are improved benefits waiting for veterans. Here we can think of those sections of the act that were improved, including the exceptional incapacity section, the benefit of the doubt section and the section providing special benefits to Hong Kong prisoners of war.

Under the provisions of this bill the number of ten-year appointed commissioners will be increased from 12 to 14, and of ad hoc commissioners from five to ten. The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) have suggested that these numbers could be increased further. I would hope that if the committee can have the bill referred to it today we can have a meeting of the committee on Monday evening, at which the departmental officials and the minister or his parliamentary secretary will be able to give us more information on how they think the backlog of claims will be cleared up by the addition of seven new commissioners, which I calculate makes an increase of 50 per cent in the number of commissioners handling claims.

The real danger that faces us if this bill is not passed during the next week is that all the benefits that will accrue to veterans from the amending legislation which was passed last year will be lost, because if they have to wait 16 months or longer to have their applications processed by the commission, they will not be very happy, even if the ultimate award is satisfactory. Therefore, I wholeheartedly support the bill and hope we can give it second reading this afternoon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

ADULT OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ELIGIBILITY REQUIREMENTS TO RECEIVE ALLOWANCES—AUTHORIZATION OF CONTRACTS WITH EMPLOYERS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-195, to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved:

That Bill C-195, to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act, be amended in clause 1 by changing the period at the end of line 10 at page 1 to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"including a woman who is engaged in the domestic services of her home whether or not she has at any time been a member of the labour force.

She said: Mr. Speaker, in order to explain the background and the reason for introducing this amendment I shall have to go back a little in history. The amendments being introduced by the minister are to the Adult Occupational Training Act, 1970. My amendment would apply to clause 3, the definition section of that act, which now reads as follows:

In this part

"adult" means a person whose age is at least one year greater than the regular school leaving age in the province in which he resides;

"adult eligible for a training allowance" means an adult who

(a) has been a member of the labour force substantially without interruption for not less than three years, or

(b) has one or more persons wholly or substantially dependent upon him for support.

The way that clause reads, without the bill which the minister has introduced, has been a source of great trouble and difficulty to women across this country. Many women have needed to go out into the labour force, not only to receive training but to obtain the allowance while taking the course. One type of woman affected by this legislation is the single-support mother who because she was unable to get the training allowance and was not able to afford any kind of babysitting or housekeeping service could not go out to work and, in any case, was not eligible because of the three-year requirement. Other women were also affected adversely. Recommendation No. 130 of the Report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women reads:

—we recommend that section 3(b) of the federal Adult Occupational Training Act be amended so that full-time household responsibility be equivalent to participation in the labour force in so far as eligibility for training allowances is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, for several years I have been trying to achieve exactly the same sort of thing as is contained in that recommendation, and I have had a bill on the order paper to amend this clause. My bill, C-143, referred to section 3 of the act to which I added the following:

(c) without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the words "labour force" includes a woman who has been engaged in the domestic services of her home for a period of not less than three years.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, I wanted the definition to make sure that a woman who had been engaged in looking after the domestic services of her home for a period of three years would be considered to have been a part of the labour force and consequently eligible not only for training but for the training allowance. I realize very well that the minister has been besought and besieged by groups of women and has been embarrassed by the recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. In this new Bill C-195 he has sought to correct this particular form of discrimination against women in the home. Clause 1 of the new bill provides:

1. Section 3 of the Adult Occupational Training Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"3. In this part, "adult" means a person whose age is at least one year greater than the regular school leaving age in the province in which he resides."

Anyone who reads that is apt to wonder why I am now seeking to introduce an amendment, because they could assume that it is plain that an adult is a person whose age is one year greater than the school leaving age in the province in which he resides, and presumably a woman is an adult. It might be asked why I want this spelled out. That is what I want to make plain this afternoon, Mr. Speaker. As it reads now, this section leaves it wide open that women can get training and allowances presumably on the same basis as male adults. I know the minister intends that in his legislation because he has been very sympathetic to this approach, but I am moving this amendment because women all across the country are concerned that they have not been able to get specific guarantees from the minister that this is so.

I should like to put on record the reasons I am worried enough to bring in this amendment. When the regulations to this bill come out, unless they are clear and definite on this point, women—and some men, too—will be asking me where I was when the legislation went through. They will ask, "Why didn't you get it clarified beyond any doubt?"

On May 4, when the minister introduced the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women to this House, he said:

The bill to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act which received first reading last week in the House of Commons will provide women—

The minister did not underline this, but I will.

—who have worked one year at any time in their lives the opportunity to receive training as well as training allowances for the first time.

The minister knows as well as I do that any woman, except a few parasites, has worked more than one year at any time in her life. I could not help but conclude that the minister still had in mind the idea of the labour force and the necessity of being part of the labour force in order to qualify. Listen to these words again:

—the bill will provide women who have worked one year at any time in their lives—

That can only mean they have worked for one year in the labour force in their lives; it does not make sense otherwise. All women have worked more than one year in their lives, Mr. Speaker.

—the opportunity to receive training as well as training allowances for the first time.

I replied for our party to the ministerial statement. I asked the minister about this and he nodded his head in affirmation. I said I hoped that Hansard would record the nod. I might have had my fears allayed by that nod. But on May 5, during second reading of Bill C-195, an act to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act, the minister said:

> I think the change will do much to remove the unintentional discrimination that has been directed toward women in the work force. The three year work rule made it extremely difficult for the department to help upgrade a widow or a woman who, for one reason or another must return to work to support her children, a chronically ill husband or someone else in her family by providing such simple courses as shorthand, typing, dictation and other work of this nature.

The words "must return to work", if they are to mean anything, must be construed as "must return to work in the labour force". That is the only possible meaning one can give them. Again, this made me worry about the type of regulations that will come down. I wondered if they would be clear, or would lead to all sorts of red tape or wrangling as has happened in far too many cases where discrimination has been involved.

I do not think the minister used those words intentionally; but he used them, and that is what worried me. He suggested this will make it easier for women who must return to work, to do so. I suggest that such provision will not help those women who want to take advantage of this legislation but who have never been members of the work force. I am talking about women who married when they were young and perhaps had children, perhaps the husband has died, perhaps the husband is chronically ill or is a drunkard or helpless and is not much use as a breadwinner. Women in that position desperately need training and the training allowances without which they cannot make the necessary arrangements that will permit them to be away from home while they are undergoing training.

I wish the minister would listen, Mr. Speaker, because I shall present one or two further pieces of evidence in support of my contention. On being questioned by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), a member of my party, on whether farmers' wives or housewives on farms would qualify for manpower training allowances under this act, the minister said:

> I will answer that in my usual direct fashion by saying that when we get to the committee stage the whole question of women in the work force will, I am sure, be thoroughly discussed.

Then he said that no doubt we should want to ask some basic questions about the definition of one-year training and whether or not work done in the home by the farmer's wife, for example, or a woman in a similar situation could be defined by regulation. That statement worried me because the question was not answered. Here, again, the minister could have given a categorical yes or no answer; but he did not, and that worried me.

I read the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, a report which was so carefully prepared by Mrs. Paltiel under the direction of the minister, and found on page 23 this reference to amendments to the Adult Occupational Training Act:

> This would remove a major obstacle and vastly improve the opportunities for training for women who require it for re-entry into the labour force.

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

Again, the significant words are "for re-entry into the labour force". When I saw this last piece of evidence—and one must admit, Mr. Speaker, that I am not presenting merely a single piece of evidence—I could not help but worry again. I worried precisely because in the time I have spent here I have learned that provisions must be spelled out clearly in legislation, otherwise regulations over which we exercise no control whatever may be fudged-up or so confusing and messy as to lose sight of the end the legislation was intended to bring about.

So I say to the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the women of this country want their rights in this act spelled out so that they are clear beyond any doubt. I introduced my amendment because women of this country have had a long, hard fight asserting their rights, and the right enshrined in the amendment is tremendously important for women. Many women across this country need the benefits of this legislation. Women in the home, in the cities and in the country want to supplement the income of the home. They might be the only breadwinner in the home, or perhaps the husband is a cripple, helpless, or no use as a breadwinner. Women need this legislation for supplementing the income of the home.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister to make a clear and definite statement this afternoon on whether the definition of a person who is to be eligible for training and training allowances is to include a woman "who is engaged in the domestic services of her home whether or not she has at any time been a member of the labour force." That is the definition for which I press. I want this language in the act to be clear and plain. I trust the minister will do as I ask, on behalf of thousands of women across this country who want to know whether they will be eligible for the training allowance or for training once this act is proclaimed.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, one would be entitled, if one were judging the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and the amendment she has proposed, to conclude that an election is just around the corner. She wants to include apparently, "woman" in the definition of "adult". Apparently the hon. member is implying that women are not persons, since the bill as now drawn says that an adult means a person. I have the greatest respect for people who fight for the rights of groups in the country even though one group may include 50 per cent of the population, the women of the nation. On the other hand, I think hon. members would agree that any attempt to segregate groups of people in legislation like this amounts to a form of discrimination.

I will not become involved in that question because I am sure the minister will want to raise it when he speaks. I have been the recipient of much commentary, especially since the publication of a recent article which, unfortunately, misrepresented my views.

An hon. Member: You should read it carefully.

Mr. Lundrigan: It was printed recently in a national magazine. It purported to represent my views on the basis of my talking to certain groups of women across the country and in various parts of the Atlantic region.

Mr. McBride: There has been a great change in the hon. member.

Mr. Lundrigan: The hon. member from Arnprior who represents Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton has been very active in the House in the last few months. I wonder how things are in the valley. I am sure the House will be delighted to hear about some of the rallies the hon. member has attended, which it might be in order to put on the record although perhaps the hon. member would not wish the matter to be debated. In any event, I have the greatest respect for the minister and the government for the moves made to eliminate various types of discrimination against women in the labour force. In this category we must include all women who participate actively not only in the work force but in any capacity in Canadian life. So I do not think we ought to talk about the special status of any group, be they young people, old people, women, males or anybody else. Once you put people into special compartments, you are discriminating. I like to think that in legislation like this, which I think reflects the attitude of the Canadian people—that is the important aspect of this question—we can eliminate discrimination so that we need not introduce special status for anyone, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has attempted to do, I am sure for good reason. If she wants to emphasize an area of discrimination and place before the Parliament of Canada her views, then naturally she is entitled to do so. I would be disappointed if she did not hold strong views on women's movements and women's rights in Canadian society. However, I do not think her proposal is other than discriminatory. I will not elaborate because I am sure the minister will want to touch on this point.

The fact is that Bill C-195 is a progressive step. We have talked about it for a long time. I could say, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) likes to say, that we introduced such legislation six years ago, four years ago, three years ago, and finally the government has adopted it. I will not do that. I think all members of the House agree that eliminating discrimination in the labour force is a move in the right direction.

Once again, we urge the minister and the government to look at the 52-week requirement respecting adult occupational training. I am sure his officials will say that this matter has been handled with discretion and flexibility. I think the 52-week provision ought to be incorporated in this legislation so that we do not see a repetition of the stupid situation in which a person, having started a course, finds 52 weeks later, even before he is finished, that under the regulations his eligibility for participating in the program has ended. That stupidity must be eliminated, Mr. Speaker.

Including on-the-job training in Bill C-195 is a good move. This program has been successful. I have repeated my concern in this House and in committee. I am afraid that areas that are not well organized so far as the business structure is concerned—I am talking about the rural parts of the country—will not be able to take advantage of on-the-job training to the extent of the more structured parts of the country, unless there is some flexibility.

I cannot imagine a great deal of money flowing into northwestern Ontario under the on-the-job training program as compared to what will flow into Toronto which has a very well structured business community. The minister refers to on-the-job training in large companies such as Northern Electric. There it is no difficulty in bringing in on-the-job training of a sophisticated nature. I can see that happening in large businesses and well structured communities, but not in rural parts of the country.

I do not have this concern because I am from a rural part of the country: my concern is the same as that for a good bit of government legislation, including the recent announcement on housing policy. There seems to be greater emphasis on the urban and better structured parts of the country. Without making any announcement, the government is in fact de-emphasizing rural Canada. It is trying to eliminate rural Canada. That is what I am concerned about. This is one of the most fundamental, unwritten aspects of the government's policy. It has never been enunciated. However, if one looks at the various aspects of the legislative program of the past three years, he will see a good many areas in which the government is trying to legislate rural Canada out of existence. I will leave it at that and move on to another challenge on which the minister can comment either today or next week.

The minister referred to the fact that a number of activities of his department in the past six or seven months have had some effect on the economy. He referred to the several moves to help people in occupational training, the Local Initiatives Program, which is indirectly related to this bill, Opportunities for Youth and other areas in which his department has been trying to stimulate the Canadian economy. From day to day in the House we have expressed a good number of reservations, not on the programs introduced by the minister or on the philosophies underlying such programs as LIP but on the way the programs have been decided, brought into effect, the way Parliament has lost control and the fact that we have never been involved in establishing the criteria or determining the evaluating procedures. We have not been well informed on the whole spectrum of the programs.

The minister will have an opportunity in three or four minutes to tell the Canadian people whether he plans, aside from the legislation presently before us, to introduce within the next few days a program which I believe might be called CMOP. That is the first time that term has been used in the House of Commons. Is the minister familiar with CMOP? I understand it stands for Canadian Manpower Opportunities Program. Perhaps the minister is surprised to hear that expression coming from this side of the House.

I challenge the minister to tell the House whether the government has a plan to bring in that program, and whether it will give an undertaking to introduce that program in the House of Commons and have it duly debated in terms of funding, criteria and the whole process so that it will not become another Local Initiatives Program which is basically outside the jurisdiction of this House. I just throw this out to the minister. I do not say that all the decisions have been made with regard to CMOP. My source of information is not official; I have to draw conclusions on what might sometimes be inadequate information.

The minister has a right to be proud of the work he has done. However, I ask him to give us a broad indication about the CMOP program which will be funded between $80 million and $100 million. I ask the minister to inform us before Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday of next week whether this program will be handled like other programs which may be very sound philosophically but on which Parliament has never had a chance to express itself. It therefore becomes a bureaucratic operation and handled in some ways without the just concern of the whole nation. I challenge the minister on this matter. Although it is not directly related to the bill in a specific sense, I am sure it is a matter with which he will want to deal.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have taken note of some of the questions raised by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan). I hope I will be able, if not to answer them at least to allude to them on third reading, if the hon. member does not mind, because the business before us at this stage is specifically whether or not we are to accept the amendment introduced by a representative of the New Democratic Party. I listened with a great deal of interest to the forceful presentation of the young lady.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: I always do. However, I was tempted very early in her remarks to suggest that the amendment was entirely out of order, as can be seen if one reads the bill carefully. I listened to her comments, and at the risk of appearing, certainly not flippant but rather crabby in my old age, I was left with the impression that the hon. member felt that she and she alone had any concern about women in the work force, and that she and she alone defined work as including domestic work or the traditional type of work that a busy mother has to do while carrying out her household duties. I can assure her that she has no monopoly on this type of thinking. Theoretically, she presumes she has that kind of monopoly.

It is a definition that in general I accept. I think many members of the House realize that housework of the traditional nature and type is work in the full sense of the word and that in part our lack of consciousness should have been recognized a long time ago and in many other fields. If I chastise the hon. lady on this, it is because I think that the whole thrust of her argument is that whenever I talk about work—apart from the times I talk about re-entry into the work force, or even when I talk about that—I talk about the work force excluding work in the home. On many occasions I have expressed the opinion of the hon. lady that work in the home is work in the work force. I will not belabour the point about the need of re-entering the work force.

The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has quite logically and concisely dealt with, and I want to try to remain concise and precise, the question of whether the definition of "adult" includes people working at home, in the traditional sense. It is absolutely immaterial under the terms of Bill C-195 as it is now written. The argument is valid as far as the original act is concerned because the three-year rule did, very definitely, discriminate—unintentionally, I hope—not only against women but against other members of Canadian society who for one reason or another found their right to financial assistance while taking training courses jeopardized.

If hon. members would look at Bill C-195 and read the explanatory notes which showed the bill as it was prior to the proposed amendments, they would find that we had left out entirely the old section 3(b) which defined an adult. So under the new bill it is immaterial whether a person, male or female, was ever a member of the work force. Every bill defines an adult in a different way, depending on its purpose. The definition of an adult in Bill C-195 is a person whose age is at least one year greater than the regular school-leaving age in the province in which he resides. What we are saying is that a person, male or female, may never have been a member of the work force at any time. That is no longer a prerequisite to obtaining financial assistance. That no longer has any meaning under the present bill.

We have therefore gone further than the recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada that section 3(b) of the act be amended so that full-time household responsibility be equivalent to participation in the labour force as far as training allowance is concerned. We have eliminated discrimination of any kind. We do not want to substitute one kind of discrimination for another by setting up preferred groups. We shall not rectify the imbalance in Canada as between opportunities for men and for women in the final analysis by legislation. We have to rectify that discrimination by education. It is not by substituting well intentioned discrimination of one type that we shall eliminate discrimination of another. Many of us who feel this way are sometimes accused of being reactionary whereas, in fact, we see beyond the short range and do not wish to replace one type of discrimination by another, however well meaning. The bill as written eliminates discrimination entirely by removing section 3(b).

Having taken five minutes to say all that, I must recognize that the hon. lady has been one of the strong advocates of the total elimination of discrimination against women. Her career has been notable in this respect. Her speeches have often been directed to this end. Indeed, she has become synonymous with this battle which is only beginning but which at least is progressing along the right lines. I am sure that her amendment, which I think would be out of order, or at least it might be considered out of order because it is redundant, is nevertheless an honest attempt to bring to my attention as minister some of the ambiguities in my statements and to the fear she has that regulations may interfere with the intent of the law, although in practice a federal court would prevent that happening. Nevertheless, I am prepared to entertain, if the hon. lady feels this to be desirable, an amendment in her name—this is a tribute to the hon. lady, I can assure her, rather than the result of any fear I have of the bill as presently drafted—which would substitute one word for another in her amendment as set down. Thus, instead of reading, "including a woman who was engaged in the domestic service of her home whether or not she has at any time been a member of the labour force," the amendment would read, "including a person who was engaged in domestic service at home," and so on.

Hon. members will appreciate that there are men engaged in domestic service at home, paraplegics and others whose wives go out to work and who maintain the home in a happy marriage situation. There are more of these people than we realize. So in my view the amendment should read:

—including a person engaged in domestic service at home whether or not such a person has at any time been a member of the labour force.

In this way we shall be removing the remote possibility of regulations ever limiting what the act intended. The amendment makes the point which the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate made so eloquently when he argued we should not substitute one type of discrimination for another, and in a way it recognizes, though perhaps after the fact, the contribution made by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and its particular recommendation made at the time the officials of my department were drawing up these amendments.

I am not sure of the procedure, Mr. Speaker; I will leave that in your capable hands and I will gladly yield the floor to the hon. lady if she feels disposed to change her amendment along the lines I have indicated. I would then be quite prepared to second it.

Mrs. MacInnis: I wish to say right now that I find the minister's generosity very great. Not only is his generosity great, but his wisdom is much greater than mine because I infinitely prefer the word "person" in there rather than "woman". But I did not know the minister was prepared to look far enough ahead to the point at which men would be doing household work on a large scale along with women, and that is exactly how it should be.

Mr. Mackasey: You haven't been to my house.

Mrs. MacInnis: I accept the minister's suggestion with real pleasure and profit. I accept the minister's strictures concerning what is perhaps a positive attitude on my part in seeming to be more concerned about women than some other people are. I accept this criticism, but in order to gain anything one has to drive very hard against tradition. I may never have occasion to say this again, but I think that what the minister has done today in this regard at least is to introduce a bill which will be very much appreciated, not only by the women of this country but by the men who have wit enough to understand what he has done. I thank him very much.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, things I might have said are now not necessary to say, so I rise simply to ask whether the House will give consent to the motion on the order paper in the name of my hon. friend from Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) which I had the honour to second, being taken as though it read:

—including a person who is engaged in domestic services at home whether or not such person has at any time been a member of the labour force.

• (1640)

One could write out an amendment to change this, that or the other word, but it is crowding five o'clock and in view of the unanimity in the House the motion in the name of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, which I am still pleased to second, might be regarded as reading in the terms suggested by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Mackasey) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggest the way we should proceed. The Chair is in agreement, if hon. members are. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will put the question, since that is agreed. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, moves:

That Bill C-195, an act to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act, be amended in clause 1 by changing the period at the end of line 10 at page 1 to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"including a person who is engaged in domestic services at home whether or not such person has at any time been a member of the labour force."

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that Bill C-195, to amend the Adult Occupational Training Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Mackasey moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is in order for an hon. member to say a word or two on third reading?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes, of course it is in order. The minister pointed out that the hon. member dealt in his remarks with what he might have dealt with on third reading, and I am sure the minister might like to respond. I will, of course, see the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan).

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I deliberately put all my remarks in the one package because, unlike some hon. members, I do not want my name to appear in Hansard 17 times in one day, even if it means seconding motions or what have you. I understood that the minister was going to make a few remarks on third reading.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my first words on third reading are to thank the House for its courtesy in dealing with the report stage so rapidly. I think this was possible only because of the very exhaustive study we gave the bill in committee. We often talk about bills that are of a non-partisan nature, and it is significant that these few minor amendments—I say minor; they are really major, if I may put it in that way—made to the original act passed in 1967, I believe, were both important and necessary.

It became very obvious to me earlier on, that these amendments should be made while looking at the same time at the act in its entirety with a view to amending the original act as fully and as soon as possible. Hence at the committee stage—I say this sincerely since I have a book full of notes in front of me—many points were raised by the representatives of the various parties, including the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) who has obviously specialized in manpower problems and is quite knowledgeable of the subject, perhaps more so than the minister since I have been in my present portfolio only a few months.

What I have tried to do during those few months, either directly or through my officials, including the new deputy minister, is to visit every province of Canada—certainly I have been in touch with every province—with the exception of Newfoundland which I intend to visit personally at the appropriate time of year, which should not be too far ahead in the future. I mean appropriate in terms of the fishing season, not election time. The general result of these visits has been a reawakening of enthusiasm about the broader aspects of the potential of manpower programs and the growing realization, not only at the federal level and within the federal department but at the regional level as well, of the important part that manpower must play, and will have to play in the future, if we are to achieve not only a quality of life that reflects reasonable unemployment figures but a quality of life that is reflected in the contentment and satisfaction of a well educated work force.

The hon. gentleman referred specifically and quite knowledgeably to a particular program, the initials of which he was able to pinpoint. I assure him that I have no intention of introducing tomorrow, next week or before the session ends, on motions or without advance warning, this kind of project in the form of a bill which would make possible this sort of future thrust by the Department of Manpower. In other words, it is not my intention to bring such legislation before the House.

The reason for this, I think, is self-evident. I happen to believe—this is only a personal opinion—that the Canada of tomorrow cannot afford a government that is extremely centralist in nature. I believe very strongly that in any legislation dealing with people, the federal government has a very strong and dominant part to play from the economic point of view. However, the provinces in turn have a particularly important role to play in the introduction of social legislation in this House, even though that legislation clearly lies within the federal field.

For example, just to use a hypothetical case, with any legislation dealing with the disadvantaged people of Canada it seems to me that input from the provinces and the various regions of the country would be of tremendous significance. We are all Canadians and all levels of government are dealing with the same people. However, if the type of co-operation and consultation that I see for the Department of Manpower in the future is to be at all meaningful, then such discussions certainly cannot be conducted in a secretive manner. Programs of an experimental nature would have to be developed in co-operation and conjunction with the input we receive from various provincial agencies and organizations.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the minister a question? He referred to the Canada Manpower Opportunities Program a little earlier and said that he would not be introducing any such program through the introduction of legislation or a statement on motions before the House closes. I ask the minister whether there is such a program, which he might be ready to unveil now or after the House closes some time this summer, which not necessarily involves opportunities such as training programs or education, if I might use that word which is not supposed to be used in the House of Commons, but mainly a works program? Does the minister have this kind of a program ready to unveil?

• (1650)

Mr. Mackasey: I will be a little evasive and say I have many programs to unveil and have to make up my mind what is the best program to unveil, if any.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You say that is just a little evasive?

Mr. Mackasey: It is very evasive, and necessarily so because programs depend on many factors. They depend on the approval of the government and the availability of funds. More and more they should, and will, at least in manpower fields, depend on the consent and co-operation of provinces and agencies. I am not prepared to say to what extent we have finalized, or whether to any extent we have finalized any particular program emanating from the Department of Manpower at this moment.

Mr. Lundrigan: I have one final question. I hate to interrupt the minister, but could he answer the second part of my question which had to do with presentation before the House of Commons of any program which he might, for example, have wished to introduced in May but deferred for obvious reasons and may want to introduce in the next couple of weeks, perhaps before the House closes? Could he give us some kind of undertaking that if such a program is introduced before the House of Commons rises, it will be brought before the House and debated at least to the point where as members of this House of Commons we can express ourselves on the extent of the program and on the criteria for evaluation procedures, and consider whether it is different from the type of program which the government has introduced in the last six or seven months?

Mr. Mackasey: I would like to be able to give that assurance, but I cannot. I will be honest and say I have no such program in my desk or in my drawer which I intend to introduce before the end of June, next week, before Parliament ends. What the hon. gentleman is saying is that he would like to see a program which affects Canadians—whether to offset unemployment, decrease or halt unemployment—so that all parties would have an input into that program before the fact rather than after the fact, their contribution after the fact sometimes being of a critical nature, naturally. I cannot give that assurance. That is government policy, as the hon. gentleman knows. I think he is really pulling my leg, which he is quite adept at doing.

If he frankly asks me what the government intends to do next winter, if we are again plagued by unemployment, and whether we would embark on the same type of program we did last winter, I would have to say that at the moment I do not know. If he were to ask me, if I were to embark on the same type of program, whether I would use the same criteria I would have to say no, that we would benefit from the experience of the last winter which demonstrated tremendous success, as everybody knows, in alleviating hardship of short-term unemployment when we were able to put thousands of people through local initiative programs under the control or guidance of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

To summarize, I cannot give the hon. gentleman the assurance that all parties and all members would have the same type of input into a program, before the fact, as the cabinet and the government does. That is our responsibility. The hon. gentleman's responsibility, of course, is to criticize as constructively as possible, which he usually does in a very effective manner.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister.

As he mentioned a while ago that he had consultations in all provinces, I would like him to tell us the results of his discussions with his counterpart of the province of Quebec.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, these conferences with Quebec Labour Minister Cournoyer are presently in progress. I met the minister last Friday and there will be other meetings, I believe, in the near future with his officials.

At the moment, we are exchanging letters and documents and we have made some progress from one week to the other. Finally, I am convinced that I have done my duty and, as I wished to do, I have consulted as many provinces as I could, including Quebec, on all matters concerning Canadians, whether these bills came under federal or provincial jurisdiction, and sometimes under both.

[English]

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 a.m., pursuant to special order made this day.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—DIVISION ON ESTIMATE FOR SENATE EXPENDITURES AS RECORDED IN "HANSARD"

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, notice of which I sent to Your Honour under the provisions of Standing Order 17(2).

Last Thursday night, in fact at about two-thirty o'clock on Friday morning, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) made the point that a vote once cast must stand and cannot be changed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But I wasn't upheld.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Therefore I should like to draw the attention of Your Honour, the right hon. member for Prince Albert and other members of the House to the fact that as recorded on pages 3433 and 3444 of Hansard for Thursday, June 22, 1972, all of the Progressive Conservatives who were present voted with us against the entire appropriation for the maintenance of the Senate.

I have been trying for a long while to get support for this proposition. I welcome the fact that the Tories have now voted that way. Mind you, I am sorry for the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Deakon) and the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan) because they are recorded as having voted for the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I expect you may tell me that this is an error in Hansard. I certainly do not blame Hansard for any confusion during that long, sad night. But the point I wish to make is that in view of the dictum pronounced the other night by the right hon. member for Prince Albert I assume that the vote of the Official Opposition against the Senate must stand.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member can get any amusement out of that facetious statement, I have no objection. I shall not waffle.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

METHOD OF CONSIDERATION OF REPORT STAGE MOTIONS ON FOREIGN TAKEOVERS REVIEW BILL

Mr. Speaker: Order. My understanding is that the House is to proceed this morning with consideration of the motions respecting Bill C-201. Perhaps the Chair might make some brief observations in relation to proposed or suggested groupings of some of these motions. I do not expect that all of them will be disposed of this morning, so there will be opportunities during the hours and perhaps days ahead to review possible groupings of these different motions.

In any event, after looking at these motions over the weekend the Chair would like to suggest that motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 21 and 28 be combined for the purpose of debate, and that a division on motion No. 1 would also dispose of the other four motions. These motions appear to relate to the same matter. I think it would be difficult to have different debates on each one of these motions. I would think that one debate could very well cover the field of discussion in relation to Nos. 1, 2, 3, 21 and 28.

The next group would be motions Nos. 4 and 18 which could be combined for the purpose of debate, and a division on motion No. 4 would also dispose of motion No. 18.

Motions Nos. 5 to 9 inclusive might also be combined for the purpose of debate. Motion No. 5 might be disposed of separately. A division on motion No. 6 would also dispose of motions Nos. 7, 8 and 9. I do not think I should attempt to cover the whole field at this time, but perhaps I should at this point refer to motion No. 9. The printed version of this motion is incorrect. The corrected version should read as follows:

• (1110)

That Bill C-201, an act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, be amended as follows:

In subparagraph 3(3)(c) by substituting the figure 10 per cent for the figure 5 per cent in line 31; and in line 36 by substituting the figure 40 per cent for the figure 20 per cent.

Perhaps we might leave it at that for the moment and review the matter later after we have disposed of some of the motions to which I have alluded. Further groupings might be considered by hon. members in the meantime.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have found some difficulty in relating the amendments as they appear on the notice paper. They obviously relate to lineation and pagination of the reprinted bill, but in the haste of trying to get on with this debate hon. members, unfortunately, have not received the reprinted bill. My staff has been having a terrible time trying to tie in these amendments to the appropriate sections.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that the reprinted bill is included in the files that hon. members have at their desks at the present time. Perhaps we might deal only with the first one of the groupings which I think is quite obvious to any hon. member. This would give hon. members an opportunity to think about the other groupings to which I have referred. In other words, I think there should be no objection to the suggestion that Nos. 1, 2, 3, 21 and 28 be combined for purposes of debate and be the subject on one division.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we accept the suggestion that motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 21 and 28 be combined for the purposes of debate. While that debate is going on, Your Honour, we will be able to study the other groupings that Your Honour has suggested. We may agree to them as well but possibly we can defer our acceptance until later.

Mr. Speaker: A memorandum will be circulated among the House leaders in order that hon. members who are interested may suggest further groupings in advance. These will be proposed from the Chair in due course, but it might give hon. members a chance to look at the different motions and decide whether the groupings suggested by the Chair are logical and acceptable to hon. members.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was wondering whether the NDP proposes to withdraw any of its amendments in view of the development over the weekend?

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOREIGN TAKEOVERS REVIEW ACT

MEASURE TO CONTROL FOREIGN TAKEOVERS OF CANADIAN COMPANIES

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-201, to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: We will proceed with motion Nos. 1, 2, 3, 21 and 28. Mr. Saltsman, seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moves:

That Bill C-201, an act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, be amended by inserting the following words after the word "economic" in subsection (1) of clause 2 on line 13 on page 1:

", political and social".

Mr. Burton, seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moves:

That Bill C-201, an act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, be amended by inserting the following words after the word "Canada" in subsection (1) of clause 2 on line 1 on page 2:

"and is likely to enhance the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment".

Mr. Knight, seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moves:

That Bill C-201, an act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, be amended by inserting therein, immediately preceding paragraph (a) of subsection (2) of clause 2 on page 2 the following:

"(a) the likelihood that the acquisition will enhance the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment;"

and by renumbering the subsequent paragraphs accordingly.

Mr. Knight, seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moves:

That Bill C-201, an act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons be amended by inserting the following words after the word "Canada" in clause 9, subsection (1) on line 44 of page 17:

"and is likely to enhance the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment".

Mr. Broadbent, seconded by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moves:

That Bill C-201, an act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, be amended by inserting the following words after the word "Canada" in subsection (6) of clause 18 on lines 20 and 21 on page 27:

"and is likely to enhance the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment".

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in moving motion No. 1, that the words "political and social" be added following the word "economic" in clause 2, I want to make the point that unless these words are included the bill is a farce. One of the reasons we are concerned about foreign ownership is that the so-called decisions affecting foreign ownership have been made on purely economic grounds or on what appear to be purely economic grounds.

The argument has always been that foreign ownership makes us richer and therefore, regardless of the consequences for the work structure and regardless of the political costs, it is desirable. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if the word "economic" were to stand alone in the preamble outlining the purpose of the bill, we would be right back where we were before except that the government now has legislation to justify doing what it has always done—permit unlimited foreign ownership in Canada. The criteria for permitting foreign ownership must be broader than economic. There are important arguments against foreign ownership on economic grounds alone, but I believe the criteria must go beyond that and so I have put forward this amendment.

We think it is important that this bill receive full debate. It has not received full debate because the government drummed it through the committee. They made no bones about their haste in getting it through the committee and curtailing the number of witnesses to appear there. Their argument was that the bill was so important that it had to be dealt with in that manner. I have not been able to accept that argument, nor have many other people in Canada. In its present form the bill is hardly worth passing; it is meaningless and in some ways it will be a step backward.

In looking at some of the actions that this government has taken regarding foreign ownership let us consider two cases that come to mind. There was the incident involving Denison Mines when the government stepped in—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope the hon. member proposes to relate his remarks to the motion before the House. The hon. member knows that if we have a general debate on every one of theses 28 or so amendments we will not in that way respect the rules. I would invite hon. members to relate their remarks to the motions actually before the House. If a general debate is to take place it should normally take place on third reading rather than on consideration of individual amendments. I appreciate that the hon. member's amendment is general in nature and perhaps his remarks do in fact relate to this motion, but I feel I should bring this point to the attention of all members at this time.

Mr. Saltsman: I appreciate your concern, Mr. Speaker, and I want to assure you that I am limiting my remarks to the particular aspect of this amendment. As I proceed I think it will become clear that I am doing so.

If we look at the two cases the government has stepped in to prevent a foreign takeover, Denison Mines and Home Oil, we have to wonder whether, if this legislation had been in force at that time, the government would not have permitted the takeovers rather than stop them. On purely economic grounds, the people who wanted to take over Home Oil could probably have made a very good economic argument on why foreign ownership of the company would be more desirable than Canadian ownership. The reason for prohibiting that takeover was that it had significance in other areas.

If this legislation had been in force the government would have said that the takeover clearly fell within the criteria of the legislation and therefore they were bound by the law and the takeover should be concluded. This is why I say that in some ways this legislation is worse than not having anything at all because the decision that the government had to make in regard to Home Oil was to a large extent a political rather than an economic decision. The nation was upset about the possibility of the last major Canadian oil company falling under foreign ownership. It was not upset about the economic indications alone but rather about the entire range of possibilities involved in such a takeover. The government, subject to this kind of public pressure and public concern, responded in the way it should have responded, namely, with a political act. If it could have hidden behind this kind of legislation, there are grave doubts whether it would have acted as it did.

Again, if we look at the Denison Mines situation, what was the reason for the government prohibiting the takeover of Denison Mines by a foreign investor? Was it an economic argument? I do not think so because the foreign investor could have made an excellent case why Denison would have flourished or sales of uranium might have been greater under foreign than under Canadian ownership. The reason the sale of Denison Mines to foreign ownership was prohibited was largely political rather than economic. I realize that to try to draw a line between economic, social and political considerations is very difficult, but in advocating this position I say that nevertheless these things have to be taken into consideration, and in those cases where the government stepped in they were in fact taken into consideration.

We do not know, even to this date, what the full story of Denison Mines was. We have never really had an explanation from the government of why it stepped in and prohibited the sale, but we can speculate. Suggestions have been made that the reasons were that if it came under foreign ownership perhaps some of our sales to foreign countries would have been affected. Our sales in the United States would have increased but our sales in other countries to which we are trying to sell nuclear reactors might have been affected because of American legislation that would come into play with the foreign owner. The foreign owner would in fact have been subject to the trading with the enemy laws of the United States, and if the countries to which we want to sell uranium were in fact on the prohibited list we could not have sold it. We do not know the full story, but the point is that the government did step in and take some action. If this legislation had been in force and the foreign corporation that wished to take over Denison Mines had come before the government and said, "we in fact conform to virtually every part of this legislation and we are agreeable to going along with your economic criteria", the government might very well have permitted the takeover of Denison Mines.

There is tremendous danger in this legislation which is being advanced before the House as being a step forward, a move in the direction of doing something about foreign ownership, starting with takeovers. It is in fact a menace and could very well provide the government with the excuse it needs to enable more rather than fewer takeovers in Canada. It is for that reason that the terms of reference in the preamble must be enlarged. It is for that reason that we must add "political and social" after "economic". We are in the mess in which we find ourselves today because the government has insisted that we are only making economic judgments. We have the present degree of foreign ownership because the government has been saying that the marketplace will sort it out. We do not want that any more. Unless this legislation provides other criteria, then it is useless and, more than useless, it is dangerous.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), who speaks so ably for the government, may say, as we have said, that the legislation represents an advance, that it is a step forward, although it is not everything he or we would like. On the other hand, he may say—and there have been hints to this effect—that if this legislation is not passed before the adjournment it will be on the opposition's heads. He may say, "Let them answer to the country and explain why this legislation did not pass, even though it is a small step so far as the government is concerned". I wonder whether there is that much brass on the government benches to make that kind of accusation.

On a number of occasions we have raised the matter of the interim problem before the takeover legislation comes into force. After all, foreign ownership and takeovers are not new. This country has been debating the subject for at least 10 to 12 years. The government has shown no fear whatsoever of what may happen during that period of time. Even while this legislation was being discussed there were assurances from the opposite side when some of us raised the question of retroactivity and of what should be done in the interim. We were told that it does not make any difference really because once these companies know that we intend to pass legislation at this time they will hopefully behave accordingly and in the light of the impending legislation.

In the past there has not been any sense of urgency on the part of the government. Why is there this new sense of urgency, why this drumming of the legislation through the committee and now the obvious desire of the government to drum it through the House in a short period of time during a week when many other pieces of legislation are supposed to be considered? The reason is that the government simply does not want any examination of its foreign policy objectives. It does not want any real, significant debate on takeovers and their relationship to foreign ownership in Canada. What it is hoping for is to defuse the entire problem of foreign ownership in this country. It wants to be able to go into an election and say that foreign ownership is no longer an issue, that it has taken care of it and that the legislation is on the books. It is in that context that the legislation is dangerous. The government does not want a debate on foreign ownership; it wants to shove the matter under the rug, to hide it in a closet where no one will see it, and then go on with what it will invent as issues in the election.

Takeovers and foreign ownership in Canada are far too serious a problem to be dismissed in the way the government wants it dismissed. We are not prepared to see it shoved to the side in this way. We think the question is serious enough that those members who have things to say about foreign ownership should say them. We think it is important enough for the debate to continue. After all, there has not been a debate in the House on foreign ownership and on legislation affecting it with the possible exception of some sections in the Bank Act. If this legislation is passed there may not be a debate on foreign ownership in the House or anywhere until an election is called.

Let me raise some of the issues surrounding the question of foreign takeovers that should be considered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I have to remind the hon. member that as much as possible he should relate his remarks to the amendment before the House which he himself has brought to the attention of the House. I have listened to him closely for a minute or so, more closely than before, and it does appear to me that he is now making a speech which he might have made on second reading or which he might make later on third reading. I think an effort must be made by hon. members not to make general speeches when we have before us a very specific amendment.

Mr. Saltsman: I want to discuss some of the social implications of foreign takeovers, and I think that this relates directly to the amendment. Let us take the situation of an international corporation that wants to take over effectively in the province of Quebec. Is the government simply going to look at this kind of takeover in economic terms alone, as important as economics are, or will it ask other important questions?

Quebec is moving in the direction of greater reliance on French as the working language of the province. Will the government ask an interantional corporation proposing a takeover what its policy is on language and whether, in Quebec, the working language of that corporation is to be French as it should be? Or will the government say that this is not its concern because the bill deals only with economics, not with the French language or social conditions in Quebec or elsewhere in Canada, and therefore the takeover ought to be permitted? If that is the criterion to be used, if that is the way the government is to judge these matters, we are heading for trouble. One cannot separate economic and social conditions in a province. In a poor society where people are on the verge of starvation, economic considerations rule entirely. However, in a society that has achieved some degree of substance the people want something else as well. They consider the quality of life important, as well as the environment. Their social milieu is most important in their eyes. Yet this bill does not consider these areas. This bill, which might be most welcome in some primitive, underdeveloped country, makes no sense in Canada, a country with social and political objectives.

Are we, for instance, to look at a takeover and consider it only on economic grounds if the effect of the takeover might be the raising of consumer prices because of heavy advertising, product differentiation, and so on? Is the government to decide on economic grounds alone? Will the consumer not be considered? Will takeovers be permitted in all cases where it can be shown that a company's operations will be profitable and create employment? If a company involved in a takeover will create pollution through the introduction of certain techniques, will questions not be asked about this? Will the government not ask if the company is prepared to do research in Canada and employ this country's graduates and thus provide for a future Canadian technological capability? Will the government not ask such questions, or will it simply permit takeovers on general economic grounds? I agree it is not always possible to judge the benefits of research in straight economic terms because the implications of research go beyond economics, but how will the government judge in cases like that?

After repeated questioning, members of the government still have not told us clearly how many firms are involved in the United States DISC program, for the very good reason that they do not know. Actually, it seemed that there was no way it could know how many firms are involved. Now the government is undertaking extensive detective work and trying to ferret out those companies which have "shafted it" or double-crossed it. The government is learning who its good corporate friends are. It is watching the situation.

If certain companies attempt to take over Canadian companies, will the government ask them: Will you be applying for DISC, or will you say that in operating in Canada you will not respond to programs like DISC which may shift production from Canada to the United States or some other country? I say this, Mr. Speaker, because other countries besides the United States are involved in programs of this type. DISC, of course, is a purely American program, but other countries have instituted similar programs. What is the point of allowing a takeover on economic grounds which may look advantageous at the time unless the company taking over the Canadian company assures us that it will not respond, in its Canadian operations, to legislation passed in the country in which the parent of the international corporation operates? We must be assured that companies coming to this country will not respond to programs instituted in the United States which might permit them to take advantage of certain tax concessions.

One criterion governing companies that seek to take over Canadian companies must be that they shall obey the laws of Canada only and not the laws of other countries; otherwise we shall, in the future, lose control of our economy and lose our social and political freedom. The bill contains no provisions in this area. The bill does not even touch on it. For instance, how is the government to say to such companies: You must assure us that you will continue your operations in Canada and not transfer them out of the country if any tax benefits under programs like DISC are offered to you?

Will the government look at the history and background of a foreign corporation wanting to take over a Canadian company and assess its labour policies? Many companies in the United States and other parts of the world, including Canada, have been notorious for their terrible labour-management relations. Are we to permit companies like that to operate in Canada without scrutinizing them? Are we to permit companies like that to enter on purely economic grounds? Are we to allow companies to operate in this country if their policies would be reprehensible in our social climate? I am not talking about witch hunts or the John Birch Society, much as I dislike it, or anything like that. I do not know how you can keep people like that out. I am talking about companies of the United States which have adopted anti-trade union or anti-labour stances. Are we to let companies like that operate in Canada when the prevailing sentiment in Canada recognizes the value of trade unions and recognizes that labour-management negotiations in a civilized form ought to be encouraged? Those are the factors we must look at. If we overlook them, we may create an enormous amount of chaos in our society.

The government, however, has a perfect excuse under this legislation if anything goes wrong. It can always say: It is too bad that companies with bad labour-management records have come into this country, but the act does not say anything about it; it only deals with economics and therefore, although we may not like these companies, we cannot do anything about them since we are restricted by the act. Instead of allowing us to develop in freedom, the act will become a sort of straitjacket that the government has voluntarily put on.

At present the government has power to control foreign takeovers. It has exercised these powers. Therefore it must not tell us that if this bill is not passed by the end of the session the responsibility will be on our heads because it has no powers to prevent takeovers. It has prevented them before when a takeover was against the public interest and when there was public pressure to block it. This bill will give the government a beautiful out. It will not need to respond to public opinion or political pressure because it can hide behind this legislation. For example, will the government ask the foreign company to assure the Canadian people that the Trading with the Enemy Act of the United States will not apply to that company's operations in Canada? The government can say that this legislation does not cover matters like that, that it covers takeovers on economic grounds alone, and that therefore a company will be allowed to enter this country if it can show that its operations will be profitable, that it can produce so many gadgets and create more jobs.

The government will be able to say that political considerations do not come under the act. The point is, Mr. Speaker, that political considerations are important and can seriously affect our foreign policy. There is no reason in the world to permit companies coming into Canada to operate under a dual loyalty. Perhaps the primary loyalty of the company may be to that country in which its parent has its head office. But let us make no mistake. The United States Trading with the Enemy Act does not exempt the branch plant of a United States corporation from its provisions. The subsidiary of an American corporation is subject to the provisions of that act and other acts of that type that may be passed by the United States.

It might be argued that there is not a great deal of evidence to indicate that the Trading with the Enemy Act of the United States has seriously inhibited the operations of Canadian branches of foreign corporations, but there is enough evidence to indicate that it has to some extent in the past and may in the future have some very serious effect. Even if the effect is slight, we as a nation should feel insulted to think that for the sake of a takeover and bringing more capital into this country, we are prepared to limit our sovereignty seriously in relation to those with whom we do business, have cultural relationships and normal contact. We should not have to go about the country watching those who are subject to pressure based on political judgments in the United States.

Other problems will arise such as the amalgamation of firms in Canada. In a system like ours the situation is seldom the same from year to year. The number of competitors in industry will vary as technology becomes more and more expensive and as the need for size and skill increases. Mergers will then have to take place. Conversely, as the amount of money that is needed to acquire certain kinds of technology diminishes, some of these corporations should be split into smaller units because it is more economical. These changes have to take place in society. They are not taking place in Canadian society because of American legislation.

American corporations are subject to the Sherman act, the combines legislation of the United States. Even where it appears that some mergers between branch plants of foreign corporations in Canada are desirable, they are afraid to do so. They are not only afraid but they are unable to do so because they are subject to the laws of another country.

When looking at takeovers the government should ask these corporations whether they will willingly agree not to be subject to the Sherman act but will act according to the needs of the Canadian marketplace and the social and political context in which we live. Is the government going to seek these assurances? There is no evidence that they intend to do so. I think the government would be afraid to even raise the question of the Sherman act or other acts of this nature. I see the minister shaking his head to indicate that he is not scared out of his handsome head. He will have an opportunity later to reply in a somewhat more articulate manner. These are the kinds of problems we are going to face if this legislation is passed in this form.

I want to raise one other point. If I do not raise it, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will. Perhaps he will say that we do not have a right to make social and political judgments with regard to takeovers because we do not make social and political judgments with regard to anybody else, and therefore, the takeover people will be subject to all the laws of Canada as they now stand. If the minister implies that, he has his head in the sand. He will in fact be saying that an international corporation responds in the same way as a Canadian-owned corporation, but it does not. An American corporation does not respond in the same way as a Canadian or a German corporation. They have different attitudes and rules. The minister will also be saying that because we have failed to make these kinds of distinctions in our economy we should not only continue this kind of failure but also reinforce it.

We are trying to break away from the failures of the past. We in this country have come to the conclusion that foreign ownership is not the great gift we thought it was originally. We know that it has damaged our economy and has created serious problems for us. This legislation is supposed to deal with that. If it does not, what good is it? It is time we dealt with this situation.

We are asking that an attempt be made to deal with this matter in a realistic way. We suggest that all the necessary criteria of economic, social and political judgments be combined when looking at a takeover. In some ways the minister should welcome this amendment because it is going to be very difficult to separate these things when an economic judgment has to be made. It would be much healthier and much easier for whoever is making this judgment to have the power to look at it in its total context. It might be argued that there is no context and that the government has no program, plan or social objective. To a large extent this is true, but the government knows there are some things in this country that are sociably desirable and wanted by the Canadian people. By accepting this amendment, the minister will have an opportunity to take these things into consideration.

The legislation sets out that the government is going to look at things, but it does not say what they have to do in any specific case. If this legislation is to be effective and have any meaning whatsoever, the entire gamut of Canadian needs has to be taken into account. It is for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that we urge acceptance of this amendment.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few comments in support of the amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman).

[Mr. Saltsman.]

In the past few months I have had occasion to read the two volumes written by Pierre Burton on the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway from east to west. I recommend that during the summer recess the minister find the time to read them. The message that comes across loud and clear in these two superb books is that if the decision to build a railway from Montreal to Vancouver had been made on purely economic grounds the railway would never have been built. If Sir John A. Macdonald and the Conservative Party of Canada had looked at the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway on a purely dollars and cents basis, the railway would not have been built. With a country extending for thousands of miles from east to west, with a very small population huddled close to the United States border, and Toronto, Montreal and even Winnipeg all less than 100 miles from the American border, it is obvious it would have been sensible to build railway connections from Toronto, Montreal, Halifax, Winnipeg and Vancouver to the closest cities south of the border. Had Sir John A. Macdonald and the Conservative Party followed the kind of thinking inherent in the bill before us today drafted by the government, the Canadian Pacific Railway would not have been built. If the CPR had not been built there would be no Canada today, there would be no Parliament and we would not be meeting here to debate this bill.

• (1150)

Why was the CPR built? As hon. members know, I am not a great supporter of the way in which it was built or of the kind of subsidies which were given in the form of cash and land grants. But the CPR was built, in the end, despite tremendous opposition from certain financial and political interests in this country as a result of the determination of a Conservative government led by Sir John A. Macdonald who had reached the conclusion that a railway was needed if this country were to survive. This decision was made for political and social reasons. It was not made because of economic reasons. If Macdonald had been called upon to decide the issue on the basis of business considerations alone, the railway would never have been built. So I urge the minister to be less partisan, to be less obstinate in his approach to this amendment. Let him not persist in believing that the bill before us is the be all and end all of what is required. Let him consider all the benefits he will derive in the administration of this legislation if he agrees to the amendment my hon. friend has proposed.

Allow me to give two illustrations which will make it clear why I believe the kind of amendment we are proposing is needed. I shall deal first with the Kootenay and Elk Railway in British Columbia. As hon. members know there are tremendous coal deposits in that province. That coal is presently being removed and sold almost exclusively to Japan. It is being hauled over Canadian railway lines to the west coast where it is shipped. It is now proposed by certain financial interests that a line be built, the Kootenay and Elk line, to the United States border so that the coal can be shipped mainly over United States railway systems and through United States territory to Cherry Point.

Mr. Pepin: Is this on the subject of transportation or takeover?

Mr. Orlikow: The minister must have had a difficult weekend because he is usually intelligent, but his interjections today indicate to me that he has had a rough weekend; he is being as stupid as some of his colleagues usually are.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Orlikow: The minister knows as well as I do that a ruling by the Canadian Transport Commission forbidding such movement was overthrown by the courts. If the bill before us goes through, on what basis can similar operations be prevented? I am sure the people who propose shipment of this coal over United States lines will be able to demonstrate that it would be cheaper to move it over United States railways rather than via the Canadian Pacific or Canadian National. Obviously, if it were not cheaper they would not be proposing this operation. So I suggest to the minister that if there were a clause in the bill giving the government the right to prevent takeovers on political or social grounds he could intervene to ensure that plans such as I have been describing are not carried out.

I say to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Deachman), who is looking askance at me, that he ought to consider these operations in terms of what they would mean if related to job opportunities in British Columbia. Let him remember that not long ago 9 per cent of the labour force in Vancouver was unemployed; there were more unemployed in that city than in Montreal which traditionally has the highest rate of unemployment.

Let me give one other illustration. The hon. member for Waterloo talked about the effects upon United States corporations of legislation such as the Trading with the Enemy Act. It has been frequently suggested that Canadian subsidiaries of United States corporations are not very much influenced by their head offices in the United States. I can think of one case in which such influence could have had a very adverse effect on the people of Canada, particularly those of western Canada.

Several years ago the government of Canada, a Liberal government, made a deal with the Soviet Union agreeing to sell a large quantity of wheat and flour. The Russians then asked that a substantial part of this wheat and flour should be shipped to Cuba instead of being shipped first to the Soviet Union. It so happened, fortunately in one way and unfortunately in another, that there was a substantial overcapacity for flour production in this country at that time. This was the situation: some 80 per cent of the flour production facilities in this country is controlled by United States companies whose head offices are outside the country, and they were forbidden to produce flour for Cuba. Suppose this surplus capacity had not been available. Had this been the case we could not have fulfilled the wishes of the Soviet Union with respect to shipment at a time when we were desperately looking for markets for our wheat and flour.

I suggest to the minister that unless in this legislation there is included a provision such as is proposed by my hon. friend permitting the government to decide the question of takeovers not simply on the basis of economics but on the basis of political and social requirements we shall be in precisely the same position after this bill has been passed as we are now. The government will have a bill the provisions of which it will be unable to implement in order to prevent takeovers. I predict that this is what will happen. I am very sceptical that, with the present minister and government in office, many questions will be asked or takeovers prevented, though I hope I am wrong and that when the legislation does pass the minister will demonstrate that he is a tiger instead of a pussycat. However, I suggest that if any United States company or company whose headquarters is in some other country considers a takeover really worth while from its point of view, the minister will face the same situation as in the case of the Kootenay and Elk railway which I talked about a few moments ago. If such is the case, the company will be told that under the law a takeover is not permitted. The only reason the minister will have for such decision is that the takeover does not suit the economic interests of this country.

• (1200)

The company in question will then do precisely what the Kootenay and Elk railway did, which is to go to the court. I am sure that companies like General Motors or some of these multinational giants will have the economic, statistical and financial resources at least to match those of the government of Canada, and they will be able to demonstrate, at least to the satisfaction of the court, that from the point of view of economics, from the point of view of the company itself, from the point of view of the producer and so on, a takeover is a good thing. Under those circumstances the court will probably rule, as it did in the Kootenay and Elk Railway case, that the minister does not have the authority to do what he proposes to do even if he proposes to do it, which I doubt.

Therefore, in all seriousness and in my usual non-partisan way I suggest that the minister agree to the amendment proposed by my colleague which will give him the kind of power he needs if this bill is to enable him to do what he told the people of Canada he wants done.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it might be helpful for me to say a few words at this point in the discussion to prevent useless interventions.

I presume no one in this House has the monopoly of intelligence, good will or good intentions and, for my part, I do not totally disagree with the intentions or motives which inspire my hon. friends in the presentation of the amendments before the House. We will agree readily on that point.

But an act is not a patriotic oration such as those we hear on St. John the Baptist's Day, nor is it a speech on the Canadian Pacific. It must be characterized by some logic, by well defined objectives, factors or criteria of judgment. In an act, we must also distinguish between what is essential and subordinate. A subordinate matter can be extremely important, but in the context of the provisions, we must grant it less importance than something to which we give priority.

It is from that point of view, Mr. Speaker, that the bill now under consideration and more especially clause 2 has a certain logic which I will now try to explain.

There are three concepts which we must bear in mind. First, the concern in Canada. Second, the objectives of the legislation. Third, the factors which must be taken into consideration to assess whether the acquisition of control is acceptable.

Three words, then, should hold our attention: "concern", "objectives" and "factors".

At the beginning of clause 2, it is clearly established that the Canadians, the government and the Parliament of Canada are concerned about the weakness of the effective control of Canadians over their economic environment, owing in part to the considerable foreign investments in Canada.

The economic concern is underlined as the most important. That does not mean that the economic situation does not have political, social and cultural effects which do not also concern us; it is a matter of insisting on what is essential, that is the concern about the economic factor. The other consequences result from it.

In order to underline that, mention has been made here only of the effective control by Canadians of their economic environment, and not of the effective control of their environment politically, socially, culturally, and what have you.

In other words—I know this is all very subtle, but as I am addressing a very sophisticated audience, I do not hesitate to do so—had the concern been essentially political or cultural, a totally different bill might have been put before the house.

And I also stress, particularly for the benefit of my hon. friend from Hamilton-West (Mr. Alexander), the practical difficulty in making the distinction between economic, social and political aspects of such issues, and the danger involved in defining the purpose of the bill as economic, social, cultural and political. There definitely is a danger there. At a certain point of the discussion, the wording now recommended by the hon. member for Hamilton West may have been considered, but the purpose, I repeat again, was to determine what the bill would focus on, and it does emphasize the economic aspect. Political, social, and cultural consequences of the economic situation are not being ignored, but the key point, the emphasis is on the economic aspect.

Why so? For a very practical reason. It is in fact very difficult to determine the social, cultural, and political factors involved in deciding whether a takeover is valid. This could lead to all kinds of considerations quite remote from the main concern as expressed in the bill, which is economic.

The hon. member for Hamilton West did put specific questions. He asked me, for instance, whether research and development will be considered in the decision.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Hamilton West is rising on a point of order.

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am continually hearing the minister refer to the hon. member from Hamilton. I appreciate his ability to recognize my input in this House, but this is not my motion. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal will be expressing his thoughts, but I think the minister should give the credit to the member who has put the motion on the order paper.

• (1210)

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, let me say I realize it is very difficult to distinguish between myself and the hon. member for Hamilton West, but I am shorter than he is.

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member for Waterloo asked me if the government was going to consider factors like research and development and the Trading with the Enemy Act in an assessment of the significance or otherwise of the benefits for Canadians in a takeover. The answer is, most probably, and certainly in the case of research and development and in the case of the Trading with the Enemy Act because these are essentially economic considerations. There may be a social or cultural aspect to research and development, but basically research and development is an economic matter. There is no doubt about that, and consequently research and development intentions will be factors borne in mind. As a matter of fact, this is indicated as such in Clause 2 (2).

The hon. member brought up a number of other considerations such as language and behaviour of the company in respect of unions. I could mention a number of other such aspects of company behaviour, for example, allowing employees to be candidates in the political arena.

As we leave the more precise economic considerations and indulge in social and economic factors there is much more room for judgment than there is in the straight economic field. Let me give you a straight example. Suppose a possible acquirer has a very bad record for unlawful pollution in France, Germany or anywhere else; then I would think this might become a factor in the analysis.

With regard to language, because of the possible consequences, I would hesitate to consider that sort of thing because it might get us involved in the business of implementing provincial legislation which itself is in the process of debate. I am not giving legal advice because obviously I cannot, but in the case of language I would say to the potential acquirer that if he is going to Quebec he should certainly be aware that the Quebec government and the Quebec population have specific views about the use of the French language in plants. The potential acquirer should be aware of that. I was talking to a new investor yesterday and he was very much aware of it.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister to point out to me which one of the five factors set out in subsection 2 of clause 2 he would use as his authority for dealing with the matter of language as he has just outlined it to the House?

Mr. Pepin: That is exactly what I am saying; I am not going to deal with language. I am not going to make it a factor for the allowance or otherwise of a takeover because it is not covered specifically in the factors. That is exactly why we want this bill to concentrate on economic matters and not on social, political or cultural matters. You are making the case for me because language is not covered in the bill.

In order to be practical, if I were involved in this business of screening I would certainly make sure that the company about to proceed to take over was aware that there is discussion and debate and the possibility of some future laws in Quebec about the use of French. As a service, an unpaid one, to the potential acquirer, I would make sure he was aware of these facts. That is why the preoccupation and concern of this bill are couched in economic terms. I am the first one to say that political, social and cultural consequences are not unrelated to the importance of foreign investment in Canada, but that is not the first preoccupation of this bill. I started my remarks by saying that this bill tries to make clear what should be clear.

[Translation]

The second concept I have pinpointed relates to "objectives". The second amendment suggested to us recommends that the main objective be two fold, that is first to aim at profits, "significant benefit" to Canada but also as a second main objective, namely "ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment."

In fact, this amendment would tend to establish a double main objective. First, increased profits for Canada and secondly "ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment".

Mr. Speaker—and as always I am speaking quite frankly—if we consider on the same basis two objectives—that is benefit to Canada and ability of Canadians to control their economy, I think we would create great difficulties.

Why? Because it may very well be that in certain situations, or in a takeover, the ability of Canadians to control their own economy will not be their major concern. I shall give you a concrete example.

Let us consider the case where a foreign-owned company would want to take over a branch of another foreign-owned company in Canada. Following an inspection, or a screening of that take over; we would discover that there are all sorts of advantages, such as, for instance, from the point of view of economic activity, research and development, exports, but, on the other hand, that the increase in Canadian control may very well not be an important gain in this takeover of a branch, a subsidiary already operating in Canada. I hope this is clear enough.

If we accept amendment No. 2, it would become mandatory to show in such a case that there is an increase in the ability of Canadians to control their own economy, and that is not necessarily so. There are others benefits, but that one is not of prime importance.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I cannot admit that the ability of Canadians to control their own economy be considered under this measure as an objective on the same level as the "significant benefit" that would derive for Canada.

I hope I have made myself clear; if not, I would gladly start over again.

The third amendment, Mr. Speaker, is a repetition of the second with the difference that here the ability of Canadians to control their own economic environment is taken, not as an objective, as in amendment No. 2, but as one of the factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a takeover is acceptable or not. I hope I have made this point clear.

My answer is very simple; it is that this concern is already included in the factors enumerated in clause 2(2) of the bill, and more specifically in subclause (b). Once again, to assess the admissibility of a takeover, to see if it brings about "significant benefit" to Canada, five factors will be taken into account and among these, the one included in subclause (b). It reads:

(b) the degree and significance of participation by Canadians in the business enterprise and in any industry or industries in Canada of which it forms a part;

• (1220)

[English]

Let me put this in English now. The suggested amendment says that we should bear in mind the ability or capacity of Canadians to control their own economy. I simply answer that this is already in the bill under clause 2(2)(b) which reads:

the degree and significance of participation by Canadians in the business enterprise and in any industry or industries in Canada of which it forms a part;

So when we look at a potential takeover we will look, among other things—I underline this—at what it will bring in terms of Canadian participation, in terms of Canadian directors, in terms of Canadian management, in terms of Canadian ownership. We will look at all that with respect to the particular takeover and we will look at it—and this is in answer to my friend, the hon. member for Waterloo—in terms of the industrial sector in which that particular takeover is taking place.

In the case which he submitted to us of Denison Mines the screening authority would have looked at the Denison case also in terms of Canadian participation in that sector of the Canadian industry. They would ask themselves: if Denison disappears, what will happen to the Canadian presence in the uranium field?

I do not want to pursue my remark because amendments 21 and 28 are just a continuation of amendments 1, 2 and 3, but let me sum up what I tried to say. I said that we have three concepts here: first, the concern of the population which can be political and social but which is basically economic. The other two considerations follow the economic situation. Second, I said that the objective of this bill is to bring out advantages and benefits which are significant for Canada. The main purpose or an equally direct purpose of this bill is not to enhance the capacity of Canadians to direct their own economy. I believe strongly that the first will help the second, that if you bring about more research and development through a takeover you will enhance the capacity of Canadians to control their economy, but I repeat that this is not the main objective of this bill. I say that I hope this amendment will be defeated. If it were accepted it would create all kinds of difficulties because there are cases when the enhancement of the capacity of Canadians to control their economy cannot and will not be the main preoccupation of those who will have the job of screening takeovers. Third, I said that the very desirable secondary objective submitted in these amendments, that is, the capacity of Canadians to enhance their control over the economy, is already contained in the bill as a factor to be taken into account.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a pity that amendment No. 1 is grouped with amendments 2, 3, 21 and 28. However, that issue has presumably been settled by the Chair. It might have meant that there could have been a different response on the part of my party had amendment No. 1 been separated from amendments 2, 3, 21 and 28.

It seems to me, with great respect, that the NDP is engaged in what I suggest is a futile attempt to breathe life into a rather innocuous bill. The truth is that takeovers represented 15 per cent of Canada's foreign investment in 1968 and 5 per cent in 1969. This is from memory, and memory is often a bad judge. The figures may be reversed, but I am willing to be tested on them. They are trying to tie political and social considerations to a bill which is of such weakness and is so fragile that it cannot, I suggest, withstand this type of major surgery. Furthermore, I really think that it would subject the bill to a constitutional test of very serious implications. It may well be argued, and I suspect it will be by some of my colleagues and the Bar Association, that the amendment would be a major ground for constitutional challenge to the bill itself, but this is not part of my argument at the moment. I do not think we should be mystified by the fact that people want to make amendments and tinker with the bill. After all, the bill was heralded.

The minister made great play of the fact that he is candid. Candour is an estimable quality of the minister, but if he was being totally candid he would admit that after a couple of years of study of the matter of foreign investment out popped this bill, the trumpet sounded, and this was supposed to be the answer. I suggested earlier that the trumpet sound was somewhat uncertain. The NDP, who apparently had an interesting weekend drumming out part of their party, are now engaged in trying to drown out my few remarks by musical interjections. This may be an interesting role for them; I leave it to them. I wonder who had the worst weekend.

I think that in paragraph (e) of subclause 2 of clause 2 the absence of enunciated national and industrial policies for this country also adds to the dilemma we have in debating the bill with any intelligence. Really it is an Alice in Wonderland world. The word which the bill uses is "factors", but we have never heard or been told the essential components of those factors. This makes it rather awkward to have any certainty about the full implications of the bill. I suggest that in trying to sharpen the bill as a weapon in dealing with the whole matter of foreign investment and the control that Canadians obviously want to have over their economic destiny, it is better not to try to make amendments that may go to the very consitutionality of the bill itself. Rather, it would be better to oppose motions Nos. 1, 3, 21 and 28, and that is what this party proposes to do.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this is the opening of the debate on the bill following its reference to the committee, and I think it is incumbent upon me to comment upon the committee hearings and upon the reactions of the public to the decision of the committee with respect to receiving representations.

I suggest there has been a totally indecent haste on the part of the government in trying to put the bill through the House. The committee finished its hearings on Thursday, and here we are not much beyond the legal 48 hours discussing the bill at the report stage. Time and time again the briefs from the public indicated they would have preferred more opportunity to comment on a number of questions, but because of the haste with which they had to prepare their briefs they were not in a position to do so. In fact, Mr. Speaker, many organizations must hold national consultations before submitting briefs.

As indicated by my colleague from Fundy-Royal, the government took nigh on two years to come to its conclusion. It issued a form of report, accompanied by a bill, and then immediately jumped in and said: Look, this bill has to be considered right now and passed into law. I think it was silly and irresponsible of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to make such a comment. In fact, I think he went much farther than that. I think he was trying to blackjack the House into a routine consideration of a unilateral step taken by the government when moving into an area that is shared with the provinces. He then made the threat that any disabilities or any consequences of takeovers that might take place between the time he was speaking and when the bill became law would be visited upon the heads of members of this House. That was patent nonsense, Mr. Speaker. It is the type of nonsense the Prime Minister speaks as soon as he steps into the economic area.

This bill goes much beyond the question of so-called takeovers. It provides for a mechanism to screen the acquisition of ownership, to screen even a small percentage of ownership which every witness, outside of government circles, indicated was beyond any question of control. Equally so, Mr. Speaker, the minister's own witnesses indicated that they have not devised the regulations, they have not devised the procedures, and certainly up until the time of the committee hearings they had not chosen the registrar or the review board.

The minister and I may have a difference of opinion about the number of weeks that will pass before this bill becomes law. I point out that it is to come into force not upon assent by Parliament but upon proclamation. It is quite conceivable that two or three months could pass before the bill becomes law. What becomes, then, of those so-called takeovers that take place between the time the House adjourns on June 30, if it does adjourn, and the date the bill becomes law?

When he made his threat the Prime Minister exhibited an abysmal ignorance of the bill or else tried to mislead the public when he made such a statement. That is where I would put it. It was just windowdressing on his part to attempt to show that the government is taking vigorous action on the question of foreign ownership.

This bill confuses control and takeovers with the question of ownership. I would commend to the minister and his advisers a very careful study into the performance of foreign-owned firms in Canada, made at the behest of the Canadian-American Committee by a group headed by Professor Safarian of Toronto. This study makes far more sense than the so-called Gray report, or the so-called leaked report of last fall. In my estimation it shows the confusion in the government's mind over ownership and control.

The first amendment proposed by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) deals with much more than mere economic development of the country. I question whether the Parliament of Canada has sufficient jurisdiction, without agreement with the provinces, to move to control provincially incorporated businesses operating strictly within the province of incorporation. I question whether it has jurisdiction to touch a foreign corporation that is registered under the foreign companies act within any province and is limited in its operations to that province. This amendment goes much farther than that and talks about the political and social environment.

Because of the non-performance of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) before the committee, the reactions of the provinces to this bill remain the most sacrosanct state secret. The minister himself indicated that there was a range of opinions but he did not indicate what they were. He said that he intends to have consultations, but what he and his officials consider to be consultations may differ widely from what provincial administrations consider to be consultations. A classic example, which appears in public print, is the attitude of my own province where the Minister of Federal and Intergovernmental Affairs, Mr. Getty, stated that he is not satisfied with this unilateral action on the part of the government of Canada and that consultation might be information after the event.

There is not the machinery nor is there the personnel available within the government for the purpose of judging the significant economic benefit to Canada of transactions taking place in certain activities. The minister cannot give one instance of any expertise in oil and gas or any part of the petroleum industry. Yet by the very nature of the transactions taking place daily in Alberta, the centre of exploration for and production of oil and gas, which is a highly complex business—

Mr. Pepin: You don't want to build at all.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, that interjection shows the attitude of this government, an attitude reflected from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that if we criticize anything we are against it.

Mr. Pepin: I was just trying to tease you.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I suggest to the minister that the government has no monopoly on concern about the degree of foreign participation in our industry. Somehow or other they think they are the saviours of the people and pose as knights on white chargers in regard to this subject. We have been at pains to show that there are other ways of achieving this. This bill does not do one blessed thing to enable Canadians to participate more actively in the ownership and control of their industry. There is nothing in it which is designed to encourage Canadians to participate. There is some sort of attempt, as it says, "to maintain effective control over their economic environment". The motion adds the words: "political and social".

I have called into question the jurisdiction of the government to move unilaterally in the matter of the economic environment. Surely it is without question that, if the amendment were to appear in this bill, by tomorrow morning challenges would come from the provinces because we know that many of the provinces put much greater emphasis on the political and social aspects than on the economic. Therefore, in this the New Democratic Party is showing its ambivalence between its traditional wing and its now to be expurgated Waffle. It now wants to set up some sort of economic czardom. They have some sort of fetish that they will have planners, boys in the back room and ivory-tower academics who will handle Canada's economic life through an instrument such as a takeover bill.

I reiterate the concern of my colleague the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) about the grouping of the first amendment with the other four. They are all quite different.

Mr. Deachman: You didn't do anything about it so don't complain now.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Deachman) is well known for speaking from his seat in any discussion of the matter at hand.

Mr. Deachman: You are losing the thread of your argument, but go ahead.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In any event, Mr. Speaker, this amendment would extend the considerations that the bill would have. I have queried the present ambit of the bill from its constitutional point of view. This, to me, takes it much further.

I should like to put on record an excerpt from a letter sent to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) by Conwest Exploration Company, Limited, a company owned by Canadians. The letter reads in part:

> With respect to companies, our experience, in the Canadian mining industry, is that "effective control" through holdings of issued voting shares varies from company to company. In a company with a large number of shareholders (i.e. in excess of 200 shareholders) and a relatively even distribution of the issued voting shares (i.e. no single shareholder holding more than 1 per cent of such issued shares), effective control might in unusual circumstances be available with as little as 20 per cent of the issued voting shares; whereas in a company which has fewer shareholders effective control would probably require holdings in excess of 35 per cent of the issued voting shares. With respect to companies with a large number of shareholders, we believe that 20 per cent of the issued voting shares would not, in ordinary circumstances, represent effective control and even 30 per cent would be very vulnerable. Therefore the bill should contain realistic percentages with respect to voting rights when dealing with the broad spectrum presumption as to "non-eligible persons".

This is an argument that will come up again, but the question is "effective control over their economic environment". There has been some confusion by the government with regard to the low percentage figure, the threshhold figure of ownership which involves calling into play the machinery under this bill. There is no review process. Even though there may be rebuttable presumptions and so forth, it is still part of the process. I say that there is no way that this bill, with its low threshhold of shareholdings, will have anything to do with the political and social environment. I say that this amendment appearing as No. 1 is meaningless within this bill and unfortunately it has been linked with the others. One could express some sympathy with regard to the second amendment, the substance of which reads as follows:

. . . and is likely to enhance the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment.

What it boils down to is this: How is one to judge what is of significant benefit to Canada? I maintain, of course, that many transactions of a mutual nature will be affected by this bill. Hopefully, they will continue to take place. If they must meet the standard of significant benefit to Canada as well as those additional standards, requests or amplifications put forward in other amendments, I can only say that the picture will be so materially changed as to suggest that this matter has not been thought through. In my view, the first set of amendments cannot be supported.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I must, first, take note of the comments made by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), who spoke on behalf of his party. At least, he was the first member of his party to speak on this matter in this debate. I lent a sympathetic ear to the remarks he made on the amendments now under consideration which have been moved by members of the New Democratic Party. He suggested that these amendments represent a futile attempt to breathe life into this legislation. I can assure the hon. member that we certainly wrestled with the matter because we think this legislation is so hopeless and so inadequate that it is most difficult to insert meaningful changes into the bill. At the same time, I think this is a most useful exercise because this bill permits us to see whether the government's heart is where its mouth is. I suggest that we must take these amendments most seriously because they will provide some indication whether the government seriously intends to do something under this legislation. If the government is willing to accept the amendments we have put forward it will show us that it is trying to do something beneficial, even though we are dealing with a pretty inadequate piece of legislation.

In commenting on the remarks of the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, may I say that if the hon. member really meant what he said, namely, that we should just oppose this legislation even though it is pretty inadequate, his suggestion, the sincerity of which I do not doubt, would have been more appropriate if the members of his party had taken a more vigorous stance on the bill at the second reading stage and previously. I might remind the House that the hon. member's party was unanimous in supporting the bill on second reading. It seems to me the hon. member is trying to divert attention from some difficulties existing within the Progressive Conservative party. At the same time, the difficulties and dilemmas of the Progressive Conservative party could not have been more clearly demonstrated than by the speeches of the hon. members for Fundy-Royal and Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). The hon. member for Fundy-Royal presented the "Progressive" point of view and the hon. member for Edmonton West presented the "Conservative" point of view. I can understand why some years ago that party decided to insert "Progressive" into its name and become the Progressive Conservative party. Once again it has demonstrated the sort of stance it has adopted for some years on many issues which have come before the House.

Certainly, this legislation is a futile exercise. I should like to hear the hon. member for Fundy-Royal reconcile his position with the fact that his party has submitted 15 amendments, as listed on the order paper, at the report stage. I also find it somewhat curious that the hon. member, after talking about this futile exercise, should so successfully straddle the fence by saying: We will support one of these amendments but oppose the others that are under consideration at present. His party would oppose the other amendments even though they deal essentially with the same area as the one it supports.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With respect, no, they do not.

Mr. Burton: The hon. member felt that he ought to support one amendment but oppose the rest. I suggest that shows very curious logic.

In dealing with the amendments before us, the first point that ought to be made clear in the minds of hon. members is that this matter is being approached as a political issue by the government. The government has demonstrated, by the structure of the legislation it seeks to introduce which provides that authority and control with respect to the implementation and administration of this legislation rests not with some board, not with officials, but with the minister, that this is a political matter. It is the minister who is to make the recommendations to the Governor in Council, and it is the Governor in Council that is to make the final decision. Clearly, this is a political matter and will be dealt with in a political way. That is evident from the very basis and structure of the bill the government has presented to the House.

When the minister placed the emphasis, as he did in his speech, on economic considerations, or, rather, on the paramountcy of economic considerations and suggested that that is what this country is all about, I suggest he demonstrated that he does not know the history of Canada and does not know what this country is all about. I suggest that the amendments now before us are an attempt to give this bill some meaning. We are trying to give some further indication that we, in Canada, are trying to deal with some of the problems that this bill alludes to, certainly in clause 2. However, instead of introducing legislation which is really effective, which really could deal with basic issues, the government, I suggest, has brought in a sterile, impotent eunoch. Having listened to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr.

Pepin), it has become clear to me that this legislation is really a sham and hoax and not an attempt to deal with our difficulties connected with takeovers and the entire issue of foreign ownership, the issue we have been considering for so long. When this bill was being considered by the finance committee—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will note that it is now one o'clock. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2:00 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TABLING OF SIXTH REPORT OF CLERK OF PETITIONS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk has laid on the table the sixth report of the Clerk of Petitions.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF EXPERIMENTAL ISSUE OF BILINGUAL ORDER PAPER

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will notice that a bilingual edition of the order paper in the same style and format as bilingual bills has been placed on their desks in addition to the regular English and French editions.

In line with a suggestion from the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, the Chair will be pleased to hear whether the combined version is more suitable and useful to hon. members than the separate English and French editions. This arrangement will continue for the balance of this session to make it possible to obtain hon. members' views.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Third Report of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs—Mr. Foster.

[Editors Note: For text of above Report, see today's Votes and Proceedings]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Questions

DEVELOPMENT AND PRODUCTION OF DHC-7 STOL AIRCRAFT

Question No. 174—Mr. Noble:

1. What progress is the government making towards promoting the development and production of the DHC-7 Stol aircraft?

2. What is the amount of the government investment in this project?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. Negotiations have been conducted by the department with the Havilland Canada Limited covering the complete program for the development to certification of the DHC-7 STOL aircraft. The result of those negotiations remain subject to final approval by the government.

2. The government's investment to date on the DHC-7 STOL aircraft is $5.73 million.

BILINGUAL POLICY AT NATIONAL HISTORIC SITES

Question No. 285—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Does the federal government make contributions to national historic buildings in Canada for the purpose of implementing the government's bilingual policy at these national sites?

2. Did the Charlottetown Confederation Centre approach the federal government for aid in adapting their signs to bilingual ones and, if so, what was the contribution of the federal government to this project?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Secretary of State as follows: 1. All building signs in our National Historic Parks and Sites are fully bilingual. All recent national historic plaques attached to buildings across Canada not owned by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development are bilingual. A program is now under way to make all national historic plaques bilingual.

2. No.

ESTIMATED COST OF ADMINISTERING FAMILY ALLOWANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 357—Mr. Robinson:

What is the estimated cost of administering the family allowance program in accordance with the selectivity criteria for payments?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): After implementation, the cost of administration of the Family Income Security Plan for one full year is expected to be approximately $17 million. This figure represents 2.1 per cent of anticipated expenditures on FISP benefits to families.

CANADIAN-OWNED PHARMACEUTICAL MANUFACTURERS

Question No. 426—Mr. Rowland:

1. What percentage of the pharmaceutical manufacturers operating in Canada are Canadian-owned companies?

2. What percentage of the total volume of prescription drugs used in Canada do Canadian-owned pharmaceutical manufacturers produce?

Questions

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. Information gathered under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act indicates that in 1969, the most recent year for which data are available, 33 per cent of all pharmaceutical manufacturers operating in Canada were Canadian owned, accounting for 10 per cent of the industry's assets, and 11 per cent of its sales.

2. Information not available. However, it is estimated that Canadian-owned pharmaceutical manufacturers produce approximately 5 p. cent of the prescription drugs used in Canada.

REGIONAL STATISTICS

Question No. 450—Mr. Nystrom:

Which department has jurisdiction over the development of regional statistics?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: Statistics Canada has a responsibility to provide statistics on all aspects of economic and social activities and within the resources available, is developing and producing regional statistics as part of its program.

EMPLOYMENT SUPPORT ACT—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES

Question No. 524—Mr. Mazankowski: (Supplementary)

Under the provisions of the Employment Support Act (a) what agricultural commodities received financial assistance (b) what was the amount in lieu of each commodity (c) how were the funds distributed?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Under the provisions of the Employment Support Act, assistance is limited to "manufacturers" as defined in Section 2 of this Act. Consequently, agricultural commodities were not supported directly under the Act but only indirectly to the extent that food processors received assistance in respect of their manufacturing activity. Statistics covering the administration of the Act until March 31, 1972, indicate that 64 grants totalling $853,310 for the support of 1308 jobs were approved to firms in the agriculture, fisheries and food products sector of the Canadian manufacturing industry.

SEED POTATOES

Question No. 580—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

1. During the years 1968, 1969, 1970 and 1971, what promotion was carried out by the government with respect to the domestic and foreign sale of Canadian seed potatoes?

2. During the current year, what plans or programs are being instituted for the promotion of the Canadian seed potatoes?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce continued an active program of export promotion of Canadian seed potatoes in the years 1968, 1969, 1970 and 1971. The principal methods used are technical and promotional trade missions and visits, and testing of Canadian seed potato varieties in foreign countries. (a) In the years mentioned the Department organized incoming potato missions from Roumania, Israel and Chile, and an out-going mission to Greece, Cyprus, Spain and Portugal. In the case of Chile, there was an immediate sale of 26,000 tons of potatoes for consumption in that country, with certified seed being shipped to meet Chile's phytosanitary requirements. The mission from Israel and the one to Spain gained access for Canadian seed potatoes, subject to the satisfactory outcome of trials. A second trial planting of Canadian varieties now is underway in Spain following a successful trial in 1971, and it is hoped that commercial sales of Canadian seed will follow. In the fall of 1971 a seed potato expert from the Canada Dept. of Agriculture was sent to Spain to consult with Spanish officials concerning the trials of Canadian varieties. Late in 1971 the Department brought to Canada the chief potato specialist in the Costa Rican government in connection with a plant health problem, with the result that access to that country was preserved for Canadian seed potatoes. (b) Quantities of Canadian seed for trials were sent to a number of established and potential market countries in the years mentioned. They included Italy where Canada must pay for official tests of varieties which we wish approved for planting in that country. Test quantities of seed also were sent to Greece, Israel, Venezuela, Cuba, Brazil, Peru, Paraguay and Roumania.

2. The Department's program in 1972 includes efforts to introduce Canadian seed into several new market areas such as the African countries bordering on the Mediterranean, initially by providing seed for test plantings. Tests will continue in the Mediterranean countries mentioned in (a), the Caribbean and South America.

Key officials from the EEC will visit Canada in July to inspect Canada's potato research and plant protection systems. The Department has invited a delegation of potato specialists in the Spanish Ministry of Agriculture to visit Canada in August, to further our efforts to establish a commercial market in that country. The Department has arranged for a seed potato mission from Venezuela, Uruguay, Argentina, all traditional markets for Canadian seed, to visit Canada in September in order to maintain our image in the face of increasing competition from European suppliers.

A Canada Department of Agriculture potato expert visited Cuba in early 1971 at the invitation of the Cuban government, to provide advice on a disease condition in the Cuban potato crop. An exchange of technical visits with the Cubans now is underway through cooperation of the Canada Department of Agriculture and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Two Canadian technical experts visited Cuba in May 1972. A Cuban official will spend several weeks in the Maritime potato producing region this summer, and in early 1973 a Canada Department of Agriculture specialist will make a further visit to Cuba. It is expected that this program will do much to maintain Canada's traditional market for seed potatoes in Cuba.

An important part of the continuing program to promote exports of Canadian seed potatoes is to stress the Canada Department of Agriculture's programs of research, plant breeding, inspection and plant health, particularly the Elite Seed program. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce will publish an up-dated seed potato booklet later in 1972 which will cover these subjects, and this booklet will be distributed to all countries where there is an existing or potential market for Canadian seed potatoes. The booklet will aid the efforts of Trade Commissioners in posts around the world. They promote Canadian seed potatoes by assisting in gaining access, by arranging representation for Canadian exporters and by following-up on commercial shipments.

POTATO GRANULES PURCHASES

Question No. 582—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

1. In the years 1968, 1969, 1970 and 1971, what amount of potato granules were purchased for food aid programs?

2. (a) From whom were such granules purchased (b) at what price and in what amounts (c) to whom were they sent and in what amounts?

3. What plans does the government have for the sale of such granules this year as food aid?

4. Has the government responded to the request by the Canadian Horticultural Council to undertake an expanded educational program to acquaint countries with the value of potato granules?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of External Affairs and Agriculture as follows: 1. 2. and 3. See Annex "A" following.

4. No such request received from the Canadian Horticultural Council.

GOVERNMENT CONSIDERATION OF PURCHASE OF DHC-7 STOL

Question No. 598—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government advise if it is considering the purchase of the DHC-7 Quiet STOL Airliner being offered by De Havilland Aircraft of Canada Limited and the Boeing Company?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The DHC-7 is an aircraft in the initial stages of development. Only when it is successfully developed and in production can the government consider purchase of such aircraft.

[Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary).]

IMMIGRATION APPEAL BOARD

Question No. 602—Mr. Hales:

1. How long is it presently taking in the Toronto area from the time a person applies for a hearing before the Immigration Appeal Board until he is called before the Board?

2. How long would it take referral cases before their appeal is heard?

3. What does the Department of Manpower and Immigration propose to do in order to rectify this situation?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The Minister of Manpower and Immigration advises that: 1. Other than detainees, it is estimated that the period of time may be from three and a half to four years.

2. It is understood that this part of the question relates to the inquiry stage of the immigration process. On this basis, there is at the moment a two-year waiting period in Toronto between the time an applicant is found to be unable to qualify for immigrant status on initial assessment and the date a formal immigration inquiry can be convened to examine his case should the applicant choose to pursue this course of action.

3. The Government is studying various alternatives for amending the Immigration Appeal Board Act with a view to speeding up the appeal process. When a suitable solution is found, appropriate amendments will be placed before the House. In the interim, the Department of Manpower and Immigration is implementing a number of administrative measures aimed at reducing the backlogs, by means of increased resources and streamlining of procedures.

APPLICATION TO CHARTERED BANKS IN NEWFOUNDLAND FOR GUARANTEED LOANS

Question No. 613—Mr. Marshall:

How many applications were made to the Chartered Banks in the Province of Newfoundland during the period January 1 to March 31, 1972 under (a) Small Businesses Loans Act (b) Fisheries Improvement Loans Act (c) Farm Improvement Loans Act and, in each case of refusal, for what reasons?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Under the legislation for these programs the chartered banks and other designated lenders, who have the responsibility for processing applications for loans, are not required to report the number and disposition of applications received but only the number and value of loans made.

CIDA ALLOCATION OF FUNDS FOR RESEARCH PROJECT ON TRITICALE BREEDING

Question No. 615—Mr. Hales:

1. How much money has been allocated by CIDA to the University of Manitoba and the CIMMYT program?

2. On what date was it allocated and for what period?

3. What are the potentials of this program and what will it mean to Canada?

4. Where is the money for this research being spent and under whose direction is the program being administered?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1 and 2. CIDA has allocated to the Centro Internacional de Majoramiento de Maiz y Trigo (CIMMYT), in Mexico, a grant in the amount of $2,500,000 to support CIMMYT's research project on triticale breeding, together with a further grant in the amount of $750,000 for Canadian research institutions to carry out research projects in the same field. Out of these, $500,000 will go to the University of Manitoba. The funds have been made available over a period of five years starting in July 1971. As of March 31, 1972, a total of $210,000 has been paid out to CIMMYT and $98,833 to the University of Manitoba.

3. The development of Triticale, a man-made plant from the crossing of wheat and rye has been the subject of pioneering work by plant breeders and scientists at the University of Manitoba over some 15 years. The program should be one of the key factors in the fight against world poverty and hunger.

Triticale has revealed itself to be a source of exceptionally high quality protein. An examination of comparisons below will indicate the potential.

Protein Efficiencies of Selected Sources

Source	Protein
Whole Powdered Eggs	3.50
Powdered Milk	2.70
Wheat (White Flour)	0.59
Triticale (Best to date)	3.46
Triticale (objective)	2.70

The protein efficiency measure gauges the growth induced by a diet based on the plant. It will be noted that lines are now available which come close to the efficiency of whole powdered eggs, the most efficient known source.

As well as the benefits accruing to tropical countries from this research, there are excellent prospects for gains in Canada since triticale may possess some of the rye characteristics of reasonable yields under dry conditions, or in soils and climates, hot or cold, where traditional grains do not now excel. If triticale is proven to have this potential, it will have extra value as human food protein, either directly or through the feeding of animals, in many arid, hot and cold regions of the world. Its use, therefore, as grain or forage in northern regions of Canada would be a most valuable by-product of research.

4. The International Development Research Centre (IDRC) acts as the principal executing agent on behalf of the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) for these programs. Canada has observer status at board meetings of CIMMYT, and Dr. H. Steppler of McDonald College represents CIDA as a member of the IDRC Advisory Panel. Furthermore, Canadians are in charge of the triticale program both in Mexico (Dr. Frank Zielinski) and in Manitoba (Dr. G. Anderson).

REINSTATEMENT OF DAIRY QUOTAS

Question No. 636—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. How many producers have applied for reinstatement of their dairy quotas which were lost previously because of their failure to deliver 420 pounds of butterfat, as of May 31, 1972?

2. What is the distribution of applications for reinstatement, by province?

3. How many applications have been approved, by province?

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): 1. Reinstatement of dairy quotas was not based on applications from producers. It was based on the records of deliveries by each shipper during the 1971-72 year.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Numbers of reinstated quotas by province are: Prince Edward Island, 73; Nova Scotia, 47; New Brunswick, 76; Quebec, 309; Ontario, 240; Manitoba, 406; Saskatchewan, 1,158; Alberta, 610; British Columbia, 23; Total 2,942.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO NIGERIA

Question No. 640—Mr. Godin:

Has the government granted a loan recently to Nigeria and, if so (a) in what amount (b) for what term (c) at what rate of interest?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Canada has granted two loans to Nigeria and both intergovernmental agreements were signed on April 4 of this year (1972). The first is a program loan in the amount of $5 million Canadian. The purpose is to assist Nigeria with its foreign exchange problems by making available funds which may be used to purchase Canadian goods and services. The only constraint placed on Nigeria is that the goods and services must be of a development nature. The second loan is in the amount of $1 million Canadian to cover the cost of Canadian consulting engineers who are doing the engineering for the extension of the Kainji Hydro-Electric Power Project on the river Niger. Montreal Engineering were awarded the contract.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

Both loans are at zero interest, 40 years to pay with a ten year moratorium.

NUMBER OF CANADIANS TRAINED IN GUERILLA WARFARE

Question No. 645—Mr. Hellyer:

Have any Canadians or residents of Canada been trained in guerilla warfare in Jordan or Lebanon in cooperation with the Palestinian Liberation Front and, if so, how many and in what province or provinces do they currently reside?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): It would not be in the public interest to reveal any information that might be available on this subject.

STE. SCHOLASTIQUE AIRPORT

Question No. 646—Mr. Hellyer:

Were plans concerning the construction of a terminal building at the Ste. Scholastique airport changed because of unsatisfactory soil conditions and, if so, what was the nature of the problem and the extent of the changes required?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): No; plans concerning the construction of a terminal building at the Ste. Scholastique airport were not required to be changed because of soil conditions.

THREE PER CENT PERPETUAL BONDS

Question No. 653—Mr. Rynard:

1. What amount of 3 per cent Perpetual Bonds was outstanding as of December, 1971 and what was the quotation?

2. What consideration has been, or is being, given to a due date for the 3 per cent Perpetual Bonds?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): 1. As at December 31, 1971, $55 million perpetual bonds were outstanding; market price $42 per $100 bond.

2. Careful consideration was given to establishing a maturity date on the perpetual bonds prior to September 15, 1966, when the last coupon on the coupon registered bond certificates became payable. The Federal Government has from time to time reviewed its policy with respect to these bonds and does not feel that it is in the country's best interest to redeem or fix a maturity date on these obligations at this time.

Mr. Béchard: We shall look into that matter immediately.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

POSSIBLE MEETING OF INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND FOLLOWING FLOATING OF POUND STERLING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether a meeting is planned in connection with the International Monetary Fund or the Group of Ten following the free floating of the pound and speculation about other possible developments.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No Sir, not at the moment.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND ARRANGEMENT FOR FIXED RATE OF EXCHANGE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance what is the attitude of the Government of Canada toward the International Monetary Fund arrangements. What is the attitude of the Government of Canada toward the fixed rate structure, fixed parities, as a basis of international monetary arrangements, subject to whatever reforms he may wish to suggest with regard to the width of bands? Does the government favour the retention of fixed parity rates as a basis for international exchange, reserving its own right, of course, to float the dollar for the time being?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That would be our position. We are satisfied with the arrangement made in Washington in December providing for fixed rates of exchange with a 2¼ per cent margin on either side. We made our position clear at that time, that in view of the particular situation in which Canada found itself we would continue to maintain a floating rate until there was more stability in the international monetary picture.

• (1410)

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the further movement away from fixed rates of exchange, with, for example, the British currency floating and rumours about the possibility of others, does the Minister of Finance propose to take any initiative with regard to international monetary arrangements, or does he intend to let nature take its course?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we will take any initiative we can if we think it can be fruitful. At the moment, as I understand it, the foreign ministers and Ministers of Finance of the member countries of the EEC are meeting in Luxembourg and I imagine this will be one of the topics of conversation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PENSIONS

CANADA PENSION PLAN—POSSIBLE ACTION TO KEEP IN LINE WITH QUEBEC PLAN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the serious consequences that will follow if the Canada pension plan and Quebec pension plan get out of line, and in view of the fact that a bill has been tabled in the Quebec National Assembly to amend the Quebec Pension Plan effective in 1973, can the minister say whether he discussed this matter with Mr. Castonguay when he saw him at Quebec City last week end; and would the minister also say what steps the federal government is taking to try to make sure that these two important pieces of legislation remain synchronized?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member may I say that I discussed this whole area with Mr. Castonguay. It is my hope that following our discussion we can get together again, for further discussions about how his proposals with respect to the Quebec pension plan and our proposals with respect to the Canada pension plan can be brought together in order to preserve the uniformity between both acts.

CANADA PENSION PLAN—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES CONCERNING AMENDMENTS—POSSIBLE MEETING ON QUEBEC PLAN

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question may I ask the minister what serious efforts the government has made to reach agreement with the other nine provinces concerning the amendments to the Canada Pension Plan of which the federal government gave notice in December 1970?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, discussions have taken place with the other provinces. In terms of arriving at an early consensus between the provinces I believe this is some time off yet since the matter has not been that high on the priority list of legislation with which the provinces and the federal government have been preoccupied. I see real efforts being made in this direction over the course of the next couple of months stemming from what took place last week.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the seriousness of the situation, and particularly in view of the bill that has been tabled at Quebec City, is the minister proposing to call a meeting of the responsible ministers of the other provinces at an early date so this issue may be resolved before there is a divergence?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether a formal meeting is necessary. May I reiterate that we have had intermittent discussions with the provinces on a continuing basis, and we hope to get intensive discussions with all the provinces underway shortly.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—CONSULTATION WITH QUEBEC

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether in the course of the discussions he was able to reach full agreement with Mr. Castonguay on the question of family allowances?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the discussions with Mr. Castonguay relative to this point indicated that he was considering the whole question of the provincial option, and whether it would be acceptable. He indicated that he will let the federal government have a response when he has had ample opportunity to study the matter further.

PENSIONS

CANADA PENSION PLAN—POSSIBLE AGREEMENT TO DELAY QUEBEC PLAN PENDING CONSULTATIONS WITH OTHER PROVINCES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare this simple question. In his discussions with Monsieur Castonguay, was there an understanding between them that the bill tabled in the Quebec House will not be brought to completion until such time as discussions among the federal government and other provinces as well as Quebec have been completed and some arrangement for uniformity across Canada arrived at?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there is no precise understanding along those lines. All I can say is, it is my hope that the bill will not proceed with such haste in the Quebec House that it would preclude discussions of the nature I indicated earlier, allowing sufficient time for both governments to get together in an attempt to preserve uniformity.

Mr. Lewis: You have no assurance?

Mr. Munro: No specific assurance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will return to supplementary questions in a moment, but we should try to complete the first round of questions.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING AMENDMENTS—OFFICIAL STATUS OF FRENCH LANGUAGE—RESUMPTION OF DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the statements he made over the radio last weekend, to the effect that the improvement in their living standards or the changes Canadians wanted, were not, according to him related to the desired amendments to the constitution, I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman if his comments meant that he did not wish the Canadian constitution to be amended in regard to the provinces?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, not at all. I have indicated very clearly that much effort was made, last year to effectively introduce very important amendments to the constitution, which would have given, for example, a guaranteed official status to French throughout the country together with many other changes we had advocated. However, the hon. member knows that we have not succeeded and that the matter is still in abeyance.

Mr. Beaudoin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the right hon. Prime Minister tell us if he will put forward in the near future a proposal to activate discussions with the provinces in order that all or them accept the official status of both languages in the country?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have often expressed my view on the subject and the hon. gentleman is perfectly aware of the federal government's position which is that it will be very happy if discussions could resume on the basis of the Victoria charter or on another basis acceptable to Canadians generally. We are waiting particularly for the government of Quebec to suggest ways out of the Victoria deadlock.

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—ALLEGED DIFFICULTY IN ARBITRATION PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In light of the report that the port strike arbitration has apparently hit a snag and the International Longshoremen's Union does not intend to submit its case to arbitration, will the minister now bring us up to date in respect of this latest report?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there have been no snags in the arbitration proceedings. They begin tomorrow morning. There have been some speculative reports, but I think we should treat them as speculative until the proceedings get underway.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—POSSIBILITY UNION WILL NOT ACCEPT DECISION OF ARBITRATOR—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF SETTLEMENT SOON

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, in view of the report that the International Longshoremen's Union will not abide by any decision which comes from the judge, will the minister assure the House now that both parties will go into arbitration with the idea that both parties will accept any decision that is made by the judge?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, the Maritime Employers' Association has initiated the arbitration proceedings and I expect the other party to live up to its obligations in the agreement and in the law, to participate in the proceedings; to co-operate and to conform with the result.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the minister has certainly evaded my question for purposes unknown to me. I asked whether, in fact, he could assure the House that both parties to the dispute will abide by the decision handed down by the judge. That is all I am asking.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to the Chair that the hon. member is asking a question in exactly the same terms he used in the first instance.

An hon. Member: Which the minister ducked.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the minister does not want to answer that question,—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

• (1420)

Mr. Alexander: —and in the light of the fact that it has been reported that this matter will be cleared up in the next two or three days and that the ports will be in a position to move cargo, can the minister assure the House that this is a fact?

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North has a supplementary and will be recognized for that purpose.

PENSIONS

CANADA PENSION PLAN—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES ON AMENDMENTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I wish to ask him whether in the intermittent discussions with the provinces, to which he referred earlier, in connection with possible changes in the Canada Pension Plan, he outlined in any detail at all to the nine provinces the kind of amendments to the present Canada Pension Plan about which the federal government has been thinking.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, although I must say that it was not necessary to go into that in any considerable detail. The provincial governments have been aware, since the publication of the white paper some time ago, of the general types of amendments that we would like to see in the Canada Pension Plan and they have been giving them consideration.

TORNADOES

MANIWAKI—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO VICTIMS

Mr. T. Lebefvre (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Can he tell the House whether the federal government is prepared to assist the people in Maniwaki who suffered severely, on Saturday, June 24, as a result of a tornado which caused at least two deaths as well as extensive damage?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Pontiac for providing me with a report on what he saw on the site and for giving me notice of his question. I will answer, as in other similar instances, that the federal government is always prepared to discuss the ways in which it might assist the people who suffered from a disaster. Under the law, initiatives must come from the provincial government, then we discuss the way we are going to provide this assistance. I should like to add, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Fortier, from the Canadian Emergency Measures Organization, who will give me further information to complement those given by the hon. member, is already on the site.

Mr. J. M. Mr. Speaker: That is not a supplementary question. The hon. member will be recognized in a while for the purpose of asking that question if he can wait two or three minutes.

ALLEGATIONS BY FORMER CORPORAL RAMSAY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Solicitor General, but in his absence I will direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the allegations by former Corporal J. Ramsay of the RCMP, will the government make a statement on motions concerning these charges before the present session of this parliament adjourns, hopefully later this week?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have not seen these so-called charges, but I will gladly ask the Solicitor General to look into the matter.

INQUIRY AS TO OVERTIME WORK WITHOUT PAY

Mr. Nesbitt: Could the Prime Minister tell us whether some members of the RCMP are required to work 300 hours a month or more without any overtime pay or any other recompense such as time off?

Mr. Trudeau: I will gladly look into the matter of whether the RCMP work harder than Members of Parliament.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

MEETING AT CHATEAU MONTEBELLO—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF NECESSITY FOR USE OF THESE FACILITIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister in view of the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and his parliamentary secretary who are supposed to be here today. Would the Prime Minister request that the minister responsible make a statement in the House when he returns explaining the purpose of a meeting which is under way now at the Chateau Montebello, also known as the Seigniory Club, which some 40 members of his department are attending and which began with a very lavish cocktail party last night. I wonder if the purpose of this meeting could be explained to the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will gladly direct the matter to the attention of the minister, but I am sure this is the kind of question which could be more properly put on the order paper.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, in view of the quite adequate facilities provided for this department within Ottawa, would the Prime Minister find out why it was necessary to send these officials, most of whom are working in Ottawa, to such a place, which costs the taxpayers more than $30 a day per person?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can understand that the—

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, since storms are all first cousins, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs give an indication of the extent of Canadian aid to United States flood victims?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I join with all hon. members in expressing our great sympathy to the people who lost relatives, and who suffered the serious damage that has been done in parts of the United States, but I do not expect the United States government will ask us for help.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CLOSING OF ANGLO-ROUYN MINE—POSSIBLE ACTION TO AVOID LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. It has to do with the intended closing of the Anglo-Rouyn mine near Lac La Ronge in northern Saskatchewan. The result will be the unemployment of some 250 workers over a period of five or six years. I have to tell him that there are three or four small companies who want to use the facilities of Anglo-Rouyn so that they might continue at least a substantial portion of the employment, but the company is taking down the supports and pit props which will make the mine totally useless unless action is taken. Will he have this matter looked into because I think, if he does, he will preserve the jobs of many who might otherwise be unemployed?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to look into that question and in so doing to draw it to the attention of my colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR EARLY DEBATE OF REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as government House leader. Last week the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications brought in a report containing some very important recommendations for future rail passenger service in western Ontario, and in fact for all of Canada. In view of the immediate importance of this report and its recommendations, particularly to western Ontario, and in view of the fact that the House may close on June 30 and not re-open until September 28, what steps is he taking to make it possible to have a debate on this matter in the House before the recess?

Given the very high standards governing pensions for the employees of the textile industry who must retire at age 55, can the hon. minister tell us if he intends to table amendments to the legislation allowing these pensioners to draw their pension without too much trouble?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased indeed to learn of those problems in any specific sense. I have nothing further to say except that I have no specific amendments at present with respect to that bill.

Mr. Hees: It is very important—

ALLEGATIONS BY FORMER CORPORAL RAMSAY—REQUEST FOR INDEPENDENT COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, now that the Solicitor General has arrived in the Chamber, I should like to put a question to him, in order to establish the accuracy or otherwise of statements made about the RCMP in the July issue of Maclean's magazine, will the government establish an independent commission of inquiry with the broadest terms of reference that could function in such a way as to fully protect the anonymity and confidences of members and former members of the force?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, from time to time my attention is drawn to articles which alternately praise the work of the RCMP to the skies and damn it to Hades. ALLEGATIONS BY FORMER CORPORAL RAMSAY CONCERNING ARREST OF INDIANS—POSSIBLE INVESTIGATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): A supplementary question to the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker. In view of the serious statement made by the ex-corporal that some officers arrested Indian people in order to boost their record—that is the way I think it was phrased—and in view of the fact that this reflects upon many of the Indian people in this country, will the minister investigate this charge to determine whether or not it is valid?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, general critics are the easiest to make. If anyone is aware of any concrete fact, all he has to do is get in touch with me, my door is always open, and we will certainly make an inquiry if on first view there is enough evidence to support the charge.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Solicitor General look at the figures showing the number of people in jail in western Canada and confirm the fact that substantially more than 50 per cent are of Indian descent? Possibly the charges should be looked into very closely.

HEALTH

WESTERN PROVINCES STUDY OF MEDICARE COSTS—POSSIBLE FEDERAL PARTICIPATION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since the four western provinces have set up a committee to study and advise on health care costs at the provincial health ministers' level, will the federal department have any direct liaison with this committee?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I hope that would be the case. It is normal for the provincial health ministers to request an observer from the federal department and we usually respond by having an observer there.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Selkirk has a supplementary to the previous question.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGATIONS BY FORMER CORPORAL RAMSAY—POSSIBLE UPDATING OF COMMISSIONERS STANDING ORDERS GOVERNING SERVICE COURTS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question refers to the same article. In view of the statements made about internal operations of the RCMP, will the minister have a thorough review made of the Commissioner's Standing Orders and other regulations with a view to updating them, particularly those applying to procedures governing the operation of service courts?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I know that the Commissioner is doing his work. It is certain that the question of individual rights is obviously important and I shall certainly direct my attention not only to this problem as far as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is concerned, but also to the prisoners' rights in all federal penitentiaries.

[English]

Mr. Rowland: I should like to ask the minister if he can at least assure the House that he will be looking into the charges made in this article and making some sort of inquiry to test their validity—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member is now asking the question which was asked by one of his colleagues in the first instance.

ALLEGATIONS BY FORMER CORPORAL RAMSAY—POSSIBLE INQUIRY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and may I put it to the minister this way? Taking for granted the minister's statement that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is a very efficient and desirable force in Canada and in view of the fact that the article referred to contains considerable opprobrium against that force, may I ask the minister first, whether he has read the article and second, whether he intends to take any steps to clear the RCMP of the charges found in that article?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have not read that article, but I intend to do so if time permits. On the other hand, I was clearly told that the allegations were couched in general terms.

Therefore, as I said a while ago, until my attention is drawn to specific cases, I do not intend to initiate procedures after articles published in the newspapers. Anyhow, I am aware that problems exist within the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as within any other human organization but I did not wait to read the article in the publication referred to by the hon. member before dealing with the matter.

ALLEGATIONS BY FORMER CORPORAL RAMSAY—CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER BEFORE STATEMENT BY COMMISSIONER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the Commissioner of the RCMP consulted with him before making the statement that he did regarding that article, since I recall that when the Commissioner made a statement about Communists being in Ottawa when the Chinese Embassy was opened, the Prime Minister admonished him and said that Commissioners should not make statements!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if that question was too long, I should like to ask a shorter edition. Was the minister consulted by the Commissioner with respect to this article which he has not had time to read, busy as he is, before the Commissioner made the statement?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Commissioner has given no press conference, but he told me that he made some remarks to a reporter before reading the article in question. This means that he himself does not always have time to read the papers. Thereafter, for a second time, he made comments to a reporter. That is all.

FOREIGN TAKEOVERS REVIEW ACT

MEASURE TO CONTROL FOREIGN TAKEOVERS OF CANADIAN COMPANIES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-201, to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 21 and 28.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the amendments now before the House, we must bear in mind that many Canadians view this bill as mocking Canadian nationhood. This is the type of measure which is bound to create confusion, misunderstanding and resentment among Canadians. Many also hold the view that the bill places Canadian nationhood in jeopardy, and that Canadians have the right to expect more forthright leadership from the government than has been demonstrated in this legislation. The view is widely held that the government is obligated to show more effective leadership and that, in this legislation, the government ought to demonstrate greater determination and greater will to do something concrete to solve some of the problems this country faces. For that reason I think it is important for us to consider these amendments seriously. If the government were to accept them, it would show that it is willing to be helpful, despite the inadequacies of the legislation it has presented to the House.

Some of the amendments now being debated were considered when the bill was before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I was somewhat concerned, because a railroading job was done in putting that bill through committee. Hearings on this important legislation were limited, as was the number of witnesses called. The public was not invited to submit briefs or submissions. It is true that some uninvited briefs were submitted. These, however, came from people who had a particular area of interest to protect and who represented a particular point of view.

The amendments the government presented to the committee further watered down this legislation For that reason I feel our amendments are important, since they would give some thrust to the bill which is not now present in it. We listened to the minister's technical explanations as he tried to fight his way out of the woods. In dealing with the intricacies of the legislation, the minister seemed to be unable to see the forest for the trees. He was so concerned about giving technical explanations that, I think, he lost sight of the true purpose of the bill and of those issues with which our amendments deal.

I listened carefully to the comments of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) when he spoke on the amendments now before us. He dealt particularly with the structure of clause 2 of the bill. He outlined carefully his concepts concerning clause 2 of the bill; three of the amendments now before us deal with clause 2 of the bill, Mr. Speaker. The minister presented the point of view that the structure of this particular clause represented a logical buildup. He went on to outline it in some detail. What he forgot to tell us about was the big letdown at the end. He presented the logical build-up as he saw it, that the first part of the clause deals with concerns, the second with objectives and the third with factors to be taken into account. It so happens that the first three amendments under consideration this afternoon deal with each of those areas.

The minister suggested that among the concerns expressed in clause 2, economic considerations were central, and certain other consequential considerations, although not spelled out in the bill, flowed from there. We should note carefully this particular part of the clause. What this clause says, and I am paraphrasing, is that this bill recognizes that the extent to which control of Canadian industry, trade and commerce has been acquired by persons other than Canadians, thereby affecting the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment, has become a matter of national concern. The minister is stating the reason this legislation is being enacted is that there is national concern about this question.

The bill does not express any view as to whether Parliament or the government considers there is a cause for concern. It simply states that this measure is being enacted in response to a national concern about a problem and, therefore, the government has to do something about it. It goes on to say that the concern involves the ability of Canadians to maintain control over their economic environment. Here, we have one of the basic fallacies of the bill. One of the basic fallacies of the minister's presentation this morning was that he dealt solely, as does the bill, with economic considerations.

I am not one to under-rate the importance of economic considerations. After all, I am something of an economist by profession. I certainly stand by my profession, and I stand by the approach we have to use in doing our work. However, the minister has some other viewpoint about the paramountcy of economic considerations because he suggests that economic considerations can be described in more precise terms than political and social factors. On occasion in this House the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan) has expressed the view that if you get two economists together, they will each express a different point of view. I have taken issue with the hon. member's comment. At the same time, however, I think it is a fact that in dealing with economic considerations you have to make judgments, just as you do when you are dealing with political and social considerations. That is the first fallacy.

The second fallacy that has to be dealt with is that the manner in which this bill has been presented places economic considerations before all other considerations. I suggest that economic considerations do not come first. They do not come first within the milieu of Canadian society. The fact is, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), if economic considerations held sway, we would never have had a Canadian nation or any of the benefits we have at the present time. If we allowed economic considerations to hold sway over social factors, many items of legislation passed by this Parliament and provincial legislatures throughout the years would never have seen the light of day.

[Mr. Burton.]

On the language question, the minister tried to make a case of some kind. I must confess that at first I did not correctly understand his reasoning and, therefore, I asked him a question. The minister stated that we can always make some comments to firms which are going to acquire Canadian firms, such as pointing out to them our language laws. The minister said that we could point out to firms intending to locate in Quebec or some other place that they must take these things into account. He said we do not want such a provision in any legislation, but he would make a firm aware of the situation. Is this not an example of pressure being exerted by the minister? As he admitted, there is no basis in the legislation for doing this, but nevertheless he is going to do it. In a number of instances recently, the government has done exactly what is intended to be done under this legislation.

It is very important that we give consideration to the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) in which he attempts to change the description of the concern of the Canadian people so that it will read "the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic, political and social environment" rather than "the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment". I suggest the amendment more accurately describes the concern of the Canadian people at the present time. People are concerned about what is happening to our nation and to our society.

If the minister insists on retaining this description, it will be totally inadequate. It will be just one more factor that will lead to the disillusionment of the public with this legislation. The minister went on to state what he considered to be the objective of this legislation as expressed in clause 2. He pointed out that the present wording of clause 2 gives the authority to ensure that business enterprises acquired by persons other than Canadians will be assessed in such terms that the acquisition of such control is likely to be of significant benefit to Canada. The minister pointed out that the addition of the amendment I moved would place a double objective in the clause. He suggested that somehow or other these objectives would be inconsistent in that they would make it mandatory to consider the whole question of whether or not the acquisition of a particular firm would be likely to enhance the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment. The minister is exactly right. However, I suggest that the minister's logic breaks down at this point.

When the minister suggests that the spelling out of the objective of this legislation is contained in the last part of clause 2(1) dealing with the assessment of the benefit to Canadians, he does not carry through the outline contained in the first part of subclause (1) in which it is maintained that a concern of Canadians is the ability to maintain effective control over their economic environment. The minister's logic breaks down at that point.

The second part of subclause (1) is not consistent with the first part of the subclause which spells out the concern of the Canadian people. Of course, that is contingent upon subclause (2) which sets out the factors that are to be taken into account when dealing with this assessment. The minister made a couple of points here. First, he suggested that this was inconsistent with the subamendment I moved because it was simply made one of the factors to be considered. If this is of concern to the minister, I would be quite happy to agree to a subamendment which would insert that particular wording in the preamble to subclause (2) rather than making it a separate paragraph.

The second point made by the minister was that this is really redundant because it simply deals with the point that is made in the subclause (2)(b). He quoted paragraph (b) which reads:

• (1500)

the degree and significance of participation by Canadians in the business enterprise and in any industry or industries in Canada of which it forms a part;

These are factors which are to be taken into account by the minister. But the wording does not spell out in what way the minister is to take these things into account. Proof of this contention can be found by reading the committee proceedings. I asked the minister questions about paragraph (d) which states that a further factor to be taken into account was the effect of an acquisition on competition within any industry or industries in Canada. The minister confirmed my impression that the paragraph did not state, in one way or another, how the minister was to carry out his assessment. In some cases he might be inclined to disapprove an acquisition because it increased competition; in other cases he might be inclined to disapprove it because it would have an opposite effect. I believe the same considerations apply to paragraph (b). This is why it is important that the new paragraph proposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) be inserted in subsection (2) setting out the factors to be taken into account by the minister when assessing a possible acquisition.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Gordon L. Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to accept this amendment because I feel it would materially increase the power of the minister to intervene in cases of take-overs. It goes far beyond anything outlined in the bill.

It is said that the bill before us would affect only 10 to 15 per cent of foreign investment in Canada involved in take-over operations. I suggest, though, that it is the beginning of a complete survey of all foreign investment here. Otherwise, why are the limits set so low, $250,000 worth of assets and gross revenue not exceeding $3 million. That amount of assets would be owned by any good-sized gravel company, along with the mortgage. It is set very low. All these companies of relatively small size will be involved in bringing their cases before the tribunal. Moreover, the proposals before us could easily be extended to encompass all the companies which might be concerned with take-over arrangements. If this further responsibility of considering the social and political implications of a take-over were added to the already onerous task of the tribunal, its members would require the wisdom of a Solomon. An almost impossible situation would be created.

Consider the case of a company which is connected with a particular aspect of Canadian life. Suppose it had been started by Canadians and foreign interests had bought in at some time to the extent of 5 per cent, which would represent an insignificant degree of economic penetration. At some time in its history it is likely that this company would be scrutinized by the minister and by his tribunal. I suggest it would be almost impossible for the tribunal, after an examination which is bound to be superficial in character, to decide whether a take-over would be beneficial to Canada. The technological aspect is obviously an important one, and the tribunal would have to ask itself what was likely to be the outcome of technological innovation. It might turn out that the change would produce insignificant results, or an unremarkable product. On the other hand, the product might be destined to take an important place on the industrial scene. So the picture before the tribunal is already complex and obscure. In these circumstances it would be most unwise to ask that body to take into account political and social desirability as well as the other factors.

I contend that the bill would make the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) a minor Caesar in the field of takeovers. We are already faced in this country by problems arising from regional differences. I call attention to a number of actions which have been taken in the last two or three years, entirely political in their nature and motivation. For example, there was the movement of Air Canada from Winnipeg to Montreal. Air Canada can obviously operate in almost any large city in Canada, but the operation was moved to Montreal on the ground that this was the most suitable centre for its activities. Yet we are all aware that if a move from Winnipeg was contemplated the logical place to go was Toronto. Then, there is Ste. Scholastique airport, a large and expensive airport which is already showing signs of being a white elephant. Presumably, it has not been located in such a way as to serve as many people as it should be serving. Consider western freight rates in the light of the extended hearings on rapeseed traffic. There can be no doubt that manufacturers in the east are being protected by the freight rate structure.

The proposal that the tribunal should become involved in what are essentially political and social decisions appears to ignore the unhappy experiences which have so often been the consequence of such decisions in the past. In a country as diverse and widespread as Canada there will always be decisions to be taken on a political basis. There is no reason, however, to compound what is already an unpleasant if necessary aspect of Canadian life by inserting a requirement, such as the one specified by the hon. member, into the piece of legislation before us.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to speak on this motion. It is of real importance to the Canadian economy. I am always impressed by the minister's charm in the committee and in the House, but I am never impressed by his logic. The amendments I am proposing are designed at least to insert a tooth in the jaws of this toothless legislation so that the bill can chew some of the meat of the issues. The minister in charge does not seem to see it that way. He has indicated that amendments Nos. 3 and 21 in my name are already covered by clause 2, and he quoted the clause dealing with participation.

I understand that lawyers in Toronto have been having parties at which they laugh about who is going to be appointed to the boards of directors of Canadian corporations and who are to act as token representatives. My amendments are, as I have said, an attempt to insert a tooth in the jaws of this legislation, and I am sure that the minister was not shocked at their wording since it is taken from the principles contained in the bill. Having outlined the principles of the bill, they should at least be embraced in the criteria set forth in clause 2. However, in view of the statements made by the minister, both in committee and outside the House, I am sure he is not too concerned with trying to strengthen the legislation.

On looking through the amendments proposed by others in addition to my colleagues and myself, it is of interest to see those that will be accepted. The government's amendments reflect the concern of private industry, the Investment Dealers Association, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Bankers Association. But not one amendment on the order paper deals with the lack of direction I have outlined or with the kinds of proposals put forward by the Committee for an Independent Canada. Not one motion moved by the members of the New Democratic Party was accepted in committee. The only motions accepted by the minister and the government were those that eroded what little effect the legislation is going to have.

My amendments would be at variance with the opinions expressed by the Canadian Manufacturers Association; at least I would hope they would. Let me inform the House what that association said about the amendments and about the bill. They polled their membership before drawing up their brief and concluded as follows:

> We believe the policy expressed by Bill C-201, namely that foreign takeovers should be reviewed by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, subject to approval by cabinet, is moderate.

Hence, I have introduced my amendments. Whom does the Canadian Manufacturers Association represent in the Dominion of Canada? At least 60 per cent of the investment in that sector of industry is foreign. In the neighbourhood of 60 per cent of the firms are foreign controlled, and those firms find this bill moderate, not worth worrying about. In 1968 one-third of the increase in direct foreign investment, namely $1,835 million, was in the manufacturing sector, which has found this bill of no concern in terms of its over-all effect. They say it is a moderate piece of legislation, legislation about which they do not have to be concerned. This underlines the fundamental problem of this bill.

It has been said that this bill is but a first step along the road to doing something about foreign investment and foreign ownership in Canada. Government members who are rationalizing about their vote for the legislation are suggesting that it is only a first step. But when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce addressed the Victoria Chamber of Commerce, he stated there was no second shoe to be dropped after the next election, that this bill was it.

[Mr. Knight.]

This legislation is the government's answer to the problem of foreign ownership and foreign investment in the Dominion of Canada. It is not an answer that is acceptable to the people who for the last four years have been listening to report after report after report, some of them from the government, stating we have to come to grips with this issue. And this is the solution the government offers. The fundamental questions of investment and ownership are not dealt with in this bill. As the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) pointed out, this legislation deals with perhaps a mere 5 or 6 per cent of the foreign investment that takes place in Canada today.

This bill, in a sense, is a sham. Certainly it is no answer. We are proposing amendments in an attempt at least to make some kind of changes, to give the legislation at least one tooth. The debate on this bill has centred around certain complaints from industrial sectors about administrative difficulties, and a number of amendments deal with this. Our amendments relate to the substance of the bill, on the assumption that the title of the bill means what it says.

I have already cited the reaction to the bill of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, which says it is moderate, that it is nothing to be concerned about. We now know why the government and Her Majesty's loyal opposition are going to vote for the legislation. This is a non-answer to a basic and fundamental question. I suspect, though I hope I am wrong, that the government will reject all amendments that try to improve and strengthen the legislation. Perhaps I am wrong and the minister will give due consideration to some of these proposals, mild as they are. I leave it to the minister's good grace to give these amendments due consideration, and I hope he will accept them.

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations on the motion moved by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). I shall confine myself to the motion. May I first point out what in my opinion is the effect of the motion and indicate how the clause entitled "Purpose of act" would read were the amendment to be adopted.

I agree in general terms with the phrasing of the bill and with the idea of enunciating the purpose of the bill in its provisions. I submit it is of great advantage in all legislation to have the purpose of a bill set forth, so that those who implement it understand what the government is trying to accomplish. The framers of the legislation, for whom the minister is, of course, responsible, provided in clause 2 as follows:

• (1520)

> This Act is enacted by the Parliament of Canada in recognition by Parliament that the extent to which control of Canadian industry, trade and commerce has become acquired by persons other than Canadians and the effect thereof on the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment is a matter of national concern—

I agree with those words. I do not, however, agree with the hon. member for Waterloo that he is going to add anything to them by putting in the words "political and social" so that this would read in part "to maintain effective control over their economic, political and social environment". I do not think it is the function of the state to attempt to have any control over the social environment of the individual. I do not take kindly to that from any government or any individual. I do not think there should be an indication of control over my political environment. I want to be the judge of the political environment so far as the government of the country in which I live is concerned. It seems to me that the amendment is likely to bring about such a thought.

I agree with the minister when he states that the law of economics, to a very great extent, governs the social life of individuals. We know that is the case. After all, the social life is a way of life. It is the standard of living, the way we live, the things we do and want to do and the life we want to live. Economic circumstances have a tremendous bearing on what the individual is able to do by way of accomplishing the things he would like. The individual tries to make a life based on advantage, pleasure, satisfaction and the interests of those with whom he is associated, and economics have a great deal to do with this.

The hon. member for Waterloo also expressed a doubt as to whether the government would see to it that people doing business in Canada obey Canadian law. I think I quote him correctly, and I have no inclination to quote him other than correctly. I think any government, even the government under which we are presently working, attempts to see that people and companies obey the laws of Canada. I think that is the responsibility of the government, and I find no fault with the way it is doing this, except in some cases which I try to mention to the proper persons.

The law of the country should apply to all corporate citizens, and I think it does at this time, but we have no law relative to takeovers. When there was some disposition on the part of the government to think that a couple of takeovers of oil companies and a uranium company were not in the public interest, steps were taken to indicate that feeling of the government. As a consequence, those takeovers were not carried out. The government did not confide in me as to what should be done, and I did not expect it to do that. Steps were taken, so it could be argued that there is no need for this legislation at all. When a situation is serious enough that the government thinks it should take action it takes action and, generally speaking, the people respect that action. We have proof of that in that these acquisitions or changes were not accomplished.

Generally speaking, it is a very serious piece of legislation that interferes with the ability of the subject, whether it be a corporation or an individual, to dispose of property to the best possible advantage. In my opinion that is very serious. I do not suggest it is not justified on the ground of general public interest. I am sure that is what my friends to the left would argue, that it is in the general public interest to have some regulations so far as takeovers are concerned. As long as individuals and corporations are operating under the laws of the land, surely they are carrying out the intent of the people who govern the country in which they are located.

Since we have before us a bill, to which the hon. member for Waterloo has proposed an amendment, I am sure he will not mind if I refer to a few things he has said. He mentioned that this government may have had a hand in preventing those takeovers to which I have referred. Of course it did, and I cannot see why there should be so much agitation to bring about machinery such as we have in this bill. Since the government has brought this bill before Parliament, it must consider there is an element of truth in the argument in favour of the need for grappling with this situation. The government thinks there is a need for taking action and has brought in this bill to set up certain machinery. It is now asking for the opinion of this Parliament about this machinery. It has also asked a committee for its opinion. That committee had a number of people submit their views. The bill is now back before us with some amendments.

The suggestion of a number of the speakers today has been that the machinery the government is placing before Parliament is inadequate. Some have indicated they will vote against it. I think I should vote against it because it is an interference with individual liberty and because the government has demonstrated an ability to grapple with the situation when it has the inclination to do so and when circumstances demand such action. That is not really the point of my remarks. My point relates to the difference between ownership and control.

The minister told the committee it was not the object of this bill to prevent takeovers which were in the interests of Canada, but rather to provide the machinery and the screening process by which it would be done. Having set up the machinery, I think it is appropriate that it should be administered by a department of government. Some people will argue that there should be some kind of board or semi-independent type of body set up to deal with this matter. I confess that I do not subscribe to that argument. Governments are elected and given the responsibility to carry on the affairs of the country. I do not believe in the principle of delegation. The government should proceed to deal with those matters. I do not find fault with the machinery, and I have said this privately to the minister. I am sure he will not mind my saying that again.

I am a bit concerned about the length of time it might take to get approval of a takeover which is very much in the interest of the Canadian people. He has assured me that he is conscious of that also, and I accept that wholeheartedly.

But coming back to the question of the motion, I find that I cannot accept the motion because I do not think there should be interference by any government with the social and political environment in which we live. I believe in the rights of the individual. I believe in individual initiative, and I believe in making the individual play his own part and use the talents he has. I believe sincerely in that general philosophy. But the question of economics is different due to the fact that we are surrounded by so many variable types of influence in our economic life and therefore naturally our government must step in and do something to protect us as individuals. There was a great philosopher who said at one time that it was not the function of governments to make people happy, but that it was the function of government to create an atmosphere in which they might make themselves happy. This I feel is something which we might all consider.

So I find myself unable to agree with the motion of the hon. member for Waterloo for the reasons I have just given. The government has a mandate to set up the machinery, and I am sure we will co-operate in trying to see that the machinery which has been set up, as amended by the representatives of the people, will do the best kind of job, the job that it is designed to do. However, I find myself unable to support the motion.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the last speaker, the former premier of New Brunswick, could not have confirmed more adequately the belief held by a number of people in this party that the heart and core of the thinking of the Conservative party is essentially the same as the heart and core of the economic thinking of the present government. I say this, of course, without suggesting any disrespect for the seriousness and earnestness with which opinions are held by the hon. member, but simply to make a philosophical point that for many people Adam Smith died in the eighteenth century, but for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and for the spokesman for the Conservative party who has just sat down, it is evidently clear that Adam Smith is reigning supreme.

If you just look at the bill that is before us, Bill C-201, and consider the objections that have been brought against the motion introduced by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), it is clear that for example, the minister's thinking in economic matters was warped and perverted by his early liberalism, at the University of Ottawa presumably, where it was drummed into his head that there was a radical and profound distinction to be made between economic matters on the one hand and political matters on the other, and never the twain shall meet. He is like Thomas Hobbes, seventeenth century theorist; me, more like John Locke who was somewhat of a Democrat. At the same time he has the eighteenth century view of economics held by Adam Smith, which is also found in the thinking of Hobbes and Locke in any case. They made the same distinction 200 years ago that we heard in the hon. member's speech and that is the guts of this bill, between economic, social and political matters, the view of social reality that the more progressive and imaginative intellectual spheres began to disregard in the latter eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth centuries. One would have hoped that that kind of distinction would have been irrevocably shattered, but alas it still resides very profoundly in the hearts of our cabinet members and, as I said, in the hearts of members of the Official Opposition.

Let us just look at the categories of the bill ostensibly designed to deal with the serious question of foreign ownership. If you look at the criteria that are to be considered in clause 2(2), paragraphs (a) to (e), you see references to economic activity in paragraph (a), to Canadians in the business enterprise in paragraph (b), to productivity, industrial efficiency and technological development in paragraph (c), to competition in paragraph (d) and to economic policies in paragraph (e). There is absolutely no reference to the impact on the lives of Canadians of economic decisions in terms of social and political reality. Surely, that is what society is all about. Surely, this is or should be a fundamental criterion in assessing the worth of the newly defined economic policy. It is not just a matter of economic efficiency, of technological innovation and of competition but, much more significantly, of the effects on the political and social aspects of Canada, the degree to which it encourages or discourages independence in the broader sense of that word, not just economic independence but the extent to which a move may involve important questions of the political durability of Canada as a union linking one part with the other.

[Mr. Flemming.]

Let us consider, for example, the decision to establish Air Canada, originally Trans Canada Airlines. Was that just an economic decision? Surely not, or the economic thinking of the government of the day, which still exists, would not lead it to come up with the decision to have a publicly owned airline. There are, in short, profoundly important political considerations that must play a role in any decision making in this area, and they are just the kinds of considerations that the government is not interested in including in the heart of its bill.

It is very interesting that in the most recent issue of the Financial Times—and I cannot forbear the pleasure of mentioning this—the issue of June 26, at pages 15 and 16 there are two separate news items. The first one refers to the government's policy on the takeover bill. The heading reads "Softening the Takeover Act" and the opening paragraph reads:

> The government has moved to meet business criticism of its takeover legislation. Industry Minister Pepin last week proposed four amendments to the Foreign Takeovers Review Act.

Then, it goes on to describe the amendments. It points out that each amendment is designed to please the corporate sector in Canada, that corporate sector which is overwhelmingly foreign owned. Readers of the Financial Times, most of whom would be supporters of the present corporate sector, would read that item with a great deal of pleasure.

Then, when they turn to page 16 they see another news item headed, "Ontario's Canadian Director Policy: Symbol, Not Threat." The opening paragraph in reference to the Ontario government's profoundly militant, profoundly imaginative, profoundly innovative action when it announced it was going to Canadianize Ontario industry by putting a few Canadians on boards of directors, reads—and the Financial Times, even though it is a conservative publication is interested in reality and not sham:

> Ontario's plan to force all provincial companies to have a majority of Canadian citizens on their boards by October 1, 1973 only sounds tough.

The article goes on to conclude that that bit of action proposed by the Ontario government is all form, and is totally lacking in substance. It points out:

> Business generally has reacted to the legislation nonchalantly.

In other words, the business community recognizes that kind of legislation for what it is. It serves to defuse the problem of getting real autonomy in Canadian economic matters by suggesting that a few more Canadians on boards will shift the direction of policy decisions. If there were real heart to that legislation, it would require effective guideline regulations and the imposition of sanctions, making it mandatory that Canadians on corporation boards must make decisions that have a positive influence on research and development, on unemployment, on effective development of Canadian resources. That kind of substance is totally lacking in the Ontario legislation.

I just mention this to show that on two pages back to back in the Financial Times we have criticism of the Liberal government in Ottawa and of the Conservative government in Toronto. Here, in this chamber, we have had back to back speakers who, in philosophical outlook on economic matters, are absolutely in accord with the government, absolutely in agreement that the political state should not involve itself directly in influencing decisions by corporations that have an effect on the political and social affairs of Canada. It is a very revealing exercise.

Through our amendments we would make it mandatory on the government to ask such political questions as: what about the extraterritoriality question concerning foreign owned corporations? Will they obey United States law in terms of those to whom they may or may not sell goods? Will they be able to sell automobiles to China or the Soviet Union? Will they be able to hire foreign owned ships to transport wheat to China if this is contrary to the wishes of the United States government? This extraterritoriality question is profoundly important in terms of political significance, in terms of our being able to assess whether or not we are an independent nation.

The government would be able to intervene directly in terms of research and development matters which do not have just an economic impact. It could happen that a firm coming into Canada, which normally does a lot of research and development elsewhere, would provide a certain number of jobs and thus meet the narrowly defined economic criteria in the bill, but would do nothing to develop Canadian research and development potential, would do nothing to employ young Canadian scientists. Letting such a firm come into Canada without a research and development commitment, or allowing a takeover without insisting on a research and development department, would meet the narrow economic criteria but would not meet the political and social criteria. Our young people want to work in industry, and for the sake of the long-term economic interests of the country we must have a strong research and development industry.

The minister knows very well that the OECD report issued last fall, outlining a study of the ten leading industrial nations, put Canada far at the bottom of the list in terms of doing its own research and development. It was not just one step below the ninth on the list, but quite a way below it. To have a modern economy that will thrive and grow, we must have this kind of potential.

Some consideration must be given to the allocation of investment funds. Some consideration must be given to restriction of the Canadian banking industry. Is it going to be allowed to finance further takeovers? Is it going to be restricted to the financing of Canadian owned enterprises? There is nothing in this bill which says anything about that. There is nothing in this bill which deals with the existing levels of foreign ownership. Its provisions are all concerned with the future. It does nothing about the fact that 50 per cent of our manufacturing industry is foreign owned, 65 per cent of our mining and smelting industry is foreign owned, and 74 per cent of our petroleum and natural gas industry is foreign owned. All the government is concerned about is future takeovers, and this in a narrowly defined economic sense.

I could go on at length to list about 15 other things that the bill does not include that were mentioned in the committee and that were dismissed without serious argument by the minister. But I will not do so. I end up urging acceptance of our amendments, urging rejection of that narrow 18th century economic philosophy which separates economic from political and social considerations, and hoping that the House will support us.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak briefly on the amendment to Bill C-201 before the House. This bill is the government's answer to the foreign ownership crisis facing the Canadian nation. If ever a piece of legislation needed amendment, it is the one we are debating this afternoon. I feel this is an anaemic approach to the problem of foreign ownership in Canada. As we look over the record of this government, however, we must realize that it is a typical Liberal approach: Do nothing by halves if you can do it by quarters. This is exactly the position this government has taken, not only on the matter of foreign ownership but on other very important issues. I find it particularly disappointing.

Having been in this House for the past four years and having seen the amount of research and effort that has gone into the problem of foreign ownership from all sides of the House, I feel there is genuine desire on the part of Canadians to make sure that we have control of our destiny, that we have control of our resources. I feel that we do not have that control largely because governments in the past have not dealt with the problem effectively. It has been a bitter disappointment to Canadians to realize that the announced policy has nothing to do with the expansion of existing foreign-owned firms into new areas and new industries, which is one of the key problems facing us. It has nothing to do with direct foreign investment coming into Canada, and it does nothing to increase Canadian ownership in the areas with which we are directly concerned. It will not reduce the percentage of foreign control which presently exists in Canada: in fact, there is every indication that the opposite will be the result.

If I may go back to the amendment presently before the House, I should like to read the first portion of the clause because I think it should appear in Hansard to show what the government is offering and what our amendment will do. Clause 2(1) reads as follows:

> This act is enacted by the Parliament of Canada in recognition by Parliament that the extent to which control of Canadian industry, trade and commerce has become acquired by persons other than Canadians and the effect thereof on the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment is a matter of national concern, and that it is therefore expedient to establish a means by which measures may be taken under the authority of Parliament to ensure that, in so far as is practicable after the enactment of this act, control of Canadian business enterprises may be acquired by persons other than Canadians only if it has been assessed that the acquisition of such control by those persons is or is likely to be of significant benefit to Canada, having regard to all of the factors to be taken into account under this act for that purpose.

The clause now reads in part, "to maintain effective control over their economic environment" and our amendment would have it read "to maintain effective control over their economic, political and social environment". This amendment represents an extremely important addition to that clause. I heard the minister give his reasons for rejecting the amendment, but he is not fooling anybody in this House, and few of the Canadian people by indicating that we do not require the addition of those three words.

We have a number of examples, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think a little repetition will hurt. I am going to point out to the minister why the amendment should be accepted. The facts are crystal clear to anyone who wants to examine the background of the effect which foreign ownership has had on Canadian business. Foreign corporations with subsidiaries in Canada do interfere, and have interfered in a political and social way, with Canadian decisions and no member of this House can say otherwise. I shall give an example of what happened a few years ago when the Ford Motor Company of Canada had a large contract to sell 1,000 trucks to mainland China.

Mr. Pepin: Not again!

Mr. Harding: Yes, Mr. Speaker, again—because it does not seem to have come home to the minister yet, nor to the government and the cabinet who insist on this weak, watery approach to foreign ownership in Canada. One thousand vehicles would have been produced in a Canadian factory, by Canadian workers using Canadian raw materials. But what happened? The Ford Motor Company of Canada is a subsidiary of the Ford Company in the United States. It was against United States policy to trade with mainland China, so the Canadian subsidiary was forced to drop the contract to make those vehicles.

If that is not interference in the political life of this country, when what is? This is the very thing we are trying to prevent. No other country in the world should be able to tell us with whom we may trade. If we have an opportunity to sell goods to China, Cuba or any country in the world with whom we have friendly relations, the decision must rest with the Canadian people and not with some company in another part of the world.

The minister says we do not need this amendment. Mr. Speaker, other examples of interference were given to the House this morning when there was mention of a wheat sale. Apparently, because certain flour mills were under the control of United States companies, they were forbidden to ship flour to Cuba although the sale had initially been made to Russia. This is sheer and utter nonsense. We must be masters in our own house, but the bill before us does not give us that opportunity.

We hear about the effect and influence of foreign-owned companies on what is happening in Canada. Not long ago a conference on the environment was held in Stockholm. A strong delegation was sent from Canada; it offered to contribute $1 million toward global research into energy sources which would not create pollution, then suddenly the offer was dropped. The international press suggested that tremendous pressure had been put on the Canadian delegation by the big oil companies. The fund was to be established to search for another source of energy which would not pollute to the degree that oil does. This is sound and sensible, yet Canada withdrew the offer of $1 million toward the $4 million fund.

All we have to do is look around the northern parts of Canada. Look at what is happening in Arctic exploration. Foreign corporations, by applying pressure to various departments of government, have forced them to water down the strictness of land use regulations affecting the Arctic and now the fragile economy of the area will not be protected to the extent that it should.

The minister knows this, yet he sits there and tries to appease the Canadian people by telling them that such activities have little effect on the social and political life of this nation. That is utter nonsense. If the minister thinks for one moment that he has sold this watered-down policy to the Canadian people, he had better think again. Young people especially, who want to enter the Canadian labour force but cannot find jobs, are concerned. Young people with university degrees cannot find work, partly as a result of foreign ownership policies the Liberal government has fostered over the years.

We are shipping out raw materials at an alarming rate. Insufficient quantities of raw materials are fabricated into products within the borders of Canada. The result is lack of jobs for Canadians in Canada. That is why we demand action to be taken. We are in favour of a screening process, which is all this bill deals with; we are in favour of screening takeovers. At the same time we ask the government to move into other fields of foreign ownership so that we may become masters in our own house.

That is why we urge the minister to accept our amendments. They will be of benefit. They will enable the government to screen on a basis other than that of straight economic policy. The minister cannot deny that. There is need for our amendments, I submit. For that reason we ask the minister to reconsider his position, to accept the amendment before us and to take a small step forward in adopting a tougher policy toward foreign ownership in Canada.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Obviously, all afternoon we shall be listening to NDP members. Would he and others care to tell us precisely what his party would do about foreign investment? Would they allow it? If so, in what circumstances would they allow any or some? And what would be the criteria for allowing foreign investment to enter this country?

An hon. Member: The minister should ask the Waffle group.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, we are not at all opposed to the screening process.

Mr. Pepin: I should hope not.

Mr. Harding: Spokesman after spokesman has outlined in the House the program the government ought to put into effect. The minister has sat there and listened. It is useless running over the gamut of our suggestions. I mentioned some of them at the beginning of my remarks. One of the most dangerous aspects of this matter is the expansion of activities in Canada of foreign-controlled corporations. Right now there is no bar to their extending operations to other industries and taking over control from within. This is a key area. Why has the legislation not dealt with it, or has the cabinet not backbone enough to do so?

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to take part in this debate. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) asked the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) what an NDP government would do with regard to foreign investment, and would it allow any. The answer is that we would allow some foreign investment in this country, although there are some areas in which we would allow none. There are some areas in which we would allow a modest amount, and there are others in which we would allow larger amounts. Essentially, however, an NDP government would make sure that foreign capital entering this country would enter as loan capital and not equity capital.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) is trying to prevent loan capital entering Canada. He is discouraging it. His policy, obviously, adds impetus to the momentum with which foreign companies are taking over Canadian companies and adds to the dangers besetting our nationhood. Mr. Speaker, the NDP would allow some foreign investment but that foreign investment would need to obey Canadian ground rules which any reasonable, reputable and honest foreign investor would be glad to abide by. Many well developed countries of the world have utilized such rules for many years.

An hon. Member: Including the United States.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party reminds me of an old hound-dog on a farm in Saskatchewan. It is so unimaginative and lazy that when it sits on a cactus it preferred to howl instead of getting up.

These five amendments are good; they go right to the issue of foreign ownership and investment in Canada, a question which also has to do with takeovers. They go to the heart of the matter. I submit that these amendments have brought the government into the debate, although I do not see many Liberals taking part. The minister has been running around Parliament Hill during the last two weeks like a hysterical chicken: he has been seeking support for his bill.

An hon. Member: He is like a toothless hound-dog.

Mr. Benjamin: He has been trying to get an answer with a degree of haste which would seem indecent even in a lady of ill repute.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Benjamin: After all the years this issue has been debated in Canada, after investigations lasting two years, after bringing down the Gray report and ruminating over it for several weeks, what has the government done? It has brought in this bill which falls far short of what is necessary. One can only conclude that the government still does not think it needs to do very much with regard to foreign ownership and foreign control of the Canadian economy.

It is evident from the speech of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) that the government still adheres to eighteenth and nineteenth century concepts of foreign control which most advanced countries discarded long ago. After all the years of debate, the government has brought in this dismal bill. Then it has the gall to demand that the bill be put through with great haste so that we may prevent some possible takeovers. These, I submit, if they take place, will be a small percentage of the total number of takeovers which have been involved in the foreign ownership and control of our economy.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) felt that the NDP amendments were an attempt to put life into a bill that was so inadequate as to be hardly worth the effort of passing. I think I am paraphrasing him correctly. He may be right. But we must try and put something into the bill which will benefit Canadians and Canadian development. We have had to force the issue. We must make the government face it, debate it and accept some meaningful improvements and additions to the bill which would enlarge its scope and the ability of the government to act in the area of takeovers.

Here is an issue which is probably one of the most important, if not the most important, issues that has come before the Canadian people in the last 15 years. It is an issue we must debate urgently if Canadian nationhood is to survive. But we find only 11 Liberals out of 151 are present and interested in it. Where is the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn)? Where are the hon. members for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) and Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz)? Where are the 13 who signed the submission saying this bill does not go far enough? Why are they not taking part in the debate? It seems to me here again is a chance for the hon. member for Duvernay to make his views heard, to make the minister and the rest of the government sit up and take notice. The minister wants to pass this bill in great haste.

An hon. Member: Where were you in committee?

Mr. Benjamin: Where was the hon. member in committee?

Mr. Pepin: I think the hon. member is getting too excited.

Mr. Benjamin: The minister suggests that the control of our economic environment is sufficient, and that this matter comes first. I submit that the effects on our social and political environment flow directly from what happens in our economy. No doubt this has been the case throughout our history; that is the whole problem.

• (1610)

The amendment is an attempt to persuade the minister to at least help solve the problem by getting rid of that outmoded concept. The effects on the social and political environment should be given at least equal, if not greater, consideration as the effects on the economic environment. These amendments are an attempt to get the minister to face up to that fact and recognize that the social and political environment is at least as important as the economic environment in the whole area of takeovers.

A company trying to accomplish a takeover should have to guarantee that certain social and political conditions will be met. If they cannot do that in addition to meeting the economic environment conditions, the takeover should not be allowed. Let me illustrate what I mean. If this amendment is accepted, and if a company in any industry contemplating a takeover cannot guarantee that its operations will not be affected by United States law or the law of any other country, the takeover should not be allowed. That has to do with the Canadian political environment. Surely the minister would like to have that part of the amendment in the bill. Surely these types of consideration should be equal to considerations of the economic environment.

Let me give another illustration. If a takeover by a foreign-owned food chain or other merchandising operation means the driving out of hundreds of Canadian small businessmen, corner groceries, small hardware merchants or clothiers, including some that are not so small, the takeover should not be allowed. That has to do with the social environment. By including the word "social" in the bill we would be saying that Canada in its own distinct way places great value on having a social environment that is distinct in nature. Small businesses then would not continually have the shirts ripped off their backs; they would not be swallowed up by the dozens, with those remaining gradually going belly-up. This situation has contributed to the vast destruction of rural Canada. For decades it has driven hundreds of small entrepreneurs out of this country. When is the minister going to wake up? Those are two reasons for inserting the words "political and social" in clause 2 of the bill.

Let me give a hypothetical example of what may happen if the amendment is not accepted. To a large extent the fertilizer industry is foreign-owned and controlled. There are a number of manufacturing plants in western Canada. The majority of them are foreign-owned and are controlled and directed from boardrooms in other countries. This industry is selling Canadian-made fertilizer packed in bags made in Canada, shipped on Canadian railway lines from Canadian fertilizer plants in Medicine Hat, Edmonton and Brandon to United States points where it is sold anywhere from $10 to $25 a ton less than it is sold to the farmer in Canada who lives beside the fertilizer plant.

Canadian farmers, individually and in groups, are trying to do something about their social and economic environment by banding together and ordering fertilizer at a point in either Montana or North Dakota. For example, a company in North Dakota assured a group of Canadian farmers delivery of 300 tons, six carloads, at $15 to $20 a ton less than they would pay in their own town. They received delivery of one car but the other five could not be delivered. That is very strange. I wish to cite another example. A farmer in Birch Hills, Saskatchewan, went to Montana, 450 miles away, and bought fertilizer for $20 a ton less than at home. This fertilizer had been manufactured in Edmonton, only 200 miles from his home.

There will be further takeovers in the fertilizer industry. The minister needs our amendment so that he can call a halt to takeovers by international fertilizer companies. The minister should say to these firms that if they cannot guarantee they will sell these products at no higher price to Canadian consumers than they will sell to people across the line, a takeover will not be allowed. That has to do with the social and political environment as well as the economic environment; you cannot separate the three. The minister is diluting the situation by submitting that the economic environment is first in importance. I submit the three go hand in hand.

I hate to say this, Mr. Speaker, but some opposition members and most members on the government side continue to contribute to the betrayal of our nationhood. Those are strong words. They contribute to this betrayal of our nation, albeit unwittingly and maybe even unwillingly, in ways which make one feel embarrassed and ashamed. This is probably the first time in history that Parliament has had a chance to do something about an issue of such magnitude and concern to Canadians in all walks of life—but what do we get? We get this tiny, faltering, half-hearted step.

Mr. Pepin: At least it is something. Two weeks ago there was not anything.

Mr. Benjamin: I do not want to sound like a flag-waver. In closing my remarks, I want to speak as sincerely as I can about our country and how we feel about it. No matter what our walk of life, political faith, ethnic origin or whatever else, we all have a deep love for this country. We may not run around waving flags, bragging and shooting off our mouths about it as much as people in other countries, but there is no question that this love is there. Surely it is not too much to ask the government of our country to do more than they are now prepared to do about our sovereignty and the control of our economic, social and political environment. We are a distinct country and a distinct people, geographically and socially. We have ways of doing things. We have a future that makes all Canadians, justifiably so, feel something special and that our country is special. I urge the minister to accept the amendment in order that we can give more weight to the last line in our anthem, "O Canada, we stand on guard for thee."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1620)

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have every sympathy with the minister when he says he has to sit here all the afternoon and listen to what I suppose—

Mr. Pepin: I cannot stand on guard, but I am sitting on guard.

Mr. Gleave: The minister says he is sitting on guard instead of standing on guard. That is fine, as long as he sits on guard. My complaint is that he is just not on guard, standing, sitting or lying down.

Political and social consequences are important. The minister asked, "What did you do?" Well, when we formed the government in Saskatchewan we did several things. We went into the areas of a large number of northern lakes and said, "Whoever you are, you cannot build your cottages on the shoreline any more, because that shoreline belongs to the ordinary people and they should have access to it." We listen to news reports from Ontario and eastern Canada: people are complaining that they cannot get to the beaches on the lakes. We did something. As far as I know, we are the only province in Canada which owns its own gas distribution system and has the reserves to back it up. I believe this is still the case, even though a Liberal government, when they had the opportunity, peddled some of it off. If the minister wants to know what can be done, I will mention two or three things. Of course, a province is limited in the extent to which it can protect the economic rights of its people.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What province is losing people?

Mr. Gleave: The hon. member over there asks what province is losing people. Big deal! I am not apologizing for that part of it. It is due to the fact that we are largely an agricultural province, and the policies of the government with regard to grain sales in late 1968 and in 1969 just about bankrupted us. So we have encountered some difficulty.

The hon. member who threw that question at me knows it was true in Alberta and it was also true in Manitoba. We were having difficulty. But we found in Saskatchewan, as in other provinces, that foreign ownership is beginning to encroach on our farmland, not because foreigners particularly want to farm our land because they think it is a good speculative proposition, but because it is a hedge. The provincial government became concerned. It brought in a bill to deal with the situation and that bill has been referred to a committee which will discuss it and decide what sort of legislation will finally be placed before the legislature to protect the land. What do we get from the other side of the House? Here is a headline in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, "Ottawa opposes, Lang says". You have only one MP from the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Nystrom: One too many.

Mr. Gleave: Even before the bill becomes an act he intends, he says, to have it investigated. It is easy enough to say the matter will be hauled before the courts. Whether he will ever get round to it is something else. I doubt it. Hon. D. Steuart, leader of the opposition out there, is crying big crocodile tears; If you held out a dish you would be able to hear them splash. But as I say, some action is being taken.

In the city in which I live there was a refinery which was created by the people who work there. The refinery was started as a little highway refinery. Then it became BA, then it became Gulf. The decision was made to take it away. It is gone. It generated enough money to enable it to be placed there profitably. But at some point they decided it was to their advantage to place everything in the Edmonton area.

The Quaker Oats company decided it was to their advantage to locate their plant in Peterborough. They closed the other one down. They had no concern for the social implications of doing so. They had no consideration for anything except the prospect of making a buck. Maybe that is a good enough motivation for a company, but what kind of country would such a philosophy leave us? This question involves much more than ourselves; it involves generations who will come after us. Will they be able to play on the beaches of Prince Edward Island? Will they have access to the beaches of Ontario and Nova Scotia? What kind of country are we expecting? This is a valid question, I believe. It is more important in the long run than the question of how to make a buck most easily.

I read an article recently about the proposal to build a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley. Answers to questions in the House indicate that a move of this kind is under way. But what about the effect on the ecology? This is a question which has not been answered. Apparently it is intended to go ahead anyway. But what about the people who live in the area? Don't they have rights? Do we have the right to set their wishes aside? Possibly we have the right legally—but morally? That is inevitable. Whether it concerns the Mackenzie Valley or the James Bay area, the decision will be made without very much consideration being given those who have managed to make a living satisfactory to them over a long period of time.

• (1630)

To get to the main substance of the bill and to the proposed amendments, surely the government must be aware of the very bad press this particular proposal has received. I have read hardly a newspaper article or editorial comment which says the bill is a good one, that the proposal is solid and will meet the needs of Canadians now and in the future.

Mr. Cullen: Do you want government by newspaper?

Mr. Gleave: I am just recounting the opinion that has been expressed. You may not like it, but I do not think that is government by newspaper. The newspapers are not going to make the decisions; the decisions will be made in this House and by the government on the other side of the House. Some members in committee from that side of the House expressed their unhappiness with this measure, and in view of the totality of the circumstances I do not see how the government can justify going ahead with it in its present form. It is too narrow in its approach and I do not think it will work or make much difference.

Mr. Pepin: You cannot measure whether it will work by its size.

Mr. Gleave: It is not a matter of size; it is a matter of selectivity, of objectives, of what we want. These objectives are not declared in the bill; it is left to a certain committee to make ad hoc decisions here and there. Unless the objectives are set out, these decisions will be weak because the measure is weak. It lacks any clear statement of objectives. I do not hear what the minister is saying from his seat, but I certainly appreciate his listening to me. I suppose he is trying to help me. We all know how good natured he is and considerate of the members on this side, for which I thank him very much.

Let me repeat, in all sincerity, that the essential weakness of this approach is that the objectives are not clearly stated. In view of this, the measure will be ineffective. If it passes the House and becomes law, it will mean that at some future date we will have to review the bill and then try to undo what has resulted from lack of action in the meantime.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin)—Public Service; the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter)—Regional Economic Expansion; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding)—Science and Technology.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOREIGN TAKEOVERS REVIEW ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR CONTROL OF FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF CANADIAN COMPANIES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-201, to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 21 and 28.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, on May 30 or 31 when I spoke in this debate I referred to the bill introduced by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) as an economic eunuch. I said that it amounted to a big zero and would not do anything at all to further the repatriation of Canada economically, culturally or socially. I realize the minister thinks that this is rather humorous. He is one of the more conservative and status-minded ministers of the government, which is very unfortunate since this is an issue about which Canadians are very concerned, as demonstrated by recent public opinion polls.

In many ways this issue has crossed party lines. The 13 mavericks in the Liberal party as well as some in the Conservative party, and the Committee for an Independent Canada, composed of all political stripes, are all concerned about foreign ownership in the Canadian economy. By no means does this bill go far enough to solve the economic independence of this country, which I suggest is what most rank and file members of the Canadian citizenry want at the present time. The bill deals only with takeovers in the economy. As pointed out by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans), the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) and others, it relates to 5 per cent, 6 per cent or maybe 10 per cent of the total foreign ownership of this country.

For years there have been studies, task forces, commissions and public debates on the question of foreign ownership. We have had the Watkins report and the Gray report. In essence, both these major pieces of work, commissioned by Liberal governments, came to the same conclusion, namely, that the Canadian economy is far too much foreign-owned and controlled and that something must be done to repatriate it. Yet this is not being done.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. In pursuing his remarks along present lines, the hon. member seems to be debating the bill again on second reading. He is really debating the principles and objectives of the bill. I would invite the hon. member to bring his remarks to bear as closely as he can on the amendments before the House, which relate to the social and political effects of the bill.

Mr. Nystrom: I agree with you, Mr. Speaker, and I have given the reason for our party moving several amendments. We have decided it is not a good bill. Because we are concerned about foreign ownership, we want to strengthen the bill. We are now debating the first amendment, moved by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), which deals with the social and political aspects of foreign ownership as well as the economic aspects. I think these aspects are very important.

The amendments which the minister is going to consider are not those that groups like the Committee for an Independent Canada and the members of our party would like to see moved. I suggest that instead of listening to his friends in the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the stock exchange, and so on, he should bear in mind the interests of the ordinary workers and farmers of Canada.

As already mentioned by others, the Ontario government announced during the last few weeks it will take action to ensure that more Canadians sit on the boards of companies in the province. The Saskatchewan government is preparing a bill dealing with the foreign ownership of farmland. These steps are very important to the political and social way of life of this country. They deal with problems that must be solved quickly if we are to have a united Canada that will forge ahead in future years.

Questions have been asked by members on the other side of the House, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and others ask about our approach to foreign ownership. They ask, "What about your party going into foreign markets and getting money from Japan and the United States for development in Saskatchewan and Manitoba?" We have done that in some cases.

• (1640)

Let me give one example. When the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) was premier of Saskatchewan, our government went to the United States and borrowed hundreds of millions of dollars for the establishment of the Saskatchewan Power Corporation. The one important thing was that this was loan capital, not equity capital. Now the people of the province of Saskatchewan own the Saskatchewan Power Corporation, rather than some United States industrialist living in Chicago, Detroit or elsewhere. This is a very important distinction and an important political choice which I hope the minister will realize and consider seriously.

History will show that nearly every country in the world has had to rely on foreign capital at some stage of its development. The classic example is the United States. During its development it had a great deal of money from the United Kingdom and other European countries. But it made sure that the majority of that money was loan capital and not equity capital. Now the people of the United States own their own economy.

The same thing has happened in countries such as Japan and Sweden. Some 30 or 35 years ago Sweden was primarily foreign owned and controlled. The Social Democratic Party which assumed power there in 1935 accomplished repatriation of the economy. That was a matter of top priority and an important political choice, one which this government should make. We in this country are prostituting our economic destiny to a greater extent than any other industrial country in the western world. I suggest this is an insult to Canadians and a tragic policy for this government.

There is a difference between loan capital and equity capital, and we should realize the difference. When you buy a house and pay off the mortgage in 25 or 35 years, you own the house; but in respect of the Canadian economy this is not the case. It is like inviting outsiders, whether Americans or Japanese, to come into our houses, make themselves at home, use the furniture and even take our wives, and we pay them to do so. We let them make their profits and go back home. This is what is happening in Canada. It is something our government must stop, but it must take a major political decision to stop it.

I suggest we finance many foreign takeovers in our country. A United States economist in the department of commerce stated in 1968 that about 94 per cent of the money invested in Canada by American corporations is Canadian money. Some 94 per cent of the funds invested is really Canadian money obtained on the Canadian financial market. Some is borrowed from Canadian banking and lending institutions and some is profit from existing foreign firms, reinvested in our economy. We are selling out our country with our own money. Again, the minister should realize this and make the positive political decision.

We have funds in this country and we have ability. If we had a government with guts and imagination, surely to God it could create some policies and legislation to put our economy in the hands of Canadians. How, precisely, can we do this? The answer has been outlined time and time again in the Watkins report, the Gray report, by the Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs, the Standing Committee on National Defence and by certain members of the Liberal party, the hon. member for Duvernay, the Canadian Labour Congress, and the NDP. We know how to do this. All we need now is a political decision to repatriate our country. It could be done within a few years.

Another thing that concerns me about this bill is that not enough emphasis is placed on some of the political decisions which must be made, nor on some of the social and cultural aspects of the problem of foreign ownership of our economy. Four months ago I was speaking to a non-political group in Yorkton. Most of the people were not supporters of my party; they were young businessmen and executives. I was speaking about foreign ownership. During the question period one of the young people said there was something that might be even more important than economic control of our country being in the hands of foreign, multinational corporations. He suggested that the cultural and social influence the United States and other countries had on Canada was the most important thing.

In a few minutes this afternoon I want to try to underline that point. We have tended to ignore, eliminate or forget the powerful impact other countries can have on Canadian culture through the media, the theatre, the arts and such other things. Let me emphasize the importance to the minister and the government.

I remember back in the late 1950s when I was a student in elementary school in Saskatchewan. Many of us knew more about United States political figures than we knew about our own. We knew more about Abraham Lincoln, what he did and stood for, than we did about Sir John A. Macdonald; we knew more about Jefferson than we did about Laurier. This was in large part because many of the textbooks used in those schools were published in the United States. They were written by United States authors and contained American historical interpretations.

Perhaps the book publishing industry is an area that should receive high priority from this government. The government should look at it very closely from the point of view of assistance to make it truly Canadian. We should try to create a nation which has a special identity that is Canadian.

We have moved in some of these areas, and I do not condemn the government for absolutely everything it has done.

Three or four years ago the radio-television commission laid down guidelines and rules concerning broadcasting in this country. It said that within three years 80 per cent of radio and television stations must be Canadian-owned. We have pretty well attained that goal. This sort of thing can be done and must be done. It should be done in the book publishing industry, the film industry, the arts and such fields, as well as in economic areas in respect of resources, manufacturing, and so on. We should put more emphasis on these areas, then perhaps we would have a more vibrant country, that is more Canadian.

The French-speaking areas of this country have developed distinct culture that is Canadian. This is primarily so because they speak the French language and are less susceptible to the pressures of United States influence. I am very proud of that fact in Canada. I not only want to see it preserved, but stimulated. I should also like to see this fact stimulated in respect of English-speaking Canadians. I think this is a very healthy thing.

Earlier the minister was questioned about the French language being the working language in Quebec. He was asked whether this should be a consideration when an outside company is considering a takeover in the province of Quebec. I suggest it should be a consideration because the working language of most people in Quebec is French. If a foreign corporation is to take over a Canadian corporation and ignore that fact, it should be a very serious consideration in government legislation. I am surprised that some of these things are not done, especially since the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is from the province of Quebec and I am sure realizes it is a very important question in that part of Canada.

• (1650)

There are many other issues and points I would like to speak about, but my time is running out. However, I do want to emphasize that there are very important social and political considerations that we must take into account. Not all considerations in the country, when it comes to foreign ownership, are solely and distinctly economic. This country, for example, was built for many reasons other than economic. It did not make economic sense to build a nation that went east and west; all the natural economic and trade patterns went north and south but we went against some of these economic considerations.

My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), outlined many of these aspects when he spoke earlier about lack of economic sense when the CPR and the CNR were established. However, we made this decision and it was a conscious political one. We wanted to build a nation that was distinctly different from the United States. I suggest that in the future we will have to make a great many decisions that are political rather than economic. They may be social and cultural rather than economic. These considerations should be embedded within a piece of legislation such as this. If they were, then perhaps this bill, which up to now is really a big nothing, would have at least some significance and would go a little way toward repatriating the Canadian economy, the Canadian society and the Canadian culture which I am sure all of us want to see developed.

Again I urge the minister to stop listening to the Canadian Manufacturers Association, to his friends in Bay Street and those in the stock exchange, and instead to listen to the ordinary Joes of this country, the ordinary people who are interested in building a Canada that will provide them with jobs and a future for their children. We all know that we export a great volume of raw materials and that this industry provides very few jobs. It is capital-intensive. We should make a conscious, political decision to put more emphasis on manufacturing industry that is labour-intensive. I refer the minister to his colleague, the hon. member for Duvernay. I am sure if the minister listened to him he could—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I think the Chair has been very fair to the hon. member who has the floor, but perhaps in the few minutes left to him he should speak more to the amendment which is before us.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I respect your remarks. It is rather difficult for some of us, because we are speaking on a subject that moves us very strongly and on a bill which apparently does not move the minister, to contain ourselves to the narrow restrictions of certain amendments. But I shall abide by your wishes and in the few moments remaining to me I shall try to be more specific.

I urge the minister to accept this amendment. I ask him seriously to consider it and when he replies to outline some of the possibilities it may have, not to reject it totally out of hand because this is a very important question which affects all Canadians. Canadians want changes in this area and I think it is the responsibility of the government to lead the way. Governments are here to govern, to express the collective will of the people of Canada, and I am sure the people of Canada want us to go much further than we are going in the area of foreign ownership. That has been proven time and time again by people in all political parties, by various commissions, and by public opinion. I plead with the government to listen to them. The government has promised participatory democracy and a just society. Here is an opportunity to go a little way in that direction.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, in considering this matter I am reminded of the teacher who asked his class what was the capital of Canada and a pupil answered, "Mostly American". That is part of the problem that concerns us. We are considering the political and social impact of some of the economic factors which affect us. This makes me think of David Lloyd George of Great Britain when discussing a social problem of theirs. He said they were born paupers in the land of their birth. We are facing a somewhat similar situation in this country.

I would suggest to the minister and to the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard), who seems to be listening to the debate, that Canadians would like a piece of the action. This is really what we are talking about. We do not want all of it to be taken over by somebody else. If there is going to be a takeover here, we want to do it. This is what we are talking about. We would like a bill to help Canadians take over their own country. What concerns us is social, economic and political equality. In effect, we would like to walk around with some money in our jeans, in our own country, and we would like to feel that we have a stake in Canada.

The French have an expression "Maîtres chez nous". I am sure the minister, while he might not recognize my accent, is familiar with the term. I am suggesting, Sir, that those who own or control a country have an interest in that country. What, then, are they going to do with it? This is the intent of the amendment.

As I have observed people generally, those who own a house or a business, or those who manage a business have an interest in it and want to promote it. Those who look at a corporation as something that somebody owns, such as an absentee landlord, do not have the same interest in promoting the equity of the corporation. They might if they had a sense of proprietorship in the corporation. Let me give an example which is fairly close to me. I do not own a share in the Bell Telephone Company, but I have listened to the piles being driven for the new building down the street. Even in that sense I have a sense of proprietorship in it. At least I have suffered with them a little. It is a fine building which is serving a purpose here in Ottawa. I am trying to point out, Sir, that there are things in which we have an interest because we are Canadians.

May I call it five o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

SUGGESTED NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON PRIMARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government of Canada should consider the advisability of taking the initiative in securing the collaboration of the provinces in the convening of a national conference on uniform standards in primary and secondary education.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I consider it an honour to be able to speak on a matter which, if it does not receive national acclaim today, certainly in the next few years will have to be faced by a government of Canada. The motion which appears today on the order paper is not put forward for the first time. It was introduced last year by the former hon. member for South Western Nova. It was reintroduced early this year in my name, went through the usual procedures and now we are able to debate it for the next hour.

The first thing I want to say is that the motion can be refined. It would be no trouble at all for any member of the House to look at this motion as it stands verbatim, to take it apart and destroy it. One or two of its phrases are highly unpopular. Had I taken the time earlier in the year to refine the motion further I might have changed certain phrases. The motion contains the phrase "a national conference on uniform standards in primary and secondary education". As an educator who has spent quite a number of years in classrooms, I take exception to anything that could be defined as a uniform standard for the classroom. No educator, no citizen would ever introduce a motion calling for a uniform standard to be applied to a classroom setting.

If I were to speak about a curriculum, not only do I believe that you cannot have a national curriculum but I believe you cannot even have a provincial curriculum or a school curriculum in the standard sense. A curriculum is the total experience of an individual in the school or learning setting. It is something that exists at the individual level in the classroom. No educator would ever talk about a uniform standard applying to a curriculum process.

These are some points I want to clarify before hon. gentlemen opposite rise to speak on this motion. I would not consider uniform standards in terms of laying down in black and white what should transpire in an educational system across Canada in terms of text books, expenditures of funds or any of the specific goals of education. Again, these questions are not only of provincial nature but are better handled at the local level.

The purpose of this motion is to draw attention to the need for the federal government to recognize that in 1972 it has a responsibility in the area of human resource development, and to suggest that there should be a meeting of minds between municipalities, provinces, school boards, teachers and the national government to talk about all of the broader aspects of the educational process.

Turning back to 1867 when the nation of Canada was born, it is easy to understand that education was assumed to be a local issue. At that time it was totally a community issue. As a matter of fact, from studying the history of education in Canada we find that it was mainly the churches which became involved in the educational process. In those days very few people travelled from one part of the country to another. There was not the kind of mass migration that we see nowadays. And because of the political implications and realities of 1867, education was deemed to be purely a provincial issue.

For the last 25 or 30 years, broadminded educators have realized that education must be considered as something more than a provincial issue. The one thing that offends me even more as an educator than as a Member of Parliament is the hypocrisy of the various levels of government. Today the federal government is involved, actively and directly, in as many as 20 educational areas. But its hypocrisy is unbelievable. The federal government allocates funds to the provinces with which they can build vocational institutions. These facilities are owned by the provinces because of the constitutional hang-up. The provinces in turn sell seats in these institutions to the federal government, or rent space to the federal government, so that it can manage its federal manpower programs or adult occupation retraining programs. This avoids facing the reality of the situation, that vocational education is an integral part of the educational process and that there should be close liaison between the local educational systems at all levels, primary, secondary and post-secondary.

Again, Mr. Speaker, annually the federal government pays many millions of dollars to the provinces to be devoted to post-secondary education. The universities, which are an integral part of the educational process, receive their share of the federal revenue dollar but in effect never admit it. The provinces jealously guard what they consider to be a constitutional right. Recently a constitutional conference was held without a single aspect of education coming to the fore. I do not want to get involved in that debate, but when the provinces have a hang-up over their constitutional and jurisdictional rights, and when the federal government maintains the hypocrisy of not wanting to get involved in education, it is the people of Canada who suffer the resultant hardship.

I do not have to tell my colleagues of the effect which the general mobility of the population has on our young people. All of us know of members of the armed forces who have been transferred around Canada, perhaps a dozen times in a decade, and know the effect this has had on the children involved. Each Member of Parliament who has brought his family to Ottawa can speak of the impact which lack of a common educational area has had on his family.

We are one of only two major countries in the western world which do not have a federal presence in their educational systems. I believe the federal government should face up to the fact that a major portion of the Canadian population is, or has been, in the process of moving from one part of Canada to another. Within the next decade perhaps all the population will move, once in a lifetime, from one part of Canada to another. This points to the need for the common presence of a national body in the area of education.

One of the biggest drawbacks to regional development is the lack of equal educational opportunities in the disadvantaged regions. Many provinces are fooling themselves whenever they stand up at a national conference and say they jealously guard their constitutional right over education. In effect they are denying their citizens equal educational opportunities. Unless we get the federal government involved in the educational process, the people of areas suffering regional disparity will continue to have a second-rate educational structure.

As examples I could mention several provinces but I will talk about my own because I know more about it. There is no way that my province can ever afford the share of the tax dollar that is necessary in order to provide its citizens with equal educational opportunities. We have not the tax revenues to provide the necessary school facilities. Here I am talking about the physical resource capability so that our young people may have the same opportunities as young people in Montreal or Toronto. Consequently, unless the provinces get off their high horses and the federal government is willing to involve itself directly in the educational process with the co-operation of the provinces, regional disparity will continue to exist.

• (1710)

As an example of how critical the situation is between the provinces and the federal government, all the regional development agreements are providing part of the infrastructure to certain areas for the building of schools. The federal government says it is part of the economic infrastructure. In Prince Edward Island some moneys have been allocated for school construction on the basis that the manpower capability will be needed in later years for economic development, so funds are allocated for education. What abominable hypocrisy that is, when we should be facing the reality that the province needs federal involvement—not direction but the type of involvement where physical and monetary resources are made available. Instead, the federal government, with the permission of the provinces, goes through about 20 back doors.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that in view of the fact that the federal government, with the co-operation of the provinces, is already involved in about 20 areas of educational development, in view of the fact that education today is more than a provincial and local issue, and in view of the mobility of the population, it is one of the imperatives of this Parliament that the federal government start talking to the provinces, the municipalities, the school boards and teachers to convene some sort of national conference on human resource development. It is almost out of order to use the word "education" in the House of Commons today, and indeed I am surprised that the Speaker has not ruled on that.

If there is to be a meeting of minds, we have to talk about an area of common interest and common involvement. We do not have to take authoritarian involvement or direction from Ottawa. We have to talk about the broad objectives of education which must be faced by the Canadian people. This is the intent of the motion. If we want some kind of equality of educational opportunity, if we want to eliminate the serious impact of the fragmentation of the process on the mobile public of the seventies, then we must start facing the facts.

Just before coming into the House today I spoke to some members of the armed forces and asked if they thought this motion had any relevance to their families. I was astounded to learn that the educational opportunities of many children had been ruined because when they moved from one system to another it was necessary to start the whole process over again.

As an educator, I could speak for hours on this subject and eliminate many of the arguments about uniform standards. That is not an adequate phrase and I could be blamed for not defining my motion. However, I hope that members taking part in the debate will not get hung up on that; I hope they will address their remarks to the question of some kind of common federal presence, and that they will be realistic enough to see that despite the fact it may be popular for members to stand at the end of the provincial road, they are also dealing with the lives of many thousands of Canadians.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the subject the hon. member has raised today is timely and is of general interest in this country. There is widespread interest in public education and, as he pointed out, Canada has become a nation of very mobile people. I believe that the average family moves something like once every five years, and undoubtedly many of those moves are across provincial boundaries.

The motion is pertinent, also, because we are all concerned about disparities which exist among certain geographical regions and among certain economic, social and cultural groups. I rather expected the hon. member to speak at some length on the need for uniform standards, but I agree with him that in Canada we should avoid rigid, uniform educational standards from coast to coast and from north to south. We are a country of variety and the needs in one part of the country are not identical with the needs in another.

I, too, tend to believe that the curriculum should not be identical in the hon. member's riding with that in southern Ontario or my own riding in British Columbia. However, I must also say that more uniform standards than are presently available to our students would be desirable. All hon. members undoubtedly have examples.

I can recall a young high school student from British Columbia who was brought to Ottawa by her parents. Being the capital of the nation, where bilingualism is a policy, the parents naturally expected that their daughter's knowledge of French would be furthered. It only took a short time for them to discover that the methods of teaching in British Columbia and Ontario were so different that if she were to pursue a French course here she would probably lose credits and possibly fail a year in school. As a result, the young lady took Spanish instead. This illustrates the need for some uniformity in education.

I think I should remind hon. members that there are considerable constitutional barriers to federal involvement in the field of education. The constitution clearly states that the power to legislate in the field of education belongs to the provinces, in and for each province. Most elementary and secondary education as well as post-secondary education is provided within the structures of the ten provincial systems. The federal government, naturally, must be concerned that all provinces have the resources necessary to provide at least a minimum service for Canadians, but its direct responsibility for elementary and secondary education is primarily limited to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and, to some extent, to the native peoples. For post-secondary education it is confined specifically and constitutionally to the operation of our three military colleges.

Under these circumstances, I would suggest that the first initiative should come from the provinces; but I am not suggesting that the federal government has not been concerned with the way in which educational standards can be improved. A series of federal governments, Mr. Speaker, have shown active concern in various aspects of education—technical education, manpower training, higher education both in the universities and other types of post-secondary institutions, and the training of personnel for health and welfare services. The federal government for many years has been deeply involved in supporting university research programs.

The hon. member spoke at some length on the need for a federal presence in education in Canada. Mr. Speaker, we have a very considerable presence in education and I should like to put some figures on the record which are most significant in this respect. It is estimated that in the year 1960-61 the proportion of federal government support in relation to the total expenditures of all levels of government on education was 8.4 per cent; that is, of the 100 per cent contributed by provincial governments, municipal governments and the federal government, the federal government contributed 8.4 per cent. In the 1971-72 period the federal share had risen to 22.4 per cent. I might add that at present federal programs of education support are under active review.

In my view, however, the body to which this motion ought to be addressed is the Council of Ministers of Education, established in 1967. The ministers of education of the ten provinces have somewhat slowly, but persistently developed a permanent structure with a central office in Toronto. Several federal cabinet ministers have on several occasions met with the council, as have federal officials with their council counterparts, on matters relating to our federal programs. Although these meetings will continue, I feel that the broader implications of this motion are such that the council itself should take whatever initiative it feels necessary.

I fully realize the seriousness of the differences and disparities which gave rise to the hon. member's request for a national conference. I am sure all members of this House are aware of unfortunate disparities across our land relating to the education of our children. I agree with the hon. member that there should be a greater federal presence in the area of education, but would remind him and the House that there is a considerable degree of federal presence in this area, inasmuch as more than one-fifth of the education money in Canada is being provided by the federal government. The provision of this money I feel is evidence of a most satisfying and significant presence.

I also agree that the federal presence is by no means sufficiently visible. If an initiative were to come from an interprovincial agency such as the Council of Ministers of Education, I am sure the federal government would be prepared to give its full co-operation and to continue its involvement in education for the good of the young people of Canada.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate because the motion moved by the hon. member from Newfoundland is of great importance. I agree with most of his statements and, speaking as an educator, share his concern regarding uniform standards of education across this country.

As we look at our process of education we must not forget that there is a certain flexibility as between one province and another in teaching methods. For example, in the field of social studies or history, the aspects students might study in Saskatchewan might be different from those they might study in Newfoundland. In Saskatchewan, a student studying history might be taken to the site of the Riel rebellion. Students in Newfoundland might not be able to do so.

On the other hand, since young people may move from one end of the country to the other, it is important to keep standards uniform. This affects, I think particularly people of my generation and of the generation of the hon. member from Newfoundland who may be school teachers. People may train in one part of the country to be teachers, only to find that in time there might not be enough jobs for all those trained.

I submit that it is important for the federal government to introduce some kind of standard governing the employment of teachers in this country. If the federal government is lavishly to hand out, as has been suggested, 22.4 per cent of all money spent on education it ought, as the hon. member from Newfoundland suggested, convene a national conference and deal with the problems of education on a national basis. We must remember that although the government pours money into technical and trade education, the people of this country are mobile. The young people of Saskatchewan may move to Toronto or Hamilton, and when they apply for a job in order to exercise their skills in the trade they have learned they may find themselves competing with 100, 200, 300 or 400 applicants from other parts of Canada who have taken the same kind of training on the assumption that jobs are available.

In this House we have taken part in interesting debates centering on the question of regional disparities. Regardless of anything the Council of Ministers of Education may say, I think it is up to the federal government to say whether we should introduce general standards in education which will meet the needs of our young people on a national scale as they become available for employment.

We must also consider the problem of young people who are trained in this country in a particular profession and who, not finding a job here, move to the United States in order to work in that profession. Only if there is a national program for providing employment in those sectors for which young people are being trained today will we be able to alleviate the problem of the exodus of our young, professional people to the United States. At the same time, of course, we must remember the social problems that arise from the mobility of our people. Relatives of mine in the armed forces have told me that young people moving from Noya Scotia to British Columbia, say, may encounter great difficulties in education. Also, apart from adjusting to the educational system, youngsters must make social and other adjustments.

We must also consider the difficulty, referred to by the parliamentary secretary, of financing education. When the British North America Act was passed in 1867 it was agreed that educational costs would be met by property taxes. It has become difficult to provide equal opportunities in education for all since property taxes are not sufficient for providing all the facilities required. The federal government, therefore, must come to grips with the question and determine whether the concept of financing education through property taxes—I am thinking of rural Saskatchewan in particular—is not outmoded and outdated. Is the property tax a large enough source of educational revenue in each of our provinces and municipalities?

The teaching profession at the post-secondary level in the last few years has developed some really interesting proposals for setting up a national council of educators which would look into the question of national standards. The parliamentary secretary told us of the Council of Ministers of Education. It is now incumbent on the federal government, I believe, to take such action as is suggested by the hon. member from Newfoundland and convene a national conference which will attempt to deal with the problems of education. I ought to deal with uniform standards as well as with the financing of education.

I conclude my remarks on this motion by expressing the hope that it will be voted on and will receive the unanimous support of the House. I compliment the hon. member for bringing forward the motion and I commend its intent.

[Mr. Knight.]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the private member's notice of motion No. 10, in the name of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan), reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government of Canada should consider the advisability of taking the initiative in securing the collaboration of the provinces in the convening of a national conference on uniform standards in primary and secondary education.

• (1730)

First, I want to congratulate the hon. member for bringing this question before the House. It is a matter of concern to many Canadians. A year or so ago, when I travelled with the constitutional committee to various parts of this country, it was a common complaint that when people move from one part of the country to another their children have to move back a grade or forward a grade in school. Often the subjects are not aligned so that this can be done in an easy way. Therefore, I am glad the hon. member has put this motion before the House today.

I am also glad that the hon. member is not talking about a uniform curriculum but about uniform standards. I suppose standards are the end result of work in a specific curriculum. That may pose some difficulty, but I am pleased that he does not want a uniform curriculum, which of course would be very difficult to achieve. I do not think anyone in this country would like to see one flat, monolithic curriculum across the country in which students from Bonavista to Vancouver Island would learn exactly the same thing on the same day.

The problem of curriculum is even greater than one might think. It was only four or five years ago that in the province of Ontario we had a greater level of uniformity across the province. There were provincial school inspectors who made sure that we had a standard across the province. Since then the province has been carved into 30 to 40 school divisions. These divisions have considerably more autonomy than the old, local township school area boards. We have a multiplicity of curricula and programs in our school system within the province of Ontario, let alone a diversity throughout the country. If there were uniform standards they would be of great advantage to the hundreds of thousands of people who move every year from one part of the country to another. A recent figure that I read suggested that one in four families moves every year. I do not know whether they move interprovincially or not.

The hon. member referred to the problem of regional disparity. He suggested that regional disparity somehow relates to education. I believe there is a link. If you look around the world you will find that a reasonably high level of education and training—I use that term advisedly because surely training for a specific job is almost as important as broad, general academic education—well distributed throughout the population is probably the greatest factor in determining the relative affluence of any country. In many countries with tremendous capital investment, the average individual is poor. Many countries are very rich in natural resources but the people are relatively poor. In several countries, people with a high level of education and training are not generally distributed throughout the population and there is a very low standard of living.

The hon. member made a good point when talking about regional development, but I am not sure that establishing standards across the board is essential. If we suggested that to the minister of education for Newfoundland, he might be inclined to look at us as federal people who are trying to stick our noses into the provincial pot. He might say something like Sir Winston Churchill said to the North American continent in the dark days of World War II: Give us the tools and we'll finish the job.

I think we can attack the problem of regional disparity, without setting uniform standards, by providing extra funds. The federal government has provided a great deal of funds to Newfoundland. I understand that through the special areas program, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has made funds available for school construction. The federal government is putting a great deal of money into education in every province of this country.

I recently noticed a question on the order paper concerning grade 13 education in the province of Ontario, whether grade 13 was considered to be university level for the purpose of federal assistance. We found out that it is. In fact, 50 per cent of the eligible operating expenditures as defined in the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act, 1967, for grade 13 education in the province of Ontario are borne by the federal government. This is not generally known in the province. The provincial government probably does not mention this any more than necessary.

In the answer to this question on the order paper I read that in the fiscal year 1967-68, $16 million was provided for grade 13 education, and for the fiscal year 1971-72 it is estimated that almost $33 million will be provided by the federal government to the province of Ontario for the educational costs of grade 13. I think we can see from these figures that the federal government is deeply involved in education both at the university level and, at least in the province of Ontario, at the grade 13 level.

The real problem in the motion before us this afternoon is a constitutional one. Section 93 of the British North America Act makes it quite clear that education is primarily a matter of provincial responsibility. There have been many incidents throughout history where the provinces have made it quite clear that although they will accept money from the federal government for education, they do not want to hand over any of the responsibility for education to the federal government.

I might mention some of the areas in which the federal government is involved in education. Perhaps the newest is the bilingualism program under which funds are made available to provincial departments of education. A group from one of the high schools in my constituency recently asked me whether funds could be made available for a special immersion course. The response from the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) was that funds are already available to provincial governments for such training, so it was impossible to get federal funds directly. Federal funds are also available in connection with the retraining and upgrading program. This is really a most important form of education because we are training men and women to do the jobs which are available for them.

The federal government is also deeply involved in the education of Indians and Eskimos. I understand that even here there is a great deal of diversity in programming, in the elementary schools at least. I do not know whether there are separate high schools on Indian reserves but the levels adopted in each province are the levels adopted by the schools for which the federal government is responsible as far as the curriculum of each is concerned. Criticism has been expressed in some provinces in connection with the role of the federal government in education through television. We read recently that the minister of transport of Quebec and the responsible provincial minister in Ontario were seeking increased jurisdiction over television and cablevision within their provincial boundaries. This is one area, I suppose, in which there will continue to be constitutional argument.

I was interested in the statement by the parliamentary secretary that between the fiscal year 1960-1961 and the fiscal year 1970-1971 the percentage of the cost of education borne nationally had risen from 8.4 to 24.4. I mentioned earlier that the committee on the constitution during its hearings throughout the country often heard it argued that there was a need for national standards in education. In this connection, it was interesting to read what is contained in the committee's report. The committee studied this subject and deals with it in recommendation No. 88. It reads:

> Education as such should remain exclusively a provincial power as it is at present subject to the guarantee for minorities set out elsewhere in this report.

Recommendation 89 reads:

> The provinces should create a permanent office for co-operation and co-ordination in education and federal participation should be confined to the area of federal jurisdiction over the education of native peoples, immigrants, defence personnel and dependants.

So, the committee seems to have opted for the idea of diversity. The permanent office has since been established, I understand, by the Council of Ministers of Education.

It seems to me that what is being proposed is a national conference. If such a conference were not sponsored by the ministers of education, it is likely that no provincial representatives would attend. So it appears that if we are to have a conference of the type suggested, it should really be sponsored by the Council on Education. Even if it were to do so, I do not know whether a national conference is really the place at which to hammer out guidelines toward a national standard system. Young people and educators tell me, when I talk to them, that many students are already placed in different grades for different subjects. Thus, for example, a child could be in grade eight as far as his class report is concerned, but he could be in grade four for reading and grade seven for mathematics. With an open approach of this kind, implying far greater elasticity in the school timetable, it would surely be even more difficult to create uniform standards for each grade and to do so would require all the ingenuity of our educators.

Mr. Lundrigan: The hon. member wrote his notes before listening to me. He had them prepared first.

Mr. Foster: The hon. member appears to be concerned. I do not know why. While he was speaking he appeared to be apologizing for his motion, anticipating there would be criticism of his idea. I realize his motion deals not with the curriculum, but with standards. But surely, in the end, standards are reflected in the curriculum. Yet I understand the hon. member's difficulty. The idea of establishing an education program based on grades which go remorselessly on and on is not what we need today. We want a system which is flexible, one which gives a person a broad education so that he can enjoy life while still providing substantial training as a basis for a future occupation. We hear about students in Ottawa who have already taken a BA degree and who then attend Algonquin College to acquire specific training.

What I am saying, in effect, is that although the hon. member's objectives are perhaps laudable we are a long way from realizing them, partly because the sort of education system he seems to have in mind is already ceasing to exist; more emphasis is placed on individual training and there is more training of the individual for a specific job. The idea of a national conference appears unlikely to come to fruition, however desirable it may be, for the reason that the provinces have already established a Council of Ministers of Education, and ministers of the federal cabinet meet with the Council from time to time to discuss specific subjects of common concern.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I should first of all express my pleasure that the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) should have brought this matter before the House. It is certainly one of the important questions which is confronting us today.

As the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) has just reminded us, uniformity of educational systems across the country is only one of the goals which we have. Another is to achieve diversity based on cultural differences across the country. It would be advantageous if at least the number of grades could be standardized from province to province, so that there would not be a final grade in Ontario of 13 and in Saskatchewan of 11, with students from each of these provinces finding themselves in rough equality when they enter university. This means that Ontario students require an extra two years' preparation, which may be argued to be a good thing because they would get a sounder grounding in the earlier years. At the same time, it would seem to place Ontario students at a competitive disadvantage, which perhaps is an unusual position for anyone in Ontario to find himself in.

Despite the fact that this subject is very important and that unity is one of the educational system's main objectives, I would have great reluctance in supporting the notice of motion as presently worded. I realize that the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has asked us not to take the motion too literally, but it seems to me that the motion includes the concept of federal initiative and it is precisely that concept to which I object.

[Mr. Foster.]

If the motion were merely to prescribe that the federal government participate in such a conference, certainly I would have no qualms about that. I believe there should be such a conference and that the government should participate in it. The difficult question is the question of federal initiative. It seems to me there is nothing more destructive of unity in this country than any movement toward a federal intrusion into the field of education. The constitution committee took as one of its basic principles that responsibility for the cultural and social aspects of our national life should not only remain with the provinces but that provincial interests in these areas should be expanded. To suggest a federal initiative here, even if it is not one of substance but merely one of procedure, could well be misunderstood. Its symbolic importance would, I think, be recognized by the provinces, and the provinces in many cases if not in all would find themselves in a situation of difficulty and embarrassment in face of such a federal initiative.

The recommendation of the constitution committee of this House and the other place which is directly in point is recommendation No. 89, which is that the provinces should create a permanent office for co-operation and co-ordination in education. In substance, I fully agree with the type of thing that the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has in mind, but the constitution committee was very careful to specify in the latter part of the recommendation that federal participation be confined to the area of federal jurisdiction over education of our native peoples, immigrants, defence personnel and dependants. Those are the exact terms of recommendation No. 89.

This recommendation was not lightly arrived at by the constitution committee. It was deliberately and carefully phrased. We felt that there should be federal participation because there is a federal role in education, not a general one but one confined to the particular area of education of our native peoples, immigrants, defence personnel and their dependants. Perhaps in the broadest sense of education we could also get into the manpower area which may arguably be a kind of education as well, though education in a sense that is not generally included in formal education. But to go beyond that would cause an intrusion into what is generally accepted as a provincial domain.

The reason we have a division of powers in the constitution, and provincial control over a matter as important as education, is precisely because Canadians are different across the country. Communities across Canada, not only English-speaking or French-speaking but all communities as embodied in the provinces, have different outlooks. They want to preserve certain aspects of their lives. I am sure that the citizens of Newfoundland want to preserve that which is characteristic of Newfoundland in their education system. If provincial education can be criticized at all, at least as it appeared at the time I went to school, it is because it does not cultivate sufficient sense of locality and of what the particular area brought to confederation.

I suggest that federal intrusion in education to the point where unity is given a role more important than any other goal would tilt the balance very much the wrong way and remove that element of local control and expression of culture that it is so important to maintain in this country. Therefore, while I greatly sympathize with the proposal that has been put before the House today by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate, I find I cannot accept the wording of his motion since I believe federal initiative is of its essence. In the result, I would ask the House not to endorse the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Lundrigan: Call it six o'clock.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in the very few moments left to me may I simply say that from the debate on this motion this afternoon it would seem that much of what the hon. member wants to accomplish through his motion has already been accomplished, and indeed is continuing to be accomplished, by the interchange of information at the provincial level and through the financial aid that the federal government gives particularly at the university and post-secondary education level.

Speakers preceding me have said that there is a Council of Ministers of Education. However, it does not end there; there are interchanges of information, conferences and conventions of public servants engaged in the field of education as well as school boards and teachers. There is also—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOREIGN TAKEOVERS REVIEW ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR CONTROL OF FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF CANADIAN COMPANIES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-201, to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 21 and 28.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was talking about the reason behind this motion, and suggested it was the social and political situation at the present time. We do not find people throwing rocks at their own windows or at the windows of their friends. This only happens when people are upset to the point where they think in terms of political disturbance and social revolution. It is generally felt that the people who become involved in social revolution are those who have the least stake in the country. This is something with which we should concern ourselves when trying to limit ownership as far as possible to our own people. Social and political development is likely to go hand in hand with the development of a country.

Let me refer to what was said in the Financial Times of June 26 regarding the oil industry. We find this at page 12:

> At this point, Mr. Macdonald has not gone any further than to reiterate Ottawa's 1970 guidelines. Canadians are supposed to have a "substantial opportunity" to participate in ownership, engineering and construction of the line.

The article referred to the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. It goes on to state:

> Canadian engineers have no doubt that they will participate—but as managers or under sub-contract?

Perhaps I might ask whether they will participate as labourers. I continue quoting:

> "This is the critical time," says one Canadian engineer. "One job leads to another." He argues that if a U.S. engineer is named to manage the Mackenzie project, chances are the same company will get the nod for three or four more big Arctic pipeline projects being considered.

Later in the article, we find this statement:

> The engineering firm which manages the project will have enormous power in hiring, assigning sub-contracts and specifying materials and equipment. The $5 billion pipeline will generate about $250 million in engineering fees—and provide work for thousands of engineers in Canada and the U.S.

• (2010)

Logically, a project as large as the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, particularly in view of its complexity and the fact that American as well as Canadian gas and oil will move through it, can hardly avoid involving the capital and engineering skill of other nations. I am not arguing about that. I am suggesting that the Canadian content should not be too small; and further, in connection with the amendment we are proposing, that if the Canadian percentage of business in that pipeline is too small, some of the political and social adverse consequences which I discussed earlier will increase.

I think we should make an effort now to ensure that Canada's interests are adequately protected. The hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans) suggested that no longer does capital come from people who invest their money; a large portion of it comes from the sale of products on the marketplace and it is built up within companies. I suggest to the minister that he should consider greater Canadian ownership of business in this light. We might invest, through the Canada Development Corporation, in a business such as this and get some return on our investment. I am sure the Canada Development Corporation, with the credit of the Canadian government behind it, could go to the insurance companies and borrow hundreds of millions of dollars as easily as a private corporation could.

I would like to make another suggestion to the minister. If we do not decide to do it through the Canada Development Corporation, we might use the Panarctic approach to ownership by foreign corporations. Why should we give a grant of $12 million to a company that will build a pulp mill? Why should we not invest $12 million in the company and take a percentage of the profits, if any, at the time? I suggest that the effect, so far as raising capital is concerned, would be the same and that, logically, some of the ownership would go to the Canadian people if we used this approach. It seems to me that we should give more thought to this. We have given several hundred millions of dollars away in the regional development program, and especially, so far as big projects such as pulp mills and oil ventures are concerned, the government should actually invest the money rather than give grants.

I want to mention one or two other points which I think the government should well consider in connection with the matter we are discussing. I believe that there is a shortage of management training in Canada and that the government could well afford to give some encouragement in this area. This would have some effect on our political and social development in Canada. If the managers of a business are from somewhere else than Canada, if the ones who make the decisions that really count come from somewhere else, wherever this may be, the effect is detrimental. I do not think that we Canadians are any slower so far as our mentality, our intellectual capacity or our business sense are concerned. It may be that we have not had the opportunity to develop in some areas as we should, and I would like to suggest to the minister that he might consider further assistance along this line. Certainly we have some business schools in the country and perhaps we could give some aid or at least encouragement to them.

This is also important in a social sense. Small Canadian business in the Prairies is also important, and the logical thing to do would be to give them some encouragement to grow and become big business rather than encouraging some foreign owned giant to move in and take a further chunk of the Canadian economy. It seems a logical step that we might take.

I notice in sections of the Gray report some reference to joint ventures, and I have been advocating that we take a good look at this. I will not go into it in detail, but we might look at some other things. For example, we might discriminate in the sense of using government purchases from Canadian controlled firms rather than American controlled firms. We might give grants and loans only to Canadian controlled firms and we might use the tax system in favour of Canadian controlled firms. These are merely measures which might logically establish the political and social goals about which some hon. members have been speaking this afternoon.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have not taken part in this debate up to this point but I do not want to see this legislation pass without saying some of the things about it that are on my mind. We have proposed these amendments because we feel very strongly that this matter cannot be considered purely from an economic point of view. We feel very strongly that the economic, political and social wellbeing of this country is indivisible and that economics cannot be considered apart from the other two. No part of it can be separated or lost without the rest going the same way. That is why we seek to make these amendments in a determined attempt to put some bite into this toothless legislation.

[Mr. Thomson.]

Times without number this government has been warned, three times in its own reports and countless times by other thoughtful and authoritative bodies and individuals, that the extent and nature of American investment imperils Canada's economic independence, its political sovereignty and its cultural identity. But in spite of all these warnings, in spite of the growing misery, hardship and apprehension of Canadians, so many of whom are in difficulties because of the lack of a proper policy from the government, this government will simply not listen to these warnings. Instead, their ears are wide open to the siren song of continentalism, which means accepting American domination of Canada's economic, political and cultural future.

This proposal to screen foreign takeovers of Canadian companies means only some haggling over the terms by which a small fraction of U.S. capital enters Canada. It leaves untouched the whole disastrous set up by which Canada is gradually being inundated by the floodwaters of American big business, American political thinking and American cultural values. The worst of it is that the dike would hold if Canadians in the government were not perpetually weakening it from inside by poking holes through, thus enabling the flood to come all the more easily.

If this country is to be kept in one piece, we have to be masters in our own house, maîtres chez nous. This government is permitting a great and powerful neighbour to move in and lay down the pattern of living for us. This government is betraying the promise that Canada could develop as a country unique in its own way, with all kinds of possibilities and all kinds of developments which belong to this country and which we should promote ourselves. We have only to look at what is happening to see how disastrous the situation is, and this legislation will simply worsen it because it will mean nothing whatsoever and the same thing will go on increasingly.

Economically, this country has been allowed to drift into a situation where the two extremities of the country are starved for industry. On the west coast we have all kinds of good resources but for years and years our industry has been underdeveloped and we have allowed this government to go on doing this without setting up a policy to assist. Our jobs are being shipped out and with them go our incomes.

Not long ago the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) and I raised the example of a small company that had managed to produce and develop in Canada a special chainsaw which was being marketed and the market for it was growing. Then, the parent company which was controlled in the United States decided that it was not going to continue marketing that particular chainsaw and moved the operations away down to the United States. With them went the jobs and the incomes of a great many people in the region.

That is just one example of what has happened over and over again. The Maritimes at the other end of the country are not as richly endowed with natural resources as British Columbia but have a tremendous tourist potential, and there are some possibilities for industrial development. The Maritimes, however, have been in a state of economic starvation, and with the prevention of its proper development comes the starvation of the future of its young people. The history of the Maritimes has been a dismal story. Its young people have had to follow the road to Boston, then west to the prairie harvest fields, finally reaching the Pacific coast where they settled down and made a fine contribution to our west coast life.

What has been the government's answer? Its answer has been to hand out more and more money, much of it to the same corporations which have been draining the resources of both ends of the country. Talk about seeking to cure yourself with a hair of the dog that bit you! This is the government's policy, and the patient gets worse all the time. Why does this lopsided development continue? It is for the simple reason that American developers and parent companies find it much easier to come into Ontario. They do so for transportation reasons as well as for resource reasons. Because the United States finds it easier to establish branch plants in Ontario, our government tamely allows this process to continue and, as a result, the eastern and western extremities of the country are underdeveloped.

From the consumers' point of view a serious situation is threatening. We are beginning to notice that control over food and grocery products is slipping more and more into the hands of the larger chain stores. The little grocery stores that used to be on the corner of every block are dying away. As yet all the great chain stores are not American controlled or American owned, but the greatest one in western Canada is completely American owned and controlled. I refer to the Safeway chain. Canada Safeway is its single Canadian subsidiary. Safeway is the largest retail food chain in the United States west of the Mississippi. Canada Safeway, a wholly owned subsidiary, operates 263 retail outlets from the head of the Great Lakes to the Pacific region, with some in the Toronto area. Its profits increased 40 per cent in the first quarter of this year. To a considerable extent it has been responsible for the rise in food prices. We do not know just how to assign responsibility, but we do know that the chain stores are to a large extent responsible for the rise in prices. More and more the Canadian consumer is at the mercy of control exercised south of the border.

The Batten Royal Commission report in 1968, which went into the whole question of food chains and food prices in the five biggest cities on the Prairies, said this:

> Safeway is recognized to be the price leader because ... it is regarded to be the principal price cutter in every city. Its reputation as a price cutter is not based on its having the lowest prices, rather it is based on well-advertised, selective price cutting.

In every city, except Saskatoon, Safeway was the largest advertiser by far. The only reason it was not the largest in Saskatoon was that three companies under Weston control advertised jointly.

But the worst part of all is what is happening to the future of Canadian culture. We know that when economic control goes, political control will also go. Culturally the result will be disastrous for Canada. We have built up a fine mosaic tradition encompassing different peoples. At times it has been touch and go, but we have succeeded with patience and understanding. On the other side of the border there is the melting pot tradition. Every person who goes to the United States has to become a 100 per cent American, homogenized. I say that the government's lack of policy as shown in this legislation will result in the ruin of our chances to make this a new and unique country all of its own. We began by attracting people from all over the world. We all came here, whether recently or six generations ago—

Mr. McBride: Not the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand).

Mrs. MacInnis: Unless we stop this growth of domination by foreign interests, we will be lost as a country. Last March 24 when speaking to a National Executive meeting of the Canadian Jewish Congress in Toronto the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said this:

> There is no doubt that the most important single resource in this country is not its size or its physical splendours but its human resources; the persons who live here reflect in millions of ways the face of Canada and do so more accurately and effectively than any map or statistical chart. We are, in the result, a different country from any other; we have a different outlook, different attitudes, and different values. We are this because the social evolution of Canadians has not been identical to the patterns pursued, consciously or unconsciously, by other societies elsewhere. For a number of reasons there has not developed in Canada a pressure to conform and, in my view, we are the better for it. Conformity, for all its surface attraction in terms of unity and absence of misunderstanding, is a deadly influence. It eliminates individuality, it reduces brilliance to mediocrity, it grinds down personal initiative. Worse than even any of these consequences, however, is its pattern of discrimination and exclusion of those who are non-conformists.
> Canada, partly through the foresight and wisdom of our forebears a century ago, partly through chance and natural selective processes, has developed on a quite different pattern. The fabric of our society is diverse and colourful. It is also, as a result, exceedingly resilient. There has been little doubt in the minds of millions of Canadians for many years that this is a multicultural society.

I want to warn that those words of the Prime Minister will not be worth the paper they are printed on if the government does the direct opposite of what he has suggested in that passage. We shall have conformity. We shall have streamlined Canadianism. Already, we are getting to the stage in our eating habits where our national dish may well become a hot dog with potato chips, washed down by a flood of Coca-cola.

The Texas drawl in music is becoming more and more pervasive. We are not hearing as many Canadian accents in our songs. It is the same in every department of our life. I hope that those people who live in French-speaking Canada realize that if they want to preserve the individuality of that part of the country-as we all do—they will not do it by increasing American dominance and influence. That will come in, as it has in the past, through industry and then by radio and television. Soon our young people will want nothing but American radio and television broadcasts because that kind of pap is so easy and it is the sort of colourful thing that attracts young people.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very important measure we are dealing with tonight and I feel that in this regard the government is selling Canada short. Our ancestors had no notion that one day there would be a government in power that would betray the bright promise that brought them here. If we want to develop patterns of our own, it is still not too late. But if we keep on the road to continentalism we might as well shut-up shop and follow the Mississippi or any other of the rivers down which we can be sold. I want to see us develop along our own lines in a free and independent manner.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): I welcome the opportunity to speak tonight on Bill C-201 and particularly on the many amendments which have been brought forward, demonstrating that the bill was far from adequate and that it could not be expected to be well received in the House.

Opposition to the bill has been strong. We are now dealing with several amendments brought forward by the New Democratic Party, some of which I feel are fully justified because we know the bill will not settle the problem of foreign interests taking advantage of Canadians. Quite a lengthy volume has been written on the subject and we have long known that we are being taken advantage of, and the bill will not allow us to regain control over our economy.

It purports considering the situation of foreigners coming here to exploit our resources in order to determine their purpose in coming here and the consequences that might be involved.

To find out what the results of foreign takeovers are going to be is fine, but it would be much better to find a way to get back our economy. Why did we allow foreigners to take over our industries? The governments we chose for ourselves, whether grit or tory, were good governments and they ran our country for years; unfortunately, they let most of what we owned fall into foreign hands.

The number of our family businesses has been reduced to practically nothing. One after another, they feel into foreign hands. Small businesses of all kinds, including the leather shoe industry, have disappeared and were replaced by larger businesses under foreign control. The only capital that we should import, Mr. Speaker, is technological capital. If we lack technology, we can get it from some other country.

All we have to do is get organized and find the experts and staff we need to develop our industries, our general economy, and pay them accordingly. Well, this has not been done.

We have exported technology and finance based on our natural resources. Then, if foreigners have been able to finance our natural resources through techniques we know, I believe it is high time for the government to suggest financial remedies to regain control over our economy.

But this bill does not suggest anything valuable to give to Canadians the hope to become once again the masters of their economy.

We will continue to be exploited by foreigners because we lack capital. Why? Who gets the savings of the nation or the Canadian taxpayers?

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

• (2040)

First of all, the federal government through bonds, taxes and levies. And Canadian citizens even have to borrow in order to pay their taxes and levies and must besides pay the interest on the money they borrow to pay their taxes.

That is not a way to become owners of our industries, exploited and overexploited due to interest rates. In order to lend to industry, the Industrial Development Bank, which is the bank of citizens, exploit the latter by asking an interst rate of 12 per cent. Industry cannot become owner owing to the exploitation by the government itself through a bank created precisely to help.

Mr. Speaker, this is what we should read in that good-intentioned bill. However, since no solution is provided, we shall remain exploited, by both national and international financial groups.

They say that foreign investment in Canada will be carefully supervised. A few conditions will be set; for instance, a certain percentage of the shares will have to belong to Canadians, while another percentage will belong to foreigners. If Canadians have no capital on hand, how can they become shareholders?

At the present time, we do not have the necessary money to become shareholders in any industry, and the minister knows it. See what the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) had to do for industries, all of them close to bankruptcy. They are given grants with the taxpayers' money, and yet, many of them still go bankrupt, because even with government grants they cannot manufacture, produce or remain in operation. Why is that? Because the Canadian people do not have enough purchasing power to buy the production, because the goods remain unsold in the warehouses, and the warehouses are still being financed under bank formula 88, involving a 12 per cent interest rate.

In fact, a 12 per cent interest rate has to be paid to the Industrial Development Bank and to chartered banks in order to finance inventories in warehouses. And while the warehouses are bursting with goods, if the banks request payment, the industries have to sell at a loss, and then we see mass bankruptcies. Industries are unable to make ends meet because they have to sell their production at a loss.

This bill says nothing about that. It deals with control of foreign takeovers, the appointment of a commission to examine the matter. Once this has been achieved, not much more could be done. Foreigners will be told: Settle in this country just the same, since we do not have the means to finance our businesses. The manufacturer has his back to the wall when he has to reimburse the money borrowed from the Industrial Development Bank, plus interest and tax on these repayments because they are taxable. This is where nothing works anymore.

Many establishments must bo bankrupt. If not, they have to sink into debts, borrow millions and sell shares on the stock exchange. But they cannot all have recourse to the stock exchange. Only the large industries have access to it. The others cannot properly manage their undertaking; they are too heavily taxed and overtaxed; they have too much interest to pay, the cost of production is too high and they cannot sell their products. They cannot compete with foreigners, even if the minister is moving heaven and earth to find outtlets abroad. Despite all his good will and efforts, when products are too expensive it is difficult to export them.

In the booklet I have in hand, there is absolutely nothing to let us hope for any possibility of finding ways to reduce our production cost so as to enable us to export. The cost of our production must be reduced in order to enable Canadians to buy more products because, if production is too expensive, Canadians will not have the money necessary to buy it and it will stay in warehouses, financed at 12 per cent according to form 88 used by banks.

Mr. Speaker, it is impossible, in the present system, for Canadians to become owners, shareholders of industries. Yet the bill does not offer more significant benefits enabling us to develop, to become ourselves and to develop our country from a physical point of view.

Thus we are still abler to develop it from a financial point of view, but it is precisely what we do not want to do: everything which is physically possible—as is often said—should be financially feasible. If not, it is because our economy is not well administered and balanced. Therefore, we have to use the proper techniques in order to balance once more our economy so that Canadians may some day become owners.

Mr. Speaker, do our representatives have at heart the desire to assure the respect of our ethnic characteristics? I think they don't have time to ponder over that question. Several months would be needed to arrive at solutions in order to find the means and method of organizing a logical system, adapted to reality so that we may do something in the field of economy.

The bill we are now examining has weak points and shows that as much as 80 per cent of certain industries do not belong to us, being under foreign control.

It seems to me that, as a whole, close to 75 per cent of our industries are under foreign control. This subject is dealt with in the bill, but having been aware of that for a long time we learn precious little from it. If its contents had been a little different, if it had suggested something else, we certainly could have worked out some practical answers and tell our fellow citizens: We have devised a way to allow you to become the owners of your enterprise, of your business, in order that you could lead your kind of life in your own country. But there is no mention at all of it in this bill. The only thing it proposes is the right to inquire into foreign interests wishing to develop our resources.

Mr. Speaker, since we already have so much, namely universities and very advanced technological knowledge, we should be able to do without the bigger part of foreign investments.

• (2050)

Capital is the only thing lacking but we have everything to bring such capital into play. Indeed, when foreigners come here to develop this country, they know what to do with shares. They know what is a share and they are able to issue shares; that is to create capital. If they can do that, we can do it too.

Foreigners create capital with our property, our assets and our natural ressources. That capital is really created through shares based upon something that is not tangible, on nothing, and those companies thus take over our industries.

Yet, the government could enable the Canadian people to do the same thing through a simple piece of legislation that would promote their interests in ventures of that kind. It could also provide them with explanations to show them what is a company, what shares are, how they are created, but it takes great care not to do that.

We could regain that way the control of our trade and of our economy and enable Canadians to become masters of their own destiny.

A good number of industries and firms are operated by foreigners at the present time and are very hard to take back. We will have to resort to exceptional measures if we want to do so. The bill now before us does not include any solution to that problem.

I do not intend to blame in any way the government since we are glad that it has introduced this bill. Indeed, it reminds us that we are no more masters in our house. But this legislation contains nothing about the effective means to break out of this situation. We should find these effective means and it is on this point that we are focusing our efforts in order to devise the appropriate means of insuring that a low interest financial agency and a satisfactory purchasing power are available to Canadians so that our domestic market would absorb the largest possible amount of products and that we will export the leftover instead of what best we have.

Today, we export our best products and are satisfied with leftovers while this situation should be reversed. We should consume whatever best we have and export the remainder. Charity begins at home.

It is with this objective in mind that I say that this bill can settle nothing. It is, at the most, a statement of principles. I think that to extricate ourselves from this dead end, it will be necessary to publish other white papers suggesting effective solutions. We shall have to find the appropriate means to bring about the Canadian financing of our industry in the same manner as it is now being financed by foreigners, based on the same natural resources and the same guarantees.

The reason foreigners invest here and create capital is that we put up the necessary security. In fact, we put up our natural resources, and then we are happy just to work for foreigners. Today, we realize that we are not masters in our own country any more, and we deplore it.

The way to get out of this deadlock is to say to Canadians: Considering that 80 per cent of our economy is controlled by foreigners, we must wonder why, and find ways of regaining control.

If we are unable to buy back the industries which are foreign-owned at present, new developments at least should be owned by Canadians. We should issue new credit to Canadians at minimal rates of interest in order to allow them to develop their industries and trades. Thus, they could own new developments, if not older ones.

I would still have several remarks to make, but I think it will be rather difficult for us to support this bill. We also feel certain that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, one of the difficulties with this bill, which is designed to take care of the social and economic wishes of the Canadian people, is that it falls within the responsibility of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I know that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) is interested in economics; in fact, he is an expert in that field. He is also an expert in terms of his department and the language being used by modern economists in the fields of trade and finance. Therefore, he should be prepared to accept the suggestions of the previous speaker regarding this bill.

If the government decided to make loans at a very low interest rate to Canadian companies, this would probably solve the problem of American-controlled branch plants in our country. However, I do not understand this matter well enough to know whether it would accomplish what my party and the Canadian public would like to accomplish.

In introducing this bill, which is a substitute for a major screening process to eliminate the serious problem we have, the minister has come up with this minor economic solution. What bothers me is that some of the Conservatives are not speaking on the bill. In their ranks they have one of the two casualties of government attention to foreign takeover. I refer to Mr. Roman who was affected by the government's economic control of foreign takeover in the case of Denison Mines. Mr. Roman has decided to run as a Conservative candidate. I am surprised that none of his would-be colleagues are willing to point out that this bill only makes legal what happened to Mr. Roman retroactively by order in council, with limited compensation to sweeten the pie.

Therefore, I am really surprised that the Conservatives have not been speaking on this bill. Mr. Roman's economic judgment has been very successful over the years. However, either he has been badly informed or his political judgment is wrong. He is not going to find the friends he is looking for in the Conservative party.

There are only two exceptions which I can mention, Mr. Roman and Home Oil. People like Mr. Roman and all the other economic wizards in this country have been able to build up companies from nothing to a very prominent position with money they borrowed from Canadian banks in which Canadians invested their savings. Mr. Roman should be in the Liberal party. I suggest he should consider very carefully his candidacy, because obviously his friends are in the Liberal party.

It has been pointed out by members of my party that our interest in this foreign takeover bill is very widespread. We are affected in many ways other than the economic field. We believe the Canadian public is interested for other reasons. School textbooks are very important to the development of a nation. When I was a young boy I learned the story of how Laura Secord, hanging on to the tail of a cow, drove the cow home through enemy lines. That was a much better story than they are telling now about the glorious stars and stripes, how it has stood forever and how God is on the side of the American soldier no matter against whom the battle might be. In any case, these stories are the fabric which makes up a nation and which, in the end, enables people to stand up for something which they and I believe to be worth while, the Canadian fact, the fact of this nation extending from east to west and north to south.

We should have been most concerned when we lost our major publishing company. But no. This government did not take any stand. The government in Toronto did not take a stand. The only time they take a stand is when the economy is being hurt. Some may ask, what about the uranium industry? Mr. Speaker, they were not interested in preserving that industry for Canada.

We have allowed the manufacture of napalm, we have allowed the manufacture of materials used in germ warfare, we have allowed the manufacture of destructive chemicals to be used in Viet Nam. Everyone knows about that. So they were not interested in the possible misuse of uranium. They were interested in retaining control of uranium because a whole Canadian industry, through the CANDU atomic reactor, is based on uranium and if the Americans were to control uranium, then instead of being able to use the heavy water method of producing atomic energy, and hence electrical energy, we would be obliged to use enriched uranium and follow the methods used by other countries.

This government is interested only in economics. I do not go so far as the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan) who says all economists are crazy; I just think most of them are. Two minutes ago we listened to a very learned gentleman talking about pure economics. I believe that anyone who talks about the situation affecting a nation in terms of pure economics, in terms of profit and loss, is missing the point altogether. The fact that an operation is being run economically by a Canadian is no better, really, than its being run economically by a foreigner. In addition to economic advantages there is the national interest as a whole to be considered. I believe that the social benefit, the cultural benefit is almost as important as whether an enterprise is successful. Perhaps it is more important.

In the past, when making decisions connected with our development we have often cited economic benefit as our justification. The entrepreneurs, the capitalists hitched their wagons to the Calvanistic principle which has been adopted by Canadians for so many years that work, any work, is good. Work being good, they said, it should be paid for at the highest possible rate and so should everything else. Through this reasoning they reached the conclusion that whatever was done, if it made money it was successful. It was also godly and it was good. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the old adage in the Li'l Abner strip that what is good for General Bullmoose, or General Motors, is good for the nation is not a good concept.

I had the opportunity this week of meeting a large number of young people who were not at all interested in the work-money-success ethic. They were not convinced it was a proper ethic to live by. They expressed the opinion that they were on earth to be their brothers' keepers and that it was not good enough for them to make a success as General Bullmoose did; it was necessary for everyone else to achieve a measure of success or they themselves were not truly successful. So I say it is not good enough in this legislation to perpetuate the myth which has grown up in this country, that the only thing which matters is money, that money is success and that this kind of success is the criterion of worth.

My party has suggested other criteria. They are not new; in fact, they derive from the first sentence of the bill before us. If we read it, we find the minister is talking there about the national good. We agree with him that this should be one of the criteria. But the minister knows, of course, that he only put that sentence in for window-dressing. It is the preamble. When we get down to the clauses which are capable of putting it into effect, we find nothing. But we shall add it to where it counts, that is, to a number of clauses. If these criteria are accepted, the minister will find considerable support among the young people of Canada and among many of us in this quarter of the House. If not, we shall be confirmed in our notion that we are dealing only with a piece of window-dressing.

We all realize that when we talk about recovering control of the Canadian economy we are bound in practice to take into consideration the state of development of the people we represent. We have to take into consideration, obviously, the present state of the economy, the fact that in the main a dozen companies control most of our wealth. At one time, the old CCF party put out a pamphlet which was widely read. It certainly made a lasting impression on me. It said that 100 people owned Canada. I suppose, the nearest one could get to knowing who, would be to look at the list of directors in this country who have 50 or more directorships in their name.

I think of companies like A.T and T in the United States which indirectly control many companies in Canada but in which, strange as it may seem, they own practically no stock. Over other companies, of course, they exercise direct control. I think of Bell Telephone whose representatives have appeared before us many times. They have drawn attention to the great number of people who own shares in Bell Telephone Company, yet it is very odd that the company should have exactly the same structure as the Bell company in the United States.

In a situation as complex as this, it is very hard to say with certainty that the 200 companies represented at Liberal party meetings are those which control the country. If members of the Liberal party believe they do, they may be fooling themselves. These are the ones who show, the ones that come to the surface. I suppose there are other companies which exercise a far greater measure of control though in a complex and devious way. For example, we have the interlocking directorship where one director tells another, both of whom represent large interests, to move A to B while he moves C to D so they both get an advantage from E.

That is the kind of control that is not affected economically but is affected in terms of the political or social desires of the Canadian people. We know when a company does something considered anti-social, something that is not in the interests of the people in the area or in the interests of the country itself. Today we see another company declaring it will not produce a certain commodity and for no particular reason.

If an economic calamity occurs in the United States, which is not unlikely, it seems to me that we will be heading for another financial showdown internationally. If the United States once more decides it has been unfairly treated by other countries, as it did when it imposed the surcharge, it may take further financial action and the iceberg which is mostly submerged will rise and give a great deal more exposure. It may decide that some of the industries of this country which are both economically and socially desirable in the area should be repatriated to the United States, in which case Canada would not have to decide to screen the process. Instead, we will have to decide on the political and social implications of such a situation.

As another example, if General Motors of the United States decided to close down the General Motors plant at Oshawa, which supplies cars more cheaply to the United States than the United States can produce them, and if the same move is duplicated by other companies, as apparently it is being duplicated today, then Canada will have to make a decision that has nothing to do with economics; the decision will be a political and social one.

I am not suggesting that this would be of advantage. I am sure most people in this country are not prepared to face that circumstance, no matter the control retained over Canadian industry by other countries. After all, Canadians have been provided with a high standard of living and have always been aware of the economic situation. I think of the Spruce Falls mill in Kapuskasing owned by the New York Times, a foreign-controlled company that has made an effort to do better than most Canadian-controlled companies. Even the minister who presented the Gray report, probably economically as reactionary as anyone in the House, indicated that there were five or six fields in which even the minimum policy of the Liberal government will have to apply. Yet we find this bill applying to one limited field only, the easiest of all to attack, namely, the field of economics; and it is being applied in a way that legalizes what the government has had to do twice previously.

If the government really wants to take a step forward in the field of foreign ownership, it will accept these amendments which indicate only that political and social implications should be part of the decisions that are taken.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have been following this debate since eleven o'clock this morning and once again the House of Commons finds itself in its classic stance. We have a party on one side saying that the government is going too far, and a party on the other side saying that the government is not going far enough.

Mr. Benjamin: The other party quit early.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): In the process of saying too much and saying too little, the democratic process is breaking down and nothing gets done. We have been here since eleven o'clock this morning debating the first of 32 amendments. Hon. members on the other side have had most of the day to make their points.

Mr. Benjamin: Where have you been all day?

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): I have been here listening to the things your party said. They were not worth listening to but I listened nevertheless, and I think now I should have an opportunity to make my remarks.

Mr. Benjamin: Then get off this nonsense about democracy.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): As I was saying, we have been debating the first of 32 amendments today and have yet to bring a single one of them to a vote. Speaker after speaker has been talking about some very heart-warming subjects, most of which having nothing to do with the amendments let alone the bill. This is one of those occasions when opposition members talk out their own amendments. There has been the suggestion by opposition members that they have the right to do this since they claim there has not been enough time to discuss foreign ownership in Canada, or takeovers.

Mr. Benjamin: That is right.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): I suggest that that is a complete fallacy. The subject is well known to Canadians. Now a great deal of study was given the bill by the committee, which interviewed 11 groups of witnesses from across Canada representing thousands of members. The committee held 18 separate meetings involving 33½ hours of study. Some 65 witnesses attended the meetings of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

I suggest that this amounts to a very full discussion and that members of all parties have had a full opportunity to express their views. The subject matter of the amendments before the House today are almost entirely the same as those debated very fully in the committee. They have been brought back again, I do not know why. It is the right of members to do so, but I suggest that is not the way to facilitate the passage of legislation through this House.

Today we have listened to members giving the House lectures on first year university economics and quotations from Adam Smith, Hobbs and Locke. We have had debates about research and development which have nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. Fairweather: Read the bill and you will see.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): We have had speeches about the laying of the CPR tracks across Canada, which we all hailed many generations ago as a great accomplishment. We have discussed banks financing takeovers in Canada, despite the fact that the subject was thoroughly discussed in committee, where it was pointed out that Canadian banks do not finance any significant number of foreign takeovers in this country. I think it is important to correct this sort of misinformation that is circulated through the House.

• (2120)

The president of the Canadian Bankers Association used the word "piffling" when describing the amount of money banks put up to finance foreign takeovers. Subsequently, in a letter in the press he indicated that a tally had shown that banks in Canada and other financial institutions supplied about 9 per cent of takeover money in Canada and only a small part of this was supplied by the banks. He said that much of this is temporary money used for roll-over purposes in the course of takeovers in Canada. When hon. members repeat this over and over again, as it was repeated again this evening by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), making the same erroneous point, I think it is important that it be cleared up once again.

I may say I was impressed by the eloquence of the hon. member for Timiskaming. He talked so much about the social and political aspects which should be in the bill that I thought for a minute he was going to suggest we add religious convictions as a subject to the bill.

An hon. Member: That might help.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): We have been told that the bill is a eunuch and does nothing, yet we have an NDP amendment which suggests that the bill should be made retroactive. I should like to ask hon. members what the logic of such action would be. They say the bill is no good, yet they want to make it retroactive.

An hon. Member: Don't confuse them with logic.

Mr. Fairweather: A retroactive eunuch would be very interesting.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): An experienced eunuch or a kind of unique eunuch.

Mr. Fairweather: At least he would have his memories.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): We have had other repetitions of erroneous ideas this afternoon. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) talked about a second shoe. This matter was cleared up by the minister at committee meetings and reported. I refer hon. members to the report of the committee meeting on June 9 at which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) said:

> There has been a bit of confusion on that subject and my friend Mr. Burton will remember that when Mr. Brewin was speaking in the House, Friday last he referred to a statement that the Prime Minister had made, to the effect that we had nothing else up our sleeve, or something of that kind. At that point, I interrupted—this is in Hansard—and said "With respect to screening". I am quite sure that when the Prime Minister said that we do not have anything else up our sleeve, he was referring to screening. I checked that with him and that was his interpretation.

I do not think it helps the people of Canada when they listen to reports from this House and hear members repeating over and over again the suggestion that this government or governments in the future will never do anything else about foreign takeovers or about foreign ownership in Canada, because those matters are undoubtedly the subject of continuing interest to the people of Canada and will be to governments which serve in this House of Commons.

I want to say something about the suggestion of the hon. member for Assiniboia that the government has not listened to any of the suggestions made by those who appeared before the committee or to any opposition amendments, and the government has been completely adamant on this subject. Let me remind the hon. member that the Committee for an Independent Canada suggested there should be a change in the presumption level. The Hon. Walter Gordon, who spoke as a representative of the Committee for an Independent Canada, came before the committee and made the representation, among others, that the percentage levels at which presumption of foreign ownership should be considered and screened should be raised. We had an amendment before the committee which would allow for that. I refer to the amendment to clause 3(2) which deals specifically with that point.

An hon. Member: That is another proposal which is half pregnant.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): There were proposals from the provinces in Canada gleaned from a discussion between the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) and the provincial governments across Canada that there should be better machinery for consultation with the provinces. There was an amendment included to allow for that provision. I find it strange indeed that members of the NDP should try to prevent the government taking action in the area of direct foreign investment.

An hon. Member: Stick to the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I remind the parliamentary secretary that his remarks are perhaps a little away from the amendment before us. He himself commented about other speakers not keeping to the amendment. He should try to keep his remarks relevant.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, in keeping to the subject of the bill, if I am to reply to hon. members who themselves did not refer to the bill or the amendment, I shall find it difficult to make comments of specific relevance. At any rate, I am very close to concluding my remarks.

I was saying that it is very strange the NDP should try to prevent government action in the area of direct foreign investment in order to bring about substantial benefits to Canada. I thought about this today as I listened to the debate, and concluded that there are only two possible reasons that party could have for adopting such a course of action. The first is that they have involved themselves so much in the airy-fairy world of political theories they must devise some kind of policy to fit those esoteric theories. The only other alternative I can think of is that this is sheer political opportunism on their part.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): I realize that this thought is furthest from their minds and it is a shame I should even suggest such a thing. However, the NDP has talked about many lofty objectives. These hon. members have talked about many things, but because they have talked so much they have clearly shown they want to continue to talk, but do nothing.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to my colleague from British Columbia, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard), chide the members of this party for having taken some time to consider the subject of clause 2 of the bill. At the outset of his remarks he made some rather high-sounding references to the maintenance of democracy and that sort of thing, and suggested that this subject matter had been fully discussed.

I am not quite sure what he meant when he was referring to the subject matter, but it came to my mind that if he was talking about concern for the survival of Canada as an independent economic, political, social and cultural entity, there has been quite a bit of discussion on this topic over a period of time. In fact, I was reminded that some time ago my first year essay—I think the hon. member made some reference to academic discourse—as a freshman student at the University of British Columbia, was entitled "The Americanization of Canadian life", or words to that effect.

It is true to say that both before and since the time I wrote that essay, this issue has been a matter of concern to many Canadian people. Unfortunately, it does not appear to have been a very great concern to most governments which have been in power in Canada since that day in my youth when I wrote the essay. I am sorry that I do not have it with me and cannot read it into the record.

If one were to put the subject matter of the hon. member's remarks into the context of the current Parliament, and remembered in so doing that he speaks as a member who supports the government of the day, who serves as parliamentary secretary to one of the ministers of the Crown in the cabinet, one would realize that it ill behooves him to talk about lengthy debate and discussion on this subject, particularly with reference to any government proposals on the matter. To put it mildly, the hon. member has a lot of gall to complain that the day has been spent on the consideration of this bill in what, probably, is the final session of this Parliament, in light of the fact that the government he supports has sat on its fanny for the last four years and has done absolutely nothing about the problem.

I do not need to remind the hon. member, surely, because he does spend some time in the House, that the members of this party have persistently during every session of this Parliament questioned the government about when they would be prepared to follow through some of the indications of action that they tried to give the Canadian people during the last general election. We waited in vain until finally we received this poor excuse for a bill which, the hon. member suggests, represents the government taking important action on a question that many people have said in many different ways is at the very heart of Canadian confederation from its start until today.

If I, as a young Canadian student attending his first year at university, was concerned about this matter and if, as someone who has taken some interest in the affairs of his country over a period of time since then, have seen year in and year out with this government and that government in power the continued erosion of the ability of the Canadian people to control their own destiny because governments appeared to be unconcerned, then I suggest that as any member who gives any serious thought to this matter I would recognize that when we have an opportunity to debate this question it is worth spending a little time and a little thought on it before we move to passing the government's proposals.

What is the clause of the bill that we have before us, and what is the amendment that is under consideration? The proposal which has been put forward by one of my colleagues says, in effect, that Canadians should be concerned, if we are to survive as a nation worthy of the name, about something more than simply our economic environment in the narrow sense of that term. Surely no one can quarrel with that idea.

Mr. Pepin: No one does.

Mr. Barnett: In the context of this clause of the bill I would suggest that the amendment is more than appropriate. I have been reading and rereading it rather carefully in the context of the title of the bill. I am reminded of something I said in one of the committees of the House the other day. We were considering the preamble of that bill, and the preamble was a rather high-sounding declaration. As a matter of fact, it was much more verbose in its wording than this one, and perhaps less meaningful.

I think that if one analyses this clause of the bill in relation to the generally accepted practice in legislation, all the bill is, in effect, is a preamble. Apart from anything else, I for one regret that instead of enacting legislation which deals with the meat of the matter we seem to be moving to the point of putting this sort of wordy declaration of purpose in the preamble of a bill like this, rather than putting it into the text of the bill, as if it really lent some substance and weight to the thrust of the legislation.

As I read this clause, one could argue that it is hardly worth trying to amend it, because I do not think it really means very much anyway. But if we are to have this kind of wording in a bill, if we are to continue what in the committee I referred to as a Pickersgillian fad, referring to the fact that it was the so-called new transportation act produced by the former member for Bonavista-Twillingate when he was minister of transport that seemed to start the trend of putting a lot of high-sounding words at the beginning of proposed new law, then we might as well make it a reasonably all-embracing statement of purpose.

In that context we must be concerned with much more than the mere matter of the economic environment. We should make it clear that what happens to the economic environment has a direct and lasting effect on our political and social environment. How can it be otherwise? So if it is expedient to have an act, and if it is expedient to state in rather lengthy terms its purpose, then I suggest, as my colleagues are suggesting, that we should set our horizons beyond the narrow economic context of the impact of this legislation, whatever it may be.

The bill, entitled "Foreign Takeovers Review Act" as well as the clauses set some terms and conditions under which the government will have the authority to make certain reviews. The pros and cons of those proposals can be debated under other report stage amendments when we come to them. But in the context of clause 2 of the bill I suggest that the House cannot do less than indicate that the purpose of the legislation goes beyond a mere economic review of the consequences of foreign ownership and of takeovers in Canada. In certain special pieces of legislation we have recognized that if we are to preserve ourselves as a nation worthy of the name, broader aspects than purely economic ones are involved.

I cannot understand the reluctance of the minister and of his supporters to agree to a rather simple, straightforward proposition that economics alone is not of sufficient concern, is not a sufficiently broad yardstick by which to assess the impact of takeovers. One might almost become biblical about this and remind hon. members of the saying about man not living by bread alone. It seems to me that particular reference is well taken in the context of what is proposed in this clause of the bill.

The whole ambit of subject matter that comes before Parliament from time to time becomes increasingly meaningless and our very existence as a Parliament becomes increasingly meaningless if we are prepared to allow the ever increasing erosion of our economic, social and political fabric by the process that has been going on, certainly at an accelerated rate since I first became a member of this House.

I used to think that the government headed by former prime minister St. Laurent was rather heedless of the consequences of what was happening in our economy. But when I contrast the attitudes that were taken by leading members of that government with those taken by members of the present government, from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) down, I feel that in that particular period we were led by a government that was prepared staunchly to defend, protect and enhance the rights of Canadians to control their own affairs.

I recall with some nostalgia the kind of statements I used to listen to, made by Right Hon. C. D. Howe, when he talked about the dangers to Canada if we allowed the export of power, and some of the speeches he made when discussing the necessity of ensuring an all-Canadian itinerary for the transport of gas. Even though those of us in this party quarrelled vigorously with him on the method he sought to employ to bring about that objective, nevertheless on the objective itself we had a great deal of common ground.

When I contrast the attitudes that were expressed then by those who were supposed to be the leading defenders of Canada and Canada's rights, and think of the insipid, waffling, almost hysterical yielding to the process that is going on and is characterized by the present government, then so far as Canadian governments are concerned I feel we have been going downhill at a rather rapid pace. Indeed, in that context I would say that the Liberal party of 1953 to 1957 was much more worthy of the name Liberal than its counterpart today, even though I may have been pretty critical at the time of some of the things that government did.

They say that all things in life are a matter of contrast and comparison. I do not mind admitting that I have been around here long enough to have some perspective on the attitudes and viewpoints expressed by cabinet ministers in the discharge of their governmental responsibilities. More is the pity that in this day and age, when the dangers to the future of Canada are more glaringly apparent, we find ourselves with a government which after all these years of moaning and groaning has brought forth, for the consideration of Parliament, nothing better than this bill.

I would suggest to the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary and his colleagues that he accept, with a little better grace than was apparent in his speech tonight, the fact that at least some of us are prepared to stand up and be counted on the issue of really doing something effective to protect the integrity and the future of our Canadian way of life. For a brief period I was domiciled outside Canada. I was a landed immigrant in another country. But as a young man I made the choice that I wanted to come back to the Canada where I was born, because I felt there was something valuable and worth while in being Canadian, that ours was a society which in some respects was different and unique, where I could feel at home, and I wanted to play my part in preserving and enhancing it.

This is a responsibility that any member of the House should take even more seriously than does the Canadian who has no responsibilities beyond those of an ordinary private citizen. This is the place where we should be in the forefront of building a future for Canada. This is the place where some of us hoped—the present Parliament—real steps would be taken to enhance and protect the future of Canada. So far, Mr. Speaker, we have hoped in vain. So far we have been faced with a weak and insipid piece of legislation. If one reads this particular clause as it stands, it does nothing more than hold out false hopes for the Canadian people for something that has no substance and reality. I would suggest the least that could be done in the context of this clause would be to accept the attempt made by my colleagues to strengthen and broaden its intended purpose.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, rising so late in the evening, when there may be a vote, presents quite a dilemma because I would like to say one or two things about the progress of this debate. But I also hope there will be a vote tonight and because of that hope I will try to confine my remarks to less than two minutes.

I think it is quite unfair to accuse the opposition of obstructionism in the debate on this bill. For example, in the committee where this bill was discussed there was a tremendous amount of co-operation. In fact, if there had not been co-operation the bill would not be back in the House today. Those of us who want this bill should be grateful for the co-operation we received. Talking about the progress of this debate today, again I do not think there has been obstruction. But we come to the other question of whether there has been the kind of co-operation that is required to get the bill through the House in the time that all of us see is available.

I am rising to urge all members to show the kind of co-operation that was evident when the bill proceeded through committee. There has been a lot of debate to the effect that foreign ownership is a big question; foreign takeovers are a big question. But as I see it, the question is whether we are going to debate it or do something about it.

An hon. Member: There is nothing in the bill to do anything about.

Mr. Kaplan: We have a chance to do something about it and I hope that all members who are in favour of the foreign ownership policy will see this bill as a step in that direction. For a moment I should like to dwell on an argument raised by the Committee for an Independent Canada when it appeared before our committee. I hope that none of the presentation of that committee on this particular aspect has been adopted by any hon. member opposite. They took the position that this bill, which moved in the right direction, moved so little that it was their duty to obstruct it, to prevent the country from deriving some little benefit so that there would be damage to Canada in terms of more takeovers or foreign ownership so that the government would have—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has referred to obstruction from members on this side of the House, the opposition and the particular stand they may or may not have taken on the Canada-First Committee. My point of order arises from the action taken in the committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs when the chairman, the hon. member who just sat down, saw fit to take upon himself the authority to rule on his own questions and in this way stop the action of any other committee member. Any chairman who takes over a committee and refuses to accept a point of order, and as chairman rules on his own decisions, does not make it a worth-while committee.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I think it is a kind of anarchist point of view to say that we bring about big progress by preventing little progress. I want to conclude by saying that I hope that is not the spirit in which members of the opposition approach this bill, and that they will see this as little progress which is worth making and progress which they should support.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the House ready for the question on motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 21 and 28?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motions stands deferred.

Motion No. 4, moved by Mr. Fairweather and seconded by Mr. Hales, is as follows:

That Bill C-201, an act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, be amended by deleting lines 24 to 27 on page 2 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"dustries in Canada;

(e) the compatibility of the acquisition with national industrial and economic policies; and

(f) after consultation by the minister with each province that is likely to be significantly affected by an assessment made by him pursuant to section 6, the effect of the acquisition on the industrial and economic policies of each such province.

Motion No. 18, moved by Mr. Saltsman and seconded by Mr. Knowles, is as follows:

That Bill C-201, an act to provide for the review and assessment of acquisitions of control of Canadian business enterprises by certain persons, be amended by renumbering present clause 6 as clause "6(1)" and adding the following immediately thereafter:

"(2) In conducting a review the minister shall consult with the appointed representative of the province or provinces concerned with the proposed acquisition."

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, surely obstruction cannot be charged, with only three minutes to go! The purpose of my amendment is to add another factor to the series of tests that the minister must apply in judging whether a proposed takeover is of significant benefit to Canada. I hope that members will quickly see the point of the suggestion which I make. The provincial realities, and I think it is right to say provincial priorities, will be a significant aspect. It is difficult when the minister uses the word "factor", because now that word will take on a very special meaning of jurisprudence, so I shall have to stop using it and start using the word "aspect" for the purpose of making a general comment.

My amendment recognizes the fact of provincial realities and priorities. I sincerely believe that it improves the bill and I have the temerity to hope that the government will accept it. I do not have any pride of ownership, and if the minister wants to make it his own, or the parliamentary secretary or the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan), I will bow out and make way for them.

With great good sense, an editorial in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of June 26 reads:

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger).]

Provinces have rights too:

The federal government should think twice about its decision that it cannot accommodate requests by provincial governments for more formal consultation when Ottawa is deciding whether to approve foreign takeovers.

The flat rejection of provincial participation in the decision-making process, spelled out in the commons by industry minister Jean-Luc Pepin, discriminates against the rights of the provinces and affords them precious little protection against further discrimination in the manner in which federal authority may be influenced.

Where, for instance, does unilateral approval by the federal government leave a province such as Nova Scotia in respect of a foreign takeover of a company in this province which the government of Nova Scotia considers not to be in best interests of its people?

That is why I am delighted that the minister sees the point and will add my amendment to his list of "factors".

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC SERVICE—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF PETITION OF HERMAN WEISZ ALLEGING INJUSTICE

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, on June 6, I presented in this House, in accordance with Standing Order 67, a petition by one Dr. Herman Weisz of Ottawa which sets out a grievance in respect of a report entitled "Concentration in the manufacturing industries of Canada". On June 7 the Clerk of the House laid upon the table the report of the Clerk of Petitions which was that this petition met the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form. On the same day the Speaker gave a ruling that the petition was not an appropriate manner in which to bring the matter to the attention of the House. This ruling said, in effect, that petitions to the House have become obsolete.

I regret this ruling in light of the long-standing right of citizens to present petitions to this House, and I hope that the appropriate committee of the House will investigate ways and means of reviewing this ancient and healthy institution so that the petitions of citizens, proper in form, may be referred by the consent of the House to appropriate committees for investigation and remedy. The Speaker did suggest that other remedies existed for those who had grievances against the administration. I now avail myself of one of these remedies.

On June 7, I questioned the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on the matter, seeking a statement from him or from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras) in regard to the serious injustice alleged by Dr. Herman Weisz. No such statement has been forthcoming.

• (2200)

The grievance, Mr. Speaker, can be briefly and simply stated. It is that Dr. Herman Weisz, a Canadian citizen and a public servant, spent nearly two years, from February, 1967, to December, 1968, in charge of a study conducted by the research branch of the office of the Director of Investigation and Research; that he contributed original concepts to the work; that when the study was virtually completed in December, 1968, he was taken off the work and the final completion of it was assigned to another; and that when, after various delays, the report entitled "Concentration in the manufacturing industries of Canada" was transmitted to the minister for publication, it was stated in the letter of transmittal which was the foreword to the published report that the report was prepared by Mr. R. S. Khemani under the direction of Mr. J. William Morrow, neither of whom had made more than a minor contribution to the report.

The preface to the report is therefore wrong. It is, clearly, contrary to the facts. It failed to give credit to Dr. Weisz for his part in it and involved, in effect, the appropriation of the original work of Dr. Weisz. It is, therefore, damaging to his reputation and to any public recognition and, under the merit system of the public service, this constitutes a grave injustice to him.

I ask the minister or his representative to give an explanation of this injustice in the public administration and to tell the House what will be done to remedy it. I believe that one of the valuable contributions of this House is calling public attention to injustice in the public service, injustice to which those responsible in the government have turned a blind eye.

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the report with which we are dealing is entitled "Concentration in the manufacturing industries of Canada." It was published under the authority of the former minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, now Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford).

In submitting the report to the minister, D. H. W. Henry, the combines director, wrote the following letter of transmittal:

Ottawa, March 31, 1971.

The Honourable Ron Basford, P.C., M.P.,

Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs,

Ottawa.

Sir:

I have the honour to transmit to you the text of a report entitled: "Concentration in the manufacturing industries of Canada".

Special tabulations essential to the study were prepared by the manufacturing and primary industries division, Dominion Bureau of Statistics, Ottawa, whose assistance is gratefully acknowledged. Professor Gideon Rosenbluth of the University of British Columbia made helpful comments upon a draft outline of the report.

The report was prepared in the research branch by Mr. R. S. Khemani—

Mr. Brewin: That is not true.

Mr. Tolmie:

—under the direction of Mr. J. William Morrow—

Mr. Brewin: That is not true.

Mr. Tolmie:

—and with the assistance of other members of the staff.

Yours very truly,

D.H.W. Henry
Director of Investigation and Research,
Combines Investigation Act

Mr. Brewin: It was a false report.

Mr. Tolmie: In essence, it was stated that the report was prepared in the research branch by Mr. Khemani under Mr. Morrow's direction and with the assistance of other members of the research branch staff. Mr. Weisz was not singled out for special mention.

A petition under Standing Order 70 from Mr. Weisz was presented to the House on June 6 last and Mr. Speaker ruled that the House should not deal with the matter since there were other and more effective ways in which this could be done.

The situation is that the supervisors of Mr. Weisz and, in particular, the combines director, Mr. Henry, did not consider that the contribution which Mr. Weisz made to the report warranted his being singled out for special mention in the letter of transmittal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter.)

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—ARGENTIA TASK FORCE—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on February 13, 1970, the United States government announced its intention to curtail operations at its naval station in Argentia, Newfoundland. Immediately following the United States government's announcement, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) issued a statement on behalf of the federal government at which time he pledged the efforts of all federal government departments to determine what possible use could be made of any available station buildings, as well as to find solutions to the serious social and economic problems that would result from the base phase-down. Following subsequent meetings between the Minister of Transport and representatives of the Placentia area, a Canada-United States committee was formed. It was later designated as the Argentia task force. This task force was headed by an official of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion here in Ottawa, Mr. Garnet Page.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to members of the local development associations in the area, in particular the members of the Placentia area development association under the chairmanship of Mr. John Whalen. Mr. Whalen and his local committee, together with the mayors and members of the town councils in the area, have worked with a dedication that is without parallel and, I might add, without remuneration. Indeed, credit for what has taken place in the area in the past two years must go to these people.

With respect to the official committee appointed by the federal government, namely, the Argentia task force, it has been a miserable flop—mere window-dressing for the ineptitude of the federal government and the former Liberal government of Newfoundland. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the last meeting of the so-called Argentia task force was in June, 1971, more than a year ago. The last report submitted by the chairman of the task force was on April 28, 1971, and but for the fact that Mr. Page was summoned to appear as a witness before the Standing Committee on Regional Development on that date, April 28, 1971, I am confident that no report would have been submitted at that time.

I have no doubt that the minister in his reply tonight will paint a very glowing picture of the task force and the vast improvements that have come about as a result of its performance over the past two years. He will tell the House of the number of jobs that have been created in Castle Hill historic park, the vocational training school, the tourist chalet and the upgrading of the road to Long Harbour. But the truth of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that less than a dozen full-time jobs have been created by the federal government or through the efforts of their task force.

The federal government's reaction to the very serious problems that exist in the area as a result of the naval station phase-down is another blatant example of the government's band-aid policy, a temporary cure for the very serious social and economic problems that are prevalent in the Placentia area. It is a little ironic, Mr. Speaker, that despite the promise that was contained in the Minister of Transport's statement back in 1970 with respect to the abandoned facilities at the United States naval station, with one exception they still remain vacant. No new industries have established in the area and no real effort has been made by the Argentia task force or the federal government to offer any worth-while incentives to companies who have expressed an interest in the area.

The overcrowding of classrooms in the area continues to become more acute despite the commitment made by the task force chairman at its last meeting that he would address himself to that problem and would leave no stone unturned to find a solution. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, as a result of the federal-provincial resettlement program in Newfoundland, which encouraged more than 200 families to relocate in the Placentia area, an impossible burden has been placed on existing school facilities, a burden which is beyond the capacity of the school board to overcome and, I might add, has been a serious detriment to the other areas within the jurisdiction of the school board where adequate classroom and other facilities are lacking.

The time has come for action. Unless the Argentia task force and its chairman are willing and able to tackle the many and varied problems in the area, it should be abolished and replaced with a more aggressive body. The unemployed men and women in the Placentia area can ill afford the luxury of a high-sounding federal task force that lacks a full time director and secretariat, which meets less than once a year, which has a chairman who has not visited the area for over a year and who has not submitted a report in 16 months.

We want action. We want it immediately. We want to know what the government's policy is with respect to DREE grants to companies which express an interest in setting up operations in one of the United States government's abandoned buildings. We want a full-fledged development corporation established which would take as its prime objective that of negotiating with the United States government, through the Department of External Affairs, a satisfactory arrangement with respect to the future use of the buildings on the base abandoned by the United States. It is inconceivable that no real effort has been made by the Argentia task force or the federal government to negotiate with the United States government a more satisfactory arrangement with respect to these facilities.

I understand that at the present time occupancy of these buildings, which in most cases are ideally suited for private enterprise, is on a tenure of anywhere from one year to 30 days. We want the federal government to designate the entire Placentia area as a special area under DREE. We want assistance from the federal government to help overcome the very serious overcrowding in our schools. We want the federal government, under DREE, to concern itself with the need for improved municipal infrastructure in the area, thereby creating a healthier climate in which to encourage the private sector to establish.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, we want the federal government to accept its responsibility to the people of the Placentia area who continue to suffer the misery of unemployment and of not knowing what the future holds for them or if, indeed, they have a future.

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the task force has prepared a number of reports and these have been transmitted to the minister. With the concurrence of the provincial government, a last meeting of the Argentia task force has been scheduled for July 6. After this meeting a final report on the results of the work of the task force will be prepared. The minister will be pleased to table this report when it becomes available.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY—WHITE LAKE DOMINION RADIO ASTROPHYSICAL OBSERVATORY

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) what steps the department was taking to protect the valuable scientific work being done by the Dominion Radio Astrophysical Observatory at Penticton. Mr. Speaker suggested that the matter be raised at this time, and I welcome the opportunity to expand on this important scientific project.

On June 14 I moved a motion in the House that the question of the observatory and the severe damage which would result to its outstanding research facilities in the event of encroachment on its land by subdivisions be referred to the appropriate standing committee for study and report. Unfortunately, the motion did not receive the necessary unanimous agreement.

A brief background description of the project should come first. This radio astrophysical observatory is about a 20-minute drive south from Penticton. It is situated on a quiet site which was chosen after a great deal of searching, because it was about as far south in Canada as it could be located. It is near a settled area, one of the few in all Canada which is perfectly suitable for this type of scientific work. It is free from almost all types of electrical interference, and this is an absolute necessity having regard to the type of scientific research being undertaken. The site is acknowledged as one of the best in the world for radio astrophysical observations. Canadians have an investment in it of close to $3 million, although it would be worth much more in terms of today's values. The annual staff payroll is close to $200,000.

The research work has been recognized and commended by leading researchers in many countries. In May of 1971 it received the following commendation from the National Committee for Canada of the International Astronomical Union:

> Those members of the committee who are not engaged in long baseline work wish to extend their heartiest congratulations to the long baseline team of Messrs. Broters, Chisholm, Galt, Gush, Legg, Locke, McLeish, Richards and you on their award last month of the Rumford medal of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Such high recognition of Canadian research in astronomy brings honour to the nation and underlines the success of co-operation among institutions for astronomical projects.

The future of this site and its research potential is in serious danger from possible land development projects in the area. To date the federal government has done nothing to protect the observatory from this danger. I understand that any electrical appliances in the area would ruin the work being done, and appliances in the area would ruin the work being done, and appliances do come to the area when homes are built.

There are several solutions. At present the Okanagan-Simikameen regional district has rejected one proposed development. Other developments are pending. It has, however, warned the federal government by resolution that it will not be put in the position in coming years of defending the observatory. The federal government could buy up sufficient property to protect this project, but this has been rejected by the minister.

I feel that the federal government should approach the provincial government with a view to having the area set aside as a game preserve or for park purposes. Perhaps even some other solution can be worked out. In any event, there is immediate and pressing need for federal government action and I urge the minister to look into the matter again without delay. We can have both an outstanding research facility and a recreational area. Both could be a credit to the district, to the province and to the nation. I trust we can agree upon an early and favourable solution to protect this valuable scientific installation.

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the site of the Dominion Radio Astrophysical Observatory near Penticton, British Columbia, was chosen about 15 years ago for its freedom from man-made radio interference, a requirement for the detection and study of the extremely weak radio signals from astronomical objects. Considerable land was acquired at that time and the government of British Columbia, by order in council, placed a map reserve on all Crown land within a much larger buffer zone surrounding the site. Because of the nature of the countryside it was believed then that these actions would ensure the usefulness of the site for a very long time. In particular, it was not envisaged that large-scale housing developments would ever be built in the region. The government of Canada was, therefore, concerned when it learned that two such developments were being proposed on privately held land within the buffer zone.

The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) has made known the government's position on this matter. On several occasions he has expressed the view that the purchase, or the expropriation now of an area large enough to protect the observatory is not a proper solution to this problem. I understand the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard) has made numerous representations on this question. In a letter of April 27, 1972, to Mr. Bruce Howard, Member of Parliament for Okanagan Boundary, in response to his representation on behalf of the community in question, the President of the Treasury Board said:

> I do not think the federal government should be expected to expend substantial sums to protect the investment in its observatory if its purposes can be achieved more economically elsewhere.
> If the community collectively or the provincial government, as the case may be, concludes that it could develop more satisfactorily by continued housing development which would drive out the observatory rather than limiting development and permitting the continued operation of the observatory, this choice, in my view, should be a local one and not one for the federal government to try and make.
> I would expect the representatives of the community to take whatever action is considered to be in the best interest of the community at large.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 27, 1972

The House met at 11 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN

MEASURE TO PROVIDE BENEFITS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-170, to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Before calling motion No. 1 as it appears on the order paper the Chair might refer to the procedural aspects of the motions. After examining the motions proposed by hon. members I would like to suggest that motions Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 appear to be acceptable on procedural grounds, unless hon. members want to suggest that for one reason or another they are not.

Motions Nos. 5 and 7 appear to present some difficulty. I think that the hon. member who has moved them might agree that they have financial implications. However, it might be said that motion No. 5 to some extent covers the same ground as motion No. 6 which is sponsored by the minister, and of course motion No. 6 is covered by a recommendation. In these circumstances it may be that the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe would feel that the purpose which he seeks to achieve through his motion No. 5 would be realized under the terms of motion No. 6. But I would suggest, subject to any arguments that might be submitted by hon. members, that motions Nos. 5 and 7, because they have financial implications, could not be moved.

Motions Nos. 8 and 9 appear to be acceptable from a procedural point of view.

I might also add that it might be difficult to have any of these motions considered together. In the circumstances, because there is no clear link between any of these motions except perhaps Nos. 5 and 6, I would think we might proceed with them one at a time, with the Chair putting motion No. 1 so as to launch the debate on the motions. I would be pleased to hear the advice and obtain the guidance of hon. members on these several points.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, do I understand you to say that we can reserve the right to make some comments on what Your Honour has said? It may be, now that the minister has accepted the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), that it would not be necessary to proceed with the hon. member's motion. Depending on the progress that the government makes, and how it jumps around from bill to bill, we might argue the point with respect to his other motion later this week or next week.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we see nothing wrong with your suggestions.

Mr. Speaker: In other words, my understanding is that the hon. member for Peace River has suggested that my interpretation of motions Nos. 5 and 6 is correct, that they are essentially the same motion, and that if the House debates, considers and votes on motion No. 6 this would be deemed to cover motion No. 5. The only motion which would remain to be considered from a procedural standpoint would be motion No. 7, which we might consider from that standpoint when it is reached.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe) moved:

That Bill C-170, An Act to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be amended by deleting the definition of "parent" in subclause 2(1), lines 16 to 18 on page 2, and substituting the following:

> ""parent" in relation to a child means an individual who has, in fact, the custody and control of the child and, where a family relationship exists, means for the purpose of paragraph 5(1)(a) the female parent except in any case where the female parent may be considered disqualified by reason of infirmity, ill health, improvidence or other reasonable cause or in any case where other special circumstances or reasonable cause of any kind may so require."

He said: Mr. Speaker, as there seems to be some evidence of a willingness to co-operate I will be very brief in my explanation. The bill provides that the benefits may be paid to the father or mother in the discretion of the government. The amendment would provide for the benefit to be payable to the mother, as is now the case under the Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act, and that the government would only have discretion to pay the benefit to someone other than the mother when there were good and sufficient reasons so to do as stipulated in the amendment.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we are certainly not arguing about the acceptability of this motion. I do point out to the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), however, that I believe it presents more problems than it solves. Under the present family allowances policy we prescribe under the regulations that, where a child is in the custody of both parents in a normal setting, payment will be made to the mother. This would be continued under the present legislation and the House has the assurance that, as has been the case for years under family allowances, the regulations would continue to provide for this.

I take it that in putting this motion the hon. member is endeavouring to obtain some assurance that in fact the mother will receive payment. For the reasons I have stated, I do not believe this is necessary. I also think it raises some difficulty because as I understand the hon. member's motion the payment would be made to "the female parent except in any case where the female parent may be considered disqualified by reason of infirmity, ill health, improvidence or other reasonable cause or in any case where other special circumstances or reasonable cause of any kind may so require."

This is a very subjective kind of criteria. It is difficult to determine when a mother would be disqualified in such circumstances. For instance, the word "improvident" could cover a very wide area, depending on the attitude of the person who made the decision. We prefer the present wording because of the basic underlying assurance that the regulations will provide for payment to the mother. Of course, in circumstances where the child may not be with the natural parents but is with relatives, adoptive parents or somebody else who is responsible for the care and custody of the child, then the payment can be made to that particular person. The present wording permits a degree of flexibility.

I hope the hon. member will reconsider his motion in view of what I have said and in view of the high degree of flexibility required in order to permit the plan's administration to substitute for the mother, even for a temporary period, the person who has the actual care and custody of the child. For these reasons, I feel that this motion is not necessary and creates difficulty which I am sure the hon. member would not find desirable.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when this point was raised in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs one of the responses that we were given was that the wording of the act was neutral. The question was put to us whether it would not be better to be neutral than to discriminate in favour of a person of either sex. To underline what I mean, the phrase in the bill before us reads as follows:

"parent" in relation to a child means an individual who has, in fact, the custody and control of the child.

That, I submit, Sir, is a very plausible argument in this day of equality between the sexes. We were also assured in the committee, as we have been assured now, that the normal practice will be for the cheque to be made out to the mother. Not only were we given the assurance that this would be done but we were told that as with respect to the present Family Allowances Act it would be covered by regulation. We all know that regulations passed under statutes are just as much law as the statutes themselves. Therefore, at some point it is going to become part of the law that the normal course will be for FISP cheques to be made out to the mother. I therefore support the contention of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). This same point was made in committee by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), that the act itself is the place where it should be said that the cheque should normally go to the mother.

I appreciate the point that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) made about the subjective judgments that might have to be made because of the wording of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe. I suggest that the answer to that would be to propose an amendment to the motion and I suggest that the minister propose it. He has a staff with him this morning and they could draft it fairly quickly. All that is needed is a very simple statement that the cheque will normally go to the female parent, perhaps with a proviso that, where special circumstances or reasonable cause of any kind require another course to be taken, that other course will be followed.

There is no point in my trying to move the amendment and getting us locked into procedural difficulties. This kind of thing gets through only if the minister is prepared to accept it. I would hope he would consider it. Instead of just asking the hon. member who moved the motion to withdraw it, I would hope he would propose an alternative wording, perhaps the very wording that is already in mind for the regulations. All the hon. member is asking, and we support him, is that the provision that these cheques should normally go to the mother be in the act itself rather than just in the regulations.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? The hon. member for Simcoe North.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) a question. He says that payment might go to relatives or to someone else—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that we are not in committee. Perhaps the House might allow the hon. member to ask the question of the minister and assume that the minister still has the floor. I think all hon. members have to be reminded that we are not in committee. The minister can speak only once but we might assume that the minister still has the floor. The hon. member might ask the question and the minister might reply, but certainly there has to be order and we have to follow the rules to some extent.

• (1120)

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I am concerned about how these allowances would be paid in cases where both parents are either gone or disabled and unable to look after the child and the child is in the care of an uncle, aunt, or other relative. Why was the public trustee not specifically mentioned in this bill as one who might look after such a child?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister will be recognized with the consent of the House. Hon. members should bear in mind that we are not in committee. Hon. members ought to ask these questions before the minister finishes, because he cannot speak a second time.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I see the hon. member's point but I would wish to check into it further. I believe the situation is as I explained it. Under the present wording of the bill there is, in certain circumstances, a good deal of flexibility with respect to the care and control of the child, if that care and control is in the hands of a relative or some other person. In other words, if a relative or some other person has the care and control of that child, we can substitute that particular person for the other and make the cheques payable to that person.

The hon. member asked about the public trustee. It may well be that if there is an order of a court placing the care and control of the child in the hands of the public trustee, which I do not think is usual, the regulations would empower us to make payments to the public trustee. This is one of the reasons why I am arguing fairly strongly for the present wording and for the power to enable us to do this by regulation. In light of all the variations in circumstances that are possible, I submit that if we were to insert such provisions in the legislation there would be an inevitable tendency for a high degree of rigidity to result which otherwise would be unnecessary and which could cause hardship in some cases.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, in my comments I should like to return to an old argument I have raised in the House time after time. I accept the minister's view that a large degree of flexibility in the regulations is needed. However, I think the government has been lax in not taking the action it ought to have taken to establish the scrutiny committee under the Statutory Instruments Act. That committee could have dealt with this issue.

I agree that the power to act by regulation and by Order in Council is a very essential and flexible power which in most circumstances ought to be granted. However, the granting of such powers to this government ought to be approached with grave caution in view of the government's failure to do what it said it would do. The former Minister of Justice over and over again said that he would establish the committee to which I have referred and make it work. The committee is there, of course, but it is not working. It has not been called together. I do not blame the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) for this. I understand his position, but I urge him to use his influence with his colleagues to see that this committee comes to life and operates. If the minister were to do that, the argument he has presented in favour of such regulations would be far more acceptable than it is at present.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Marshall) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: The next motion is No. 2, standing in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That Bill C-170, an act to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be amended by striking out lines 7 to 10 on page 3 and substituting the following:

(i) by a department or agency of the government of Canada or of a province that, by order of any court or by the consent of the parents of that person, has the custody and control of that person, or

Motion No. 2 (Mr. Munro) agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: The next motion is No. 3, standing in the name of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe) moved:

That Bill C-170, an act to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be amended by deleting subclause 3(4), lines 1 to 4 on page 4.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to ensure that the statute comes into effect as soon as possible and, in conjunction with proposed amendment No. 5, that benefits may be paid back to May 1, 1972. The provision that this amendment proposes to repeal can delay the coming into effect of the act until the government, in its discretion, ceases to pay the present type of family allowance.

The government proposal for a new family income security plan was first made at the beginning of December, 1970, in the white paper on income security for Canadians. Public criticism of several aspects of the bill led to an announcement of changes the following June. On September 3, 1971, Bill C-264 on FISP was tabled in the House of Commons with a promise that the first payments under the new plan would be made in May, 1972. Bill C-264, as we know, died on the order paper.

Bill C-170, a slightly modified version of its predecessor, Bill C-264, was given first reading in the House of Commons on March 15, 1972. This time, no commitment was made for implementation of the plan. During the committee proceedings after second reading of the bill the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) first of all estimated, on May 24, 1972, a lapse of six or seven months before the beginning of the new FISP payments. This would mean implementation of the bill during the October-December 1972 period, assuming the bill was passed in June, 1972. However, by June 1, 1972, the picture had changed. The deputy minister testified before the committee and said, as reported at page 12:5 of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs:

. . . since the previous bill was introduced and presented, we have carried out a number of further studies with a number of task forces on the administrative problems and we found that it will take longer than we had originally anticipated.

Actually, the deputy minister reported that the previous estimate of six or seven months had been doubled and that the new FISP cheques would not be out until the summer of 1973, if Bill C-170 were passed by the end of June. The four reasons he gave for the additional delay were, first, the need for eight months of computer time; second, the desire to co-ordinate the filling out of FISP application forms with income tax forms; third, the uncertainty with regard to possible provincial options; and fourth, the preference to have the peak FISP administrative load after the peak load for OAS and GIS has diminished and so to transfer trained staff from the OAS and GIS part to the FISP part of the operation.

None of these arguments offer very convincing reasons for the sudden revision in the time estimate for implementation of the FISP plan. Why did the deputy minister and the minister not have the same information the previous week when they told committee members that the delay would be six or seven months, and last September when they specified a May starting date less that eight months away? It is even more suspicious when paralleled with the assistant deputy minister's statement that the time estimate was reached, according to his statement on page 12:7 of the committee's proceedings; "after a very realistic and completely detailed approach with the advice of experts, consultants, from the outside who were hired for this purpose." If such expert help was contracted by the department, why did its most senior officials not know about it?

• (1130)

Another feeble excuse offered by the staff of the assistant deputy minister for the delay was the recent unemployment insurance catastrophe. He expressed the need to allow more computer time in order to avoid the same type of situation. The question then arises as to why the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare took so long to learn their lesson. The unemployment insurance mess took place over the winter months, peaking around February. Why did the officials not then take note of the problem, institute a plan to avoid such a mess in the FISP cheques and set a reasonable target date for the implementation of the FISP bill in line with such a goal?

At best, the government is guilty of a lack of foresight. At worst, they are guilty of being insincere in introducing Bill C-264 with no intention of implementing it in the foreseeable future and therefore ignoring the administrative details.

From the time FISP was originally announced in December, 1970, up to May, 1972, the consumer price index rose by 6.5 per cent. By the summer of 1973, the increase may well reach the 10 per cent mark. Therefore, by the time FISP is operational Canada's families will be deprived of the buying power of the family allowance dollar whose levels were set two and a half years previously. And who is to say how many families will have been made ineligible for family allowances because inflation has priced them out of the FISP levels, even though their buying power may be unchanged?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly the hon. member is aware that during the course of the deliberations on this bill it was necessary to undertake discussions with the provinces with respect to how this concept fitted in with their priorities. They had many suggestions to make. They wished time to consider the bill and some of its provisions and to make suggestions for changes. Quebec, to single out that province in particular, had many suggestions to make which involved detailed discussions. It was impossible to forecast how long those discussions would take. This is a partial explanation for some of the delays involved. To this we should add House time itself.

In terms of the time necessary to provide for the administrative arrangements, I believe it well behooves us to err, if anything, on the side of caution in this effort inasmuch as we have listened to some of the admonitions of the opposition with respect to what has happened with regard to administrative foul-ups. Many of the opposition members gave us some very excited speeches about what they fear in this regard, and we will certainly take every precaution necessary to ensure that, administratively, this program is run in a smooth, effective and efficient way. When Dr. Willard described what would be necessary in terms of lead time in the committee I believe that his explanations were perfectly justified.

I should like to refer now to the acceptability or otherwise of this motion. I believe, Sir, that you have indicated that it is acceptable on procedural grounds. I would argue that it is unacceptable because it would mean that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister is a little late.

Mr. Speaker: The minister is now arguing on a point of order when the motion is already before the House. He will appreciate that this cannot be done. He can consider only the substance of the motion, not its procedural acceptability.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge that I am belated on the procedural point but it seems to us that it would be impossible to pay FISP benefits immediately on Royal Assent. In view of the time required to analyse the statements of income and the administrative procedures necessary, I am sure it is readily apparent to all hon. members just how impossible this situation would be. For these reasons and from a common sense point of view I would argue the unacceptability of this motion.

An hon. Member: How long would this take?

Mr. Munro: An hon. member has yelled, "How long would this take". I would point out to him—

Mr. Lewis: He did not yell; he asked politely.

Mr. Munro: —that this was considered at great length in the standing committee. I indicated, and so did the deputy minister, that we would hope to submit application forms and information booklets to all those people wishing to apply for the new FISP benefits so they could fill these out in a considered fashion. Based on the requirements in the legislation, we would like them to submit the information on the previous year's income. We think this would fit in very well with the terms of their income tax statements which they will file during the first three months of next year. Thus they can avoid having to file different statements for different periods of time. This would be of considerable help in terms of the simplification of administration. The deputy minister indicated in the committee that he would expect the program to be under way during the course of the next summer. That is the explanation of why this number of months would be required for the implementation of this legislation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the point which has been made in the discussion of this amendment is a very important one. I rise once again to stress its seriousness and to make a plea to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) that even now he take this bill back to the drawingboard. The minister has great confidence that the administration of this legislation can be simplified and can be made to run smoothly, but I suggest to him that the additional length of time the deputy minister has already indicated will elapse before the act can be put into force is an indication of what will obtain during the entire life of this legislation if it is put on the statute books. I used the phrase "entire life" as though the legislation might be on the statute books for a considerable period of time. I doubt that it will. I suspect that within two or three years whatever government is in power will be coming back to Parliament asking for drastic changes in this legislation.

When one considers the number of changes that take place in the experience of an average family in the course of a year, when one realizes that these changes have a bearing on the amount of benefits available to a family under this legislation, I suggest there is no possibility of the legislation operating on this simplified basis. Every time there is a change in the income of a family, a problem arises as to the amount of benefit. The income can change because the breadwinner's wages or salary go up or down. The income can change because there is unemployment and reliance on unemployment insurance, followed by employment. The income can change because the mother goes out to work for a while, then ceases to work, and then goes out to work again. True, there are some families whose incomes are more or less static the year round. There are people on salaries, people in the upper brackets, who have some continuity in that regard, but most of the working people and those who are not working at all who will be affected by this legislation live on incomes that fluctuate a great deal during the course of a year.

There is also, of course, the question of the number of children in the family—this can change—and then there is the change through the years in the ages of the children. Add to this the requirements in this legislation for reports, add to it the time factors, and I suggest it will require a tremendous amount of technology to build a computer that will cope with the situation, and even after the computer has been built there is the human problem of dealing with individuals.

I think the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) is quite right to point out that the original estimate as to how long it would take to get the program started had to be extended considerably a month or two ago. It is clear, now, that there will be no payment under this legislation until the summer of 1973; it will take that long to get started because of the complicated mess in this legislation. That mess will continue until whatever government is over there has the sense and courage to admit it has made a mistake and return to the simpler method which has existed under the Family Allowances Act. The government is putting the people of Canada into an unholy situation by trying to impose the conditions necessary to qualify for this benefit, especially considering the fact that we have handled this matter in a progressive way for 27 or 28 years. Even at this late stage I urge the minister to take this bill back to the drawing board.

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to deal with this matter at great length. I would emphasize that this proposal began with a white paper in 1970. It took legislative form in 1971 at which time the government set an implementation date, which was to be May of this year. I cannot understand upon what basis the minister can now say, that certain factors had not been taken into consideration. It amounts to an admission of incompetence and lack of foresight.

The minister tried to put some of the blame on the opposition. I would remind him that the Official Opposition offered on a number of occasions to sit through the normal Christmas recess to ensure that this legislation was put through. But that offer was rejected. The government has an obligation to the people of Canada who have budgeted one way or another with this legislation in mind. The people who would have benefited have allowed for the benefits in their budgets and the people who would lose by it have also taken that eventuality into consideration. The amendment is well taken because it pinpoints the promise the government made to put this measure into effect by May. In my view the government has no alternative but to see that it is backdated to that date.

I can see only one reason for this vacillation. It is that the government wishes to get the best of both worlds. It does not want to offend the million or so families who will be cut out of this plan, yet it wants to continue to hold out a promise to those who will benefit. So it has decided to put the whole thing off until after the next election. I believe the government should show more courage and finally put this thing into pay through the people of Canada, and stand by their own legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe) moved:

That Bill C-170, an act to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be amended by deleting from subclause (5)(1) lines 26 to 31 on page five, and substituting the following:

"(1.1) Benefits paid in respect of children and persons referred to in subsection (3)(1) shall be applied exclusively toward the maintenance, care, training, education or advancement of the children or persons in respect of whom they were paid."

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to provide that the benefits are paid in trust to the parent for the maintenance, care, training, education or advancement of the child or person in respect of whom they are paid. Family allowances and youth allowances were paid on a trust basis. The government has removed this trust in favour of the child. The government has put in an amendment to provide that where the benefit is paid in respect of a child or person who is wholly or substantially maintained by federal or provincial government money or by an institution, then the benefit must be spent for the care, maintenance, etc. of the child or person. This merely emphasizes that a benefit which is paid to parents is not in trust for the child.

The principle of Bill C-170 is not the principle of the Family Allowances Act; it is not the principle of its predecessor, Bill C-264 which was introduced in the last session on September 13, 1971. Between that date and March 15, 1972, when Bill C-170 was introduced, an entirely different principle, a totally different philosophy, a distinct legal concept, was silently substituted.

The Family Allowances Act, the Youth Allowances Act all have one principle in common. That principle is that the benefits are established, paid, administered and accounted for as a right that is vested in our children. The people of Canada, acting through their government, are the donors. The parents are the trustees and the children have been and are the beneficiaries. The government proposes to take away that right in Bill C-170.

Nowhere in his explanation of the bill on second reading did the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) confess to the purpose of Bill C-170. Indeed, he implied that the rights of Canadian children, as established by Parliament, will be maintained and even enhanced. As reported in Hansard at the top of page 1133, he said:

> FISP benefits will provide a basic income for each child upon which can be built additional supports as deemed appropriate by provincial or municipal authorities. We know that unemployment insurance does not make any special provision for children. Neither do old age security, the guaranteed income supplement, the Canada Pension Plan retirement pension or war veterans allowances . . .

He might have added that neither does FISP.

Section 5 of the Family Allowances Act provides:

> The allowance shall be applied by the person receiving it exclusively toward the maintenance, care, training, education and advancement of the child . . .

Section 5(1) of the Youth Allowances Act provides:

> An allowance payable to a parent in respect of a dependent youth shall be applied exclusively for the care, maintenance, education or advancement of such youth.

Clause 5(2) of Bill C-264 introduced last session provided:

> A benefit shall be applied
> (a) in the case of a child referred to in paragraph 3(1)(a), exclusively toward the maintenance, care, training, education, or advancement of the child in respect of whom it was paid, and
> (b) in the case of a person referred to in paragraph 3(1)(b), exclusively toward the maintenance, care, training, education or advancement of the person in respect of whom it was paid . . .

Those trust provisions for the benefit of the children of Canada do not appear in Bill C-170. Instead, that bill takes away the vested right of the children, a right which the minister said was the only such right they possessed. And what does Bill C-170 propose to substitute? Outright grants to adults. The children become part of a formula upon which the right of the adult is based and calculated.

[Mr. Marshall.]

Clause 5 provides that the recipient of the allowance shall be the parent or other authorized person. The definition of "family" and "parent" refers to the child as being in the custody and control of such person. Clause 3(1) on page 3 and clause 4(3)(a) and (b) on page 4 provide that a child be wholly or substantially maintained by such person. That is the sum total. There is no reference to the child being cared for, trained, educated or advanced.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I think this motion has considerable merit. The title of this bill is: "An act to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children". The governing words are "in respect of children". I humbly submit that at issue here are payments made for the benefit, maintenance, education and support of children.

What the hon. member is attempting to put before the House, I think quite forcefully, is that we are removing the trust aspect relating to these payments. It now appears that the money is going not for the benefit of the children, or in respect of children, but rather in respect of parents or those who have the control of or guardianship of children.

I am sure the government is aware of the principle that the hon. member is trying to put forward. Let me refer to clause 5(1.1), an amended provision which sets forth the thinking that should be behind the bill. It provides:

> Benefits paid in respect of persons referred to in paragraph 3(1)(b)—

Paragraph 3(1)(b) refers to persons who are looked after or provided for by a department or agency of the government of Canada, or a province or institution. The money paid under FISP is to be used for, and shall be exclusively applied toward, the maintenance, care, training, education or advancement of the person in respect of whom the money is paid.

It is there that you have an anomaly. Where children are under the care of an institution or federal or provincial agency, the government has been extremely explicit in stating that the money is to be used for specific purposes. However, in the relationship that exists between parents and/or guardians and/or relatives and children the trust aspect is forgotten about and the parents are told that they can take the money and do what they want with it. And this is exactly what is happening.

It would not take too much research to look into this kind of relationship. I am not going to make a general statement in this regard, but too many parents do not use the money for the benefit of their children. Rather, it is used for the benefit of themselves. I do not want to illustrate cases where people wait for the cheques to arrive by mail and then take a taxicab to the local beer parlour or liquor store, or buy clothing for themselves. I do not know how that would benefit the children.

I suggest it does not take too much argument to make anybody realize that the hon. member has brought to the forefront a point that should be thoroughly considered by the government. If this money is to be used for the benefit of children, the act should specifically so provide. In fact, I am wondering whether this money will be so used.

Certainly I would question it. As long as money is paid out with no strings attached the money will be used for the benefit of the parents rather than for the benefit of the children to whom the money is directed.

I hope that in replying to the hon. member's remarks the minister will give us some assurance, though I do not know how he can, that the principle we are now discussing is whether we should pay these benefits to parents for the benefit of their children, or whether the money is paid to the parents for the benefit of the parents and their children. I can envisage this money being used to pay the rent or for the parents' medical expenses, for example, in which case the children would derive no benefit at all. Or is the money to be directed toward the maintenance, care, training, education or advancement of the person in respect of whom it is paid?

As I say, I should like the minister to underscore the principle of the bill so that the country can be advised. If the money is to be used for the benefit of the children, the act should so state and strings should be attached. In only one case are strings attached, and that is when children are in the care and control of an institution. No strings are attached when they are in the care and control of their parents. Therefore I support the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister has already spoken. He can only speak now with the consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, the general philosophy behind family allowances is that the payment is an incremental income for a family with children to assist them with the additional responsibilities they have compared with a single person or a childless couple. The money goes into the general family income pot, so to speak, to assist families with a dependency factor, as opposed to the expenses incurred by a childless couple or a single person.

We all know that wage scales are based on the value of a service rendered by a person to a particular firm. However, such wages do not take into account this dependency factor, and this is one of the rationales of family allowances. In cases where family allowance is paid to children in the care of an institution, I think there should be a term in the legislation, in the absence of the natural parents, to provide that the money is to be used for the care and maintenance of the children.

The hon. member is now suggesting that we should ensure that each payment sent to a mother is used for the care and maintenance of her children. Let one just consider the number of cheques being sent out each year. There are well in excess of two million families in receipt of family allowance each month. Some hon. members opposite have been talking about the administrative difficulties created by the bill. The moving of a motion such as this illustrates just how terribly concerned they are about administrative difficulties. I would ask them whether they would want to see the creation of an horrendous federal bureaucracy, established at considerable cost to the taxpayers of this country, in order to police the action they suggest.

Mr. Baldwin: That is not so.

Mr. Munro: I suggest it would be so. Or, may I ask, is this motion being put forward merely as a pious declaration of intent, with no consideration at all being given to its enforcement? I am in the hands of the hon. member, but in our previous discussion of family allowance we have never considered this kind of policing arrangement in regard to parents in receipt of family allowance. We were well aware that it was unenforceable and as of right they receive this money subject to the income test, so I would ask hon. members in terms of common sense to let the legislation go as it now stands and not include this type of requirement.

• (1200)

We are talking here in many cases of lower income families, and this money is for the general good of the family. It would be very difficult in any particular situation to say whether the parents had used the money for the care and maintenance of the child as opposed to providing better accommodation generally for the whole family. Could one not say that is indirectly a very tangible benefit to the child itself? You get into all of these problems of interpretation which would render such an addition invalid and unsuccessful. For those reasons I would ask hon. members to turn down this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the hon. member rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Baldwin: I want to make a speech if the House will let me, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Agreed, on division.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I think the minister misconceives the legal aspect. I am sure my hon. friend in whose name the motion stands is not suggesting that the government should engage or hire a large number of people to actively police every aspect of this. As I construe the motion, it constitutes a statutory responsibility of a contractual nature by which those people who are legally entitled to and do in fact receive these funds have a statutory duty upon them which can be properly accepted by them through this clause. Such a provision has been put in other statutes. It is in many provincial statutes, perhaps not in precisely the same form, but surely this is why we have statutes. In many instances it is necessary to spell out that there is a duty upon those receiving certain funds and that these are the conditions under which the funds are received. In the motion the conditions have been clearly and explicitly set forth. The money is to be applied toward the maintenance, care, training, education or advancement of the child.

If the government became aware that there was a breach obviously it might have some responsibility to do something about it, but as between the child who is the beneficiary and the person who receives the money there is a legal duty upon the parent or other person. That is the meaning of the motion.

Mr. Munro: Ask me a question so I can reply.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister wants to make another speech. I think we will wait until we get to third reading.

By that time so many questions will have been asked that he will probably be able to devote his entire speech on third reading to answering valid questions.

Mr. Munro: Okay, never mind.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in self-defence against my friends to the right may I point out that I was pleased to support the first two amendments put forward by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), but in this case I ask my friends to the right to take another look at the matter and consider the possibility they have misunderstood the legislation. I realize they have many distinguished legal counsel in that group who are used to looking at the law and are anxious to practise equity.

Mr. Baldwin: And we give free advice.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think it is on that basis that the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe suggests we make this legislation the same right through the piece, applying the same terms to children as are applied to persons in clause 3(1) of the bill. I would ask him to look again at clause 3(1)(a), which is the standard provision for paying what we have called family allowances to parents across the years. We have not policed it over the last 25 or 27 years. Where there has been wrongdoing it may have been caught, but we have not policed every mother to see how she was spending that money.

Clause 3(1)(b) is a special provision that was put in to cover payments to agencies and institutions that may be caring for children. Incidentally, this was related to a point we discussed on second reading as to whether full payments would be made in such cases, and in the committee the government agreed that all the payments should be made in full. As a matter of fact, the original bill provided for only half payment on a certain basis, but that has been struck out. Now, where children are in institutions, the full amount of the allowance is paid on their behalf.

Surely it has become necessary, since we are going to make payments to institutions looking after children, to provide how those institutions shall use that money. It was also pointed out to us in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs that this has some relation to the funds these institutions receive under the Canada Assistance Plan.

At any rate, what 3(1)(b) refers to is simply the case of persons or children, if you will, who are in the care of institutions. I think it is appropriate for us to lay down in law that, where institutions receive this money, they shall use it exclusively for the maintenance, care, training, education or advancement of the children. They must not use it to offset some other cost and they must not use it in juggling their accounts under the Canada Assistance Plan. It must be used for the purpose suggested there. I think that to provide a requirement as to what must be done when the money gets into the hands of institutions is all right, but the laying down of a requirement that every mother in Canada who gets this money must meet certain conditions or be subject to policing is going a little too far.

I find myself uncomfortable in being on the minister's side on this point because he is making a big mistake with the bill as a whole.

Mr. Baldwin: I don't blame you.

Mr. Munro: You have made that speech ten times.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is that all? The minister says I have made the speech about the whole bill being a mistake ten times. There is no quota on this so there may be more to come. In all seriousness I ask my hon. friends in the Progressive Conservative party not to press this amendment.

Mr. Baldwin: Will the hon. member accept a question? In view of the reactionary speech he has made I should like to ask him this question. I am pinning a lot of my argument on the word "advancement". As a result of many legal decisions and judicial interpretations the word "advancement" has the very widest meaning, and almost any expenditure would fall within it. I do not want to make a speech so I will ask the question.

Some hon. Members: Thank God for that.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the hon. member not agree that almost any type of expenditure in respect of the household, the home or the benefits of the same is and must be covered by the word "advancement"? So there is quite a bit of flexibility there which should answer the objection of my hon. friend. I would ask him if he would not accept that the use of the word "advancement" would get rid of his objection?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If my hon. friend is saying that the word "advancement" is so broad it has no meaning, then why bother?

Mr. Baldwin: It has a wide meaning, but not too wide.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think I would rather trust the mothers of Canada than the lawyers in the Tory party.

• (1210)

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up too much time on this motion, but I was prompted to rise by the use by the minister of the words "common sense" a couple of times in respect of this legislation. Anyone who can look at this legislation and say it has been created by the use of common sense has much to answer for because here we are speaking of an amendment to the bill which seeks to do something that has been done before. The minister says it would involve the necessity of policing the mothers of Canada. This is not a new proposal which is being suggested. It was contained in the old act. I cannot remember a single situation of a mother being harassed because she did not use the family allowance cheque in the proper manner. We all know there are probably cases in which a check should be made or in which some organization should be involved in the directing of the spending of the money so that the children involved will receive the benefit. I say that here is an arrangement for the protection of the children of Canada which would not in any way belittle the mothers.

All we need do is pick up the newspapers any day to become aware of cases of children not receiving the benefits. This provision is included to protect the children of Canada. I do not think the hon. member who placed this amendment on the order paper had any idea of belittling the mothers of Canada. He feels that from time to time cases may arise where children will need the protection of this amendment.

This minister is not one who is prone to accept amendments from anybody. We have had experience with him for a long time starting with the Canada Pension Plan when he was a parliamentary assistant. There are other ministers who are much more amenable than he is in respect of amendments. I remember when the legislation in respect of the Canadian Transport Commission was being put through the House. The minister piloting that legislation accepted amendment after amendment. Of course that bill never should have been passed. It was similar to this bill. Here we have an amendment the substance of which has been on the law books of Canada for 20 years. I do not know of any case in which it has been abused. It is there as an assurance in cases where there may be abuse created by the parents, that the children will receive the benefit of the legislation. I think the minister would do well to accept this amendment.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I think I would disagree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in respect of this amendment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: I am aware of the difficulties which arise—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are not a Tory lawyer.

Mr. Peters: —in supervising the use of the money. I would agree with those who say that money paid under family allowances no doubt in some cases has been substituted for money that should have come from other sources. However, I suggest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that by the time this legislation is in effect the computers which will be developed to handle it will be complicated and advanced enough that they will also be able to make house calls. I think this can probably be supervised in the home by the computers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Marshall: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The motion is defeated on division.

Motion No. 4 (Mr. Marshall) negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. We have now reached motion No. 5 in the name of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe on which Mr. Speaker made some comment at the outset concerning its acceptability because of the financial implication. I wonder whether hon. members would be ready to accept the suggestion made by Mr. Speaker that because both motion No. 5 and motion No. 6 in the name of the minister have the same implications it might be simpler to consider motion No. 6 for which there is a royal recommendation and at the same time eliminate the difficulty with which we are faced in respect of motion No. 5. The Chair would welcome at this time a comment from the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, we are agreeable to proceeding with motion No. 6 in the name of the minister, and in the interest of getting on with the bill I withdraw motion No. 5.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Does the hon. member have the consent of the House to withdraw motion No. 5?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 5 (Mr. Marshall) withdrawn.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That Bill C-170, an act to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be amended by striking out lines 18 to 30 of Clause 6 at page 6 and substituting the following:

"(1)(a) or (b), as the case may be."

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise merely to suggest that the minister might say a word or two on this motion so that what we are doing will be on the record. This is the change that would do away with the earlier arrangement which provided for only half the amount of the allowance being paid in certain circumstances. It is a welcome change, but I think the fact that the change is being made should be on the record.

Mr. Munro: I would be pleased to do that, Mr. Speaker. In the committee I indicated that the government would be pleased to consider an amendment of this kind when the appropriate stage arrived. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggests, the bill, prior to this amendment, provided that one-half the maximum benefit would be paid in cases where the care and custody of a child were in an institutional environment. This proposed amendment, together with that which has been made already in respect of clause 5 in the committee, will result in the maximum payment being made in respect of all children in the care of agencies and institutions when the benefit is used only for the good of the children. I believe this not only meets the objection expressed by hon. members opposite but is also a positive response to many of the letters we have received from some of the welfare ministers in the provinces.

Motion No. 6 (Mr. Munro) agreed to.

• (1220)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): We will now proceed to the consideration of motion No. 7 but, as previously mentioned, the Chair has reservations as to its procedural acceptability. If hon. members will look at the motion and at the bill, they will notice that in clause 2(1) on page 1 of the bill "benefit year" means any period after August, 1972, consisting of 12 consecutive months commencing with the first day of September. Motion No. 7 proposes to add a new clause No. 20, which would have the effect of suspending the provision relating to a benefit as defined in the bill and provide for payment for a period in advance of the defined benefit year. It is the conclusion of the Chair that this would have the effect of initiating payments in certain cases four months prior to the date which is provided for in the bill and in the recommendation. To my mind this represents a clear financial implication which could not be undertaken without a recommendation. Because of this the motion cannot now be considered.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that I bow to the position taken by the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): We will now proceed to the consideration to motion No. 8.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That Bill C-170, An Act to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be amended by striking out lines 10 to 26 of Clause 23 at page 24 and substituting the following:

"(a) the aggregate of

(i) the allowances that would have been paid under the Youth Allowances Act, as it read before being repealed by this Act, during that portion of that year that is before the repeal of the Youth Allowances Act, and

(ii) the benefits that would have been paid under this Act with respect to persons described in subsection 3(3) during that portion of that year that is after the repeal of the Youth Allowances Act, and during which that province provided for the payment of allowances or benefits described in paragraph 3(3)(a) or (b), if allowances or benefits described in subparagraph (i) or (ii) had been payable to parents resident in that province; or

(b) the aggregate of allowances and benefits described in paragraphs 3(3)(a) and (b) that were provided by that province in that taxation year, whichever is the lesser.

(2.1) Where for any taxation year, with respect to any province, the amount of the aggregate determined in accordance with paragraph (2)(a) exceeds the amount of the aggregate determined in accordance with paragraph (2)(b), the amount of the excess shall stand to the credit of that province for the purpose of subsection (2.2).

(2.2) Where for any taxation year, with respect to any province, the aggregate determined in accordance with paragraph (2)(b) exceeds the aggregate determined in accordance with paragraph (2)(a), the amount that may otherwise be recovered from the province for the year pursuant to section 6.1 of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, 1964 shall be reduced by the amount of the excess, except that such reduction shall not exceed the amount standing to the credit of that province for the purpose of this subsection."

He said: Mr. Speaker, in essence what this amendment is designed to do has particular applicability to the province of Quebec. As hon. members are aware, we gave three tax abatement points to Quebec in lieu of that province raising its own taxes in order to finance its youth allowances. In view of the fact that they have already had their abatement points we are saying here: We will pay you what the FISP benefits would have amounted to if applied in the province of Quebec if you are going to carry on with your own youth allowances program.

Further, what we are now saying is that if they design their program in such a way that they spend in excess of what the federal payments would have been as applied in that province, they have to find that amount out of other revenues that they might have. If they do not spend the same amount as the federal payments would have been in that province, then the credit can be applied against other amounts that have been spent under the program in that province. This provides the province with the opportunity to get credits for underexpenditures that can be applied, on an averaging basis, to what may be overexpenditures in ensuing years. It provides for this type of adjustment on what we believe is a fairly reasonable basis.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does this proposed amendment have anything to do with relations between Ottawa and Quebec respecting the payments for persons under 16 years, in other words, who come under the provisions of the Family Allowances Act, under the new FISP, or do we understand that negotiations about such payments are still taking place and that there might have to be an amendment to the act later, depending on what agreement is reached between Ottawa and Quebec? I think this is a pretty important aspect of the matter upon which the minister should enlarge.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to try to answer the hon. member's question. The negotiations with Quebec on other features of the FISP legislation, particularly referring to those under 16 years, are still continuing. It is our hope that we will soon arrive at a reasonable settlement.

• (1230)

The Prime Minister's letter of June 9 to the premier of the province indicated that we felt that all outstanding issues in this area had been resolved and that we hoped we could now enter into an acceptable arrangement with Quebec, giving them the opportunity, within certain federal limits set out in an earlier letter, to design their program. My latest information is that the Quebec government is considering this and we are waiting to hear from them. If they should respond positively and indicate that they have arrived at a suitable solution to this question, then it might be necessary, as the hon. member implied, to bring forward an amendment to the legislation, probably in the next session of Parliament. I do not expect that all the "i's" will be dotted and the "t's" crossed by the end of this week and, as we all know, we hope to adjourn at that time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister one more question? I realize it is hypothetical but it is the only way I can put it. When this bill is passed, becomes law and the payments go into effect some time in 1973, if no agreement is reached with Quebec in the meantime do I understand that the payments provided in this bill would go forward to the individual families in Quebec?

Mr. Munro: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, if no agreement were reached with Quebec and if no provincial option or amendment were made to this legislation and the act were proclaimed it would be applicable in Quebec and elsewhere precisely on the terms set out in the bill.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question? In addition to discussions with the province of Quebec regarding some flexibility in family allowances, has the minister had discussions with the other provinces and is it contemplated that any arrangements made would apply only to Quebec or would they be extended to all the provinces? Is there to be discussion with the other provinces before anything is settled?

Mr. Munro: Yes, Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions with all the other provinces. As I indicated earlier, a letter went from the Prime Minister to Premier Bourassa on March 9, and it went as well to all other first ministers. This letter set out the terms of the suggested provincial option and was well received. The reaction from Quebec was fairly favourable and I am not aware of any unfavourable reaction from other provinces. Naturally they indicated that they wanted to study its terms and our officials have been available to explain any questions raised with regard to provincial options. To my knowledge there has been no objection from the other provinces. I do not know whether that answers the question of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell us whether the amendments before the House are a result of his talks with the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs and, if so, does he think that they meet with the Quebec government requirements?

[English]

Mr. Munro: If I understand the hon. member's question correctly, Mr. Speaker, the amendments that we have been considering today do not have any direct relationship to the discussion we have been having with Quebec except perhaps in a peripheral sense, when I talked about the arrangement for calculating youth allowances. The main theme of our discussion with Quebec is the proposals put forward in the Prime Minister's letter to the premiers of March 9. This went into considerable detail about giving the provinces the right to design the benefit level of the program within certain federal minimum standards.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, this amendment is quite complicated and I do not want to confuse the issue further but I am concerned about whether it may result in a lack of uniformity in family allowance payments in Quebec compared with the other provinces. If that is the case it is very serious and I am concerned about it. If this results in a difference in payments of family allowances for youngsters in Quebec compared with payments for children in other provinces, then surely the minister cannot justify this amendment.

Mr. Munro: At the present time, Mr. Speaker, the benefits for 16 and 17 year-olds under the Quebec schooling allowances are the same as the federal youth allowances so there is no problem there. A decision was taken earlier that Quebec would be given tax abatement points and through them could raise their own taxes to pay for their youth allowances program. The tax abatement points were valued at what was calculated to be the gross youth allowances paid out in that particular province. This is possible for the province of Quebec within the ambit of their own jurisdiction, which in this particular case we concede. In other words, they took advantage of the offer at that time but if my recollection is correct other provinces did not. Quebec may set the benefit levels at its own discretion. All this clause does is calculate what would happen if, for example, their benefit levels should be reduced to such an extent that the tax abatement points are worth more. In that case there is an adjustment through a refund to the federal government. If their youth allowances should be worth more than the federal government's value of tax abatement points, then they would have to raise this out of their own resources. That was passed several years ago.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the questioning of the minister is completed I should like to say a few words on this amendment. All it does is keep alive the arrangement already made between Ottawa and Quebec with respect to youth allowances. It may alter the terms slightly but in effect it keeps that arrangement alive. It does nothing about the payment of what are now known as family allowances or what will be known as family income security benefits for those under age 16. The minister has made clear that if any change in that respect is to be made, it will have to follow an agreement between Ottawa and Quebec and will have to be achieved through an amendment to the act.

• (1240)

I am not at all scandalized by the idea of letting a province like Quebec have some say about the formula to be applied to family allowances in respect of that province, if there is to be a formula. Hon. members must surely be aware that I favour the principle of universality as opposed to that of selectivity in these payments, but if there is to be selectivity I do not find it offensive to think that a special arrangement might be made with Quebec. I hope, Sir, that you will allow me to speak for a moment or two before you question whether I am in order in my remarks.

I regard as very serious and deplore the way in which old age security programs, family allowances and the Canada Pension Plan are being traded against each other in the negotiations that are taking place.

Mr. Rynard: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was particularly concerned when I learned—and I asked questions about this yesterday—that in the Quebec National Assembly a bill has been tabled that would amend the Quebec Pension Plan in such a way as to put it out of line with the Canada Pension Plan. I think the Canada Pension Plan was a particularly good piece of legislation and I think the arrangement under which the Quebec Pension Plan was passed at the same time was an outstanding example of co-operation between the federal regime and the Quebec provincial government. It was an outstanding example because that plan works in full co-operation with the federal plan and there is full synchronization. The Quebec government has full control over the Quebec Pension Plan. Individuals can leave Quebec, go to other provinces of Canada and move back again without any harm being done.

I see you are becoming somewhat agitated, Mr. Speaker. Let me say why my remarks are relevant. I do not think it is good for the political health of this country when some people threaten: If you do not do this to family allowances or to the old age security program we, in Quebec, will change the Quebec Pension Plan and cause trouble. The trouble would be very real because it would involve various employers and different arrangements would need to be made. I shall finish in a minute or two, Mr. Speaker.

It should not be inferred from what I have said that I am simply deploring that Quebec has done. I deplore the fact that this government, which gave notice in December, 1970, of the amendments it would bring in with respect to the Canada Pension Plan, has not moved more vigorously with respect to those amendments. If those amendments with respect to the Canada Pension Plan had been introduced, I think we would perhaps not be in our present trouble. The various programs I mentioned are being traded against each other. I think that this should come to an end. I hope the discussions that will take place between Ottawa and Quebec with respect to FISP—you see, Sir, my remarks are now in order—will be the kind of discussions in which there will be an attempt to bring about a harmonious understanding with respect to all these pieces of social legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gilbert: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I declare the motion carried on division.

Motion No. 8 (Mr. Munro) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The House will now proceed to Motion No. 9 standing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That Bill C-170, an act to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be amended by deleting therefrom Clause 24, being lines 31 to 37 on page 24 of the said bill.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wonder if I could make a deal with the minister and with the House. If I must speak until one o'clock so that we do not mess up the lunch hour with a vote or two, of course I can do so. On the other hand, if there could be an understanding that any deferred votes will take place this afternoon after the question period, which I think is the course of common sense, I would be prepared to make my speech much briefer than might otherwise be the case.

An hon. Member: You are on.

An hon. Member: Blackmail.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am told this is blackmail, and I am also told this is a good idea.

Mr. Munro: I agree to the suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to thank the House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell: This is a good sign for the rest of the week.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of some of the difficulties that might arise if this amendment were carried and if this bill were carried without clause 24. The result would be that the new FISP program would be in effect but the old Family Allowances Act and the Youth Allowances Act would also continue to be in effect. Some people would like that. They would not say it is ridiculous, because it would mean that people would get both payments.

Mr. Alexander: Where would the money come from?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We should then be doing something similar to what is happening under the old age security program, under which all people are paid the basic $80 but under which some people get GIS as well. So, people would be getting family allowances under the old act and, in cases where they pass the means test, they would also get the new family income security plan payment under the new act.

My reason for moving this amendment, Mr. Speaker, was to provide a last opportunity for saying before we reach the third reading stage that I do not like to see the Family Allowances Act being repealed. I had the privilege of being in the House in 1944 when it was passed. I was one of those who voted for it. Incidentally, it was one of those recorded votes that was unanimous.

An hon. Member: The hon. member voted for the BNA Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am talking about the Family Allowances Act, not the British North America Act which was passed at Westminster. I was never in that Parliament.

An hon. Member: The hon. member was away that day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As I say, that vote in 1944 was unanimous. There was one member who said he would vote against the bill but he was not present when the vote was called and the vote was unanimously in favour. I still think it was one of the better pieces of social legislation passed by the Parliament of Canada. I think the two best pieces of legislation have been the Old Age Security Act, as it was passed in 1951, and the Family Allowances Act, as it was passed in 1944. I think legislation that accepts Canadians as Canadians and does not divide people according to their wealth or poverty is good Canadian legislation. I do not like to see this good legislation being wiped from the statute books and replaced by a piece of legislation brought in under the euphemistic term "selectivity" but under which the government, by applying a means test, will be dividing the people of this country into those who have and those who do not have. Therefore I want to vote against this proposal to wipe out the 1944 Family Allowances Act. I think it was a good piece of legislation and this Parliament should confirm the wisdom of those who were here in 1944.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, a while ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) spoke about trusting the mothers of Canada rather than Tory lawyers. I want to say that I cannot trust him and I do not understand what he is attempting to do in moving a motion which in my view is legally impossible to accept. I think the hon. member was very fair in that he said that anyone interpreting his motion would appreciate that if it were adopted we would in effect have the Family Allowances Act, the Youth Allowances Act and also Bill C-170. What the hon. member is attempting to do is to show his disgust, if I may use the term, at the action of the government in removing the excellent plan that has been implemented over the years. But why we have to go through this manoeuver in order to prove that point is beyond me.

Let us suppose that by chance the amendment carried. We have to be responsible lawyers and responsible laymen within this chamber in bringing forward motions. I say that the bill will be an administrative nightmare in any event because of the criteria that are set down with respect to the number of children involved, the ages of the children and income. It has been pointed out time and time again that because of changing circumstances that affect each and every one of these criteria those who should be able to take advantage of this legislation will find themselves in a rather difficult position every month because even within that time span we can expect differences of age to become apparent, incomes to change or a child to be born. What it comes down to is whether in effect we can accept the motion of the hon. member. With all due respect to him I find that it is not feasible.

The hon. member did not say how much cost his motion would entail. I was not being facetious when I asked him about this. The hon. member appears to have thought that in order to register his profound objection to the way in which the government is now approaching the matter he should advocate that all these acts be operative at the same time. But if we are going to discuss this motion sensibly we should at least know what it means in terms of money. I have heard nothing about that. As a matter of fact, I know that the hon. member did not wish to pursue the matter further. What he wanted to do was to register his concern.

We have registered objections regarding the departure from the principle of universality and the adoption of selectivity in the plan. We have all made pertinent points and questioned the sudden change of thinking in this regard. In a recent speech the minister said that the middle-income people—

Mr. MacEachen: Order!

Mr. Alexander: The government House leader says "order" because he knows what I am going to say. I think the minister revealed the government's position when he stated that the middle-income group will have to pay the shot in the future. Universality will disappear and as a result the middle-income group will have no incentive to continue paying.

Mr. Munro: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps in my reply later I can indicate specifically what I said because I do not want to be misquoted. The hon. member is guilty of gross distortion when he makes remarks of that kind. This is not at all what I said. If he would care to get a copy of my speech, which was sent to the leader of his party, he can read my remarks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If he reads them he will have more criticisms.

Mr. Alexander: Let me put it this way, Mr. Speaker. It is my considered opinion that it is the position of the government that the middle-income group will have to pay the shot. I recall that the other day questions were asked of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about whether in fact this is the policy of the government. The answer given was certainly ambiguous and evasive. All indications can lead us to no other conclusion. If the minister takes exception to this, I will withdraw my remark as it applies to him personally and apply it to the government benches in general. That will bring them all into the boat, and if they want to rise on a question of personal privilege they are quite entitled to do so under the rules. All I wish to say is that people must be given incentives if they are to pay continually for a good program. Parliamentary democracy allows people to register their concern, and this concern will be made apparent if one particular group in society is continually made to pay. May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HALES—ALLEGED ERRORS IN TABLING OF REPORT OF NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege concerning the tabling of a report prepared by the National Harbours Board on Friday, June 23. I am rising at the earliest possible opportunity. My question of privilege is that I believe the records of the House are incorrect. It is not a personal point of privilege but one that affects every member of the House.

The fact is that in tabling its report the National Harbours Board did not abide by the rules and regulations laid down by Parliament. There have been three breaches of the laws of this Parliament and an abuse of Standing Order 41(1). The following appears at page 424 of Votes and Proceedings for June 23 last:

> The following papers having been deposited with the Clerk of the House were laid upon the Table pursuant to Standing Order 41(1), namely:
> By Mr. Jamieson, a Member of the Queen's Privy Council,—Financial Statements of the National Harbours Board, for the year ended December 31, 1971, pursuant to section 32 of the National Harbours Board Act, chapter N-8, R.S.C. 1970—

Section 32 of the National Harbours Act provides:

> The Board shall, as soon as possible but within three months after the termination of each calendar year, submit an annual report to the Minister in such form as he may prescribe—

In passing, I point out that the report was tabled six months, instead of three months, after the termination of the calendar year 1971. I also bring to Your Honour's attention that section 34 of the National Harbours Board Act provides:

> The accounts and financial transactions of the Board shall be audited by the Auditor General of Canada.

The fact of the matter is that the report was tabled with a financial statement that was not audited or certified by the Auditor General of Canada, in violation of section 34 of the National Harbours Board Act. In addition to that, although it is not laid down by statute, it is a matter of courtesy for the board or any other government commission to table sufficient copies to enable all Members of Parliament to receive one. In this case, only one copy was tabled and, as I say, it was not audited by the Auditor General.

It appears to me that these very serious omissions on the part of the National Harbours Board must not be allowed to go unnoticed, not by me or by any member of the House. Certain rules and regulations are laid down and must be followed, and I submit they have not been followed. I therefore suggest that the House should not accept a report that does not meet the criteria laid down by Parliament.

I hope Your Honour will not rule I am raising a grievance because this is a matter of parliamentary procedure that affects all members, but if Your Honour feels I have made out a bona fide case, I shall move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

> That this House orders the Clerk of the House to expunge from Votes and Proceedings, No. 80, for Friday, the 23rd June 1972, under the heading, "Returns and Reports Deposited with the Clerk of the House", the following entry:
> "By Mr. Jamieson, a Member of the Queen's Privy Council,—Financial statement of the National Harbours Board, for the year ended December 31, 1971, pursuant to section 32 of the National Harbours Board Act, chapter N-8, R.S.C. 1970 (English and French).—Sessional Paper No. 284-1/154".
> and that the Clerk do return the Paper, improperly titled "Sessional Paper No. 284-1/154" to Mr. Jamieson, a member of the Queen's Privy Council.

I hope—

[Mr. Hales.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair is prepared to indicate whether it feels that a prima facie case of privilege has been made. I really do not think that we should allow a debate on the matter. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) seems anxious to rise, but I do not think he should be allowed to rise unless the Chair rules that there is a prima facie case of privilege. Otherwise, as hon. members know, there is no reason why we should not have a full debate on the matter, and I do not think there should be a debate unless it is felt that there is a prima facie case of privilege established.

Certainly, I cannot make such a finding. The hon. member has given notice of his intention to raise this matter this afternoon by way of a question of privilege. I have had the opportunity to give the matter some thought in the meantime, and I have certainly given full attention to the submissions he has made for the consideration of the Chair. It seems to me that the hon. member has two grievances, the first in relation to what he considers to be an illegal procedure concerning the tabling of this report, and the second in relation to the distribution of the report. He says that only one copy has been tabled, whereas it is the general practice to table more copies for distribution to hon. members who want to see the report. I fail to see how this can be considered a breach of the privileges of the House.

The motion suggested by the hon. member is, in my view, a substantive motion. It is not a privileged motion but a submission that substantive action be taken by the House in relation to certain facts to which he has alluded. That, to my way of thinking, is a substantive motion which would have to be moved in the usual way, with the required notice given as provided by the Standing Orders.

While the hon. member may have a grievance in so far as the distribution of the document in question is concerned, if the Chair could be of assistance in this respect there is no doubt that I would be prepared, with the assistance of the Clerk and the gentlemen at the table, to satisfy this requirement for the hon. member. Otherwise I do not think the matter should be debated in the House by way of a question of privilege.

FINANCE

TABLING OF TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON STRAWBERRIES

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to apologize to the House, but I wonder if I might just table a report in accordance with the rules.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. minister the consent of the House to revert to motions for the purpose of tabling a document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I want to thank the House for its courtesy. In accordance with Section 6, Chapter T-1 of the Revised Statutes, I wish to table a copy in English and French of a report of the Tariff Board in respect of strawberries, reference No. 148, together with a transcript of the proceedings on the reference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: A typical Turner big deal.

An hon. Member: How about blueberries?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

POSITION OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—INTERVENTION BY BANK OF CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to learn that the government is finally getting down to earth. I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday he indicated that his government was not taking any particular initiative with regard to the dollar. I should like to ask what the reason was for the apparently substantial intervention yesterday by the Bank of Canada in connection with the Canadian dollar?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the exchange fund did not intervene except to maintain an orderly, stable market in accordance with the policy the fund has maintained ever since the dollar was floated.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether the government of Canada and the Bank of Canada have any policy other than to simply maintain an orderly float? In other words, is it still the policy of the Bank of Canada and the government to allow the dollar to float freely, subject to levelling out from day to day fluctuations?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is still the policy of the government, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON SUPPORT OF UNITED STATES DOLLAR

Mr. Stanfield: I have a further supplementary question. Is it, therefore, the policy of the government of Canada not to join with European countries and European central banks in their policy of supporting the U.S. dollar? Is the government of Canada remaining apart from any international movement to support the United States dollar?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Neutral, as always.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if we find at any time there is a risk that the agreement arrived at in Washington would have to be revised, then of course Canada would take all appropriate initiatives. For the moment we are satisfied with the results which appear to have been achieved yesterday in Luxembourg. We will continue to watch the international monetary scene.

GOVERNMENT LIAISON WITH CONFERENCE ON EUROPEAN CURRENCIES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Finance. Does the government of Canada, itself or through the Bank of Canada, maintain a direct contact with the discussions which are taking place in Luxembourg as well as other discussions which obviously are taking place in a very desperate effort to save a very difficult situation with regard to European currencies?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Yes, we are in touch and so is the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

POSSIBLE GOVERNMENT ACTION AGAINST UNITED STATES SUBSIDIARIES DELAYING DIVIDEND PAYMENTS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if the government is contemplating taking any steps in respect of the actions of some United States owned subsidiaries in Canada which are delaying dividend payments to the parent firms in the United States, thus contributing to the problem which is now under study?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if I can accept the preamble to the hon. gentleman's question and therefore I do not know how relevant my answer would be.

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY ON HOLDINGS OF GOLD AND UNITED STATES DOLLARS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Finance could tell us why Canada in recent years has increased its holdings of depreciating assets, namely United States dollars, while decreasing its holdings of appreciating assets, namely gold. Does it intend to maintain this policy?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): It is a little difficult for me to answer that unless the hon. member wants to have a debate about it.

Mr. Nowlan: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, in order to clarify the confusion that seems to exist in the minister's mind. In view of the very large holdings of United States dollars and the decreased holdings of gold, does the government or the Bank of Canada have any policy to diversify their holdings of reserves or does the government or the Bank of Canada have a guarantee on the exchange rate on the dollars we hold.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No; there is no guaranteed rate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of supplementaries are sought. Perhaps for the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre.

Mr. Benjamin: It is not a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate it is not. The hon. member is recognized so that we may finish the first round of questions, and then return to the supplementaries.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGATIONS BY FORMER CORPORAL RAMSAY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. In view of his admission yesterday that he had not read the article by ex-Corporal Ramsay which appeared in Maclean's Magazine, and in view of the serious charges and other statements in the article, has he now read the article, and if not why not? If he has, what action does he intend to take by way of inquiry? Also, will he make a statement in the House?

• (1420)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I have not yet had the time to read that article. As for an inquiry into the RCMP, it would be untimely in view of the circumstances because no precise fact which could justify it was drawn to my attention.

[English]

ALLEGED PUBLICATION OF PART OF CONSULTANTS REPORT BY COMMISSIONER—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT

Mr. Benjamin: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that Commissioner Higgitt has made public statements in which he quoted certain portions of a consultants report which was submitted to the force and classified as an internal document, and since part of the report has now been made public by the Commissioner, will the minister table the entire report so that its entire contents may be known to this House and the public?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: No, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member so well said, it is an internal document among others on which we are working.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Selkirk on a supplementary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Selkirk.

ALLEGATIONS BY FORMER CORPORAL RAMSAY—POSSIBLE INVESTIGATION

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In light of the fact that the article referred to by my colleague makes serious charges and that those charges must either be true, in which case there are some problems in the RCMP or false in which case the reputation of the RCMP has been unnecessarily damaged, will the minister make an investigation of the charges referred to in the article so that they can be cleared up.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, some articles praise the work of the RCMP to the skies. I am as sceptical about them as I am of those that damn it to Hades.

My duty is to see that the RCMP meet the aspirations of Canadians, that it gives a truly honest and competent service.

[English]

ALLEGATIONS BY FORMER CORPORAL RAMSAY—REQUEST THAT MINISTER READ ARTICLE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman has become a supporter of the RCMP and is no longer trying to remove the letters R.C. I ask him this: is there not some way in which he can find the time in which to read that very critical article. I know he is busy. We see him busily occupied all the time with other things. Can we hope that by tomorrow he will be able to secure the leisure time that will enable him, even without a reading course, to read this article which is so condemnatory of a police force which should not be attacked in that way.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I have the highest respect for royalty, as the right hon. member knows, I do not besmirch it at every turn. Second, as far as—

[English]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Tell us another one.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the hon. gentleman should have an opportunity—

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please. I am suggesting we should not have a debate. Perhaps the minister could reply to the right hon. gentleman's question, and then there are supplementaries which we will hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, when it comes to reading articles or documents I do not expect the right hon. gentleman to tell me what I should read, not anymore than he would accept to read what I would like to suggest to him.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister has given a sawdust Caesar type of answer to Parliament. I ask him this: does he intend to read this article that is so condemnatory of the Mounted Police, instead of pretending he has not read it?

POSSIBLE AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS OF ACT GOVERNING SERVICE COURT PROCEDURES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's answers about reading the article, may I ask him whether he has at least read the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that a question such as this one is entirely out of order. Perhaps he might want to ask a question that is acceptable from a procedural standpoint.

Mr. Lewis: With respect, Your Honour stopped me a little soon. I hope the minister has read the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act because I want to ask him whether in view of the archaic, star chamber provisions in that act with respect to offences by members of the force, and the methods of trial of members of the force, he is giving consideration to amending it so as to make it more civilized than it is?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, we are conducting a review of the Commissioner of Penitentiaries Standing Orders applying to discipline within these institutions because human rights are involved, which I consider to be fundamental. As for regulations governing conduct of members of the RCMP, that is fundamental and worthy of our attention because there also human rights are involved.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister points out that he deals with human rights, and in view of the fact that a member of the force may be charged by an officer, is then tried by an officer and his appeal is to an officer, and that he is not allowed any counsel except another member of the force—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask the question.

Mr. Lewis: Can the minister assure the House that he is giving serious consideration to bringing amendments before Parliament to provide for a decent and modern form of charge, trial and appeal for members of the force?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I have already raised that issue with the Commissioner and it concerns me considerably. I have no ready solution, but I should certainly like to know the hon. member's opinion on the matter.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are still at least six members who desire to ask supplementaries, and we have to deal with the supplementary to the original question asked by the hon. Leader of the Opposition. Perhaps we should recognize the hon. Leader of the Opposition who has a supplementary on this subject, and then I will recognize the hon. member for Portneuf.

ALLEGATIONS BY FORMER CORPORAL RAMSAY—REQUEST THAT MINISTER READ ARTICLE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the matters involved, would he seriously consider requesting the Solicitor General to read this article so that he will know what it is all about and then can look after the force he is supposed to look after?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

VALCARTIER—DISPARITY BETWEEN REMUNERATION OF TRADESMEN EMPLOYED ON BASE AND PRIVATE INDUSTRY—POSSIBLE READJUSTMENT

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of National Defence.

Since workers of different trades at Valcartier military base receive some 30 per cent less in salaries than their opposite numbers in private industry in the province of Quebec, could the hon. minister tell us whether studies are now being conducted in this regard and whether he will be in a position to inform us of salary adjustments in the very near future?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the salaries of civilian personnel working for the Department of National Defence are decided through collective bargaining in the same way as the salaries of the other employees in the public service.

[Translation]

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. minister aware that six years ago the difference between the wages of the tradesmen and those of their colleagues in private industry was only 5 per cent?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Edmonton Centre has a supplementary to the first question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

EDMONTON HUMP YARD—SUGGESTED LIMITATION ON HOURS OF OPERATION

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Would the minister see to it that the Canadian National hump yard in the Calder, Athlone, Lauderdale and the Elm Park areas of the city of Edmonton be prohibited from operating between 11 p.m. and 7 a.m. because of the noise factor which unduly distresses the worthy residents of these areas?

Mr. Speaker: That of course is representation. Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I gave notice of this question to the Minister of Transport, and I hoped to receive an answer for those poor senior citizens and residents in this area who would like to have this whole Calder yard transferred to the constituency of Edmonton Strathcona, where it would not do any harm.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF VALUE OF DOLLAR ON GRAIN PRICES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the par value of the dollar is having an adverse effect on grain prices, has the minister any plans to alleviate the very considerable crisis created because of the extremely low prices received by the Canadian farmer?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, prior to the new situation that arose when the pound was floated, the banks had taken action to lower their rate of interest on short-term money and certificates of deposit. That has had the effect of making short-term money rates less attractive in Canada and has affected the rate of exchange beneficially as it has gone down by one point. As I said to the House earlier, I will be talking to the provinces during the next few weeks to inquire about their foreign borrowing requirements and see if I can prevail upon them to orchestrate those requirements a little better.

SUGGESTED CANCELLATION OF CORPORATION AND PERSONAL INCOME TAXES TO STIMULATE BUSINESS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Since the increase in corporation and personal income taxes which were due to take place on January 1, next, would greatly reduce the effectiveness of the reduction in corporation tax as applied to the manufacturing industry, is the minister giving consideration to cancelling these two tax increases so that business in Canada will be encouraged as much as possible to expand its operations immediately?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the corporate tax relating to that part of the business community most affected and vulnerable to international competition, namely manufacturers and processors, was cut by 20 per cent effective January 1. That will be of immense value in achieving the results that I know the hon. member desires.

• (1430)

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I agree, of course, with what the minister said. May I point out again that these tax increases greatly reduce the effect—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member had the floor for that purpose, but he was making a speech. The hon. member should ask his supplementary.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is as follows: Has the minister's doctor not told him that it is dangerous to keep his head in the sand so much of the time these days?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INTERVIEW OF BERNADETTE DEVLIN ON FRENCH NETWORK—POSITION OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask a question to the hon. Secretary of State but, as he is absent, I shall direct it to the Prime Minister.

Recently, Miss Bernadette Devlin, Member of Parliament for Northern Ireland, was invited by the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and she said she received high fees to give marxist opinions on the world revolution which would settle the problem of Ireland and Quebec, and this by violence.

As a taxpayer and as an hon. member, I should like to know when the government will ask the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to refrain from inviting undesirable persons from other countries who come to Canada to pollute our airwaves and preach revolution and violence.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State has indicated on several occasions that he was referring to the Crown corporation representations such as those made by the hon. member, but I think the Progressive Conservative party itself would object if the minister intervened too often and too directly in the internal decisions of the corporation.

TRADE

ALLEGATION UNITED STATES DISC PROGRAM INCREASES COMPETITION FOR CANADIAN COMPANIES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. What steps has he taken to meet a situation which is now developing whereby some United States manufacturers are approaching Canadian merchandisers and saying that they now can compete with Canadian made goods as a consequence of receiving grants under the U.S. DISC program.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I said in the speech I made in the budget debate that we would look into particular situations. If my hon. friend can indicate one, I will look into it immediately.

PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SUGGESTED INCREASE FOR RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister yet in a position to make a progress report on his efforts to secure substantial improvements in railway pensions with respect to both the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is my hope and intention that I will be able to make a statement on this subject before the end of the current week.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will that statement apply to both railways, to the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I can only, of course, as the minister through whom CNR responds to the House, assure the hon. member that it will cover the CNR situation. I cannot at the moment say whether it will extend to CP.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You could at least try.

FLOODS

POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF COVERAGE OF FRASER VALLEY DIKING AUTHORITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. In view of the great need for vastly improved diking in many parts of the river systems of British Columbia, can the minister advise the House if he has received any representations from the government of British Columbia on this subject, especially with regard to extending the coverage of the Fraser Valley Diking Authority to other areas like Kamloops on the upper reaches of the system.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, not as yet.

Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister take the initiative and contact the government of British Columbia with a view to extending the authority of this diking corporation to cover any of the pressure spots and to prevent flooding in British Columbia.

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to restate our suggestions along those lines.

INDUSTRY

DOMINION AVIATION—STATUS OF APPLICATION FOR DEVELOPMENT GRANT—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON STOL PROJECTS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Some time ago I asked him about an application for a PAIT grant for Dominion Aircraft. Perhaps one of the ministers' quiet answers slipped by when I was not paying attention. May I ask the minister if this application has been rejected.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The PAIT committee, which is an interdepartmental committee, found that it was not able to recommend support for this project. The two principal factors in influencing this decision were, first, lack of convincing evidence of financial viability of the company and, second, concentration of the development work in the U.S.A. The research and development programs of the Canadian government are for research and development in Canada.

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since this decision appears to confirm the government's announced intention to concentrate government assistance on STOL projects in eastern Canada, would the minister facilitate the present announced intention of the government to seek American financing in order to proceed with this project.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I deny emphatically the postulate involved in the question, and I suggest that my hon. friend ought to be better informed on the project itself.

Mr. Baldwin: I wonder if the minister could answer the other part of the question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POST OFFICE

EGANVILLE—REASON FOR BILINGUAL REQUIREMENT IN ADVERTISEMENT FOR POSITION

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Postmaster General and arises from strong protests from the people of Eganville, 99 per cent of whom are English speaking. Why does a current competition for position No. P.O.1349-21P, that being an area competition for a part-time job in Eganville Post Office, carry the requirement that proficiency in both official languages is essential?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am wondering whether this question is not the type that might be considered at the time of adjournment. The hon. member might perhaps like to advise the House. It could more appropriately be considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

FEED GRAIN—EASTERN FARMERS SUPPLY—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN OTTAWA AND QUEBEC ON PRICE PARITY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

A few weeks ago I asked the minister whether he would make a statement in the House concerning the supply of feed grain for eastern farmers in order to grant them prices as high as those paid to western producers. Does the minister intend to make such statement before the end of the month?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I said to the hon. member some time ago, we intended to have the results of a number of studies that were going on, including representations from the livestock feed users in Eastern Canada. These studies have not been completed, although they have been expected before this date. I might advise the hon. member that the market has now changed in western Canada vis-à-vis prices in eastern Canada, so that there is really no disadvantage at the moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I wish to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the reply the hon. minister has just given, may I ask him whether discussions on this issue are still being carried out with his Quebec counterpart even though the price of pork has improved?

[English]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I have had some discussions with the Minister of Agriculture in Quebec on this subject. I think both he and I are waiting for the results of the study and the recommendations that we expect to get from the representatives of the people who are directly involved.

FEED—POSSIBLE INCLUSION OF PROTEIN CONTENT AND MINERAL PHOSPHATES UNDER FREIGHT ASSISTANCE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. On June 13 my colleague, the hon. member for Huron, asked the parliamentary secretary to the minister a question about feed freight assistance and whether a decision had been made to include feed supplements in the feed freight assistance program. May I ask if this is also part of the study and if the minister will be in position to make a statement on this before the end of the week?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, some studies have been under way. Some pilot projects for shipping high protein supplements by a more economical means to the Maritime provinces have also taken place. Answering the first part of the question briefly, it is not included in the feed freight assistance program at the moment.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

ALLEGED CRISIS CENTRE—STAFF OF GENERAL DARE—TERMS OF REFERENCE FOR RESEARCH PROJECT—HIRING OF PEOPLE OUTSIDE PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Prime Minister. He may perhaps recall that a couple of weeks ago I asked him some questions with regard to a crisis management centre and he informed us that there was no such centre, but that there was a post occupied by General Dare. He was also good enough to undertake that he would look into the matter of whether General Dare was assisted directly or indirectly by anyone else. May I ask the Prime Minister whether he has made this inquiry and whether he can tell us exactly what staff, directly or indirectly, General Dare has for the purpose indicated.

• (1440)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did make the inquiries and, as the hon. member suggests, this was a few weeks ago. I think I am correct when I indicate that General Dare is the only person who is seconded to the Privy Council office to conduct this research study, but he is directly assisted by people who are seconded to him from their own departments. I believe there are four in number. They are not detached from their departments but seconded to General Dare. The terms of reference about which the hon. member also asked me have been made public since that time, and if the House so desires I will table a copy of them.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps now that they have been made public the Prime Minister might agree to table those terms of reference.

I should also like to ask him whether he has further information as to whether General Dare, Colonel Sutherland and the others who are working directly on this project have also engaged the services of people outside the public service, members of the university staffs, and so on, to do some of the studies? Would the Prime Minister at some point make a statement to the House as to the reason for the expenditures for these studies?

Mr. Trudeau: I believe I can answer part of the question right now. I have found the memo indicating the names of the people who are seconded to General Dare and are on loan from various agencies. There is Colonel Sutherland, on loan from the Department of National Defence; Mr. White, on loan from the Emergency Measures Organization; Mr. Blackwell, on loan from the Emergency Measures Organizations, and Mr. Woodend on loan from the Defence Research Board. Two people have been retained on contracts for specific studies, namely Professor Jackson and Professor Van Loon.

As to the other part of the question, I believe the hon. member will see from the terms of reference the reasons they are working on these projects and what their terms of reference are.

ALLEGED CRISIS MANAGEMENT CENTRE—DEPARTMENT RESPONSIBLE FOR EXPENDITURES

Mr. Lewis: Could the Prime Minister inform the House whether the expenditures for this exercise come out of the Privy Council office or the Prime Minister's office? Precisely under what umbrella are these expenditures being made?

Mr. Trudeau: I believe the expenditures come from the Privy Council office. If that is not correct, I will report to the House, but I am almost certain that it is so.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY AS TO OVERTIME WORK WITHOUT PAY

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I put a question to the Solicitor General who was temporarily out of the House. Is the Solicitor General now in a position to reply to my specific question concerning the fact that members of the RCMP are sometimes instructed to work more than 300 hours a month?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in any case the overtime payment question is being examined; it requires much time precisely because we wanted to consult the RCMP. The estimates approved by Parliament provide a sum of money that will be distributed one way or another this year until we arrive at a definite system.

FURTHER ALLEGATIONS BY FORMER CORPORAL RAMSAY—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. In view of the further statement made over the weekend by ex-Corporal Ramsay in Vancouver that what was contained in the article "isn't the half of it" and:

> They wouldn't let me print all that I wanted because of libel laws.

Would the minister reconsider his position and at least talk to Corporal Ramsay and get all the evidence in the case?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CRITERIA FOR TEMPORARY RELEASE—AVAILABILITY OF PSYCHIATRIC REPORTS IN CASE OF CHARLES HEAD

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a question for the Solicitor General. It arises out of questions I asked the Minister of Justice the other day in relation to his temporary release program. The parole board, which has nothing to do with it, is getting blamed. I wish to ask him again what criteria are followed when temporary release is given to dangerous sex offenders, and particularly is a report from a psychiatrist demanded before they are released?

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Perhaps my hon. friend over there needs a psychiatrist. Is a report demanded from a psychiatrist indicating that the person is now rehabilitated and it is now safe to release him into society?

Mr. Speaker: If the minister replies to the question, I hope he will be brief because the first part of the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary North would appear to invite a rather lengthy statement. However, the minister will be recognized for the purpose of replying briefly to the hon. member's question.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of guidelines given by the Commissioner of the Canadian Penitentiary Service which are used to determine whether a prisoner should be paroled or not. If the hon. member never was aware of that, I will be glad to send him a copy.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate the minister's full answer. I have another short question, Mr. Speaker. Was there a psychiatrist's report approving the release of Mr. Head, who was given an indeterminate sentence as a dangerous sex offender, before his temporary release in the light of the fact that the parole board refused his parole?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I must say that the prisoner involved had 94 interviews with various psychiatrists over a period of five years. In other words, that prisoner has been receiving intensive treatment from our department.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: I have one more question, Mr. Speaker. Did the particular person in question refuse to be interviewed by a psychiatrist, and was that the reason the parole board recently refused to release him? I ask the minister how he justifies the 90 interviews to which he referred when the parole board refused his release.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is obviously an argument.

Mr. Woolliams: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INCREASE IN CONSULTATION MECHANISMS—BRIEF OF QUEBEC CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE—RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT SECRETARIAT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Last week, at their annual conference, the delegates of the Chambers of Commerce sent Premier Bourassa a resolution asking him to establish mechanisms for consultation with the federal government and Mr. Bourassa replied that he felt it was essential to increase consultation mechanisms with Ottawa—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member could ask his question without such a long preamble.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, since the Quebec premier stated that he felt it was essential to increase consultation mechanisms with Ottawa in order to avoid unnecessary tensions within federalism, would the Prime Minister indicate whether he is prepared to favour the establishment of such mechanisms?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, consultation mechanisms already exist and are used a great deal in respect of relations between the federal government and all provinces. I would be prepared, if the Chambers of Commerce are interested, to indicate to them the number of consultation mechanisms already existing. I think the record would show that we have established more of those than any previous government.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

The province of Quebec having made known its wishes concerning reopening of constitutional negotiations, is the Prime Minister in a position to indicate whether he intends to re-establish the permanent secretariat responsible for federal-provincial conferences?

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the secretariat is still in existence. Only, the staff has been reduced. If the province of Quebec really wants to submit specific proposals with a view to reopening the debate and recalling federal-provincial conferences, we will consider doing so.

CATTLE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON METHODS TO AVOID LOSS OF ANIMALS IN TRANSIT

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns the meeting which was held last Friday between the Humane Society, representatives of the railroad companies and officials of the Department of Agriculture in order to determine what progress is being made in new methods of shipping cattle from western Canada to eastern Canada which will avoid severe losses such as occurred last fall. Does the minister believe the situation will be better this fall?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Of course, we can never predict precisely what the weather will be like next winter. Last year there were some unfortunate coincidences involving severe weather, the difficulty of getting cars through certain railroad terminals, and so on. We hope all of these problems can be avoided.

Hon. Donald C. Will the minister be making a progress report on this program by way of a statement on motions before the House rises at the end of June?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to do so. However, I can advise the House that this program will be terminated today because we have reached the objective of reducing the flock by about one million birds.

FOWL SLAUGHTER PROGRAM—REQUEST TO EXTEND DEADLINE FOR GRANTS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary to the Minister of Agriculture concerning the policy on slaughtering fowl.

Since on June 8 the minister announced that subsidies would vary in so far as the objective would be attained within a period of eight weeks or less and since many producers of my area have not been able to claim that subsidy—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a speech when he should ask a question.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, could the minister indicate how he can grant the same benefits to producers who have not yet applied for this subsidy?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I recognize that this is a problem, but we did announce at the time the program was initiated that when the total flock had been reduced by an appropriate amount it would be terminated whether that process took four weeks, six weeks, eight weeks, or any other period. There has been a very significant improvement in egg prices and now we have reached the point in numbers at which the objective of flock reduction has been attained.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

HALIFAX DOCKYARD—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ACCIDENT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Minister of National Defence. It concerns the two tragic deaths in the Halifax dockyard the other day. Can the minister tell us whether the inquiry, which I know must be taking place, has produced any evidence of negligence to date?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. I have received no report on the inquiry in this case.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-170, to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: By leave now?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the House.

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: It requires unanimous consent and since there is not unanimous consent, the bill cannot be given third reading now.

Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I understood that you put the request that, by leave, we move to third reading.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair did this and it required unanimous consent. There was one member who objected. Perhaps hon. members wish me to inquire again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the no as well as I did.

FARM CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LOANS AND POWERS AND CAPITAL OF CORPORATION

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-5, to amend the Farm Credit Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The discussions and conferences taking place should be held outside the curtains so that we may proceed with the work of the House.

I should point out that motion No. 1 would appear to be acceptable on procedural grounds. Motion No. 2 would appear to be defective in that it would seem to insert a financial provision in the main act that is not covered in the bill that is before the House. Of course, hon. members will be given the opportunity to offer their advice to the Chair on the procedural aspects of this motion.

Section 23 of the main act relates to the making of regulations with respect to the Farm Credit Act. However, it might be better if we do not go into this aspect of the matter now, and instead proceeded with motion No. 1. Whenever we reach motion No. 2 the Chair will hear hon. members on the procedural aspects of the motion.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to move motion No. 1 on behalf of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). I would point out, however, that because of the arrangements that were made, assuming we would be proceeding with the other bill hon. members who are keenly interested in this bill are presently involved in committee proceedings. We hope they will be here for the purpose of debating this motion, but at the moment I am prepared to move it on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Baldwin, for Mr. Mazankowski, seconded by Mr. Hees, moves motion No. 1 as follows:

That Bill C-5, an act to amend the Farm Credit Act, be amended by deleting lines 8 to 15 on page 1 thereof and by substituting therefor the following:

"(1.1) The corporation has all the powers necessary to carry out such duties or functions in relation to the administration of any agricultural program as is assigned to it pursuant to any other act of the Parliament of Canada."

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, is the minister going to make a statement of any kind on this bill?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, without repeating the substance of the argument that took place on an amendment which, if not identical certainly was similar to this one in its substantive parts, was moved in committee I would point out that such an amendment was defeated in committee.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, at this short notice, not anticipating that the bill would come up until tomorrow, I would like to attempt to explain what this motion means. Clause 1 of the bill really does not have much to do with the Farm Credit Act as such, but simply gives the governor in council any authority necessary to carry out any provisions it may wish to have carried out with respect to the small farm development program announced by the government more than a year ago.

During the committee hearings we received representations from two provincial ministers of agriculture and from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the National Farmers Union. All these representations expressed reservations at Parliament handing the government the type of power provided in clause 1 of the bill. They contended that it was not necessary for the Farm Credit Corporation to carry out additional duties as provided in this bill through amendments to the Farm Credit Act.

The amending bill increases the amount that an individual borrower may obtain from $40,000 to $100,000. We do not quarrel with that. Many farmers are waiting for this bill to be passed so they can make use of the additional funds available and we do not quarrel with the increase in the ceiling to $100,000. In fact, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture told the committee it would like to see the ceiling raised to $250,000.

We contend that it is entirely unnecessary to put in clause 1 sweeping power to carry into effect the small farm development program, particularly when the minister and his officials are unable to give us any indication of how that program will be carried out and which farmers will be eligible. The federal government has been negotiating with the provinces in an endeavour to reach agreement on the provincial departments of agriculture supplying all the personnel to administer the program. I point out that many of the provinces already have their own programs. Ontario makes very effective use of the ARDA program, the cost of which is shared 50 per cent by the province and 50 per cent by the federal government, and the administration is carried out by the province. Ontario has some concern that the small farms development program put on top of ARDA will mean a considerable mix-up.

Some of the western provinces have also initiated their own programs, and they have been completely unable to come to agreement with the federal government on the authority that clause 1 of the bill would give to the Farm Credit Corporation. Those are the principal reasons this motion has been moved, that is, to prevent giving the governor in council a great deal of power when it does not yet know what use will be made of it.

• (1540)

We feel that when the small farm development program is spelled out to Parliament, hon. members might be willing to go along with this additional power. However, we do not think the power should be granted without further explanation. That is why this amendment is moved, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—as a matter of fact, probably two points of order, but I shall deal with them both at the same time. First of all, in view of the fact that this piece of legislation is before the House unexpectedly, I wonder if word has been communicated to members who are attending a meeting of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I suspect that there may be some members attending that meeting who will be surprised and who would want to be here.

My second point of order concerns the proceedings for the rest of the day. I know, of course, that I could speak personally with the government House leader about what would take place after this, but I believe all hon. members are entitled to know what the order of business will be when we finish dealing with the farm credit legislation.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that information has gone to the committee advising members that this bill is now before the House. When this bill is cleared I shall call the Canada Labour Code.

Mr. Horner: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is all very well to advise the committee on agriculture that this bill is being discussed, but there are amendments before the House on the bill which are the result of committee study. I think the government House leader (Mr. MacEachen) should either ask the agricultural committee to suspend its sitting while this bill is being discussed in the House, so that members can participate, or he should call the Canada Labour Code and stand this bill until tomorrow.

It was my understanding that the Canadian Wheat Board would appear before the committee for today only. I might add that it was the practice in the past to study the annual report of the Canadian Wheat Board each year, but today the committee must study four annual reports. I am not in any way linking the four annual reports to the term of office of the present government. I am sure it is not necessary to mention to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), who knows the prominent part that the Canadian Wheat Board plays in the welfare of Canadian farmers generally, that he might use his good offices to ask that this bill stand so that the annual reports of the Canadian Wheat Board can be dealt with.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, the government whip has indicated to the chairman of the agricultural committee that this bill is now before the House. While I have no authority to suggest or demand that they suspend their hearings in order to attend in the House for the consideration of Bill C-5, I did suggest that they could consider suspending their sitting while these two amendments were being dealt with.

Mr. Horner: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, we were told this morning that the Wheat Board would stay today in Ottawa, meet with representatives of the other place tomorrow morning and then return to Winnipeg, I imagine tomorrow afternoon. If the committee proceedings this afternoon were suspended, I believe the four annual reports would not be adequately scrutinized. I do not think that the government House leader or the Minister of Agriculture would like to shoulder the responsibility for that important body not being fully examined, particularly when wheat, barley and oats are selling at the lowest price in history.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, may I say that I agree with the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) on this point, though I seldom do agree with him. The Wheat Board report was brought before the committee and we went only once around the table for a ten-minute discussion and three or four members did not have the opportunity to ask questions. Many of us wished to put further questions to the Wheat Board this afternoon.

As the hon. member for Crowfoot pointed out, this is the first opportunity we have to look at the four reports of the Canadian Wheat Board, a body which affects every farmer in western Canada. If we are to deal with this matter in the House at a time when the committee is sitting, we should consider whether we are limiting the very important discussion that should be going on in committee with the Canadian Wheat Board as well as the very important discussion that should be going on in this House on the Farm Credit Act.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, if the committee now in session wished to suspend its sittings, it could resume at five o'clock and make up the hour that would be taken of the hour and ten minutes from now until private members' hour, so both objectives could go forward at the same time without prejudice to the wheat farmer.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that we are getting into the area of diminishing returns because in the atmosphere which now prevails it is most unlikely that consent would be given to third reading of the farm credit bill today, and amendments which are not now being discussed as actively as they might be could be the subject of third reading amendments. The minister is well aware of this. The result would be the same. I am sure the minister, with that flare for compromise which marks his presence here today, would be quite prepared to agree to suspend these proceedings and go on with the Canada Labour Code.

Some hon. Members: Why not?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we are not adamant about remaining on this item, but it was my understanding that we would move to it when we had completed third reading of the Family Income Security Plan. That possibility was removed by the failure of one member of the House to give unanimous consent—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On your side.

Mr. MacEachen: —and we were obliged to move to this item. I would be quite happy to call the Canada Labour Code, but hon. members opposite may not be ready to cope with it at the moment.

Some hon. Members: We are ready.

Mr. MacEachen: I do not want to create any difficulty by calling that item, but if it is agreeable and if the mover of the first amendment is ready, then I would call it and hope the minister would return to the House as quickly as possible. In the meantime, his parliamentary secretary would stand in for him.

Mr. Baldwin: We are prepared to do that, Mr. Speaker. The member of our party who has moved the amendment is here, as would other hon. members have been had it not been for this very important meeting. I think it would be conducive to good management and would facilitate the business of the House if we were to move to the Canada Labour Code.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to talk on either the farm credit bill or the Canada Labour Code, but if the switch is made to the latter I should like to reserve some rights about the order of the amendments, in view of the fact that one or two of our members are not in the chamber at this point because of the change of plan effected by a certain member on the other side of the House.

• (1550)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we could consider the Canada Labour Code.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Is there unanimous consent that we not continue at this time with Bill C-5.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, if the other parties are ready to proceed with the Canada Labour Code, we could proceed with it. Apparently there is some willingness to consider the Canada Labour Code. If not, we could possibly ask for third reading of the Family Income Security Plan.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But the minister is not present.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the House is now faced with problems. I have listened most carefully to all the points of order and to the questions of procedure that have been raised.

I can understand perfectly the stand taken by the members of the committee on agriculture, especially by those interested in the Canadian Wheat Board. It is abundantly clear that the House is anxious to deal with Bill C-5, an Act to amend the Farm Credit Act, and also with the proposed amendment to that bill.

So far as we are concerned, we are willing to vote in favour of the motion to adjourn our proceedings on Bill C-5, and to revert to consideration of bill C-183, an Act to amend the Canada Labour Code.

I express the hope that the last motion introduced will carry unanimously, and we are willing to vote for it.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to adjourn this debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since it has been decided that we are not at present to continue consideration of the farm credit bill in view of difficulties occasioned by hon. members having to attend the agricultural committee, may I on behalf of my party ask the government House leader to assure us that after the Canada Labour Code has been dealt with the farm credit bill will be brought back to the House.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to give the farm credit bill high priority.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD, INDUSTRIAL INQUIRY COMMISSIONS AND CONCILIATION BOARDS

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-183, to amend the Canada Labour Code, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West) moved motion No. 1 as follows:

That Bill C-183, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code, be amended by deleting lines 1 to 29 on page 1 thereof and striking out the words "Now Therefore," where they appear in line 1 on page 2 thereof.

He said: Mr. Speaker, one can see what happens when the government backs down from an original position and attempts to bring in legislation at the last minute. The government has had a whole year—

An hon. Member: No, four years.

Mr. Alexander: —in which to bring in this particular piece of legislation. That is irresponsible, since hon. members who may wish to debate this bill have not been given sufficient notice. Notwithstanding these difficulties, we will debate the bill since we on this side can face almost any situation. We are certainly prepared to proceed.

The purpose of this amendment is quite obvious, I think. It seeks to remove from the bill the preamble as printed. If we reflect for a moment upon the entire collective bargaining process, we will have valid reason for thinking that many people, those covered by union-management arrangements and those not so covered, question the efficacy of the collective bargaining process. I say that because the port of Montreal, in Trois-Rivières and Quebec City no one seems to be concerned about the provisions of the Canada Labour Code as now in effect. The law, apparently, is being flouted and collective agreements are being flouted.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Alexander: Apparently the government does not know what to do even though the public interest is being adversely affected to the tune of $1 million a day. This is a conservative figure and applies to the city of Montreal. When we consider all the categories of goods and materials that must move across this country, including wheat from our western provinces, we recognize, I submit, that this type of preamble is not one that we can accept. I respectfully suggest for my party that we cannot accept the premises embodied in this preamble.

I shall read the second paragraph of the preamble. I object to sentences or words which lead to an improper conclusion with regard to the entire area of labour-management relations. The paragraph I refer to reads:

> And Whereas Canadian workers, trade unions and employers recognize and support freedom of association and free collective bargaining as the bases of effective industrial relations for the determination of good working conditions and sound labour-management relations—

I take issue with the idea that freedom of association and free collective bargaining are the bases of effective industrial relations. This idea, to me, is wrong in principle. Surely it would not take one long to find an example showing that freedom of association and collective bargaining did not play any role whatever in good industrial relations and in industrial peace. I am referring specifically to Dominion Foundries and the Steel Company of Canada.

In addition, reflecting on the total problem we will realize, I submit, that this bill affects only about 538,000 employees who come under federal jurisdiction. If my memory serves me right, approximately one-third of this country's work force is involved with freedom of association clauses and collective bargaining. In other words, two-thirds of the workers of this nation are not involved with unions or with management; neither unions nor management are involved in decisions regarding industrial peace.

We take exception to this preamble. We have tried to make the bill more meaningful by indicating that freedom of association and collective bargaining in total are merely one of the facets, one of the bases, to use the language of the preamble, underlying effective industrial relations. Why could the government not say, "Although we are most zealous with respect to the entire collective bargaining process, we admit that factors other than collective bargaining can lead to industrial enlightenment and peace." Management and labour together can work together for the benefit of the entire work force. Together, unselfishly, they could work for the benefit of the entire economy of the country, bring about security of tenure under the wage structure and deal with the whole gamut of matters in which management and labour are usually involved.

For some reason, however, the government says, "We cannot allow this sort of thing because freedom of association and collective bargaining are the bases of good industrial relations." Surely upon quick reflection, and much more so on profound reflection, one cannot admit that. We say that if we are to be responsible and attempt to bring about industrial peace, which is the basis of this bill, we must start on the proper premise, and the proper premise does not allow a preamble such as this.

• (1600)

Another objection I have to the preamble is that those who will have to deliberate, who will come before the conciliation board, the arbitration board or the Canada labour board will invariably look to the preamble for guidance. I say that this is wrong. I say that the bill should speak for itself and I see no reason for a preamble such as we have here. I know why the preamble was put in. An agreement was made between the government and the union as the result of a compromise and it was decided to put in clause 149. I respect the action of the government in that regard. But I say, give us a break and put in a preamble indicating the worth of the collective bargaining process and freedom of association leading to industrial peace.

Let us consider where the preamble is placed. As I see it now, it is in part V of the Canada Labour Code which is the part which deals with industrial relations. I do not know whether this preamble will be in the middle or at the front of the Canada Labour Code. This will mean that when one peruses such legislation one will have to look for the preamble in order to ascertain what it is all about and the principle behind it.

I say that we must question the collective bargaining process; it does not seem to be working because labour and management have not been bargaining in good faith. Secondly, they have taken inflexible positions. Thirdly, they should make full and complete disclosure. It seems to me that the whole process should be built upon these three criteria, which at present it is not. I see the hon. member across the way smiling. I could not reach him in committee and I do not know whether I am reaching him now.

I say that so long as the collective bargaining process is as it is today—it is under severe questioning in regard to the postal strikes, the Montreal port strikes and the NABET strike—it leaves much to be desired. It is questioned to such an extent that many people are asking the government to accept public responsibility and to become involved because the collective bargaining process is breaking down. I know that the minister will have much to say about this matter, but the position of the government is that even though the collective bargaining process is breaking down, freedom of association and collective bargaining are the bases of effective industrial relations. I say they are not, because other things are involved which this preamble does not recognize.

To go further would be repetitious, Mr. Speaker, but I hope I have given sufficient reasons for the House to reach the conclusion that this type of manoeuver should be questioned because, as has been said, it is doing neither harm nor good and since this is the case it should be wiped out. I hope that when other hon. members have commented on this motion the minister will give us the reason for the preamble being included, why it is so lengthy and what he hopes to accomplish by it. Will this preamble in fact make the collective bargaining process useful? Will it improve it? I say that it will not.

I hope that hon. members understand what I say and will give credit where credit is due. This bill wipes out two-thirds of the work force, the non-unionized work force, by referring specifically to those who are unionized.

This is supposed to be the basis for reaching industrial peace. This I refute.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) regarding the preamble of this bill. On reading it, I find that it is like motherhood: I cannot see anything wrong with it, but I agree that it does not carry much weight. It appears to be just a reiteration of what is generally accepted as being the requirement of collective bargaining and the right to free association. Therefore, I wonder if the hon. member would not be prepared to accept an amendment which would put this into clause 1 instead of removing the preamble. I have been unable to understand why the hon. member wishes to remove it.

One of the problems we have in Canada today is that the government is involved in this legislation to the extent of about half a million employees out of a total of five million organized workers in the country who are involved in collective bargaining. This means that 10 per cent are in government service. One of the difficulties we are having, not only in terms of what is happening in the federal government but in provincial and municipal governments, is that in most cases a new principle must be stated in the preamble which would allow collective bargaining in the government services, because to all intents and purposes it is non-existent on the municipal, provincial or federal level.

In any negotiation the two parties should bargain in good faith, eyeball to eyeball. Certainly no negotiations carried on with the federal Treasury Board are eyeball to eyeball. In most cases when difficulties arise, in the final analysis the cabinet intervenes and makes a decision which in the first place should have been reached through the collective bargaining process. This is true also in the municipal field, and one of the charges that is being levelled is that there has been a failure in negotiations between management and labour as a result of which there have been many strikes, particularly in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver resulting, in some cases, in garbage piling up higher and higher day by day. In these cases negotiations have continued until a crisis situation has been reached and a strike has taken place.

We should strengthen the preamble of the bill and adapt it to modern needs. The power given to the minister to intervene, through a mediator, at an early stage in negotiations which involve the public interest will go some way toward meeting one of the problems which face us. So far, the public seems to have been left out; they appear to have no say in collective bargaining, though the result may affect them in many ways. My own view is that authority for the intervention of a mediator should be set out in one of the operative clauses of the bill.

I do not know why the committee decided to delete the preamble. The purpose would probably be better served if it were strengthened and if supplementary provisions were written into the body of the legislation. Lawyers, it has been said, have never found themselves able to interpret the preamble of a bill as having any legal force, anyway.

[Mr. Alexander.]

There should be contained in the legislation and referred to in the preamble a provision obliging both parties in dispute in the public service sector to negotiate in a meaningful way toward the compromise which is normally reached when two parties arrive at a contract. But the government has failed to negotiate in good faith with its employees in any of the major conflicts which have developed in recent years. They failed to negotiate honestly with the air traffic controllers, for example, or with the postal employees. Nor were negotiations in good faith carried out with the striking government employees in Quebec.

At yet another level, no meaningful bargaining took place between elected representatives and the strikers in major cities demanding a better reward for garbage collection. A similar situation has arisen in Ontario where the hydro dispute is still in progress. The workers are, in fact, not negotiating with anybody. It is true they have held meetings with officials, but those officials are not empowered to make decisions in the absence of further consultation.

In most cases it is only after a long and damaging strike that negotiations eventually take place between the workers and people who until then have not been involved in the negotiations in any way. It is not sufficient to deal with departmental heads. There are limits beyond which they cannot go, and as soon as they have made their counterproposals to union demands the negotiations have been completed as far as they are concerned.

I would be prepared to move that this preamble be included in clause 1 of the bill and that additional amendments be submitted to the minister, or by the minister to eliminate deficiencies in the negotiating process of which the hon. gentleman is surely aware. If the mediator who is appointed under this legislation to sit in on the negotiations is a man of any calibre at all, he will advise the minister that the heads of government departments and agencies are not carrying on meaningful negotiations and that changes must be made. The general public is aware that in most of the major strikes recently in the public service, the employees, whether municipal, provincial or federal, have not received an adequate response to their proposals and that meaningful negotiations have not, in fact, taken place.

I strongly urge the minister to make the changes which he, together with almost every Canadian who reads the newspapers, knows to be necessary. In the absence of such changes untold hardship is being caused both to workers and to the general public. The object should be to give a fair deal to the half-million citizens who must negotiate through the type of legislation which is before us and who give leadership to another four million who negotiate with boards, agencies and corporations in which the public has an indirect degree of ownership.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with one particular matter in speaking to the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). I wish to encourage the Department of Labour and the government generally to broaden their vision and see that Canadian working conditions and standards are adhered to in the coastal waters of Canada. My reference will be to the Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement as it relates to collective bargaining and living conditions on vessels which operate in coastal waters. The ship I have in mind sails between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, but other ports are affected as well.

• (1620)

The British Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement received support from this chamber on June 8, 1934, a day otherwise marked by the fact that one Mitchell Hepburn resigned from the chamber. Mr. Manion asked, "Where does he go from here?" and Mr. Hanbury replied, "He is going to be the next premier of Ontario". That forecast was an exact one. Then followed a couple of private bills, and then the debate on the Canada Shipping Act, which is found at page 3812 and subsequent pages of Hansard of that date.

The Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement was a replacement, thanks to the Statute of Westminster, of British statutes that formerly had some application in Canada. In other words, this was an important measure in the Canadian process of growing up as a nation. The Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement was signed by the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland and laid down the main lines along which legislation should be enacted in the different dominions.

There are ten parts to the agreement, dealing with common statutes in ownerships, uniform standards of safety, extraterritorial operation of laws, equal treatment for all ships registered in the British Commonwealth, internal discipline, engagement and discharge of seamen, standards of qualification for officers, shipping inquiries and courts, relief and repatriation of seamen, offences on board ship, and general provisions related to the implementation of the agreement. The agreement also provided that changes could be made to it, but oddly enough only one change has been made to the agreement, and that at the instance of Canada about ten years ago. However, the change is not relevant to the argument that I should like to make. The library of Parliament has provided me with the information I have so far given the House.

On looking at the Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement one finds that under part III, which deals with the extraterritorial operation of laws, article 9 provides:

> Save as otherwise specially provided in this agreement, the laws relating to merchant shipping in force in one part of the Commonwealth shall not be made to apply with extraterritorial effect to ships registered in another part unless the consent of that other part of the Commonwealth has been previously obtained:—
> Provided that nothing contained in this article shall be deemed to restrict the power of each part of the Commonwealth to regulate the coasting trade, sea fisheries and fishing industry of that part.

What I have read so far is an enumeration of the matters covered by the Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement. One will readily note that, viewed from the standards applicable today, the agreement is remarkably silent in that nowhere does it mention wages and other benefits to which people working in Canada are accustomed nowadays. For example, workers are accustomed today to being paid reasonable amounts. They are accustomed to receiving reasonable holidays. They are accustomed to such reasonable fringe benefits as workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance in the event they are laid off, and so on. But those who drew up the Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement predated the present era and that agreement is remarkably silent on such matters.

My intervention in this debate will be a very brief but I think important one. It is to point out to the minister that there are ships in our waters manned by crews that are not used to the same standards of living as Canadian workers. I can supply the names of the countries from which these crews come, but I think that might give some colour to my speech that I certainly do not intend. What I am more interested in is to see that, wherever they come from, since these people, in effect, work in Canada and visit Canadian ports—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would ask the hon. member whether he is able to satisfy the Chair that his remarks are relevant to motion No. 1 now before the chamber. If the hon. member would so indicate, I would be pleased to hear him.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I understand that motion No. 1 deals with the preamble to the bill, which lays out the entire purpose of this legislation. The point I am trying to make to the minister is that in envisaging how this measure will be applied, he stop not at the coastal boundaries of Canada but also consider how ships operating within the Canadian coastal trade are living up to Canadian labour law or, rather, through some technicality are trying to get around Canadian labour law.

If my remarks are considered in order, Mr. Speaker, I can put my argument very briefly. I was pointing out that under the Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement there is nothing to restrict the application by the Canadian Department of Labour of Canadian standards of wages and working conditions to those who man ships registered under the Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement, seamen who are paid wages vastly different from those that any Canadian seaman worth his salt would put up with. This is my request to the minister. I think I have founded my argument sufficiently, and when the minister replies would he say whether his department will look at this particular situation.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I think it is useful to include a preamble such as this in the bill. I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and I must confess that his reasoning with regard to why the preamble should be omitted from the bill escaped me. I think it is very useful to have in the preamble to the bill a reference to the past history of labour legislation in Canada.

There may be some dispute about the facts of the matter as stated in the first paragraph of the preamble. Whatever be the adequacy of legislation in terms of encouraging the free collective bargaining process and the constructive settlement of disputes, as the first paragraph states, there may be some argument whether this process has always been carried through. Nevertheless, there has been a history of attempts to make progress in this direction.

The second paragraph of the preamble states that Canadian workers, trade unions and employers recognize and support freedom of association and free collective bargaining as the bases of effective industrial relations for the determination of good working conditions and sound labour-management relations. I think it is useful to include that paragraph in the preamble. Again, there may be some argument about the facts of the matter; certainly some of the correspondence that I receive from employers indicates that that is not their point of view. Many employers do accept this principle, but I am sure the minister and hon. members will agree there are some who do not, which makes it all the more important that in enacting a piece of legislation such as this there be set forth very clearly the basic premise and principle upon which the legislation is based.

The third paragraph links the action we are taking through the vehicle of this bill with the conventions of the International Labour Organization, and I submit this recognition is very important. The fourth paragraph refers to the necessity of encouraging and developing further legislation toward the ends described. I think all this is very good and useful, but there are a couple of points which deserve further consideration. It is very useful to have this sort of statement set out in the bill. I do not question the motivation of those who want to remove it, but the only possible motivation that makes sense to me is a desire to weaken the legislation and the effectiveness of the labour code as it may be enacted by this Parliament.

The first point of concern to me is that in looking at the structure of this bill I find that the preamble is nothing more than that—a preamble to the bill. It does not establish clearly that it will be a preamble to the act or any part of the act. The operative portion of the bill commences at the end of the preamble, or after the portion which the amendment would delete. So there seems to be a very real question which the minister should clear up, that is, whether the preamble as contained in the bill will find its way into any consolidation of the act that is printed or into the revisions of the act when it is again revised. Will it be considered an integral part of the Canada Labour Code as amended by this bill? That is an important point for clarification.

There is another point which I think should be considered. It was raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) who pointed out that there have been discussions about the preamble and asked whether it is in fact to be part of the act. The suggestion has been made that a preamble in many instances is sort of a "motherhood" statement. I do not wish to trespass in the area of the law because that is not my field of expertise. I know the minister had the assistance of very competent and able draftsmen and other experts in preparing this bill. Certainly I do not want to take away from their skills in any way. Nevertheless, there are some questions that need answers.

When the foreign takeovers review bill was before the committee on finance, of which I am a member, there were some discussions about a particular clause. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am relating my remarks to the amendment now under consideration. In the foreign takeovers review bill clause 2 sets out the purposes of the legislation and it is nothing more nor less than a preamble which indicates what the bill is about and why it is being enacted. When the bill was before the committee there was some question as to why it was not a preamble. At that time the legal advisers who appeared before the committee stated that a preamble does not have any effect in law, and that there are a number of important cases which show that a preamble is not taken into account in deciding a case before the courts.

Mr. Alexander: But they look at them.

Mr. Burton: They may look at them, but as I understand the situation a preamble does not have any bearing on the decision in a case. The judge looks at the sections of the act under consideration. That is what has to be taken into account. It was pointed out that when you have a statement in a clause of a bill which sets out the purpose of the legislation, then legal precedents support the argument for taking such statement into account. In fact, if a statement similar to the one contained in this preamble is set out in a section describing the purpose of the act, when a case comes before the courts the judge must take account of that section. It seems to me that this matter deserves further consideration.

The suggestion of the hon. member for Timiskaming, that in fact it would be desirable to amend this preamble in such a way that it would be included as a clause of the bill or as part of the act should be given further thought by the government. It should be included at a suitable place in order that it would have greater effect than would appear to be the case in the manner in which it has been incorporated in this bill. I hope these two points receive further consideration by the minister, and I hope he will comment on them.

One further reason for having a statement in the bill such as is contained in this preamble, either in the form it is now or in the form of a separate clause, is that it would be a reminder to the government that it needs to pull itself up by its own bootstraps in conducting labour relations in a more effective, open and efficient way than it has done to the present time. If we are to have free collective bargaining operating as it should, and as stated in this preamble, the government should set out something of an example rather than carrying on the kind of negotiations it conducts at this time.

When the government often makes completely meaningless offers, and in some cases no offers at all, to employers carrying on negotiations it cannot expect a piece of legislation such as this to operate in an effective manner across the country. If this bill is to mean anything, the government itself must show some leadership and create a better record than it has in carrying on relationships with public employees. I hope this point receives consideration by the government.

I have not entered the debate on amendments to the labour code up to this point, but I want to indicate very clearly that I support the efforts made to improve the process of collective bargaining. I accept the principle of free collective bargaining in carrying on labour-management relations. In my own constituency of Regina East there exist many collective bargaining agreements, some of which come under the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Labour and others under the jurisdiction of the department of labour of the province of Saskatchewan.

There has been a long history of peaceful and amicable relationships between employers and employees in Saskatchewan and negotiations have been carried on in good faith. It seems to me we must assure a greater degree of acceptance by the public of the principles stated in this preamble, by employers, members of trade unions and other workers. Certainly members of trade unions accept this principle, but we need greater acceptance by some employers.

As I indicated previously, many employers do not accept these principles and do not operate on the basis of good faith. If we are to experience an improvement in industrial relations in Canada we must move in the direction suggested by this bill. Surely the proposals and questions I have raised should receive consideration by the minister. I hope they will lead to further improvement in the legislation, resulting in a better labour code for Canada.

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak briefly of the proposed amendment. When Bill C-183 first made its appearance as the successor of Bill C-253, one of the most noticeable differences was that the new bill contained a preamble not found in the original bill. I immediately asked myself why there was this departure from normal procedure and what was the purpose of the preamble. After reading the preamble I still could not find a valid reason; I could not understand any purpose to be accomplished by the preamble. It began to become self-evident that the only reason for its inclusion was as a half-hearted response to the recommendations of the Woods task force that the government make some definite commitment on the side of the collective bargaining system.

It is interesting to note that the Woods Report certainly gives half-hearted endorsation to the bargaining process. The report stated, in effect, that while the present system has many limitations and shortcomings, it is necessary and the best thing available at the present time. In an interesting aside, however, the report indicated that the present system has already tended to complicate the attainment of some of the country's goals. I believe it is obvious that what the task force was referring to was that, even though there is a general acceptance that the collective bargaining process is good and probably the best system so far designed, there is a growing disenchantment with the process as used by management, labour and government. The fact is there is an increasing feeling in the country that what should probably be of primary concern, the public interest, is being completely overlooked in the collective bargaining process as we see it practised today.

Previous speakers have referred to the delinquencies of bargaining agencies of the government, and the fact that many accusations have been hurled at the Treasury Board about their lack of good faith in bargaining. It seems to me, from the little I know of collective bargaining, that it breaks down completely unless there is good faith on the part of the parties involved. I would think, therefore, if the preamble was intended to strengthen the collective bargaining process there should have been something in the preamble or the bill itself to achieve this purpose. In reading through the many briefs the one which struck me particularly was that presented by Bell Canada. I thought the statement on the preamble was very good. I should like to read it into the record:

I find the preamble excessively positive when it proclaims the universal acceptance of freedom of association and free collective bargaining as the—

The word "the" is underlined.

—basis of industrial relations for the determination of good working conditions and sound labour-management relations. While this company and its employees are committed to collective bargaining, a very substantial portion of the work force is not so committed, and the public is becoming increasingly disenchanted with the impact of widespread strikes. I believe Canada's best interests would be better served if all concerned parties concentrated on improving an imperfect system rather than extending its scope.

• (1650)

One of the things that disturbed me and other members of the committee as we listened to the various presentations was that it became very evident that there is a growing distrust between labour and management. I felt we had been making considerable progress in the mechanics of labour-management relations and it was very upsetting to discover that the old cat-and-mouse game was still being played. Labour did not trust management, and vice versa.

The employers felt that the provisions in the bill regarding technical change were tough and would tend to handicap management in negotiations with employees. On the other hand, employees said these provisions should be tougher. In effect they said, "We don't trust the employer. He will not operate with the interests of his employees at heart." Therefore, it seems to me that if this preamble is to be of any use it must have something in it that will improve the present system of bargaining. The preamble presently refers to the act but it sets out something that really is not in the act. The last paragraph of the preamble reads:

And Whereas the Parliament of Canada desires to continue and extend its support to labour and management in their co-operative efforts to develop good relations and constructive collective bargaining practices, and deems the development of good industrial relations to be in the best interests of Canada in ensuring a just share of the fruits of progress to all—

Then we go into the body of the bill. To me that paragraph would imply that this legislation is introducing something new to improve the collective bargaining process, and that that process should be sustained as the best method of settling disputes. But many of the people who appeared before the committee took the opposite viewpoint. They said that this bill, instead of improving relations between the two parties, would tend to worsen them. I have mentioned a couple of the provisions to which they referred, such as that dealing with technological change, the clause regarding supervision and the broadening of the legislation to include many more people.

They said that these provisions, instead of making it easier to bargain in good faith, would worsen the already deteriorating relations between employer and employee. Therefore I would say that the preamble, if it is intended as the government's wholehearted endorsation of the collective bargaining process, does not do what it is intended to do. Even though collective bargaining is probably the best means we have of settling disputes between the two sides, the process depends on the good faith of the negotiating parties. I believe that at the present stage of the game there is a third party which should be involved in collective bargaining but which in most cases is completely ignored.

So many strikes have such far reaching effects on the public that I believe the public must become a third party to the collective bargaining process. It should no longer simply be a matter of employer and employee trying to divide up the spoils between them. The public must be considered. Therefore I believe there should be something in the preamble, or in the body of the bill, setting out the government's position on how the public interest should be looked after in cases of employer and employee disputes.

I feel that the present preamble is unnecessary. It does not accomplish anything; in fact, the wording in certain parts of it may tend to worsen relations between employer and employee. Therefore I feel that the amendment should be supported and that the preamble should be deleted from the bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, colleagues of mine who have preceded me have made it clear that we are not opposed to the language that is contained in the preamble. Granted, it is largely language, but like motherhood it has our support. However, we feel that if the declarations in the preamble to the bill are to have any value, they should be contained in the bill itself. Everyone present knows that we got catapulted into this debate rather unexpectedly, and instead of some roaming around in the library as I had hoped to be able to do in the next day or so, I had to do that rather hurriedly in the last half hour.

I find there are at least two interesting examples which I should draw to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) in the hope that he will find his way clear to follow them. Perhaps I had better do this before somebody else draws attention to it, Mr. Speaker. I should admit that these are pieces of legislation, one of which was brought in by the Hon. J. W. Pickersgill, and the other by the Hon. Judy LaMarsh, but even those two former ministers had to be right once in a while.

In the case of the National Transportation Act which was brought in by the Hon. J. W. Pickersgill there was included what amounts to a preamble but which was cast in the form of a declaration of principles. If one looks at the annual statutes for 1966-67, chapter 69, he will find that section 1 starts:

It is hereby declared—

Then much wording follows, which is obviously the language of a preamble. The point I wish to make is that that was put in as section 1 of the act and is therefore in the act after the words:

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows—

In other words, it is legislation. I also looked into the Revised Statutes of 1970 to see what happened to this piece of legislation and I found that the only change that the revising officers made was to make what was section 1 of the act, as passed in the House, section 3 of the act as contained in the Revised Statutes.

In a moment I shall give another example. I point out now that in the other example the declaration also was transferred and made section 3. Without doing any great amount of research, I think the answer is quite clear, namely, that the revising officers sought to establish some consistency with respect to laws which they put into the Revised Statutes, and their pattern seems to be that section 1 is the title of the act, section 2 is the interpretation section which gives the various definitions and then, where there is a declaration of principles, it appears as section 3.

The other example is the Broadcasting Act which was passed in the 1967-68 session. There, again, one finds at that time as section 2, "It is hereby declared that . . ." Then there follow lettered paragraphs down to and including (j). Again, these were in the nature of a preamble, but they were section 2 of the act and therefore they are part of the legislation, with legislative effect. Again the change that was made by the revising officers was to make section 2 of the act, as passed by Parliament, section 3 in the Revised Statutes. Again I suggest that that is simply because of a consistent pattern obviously sought by the commissioners.

A while ago the Minister of Labour did not know the answer to a question put to him by one of my colleagues, but I think the answer is quite clear, that words which are just preamble will disappear when the act gets into the Statutes of Canada. After all, all we do when we pass an act is to enact what follows after the words "Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows."

I therefore suggest that if this bill stays as it is, the words that are there by way of preamble will disappear when the bill becomes an act in the Statutes of Canada. Certainly, if they do not disappear in the annual statutes they will disappear when they get into the next revision, whenever that takes place.

One is always wise, in this kind of presentation, to look for any exceptions that test the rule or any exceptions that the other side might throw at you. Accordingly, I looked up the Canadian Bill of Rights to see what had happened in that case. As hon. members will recall, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) was minister of justice and tabled the Revised Statutes of Canada for 1970, he pointed out that the Canadian Bill of Rights was being put in a special category. That means that it takes a little looking to find it. But at least I found it. And I now find it is five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

ENVIRONMENTAL COUNCIL OF CANADA

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond Delta) moved that Bill C-12, to provide for the establishment of an environmental council of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

He said: Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that during the third session of this Parliament I introduced a bill very similar to the one we are discussing today. That bill was debated in the House on December 10, 1971.

• (1700)

The bill which I bring before you this afternoon has been strengthened and clarified as the result of some of the constructive criticism encountered in the previous debate. The principle, nevertheless, remains the same, an independent environmental council of Canada must be established. In general, it must advise and recommend the means by which Canada can achieve the highest standards of environmental quality and the lowest levels of pollution. In particular, it must assess the medium-term and long-term prospects for the Canadian environment. It must consider all means of improving our environment. It must advise government what policies will best help to attain and maintain a pollution free environment. It must study the economic impact of environmental policies and devise means of diminishing any negative aspects of this impact. It must encourage consultation and co-operation on environmental matters between all segments and sectors of our society. Furthermore, and perhaps most important, it must have the authority to make its findings and recommendations public and let the chips fall where they may.

Some persons, Mr. Speaker, will ask why I proceeded with this bill when the Minister of the Environment (Mr.

Davis) has already announced establishment of the Canadian Environmental Advisory Council, which held its first meeting on 10 May. The answer to that is simple. The advisory council is ultimately responsible to the minister. The members of the advisory council are appointed by him. No matter how much the minister may protest that the body he has set up is independent, there will always remain a lingering doubt about its objectivity. What is more, there is no provision for the minister's advisory body to make their recommendations public. They report to him and him alone.

Speaking in the House on March 21, 1972, the Minister of the Environment stated that he personally did not see the need for an independent environmental council "whose advice is not necessarily practical under the circumstances". I recall, Mr. Speaker, that somewhat the same charge was levelled about a year ago at the Economic Council of Canada. It was suggested then that the council's goals were unreasonable or idealistic because the economy had not measured up to them. The reply at that time by the retiring chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, Mr. Arthur J. R. Smith, was this:

> The council has deliberately refused to accept the view that poor actual progress toward higher standards of economic performance should per se be accepted as a reason for lowering its sights on the objectives toward which we should, as a nation, seek to strive over the medium term future—

Likewise, Mr. Speaker, I submit that too much emphasis on the so-called practicalities of the antipollution struggle could result in a tendency to lower our standards when we should be raising them. It could, in fact, be used as an excuse for inaction.

In the House last December, I expressed my strongly held view as follows:

> There is always a place for independent evaluation of existing governmental policies and practices. An over-all view is necessary because of the natural tendency of those who have been involved in the creation and administration of policy to lose the ability to assess objectively the effectiveness of those policies. They tend to become blind to the need for new departures. The Economic Council has sought to satisfy such a need in the area of economic policy. An environmental council would do the same in the field of ecology. Being independent, the environmental council would be in a position to freely criticize government policy, should this be necessary, and bring new views concerning general or particular policies and programs to the attention of those who must bear the ultimate political responsibility for them.

As the bulletin of the Canadian Wildlife Federation pointed out last year, Mr. Speaker, no matter what merit the minister's Canadian Environmental Advisory Council might have:

> —it would be no substitute for an independent environmental council studying issues much broader than the responsibilities of any one department of government and reporting publicly on its findings and recommendations.

The movement for the establishment of a truly independent environmental council of Canada has widespread support. Amongst the supporters are the Science Council of Canada, the New Democratic Party, the Progessive Conservative party and the Liberal party of Canada.

In its report entitled "This Land is Their Land", the Science Council called for the establishment of an environmental council of Canada to:

Environmental Council of Canada

—conduct and publish studies and forecasts of environmental problems in Canada, and make analytical reviews of environmental questions which are the subject of public interest. It should strive to become a major source of informed opinion on environmental problems.

The New Democratic Party spokesman on environmental matters, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), has many times stated his party's support for the setting up of an environmental council of Canada. I believe the most recent occasion was in this House on March 21, 1972, when he said:

The function of the council would be to report on environmental affairs and to give guidance to both the government and the general public on all environmental problems. It would be a non-political organization, with adequate facilities to do a thorough job in the whole field of the environment. The establishment of such a council is long overdue and would be welcomed by Canadians generally.

The Progressive Conservative party, too, supports the proposals. An official background paper prepared for the annual meeting of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada on December 5-7, 1971, states that such a council is needed:

—to advise the Canadian government and Parliament and the Canadian public about particular environmental matters and to recommend on a continuing basis both specific short term and long term measures for pollution abatement.

In taking this stand, the Conservatives were following the lead of the 1970 policy conference of the Liberal party of Canada which overwhelmingly voted for a resolution urging the government to:

—establish an independent National Council of Environmental Quality, representative of a broad spectrum of interests, to analyse environmental problems and the government's response, to recommend environmental objectives for Canada and policies necessary to achieve them and to report annually on the state of our environment.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we have a situation in which the measure which I am presenting today has the support of the New Democratic Party, the Progressive Conservative party, and the Liberal party of Canada. It is difficult to see how opposition to this measure could arise this afternoon. The people of Canada will be watching closely. It is not enough to refer to the achievements of Stockholm, although they were many and the Canadian delegation played an outstanding role. It is not enough to list the antipollution measures enacted by this government, even though we have done more in four years than has been done in the past 100 years. We cannot—we must not—allow ourselves the luxury of basking in the glow of past accomplishments. We must continue to advance in the battle for an unpolluted environment. Mr. Speaker, the passage of this bill can provide one important step in that advance.

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) for bringing this matter to the attention of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I have to remind the hon. member that he is not occupying his own seat. He would have to move a few feet closer to the chair if he wishes to continue his remarks.

[Mr. Goode.]

Mr. Howe: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but these seats in the front row are a little confusing. I congratulate the hon. member for bringing forward this matter. A great many experts and people knowledgeable in the field of the environment warn us that not much time is left unless we come to very serious grips with this problem.

• (1710)

I want to speak about two particular areas. I feel that an environmental council such as is proposed could have done much good last year when the government brought before this House the clean water bill. At that time we asked the government to retain the formula that had been included in the Navigable Waters Protection Act whereby dams and projects involving conservation areas were dealt with in a certain manner. The cost was split three ways.

The hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) earlier today asked the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) if his department could assist in the building of further dams and dykes in order to prevent more flooding of rivers in the hon. member's constituency. If the former piece of legislation had been in force, the formula would have been available and could have been used. If an independent environmental council had been in existence last year when this House was considering the clean water bill, it could have given advice on matters such as that raised by the hon. member and it would not be necessary for every problem involving water to give rise to negotiations. We ought to have retained in the clean water legislation the formula included in the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

Let me refer to the Grand River conservation program which is now in effect and has been for the past few years. A new program is coming forward which involves the Speed River that flows to Guelph. It is absolutely necessary for the program to be undertaken; however, the province and local municipalities must pay the total cost. Because the Grand River eventually flows to the St. Lawrence Seaway, I maintain that the federal government ought to pay 37.5 per cent of the cost of the new conservation program which is absolutely necessary on the Grand River.

I wish to raise another important point. I refer to the government's decision with regard to the second international airport at Toronto. If an environmental council of Canada had been established when the airport was first being considered, it could have advised the government. Being an independent body, it could have told the government that there is good farmland in the area of the proposed airport. It could have said that the airport would create only an asphalt desert, and there are too many such deserts particularly in southern Ontario.

An independent environmental council which both the province and the federal government could consult on problems of this kind might give rise to better decisions. Instead of suggesting that the airport be at Pickering, it might have suggested that it be built in Amaranth township, near Orangeville, where the farmland perhaps is not as good as in Pickering township. We talk about pollution and preach about anti-pollution measures yet, we do not do as we say; we make decisions such as this which will affect the Toronto area.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North-Nipissing East): Mr. Speaker, in beginning my remarks on Bill C-12 I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) for bringing forward this matter. The explanatory note of the bill says that the purpose of the bill is the establishment of an environmental council of Canada which would be charged with the responsibility of advising and recommending the means by which Canada can achieve the highest possible standards of environmental quality and the lowest possible levels of pollution. When we think of pollution of the environment, we think of the air and emphasize forestry, land and water. The end result about which we are concerned is the quality of life of the people themselves.

About one year ago the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta introduced Bill C-25. That was during the third session of this Parliament. That bill sought to establish a Canadian environment week during October. The bill was considered by the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works which I chaired. It was indeed a pleasure to co-operate with the hon. member at that time.

Mr. McCleave: He is a good boy.

Mr. Hopkins: I enjoyed the co-operation of the opposition, including that of the hon. member who said the hon. member is a good boy. I must emphasize one thing when we talk about national parks and the cleaning up of the major water basins of this country. Some time ago this House passed the Canada Water Act. Mr. Speaker, I will continue speaking on this subject until we get some action.

Mr. McCleave: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hopkins: There must be additional funds for the cleaning up of our water basins. What the Canada Water Act says is good. It is one of our best pieces of legislation. However, something must be done in addition to what the act prescribes. The act says that the polluter must pay. As I said before, in many areas of this country the polluter no longer exist, but pollution remains. Therefore, it behooves the various levels of government of this country to come forward with funds to assist in the cleaning up of the environment and to allow the citizens of Canada to enjoy a better quality of life.

I wish to speak specifically of water basins which are covered by the Canada Water Act. This subject is pertinent in discussing the bill before us. There are, in many of the water basins of Canada, deadheads; they are leftovers from the old logging drives of the past 125 to 150 years. We are looking back in Canadian history. The Ottawa River is a perfect example of what I mean. Many hon. members of this House have asked questions about pollution of the Ottawa River emanating from the E. B. Eddy Company across the river. Yet I have not heard many questions or speeches in this House that deal with the hundreds of miles of river beyond Ottawa.

Few in this House have dealt with the hundreds of miles of waterways in this country which could be developed into excellent tourist areas. Some groups are interested in lifting logs out of our rivers. These logs could be used for commercial purposes. To back up my statement, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I know of a small group of people who lifted a birch log out of the river. Obviously, it was to have been used for the manufacture of birch veneer 86 years ago. It turned out to be a very profitable piece of timber for it produced, I think, 1,000 board feet of lumber. Normally about 20 logs would be needed for such a quantity.

This program is not being backed at the present time by any government department. I contend that funds ought to be allocated, either through the Department of the Environment and Fisheries or through the Department of Manpower and Immigration under its manpower programs, for assisting companies to begin operations on such waterways in order that we may clear them and promote the tourist and recreational industries of Canada.

Why should there be government assistance for such programs? The answer is very simple. It takes a large amount of capital to start a company which could operate in this area. First, it would need to buy equipment and hire men, and even though men might be paid $100 a week it would still take time to lift these large logs out of the water and transport them to sawmills or veneer plants and manufacture them into wood products. Then, these products are shipped to the market and the company has to wait 30 or 60 days to realize a return on its capital. During that time there are wage and operating costs to meet. This has proven to be a helpful measure, and once these companies are on their feet they can operate on their own.

If we are going to discuss the environment, we should give serious consideration to cleaning up our waterways. We talk a lot about pollutants from various chemical substances, but there are certainly more practical things that have to be done on our waterways. As well as improving the quality of life by cleaning up our waterways, we should create parks. Many people can get very emotional about this, but we must approach this idea rationally, without emotionalism. We must go about it in a factual and well-planned manner.

You will recall that about three years ago there was a Sunday night CBC program which alleged that Algonquin Park in the upper Ottawa valley was being raped and destroyed by the forest based operators in that area. I personally visited that area and the local people took me to the spot where the CBC had their cameras set up, which was in the bottom of an old gravel pit that J. R. Booth dug some time in the 1880's or 1890's to supply gravel for the bed of his railway line through Algonquin Park. I also found out that the producer of the program was the past president and director of the Audubon Society of Canada and a former employee of the CBC. The people of Canada deserve something better than this if they are to contribute to the costs of such programs. If we want to promote the improvement of the environment in Canada let us put the facts before the Canadian people, not our personal, biased views.

Environmental Council of Canada

During the past several months a group in the district of Nipissing, and in the county of Timiskaming on the Quebec side of the river, have been working strenuously toward creating Canada's first interprovincial national park. This park would be located between Mattawa, Ontario and Timiskaming, Quebec. Before the national parks people in the department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development can complete this project they must have approval from both the provinces, Quebec and Ontario. We brought this idea into focus for another reason. As Canada's first interprovincial national park, it would be a unifying force between the two most populated regions in Canada. Since the park would be located on both sides of the border between the two provinces, it would automatically attract people from the large urban areas in the southern part of both Quebec and Ontario, as well as other people right across Canada. It would be a mistake to create a park on one side of the river only. I want to see this done on an interprovincial scale.

This park would be the first interprovincial park in Canada where people of various ethnic origins could meet together on camping grounds and recreational sites, thus getting to know one another in an atmosphere of leisure rather than in the atmosphere of confrontation which so frequently appears in newspapers, on television and through other media. A group of people rented a railway passenger car, attached it to the back of a freight train leaving Mattawa and invited both federal and provincial officials as well as people from Quebec to go to the town of Timiskaming. From there they went back by bus to the Ontario side, to Mattawa. This took place on Thursday, May 18. On May 19, we chartered two aircraft from the North Bay airport and gave these people a complete tour of the area on both sides of the Ottawa river where the park is to be located. Everyone agreed that this was an excellent project. Now, I call upon the provinces and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to get together and make this a reality. My remarks on this park project are very closely related to the remarks I was making at the beginning because the Ottawa river, which is one of the river basins listed under the regulations of the Canada Water Act, flows right through this proposed national park.

There is another aspect of this project which we should consider seriously if we are really interested in a good environment for our people, and it does not rest entirely on the shoulders of the federal government any more than does the creation of a national park. I have always felt that we have not made enough use of the ARDA program which involves local, provincial and federal governments. We have large areas of land in this country which are presently being farmed. The farms are marginal or less than marginal. It would be of far greater benefit to the future forest-based resources of this country if we could bring about ARDA agreements between the local, provincial and federal governments to start a massive reforestation program. This would also have an effect on the human environment in that area.

There are idealists who feel that you can take people off farms in this country, enroll them in adult training courses and train them to adapt to a new way of life in an urban, industrial society. I think it has been proven time and time again that this is impractical because it is very difficult to convert these people, who are used to the great outdoors and to living in a clean environment, to an urban life and expect them to be contented. If this program were to be pushed to the limit, it would create social problems and injustices rather than be of advantage to these people. However, through ARDA programs we can bring about the rejuvenation of the areas in which these people live. I am referring to people who make perhaps $1,200 or $1,500 a year from their farms and barely exist. If we can reforest such areas through ARDA agreements and hire local people to do the work, we will not only be doing them a service but we will be doing the future generations in Canada a service by improving our forest-based resources for which Canada has become so famous.

Recently, I had occasion to visit the Black Forest area in Germany which is about 15 miles wide and 60 miles long. Here is a perfect example of the forest industry and tourist and recreation business living side by side. I do not agree that it is impossible for industry, recreation, tourism and conservation to be tied in together. With good planning this could be done.

We often hear it said that there ought to be no roadways through our parks. Well, there are 1.6 million old age pensioners in this country who have retired and who wish to enjoy their leisure. Is it fair to them to say, "I want to carry my canoe through this territory and I do not want any roads built there"? Is it fair to leave these 1.6 million people standing by, looking at a wonderful tourist area which they cannot enter? We could block out areas suitable for them. We could block out areas suitable for those who want untouched forest territory, completely deserted areas through which they could travel in their canoes if they wished. By approaching the question in a rational rather than an emotional manner we could learn to live together.

I read an interesting article on idealism the other day. It said, among other things, that ideally government exists solely to serve the people, and the civil service exists solely to advise the government. Some people say that basic political intelligence is relayed to the government by representatives of the people who have been elected to this House. It is not new, of course, for mass meetings to be held in constituencies across this country at which public figures, elected representatives, appear.

Moreover, this is a new age in communications and this is where the pressure of opinion originates and strengthens until finally things are done. For example, meetings have been held in both Ontario and Quebec on the interprovincial national park proposal I have discussed. This involves Members of Parliament being absent from the House if they are to contribute in this way to a better environment.

I hope the news media will, in all fairness, recognize that on many occasions such as this it is necessary for Members of Parliament to be absent from the House for legitimate reasons, trying to get programs off the ground in their constituencies, keeping in touch with constituents, and so on. In this way, public servants and Members of Parliament can get together and learn to know one another. It seems to me that discussion is one of the simplest things, one of our cheapest products, yet it is often neglected.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-12, an act to provide for the establishment of an environmental council of Canada. Our party has been calling for such a council for a long time. On two occasions we have moved amendments in the House and in committee calling for such a council. In fact, going through my files I found an amendment of ours dated February 9, 1971, which was directed to Bill C-207 and the substance of it reads:

That the minister of the environment shall create an environmental council of Canada whose task will be to:

(a) conduct and publish studies and forecasts of environmental problems in Canada

(b) make analytical reviews of environmental questions which are of public interest

(c) advise the federal and provincial governments in the area of pollution prevention and clean-up

(d) advise particular ministries as to the interrelationship between resource development and environmental protection

(e) advise as to the need for specific environmentally oriented research

That amendment was turned down by the government. I cannot recall much support being forthcoming from some of the members who are suggesting that the bill before us today should be passed. Frankly, I am very much in favour of it.

There is no doubt that Canada is in need of an environmental council. I am not thinking in terms of a council which is attached to a department or to the government. Such a body should be established along the lines of the Economic Council. It should be completely divorced from the political field. It should have power to check carefully into various environmental concerns which face our nation, and it should report regularly. It should have a strong research staff. It should report without fear or favour and recommend what action governments should take to ensure threats to the environment are dealt with.

Very often, members of this House and the general public do not possess the necessary background with which to evaluate the environmental issues which are brought to their attention. A body such as an environmental council could play an important role in such an evaluation. We just do not have the advantage of a non-political source of expertise, though such an organization is urgently required in this day and age. It was with these thoughts in mind that we urged the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) to accept our proposal that an environmental council be set up at the time the re-organization bill was going through the House.

I know that we have a council of some sort attached to the department, but here again it is under the control of the government and will not do the type of research or make the recommendations that one would expect from a completely independent council. For that reason I endorse the legislation currently before the House. I might add that there are several sections of the bill that perhaps should be altered. Nevertheless, the idea is good and I am pleased to see the hon. member at least interested enough to bring it before the House for debate.

I understand that two or three other members wish to speak on this very important matter, and though there are other things I should have liked to say, may I in closing reiterate that our group is in favour of the bill. If the bill is not acceptable to the government, the least the government can do is to give serious consideration to setting up an environmental council, if necessary by amending some existing legislation. In any event, let us move toward the establishment in Canada of an environmental council. We need it, and it is one of the best ways to get at the root of some of the major clean-up problems confronting the nation.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I too will shorten my speech since others want to speak in support of Bill C-12, to set up an environmental council. By coincidence, only yesterday I received 14 or 16 letters from a grade 5 science class in the village of Hillsborough in the constituency of Fundy-Royal. My hon. friend who proposed the bill anticipated for me very neatly a way in which to illustrate to the House the interest of young Canadians in the subject of pollution.

As is often the case, letters from youngsters are much more direct and succinct than those written by adults. As I say, these letters were written by a grade 5 science class, composed of Linda Smith, Patricia Lockhart, Jeffrey Wilson, Edward Jonah, Jeffrey Irving, Donna Milton, Dale Ryder, Kelvin Rose, Timothy Taylor, Kim Eagles, Sheldon Steeves, Lisa Hopper and Lloyd Branscombe.

Mr. Corbin: Great Canadians.

Mr. Fairweather: We may laugh at this, but each of these youngsters has an interest in the subject and their views are equal to any others who are taking part in this debate today. I will see whether the House does not agree with me by quoting three of these letters.

Mr. Deachman: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I just want the hon. member to know that members on this side of the House are not laughing at him but are thoroughly enjoying, with him, the pleasure of putting these youngsters' names on the record.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I do not hide the fact that I am putting these children's names on the record. I think children who are interested enough in the procedures of Parliament are entitled to the processes of Parliament. If the hon. member has any doubt about that, let him listen. Linda Smith writes:

Something should be done about the oceans and seas. They are full of pollution. Soon the marine life (animals) will die and we'll be sick. People do what they want because the sea is big and there is room for pollution in it. They are putting sewage, garbage and oil in it. Please do something about this or the same thing will happen to our beaches and lakes.

Very straightforward: no horsing around with that young Canadian. The next letter is from Jeffrey Wilson, who incidentally sends his love, something not often sent to a Member of Parliament:

> Will you please help me? Will you please stop pollution? Fish and other sea life are being killed. Try to find another way to drill for oil under water or stop. Thank you.

The whole statement is there and the minister and his staff could not find a more eloquent way of putting the problem. Lastly, a letter from Jeffrey Irving:

> I know you are very busy but please try to find time to read my letter. Raw sewage is being dumped into our many lakes, rivers and oceans. This is not only polluting the water, it is killing our fish for eating. Not only for me but for many other people try to do something about it.

My hon. friend is trying to do something about it by proposing the establishment of an environmental council. I support his bill and commend him for bringing the matter to our attention.

[Translation]

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the disastrous effects of pollution are no longer to be demonstrated and the insistence of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) to debate a second time the establishment of an Environmental Council of Canada shows the strong feelings of the hon. member about this issue which has become one of the world's major concerns.

The fact that this subject was raised by a member of this side of the House reveals how important this subject is to Liberal members. Besides, the leadership shown by Canada at the recent United Nations conference on environment in Stockholm certainly is proof that our country is at the forefront of the battle against pollution.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I would like most cordially to commend the leader of the Canadian delegation, the hon. Minister of Environment (Mr. Davis).

The success of our country during this conference is most encouraging for the survival on this planet of living beings threatened by more or less imminent extinction if manking does not realize once and for all that there are limits to the saturation of our atmosphere and waters with chemical products which are dangerous not only to man but to all living creatures on the globe.

The goal the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta has in mind in presenting his bill shows his desire to call the attention of the government on its responsibilities and tell the people that instead of merely shouting for help, merely begging the government to do something should act on their own, in their own environment, at work, on the farm and in various places.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian citizen must shoulder a heavy load in this area not only by paying yearly and daily taxes to all government levels, which must also, with that money, take upon themselves to fight pollution, but in trying himself to stem that modern calamity without the need to spend millions of dollars.

For instance, one can see on our Canadian highways, in Quebec, in the Gaspé peninsula, unscrupulous motorists throwing beer bottles, beverage cans, papers of all kinds out of the car windows onto the highway; those people should realize that this is also a form of pollution.

Somebody mentioned a while ago young people writing to their Parliament members to ask them what to do, what the government is doing in order to fight pollution. I should not like to rebuke all those young people, because they are not all alike, they do not all behave in the same way. Some of them for instance like to frolic on the beach late in the evening and the following day while strolling along we can see dozens and dozens of broken bottles and objects of all kinds polluting our beaches.

I believe we could ask the young people to do their share in the fight against such an enemy, pollution.

I am agreeable to the bill of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta for the establishment of an Environmental Council of Canada. However, among the many measures this government has taken in order to fight pollution, let us point to an existing council which came into being under the legislation creating the Department of the Environment and whose name I shall translate freely as Canadian Environmental Council.

The council so created reports to the minister. The benefits of such a council are the following: if need be, it can report daily to the minister because, according to its own structures, it is in daily contact with the department and the minister, whereas this worthwhile independent environmental Council of Canada, if created, would report to Parliament once a year.

So, we would learn only once a year what is going on as concerns pollution, whereas the already established council is in daily contact with the Department of Environment. And if by any chance one were questioning the seriousness of this council, I should like, before concluding my remarks, to read into the record the names of its members, whose status is quite impressive. They are Canadians who have given evidence of their distinction. Their total number is 15, as was announced by the Minister of the Environment on May 8, 1972.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The time allotted for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA LABOUR CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD, INDUSTRIAL INQUIRY COMMISSIONS AND CONCILIATION BOARDS

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-183, to amend the Canada Labour Code, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, and motion No. 1 (Mr. Alexander).

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when I was speaking just before five o'clock, and doing so on the basis of some rather hasty research, I made in the main two assertions. It may not enhance my reputation with my lawyer friends, but I rise now to say I must modify one of those assertions. In other words, I have been able to do a bit more research during the break between six o'clock and eight o'clock and I am happy to correct one of the statements I made just before five o'clock.

The first statement I made was that preambles in bills tended to disappear in the annual statutes, and particularly in the Revised Statutes of Canada. That is the statement I wish to amend. The other assertion I was making before five o'clock was that preambles which appear in legislation ahead of the enacting clause have no legislative effect. That is an assertion on which I wish to stand, and in support of which I wish to quote one or two references.

Mr. Woolliams: I think you should stand with that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, I am standing with the second assertion. It is the first one which in all fairness I must correct. During the break I found something to which I was about to refer. When I got to the Canadian Bill of Rights I found it has a preamble and that it is still there even though the Canadian Bill of Rights is appendix III to the Revised Statutes of Canada for 1970. Mind you, that preamble is in different language. It starts off with the word "affirming" as if Parliament affirms such and such and hence enacts as follows.

It is also true that I have found a number of other statutes which had preambles in them at the bill stage, and that a number of those preambles stayed with the bill as it became an act and was written into the Revised Statutes of Canada.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Not the amending act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is right, not when it is an amending act. I also point out that my assertion was not completely wrong. When you get to the Revised Statutes of Canada, even the phrase "Her Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada enacts as follows" disappears. That phrase appears in the annual statutes but is not in the Revised Statutes. I am talking about the Revised Statutes. I pick up one act right off, an act respecting livestock shipping, and the enacting words "Her Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada enact as follows" do not appear in the Revised Statutes.

• (2010)

Mr. O'Connell: Does that have a preamble?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, this one does not.

Mr. O'Connell: Find one with a preamble.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was admitting that where there are preambles, they do carry over, so I will not argue that point any further.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They are original acts; they are not amending acts.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As I say, I would be glad to do more research to correct this point. But on the other point, the one about the effect of preambles, I feel that I must press it rather strongly. I draw attention to Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, citation 360, page 268 where the author says:

As a rule a preamble is unnecessary in a public bill.

He goes on to state that in private bills there has to be a preamble, but repeats that it is not necessary in a public bill and that it does not have legislative effect. Then I pick up a book entitled "Legislative Forms and Precedents" written by E. A. Driedger, who at the time he published this book was deputy minister of justice and deputy attorney general of Canada. At page 8 of his book Dr. Driedger says:

The use of preambles has fallen out of fashion, and public acts do not now normally have preambles.

The preamble is part of the act and may be referred to in construing the act. The Interpretation Act provides—

I could go on and read what he says of Dr. Driedger's book, from page 8 but instead I should like to read directly from the appropriate statute, namely, the Interpretation Act. It is chapter I-23 of the Revised Statutes of Canada for 1970. Section 12 thereof reads as follows:

The preamble of an enactment shall be read as a part thereof intended to assist in explaining its purport and object.

I freely admit that a preamble is permissible, even though it has fallen out of style, that it can be put into a piece of legislation and that it does get carried forward. But the most that can be said for it is that it is intended to assist in explaining the purport and object of an act. In fact, that is all that is said for a preamble, not only in Dr. Driedger's book but in the Interpretation Act itself.

So I think we are now at the position that a number of us were taking before five o'clock when we insisted that if these words, fine words that they are, appear only as a preamble, if they appear before the words "enacts as follows", then they have no legislative effect. They are there; they can be looked at; they can be read for an explanation—but they do not have enacting or legislative effect.

Because we think there is some merit in the words that are in the preamble, we would like the minister to find a way to transfer them into the body of the legislation itself. I cannot support the proposition put before us by the hon.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that they should be wiped out altogether.

Mr. Alexander: Right.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I don't know what the hon. member means by saying "Right" at that point.

Mr. Alexander: I mean right, they should be wiped out altogether.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I cannot support that. Maybe there is something in the language that the hon. member does not like. Maybe he thinks that it goes too far.

Mr. Alexander: It misleads.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I like the wording that is there, but I think we should put it in the statute where it will have some meaning. Now, if I may go back to what I was saying about my first point, not watering down my admission that preambles do not disappear, nevertheless may I say to the minister that what will happen to the preamble to Bill C-183 is a moot question. This is not, as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) would point out, an original statute. This is an amending bill. This bill will amend chapter L-1 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, namely, the Canada Labour Code.

What does the bill do in the enacting part? It provides:

Part V of the Canada Labour Code is repealed and the following substituted therefor—

Then there follows a new part V entitled "Industrial Relations" and it starts with a new section 107. That means that the revising officers, or those who compile an office consolidation, will have to pick up the Canada Labour Code and, starting with section 107, take out all the rest of part V and put in there the new clause 107 and all those that follow. But where will such revising officers, or those who produce an office consolidation, put the preamble? It is not a preamble to the Canada Labour Code; it is only a purported preamble to part V. But there is no preamble to part V in the act that is on the statute books and there is nothing in this bill that says where those words in the preamble are to be put anywhere at all in the main statute that we are amending.

Maybe, Mr. Speaker, we are arguing over words, forms and procedures and all that sort of thing, but I think there is an element of importance to it. If these words have any meaning, and I think they are good words, then they should be put in the statute in a place where they will have effect.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for not being in my seat, but the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) sat down rather more abruptly than I anticipated.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Come, come! I am a man of few words.

Mr. Peters: Quite a few.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Having heard that remark from the hon. member, I would say it is the most blatant understatement of the year. I am in full agreement with the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) to delete the preamble. I do not want to traverse the same ground with regard to preambles that was covered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but there is one distinction that I want to emphasize. The statute books and the Revised Statutes are full of examples of pieces of legislation that have preambles, but they are original statutes. This is an amending bill that in clause 1 proposes to repeal part V of the Canada Labour Code. I ask hon. members, where will the preamble fit in the Canada Labour Code when this amending legislation is enacted? There is nowhere it can be fitted in between sections 106 and 107; that is not the place to put the preamble.

This preamble is pure window-dressing for the purposes of this bill. I want to speak about this window-dressing because I believe it falls far short of what the bill should be doing. It is not often I speak on labour matters, Mr. Speaker, but I did speak on second reading of this bill because I was terribly disturbed about how it might affect the Canada Labour Code. The government, quite rightly, has proclaimed that the Canada Labour Code is the flagship for provincial labour acts across the country. The government claims that it sets the pace.

I want to impress upon the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) and all hon. members of this House that the ultimate purpose of any labour code is to promote industrial peace, not to put into contention the rights of the workers as against those of management. Certainly, it should establish the right of the worker to organize and to protect himself during the period of organization, but it should also establish the rights of the employer. Labour relations are, after all, a social contract between members of society and any contract should set out the rights and obligations of the parties as well as the means of curing defaults. I have seen many contracts which were not worth the paper they were written on because they did not provide a means for resolving defaults. This bill does not meet, the demand of today's society, namely that industrial peace must be promoted.

What is the result of a breach of the social contract between workers and management? The result is strife, confrontation and the abuse of society's rights. I do not blame one side or the other, but in the end it is the rights of society that are abused. How does this bill provide for the correction of defaults, Mr. Speaker? It is the most inefficient document that you could find. That is what I think of this bill.

An hon. Member: What do you propose instead?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I say we must establish means for the protection of society's basic rights, but there is no provision for that in this bill. During the second reading debate, I said that the ultimate purpose of this bill must be to promote industrial peace. The workers' rights are not worth a tinker's dam unless there is industrial peace.

Mr. O'Connell: Amendment No. 1.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The rights of the workers are not protected during strife. How many workers who have gone out on strike have recovered from the deprivation and dislocation, unless the strike was only for 24 hours. What about the damage to the economy, to the legitimate interests of management and ownership? These cannot be disregarded in a labour code.

I say that this bill is improperly oriented because it fails to have as its ultimate purpose the promotion of industrial peace. We have seen industrial strife from one end of this country to the other during the past year. Indeed, some people in various departments of labour seem to get gratification from the fact that they are sent out as conciliators and trouble shooters. Is that the answer to a labour code?

Mr. Woolliams: Of course, it is not!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A successful labour code is one under which there is a minimum loss of time through confrontation of workers and management and a minimum loss of production. This year, in the federal and provincial fields, we have seen an outright rape of society's interests, of the paramount public interest. There are certain things that individuals are entitled to do and certain things that individuals are not entitled to do in so far as the protection of their property and person is concerned. Mr. Speaker, we have seen how those rights have been abused as a result of industrial strife. Plant and property have been vandalized and sabotaged, then because a settlement is imminent it is claimed that there must not be any prosecutions. All this is done under the guise of striving for a labour contract. On the other hand, some employers use goon squads. However, goon squads are used by both sides. Some things done by management, of course, are not right. If I, as John Q. Citizen, were to break those same laws I would be brought before the court for having offended society. There are many infractions of the laws of this country as a result of labour strife, but apparently immunity is claimed just because there happens to be labour strife. This bill does nothing to cure that.

If there were a grave attack upon the paramount public interest of this country, is there anything in this bill that allows the government to move in to keep the parties apart and to impose a settlement? Settlement must be imposed ultimately; there has to be an ultimate sanction. Some may say that they do not want compulsory arbitration but that they want labour courts.

I think the worst type of settlement in industrial disputes is the ad hoc settlement forcing back to work a group of workers through a bill brought into this House and discussed in the other place under the stress of public pressure. Such settlement is subject to partisan contestation. And who wins? Nobody. Everybody loses—the workers themselves, the employers. If anybody believes in the viability of society and the collective rights of individuals, let me say that those rights will have suffered too.

Yet it is said that this bill is a bright, new shining light in labour relations. This is to be the flagship of provincial labour codes. Will this bill do anything for the chaotic labour relations existing in British Columbia? Is this bill to be the flagship for equally chaotic relations in Quebec and possibly in Ontario, where it seems certain people can say of the public, "Public rights be damned; I come first." Confrontation, Mr. Speaker, settles nothing even though some segments of society today think it is the panacea in social relations. Confrontation should be the last possible recourse. To that extent I say to the minister that this bill is deficient; it has failed to provide any protection in that regard for the public interest.

As for the preamble, it is almost like a recital in support of motherhood. I commend the efforts of my colleague for Hamilton West to delete the preamble from the bill. In my view, even without his amendment the preamble is little more than a pious, cosmetic dressing-up of this bill. It is meaningless because it could not be included in the statute. You cannot insert it between sections 106 and 107; there is no way that could be done because this is an amending bill.

In brief, the preamble is meaningless, save perhaps to this extent: it will offer an opportunity for debate in this House and some people might use it, as I suggested, for cosmetic purposes. In the second paragraph of the preamble there are statements that do not hold water. The majority of employers in this country, and employees, enjoy rights. They enjoy good working conditions without having had to resort to freedom of association and collective bargaining. One could point to examples throughout the country.

Why is it that freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining must be the bases—I underline this—of effective industrial relations? That is a lot of poppycock, because the majority of labour relations in this country between employer and employee are not based on collective bargaining. They do not have to be. Recognizing that these relations do exist and that they are of value in many places, I ask, why insist that those conditions shall be the cardinal rule underlying these relations? To me this is mere window dressing—pure, cosmetic window-dressing.

Of course you give workers the right to protection and the right to organization. I know that Canada signed the international convention, but it did that many years ago without consulting the provinces which have equal, if not greater jurisdiction in labour matters. I doubt very much if some of the provinces would sign the convention now in the form it was brought down. Is this bill an attempt, finally, at bootlegging—perhaps we should not use the expression "bootlegging"—at surreptitiously legitimizing an action taken by the government of Canada inasmuch as it has not been able to do this before or has been unwilling to do it? Yet there is the attempt in paragraph 3. One does not need this preamble to continue one's support of the right to organize and the right to bargain collectively. One does not need the preamble to protect that right or to promote industrial peace.

In my final plea for support of my colleague's amendment I say this: To the extent that this bill will not promote maximum industrial peace—and according to evidence given before the committee it will do just the contrary and bring about more and more confrontation—the bill has missed the point. That is why I urge this House to support my colleague's amendment.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I observed the attitude of those who spoke before me during the course of this debate. They all referred in particular to the preamble of the bill, and yet I cannot see anything in this preamble that might prevent a series of understandable clauses to be drafted, taking into account the needs of workers. I do not mean that I give blanket approval to Bill C-183 because, in my opinion, this is too complex a legislation which goes beyond the reach of workers and which will enable union and management legal advisers to use union dues to make profits by pleading before the courts a few disputed points which will arise as a result of a legislation difficult to apply.

A legislation dealing with labour must—and I stated it on several occasions in this House—be drafted clearly so that all workers and employers may understand it easily.

I have listened for some time to speeches about the famous preamble; they remind me of a debate to which I had the opportunity of taking part and in which the word "dialogue"—by the way, a popular word in our modern society—was often employed. This was even the subject matter that was chosen by the director general of the 56th International Labour Conference held in Geneva's Palais des Nations in June, 1971, and I quote:

> Freedom through dialogue.

On that occasion, over 1,000 delegates from various countries of the world were looking for a step towards the organization of a more equitable and especially more humane world. The speeches of the representatives of various countries simultaneously translated into four different languages outlined the standpoint of each on the best ways to maintain or recover freedom through dialogue, to discuss, negotiate and seek means of agreement.

The delegate of the workers of France, Mr. Louet, summed up the world situation in a brief and persuasive speech and with outstanding eloquence. It would indeed be fit to quote some extracts:

> Our planet is undergoing deep and quick transformations, of a magnitude and acceleration never known in all its history. For want of controling such an evolution, millions of human beings suffer from it sometimes dramatic effects. The aggravation of disparities of all kinds which results generates renouncement or bitterness if not anger.
>
> The enduring egoisms and the complex jumble of economic mechanisms make national action almost inoperative in view of the world-wide scope of the problems to be solved.

Insisting on the advantage of dialogue, he added:

> But what is the dialogue referred to, between what individuals and for what purpose? If holding a dialogue must be synonymous with speaking—

—I must add here that we are not short of speeches, we already speak too much most of the time without saying anything much constructive or original.

True dialogue means promoting the exchange of ideas to convince each party to listen to the ideas of the other and then to review and reconsider one's ideas.

We should perhaps take the following as a motto: Let us speak a little less and listen a little more. When everyone speaks and nobody listens, communications break down and tantrum sets in; that is what we often note in the course of various negotiations.

It often occurs that government and unions speak different languages, particularly when the government's wage policy and the sum total of salaries are at stake. These are words many people use but with different interpretations. There is a kind of professional distortion particular to negotiators on whatever side of the table they may sit; actually, they keep putting a new sheen on old clauses without devising any new ones.

Negotiators on both sides haggle over commas and tend to forget the basic objective of a collective agreement which is the humanization of labour-management relations. Instead of seeking to guarantee the security of all concerned, some collective agreements develop into means of provocation.

We sometimes discover that those who should be concerned with maintaining good relations, do not pay as much attention to shouldering their own responsibilities and obligations as to claiming their rights; a good many problems would be automatically solved if people would try and apply more often nature's good old law of compensation which states that a job well done should be a job well paid. In view of the changing methods of production in this day of automation, a large number of workers tend to claim high wages for too little work with the ensuing result that in various segments of the administration there are public servants who are no longer "serving".

It is important to identify the various causes of misunderstanding and to direct labour legislation towards the protection of the rights of the week, the humble, the poor and, specifically those who are most in need of protection. Incidentally, it should be noted that the complexity of our laws often results in confusion.

I insist on this point. It is difficult to draft legislation—especially labour laws—in clear language. Let us then try to avoid these famous complexities which inevitably lead the parties into courts.

Today, there are big legal offices, as I know, having been active in the union movement. At that time, it was quite hard to find lawyers familiar with labour legislation. Now there are legal firms grouping 7 or 8 lawyers in cities like Montreal and Quebec. The legislation is so complicated that both unions and employers have to resort to legal advisers. Finally, what is the use of such complicated labour legislation? In fact, there are innumerable strikes and little agreement between the parties.

A summary listing of causes of conflict might provide food for thought to those who are really anxious to improve the situation. Considering the continuous rise of the cost of living through proliferation of taxes, levies, commissions, boards, surveys, etc. coupled with the complexity of legislation resulting in unending and expensive legal proceedings, it is easy to understand the reasons for the strikers' mentality which causes concern to employers and workers.

Such considerations should cause the government to take time out to prepare labour legislation truly accessible to those involved in it.

It is quite noteworthy that there should be a tendency to organize minor union skirmishes on various fronts, thus perpetuating a climate of mutual incomprehension. Why so? Usually for the sake of salary increases which, as soon as they are achieved, are quickly eroded through the increased price of products.

They fight to get wage increases to make up for the dollars which are lacking without being over-concerned about finding out who is making, controlling them and determining their value. What will be the use of earning from $3 to $10 an hour if this is equivalent to only $1 or $2? This is a problem of distribution of resources, purchasing power, work and leisure, and order must reign in the financial system which does not fulfill its task. In fact, let us consider this childish scene of distribution: 10 children, 2 apples, a fight ending in favour of the strongest; 10 children who have pennies, 2 apples, the highest bidder, provided he is protected by a policeman; 10 children, 15 apples, to each his own, and for all appetites.

There is the whole picture of the present crisis. We are behaving like children. Let us therefore try and find a way of drafting a law likely to favour a more equitable distribution of commodities so that workers may work in normal conditions. We must re-establish the equivalence of the purchasing power based on the needs and the value of goods, considering that human work tends to be replaced by machines.

Some clauses of the bill deal with technology and the way it may be applied. It is just about inapplicable. The worker is hungry and thirsting for money to live and support his children. Let us give him justice so that he will not be compelled to walk about with a stick and a piece of cardboard nailed at the end of it.

[English]

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I listened to what was in my opinion an astonishing speech made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). Presumably he was discussing the motion before us which would have the effect of deleting the preamble to this bill, but as I listened to the hon. member it became obvious to me that he was really not debating the deletion of the preamble, he was debating the deletion of the bill. He was, in effect, willing to throw out the baby with the bath water, to quote a hackneyed expression.

The hon. member has a perfect right, of course, to disagree with the idea of the collective bargaining process, which is obviously what the hon. member for Edmonton West was telling us.

Mr. Woolliams: He did not say that at all.

Mr. Barnett: He may believe that the whole process whereby working people have the right, painfully built up over the years, to act as a group on more or less equal terms with an employer should be abolished as far as any basis of legality is concerned but I want to make it clear that I, for one, do not support the position he has taken. The bill does not say that collective bargaining is compulsory. As I understand the proposal, it is a process which is open and available under certain rules to those who desire to engage in it. As far as employees are concerned, unless the majority wish to enter into collective bargaining arrangements with their employer, there is nothing in the law which says they must do so. In the opinion of the hon. member for Edmonton West this is an insidious brand of dictatorship.

Mr. Woolliams: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I listened carefully to the hon. member for Edmonton West and he never said that at all. He said he hoped a bill would be enacted by Parliament dealing with labour-management relations and that it would be such a bill as to bring about industrial peace. He pointed out that the preamble did nothing of that kind. He never attacked labour, or collective bargaining. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) has always been fair, and I hope he will be fair tonight regarding what the hon. member for Edmonton West did say.

Mr. Barnett: I enjoyed the speech just made by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), as I always do, but I hope the time taken for his speech will not be charged against me. I was not attempting to quote verbatim what the hon. member for Edmonton West said.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't waffle, then; set out the facts.

Mr. Barnett: I was saying that his remarks led me to believe the hon. member for Edmonton West is opposed in his own mind to the process of collective bargaining.

Mr. Woolliams: That is a complete untruth.

Mr. Barnett: I think it is a fair interpretation to place on the thrust of his remarks tonight.

Mr. Peters: That is what I got out of his speech.

Mr. Alexander: That is not what I got out of it.

Mr. Barnett: The hon. member for Edmonton West said nobody ever gained anything out of strikes. Well, I do not believe there is anyone in this House who thinks strikes are a desirable element in our society. Nevertheless, I cannot subscribe to the view that all strikes have been fruitless. I recall being personally involved in three strikes before I came to this House. One was a strike to gain recognition of the existence of a union, and for the right to collective bargaining. This is not a right whose value can be estimated immediately in monetary terms, but in my opinion this was a justifiable and necessary strike.

The second strike was one in support of the principle of a 40-hour working week. It sounds academic now to be told that people had to strike to get a working week of that duration. However, in those days, if an employer told his workers to work six days a week for 12 hours each day, the employees were obliged to do so or risk losing their jobs. That strike, in my opinion, was necessary and socially desirable.

The third strike in which I was involved was a strike to gain recognition of the principle that working people who were paid by the hour or by the week were entitled to a vacation once in a while without loss of income. I remember hands being held up in horror at the idea of paying someone when he was not doing anything. But why not recognize the work of people other than those engaged in the professions?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, but don't you think of labour sometimes getting into the professions? Don't you think the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) is in a profession? He is a useful man.

Mr. Barnett: The hon. member for Calgary North says the hon. member for Edmonton West was talking about industrial peace.

Mr. Woolliams: Right.

Mr. Barnett: Of course, he was. And if the hon. member is in favour of industrial peace I agree with him.

Mr. Woolliams: Good.

Mr. Barnett: But the nub of the matter is this: just how does one go about achieving industrial peace. Is it something which is imposed or is it something which comes about as a result of discussion and negotiation?

Mr. Woolliams: Or irresponsibility.

Mr. Barnett: Or is it something which comes about as a result of the development of experience in the relationship between workers on one side and management on the other? We are a long way from having arrived at any seventh heaven in the development of peace between employers and employees. I do not say there have not been occasions when the fault lay on one side rather than on the other. What I am saying is that an attack on the concept of collective bargaining is not an approach which is likely, in any society which calls itself democratic, to move us toward a state of industrial peace.

• (2100)

With regard to the principles contained in the preamble and the way they are spelled out in the bill, the hon. member suggested that the worst means that could be used to bring about a settlement if the situation reached the stage where it seriously affected the public interest would be to introduce a bill in the House. I do not agree with that contention. I think that approach is far more apt to bring about a settlement that would be acceptable to both sides than would the kind of Star Chamber methods that have been used in the province of British Columbia under a law that was pushed through the legislature enabling one minister in secret to sign a document ordering the workers to do such and such.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): When did I suggest that alternative? Come, now.

Mr. Barnett: I suggest that the only way in a free society in which stoppages of work or industrial disputes can be settled in what we consider in the ultimate sense to be a democratic way is by taking action through the elected representatives of the people in Parliament. Because here we can publicly debate the issues and the pros and cons of what is required in the public interest and what is fair to the employers and employees in relation to the public interest, and thus the individual situation can be assessed.

Fortunately, in my view, we are retaining that kind of approach in this bill. I suggest that if either in the preamble or any other part of the bill it is suggested that we take an approach similar to the one taken in the province of British Columbia, we would be sowing the seeds of deep-rooted trouble for the future as far as any hope for a real and lasting industrial peace is concerned.

Perhaps I am straying as far away from the subject matter of this motion as did the hon. member for Edmonton West, so let me come to the preamble itself which the hon. member is proposing to delete. Some of the questions raised about its position in law have already been dealt with by other hon. members and I shall not repeat them. I was, as member of the committee know, responsible for moving the deletion of the preamble during the committee stage.

Mr. Alexander: I was waiting for that.

Mr. Barnett: To assist the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) perhaps I should quote part of what I said, as reported at page 20:23 of the Minutes of Proceedings for June 20 last:

Whenever I find myself looking at one of these rather flowery preambles to a piece of legislation, I think of it as being a continuation of what I call the Pickersgillian fad. I say that because the former member for Bonavista-Twillingate as minister of transport seemed to initiate this idea—

Perhaps I was a little out there; he revised it. As pointed out in one of the quotations of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), apparently this was something that used to prevail but which fell out of fashion. Then I went on to say that I did not think these preambles really meant very much. As pointed out by other members tonight, I too pointed out that in law they really had not very much effect, and I went on to say that I did not think the habit of putting this sort of thing in front of bills had much value. Members of the House may be interested to know that when asked to comment, the deputy minister of labour said that it was probably true that they did not have very much effect in law, but that if they had no more effect than that he could not see any particular harm in leaving them in bills.

Quite frankly, I have not altered my view about this practice. The sentiments expressed are laudable enough in most cases and I do not quarrel with them. Nevertheless, I think that what has been put forward as a serious suggestion by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is worthy of consideration. If what is said here is intended to mean anything, then let it be incorporated in the legislation itself. This is a serious proposition worthy of discussion and consideration, even though it might involve a little redrafting of the phraseology of the preamble.

As I have read the bill, I think it would add something to have some of the matters stated in the preamble made part of the bill. To take one example, though this is not perhaps a key point, mention is made of the government of Canada having ratified a convention. I do not know offhand whether Parliament has ever ratified it, but the present wording might be made more appropriate if it were phrased in such a way as to read that Parliament had given its support to the convention.

I think what is implied here is a recognition by employers that collective bargaining is supported and should be supported in this country. Yet as I read the law there is no provision to the effect that employers are bound to recognize collective bargaining. There is a pious sentiment here about a recognition of collective bargaining as a basis for arriving at settlements between employers and employees. If that were a proposition that could be considered, then certainly I would support it. However, quite frankly, despite what some of my colleagues have said as well as some of the arguments advanced, particularly by the hon. member for Edmonton West, in support of the motion put forward by the hon. member for Hamilton West, I have not changed the views that I expressed in committee about putting what I still feel are but pious sentiments in front of a bill.

• (2110)

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I want first to recognize that this bill came upon us this afternoon rather unexpectedly. This circumstance arose when one hon. member of this House declined to give unanimous consent to our proceeding with third reading of the bill then before us.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A member from your side.

Mr. O'Connell: It did come a little unexpectedly, although the quality of debate has not suffered for that reason. No doubt that is because this bill has really been before all of us who have been interested in it for perhaps a year. A similar bill was introduced about this time last June. There have been many meetings, and many briefs have been heard. The minister has met with many delegations and listened to their points of view. The bill went through a very good second reading debate in the House and received great support. There were 24 hearings of the standing committee and 20 or so delegations appeared before that committee. No doubt that has all helped us to get a good start on it this afternoon.

I want to address myself to some of the points made in respect of the preamble. We are looking at these questions because the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) has moved that the preamble be deleted. What does a preamble do? The preamble is here because it sets forth the faith of this government in the principles underlying this bill. Let me draw hon. members' attention to this fact. The preamble gives weight and recognition to employers and employees as participants to the collective bargaining process which the bill underwrites. It stresses freedom of association and free collective bargaining as effective bases for industrial relations in Canada.

I should like to draw hon. members' attention to the fourth paragraph of the preamble. It means just what it says, that Parliament desires, and expresses the desire here, to continue and extend its support to labour and management in their co-operative efforts to develop good relations and constructive collective bargaining practices. The provisions in the bill itself which follow that expression in the preamble are evidence of the value this government places on our present system of industrial relations based on freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Where is that going to fit into the labour code?

Mr. O'Connell: Some may not take this position but may reject it. What we say in this preamble is that freedom to associate and free collective bargaining are the cornerstones of industrial relations in Canada. Some may argue that there is only 10 per cent of the labour force operating under federal jurisdiction and that only one-third of the total labour force is in fact unionized. It is not a question of numbers; it is a question of the principles involved.

We are not going to bring before this House of Commons an equivocal statement in respect of the central position of free collective bargaining and freedom of association in Canada. We are not going to put forth a fuzzy preamble. We are not going to give with one hand and take back with the other. It is for that reason we cannot find acceptable the suggestion which came forward from the standing committee that this is to be one of the bases of industrial relations. No one is going to argue that the collective bargaining process as it is pursued under the Canada Labour Code is the whole story. No one is going to argue that this is the whole practice. What we say in unequivocal terms is that it is the cornerstone.

May I refer hon. members to the Woods task force report on Canadian industrial relations. Recommendation No. 434 did make a case and concluded by recommending that the legislation contain a preamble that would replace the neutral tone of the present statute with a positive commitment to the collective bargaining system. That in fact is what we are doing in this specific preamble.

May I address myself to the second point raised here which sent all of us to a hurried exercise in research over the dinner hour. What status does this preamble have as it is in print in this amending bill? I speak without the benefit of legal training but I think I now see my way clear in respect of this preamble. I conclude my remarks on this section of the comments by stating that I think we should encourage the House to leave the preamble exactly as it is now.

It has been said that a preamble which precedes the words "Therefore Her Majesty by and with the consent of the House of Commons and the Senate enacts as follows" does not have status, legislative effect and may disappear in a subsequent revision. It seems to me there are two points involved here, one in relation to the legislative effect of a preamble positioned in front of those words, and the second in relation to the likelihood of its survival in a subsequent revision of the statutes of Canada.

In the first instance, I have been able to find many acts on our statute books, in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, which do have preambles. These preambles precede the words "Therefore Her Majesty by and with consent enacts as follows". I will make reference to a few of them: the farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, the Industrial development Bank Act, and act respecting small loans, an act respecting Royal Style and Titles, the Queen Elizabeth II Canadian Research Fund Act, the Atomic Energy Control Act, the Bank of Canada Act, and a number of others.

With the little research it was possible for me to do, I could find only one case where the preamble did not survive. I want to be frank with hon. members; I could find only one case where the preamble did not survive the attention of the statute revision officers, and that was the Veterans' Land Act. I do not know whether it is a special case, but it is the only one we could discover where the preamble was dropped in a subsequent revision.

Just to confirm this for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who raised the point, if he looks in the Revised Statutes, volume 4, he will find that the act incorporating the Industrial Development Bank Act begins with a preamble and these words:

Therefore, His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows—

Then comes the short title and the interpretation section. There are three volumes which follow that confirmation of this practice of a preamble that comes at the front of a bill surviving any revision process, and status there is not governed by the enacting sections.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Were any of those amending statutes?

Mr. O'Connell: I will come to that in a moment. I cannot confirm or say no to that question. They may not have been amending statutes. I am further advised that it makes no legal difference whether a preamble survives a revision. The preamble continues in force and has the same validity that it had in the original statute, amended or otherwise, and it would still have the kind of legislative effect laid down in section 12 of the Interpretation Act. I shall read that section:

• (2120)

The preamble of an enactment shall be read as a part thereof intended to assist in explaining its purport and object.

The point I want to make is that in my view, supported by some legal counsel, the preamble continues to have that effect. It would have it in this amending statute whether or not in some subsequent revision it is carried forward. It is therefore not a question of technical features or drafting practices as to just where it appears in this connection.

The next substantial question is, what legal effect does this preamble have? I say it continues to have the effect which all preambles have as determined in section 12 of the Interpretation Act where it is carried forward in a revision.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question at this point?

Mr. O'Connell: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Without arguing the matter as he placed it before us, would he not prefer that the language of the preamble have legislative effect rather than just the effect of assisting in explaining the purport and object of the legislation? The minister will recognize I am quoting from section 12 of the Interpretation Act.

Mr. O'Connell: This is a question which I believe I can answer rather readily. The preamble has no greater effect in any statute than that laid down in the Interpretation Act. Whether it is in one position or another, it has not different legislative effect than that permitted in the Interpretation Act. I therefore have to rest on the case I have been presenting.

I wish to say this in addition. From the advice I can get—in this sense it is not conclusive because the determining point is the statute revision officers, and when they come to look at this matter they are the ones who will make the decision—in all frankness, it may well be that this being an amending statute the preamble may in fact disappear. I cannot say it will, but I would be less than frank if I said now that it will not.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Because this bill does not say what to do with it.

Mr. O'Connell: Even if this bill put it in a different place, it might well disappear in the course of revision. That is to be determined by the revision officers. Regardless of the decision the revision officers will make this preamble will have as much use for all those who wish to refer to it whether or not it is carried forward in a revision, and the use of those who wish to refer to it is the use which is permitted in the Interpretation Act. With those few comments I conclude my remarks.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit another question?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I feel I cannot accept the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Hamilton West in motion No. 1.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, would the minister tell us with certainty whether the interpretation of the balance of the clauses would be identical if the bill did not have any preamble?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I am being asked to give a legal opinion. I have to shrink from that. I can give my own opinion, which is that it would have exactly the same effect whether or not the preamble were there. It is not in there to modify the interpretation. The words of the Interpretation Act are, "to assist in explaining its purport and object". It is put in there to demonstrate the faith we on this side of the House have in free collective bargaining and in freedom of association.

Perhaps before I sit down I ought to correct one impression which may have been left by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) with reference to ILO convention No. 87. If I understood him correctly, he said there was not consultation with the provinces. That is not the case. ILO convention No. 87 was ratified by this government after receiving the unanimous consent of all the provinces of Canada. There was full consultation and unanimous consent was received. It was ratified this year and reference is made to it in the act. That ought to be pointed out, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, before the minister sits down might I ask him a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is rising to ask a question of the minister.

Mr. Alexander: With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I listened to the minister and did not expect any different speech than that which I heard in the committee. However, I am wondering why the minister did not give any reason for not including the preamble in this bill, when in fact he has placed so much emphasis on freedom of association and the collective bargaining process as elaborated in the preamble.

I ask with all due respect—and I believe this was the thinking all along—why the preamble was not in the first bill. In fairness, I think we should have an explanation because it seems to me that suddenly—I know, Mr. Speaker, that I am getting into a debate—between the tabling of the first bill, its removal and the bringing in of Bill C-183 someone, for some reason, became enlightened. I ask why the preamble is in this bill now when it was not in the other bill.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is either a case of enlightenment or non-enlightenment. As the hon. member knows, it was the case of members of the labour movement for some time that a preamble should come into this bill. I found that to be a very persuasive argument and was very happy to have the preamble inserted in the bill. I have had confirming counsel to that effect in the Woods task force report on industrial relations which recommended the same thing. It seemed to me it would appeal to this Parliament to state unequivocally its confidence in the collective bargaining process and the majority of the parties which participate in it and work with it by laying it out here as the cornerstone of industrial relations in Canada. I am very happy to take responsibility for inserting it in the present bill.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, would the minister advise the House what he thinks will happen to the preamble, assuming the bill is passed and there is perhaps an office consolidation for use by the public, bearing in mind that I put it to him that the preamble would have to disappear because there is no provision whereby the preamble can appear between sections 106 and 107 of the statute? This is an amending statute; therefore, what is it worth?

Mr. O'Connell: I shall not tax the patience of the House by again going over the arguments I made. I know the hon. member was absent for most of my remarks. I regret that, because I believe I covered the ground quite fully. I think he will have to read my remarks in Hansard.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But you did not give an answer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The minister has time left in his remarks. If the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has a question and the minister wishes to receive it, the Chair will see the hon. member for Calgary North. The hon. member for Calgary North on a question.

• (2130)

Mr. Woolliams: No, I want to say a few words on this matter.

Mr. Gilbert: I want to ask a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I was under the impression that the hon. member for Calgary North wanted to ask a question.

Mr. Gilbert: This is a very short question. I have been impressed by the rationale and persuasive arguments of the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell). The idea of setting forth a philosophy in the preamble is a good one. Is there any truth to the speculation that the Canadian Manufacturers Association is not happy with this statement of philosophy and want it deleted?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I think it is known to all of us that not all the participants in collective bargaining in Canada are happy with this or that part of the labour bill. That applies to both parties to collective bargaining. I would not want to draw specific attention to any one of them this evening.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I thought he was very good. I listened to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I also thought he was very good; he put the problem squarely before the House and the people. I also listened to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), and I felt he misinterpreted the problem somewhat. From the questions put to the minister it seems to me that the preamble does nothing to assist in the interpretation of the legislation. It seems that it was intended by the minister's advisers to assist him in selling a bill that is not favourable to either labour or management. That is why it is there.

Let us consider what the legal authorities say about a preamble. I wish to quote from Maxwell in "The Interpretation of Statutes," twelfth edition. When I went to law school, Maxwell had a large book, but tonight I found that his book is only a quarter of an inch thick. When I read from it hon. members will realize why he has reduced it in size.

I know that the minister had the best possible legal aides to assist him in drafting the preamble. I would like to deal with it in a legalistic way and then say something about its political implications. The preamble does not add anything to or subtract anything from the bill. It was put in at a time when we are heading into a general election, when the government wants to keep both labour and management happy. As a result, we have a weak bill with a long preamble. This reminds me of lawyers who when they have a strong case on the facts spend considerable time stressing the facts, but when they have a week case on the facts they stress the law. I suppose anybody in the minister's position would have done the same.

When I reread Maxwell tonight it rather shocked me, not having looked at it for a number of years. It starts by saying:

Many old statutes—

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

In passing, Mr. Speaker, I always thought the Liberal party was a new party, an aggressive party.

—have preambles in which the main objects of the Act are set out, and these are legitimate aids in construing the enacting parts. But considerably less space will be devoted here to the use of the preamble in construction than in previous editions of this work, for two reasons.

He goes on to give the reasons. That is why the question was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and by other hon. members. I point out that Maxwell is a legalistic man who has nothing to do with politics. His is a text book which would be used by a court in deciding how this bill should be interpreted. I continue the quotation:

First, hardly any modern statutes have preambles, so that the importance of the preamble as an aid to construction is constantly declining.

I see the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell) pointing to statute books. Those are Liberal statutes.

Mr. O'Connell: Would the hon. gentleman like to indicate which party was in office when the Bank of Canada Act was passed?

Mr. Woolliams: Wait, I am coming to something. When you are dealing with the interpretation of the constitution through the BNA Act, or with the Bill of Rights, then you can refer to the preamble. But when you are dealing with a working statute having to do with labour-management relations, that is a different proposition. If the minister is pointing to statutes that may have been passed by a Conservative government, I point out that I was not a member of that government. I am talking about Bill C-183. We are dealing tonight with a very important matter, probably one of the most serious questions affecting Canada.

Mr. O'Connell: What about the Bill of Rights?

Mr. Woolliams: I am glad the minister asks me about the Bill of Rights. That is an exception. When you are dealing with the BNA Act, the interpretation of the constitution, or the Bill of Rights then you may go to the preamble. Here we are dealing with the interpretation of a statute respecting labour-management relations. Let me just finish the quotation.

First, hardly any modern statutes have preambles, so that the importance of the preamble as an aid to construction is constantly declining.

Mr. O'Connell: It is still there.

Mr. Woolliams: I would not get too excited if I were you. I don't think you have read what I am going to read.

Secondly, the office of the preamble in interpretation has been authoritatively stated by the House of Lords—

This was an English case, The Attorney General v. Prince Ernest Augustus of Hanover, 1957 Appeal Cases, page 436. Here I might say that the British authorities are followed as part of the process in rendering decisions in Canada.

In that case, Lord Normand said (at pp. 467, 468): "When there is a preamble it is generally in its recitals that the mischief to be remedied and the scope of the act are described. It is therefore clearly permissible to have recourse to it as an aid in construing the enacting provisions. The preamble is not, however, of the same weight as an aid to construction of a section of the act as are other relevant enacting words to be found elsewhere in the act or even in related acts. There may be no exact correspondence between preamble and enactment, and the enactment may go beyond, or it may fall short of the indications that may be gathered from the preamble. Again, the preamble cannot be of much or any assistance in construing provisions which embody qualifications or exceptions from the operation of the general purpose of the act. It is only when it conveys a clear and definite meaning in comparison with relatively obscure or indefinite enacting words that the preamble may legitimately prevail.

Then he comes to the general rule which has been mentioned by the minister, by the hon. member for Edmonton West, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Hamilton West, that the preamble means nothing; the act itself is important. If the minister is satisfied that this proposed legislation will bring about economic and industrial peace and will still be fair to both labour and management, they being responsible within the law, then he has done his job.

Basically, this preamble means nothing. The only reason it is there is that the minister and the government are concerned that they are not satisfying labour nor management, and that there is likely to be an election this fall. If the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is still frightened, we will have one according to the constitution even if we have to go to the Supreme Court of Canada to obtain the right to have it.

I thought the minister added something new to that department. I thought he was sincere, though sometimes he appears to be a little sad or apologetic. But now he brings in a preamble which is a straight, political platform and means nothing. I was not on the committee that studied the bill, but it appears that it might be selling labour or management a little short. One thing is sure, however—it is selling the Canadian people short. I listened to my friends in the New Democractic Party.

An hon. Member: As you always do.

Mr. Woolliams: It is clear that Saskatchewan has been pretty kind to the CCF, Mr. Speaker. That is where the first socialist experiment took place. The farmers of Saskatchewan have been pretty kind, too, giving them a few seats in the legislature. But I would like to have a mouse in the caucus to find out where they stand when they speak to the grain farmers.

The port of Montreal has been tied up so that we cannot ship wheat and contracts are broken. Since 1968 there have been so many strikes on the west coast that wheat cannot be shipped. How does this party manage to hold seats for the wheat farmers? How can they hold seats, with labour union leaders like the leader of their party who is at least a solicitor for unions? It is beyond me.

I should like to have the unanimous consent of the House to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), who has been connected with the labour movement in this country, explain to the people of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta, agricultural provinces, why the party almost continually supports industrial unrest. It would take a magician to do it, but somehow they manage to get the farmers and labour of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta to vote for them.

In his speech the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said that what we are trying to legislate tonight is industrial peace. Surely that is important, Mr. Speaker. If it is not one group on strike, it is another. We cannot get the wheat out of the country. It is all very well to talk about great markets and contracts, but in the last four years Canada has dropped from first place to sixth place as a nation trading in grain. If I am to be kind to the government for a moment, I must say it was not really because of their agricultural and trade policies but because there has not been industrial peace in this nation. Without it, we cannot compete against Japan, Germany and the United States. While our ships waited in Vancouver month after month to be loaded with wheat to meet our contracts with the U.S.S.R., the United States was loading ships in Seattle with American wheat.

Mr. Mackasey: Not true.

Mr. Woolliams: In the story "How Green was my Valley", which was written at the time of the industrial revolution in Great Britain and dealt with the suffering of the coal miners, the old man told his sons that they could only achieve their ends if they did it with responsibility. That is the important factor, Mr. Speaker, and it is the only way to get industrial peace. Management must be responsible and labour must be responsible.

With the greatest respect to the Minister of Labour (Mr. O'Connell), I do not think much of this preamble. Maybe his legal advisers told him it was necessary, but it is nothing. If he needed it to bolster this act, he would be better to throw the whole thing on the garbage heap because it is nothing.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of speaking at this time but as I listened to the hon. member who just sat down, several questions occurred to me. I have not been able to figure out which part of his speech referred to the preamble of this bill.

Mr. Woolliams: I read from a legal text; I cannot do more than that.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should try to understand, although I do not suppose it is possible, that when workers in Canada talk about the right to collective bargaining it means their right to bargain and to negotiate about conditions of work, wages, holidays, grievance procedures, and so on. It means that they will be able to decide what is important, on their own. It means that nobody can tell them what to do if they follow the proper procedure.

I agree with the hon. member, since trade unions are composed of human beings who are fallible, that there have been strikes which probably were not very wise. The workers themselves are making decisions on principle, Mr. Speaker. They are not influenced by outsiders, by people like the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), by members of the NDP or by anybody else. Of course, the hon. member may deplore strikes. They cause inconvenience. I can understand the concern of wheat farmers who want to move their grain. I can understand the concern of people who want to go to hospital when hospital workers go on strike.

• (2150)

It is not enough for the hon. member for Calgary North to complain about strikes. It is not enough to point out how strikes create difficulty. Strikes are a facet of life in every democratic country. The hon. member spoke of the wheat sales the United States made while the port of Vancouver was closed. I think the hon. member for Calgary North knows there was a longshoremen's strike on the west coast of the United States which closed every port from Seattle down to San Diego. That strike lasted for almost six months.

Mr. Woolliams: Do they permit strikes in Sweden?

Mr. Orlikow: Of course they permit strikes. They have many strikes because they have—

Mr. Alexander: Enlightened management.

Mr. Orlikow: Precisely. If our management were as enlightened as Swedish management, and as ready to deal freely and fairly with employees, we would not have nearly as many strikes in Canada. Mr. Speaker, I want to say something else to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). If there were as little unemployment in Canada as there is in Sweden, there would not be as many strikes in this country. Strikes are to be deplored. But deploring strikes is not enough.

When a person says strikes are bad and that there should not be strikes, he is obligated to suggest a method of establishing relations between employers and employees which will work better than free collective bargaining, a system which sometimes leads to strikes. Mr. Speaker, systems like that have been tried. For 50 years in Australia and New Zealand they have dealt with labour matters under forms of compulsory arbitration in labour courts. Yet in those two countries there have been more strikes in some years than there have been in Canada, where the relatively free method of collective bargaining is used.

Let me say one more thing, Mr. Speaker. When the hon. member suggests or implies that the members of my party encourage or are involved in strikes, he is just as wrong as he would be if he were to suggest that we encourage employers to lock out their employees. We have no more influence over what others do than members of any other party. The perfect example that comes to mind, and I will close on this note, is this: there is not one province in this country which has experienced more strikes in the last couple of years than Quebec. The hon. member for Calgary North talked about the lockout of dock workers in Montreal.

Mr. Woolliams: What about B.C.?

Mr. Orlikow: I am sure that even the hon. member for Calgary North would admit that my party has little influence in the province of Quebec. After all, Quebec is represented in this House mostly by members of the Liberal party. If any politicians are responsible for those strikes, the hon. member for Calgary North had better look across the way to the government side.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the House ready for the question? The question is on motion No. 1, in the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Peters: Call in the members. The Conservatives are not rising. They are chicken.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Alexander) negatived on division.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I change that and say I am rising on a question of privilege? An hon. member to my left has suggested that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition is chicken.

Mr. Peters: Don't fight about it.

Mr. Alexander: If there was any fight, it resulted from the NDP's action in filibustering this amendment. Most of them never even mentioned the preamble.

Mr. Burton: That's a bloody lie and you know it.

An hon. Member: You can't say that here.

Mr. Burton: Well, I said it.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to become involved in any controversy with the hon. member who made an ungentlemanly remark.

Mr. Woolliams: He is not even in his seat.

Mr. Alexander: I think perhaps he has lost his ability to take cognizance of the place where he usually sits. In all fairness, Mr. Speaker, why should we call for a vote on this amendment at this particular time? After all, it was a mix-up on the government side that prevented the FISP bill from passing. An hon. member on the government side said, when the matter was put to the House, that it should not carry."

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Alexander: After that, the government brought forward the farm credit bill. An hon. member on the government side to the right of the Speaker prevented the passage of the FISP bill. It would have passed earlier this afternoon.

An hon. Member: Who was that hon. member?

Mr. Alexander: Just one moment. The government, in its confusion, hurriedly tried to bring forward another bill, the farm credit bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please.

Mr. Alexander: That bill was not proceeded with and the government brought forward the labour bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. So far I have not heard anything that might constitute a question of privilege. From what I have heard, there is no question of privilege.

Mr. Peters: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: Finding that it is close to that hour, may I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

PENSIONS—OLD AGE SECURITY—ALLEGED INTENTION OF QUEBEC GOVERNMENT TO CLAIM PART OF RECENT INCREASE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on June 1 last, I put the following question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare:

Does the minister intend to make a statement on motions following the action taken recently by the Quebec government with regard to its intention of using part of the increase in the old age pensions which was granted through passage of Bill C-207?

The minister answered as follows:

No, it was not my intention, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I understand quite well why the minister did not intend to resume the discussion of the matter because he would have been compelled to say that Quebec had no other alternative than to increase the cost of staying in homes.

Thus pensioners find themselves with next to nothing. Not all of them, I agree, but certainly the poorest and those who, under federal-provincial agreements, will get next to nothing from the $15 increase which has been granted to them.

For instance, let us consider a few cases quoted by Miss Claire Dutrisac in La Presse of May 31 last.

Take a single person, aged 65. After a monthly estimation of his needs, that is, $90 for housing, $52 for food, clothing and personal expenses, $10 for a special diet and $5 for life insurance, we have a total of $157.

On the other hand, the income of that person is made up of the old age pension, plus the guaranteed income supplement, that is $137.70. The difference paid by the welfare service is therefore $19.30. Medical supplies are also paid by that service, although not directly to the beneficiary. So, in view of the $15 increase we voted, this person's income will be increased to $152.70.

The difference between the needs and the income would therefore amount to $4.30. This, then, will be the amount added to the allowance of the federal government, instead of $19.30.

To conclude, in that specific case, Mr. Speaker, this individual will not see one penny of the $15 monthly increase.

On the other hand, a single person of 65 who does not benefit from the welfare act because his needs have been evaluated at less than $137.70 will benefit fully from the $15 increase and will live off the $152.70 pension we have voted.

Mr. Speaker, this principle resembles that of the communicating vessels. It will be even more pronounced in the case of those who live in old people's homes. Those who used to receive $137.70 will get $152.70 retroactively to January 1, 1972. They now pay the institution $104 a month for room, board and services supplied by the home. Thus they have $33.70 left for personal expenses such as clothing, entertainment, tobacco and so on.

Now in a few days their pension will be increased to $110 a month. The sum remaining at thier disposal will therefore be $42.70. If the government of Quebec had not increased their pension, they would have $48.70 left. In other words, their $15 increase will in fact be cut down to $9 since they will have to give $6 more to the institution.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the federal government should not so deceive. People of 65 or over do expect to get $15 per month more.

In fact, nearly 12,000 senior citizens of Quebec will see very little or no difference as a result of Bill C-207.

Mr. Speaker, I shall soon bring up this matter again in the House so as to make sure that the government is really taking its responsibilities towards the people who have built our country. I insist on it because we will be old one day and we will then realize the extreme importance of an equitable pension for all the old people.

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member and I was wondering if those comments are really his own or belong to Miss Dutrisac.

In any case, if he wants to criticize the government's decision to increase the pension of the 1,800,000 individuals who will be getting additional payments, he is ill-advised to do so I think and if he accuses the federal government of failing to come to an understanding with the Quebec government I will remind him that the leader of his party in the House sharply criticized Mr. Castonguay when the latter took his decisions following the increases authorized by Ottawa.

The hon. member mentions the possibility that a decrease in supplementary benefits to welfare recipients would cancel the increase coming to some retired people.

I would reply that the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare are presently studying the effects of the increases in the benefits paid as old age security pensions and as guaranteed income supplement on the benefits paid under the Canada Assistance Plan, and they are discussing all aspects of the matter with the representatives of the provinces. Even if the total number of people involved at the present time equals a small percentage only of the number of pensioners, the federal government plans to examine every possible means to keep them from being short-changed in any way.

On the subject of that increase, I would also like to say that from the human point of view most Canadians have approved the government move to increase the old age security pensions and the guaranteed income supplement.

The substantial difference between the rates of payments to people aged 65 and over and to people under 65 quite clearly illustrates what regard we have for our senior citizens. A quick survey of levels of payments to elderly people in all provinces has demonstrated that such levels are lower in all the provinces than those made by the federal government. Quebec is not the only province in this situation, although it is the only one to have voiced criticisms.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that this decision taken by the federal government may have brought pressure to bear on Mr. Castonguay. However there is a course he can resort to, should he find such pressure too strong. He can always increase benefits to welfare recipients between 55 and 65 years old and, it is known, the federal government would share these expenditures, assuming 50 per cent thereof.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS—INCREASE IN COST OF FOOD—MEASURES TO ASSIST LOW-INCOME CONSUMERS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, evidence continues to pile up that the consumer is being made to pay higher prices for food in the supermarkets while at the same time the profits of the huge food chains are increasing. Today's Globe and Mail reports that the cost of 147 food items in major food chains in metropolitan Toronto hit a record high in February of this year, according to a graph produced by the Ontario Food Council. The same 147 items which sold for just over $55 on December 9, 1970, cost $62 on February 9, 1972.

The council secretary said much of the increase was due to the cost of beef and pork and, in a smaller way, the increased cost of poultry. These are nutrition-necessary protein foods. In spite of the slump in prices due to the late price war and other dips due to various factors, the council secretary says prices are now on the rise again.

Who is responsible for these price rises? Clearly not the farmer. A correspondent in Calgary reports that some farmer friends of his received from 19 to 26 cents a pound on the hoof for lambs in 1971 and only 19 to 33 cents a pound for lambs this year in Calgary. In June of this year the Safeway chain in Calgary was charging $1.95 a pound for lamb chops which, my correspondent adds, "were so tough they must have been mutton". Not much fat in those chops for the farmer!

As to poultry prices to the farmer, just today in the House the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) announced the slaughter of one million chickens in Canada for the purpose of keeping up prices for the farmer and ensuring that the egg market would not be depressed by an oversupply of cheap eggs. Speaking in the House on June 1, my hon. friend from Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) pointed out that in 1949 the farmer received 57 cents of the consumer's dollar. Twenty years later, in 1969, he received only 45 cents. My hon. friend believed that by last year the farmer's share had dropped to only 40 cents. So we need not waste time blaming the farmer. Like the consumer, he is on the losing end.

Nor is the need for a government spokesman to assure me that Canada has lower food prices than Outer Mongolia or Timbuctu. The consumers of this country can put two and two together. If the farmers are not getting a larger share of the food dollar and if food prices are rising, someone between them and the farmer is grabbing the difference. We want to know who it is. That is what I want the government to find out. If the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is worth anything, it is supposed to look after the interests of consumers as well as of corporations. But when the proposed competition act was introduced, the big corporations of Canada protested so vigorously that the bill was withdrawn. Why was this so? Because it contained some provisions to protect consumers.

The chairman of the federally-appointed Canadian Consumer Council said recently that the government's decision to revise this bill was "an act of political expediency" and the "result of an unbalanced dialogue" since only two or three out of a total of 300 briefs represented consumer interests.

Big corporations are well organized and well heeled. They can afford to travel, to hire experts to prepare briefs and to make their case for special privilege, while consumers are unable to protect themselves. Who, then, is to protect the consumer by delving into the facts and getting at the reasons for the relentless rise in food prices? Who is going to see to it that better ways are found of protecting the farmer than slaughtering one million chickens while thousands of Canadian families and millions of other families elsewhere need the protein they represent?

I firmly believe that only one agency can and should take responsibility for these problems, and that agency is this government. I urge once again that it begin to discharge that responsibility by conducting an investigation into rising food prices—a public investigation with witnesses from every sector of the food industry from the farm to the supermarket shelf—and that consumers be among the witnesses and the audience. Until this is done and the facts are known, the public will continue to suffer blindly, the government will continue to evade its responsibility and food prices will continue to rise.

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member stated that between April, 1971, and April, 1972, the cost of food used in the home rose by twice as much as the cost of living generally. The food component of the consumer price index rose from 131.5 in April, 1970, to 138.3 in April, 1972, an increase of 6.8 points. The consumer price index rose in the same period from 129.7 to 138.2, an increase of 8.5 points.

The use of the period April 1, 1971, to April 1, 1972, gives a false impression of trends in food prices because a large part of the increase during 1971 represented a readjustment following the price war among the supermarkets which began in 1970. From September to December, 1970, the food component of the consumer price index declined from 130 to 125.6, or 4.4 points.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

The recently announced budget makes special reference to the problems of low-income consumer groups, in particular elderly Canadians, through the adjustment of old age pensions in accordance with the cost of living and an increase in the guaranteed income supplement for needy, elderly Canadians.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McGRATH—CONSTRUCTION OF OIL REFINERY AT COME-BY-CHANCE—MANNER OF RELEASE OF STOP-ORDER STATEMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, notice of which has been given to Your Honour in accordance with the Standing Order. My question of privilege, in my view, affects the rights of all hon. members of the House.

Yesterday the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries released a statement to the Press Gallery in which the minister announced that a "stop-order" had been issued on the construction of the new oil refinery at Come-by-Chance, Newfoundland, in accordance with the provisions of sections 33(1) and 33(2) of the Fisheries Act. This is a very important statement and one that should have been made in the House in accordance with well-established practice. The minister does have the right to make a statement outside the House. My question of privilege, however, is based on the fact that the minister did not release copies of the statement to members of the House until this morning, thereby denying us the right to question the minister in the House yesterday. There is provision in the rules under Standing Order 41(2) to table statements in the House. The minister, in failing to do so and in failing to provide members of the House with copies of his statement at the time of its release to the press, in my opinion, is guilty of flagrantly violating the rules and practices of the House. If Your Honour rules that I have a prima facie question of privilege, I would move that the matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East has given the Chair notice of his intention to raise this matter by way of an alleged or suggested breach of the privileges of the House. With respect, I must advise the hon. member and the House that, after having given the matter due consideration, because the hon. member had given the Chair notice of his intention to raise this matter, I find it difficult to agree with the contention of the hon. member that this matter should be considered by a committee of the House.

The hon. member claims that copies of the minister's statement should have been distributed to hon. members so that they could have been given an opportunity to ask questions in the House. It seems to me, without trying to pass judgment on whether or not the statement should have been made in the House, that the questions that could have been asked yesterday can be asked today. There will be a question period in a short while, and I would think that the hon. member will have the same rights today as he had yesterday.

I recognize, as does the hon. member, that under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2) a minister of the Crown is entitled to table certain documents. However, the Standing Order does not provide that the minister is obligated to table a statement and there is no provision in the Standing Orders to the effect that a statement should be made in the House rather than outside the House.

In view of all these considerations, I doubt very much that hon. members would expect the Chair to authorize the initiation of a debate on this matter which would eventually, perhaps, lead to the matter being sent to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I cannot see my way clear to ruling that there is a prima facie breach of parliamentary privilege, and I would not think the hon. member's motion should be put to the House.

ORDER STOPPING CONSTRUCTION OF COME-BY-CHANCE OIL REFINERY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Based on the announcement of the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries yesterday invoking section 33 of the Fisheries Act with respect to the Come-By-Chance oil refinery I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the whole matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry for examination of the contents and inquiry into the implications of the said ministerial statement.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for St. John's West under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The hon. member's motion cannot be put.

ALLEGED FINANCIAL ADVANTAGE GAINED BY FARMERS THROUGH WITHDRAWAL OF INCOME STABILIZATION BILL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 to move a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity arising out of the fact revealed last night in the Standing Committee on Agriculture at which witnesses from the Canadian Wheat Board were present, namely, that western farmers gained approximately $100 million by virtue of the withdrawal of the grain income stabilization bill. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave):

That the Standing Committee on Agriculture investigate the revelation made yesterday at that committee to the effect that western farmers gained a considerable financial advantage by virtue of the withdrawal of the grain income stabilization bill, introduced in the House last year by the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, a fact which is contrary to the statements made last fall in the House of Commons—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member going to indicate what the motion is? I think there might be something irregular in hon. members introducing motions that in themselves are so long that they are speeches. It is easy, I suggest, for hon. members to circumvent the rules which provide that there should be a brief explanation of the motion if the motion in fact is a speech in itself. Again I say that the hon. member should indicate what the motion is. I might say in passing that I have some doubts as to the regularity of this motion.

Mr. Knight: The motion is:

That the Standing Committee on Agriculture investigate the revelation made yesterday at that committee to the effect that western farmers gained a considerable financial advantage by virtue of the withdrawal of the grain income stabilization bill, introduced in the House last year by the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, a fact which is contrary to the statements made last fall in the House of Commons by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, and that the standing committee report on its findings to the House as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated a moment ago, I have serious doubts about the regularity of the motion. It seems to me that the hon. member's motion refers to proceedings in a committee. I will take the matter under advisement and indicate to the House later whether I should ascertain if there is unanimous consent of the House to put the motion.

[Mr. Carter.]

Mr. Knight: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the motion is one of referral, based on the short experience I have had in terms of the House sending important questions to standing committees of the House. That is how the motion reads. If this was not clear, the motion is that the matter be sent to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I might at this point refer to the motion proposed earlier by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I refer him to citation 324 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, which reads as follows:

Until the report and evidence have been laid upon the Table, it is irregular to refer to them in debate, or to put questions in reference to the proceedings of the committee.

The hon. member's motion makes reference to proceedings in a committee and because of this it cannot be put.

IMPENDING NUCLEAR TEST BY FRANCE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, not wishing to try your patience too much further, I have a regular and brief motion under Standing Order 43.

In view of President Pompidou's statement confirming France's determination to continue atmospheric nuclear tests in the South Pacific, and in view of the fact that Australia, New Zealand and a number of Latin American states have expressed united opposition to these tests, even to the point of threatening to withdraw diplomatic relations, I seek unanimous consent under Standing Order 43 to move the following resolution, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding):

Whereas continued testing of nuclear warheads by any nation anticipates a threat to human life on this planet, and

Whereas a yet unconfirmed report emanating from Australia that the Greenpeace crew has been incarcerated in a military hospital in Tahiti;

Therefore this House of Commons calls upon the government of France to cease all further tests and urges the Prime Minister to request immediately of the Ambassador of France that he confirm or deny whether or not the integrity of a Canadian vessel has been violated on the high seas.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again, I have serious doubts as to the regularity of this motion. Hon. members will appreciate that even motions put forward under the terms of Standing Order 43 must follow the rules of the House. It is a long established rule that a motion should not include "whereas" clauses. This motion contains "whereas" clauses and I suggest to the hon. member that it is entirely out of order for that reason. But rather than rule the motion unacceptable on that ground it might be easier to ask whether there is unanimous consent. If there is unanimous agreement it will be put. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not. Therefore the hon. member's irregular motion cannot be put.

LETTERS TO WESTERN FARMERS ALLEGEDLY PROMISING CERTAIN PAYMENTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise to put a motion under the terms of Standing Order 43. The subject matter has to do with facts which were revealed yesterday evening at a meeting of the Standing Committee on Agriculture at which officials of the Canadian Wheat Board were present. I move:

That the Standing Committee on Agriculture meet forthwith and examine the mailing of letters last July and August to western farmers, promising payments of $1.45 per eligible acre, and specifically, whether Statistics Canada, Winnipeg, or the Canadian Wheat Board were the originators of these letters; and that the Standing Committee on Agriculture report to this House by the end of this session.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The motion cannot be put.

PARLIAMENT HILL—RECONSTRUCTION OF SCENIC WALK

Question No. 88—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. Is the government giving consideration to the re-opening of the scenic walk around Parliament Hill, formerly known as "Lovers' Lane"?

2. Could such re-opening be partly a winter works project?

3. What would be the estimated cost of such project?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): In so far as the National Capital Commission is concerned: 1. Reconstruction of the walk was considered but was ruled out because of erosion, scarring of Parliament Hill and other factors. Instead, the government has decided that a promenade will be built around the base of the Hill.

2. N/A

3. $750,000.

NUMBER OF WORKERS INVOLVED IN WORK STOPPAGES IN CANADA 1968-70

Question No. 268—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. By province, how many members of (a) American controlled international unions (b) national and regional unions, went on strike during 1968, 1969 and 1970?

2. For the period 1968 to November 30, 1971, how many manufacturing plants closed down?

3. Were the workers employed in these plants members of (a) international unions (b) national and regional unions?

4. What was the total amount of union fees paid by Canadians to international unions for the years 1969 and 1970?

6. Does the government plan to introduce legislation which would make Canadian trade unions independent of American unions and, if not, for what reasons?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Labour and by Statistics Canada as follows: 1. The number of workers involved in work stoppages in which the unions involved were (a) international and (b) national and regional, during 1968, 1969 and 1970 in each of the Canadian jurisdictions is given in the table. A third category "Others", includes cases where the work stoppages involved unorganized workers or where it was not possible to classify unions under (a) or (b) categories because of the involvement of several unions in the same work stoppage. The term jurisdiction corresponds to province except in the case of "Federal." Work stoppages in the federal jurisdiction may occur in one or more provinces, but the workers involved are not distributed geographically. Included under "Federal" are federal industries and the federal public service.

LORNEVILLE, NEW BRUNSWICK—STUDIES CARRIED OUT BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Question No. 390—Mr. Robinson:

Is a study being carried out of the Lorneville, New Brunswick Development and, if so (a) what is the estimated cost of the study (b) how much of the cost is to be paid by the federal government?

CANADIAN TRADE FAIR, PEKING—AGRICULTURAL EXHIBIT

Question No. 525—Mr. Knight:

What are the names of the 14 agricultural and livestock firms that have been accepted to show displays at the Canadian Trade Fair in Peking in August?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The names of the agricultural organizations* which will have displays in the agricultural exhibit at the Canadian trade exposition in Peking are as follows: The Canadian Wheat Board, The Canadian Grains Commission, The Canada Grains Council, The Rapeseed Association of Canada, The Canadian Renderers Association, The Canadian Seed Growers Association, The Ontario Fluecured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board, The Canadian Pork Council, The Canadian Joint Beef Breeds Association, The Joint Dairy Breeds of Canada, The Canadian Committee of Animal Breeders, The Canadian Poultry Breeders Export Group, The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

*The fourteenth firm, while not representative of the agricultural sector is the B.C. Fisheries Association.

EXPORT MARKETS FOR CANADIAN-MADE SHOES AND BOOTS

Question No. 565—Mr. Yewchuk:

To date, what action has been taken by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to secure markets for Canadian-made shoes and boots in (a) Africa (b) People's Republic of China (c) U.S.S.R. (d) US (e) Yugoslavia?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): (a) None. The bulk of the footwear used in Africa is manufactured locally. This market is supplied from "low-cost countries" in view of the fact that footwear demand is for a low-cost footwear not normally manufactured in Canada. (b) In discussions between Chinese officials and departmental representatives, including the arrangements for the Canadian Trade Exposition in Peking in August, it has been made clear that the Chinese authorities are unwilling to allocate their limited foreign exchange to pay for imports of consumer goods—particularly footwear which can be supplied locally. (c) and (e) No action has been taken by the Department to secure markets for Canadian-made shoes and boots in the USSR and Yugoslavia. Wage differentials and other costs between Canada and these two countries make it difficult to penetrate this market. (d) A cost benefit analysis of export opportunities has indicated that the best results could be obtained on the U.S. footwear market and U.S. market penetration has been the Department's priority. The following activities have been undertaken by the Department to assist Canadian manufacturers in securing export markets in the U.S.

1. The Department has sponsored incoming buyers' missions from the United States in 1969 and 1970.

2. In 1971, financial support was given to the advertising campaign in selected trade media for the Canadian Shoe and Leather Fair. This support is again being given in 1972.

3. Financial assistance was extended to footwear manufacturers taking sample rooms in regional shoe fairs in the United States in 1970.

4. The regional offices of the Trade Commissioner Service offer direct assistance to Canadian exporters by directing them and arranging appointments with U.S. buyers and marketing agents. They also direct U.S. importers to Canadian manufacturers.

5. The Department commissioned a comprehensive marketing study of the U.S. market by Canadian consultants. This report was distributed in February 1972 to all Canadian footwear manufacturers.

6. Export encouragement and marketing advice is extended to all Canadian manufacturers by the Department.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

Question No. 599—Mr. Robinson:

Will the government consider the advisability of recommending to provincial governments that welfare recipients be allowed to earn moneys to supplement their income up to the poverty level enunciated by the Economic Council of Canada without having welfare allotment reduced?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Department of National Health and Welfare, in discussions with provincial welfare departments, has made it clear that provincial social assistance programs which provide for recipients retaining specified amounts of earned income are eligible for sharing under the Canada Assistance Plan. In some provinces, an amount of up to $100 per month may be earned without effecting a reduction in the social assistance payment.

DEMPSTER HIGHWAY, YUKON

Question No. 604—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

1. How many miles of the so-called Dempster Highway in the Yukon have been constructed and what has been the cost to date of building the said Highway?

2. Is the construction of the said Highway to be continued and, if so, what is its ultimate destination and what is the estimated cost of reaching that destination?

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. At the end of 1971, 158 miles had been completed at a cost of $7,650,000

2. Yes. The Dempster Highway will ultimately join the Mackenzie Highway at Arctic Red River. The estimated cost of reaching Arctic Red River will be approximately $21,000,000 over and above the $7,650,000 already spent.

EXPORTS OF CANADIAN DAIRY PRODUCTS

Question No. 609—Mr. Yewchuk:

To date, what form of consultation and co-operation has taken place between the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the specific purpose of increasing and improving the export trade of Canadian dairy products?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned: Officials of the Department and the Canadian Dairy Commission are in continuous consultation with their counterparts in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the purpose of maintaining and expanding access and sales for Canadian exports of dairy products. In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: Officials of the Department consult and cooperate on a continuous basis with officials of the Canada Department of Agriculture and the Canadian Dairy Commission. Policies, programs and export marketing activities relating to the expansion of export trade for Canadian dairy products are discussed fully and implemented on a cooperative basis.

Question No. 628—Mr. Burton:

1. What are the estimated total expenditures that the government will incur as a result of the passage of the Employment Support Bill?

2. What expenditures have been made and what are the total expenditures estimated to be incurred as a result of the following commitments made by the Agricultural Stabilization Board to offset difficulties during the period when the United States 10 per cent surtax was in effect (a) offer of a special subsidy of 50 cents per bird for fowl slaughtered during an eight-week period providing the number slaughtered exceeded the normal kill in the period; the subsidy to be pro-rated among all producers (b) offer to purchase and can up to four million pounds of eviscerated turkeys (c) offer to purchase Canada No. 1 potatoes at $1.50 per hundredweight (d) an offer to the Canadian Horticultural Council for market promotion of fresh apples (e) offer of a supplementary subsidy of 1½ cents per pound to blueberry producers on products delivered in the period August 16 to October 15, 1971?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Agriculture as follows: 1. $11,200,000.

Questions

CANADIAN POLICY TOWARD GERMAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

Question No. 638—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Is the government considering granting MFN (most favoured nation) tariff treatment to the German Democratic Republic?

2. Is the government considering the admission into Canada of trade commissioners from the German Democratic Republic?

3. Is the government considering changing its policy of refusing to grant visas to journalists from the German Democratic Republic?

4. Has the government been in negotiation with the German Democratic Republic regarding the above three matters?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the departments of External Affairs, Industry, Trade and Commerce and Manpower and Immigration, as follows: 1. For the past two years, the Government has sought through unofficial means to put our trade with the GDR on a MFN (most favoured nation) basis.

2. An unofficial arrangement providing mutual MFN treatment would facilitate consideration of any proposal for the establishment of an unofficial East German trade office in Canada.

3. The Government has no policy of refusing visas to East German journalists. They come under the same regulations as any other visitor from the German Democratic Republic.

4. Since Canada does not recognize the German Democratic Republic, there can be no contact at the governmental level. The Government of the German Democratic Republic is, however, aware of our position on these three questions.

*RAILWAY ACT—PROVISION OF FUNDS FOR BETTER FENCING OF RIGHTS OF WAY

Is the Minister of Transport considering amending the Railway Act to provide funds for better fencing of rights of way in urban areas for protection of the public?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, section 214 of the Railway Act deals with "fences, gates and cattle-guards" at railway crossings. For the time being the Department of Transport is not considering an amendment to the Railway Act in that respect.

TAXATION OF STRIKE PAY

Question No. 691—Mr. Robinson:

CORPORATION AND LABOUR UNIONS RETURNS ACT REPORT, 1968

Question No. 705—Mr. Blair:

1. Was the 1968 Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act Report on Labour Unions reprinted after it had been approved for Tabling in Parliament in order to delete critical references to international unions?

2. Were any representations received from international unions requesting the alteration of the Report?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Statistics Canada reports that: 1. No. The Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act Report, Part II—1968—which summarizes returns made by labour unions under the Act was completed in draft form and printed while the Dominion Statistician was out of the country. It was held for review and approval of the Dominion Statistician on his return. Some parts of the textual material of the report were not considered to be appropriate and therefore it became necessary to amend the text and correct some typographical errors before presentation to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce for tabling in Parliament. No charts or other summary tables were altered or deleted from the original draft on which the analyses were based.

2. At no time between the original drafting of the report and tabling in Parliament was there any discussion concerning content of the report with anyone connected with any union organizations nor were any copies of the original draft made available to any union officials or organizations.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, on a question of personal privilege I should like to draw the attention of the ministry and the House to the interesting circumstance that starred question No. 476, which has been on the order paper since March 29 and for which this might be the last clear date on which to provide an answer, has not been answered.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I should like to indicate to the House at this time that, in keeping with the practice that has prevailed on some occasions in the past when the House has risen for an extended recess on a Friday, we are endeavouring to continue during the rest of this week to answer as many questions as possible. I am hopeful that we will be in a position to deposit answers to quite a substantial number of questions on Friday. This will, of course, require unanimous consent to call written questions, but we shall be seeking such consent.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire whether or not it would be possible to answer question No. 425 which has been on the order paper for fully three months. It pertains to grants and other forms of financial assistance to some 95 corporations. It seems to me, given the possibility of an election coming up soon, that the answer to this question could be rather pertinent.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 48 is acceptable to the government.

CONTRACTS DEALING WITH PUBLICITY FOR DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

Motion No. 48—Mr. Nystrom:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all contracts dealing with publicity and/or information entered into by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal years 1970-71 and 1971-72.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, notice of motion for the production of papers No. 58 is acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents and the authorization of the government authorities concerned.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations mentioned by the parliamentary secretary, does the House agree to consider notice of motion No. 58 as passed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND CANADA RELATING TO SUFFIELD EXPERIMENTAL STATION, ALBERTA

Motion No. 58—Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the Agreement or an exchange of correspondence between the Government of Great Britain and the Government of Canada governing the use and terms of such use of that portion of the Suffield experimental station in Alberta for training purposes by British troops, including British armoured vehicles.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 5, 22, 34, 46 and 68.

COPY OF REPORTS ON USAGE OF MARIJUANA

Motion No. 5—Mr. McIntosh:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all reports or other documents relating to tests or experiments conducted to date by or on order of the Department of National Health and Welfare on usage of marijuana.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on the hon. member's behalf.

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, all marijuana experiments sponsored by the department have been made public. Interim reports must remain classified in order to avoid misinterpretation of inconclusive discoveries. The department has also supplied the Le Dain Commission with chemical analysis of drugs, therefore the discoveries belong to the commission.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The parliamentary secretary should indicate whether he is prepared to table the papers requested by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek.

Mr. Ouellet: For the aforementioned reasons, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, we think that all of these reports paid for by the taxpayers should be made available, so we should like the question to be put.

Mr. Jerome: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF CONSULTANT REPORT BY ECONOMIST INTELLIGENCE UNIT FOR DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—1966-67

Motion No. 22—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by the Economist Intelligence Unit on guidance and assessment of the Canadian textile industry, undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal year 1966-67, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on the hon. member's behalf.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Moose Jaw has asked previously that a copy of the consultants; report on the Canadian textile industry be released. The department's position is still as follows: the study contains information provided in confidence to the department on the understanding that it will not be disclosed. Such disclosure would prejudice the department's ability to obtain similar information in the future.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's position is the same, as follows: he would like the papers.

Mr. Jerome: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF REPORT BY GHERZI TEXTILE ORGANIZATION REGARDING CANADIAN TEXTILE INDUSTRY FOR DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE, 1966-67

Motion No. 34—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Gherzi Textile Organization on the Canadian textile industry undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal year 1966-67, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I move the motion on the hon. member's behalf, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer is the same. Would you like me to read it again?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The response is the same, too.

Mr. Jerome: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COPY OF CONTRACTS DEALING WITH PUBLICITY FOR DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Motion No. 46—Mr. Nystrom:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all contracts dealing with publicity and/or information entered into by the Department of National Health and Welfare in the fiscal years 1970-71 and 1971-72.

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we cannot accede to the request of the hon. member because a contract is a confidential document between the individual and his employer.

I should therefore ask the hon. member to kindly withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I will not withdraw it because the government accepted a similar request before in respect of a different department. Therefore I ask that it be transferred for debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. A few minutes ago the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Jerome) said that the government agreed to notice of motion for the production of papers No. 48 which reads:

Motions for Papers

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all contracts dealing with publicity and/or information entered into by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal years 1970-71 and 1971-72.

Notice of motion No. 46 now before the House is in exactly the same words but refers to a different department. I think it is quite improper for the government to agree to one and not the other.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member brought his argument forth by way of a question of privilege. He will appreciate that this is an argument he may want to put forth when the matter is debated in the House, perhaps in July or August. The motion is transferred for debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I shall be here.

An hon. Member: What else is new?

COPY OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PROVINCIAL AND FEDERAL GOVERNMENTS RELATING TO MAIL SERVICE

Motion No. 68—Mr. Dinsdale:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the correspondence between the provincial governments and the federal government with respect to the deteriorating mail service, particularly the courier service set up recently by the Province of Alberta to provide more efficient mail service between Calgary and Edmonton or any similar mail courier service established by any other province?

Mr. Baldwin: I move the motion on the hon. member's behalf, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gerald Richard Cobbe (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, there has been no correspondence between the Alberta government and the federal government on this subject. Therefore I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Baldwin: He will also be here in July or August to debate it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

COME-BY-CHANCE OIL REFINERY—REASON FOR ORDER STOPPING CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries. Will he tell the House why he found it necessary to invoke Section 33 of the Fisheries Act in respect of the oil refinery at Come-By-Chance?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Because, Mr. Speaker, the construction of the refinery in question is well advanced and the company had not clearly indicated it was prepared to make all the installations which will be necessary to meet the fisheries standards once that plant is in operation.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I think the minister has deliberately misled the House in his statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Carter: I make that charge on the basis of information which has come to me that meetings were held among officials of the minister's department, the refining company, the contractor, the Newfoundland provincial government, the Minister of Finance and various other people involved in the project. These meetings took place on June 7 and June 8, and on June 22 and June 23 the same people met and agreed on all aspects of the requirements of the minister and his department and indicated they were willing to abide by those requirements and would proceed to take the necessary action to correct these problems. I think the minister has deliberately misled the House on this matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will, of course, allow the minister to reply, but the hon. member is a member with some experience and knows he cannot charge another member, including a minister, with deliberately misleading the House. Perhaps we might allow the minister to reply and then I will return to the hon. member.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member should spring to the defence of the Newfoundland Refining Company when he well knows—

Mr. Horner: Tell us how big a grant your government gave?

Mr. Davis: —that this company has been very slow in making commitments in the direction of pollution abatement.

An hon. Member: This didn't happen when Joey was around.

Mr. Davis: The company has not made available to the government the plans necessary to meet the tough standards we have set, and with which, incidentally, the hon. member undoubtedly agrees.

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point made by the minister and the point made by the hon. member are debate between the minister and the member. This might lead to a full-fledged debate of some kind. I am sure the hon. member for St. John's West appreciates it is a long established practice of the House, as old as the parliamentary institution, that an hon. member cannot suggest that another hon. member has wilfully misled hon. members. I would invite the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair. I suggest it is possible to have debate, to have questions and answers, to have controversy, in other words, to have the system which exists, without accusing other hon. members of having wilfully misled the House or having wilfully misled other members. I would hope the hon. member would find it possible to express his thought in some other way.

Mr. Carter: On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say I am not prepared to withdraw that comment on the basis that the minister and his department were quite aware of the fact that the Newfoundland government, the principal owners of the refinery, the company, the contractors and all the other people concerned were willing to abide by the decision of the minister with regard to requirements and at the meeting of June 22 and June 23 that intention was expressed and the minister's officials were present.

Mr. Speaker: Again that is debate by the hon. member. The hon. member may feel very strongly about this matter and feel he is right, but I believe he has an obligation to the House, to this institution, to respect the traditions and customs of the House, I really do not see how we can help the House of Commons and the traditions of this House by adopting a rigid attitude. It is easy for hon. members to adopt rigid attitudes, whether they are on the government side or on the opposition side. It is much more difficult to bend with the rules. I really think there is an obligation on the part of hon. members, even when they feel strongly about a matter, to take into account the traditions of the institution and forget about the feelings and emotions which are perhaps linked with a situation. I would earnestly invite the hon. member for St. John's West to give some thought to the situation and not place the House in the difficult position in which he is placing us all now.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I recognize my responsibility as a member, but I think the Minister of the Environment also has a responsibility not to mislead the Canadian people and the House. I still contend that the minister did mislead the House in his answer.

Mr. Speaker: I think the contention has been made very often in the past that the House has been mislead. I have had the feeling over the years during which I have heard debates that hon. members unwittingly, and without wanting to, will mislead other hon. members in the statements and speeches they make. This applies to any hon. member. I am sure that if I had the opportunity to participate in debate as my colleagues have I might be placed in the same situation where unwittingly I would not convey the information I might be expected to convey in the course of statements. But there is a difference. I think the hon. member has the right to accuse the minister of misleading the House, but there is a distinction I might draw that a member cannot say that another member has wilfully misled the House. I think this distinction is an accommodation the hon. member might wish to avail himself of.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, one hon. member rose in the House today to say I should have made a statement and did not. Another hon. member has been saying that I misled the House. Since I have not previously commented on the subject, I cannot see how I misled the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. The responsibility of the Chair is not to determine whether a member has effectively misled or has wilfully misled. The point is not that at all. I am not here to judge the circumstances. In fact, I know very little about the circumstances to which the hon. member for St. John's West has alluded and the circumstances to which the minister has referred. I am dealing strictly with the procedural aspect, that it is not possible according to the rules to accuse another member of wilfully misleading. I think it is in accordance with the rules to suggest that another member has misled the House. I hear that accusation made often in the House. I have heard it on a number of occasions. I would hope the hon. member would want to co-operate with the Chair, with other hon. members and with the House by indicating that that is what he had in mind when he made the statement.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I think the facts speak for themselves in that I would suggest to the minister that if he wants to make an example and start to flex his muscles Newfoundland is not the place to do it. The minister was well aware of the fact that these conditions were being met by the parties concerned. Despite that, he issued a statement at which time he threatened to invoke Section 33 of the Fisheries Act. Today in his answer he certainly gave the impression that the other parties were not willing to abide by the rules of his department with regard to pollution control. I do not know how else to put it, Mr. Speaker. The minister's actions are deliberate. I do not know any other way to put it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member says the minister has faulted certain rules of conduct. I suggest to the hon. member that he is faulting certain rules of the House. He is accusing the minister of being intransigent. That is quite possible. I certainly cannot rule on that. But the hon. member might be just a trifle less intransigent. It seems to me he has made his point. He has had three occasions on which to express his views in relation to the circumstances of the matter. He feels very strongly about it, but I would feel that, for the good conduct of the affairs of the House, the hon. member might like to amend his statement along the lines I have suggested.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, if the minister is prepared to correct his answer I am prepared to correct my statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: Admit it was a cheap trick.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously we have reached an impasse. I think I have a duty to the House to appeal again to the hon. member. Apparently he feels very strongly about the matter. Obviously he does. But there are rules of the House, and I certainly have no hesitation at all in living up to my responsibilities. Every single member of the House, including the hon. member for St. John's West, would want the Speaker to enforce the rules of the House. From what I know of him I am sure this is what he would expect me to do. I wonder what in the world is gained by the kind of debate and argument that has arisen between the hon. member and the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries. I would again suggest to the hon. member that it would be so easy for him to indicate that he is prepared to review the matter in light of the statements that might be made later when questions are asked during the question period. I would think that the hon. member for St. John's West appreciates that the question period will continue in a short while and he can then ask all the questions he likes.

• (1440)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: There seem to be objections to this. Other hon. members appear to have questions to ask also, but the hon. member can ask questions to get some clarification about this very delicate matter. In the meantime, perhaps he might like to amend his statement, which will give us an opportunity to proceed with the question period and will give an opportunity to the hon. member for St. John's West to ask his questions.

Mr. Carter: If I may be allowed to change the wording slightly, I would say that the minister is guilty of uttering a terminological inexactitude.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I really feel that the hon. member has come a long way.

Mr. Baldwin: How about the minister moving a couple of inches?

Mr. Speaker: I would hope that the good will indicated by the hon. member for St. John's West would show itself in the responses given by the minister to the questions that might be asked by the hon. member for St. John's West. I really feel that the hon. member has gone a long way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members may not think that is so, but I feel that it is a very substantial concession—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —not to the Chair, not to the minister, but to the practices of the House, to the longstanding traditions of the House. I understand that the hon. member is substituting the words he has just used for the suggestion made earlier that the minister had wilfully misled the House. On that understanding, I will recognize the hon. member for the purpose of asking his question. I would hope that we would not have to go further and that questions can be asked.

Mr. Carter: This is my supplementary question to the minister. Was he aware of the fact that his officials and officials of the company and of the Newfoundland government had agreed to concur with his requirements with respect to the oil refinery at Come-By-Chance?

Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Speaker. There have been a series of meetings held with the company. We have not yet received plans which would indicate that the company was definitely committed to building, for example, dikes around oil storage tanks. We were not convinced that it had the financial wherewithal to carry out those plans. Until we have those plans and until we have proof of the financial capability of the company to carry out those plans, we must, under the provisions of the Fisheries Act, take the steps which we have taken to date.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware of the fact that agreement was only reached last Friday and that this would not have allowed time for the plans to arrive in Ottawa yesterday prior to making his irresponsible statement?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, until we have the plans and until we are convinced that the company will carry them out, I do not see any reason for us to continue to be lenient in this case.

Mr. McGrath: The minister was caught out in a cheap, political trick, and he knows it. He got carried away by the Stockholm conference.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may rephrase a question which was asked earlier. Can the minister confirm to the House that a meeting did take place last Friday, June 23, at which time the Department of the Environment was present as well as the clean air, water and soil authorities of the provincial government, the refinery company and the consulting firm representing the provincial government, and did the company at that time, on Friday, agree to meet the specifications he laid down earlier at his meeting with the finance minister?

Mr. Davis: There have been a series of meetings of that character including representatives of the provincial authorities, but we have yet to receive the proof we need.

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Lundrigan: Perhaps I am not making myself very clear. I am trying to conform to the rule of brevity in the question period. Can the minister indicate whether that meeting took place on Friday and whether the company agreed to the several points regarding effluent control which were recommended by the Department of the Environment?

Mr. Davis: One of a series of meetings, the latest, occurred on that date. The company did agree to undertake some additional changes in its plans, but until we are sure that all the necessary changes will be made we have no alternative but to take the action we did.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate may ask a further supplementary and then the hon. member for Kootenay West will be recognized for a supplementary.

Mr. Lundrigan: Perhaps the minister would like to take the time on motions—I am sure he would get the agreement of the House—to correct the very bad and wrong impression he gave the Canadian people right across the country and the cheap political stunt he pulled yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment. How long has the department been aware that the building plans of the Come-By-Chance refinery were inadequate so far as pollution control requirements are concerned?

Mr. Davis: The plans which we received were always inadequate, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Monteith: Answer the question.

Mr. Harding: I am sure the minister missed my question. How long has the department been aware that the building plans of the Come-By-Chance refinery were inadequate so far as pollution control requirements are concerned?

Mr. Davis: They have not been adequate over the last 18 months during which we have had frequent meetings with the company. They have yet to be made adequate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harding: I have another supplementary question for the minister. Why was federal action on the building plans delayed until this late date?

Some hon. Members: Get to your feet.

An hon. Member: Answer.

Mr. Davis: We were always hopeful, even though the construction of the refinery was proceeding, that the company would see the light and that with the backing and indeed urging of the provincial government would make the necessary plans available to us at an early date.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Did the officials of the department extract such an agreement from the company and/or the Newfoundland government last Friday?

Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McGrath: That is where the lie is.

Mr. Nowlan: We ought to build a dike around you.

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASES—INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETION OF STUDY BY MINISTER AND ACTION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, by chance may I turn to the Minister of Communications and ask him to respond to a question I have asked him on two or three occasions. Has he completed his study of the facts which appear to have justified the Canadian Transport Commission in giving Bell Canada large increases in consumer rates? Has he completed that study and is he able to inform the House as to any action he is contemplating taking?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of Communications): I hope to be in a position to do that tomorrow, Mr. Speaker. Meanwhile I might tell the hon. member, because I know he is interested, that I have arranged to place the transcript of the Canadian Transport Commission hearings on loan with the library of the University of Windsor so that Dr. Lloyd Brown-John may have full access to it.

Mr. Lewis: I appreciate that action of the Minister of Communications. I am not saying that with tongue in cheek; I really do.

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASES—SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION BY TRANSPORT COMMISSION IN LIGHT OF LAY-OFFS BY NORTHERN ELECTRIC AND BELL CANADA UNDERTAKING

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Communications if he is aware of the fact that Northern Electric has been laying off between 2,000 and 3,000 people, giving as a reason that Bell Canada has cancelled orders to the tune of about $100 million, contrary to Bell Canada's undertaking with the Canadian Transport Commission that this money would be spent on necessary equipment and expansion, and that their refusal to carry out the commitment has resulted in these large lay-offs of Canadian workers in Montreal?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member is asking me if I am aware of those facts. I could not vouch for them. I have seen some disappointment expressed by Bell Canada that the increases given by the Canadian Transport Commission are not sufficient to carry out the full capital program they might have hoped to carry out.

Mr. Lewis: Will the minister investigate the facts to which I have alluded and, if they are so, will he undertake to do what in my respectful opinion it is the duty of the government and Parliament to do, that is, immediately request the Canadian Transport Commission to reconsider?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now making a representation. Perhaps the minister might reply to the question itself.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with great respect to you, I am not making a representation. I am asking the minister whether he will undertake, when he looks into these questions, to ask the Canadian Transport Commission to rescind, revoke or alter—I think "vary" is the word used in the act—to vary its decision as it has the authority to do under the act giving it the power to set rates?

Mr. Speaker: Of course, that is a question whereas the hon. member's previous statement was a representation. The minister could reply to the question.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, certainly I would share what appears to be the hon. member's dim view of any failure to carry out commitments made to the commission, and I will be glad to inquire whether that appears to be the case.

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASES—REQUEST BY UNIONS ACTING ON BEHALF OF LAID-OFF NORTHERN ELECTRIC WORKERS FOR MEETING WITH MINISTER

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Communications. Has he yet replied to a request he received from three unions acting on behalf of workers directly affected by lay-offs at Northern Electric to meet with him? I understand this request came to him about ten days ago in the form of a letter. Has the minister replied and, if so, what was his reply?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I think the request came to me somewhat indirectly in that the unions had the impression that the Minister of Transport had somethingg to do with communications. However, I do not have much to do with lay-offs. I have been making inquiries about what might be the best procedure for one or more ministers to meet with these people. I do not think that by myself I could be very helpful to them in regard to lay-offs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We do have to try to move along. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby may ask a last supplementary and then I shall go to the hon. member for Champlain, because we are running short of time.

Mr. Broadbent: It was my understanding that a subsequent letter was written to the minister asking for a meeting and I understand there have been some discussions between himself and the Minister of Labour. Would the minister give a commitment to the House that he or some other minister directly involved will undertake to meet with representatives of these workers?

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, there has been consultation with a view to having such a meeting. Although I did not realize it until just now, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who is always one step ahead of the rest of us in these matters, has already met with a representative of the unions.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanbury: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I try to correct an impression I may have given to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby as a result of attempting to pass on information which was given to me sotto voce by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. He has, I understand, met with the president of Northern Electric at the request of union members but not with representatives of the unions. In accordance with the request made to me we shall try to arrange for further consultations.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—USE OF FUNDS NOT SPENT BY CERTAIN APPROVED PROJECTS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

What does the department he heads intend to do with the funds made available through the Opportunities for Youth program for projects that were accepted but for some reason or other cannot be carried out?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the same thing that we did last year, that is, the way some projects disappear, the same way others suddenly develop new needs for additional funds.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY AS TO GRANT FOR CONSTRUCTION OF COME-BY-CHANCE OIL REFINERY

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the statement made by the Minister of the Environment that it appeared there was insufficient money to complete the refinery at Come-By-Chance according to specifications laid down by his department, would the minister advise whether the Department of Regional Economic Expansion made any grants under its incentive program and in what amount? Would he also inform the House whether the department verified the financial status of the company before advancing any funds?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there is no grant from my department. As you know, oil refineries are excluded from the incentives program.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Were there any special grants under any other program with regard to docking facilities or ancillary facilities?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I do not know about docks in Canada, Mr. Speaker. Somebody else should answer the question.

AGRICULTURE

TERMINATION OF FOWL SLAUGHTER PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR PAYMENT OF SUBSIDY ON FLOCKS BOOKED BY PLANTS FOR KILLING

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, on June 8 the government announced a fowl slaughter program and on June 27 it announced that the program was being terminated. Since approved poultry processors were unable to handle all flocks committed to them during this period, will the government pay the approved subsidy on all flocks booked by killing plants which were not slaughtered because of lack of facilities?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there were sufficient facilities at the plants to reduce the total flock numbers in Canada by the objective that I stated on June 8 of about one million birds. As a matter of fact, up to last night the number would probably be closer to 1.4 million or 1.5 million birds. We see no necessity to reduce the flocks any further.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the minister's original announcement was very misleading and led producers to believe that they would have six weeks within which to become eligible for this assistance, would he now make an announcement that the program will continue for up to six weeks?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, the announcement never implied or expressed any such thing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: That's fowl play!

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

ALLEGED INFILTRATION OF PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE, SECURITY PLANNING AND OTHER GROUPS BY CERTAIN SPECIAL AGENTS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister which arises from a serious allegation in an article appearing in the Toronto Star today. The author, Tom Haslett, alleges that certain special agents have infiltrated the Prime Minister's office, the security planning group and other groups. These agents are alleged to represent the Cuba Directorate of General Intelligence. Has the Prime Minister seen that article and is he prepared to make a statement in reference to these serious allegations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the article but I have heard of it. It is my understanding that the article does not say there has been infiltration as the hon. member just indicated, but that there has been attempted infiltration. I believe the hon. member is incorrect in asking the question in that way.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to accept the word "attempt".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I am not having an argument with the Prime Minister. I am asking him, in light of that serious allegation in regard to his own office and other offices, whether there has been an investigation. If so, what was the result and did the attempt go as far as an overt act?

Mr. Trudeau: As I say, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the article has been made public yet but is appearing this afternoon. I have not taken cognizance of it, but of course I will investigate all serious allegations made anywhere. So far as infiltration is concerned, Mr. Speaker, the most serious infiltration of my office thus far has been by westerners, and that is very welcome.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1500)

Mr. Woolliams: When the Prime Minister talks about westerners, it depends from how far west they come. I wonder if he would take this matter seriously, and I am sure he does, and look into the question of the book by Orlando Castro Hidilgo entitled "Spy For Fidel" which makes certain allegations that apparently are the basis of the story that I referred to when I put my question to the Prime Minister?

GRAIN

ACTION ON COMPLAINTS REGARDING LACK OF GRAIN DOORS

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. As delivery points on CNR lines are facing real problems because of a lack of grain doors, would the minister inform the House what action will be taken by the government to force the CNR to take action?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when this matter was last brought to my attention it was brought to the attention of various authorities. I understood corrective action had been taken. If the hon. member has further specific examples, I will be glad to pursue them in the same way.

Mr. Knight: Having raised this matter with the minister the last time, inasmuch as these same delivery points are still short of grain doors and as this involves CNR lines serving nine delivery points in southern Saskatchewan in particular, may I ask him to inform the House what action will be taken in the very near future?

An hon. Member: Get different doors.

ALLEGED SPOTTING OF UNCLEAN BOXCARS BY CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether his attention has been called to the fact that Canadian National Railways is presenting a great many boxcars that are unfit for loading to local grain elevators. They have not been cleaned out. Unlike the CPR, the CNR does not have proper arrangements for processing these cars before they are presented. Is the minister aware of this?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, specific allegations of that sort have not been brought to my attention in the last few days or weeks. There was a series of such incidents at an earlier period of time and again some corrective action seemed to have been taken. I am always glad to pursue individual complaints and try to see that the railways do the best possible job.

I should like to thank the minister for his courtesy in keeping me informed of the submissions made by the Nova Scotia Minister of Development in this regard.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on a day like this compliments of this type, I assure you, are very welcome. Has the minister considered the decision and does he propose to adopt any measures, legislative or otherwise, to eliminate the state of uncertainty in which thousands of Canadians now find themselves?

CRIMINAL CODE

POSSIBLE AMENDMENT TO LENGTHEN REST PERIODS FOR CATTLE IN TRANSIT

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Justice. In the interest of reducing the heavy losses of cattle in transit from the west to eastern feed lots, is it the intention of the minister to give favourable consideration to the request of the Canadian Cattlemen's Association for an extension of the 36-hour limit in the Criminal Code to 42 hours for rest periods during the movement of cattle by the railways? This would shorten the trip between Winnipeg and Toronto by approximately 18 to 20 hours.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked his question and the minister may reply.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, following the representations from the association I asked for some special studies to be undertaken to see whether it would be within the tolerances of humane treatment if there were such an extension. I propose to institute some special studies in this regard forthwith in order to see if any accommodation can be arrived at.

[Mr. Lang.]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was advised a few hours ago of this difficulty. I am naturally concerned because it is delaying construction of the Pelee Island airport. According to my tentative information, the labour dispute does not involve the federal government. I am proposing to visit the area and talk to the parties concerned in order to see what our involvement is.

Has the minister to date been given any indication by the Ontario government whether that government is willing to proceed with such a joint project which would be the first interprovincial national park in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister will be allowed to reply, but again I caution hon. members that they should try to resist the temptation to ask questions about area national parks.

GRAIN

CONFIDENTIALITY OF INFORMATION IN APPLICATIONS FOR PERMIT BOOKS

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice in his dual capacity as minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Would the minister say whether, when a farmer files an application for a Canadian Wheat Board permit book, the information given as to the amount of acreage he has and as to the size of the cash advance taken under that permit book is confidential, or is this information as to how many acres he has under cultivation and how much he owes with regard to cash advances available to the general public? Is this information to be available to the general public or is it not? It is either one or the other.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would have to ask the Canadian Wheat Board about their practice in this regard.

Mr. Horner: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I addressed my question to the Minister of Justice in his dual capacity as minister in charge of the Wheat Board.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Horner: I think it is the duty of the Minister of Justice to know whether or not—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Horner: —this information is confidential or otherwise.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate the point which has been made by the hon. member. He directed his question to the minister in his capacity as Minister of Justice; at the same time the hon. member for Crowfoot must appreciate, as I do, that he cannot ask for a legal interpretation from the minister in his capacity as Minister of Justice.

Mr. Baldwin: The opinion would probably be bad.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I rarely disagree with your rulings, and I do not disagree now. But I believe that there ought to be, within the confines of the Canadian Wheat Board, an understanding that when a person files an application in connection with a permit book the information he gives regarding his personal and private operations on the land shall remain confidential. That precedent should have been established long ago, particularly since the Canadian Wheat Board has been in operation for some 37 years.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is presenting argument in support of his point. He may be right, but I would think that from a procedural standpoint the question would hardly be acceptable.

CASH ADVANCES—POSSIBLE CHANGE TO PERMIT ADVANCES TO FARMERS WITH RENTED LAND

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board concerning permit books and cash advances as they relate to permit books. Would the minister indicate if the board is giving consideration to making changes in the cash advances system in order to enable those farmers who own part of their land and rent part of their land to take a cash advance on the portion they own, even though the landlord may refuse the necessary consent with respect to his interest in the land rented?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this matter was discussed very thoroughly in the committee when this legislation was last before it. There are some real difficulties concerning the application of provincial law and the ownership of grain which have so far made it impossible for us to arrive at a satisfactory solution in this regard. I know of no further work being done in this regard at present. We did work very exhaustively on it at the time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to bring to the attention of the hon. members that there are perhaps 20 hon. members seeking the floor to ask questions. Normally the question period would have expired by now, but I thought the House should not be charged with the minutes that I took on my earlier entreaties. Ten minutes is being added to the end of the question period because most of that earlier ten minutes was occupied by my soliloquy. However, I would invite hon. members to try to limit supplementaries.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence on the very serious matter I raised on Friday last concerning the action of International Telephone and Telegraph in preventing a counsellor from the Northwest Territories from visiting his constituency. Can the minister advise if he has had a report on the incident? Can he advise what he has learned and, more significantly, what he has said or done to reassert Canadian sovereignty and autonomy over our northland?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I looked into this matter. As I understand it, the incident occurred some 18 months ago. The company running the particular radio installation is not International Telephone and Telegraph; it is the Marconi Company of Canada. They own the particular airstrip involved. It was constructed by them. They are quite willing to have people come and visit there, but there are certain arrangements which have to be made for people to get on a chartered aircraft. From my information I understand that the person involved demanded to be put on a privately chartered aircraft to go to this airstrip. He was refused, unless he went through the Marconi representative and was cleared by him.

CAPE BRETON HIGHLANDS NATIONAL PARK—ALLEGED LACK OF SEWAGE FACILITIES CAUSING POLLUTION OF RIVER AND DESTRUCTION OF SALMON FISHERY

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment. As a result of his great interest in pollution as indicated today, would he concern himself, particularly within the cabinet and particularly with regard to the minister responsible for Canada's national parks, with the situation in Cape Breton Highland's National Park where all effluents and waste are being deposited in Little river, destroying the river and the salmon fishery? Would he cause an investigation to be carried out and ascertain whether the government and the department concerned could not set up proper sewage facilities so that the fishery will not be destroyed any longer?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will make inquiries to see whether the hon. member's submission is true in fact.

Mr. Muir: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Muir: Yes, on a rather interesting point of order, Mr. Speaker. The minister has suggested that I am not telling the truth. He is going to investigate—

Mr. Drury: He is going to find out if you are.

Mr. Muir: —and ascertain if this is a true statement. I think he is questioning my integrity; furthermore, he is deliberately misleading the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I notice that the hon. member is saying this with a smile. I appreciate that the minister perhaps—

Mr. Muir: You always have to smile at this government, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the minister did not want to reply in this way, saying he will investigate whether the hon. member's statement is true. I do not think that is the proper way, that these words were correctly chosen. In any event, we understand what the minister wanted to say and what the member wanted to ask, and perhaps we might leave it at that.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I have the greatest respect for you and always will have but I do not think you should make excuses for a man who suggests that the truth is not being told in the House.

Mr. Speaker: That was not my understanding. I must say that I have to interpret the statements made by hon. members, and I really did not interpret this one in that way. I did not think the words were that well chosen, but I do not think the minister wanted to impute that the hon. member was not telling the truth to the House.

Will he soon be in a position to announce a complete review of his department policy on the pitiful condition of the federal works as well as on the landslides due to tides and especially the speed of boats on the St. Lawrence between Quebec and Montreal?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premise of the member's question. HEALTH

POSSIBLE PROVISION OF FREE DRUGS TO PENSIONERS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the accelerating costs, especially severe to old age pensioners, veterans and others on low income who are suffering ill health and require drug care, and in view of the minister's objective of moving into the provision of free drugs for those people, will he state whether he intends to introduce legislation before the House recesses?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, there would be no chance to bring in whatever legislation the hon. member is referring to before the recess. I would like to point out also, Mr. Speaker, although the hon. member may be aware of it, that under the Canada Assistance Plan we pay for drugs supplied by the provinces to those in need on a 50-50 basis. My understanding is that many provinces are now supplying drugs to those who are recipients of the guaranteed income supplement and giving them drug cards, and the federal government is paying half that bill.

Mr. Rynard: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I bring to the attention of hon. members that there are just two minutes left before the end of the question period. Obviously, we will have difficulty recognizing the 10 or 15 members who are still looking for an opportunity to ask their questions.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his answer and remind him that this is a statement he made—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are just two minutes left, and I suggest we should not take up these two minutes to remind ourselves of things.

The minister told me that he would be glad to look into this matter. Has he done so, and what does he plan to do about it?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I made some preliminary inquiries, or had some made, but I do not see an easy solution under which, as the hon. member suggests, the students would get rather more money than the terms of employment offered would provide.

Would he tell the House when he is going to file the annual report of his department, which is now three years late? If he does not understand the question, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the only annual report of this minister's department was filed in the House as a sessional paper on June 26, 1970, and then distributed. GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FARM CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LOANS AND POWERS AND CAPITAL OF CORPORATION

The House resumed, from Tuesday, June 27, consideration of Bill C-5, to amend the Farm Credit Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Motion No. 1.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to say that as far as we are concerned the motion we are considering in the name of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) is very much in order and it is appropriate it should have been moved.

Indeed, when the bill was in committee I, personally, moved a very similar amendment. We adopted this approach because the bill gives the corporation power to carry out certain duties which have not been assigned to it by an act of parliament. It will exercise these powers by virtue of orders in council. We consider this would be allowing the government, and the corporation, too much latitude. Arguments were advanced in committee in favour of the bill as it presently stands. We were told the corporation would have extensive powers anyway, that there would be $130 million at its disposal under votes 1 and 15, and that the corporation would have power to act without the benefit of these provisions in the bill in any case. I was a little disturbed that it should be so easy for the minister and the corporation to lay their hands on so much money and pursue policies which would appreciably affect the fate of many people involved in agriculture in the absence of what, to my mind, is proper control through legislation. So, regardless of the explanations given by those responsible at that time, I am still not ready to embody in an act this very loose enabling power which will give the government an opportunity to act without, to my mind, the necessary degree of responsibility to Parliament.

We were also told in the course of discussion that certain changes would, in any case, be necessary in connection with the farm adjustment program, now called the farm development program, and that it would be just as well if the board could carry on for a little while; after it had experimented, in effect, guidelines could then be laid down in legislation. But suppose that in the course of this experimentation one or two proposals do not work out very well and hardship or inequity arises. What recourse would individuals or communities have under the law? Could they go to the ordinary courts and say: "Certain things have been done which have cost me money, and I wish to recover the losses I have sustained"? They could hardly argue that certain things had been done which should not have been done under the terms of this or that Act of Parliament. As a legislator, I myself, for example, could not very well appear before the Standing Committee on Agriculture and say to the minister or to the representatives of the corporation that in a particular case they had taken action which did not conform with this or that section of the act. For these reasons, I do not believe the approach recommended to the House is a good one.

Anyone who observes the scene in agriculture today knows there are problems with which we must deal. At the same time, we must ensure that we act in such a way as not to aggravate those problems. One of the things which disturbs me is the lack of a clear indication of policy. The committee held several sittings, and a number of witnesses appeared. Finally, the minister came in and said: "Yes, we do have an updating of the statement made on March 8, 1972". I believe that was the date. But in any case, whatever the date was, it was a long time before the information was available to us.

I must say I am bothered by the lack of balance in the policy as far as it has been explained to us. For example, there is provision for some subsidization of older people who choose to move out of farming; an annuity is to be paid to them, and so on. But I would have to learn a great deal more about the details of this proposal before I could either accept it or reject it. On the other hand, no assistance is provided for the younger person, or newcomers to agriculture who wish to establish themselves. In some European countries, interest rates are subsidized in such circumstances. The legislation before us ignores this aspect. It is considered quite all right to increase the total amount of a loan to $100,000, and that may be useful for those who want to borrow that sort of money. But for someone entering farming for the first time, the subsidization of the interest rate up to about half of the $100,000 is altogether justifiable. However, it is not even considered.

• (1530)

Mr. McKinley: They would not even accept the amendment.

Mr. Gleave: No, we could not even get the amendment on the record, as the hon. member rightly says. It is not as though there were no subsidization policy in this country because there is. Under DREE, large subsidies are offered to private industry. I anticipate similar subsidies will be offered to industry to conform with antipollution laws. Students are subsidized through loans so they may attend college and university. The building of such institutions is also subsidized. Therefore, why should not persons entering agriculture be subsidized over the initial years, which are the tough years, while they are establishing themselves? If they turn out to be good farm operators and their income structure does not prove to be disastrous, they will turn their businesses into going concerns. The minister, who has lived in a farming community, knows that very well.

As I say, this need is ignored. We just assume that people will buy land, equipment and livestock, will become able and competent farmers and produce the food we need domestically and for export. I noticed that the other day the minister journeyed to Charlottetown in Prince Edward Island, and the main burden of the speech he made was that Canadians should produce food for export, that this assists the Canadian economy. I wonder whether the minister talked to the potato farmers of Prince Edward Island and received from them the assurance that they were in a sound financial position and would continue to produce potatoes? Did the minister also get the same feeling of confidence from farmers in the grain growing areas of Canada? I would ask also whether we have the same feeling of confidence about the general agreement on tariffs and trade, about our relations with the United States and our access to that important market. However, I do not want to digress.

Getting back to the bill, I am wondering whether those who drafted the bill clearly understand how it will be implemented and how well the two programs will dovetail together. On the one hand, we have a lending agency that has assisted farmers for a fair number of years on the basis of their productivity and the management of their operation. We are now adding this social function. When you implement a policy that aims at the creation of farms of a certain size, you are performing a social function, not a commercial function. I suggest that, despite the usual pitfalls, a commercial lending operation is a fairly straightforward proposition. It is true you make bad guesses sometimes with regard to management or productivity, and you must take the good with the bad. However, if some able person is conducting the operation, over the long haul the operation will prove successful. As far as western Canada is concerned, despite the fact that western farmers experienced two or three low income years, I think it is fair to say they, too, will be successful. I suggest the Farm Credit Corporation has confidence that in the years ahead, as our cash flow increases and agriculture picks up again, our farmers will continue their operations satisfactorily. The minister and the Farm Credit Corporation realize that in the west there are good producing farms and there is good management.

However, the government has introduced a land development policy that is not only socially but politically motivated, and they will find that they are riding two horses which may very well be going at different speeds. As a result, the government are going to run into a fair bit of difficulty. I pointed out in committee that the bill provides that the appraised value of farmland shall be based as far as possible on its productivity. Yet the government is apt to use a different measure altogether, that of transferring farmer A to some other place and bringing in farmer B in his stead to operate his block of farmland. That is a different concept entirely.

The minister has run into some difficulty with the provinces, but I do not want to dwell unduly on that matter. I tried, as did other members of the committee, to get all the information I could on this matter as the bill was going through. Certainly, I do not want to criticize the minister for not getting agreement with the provinces. I assume he tried to, but I was not at the negotiations and do not know what happened. All I know is what I was told during the committee hearings. However, I suspect one reason there was a fair amount of difficulty in achieving agreement with the provinces was that what was proposed by the government in this area of land adjustment was ill-defined. The provinces, especially those which are largely dependent on agriculture, cannot afford to gamble on their future in that area. The income is very important to them and if farming operations are not in good shape, certainly in some cases the industrial base is not sufficient to make up for the mistakes made in the agricultural area. I would be much happier if we, as a committee and myself as a member, had more information on this matter. I know some of our people want additional amounts by way of loans. I know the needs of the farmers in my area fairly well, and the minister knows them across Canada.

• (1540)

I see you are getting uneasy, Mr. Speaker, so I assume my time has expired.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to thank the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Prince Edward-

Hastings (Mr. Hees) for moving and seconding the motion yesterday on my behalf. I was unable to be here yesterday, as I was attending the opening ceremonies of the 28th annual meeting of the Indian Association of Alberta taking place at the Saddle Lake Reserve in my constituency. I thank the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley) for explaining briefly the purpose of the motion I placed before the House for consideration. The purpose of the amendment is simply to restore parliamentary control over the possibility of any agricultural program being assigned to the Farm Credit Corporation for administration.

We have in Bill C-5 an amendment to Section 11 of the Farm Credit Act which broadens the powers and alters the functions of the Farm Credit Corporation, giving it the power to administer any kind of program that may be assigned to it by any other act of Parliament or by government order in council. It has been repeated many times in the committee by the minister and the Chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation that it is not necessary for this portion of the bill to be enacted to administer farm development programs. This arouses some suspicion. We wonder why we must have a clause in this bill which is all encompassing, broad and powerful.

There is no obligation under the provisions of this amendment to have an agricultural program approved or debated by Parliament. There is no obligation on the part of the government or the governor in council to discuss these programs or consult with the farmers of Canada or their organizations. There is not even an obligation for the government to produce a white paper or a position paper such as was produced under the provisions of the Small Farms Adjustment Program introduced on March 8. We wonder why we need such a broad and encompassing clause. We can only assume that the government may have some other mechanism which, in its wisdom, may alter the social and economic structure of agriculture.

During the consideration of this bill, and particularly of the adjustment program, we had a great deal of difficulty extracting information. An announcement was made of the government's intention in March, 1971, but we did not have a revised edition of the program presented to us until June 15 of this year, notwithstanding the fact that the bill was introduced on February 24, 1972. Throughout the course of the debate we tried to ascertain the direction in which the minister and the Department of Agriculture were proceeding. We have been and still are suspicious of the fact that this program will tend to reduce significantly the number of farmers in Canada, and we have evidence to back up that suspicion. Discussions and negotiations have been taking place with the provinces since the time the proposal was placed before the public. As I understand it, as of this date there has still been no agreement reached. Perhaps the minister will respond to that suggestion sometime later today.

We have been discussing this particular proposal in a vacuum. It was not until the provincial representatives appeared before the committee and took very strong exception to this bill, as did representatives of the National Farmers Union and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, although not as vigorously as other witnesses, that we had enough information to outline the main structure of the program. These representatives of the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan who appeared before the committee have serious reservations about the scope of the power granted in clause 1. The representative of the province of Manitoba stated explicitly in his brief, as recorded at page 6:

> I have no recourse but to recommend to your Committee that the amendment to Bill C-5, extending the authority of the Farm Credit Corporation to administer such a program, be deleted from the Bill. Until such time as more satisfactory arrangements can be developed between the Federal Government and the provinces, I feel that the authority of the Farm Credit Corporation should not be extended to permit it to administer the proposed Small Farm Development Program.

The National Farmers Union, in an excellent brief, said basically the same thing. Let me quote from Committee Proceedings No. 22 of June 20 at page 22:4:

> —the government, in our view, is being devious by circumventing public discussion and debate on the entire question of the Small Farm Adjustment Program while implementing an important part of the program in Bill C-5.
> Certainly, so far as the NFU is concerned, there has been no communication from the Minister of Agriculture relative to further plans under the Small Farm Adjustment Program since his initial statement of March 8, 1971.

It seems rather strange that a program which will very significantly affect, in some cases detrimentally, the farmers of Canada that little negotiation or discussion took place with a farm organization that speaks for the farmers of Canada.

Let me point out that the amendment to Section 11, as provided for in clause 1, does not only give power to the Farm Credit Corporation to administer the Small Farms Adjustment Program, but also any other duty or function assigned to it by the government by order in council. In other words, it can administer any agricultural program. In my opinion, and in the opinion of my colleagues, this power is much too broad for this or any other minister. The farmers of Canada have had some bitter experiences with some of the legislative measures introduced by this government, that is legislation drafted and introduced without any prior consultation with the farmers of Canada or their organizations. These pieces of legislation required many major amendments before they were acceptable, or indeed useful, to the farmers of Canada. They had to be changed by Parliament.

• (1550)

One could say that with the power which is to be delegated to the Farm Credit Corporation in this particular clause (1), Bill C-176 in its original form could have been administered by the Farm Credit Corporation had the government in its wisdom seen fit to assign to it a program of that nature rather than deal with it through legislation. We all know that after two years of parliamentary and public debate, the bill did pass but was altered significantly. It was altered to suit the wishes and needs of the producers who were affected. I suppose the same thing could be said about the stabilization bill which was certainly not in accord with the wishes of the vast majority of the farmers, according to the mail I have received and the public reaction generally.

With the power contained in clause (1), the government in its wisdom could have seen fit I suppose to assign the program under the stabilization bill to the Farm Credit Corporation for administration without parliamentary debate and without discussion with the producer organizations. So, I believe it behooves each and every one of us to think very seriously before we delegate this kind of authority to any kind of agency. In short, this clause would give the necessary power to reshape the social and economic structure of agriculture without reference to Parliament, without reference to the farmers of Canada, without reference to the provinces and without reference to the producer organizations. I recall that in the presentation of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and members of the cabinet, the necessity was reiterated of producers being involved more closely and more meaningfully in the organization and development of programs as well as their evaluation.

Quite frankly, we believe this small farm adjustment program is tainted with the recommendations of the task force on agriculture which suggested that the number of farmers be reduced significantly in order to cure the ills of agriculture. We believe the major emphasis of a program such as the small farm adjustment program should be aimed at assisting those who are in the industry to improve their income and their standards, so that they may be able to remain in the field of agriculture and thus remain within the rural areas of Canada. This particular program does just the opposite. It is a program which encourages farmers to move out of agriculture. We recall that when the original proposal was presented by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) it was entitled an adjustment or redevelopment policy for agriculture, a proposal for farm adjustment and resource mobility. In the contents of the white paper, it was pointed out that one of the aims was to grease the wheels of adjustment.

I suppose because of the lack of acceptance of a title of that nature, the minister in his wisdom saw fit to rename the program the small farm development program. However, there is very little in that proposal to indicate it is a development program for small farms but rather is a development program for large farms. Perhaps it might be more appropriately called the small farm extinction program. We cannot accept a proposal which gives the government such carte blanche authority to proceed with any—and I want to emphasize the word "any"—detrimental or otherwise, agricultural programs which could affect the welfare of those engaged in the agriculture industry. I, therefore, propose that any such program which would affect the social and economic fabric of the agriculture industry should not be proceeded with by government order in council but rather by a bill which would be processed through the machinery of Parliament. Certainly, an ad hoc measure of this nature is neither desirable nor suitable.

I am sure all of us recall the ad hoc measure that was introduced to reduce wheat acreage entitled the Lift program. This was a stop-gap measure with an originally suggested expenditure of between $100 million and $140 million. Because this program was an hoc measure, it was introduced without any prior consultation or discussion with the farmers of Canada or indeed the farm organizations. Less than 50 per cent of the farmers of Western Canada were able to participate in the program and less than 50 per cent of the funds allotted were expended. As a matter of fact, it discriminated against those farmers who had reduced their wheat acreage in the years prior to the introduction of this measure. Certainly, it was a very ill advised program. It was a bitter experience to many farmers of western Canada. Legislation which deals with the welfare, development or extinction of farmers in Canada should be clearly defined, clearly understood and introduced in Parliament as a piece of legislation rather than as a government order in council. Therefore, I urge all hon. members to accept this amendment which has been proposed.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in the committee on agriculture, we spent a considerable amount of time dealing with the different aspects and clauses of this particular bill. This amendment to section 11 of the Farm Credit Act, I suppose, in many ways has created the greatest controversy. I think the motion moved by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) is a commendable one and one which should be accepted by the House. Through a long process, we have seen different pieces of government legislation dealt with in terms of how they affected the farmer. We have seen debate centred around Bill C-197. After considerable debate, it ended up as Bill C-176. In that process there were no less than 6, 7 or 10 fundamental changes in the various provisions of the bill. We once sat all night at Christmas time—and I shall refrain from emphasizing this in case it should put you in a bad mood, Mr. Speaker—dealing with that legislation, and some rather fundamental changes were made in the government's proposal.

Now, in the second or third last day of the session we have the Minister of Agriculture bringing a bill before the House which, according to the amendment to section 11 of the Farm Credit Act, will allow the Farm Credit Corporation to administer any program the minister sees fit to allocate to it. My hon. friend moved a motion to delete this particular aspect of the proposed amendment to the Farm Credit Act. If we allow this amendment to pass as proposed by the minister, without accepting the deletion made by the hon. member for Vegreville, then we are giving a free hand to the Minister of Agriculture, regardless of who he is, to allocate whatever program he sees fit to the Farm Credit Corporation without giving the representatives of the people of Canada an opportunity to make a decision on that action. That, in the light of the activities of this government, can be a real threat to people in the rural areas.

In dealing with this amendment, I need only refer hon. members to the action taken by the government on the task force report on agriculture which stated that two out of every three farmers should be removed by 1990. There has been a drop in the number of farmers, and this has been a trend in agriculture for a long time. We all know that. The government is attempting to accelerate the removal of farmers from the land, in this case particularly those on small farms. This amendment allows the small farms consolidation plan to go into operation without any legislative authorization.

If the minister were still a member of the party which sits to my left, I wonder how he would have reacted to a Liberal government bringing in a bill that allowed plans and programs costing in the neighbourhood of $150 million over seven years to be put into effect without any authorization from the people's representatives. I wonder what he would have thought, and how it would have affected his constituency, if some minister of agriculture earlier in the history of this nation had carried out such a program.

What do we know of the small farm development consolidation plan? We know that it was introduced on March 8, 1971 as a resources mobility and adjustment program, not a development program. We have had a great deal of experience in listening to government ministers introducing programs with fancy names and no real intention behind them. Since that time we have not had a brief outline of exactly what the intent of that program is, other than what the minister called a corps program in committee. Only one provincial government has stated that it is in agreement with the plan as introduced by the Minister of Agriculture. Farm organizations, such as the National Farmers Union, have stated categorically, as the hon. member for Vegreville pointed out, that the method by which this program is being introduced is nothing short of devious, and that is the mildest word that can be used to describe the manner in which the minister has introduced the program. Under the program two farms would be made into one or three farms would be made into two. That is not a development of small farms, it is a development of bigger farms.

We find that the agricultural policies advocated by this government are continually overshadowed by the economics branch of the Department of Agriculture. I am sure that the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Whelan) does not appreciate the extent to which the economists control the Department of Agriculture and its policies. We are well aware of his opinions as expressed in the committee. First of all, on the basis of the task force report, the department made certain assumptions regarding the consolidation of farm holdings in terms of what they called efficiency. May I point out to the minister that farmers are more efficient and productive than Canadian industry. I do not understand how in the Lord's name he could ever introduce a consolidation program on grounds of efficiency. That is the purpose of the program. Part of the same concept of rationalization was the basis for the introduction of the incomes stabilization bill. If there had been a decision to administer that program through this amendment, members of this House would not have been allowed to have a public debate on that bill, the withdrawal of which would never have taken place and western producers would never have benefited from the savings.

I feel that this is a fundamental point, and I wish to repeat it regardless of the fact that the amendment deletes the provision relating to the small farm consolidation plan. Let us deal with the limited knowledge we have, with certain aspects of that particular program. First of all, the minister says that the program will be put into effect regardless of provincial agreement. This is very high sounding, and a beating upon one's chest before the federal election. It may sound good in some parts of the country. Let me point out to the minister that, as has been said in the committee, in terms of administration this program suggests the hiring of counselling personnel. That kind of counselling and advice is provided in almost every province with large rural areas, such as for example the Ag-Rep program in Saskatchewan.

I can tell the minister that if he thinks that the introduction of the small farms consolidation plan through this amendment will be a feather in his cap in the next federal election when the farmers know that he has added one more civil servant to the payroll to visit them, let me tell him that this plan will not go very far and neither will the minister. Not only are we setting up a program that cannot be examined by members of the House of Commons, but we are setting up an administrative bureaucracy which could affect each province in Canada where counselling and administrative services are already available, such as for example the Ag-Rep program in my province. Yet, the minister says that he is going ahead with it.

There has been some discussion about incentives being provided for farmers to leave their farms and to take up some other occupation. In view of the fact that there are 512,000 unemployed people in Canada, I am not sure what kind of employment they could expect. It has been mentioned that consideration must be given to those people going on welfare. I hope that the minister is well aware of the fact that in view of the lack of job opportunities in this country there seems very little opportunity for a man who has spent his life farming to suddenly train himself to be a technician in a chemical plant or to train himself for some other job which is usually non-existent anyway. Under this program there is no provision for the second, third or fourth son of a farmer who may have moved to the city and who wants to return to the land. This is where the social judgment comes in. Instead, there is a provision that the young farmer whose land, within the definition presented by this government, is uneconomic should be removed from the land. When I inquired about the possibilities in the Prairies for expansion I was told that he could find another quarter or half section of land but that might be 20 or 40 miles away and the cost was likely to put it out of his reach.

A program such as this would be impossible to administer because of the variation in the types of farming in the country. A small livestock or grain producer in my constituency of Assiniboia does not operate at all, in terms of land and costs, in the same way as a potato grower on Prince Edward Island or an apple grower in Nova Scotia. The average size of a farm in Saskatchewan, for instance, is much larger than the average size in Ontario, but in the small farm development consolidation plan there is no provision for such differences. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the minister says he is going ahead with it.

Mr. Speaker, I have given a number of reasons why I think the motion moved by the hon. member for Vegreville is a good one and I support it. I believe that he has a second amendment dealing with interest rates for young farmers. I am very interested in that and I hope it can be put to the House.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). Under Bill C-5 the Farm Credit Corporation may carry out virtually any program that the government of the day sees fit and this gives enormous power over an industry which already suffers from too much government interference. Apparently it is the stated intention of the government to use this clause of Bill C-5 to administer the small farm development program but, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this program has been accepted or understood by the provinces. Indeed, from the minister's remarks I am not sure that he understands it, either. Any action in this area should be debated in Parliament so that members will have some idea of what is in store for the people. I think it is doubly important that legislation dealing with small farms should be thoroughly perused.

A study of what has happened in agriculture during the last four years shows how the government has intruded into the day-to-day business of farming. The Canadian Dairy Commission was in existence prior to 1968, but in that year it became much more active and since then it has substantially changed the pattern of the dairy industry in Canada. However, it has done this on a political basis rather than according to the demands of the market. As a result of high labour costs, many dairy farmers have switched to other products and the only way to get quotas for farm separated cream or milk is through the government or the Dairy Commission. The same situation now applies to eggs under Bill C-176 because quotas will be given to the provinces. Without a quota, a farmer cannot become involved in this industry. As far as chickens are concerned, the only way that a quota can be obtained in the broiler industry is from a commission. In Manitoba, a farmer can only raise 300 turkeys without a quota. If he raises more than that, he must obtain a quota from the provincial turkey board. Also in Manitoba a farmer without a quota for hogs is just out of luck. That leaves only cattle and sheep, the sheep industry is too small to get involved in quotas but the cattle industry is heading that way. In the western grain industry a lapsed quota has meant severe hardship for the small farmer who is prevented from taking advantage of some of the efficiencies available to his larger neighbour. Some of the Wheat Board's ideas with regard to grain deliveries are commendable, since the main thing is to get the grain to our customers. Some of their other ideas, however, have driven the small farmer to early retirement because of his economic situation.

As it stands, this clause of Bill C-5 would give the government power to do almost anything in order to carry out its program, and I believe this authority is far too wide, Mr. Speaker. We have heard only vague outlines of the small farm development program, Mr. Speaker. There is the assumption that the federal government will buy or in some manner rent or lease small farms, giving the owner an opportunity to take up another occupation or to retire with dignity. But, Mr. Speaker, no arrangement has been made to deal with the situation in the provinces. It should be realized that land use is under the jurisdiction of the provinces and will have to remain there under our concept of government. This is just another indication of the federal government's centralistic approach to a problem which comes largely under provincial jurisdiction.

[Mr. Knight.]

• (1620)

In their brief submission to the Standing Committee on Agriculture, the representatives of the National Farmers' Union said:

> We believe members of this committee are fully cognizant of the effects of proposed amendments to raise upper limits on FCC loans to $100,000. Your endorsement of proposed amendments to Bill C-5 will signal your support of policies which advocate the continuing depopulation of rural areas and the sacrifice of the family farm to technology and economic determinism.

They then said that the bill does little for young farmers who need credit and that it fails to meet the needs of young farmers who wish to become established in farming. The government has not yet announced how small farmers under this legislation will have access to credit. Even if the amendment of the hon. member for Vegreville were to be incorporated in the bill, and even if the provisions of the bill applied to small farmers, we still would not know, and the government has not told us, how the small farms program is to be organized, how it is to be operated, and what its main thrust is to be.

This is an important measure and should not be dealt with in such general and vague terms. Until such time as the government comes forward with more definitive plans and proposals and defines more clearly what it means by the small farms program, I think this amendment ought to stand. We must be given a chance to debate any proposals the government has in mind for small farms.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the chance to speak in the closing portion of this debate. At the same time may I say that I support the amendment which would delete what we consider to be the contentious part of Bill C-5, the amendment brought forward by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski).

First, may I say that I agree in principle with that part of the Farm Credit Corporation bill which deals with increased amounts that are to be lent to farmers. The maximum amount to be lent is to be increased from $40,000 to $100,000. That sum is probably enough for one-owner farms. I should like to see a provision incorporated in the legislation which would raise the limit for farms owned by a corporation, which could be a family or a partnership. The maximum should be increased beyond the present limit for such farms. I think there is a legitimate reason for so doing, Mr. Speaker.

In the past year we have seen, and you will see to an accelerating extent in the future, and increasing emphasis on farm corporations on the Prairies and elsewhere in Canada. Farms have been incorporated, I suggest, because of our tax laws and because of the estate and gift taxes that many of us have had to live with in Canada. The government, in many cases, has forced the small businesses, and I certainly include many farms in that definition, to incorporate to escape succession duties that would need to be paid on the death of the person who established that particular farm or business enterprise. I should like to see the provision I have alluded to included in this bill or at least something along that line could have been included in the bill. In any event, I welcome the increase in the ceiling, which is to be $100,000. At least under the Farm Credit Corporation legislation, farmers will be able to borrow that much and I think this bill will permit the Farm Credit Corporation to operate more effectively as a lending agency in the 1970's.

We must look realistically at farming, Mr. Speaker. When I say that, I do not want to leave the impression that I am in favour of larger farms and against small farms. As I say, in looking at agricultural problems, we must be realistic. Often we hear people say that the government must come up with positive measures for dealing with the small farm problem. Important though such measures may be, if we look at the picture positively and realistically and consider what shape farming will take in future, we will concede that, of necessity, farms should become larger. Any young farmer with managerial skills and ability to work hard will, as soon as he can, try to buy more land, because he will want a more viable economic unit. He will want to reduce his costs, and that is the most natural thing in the world. It is fine to talk about small farms and the preservation of the small farm in Canada. Until we can solve this problem, we shall, I think to a great extent, be just talking.

I think we should emphasize assisting farmers who want to remain on the land rather than making it easier for them to get off the land. I am talking of farmers with ability. One way to do this, I suggest—and I may be encroaching somewhat on the next motion that my hon. friend will propose—is by so structuring the Farm Credit Corporation that it will grant special loans to young farmers. These should be available in the first few years of farming when a farmer is seeking to become established. Possibly, repayments could be put off, and I am talking about interest and principal, for a few years until that young farmer gets on his feet. The mechanics of the loan could be worked out in such a way that the total amount of the loan would be paid back eventually. That would give the young farmer starting out a break. He would not need to repay borrowed money at once. This is important in view of the cash income situation of Prairie farmers. The government has been saying a great deal about this. It suggests that there is more cash in the hands of western Canadians now than there has been for some time. In view of rising costs and prices, Prairie farmers, despite their extra cash in hand, are considerably worse off than they were years ago. I feel we are justified in introducing some form of special credit facility for those young farmers who want to begin in the business. Such facilities should not be given to all segments of society; however, in view of rising costs, relatively low prices and the cost-price squeeze, such facilities I feel would be justified for young farmers.

Now, I come to the more contentious part of the bill. The amendment deals with a contentious matter. The small farms development program, as the government has called it, was introduced by the back door. Members of Parliament did not deal with that matter directly. All that we gleaned about the bill consisted of those small bits and pieces of information we were able to extract from the minister through answers to questions raised in the House of Commons of information obtained from press reports and of information contained in statements made outside the House. As a result, we became suspicious of the government's intentions with regard to the small farms legislation. Only after extensive questioning in the committee that dealt with Bill C-5, and only after the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and the farmers unions had made every effort to discover the government's intentions, were we given a glimpse of what was in the package. There were not too many members who were in total agreement with what the government was proposing. One of the biggest problems we will see with the small farms development program will be the overlapping with provincial jurisdiction.

The province of Manitoba, in its submission to the committee, said that regardless of what happens to this legislation it will go ahead with its own legislation on small farms. We have heard the same story from other provinces. The provinces are quite worried about the fact that there is no real flexibility in the program to meet the various needs of the different agricultural regions. There is a fear that a major emphasis in the program is placed on the readjustment of human resources out of agriculture. The provinces are also worried about the establishment of federal administrations in each province to administer the program, giving rise to overlapping with farm management and consulting services operated by the provinces themselves. The provinces are also worried about the fact that they had no say in the makeup of the small farms development program. They feel it was formulated by Ottawa and presented to them with the threat, "Either you take it or leave it We are not going to bend in any way so far as our proposals are concerned."

The fundamental issue that was outlined at the Edmonton meeting in July of 1971, attended by the other provinces, still remains. It concerns the federal government proceeding on a unilateral basis with a major program affecting Canadian agriculture, without permitting the provinces any say with respect to the kind of program that best suits their needs. In this respect we are seeing the hard core centralism or federalism that emanates from the present government It is not willing to negotiate with the provinces. I represent a riding in the province of Manitoba, and I know that province has additional concerns about details of the program which have not been outlined to any great extent in the House or even before the committee. I would like to mention one problem which will arise if the federal Department of Agriculture proceeds unilaterally with its program.

It was indicated earlier that a limit of $20,000 would apply to any property purchased under the land transfer program. The minister has stated that his department is still sticking with that figure, but there is a hint that this level could be raised through negotiations. But assuming that the level stays at $20,000, I know that in the province of Manitoba much of the land covered by this program is land that the province itself does not want returned to agricultural use. This is just one example of the kind of problem the government will encounter if there is not further negotiation with the provinces.

Associated with this problem is the broader question of who will determine land policy within a province. All the provinces want to establish their own priorities in this matter, but it looks as though the federal government wants to have some say in determining provincial priorities. The provinces which made submissions noted that insufficient emphasis is placed on measures to assist farmers who wish to remain in agriculture. In fact federal officials have been emphasizing programs to assist farmers who wish to leave agriculture. This is one of the biggest concerns expressed by the majority of provinces with respect to the small farms development program. The fact is that the program is not flexible enough. The manner in which the federal government is trying to remove farmers from the land is not acceptable to western Canada or, indeed, to any part of Canada.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, once again I say that the amendments respecting dollar value, in so far as the FCC is concerned, are acceptable. They make the dollar value realistic for the 1970's. However, I think we should be able to deal with the small farms development program on a different basis. Toward the end of the committee hearings I believe the minister said a bill would be introduced after the program had been in operation. What use would a bill be at that time? This is completely unacceptable to most members on this side of the House. I urge all hon. members to support the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Vegreville, and I hope it will be carried when it is voted upon.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most surprising pieces of legislation dealing with agriculture that I have seen since becoming a member of this House. The bill's provisions will modify the operations of the Farm Credit Corporation in several respects. In each case it is said that the changes being made will not necessarily affect the Farm Credit Corporation's operations as presently defined, with the exception of that provision governing an expansion of money, but the changes are being made so that the government can implement its new policy on small farm development.

During the last couple of years, Parliament has received several visitations from farm organizations that have been critical of the government's proposed program. All of the provinces have been unwilling to accept the small farms development program as outlined in a series of papers, I believe seven in total, of which only a couple are in the public domain. The Manitoba government, the Saskatchewan government, the National Farmers Union and other farm organizations have been highly critical of the proposed small farms development program, not knowing what its purposes are. One simple fact which is apparent to everyone is that size in itself is not necessarily advantageous. There is no one in this country who is not aware that size in itself is not necessarily an advantage. It may not even be advantageous to enterprises whose size approaches the upper limits.

• (1640)

I can recall one of my hon. friends asking, a few years ago: "What is wrong with a supermarket simply because it is big?" But we have seen supermarkets expanding to their present size without bringing any particular economic advantage as far as the consumer is concerned, though, no doubt, there is a great deal of return for those who finance these huge operations. So it may be with agriculture. I think of the largest farm units in my constituency.

[Mr. Murta.]

In all cases they are operating on the basis of loans. Four or five of them have borrowed such large amounts that the local co-operative is in debt to the extent of $250,000. It cannot collect because the operators of those very large farms are so far in debt themselves that there is nothing to foreclose. Anyone who has advanced credit without attaching the land has no chance of getting the money returned.

There are advantages, of course, attached to the ability to procure extended credit. I am thinking of operations under the Dairy Commission through which amalgamations did take place; farms and quotas were purchased and this resulted in economic units being developed in my area. But this was not possible because the owners could borrow money or because their holdings had increased in size. It resulted from action taken by the government which produced a fair price for the product. It meant farmers were selling their product at profit and, within limits, the more they produced the more profit they could make. But if a farmer is producing wheat, for instance, and is selling at a loss, all he does if he doubles the size of his holding is to double the size of his loss. It is obviously not to a person's advantage to expand in those circumstances. He would be better off to maintain his holding and operate with the machinery he already possesses.

Representations made to us in connection with this bill suggest that the people themselves, in the area concerned, should have some say as to whether it would be advantageous socially or economically to amalgamate the smaller farms. If one farmer, whose production is uneconomic, buys a second farm which is in a similar position mainly because of the low prices received for the commodities produced, he will have acquired a larger unit, it is true, but it is very doubtful whether any real advantage has been secured.

I was interested in the charge made by representatives of the Farmers' Union that persons who are coaxed into borrowing more money are usually in difficulty already and that the borrowing of additional sums only means that some of this money, in a roundabout way, becomes income upon which the borrowers can live for a period. The government has on two occasions brought agricultural legislation before us to which the people directly concerned were opposed. One was the stabilization bill. Witnesses who appeared before the committee were of the opinion that this bill was detrimental to agriculture in general and to certain farmers specifically. The truth of their contention has now been borne out. Farmers are many millions of dollars better off in western Canada as a result of the stabilization bill not being passed.

Again, we are being warned by these same people that the legislation before us is not in the interests of the average farmer. Government spokesmen have offered very little by way of defence. What we are really doing is changing the terms upon which the Farm Credit Corporation operates. In line with this is the obvious intention of the Liberal party to reduce the number of farms in Canada. The Liberal party has pursued this intention for ten or more years, and it has never wavered in doing so. I am not sure that this is good policy. I know there are many farmers in eastern Canada who have remained in business only because the federal government intervened to improve the price received for the commodity they produced. The only segment of the agriculture industry which is in reasonable shape today, the only segment I would recommend any young farmer to get into, is the milk production industry. This is the only agricultural enterprise which would warrant the borrowing of large sums of money. I say this because if a dairy farm is judiciously handled it will produce a better than average farm income.

When we talk about a farm development program we should obviously be talking about arrangements for young farmers entering the agriculture industry. This involves changes which the Farm Credit Corporation is not able to make on its own. There will need to be developments along the lines of a co-operative which will form conclusions as to the moral standing and agricultural ability of a young person and, if it is satisfied, lend him money, bearing in mind that he has time in which to repay it. Today money is lent to farmers 55 years of age. They are advanced sums of up to $100,000 though there is no possibility of their living long enough to pay off the debt.

I suggest that if we examine the amount of interest and premium payments made by farmers, it is doubtful that most of them would ever repay the premium amount before they die. Yet, we are making large loans to young farmers who are going into partnership with their fathers, which will mean that the junior member of the partnership will be mortgaged for the rest of his life, and perhaps for the lives of his grandchildren as well. I know of a case where, in my opinion, the mortgage on a farm is about twice the value of the goods and chattels on the farm and the land itself.

I do not think there is any other industry that offers an income so low that it is not possible to make a success of the operation. The average income of farmers across Canada is considerably less than $5,000, yet we are going to lend them money to enlarge their operations, to buy neighbouring farms, and in that way eliminate a very large proportion of our rural way of life. I, personally, know dozens of young people who have gone to cities to find work and have become immersed in an environment with which they are totally unfamiliar. In large part they have been given direction by the Department of Agriculture.

On the other hand, we make no attempt to give the farmers sufficient money to make a success of their operation and allow our young people to stay in rural communities where they can make a useful contribution. It is a fact that governments in Canada have always been plagued with the idea that they must create agricultural surpluses. No other industry offers its products in this way. However, I suggest there will be a day of reckoning if we continue to enlarge farm units but fail to take into account what those units can produce or to arrive at a reasonable price for those products.

Looking back over the past 20 years we find that the federal government has often maintained agriculture through payments out of the agricultural stabilization fund. We have disposed of our agricultural surpluses to countries around the world through the vehicle of a number of government agencies. We have made a national contribution in a number of ways by disposing of surplus production on our hands. And on a number of occasions, we have made efforts to arrive at a reasonable price. But it seems to me that the agricultural industry will never be a healthy one. Certainly doubling the size of farm units will not create a healthy agricultural climate. The only thing that will help agriculture is to give the farmers a reasonable price for the goods they produce.

I suggest that once this legislation has passed, the farmers should look at it very carefully before deciding whether to borrow further money from the Farm Credit Corporation. In my area, a number of people are anxiously considering another piece of farm legislation passed by the provincial government to establish a cow-calf operation. My advice to them is that if they have the buildings and sufficient land and machinery to go into a cow-calf operation today, they would probably be wise to borrow the capital required and increase their production considerably. But if they have to use the loan to amalgamate farm units before they can increase their production, or if they require buildings and other items of capital cost, then they are not going to make a success of the operation.

I suggest that we have already extended so much credit to the farmers that it would be foolish if they took advantage of further credit just because it was available. The farmers should consider very carefully whether borrowing money is the answer to their dilemma today. What is important is not the size of farm units or the farmer's capacity to produce, but the price he receives for what he produces, which is often below cost even in a well operated farm unit.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, might I rise on a point of order to ask whether the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) will indicate if he is going to accept this amendment? It might facilitate the passage of the legislation if he would say now that he will accept the amendment. The debate might then come to an end and we might have a vote. I am also wondering whether the minister plans to make a speech. I just raise those questions as a point of order.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the debate, but as I said yesterday when the bill was reintroduced at the report stage, the amendment before us now is either identical to, or essentially the same as, one that was debated for several days in the standing committee, after which it was put to a vote and defeated.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I did not ask the minister for the opinion of the committee, I asked him for his opinion. At times his committee does not agree with him, and at other times he does not agree with the committee. I thought he could give us the position of the cabinet, which is not necessarily determined by the committee.

Mr. McKinley: He does not have much say in the cabinet.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley) suggests that the minister has very little say in the cabinet, but I would not want to say that. I always hold out hope that any westerner in the cabinet has some power, though

I might add that it appears to be a diminishing power to we westerners who sit close at hand and watch.

An hon. Member: You do not complain about our increased wheat sales.

Mr. Horner: Do not talk about rising wheat sales. It is the record demand for wheat in the world that has caused this increase. I am particularly pleased to see that we are not completely dead, and that our wheat sales for the year we have just finished studying increased 20 per cent over the previous year. This compares with the Australian increase of 32 per cent and the United States increase of 50 per cent. I would like to think our sales had increased even more. It is too bad we are not the leaders instead of running third, particularly when wheat plays such a dominant role in the income structure of so many farmers in western Canada. I wish our sales had increased to a greater extent and at a better price, rather than at a record low price. In fact, the realized net return on wheat to farmers in western Canada was the lowest in the last ten years according to the annual report of the Canadian Wheat Board which we finished studying late last night. If the hon. member who intervened would like to look at those figures, I can give him the page number of the report.

• (1700)

In Clause 1 of this bill we find the following:

> The Corporation has all the powers necessary to carry out such duties or functions as may be assigned to it by the Governor in Council in relation to the administration of any agricultural program or as are assigned to it pursuant to any other Act of the Parliament of Canada.

This is a sort of ambiguous clause which leaves some fear in the minds of many members who are convinced that the governor in council some day may dream up another operation such as Lift, for example, and turn it over to the Crown corporation for administration. The Lift program was another matter that was never debated. Because of the demand throughout the world for wheat and feed grains this program has proven to be a gross error of tremendous magnitude, particularly in respect of farm income.

The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) announced in January that he had made a real breakthrough in that he was going to establish a realistic two-price system. Payments were to be made under a two-price system based on a dollar a bushel, and so on. What happened when Parliament reconvened? Slowly but surely, this idea seeped away. All of a sudden we heard there was not going to be any legislation, the government was just going to pay out the money in a one-shot program. Many farmers suspected the government was trying to buy their votes in the rumoured June election, or whenever it might be. Unfortunately for the Liberal party, the minister ordered the payments to be made but the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did not call an election. Now, the Liberals are afraid that the farmers may spend the money before the election and not vote for the government, but these things happen.

The amendment spells out specifically that the corporation has all the powers necessary to carry out such duties or functions in relation to the administration of any agricultural program assigned to it pursuant to act of Parliament. We feel there is some value in debate and in learning through the exchange of ideas. We have not given up on the concept of dialogue. We may have differences of opinion and violently disagree with what is going on in western Canada, in the Maritimes, in Newfoundland or in Quebec. We still agree that this shall be the meeting place of the representatives of the people and that dialogue will produce an exchange of ideas or a cross-pollinization. We feel this cross-pollinization will result in satisfactory answers to the problems confronting the people in various areas.

This particular bill seems to indicate that the Minister of Agriculture is afraid of dialogue and an exchange of ideas. He seems to be saying that we should not bother him too much because he has a television view and can only see in a straight line. We should not bother him with all the flack that comes through the process of debate. He wants to do what he wants, perhaps the creation of another Lift operation or acreage payments based on the two-price system so that votes will fall his way. He wants to build 2,000 boxcars but does not want debate, legislation or anything else which might let the people know who will be paying for those boxcars.

An hon. Member: Are you against it?

Mr. Horner: The hon. member can read the speech I made in the House of Commons on March 8 to find his answer to that question. He will see that I was not against it but suggested it.

In any event, it appears that the minister is afraid of debate. He is taking a negative approach. The minister, the Prime Minister and other Cabinet members go out to western Canada and ask the people what they want and why they are not satisfied. They say they are moving the grain, selling all kinds of it and want to know why they are not happy. They tell them they are building boxcars and they should be happy. We as the representatives of these farmers want to participate. Clause 1 of this bill will give the minister, through order in council, the right to bring in any kind of program he wants without consulting anybody except a few Liberal cronies back home, providing he has not become too high hat to speak even to them.

An hon. Member: There are not too many of them anymore.

Mr. Horner: I agree with the hon. member, there are not many of those old Liberal cronies left. This is how democracy is falling down, and this is how the parliamentary process is being eroded. We must not sit as legislators and allow such an all-inclusive clause to pass. Many members have read this all-inclusive clause and have come to the conclusion that this is how the small farm program gets into the picture. The minister has not really answered that question. He has said this would cover the small farm program, although it was not necessary because votes 1 and 15 of the estimates assure that this program will go ahead.

Much of the debate on Clause 1 has centred around small farm legislation. I was going to say this is propaganda, but it is even a little better than that. The minister put forward this much talked about document on March 8, 1971, but since that time he has backed away from it. Some have suggested that the March 8 document indicated that the government would be purchasing land, along with other non-farmers. As a result of the minister's vacillation at committee meetings, we are in doubt as to whether the government will purchase land. I have asked the minister whether this is so and I hope he will answer before this debate is concluded.

Can non-farmers, who have no intent to farm, purchase land under this program for speculative or other purposes? Can they borrow money from the Farm Credit Corporation for the purchase of such land? There was a great deal of talk about the fact that the March 8 document indicated the small farm program would be available to senior farmers prepared to sell out when the farm land had a value of no less than $3,000 and no more than $20,000. The minister now says it is not tied to those values but is flexible. Someone asked whether the eligible value could go up to $35,000, and whether a portion of a farm rather than the whole farm could be sold. If a farmer were selling to his son, could he sell half the farm for $30,000 and lease the other half and receive the maximum grant? The minister has not answered these questions. He has suggested that the $20,000 limit will be raised, but he has not said how high. I asked him in committee if it would be raised to $35,000. He said it may, but that depended on the provinces.

As yet no province has agreed to go along with this program, and therefore the minister has categorically said that the government will not wait for the provinces but will proceed alone. Will a small farmer with a net real estate value on his farm of $35,000 qualify for the assistance to the elderly farmer who wants to sell out. That is about the fourth question I have asked to which I should like an answer. When I asked the minister if the small farms program was limited to the elderly farmer, he said that in his mind any farmer could receive the grant but that he preferred to think it would be given to a farmer who was elderly and wished to enjoy a higher quality of life somewhere else. Such a farmer would be given assistance. The minister said there would be a direct grant of $1,500 to such a farmer who would be selling out, plus 10 per cent of the sale value of the farm. If the maximum value were $20,000 this would mean a grant of $3,500. This is the bonus that would be received by a farmer who retires from the land who seeks, in the minister's words, a higher qualify of life in another occupation.

The other question which has not been answered is in respect of a young person or another farmer buying land and receiving special consideration. Would he be able to buy it under conditions which would allow him a lower down payment than if the program were not in effect? I do not think that question has been answered. We are led to believe the House plans to adjourn at the end of this week. If I were in the minister's place, I would be inclined to try to co-operate in answering these questions. This may be the last piece of legislation the minister will have the privilege of bringing into this House of Commons, the good Lord willing. I think if I were in his place I would be very co-operative with the House and try to answer these questions. In this way the minister would have an opportunity to have his name recorded in posterity as one who put forward one more piece of legislation. These are the four or five questions I have in respect of this legislation.

I have before me the Federal Farm Credit and Related Statistics booklet. In this booklet there is a table which sets out the class of FCA borrowings by province. Without going into the matter of the provinces, the number of loans made on farms with a net value of land worth $20,000 represented 4.7 per cent of the number of borrowers. So, up until this date we are dealing with a very small section of borrowers. Does the minister hope to enlarge this section? Is the program geared to encourage the small farmers to borrow more money in order to buy land or, as suggested by the National Farmers Union in the committee, is this program designed to take agricultural land out of production? Is it designed to lend the money to non-farmers who will use it perhaps for the purpose of subdividing the land into what are called acreages on the edge of major cities or for the purpose of light industry. Is this the concept under which a farmer who has been producing, let us say, a fair return or a fair amount of money per acre will find that his acreage is to be used to pasture one saddle horse for the young children in a family rather than being used to produce products to be sold abroad. This is a question in the minds of many people. We on this side of the House go along with the over-all concept of lending more money to farmers. One has only to look at the difficult plight in which many farmers find themselves.

In the same booklet at page 63 there is an interesting table in respect of land tenure by province. Let us take, for example, the province of Alberta. There is much concern today about Americans buying up Canadian land and so on. In the province of Alberta in 1961, 51.5 per cent of the agricultural land was farmed by the owner of the land. In 1966, this figure increased to 62 per cent. I think this is a good direction in which to be going. In the province of Saskatchewan, however, the reverse is true. In 1961, 64.9 per cent of the land was farmed by the owner. In 1966, this figure had reduced to 55.4 per cent, nearly 10 per centage points in a five-year period. In other words, more farmers were leasing or renting land in that province rather than owning it. I might as well give the figures for the province of Manitoba. In 1961, 80 per cent of the land was farmed by the owner. In 1966, the figure had reduced to 65.8 per cent. This is a trend of which I do not believe anyone should be particularly proud. It is interesting to note in that same table that for the remainder of Canada the percentage is much higher, in the 88 per cent and 89 per cent bracket, and remains relatively constant in that five-year period in comparison to the three prairie provinces.

Because of its application to very low net worth farms, this small farms program will not be very beneficial to the areas which perhaps need it the most. If it were necessary to pass judgment on the small farms program, it might be considerably different from the judgment on Bill C-5 because Bill C-5 does two things. It allows the Farm Credit Corporation to lend more money to the individual and to a younger individual. It reduces the age of the borrower from 21 to 18. I think these two things are beneficial. Clause (1), in its all-encompassing provision, takes in the small farms program and it is regrettable that the minister has not given a more complete and clear explanation of what he really envisages. Is it to reduce the number of farms? Is it really a farm adjustment program or a farm development program? Is it to place more farmers on the land who will be better able to provide for themselves or is it to have less farms on the land? These questions should be answered before this minister and this House ask us to pass this legislation during the dying minutes of this session.

• (1720)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner: No, the minister should speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski).

When this bill was called yesterday, Mr. Speaker had some reservations about this motion. I have had the occasion to look at his remarks in Hansard of yesterday and I, too, have reservations. Hon. members may want to assist the Chair in this regard, but it seems to me that there are financial implications in the amendment. If the bill were amended as proposed, and enacted into law, it would put an additional burden on the Treasury. However, what is probably more to the point, and my second concern, is that the proposed motion in the name of the hon. member for Vegreville amends section 17 of the Act which is not a section in the bill and is not before the House at this time. However, I would appreciate hearing the opinions of hon. members if they would like to comment.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment briefly on this motion. Under the provisions of section 23 of the Farm Credit Act, the Governor in Council has the power to establish interest rates. He can prescribe rates at 2 per cent, 3 per cent, 4 per cent or 5 per cent. So, I believe that it is within the realm of the provisions of the act.

My second point is that the powers of the Farm Credit Corporation are indeed being expanded to enable it to administer a program for which something in the order of $150 million is to be appropriated over the next seven years. I believe that in the estimates in excess of $20 million has been appropriated under Votes 1 and 15. This particular program provides for the expenditure of these funds over the next seven years, as I pointed out. Funds are allocated under the program for grants to farmers who wish to retire or leave the business of farming. There are special facilities to be provided and there is the buying and selling of lands, all of which will be a burden on the Treasury, and all of which is provided for under the small farms development program. Delegation of powers is extended under clause 1 of Bill C-5.

I simply ask in this amendment that a certain portion of the funds be allocated for the subsidization of interest rates, because if this is truly a small farms development program it is certainly necessary to provide encouragement and incentive to young farmers to engage in the business of farming. There are other sections of Bill C-5 which refer directly to the administration of the small farms development program, and since such broad powers are granted, I believe that a certain portion of the funds allotted should be provided for the subsidization of interest rates to farmers under the age of 30 who are applying for loans for the first time. I believe that this would certainly give young farmers in Canada a fighting chance to engage in the business of farming, and it would certainly assist them in assembling the kind of viable unit that is necessary to conduct a successful operation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should like to indicate, if the minister will excuse me for a moment, that I wanted to hear the hon. member for Vegreville who put forward the motion, but I do suggest that he may have diverged from the question of the procedural acceptibility of the motion. I mention this because I see several other hon. members rising. Until we decide on the question of whether or not the Chair can accept the motion, hon. members should direct their comments to the procedural argument.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, in speaking directly on the procedural matter, may I point out that this bill does not provide money or in fact make an appropriation for any subsidization of interest rates. Of course, the hon. member defeated his own argument when he admitted that that was the objective of his amendment because, quite obviously, if there is to be a subsidization of interest rates for the purposes described in the amendment it would require a recommendation. Of course, there are rules regarding any motion brought to the House for an appropriation of money or an additional charge on the Treasury, and it is not within the competence of a private member to make such a motion. Of course, he has other methods of bringing that before the House if he chooses.

The other important point is the one to which you alluded, Mr. Speaker, and that is that this amendment does not in fact amend the bill which is before the House today; it attempts to amend the Farm Credit Act. I do not have all the citations before me, but I am sure you are familiar with them, Mr. Speaker. There are dozens of cases where attempts have been made to amend an act sections of which are not contained in the bill before the House. Of course, there is no question that the Farm Credit Act, as contained in Bill C-5, deals with section 17. The other part of the procedural prohibition against a private member moving a motion that is in fact a direct or indirect charge on the Treasury is valid, and this amendment is out of order on both counts.

• (1730)

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I was not too impressed with the hon. minister's remarks. Bill C-5 amends the Farm Credit Act, and the corporation does lend money at a prescribed interest rate that is 1½ per cent higher than the rate at which the government borrows. In this amendment, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) specifies that the interest should be less for a certain portion of the loan. This does not necessarily cause an expenditure of money. I notice that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) is nodding his head in agreement with that statement, Mr. Speaker. If the government borrowing rate were to dip, this amendment would not cost the government a cent. Indeed, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) told us not so long ago that government interest rates were coming down, so in the near future they may even be below this suggested rate. Indeed, if I took the assurance of the minister to heart I would assume that they are nearly below it now.

The fact is that this amendment may not cost the government any money at all, and it is specified that it should only be made to a farmer of less than 30 years of age, so the government may be saving some money. The bill deals with the Farm Credit Corporation which lends money at an interest rate which may well be below this because it is an adjustable interest rate, not a pegged rate. This amendment cannot be ruled out of order, because it may not cost the government any money at all.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, I wish to concur in the remarks made by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). This amendment may not cost the government any money at all. I think this procedural difficulty could be solved if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) were to accept the amendment.

An hon. Member: Move the amendment, Bud.

An hon. Member: Come on, Scrooge!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has for consideration and decision whether motion No. 2 standing in the name of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) can be accepted by the Chair as being procedurally correct. In my initial remarks, I indicated that I had two concerns. One was that the proposed amendment, if it were enacted, might cause a charge against the Treasury and there is no recommendation accompanying the motion. The second was that it appears to go behing the bill and purports to amend the Farm Credit Act.

The hon. member for Vegreville, the hon. member for Crowfoot and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) have argued, with respect to the first point, that there will not necessarily be a charge against the Treasury. I would like to look at that argument if I were to base my ruling upon it but, in any event, I would want to base my ruling on the second point which, I indicated earlier, was a bar to the acceptance of this motion. The motion does not in fact purport to amend the act and, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) has pointed out, the authorities are clear that this is not acceptable from a procedural standpoint. I must, therefore, decline the motion on this basis.

I understand that on Motion No. 1, the yeas and nays have been taken.

Call in the members.

The House divided on Motion No. 1 (Mr. Mazankowski), which was negatived on the following division:

During the taking of the vote:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: So that there will be no confusion, I might ask the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) if he did indicate his vote?

Mr. Gauthier: I did.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: He did.

After the taking of the vote:

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved:

That Bill C-5, an Act to amend the Farm Credit Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Olson: I wonder whether Your Honour would inquire as to a possible disposition in the House to give third reading to this bill.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Baldwin: It is our hope that the spirit of kindness may move the minister to change his mind and alter somewhat his hard-hearted approach to this legislation.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 29, 1972

The House met at 11 a.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN

MEASURE TO PROVIDE BENEFITS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-170, to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children, be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Mr. Speaker, during the last several weeks of compressed debate on this legislation the argument I have heard perhaps most frequently is that the family income security plan legislation is detrimental to the middle income group. This is hardly astonishing for, as I indicated in an earlier debate, the argument does have its political appeal, at least initially. I firmly believe, however, that such political appeal is tenuous and of short-term duration. It is difficult to reconcile the constant and differing demands by the opposition. On the one hand, they demand an increasing redistribution of income and, on the other hand, the same members of the opposition simultaneously espouse the cause of lowering the tax burden on our middle income groups. The facetious attempts on the part of the opposition to palm off this political sleight of hand will, I fear, damage greatly its credibility with Canadians in the long run. In other words, how can the opposition call for greater expenditures than the government is now making, yet accuse the government at the same time of placing too heavy a tax burden on the middle income groups.

Mr. Baldwin: That is a matter of interpretation.

Mr. Munro: Therefore I have become increasingly convinced that such an approach is based on a cynical and disdainful regard for the intelligence of the majority of Canadians.

Needless to say, some in the opposition have advocated that the rich and the corporations should be taxed more. Of course they should be. If we are to undertake these additional financial obligations, it will be absolutely mandatory that we do so. It will be mandatory not just for the sake of the revenue which would be provided but also for the simple reason that the affluent of this country must accept their full obligation to our society generally.

Mr. Gilbert: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Say that to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

Mr. Munro: As it stands, the government is already making a heavy investment in income security. At present, roughly $4 billion is committed to just three programs. Old age security and the guaranteed income supplement for the aged, with the increases voted by Parliament in December, 1970, and again last month, will represent expenditures of about $2.5 billion. The legislation now before the House represents an additional $800 million, and perhaps more. In addition, the federal 50 per cent share of provincial allotments for social assistance and social support and rehabilitation services means another $800 million in expenditures. With these facts in the background I should like to deal with some of the proposals I have heard opposition members raise.

Some in the opposition say that what we are proposing is not enough. For example, when the Family Income Security Plan legislation was last before the House some in the opposition talked about increasing the benefits over and above those recommended in the present bill as well as making those increased benefits universal. Just to make the benefits universal at the present levels, let alone provide increases, would require an additional $700 million over and above the $800 million that is now recommended.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister forgets that these payments could be subject to income tax.

• (1110)

Mr. Munro: I ask, from where is this additional revenue to come? Let us combine this measure with another promise or position advanced in the House during the current session, namely, that there should be universal old age security payments of $150 a month. The first proposal would pay family allowances at the rate of $15 a month for those under 16, $20 a month for those 16 and 17, on a universal basis. The implementation of these two programs would require an additional expenditure of about $1.5 billion in excess of the presently projected costs I have already mentioned. Do those in the opposition who talk about the burden on the middle income group really believe that the middle income group can be misled to believe that these promises will not cost them money?

I have not finished costing some of the proposals of those in the opposition. Some have talked about the desirability of a guaranteed annual income, a concept which I have indicated before the government is continuing to consider. We already use the guaranteed income technique in the income supplement for the aged and we are now about to apply it to family allowances. In addition, we have created a fund in conjunction with interested provincial governments which will be used to finance experiments on a full guaranteed income technique.

However, to move immediately to a full nation-wide guaranteed income would require enormous new financial resources. Even if paid only at the poverty line levels set out in the 1969 Economic Council brief to the Senate committee on poverty, which numerous councils and agencies have suggested are already outdated, such a full program would cost anywhere from an additional $1.5 billion to $2 billion taking into account all savings from present programs, including savings from the recent guaranteed income supplement increases for the aged and the projected FISP expenditures. I have picked a conservative figure of $1.5 billion to $2 billion based on outdated poverty line levels.

Let us add it all up. Those who advocate a universal old age security payment of $150 a month are advocating an increased expenditure of $700 million to $800 million. Those who advocate universal family allowance payments at maximum FISP benefit levels are advocating an additional $700 million of federal spending. Those who advocate a guaranteed income, even at 1969 Economic Council levels, are advocating an additional expenditure of $1.5 billion to $2.5 billion. The projected expenditure of $1.5 billion to $2.5 billion for a guaranteed income would be over and above what is now being spent. It would be over and above the increased spending resulting from the two guaranteed income supplement increases for the aged voted in the last two years and would be over and above the money allocated to FISP. This brings us to a rather grand price tag at the level of $3 billion to $3.5 billion in extra federal expenditures.

It would only be fair to go into how those in the opposition who suggest this very extensive increase in our expenditures for income security would fund these proposals. On the basis of the promises already advanced by the opposition, I believe that when we analyse the inadequacy of their responses to this question we will see that they are really insulting the intelligence of middle income Canadians.

This government accepts that the burden of financing new programs should be spread fairly and equitably. I think the Family Income Security Plan will reflect this philosophy. Only 28 per cent of the revenue required to finance FISP will come directly from families with children who must give up all or part of their present family allowances. The remaining 72 per cent will come from general revenue. This means corporations, childless couples and single people as well as families with children. In short, everyone will bear a proportion of this task.

What I pointed out in Quebec and re-emphasize now is that even if we were to increase the tax rate on high income earners and on corporations to extreme proportions, the revenue generated would be greatly inadequate to finance the new large-scale programs advocated by various members of the opposition. I was simply pointing out where we must look for the needed revenue if the promises of many of these politicians are to be realized. Do any in this House seriously think the middle income groups in this country can be so easily manipulated that they will believe that promises and policies such as I have heard in the House would not cast a partial burden upon them?

I might refer to a recent speech by the leader of the New Democratic Party when he talked about where we might find some additional revenue. He talked about obliterating any tax concessions to corporations as a fetchingly appealing strategy. Unfortunately, it will soon come home that even that by doing that not enough revenue would be generated to anywhere near finance proposals of this magnitude. I have pointed out that, on the basis of rough estimates, steep increases in corporation tax, in the order of say 20 per cent, would yield only $400 million to $500 million. I have also pointed out that just a $10 universal increase in the old age pensions from $80 to $90, a woefully inadequate figure in itself, would eat up approximately half of that amount.

Some of the opposition talk of taxing the rich to implement this promise. I repeat, of course we should: However, 1969 statistics show that only 11 per cent of the Canadian taxpayers paid on incomes of over $10,000 a year.

Mr. Lewis: We know that.

Mr. Munro: It is a fact. Even if this is but a rough guide, it hardly indicates a sufficient tax base to render adequate revenue to the government, even at prohibitive tax rates. I frankly feel that if we taxed in full every dollar earned over $20,000 we would get but a fraction of the amount necessary for the large-scale programs mentioned.

In light of these facts, I realize that some of those in the opposition will admit that even if we applied prohibitive tax rate increases against the affluent it would not bring in enough revenue for all the increases they are suggesting. But then, of course, at least in respect of FISP they would go on to suggest special recovery rates, especially if we made universal payments to the middle income groups.

In setting these recovery rates the opposition has a choice. They can recover at rates of up to 100 per cent, or, if they are afraid of further alienating the middle-income voter, which they greatly desire not to do, they can recover at much lower levels.

If they do not recover at rates of up to 100 per cent there will be a major leakage of benefits to the affluent in this country and there will also be a heavy additional burden on the general revenue fund, the bulk of which comes, once again, from the middle income group which they claim they want to rescue from the burden of increased taxation. If, for example, they recover at normal tax rates, then that recovery would represent only slightly in excess of $200 million of the additional $700 million needed to pay universal benefits—a loss of close to $500 million which could otherwise be directed to other more pressing social concerns, as well as a substantial burden on the middle income groups, as I have just pointed out. If, on the other hand, they did recover at rates of 100 per cent, then all they would be doing would be placing an additional tax burden on the middle and upper income husband in order to make a payment to his wife.

So once more let us review the opposition proposals in their totality: new additional federal spending programs of up to $3.5 billion, with little prospect of obtaining a significant proportion of this money from increased levies on the rich and the corporations, even at prohibitive rates.

Thus it is obvious that those opposition members to whom I have referred are already advocating increased taxation affecting the middle income groups.

Mrs. MacInnis: What about the other income groups?

Mr. Munro: With regard to the upper income groups and the corporations I have already said that to finance this proposal—and they will pay their share—taxation would have to be levelled at much higher, even at prohibitive rates.

So when opposition members make charges of irresponsibility, let them, to avoid charges of disdain for the intelligence of Canadian taxpayers, tell the middle income group where they intend to raise the money to carry out the promises they are making. Let them be assured of one thing: these middle income Canadians are not so naïve that they will not ask the question. I believe this is a challenge which the opposition must meet.

For the benefit of those who talk about the burden of some of our policies on the middle income group I should point out just in what way certain of our policies have helped the middle income group.

For example, we have not forgotten to provide financial compensation to middle income citizens with families. Our income tax laws continue to provide for children's exemptions. This is because they are mainly directed to horizontal redistribution of the tax burden from taxpayers who have children to taxpayers who do not. Tax exemptions for children are estimated to represent $550 million. The tax exemption system does favour middle and higher income families because, as income is higher, the exemption becomes more valuable.

Some hon. Members: Right on!

Mr. Munro: Nor is this the only government measure which aids the middle income group. I would cite for example, programs such as hospital insurance, medicare, unemployment insurance, the Canada Pension Plan, retirement, disability, widows' and orphans' benefits, and the financing of post-secondary education, all of which were implemented under Liberal governments.

These have spared those benefiting by them enormous personal financial obligations which might otherwise have crushed their financial security and forced them into a dependency on welfare. This is especially true since programs such as hospital insurance, medicare and post-secondary education financing have been most heavily utilized by the middle income groups in comparison with all other income groups in our society.

In this connection I should stress that our country has outperformed the United States, despite their vastly superior financial resources. We have not only kept pace with the American economy and the American standard of living, notwithstanding the extra pressure of a proportionately faster growing labour force, but we have also provided social benefits not yet available in the United States, for example, comprehensive universal hospital insurance and medicare, basic non-contributory old age pensions and family allowances.

Moreover, we should remember that thanks to the prosperity resulting from the improvement of the economy in the last decade, a process toward which present government and Liberal governments preceding it have greatly contributed, real income flowing to the middle income group, over and above the inflation factor, has risen by almost 30 per cent. In short, thanks to positive government economic measures much of our working class has moved into the middle income group. And through continued vigorous government action we intend to see that these workingmen who have moved into the middle income group stay there.

I should also like to talk about a few of the other criticisms which have been levelled at the Family Income Security Plan. First, I would point out that its key principle is to assist the low income worker. Thus it goes a long way toward meeting a number of criticisms of our present welfare system.

This plan is not designed to aid the indolent. Its principal aim, I repeat, is to aid those who work, to build in incentives which will encourage them to continue working by providing supplementation to their low-level earnings.

We hear today much criticism on the grounds that people are sometimes placed in situations which encourage them to ask: Why should I work when I can get as much on welfare? The middle income group feels it has worked hard and saved its money. Naturally it resents those who would abuse the welfare system and prefer to use the hard-earned middle income tax dollar to support themselves without working.

Of course, as I have often stated, the number of people who would prefer to live on welfare rather than work is exaggerated. But the feeling held by many people is understandable, none the less. There are some who would prefer to live on welfare and turn down reasonable job opportunities.

The Family Income Security Plan helps meet this problem by providing incentives for the low income earner. It assists him or her to resist the temptation, if and when it does exist, to go on welfare and withhold his or her contribution to society.

An hon. Member: How does the bill do that?

Mr. Munro: If the criticism about some social assistance rates being as high as or higher than certain wage levels is justified, it is derived from the fact that in some provinces social assistance rates applicable to a family with several children often do come perilously close to what the minimum wage rates or laws provide in that province.

• (1130)

An hon. Member: Anything is possible with this government.

Mr. Munro: I could easily talk about some provincial governments of the same political complexion as the hon. member which do the same thing. This closeness between welfare and the minimum wage is especially true when one considers that often other social services, such as hospitalization and medicare, are provided to the man or woman with a family on social assistance while the wage earner must pay the regular shot. FISP does something about this.

Mr. Alexander: The minister is filibustering his own bill.

Mr. Munro: It builds in incentives for workers to remain in the work force by providing incremental income. The wage structure in Canada does not take into account the dependency factor.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would suggest to hon. members to my left that there is so much noise and interruption that it might be deemed to be somewhat unfair to the minister who is trying to make his speech. I think the minister should be given an opportunity to make his speech without all these interruptions.

Mr. Munro: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, in terms of incentives the wage structure in Canada does not take into account the dependency factor. An employer pays the same rate to the married man or woman with a family as to the single man or woman for the same job and the same duties. Therein lies the problem.

Social assistance rates leave a large gap between the level paid to a single man or woman and the level of income that the single man or woman can earn by working. So, to a much greater degree, incentives are preserved. It is where the man or woman has a family that social assistance levels sometimes approximate minimum income wage rates. This results from a legitimate desire on the part of the welfare system not to penalize the child or children of the welfare recipient. And this—the position of a family on assistance—is where the disincentives emerge as a real problem.

FISP recognizes the problem. It gives meaningful income supplementation to the low income wage earner. It recognizes that his or her earnings are low and boosts the total family income according to his or her family responsibilities. In other words, it takes into account the number of children, a factor that the wage structure, by its very nature, cannot do.

The importance of this principle of wage supplementation was brought up again in the latest report of the National Council of Welfare which restressed the profile of Canadian poverty. The basic fact is that the majority of Canada's poverty population comes from the working poor group, those in marginal, seasonal, interrupted or part-time employment.

I should now like to refer to one other criticism made by some members of the opposition of the Family Income Security Plan, namely, that somehow the FISP application form and cheque will constitute some form of stigma as well, as some have indicated, as an administrative nightmare.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro: Let hon. members hear the explanation. Potential FISP beneficiaries will fill out a simple income form, just as impartial and anonymous as and simpler than the income tax forms millions of Canadians now fill out. On the return voyage—the arrival and cashing of the FISP cheque—the stigma is non-existent as well. The amount of the cheque alone is no indicator of income, since a person would have to know the number and ages of the recipient's children before he could begin to calculate the person's income. The cheque will be a government of Canada cheque, as are millions of cheques received by beneficiaries of other government programs, such as unemployment insurance, old age security, Canada Pension Plan, manpower training allowances, and, of course, the regular pay cheques issued by the federal government to its employees. Finally, the only people who need know the amount of the cheque are those who cash it, and I do not think Canadian banks are in the habit of announcing the details of the financial dealings of their customers.

This will not be our first experience with cheques issued under a selective benefit program. We have had five years' experience with the guaranteed income supplement for the aged, which is now received by more than one million senior citizens, and we have not heard loud cries of outrage that this cheque stigmatizes the pensioners.

Why should there be? The income test under the guaranteed income supplement is impersonal; it is a matter strictly between the administering authorities and the person concerned. The test is conducted by mail, and payments are made by cheque which can be promptly cashed or deposited in any one of the many and conveniently distributed branches of Canada's banking system. Why, then, should there be a social stigma under the Family Income Security Plan?

With regard to the question of administrative complexity, may I make just a few comments. I frankly admit that the administration of the plan is, of course, more complex than the rather simplistic approach to universal payments. However, the main principles of FISP are not at all difficult to comprehend. The amount of benefits payable is not difficult to comprehend; the ages determining the amount of benefits are not difficult to comprehend; the concept of basic income levels or thresholds is not difficult to comprehend. Neither is the idea that an income test similar in principle to income taxation is used to determine eligibility, or the application of this simple income test on one application form, as is the case with the guaranteed income supplement. I believe all these points are easy to understand.

In conclusion, may I point out that the Family Income Security Plan is but one facet of an over-all government program to deal constructively with employment generating policies and with poverty. These priorities fall into three categories among the Canadian population. First, there are those Canadians who are permanently out of the work force. They are one priority. When we review government policies designed to assist this group I think it can be established that this group is treated better under this government than the same group would be in any country of the free world comparable to Canada. Let me just analyse the people in this group. There are the aged, and for these we have provided the guaranteed income supplement. For the disabled we cost-share support payments under the Canada Assistance Plan.

The second category is the working poor, for whom we have designed policies, of which FISP is a major ingredient, to assist them; I have already listed these policies. in addition, we have the new unemployment insurance plan. We have also raised the minimum wage levels in the federal sphere as well as introduced needed labour legislation to protect these workers from the ravages of technological change.

Lastly, the third category and priority among Canadian citizens is the unemployed. We have directly intervened, in cases where the private sector has not been able to be of assistance, with programs such as Local Initiative, Opportunities for Youth, cost-sharing with the provinces and work activity projects.

• (1140)

I recommend the Family Income Security Plan to the House as an essential ingredient in the necessary over-all attack in terms of giving added income supplementation to the working poor of this country and as a constructive measure to deal with poverty.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro). Somebody said he was trying to defend the indefensible, but he reminds me of a goldfish going around and around in a fish bowl and getting nowhere.

An hon. Member: You need a new pair of glasses.

Mr. Rynard: As a matter of fact, he reminded me a little bit of what Shakespeare said in that he protested far too much. It is interesting to note that he spoke about the things the Liberal government has done over the years but forgot to refer to what that great Prime Minister did who occupied the seats of the mighty for longer than any other man in the British Commonwealth, Prime Minister Mackenzie King. I am sure he did not do that intentionally; in fact, I would never accuse him of really doing anything intentionally. Mackenzie King brought in children's allowances in 1946.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): 1944.

Mr. Rynard: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) corrects me and I accept his correction, but I think the bill became law in 1946.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was passed in 1944 and became law in 1945.

Mr. Rynard: I accept that correction and I note that the hon. member has been reading up on this subject. He was in the House at the time so he has that advantage over the minister and myself.

Why the minister did not refer to this fact when he was boasting so much about what the Liberal party had done over the years is a little hard for me to comprehend. I always try to comprehend what the minister has to say because I get such peculiar answers to the questions I ask him.

The minister referred to OHSIP, the training of doctors, and the health resource fund. I hope I am not going to embarrass him by mentioning these things, but he knows the mess they are in at this time. He is having difficulty all across the country with health resources and the shortage of general practitioners.

Mr. Munro: Dr. Potter says there is no shortage.

Mr. Rynard: The minister does not have to refer to Dr. Potter because he is referring to Ontario. The minister is in trouble in every province because of a shortage of doctors, general practitioners; he knows that and that emergency wards are overtaxed. Over and over again I have asked him about this. Once in a while there is a flash of light and the minister seems to see a vision, but then he loses it.

On June 9 the minister said that the next thing he was going to bring in or think about, which should have been brought in before on the recommendation of the Hall Commission, is pharmacare or drug care. Yesterday he forgot about these things and said that we are doing this under the Canada Assistance Plan. He has told me that for the last two or three years. What I want to know is, did he lose his vision of June 9, 1972, again?

Let us go back to all those great things he said the Liberal party was doing. This bill is very complex, ill-conceived and poorly prepared. It is almost impossible to administer and if there is any answer to that I should like to hear it.

An hon. Member: You just haven't read it.

Mr. Rynard: No one can. Would it not have been easier to have family allowances payable to everybody and cut back a little on other government spending?

An hon. Member: Like what?

Mr. Rynard: I will give you some examples a little later if you will have patience. Let me refer to what Mr. King did and compare it with the situation today. This bill does not provide the economic help the Liberal party gave back in 1944 when it brought in family allowances. If the minister thinks it does I should like him to get up and say so. This bill includes a means test and classifies poverty. It creates different stratas in our society. What financial help does it give the mothers of this country? I suggest it gives less than the measure adopted in 1944. The minister did not tell the mothers they were going to get less. Let us be clear about that. But he underestimates them.

In 1946 the average industrial wage was just over $30 per week and in 1970 it was just over $130 per week, four times as much or a 400 per cent increase. It does not take a mathematician to compare the purchasing value of the two figures. FISP will pay $180 in respect of children up to age 12, and it will pay $240 in respect of those from 12 to 18 years of age. All FISP does is restore a portion of the purchasing value of the dollar; yet the minister makes a great deal out of what he is doing for the unfortunate poor. Even those entitled to the maximum now will have less in purchasing power than people had originally under the previous family allowance scheme. That scheme was universal; this is not. People will be much worse off, so this is nothing more than a pious platitude or a crying epitaph to a vanishing allowance.

Approximately one-third of those now receiving family allowances will be cut off entirely. About one-third will be receiving the maximum. I should like to know why the $4,500 income bracket was chosen as the most deserving. As far as I know the minister gave no reason for choosing this figure. Why is the $9,100 income bracket the least deserving? About one-third will get the full allowance. About half of the remainder will get less than they do under the present scheme and the other half will get a little more.

I think we must keep in mind that this bill was first advanced in 1970 but is not going to come into force until 1973. I should like hon. members to remember that the minister first advanced this scheme in 1970 but nothing will take place until June, 1973. What will be the result of inflation in the meantime? If inflation continues at the 10 per cent rate over two and a half years the $20 the minister is talking about will only be worth $18. I notice the minister is making note of this so I hope he will have a change of heart and increase the amount.

• (1150)

Just a short time ago the minister announced that this legislation would be in effect this fall. A week or so later he said it would not be operative until next year. In the space of one week he doubled the time for it to become operative. This is why I wonder whether or not the government knows what it is doing. What information did the minister have when he made the statement that it would be in effect this fall? What information did he have at that time which he did not have previously? I think that is a very pertinent question. Why did he then change the date from the fall until next June? What was his reasoning? In September of 1971 he said it would be operative in May of this year. Does anyone really know when it will be operative? Why was it necessary to hire outside help? Why did th eminister find it necessary to hire experts and consultants from outside in order to tell him how to run the computer.

The minister boasted about what the government has been doing in respect of unemployment insurance and so on. The minister has been in the House only about half the time, but long enough surely to have heard over and over again the questions about people who were having difficulty getting their unemployment insurance payments and were almost starving. If this is an example of the Liberal philosophy of being good to the poor, it is a different philosophy from that of the Conservative party.

As I said before, the experts and consultants had to tell the department how to run the computer. One of the higher-ups in the minister's department said, "Well, it is the computers; we got into a mess in respect of unemployment insurance because of the computers; it was a catastrophe". This makes one wonder whether this bill will be just as great a catastrophe.

Let us take another look at the defects of this poorly drawn and poorly drafted bill. If a worker started with an income of $4,500 in 1970, with the ordinary increase in salary he would receive he would not qualify for the full benefits by the year 1973. He would be paying more money in income tax and would be taxed on the FISP benefits he would receive simply because he would be receiving less money from FISP. In reality this is a tax. This will continue all the way up the scale until he is pushed to the cut-off level at which he will not be eligible. As poverty increases more and more, as it has in the last few years, people will be beyond the cut-off level and less payments will be made in respect of children's allowances.

[Mr. Rynard.]

The minister was not in the House at the time, but I am sure some of his colleagues who are sitting here were, when Mr. Pearson as Prime Minister came into the House in 1963 and announced the very bright philosophy about which the minister spoke this morning to the effect that poverty would be ended. Unfortunately, it has become worse.

An hon. Member: The just society.

Mr. Rynard: No. That came along later in 1968. This is another gimmick, of course. They were trying to fool the people. This is what the minister is trying to do now. I believe he protesteth far too much.

Mr. Béchard: Tell us about the opposition of the Conservatives in 1944.

Mr. Rynard: If you are asking for it I will give it to you before I am through. I will tell you about the mess you made of medicare and a few other things in this country as well as about unemployment and inflation. You will hear about this if you ask for it. On the other hand, if you want to stick to the subject we are on we will stick to it. As I was saying, more and more people are living below the poverty line. This is the way the minister thinks he will end poverty. He may have bright ambitions, but as a result of my experience in life I can tell him that he is no Lochinvar on a white charger.

The last point I wish to make has to do with the complete absence of any provision for the retarded child. The minister may ask what this has to do with this legislation. He continues going around and around the fishbowl. There is no provision for the provincial guardian or some other responsible party to guard and guide the interests of the child. I have seen many children who have been abused. It is not very long ago that many articles appeared about the battered child syndrome. So far as I can see the minister has done nothing about this. No provision whatever is made for the retarded child who requires extra care. If the minister, with his great humanitarian ideas, wants to do the things he is talking about let him bring in a provision to pay for the care of retarded children who are in the home. These children require extra care. Once they go to an institution the government is faced with an expense of $10 to $15 a day. Why does the minister not bring in some provision in this regard and add it to this bill if he really has a humanitarian attitude toward these people? There is no provision whatsoever for the child who is retarded and requires extra care in cases where the parents look after him in their own homes at their own expense instead of shoving him off to an institution at the expense of the public. These people do not receive a cent.

I say to the minister that his bill falls far short of what was done in 1945. At that time payments were made universal. Now he is picking out about a third of the people to help and is doing less for them because of the purchasing value of the dollar. I think the minister should redraft his speech before the public become aware of it.

I wish to refer now to the filling out of the tax reform sheet and what amounts to a tax of 33 cents on every $100 of additional income. In my opinion this is a complete nightmare. The minister obviously does not understand the bill. I say that with all kindness in my heart because as I looked over the figures I could not understand them either. I asked some other people to look at them and they did not understand them. The minister has already proven that even his experts do not understand this provision or are afraid of the computer because they do not know how it is to be fed the information.

The minister postponed this measure until this June and then until perhaps next June. He goes around and around the merry-go-round. He talks about the poor and about taxing the middle class more. If the minister did not say this I will accept his word for it. However, the Montreal Gazette and some other papers thought he was really after the middle class and would reduce them to serfdom. Whether or not the minister really meant that or whether or not he really said it, it is a fact that the middle class people are the ones who will be properly soaked by taxation.

The government refers with piety to its humanitarian instinct and says that all things that are good come from their party. As I look across at them and remember how well they hid the fact that they will increase taxes next year by 3 per cent, I deny their humanitarianism. The minister did not include that in his speech this morning when he was defending the middle class. Whatever the minister's feelings may be, he is part of a government that is increasing taxation for the middle class next year by 3 per cent.

I should like to comment now on these new income tax forms. Every time a person's salary goes up or down he must report it. Every time a person's salary or a person's commission goes down and he finds himself in difficulties because of decreased income and applies for help which he needs immediately, how long will it take to reach him? I ask the minister, if a fellow applies in 1970 will he not get help until 1973? If a fellow finds that his income is cut and he needs the money now, how long will it take before he gets it? I think that is a very fair question.

I do not want to go into further details and embarrass the minister because he is in a sufficiently bad position now. However, let me point out that people must fill in these forms every time their income goes up or down. It is like a yoyo. Once the form arrives in Ottawa nobody will be able to figure it out so they will put it into the computer and then the fellow will be told either that he will get less money next year or a little more. Where are these records to be checked? Believe it or not, they are to be checked in the income tax branch. I remember, as many in the House do, when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) accused the government of attempting to do that very thing, but it was denied. Hon. members can check this in Hansard. However, we were told in committee that this is the very thing they are going to do in relation to this measure. These are Gestapo tactics, with a Gestapo checking financial returns that are supposed to be completely secret.

I spoke about the person who really needs help. In the majority of cases it is my opinion that FISP will pay too much or too little each year. There will be one heck of a mess. In the majority of cases incomes will be going up and down like a yoyo. As I said, the process will be computerized and it will be only as good as the people who are feeding data into the computer. Since the information will be changing continually, the computers will get mixed up. This will be no better than Information Canada, and it has been a great disappointment to the people running it. I could go on about a few other things that have been great disappointments.

This measure was brought in with loud cheers from the government supposedly to help the poor more than the rich, but it does not do this. A family with an income of $3,000, paying no income tax and with one child, will get $180 from FISP, but a family with an income of $60,000 and one child will get an extra $184. How in the world can the minister tell me that the plan does more for the poor than for the rich? It seems to me that the only sane thing to do is to make the family allowance universal and to cut back on welfare payments for children by an equal and offsetting amount. The government has just taken us into another jungle of computers from which it will be difficult to extricate ourselves, and already they are in a mess, so far as computers are concerned, with the social security measures they have brought in.

I could refer to medicare and talk at length of the mess there which they do not know how to get out of. They do not know whether to get more doctors because costs are going up and up and they cannot meet them. As I have said before, they do not know what to do with emergency departments in hospitals. So they are in an all-round jungle.

It is my belief that all this should be brought under one department. For instance, why should $30 million be spent on the administration of a program that is supposed to help the poor? This is exactly what is being done, with a doubling of the staff. The minister failed to point this out in his speech. I hope he will correct this when he goes on the hustings. I hope he will tell the people just how bad this bill is.

Mr. Lewis: Yes, do that, John.

Mr. Rynard: It is more likely that the program will cost $50 million rather than $30 million to administer instead of the previous figure of $15 million. Some more universal form must be found of doing this through one department and one form. The costs of other plans now are not only astronomical but the plans are not working in the interests of those people whom we are trying to help.

Furthermore, I am disturbed by the fact that the Department of National Health and Welfare will be checking with the income tax branch. Perhaps the solution could be found by scrapping income tax exemptions for dependent children, scrapping government handouts for public housing and increasing family allowances to cover all these things and make sure that we deal fairly with everybody and that we keep in mind that family allowances are for children. I want to remind the House that the benefits paid with respect to children and persons referred to in subsection 1 of section 5 are to be applied exclusively toward the maintenance, care, training, education or advancement of the children and persons. The cardinal principle is that this is a Family Income Security Plan and that it is the children of this land who are supposed to be protected. I am sorry to see the government in this age of affluence bringing in a bill that does much less for the poor people of this country than was done in 1945.

• (1210)

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) I felt rather sad. It is always sad to watch a man's tortuous anguish as his once kind heart is at war with his guilty conscience, for that was the background of his speech this morning, and it is the background of the speeches he has made recently across the country.

This poor, sad minister, who would like to go down in history as a great friend of the ordinary Canadian, is being ground to dust by the reactionaries who accompany him in the cabinet of Canada. And as is always the case, Mr. Speaker, if you allow yourself to be ground down by ideas and thoughts in which you do not believe, you end up by accepting those ideas and thoughts and becoming just as reactionary as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) and other ministers in the Cabinet.

The minister's speech this morning was a remarkable exercise in lack of logic, in lack of sense and indeed, Mr. Speaker, in lack of honesty. When he was trying to show how much everybody wanted he included not only the additional cost under FISP for universality that some of us advocate, not only the increases in pension costs, but also talked about a guaranteed annual income, something which has never come into this debate. I just wonder whether he should fire his speech writers and advisers because they stopped short. Why did they not include the cost of housing, the cost of post-secondary education, the cost of pollution, the cost of everything else? He would have had a great budget in that case and he could have beaten his poor breast a little harder. Uriah Heap had nothing on this minister.

Because he is trying to suggest to the middle income groups that he is really their champion, what does he do? I say this with great sadness, and I use strong language. He does the most disgusting thing he could have done, and that is to appeal to the anti-welfare backlash in this country.

If there is any logic at all in what he said, let me say to him that his bill, with the maze and mess administratively that it is, is only an invitation to abuse. Anyone who knows anything at all about law or about administration knows perfectly well that if the administration is simple, abuse is difficult—you cannot get away with anything. But if the administration is complicated, abuse is a lot easier. There are loopholes you can get through. You can deny that you have made $200, that your wife has made $200, or deny other things much more easily than you could have under the previous plan.

The minister knows that a complicated bill will make abuse easier. Then why in heaven's name should he talk about it? Why does he talk about it except to try to throw sand in the eyes of many people who think that this bill is a retrograde step? There are many people in his constituency, many workers in his city, who know that what he is doing in this bill is diddling the people of Hamilton and the people of Canada.

[Mr. Rynard.]

Then he reminds us that only 11 per cent of the people in Canada make incomes over $10,000. We have been saying that to this government and to the Conservative government that preceded it ever since I have been active in politics. We have been saying to these people that the kind of system they promote concentrates income and wealth in an ever smaller group of the population. He is not telling me anything new when he tells me that only 11 per cent—and I am a little surprised it is as high as that—have incomes above $10,000. But what he did not tell us, and what he carefully avoided telling us, is the proportion of the total income in Canada, the percentage of the total wealth in Canada, over which this small group of people actually have control. It is about 30 per cent, compared with his figure of 11 per cent of the population.

FISP is a tax on the middle income groups, and the minister is hypocritical when he warns those groups about taxing them. He is taxing them in this bill when he takes from them the payment that would otherwise have been made to them. It is a regressive tax because it is a tax that falls only on those who have children. That is why it is a regressive and undesirable tax.

Here we are talking about the middle income groups. Ages ago we used to speak about such people being fairly rich, but now we are talking about people making between $7,000 and $11,000 a year, and that in modern society is not very much.

May I remind this minister who undoubtedly reads history, particularly the history of the Liberal party, with a great deal of attention and pleasure, that when the late Mackenzie King introduced family allowances in the first place he reduced the tax exemption for a child in receipt of family allowance from $500 to $300.

We are told in books that Mackenzie King sometimes consulted certain mediums. May I suggest that this minister consult the ghost of Mackenzie King because even from that gentleman he could learn a great deal, and he has been dead for some years. That is the way to handle this matter. When you have a universal family allowance plan you should deal with the tax system as was done in 1944-45. You do not deal with it as the minister does.

The minister says that all the increases in welfare and in family security that we advocate will cost a lot of money, and asks where will the money come from except from the middle income groups? I want to tell him where it can come from, Mr. Speaker. He is right when he says it could only come from the middle income groups so long as his government is in power, because that is the only place that his government will go for the money.

Mr. Munro: I did not say that.

Mr. Lewis: So long as the squire from Mount Royal is Prime Minister of Canada, the only people who will be taxed will be the middle income groups. But if you had a government that was oriented toward the people of Canada, that was honestly concerned about improving the lot of the ordinary Canadian, there would, let me tell the minister, be no mystery about where the money could come from.

On a national accounts basis this year we are to collect, after the last budget, 50 per cent of our federal revenue from individual taxpayers and only 12 per cent from corporations. Just ten years ago we collected about 41 per cent from individuals and somewhere around 20 per cent from corporations. Twenty years ago we collected about 28 per cent from individual taxpayers and 27 per cent from corporations, and about 25 or 30 years ago we collected about 27 per cent from individuals and 28 per cent, 29 per cent or 30 per cent from corporations. This government and the Tory government that preceded it in 1963 introduced tax systems which have consistently squeezed a larger and larger proportion of federal revenue out of individual taxpayers and consistently reduced the proportion that comes from corporations.

• (1220)

What is the result of this kind of tax system? The result is that in 1969, the latest year for which there are figures, 46 per cent of all Canadian corporations did not pay a single, solitary cent in income tax.

Mr. Nystrom: And people call this a just society.

Mr. Lewis: Of the mining and oil corporations in Canada, 78 per cent did not pay a single sou in income tax to the federal treasury. Poor Shell Oil Company, Mr. Speaker, one of the underprivileged, impoverished multinational corporations of the world, made about $250 million in profits in the five-year period between 1964 and 1969 but did not pay a single, solitary cent in income tax to the federal treasury. One might assume that Shell Oil would be philanthropic; well, it was not. Falconbridge mines in the same period made a profit of about $250 million and paid $15 million in income tax; that represents a tax rate of 6 per cent. And, if that was not enough, the company shortly thereafter obtained a $4 million grant from the federal treasury. That was a gift from the people of Canada to another impoverished corporation in Canada.

Mr. Gilbert: How do you like that, Murray? Are you not proud?

Mr. Lewis: The tax cuts and other goodies the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) provided for the corporations of this country a little while ago will save them $500 million in the first year and $700 million in the second year. He has given them $1.2 billion which they do not need, as profits in the last six months have been going up, up and up without ceasing. They have increased by between 30 per cent and 40 per cent over what they were in the similar period one year ago. The minister has handed $1.2 billion to the corporations. This is money which they do not need, money which will not create any employment, money which has been given to manufacturing and processing concerns that are now working at less than capacity. I say to the government that if that $1.2 billion were used to help the poor in Canada and middle income groups of Canada, not only would there be greater justice in our society but the economy would be a great deal better off and unemployment would be reduced.

I remind the minister also of the handouts this government has given corporations every year. The total amount, including tax concessions, etc., is about $2 billion every year. We have given handouts through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. According to a preliminary study undertaken by a young professor who did a conscientious job, handouts of $200 million, $300 million and $400 million a year under DREE have brought almost no benefit to the areas of this country concerned. We hand out hundreds of millions of dollars under all sorts of programs. These handouts to corporations altogether total about $2 billion a year, Mr. Speaker. I emphasize this. I say that that is where the money is to be found, that is from where it should come. Let us stop this welfare system for the wealthy corporations of this country, most of them foreign-owned, and let us bring in some welfare for the ordinary people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, when you look carefully at the budget which the Minister of Finance presented you will arrive at a significant and important conclusion, and if any member of the Liberal party is not shaken by that conclusion he has lost his marbles, lost his humanity, or perhaps lost both.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If he had any marbles or humanity to begin with.

Mr. Lewis: When you read the budget speech of the Minister of Finance and peruse the accompanying material, you will find that the corporations of Canada will contribute in 1972-73, on a budgetary basis, 15 per cent of the total federal revenue. If you look at another chart in the budgetary material, you will find that the federal government will pay out 15 per cent of all federal expenditures to the corporations. It will pay that much to them under what is called economic development and support. Economic development and support obviously means various handouts to corporations under DREE, under other development grants, under defence industry programs and includes, I must add, manpower training grants which undoubtedly would be desirable if the program were planned properly.

I want to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to this: Corporations will contribute 15 per cent toward revenues; corporations will take 15 per cent of the expenditures. In the result, the corporations of Canada will contribute nothing at all to family allowances, old age pensions, medicare, hospital insurance programs or to any of those humane schemes that reluctant governments have been forced to put on the statute books. That is the result of this government's policies. One can readily see where the money can be found.

The money is there, Mr. Speaker, the funds are there, the revenues are there, and the necessary wealth is there. This is a great country, a rich country, a wonderful country. The minister cannot do what I assume in his heart he would like to do, namely, deal justly and decently with the people of Canada, because the funds, the wealth, are in the wrong hands. They are in a few corporate hands in this country and the government does not have the guts to open those hands and take for Canada the money that is in them.

Let me tell the minister of another way to obtain revenue. The government could obtain more if it were to reduce unemployment significantly. The Economic Council of Canada said two or three years ago that every percentage point of unemployment means a loss to us of $1.5 billion per year. Today that loss is probably slightly more in view of increased prices of various sorts. Every percentage point of unemployment means at least a loss of $1.5 billion. Every $1.5 billion that is lost to us represents a loss to the federal treasury of approximately $500 million, $600 million or $700 million; I do not know exactly how much is lost that way. If unemployment, instead of being at more than 6 per cent on a seasonally adjusted basis, were to be down to 3 per cent, the minister would have all the revenue he needs for a proper family allowances plan and a proper old age pension plan, and there would be no need to impose additional taxes on the middle income groups of this country.

What has this government permitted? It has deliberately created loopholes for corporations that cost the treasury about $400 million each year. It has deliberately cut the taxes of corporations, and these tax cuts will cost the treasury $500 million and $700 million a year for two years. We are talking about $1 billion, roughly. It has deliberately given the mining and oil corporations tax holidays without end. These, according to the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans), cost the federal treasury between $300 million and $400 million per year. I heard the other day that Steep Rock mines in northern Ontario was very interested in the three-year tax holiday which is given to the mining corporations of Canada. What did that company do? It had what you and I and anybody else would call one mine. It divided this into three parts, opened the first third and got a three-year tax holiday. When that holiday ended it opened the second third and obtained an additional three-year tax holiday. When that was ended it opened the final third and got another three-year tax holiday. So, instead of obtaining a three-year tax holiday it got a nine-year tax holiday, Mr. Speaker. I understand that the operation was a strip mining or surface mining operation. The company is now considering sinking some shafts, calling it a fourth mine and asking for another three-year tax holiday.

The tax system for which this government is responsible makes that kind of tax avoidance possible. It gives these benefits to corporations. It deliberately creates massive unemployment that brings further losses in production and in revenue, and then it stands there and cries shamelessly "where is the money to come from." The money is there, Mr. Speaker. It is there in the corporations. It is there in the country and the government will not do anything about it.

The real problem that faces the minister and the country with respect to social security programs is that for many years, instead of doing the humane and decent thing of adjusting those programs year by year in accordance with the cost of living increase and the standard of living increase, we sat back and let the same inadequate amount be paid year after year for tens of years, as we did in this case. Suddenly we arrive in 1972, an election year, and the government feels that it ought to do something. They sit down and make calculations and find that if they are to increase the $6 that is now paid for the cost of living increase this figure must be increased to $15. Therefore you get a 150 per cent jump in one year. To increase the $8 now paid for the cost of living increase the figure must be increased to $20. Again there is a 150 per cent increase in one year. That is what is wrong with our system and the way we do things.

If we had increased the $6 to $7 or $7.50 and then to $9 the second year as the cost of living, the gross national product and the standard of living went up, and increased the family allowance year by year in accordance with the increase of wealth in this country, no one would have to make the kind of calculations which the minister had to make this morning. The increase would be related to what is happening in our economy and to prices. The people would have been dealt with fairly.

What good is it to a family whose children are now grown up who were in hardship all the years the $6 meant less and less year after year until we reached 1972 when it does not mean anything at all? What good is it for the family who lived through those hardships without getting the increases? Justice demands universality. Decency demands universality. Unity demands universality.

The miserable excuses which the minister has trotted out in this and other speeches are meaningless. They are without validity and without meaning. They are the hapless cry of a guilty conscience that is now trying to make political hay out of a situation that the minister knows will not come to him. In fact, we are rearing the point which makes it impolite for me to describe precisely the present state.

The minister talked about our fooling the middle income people. We are not trying to fool them. It is a simple fact that many of the voters in the minister's constituency, Hamilton East, who work for Stelco, Defasco, Westinghouse, in other plants or anywhere else will not receive a penny in family allowance. It is shameful and criminal that that is the way we are going to treat a large proportion of the voters in the minister's own riding. That is why he makes the speeches he does. The minister knows perfectly well that those people resent what he is doing to them. They see that he is adding a tax on to them through this bill. Therefore, he is trying to build up a case for himself. No one, even people who are sometimes called tough, will really begrudge a poor, suffering conscience like that of the minister from looking for an excuse and seeking to get out of this terrible, immoral morass into which the minister and his colleagues have gotten themselves. I am really sorry for the minister. He looks like such a nice guy. He talks as though he really wants to do something. However, after his speech is over the substance which he produced is as disappointing as the poor excuses he tried to make.

My colleagues and I see no excuse for the destruction of the principle of universality. We do not see anything which the minister can boast about in bringing up the family allowance to the level at which the cost of living would have brought it up anyway. We see only sadness in a situation which will divide people and again hurt people who ought not to be hurt. The Minister of National Health and Welfare cannot possibly persuade anyone with intelligence and any kind of social conscience that his FISP bill is anything other than a miserable destruction of the important principle of universality, anything other than neglect for a large number of the children of this country, or that it will assist the poor in Canada as they ought to be assisted. All the minister is doing is enabling them to buy as much in 1972 as they were able to buy some 12, 15 or 20 years ago.

I oppose the bill now as I did then. I am only sorry that the minister is engaging in the kind of argument he has advanced. I suggest to him it is saddening and rather undignified to see him in constant convolution trying to make sense and decency out of a bill that has neither.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to speak to the topic now before the House which, to my mind, is one of the most important ever discussed here.

Family allowances were given the Canadian people in 1945, I believe and they have remained practically the same since. In fact, they were increased by approximately $1 whereas the cost of living has gone up by about 300 per cent.

Now, we see that the minister wants to reduce families to the level of dollars because he reduces family allowances to a matter of dollars and cents. The minister does not know where he will get the money needed to pay those allowances.

But families are worth more than dollars. If there is anything truly concrete, truly great, truly noble, the family is. In fact, were it not for the family, governments would not exist. The population is made up of families. The family has the right to live, it needs all the state can do for it. The needs that should be given priority in our economy are those of the family.

All the speeches we have heard the minister deliver on family allowances are imbued with the fear of lack of money to ensure a decent life to the children of Canada from the uncalculable resources the whole country would have to distribute. We rightfully claim that such an approach to the problem of family income security and family allowances is depressing and absurd, even though it represents the thinking of our most intelligent members of Parliament who endeavoured to summarize government policy in a notorious white paper which was communicated to the population a year ago, published after wide research in the fields of university, administration and legislation. Now let us look at the results. They are offering an extra $170 million, a staggering amount for Canada's 7 million children under 17, the third of a population with a national product of $92 billion in 1971-72 and a production of over $100 billion in 1972-73.

They don't know where to get the money! With an increase by $8 billion in the gross national product in 1972-73, they are wondering where they will find money to help families. But they fail to realize that if we give more money to the families through family allowances they will not keep it but they will spend it.

• (1240)

By doing so, we would give a new impetus to the economy. Families would pay 12 per cent sales tax to the federal government and 8 per cent to the provincial government—I am thinking of the Quebec government—in addition to all kinds of direct and indirect taxes.

We do not know how to raise money, but we forget that payments made to families would be recovered by the treasury.

Mr. Speaker, having increased by $170 million the allowances paid to the 7 million children under 18 and following an increased production of $8 billion for next year, we forget that 50 per cent of Canadians are unemployed and cannot purchase the goods available in stores and warehouses. We must keep in mind that giving money to families will be the best investment ever made in the history of our economy.

We have funds for the Opportunities for Youth program. This morning I received two telegrams from citizens who asked me to see that things are straightened out because some persons have received grants under this program and they are spending it on orgies. We are witnessing the corruption of our youth. There is plenty of money to corrupt youth, but none whatsoever to support families.

But, national production from 1944 to 1945 amounted to $12 billion only and it has increased to $92 billion in 1971. It will reach $100 billion in 1972.

In 1944, an hon. member's basic salary was $4,000 and we are now drawing some $26,000—nearly seven times more. But family allowances have remained at the same rate. In fact, we take decisions according to our judgment and knowledge.

The salaries of members of Parliament and of many other people have kept pace with the ever increasing cost of living, but family allowances have been left aside. What could be more important, more easily perceived and more human than the family, for it constitutes the basis of society.

The revenues of judges, ministers of the Crown, university graduates, accountants, economists are all geared to rise with the cost of living and the national product; but in the case of our children—they account for one third of our population—the same family allowance rates apply as in 1944-45 when the GNP had an estimated value of only $12 billion, seven or eight times less than today. Yet, we live in the year 1972-73.

Mr. Ouellet: Right you are!

Mr. Latulippe: Therefore, it seems to me that, about a matter of such importance as guaranteed personal and family income, all the members chosen by the people of Canada to represent them in this House, all equally interested in the well-being of every one of the 23 million citizens living in Canada, in their constituencies, should get together because the most important of all economic questions is that one, a guaranteed personal income based on our national product, brought about by the development of our natural and national resources, by means of the capital and the labour invested by the active adults of our land.

If at long last we would realize that the life of our fellow Canadians is as important as the capital and the labour of the makers of our national product, we would at least have taken the first step towards a balanced economy, a balanced economic security.

• (1250)

In the various sectors of our economy, we could at last hopefully foresee the end of inflation, unemployment and poverty by putting the needed economic blood in the hands of the true consumers who are the families.

But all that, Mr. Speaker, requires the acknowledgment of the first objective of all government and parliamentary activities: to guarantee the income security and the life of every living citizen, every human being. This is the first objective of our government. The life of the citizens must have priority over capital—the minister should know that—even over labour because where can we find capital and labour if the citizen has no life?

If we protected so much the capital, the guaranteed income and the work of each individual, why should we not take more care of the life of every citizen even if they have neither work nor money? This is the main concern of any sound, honest and logical administration, of any efficient legislation. This is the main question which should interest all government members elected by the same nation numbering about 23 million at the present time, all having the right to live before being entitled to work and to have money.

Life must come before everything. It is because there are citizens that we have a country, provinces and municipalities.

If capital has an existence which differs from that of human beings, if work exists as an expression of man, life is the foundation of this man's existence and the base of his work or of his capital. Without life, capital and work are impossible for a citizen.

Life deserves our attention; it must be the first objective of our national economic administration as it is the first expression of each citizen's existence even before he is able to work or own capital.

Life first, work afterwards. Is this the order we follow in the hierarchy of our administrative priorities? It is not surprising that there is a lack of economic balance, that capital has to cope with inflation, that work is affected by the changes in the unemployment rate and that the lives of citizens are threatened by the obtrusive presence of dishonouring and depressing poverty.

This is a situation which prevails in many Canadian families. This is how the more we progress the more we go backward in the battle against inflation, unemployment and poverty. We simply take everything backward and cannot see straight. We try to protect capital and work before protecting the citizen. We are considering the scale of values the wrong way. We think we are going up but we continue to slide. Mr. Speaker, this is where we must intervene with all our might, with all our being. We must claim respect for our legal family rights and the establishment of the genuine just society for the family. This is why everywhere capital becomes more and more important, in volume and in revenue, to the detriment of personal incomes which are increasingly taxed, to the detriment of the way of life of citizens without work or money, who become more and more impoverished by the rising cost of living. Citizens too young, too old, too sick are unable to earn their living either through work or through capital.

We are rich, Mr. Speaker, and we live in poverty. The hon. minister should understand that. This can be remedied by the simple conversion of the guaranteed personal income, by the vital personal right of each family, taking into account the decision we will reach here, in Parliament, the members elected by the people of Canada for a period of five years ending around mid-July 1973.

The decision is up to us; no other citizen of Canada can be held responsible for this decision. Everybody has had the chance to have his say in the many royal commissions held in the last ten years. Research councils and white papers have done their job. Now is the hour of action, of legislation, of administration, in short, the establishment of a new economic order which depends on us only.

If capital is very well treated by every kind of companies and labour unions, the fact remains that every citizen's right to live must be defended with energy and protected permanently by the provisions of Bill C-170 which cannot be adopted without due consideration.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. it being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

COMMENT ON EXPERIMENTAL BILINGUAL ORDER PAPER—SUGGESTED EXTENSION TO "HANSARD"

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I take this opportunity to congratulate Your Honour on having supplied hon. members with a sample of a bilingual order of the day, which format exists already in the case of bills and committee proceedings. I trust that this practice will soon extend to Hansard and the Votes and Proceedings of the House.

CANADIAN CULTURE

CONSERVATION OF DOCUMENTS DONATED BY RIGHT HON. MEMBER FOR PRINCE ALBERT—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the House is already aware of the government's interest in all matters affecting cultural development in Canada. In the past few years this interest has become apparent in areas such as publishing, museums, films, the purchase of collections and the award of grants to cultural institutions. Other matters are being studied, some of which are of such importance that certain acts will have to be amended and we shall table these amendments in the House at the appropriate time.

Some time ago we were informed of a suggestion which will certainly interest the House of Commons. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) decided some time ago to offer to the University of Saskatchewan his collections of documents, books and other items relating to his term of office. The university expressed the desire, not only to accept these collections, but to locate them in a setting worthy of their importance. In order to do so it would be necessary to construct a building on the university campus at a cost of some $600,000. The organizers of this project are making every effort to obtain half of this sum from the private sector and they propose that the remaining $300,000 be contributed by the federal government. This suggestion has been studied by our services and negotiations are now under way between the Public Archives, the University of Saskatchewan and the Department of the Secretary of State.

On the basis of this suggestion, I have asked the officials of the Department of the Secretary of State to submit to me a general policy on the question of documents which prime ministers decide to donate to private institutions, as was done by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett whose papers are now deposited in the archives of the University of New Brunswick.

However, while these negotiations are still taking place, I wish to inform the House of Commons that the government is most willing to continue its discussions with the University of Saskatchewan, so that the right hon. member's very generous gift can be placed in a setting appropriate to the important contribution he has made to the development of this country.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know the statement made by the Secretary of State will be received with delight by members of the House. As a general proposition it is, of course, very important that we preserve and develop a sense of the history of our country as well as an understanding of our country. As my fellow Nova Scotian, the late Joseph Howe, said so well many years ago, a wise nation honours her great men.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: The right hon. member for Prince Albert already holds a very proud place in our history, and it would certainly be very inadequate and inaccurate for me to describe my right hon. friend as an historic figure because, in addition to his proud place in our history, he continues to be a very strong public force in our contemporary life. So, my few words today are not intended as an obituary or as a summing up of the right hon. gentleman's career, because I am certain there will be a few more papers and documents added to the collection we are discussing today.

• (1410)

I should like to say simply that the recognition of the right hon. gentleman's contribution, and the respect and admiration for the right hon. gentleman, is shared by Canadians and that the recognition, respect and admiration for him transcend far beyond party lines in this country. I am happy, therefore, at the decision of the government and I believe it will give pleasure throughout the land. The right hon. member has made a generous gift. It is reassuring to know that it will be properly housed and displayed, thereby deepening the understanding of Canadians of their country and of this very unique Canadian. It is appropriate, of course, that this collection be housed in the university to which the right hon. gentleman is devoting his service and his talent as chancellor. I believe that this move to strengthen the culture of our country is one which every member of this House will approve without reservation. I congratulate the Secretary of State and the government, and I express the hope that the library to be built will make ample provision for an expanding collection.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition said that he was not indulging in an obituary. My comment on that is that there are many young people in Canada who envy the liveliness and the vibrant presence of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). One of the great strengths of the democratic system, one of the attributes of our system that distinguishes it so fundamentally from other systems, is that men and women who disagree strongly about social and political objectives and philosophies none the less respect each other and honour each other as citizens of the world and as citizens of Canada. I want to say without any hesitation whatever that I add my words to those expressed about the right hon. gentleman's contribution to this institution and to Canada as a whole.

I sometimes think, Sir, that there are three categories of politicians. First, there is the serious, hardworking politician who serves his constituency and the country. Second, there is the one who may have the joie de vivre and who makes of political activity a kind of interesting game; and the third, one who has the capacity to combine both. I think that the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert has the capacity to combine earnest service to his constituency and to the country with a liveliness of attitude and of expression that makes of politics a joy rather than a chore. That is a great contribution, Mr. Speaker.

Finally, sir, I also wish to congratulate the Secretary of State, not only for his action with respect to the papers and documents of the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, but for having done more than honouring one person by giving a proper place to safeguard important documents of the history of this country, which is obviously a desirable objective. Canada's history, unlike that of many other nations, consists less of victorious generals, admirals and the like, and much more of victorious people in the building of a decent society. That is why, with others, I greet the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, and am so proud of my country.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join my colleagues in thanking the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) for offering his collection of documents, books and other objects relating to his term of office. His gesture is doubtless very eloquent and the Canadian people will have the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the activities of this statesman.

To my mind, the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier)is right, in a way, in taking steps to locate those documents in a worthy setting. The minister did not specify whether the proposed building will be used only for that collection or other ends. In any event, I believe this is a positive measure which should be repeated in the future.

[English]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I find great difficulty in expressing my deep feelings of appreciation to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) for the announcement he has made, to my leader, the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), and to the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise). If I were to express everything that is in my heart, it could be embodied in a few lines. This day reveals the true meaning of Parliament. Each of us here is trying to make his or her contribution to a greater Canada.

Naturally I am most grateful, personally. This announcement came as a complete surprise to me. Again I thank one and all for what has been said, and as Chancellor of the University of Saskatchewan I know I speak for the entire company of scholars of that university when I say how grateful that institution will be for what the Secretary of State has announced. From the bottom of my heart, Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. gentlemen. This is a day, for me, to be remembered.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PENSION INCREASES FOR RETIRED EMPLOYEES—PROPOSED CHANGES IN PENSION PLAN

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the President of Canadian National Railways that the company is announcing today that pensions, including pensions received by widows, will be increased to take into account increases in the cost of living since 1969.

• (1420)

Members may recall that effective January 1, 1971, Canadian National pensions were increased by 2 per cent for each year of retirement up to 1969, and in some cases by a larger percentage. The increases to be announced by the company today will, from January, 1972, add 4 per cent to all current pensions that were in force on December 31, 1970; and 2 per cent to current pensions that first came into force during the year ending December 31, 1971. Combined with the action taken in 1971, the effect is that CN pensions will have been increased by 2 per cent for each year of retirement throughout the period 1935-71. I am also informed that the General Chairmen's Association, representing all union members in CN, has submitted proposals for changes in the company's pension plan and these proposals are currently under discussion by the CN Pension Board. Among them is one to escalate pensions because of the higher cost of living.

The announcement by Canadian National of increased pensions is in response to that proposal and to the strong representations made by the General Chairmen on the Pension Board that action be taken as quickly as possible. I might add, parenthetically, Mr. Speaker, that undoubtedly there were strong pressures from this House, as well. The Pension Board has expressed the view that similar adjustments of existing pensions should be made in the future. I understand the union members of the Pension Board welcome this response to their representations.

With regard to the pension formula and other improvements proposed by the General Chairmen's Association, their representatives on the Pension Board are hopeful that further changes to the pension rules will follow. Mr. MacMillan advises me that historically changes proposed by the Pension Board have been implemented. In any event, negotiations with unions representing major groups of employees are due to open well before the year end, at which time any unresolved question is expected to be a bargaining issue.

Having regard to on-going discussions in the Pension Board and the opening of negotiations in the fall, I hope that all hon. members will agree that these matters should be left to labour and management to be resolved in that process. The President of CN also informs me that several changes have been made in the Pension Plan and its administration, through agreement reached through the Pension Board, since the 1970 report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. One of those changes I have already mentioned: the 1971 escalation of 32,000 pensions. In addition, early retirement rules were improved; the 1959 plan was again reopened to members of the 1935 plan and 9,000 employees transferred; age and service requirements for survivor benefits were eliminated for employees killed in the performance of duty and the Pension Board has been reconstituted to give equal representation to union and management, with each side including a pensioner in its membership and designating a co-chairman. In 1972, the company's costs for pension plans are expected to be at least $50 million, an increase of $17 million, or 50 per cent over the last two years.

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, we in this party welcome the minister's announcement of the long overdue increases in Canadian National pensions. I think it is a tribute to the workings of the parliamentary system that there was unanimous support for this from all sides of the House. As a result of the report on pensions the Standing Committee brought down some years ago, and through the efforts of the minister, this breakthrough has been accomplished. I hope that benefits will continue to flow from this report in the years to come.

The increase in pensions will be welcomed by all those pensioners whose pensions, which were far from adequate when they were first established, have been eroded because of inflation which has gone unchecked for the past four or five years. These increases will be welcome news for them, but I point out to the minister that they are little enough. These increases do not offset increases in the cost of living, which run between 3.5 per cent and 4 per cent per year, nor will they offset any purchasing power pensioners have lost over the years as a result of inflation.

I am encouraged by the statement that the matter of escalating pensions is to be a continuing subject of discussion by the Pension Board. I am hopeful the minister will use his influence to persuade the pension board that the very least that should be built into the CNR pension plan is a provision for the automatic escalation of pensions to cover the cost of living. It is an anomalous and distressing situation that these pensioners should be the pawns of Parliament and have to come to us hat in hand to ask for increases in their pensions which should be given to them as a matter of right because of the inflationary situation we have today. I hope the minister will use his influence to persuade the pension board to recommend that this provision be built into the CN pension plan.

I also hope that the minister will use his influence with the Canadian Pacific Railways. The CPR is not mentioned in the minister's statement, naturally, but I hope the minister will be able to prevail upon the CPR to take some action.

I am a bit disturbed by the announcement concerning the pension plan for those now employed by CNR. It is stated that since this matter will come up for negotiation this fall, probably we should leave it this way. Representations were made during the committee hearings. The union took the position that pension adjustments or increases were properly a matter for negotiation. After talking to CNR workers, my impression is that they are not satisfied the pension scheme has been given proper attention in negotiations. I strongly urge the minister to consider this matter. If something satisfactory does not develop as a result of the negotiations this fall, some action must be taken to protect the employees who feel they are not being given a proper break. This escalation provision should be built into their pension scheme so that escalation becomes a matter of right.

I congratulate the minister on this announcement. I ask him not to rest here, but to continue to press the CNR and CPR to bring their pension schemes up to a comparable level with those which prevail in industry.

C.N.R. Pension Increases

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, December 19, 1969, when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) announced a formula for increasing the pensions of retired civil servants, and again on Friday, February 5, 1971, when the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) announced increases in the pensions of retired Canadian National Railways employees that were then being put into effect, I did not hesitate to rise in my place, congratulate both of these ministers and express appreciation for what was being done. I must say, however, that I can hardly be expected to leap for joy today over what the Minister of Transport has now announced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This statement is reasonably lengthy. It makes many references to matters still under discussion about which something might be done in the future. It also recites, as a matter of history, a number of things that have been done in the past couple of years. However, with regard to what was announced today in terms of actual dollars and cents, all we have been told is that the arrangement to escalate CNR pensions by 2 per cent for each year of retirement has been brought up to date by two years. That is all it does. This means that those who got the increase that was provided a little over a year ago will receive increases based on 2 per cent per year or for the two years, 4 per cent but that does not mean 4 per cent of what they are now getting. It is 4 per cent of their basic pension which was established years ago. It means that those who retired in 1970 will get a 4 per cent increase, while those who retired in 1971 will get a 2 per cent increase. That is all it does, and the minister has the gall to say that this is being done to enable these pensioners to cope with the increase in the cost of living. Even old age pensions and veterans pensions are being increased in accordance with the actual rise in the cost of living or in other words, by 3.6 per cent. But these retired employees are being asked to settle for 2 per cent in a year in which the cost of living increased by 3.6 per cent, or 4 per cent over two years in which the cost of living increased by 7 or 8 per cent or more.

• (1430)

I therefore say to the minister that though, like the last speaker, I am prepared to welcome anything which is given to pensioners, when it will amount only to a dollar or two a month, as it will in many cases, I am sure he will not expect me to shout for joy; I am sure he will not think it incumbent upon me to express great appreciation of what has been done. I think the minister should go back to his office, get Mr. Norman MacMillan on the phone and tell him this is not good enough. A lot more has to be done.

The escalation of railway pensions has to be put on a permanent basis. It should not be a case of this being done every year or so when ever the opposition gets tough on the CNR financing bill. Escalation of the pensions of employees must be related to the cost of living. It is not good enough to give a 2 per cent increase when the cost of living goes up by 3 or 4 per cent. The time has come for an adjustment in the basic pension plan so that there will be a factor of at least 2 per cent for every year of service an employee has worked. These questions have been under discussion across the country, so the CNR management and the pension board understand them just as well as anyone in this House. They know, even before the minister telephones Montreal, that this increase is not satisfactory and that it will not be satisfactory to the employees who have retired. Yes, we are always glad to see increases in pensions, even a dollar or two, but this is not good enough and I call on the minister to make this fact known to the CNR.

I know it is about time for me to resume my seat, Mr. Speaker. Like the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) I suggest to the Minister of Transport that he should not tell us he has no influence over the CPR. The CPR is not the government of the country. The cabinet over there is the government. It is time for the government to tell the CPR to put the pensions of its employees on a just, proper and humane basis, and to do it now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to congratulate the hon. minister for announcing the decisions reached by the CN in respect of its retired employees' pensions. We should normally rejoice since this project provides increased payments, but actually the increase is so small, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (M. Knowles) has pointed out, that judgment really calls for some qualifications.

The CN estimates that its pensions schemes will cost at least $50 million, that is an increase of $17 million. But these amounts are not so considerable if we take into account the great contributions made by CN employees as well as the messing about that has been going on for a long time in the pension fund. It is known that these pensioners have asked the government to compel the CN to repay into the fund an amount of $675 million it had borrowed for 60 years at 4 per cent interest.

Everyone is aware that Social Crediters are against levying interest on new credits or savings. As regards the $675 million loan the CN has obtained from the pensioners' fund at 4 per cent interest for a period of 60 years, we think it has gone a little bit too far and this is why the CN is egged on today to grant a small increase of $1.50 or $2.

Another important point which should be raised, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that before the 1968 elections, the CN had received the support of some government members to distract from its pensioners' fund an amount of $371 million.

We therefore rejoice—as I said earlier—at what is happening today to pensioners, but we hope that the hon. minister will make a statement informing us when the CN intends to repay into the fund the $675 million it has borrowed at 4 per cent interest and when it will repay the $371 million which it also had to borrow and which appear nowhere and can to a certain extent be construed as a theft.

I therefore ask the minister to make another statement in the near future.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

COMPENSATION TO PRAIRIE FARMERS FOR LOSS RESULTING FROM INCREASED VALUE OF DOLLAR—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43. My motion is related to further recent increases in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar resulting in a total increase of 10 cents over the past two years. I have made calculations which show that every increase of one cent costs prairie farmers $10 million and that an increase of 10 cents costs prairie farmers $100 million a year. Thus, I move:

That this House urges the Government of Canada to give early consideration to the provision of compensation to Canadian farmers to offset the loss of income caused by falling export prices brought about by the rising exchange value of the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

PROTEST RESPECTING FILM "DUPLESSIS ET APRÈS"—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43.

I ask unanimous consent of the House to move an urgent motion concerning a film which has been showing for a few weeks in several Canadian theatres, and particularly at the Comédie canadienne theatre, entitled "Duplessis et après . . ." This film was made by the National Film Board with the taxpayers' money—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member must state his motion. He cannot make an argument to support a motion which he intends to submit to the House.

Mr. Rondeau: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

All along that film, fun is made on institutions—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should take into consideration the suggestion which I have just made to him. He cannot make an argument, and can simply state as quickly as possible what his motion is.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I move:

That this House do issue an order giving the committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts an opportunity to study the policy and administration of the National Film Board, which produced the film "Duplessis et après . . .", a revolutionary film which ridicules the religious institutions of Quebec, the Liberal party, the Union nationale, the Social Credit party, and—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

POSSIBLE FORGIVENESS OF OVERPAYMENTS TO FARMERS UNDER LIFT PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It concerns a revelation in the latest report of the Auditor General that a large automobile manufacturer received forgiveness of a debt to the treasury amounting to $6 million.

I therefore move, seconded by my hon. friend from Regina East:

That the government give serious consideration to forgiving under Section 17 of the Financial Administration Act, overpayments made to 4,000 western grain producers, to a total amount of $540,000, under Operation Lift.

ADMINISTRATIVE REVIEW BOARD

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH BODY TO REVIEW GRIEVANCES OF PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-226, to establish an administrative review board.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Rose: Briefly, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to correct the present situation under which the grievance of a public servant against a departmental superior usually filters down to the individual who made the original decision. This bill envisions a distinct and separate appellate body with powers similar to those granted in the case of war disability pensions to the Pension Review Board.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR RELATIONS

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—POSSIBLE NON-COMPLIANCE OF UNION WITH ARBITRATION AWARD—GOVERNMENT POSITION—CONTINGENCY PLANS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour what his position is at the present time regarding the dispute in the St. Lawrence ports. Is it the position of the minister that he is simply hoping that the award made by the arbiter, Judge Gold, will be complied with?

Hon. Martin P. O'Connell (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the arbitration hearings have been concluded. Judge Alan B. Gold is in the course of preparing his report, and I think all hon. members would agree that it would be improper for me to comment while this process is reaching its final stages.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the reported intention of the union not to comply with the award, has the minister met with the union officials and discussed with them whether their attitude is correctly reported?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I expect that the parties to this dispute will come to their senses following the publication of the award and that they will comply with it.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's statement of hope, but his failure to be able to give me a more positive answer to the question I have just asked him, has the minister any contingency plan—I ask him this question today since he is not due to be in the House tomorrow—in the event that the arbiter's award is not complied with and the reported intention of the union, which apparently the minister has not checked, turns out to be correct?

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, the government has under consideration all of the options available to it in light of the award of the arbitrator.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—EFFECT ON MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—CONTINGENCY PLANS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board which arose from a question I put to him last week. Has the minister or the Wheat Board been able to devise methods for moving grain to offset the export losses that have resulted from the closure of these ports?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House at the last opportunity, the remaining ports are operating to the maximum of their capacity in attempting to move the grain. There is, of course, a resultant delay for some of the ships coming in to collect grain.

Mr. Gleave: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister assure the House that he has further contingency plans underway if this tie-up at these ports is not immediately settled?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is repeating a question which was asked previously.

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—ALLEGED ACCUSATION BY REPRESENTATIVE OF MONTREAL AUTHORITIES AGAINST FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary to the Prime Minister.

A representative of the municipal authorities of Montreal yesterday charged the federal government with failing to intervene in the longshoremen conflict for political reasons. That is a statement which, in my opinion, is absolutely indecent. Did the Prime Minister answer that wanton charge from a representative of the Montreal municipal authorities?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret not having been aware of the statement. I did not know that it had been made, but I thank the hon. member for having pointed it to me. I will examine it and answer it if necessary.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

QUEBEC—LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BEFORE ADJOURNMENT OF HOUSE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister in connection with that conflict.

As a result of the serious situation and the considerable damages in Quebec, especially in the port of Montreal, I would like to ask him if he intends to let the House adjourn before the settlement of that conflict?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is an adjournment motion on the order paper which will be called tomorrow, if necessary.

Mr. Valade: I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to ask the Minister of Labour if, as a result of that serious situation, he intends to make a statement before the adjournment of the House so that the people, the press and Parliament be informed of the exact situation and the steps the government intends to take to settle that conflict.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IMPENDING NUCLEAR TEST BY FRANCE—POSSIBLE EXPLOSION OF DEVICE—FURTHER TESTS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would he inform the House whether France has exploded a nuclear device in the South Pacific, contrary to the requests of nations of the world such as Canada and the countries of South America, and has the minister or the government any official or other information with regard to France's intentions respecting further nuclear tests in the area?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the French government has refused so far to confirm that any of the tests have been made, but we have every reason to believe that at least one has been made. We do not have any means of detecting explosions in the atmosphere, but we have been told that an explosion has already occurred, so we are assuming that is so. We have every reason to believe that, notwithstanding the very vigorous protests that have been made by us and other countries, even by this House of Commons, the French government intends to proceed with the rest of the tests.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister be good enough to inform the House of the source of the information that at least one test has taken place? Would he also inform the House whether any further protest to France is being organized by Canada or any other nation that takes the initiative for that purpose?

• (1450)

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the information we have has come to us in various ways. None of it is contradictory, so we just assume it is true. It has not been denied by the French government, nor has it been confirmed. Our protests have been made to the French government, as have the protests of other countries, and, like the Prime Minister of New Zealand, I find myself having to conclude that the French government, notwithstanding what we consider to be action contrary to the welfare of mankind, puts its tests ahead of that consideration.

IMPENDING NUCLEAR TEST BY FRANCE—POSITION OF "GREENPEACE III"—POSSIBLE INTERCEPTION BY FRENCH NAVY

Mr. Lewis: May I now ask the minister whether his department has kept in touch with the plight of the Greenpeace III, the ship which was supposed to be in the area where the tests were to take place? Are the reports that the French government has chased this ship out of that area correct, and are we in any way in touch now with the rather courageous people on the Greenpeace who are trying to make the protest against nuclear tests dramatic, in view of the danger to lives—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that this is not a question. The minister may reply to that part of the hon. member's intervention which was a question.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. On several occasions, long before the government received any request to do so, we communicated with the French government to make it aware of the presence of some Canadians on a ship—not a Canadian ship—in the Pacific. The French government has informed us that the ship left these waters voluntarily and there was no intervention whatsoever by French authorities. This is the information we have from the French government, and since I cannot be in touch with the Greenpeace I cannot confirm it.

AGRICULTURE

FOWL SLAUGHTER PROGRAM—REQUEST TO EXTEND DEADLINE FOR GRANTS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Could he tell us whether he intends to intervene to grant a delay concerning the legislation on fowl slaughter since a great many farmers could not take advantage of the legislation because the one million figure provided for in the legislation has been reached?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker. In the press release I gave out upon the initiation of the flock reduction program, the numbers were indicated. It was stated that when we had reached about one million birds in total—more than the normal number of 250,000 per week—the program would be terminated.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

According to farmers, a considerable number of chickens ought to be slaughtered to restore a balance.

What is the minister's decision regarding this? Are there any other considerations on which farmers could count?

[English]

Mr. Olson: There may be some disequilibrium between individual producers in the provinces, but we have no control over any equity allotment or any authority to make such quotas. What we do know is the numbers involved in the flock reduction program for various provinces necessary to get the right balance was reasonably satisfactory.

NATIONAL PARKS

INCREASE IN FEES FOR TRAILERS—SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in his capacity as minister in charge of parks. Knowing that he is interested in obtaining as much tourist traffic as possible, I would ask him whether he has received complaints from various United States tourists and others across Canada about the increase in the daily charge in National Parks for trailers and automobile homes from $2.50 to $4. I point out these people came to Canada or have been visiting the parks on the basis of information provided in booklets from his department stating that the cost would be $2.50 per day?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any such representations from tourists. Of course, it is always unfortunate to have to increase prices, but this $2.50 charge had been in force for many years; in view of the services we render to the public, we thought we were justified in increasing the cost at this time, but I do not think that the new price will be likely to scare visitors away. In my view, they realize this is still most reasonable for the services available to them in national parks.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister is changing the rules in the middle of the game. I have had four or five communications in this connection containing strong condemnation by United States tourists of what has been done. They are not complaining about the amount involved, but about the fact that they came to Canada on the basis of information that the charge would be $2.50. I would ask him whether he is prepared—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to postpone the coming into effect—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order, please. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman would resume his seat.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am in such an agreeable mood today I would not ask an embarassing question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: In light of the fact this change was made after the season was underway, I would ask the minister whether he will give consideration to postponing the coming into effect of this change until the end of the present season in order to encourage tourist traffic?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am always glad to listen to the suggestions of the right hon. member. I shall take this one under consideration, but I do not know whether I shall be able to follow through with it.

[English]

ALLEGED DETERIORATION OF SERVICES IN CAMPGROUNDS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the information given by the right hon. member for Prince Albert about the fee increase for tenting and campground space in our national parks, would the minister advise the House why it is we are receiving so many complaints about the accumulation of garbage and the deterioration of services in some of these tenting grounds?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, that is the fact.

AGRICULTURE

ALLEGED IMPORTATION OF FRUITS AND VEGETABLES EXPOSED TO DDT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Are investigations being carried out by his department to substantiate charges that there is unrestricted importation of fruits and vegetables into Canada, for example peppers, which have been exposed during growth to DDT spray? Will the minister state whether the government intends to either curb such importations or allow our growers to use the same chemicals instead of the other more costly substitutes required by Canadian law?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will look into this to see whether this is, in fact, happening, but I would like to remind the House that the tolerance of the residue of these chemicals on the plants is nil, so we would not find any residue whatever or the product would be rejected.

Mr. Horner: Why don't you legalize it in Canada?

[Mr. Speaker.]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGATION BY FORMER CORPORAL RAMSAY—POSSIBILITY OF INDEPENDENT INQUIRY

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like someone to allay my suspicions as to whether or not a member of this House can read. I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether he has yet read the article by Corporal Ramsay in the July issue of Macleans magazine which contains serious charges and statements about the RCMP, and has he instituted any inquiries into the subject matter of that article? If he has done so, is the inquiry being carried out by an independent group or by members of the force?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I was informed that the publication involved withheld details which could have led to slander action. On the other hand, the individual who gave information to that magazine has a standing invitation to meet me. As I have said my door is open to both the publishers of the magazine and this individual so that I may be informed of specific cases. I shall certainly look into them to ascertain if an investigation is required. Anybody could then blame any government organization, which would compel the government to investigate each case.

[English]

ALLEGED PUBLICATION OF PORTION OF CONSULTANTS REPORT BY COMMISSIONER—CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact the minister stated in the House that the report on the RCMP published in 1968 by a group of business consultants cannot be made public because it is an internal document, and in view of the fact the Commissioner of the RCMP took the liberty of quoting portions of this report on the radio and in a telex message, I should like to ask whether the Commissioner obtained the permission of the minister to make public those parts of this report? If so, did he do so before or after he made them public?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, if within that organization there are documents aimed at improving its administration, that means we are working at such an improvement. It is quite evident.

• (1500)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member, but the House will have noted that we are not moving very quickly this afternoon. If we have 3, 4 or 5 supplementaries to each question, we will not be successful in recognizing too many members during the question period. I would advise hon. members, therefore, to try to limit their supplementaries for the benefit of their colleagues.

METHOD FOLLOWED IN PREPARATION OF CONSULTANTS REPORT

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minister said he cannot make that report public, will he advise the House who were the authors of the report, whether it is correct that in compiling the report they never left the city of Ottawa and whether or not they failed to interview any members of the force of lower rank or their wives or members of the Indian and Metis people.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister might reply briefly to this question, but the hon. member has asked a series of questions. I doubt whether that is in order. The minister may be recognized for the purpose of replying briefly.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I certainly refuse to accept all the hon. member's allegations, but I shall take his request into serious consideration.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRAM "NEW HORIZONS FOR THE AGED"—POSSIBLE COMMUNICATION OF DETAILS BY MEMBERS TO SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the minister's announcement of the senior citizens New Horizons Program, would he advise the House whether he will make a statement on motions before the recess to advise Canadians what this program will entail.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I doubt that I will be able to make a further announcement before the recess. The government has under consideration now the criteria that will be applicable in respect of the New Horizons Program and I doubt whether we will complete our consideration by then.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the long summer recess would give all Members of Parliament an opportunity to overcome the failure to communicate with people, would the minister reconsider and make a statement on motions tomorrow advising what the criteria will be so that members will be able to relay that message to the senior citizens of the country.

Mr. Munro: As I indicated I realize the communications aspect is important. Once we arrive at the decision we will endeavour to get that information to them as quickly as possible. We are endeavouring to discuss the criteria with the various provinces and have not completed that phase.

POSSIBILITY OF NEW PROPOSALS TO PROVINCES ON HEALTH COSTS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of the indication given in Quebec yesterday by the Minister of Finance that new proposals would be made to the province on the matter of health, I should like to ask the minister whether he will be making a statement on this subject before the House rises or whether this is something the Minister of Finance has taken into his own hands?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Finance was down there with certain of his own officers and officials to discuss the health-cost formula. I believe he received various suggestions from the province of Quebec which he indicated he would consider in respect of further changes with a view to getting an agreement. However, that would take some time and I do not anticipate making a further announcement.

"NEW HORIZONS FOR THE AGED"—CONSULTATIONS WITH SENIOR CITIZENS GROUPS ON IMPLEMENTATION OF PROGRAM

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare which is supplementary to those addressed to him a few moments ago about the proposed New Horizons Program. I should like to ask the minister whether in the carrying out of this program or in the putting of it together, the senior citizens themselves and probably their organizations will be consulted and advised.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, they will. We have had some consultation with one or two of the national senior citizens organizations. It would be our hope to have further consultation with them. We hope the criteria will be flexible enough that it can always be changed to take into account their views.

FINANCE

RISE IN PRIME LENDING RATE IN UNITED STATES—SUGGESTED ACTION BY MINISTER TO ENSURE CHARTERED BANKS DO NOT RAISE INTEREST RATES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance who was due to be in the House today but in his absence I will direct it to the acting minister. Have the Minister of Finance or any official of his department been in touch with the chartered banks to make sure they do not take advantage of the rising prime lending rates in the United States to increase the prime lending rate in this country?

Hon. P. M. Mahoney (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows the Minister of Finance was in very close touch with the Canadian chartered banks as recently as a couple of weeks ago, as a result of which short-term interest rates were lowered. I am sure he is in constant touch with them.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, due to that non-answer I will put a supplementary question. Is it the intention of the Canadian government to do everything in its power to stop a rise in the prime lending rate at this time, since a rise in the prime lending rate causes interest rates to go up which could and would adversely affect industrial expansion and employment at this time.

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, the government, of course, is concerned about interest rates, among other things, in the economic operation and we watch this situation very carefully.

Mr. Hees: Then, why in the world do you not do something about it?

WELFARE

DISCONTINUANCE OF GRANT TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND TENANTS UNION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare concerning a subject which has the heather ablaze in Prince Edward Island. It concerns the discontinuance of the grant from his department to the Prince Edward Island Tenants Union. Can the minister advise why such a step was taken, and whether the Prince Edward Island government made any representation regarding this highly criticized move which has added to unemployment in our area.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would advise that the decision was taken by myself as a result of evidence which came before me. I felt that the activities of the organization in question were outside the terms of the grant.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CANCELLATION OF TEMPORARY RELEASE PROGRAM FOR DANGEROUS SEX OFFENDERS—APPLICATION TO OTHER CATEGORIES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether, in light of the fact that a charge has been laid—and I do not want to get into that matter—his cancellation of the program of temporary release of prisoners applies only to those who are dangerous sex offenders and who have been declared so, or does it apply to everyone in the penitentiary at this time? To whom does it apply?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I clearly indicated that the application of the program has been discontinued with regard to dangerous sex maniacs.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: In light of the fact that a fellow has just been charged, one of the ones whom the minister or his department has released, Swearngen, the man who shot two people, then disarmed two other policemen, was finally arrested and now given an additional eight years, will he not apply the same criteria to those people who are given life sentences as a result of violent crimes or who have been convicted of murder, or is he going to do the same as he did in the other cases?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I am in full sympathy with the victims of criminals, whoever and wherever they may be but nevertheless I believe the hon. member's reasoning might lead to total discontinuing of the temporary leave program. Is that what he wants?

[English]

TEMPORARY RELEASE PROGRAM—RETURN OF JURISDICTION TO PAROLE BOARD

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask a further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may ask a supplementary, but I do not think there should be a debate. The questions and the minister's answers are taking the form of a debate between the two hon. gentlemen.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in light of the mistakes which are now evident in respect of the program—the minister has admitted them himself—would he now return the jurisdiction to the Parole Board where it belongs or set up regional boards if he intends to continue with his program on an ad hoc basis and leave society unprotected.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I see that the hon. member shares my views. I have said again and again during the past few months that there should be a thorough review of the Parole Board and of the liberation of inmates in general. That is why I have set up a task force chaired by Judge Hugessen; a Senate committee is now dealing with this matter and will probably report on it in the fall.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that we are running short of time. Perhaps we should try to limit supplementaries, and if there is time return to the hon. member.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DENNIS REPORT ON LOW INCOME HOUSING

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs whose name was on the roster for today. I do not see either him or his parliamentary secretary in the House, so I shall address my question to the acting minister or to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that printed copies of the report by Professor Michael Dennis on low income housing will be delivered today or tomorrow, and in view of the immense importance of the subject to many Canadians, will the minister undertake to table a copy of this report in the House before adjournment?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question and draw it to the attention of the responsible minister.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

SUGGESTED TABLING OF PROPER ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In the light of the extraordinary situation disclosed by the hon. member for Wellington the other day that the National Harbours Board is unable or unwilling to give to the Minister of Transport a properly audited statement to table in the House, will the Prime Minister instruct the National Harbours Board or use his best influence to persuade them to give to the minister such a statement in order that the National Harbours Board may purge its contempt of Parliament and Parliament may know what are the conditions of the financial affairs of the National Harbours Board?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I should like to take notice of the question, Mr. Speaker.

GRAINS ADMINISTRATION COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT NAMING MEMBERS AND OUTLINING DUTIES

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the recent statement made by the minister relative to the Canada Grains Council, the Grains Group, and the creation of a new broadly based Grains Administration Committee, would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to explain to the House what the exact duties of this new committee will be, who the members of the committee will be, and why there is such a proliferation of councils, groups and committees dealing with the same problems?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thought that the announcement about the activities of the committee of the Canada Grains Council was clear, but if not, I will be glad to discuss it with the hon. member.

ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL—SUGGESTED NAMING OF CHAIRMAN

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that there are hearings before the Anti-Dumping Tribunal and that some sort of a cloud still hangs over certain decisions of that board, would the right hon. gentleman or the minister advise the House when it is intended to appoint a new chairman of the board so that the board will be regularly constituted for its investigatory work as well as any particular hearings that may be held over the next few months?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance, under whose jurisdiction this is, has discussed this with me. I know he has been actively discussing the recruitment of certain persons for that important post.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have always taken the position that we would study any application, whoever submitted it. POSSIBLE INCREASE IN ATHLETIC SCHOLARSHIPS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister decided to increase his athletic scholarship program or physical fitness scholarships, so that the many hundreds of deserving young men and women who have been turned down recently will be able to have some opportunity in this regard?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, at present there is no intention to increase the allocation. As the hon. member knows, it is approximately $1 million now and we have been able to recognize many fine athletes in the country with that $1 million. However, there is no intention at present to increase this any further.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

EXPORT OF CARS BY CHRYSLER UNDER DISC PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can he inform the House as to whether or not the General Motors Corporations and the Chrysler Corporation in the United States have begun to export cars to Canada under DISC?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not know about General Motors, but I am informed that Chrysler has begun to do that.

Mr. Broadbent: Can the minister inform the House as to whether or not the government intends to take any steps to prohibit this violation of the auto pact. Chrysler is the second corporation, joining Ford, and we may certainly anticipate that General Motors will undertake similar action. Does the government have any plans that it intends to implement in the summer months to stop this clear violation of the pact?

Mr. Pepin: I have answered a similar question a number of times, Mr. Speaker. The best we can do is to say that we are keeping our options open.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for one last supplementary question. There is not much more than five minutes before the end of the question period, and I think that we should give an opportunity to other hon. members to ask their questions. I might mention in passing that I notice some hon. members who have asked questions or supplementary questions are rising again. Since they have already been recognized during the question period, they might as well take a rest for the remainder of the question period.

INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary question for the minister. Is he in a position to inform the House now, or would he do so tomorrow, on the current state of trade discussions that have been going on for many months now with the United States to inform us if some agreement has been reached, more specifically, some agreement on Canada-U.S. trade.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, no formal discussions have taken place recently and this is mostly due to the fact that both countries' negotiating teams have been busy with bilateral and multilateral negotiations round the world such as, for example, the United States and China and the Soviet Union. But with Secretary Shultz' appointment now confirmed, and with the so-called holiday season approaching, there are good chances that these negotiations will be resumed on bilateral issues as well as on broader issues. In the meantime—

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Communications.

Have the minister and his officials studied or agreed to the regulation of telecommunications by Quebec and the rate schedules set out in bill 35 where cablevision is defined as a public service, falling under the jurisdiction of a public service agency of the Quebec government?

[English]

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I think the bill to which the hon. member refers applies to action within the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec. I do not think the federal government would take exception to any action which is within the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec.

SWORDFISH—POSSIBLE LIFTING OF IMPORT RESTRICTIONS BY UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of the Environment and Fisheries. In view of the decline by 51 million pounds in the quantity and more than $6 million in the value of fish landings for May as announced by the fisheries service of his department, will the minister inform the House whether he is still carrying on discussions with American authorities concerning the possibility of re-establishing the sword fishing industry in Atlantic Canada, and if so, is there any indication that import restrictions imposed by the United States authorities on Canadian swordfish imports may soon be lifted?

• (1520)

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any likelihood that the United States will relent and change its stipulation that swordfish containing more than half a part per million of mercury will not be allowed into the United States. However, we will continue to make representations.

GUIDELINES FOR CONSTRUCTION OF OIL AND GAS PIPELINES—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON SCREENING APPLICATIONS AND SUPERVISING CONSTRUCTION—POSSIBLE CONSULTATION WITH PRIVATE INDUSTRY

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. With regard to the guidelines released yesterday on pipeline construction for Arctic oil and gas, on which he gave an extensive interview last night, has the government decided which agency will screen applications and supervise construction under these guidelines?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of the act, the management of the lands in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon falls within the jurisdiction of my department. The department's officials will control the progress of the work and this, in the light of advice from experts of the Department of the Environment.

[English]

Mr. Aiken: In view of the fact that most of the intensive research up to this time has been done by private industry and not by government sources, will the minister indicate whether the government will consult private industry, or what expertise his department expects to have?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, my department and the Department of the Environment have spent more than $15 million in the last three years to have some research done and the companies that make an application will have to prove that the construction of the pipeline will not cause any damage. BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

OUTLINE OF BUSINESS FOR BALANCE OF SESSION

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government House leader, having in mind that the cabinet apparently laboured until almost two o'clock, what is the size and description of the legislative list which was produced for today and tomorrow?

Family Income Security Plan

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would not admit that it required much labour to decide what is on the menu for the rest of the session. We will continue with FISP, the Family Income Security Plan, and hopefully when that is disposed of we might consider disposing of the report stage and third reading of the Pension Act, which will not take very much time. Hopefully, the third reading of the Farm Credit Corporation amending bill might also fall into that category of brief passage through the House, followed by the Canada Labour Code and the takeover bill. I still have waiting in the wings the Representation Commissioner Act and the CNR financing measure. If my hon. friend wants more, I will call another cabinet meeting.

Mr. Baldwin: In light of the fact that the Prime Minister expressed some doubt as to whether the motion in his name on the order paper might be put tomorrow, can the government House leader take us into his confidence as to what doubt the Prime Minister might have and, if he gives way to these doubts, what we might be doing next week?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there are no doubts whatsoever in the Prime Minister's mind about this motion tomorrow.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a brief point of order. Earlier I attempted to ask a question pertaining to revenue, which I think is important, before the termination of this week's proceedings, and I wonder if I might get permission to ask it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member might ask the question tomorrow. The hon. member will appreciate that there are other hon. members, in particular the hon. member for Moncton, who have questions to ask. I have tried to see them all, and perhaps once more I might mention that the members in the third, fourth and fifth rows again today were not given a fair chance to ask their questions.

FAMILY INCOME SECURITY PLAN

MEASURES TO PROVIDE BENEFITS IN RESPECT OF CHILDREN

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Munro for the third reading of Bill C-170, to provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, before lunch I was stating the family's basic principles and prerequisites. I was saying that the human being is the most important aspect in society, as a divine creature, with aspirations and spiritual and material requirements, and that it has inalienable rights which must be respected and safeguarded.

I was saying as well that the most important duty of a democratic government within society is to give the people the type of public administration they want, provided it is physically feasible and normally acceptable.

As regards family allowances, we are aware that it is physically possible to provide all Canadian families with family allowances geared to the increase in the cost of living. That is where our views differ from those of the hon. minister; we belong to those who have been asking for a long time for the increase in family allowances, not only for a designated group of families, but for all regardless of race, colour or language. They are human beings who deserve the highest possible consideration from their leaders.

We regret those complex aspects which were brought into Bill C-170. The decreasing rate is unacceptable because it is the money of the community, which must be spent by the community and not only by a group. The children from families whose annual income is below $4,500 are certainly entitled to adequate allowances properly tailored to the cost of living because an annual income of $4,500 is not sufficient.

Even an income between $4,500 and $8,000 is still too low. Families adjust their expenditures to their revenues. The higher their income, the more they spend; and the more they spend, the stronger the economy. In order to solve the problem of poverty, do we have to strip the poor man to help his poorer fellow?

This bill does not leave any room for the fight against poverty. Family allowances were designed to help Canadian families raise their children, the most important resource in our country. This objective becomes fuzzy the moment family allowances are made selective; everyone knows it would be impossible to pay family allowances large enough to compensate for all the expenses needed to raise children. The hon. minister stated in one of his speeches that more than a million Canadian families would not benefit at all from the legislation.

Is there any member here or any Canadian who believes that there are more than a million wealthy families in this country? Does the minister really believe it is fair not to give anything to the children of more than a million Canadian families? Does he really believe there are more than a million families in Canada which do not need any assistance to bring up their children?

Mr. Speaker, this shows the injustice generated by the bill now before us. We would have much to add about this but we say to the minister that he is making a big mistake and creating the greatest social injustice a country has ever known in having this House pass a legislation like the one before us now.

Every family in this country must benefit from this legislation. Whatever their income, all our families need family allowances.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Latulippe: Somebody says it is not true. The Department of Revenue can get the surplus out of those who do not need them because it is empowered to do so under the law. But if there are shortages we must leave all necessary economic and monetary powers to the family so they may fulfill their possibilities; the community must distribute its money among all citizens. Every child of any family in this country is entitled to family allowances.

There is no better way of distributing money in this country than giving mothers what they need for their family and for the country, for the family provides the servicemen the country will need to defend the crazy systems that exist.

[English]

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, first may I say that when we consider Bill C-170 we must consider the entire aspect of redistribution of wealth. Family allowances were established on the principle of universality back in 1946, I believe. Through this bill we shall in a sense redistribute money throughout the various regions of Canada and among the lower income groups of our society. This program, in seeking to implement the theory that it is the government's duty to redistribute the wealth of the people, will turn the universal family allowance concept which was first adopted in 1946 into an additional welfare program. If we accept that, we must then ask, how much will the program cost? It will cost the people of our country an additional $150 million according to the minister. Whom will it benefit? Will it reduce welfare, or perpetuate it? Will it reduce poverty, or contribute to it? I believe this program will perpetuate welfare and poverty since it will encourage people who can least afford large families to raise large families.

Young people growing up in a welfare atmosphere become accustomed to it. They are satisfied to live that way and for a great part of their lives accept welfare and the dole. It is wrong, morally, to do this in a nation as wealthy as Canada, a nation populated with energetic people. As it is, we tax our people too much; we tax our young too much and our old too much. What happens to the middle income groups? They are taxed very heavily, much more heavily, on a proportionate basis, than the wealthy. I think this policy is a mistake.

Before we redistribute wealth on a regional basis we must consider how the various regions of Canada are made up. Which regions will benefit most? How will this money be redistributed? These questions were never answered in committee or during the second reading debate. Perhaps the minister does not know how this is to be done, or is afraid to disclose to the people how our wealth will be redistributed among the regions of this country. This is an important matter, Mr. Speaker, because at the extremities of Canada there is disunity. Before adopting a system that will redistribute wealth we must at this time, for the sake of our survival as a nation, examine how the redistribution is to take place, how it will affect the really rich and the middle classes.

Actually, we have provided a bonus for the married man raising a young family. I am referring, of course, to the previous family allowance plan and to the new FISP plan as well. At present there are income tax exemptions for every child. If we look closely at the system we will see that a married couple with an income of $3,000 per year and one child benefits to the extent of $180 per year from this program. When the income increases to $4,500 the family will receive that $180 and an additional $74 by virtue of the reduction in income tax. If the family's income rises to $7,000, its extra spending power diminishes sharply. At $7,000 it obtains little or no benefit from the program. At $9,000 the reduction in income tax is $90. With an income of between $9,000 and $21,000 taxes rise drastically.

However, if you earn between $50,000 and $60,000 you receive almost as great a benefit from the tax system as the man earning $3,000. Clearly, the middle income group shoulders the load. That, I suppose, corresponds with the minister's thinking as expressed in his speech in Quebec. I hold in my hand a copy of the Montreal Gazette of June 21. The following is reported in this newspaper:

> Munro said it would be "foolish" to think welfare needs could be met by hitting the "super-rich" and corporations with drastic tax increases.

In other words, he has adopted the Liberal party's concept that we must save the super-rich and tax the middle classes. I wonder if the workers in Hamilton appreciate that. There are many middle income people there. The article continues:

> Furthermore, the minister argued that placing too much of a tax burden on the rich could remove the "incentive" to become rich which would leave the government "no further ahead and perhaps worse off."

The report in the Montreal Gazette of June 21 shows that the minister does not think we should tax heavily the super-rich. I used to think Canada was made up mostly of middle income people. The middle class is shrinking. The super-rich, as the minister calls them, and the poor who live at or below the poverty line are increasing. This bill does very little for our shrinking middle class. On the other hand, I think it will perpetuate poverty at the lower end of the income scale. Furthermore, it will permit the super-rich to avoid completely carrying their fair share of the burden in our economy.

• (1540)

Let us consider this redistribution. The committee studying this bill was never informed of any concept or forward-thinking which the department may have worked out as to how the money would be divided between the various regions of Canada. Nor has this House been so informed.

I wish to refer to some figures put forward by Mr. Reuben Baetz, executive director of the Canadian Council on Social Development, with regard to those living below what he and the Economic Council of Canada have established as the poverty level. For a married couple with two children the figure is $3,100, and for a married couple with five children the figure is a little over $5,000. That is what he has classified as the poverty level.

I now wish to refer to the areas which have the greatest number of families living below the poverty line. The figures are as follows: Quebec, 17.5 per cent; Ontario, 12.1 per cent; the prairie provinces, 24 per cent; British Columbia, 14.2 per cent; the Atlantic provinces, 29.7 per cent. There is a great deal of disparity as between the various regions with regard to families living below the poverty line. Has the minister stated that he believes redistribution of wealth as between the various regions under this program will correspond with the program presented by Mr. Baetz in the Economic Council report of 1969? He has not. It should be clearly stated where this redistribution will take place.

Many people attacked Premier Bennett of British Columbia when he stated there should be a redistribution of wealth. I am in complete agreement with that, but it should go directly to the poor people. As I stated, the percentage of poor families in British Columbia is 14.2 per cent, a little better than Ontario and not that much better than Quebec. The prairie provinces and the Atlantic region suffer most in this respect. Will there be a more equitable distribution of wealth under the new family allowance program? I do not believe so.

I wish to refer to some figures in the report concerning unattached individuals living below the poverty line. These figures were established by the Economic Council of Canada and are as follows: the Atlantic provinces, 49.7 per cent; Quebec, 36.2 per cent; Ontario, 30 per cent; the prairie provinces, 40 per cent; British Columbia, 34.5 per cent. Here again, there is some merit to Premier Bennett's thinking. If we were to distribute our wealth among the poor, 34.5 per cent of the unattached individuals in British Columbia would benefit from such a scheme.

I shall read some more figures which are also very revealing. They are found in a report prepared by Statistics Canada with regard to the percentage of dwellings in Canada having less than one room per person. Can the minister give us the assurance that redistribution of wealth will alleviate this problem? Dwellings in Canada having less than one room per person amounted to 22 per cent. For Manitoba the figure was 25 per cent. For Alberta, that wealthy province which is often considered to be one of those which pays the shot, the figure was 25 per cent. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) visited Alberta before the last election he said it had to pay the shot, but in fact rural Albertans are not enjoying the same high standard of living as some other regions. It is interesting to note that the Maritimes fared fairly well. The figures are: Prince Edward Island, 18 per cent; rural Nova Scotia, 18 per cent; rural New Brunswick, 25 per cent; rural Quebec, 29 per cent; rural Newfoundland, 29 per cent.

These figures indicate that all is not well in many regions which are considered wealthy and must pay the shot for many of the equalization and redistribution programs. They really do not enjoy the standard of living which they might. In fact, having studied these figures, as well as those relating to unemployment and wage levels in the various regions, I believe that people on the Prairies are prepared to, and do, work for less. This is not good because we are rewarding the less thrifty, and to some degree at least those who are not interested in working. This concept is wrong.

It is wrong to perpetuate this sort of situation. We should try through good legislation to reward the thrifty and encourage people to reach a high degree of fulfilment. A system that rewards effort and thrift will bring about a better Canada in which to live. This program is basically wrong. It will perpetuate poverty and welfare and encourage large families at the low income level where people are least able to educate their children in order that they may take their place in the highly technological society in which we live.

I am disappointed that the minister has failed to give a breakdown of who will pay the increased tax and which regions will benefit so that we may know whether this program will alleviate poverty in our country. The minister could have devised a program much more in keeping with the needs of today's society.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, of all the stupid, idiotic, miserable and impossible bills introduced by this government, Bill C-170 must set a new highwater mark for bureaucratic bungling. Perhaps the bill should be entitled "an act to guarantee the establishment of bureaucracy" or "an act to drive ordinary taxpayers crazy." An ordinary person would have to lie awake at night for weeks to dream up anything as complicated. Even an ordinary nightmare would be a welcome relief after reading Bill C-170. This is a horrendous bill, Mr. Speaker. It fills the heart with despair that this government will ever abandon its penchant for symptom-treating. That is the fundamental objection: Bill C-170 is symptom-treating.

If the anti-poverty campaign of the past few years had been successful, this bill would not now be necessary. In fact, as was stated earlier in this debate, there is more poverty, relatively, today than when the anti-poverty campaign began a few years ago. There are much better ways to distribute income. The one that I would like to see adopted in this country is higher minimum wages. Frankly, I do not think there is any substitute for it.

During the past few years we have distorted our economy out of all reason until today we have people working in some parts of this country for $1.25 or $1.50 an hour while in other parts people with approximately the same level of education are earning $7, $8 or $9 an hour, plus fringe benefits. It is totally impossible for the person earning minimum wages or near minimum wages today to buy the products of those who are earning the higher wages. Something has to be done about this situation. In my opinion there is no better method than bringing minimum wages for employables up from the bottom. Not only must this be done but it must be done on an accelerated basis.

I am aware the minister might suggest that this is a provincial matter. I agree that it is in part a provincial matter. At the same time, there is no reason the federal government cannot get together with the provinces and work out ways of increasing minimum wages on an accelerated basis. If necessary, the federal government, with its tremendous fiscal leverage, can use moral suasion to get the provinces to take action.

Minimum wages is the best method of distributing income. It is the cheapest of all methods of doing so because there is no brokerage involved; there is no one to take a nickel or a dime off for administration since the payment is made directly to recipients. In my opinion there is no substitute for what is the most efficient, most economic method of distributing income to employables, which is through minimum wages.

It has been argued that minimum wages raise costs and, therefore, the prices of marginal goods. This is true, of course. If one small shop or one small restaurant had to pay higher minimum wages than its competitors, it would be placed at a disadvantage. But if all similar establishments had to pay higher minimum wages the competitive position would remain intact.

If no other changes took place, the cost of the goods or services provided to the public would increase. But there is a related effect. Instead of collecting extra tax dollars necessary to finance some of these income redistribution schemes, the government could reduce taxes so as to compensate for, or at any rate largely offset, the effect of increased costs due to higher minimum wages. In these circumstances the effect of higher minimum wages would be mitigated. There would be no necessity for higher prices in most cases and in other cases only marginally higher prices would be necessary, not greater than those which would be required in any case as a result of higher tax levels.

So an increase in the minimum wage would not cost more, and it would probably cost less. It would cost less because it would not be necessary to collect money from the taxpayers on the one hand, to handle it at great cost through a large number of employees engaged in administration and then to redistribute it to many of the people who had paid it in the first place. In addition, it is socially more acceptable. There is something good about people getting their incomes in their own pay packets. There is something socially desirable about a system under which payments are made directly to recipients and subject to less probing by the bureaucracy; where there is less "big brother" interference in the lives of ordinary citizens.

One of the most regrettable developments in the last two decades has been the degree of insistent interference with the petty details of people's lives. Is it any wonder people are beginning to go right up the wall? The minister could take a lesson from what is happening in Sweden, where the level of bureaucratic interference is such that not only is efficiency falling off but people who were so proud of their democratic system until recently are now having serious doubts about it. The bureaucrats of this country are driving the little people crazy. It is a matter of sensitivity, a matter of humanity. The more interference there is in the details of people's lives, the more inhumane the system becomes.

Of particular interest is the provision here for adjustments to correspond to changes in the cost of living. This is another indication that the government has no serious intention of taking action to control inflation. This afternoon the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) told us that one more adjustment to compensate for inflationary rates was being made. Another occurs in the bill before us. We are bringing in more and more legislation containing provisions for adjustment to reflect increases in the cost of living.

Is this an admission that there is nothing we can do about inflation? Does it mean we have capitulated to this most insidious of all the threats to our economy, that we have given up all hope of being able to bring costs under control, that the government has abdicated its responsibility and has no further plans to put before the Canadian people? It is evident that something has to be done. It is impossible to allow this erosion to take place at the present rate for many more years.

One must look ahead. With wage settlements following the present pattern, and on the basis of the existing rate of productivity in this country, by the end of the century milk will cost $1.65 a quart, a television set will cost $2,500 and a house that today costs $25,000 will cost $146,000. The worst aspect of these figures is that a great many ordinary, innocent people will be hurt in the process. So when we see the government once again coming forward with legislation and provisions which are nothing more than superficial symptom-treating, we begin to give up hope of any move toward more radical and positive alternatives.

I should like to recite what I think the positive alternatives should be. As far as employables are concerned, they should have access to jobs with decent wages. If the minister would do his mathematics he would find that a modest increase in the minimum wage would provide more relief for more Canadian families that are affected by the bill before us. And it would be a lot less complicated. The solution for employables, then, is jobs in such numbers that anyone who wants to work can work. There is no secrecy about how this can be done; all the orthodox economists know how to do it. It is being done in most countries of the western world—in Germany, Switzerland, and all the Nordic countries. It is being done in New Zealand and Japan. It is only in Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom and Italy that there is a high level of unemployment. And, of course, Canada has the worst record of all.

Wages for those who want to work should be high enough to enable them to look after all their basic requirements, that is to say, food, clothing, shelter and personal needs. Wages should be high enough to enable them to keep themselves and their families in reasonable dignity. This is an assurance of guaranteed annual work, which is an altogether different proposition from a guaranteed annual income, a direction in which the minister seems to be moving by the back door. I tell him that a guaranteed annual income is nothing more than institutionalized welfare. It is one of the most retrograde developments which could possibly be imagined. What it does is to establish as a matter of right those incomes that are sufficiently high as to be a disincentive to work for many people.

• (1600)

Whether the minister knows it or not, there are in Canada today tens of thousands of people who find themselves in the position where taking a job at or near minimum wages provides them with less cash disposable income than they can get from the welfare program. So guaranteed annual work, rather than guaranteed annual income, is the solution for employables.

For unemployables, of course, a guaranteed annual income is required. Once again, that guaranteed annual income for those who cannot work or are unable to work, for deserted mothers and so on, must be high enough to look after their basic necessities of life—food, clothing, shelter and personal requirements—so that they too do not have to beg, so that they too do not have to look for aid from "big brother", so that they too do not have to look over their backs at weekends to see whether someone is watching them and seeing how they spend their time, whether they are doing a little moonlighting. In other words, we must restore a little dignity to human life by providing our unemployables with a guaranteed annual income that is sufficient for their basic needs.

We would then be able to use our tax laws to compensate people for the extra cost incurred in raising children. There is no reason why, with decent minimum wages for jobs which are available for those who want to work, our tax laws cannot be regulated in such a way that the extra income required to raise children is thus available to families with children.

One wonders, of course, whether a really progressive government that appreciates the necessity for going to zero population growth would want to encourage large families. In the event they decided that notwithstanding the consequences to the environment of this planet they wanted to encourage large families, or they just wanted to compensate people for the cost of the raising children who are already on this planet, there would be a better way to accomplish it than the proposals put forward in this bill. The government can still use the tax laws in order to provide the extra net income for a family's requirements.

In addition, as I have stated, it is necessary to protect the purchasing power of the ordinary people. We must control inflation; we cannot allow it to continue the way it is at the present time. I have stated over and over again that in my opinion there is no substitute for mandatory guidelines for wages and profits where monopoly power exists. If there is any other solution, I should like to know what it is; but to the best of my knowledge there is none.

Wages where monopoly power exists—which means where big unions exist—must be related to productivity. An increase in wages must be related to the average productivity increase in the whole economy. Then where giant companies are so big, so strong and powerful that they can regulate markets, their profits must be controlled in such a way that the benefits of the controlled wages are passed on to the consuming public. If that is done, then it is in fact possible to operate a free society in such a way that jobs are available for anyone who wants to work and, at the same time, the purchasing power of the Canadian economy is preserved and the savings of our senior citizens and others living on fixed incomes are kept intact.

I know of no other way to get to the position where prices are stable. It is possible to make our financial system work superbly and to provide jobs for all who want to work, at decent wages. It is possible to offer wages at a level high enough to look after family responsibilities. But this will require action quite different from that proposed in this House during recent weeks.

When one considers the common sense alternatives that are available, one wonders how Bill C-170 ever got through the cabinet. It is a terrible indictment of the cabinet system. Where is cabinet control of the bureaucracy? Where is cabinet control of its silly ministers? I hope the minister does not take offence at that remark, because I know his heart is in the right place even if his legislation is every bit as bad as I have painted it. Certainly after reading the bill and the remarks the minister made in Quebec City recently, I must regretfully put the minister in that category. This is one of the problems with the present government. It has a lot of ministers who for one reason or another are guilty of what could be most generously described as fuzzy or furry thinking. And apparently the other ministers are unable to control them.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Where does the minister think that the money he needs will come from? He made a case today which I found very interesting: he said that it would not come from the middle class. I am wondering just where he thinks it will come from. He certainly is correct in saying that it will come from the middle class, because there is not enough money available from that source.

To illustrate this, recently I asked the parliamentary library to do an exercise for me to demonstrate what would happen if we taxed all incomes $20,000 and over at 100 per cent. The answer reveals that there would be about $250 million extra income, at least as I recall the figure. If this amount were distributed among the whole working force, each member of the working force would receive 1½ cents an hour. If the level were reduced to $15,000 and all income above that was taxed at 100 per cent, you would have an additional income of about $530 million. Divided amongst the whole working force this would provide an extra three cents an hour. This is not the kind of aggregate that would gladden the hearts of the average working person in this country at the present time.

As I have suggested, Mr. Speaker, there is no way we can get the money required except by increasing production. The way to increase production is to get people off welfare and back into the work force. We must get people off unemployment insurance and back into the work force. If, as suggested earlier, by the leader of the New Democratic Party, we reduced the present level of unemployment from 6 per cent to 3 per cent, reducing the number out of work in this country from about 600,000 to 300,000, roughly $5 billion a year in real terms would be produced to enable us to do all the things that are required to make this country great.

This money can, of course, be used to eliminate poverty. It can be used to bring minimum incomes up to the point where people can breathe a little easier. It can be used to eliminate slums and wipe out the terrible shacks that exist in many parts of the country. Some of this money could be used to build houses for people and families who need them. Some of it could be used to construct an urban transportation system to enable people to travel around in some comfort, and thus some dignity would be restored to urban living. Some of it could be used for the development of industries and resources in Canada—this would be Canadian capital—if only our tax laws encouraged savings, as opposed to the kind of laws passed recently by this Parliament which had the opposite, negative effect.

If the economic management of this country was worth anything, we would have available extra resources to the tune of $4 billion or $5 billion annually over and above natural growth. This could be used to eliminate poverty, slums, to build houses, to construct an urban transportation system and to develop our resources. In other words, it would enable us to do those things which Canadians want done. That is the method we should adopt. That is the direction we should take, rather than taking more income out of the present pot and passing it to people who in many cases have no incentive to get back into the work force.

The present policy is retrogressive both economically and socially. It is retrogressive economically in the sense that every person who is discouraged from participating in the work force means less productivity, and thus we are unable to do all those things which remain to be done. It is retrogressive socially because most people are happier when they are working, when they have something productive and worth while to do and feel important. They are happier if they feel they are part of the process and are needed and wanted. It is socially more desirable to have people working than having a welfare system which discourages their working. Of course this happens, and I can give the minister many individual cases if he is interested in having them.

We are already reaching the point of diminishing returns and to push tax rates higher would be another folly. In the last two weeks I have talked to a number of individuals who already have refused to work overtime. By the time the government takes its cut, they say it is not worth while. One would expect that this would apply to a number of people in the professions, and it does. Now it has come down to a level which I would call the average working level.

Recently I was involved in a television interview and the CBC technician behind the camera came over afterward and said he refused to work any more overtime. He was a single man and the tax rates are so high that he feels there is no point working overtime; it was not worth while. A week ago Saturday I attended a garden party in my riding at a home for senior citizens, and the chief nurse said the same thing. She said she would no longer work overtime because there was no percentage in it for her. She said she was working that day and would take time off. She would not work overtime because the taxes she had to pay to the government of Canada and to other levels of government were so high it was not worth while; she was going to take time off instead.

We have reached the point of diminishing returns, and there is no place from which the extra tax money required for these new measures can come unless we put back to work people who are presently unemployed and who in most cases would welcome a chance to go to work if wages were high enough to enable them to keep themselves. You cannot blame somebody for not going to work when he can make 20 per cent or 30 per cent more by staying home than by re-entering the work force.

One might also ask where the Liberal backbenchers were when this bill was being presented. Did they object to it in caucus? I know what some of them think by listening to them over here, ministers and backbenchers alike. They think this is a very bad bill. Most of them do not want to fight an election on it and hope it will not go through in the next two days, yet they let it through caucus and they come in and rubberstamp it. Are they as incapable of exercising independent thought as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said they were when he was writing in "Cité Libre" some years ago? We have a chance to find out in the course of the next two days.

I suppose one might ask the official opposition if this is not an opportunity for them. Surely they do not want something as complicated as this bill to pass the House. Surely if they are serious about forming a government later this year they would not want to foreclose their opportunity by allowing this bill to pass at this time. Surely they could come up with something more ingenious than this bill. Surely they have some ideas of their own they would like to put forward after the election. If they are serious and really believe there is any possibility of forming a government, then to demonstrate that belief they should hold up this bill so it does not pass and clear the deck for action with measures of a more ingenious and fundamental character when the next Parliament is called later this year. That is what I would recommend.

I would recommend that all people who believe the time for symptom-treating has come to an end, who believe we must get back to fundamentals and start curing diseases rather than putting band-aid on top of band-aid, should vote against this bill, stop it in its tracks. Then perhaps at the next Parliament of Canada someone will come up with a fundamental measure that will enable people of this country who want to work, to work for wages high enough to keep themselves and their families in decency and at the same time make a contribution to both the economic and social welfare of this great nation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the debate on Bill C-170 is really a debate in respect of a basic principle. I recognize that the waters have been muddied a good deal and we have got away from serious discussion of the principle that I believe should be central to this debate, but the principle is still there. It is because in our view that principle is a very important one both now and in the future that we still think the government should not press Parliament to pass this legislation at this time.

As I suggested yesterday when we were at the committee stage, I strongly believe this bill should be taken back to the drawing boards, and I still make that plea to the minister as earnestly as I can. I said there is a principle at stake in this bill. That principle, as I see it, is simply this: Are we going to treat people in Canada as people, or are we going to treat them as pawns in an economic mess? When any government provides assistance to its people, whether it is called welfare, allowances or what-have-you, because they are poor, and when any government bases its social programs on poverty it is violating the principle that people have rights because they are people.

I believe in the redistribution of wealth. I do not think it is yet within the capacity of mankind to devise an economic system which will automatically distribute the wealth we produce on the basis of equality, yet I think that a civilization which is civilized ought to aim at equality, and I favour the redistribution of wealth being done through progressive taxation and the distribution of allowances to people to enable them to enjoy an adequate standard of living. I want those allowances to go to people, old age citizens, mothers, children and what-have-you, not because certain of those people are poor but because they are people and have the right to share in the wealth this country produces.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) is sitting there ready to say he has heard this speech from me ten, fifty or a thousand times, but it is still true that over the years we have made some progress in this Parliament. The day came when we took away from our older people the stigma that was attached to them when pensions were given only if they declared their absolute poverty. That day came when we established old age security on a universal basis. We had enough years of experience with old age security on a universal basis to be able to compare that experience with what had gone on before. I am prepared to assert and reassert that we gave to many senior citizens in those years a dignity that we denied our older people in earlier years.

• (1620)

We gave to Louis St. Laurent when he became 70, we gave to other politicians, we gave to professionals, to working people and so-called poor people the same basic pension. We accorded a dignity to old age because we gave it to Canadians over a certain age, not because they were poor but because they were Canadians of that age. We did not ask them to declare their poverty in order to receive that pension. No matter how much the Minister of National Health and Welfare wants to chide me about making this speech times without number, and no matter how uncomfortable he feels because I assert this is one good thing a Liberal government once did, it is a fact it was a piece of legislation that was good. The thing that was good about it was that it accepted the basic principle that people should be treated by the economy of the country—and after all, it is the government which has control of it—not in terms of their wealth or poverty but in terms of their being people.

I say to you, sir, that we did the same thing in 1944 in respect of family allowances. The amount of money that was provided was very small. and I do not want to subscribe to all the things Mr. Mackenzie King said about the humble poor, the working poor, and so on, when he was putting this legislation through; but the basic principle of that legislation was good. We said we were going to provide an amount of money for the children of this country because they were the children of this country. We attached no means test to it. It was a good piece of legislation.

However, this government headed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), a latecomer to the Liberal party who decided that the Liberals who went before him did not know what they were talking about, decided that the progress we made toward universality, toward the payment of pensions and allowances to people, not as welfare or as handouts because they were poor but as their share of the wealth that was being produced, was wrong. The cabinet ministers over there have now decided that was wrong. I submit to them that they have not thought the matter through and that they are turning back the clock of history so far as Canada is concerned.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Just as it was wrong to attach a means, a needs or an income test to a portion of the old age pension, so it is wrong in principle to attach a means or a needs or income test to the family allowance. I urge as strongly as I can that the minister, who along with my leader I think has a good heart, not have it on his record that in his younger years, instead of helping to achieve progress in this country he turned the clock backward and returned to the practice of payment of allowances to children on the basis of poverty.

Mr. Haidasz: He is not prime minister yet.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not know what that has to do with it but I suppose the point is well taken, that it is the Prime Minister who made this decision and that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is just carrying out the decision the Prime Minister made. Now they have decided that Mackenzie King, Louis St. Laurent and Lester Pearson did not know what they were talking about when they tried to establish and reinforce the principle of universality.

I realize I am repeating myself, but to me this is terribly important. I think we are talking about the most important aspect of social policy that this Parliament ever considers. When we give money to people because they are poor and make them declare their poverty, we keep them in that poverty. One of the things I do not like about this FISP legislation, if it goes through, is that I think just as welfare has produced generations which are on welfare because the former generation was, so we will divide this country into the haves and have-nots and many of the have-nots are families with children who will receive the FISP benefit because they have met a poverty test, and those children will grow up to become the parents of families which will do the same thing. Do we not want to bring a halt to this?

In all our discussions about national unity we hear a great deal about language and race. If there is to be national unity, it must be in economic terms. We must move in the direction of economic equality among our people. We will not do this by the method of saying to people that they will receive the allowances they are entitled to, not because they are Canadians but because they declare their poverty.

This morning when the Minister of National Health and Welfare was making that interesting speech, the purpose of which is obscure, he had quite a bit to say about our charge that this legislation stigmatizes those who will receive these FISP cheques. He is quite justified in saying that quite a bit was said over here about the corner grocery store man knowing the position of certain families when he would cash the cheques, and so on. Because things like that were mentioned over here I do not blame him for trying to answer them.

However, the minister missed the main way in which this legislation will stigmatize and dehumanize people. It is very simple. We now have a family allowance program for which people qualify because they have children of certain ages; that is all there is to it. But under the new legislation the only way one can receive a benefit under FISP is by declaring his poverty. I do not want Canadians to be forced by legislation to declare their poverty, or for them to start a tradition in which their children and their children's children will do the same thing. I want to move in the direction of economic equality. We will get there a lot faster with universal programs than we ever would with the kind of legislation the minister now has placed before us.

As I say, there is a lot of talk about the need for Canadian unity. We have to get together among the provinces, the provinces have to get together with the federal government and both have to get together with the language groups, and so on. I agree on the need for Canadian unity, but I insist there will not be real unity until there is an equal opportunity among all people in this country to enjoy a decent standard of living.

The hon. member who spoke just before me seemed worried about the guaranteed income and people having the right to welfare. I think he put it this way. If I am misquoting him, I trust he will forgive me. It seems to me what is wrong in his thinking is his failure to realize that there are already things to which people have a right. People have a right to live. People have a right to use the roads and highways and the postal service. People have the right to be defended and protected. They have the right to education. We say people have a right to decent housing, and they also have the right to enough money to be able to enjoy a decent standard of living. We believe that right should no more depend on whether or not they are lucky enough to get remunerative employment than the right to an education should depend on whether they were born in a poor or a wealthy home. It is because we believe that the redistribution of wealth should be done on the basis of right that we favour allowances being given on a universal basis rather than as welfare payments being handed out on a basis of one's declaration of poverty.

So I say that we are discussing today one of the most important matters of principle that we ever discuss in this House of Commons. The whole issue has been with us for a long time. Among the things that I have read fairly often is the report of the Liberal convention of 1919 when they were concerned about unemployment, old age and sickness and pledged themselves to do something about those difficulties. It took them a long while to sort out their thinking. But I have to say for the Liberals that even though it may have taken prodding from this side of the House to make them do it, they came to the point when they realized that these problems were not to be solved by welfare handout programs but, rather, by universal allowances or by insurance programs.

I think the travail that the Liberal party went through for a few decades to come to this position was worth it. The trouble is now—and it is a tragedy for Canada—that the Liberal government is headed by a Prime Minister who thinks he knows better than all the Liberals who went before him, so he has handed out the dictum that the way the other Liberals did it is not the right way. So now they foreswear the principle of universality, the very principle that led this Parliament to bring in good social legislation.

I believe it is most unfortunate that this has happened to the Liberal party. If it had happened only to the Liberal party it might not be so bad, but because the Liberal party is in power it is happening to the country as a whole. I see this piece of legislation, if it goes on the statute books, as an unfortunate one, not just for the mess that I will talk about in a few minutes but because I think it turns back the clock; it increases the sense of division in this country; it divides us into haves and have-nots; it perpetuates living on handouts, on welfare, on means tests or income test programs instead of enjoying one's share of the wealth that we produce because we are people, because we are Canadians and because we are part of this great country.

If we cannot persuade the government under the present Prime Minister to realize the mistake that it is making, I hope that at least by debating this measure, as now seems likely in view of the speech made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, we may yet give the government the summer to think it all over.

I said a moment ago that I would say something about the mess that this legislation will create. There is no doubt about that. It is true that some of the many difficulties that the new Unemployment Insurance Act created have lessened, but they have not gone. We still have cases of persons over 65 or over 70 years of age having received unemployment insurance benefits being told a few months later that they have to return the $200 or $300 they received. One can imagine the tragedies that this kind of thing produces.

We still have people not receiving the benefits to which they are entitled or having to go through all sorts of rigmarole. Why? Because a relatively understandable Unemployment Insurance Act was replaced by one that had in it so many complications that it is just not working. The troubles that the computer had with the Unemployment Insurance Act are minor compared to the troubles the computer will have with this act. The minister and his officials have had to admit from time to time that it will take longer and longer to get this legislation into effect.

Originally, there was a bill under which payments were to have been made last month, in May, 1972. Now we have a bill the intention of which was that the payments would be made in September or October of 1972. That has been delayed to December and then to January. Yesterday the minister admitted that very probably the payments under the new legislation will not be made, even if the bill passes now, until next summer, the summer of 1973. I suggest to you, Sir, that if it will take that long to get it started, it is an indication of the length of time that will be needed to sort out the complications and the messes that will arise under this legislation.

It has been said many times that the amount that you get will have to be readjusted time and time again because people do not live lives under static conditions. The average family finds its income going up or down, finds the number of children increasing or decreasing and their ages changing. There are cases where people go on unemployment insurance and then go back to work again, or have periods when they do not get either, so that the amount of income a person will have in a year is an unknown quantity at the beginning of the year and in some cases is unknown at the end of the year. All these things can determine the amount that each family will get under FISP.

The result of all this, as I say, is that there will be a complicated mess, and in addition to the delays and changes that will take place there will be the fear that thousands of mothers and families will have, that they may be saying the wrong thing, that they may be making a mistake, that they may have failed to report something which they should have reported. The result will be that they will put themselves in danger of having to pay moneys back or face prosecution.

Compare all that with the simple system we have had since 1944 under which all of these other economic factors did not matter at all. I submit that these complications make this bill one that no sensible group of people, such as I hope we have in the House of Commons, should accept. I disagree with a good deal that the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) said in the speech he made this afternoon, although I understand some of what he said and agree with some of it. But what interested me most was his reflection, as one who sits to Your Honour's right, of the kind of talking that is going on in the Liberal party. He is not of them any more, but he is over there with them and he made it clear to us that there are many of them, ministers and backbenchers alike, who hope this legislation will not go through.

As a matter of fact, this morning when the Minister of National Health and Welfare made that very provocative speech I wondered if that was his purpose. Was he trying to provoke more speeches in this debate so that the bill would not get through today or tomorrow?

Mr. Munro: It was not all that provocative, surely.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Nothing is impossible, from the minister. In fact, if the minister wants to know, I will look him straight in the eye and tell him that I do not think he believes in this legislation.

Mr. Munro: That is not true.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not think that the minister, whom I knew under other circumstances when he was a private member sitting on the opposition side of the House, and when he was parliamentary secretary to the minister of national health and welfare during the Canada Pension Plan days, is the person whom I knew in those days. I do not think he believes in the principle which the Prime Minister has told him must be enshrined in this legislation. For all these reasons, and in particular because of the complicated mess that this legislation will produce, we think it should not be passed today or tomorrow.

In passing I would like to make reference to another awkward situation that is likely to develop. If my friend, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), gets the floor in this debate she will enlarge upon it because it is a matter that she raised when the bill was before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. But in case she is delayed in joining the debate, she has asked me if I would mention it now. As the minister knows, my colleague asked questions in the committee about the possibility of the FISP benefits being treated as income for purposes of welfare payments in some of the provinces. In particular, she asked whether any steps would be taken to make sure that this would not happen. This was dealt with in the committee on May 24, 1972. The record of that discussion is on pages 9:20 and 9:21. I will not take the time to read what is said there, but I would point out that the minister simply expressed the hope that they would not do it but he was not able to give an assurance. He insisted that it was not the job of the federal government to require provinces to sign an agreement in this respect.

I have in my hand a letter which the national anti-poverty organization of Alberta sent to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, with a carbon copy to all Alberta members as well as to other interested members, in which it is pointed out that in Alberta the present family allowance payments are not regarded as income for the purposes of welfare, but there is every indication that in that province family income security benefits, mainly because they will be larger, in some cases will be counted as income for the purposes of welfare payments. The result could well be a smaller total cash flow to individual families.

My colleague tells me that the same thing is likely to happen in British Columbia. I say to the minister that the provinces which provide welfare payments do so on the basis of the Canada Assistance Plan, which is funded 50 per cent by the federal government, and I see no reason why the government could not find a way to make sure that payments made under FISP are not counted as income and therefore deducted from the welfare payments made in the provinces.

I hope my colleague will be able to get into this debate at some point and develop this matter. I mention it here as one complication that is bound to develop with this kind of legislation. Indeed, complications are bound to develop with respect to the whole nature of this program, which is the welfare program that the hon. member for Trinity does not like. I quite agree with him in his opposition to welfare. Where I disagree with him is in his opposition to a guaranteed income, his opposition to redistributing wealth with the aim of providing an adequate and decent standard of living for all our people.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I know the hon. member would not want to create a false impression. Whereas I did suggest that work for employables is better economically and socially than welfare, my proposal was for accelerated minimum wages which would lead to income redistribution.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am happy to accept that correction and to accept the hon. member's statement that he believes in income redistribution. But where we part is on the question of how it is to be done. You cannot do it by minimum wage levels, necessary as they are. In the final analysis there has to be a tax structure and the payment of allowances in a way—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No way.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —that will really redistribute wealth and bring something approaching equality to this country. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), who has made a number of interjections which I have not stopped to listen to, says there is no way for that to work. Mr. Speaker, let it be on the record that I, too, do not believe it is possible to devise an economic system that will distribute income and wealth equally to all citizens. I think it is the job of government to step in and do that, because people are people no matter where they were born.

I suspect that many of us in this chamber were born under conditions of poverty. I am not going to recite my own case, for there are many others in this House who could do likewise. A number of us have been able to break through the barrier, to get into a little better climate of life; but that number is few. What I do not like is that so many people are confined to the same level, the same stratum of society in which their parents lived.

I think that as we go on with these kinds of payments, based on poverty, that is what we perpetuate. I do not want to perpetuate it. I want to work by every means we can, under federal and provincial legislation, to a greater redistribution of the wealth of this country. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we want to see an increase in the payments of what we have known since 1944 as family allowances. We welcome the proposal in this bill that instead of paying $6, $8 and $10 at various ages, we pay $15 and $20. I would be quite happy to see those amounts made larger. I will not waste any time on the question of where the money would come from, because my leader the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) completely demolished the arguments made by the minister this morning in that respect.

As a matter of fact, I have spent my whole adult life listening to Liberals, from Charlie Dunning on down, saying that we cannot find the money to do this or that, yet I have seen Liberal governments find the money when they have been forced into doing things. We urge that the payments stipulated in this bill be made on a universal basis. We think that the tax structure should be revamped so that those in the upper brackets will pay them back.

I am quite prepared to accept what the Canadian Council on Social Development has sometimes called an arrangement whereby they are clawed back, even in some cases up to 100 per cent. The minister asked whether we want a system whereby we give the money to a wife and then make the husband pay it back. Most husbands are used to that. That is the way we have been doing it under the Family Allowances Act; the money has been going to the wife, to the mother. We think that should continue to be the case, but with an income tax system that would take it back from those in the upper brackets.

If any individuals wished not to apply, then they would not have to apply. I am not worried about wealthy people having to declare their wealth for the payment of income tax, but I am annoyed that poor people have to declare their poverty in order to get what is their right. That is why my colleagues and I feel strongly that this legislation should not be put through in its present form, but that it either should be taken back to the drawing board by the government or referred back to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs so that we can keep in it the higher amounts of $15 and $20 but put out of it the means, or needs, or income test provisions that are now in it. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway:

That Bill C-170 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs for the purpose of reconsidering the portions of clause 6 and of such other clauses that impose a means or income test for the receipt of benefits under the said bill.

• (1650)

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated he had heard me interjecting "No way". I meant that there was no way the Canadian public would accept the egalitarian society for which he is preaching.

Mr. Orlikow: Why not ask the minister if he agrees?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I will develop this thesis as I go along. I spoke at some length in the second reading debate on this bill. Once again I must confess my amazement. I am surprised that the government, in searching for a more equitable way to make payments to families, in abandoning the old family allowance plan and adopting the new Family Income Security Plan has, in my estimation, come up with a program which is infinitely more unjust than the old one. It will cause much more controversy and much more dissatisfaction on the part of those who may be entitled to more or who may be disentitled to any benefits under this program.

The minister this morning put figures on some of the most extravagant propositions raised by individual members, attributed those suggestions to the opposition in general. He failed to realize that individual members on this side of the House are not, and must never be, in the position of members of cabinet who must display cabinet solidarity. Otherwise, all one would need in this House would be party leaders—the prime minister, the leader of the opposition and the leaders of other parties. There can be no exchange of ideas under a system like that.

I disagree fundamentally with the egalitarian, socialistic philosophy of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do not agree with him one iota.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then one of us must be wrong.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On the other hand, he must be permitted to express his ideas in this forum even though he disagrees with some of his colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Even though he disagrees with some of his colleagues, he must express his ideas. I am sure the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) does not share these opinions expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not at all; he is my chief supporter.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Not according to what I hear; there are great differences of opinion between those hon. members. The minister in his speech this morning mentioned ideas which come within the widest parameters. In putting a dollar figure against these ideas, he conveniently forgot the net cost to government that this program involves. Of course, he may have considered the matter on a gross cost basis. The various methods of redistribution, say the old age pension, unemployment insurance and other programs, come within the purview of income tax, and this is where I differ from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I agree that the entitlement to benefits for children should be determined on a universal basis. However, if we are to achieve the aims of this bill, surely the simplest way would be by putting family allowances under the Income Tax Act. Let them be subject to income tax. We do this with old age security. At one time I thought the NDP would adopt that position. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has not spoken about this, so I do not know whether he has abandoned the idea that family allowances ought to be subject to income tax. Entitlement to benefit ought to vary according to ability to pay. In that way, low income people and those with large numbers of children would obtain greater entitlement. This, I put to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members is the thrust and purpose of the bill.

What will we do under this bill? We shall create an administrative monster. We shall ask every parent, living singly or otherwise, to estimate family income. On the basis of that estimate the allowance will be paid. There is no guarantee that the mother will work and earn that income. If she is a part-time employee she may not earn as much as she estimated, or she may earn more. If she does earn more, at the end of the year money must be repaid to the state; an adjustment must be made. If you think there will be no opportunity for those who desire to fiddle, think again. Right at that point there will be an open invitation to fiddle.

My second point is that there will be difficulty, as there is with unemployment insurance benefits, in the recovery of overpayments.

Mr. Peters: This is terrible.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What effort will be made by the collection branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare to recover overpayments made under FISP? Think of the huge bureaucracy that must be created to monitor the annual returns that will need to be made to establish entitlement to family income security!

Mr. Peters: That might be one way of lessening unemployment.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I hear an hon. member saying that this may be one way of solving part of our unemployment difficulty.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe—(Mr. Marshall)—National Defence—Alleged inadequate quota for Newfoundland in provision of work under student summer employment program; the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose)—Industry—Request for action to prevent closure of Port Moody plant of Cascade-Delta Benco Company; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—External Affairs—Reported request to group visiting Quebec House in Paris to remove Canadian flag lapel pins.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions for the production of papers, and public bills. As there are no private bills listed on the order paper, the House will proceed immediately to the consideration of notices of motions for the production of papers.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

VIET NAM WAR—VENNEMA REPORT

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the interim report made in March, 1968, by Dr. A. Vennema, director of Canadian medical aid in Vietnam in 1967-68 and for copies of any subsequent correspondence between him and the Department of External Affairs.

She said: Mr. Speaker, two years ago I placed on the order paper a request for the production of papers connected with the report of Dr. A. Vennema. At that time the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) I believe had placed a similar request on the order paper. On March 8 of this year the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Isabelle) replied to my request in the following words:

• (1700)

Mr. Speaker, all experts such as Dr. Vennema, who perform a particular service under contract to the Canadian International Development Agency, submit reports on their respective projects as a matter of routine. These reports and other correspondence are submitted on the understanding that they will be treated as confidential and privileged documents. If these experts felt that such documents could be made public they would be reticent about making meaningful comments that would help in the effective implementation of Canada's aid program. For these reasons I ask, with regret, that the hon. member withdraw her motion.

This I refuse to do for reasons which I shall make evident. Who is Dr. Alje Vennema, whose report I requested? Dr. Vennema, according to the biography accompanying his article in "Canadian Commentator" published in Toronto, was head of Canadian medical services in South Viet Nam from 1964 to 1968. He was later awarded the medal of the Order of Canada for his services in that capacity. Following his work in South Viet Nam he submitted a report to the government. It is this report that I have been unable to get. His report has been buried in the vaults of the Department of External Affairs. In other words, he was given a medal and told to be quiet.

What is contained in the report we do not know exactly, but we have a fair idea because of the article which he wrote for "Canadian Commentator" last summer. I quote from this article:

Canada was supposed to be neutral and objective. We could have drawn the attention of the Americans to the catastrophe they had unleashed upon the Vietnamese by telling them: "What you are doing is not only disastrous, it's tragic, it's godawful and you ought to stop it."

But we always tried to placate the Americans in almost everything. The Canadian delegation to the ICC was in essence an extension of the U.S. State Department. If there was an important decision in an area that might hurt the Americans, the Canadians would make sure it wasn't published.

Most of the Canadians with the ICC felt they were doing the right thing. Many shared the American opinion that there was a place for the Americans in Viet Nam, fighting Communism and infiltration from the north. Some thought it was a useless situation to be in; others, that the Canadian component of the ICC existed to further the affairs of the West, as the Poles represented the East and there were those who felt anything being done was the right thing to stem the tide of Communism. Yet we were in a unique position to tell the Americans: "Look, what's going on here is a tragedy".

I went to South Viet Nam to join the American Dr. Tom Dooley's medical mission and moved to the Canadian mission in 1964. Under the terms on which Canadian medical aid was extended to Viet Nam in 1954 we were supposed to deal with both North and South Viet Nam through a liaison committee. But we didn't really want to give aid to the North and we never offered it. We didn't deal through the liaison committee but through an exchange of notes with the South Vietnamese government, which was de facto recognition of that government. Every time there was a coup and the government changed we exchanged notes but we never had a project agreement although we spent more than three million dollars.

Our services were not directly concerned with the war as we were dealing with tuberculosis and nutrition and so on in the TB hospital we built in Quang Ngai.

But I handled 20-30 napalm bomb casualties in the hospital. When a Toronto Star reporter wrote this the ICC delegation got cables from Ottawa saying "Better talk to Vennema about this. This type of thing should not be said. The U.S. government says there are no napalm cases in this province."

In 1967-68 I first told about the American use of gas. The Canadian delegate, Ormond Dier, called me in and said "What's this?" I said I had handled people affected by gas—likely CS or CN. He said the delegation was upset that this had been put out and advised me to keep quiet.

Don't forget, this man was later awarded the Order of Canada. He is not a man who can be lightly brushed aside.

Blair Seaborn, the ICC delegate who carried U.S. messages to Hanoi was, I thought, a very reasonable man who had a good grasp of the situation, but he was just a go-between and he personally had no decision or say-so in anything. The decisions were made between Ottawa and Washington—

I left the hospital in 1968. It was taken over by the South-Vietnamese army paramilitary forces who used it as a firing base—what the hell is the use of making a hospital and having it used as a firing base? I suggested to Ormond Dier that he withdraw all his voluntary medical personnel because they were risking their lives. Secondly, I said, by providing medical aid what you are really doing is prolonging the conflict. South-Vietnamese doctors and nurses were never much interested in their own people and the medical services in the country were being rendered by foreign personnel.

Dier's response was that we must have Canadians at Quang Ngai because it was very important for Canada to be in Viet Nam. Canadians had died for Canada before, he said. I asked if it's that important why don't you send a civil servant there from the department of external affairs who can just sit there and wave a flag? But he put a lot of things into perspective for me. What was important in Viet Nam was Canadian representation—to show we were there. Again, to placate the Americans. There was nothing we could do in Viet Nam without the Americans. We depended on them for transportation, often for food, for everything.

This article was written by the man whose report I am trying to obtain. This is some indication of the tenor of the report and why we cannot get it. This man has refused to be shut up by the receipt of the Order of Canada. His four years in the South Viet Nam hell performing medical service ought to be given respect by making his opinions and report available to the representatives of this country. We do not know exactly what is contained in his report but I think this article indicates what is likely to be there.

The remarks of the parliamentary secretary about meaningful comments that would help in the effective implementation of Canada's aid program take on a different meaning. The parliamentary secretary indicated that reports such as this can be released only if they are helpful to Canada's aid program. What aid program? Canada's aid program to the Vietnamese, or Canada's aid to the American attempt to wipe them out? All through the piece, all through this costly, dragged-out war Canada has been the silent partner in the murder of the Vietnamese people. True, we have had a hospital there to bind the wounds and care for the sick, but our country, through defence sharing agreements, has helped to supply the means of killing and mutilating the people and despoiling and destroying their country.

Dr. Vennema's former assistant in the Canadian anti-tuberculosis hospital at Quang Ngai, Claire Culhane, has written a description of the dreadful and unbearable horrors she witnessed daily in the course of her nursing work there. Her feeling of the hypocritical futility of the whole Canadian exercise of caring for the victims while helping to cause the casualties is summed up in her description of the case of one young patient. She writes:

In the soft tissue ward I had been nursing a youngster whose entire body was one big open wound, but it was healing. Gradually, after three months of careful treatment he was beginning to be able to romp around the ward, quite naked as he could not bear to have anything touch his raw flesh. One morning I came in to find he had been discharged home. The utter futility of our TLC (tender-loving-care) program filled me with despair. If he didn't get bombed or blown up on the way home (two provinces distant)—if there was a home and a family still there—with no further treatment and only dirt and dust to play in, he would surely become infected and die in no time at all. All we had been doing for three months was treating a doomed child. But what degree of difference was the prospect for any of the other patients as soon as they left the hospital? Every procedure was just an exercise in futility and could not have been made more vivid than at that moment.

That is Claire Culhane who went through the hell over there at that period of time. Mr. Speaker, I think it is time we began to realize we are living in a single world and that all these imperialisms and frontiers are dangerous; they are impossible things with the people of the world being just human beings wherever they may be found.

The motion we are considering has been on the order paper for a long time and Dr. Vennema's report has been in the hands of the government for a much longer time. The war which was described by the former Secretary General of the United Nations, U Thant, as "this monstrous war" still goes on. Canada's "Pentagon Papers" should be released. The people have a right to the facts. They paid for the preparation of the report. They sent Dr. Vennema over there, and no matter what they thought of his political opinions the government has recognized his services by awarding him the Order of Canada.

The very least we should do in this instance is to air the facts in the way the American facts have been coming out and allow the people of this country to know the truth of Canada's role in the war in Viet Nam. It is no longer good enough to say, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did when questioned about the $300 million worth of military equipment being sold to the United States by Canada and which found its way to Viet Nam, "The choice is between $300 million sales or clean hands and empty bellies." I believe the Prime Minister was exceedingly wide of the mark: that is not the choice. As the Americans are learning, the choice is not between clean hands and empty bellies, but between using the equipment and technology they possess for the purposes of war, killing, destroying, mutilating and ruining the environment, and turning that technological know-how and skill to the purposes of peace. That is the choice in front of us.

Mr. Béchard: What about the aid coming from the Russians?

Mrs. MacInnis: I don't care what the Russians, the Chinese or anybody else are doing. That is not germane. I am talking about Canada. Canada is our backyard and we should be cleaning it up before we go around finding out what anybody else is doing. This is the place we can control and that is what we should be doing. As a first step we should not be afraid of getting at the truth. If Canada has been an accomplice in this matter and still is, I think it is time the Canadian people were made aware of it. If Dr. Vennema's report contains facts and figures about what he has been doing in Viet Nam, and deals with what he saw in addition to his medical work, we deserve to hear those facts. Let us not forget that Dr. Vennema was regarded highly enough by this country to be awarded the Order of Canada.

Mr. Béchard: For the work he has done there.

Mrs. MacInnis: All right, for the work he has done there. But not only for the work he has done, which is only part of the thinking that merited the award. Certainly we should not censor Dr. Vennema's report. The government has no right to censor that report or to black it out entirely. The people of this country have a right to be given the facts. This is the reason several of us in the House have hung on doggedly, despite the amount of time which has gone by since the motion was placed on the order paper and despite the fact that Dr. Vennema must have long ago given up hope of getting this matter brought out into the public gaze. Claire Culhane has also worked very hard in this regard, as have a great many others, protesting that it is not too late to bring out these facts. It is never too late to bring out the truth into the light of day for people to see.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to speak in connection with this motion for the production of papers. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) said a few moments ago, the issue involved here is not a new one. It is tragic that it is still a contemporary issue in that the conflict in Viet Nam continues, as does the complicity of Canada in that conflict. It is disturbing, especially when one considers the wanton destruction of life and environment in that tragic little land of Viet Nam.

I have been particularly concerned with the lack of forthrightness of the government, not only in reference to Dr. Alje Vennema, with whom I have had an opportunity to talk from time to time, but with reference to a whole host of people many of whom have been sent to Viet Nam over the years and who have come back to Canada with serious reports only to have the greater part of them swept under the rug.

It is interesting when we recall, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has pointed out, the high regard in which Dr. Alje Vennema is held in this country and the award he has received. I could mention, in addition, people such as Dr. Gustav Gingras who recently received an award from, I believe, the Royal Bank of Canada of $50,000 for his great work in rehabilitation. I think members on both sides of the House will remember that Dr. Gingras was involved in the examination of a possible rehabilitation program under which children were to be brought from Viet Nam to this country, as well as with rehabilitation work with children in Viet Nam. Again, he was most critical of the posture and performance of the Canadian government toward that country. It is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that anyone who attempts to deal with the humanitarian issues which are at stake in Viet Nam immediately becomes concerned about the role played by the Canadian government in that conflict.

It was much more comfortable for the government and for Canadians generally to be in support of the role of Canada in Viet Nam while there was still widespread support for the United States interest and involvement in the conflict. However, since the decline of American support for its own involvement in that war, the revelations which have been made with regard to the atrocities committed and the real political issues at stake in that country have impressed both young and old alike with the folly and, of course, the tragedy of the war. The tragedy in the first instance, of course, involves the people of Viet Nam themselves. The tragedy for the United States, and the tragedy for Canada, lies in allowing itself the foolishness of getting involved in that conflict and for believing it had interests at stake great enough to encourage the destruction of a people and of a land.

The United States has not yet extricated itself from that war. There is a widespread belief both here and in the United States that this will happen. But at some time there will need to be an accounting taken, not only by the Americans of what they have lost and suffered in the conflict but of Canada's own role. It will not be a happy one. When the story can be fully told by Dr. Gingras, Dr. Vennema, Claire Culhane and the secret reports of the International Control Commission, as well as all the other documents and papers which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway suggested are secreted away in some vault, I have a deep-seated belief that Canadians will be sorely ashamed.

It is an easy thing to say. It has become increasingly obvious that we have willingly consented to a good deal of the United States military intervention in Viet Nam and that our aid projects as such have been, as I think has been suggested, 50 per cent humanitarian and 50 per cent political. Much of what has been declared as aid has of necessity been tinged politically because we have offered cover, protection and assistance to the military of South Viet Nam and of the United States.

We have proclaimed that we are, in one sense, neutral. But we have not been neutral. It is a well documented fact that we have supplied hundreds of millions of dollars worth of destructive materials which have been used to cause injury and death in South Viet Nam. Yet we have attempted to provide some kind of humanitarian program under the umbrella of the South Vietnamese military regime and the United States military government. This has never been clearly stated by any prime minister or minister of the government, but it cannot be denied for it would not be true to deny it. We have given no official recognition to the regimes of either Hanoi or Saigon, yet we have been a willing ally in terms of our activities with the Saigon regime. We have, of course, had no contact, apart from what limited contact has been available through the ICC, with the Hanoi regime.

There are two fundamental issues at stake this afternoon. One issue is Canada's real role in Viet Nam both in terms of military hardware and in terms of aid and humanitarian programs. There has been no tragedy greater for North America during the last decade than its involvement in Viet Nam. To the degree that we have encouraged or assisted in that conflict and extended it, we must admit that in one sense we have been duped and in another sense more than duped. Perhaps we have been willing accomplices—mistakenly, perhaps—with regard to the real issues in this conflict.

It has been stated very clearly by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that there is a good deal to know about Canada's aid program in Viet Nam. For the last four sessions, with the exception of the present brief session, I have continued to have on the order paper a notice for production of papers asking for the documents relating to Mrs. Claire Culhane. Mrs. Culhane is a rather well known individual in this country for she has demonstrated unceasingly against Canadian involvement in Viet Nam. She has created something of a reputation for herself because of her single-mindedness on this issue.

What she has tried to bring forward in every possible way in conversations with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), as well as through repeated letters to ministers and members of the House, is the full round of reports that she herself has made. On an earlier occasion when I attempted to obtain these reports and documents which she has filed as CIDA adviser, I was told by the officials of the minister's department that if the documents were made public they would very likely be libellous.

What I was asking for were documents that Mrs. Culhane had herself submitted. I assume that if they were libellous, Mrs. Culhane would have to accept responsibility for them, and it has always been my impression that this is what she was prepared to do. Yet the government has been most reluctant to provide the full facts and background information respecting her reports and other reports which have been filed over that period. I submit it is important that the Canadian people know what in fact has been the role of the Canadian government in regard to its aid programs in this terrible conflict. If it is the wish of this particular government not to make these records available, then it is paramount that some future government do so in the interests of the Canadian people.

The second issue at stake here is directly related to this whole business of production of papers. Yesterday afternoon I was, quite frankly, very tempted to rise on a point of order immediately following the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when consent to a motion for production of papers was refused to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). I think in Hansard for yesterday afternoon we have a classic record of the inability of this House to deal effectively with the production of papers. As reported at page 3596, the following motion No. 48 put on the order paper by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville was moved:
