A CHILD AT PRAYER

A Brile child, with chestnut hair. And gentle eves of blue, ad rosy cheeks and crimson lips, Love's own appropriate hue, Knelt in the morning's golden blush, And whispered in her lisping tones, "Dear Father, hear my prayer !"

\ The smiling sunbeams damed and played Around the kneeling child, And lighted up with holy light The amber cleams seemed loath to leave Her clouds of waving hair, And listened while those sweep lips said, "Dear Father, hear my prayerd"

Oh, blessed child, keep ever pure From sin's enticing wile, And let the happy, youthful brow ever in God's smile; And by and by thy feet shall press The heavenly meadows fair, And thou shalt chant in nobler strains, "Dear Miller, hear my prayer!"

They had been engaged some time, and it was almost impossible to conceive any passion more pure, more generous, more unvarying than that which subsisted between the young people.

Elizabeth, though courted, cares-ed, and flattered on every side, had as yet no lover of her own. Many other girls placed in her position, would, doubtless, have fallen in love pretty well every other day, considering the amount of attention she got from men for whom all the Dublin girls are sighing. But somehow or other, in proportion as she was more wooed, so she became more exacting. Her suitors all wanted some one-thing more than the poor fellows happened to possess, it might be a better-shaped nose, a smaller mouth, whiter hands, a quicker wit, a finer character, a more generous heart, etc. And so it came to pass that she let them all go by her, includ-
