

Technical and Bibliographic Notes / Notes techniques et bibliographiques

The Institute has attempted to obtain the best original copy available for filming. Features of this copy which may be bibliographically unique, which may alter any of the images in the reproduction, or which may significantly change the usual method of filming, are checked below.

L'Institut a microfilmé le meilleur exemplaire qu'il lui a été possible de se procurer. Les détails de cet exemplaire qui sont peut-être uniques du point de vue bibliographique, qui peuvent modifier une image reproduite, ou qui peuvent exiger une modification dans la méthode normale de filmage sont indiqués ci-dessous.

Coloured covers/
Couverture de couleur

Coloured pages/
Pages de couleur

Covers damaged/
Couverture endommagée

Pages damaged/
Pages endommagées

Covers restored and/or laminated/
Couverture restaurée et/ou pelliculée

Pages restored and/or laminated/
Pages restaurées et/ou pelliculées

Cover title missing/
Le titre de couverture manque

Pages discoloured, stained or foxed/
Pages décolorées, tachetées ou piquées

Coloured maps/
Cartes géographiques en couleur

Pages detached/
Pages détachées

Coloured ink (i.e. other than blue or black)/
Encre de couleur (i.e. autre que bleue ou noire)

Showthrough/
Transparence

Coloured plates and/or illustrations/
Planches et/ou illustrations en couleur

Quality of print varies/
Qualité inégale de l'impression

Bound with other material/
Relié avec d'autres documents

Continuous pagination/
Pagination continue

Tight binding may cause shadows or distortion along interior margin/
La reliure serrée peut causer de l'ombre ou de la distorsion le long de la marge intérieure

Includes index(es)/
Comprend un (des) index

Title on header taken from:/
Le titre de l'en-tête provient:

Blank leaves added during restoration may appear within the text. Whenever possible, these have been omitted from filming/
Il se peut que certaines pages blanches ajoutées lors d'une restauration apparaissent dans le texte, mais, lorsque cela était possible, ces pages n'ont pas été filmées.

Title page of issue/
Page de titre de la livraison

Caption of issue/
Titre de départ de la livraison

Masthead/
Générique (périodiques) de la livraison

Additional comments:/
Commentaires supplémentaires:

This item is filmed at the reduction ratio checked below/
Ce document est filmé au taux de réduction indiqué ci-dessous.

|     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |
|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|
| 10X | 12X | 14X | 16X | 18X | 20X | 22X | 24X | 26X | 28X | 30X | 32X |
|     |     |     |     |     |     |     | ✓   |     |     |     |     |

CANADIANA

A COLLECTION OF CANADIAN NOTES.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY.

---

---

VOL. I.

MAY, 1889.

No. 5.

---

---

SIR WILLIAM ALEXANDER.

Condensed from a paper read by Mr. W. W. L. Chipman, before the Society for Historical Studies, Montreal, 16th November, 1887.

Sir William Alexander, born about 1567, at Menstry, a village in the parish of Logie, Clackmannanshire. Son of Alexander Alexander and his wife, Marian, daughter of Allan Couttie. His sisters were Janet and Christian; he had no brothers. Family originally named MacAlexander, and, like the Argylls, claimed descent from the Viking Conn Chead Chath. His father died in 1580 and he went to live with his granduncle, who sent him to Stirling Grammar School at the age of thirteen. His personal appearance at the age of fifty-seven, as represented in a wood-cut by Marshall, resembled that of his contemporary Shakespeare. His forehead was high, his eyes large, his nose long and straight, and his well shaped head covered with a profusion of curly hair. He wore a moustache and well trimmed beard of medium length—the whole a pleasing and intelligent countenance set off by a huge Elizabethian ruff. He was educated at Stirling, and afterwards travelled with the Earl of Argyll, whose favorable mention of him to King James led to his appointment as tutor to Prince Henry. He thus acquired an influence at Court which he maintained. His career extended over thirty-six years of Elizabeth's reign, all of James' reign and fifteen years into the reign of Charles I. The facts recorded of the first thirty years of his life are very meagre, which renders the painstaking researches of such men as Slafter and Rogers the more valuable. His leisure at this time appears to have been devoted to literature. In 1597 A. occupied the manor home and lands at Menstry and annually visited them in the autumn, even when his residence was a Covent Garden, London, whither he removed in 1603 on the accession of James to the English throne. At about this time he married the daughter of Sir William Erskine, by whom he had issue eight sons and three daughters.

He was attached to Prince Henry's household and received several lucrative marks of royal favor, and also the knighthood, which was conferred about this time. Upon the death of Prince Henry, in 1612, A. received a position in the household of Prince Charles and in 1614 was made Master of Requests to the King.

A.'s attention was shortly after this drawn to America and he obtained a surrender of the charter of the Plymouth Company, and on the the 10th September, 1621, a grant to himself of a tract including the present Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, with the Counties of Rimouski, Gaspé and Bonaventure, in the Province of Quebec; the whole then called New Scotland, and by A. sub-divided into New Alexandria and New Caledonia. He was appointed hereditary lieutenant, with power to use the mines and forests, erect cities, hold courts, grant lands, coin money, etc. The consideration of this grant was one penny Scots, payable each Christmas Day.

A. next obtained the co-operation of Sir Robert Gordon of Lochinvar, to whom he gave the territory at Cape Breton, thenceforth to be known as the Barony of New Galloway, which grant was confirmed by Royal charter on the 8th November, 1621. The following August, a small party of emigrants sailed for New Scotland, but was compelled, by stress of weather, to winter at St. Johns, Newfoundland. Nine months later, a second ship reached St. Johns with more emigrants and supplies, only to find the first ship's passengers discouraged and separated. A few of the newly arrived party sailed at the close of June to examine the coasts of New Scotland as far as Port Negro and to select their place of settlement. Returning to their fellow voyagers, after a short survey, they decided to embark for England.

The accounts which they gave to Sir William Alexander on their arrival seem to have inspired him to renewed efforts, though his two expeditions had involved him in a loss of six thousand pounds. Through his influence with King James, he procured a warrant upon the Scottish treasury for the re-imbusement of his loss, but from lack of resources, or other reasons, it was not responded to.

The next plan hit upon by Alexander to recoup himself for this loss, was to induce the King to create one hundred baronets, limited to sons of Scottish land-owners and younger sons of the nobility, who should purchase lands in the new colony. It was intended to divide each province of New Scotland into several dioceses, each diocese into three counties, each county into three baronies, and each barony into six parishes. The baronies were to reach three miles along the coast and ten miles inland, and the parish divisions were to contain six thousand acres each. On the 23rd of November, 1624, the Scottish Council adopted this plan, it being understood that each baronet was to be a baronet of some one or others of these baronies, and to have ten thousand acres of land besides the six thousand acres belonging to his barony. For all this had to be paid one thousand merkis Scottish money, and each baronet was to send out to the colony six men, armed, apparelled and provided for two years.

The proclamation, 30th November, 1624, provided that these provisions should be complied with under a penalty of two thousand merkis, equivalent to £110 8s. 4d sterling, or $537.29 which was regarded and accepted as a commutation price for the title which came direct from the Crown. Amongst the baronets thus created were Sir Robert Gordon, Earl Marischal, Alexander Strachan, Sir Duncan Campbell, Robert Innes, Sir John Wemyss, David Livingstone and Sir Robert Douglass. On the 12th July, 1625, a further charter was issued by King Charles respecting these titles and re-conveying the unsold lands to Alexander who had surrendered them to the Crown for the purposes of the Act. This proclamation also increased the number to one hundred and fifty.

A pamphlet entitled "Encouragement to Colonists," was published by Alexander in 1624, illustrated by a map. In 1626 Alexander was appointed Secretary of State for Scotland and secured the lands and barony of Menstry. He rapidly increased his influence in this position and acquired several perquisites, and in the spring of 1629 sent another expedition to New Scotland under command of Capt. David Kertch as Deputy Admiral, Sir William himself having been created Admiral of New Scotland by letters patent dated 3rd May, 1627. This expedition was intended to check the power of Cardinal Richelieu's French company of a hundred associates, and also to cope with the Spanish and French traders. Kertch captured eighteen French transports, with one hundred and thirty-three pieces of ordnance destined for the fortifications of Port Royal and Quebec, a success which he followed up by the capture of Port Royal.

On the 2nd of February, 1628, Alexander obtained a further grant, including the Island of Anticosti, and all other islands in the Gulf between New Scotland and Newfoundland, and all the islands of the River of Canada up to its source, then thought to be the Gulf of California, together with fifty leagues (that is one hundred and fifty miles) on either side of the river. The following spring (1628) fourteen new patents of baronetcy were issued, and the avails invested in further ships, and in May, Alexander's oldest son William, who had been created Knight Admiral of New Scotland, sailed with a fleet of four vessels with seventy-two colonists and a year's provisions. He arrived at Port Royal, but soon returned to England, eager to procure, as he did, a commission covering a charter for a company having the sole trading rights of the Gulf and River of Canada, to frustrate the intentions in the same direction, of certain English adventurers.

At this time, Sir William Alexander, the elder, found an adventurer without means in Lord Ochiltree, who provided by King Charles with the loan of five hundred pounds, joined Sir William Alexander, the younger, on his second expedition. In June 1629, Capt. Kertch reported from Port Royal that his colony was in an impoverished condition, and it was found that thirty of the colonists had died.

Special efforts were made at home to force reception of baronetcies, and the King plainly hinted that higher honours would ultimately await the acceptors, and that all holding heritable offices would find their promotion in danger if they did not help the colonial scheme. On the 23rd of April, 1629, a treaty of peace between France and England had been signed, and under this Lord Ochiltree and his settlers were dispossessed at Cape Breton, some being transported to France as prisoners. In this year, Sir William Alexander obtained the lands and barony of Tullibody. In the same year, Claude de la Tour, the former Governor of Port Royal, who had gone to England after his capture by Kertch in 1628, returned to New Scotland a faithful subject of England, with two ships of war. He had been created a Baronet of New Scotland, and had acquired by purchase from Sir William Alexander an immense tract of land extending from the sea inland, some thirty or forty miles, and reaching from the present Yarmouth to Lunenburg, comprising the present county of Shelburne and Queens and half of Lunenburg.*

Sir William Alexander's claims to New Scotland were now in danger by the counter claims of the French Government, through the persistent efforts of Cardinal Richelieu. Six baronies were however created in 1629, and thirteen in the following year. It is apparent that notwithstanding the treaty of peace, England had not looked forward to restoring Port Royal or the territory of New Scotland, though she had intended to restore Quebec, which had been wrested from Champlain by Kertch after the treaty of peace had been signed.

Some anxiety seems to have been felt by the newly created baronets as to their possessions and titles in the colony, and Sir William Alexander was ordered to attend a meeting of the Scottish estates, at which he maintained the legality of the English claim to New Scotland and the greater part of Canada, basing his argument upon the priority of discovery, possession and the removal of the French from Port Royal. For services rendered at this time, he received the titles of Viscount Stirling and Lord Alexander of Tullibody, and was renominated Master of Requests for Scotland, at a salary of two hundred pounds, and in 1631 received further honours.

The colony at Port Royal still remained under command of his eldest son, Sir William Alexander, who returned to England in July 1631, when Port Royal was ceded to the French. Viscount Stirling, the Privy Council and the baronets vainly struggled to retain the territory, but its surrender was formally concluded under the treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye on the 29th March, 1632. Viscount Stirling

* The statement of Haliburton that he acquired the whole of Nova Scotia except Port Royal is incorrect, as appears by La Tour's deed which was registered in 1659 at Suffolk Mass. Haliburton may have followed the statement of Sir John Scott of Scots Tarot to the effect that Sir William got a great sum of money from the King of France to quit his interest in Nova Scotia. He was at any rate aware of the random statement of Sir Thomas Urquhart that he disposed "totally to the French for a matter of five or six thousand pounds English money both the dominion and property of the whole country of that kingdom of Nova Scotia."

received a warrant of £10,000 in compensation for all claims in this connection, although no provision seems to have been made for the unfortunate baronets of New Scotland, of whom there appeared to have been 113 in all enrolled between 1625 and 1638.

Taking the number at 113, it would appear that as each paid two thousand Scotch merkis,* the amount raised in this way was £12,477.1.8 sterling, equivalent to $60,713.77 of our present money.

Viscount Stirling now turned his attention to matters nearer home, and secured the privilege of fishing on the west coast of Scotland for a company employing 200 vessels of various sizes.

On the 11th May, 1633, Sir William Alexander, the younger, received a Royal patent for thirty-one years with the sole trading rights of the gulf and river of Canada and adjoining regions, and on the 14th June, 1633, upon the occasion of King Charles' coronation at Holyrood, Viscount Stirling was advanced to the dignity of an Earl with the additional title of Viscount Canada.

On the 29th April, 1635, his son William, then styled Lord Alexander by courtesy, obtained from the Council of the New England Company, a patent of that part of the main land of New England from St. Croix, adjoining New Scotland along the sea coast of Pemaquid, and so up the river to the Kennebeck, and northwards to the river of Canada, to be called the County of Canada, also along the island to the west of Cape Cod, to be called the Isle of Sterling. This patent was subsequently surrendered, and grants made direct from the Crown in eight divisions along the sea coast of New England. In 1637, his second son Anthony died, and his eldest son William, died the following year (1638), on the 13th May.

In 1639 the influence of the Earl of Stirling was on the wane, although in this year he took the further title of * A merkis or merk was thirteen shillings and fourpence Scot or one shilling and a penny and a third of a penny sterling.

Earl of Doven. His debts were now pressing heavily upon him, and had reached the sum of £32,680, and his estates were practically in the hands of his creditors.

On the 12th February, 1640, just two months prior to the assembly of the Short Parliament, when King Charles and his monopolies were the subject of attack, the Earl's death ensued at his residence in Covent Garden, London. The body was embalmed, placed in a leaden coffin, and conveyed to Stirling, where it is said to have remained in the family vault undisturbed for a period of one hundred years.

The Earl had four successors in the earldom, the last of whom (Henry, the fifth earl) died without issue on the 4th of December, 1739. A claimant for the earldom appeared in 1759, in the person of William Alexander, of New Jersey, U.S., afterwards a Major-General in the American Revolutionary army. He assumed the title, but his pretensions were not allowed; yet, his countrymen continued to extend to him the title of Lord Stirling. On the 25th July, 1887, the decease occurred, at the age of 100 years, eight months and twenty days, of a grand-daughter of the American claimant, a Mrs. J. Witherspoon Smith, in her day one of the most brilliant and beautiful women in New Orleans. Her mother, the daughter of the so-called Lord Stirling, was styled Lady Catherine Duer.

The title to the earldom remained dormant until legal proceedings were taken by Alexander Humphreys in 1826, following a petition which he had made in 1815, claiming descent, through his mother, from the fourth earl. He pressed his claim until 1839, when he was indicted for forgery of certain documents, and his was one of the most noted of State trials. The documents were declared forged, and though the forgery was not brought home to Humphreys, his claims to the title were defeated. He had gone so far in 1838 as to forward to Lord Melbourne a solemn protest as hereditary Lieutenant to Her Majesty in these parts against the appointment of the Earl of Durham as Governor-General of the colony.

As a poet, Earl Stirling justly won the praises of several noted poets of his own day, but only to pass into oblivion. Writers upon English literature entirely ignore him, while remembering those who have praised his poetry. In his writings he sought to persuade the heart. In his "Dooms-day" poem he invoked, in the very outset, a Divine blessing upon his effort. When we think how strangely disturbed the times were in which he lived, and how unfavourable to the purer kind of literary production; when we remember how great the enterprise needed to plant a colony single-handed, we must accord him no small meed of praise. Behind all the unworthy expedients which his public undertakings led him to adopt, we see those better moments which bespeak the poet and the gentleman. We can forgive the weaknesses and the spirit of avarice which seconded the spirit of adventure, and restore Sir William Alexander to an honourable place in the annals of both the old and the new world.

For in his own words :—

"This is the grief which bursts a generous heart,
When favour comes by chance, not by desert."

And again :—

"We want all that did advance our name,
For in a corner of the world obscure,
We rest ungraced without the bounds of fame."

---

Notes.

[Communicated by MR. JOHN READE.]

One of the ablest and most active of the French Intendants of the Old Regime was M. Hocquart. Not only did he endeavour to develop the resources of the colony, but he was also the author of some clear, comprehensive and vigorous reports on the state of Canada during his administration. To a memoir not unreasonably attributed to his pen we are indebted for a most interesting and valuable account of the people of Canada—comprising the noblesse, the mercantile community and habitans—in the period that preceded the outbreak of the final struggle between France and England. To him may also be ascribed the first attempt made in Canada in the direction of scientific and experimental farming. He had tests in the cultivation of tobacco and other plants conducted on his own property at Chambly, at Beauport and in the grounds adjoining the Intendant's Palace. Under his auspices, moreover, was undertaken what may be designated the first Colonial Exhibition held in Europe. For, in order to disseminate needed knowledge concerning Canada, he had a selection of the leading native products—plants, grains, fruits, woods, minerals, furs, etc.,—carefully made and sent to the mother country. It was at his suggestion that the Forsters, father and son, were ordered by the King to inspect the mines of Canada, and the working of the St. Maurice Forges was also of his conception. Dr. Sarrasin, Dr. La Croix, Father Gosselin and other men of scientific tastes, found in Mr. Hocquart an ardent sympathizer and fellow-worker. The memory of such a man should be held in honor in a land of which he was one of the first to discern the real importance, and in his efforts to develop whose resources he anticipated some of the movements which we deem especially characteristic of our own time.

---

What was the motive which induced the British authorities to establish, and maintain for nearly sixty years, a Lieutenant-Governorship in Gaspé? Dr. N. E. Dionne, in a little volume of Etudes Historiques, which I have already had occasion to mention in Canadiana, ascribes that policy to the necessity of making all possible provision for the loyalist refugees. Not only was a vast tract placed at their disposal in Upper Canada, not only were they welcomed to

New Brunswick, but a region large enough to constitute no inconsiderable province, was set apart for them in Gaspé and Bonaventure. If that be the explanation, no time was lost in preparing for the coming emergency, as the first Lieutenant-Governor of Gaspé, Nicholas Cox, received his nomination as early as 1774. It was not until 1780, however, that he betook himself to the scene of his administration. In 1784 he was awarded a pension, and in 1794 his death was announced in the Quebec Gazette. In the obituary notice, he is also named "Superintendent of the Labrador Fisheries." Captain Cox was a brave officer, who had fought at Louisbourg and at Quebec, and his governorship was meant to be the reward of his services. His successors were Francis Le Maistre, who died in 1805, and Alexander Forbes, who survived the abolition of the office. Christie (Vol. II. p. 347) mentions an address (the first of several such remonstrances) to the Governor-General, on a number of anomalies of administration of which one was the payment of a salary to Mr. Forbes. Nevertheless, Mr. Forbes continued to be paid it down to the year 1831, if not longer, and was mentioned as Lieutenant-Governor of Gaspé in official publications as late as 1833.

---

Taking up a recently published pictorial guide to summer resorts, and glancing through its pages, I came upon the following passage: "The original name of the Saguenay was Chicoutimi, which signifies 'deep water,' and was so called by the Northern Indians, who here first encountered the profound depths of the river; the present name is a corruption of St. Jean Nég." Now, in the "Oeuvres de Champlain," edited by the late Abbé Laverdière (Quebec, Geo. E. Desbarats, 1870), page 68, I find a note which, being translated, reads as follows: "Father Jerome Lalemant (Relation 1646) says that the Indians called Tadoussac Sadilege; on the other hand, Thevet, in his

'Grand Insulaire,' affirms that the Indians of his time called the Saguenay Thadoyseau. It is probable that at those different epochs, as is still the case, one of these terms was often taken for the other. What is certain is that both words are of Indian origin. Tadoussac or Tadouchac means mamelons or "mounds" (from the word totouchac, which in Montagnais means 'a teat' or 'nipple'), and Saguenay signifies 'water issuing forth' (from the Montagnais sakinip)."

On the same subject I found a curious passage in a paper entitled "L'Amerique et les Portugais," contributed by Señor Luciano Cordeiro, professor at the Institute of Columbia, to the first Congrès des Américanistes, and printed in the Compte-Rendu of the proceedings at Nancy in 1875. "Canada," according to Señor Cordeiro, is a Portuguese term, meaning a narrow passage or a path bounded by walls. Having ascended the St. Lawrence, the Portuguese explorers gave the River that name (Canada) either from its configuration, or because they believed it to be a channel by which they could reach the East. Señor Cordeiro also suggests another explanation. In 1439 or 1440, Denis Fernandes had discovered in Africa a great river which was called Çanaga (now Senegal), near the mouth of which a fort was built in 1470. By that river it was thought possible to attain the interior of Prester John's Dominions and thus find a new route to India. The mouth of the river was called Sonedech, according to Goes, Ovedech, according to Barros, and Tuedec, according to Emanuel Correia. Perhaps, then, the Portuguese adventurers, in first seeing the St. Lawrence, were reminded of the Çanuga and Señor Cordeiro finds some ground for this hypothesis in the fact that it was at the influence of the Seguenai (sic) and the main river that Cartier seemed to have picked up the word "Canada." Association of ideas might then have recalled to his mind the other African term, "Tuedec," and thus the destined capital of new France might have obtained its name. I give these conjectures as I find them, more as curiosities than as having any probability.

Abbé Cuoq, who is one of the best Indian scholars in North America, has settled the derivation of Canada. In his "Lexique de la Langue Iroquoise avec Notes et Appendices," I find the following definition: "Kanata: Ville, village, bourg, bourgade, camp, campement de plusieurs, group de tentes. De là le nom de Canada auquel on a voulu, tout récemment encore, mais toujours sans fondement solide, assigner une toute autre étymologie."

---

(Communicated by MR. WILLIAM McLENNAN.)

The exact scene of De Maisonneuve's exploit with the Iroquois chief in 1644, discussed in the March number, has always been a disputed point, and from its being styled the "Exploit of the Place d'Armes" by modern writers, it has been frequently held that the old Place d'Armes, Custom House Square, is meant. The Abbé Rousseau, in his Vie de De Maisonneuve, page 77, upholds this view. But the Abbé Faillon, in his exhaustive and authoritative Histoire de la Colonie Française, Vol. II, p. 25, gives his cogent reasons for the present Place d'Armes. The story is so familiar that we need not repeat it here, but an examination of the surroundings may help us to determine the probable scene of the encounter.

The Hotel Dieu, at the corner of St. Paul and the present St. Sulpice streets, was the first building of importance erected beyond the immediate limits of the Fort, and even this was at a distance of not more than three hundred yards. The work there was being pushed forward with all rapidity, and there was constant passing to and fro between the Fort and this point. The little colony had too practical an experience with the methods of Indian warfare to neglect so simple a precaution as that of removing the natural means of ambush along such a road, and it is improbable in any case that the river front was heavily wooded. So that the chemin de traine referred to in Dollier de Casson's account, p. 52, cannot mean an open road that had been in daily use almost since the first settlement, and ran directly from the Fort over the site of the square long afterwards known as the Place d'Armes, to the Hotel Dieu. This chemin de traine was broken by carrying wood to the new buildings, and in all probability ran up towards the rising ground which reaches its height between Notre Dame and St. James streets, and in all likelihood along the line of the present St. Sulpice street. This direction is the more probable from the fact that the road used by the Indians to gain the mountain, as shown on a map of 1680, ran by the north-west corner of the present Place d'Armes, and as the usual landing-place was inside the little island now covered by the Island Wharf, it probably ran up or near St. Sulpice street and through the present Place d'Armes.

Here we have a place which would allow for the action and time required by the narrative. The men were scattered behind the trees and made a good fight until the ammunition began to fail, and as they were badly supplied with snow-shoes, a retreat was ordered to the chemin de traine, for firmer footing. This reached, they broke and ran, and De Maisonneuve retreated, facing the enemy, and from time to time stopping and menacing them as they pressed too closely. When the open road to the Fort was reached the fugitives were nearly cut down by the cannon of the Fort trained on the open road, the sentinel mistaking them for the enemy, and as it all occurred on a fine March morning, they must have been some distance away. De Maisonneuve had not yet appeared, and his fate was unknown until a few minutes afterwards, when he entered safe and sound after his perilous adventure. Had it occurred on the old Place d'Armes, not two hundred yards away, it would have been in full sight of the watching garrison. Bearing the above in mind, I think, although we may not agree with the preciseness with which M. Faillon places the exploit, we must conclude that the old Place d'Armes cannot have been the place; that it was at some distance beyond, and probably to the north of, the Hotel Dieu, and may fairly accept the tradition which fixes it as the present Place d'Armes.

[Communicated by MR. CHARLES M. HOLT.]

The following interesting item is from the note book of Mr. W. B. Lambe: "June 26, 1856.—Rev. Joseph Abbott, formerly Rector of St. Andrews, Canada, afterwards lecturer in History, McGill College, Montreal, told me that George Washington, first President of the U. S. of America, was born in Westmoreland, England, about six miles from where Abbott himself was born. That Washington was christened by the Vicar of the Parish (Burns, whose son was the author of 'Burns' Justice'), and that Washington was taken from England to America by his parents when about two months old. Rev. Mr. Abbott, at my request, wrote for a certificate from the Register of the Parish and received for reply 'that the register had been defaced.'"

Publications Received.

THE MYSTERIOUS STRANGER or Memoirs of the Noted Henry More Smith. By Walter Bates, Esquire. Saint John, N.B.; printed by Geo. W. Day, corner Prince William and Princess streets. 5th Edition. 1887.

[Communicated by the Secy. of the New Brunswick Historical Society.]

One of the most popular publications, of a social character, in the Province of New Brunswick, is the pamphlet entitled "The Mysterious Stranger; or, Memoirs of the Noted Henry More Smith." This little book, it is stated on the title page, contains "a correct account of his extraordinary conduct during the thirteen months of his confinement in the jail of King's County, Province of New Brunswick, where he was convicted of horse stealing, and under sentence of death." It also purports to give "a sketch of his life and character from his first appearance at Windsor, in Nova Scotia, in the year 1812, until the time of his apprehension and confinement." To which is also added "a history of his career, embracing an account of his imprisonments and escapes, selected from the most authentic sources, both public and private." Walter Bates, Esq., the author, was High Sheriff of King's County during the period of Smith's imprisonment and for many years after.

Mr. Bates was born in Stamford, Connecticut, and came to New Brunswick in the spring of 1783 with the Loyalists.

Henry More Smith was an accomplished vagabond and thief, who found in the good old Loyalist, Sheriff Bates, a biographer of no mean order, and the popularity of the book has no doubt been due entirely to the powers of description displayed by the author in the simple narrative he has so well written. Six editions of the book have been printed since its first appearance in 1830, and the sale still continues. Smith's misdeeds and adventures excited at the time of their occurrence a great deal of interest in the rural districts of the Province, and ignorant persons were disposed to attribute his cleverness to dealings with Satan. Many of the old residents of the locality who have, during the last few years, passed away, were never weary of relating anecdotes of this remarkable man, and relics of his mechanical skill were preserved in the parish for many years after his departure. The book is of great local historic value, and many of the names recorded on its pages have become famous in the annals of New Brunswick. The old jail at Kingston, where the "noted Henry More Smith" was imprisoned, has long since disappeared, and Kingston itself has also ceased to be the shiretown of King's County, but a short distance from the site of the old jail still stands the parish church, where the good sheriff and his family worshipped, and close to the entrance in the graveyard, by which it is almost surrounded, stands a square freestone column, beneath which rests the mortal remains of the staunch Loyalist and his wife, and on it is cut this epitaph :

In memory of
WALTER BATES, Esq.,
High Sheriff of this County,
who died
February 11th, A.D., 1842,
Aged 82 years.

MRS. ABIGAIL BATES,
Wife of
WALTER BATES, Esq.,
Who died July 6, 1820,
In the 58th year of her age.

Several of the prominent persons mentioned by Sheriff Bates in his little book sleep in that neglected churchyard, "the sleep that knows no waking," and on many of the headstones, scattered around, the record is cut that the sleeper was a United Empire Loyalist.

St. John, N.B., March, 1889.

JONAS HOWE.