As I have reason to believe that the most important of my despatches from Upper Canada were, contrary to usual custom, submitted for the decision of the Cabinet, I am perfectly sensible that the publication of this volume must draw upon me the whole force of Government.

The despatches which it contains were almost, without exception, written either during the day, while I was constantly interrupted, or late at night, when I was tired. Several were actually despatched in the rough draft, and such was the pressure of public business, that I had seldom time to revise them.

The general plan of my communications to the Colonial Office was unequivocally to explain the expected result of my proposed measures, which, having been long ago carried into effect, must now be tested by the triple ordeal of the future, present, and past; and, as it has so happened that this volume has been published with extraordinary celerity (it has been printed in a week), I think it cannot be denied that,—as I have no political connexion with any party, as I do not address myself to any party, and as there does not exist in either House of Parliament a single member who can stand up and say that, directly or indirectly, I have in any way solicited his assistance on this or any subject,—I can have but little to support me in an unequal contest but the justness of my cause.

I have neither explanations nor professions to offer. Why do I publish these despatches? Am I actuated by public principle or private feeling? What do I expect to gain by the course I am adopting? Will it be of any service to the country in general, or to our North American colonies in particular?

To all of the above questions one answer will suffice. Reader, peruse the volume, and then judge for yourself. Its copyright I have presented to my worthy publisher; and now, as I have long wished to do, submitted to the country the result of my experience in the administration of the government of Upper Canada, I abandon it to find its own level among the mass of Reports and Documents which are already struggling to obtain the consideration of the public.

CHAPTER I.

Preliminary History—The Elevation of Mr. M'Kenzie, and the recall, by the Colonial Office, of His Excellency Major General Sir John Colborne.

MR. M'KENZIE, who has caused the effusion of so much British blood and money, was, it is believed, an insignificant pedlar-lad, who, about eighteen years ago, having transferred himself to America, under disreputable circumstances, succeeded in becoming the shop or errand-boy of a notorious Republican at Toronto.

After living for some years in this description of society, he gradually brought himself into notice by the extraordinary talent he displayed in inventing gross falsehoods, and, as his radical associates acutely perceived that such poisonous misrepresentations flowing through the province would by degrees sicken the loyalty of those, who secluded in the backwoods, were completely dependent for political information on the local press, he was strongly encouraged to throw aside his shopman's apron, and to set up a newspaper.

With this detestable object in view, Mr. M'Kenzie's exertions for many years were really almost superhuman. Every hardship, whether of wood, wind, or weather, which the settler encountered in his lonely residence in the forest, was, by some falsehood or other, ingeniously shown to proceed indirectly from Downing-street, or directly from the Government House, or Legislative Council, at Toronto. Every magistrate, militia officer, postmaster, or schoolmaster, who in any way misbehaved himself, either in public or private, was declared to be an especial favourite of the Government; artful comparisons were constantly unfairly made between the condition of the old densely-peopled districts of the United States, and the young settlements of Upper Canada, the difference being of course attributed to the withering influence of monarchical institutions. After these mischievous misrepresentations (which lowered if it were possible, Mr. M'Kenzie in the estimation of every honest, intelligent man) had sufficiently shaken the loyalty of those who, secluded in moral darkness, had unfortunately listened to his tales, he considered that the time had arrived for getting up some vague petition to the Colonial Secretary for the general correction of "grievances." In order to obtain sufficient signatures for this purpose, it is perfectly notorious, throughout Upper Canada, that the most barefaced and impudent deceptions were practised. In various directions agents were employed who, themselves, affixed the names or marks of all who could be induced to acknowledge they had any one thing to complain of: indeed, several worthy individuals were added to the list, who actually believed they had joined in a loyal address. The names and signatures thus collected in batches, on separate pieces of paper, were then all pasted together, and, with scarcely anything but these credentials in his wallet, and with unprincipled impudence as his companion, this low adventurer (by one of those eccentric chances which occasionally characterise the course of an impostor's life) returned to his mother-country, to introduce himself in Downing-street to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, leaving behind him in Upper Canada that kind of character which, with more wit than elegance, has been thus quaintly described by an American writer:—

"He is, without exception, the most notorious liar in all our country. He lies out of every pore in his skin. Whether he be sleeping or waking, on foot or on horseback, talking with his neighbours or writing for a newspaper, a multitudinous swarm of lies, visible, palpable, and tangible, are buzzing and settling about him like flies around a horse in August."

One would have thought that the infamous notoriety of this low-bred, vulgar man would have secured the Governor and Legislature of Upper Canada from his libellous and seditious accusations; but, alas! the very fact of his undertaking a journey of nearly 4000 miles shows pretty clearly that Mr. M'Kenzie shrewdly suspected that the Colonial Office would not be very inimical to his demands.

The reception which Mr. M'Kenzie met with in Downing-street, he has boastingly explained by the following letters, which are only a part of many he has published in Upper Canada, in order triumphantly to demonstrate the accredited importance with which he had been received, notwithstanding the documents, of which he was the advocate, had not passed through the executive government, or before either branch of the Legislature of Upper Canada.

Colonial Office, July 26, 1832.

SIR,

Lord Goderich has desired me to acknowledge the receipt of your papers, and I have the honour to inform you that his Lordship regrets he cannot appoint an earlier day than Friday, the 3rd of August. On that day, however, at two o'clock, he will be glad to see you at this office.

I have the honour to be,

Your most obedient,

Humble Servant,

CHARLES DOUGLAS.

W. L. M'KENZIE, Esquire,

Downing Street, 8th September, 1832.

SIR,

I am directed by Lord Goderich to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the 27th August and 5th September. In answer to these communications, I have to inform you that the other addresses, as well as that from the Niagara district have in the usual manner been laid before his Majesty, and you are at liberty to state this fact to the persons by whom they have been signed, without receiving a separate answer to each.

With respect to the war losses and the state of the representation, although, of course, he can enter into no discussion with any private individual on those subjects, Lord Goderich is willing to receive and to pay such attention as they may seem to require to any further written statements you may think fit to submit to him. If you have anything to offer which can only be verbally communicated, his Lordship will not refuse on his return to town, to afford you such opportunities of addressing him as his other avocations will allow.

(Signed) HOWICK.

To W. L. M'KENZIE, Esquire.

Colonial Office, Tuesday, 26th.

SIR,

I am desired by Lord Goderich to propose to you to call here on Saturday next, at two, instead of tomorrow, at half-past twelve, as the House of Lords meet at one o'clock to send up an address to his Majesty.

I am, Sir,

Your humble servant,

B. J. BALFOUR.

To W. L. M'KENZIE, Esquire,
&c. &c.

Colonial Office, November 2, Tuesday.

SIR,

Lord Goderich has desired me to express to you his regret that the pressure of business should have prevented him seeing you since his return to town. He now begs leave to propose one o'clock on Tuesday next, at this office, for the interview you desire.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient Servant,

B. J. BALFOUR.

W. L. M'KENZIE, Esquire,
&c. &c.

Colonial Office, November 5th.

Lord Goderich presents his compliments to Mr. M'Kenzie. He finds himself obliged to change the proposed hour for interview to-morrow to twelve o'clock instead of one, which he hopes will not be inconvenient to Mr. M'Kenzie.

W. L. M'KENZIE, Esquire.

Colonial Office, November 6th.

Lord Goderich is sorry to be again obliged to put Mr. M'Kenzie off. He has now to propose twelve o'clock on Wednesday, instead of twelve to-morrow.

W. L. M'KENZIE, Esquire.

In this country, people will scarcely comprehend why Mr. M'Kenzie should (writing the words "Esquire" and "your most obedient humble servant" at full length) have published with so much ostentation copies of the above commonplace communications. In a small community, however, considerable importance is attached to any interview with a minister; and in colonial society this distinction is not only, by the vulgar, looked upon as an honour, but, by the most sensible and reflecting, it is justly considered as a political advantage which may be productive of very serious results.

The following memorandum, which Mr. M'Kenzie published in Upper Canada, together with the notes which have been just quoted, sufficiently show the mischievous application that may be made of these improper interviews.

(Copy.)

Memorandum.—On Wednesday, the 7th of November, 1832, I had the honour of a very long interview with the Secretary of State; and on the day following the despatch was written, which is an answer, in part, to my representations.

(Signed) W. L. M'KENZIE.

The despatch from the Colonial Minister to His Excellency Sir John Colborne, to which Mr. M'Kenzie here alludes, is one of the most extraordinary public documents ever published in Upper Canada. It begins as follows:

(Copy.)

Downing-street, Nov. 8, 1832.

SIR,

During several months past, I have been in occasional communication with Mr. William M'Kenzie upon the subject of the grievances said to exist in Upper Canada, and for redress of which various petitions have been addressed to His Majesty. I propose in this despatch to follow Mr. M'Kenzie through those parts of his statement, respecting the representation of the inhabitants in the House of General Assembly, which appear to me essential to the consideration of the practical questions he has undertaken to agitate.

The despatch accordingly obsequiously follows Mr. M'Kenzie through the whole course of his most insulting abuse of the executive, legislative, civil and religious authorities of the colony; and in one instance, merely because Mr. M'Kenzie, an unprincipled, vagrant grievance-monger, had complained "that the law, as interpreted by the Court of King's Bench, entitles the county members only to wages," without asking His Excellency Sir John Colborne or the House of Assembly itself for explanation or vindication, the despatch says, "I have no right to interfere with the deliberations of the Council, but I am able to signify to you his Majesty's pleasure that you should not oppose any objection to ANY LAW which may be presented for your acceptance for placing the town and county representations on the same footing in this respect."

Again, because Mr. M'Kenzie had complained that various religious bodies, not choosing to take an oath, were excluded from the elective franchise, the despatch most humbly says, "I shall be happy to introduce a bill into parliament for amending this part of the constitutional Act of 1791, unless there should appear to be some difficulty in that measure which does not occur to me at present."

The influence of the crown appears to have been as successfully attacked by Mr. M'Kenzie as the great constitutional Act of 1791, for, in reply to Mr. M'Kenzie's accusations that "the crown possessed an undue influence in the Provincial Legislature," the despatch says, "If this could be shown, his Majesty would not hesitate to assent to ANY LAW which might be passed for the purpose of limiting the number of persons holding offices at pleasure who should be permitted at one time to sit there."

This uncalled for surrender of the influence of the crown, when compared with succeeding events, forms a most melancholy illustration of the following ominous prophecy, with which it was officially accompanied: "Mr. M'Kenzie," says the despatch to Sir John Colborne, "has concluded his paper by predictions of bloodshed and civil war, and a dissolution of the connexion between Upper Canada and this kingdom.

"But against gloomy prophecies of this nature every man conversant with public business must learn to fortify his mind. They have ever been the resource of those who endeavour to extort from the fears of government concessions in favour of which no adequate reasons could be urged."

Nothing could be more applicable to Mr. M'Kenzie than the above remark, and yet, as if to prove how much easier it is to preach wisdom than to practise it, the despatch concludes by saying to his Excellency Sir John Colborne,—

"I have received these documents from Mr. M'Kenzie, not merely as expressing his own opinion, but also as explanatory of the views of those who have deputed him to represent what they call their grievances to his Majesty. To them, the utmost possible respect is due.

"Having written this despatch with a view to publicity, you have my authority to make it public in whatever manner you may think most convenient."

Now, instead of appearing at the Colonial Office as a broken-down pedlar and a notorious disturber of the public mind, let us suppose that Mr. M'Kenzie had come from a distant colony to the Horse Guards, to complain against the military officer in command,—can any one believe that Lord Hill would have taken any other notice of the complainant than mildly, but firmly, to have desired him to transmit his communication through his commanding officer?

In case a sailor, or even a naval officer, were to come up to London to abuse his commodore, would not the Admiralty pursue the same course, and ought not our colonial governors and legislators to be supported by the Colonial Office with that common caution which would induce every judge and magistrate, or, indeed, any sensible person, not to deliver, or even to form, an opinion on an ex parte statement? Yet, in the case before us, the accusations of a man of broken character and fortune against his Excellency Sir John Colborne, against every constituted authority, and against the feelings of every respectable inhabitant in Upper Canada, were not only listened to by repeated appointments, but replied to "with the utmost possible respect" in the elaborate despatch above alluded to.

What were Sir John Colborne's feelings, on unexpectedly receiving this most extraordinary communication, it surely cannot be necessary to divulge, as the sentiments of the other two branches of the Legislature of Upper Canada sufficiently appear from the following published extracts of their admirable, constitutional, and indignant reply to the message in which the Lieutenant Governor transmitted to them a copy of the unfortunate document in question.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY SIR JOHN COLBORNE,

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

We, his Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the legislative council of Upper Canada, in provincial parliament assembled, beg leave to express our thanks to your Excellency for laying before us an original despatch, written to your Excellency by the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies, on the 8th of November last, containing his Lordship's observations at great length upon a variety of statements made to him by Mr. W. L. M'Kenzie, an inhabitant of this town.

The statements upon which these comments have been framed have also been laid before us by your Excellency; but, without entering into any particular consideration of their contents, with which the council had little desire to become acquainted, enough appears in the tenor of his Lordship's observations to make it manifest that those statements have been made with a very unusual disregard of truth, and in a spirit of wanton and intemperate hostility to the legislative and executive authorities in this province.

We cannot say that it may not possibly give satisfaction to some persons in this province to observe the condescending and respectful manner in which representations of so peculiar a description, proceeding from an individual, have been received and replied to, notwithstanding it was evident they were outrageously insulting to all the constituted authorities of this colony, and scarcely less so to the people at large, in imputing to them sentiments and feelings by which they never have been, and we are convinced never will be, actuated. It is not in the nature of things, however, that the legislative council, or that any portion of the people in this province, of sound hearts and understandings, having the truth under their view, can regard such statements as compose Mr. McKenzie's voluminous correspondence with his Majesty's Secretary of State in any other manner than with the most unqualified contempt—a contempt which, upon every principle on which character is acquired or lost, we think it must be more conducive to the public interests and honour, and to all the ends of good government, to avow than disclaim. So far, therefore, as the despatch of his Majesty's Secretary of State is to be considered as a reply to those statements, or as a commentary upon information derived from the same source, we cannot regard it as calling for the serious attention of the legislative council.

We appeal, however, to the intimate knowledge of this colony which your Excellency has acquired during a residence of four years, for a confirmation of our remark, that, upon several of the questions which in this despatch are most elaborately discussed, no dissatisfaction or difficulty prevails, or ever has prevailed; that no person living here ever heard or imagined before that they were seriously talked of or thought of as grievances; and that the minds of the people are so far from being disquieted by them, that it is probable not a word would be heard upon them in travelling from one extremity of the province to the other, and in mingling with its industrious population through every portion of it.

It has been painful to the legislative council to see that, in a discussion founded upon these documents, the office of Lieutenant-Governor of this province, and the names of some of the most responsible of the King's servants, are even hypothetically connected with imputations which no one can easily tolerate to find connected with his name.

(Signed) JOHN B. ROBINSON,
SPEAKER.

Legislative Council Chamber,
2nd day of February, 1833.

★ TO HIS EXCELLENCY SIR JOHN COLBORNE,
&c. &c. &c.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY :

We, his Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Upper Canada, in Provincial Parliament assembled, return our thanks for your Excellency's message of the twelfth day of January last, transmitting a despatch of the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in answer to certain letters and documents addressed to his Lordship for the purpose of proving that the people of this happy and prosperous colony are oppressed and burthened with grievances, and have become so discontented that there is danger of revolt and bloodshed, unless these alleged burthens and grievances are removed and redressed.

We most readily concede that the noble Secretary of State was actuated by the best motives in framing the despatch in question; but we cannot refrain from expressing our great regret that it did not occur to his Lordship that allegations thus deeply affecting the character of his Majesty's subjects of Upper Canada rested on no better testimony than that of an individual who had been twice expelled this House, and who, in consequence of his having fabricated and reiterated libels of the grossest description, had been declared unfit and unworthy a seat in the Assembly during the present parliament. If this fact had occurred to his Lordship, it is reasonable to suppose that he would not have felt himself at liberty to recognise the author of this additional calumny on the people of this province as the agent, or as speaking the sentiments, of any portion of the loyal inhabitants of the province of Upper Canada, and would therefore have considered it utterly unnecessary to enter into so elaborate an examination or refutation of anything advanced by him.

(Signed)

ARCHIBALD M'LEAN,
SPEAKER.

Commons House of Assmblly,
9th day of February, 1833.

One would have thought that the manly indignation displayed in these high-spirited, loyal remonstrances from both branches of the Canadian Legislature would have induced the Colonial Office to have drawn in for ever the horns with which even then it was feeling its way towards democracy: however, Mr. M'Kenzie had still access to the department, and, as her Majesty's Attorney and Solicitor generals of Upper Canada had joined in ignominiously expelling him from the House of Assembly, he determined to endeavour to display the almost royal influence he possessed, by making it appear that he had induced the Colonial Minister to dismiss both these officers from his Majesty's service. Accordingly, with this object in view, he has published in Upper Canada the following note and memorandum:—

(Copy.)

Lord Howick presents his compliments to Mr. M'Kenzie, and will be happy to see him, if he will be good enough to call on him, Monday, at twelve o'clock.

Colonial Office, 7th March, 1833.

Memorandum.—This note was addressed to me on the occasion on which the Colonial Office resolved to change the Attorney and Solicitor generals of Upper Canada, in answer to my representations as to their conduct.

(Signed) W. L. M'KENZIE.

Accordingly, within one day of the date of Lord Howick's note, a despatch (6th March, 1833, and published by Mr. M'Kenzie) was addressed to Sir John Colborne, which, after referring to the part which the two crown officers had taken in joining in the votes for the expulsion of Mr. M'Kenzie, concluded by saying, "I have received his Majesty's commands to inform you that he regrets that he can no longer avail himself of their services, and that, from the time of your receiving this despatch, they are to be relieved from the duties imposed upon them in their respective offices."

At the time this despatch was written it was known to every loyal man in the North American colonies that Mr. M'Kenzie was secretly, in his heart, the same rebel and the same traitor which experience has since proved him to be; and, although it might have been deemed impolitic in the crown officers to avow their natural hostility to such a being, yet the bare fact of the Colonial Office publicly expelling them with ignominy at the very moment when it was known that Mr. M'Kenzie was revelling in Downing-street, reading confidential communications which ought never to have been submitted to him, had the effect of disheartening the British, and of encouraging the republicans to believe most confidently that the Colonial Office was with them, and that, with that resistless engine to assist them, their dark nameless object must eventually succeed.

On Mr. M'Kenzie's return from England he was accordingly hailed by the republicans, or anti-British, as their "conquering hero," and, supported as he had been in Downing-street, it was not surprising that he succeeded in regaining a seat in the House of Assembly, where he was enabled to ejaculate falsehoods almost faster than his own infamous newspaper and the republican press could manage to print them.

The loyal being dispirited, it was not surprising that at the next election the republicans should be successful. Accordingly, at the meeting of the session in January, 1835, a large majority of republican members (13 of whom actually were Americans) was obtained. Mr. Bidwell, an avowed enemy to monarchical institutions, and an incurable American in his mind, manner, and utterance, was elected Speaker; and, as Mr. M'Kenzie's grievances had proved so fruitful and so successful to the radical cause, it was determined to sicken the loyalists by a second dose, and, accordingly, before the session was a fortnight old, a grievance committee was appointed as follows:—

1. W. L. M'Kenzie,

For whose apprehension for treason, murder, arson, and highway robbery a reward of £1,000 is now offered.

2. T. D. Morrison,

Since tried for treason, and has suddenly quitted the province.

3. David Gibson,

One of M'Kenzie's principal officers in the battle of Gallows Hill, on which day, having absconded, he is now out-lawed as a traitor, a reward of £500 having been offered for his apprehension.

4. Charles Waters,

A notorious republican.

Although the transparent veil, which covered rather than concealed the character of this committee, had not as yet rebelliously been cast aside, still it was just as evident in our North American colonies then as it is now, that the whole and sole objects for which these republicans were striving were—

1. Separation of the Canadas from the mother-country.
2. The robbery and murder of the loyal inhabitants.
3. The attainment of that general letter of licence which is the natural effect, in a young, thinly peopled country, of a sudden transition to democracy.

It was perfectly well known to every man of character in Upper Canada that, because the report of this Grievance Committee would be written by its chairman, Mr. M'Kenzie, it could possibly not, in the nature of things, contain anything but a confused mass of falsehoods and misrepresentations, forming the basis of new demands upon the Colonial Office, that the power of the Lieutenant-Governor should be weakened—that his Executive Council should be made "responsible to the people," and that the Legislative Council, which corresponds with our House of Lords, should also be elected by "the people."

All this being clearly foreseen, it became necessary for Mr. M'Kenzie and his colleagues, in delivering themselves of their report, to have recourse to a considerable degree of stratagem. Accordingly, a very few days before the close of the session, Mr. M'Kenzie, at midnight, brought up in the House of Assembly, when it was thinly attended, this report of the Grievance Committee, which, WITHOUT BEING READ, was merely received and laid on the table. It was not adopted, but, on its being artfully proposed that 2000 copies of it should be printed in "pamphlet form" (thereby giving the house to understand that this report, whatever it might contain, was after all a mere pamphlet), even this was opposed and eventually carried only by a majority of eight.

On the following morning, and on the two succeeding days, several members inquired for this Grievance Report, but for three days it could not anywhere be found, until it was again produced by Mr. M'Kenzie himself, who was obliged to confess he had taken it home with him; and it is now well known that he did so for the purpose of surreptitiously inserting, previous to its being printed, a quantity of additional matter; and with this base transaction the session closed.

At the end of May the report of the Committee was printed, and, when it made its appearance, instead of being in "pamphlet form," it turned out to be a large octavo grievance volume, in boards, containing 553 closely-printed pages; and it has been calculated (I believe accurately) that there exist in this book more than three times as many gross falsehoods as pages!

As every respectable inhabitant in the colony knew that nothing but wilful misrepresentations could proceed from the pen of Mr. M'Kenzie, the insulting libels which this report contained on the Executive Government, the Executive Council, the Legislative Council, and on every thing that is venerated in our social fabric, were treated with indifference and contempt, and by no one more so than by His Excellency Sir John Colborne, who at once forwarded the infamous volume to the Colonial Office, with a few short observations, pointing out the glaring "falsehoods" it contained.

On the arrival in Downing-street of this huge book of grievances, declared by the Lieutenant-Governor to be full of "falsehoods," which had not appeared before or even been alluded to by the Legislative or Executive Councils, and which had neither been read nor adopted by the House of the representatives of the people of Upper Canada, one would have thought that the Colonial Office would have recollected the punishment under which it had lately smarted—first, by the stern, manly rebuke it had received from both Houses of the Legislature, for having, without consulting them, recommended legislative proceedings on Mr. M'Kenzie's alleged grievances—and, secondly, by the humiliating necessity to which it had been reduced, of publicly restoring to office the two crown officers who (Mr. M'Kenzie has stated) were dismissed in consequence of his representation.

One would have thought that, as "a burnt child dreads the fire," such fatal experience would have taught the Colonial Office to shudder at the very name of Mr. M'Kenzie—that it would have taught the Office to place a just confidence in the Lieutenant-Governor of the colony, and never again by listening to ex-parte unofficial statements, to subvert all rule and government, by giving the Governor and Legislature the go-by. But the policy of the Colonial Office was immovable—its course unalterable—its malady incurable; and, though it was perfectly aware of the struggle that was taking place on the continent of America between monarchy and democracy, it deliberately threw its immense influence into the wrong scale!

Accordingly, instead of disregarding this unadopted, and even unread, report of a party who have since shown they were a nest of traitors; instead of supporting the Executive Government, which had been infamously reviled, they came to the determination, not only to recall His Excellency Sir John Colborne from his post, principally because he had treated this report with silent contempt, but, as if to gild the fame, or rather the infamy of Mr. M'Kenzie, they resolved to submit for the King's approval a series of drastic remedies for almost all the fictitious disorders which the wicked report of Mr. M'Kenzie had detailed. That brave and gallant veteran officer Sir John Colborne (whom though a slight difference exists between us, I both respect and regard) was accordingly officially apprized that he would immediately be removed—remedial concessions were framed—the loyal population were again disheartened—the republicans again improperly boasted that the Home Government was with them;—and thus ends the first chapter of the political accidents it has become my melancholy fortune to relate.

CHAPTER II.

The History of my Appointment to the Government of Upper Canada in November, 1835.

It had blown almost a hurricane from the S. S. W.—the sheep in Romney Marsh had huddled together in groups—the cattle, afraid to feed, were still standing with their tails to the storm—I had been all day immured in New Romney with the board of guardians of the Marsh Union; and though, several times my horse had been nearly blown off the road, I had managed to return to my lodging at Cranbrook; and, with my head full of the unions, parishes, magistrates, guardians, relieving officers, and paupers of the county of Kent, like Abon Hassan, I had retired to rest, and for several hours had been fast asleep, when, about midnight, I was suddenly awakened by the servant of my lodging, who, with a letter in one hand, and in the other a tallow candle, illumining an honest countenance, not altogether free from alarm, hurriedly informed me, "That a King's Officer had come after me!"

What could possibly be the matter in the workhouse of this busy world I could not clearly conceive; however, sitting up in my bed, I opened the letter, which, to my utter astonishment, was from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, expressing a wish that I should accept the government of Upper Canada; and that, if possible, I would call upon him with my answer, at half-past eight the following morning, as at nine o'clock he was to set out for Brighton, to see the King.

As I was totally unconnected with every member of the Government, and had never had the honour even of seeing Lord Glenelg in my life, I was altogether at a loss to conceive why this appointment should have been offered to me. However, as it appeared there was no time to be lost, I immediately got up, and, returning to London in the chaise of the King's messenger who had brought me the communication, I reached my own house at Kensington at six o'clock, and having consulted with my family, whose opinions on the subject of the appointment I found completely coincided with my own, I waited upon Lord Glenelg at his residence, at the hour appointed (half-past eight,) when I most respectfully, and very gratefully, declined the appointment.

To this determination Lord Glenelg very obligingly replied, by repeating to me his wish to be enabled to submit my name to the King for so important and difficult a trust: he begged me to reconsider the subject; and, in order that I might be enabled to do so, he requested me to go and converse with his under-secretary, Mr. Stephen, who, his Lordship said would give me every information on the subject.

Nothing could be more uncongenial to my habits, disposition, and opinions than the station that was offered to me: while on the other hand, as regarded my appointment in the poor-law commission, never had I been engaged in a service the duties of which had so completely engrossed my mind. Rightly or wrongly, it now matters not, I fancied that, against prejudice and clamour, I should eventually succeed in the noblest, and to my mind the most interesting of all services, that of reviving the character and condition of the English labourer; and as, notwithstanding the unpopularity of the new Act, I had, thanks to the magistrates, yeomanry, and farmers of the county of Kent, carried it into effect by acclamation, the pleasure as well as interest of the task was daily increasing.

If the poor-law commissioners had expressed the slightest wish to remove me from Kent to any station of greater difficulty, or even of danger, it would of course have been my especial duty not to have declined; but as the Colonial Office had not the slightest claim upon me, and as I was really grossly ignorant of everything that in any way related to the government of our colonies, I continued, so far as my own wishes, and even interests were concerned, to adhere to my opinion.

Still, however, I did not like to persist in refusing my humble services to the King's Government, after they had been twice required of me; and accordingly, walking towards Downing-street, under this confliction of feelings, it was with considerable reluctance that I entered the door of the Colonial Office.

In obedience to a principle which I need not repeat, I at last without any further reference to my family, expressed to Mr. Stephen that I would undertake the duty; and accordingly a letter was, without delay despatched to Brighton to Lord Glenelg, who, on receiving it, immediately submitted to the King my name, of which his Majesty was graciously pleased to approve.

I must now mention a few details which, though not very interesting to relate, had perhaps better not be withheld from the public.

In my interview with Mr. Stephen I learnt that, from motives of economy, which, in a moment of so much alleged danger, I could not clearly comprehend, there would be a difficulty in continuing to me an aid-de-camp, and that, not only was I to receive £500 a-year less salary than my predecessor, but that, instead of his military remuneration, which amounted, I understood, to nearly £1000 a-year, I was to forfeit to the Government my half-pay as major in the army.

With respect to these arrangements, I at once very distinctly observed to Mr. Stephen that, although it was, of course, utterly impossible for me even to imagine what would be the official expenses to which I should be subjected, yet that, as so many governors, one after another, were supposed to have failed in their missions, and as the difficulties which had overcome them were declared to have increased rather than to have diminished, I considered it was unreasonable, as well as imprudent, in the Government to ask me to encounter them with diminished means. I told Mr. Stephen that to go without an aid-de-camp to a disturbed colony, where the Governor had always been seen to have one, would in my opinion be impolitic; and I added that, as I was altogether below my predecessors (Sir Peregrine Maitland and Sir John Colborne) in military rank, and that as I was to be divested of the command of the troops, I thought the civil elevation of a baronetcy ought to be conferred upon me.

In short, my argument ran upon the theory that I thought I ought not to go into action without as many shot in my locker, and as much support, as my predecessors had had. I declared I wanted no more.

In reply, Mr. Stephen admitted the justness of my theory. He told me that I ought to have an aid-de-camp—that he thought I should be justified in insisting that my official expenses, as Lord Gosford's had been, should be defrayed—that if a batch of baronets were to be created there would be no difficulty; but there were so many applications for the distinction, that he thought Lord Melbourne might feel he would create jealousy by a single appointment.

The following day I did not see Lord Glenelg; but, as I had been apprized that, in order that the King's promise to the Legislature of Upper Canada, to give his answer in January, should not be broken, it would be necessary I should sail in a very few days, I thought it advisable that, before I was gazetted, I should repeat in writing the requests I had made to Mr. Stephen. I accordingly did this, and myself delivered the communication to Mr. Stephen, who however advised me not to force it officially upon Lord Glenelg, but to leave him perhaps to speak to his Lordship on the subject.

I had, I think, only one short interview with Lord Glenelg before I went to the King, at which, though my attention was of course occupied with higher subjects, I very shortly submitted to his Lordship (in presence, if I recollect right, of Sir George Grey) the propriety of my being raised as nearly as possible to the same level as my predecessor, to which general theory Lord Glenelg with his usual kindness of manner replied, "There is much truth in what you say."

On my arrival at Brighton, in order to be presented to the King, I explained the difficulty which had been raised about my aid-de-camp, to which it was replied, "You really ought not to go out without one!"

Everybody thus seemed to agree with my theory, and yet nothing was settled. At last Mr. Stephen took me to Lord Howick, and after considerable trouble I was authorised to appoint Lieut. Halkett, of the Coldstream Guards, as my aid-de-camp.

As my time was very short, my attention was much engrossed in reading over a voluminous correspondence which was placed before me in the Colonial Office. I had to wind up, or rather to cut, the thread of my business with the Poor-Law Commission, and had also my private affairs to settle; accordingly the day of my departure arrived without any terms with the Government having been satisfactorily settled. I had been subjected to considerable losses by being called upon so suddenly to break up my establishment; and for temporary outfit I had been thus subjected to expenses exceeding £500.

In order that the King's promise to the Legislature of Upper Canada should be fulfilled, instead of being sent, as had been customary, in a King's ship, I was desired to proceed with my suite, which consisted of my aid-de-camp, my civil secretary, &c., by the packet to New York, from whence I was to transport them, as well as my baggage, in the depth of winter, through the United States to Canada; and, in order to indemnify me for all these losses, outfit, and expenses, I was offered on the morning of my departure £300, of which, I was told, it would be necessary to retain £230 for the fees of my commission.

With my suite I immediately set off for Liverpool, and I was on board the New York packet, which was actually moving out of the harbour, when an official letter was delivered to me by post, cancelling the appointment of my aid-de-camp!

There was of course no time to remonstrate: however, as Lieut. Halkett, in order to join me, had obtained from the commanding officer of his regiment a year's leave of absence, I begged he would employ it by accompanying me to Toronto as my guest, which he accordingly did.

My arrival in Upper Canada will form the subject of the next chapter. I will therefore merely here state that, in the very few words which passed between Sir John Colborne and myself on the subject of official expenses, Sir John mentioned to me, in general terms, that these expenses had, during the ten years he had administered the government, exceeded his salary of Governor; and I had scarcely thus learned that the theory I had asserted in the Colonial Office was a practical fact, when I found that, even before I was sworn in, I was debtor to Sir John Colborne £1050 for stoves, kitchen apparatus, furniture of public rooms, &c., and that I should be required to pay another £1000 for horses, carriages, sleighs, linen, liveries, additional furniture, &c.

Considering that our valuable North American colonies were supposed almost by everybody in England, and especially by the Government, to be on the point of separating themselves from the parent state, I will merely ask, was it even politic in the King's Government to despatch me on so forlorn a hope, not only without sufficient means, but, morally speaking, as destitute of ammunition as General Whitelock's men were, when, without flints or fixed bayonets, they were wilfully marched towards inevitable defeat?

Whatever may be the opinion of the public on this subject, I shall always believe that, had I, inexperienced and unsupported, fallen as soon as I reached my post, his Majesty's Government would have been liable to impeachment for the loss of our North American colonies. Nevertheless, I really do them the justice to believe that they were so intoxicated by the insane theory of conciliating democracy, that they actually believed the people of Upper Canada would throw up their hats and be delighted at the vulgarity of seeing the representative of their sovereign arrive among them as an actor of all work, without dignity of station, demeanour, or conduct: in short, like a republican governor, who, from his cradle has been brought up to reckon "that all men are born equal"—that the fabric of human society has neither top nor bottom—that the protection of property of all description belongs to the multitude, and that the will of the mob is the real "law of the land."

CHAPTER III.

My arrival at Toronto—Strange impression concerning me—The conduct of the Loyalists—and of the Republicans—Copy of letter from Mr. Joseph Hume to Mr. M'Kenzie, found among Monsieur Papineau's baggage—My communication to His Majesty's Government.

THERE would be no end to this chapter were I to describe the simplicity of mind, ill-naturedly called ignorance, with which I approached the city of Toronto.

With Mr. M'Kenzie's heavy book of lamentations in my portmanteau, and with my remedial instructions in my writing-case, I considered myself as a political physician, who, whether regularly educated or not, was about to effect a surprising cure: for, as I never doubted for a moment either the existence of the 553 pages of grievances, nor that I would mercilessly destroy them root and branch, I felt perfectly confident that I should very soon be able proudly to report that the grievances of Upper Canada were defunct—in fact, that I had veni-ed, vidi-ed, and vici-ed them.

As, however, I was no more connected with human politics than the horses that were drawing me—as I had never joined any political party, had never attended a political discussion, and had never even voted at an election, or taken any part in one—it was with no little surprise that, as I drove into Toronto, I observed the walls placarded in large letters which designated me as

“SIR FRANCIS HEAD, A TRIED REFORMER.”

I could soon see that the loyalists looked upon me in this light, and, accordingly, on the very first appointment, that of Surveyor-General, which they themselves forced me to make, they almost one and all joined in a very improper petition to the King, which I am sure they have all since deeply regretted.

Exposed as I knew I must be to the political storm, it was to me a matter of the most perfect indifference from which quarter of the compass it proceeded. “I have the grievances of Upper Canada,” I said to myself, “and I have their remedies;” and, whether the Tories liked the medicine or whether they did not, I cared not a single straw.

Among those who in private audience presented themselves to me was Mr. Bidwell, the Speaker of the House of Assembly.

To this gentleman, who was the leader of the republicans, I expressed the same language which I had addressed to the leaders of the opposite party. I told him plainly that I was an inexperienced man, but that I would deal honestly towards the country; and, being resolutely determined to correct the grievances of the province, I at once took up the book which contained them, and invited Mr. Bidwell to converse with me freely on the subject.

To my utter astonishment, he told me that there were grievances not at all detailed in that book, which “the people” had long endured and were still enduring with great patience; that there was no desire to rebel, but that a morbid feeling of dissatisfaction was daily increasing—that increase it would, and that, in fact, if it had not been distinctly stated that I was the bearer of new instructions, those with whom he was associated had come to the determination never to meet in provincial parliament again. “What, do you mean, Sir,” said I, “that this book of grievances, which I have been especially sent to correct, does not contain the complaints of the province?” Mr. Bidwell repeated his former answer, and, from that day to the hour of his leaving the country, never could I get him to look at the book of grievances, but whenever I referred to it he invariably tried to decoy me to some other Will-o'-the-wisp complaint, which in like manner would have flown away before me had I attempted to approach it.

When Mr. M'Kenzie, bringing with him a letter of introduction from Mr. Hume, called upon me, I thought that of course HE would be too happy to discuss with me the contents of his own book, but his mind seemed to nauseate its subjects even more than Mr. Bidwell's. Afraid to look me in the face, he sat, with his feet not reaching the ground, and with his countenance averted from me, at an angle of about 70 degrees; while, with the eccentricity, the volubility, and indeed the appearance of a madman, the tiny creature raved in all directions about grievances here, and grievances there, which the Committee, he said, had not ventured to enumerate.

"Sir," I exclaimed, "Let us cure what we have got here first!" pointing to the book before me. But no, nothing that I could say would induce this pedler to face his own report; and I soon found that the book had the same effect upon all the republican members, and that, like the repellent end of a magnet, I had only to present it to the radicals to drive them from the very object which His Majesty's Government expected would have possessed attraction.

Although I had arrived in total darkness, the light of truth at once now bursting upon my mind, I perceived most clearly that the republicans had over-reached themselves; or, in still plainer terms, that they had killed the goose which had been laying them golden eggs. The following Guy-Faux letter from Mr. Joseph Hume, M. P., to Mr. M'Kenzie, points out the cautious, cunning, bit-by-bit course of "reform," which, in order to attain their treasonable object, the republicans in our colonies ought to have adopted, instead of dangerously asking for too much at a time, or of ever rashly committing the sum total of their grievances to paper.

This letter, which was taken among Mr. Papineau's baggage after he had absconded, was endorsed in the traitor's own hand-writing as follows :

"Jos. Hume. Addressed to W. L. M'Kenzie, advice respecting the policy to be pursued by him."

---

"To William Lyon M'Kenzie, of Toronto."

"London, December 5th, 1835."

"MY DEAR SIR,

"You will learn, with as much pleasure as surprise, of the recall of your present Lieutenant-Governor, and of the appointment of Sir Francis Head to succeed him. Of the causes which produced this very fortunate change I will not now dilate, but congratulate you and the people of the province of the choice made of Sir Francis.

"Sir Francis is known as the author of 'Observations on South America,' whither he went on some mining expedition, and as the author of the 'Bubbles of the Brunns.' He has been employed as poor-law commissioner in Kent, and his conduct and principles have been much approved of.

"He has been selected as a civilian, as I hope it is now the determination to send civilians as governors, instead of the military men, as heretofore. Sir Francis has, therefore, I believe, sold out of the army. I send you a letter of introduction to Sir Francis, to whom I have given* the 1st and 7th Report of your Committee of Grievances, that he may read and study them on his voyage to Canada; I gave him some of your late letters to me to read, so that he might know the grievances you have to complain of, and arrive in some degree acquainted with your province. If I had your other reports, I should have given him a copy. I gave my first copy to Sir George Grey, Under Secretary, and Mr. Chapman has replaced that one by those you sent him. If these had been in time, I should have met Sir Francis Head, and have explained to him my view of your situation, but I have written to him shortly on these subjects. I enclose you a letter to him, and send you a copy of that letter, that you may see what I have said to him.

"My anxiety is, that you and all the reformers should receive Sir Francis in the best possible manner, and do everything consistent with principle to meet his views and wishes. We think Sir Francis will do what is possible to conciliate and settle matters, and you must make allowance for the instructions he may have from Downing Street, where I do not think they have yet come to the resolution of doing to the colonists what they are doing, or striving to do, for the people of the United Kingdom.

"When I tell you that to us, who are on the spot, and watching every movement of ministers, there appears to be a reluctance to make reforms efficient for the objects contemplated, and that we have still the battle to fight for extended suffrage—for protection for our electors in voting—for equal civil rights to all classes of religious opinions—for reform in our courts of law, &c., you must not be surprised if the ministers are not prepared to yield you an elective Legislative Assembly, which is one chief object of your demands. You must have patience, and take as much as you can get quietly. I approve much of the spirit of the speech of Lord Gosford to the Assembly of Lower Canada, and trust that Sir Francis Head will do as much for you. In that case, and you will be right to demand equal justice, I would have you moderate your demands for the Legislative Council, and get all the other rights fairly established. If I could have influence with Mr. Papineau and his associates, I would counsel him to accept cheerfully the proffered concessions by the Government, and give a fair trial to the Government under the new and improved system. You must bear in mind that the conduct of the House of Lords in the last session has raised in the minds of the reformers here a conviction, as strong as it can be either in Upper or Lower Canada, that the House of Lords should be elective and responsible, and I have given notice for an inquiry, with that view, in the ensuing session. We do not expect to carry that measure, as Lord John Russell has, in public speeches, declared his intention to resist—to resist any interference with the House of Lords and their privileges. But we shall discuss the nature and constitution and power of that House, and take, in the mean time, all the concessions we can, to complete the Reform Bill, and other measures now in progress. We do this to get quietly what can be used afterwards for getting more, if that shall after trial be necessary. Your demands respecting the Legislative Council are exactly the same in principle as ours respecting the Lords. Responsibility to the people in both countries I deem essential for good government, and for the power and satisfaction of the people. But I must consider the resistance to that concession, and wait the proper time for urging the demand, so as not to interfere with other reform going on.

“Our object, therefore, is your object; and I request you to use your influence to prevent that question, if it should not be yielded by your Governor, from causing strife or ill-will between the Reformers and the Government. I observe that Lord Gosford has left the Legislative Council, as to its election by the people, out of his speech; but he has promised to improve it by leaving out all those dependent functionaries, and you should try to get on with that, the best you can, for some time. Whenever we succeed in England, you will have no difficulty in Canada in obtaining an improved Legislative Council, and I hope you will keep that in view.

“I wish you would convey to Mr. Papineau, in Lower Canada, this opinion and advice, as the one which all the best friends of Canada in this country would offer, and let them consolidate and mature what his Lordship has offered to give them. My friend Mr. Roebuck, and some others here, are too sanguine, and disposed to demand too much, and in a manner likely to do harm to the party here; and I should, therefore, be delighted to see a tone of moderation and conciliation assumed by the popular party in both countries, in answer to the overtures of the present Whig Government. You will bear in mind that the Liberal party here have the court, the aristocracy, and the church all against them, and that it is sound policy in the Radicals not to urge demands from the Whigs which shall, in any way, give ground for the King to throw off the Whigs and to take the Tories to power. Every day the Whigs remain in power, the power of the people is increasing, and the power of the Tories and the church is decreasing; I therefore entreat you to prevail upon the Reformers in both Canadas to act with moderation; and, whilst they continue to state what their ultimate and just demands are, receive with conciliation what they can get towards the amelioration of your existing grievances.

“If the Reformers, from the Ultra-Radical to the milk-and-water Tory-Whig, had not acted on these principles in the last session, the Tories would have remained in power, and we should not have got Municipal Reform and other reform, as now going on.

“You may take my advice, who have never flinched from giving an honest advice to the Canadians, that the healing of their differences in the Canadas, by accepting the concessions offered, will please the Ministers here, and give satisfaction to the King, who is understood to take a warm interest in your affairs. Take what you can get—petition for the rest; but use cool language, and act with moderation in every way. You may trust to us here, that every accession of right and power, by the people of the United Kingdom, will soon be returned to the Canadians. I shall be pleased to hear from you from time to time, and, with best wishes for your success,

“I remain,

Yours obediently,

(Signed)

“JOSEPH HUME.”

"P. S.—The Tories here have been boasting much of their success in the late registration of votes, but I believe without truth. I believe Reformers are stronger than ever all over the country, and that, with the aid of the Municipal Councils, the majority for Reform in the House of Commons, in the next election, will be 150 at the least. The Tories are boasting of an early dissolution, and that Sir Robert Peel will again be in office soon; but, as the present Ministry will not resign, I do not think the King will try another coup-d'état, as he did in November last year.

"From all this you will conclude that the Whigs will remain, and, as they cannot stand without the Radicals, the Ministers must be doing a little to please them, and thus the rights of the people will be gradually secured.

"J. H."

Having endeavoured to explain the position in which I found myself, after my first fortnight's experience in provincial government, I will now lay before my readers a despatch which was written within a week of my arrival at Toronto.

Government House, Feb. 5, 1836.

MY LORD,

In my despatch, No. 2, I informed your Lordship that I arrived at Toronto on the 23rd ult. I had previously engaged apartments, for myself and the three gentlemen who accompanied me, at the principal hotel in this city, but on my arrival a letter from Sir John Colborne was immediately delivered to me, by his aid-de-camp, informing me that rooms were prepared for me at Government-House. Requiring rest and quietness, I at first declined the invitation; but, finding that party differences were running very high, and being desirous to show that I had at least arrived with unbiassed feelings, I thought it better to accept than to decline the attention that was offered to me, and I accordingly went to Government-House on Saturday.

On Monday I was sworn in as Lieutenant-Governor of this province, and the following morning Sir John Colborne and his family left Toronto for Montreal, accompanied, for a few miles, by a vast concourse of people, who, I was happy to see, vied with each other in testifying the sense they entertained of his amiable character and high moral worth.

On Sir John Colborne's departure I endeavoured to make myself acquainted with the outline of public feeling in the province, by conversing calmly with the men of most ability of all parties. I had several interviews with the chief-justice and the officers of the crown, two long conversations with Mr. M'Kenzie, member for York, two interviews with Mr. Bidwell, the Speaker of the House of Assembly, and with others.

As far as I was capable of judging, it appeared to me that, in general terms, a good feeling pervaded a majority of the people of this province, who, intently occupied in their various locations, are naturally desirous to be tranquil, and equally disposed to be loyal.

That party feeling, however, and struggle for office, which have existed so strongly in the mother-country, have produced similar excitements in this province; added to which, strong republican principles have leaked into the country from the United States. These various elements have long been conflicting together in the House of Assembly, which, I firmly believe, misrepresents the general feeling and interests of the inhabitants, who, as I have before said, ardently desire peace, tranquillity, and a continuance of exemption from taxation. But, from the peculiar state of this infant society, all that is good and estimable remains at the bottom, while the surface is agitated by factious discussions.

In England this evil would soon be corrected by the ebullition of a free press; but the greatest difficulty which seems to present itself is, that the press is here conducted by editors who, on all sides, not only misrepresent, but shamelessly falsify, all public events. In Toronto, this unprincipled mode of warfare is so well understood, that it produces but little evil; but the dissemination of falsehood throughout the remote districts of the province, as well as in Lower Canada, creates a moral contagion which it is almost impossible to arrest.

As far as I have been able to judge, I should say that the republican party are implacable; that no concession whatever would satisfy them, their self-interested object being to possess themselves of the government of this province, for the sake of lucre and emolument.

Under these circumstances, I considered that the great danger I had to avoid was the slightest attempt to conciliate any party; that the only course for me to adopt was to act fearlessly, undisguisedly, and straightforwardly, for the interests of the country, to throw myself on the good sense and good feeling of the people, and abide a result, which, I firmly believe, will eventually be triumphant.

Having resolved on this course, I verbally explained it to Mr. Bidwell, the Speaker of the House of Assembly, a gentleman of unimpeachable moral character, but of strong republican principles; to Mr. M'Kenzie, one of the members for York; to the various heads of parties; and to the members of the Executive Government; and, on the 27th ultimo, I delivered to the two houses of the Legislature the following speech:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Legislative Council, and Gentlemen of the House of Assembly,

As the Lieutenant-Governor of this province, I am commanded by the King to lay before you the answer his Majesty has been pleased to give to the several addresses and representations which proceeded from the two branches of the Legislature during your last session.

This communication I shall submit to you in a Message, which will at once inform you of the difficult and most important duties about to devolve upon me, as well as upon yourselves.

As regards myself, I have nothing either to promise or profess, but I trust I shall not call in vain upon you to give me that loyal, constitutional, unbiassed, and fearless assistance which your King expects, and which the rising interests of your country require.

The newspapers I have forwarded contain the Addresses I received from the Legislative Council, and from the House of Assembly, to which addresses I replied as follows:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Legislative Council,

It is with much satisfaction that I receive your congratulations upon my assumption of the government of this important province, and I cordially participate in the sentiments of gratitude you express for the paternal solicitude of our most gracious Sovereign.

Mr. Speaker, and Gentlemen of the House of Assembly,

I thank you for the address I have just had the pleasure to receive from you. I appreciate the liberality with which you welcome my arrival among you. I am gratified to learn that you sincerely desire cordially to co-operate with me in the arduous duties which, by command of our revered Sovereign, we are about impartially to perform; and I look with confidence towards the future for the continuance of your loyal support.

A great difficulty now arose in my mind, namely, whether my message should consist of my instructions and appendix, as I received them, or whether I should condense them.

I at first attempted the latter course, but, in carrying it into effect, I found the subjects so important, the remedies to be applied requiring so unavoidably the explanatory arguments upon which they had been prescribed, that I felt it was almost impossible for me to undertake correctly to translate them into other words. I also considered, that as unexpected difficulties had lately arisen in Lower Canada, and as the press was at that moment decrying "the trembling Government of Great Britain," any concession proceeding from me might appear as if extorted by the threats of the moment: whereas, I felt that if my instructions were given to both Houses exactly as I received them, their date would clearly show that they had no reference whatever to the tumultuous proceedings of the day.

I had also reason to believe that the House of Assembly would not be satisfied with anything short of the precise words of his Majesty's Government, inasmuch as Sir John Colborne had formally announced to them, that on my arrival the King's answer to the addresses and communications from both houses of the Provincial Legislature would be officially announced to them. I felt confident that they would receive with the greatest suspicion and dissatisfaction any alteration made by me, and that although I might certainly assert the prerogative of refusing to accede to their wishes, yet that such a course would belie the straightforward policy which I had declared I would adopt, and at once involve me in an ignominious dispute, amounting after all, to nothing less than a quibble, because as I was actually ordered by your Lordship to give them the substance of my instructions, they might fairly argue that the substance and the reality were and ought to be identical.

It is true that by giving to them the Appendix which is an extract of Lord Gosford's instructions, I felt that I might possibly embarrass his Lordship and the Commissioner of Inquiry; but after giving the subject the best reflection I was able, I considered that the point of all others on which the House of Assembly were most anxious to receive his Majesty's determination, namely, the alteration, if any, in the Legislative Council, was only mentioned in my instructions by a reference to the said Appendix, and that the manner in which it was there treated was by arguments (which I could not presume to withhold) avowedly declared to be applicable to both the Canadas.

I also remembered, that in the draft of the instructions and Appendix originally given to me by your Lordship, I was ordered to give the "copy" of them to the provincial Legislature, and that when the word "substance" was substituted for the word "copy,"* your Lordship will remember it was explained to me in England, that the alteration was merely made because it had been considered undignified that it should appear, I was ordered to do so, your Lordship observing to me, "But remember, the more you give them of it the better."

I have not hesitated to make this explanation to your Lordship of the course I determined to adopt, because, as regards Lord Gosford, I am not without the apprehensions I have stated.

For the reasons above stated, I accordingly forwarded a copy of my Instructions and Appendix to each house of Parliament, in the form of a message, headed as follows:—

Government House, 13th January, 1836.

"The Lieutenant-Governor transmits to the Legislative Council (House of Assembly) the communication alluded to in his speech to the two Houses of the Legislature, on the 27th instant.

"The Lieutenant-Governor was commanded by his Majesty to communicate the substance of his instructions to both Houses of the Provincial Parliament, but considering it would be more satisfactory to them to receive the whole, he accordingly transmits it herewith."

I am well informed that the Legislative Council were highly satisfied with the above message, and a deputation waited upon me with an address expressive of these sentiments.

The House of Assembly has not yet pronounced its opinion on the subject, but has merely ordered 2000 copies of the message to be printed. A most violent discussion will of course take place, and the result will pretty clearly determine the relative strength of the placable and implacable parties in that House.

Whatever may be the result, I shall steadily and straightly proceed in the course of policy I have adopted: I shall neither avoid nor rest upon any party, but after attentively listening to all opinions, I will, to the best of my judgment, do what is honest and right, firmly believing that the stability of the throne, the interests of this province, and the confidence of the people can now only be secured by such a course.

As I had anticipated, the production of my Instructions embarrassed Lord Gosford in the policy by which he was endeavouring to obtain his supplies. The Colonial Office joined in the general disapprobation which, in London, was expressed at my conduct, although the Office knew, as well as one who is still living knows, that in my Instructions, as they were originally shown to the King, I was ordered to give "the copy," and that it was his Majesty himself who made the alteration, which was explained away to me by Lord Glenelg, as I reminded his Lordship in the preceding despatch.

* This alteration was made by the King himself, who deemed it infra dig. that the Assembly of Upper Canada should read that I was ordered to give them a copy of my instructions. ## CHAPTER IV.

The Republicans are mortified—My Opinions and Policy expressed to the Colonial Office—Am called upon to increase the Executive Council—Ominous Circumstances attending these Appointments—The Republicans prepare to advance.

ALTHOUGH the well-known blue-bound grievance book, which I constantly kept on my table, acted as a talisman in driving from me the republican party, who apparently could speak no language but that of indefinite complaint, yet I clearly foresaw that they would not long submit to be thus easily defeated. Although nothing but polite expressions had passed between us, it was perfectly evident to me, that the Republicans were sorely mortified at being, on all occasions, "brought to book," and that as their case had thus become desperate, they were not merely waiting, but were eagerly seeking, for an opportunity to pick any quarrel with me, that would enable them to join with Mr. Papineau and the House of Assembly of Lower Canada in open rebellion. Accordingly, though the main body of their forces continued stationary, it will appear from the following despatch, that, before I had been three weeks in the Province, their skirmishers began to advance.

No. 5.

GOVERNMENT-HOUSE,
Toronto, February 15th, 1836.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to enclose to your Lordship an address which I have received from the House of Assembly.

Your Lordship will perceive that it was moved by Mr. M'Kenzie, with the object publicly to extract from me my opinions on various subjects, which have long been violently agitated in the House by himself and others, and that in order to give unusual publicity to the address, 2000 copies have been ordered by the House to be printed; besides which, it has been copied and published in most of the newspapers.

I accordingly submit to your Lordship my answer to this address, which you will perceive is written to meet the object to which I well know it is intended to be applied, namely, to be circulated throughout the Canadas.

I can assure your Lordship that I have had very satisfactory and amicable conversations with a number of individuals of all parties; and the more I reflect upon what I have heard and observed, the more convinced I am that the population of Upper Canada will eventually rally round this government, if it firmly and decidedly declares that it is determined to maintain the constitution inviolate, but to correct, cautiously, yet effectually, all real grievances.

As long as people in the remote districts are allowed to believe that the government of this province feels itself insecure, so long will they be disposed to attach themselves to whatever they are led to conceive has stability and strength; but if their own interests be appealed to, if they find that we are anxious to infuse among them capital and population, both of which they ardently desire, and that nothing but dissension prevents it, they will, I firmly believe, very quickly correct for themselves the greatest of all their grievances, namely, a factious opposition to the British Government.

Since my arrival here my attention has been much occupied in searching for two or three individuals fit to be added to the Executive Councils, which will probably be the subject of my next despatch.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient servant,

F. B. HEAD.

The Lord Glenelg, &c. &c. &c.

The Constitutionalists, or Tories (as they were called by the Republicans), who immediately after my arrival had made one bad move, now as thoughtlessly made another, which for a moment threatened alarming consequences.

An active member of my Executive Council brought before my consideration, in the most formal manner possible, certain reasons for my increasing that body, which, though obvious and unanswerable, I should have been most happy to have overlooked, until I had had time enough to become better acquainted with the province. Under such an excuse, however, I did not feel disposed to shield myself, and as this grievance at least was admitted, I determined I would not be seen openly to refuse to correct it, but the embarrassing question at once arose, from which party should the increase be made? I did not choose to join the Republicans: the Tories, who, fearing I was their enemy, had thought proper to join in petitioning the King against the very first act of my administration, were still almost in a body standing aloof from me. I did not, therefore, feel it right to advance towards them; and, being thus obliged to be independent, I determined that the addition to my council should be made from the middle party, instead of from either of the two extremes. Accordingly, explaining my object, I collected all the most respectable opinions I could, putting down every name that was recommended to me, and finding that the name of a Mr. Robert Baldwin (a gentleman I had never seen) was repeated on my list infinitely oftener than any other, I sent for this individual (as will appear by the following despatch), and throwing myself upon his advice for the addition of two other names, I was led by him to select Dr. Rolph, who has since proved, next to Mr. M'Kenzie, the most wicked of the traitors.

The Constitutionalists, or Tories, were both chagrined and alarmed at Dr. Rolph's appointment, but if they had not joined against me on my arrival, and if one of their party had not most inconsiderately forced upon me this increase of the council, neither Dr. Rolph nor even Mr. Robert Baldwin would ever have been appointed by me.

The following despatch will explain the ominous circumstances which attended these appointments.

No. 9.

GOVERNMENT-HOUSE,
Toronto, Feb. 22, 1836.

MY LORD,

A few days after my arrival here I received a communication from the Executive Council, submitting to me the necessity of increasing their number, which, from being composed of three individuals, would (in case of the illness of any of the members) be unable to form a quorum. I was also informed by them, that as Mr. Peter Robinson, besides being Commissioner of Crown Lands, was also an Executive Councillor, he had the invidious duty imposed on him of auditing his own accounts.

This important subject, as I stated to your Lordship in my despatch, No. 5, has occupied my attention for some time: for in so small a community as that of Toronto and its neighbourhood, to select three individuals suited to the office was no easy task.

After making every inquiry in my power, I became of opinion, that Mr. Robert Baldwin, advocate, a gentleman already recommended to your Lordship by Sir John Colbourne for a seat in the Legislative Council, was the first individual I should select, being highly respected for his moral character, being moderate in his politics, and possessing the esteem and confidence of all parties.

Having come to this conclusion, I deemed it prudent to consult the Chief Justice, who is speaker of the Legislative Council; Mr. Bidwell, the speaker of the House of Assembly; and the members of the Executive Council; and as all these gentlemen unreservedly approved of his selection to the office,* I sent for Mr. R. Baldwin, and proposed to him to accept the same, with the addition of Mr. —, who had already been recommended by my predecessor, and Dr. Rolph, who had also been recommended by Lord Goderich as Solicitor General of this province.

* They recommended him only as a middle man.

I had several interviews with Mr. Baldwin, of many hours' duration; I allowed him to consult Mr. Bidwell, Dr. Rolph, and his other friends, on the subject; and the result of his deliberations was, his positively declining to take the office, unless I enabled him to carry with him the support of the House of Assembly, which he stated could not be effected unless I should consent to dismiss the three existing councillors.

With this demand I resolutely refused to comply, on the grounds that I had other interests besides those of the House of Assembly to consider; that the Commons already possessed its own legitimate power; that to impart to it in addition an exclusive influence in my Council would be unconstitutional and unjust; besides which, it would at once connect with party feelings the representative of His Majesty, who ought to stand unbiassed, and aloof from all such considerations.

Mr. Baldwin maintained his demands, and I accordingly parted with him, declaring that nothing should induce me to dismiss from the council three gentlemen who had given me no cause for complaint; that, if necessary, I would rather throw myself on the good sense of this country, as well as of the world, and abide the result, whatever it might be.

On Mr. R. Baldwin leaving me, I sent for his father, Dr. Baldwin, who, although rather more ultra in his theory of reform, is a gentleman of very large property, who is respected for his moral character, and who had also been recommended by my predecessor for a seat in the Legislative Council. On consulting with Dr. Baldwin, and on proposing to him that he, Dr. Rolph, and Mr. —, should join the Executive Council, he insisted on the same demands as Mr. R. Baldwin, and we accordingly parted.

I felt so confident the terms required of me were unjust, and that to all reasonable men they would appear so, that I had fully determined on the course I would adopt. However, this alternative was rendered unnecessary, by an intimation I received that Mr. R. Baldwin felt disposed to reconsider my proposal; and accordingly, the following day, he called upon me to agree to join the council, without the dismissal of the three existing councillors.

I accordingly appointed an hour to receive Mr. R. Baldwin, Dr. Rolph, and Mr. —, and in their presence I addressed the following note to Mr. Baldwin, a copy of which it was agreed should be given by him to Mr. — and Dr. Rolph.

GOVERNMENT-HOUSE,
February 19, 1836.

DEAR SIR,

I have great pleasure in learning that you, Dr. Rolph, and Mr. —, accept the invitation I made to you, by joining the Executive Council.

The confidence I shall repose in you will be implicit; and as I have no preliminary conditions either to accede to, or require from you, I shall rely on your giving me your unbiassed opinion on all subjects respecting which I may feel it advisable to require it.

I remain, dear Sir,

Yours faithfully,

F. B. HEAD.

R. Baldwin, Esq.

After my interviews with these gentlemen, who were yesterday sworn into office, and gazetted, as "members of the Executive Council, until the King's pleasure be known," I sent for Mr. Bidwell, and asked him whether he conceived that the House of Assembly would feel satisfied with the addition I had made to the Executive Council.

Mr. Bidwell told me that he thought these appointments would give general satisfaction; that he was of opinion the House of Assembly had confidence in these gentlemen, as well as in myself, and that it would be his desire, as well as those, he believed, with whom he co-operated, to give me their assistance, and in no way to offer me any factious opposition. He observed, however, that there were several grievances, which your Lordship's instructions to me had overlooked, and that he expected these would shortly be brought before my attention.

I must add, that Mr. Bidwell's communications with me have been satisfactory, and that I have no cause whatever to complain of him, although I have not hesitated invariably to apprise him that with his political opinions I do not concur.

Having now informed your Lordship of the individuals I have added to the Executive Council, with the circumstances which have preceded their appointments (which, I trust, may be confirmed), it only remains for me to state, that although tranquillity in this province is, I now conceive, momentarily established, I do not expect that the present House of Assembly will long discontinue their agitations.

It shall be my duty, however, to afford them no reasonable cause for complaint. To their addresses, as well as to their opinions, I will give every possible attention, and will afford them ready assistance to correct all real grievances; but I am so convinced that every improper concession will not only strengthen their demands, but weaken my influence in the province, that I shall continue to resist, as I have hitherto done, any demand that may at all tend to undermine the happy constitution of the province, as I believe that this policy will eventually secure to the Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada (whoever he may be) the confidence and the support of the community.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient servant,

F. B. HEAD.

The Lord Glenelg, &c. &c. &c.

P. S. I submit to your Lordship copies of two addresses I received last week from the House of Assembly, with my answers, which explain the reasons for which I declined to comply with their requests.

Without troubling the reader with these two querulous addresses, my answers to them will sufficiently explain that they were small clouds clearly indicating an approaching storm.

"GENTLEMEN,

"I much regret that I cannot, without authority from the Secretary of State, comply with the request contained in your address.

"The numerous copies of despatches, &c., which accompanied my message to the House of Assembly, of the 15th instant, will, I trust, satisfy the House of my desire to lay before it as much of the correspondence between my predecessor and His Majesty's Government, as with any propriety I could be expected to divulge.

"I have already given to the House, according to its request, the names of individuals whose recommendation for seats in the Legislative Council has not yet even received the sanction of His Majesty's Government.

"The only part of His Excellency Sir John Colborne's despatch of the 16th September, 1835, which I have deliberately withheld, is that in which he confidentially expresses to His Majesty's Government his high estimation of the character of the individuals he proposes; and although in the particular case alluded to, no objection whatever exists to the publication of his opinions, yet I conceive it would establish a bad precedent, were I to consent to make public, descriptions which must unavoidably always be personal, and which might occasionally be painful to the individuals, and consequently unjust towards them to disclose."

"GENTLEMEN,

"It is with great reluctance I feel it necessary to state, that, without authority from the Secretary of State, I am unwilling to submit to the House of Assembly 'the documents and other evidence in the possession of the Government or its Officer, relative to the Huron reserve, or to the proceedings of the Government had thereon, as would enable the House to ascertain whether its interference on behalf of the Wyandot Indians is required.'

“My objections on this subject are those of policy rather than of law; and without denying the constitutional right of either of the two Houses of the Legislature to inquire into any subject in which they may consider the public interests to be involved, I am of opinion that the disclosure of ‘documents and evidence’ alluded to would be attended with evil consequences to those whom it is intended to benefit, by rendering the Indians doubtful of the all-sufficient and paternal protection of His Majesty, on which they have hitherto solely relied.

“Without reverting to the anomalous history of the aborigines of this land, I will merely observe, that, in Upper Canada, the Indians have hitherto been under the exclusive care of His Majesty, the territories they inhabit being tracts of Crown lands devoted to their sole use as ‘His allies.’

“Over these lands His Majesty has never exercised his paramount right, except at their request, and for their manifest advantage. Within their own communities, they have hitherto governed themselves by their own unwritten laws and customs; their lands and property have never been subject to tax or assessment, or themselves liable to personal service.

“As they are not subject to such liabilities, neither do they yet possess the political privileges of His Majesty’s subjects generally.

“The superintendents, missionaries, schoolmasters and others, who reside among them for their protection and civilization, are appointed and paid by the King; to his representative all appeals have until now been made, and with him has all responsibility rested. In every respect they appear to be most constitutionally within the jurisdiction and prerogative of the Crown; and as I declare myself not only ready, but desirous to attend to any complaint they may offer me, I consider it would be highly impolitic (especially for the object of redressing a trifling grievance) to sanction the adoption of a new course for their internal government.

“To this general view of the subject, I have only to add, that as regards the particular memorial submitted to the House of Assembly, by Thomas Splitlog, Thomas Clerk, and six others, of the Huron or Wyandot nation, a counter-petition, signed by eleven individuals of similar tribe and rank, has been presented to the House of Assembly, stating, ‘we have the fullest confidence in the justice and fatherly protection of our beloved Sovereign and his representative the Lieutenant-Governor.’”

CHAPTER V.

THE Prerogative of the Crown assailed by the Executive Council—The House of Assembly furiously join in the Attack—Remonstrance useless—They stop the Supplies—Insult me in a Petition to the King, and to the House of Commons—I appeal to His Majesty’s Government for Support—Solemnly warn the Government of their Policy—Withhold Assent to the Money-Bills—Decline to grant the Contingencies, and dissolve the Assembly—Explain to His Majesty’s Government why I cannot agree with the Commissioners of Inquiry, and tender my Resignation—Result of the Elections—Dr. Daucombe and Mr. Hume declare to Lord Melbourne that I have fabricated Votes—Earnest Recommendation to His Majesty’s Government not to surrender the casual and territorial Revenues of the Crown.

THE reader is now about to enter upon the most violent, and certainly the most eventful, moral struggle that has ever taken place in our North American colonies; and as I have no hesitation in confessing, that, by retreating before the Republicans, the contest could have been avoided, I beg particular attention to the subject.

The subtle, persuasive eloquence of Dr. Rolph, whose reasonable principles were, by several intelligent people, justly estimated, induced many to believe that from the moment he became a member of my Executive Council I was lost. However, I entertained not the slightest apprehension on the subject, for so long as the Council afforded me constitutional advice, I knew I should be too thankful to give it immediate consideration; and, on the other hand, standing as I did (to say the least) totally without support from any party, I felt confident that if the Council should attempt to force upon me unconstitutional proposals, it would be out of their power to deprive me of that invincible moral power which always rushes to the vindication of a just cause.

With the members of the Council, however, Dr. Rolph, who I soon learned was the bosom friend and confidant of Mr. Speaker Bidwell, did not plead in vain.

Aware that in the House of Assembly there stood in array an irresistible majority in favour of the republican principle of making the Lieutenant-Governor's Executive or Privy Council "responsible to the people," the necessity of my making this concession appeared to be inevitable; and calculating therefore that, situated as I was, I would not venture to refuse, they at last agreed together to address to me a written requisition to this effect.

When I received this unexpected document which was regularly signed by all the six members of the Council, I saw no reason to be alarmed at it. That I was sentenced to contend on the soil of America with Democracy, and that if I did not overpower it, it would overpower me, were solemn facts, which for some weeks had been perfectly evident to my mind; but by far the most difficult problem I had to solve was, where I ought to make my stand. To involve myself in a struggle with the House of Assembly, about any one trifling concession, would, I knew, have brought the Home Government down upon me with all its power; the province might also with some apparent reason have complained; and thus, bit by bit, and inch by inch, I felt I might be driven to abandon constitutional ground, which, once lost, could never be reclaimed. It was therefore, I repeat, with but little apprehension that I found my Council (who I knew would be immediately backed by the House of Assembly) had called upon me at once to surrender to a democratic principle of government, which I felt, so long as the British flag waved in America, could never be admitted. I accordingly declined to accede to the demands of my Council, who, taken quite aback by my refusal, were no sooner politely bowed out of my service, than I received from the House of Assembly the following address, to which I gave the reply which follows it:—

"HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

"To His Excellency SIR FRANCIS BOND HEAD, Knight Commander of the Royal Hanoverian Guelphic Order, and of the Prussian Military Order of Merit, Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Upper Canada, &c. &c. &c.

"MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,

"We his Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Upper Canada in provincial Parliament assembled, humbly beg leave to inform your Excellency, that this House, considering the appointment of a responsible Executive Council, to advise your Excellency on the affairs of the province, to be one of the most happy and wise features in the Constitution, and essential to the form of our government, and one of the strongest securities for a just and equitable administration, and eminently calculated to ensure the full enjoyment of our civil and religious rights and privileges, have lately learned, with no small degree of anxiety, that the Executive Council so recently formed for the purpose above stated (as we presume), consisting of six members, did, on Saturday the 12th instant, unanimously tender to your Excellency their resignations, and that your Excellency was pleased to accept the same; and humbly request your Excellency to inform this House, without delay, whether such are the facts, and also to communicate to this House full information relative to the cause of disagreement between your Excellency and your said late Executive Council, as far as lies in your Excellency's power to make known; as also to furnish this House with copies of all communications between your Excellency and your said late Council, or any of them, on the subject of such disagreement and subsequent tender of resignation."

(Signed)

M. S. BIDWELL,

SPEAKER.

Commons' House of Assembly,
March 14th, 1836.

HIS EXCELLENCY'S REPLY.

"GENTLEMEN,

"Nothing can appear more reasonable to my mind than the surprise and anxiety which the House of Assembly express to me at the intelligence they have received of the sudden resignation of the six members of the Executive Council; for with both these feelings I was myself deeply impressed, when firmly relying on the advice, assistance, and cordial co-operation of my Council, I unexpectedly received from them the embarrassing document which, with my reply thereto, I now, at the request of the House of Assembly, willingly present to you. With every desire to consult my Council, I was preparing for their consideration important remedial measures, which I conceived would be advisable to adopt; and had they but afforded me those few moments for reflection, which, from my sudden arrival among you, I fancied I might fairly have claimed as my due, the question, which so unnecessarily they have agitated, would have proved practically useless.

“Had they chosen to have verbally submitted to me in Council, that the responsibility, and consequently the power and patronage of the Lieutenant-Governor ought henceforward to be transferred from him to them—had they even, in the usual form of a written petition, recommended to my attention as a new theory, that the Council, instead of the Governor, was to be responsible to the people—I should have raised no objection whatever to the proceeding, however in opinion I might have opposed it; but when they simultaneously declared, not that such ought to be, but that such actually was the law of the land, and concluded their statement by praying that a Council sworn in secrecy to assist me might be permitted, in case I disapproved of their opinion, to communicate with the public, I felt it my duty, calmly, and with due courtesy, to inform them, that they could not retain such principles together with my confidence, and to this opinion I continue stedfastly to adhere.

“I feel confident that the House of Assembly will be sensible that the power intrusted to me by our Gracious Sovereign is a subject of painful anxiety;—that from the patronage of this province I can derive no advantage; and that I can have no object in retaining undivided responsibility, except that which proceeds from a just desire to be constitutionally answerable to his Majesty in case I should neglect the interests of his subjects in this province. With these sentiments I transmit to the House of Assembly the documents they have requested, feeling confident that I can give them no surer proof of my desire to preserve their privileges inviolate, than by proving to them that I am equally determined to maintain the rights and prerogatives of the Crown, one of the most prominent of which is, that which I have just assumed, of naming those Councillors in whom I conscientiously believe I can confide.

“For their acts I deliberately declare myself responsible; but they are not responsible for mine, and cannot be, because, being sworn to silence, they are deprived by this fact, as well as by the Constitution, of all power to defend themselves.”

The foregoing documents I forwarded to the Colonial Office with the following despatch.

Toronto, March 22nd, 1836.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to inform your Lordship that on Saturday, 12th instant, the six members of the Executive Council suddenly and simultaneously resigned—that a majority of twenty-seven against twenty-one of the House of Assembly very resolutely espoused their cause—that all business in the House was suspended until my answer to their address was received—that a public meeting has been called on the subject, at Toronto—that similar meetings will probably take place throughout the country—and that the whole province is, and for a short time will be, in a state of very great excitement.

All this will, I firmly believe, be productive of the most beneficial political results, and I now proceed to submit to your Lordship a plain statement of the whole affair.

In my despatch No. 9, I stated to your Lordship that almost immediately after my arrival here, the old Executive Council represented to me the necessity of increasing the number which was not only barely sufficient to form a quorum, and, consequently, in case of the illness of any one member would be powerless, but that the Commissioner of Crown Lands, from being one of the members, was obliged to audit his own accounts.

In my despatch alluded to, which I beg your Lordship will be pleased to re-peruse, I detailed the difficulty I had had in adding three new members to the Council, and the attempt which had been made to insist on my forcing the unpopular old members to retire.

As soon as this addition to the Council was gazetted, which happened less than a month ago, a universal joy and satisfaction was expressed by the radical party, and I received addresses from various places, expressing in very strong terms approbation of the addition I had made to the Council, and praying that the old members might be dismissed.

In receiving these addresses I could not but remark, that not only were many of them expressed in exactly the same terms, as if written by one person, but that several were presented to me by the same two members of the Assembly; and from other ominous circumstances I became fully convinced that an attempt somewhere or other was making to promulgate an error which has long been artfully inculcated in this province—namely, that the Executive Council were responsible to the people for the acts of the Lieutenant Governor.

The object of this smooth-faced, insidious doctrine was at first to obtain for the Council merely responsibility, and, when that point was conceded, immediately to demand from the Crown the power and patronage which has hitherto been invested in the Lieutenant Governor.

As the addresses proceeded from places of no importance, I replied to the personal congratulations on my arrival, with which they commenced, without taking any notice at all of the objectionable clauses, at the same time I was perfectly alive to the very great danger that was brooding; and expecting that it would sooner or later be brought before my notice by an address from the House of Assembly, I determined that, the moment it assumed a tangible form, I would at once stand against it.

While I was in this suspense, the attack was made upon me from a quarter from which I certainly did not expect it; namely, from the Executive Council itself, which, in a document signed by them all, declared that the popular doctrine was the law of the land, that the old practice had been unconstitutional; and that in case I was of a different opinion, my council, sworn to secrecy, humbly prayed that it might be permitted to communicate with the people.

I need hardly observe, that by this address the old, unpopular Councillors* at once impeached the conduct and practice of their whole lives. However, on the receipt of the document, I immediately informed the Council that they could not retain such principles and my confidence, and that they must consequently abandon either the one or the other.

This reply was what they did not expect; for the new members, elated by the success of the intrigues which had been adopted, had fancied themselves to be so strongly supported by the people, that they did not conceive I would venture to do anything but accede to their threat.

As soon as the Council received my reply, four of the members, namely, * * * * * at once surrendered at discretion, offering to recant all they had written, and assuring me they had since the receipt of my answer again changed their minds: however, the other two held out; and I, therefore, declared that the document by which I had been attacked could only be cancelled by the same Council from which it had proceeded, and that unless it was retracted as formally as it had been made, I must adhere to the reply I had given to it.

I had two reasons for maintaining this course: first, because had I dismissed only the two popular candidates without explaining the cause, I should have incurred the greatest unpopularity, and should have been hampered by the continuance in office of the other four: secondly, because, for the reasons above stated, being persuaded that sooner or later it would be necessary I should stand against a doctrine which was rapidly tending to upset the prerogative of the Crown, I deemed it advisable to do so before it got too strong for me, particularly as I never could hope to attain a more advantageous position for the contest than that afforded me by the ill-written document of my own Council.

Having now very briefly explained the outline of the affair, I beg to refer your Lordship to the four following printed papers which will fully explain it in detail.

1. A copy of the address I received from the House of Assembly.
2. My reply thereto, enclosing;
3. The communication I had received from the Executive Council, and
4. My reply thereto.

Having submitted to your Lordship the foregoing documents I beg leave to repeat, as my humble opinion, that the greatest possible benefit will be derived from the dispute I am having with this province: for if truth be invincible, it will follow that the effort which is making to oppose me must eventually be discomfited, and among the description of people which I have to deal with, such a result will be highly important.

* The Honourable Colonel Wells is the only surviving member of these old councillors—a more loyal man does not exist in Upper Canada; so indeed was the late Honourable P. Robinson.

On the other hand, should I be defeated, I trust your Lordship will never regret that I did not hesitate to maintain the rights and prerogatives of the Crown.

I also enclose herewith to your Lordship, an address I have received from the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commonalty of the City of Toronto, with my reply thereto.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's obedient servant,

F. B. HEAD.

The Lord Glenelg, &c. &c. &c.

As soon as the Constitutionists were convinced by the principles I was maintaining, that notwithstanding Mr. Hume's pestilential letter of recommendation in favour of Mr. M'Kenzie (who had openly boasted of it), and notwithstanding the suspicious appointment of Dr. Rolph to my Council, I was not, as had been generally supposed, a democrat, they most loyally, one and all, joined me to a man. Moral war was thus (as it long ago ought to have been by his Majesty's Government) openly proclaimed between the Constitutionists and the Republicans; or, in other words, between those who were for British institutions, against those who were for soiling the empire by the introduction of democracy; and I need hardly add, that the approaching struggle was most anxiously looked upon by the other North American Colonies as one on which their own political destinies depended.

I was, of course, too much occupied to be able to write to the Colonial Office at very great length: however, on the 6th of April, 1836, I forwarded a despatch which, commencing with detailing events which having already been submitted to the reader, it would be tedious to recapitulate, proceeded as follows:—

EXTRACT.

Many of the addresses I received on this subject had evidently proceeded from the same pen, and had the influence, which was thus exerted, continued to be secret, it might shortly have produced such powerful effects, that I might have found it almost impossible to have opposed it; but, very fortunately, the power exerted against me was too eager for its object, and the battery was unmasked before the enemy was sufficiently organized to man it.

My Executive Councillors themselves suddenly claimed the responsibility which had hitherto rested with the Lieutenant-Governor; and on my requiring them to resign, an excitement suddenly burst forth in the House of Assembly beyond all description.

The republican party fancying that their object was attained, and that I was caught in the net which had been so insidiously drawn around me, were exasperated at seeing me suddenly extricate myself from it, and the House addressing me on the subject, instantly suspended all business until it had received my reply.

The whole correspondence on the subject, some of which has already been forwarded to your Lordship, I here annex in a printed form: it contains—

- "1. The address of the House of Assembly.
- "2. My reply thereto.
- "3. The communication addressed to me by the Executive Council.
- "4. My reply thereto.
- "5. An address from the mayor and common council of the City of Toronto.
- "6. My reply.
- "7. An address, signed by the mayor, from a public meeting held in the city hall.
- "8. My reply.
- "9. An address from the House of Assembly.
- "10. My reply."

I trust that the tone of my answers to the above communications will sufficiently prove to your Lordship how desirous I was to offer all possible explanation, and to do everything in my power to govern, and to be governed, by truth and reason.

At the time I conducted this correspondence, I was perfectly sensible that I was friendless; for the republican party had proved themselves to be implacable, and the constitutional party I had refused to join: however, seeing that the moment had now arrived for resolutely assuming my position, I awaited the result of the conflict with a perfect confidence, solely proceeding from the justice of my cause.

The success of these measures has, I can faithfully assure your Lordship, equalled my most sanguine expectations.

Every newspaper in the Upper as well as in the Lower Province, excepting Mr. M'Kenzie's Advocate and one other, has in the most unequivocal terms supported me in the doctrine I have maintained; the constitutional party have joined me to a man, and in the numerous addresses I have received are the names of many influential individuals who have hitherto been opposing the Government. Indeed, I can truly declare, that the intelligent classes of every denomination are rallying around me in a manner which fully corroborates the statement I first made to you on arriving in this province, namely, "that all that is good and estimable remains at the bottom, while the surface is agitated by factious discussions."

A very striking example of this fact occurred on Saturday last.

As soon as the late Executive Council resigned, Mr. M'Kenzie and his party, at an immense expense, forwarded to every part of the province printed copies of the annexed circular, almost all of which were franked by members of the Assembly. This document, as your Lordship will observe, ended by a printed petition to the House of Assembly, which only required the insertion of the name of the township and of the subscribers.

As soon as this firebrand was supposed to have caused sufficient excitement, the four members of the Metropolitan County of York, namely,* Mr. M'Kenzie, Dr. Morrison, Mr. Gibson and Mr. M'Intosh, issued another notice (which I also annex) dated "House of Assembly," and calling a public meeting to be held ten miles from Toronto on Saturday last.

As this county has been supposed to be under the complete influence of Mr. M'Kenzie, and its other members, it was agreed upon by the constitutional party, that, as they might be overpowered by numbers, they would not attend, and accordingly it was expected that the Radicals would completely carry the day: however, the reply I had written to the industrious classes of Toronto had been much read, and accordingly, when the meeting assembled on Saturday an unexpected result took place.

Mr. M'Kenzie totally failed in gaining attention; another member, Dr. Morrison, who is mayor of Toronto, was collared and severely shaken, and the whole affair was so completely stifled by the indignation of the people, that the meeting was dissolved without the passing of a single resolution.

Mr. M'Kenzie and his party afterwards assembled, and then went through the form of carrying their ready-concocted resolutions.

The effect which this unexpected defeat will produce throughout the province will, I am perfectly convinced, eventually break up the radical faction; and as soon as I have an opportunity of visiting, as I propose to do if I remain here, every county in this province, and of meeting and conversing with the inhabitants, I feel quite confident that a burst of loyalty will resound from one end of the province to the other, for a more honest, well-meaning yeomanry and peasantry cannot exist than his Majesty's subjects in this noble province.

It is out of my power to describe to your Lordship, without the appearance of exaggeration, the joy and gladness expressed to me by all parties at the constitutional resistance I have made; but I will not conceal from your Lordship that there is one question in almost everybody's mouth, namely, "Will the Lieutenant-Governor be supported by the Home Government?" "HE NEVER WILL!" say the Radicals; "We fear he will not!" say the Constitutionists.

Your Lordship has to settle this question, and in my humble opinion upon your decision rests our possession of the Canadas.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient servant,

F. B. HEAD.

The Lord Glenelg, &c. &c. &c.

* Of these four individuals, three have since either been tried for treason, or have absconded.

The war which raged against the Executive Government of Upper Canada, in the House of Assembly, could only be explained by a publication of the violent speeches of the Republicans, which are much too long to be here inserted. Suffice it to say, that the republican majority adopted an address to the King, signed Marshall S. Bidwell, Speaker, in which his late Majesty's attention was called to a report which the House of Assembly had adopted, in which it was declared that my "ear was credulous," my "mind poisoned," my "feelings bitter"—that I was "despotic, tyrannical, unjust, deceitful," that my conduct had been "derogatory to the honour of the King," "demoralizing to the community," and that I had treated the people of the province as being "little better than a country of rogues and fools." Not satisfied with this attack upon my character, the House adopted a long memorial to the House of Commons, signed Marshall S. Bidwell, Speaker, in which not only was the same offensive report submitted, but it was further stated in the memorial as follows:—

"It is with pain, disappointment, and humiliation we notice the reiterated declaration of his Excellency to conduct our affairs without the advice of the Executive Council according to his own will and pleasure, which his public acts have already proved to be arbitrary and vindictive. And this view of his sole ministerial power and authority, with a nominal responsibility to Downing-street, he has sustained before the public by mis-statements and misrepresentations so palpably opposed to candour and truth, as to destroy all hopes of further justice from his government. * * * * * For other instances of his deviation from candour and truth, &c., we refer to the appended documents.

"MARSHALL S. BIDWELL,
"SPEAKER."

As this Mr. Bidwell was the well-known leader of his party, as he was generally supposed to have been the framer of the address against me to the King, and as he was at all events the official organ of a House of Assembly which had heaped upon me such unparelled abuse, the reader will hereafter learn with no little surprise, that his Majesty's Government, instead of supporting me by openly resenting his conduct, desired that he should be publicly exalted to the Judicial Bench, by me, whose station of representative of the King he had so grossly insulted. But as this will form the subject of a distant chapter, I will at once regularly proceed with my narrative by stating, that on the Assembly stopping the supplies, I withheld my assent from all their money bills, and even from their own contingencies, on the principle that as nothing but a storm of agitation could now settle the weather, it would be useless to attempt to suppress it. In the following despatch, I will, however, request the reader's especial attention to and recollection of the solemn warning it contains.

No. 26.

Toronto, 21st April, 1836.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship two addresses from the House of Assembly to his Majesty, as also a copy of one to the House of Commons, reprobating in unusual language my conduct as Lieutenant-Governor of this province. I have also to inform your Lordship, that the House of Assembly have deemed it their duty to stop the supplies—that, in consequence of this proceeding, I have reserved all their money bills for the consideration of his Majesty; and that I have declined to grant their contingencies. I also inclose to your Lordship a copy of my speech on proroguing the Provincial Legislature.

Under these circumstances, I feel it incumbent to submit to your Lordship a plain statement of the whole affair.

In my despatch No. 3, to your Lordship, dated 5th February, I stated as follows:—

"As far as I have been able to judge, I should say that the republican party are implacable, that no concession whatever would satisfy them, their self-interested object being to possess themselves of the government of this province, for the sake of lucre and emolument."

In my despatch, No. 9, dated 22nd February, I stated to your Lordship as follows:—

"Having now informed your Lordship of the individuals I have added to the Executive Council, with the circumstances which have preceded their appointments (which I trust may be confirmed), it only remains for me to state that although tranquillity in this province is, I conceive, now momentarily established, I do not expect that the present House of Assembly will long discontinue their agitations.

"It shall be my duty, however, to afford them no reasonable cause for complaint. To their addresses, as well as their opinions, I shall give every possible attention, and will afford them every assistance to correct all real grievances; but I am so convinced that every improper concession will not only strengthen their demands, but weaken my influence in the province, that I shall continue to resist, as I have hitherto done, any demand that may at all tend to undermine the happy constitution of the province, as I believe that this policy will eventually secure to the Lieutenant Governor of Upper Canada (whoever he may be) the confidence and support of the community."

To the foregoing opinions, expressed to your Lordship, I firmly continue to adhere, and refer to them for the object of proving that the political state of this province requires no deep experience, but that its moral was evident to me before I had been a month in this capital.

The speech I yesterday delivered on proroguing the Provincial Legislature will sufficiently explain the attempts I have in vain made to carry into effect the remedial measures with which I was intrusted. I will, therefore, only shortly observe, that the Grievance Report remains unopened—that not one of the remedies your Lordship prescribed has been carried into effect; that, in fact, this Grievance Report was nothing but a revolutionary ignis fatuus, purposely created to deceive the British Government, and that, as I stated in my despatch, No. 24, dated 6th April, "far from desiring to remove these grievances, the republican members deem them the fulcrum for subverting the government, and for destroying the constitutional liberties of the province."

The decided measures which your Lordship took promptly to correct the alleged grievances which were brought before you have had the happy effect of breaking up the faction which, from want of firmness, has long been undermining the constitution of this province.—Its enemies are now unmasked, disarmed, and discomfited, and the inhabitants of this country are now indignantly exclaiming, as Cromwell said, "You who are deputed here by the people, to get their grievances redressed, are yourselves become their greatest grievance!"

If the sentiments contained in these petitions from the House of Assembly were really the sentiments of their constituents, this province might justly be said to be in a state of revolt; whereas the fact is, as I stated it to your Lordship in my despatch No. 24, "that a burst of loyalty will very shortly resound from one end of the province to the other, as a more honest, well-meaning yeomanry cannot exist than his Majesty's subjects in this noble province;" and for a proof of this assertion, I refer your Lordship to the enclosed addresses I have already received.

Your Lordship cannot but remark, that, for the first time in the history of this province, the supplies have been stopped—that the whole country has thus been thrown into confusion, and that the period selected for this violence has been my arrival with your Lordship's instructions to correct all the grievances of the country! Had the object of those who have styled themselves Reformers been reform, your Lordship's instructions would have been hailed with joy; instead of which they have been repudiated by the Republicans, as the enemy of their hopes.

The case is fortunately so clear, that no one even in England can now fail to understand it.

"Why," it will be asked "have the supplies in Upper Canada been stopped?" The answer is, because the complaints of the Republicans were ordered to be corrected; and being thus driven off their grievance-ground, they were forced by your Lordship to unveil their real object, which has been neither more nor less than to seize upon the power and patronage of the Crown.

"And how," it will be asked, "have they attempted to do this?" I reply, by demanding that the Executive Council be henceforward responsible to the people; or, in other words, to themselves, for the acts of the Lieutenant Governor.

"And is this all?" No; they further demand that the Legislative Council shall be elective; or, in other words, that it also shall be nominated by themselves; and if this does not betray their real object—if this does not prove to people in England the traitorous, democratic intentions of the half-dozen Republicans who have been allowed to agitate this noble province, facts are useless, and argument powerless!

If the duties of the Lieutenant-Governor of this province merely consisted in his being one branch out of three of the Colonial Legislature, even in that case there could be no more reason why HE should be governed by an Executive Council, than that such a body should be created to govern the House of Assembly or the Legislative Council; but, besides the Lieutenant-Governor's station in the Provincial Legislature, he has to guard the lands and property of the Crown: in short, he is the only individual in this colony competent to consider the interests of the British Empire, of which this colony is but an atom.

The Executive Council are his Privy Council, to give him sworn advice when he wants it, and not to "encumber him with help" when he does not require it.

If I had been governed by my late Council, the constitution of this province would at this moment be subverted, for it will be evident to your Lordship that the unanimous demand they made upon me was contrary to law.

This doctrine was, in 1828, clearly explained by Mr. (now Lord) Stanley, who, in reply to Mr. Roebuck's motion, "That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the political state of the Canadas," declared as follows:—

"The first point to which the Honourable Member referred, was, the constitution of the Executive Council. It may, perhaps, be necessary for me to inform the House that the Executive Council is a body acting in the nature of the Privy Council in this country—advising the governor, but not responsible to him, and forming a council against whose opinion, as well as with it, he may act."

*My Lord, I most solemnly declare, as my deliberate opinion, that if this doctrine be ever subverted, democracy, in the worst possible form, will prevail in our Colonies.** The two branches of the Legislature have their respective interests to attend to, which too often are made subservient to their private views; but THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR IS THE KING'S SENTINEL, and if he be disarmed of the power he has received from the Imperial Parliament, and be fettered by his Provincial Council, the Republicans will move heaven and earth to become the individuals to govern him.

If the power of the Lieutenant-Governor is to be surrendered, I respectfully recommend that the deed be done in broad daylight: for, to hamper him by the number of his councillors, or to oblige him to consult them when he does not need their advice, would most surely produce the same effect in a weak, discreditable manner.

As the subject is of vast importance, and as I believe our colonial possessions now hang upon your Lordship's decision, I will proceed to shew with what artifice the Republicans of the House of Assembly of this province have, in their petition against me, endeavoured to attain this object.

But the Republicans in the House of Assembly were unable to answer the correspondence which I had held with my late Executive Council, and, feeling that they were dead beaten, they caught at this straw, and petitioned the House of Commons, which of course they knew were perfectly ignorant of the whole subject, against what they have termed my "deviation from candour and truth."

But it is perhaps well they should have done so, as it will explain to the House of Commons, as well as to your Lordship, what sort of people the revolutionists of Upper Canada are, and will prove the absolute necessity of not ordering the Lieutenant-Governor to be governed by his Executive Council, which might be composed of such men. In this event, what would become of the property of the Crown?—What would become of the rights of the people?

I have now submitted to your Lordship facts which are incontrovertible, and have replied to the accusations which have been made against me by the House of Assembly, by merely contrasting them with their own declarations.

I must now proceed alone upon my own testimony, to which I trust your Lordship will give that weight which is due to the station I hold.

I have stated to your Lordship that the instructions you gave me to correct the grievances of this country have had the effect of breaking to pieces the republican party. The loyal feeling which is now rising up to support me in all directions is greater than I dare describe; as a single proof of which, I will inform you, that a scene took place on my proroguing the Provincial Legislature which is unprecedented in the history of this country.

* The reader is particularly requested to keep in mind these solemn warnings, as he will, ere long, read with astonishment the orders given by Her Majesty's Government respecting them to Sir Archibald Campbell, Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick.

Although Toronto is, and always has been, the head-quarters of the reformers, and though this capital will suffer more than any other part of the province by the stoppage of the supplies, yet never before was the Parliament House so crowded, inside and out, as when I went there to deliver my speech.

As soon as it was ended, contrary to all custom, a burst of acclamation resounded—cheers were several times repeated, and a crowd of the most respectable people, of all parties, actually endeavoured to take the horses from my carriage to draw me up to Government House.

On the speech being read again by the Speaker in the House of Assembly, the gallery and floor was equally crowded, and, as soon as Mr. Speaker Bidwell had concluded, three cheers were given in the House, although never before had such a demonstration of public feeling been evinced.

I am perfectly confident that the whole country is disposed to rise up to support me, and I can assure your Lordship that I foresee no difficulty whatever in crushing the republican party, and in establishing loyalty, except a general fear which prevails throughout the country that the Home Government will be afraid to support me.

I tell your Lordship the truth, for it is proper you should know that the reception which was given in England to Mr. M'Kenzie has had the effect of cowering the loyalists and of giving a false courage to the republicans.

One word of firmness from the British Government will now settle the question for ever; but if you hesitate to support me; if in your Lordship's reply to this despatch you encourage by a single word the republicans, they will instantly be reanimated, and will again utter their old cry against the "WEAK AND TREMBLING GOVERNMENT OF GREAT BRITAIN."

That they have mistaken British generosity for fear no one is more persuaded than myself, but I earnestly entreat your Lordship to put confidence in me, for I pledge my character to the result; I solemnly declare to your Lordship that I have no difficulties to contend with here that I have not already overcome; the game is won; the battle is gained as far as relates to this country, and I cannot give your Lordship a more practical proof of it than by saying I want no assistance excepting the negative advantage of not being undermined at home.

I am not myself in the least afraid of your Lordship's shrinking from supporting me, but if you knew the feeling of this country you would pardon my telling you that the loyalists are incapable of understanding the generous, liberal policy under which the Home Government has intended to act, and that the republicans firmly look to it for support.

In the present House of Assembly, which is composed of 60 members, five of whom only are English, five Irish, and nine Scotch, there are thirteen American members, many of whom have not only a distaste for monarchical government, and are avowed advocates for the election of magistrates, legislative councillors, &c. &c., but who are desirous to upset the constitution of this province for the sake of reigning in its stead [for which see their incorrect accusations against me.]

Many of these individuals attained their places by the encouragement which was given to Mr. M'Kenzie in England; and, now that I have succeeded in turning the tide, they will, I hope, sink for ever, and be replaced by intelligent, loyal British subjects, if your Lordship will firmly support me.

Whether I may continue here, or be replaced, is a subject I will not now discuss; but as long as I do remain here, and just at the present moment, it is of vital importance that I should retain the victory that has been won.

Upon Upper Canada, I conceive, hangs our possession of our North American, and possibly of our West Indian possessions: for, if this colony be firmly secured, not only will the rest be maintained, but I believe every intelligent individual in the United States foresees that democracy must ere long produce, by a revolution in that country, the identical form of government (I mean a monarchy) which it is endeavouring to overturn in this province.

Your Lordship is aware I have had some experience in ascertaining the opinions of the lower classes in the mother-country, and I have no hesitation in declaring that in no part of Great Britain does there exist so loyal a disposition as will be displayed in this province, if we will only act towards it with firmness and decision.

I shall never regret the generous policy which attempted to produce here tranquillity by conciliation, for I at present owe to it my success; but my speech to the Legislature will prove to your Lordship that we can carry that policy no further—that to Republicans the more we concede the more they demand—that, while they are pushing at the Constitution, every inch of ground they gain redoubles their exertions—and that, on the contrary, if resistance be sternly offered to them they give up the attempt and run away.*

I fully expect that before a month has elapsed the country will petition me to dissolve the present House of Assembly, but until the feeling is quite ripe I shall not attend to it: I would therefore request your Lordship to send me no orders on the subject, but to allow me to let the thing work by itself; for it now requires no argument, as the stoppage of the supplies, of the road money, and all other money bills, will soon speak for themselves in a provincial dialect which every body will understand.

The language contained in the 92 Resolutions from Lower Canada, as well as in the resolutions they have lately forwarded to the Government; the language contained in the Grievance Report of this province, in the petitions now forwarded by the House of Assembly of Upper Canada against me, and in Mr. Speaker Papineau's letter to Mr. Speaker Bidwell, are in my humble judgment subversive of all discipline, and totally irreconcilable with the allegiance due from its colonies to the British Empire.

I feel quite confident that if such language be received by His Majesty's Government without a stern rebuke it will be aggravated; and I therefore earnestly express my hope that your Lordship will deem it proper to reprobate the reception which I, as the bearer of your remedial measures, have met with by the House of Assembly, and that you will by your expressions firmly support me in the course I have pursued.

I have, &c.

F. B. HEAD.

The Lord Glenelg, &c. &c. &c.

The reader will soon perceive that, instead of supporting me in the course I had pursued, and instead of reprobating the author of the 92 Resolutions in Lower Canada, and the conduct of Mr. Speaker Bidwell in the Upper Province, his Majesty's Government, after the receipt of this despatch, obtained the royal assent to the Road Bills I had reserved, thus restoring to Radical Road Commissioners the disposition of road money which had notoriously been misapplied to the basest political purposes!

Not satisfied with this, his Majesty's Government communicated to me their desire that Mr. Bidwell, like the author of the 92 Resolutions in Lower Canada, should be exalted to the Judicial Bench, notwithstanding the recommendations contained in the three following despatches!

Toronto, 27th April, 1836.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to transmit to you a copy of a letter which Mr. Papineau, Speaker of the Assembly of the Lower Province, has addressed to Mr. Bidwell, Speaker of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada.

I conceive that the traitorous and revolutionary language it contains, as well as the terms in which it speaks of your Lordship, need no comment; but I will only observe, that although the letter is dated 20th of March, it was detained by Mr. Bidwell until a few hours before I prorogued the Legislature, and then by him laid before the House of Assembly of this province.

I take this opportunity of mentioning to your Lordship that the House of Assembly lately appointed three Commissioners to meet Mr. Papineau and the other two Commissioners from the Lower Province, and that the individuals named for this unconstitutional object were Mr. Speaker Bidwell, Mr. Perry, the chairman of the committee to whom was referred my correspondence with the Executive Council (a gentleman who has lately uttered most violent language against me as well as against the British Government,) and Mr.—.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to enclose to your Lordship a copy of the minutes of the Executive Council, by which it will appear that, in withholding assent to the money bills, and in declining to grant the contingencies of the House of Assembly, I acted with the advice of my Council.

One of my reasons for not granting the contingencies was, the knowledge that a large sum would be granted out of them, by the Assembly, to send an agent to England, which I have good reason for knowing they had determined to do.

I have just learned that Mr. Robert Baldwin, one of the Executive Council, leaves Toronto this day for London. It is stated that he goes there for the recovery of his health; but it is acknowledged by his party, that he will be prepared to answer any questions which the Government may feel disposed to put to him.

The system of sending agents from the British North American Colonies, and their being received by the Government, is one which I feel confident your Lordship will discountenance.*

The House of Assembly, or the Legislative Council, or the Executive Council, or any individual in the colony, have a constitutional mode of making accusations against the Governor, to which accusations he has also a constitutional opportunity to reply.

Should this not be deemed sufficient, and should the novel course of receiving agents be adopted, then I submit that, in common justice, the party complaining should appoint one agent, and the party complained of another, but that one should not be heard without the other: the inconvenience of such a system must be so apparent, that I feel confident your Lordship will not approve of it.

The mere fact of its being supposed that the revolutionary party have an agent at home, who is successfully undermining the character of the Lieutenant-Governor, will give great importance in this country to Mr. Baldwin's residence in London; and I therefore hope that, should he, directly or indirectly, communicate with the Colonial Office, your Lordship will give him that style of answer, a copy of which, transmitted to me, and published in this country, would at once put an end to that sort of left-handed attacks upon the constitution.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord, &c.

3.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship an address which was this morning presented to me by a deputation from the electors of this city, with my answer thereto.

I would direct your Lordship's attention to the fact, that, at the last general election for the city, the total number of votes that were polled amounted to 512, and that to the present address there are attached no less than 461 signatures.

I have also the honour to transmit an address from the electors of the county of Lennox, of which Mr. Speaker Bidwell and Mr. Perry (the chairman of the committee, who drew up the report on the correspondence with my late Executive Council) are at present the members. It will explain to your Lordship the reaction which is taking place in this province.

* In this almost single instance my recommendation was most strictly complied with.

I may also observe, that I have this evening received official information, that 1200 electors of the Gore district are coming down in a body to Toronto to present to me, in person, an address, strongly supporting me in the measures I have adopted.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship a copy of a Gazette Extraordinary, by which it will appear that I this day dissolved the Provincial Parliament.

The new elections will be concluded on 27th June.

The number of signatures attached to the loyal addresses which I have received already amount to 24,100; many others are on their way.

(Private.)

Toronto, May 28th, 1836.

MY LORD,

My official communications of this day's date will inform your Lordship that I have this day dissolved the Provincial Parliament.

Of course a most violent contest will take place, and I need hardly observe that it is one upon which our possession of the Canadas may almost be said to depend.

Sensible as I am of its importance, I feel calm and tranquil as regards its result.

In South America, truth and justice carried me through difficulties even greater than those I have now to contend with, and I have the firmest reliance they will again be triumphant.

I enclose to your Lordship a printed copy of an answer I this day gave to one of the numerous addresses.

In all my other answers I have been cool and calm; but in this I have made an exception, because I have long determined to notice that letter which Papineau addressed to Mr. Speaker Bidwell.

The fact is, Papineau as well as Bidwell, and all their party, have long endeavoured to inculcate the idea, that the whole of the population of the Canadas are "united, to a man"—that they only tolerate the British Government, and that, consequently, they can throw it off when they please.

Now, I think it highly necessary that this artful spell should be broken—that the truth should be proved, and I have therefore done so effectually.

I am quite sure that my answer* will do Papineau the greatest possible injury; for it will prove his theory to have been false. It will re-animate the loyalists; and as our militia regiments all assemble for a few days on the 4th of June, the appeal will stir them up, and turn their votes in the right direction.

I am aware that the answer may be cavilled at in Downing-street, for I know it is not exactly according to Hoyle. Mais, mon seigneur, croyez-vous donc qu' on fasse des révolutions avec de l' eau de rose? It is impossible to put down republicanism by soft words.

I have only one moment, as the mail is starting.

I remain,

Your Lordship's faithful and obedient servant,

F. B. HEAD.

* "Let them come if they dare!"

The reader will have observed the heavy difficulties I had to contend with, not only in Upper Canada, but in England. The following despatch will moreover explain that, although I was privately on amicable terms with the Commissioners of Inquiry in Lower Canada, yet that I found it so utterly impossible to subscribe to the policy they were ordered to pursue, that I respectfully tendered to her Majesty's Government my resignation.

" Toronto, June 1st, 1836.

MY LORD,

I have received from Lord Gosford and the Commissioners of Inquiry, a copy of their reports to your Lordship on the Executive Council, and I have had an interview with Sir George Gipps, who was here two days ago, on his way to Niagara.

It may have appeared strange to your Lordship that, during the short time that has elapsed since my arrival here, I should have twice respectfully tendered to your Lordship my resignation of the station I hold.

The ostensible reason which I gave for so serious a proposal was, that my income and rank were inadequate, as I still declare them to be, to the duties I had to perform; but having read the Commissioners' Report, and having conversed with Sir George Gipps, of whose talents and probity I am deeply sensible, I have resolved to hesitate no longer to confess to your Lordship, that I do not agree in opinion with the Commissioners of Inquiry; and that I have long felt I should eventually embarrass them by remaining in this country. I should not do justice to myself, or act frankly towards your Lordship, the Governor-General, or Commissioners, were I any longer to conceal that, as regards their policy, I have not an idea in common with them.

The very first act of my administration was a deliberate departure from the course they adopted. I perfectly well knew, and I stated it to your Lordship, that by not giving to the legislature of this province the Commissioners' version of their instructions, I should seriously embarrass them: at the same time I could not make up my mind to conceal the truth, and I therefore promulgated the instructions themselves, in puris naturalibus, although I was sensible it might cause my recall.

In the Commissioners' Report respecting the Executive Council, they build their recommendations on the foundation, "that the weightiest accountability which can attach to any man, in matters of a public nature, for which he is not punishable by law, or by loss of office, is accountability to public opinion."

To this doctrine I have never been able to subscribe; on the contrary I have always considered that every man in office should make public opinion follow him, and never attempt to follow it.

However, upon this foundation the Commissioners project plans which, consistently with their theory, are avowedly framed "to secure as much as possible of the confidence of the people."

In the contest which I have had with the House of Assembly here, my argument has been that the Governor and his Executive Council form the great constitutional counterpoise to the representatives of the people; and that in proportion as the Provincial Legislative Council is deficient in the rank, wealth, and superior education which give influence to our House of Lords, so it is necessary that the Governor and his Council should be enabled to withstand the democratic pressure which, in the British constitution, it is as much as the King and the House of Lords can do to resist. I therefore consider that the Commissioners' recommendation of attempting to conciliate partly public opinion by forming the Executive Council out of the two Houses of the Legislature—or, in other words, out of the very elements it is intended to control, is a fatal error.

I also consider, that to absolve the Governor's council from secrecy would render it absolutely impossible for him to consult them; for as he is only supposed to consult them on subjects upon which he feels his judgment to be rickety, the confession to them of his own weakness would, if made public, ruin his authority by depriving him of respect.

Besides this, if a councillor were permitted to declare what measure he had not advised, he would equally be at liberty to declare what measures he had advised; and, if these were popular measures, the Governor of this colony, besides having to stand against democracy, would also have to bear against the additional odium of having stood against the popularity.

hunting advice of his Council; which, altogether, would in practice be more than he could bear.

But the Report of the Commissioners respecting the Executive Council forms but a single feature in the whole picture of their policy, which to my mind has a democratic character to which I cannot conscientiously accord.

I can declare to your Lordship, that, before I came to this country, many of my friends fancied I was a radical, and, indeed, I almost fancied I was one myself, for in all the countries I have ever visited, I really have been devotedly attached to what is vulgarly called the liberty of the subject, but I cannot go as far as the Commissioners; and I feel it only due to them, and to your Lordship, to state so.

For instance, I consider that the language of the 92 Resolutions of Lower Canada was not only insulting to the British Government, but traitorous.

If this be true, it unavoidably follows that the author of these resolutions is a traitor, and to create him a judge was, in my humble opinion, to place on the British bench one whose proper situation was the dock.

I consider that, in a British colony, British interests should be paramount, and that in these provinces we should foster them by every means in our power, by infusing into the country our redundant population, and by giving nothing to aliens but their bare rights.

I do not in the slightest degree presume to offer these observations as complaints against the Commissioners, or even as suggestions worthy your Lordship's consideration; but merely as a confession that my principles and opinions differ completely from those of gentlemen under whom I believe, I should act, and with whom, I am sure, it is highly advisable I should concur.

As long as I could continue neutral, my opinions were concealed in my own breast, but every hour drives me to the necessity of taking decisive measures; and as the Commissioners and I are now acting in opposite directions, I feel quite confident that sooner or later the principles which govern us must be suspected to be different, and that, the moment the truth is elicited, embarrassments of a very serious nature must ensue. The British population of both the Canadas is now leaning with its whole weight upon me, instead, as it ought to do, upon the Commissioners; I therefore feel I am doing his Majesty's Government more harm than good—that being the lesser power I really ought to retire—and I have no hesitation in recommending to your Lordship that I should do so.

There exist, in the Commission of Inquiry, opinions openly promulgated which many may term liberal, to which I cannot and never will subscribe; but, far from wishing to oppose them, I only desire to offer to your Lordship to yield to them the field.

I have, &c.

F. B. HEAD.

The Lord Glenelg, &c. &c. &c.

Although in the foregoing despatch I divulged to his Majesty's Government my opinion concerning the Commission of Inquiry, the high jurisdiction of which extended to Upper Canada, yet in doing so I felt it but right, 1st—to tender my resignation; and, 2ndly, to make the Commission aware of the opinions I entertained, by communicating them almost literally in a letter to Sir Charles Grey.

As his Majesty's Government, in reply to my communication, declined to lay my resignation before the King, I could not, as I desired, "yield to them the field;" and as the Government did not call upon me to explain my meaning, I had no opportunity of doing so; but as the despatch has now become public, I feel it a duty I owe to the Commission precisely to explain my meaning.

In the Commission there existed one gentleman of whose talent and probity I have already spoken in high terms. His abilities were good, his power of writing uncommon, but his political principles were offensive to almost the whole of the British population. The freedom (which surely must be known in this country) with which he avowed them, was a subject of general regret; and although I could not but admire the honesty with which he spoke his mind, yet when I found that even at a large party, expressly invited to meet him at the Government House at Toronto, in Upper Canada, he advocated his principles so undisguisedly, that, on his leaving the room, one of the public officers observed, loud enough for me to hear him, "That gentlemen should be recalled!" I felt it my duty, though he was personally my friend, to express what I did in my despatch, and having done this, "yield to him the field."

The feeling in the Canadas among the British party was, on this subject, right or wrong, so strong, that, on this gentleman returning to England, it was a subject of considerable speculation to observe in what way a person who was known to have honestly expressed such sentiments would be received by the Colonial Office; and they were equally astonished and disheartened (to no one was the moral more appalling than to myself), when they saw it very shortly announced that, out of the whole population of Great Britain, he was selected by his Majesty's Government to be placed at the head of one of the most rising and important of our colonies. On this appointment I have no comment to offer, and I most deeply regret the necessity which has called for even what I have said.

The following despatches on various subjects will speak for themselves.

Toronto, June 22, 1836.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship a newspaper published here, entitled the Correspondent and Advocate, which contains a letter from Mr. M'Kenzie, of which the following is an extract.

"The people of Lower Canada and the Upper Canada Reformers especially direct their views to four important objects, not one of which will be conceded, as I believe, until it be too late. They are—an elective Legislative Council; an Executive Council responsible to public opinion; the control over the whole provincial revenue to be in the Legislature; and the British Parliament and the Colonial Office to cease their interference in our internal concerns."

As the Republicans in the Canadas generally mask their designs by professions of attachment to the mother-country, I think it is important to record this admission on the part of Mr. M'Kenzie of the traitorous object which the Reformers of this province have in view.

8th July, 1836.

MY LORD,

The important subject of this despatch is to inform your Lordship of the result of the elections which have taken place here in consequence of my having dissolved the Provincial Legislature on the 23th of May.

As soon as I determined on the 5th of March last to make a stand against the unconstitutional demands of my late Executive Councillors (which, as your Lordship is aware, were strenuously supported by the House of Assembly), I became sensible that the only practicable method of breaking the republican party was by opening the eyes of the people to the traitorous designs of those who were leading them insensibly to revolution.

In proportion as the Constitutionists were observed to rally round the British flag (which I hoisted for the first time in the history of the Province on the roof of the Government House), the Republicans felt it necessary to make on their part every possible exertion; and as the period for the elections gradually approached, it became evident to every reflecting man in Lower Canada, that by the conflict about to take place in the Upper Province, Mr. Papineau's power would either be materially increased or diminished, inasmuch as in one of my replies I had noticed his letter to Mr. Speaker Bidwell as follows:—

"But as Mr. Speaker Papineau has thought proper to promulgate in this province, 'that the people of the Canadas, labouring under the accumulative wrongs proceeding from an Act of Parliament, unite as a man,' I feel it necessary publicly to repudiate that assertion, by declaring what the state of opinion in Upper Canada really is.

"The people of Upper Canada detest democracy; they revere their Constitutional Charter, and are consequently staunch in allegiance to their King.

"They are perfectly aware that there exists in the Lower Province one or two individuals who inculcate the idea that this province is about to be disturbed by the interference of foreigners, whose power and whose numbers will prove invincible.

"In the name of every regiment of militia in Upper Canada, I publicly promulgate, let them come if they dare."

The elections commenced on the 20th of June, and the struggle, as might be expected, was a desperate one. I am happy however to inform your Lordship, that the result has been successful, and that truth and justice have as usual prevailed.

In the late House of Assembly the Republicans had a majority of eleven. In the present House of Assembly the Constitutionists have a majority of twenty-five (there being now forty-five constitutional members, and only seventeen republican !)

In the late House there were thirteen American members ; in the present House there are only seven, one of whom is a Constitutionist.

Among the Republicans who have lost their election are the following names :

"1. Mr. Speaker Bidwell,* the twin or Siamese companion of Mr. Speaker Papineau.

"2. Mr. Peter Perry, the most powerful, as well as the leading speaker of the Republicans ; the chairman of the committee to whom was referred my correspondence with my Executive Council.

"3. Mr. W. L. M'Kenzie, the Chairman of the Grievance Report, and arch-agitator of this province."

As a single example of the reaction which has lately taken place in the public mind, I may state that the Solicitor-general, who is the leader of the constitutional party in the House of Assembly, was returned without opposition ; that Mr. M'Lean, the late constitutional Speaker, was returned at the head of his poll ; while Mr. Speaker Bidwell, the avowed advocate for republican institutions, was the lowest of the four candidates for his county.

The effect which the election has produced in this country, and the excitement it will cause in Lower Canada, I will not attempt to describe, but will only express a hope that it will, in your Lordship's estimation, sufficiently defend the course of policy which I have adopted on my arrival at this province, and which I had the honour to explain to your Lordship in my despatch of the 5th of February, as follows:—

"Under these circumstances I considered that the great danger I had to avoid, was the slightest attempt to conciliate any party ; and that the only course for me to adopt, was to act fearlessly, undisguisedly, and straightforwardly for the interests of the country, to throw myself on the good sense and good feeling of the people, and abide a result which I firmly believe will be triumphant."

MY LORD,

In my last despatch, No. 56, dated 8th instant, I had the honour to inform your Lordship, that our elections have added forty constitutional votes to the House of Assembly, which is composed, as your Lordship is aware, of sixty-two members.

"The republican minority of course feel that their cause is desperate ; and, as a last dying struggle, they have, I understand, been assembling at Toronto night after night, for the purpose of appealing for assistance to his Majesty's Government !

* The Government insisting on elevating Mr. Bidwell to the bench, after they had received this despatch, is surely incomprehensible.

Their conventions are so secret that it is impossible for me to know what passes there; but I have been informed, that they have actually despatched Dr. Duncombe,* (an American, and a rank republican) with complaints of some sort respecting the election.

I also beg to state to your Lordship, that I expect that Dr. Baldwin, Mr. George Ridout and Mr. Small, whom I have felt it necessary to dismiss from the situations they respectively hold, in consequence of the disrespectful language they have publicly used against me, will also seek to be supported by his Majesty's Government.

I feel confident that your Lordship will discountenance this dark, unconstitutional practice of despatching agents from the province to his Majesty's Government, to make secret complaints against the Lieutenant-Governor, which, of course, it is impossible for him to repel.

I will therefore merely assure your Lordship that in the elections, as well as in the prompt dismissal of a few of the ringleaders of the Republicans, I have acted cautiously and conscientiously.

MY LORD,

Until I know whether my past proceedings have been approved of or condemned, it feels cheerless to enter upon the consideration of the future: however, as it is absolutely necessary to consider what should be done at the meeting of the Provincial Legislature which might possibly take place in November, I feel it my duty to submit to your Lordship a few observations.

In an evil hour we fatally surrendered, without bloodshed, the duties levied under 14 Geo. III.† the consequence of which has been, that the Republicans, instead of thanking us, have called upon us also to surrender the hereditary revenues of the Crown.

Your Lordship took the pains of ordering in detail a remedy for every single grievance in Mr. M'Kenzie's volume, and the Republicans instantly repaid you by calling for an immediate surrender of the power and responsibility of the Lieutenant-Governor. Little now remains in our hands, and if that little be conceded, if we give up the hereditary and territorial revenues of the Crown, in my humble opinion we have King Lear's fate before us, without his plea of inexperience.

I need hardly observe to your Lordship, that the British Constitution was granted to the inhabitants of the Canadas, merely for the internal government of their own property, and their own affairs; not to entitle them to claim possession of the property of the parent state! If once this distinction be confounded, not only will the property of the Crown be in danger, but the colony will actually be encouraged to demand its separation from the mother-country; but if the Crown voluntarily surrenders its actual property in this colony, before it has imbibed from the mother-country a hundredth part of the redundant population it is capable of sustaining, it may with equal justice be required to surrender its jurisdiction.

I feel quite confident that if the Lieutenant-Governor of this Province, whoever he may be, will act with common firmness, he will not be seriously embarrassed by this refusal on the part of his Majesty's Government; and if the territorial revenues were placed at the Lieutenant-Governor's disposal, under such orders and precautions as his Majesty's Government might think proper to direct, to be judiciously applied by him to those sort of improvements (such as road-making for instance) which would benefit the mother-country as well as the province, or if necessary, to be temporarily withheld, I believe that the country, instead of factiously opposing the Lieutenant-Governor, would feel it their interest (which at present it is not) to live upon good terms with him; and there can be no doubt whatever, that, being disinterested, being unconnected with all jobs and local speculations, the Lieutenant-Governor of the province could direct the expenditure of the hereditary revenues of the Crown with greater advantage to the country than if they were to be intrusted to the people's representatives.*

* This Dr. Duncombe crossed the Atlantic on his secret mission under a false name. On arriving in London, he of course went to Mr. Hume, who seconded his charges against me of having "fabricated votes." On his return to Upper Canada he failed even to appear before the House of Assembly to substantiate any one of his allegations, became a traitor in arms, ran away, and a reward of £500 is now offered for his apprehension.

† See the Duke of Wellington's admirable protest against this fatal measure.

Whether the Lieutenant-Governor or the House of Assembly is to have the expenditure of this money is the point which I respectfully submit to your Lordship's consideration.

In my humble opinion it should be given to his Majesty's representative.

1st. Because it is the property of the Crown, and not the property of the people; and 2ndly. Because it is politic to give the Lieutenant-Governor every possible constitutional support, and impolitic to throw that which legitimately belongs to his influence into the scale of the House of Assembly, which already too clearly preponderates.

I have not yet been able to determine when the Legislature will assemble; but as it is very possible that it may be advisable it should do so early in November, I hope to receive immediate instructions.

CHAPTER VI.

Return to Toronto, after a two months' Inspectional Tour of the Provinces—Submit to his Majesty's Government a Memorandum on the Political State of the Canadas—Also a Memorandum on the Indian Tribes—Remonstrate with the Government—Adhere to the Opinion that the Casual and Territorial Revenues should not be surrendered—Reply to Mr. Ex-Speaker Bidwell's Accusation—Loyal Address from the Speaker of the new House of Assembly on granting the Supplies.

In my inspectional tour, which occupied about two months, I traversed Upper Canada from the extreme south to the eastern district, and from thence to the western boundary.

I generally travelled with two attendants; and, as a considerable portion of the journey was necessarily performed on horseback, I had an opportunity of conversing on very agreeable and easy terms with the yeomen and farmers, who generally assembled to ride with me through their respective districts, and proceeding considerable distances, I had thus an opportunity of conversing through the day with various sets of farmers. In my visits to the Indians it was found inconvenient to carry a tent, and accordingly my aid-de-camp and I lived in the open air, and at night slept on the ground.

Nothing can be more reasonable than that his Majesty's Government should withhold their support from any officer in their service who conscientiously advocates in his despatches principles differing from their own; but that my humble opinion on the political state of the Canadas, and of the Indians, should on that account have been withheld from the public, when every report, even of disagreement, proceeding from Lord Gosford and the Commissioners of Inquiry in Lower Canada, was liberally submitted by His Majesty's Government to both Houses of Parliament, to enable them to form their judgment on the Canada question, appears to me inexplicable.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to inform your Lordship that I have issued a proclamation convening the Legislature of this province for the despatch of business on Tuesday, the 8th of November next.

* The Legislative Council, in their late able "Report on the State of the Province," in speaking of the proposed surrender to Upper Canada of the casual and territorial revenues, in most disinterested terms declare, "that they are far from being impressed with the conviction that such a relinquishment of the just rights and prerogatives of the Crown will contribute to the welfare of the colony." Yet, against the advice of two branches of the Legislature, the Colonial Office insist on surrendering them!

I had, as your Lordship is aware, fixed upon the end of November; but in consequence of the state of affairs in Lower Canada, I have considered that his Majesty's Government would probably like to have before them, at the meeting of the Imperial Parliament, the actual result of the whole of the proceedings of the session of this Legislature, and I therefore fixed on the day I have mentioned.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to submit to your Lordship a short memorandum on the present political state of the Canadas.

I have, &c.

The Lord Glenelg, &c. &c. &c.

---

Memorandum on the present Political State of the Canadas.

During the inspectional tour I have lately concluded, I have been occupied two months in calmly observing the moral feeling of this province.

Avoiding addresses of congratulation, or anything that could cause political excitement, I have mingled with men of practical intelligence, and have listened to the variety of opinions they offered to me, with the same attention with which, as an Assistant Poor Law Commissioner, I made myself acquainted with the prejudices and difficulties it was then my duty to encounter.

I have since had full leisure and opportunity deeply to reflect upon all I have seen and heard; and, although I am at this moment sensible how much may possibly depend on the integrity of the evidence I am about to offer to your Lordship, and into what difficulties I may lead His Majesty's Government, if by exaggeration I should induce them to construct their remedial measures upon a false foundation; yet, with all this before my mind, I have no hesitation whatever in declaring to your Lordship, that upon the loyalty of the people of Upper Canada, his Majesty's Government may now build as upon a rock. I declare to your Lordship that in England there does not exist a more sensible attachment to the British constitution, and to the person of our Sovereign, than here. The owners of property in Upper Canada, dislike democracy: they dislike it infinitely more than people in England do, because there it is a fine omne-ignotum pro-magnifico theory, that no man understands—whereas here, it is seen practically working before our eyes in the United States; and it is because the British population in Upper Canada see it in operation, that they deliberately detest it, in which feeling, or rather judgment, they are joined by many of the Americans themselves, who sorrowfully foresee that Lynch law must ere long unavoidably treat their rights, their hard-earned property, and their religion, just as the cataract of Niagara everlastingly behaves to the calm, gliding waters of Lake Erie.

Of course there exists in Upper Canada, as in England, a party who desire to subvert the British Constitution; but I can assure your Lordship that this party is, generally speaking, composed of people who, in point of property as well as in point of character, have little or nothing to lose, and whose opposition is therefore, proportionately, not equal to that which exists in the mother-country.

The opinion which so generally prevails in England, that a republican government is better suited to the disposition of the Canadian people than the British Constitution, is an error which the simple fact I am about to mention ought to subvert.

Previous to the late election, I made the following declaration, which was printed and circulated over the whole province :—

“ The people of Upper Canada detest democracy ; they revere their Constitutional Charter ; and are, consequently, staunch in allegiance to their King.”

This declaration against democracy was, of course, disapproved of by the republican members of the late House of Assembly ; and consequently, nothing could be more clearly put to the decision of the inhabitants of any country than the following question, which the people of Upper Canada actually asked of each other on the hustings : “ Do you vote for the House of Assembly or for Sir Francis Head ? ” which amounted in plain terms to this, “ Are you for a republican government, or are you not ? ”

The subject having been thus publicly sifted, debated, and argued for about three months, the verdict of the people was unequivocally delivered as follows ;—

It discarded from the House of Assembly,

1. Mr. Speaker Bidwell, the avowed advocate of republican institutions.
2. Mr. Peter Perry, the leading supporter of these doctrines.
3. Mr. W. L. McKenzie, the leading writer in support of these principles.

It completely broke up the republican majority, which, under the pretence of being redressors of grievances, had long insidiously, but successfully obtained seats in the Assembly : in short, the result of the election, or in other words of the opinions of the people, was eventually declared to be as follows :—

Number of Constitutional members elected - - - 44

Number of their opponents - - - - - 18

Of this latter number (18) there were not three who dared openly to avow, before their constituents, a desire to separate this colony from the mother-country, or to exchange its constitution for democracy.

I feel it impossible to take leave of the above recited historical fact, without remarking how little it supports Mr. Papineau in his assertion, that America is destined to give republics to Europe !

With respect to the Indians inhabiting the vast regions around us, I can assure your Lordship, from personal communication with these brave men, that, in the event of a war, all those upon whose attachment we have a just claim would, at any time, sacrifice their lives for their great father, the King, and that if it should be necessary to call upon them, they would come.

Having now stated the result of the observations I have personally made on the state of public feeling in Upper Canada, I would gladly conclude ; but the political state of Lower Canada is so entangled with the interests of this Upper Province, that I feel it my duty respectfully to submit to your Lordship my opinion of the remedial measures which ought to be adopted, in order that his Majesty's Government may take them into consideration, with the various other projects and recipes which will be proffered on the subject.

The remedy which I fear will be assiduously recommended by the British population of Lower Canada is, that the two provinces should be united, and placed under the government of some individual in whose coolness, decision, and ability they can rely.

My humble but deliberate opinion of this project is, that it would produce the effect of separating both the Canadas from the parent state, on the homely principle, that if tainted and fresh meat be attached together, both are corrupted.

Upper Canada is now, as I have assured your Lordship, sound and healthy at heart.

So long as in the United States democracy displayed only its brilliant flowers, considerable danger existed of the weed being rashly transplanted into this neighbouring soil ; but since the poisonous properties of its fruit have become known to us, the attachment of the Upper Canadians to their British constitution has, from deliberate conviction, gradually become what I have described it to be. I firmly believe that this good feeling will increase—that the disease of democracy has ceased to be infectious—that we have now nothing to dread but its contagion, and, consequently, nothing to avoid but its actual contact. However, notwithstanding the good feeling which exists in the country, it is well known, to every observer of human nature, that a considerable portion of mankind are always governed more by prudence than by principle. In this country, as in all others, there must, consequently, exist a large body of men, termed here "majority men," from their propensity to attach themselves to the largest party.

So long as Upper Canada remains by itself, I feel confident that, by mere moderate government, her "majority men" will find that prudence and principle unite to keep them on the same side; but if once we were to amalgamate this province with Lower Canada, we should instantly infuse into the House of General Assembly a powerful French party, whose implacable opposition would be a dead or rather a living weight, always seeking to attach itself to any question whatsoever that could attract and decoy the "majority men;" and I feel quite confident, inasmuch as evil passions are always more alert than good ones, that, sooner or later, the supporters of British institutions would find themselves overpowered, not by the good sense and wealth of the country, (for they would, I believe, always be staunch to our flag,) but by the votes of designing individuals, misrepresenting a well-meaning, inoffensive people.

("For oft, though Wisdom wakes, Suspicion sleeps at Wisdom's gate.")

But leaving political intrigue out of the question, I submit to your Lordship, in opposition to the project of uniting the Canadas, that there exists no moral affinity between the inhabitants of the two provinces. The one are commercial and enterprising, the other anti-commercial and quiet: the busy enjoyment of the one nation is locomotion, the peaceful luxury of the other is rest.

But even if their propensities were identical, their climate, soil, and geography are so different, that their interests would be constantly at variance.

For instance, the Upper Province, surrounded by seas of fresh water, which it holds in partnership with the United States, requires rail roads and markets, which it might be against the interests of the Lower Province to promote.

The distance between the extreme districts being about 1100 miles, and there being no travelling by water for at least five months in the year, would make the meeting of the Legislature at any point of common rendezvous exceedingly inconvenient. Besides which, the size of the two provinces united, would impart to them a political weight, power, and importance, which would, I fear, encourage a separation from the mother-country. In short, the more I practically consider the project, the more clearly does it appear to my mind, that both provinces would be embarrassed by their union, and that, between the two stools, the British Constitution would fall to the ground.

Deeply impressed with this opinion, it is alarming to me to reflect how strongly the project will probably be pressed upon the consideration of his Majesty's Government by various classes of people, each actuated by self-interest; for instance:—

1. By the British population of Lower Canada, who desire to be rescued from the domination of the French.
2. By a portion of the British in Upper Canada, whose votes have been canvassed by their correspondents in the Lower Province.
3. By that unthinking portion of the community, which here, as well as in England, is always in favour of novelty and change.
4. By all those deep-calculating Republicans in both provinces, who shrewdly foresee that the union of the two provinces would eventually cause their separation from the British Empire.

In case his Majesty's Government, for better reasons than I have offered, should disapprove of the union, it then becomes necessary to consider how the present revolt in Lower Canada should be dealt with.

In my humble opinion there are but two courses to be adopted; namely, either peaceably to attempt to cure the evil, or to determine forcibly to kill it.

The only peaceful prescription for effecting a cure, which I can conceive, is emigration; and it will no doubt be argued, that as an army of emigrants is cheaper than an army of soldiers, it should be our policy to swamp the misrepresentatives of the French habitans, by opening upon them, by dint of free grants of land, the flood-gates which retain our superabundant population.

I feel confident, however, from what I have seen of Upper Canada, that this theory would fail to produce the desired effect: for the severity of the Quebec climate, compared with this, would chill the efforts of Government to effect this rapid emigration; and, even if it were to be effected, the time that must elapse before the present members of the Assembly could be actually displaced, would defer the remedy to a distance beyond our present political horizon. In the mean while, Upper Canada would be like a living body chained to a dead one: for as the two provinces are partners in the joint-stock revenues of the St. Lawrence, as well as in the navigation of the Ottawa, a sulkiness, or anti-commercial obstinacy, on the one part, would amount to an actual blockade of the interests of the other: in short, the Upper Province would be driven by desperation to search for an outlet to the ocean, via the United States.

The political disorder of Lower Canada being (as I have endeavoured to shew) by the slow process of emigration incurable, we are now driven to consider what would be the safest, the simplest, and the most effectual method of killing it. I do not mean by personal violence, but the calm, legislative powers of the Imperial Parliament.

It is useless at the present hour retrospectively to regret the uncalculating course of policy, which from our first possession of the Canadas has not only permitted, but encouraged a few individuals who misrepresent the real interests of the French habitans of Lower Canada, (whose simplicity and amiability of character no one can fail to admire,) to assume towards the British Empire a tone of arrogance, and a posture of defiance which, considering their relative physical strength, and the total absence of any just cause for revolt, is without a parallel in colonial history.

Our past policy has, however, been productive of one advantage, namely, that it must now satisfy the cool judgment of the civilized world, that Great Britain in forbearance has borne more, and in submission has submitted to more, than would have been tolerated by any other nation on the surface of the globe; and indeed, such is the scrupulous regard for justice, and the love of mercy, which is inherent in the British character, that I am proud to believe it will be with the deepest regret that the subject will even now be considered by the Imperial Parliament.

Something, however, must be done; and although I trust I am as unwilling as any person can be, to meddle with the Constitutional Act of 1791, yet, seeing the unavoidable necessity of doing so, I cannot but avow, I think it the duty of the country, if it does resolve to interfere, to prevent the necessity of ever doing so again.

With the double object therefore of cure and prevention in view, the following is the manner in which I would propose that the Imperial Parliament should deal with Lower Canada.

1. Let the Act giving up the revenue of the 14th George III. be repealed.
2. Annex Gaspe to New Brunswick.
3. Annex Montreal to Upper Canada.

4. Make the north bank of the Ottawa the boundary of Lower Canada, giving the waters of the river, and the expenses of making them navigable to Upper Canada; Lower Canada having free right to use them by paying the same tolls as the Upper Province.

By the above simple arrangement, the Canadas would be divided into two lots; the one British, the other French. Upper Canada, which, without any exception, contains the largest region of black rich earth I have ever witnessed, would then comprehend almost all that is British in the Canadas; and it would have, as its own port of entry, Montreal, the wealth and importance of which would draw the exports as well as imports of the country to the St. Lawrence: whereas, continue to deny to Upper Canada that port, and every person acquainted with the country foresees, and has long foreseen, that its produce, pent up under high pressure, must fly off by licit or illicit means, into the United States.

As long as Upper Canada remained poor, and occupied in petty political discussions, the want of a free port of entry was merely a subject of constant complaint; but whenever it shall become flushed with wealth, unless free circulation be given to its commerce, I have no hesitation in saying, I believe the people would revolt from any Government on earth that should deny them this natural respiration.

Convinced of this truth, I consider the opportunity now afforded to the Imperial Parliament of providing against this approaching evil a most fortunate occurrence: for if the misrepresentatives of Lower Canada had not by their late conduct shaken off their connexion with the British population of the Canadas, the latter would very shortly have found it necessary, without right, without justice, and for no other reason than for that which all over the world governs mankind, namely, their own interests to have severed the connexion themselves. That the two tribes of men, French and English, do not assimilate, is no modern discovery; why therefore, should we expect that a commercial partnership should succeed on the St. Lawrence, which would not hold together for five minutes on the Thames?

My humble project of separating the two tribes is nothing more than what Nature herself did, when she deliberately created the British Channel.

If it should be argued, that, by transferring Montreal from the Lower to the Upper Province, we should make the latter too strong, and the former too weak, I respectfully reply, that Upper Canada need not be ashamed to acknowledge that, single-handed, she can never be made strong enough to stand against the United States by land; nor, with her solitary port on the St. Lawrence, could she ever attempt to contend against Great Britain by sea. With one of these powers she must consequently exist in alliance; and leaving consanguinity out of the question, there can be no doubt in the mind of any man who is acquainted with the inhabitants of Upper Canada, that they are deliberately of opinion that they hold at this moment a higher and more independent station, as a colony of their own revered mother-country, the British Empire, than they would hold if they were permitted to be styled one of the super-numerary stars of the United States.

We have therefore nothing to dread from the size or from the prosperity of Upper Canada, and with respect to the division proposed making the Lower Province too small—if it be true, and surely no one can deny it, that the French are not the same sort of restless, commercial people as ourselves—that we made a grand mistake in legalizing their language—that their habits, wants, and religion, however they may be deserving of our respect, never will assimilate with our own; it may be fairly asked, what harm shall we do ourselves, or what injustice shall we do to them, by saying, “Gentlemen, your representatives have failed to support the Executive out of the revenues we surrendered to you, on condition you should do so: we have, therefore, repealed that Act, the provisions of which you yourselves have most deliberately broken.

“You profess not to like your connexion with Great Britain, under whose mild, parental protection you have amassed all your wealth: we have, therefore, detached you as much as possible from British interest, nevertheless, for the sake of those who have already emigrated, as well as for those who have a right still to emigrate from their mother-country to the British colony you inhabit, we shall insist on retaining within that portion of the empire the British Constitution.

“You have, therefore, your own Legislative Council, your own representatives in the House of Assembly; and with these advantages, which you may either use or abuse, we now leave you to act as you may think best for the interest of the noble country you inhabit.”

If Lower Canada, under these altered circumstances of its own seeking, should choose to be commercial and loyal, it would soon reap the inestimable advantage of its connexion with our empire: if, on the contrary, it should prefer to be disloyal and anti-commercial it would injure no one but itself, for it could not possibly be an independent nation, neither could it hope to join the Upper Canadians, for they would say, “No, Gentlemen, we have already tried a connexion with you, you did not suit us, you would not work with us, you publicly declared you did not like us, your representatives refused to meet for legislation, until our British Constitution was changed for elective institutions: we have at last got a port of our own, we are busy opening the navigation of the Ottawa and the St. Lawrence, and we are satisfied.”

Lastly, it could not join the United States,

1st, On account of its distance;

2nd, Because, by the common law of nations, Great Britain and Upper Canada would object to any foreign power occupying a position of our empire which commands the entrance of one of the noblest of its rivers.

I am aware that in the eastern township of Lower Canada, as well as at Quebec, there exist some British inhabitants, who, if they were to hear of the proposed annexation of Montreal to the Upper Province, might, at first, with some reason, fancy themselves peculiarly neglected, by being thus apparently placed even more than ever under the domination of the French; but I think a little reflection would satisfy them, that as it is impossible for them, as they are at present, ever to belong to the French majority, the more the power of that majority be crippled, the less will they have to fear from its domination.

With respect to Upper Canada, I have already stated that, with the assistance of Montreal, the navigation of its two great rivers would immediately be perfected.

Enjoying independently its own port of entry, and public confidence being restored, the province would become rapidly rich from the redundant capital, enterprise, and population of the mother-country, and its commerce being attracted by the wealth and intelligence of Montreal, would travel on our own noble rivers the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa, instead of being forced upon canals and rail-roads in the United States, which, in case of war, it would suddenly be deprived of. The loyal colony of New Brunswick would also be benefitted by the arrangement, and I believe that the just lesson would produce a salutary moral throughout all our colonies.

In the above outline of the advantages which would attend the division of the Canadas as I have proposed, I have said nothing of the immense value of these provinces to Great Britain, because I feel that subject too vast to be described. I will, therefore, only observe that Upper Canada alone is capable of receiving the whole agricultural population of England and Wales—that its commerce is a market for our own manufactures, and a nursery for our seamen, instead of for those of other powers.

If the Imperial Parliament will now deal with Lower Canada with firmness and decision, there is nothing whatever to fear—if it vacillates, all is gone.

My memorandum on the state of the Indians of America will be found in Appendix A.

Toronto, 28th, Oct. 1836.

(Private.)

MY LORD,

It is an old maxim in the army, that any project of apparent difficulty, or danger, should always be accompanied by an offer from the proposer to carry it into effect himself.

The memorandum I have the honour to submit this day to your Lordship contains a proposition of this nature, and I should have no hesitation in declaring to your Lordship that I would pledge my character to carry either half of what I recommended into effect: I mean, that I would undertake either to advance the interest of the Upper Province in the way I have proposed, or by caution, forbearance, and firmness to tranquillize the Lower Province,* notwithstanding the operation I have recommended it should undergo;† but, from the treatment I am receiving, I feel that my services are not appreciated, and will not long be in action.

I have, &c.

F. B. HEAD.

The Lord Glenelg, &c. &c. &c.

To those who may have conceived that I have intemperately abandoned my post, I beg to observe, that I remained at it nearly eighteen months after the above despatch was written.

Toronto, Upper Canada, 7th Nov. 1836.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's despatches (No. 73 and 95), of the importance of which I am deeply sensible; but as the Legislature assembles to-morrow, I trust your Lordship will excuse me, if I reply to these communications in as few words as possible.

* After it had been reduced.

† Although I offered to carry either of these two measures into effect, yet I can truly say that nothing in this world would have induced me to have assumed the impracticable duty of contending with an amalgamation of the Houses of Assembly of the two Provinces.

The flattering manner in which your Lordship has been pleased to convey to me the King's gracious approbation of my conduct has afforded me the first happy moment I have enjoyed since my arrival in this province.

The future so completely occupies my attention, that it is with reluctance I turn to the consideration of the past; but your Lordship seems to wish that I should frankly explain myself respecting my political opinions, and I will therefore lay them before you without reserve.

Up to the receipt of your Lordship's despatch (No. 95), I have suffered, from the treatment I have received from his Majesty's Government, more pain than it would be possible for me to describe.

On the 29th of February almost every member in the House of Assembly, with a majority of the Legislative Council, recommended to your Lordship that an individual should be appointed to the important station of Surveyor General of this province, in opposition to an appointment which I had made. In resisting this aggression, I had no interest but that of the public service, and I undertook a heavy responsibility in standing against a recommendation apparently so respectable.

Your Lordship must have received this communication about the end of April, and though my arguments and reasoning appeared to you satisfactory, and though eventually you approved of my conduct, yet it was not until the 27th of September that I was relieved from the painful belief which generally existed here, that the measure I had taken was discountenanced by his Majesty's Government.

On the 4th of March I received from the Executive Council a document, ferociously supported by the House of Assembly, which I immediately transmitted to your Lordship, with my answer, which your Lordship was pleased eventually to notice in the following terms:—

"From the constructions thus given to the Act of 1791, I must altogether dissent, nor do I know that it would be possible to refute it in terms more complete and satisfactory than those employed in your answer of the 5th of March."

The above support, however, I did not receive from your Lordship until the 27th of September, during which time I was engaged single-handed in one of the severest moral contests on record in the Colonial Office. Your Lordship's silence was construed, not only by my enemies, but by everybody, even by my own Executive Council, as the marked disapprobation of his Majesty's Government, and it bore me almost to the ground.

By my own unassisted exertions, I received addresses of support from about 28,000 yeomen, farmers, &c., all of which I forwarded to your Lordship, but to which, to this day, I have never received the slightest acknowledgement from his Majesty's Government, addressed to those who thus generously came forward to support me.

Whenever a mail arrived, I was asked, with the greatest anxiety, what remarks the British Government had made to these noble addresses; the mortifying answer I had to give was "None."

The speech I delivered to the Legislature at the close of the last session has, in this province, as well as in the United States, been noticed in a manner strongly supporting me, as the administrator of the Government. Upwards of 100,000 copies of it have been distributed.

The greatest curiosity naturally existed in this little community to know what notice His Majesty's Government had taken of this speech; I had again to reply "None."

When I eventually gained a victory, which I hope I do not overrate when I say that it has saved the Canadas, weeks and weeks elapsed without the slightest acknowledgment, or even mention of it, by his Majesty's Government, the effect of which corroborated the general belief that I was acting against the policy of his Majesty's Government, and that I should eventually be recalled.

During this period of painful suspense, my family were in the greatest embarrassment and anxiety; and though certain points of my conduct were approved of by your Lordship, yet other minute points were visited with observations which I never expected to receive.—For instance, I was told that by having given to the Legislature the whole, instead of the substance of my instructions, I had "disregarded the express injunctions of the King;" that I had "avowed in the most public manner, that, in thus divulging the precise terms of my instructions, I was acting in opposition to his Majesty's orders," and that "I had thereby contributed a little to impugn the respect due to the royal authority."

Again, in your Lordship's despatch (No. 73), in spite of the triumph I had gained, I was slightly reproved for having accepted the resignation of Messrs. Rolph, Baldwin, and —, and your Lordship withheld your approbation from what was stated to be "my recommendation, that Mr. — should be removed from the office of —:" whereas, if your Lordship will be so good as to refer to my despatch on the subject, it will appear that I never recommended that gentleman's removal; on the contrary, that I earnestly requested your Lordship not to remove him, until I found him associated with Mr. Papiucan and Mr. Bidwell, when I merely retracted the above recommendation, leaving it entirely to your Lordship to deal with him as you might think proper.

My Lord, I could continue these observations further, and could shew you the mischievous political effect they produced in the Canadas, as well as in England, of causing everybody to believe that I was discountenanced by his Majesty's Government, to whose interests, honour, and policy I had never been faithless for a moment. But I will say no more on the subject; I dismiss it from my mind and from my memory, and have only made the above explanation as an apology, rather than as a reason, for a few intemperate sentences which in my despatches to your Lordship I regret that I have expressed.

I will now proceed to reply to the latter paragraph in your Lordship's despatch No. 95, which states, that a "zealous and cordial co-operation on my part, in prosecution of the system of policy thus solemnly announced, is the condition upon which the administration of the province can be continued in my hands."

The above observation of your Lordship is so plain and unequivocal, that, if it stood isolated, I should receive it with respectful silence; but, as it appears to be connected, in a slight degree, with the baronetage which your Lordship announces to me it is his Majesty's intention to confer upon me, I feel the strongest possible anxiety to explain myself most clearly on the subject, before the gracious intention of his Majesty can possibly be carried into effect.

With respect to the instructions I have had the honour to receive from your Lordship, I have no hesitation in saying, that, when I read them in England, they appeared to me to be everything I could desire.

They have formed the text of all the replies I have made to the various addresses I have received, and I have invariably referred to them as a proof that I was ordered by your Lordship "to maintain the happy constitution of this province inviolate, yet cautiously, but effectually, to correct all real grievances." The victory I gained over the Republicans I attributed (vide my despatch No. 56), not to my own exertions, but to your Lordship's instructions.

With respect, however, to that part of Lord Gosford's instructions which relate to the giving up the hereditary and territorial revenues of the Crown, I never understood, or indeed reflected upon, that subject, until, by our victory here, it became evident, to my humble judgment, that it was neither necessary nor advisable to do so.

In my despatch No. 60, I therefore explained, with the frankness with which I have always ventured to address your Lordship, the reasons of my earnest recommendations that they should be withheld. I respectfully adhere to the opinion I have expressed; and I have no hesitation whatever in saying, that, if the subject were open to your Lordship's revision, I should feel it my duty to tender my resignation, rather than be the instrument of doing what I conscientiously believe is impolitic.

But your Lordship informs me, that the King's word is pledged to the performance of this arrangement; and it being therefore irrevocable, it is useless for me to say any more on the subject.

If it were open to argument, I do yet believe I could bring conviction to your Lordship's mind, that Lower Canada having refused to serve any longer under the British Constitution, has virtually absolved his Majesty from any previous offers of accommodation he may graciously have made. I look upon the territorial revenues of the Crown as our last cable; that when it goes, we shall be on a lee-shore, and, at the next tempest, be driven on the rocks.— As the pilot in charge of your vessel, I warn your Lordship of the danger, and if it be necessary that I should abandon my opinion, or the reward which is intended for me, I have no hesitation in at once renouncing the latter, for every hour of reflection makes me cling firmer and firmer to the former.

I have now, as regards my instructions, opened my mind to your Lordship, without concealment or reserve; and it only remains for me to be equally explicit, as regards my own private policy, or, in other words, the manner in which I shall continue to carry my instructions into effect.

In this I have no alteration to propose. In a moral contest it never enters into my head to count the number of my enemies. All that guides me is a determination to do what is right. I will never shrink from responsibility, and will endeavour never to conciliate nor offend.

The more I am trusted, the more cautious I shall be—the heavier I am laden, the steadier I shall sail; but I respectfully claim the military privilege of fighting my own battles in my own way, and of retiring from your Lordship's service whenever I may find it advisable to do so.

I will not apologise for having explained myself so clearly, because I am sure your Lordship will feel for me how absolutely necessary it is that I should not receive the baronetage which I am informed is graciously to be conferred upon me, with the slightest possibility of a misunderstanding on the subject.

No. 89.

Toronto, 6th Nov. 1836.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's despatches, Nos. 75, 76, 77, and 80, in which I am informed that certain letters respecting my conduct have been addressed to your Lordship by the following persons:—Messieurs Marshall Spring Bidwell, Robert William Baldwin, John Rolph, T. D. Morrison.

I have also the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's despatch No. 95, enclosing a copy of a petition addressed by Mr. Charles Duncombe, a member of the House of Assembly of this province, to the House of Commons, and presented to the same by Mr. Joseph Hume.

On the receipt of the above-named despatches, Nos. 75, 76, 77, I immediately communicated to Messrs. Bidwell, Rolph and Morrison, a copy of your Lordship's request, namely, "that I would call on each of these gentlemen respectively for a copy of his letter to your Lordship, in order that I might be able to supply your Lordship with any observations on it which I might consider it to require."

The copies of his replies, which I herewith enclose, will explain to your Lordship that Mr. M. S. Bidwell declines to furnish me with a copy of his letter to your Lordship, urging, as his reason, "that it contained a narrative of what had taken place between his Excellency and himself, particularly relative to his Excellency's proposition to appoint him a judge of the Court of King's Bench."

And Mr. Bidwell further adds,

"This private letter to the distinguished nobleman whose name I have mentioned I do not now choose, especially as I have no longer any connexion with public life, to convert into a public and official communication, by transmitting to you a copy of it."

It will no doubt appear strange to his Majesty's Government that Mr. Bidwell, after transmitting to your Lordship statements concerning my conduct, should, when called upon by your Lordship to avow them, deem it advisable to withhold them from me in this country on no better grounds than that they merely "contained a narrative of what had taken place between the Lieutenant-Governor and himself." It will no doubt appear equally inexplicable to your Lordship how Mr. Bidwell could hope, for a moment, that a British minister* would allow him, or any person, to forward, under the protection of privacy, secret communications respecting the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of this province.

* The reader has to learn, that, in spite of this despatch, the Colonial Office desired me to raise this man to the Bench! He has since the rebellion voluntarily transported himself, and engaged never to return to Upper Canada.

However, as Mr. Bidwell shields himself under this plea of privacy, it only remains for me to observe, that I have it not in my power to offer to your Lordship any observations on the subject of his communication.

As regards Mr. John Rolph,* whom your Lordship is so good as to inform me has also "commented at considerable length on my conduct," I have to inform your Lordship, that, to the letter from my secretary, enclosed herewith, in which I called upon him, by your Lordship's desire, for a copy of his letter, Mr. Rolph replied, by merely acknowledging its receipt; that, after an interval of five weeks, being again pressed by my secretary for a specific answer, he replied as follows:—

(Copy.)

Toronto, 5th Nov.

SIR,

I have the honour to acknowledge your letter of the 21st of October, recalling my attention to the letter of the 23rd of October.

The sickness in my family has abated, and I hope shortly to be able to furnish the Lieutenant-Governor with a copy of my letter to Lord Glenelg.

I have, &c.

(Signed)

JOHN ROLPH.

T. Joseph, Esq., &c. &c. &c.

As regards Mr. John Rolph's comments on my conduct, I have therefore also to state, that, not having obtained from him the information I required, it is out of my power to offer to your Lordship any reply to his allegations.

Mr. T. D. Morrison,† in his letter dated 29th of April, 1836, "imputes to me a misquotation, from the Report of the Committee of 1835 on Public Grievances, in my speech at the close of last session." To this accusation I consider it unnecessary to reply, as it merely amounts to this—that, in my speech from the Throne, I quoted, as from the Grievance Report, a sentence which actually belonged to its Appendix.

With respect to Mr. Robert Baldwin's communication, dated 26th July, 1836, in which he encloses to your Lordship a Toronto newspaper, informs your Lordship of the contents of private letters he has received, and transmits to your Lordship a list of certain tunes which he has been informed have been played at public dinners in Upper Canada, I have no observations to make on such subjects, except that I believe that Mr. M. S. Bidwell, Mr. John Rolph, Mr. T. D. Morrison, Mr. R. Baldwin, and Mr. C. Duncombe, would be the very first to complain were I to undertake to curb in this province the freedom of the press, or to stifle the tunes of which Mr. Robert Baldwin has so gravely complained.

With respect to my expression, "let them come if they dare," your Lordship has only to read Mr. Papineau's letter to perceive that this sentence was most clearly levelled at the invitation which the Speaker of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada made to this province as well as the other British North American Colonies to unite for an object that could not be misunderstood.

The Americans had no more to do with the subject than the Chinese, and of this fact, every inhabitant of the Canadas might be sensible; but my defiance was more than was expected, and it was therefore deemed safer to misinterpret it than to meet it.

It certainly appears to me not very creditable to those whose accusations I have just replied to, that after having so loudly and repeatedly complained of the "humiliating and mortifying" inconvenience of seeking for justice 4000 miles off, they should centrifugally write and hurry across the Atlantic, to complain of the honest verdict which has been deliberately pronounced against them, not by me, but by the inhabitants of their own province.

If your Lordship however will be good enough to continue invariably to furnish me with a copy of the accusations they secretly write against me, this un-British practice will very shortly be discontinued.

I have, &c.

P. S.—It is my intention to forward a copy of Mr. Charles Duncombe's petition to the House of Commons to the House of Assembly, as I conceive that tribunal to be the proper one for inquiry into the allegations it contains.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to inform your Lordship that having proceeded in state to the Legislative Council Chamber to give assent to a bill, the Speaker of the House of Assembly addressed me from the bar of the House of Assembly as follows:—

“MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,

“We, his Majesty's faithful subjects the Commons of Upper Canada, recognising the duty which we owe to our Sovereign and the loyal people whom we represent, and sensible that it is the anxious desire of your Excellency to accede to all our reasonable expectations, and to afford us every aid in removing all well-founded complaints, beg leave to present to your Excellency for the royal assent, a bill which has passed both houses of the legislature, to provide for the support of the civil government for the current year, and trust that the evils occasioned by withholding the supplies during the last session may thus be effectually removed.”

CHAPTER VII.

History of the Downfall of His Excellency Lieutenant-General Sir Archibald Campbell, Bart., Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick—Its Political Effect upon me—Receive intelligence that His Majesty's Government had assented to the Road Bills of the Old Assembly, which I had reserved—Earnestly remonstrate against Concessions to Democracy—Gratifying result of the Metropolitan Elections—Commuted Pensioners—The suspension of Cash Payments throughout the United States—The Legislature is convened—Despatch to the Colonial Office explaining the Insecurity to Property of Republican Institutions—Violent Struggle in the House of Assembly.

ALTHOUGH in my despatches to his Majesty's Government I could scarcely avoid, almost in self-defence, egotistically claiming for the Executive Government credit for the apparent result of its measures, yet I should do injustice to the people of Upper Canada were I now to deny to them the sole honour of a moral victory obtained by their fervent loyalty as well as by their deliberate attachment to our happy institutions.

Not only did their free, unbiassed verdict produce most beneficial results throughout the whole of the North American Colonies which with the utmost anxiety had been watching in Upper Canada the conflict between principles by which they themselves had been equally disturbed, but far above all did it offer a morale of inestimable value to the mother-country itself: for surely it is impossible for any man to deny that, previous to the struggle in Upper Canada, there existed among all parties in England an impression, beyond the power of argument to efface, that democracy not only was indigenous to the soil of America, but that no other form of government could be made to flourish there.

But although every person acquainted with human nature knows how impossible it is at once to eradicate any firmly-rooted error, (for though you cut down the tree in America it requires ten or twelve years before the stumps rot,) yet the incontrovertible fact that the people of Upper Canada, when formally, appealed to at a general election, had deliberately, emphatically, and unequivocally declared themselves in favour of monarchical institutions, was a staggering blow to the popular error in the mother-country, which it was highly desirable to repeat before it could recover from it.

Never, therefore, had the British Government a nobler opportunity of forcing conviction on the public mind, and of calling upon it to surrender its prejudices and misconceptions.

Aware of all the facts which had occurred, surely it was the bounden duty of the Government to have magnanimously led the two Houses of the Imperial Parliament forward to reform, by frankly telling them to reform themselves, and, instead of mutilating, to appreciate the blessings of time-tried institutions, which the inhabitants of Upper Canada had proved to possess the same intrinsic value on the continent of America, as they had possessed in the old country in its noblest days.

Far, however, from adopting this course, his Majesty's Government, just as if they had been mortified at the triumph which had been gained, and just as if they had determined that its salutary consequences ought immediately to be arrested, planned a measure which I humbly think to future ages will appear not only incomprehensible, but incredible!

It was of course utterly impossible for his Majesty's Government to order me to abandon the principle which before the whole continent of North America I had successfully maintained namely, "that the Executive Council is not responsible to the people."

1. Because, as Lieutenant-Governor of the province, I had been supported in that principle by the voice of the people at the general election.

2. Because the Legislative Council had supported the same principle.

3. Because the House of Assembly, shortly after they had been elected, had adopted by a triumphant majority the following opinion (date 22nd Feb. 1836) of their Committee:—

"The question regarding the Executive Council it is perhaps unnecessary to discuss.—Never was the public opinion more clearly, more emphatically expressed than on that very subject, at the late general election. A large majority of your Honourable House was, as your Committee firmly believe, returned as advocating principles and opinions diametrically opposed to those contained in this second resolution." [This second resolution of the House of Assembly in Lower Canada was to render the Executive Council of this Province directly responsible to the representatives of the people, &c.]

"Your Committee, however, cannot let pass the opportunity of expressing their opinion, that the Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, or person administering the government of this province, is intrusted with the exercise of the royal prerogative within the same, and that he, and not the Executive Council, is constitutionally responsible, as well to the Sovereign as to the people of this province, for the impartial and upright performance of the duties of his office; a responsibility essential to the preservation of the rights and liberties of his Majesty's subjects in Upper Canada, and which it is the important duty of their representatives to maintain and enforce, and not to suffer that responsibility, so far as depends on them, to be weakened or destroyed, by transferring the whole or any portion of it to other parties; and that any attempt to transfer to the Executive Council this responsibility, and, as a necessary consequence, the power and patronage vested by law in the person administering the government, is in derogation of the constitutional charter, and would be dangerous to the liberties of the people, injurious to the stability of our social and political institutions, and utterly destructive of the ties which attach this colony to the British empire."

As it appears from the foregoing extracts how firmly the Legislature and inhabitants of Upper Canada stood combined together heart and hand to resist the republican principle of making the Executive Council "responsible to the people," it is with regret I received from the Colonial Office a despatch dated 25th July, 1836, in which after some highly complimentary sentences, it was ominously observed, "His Majesty's Government look to no transient results or temporary triumphs!"

That the results of the contest in which we had been engaged would not be "transient" or its "triumph temporary," were, at the time this despatch was written, as clear to every loyal subject in our North American Colonies as they have since been proved by the repeated repulses which the American people have met with wherever they have unjustifiably attempted to invade the Canadas for the purpose of forcing upon us their loathsome institutions. Still it was evident to me from the sentence above quoted—from the non-publication in England of my despatches announcing the moral victory that had been gained—and from the remarkable ministerial silence that had prevailed on the subject in both Houses of Parliament, that the Colonial Office was but little disposed to change its policy. I own, however, I was not prepared for the astonishing course which I will endeavour as shortly as possible to relate.

As if determined to fulfil its own prophecy by proving that in Upper Canada the "triumph" gained would be "temporary," and the results "transient," the Colonial Office, on the 30th September, 1836, addressed to me a despatch, which after asserting a most melancholy axiom, namely, that "it is vain to suppose that any concession can be made to the General Assembly of any one of the North American provinces and withheld from the rest," enclosed to me copies of despatches and instructions to his Excellency Lieutenant-General Sir Archibald Campbell, Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, to which he was ordered to give general publicity, and which I was desired to consider, as far as they could be applied to Upper Canada, "as addressed to myself." The despatch then proceeded to say, "It has appeared to me (the Secretary of State) that it would be very desirable to accelerate the meeting of the Legislature of New Brunswick, in order that the nature of the proposed arrangements in that province might be well understood in both the Canadas and in Nova Scotia, before the opening of the regular session of the General Assemblies in those provinces. * * * *"

It is further my wish, that the meeting of the Upper Canada Assembly though postponed for some weeks after that of New Brunswick, should precede, by an equal period the meeting of the Lower Province."

As the whole of the despatches to Sir Archibald Campbell have been published throughout every province in North America, I need hardly say, that the "proposed arrangements" which were thus ordered to be effected, contained not only directions for the surrender of the casual and territorial revenues against which I had so humbly but so strongly remonstrated, but the following order to Sir Archibald Campbell:—"In making your selection (for seats in his Majesty's Executive Council) you will not confine yourself to a single class or description of persons, but will endeavour to ensure the presence in the Council of gentleman representing the various interests which exist in the province, and possessing at the same time THE CONFIDENCE OF THE PEOPLE AT LARGE!"

By this most extraordinary and complicated arrangement, the triumph which the loyal inhabitants of our North American Colonies had gained over the demands of the Republicans was not only proved to be "temporary," but was completely destroyed.

Instead of allowing the Legislature of Upper Canada to continue to lead the way towards real reform by the merciless eradication of Republican principles, it was not only ordered to the rear, but as it were confined there in irons by the Colonial Office until the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick could assemble the Legislature of that province, publicly to surrender to them, among other concessions, the very point which, before the whole continent, the Upper Canadian Legislature had successfully defended from the Republicans: for I submit to the intelligence of the civilized world, that this decision of the Colonial Office respecting the Executive Council, when divested of the diplomatic language in which it was couched was a direct surrender of the question in dispute. I ask, first, whether it was constitutional to order that the Governor's Executive Council should be made "to represent the various interests" which were already represented in the House of Assembly; and secondly, whether there is any difference between the Colonial Office ordering the Executive Council "to possess the confidence of the people at large," and the republican demand which the people of Upper Canada had resisted, namely, "that the Executive Council must be responsible to the people?"

But perhaps, after all, the most astonishing fact in the whole of this proceeding is, that not only these concessions, but various others, which were ordered to be promulgated by Sir Archibald Campbell throughout the whole of our North American Colonies, appear to have been arranged in the Colonial Office by Messrs. Crane and Wilmot, two deputies from the House of Assembly of New Brunswick!

Without meaning, in any degree, to compare these two most respectable gentlemen with Mr. McKenzie still one would have thought that the fatal experience which the Colonial Office had so dearly purchased by listening to the latter individual would have proved the impropriety of the principle of legislating on ex parte statements, proceeding either from the people or from the representatives of the people, without referring them to the Lieutenant Governor, Executive Council, and Legislative Council of the colony! The following extracts, however, of the despatches alluded to from the Colonial Office to Sir Archibald Campbell, clearly show, not only that the old system continued, but that vires acquisiverat eundo.

Extract of a despatch to Sir A. Campbell, dated Downing-Street, 31st Aug. 1836, and published in New Brunswick:—"I have also been in communication with these gentlemen (Messrs. Crane and Wilmot), as well on the matters to which the address adverts, as on others connected with the colony."

A second despatch to Sir A. Campbell, dated 5th Sept. 1836, encloses—

"Copies of the correspondence which had passed on the subject of that address, and on other matters of a public nature between this department and Messrs. Crane and Wilmot, the gentlemen deputed by the House of Assembly to represent them in this country. Having communicated to Messrs. Crane and Wilmot the draft of my despatch of the 31st ultimo, I have received from them the enclosed observations upon it. I have also had with them personal communication on the subject. I now proceed to inform you in what respects his Majesty has, in consequence, been pleased to direct that the instructions contained in my despatch of the 31st ultimo shall be altered or modified.

"The first alteration proposed by Messrs. Crane and Wilmot is, that the Executive Council could, in compliance with the wishes of the Assembly, be at once enlarged, without waiting for the further deliberation contemplated in my despatch of the 31st ultimo. On this point, his Majesty, after due consideration of the arguments urged by the House of Assembly, and of the representations of Messrs. Crane and Wilmot, is prepared to adopt the necessary steps for meeting the wishes of the Assembly."

It appears that these concessions to one branch only of the Legislature produced the natural effect of increasing, rather than of satiating, the voracious appetite of Messrs. Crane and Wilmot, for a third despatch to Sir Archibald Campbell, dated 10th September, 1836, referring to the two previous despatches observes—

"In one respect, the arrangements announced in the despatches just referred to are defective. They do not comprise any detailed explanation of the provisions of the Act, to be made for securing the civil list, and for the general sale of the Crown lands. I am yet engaged in correspondence with Messrs. Crane and Wilmot on these topics, and some time may, probably, elapse before I can settle with these gentlemen what are the precise terms in which those laws ought to be drawn up. You will not, however, postpone on that account the meeting of the Legislature, or the communications which are to be made to them."

The Legislature was ordered to be convened with the least possible delay, and the despatch to Sir Archibald Campbell then observes—

"Considerations applying not to New Brunswick alone, but to the other British North American provinces also, require that no time should be lost in giving general publicity to the proposals which you are authorised to make. You will, therefore, take the necessary measures for convening the General Assembly, for the dispatch of business on the receipt of this despatch.

"On the meeting of the Legislature, you will, by a message, communicate to the Legislative Council, and to the Assembly, copies of my despatches of the 31st of August and of the 5th of September. It is my wish that no needless reserve should be practised on this occasion.

"The views explained in those despatches having been maturely adopted, after a full and careful investigation, it is desirable that they should be fully known, and clearly developed to the Legislative bodies of New Brunswick, and through them to the Legislatures of the other British North American Provinces."

The severe mortification which this infatuated course of policy of the Colonial Office produced in Upper Canada is indescribable. The Loyalists were again disheartened, the Republicans again exultingly, though untruly, boasted that the Home Government was with them.

His Excellency, Lieutenant-General Sir Archibald Campbell, seeing the effect produced, not only in New Brunswick, but throughout all the British North American Colonies, by the representations of a single pair of "delegates," from a single branch of the Legislature of a single province—feeling how completely his authority was superseded—how hopeless it was for him to attempt to maintain monarchical institutions, while the Colonial Office openly legislated on the democratic principle of "delegates," (the very name of which was most offensive to the Royalists,) and openly disapproving, on constitutional grounds, of the mode in which the King's casual and territorial revenues were proposed to be surrendered—expressed himself to his Majesty's Government, in terms which will, probably, ere long, come to light.

On his Majesty's representative hesitating to surrender the revenues of the Crown, until he could merely receive an answer from the Colonial Office to the objections which, without loss of time, he had submitted to it, the House of Assembly, made impatient by their successes, immediately petitioned the King.

The following extract from a respectable paper will explain the sentiments as well as the fate of this gallant veteran, who (though I have never seen him, or corresponded with him) I believe, I may say, left his post honoured and respected by every loyal subject in Upper Canada.

It appears that the conduct of Sir Archibald Campbell, Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, with respect to the Civil List, has excited so much of the displeasure of the Assembly of that province, as to induce them to despatch a deputation to England with an address to his Majesty, praying for the recall of Sir Archibald. To the committee who waited upon his Excellency with this address, the gallant veteran made the following reply—a reply worthy of the man and his services to his King and country:—

Reply of Sir A. Campbell to a Deputation from the House of Assembly, New Brunswick.

GENTLEMEN,

The conscientious rectitude of my own conduct render the subject of this address to me a matter of the most perfect indifference.

I have had the honour of serving his Majesty for nearly half a century, in almost every quarter of the globe; and I trust those services have been such as to suffer no diminution in the estimation of my Sovereign, from any representation that may be made by the House of Assembly of New Brunswick.

I need hardly say, that no one in our British North American colonies felt the shock of Sir Archibald Campbell's retirement more keenly than I did, for in his fate I clearly read, as addressed to myself, the words, "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin." My hour, however, had not yet arrived; and I have, therefore, in the interim, to lay before the reader the following despatches, which will show the nature of the difficulties with which I continued to struggle.

No. 103.

*Toronto, Upper Canada,
30th December, 1836.*

MY LORD,

I have the honour to reply to your Lordship's despatch, No. 93, as also to one marked "confidential," and dated 30th September, 1836.

In the former communication I am informed that his Majesty's Government has assented to twelve road bills, which at the close of the last session I had reserved. In the latter, I am furnished with copies of three despatches addressed through Sir Archibald Campbell to the Governors of all the North American Colonies.

Previous to reporting to your Lordship the embarrassment which has been occasioned here by the above communications, I beg leave to state that I am fully sensible that any general system or course of policy which it may be advisable to adopt throughout the North American Colonies, may, though generally beneficial, be productive of embarrassment in particular places. All I therefore desire to do is faithfully to apprise your Lordship of the effect which the despatches referred to have produced in this province.

In my despatch, No. 44, I had the honour to inform your Lordship, "that although, with the advice of my Executive Council, I had reserved all the money bills for the signification of his Majesty's pleasure, yet there were three of them, to which the Council concurred with me in recommending that the Royal Assent should immediately be given."

I added, "It would have given me much pleasure to have at once assented to these three bills; but I conceive it was of greater importance to maintain the principle, that the House of Assembly is not to be allowed to embarrass the Government, without also embarrassing the country, and that to withhold the Supplies does not mean to stop the Government wheel, but the whole machinery of the Legislature."

With respect to the other twelve bills, I had much stronger reasons for reserving them; inasmuch as the expenditure of the money voted in each bill had, for well-known revolutionary purposes, been unconstitutionally committed to Republican Commissioners, which fact in my despatch to your Lordship, No. 64, dated 29th July, 1836, I endeavoured to explain as follows:—

“ Before I set out, I am anxious to address your Lordship on the subject of the Commissionerships, which were passed by the House of Assembly during their last session, and which will be best explained by the enclosed copy of my reply to an address I received from the Township of Pickering.

“ The sum voted by the House of Assembly of this province nominally for road-money, amounts to £50,000 a year; and as this money is not only voted, but placed at the disposal of certain members of the House who are self-appointed by the Assembly as salaried Commissioners, it becomes a political engine of enormous unconstitutional power.

“ The insidious uses to which it has been applied, have, I can assure your Lordship, been revolutionary; and I beg to call your attention to the fact, that, in the enclosed printed list, the name of Mr. Peter Perry occurs no less than six times.”

Having thus submitted to your Lordship the reasons for which I had reserved all the money bills of the late House of Assembly, I awaited your Lordship's justification of the measure, which in your despatch, No. 73, was, very much to my satisfaction, unequivocally expressed.

It now became necessary, that, previous to the meeting of the present Legislature, I should determine on the measures it would be advisable to recommend in my speech from the throne.

The addresses I received from both Houses in reply to this communication will ere this have explained to your Lordship that my proposed measures met with the cordial approbation of the Legislature; which accordingly at once set to work by appointing a joint committee to inspect and report on the state of the Welland Canal, and, indeed, on all the other important changes I had submitted for consideration.

Nothing could be more satisfactory and praiseworthy than the cool, business-like progress which the Legislature was making, and the complete government of all those feelings of triumph which it has been my earnest endeavour to discourage and suppress. No angry expressions had been uttered even in the House of Assembly; and after the storm it had experienced, the public mind was rapidly subsiding into a calm, when all on a sudden I received your Lordship's despatch, No. 93, dated 6th September, 1836, containing the Royal Assent to all the bills I had reserved, which not only confused the arrangements the Legislature had commenced, but throughout the whole province caused the resurrection of the Republicans as political Commissioners, with large sums of money at their command.

On receiving this communication, my first impression was to suppress it: however, on reflection, it appeared to me, that I ought to allow myself to be driven by the Republicans from this province, rather than presume to stay the execution of the King's will; and accordingly, of two evils, choosing the least, I transmitted His Majesty's assent to the twelve bills to both Houses of the Legislature.

My Lord, I had not recovered from this shock, when I received the confidential despatch, dated the 30th of September, 1836, informing me that at the instigation of agents from only one branch of the Legislature of New Brunswick, your Lordship had deemed it advisable, through Sir Archibald Campbell, to promulgate to all the North American colonies that, among other arrangements, the Executive Council was to be increased in number, and henceforward to be composed of individuals “ possessing the confidence of the people.”

In my reply of the 5th of March last, to my late Executive Council, which had been honoured by your Lordship's approval, I had stated, “ The Lieutenant-Governor maintains, that the responsibility to the PEOPLE, who are already represented by the House of Assembly, which the Council assumes, is unconstitutional; that it is the duty of the Council to serve HIM, not THEM.”

Your Lordship cannot have forgotten the total defeat which the Republicans experienced by rashly attempting to drive me from this invincible position; and as the British population of the North American Colonies were eager spectators of the conflict, your Lordship will, I am sure, pardon me for expressing the feelings of mortification and depression with which

I now recollect the prophecies which, ever since the commencement of the political war I have waged here, have invariably foreboded that I should not be supported by the British Government.

“It is out of my power” (I stated in my despatch, No. 24, dated 6th of April last) “to describe to your Lordship, without the appearance of exaggeration, the joy and gladness expressed to me by all parties at the constitutional resistance I have made; but I will not conceal from your Lordship that there is one question at this moment in almost everybody’s mouth, namely, ‘Will the Lieutenant-Governor be supported by the Home Government?’—‘He never will,’ say the Radicals; “We fear he will not,” say the Constitutionists.”

My Lord, there is no portion of your Lordship’s instructions which I am not at this moment preparing to carry into effect. I have made it generally known that I am about to surrender to the Provincial Legislature the casual and territorial revenues of the Crown; and I have also informed the Chairman of a Committee of the House of Assembly, to whom the revision of the Land-granting Department has been referred, that, under certain restrictions, I am authorized by His Majesty’s Government, moreover, to surrender to the Provincial Legislature the authority to regulate the disposal of the Crown Lands; but I regret to inform your Lordship, that the leading recommendation contained in the report of the said Committee on the Land-granting Department is, that the whole of the said Crown Lands shall at once be offered to the public, (or, in other words, to the people,) at the low price of five shillings an acre!

But who is there now in the province to resist this proposal?

The only individual who might be expected to protect the interests of the emigrant, is the Lieutenant-Governor, but I fear this expectation cannot now be realized; for by the late instructions to Sir A. Campbell, the Lieutenant-Governor, if he attempted to guard the Crown lands, would not only find the two branches of the Legislature against him, but his own Executive Council might reasonably argue, that unless they also opposed him, they would forfeit “the confidence of the PEOPLE;” and it is impossible to offer a more convincing proof of the reality of this danger, than by referring to the petition which, shortly after my arrival here, was forwarded to your Lordship, earnestly recommending, as surveyor-general of this province, a clerk in the office who (although a most loyal, gallant subject) had been proved to have been acting contrary to express orders as private agent.

Your Lordship has only to review this singular petition, to perceive that it contains the names of almost every member of both Houses of the Legislature; and it therefore clearly follows, that had this appointment depended on the Provincial Legislature, it would most certainly have been carried into effect.

The necessity of protecting the emigrant from the rapacity of the settled inhabitant, has just been confirmed by the highest possible practical authority, namely, by Mr. President Jackson, of the United States, who, in his message promulgated last week, makes the following confession:—

(After commenting at considerable length on the President’s speech, and on the preponderating influence which Messrs. Crane and Wilmot had obtained in the Colonial Office, the despatch proceeds as follows:—)

It will, I hope, be liberally construed as no want of attachment to your Lordship, or of fidelity to his Majesty’s Government, if I acknowledge, that I feel jealous of the intervention of a new influence, alien to the constitution of this legislature.

The British Constitution has nothing whatever to fear from its low-bred antagonist Democracy, in America, if his Majesty’s Government will not avert from us its support.

“ ——— nought shall make us rue,
If England to herself do rest but true.”

But if the Lieutenant-Governors of our colonies be sentenced to contend with—

1. Public opinion, or, in other words, the opinion of “the people.”
2. The House of Assembly, or the representatives of “the people.”
3. An Executive Council required to possess the confidence of “the people.”
4. Agents in England, enjoying the ear and confidence of his Majesty’s Government, as being the representatives of the representatives of “the people:”

And lastly, if, as a general rule, all our colonies are to surrender whatever prerogative any one of them in particular may be deprived of, by which arrangement the weakest Lieutenant-Governor, whoever he may be, will lead all the rest, (which is certainly contrary to military tactics, for the guards at Waterloo never for a moment thought of giving up Hougoumont, because some of the Belgian infantry ran away,) I think your Lordship, on reflection will perceive, that instead of crushing democracy in this continent, we shall actually be creating it in our colonies.

I have ventured to offer to your Lordship's impartial consideration the above suggestions, in opposition to Messrs. Crane and Wilmot's recommendations, that certain alterations should be made in those instructions which, on leaving England, I had the honour to receive from your Lordship.

Under those instructions, I had successfully contended with democracy in America, and, confident of the eventual result of this noble struggle, I had only required of his Majesty's Government "the negative assistance of not being undermined at home."

The more seriously I contemplate the political tranquillity of this province, the more steadfastly am I confirmed in my opinion, that cool, stern, decisive, unconciliating measures form the most popular description of government that can be exercised towards the free and high-minded inhabitants of the Canadas.

Toronto, Upper Canada,
January 13th, 1837.

MY LORD,

The election of aldermen and common councilmen for the five wards of this city closed yesterday, and the result is creating so much sensation in this province, that I feel it my duty to communicate it to your Lordship.

Ever since the termination of the general elections in July last, the wreck of the republican faction, whose head-quarters are at Toronto, have been endeavouring to demonstrate, that the re-action which has taken place throughout the country was but the momentary effect produced by my replies to the addresses I received, and by the improper issuing of patents, in short, that their outworks had been carried by a mere coup-de main; and as the election for the metropolis approached, it was determined by the Radicals to display the power they yet possessed in their citadel, by electing as the new mayor, either M'Kenzie, or one of the three gentlemen (Dr. Baldwin,* Mr. George Ridout, or Mr. Small) who had been dismissed from office by me.

As it mattered but very little to me who was mayor of this city, I can assure your Lordship, that I scarcely ever gave the subject a thought, or indeed had time to do so: however, the electors of the city having been eye-witnesses of the conflict I had had with the Republicans—having been made acquainted with all the accusations urged against me by Messrs. Home and Duncombe—having had an opportunity of observing, for two months, the practical working of the new House of Assembly, and of reflecting, for a year, on the course of policy I had adopted, they unequivocally expressed their verdict in my favour, by exterminating the twenty republican candidates from every single ward in the city, and by electing in their stead staunch Constitutionists, who, in every instance excepting one, had majorities of more than two to one over their opponents.

As not a single patent has been issued during the elections, and as almost universal suffrage prevails, the political self-purification of this metropolis offers a moral which, I humbly conceive, does not require a comment.

* The name of this gentleman will, in conjunction with that of Mr. Ex-Speaker Bidwell, be shortly brought before the reader's especial attention.

I now transmitted to the Colonial Office a very long despatch, enclosing the minute investigation, and unqualified vindication, by the House of Assembly of the charges brought against me in England, by Mr. Joseph Hume and Dr. Duncombe, of having carried the elections by "the fabrication of votes." As these documents have been laid before the House of Commons, by his Majesty's Government, I need not here insert them.

No. 56.

Upper Canada, Toronto,
May 5, 1837.

MY LORD,

With reference to your Lordship's despatch of the 12th of January last, No. 130, in which is enclosed a letter from the Deputy Secretary at War, stating, that on being furnished with a list of the military pensioners referred to in my despatch of the 19th of October, 1836, No. 84, with full particulars of each man's case, the Secretary at War will consider whether any mode of relief to any of them is within his power, I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship a report from Emigrant agent A. B. Hawke, affording all the information he is able to impart.

As the three branches of this Legislature have already respectfully supplicated his Majesty in behalf of these miserable men, I feel it would be improper in me to say anything further in their favour. It will appear by Mr. Hawke's report, that an exact list of them cannot be obtained, and, consequently, that full particulars of each man's case cannot be submitted to the Secretary-at-War:—the following general description of their situation will however apply very nearly to them all.

The commuted pensioner in Upper Canada is an improvident veteran with whom the British Government has profitably made a hard bargain; having spent his best days in the service of his country, from severe service and hard drinking he has not remaining strength to gain in this climate sufficient subsistence, and consequently every winter he suffers most bitterly both from cold and hunger.

The braver he is, the less he complains; but his sufferings have at last attracted such general commiseration, that last year the legislature felt it their duty to address His Majesty on the subject.

If relief be withheld from these poor, worn-out, improvident men, another winter or two will be more than many of them can withstand. When all are gone, the transaction, so far as regards the pecuniary saving, will undoubtedly be at an end; but I respectfully assure your Lordship, it is generally considered here that a little blot will remain upon the brilliant history of this province, which it will then be too late to efface.

Toronto, Upper Canada,
May 30, 1837.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to inform your Lordship that, with the advice of my Executive Council, I have this day determined to convene the Provincial Parliament of Upper Canada on the 19th of June.

I much regret this measure, as the Council agrees with me in the opinion, not only that there exists no real necessity for convening the Legislature, but that the proclamation will tend to ruffle the commercial tranquillity which at present exists throughout this province.

The apprehension that there would be a run on the chartered banks in Upper Canada, in consequence of their continuing specie payments, has proved to have been groundless.— Nevertheless, your Lordship will easily imagine that it is impossible for me to act contrary to the policy of the surrounding states, without opposing a number of private interests, which have lately been joined in a hue and cry for the assembling of the Legislature; and as I foresee, that whatever embarrassment the trade of this province may have to suffer, in consequence of the present unexampled state of the monied market, would be industriously declared to be the effect of the non-convention of the Legislature, I have deemed it advisable of two evils to choose the least, and meet a real difficulty rather than one which would be intangible.

I have no apprehensions respecting the result, and expect that the session will last only a few days.

No. 82.

Upper Canada, Toronto,
July 12, 1837.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship a copy of my speech on proroguing the Legislature of this province.

In my despatch, No. 66, dated the 30th of May, I explained to your Lordship the reasons which had induced me most reluctantly to convene the Provincial Parliament, and as soon as it assembled I experienced all the difficulties I had anticipated. I will endeavour to explain them to your Lordship.

The rapid improvements which for some years have been taking place in the United States have been a mystery which few people have been able to comprehend. Every undertaking had apparently been crowned with success; every man's speculation had seemed to answer; the price of labour, although exorbitant, had everywhere been cheerfully paid, and money had appeared in such plenty, that it had profusely been given in barter for almost every commodity that came to market. In short, the country was triumphantly declared to be "going a-head;" and, as the young province of Upper Canada was observed to be unable to keep up, the difference in its progress was contemptuously ascribed to the difference in its form of government.

Monarchical institutions were therefore ridiculed, republican principles were self-praised, and democratic opinions were not only disseminated over this continent, but, crossing the Atlantic, they made their appearance in our own happy country, where it has lately been deemed by many people fine and fashionable to point to the United States of America as a proof that riveting religion to the state, and that nobility of mind, are to commerce what friction is in mechanics.

In the midst of all this theory, the whole commercial system of the United States suddenly was observed to tumble to pieces, its boasted prosperity being converted into a state of disorder altogether new in the moral history of the world, for the republic declared itself to be bankrupt, without even pretending to be insolvent: in short, its banks simultaneously dishonoured their own notes, keeping specie which belonged to their creditors in their vaults. This example of the banks offered a pretext to any man to absolve himself from his debts by fictitious bankruptcy. The public creditors afar off, as well as those on the spot, had no power to save themselves, and under these circumstances a general distrust prevailed.

This sudden annihilation of national credit in the United States produced of course serious inconvenience and alarm in Upper Canada.

The mysterious prosperity of the Republic was now proved to have been produced by an imprudent and reckless system of discounting, which had supplied the country with more money than it was possible for it to repay: in fact, to lend money having been supposed to be quite as profitable a speculation as to borrow it, one debt had been contracted to pay another; the people had borrowed of the Banks—the Banks had borrowed of each other, and thus the credit system had been strained till it snapped.

whatever direction it took ; and though, upon any other subject, they would totally have failed in their object, yet, in consequence of the feelings I have described, they certainly in this instance were very near obtaining it.

I have now explained to your Lordship the result of the extraordinary session which has just closed, and it only remains for me to state the course of policy I intend to pursue.

I intend to recommend the banks to accommodate the public as far as in prudence they can do so ; but as the penalty which attended the exhaustion of their coffers is now removed, or, in other words, as they would not now be obliged to discontinue their banking in case they should become unable to redeem their notes, it is my opinion that they should make no expensive exertions to obtain any more specie than they now possess, but that what they have got they should freely pay away. If, while they are pursuing this honest course, the United States or Lower Canada (finding that suspended bank notes are not money) should be driven to return to cash payments, Upper Canada will then triumphantly have weathered the storm ; if, on the other hand, no such events should occur, and that their coffers are consequently drained, still the good faith of the province will have been preserved ; and, without desiring to value credit at more than its intrinsic worth, I have reason to believe that the banks themselves feel that the commercial character of Upper Canada is of more value, even to themselves, than the trifling cost of replenishing their vaults whenever this continent shall return to cash payments.

Although a violent and almost universal clamour has been raised against the continuance of cash payments, yet I feel proud in informing your Lordship, that up to the present day no application has been made by any one of the Chartered Banks to the Legislature or to myself for permission to suspend. The power to grant this permission has now been placed by the Legislature into my hands.

If it be sought for, and if, after attentively listening to the arguments urged in its favour, I see reason to grant it, I will not hesitate to do so. On the other hand, your Lordship may depend that I will not be driven by clamour to give up the proud position which, by the integrity of the Chartered Banks, this province has up to the present moment been enabled to maintain.

THE Colonial Office again legislate on ex-parte statements—Second Memorandum on the political state of the Canadas—Curious question respecting fugitive slaves—Third Memorandum on the political state of the Canadas—Embarrassment produced by the Colonial Office showing their Despatches to the Lieutenant-Governor, before he has received them, to a complaining Colonist.

THE following despatch affords another example of the fatal propensity of the Colonial Office to legislate on ex-parte accusations, however small and insignificant the matter itself may be, if it gives the opportunity of casting anything like censure on that branch of the legislature whose duty it is to stand, whenever necessary, against the representatives of the people.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
July 20th, 1837.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's despatch (No. 73, dated 28th April, 1837), in which is transmitted to me a copy of a letter addressed to your Lordship by Mr. Egerton Ryerson, complaining of the conduct of the Legislative Council in having, "at the eleventh hour of the session, sent a Bill, authorizing a loan of £4100 to the Trustees of the Upper Canada Academy, back to the Assembly, so amended as completely to defeat the object of it, by providing that the Receiver-General should not advance any of the money granted by the Act, unless he had money in his hands for which he had no other use."

Having, as your Lordship is aware, advanced from the Casual and Territorial Revenue Fund the balance necessary for the payment of the war losses, I had no means of immediately paying to Mr. Ryerson the sum of £4100; nevertheless, being desirous that your Lordship's wishes should be carried into effect, I have given to Mr. Ryerson such a statement of my intention to advance the money in question, so soon as it can be procured, as will, I am happy to understand from him, enable him easily to obtain the amount from one of the provincial banks.

Having, I trust, thus fulfilled the spirit (although it has not been in my power to obey the letter) of your Lordship's instructions, I feel it due to the Legislative Council to explain to your Lordship that Mr. Ryerson's declarations against that branch of the Legislature are unmerited and incorrect.

The impression which Mr. Ryerson's letter to your Lordship seems designed to produce is, that the Assembly, being eager to encourage the Upper Canada Academy, had readily passed a bill to that effect through their House, and had in good time sent it up to the Legislative Council—that an amendment was there made to the bill, which was calculated and contrived to defeat it—that the bill and amendment were purposely kept back till the eleventh hour, and then sent down to the Assembly, when it was too late to remove any difficulty.

The facts are as follows:—The session commenced on the 8th of November, and ended on the 4th of March. On the 24th of February the bill for granting aid to the Academy came up to the Legislative Council from the Assembly,—that is, within the last eight or nine days of a session of 116 days, and when the Legislative Council had probably forty or fifty other bills before them. It was read a second time on the 25th of February, was discussed in committee on the 27th, (the 26th being Sunday,) and was amended and returned to the Assembly on the 23th. On the same day that bill was sent up among other bills sent from the Assembly; and after the 28th of February, when it was returned amended by the Council, I understand that the Assembly sent no less than twenty-six bills, which, with very few exceptions, were passed through the Council, and became laws.

From the foregoing statement, it is clear—1st, That the Legislative Council could not have returned the bill in question early, because it came to them late.—2ndly, That the bill, when it did come, was passed through all its stages without delay.

Now, with respect to the merits of the amendment, on adverting to the Acts passed in the last session, your Lordship will perceive that about a million and a half of money was granted by the Legislature, and the province being already in debt, the Acts, generally speaking, provided for raising by loan the monies required to meet these new grants.

The bill to which Mr. Ryerson refers simply granted £4000 out of the unappropriated monies in the hands of the Receiver-General, and made no provision for borrowing the £4000 on debenture.

The Legislative Council knew that, after the grants which the Assembly had made, there would not be 4000*l.* in the Receiver-General's hands unappropriated, and, consequently, that if the bill passed into a law, either it would be a delusion, or the Receiver-General would be embarrassed by the conflicting demands of persons claiming money granted by several Acts passed on the same day.

Under these circumstances the Council added the following proviso to the bill:—“Provided always nevertheless, that the monies granted by this Act shall not be paid by the Receiver-General, unless there shall remain in his hands unappropriated monies, after the payment of the charges imposed upon the provincial revenue under any Act or Acts heretofore passed, and also of any monies granted during the present session for the support of the Civil Government, or to defray any charges attending the public revenue.”

This precautionary limitation, that in case there should not be unappropriated money for all the claimants, the charges for the public service voted during the same session should be first defrayed, is what Mr. Ryerson, in his letter to your Lordship, terms a “proviso, that the Receiver-General should not advance any money granted by the Act unless he had money in his hands for which he had no other use.”

I understand that the Archdeacon of York (alluded to so severely by Mr. Ryerson, as having been hostile to the bill) was not even present when the amendment was framed, discussed, and passed. I am informed that he took no part in the bill, except voting for it, as he did for an act of incorporation of a Roman Catholic College, passed in the same session.

that the amendment was framed by the speaker of the Council, who is a private contributor to the building of the Academy, and who, I understand, strongly advocated in the Council the expediency of giving to the institution the public support that had been prayed for.

I feel confident that your Lordship will read with interest and with satisfaction this vindication of a branch of a Legislature which, I respectfully assure your Lordship, requires the firmest possible support, in order to encourage it to continue uncompromising hostility and opposition to the House of Assembly, whenever it may constitutionally be necessary to do so.

I have, &c.

F. B. HEAD.

Having written this despatch, I thought it highly salutary that the principle contained in the last paragraph should be promulgated in the colony, and I accordingly sent it in a message to the House of Assembly, who, far from being offended at it, continued, like the free people they represented, to give me their support. I mention this fact, to prove how unnecessary it is, in our North American provinces, unconstitutionally to seek for momentary popularity by making improper and therefore degrading concessions to the representatives of the people.

Upper Canada, Aug. 29th 1837.

MY LORD,

In communicating to me a copy of the Resolutions which it was the intention of her Majesty's Government to bring forward in the House of Commons respecting Lower Canada, your Lordship was pleased to conclude your despatch to me, No.—, dated Feb. 18th, 1837, as follows: "I shall look forward with much anxiety for a full communication from you on the subject, &c."

Besides being thus officially invited to furnish her Majesty's Government with my opinions respecting the measures proposed to be adopted towards Lower Canada, I had a natural inducement to do so, from the political connexion which exists between the two provinces: for I need hardly observe to your Lordship, that it is useless for Upper Canada to be expending £300,000 in rendering the upper portion of the river St. Lawrence navigable, if the lower waters are to remain impassable, our access to the ocean, as well as our prosperity, being dependent on the tranquillization of the Lower Province.

As my residence here had of course enabled me to form an opinion on the measures proposed to be introduced by her Majesty's Government, and as that opinion was solicited, I should not have withheld it, except for the reason that, as your Lordship's communication reached me too late for my opinion to be of any practical use, I felt it would be only vexatiously embarrassing the Government were I to transmit it. I therefore determined to be perfectly silent on the subject, and, if the same reasons existed, I should still remain so; but, seeing that the remedial resolutions of the Imperial Parliament, as I anticipated, have totally failed in their effect; seeing that the House of Assembly of Lower Canada have again refused the supplies; that Mr. Papineau's language has become more insulting than ever, and that his agents here are openly preaching revolt,—I feel that, as her Majesty's Government will be now driven to determine what is next to be done, I have no excuse for any longer withholding my opinions, and I accordingly, reluctantly and respectfully, submit them for consideration.

My Lord, the portion of this globe from which I am now addressing you is the most favoured region which it has ever been my humble fortune to visit. The freshness and elasticity of the Canadian air—the peculiar blueness of the sky—the magnificence and utility of the great lakes—the unexampled exuberance of the soil—the indication of mineral wealth—and the abundance of timber and fuel—form altogether a rich picture, which it is beyond the power of the artist to delineate. With respect to the inhabitants, I will only say that, so far as I am competent to judge of them, they are worthy of the free country they inhabit.

The British population have lost none of the noble qualities which distinguish their race. The French Canadians retain all the social virtues which adorn the character of the French, without their propensity to war.

Blessed with these advantages, the Canadas ought to be happy; but, on the contrary, the Upper Province was, and the Lower is, apparently, on the brink of revolution.

Where, it will be asked, does the blame rest? I respectfully reply, neither upon the surface of the country, nor upon the morals of its people; but upon the conciliatory measures which, under successive administrations, have been unremittingly applied by the Colonial Office.

If, in common law, respectable evidence be deemed sufficient to substantiate any accusation, surely, in politics, concurrent opinions such as the following ought not to be rejected.

1. The British population of Lower Canada deeply lament the course of policy which the Home Government, for many years, has been pursuing. 2. So does the loyal British population of Upper Canada. 3. The Chief Justice, the Law Officers of the Crown, every faithful public servant in this province, silently evince their sorrow at the concessions which have been made, and which are still being made, to those few designing men, who for self-interested objects, have been long labouring to subvert the British Constitution. 4. So do I, the Lieutenant-Governor of the province. 5. So does Sir John Colborne, the Commander of the Forces in the Canadas. 6. So do the British troops, who, although, generally speaking, regardless of politics, cannot here avert their minds from circumstances which are so glaringly before them, and which they foresee tend to haul down the colours that from their boyhood they have been taught to venerate.

If her Majesty were suddenly to arrive in the Canadas, there is no one among those I have enumerated who would not be proud to follow her with devotion, from Niagara to Quebec. If a representative of our colonial policy were to appear here, I do declare to your Lordship, that in my humble opinion he would be seen to traverse the Canadas alone. And now, my Lord, who is the individual who ventures to bring these truths before your Lordship's mind? Why, one who is indebted to your Lordship for a selection in his favour almost unparalleled, who has obtained, through your Lordship's recommendation, hereditary rank, and, who at this moment, feels most deeply that all he has ever written, instead of offending your Lordship, has most liberally been pardoned and overlooked.

As your Lordship's accredited agent, as one whose especial duty it is to act towards his principal with honour and fidelity, the evidence I offer to your Lordship is entitled to respect.

The concurrent opinions, which I have just stated to your Lordship, might once have been termed theoretical; but they have now not only been reduced to practice, but the proof has been, as it were mathematically, worked out both positively and negatively.

1. The conciliations which Lord Gosford has been commanded to make in Lower Canada as well as those almost promised by inference in his late speech, have ended in anarchy.

His Lordship's generous character, his high-minded integrity, his rank, his fortune, his affability, his amiability, all have failed to produce political tranquillity; his moral power has gradually sunk under the experiment—he has now "lost all but his honour."

Again in New Brunswick, the concessions made to Messrs. Crane and Wilmot have equally failed in satisfying that country. These gentlemen, as agents from the House of Assembly, obtained the surrender of the casual and territorial revenue. When their own scale was thus heavily laden, they next asked that the salary or influence of their Governor might inversely be lightened; when this was granted, they returned in triumph, their Governor, retiring from the conflict, yielding to them the field; but the bonfires were hardly extinguished, when Mr. A. Wilmot, I perceive from the journals, proposed that the Executive Council should be converted into persons "possessing the confidence of the people," which, in these Colonies, means nothing more nor less than that the Governor's head is to be emptied of its contents, and then stuffed with republican brains.

2. In Upper Canada, the opposite or negative process, I mean the unconciliatory course of policy has, it cannot be denied, practically tranquillized the province. It has not only completely overthrown the enemies of the British Constitution, but, in a very great degree, has effected their conversion. Hundreds of men who leaned with their whole weight against the Government, so long as they found it bend to their pressure, suddenly stood erect to defend it, the instant it resolutely commanded them to keep off. People of the most violent politics have lately acknowledged themselves to have been in error; and even the late Speaker, Mr. Bidwell himself, who was the avowed republican associate of Mr. Papineau, now openly declares that he deeply regrets the course he was led to pursue.

I could proceed to prove to your Lordship, that the policy I have humbly pursued has very numerous supporters, even in the United States; but I will not seek for evidence beyond the limits of her Majesty's dominions. I will merely observe to your Lordship, that the success which has been obtained in Upper Canada is not adventitious; but that it is a result which, in my first despatch, dated the 5th February, 1836, to your Lordship, I distinctly foretold as follows:—

“As far as I have been able to judge, I should say that the republican party are implacable, that no concession whatever will satisfy them, their self-interested object being to possess themselves of the Government of this province, for the sake of lucre and emolument.

Under these circumstances, I conceive that the great danger I had to avoid was the slightest attempt to conciliate any party, and that the only course for me to adopt was to act fearlessly, undisguisedly, and straightforwardly, for the interests of the country—to throw myself on the good sense and good feeling of the people, and abide a result which, I firmly believe, will eventually be triumphant.”

Having concluded the foregoing preliminary observations, I will now very shortly proceed to submit to your Lordship, not my remarks respecting the late resolutions of the Imperial Parliament, for as they have passed it is useless now to discuss them, but my humble opinion of the course which should henceforward be adopted. I therefore respectfully recommend her Majesty's Government to frame their future policy upon two unalterable determinations.

1. NOLUMUS LEGES ANGLIÆ MUTARI.

2. WE WILL NOT RETAIN POSSESSION OF THE CANADAS BY FORCE OF ARMS.

[ I mean by this—

1. We will not mutilate the British Constitution in our Colonies by concessions to Democracy.

2. Let us govern by moral power, and not by military force; (i. e. “Let's clap the padlock” on the affections of the people.) ]

My Lord, I have no hesitation in saying, that if these two maxims are mildly but firmly maintained, truth, reason, and justice will overpower the factious opposition that is now offered to us, and that a splendid moral triumph will be the result.

Much might be written on this subject, but with the voluminous details which are already before the Government, I feel that the deliberate result of my opinion will be less troublesome to your Lordship than a statement of the minute arguments on which it has been founded.

The servants of the Crown in Lower Canada ought, I conceive, to be immediately and for ever made independent of the House of Assembly, by an act of the Imperial Parliament.

I have, &c.

F. B. HEAD.

The above official opinions, like all which I have humbly offered, were deemed unworthy to be laid before the Imperial Parliament. The British Constitution in our colonies was weakened again by concessions, and then, to prevent its falling, it was found necessary to support it by force of bayonets.

No. 112.

Upper Canada, Toronto, 8th October, 1837.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to submit to your Lordship sundry documents, as per Schedule, respecting the case of Jesse Happy, a fugitive slave, who has been demanded from me by the Governor of the Commonwealth of Kentucky on a charge of Horse stealing.

Your Lordship will perceive the reasons for which, by the advice of my Executive Council, I declined to deliver up this man, who continues a prisoner in Hamilton Gaol, until he should have had time to procure affidavits of the facts set forth in the various petitions I have received in his behalf.

Your Lordship will also perceive it is by the advice of the Council that I now respectfully beg leave to draw the attention of her Majesty's Government to this case as a matter of general policy.

I believe no one is disposed to deny that the Canadas, as well as the United States, are much benefitted by that portion of the provincial statute which, for the general purification of society, encourages each to claim from the other persons guilty of felony.

To this arrangement I have invariably given all the assistance in my power; and in a late instance, although very great exertions were made to induce me to refuse to surrender a man demanded by the authorities of New York, on a charge of having robbed the Rochester Bank, yet, in spite of the arguments and recommendations in his favour, I gave him up, and have since learned that he has confessed his guilt.

I have also to inform your Lordship that in a case which was brought before me only a few days previous to that which is the subject of this communication, I insisted on giving up to the Governor of the Commonwealth of Kentucky a slave who, in order to effect his escape, had been guilty of stealing his master's horse. I submit to your Lordship a copy of a petition I received in this man's favour, with my reply thereto, and have to inform your Lordship that the under-sheriff was attacked in endeavouring to carry my orders into effect; that two men were killed and others wounded in the affray, which ended in the escape of the prisoner, which is now the subject of judicial investigation.

I mention these facts to satisfy your Lordship that I am by no means desirous that this province should become an asylum for the guilty of any colour: at the same time the documents submitted with this despatch will I conceive show that the subject of giving up fugitive slaves to the authorities of the adjoining republican states is one respecting which it is highly desirable I should receive from her Majesty's Government specific instructions.

It is quite true, that if a white man who has stolen a horse from the Commonwealth of Kentucky comes with it, or without it, to this province, he is by the statute I have alluded to liable to be given up on demand to the neighbouring authorities; and it certainly does seem to follow that a black man ought not to expect, because our laws grant him personal freedom, that he should moreover claim from them emancipation from trial for crimes which even British-born subjects would be held responsible. Yet on the other hand it may be argued that a slave escaping from bondage on his master's horse is a vicious struggle between two guilty parties, of which the slave-owner is not only the aggressor, but the blackest criminal of the two. It is the case of the dealer in human flesh versus the stealer of horse-flesh; and it may be argued that, if the British Government does not feel itself authorized to pass judgment on the plaintiff, neither should it on the defendant.

The clothes and even the manacles of a slave are undeniably the property of his master, and it may be argued, that it is as much a theft in the slave walking from slavery to liberty in his master's shoes as riding on his master's horse; and yet surely a slave breaking out of his master's house is not guilty of the same burglary which a thief would commit who should force the same locks and bolts in order to break in!

Besides these observations on the general principle of the measure, the objections urged to its practice are as follows:—

It is alleged, that after a slave surrendered by the Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada has been tried in the United States, and acquitted of the offence laid to his charge, he is sure to be taken back to slavery by his old master; and that, to obtain this object, it is notorious that false affidavits can always be obtained, in a slave state, against any runaway slave. It is therefore argued, that giving up a slave for trial to the American laws, is, in fact, giving him back to his former master; and, therefore, that until the republican authorities can separate trial from such unjust punishment, that, however willing we may be to give up a man to the former, we are justified in refusing to deliver him up to the latter, unless sufficient security be entered into in this province, that the person delivered up for trial shall be brought back to Upper Canada as soon as his trial or the punishment awarded by it shall be concluded.

It is argued, that the republican states have no right, under the pretext of any human treaty, to claim from the British Government, which does not recognize slavery, beings who by slave-law are not recognised as men, and who actually existed as brute beasts in moral darkness, until on reaching British soil they suddenly heard, for the first time in their lives, the sacred words "Let there be light, and there was light!" From that moment it is argued they were created men, and if this be true, it is said they cannot be held responsible for conduct prior to their existence.

Having now furnished your Lordship with the principal arguments which are used against the course I myself have adopted in one slave-case, and have only hesitated to adopt in another, I beg leave respectfully to recommend that instructions on the subject may without delay be transmitted to the Lieutenant-Governor of this province.

I have, &c.

Third Memorandum on the Political State of the Canadas.

Toronto, 18th November, 1837.

MY LORD,

Being sensible that your Lordship will be desirous to receive authentic information not only of the general state of affairs in the Canadas, but of the particular course of policy which is being pursued in each of the provinces, I have the honour to enclose to your Lordship a copy of a second letter, which has been expressly despatched to me by Sir John Colborne, with a copy of my reply thereto.

These letters, short and familiar as they are, contain a moral of considerable importance, for they indisputably shew that the Canadas are each acting on a principle diametrically opposed to the other—the Lower Province centripetally drawing to itself as much military force as it can collect; the Upper Province contrifugally discarding every British Soldier from its territory.

My Lord, it is I conceive undeniable, that for many years Mr. Papineau has been labouring to separate the Canadas from the mother-country. To effect this object by force he has been perfectly sensible would be impossible; he has, therefore, been endeavouring to attain it by means which may almost be termed constitutional, namely, by seeking the intervention and authority of the Imperial Parliament.

For this purpose, a member of the House of Commons (Mr. Roebuck) has been paid by the House of Assembly of Lower Canada to expatiate on grievances, and to declare at all times and in all places to those who have no personal acquaintance with the Canadas, that the people there are restless, dissatisfied, yearning for republican institutions, and that, unless the never-ending, still-beginning concessions they require are granted, another American war must be the result.

In order to corroborate these vague statements by evidence, Mr. Papineau's policy has been to involve each succeeding Governor in a quarrel with the House of Assembly, to keep up an endless war between the two Houses of the Legislature, as well as between the Assembly and the Executive Council. Besides this, in order to create discontent among the people, all great improvements have been discountenanced, immigration has been taxed, and every artifice has been resorted to, practically, to convince them that there really must exist something in the management or rather mismanagement of their country, which required "reform."

While Mr. Papineau was himself working out this revolutionary formula in Lower Canada, he well knew it would be absolutely necessary he should promote a conspiracy in the Upper Province—accordingly Mr. Joseph Hume was selected to echo Mr. Roebuck's complaints in the House of Commons, while Mr. Bidwell was to be the mimic in Upper Canada of Mr. Papineau himself.

By pointing out grievances with one hand, and preventing their correction with the other, a small republican party in this province managed to create discontent, and gradually to obtain a majority in the House of Assembly; and the revenue of the province being thus at their disposal, they availed themselves of every possible opportunity to pay and employ those only who, by disseminating falsehood, would create discontent.

Under this malign influence people in the remote districts conceived that every difficulty they met in backwoods proceeded from the British Government; and as it was invariably stated to them that if they were under a republic they would instantly be relieved, they had every possible temptation to revolt. The republican agents had the power of worming their way to these poor people by paths, on which it was believed nothing proceeding from the Government could be made to travel: the rebel party fancying therefore that the ignorance in which their victims were involved could not be dispelled, openly boasted of their triumph, and in the House of Assembly instantly evinced the most treasonable disposition.

My Lord, affairs were in this state : the House of Assembly of Lower Canada had published their ninety-two resolutions ; the Assembly of this province (although they pretended to have attachment to the mother-country) were advocating an Executive Council responsible to the people, an elective Legislative Council, and were openly insulting the Executive when I arrived in this province. And yet with all these advantages Mr. Papineau knew perfectly well that the day had not arrived for attempting to carry his object by force ; with every desire to do so, HE WAS AFRAID : in short he knew quite well that, though the dissemination of his poison had sickened loyalty, it was not yet dead !

The result of the exertions which I humbly made proved the accuracy of his judgment.

By addressing the people in homely language I revived the loyal spirit in Upper Canada, and by resorting to reason instead of military force, I became at last enabled by the assistance of the former to dismiss the latter from the province.

I mention these facts to your Lordship for the purpose of shewing the impolicy of our now allowing Mr. Papineau to enjoy the triumph of making it appear that we retain possession of the Lower Province only by force of arms.

If Lower Canada were to be governed by reason instead of by force, I beg leave to ask how could it possibly separate itself from the British Empire !

If the republicans of the two provinces, united, were afraid to attempt it, what chance has one to attain it, now that its comrade has turned against it ! Suppose that by a coup-de-main Mr. Papineau could gain forcible possession of Montreal and of the fortress of Quebec, what could they be worth to him but a hempen neck-cloth ! Would the British population be annihilated ! Would there be no re-action ! Would Upper Canada submit to a republic between it and the ocean ! I can assure your Lordship that Mr. Papineau's dominion, like his life, would hang only by a thread. Between the British navy on the one side, and the brave militia of Upper Canada and of New Brunswick on the other, he would find himself a wild elephant between two tame ones.

It may appear strange that Mr. Papineau, whose abilities have been proved by the demoralization they have effected, should at this moment be occupying a position so completely untenable ; but the fact is, he triumphs by the weakness of our conduct, and though he is in reality a ruined man, yet he has managed by impudence and artifice to gain the very darling object he has for so many years ardently been striving for : in short, he has summoned eight British regiments into this province to fight, but to be quoted in the House of Commons as undeniable evidence that we require military force to retain possession of that country.

My Lord, although I cannot deny the fact of the presence of the troops, yet I do respectfully submit to your Lordship, that Mr. Papineau has managed to obtain them by illegitimate means and by false pretences.

The force at present in Lower Canada is unnecessary ; but we have had recourse to it from the same unfortunate aberration that has hitherto induced us not only to submit to Mr. Papineau's insults, but to bow before them in proportion to the insolence with which they have been inflicted. From the extreme of submission we have suddenly flown to the extreme of anger ; and influenced in both instances by our passions, Reason and Justice, which in Government are invincible, have passed unheeded.

It is now late in the day to repent of our policy ; but there is yet time not only to confess, but to correct the errors we have been guilty of.

My Lord, I respectfully recommend her Majesty's Government immediately to abstract all the troops from Lower Canada excepting those to garrison Quebec and Montreal.

As soon as the political atmosphere shall be thus purified, let Mr. Papineau, if he dare, attack the Queen's Government, and the British population of our North American Colonies ; let him, if he dare, take forcible possession of the Lower Province.

Instead of encouraging the loyal inhabitants of both provinces ignominiously to lean upon our troops, let us allow them to fight if necessary for themselves, for their families, and for their liberties ; and if this policy be mildly but firmly pursued, the civilized world will cheer us in our path, and, as I have before ventured to assure your Lordship, a brilliant moral victory will be the result.

I have, &c.

F. B. HEAD.

P. S. Since writing the above, I have just received from an officer sent expressly to me from Montreal by Sir John Colborne, a letter urging me to despatch to Lower Canada some companies of our militia for five months' service, as Sir John observes, "If we do not immediately take active measures to arm and organize our friends, the province will be lost."

I have the honour to enclose a copy of Sir John Colborne's communication, with my reply thereto, which will explain to your Lordship the reasons which, in my opinion, forbid me at present to comply with his request.

Notwithstanding the state of the Lower Province as reported to me by the officer commanding the forces, I remain still of the opinion already expressed in this despatch, namely, that Her Majesty's Government should immediately abstract all the troops from Lower Canada, excepting those necessary to garrison Quebec and Montreal.

I am perfectly sensible that this recommendation will appear extraordinary to your Lordship, when contrasted with the pressing exigencies of Sir John Colborne. I will, therefore, endeavour to explain opinions which I can assure your Lordship I have not the slightest desire to advocate.

If Mr. Papineau and his followers were a foreign enemy, it would be desirable that the party which possessed the greatest quantity of physical strength should predominate: but the French habitans of Lower Canada are as much Her Majesty's subjects as the British troops, and in the present state of the civilised world, I do maintain that a civil war must henceforward be a moral one; and that victory will eventually declare itself in favour of moral and not of physical preponderance. The peace, welfare, and stability of society depend upon the maintenance of this principle; and such is the momentum of public opinion, that I feel confident no power on earth can now-a-days prevail which attempts to withstand it.

I submit to your Lordship, that no government is justified in attacking its own citizens until it has previously gone through the forms of endeavouring to govern them by firmness and reason. A government need not be firm, nor need it be reasonable, but the fatal consequence of its being neither one nor the other is, that it exists in an unfit state suddenly to put down rebellion by force; for what is despotism but government sans reason?

My Lord, I say nothing against the unfortunate by gone system of conciliation which has hitherto been adopted in Lower Canada—I will even admit, for argument's sake, that the Government was right to try the experiment,—but I respectfully maintain that it is not justified in flying from it to the opposite extreme without having had recourse to the middle regimen I have described. But it is argued that the British population is in actual danger, that the Lower Province "will be lost" unless we have immediate recourse to physical force, and, consequently, that it is now too late to philosophise on the subject. I conceive that the argument is the same as if a man who had commenced to build his house on a bog were to insist on continuing it because he had already completed its first story. It is true the removal of the building would be mortifying and expensive, but, if it were impossible for it to stand, the sooner it were abandoned the better.

My Lord, I conceive that no quantity of British troops would be sufficient to put down agitation in Lower Canada, or even to protect every person in that province from open violence. The cumbersome attempt on our part to do all this by soldiers would appear to the world a series of aggression, which would sooner or later excite sympathy in favour of Mr. Papineau and his adherents.

On the other hand, if, sheathing the sword, we were at once to place ourselves on the defensive, and openly await the very evils we are now trying to avert, Mr. Papineau would then be driven either to give up agitation or to become the aggressor, in which latter case we (I mean the British population of the North American Colonies) should instantly gain in moral power infinitely more than we had laid aside in military force.

I submit to your Lordship, that in military strength Mr. Papineau has no chance whatever of successfully contending against the British empire. Let us, therefore, equally be his superior in that moral power by which our possession and protection of the Canadas must eventually be decided.

F. B. H.

The foregoing opinions (which by her Majesty's government were not deemed worthy to be included among those submitted to the Imperial Parliament) clearly show that I had totally failed to foresee the invasion of our colonies by our American allies. I own, however (and the confession should shame them), that it never entered into my heart for a moment to conceive that, while American friendship was standing smiling at our side, its hand was only waiting until we faced our difficulties to stab us in the back! "Experience," they say "makes men wise," but where in the page of the history of civilised nations was such experience to be learned! It is recorded for the first time; and I humbly submit that I am much less deserving of blame for not having anticipated this attack than is the British nation, who, although the event has actually happened, can scarcely even now, by argument or facts, be persuaded to believe what the conduct of the American authorities has been.

To repel this unprecedented attack of faithless friends the whole energies of the British Empire should, if necessary, be directed, just as they should be directed to repel an invasion of our colonies by the power of France or Russia. But, leaving this unnatural contingency out of the question, and returning to the domestic government of our North American colonies, I beg leave to say that, barring foreign invasion, I most unalterably adhere to the opinions expressed in the foregoing despatch: for I well know that I speak the sentiments of the British population of our North American colonies, when I say that if, instead of sending out seven-and twenty regiments, her Majesty's Government would send out only one man, who, standing alone among them, would promise the people that, while he lived, the institutions of our empire should never be changed, a universal British cheer would resound throughout our colonies, and "Reports" of alleged grievances would be heard of no more. When the people of Upper Canada were appealed to, did they not strictly fulfil the prophecy by responding to the call! And is it not an historical fact, that the brave inhabitants of New Brunswick, with their Lieutenant-Governor at their head, stood not only ready, but earnestly wishing to be called! Grievances! Separation from the mother country! Hatred to British institutions! Natural attachment to democracy! Commissions of Inquiry, one after another, may in our colonies no doubt collect complaints in detail, just as they would be collected from every regiment and every line-of-battle ship in our service, were we to pay people for searching for them; but, let the enemy appear, let the British colours be hauled up, and let our people but see the foe who unjustifiably advances to deprive them of their liberties, and in one moment all complaints are forgotten!

The following despatch affords another sad example of the endless embarrassments which the Lieutenant-Governors of our provinces suffer from the eaves-dropping system of our Colonial Office.

No. 127.

UPPER CANADA,
27th November, 1837.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship a pamphlet entitled "the Correspondence of the Honourable William Morris with the Colonial Office as the delegate from the Presbyterian body in Canada."

I have also the honour to transmit a copy of a communication which, in consequence of the above publication, I directed my civil secretary to address to the Moderator of the Synod.

Your Lordship will, from the above document, perceive the inconvenience which has arisen from allowing "a delegate" from this province the entire perusal in Downing-street of a despatch which it is left to my judgment to determine whether the whole or a part only should be published in Upper Canada.

With respect to the intemperate, uncalled-for language contained in the pamphlet, I have only to request that your Lordship will be so good as to compare it with the accusations lately made against the Attorney-General of this province, from the effects of which that officer as well as her Majesty's Solicitor General are still suffering.

I have, &c.

F. B. HEAD.

Is there another public office in the state—in the world—which would permit its conditional or discretionary orders to its confidential servants to be thus perused, while the matters were still pending, by interested or hostile individuals, whose known purpose was to thwart them?

CHAPTER IX

Three ultimate causes of my Resignation—1. Dismissal of Judge Ridout—Order from His Majesty's Government for his Restoration—2. Appointments of Attorney and Solicitor General arrested by His Majesty's Government—3. Reasons for not elevating Ex-Speaker Bidwell to the Bench—His Majesty's Government communicate their desires for his Elevation—My refusal to obey their Orders—The Republican Party unmask themselves and attack Toronto—Despatch to His Majesty's Government—Important Moral in it suppressed.

The following despatches will speak for themselves. No preliminary observations are necessary, as the dates will sufficiently explain that, in consequence of the rebellion which had already broken out in Lower Canada, a corresponding insurrection was naturally to be expected in the Upper Province, and, consequently, that it was more than ever politic that I should give encouragement to the loyal, and discouragement to that party who were on the very eve of a rebellion.

If I had been governing by force of arms, they would have been sufficient; but, having yielded to the Lower Province Her Majesty's troops, I had nothing left to support me but a strict adherence to that plain moral rule which bids all nations, as well as all individuals, keep up a just distinction between their enemies and their friends.

TORONTO, UPPER CANADA,
12th September, 1836.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship the accompanying memorial from Mr. George Ridout, complaining that he has experienced unjust treatment from me.

The facts attending this gentleman's dismissal from his situations of Judge of the District Court of Niagara, of Justice of the Peace, and of Colonel of Militia, are shortly as follows:—

On the 27th March last, Mr. George Ridout, heading the deputation, read that address to me from a public meeting held at the City Hall, by Dr. O'Grady (the editor of the Correspondent and Advocate) and others which I forwarded to your Lordship on the 6th of April last, in my despatch No. 24.

Shortly afterwards Mr. Ridout made a declaration which became the subject of general conversation, that, in the event of his being dismissed by me from office, "I should deserve to be tarred and feathered, and that he would lend a hand to do so."

In one of the public offices in Toronto he declared that we must or should now have "war to the knife."

Mr. George Ridout was a frequent attendant as well as speaker at the Constitutional Reform Society, from which was widely circulated a printed address, signed by Dr. Baldwin, of which the following is an extract:—

"It is our duty solemnly to assure you, that the conduct of Sir Francis Bond Head has been alike a disregard of Constitutional Government, and of candour and truth in his statements."

Mr. Ridout declares he is not a member of this society, yet from his frequent attendance and speaking at the meetings of this society, before as well as after it had, for mere electioneering purposes, changed its name (only a few weeks ago) from the "Alliance" to the "Constitutional Reform Society," I felt I had a right to consider him as an active member.

Previous, however, to declaring him to be such, I took the precaution of obtaining a legal opinion on the subject, which was that Mr. G. Ridout most decidedly did appear to be an active member of the said Society.

It is perfectly true that old Mr. Ridout was a loyal, gentlemanlike, and estimable man, and it was from a benevolent desire to reclaim Mr. G. Ridout, his son, from radical principles, that the situations he held were successively heaped upon him by Sir Peregrine Maitland and by Sir J. Colborne; but the more he was favoured the more violent he became, and when, as a judge and colonel of militia, he talked about tarring and feathering the King's representative, I considered it was my duty to inform him that his Majesty had no further occasion for his services.

I may add that, shortly after my arrival here, I myself took a great deal of trouble to endeavour to reclaim Mr. George Ridout, and kindly to persuade him of his errors, but in vain.

The Petition of George Ridout, of the City of Toronto, in Upper Canada, Barrister-at-Law, SHEWETH,

That your petitioner, a native of Canada, and son of the late Honourable Thomas Ridout, Surveyor-General, was appointed a Lieutenant in the Militia by the late Major-General Sir Isaac Brock, a name ever dear to this province, and with whom he was present at the battle of Queenston.

By the ordinary progressive steps, and a service of more than seventeen years, your petitioner rose to the rank of Colonel of the 2nd Regiment East York Militia, in the room of the Honourable John B. Robinson, appointed to fill the high office of Chief Justice of this colony in 1830.

That your Petitioner's appointment to the honourable, though not lucrative situation, of Judge of the Niagara District Court, was conferred upon him, in 1828, by Sir Peregrine Maitland, late Lieutenant-Governor of this Province.

During the administration of his successor, Sir John Colborne, your Petitioner discharged the duties of these situations, so much to the satisfaction of that officer, that he was appointed a Justice of the Peace for the Niagara district. That your Petitioner was treated with kind consideration both by Sir Peregrine Maitland and by Sir John Colborne, though he voted for gentlemen who were deemed the Reform candidates.

That thus in practice, as well as by the King's instructions, your Petitioner found the principle recognised, that every elector has a right to exercise his own judgment, without fear or apprehension, and to indulge in such political opinions as are consistent with his duty to his King and country, without fear of proscription.

Aware also of the unrestricted liberty he had enjoyed under the government of Sir P. Maitland and Sir John Colborne, he hesitated not to follow the course he had hitherto pursued; and at the late election for this city gave his vote, for the second time, in favour of his brother-in-law, the late member, and a Reformer, as he believes, in the spirit of Lord Goderich's despatch, and to that only.

The election for the city of Toronto closed on the 23rd June last; but no intimation of the intention of Sir Francis B. Head to punish your Petitioner for his vote reached him until the 15th July, after the result of all the elections had been ascertained; and the time chosen for making this communication was, when your Petitioner was in the discharge of his duty as Judge of the Court at Niagara, although his residence is at Toronto.

The reasons assigned for your Petitioner's dismissal from the various honourable situations he held are totally without foundation, as will plainly appear from the correspondence between your Petitioner and the private secretary of his Excellency, Sir Francis Bond Head. That this may admit of no doubt, your Petitioner submits the evidence hereto annexed.*—

* N. B.—The papers appended to this petition are—

1. Communication from Mr. Joseph.
2. Mr. G. Ridout to Mr. Joseph.
3. Colonel Coffin to Mr. Ridout.
4. Mr. Ridout to Colonel Coffin.
5. Mr. Ridout to Colonel Coffin, demanding a Court Martial.
6. Colonel Coffin to Mr. Ridout.
7. Petition to Sir F. B. Head.
8. Certificate, that G. Ridout opposed the formation of the Society, under the principles that Mr. M'Kenzie had moved. Signed by Dr. Morrison.
9. Certificate, that George Ridout does not belong to the Society.
10. Minutes from Osgoode Hall Law Society, that George Ridout was appointed treasurer for 1830.

Your Petitioner respectfully refers the same papers, hereto annexed, shewing the unavailable exertions he made to procure redress from Sir F. B. Head, for the injustice suffered, and the necessity imposed upon him of appealing for that redress to his Majesty's Government.

Your Petitioner feels the injustice done him the more sensibly, not only because he has been punished, although not guilty of the charges alleged to him; but persons who took an active part as members of the societies alluded to, have been permitted to do so with impunity; whilst others holding lucrative and important situations under Government, clerks in offices, and even messengers, in defiance of the King's instructions, have attended the polls from Riding to Riding, during the late elections; and they used every exertion, even to intimidation, in order to obtain votes for the candidates known, or supposed to be acceptable, to Sir F. B. Head.

If the inhabitants of this most important province are to adopt a new line of conduct for every successive Governor that may be ordered out, whose views may differ from each other as to the interpretation of the King's instructions; if proscription is to follow acts previously deemed not only harmless, but constitutional, and even entitled to favour, because a new Governor adopts a policy diametrically opposite to that of his predecessor—then must the situation of the honest inhabitants of Upper Canada be deplorable indeed. The natural consequence must be, that men accustomed to the equal and steady application of known rules and laws, and to the mild sway of the British Government, will abandon the country, and the emigrant will avoid so frightful a tyranny.

Convinced that your Lordship will not sanction injustice, nor permit any man, however exalted in station, to use the power delegated to him for the use of his Majesty's subjects, to be exercised in their oppression, I appeal, with the utmost confidence, from the decision of Sir F. B. Head to the justice of his Majesty's Government, for such redress as a gentleman of unblemished honour, and a loyal British subject, has a right to expect.

All which is humbly submitted.

(Signed)

GEORGE RIDOUT.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
12th July, 1836.

SIR,

I am commanded by the Lieutenant-Governor to call your attention to the enclosed printed address, which has lately been widely circulated by, and "on behalf of a" society, of which it appears you are an active member.

The Lieutenant-Governor desires me to observe, that the language contained in this address has hitherto remained unnoticed by him, only from his determination not to interfere with that public verdict which he felt confident the country would clearly express. But as the elections are now over, his Excellency considers that in order to maintain the happy constitution of this province inviolate, it is absolutely necessary, in obedience to the King's instructions, that no person should be permitted to retain any office of trust or confidence under the British Government, who attempts (however unsuccessfully) to insult the Lieutenant-Governor of the province by language such as is contained in your society's address. His Excellency, therefore, deems it his painful duty to direct me to inform you that his Majesty has no further occasion for your services as Judge of the Niagara District Court, and Justice of the Peace.

I have, &c.

The Constitutional Reform Society of Upper Canada to their fellow Reformers.

The difference between Sir Francis Bond Head and the House of Assembly, growing out of the resignation of the late Executive Council, has led to a dissolution of Parliament. The unanimous representation of the late Executive Council, severally signed by the Honourable Peter Robinson, the Honourable G. H. Markland, Honourable Joseph Wells, Honourable J. H. Dunn, and Robert Baldwin and John Rolph, Esqrs., we declare to be moderate, just, and constitutional. The refusal of Sir F. B. Head to allow the Executive Council to discharge the duties obviously belonging to their office, and imposed by their oath, of advising the Lieutenant Governor upon our public affairs, preparatory to his final and discretionary action upon those affairs, betrays a disposition, as a stranger, to conduct the government in an arbitrary, unsafe, and unconstitutional manner, which the House of Assembly, unless traitors to us, could not sanction or grant supplies to uphold.

The fifty-seven rectories could not by law have been established without the advice and consent of the Executive Council of the province; and their recent establishment and endowment with their exclusive ecclesiastical rights and privileges, is a practical and melancholy proof of the indispensable necessity of a good and honest Executive Council, alike possessing the confidence of the King and the people. It is our duty solemnly to assure you that the conduct of Sir Francis Bond Head has been alike a disregard of constitutional government, and of candour and truth in his statements to you. We therefore appeal to you most earnestly not to abandon your faithful representatives at the approaching contest, but by your manly conduct prove yourselves worthy of good government and honest public servants.

SIR,

Whilst in the discharge of my duty as a public officer at Niagara, yesterday, I had the honour of receiving your letter of the 12th instant, communicating to me that for reasons assigned by Mr. Joseph, his Majesty had no further occasion for my services as Colonel of the 2nd Regiment of East York Militia.

As I have fully answered Mr. Joseph's communication, and I hope satisfactorily shown that there was no foundation for the reasons therein assigned, it will be unnecessary for me to add anything farther, than merely to remind you that among the dismissals, no allusion is made to the situation I held of acting Judge-Advocate on the approaching court-martial at Cobourg, and to beg of you to consider this a sufficient notice of my resignation of that office.

His Excellency deems it scarcely necessary to observe to you, that it was not for having voted for your brother-in-law that you were removed from the situations you held in his Majesty's service.

Toronto, 27th July, 1836.

To His Excellency SIR F. B. HEAD, Knight, &c. &c. &c., and Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,

I have the honour to state for your information that I find by a letter addressed to me by the Adjutant-General of Militia, that your Excellency refuses me a court-martial, but admits that I have not been removed from the situations which I held in his Majesty's service for voting in favour of my brother-in-law at the late election.

In bringing my case under the notice of his Majesty's Government it is material that the facts should be truly stated. I beg therefore to remind your Excellency that I am fully prepared to prove, as mentioned in a former communication, that the reasons assigned by your Excellency for depriving me of office are totally without foundation. Why should I hesitate to speak the whole truth? They are altogether untrue.

The only other reason which I could think of was my vote, which your Excellency, as appears from the Adjutant General's letter, admits not to have been the case. The clear and undeniable inference therefore is, that, in as far as depends upon your Excellency, I am disgraced and turned out of office under false pretences, and because it is your pleasure.

Such a course of proceeding will not be approved of by my gracious Sovereign, so just and tender in the exercise of his power, nor will his Majesty countenance oppression on the part of those to whom he has delegated a portion of his authority, or suffer them, if guilty of injustice, to pass unpunished.

It will scarcely be credited in the House of Commons, or by the British public, that a man, who has served without a view to reward during a bitter war, should be insultingly oppressed by one—a stranger to the province, as your Excellency is—a stranger to the services of many of its inhabitants—but clothed with a little brief authority, intrusted to you by the Colonial Minister, and listening to evil, irresponsible advisers, exercises that power in the violent reckless manner in which it has been directed against me.

After discovering that the reasons assigned for my dismissal were untrue, and that there was no just ground for such a proceeding, the honourable course would have been to have restored me instantly to my offices, with such apologies for my wounded feelings as one gentleman owes to another whom he has unjustly aspersed.

But as this has not been done I feel myself justified in stating to his Majesty's Government that I have been treated with the grossest injustice, without even the shadow of misconduct on my part, for the reasons assigned are totally without foundation.

If, however, even at this late period, your Excellency has any other reasons than those given, which have been hitherto kept back, I am willing to allow them every weight, nor shall I attempt, when informed of their existence, to suppress or lessen their just influence with his Majesty's Government in the statement which I am about to forward.

If no other reasons are produced, I have a right to consider your Excellency's conduct to me inconsistent with your duty as the representative of my gracious Sovereign; and, as I can expect no redress at your hands, it only remains for me to appeal to the justice of the Imperial Government.

I have, &c.

REPLY TO THE ABOVE CASE.

No. 113.

(Copy.)

Downing-street, Aug. 29th, 1835.

SIR,

I have received your despatch of the 10th September, No. 72, enclosing a memorial addressed to myself, by Mr. George Ridout, dated on the 12th of the preceding month of August, in which Mr. Ridout appeals to his Majesty's Government, against your removal of him from the offices of Colonel of the Militia, Judge of the District Court of Niagara, and Justice of the Peace.

In deliberating on the advice which it became my duty to submit to the King on this occasion, I have thought myself obliged to exclude from my consideration, every ground which has been alleged in defence of your proceeding against M. Ridout, which was not assigned by yourself, in your correspondence with that gentleman.

In general, I should consider it unjust to subject any man to humiliation and punishment, for reasons which he has not had an opportunity of controverting; but in Mr. Ridout's case, there are peculiar motives for adhering to this principle.

In his letter of the 27th July, he combatted both by argument, and by evidence, the single charge preferred in your private secretary's letter, and then proceeded as follows:

"If, however, at this late period, your Excellency has any other reasons than those given, which have been hitherto kept back, I am willing to allow them every weight; nor shall I attempt, when informed of their existence, to suppress or lessen their just influence with his Majesty's Government, in the statement which I am about to forward."

Thus, distinctly apprised, that Mr. Ridout proposed to appeal against your decision, and with so unequivocal a demand for an opportunity of repelling every accusation which you might design to bring against him, I think you were reduced to the alternative, either of disclosing to him all the grounds of your proceeding, or of leaving the appeal to be decided by his Majesty, upon those grounds exclusively, which you had so disclosed.

Adverting, then, to the only charge against Mr. Ridout, and of which he was apprised in your private secretary's letter of the 1st of July, I find it to have been, that he was an active member of a society, by which a very objectionable address had been widely circulated.

Mr. Ridout does not deny either that the address was indefensible, or that it had been widely circulated, or that it had originated with the society in question. But he does, in the most positive terms deny, that he was a member of that society, or that he had even seen the address, until it met his eyes in a printed form, in the course of its circulation through the province, or that he was in any sense responsible for it, either as author or publisher. To these peremptory contradictions of the facts alleged against him, he adds, that he attended at the meeting at which the society in question was established, and opposed its formation.

on the principles contained in the resolutions brought forward by its author. This statement is corroborated by the affidavit of Mr. Stewart, who states himself to have been present on the occasion.

Such is the state of the question, as it is presented to me by your despatch and its enclosures. I have sought in vain for any proof that Mr. Ridout was a member of this society, or that he in any manner partook in the publication of the objectionable address. I am compelled, therefore, to come to the conclusion, that the charge is not only unsupported by proof, but that, to a great extent, it is actually disproved, as it is in every point directly contradicted.

But, in absence of evidence as to the fact, you have referred me to the legal opinion of the Solicitor-General of Upper Canada, who states, that Mr. Ridout most decidedly did appear to be an active member of that society.

It will, of course, not be ascribed to any want of respect towards Mr. Hagerman, if I observe, I do not understand why any legal reference is necessary in this case. The question involves no legal principle, but relates to a simple matter of fact. Mr. Stewart, though describing himself as a carpenter is, I think, far more entitled to speak with authority on this occasion than the Solicitor-General of the province, because the former possesses, and the latter does not possess, a personal acquaintance with what actually occurred, and, because Mr. Stewart was present, and Mr. Hagerman was absent when the society was formed, and when Mr. Ridout is said to have protested against its formation.

It is with the deepest reluctance that I overrule a decision publicly adopted by you, especially in a case of the present nature. I have, on every occasion, felt and, as I trust, have evinced, the utmost solicitude to afford you all the support and countenance in my power in the discharge of your arduous duties. But it is superfluous to say, that every consideration must yield to the irresistible claims of justice, and for the reasons which I have mentioned, I find it impossible to dispute Mr. Ridout's pretensions to be reinstated in his various offices. I have accordingly, to convey to you his Majesty's commands, that Mr. Ridout should be permitted to resume the various employments from which he had been removed. I refer to your own judgment the mode of proceeding to carry these instructions into effect.

It will afford me most sincere pleasure, if you shall be able to reconcile the prompt and complete execution of them, with the protection of your own authority from the danger to which I am well aware it may be exposed by the measure which I am thus compelled to adopt.

I have, &c.

No. 13.

(Copy.)

Toronto, Upper Canada,

6th February, 1837.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's despatch, No. 113, which only arrived here on the 6th instant, in which, referring to my having removed Mr. George Ridout from the offices of Judge of the District Court of Niagara, Colonel of Militia, and Justice of the Peace, your Lordship states, "It is with the deepest reluctance that I overruled a decision publicly adopted by you, especially in a case of the present nature * * I have therefore, accordingly to convey to you his Majesty's commands that Mr. Ridout should be permitted to resume the various employments from which he has been removed."

As the refutation of the last set of accusations made against me, namely, those made by Messrs. Hume and Duncombe, were despatched to your Lordship only two days ago, (thus completing the victory which, after a year's hard fighting, I have managed to gain over the opponents of the British constitution,) it was with some little disappointment and surprise, that I received from his Majesty's Government a communication amounting almost to a dismissal, not in the lenient form of being relieved, but by being publicly rendered incompetent to retain my station.

When my predecessor, Sir John Colborne was ordered by your Lordship to lay before the House of Assembly of the province he governed your Lordship's decided disapprobation of his conduct, he preferred at once to tender his resignation, a course which I believe almost every man of honour, who has ever been placed in similar circumstances, has deemed it incumbent upon him immediately to adopt.

I feel however so confident that I can succeed in bringing conviction to your Lordship's mind that I am as innocent of having acted unjustly towards Mr. Ridout, as I have been proved to be innocent of the various allegations brought against me by Messrs. Hume, Duncombe, Baldwin, Bidwell, Rolph, &c., that I have determined to submit to the consideration of his Majesty's Government the following statements and observations.

It is perfectly true that in the month of July last I dismissed Mr. Ridout from the situations of Judge of the District Court of Niagara, Colonel of the Militia, and Justice of the Peace, alleging to him, as the grounds of my doing so, that he Mr. Ridout appeared to be an active member of a society which had widely circulated a printed Address signed by Dr. Baldwin, Judge of the Surrogate, of which the following is an extract :

"It is our duty solemnly to assure you that the conduct of Sir F. B. Head has been alike a disregard of Constitutional Government, and of candour and truth in his statements to you."

It is also true that Mr. Ridout declares he "had nothing to do with drawing up the Address alluded to—that he had never seen it, until it met his eyes in a printed form—that he was not a member of the Society from which it had proceeded—and that at the meeting at which the Society in question was established, he opposed its foundation on the principles contained in the resolutions brought forward by its author (which latter statement, I admit, is corroborated by the affidavit of Mr. Stewart, a carpenter, who declares he was present on the occasion)."

If your Lordship will be so good as to refer to the letter from my Secretary to Mr. Ridout, you will perceive that it was not stated by me that Mr. Ridout had drawn up the Address alluded to, or that he had ever seen it till it met his eye in a printed form, or that he was a member of a Society from which it proceeded. All that was declared was, that the paper "had been published by a Society" of which Mr. Ridout, long after it had been placarded all over the province, continued to "appear to be an active member."

I need hardly observe to your Lordship, that Mr. Ridout, as a Judge of the District Court, must have known perfectly well that many a man has been hanged as an accomplice in a murder, who never saw it committed; and that when a Society of avowed republican principles has placarded and published in the newspapers a gross and wilful insult upon the King's representative, any officer in the service of his Majesty's Government might even legally be considered an accomplice by constantly attending the said meeting, most especially if, like Mr. Judge Ridout, he was heard to utter the most inflammatory speeches; but the following instructions to me from your Lordship on this subject admit of no misinterpretation.

"I further unreservedly acknowledge that the principle of effective responsibility should pervade every department of your Government, and for this reason, if for no other, I should hold that every public officer should depend on his Majesty's pleasure for the tenure of his office. If the head of any department should place himself in decided opposition to your policy, whether that opposition be avowed or latent, it will be his duty to resign his office into your hands; unless this course be pursued, it would be impossible to rescue the head of the Government from the imputation of insincerity, or to conduct the administration of public affairs with the necessary firmness and decision."

I most respectfully submit to your Lordship whether his Majesty's Government, after giving me the above instructions to act with firmness and decision, is justified in suddenly turning upon me for having obediently carried them into effect?

I most respectfully ask, whether, in framing the above instructions, it ever occurred to your Lordship, for a moment, to conceive that I could possibly meet with such an extreme case of "opposition, avowed or latent," as that of two judges, who, above all people, ought to be immaculate from political sin, openly attending a republican society, which at every meeting grossly and publicly insulted the King's representative; the one judge actually affixing his name as chairman to a most infamous placard; the other constantly haranguing the people.

Supposing, instead of being members of the Judicial Bench, the especial duty of whom, by example as well as by precept, is, to maintain the King's authority, they had been officers of the army or navy, would any quibble or subterfuge whatever be sufficient to screen them from dismissal?

Mr. Judge Ridout's legal talents are sufficiently demonstrated by the craftiness of his defence and evidence, which insidiously attempt to prove "that he had attended at the meeting at which the society in question was established, and opposed its formation on the principles contained in the resolutions brought forward by its author." He conceals, however, from your Lordship the following important explanation.

Until Mr. Bidwell delivered to the House of Assembly Mr. Papineau's letter, openly proposing to the North American Colonies to unite together for a revolutionary purpose, the society in question was known by the name of the "Alliance Society,"

On my dissolving the House of Assembly, the Constitutionals formed a "Constitutional Society," for the express purpose of opposing the unholy doctrines of this "Alliance Society," some of the members of which, finding that it required a veil, proposed to change its name from the "Alliance" to the "Constitutional Reform Society." The most reckless and violent of the party opposed this change, preferring what is vulgarly termed here "to go the whole hog." Of this number was Mr. Ridout, who truly enough informed your Lordship "that he opposed the formation of the society in question."

Having given this short elucidation of the letter of dismissal which my secretary addressed to Mr. Ridout, as also of his reply, I respectfully proceed to your Lordship's observations thereon.

Your Lordship states, "In deliberating on the advice which it became my duty to submit to the King on this occasion, I have thought myself obliged to exclude from my consideration every ground which has been alleged in defence of your proceedings against Mr. Ridout, which is not assigned by yourself in your correspondence with that gentleman."

"But, in the absence of evidence as to the fact, you have referred me to the legal opinion of the Solicitor-General of Upper Canada, who states, that Mr. Ridout most decidedly did appear to be an active member of the said society. It will of course not be ascribed to any want of respect towards Mr. Hagerman, if I observe that I do not understand why any legal reference is necessary in this case." The question involves no legal principles, but relates to a simple matter of fact. Mr. Stewart, though describing himself as a carpenter, is, I think, far more entitled to speak with authority on this occasion than the Solicitor-General of the province.

I cannot but believe that, on reflection, it will be evident to your Lordship that, if the solemn, deliberate judgments of the King's representative in a British colony, without any opportunity being afforded to him for explanation, be suddenly overruled by his Majesty's Government, or the mere denial of the individual sentenced to punishment, supported only by a witness of unknown character,—if going still further, it be decreed that the Governor's official explanatory despatches on the subject are to be treated by his Majesty's Government, to whom they are respectfully addressed, as mere hearsay evidence, which must not affect the merits of the case,—if the deliberate judicial opinion given by his Majesty's Attorney (not Solicitor) General to the King's representative, be declared to possess no more weight in the mind of his Majesty's Government than the evidence of a common carpenter, I state with deference, that the dignity, honour, and authority of the Governor are virtually extinct.

I respectfully submit, that, in no department of the state, not even in your Lordship's own office, has it ever been deemed necessary, or even advisable, that every reason for which an individual is to be relieved from office must be stated to him.

It may be necessary to remove a public servant for many reasons, which it may not be desirable to explain to him. But, in maintaining the dignity of the station of Lieutenant-Governor of this province, I am, by your Lordship's own instructions, especially absolved from any such necessity; for it is distinctly stated, "It is the duty of the Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada to vindicate to the King and to Parliament every act of his administration."

"To his Majesty and to Parliament the Governor of Upper Canada is at all times fully responsible for his official acts;" and yet, when I proceed to do so, his Majesty's Government cast my official vindication aside, and pass a severe judgment upon me, with the following preamble:—"In deliberating on the advice which it became my duty to submit to the King on this occasion, I have thought myself obliged to exclude from my consideration every ground which has been alleged in defence of your proceedings against Mr. Ridout, which was not assigned by yourself in your correspondence with that gentleman."

The following circumstances officially detailed to your Lordship in my despatches, Nos. 72, 62, and 57, must have been accordingly "excluded from your consideration, in judging of the propriety of Mr. Judge Ridout's dismissal."

1. "That on the 27th March, Mr. Ridout, heading the deputation, read that Address to me from a Public Meeting held at the City Hall, by Dr. O'Grady, (the Editor of the Correspondent and Advocate,) and others, which I forwarded to your Lordship on the 6th April.*

2. "That shortly afterwards, Mr. Judge Ridout made a declaration which became the subject of general conversation, that in the event of his being dismissed by me from office, I should deserve to be tarred and feathered, and that he (Mr. Judge Ridout) would lend a hand to do so.

3. "That in one of the Public Offices, he (Mr. Ridout) declared that we must or should now have war to the knife."

4. "That from a benevolent desire to reclaim Mr. Ridout from radical principles, the situations he held were successively heaped upon him by Sir P. Maitland, and by Sir John Colborne; but the more he was favoured, the more violent he became.

5. "That shortly after my arrival here, I myself took a great deal of trouble to endeavour to reclaim Mr. George Ridout, and kindly to persuade him of his errors, but in vain."

6. In my despatch to your Lordship, No. 57, I stated, "I will therefore merely assure your Lordship, that in the elections, as well as in the prompt dismissal of a few of the ring-leaders of the Republicans, I have acted cautiously and conscientiously."

7. That Mr. Judge Ridout, in a letter dated 27th July, which he addressed to me as the Lieutenant-Governor of this Province, declared that the reasons assigned by me "are altogether untrue;" that I have turned him out of office "under FALSE pretences;" that, "clothed with a little brief authority," I am "exercising my power in a violent, reckless manner," &c.

If the foregoing extracts from public despatches, all directly bearing upon the subject in question, be deliberately excluded from your Lordship's consideration, I cannot but most respectfully repeat, I am at a loss to understand why, in your Lordship's instructions to me, after distinctly stating, that unless I had power to dismiss from office any person who might openly or latently oppose my policy; "it would be impossible to conduct the administration of public affairs with the necessary firmness and decision." It is added, "that it is the duty of the Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada to vindicate to the King and to Parliament, every act of his administration;" for, how can I possibly vindicate my dismissals, but by despatches which I have the high privilege and honour of addressing to your Lordship.

I had certainly conceived, that as long as I was deemed worthy of the confidence reposed in me, independent of the production of facts and arguments, the mere expression of my opinion of the absolute necessity of the dismissal from office of any person, who, from my local knowledge, I deemed hostile to the British Constitution, would have carried with it infinitely more weight than the individual's denial of his own guilt.

The dangerous duty imposed upon me, of selecting for office those who are most fit for it, and of dismissing those who are unfit, requires the coolest deliberation and judgment: my very appointment to the station I hold presupposes my competence to the task; and it will now be my endeavour respectfully to demonstrate to your Lordship that, as regards the dismissal of Mr. Ridout, I have discharged this duty conscientiously and correctly.

Your Lordship must be aware that I succeeded in defeating the Republican party in this province, by calmly appealing to the judgment and good sense of the people. It was not,

* To this insolent Address I returned a calm answer, to which, contrary to all precedent, I received a communication, termed "a rejoinder," of which the following is an extract:—

"We cannot altogether agree with your Excellency, that 'the only consolation which should support an honest man in an arduous duty is the reflection that he is ready to atone for every error he commits and that he is subject to arraignment if he offend.' The highwayman and the pirate might, and often have, pleaded the same—have even been ready to make atonement, by restitution, and after 'arraignment,' expiated their crimes according to law."

I ask whether, when such language as the above had been addressed to the King's representative, it was not the bounden duty of his station to dismiss from his Majesty's service him who had headed and read the original Address? Is it not incomprehensible, that his Majesty's Government should, at such a time, have joined with such a man against me?

therefore, very likely that, when the victory was established, I should suddenly lose the equanimity by which I had gained it. But, because I had defeated the political machinations of my opponents, I was in all directions assailed by language, which gradually increased in virulence, until it became evident to me, that for the dignity, and even maintenance, of the King's authority, it was absolutely necessary I should check it.

Inasmuch, however, as the danger of doing so was apparent, I deeply reflected on the course which it would be most prudent for me to adopt.

The press—the shameless and traitorous language of which it would be impossible to describe—I determined to let alone; I also resolved not to notice affidavits and other evidence which I received, concerning individuals of low station, who, although holding commissions in the militia, publicly declared, "The Lieutenant Governor was the d—est liar and d—est rascal in the province." I considered these persons as not worthy to be made examples of; but the two individuals whom I eventually determined to select for punishment were Mr. Ridout and Dr. Baldwin, because I considered that, as Judges of the land, they had no excuse whatever for the offensive conduct they had been pursuing.

Instead, however, of at once following my own judgment, which, on the subject in question, I never once mistrusted for a moment, my first course was to seek the advice of my Council, who, with the facts existing before their eyes, deliberately and unanimously approved of the dismissal of Dr. Baldwin and Mr. Ridout. Not satisfied with their concurrence, I deemed it necessary to consult his Majesty's Attorney-General on the whole subject, and especially whether I should be authorised in declaring, that Mr. Ridout "appeared to be an active member" of the Association, at which he had been, and still was, a constant attendant.

The Attorney-General made every due inquiry, the result of which was, a deliberate confirmation of my views on the subject.

I accordingly publicly dismissed Mr. Ridout and Dr. Baldwin from the offices which they respectively held under his Majesty's Government, and though, like Dr. Duncombe, Mr. Bidwell, Dr. Rolph, &c., Mr. Judge Ridout has framed a remonstrance to his Majesty's Government, yet in this country neither he nor Dr. Baldwin presumed to get up even a petition to the House of Assembly on the subject.

The people of any British colony are always ready enough to espouse the cause of an injured man; and, trusting to inflammatory speeches, &c., an attempt was made to stamp the disapprobation of this capital upon my conduct, by returning Dr. Baldwin, Mr. Ridout, and Mr. Small, (whom I had also dismissed) as Aldermen for the city. Your Lordship knows the result, which has only just taken place, namely, that in spite of Dr. Baldwin's wealth, in spite of Mr. Ridout's efforts—in short, in spite of everything, they completely failed in their object; and, though they have sought the crown of martyrdom in England, they failed in being dubbed even Aldermen in Toronto!

If I have unjustly treated them, it cannot be a secret to the House of Assembly; but the opinion which that branch of the Legislature has just forwarded to your Lordship, as well as to both Houses of the Imperial Parliament, states—

"Few Governors of a Colony were ever placed in circumstances of greater difficulty than those which assailed Sir Francis Head within three months of his assuming the Government of the province; and it is, perhaps, not too much to say, that no man could have met those difficulties (ungenerously and unreasonably thrown in his way) with more temper, firmness, and judgment, than he did."

Not satisfied with these concurrent verdicts in my favour, on receiving Your Lordship's despatch, ordering Mr. Ridout to be restored to his offices, I again assembled my Council, who, without having been made acquainted with your Lordship's decision, forwarded to me this morning the following minute of their opinions:—

(Copy.)

IN COUNCIL, 9th FEBRUARY, 1837.

His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor was pleased this day to come down to the Council, and to inform them that the case of Mr. George Ridout, late Colonel of Militia, and Judge of the Niagara District Court, had been referred to his Excellency, by his Majesty's Government, on an application to his Majesty by Mr. Ridout, praying for redress.

His Excellency, referring to the circumstances under which Mr. Ridout's removal took place, and to the fact that, at the time the advice of the members of the Council, as to the question whether there was any thing in Mr. Ridout's statements, and whether any circumstances have transpired in the knowledge of the Council, since Mr. Ridout's removal, which, in their opinion, ought to induce his Excellency to make a report to his Majesty's Government, or to come to any determination respecting his case, more favourable to Mr. Ridout than those already made, and resolved upon:

The members of the Council in office at the time of Mr. Ridout's removal, feel bound to say, that to their knowledge, the conclusion to remove him from office was not arrived at without much deliberation, and even reluctance, on the part of his Excellency.

Under the conviction that, if officers in the employment of his Majesty, were to be permitted to express themselves, without measure or discretion, as to the conduct of his Majesty's representative, and to join with others, in endeavouring to destroy the respect and confidence, on the part of the people, which are so necessary to the well-being of any government, it would be almost impossible that the affairs of the colony could be conducted, for any length of time, successfully.

The members of the Council then in office performed what they felt to be a disagreeable and painful duty, in recommending to his Excellency the dismissal of Mr. Ridout.

The Council are now unanimously of opinion, that the power vested in his Excellency, of removing any officer holding a situation during pleasure, when his remaining in office is considered injurious to his Majesty's Government, and to the tranquillity and peace of the country, was in this instance exercised judiciously, and when it scarcely could be avoided, without bringing the Government into contempt. If Mr. Ridout disapproved of the measures adopted by the Lieutenant-Governor, he was not called upon to support them, or even to refrain from opposition, or claim of redress, preserving the decorum and decency of language which must, under any circumstances, be considered as due to the representative of the King.

When, however, a gentleman holding an official situation, departs from the rules which are dictated by the most ordinary considerations of propriety, and sets an example to others of disrespect and insubordination, which the ignorant and evil-disposed are but too apt to follow, the Council cannot but feel that it is no less due to the dignity of the Crown than to the feelings of those who desire that the Government under which they live should be respected, that the offending individual should be removed from a place in which his example is calculated to be so peculiarly injurious.

The Council, therefore, feeling the greatest regret that Mr. Ridout's conduct should have rendered such a course advisable, cannot at present recommend his Excellency to advise his Majesty to restore Mr. Ridout to the offices from which he has been removed.

(Signed) R. B. SULLIVAN, P. C.

And now, my Lord, I beg to show who these gentlemen of my Council are who originally concurred, and who still concur with me, in the propriety of the dismissal of Dr. Baldwin and Mr. Ridout.

1. The first on the list is the Hon. R. B. Sullivan, Dr. Baldwin's own nephew, whose sister was married to Mr. Ridout's own brother.

2. The Hon. Captain Baldwin, of the Royal Navy, actually the brother as well as the friend of Dr. Baldwin, whom I dismissed! Captain Baldwin also, for many years, has been the intimate friend of Mr. Ridout.

3. The Hon. William Allan, for many years President of the Bank of Upper Canada, a man whose character for probity would be admired in any country in the world.

4. The Hon. John Elmsley, an officer in his Majesty's Navy, a person of considerable property, and perhaps the most ultra-reformer in the Legislative Council.

5. The Hon. W. H. Draper, who has lately joined the Executive Council, and who is member or representative for this metropolis, where every fact concerning Mr. Ridout's dismissal is of course known and at hand.

I have now submitted to your Lordship the leading reasons for which I deemed it necessary to dismiss Mr. Ridout from the offices he held under His Majesty's Government; and I have only to add, that had I not done so, I have reason to know the principal members of the Bar would have declined to appear in the Court of Niagara, on account of the reprehensible conduct of Mr. Judge Ridout.

With respect to the order which I have received from your Lordship to restore this gentleman to the offices from which he has been removed, I have only to state that if such should continue to be His Majesty's desire, I will obey the command: it is not my intention petulantly to tender my resignation because my judgments have been overruled; at the same time, I feel perfectly confident that, the moment Mr. Ridout's authority is restored to him, I shall be deprived of my own, as well as all power or possibility of carrying on the government of this province.

As I expect every hour to hear of the arrival of my family at New York, they having sailed from England on the 10th of January, I can have no desire they should recross the Atlantic; but I am not ashamed to say that I have not courage to face the difficulties which from all sides would assail me the moment it become known that His Majesty's Government had openly declared itself opposed to one of the most prominent measures of my administration of this government.

I have, &c.

(Signed) F. B. HEAD.

The following despatch is a sample of the able style of special pleading exercised by the Colonial Office towards Colonial Governors. Instead of, in a moment of mutiny, supporting me in my station, and of giving proper weight to my opinions, I submit that Her Majesty's Government treated me and Mr. Ridout just as a police magistrate would deal with the case of two unknown persons, brought before him for having been found quarrelling in the street.

DOWNING STREET,

5th April, 1837.

SIR,

I have received your despatches of the 6th of February last, No. 13, on the case of Mr. Ridout. In order to explain clearly the view which I have taken on this subject, I must begin with a short retrospect of what has hitherto occurred, although it will perhaps involve me in the repetition of some statements already addressed to you.

Mr. Ridout's dismissal from his office was communicated to him on the 12th of July last, in letters written to him by your Secretary, and by the Adjutant-General of Militia. In your Secretary's letter this measure was attributed to the circumstance that Mr. Ridout appeared to be a member of the Constitutional Reform Society of Upper Canada, by and on behalf of which had been circulated the printed address of which reference was then made. The Adjutant-General's letter stated that Mr. Ridout was deprived of his Commission in the militia for the reasons mentioned in your Secretary's letter.

On the 14th July, Mr. Ridout transmitted to your Secretary an answer, denying that he was a member of the society in question, or that he had ever seen their address until it was in circulation in print through the city of Toronto. His answer to the Adjutant-General suggested that the real cause of his dismissal was a vote which he had given at the general election. The Adjutant-General replied by contradicting the truth of this surmise.

On the 22nd of July Mr. Ridout announced to you his intention to bring his case under the notice of his Majesty's Government, and made an application to be furnished with an explanation of any other reasons for your conduct which might have been kept back.

No notice having been taken of this letter, he placed in your hands, for transmission to this country, his petition of the 12th of August, in which he offered to prove that he had refused to connect himself with the Constitutional Reform Society, because he disapproved of its constitution. He attached to that document the affidavit of Alexander Stewart, in which the deponent confirmed Mr. Ridout's statement, alleging that he was present at the formation of the society, and heard Mr. Ridout oppose that measure.

In your despatch of the 12th of September, you enclose the preceding correspondence, and imputed to Mr. Ridout various acts of misconduct, to which that correspondence contained no allusion.

In my despatch of the 29th of November, I stated that I had thought myself obliged to exclude from my consideration every ground alleged in defence of your proceeding against Mr. Ridout, which had not been assigned by yourself in your correspondence with that gentleman. For this decision I gave three distinct reasons. They were, first, that it seemed to me unjust to subject any man to humiliation and punishment, for reasons which he has not had an opportunity of controverting; secondly, that Mr. Ridout had combated, both by argument and by evidence, the single charge preferred in your Secretary's letter; and thirdly, that, with a view to an appeal to his Majesty's Government, he had demanded an opportunity of repelling any other accusation which you might have to bring against him.

In reference to this statement, you have, in your despatch of the 9th February, observed that, in no department of the State, not even in my own office, has it ever been deemed necessary, or even advisable, that every reason for which an individual is to be relieved from office must be stated to him; that it may be necessary to remove a public officer for many reasons, which it may be desirable to explain to him; and that you were expressly absolved from such necessity by any other instructions to you.

You must permit me to state unreservedly, that this answer appears to me inadequate; first, I am totally ignorant of the existence either in this office or any other department of the State, of any such practice as that to which you refer.

I am not aware of so much as a single instance, in which a public officer has been dismissed as a punishment, and on the ground of misconduct, without the most explicit disclosure to him, of the reasons by which his superior vindicated such an exercise of authority.

Secondly.—I cannot concur with you in opinion, that any man ought to use, or possess such a power over those serving under him.* The only difficulty of supporting my opinion on this subject by argument is, that so simple and elementary a principle of justice, would rather be obscured than illustrated by a statement of the reasons which instantly suggest themselves in support of it. There are indeed official relations of such a nature, that it is necessary to confine to the superior officer the right of dissolving them at once, without assigning any cause whatever to the sufferer. Thus, for example, a public officer should be at liberty instantly to remove his private secretary for mere incogruity of habits of temper, or for want of some peculiar talent, or qualification, causes which, in such a relation, are of the uttermost weight, but which could scarcely be drawn out into a specific charge or statement. In such cases this is mutually understood as the necessary condition and tenure of the service; yet even in this intimate and confidential relation, if the removal should be made avowedly on the ground of misconduct, the superior would be bound in common justice to explain unreservedly, in what the imputed fault consisted. If not, any man's character and happiness might be sacrificed by vague suspicion, and by surmises, infamous in proportion to the station and character of the accuser.

Thirdly.—I cannot allow that the instructions from me which you have quoted, absolve you from this obligation.

On the contrary, I think they clearly impose it on you, they declare your responsibility to the King, and to Parliament. In Mr. Ridout's case notice was given to you that an appeal was about to be made to his Majesty; To acquit yourself of the responsibility which I declared you to owe to the King; it became incumbent on you to establish the fact, that Mr. Ridout had merited the severe punishment which had been inflicted on him.

To substantiate that conclusion, it was necessary to show that he had really been guilty of the offences laid to his charge, and this could be proved only by showing what he was alleged to have said or done admitted of no satisfactory explanations, a result which could not be established, until an opportunity of making such explanation had been afforded to him.

Fourthly.—If I could admit that you were entitled to inflict a punishment without a distinct statement to the accused party, of the causes which had provoked it, I should yet limit that admission to cases in which an entire silence had been maintained.

Instead of this, however, you communicated to Mr. Ridout a single charge, which he contradicted, and applied himself to disprove.

He was thus, I think, warranted in believing that, if successful in refuting that accusation, his exculpation was complete. Finally, I thought that, in what related to the Constitutional Reform Society, Mr. Ridout's defence was conclusive,† and I could not therefore but doubt, whether he might not have been equally successful in vindicating himself against the other charges, if they had been made known to him.

*It was a moment of mutiny.

† Mr. Ridout's defence on this subject, far from being conclusive, was a glaring quibble. He answered the accusation, that, by constantly attending and speaking at a meeting, he appeared to be an active member, by merely declaring that he was not an actual member of the society; and it was exactly because I knew he was not, that I had applied to the Attorney-General on the subject. This officer's official opinion, that Mr. R. decidedly "appeared to be an active member," I forwarded to the Colonial Office, who had it before them while writing this despatch.

For these reasons, I adhere to my first opinions, that I was bound to exclude from my consideration every allegation against Mr. Ridout, of which he had not been apprised.

You, however, maintain that your despatch of the 12th of September ought to have satisfied me of the truth of the accusation preferred in your secretary's letter of the 12th of July. Two reasons are assigned for this conclusion. First, I had before me the statement of your own conviction that the charge was well founded; and, secondly, I knew that you had obtained a legal opinion to the same effect.

It would be more than superfluous to declare my perfect reliance on the accuracy of every assertion of yours, respecting any matter of fact which has fallen within your own personal observation; neither is it necessary for me to disclaim altogether the idea of impeaching in any degree, the legal knowledge or the talents of the Attorney-General. But neither you nor the Attorney-General offered yourselves as witnesses to the matter of fact, namely, whether Mr. Ridout was or was not a member of the Constitutional Reform Society. You laid claim to no personal knowledge* of his conduct in reference to that body.

The Attorney-General was quoted, not as a witness of the fact, but only as an interpreter of the law. Consequently, notwithstanding the strong dissent which you have expressed, I must continue to think that the authority of Stewart, though a common carpenter, when speaking on his oath respecting an occurrence which passed in his own presence and hearing, is entitled to much more weight on the question of fact than can be assigned to the opinion even of the the Attorney, who appears to have had not the slightest personal knowledge† of what took place at the meeting. This is a conclusion to which, in so far as regards the facts in question, no one, I am inclined to think, would more readily subscribe than the Attorney General himself.

From your despatch of the 6th of February, I now, however, for the first time, learn that Mr. Ridout's removal from office was recommended by the Executive Council, and I further learn that they adhere to their original opinion.

On this subject I have to state, that I have never expressed, nor do I now entertain, any judgment opposed to theirs; on the contrary, I entirely agree with them that, the various acts of misconduct ascribed to Mr. Ridout, in your despatch of the 12th of December, and still more fully stated in your despatch of the 6th of February, are such as would, if substantiated on proper inquiry, justify the very severe penalty inflicted on him.

If I am to understand the Council as thinking that such an inquiry was needless, I must, with whatever reluctance, differ from them. The grounds of that difference I have already in part explained; but I must add, that if there be any one class of public officers, in whose case it is especially incumbent on the Executive Government to proceed with caution, circumspection, and with a strict observance of all the essential forms of proceeding on such occasions, it is the class of those who are intrusted with the administration of justice.

In avowing my opinion, that the matters laid to the charge of Mr. Ridout, would, if established, justify his dismissal, I wish to be understood as not referring to the intemperate terms in which he addressed you after his removal from office; much allowance is to be made for natural feelings, under a sense of supposed injury. It is to the other allegations that my remark applies. It is, I can assure you, painful to me to take any course of conduct which may aggravate the difficulties of your situation, yet I feel myself bound, by the paramount obligations of justice, still to withhold my approbation of the measures adopted in Mr. Ridout's case. On the other hand, his restitution to office may, I think, be properly made to depend upon his ability to exculpate himself from the various charges preferred against him in your despatches of the 12th of September and the 6th of February. To this extent, the instructions conveyed to you in my despatch of the 29th of November, are withdrawn and qualified.—Further than this it is impossible for me to advance. You will, therefore, in whatever mode you shall think best, put Mr. Ridout in possession of those accusations, and after weighing his answers, and the evidence by which it may be supported, you will communicate to me the result.

I cannot close my answer to your despatch of the 6th of February, without adverting to some of the general topics to which you have there taken occasion to advert.

* I told the Government that he constantly attended and harangued the meeting; this was notorious. Surely her Majesty's Government did not mean to insist that I ought to have acquired personal knowledge of the fact by attending the meeting myself.

† The Attorney-General did not attend these meetings, but, in consequence of my calling upon him for his opinion, he made necessary inquiries of those who had been present, and who had witnessed Mr. Ridout's behaviour there.

You complain that the Governor's official explanatory despatches have been treated by me, in this case, as mere hearsay evidence, which must not affect the merits of the case. I may, perhaps, misunderstand the precise meaning of this remark, but if it be that statements made by a Governor to me on the authority of third persons, are entitled to the same weight as if they referred to facts of which he was the personal observer and witness, I can only say, that I am not aware of any reason which would justify me in so regarding them.

If I might interpret some other passages of your despatch, you understand me to have authorised you to dismiss from office any person who should openly or latently oppose your policy. If you will again refer to the instructions which you have thus quoted, you will perceive that the officers to whom I referred were not of the class to which Mr. Ridout belonged, but persons whose public offices bring them into a confidential or immediate connexion with your administration of the affairs of the province. I certainly never contemplated that every officer of the militia, every district judge, and every justice of the peace, should hold his office on the condition of being dismissed if he should happen to oppose the policy of the Lieutenant Governor for the time being. To urge the rule which I have laid down to such consequences is at once to misapprehend my meaning, and to establish a principle which would bring almost every gentleman in the province into such relations with the local Government as no man of independent character and principles could be expected or desired to maintain. The instructions to which you have referred were intended to apply (and I think that intention sufficiently manifest) to those high and confidential officers of your Government only with whom you are habitually brought into confidential intercourse upon the general interests of the province. If there be any ambiguity in my instructions to you, which I do not perceive, you will hereafter understand them in this limited sense only.

You further express your expectation that the "mere expression of your opinion of the absolute necessity for the dismissal of any person from office whom, from your local knowledge, you deemed hostile to the British constitution, would have carried with it infinitely more weight than the individual's denial of his own guilt." From this and other passages in your despatch, I infer that you regard the Secretary of State as virtually bound to adopt your opinions in individual cases as conclusive, even upon an appeal against your decision. But such is not my estimate of the duties of my office: I act under a strict and effective responsibility to the King and to Parliament. Of every measure which I take, or which, when taken by others, I approve, I must be prepared to produce the vindication. But I should ill acquit myself of that duty if I attempted to rest my justification on an implicit confidence in the judgment of the officer against whose acts an appeal had been brought before me. Cherishing as I do the strongest presumption in favour of every decision of yours, I must yet, as often as your sentence is impeached, examine into the merits of the question with strict impartiality, and with a jealousy of those prepossessions in favour of your opinions from which I can never be exempt. In our relative position in his Majesty's service, I could not act on any other principle without abandoning my duty to the King and to his Majesty's subjects, and I trust that, on your part, the just and lively estimate which you have formed of the importance and responsibility of your own duties will be combined with a due allowance for the not less arduous and responsible nature of mine.

No. 41.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship, a copy of a Gazette Extraordinary, by which it will appear that I have made the following appointments, until the King's pleasure be made known.

Robert S. Jameson, Esq., Vice-Chancellor;

Archibald McLean and Jonas Jones, Esquires, Judges in the Court of King's Bench;

Christopher Alexander Hagerman, Esq., Attorney-General; and,

William Henry Draper, Esq., Solicitor-General.

As regards Mr. Hagerman, I can say, that I have not been in the habit of seeing or consulting him, excepting on such cases as have especially belonged to his station, and accordingly, during the whole of last session of the Legislature, I did not, I think, send for him four times. Mr. Hagerman's claims, as brought under my consideration, are shortly as follow:— He was present at the actions of Chrysler's farm—the taking of Oswego—and in several engagements on the Niagara frontier, during the year 1814, and was recommended for a gold medal by Sir Gordon Drummond, on whose staff he served as provincial aide-de-camp. He was first elected representative for the town of Kingston in 1826; since that period he has been three times returned, and has held the situation of Solicitor-General nearly eight years.

On the 30th November, 1829, Sir John Colborne received from Sir George Murray a despatch, No. 48, relating to the disappointment which Mr. Hagerman had experienced, in consequence of not having been confirmed by his Majesty in the office of judge, to which he had been temporarily appointed on the removal of Mr. Willis, of which the following is an extract:—

“At the same time I readily admit that the case, as regards Mr. Hagerman, is one of some hardship, and I have to request you will assure that gentleman, that I regret extremely that he should have suffered any inconvenience, in consequence of the arrangements which I felt it my duty to recommend, and that I shall be very ready, at a future opportunity, to give his claims every consideration.”

I believe Mr. Hagerman to be warmly and enthusiastically attached to the British Constitution, and to the connexion of this province, of which he is a native, with the mother-country; I consider him to have been a faithful servant of the Crown. The assertion of his principles has drawn upon him in the House of Assembly the whole fire of the Republicans; and in these actions, although he has shown considerable powers of defence, he has occasionally evinced an impetuosity which it would have been prudent to have restrained. I believe, however, that his moral character is respected even by his opponents; and therefore, on the whole, considering that no just reason existed why, on the promotion of the Attorney-General, he should not be appointed as his successor, I felt it to be my duty to name him as such until the King's pleasure should be known.

Having submitted to your Lordship the grounds upon which I have made the appointments in question, I think it proper to state, that it is with unfeigned regret I have omitted to recommend to your Lordship's notice the name of Mr. Bidwell. That gentleman's legal acquirements are, I consider, superior to at least one of the individuals whom I have elevated. His moral character is irreproachable, and though he was ostensibly the leader of a party who have offered me every possible insult and indignity, yet I can assure your Lordship that I entertain towards Mr. Bidwell no feeling of animosity; and that, even if I could desire to triumph over a person whom I have publicly disarmed of his power to oppose me, I should feel that that triumph would be infinitely more grateful to his Majesty by forgiveness than by revenge. But, anxious as I am to give to talent its due, yet I cannot but feel that the welfare and honour of this province, depend on his Majesty never promoting a disloyal man.

Divested of all its objectionable language, Mr. Bidwell's object (so far as it could be elicited by the conduct of his associates) was to separate this colony from the parent state; to create disaffection for the paternal government of the King, and, by forming an alliance with Mr. Papineau's party in Lower Canada, to exchange the British constitution for the low, grovelling principles of democracy.

I therefore considered that publicly to elevate Mr. Bidwell to the Bench would deprive me of the respect and confidence of this country; and I believe your Lordship will agree with me in opinion, that, where a man acts with disloyal associates, his talents aggravate, rather than extenuate his offence.

Having afforded your Lordship all the information in my power respecting the law appointments I have made, it only remains for me respectfully to express my hope that his Majesty will be graciously pleased to confirm them.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's

Most obedient humble Servant,

DOWNING STREET,

July 14th, 1837.

SIR,

I have had the honour to receive your despatch of the 5th of April last, No. 41, enclosing the copy of a gazette extraordinary, notifying certain legal appointments which you had made, in conformity with an Act passed by the Legislature of Upper Canada, during the last session. The public events which have occurred since my receipt of that Act have hitherto rendered it impossible to submit it for the Royal sanction. But I trust that I shall have it in my power to communicate to you the Queen's pleasure respecting it at an early period. In the mean time her Majesty commands me to express her approbation of the appointment of Mr. Jameson to be Vice Chancellor, and of Messrs. A. Maclean and Jonas Jones to be Judges in the Court of Queen's Bench, and I shall take an early opportunity of transmitting to you the necessary warrants under the royal sign manual conferring those appointments. * *

The selection of Mr. Hagerman to be Attorney-General appears to be more open to question. I am fully prepared to admit, as a general rule, the claim of the Solicitor-General not to be passed over in any new arrangements such as those to which your despatch refers, and I am of opinion that such a claim should not be set aside without some strong and paramount reason. I am also willing to give the greatest weight to the representations which you have addressed to me in Mr. Hagerman's favour, founded both on his private character and public merit. It is, however, essential that the gentleman who fills the high and responsible office of Attorney-General should hold opinions on questions of general policy, and relating to the administration of the affairs of the province, in unison with those of the Executive Government.

I have no reason to doubt that you have received the utmost support and co-operation from the Solicitor General, but I am bound to add that, if the sentiments ascribed to Mr. Hagerman in the resolutions, a copy of which I have the honour to enclose, be really entertained by him, and have been publicly expressed by him in his place as a member of the provincial Legislature during the last session, a very wide difference exists between his view and that of her Majesty's Government, supported by the Law Officers of the Crown in 1819, as to the rights of the Church of Scotland in Upper Canada under the Act of 1791.* As these resolutions have been transmitted to me by an individual member of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and as I have not received any information from you on the subject, I am willing to hope that some misapprehension may have existed as to the real nature of the language employed by Mr. Hagerman. I shall therefore suspend my opinion as to the propriety of his advancement to the office of Attorney-General, until he shall have had an opportunity of offering any explanation which he may desire to give with reference to this subject. You will communicate to Mr. Hagerman a copy of so much of this despatch as relates to him, together with a copy of the enclosed paper.

There is another subject noticed in your despatch, to which it is necessary that I should advert. You state that it has been with unfeigned regret that you have omitted to recommend for one of the new legal appointments Mr. Bidwell, whose professional talents you consider superior to those of at least one of the gentlemen selected by you, while his character is irreproachable. You observe, however, that Mr. Bidwell's object, "so far as it could be elicited by the conduct of his associates," was to separate Canada from the parent state, and you claim my assent to the proposition, that, "where a man acts with disloyal associates, his talents aggravate rather than extenuate his offence." I need not assure you of the great weight which I attach to any opinion respecting the affairs of Upper Canada deliberately expressed by you, and I have accordingly felt bound in the present instance to defer to your judgment relative to Mr. Bidwell. But, considering that the disloyalty which is imputed to Mr. Bidwell's associates is not charged against himself, or attempted to be proved by any act of his; † that he has, for the present at least, withdrawn himself from political strife; and that his legal abilities and high moral character are acknowledged and respected even by his political opponents; I cannot regard the part which he ‡ formerly took in local politics as an insuperable barrier to his future advancement in his profession. On the contrary, advertng to the general estimate of his qualifications for a seat on the Bench, it appears to me that the public interests would be promoted by securing his services; nor would it be of slight importance to convince the inhabitants of Upper Canada that, in the selections for judicial offices, the Executive Government is actuated by no other feeling than an anxiety to promote the welfare of all classes of her Majesty's subjects. If therefore, as you appear to anticipate, another vacancy should occur among the Judges of the Court of King's Bench, it is the wish of her Majesty's Government that the situation should be offered to Mr. Bidwell, and they will hear with much pleasure that he has accepted it.

* The offensive sentiment which Mr. Hagerman, in a most angry discussion in the House of Assembly, is accused of having uttered, was as follows:—"The Church of England is the Established Church,—the Roman Catholic Church is an Established Church, but the Church of Scotland is no more an Established Church than that of any other dissenting body in the province."—Mr. Hagerman denies having uttered these words.

† See the insulting accusations made against me to the King and to the House of Commons (page 81,) both signed Marshal Spring Bidwell.

‡ Mr. Bidwell's opposition to monarchical institutions had not ceased.

I have the honour to be,
 Sir,
 Your Obedient Servant,

GLENELG.

No. 99.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
 Toronto, 10th September, 1837.

MY LORD,

I have to acknowledge the receipt of the following despatches, which I have had the honour to receive from your Lordship :

1st. Despatch, No. 158, dated 5th April, 1837, repeating to me that the reasons I submitted to your Lordship for having removed Judge Ridout from office, appear to your Lordship inadequate, and that your Lordship still withholds your approbation of the measures adopted in Mr. Ridout's case.

2nd. Despatch, No. 200, dated 14th July, 1837, informing me that your Lordship has not been pleased to confirm the appointments of the Attorney and Solicitor General, which, on the 5th of April last, I had the honour to notify to your Lordship, in a Gazette extraordinary, but that it is the wish of her Majesty's Government that the situation of Judge of the Court of King's Bench should, in case of an expected vacancy, be offered to Marshall Spring Bidwell, the Speaker of the late House of Assembly, the leader of the Republicans in this province, and the fellow-labourer and correspondent of Mr. Speaker Papineau.

As, after very deliberate consideration, I have determined to take upon myself the serious responsibility of positively refusing to place Mr. Bidwell on the Bench, or to restore Mr. George Ridout to the Judgeship from which I have removed him, I feel it my duty, not only respectfully to explain to your Lordship the reason of my conduct, but frankly to disclose to your Lordship opinions and sentiments which, being hostile to the policy of the Colonial Office, ought not to be withheld from your Lordship.

I feel confident that your Lordship will, with the equanimity which distinguishes your character, calmly listen to the observations I am about to make, and I can assure your Lordship that at the present instant there is no feeling more strongly impressed in my own mind, than that, in the utterance of strong opinions, which I feel most deeply, I may not be led away to use an expression which can in any way be considered as evincing a want of that respect which is justly due to your Lordship, as well as to the high station you hold.

My declining, or, in plain terms, my refusing, to carry your Lordship's orders into effect, would, I am aware, commonly be considered as an overt act of hostility, but when it is considered that the population of our colonies amounts to 99,000,000 of people, scattered over thirty-five portions of the globe, it must be evident that their prosperity depends, not only on the Colonial Minister commanding what he deems to be right, but on the Colonial Governors refusing, at their peril, to execute what they conscientiously believed to be wrong.

In a conflict of this nature, it does not therefore necessarily follow that disobedience in a Lieutenant-Governor is disaffection to the Minister; and, although I am sensible that your Lordship has power abruptly to terminate such objection on my part, by immediate dismissal, yet I have no observations to offer on that subject, as it is my own duty, and not your Lordship's, that I am at present desirous to perform.

My Lord, in my despatch, dated 18th Nov. last, (page 204,) I respectfully informed your Lordship "that, in my humble opinion, the whole blame of the dissensions which exist in the Canadas rests neither upon the surface of the country, nor upon the morals of the people, but on the conciliatory measures which, under successive administrations, have been unremittingly applied by the Colonial Office."

I stated to your Lordship that "the British population of the Canadas, the Chief Justice, the Law Officers of the Crown, and every faithful public servant, were of this opinion; and that, although her Majesty were suddenly to arrive in the Canadas, there was no one of those I had enumerated who would not be proud to follow her with devotion from Niagara to Quebec; yet that, if a representative of our colonial policy were to appear here, "I declared to your Lordship" that, in my opinion, "he would be seen to traverse the Canadas alone."

In this statement I communicated to your Lordship the truth, but not the whole truth.—Your Lordship's late despatches oblige me to supply the deficiency.

My Lord, there exists in this country no personal feeling against your Lordship, but the loyal British population of the Canadas loudly complain that there exists in the colonial department an invisible over-ruling influence, which either favours the introduction of republican principles as productive, in theory, "of the greatest happiness to the greatest number," or, acting under the mistaken persuasion that democracy must inevitably prevail over this continent, deems it politic to clear the way for its introduction, rather than attempt to oppose its progress; in short, it has for many years been generally believed, that however loyal may be the HEAD of the colonial department, its HEART is in favour, not only of republican institutions, but of the expediency of assisting rather than of retarding the launching our North American Colonies into that vast ocean of democracy, upon which the United States, the cable of their public credit having snapped, are at this moment driving without rudder or compass.

If a statement of the above opinions were to reach your Lordship anonymously, or bearing the signature of a few individuals, or even of a large body of individuals, it would, of course, be cast aside as contemptible; but your Lordship, whose attachment to the British Constitution is well known, will, I conceive, be startled when I tell you, not only that the British population of the Canadas partake largely of this opinion, but that I, her Majesty's representative in this province, am of that opinion; that the late Lieutenant-Governor, Sir John Colborne, who had eight years' experience, is of that opinion; that Lieutenant-General Sir Peregrine Maitland, who, as Lieutenant-Governor, had ten years' experience, is of that opinion; I believe Lord Aylmer, Lord Dalhousie, Sir A. Campbell, (the late Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick), to be of that opinion; and, moreover, that if the Lieutenant-Governors of all the British Colonies were to be examined by your Lordship, their testimony would, generally speaking, substantiate rather than deny what I have stated.

If your Lordship believes the statement I have made, the concurrent opinions I have quoted must be conclusive; if, on the other hand, your Lordship doubts the accuracy of my statement, I beg your Lordship to examine the witnesses, whose names I have submitted to you. I have had no communication with any of them, but from the seat of Government of this province, where the sentiments of my predecessors are recorded, I clearly see what is passing before my eyes, I plainly hear what is sounding in everybody's ears.

Your Lordship must, of course, be aware, that a monarchy may be mechanically lowered into a republic, by means of an inclined plane, the angle of which may be so acute, that the surface to a common observer appears to be level; but lest this metaphor should not be clear to your Lordship, I will state in still plainer terms, that the way to convert a monarchy into a republic, is to take every opportunity to subtract power from the Crown, in order to add or give it to the people.

Now, it must be evident to your Lordship, that this arrangement may be practically effected by a secret influence, which it may be almost impossible to detect. For instance, there may be appointed to the Government of her Majesty's Colonies a series of military men, each ignorant of the principles of civil government, as well as unacquainted with the various classes of society of which it is composed. During their initiation to their new professions, every encouragement may be given, at your Lordship's office, to representations arriving there from any portion of "the people;" while, on the other hand, every possible discouragement may be given to the friends and supporters of monarchy. A man, asking for concessions, may invariably be represented to your Lordship as highly intelligent and respectable; a man stanchly recommending their refusal, may be termed politically biassed,

The Lieutenant-Governors, observing that they are applauded whenever they concede any thing to the House of Assembly, and that, somehow or other, they invariably get themselves into difficulty whenever they support the Legislative Council, may, for a long time, be led unconsciously to do what all military men are naturally disposed to do, namely, recklessly to carry into effect the spirit of their instructions.

So long as they do this, they may peacefully enjoy their stations; but when experience in their new professions opens their eyes,—when reflection staggers their judgment,—when beginning to perceive that concessions to what is falsely called “the people” increase rather than satiate the appetite,—they appeal to the Colonial Office, and, in language military rather than diplomatic, bid them “be firm,” then, and from that moment, they may immediately find themselves unaccountably afflicted with a sweating sickness, which is a sure precursor of their removal. The language of praise ceases to cheer them,—they may receive slight rebukes,—objections may be raised to the appointments which they make,—people who oppose them in the colony may be raised to distinction,—any trifling disputes in which they may be involved may invariably be decided against them,—their tiny authority in the colony may continually be shaken, until, by a repetition of petty circumstances, which mortify rather than offend, they may become disgusted with their duty, they may intemperately proffer their resignation, a new man may be appointed, and the same process may be renewed.

The whole of these circumstances may occur, the democratic power may gradually be increased, the influence of the executive may gradually be diminished, the whole loyal population may become indignant at observing their inevitable declination towards democracy, and yet there may be no particular moment, or no one particular circumstance sufficiently strong to arouse the Colonial Minister to a knowledge of the dreadful fact, that the tendency of his own office is republican, and that, while on its surface is seen flowing towards the throne, a strong under-current is absolutely carrying everything away from it!

The case I have just sketched may be merely one of imagination; but I beg your Lordship to keep it in mind, as I bring before your patient consideration the following statements and observations:—

My Lord, on my assuming the government of this province, I was desired by your Lordship to consider as the guide of my proceedings Lord Gosford’s instructions, in which were contained the following words:—“In every part of the instructions with which, either as Chief Commissioner or as Governor, you are charged, conciliation, and the reconciliation of all past grievances, are studiously presented as the great object of your mission.”

Being convinced that the concessions which had been made in our colonies to the advocates of democracy had been the sole cause of the disturbances in the Canadas, I, very shortly after my arrival here, expressed myself to your lordship as follows:—

“The more seriously I contemplate the political tranquillity of this province, the more steadfastly am I convinced in my opinion, that cool, stern, decisive, unconciliatory measures form the most popular system of government that can be exercised toward the free and high-minded inhabitants of the Canadas.”

I need not observe to your lordship that it is impossible for two systems to be more diametrically opposed to each other than that prescribed to Lord Gosford and that which I had determined to pursue.

I had not the slightest intention to rebel against what I considered to be your Lordship’s policy, (namely, the maintenance of the King’s authority in the Canadas,) but, being convinced that this object could only be obtained by the means I have explained, I did not hesitate to inform your Lordship of the course I had deliberately determined to pursue.

My policy having been shortly explained, I beg leave to bring before your Lordship’s mind the following sketch of my principles, as they have been avowed to your Lordship in my various despatches.

[Long extracts of my despatches are here quoted, which, having been already submitted to the reader, it would be tedious to repeat.]

I have now recapitulated to your Lordship a plain statement of the policy and principles which have regulated my proceedings; and, without advocating any political theory, I only refer to the practical result of the conciliatory system which has been adopted in Lower Canada, and of the non-conciliatory system which has been adopted in Upper Canada, and respectfully say to your Lordship, “look on this picture and on that!”

As far as regards your Lordship's approbation of my services, I have every reason to be grateful for the terms in which it has been expressed, and for the distinction which his late Majesty has graciously conferred upon me; but I have now arrived at the point of my narrative in which I think it will appear what sort of reception my principles and policy have met with from the Colonial Office.

[Long extracts of my despatches, all complaining of want of support, are here quoted, but, as they have been already before the reader, it would be tedious to repeat them.]

It being very desirable that I should secure the services of my Presiding Councillor, the Honourable R. B. Sullivan, a lawyer of considerable eminence, who of course could not devote to me his whole time for the councillor's salary of £100 a-year, I gave him an appointment, which, as he immediately quitted his profession, I requested might be confirmed. A technical objection was immediately raised in your Lordship's office to this recommendation; and, though I earnestly repeated it, Mr. Sullivan's appointment has not, at the expiration of fourteen months, even yet been confirmed.

I have now to proceed to your Lordship's despatch No. 200, dated 14th July, 1837, in which I learn that her Majesty's Attorney and Solicitor-General of this province, both of whom were lately appointed by me, have not been confirmed by your Lordship. My presiding Councillor, and both my law officers, thus stand at this moment before the public in the equivocal situation of having been countenanced by me, and being discountenanced by the Colonial Office, the moral of which evidently appears to the public to be, that her Majesty's Government has no confidence in the Lieutenant-Governor of this province.

My Lord, I refer with satisfaction to the despatch I had the honour to address to your Lordship on the subject of the late law appointments, as my conscience tells me that the difficult duty I was then called upon to perform was executed with caution, reflection, and strict impartiality.

With respect to the Attorney-General, whose feelings at this moment must be suffering severely from the indignity which has so publicly been offered to him, I find from your Lordship's despatch that, although it is admitted that as the late Solicitor-General of this province he (Mr. Hagerman) had a claim not to be passed over on the promotion of the Attorney-General, Mr. Jameson, to be Vice-Chancellor (an appointment which your Lordship has confirmed,) although your Lordship acknowledges Mr. Hagerman's public and private merit, as also that as Solicitor-General he has afforded me the utmost support and co-operation, yet, in spite of all this, and I must respectfully add, in spite of the shock which the marked disapproval of the Colonial Minister gives to my administration, yet Mr. Hagerman's promotion has been publicly stopped merely because, in some resolutions passed by the congregation of a single church, in a single town in this province, it was printed in a newspaper that, in a religious discussion in the House of Assembly, he uttered an opinion concerning the rights of the Church of Scotland which was illegal.

My Lord, the story of Mr. Hagerman's conduct on the great subject of the clergy reserves, was shortly as follows:—When that question was about to be brought before the Assembly, I foresaw it would give rise to a most angry debate, which would probably end in nothing. I, therefore, although I had no precise instructions on the subject, determined to use all the influence in my power to help the question to a conclusion; and I accordingly determined to recommend that the reserves should be divided among the churches of England, Scotland, Rome, and Wesleyan Methodists, in the proportions which the population of those great sects relatively bear to each other in the mother-country.

On submitting this abstract proposition to Mr. Hagerman, he at once assented to the church of England, the church of Scotland, and the Methodists sharing the reserves; but he avowed to me that, unless strong arguments were adduced, he could not conscientiously be the advocate of the Roman church. The more I argued in favour of that part of my proposition, the more did Mr. Hagerman urge his objections to it; and I can truly add, the more did I respect him for doing so. He firmly adhered to his opinion; but he concluded by observing, that, though he could not promise to vote in favour of the Catholics, yet, for my sake, he would retire from opposing their admission. I conceived that, on a question of conscience, Mr. Hagerman ought not to have done more than he did. However, after all, the proposal never came to a division.

Finding that party-feeling was running so high that it was impossible for any man breathing to guide it, I became of opinion that it would be prudent to abandon the contest, by placing the reserves at the disposal of his Majesty, or, in other words, by reinvesting them in the Crown. This proposition I explained to Mr. Hagerman, who brought it forward in the House of Assembly, advocated it most ably, and failed in carrying it only by one vote.

The great discussion having thus failed, it was, therefore, abandoned in despair by all parties; but a memorial was addressed to the House of Assembly by the ministers, elders, and congregation of Lancaster, in connection with the Church of Scotland, complaining that "there appeared to have been an organised system pursued by the different Provincial Administrations, of thwarting them in the attainment of their just and legal rights:" that the endowment of the fifty-seven rectories was "unjust, illegal, and unconstitutional;" and "that your memorialists complain especially of the power which the Act under which these rectories have been established gives to the Church of England, of lordling it over our consciences, and exercising a spiritual tyranny over us, to which, as conscientiously attached to the doctrine, discipline, and worship of the Presbyterian Church, we cannot submit."

It was impossible for any one acquainted with religious feelings which existed at that moment in the House of Assembly to read the language of this petition without foretelling that it would be productive of a violent religious debate; and, accordingly, as soon as the subject was broached the conflict began. Sometimes the Scotch got uppermost—sometimes the English—but what was ejaculated by either I believe no man living can declare. However, it happened that Mr. M'Kenzie's newspaper came out next day, and, as he is not only a Scotchman, but one of Mr. Hagerman's bitterest enemies, your Lordship may easily conceive that Mr. Hagerman's speech was purposely and mischievously made as offensive as possible to the Scotch. As I never do read the debates—which I know to be inaccurately reported—I have not the most distant idea of what was published on this subject, but I understand it was transferred from Mr. M'Kenzie's paper to others; and the consequence was, that the congregation of St. Andrew's Church, in the town of Kingston, at an evening meeting, passed ten resolutions, two of which censured the Solicitor-General, Mr. Hagerman, for the incorrect statements and intemperate language he had been declared to have uttered respecting the church and clergy of Scotland.*

I have now detailed to your Lordship Mr. Hagerman's conduct as regards the great question of the clergy reserves, and I cannot but feel most deeply the treatment he has received.

Mr. Hagerman's whole life in this province has been one of loyalty to his Sovereign, and of national attachment to the mother-country.

In the field, as well as on the floor of the House of Assembly, he has done his duty; and while the republican majority were against him, night after night was he seen fearlessly standing, as Solicitor General of the Province, against language which would have disheartened almost any man.

On the promotion of the Attorney General he naturally looked for distinction and reward; but it is sickening to the heart to observe that all his services have been forgotten, that he has been publicly discountenanced by the Government he had served, for no other reason than because, by some channel or other, a newspaper account of a common religious squabble was allowed to enter the Colonial Office! My Lord, this very man, McKenzie, who published the statement to which I allude, is known to every one to be the disseminator of falsehoods of the grossest description, and I have no hesitation in saying, that no man's character or promotion is safe in this Province if extracts from his newspaper are to be received at the Colonial Office as evidence of guilt.† But even supposing the speeches of the Members of the House of Assembly were correctly reported, surely it cannot be desirable to establish as a precedent that every word that in the heat of debate may be uttered by a member on the floor of that

* The words imputed to Mr. Hagerman—who denies to have uttered them—were: "The Church of England is the established Church; the Roman Catholic Church is an established Church; but the Church of Scotland is no more an established Church than any other dissenting body in the province."

† As a specimen of Mr. McKenzie's falsehoods, I may state that one morning while I was in Toronto, there appeared in his paper a detailed account of my having been taken before a magistrate in the province for horse-stealing. Minute circumstances were detailed, my examination was given, and eventually the words by which it was stated I had at last made myself known to the magistrate.

The story from beginning to end being a falsehood, Mr. M'Kenzie was asked how he could possibly have made such a statement, to which he answered, "Oh, it served my purpose!" which was, to circulate the libel in the back woods. It however went much farther, for it got into the London "Times" newspaper, and consequently went round the world.

House, flies to the Colonial Office, to arise in judgment against him, in case he be recommended for reward. But in this particular case of Mr. Hagerman's a most singular circumstance has occurred. The statement concerning the rectories submitted by your Lordship for opinion to the crown officers of England has completely overlooked Lord Bathurst's despatches, dated 2nd April, 1818, and 22nd July, 1825, which contain the very authority in question. The decision of the crown officers of England is consequently erroneous; and, in reading the despatches alluded to, your Lordship will at once perceive that what they declare to be "not valid or lawful" is in fact both one and the other. This error may throw the whole of this province into commotion; and I mention this circumstance as a strong proof that, as mistakes, even in deliberately written documents, must occasionally occur, how hard it is to punish the Attorney General of Upper Canada for an illegal opinion, which is merely reported in a newspaper to have escaped him in the anger of debate, and which after all he DENIES TO HAVE UTTERED.

I respectfully submit that your Lordship should look to the Lieutenant-Governor, and not to the editors of provincial newspapers, for the fitness and character of an Attorney-General to the Crown.

I have already stated to your Lordship, that I have only official acquaintance with Mr. Hagerman, but I deeply feel for him, because I know him to have served faithfully, and it is my duty to protect those who have honestly served the King's Government.

Of the Solicitor-General, W. H. Draper, who is also another public sufferer from this newspaper report, I have but little to say, as your Lordship has just had an opportunity of judging for yourself how far the description I had given to your Lordship of that gentleman was correct. He has said not one word to me on the subject of his appointment as Solicitor-General not having been confirmed, but I know that he must feel deeply mortified.

As far as regards my government, the non-confirmation of my law officers shakes it to the foundation—it encourages the republicans—it disheartens the constitutionalists.

The despatch in which your Lordship informs me of the reasons which have arrested the appointments of the Attorney and Solicitor General of this Province, concludes by your Lordship announcing to me the desire of Her Majesty's Government that Mr. Marshal Spring Bidwell, the leader of the republican party of this Province, should, contrary to my recommendation, be raised to the Bench!

My Lord, among the various difficult duties which I am called upon to perform, there is no one which requires cooler judgment than the impartial selection of individuals for office: the duty is at all times invidious, but there is no part of it more painful to my feelings than the bad custom which exists of giving a description of the various individuals to her Majesty's Government; and I have often almost determined to request that, so long as confidence be reposed in me, my appointments may be confirmed on the faith of my recommendation.

To describe behind his back the character of every individual selected for office, as well as rejected by me—to point out the qualifications of the one, and to record for ever the failings of the other—is an occupation revolting to my feelings; for, however violently a man may have opposed the King's Government, to paint all his faults, to delineate all his weaknesses, and to make accusations against him, which I know he has no power to contradict, is a service which I think no man of honour should ever be called upon to perform. In the case of Mr. Bidwell, I drew his character to your Lordship with a light, and I must say a feeling hand; I wished to avoid saying more of him than was absolutely necessary to show your Lordship that I had sufficient reasons for not having selected him for promotion.

I accordingly acknowledged Mr. Bidwell's ability and moral character, but added, "yet anxious as I am to give to talent its due, I cannot but feel that the welfare and honour of this Province depend on His Majesty never promoting a disloyal man."

"I therefore consider that publicly to elevate Mr. Bidwell to the Bench, would deprive me of the respect and confidence of the people of this Province."

I certainly considered that the whole tenor of my observations respecting Mr. Bidwell would have satisfied Her Majesty's Government that, in not selecting him for promotion, I had reluctantly performed a necessary duty; however, having failed in my expectations, I have now to detail to your Lordship circumstances respecting this gentleman, which it is most painful to me to record.

Mr. Bidwell's father, who was a prominent member in Congress, was long distinguished in the United States for his detestation of Great Britain. After having taken the oath of allegiance to the Republic, and of abjured allegiance to the Crown of England, it became necessary for him, on account of conduct which I need not relate, to abscond from justice; and being, in consequence, outlawed by the States, he became an inhabitant of Upper Canada.

On being called upon by Sir Gordon Drummond, during the invasion of this country by the Americans, to take the oath of allegiance to our Sovereign, he at first refused, claiming to be a natural-born British Subject; but it being resolutely required of him, he did so, protesting, however to the magistrate, that the oath was not binding, inasmuch as it had been compulsory; and, on being returned a member of the Provincial Parliament, he was expelled, and never re-elected. To the last hour of his life his hatred to the British Constitution was consistent and unchanged.

His principles were inherited by his son, whose talents, as your Lordship perfectly well knows, have been unceasingly exerted in endeavouring, by subverting the Constitution, to dethrone our Sovereign from this portion of his dominions. He has been the untired advocate of republican government, and by his ability, and by his eloquence, he rose to become the leader of the republican party, and eventually he became Speaker of the House of Assembly.

Whenever he had an opportunity of expressing his sentiments, they were in favour of an elective Legislative Council, of an Executive Council "responsible to the people"—and, just as I was arriving in Upper Canada, he declared in the House of Assembly, that "the King had insulted the Legislature by appointing Commissioners to enquire into the affairs of the province."

In his capacity of Speaker he delivered to me, to be transmitted to the King, one of the most insulting addresses that ever has been offered to the British Sovereign. It declared that I was "despotic," "tyrannical," "unjust," "deceitful," that my conduct had been "derogatory to the honour of the King," "demoralizing to the community," and that I had treated the people of this province as being "little better than a country of rogues and fools."

Not satisfied with this, Mr. Bidwell, on the last night of the session, presented to the House of Assembly a traitorous communication addressed to him from his fellow-labourer and colleague Mr. Speaker Papineau.

This letter impeached the King's ministers, accused your Lordship of "arrogance," termed the Royal Commissioners the King's "deceitful agents," and was altogether of a purely rebellious character. On my dissolving the parliament and appealing to the people of Upper Canada for redress, they completely overturned the republican party in general, and Mr. Bidwell in particular. In vain he attempted to retain his station, but he was driven by the people not only from the Speakership, but from the House of Assembly itself—in fact, he actually lost his election.

My Lord, the whole of the above facts are known to your Lordship, and yet in the very same despatch in which I learn that the promotion of her Majesty's Attorney and Solicitor-General has, after a whole life of loyalty and devotion to our Sovereign, been arrested, from a newspaper statement of an erroneous opinion said to have been uttered in the heat of a religious debate, I am informed that, in opposition to my recommendation to the contrary, it is the wish of Her Majesty's Government that Mr. Bidwell should be raised to the bench!

In my former despatch on this subject I submitted to your Lordship that "publicly to raise Mr. Bidwell to the bench would deprive me of the respect and confidence of the people of this province, the welfare and honour of which depended on his Majesty's never promoting a disloyal man."

To these principles and opinions I respectfully but unalterably adhere; and nothing is therefore left for me but to declare to your Lordship, with the deepest regret, that so long as I remain Lieutenant-Governor of this province, I will never raise Mr. Bidwell to the bench; and I think it proper to confess to your Lordship that I have at this moment two appointments to make of King's Counsel, neither of which can I, conscientiously, bestow upon that gentleman, who has not, as your Lordship seems to conceive, "at least for the present withdrawn himself from political strife," but who, in a moral conflict, has been forcibly driven from the field: Seeing that I have prevented him from becoming President of the republican state of Upper Canada, he might now, no doubt, be happy to become a judge under the monarchy. I know that he expresses his regret at having written to your Lordship a letter of accusation against me, which, when called upon by your Lordship's desire to furnish me with a copy of, he deemed it prudent to decline, but he has never yet publicly recanted his principles or disavowed his party, and his name is at this moment appearing uncontradicted in the Radical newspapers of this province as follows:—

“Resolved, that reposing the greatest confidence in our fellow citizens,—

John Rolph, M. P. P. (now an absconding traitor)

James Leslie,

James H. Price, } (notorious republicans)

John Edward Sims, and

Robert M'Kay, Esquires;

“We do hereby nominate and appoint them Members of the Provincial Convention for the city of Toronto; carried unanimously and by acclamation.”

I have now to reply to your Lordship's despatch, No. 158, dated 5th April, 1837, respecting Mr. G. Ridout, which involves constitutional principles of the same vital importance as those which relates to Mr. Bidwell.

Mr. Ridout's case is shortly as follows:—

On the 12th July, 1836, my Secretary addressed to Mr. Ridout a letter, of which the following is a copy:—

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

July 12th, 1836.

SIR,

I am commanded by the Lieutenant-Governor to call your attention to the enclosed printed address, which has lately been widely circulated by and “on behalf” of a society of which it appears you are an active member.

The Lieutenant-Governor desires me to observe that the language contained in that address has hitherto remained unnoticed by him only from his determination not to interfere with that public verdict which he felt confident the country would clearly express; but as the elections are over, his Excellency considers that in order to maintain the happy constitution of this province inviolate it is absolutely necessary, in obedience to the King's instructions, that no person should be permitted to retain any office of trust or confidence under the British Government, who attempts (however unsuccessfully) to insult the Lieutenant Governor of this province by language such as is contained in your society's address. His Excellency therefore deems it his painful duty to direct me to inform you that his Majesty has no further occasion for your services as Judge of the Niagara District Court and Justice of the Peace.

I have, &c.

J. JOSEPH.

“On the 12th September, 1836, I transmitted to your Lordship a Memorial from this gentleman, complaining that he had experienced unjust treatment from me, in having been dismissed from the situations of Judge of the District Court of Niagara, of Justice of the Peace, and Colonel of Militia. Conceiving that your Lordship had confidence in my character and judgment, and having neither time nor inclination to detail the many reasons which had induced me, after mature deliberation, to determine on Judge Ridout's dismissal, I deemed it sufficient merely to inform your Lordship

“That on the 27th March last Mr. George Ridout, heading the deputation, read that address to me from a public meeting held at the City Hall, by Dr. O'Grady, (Editor of the Correspondent and Advocate,) and others, which I forwarded to your Lordship on the 6th of April last, in my despatch No. 24.

Shortly afterwards Mr. Ridout made a declaration which became the subject of general conversation, that in the event of his being dismissed by me from office, “I should deserve to be tarred and feathered and that he would lend a hand to do so.”

“In one of the public offices at Toronto he declared that we must or should have “War to the knife.”

"Mr George Ridout was a frequent attendant as well as speaker at the Constitutional Reform Society, from which was widely circulated a printed address, signed by Dr. Baldwin, of which the following is an extract :

"It is our duty calmly to assure you that the conduct of Sir F. B. Head has been alike a disregard of constitutional Government and of candour and truth in his statements,"

"Mr. Ridout declares he is not a member of this society, yet from his frequent attendance and speaking at the meetings of this society before as well as after it had, for mere electioneering purpose, changed its name (only a few weeks ago) from the "Alliance" to the "Constitutional Reform Society," I felt I had a right to consider him as an active member. Previous, however, to declaring him to be such I took the precaution of obtaining a legal opinion on the subject, which was, that Mr. Ridout did appear to be an active member of the said society.

"It is perfectly true that old Mr. Ridout was a loyal gentlemanlike, and estimable man, and it was from a benevolent desire to reclaim Mr. George Ridout, his son, from Radical principles, that the situations he held were successively heaped upon him by Sir Peregrine Maitland and by Sir John Colborne; but the more he was favoured, the more violent he became, and when a judge and colonel of militia he talked about tarring and feathering the King's representative, and I considered it was my duty to inform him that his Majesty had no further occasion for his services.

"I may add, that shortly after my arrival here, I myself took a great deal of trouble to endeavour to reclaim Mr. George Ridout, and kindly persuade him of his errors, but in vain."

In reply to the above communication, which contained an outline of the charges against Mr. Ridout, as well as what he has alleged in his defence, your Lordship was pleased to command me to replace Mr. Ridout in the various employments from which he had been removed. It being utterly impossible for me to obey this order, and retain my authority in the province, I immediately addressed to your Lordship a very long despatch, No. 13, dated 5th February, 1837, to which I particularly beg leave to refer your Lordship, that far from having acted hastily, I had not dismissed Judge Ridout until I had consulted and received the concurrent advice of the Attorney-General of this province, as also of my Executive Council.

I also referred your Lordship to an extraordinary document in my favour, transmitted by the House of Assembly not only to your Lordship but to both Houses of the Imperial Parliament, of which the following is an extract:—"Few Governors of a colony were ever placed in circumstances of greater difficulty than those which assailed Sir Francis Head within three months of his assuming the government of this province; and it is perhaps not too much to say, that no man could have met those difficulties, ungenerously and unreasonably thrown in his way, with more temper, firmness, and judgment, than he did."

My despatch contained many other documents, all supporting me in the course I had adopted; however, after having maturely considered this evidence, your Lordship was pleased again to reply, that you "felt it your duty still to withhold your approbation of the measures adopted in Mr. Ridout's case."

It is useless for me to presume to argue any longer with your Lordship, or with Mr. Ridout, on this subject, Mr. Ridout resting his whole defence upon two quibbles:—1st, That he was not a member of the Constitutional Reform Society, which I have always admitted, having merely said that, by constantly attending and speaking there, he appeared to be a member; and, 2nd, That he opposed the name of the society being changed from the "Alliance Society" to the "Constitutional Reform Society;"—which latter argument, as I have already explained to your Lordship, is the same as if a clergyman, on being expelled by his bishop for attending an irreligious meeting, were to prove that he had opposed the society becoming deistical, because he wished it to remain atheistical.

I have no further accusations to make against Mr. Ridout; I have nothing further to urge against what he has said in his defence, but having, as Lieutenant-Governor, by the advice of my Council, deliberately selected him for punishment, as the most intemperate of my opponents, I feel it necessary, as in the case of Mr. Bidwell, respectfully, but explicitly, to declare to your Lordship, that, so long as I am deemed competent to be Lieutenant-Governor of this province, I decline to have any further communication with Mr. Ridout, and must decline to restore him to the stations from which I have removed him.

My Lord, I have many similar subjects to those which I have already introduced, but will trouble your Lordship with only one more, namely, your Lordship's despatch of the 6th June, 1837, in which I am censured by your Lordship for not having sent Mr. — with my despatches respecting the monetary affairs of Upper Canada, instead of the Honourable W. H. Draper, a member of my Executive Council.

Your Lordship is already aware that Mr. — as a member of my late Executive Council, signed that hostile document which involved me in one of the greatest struggles recorded in the colonial Office, and that he was subsequently appointed, by the late House of Assembly, as an associate with Mr. Bidwell and others, to meet Mr. Papineau and others, on the part of Lower Canada.

I have never complained to your Lordship of Mr. —, or have ever shown him any feeling of hostility; but to have selected him out of the whole province as my messenger to your Lordship, in preference to the confidential members of my own Council, would have been an act of inconsistency, which would have deprived me of the confidence of this country.

It was with regret I observed that, after I had sent from Upper Canada to your Lordship Mr. Draper, as a member of my government, possessing my confidence, that that gentleman should have been allowed to return without being the bearer to me of a single line from your Lordship on the subject of his especial mission, or any other subject, and yet that despatches, in which Mr. Draper himself was particularly concerned and even named, were given to a military officer who was a passenger in the very same packet with Mr. Draper.

It is perfectly well known in your Lordship's office that in a colony very considerable importance is assumed by any one who has the honour to be bearer of your Lordship's despatches to the Lieutenant-Governor, and I need not say that these despatches having been withheld from my Executive Councillor, and given to another, forms one of the proceedings of the Colonial Department, which, to the people of this province, appears as if it were intended to discountenance my administration.

My Lord, I have now finished my statement, and although I am sensible it may offend your Lordship, yet I have the consolation of reflecting that I have acted on the defensive solely for the benefit of this noble province.

I have no complaints whatever to make against your Lordship, whose intentions I am perfectly confident are pure and just; but it is impossible for me to observe the support which, not only in this province, but elsewhere, is invariably given to the republican party, and the discouragement which is shown to the supporters of the British constitution, without becoming of opinion, that in the Colonial Office an invisible republican influence exists under which Governor after Governor has succumbed.

It may be said that no one of the statements I have made, taken separately, supports so serious an accusation, and freely I admit it; but I ask your Lordship to consider whether the innumerable official obstructions which I have found in my path could all possibly have come there by chance?

Whatever may be the opinion of her Majesty's Government on this subject, I do declare to your Lordship that I join the loyal British population of the Canadas in believing that such obstructions have been intentional, and that any Governor who acts as I have done, although he may receive honours from his sovereign, and thanks from the Colonial Minister, will experience, as I have done, an intangible power which, though it never looks him in the face, will unequivocally decree,—

"I will drain him dry as hay—
Sleep shall neither night nor day
Hang upon his pent-house lid;
He shall live a man forbid;
Weary seven nights nine times nine,
Shall he dwindle, peak, and pine."

My Lord, I can truly say that my spirits, as well as my strength, are worn out by the minute vexations I have met with, and among them there is nothing that I feel more deeply than the mortification which those who have faithfully served the King's Government are now feeling at the non-confirmation of their appointments. I am not, however, writing under the influence of temper, but my judgment calmly warns me that it is impossible for any government on earth to be carried on without the maintenance of a firm and consistent system of rewards and punishments, and that, if the Colonial Office reward those I punish, and punish those whom I reward, my authority here, as well as my character, must be ruined.

I have not been hasty either in my opinions or in my measures, for from the moment of my arrival to the present day, my despatches have invariably expressed to your Lordship sentiments such as are contained in the following extract, which was addressed to your Lordship seventeen months ago.

"It is out of my power to describe to your Lordship, without the appearance of exaggeration, the joy and gladness expressed to me by all parties at the constitutional resistance I have made. But I will not conceal from your Lordship that there is one question at this moment in almost everybody's mouth, namely, 'Will the Lieutenant-Governor be supported by the Home Government?' 'HE NEVER WILL!' say the Radicals; 'WE FEAR HE WILL NOT!' say the Constitutionalists.

"Your Lordship has to settle this question; and, in my humble opinion, upon your decision rests our possession of the Canadas."

With the deepest regret, I have at last been driven deliberately to refuse to carry into effect your Lordship's instructions, and having done so, and having avowed opinions hostile to the colonial policy, but which I can assure your Lordship are accompanied with no angry feelings towards any man, I feel it to be a duty which I owe to your Lordship, as well as to myself, respectfully to request that your Lordship will be pleased immediately to tender to her Majesty my resignation of the station which I have the honour to hold.

My Lord, I belong to no political party in England; and even if I did, the British distinction between Whig and Tory, like our London fog, does not cross the Atlantic. The two parties here are constitutionalists on the one side, and democrats on the other. The dispute on this continent is not, as it is in England, which of two parties shall attain the honour of conducting the government of their sovereign; but here the great mass of society is striving to secure to their children the blessings of the British constitution, which a small party, from self-interested motives, is endeavouring to pull down. The idle, the profligate, and the unprincipled, see that democracy in the United States is rapidly hurrying to anarchy, and they well know, or rather they reckon, that anarchy, or in other words, plunder, is the shortest method of obtaining wealth.

I have with attention personally observed the effects of democracy in both continents of America, and, having reason to feel deeply attached to the people of Upper Canada, I have determined for their welfare to do all in my humble power to arrest a course of policy which in my opinion has long tended to the subversion on this continent of British institutions.

No one can read an account of the early stages of the American Revolution, without being struck with the resemblance of much that we now witness to that unfortunate period of our history.

It was then a capital error in the Government of the mother-country, that they seemed to believe the Americans to be sincerely contending for the single object of freedom from taxation by the British Parliament, and they imagined that by renouncing that power, and by disabling themselves (by 18 Geo. III.) from raising money in the Colonies, even for the necessary support of the Government, they would overcome all difficulties. But it was soon evident that the outcry raised about taxation was but the means to another end. Separation from the mother-country was, from the first, the self-interested object of the few ruling demagogues who gave the impulse; and they persevered just as resolutely after the ostensible ground of difference had been renounced as before. The Government soon learnt that their measures of conciliation availed them nothing.

So here, in our time, the Government has gone back step by step for years, giving ground before the pretensions of Mr. Papineau and the Assembly, however insolently advanced; weakening by each concession the confidence of the King's loyal and attached subjects, and encouraging as well as strengthening an unprincipled faction avowedly hostile to British rule. No approach to an amicable adjustment has followed any or all of these concessions. On the contrary, they have been so many unprofitable sacrifices of principles and usages necessary to the maintenance of good government, and at the last an end is arrived at, when the King's Ministers are reduced to choose between an unequivocal and direct violation of the Colonial Constitution, or an abandonment of the power of governing. A firm determination early evinced to yield nothing to clamour, to surrender nothing for the mere sake of conciliation, would have secured to the Government the respect of all classes, and would have averted the necessity of resorting to measures which admit in principle of no defence.

Whatever may have been the brilliant theory of subverting the British Constitution in America, we who are living on this continent clearly see before our eyes its effects; namely, that in the United States the will of the people has become stronger than the power of the law. Public credit, life, and property hang therefore upon the conduct of a dense mass of men, in no one of whose hands can it be wise that such vast interests should be committed.—The only remedy is in a revolution, of which it is easier to foresee the beginning than the end.

To save the people of Upper Canada from following in the footsteps of the United States, has been the object of every act of my administration.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's

Most obedient Servant,

F. B. HEAD.

No. 132.

TORONTO, 19th December 1837.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to inform your Lordship that on Monday, 4th inst. this city was, in a moment of profound peace, suddenly invaded by a band of armed rebels, amounting, according to report, 3000 men (but in actual fact to about 500,) and commanded by Mr. M'Kenzie, the editor of a republican newspaper; Mr. Van Egmond, an officer who had served under Napoleon, Mr. Gibson, a land-surveyor; Mr. Lount, a blacksmith; Mr. Loydd, and some other notorious characters.

Having, as I informed your Lordship in my despatch, No. 119, dated 3rd ultimo, purposely effected the withdrawal of her Majesty's troops from this province, and having delivered over to the civil authorities the whole of the arms and accoutrements I possessed, I of course found myself without any defence whatever, excepting that which the loyalty and fidelity of the province might think proper to afford me. The crisis, important as it was, was one I had long earnestly anticipated, and accordingly I no sooner received the intelligence that the rebels were within four miles of the city, than, abandoning the Government House, I at once proceeded to the City Hall, in which about 4000 stand of arms and accoutrements had been deposited.

One of the first individuals I met there, with a musket on his shoulder, was the Chief Justice of the province, and in a few minutes I found myself surrounded by a band of brave men, who were of course unorganized, and generally speaking, unarmed.

As the foregoing statement is an unqualified admission on my part that I was completely surprised by the rebels, I think it proper to remind, rather than to explain to your Lordship, the course of policy I have been pursuing.

In my despatch, No. 124, dated 18th ult., I respectfully stated to your Lordship, as my opinion, that a civil war must henceforward everywhere be a moral one, and that, in this hemisphere in particular, victory must eventually declare itself in favour of moral, and not of physical preponderance.

Entertaining these sentiments, I observed with satisfaction that Mr. M'Kenzie was pursuing a lawless course of conduct which I felt it would be impolitic for me to arrest.

For a long time he had endeavoured to force me to buoy him up by a Government prosecution, but he sunk in proportion as I neglected him, until becoming desperate, he was eventually driven to reckless behaviour, which I felt confident would very soon create its own punishment.

The traitorous arrangements he made were of that minute nature that it would have been difficult, even if I had desired it, to have suppressed them; for instance, he began by establishing union lists (in number not exceeding forty) of persons desirous of political reform; and who, by an appointed secretary, were recommended to communicate regularly with himself, for the purpose of establishing a meeting of delegates.

As soon as, by most wicked misrepresentations, he had succeeded in seducing a number of well-meaning people to join these squads, his next step was to prevail upon a few of them to attend their meetings armed, for the alleged purpose of firing at a mark.

While these meetings were in continuence, Mr. M'Kenzie, by means of his newspaper, and by constant personal attendance, succeeded in inducing his adherents to believe that he was everywhere strongly supported, and that his means, as well as his forces, would prove invincible.

I was not ignorant of these proceedings; and in proportion as Mr. M'Kenzie's paper became more and more seditious, and in proportion as these armed meetings excited more and more alarm, I was strongly and repeatedly called upon by the peaceable portion of the community forcibly to suppress both the one and the other. I considered it better, however, under all circumstances, to await the outbreak, which I was confident would be impotent, inversely as it was previously opposed; in short, I considered that, if an attack by the rebels was inevitable, the more I encouraged them to consider me defenceless the better.

Mr. M'Kenzie, under these favourable circumstances, having been freely permitted by me to make every preparation in his power, a concentration of his deluded adherents, and an attack upon the city of Toronto, was secretly settled to take place on the night of the 19th instant. However, in consequence of a militia general order which I issued, it was deemed advisable that these arrangements should be hurried, and, accordingly, Mr. M'Kenzie's deluded victims, travelling through the forest by cross-roads, found themselves assembled, at about four o'clock in the evening of Monday, the 4th instant, as rebels, at Montgomery's Tavern, which is on the Young Street Macadamized road, about four miles from the city.

As soon as they had attained this position, Mr. M'Kenzie and a few others, with pistols in their hands, arrested every person on the road, in order to prevent information reaching the town. Colonel Moody, a distinguished veteran officer, accompanied by three gentlemen on horseback, on passing Montgomery's Tavern, was fired at by the rebels, and I deeply regret to say that the Colonel, wounded in two places, was taken prisoner into the tavern, where in three hours he died, leaving a widow and family unprovided for.

As soon as this gallant, meritorious officer, who had honourably fought in this province, fell, I am informed that Mr. M'Kenzie exultingly observed to his followers, "That, as blood had now been spilled, they were in for it, and had nothing left but to advance." Accordingly, at about ten o'clock at night they did advance; and I was in bed and asleep when Mr. Alderman Powell awakened me to state that, in riding out of the city towards Montgomery's Tavern, he had been arrested by Mr. M'Kenzie and another principal leader; that the former had snapped a pistol at his breast; that his (Mr. Powell's) pistol also snapped, but that he fired a second, which, causing the death of Mr. M'Kenzie's companion, had enabled him to escape.

As soon as Mr. Powell reached Toronto, the alarm-bell was rung, and, as Mr. M'Kenzie found we might be prepared for him, he forbore to proceed with his attack.

On arriving at the City Hall I appointed Mr. Justice Jones, Mr. Henry Sherwood, Captain Strachan, and Mr. John Robinson, my aid-de-camps. I then ordered the arms to be unpacked, and, manning all the windows of the building, as well as those of opposite houses which flanked it, we awaited the rebels, who, as I have stated, did not consider it advisable to advance. Besides these arrangements, I despatched a message to the Speaker of the House of Assembly, Colonel the Honourable Allan M'Nab, of the Gore District, and to the Colonels of the militia regiments in the Midland and Newcastle Districts: an advanced piquet of thirty volunteers, commanded by my aid-de-camp, Mr. Justice Jones, was placed within a short distance of the rebels.

By the following morning (Tuesday) we mustered about 300 men, and in the course of the day the number increased to about 500; in the night, an advanced picquet, commanded by Mr. Sheriff Jarvis, was attacked within the precincts of the city by the rebels, who were driven back, one of their party being killed and several wounded.

On Wednesday morning we were sufficiently strong to have ventured on an attack, but, being sensible of the strength of our position, being also aware how much depended upon the contest in which we were about to be engaged, and feeling the greatest possible reluctance at the idea of entering upon a civil war, I despatched two gentlemen to the rebel leaders, to tell them that, before any conflict should take place, I parently called upon them, as their Governor, to avoid the effusion of human blood. In the mean while, however, Mr. M'Kenzie had committed every description of enormity; he had robbed the mail with his own hands,—had set fire to Dr. Horne's house,—had plundered many inoffensive individuals of their money,—had stolen several horses,—had made a number of respectable people prisoners; and, having thus succeeded in embarking his misguided adherents in guilt, he replied to my admonition by a message, that he would only consent that his demands should be settled by a national convention, and he insolently added that he would wait till two o'clock for my answer, which in one word was, "Never."

In the course of Wednesday the Speaker of the House of Assembly, Colonel the Honourable Allan M'Nab, arrived from the Gore District at the head of about sixty men, whom he had assembled at half an hour's notice; and, other brave men flocking in to me from various directions, I was enabled by strong piquets to prevent Mr. M'Kenzie from carrying into effect his diabolical intention to burn the city of Toronto, in order to plunder the banks; and, having effected this object, I determined that, on the following day I would make the attack.

Accordingly, on Thursday morning, I assembled our forces, under the direction of the Adjutant-General of militia, Colonel Fitzgibbon, clerk of the House of Assembly.

The principal body was headed by the Speaker, Colonel Allan M'Nab, the right wing being commanded by Colonel Samuel Jarvis, the left by Colonel William Chisholm, assisted by the Honourable Mr. Justice M'Lean, late Speaker of the House of Assembly; the two guns by Major Carfrae of the militia artillery.

The command of the militia left in the city remained under Mr. Justice Macaulay, and the protection of of the city with Mr. Gurnett, the mayor.

I might also have most advantageously availed myself in the field of the military services of Colonel Foster, the Commander of the forces in Upper Canada, of Captain Baddeley of the corps of Royal Engineers, and of a detachment of eight artillerymen, who form the only regular force in this province; but, having deliberately determined that the important contest in which I was about to be engaged should be decided solely by the Upper Canada militia, or, in other words, by the free inhabitants of this noble province, I was resolved that no consideration whatever should induce me to avail myself of any other assistance than that upon which, as the representative of our gracious Sovereign, I had firmly and implicitly relied.

At twelve o'clock the militia force marched out of the town, with an enthusiasm which it would be impossible to describe, and in about an hour we came in sight of the rebels, who occupied an elevated position near Gallows Hill, in front of Montgomery's tavern, which had long been the rendezvous of Mr. M'Kenzie's men. They were principally armed with rifles, and for a short time favoured by buildings, they endeavoured to maintain their ground; however, the brave and loyal militia of Upper Canada, steadily advancing with a determination which was irresistible, drove them from their position, completely routed Mr. M'Kenzie, who, in a state of the greatest agitation ran away, and in a few minutes Montgomery's tavern, which was first entered by Mr. Justice Jones, was burnt to the ground.

Being on the spot merely as a civil Governor, and in no way in command of the troops, I was happy to have an opportunity of demonstrating to the rebels the mildness and beneficence of her Majesty's Government, and, well knowing that the laws of the country would have ample opportunity of making examples of the guilty, I deemed it advisable to save the prisoners who were taken, and to extend to most of these misguided men the royal mercy, by ordering their immediate release. These measures having been effected, and the rebels having been deprived of their flag (on which was inscribed in large letters

"BIDWELL, and the glorious minority!
"1837, and a good beginning!")

the militia advanced in pursuit of the rebels about four miles, till they reached the house of one of the principle ringleaders, Mr. Gibson, which residence it would have been impossible to have saved, and it was consequently burned to the ground.*

The infatuated followers of Mr. M'Kenzie were now completely dispersed; deceived and deserted by their leaders, they sought for refuge in all directions; ashamed and disgusted with the murder, arson, highway and mail robbery, which he had committed before their eyes, and detesting him for the overbearing tyranny of his conduct towards them, they sincerely repented they had ever joined him; and I have been credibly informed that their wives and children now look upon Mr. M'Kenzie as their most malignant enemy. Mr. M'Kenzie has fled to the United States—Mr. John Rolph has absconded—Mr. Bidwell,* who took no part in the affray, has amicably agreed with me to quit, and has quitted this province for ever—Dr. Morrison and the Captain Van Egmont are our prisoners—Mr. Lount and Mr. Gibson have fled, and I understand are making for the United States. As Mr. M'Kenzie had been particularly active in disseminating his principles throughout the London District, and as Dr. Duncombe, well known to the House of Commons in England, was reported to be there with a body of armed rebels, I deemed it advisable, as soon as the militia returned to Toronto from driving Mr. M'Kenzie from Gallows Hill, to order a body of 500 men to proceed immediately to the London District. I placed this corps under the command of the Hon. the Speaker of the House of Assembly, Colonel Allan M'Nab, who, with great promptitude, marched with it to the point of its destination.

On the day of Mr. M'Kenzie's defeat, as well as on the following morning, bands of militia-men, from all directions, poured in upon me, in numbers which honourably proved that I had not placed confidence in them in vain.

From the Newcastle District alone 2000 men, with nothing but the clothes in which they stood, marched, in the depth of winter, towards the capital, although nearly 100 miles from their homes.

From the Gore, Niagara, Lake Simcoe, and from various other places, brave men, armed as well as unarmed, rushed forward unsolicited; and, according to the best reports I could collect, from 10 to 12,000 men simultaneously marched towards the capital to support me in maintaining for the people of Upper Canada the British Constitution.

The numbers which were advancing towards me were so great that, the day after Mr. M'Kenzie's defeat, I found it absolutely necessary to print and circulate a notice declaring "that there existed no further occasion for the resort of militia to Toronto;" and the following day I was farther enabled to issue a general order, authorising the whole of the militia of the Bathurst, Johnstown, Ottawa, and Eastern districts, to go and lend their assistance to Lower Canada. I have now completed a plain statement of the events which have occurred in this noble province during the last week, and have done so at some length, as the moral they offer is most important.

Your Lordship knows that at the last election Mr. M'Kenzie, and those of his party who advocated murder, plunder, equal rights, and revolution, under the mask of reform, in vain applied to farmers and yeomen of this country to support them, instead of supporting me. Driven by the voice of the people from their seats in the House of Assembly, they declared that they had only been defeated by the influence of a corrupt Government. However, the moment the charges made against me in the House of Commons reached this country, the House of Assembly deliberately investigated the whole affair, which they proved and pronounced to be a series of wilful and premeditated falsehoods.

Mr. M'Kenzie and his party, finding that at every point they were defeated in a moral attack which they had made upon the British constitution, next determined to excite their deluded adherents to have recourse to physical strength. Being as ready to meet them on that ground as I had been ready to meet them in a moral struggle, I gave them every possible advantage. I in no way availed myself of the immense resources of the British empire; on the contrary, I purposely dismissed from this province the whole of our troops. I allowed Mr. M'Kenzie to write what he choose, say what he chose, and do what he chose; and, without taking any notice of his traitorous proceedings, I waited, with folded arms, until he had collected his rebel forces, and had actually commenced his attack.

I then, as a solitary individual, called upon the militia of Upper Canada to defend me, and the result has been as I have stated, viz., that the people of Upper Canada, came to me when I called them; that they completely defeated Mr. M'Kenzie's adherents, and drove him and his rebel ringleaders from the land.

(When her Majesty's Government published this despatch, they omitted the following paragraphs and words printed in italics):—

* The gentleman whom I had been directed to raise to the bench.

* " These are historical facts which it is impossible to deny; and the plain inference is, that the inhabitants of Upper Canada, as I have often publicly declared, detest democracy, and revere the noble monarchical institutions of the British Empire.

" My Lord, what a serious lesson have the inhabitants of Upper Canada offered to their mother-country! Our evidence, humble as it is, will surely bring conviction to the minds of those misnamed reformers, who, ignorant of the blessings they enjoy, desire to adulterate the purity of our revered institutions: situated as we are here, surely we are better able to judge between monarchical and republican Government than the people in England, who are acquainted only with the former. The faithful attachment which this province has evinced to British justice, to British juries and to the British Sovereign, is the noblest instance of independence I have ever witnessed, and it induces me to tell your Lordship, plainly and unequivocally, that neither the Legislature nor the people of Upper Canada will any longer submit to the base conciliations which have long disgraced the Colonial Office.

" My Lord, it has long been notorious to every British subject in the Canadas, that your Lordship's Under-Secretary, the author of our Colonial despatches, is a rank republican. His sentiments, his conduct, and his political character, are here alike detested, and I enclose to your Lordship Mr. M'Kenzie's last newspaper, which, traitorous as it is, contains nothing more conducive to treason than the extracts which as its text it exultingly quotes from the published opinions of her Majesty's Under Secretary of State for the Colonies!

" These sentiments have already been very clearly expressed by me to your Lordship, especially in my despatch dated 10th September, 1837; and I am perfectly confident that the triumph which this noble province has gained will never be complete until the Government shall remove from office a man who, by discouraging the loyal and encouraging the disaffected, has at last succeeded in involving the Canadas in civil war." It now only remains for me to inform your Lordship that Mr. M'Kenzie, who is escaped to Buffalo, in the United States, has by falsehood and misrepresentations, almost succeeded in exciting a large body of labourers out of work to invade Upper Canada for the purpose of plundering the banks and of gaining possession of the crown lands, [which your Lordship is aware I have been desired to surrender to the Provincial Legislature.] This [new feature in "reform"] is [one which] at this moment [is] causing throughout the province considerable excitement, and I must say that, for the sake of humanity, I earnestly trust and hope the attempt will not be made.

I entertain the utmost reliance that the Government of the United States will nobly prevent any such invasion. I am persuaded that all Americans of intelligence and propriety will feel that the character of their country requires them to discountenance a lawless and unprincipled aggression [which would bring upon them the execration of the civilised world; for where would they stand in the estimation of mankind if they were to be seen, ungratefully repaying the high-minded and successful exertions which Great Britain lately made to save them from war, by steeping her colonies in blood and misery?]

Should, however, any of the inhabitants of Buffalo, or other frontier towns, regardless of these sentiments, [presume,] for the sake of plunder, to invade the free and independent people of Upper Canada, I feel confident that every man in the province, Indians and black population included, will assemble together in one band to exterminate the invaders, or to perish in the attempt.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship a copy of the speech with which I have this day opened the Legislature of this province, together with copies of sundry documents, which will explain to your Lordship—firstly, that the rebellion which has broken out here has been effectually put down, with the loss on the side of the Constitutionists of only one man killed; and, secondly, that an unprovoked attack has been made upon our territory by American Citizens, who have succeeded in taking possession of Navy Island (which is about two miles above the cataract,) have entrenched and garrisoned it, have planted thirteen pieces of cannon upon it, and in fact, have thus formed a camp upon our territory, to which people, by handbills termed proclamations of the Provisional Government, are publicly invited under the promise that "three hundred acres of the most valuable land in Canada, and one hundred dollars in silver, will be given to each volunteer who may join the Patriot forces in Navy Island."

I have communicated these facts to His Excellency the Earl of Gosford, and to Sir John Colborne, and have addressed communications to the Governor of the State of New York, and to her Majesty's Minister at Washington, copies of which I have the honour to enclose. I have stationed a militia force of about 2000 men on the Niagara frontier, and have made all the arrangements in my power for calling out the militia of the province, in case their services should be required.

Having thus done all in my power to withstand the invasion of a foreign enemy, which was never contemplated in my despatch to your Lordship, No. 124, dated 18th November, I feel it my duty to recommend, contrary to the suggestions contained in that despatch, that her Majesty's Government should afford to the Commander of the Forces every possible assistance, promptly and affectually, to put down this attack by American Citizens, unauthorised by their Government, and in open violation of the laws of nations.

NIAGARA FRONTIER, UPPER CANADA,
16th January, 1838.

MY LORD,

I have great pleasure in communicating to your Lordship that the pirates have been driven from Navy Island, which is now in possession of her Majesty's forces on this frontier.

I have also the satisfaction to state that the gallant militia of Upper Canada have also driven the pirates, who had taken possession of Bois Blanc Island, from that position, and in a most gallant manner have captured a schooner off Malden, which is on the St. Clair river, about sixteen miles below Amherstburg.

As this vessel contained three pieces of artillery, 200 stand of arms, and most of the principal officers of the pirate force, her loss will discourage them; and, finding that at both ends of the province they have been discomfited by its brave inhabitants, I trust they will find it necessary to abandon the infamous attempt, which has been made by the citizens of the United States, to plunder the property and overrun the institutions of a province with which they were, politically, existing in friendly alliance.

CHAPTER X.

Order back the Militia.—Address the Governor of the State of New York.—H. S. Fox, Esq, Her Majesty's Minister at Washington.—Despatch to Her Majesty's Government.—American pirates forced to abandon Navy Island.—Receive Despatch accepting my resignation.—Important reply thereto.—Allegations against one of Her Majesty's Under-Secretaries of State for the Colonies.—Nature of evidence.

By people in England I have been generally blamed for allowing treason to come to a head. But the fact is, the province had suffered quite enough from agitation: and, as I had carefully tested the materials with which I had to work, I felt that, instead of either trying to conciliate Mr. M'Kenzie, or make his fortune by a Government prosecution, I had better let him come within the reach of the law and then let it hang him. His legs saved him from the latter fate; but so faithfully did the brave and loyal militia of Upper Canada respond to the confidence that had been reposed in them, that the insurrection was no sooner quelled than we were threatened with being absolutely overwhelmed at Toronto by those who were rushing forward to die, if necessary, in defence of monarchical institutions. The general order already alluded to was accordingly instantly promulgated, besides which, expresses were sent in all directions, of which the following is a specimen :—

SIR, No. 14.

Enclosed I send you a copy of his Excellency's order issued after the defeat of the rebels, to prevent the recourse of the immense number of loyalists flocking to the capital. They are not now required; and his Excellency being informed that you are upon your march to this place, with a body of fine fellows, I am desired to express to you and your men the high sense his Excellency entertains of your loyalty and zeal, and to thank you and your men for this evidence of their determination to put down rebellion, and to desire that you will return to your respective homes, holding yourselves in readiness to act when called upon.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your obedient servant,

JONAS JONES,

A. D. C.

COLONEL M'DONELL,
2nd Northumberland Militia.

The following despatches, written on the exigency of the moment, will, I believe, faithfully portray the hydra-headed difficulties which the loyalty of the people of Upper Canada, one after another, triumphantly overcame.

No. 31.

To his Excellency Governor Marcy, State of New York, Albany.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
13th December, 1837.

SIR,

Your Excellency has doubtless received intelligence, though not of an authentic character, of an insurrectionary movement which within the last few days has been made in this province, and which the loyal feeling of a great mass of her Majesty's subjects has enabled me promptly to suppress. Though an occurrence of this particular nature in a country immediately adjoining the state under your Excellency's government must naturally excite a considerable degree of interest, I might not have felt myself called upon to communicate with your Excellency upon the subject, if I had not received an official report from the magistracy of the district of Niagara, that efforts are made by calling public meetings in Buffalo to procure countenance and support among the inhabitants of that city to the efforts of the disaffected in Upper Canada.

I am perfectly persuaded that, under any circumstances, the public authorities in the United States would exert themselves to strengthen, rather than to disturb, the kind feeling which has for so many years united the natives of Great Britain and the United States in the most amicable relations; and when I acquaint your Excellency that the armed party of traitors who are now dispersed, during the few days that they remained embodied, were guilty of such unprovoked and wanton acts of murder, arson, and robbery, as disgusted their adherents, and occasioned their rapid desertion, I feel no doubt that whatever may be justly done by the Government of one friendly and enlightened nation towards restraining its subjects from disturbing the peace and injuring the unoffending inhabitants of another, may confidently be expected of your Excellency.

It is fit I should apprise your Excellency that there is not at this moment to my knowledge, within the whole extent of Upper Canada, a single body of men assembled with arms, or otherwise in opposition to the Government. Before the 6th of December there had been about 500 or 600 men hastily got together, at the instigation of a Mr. M'Kenzie, the editor of a seditious newspaper here; but these have been wholly dispersed, and their leader, we understand, is now in Buffalo, endeavouring to excite there a support which he fails to meet with in this province.

I have the honour to be,

Your Excellency's most obedient,
humble servant,

TORONTO, 23rd December, 1837.

DEAR SIR,

I take the liberty of introducing to your Excellency the Honourable Archibald McLean, late Speaker of the House of Assembly of this province, who is the bearer of a communication from me to her Britannic Majesty's Minister at Washington, on the same subject on which I had the honour to address your Excellency on the 13th instant; a copy of which communication Mr McLean takes to Washington.

Mr. McLean will inform your Excellency, that the party of Americans who, under the command of Mr. VanRensalaer, have taken possession of Navy Island, have issued a proclamation, hoisting in Canada the flag of independence, offering a reward of five hundred pounds for my apprehension, with three hundred acres of our crown lands to every volunteer who will join in the invasion of this province.

I have not yet had the pleasure of hearing from your Excellency (which, indeed, time has not admitted of,) but I feel confident your Excellency will, by the most energetic means, put an immediate stop to proceedings, which must otherwise inevitably lead to a national contest.

Mr. McLean will have the honour to submit to your Excellency any further information which you may desire.

I remain, with much consideration,

Your Excellency's,

Very faithful and obedient servant,

*To His Excellency Henry S. Fox, Washington.*GOVERNMENT HOUSE, TORONTO, 23rd December, 1837.

SIR,

I beg leave to introduce to your Excellency, the Honourable Archibald McLean, late Speaker of the House of Assembly of this province, and now one of its Judges.

My official communication will explain the object of his mission, which, I regret to say, is, I conceive, of a very alarming nature.

The little outbreak in this province has been completely put down by the people themselves, for I had no other assistance. But the case has assumed a new feature. A number of American citizens of wealth and intelligence are desirous to get possession of this fine province, and to swamp our institutions; they willingly afford money, and as thousands of people are every where out of work in the United States, an invasion may be made, which it would be out of our feeble power to resist.

I trust I am not apt to be unreasonably alarmed, but I can sincerely assure you that, unless the American Government take immediate measures to put down the invasion of this territory by force of arm, I think the worst will happen.

A body of Americans, headed by an American, have now, with about 700 men, taken possession of Navy Island, which belongs to Great Britain. They have issued there a proclamation declaring the independence of Canada; have offered a reward of five hundred pounds for my apprehension; and 300 acres of the richest lands of the crown to whoever will volunteer to assist them in invading this territory.

The people of the United States are so excited on the subject, and so ripe for plunder, that no words or writing will, in my opinion, stop them. I consider that the United States Government must either put down the aggression by force, or be held responsible for the consequences.

I remain, with great consideration,

Your obedient servant,

SIR,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch, No. 99, of the 10th September last.

I will not conceal from you the surprise with which I have perused that despatch, nor my sense of the degree of public inconvenience likely to ensue from so abrupt a termination of your administration of the affairs of Upper Canada, at a period when the result of your policy in several important questions remains undecided, and when it is obviously of the greatest consequence that measures recommended and initiated by yourself should be followed up under your own superintendence in the approaching session of the provincial Legislature. I therefore feel it my duty to abstain from laying your resignation before the Queen until I shall have had an opportunity of consulting my colleagues collectively as to the course which it will be right for me to adopt. The absence of several of them from London at the present moment precludes my doing this immediately, although the delay, I trust, will be of very short duration. In the mean time I purposely abstain from adverting to any of the topics which you have introduced into your despatch.

Lieutenant-Governor SIR FRANCIS BOND HEAD,

No. 247.

DOWNING STREET,
24th November, 1837.

SIR,

In my despatch of the 26th of October, No. 238, I acknowledged the receipt of your despatch of the 10th of September, No. 99, and informed you that I had felt it to be my duty to abstain from laying before the Queen your resignation of the office of Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Upper Canada, until I should have had an opportunity of consulting my colleagues, collectively as to the course which it would be right for me to adopt. Her Majesty's confidential advisers having now bestowed their careful attention on the whole subject, I proceed to communicate to you the result of their deliberations. It is due to my own character, and to the station which I have the honour to hold, that I should connect this communication with an explicit reference to the various grounds which you have assigned in explanation of your conduct on this occasion. The first of these topics, however, I shall pass over with a very few words. To those who have intrusted me with the office which I now fill I have given the most precise explanation of the mode in which I have executed the duty of superintending your administration of the affairs of Upper Canada. But to an officer serving under my immediate authority, who charges me with having surrendered the exercise of my own independent judgment to some invisible and everruling influence, exerted for the introduction of republican principles into British North America, I need make no reply—contented to refer to his more calm and deliberate judgment the question whether it is fitting that so serious a charge should be conveyed in such a form and on such an occasion.

Commencing with this topic, you next proceed to announce that the system of policy pursued by my predecessors and by myself, in reference to British North America, is essentially opposed to your own. This declaration naturally leads to the inquiry whether, during the period of our official connexion, there has ever arisen, until the present time, any material question of practical conduct on which we have differed. Our abstract principles may not have been the same: in our official correspondence you may have occasionally advanced doctrines to which I have not been able to give my assent. Such disagreements are more or less inseparable from every discussion between those who at once assert for themselves, and respect in others, the free exercise of an independent judgment.

Habitually indisposed to make my official correspondence the channel for the debate of abstract questions of policy, I have been content to know that you were prepared to obey my instructions, and have felt comparatively very little concern as to the light in which you might regard my opinions. Whatever theoretical distinctions may have existed between you and me, it is at least clear that, subject to the exceptions to be noticed in the sequel, you have avowed your entire acquiescence in the whole tenor of my instructions, and that every act of which you have been the author, involving any of the general and permanent interests of the province, I have sanctioned and approved.

X. Another specific complaint urged in your despatch is, that I employed, not Mr. Draper, but another gentleman, as the bearer of my despatches to you respecting the financial affairs of the province. Even this complaint, slight as it may appear, must not pass unnoticed.

I fully intended to make Mr. Draper the bearer of my despatches in question. With that view he was requested to attend at this office. He promised to do so, but, from causes unexplained and unknown to me, Mr. Draper left England without presenting himself at this office; and the employment of another messenger was therefore a matter of inevitable necessity. These facts were communicated to you on the 4th of August. When you wrote your despatch of the 10th of September, you had probably not received that communication.

In the preceding observations I beg to state that I mean to make no complaint of Mr. Draper, nor to imply the slightest reflection upon him of any kind. My opinion of that gentleman has been sufficiently attested by the confirmation, since that time, of his appointment as Solicitor-General of the province.

The next topics to which I have to advert demand the more particular notice, as they appear to be regarded by you as the more immediate and prominent grounds of your resignation.

XI. You remonstrate against my instruction on the subject of Mr. Bidwell's eventual promotion to the bench, in case of a future vacancy; and you declare your determination never to carry that instruction into effect. Your opposition is vindicated by the objections which you make to the political career of Mr. Bidwell, and which, you insist, ought to have forbidden the adoption by her Majesty's Government of any resolution favourable to that gentleman's employment in the service of the Crown.

My estimate of Mr. Bidwell's character and claims to advancement to the bench had been derived chiefly from your own despatches. It was on no lower authority that I adopted the opinion that he was properly eligible for that distinction. You now inform me that you had drawn his character with a light and feeling hand. You had, however, acknowledged Mr. Bidwell to be a gentleman of great abilities, of the first eminence in his profession, and of irreproachable private character. I knew, indeed, that he had formerly taken a very prominent part in opposition to your own measures, and those of your immediate predecessor. You had stated that his object "so far as it could be elicited by the conduct of his associates," was to separate Upper Canada from the parent state; and you had claimed my assent, in reference to this gentleman, to the proposition, "that, where a man acts with disloyal associates, his talents aggravate rather than extenuate his offence." I had further been apprized that ing your administration of the affairs of Upper Canada. But to an officer serving under my immediate authority, who charges me with having surrendered the exercise of my own independent judgment to some invisible and everruling influence, exerted for the introduction of republican principles into British North America, I need make no reply—contented to refer to his more calm and deliberate judgment the question whether it is fitting that so serious a charge should be conveyed in such a form and on such an occasion.

Commencing with this topic, you next proceed to announce that the system of policy pursued by my predecessors and by myself, in reference to British North America, is essentially opposed to your own. This declaration naturally leads to the inquiry whether, during the period of our official connexion, there has ever arisen, until the present time, any material question of practical conduct on which we have differed. Our abstract principles may not have been the same: in our official correspondence you may have occasionally advanced doctrines to which I have not been able to give my assent. Such disagreements are more or less inseparable from every discussion between those who at once assert for themselves, and respect in others, the free exercise of an independent judgment.

Habitually indisposed to make my official correspondence the channel for the debate of abstract questions of policy, I have been content to know that you were prepared to obey my instructions, and have felt comparatively very little concern as to the light in which you might regard my opinions. Whatever theoretical distinctions may have existed between you and me, it is at least clear that, subject to the exceptions to be noticed in the sequel, you have avowed your entire acquiescence in the whole tenor of my instructions, and that every act of which you have been the author, involving any of the general and permanent interests of the province, I have sanctioned and approved.

X. Another specific complaint urged in your despatch is, that I employed, not Mr. Draper, but another gentleman, as the bearer of my despatches to you respecting the financial affairs of the province. Even this complaint, slight as it may appear, must not pass unnoticed.

I fully intended to make Mr. Draper the bearer of my despatches in question. With that view he was requested to attend at this office. He promised to do so, but, from causes unexplained and unknown to me, Mr. Draper left England without presenting himself at this office; and the employment of another messenger was therefore a matter of inevitable necessity. These facts were communicated to you on the 4th of August. When you wrote your despatch of the 10th of September, you had probably not received that communication.

In the preceding observations I beg to state that I mean to make no complaint of Mr. Draper, nor to imply the slightest reflection upon him of any kind. My opinion of that gentleman has been sufficiently attested by the confirmation, since that time, of his appointment as Solicitor-General of the province.

The next topics to which I have to advert demand the more particular notice, as they appear to be regarded by you as the more immediate and prominent grounds of your resignation.

XI. You remonstrate against my instruction on the subject of Mr. Bidwell's eventual promotion to the bench, in case of a future vacancy; and you declare your determination never to carry that instruction into effect. Your opposition is vindicated by the objections which you make to the political career of Mr. Bidwell, and which, you insist, ought to have forbidden the adoption by her Majesty's Government of any resolution favourable to that gentleman's employment in the service of the Crown.

My estimate of Mr. Bidwell's character and claims to advancement to the bench had been derived chiefly from your own despatches. It was on no lower authority that I adopted the opinion that he was properly eligible for that distinction. You now inform me that you had drawn his character with a light and feeling hand. You had, however, acknowledged Mr. Bidwell to be a gentleman of great abilities, of the first eminence in his profession, and of irreproachable private character. I knew, indeed, that he had formerly taken a very prominent part in opposition to your own measures, and those of your immediate predecessor. You had stated that his object "so far as it could be elicited by the conduct of his associates," was to separate Upper Canada from the parent state; and you had claimed my assent, in reference to this gentleman, to the proposition, "that, where a man acts with disloyal associates, his talents aggravate rather than extenuate his offence." I had further been apprized that

Mr. Bidwell had entirely retired from political life, confining himself to the duties of his profession, and had ceased to act with the party of which he had formerly been a member.— Such was my information when I instructed you eventually to offer to Mr. Bidwell a seat on the bench. I confess that it did not appear to me fit that, under such circumstances, he should be punished by a permanent and irreparable incapacity for a promotion to which, on the grounds of private character, no objections could be raised, and to which, on the grounds of professional eminence, he had the highest possible title. It appeared to me dangerous, or rather impracticable, to govern the province on the principle of a proscription of the whole of one large body of the inhabitants. You now indeed make the additional statement that Mr. Bidwell was a member of a revolutionary society called the "Provincial Convention!" Of this fact I was totally ignorant until the receipt of the very despatch now under consideration. By a despatch from you of a still later date, namely of the 22nd of September, it appears that a letter bearing the date of the 3rd of August, and the signature of Mr. Bidwell, was published at Toronto on the 20th of September, in which Mr. Bidwell expressly declines to be a member of that society, and complains of the unauthorized use of his name for that purpose. In reporting this fact, you assume that the date which the letter bears was purposely falsified; that Mr. Bidwell had heard of the intentions in his favour, and had published his letter with a false date, in order to remove an objection which might have obstructed his advancement. On what authority this accusation is made you have not explained; and without some such explanation I could not impute what would be in effect a wilful violation of truth to a gentleman whose moral character is unimpeached by his most decided political antagonists. If, however, the only practical ground of difference between you and me had been the promotion of Mr. Bidwell, I should have been anxious, for the present at least, to defer to the strong opinion which you have expressed against my recommendation. Mr. Bidwell had certainly no claim of strict right to the promotion in question. Every selection of that kind is an act of discretionary authority in which the Government is not only at liberty, but is bound, to weigh all conflicting prudential considerations on either side; and, whatever may have been my views respecting Mr. Bidwell's appointment, I do not scruple to admit that, if I had been to make my choice between the execution of that purpose and your continuance in office, I should not have hesitated to prefer the latter alternative.

XII. But Mr. Ridout's case is of a different complexion, and with respect to it I am compelled to acknowledge my irreconcilable dissent from your judgment and conclusions.

In the despatch to which I am now replying, the particulars of this case are recapitulated but briefly, and therefore with that kind of inaccuracy which is inseparable from the abridgment of any considerable extent of detail. On the other hand, in the correspondence which has taken place on this subject, and which is comprised in the despatches referred to in the margin,* will be found a full and careful investigation and statement of every material circumstance. To that correspondence I reply with confidence, as proving that the course which I pursued was imperatively forced upon me by the duties of my office, and by the obligations of justice to Mr. Ridout, and of good faith to the province at large.

I think it necessary, however, to preface the remarks I have to make on this subject by a short summary of the facts as they are to be collected from the papers before me.

You dismissed Mr. Ridout from the offices of Colonel of Militia, Judge of the District Court of Niagara, and Justice of the Peace, and caused a letter to be addressed to him, in which that measure was stated to have been taken on the ground that it appeared that he was an active member of a society which had circulated an address insulting to your person and office. Mr. Ridout distinctly denied that he was a member of that society; that he had anything to do with drawing up the address in question; or that he had even seen it, until it was in circulation in print through the city of Toronto. He transmitted to you evidence on oath in corroboration of his statement. As you took no notice of his complaint, he placed in your hands an appeal to myself, having first requested, in terms to which no possible objection could be made, that, if there were any other reasons for his dismissal than that which you had assigned to him, he might be informed of them. You did not comply with this request, but, in transmitting to me his appeal, you imputed to Mr. Ridout various acts of misconduct to which

† Is it not astonishing that, notwithstanding the uncommon ability with which this despatch is written, the Colonial Office should persist in not seeing the real bearing of the case, namely, that Mr. Ridout cunningly answers the charge that "he appeared to be an active member," by stating (what was quite true) that he was not a member of it?

no allusion had been made in your correspondence with him. I answered you by stating in effect that, in deciding on Mr. Ridout's appeal, it was impossible for me to advert to any other grounds of accusation than that which had been made known to Mr. Ridout as the cause of his dismissal.

I explained the reasons which led me to regard as satisfactory Mr. Ridout's defence against the charge of which alone he had been informed, and I signified to you his late Majesty's commands that Mr. Ridout should be permitted to resume the various employments from which he had been removed. Against this decision you remonstrated in your despatch of the 6th of February. You then, for the first time, informed me, that you had acted on this subject with the advice of the Executive Council. In my reply of the 5th of April, after stating my dissent from some of the principles which you had maintained with reference to this case, I further addressed you in the following terms:—

“From your despatch of the 6th of February, I now, however, for the first time, learn that Mr. Ridout's Removal from office was recommended by the Executive Council; and I further learn that they adhere to their original opinion.” [See the despatch already before the reader.]

I have entered on the preceding statement as necessary to explain and justify the very material fact which I am desirous to record. That fact is, that the instructions which you now refuse to obey do not direct Mr. Ridout's reinstatement. In the exercise of the authority with which I was invested, I directed you to place a Judge, whom you had dismissed from office, in possession of the grounds of that very grave proceeding, before I could confirm his removal. I called upon you to render to him that measure of justice which the humblest member of society is entitled to demand, by making known to him what were the reasons on which the representative of his Sovereign had sentenced him to degradation and punishment.* This is the instruction which you meet with a direct and positive refusal. Such is one of the most prominent grounds on which, at a moment of extreme embarrassment and difficulty, you have resigned the administration of the Government of Upper Canada. Your deliberate refusal to obey my instructions of the 5th of April is communicated to me for the first time in a despatch dated on the 10th of September. It is to be collected, from other communications of yours which are recorded in this office, that my despatch of the 5th of April had reached your hands on the 26th June; that is, between two and three months before the date of the peremptory declaration that on this point, at least, you would not conform to the unequivocal instructions of your official superior. You must permit me to say that your purpose ought to have been much sooner announced. I cannot acknowledge the justice or propriety of leaving me so long in ignorance of such a decision, and of the resignation, which you represent as immediately and unavoidably connected with it.

I have thus noticed, separately and distinctly, the various accusations of which, in your despatch of the 10th of September, you have made me the object. I have not stopped to comment on particular expressions, or on the general tone and style of that communication. The respect with which her Majesty's Government have invariably acknowledged your public services is too sincerely entertained to leave room for any other feeling than that of regret, in contemplating the position which you have thought it proper to assume with relation to them. So long as I could rely on your assurance that your policy would be regulated by the instructions which you had received from me, I felt fully justified in continuing in your hands the administration of the province. You now, however, inform me that you have felt it your duty frankly to disclose to me opinions and sentiments, which, being hostile to the policy of the office over which I preside, ought not to be withheld from me. You have accompanied this disclosure with a positive refusal to carry my instructions into effect, in a case in which that refusal involves not only disobedience to my directions, but actual injustice to an individual who has appealed to me for redress.

Under these circumstances her Majesty's Ministers have, after the fullest deliberation, thought it their duty to tender to the Queen their advice that your resignation should be accepted; and I have received her Majesty's commands to signify to you her acceptance of it accordingly.

* This despatch had scarcely left the Colonial Office when Toronto was attacked by the rebels. Surely this fact ought to vindicate the very few dismissals which I had previously made.

If I had been arbitrary or unjust, could I have withstood the rebellion without troops?

In conformity with your request, your successor will proceed to Upper Canada with the least possible delay. In the mean time, I rely on your devoting the short period of your future administration of the affairs of Upper Canada to the protection and advancement of those highly important interests which, during the last two years, have been intrusted to your guidance with so much advantage to the public service.

I have, &c.

No. 11.

TORONTO, January 26th, 1838.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's despatch, (No. 247,) dated 24th November, 1837, in which you inform me that her Majesty has been graciously pleased to accept my resignation, and that my successor will proceed to Upper Canada with the least possible delay.

As I had not only tendered my resignation, but had deliberately refused to carry into effect the commands I had received from your Lordship, respecting the restoration of Judge Ridout to the offices from which I had removed him, and respecting the elevation of Mr. Bidwell to the Bench, I was quite prepared to have received from her Majesty's Government, with the utmost submission, the above communications, and I can truly assure your Lordship that, expecting they would have been delivered to me without comment, I was also not only prepared but desirous to have expressed to your Lordship and to her Majesty's Government my deep regret at having from a sense of public duty been obliged to place myself in opposition to their wishes. I was further prepared to have begged your Lordship to pardon any expression which, in the conscientious resistance of your Lordship's policy, I might inadvertently have made use of, and to be assured that it had never been my intention or desire to appear wanting to your Lordship in respect for your private character or public station.

These feelings I continue to entertain; but your Lordship's late communication having coupled the acceptance of my resignation with certain remarks, I feel it due to the station I yet hold to record the requisite explanation, particularly because it is evident to me, from the ingenuity of the extracts quoted in your despatch, that they have been selected, dovetailed, and then brought before your Lordship's consideration by some person of considerable ability and experience in what is commonly called "special pleading."

I. In your Lordship's despatch it is stated, "with the solitary exception of the proposed surrender of the territorial revenue, I had not, from the commencement of your administration until my receipt of your despatch of the 10th September, 1837, the slightest reason to know or to surmise that, among the measures prescribed for your adoption in my original instructions, there was any one to which you did not completely and cordially subscribe; and your Lordship added, "therefore the contrast which you declare to have existed between your policy and mine has really prevailed in reference to the specific measures indicated by my original instructions. I can only state that my ignorance of the fact has been as unavoidable as it has been complete."

In order to support this view of the case, which of course tends to show that I acted irrationally in tendering my resignation, a few extracts are selected from two or three of my despatches, in which it is perfectly true that I distinctly avowed my approbation of the original instructions which, on my appointment, I had had the honour to receive from your Lordship. Nevertheless, notwithstanding this avowal, the whole series of my despatches continuously prove that I much more explicitly avowed my disapproval of your Lordship's policy; and, though I do not presume to blame your Lordship, yet I feel I have reason to complain that extracts, showing my approbation of my instructions, are quoted against me in your Lordship's despatch, for the apparent purpose of convicting me of having expressed my approval of your policy, whereas the disagreement which existed between your Lordship and myself (not respecting my instructions, but the impolicy of conciliation) has never subsided for a moment since the first day of my arrival in this province.

I could quote from my despatches, if it were necessary, a series of extracts which would indisputably show that, from the date of the elevation to the Bench in Lower Canada of the author of the 92 resolutions, down to the period of your Lordship's proposed restoration in this province of Judge Ridout, and of the proposed elevation of Mr. Bidwell, I opposed, in the strongest possible terms, the fatal system of conciliation; and, far from my not having differed from your Lordship, I am sure it must have been notorious throughout the British North American Colonies, and even in England, that I was in this province openly pursuing a course of policy diametrically opposite to that which was theoretically advocated by the Colonial Office, and practically carried into effect in Lower Canada.

It is true that, on being supported by the people of Upper Canada, and on gaining by a dissolution of the Provincial Parliament an overwhelming constitutional majority in the House of Assembly, I felt it proper, on the common principle of official courtesy, to ascribe the whole credit of the victory to the instructions (not the policy) which had emanated from her Majesty's Government; but I certainly did not expect that this compliment would have been quoted against me with a view to show that your Lordship had received no notice or warning that I was hostile to the policy of her Majesty's Government, until you were suddenly embarrassed by the receipt of my unexpected resignation, dated 10th September, 1837.

2. Your Lordship's despatch next proceeds at great length to show "that there is no one of my reputed acts or proceedings in which the general interests of the province were involved which has not received your sanction."

Your Lordship's despatch supports this assertion by quotations from your own despatches, which, as far as the words go, clearly substantiate the fact, but your Lordship's despatch has omitted the dates, which, had they been quoted with the words, would have proved the accuracy of my complaint, which was, not that support had been altogether denied me, but that it had been withheld from me during the various struggles in which I had been involved; and, as Lord Chesterfield granted it to Johnson, only bestowed when success had considerably impaired its importance.

I have before me a quantity of minute evidence on this subject, but, casting it aside, I appeal at once to the English Government newspapers and to the Journals of the House of Commons—both of which I am sure will prove to any unprejudiced person that, ever since my arrival in this province, a most remarkable silence has shrouded every victory which I have gained over the Republicans; and, as one instance of this discouraging system, I may observe that Mr. Hume was allowed, on the floor of the House of Commons, to act in the fictitious character of accredited agent or representative of the people of Upper Canada, long after her Majesty's Government were in official possession of my despatch concerning a report from the House of Assembly, which in the strongest possible terms repudiated Mr. Hume as well as the treasonable language which he had addressed to Mr. M'Kenzie, for whose apprehension, as an absconded traitor, the sum of one thousand pounds is at this moment offered by the Executive Government of this province.

As the above observations will, I conceive, sufficiently prove what, in British North America, is perfectly notorious—namely, that in the arduous struggles in which I have been engaged here, I have not received from her Majesty's Government opportune support, I feel it unnecessary to notice the particular cases of Captain Macaulay, the Executive Council, the loyal addresses, the speech from the Throne, and Mr. Sullivan's appointment, which are adverted to at great length in your Lordship's despatch, and which, I can assure your Lordship, would appear to you under a very different aspect were I, by a proper adjustment of dates and facts, to lay the subjects fairly before you. I will, therefore, at once proceed to the non-confirmation of her Majesty's Attorney and Solicitor-General, which, in my despatch of the 10th of September I so seriously complained of.

Your Lordship's observations on this subject, in your late despatch, require but little reply, as it appears that all I complained of is, in fact, admitted by your Lordship, that is to say, you admit that both these important appointments were suspended merely because "A member of the General Assembly of Scotland had transmitted for your Lordship's information certain printed resolutions of the Presbytery of that Church in Upper Canada, which resolutions represented that in the session of 1836, Mr. Hagerman had, in his place in the House of Assembly of Upper Canada, held language and pursued a line of conduct highly injurious to the character and interests of the Scotch Church, and in direct opposition to the avowed policy and recorded opinions of the Ministers of the Crown."

It has now turned out that your Lordship's solitary self-interested informant (a Scotchman, whose accusations were founded on some extract he had read from a most profligate newspaper) was in error; but, even had he been right, I respectfully repeat and maintain, that so long as a colony has a provincial legislature which can read, write, and speak for itself, no private individual who gets worsted in a religious squabble should be allowed to arrest, in opposition to the recommendation of the Lieutenant-Governor, the promotion of both her Majesty's Attorney and Solicitor-General, until they can publicly vindicate themselves from the poisonous accusations which the secret informer has been allowed to pour into the ear of the Colonial Minister.

The Attorney General (Mr. Hagerman) is known at your Lordship's office to be a staunch uncompromising supporter of British principles, and I have no hesitation in repeating, that the marked indignity which he and the Solicitor General have received, has had a bad moral effect.

3. With respect to the reception which was given at your Lordship's office to the Solicitor General, the Honourable W. H. Draper, who, as a member of my Executive Council, was especially despatched by me to your Lordship, to explain the views which the Executive Government here took in opposition to the departmental conduct of Mr. ———, (who was consequently exactly the last individual in the province whom it would have been proper to have selected for such a mission,) I have only to inform your Lordship that Mr. Draper, whose mild inoffensive character, and sound constitutional principles, are highly admired here, on his return to Toronto from England, confessed to me, rather than complained, that in the course of his life-time he had never had so much difficulty in suppressing his feelings as on his first interview with your Lordship's Under-Secretary, Mr. Stephen, whose whole manner towards him was not only repulsive but highly offensive.

Had Messrs. ———, and Draper been mere private individuals, the eulogium which your Lordship's despatch passes on the former, and the neglect which was shewn to the latter, would interest no one; but, while Mr. Draper appeared at the Colonial Office as a member of my Executive Council, and as an individual devotedly attached to constitutional principles, Mr. ——— appeared there recorded as one of the five members of my late Executive Council, who, shortly after my arrival, had made an attack upon the constitution, which, being immediately backed by the then House of Assembly, obliged me to dissolve the Parliament and appeal to the people (who supported me,) which had the effect of discarding Mr. Speaker Bidwell and other republican members from the House of Assembly.

It was also recorded in your Lordship's office that Mr. ——— had been named with Mr. Bidwell, Mr. Papineau, and others of the same politics, as commissioners for an object which, though artfully veiled, was very generally and naturally here believed to be revolutionary. Under these circumstances, surely it must be very evident to your Lordship that it would have appeared a measure of conciliation highly offensive to my Council had I, as Lieutenant-Governor of this province, selected Mr. ——— as the individual in Upper Canada most worthy of my confidence: and it certainly remains for whoever may have advised your Lordship on this subject to explain why, when all these facts were recorded in the Colonial Office, your Lordship's despatch should persist in giving so decided a preference to Mr. ———, at the expense of Mr. Draper, a loyal member of my Executive Council, whom I had especially despatched to your Lordship to explain the precise views of the Executive Government, of which he officially was cognizant.

With respect to the despatches on the subject of Mr. Draper's mission, which were given to Major Bonnycastle instead of to Mr. Draper (although it was known at the Colonial Office that both these gentlemen were to sail for New York in the same packet,) your Lordship states,—

I fully intended to make Mr. Draper the bearer of the despatches in question. With that view he was requested to attend at this office. He intended to do so, but, from causes unexplained and unknown to me, Mr. Draper left England without presenting himself at this office, and the employment of another messenger was therefore a matter of inevitable necessity.

If the united testimony of Mr. Draper and of Major Bonnycastle be correct, your Lordship's obliging intentions towards Mr. Draper have been frustrated in a manner which I think it but proper your Lordship should be made acquainted with.

Mr. Draper admits that, by appointment, he was to have called at the Colonial Office on the day before the packet sailed; that he did call accordingly, but not at the appointed hour. Major Bonnycastle, however, states that your Under-Secretary, Mr. Stephen, told him, two or three days previous to the sailing of the packet, that he (Major Bonnycastle) would be the bearer of the despatches; that he accordingly asked Mr. Murdock (a clerk in your Lordship's office, who, he was informed, had charge of the Upper Canada correspondence) for them; that Mr. Murdock told him that the despatches would not be given to him; that he (Major Bonnycastle) went and told Mr. Stephen what Mr. Murdock had said, upon which Mr. Stephen sent for Mr. Murdock, and, in his (Major Bonnycastle's) presence, told Mr. Murdock, very angrily, that he, Mr. Murdock, ought to obey the instructions he had received, and that he was to give the despatches to Major Bonnycastle.

4. I will now proceed to the two principal topics in your Lordship's despatch, namely, my refusal to raise Mr. Bidwell to the Bench, or to restore Judge Ridout to the offices from which I had removed him, and my consequent resignation.

My Lord, I had not been a fortnight in this country when your Lordship wrote to me, suggesting for my consideration "that it would be a very judicious act on the part of the Government to place in stations of trust and honour those gentlemen of Upper Canada (Mr. Rolph and Mr. Speaker Bidwell) who had been represented to you as among the most able, popular, and estimable men in the colony."

The recommendation submitted by your Lordship for my consideration was, "that Mr. Rolph should be a member of the Executive Council, and Mr. Bidwell be placed on the judicial bench."

5. With respect to Dr. Rolph, the first individual mentioned to me by your Lordship as a person whom it might "be a very judicious act on the part of the Government to place in a station of trust and honour." I feel it only necessary to state that, next to Mr. M'Kenzie, Dr. Rolph has been proved to have been the most insidious, the most crafty, the most blood-thirsty, the most treacherous, the most cowardly, and, taking his character altogether, the most infamous of the traitors who lately assailed us. After having been the person who fixed the day on which Toronto was to be attacked, he hypocritically undertook to be the bearer of my appeal to the rebels, to avoid the effusion of human blood; and it has actually been proved before the Commission which is now investigating this treasonable affair, that, after Dr. Rolph and Mr. Robert Baldwin had delivered this message from me, the former, Dr. Rolph, went aside with two of the principal traitors, and diabolically recommended them to come and attack the town.

I will only add that Dr. Rolph's consciousness of the part he had acted prompted him to fly to the United States (before any idea was entertained of arresting him) the moment it became evident that the treacherous attack he had planned would not succeed. As a fugitive traitor, his seat in the House of Assembly has just been declared void, with only two dissentient voices, which merely disagreed on a question of form.

With respect to the other individual (Mr. Bidwell) mentioned to me by your Lordship as a person whom it might "be a very judicious act on the part of the Government to place in a station of trust and honour," it is certainly remarkable that, within less than a month from the date of the above recommendation, both he (Mr. Bidwell) and Dr. Rolph, the former as Speaker, the latter as Executive Councillor, joined in perhaps the most ferocious attack that ever was made by any Council or House of Assembly upon the Lieutenant-Governor of the colony. The grossly insulting language which was used against me, every word of which has long ago been transmitted to your Lordship, is, I maintain, without precedent; and, although your Lordship did not support me during this conflict with these persons, yet when it was decided in my favour, you did not hesitate to approve of the resistance I had made against their violent aggression upon the constitution of the province. Nevertheless, notwithstanding Mr. Bidwell, in consequence of his Republican doctrines, and of his avowed connexion with Mr. Papeineau, was publicly driven, not only from the Speakership, but from the House of Assembly itself; and notwithstanding that in my despatch (No. 41,) dated 5th April, 1837, I voluntarily explained to your Lordship why I could not conscientiously place him on the Bench, yet, with all this mass of evidence on your mind, your Lordship deemed it advisable deliberately to inform me that it was the wish of her Majesty's Government that the situation of Judge of the Court of King's Bench should, in case of an expected vacancy, be offered to Mr. Bidwell.

In vindication of this appointment your Lordship's late despatch states as follows:—"I confess that it did not appear to me fit that, under such circumstances, he (Mr. Bidwell) should be punished by a permanent and irreparable incapacity for a promotion to which, on the grounds of private character, no objection could be raised, and to which, on the grounds of professional eminence, he had the highest possible title. It appeared to me dan“gerous, or rather impracticable, to govern the province on the principle of a proscription of “the whole of one large body of the inhabitants.””

What were the dangers which your Lordship apprehended,—what were the principles upon which your Lordship proposed to govern the North American colonies,—and why your Lordship designated the small band of traitors, whose conspiracy has lately been exploded without the assistance of a single soldier, “the whole of one large body of the inhabitants,”—I will not presume to enquire, but will simply state the following fact.

Your Lordship's communication to me of the desire of her Majesty's Government to elevate Mr. Bidwell to the Bench reached me on the 1st of September last, just two days after Mr. Bidwell had addressed a letter to Mr. O'Callaghan (a traitor, for whose apprehension a reward of £500 has been offered by Lord Gosford,) which was published in his own newspaper, and of which the following is an extract:—

Retired from public life, probably for ever, I still look with the deepest interest and sympathy on the efforts of those who are actively contending for the great principles of liberty and good government. Your great and powerful exertion in the cause of liberty and justice I have noticed with admiration and respect, and I look with deep interest on the struggle in Lower Canada, between an insulted, oppressed, and injured people and their oppressors.—All hope of justice from the authorities in England seems to be extinguished.

My Lord, if I have been wanting in respect to her Majesty's Ministers, I offer to them the foregoing extract as my apology; for even at this moment of my approaching departure for ever from this province, the very idea of my having been desired to elevate the writer of such sentiments to the British Bench creates within me feelings which it is difficult to suppress. Under the excitement of these feelings, I positively refused to obey your Lordship's instructions, and I respectfully tendered to her Majesty my resignation of the station I hold. Events have since proved that the judgment I had formed of the dangerous effects of conciliation was not incorrect. Treason, which had long slumbered in this province, having been fanned by conciliation, suddenly burst into a flame. The details of the late rebellion, as contained in my despatch dated December 19th, (No. 132,) have already explained to your Lordship that on the 7th of December last the brave militia of Upper Canada drove the rebels from their position at Gallows Hill; that their place of rendezvous, Montgomery's Tavern, immediately fell into their possession; and that on a small party reaching it, they found, brought out, and unfurled in triumph before their comrades, the traitor's flag, upon which was inscribed in large letters,—

1837, and a good beginning.”

My Lord, if that flag had, as was expected by its followers, triumphantly entered Toronto, I have no hesitation in saying it would have waved over the corpse of every loyal subject in the city; indeed, we have received evidence that a general massacre of the Queen's loyal subjects would have been attempted. The flag in question was captured on the 7th December last, just six days after the departure from Downing Street of your Lordship's despatch, which, in reply to my declaration, that, so long as I continued to be Lieutenant Governor of Upper Canada, I would never raise Mr. Bidwell to the Bench, informed me “that Her Majesty's Ministers have, after the fullest deliberation, thought it their duty to tender to the Queen their advice that my resignation should be accepted.”

I beg leave to place these facts on record, without a comment.

7. It gives me pain to reply to that part of your Lordship's despatch which relates to my refusal to restore Judge Ridout to the offices from which I had removed him. The despatch says nothing in favour of the Judge's proposal to tar and feather me; nothing in favour of the whole course of his political misconduct; nor does it in any way oppose my opinion, or the opinion of the Executive Council, that Judge Ridout was not a proper person to be allowed to continue in office under the British Government; but the despatch clings with inexplicable tenacity to a fact which I have always fully admitted, namely, that I disclosed to Judge Ridout only a part, instead of the whole, of the reasons, for which I had felt it necessary to inform him that his late Majesty had no further occasion for his services; and because I had adopted this course, your Lordship declares, “it was impossible for me to advert to any other grounds of accusation than that which had been made known to Mr. Ridout as the cause of his dismissal.” Even in peaceful times, I am not aware that it is usual always to satisfy every public servant of all the reasons for which his services are no longer required; but in the moment of mutiny, or on the eve of a traitorous insurrection, such as I have just quelled, any man who understands how to wield power, knows, that a well timed and unexpected display of just authority invariably effects most striking results. This result was most strongly exemplified in my dismissal of Mr. Ridout, which so effectually checked the insults the republicans were preparing to offer me, that it rendered it almost unnecessary for me again to defend myself; whereas, in Lower Canada, the conciliatory or enduring system of Her Majesty's Government was exercised until the Royal Gazette suddenly teemed with dismissals, which, however, were too late to produce anything but the most insulting and disreputable replies.

My Lord, I submit to the candid consideration of your Lordship, that my administration of the Government of Upper Canada had not authorised Her Majesty's Government to consider me as an arbitrary or vindictive man; there was, therefore, no reason to presuppose that I had acted without reflection in any dismissal I had effected; but Mr. Ridout's case, as it has been detailed to your Lordship, proves that his dismissal was decided on by my judgment and not by my passions, for there was not the slightest occasion that I should have consulted either the Attorney General or the Executive Council on the subject; and the very fact of my having done so proves that I was desirous to be guided by reason and justice. As I have already stated to your Lordship, Mr. Ridout's republican friends, fancying that his dismissal might, in a city where almost universal suffrage prevails, secure his election as an alderman, tried the experiment, and failed; he has never ventured to petition even the House of Assembly on the subject; and I feel I may say that every man of respectability in the province, who is cognizant to the facts, is conscious that Mr. Ridout's dismissal was not only just, but a necessary measure; and I have only to add that, in the late insurrection, which has tested all men's principles, Mr. Ridout is almost the only individual of a respectable family who has not either taken up, or declared himself ready to take up arms, to put down insurrection, or to repel the perfidious invasion of this province by American citizens.*

My Lord, I have now finished the painful duty of replying to your Lordship's last communication; and as I daily expect to hear of the arrival in the province of my successor, I can have little desire to protract a discussion which nothing but a strong sense of duty would have forced me to undertake. Your Lordship cannot, I think, help observing with astonishment, that, in the particular cases mentioned in this despatch, the friends of British institutions have certainly been depressed, and their opponents elevated, by the Colonial Office; your Lordship, however, would, I believe, not only be astonished, but alarmed, were I indisputably to prove to you, as I readily could do, that this unnatural and destructive system has long characterised the practical policy of the Colonial Office, although it has been governed by noblemen, like your Lordship, of high character and worth.

I should not do justice to the brave and loyal people of Upper Canada, who have protected my character, my policy, and my life, were I, in taking leave of them as well as of your Lordship, to shrink from recording as my deliberate opinion that the hidden cause of our colonial misrule—the secret reason why Papineau, M'Kenzie, Rolph, Bidart, Debortz, Ridout, and others of similar politics, have been openly supported by the Colonial Office in proportion as the loyal population has been depressed—has already been disclosed to your Lordship in my despatch (No. 132,) dated 19th December, 1837, of which the following is an extract:—

“MY LORD,—It has long been notorious to every British subject in the Canadas that your Lordship's Under-Secretary, the author of our colonial despatches, is a rank republican. His sentiments, his conduct, and his political character are here alike detested, and I enclose to your Lordship Mr. M'Kenzie's last newspaper, which, traitorous as it is, contains nothing more conducive to treason than the extracts which, as its text, it exultingly quotes from the published opinions of her Majesty's Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies!”

The following are the extracts above alluded to as republished by Mr. M'Kenzie:—

“Evidence given by James Stephen, Junior, Assistant Secretary of State for the Colonies, before the House of Commons Committee on the Government of Canada, 1828. It is impossible (says Mr. Stephen) to suppose the Canadians dread your power; it is not easy to believe that the abstract duty of loyalty, as distinguished from the sentiment of loyalty, can be very strongly felt. The right of rejecting European dominion has been so often asserted in North and South America, that revolt can scarcely be esteemed in those continents as criminal or disgraceful. Neither does it seem to me that a sense of national pride or importance is in your favour. It cannot be regarded as an enviable distinction to remain the only dependent portion of the New World."

* After I had retired from the Government of Upper Canada, Sir George Arthur, who succeeded me, investigated Mr. Ridout's case, by order of the Colonial Office: every chance was given to him, in my absence, of shewing cause for his restoration to office. I understand that he totally failed, and that Sir George Arthur most decidedly recommended that Judge Ridout should not be restored to the offices from which I had removed him.

As Lieutenant-Governor of this province I have already stated my opinion of these execrable sentiments. That they are totally incompatible with the station of an Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies is, I conceive, a fact which is undeniable; and that these sentiments are not only disloyal, but erroneous, will, I think, appear from the following short observations:—

1. Mr. Stephen says "it is impossible to suppose the Canadians dread your power." That they do dread our power has just been proved by the late total defeat of Mr. Papineau and the whole of his force, who laid down their arms to our soldiers; all the principal leaders have absconded for no other reason but "dread of our power." 2. Mr. Stephen asserts, that on this continent "revolt can scarcely be esteemed as criminal or disgraceful." That the inhabitants of Upper Canada, like all honourable men, consider revolt against the parental Government under which they live as an act both criminal and disgraceful, has been proved by the noble and successful exertions they have just made to put down treason and to bring to justice concealed traitors. 3. Mr. Stephen declares as his opinion, "that it cannot be regarded as an enviable distinction to remain the only dependent portion of the New World."

Not only has Upper Canada put down insurrection, but its brave and high-minded inhabitants have just rushed, armed as well as unarmed, to their eastern as well as to their western frontier, to repel the invasion of their allies, American citizens, who, from New York to Michigan, have been collecting money, men, and arms, for the object of forcibly branding Upper Canada with the independence or mobocracy under which they themselves are publicly suffering.

The American force which has been brought against us, although powerful enough against all their authorities to rob their own state-arsenals of arms and cannon, proved unable to attain its perfidious object; and I have no hesitation in saying that Upper Canada feels at this moment proud of the "enviable distinction" of being dependent on the British empire, whose brilliant history it venerates, and whose Sovereign it affectionately adores, with a loyalty which has just called forth the unsolicited thanks and admiration of the three branches of the Legislature of the gallant province of New Brunswick, another North American province which, contrary to Mr. Stephen's theory, voluntarily remains "one of the dependent portions of the New World."

As I entertain no sentiments of animosity against Mr. Stephen, it has been with very great reluctance that I have mentioned his name; but, being deeply sensible that this province has been signally protected by an omnipotent Providence during the late unnatural rebellion, I feel it my duty, in retiring from this continent, to divulge, through your Lordship, to my Sovereign, my opinion of the latent cause of our unfortunate misgovernment of the Canadas.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

(Signed)

F. B. HEAD.

With respect to the foregoing serious allegations I must be permitted at once to express my deep and unfeigned regret at the necessity which, in a moment of rebellion, obliged me, in the stern performance of a most arduous duty, to assail the political principles (quoted against me by Mr. M'Kenzie just before the attack of Toronto) of a gentleman whose moral character is above all reproach.

It is necessary, however, in my own defence, I should now inform the reader that not only did my predecessor, his Excellency Sir John Colborne, distinctly allude to this secret irresponsible influence, but that, in two most able reports lately addressed to Her Majesty by the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of Upper Canada, reflections are directly made against Mr. Stephen's influence and principles; the Legislative Council describing him as "a gentleman in the Colonial Department,"—the House of Assembly openly mentioning his name.

Besides this, in the leading article of the Montreal Gazette (one of the most respectably conducted papers in Lower Canada) there appeared, on the 22nd of November last, eight months after I had left Upper Canada, the following observations :—

“ We do not desire, as we have never wished, to screen Lord —, as the head of that branch of the Government, from censure or blame for the entire absence, or at least neglect, of those qualities which go to the formation of an efficient minister of the Crown in his especial sphere of duty, but we may express our regret that a person, so estimable in private life, should have been seduced from the quiet tenor of his way, to accept office in a department, in which the most laborious assiduity, and the most resolute firmness of decision were essentially necessary—qualities in which his Lordship could not but have felt his incompetency.— Like his colleagues he has appeared to consider that, where politics and parties in England were not affected by the matter in question, every possible evasion of decision, superficial examination, conciliation of the violent, or the exposure of the peaceable, and sacrifice of the weak to the party interests of the influential, might be practiced with impunity, and that accident, caprice, or inattention to official duties, would not be noticed in Parliament, and public scandal would be thereby avoided. Notwithstanding this opinion which we entertain, every man of common observation must be aware of the utter impossibility of any individual, however gifted or laborious, to perform all the duties of such an office ; he must be more or less dependent upon his subordinates, especially for statements of facts and circumstantial information, upon which his conclusions and judgment must entirely be founded ; and the consequence is, that the individual intrusted with the weighty responsibility of the vast Colonial charge is directed by one official, who, unnamed and unseen, has the practical control of the Colonial Office, and is never in any way referred to at home. It is time that this system should be abolished—it is time that the baneful domination of Mr. Under-Secretary Stephen should be got rid of, and that an entirely new system of things should be adopted.

“ It is well known that Mr. Stephen has for many years past been the confidential adviser and director of the Colonial department ; nor can it be doubted that to his evil influence must be ascribed all the misgovernment which these provinces have suffered for so long a period. The inconveniences of a rapid succession of Ministers, entertaining opposite opinions upon colonial administration, may have been felt by other colonies ; but in regard to these, for the last fifteen years at least, such inconveniences appear to have been not so sensibly felt. Whoever was the Minister, the same principles were followed—whatever was the exigency, the same system was continued—and whatever was the nature of the despatch, the same rule, the same sentiment, and the same doctrines have been employed ; all these afford internal evidence of the offender, and point him out to public animadversion. Indeed, since that gentleman has made himself so officially necessary, he has prejudiced colonial interests more than he can, by any means, hope to repair, and has sat as an incubus, not only on Lord Glenelg's breast, and stifled his measures, but has equally stifled the good intentions as well as the active ability of his Lordship's predecessors. The House of Assembly of Upper Canada, at its last session, pointedly noticed the influence of the person mentioned above, and we trust that it will be followed up by the Legislatures of the other colonies : their internal peace, their advance in prosperity, and their continued connexion with the parent country, loudly call for the expression of opinion upon a matter of so much importance to their best interests, and we trust that it will be openly and boldly avowed.”

To this opinion, which is infinitely more ably expressed than my own, I subscribe, and, should I be called upon either by her Majesty's Government, or by either House of the Imperial Parliament, to substantiate the allegations I have avowed, I shall at once give the following list of the witnesses to whom I refer :—

Sir Peregrine Maitland—Sir John Colborne—Sir Archibald Campbell—the Crown Officers of Upper Canada—Chief Justice Robinson—the Legislatures of our North American colonies—the British Merchants in England connected with our North American provinces—the West India and other merchants connected with our Colonies.

No. 15.

TORONTO, 9th February, 1838.

My LORD,

In my despatch of the 10th of January, which contained a copy of my communication to Mr. Fox at Washington, respecting the capture of the piratical steam-boat the Caroline, I had the honour to mention to your Lordship, that, in justice to Captain Drew of her Majesty's Royal Navy, and the other officers and men engaged in the service alluded to, I should feel it my duty to bring their conduct before the especial attention of her Majesty's Government.

It is proper, however, I should previously inform your Lordship, that as soon as I found that this portion of the British empire was perfidiously attacked and invaded by American citizens, under American leaders termed "Generals"—that artillery and muskets were brought against us from the State arsenals—that Navy Island belonging to her Majesty was actually seized by Americans—that batteries were formed there, from which shot were fired for many days upon the inoffensive inhabitants of this province—and that the island was regularly supplied, by boats from the American shore, with provisions and munitions of war,—I approved of the recommendation of Colonel M'Nab, commanding the expedition on the Niagara frontier, that a naval force or flotilla, under officers of experience, should be constituted; and feeling that it would be unjust, that, in the name of her Majesty, I should require naval officers to leave the back woods, into which they had retired, without recognising them in the professional capacity in which I had especially called them into action, I directed my military secretary, Colonel Strachan, to forward to Colonel M'Nab a written communication, a copy of which is herewith enclosed, directing him to call upon such naval officers in the province as he might deem proper to select, to afford me their services, on the understanding that they would receive their full pay during the period they were thus publicly employed by me on her Majesty's service.

In consequence of the above communication (which I at once think it right to acknowledge contains no authority beyond what the Lords of the Admiralty may, from the emergency of the case, deem proper to conform to it) Colonel M'Nab called upon Captain Drew, R. N., to collect and command a flotilla of gun-boats and other craft, to be immediately fitted out for the purpose of attacking Navy Island.

While the gun-boats were being prepared, the American force, under the American commander styling himself General Van Ranssaler, continued, day after day, to fire from Navy Island, upon the unoffending inhabitants of the Niagara frontier, although not a gun had been fired on the part of the British, although the American forces on our island were daily increasing, and although a steam-boat, chartered by these pirates, was actually employed in transporting to the island munitions of war for the purpose of aggravating the insult which, in a moment of profound peace, had perfidiously been made by American citizens upon her Britannic Majesty's dominions.

Under these circumstances, Colonel M'Nab determined, as an act of self-defence, to call upon Captain Drew to capture, burn, or destroy this steam-boat.

Accordingly, about eleven o'clock the same night, Captain Drew, with five boats, containing nine men each, pushed off from the British Shore. The boats were commanded by Captain Drew, R. N., Lieutenant M'Cormack, R. N. Lieutenant John Elmsley, R. N. Lieutenant Christopher Beer, R. N., and — Gordon, a commander of a steam-boat.

The crew were composed of volunteers, who embarked in total ignorance of the service in which they were about to be engaged, Captain Drew's requisition having merely stated "that he wanted a few fellows with cutlasses who would follow him to the devil."

As soon as they were clear from the shore, Captain Drew ordered his followers to rest for a few moments on their oars, and, while the current was hurrying them towards the Falls of Niagara, which were immediately below them, he briefly explained to the crew the duty he required them to perform, and the post respectively to be assigned to each. Silence was then preserved until Captain Drew's boat came within fifteen yards of the steamer (which was obscurely seen moored to the American wharf at Fort Schlosser,) when the sentinel on board in a hurried manner called out "Boat ahoy! boat ahoy! Who comes there?"

A man in the bow of the leading boat replied "Friend!" on which the sentinel called for the countersign. "I'll give it to you when we get on board," replied Captain Drew, who, by this time being close to the vessel, boarded her on the starboard gang-way, and, from an over-anxiety in his crew to follow him, it so happened that for more than a minute he was the only assailant on the pirate's deck. Captain Drew then encountered five men, one of whom fired his musket close to his face, but, missing, he (Captain Drew) immediately cut him down.

Captain Drew then disabled another of the pirates, and, with the flat of his sword, driving the other three before him, occasionally hastening them with the point, he made them step from the vessel to the wharf.

By this time Lieutenant M'Cormack had boarded on the starboard bow, and it being so dark that he could not recognize the men he found there, he asked them "if they were friends or enemies?" One of them replied, "An enemy!" and immediately firing, shot him through the left arm. Lieutenant M'Cormack instantly cut this man down; several of the pirates then fired upon Lieutenant M'Cormack, and wounded him in five places; yet, in spite of this, he effectually disabled another of them, and then sinking from loss of blood, the vessel was carried, when Captain Drew immediately ordered a party of his men to cut her off.

It was, however, found that she was moored to the wharf by chains from the bow and quarter, which it required nearly fifteen minutes to unloose.

During this delay the American guard stationed at the inn above Fort Schlosser turned out and commenced firing upon the assailants; in consequence of this Lieutenant Elmsley, R. N., heading a volunteer party of sixteen men, armed with nothing but their cutlasses, advanced about thirty yards towards them, and, forming in line, they gallantly stood there to protect the vessel against the American riflemen until the chain cables were cast off.

The crews, now returning to their respective boats towed the vessel from the wharf, but the current irrevocably drifting her towards the Falls of Niagara, Captain Drew, assisted by one man, set her on fire, and, as soon as she was fairly towed into the stream, the assailants, finding she was more than they could hold, let her go, and, giving her three British cheers, they rapidly pulled away for their own shore, while the pirate steamer slowly glided towards her doom!

A small light glowing within her suddenly burst from her hold, and in a few minutes the guilty vessel, enveloped in flames, was seen hurrying towards the rapids, down which she hastily descended until, reaching the crest of the Great Horse-shoe Falls, over she went.

Your Lordship will imagine, better than it is possible to describe, the solemn magnificence of this spectacle; yet it does not exceed the moral picture exhibited at the capture of the vessel.

The justness of the cause, the noble project of the attack, the coolness with which it was executed, and, lastly, the mercy that was shown by our brave fellows the moment the vessel was their own, are naval characteristics which reflect honour on the British empire in general, and on this noble province in particular.

I therefore feel it my duty to request your Lordship to lay my humble testimony of the merits of Captain Drew (whose intrepidity and generosity are beyond all praise) before the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, to whose liberal consideration I beg leave most earnestly, but respectfully, to recommend him.

I also feel it my duty to bring before their Lordship's especial consideration the case of Lieutenant M'Cormack, who is still lying on his back completely disabled, and I much fear that one of his five wounds will require the amputation of his left arm.*

* I visited this officer shortly after he was brought on shore, with five gun-shot wounds through him. He was of course in a high fever, but, even in that state, he expressed the satisfaction he felt at having had an opportunity of serving his country.

This loss to a backwoodsman, upon whose manual labour his family is dependent for support, is irreparable; and I feel confident that her Majesty's Government will consider that, as it is highly advantageous that the Queen should be enabled to call upon the retired naval officers in this province whenever their professional services on the lakes may suddenly be required, so it is not only just, but politic, that, if disabled, they should not be allowed to suffer from privations which might tend to deter others from following their noble and patriotic example.

Although naval or military officers when called upon by their Government are in no way responsible for the political consequences of the daring measures they are ordered to effect, yet I cannot help assuring your Lordship that the capture of the Caroline has been productive of the most beneficial consequences. Before it took place American "sympathy" for our absconded traitors was unbridled and unchecked.

The state arsenals were openly plundered, subscriptions were openly collected, provisions as well as munitions of war, were openly supplied; and while her Majesty's Government in Upper Canada was subjected to enormous expenses, and while the unoffending inhabitants of this province were kept in a state of painful anxiety, the inhabitants of the American frontier were actually amusing themselves at our sufferings, and were even making parties of pleasure for the purpose of inspecting the preparations on Navy Island.

No sooner, however, was the Caroline in flames than a sudden excitement prevailed; but it was the excitement of fear. The women fled from the villages on the coast—people who had fancied themselves bed-ridden decamped—and the citizens of Buffalo evinced the greatest possible consternation for the safety of their town.

Immense expenses were immediately incurred by the Americans for the purpose of self-defence, and, considering how much Upper Canada had been obliged to expend on this principle, I trust your Lordship will admit that it was salutary, politic, and, above all, just, to make our American allies participate in the lamentable consequences of their own perfidy towards us.

Of course there were not wanting those who argued that the excitement produced by this bold act of justice would irritate our assailants; however, it may be observed that it is impossible to make war palatable to one's enemy, and that, indeed, it is not advisable it should be so.

The result has now spoken for itself. The pirates have fled from Navy Island, their plan of invading the Niagara frontier has been abandoned, and our allies, arrantly ashamed of themselves, are now merely our enemies from that odd principle in human nature, which invariably makes men hate and envy those whom they have injured.

Our militia forces on the frontier have nearly all been allowed to retire to their homes; but, as the flotilla of boats requires to be guarded, and as I think it highly advisable that some officer of experience should watch the naval movements of the Americans, I have directed Captain Drew, by two orders, (copies of which are herewith enclosed,) to continue his pendant flying until I shall have had time to communicate to your Lordship.

As the expense of this precaution and observation will be very trifling, I would strongly recommend that it should be continued for at least a year; for, as several vessels are now building on the lake, it would be prudent that we should have some one whose duty it is to ascertain whether any suspicious alteration is effected in their structure.

Trusting that your Lordship will offer to the Lords of the Admiralty my apology, in case I should have given any orders they may see reason to disapprove of, and that you will be so good as to lay before them Colonel M'Nab's recommendation in favour of Lieutenant Elmsley, a member of my Executive Council, to whose intrepidity I can myself bear testimony.

I have, &c.

To the Right Honourable the LORD GLENELG.

In reading the foregoing despatch, as also the documents appended to it, the reader will, I think, join with me in regretting that, although this was the first naval victory in her Majesty's reign, my unceasing applications for the promotion of Captain Drew, and for a pension for Lieut. M'Cormack, neither of whom I had ever seen before they captured the Caroline, have been unavailing!

TORONTO, 20th December, 1837.

SIR,

I am commanded by the Lieutenant-Governor to inform you that, should you require the assistance of naval officers of experience to recover possession for her Majesty of Navy Island, his Excellency desires that you will call upon such naval officers in the province as you may deem proper to select to afford him their services, and that you will explain to them that they will receive their full pay during the period they are thus publicly employed by his Excellency in her Majesty's service.

I have, &amp;c.

HON COLONEL M'NAB.

By me, Allan Napier M'Nab, Colonel Commanding her Majesty's Forces on the Niagara Frontier.

By virtue of the power and authority vested in me, as the Colonel Commanding Her Majesty's forces on this frontier, by his Excellency Sir Francis Bond Head, Baronet, &c. &c. Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Upper Canada, in a despatch dated this twentieth day of December instant, commanding me to call forth the services of such officers of her Majesty's Royal Navy as may be necessary for the purpose of organizing an armed naval force to co-operate with the troops under my command in the reduction of Navy Island.

I hereby authorize you to take upon yourself the charge and command of the naval department, to act in concert with me. You will organize such a force of armed vessels and boats for a flotilla as will protect the landing, and transport one thousand men from the Canadian shore to Navy Island.

You will also make such other arrangements as in your judgment you may think necessary for the good of her Majesty's service, and for effecting the object of the expedition. For which this shall be your sufficient warrant.

Given under my hand at _____, this twentieth day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven.

Commander ANDREW DREW.

NIAGARA FRONTIER,
CHIPPEWA, January 17th, 1838.

Navy Island having been evacuated by the rebels, you will immediately proceed to lay up the vessels and boats composing the flotilla under your command in safety for the winter.

You are hereby authorised to continue on the spot yourself until further orders, with such a complement of naval officers and seamen as you may deem sufficient to take proper care of the flotilla.

CAPTAIN DREW, Chippewa.

SIR,

TORONTO, February 4th, 1838.

You are hereby Commanded,—in addition to the duties already pointed out to you, of protecting the property of her Majesty lately employed in the Naval Department, and placing the schooners and flotilla in a place of security,—to use your utmost endeavours to procure such information of the movements of the rebels, or any other persons inimical to her Majesty's Government, as may conduce to the interest of her Majesty's service; taking care, however, to be extremely cautious and circumspect in the discharge of your duty; to avoid everything that could in the least degree compromise the dignity of her Majesty's Government, or give just cause of complaint to the Government of any other country at peace with Great Britain. You will report your movements to me, as also to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, as often as occasion may require; and you will continue your pendant flying, until I shall have had time to communicate these instructions to her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies.

HEAD QUARTERS,
CHIFFEWA, January 20th, 1838.

SIR,

I have the honour to enclose the report of Captain Drew, R. N. commanding the Naval Brigade on the Niagara River; and the services of that force being no longer required, I have given them leave (with the exception of Captain Drew) to return to their homes. That valuable officer will retain a sufficient number of officers and men to dismantle the vessels and lay them up.

The conduct of Captain Drew, and the volunteers under his command, has been most efficient since they joined the service. Where all have so nobly done their duty, it may appear improper to mention the names of individuals who have signalized themselves while on this station; I cannot, however, refrain from mentioning the names of Lieutenants M'Cormack and Elmsley; the former was dangerously wounded in gallantly boarding the Caroline, and is still in the hospital; the latter has been actively employed, almost day and night since he joined Captain Drew's squadron; and I am authorised by Captain Drew to say, that he has received the most valuable services from that officer; and I do Lieut. Elmsley but justice in saying, that the dangerous nature of the duty which was assigned to him brought him more under the fire of the enemy than any other under my command.

I have, &c.

No. 18.

TORONTO, Upper Canada, 21st Feb. 1838.

MY LORD:

I have the honour to inform your Lordship, that having consulted my Executive Council, and the Speakers of the Legislative Council, and the House of Assembly, I yesterday determined that on Tuesday, the 27th instant, I would prorogue the Provincial Parliament.

I feel confident that by doing so I shall relieve Sir George Arthur (whose departure from England we have not yet heard of) from the very difficult and embarrassing situation in which he would be placed, were he, on his arrival here as a stranger, to be suddenly called on to assent or dissent from bills, on the policy or impolicy of which he had no time to consider.

I feel confident, it is only fair to Sir George Arthur, that he should have a few months leisure before he be called upon to meet the Legislature.

I may also inform your Lordship, that in consequence of the disturbed state of Lower Canada, and of the United States, many of the members have felt it advisable to return to their constituents, and that others are very desirous to do so.

I have, &c.

F. B. HEAD.

The Right Honourable,
LORD GLENELG.

When, labouring in a distant country, one has been by public opinion unjustly reviled, there is something highly gratifying in that retributive justice with which in England, the error is generously admitted, so soon as by the light of truth it is clearly perceived.

This observation particularly alludes to the sentiments contained in the following speech, which at the time it was promulgated were declared in England to be a libel on the Americans; and yet these sentiments have at last nobly resounded, infinitely louder than I proclaimed them, in both Houses of the Imperial Parliament.

*Honourable Gentlemen of the Legislative Council: and,
Gentlemen of the House of Assembly:*

Considering the circumstances under which you were hastily assembled, it is satisfactory to me to observe that you have been enabled, notwithstanding occasional anxiety from attempted invasions of our frontier, to give your deliberate attention to the public interests, and to mature some valuable measures.

Gentlemen of the House of Assembly:

I thank you for the supplies which you have granted for the support of the Civil Government during the present year.

Honourable Gentlemen, and Gentlemen:

I regret to say that there still exists, among a portion of the American people, so strong a desire to force upon the free inhabitants of this province republican institutions, that, with scarcely an exception, every Government arsenal, from Lake Champlain to Lake Michigan, has within the last two months been broken open and plundered, to furnish arms for the invasion of this portion of the British empire; and, however the circumstance may be explained, it is certainly a remarkable fact, that all these robberies have been effected without the sacrifice of a single life, and without even the imprisonment of the person who is notoriously the instigator of these acts.

The wrong which citizens of the neighbouring States have committed, by thus attempting to dictate to the inhabitants of Upper Canada the form of government under which they are henceforward to exist, will, as the assertion of a new theory, be condemned by the civilized world as severely as in practice it has been repudiated by the people of this province.

What right, it will be calmly asked, have the inhabitants of one country, armed with the artillery and weapons of their Government, to interfere with the political institutions of another? What excuse, it will be gravely considered, had citizens of the United States for invading the territory of Upper Canada?

When our coloured population were informed that American citizens, sympathising with their sufferings, had taken violent possession of Navy Island, for the double object of liberating them from the domination of British rule, and of imparting to them the blessings of republican institutions, based upon the principle that all men are born equal, did our coloured brethren hail their approach? No! on the contrary, they hastened as volunteers in wagon-loads to the Niagara frontier to beg from me permission that, in the intended attack upon Navy Island, they might be permitted to form the forlorn hope—in short they supplicated, that they might be allowed to be foremost to defend the glorious institutions of Great Britain.

When the mild Aborigines of this Continent, who live among us uninjured and respected, were informed that citizens of the United States, disregarding the wampum-belt which was sacredly connecting them with Great Britain, had invaded our shores to sympathise with the sufferings of the red tenants of the forest, and to offer them American friendship instead of the enmity of British rule, did our Indian brethren hail their approach? No, their chiefs and warriors instantly painted their faces for battle, and with rifles in their hands these free-born defenders of their virgin soil appeared before me with a solitary request, namely, that in case of their death their wives and children might be pensioned. The Six Nations Indians, the Missisaguas, the Chippewa, the Hurons and the Ottawas, spontaneously competed with each other in a determination to die, if necessary in defending the British Government, under whose parental protection they and their fathers had been born.

When the Canadian farmers and yeomen of British origin were informed that citizens of the United States sympathising with their sufferings, had in three instances taken forcible possession of Her Majesty's territory, for the purpose of liberating them from British domination—that, with this object in view, the American leaders had issued proclamations, promising to each liberator three hundred acres of the best lands of Upper Canada, with one hundred dollars in silver,—that the American self-styled General in command of the liberators had called upon the citizens of Upper Canada “to free their land from tyranny”—to rally round the standard of liberty”—“to lay down their arms”—in which case, it was beneficently promised to them that “their persons and property should be protected,” and that if they would “cease resistance, all would be well with them,”—did the Canadian inhabitants hail their approach? No, on the contrary, their brave and loyal militia, although totally deprived of the assistance of her Majesty's regular troops, rose simultaneously, and, regardless of every private consideration, wherever the invaders appeared, thousands of bayonets were seen bristling on our shore, ready to receive them. On the eastern, as well as on the western frontier, but one feeling prevailed,—it was a noble determination on the part of free men to conquer or die in defence of their religion—their constitution—their character—their families—and their farms; yet, notwithstanding their excited feelings, when the American citizens, who, from an armed schooner, had cruelly battered the town of Amherstburg, fell into the hands of the brave militia of the Western District (in which not a single rebel had been in arms,) did these prisoners fall victims to popular fury, or were they even insulted? No; the instant our invaders surrendered to British power, they experienced that mercy which adorns the British name,—their wounds were healed at our hospitals,—and, from the western extremity of Upper Canada, they were conducted unharmed through the province, safe under the protecting ægis of our laws!

When a band of rebels, defeated in their cruel object to reduce this capital to ashes in the depth of a Canadian winter, were, after the conflict at Gallows Hill, brought to me as prisoners on the field—was any distinction made between American-born and our other Canadian subjects? No, all were released. Before the assembled militia of Upper Canada all were equally pardoned; and though many of our brave men, smarting under feelings natural at the moment, evidently disapproved of the decision, yet all bowed in obedience to the administrator of the laws, and, under the noble influence of Monarchical Government, they allowed their assailants to pass uninjured through their ranks.

When the gallant inhabitants of the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia received intelligence that American citizens had commenced an attempt to free the British North American Colonies "from the tyranny of British rule," did they rejoice at the event? No; a burst of loyalty resounded through their lands, and a general desire to assist us was evinced.

If Upper Canada were merely a young, healthy province, with no protection on the continent of America but its character, its industry, and the agricultural difficulties it has to contend with—its filial attachment to its Government—the bravery it has shown in its defence—and the mercy it has extended to its captured assailants, ought to be sufficient to make its aggressors ashamed of their late attempt to force upon their neighbors institutions which they conscientiously and unequivocally reject. But when it is considered that Upper Canada is an integral portion of the British empire, and that the two countries are at this moment bound together by a solemn treaty of peace, the faithless attack of citizens of the United States upon the province, after it had completely quelled a slight domestic insurrection, will, if persisted in, excite feelings among the generous nations of Europe, which will add but little to the character of republican institutions; for surely the smile of a nation should not be more dreaded than its frown, or its extended hand be more fatal than its uplifted arm.

When the facts just stated are clearly comprehended by intelligent men, how will the American citizens, who have so wantonly attacked the British empire, find it possible to explain that the province of Upper Canada required them to interfere in its concerns?

There are two facts which the American nation have not power to deny.

1st. That it is their interest as well as their duty to fulfil their treaties.

2nd. That if their people be permitted to rob the United States arsenals in order to invade a friendly power, the lawless body will very soon find out that it is easier to plunder their own wealthy, defenceless citizens, than the poor, brave, well-armed people of Upper Canada.

I have felt it to be the especial duty of the legislative station I hold, not only to protest against the unprincipled invasion of this province by its allies, but to vindicate the inhabitants from the unreasonable accusation, which, without due inquiry, was made against them by the federal Government of the United States, of having "assassinated" the crew of the Caroline.

The memoir of the attack which has just been made upon us, offers a moral to the mother-country which I feel confident will create throughout the empire considerable sensation; for, although the old country is not without its share of human misapprehension and prejudice, particularly as regards its transatlantic possessions, yet, when facts are clearly submitted to it, its judgment is always sound, and its verdict nobly impartial.

The struggle on this continent between monarchy and democracy has been a problem which Upper Canada has just solved.

It has been very strongly argued, even in England, that democracy was the only form of government indigenous to the soil of America, and that monarchy was a power which required here artificial support.

With a view to subvert this theory, the whole of the Queen's troops were allowed to retire from the province, and, the result, as had been anticipated, was, that the people of Upper Canada were no sooner left uncontrolled than they proclaimed themselves in favour of monarchical institutions. Surrounded by temptations on almost every side, they indignantly rejected them all; in a few hours they successfully put down insurrection in their own land; and when American citizens, astonished as well as disappointed at their loyalty, determined to force them to become Republicans, people of all religions, and of all politics, rushed to the frontier to die in defence of their glorious constitution.

The conduct of the Militia of Upper Canada attracted the attention of the gallant and loyal inhabitants of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, whose Legislatures have done themselves, as well as this province, the honour of promptly expressing their unqualified approbation of the attachment which has been evinced here to the British constitution.

When these facts shall arrive before the English people, and when they shall also have taken into their consideration the devoted and unalterable attachment which the British population of Lower Canada have evinced for our revered institutions, surely they will come to the conclusion that the concurrent opinions of her Majesty's North American Colonies, respecting the relative advantages between monarchy and democracy in America, must be sounder than their own can be, inasmuch as eye-witnesses judge more correctly than people can possibly do who are living four thousand miles off.

The people of England will, I trust, not fail to admire the calmness, the resolution, the generosity, and the honourable subjection to their laws, which have distinguished the inhabitants of Upper Canada; and on the other hand, they certainly cannot fail to observe that the republican project of our English Reformers, namely, to make the people, bit by bit, responsible only to themselves, has ended, in America, by the Government of the United States confessing its total inability to restrain the passions of its citizens, to guard its state arsenals, or to maintain its treaties with its oldest and most natural ally.

Lastly, the British people will, I trust, observe with considerable alarm, that the leading advocates for organic changes in our institutions are either at this moment lying in our gaols as traitors, or, from having absconded, are self-banished from the province;—in short, that their pretended efforts to obtain in Upper Canada, what they called "LIBERTY FOR THE PEOPLE," has ended in a most infamous and self interested attempt to plunder private property, rob the banks, and burn to ashes the rising capital of their country!

With this experience before our eyes, I must confess I join with the Legislature and people of Upper Canada in shuddering at the abused name of "reform," just as we now recoil with abhorrence when we hear suddenly pronounced the word "sympathy."

As my successor is hourly expected here, I return to the mother-country as I left it, totally unconnected with party or with politics; but in retirement I shall remember the lessons which the people of Upper Canada have taught me; and I feel it my duty to declare, that I leave the continent of America with my judgment perfectly convinced, that the inhabitants of Europe, Asia and Africa, are right in their opinion that all men are not by nature equal,—that the assertion to the contrary in America is a fallacy,—and that talent, industry and character, must elevate individuals, as they do nations, in the graduated scale of society.

May the resplendent genius of the British constitution ever continue to illuminate this noble land, and, animated by its influence, may its inhabitants continue to be distinguished for humility of demeanour—nobility of mind—fidelity to their allies—courage before their enemy—mercy in victory—integrity in commerce—reverence for their religion—and, at all times, and under all circumstances, implicit obedience to their laws.

Honourable Gentlemen and Gentlemen,

FAREWELL!

TORONTO, 3rd March, 1838.

SIR,

"I have the honour to inform your Excellency that on the 22nd and 23rd ult. a body of American citizens with arms and cannon, under the command of Mr. Van Ransallaer and others (having previously broken open and robbed the United States arsenal at Watertown,) invaded and took possession of Hickory Island, a small territory belonging to her Majesty in the St. Lawrence, about sixteen miles below Kingston.

I have also the honour to transmit to your Excellency a copy of a communication I have received from Colonel the Hon. John Maitland, commanding her Majesty's forces on the western frontier, by which you will perceive that on the 25th ult. a similar invasion of the Queen's territory was committed by a large body of American citizens, who, from the province of Michigan, with arms and cannon, invaded and took possession of Fighting Island, a long slip of land situated between Sandwich and Amherstburgh.

I beg leave to call your Excellency's particular attention to the two circumstances remarked upon by Colonel Maitland, namely, that the arms which our gallant men captured from the perfidious invaders of our soil were new United States muskets, and that, when these ruffians were forcibly driven from our island, instead of being captured by the American authorities, they were allowed to form in line on the American Shore, from whence they opened a fire upon her Majesty's troops.

It only remains for me to apprise your Excellency that I have been informed, from undoubted authority, that, with scarcely an exception, every one of the United State arsenals, from Lake Champlain to Lake Michigan, have been broken open for the purpose of enabling American citizens to invade us; and it is an act of atrocity unrecorded in the history of civilized nations, that Van Rensselaer and M'Kenzie, who have instigated their followers to these acts, remain to this moment at liberty.

Besides the documents, I beg you will be so good as to convey to your Legislature, my thanks for the honour it has conferred upon me by connecting my name with the province of New Brunswick, which, in her Majesty's North American Colonies, has always been so conspicuous for its loyalty, and for its noble attachment to the principles of the British Constitution.

It gives me very great pleasure to be enabled further to request your Excellency to transmit to the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia the accompanying resolutions from the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of this province.

I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship a copy of an address which was read to me this day, while seated on the Throne, by the Speaker of the House of Assembly.

Copy of the Speaker's Address

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

We, her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Upper Canada, have granted to our Sovereign Lady the Queen the supplies necessary to enable her Majesty to carry on the civil government of this province for the present year.

Upon looking back upon the various important communications which have been made by your Excellency to the House of Assembly during the present session, we cannot but congratulate you and the country upon the firm and noble attitude assumed by your Excellency in all those public documents which have emanated from your Excellency.

When we reflect upon the serious occurrences that have taken place in Upper Canada, and upon its borders, within a few months past, and upon the distinguished part taken by your Excellency to maintain the honour and interests of our country during that short but eventful period, we find equal cause of gratulation. Rebellion has been crushed, the attacks of perfidious citizens of a foreign power have been repelled, and peace reigns triumphant within the bounds of your Excellency's government. We trust that the provisions of the militia-law, to which your Excellency has just given the royal assent, may, under Divine Providence, contribute to the preservation of this loyal portion of the British Empire from the aggression of all enemies, whether foreign or domestic.

From the message of Your Excellency, transmitted to both Houses of the Legislature, we have too much reason to believe that the present will be the last time we ever shall have the honour of meeting your Excellency on an occasion like the present.

In the name of the people of this province, I offer to your Excellency the expression of their deep regret that your Excellency should have felt constrained to tender to her Majesty your resignation of the government of this province, which your Excellency has administered with so much credit to yourself and advantage to the country.

The people of Upper Canada will ever retain a grateful recollection of the services of your Excellency; and they feel assured your Excellency will meet with a due reward at the hands of our youthful and beloved Queen.

It now only remains for me to present to your Excellency, for the royal assent, the Bill to provide for the civil government of this province for the current year.

Toronto, 14th March, 1838.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship a copy of a despatch from Colonel the Honourable John Maitland, commanding the forces in the western district, detailing the gallant manner in which he marched against a large body of organised Americans, who had taken possession of Point Pelé Island, which they had invaded.

Your Lordship will perceive that the American force retreated as soon as he advanced, and, traversing the island, which is nine miles long, quicker than it was possible for him to follow them, they came in sight of a couple of companies of the 32nd Regiment, under the command of Captain Brown, which had been purposely stationed on the ice, with a view to cut off their retreat to the American shore.

The Americans, seeing this small party, determined to attack them with their whole force, and, advancing toward them, they availed themselves of a quantity of broken ice, behind which they were, to a certain degree, protected, and then opened their fire.

In a short time about thirty of our brave men fell, and there can be no doubt that in a few minutes they must have been all mowed down by the destructive fire of so many rifles and muskets, had not Captain Brown, with admirable decision, ordered his men to charge.

The Republicans stood their ground until the monarchical troops arrived within about twenty yards of them, when, abandoning their position, as also their principle that "all men are born equal," they decamped in the greatest confusion, and reached the shore; and, had they there rallied behind the trees, it would have been impossible for so small a party of men to have dislodged them; however, they continued to retreat, and were completely driven from our island.

If your Lordship will be so good as to compare the date of this action with the attacks that were made about the same day upon the province at Hickery Island, near Kingston, and at Pantalino, opposite Buffalo, you will perceive that a simultaneous effort was made to gain possession of Upper Canada.

In all quarters it has been repulsed, and I am happy to say that in no instance have our faithless allies dared to attack the main land, their attempts at conquest having only been directed upon our own islands.

I have every reason to believe that this is the last effort which will be made; and I have no doubt that its expected success has been the reason why the Federal Government at Washington have so unaccountably delayed to legislate on the subject of these unprincipled aggressions.

Seeing that they can make no impression upon us, I fully expect they will now adopt measures which they should not have delayed.

I hear from every quarter that the excitement, or sympathy, in the United States is rapidly subsiding.

In the attack at Point Pelé Island, the Americans not only lost their commanding officer, but, the following day, General Sutherland, the author of the proclamations alluded to in my speech on proroguing the Legislature, was, with his aid-de-camp, Captain Spencer, taken prisoner, and, two days ago, they were brought here, through the province, under a guard only of twelve men.

I immediately ordered Mr. Sutherland to be tried by a Court-martial, before which he was yesterday arraigned.

In the course of last night he managed to open veins in each arm and in each instep, and this morning he was found nearly lifeless from the loss of blood; in consequence of which, the Court-martial has adjourned until Saturday.

P. S.—I have this morning received, for the first time, intelligence of the departure from England of Sir George Arthur, but I have not yet heard of his arrival at New York. I find that Colonel Maitland's despatches are in the hands of the Judge Advocate of the Court-martial, and I fear they can scarcely be copied in time for this mail.

GARRISON, TORONTO, 22nd March, 1838.

Sir,

In compliance with the wish expressed by your Excellency, that I would reduce to writing that part of the conversation that I had with the prisoner, Thomas Jefferson Sutherland, on the 13th instant, which related to the United States Government, I have the honour to transmit, for your Excellency's information, the following statement, which, as nearly as I can recollect, is correct.

While visiting the prisoner, on the evening of the 13th, with the officers of the guard, I was requested by Sutherland to sit a short time and converse with him. Having ascertained that I did not belong to the Militia, or was connected with the Court-martial then sitting for his trial, he entered freely into conversation, but chiefly on the politics of the country, and stated his own views, and, as he said, those of his Government, for the line of conduct lately pursued by them.

He said it was the aim of the United States to become a great naval nation; that they could not be a military one, as a standing army of any force was not compatible with their institutions, and, instead of supporting the Government, would be first to cause its overthrow; therefore their attention was directed to their navy, and their means of increasing it: the greatest obstacle they had to contend against was the possession by Great Britain of the Canadas, from which she could, at any moment, throw a large body of troops into their territory. It was their determination, at all hazards, to obtain the Canadas as they had Texas, and then they would have the sea-board from the Gulf of Florida to the Northern Ocean.

I asked him, when he said "they," did he mean the people of the United States, or the Government? His answer was, that the people of the United States were the Government, and the will of the people was the law, by which their rulers must abide; that in the acts of the Americans in favour of the insurrection in this province, and in the Proclamation of the President and General Scott to put down the meetings and arm the Patriots, the Government had acted with duplicity, for it was not their wish or their intention to suppress them; "In fact," said he, "it is a piece of humbug on their part; and, as a proof of it, I will now tell you that none of the arsenals were robb'd of the arms, but the doors were opened, and we were told to help ourselves."

This is all I remember which I consider material for your Excellency to be acquainted with, and, trusting it may meet with your approval,

I have the honour to be,

With great respect,

Your obedient humble servant,

MY LORD:

From the particular circumstances under which I have been placed here, I have felt it necessary to agitate the public mind more than was congenial to my habits, or perhaps, more correctly speaking, to the station I hold.

It is not my desire to defend the irregularity, which I am sensible can only be excused by its success; but, inasmuch as the animosity which I have purposely endeavoured to create in Upper Canada against republican institutions may be considered by her Majesty's Government to amount to an expression of opinion on my part in favour of actual hostility against the United States, I am anxious, before I leave the province, to explain to your Lordship that I am very far from desiring to recommend any such measure.

Although it has been absolutely necessary that by a species of agitation I should rally around me the loyal and brave militia of this province, yet I can assure your Lordship I have done so merely on the defensive principle, and that nothing has been further from my intention than to do anything offensive to the Americans or their Government.

To all those in authority under me I have strongly recommended this course of procedure, and I enclose to your Lordship a private letter (A) which I some time ago addressed to the Governor of the neighbouring State of New York, which will, I believe, satisfy your Lordship, of the desire I evinced to co-operate with the American authorities in maintaining our treaty inviolate.

I have not time, nor would it be perhaps proper that I should now detail to her Majesty's Government the many reasons which, in my humble opinion, exist against our declaring war with the United States; but on my arrival in England, should it be desired, I would do so; and it would certainly give me very great satisfaction to be enabled to contribute towards an object of so much importance to humanity in general, and to the British empire in particular.

TORONTO, December 27th, 1837.

DEAR SIR,

I have just received information that your Excellency has taken the trouble to come to Buffalo, for the purpose of preserving the peace which has so long happily existed between Great Britain and the United States.

This exertion on the part of your Excellency is, I can assure you, duly appreciated by me, and it has induced me to determine on crossing over to Niagara to-morrow, from whence I will proceed to Fort Erie, and will have the pleasure of calling on your Excellency at Buffalo, at any hour, and at any place in the city,* on Friday the 29th instant, which your Excellency may be so kind as to appoint, in a note addressed to me, to the care of the officer commanding the Canada Militia, at Chippewa.

SIR,

I have just received your letter of the 27th ultimo, directed to me at Buffalo, and forwarded to this place. Your Excellency was misinformed as to my being at Buffalo at the time you addressed me. Had I been there, I should have readily assented to the proposed interview, in the hopes it might have led to some arrangement calculated to preserve the mutual relations between the United States and her Britannic Majesty's provinces of Canada, and quiet the apprehensions of the inhabitants on the frontier.

I have, &c.

W. L. MARCY.

His Excellency SIR FRANCIS BOND HEAD,
Lieutenant Governor.

* This visit would have been attended with some little risk, as the people of Buffalo were so highly excited, yet I thought they would surely respect me as the guest of their own Governor.

At the time I wrote this despatch to the Colonial Office, my reasons for recommending that we should avoid going to war with America rested on the same grounds as the reasons which had induced me to recommend a moral instead of a military government of our British North American provinces.

When the Americans began to invade us, if her Majesty's Government had supported me in calmly calling upon them, before the civilized world, to perform the duty they owed to the human character, and to the human family;—if remonstrance after remonstrance had publicly been administered to them until the old nations of Europe began to look askance at them, to mistrust their promises, and to recoil from their friendship; if, while this cheap moral medicine was working its effect, every robber invading Upper Canada, under the protection of no government, and under no national flag, had been, without exception, quickly hung, as, by the laws of nations, pirates always have been hung, there exists, I believe, no people on earth who would more sensitively have felt their disreputable station, and who more nobly and more promptly would have risen to redeem their national character, than the citizens of the United States, who, like all men, however brave they may be, cannot long bear up against being everywhere calmly looked down upon by men of honour.

If this simple policy had been pursued, about two millions of money would have been saved, and the difficulties of adjustment, which have now (hidden though they be) risen to an alarming degree, would have been arrested. But what has been our course?

When I calmly called shame upon the American people, it was said I was rashly offending them. When the piratical steamer, the Caroline, chartered to carry offensive weapons and invaders to her Majesty's island was gallantly captured, we were told we should involve the country in war. When robbers, who had invaded Upper Canada to murder its people became our prisoners, with uplifted eyes we were called upon, in the name of mercy, not to hurt them. When the Indian warriors, painting their faces, rose to defend their native territory against people whose savage fury made them mutilate with their bowie knives the very corpses of our officers, soldiers, and militia, it was preached to us, as from a tub, that Indian warfare ought not to be allowed!

In short, with democracy attacking us in all quarters, we were discouraged from defending ourselves either by word or deed; and, of course, under these circumstances, invincible moral power was gradually substituted by a costly military force, which is now hanging upon the neck of the nation as the mark of its abject weakness, rather than as the proof of its strength!

A country may undeniably submit to be insulted by its neighbouring government if it chooses, but surely it cannot be denied that a civilized community has no right whatever to compromise the laws of nations, by quietly submitting to piracy, which it is the bounden duty of all men to unite in suppressing. We have neglected this duty, and it now remains for us to pay a disgraceful penalty which is yearly increasing in geometrical progression.

Upper Canada, Toronto, 20th March, 1838.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to enclose to your Lordship a printed copy of some addresses, &c., which have been presented to me in consequence of my resignation of the government of this province.

In justice to myself, as well as with a view to satisfy your Lordship, I am desirous of explaining that, on receiving your Lordship's despatch, informing me that my resignation had been accepted, and that my successor had been appointed, I at once determined to do everything in my power to prevent my departure from this province embarrassing my successor or the policy of her Majesty's Government.

I accordingly, without loss of time, mentioned to the Speaker of the Legislative Council, and the Attorney and Solicitor-Generals, who are members of the Lower House, it was my anxious desire that no private considerations should induce the Legislature to forget for a moment that we had an enemy on our frontier that could only be repelled by unanimity and high feelings.

I made a similar communication to the Mayor of Toronto, who came to inform me that some of the militia had thrown down their arms; and I can assure your Lordship that, whenever I had an opportunity, I did all in my power to allay the slight excitement which at first appeared to prevail.

As soon as some addresses reached me, I determined that I would return but one and the same short answer to them all, and, accordingly, I gave to the Constitutional Society of Quebec, and to various other public bodies, the identical reply which I had given to the blacks and Indians.

I have just declined to accept a public dinner in my way through Montreal; I shall do the same to a similar invitation which I see is in preparation at Quebec; and if, on my arrival in that city, I should find it unsafe for me even to go by the Kennebec road to New York, and should consequently proceed to England by Halifax, in travelling through the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia I shall pursue a similar course.

As Sir George Arthur has, I am informed, already reached Montreal, his arrival here is hourly expected.

I therefore take this opportunity, which may possibly be my last official despatch from this Government, to assure your Lordship that, in the opposition I have offered to the commands of Her Majesty's Government, and in the unreserved expression of my opinions, I have solely been guided by a sense of public duty, in defence of which I have nothing further to say; I hope, however, I shall not in vain request your Lordship to feel assured that it was never my intention to be disrespectful to your Lordship. If anything I have written bears that construction, I beg leave unequivocally to apologise for it.

I have the honour to be, &c.

CHAPTER XII.

Arrival in London.—Interview with the Secretary of State.—Letter to Lord Melbourne.—Correspondence with the Colonial Office.

On my arrival in London, I solicited an interview in Downing-street, with Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, for the purpose of urging the claims upon Her Majesty's Government of Colonel FitzGibbon, who had commanded the attack of the rebels at Gallows Hill—of Captain Drew, who had commanded the successful attack of the Caroline—of Lieut. M'Cormack, who had been wounded, and disabled there—and of the Widow of Colonel Moodie, who had been cruelly murdered as he was gallantly bringing me intelligence of the approach of the rebels.

Having performed these duties of public gratitude for public services, I calmly complained to his Lordship of the want of due support from Her Majesty's Government on the most important occasions. What were my feelings on this and other similar subjects will, however, best be explained by a letter which I subsequently addressed to Lord Melbourne; but before I come to that, I feel bound in justice to the Government to mention an otherwise insignificant matter—namely, the pecuniary loss occasioned to me by my mission. I have already stated, that out of £300 originally granted to me for outfit, £230 had been retained for fees on my commission, and that the appointment of my Aid-de-camp had been annulled.

Suffice it to say, that Her Majesty's Government have, with strict justice, recently repaid me the whole of my expenses, and that my Aid-de-camp was restored to me at Toronto, about five months after his appointment had been suspended.

On more important points I have not (as the following letter will show) been quite so fortunate.

TO LORD MELBOURNE.

Barford, Warwick, Sept. 18, 1838.

MY LORD,

During the session of Parliament I was unwilling to trouble Her Majesty's Government with the following application for redress, which I trust will now receive from your Lordship a patient consideration.

My Lord, without recapitulating in detail the various by-gone difficulties, which for more than two years I encountered in administering the Government of Upper Canada, I will merely observe, that on my arrival in that province I found myself not only bounded on the one side by Lower Canada on the eve of a revolt, and, on the other side, by the United States, whose government, as well as people, were secretly using their influence to exterminate from the continent of America monarchical institutions, but I found myself exposed to, and opposed by, a Republican House of Assembly, headed by Mr. Speaker Bidwell, generally looked upon as the bitter enemy of monarchy, the untiring advocate of republican institutions, and the avowed friend, as well as correspondent, of the traitor Papineau, the Speaker of the House of Assembly in the Lower Province.

Previous to my arrival in Upper Canada, Mr. Bidwell, and the overwhelming majority who supported him, had determined to refuse to meet again in session until their revolutionary demands had been acceded to; and there can be no doubt if Mr. Bidwell had done this, and, without given any reason, had merely followed the example of Mr. Papineau, and the House of Assembly in the Lower Province, that the British Government, embarrassed by this double revolt, and by the simultaneous demands of the President of the United States respecting the State of Maine, would have found it almost impossible (even if they had wished it) to have persuaded the English House of Commons to have supported them in the expense of resisting what would have been vulgarly termed the unanimous desire of the North American Colonies for Republican institutions: in short, the Canadas would have been surrendered by us; and if the transatlantic barrier of the British Empire had been thus broken, the torrent of democracy, suddenly rushing upon the mother-country, might almost have over-turned our institutions at home. Fortunately, however, Mr. Bidwell and his party determined to go through the form of meeting me in Provincial Parliament; nevertheless, the day it assembled they endeavoured to pick a quarrel with me, and immediately followed up this attempt by a series of violent addresses to me, the revolutionary object of which could not be mistaken.

The published replies which I gave to these addresses not only parried the attacks made upon me, but struck a series of heavy blows upon my assailants, who becoming angry in proportion as they saw themselves publicly discomfited, prevailed upon their accomplice Dr. Rolph, a member of my Executive Council, to require me to surrender to the said Council the responsibility, power, and patronage which were the constitutional attributes of my station.

Until this demand was made I had, apparently, been gradually retreating before Mr. Bidwell and the House of Assembly, but no sooner did I perceive that by supporting this unjust demand of Dr. Rolph they had rashly encamped themselves with him upon a position from which I felt myself competent to drive them; than I determined on attacking them, and accordingly, throwing off all disguise, I refused their demands, dissolved the Parliament, and declaring myself on the continent of America, to be the uncompromising supporter of our Monarchy, and the open opponent of democratic institutions, I threw myself upon the people of Upper Canada, and appealing to their loyalty and good sense, I commenced a moral agitation which drew upon Upper Canada the almost breathless attention not only of the whole of our North American Colonies, but of the Government and people of the United States.

The excitement attendant upon a general election afforded me opportunities of addressing the backwoodsmen of the remotest regions of the province, in plain language, which, though deservedly open to diplomatic criticism, nevertheless circulated in all directions. My writings, faulty as they were, imparting to these honest freeholders truths of which they had been kept ignorant, not only dispelled the delusions which had been practised upon them, but made them one after another turn with indignation upon their betrayers.

During three months I maintained this conflict with the enemies of the British constitution, during which time Her Majesty's Government (probably believing that I should not be successful) deemed it politic to leave me unassisted to struggle with the storm. The crisis at last arrived, and when the elections were terminated the result proved, that inexperienced as I was in diplomatic controversies, I had not falsely estimated the power and majesty of a just cause.

My antagonist, Mr. Bidwell, was not only driven from the chair, but he was discarded even from the House of Assembly; in fact, he lost his election. Mr. M'Kenzie, as well as all the leading republican members, also lost their elections. Dr. Rolph's insidious machinations were totally discomfited, and the important result of the contest was the moral triumph on the continent of America of monarchical institutions; indeed, so decided was the opinion of the new Parliament on the subject, that one of the first acts of the House of Assembly was, to express, in the strongest terms, its indignation at a certain traitorous letter addressed by Mr. Papineau to Mr. Bidwell, which that gentleman, as his last act, had at midnight, on the last night of the session, managed, almost surreptitiously, to place upon the journals of the House.

The tranquillity which was thus obtained was not the effect of mere momentary excitement; on the contrary, it was suddenly and unexpectedly tested by the simultaneous stoppage of all the banks in the United States, as well as in Lower Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick. Upon principles irreconcilable with British commercial integrity, the whole of these institutions, though they had specie in their coffers, stopped payment. The banks of Upper Canada alone performed their engagements to the public creditor by honestly liquidating what they had promised to pay on demand. The odium and unpopularity unavoidably attendant upon their performance of this duty fell (I believe unjustly) almost wholly upon me. Nevertheless, the discomfiture of the Republicans was so complete that, in spite of the temporary unpopularity to which I have alluded, and to which I was subjected for nearly a year, I was enabled, when Mr. Papineau's insurrection in Lower Canada broke out, to grant to Lord Gosford and to Sir John Colborne the timely assistance of Her Majesty's troops from the Upper Province; and moreover, when the writings of Mr. M'Kenzie and Mr. Bidwell, and the traitorous conduct of Dr. Rolph, caused a sympathetic insurrection to break out in Upper Canada, I again, in a moment of unexampled difficulty, emphatically appealed to the good sense and good feelings of the people, and assuming the attitude which I humbly believed to be best suited to the occasion, with folded arms I publicly waited the result.

Her Majesty's Government observing the danger by which I was evidently surrounded, deemed it again politic to leave me to my fate; indeed, in the Imperial Parliament it was more than hinted that I was over chivalrous—that my writings (my only means of defence) were epigrammatic, and that the attitude I had publicly assumed was the effect of a distempered rather than of a serene mind. However, a just cause triumphed—the people of Upper Canada again most nobly responded to my call, and while people in England were accusing me of rashness, the Canadian militia not only promptly suppressed domestic insurrection, but in every direction successfully repulsed the people of the United States, who, apparently encouraged by their Government, attempted to rush in upon and take possession of the Canadas. Lastly, Dr. Rolph, Mr. M'Kenzie, and the whole of the leaders of the insurrection, absconded from the province; Mr. Bidwell also prudently retired into the United States, where he was received with open arms, and contrary to precedent, rule, and, I believe, law, he was raised, per saltum, to be advocate and attorney of the American bar.

My Lord, during the two years in which, as an inexperienced man, I was engaged in the arduous struggle which I have just imperfectly described, Her Majesty's Government not only cautiously abstained from the danger of taking any share in the difficulties I had to contend with—they not only abstained from giving me adequate support, but pursuing a policy as inexplicable to me as it was to the Provincial Parliament, and to every man, by whom I was supported—they seemed determined to pull down my authority, and to restore to power those whom, in a moral and almost a bloodless contest, I had defeated,

For instance, while I was publicly engaged in presence of the whole people of the North American Colonies, in struggling against the demands of Dr. Rolph, and his bosom-friend, Mr. Speaker Bidwell, I received from Downing-street intimation that it might be advisable to raise the former of these individuals to a place of high consequence, and to elevate the latter to the bench; and as if this were not sufficient to dishearten those who surrounded me, I was, without being offered the power of justifying myself, peremptorily ordered to replace on the bench Judge Ridout, who by the unanimous advice of my Council (the sister of one of whom was married to his brother,) I had dismissed, because he continued openly to attend and harangue the notorious Central Committee, because he had himself read to me an insulting address, and because he had violated all political decency by publicly declaring that I, the Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, deserved to be "tarred and feathered," and that he Judge Ridout, "would lend a hand to do so."

My Lord, my correspondence with Her Majesty's Government on these topics, teem with facts and uncontrovertible evidence, showing the violent political conduct during the whole of their lives, of Mr. Bidwell, and of Mr. Ridout, who were considered by my executive council, (whom I repeatedly consulted,) by the Chief Justice, by the Attorney and Solicitor-General, and by the bar, as unfit subjects, on account of the violence of their politics, for the honours proposed to be bestowed upon them by Her Majesty's Government.

To these earnest remonstrances on my part, and though the Province was upon the eve of a rebellion, Her Majesty's Government deemed it politic to reply by desiring me, at the next vacancy, to elevate Mr. Bidwell to the bench, and the Government persisted, moreover in withholding its approbation of my dismissal of Mr. Ridout!

My Lord, I belonged to no political party in England; I had propounded on the continent of America no political doctrines except, as I have already confessed, unalterable attachment to monarchical institutions, and uncompromising opposition to democracy. I had given Her Majesty's Government no just cause for offence, and having, unfortunately, at their repeated solicitations, given up my permanent situation (I was the senior of the twenty assistant-commissioners) in the Poor Law Commission, where, at least, I was serving to the satisfaction of my employers, I had, so far as the private interests of my family were concerned, made myself so completely dependent upon my station and salary of Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, the outfit for which had been very expensive, that I had every reason to desire to retain this appointment, and no reason whatever to quarrel with Her Majesty's Government; nevertheless, as soon as I found that Her Majesty's Government were really the open supporters against me, of such men as Mr. Bidwell and Mr. Ridout, without the slightest feeling, either of petulance or anger, and, I hope, without the expression of a sentiment of disrespect, I begged leave to retire from a most dangerous station, which, without the countenance of my employers, I had not the ability to maintain; in fact, Her Majesty's Government actually drove me from the field, and it is a singular fact, which your Lordship is aware is recorded in my despatches, that only six days after the Government despatch, which announced to me that my resignation was accepted, had left Downing Street, Dr. Rolph, one of the individuals recommended for elevation by the Colonial Office, actually arranged as the President of the Republican Provincial Government of Upper Canada, his murderous attack upon Toronto, which was attempted to be carried into effect by Mr. M'Kenzie, upon whose flag, (the emblem of arson and robbery) when it fell into the hands of the loyal Militia of Upper Canada, was found inscribed in large letters—

1837, and a good beginning!”

As soon as my retirement from the Government of Upper Canada was made known to the Provincial legislature, (upon whose addresses I declined to give copies of the correspondence with Her Majesty's Government, which led to my resignation,) I received from both branches addresses, containing expressions too complimentary for me to transcribe.

Not only from almost every town and district in Upper Canada, I received addresses of a similar nature, but the Legislatures, as well as people of Lower Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, forwarded to me the most gratifying addresses, and, as soon as it became known, that in order to avoid the personal danger which awaited me in the United States, I had taken measures for embarking at Halifax, preparations were immediately made in Lower Canada, as well as in New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, for receiving me in these Provinces with public honours.

I need not say, that under the peculiar circumstances attendant upon my retirement, from the loyal people of Upper Canada, it would have been not only highly gratifying but of essential service to me to have accepted from the whole of our North American Colonies (who, as by-standers, had been eye-witnesses of my conduct) this public testimony of their support; but I felt it would be of still greater advantage to me to demonstrate that my retirement from the service of Her Majesty's Government had proceeded solely from public principle, and that I had no factious desire either to embarrass my successor or the Government under which I had served. I, accordingly, went through the United States to New York, and your Lordship is aware, that instead of this measure being appreciated by Her Majesty's Government, it was by almost every member of it termed, “like my other acts, over-chivalrous and rash.”

On my arrival in England I was actuated by the same feelings, and, though the merchants in the City of London, connected with the North American Colonies, insisted, in a manner which I could not decline, on paying me a most honourable compliment, yet neither to them, nor even to my friends, did I divulge the cause of my return, or lay before them copies of the correspondence with Her Majesty's Government, which had led to my resignation. Neither directly nor indirectly did I either say, or write, to any man, one word, which could in any way embarrass Her Majesty's Government, and conscious of the integrity of my own conduct, I should, in my retirement, have still submitted silently to the wrongs which I conceive I have suffered, had it not been (as I now propose to show your Lordship, by a document, and by evidence which is unanswerable) that Her Majesty's Government suddenly turned round, and adopted as their own the very arguments, and the identical course of policy, for the pursuance of which they had driven me from the Government of Upper Canada.

The document to which I allude, and which relates to the dismissal by Her Majesty's Government of the Chief Justice of Newfoundland, is as follows:—

(Copy.)

“At the Court of Buckingham Palace, the 5th day of July, 1838.

PRESENT:.

THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

Lord Chancellor,

Lord President,

Lord Steward,

Earl of Albemarle,

Earl of Minto,

Viscount Palmerston,

Viscount Howick,

Lord Holland,

Lord Hill,

Lord Glenelg,

Sir J. Hobhouse,

Mr. Chancellor of Exchequer.

“WHEREAS there was this day read at the Board, a report from the Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee of Privy Council, dated this day, in the words following, viz.—

“In reporting to your Majesty upon the memorial, your Majesty has been pleased to refer to us, from your Majesty's Commons of Newfoundland, in General Assembly convened, we think it right in the first place to state, that we have not found anything to justify the terms adopted in the prayer of the memorial ‘that your Majesty would be pleased to purify the Bench of Justice in Newfoundland, by the removal of the Chief Justice,’ inasmuch as we have not found any ground for imputing to the Chief Justice any corrupt motive or intentional deviation from his duty as a Judge; and we feel it is incumbent upon us to express disapprobation at the language and conduct adopted towards the Chief Justice, as being unjust towards him personally, and inconsistent with the respect due to the high office he was filling.

“We regret, however, to be under the necessity of reporting that we have found in some of the transactions brought under our consideration, so much of indiscretion in the conduct of the Chief Justice, that he has permitted himself so much to participate in the strong feelings which appear, unfortunately, to have influenced the different parties in the colonies, (although we do not find that his judicial decisions have been affected thereby,) that we feel it our duty to state, that we think it would be inexpedient that he should be continued in the office of Chief Justice of Newfoundland.

“Her Majesty having taken the said report into consideration, was pleased, by and with the advice of the Privy Council, to approve thereof, and of what is therein recommended, and to order, as is hereby ordered, that the Right Honourable Lord Glenelg, one of her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, do signify to Chief Justice Boulton, her Majesty's pleasure thereon.”

“C. GREVILLE.”

By the above document it will appear, that almost immediately after my resignation was accepted, her Majesty's Government dismissed the Chief Justice of Newfoundland, an old and faithful servant of the Crown, for the identical* reasons which I had given to them in Upper Canada, for having dismissed Mr. Ridout (who was merely the Judge of a district court,) and for not having elevated the Republican ex-speaker Bidwell to the Bench.

In the case of the Chief Justice of Newfoundland (which was drawn up against him, and signed by Stephen Lushington,† Daniel O'Connell,‡ and F. Fleming,) it appears that the Privy

* I mean only identical in principle, for in the dégré there was no comparison. The Chief Justice of Newfoundland is charged only with having participated in strong party feelings, whereas the parties I have dismissed were proved to have used the most insulting language, and to have otherwise violently opposed me.

† Since made Judge of the Admiralty; though he would not, I suppose, deny that “he participates in strong party feelings.”

‡ To whom—though it will not, I suppose, be denied that “he participates in strong party feelings”—it has been stated, and not contradicted, that her Majesty's Government offered successively two of the highest stations on the Irish Bench.

Council reported that they had not found anything to justify the terms adopted in the memorial of the Assembly of Newfoundland—that they had not found any ground for imputing to the Chief Justice any corrupt motive, or intentional deviation from his duty as a Judge; they even expressed their disapprobation at the language and conduct adopted towards the Chief Justice, which they declared to be unjust towards him personally, and inconsistent with the respect due to the high office he was filling: and yet, in spite of the Chief Justice's admitted innocence, and notwithstanding the declared guilt of his accusers, her Majesty's Government deliberately dismissed this public servant, with no other explanation, or no other reason, than is contained in the following sentence:—"We regret, however, to be under the necessity of reporting that we have found, in some of the transactions brought under our consideration, so much of indiscretion in the conduct of the Chief Justice, and that he has permitted himself so much to participate in the strong feelings which appear unfortunately to have influenced the different parties in the colony (ALTHOUGH WE DO NOT FIND THAT HIS JUDICIAL DECISIONS HAVE BEEN AFFECTED THEREBY), that we feel it our duty to state that we think it will be inexpedient that he should be continued in the office of Chief Justice of Newfoundland."*

My Lord, against the policy of a minister, or against the policy of a government, it is, I am aware, generally speaking, hopeless for an humble individual, like the Chief Justice of Newfoundland, or like myself, to argue or complain; for even if the individual should succeed in proving ever so clearly, or ever so cleverly, the said policy to be bad, the minister is, I admit, fully justified in abruptly ending the discussion, by exclaiming, "Sic volo, sic jubeo, stet pro ratione voluntas," which means "It's my policy."

Your Lordship, therefore, or Her Majesty's Government, had full indulgence either to say to the Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, "We will not allow you even on the eve of an insurrection in our colonies to remove a Judge from the bench of a District Court, merely because he has taken a violent part in politics—merely because from having done so the Executive Council, the Attorney and Solicitor-General, the Chief Justice, the Judges, and the bar of Upper Canada, all united in approving of his dismissal—merely because he openly and grossly insulted you by reading to you, at the head of a Republican deputation, an impertinent address—and merely because he publicly threatened 'to tar and feather' you. We, moreover, insist that out of the whole population of Upper Canada, it is advisable that you should select and elevate to the Bench, her Majesty's bitterest opponent, because we do not think he should be debarred from the exalted station merely because, during his whole life, he has been (like his father before him) the unceasing advocate of Republican institutions—merely because, by his speeches and by his writings, he has done more than any other man in the Canadas in bringing about the late revolt, which will cost the mother-country more than two millions—and merely because he was the Speaker and leader of a House of Assembly, which, previous to your dissolving it, offered you every possible insult."

On the other hand, your Lordship or Her Majesty's Government had full indulgence to say to the Chief Justice of Newfoundland, "Your motives have never been corrupt—you have never intentionally deviated from your duty as a judge—your judicial decisions have never been affected by your political principles, but you have permitted yourself to participate in the strong feelings which appear unfortunately to have influenced the different parties in the colony of Newfoundland, and although in that colony there was not the slightest danger of a revolt, yet we have considered the case brought against you before the Privy Council, by Stephen Lushington, Daniel O'Connell, and J. Fleming, and as it is our fixed policy that in our North American colonies the bench of justice shall be immaculate from and even unsuspected of political bias—we dismiss you."

Your Lordship and Her Majesty's Government enjoy (as I have already admitted) full liberty to pursue one of the above two diametrically opposite courses of policy, and to give no explanation to either complainant, except the Latin sentence I have quoted; but, my Lord, I very respectfully submit that neither your Lordship, nor Her Majesty's Government, nor the people of England, nor any power on earth, ought even to desire to possess the right of pursuing in the North American colonies both of these policies at the same time; I mean of saying that your law is and is not, that it is right and that it is wrong; in short, that the Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, and the Chief Justice of Newfoundland, shall be equally driven from the service of their sovereign, in order that the people of the North American colonies may learn that a Judge's interference with political party is no objection whatever, and is an insuperable objection to his remaining on the bench,

* One often hears of condemnation, with a recommendation to mercy, but here is an acquittal, with a recommendation to punishment!

But taking leave of the case of the Chief Justice of Newfoundland, I beg permission to remind your Lordship, that in the able defence of Lord Durham, which her Majesty's Government lately made before Parliament, your Lordship in the one house, and Lord John Russell in the other, strenuously maintained the identical doctrines, my support of which induced her Majesty's Government, morally speaking, to drive me from the Government of Upper Canada. It was not denied, (on the contrary, it was admitted most frankly by your Lordship as well as by Lord John Russell) that Lord Durham had acted illegally, but generously supporting the public servant in the execution of his new and difficult duties, your Lordship's whole argument tended to prove that Lord Durham's measures were justified by THE NECESSITY OF THE CASE, and so strongly did her Majesty's Government maintain this principle, that your Lordship not only assailed the whole profession of the law, as well as the quibbles by which lawyers maintain the smallest private right against the public safety, but your Lordship very truly added, "that the noble Earl (Durham) would be most seriously injured even by the discussion—that unquestionably his authority would be much weakened by it—and that it would be far better for their Lordships to move an address to the Crown to recall him at once, than to weaken and impair his authority; in short, that to confer powers on an individual, and not to give him confidence for the exercise of them, was only laying a trap for him, or something like it."

A Bill of Indemnity, which eventually passed through both Houses of the Imperial Parliament, was proposed and acceded to, on the principle urged by the Government, that his Lordship was deserving of protection, because his measures (though illegal) were justified by the necessity of the case.

Now, if my correspondence with her Majesty's Government, which led to my resignation, were to be referred to, it would at once appear, that the reason, cause, or defence, I offered to her Majesty's Government, for not replacing Judge Ridout, and for refusing to elevate, on the eve of a revolt, the ex-speaker Bidwell to the bench, was the necessity of the case. A necessity, I humbly submit, infinitely heavier than Lord Durham's necessity, inasmuch, as his Lordship did not arrive in the Canadas until the rebels in both Provinces had been defeated—until the American forces had been successfully repulsed in every attempt they had made to invade and possess themselves of Upper Canada—until Papineau, Bidwell, Rolph, M'Kenzie, and the whole nest of Conspirators who had offered £500 for my apprehension, had absconded from the Province—in short, until "the hurly-burly was done, and the battle lost and won;" nevertheless, though my necessity was as superior to Lord Durham's, as in rank, station, education, and diplomatic experience, I was his Lordship's inferior—and although, after all, there was nothing illegal in my dismissing a Judge for the very reason for which her Majesty's Government dismissed a Chief Justice—yet her Majesty's Government voted for an Act of Parliament to indemnify Lord Durham, and publicly reversed and discountenanced my Act, which was identical with their own!

Her Majesty's Government have, it cannot be denied, full power to direct in the North American Colonies whatever policy they may think proper; but I again respectfully maintain, that they cannot carry on two conflicting policies at the same time, by declaring that in Lower Canada an illegal act ought to be, and that in Upper Canada, it cannot be justified by necessity.

Without any wish to offend, or even to upbraid Her Majesty's Government, I beg leave to state to your Lordship, that I feel very deeply, it would have been better (to use your Lordship's own words) for Her Majesty's Government to have recalled me at once from the government of Upper Canada, than to have weakened, impaired, and undermined my authority, until it fell prostrate to the ground—that by having conferred powers on me, without giving me confidence for the exercise of them, Her Majesty's Government laid a trap for me, from which it was impracticable for me to escape—that Her Majesty's Government acted, therefore, unjustly towards me, in removing me from a permanent appointment, to one which almost immediately they made it impossible for me to maintain; and lastly, that leaving my own interests and feelings completely out of the question, it is as disheartening to the loyal population of Her Majesty's North American Colonies, as it is encouraging to their republican opponents, to observe, that while Lord Gosford, (who was obliged by Her Majesty's Government to try the fatal experiment of conciliating the republicans,) has been, I rejoice to observe, most graciously received and rewarded by his Sovereign, I, who returned to England simultaneously with his Lordship, have not, by a single audience, been even honoured by an opportunity of most humbly assuring Her Majesty of the loyalty of the people of Upper Canada—of their devotional attachment to the British throne—of their admiration of the British Constitution—and of their unalterable detestation of those republican principles, which have created before their eyes on the Continent of America a vulgar mob-tyranny, under which neither life nor property are secure.

My Lord, I do not expect that your Lordship can find time even to consider the few arguments which are contained in this communication, and which I assure your Lordship explains but a part of the wrongs which I consider I have received from Her Majesty's Government, but I trust that your Lordship, taking into consideration how unwilling I have been factiously to embarrass Her Majesty's Government, and how patiently I have waited for redress, will pause before you refuse the request which I now respectfully make to your Lordship, which is, that your Lordship would be pleased to allow me, either before the Privy Council—before the Judicial Committee thereof—or before a Committee of such members of the Government as it may be deemed by it advisable to select, an opportunity of convincing your Lordship by their report, that Her Majesty's Government has unjustifiably wronged me.

If it should be reported to your Lordship that I had failed in substantiating this allegation, your Lordship would have the satisfaction of reflecting, that you had granted to me the opportunity I had demanded. If, on the other hand, I should succeed in substantiating my accusation, my opinion of your Lordship leads me to believe, that your Lordship would rejoice, rather than regret, that a truth which affected the character of your Lordship's administration was no longer concealed from your knowledge.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient

Humble Servant,

(Signed) F. B. HEAD.

The Lord Viscount MELBOURNE, &c. &c.

In reply to this communication, Lord Melbourne, in a note marked "Private," declined to accede to the requests I had made.

CHAPTER XIII.

A few Observations on three or four Paragraphs in the "Report on the Affairs of British North America, from the Earl of Durham, Her Majesty's High Commissioner, &c. &c. &c."—(Presented by Her Majesty's command to both Houses of Parliament.)

It has been strenuously urged against Lord Durham, that his Lordship, in reporting "on the affairs of British North America," was not justified in assailing my by-gone policy and conduct. If his Lordship's attention had by Her Majesty been merely directed to the administration of the government of Lower Canada, his public censure on my conduct would certainly, to say the least, have been unnecessary; but as his Lordship's mission had in view the much higher object of adjusting what is commonly termed the disordered state of our North American provinces, it surely cannot, by any unprejudiced man, be denied, that Lord Durham could not safely legislate for the future tense of life without not only attentively observing the present, but without also calmly reflecting on the past; for it is by the protruding masts of vessels which have sunk that the cautious mariner first learns to avoid the hidden rocks upon which they have foundered.

I conceive, therefore, that Lord Durham was not only perfectly justified, but that his Lordship performed no more than his duty in investigating the policy which, as Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, I had pursued, and in reporting to Her Majesty, perfectly regardless of my feelings, whatever might be his opinion on the subject; and I must go still further and say, that however captivated a public man may be with his own conduct, he has no right even to feel offended at the honest disapprobation of it, which a superior officer, in the performance of a painful and arduous duty may feel it necessary to pronounce.

But though I claim this freedom of action for Lord Durham, I submit that there existed in his commission no clause authorizing his Lordship to rebuke any one by incorrect assertion.

As the tie which once connected me with Upper Canada has been severed, it is not my duty, it is not my inclination, nor do the present limits permit of my replying to all the allegations against the Legislature and the people of Upper Canada, which are contained in his Lordship's report. I propose only to make a few observations on those three or four paragraphs which are especially directed against myself, and on one or two others of a more general nature.

1. "Proceedings of Sir Francis Head."

This paragraph commences by reporting to Her Majesty, as follows:—

"Such was the state of parties when Sir Francis Head, on assuming the government of the colony, dismissed from the Executive Council some of the members who were most obnoxious to the House of Assembly, and requested three individuals to succeed them."

This statement is, I beg to say without offence, exactly a reversion of the truth, which was (vide my despatch, No. 9, page 56), that the three individuals, named by Lord Durham, requested me to dismiss "the members who were most obnoxious to the House of Assembly," that I resolutely refused to dismiss them, and that accordingly they were not dismissed.

Lord Durham's Report, after truly narrating that I afterwards added three reformers to the Council, reports to Her Majesty that—

"Among the first acts of the Governor, after the appointment of this Council, was, however, the nomination to some vacant offices of individuals, who were taken from the old official party, and this without any communication with his Council. These appointments were attacked by the House of Assembly, and the new Council, finding that their opinion was never asked upon these or other matters, and that they were seemingly to be kept in ignorance of all those public measures which popular opinion, nevertheless, attributed to their advice, remonstrated privately on the subject with the Governor. Sir Francis desired them to make a formal representation to him on the subject; they did so, and this produced such a reply from him, as left them no choice but to resign. The occasion of the differences, which had caused the resignation, was made the subject of communication between the Governor and the Assembly, so that the whole community were informed of the grounds of the dispute."

The whole of the above is a tissue of unintentional errors. The unpopular appointment to which Lord Durham, in the plural number, has alluded, was in favour of a new settler; it had been made by me not only by the advice, but solely at the suggestion of the leading member of my old Council, before the three reformers were added to it.

The new Council, who were only in my service a fortnight, never once remonstrated with me on that or on any subject till I officially received their public document, which (vide my despatch, No. 15, page 72), emanated entirely from themselves, without my knowledge or suggestion. Lastly, the communication from the House (which is before the reader—see page 66) was from the Assembly to me, and not from me to it.

Lord Durham's Report to the Queen, proceeds as follows:—

"The contest which appeared to be thus commenced on the question of the responsibility of the Executive Council, was really decided on very different grounds. Sir F. Head, who appears to have thought that the maintenance of the connexion with Great Britain depended upon his triumph over the majority of the Assembly, embarked in the contest, with a determination to use every influence in his power, in order to bring it to a successful issue. He succeeded, in fact, in putting the issue in such a light before the province, that a great portion of the people really imagined that they were called upon to decide the question of separation by their votes."

The following extracts from my replies to the Addresses I received from 28,188 people, before the elections took place, will, I trust, without a comment, clearly show whether or not Lord Durham was perfectly justified in reporting to Her Majesty, that in order to gain the elections, I had placed the subject of dispute before the inhabitants of the province disingenuously.

No. 1.

Extract from "Reply to the Address of the Inhabitants of the District of Johnstown."

GENTLEMEN:

I need hardly say, that it affords me consolation to observe from your address, that the yeomanry and farmers of Upper Canada, instead of allowing other people to think for them, have been at last driven to the necessity of judging for themselves of the serious events which have lately passed before their eyes.

In the mother-country I have invariably found, that when the yeomanry are once aroused from their lethargy, in which they are too apt to remain, their sturdy opinion forms one of the most correct verdicts in the land, and confidently believing that such will prove to be the case in this province, I beg to ask those yeomen and farmers of the Johnstown district, whose names are subscribed to the documents I have just received, the following plain questions:—

What necessity has there been for this general disturbance throughout Upper Canada about a responsible Executive Government?

Have I not evidently, to the best of my ability, endeavoured calmly to explain, not only to the Legislature, but to the inhabitants of this province, my reasons for declining to surrender to my late Executive Council that power and patronage which is the prerogative of the Crown?

Has the language, which so unnecessarily has assailed me, diverted me from my declared determination to govern and be governed by reason?

Have I once rebuked it by an intemperate expression?

While I was resolutely defending your constitution, which is the sacred charter of your freedom, did I not repeatedly declare that, in case I was wrong, there existed, above us all, a high tribunal, to which I was ever ready to bow?

Why, I ask, was not that offer accepted?

What necessity was there for my opponents to promulgate, during the discussion, that their grand object was "To stop the supplies?"

What was the use of paralyzing the country by so cruel a remedy?

Did they think that despair and poverty could explain what reason and argument had failed to substantiate?

Can any three professional gentlemen of Toronto, intently occupied in their own petty interests, presume to offer to Upper Canada the powerful protection, and parental assistance which our Sovereign can bestow upon this young growing country?

Is the loyalty of this portion of the British Empire to bow before a self-constituted triumvirate, merely because it declares that no responsibility is trust-worthy but its own?

Gentlemen, I have no reply to offer to these questions, but commit them to your own calm judgment and good sense.

No. 2.

Extract from "Reply to the Address of the Mayor and Common Council of the City of Toronto."

The constitution of this province is the sacred charter of the land; and it is no less my duty than the interest of its inhabitants that I should firmly maintain it, as I ever will, inviolate.

If that charter constitutes a "Provincial Ministry," it need only be shown to me to be secured; but I deliberately repeat, that it contains the creation of no such a power, and in my opinion, were it to be now created, it would be productive of the most vicious effects; for if the power and patronage of the Crown were to be delivered over to a tribunal sworn to secrecy, they would very soon fall into the hands of a few metropolitan families, who might possibly promote their own views to the rejection of the interests of the distant counties; whereas, while these powers continued invested in the individual appointed by His Majesty to be the Lieutenant-Governor of this province, he (being a stranger) can have neither interest nor inducement to abuse them.

Extract from "Reply to the Address of the inhabitants of the City of Toronto."

I have no wish to deny "that in the British constitution the King is assisted in all the affairs of Government by the advice of known and responsible councillors and officers who possess the confidence of the people, and who form His Majesty's Cabinet." But Colonel Simcoe, who, you yourselves state, "was authorised undoubtedly by His Majesty's Government to declare to His faithful subjects in this province the nature of the Constitution," created no such cabinet, nor any cabinet at all; and from his day, down to the present hour, there has never existed any ministry in the colony except the Governor, who is himself the responsible minister of the Crown.

* * * * *

The yeomen and industrious classes of Upper Canada should never allow a single letter to be subtracted from or added to the great charter of their liberties; for if once they permit it to be mutilated, or what may be termed improved, they and their children become instantly liable to find themselves suddenly deprived of their property, and, what is better than all property, of their freedom and independence.

By this Act you are of course aware, that a House of Assembly, a Legislative Council, and a Lieutenant Governor are appointed; but it creates no Executive Council; and if people tell you that it does, read the Act, and you will see the contrary.

"Reply to the Address of the Inhabitants of the County of Hastings."

GENTLEMEN:

In return for the Address which I have just received from you, I assure you that I will continue firmly to uphold and support the best interests of your agriculturists, and of your province, and that never will I allow either the one or the other to be placed under the irresponsible domination of a Toronto Ministry.

No. 5.

Extract from "Reply to the Address of the Grand Jury of the Home District."

If that noble charter had not existed, there can be no doubt but that the representative of His Majesty would have been overcome, and that the inhabitants of Upper Canada would now be under the ignominious tyranny of a secret metropolitan "Cabinet"; but your constitution has proved to be impregnable, and at this moment no people bewail the fact more keenly than those who have lately been nearly crushed in their endeavours to undermine it.

No. 6.

Extract from "Reply to the Address of the Inhabitants of the Town and Township of Kingston."

It therefore only remains for me to beg you to assure them I feel most deeply the confidence they repose in me; and that so long as I shall remain His Majesty's representative in this province, I will never allow them to be unconstitutionally subjected to the arbitrary domination of an irresponsible, secret, and self-constituted "Cabinet."

No. 7.

Extract from "Reply to the Address of the Inhabitants of the District of Ottawa."

The falsest reports are daily invented, and at great expense are circulated all over the province, in order if possible still to delude and agitate the public mind; for instance, it has been stated that I wish to establish tithes—that I am concocting plans for making the people of Upper Canada slaves, &c. &c. &c.

Gentlemen, my plans and projects are all contained and published in the instructions which I received from the King. They desire me to correct, without partiality, the grievances of this country; and it is because the agitators see I am determined to do so that they are endeavouring to obstruct me by every artifice in their power. They declare me to be their enemy, and the truth is, I really am.

As her Majesty's Government were in possession of printed copies of all these replies, they surely ought at least to have produced them in my defence when they submitted, by command of the Queen, to both Houses of Parliament, Lord Durham's charge against me, that I had gained the elections disingenuously.

Lord Durham, in informing her Majesty what the feelings of the people of Upper Canada were previous to these elections in 1836, states—

"Above all, not only they, but a great many others, had marked with envy the stupendous public works which were at that period producing their effect, in the almost marvellous growth of the wealth and population of the neighbouring state of New York."

Far from entertaining these feelings of envy, the people of Upper Canada rejected at the elections seven out of the thirteen American members who had previously sat in the House of Assembly; and the whole result of the contest, as well as the repeated defeats which the American sympathisers have suffered during the last two winters, have proved how cordially I was supported in the assertion I had openly made, "that the people of Upper Canada detest democracy."

Lord Durham thus proceeds to inform the Queen:—

"The general support of the British determined the elections in favour of the Government; and though very large and close minorities, which in many cases supported the defeated candidates, marked the force which the reformers could bring into the field, even in spite of the disadvantages under which they laboured from the momentary prejudices against them, and the unusual manner in which the Crown, by its representative, appeared to make itself a party in an electioneering contest, the result was the return of a very large majority hostile in politics to that of the late Assembly."

Before the elections commenced I gave such replies as I thought proper to the different Addresses I received; but in order that the country should clearly see that I was determined not "to make myself a party in an electioneering contest," I gave the following reply to the seven following Addresses, two of which, from very influential bodies, arrived at Government House a day or two only after the election could legally commence.

List of Addresses just referred to.

1. Wesleyan Methodist Conference. (Signed by order and in behalf of the Conference, William Lord, President; William Case, Secretary.)
2. United Synod of Upper Canada. (Signed in name, presence and appointment, of Synod. C. Nicholl, Moderator; William Smart, Clerk of United Synod.)
3. Gananoque, and its vicinity.
4. Ramsay.
5. Warwick.
6. Goderich.
7. Town of Nepean.

Reply in Writing delivered to each of the above.

"Gentlemen,—As the elections have commenced, I must decline giving any other reply to the Address, which I have just received from you, than merely to acknowledge its receipt."

I may add, that, besides this precaution, I gave orders to all my attendants, as well as to all the clerks in the government office, to abstain from contributing to the subscriptions which were set on foot by the constitutionalists, in order to refute the calumnies published by the republicans. I also desired the Adjutant-General to promulgate that I would suspend all militia promotions, or dismissals,* until the elections were concluded.

2. Real Result of Sir F. Head's Policy.

In informing the Queen of "real results," which had happened two winters before his Lordship's arrival in North America, Lord Durham deems it advisable to describe, in the following terms, the members I had appointed to my Executive Council:—

"It may, indeed, be fairly said, that the real result of Sir F. Head's policy was to establish that very administrative influence of the leaders of a majority in the Legislature, which he had so obstinately disputed. The Executive Councillors of his nomination, who seem to have taken office almost on the express condition of being mere ciphers, are not, in fact, then, the real government of the province. It is said that the new officers of government whom Sir F. Head appointed from without the pale of official eligibility, feel more apprehension of the present house than, so far as can be judged, was ever felt by their predecessors, with regard to the most violent of the reforming Houses of Assembly. Their apprehension, however, is not confined to the present house: they feel that, under no conceivable contingency, can they expect an Assembly disposed to support them; and they accordingly appear to desire such a change in the colonial system as might make them dependent upon the Imperial Government alone, and secure them against all interference from the Legislature of the province, whatever party should obtain a preponderance in the Assembly."

Whether Lord Durham is justified in designating the Executive Council whom I appointed as "mere ciphers" shall shortly appear; but, abandoning that point for a moment, I hasten to vindicate before the public the characters of four gentlemen whom Lord Durham (notwithstanding his admiration of the United States, where "all men are said to be born equal") has designated to Her Majesty as having been "appointed by Sir F. Head from without the pale of official eligibility"!

The gentlemen alluded to by his Lordship are as follows:—

1st. The Honourable Robert Baldwin Sullivan (lately elevated to the Legislative Council by the recommendation of Sir George Arthur). This gentleman, far from being one of those native Canadians designated by Lord Durham as the "family compact," belonged to a family who had emigrated from Ireland—his father was not living—he had no brother holding any public station—his nearest connexions were the family of Dr. Baldwin, the Chairman of the Alliance (republican) Society. He had received a good classical education—was a man of very superior talents—one of the leading members of the bar, and of irreproachable character. His wife was the daughter of Colonel Delatre, late quarter-master-general at Ceylon.

2d. The Honourable William Allan, a native of Scotland, was, at the time I appointed him to my council, one of the oldest members of the Upper House of the Legislature. He is a retired merchant of the first respectability, opulent, and possessed of large landed property. For forty years he has successively enjoyed the confidence and respect of every Lieutenant-Governor of the province; and being also well known in England, he was solicited by the association of London merchants directing the Canada Company (to whom I beg leave to refer) to take charge of their interests in that country. In consequence of his high character he remained President of the Bank of Upper Canada, by annual election, from the time of its establishment till he voluntarily retired, when he received from the shareholders, without political distinction, a very splendid piece of plate, as a testimonial of their high gratitude and respect. I beg to say, that with a more high-minded man than Mr. Allan, I have never associated.

3rd. The Honourable John Elmsley, Lieutenant of the Royal Navy (vide his gallant conduct in the capture of the Caroline, page 125), is the son of a former chief justice of Upper Canada, from whom he inherited a large property in the province, and nephew of the late Admiral Sir Benjamin Hallowell. He had, before I appointed him, for many years, been a member of the upper branch of the Legislature, and had also formerly been, for many years, a member of the Executive Council, from which he had voluntarily retired, under the administration of Sir John Colborne. Mr. Elmsley is a very zealous member of the Roman Catholic Church, which, according to Lord Durham's report, does not possess any portion of the patronage of the province.

4th. The Honourable Captain Baldwin had also, before I appointed him to the Executive Council, been for many years a member of the Legislative Council.

He was a retired post-captain in the British navy, highly respected in his profession, and although he was the brother of Dr. Baldwin, the chairman of the Alliance or Republican Association, his loyalty and his mild, amiable disposition, formed the conspicuous features of a character which by all parties was esteemed.

5th. The Honourable W. Draper, Her Majesty's Solicitor-General, who, at the time I appointed him to my council, represented in the provincial parliament the metropolis of Upper Canada, is a well-educated English gentleman, of amiable and irreproachable character, highly respected, and a prominent member of the Society of Upper Canada; in point of talent one of the leading members of the bar.

To the above description of these five gentlemen, who are reported to Her Majesty by Lord Durham as having been "appointed by Sir F. Head without the pale of official eligibility," I beg leave to add that they continue to form to this day the Executive Council of Upper Canada. A new Lieutenant-Governor, of much colonial experience, has, since my departure from the province, had an opportunity of estimating their character and worth. In the correspondence laid before Parliament by Her Majesty's Secretary of State, it will be seen that Sir George Arthur speaks, as I always spoke of these gentlemen, in terms of the highest confidence and respect.

With respect to Lord Durham's report to the Queen, that my executive council "seem to have taken office almost on the express condition of being mere ciphers," I beg leave most solemnly to declare that such a condition was neither expressed nor understood.

Although I maintained the important constitutional maxim that I and not they were responsible to Her Majesty and to Parliament for any misconduct I might pursue, yet I was too happy to receive from them their counsel and advice. The journals of the Executive Council will show, that on all important subjects I consulted them—on no serious question did I ever dissent from their advice, on the contrary, to upwards of 2,000 written opinions, which I received from this council, I subscribed my initials to all excepting two, and on those two they yielded to the reasons I mildly submitted to them.

Besides officially convening them as I have described, I issued a standing order, which was never deviated from, namely, that however crowded the waiting room of Government House might be with people wishing one after another to speak to me, the executive councillors were the moment they entered to take precedence of all, and that they were to have the privilege (which they invariably exercised) of walking at once into my presence at any hour they chose.

I lived with them in the greatest possible confidence and harmony, and I left them full of gratitude for the manly opposition with which they invariably disputed any proposition of mine which they considered to be objectionable.

As far as regards any censure which Lord Durham may have gravely expressed to Her Majesty concerning me, I have no desire to trouble his Lordship on this subject; but after the explanation which I have afforded of these respectable gentlemen, I cannot but express my sincere conviction, that Lord Durham will never rest satisfied in his own mind, or will ever attempt to address to the House of Lords one word on the subject of the Canadas, until he has publicly repaired the error he has unintentionally committed, in designating gentlemen who have faithfully served, and who, under difficult circumstances, are still faithfully serving their country, as having been selected "from without the pale of official eligibility," and as having "taken office almost on the express condition of being mere ciphers."

3. As regards the new House of Assembly, and myself, Lord Durham, with equal severity, thus expresses himself to the Queen:—

"I say this, without meaning to cast any imputation on the members of the House of Assembly, because, in fact, the circumstances under which they were elected were such as to render them peculiarly objects of suspicion and reproach to a large number of their countrymen."

"They were accused of having violated their pledges at the election. It is said that many of them came forward, and were elected, as being really reformers, though opposed to any such claims to colonial independence as might involve a separation from the mother country. There seems to be no doubt that in several places, where the Tories succeeded, the electors were merely desirous of returning members who would not hazard any contest with England, by the assertion of claims, which, from the proclamation of the Lieutenant-Governor, they believed to be practically needless; and who should support Sir F. Head in those economical reforms which the country desired, far more than political changes—reforms, for the sake of which alone political changes had been sought. In a number of other instances, too, the elections were carried by the unscrupulous exercise of the influence of the Government, and by a display of violence on the part of the Tories, who were emboldened by the countenance afforded to them by the authorities. It was stated, but I believe without any sufficient foundation, that the Government made grants of land to persons who had no title to them, in order to secure their votes."

"This report originated in the fact, that patents for persons who were entitled to grants, but had not taken them out, were sent down to the polling places to be given to the individuals entitled to them, if they were disposed to vote for the government candidate.

"The taking such measures, in order to secure their fair right of voting to the electors in a particular interest, must be considered rather as an act of official favouritism, than as an electoral fraud.

"But we cannot wonder that the defeated party put the very worst construction on acts which gave some ground for it; and they conceived, in consequence, a strong resentment against the means by which they believed that the representative of the Crown had carried the elections, his interference in which in any way was stigmatized by them as a gross violation of constitutional privilege and propriety.

"It cannot be matter of surprise, that such facts and such impressions produced in the country an exasperation, and a despair of good government, which extended far beyond those who had actually been defeated at the poll."

As the House of Assembly of Upper Canada is constitutionally able, calmly and temperately, to speak for itself, I will merely, as regards these serious allegations, declare that Lord Durham, in reviving the accusation which Mr. Joseph Hume and Dr. Duncombe two years ago made against me to Lord Melbourne, has unintentionally made to the Queen mistatements which the evidence and documents, printed by order of the House of Commons on the 3rd May, 1837, unanswerably disprove.

With respect to the allegation affecting my own character, namely, that "the elections were carried by the unscrupulous exercise of the influence of the government," I beg leave calmly, but unequivocally, to deny it; and to add, that I am ready to support my denial by recorded proofs, which (after the same revolting charge brought against me by Mr. Hume and Dr. Duncombe had been strictly investigated) her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies referred to in the following despatch, which has been printed and published in Upper Canada:

"DOWNING-STREET,
17th, April, 1837.

"SIR,

"I have received your despatch, dated the 4th February. (No. 7) It reached me on the 20th ultimo. It was not until the 7th instant that I received, by a subsequent conveyance, the Appendix, comprising the evidence taken before the Committee of the House of General Assembly of Upper Canada, to which was referred my correspondence with you on the subject of the petition presented to the House of Commons by Dr. Duncombe, in the Parliamentary Session of 1836.

"The refutation of Dr. Duncombe's charges is entirely satisfactory. It has been in the highest degree gratifying to me to be able to report to his Majesty, that after a minute and vigorous inquiry, during which every facility was given to the petitioner to substantiate his accusation, your conduct, in reference to the elections, has been proved to have been governed by a strict adherence to the principles of the constitution.

"I have the honour to be,

"Sir,

"Your most obedient servant,

(Signed)

"GLENELG.

"Lieutenant Governor SIR FRANCIS HEAD, K.C.H."

Her Majesty's Government having this proof, bearing their own signature, of my innocence in their possession, ought, I think, to have at least admitted it among the bulky documents which they submitted to Parliament with Lord Durham's allegation.

Lord Durham next informs the Queen, that the Assembly, instead of supporting the Governor, compelled his obedience to itself, and produced no change in the administration of affairs, except that of re-instating the "family compact" in power.

As the reader will have perused in preceding pages, the gratifying addresses with which, at the close of two arduous Sessions, the Speaker of the House of Assembly voluntarily accompanied the vote of supplies, he will probably be no less surprised than I am, at learning from Lord Durham that the House had failed to support me.

It would not be difficult to proceed with the whole of Lord Durham's report on Upper Canada as I have commenced, but as I have no desire unnecessarily to hurt his Lordship's and as I have sufficiently shown its inaccuracy, to vindicate my own character from its attacks, I will merely notice, by a few concluding observations, one or two topics in which I individually have neither interest nor concern.

After impugning the characters of the Lieutenant-Governor, of the Executive Council, of the Legislative Council, and of the members of the House of Assembly, Lord Durham, not satisfied with resting his grievances on them, humbly submits to Her Majesty a new subject of complaint, which throughout his report is termed "THE FAMILY COMPACT." "Successive Governors," says his Lordship, "as they came in, in their turn, are said to have either submitted quietly to its influence, or after a short and unavailing struggle, to have yielded to this well-organized party the real conduct of affairs."

In a monarchical form of government, like that of Upper Canada, composed of a legislature of three branches, one of which contains the sturdy representatives of the people, it would be difficult to comprehend how this fourth power could possibly manage to exist, and what could possibly be its elements, unless the mystery had been thus explained by his Lordship:—

"The bench, the magistracy, the high offices of the episcopal church, and a great part of the legal profession, are filled by the adherents of this party: by grant or purchase they have acquired nearly the whole of the waste lands of the province; they are all-powerful in the chartered banks, and, till lately, shared among themselves almost exclusively all offices of trust and profit. The bulk of this party consists, for the most part, of native-born inhabitants of the colony, or of emigrants who settled in it before the last war with the United States; the principal members of it belong to the Church of England, and the maintenance of the claims of that Church has always been one of its distinguishing characteristics."

It appears, then, from Lord Durham's own shewing, that this "FAMILY COMPACT," which his Lordship deems it so advisable that the Queen should destroy, is nothing more or less than that "social fabric" which characterizes every civilized community in the world. It is that social fabric, or rather fortress, within which the British yeoman, farmer and manufacturer, is enabled to repel the extortionate demands of his labourers; and to preserve from pillage and robbery the harvest of his industry after he has reaped it!

"The bench," "the magistrates," "the clergy," "the law," "the landed proprietors," "the bankers," "the native-born inhabitants," and "the supporters of the Established Church," form just as much "a family compact" in England as they do in Upper Canada, and just as much in Germany as they do in England. If Lord Durham proposes not only to make the legislature of Upper Canada responsible to what he calls "the people," but to level to the ground our social fabric, why, I beg leave, without offence, to ask, instead of dedicating his Report to Her Majesty, did not his Lordship on his landing, at once summon a National Convention, and place it in the hands of "the people!"

The "family compact" of Upper Canada is composed of those members of its society who, either by their abilities and character, have been honoured by the confidence of the executive government, or who, by their industry and intelligence, have amassed wealth.—The party, I own, is comparatively a small one; but to put the multitude at the top and the few at the bottom, is a radical reversion of the pyramid of society, which every reflecting man must foresee can end only by its downfall.

There is continually repeated in the Report one other observation, which, as Lord Durham has stated it, appears so unanswerable, that I will endeavour to explain the subject, especially as most travellers have agreed in the conclusions which Lord Durham has arrived at.

In offering examples of "the results of long misgovernment," his Lordship states:—

"There is one in particular which has occurred to every observant traveller in these regions, which is a constant theme of boast in the states bordering upon our colonies, and a subject of loud complaint within the colonies,—I allude to the striking contrast which is presented between the American and the British sides of the frontier line, in respect to every sign of productive industry, increasing wealth, and progressive civilization.

"By describing one side, and reversing the picture, the other would also be described. On the American side all is activity and bustle. The forest has been widely cleared; every year numerous settlements are formed, and thousands of farms are created out of the waste; the country is intersected by common roads; canals and railroads are finished, or in the course of formation; the ways of communication and transport are crowded with people, and enlivened by numerous carriages and large steam-boats. The observer is surprised at the number of harbours on the lakes, and the number of vessels they contain; while bridges, artificial landing-places, and commodious wharves are formed, in all directions, as soon as required.— Good houses, warehouses, mills, inns, villages, towns, and even great cities, are almost seen to spring up out of the desert. Every village has its school-house and place of public worship. Every town has many of both, with its township buildings, its book-stores, and probably one or two banks and newspapers; and the cities, with their fine churches, their great hotels, their exchanges, court-houses, and municipal halls, of stone or marble, so new and fresh as to mark the recent existence of the forest where they now stand, would be admired in any part of the Old World. On the British side of the line, with the exception of a few favoured spots, where some approach to American prosperity is apparent, all seems waste and desolate. There is but one railroad in all British America, and that, running between the St. Lawrence and Lake Champlain, is only fifteen miles long.”

From the very little I have seen in twice passing through the United States, I should say that the above picture is that which an American rather than an English writer would be expected to delineate; but, admitting it to be perfectly correct, I submit to the judgment of the reader, that the difference has hitherto been attributed by travellers altogether to a wrong cause.

The rapid growth of a young colony must almost be witnessed to be believed; and accordingly, in the United States, the age of the settlement, and not its fertility, is the general criterion of its wealth.

There was, of course, a time when the United States formed but a portion of the dense forest of America; but, animated by British blood, these colonies grew so rapidly that, in the year 1776, they had attained a strength sufficient not only to take leave of their parent state, but successfully to contend with it.

However, while they had attained this degree of strength, the province of Upper Canada, which is as large as England and Wales, was a cheerless wilderness—without a single white inhabitant, excepting a few soldiers in the fort at Kingston, and about twenty French families who had crossed over the Detroit river to settle on the British shore: there existed, consequently, then, a much greater contrast between the United States and Upper Canada than there exists now.

But let us consider for a moment what is the progress which Upper Canada has made:

In the year 1784 its settlement began.
“ 1791	its population was 10,000
“ 1809	“ 60,000
“ 1812	“ 70,000
“ 1822	“ 126,000
“ 1828	“ 240,000
“ 1837	“ 396,000
“ 1839	“ 450,000

Total age, 55 years. (The age of the United States being upwards of 200 years!)

In no one of the United States has a public work equal to the Welland Canal been carried through by a country so young and so thinly inhabited.

The same may be said of the St. Lawrence Canal, which, in execution and grandeur of design, is perhaps superior to any in the United States. (These two works were strenuously opposed by the reform party, as the journals of the Legislature will show.) Besides these, the Rideau Canal, which, though constructed by the parent government, is not on that account the less useful to the province, forms an artificial navigation of 120 miles, connecting, in fact, the Atlantic with Lake Ontario. This canal is undeniably the best executed work on the continent of North America.

Besides these undertakings, there have been created the Niagara Dock, the Burlington Bay Canal, and Desjardins Canal; also the harbour of Cobourg, Port Hope, Oakville, Port Credit, Toronto, Grand River, Port Dalhousie, Port Stanley, &c. Now, instead of upbraiding a healthy young British Colony merely on account of its youth and poverty, if our travellers would but take the trouble to observe how hard the backwoodsman is toiling, and what affectionate exertions the little community is everywhere making to copy the picture of its beloved mother-country, instead of trying to poison its contentment by unfairly comparing it with a portion of America that has attained the strength of manhood, they would, I think, be as much astonished as I have been, were they attentively to observe how much has been done in so short a time, and how, under the blessing of God, this land has prospered!

But, although it is true that the inhabitants of Upper Canada are poorer in purse than "the people" of the United States, yet, if the moral picture be considered, it is beyond all description in our favour.

Assassination is unknown—the bowie knife is not to be purchased—the laws are respected—religion is revered—public treaties are preserved; and nothing can be more true than that even (borrowing Lord Durham's words) if this picture "were to be reversed," and the British institutions of Upper Canada were to be destroyed, the gloomy forests would still remain to be cleared—the sweat of the British settler would still drop from his brow.

Although Lord Durham has apparently deemed it beneath his notice to bring before the consideration of the Queen the unparalleled sufferings of her Canadian subjects, yet I firmly believe that a paragraph on that subject would not by Her Majesty have been deemed the least acceptable portion of his Lordship's voluminous report.

Although but little versed in history, I firmly believe it nowhere contains a more affecting picture than has been exhibited to the civilized world for the last two years, by the brave resistance which a small British population has been making against the unprincipled attacks by which the Americans have endeavoured to force upon them republican institutions. The instances of individual courage that could be detailed are innumerable, while on the other hand the conduct of the assailants has been stamped by cruelty and cowardice. I must own, that when I daily think of the number of our soldiers who have untimely fallen—of the manner in which Colonel Moodie, Lieut. Wier, Lieut. Johnson, Staff-surgeon Hume, have been butchered and mutilated, of the privations and losses the people of Upper Canada have patiently endured; and when, on the other hand, I reflect that on the last invasion at Sandwich, a body of American sympathizers escaping into our woods, remained there starving from hunger and cold—not daring anywhere to ask even shelter of those whom they had professed they had invaded—to liberate them from the British Government, but wandering through the province until, worn out by the punishment of their guilt, they perished in the forest in such numbers that nineteen corpses were in one spot found frozen to death round the white embers of a fire,—I own that whenever these two pictures come together before my mind, it is filled with astonishment that Lord Durham, with this glaring evidence before him, could deliberately declare to our youthful Queen that the people of Upper Canada are dissatisfied with their institutions—that he could possibly find in his heart to submit a report to Her Majesty without a single word of commiseration of the unexampled sufferings which had afflicted—without a single word of approbation for the gallantry and fidelity which had distinguished—Her Majesty's loyal and devoted subjects in the Canadas, but which on the contrary lauded in well-measured terms the detestable invaders of their soil! But it really seems to me that Lord Durham has looked upon British North America in general, and upon the province of Upper Canada in particular, through a glass darkened.

It is possible that the public authorities whom his Lordship as Her Majesty's High Commissioner has deemed it proper to revile will feel it their duty patiently to submit to his remarks; but, when it is considered that Parliament may be advised by her Majesty's Government to legislate upon this most mischievous document, I feel it my duty to join with the rest of the community in gravely considering what opportunities Lord Durham has had for forming the astonishing opinions which are propounded in it.

"It is said" that his Lordship came up the St. Lawrence in a steam-boat exclusively appropriated to himself and his suite;—that on arriving at Kingston he landed to receive an address, and then proceeded by water to Niagara, where he passed the county-town without receiving the address that was framed for him, or conversing with its inhabitants;—that at the Falls his Lordship remained about four days, part of which time he was unwell, part was devoted to military review, and the greater part in receiving Americans and others who attended his Lordship's levees, balls, and dinners;—that thus intently occupied, he had not time to visit the most interesting part of the Welland Canal, which was within six miles, although his Lordship had offered to procure assistance of £250,000 from Her Majesty's Government;—that in crossing to Toronto, he touched at the termination of the canal in Lake Ontario without inspecting the work;—that at the seat of government at Toronto he spent twenty-four hours, principally occupied with a levee, receiving addresses, and with a state dinner;—that his Lordship then made the best of his way back to Montreal; and that in such exclusive dignity did he travel that he would not allow even the public mail to be taken on board at Cornwall, by which it was delayed a day.

If the above reports be correct, it would appear that his Lordship left Lower Canada only for ten days, during which time he had to travel by water about 1,000 miles.

By promising, "it is said," to procure a grant of £250,000 to make the Welland Canal a prominent work,—that the St. Lawrence should be improved to Montreal,—that the navigation of the Ottawa should be similarly assisted, and by his generous expenditure, his Lordship naturally excited the hopes of the people that these important undertakings would be effected.

As the representative of their Sovereign, Lord Durham had a sterling claim upon their loyalty, which, wherever he went, was paid to him at sight; and as his conduct and demeanour were always dignified, and as he expressed himself with fluent and acceptable elocution, addresses from all quarters were poured upon him. Nevertheless, authorised by the statements made against me in the Report to the Queen, I challenge Lord Durham to lay before the British public every address he has received from the inhabitants of Upper Canada, with the fullest information he can give of the number of signatures, or any other explanation; and if they support his representations of discontent, slander their governor and their legislature, or exhibit that restless desire for change in their constitution which his Report everywhere speaks of, I pledge myself to acknowledge that I am ignorant of the state of Upper Canada, and that his Lordship, in five days' sailing through it, has become better acquainted with the interests and disposition of its people than I am, after having traversed it in all directions, on horseback, and even on foot—after having slept in its forests—mingled with its inhabitants in times of peace and war, and after an actual administration of the government during three sessions of Parliament.

Again, in defence of the Executive Council, who have served their country with so much fidelity and ability, I call upon his Lordship to produce the able document they drew out for him of the state of the province, and if that document (which I have never seen) warrants the description Lord Durham has given of these gentlemen, and if it accords with the sentiments contained in his Report, I will willingly acknowledge that I, instead of his Lordship, have incorrectly estimated their character.

Lastly, I call upon Lord Durham to answer whether, in his place in Parliament, he will venture to declare that the sentiments contained in his Report will not be repudiated by every Lieutenant-Governor in the British North American Colonies; that they will not be repudiated by the whole of the respectable inhabitants of Upper Canada; and, on the other hand, I ask his Lordship whether, before his country, he will assert that from the most intelligent people of Upper Canada, or from the committee who, with his Excellency Sir George Arthur, had the honour of waiting upon his Lordship in Quebec, he ever received that description of the Canadian people, and that admiration of the United States, which are contained in his Report?

Although the preceding Governors and Lieutenant-Governors of the Canadas have formed their estimate of the country and inhabitants, by personally visiting them on easy terms; although even his Grace the Duke of Richmond (whose noble memory in the Canadas is deeply respected) rode post through the province, just as our country gentlemen, fifty years ago, used to ride through England; yet I cannot but admit that the halo of glory which everywhere accompanied his Lordship, the "champ de drap d'or" on which wherever he landed he was seen to tread, produced in the Canadas a very favourable effect. Mankind are always led by outward appearance, and I therefore will not deny that as my Lord Durham, surrounded by a brilliant staff, and unprejudiced by the conversation of a single Canadian, ascended the great St. Lawrence, and, traversing the noble Lake Ontario, which is forty miles broad, proceeded to Niagara, the fine hotel of which had been previously cleansed of every visitor, his Lordship's career resembled the course of a heavenly meteor; but admitting all this, admitting the weight and consideration it very properly obtained for his Lordship, yet as not only the welfare and the very existence of our North American Colonies, but of our interests at home, hang upon the importance due to Lord Durham's Report, I beg leave to say, that, in my humble opinion, under such circumstances, his Lordship had not as much means of writing the history of the American and Canadian territories between which he sailed, as poor, blind

Lieutenant Holman, R. N., would have possessed, had he socially travelled the same distance by public conveyances.

It therefore becomes necessary for the country soberly to inquire from what sources his Lordship's information has been derived? In the report itself, this important fact stands shrouded in mystery; for instead of resting his opinion, verbal or written, upon any recognised authorities, almost every assertion is impersonally expressed by the words "it is said," or "it seems," or "it appears." But I trust Lord Durham will eagerly divulge to Parliament by whom "it is said," to whom "it seems" and to whom "it appears."

It was naturally to be expected that this important fact, on which the whole validity of the Report depends, would have been comprehensively contained in the Appendix, but, on referring to that document, it undeniably appears that his Lordship has most truly fulfilled the promise made on his landing, namely, "that he would make disclosures which would astonish both the Parliament and the country;" for certainly nothing can be more astonishing to any man than, on opening an Appendix to a Report which in impersonal terms asperses the character of the Legislature as well as the public servants of Upper Canada, and which recommends organic changes that may shake the foundation of the British empire, to find that, excepting five pages containing the experienced opinions of Mr. Charles Buller and Mr. R. D. Horner, on the subject of emigration and crown lands, and excepting copies of thirty-five addresses and letters, which his Lordship received, this Appendix, submitted by his Lordship to the Queen, and by order of Her Majesty transmitted to both Houses of Parliament, contains nothing at all but the following subjects:—

When the "disclosures" contained in this Appendix shall have ceased "to astonish the Parliament and the country," will not the public humbly persist in requiring Lord Durham to produce respectable evidence in support of his allegations? Derservedly respected as Lord Durham is, will the British Parliament be satisfied with his Lordship's declarations that "it is said," that "it seems," and that "it appears," that British institutions must be changed; and in lieu of all other explanation will they be satisfied with a detailed history, however interesting, of the gaols, lunatic asylums, sœurs grises and enfans trouvés of Quebec?

Lord Durham's best friends cannot deny, that in justice to his unsullied personal reputation, his Lordship is bound positively to prove the truth of his allegations, lest his Lordship may ere long negatively be required to disprove the rumour contained in the following letter, which has been addressed to me by a very able, discreet, and highly honourable public servant, namely, the Honourable W. H. Draper, Her Majesty's Solicitor-General for the province of Upper Canada, who, it will appear, though declared by Lord Durham to be "without the pale of official eligibility," witnessed his Lordship's departure from the Canadas, with feelings of unqualified regret.

(Copy.)

Toronto, 16th October, 1838.

MY DEAR SIR FRANCIS,

I know so well the deep interest you feel in all that affects the province, that I do not apologize for again intruding my correspondence upon you.

Notwithstanding that I felt no confidence in the scheme likely to be propounded by Lord Durham for the settlement of our difficulties, I do most sincerely deplore his sudden departure. His visit to Upper Canada, and the cordial assurance he met with of support in any scheme calculated to make the connexion of this province with Great Britain perpetual, together with the manly and excellent course pursued by the constitutionalists of the Lower Province, has opened his eyes; and he frankly confesses himself a changed man in many important respects. Among other changes, he has given up the idea of abolishing the legislative councils. He appears also convinced who are to be relied upon in the province; and sees clearly, and openly avows that the government of these provinces has been directed by the Colonial Office in ignorance of the true state of affairs. In truth he has been converted as regards the Canadas, at least to the true and conservative faith; and therefore I regret his departure, though I think he has done right.

I have not the same regret at the loss of his Secretary, Mr. Buller, for I do not entertain any favourable expectation from him. He states (as I hear) his opinion that nine-tenths of the people of Upper Canada are disloyal. The mode in which he has acquired the information upon which this opinion is based is somewhat unique. He was taken ill during Lord Durham's visit to the falls, and was left behind at Niagara. While so detained, he sent his servant out to converse with everybody he could meet, and from his report he has formed his judgment. This statement as to the mode of ascertaining the opinions of the people Mr. Buller has himself made to several individuals, one of whom repeated it to me, as coming direct from Mr. Buller.

To you, my dear Sir, the province already owes the proof of her sincere attachment to her Sovereign and to her constitution. Persevere till you gain this great good for us, and I will safely prophesy that in Upper Canada—

"Semper honos nomenque tuum laudesque manebunt."

Believe me,

My dear Sir Francis,

Very faithfully,

Your obedient servant,

W. H. DRAPER.

Of course I only give this letter as I received it; but as the sentiments contained in Lord Durham's report must soon be gravely discussed, I feel it right, in conclusion, to explain upon what ground my own opinions, which differ so widely from his Lordship's, have been formed.

On my arrival at Toronto, I considered that the object of the greatest importance was to make myself as accurately acquainted as possible with the real feelings of the inhabitants of the country.

To attain this information, I accordingly, for the first year, publicly received any person, of any politics, from any part of the province, from eleven o'clock till three, for six days in the week: after the first year, and until the time of the insurrection, I limited this most toilsome duty to three days a-week.

Being desirous that people should see I belonged to no party, I never, from the day I entered Toronto, until the receipt of my resignation, ever entered any person's house—I never associated with any person; scarcely ever rode with anybody—never with a servant; but when my horse was brought to my door at three o'clock, if business did not detain me, I used to ride by myself (whatever was the weather) for twelve or fourteen miles.

In these moments I occasionally visited some of the log-huts; and whenever I could, with propriety, avail myself of an opportunity, my disposition led me to converse with those who were variously occupied at their work.

Besides this, I was in the habit of receiving petitions in writing from all parts of the province, on all public subjects.

Putting all I have seen together, I readily admit that all the complaints described in Lord Durham's Report actually exist; but I feel it my duty to add, that they are the complaints of the small minority with whom I had to contend. My despatches will strongly corroborate Lord Durham's report, that there is a desire in Upper Canada to make the Lieutenant-Governor, Executive and Legislative Councils "responsible to the people"—that "the family compact" is complained of—that American institutions are admired; and I do not presume to deny his Lordship's assertion, "that all the discontented parties, and especially the Reformers of Upper Canada, looked with considerable confidence to his Lordship's mission:" but I can declare to the country, that Lord Durham is wrong in attributing these sentiments of discontent to the majority; and though his Lordship has reported to the Queen his opinion of the "Proceedings of Sir Francis Head," "Failure of Result aimed at by Sir F. Head," "Real Result of Sir Francis Head's Policy," and of the consequent "EXASPERATION OF THE PEOPLE," it is my humble opinion, that, if his Lordship were to dare me to ride with him through the British North American provinces, I should very soon have to repeat—

"But ere we could arrive the point proposed, Cæsar cried, Help me, Cassius, or I sink!"

It now only remains for me to say, that in reply to the letter, dated 18th September, 1838, page 419, which I had addressed to Lord Melbourne, his Lordship, in a note marked "private," declined to accede to the three requests I had made.

As Her Majesty's Government thus denied me a private investigation, which I had hoped would have led to a more public discussion, at the expiration of three months, I deemed it proper respectfully to address to Lord Melbourne two other letters (which, with his Lordship's answers, have appeared in the newspapers.) In the first of these, I requested his Lordship's permission to explain and vindicate my own conduct, by publishing my despatches.

In the second, I stated, "I beg leave very respectfully to inform your Lordship, that as Her Majesty's Government will not sanction any of my requests, I shall feel myself precluded from publishing my Despatches, or from furnishing any one with the numbers or dates of those I am desirous to produce."

Having determined on this course, I faithfully pursued it, and I had actually come to London on purpose to inform Her Majesty's Government, (and I had made the same statement to two or three members of each branch of the Legislature,) namely, "that if any member of either House should ask for my Despatches in my name, the Government were authorised by me unequivocally to contradict the assertion," when, on opening Lord Durham's Report, I found that, although I had thus obeyed the decision of my late employers almost at the expense of my character—and although I had, on a very important subject, actually been employing myself in writing in their support—Her Majesty's Government, without consideration for my feelings, had recommended the Queen to transmit, by Her Majesty's command, to both Houses of Parliament, a Report containing allegations against my conduct and character, of a most invidious description; and, notwithstanding her Majesty's Government knew perfectly well that, having bound me hand and foot to silence, I was defenceless, they actually accompanied Lord Durham's Report with their own volume, containing 400 closely printed folio pages, in which not a single line of even those printed documents in their possession, which they knew would vindicate my character, was admitted; and it further appeared from the newspapers, that when Lord Durham's allegations against me were officially presented, there was not, among her Majesty's Ministers, one individual who, in either House of Parliament, stood up to utter a single word in my defence.

When these facts came suddenly upon me, I very strongly felt that my allegiance to the Ministry was dissolved; and on the spur of the moment,* I addressed and published a note to Lord Melbourne, informing his Lordship that I had determined to vindicate myself.

A few hours reflection, however, induced me to reconsider the subject; and though I had determined, officially, to write no more, I was actually, through a mutual friend, endeavouring to obtain the Government's permission, when I observed, not only that such parts of my correspondence as were necessary for my vindication had been asked for by the Duke of Wellington, granted by Lord Melbourne, and ordered to be printed; but that the Secretary of State for the Colonies, under whom I had served, as well as another noble lord who had held the same high office, had very liberally concurred in opinion, that the publication of a portion of my despatches was necessary for my defence.

Casting all private feeling aside, I can conscientiously declare that, on public grounds alone, I have long felt it would be desirable that my despatches should be allowed at least to neutralize certain opinions respecting the British North American colonies, to which general publicity has been given; but deeply sensible of the high confidence that had been reposed in me, without uttering to the public a single word of complaint, I saw the supporters of my administration, one after another, degraded—those who insulted me rewarded! Unsupported, unvindicated, I was spoken lightly of by those I was serving—even my gait in writing was, as it proceeded, publicly pointed at by the Government; nevertheless, I submitted in silence to all; and I can truly say that, if my Lord Durham's Report had merely been published in the newspapers, I should have taken no more notice of it there than of the ephemeral observations which I have long been accustomed to endure. But, uninfluenced, I hope, by temper, my judgment most explicitly tells me, that no loyal subject ought to allow a Report, to the Sovereign, to be submitted to both Houses of Parliament, by order of a Government who had not only insisted on his silence, but who have also suppressed his evidence, without rising before the country to vindicate himself; for, whatever may be a man's philosophy, or forbearance, he ought to be ashamed to say that "he does not care" for censure from such a quarter, conveyed in so imposing a form.

On the common-admitted principle of self-defence, I have, therefore, published less than one-sixth (being all that I consider at all important to the public) of the despatches which were originally called for by the Duke of Wellington; and, having done so, far from pleading that I have yielded to natural feelings, I calmly maintain that, (without even reckoning the sanction of the order of the House of Lords, that the despatches requisite for my defence should be printed,) I am perfectly justified in what I have done.

The reader is now aware of the serious differences that have existed between Her Majesty's Government and myself; and without the slightest feeling of personal animosity, I commit the subject of our dispute to the public, earnestly hoping that it may be considered only so far as it regards the happiness, prosperity, and protection of the British North American Colonies.

PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION.

MY REASONS FOR NOT HAVING DELAYED THE PUBLICATION OF MY "NARRATIVE" UNTIL THE DESPATCHES, ORDERED TO BE PRINTED BY THE HOUSE OF LORDS, WERE PROMULGATED.

THE accusations against me, and against the legislature of Upper Canada, contained in Lord Durham's Report, which, by the advice of Her Majesty's Government, was "presented by her Majesty's command to both Houses of Parliament," were as follows:—

1. That, as Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, I had managed to obtain, at the elections, a constitutional majority in the House of Assembly, by making deceptive misrepresentations to the people; and that, in a number of instances, the said elections had been carried "by the unscrupulous exercise of the influence of my Government."

2. That I had formed my Executive Council of persons whom I had "taken from without the pale of official eligibility,"—that this Council had "accepted office almost on the express condition of being mere ciphers;" and that, having been selected under these degrading circumstances, it continued under the administration of Sir George Arthur, "to feel that under no conceivable contingency could they expect an Assembly disposed to support them."

3. That the members of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada "had been elected under circumstances such as to render them peculiar objects of suspicion and reproach to a large number of their countrymen;" and that they were accused of having "violated their pledges at the elections."

4. That by the above acts the people of Upper Canada had been exasperated.

On these offensive accusations being laid, by advice of Her Majesty's Government, before both Houses of Parliament, accompanied by four hundred folio pages of additional matter, selected by the Government, but which, strange to say, did not contain a single word in defence either of me or of the Executive Council, or House of Assembly of Upper Canada, I found myself, all of a sudden, most ungenerously thrown, by a Government I had faithfully served, into a dilemma from which it was utterly impossible for me to extricate myself with impunity: for, if I should vindicate myself, by publishing the despatches which I had refused to divulge to both Houses of the Canadian Legislature, I knew I should instantly be accused of betraying my employers; while, on the other hand, if, to avoid this imputation, I should remain silent, I felt most strongly that the Executive Council of Upper Canada, whose private as well as public characters had been so unjustly assailed—the House of Assembly of Upper Canada, who had, during two arduous sessions, so nobly supported me, the electors of the province, who in peace as well as in war, had so constitutionally flocked around me, and the Legislatures of our North American Colonies, who had so loyally co-operated with Upper Canada in standing against democracy, would indignantly have declared, that, supported as I had been by them all, I was bound to them by honour and by gratitude, not only regardless of every personal sacrifice, to step forward to shield them in their absence from being so unjustly defamed before the Imperial Parliament, but to save them from the ruinous consequences of Lord Durham's Report, by exposing to the country the unintentional misrepresentations which it contained. The dilemma in which Her Majesty's Government placed me was a cruel one; because, without any means of escaping, it forced me to sacrifice either my reputation among diplomatic men by publishing my despatches, or my character among men of the world, by ungratefully shrinking from defending those to whom, under Providence, I was indebted for infinitely more than my life.

The Duke of Wellington, totally unsolicited by me, seeing the miserable predicament in which I was placed, magnanimously rose in my defence, and, supported by two late Secretaries of State for the Colonies, both of whom declared that I was entitled to vindication, his Grace called upon Lord Melbourne for the production of the whole of my despatches.

The very point which I myself had refused to accede to the addresses of both Houses of the Canadian Legislature, was thus fairly brought before Lord Melbourne by his political antagonist, and the moment had therefore arrived for his Lordship to determine and to declare before the country, whether he would resist or yield to a request, the consequences of which he was fully aware of. His Lordship was pleased deliberately to accede to the Duke of Wellington's motion, and accordingly such of my despatches as were necessary to my vindication, were ordered to be printed.

The important point being yielded, publicity being granted, and the immediate elucidation of the real truth being of vital importance not only to my own character, to the character of the authorities of Upper Canada, but to the empire at large, ten days after this permission was granted, I published in a popular form, and with necessary explanations, the case which I had hitherto withheld from the public.

In this publication I did not divulge a single State secret, but by producing less than a sixth of my despatches, I merely exculpated myself from the accusations which had been made against me, by explaining what had been the policy I had endeavoured to pursue, what had been the difficulties which had vexatiously been opposed to me, and how, instead of being supported by my employers, I had, by their repeated attacks, been eventually driven from my post.

For reasons which I am unable to explain, an unusual delay took place in the promised production of my despatches, in consequence of which my defence of the policy I had pursued was published before it was officially promulgated by Her Majesty's Government.

I acknowledge with submission the breach of form I have thus committed; at the same time it will, I hope, be also admitted that, leaving my natural eagerness to vindicate myself, and those who had supported me, from the offensive accusations which had been brought against us before both Houses of Parliament, completely out of the question, it was of vital importance that my volume should reach the colonies and appear before the judgment of the British public, as nearly as possible, simultaneously with Lord Durham's unfortunate recommendations: for surely it must be evident that, in our colonial policy, there exist errors enough without wilfully sowing and giving time for the growth of others, which, by a prompt reply, might at once be eradicated; and this general observation is particularly applicable to Lord Durham's Report, which, without intentional offence to his Lordship, I must say, contains allegations against the Legislature of Upper Canada, and expressions of admiration of the United States, almost sufficient to make our Canadian Militia throw down their arms in despair.

Notwithstanding these reasons, it has, however, been observed by Her Majesty's Government, before Parliament, "that my publication of my despatches is unparalleled, and that long may it remain so." Whether the provocation as well as the treatment I have received from Her Majesty's Government be also "unparalleled" is a question for the public rather than me to determine. I will therefore proceed to notice two other remarks made against me by Her Majesty's Government, viz., that I ought not to have published at all—first, any despatches impugning the political principles of individuals (one of whom principally alluded to is, I presume, Her Majesty's Under Secretary of State for the Colonies); and, secondly, any expressions hostile to the institutions of the United States, Her Majesty's Government having determined, although I have published them, officially to withhold all such documents from the public.

Now what a contradiction this is to the course which the Government pursued respecting Lord Durham's allegations against me!

These allegations leaked out into the "Times" newspaper before they were officially laid before Parliament, or rather before it was even decided that they should be laid before Parliament, just as my despatches appeared after they had been ordered to be printed. In the former case, however, the greater irregularity was urged by Her Majesty's Government as their excuse, or rather as their reason, for promulgating a libel; while, in the lesser case, it is said to be no reason at all for their publishing it. And now, let us examine who are the parties that in one instance Her Majesty's Government join in attacking, and in another instance, exactly similar, protect from defamation.

Why, the individual whom Her Majesty's Government have assisted in assailing before both Houses of Parliament, is the man who, on the continent of America, humbly maintained monarchical principles against democracy; while, on the other hand, the individual whom they shield is Her Majesty's Under Secretary for the Colonies, declared, on respectable evidence which it has been offered to produce, to have assisted in our colonies the progress of republican institutions!!

But not only do Her Majesty's Government protect this individual, but they declare their intention to protect democracy itself; and although twenty-two pieces of artillery of the United States were fired during a fortnight upon Upper Canada while I commanded there—although the Americans, after having set a price upon my head, shamefully invaded the province in all directions,—shot down thirty of our brave soldiers,—cruelly murdered and plundered the Queen's subjects,—brutally insulted several ladies on board the British steamer (the Sir Robert Peel), which they burnt,—barbarously mutilated the corpses of our officers, one of whom, it is said, they hung up by the heels as a mark for their rifles.—Although, on relinquishing the government of Upper Canada, I was pursued for upwards of forty miles by these Americans, who hunted me like bloodhounds to murder me, for no other reason than because, as Her Britannic Majesty's representative, I had resisted the repeated proclamations by which the American "Generals commanding" had insolently called upon Her Majesty's subjects of Upper Canada to exchange British institutions for democracy.—Notwithstanding all these provocations, and notwithstanding these infamous aggressions have already cost the country nearly two millions of money, I am to be censured by Her Majesty's Government for having, after they had agreed to the publication of my despatches, made the country and the civilized world aware that I had called "shame" upon those institutions of the United States, which their citizens had vainly endeavoured, by bayonets and artillery, to force upon the people of Upper Canada, whether they liked them or not.

If Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that the old-fashioned custom, which in British history has ever been maintained, of indignantly resisting insult and aggression, is henceforward to be abolished, why, instead of first inculcating the new doctrine upon an humble individual like myself, did they not venture at once to rebuke the Duke of Wellington, when, on the 6th ult., his Grace, in a speech which men of property in the United States will both appreciate and admire, compared the unjustifiable invasion of the Canadas 'to a system of warfare known only among the most lawless of the most barbarous states of the East and of Africa!'

Do Her Majesty's Ministers conceive that the plain-dealing yeomen, farmers, merchants, and manufacturers of the British empire are to be called upon to pay two millions of money for a secret war with America, which no man is to dare to mention; and that our public officers, smarting under the indignities they have received from the American Republic, are to be publicly censured, unless, with the servility of spaniels, they lick the hand that has been striking them?

Do Her Majesty's Ministers afford this unheard-of protection to our own revered institutions? No! Every fault which conflicting Commissioners of Inquiry, one after another, can ingeniously point out in the Monarchical institutions of the Canadas have been printed with eager alacrity; every recommendation from friend or foe to subject the Governor, the Executive Council, and the Upper House of the Provincial Legislature to the will of the people, has been listened to 'with the utmost possible respect,' and published in detail. Lord Durham's censures against my policy; his Lordship's allegations against the Executive Council whom I appointed, against the Legislative Council, and even against the representatives of the people of Upper Canada, by the advice of Her Majesty's Ministers, have been all 'laid before both Houses of Parliament by command of the Queen.'

Neither the private nor the public feelings of the supporters of British institutions have been spared; but the moment (availing myself of Lord Melbourne's motion, that a portion of my despatches be printed) I tell the country the real truth—the moment, in defence of our monarchical constitution, I utter a word against those republican institutions of the United States, which have assailed and insulted it, Her Majesty's Government defend democracy, and frown upon me for having disclosed the resistance I offered to its attacks!"

Lastly, how could Her Majesty's Government complain before the House of Commons, that too many of my despatches had been published, when in the same breath they cheerfully consented to print a second batch of them, on Mr. Hume's ridiculous pretence, that their publication was necessary for the purification of his character?

(PREFACE TO SUPPLEMENTAL CHAPTER.)

If Her Majesty's Ministers feel that they have been seriously injured, in the opinion of steady men of business, by the publication of my despatches, they should blame themselves, not me: for if they themselves had not torn up the solemn treaty of peace which existed between us, I should still have been governed by its terms.

The dilemma in which they involved me, by acknowledging and laying before Parliament, as an official "Report," the pamphlet of an Ex-Governor, who before his resignation had been received had, in a Quebec Proclamation, assailed them and the Imperial Parliament as severely as after his resignation had been accepted, he assailed in his said London Pamphlet the conduct and by-gone policy of an Ex-Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, "functus officii," like himself—the consequent demand in the House of Lords for my despatches—and the exertions which I was forced to make in self-defence, will, I believe, be a warning to British Statesmen:—

1st. Never again to forget their own dignity by refusing to accept the resignation of a public servant, when, by word as well as by deed, he frankly says of their measures (as I did within four months of my arrival at Toronto), "that he has not an idea in common with them;" and that the policy they have desired him to follow "has a democratic character, to which he cannot conscientiously accord."

2ndly. Never again in our colonies, in opposition to the earnest recommendations of the Lieutenant Governor, to raise up the well-known enemies, and to pull down the time-trying friends of British Institutions.

3rdly. Never again to combine with any one in unjustly dragging before both Houses of Parliament a silent, innocent man, who, in his retirement, was faithfully concealing their policy.

SUPPLEMENTAL CHAPTER.

Her Majesty's Ministers, after my retirement, persevere in the same fatal system—Extraordinary Despatch from the Colonial Office to His Excellency Sir George Arthur—Observations against the proposal, by Her Majesty's Ministers, of the Union of the Canadas—Explanation to the Bishop of Exeter respecting the Clergy Reserves—A few Remarks on a Volume (containing 524 folio pages) of my Despatches, lately laid by Her Majesty's Government before both Houses of Parliament—Concluding Observations.

THE preceding chapters have, I believe, unveiled to the public the real difficulties which drove Sir John Colborne, Sir Archibald Campbell, and myself from the administration of the Colonial Governments to which by our Sovereign we had respectively been appointed.

For the sake of history, rather than from any desire either to gratify or irritate the political passions of the day, I feel it a painful duty, in the third edition of this volume, to place on record a few facts and documents which, I regret to say, too clearly prove that, since my retirement, Her Majesty's Ministers (who have never for a moment entertained any personal animosity against me) have steadily pursued towards the Canadas the same fatal system—that they have evinced the same unalterable determination to weaken the influence of the Crown, to strengthen the democratic power—in short, to subvert (regardless of the opinions and entreaties of almost every respectable inhabitant of our colonies) British institutions on the continent of North America.

After the electors of Upper Canada had constitutionally repudiated from their confidence Mr. Speaker Bidwell and the republican majority by whom he had been supported, one of the first subjects to which the new loyal House of Assembly steadily directed its attention, was a despatch from the Colonial Office, respecting the regulation of the public lands; and accordingly, after patient deliberation, they brought forward a bill, in which the Commons' House, entirely of its own accord, deemed it advisable to invest in the representative of their Sovereign that amount of honourable confidence which dignifies the character of monarchical institutions, and which most particularly facilitates colonial government.

Considering the severe moral conflict in which, unsupported by Her Majesty's Government, I had been, and in which I was still engaged, nothing could be of more vital importance to the Crown than this unanswerable proof, even to the mother-country, of the attachment of the Canadian people to British institutions, and of their sensible repugnance to that levelling insatiable desire of the adjoining Republic always to be restlessly transferring, from the executive branch of their legislature to an ungovernable mob, the patronage which, in monarchical institutions, is confidently reposed in the Crown.

The bill, by a triumphant majority, passed through the House of Assembly, as also through the Upper House of the Legislature, and then having been, by the advice of my Executive Council, referred by me to the opinion of the Crown officers, and (their concurrence having been obtained) to the Secretary of State, to receive the Royal assent, Her Majesty's Ministers had before them an opportunity of advising the Crown to confirm, in terms of approbation and encouragement, the victory which had thus constitutionally been gained on the continent of America over the advocates of democracy.

Their immense influence, however, as usual, they cruelly threw into the wrong scale; and, as if determined to resist everything that could restore vigour to the exhausted influence of the Crown, and as if determined to seize upon every opportunity of strengthening their own power by courting ephemeral popularity with the mob, they replied to my communication, by the following sickening despatch to Sir George Arthur, which, having been laid by His Excellency before the Provincial Legislature, has been just printed by order of the House of Assembly:—

No. 36.

DOWNING STREET,

8th March, 1838.

SIR,

As the bill passed by the Legislative Council and Assembly of the province of Upper Canada, in the session of 1837, entitled, "An Act to provide for the disposal of the public lands in this Province, and for other purposes therein-mentioned," and reserved by the Lieutenant-Governor for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure, could not by law receive the Royal assent until it should have laid for thirty days on the table of both Houses of Parliament, it was impossible for me to communicate the decision of Her Majesty upon that bill during the last year.

The transcripts of the bill having been laid before both Houses early in the present session, and the period fixed by law having expired within which the confirmation of the bill might have been arrested by an Address from either House, Her Majesty has been graciously pleased, by an order in Council, finally to enact and confirm this bill.

It is, however, necessary to state, that the bill is not exempt from some objections, to which I feel it my duty to draw your attention. The Royal assent to it has been given because the main scope and tenor of the law is in accordance with those principles, on the subject of the settlement of waste lands, which have been maintained by Her Majesty's Government since the year 1831, and because, the law having been passed for only two years, the objectionable clauses may be readily omitted when the Act shall be renewed, and by due caution in the mean time will not be productive of any serious injury.

The enactments to which I refer are, 1st, that which authorises the Lieutenant-Governor to direct reservations of land adjacent to lands about to be sold, in order that such reserves may be freely granted to the purchaser on proof of his residence for five years, and of his having effected certain improvements; and, 2ndly, that which enables the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to make private sales to any person to whom a special injury would be done by the public sale of any particular piece of land. Each of the provisions is liable to the same general abuse. Each of them will invest the Executive Government with the power of dealing with this part of the public property in such a manner as to gratify individuals, and convert into a source of favour an administration which should be conducted upon the most rigid principles of open and impartial dealing—upon rules which every purchaser can ascertain, and in which all shall have an equal interest.

Reposing full confidence in the discretion and equity of the local Government, I am yet unable to perceive any sufficient reason why the law should refer to their arbitrement questions which might safely be decided by general and inflexible regulations. You, I am convinced, will be happy to be relieved from this invidious duty, and to be placed beyond the reach of any possible reproach of having employed it unwisely, or with undue favour to any person whatever. So far as these enactments leave you a discretionary authority, in making the reservations and private sales to which they refer, you will, therefore, abstain from availing yourself of that right. When the bill again comes under consideration, you will endeavour to induce the Council and Assembly to receive it with the omission of those enactments; and it would be desirable that you should suggest that, with this alteration, it should be passed for a longer period than two years.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) GLENELG.

Major-General SIR GEORGE ARTHUR, &c.

It need hardly be said that the republican members of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada were delighted at the want of confidence, which, in direct opposition to the desire of both branches of their Legislature, Her Majesty's Ministers had deemed it proper openly to evince towards the representative of the Crown in Upper Canada; while, on the other hand, the constitutional members, as well as inhabitants, were not only disheartened but disgusted at finding that, by that miserable species of special pleading from which they had so long suffered, their Governor was publicly to be deprived of the patronage which had constitutionally been intrusted to him, under the republican excuse that he might be "relieved from an invidious duty, and be placed beyond the reach of any possible reproach [by the mob] of having employed it unwisely or with undue favour to any person whatever."

In England, every plain honest man would look down with contempt upon suspicions and insinuations of this nature, but, in a little remote community, the withering effect upon the Lieutenant-Governor of such unworthy precaution, on the part of the Queen's Ministers, is indubitably prejudicial; for, with the fatal example of a licentious republican government before his eyes, it is impossible for any reflecting inhabitant to compare the systematic manner in which her Majesty's Ministers fetter the legitimate influence of the Queen's representative, and unfetter the unruly passions of the mob, without clearly foreseeing that life and property, in our noble North American colonies, must inevitably, ere long, become, as in the United States they have become, the defenceless victims of the violence and tyranny of the multitude.

The attention of the reader has hitherto been directed to a series of small aggressions which, one after another, her Majesty's Ministers have made upon British institutions in America. The mere dramatis personæ of the political tragedy which, by day as well as by night, has unceasingly been performing in our colonies, constitute a band of witnesses whose united testimony cannot be opposed.

The countenance shown by her Majesty's Government to Mr. M'Kenzie, Mr. Papineau, Dr. Rolph, Mr. Bidwell, Mr. Bedart, and even to a whole list of traitors, for whose apprehension the Crown is now offering immense rewards, viewed simultaneously with the depression, by her Majesty's Ministers, of Sir John Colborne, Sir Archibald Campbell, Sir Francis Head, and more or less of every Governor in our North American colonies, are corroborative facts, which the public as an impartial jury, cannot long consider without unanimously agreeing in their verdict.

Nevertheless, though with apparent malice prepense our colonial institutions may secretly have been attacked "with intent to kill," it has so happened, or, to speak more gravely, it has providentially been decreed, that, by the good sense and good feeling of the inhabitants of Upper Canada, the blows have not only been parried, but, the leading traitors having been driven from the land, the loyalty of that province, like molten gold, has actually been purified by the conflagration which attempted to consume it; and, as the Legislature of New Brunswick, as also of Nova Scotia, not only publicly applauded the fidelity of their sister province, but, when the Americans attacked our colonies, voted a volunteer army with upwards of £100,000 to repel the invasion of democracy, one would have thought that her Majesty's Ministers (seeing that the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel most willingly lauded these brave defenders of the British flag) would have felt themselves absolutely compelled to obtain from the Imperial Parliament, in the form of resolutions, some sort of strong expressions of admiration, by which the Transatlantic defenders of our institutions, would have been encouraged in their exertions, and supported under the sufferings they had been called upon to endure. The ominous silence, however, of her Majesty's Ministers on these subjects, coupled with the ill-timed complimentary expressions of confidence which, on every opportunity, they seemed determined profusely to heap upon our republican allies, inversely as they deserved them, clearly indicated that their destructive policy was not yet to be abandoned; and accordingly, after a long period of anxious suspense, they formally announced to both Houses of Parliament, in the most imposing manner our constitution admits of, the ruinous project of "a union of the Canadas."

As her Majesty's Ministers cannot feel themselves entitled to claim from Parliament, from the country, or from the inhabitants of our North American provinces, a blind assent to so important a measure of colonial legislation—as they cannot ask for implicit faith in their political principles, or claim to possess any more knowledge on the subject in question than can be transmitted by them to the public as easily as they have received it—it becomes necessary that their project should be seriously, and, if possible, impartially considered.

On the 28th of October 1836, when I was in perfect harmony with the Legislature and people of Upper Canada, I transmitted to her Majesty's Government "A Memorandum on the Political State of the Canadas" (vide Narrative, page 121,) in which I officially disclosed reasons for rejecting the proposition of the union of the Canadas, which I stated to be fearfully recommended "by all those deep calculating republicans in both provinces, who shrewdly foresaw that the union of the two provinces would eventually cause their separation from the parent state." Besides these arguments against a union, I respectfully submitted to the consideration of her Majesty's Government a remedial measure for the tranquillization of the Canadas, by which I conceived that democracy in general, and Mr. Papineau's adherents in particular, would most effectually be curbed and repressed.

(SUPPLEMENTAL CHAPTER.)

For reasons which have yet to be explained, her Majesty's Ministers suppressed from Parliament the arguments, the warnings, and the recommendations which, after a personal inspection of the province, and after a patient consultation with the most intelligent of its inhabitants, I had offered to them; and, although the Government had just expended a very large sum upon a Commission of Inquiry, expressly appointed to obtain information for Parliament—although the variegated (and, as far as Upper Canada was concerned, the unexperienced) opinions of the Royal Commissioners exhibited, when printed, a confiction of intellect and a confusion of language which has scarcely been witnessed since the days of Babel—her Majesty's Ministers placidly allowed both Houses of Parliament, without rudder or compass to direct them, to be buffeted on the waves of this controversy; they allowed a series of weak ineffectual Resolutions to be adopted, without ever permitting the country to take into its consideration, or to weigh in its impartial judgment, the official opinion, good, bad, or indifferent, of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Upper Province on the very subject before them.

At the time my objections against uniting the two Canadas were transmitted to her Majesty's Government, I had no reason whatever to urge them, excepting the duty which I owed to my sovereign. Instead of being suspected of unreasonably mistrusting the loyalty of the people of Upper Canada, I might rather have been supposed to have been carried away from cautious judgment by the manner in which they had responded to my appeal. With every leading republican discarded from the House of Assembly, I might have been supposed, intoxicated by success, to have neglected to calculate that my enemies still remained in existence; and that hereafter they might (as they did) make a last desperate effort to rebel.

Yet, notwithstanding the smiling prospect that was before me, I deliberately gave it as my opinion, that the unruly propensities, natural to a healthy young province, were as much as I felt I had power to restrain—that the proposed attempt to infuse into it the rebellious French majority of the lower country "would separate the Canadas from the parent state"—"that both provinces would be embarrassed by their union—and that between the two stools the British Constitution would fall to the ground."

Now, instead of being "raised from a coachman's seat to govern men and guide the state," let us suppose that the case were to be reversed, and that any one of our "liberal statesmen" were to be transferred to a coachman's seat to drive four healthy young horses, which on the slightest declivity he felt he could scarcely hold—let us suppose that, after the reins had remained in his hands sufficient time to make him perfectly well acquainted with the temper of his cattle, he were conscientiously to warn his owners of the difficulty and danger of his post—that his warning, instead of being made public, were to be kept secret, and that, as a remedy for the evil, he were suddenly to be told that six notorious runaway animals, that no coachman had ever been able to hold, were in future to be prefixed to his own hard-mouthed team—would it require a statesman's intellect to declare that the whole concern would be wilfully annihilated? Yet this homely case, absurd and ridiculous as it appears, is exactly the proposition which has deliberately emanated from her Majesty's Ministers!

The journals of the Legislature of Upper Canada will show the difficulty that Sir Peregrine Maitland, who was ten years Lieutenant-Governor of the province, experienced in restraining the encroachments of the House of Assembly.

The same journals will show that Sir John Colborne ended eight years' administration of the same government by leaving behind him a republican Speaker (Mr. Bidwell,) heading a republican majority of 36 against 25.

The same journals will show that, on more than one occasion, I could but barely resist the democratic pressure of the House.

The same journals will show the difficulties which my successor, Sir George Arthur, has similarly experienced.

As, therefore, it has undeniably been the case that during the last 21 years the popular branch of the Legislature of Upper Canada has evinced as strong a centrifugal force as it constitutionally ought to possess, for what honest object could it possibly be proposed by her Majesty's Ministers, that to the representatives of 400,000 inhabitants, who with difficulty had been governed, there should be added the headstrong representatives of 600,000 Lower Canadians, who for the last 20 years have daily become more and more ungovernable, until, headed by Mr. Papineau, having broken out in open rebellion against their sovereign, they at this moment can only be restrained by the bayonet and by martial law?

(SUPPLEMENTAL CHAPTER.)

Could Mr. Papineau himself, if he had been consulted by her Majesty's Ministers, have devised for them a republican project more certain to subvert British institutions in the Canadas, than to throw a million of inhabitants upon an executive Government, and upon a Governor who with difficulty had been able to govern 400,000?

Could the American citizens, who dishonourably invaded Upper Canada the moment they fancied she was in distress, if they had been consulted by her Majesty's Ministers, have devised for them a more certain receipt for wresting the Canadas from the British Crown, than, by an amalgamation of the two Legislatures, to diffuse the loyalty of the Upper Province over more ground than it could garrison, and simultaneously to infuse into the veins of the loyal country the disloyalty of the Lower Province? for, when both were tainted and corrupt, what resistance could they offer to that newly-discovered tertium quid, commonly called "American sympathy?"

But, omitting for a moment to take into consideration the deadly effects that would be produced by injecting into the House of Assembly the poisonous majority of the Lower Province, my despatches to the Colonial Office would indisputably show the serious difficulties which, as a civil Governor, I practically experienced when suddenly attacked by the Americans, in being obliged, by my instructions, to apply to the military commander of the forces at Montreal, instead of being empowered at once to take those vigorous measures which the ever-changing exigencies of the moment required. In winter it required a fortnight to receive an answer from Quebec; and, with a vast frozen territory, equalling in its extent six of the United States, with a huge unwieldy House of Assembly, secretly hostile to British rule, and with a frontier of 1100 miles to guard, what legislative measures could promptly be completed to repel the invasion of our republican allies?

It is utterly impossible to conceive what excuse her Majesty's Ministers can offer to the country for the astounding proposition which they have just made.

It is easy enough, under the special licence of Parliament, to solemnize the nuptials of the two Canadas; but are her Majesty's Ministers prepared, after the fatal ceremony shall have been concluded, to name to the country the man competent to govern them? or, above all, the Secretary of State who, when they shall have been amalgamated, would have moral courage enough to stand against the demands, however unreasonable they might be, of the United House of Assembly?

If the Colonial Office, deserting, in the hour of danger, the Canadian Governors, the Executive and Legislative Councils, has hitherto invariably trembled before Mr. Papineau and Mr. Bidwell—at their bidding has raised treason to the judicial bench—in short, with recreant submission, has bowed its head to every blustering demagogue who has been encouraged by its own weakness to insult it,—is it for the maintenance or for the wilful destruction of British institutions that, with this experience on record, it is now proposed to unite together two forces, each one of which the Colonial Secretary has wanted either the will or the power to restrain?

If the expensive army, at present cantoned throughout Lower Canada, be a just estimate of the rebellious spirit to be controlled there, might not her Majesty's Ministers as well fix a mill-stone round the neck of the Upper Province, as to swamp their struggling loyalty by deliberately attaching to it an amount of treason equal to the force of an army of 17,000 men?

Again, upon what grounds has this destructive recommendation been based?

1. The journals of the Legislature of Upper Canada record, against the project of the union of the provinces, the following corroborative joint address to his late Majesty, which, it will be perceived, is dated six months after my humble but deliberate recommendation against the measure had been officially communicated:

TO THE KING'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Council and Commons of Upper Canada, in Provincial Parliament assembled, humbly beg leave to address your Majesty, expressing the great concern which we feel at the present embarrassed state of the Local Government in your Majesty's Colony of Lower Canada. Though deeply sympathising with that portion of your Majesty's subjects whose tranquillity has been disturbed by the long-pending difficulties in that province, and though fully sensible how fatally our own interests and security are liable to be affected by their possible result, we have hitherto forbore to intrude upon your Majesty with any expression of our opinions upon the posture of public affairs in that colony.

That we have not now presumed to address your Majesty, in order to remark upon the policy which has been pursued in the government of that colony, which interposes between us and the United Kingdom, but for the purpose, which more directly concerns this province, of stating to your Majesty our apprehension, that a mistaken view of the condition and interests of the people of Upper and Lower Canada may prompt some persons inconsiderately to press upon your Majesty's Government the measure of uniting these provinces, as a remedy for existing evils.

We have for some time past observed, that suggestions of such a nature have been publicly offered both in England and Lower Canada, and we are not surprised that our fellow-subjects of that province, who are suffering under the present difficulties, should be willing to risk the consequences of such an experiment. They may easily persuade themselves that their situation can scarcely be rendered more embarrassing by the failure of any expedients; and they are not to be blamed if, in the hope of obtaining some relief by the change, they forbear to look carefully into the probable consequences of an union to the welfare and tranquillity of this particular portion of your Majesty's dominions.

We earnestly trust, nevertheless, that your Majesty will graciously condescend to consider, that the political condition of four hundred thousand of your Majesty's subjects cannot be otherwise than most materially affected by so important a change in the government.— We are of opinion that such a change would expose us to the danger of consequences certainly inconvenient, and possibly most ruinous to the peace and welfare of this country, and destructive of its connexions with the parent state.

This province we believe to be quite as large as can be effectually and conveniently ruled by our executive Government. United with Lower Canada, it would form a territory, of which the settled parts from east to west would cover an extent of eleven hundred miles, which, for nearly half the year, can only be traversed by land; the opposite territory of the United States, along the same extent of frontier, being divided into six States, having each an independent government.

The population which Upper Canada contains is almost without exception of British descent. They speak the same language, and have the same laws, and it is their pride that these laws are derived from their mother-country, and are unmixed with rules and customs of foreign origin.

Wholly and happily free from those causes of difficulty which are found so embarrassing in the adjoining province, we cannot but most earnestly hope that we shall be suffered to continue so; and that your Majesty's paternal regard for your numerous and loyal subjects in this colony will not suffer a doubtful experiment to be hazarded, which may be attended with consequences most detrimental to their peace, and injurious to the best interests of themselves and their posterity.

3rd of March, 1837.

It will appear from the following reply, which has been published by the Provincial Legislature, that his late Majesty William IV., who had personally visited British North America, fully concurred with the three branches of the Parliament of Upper Canada, and with her Majesty's present Ministers, in deprecating a union of the two provinces:

(SUPPLEMENTAL CHAPTER.)

DOWNING-STREET,

21st, April, 1837.

No. 170.

SIR,

I have the honour to acknowledge your despatch (No. 26) of the 4th ultimo, in which you transmit to me an Address to his Majesty, from the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of Upper Canada, deprecating an union between the two Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada.

I beg leave to acquaint you that, having laid this Address before the King, his Majesty has been pleased to receive the same very graciously, and to command me to observe, that the project of an union between the two provinces has not been contemplated by his Majesty as fit to be recommended for the sanction of Parliament.

I have, &amp;c.

(Signed)

GLENELG.

SIR F. HEAD, Bart.

&amp;c. &amp;c. &amp;c.

2. His Excellency Sir John Colborne, the present Governor of the Canadas, is, I have good reason for believing, against a union.

3. His Excellency Sir George Arthur, the present Governor of Upper Canada, is, I also believe, against a union.

4. Lord Durham himself will not, I believe, deny that on the eve of his departure from London for Quebec he replied to a deputation of Canada merchants, who waited upon him to advocate a union, by declaring "that every argument they had expended upon him tended only to confirm his objections to the project"—that to the highest authorities in Upper Canada his Lordship unequivocally expressed the same hostile opinion; and yet, with all these warnings and concurrent testimony before them, no sooner did the single House of Assembly (overpowered for a moment by the influence of a persevering individual solicitation, which also in this country has for a long time been indefatigably canvassing not only the Government, but many members of both Houses of the Imperial Parliament) pass resolutions, accompanied by a series of deceptive securities, in favour of a union, than her Majesty's Ministers (suddenly subscribing to the recommendation which Lord Durham, in direct opposition to his own former opinions, had been driven to promulgate after he had abdicated his authority*) eagerly join with his Lordship, and with the single branch of the Canadian Legislature, (for the upper house have since thrown out the bill), in a measure more serious, more fatal, more democratic, and more overwhelming to British liberty than anything which, in their fatal colonial career, they have even yet ventured to recommend: in short, with the withering example before their eyes of the effects of Irish agitation in the Imperial Parliament, they have deliberately proposed to overwhelm the loyalty of the Upper Canadian Legislature, by wilfully infusing into its vitals an irresistible and insatiable French faction, avowedly hostile to British rule!

The revolutionary effects of uniting the Canadas, was so glaringly apparent to the Upper Province that, when both Houses of its Legislature united in the session of 1837 in petitioning the late King against the measure, the republican faction, who had been outvoted on the question, had recourse to the following stratagem, which sufficiently evinced their anxiety to arrest a petition they well knew to be subversive of their treasonable object.

*In the few observations I have made on Lord Durham's Report, I have purposely confined myself almost entirely to those passages in which his Lordship had so unnecessarily assailed my character and conduct. As his Lordship's recommendations, however, involve vital interests, I cannot refrain from making public one additional instance of the unintentional inaccuracy of his statements.

In reporting on the execution in Upper Canada of the traitors Lount and Matthews, his Lordship addresses her Majesty as follows:—"The two persons who suffered the extreme penalty of the law, unfortunately engaged a great share of the public sympathy: their pardon had been solicited in petitions signed, it is generally asserted, by no less than 30,000 of their countrymen." By the last packet, official accounts have arrived of the exact number of the petitioners above alluded to, who only amounted altogether to 4,545!

(SUPPLEMENTAL CHAPTER.)

After the bill had passed through both Houses, a short customary address was proposed and passed in the Assembly, praying me to transmit the petition to the Secretary of State, to be laid at the foot of the throne. As a matter of course, it passed through the Legislative Council, and, the measure itself having been already carried, the last reading of this second address was negligently deferred by the House of Assembly to the very last day of the session. The republican members, observing this, secretly joined together to defeat it by speaking against time, and accordingly the notorious traitor, Dr. Rolph, who shortly afterwards planned the attack upon Toronto, and for whose apprehension a reward of £500 is now offered, actually did speak against time, and obstinately continued to do so, until the firing of the guns, which announced my having left Government House to prorogue the Parliament, put a sudden end to all debate, and the Republicans thus actually prevented the short address from being passed!

This petty conspiracy was of course reported by me to her Majesty's Ministers. The loud simple warning which it offered to them I hoped would have been irresistible; nevertheless, although it is still ringing in their ears, they now one and all join with Dr. Rolph and his adherents in recommending to the country the very Republican measure which, six months before the occurrence I have just related took place, I had from a station of trust and confidence faithfully warned them was advocated by our enemies.

In 1822 the Tory party in England proposed the same fatal measure of a union, but the alleged "grievances" of our North American colonies were then, incredible as it now sounds, actually believed to be substantial, the leading reformers of the Canadas were not then, as they now are, known to be traitors, and their device for the union was then received without any suspicion being entertained of its real object.

It would be well if the future historian of "The Decline and Fall of the British Empire" could pause here; but the form in which her Majesty's Ministers have introduced this measure must surely appear to posterity more culpable even than the measure itself; for, instead of manfully bearing upon their own shoulders the awful responsibility of a recommendation unsupported, I believe, by any of the representatives of the Crown in our North American colonies, or by any of the Legislative or Executive Councils of these provinces, her Majesty's Ministers deliberately advised the Queen to pronounce, before that portion of her Majesty's speech which related to the subject of the Canadas had been discussed by Parliament, a Royal opinion in the following lines:—

"Her Majesty thinks proper to acquaint the House (of Lords and Commons) that it appears to her Majesty that the future welfare of her subjects in Lower and Upper Canada will be promoted by a union of the said provinces into one province for the purpose of legislation."

Although every loyal subject in the British empire must admire the generous unsuspecting confidence which induced a youthful Queen to place such implicit reliance in the recommendations of her Ministers, yet surely it was their bounden duty to have taken unto themselves the undivided responsibility of a measure which, they cannot before the country deny, has solely emanated from their own breasts.

Considering that the vast importance of this trans-Atlantic question demanded that in both Houses of the Imperial Parliament it should, without bias of any sort, be openly and freely discussed, surely it would have been better that the opinion of the Ministers should be canvassed, and, if necessary, refuted, than that a single word of argument should be raised against the innocent recommendation of one whose name has, I firmly believe, never yet been connected in Upper Canada with any expression but those of the purest affection, and of the deepest respect!

Considering the opinions of the Lieutenant-Governors (her Majesty's representatives in our North American provinces)—considering that her Majesty's Ministers had but a few days ago printed and laid before both Houses of Parliament a despatch from me, dated 28th October, 1836, in which, in unmeasured terms, I had shown the republican tendency of the project, surely it would have been more decorous that my humble opinions should have been brought before Parliament, in opposition to those of her Majesty's Ministers, than to that of a Sovereign to whose person, dignity, and throne I am humbly but most dutifully attached.

QUESTION OF THE CLERGY RESERVES.

From the Bishop of Exeter, to whom I had had occasion to address a letter on the subject of some ecclesiastical resolutions which had been passed in Upper Canada, I had the honour to receive, on the 25th of March last, the following note, to which I immediately returned the following reply. From several other very able supporters of the Established Church I afterwards received similar observations.

It appearing, therefore, to me advisable that, in a new edition, the explanation which I had had the honour of privately submitting to the Bishop of Exeter should be made public, I applied for permission to publish his Lordship's letter as well as my own. His Lordship having readily complied with my suggestion, I commit the subject to the public without further comment.

COPY OF A LETTER FROM THE LORD BISHOP OF EXETER.

TORQUAY, 22nd March, 1838.

SIR,

I am confident that you will forgive my troubling you with another letter, in order to prevent misapprehension on a point which I feel to be of the highest importance.

In my sincere expression of the very high gratification which, in common with the world at large, I had received from the perusal of your interesting volume, I made no reserve; lest, therefore, I should be misunderstood, as including the whole of its contents, I think it necessary to say, that I lamented to read, in p. 289-90 of your "Narrative," (the passage which relates to clergy-reserves,) your recommendation "that they should be divided among the Churches of England, Scotland, Rome, and Wesleyan Methodists, in the proportions which the population of these great sects relatively bear to each other in the mother-country."

Deeming this recommendation to be in direct violation of a great and sacred principle, I grieve that it has come forth with your very high authority.

Do not suppose that I wish to draw you into a discussion of this point. My only reason for troubling you with a letter upon it is to sustain my own principles, and to avoid the appearance of inconsistency in hereafter (as it may probably happen) asserting them in Parliament—though I shall not have occasion to remark on your holding different sentiments, unless it be first cited as an authority by others.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your very obedient servant,

H. EXETER.

SIR F. B. HEAD, Bart.

COPY OF REPLY TO THE ABOVE.

ATHERSTONE, 25th March, 1839.

MY LORD,

I will not attempt to express to your Lordship my gratitude for the valuable sincerity with which you have expressed to me your opinion on a most important subject, as I trust I shall be permitted after the Easter recess to do so personally. I will therefore at once endeavour to explain, rather than to exculpate, the two pages in my Narrative, to which you have referred.

I fully admit that my recommendation—"That the clergy revenues of Upper Canada should be divided among the churches of England, Scotland, Rome, and Wesleyan Methodists, in the proportions which the population of those great sects" (I ought to have said communities, as the word sect has, I am aware, a clerical meaning which I never intended to convey, and which I regret I have conveyed) "relatively bear to each other in the mother-country," was a direct violation of a great and sacred principle; and, as this is my opinion, or rather as I concur in this opinion with your Lordship, I should really be glad to hear your Lordship maintain this important principle in Parliament.

I hope, therefore, I may not be considered as arguing against the principle, if I endeavour to explain why I was driven to abandon it, which I did for the same reason which induces a pilot, who, in a gale of wind, comes on board a vessel to leeward of its harbour, to run into any creek in which he may save at least a portion of the cargo.

My attention, while I was in Upper Canada, was so much occupied in resisting treason in the colony and treachery at home, that I had not much time to devote to the question of the clergy-reserves, but my humble opinion, such as it is, I will, without the slightest concealment lay before your Lordship.

I consider that, after having very unwisely, and almost unconstitutionally established the French religion, language, and laws (three elements which ought never to have been admitted) in Lower Canada, it was clearly the intention of the Imperial Parliament to make the wilderness of Upper Canada a purely British colony; and accordingly the acorn was planted to produce the oak.

The Sovereign was to be represented by General Simcoe; the House of Lords by a Legislative Council; the House of Commons by a House of Assembly; and the Established Church (which forms as much a portion of our constitution as any other element in it) was to be maintained and supported by the clergy-reserves.

I firmly believe not only this was the intention of the Imperial Parliament, but that it was the only proper course to pursue; for, though many people may be of opinion that there ought to be no such thing as an Established Church, yet no reasonable man can say that this important question should be decided in one way at home, and in another way in our colonies.

The Church and State being firmly riveted together at home, it was, I believe, not only the intention but the duty of the Imperial Parliament to make in the infant colony of Upper Canada such a provision as would ensure to our redundant population that they might emigrate to the same laws and same religion which are countenanced at home.

But though this was intended, yet there was a slight obscurity in the working of the Act, which I think the guardians of the Church ought, in the progress of the bill, to have cleared away; but somehow or other it escaped their notice. Nevertheless, if the Church of England had been at once properly and firmly established, and if the question now in dispute had been at once grappled with, I firmly believe the Parliament would have settled it according to the original intention; but the difficulty of the present day was not then foreseen, and the doubt was suffered to remain until 1819, when a case was drawn up and submitted to the Crown officers in a way which, certainly to me, seems to favour the admission of the Scotch Church to a participation in the clergy-reserves. I must, however, most humbly say, that I have always dissented from the opinion of the Crown officers on this subject.

I read the Act of 31 Geo. III. c. 31, to mean the planting of our Church and State in one of the noblest portions of the British empire, and I think we might as well now pretend to doubt what Sovereign the Governor was intended to represent, as what Church was to be represented, or what was the real meaning of "a Protestant clergy."

But, instead of the obvious and constitutional, if the literal meaning be claimed, then the Methodists assert that they are as much a "Protestant," or Anti-Catholic clergy, as the Scotch.

All these elements of dispute were left to ferment until the year 1836, when I assumed the Government, bringing with me instructions which, instead of deprecating any alteration in the provision, seemed to consider that it was not only the natural effect, but the fulfilment of the intention of the Act of 31 Geo. III., which Act, not being able to anticipate "what might be the prevailing opinions and feelings of the Canadians on this subject at a future period," took full precaution against "the inaptitude of a systematic provision for a Protestant clergy" to more advanced stages of society.

These sort of sentiments being publicly avowed by H. M. Ministers, the law-officers of the Crown having officially denied the right of the Church of England to the reserve in question, the Methodists being encouraged to claim a share, and 13,000,000 of lawless people on our border being hostile to the existence on the continent of America of either Church or State, I saw before me but too many reasons to believe that, unless the question were somehow or other speedily settled, it would be almost impossible to resist the insidious, specious, but unprinciplined proposition which was daily gaining strength, namely, of devoting the reserves to the purpose of education, which was plausibly argued to be an universal blessing to society.

The dreadful picture which exists in the United States for want of religion, made me reflect that if we attempted too much we might lose all; and that, in dividing the reserves in the proportions you have objected to, we should, at all events, attain the immense object of establishing religion in Upper Canada on a principle and in proportions which would not be altered by every different batch of emigrants that might arrive in the province.

That my proposition (see Mem. A) was a departure from the real meaning of the Act, viz. 31 Geo. III. I have admitted. I hope I have also shown my general willingness to face any invasion of that Act; but I do not hesitate to own to you, that to do what I wished in the clergy-reserve question was more than I could attempt—the opinion of the Crown officers was an obstacle I could not surmount.

With respect to admitting the Catholics, who certainly form no part of the Protestant Church, I have to observe, that, as the original intention of the Act, as I construe it, was set aside—1st, by the opinion of the law officers that the reserves were not to be given exclusively to the Church of England; and 2ndly, by the opinion, of her Majesty's Ministers respecting "the inaptitude" of the original arrangement "to the more advanced stages of society,"—the principle upon which the Catholics were to be excluded was so much impaired that it could hardly practically be exerted against them. If the Scotch and Methodist were to be admitted, the Catholics, who, on the insurrection bursting out, proved brave and loyal to a man, might at once have joined the Catholic priesthood of Lower Canada. I do not approve of this latter argument, yet it is not altogether devoid of political weight.

I hope you will excuse the imperfect manner in which, by return of post, I have replied to your obliging communication.

I have the honour to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's faithful

And most obedient servant,

F. B. HEAD.

The LORD BISHOP of Exeter.

The following private Memorandum, [A]. (containing the observations objected to by the Bishop of Exeter, in my "Narrative," page 289; 290,) was written by me at Toronto, in 1836, with a view to assist, if possible, the adjustment of the clergy-reserve question.

(Copy.)

MEMORANDUM [A.]

CLERGY RESERVE QUESTION.

"It appears to me that this question might be practically settled in something like the following manner:—

"1st. Debate and settle whether, under existing circumstances, it be advisable that the Clergy Reserves should (according to the 31 Geo. III. c. 31. s. 36 and 42, and according to that interpretation of the said Act which was given by his Majesty's Law Officers on the 15th Nov. 1819) continue to be confined to the Churches of England and Scotland only, or whether the Act should (in virtue of the powers in its 42nd section) be varied or repealed, with a view to admit other religious sects to a share in the proceeds of the said Clergy Reserves.

"2d. In case the first of these two queries should be agreed to, namely, that the reserves 'should continue to be confined to the two Churches of England and Scotland only,' nothing would then remain but to determine the exact proportions which each of the said two Churches should receive.

"An attempt to make this calculation from the property, or from the population of the two Churches, as they at present exist in this colony, would be objectionable:—

“ Because the requisite statistical information does not exist :

“ Because the inquiry would excite and agitate the adherents of both Churches, and yet satisfy neither :

“ Because, almost before the calculations could be concluded, emigration might suddenly null and subvert it.

“ The foregoing objections, with many of a similar nature, would be obviated by calculating the desired ratio on the broad, safe, constitutional maxim, or fact, that this colony, being as much an asylum for all British Subjects who may hereafter choose to come out here, as it is for those who have already become its inhabitants, ought to be considered as the image and transcript of the mother-country, and, consequently, that the Churches of England and Scotland (whatever may happen to be the population at this moment) should be assumed to bear the same relative proportion to each other in Upper Canada as it appears, by printed statistical tables, that they bonâ fide now bear to each other in the mother-country.

“ By this amicable arrangement of the question in dispute, all angry feelings, all local jealousies, all religious animosities, all petty interests, all fluctuating comparisons, would be avoided.

“ It is true that emigration might occasionally falsify the adjustment, but, as it is poverty and not religion that propels our countrymen from their homes, there would always be reason to expect that the assumed average would eventually become the correct one.

“ In case the second of the two queries should be agreed to, namely, that the Act of 31 Geo. III. c. 31, ‘ought, in virtue of the powers contained in its 42nd section, to be varied or repealed, with a view to admit other religious sects to a participation of the proceeds of the clergy reserves,’ the denomination of sects to be admitted, as well as the proportions they should each respectively receive, might be determined on the same broad constitutional principle which has already been described ; that is to say, all those great sects might be recognized in Upper Canada, which on account of their numbers and importance are considered as churches in the Mother-country, and each of the said sects might be assumed to possess the same relative population in Upper Canada as it actually possesses in the mother-country.

N. B.—“ In the foregoing memorandum nothing is directly or indirectly recommended ; all that is intended is to show in what way the different considerations of the subject may be practically dealt with.

“ F. B. H.”

Having now explained rather than defended the course I pursued in Upper Canada respecting the clergy-reserves, it only remains for me to observe that my apprehensions that, unless the reserves in question were secured without delay for religion, the House of Assembly would impatiently slienate them to other purposes, have, I regret to say, since my letter to the Bishop of Exeter of the 25th March, been realized, the Assembly having just passed a series of resolutions, the two first of which are, that the reserves should be sold and applied to the making of roads.

A FEW REMARKS BY SIR F. B. HEAD ON A VOLUME (CONTAINING 524 FOLIO PAGES, AND ENTITLED “Despatches from Sir F. B. Head, Bart. K. C. H., relative to Canada ; with Answers from the Secretary of State”) WHICH WAS ON WEDNESDAY LAID BY HER MAJESTY’S GOVERNMENT BEFORE PARLIAMENT.

1 I complain that, in this volume, the portion of despatches called for by his Grace the Duke of Wellington, as being necessary to repel Lord Durham’s allegations against me, has, contrary to my most earnest request, been jumbled with the portion subsequently required for Mr. Joseph Hume’s object, by which admixture the two cases, which, separately considered, would have been substantiated clearly in my favour, have been rendered incomprehensible and confused.

2. I complain that in this volume her Majesty’s Government have done me the injustice of reversing the order of the House of Commons, as declared in the title-page, by giving to their own ably-written “answers,” which are followed up by the most tedious documents, the unheard-of advantage of being printed before, instead of after, my despatches, to which they reply! In no court of justice in the world would such a course of procedure be permitted. In my case I conceive it to be particularly unfair, as the avowed object of the Duke of Wellington's motion was to enable me to repel, not fresh misrepresentations, but those specific allegations against me which her Majesty's Government had already deliberately presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of the Queen.

3. I complain that, although in this volume there has been unnecessarily republished an irrelevant but most abusive report of a select committee of that Republican House of Assembly, which, a few months after my arrival in Upper Canada, I dissolved—although the said report, containing 66 folio pages, signed by Charles Duncombe, a traitor, for whose apprehension a reward of £500 is now offered, and by T. D. Morrison, lately tried for treason, was, at the request of Mr. Joseph Hume, M. P., printed by an order of the House of Commons, dated 23d of January, 1838—her Majesty's Government have done me the injustice of excluding from this volume the counter-report of a select committee of the present loyal House of Assembly, which report, signed by Colonel the Hon. Sir Allan M'Nab, the present Speaker, triumphantly exposes the accusations made against me by the said traitor Duncombe, and by his fellow-labourer, Mr. Joseph Hume, M. P.

I submit to the calm judgment of unprejudiced men, that for her Majesty's Government to pretend to comply with the Duke of Wellington's notion by republishing the corrupt, disloyal report of a Committee, whose chairman, after this report had been made public in Upper Canada, was so repudiated by the farmers and yeomen that he actually lost his election, while on the other hand, they exclude the report signed by the Speaker of the present intelligent and loyal House of Assembly, is not only a denial to me of justice, but an aggravation of the injustice with which I have been treated, especially as the following extracts from Lord Durham's allegations, contrasted with the following extracts from the said report, will at once show the very remarkable manner in which this excluded document meets and repels the identical allegations, and almost the identical words, produced against me by her Majesty's Government before both Houses of Parliament:—

Extracts from Lord Durham's Report.

"The general support of the British determined the election in favour of the Government; and, though very large and close minorities, which in many places supported the defeated candidates, marked the force which the Reformers could bring into the field, even in spite of the disadvantages under which they laboured from the momentary prejudices against them, and the unusual manner in which the Crown, by its representative, appeared to make itself a party in an electioneering contest, the result was the return of a very large majority hostile in politics to that of the late Assembly.

* * * * *

"I say this without meaning to cast any imputation on the members of the House of Assembly, because, in fact, the circumstances under which they were elected were such as to render them peculiarly objects of suspicion and reproach to a large number of their countrymen.

* * * * *

"In a number of instances, too, the elections were carried by the unscrupulous exercise of the influence of the Government, and by a display of violence on the part of the Tories, who were emboldened by the countenance afforded them by the authorities. It was stated, but I believe without sufficient foundation, that the Government made grants of land to persons who had no title to them, in order to secure their votes.

* * * * *

"This report originated in the fact, that patents for persons who were entitled to grants, but had not taken them out, were sent down to the polling-places to be given to the individuals entitled to them, if they were disposed to vote for the Government candidate.

* * * * *

"It cannot be matter of surprise, that such facts, and such impressions produced in the country an exasperation and a despair of good government which extended far beyond those who had actually been defeated at the poll.

"All which is humbly submitted to your Majesty.

"DURHAM."

(SUPPLEMENTAL CHAPTER.)

EXTRACTS from the Excluded Report to the Honourable the House of Assembly of Upper Canada, of a Select Committee to which was referred the petition of Charles Duncombe, Esquire, to the British House of Commons. Printed by order of the House of Assembly, and adopted by more than two-thirds of the Members present.

"It will be observed, that Mr. Duncombe represents himself in the first paragraph of his petition as having been 'deputed by the Reformers of the province to lay before his Majesty's Government and the House of Commons, the dangerous crisis at which,' as he asserts, 'the affairs of the province had unhappily arrived, through the unconstitutional violence and outrage practised and sanctioned by Sir F. Head, the present Lieutenant-Governor, and those under his immediate influence and control, at the late election, for the purpose of obtaining a majority in the House of Assembly.'"

"This paragraph" (the next item of complaint) "was evidently introduced by Mr. Duncombe in his petition for a double purpose:—

"1. To persuade the House of Commons and His Majesty's Government in England, that a party exists in this country, known as Tories and Orangemen, who are tyrannically opposed to the liberties of the people, and especially that portion of them self-designated Reformers; and, secondly, that the Lieutenant-Governor, the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, and in general every public functionary in the province, corruptly endeavoured to aid and assist the Tories and Orangemen in securing a return of their political partisans to the House of Assembly. It would be difficult for the parties accused to meet charges so vague and uncertain; but the Committee deem it their duty to declare that the political distinctions Mr. Duncombe would set up are as unfounded in fact as they would be injurious to the peace and welfare of the community if they existed. The vast majority of the people of the province are loyal to their Sovereign, and strictly and ardently opposed to those, and those only, of their fellow-subjects, whose political doctrines they conceive tend to a subversion of the constitution under which they live, and ultimate separation from the parent state. It only remains for your honourable House indignantly to repel, as this Committee does not hesitate to do, this gross and unfounded aspersion of the integrity and independence of the electors of Upper Canada.

"The Committee having thus disposed of the minor parts of Mr. Duncombe's petition, will now advert to that portion of it that may justly be considered as of the greatest importance, viz., the accusation against his Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor; and it is with no common degree of satisfaction that the Committee feel themselves justified in declaring that every charge and insinuation made against a man to whom the province of Upper Canada owes so large a debt of gratitude, for firmness of principle and patriotic conduct, is wholly and utterly destitute of truth. Few governors of a colony were ever placed in circumstances of greater difficulty than those which assailed Sir Francis Head within three months of his assuming the government of the province; and it is, perhaps, not too much to say, that no man could have met those difficulties (ungenerously and unreasonably thrown in his way) with more temper, firmness, and judgment than he did.

"It would be out of place, and unnecessary, to advert more particularly to the causes which led to the dissolution of the late House of Assembly. The whole country is familiar with the facts, and has honestly, deliberately, and conclusively pronounced their opinion upon them; but it appears to have been the object of Mr. Duncombe, and others, to impress the House of Commons and his Majesty's Government with the opinion that this decision of the electors of the province was not bona fide, but brought about by means the most corrupt and detestable.

* * * * *

"In order to inform themselves fully upon these subjects, the Committee has obtained returns of every patent issued since Sir F. Head assumed the government of the province; the date of the Order in Council under which they were completed; the person to whom made, where the lands are situated, and (as far as could be ascertained) whether voted upon or not. This return will be found in the Appendix J. (1.), and from it will appear that the total number of patents that passed the great seal between the prorogation of the Assembly on the 20th of April, 1836, and the close of the late general election, was 1478, of which number 1245 were issued in pursuance of Orders in Council, made prior to Sir Francis Head's arrival in the province, and over which he had no more control, and with which he could no more have interfered, than any other officer of the Executive Government. Any attempt to arrest these patents would most justly have subjected him to the severest censure and condemnation, as having disregarded the highest duties of his station, by depriving his Majesty's subjects of their admitted and indisputable legal and constitutional rights. From the same returns, it will appear that the whole number of patents issued under Orders in Council, upon the authority of Sir Francis Head, between the prorogation of the Assembly and close of the election, was 150; and of these several were to females and other persons resident in parts of the province remote from the place where the lands granted them were situate, and who never could have contemplated making use of them for the purpose of voting. To render the groundlessness of the charge against his Excellency, if possible, still more apparent (see also Appendix J.), the committee have ascertained that the whole number of patents issued under Orders in Council, since his arrival in the province to the close of the election, was 233; of which number 30 were for females, seven to purchasers from the Crown who had paid up their purchase-money, 73 settlers under the Hon. Colonel Talbot and the Hon. Peter Robinson, who were entitled to their deeds upon producing certificates of having performed their settlement duties, and 123 U. E. loyalists, militiamen, pensioners, and old soldiers. It will probably be considered as altogether unnecessary to dwell further on this point of accusation; but in justice not only to the Lieutenant-Governor, but to the electors of the province themselves, who are implicated in the charge, that the return of their present representatives was effected by fraud and corruption, the Committee will shortly advert to the state of the polls at the conclusion of the elections for the different counties, ridings, and towns in the province, and contrast the evidence which the poll-books afford with the unfounded assertion that the majorities they present were brought about by the means alleged by Mr. Duncombe.

"It will be thus seen, that in ten counties and in one town, seventeen members of the late Assembly of the Reform party were rejected, and the like number of persons of opposite principles were peaceably and fairly returned, and against whose return no opposition or complaint has ever been made.

"The last House of Assembly was composed of 61 members, of whom 36 styled themselves Reformers. If, then, 17 were taken from their number and added to their opponents, the present Assembly, without reference to Simcoe or the second riding of York, would be composed of 19 Reformers and 42 adherents of the constitution as by law established; the only political distinction the opponents of Reformers desire to assume—a sufficient proof of a deliberate change in the political sentiments of the people.

"But to proceed to Mr. Duncombe's accusation: he asserts that he believes that he would be able to prove that 'thousands of grants of land were (improperly) issued to overwhelm legally registered votes, and voted upon; that such grants were distributed openly at the places of election to persons who had not applied at that time for such patents, and who received them to enable them to vote without paying the usual fees; that at Simcoe, one of the many instances, Mr. Ritchie, the Government emigrant agent, thus issued hundreds of these grants to persons who voted immediately on them.' It is almost needless to dwell on the gross misrepresentations contained in these assertions; as has been shown; the whole number of patents issued amounted to less than 1500, not one of which was issued without paying the usual fees, where any fees were payable, and of which less than 250 were issued under orders of Council during Sir Francis Head's administration, and these to all descriptions of persons, men and women, without distinction, in the usual mode, and upon the ordinary terms. And what are the facts with respect to the assertion that 'Mr. Ritchie issued hundreds of these grants to persons who voted immediately upon them?' They are as follow:—Mr. Jarvis, the deputy secretary and registrar, for the reasons mentioned in his letter hereunto annexed (see Appendix I.), and without consulting any other person, delivered Mr. Ritchie all the patents remaining in the office for lands situate in the County of Simcoe, some of them 10 and 15 years old, and not knowing whether the grantees lived in the county or not; the whole number amounted to 303; of this 170 were returned, the owners not having applied for them, and 133 were distributed or retained in the hands of the agent, and only 18 of the persons who so received these deeds voted at the election, as appears by the polling-book. Mr. Robinson's and Mr. Wickens' majority over Mr. Lount, after less than two days' polling, was 126 and 120 to 34. Your Committee deem further comment on this subject unnecessary.—Your Committee will, however, remark that Mr. Lount [since hanged for treason] was summoned to appear before them, but has wholly neglected to do so.

“Before closing their Report, the Committee feel it their duty to call the attention of your honourable House, and the Country, to the fact, that the petition of Mr. Duncombe was presented to the House of Commons by Mr. Joseph Hume, a member of the Imperial Parliament for the County of Middlesex, and that that gentleman appears to have been chosen as the agent through whom Mr. Duncombe [at this moment an outlawed traitor] and Mr. Robert Baldwin have conducted their communications with the Colonial Office. And it further appears, from letters of Mr. Hume, addressed to some of the Ministers of the Crown, that he is desirous of representing himself as the agent, or at all events as being authorized to express the sentiments, of the people of Upper Canada on the subject of their political feelings, and the public affairs of the province. Your Committee are of opinion, that the honour and character of his Majesty's loyal subjects in this province, require that it should be promptly and emphatically declared by their representatives, that Mr. Hume is among the last men they would select to advocate their cause, or represent their feelings or wishes to the British nation. The people of Upper Canada recollect, that in the year 1834 Mr. Joseph Hume addressed a letter to a correspondent of his in this country [the traitor W. L. McKenzie], which, referring to his correspondent's recent expulsion from and re-election to the Assembly, contained the following treasonable language and advice:—‘Your triumphant election on the 16th, and ejection from the Assembly on the 17th, must hasten that crisis which is fast approaching in the affairs of the Canadas, and which will terminate in independence and freedom from the baneful domination of the mother-country, and the tyrannical conduct of a small and despicable faction in the colony. The proceedings between 1772 and 1782 in America ought not to be forgotten; and, to the honour of the Americans, and for the interests of the civilized world, let their conduct and the result be ever in view.’ And, when it is remembered with what indignation and disgust the publication of this detestable communication was received throughout the province, his Majesty's loyal subjects cannot but regard with abhorrence the idea that the person who had thus insulted them should be supposed by their Sovereign and their fellow-subjects in the United Kingdom to be their accredited agent, that they held any communication with him, or that he was in any way clothed with authority to speak their sentiments or represent their views on any subject, public or private.

“With reference to the correspondence of Mr. R. Baldwin with Lord Glenelg, and which has also been referred to your Committee, and which is annexed to this report, little need be said further than to notice the representations it in substance contains—that the affairs of this province have reached an alarming crisis; that the connexion with the parent state is endangered; that the people have lost all confidence in their Government; that they have become dissatisfied and discontented; that, owing to the tyrannical and unjust conduct of his Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor, they are almost driven to desperation; and that nothing can save the country from revolution but administering the government agreeably to his interpretation of the constitution conferred upon us by the Imperial Parliament. In answer to all this, your Committee can only refer to facts that speak louder and carry greater conviction than assertions, however boldly or confidently made.”

Without offering a single comment on the foregoing “Report,” I leave her Majesty's Government to explain to Parliament why they did not deem it as worthy of insertion as the irrelevant republican document of 66 folio pages which they have reprinted and brought against me.

4. I complain that in this volume her Majesty's Ministers have most unnecessarily published, first, their own answers to, and, secondly, my despatches entreating them to relieve me from the pecuniary embarrassment in which they kept me during the whole time I was in Canada; while, on the other side of the question, they have most unjustly withheld from Parliament the following despatches:—

1. Two despatches to her Majesty's Secretary of State, dated the 15th of May, 1838, in which I state—

(SUPPLEMENTAL CHAPTER.)

"As regards the amount of the sum awarded to me by the Government, I have no observation to offer, all discussion on that subject having on my part ended with my administration of the government of Upper Canada. While I was in that difficult situation, I did not hesitate to express my opinion respecting the repayment to me of the expenses which I conceived to be due to me. In this country, however, I have no such arguments to offer, no claims to urge, and no desire to raise against the pecuniary award of her Majesty's Government, whatever it may be, a single observation."

"To indemnify me for the expenses of my return, which (including those for my family) bona fide amounted to £530 8s., her Majesty's Government have awarded me the sum of £300, upon which, as I have already had the honour to state to your Lordship, I have not an observation to offer."

"2. A despatch to her Majesty's Under-Secretary of State, dated the 10th of August, 1838, in which, in reply to a communication from Lord Glenelg, dated the 9th of May, 1838, and from the Under-Secretary, dated the 8th of August, by which I was requested to forward an official representation of the extra expenses to which I had been exposed by the insurrection in Upper Canada, I replied as follows:—

"I have not with me any copy of my letter to Lord Glenelg of the 15th of May, to which you have referred, but I feel certain I only mentioned the two facts—first, that, on the insurrection breaking out in Upper Canada, I found it necessary to add to my staff three extra aides-de-camp and a military secretary; and, secondly, that, while no increase of salary had been granted to me, a fair allowance had been ordered by her Majesty's Government to every British officer on duty in Upper as well as Lower Canada. I say, I only mentioned these two facts to satisfy Lord Glenelg of the justice of remunerating me for the bona fide travelling expenses which I had been obliged to incur in coming from Toronto to England.

"These expenses are all I have applied for; and, as by your letter of the 8th instant, it appears they have been granted to me, I beg to say I do not feel disposed to make any further pecuniary application to her Majesty's Government.

"I have the honour to be, &c.

"F. B. HEAD."

3. A despatch to the Secretary of State, dated the 8th of March, 1839, in which I stated—

"I feel it necessary, on public as well as on private grounds, unequivocally to decline receiving the remuneration of my official expenses in the manner in which it has been proposed they should be experimentally asked for from the House of Assembly, who would, I consider, feel they were invited to refuse them by the despatch alluded to. Without entering at present into the subject, I only beg leave respectfully to state that I had infinitely sooner lose the indemnification in question than submit to a process to which neither Lord Gosford, Lord Durham, Sir John Colborne, nor any other governor of a colony, after he had quitted it, had ever been subjected.

"I have the honour, &c.

"F. B. HEAD."

4. A despatch to the Under-Secretary of State, dated March 10, 1839, in which I stated—

"I perfectly understand that his Lordship can enter into no pledge respecting the production either to Parliament or to the Provincial Legislature of my correspondence with the Colonial office respecting the non-payment of my official expenses. On the other hand, I feel confident that his Lordship has not misinterpreted my reluctance to enter upon the discussion of a subject involving only my own private interests, by conceiving that I entertain the slightest doubt or apprehension on the subject.

"To the last moment no exertion shall be wanting on my part to prevent this discussion from coming before the public: should I however be unsuccessful, his Lordship will, I believe, see reason to appreciate the feelings by which I have been actuated.

"I have the honour, &c.

(SUPPLEMENTAL CHAPTER.)

Considering the generosity, even towards an enemy, which has ever characterized the British people, and which surely ought therefore equally to characterize the British Government one would have thought that her Majesty's Ministers, seeing how I naturally shrank from the idea of having my pecuniary affairs unnecessarily brought before the public, would have liberally refrained from doing so, most especially as there existed no dispute whatever between us on the subject, I having declared in my Narrative (vide p. 418) "that I felt bound in justice to the Government to mention an otherwise insignificant matter—namely, that her Majesty's Government had with strict justice recently paid me the whole of my expenses." But, though the right of her Majesty's Government unnecessarily and ungenerously to moot this subject cannot be denied, yet, in bringing the question before the public, in compliance with the Duke of Wellington's motion, they were perfectly unjustified in withholding from Parliament all that side of the correspondence which they well knew tended unanswerably to satisfy every liberal mind that I had sued for nothing beyond the bare repayment of the expenses to which I had been subjected.

Having, I trust it will be admitted, done everything in my power to prevent this unimportant subject from distracting the public mind from the serious considerations which must arise from the perusal of my Narrative, I feel it necessary, now that it has forcibly been brought into notice, shortly, but most unequivocally, to declare that I have no claim whatever to make either upon the country or upon its Government.

While I was Lieutenant Governor of Upper Canada, I made (under most adverse circumstances) every exertion in my power to keep up the British flag; and I resisted, as well as I was able, all attempts, from whatever direction they proceeded, to haul it down.

Some people may be satisfied with my conduct—others may be dissatisfied; at all events, if I have done wrong, I have, I submit, paid the penalty of my offence. While every possible pecuniary assistance was granted to Lord Gosford, as well as to Lord Durham, and while £4,500 a-year is now, very properly, granted to Sir John Colborne, besides his salary and emoluments of Commander of the Forces, I was left, during the political tempest to which I was exposed, to borrow money in all directions for the bare payment of my official expenses. Until I returned to England not even my travelling expenses to Toronto, incurred in 1835, were refunded to me. For my services in Upper Canada, such as they may have been, I have, including my salary, received from her Majesty's Government not one shilling beyond the repayment of the expenses to which I was subjected; while on the other hand, in consequence of my having on their repeated application, consented to serve them, I have lost since 1835 a permanent appointment of considerable importance. All I have required, and still require, of her Majesty's Government, is to let me alone in my retirement.

I completely exonerate Lord Normandy and Mr. Labouchere, for both of whom I entertain respect, from any unworthy conduct towards me. They, since their appointments, can have had no time to consider my case; but the insane manner in which her Majesty's Government have not only encouraged rebellion in our colonies, but have twice assisted in assailing me, can only, to my humble judgment, be accounted for by the proverb,

"Quos Deus vult perdere prius dementat."

CONCLUSION.

ACCOUNTS have lately reached this country from the Canadas, mentioning the arrival there of Lord Durham's Report, as also of my Narrative. Her Majesty's Ministers will now be enabled to declare to Parliament whether or not they have received from Sir John Colborne, from Sir George Arthur, from the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, from the Law Officers of the Crown, from the Executive Council, from the Legislative Council, from the House of Assembly, from the British population, or from the British army in the Canadas, anything in the slightest degree approaching to a denial of the affirmation to which I adhere,—that the whole of these parties join hand and heart in deeply lamenting the republican course of policy which her Majesty's Ministers have unremittingly been pursuing in our colonies. Whatever may be the opinion on this subject at home, unconnected with any political party, I do most solemnly declare to the country that, in the various regions it has been my humble fortune to visit, I have never before witnessed so astonishing, so unnatural, and yet so affecting a scene, as that which, for upwards of two years, daily presented itself to me in British North America.

(SUPPLEMENTAL CHAPTER.)

The inhabitants of these valuable colonies, with a manliness of character which it is almost impossible to describe, look upon the British Empire as the freest and noblest portion of the globe; they admire the liberty with which people in England write their minds, speak their minds, spend their fortune, bequeath their earnings—and, observing the jealousy with which life and property are secured—they attribute all these blessings to the power, and stability, and real majesty of British institutions.

With those feelings in their hearts, the inhabitants of our North American colonies have for several years observed the ministers of their sovereign, under the pretence of conciliating democracy, firmly ally themselves with people destitute of character, whose evident object has been the destruction of those principles upon which the British empire has been based. They have seen these demagogues, who had no real stake in their country, one after another, encouraged or promoted by her Majesty's Government, and while this party, whose evident intention was to rob and murder them, was busily occupied in broad day-light in making pikes, purchasing rifles, assembling for drill, forming themselves into unions, and thus creating general apprehension throughout our colonies, they have seen the Ministers of the Crown, in spite of warning or remonstrance, resolutely insist on elevating over the heads of the loyal population the ringleaders of the conspiracy—they have seen the arch-agitator of each of the Canadas offered to be rewarded—the insulters of her Majesty's representative officially shielded from punishment; in short, they have seen the Ministers of the British Crown actually fan into a flame the embers of rebellion, which the representative of the Sovereign, but for the encouragement shown to agitators, would easily have extinguished.

After rebellion had actually burst out, and after British institutions had been desperately attacked, they have seen the Ministers of their sovereign deaf to recommendations in favour of colonists who had risked their lives, and shed their blood, in defence of the empire; while, on the other hand, they have seen the Government, by ingenious sophistry, screen from the vengeance of the law the pirates and traitors who had been brought to justice. They have seen the British flag most grossly insulted—they have seen the British territory repeatedly invaded—The Queen's subjects robbed, murdered, mutilated, without adequate reparation being obtained, or even demanded, from the American Government; and lastly, they have seen a Governor General of the British North American colonies not only impugn to her Majesty the conduct of his predecessor, of the Legislative and Executive Councils, of the House of Assembly, and of the public authorities, but before the whole world they have seen him appeal from the Castle of Quebec, to the people of British North America against her Majesty's delegated authority, against the conduct of the Queen's Ministers, against the measures of the Imperial Parliament; and, after all this, and after having without permission abandoned his post, they have seen this servant of the public assume his seat in the House of Lords, which he had reviled, and sit there night after night for two months, without a single Minister of the Crown venturing to stand up to arraign his Lordship before the country, or to offer one word in defence of the Queen's Ministers—Imperial Parliament—Provincial Legislatures—Governors—Lieutenant Governors, and other constituted authorities—whom his Lordship had either openly assailed, or contemptuously reviled!

With these alarming facts before their minds, the loyal British population of our most valuable North American Provinces, having lost all confidence in the Ministers who surround their Sovereign, believe, (and I humbly join them in believing) that, unless the British nation will awaken from its slumber, unless the British people will arouse themselves from their death-like trance to rally round the constitution and the throne, our noble colonies will very shortly be subjected to a scene of plunder, devastation and bloodshed, which, as soon as it has paralysed the extremities, must almost simultaneously affect the heart of the empire.

Surely, when the nation reflects with what noble and powerful enemies it has hitherto successfully contended, it will feel ashamed of any longer allowing its colonies to be convulsed by one or two professional agitators who, every one knows, would instantly run away before the Queen's Government if it would only be firm, but who, for the very reason of their being notorious cowards, will, if successful, exercise a cruelty and a tyranny over every man of property, which I trust it will be the duty of their fellow subjects in the mother-country by a manly effort to determine to prevent.

MEMORANDUM ON THE ABORIGINES OF NORTH AMERICA.

TORONTO, UPPER CANADA.
20th November, 1836.

MY LORD,

As the object of this communication is to endeavour to supply your Lordship with the information respecting the Indians and the Indian department, required by your Lordship's despatch No.—, I feel it may be satisfactory that I should commence by explaining what opportunities I have had of forming the opinion I am about to offer on the subject.

I have, therefore, the honour to state to your Lordship, that I attended the annual delivery of presents to the visiting Indians at Amherstburg, as also that which took place, for the first time, at the Great Manitoulin Island in Lake Huron.

During my inspectional tour of the province, I also visited, with one or two trifling exceptions, the whole of the Indian settlements in Upper Canada, and in doing so made it my duty to enter every shanty or cottage, being desirous to judge with my own eyes of the actual situation of that portion of the Indian population which is undergoing the operation of being civilized.

I have had a slight opportunity of making myself acquainted with the Indian character in South America, and from the above data, I have now the honour to transmit to your Lordship the following observations on the subject:—

MEMORANDUM.

The fate of the red inhabitants of America, the real proprietors of its soil, is, without any exception, the most sinful story recorded in the history of the human race; and when one reflects upon the anguish they have suffered from our hands, and the cruelties and injustice they have endured, the mind, accustomed to its own vices, is lost in utter astonishment at finding that in the red man's heart there exists no sentiment of animosity against us, no feeling of revenge; on the contrary, that our appearance at the humble portal of his wigwam is to this hour a subject of unusual joy. If the white man be lost in the forest, his cry of distress will call the most eager hunter from his game; and among the tribe there is not only pleasure but pride in contending with each other who shall be the first to render him assistance and food.

So long as we were obtaining possession of their country by open violence, the fatal result of the unequal contest was but too clearly understood; but now that we have succeeded in exterminating their race from vast regions of land, where nothing in the present day remains of the poor Indian but the unnoticed bones of his ancestors, it seems inexplicable how it should happen that, even where their race barely lingers in existence, it should still continue to wither, droop, and vanish before us like grass on the progress of the forest in flames.—“The red men,” lately exclaimed a celebrated Maimi Cacique, “are melting like snow before the sun.”

Whenever and wherever the two races come into contact with each other, it is sure to prove fatal to the red man. However bravely, for a short time, he may resist our bayonets and our fire-arms, sooner or later he is called upon by death to submit to his decree. If we stretch forth the hand of friendship, the liquid fire it offers him to drink proves still more destructive than our wrath. And, lastly, if we attempt to Christianize the Indians, and for that sacred object congregate them in villages of substantial log-houses, lovely and beautiful as such a theory appears, it is an undeniable fact, to which unhesitatingly I add my humble testimony, that, as soon as the hunting season commences, the men (from warm clothes and warm housing having lost their hardihood) perish or rather rot in numbers by consumption; while, as regards their women, it is impossible for any accurate observer to refrain from remarking that civilization, in spite of the pure, honest, and unremitting zeal of our missionaries, by some accursed process, has blanched their babies' faces,—in short, our philanthropy, like our friendship, has failed in its professions. Producing deaths by consumption, it has more than decimated its followers; and under the pretence of eradicating from the female heart the errors of a Pagan's creed, it has implanted in their stead the germs of Christian guilt!

APPENDIX A.

What is the reason of all this? Why the simple virtues of the red aborigines of America should, under all circumstances, fade before the vices and cruelty of the old world, is a problem which no one among us is competent to solve; the dispensation is as mysterious as its object is inscrutable. I have merely mentioned the facts, because I feel that before the subject of the Indians in Upper Canada can be fairly considered, it is necessary to refute the idea, which so generally exists in England, about the success which has attended the Christianizing and civilizing of the Indians; whereas, I firmly believe, every person of sound mind in this country, who is disinterested in their conversion, and who is acquainted with the Indian character, will agree:—

- 1st. That an attempt to make farmers of the red man has been, generally speaking, a complete failure.
- 2nd. That congregating them for the purpose of civilization has implanted many more vices than it has eradicated; and consequently,
- 3rd. That the greatest kindness we can perform towards these intelligent, simple-minded people, is to remove and fortify them as much as possible from all communication with the whites.

Having concluded the few preparatory observations I was desirous to make, I will now proceed to state what negotiations I have already entered into with the Indians, and what is my humble opinion of the course we should adopt as regards their presents, and the expenses of the Indian Department.

At the Great Manitoulin Island, in Lake Huron, where I found about 1,500 Indians of various tribes, assembled for their presents, the Chippewas and Ottawas, at a great Council held expressly for the purpose, formally made over to me 23,000 islands. The Saugeen Indians also voluntarily surrendered to me a million and a half acres of the very richest land in Upper Canada. (For the details attending these surrenders, see my despatch to your Lordship, No. 70.)

On proceeding to Amherstburgh, I assembled the Hurons, who occupy in that neighbourhood a hunting ground of rich land of six miles square; two-thirds of which they surrendered to me, on condition that one of the two-thirds should be sold, and the proceeds thereof invested for their benefit.

The Moravian Indians, with whom I had also an interview, have likewise agreed, for an annuity of £150, to surrender to me about six miles square of black rich land, situated on the banks of the Thames river.

I need hardly observe, that I have thus obtained for Her Majesty's Government from the Indians an immense portion of most valuable land, which will undoubtedly produce, at no remote period, more than sufficient to defray the whole of the expenses of the Indians and Indian department in this province.

On the other hand, as regards their interests, my despatch, No. 70, will explain the arguments I used in advising them to retire, or fall back upon the Manitoulin, and other islands in Lake Huron; the locality being admirably adapted for supporting them, but not for white men. Still it may appear that the arrangement was not advantageous to the Indians, because it was of such benefit to us; but it must always be kept in mind, that however useful rich land may be to us, yet its only value to an Indian consists in the game it contains; he is, in fact, lord of the manor, but it is against his nature to cultivate the soil—he has neither right nor power to sell it. As soon, therefore, as his game is frightened away, or its influx of immigration cut off by the surrounding settlement of the whites, his land, however rich it may be, becomes a "rudis indigestaque moles," of little value or importance; and in this state much of the Indian property in Upper Canada at present exists.

For instance, I found 16 or 18 families of Moravian Indians living on a vast tract of rich land, yet, from absence of game, almost destitute of everything; several of the men drunk; nearly all their children half-castes; the high road through their territory almost impassable; the white population execrating their indolence, and entreating to be relieved from the stagnation of a block of rich land, which separated them from their markets as completely as if it had been a desert.

The above picture (which is a very common one) will, I think, sufficiently show, that however desirous one may be to protect the Indians, and I hope no one feels for them more deeply than myself, yet, practically speaking, that the greatest kindness we can do them is to induce them, as I have done, to retreat before what they may justly term the accursed progress of civilization; for, as I have stated, the instant they are surrounded by the white population, "the age of their chivalry has fled."

The lieutenant-governor of the province may protect them from open violence, but neither he, nor any other authority on earth, can prevent the combination of petty vices, which, as I have already explained, are as fatal in their operation as the bayonet itself.

It is impossible to teach the Indian to beware of the white man, for it seems to be the instinct of his untutored nature to look upon him as his friend; in short, his simplicity is his ruin, and though he can entrap and conquer every wild beast in his forest, yet invariably he becomes himself the prey of his white brother!

For the foregoing reasons, I am decidedly of opinion that Her Majesty's Government should continue to advise the few remaining Indians who are lingering in Upper Canada to retire upon the Manitoulin and other islands in Lake Huron, or elsewhere, toward the north-west.*

Your Lordship has informed me, that the Committee of the House of Commons on Military Expenditure in the Colonies are of opinion, "that the Indian department may be greatly reduced, if not altogether abolished; and they, therefore, call the attention of the House to the same, and also to the expense of articles annually distributed to the Indians, and whether any arrangement may not be made to dispense with such distributions in future, or to commute the presents for money."

As it is your Lordship's desire that I should afford you as much information as possible on the above suggestions, I will now respectfully endeavour to do so.

The presents which the British Government has been in the habit of granting to the Indians in Upper Canada have been delivered to two classes, termed the "resident" and the "visiting," whose numbers this year were as follow:—

Number of Indians resident in Upper Canada, .....	6,507
Average number of Indians who, in order to receive presents from the British Government, annually visit Upper Canada from the United States .....	3,270
Total average annual cost of presents issued as above .....	£8,500

It certainly appears to me very desirable indeed that we should, if possible, discontinue the practice of giving presents to that portion of the visiting Indians who reside in the territory of the neighbouring states; but what is desirable is not always just, and it is therefore necessary before the project be carried into effect, that we should consider what arguments exist for as well as against it.

In its favour it may be stated,

1st. That we should save an annual expenditure of say £4,000.

2d. That, according to common laws among nations, there appears to be no reason why, having lost all dominion over and interest in the United States, we should continue to make annual payments to any portion of its inhabitants.

3d. That it amounts almost to an act of hostility for the British Government to continue to give guns, powder, and ball, to the Indians of the United States, with whom that people are at this moment engaged in civil war.

4th. That a considerable portion of the presents which we give to the Indians, are shortly after their delivery to be seen displayed by the shopkeepers of the United States, who often obtain them almost for nothing.

In reply to the first objection, namely, "that by withholding the presents we should save an annual expenditure of £4,000, it may be stated, that of all the money which has been ever expended by the British Government, there is perhaps no sum which ought to be less regretted than that which we have hitherto bestowed on the aborigines of America. It has purchased for us the blessing of their race; they love us, they have shed their blood for us; they would do so again; they look upon us as the only just and merciful inhabitants of the old world, and impressed with these feelings, their attachment to our Sovereign amounts almost to veneration. "When we see the sun rise in the east," said a warrior to me at the Great Council at the Manitoulin Island, "it is our custom to say to our young men, there is our Great Father, he warms us, he clothes us, he gives us all we desire."

* This measure was strongly recommended by Sir John Colborne to Her Majesty's Government.

APPENDIX A.

There can be no doubt that up to the present page in the history of the British empire we have acted well towards the Indians. What that reflection may intrinsically be worth it is not so easy to determine, as every man will perhaps estimate it differently; however, its moral value, whatever it may be, should be deducted from the expense of which we complain, for we cannot enjoy both advantages; if we save the latter, we must lose the former.

In reply to the second objection, namely, "that according to common laws among nations, there appears to be no reason why, having lost all dominion over and interest in the United States, we should continue to make annual payments to any portion of its inhabitants;" it must be recollected that, in our wars with the Americans, we gladly availed ourselves of the services of the Indians, whom invariably we promised we would never desert. In these promises we made no restriction whatever as to domicile; when the tribes joined us, we never waited to ask whence they came; at the close of the war, when their surviving warriors left us, we never prescribed to them where they should go.

It will be asked, in what way were these our promises made? It is difficult to reply to this question, as it involves the character of the Indian race.

An Indian's word, when it is formally pledged, is one of the strongest moral securities on earth; like the rainbow, it beams unbroken, when all on earth is threatened with annihilation.

The most solemn form in which an Indian pledges his word, is by the delivery of a wampum belt of shells, and when the purport of this symbol is once declared, it is remembered and handed down from father to son, with an accuracy and retention of meaning, which is quite extraordinary.

Whenever the belt is produced, every minute circumstance which attended its delivery, seems instantly to be brought to life, and such is the singular effect produced on the Indian's mind by this talisman, that it is common for him, whom we term "the savage," to shed tears at the sight of a wampum which has accompanied a message from his friend.

I have mentioned these facts, because they will explain the confident reliance the Indians place on the promises which, accompanied by the delivery of wampums, were made to them by our generals during and at the conclusion of the American wars.

These rude ceremonies had probably little effect upon our officers, but they sunk deep in the minds of the Indians; the wampums thus given have been preserved, and are now entrusted to the keeping of the great orator, Sigonah, who was present at the council I attended on the Manitoulin Island, in Lake Huron, and, in every sense, these hieroglyphics are moral affidavits of the bygone transactions to which they relate. On our part, little or nothing documentary exists; the promises which were made, whatever they might have been, were almost invariably verbal—those who expressed them are now mouldering in their graves. However, the regular delivery of the presents proves and corroborates the testimony of the wampums, and, by whatever sophistry we might deceive ourselves, we could never succeed in explaining to the Indians of the United States that their Great Father was justified in deserting them.

To the third and fourth objections I have nothing to reply; for I must say I think the Americans have reason for the jealousy they express at the British Government interfering, by positively arming their own Indians, with whom they are at war, with English guns, powder, and ball; I also cannot deny that a great proportion of the presents we give to the American Indians form a tribute which we annually pay to the shopkeepers of the United States.

Having endeavoured, as fairly as possible, to explain the arguments on both sides, I now beg leave to state that, after having given the subject considerable reflection, I am of opinion, that to the visiting Indians of the United States we cannot, without a breach of faith, directly refuse to continue the presents, which by the word of our generals we have promised, and which by long custom we have sanctioned; but observing that the minds of these people were wide open to reasonable conviction, it occurred to me that it would not be difficult to explain to them that their Great Father was still willing to continue presents to such of his red children as lived in his own land, but that in justice to the Americans, who are now our allies, he could not arm against them those Indians who could continue to reside in the territory of the United States; and consequently that, after the expiration of three years, presents would be given only to those of our red children who actually shall inhabit the Canadas.

I did not formally make this declaration at the Great Council at the Manitoulin Island, but it was sufficiently hinted to them to be clearly understood, and as far as I could learn, and have since learned, it was received without disapprobation.

APPENDIX A.

I would therefore recommend that this declaration should be formally announced at the next delivery of presents. The Indians in the United States would thus have plenty of time to prepare for the change, which I feel quite confident would end by our being released honourably and altogether from an engagement which I certainly think we have maintained long enough, to reward liberally the United States Indians for the services they rendered us during the war; indeed there can be no doubt that we have treated their warriors infinitely better than we have behaved to our own veterans, who, blind, wounded, mutilated, helpless, and miserable, are at this moment wandering in the great bush or wilderness of Canada, regretting the hour that they ever improvidently commuted with the British Government their hard-earned pensions.

I do not think the Indians of the United States could or would complain of the above arrangement, and I feel certain that though a few would at first immigrate to Canada, they would not long remain there.

For many reasons, which it would be tedious to your Lordship that I should detail, I would recommend that the presents to the visiting Indians should for the three years be delivered at the Manitoulin Island only.

The expense of forwarding the presents to that spot, though less than to the old place of delivery, (Drummond Island,) is greater than at Penetanguishine and Amherstburg; but as only those who are really in want of their presents would come to Manitoulin, we should gain, as indeed we did gain this year, by that arrangement, infinitely more than the difference of expense of transport.

In a memorandum I received on the 16th July last, from Mr. Commissary General Routh, many of whose suggestions I have effected, that gentleman, not anticipating the recommendation I have now made for the ultimate discountenance of presents to the American Indians, proposed to diminish their expense by substituting strouds instead of cloth, and by withholding powder, ball, and shot.

Every person with whom I have consulted is of opinion that the latter privation would be most severely felt by the Indian hunter who lives by his gun; however, I feel confident that Mr. Routh himself will agree with me in opinion, that if the presents to all Indians residing in the United States are, as I propose to be, totally discontinued at so early a period as the expiration of three years, it would be unnecessary, unadvisable, and ungenerous, to make any deduction from the pittance or gratuity which is so shortly to be withheld.

Your Lordship is aware that considerable expenses for building, &c., were incurred at the Manitoulin Island this year; but the arrangement was made by Sir John Colborne before I arrived here, and it was too late for me to alter it; however, as soon as I got there, I put a stop to all that was doing, and discharged every person who had been engaged.

Having disposed of at least one-third part of the Indian presents, and the expense of their delivery, I certainly respectfully recommend that we should continue to deliver them to those few Indians who continue to inhabit Upper Canada.

I have already stated that this expense will shortly be defrayed altogether by the sale of the lands they have this year liberally surrendered to me; and even if that were not to be the case, I do think that, enjoying as we do, possession of this noble province, it is our bounden duty to consider as heir-looms the wreck of that simple-minded, ill-fated race, which, as I have already stated, is daily and yearly fading before the progress of civilization.

We have only to bear patiently with them for a short time, and with a few exceptions, principally half castes, their unhappy race, beyond our power of redemption, will be extinct.

I am not prepared to recommend that money should at present be substituted for presents to the resident Indians in this province.

1st. Because I think, unless good arrangements were previously made, the Indians, from their improvident habits, would in many places be left destitute; and, 2ndly. Without due precaution, a money delivery to so many men, women and children, might possibly be attended by very great impositions.

Another year's experience and reflection will, I make no doubt, enable me to offer to your Lordship a decided opinion on this subject, as I am quite alive to the advantage which we should gain by the substitution of money, if it could be properly effected.

In the expenses of the Indian department, which at present amount to £1,610 17s. 10d. per annum, I am of opinion that a reduction might at once be made to the following extent, (subject to moderate pensions, the greater part of which might be in grants out of land which has lately been ceded to me by the Indians):—

Three superintendents at £206 14s. 4d.—£640 3s.

One interpreter at £62.—£62.

APPENDIX A.

I also think that a considerable reduction might be made in the contingencies, which at present amount to £2,000.

With respect to the pensions, which amount to £462, I conceive that as they have already been sanctioned, they could not in justice be repealed.

In conclusion, I now beg leave to refer to my despatch, No. 31, respecting the age and services of Colonel Givens. I conscientiously concur with Sir John Colborne and Sir P. Maitland, in recommending that, in the evening of his long and well-spent life, this officer may not be neglected by Her Majesty's Government, to whose service he has been more than half a century unremittingly and devotedly attached.

His name is so identified with the Indian history of this country, that I earnestly hope he may be allowed to retire on his full pay; he has a large family, and his advanced age must prevent his long receiving the remuneration so strongly recommended by Sir J. Colborne, by Sir P. Maitland, and by myself.

To replace Colonel Givens, who would continue to assist as an interpreter, I have already recommended, in my despatch No. 31, the appointment of Mr. Hepburn, who last year has, without salary, been performing the duties of Chief Superintendent.

I am decidedly of opinion that at the expiration of three years a still further reduction may be made in the Indian department, and that its expenses of every description will ere long be completely defrayed by the lands which I have lately obtained from the Indians.

I have the honour to be, &c.

F. B. HEAD.

THE Lieutenant-Governor informs the Legislative Council, that in consequence of this province being invaded and assailed by a foreign enemy, and being the scene of actual military operations, Colonel Foster, the Officer in command of Her Majesty's land forces, has assumed the entire military authority and command over the troops; that he is also in command of the militia; and that the Commissary-General at Quebec has communicated to the Officer in charge of the Commissariat here, that consistently with the rules of the service, no expenses can be allowed unless sanctioned by the authority of the military Commander, upon whom the protection of the province has thus necessarily devolved.

The Lieutenant-Governor takes this opportunity to communicate to the Legislative Council, that having had the misfortune to differ from Her Majesty's Government on one or two points of colonial policy, he felt it his duty, on the 10th of September last, respectfully to tender to Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies, the resignation of the important station, which, for a short time, he has had the honour to hold in this Province.

His resignation having been graciously accepted, the Lieutenant-Governor has to inform the Legislative Council, that he yesterday received official information that Her Majesty has been pleased to appoint Colonel Sir George Arthur to be Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, and that his Excellency may be expected to arrive here in a few days.

Under the peculiar circumstances in which the province is at present placed, the Lieutenant-Governor feels confident, that the Legislative Council will rejoice with him at the approaching arrival of an Officer of high character and considerable experience, whose rank in the army will enable him to combine the military command with the civil government of this province.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
15th January, 1838.

To His Excellency SIR FRANCIS BOND HEAD, Baronet, Knight Commander of the Royal Hanoverian Guelphic Order, Knight of the Prussian Military Order of Merit, Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Upper Canada, &c. &c. &c.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,

WE, Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Council of Upper Canada, in Provincial Parliament assembled, beg to return our respectful thanks to your Excellency, for communicating to us the fact, which is at this crisis particularly important, that by the regulations of Her Majesty's service the command of the troops, and of the militia employed in defence of this province, cannot be united in your Excellency's person with the administration of the civil government.

If your Excellency were to continue to represent Her Majesty in this colony, we are persuaded, that under present circumstances, such a separation of the civil power from the military command would be likely to lead to very unfortunate results, since military rank and experience, although they are by no means incompatible with the peculiar qualifications which are requisite to give confidence, animation and effect, to the military force, are not always to be found united with them.

We beg to assure your Excellency that we learn with extreme regret, that the civil government of this province is to continue for so short a time in your Excellency's charge. It is not known to us upon what particular points your Excellency's views have differed so essentially from those of Her Majesty's Government, that your Excellency was induced to tender your resignation; but we know, that at no period in the history of Upper Canada has its political condition been such as ought to be more satisfactory to the ministers of the Crown: and we feel that not Upper Canada only, but the empire, owes to your Excellency a large debt of gratitude, for your firm and manly avowal, upon all occasions, of those sentiments which became the representative of a British monarch, and for the unwavering support which your Excellency has never failed to give to the established principles of the constitution.

APPENDIX B.

It is this fearless adherence to right principles, rather than to expediency, which has enabled your Excellency to rally round the government, in a moment of danger, the arms of an united people: and to exhibit this province to our Sovereign and to the world, in a posture which must command for its brave and loyal inhabitants the highest admiration and respect.

If the result of your Excellency's firm and uncompromising policy shall impress upon Her Majesty's Government the conviction, that they need not fear to support in Upper Canada the principles of the British constitution, it will have produced an effect of infinite value to this colony; and will have supplied what we believe has been chiefly wanting to insure its permanent tranquillity.

But the Legislative Council cannot refrain from expressing the regret with which they have observed, in the case of your Excellency, and of your respected and gallant predecessor, that your connexion with the government of this colony has seemed incapable of being protracted, with satisfaction to yourselves, beyond the period when it became evident that no submission would be made by you to a spirit of factious discontent, which nothing can appease but the destruction of British rule.

We beg your Excellency to believe, that the Legislative Council will ever entertain a grateful recollection of the justice and condescension which they have always had occasion to acknowledge in their intercourse with your Excellency; and that they participate deeply in the feeling of general regret at your Excellency's approaching departure from this province.

JOHN B. ROBINSON,
SPEAKER.

F. B. HEAD.

The Lieutenant-Governor informs the House of Assembly, that in consequence of this province being invaded and assailed by a foreign enemy, and being the scene of actual military operations, Colonel Foster, the officer in command of Her Majesty's land forces, has assumed the entire military authority and command over the troops; that he is also in command of the militia; and that the Commissary-General at Quebec has communicated to the officer in charge of the commissariat here, that consistently with the rules of the service, no expenses can be allowed, unless sanctioned by the authority of the military commander, upon whom the protection of the province has thus necessarily devolved.

The Lieutenant-Governor takes this opportunity to communicate to the House of Assembly, that having had the misfortune to differ from Her Majesty's Government, on one or two points of colonial policy, he felt it his duty, on the 10th of September last, respectfully to tender to Her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Colonies the resignation of the important station which, for a short time, he has had the honour to hold in this province.

His resignation having been graciously accepted, the Lieutenant-Governor has to inform the House of Assembly, that he yesterday received official information that Her Majesty has been pleased to appoint Colonel Sir George Arthur to be Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, and that his Excellency may be expected to arrive here in a few days.

Under the peculiar circumstances in which the province is at present placed, the Lieutenant-Governor feels confident, that the House of Assembly will rejoice with him at the approaching arrival of an officer of high character and considerable experience, whose rank in the army will enable him to combine the military command with the civil government of this province.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
15th Jan. 1838.

To His Excellency SIR F. B. HEAD, Baronet, &c. &c. &c.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

WE, Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons House of Assembly, in Provincial Parliament assembled, humbly thank your Excellency for your Excellency's message of the 15th instant, communicating to this House, that "in consequence of this province being invaded and assailed by a foreign enemy, and being the scene of actual military operations, Colonel Foster, the officer in command of Her Majesty's land forces, has assumed the entire military authority and command over the troops; that he is also in command of the militia; and that the Commissary-General at Quebec has communicated to the officer in charge of the commissariat here, that consistently with the rules of the service, no expenses can be allowed unless sanctioned by the authority of the military commander, upon whom the protection of the province has thus necessarily devolved.

APPENDIX B.

In reference to this subject, we can only express our earnest hope that this regulation, which the rules of the service appear to have rendered necessary, may in no respect impair the efficiency of the operations hitherto planned and directed by your Excellency, with so much success for the preservation and defence of the province against the attack of foreign and domestic enemies.

We are further informed by your Excellency, that having had the misfortune to differ from Her Majesty's Government, on one or two points of colonial policy, your Excellency felt it your duty, on the 10th of September last, respectfully to tender to Her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Colonies the resignation of the important station which, for a short time, your Excellency has had the honour to hold in this province, and that your Excellency's resignation had been graciously accepted.—When this House recalls to recollection the events of your Excellency's administration of the affairs of this province—the universal respect and confidence with which you are regarded, arising from your Excellency's firm and uncompromising adherence to the principles of the constitution, and which has afforded to the inhabitants of this colony various opportunities of proving, not by words merely, but by acts the most convincing and undeniable, their firm unshaken loyalty to their Sovereign, and their desire to maintain their connexion with the parent state, in contradiction to assertions and insinuations of a contrary tendency, we cannot but view with alarm the disclosure now made, that your Excellency has felt yourself called upon to resign the administration of the government on the grounds stated in your Excellency's message.

If your Excellency's measures and policy have not given satisfaction to our gracious Queen, we are driven to inquire, in the most humble and respectful, but solemn manner, what course of policy it is that is expected by Her Majesty from Her Majesty's representative in this province? Deeply impressed with the duty of submission to the constitutional exercise of the royal prerogative, we do not question the right of the Sovereign to select Her representatives in this or any other colony of the empire; but we nevertheless feel ourselves impelled by a sense of duty, suggested by a desire to maintain our allegiance, (and which, on our part, can never be laid aside or forgotten), humbly, but earnestly and emphatically to declare, that if anything be calculated to shake the attachment of Her Majesty's now truly loyal and devoted subjects to Her royal person and government, it is by acts of injustice, or the manifestation of ungenerous distrust towards servants, who have served the British nation so faithfully and nobly as your Excellency has done. It will be the duty of this House, before the close of the present session, and when more fully informed of facts, to express more at large the feelings and opinions they entertain on this painfully interesting and important subject.

In the meantime, we beg to assure your Excellency, that this House, and the people of the province, will regard your Excellency's relinquishment of its government as a calamity of the most serious nature, and which may result in difficulties and dissensions that cannot be easily repaired or reconciled. We, however, are fully persuaded, that the blame cannot rest with your Excellency; and while we sincerely and most willingly acknowledge the zeal, ability, justice and honourable disinterestedness, with which you have conducted the government of this province, during your short but eventful and arduous administration of its affairs, we beg respectfully and affectionately to express, on behalf of this province, our earnest hope, that your Excellency's prosperity in future life may be commensurate with the claims, deep and lasting as they are, upon our gratitude—the approbation of our gracious Queen—and the applause and acknowledgment of the British nation.

APPENDIX B.

To His Excellency SIR F. B. HEAD, Baronet, &c. &c. &c.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

WE, Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Legislative Council of Upper Canada, in Provincial Parliament assembled, humbly pray that your Excellency will be pleased to transmit to this House copies of so much of your Excellency's correspondence with the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for the Colonies, as relates to your Excellency's resignation of the government of this province, embracing the matter of policy upon which your Excellency had the misfortune to differ from Her Majesty's government, so far as the same may, in your Excellency's opinion, be with propriety communicated.

JOHN B. ROBINSON,

SPEAKER.

Legislative Council Chamber,
19th day of Jan., 1838.

HIS EXCELLENCY'S REPLY.

HONOURABLE GENTLEMEN:

IT would afford me the greatest satisfaction to transmit to the Legislative Council, according to its request, so much of my correspondence with the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for the Colonies, as relates to my resignation of the government of this province; but, after deliberate consideration, I have come to the conclusion, that the publication of these documents might, under existing circumstances, embarrass my successor, and might be considered as a violation of official confidence.

So long as I remain in the service of Her Majesty's Government, I do not consider myself justified in defending my own conduct, by any vindication that may embarrass their policy.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

To His Excellency SIR F. B. HEAD, Baronet, &c. &c. &c.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

WE, Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Upper Canada, in Provincial Parliament assembled, humbly request that your Excellency will be pleased to lay before this House the correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and your Excellency, which induced your Excellency to tender your resignation of the government of this province; and also any subsequent correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and your Excellency, on the same subject.

H. RUTTAN,

SPEAKER.

Commons House of Assembly,
18th January, 1838.

HIS EXCELLENCY'S REPLY.

GENTLEMEN:

NOTHING, at this moment, would be so gratifying to my feelings as to lay before the House of Assembly the correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and myself, which induced me to tender my resignation of the government of this province; but, after deliberate consideration, I have come to the conclusion, that the publication of these documents might, under existing circumstances, embarrass my successor, and might be considered as a violation of official confidence.

So long as I remain in the service of Her Majesty's Government, I do not consider myself justified in defending my own conduct, by any vindication that may embarrass their policy.

F. B. HEAD.

HIS Excellency the Lieutenant Governor has much pleasure in transmitting to the Legislative Council, a highly gratifying communication from his Excellency the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, accompanying a unanimous joint vote of thanks from the two Houses of the Legislature of that province to the militia of Upper Canada, for their gallant conduct, in so ably, promptly and energetically, suppressing the late rebellion in this province.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, 22d January, 1838.

(A similar Message to the House of Assembly.)

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, FREDERICTON,
New Brunswick, Jan. 6th, 1838.

SIR,

WITH the highest satisfaction I comply with the the wishes of the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of this province, by transmitting to your Excellency Resolutions jointly concurred in by these bodies, tendering to your Excellency, and to the gallant militia of Upper Canada, the unanimous thanks of the Legislature, and of the people of New Brunswick, for the able, prompt and energetic suppression by them, and by your Excellency, unaided by any portion of Her Majesty's Troops, of the late insurrection in the neighbourhood of Toronto.

In doing this, I beg to add the expression of my warmest concurrence in the sentiments embodied in those resolutions, with the assurance that, while we feel the most entire confidence in the ability of Her Majesty's loyal Subjects of Upper Canada, under Your Excellency's guidance, to put down rebellion wherever it may shew itself, yet we cannot but regret that our remote position with respect to that Province, prevents our offering our more active co-operation.

I have, &amp;c.

Resolved unanimously, That the conduct of our fellow subjects in Upper Canada, on this memorable occasion, so fully in accordance with their former high spirit and character, affords a glorious example to the Sister Colonies; and cannot fail to quicken the zeal and animate the exertions of every loyal heart in these Colonies, in support and defence of the liberties they enjoy under British Laws and Institutions.

Resolved unanimously, That our fellow subjects in Upper Canada may rest assured of the lively sympathy of the inhabitants of this Province, in their loyalty and patriotic ardour, and of our most zealous co-operation in maintaining the Royal Authorities, and the inestimable advantages of our connexion with the Mother Country.

APPENDIX B.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, HALIFAX, 6th Feb. 1838.

SIR,

At the request of the Legislative Council of this province, I have the pleasure to transmit to your Excellency the enclosed resolutions of that honourable body, expressing their high admiration of the energetic measures adopted by your Excellency to suppress the recent rebellious outbreak in Upper Canada, and offering their thanks to Colonel Allan Napier MacNab, and the militia under his command, for their gallant conduct on that occasion.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your Excellency's most obedient,

Humble servant,

C. CAMPBELL.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL CHAMBER,
29th January, 1838.

On motion of Mr. Stewart, seconded by Mr. Ousely :—

Resolved unanimously—That while the members of this House view with the deepest regret the existence of rebellion in the provinces of Lower and Upper Canada, they cannot refrain from expressing the gratification they have derived from those warm and animating displays of universal loyalty and attachment to the British constitution and government, to which it has given occasion throughout the British North American Colonies.

Resolved unanimously—That the grateful acknowledgments of this House ought to be immediately conveyed to his Excellency Sir Francis Bond Head, the Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, for the penetration with which he discovered, and the firm, prompt, and energetic manner in which he baffled and defeated, the mad designs of traitorous men to rob and murder those who prefer the blessings of the British government to republican institutions; but more especially for the noble-minded reliance upon the courage and loyalty of the people alone, by which he was enabled to render most important aid towards the suppression of the unnatural rebellion in Lower Canada.

Resolved unanimously—That the thanks of this House are also due to Colonel Allan Napier MacNab, and the loyal militia of Upper Canada, for their gallant conduct in crushing in its infancy this rebellious attempt, and in exhibiting a noble example of the spirit with which Her Majesty's North American subjects are determined to preserve their connexion with their mother-country, and to put down all endeavours to weaken or destroy it.

Resolved unanimously—That this House view, with astonishment and regret, the support and assistance which, in a time of profound peace and amity between the two governments, have been afforded to the ex-patriated rebels by many citizens of the American Union; and this House trusts, that the efforts of the general government of the United States will not be remitted until such of its citizens as have been guilty of so unjustifiable a violation of the existing treaty and the law of nations shall be punished with that severity which they deserve.

Resolved unanimously—That while this House recognise in the British soldier that devotion to his sovereign and country which has led to the effectual suppression of the rebellion in Lower Canada, and also to a long and dreary march at this inclement season, they cannot but rejoice that the absence of the troops from the Upper Province has afforded gratifying and irresistible evidence of the deep-rooted attachment of the people to the British constitution.

APPENDIX B.

Resolved unanimously—That an humble address be presented to his Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor, praying that he will be pleased to transmit these resolutions to his Excellency Sir Francis Bond Head, the Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada.

JOHN C. HALLIBURTON,
CLERK.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL CHAMBER,
31st January, 1838.

Resolved—That Mr. Stewart, Mr. Smith and Mr. Ratchford, do wait upon his Excellency the Lieutenant Governor, and present to him the Address and Resolutions, agreed to on the 29th of this present month of January.

JOHN C. HALLIBURTON,
CLERK.

To His Excellency SIR F. B. HEAD, Baronet, &c. &c. &c.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY :

WE the undersigned, on behalf of the Executive Committee of the Constitutional Association of Quebec, having been informed that your Excellency is about to retire from the Government of Upper Canada, feel ourselves impelled, as well by a sense of justice to your Excellency's person, as by a sense of duty to our beloved Queen, to express our deep regret at your Excellency's intended departure; and although circumstances have placed your Excellency beyond our reach for the more intimate and private relations of life, yet upon public grounds we feel ourselves called upon to acquaint your Excellency that we deeply deplore the causes which have led your Excellency to resign the high and important station you have held in our sister province, the duties of which you have so ably and so faithfully discharged.

The passing events in Upper Canada could not but be regarded by us as of the most vital importance to this province, and entertaining this view, we have watched with the utmost anxiety your Excellency's administration. We have followed you through your prosperous career, and particularly during the eventful period of the late rebellion, as whilst recording as we now do, by this Address, our admiration of your public conduct, we venture to express the hope that Her Majesty's Ministers will at length be convinced that the principles of the British constitution alone are applicable to the good government of these provinces.

At a time when constitutional government has led to such happy results from the exercise of a sound discretion, accompanied by a dignified and uncompromising course of policy, which has conspicuously marked your Excellency's administration in Upper Canada, we are irresistibly led to attribute the present deplorable condition of the British and Irish inhabitants of this province to a weak and vacillating policy, so directly opposite to that pursued by your Excellency.

We, therefore, deeply sympathise with the inhabitants of our sister province on the loss they will so universally feel on the occasion of your Excellency's departure.

In respectfully offering our sincere wishes for your Excellency's future happiness, and that of Lady Head and family, we feel that we speak the sentiments of the whole body of Constitutionals in this district, in expressing the hope, nay the conviction, that your valuable talents will ever be enlisted in behalf of these provinces, and that the important services you have already rendered to Upper Canada, and the empire at large, will receive that well-merited reward—the approbation of our most gracious and beloved Queen.

CHAIRMAN.

SECRETARY.

APPENDIX B.

MONTREAL, 13th March, 1838.

SIR,

A large and respectable meeting of citizens, who long to testify their grateful admiration of the talent, firmness, and integrity which have uniformly distinguished your brief but eventful administration of the government of Upper Canada, has deputed us to inquire, whether you will so far gratify and honour them as to accept of a public dinner during your anticipated presence at Montreal.

We have the honour to be,

With the highest consideration and respect,

SIR,

Your most obedient and faithful servants,

JOHN MOLSON,
ADAM THOM.

To Sir F. B. HEAD, Baronet,
&c. &c.

TORONTO, March 19th, 1838.

GENTLEMEN,

It has afforded me unexpected gratification to learn from your letter of the 13th instant, which I have this moment received, that a large and respectable body of the citizens of Montreal have done me the honour to invite me to a public dinner during my presence in Montreal.

I beg you will be so good as to offer to the gentlemen who have evinced such a desire my sincere thanks for this flattering testimony of their good opinion, which I can truly assure them I most sensibly appreciate; at the same time I request they will do me the additional favour of permitting me to express a desire not to avail myself of their obliging invitation to a public dinner.

On retiring from this government I shall, to the utmost of my ability, continue to render to the Canadas every assistance in my power; but I trust, on reflection, you will agree with me in the opinion that, on my journey to England, I should in no place do anything that can tend directly or indirectly to agitate a discussion of any of those questions in which the people of the Canadas, as well as myself, feel so deeply interested.

I have the honour to be,

Gentlemen,

Your most obedient humble servant,

(Signed)

F. B. HEAD.

The Hon. PETER M'GILL,
JOHN MOLSON, Esq.
ADAM THOM, Esq.

QUEBEC, 22nd March, 1838.

SIR,

The citizens of Quebec, being desirous of Marking their sense of your Excellency's character and services during the eventful period of your government of Upper Canada, have, at a public meeting, convened at the Exchange on Wednesday the 21st instant, resolved that a public entertainment should be given for that object in this city, and that your Excellency should be invited thereto, should it be your intention to visit Quebec prior to your return to England.

In carrying this resolution into effect, the undersigned committee have now the honour of requesting your Excellency to accept a public dinner on the part of the citizens of Quebec, on any day which may suit your Excellency's convenience after your arrival in this city.

A duplicate of this letter has been forwarded to Kingston addressed to your Excellency.

We have the honour to be,

Your Excellency's most obedient humble servants,

APPENDIX B.

To His Excellency SIR F. B. HEAD, Baronet, &c. &c. &c.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,

We, her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the five battalions of Montreal Loyal Volunteers, cannot allow your Excellency to depart from your government of the province of Upper Canada without expressing to you our high admiration of your Excellency's upright, uncompromising, and constitutional administration of the duties of your exalted and important office.

In presuming to address your Excellency as volunteer soldiers, we feel assured, by the noble example which has been so lately exhibited to us by your Excellency, that our sentiments will, in your bosom, meet a sympathetic feeling of ardent loyalty to our beloved Queen, and of undeviating adherence to the glorious institutions of our father-land, of which it was unquestionably designed that we should have the happiness, in this remote corner of the British empire, to enjoy the ample blessings.

In your Excellency's administration of the affairs of Upper Canada, as well as in that of your gallant predecessor, our esteemed Commander-in-chief, we joyfully recognise that rejection of hollow expediency, and that adherence to pure and sterling principle, which at once check the aspirings of restless and destructive innovation, and give high and expanding hope and energy to the supporters of institutions based upon true patriotism, and cemented by the wisdom and experience of ages.

We beg to express our undoubting confidence in your Excellency's desire to impress upon the councils of our most gracious Sovereign the importance of seizing upon the present opportunity, so happily afforded, of making the province what it always should have been, a British colony; and to convey to our beloved Queen our earnest desire to be emancipated from the dominion of a race which has proved itself the enemy of British settlement in this province, of British improvement, of British laws and institutions, and of British connexion.

We beg to convey to your Excellency the expression of our sincere regret at your relinquishment of the government of Upper Canada at a crisis so important to the best interests of that noble province, and of our heartfelt wishes for your happiness, and for that honour and promotion at the hands of our most gracious Sovereign which your Excellency's patriotism so eminently deserves.

MONTREAL, 12th February, 1838.

AT a Public Meeting, very numerously attended, held at the News-room, in the City of Saint John, on Thursday, the 22nd day of March, 1838, his worship the Mayor in the Chair,—

On motion of Mr. Pentelow—

Resolved unanimously—That this meeting has a high sense of the inestimable advantages which have accrued to the Canadas and the other British American possessions, by the administration of Sir Francis Bond Head, Bart., late Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada.

Resolved unanimously—That, entertaining a lively hope that Sir Francis Bond Head may pass through this city on his return to England, this meeting deems it an indispensable duty that some distinguished tribute of respect be paid to him by the loyal inhabitants of Saint John, and that therefore he be invited to a public dinner to be given him on that occasion.

Resolved—That a committee of management be appointed to prepare the same, and obtain subscriptions.

On motion of the Hon. Judge Parker:—

Resolved unanimously—That his Excellency, Sir John Harvey, our highly respected Lieutenant-Governor, be invited as a guest on the occasion.

Resolved unanimously—That the Hon. Colonel MacNab, Speaker of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada, be also invited as a guest, in the event of his being in this province on his way to England.

Resolved—That his Worship the Mayor, H. B. Smith, Esq., collector of her Majesty's customs, and William H. Street, Esq., be a committee to proceed to Fredericton, for the purpose of conveying the aforesaid resolutions to Sir Francis Bond Head, his Excellency Sir John Harvey, and Colonel MacNab.

CHAIRMAN.

APPENDIX B.

At a Public Meeting of the Magistrates, Merchants, and principal Inhabitants of the County of Gloucester, held at the Court-house, in Bathurst, New Brunswick, on Monday, the 2nd day of April, 1838, William End, Member of the House of Assembly, called to the Chair:—

It was resolved unanimously—That the province of New Brunswick should cordially unite in those sentiments of admiration and respect which have been so enthusiastically expressed by the loyal people of Upper Canada towards Sir Francis Bond Head, their late Lieutenant-Governor.

Resolved unanimously—That to support and strengthen the power and influence of the Government in these colonies should be the paramount duty of every man who appreciates the importance of British connexion, and desires to be protected by British laws; and that the political opinions of Sir Francis Bond Head, expressed during his residence in Upper Canada, are warmly responded to by the loyal people of this province, and regarded as a code, happily conducive to the honour and dignity of the Crown, as well as the safety and welfare of the people.

Resolved unanimously—That the unshaken fidelity with which the constitutional rights of the Crown and the subject were maintained by Sir Francis Bond Head during his administration of the government of Upper Canada; his sagacity in detecting and disappointing the specious designs of pretended patriots; his firmness in overturning the less dangerous attempts of open rebellion, and the confidence with which, on two memorable occasions, he intrusted the best interests of the colony to the good sense of its freeholders and the gallantry of its militia, justly entitle him to the everlasting gratitude of her Majesty's faithful subjects in every part of British America.

Resolved unanimously—That, while the removal of Sir Francis Bond Head from the government of Upper Canada must be deeply lamented by those who nobly rallied round him in the day of agitation and rebellion, this meeting is not without a cheering hope that the knowledge which he has acquired of the true character of her Majesty's colonial subjects, when communicated to the Imperial Parliament, may convince the British nation that the great mass of the people of these colonies, loyal in feeling and in conscience, consider it their enviable distinction to form a part of the British empire, and turn with abhorrence from those who would make these last retreats of suffering loyalty a land of aliens from the British Crown.

Resolved unanimously—That the people of the county of Gloucester, deeming it their bounden duty to adopt the sentiments of the foregoing resolutions, are desirous of publicly declaring their feelings towards Sir Francis Bond Head and the loyalists of Upper Canada; and that these resolutions be signed by the chairman, and transmitted by him to his Excellency Major-General Sir John Harvey, our esteemed Lieutenant-Governor, with an humble request that he may be pleased to communicate them to Sir Francis Bond Head.

(Signed) WILLIAM END,
CHAIRMAN.

Bathurst, New Brunswick,
April 2nd, 1838.

Besides the above, I have a small volume of addresses, which I received on my departure from the people throughout all the districts of Upper Canada, to all of which addresses I gave the following reply, verbally explaining to the respective deputations that, feeling it to be my duty not to write anything on the subject of my retirement from the government of the province which could tend to agitate that question, I had resolved to give but one answer to whatever valedictory addresses I might receive.

I SINCERELY thank the inhabitants of ———, for the very gratifying expressions respecting my administration of the government of this province which are contained in their Address.

REPORT ON THE AFFAIRS
BRITISH NORTH AMERICA, FROM THE
EARL OF DURHAM,
HER MAJESTY'S HIGH COMMISSIONER,
&c. &c. &c.

---

REPORT.

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY :

YOUR MAJESTY, in entrusting me with the Government of the Province of Lower Canada, during the critical period of the suspension of its Constitution, was pleased, at the same time, to impose on me a task of equal difficulty, and of far more permanent importance, by appointing me "High Commissioner for the adjustment of certain important questions depending in the Provinces of Lower and Upper Canada, respecting the form and future Government of the said Provinces." To enable me to discharge this duty with the greater efficiency, I was invested, not only with the title, but with the actual functions of Governor General of all Your Majesty's North American Provinces, and my instructions restricted my authority by none of those limitations that had, in fact, deprived preceding Governors of Lower Canada of all control over the other Provinces, which, nevertheless, it had been the practice to render nominally subordinate to them. It was in addition, therefore, to the exclusive management of the administrative business of an extensive and disturbed Province, to the legislative duties that were accumulated on me during the abeyance of its representative government, and to the constant communications which I was compelled to maintain, not only with the Lieutenant Governors, but also with individual inhabitants of the other five Provinces, that I had to search into the nature and extent of the questions, of which the adjustment is requisite for the tranquillity of the Canadas; to set on foot various and extensive inquiries into the institutions and administration of those Provinces; and to devise such reforms in the system of their government as might repair the mischief which had already been done, and lay the foundations of order, tranquillity and improvement.

The task of providing for the adjustment of questions affecting the very "form and administration of Civil Government," was naturally limited to the two Provinces in which the settlement of such questions had been rendered matter of urgent necessity, by the events that had in one seriously endangered, and in the other actually suspended, the working of the existing constitution. But though the necessity only reached thus far, the extension of my authority over all the British Provinces in North America, for the declared purpose of enabling me more effectually to adjust the constitutional questions then at issue in two of them, together with the specific instructions contained in despatches from the Secretary of State, brought under my view the character and influence of the institutions established in all. I found in all these provinces a form of government so nearly the same—institutions generally so similar, and occasionally so connected—and interests, feelings and habits, so much in common, that it was obvious, at the first glance, that my conclusions would be formed without a proper use of the materials at my disposal, unless my inquiries were as extended as my power of making them. How inseparably connected I found the interests of your Majesty's Provinces in North America, to what degree I met with common disorders, requiring common remedies, is an important topic, which it will be my duty to discuss very fully before closing this report. My object at present is merely to explain the extent of the task imposed on me, and to point out the fact, that an inquiry originally directed only to two, has necessarily been extended over all your Majesty's Provinces in North America.

While I found the field of inquiry thus large, and every day's experience and reflection impressed more deeply on my mind the importance of the decision which it would be my duty to suggest, it became equally clear, that that decision, to be of any avail, must be prompt and final. I needed no personal observation to convince me of this; for the evils I had it in charge to remedy, are evils which no civilized community can long continue to bear. There is no class or section of your Majesty's subjects in either of the Canadas, that does not suffer from both the existing disorder and the doubt which hangs over the future form and policy of the Government. While the present state of things is allowed to last, the actual inhabitants of these Provinces have no security for person or property—no enjoyment of what they possess—no stimulus to industry. The development of the vast resources of these extensive territories is arrested; and the population, which should be attracted to fill and fertilize them, is directed into Foreign States. Every day, during which a final and stable settlement is delayed, the condition of the Colonies becomes worse—the minds of men more exasperated—and the success of any scheme of adjustment more precarious.

I was aware of the necessity of promptitude in my decision on the most important of the questions committed to me at a very early period after my acceptance of the mission which Your Majesty was pleased to confide to me. Before leaving England, I assured Your Majesty's Ministers, that the plan which I should suggest for the future Government of the Canadas, should be in readiness by the commencement of the ensuing Session; and, though I had made provision that, under any circumstances, the measures which I might suggest should be explained and supported in Parliament by some person who would have had a share in the preparation of them, I added, that it was not improbable that I might deem it my paramount duty towards the Provinces entrusted to me to attend in my place in the House of Lords, for the purpose of explaining my own views, and supporting my own recommendations. My resignation of the office of Governor General has, therefore, in nowise precipitated my suggestion of the plan which appears to me best calculated to settle the future form and policy of Government in the Canadas. It has prevented, certainly, my completing some inquiries which I had instituted, with a view of effecting practical reforms of essential, but still of subordinate importance. But with the chief of my duties as High Commissioner—that of suggesting the future Constitution of these Colonies—that event has interfered in no way, except in so far as the circumstances which attended it occasioned an undue intrusion of extraneous business on the time which was left for completion of my labours.

In truth, the administrative and legislative business which daily demanded my attention could, with difficulty, be discharged by the most unremitting labour on my own part, and on that of all those who accompanied me from England, or were employed by me in Canada.

It is in these circumstances, and under such disadvantages, that this Report has been prepared. I may not, therefore, present as extended and as complete a foundation as I could have wished, for those measures of vast and permanent importance which Parliament will find it necessary to adopt. But it will include the whole range of those subjects which it is essential should be brought under Your Majesty's view, and will prove that I have not rested content without fully developing the evils which lie at the root of the disorders of the North American Provinces—and at the same time suggesting remedies which, to the best of my judgment, will provide an effectual cure.

The same reasons, and the same obstacles, have prevented me from annexing a greater amount of detail and illustration, which, under more favourable circumstances, it would have been incumbent on me to collect, for the purpose of rendering clear and familiar to every mind, every particular of a state of things on which little correct, and much false information, has hitherto been current in this country. I cannot, therefore, but deeply regret that such a drawback on its efficacy should have been a necessary consequence of the circumstances under which the Report has been prepared. I still hope that the materials collected by me, though not as ample as I could have desired, will, nevertheless, be found sufficient for enabling the Imperial Legislature to form a sound decision on the important interests which are involved in the result of its deliberations.

These interests are, indeed, of great magnitude; and on the course which Your Majesty, and Your Parliament may adopt, with respect to the North American Colonies, will depend the future destinies, not only of the million and a half of Your Majesty's Subjects, who at present inhabit those Provinces, but of that vast population which those ample and fertile territories are fit and destined hereafter to support. No portion of the American Continent possesses greater natural resources for the maintenance of large and flourishing communities. An almost boundless range of the richest soil still remains unsettled, and may be rendered available for the purposes of agriculture. The wealth of inexhaustible forests of the best timber in America, and of extensive regions of the most valuable minerals, have as yet been scarcely touched. Along the whole line of sea-coast, around each island, and in every river, are to be found the greatest and richest fisheries in the world. The best fuel, and the most abundant water-power, are available for the coarser manufactures, for which an easy and certain market will be found. Trade with other Continents is favoured by the possession of a large number of safe and spacious harbours; long, deep, and numerous rivers, and vast inland seas, supply the means of easy intercourse; and the structure of the country generally affords the utmost facility for every species of communication by land. Unbounded materials of agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing industry are there: it depends upon the present decision of the Imperial Legislature to determine for whose benefit they are to be rendered available. The Country which has founded and maintained these Colonies, at a vast expense of blood and treasure, may justly expect its compensation in turning their unappropriated resources to the account of its own redundant population; they are the rightful patrimony of the English people—the ample apanage which God and nature have set aside in the New World, for those whose lot has assigned them but insufficient portions in the Old. Under wise and free institutions, these great advantages may yet be secured to Your Majesty's Subjects—and a connection, secured by the link of kindred origin, and mutual benefits, may continue to bind to the British Empire the ample territories of its North American Provinces, and the large and flourishing population by which they will assuredly be filled.

LOWER CANADA.

The prominent place which the dissensions of Lower Canada had, for some years, occupied in the eyes of the Imperial Legislature, the alarming state of disorder indicated or occasioned by the recent insurrection, and the paramount necessity of my applying my earliest efforts to the re-establishment of free and regular government in that particular Colony, in which it was then wholly suspended, necessarily directed my first inquiries to the Province of which the local government was vested in my hands. The suspension of the Constitution gave me an essential advantage over my predecessors in the conduct of my inquiries; it not merely relieved me from the burden of constant discussions with the legislative bodies, but it enabled me to turn my attention from the alleged to the real grievances of the Province; to leave on one side those matters of temporary contest which accident, or the interests and passions of parties, had elevated into undue importance; and, without reference to the representations of the disputants, to endeavour to make myself master of the real condition of the people, and the real causes of dissatisfaction or suffering. It was also a great advantage to me, in one respect, that the ordinary business of the government of the Province was combined with the functions of my inquiry. The routine of every day's administrative business brought strongly and familiarly before me the working of the institutions on which I was called to judge. The condition of the people, the system by which they were governed, were thus rendered familiar to me, and I soon became satisfied, that I must search in the very composition of society, and in the fundamental institutions of government, for the causes of the constant and extensive disorder which I witnessed.

The lengthened and various discussions which had for some years been carried on between the contending parties in the Colony, and the representations which had been circulated at home, had produced in mine, as in most minds in England, a very erroneous view of the parties at issue in Lower Canada. The quarrel which I was sent for the purpose of healing, had been a quarrel between the executive government and the popular branch of the legislature. The latter body had, apparently, been contending for popular rights and free government. The executive government had been defending the prerogative of the Crown, and the institutions which, in accordance with the principles of the British constitution, had been established as checks on the unbridled exercises of popular power. Though, during the dispute, indications had been given of the existence of dissensions, yet deeper and more formidable than any which arose from simply political causes, I had still, in common with most of my countrymen, imagined that the original and constant source of the evil was to be found in the defects of the political institutions of the provinces; that a reform of the constitution, or perhaps merely the introduction of a sounder practice into the administration of the government, would remove all causes of contest and complaint. This opinion was strengthened by the well-known fact, that the political dissensions which had produced their most formidable results in this Province, had assumed a similar, though milder form in the neighbouring Colonies; and that the tranquillity of each of the North American Provinces was subject to constant disturbance from collision between the Executive and the Representatives of the people. The Constitutions of these Colonies, the official characters and positions of the contending parties, the avowed subjects of dispute, and the general principles asserted on each side, were so similar, that I could not but concur in the very general opinion, that the common quarrel was the result of some common defect in the almost identical institutions of these Provinces. I looked upon it as a dispute analagous to those with which history and experience have made us so familiar in Europe—a dispute between a people demanding an extension of popular privileges on the one hand, and an Executive on the other, defending the powers which it conceived necessary for the maintenance of order. I supposed that my principal business would be that of determining how far each party might be in the right, or which was in the wrong; of devising some means of removing the defects which had occasioned the collision; and of restoring such a balance of the constitutional powers as might secure the free and peaceful working of the machine of government.

In a despatch which I addressed to your Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Colonies, on the 9th of August last, I detailed with great minuteness the impressions which had been produced on my mind by the state of things which existed in Lower Canada. I acknowledge that the experience derived from my residence in the Province had completely changed my view of the relative influence of the causes which had been assigned for the existing disorders. I had not, indeed, been brought to believe that the institutions of Lower Canada were less defective than I had originally presumed them to be. From the peculiar circumstances in which I was placed, I was enabled to make such effectual observations as convinced me that there had existed in the Constitution of the Province, in the balance of political powers, in the spirit and practice of administration in every department of the Government, defects that were quite sufficient to account for a great degree of mismanagement and dissatisfaction. The same observation had also impressed on me the conviction that, for the peculiar and disastrous dissensions of this Province, there existed a far deeper and far more efficient cause—a cause which penetrated beneath its political institutions into its social state—a cause which no reform of constitution or laws that should leave the elements of society unaltered could remove, but which must be removed ere any success could be expected in any attempt to remedy the many evils of this unhappy Province. I expected to find a contest between a government and a people: I found two nations warring in the bosom of a single state: I found a struggle, not of principles, but of races; and I perceived that it would be idle to attempt any amelioration of laws or institutions, until we could first succeed in terminating the deadly animosity that now separates the inhabitants of Lower Canada into the hostile divisions of French and English.

It would be vain for me to expect that any description I can give will impress on your Majesty such a view of the animosity of these races, as my personal experience in Lower Canada has forced on me. Our happy immunity from any feelings of national hostility, renders it difficult for us to comprehend the intensity of the hatred which the difference of language, of laws and of manners, creates between those who inhabit the same village, and are citizens of the same state. We are ready to believe that the real motive of the quarrel is something else, and that the difference of race has slightly and occasionally aggravated dissensions, which we attribute to some more usual cause. Experience of a state of society, so unhappily divided as that of Lower Canada, leads to an exactly contrary opinion. The national feud forces itself on the very senses, irresistibly and palpably, as the origin or the essence of every dispute which divides the community; we discover that dissensions, which appear to have another origin, are but forms of this constant and all-pervading quarrel; and that every contest is one of French and English in the outset, or becomes so ere it has run its course.

The political discontents, for which the vicious system of government has given too much cause, have for a long time concealed or modified the influence of the national quarrel. It has been argued that origin can have but little effect in dividing the country, inasmuch as individuals of each race have constantly been enlisted together on the side of government, or been found united in leading the Assembly to assail its alleged abuses; that the names of some of the prominent leaders of the rebellion mark their English, while those of some of the most unpopular supporters of the government denote their French origin; and that the representatives, if not of an actual majority, (as has occasionally been asserted,) at any rate of a large proportion of the purely English population, have been found constantly voting with the majority of the Assembly against what is called the British party. Temporary and local causes have no doubt, to a certain extent, produced such results. The national hostility has not assumed its permanent influence till of late years, nor has it exhibited itself every where at once. While it displayed itself long ago in the cities of Quebec and Montreal, where the leaders and masses of the rival races most speedily come into collision, the inhabitants of the eastern townships, who were removed from all personal contact with the French, and those of the district below Quebec, who experienced little interference from the English, continued to a very late period to entertain comparatively friendly feelings towards those of the opposite races. But this is a distinction which has unfortunately, year after year, been exhibiting itself more strongly, and diffusing itself more widely. One by one the ancient English leaders of the Assembly have fallen off from the majority, and attached themselves to the party which supported the British government against it. Every election from the townships added to the British minority. On the other hand, year after year, in spite of the various influences which a government can exercise, and of which no people in the world are more susceptible than the French Canadians; in spite of the additional motives of prudence and patriotism, which deter timid or calm men from acting with a party, obviously endangering the public tranquillity by the violence of its conduct, the number of French Canadians, on whom the government could rely, has been narrowed by the influence of those associations which have drawn them into the ranks of their kindred. The insurrection of 1837 completed the division. Since the resort to arms, the two races have been distinctly and completely arrayed against each other. No portion of the English population was backward in taking arms in defence of the government; with a single exception, no portion of the Canadian population was allowed to do so, even where it was asserted by some, that their loyalty inclined them thereto. The exasperation thus generated has extended over the whole of each race. The most just and sensible of the English, those whose politics had always been most liberal, those who had always advocated the most moderate policy in the provincial disputes, seem from that moment to have taken their part against the French as resolutely, if not as fiercely, as the rest of their countrymen, and to have joined in the determination never again to submit to a French majority. A few exceptions mark the existence, rather than militate against the truth of the general rule of national hostility. A few of the French, distinguished by moderate and enlarged views, still condemn the narrow national prejudices and ruinous violence of their countrymen, while they equally resist what they consider the violent and unjust pretensions of a minority, and endeavour to form a middle party between the two extremes. A large part of the Catholic Clergy, a few of the principal proprietors of the seignorial families, and some of those who are influenced by ancient connexions of party, support the government against revolutionary violence. A very few persons of English origin, (not more perhaps than fifty out of the whole number) still continue to act with the party which they originally espoused. Those who affect to form a middle party exercise no influence on the contending extremes; and those who side with the nation from which their birth distinguishes them, are regarded by their countrymen with aggravated hatred, as renegades from their race; while they obtain but little of the real affection, confidence or esteem of those whom they have joined.

The grounds of quarrel which are commonly alleged appear, on investigation, to have little to do with its real cause; and the inquirer, who has imagined that the public demonstrations or professions of the parties have put him in possession of their real motives and designs, is surprised to find, upon nearer observation, how much he has been deceived by the false colours under which they have been in the habit of fighting. It is not, indeed, surprising, that each party should, in this instance, have practised more than the usual frauds of language, by which factions in every country seek to secure the sympathy of other communities. A quarrel based on the mere ground of national animosity, appears so revolting to the notions of good sense and charity prevalent in the civilized world, that the parties who feel such a passion the most strongly, and indulge it the most openly, are at great pains to class themselves under any denominations but those which would correctly designate their objects and feelings. The French Canadians have attempted to shroud their hostility to the influence of English emigration, and the introduction of British institutions, under the guise of warfare against the government and its supporters, whom they represented to be a small knot of corrupt and insolent dependents; being a majority, they have invoked the principles of popular control and democracy, and appealed with no little effect to the sympathy of liberal politicians in every quarter of the world. The English, finding their opponents in collision with the government, have raised the cry of loyalty and attachment to British connexion, and denounced the republican designs of the French, whom they designate, or rather used to designate, by the appellation of Radicals. Thus the French have been viewed as a democratic party, contending for reform; and the English as a conservative minority, protecting the menaced connection with the British Crown, and the supreme authority of the empire. There is truth in this notion, in so far as respects the means by which each party sought to carry its own views of government into effect. The French majority asserted the most democratic doctrines of the rights of a numerical majority. The English minority availed itself of the protection of the prerogative, and allied itself with all those of the colonial institutions which enabled the few to resist the will of the many. But when we look to the objects of each party, the analogy to our own politics seems to be lost, if not actually reversed; the French appear to have used their democratic arms for conservative purposes, rather than those of liberal and enlightened movement; and the sympathies of the friends of reform are naturally enlisted on the side of sound amelioration, which the English minority, in vain attempted to introduce into the antiquated laws of the province.

Yet even on the questions which had been most recently the prominent matters of dispute between the two parties, it is difficult to believe that the hostility of the races was the effect, and not the cause, of the pertinacity with which the desired reforms were pressed or resisted.

The English complained of the Assembly's refusal to establish registry offices, and to commute the feudal tenures; and yet it was among the ablest and most influential leaders of the English that I found some of the opponents of both the proposed reforms. The leaders of the French were anxious to disclaim any hostility to these reforms themselves. Many of them represented the reluctance which the Assembly had exhibited to entertain these questions, as a result of the extraordinary influence which Mr. Papineau exercised over that body; his opposition was accounted for by some peculiar prejudices of education and professional practice, in which he was said to find little concurrence among his countrymen; it was stated that even his influence would not have prevented these questions from being very favourably entertained by the Assembly, had it ever met again; and I received assurances of a friendly disposition towards them, which I must say were very much at variance with the reluctance which the leading men of the party shewed to any co-operation with me in the attempts which I subsequently made to carry these very objects into effect. At the same time, while the leading men of the French party thus rendered themselves liable to the imputation of a timid or narrow-minded opposition to these improvements, the mass of the French population, who are immediate sufferers by the abuses of the seigniorial system, exhibited, in every possible shape, their hostility to the state of things which their leaders had so obstinately maintained. There is every reason to believe that a great number of the peasants who fought at St. Denis and St. Charles, imagined that the principal result of success would be the overthrow of tithes and feudal burthens; and in the Declaration of Independence, which Dr. Robert Nelson issued, two of the objects of the insurrection were stated to be the abolition of feudal tenures, and the establishment of registry offices.* When I observe these inconsistencies of conduct among the opponents and supporters of these reforms; when I consider that their attainment was prevented by means of the cessitaires, the very persons most interested in their success, and that they were not more eagerly demanded by the wealthier of the English, than by the artisans and labourers of that race whose individual interests would hardly have derived much direct benefit from their success, I cannot but think that many, both of the supporters and of the opponents, cared less for the measures themselves, than for the handle which the agitation of them gave to their national hostility; that the Assembly resisted these changes chiefly because the English desired them; and that the eagerness with which many of the English urged them was stimulated by finding them opposed by the French.

Nor did I find the spirit which animated each party at all more coincident with the representations current in this country, than their objects appeared, when tried by English, or, rather, by European ideas of reforming legislation. An utterly uneducated and singularly inert population, implicitly obeying leaders who ruled them by the influence of a blind confidence and narrow national prejudices, accorded very little with the resemblance which had been discovered to that high-spirited democracy which affected the American revolution.— Still less could I discover in the English population those slavish tools of a narrow official clique, or a few purse-proud merchants, which their opponents had described them as being. I have found the main body of the English population, consisting of hardy farmers and humble mechanics, composing a very independent, not very manageable, and sometimes, a rather turbulent democracy. Though constantly professing a somewhat extravagant loyalty and high prerogative doctrines, I found them very determined on maintaining, in their own persons, a great respect for popular rights, and singularly ready to enforce their wishes by the strongest means of constitutional pressure on the government. Between them and the Canadians I found the strongest hostility; and that hostility was, as might be expected, most strongly developed among the humblest and rudest of the body. Between them and the small knot of officials, whose influence has been represented as so formidable, I found no sympathy whatever; and it must be said, in justice to this body of officials, who have been so much assailed as the enemies of the Canadian people, that however little I can excuse the injurious influence of that system of administration, which they were called upon to carry into execution, the members of the oldest and most powerful official families were, of all the English in the country, those in whom I generally found most sympathy with, and kindly feeling towards, the French population. I could not, therefore, believe that this animosity was only that subsisting between an official oligarchy and a people; and again, I was brought to a conviction that the contest, which had been represented as a contest of classes, was in fact, a contest of races.

* Among the few petitions, except those of mere compliment, which I received from the French Canadians, were three or four for the abolition and commutation of the feudal tenures. But the most remarkable was one which was presented from the inhabitants of the county of Saguenay, and supported by Mr. Charles Drolet, late M. P. P. for that county. The petitioners, who represented themselves as suffering under a degree of distress, of which the existence is too deplorably certain, prayed to be allowed to settle on the wild lands at the head of the Saguenay. They expressed their willingness to take the lands on any conditions which the government might propose, but they prayed that it should not be granted on the feudal tenure.

However unwilling we may be to attribute the disorders of a country connected with us to a cause so fatal to its tranquillity, and one which it seems so difficult to remove, no very long or laboured consideration of the relative characters and position of these races is needed, for convincing us of their invincible hostility towards each other. It is scarcely possible to conceive descendants of any of the great European nations more unlike each other in character and temperament, more totally separated from each other by language, laws, and modes of life, or placed in circumstances more calculated to produce mutual misunderstanding, jealousy and hatred. To conceive the incompatibility of the two races in Canada, it is not enough that we should picture to ourselves a community composed of equal proportions of French and English. We must bear in mind what kind of French and English they are that are brought in contact, and in what proportions they meet.

The institutions of France, during the period of the colonization of Canada, were, perhaps, more than those of any other European nation calculated to repress the intelligence and freedom of the great mass of the people. These institutions followed the Canadian colonist across the atlantic. The same central, ill-organized, unimproving and repressive despotism, extended over him. Not merely was he allowed no voice in the government of his Province, or the choice of his rulers, but he was not even permitted to associate with his neighbours for the regulation of those municipal affairs, which the central authority neglected under the pretext of managing. He obtained his land on a tenure singularly calculated to promote his immediate comfort, and to check his desire to better his condition: he was placed at once in a life of constant and unvarying labour, of great material comfort, and feudal dependence. The ecclesiastical authority to which he had been accustomed, established its institutions around him, and the priest continued to exercise over him his ancient influence. No general provision was made for education; and, as its necessity was not appreciated, the colonist made no attempt to repair the negligence of his government. It need not surprise us that, under such circumstances, a race of men habituated to the incessant labour of a rude and unskilled agriculture, and habitually fond of social enjoyments, congregated together in rural communities, occupying portions of the wholly unappropriated soil, sufficient to provide each family with material comforts, far beyond their ancient means, or almost their conceptions; that they made little advance beyond the first progress in comfort, which the bounty of the soil absolutely forced upon them; that under the same institutions they remained the same uninstructed, inactive, unprogressive people. Along the alluvial banks of the St. Lawrence, and its tributaries, they have cleared two or three strips of land, cultivated them in the worst method of small farming, and established a series of continuous villages, which give the country of the seigniories the appearance of a never-ending street. Besides the cities which were the seats of government, no towns were established; the rude manufactures of the country were, and still are, carried on in the cottage by the family of the habitant; and an insignificant proportion of the population derived their subsistence from the scarcely discernible commerce of the province. Whatever energy existed among the population was employed in the fur trade, and the occupations of hunting, which they and their descendants have carried beyond the Rocky Mountains, and still, in great measure, monopolise in the whole valley* of the Mississippi. The mass of the community exhibited in the New World the characteristics of the peasantry of Europe. Society was dense; and even the wants and the poverty which the pressure of population occasions in the Old World, became not to be wholly unknown. They clung to ancient prejudices, ancient customs and ancient laws, not from any strong sense of their beneficial effects, but with the unreasoning tenacity of an uneducated and unprogressive people. Nor were they wanting in the virtues of a simple and industrious life, or in those which common consent attributes to the nation from which they spring. The temptations which, in other states of society, lead to offences against property, and the passions which prompt to violence, were little known among them. They are mild and kindly, frugal, industrious and honest, very sociable, cheerful and hospitable, and distinguished for a courtesy and real politeness which pervades every class of society. The conquest has changed them but little. The higher classes, and the inhabitants of the towns, have adopted some English customs and feelings; but the continued negligence of the British government left the mass of the people without any of the institutions which would have elevated them in freedom and civilization. It has left them without the education and without the institutions of local self-government, that would have assimilated their character and habits, in the easiest and best way, to those of the Empire of which they become a part. They remain an old and stationary society, in a new and progressive world. In all essentials they are still French; but French in every respect dissimilar to those of France in the present day. They resemble rather the French of the provinces under the old regime.

I cannot pass over this subject without calling particular attention to a peculiarity in the social condition of this people, of which the important bearing on the troubles of Lower Canada has never, in my opinion, been properly estimated. The circumstances of a new and unsettled country, the operation of the French laws of inheritance, and the absence of any means of accumulation, by commerce or manufactures, have produced a remarkable equality of properties and conditions. A few seigniorial families possess large, though not often very valuable properties; the class entirely dependent on wages is very small; the bulk of the population is composed of the hard-working yeomanry of the country districts, commonly called habitants, and their connections, engaged in other occupations. It is impossible to exaggerate the want of education among the habitants; no means of instruction have ever been provided for them, and they are almost universally destitute of the qualifications even of reading and writing. It came to my knowledge that out of a great number of boys and girls assembled at the school-house door of St. Thomas, all but three admitted, on inquiry, that they could not read. Yet the children of this large parish, attend school regularly, and actually make use of books. They hold the catechism book in their hand, as if they were reading, while they only repeat its contents, which they know by rote. The common assertion, however, that all classes of the Canadians are equally ignorant, is perfectly erroneous: for I know of no people among whom a larger provision exists for the higher kinds of elementary education, or among whom such education is really extended to a larger proportion of the population. The piety and benevolence of the early possessors of the country founded, in the seminaries that exist in different parts of the province, institutions, of which the funds and activity have long been directed to the promotion of education. Seminaries and colleges have been, by these bodies, established in the cities and in other central points. The education given in these establishments greatly resembles the kind given in the English public schools, though it is rather more varied. It is entirely in the hands of the Catholic Clergy. The number of pupils in these establishments is estimated altogether at about a thousand; and they turn out every year, as far as I could ascertain, between two and three hundred young men thus educated. Almost all of these are members of the family of some habitant, whom the possession of greater quickness than his brothers has induced the father or the curate of the parish to select and send to the seminary. These young men possessing a degree of information immeasurably superior to that of their families, are naturally averse to what they regard as descending to the humble occupations of their parents. A few become priests; but as the military and naval professions are closed against the colonist, the greater part can only find a position suited to their notions of their own qualifications, in the learned professions of advocate, notary, and surgeon. As from this cause these professions are greatly overstocked, we find every village in Lower Canada filled with notaries and surgeons, with little practice to occupy their attention, and living among their own families, or at any rate among exactly the same class. Thus the persons of most education in every village belong to the same families, and the same original station in life, as the illiterate habitants whom I have described. They are connected with them by all the associations of early youth, and the ties of blood. The most perfect equality always marks their intercourse, and the superior in education is separated by no barrier of manners, or pride, or distinct interests, from the singularly ignorant peasantry by which he is surrounded. He combines, therefore, the influence of superior knowledge and social equality, and wields a power over the mass, which I do not believe that the educated class of any other portion of the world possess. To this singular state of things I attribute the extraordinary influence of the Canadian demagogues.—The most uninstructed population anywhere trusted with political power is thus placed in the hands of a small body of instructed persons, in whom it reposes the confidence which nothing but such domestic connection and such community of interest could generate. Over the class of persons by whom the peasantry are thus led, the government has not acquired, or ever laboured to acquire influence. Its members have been thrown into opposition by the system of exclusion long prevalent in the colony, and it is by their agency that the leaders of the assembly have been enabled hitherto to move as one mass in whatever direction they thought proper, the simple and ductile population of the country. The entire neglect of education by the government, has thus, more than any other cause, contributed to render the people ungovernable, and to invest the agitator with the power which he wields against the laws and the public tranquillity.

Among this people the progress of emigration has of late years introduced an English population, exhibiting the characteristics with which we are familiar, as those of the most enterprising of every class of our countrymen. The circumstances of the early colonial administration excluded the native Canadian from power, and vested all offices of trust and emolument in the hands of strangers of English origin. The highest posts in the law were confided to the same class of persons. The functionaries of the civil government, together with the officers of the army, composed a kind of privileged class, occupying the first place in the community, and excluding the higher class of the natives from society, as well as from the government of their own country. It was not till within a very few years, as was testified by persons who had seen much of the country, that this society of civil and military functionaries ceased to exhibit towards the higher order of Canadians an exclusiveness of demeanour, which was more revolting to a sensitive and polite people than the monopoly of power and profit; nor was this national favouritism discontinued, until after repeated complaints and an angry contest, which had excited passions that concession could not allay. The races had become enemies, ere a tardy justice was extorted; and even then, the Government discovered a mode of distributing its patronage among the Canadians, which was quite as offensive to that people as their previous exclusion.

It was not long after the conquest, that another and larger class of English settlers began to enter the province. English capital was attracted to Canada, by the vast quantity and valuable nature of the exportable produce of the country, and the great facilities for commerce, presented by the natural means of internal intercourse. The ancient trade of the country was conducted on a much larger and more profitable scale; and new branches of industry were explored. The active and regular habits of the English capitalist drove out of all the more profitable kinds of industry their inert and careless competitors of the French race; but in respect of the greater part (almost the whole) of the commerce and manufacturers of the country, the English cannot be said to have encroached upon the French; for, in fact, they created employments and profits which had not previously existed. A few of the ancient race smarted under the loss occasioned by the success of English competition; but all felt yet more acutely the gradual increase of a class of strangers, in whose hands the wealth of the country appeared to centre—and whose expenditure and influence eclipsed those of the class which had previously occupied the first position in the country. Nor was the intrusion of the English limited to commercial enterprizes. By degrees, large portions of land were occupied by them: nor did they confine themselves to the unsettled and distant country of the townships. The wealthy capitalist invested his money in the purchase of seigniorial properties—and it is estimated, that at the present moment, full half of the more valuable seigniories are actually owned by English proprietors. The seigniorial tenure is one so little adapted to our notions of proprietary rights, that the new Seigneur, without consciousness or intention of injustice, in many instances exercised his rights in a manner which would appear perfectly fair in this country, but which the Canadian settler reasonably regarded as oppressive. The English purchaser found an equally unexpected and just cause of complaint in that uncertainty of the laws, which rendered his possession of property precarious, and in those incidents of the tenure which rendered its alienation or improvement difficult. But an irritation greater than that occasioned by the transfer of the large properties, was caused by the competition of the English with the French farmer. The English farmer carried with him the experience and habits of the most improved agriculture in the world. He settled himself in the townships bordering on the seigniories, and brought a fresh soil and improved cultivation to compete with the worn-out and slovenly farm of the habitant. He often took the very farm which the Canadian settler had abandoned, and by superior management, made that a source of profit which had only impoverished his predecessor. The ascendancy which an unjust favouritism had contributed to give to the English race in the government and the legal profession, their own superior energy, skill and capital, secured to them in every branch of industry. They have developed the resources of the country—they have constructed or improved its means of communication—they have created its internal and foreign commerce. The entire wholesale, and a large portion of the retail, trade of the province, with the most profitable and flourishing farms, are now in the hands of this numerical minority of the population.

In Lower Canada, the mere working class which depends on wages, though proportionally large in comparison with that to be found in any other portion of the American continent, is, according to our ideas, very small. Competition between persons of different origin in this class has not exhibited itself till very recently, and is, even now, almost confined to the cities. The large mass of the labouring population are French, in the employ of English capitalists. The more skilled class of artisans are generally English; but in the general run of the more laborious employments, the French Canadians fully hold their ground against English rivalry. The emigration which took place a few years ago, brought in a class which entered into more direct competition with the French, in some kinds of employment, in the towns; but the individuals affected by this competition were not very many. I do not believe that the animosity which exists between the working classes of the two origins is the necessary result of a collision of interests, or of a jealousy of the superior success of English labour. But national prejudices naturally exercise the greatest influence over the most uneducated: the difference of language is less easily overcome—the difference of manners and customs less easily appreciated. The labourers, whom the emigration introduced, contained a number of very ignorant, turbulent and demoralized persons, whose conduct and manners alike revolted the well-ordered and courteous natives of the same class. The working-men naturally ranged themselves on the side of the educated and wealthy of their own countrymen. When once engaged in the conflict, their passions were less restrained by education and prudence—and the national hostility now rages most fiercely between those whose interests in reality bring them the least in collision.

The two races, thus distinct, have been brought into the same community, under circumstances which rendered their contact inevitably productive of collision. The difference of language, from the first, kept them asunder. It is not anywhere a virtue of the English race to look with complacency on any manners, customs or laws, which appear strange to them; accustomed to form a high estimate of their own superiority, they take no pains to conceal from others their contempt and intolerance of their usages. They found the French Canadians filled with an equal amount of national pride; a sensitive, but inactive pride, which disposes that people not to resent insult, but rather to keep aloof from those who would keep them under. The French could not but feel the superiority of English enterprise; they could not shut their eyes to their success in every undertaking in which they came into contact, and to the constant superiority which they were acquiring. They looked upon their rivals with alarim—with jealousy—and finally with hatred. The English repaid them with a scorn, which soon also assumed the same form of hatred. The French complained of the arrogance and injustice of the English; the English accused the French of the vices of a weak and conquered people, and charged them with meanness and perfidy. The entire mistrust which the two races have thus learned to conceive of each other's intentions, induces them to put the worst construction on the most innocent conduct—to judge every word, every act, and every intention unfairly—to attribute the most odious designs, and reject every overture of kindness or fairness, as covering secret designs of treachery and malignity.

Religion formed no bond of intercourse and union. It is, indeed, an admirable feature of Canadian society, that it is entirely devoid of any religious dissensions. Sectarian intolerance is not merely not avowed, but it hardly seems to influence men's feelings. But though the prudence and liberality of both parties has prevented this fruitful source of animosity from embittering their quarrels, the difference of religion has in fact tended to keep them asunder. Their priests have been distinct—they have not even met in the same church.

No common education has served to remove and soften the differences of origin and language. The associations of youth—the sports of childhood—and the studies by which the character of manhood is modified, are distinct and totally different. In Montreal and Quebec there are English schools and French schools; the children in these are accustomed to fight nation against nation—and the quarrels that arise among boys in the streets, usually exhibit a division into English on one side, and French on the other.

As they are taught apart, so are their studies different. The literature with which each is the most conversant, is that of the peculiar language of each; and all the ideas which men derive from books, come to each of them from perfectly different sources. The difference of language in this respect produces effects quite apart from those which it has on the mere intercourse of the two races. Those who have reflected on the powerful influence of language on thought, will perceive in how different a manner people who speak in different languages are apt to think; and those who are familiar with the literature of France, know that the same opinion will be expressed by an English and French writer of the present day, not merely in different words, but in a style so different as to mark utterly different habits of thought. This difference is very striking in Lower Canada: it exists, not merely in the books of most influence and repute, which are, of course, those of the great writers of France and England, and by which the minds of the respective races are formed, but it is observable in the writings which now issue from the colonial press. The articles in the newspapers of each race, are written in a style as widely different as those of France and England at present—and the arguments which convince the one, are calculated to appear utterly unintelligible to the other.

The difference of language produces misconceptions yet more fatal even than those which it occasions with respect to opinions: it aggravates the national animosities, by representing all the events of the day in utterly different lights. The political misrepresentation of facts is one of the incidents of a free press in every free country; but in nations in which all speak the same language, those who receive a misrepresentation from one side, have generally some means of learning the truth from the other. In Lower Canada, however, where the French and English papers represent adverse opinions, and where no large portion of the community can read both languages with ease, those who receive the misrepresentation are rarely able to avail themselves of the means of correction. It is difficult to conceive the perversity with which misrepresentations are habitually made, and the gross delusions which find currency among the people; they thus live in a world of misconceptions—in which each party is set against the other, not only by diversity of feelings and opinions, but by an actual belief in an utterly different set of facts.

The differences thus early occasioned by education and language, are in nowise softened by the intercourse of after-life; their business and occupations do not bring the two races into friendly contact and co-operation, but only present them to each other in occasional rivalry. A laudable emulation has of late induced the French to enter on the field previously occupied by the English, and to attempt to compete with them in commerce; but it is much to be lamented, that this did not commence until the national animosities had arrived almost at the highest pitch—and that the competition has been carried on in such a manner as to widen the pre-existing differences. The establishment of the "Banque du Peuple," by French capitalists, is an event which may be regarded as a satisfactory indication of an awakening commercial energy among the French; and it is, therefore, very much to be regretted, that the success of the new enterprise was uniformly promoted by direct and illiberal appeals to the national feelings of the race. Some of the French have lately established steam-boats, to compete with the monopoly which a combination of English capitalists had for some time enjoyed on the St. Lawrence; and small and somewhat uncomfortable as they were, they were regarded with favour on account of their superiority in the essential qualities of certainty and celerity. But this was not considered sufficient to insure their success; an appeal was constantly made to the national feelings of the French for an exclusive preference of the "French" line, and I have known a French newspaper to announce with satisfaction the fact, that on the previous day the French steamers to Quebec and LaPrairie had arrived at Montreal with a great many passengers, and the English with very few. The English, on the other hand, appealed to exactly the same kind of feelings, and used to apply to the French steamboats the epithets of "Radical," "Rebel," and "Disloyal." The introduction of this kind of national preference into this department of business, produced a particularly mischievous effect, inasmuch as it separated the two races on some of the few occasions on which they had been previously thrown into each other's society. They rarely meet at the inns in the cities; the principal hotels are almost exclusively filled with English, and with foreign travellers; and the French are, for the most part, received at each other's houses, or in boarding-houses, in which they meet with few English.

Nor do their amusements bring them more in contact. Social intercourse never existed between the two races in any but the higher classes, and it is now almost destroyed. I heard of but one house in Quebec, in which both races met on pretty equal and amicable terms—and this was mentioned as a singular instance of good sense on the part of the gentleman to whom it belongs. At the commencement of Lord Aylmer's administration, an entertainment was given to his Lordship by Mr. Papineau, the Speaker of the House of Assembly. It was generally understood to be intended as a mark of confidence and good-will towards the Governor, and of a conciliatory disposition. It was given on a very large scale; a very great number of persons were present—and of that number, I was informed by a gentleman who was present, that he and one other were the only English, except the Governor and his suite. Indeed, the difference of manners in the two races, renders a general social intercourse almost impossible.

A singular instance of national incompatibility was brought before my notice, in an attempt which I made to promote an undertaking, in which the French were said to take a great deal of interest. I accepted the office of President of the Agricultural association of the District of Quebec, and attended the Show previous to the distribution of the prizes. I then found that the French farmers would not compete, even on this neutral ground; with the English. Distinct prizes were given, in almost every department, to the two races; and the national ploughing matches were carried on in separate and distant fields.

While such is their social intercourse, it is not to be expected that the animosities of the two races can frequently be softened by the formation of domestic connexions. During the first period of the possession of the Colony by the English, intermarriages of the two races were by no means uncommon. But they are now very rare; and where such unions occur, they are generally formed with members of the French families, which I have described as politically, and almost nationally, separated from the bulk of their own race.

I could mention various slight features in the state of society, which show the all-pervading and marked division of the races; but nothing (though it will sound paradoxical) really proves their entire separation so much as the rarity, nay, almost total absence of personal encounters between the two races. Disputes of this kind are almost confined to the ruder order of people, and seldom proceed to acts of violence. As respects the other classes, social intercourse between the two races is so limited, that the more prominent or excitable antagonists never meet in the same room. It came to my knowledge, that a gentleman, who was for some years a most active and determined leader amongst the English population, had never once been under a private roof with French Canadians of his own rank in life, until he met some at table, on the invitation of persons attached to my mission, who were in the habit of associating indifferently with French and English. There are, therefore, no political personal controversies. The ordinary occasions of collision never occur: and men must quarrel so publicly or so deliberately, that prudence restrains them from commencing, individually, what would probably end in a general and bloody conflict of numbers. Their mutual fears restrain personal disputes and riots, even among the lower orders; the French know and dread the superior physical strength of the English in the cities—and the English in those places refrain from exhibiting their power, from fear of the revenge that might be taken on their countrymen, who are scattered over the rural parishes.

This feeling of mutual forbearance extends so far as to produce an apparent calm, with respect to public matters, which is calculated to perplex a stranger, who has heard much of the animosities of the province. No trace of them appears in public meetings; and these take place in every direction, in the most excited periods, and go off without disturbance, and almost without dissent. The fact is, that both parties have come to a tacit understanding, not in any way to interfere with each other on these occasions—each party knowing that it would always be in the power of the other to prevent its meetings. The British party, consequently, have their meetings; the French theirs; and neither disturb the other. The complimentary addresses which I received on various occasions, marked the same entire separation—even in a matter in which it might be supposed that party feeling would not be felt, or would, from mere prudence and propriety, be concealed. I had, from the same places, French and English addresses; and I never found the two races uniting, except in a few cases, where I met with the names of two or three isolated members of one origin, who happened to dwell in a community almost entirely composed of the other. The two parties combine for no public object—they cannot harmonise even in associations of charity. The only public occasion on which they ever meet is in the Jury-box—and they meet there only to the utter obstruction of Justice.

The hostility which thus pervades society, was some time growing before it became of prominent importance in the politics of the province. It was inevitable, that such social feelings must end in a deadly political strife. The French regarded with jealousy the influence, in politics, of a daily increasing body of the strangers, whom they so much disliked and dreaded; the wealthy English were offended at finding that their property gave them no influence over their French dependents, who were acting under the guidance of leaders of their own race; and the farmers and traders of the same race were not long before they began to bear with impatience their utter political nullity, in the midst of a majority of a population, whose ignorance they contemned, and whose political views and conduct seemed utterly at variance with their own notions of the principles and practice of self-government. The superior political and practical intelligence of the English, cannot be for a moment disputed. The great mass of the Canadian population, who cannot read or write, and have found in few of the institutions of their country, even the elements of political education, were obviously inferior to the English settlers, of whom a large proportion had received a considerable amount of education, and had been trained in their own country to take a part in public business of one kind or another. With respect to the more educated classes, the superiority is not so general or apparent; indeed, from all the information that I could collect, I incline to think, that the greater amount of refinement—of speculative thought—and of the knowledge that books can give—is, with some brilliant exceptions, to be found among the French. But I have no hesitation in stating, even more decidedly, that the circumstances in which the English have been placed in Lower Canada, acting on their original political education, have endowed the leaders of that population with much of that practical sagacity, tact, and energy, in politics, in which, I must say, that the bad institutions of the colony have, in my opinion, rendered the leaders of the French deplorably deficient. That a race, which felt itself thus superior in political activity and intelligence, should submit with patience to the rule of a majority which it could not respect, was impossible. At what time and from what particular cause the hostility between such a majority and such a minority, which was sure sooner or later to break out, actually became of paramount importance, it is difficult to say. The hostility between the Assembly and the British government had long given a tendency to attacks, on the part of the popular leaders, on the nation to which that government belonged. It is said that the appeals to the national pride and animosities of the French, became more direct and general on the occasion of the abortive attempt to re-unite Upper and Lower Canada in 1822, which the leaders of the Assembly viewed or represented as a blow aimed at the institutions of their province. The anger of the English was excited by the denunciations of themselves, which, subsequently to this period, they were in the habit of hearing. They had possibly some little sympathy with the members of the provincial government of their own race; and their feelings were, probably, yet more strongly excited in favour of the connection of the colony with Great Britain, which the proceedings of the Assembly appeared to endanger. But the abuses existing under the provincial government, gave such inducements to remain in opposition to it, that the representatives of each race continued for a long time to act together against it. And as the bulk of the English population in the townships, and on the Ottawa, were brought into very little personal contact with the French, I am inclined to think that it might have been some time longer, ere the disputes of origin would have assumed an importance paramount to all others, had not the Assembly come into collision with the whole English population, by its policy with respect to internal improvements, and to the old and defective laws, which operated as a bar to the alienation of land, and to the formation of associations for commercial purposes.

The English population, an immigrant and enterprising population, looked on the American provinces as a vast field for settlement and speculation, and in the common spirit of the Anglo-Saxon inhabitants of that continent, regarded it as the chief business of the government, to promote, by all possible use of its legislative and administrative powers, the increase of population and the accumulation of property; they found the laws of real property exceedingly adverse to the easy alienation of land, which is, in a new country, absolutely essential to its settlement and improvement; they found the greatest deficiency in the internal communications of the country, and the utter want of local self-government rendered it necessary for them to apply to the Assembly for every road or bridge, or other public work that was needed; they wished to form themselves into companies for the establishment of banks, and the construction of rail-roads and canals, and to obtain the powers necessary for the completion of such works with funds of their own. And as the first requisite for the improvement of the country, they desired that a large proportion of the revenue should be applied to the completion of that great series of public works by which it was proposed to render the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa navigable throughout their whole extent.

Without going so far as to accuse the Assembly of a deliberate design to check the settlement and improvement of Lower Canada, it cannot be denied that they looked with considerable jealousy and dislike on the increase and prosperity of what they regarded as a foreign and hostile race; they looked on the province as the patrimony of their own race; they viewed it not as a country to be settled, but as one already settled; and instead of legislating in the American spirit, and first providing for the future population of the province, their primary care was, in the spirit of legislation which prevails in the old world, to guard the interests and feelings of the present race of inhabitants, to whom they considered the new comers as subordinate; they refused to increase the burthens of the country by imposing taxes to meet the expenditure required for improvement, and they also refused to direct to that object any of the funds previously devoted to other purposes. The improvement of the harbour of Montreal was suspended, from a political antipathy to a leading English merchant who had been the most active of the commissioners, and by whom it had been conducted with the most admirable success. It is but just to say, that some of the works which the Assembly authorised and encouraged, were undertaken on a scale of due moderation, and satisfactorily perfected and brought into operation. Others, especially the great communications which I have mentioned above, the Assembly showed a great reluctance to promote or even to permit. It is true that there was considerable foundation for their objections to the plan on which the Legislature of Upper Canada had commenced some of these works, and to the mode in which it had carried them on; but the English complained that instead of profiting by the experience which they might have derived from this source, the Assembly seemed only to make its objections a pretext for doing nothing. The applications for banks, rail-roads, and canals, were laid on one side, until some general measures could be adopted with regard to such undertakings; but the general measures thus promised were never passed, and the particular enterprises in question were prevented. The adoption of a registry was refused on the alleged ground of its inconsistency with the French institutions of the province, and no measure to attain this desirable end, in a less obnoxious mode, was prepared by the leaders of the Assembly. The feudal tenure was supported, as a mild and just provision for the settlement of a new country; a kind of assurance given by a committee of the Assembly, that some steps should be taken to remove the most injurious incidents of the seigniorial tenure produced no practical results; and the enterprises of the English were still thwarted by the obnoxious laws of the country. In all these decisions of the Assembly, in its discussions, and in the apparent motives of its conduct, the English population perceived traces of a desire to repress the influx and the success of their race. A measure for imposing a tax on emigrants, though recommended by the home government, and warranted by the policy of those neighbouring states, which give the greatest encouragement to immigration, was argued on such grounds in the Assembly, that it was not unjustly regarded as indicative of an intention to exclude any further accession to the English population; and the industry of the English was thus retarded by this conduct of the Assembly. Some districts, particularly that of the eastern townships, where the French race has no footing, were seriously injured by the refusal of necessary improvements; and the English inhabitants generally regarded the policy of the Assembly as a plan for preventing any further emigration to the province, of stopping the growth of English wealth, and of rendering precarious the English property already invested or acquired in Lower Canada.

The Assembly, of which they thus complained, and of which they entertained apprehensions so serious, was at the same time in collision with the executive government. The party in power, and which, by means of the Legislative Council, kept the Assembly in check, gladly availed itself of the discontents of this powerful and energetic minority, offered its protection, and undertook the furtherance of its views; and thus was cemented the singular alliance between the English population and the colonial officials, who combined from perfectly different motives, and with perfectly different objects, against a common enemy. The English desired reform and liberal measures from the Assembly, which refused them, while it was urging other reforms and demanding other liberal measures from the executive government. The Assembly complained of the oppressive power of the executive; the English complained that they, a minority, suffered under the oppressive use to which power was turned by the French majority. Thus a bold and intelligent democracy was impelled, by its impatience for liberal measures, joined to its national antipathies, to make common cause with a government which was at issue with the majority on the question of popular rights. The actual conflict commenced by a collision between the executive and the French majority; and as the English population rallied round the government, supported its pretensions, and designated themselves by the appellation of "loyal," the causes of quarrel were naturally supposed to be much more simple than they really were; and the extent of the division which existed among the inhabitants of Lower Canada, the number and nature of the combatants arrayed on each side, and the irremediable nature of the dispute, were concealed from the public view.

The treasonable attempt of the French party to carry its political objects into effect by an appeal to arms, brought these hostile races into general and armed collision. I will not dwell on the melancholy scenes exhibited in the progress of the contest, or the fierce passions which held an unchecked sway during the insurrection, or immediately after its suppression. It is not difficult to conceive how greatly the evils, which I have described as previously existing, have been aggravated by the war; how terror and revenge nourished, in each portion of the population, a bitter and irreconcilable hatred to each other, and to the institutions of the country. The French population, who had for some time exercised a great and increasing power through the medium of the House of Assembly, found their hopes unexpectedly prostrated in the dust. The physical force which they had vaunted was called into action, and proved to be utterly inefficient. The hope of recovering their previous ascendancy under a constitution similar to that suspended, almost ceased to exist. Removed from all actual share in the government of the country, they brood in silence over the memory of their fallen countrymen, of their burnt villages, of their ruined property, of their extinguished ascendancy, and of their humbled nationality. To the government and the English they ascribe these wrongs, and nourish against both an indiscriminating and eternal animosity. Nor have the English inhabitants forgotten in their triumph the terror with which they suddenly saw themselves surrounded by an insurgent majority, and the incidents which alone appeared to save them from the unchecked domination of the antagonists. They find themselves still a minority in the midst of a hostile and organized people; apprehensions of secret conspiracies and sanguinary designs haunt them unceasingly, and their only hope of safety is supposed to rest on systematically terrifying and disabling the French, and in preventing a majority of that race from ever again being predominant in any portion of the Legislature of that province. I describe in strong terms the feelings which appear to me to animate each portion of the population; and the picture which I draw represents a state of things so little familiar to the personal experience of the people of this country, that many will probably regard it as the work of mere imagination; but I feel confident that the accuracy and moderation of my description will be acknowledged by all who have seen the state of society in Lower Canada during the last year. Nor do I exaggerate the inevitable constancy any more than the intensity of this animosity. Never again will the present generation of French Canadians yield a loyal submission to a British government; never again will the British population tolerate the authority of a House of Assembly, in which the French shall possess or even approximate to a majority.

Nor is it simply the working of representative government which is placed out of question, by the present disposition of the two races; every institution which requires for its efficiency a confidence in the mass of the people, or co-operation between its classes, is practically in abeyance in Lower Canada. The militia, on which the main defence of the province against external enemies, and the discharge of many of the functions of internal police have hitherto depended, is completely disorganized. A muster of that force would, in some districts, be the occasion for quarrels between the races, and in the greater part of the country the attempting to arm or employ it would be merely arming the enemies of the government. The course of justice is entirely obstructed by the same cause; a just decision in any political case is not to be relied upon; even the judicial bench is, in the opinion of both races, divided into two hostile sections of French and English, from neither of whom is justice expected by the mass of the hostile party. The partiality of grand and petty juries is a matter of certainty; each race relies on the vote of its countrymen to save it harmless from the law, and the mode of challenging allows of such an exclusion of the hostile party, that the French offender may make sure of, and the English hope for, a favourable jury, and a consequent acquittal. This state of things, and the consequent impunity of political offences, are distinctly admitted by both sides. The trial of the murderers of Chartrand has placed this disposition of the French jurors in a most glaring light; the notes of the Chief Justice in this case were transmitted by me to the Secretary of State; and a perusal of them will satisfy every candid and well-ordered mind that a base and cruel assassination, committed without a single circumstance of provocation or palliation, was brought home by evidence which no man ever pretended to doubt, against the prisoners, whom the jury nevertheless acquitted. The duty of giving this dishonest verdict had been most assiduously and shamefully inculcated by the French press before the trial came on; the jurors are said to have been kept for some time previous in the hands of zealous partisans, whose business it was not only to influence their inclination, but to stimulate their courage; the array of the leaders of the party, who were present at the trial, was supposed to be collected for the same purpose; and it is notorious that the acquittal was celebrated at public entertainments, to which the jurors were invited in order that they might be thanked for their verdict.

But the influence of this animosity does not obstruct the course of justice in political cases alone. An example of obstruction of ordinary criminal justice lately occurred at Quebec. A person had been, during a previous term, indicted and tried for some offence seriously affecting his moral character. The charge had been supported by a witness whom the jury considered perjured, and the accused had been acquitted. Having reason to believe that the witness had been instigated by a neighbour, the acquitted person indicted this neighbour for subornation of perjury, and brought the witness, who had formerly appeared against himself, to prove the falsehood of his previous evidence, and the fact of his subornation.—The proof of subornation appears to have rested, in some particulars, too much on the unsupported evidence of this witness; the jury differed in opinion, one portion of them believing the guilt of the accused to be on the whole satisfactorily established, the other refusing to believe that part of the case which depended solely on the evidence of a man who came into court to swear to the fact of his own previous perjury. This was a difference of opinion which might naturally divide a jury; but as all the parties were French, and as there is nothing in the circumstances which marks this as a case in which feelings of politics or origin could be supposed to operate, it will, I imagine, appear singular that the jury, being composed nearly equally of French and English, all the French were on one side, all the English on the other. After long discussion the jury came into court, and declared their inability to agree; and the foreman, on being told by the Judge that they must agree, answered, that they were an equal number of French and English, and consequently never could agree. In the end they did not, and after being locked up for twelve hours, they were discharged without giving a verdict; so that even in a case in which no question of party or of race is concerned, the animosity of the races, nevertheless, appears to present an insurmountable barrier to the impartial administration of justice.

In such a state of feelings the course of civil government is hopelessly suspended. No confidence can be felt in the stability of any existing institution, or the security of person and property. It cannot occasion surprise that this state of things should have destroyed the tranquility and happiness of families, that it should have depreciated the value of property, and that it should have arrested the improvement and settlement of the country. The alarming decline of the value of landed property was attested to me by some of the principal proprietors of the province. The continual and progressive decrease of the revenue, though in some degree attributable to other causes, indicates a diminution of the wealth of the country. The staple export trade of the province, the timber trade, has not suffered; but instead of exporting grain, the province is now obliged to import for its own consumption. The influx of emigrants, once so considerable, has very greatly diminished. In 1832, the number of emigrants who landed at the port of Quebec, amounted to 52,000; in 1837, it had fallen to a few more than 22,000; and in 1838, it did not amount to 5,000. Insecurity begins to be so strongly felt by the loyal inhabitants of the Seigniories, that many of them are compelled, by fear or necessity, to quit their occupations, and seek refuge in the cities. If the present state of things continue, the most enterprising and wealthy capitalists of the province will thus, in a short time, be driven from the seats of their present industry.

Nor does there appear to be the slightest chance of putting an end to this animosity during the present generation. Passions inflamed during so long a period cannot speedily be calmed. The state of education which I have previously described as placing the peasantry entirely at the mercy of agitators, the total absence of any class of persons, or any organization of authority, that could counteract this mischievous influence, and the serious decline in the district of Montreal of the influence of the clergy, concur in rendering it absolutely impossible for the government to produce any better state of feeling among the French population. It is even impossible to impress on a people so circumstanced the salutary dread of the power of Great Britain, which the presence of a large military force in the province might be expected to produce. I have been informed by witnesses so numerous and so trustworthy, that I cannot doubt the correctness of their statements, that the peasantry were generally ignorant of the large amount of force which was sent into their country last year. The newspapers that circulate among them had informed them that Great Britain had no troops to send out; that in order to produce an impression on the minds of the country people, the same regiments were marched backwards and forwards in different directions, and represented as additional arrivals from home. This explanation was promulgated among the people by the agitators of each village; and I have no doubt that the mass of the habitants really believed that the government was endeavouring to impose on them by this species of fraud. It is a population with whom authority has no means of contact or explanation. It is difficult even to ascertain what amount of influence the ancient leaders of the French party continue to possess. The name of Mr. Papineau is still cherished by the people; and the idea is current that, at the appointed time, he will return at the head of an immense army, and re-establish "La Nation Canadienne." But there is great reason to doubt whether his name be not used as a mere watchword; whether the people are not in fact running entirely counter to his counsels and policy; and whether they are not really under the guidance of separate petty agitators, who have no plan but that of a senseless and reckless determination to show in every way their hostility to the British government and English race. Their ultimate designs and hopes are equally unintelligible. Some vague expectation of absolute independence still seems to delude them. The national vanity, which is a remarkable ingredient in their character, induces many to flatter themselves with the idea of a Canadian republic; the sounder information of others has led them to perceive that a separation from Great Britain must be followed by a junction with the great confederation on their southern frontier. But they seem apparently reckless of the consequences, provided they can wreak their vengeance on the English. There is no people against which early associations and every conceivable difference of manners and opinions, have implanted in the Canadian mind a more ancient and rooted national antipathy than that which they feel against the people of the United States. Their more discerning leaders feel that their chances of preserving their nationality would be greatly diminished by an incorporation with the United States; and recent symptoms of anti-Catholic feeling in New England, well known to the Canadian population, have generated a very general belief that their religion, which even they do not accuse the British party of assailing, would find little favour or respect from their neighbours. Yet none even of these considerations weigh against their present all-absorbing hatred of the English; and I am persuaded that they would purchase vengeance and a momentary triumph, by the aid of any enemies, or submission to any yoke. This provisional but complete cessation of their ancient antipathy to the Americans is now admitted even by those who most strongly denied it during the last spring, and who then asserted that an American war would as completely unite the whole population against the common enemy, as it did in 1813. My subsequent experience leaves no doubt in my mind that the views which were contained in my despatch of the 9th of August are perfectly correct; and that an invading American army might rely on the co-operation of almost the entire French population of Lower Canada.

In the despatch above referred to I also described the state of feeling among the English population, nor can I encourage a hope that that portion of the community is at all more inclined to any settlement of the present quarrel that would leave any share of power to the hostile race. Circumstances having thrown the English into the ranks of the government, and the folly of their opponents having placed them, on the other hand, in a state of permanent collision with it, the former possess the advantage of having the force of government and the authority of the laws on their side in the present stage of the contest. Their exertions during the recent troubles have contributed to maintain the supremacy of the law and the continuance of the connection with Great Britain; but it would in my opinion be dangerous to rely on the continuance of such a state of feeling as now prevails among them, in the event of a different policy being adopted by the Imperial Government. Indeed the prevalent sentiment among them is one of anything but satisfaction with the course which has been long pursued with reference to Lower Canada by the British Legislature and Executive. The calmer view which distant spectators are enabled to take of the conduct of the two parties, and the disposition which is evinced to make a fair adjustment of the contending claims, appear iniquitous and injurious in the eyes of men who think that they alone have any claim to the favour of that government by which they alone have stood fast. They complain loudly and bitterly of the whole course pursued by the Imperial Government with respect to the quarrel of the two races, as having been founded on an utter ignorance or disregard to the real question at issue, as having fostered the mischievous pretensions of French nationality, and as having by the vacillation and inconsistency which marked it, discouraged loyalty and fomented rebellion. Every measure of clemency or even justice towards their opponents they regard with jealousy, as indicating a disposition towards that conciliatory policy which is the subject of their angry recollection; that they feel that being a minority, any return to the due course of constitutional government would again subject them to a French majority; and to this I am persuaded they would never peaceably submit. They do not hesitate to say that they will not tolerate much longer the being made the sport of parties at home, and that if the mother country forget what is due to the loyal and enterprising men of her own race, they must protect themselves. In the significant language of one of their own ablest advocates, they assert that, "Lower Canada must be English, at the expense, if necessary, of not being British."

I have in despatches of a later date than that to which I have had occasion so frequently to refer, called the attention of the home government to the growth of this alarming state of feeling among the English population. The course of the late troubles, and the assistance which the French insurgents derived from some citizens of the United States, have caused a most intense exasperation among the Canadian loyalists against the American government and people. Their papers have teemed with the most unmeasured denunciations of the good faith of the authorities, of the character and morality of the people, and of the political institutions of the United States. Yet, under this surface of hostility, it is easy to detect a strong undercurrent of an exactly contrary feeling. As the general opinion of the American people become more apparent during the course of the last year, the English of Lower Canada were surprised to find how strong, in spite of the first burst of sympathy, with a people supposed to be struggling for independence, was the real sympathy of their republican neighbours with the great objects of the minority. Without abandoning their attachment to their mother country, they have begun, as men in a state of uncertainty are apt to do, to calculate the probable consequences of a separation, if it should unfortunately occur, and be followed by an incorporation with the United States. In spite of the shock which it would occasion their feelings, they undoubtedly think that they should find some compensation in the promotion of their interests; they believe that the influx of American emigration would speedily place the English race in a majority; they talk frequently and loudly of what has occurred in Louisiana, where, by means which they utterly misrepresent, the end nevertheless of securing an English predominance over a French population, has undoubtedly been attained; they assert very confidently that the Americans would make a very speedy and decisive settlement of the pretensions of the French; and they believe that, after the first shock of an entirely new political state had been got over, they and their posterity would share in that amazing progress, and that great material prosperity which every day's experience shows them is the lot of the people of the United States. I do not believe that such a feeling has yet sapped their strong allegiance to the British Empire; but their allegiance is founded on their deep-rooted attachment to British as distinguished from French institutions. And if they find that that authority which they have maintained against its recent assailants is to be exerted in such a manner as to subject them again to what they call a French dominion, I feel perfectly confident that they would attempt to avert the result by courting, on any terms, an union with an Anglo-Saxon people.

Such is the lamentable and hazardous state of things, produced by the conflict of races, which has so long divided the province of Lower Canada, and which has assumed the formidable and irreconcilable character which I have depicted. In describing the nature of this conflict I have specified the causes in which it originated; and though I have mentioned the conduct and constitution of the colonial government, as modifying the character of the struggle, I have not attributed to political causes a state of things which would, I believe, under any political institutions, have resulted from the very composition of society. A jealousy between two races, so long habituated to regard each other with hereditary enmity, and so differing in habits, in language, and in laws, would have been inevitable under any form of government. That liberal institutions, and a prudent policy, might have changed the character of the struggle, I have no doubt—but they could not have prevented it: they could only have softened its character, and brought it more speedily to a more decisive and peaceful conclusion. Unhappily, however the system of government pursued in Lower Canada, has been based on the policy of perpetuating that very separation of the races, and encouraging these very notions of conflicting nationalities which it ought to have been the first and chief care of government to check and extinguish. From the period of the conquest to the present time, the conduct of the government has aggravated the evil; and the origin of the present extreme disorder may be found in the institutions by which the character of the colony was determined.

There are two modes by which a government may deal with a conquered territory. The first course open to it is that of respecting the rights and nationality of the actual occupants; of recognizing the existing laws, and preserving established institutions; of giving no encouragement to the influx of the conquering people—and, without attempting any change in the elements of the community, merely incorporating the province under the general authority of the central government. The second is, that of treating the conquered territory as one open to the conquerors; of encouraging their influx; of regarding the conquered race as entirely subordinate; and of endeavouring, as speedily and as rapidly as possible, to assimilate the character and institutions of its new subjects to those of the great body of its empire. In the case of an old and long-settled country—in which the land is appropriated—in which little room is left for colonization—and in which the race of the actual occupants must continue to constitute the bulk of the future population of the province—policy, as well as humanity, render the well-being of the conquered people the first care of a just government, and recommend the adoption of the first-mentioned system; but in a new and unsettled country, a provident legislator would regard, as his first object, the interests not only of the few individuals who happen at the moment to inhabit a portion of the soil, but those of that comparatively vast population by which he may reasonably expect that it will be filled; he would form his plans with a view of attracting and nourishing that future population—and he would, therefore, establish those institutions which would be most acceptable to the race by which he hoped to colonize the country. The course which I have described as best suited to an old and settled country, would have been impossible in the American continent, unless the conquering state meant to renounce the immediate use of the unsettled lands of the province; and in this case, such a course would have been additionally unadvisable—unless the British government were prepared to abandon, to the scanty population of French whom it found in Lower Canada, not merely the possession of the vast extent of rich soil which that province contains, but also the mouth of the St. Lawrence, and all the facilities for trade which the entrance of that great river commands.

In the first regulations adopted by the British government, for the settlement of the Canadas, in the proclamation of 1763, and the commission of the Governor-in-Chief of the province of Quebec, in the offers by which officers and soldiers of the British army, and settlers from the other North American provinces, were tempted to accept grants of land in the Canadas, we perceive very clear indications of an intention of adopting the second and the wiser of the two systems. Unfortunately, however, the conquest of Canada was almost immediately followed by the commencement of those discontents, which ended in the independence of the united provinces. From that period, the colonial policy of this country appears to have undergone a complete change. To prevent the further dismemberment of the empire, became the primary object with our statesmen; and an especial anxiety was exhibited, to adopt every expedient which appeared calculated to prevent the remaining North American colonies from following the example of successful revolt. Unfortunately, the distinct national character of the French inhabitants of Canada, and their ancient hostility to the people of New England, presented the easiest and most obvious line of demarcation. To isolate the inhabitants of the British from those of the revolted colonies, became the policy of the government; and the nationality of the French Canadians was therefore cultivated, as a means of perpetual and entire separation from their neighbours.* It seems also to have been considered the policy of the British government to govern its colonies by means of division; and to break them down as much as possible, into petty isolated communities—incapable of combination—and possessing no sufficient strength for individual resistance to the empire. Indications of such designs are to be found in many of the acts of the British government, with respect to the North American colonies. In 1775, instructions were sent from England, directing that all grants of land within the province of Quebec, then comprising Upper and Lower Canada, were to be made in Fief and *Seignior*y; and even the grants to the refugee loyalists; and officers and privates of the colonial corps, promised in 1786, were ordered to be made on the same tenure. In no instance was it more singularly exhibited than in the condition annexed to the grants of land in Prince Edward's island, by which it was stipulated, that the island was to be settled by "foreign protestants"—as if they were to be foreign, in order to separate them from the people of New England: and protestants, in order to keep them apart from the Canadian and Acadian catholics. It was part of the same policy to separate the French of Canada from the British emigrants—and to conciliate the former by the retention of their language, laws, and religious institutions. For this purpose, Canada was afterwards divided into two provinces: the settled portion being allotted to the French, and the unsettled being destined to become the seat of British colonization. Thus, instead of availing itself of the means which the extent and nature of the province afforded, for the gradual introduction of such an English population into its various parts as might have easily placed the

* This policy was not abandoned even at so late a period as the year 1816; as will appear by the following Despatch from Lord Bathurst to the Governor of Lower Canada:

"DOWNING STREET, July 1, 1816.

"Sir,—You are, no doubt, aware of the inquiries which have been made in the Province, as to the practicability of leaving in a state of nature that part of the frontier which lies between the Lake Champlain and Montreal; and you have, no doubt, had under your review the report of the Surveyor General, on this subject, which was enclosed in Sir Gordon Drummond's Despatch of 21st April, 1816, No. 119. With the opinion which His Majesty's Government entertains upon this subject, it cannot but be a matter of regret to think, that any settlements should have been made in the Districts of Hemmingford, Sherrington, Goodmanchester, or Hinchinbrook. But at the same time I cannot recommend the dispossession of the Settlers, at the expense which must result from the purchase of the lands which they have cleared, and the improvements which they have made upon them, unless indeed that purchase could be effected by an adequate assignment of other waste lands of the Crown in other quarters. I must confine myself, therefore, to instructing you to abstain altogether from making, hereafter, any grants in these Districts, and to use every endeavour to induce those who have received grants there, and have not yet proceeded to the cultivation of them, to accept uncleared lands in other Districts, more distant from the frontier of the United States. In some cases, where the lands have been long granted, they must, I apprehend, under the usual conditions of the grants, have become resumable by the Crown; and in such case you can have no difficulty in preventing their cultivation; and the expediency of making other grants, in lieu of those resumed, will depend upon the particular circumstances of each individual case.

"It is also very desirable that you should, as far as lies in your power, prevent the extension of roads in the direction of those particular Districts beyond the limits of that division of the Province referred to in the plan of the Surveyor General as being generally cultivated; and if any means should present themselves of letting those which have been already made, fall into decay, you will best comply with the views of His Majesty's Government, and materially contribute to the future security of the Province, by their adoption.

"I have the honour, &c.

"BATHURST.

"Lieutenant General Sir J. C. SHERBROOKE, &c."

French in a minority, the government deliberately constituted the French into a majority, and recognized and strengthened their distinct national character. Had the sounder policy of making the province English, in all its institutions, been adopted from the first, and steadily persevered in, the French would probably have been speedily outnumbered, and the beneficial operation of the free institutions of England would never have been impeded by the animosities of origin.

Not only, however, did the government adopt the unwise course of dividing Canada, and forming in one of its divisions a French community, speaking the French language, and retaining French institutions, but it did not even carry this consistently into effect; for at the same time provision was made for encouraging the emigration of English into the very province which was said to be assigned to the French. Even the French institutions were not extended over the whole of Lower Canada. The civil law of France, as a whole, and the legal provision for the catholic clergy, were limited to the portion of the country then settled by the French, and comprised in the seigniories; though some provision was made for the formation of new seigniories, almost the whole of the then unsettled portion of the province was formed into townships, in which the law of England was partially established, and the protestant religion alone endowed. Thus two populations of hostile origin and different characters were brought into juxtaposition under a common government, but under different institutions; each was taught to cherish its own language, laws and habits, and each, at the same time, if it moved beyond its original limits, was brought under different institutions, and associated with a different people. The unenterprising character of the French population, and, above all, its attachment to its church (for the enlargement of which, in proportion to the increase and diffusion of the catholic population, very inadequate provision was made,) have produced the effect of confining it within its ancient limits. But the English were attracted into the seigniories, and especially into the cities, by the facilities of commerce afforded by the great rivers. To have effectually given the policy of retaining French institutions and a French population in Lower Canada a fair chance of success, no other institutions should have been allowed, and no other race should have received any encouragement to settle therein. The province should have been set apart to be wholly French, if it was not to be rendered completely English. The attempt to encourage English emigration into a community, of which the French character was still to be preserved, was an error which planted the seeds of a contest of races in the very constitution of the colony; this was an error, I mean, even on the assumption that it was possible to exclude the English race from French Canada. But it was quite impossible to exclude the English race from any part of the North American continent. It will be acknowledged by every one who has observed the progress of Anglo-Saxon colonization in America, that sooner or later the English race was sure to predominate even numerically in Lower Canada, as they predominate already, by their superior knowledge, energy, enterprise, and wealth. The error, therefore, to which the present contest must be attributed is the vain endeavour to preserve a French Canadian nationality in the midst of Anglo-American colonies and states.

That contest has arisen by degrees. The scanty number of the English who settled in Lower Canada, during the earlier period of our possession, put out of the question any ideas of rivalry between the races. Indeed, until the popular principles of English institutions were brought effectually into operation, the paramount authority of the Government left little room for dispute among any but the few who contended for its favours. It was not until the English had established a vast trade, and accumulated considerable wealth—until a great part of the landed property of the province was vested in their hands—until a large English population was found in the cities, had scattered itself over large portions of the country, and had formed considerable communities in the townships—and not until the development of representative government had placed substantial power in the hands of the people—that that people divided itself into races, arrayed against each other in intense and enduring animosity.

The errors of the government did not cease with that to which I have attributed the origin of this animosity. The defects of the colonial constitution necessarily brought the executive government into collision with the people; and the disputes of the government and the people called into action the animosities of race; nor has the policy of the government obviated the evils inherent in the constitution of the colony, and the composition of society. It has done nothing to repair its original error, by making the province English. Occupied in a continual conflict with the Assembly, successive Governors and their councils have overlooked, in great measure, the real importance of the feud of origin; and the Imperial Government, far removed from opportunities of personal observation of the peculiar state of society, has shaped its policy so as to aggravate the disorder. In some instances it has actually conceded the mischievous pretensions of nationality, in order to evade popular claims; as in attempting to divide the Legislative Council, and the patronage of government, equally between the two races, in order to avoid the demands for an elective council and a responsible executive: sometimes it has, for a while, pursued the opposite course. A policy founded upon imperfect information, and conducted by continually changing hands, has exhibited to the colony a system of vacillation which was in fact no system at all. The alternate concessions to the contending races have only irritated both, impaired the authority of government, and, by keeping alive the hopes of a French Canadian nationality, counteracted the influences which might, ere this, have brought the quarrel to its natural and necessary termination. It is impossible to determine precisely the respective effects of the social and political causes. The struggle between the government and the Assembly has aggravated the animosities of race; and the animosities of race have rendered the political difference irreconcilable. No remedy can be efficient that does not operate upon both evils. At the root of the disorders of Lower Canada, lies the conflict of the two races which compose its population; until this is settled, no good government is practicable; for whether the political institutions be reformed or left unchanged, whether the powers of the government be entrusted to the majority or the minority, we may rest assured that while the hostility of the races continues, whichever of them is entrusted with power will use it for partial purposes.

I have described the contest between the French and English races in Lower Canada with minuteness, because it was my wish to produce a complete and general conviction of the prominent importance of that struggle, when we are taking into consideration the causes of those disorders which have so grievously afflicted the province. I have not, however, during the course of my preceding remarks, been able to avoid alluding to other causes, which have greatly contributed to occasion the existing state of things; and I have specified among these the defects of the constitution, and the errors arising out of the system of government. It is, indeed, impossible to believe that the assigned causes of the struggle between the government and the majority have had no effect, even though we may believe that they have had much less than the contending parties imagined. It is impossible to observe the great similarity of the constitutions established in all our North American Provinces, and the striking tendency of all to determine in pretty nearly the same result, without entertaining a belief that some defect in the form of government, and some erroneous principle of administration, have been common to all; the hostility of the races being probably insufficient to account for all the evils which have affected Lower Canada, inasmuch as nearly the same results have been exhibited among the homogeneous population of the other provinces. It is too evident that Lower Canada, or the two Canadas, have not alone exhibited repeated conflicts between the executive and the popular branches of the Legislature. The representative body of Upper Canada was, before the late election, hostile to the policy of the government; the most serious discontents have only recently been calmed in Prince Edward's Island and New Brunswick; the government is still, I believe, in a minority in the lower house in Nova Scotia; and the dissensions of Newfoundland are hardly less violent than those of the Canadas. It may fairly be said that the natural state of government in all these colonies is that of collision between the executive and the representative body. In all of them the administration of public affairs is habitually confided to those who do not co-operate harmoniously with the popular branch of the legislature; and the government is constantly proposing measures which the majority of the Assembly reject, and refusing its assent to bills which that body has passed.

A state of things so different from the working of any successful experiment of representative government appears to indicate a deviation from sound constitutional principles or practice. Though occasional collisions between the Crown and the House of Commons have occurred in this country since the establishment of our constitution at the revolution of 1688, they have been rare and transient. A state of frequent and lasting collisions appears almost identical with one of convulsion and anarchy; and its occurrence in any country is calculated to perplex us as to the mode in which any government can be carried on therein, without an entire evasion of popular controul. But when we examine into the system of government in these colonies, it would almost seem as if the object of those by whom it was established, had been the combining of apparently popular institutions with an utter absence of all efficient controul of the people over their rulers. Representative assemblies were established on the basis of a very wide and, in some cases, almost universal suffrage; the annual meeting of these bodies was secured by positive enactment, and their apparent attributes were locally nearly as extensive as those of the English House of Commons. At the same time the Crown almost entirely relied on its territorial resources, and on duties imposed by imperial Acts, prior to the introduction of the representative system, for carrying on the government, without securing the assent of the representative body, either to its policy, or to the persons by whom that policy was to be administered.

It was not until some years after the commencement of the present century, that the population of Lower Canada began to understand the representative system which had been extended to them, and that the Assembly evinced any inclination to make use of its powers.—Immediately, however, upon its so doing, it found how limited those powers were, and entered upon a struggle to obtain the authority which analogy pointed out as inherent in a representative assembly. Its freedom of speech immediately brought it into collision with the Governor; and the practical working of the Assembly commenced by its principal leaders being thrown into prison. In the course of time, however, the government was induced, by its necessities, to accept the Assembly's offer to raise an additional revenue by fresh taxes; and the Assembly thus acquired a certain control over the levying and appropriation of a portion of the public revenue. From that time until the final abandonment in 1832, of every portion of the reserved revenue, excepting the casual and territorial funds, an unceasing contest was carried on, in which the Assembly, making use of every power which it gained for the purpose of gaining more, acquired, step by step, an entire control over the whole revenue of the country.

I pass thus briefly over the events which have heretofore been considered the principal features of the Canadian controversy, because, as the contest has ended in the concession of the financial demands of the Assembly, and the admission by the Government of the impropriety of attempting to withhold any portion of the public revenues from its control, that contest can now be regarded as of no importance, except as accounting for the exasperation and suspicion which survived it. Nor am I inclined to think that the disputes which subsequently occurred are to be attributed entirely to the operation of mere angry feelings. A substantial cause of contest yet remained. The Assembly, after it had obtained entire control over the public revenues, still found itself deprived of all voice in the choice or even designation of the persons in whose administration of affairs it could feel confidence. All the administrative power of Government remained entirely free from its influence; and though Mr. Papineau appears by his own conduct to have deprived himself of that influence in the government which he might have acquired, I must attribute the refusal of a civil list to the determination of the Assembly not to give up its only means of subjecting the functionaries of government to any responsibility.

The powers for which the Assembly contended appear, in both instances, to be such as it was perfectly justified in demanding. It is difficult to conceive what could have been their theory or government who imagined, that in any colony of England a body invested with the name and character of a representative assembly could be deprived of any of those powers which, in the opinion of Englishmen, are inherent in a popular legislature. It was a vain delusion to imagine that by mere limitations in the constitutional Act, or an exclusive system of government, a body, strong in the consciousness of wielding the public opinion of the majority, could regard certain portions of the provincial revenues as sacred from its control, could confine itself to the mere business of making laws, and look on as a passive or indifferent spectator, while those laws were carried into effect or invaded, and the whole business of the country was conducted by men, in whose intentions or capacity it had not the slightest confidence.—Yet such was the limitation placed on the authority of the Assembly of Lower Canada; it might refuse or pass laws, vote or withhold supplies, but it could exercise no influence on the nomination of a single servant of the Crown. The Executive council, the law officers, and whatever heads of departments are known to the administrative system of the province, were placed in power, without any regard to the wishes of the people or their representatives; nor indeed are there wanting instances in which a mere hostility to the majority of the Assembly elevated the most incompetent persons to posts of honour and trust. However decidedly the Assembly might condemn the policy of the government, the persons who had advised that policy, retained their offices and their power of giving bad advice. If a law was passed after repeated conflicts, it had to be carried into effect by those who had most strenuously opposed it. The wisdom of adopting the true principle of representative government, and facilitating the management of public affairs, by entrusting it to the persons who have the confidence of the representative body, has never been recognised in the government of the North American Colonies. All the officers of government were independent of the Assembly; and that body, which had nothing to say to their appointment, was left to get on as it best might, with a set of public functionaries, whose paramount feeling may not unfairly be said to have been one of hostility to itself.

A body of holders of office thus constituted, without reference to the people or their representatives, must in fact, from the very nature of colonial Government, acquire the entire direction of the affairs of the province. A governor, arriving in a colony in which he almost invariably has had no previous acquaintance with the state of parties, or the character of individuals, is compelled to throw himself almost entirely upon those whom he finds placed in the position of his official advisers. His first acts must necessarily be performed, and his first appointments made, at their suggestion. And as these first acts and appointments give a character to his policy, he is generally brought thereby into immediate collision with the other parties in the country, and thrown into more complete dependence upon the official party and its friends. Thus, a Governor of Lower Canada has almost always been brought into collision with the Assembly, which his advisers regard as their enemy. In the course of the contest in which he was thus involved, the provocations which he received from the Assembly, and the light in which their conduct was represented by those who alone had any access to him, naturally imbued him with many of their antipathies; his position compelled him to seek the support of some party against the Assembly; and his feelings and his necessities thus combined to induce him to bestow his patronage and to shape his measures to promote the interests of the party on which he was obliged to lean. Thus, every successive year consolidated and enlarged the strength of the ruling party. Fortified by family connection, and the common interest felt by all who held, and all who desired, subordinate offices, that party was thus erected into a solid and permanent power, controlled by no responsibility, subject to no serious change, exercising over the whole government of the province an authority utterly independent of the people and its representatives, and possessing the only means of influencing either the government at home, or the colonial representative of the Crown.

This entire separation of the legislative and executive powers of a state, is the natural error of governments desirous of being free from the check of representative institutions.— Since the revolution of 1688, the stability of the English constitution has been secured by that wise principle of our government which has vested the direction of the national policy, and the distribution of patronage, in the leaders of the parliamentary majority. However partial the monarch might be to particular ministers, or however he might have personally committed himself to their policy, he has invariably been constrained to abandon both, as soon as the opinion of the people has been irrevocably pronounced against them through the medium of the House of Commons. The practice of carrying on a representative government on a different principle seems to be the rock on which continental imitations of the British constitution have invariably split; and the French revolution of 1830 was the necessary result of an attempt to uphold a ministry with which no parliament could be got to act in concert. It is difficult to understand how any English statesmen could have imagined that representative and irresponsible government could be successfully combined. There seems, indeed, to be an idea that the character of representative institutions ought to be thus modified in colonies; that it is an incident of colonial dependence, that the officers of government should be nominated by the Crown, without any reference to the wishes of the community, whose interests are entrusted to their keeping. It has never been very clearly explained what are the imperial interests, which require this complete nullification of representative government. But, if there be such a necessity, it is quite clear that a representative government in a colony must be a mockery, and a source of confusion. For those who support this system have never yet been able to devise, or to exhibit in the practical working of colonial government, any means for making so complete an abrogation of political influence palatable to the representative body. It is not difficult to apply the case to our own country. Let it be imagined that at a general election the opposition were to return 500 out of 658 members of the House of Commons, and that the whole policy of the ministry should be condemned, and every bill introduced by it rejected by this immense majority. Let it be supposed that the crown should consider it a point of honour and duty to retain a ministry so condemned and so thwarted, that repeated dissolutions should in no way increase, but should even diminish, the ministerial minority; and that the only result which could be obtained by such a development of the force of the opposition, were not the slightest change in the policy of the ministry, not the removal of a single minister, but simply the election of a speaker of the politics of the majority; and, I think, it will not be difficult to imagine the fate of such a system of government. Yet such was the system, such literally was the course of events in Lower Canada, and such its character, though not quite in degree, was the spectacle exhibited in Upper Canada, and, at one time or another, in every one of the North American colonies. To suppose that such a system would work well there, implies a belief that the French Canadians have enjoyed representative institutions for half a century, without acquiring any of the characteristics of a free people; that Englishmen renounce every political opinion and feeling when they enter a colony, or that the spirit of Anglo-Saxon freedom is utterly changed and weakened among those who are transplanted across the Atlantic.

It appears, therefore, that the opposition of the Assembly to the government was the unavoidable result of a system which stunted the popular branch of the legislature of the necessary privileges of a representative body, and produced thereby a long series of attempts on the part of that body to acquire control over the administration of the province. I say all this without reference to the ultimate aim of the Assembly, which I have before described as being the maintenance of a Canadian nationality, against the progressive intrusion of the English race. Having no responsible ministers to deal with, it entered upon that system of long inquiries by means of its committees, which brought the whole action of the executive immediately under its purview, and transgressed our notions of the proper limits of parliamentary interference. Having no influence in the choice of any public functionary, no power to procure the removal of such as were obnoxious to it merely on political grounds, and seeing almost every office of the colony filled by persons in whom it had no confidence, it entered on that vicious course of assailing its prominent opponents individually, and disqualifying them for the public service, by making them the subjects of inquiries and consequent impeachments, not always conducted with even the appearance of a due regard to justice; and when nothing else could attain its end of altering the policy or the composition of the colonial government, it had recourse to that ultima ratio of representative power to which the more prudent forbearance of the crown has never driven the House of Commons in England, and endeavoured to disable the whole machine of government by a general refusal of the supplies.

It was an unhappy consequence of the system which I have been describing, that it relieved the popular leaders of all the responsibilities of opposition. A member of opposition in this country acts and speaks with the contingency of becoming a minister constantly before his eyes, and he feels, therefore, the necessity of proposing no course, and of asserting no principles, on which he would not be prepared to conduct the government, if he were immediately offered it. But the colonial demagogue bids high for popularity, without the fear of future exposure. Hopelessly excluded from power, he expresses the wildest opinions, and appeals to the most mischievous passions of the people, without any apprehension of having his sincerity or prudence hereafter tested, by being placed in a position to carry his views into effect; and thus the prominent places in the ranks of opposition are occupied for the most part by men of strong passions, and merely declamatory powers, who think but little of reforming the abuses which serve them as topics for exciting discontent.

The collision with the executive government necessarily brought on one with the Legislative Council. The composition of this body, which has been so much the subject of discussion, both here and in the colony, must certainly be admitted to have been such as could give it no weight with the people, or with the representative body, on which it was meant to be a check. The majority was always composed of members of the party which conducted the executive government; the clerks of each council were members of the other; and in fact, the Legislative Council was practically hardly anything but a veto in the hands of public functionaries on all the acts of that popular branch of the legislature, in which they were always in a minority. This veto they used without much scruple. I am far from concurring in the censure which the Assembly and its advocates have attempted to cast on the acts of the Legislative Council. I have no hesitation in saying that many of the bills which it is most severely blamed for rejecting, were bills which it could not have passed without a dereliction of its duty to the constitution, the connection with Great Britain, and the whole English population of the colony. If there is any censure to be passed on its general conduct, it is for having confined itself to the merely negative and defensive duties of a legislative body; for having too frequently contented itself with merely defeating objectionable methods of obtaining desirable ends, without completing its duty by proposing measures, which would have achieved the good in view without the mixture of evil. The national animosities which pervaded the legislation of the Assembly, and its thorough want of legislative skill or respect for constitutional principles, rendered almost all its bills obnoxious to the objections made by the Legislative Council; and the serious evil which their enactment would have occasioned, convinces me that the colony has reason to congratulate itself on the existence of an institution which possessed and used the power of stopping a course of legislation that, if successful, would have sacrificed every British interest, and overthrown every guarantee of order and national liberty. It is not difficult for us to judge thus calmly of the respective merits of these distant parties; but it must have been a great and deep-rooted respect for the constitution and composition of the Legislative Council, that could have induced the representatives of a great majority to submit with patience to the impediment thus placed in their way by a few individuals. But the Legislative Council was neither theoretically unobjectionable, nor personally esteemed by the Assembly; its opposition appeared to that body but another form of official hostility, and it was inevitable that the Assembly should, sooner or later, make those assaults on the constitution of the Legislative Council which, by the singular want of judgment and temper with which they were conducted, ended in the destruction of the provincial constitution.

From the commencement, therefore, to the end of the disputes which mark the whole parliamentary history of Lower Canada, I look on the conduct of the Assembly as a constant warfare with the executive, for the purpose of obtaining the powers inherent in a representative body by the very nature of representative government. It was to accomplish this purpose, that it used every means in its power; but it must be censured for having, in pursuit of this object, perverted its powers of legislation, and disturbed the whole working of the constitution. It made the business of legislation, and the practical improvement of the country, subordinate to its struggle for power; and being denied its legitimate privileges, it endeavoured to extend its authority in modes totally incompatible with the principles of constitutional liberty.

One glaring attempt, which was made directly and openly, to subvert the constitution of the country, was, by passing a bill for the formal repeal of those parts of the 31st Geo. III. chap. 31. commonly called the Constitutional Act, by which the constitution and powers of the Legislative Council were established. It can hardly be supposed that the framers of this bill were unaware, or hoped to make any concealment of the obvious illegality of a measure which, commencing, as all Canadian Acts do, by a recital of the 31st Geo. III. as the foundation of the legislative authority of the Assembly, proceeded immediately to infringe some of the most important provisions of that very Statute; nor can it be supposed that the Assembly hoped really to carry into effect this extraordinary assumption of power, inasmuch as the bill could derive no legal effect from passing the Lower House, unless it should subsequently receive the assent of the very body which it purported to annihilate.

A more dangerous, because, in some measure, more effectual device for assuming unconstitutional powers, was practised by the Assembly in its attempts to evade the necessity of obtaining the assent of the other branches of the Legislature, by claiming for its own resolutions, and that, too, on points of the greatest importance, the force of laws. A remarkable instance of this was exhibited in the resolution which the Assembly passed on the rejection of a bill for vacating the seats of Members, on the acceptance of offices under the Crown; and which, in fact, and undisguisedly, purported, by its own single authority, to give effect to the provisions of the rejected bill. This resolution brought the Assembly into a long dispute with Lord Aylmer, in consequence of his refusing to issue a writ for the election of a member, in place of Mr. Mondelet, whose seat was declared vacant, in consequence of his having accepted the office of Executive Councillor. The instance in which the Assembly thus attempted to enforce this principle of disqualification, happened to be one to which it could not be considered applicable, either from analogy to the law of England, or from the apparent intent of the resolution itself; for the office which Mr. Mondelet accepted, though one of high importance and influence, was one to which no salary or emolument of any kind was attached.

But the evils resulting from such open attempts to dispense with the constitution were small, in comparison with the disturbance of the regular course of legislation, by systematic abuse of constitutional forms, for the purpose of depriving the other branches of the legislature of all real legislative authority. The custom of passing the most important laws in a temporary form, has been an ancient and extensive defect of the legislation of the North American Colonies, partially authorised by royal instructions to the Governors, but never sanctioned by the Imperial Legislature, until it was established in Lower Canada by the 1st Vict. chap. 9. It remained, however, for the Assembly of Lower Canada to reduce the practice to a regular system, in order that it might have the most important institutions of the province periodically at its mercy, and use the necessities of the government, and the community, for the purpose of extorting the concession of whatever demands it might choose to make. Objectionable in itself, on account of the uncertainty and continual changes which it tended to introduce into legislation, this system of temporary laws derived its worst character from the facilities which it afforded to the practice of "tacking" together various legislative measures; a practice not unknown to the British Constitution, and which had sometimes been found useful, because the prudence of the House of Commons has induced that body rarely to have recourse to it—but which the Legislators of Lower Canada converted into the ordinary mode of legislation. By the abuse of this practice, any branch of the Legislature had during every session the power, if it had the inclination, to make the renewal of expiring laws the means of dictating its own terms to the others: and to this end it was systematically converted by the Assembly. It adopted the custom of renewing all expiring laws, however heterogencous in their character, in one and the same bill. Having the first choice to exercise, it renewed, of course, only those Acts of which it approved, and left to the Legislative Council, and the Governors, only the alternative of rejecting such as had proved to be beneficial, or of passing such as in their opinion had proved to be mischievous. A singular instance of this occurred in 1836, with respect to the renewal of the Jury law, to which the Assembly attached great importance, and to which the Legislative Council felt a strong repugnance—on account of its having, in effect, placed the Juries entirely in the hands of the French portion of the population. In order to secure the renewal of this law, the Assembly coupled it in the same bill, by which it renewed the tolls of the Lachine Canal, calculating on the Council not venturing to defeat a measure of so much importance to the revenue as the latter, by resisting the former. The Council, however, rejected the bill; and thus the canal remained toll free for a whole season, because the two Houses differed about a Jury law.

Nor was this custom of "tacking" confined to the case of the renewal of expiring laws. A bill for the independence of the Judges was coupled with the establishment of a new tribunal for trying impeachments, and, with other provisions, to which it was known that the Crown was decidedly hostile; and thus, in the attempt to extort an objectionable concession, a most desirable guarantee for the pure administration of justice, was sacrificed.

The system thus framed, was completed by the regulations with respect to a quorum, and the use which the majority made of them. A quorum of nearly half the whole House was required for the transaction of business. Towards the end of every recent session, the majority used to break up the quorum, and disperse to their respective homes, without waiting to be prorogued, immediately after sending up a number of bills to the Council: thus leaving no means of considering or adopting any amendments which that body might make, and leaving it no option but that of rejecting or confirming, by wholesale, the measures of the Assembly.

But in describing the means by which the Assembly obtained and attempted to consolidate its power, I must not omit to direct particular attention to that which, after all, was the most effectual—and which originated in a defect common to the system of government in all the North American Colonies; it is the practice of making Parliamentary grants for local works—a system so vicious, and so productive of evil, that I believe that until it is entirely eradicated, representative government will be incapable of working well and smoothly in those colonies.

I know, indeed, of no difference in the machinery of government in the old and new world, that strikes an European more forcibly, than the apparently undue importance which the business of constructing public works appears to occupy in American legislation. In speaking of the character of a government, its merit appears to be estimated by the public works which it has carried into effect. If any individual is asked how his own legislature has acted, he will generally say what roads or bridges it has made, or neglected to make, in his own district; and if he is consulted about changes in a constitution, he seems to try their soundness by calculating whether his neighbourhood would get more and better roads and bridges under the existing or the proposed system. On examining the proceedings of a legislature, we find that a great proportion of its discussions turn on such questions; and if we look to the budget, we find that a still greater proportion of the public money is applied to these purposes. Those who reflect on the circumstances of the new world, will not find it very difficult to account for the attention there paid to what is necessarily the first business of society, and is naturally the first care of every responsible government. The provision which, in Europe, the state makes for the protection of its citizens against foreign enemies, is in America required for what a French writer has beautifully and accurately called, the "war with the wilderness." The defence of an important fortress, or the maintenance of a sufficient army or navy in exposed spots, is not more a matter of common concern to the European, than is the construction of the greater communications to the American settler; and the state, very naturally, takes on itself the making of the works, which are matters of concern to all alike.

Even the municipal institutions of the northern states of the American Union have not entirely superseded the necessity of some interference on the part of their legislatures in aid of local improvements; though the main efforts of those states have been directed to those vast undertakings which are the common concern and common glory of their citizens. In the southern states, where municipal institutions are less complete, the legislatures are in the habit of taking part more constantly and extensively in works which are properly of mere local interest; and great complaints are made of consequent corruption and mismanagement. But in the British colonies, in none of which is there any effectual system of municipal government, the evil has been carried to the greatest height, and exercises the most noxious influence. The great business of the Assemblies is, literally, parish business; the making parish roads and parish bridges. There are in none of these provinces any local bodies possessing authority to impose local assessments, for the management of local affairs. To do these things is the business of the Assembly; and to induce the Assembly to attend to the particular interests of each county, is the especial business of its county member. The surplus revenue of the province is swelled to as large an amount as possible, by cutting down the payment of public services to as low a scale as possible; and the real duties of Government are, sometimes, insufficiently provided for, in order that more may be left to be divided among the constituent bodies. "When we want a bridge, we take a judge to build it," was the quaint and forcible way in which a member of a provincial legislature described the tendency to retrench, in the most necessary departments of the public service, in order to satisfy the demands for local works. This fund is voted by the Assembly on the motion of its members; the necessity of obtaining the previous consent of the Crown to money votes never having been adopted by the Colonial Legislature from the practice of the British House of Commons. There is a perfect scramble among the whole body to get as much as possible of this fund for their respective constituents; cabals are formed, by which the different members mutually play into each other's hands; general politics are made to bear on private business, and private business on general politics; and at the close of the parliament, the member who has succeeded in securing the largest portion of the prize for his constituents, renders an easy account of his stewardship, with confident assurance of re-election.

The provincial assemblies being, as I have previously stated, in a state of permanent collision with the government, have never been in the habit of entrusting the executive with any control over these funds; and they have been wholly dispensed by commissioners named by the legislature. The assemblies do not appear to have been at all insensible to the possibility of turning this patronage to their own account. An electioneering handbill, which was circulated by the friends of government at the last dissolution in Upper Canada, exhibited, in a very strong light, the expense of the commissioners of the assembly, contrasted with those of the officers of the executive government; but the province of Nova Scotia has carried this abuse to an extent which appears almost inconceivable. According to a report presented to me by Major Head, an assistant commissioner of inquiry whom I sent to that colony, a sum of £10,000 was, during the last session, appropriated to local improvements; this sum was divided into 830 portions, and as many commissioners were appointed to expend it, giving, on an average, a commissioner for rather more than every £12, with a salary of 5s. a day, and a further remuneration of two and a half per cent. on the money expended, to be deducted out of each share.

Not only did the leaders of the Lower Canadian Assembly avail themselves of the patronage thus afforded by the large surplus revenue of the province, but they turned this system to much greater account, by using it to obtain influence over the constituencies. In a furious struggle like that which subsisted in Lower Canada, it was natural that a body wielding, with hardly any responsibility, this direct power of promoting the immediate interests of each constituency, should show some favour to that which concurred in its political views, and should exhibit its displeasure towards that which obstinately resisted the majority. But the majority of the assembly of Lower Canada is accused by its opponents of having, in the most systematic and persevering manner, employed this means of corrupting the electoral bodies. The adherents of Mr. Papineau are said to have been lavish in their promises of the benefits which they could obtain from the assembly for the county whose suffrages they solicited. By such representations the return of members of opposition politics is asserted in many instances to have been secured; and obstinate counties are alleged to have been sometimes starved into submission, by an entire withdrawal of grants, until they returned members favourable to the majority. Some of the English members who voted with Mr. Papineau excused themselves to their countrymen, by alleging that they were compelled to do so, in order to get a road or a bridge, which their constituents desired. Whether it be true or false that the abuse was ever carried to such a pitch, it is obviously one which might have been easily and safely perpetrated by a person possessing Mr. Papineau's influence in the Assembly.

But the most bold and extensive attempt for erecting a system of patronage, wholly independent of the government, was that which was, for some time, carried into effect by the grants for education made by the Assembly, and regulated by the act, which the Legislative Council has been most bitterly reproached with refusing to renew. It has been stated, as a proof of the deliberate intention of the legislative council to crush every attempt to civilize and elevate the great mass of the people, that it thus stopped at once the working of about 1,000 schools, and deprived of education no less than 40,000 scholars who were actually profiting by the means of instruction thus placed within their reach. But the reasons which induced, or rather compelled, the Legislative Council to stop this system are clearly stated, in the report of that body, which contains the most unanswerable justification of the course which it pursued. By that it appears, that the whole superintendence and patronage of these schools had, by the expired law, been vested in the hands of the county members; and that they had been allowed to manage the funds without even the semblance of sufficient accountability. The members of the Assembly had thus a patronage, in this single department, of about £25,000 per annum, an amount equal to half of the whole ordinary civil expenditure of the province. They were not slow in profiting by the occasion thus placed in their hands; and as there existed in the province no sufficient supply of competent schoolmasters and mistresses, they nevertheless immediately filled up the appointments with persons who were utterly and obviously incompetent. A great proportion of the teachers could neither read nor write. The gentleman whom I directed to enquire into the state of education in the province showed me a petition from certain schoolmasters, which had come into his hands, and the majority of the signatures were those of marksmen. These ignorant teachers could convey no useful instruction to their pupils; the utmost amount which they taught them was to say the Catechism by rote. Even within seven miles of Montreal there was a schoolmistress thus unqualified. These appointments were, as might have been expected, jobbed by the members among their political partizans; nor were the funds very honestly managed. In many cases the members were suspected or accused of misapplying them to their own use; and in the case of Beauharnois, where the seigneur, Mr. Ellice, has, in the same spirit of judicious liberality, by which his whole management of that extensive property has been marked, contributed most largely towards the education of his tenants, the school funds were proved to have been misappropriated by the county member. The whole system was a gross political abuse; and however laudable we must hold the exertions of those who really laboured to relieve their country from the reproach of being the least furnished with the means of education of any on the North American continent, the more severely must we condemn those who sacrificed this noble end, and perverted ample means to serve the purposes of party.

I know not whether to ascribe the system which was adopted for the relief of the distress periodically occurring in certain districts, to the same policy of extending the influence of the Assembly by local grants, or merely to the antiquated prejudices which seem to have pervaded many parts of the Assembly's legislation, which dictated laws against hucksters and the maintenance of foundling hospitals. No general system for the relief of destitution, no poor-law of any kind was established, and the wants of the country hardly demanded it.— But when I arrived at Quebec, I received a number of petitions from parishes situated on the lower part of the St. Lawrence, praying for relief, in consequence of the failure of the harvest. I found, on inquiry, that relief had been granted to these districts for several successive years. The cause of the calamity was obvious; it was the unsuitableness of wheat crops under the wretched system of Canadian small farming, to the severe climate of that portion of the province. By the side of the distressed parishes were large districts, in which a better system of farming, and above all, the employment of the land for pasture and green crops, had diffused the most general comfort among the agricultural population, and completely obviated the occurrence of failure or distress. There were, in the vicinity of the distressed parishes, large tracts of rich and unsettled land, available for the permanent amelioration of the condition of this suffering people; and there were valuable and extensive fisheries in the neighbourhood, which might have supported it in comfort; yet no persevering attempt had been made to provide permanent relief by encouraging the population which was thus thrown on the legislature for support, either to adopt a better system of agriculture, or to settle on other portions of the country, or to avail itself of the fisheries. The Assembly met the evil by relieving the distress in such a way as to stave off its immediate results, and ensure its recurrence. It gave food for the season of scarcity, and seed to sow a crop even of wheat as late as the 20th of June, which was, of course, to fail in its turn; for it had thus relieved the same kind of distress, in precisely the same places, for several successive years; and its policy seemed to be to pension a portion of the people to sow wheat where it would not ripen.

It is melancholy to think of the opportunities of good legislation which were sacrificed in this mere contest for power. No country in the world ever demanded from a paternal government, or patriotic representatives, more unceasing and vigorous reforms, both of its laws and its administrative system. Lower Canada had, when we received it at the conquest, two institutions, which alone preserved the semblance of order and civilization in the community—the catholic church and the militia, which was so constituted and used as partially to supply the want of better civil institutions. The beneficial influence of the catholic church has been cramped and weakened; the militia is now annihilated, and years must elapse ere it can be revived and used to any good purpose. Lower Canada remains without municipal institutions of local self-government, which are the foundations of Anglo-Saxon freedom and civilization: nor is their absence compensated by any thing like the centralization of France. The most defective judicial institutions remain unreformed. Alone, among the nations that have sprung from the French, Lower Canada remains under the unchanged civil laws of ancient France. Alone, among the nations of the American Continent, it is without a public system of education. Nor has it, in other respects, caught the spirit of American progress. While the Assembly was wasting the surplus revenues of the province in jobs for the increase of patronage, and in petty peddling in parochial business, it left untouched those vast and easy means of communication which deserved, and would have repaid the application of the provincial revenues. The state of New York made its own St. Lawrence from Lake Erie to the Hudson, while the government of Lower Canada could not achieve, or even attempt, the few miles of canal and dredging which would have rendered its mighty rivers navigable almost to their sources. The time which should have been devoted to wise legislation, was spent in a contest for power between the executive and the people, which a wise executive would have stopped at the outset, by submitting to a legitimate responsibility, and which a wise people would have ceased to press when it had virtually attained its end. This collision, and the defective constitution were, in conjunction with the quarrel of the races, the causes of the mischiefs which I have detailed. It will be a ground, I trust, of permanent congratulation, that the contest terminated in destruction of the impracticable constitution which caused the strife; nor can I conceive any course of conduct which could so effectually have destroyed the previous system of mismanagement, and cleared the ground for future improvement, as that continued stoppage of supplies which the Assembly, in its intemperance effected. It broke down at once the whole of that vicious appropriation of public funds, which was the great bane of provincial legislation, and has left the abuses of the colony so long unred, that a reforming government may hereafter work upon an unencumbered soil.

The inevitable result of the animosities of race, and of the constant collision of the different powers of the state, which I have described, was a thorough disorganization of the institutions and administrative system of the country. I do not think that I necessarily cast any stigma on my predecessors in Lower Canada, or on the uniform good intentions which the Imperial government has clearly evinced towards every class and every race in the colony, when I assert that a country which has been agitated by these social and political dissensions, has suffered under great misgovernment. The blame rests not on individuals, but on the vicious system, which has generated the manifold and deep-rooted abuses that pervade every department of the public service, and constitute the real grievances of the colony. These grievances are common to the whole people of Lower Canada; and it is not one race, or one party only, that suffers by their existence; they have hindered the prosperity, and endangered the security of all; though, unquestionably, the interests which have most materially been retarded by misgovernment, are the English. From the highest to the lowest officers of the executive government, no important department is so organized as to act vigorously and completely, throughout the province; and every duty which a government owes to its subjects is imperfectly discharged.

The defective system of administration in Lower Canada, commences at the very source of power; and the efficiency of the public service is impaired throughout, by the entire want, in the colony, of any vigorous administration of the prerogative of the crown. The fact is, that according to the present system, there is no real representative of the crown in the province: there is in it, literally, no power which originates and conducts the executive government. The governor, it is true, is said to represent the sovereign—and the authority of the crown is, to a certain extent delegated to him; but he is, in fact, a mere subordinate officer—receiving his orders from the Secretary of State—responsible to him for his conduct—and guided by his instructions. Instead of selecting a governor, with an entire confidence in his ability to use his local knowledge of the real state of affairs in the colony, in the manner which local observation and practical experience best prescribe to him, it has been the policy of the colonial department, not only at the outset to instruct a governor as to the general policy which he was to carry into effect, but to direct him, from time to time, by instructions, sometimes very precise, as to the course which he was to pursue, in every important particular of his administration. Theoretically irresponsible to the colonial legislature, the governor was, in effect, the only officer in the colony who was at all responsible: inasmuch as the Assembly, by centering their attacks on him, and making him appear the sole cause of the difficulties of the government, could occasion him so much vexation, and represent him in so unfavourable a light at home, that it frequently succeeded in imposing on him the necessity of resigning, or on the colonial minister, that of recalling him. In order to shelter himself from this responsibility, it has inevitably, and I must say very justifiably, been the policy of governors, to take care that the double responsibility shall be as light as possible—to endeavour to throw it, as much as possible, on the home government, and to do as little as possible without previously consulting the colonial minister at home, and receiving his instructions. It has, therefore, been the tendency of the local government to settle every thing by reference to the colonial department, in Downing-street. Almost every question on which it was possible to avoid, even with great inconvenience, an immediate decision, has been habitually the subject of reference; and this applies, not merely to those questions on which the local executive and legislative bodies happened to differ—wherein the reference might be taken as a kind of appeal—but to questions of a strictly local nature, on which it was next to impossible for the colonial office to have any sufficient information. It had become the habit of the colonial office to originate these questions—to entertain applications from individuals—to refer these applications to the governor—and, on his answer, to make a decision. The governor has been enabled, by this system, to shift responsibility on the colonial office: inasmuch as in every important case he was, in reality, carrying into effect the order of the authority to which he was responsible. But the real vigour of the executive has been essentially impaired—distance and delay have weakened the force of its decisions—and the colony has, in every crisis of danger, and almost every detail of management, felt the mischief of having its executive authority exercised on the other side of the Atlantic.

Nor has any thing been gained, either in effectual responsibility or sound information, by thus transferring the details of executive government to the colonial department at home. The complete and unavoidable ignorance in which the British public, and even the great body of its legislators, are, with respect to the real interests of distant communities, so entirely different from their own, produces a general indifference, which nothing but some great colonial crisis ever dispels; and responsibility to parliament, or to the public opinion of Great Britain, would, except on these great and rare occasions, be positively mischievous—if it were not impossible. The repeated changes, caused by political events at home, having no connection with colonial affairs, have left to most of the various representatives of the colonial department in parliament, too little time to acquire even an elementary knowledge of the condition of those numerous and heterogenous communities for which they have had both to administer and legislate. The persons with whom the real management of these affairs has or ought to have rested, have been the permanent but utterly irresponsible members of the office. Thus the real government of the colony has been entirely dis severed from the slight nominal responsibility which exists. Apart even from this great and primary evil of the system, the pressure of multifarious business thus thrown on the colonial office, and the repeated changes of its ostensible directors, have produced disorders in the management of public business which have occasioned serious mischief, and very great irritation. This is not my own opinion merely; for I do but repeat that of a select committee of the present House of Assembly, of Upper Canada, who, in a Report dated February 8, 1838, say—“It appears to your committee, that one of the chief causes of dissatisfaction with the administration of colonial affairs, arises from the frequent changes in the office of Secretary of State, to whom the colonial department is intrusted. Since the time the late Lord Bathurst retired from that charge in 1827, your committee believe there has not been less than eight colonial ministers, and that the policy of each successive statesman has been more or less marked by a difference from that of his predecessor. This frequency of change, in itself, almost necessarily entails two evils: first, an imperfect knowledge of the affairs of the colonies, on the part of the chief secretary, and the consequent necessity of submitting important details to the subordinate officers of the department; and, second, the want of stability and firmness in the general policy of the government—and which, of course, creates much uneasiness on the part of the governors, and other officers of the colonies, as to what measures may be approved.

“But undoubtedly,” continues the Report, “by far the greatest objection to the system is, the impossibility it occasions of any colonial minister, unaided by persons possessing local knowledge, becoming acquainted with the wants, wishes, feelings and prejudices, of the inhabitants of the colonies, during his temporary continuance in office, and of deciding satisfactorily upon the conflicting statements and claims that are brought before him. A firm, unflinching resolution to adhere to the principles of the constitution, and to maintain the just and necessary powers of the crown, would do much towards supplying the want of local information. But it would be performing more than can be reasonably expected from human sagacity, if any man or set of men, should always decide in an unexceptionable manner on subjects that have their origin thousands of miles from the seat of imperial government, where they reside, and of which they have no personal knowledge whatever; and therefore wrong may be often done to individuals, or a false view taken of some important political question, that in the end may throw a whole community into difficulty and dissension, not from the absence of the most anxious desire to do right, but from an imperfect knowledge of facts upon which to form an opinion.

“To these objections,” adds the Report, “it may be answered, that although the Chief Secretary of State retires with a change of ministers, the Under Secretaries, (or at least one of them,) and the other subordinate officers of the department, remain and hold their offices permanently—and therefore information upon all subjects can be readily imparted to the superior by the gentlemen who are thus retained; and it may be admitted, that the knowledge of this fact ought to lessen the force of the objections that rest on other grounds. But it cannot be disguised, that there is a growing impatience and unwillingness on the part of the colonists, especially in these extensive provinces, to have the measures of government, whether connected with their general system of government, legislation or patronage, controlled by persons who are utter strangers to them—not responsible, in any way, to themselves or the British parliament—and who, perhaps, being advanced to their office from length of service, or other like cause, are not regarded as competent (perhaps unjustly) to manage and direct measures which they (the colonists) deem of vital importance. Much of this feeling may be traced to pride; but it is a pride that springs from an honourable and laudable feeling—and always accompanies self-respect, true patriotism and love of country; and it therefore ought not to be disregarded, nor should any attempt be made to lessen or control it, if it were possible to do so. But the imperfection that exists in the system of colonial government that prevails in England, is rendered more apparent by the want of that confidence that ought to be reposed in the distinguished officers who, from time to time, are commissioned as governors to different colonies, than by any other fact that can be distinctly pointed out.”

I will now only point out one instance of these evils—and I select it because it is an instance occurring in relation to the most important function of the executive—namely, its exercise of the legislative prerogative of the crown, and because its existence has been admitted by the present Secretary of State for the Colonies, in his instructions to my predecessor, Lord Gosford—I mean the reservation of bills for the Royal assent. The “too frequent reservation of bills” is a “grievance,” says his Lordship, “of which my inquiries lead me to believe the reality.” And in a subsequent part of the same despatch, his Lordship admits that, owing to this cause, great mischief has been done, by the wholly unintentional delay in giving the Royal assent to some perfectly unobjectionable bills, having for their object the endowment of colleges by benevolent persons. This delay, his Lordship describes as “chiefly attributable to political events, and the consequent changes of the colonial administration at home.” I know not to what cause is to be attributed a delay, which produced, with respect to another bill, the still more serious effect of a doubt of its legality, after it had been considered and acted on as a law. This bill* was reserved; and the Royal assent was so long delayed through mere inadvertence, that when it was sent out to the colony as an act, the question was raised whether the Royal assent had been delayed beyond the two years allowed by law, and whether, having been so delayed, it was valid.

* The 9th and 10th Geo. IV, chap. 77:—The period began to run in March, 1829, and the Royal assent was not given till May, 1831.

One of the greatest of all the evils arising from this system of irresponsible government, was the mystery in which the motives and actual purposes of their rulers were hid from the colonists themselves. The most important business of government was carried on—not in open discussions or public acts—but in a secret correspondence between the governor and the secretary of state. Whenever this mystery was dispelled, it was long after the worst effects had been produced by doubts and misapprehension; and the colonies have been frequently the last to learn the things that most concerned them, by the publication of papers, on the order of the British Houses of Parliament.

The governor, thus slightly responsible, and invested with functions so ill-defined, found himself at the head of a system, in which all his advisers and subordinates had still less responsibility, and duties still less defined. Disqualified at first by want of local information, and very often, subsequently, by an entire absence of all acquaintance with the business of civil government, the governor, on his arrival in the colony, found himself under the necessity of being, in many respects, guided by the persons whom he found in office. In no country, therefore, could there be a greater necessity for a proper demarcation of the business of each public officer, and of a greater responsibility resting on each. Now, I do not at all exaggerate the real state of the case when I assert, that there is no head of any of the most important departments of public business in the colony. The limited powers of the local government in a colony necessarily obviate the necessity of any provision for some of the most important departments which elsewhere require a superintending mind. But the mere ordinary administration of justice, police, education, public works and internal communications, of finance and of trade, would require the superintendence of persons competent to advise the governor, on their own responsibility, as to the measures which should be adopted; and the additional labours which fall on the heads of such departments in other countries, in devising improvements of the system and the laws relating to each, would certainly afford additional occupation, growing out of the peculiarly defective legislation and administration of Lower Canada. Yet, of no one of these departments is there any responsible head, by whose advice the governor may safely be guided. There are some subordinate and very capable officers in each department, from whom he is, in fact, compelled to get information from time to time. But there is no one to whom he, or the public, can look for the correct management and sound decision on the policy of each of these important departments.

The real advisers of the governor have, in fact, been the Executive Council, and an institution more singularly calculated for preventing the responsibility of the acts of the government resting on any body can hardly be imagined. It is a body of which the constitution somewhat resembles that of the Privy Council: it is bound by a similar oath of secrecy; it discharges in the same manner certain anomalous judicial functions; and its "consent and advice" are required in some cases in which the observance of that form has been thought a requisite check on the exercise of particular prerogatives of the crown. But in other respects it bears a greater resemblance to a cabinet, the governor being in the habit of taking its advice on most of the important questions of his policy. But as there is no division into departments in the Council, there is no individual responsibility, and no individual superintendence. Each member of the Council takes an equal part in all the business brought before it. The power of removing members being very rarely exercised, the Council is, in fact, for the most part, composed of persons placed in it long ago; and the governor is obliged either to take the advice of persons in whom he has no confidence, or to consult only a portion of the Council. The secrecy of the proceedings adds to the irresponsibility of the body; and when the governor takes an important step, it is not known, or not authentically known, whether he has taken the advice of this Council or not, what members he has consulted, or by the advice of which of the body he has been finally guided. The responsibility of the Executive Council has been constantly demanded by the Reformers of Upper Canada, and occasionally by those of the lower province. But it is really difficult to conceive how desirable responsibility could be attained, except by altering the working of this cumbrous machine, and placing the business of the various departments of government in the hands of competent public officers.

In the ordinary course of public business in the colony, almost all matters come, in fact, before the Governor, or his immediate assistant, the civil secretary of the province. The civil secretary's office is, in fact, the one general public office in which almost every species of business originates, or through which it passes in some stage or other. The applications which every day reach this office show the singular want of proper organization in the province, and the great confusion of ideas respecting the functions of government, generated in the minds of the people. A very considerable proportion consists of requests to the governor to interfere with the course of civil justice. Every decision of subordinate officers is made matter of appeal; and no reference to the proper department satisfies the applicants, who imagine that they have a right to claim a personal investigation of every case by the governor or the civil secretary. The appeals from the past are equally numerous; and it appears to be expected that every new governor should sit in judgment on every decision of any or all of his predecessors, which happens to have dissatisfied the applicant.

But if such is the bad organization and imperfection of the system at the seat of government, it may be easily believed that the remainder of the province enjoyed no very vigorous or complete administration. In fact, beyond the walls of Quebec, all regular administration of the country appeared to cease; and there literally was hardly a single public officer of the civil government, except in Montreal and Three Rivers, to whom any order could be directed. The solicitor-general commonly resides at Montreal; and in each of the districts there is a sheriff. In the rest of the province there is no sheriff, no mayor, no constable, no superior administrative officer of any kind. There are no county, no municipal, no parochial officers, either named by the Crown, or elected by the people. There is a body of unpaid justices of the peace, whom I will describe more particularly hereafter. The officers of the militia used to be employed for purposes of police, as far as regarded the service of criminal warrants; but their services were voluntary, and not very assiduous; and the whole body is now completely disorganised. In every case in which any information was required by the government, or any service was to be performed in a remote part of the province, it was necessary either to send some one to the spot, or to find out, by enquiry at the seat of government, the name of some resident there whom it was advisable and safe to consult on the subject, or direct to do the act required. In the state of parties in the country, such a step could hardly ever be taken without trusting to very suspicious information, or delegating power to persons who would be, or be suspected of being, likely to abuse it.

This utter want of any machinery of executive government in the province is not, perhaps, more striking than might be observed in some of the most flourishing portions of the American continent. But in the greater part of the states to which I refer, the want of means at the disposal of the central executive is amply supplied by the efficiency of the municipal institutions; and even where these are wanting, or imperfect, the energy and self-governing habits of an Anglo-Saxon population enable it to combine whenever a necessity arises. But the French population of Lower Canada possesses neither such institutions nor such a character. Accustomed to rely entirely on the government, it has no power of doing anything for itself, much less of aiding the central authority.

The utter want of municipal institutions giving the people any control over their local affairs, may indeed be considered as one of the main causes of the failure of representative government, and of the bad administration of the country. If the wise example of those countries in which a free representative government has alone worked well, had been in all respects followed in Lower Canada, care would have been taken that, at the same time that a parliamentary system, based on a very extended suffrage, was introduced into the country, the people should have been entrusted with a complete control over their own local affairs, and been trained for taking their part in the concerns of the province, by their experience in the management of that local business which was most interesting and most easily intelligible to them. But the inhabitants of Lower Canada were unhappily initiated into self-government at exactly the wrong end, and those who were not trusted with the management of a parish, were enabled, by their votes, to influence the destinies of a state. During my stay in the province, I appointed a commission to enquire into its municipal institutions, and the practicability of introducing an effective and free system for the management of local affairs. The gentlemen entrusted with this enquiry had, when they were interrupted in their labours, made considerable progress towards preparing a report, which will, I hope, develop, in a full and satisfactory manner, the extent of the existing evil, and the nature of the practicable remedies.

There never has been, in fact, any institution in Lower Canada, in which any portion of the French population have been brought together for any administrative purpose, nor is there among the divisions of the country any one which has been constituted with a view to such an end. The larger divisions, called "districts," are purely judicial divisions.

The counties may be called merely parliamentary divisions; for I know of no purpose for which they appear to have been constituted, except for the election of members for the House of Assembly; and during the present suspension of representative government, they are merely arbitrary and useless geographical divisions. There are no hundreds, or corresponding sub-divisions of counties. The parishes are purely ecclesiastical divisions, and may be altered by the Catholic bishops. The only institution in the nature of local management, in which the people have any voice, is the fabrique, by which provision is made for the repairs of the Catholic churches.

The townships are inhabited entirely by a population of British and American origin; and may be said to be divisions established for surveying, rather than any other purposes. The eastern townships present a lamentable contrast in the management of all local matters to the bordering state of Vermont, in which the municipal institutions are the most complete, it is said, of any part even of New England. In any new settled districts of New England, a small number of families settling within a certain distance of each other, are immediately empowered by law to assess themselves for local purposes, and to elect local officers. The settlers in the eastern townships, many of whom are natives of New England, and all of whom can contrast the state of things on their own, with that which is to be seen on the other side of the line, have a serious and general cause of discontent in the very inferior management of all their own local concerns. The government appears even to have discouraged the American settlers from introducing their own municipal institutions by common assent. "I understood," says Mr. Richards, in a report to the Secretary of State of the Colonies, ordered by the House of Commons, to be printed in March, 1832, "that the Vermonters had crossed the line, and partially occupied several townships, bringing with them their own municipal customs; and that when the impropriety of electing their own officers was pointed out to them, they had quickly given them up, and promised to conform to those of Canada."

But the want of municipal institutions has been and is most glaringly remarkable in Quebec and Montreal. These cities were incorporated a few years ago by a temporary provincial Act, of which the renewal was rejected in 1836. Since that time these cities have been without any municipal government; and the disgraceful state of the streets, and the utter absence of lighting, are consequences which arrest the attention of all, and seriously affect the comfort and security of the inhabitants.

The worst effects of this most faulty system of general administration will be developed in the view which I shall hereafter give of the practices adopted with respect to the public lands, and the settlement of the province, but which I postpone for the present, because I purpose considering this subject with reference to all the North American Provinces. But I must here notice the mischievous results prominently exhibited in the provision which the government of Lower Canada makes for the first want of a people, the efficient administration of justice.

The law of the province and the administration of justice are, in fact, a patch-work of the results of the interference at different times of different legislative powers, each proceeding on utterly different and generally incomplete views, and each utterly regardless of the other. The law itself is a mass of incoherent and conflicting laws, part French, part English, and with a line between each very confusedly drawn. Thus, the criminal law is the criminal law of England, as it was introduced in 1774, with such modifications as have since been made by the provincial legislature, it being now disputed whether the provincial legislature had any power to make any change whatever in that law, and it not being at all clear what is the extent of the phrase "criminal law." The civil law is the ancient civil law, also modified in some, but unfortunately very few respects; and these modifications have been almost exclusively effected by acts of the British Parliament and by ordinances of the governor and council constituted under the Quebec Act. The French law of evidence prevails in all civil matters, with a special exception of "commercial" cases, in which it is provided that the English law is to be adopted; but no two lawyers agree in their definition of "commercial."

For judicial purposes, the province is divided into four superior districts, having unlimited and supreme original jurisdiction, and one inferior, with limited jurisdiction. The four superior are those of Quebec, Montreal, Three Rivers and St. Francis; the inferior, that of Gaspé.

The district of Gaspé is subordinate to that of Quebec, with some special provisions for the administration of justice within it under a particular provincial act, which expires next May. I could obtain no very satisfactory information respecting this district, except that every body appeared to be of opinion that, from its distance and scanty population, it had always met with very little attention from either the legislature or the executive government. About the administration of justice therein, I could hardly obtain any information; indeed, on one occasion, it being necessary, for some particular purpose, to ascertain the fact, inquiry was made at all the public offices at Quebec, whether or not there was any coroner for Gaspé.

It was a long time before any information could be got on this point, and it was at last in some measure cleared up, by the Accountant-General discovering an estimate for the salary of such an officer. The only positive information, therefore, that I can give respecting the present administration of justice in Gaspé is, that I received a petition from the inhabitants, praying that the act by which it is regulated might not be renewed.

Each of the courts of Quebec and Montreal has a Chief Justice, and three Puisné Judges: there is but one Judge in each of the districts of Three Rivers and St. Francis. During term time, Judges from other districts make up the bench in these two.

In all civil cases, these courts have original jurisdiction to an unlimited amount; and in spite of the immense extent of all, but particularly of the two greater districts, the parties are, in almost all cases, brought up to the chief towns for the trial of their causes.

An attempt, but of a very trifling and abortive character, has been made to introduce the English system of circuits. The Judges of these districts make circuits once a year, in order to try causes in which the disputed value is not more than £10 sterling. The limitation of the value—the introduction of small debt courts, and the consequent failure of attendance on the part of the bar during their progress—and the very insufficient time allotted for the stay at each place—have, I am informed, rendered these circuits almost useless; and even the suits which might be tried at the circuits, are generally, in preference, carried up for trial to the chief places of these districts.

There are some complaints that excessive fees are taken in the courts of Montreal and Quebec. The distribution of legal patronage is a matter of great, it is not easy to say, of how just, complaint; but the substantial evil of the administration of civil justice consists in the practical denial of it—caused by the utter inefficiency of the circuit system, and the enormous expense and delay of carrying every suit, where the value in dispute is more than £10 sterling, from the extremities of the three large and settled districts of the province, to the three district towns—in the vicious constitution of the inferior tribunals, by which it has been attempted to supply the want of an effective system, either of circuits or local courts—and in the very faulty nature of the supreme appellate jurisdiction of the province.

The minor litigation of the country is, in fact, carried on throughout these three districts in the courts of the commissioners of small causes. These courts are established in the different parishes, by the Governor, on an application made by a certain number of the parishioners, according to forms prescribed by the provincial statute, in which this institution takes its rise, and have jurisdiction over all debts not exceeding twenty-five dollars, equal to £6 5s. currency. The commissioners are appointed by the Governor, upon the recommendation of the petitioners; these are residents in the parish, and almost wholly unversed in law. The constitution of these courts is, in fact, nothing else in substance but an elective judiciary—elected under the most irregular, fraudulent, and absurd, electoral system that could possibly be devised. I cannot better illustrate this description, than by narrating simply the mode in which the appointment is, in fact, made. It is, and has for a long time been, left almost entirely in the hands of a subordinate assistant, in the civil secretary's office. This gentleman stated that he took no steps, and indeed by law he could not, until he received a petition, with the requisite number of names attached. His impression was, that these signatures were generally obtained by assiduous canvassing in the parish, generally on the part of some person who wanted the appointment of clerk, which is paid, and who took this trouble, in order to secure the nomination of commissioners from whom he expected to get the appointment. After some inquiry from any person whom this assistant secretary thought proper to consult, respecting the characters of the persons proposed, they were, almost as a matter of course, appointed. After a short time, if some other person in the district happened to acquire more popularity, and to covet the office, a petition was got up, containing charges against the occupant of the office, and praying for his removal, and the substitution of his rival. Upon most of the appointments, also, there arose long controversies respecting the politics, qualification, and character, of the candidate for office; and a removal or new appointment was always attributed to some political causes, by the newspapers of each party or race. The inquiry into the qualification of persons proposed—the investigation of the charges made—the defence urged in reply—and the distant and unsatisfactory evidence adduced in support of each—formed a large proportion of the business of the civil secretary's office. Whatever appointment was made, the government was sure to create dissatisfaction; and the administration of justice was left in the hands of incompetent men, whose appointment had been made in such a manner, as even, sometimes, to render their integrity suspicious, in the eyes, not only of those who had opposed, but also of those who had supported their nomination. I shall only add, that sometime previous to my leaving the province, I was very warmly and forcibly urged, by the highest legal authorities in the country, to abolish all these tribunals at once, on the ground that a great many of them being composed entirely of disaffected French Canadians, were busily occupied in harrasing loyal subjects, by entertaining actions against them, on account of the part they had taken in the late insurrection. There is no appeal from their decision; and it was stated that they had, in the most bare-faced inanner, given damages against loyal persons, for acts done in the discharge of their duty, and judgments by default against persons who were absent, as volunteers in the service of the Queen, and enforced their judgment by levying distresses on their property.

I must now turn from the lowest to the highest civil tribunal in the province. In a country in which the administration of justice is so imperfect in all the inferior stages, and in which two different and often conflicting systems of law are administered by judges, whose professional education and origin necessarily cause different leanings in favour of the respective systems in which each is more particularly versed, the existence of a good and available appellate jurisdiction, which may keep the law uniform and certain, is matter of much greater importance than in those countries in which the law is homogenous, and its administration by the subordinate tribunals is satisfactory. But the appellate jurisdiction of Lower Canada is vested in the Executive Council—a body established simply for political purposes—and composed of persons in great part having no legal qualifications whatever. The Executive Council sits as a Court of Appeal, four times in the year, and for the space of ten days during each session; and on these occasions the two Chief Justices of Quebec and Montreal were, ex officio, Presidents—and each in turn presided, when appeals from the other's district were heard. The laymen who were present to make up the necessary quorum of five, as a matter of course, left the whole matter to the presiding Chief Justice, except in some instances, in which party feelings or pecuniary interests are asserted to have induced the unprofessional members to attend in unusual numbers, to disregard the authority of the Chief Justice, and to pervert the law. In the general run of cases, therefore, the decision was left to the President alone: and each Chief Justice became, in consequence, the real Judge of Appeal from the whole court of the other district. It is a matter of perfect and undisputed notoriety, that this system has produced the results which ought to have been foreseen as inevitable; and that, for some time before I arrived in the province, the two Chief Justices had constantly differed in opinion upon some most important points, and had been in the habit of generally reversing each other's judgments. Not only, therefore, was the law uncertain and different in the two districts, but owing to the ultimate power of the Court of Appeal, that which was the real law of each district was that which was held not to be the law by the judges of that district. This is not merely an inference of my own; it is very clear that it was the general opinion of the profession and the public. The Court of Appeal, as re-modelled by me, at the only sitting which it held, reversed all but one of the judgments brought before it. This induced a member of the court to remark to one of the Chief Justices, that so general a reversal of the law of a very competent court below, by a tribunal so competent as the Court of Appeals then was, appeared to him utterly inexplicable: inasmuch as it could in nowise be attributed, as it was before, to the influence of a single judge. The reply of the Chief Justice was, that the matter was easily accounted for; that the system previously adopted in the Court of Appeals had rendered the decision of the court below so complete a nullity, that the parties and counsel below often would not take the trouble to enter into the real merits of their case—and that the real bearing and law of the case were, generally, most fully stated before the Court of Appeals.

As the business of the Court of Appeals was thus of great extent and importance, it became necessary that, having from political considerations altered the composition of the Executive Council, I should re-organize the Court of Appeals. I determined to do this upon the best principle that I could carry into effect, under the circumstances of the case; for, as the constitution of the Court of Appeals is prescribed by the constitutional act, I could not vest the appellate jurisdiction in any other body than the Executive Council. I called, therefore, to the Executive Council, the Chief Justice and one Puisné Judge from each of the two districts of Quebec and Montreal, and by summoning also the Judge of Three Rivers, I gave the members of the two conflicting tribunals an impartial arbiter, in the person of M. Vallière de St. Real, admitted, by universal consent, to be the ablest French lawyer in the province. But the regulations of the Executive Council, which it was supposed I could not alter in this case, required the presence of a quorum of five; and as no Judge could sit on an appeal from his own court, I had now only provided three for every appeal from the two greater districts. In order to make up the quorum, the court was therefore attended by two other Executive Councillors—one of whom, by his thorough knowledge of commercial law, and his general legal experience, was commonly admitted to have rendered essential service. I believe I may confidently say, that the decisions of this court carried far greater weight than those of any previous Court of Appeals.

The further appeal to the Privy Council, allowed in cases where the value was above £500, is, from the great delay and great expense attendant on it, hardly ever resorted to. The establishment of a good appellate jurisdiction for the whole of the North American colonies is therefore greatly desired by every province; and a competent tribunal for this purpose would spare the cost and delay of a resort to the Privy Council, and answer all the purposes proposed to be attained by the present double system of appeal.

The evils of the system of criminal justice are not so various, but from the faulty judicial division and administrative system of the province, the defects which exist in the constitution of the courts of justice are even more severely felt in this department; for, except at the principal towns of the five districts, there is not the slightest provision for criminal justice, and to these places all prisoners must be brought for trial from the most remote parts subject to their jurisdiction. Thus, from the extreme settlements on the Ottawa, where is now the great seat of the lumber trade, and of the large and wild population which it brings together, all prisoners have to be carried to a distance of two hundred miles, by bad and uncertain means of conveyance, to Montreal for trial. On the left bank of the Ottawa the law has, according to a high legal authority, no power. It was but lately that a violent mob, called Shiners, for a long time set the law at defiance, and had entirely at their mercy the large properties invested in that part of the country.

Besides those in the five places above mentioned, there are only three county gaols, one of which is in the district of Gaspé. There are no sessions held in any other than those places. At the Quebec, Montreal and Three Rivers quarter sessions there were, some years ago, professional and salaried chairmen, but the Assembly discontinued them. There are sheriffs only in the districts, and not in each county. They are named by the crown for life, and are removable at pleasure. The offices are very lucrative, and are said to have been frequently disposed of from personal or political favouritism. It is also matter of complaint, that insufficient security has been taken from those appointed to them; and many individuals have consequently sustained very serious loss from the defalcation of sheriffs.

But the most serious mischief in the administration of criminal justice, arises from the entire perversion of the institution of juries, by the political and national prejudices of the people. The trial by jury was introduced with the rest of the English criminal law. For a long time the composition of both grand and petit juries was settled by the governor, and they were at first taken from the cities, which were the chefs lieux of the district. Complaints were made that this gave an undue preponderance to the British in those cities; though, from the proportions of the population, it is not very obvious how they could thereby obtain more than an equal share. In consequence, however, of these complaints, an order was issued under the government of Sir James Kempt, directing the sheriffs to take the juries not only from the cities, but from the adjacent country, for fifteen leagues in every direction. An act was subsequently passed, commonly called "Mr. Viger's Jury Act," extending these limits to those of the district. The principle of taking the jury from the whole district, to which the jurisdiction of the court extended, is undoubtedly in conformity with the principles of English law; and Mr. Viger's act, adopting the other regulations of the English jury law, provided a fair selection of juries. But if we consider the French an entire preponderance in the juries, the practical effect of this law was to give the French an entire preponderance in the juries. This act was one of the temporary acts of the Assembly, and having expired in 1836, the Legislative Council refused to renew it. Since that period, there has been no jury law whatever. The composition of the juries has been altogether in the hands of the government; private instructions, however, have been given to the sheriff to act in conformity with Sir James Kempt's ordinance; but though he has always done so, the public have had no security for any fairness in the selection of the juries. There was no visible check on the sheriff; the public knew that he could pack a jury whenever he pleased, and supposed, as a matter of course, that an officer holding a lucrative appointment at the pleasure of government would be ready to carry into effect those unfair designs which they were always ready to attribute to the government. When I arrived in the province, the public was expecting the trials of the persons accused of participation in the late insurrection. I was on the one hand informed by the law officers of the crown and the highest judicial authorities, that not the slightest chance existed under any fair system of getting a jury that would convict any of these men, however clear the evidence of their guilt might be; and on the other side I was given to understand that the prisoners and their friends supposed that, as a matter of course, they would be tried by packed juries, and that even the most clearly innocent of them would be convicted.

It is, indeed, a lamentable fact, which must not be concealed, that there does not exist in the minds of the people of this province the slightest confidence in the administration of criminal justice; nor were the complaints, or the apparent grounds for them, confined to one party.

The French complain that the institution of both grand and petit juries have been repeatedly tampered with against them. They complain that when it has suited the interests of the government to protect persons guilty of gross offences against the French party, they have attained their end by packing the grand jury. Great excitement has long existed among the French party in consequence of a riot which took place at the election for the west ward of Montreal, in May, 1832, on which occasion the troops were called out, fired on the people, and killed three of them. An indictment was preferred against the magistrates and officers who ordered the troops to fire. It was urged by the French that the grand jury was composed almost entirely of Englishmen, that twelve out of the twenty-three were taken from the parish of Lachine, the smallest in the whole island; a selection which, they said, could hardly be attributed to mere chance, and that they were not in the usual station in life of grand jurymen. The opposite party, it must be observed, however, argued that this apparent selection of a majority of the grand jury from a single parish was a necessary result of some ill-contrived provision of Mr. Viger's jury act. The bill was thrown out, and all judicial investigation into the circumstances consequently quashed. I am merely mentioning the complaints of parties. I know not whether the preceding allegations were well founded, but there can be no doubt that such was the impression produced among the French Canadians by these proceedings, which, in their minds, completely destroyed all confidence in the administration of justice.

The French Canadians further complain that the favourable decision of a grand jury was of no avail to those who had fallen under the displeasure of the government. There are several instances in the recent history of Lower Canada, in which an attorney-general, being dissatisfied with the conduct of the grand jury in ignoring a bill, either repeated by preferred indictments for the same offence, until he obtained a grand jury which would find them, or filed ex officio informations.

Nor are the complaints of the English population of a less serious nature. They assert, unhappily on two undisputable grounds, that the Canadian grand and petit juries have invariably used their power to insure impunity to such of their countrymen as had been guilty of political offences. The case of Chartrand is not the only one in which it is generally believed that this has been done. The murderers of an Irish private soldier of the 24th Regiment, of the name of Hands, are asserted to have been saved by an equally gross violation of their oaths on the part of the jury. A respectable and intelligent member of the grand jury which sat at Montreal, in October, 1837, informed the government that nothing could be more proper than the behaviour of a great majority of the jurymen, who were French Canadians, while they were occupied with cases not connected with politics. They attended patiently to the evidence, and showed themselves well disposed to follow the opinion of the foreman, who was a magistrate of great competence; but it was added, that the instant they came to a political case, all regard for even the appearance of impartiality vanished, and they threw out the bills by acclamation, without listening to the remonstrances of the foreman.

The trial by jury is therefore at the present moment not only productive in Lower Canada of no confidence in the honest administration of the laws, but also provides impunity for every political offence.

I cannot close this account of the system of criminal justice, without making some remarks with respect to the body by which it is administered in its primary stages and minor details, to the great mass of the people of the province. I mean the magistracy; and I cannot but express my regret, that among the few institutions for the administration of justice throughout the country which have been adopted in Lower Canada from those of England, should be that of unpaid justices of the peace. I do not mean in any way to disparage the character, or depreciate the usefulness, of that most respectable body in this country. But the warmest admirer of that institution must admit that its benefits result entirely from the peculiar character of the class from which our magistracy is selected ; and that without the general education, the moral responsibility imposed by their high station in the eyes of their countrymen, the check exercised by the opinion of their own class, and of an intelligent and vigilant public, and the habits of public business, which almost every Englishman more or less acquires ; even the country gentlemen of England could not wield their legally irresponsible power as justices of the peace to the satisfaction of their countrymen. What, then, must be conceived of the working of this institution in a colony by a class over whom none of these checks exist, and whose station in life and education would alone almost universally exclude them from a similar office at home ? When we transplant the institutions of England into our colonies, we ought at least to take care beforehand that the social state of the colony should possess those peculiar materials on which alone the excellence of those institutions depends in the mother country. The body of justices of the peace scattered over the whole of Lower Canada are named by the Governor, on no very accurate information, there being no lieutenants or similar officers of counties in this, as in the Upper Province. The real property qualification required for the magistracy is so low, that in the country parts almost every one possesses it ; and it only excludes some of the most respectable persons in the cities. In the rural districts the magistrates have no clerks. The institution has become unpopular among the Canadians, owing to their general belief that the appointments have been made with party and national bias. It cannot be denied that many most respectable Canadians were long left out of the commission of the peace, without any adequate cause ; and it is still more undeniable, that most disreputable persons of both races have found their way into it, and still continue to abuse the power thus vested in them. Instances of indiscretion, of ignorance, and of party feeling, and accusations of venality, have been often adduced by each party. Whether these representations be exaggerated or not, or whether they apply to a small or to a large portion of the magistracy, it is undeniable that the greatest want of confidence in the practical working of the institution exists ; and I am therefore of opinion that, whilst this state of society continues, and, above all, in the present exasperation of parties, a small stipendiary magistracy would be much better suited to both Upper and Lower Canada.

The police of the province has always been lamentably defective. No city, from the lawless and vicious character of a great part of its population, requires a more vigilant police than Quebec. Until May, 1836, the police of this city was regulated by an act which then expired, and was not renewed, and it consisted of forty-eight watchmen, half of whom served every night for the whole town. The day police consisted of six constables, who were under no efficient control. On the expiration of this act there was no night police at all, and murders occurring in the streets, the inhabitants formed a voluntary patrol for the upper town.— Lord Gosford, in December, 1837, appointed Mr. Young inspector of police, with eight policemen under him ; a sergeant and eight men of the Volunteer Seamen's Company were placed under his order ; and another magistrate had a corporal and twelve men of the same company for the police of the lower town. Finding their force wholly insufficient, receiving daily complaints, and witnessing daily instances of disorder and neglect, and above all being much pressed to increase the police by the owners of vessels, who had no power of restraining the desertion of their crews, I ordered a regular police of thirty-two men to be organized on the plan of London police in June last. This body was further augmented in October to seventy-five ; and this number is represented to me by the inspector as by no means more than sufficient.

In Montreal, where no approach to a general system of police had been made, I directed Mr. Leclerc, who had been appointed a stipendiary magistrate by Lord Gosford, to organise a force similar to that of Quebec. The number of this is now carried, I think, as high as 100.

Throughout the rest of the province, where the functions of a police used to be discharged by the militia, that body being now disorganised, there is, in fact, no police at all. In the course of the autumn, I was informed by Mr. Young, that at St. Catharine's, forty-six miles from Quebec, a man, after notoriously committing an assault with intent to murder, was still at large a fortnight after the act ; and that no means had been found of executing a warrant issued against him by a county magistrate. As the only means of enforcing the law, Mr. Young was authorised to send policemen sworn in as special constables, the place being out of his jurisdiction ; and by them the arrest was effected. When Theller and Dodge escaped from the citadel, and were supposed to have taken the direction of the Kennebec road, no means existed of stopping their flight, except by sending the police of Quebec to the very frontier of the United States.

As there was no rural police, the same step had been taken in the case of a deserter.

In the course of the preceding account, I have already incidentally given a good many of the most important details of the provision for education made in Lower Canada. I have described the general ignorance of the people, and the abortive attempt which was made, or rather which was professed to be made, for the purpose of establishing a general system of public instruction; I have described the singular abundance of a somewhat defective education which exists for the higher classes, and which is solely in the hands of the Catholic priesthood. It only remains that I should add, that though the adults who have come from the old country are generally more or less educated, the English are hardly better off than the French, for the means of education for their children—and indeed possess scarcely any, except in the cities.

There exists at present no means of college education for protestants in the province; and the desire of obtaining general, and still more professional instruction, yearly draws a great many young men into the United States.

I can, indeed, add little to the general information possessed by the government, respecting the great deficiency of instruction, and of the means of education in this province. The commissioner whom I appointed to enquire into the state of education in the province, endeavoured very properly to make inquiries so minute and ample, that the real state of things should be laid fully open; and with this view he had, with great labour, prepared a series of questions, which he had transmitted to various persons in every parish. At the time when his labours were brought to a close, together with mine, he had received very few answers; but as it was desirable that the information which he had thus prepared the means of obtaining should not be lost, a competent person has been engaged to receive and digest the returns. Complete information respecting the state of education, and of the result of past attempts to instruct the people, will thus, before long, be laid before the government.

The inquiries of the Commissioner were calculated to inspire but slender hopes of the immediate practicability of any attempt to establish a general and sound system of education for the province. Not that the people themselves are indifferent or opposed to such a scheme. I was rejoiced to find that there existed, among the French population, a very general and deep sense of their own deficiencies in this respect: and a great desire to provide means for giving their children those advantages which had been denied to themselves. Among the English the same desire was equally felt; and I believe that the population of either origin would be willing to submit to local assessments for this purpose.

The inhabitants of the North American Continent, possessing an amount of material comfort, unknown to the peasantry of any other part of the world, are generally very sensible to the importance of education. And the noble provision which every one of the Northern States of the Union has gloried in establishing for the education of its youth, has excited a general spirit of emulation amongst the neighbouring provinces, and a desire, which will probably produce some active efforts, to improve their own educational institutions.

It is, therefore, much to be regretted, that there appear to exist obstacles to the establishment of such a general system of instruction as would supply the wants, and, I believe, meet the wishes of the entire population.

The Catholic clergy, to whose exertions the French and Irish population of Lower Canada are indebted for whatever means of education they have ever possessed, appear to be very unwilling that the state should in any way take the instruction of youth out of their hands. Nor do the clergy of some other denominations exhibit generally a less desire to give to education a sectarian character, which would be peculiarly mischievous in this province, inasmuch as its inevitable effect would be to aggravate and perpetuate the existing distinctions of origin. But as the laity of every denomination appear to be opposed to these narrow views, I feel confident that the establishment of a strong popular government in this province would very soon lead to the introduction of a liberal and general system of public education.

I am grieved to be obliged to remark, that the British Government has, since its possession of this province, done, or even attempted, nothing for the promotion of general education. Indeed the only matter in which it has appeared in connection with the subject, is one by no means creditable to it—For it has applied the Jesuits' estates, part of the property destined for purposes of education, to supply a species of fund for secret service, and for a number of years it has maintained an obstinate struggle with the Assembly, in order to continue this misappropriation.

Under the head of the hospitals, prisons, and charitable institutions of Lower Canada, I beg to refer to some valuable information collected, by my direction, by Sir John Doratt, during the exercise of his office of Inspector General of Hospitals, and Charitable and Literary Institutions, which will be found in a separate part of the appendix to this report. I regret that the pressure of more urgent subjects did not allow me time to institute into these subjects, so searching and so comprehensive an inquiry as I should have desired to make in other circumstances. But there are some points brought under my notice by Sir John Doratt, to which I think it important that the attention of your Majesty's Government should be directed without delay. I advert to the existing want of any public establishment for the reception of insane persons either in Lower or Upper Canada; to the bad state of the prisons in general, and especially the disgraceful condition of the gaol of the city of Quebec; to the defects of the quarantine station at Grosse Isle; to the low and ignorant state of the medical profession throughout the rural districts: and to the necessity of a change in the system of providing for the insane, the invalid poor, and foundlings, by payment of public moneys to convents for that purpose. It is evident that considerable abuses exist in the management of several philanthropic institutions. I have adverted, in another part of my report, to the subject of pauperism, as connected with emigration; and the evidence there cited is in some respects confirmed, by the information communicated by Sir John Doratt.

It is a subject of very just congratulation, that religious differences have hardly operated as an additional cause of dissension in Lower Canada; and that a degree of practical toleration, known in very few communities, has existed in this colony from the period of the conquest down to the present time.

The French Canadians are exclusively Catholics, and their church has been left in possession of the endowments which it had at the conquest. The right to tithe is enjoyed by their priests; but as it is limited by law to lands of which the proprietor is a Catholic, the priest loses his tithe the moment that an estate passes, by sale or otherwise, into the hands of a Protestant. This enactment, which is at variance with the true spirit of national endowments for religious purposes, has a natural tendency to render the clergy averse to the settlement of Protestants in the seigniories. But the Catholic priesthood of this province have, to a very remarkable degree, conciliated the good will of persons of all creeds; and I know of no parochial clergy in the world whose practice of all the christian virtues, and zealous discharge of their clerical duties, is more universally admitted, and has been productive of more beneficial consequences. Possessed of incomes sufficient, and even large, according to the notions entertained in the country, and enjoying the advantages of education, they have lived on terms of equality and kindness with the humblest and least instructed inhabitants of the rural districts. Intimately acquainted with the wants and characters of their neighbours, they have been the promoters and dispensers of charity, and the effectual guardians of the morals of the people; and in the general absence of any permanent institutions of civil government, the Catholic church has presented almost the only semblance of stability and organization, and furnished the only effectual support for civilization and order. The Catholic clergy of Lower Canada are entitled to this expression of my esteem, not only because it is founded on truth, but because a grateful recognition of their eminent services, in resisting the arts of the disaffected, is especially due to them from one who has administered the government of the province in these troubled times.

The constitutional act, while limiting the application of the Clergy Reserves in the townships to a Protestant clergy, made no provision for the extension of the Catholic clerical institution, in the event of the French population settling beyond the limits of the seigniories. Though I believe that some power exists, and has been in a few cases used, for the creation of new Catholic parishes, I am convinced that this absence of the means of religious instruction has been the main cause of the indisposition of the French population to seek new settlements, as the increase of their numbers pressed upon their resources. It has been rightly observed, that the religious observances of the French Canadians are so intermingled with all their business and all their amusements, that the priest and the church are with them, more than with any other people, the centres of their little communities. In order to encourage them to spread their population, and to seek for comfort and prosperity in new settlements, a wise government would have taken care to aid, in every possible way, the diffusion of their means of religious instruction.

The Protestant population of Lower Canada have been, of late, somewhat agitated by the question of the Clergy Reserves. The meaning of the ambiguous phrase "Protestant Clergy," has been discussed with great ardour in various quarters; and each disputant has displayed his ingenuity in finding reasons for a definition in accordance with his own inclination, either to the aggrandizement of his own sect, or the establishment of religious equality. Owing to the small numbers of the British population—to the endowment of the Catholic church, in most of the peopled and important districts of the colony—and, above all, to the much more formidable and extensive causes of dissension existing in the province, the dispute of the various Protestant denominations for the funds reserved for a "Protestant Clergy," has not assumed the importance which it has acquired in Upper Canada. In my account of that province, I shall give a more detailed explanation of the present position of this much-disputed question. I have reason to know, that the apprehension of measures tending to establish the predominance of a particular creed and clergy, has produced an irritation in this province, which has very nearly deprived the crown of the support of some portions of the British population, in a period of very imminent danger. I must therefore most strongly recommend, that any plan by which the question of Clergy Reserves shall be set at rest in Upper Canada, should also be extended to the lower province. The endowments of the Catholic church, and the services of its numerous and zealous parochial clergy, have been of the greatest benefit to the large body of Catholic emigrants from Ireland, who have relied much on the charitable as well as religious aid, which they have received from the priesthood. The priests have an almost unlimited influence over the lower classes of Irish; and this influence is said to have been very vigorously exerted last winter, when it was much needed, to secure the loyalty of a portion of the Irish during the troubles. The general loyalty exhibited by the Irish settlers in the Canadas, during the last winter, and the importance of maintaining it unimpaired in future times of difficulty, render it of the utmost moment that the feelings and interests of the Catholic clergy and population, should invariably meet with due consideration from the government.

Setting on one side the management of the crown lands, and the revenue derived therefrom, which will be treated of fully in another part, it is not necessary that I should, on the present occasion, enter into any detailed account of the financial system of Lower Canada, my object being merely to point out the working of the general system of government, as operating to produce the present condition of the province. I need not inquire whether its fiscal, monetary or commercial arrangements, have been in accordance with the best principles of public economy. But I have reason to believe, that improvement may be made in the mode of raising and expending the provincial revenue. During my stay in Canada, the evils of the banking and monetary systems of the province forced themselves on my attention. I am not inclined, however, to regard these evils as having been in anywise influential in causing the late disorders. I cannot regard them as indicative of any more mismanagement or error, than are observable in the measures of the best governments, with respect to questions of so much difficulty; and though the importance of finding some sufficient remedy for some of these disorders has, as I shall hereafter explain, very materially influenced my views of the general plan to be adopted for the government of this and the other North American colonies, I regard the better regulation of the financial and monetary system of the province as a matter to be settled by the local government, when established on a permanent basis.

With the exception of the small amount now derived from the casual and territorial funds, the public revenue of Lower Canada is derived from duties imposed, partly by imperial, and partly by provincial statutes. These duties are, in a great proportion, levied upon articles imported into the colony from Great Britain and foreign countries; they are collected at the principal ports by officers of the imperial customs.

The amount of the revenue has within the last four years diminished from about £150,000 to little more than £100,000 per annum. The diminution is ascribed principally to the decreased consumption of spirituous liquors, & some other articles of foreign import, in consequence of the growth of native manufactures of such articles. Nevertheless, as the permanent expenditure of the civil government only amounts to about £60,000 a year, there remains still a considerable surplus to be disposed of for local purposes, in the mischievous manner which I have described in the preceding pages. A vigorous and efficient government would find the whole revenue hardly adequate to its necessities; but in the present state of things, I consider the existence and application of this surplus revenue as so prejudicial, that I should, as the less of two evils, recommend a reduction of the duties levied, were it possible to do this without an equal diminution of the revenue of Upper Canada, which can by no means afford it.

The financial relations between these two provinces are a source of great and increasing disputes. The greater part, almost the whole, of the imports of Upper Canada entering at the ports of Lower Canada, the Upper Province has urged and established its claim to a proportion of the duties levied on them. This proportion is settled, from time to time, by commissioners appointed from each province. Lower Canada now receives about three, and Upper Canada about two fifths of the whole amount; nor is this the greatest cause of dissension and dissatisfaction. The present revenue of Upper Canada being utterly inadequate to its expenditure, the only means that that province will have of paying the interest of its debt, will be by increasing its Customs' duties. But as these are almost all levied in Lower Canada, this cannot be done without raising the taxation also of the Lower Canadians, who have, as it is, a large surplus revenue. It was for the better settlement of these points of difference, that the union of the two Canadas was proposed in 1822; and the same feeling produces a great part of the anxiety now manifested for that measure by a portion of the people of Upper Canada.

A considerable revenue is raised from all these provinces by the post-office establishment common to all of them, and subordinate to the general post-office in England. The surplus revenue, which appears from a report of the House of Assembly to amount to no less than £10,000 per annum, is transmitted to England. The Assembly made it a matter of great complaint that, an important internal public institution of the provinces should be entirely regulated and administered by the rulers and servants of an English public office, and that so large an amount of revenue, raised entirely without the consent of the colonies, in a manner not at all free from objections, should be transmitted to the mother country.* I cannot but say that there is great justice in these complaints, and I am decidedly of opinion that if any plan of an united government of these provinces should be adopted, the control and revenue of the post-office should be given up to the colony.

For the reasons I have before explained, there is hardly the semblance of direct taxation in Lower Canada for general and local purposes. This immunity from taxation has been sometimes spoken of as a great privilege of the people of Lower Canada, and a great proof of the justice and benevolence of their government. The description which I have given of the singularly defective provision made for the discharge of the most important duties of both the general and the local government will, I think, make it appear that this apparent saving of the pockets of the people, has been caused by their privation of many of the institutions which every civilized community ought to possess. A people can hardly be congratulated on having had at little cost a rude and imperfect administration of justice, hardly the semblance of police, no public provision for education, no lighting, and bad pavements in its cities, and means of communication so imperfect, that the loss of time, and wear and tear caused in taking any article to market, may probably be estimated at ten times the expence of good roads.— If the Lower Canadians had been subjected, or rather had been taught to subject themselves, to a much greater amount of taxation, they would probably at this time have been a much wealthier, a much better governed, a much more civilized, and a much more contented people.

UPPER CANADA.

The information which I have to give respecting the state of Upper Canada not having been acquired in the course of my actual administration of the government of that province, will necessarily be much less ample and detailed than that which I have laid before your Majesty respecting Lower Canada. My object will be to point out the principal causes to which a general observation of the province induces me to attribute the late troubles; and even this task will be performed with comparative ease and brevity, inasmuch as I am spared the labour of much explanation and proof, by being able to refer to the details which I have given, and the principles which I have laid down, in describing the institutions of the Lower Province.

At first sight it appears much more difficult to form an accurate idea of the state of Upper, than of Lower Canada. The visible and broad line of demarcation which separates parties by the distinctive characters of race, happily has no existence in the Upper Province. The quarrel is one of an entirely English, if not British, population. Like all such quarrels, it has, in fact, created not two, but several parties; each of which has some objects in common with some one of those to which it is opposed. They differ on one point and agree on another; the sections which unite together one day, are strongly opposed the next; and the very party which acts as one against a common opponent, is in truth composed of divisions seeking utterly different or incompatible objects. It is very difficult to make out from the avowals of parties the real objects of their struggles, and still less easy is it to discover any cause of such importance as would account for its uniting any large mass of the people in an attempt to overthrow, by forcible means, the existing form of government.

*“ The privilege of franking, possessed by a few public officers in this province, is of a singular kind. For, as it is necessary for the public service that such a privilege should be exercised, and as the English Office accords no immunities to the functionaries of a Colonial Government, the postage is charged on all franked letters, and the provincial treasury has to pay the amount over to the post office. This, in fact, destroys in a great measure the utility of the privilege for public purposes; because public officers are unwilling to use the post for their communications, when their doing so diminishes the revenues of the province.

The peculiar geographical character of the province greatly increases the difficulty of obtaining very accurate information. Its inhabitants scattered along an extensive frontier, with very imperfect means of communication, and a limited and partial commerce, have, apparently, no unity of interest or opinion. The province has no great centre with which all the separate parts are connected, and which they are accustomed to follow in sentiment and action; nor is there that habitual intercourse between the inhabitants of different parts of the country, which, by diffusing through all a knowledge of the opinions and interests of each, makes a people one and united, in spite of extent of territory and dispersion of population. Instead of this, there are many petty local centres, the sentiments and the interests (or at least what are fancied to be so) of which are distinct, and perhaps opposed. It has been stated to me by intelligent persons from England, who had travelled through the province for purposes of business, that this isolation of the different districts from each other was strikingly apparent in all attempts to acquire information in one district respecting the agricultural and commercial character of another; and that not only were very gross attempts made to deceive an inquirer on these points, but that even the information which had been given in a spirit of perfect good faith, generally turned out to be founded in great misapprehension. From these causes a stranger who visits any one of these local centres, or who does not visit the whole, is almost necessarily ignorant of matters, a true knowledge of which is essential to an accurate comprehension of the real position of parties, and of the political prospects of the country.

The political contest which has so long been carried on in the Assembly and the press, appears to have been one exhibiting throughout its whole course the characteristic features of the purely political part of the contest in Lower Canada; and, like that, originating in an unwise distribution of power in the constitutional system of the province. The financial disputes which so long occupied the contending parties in Lower Canada, were much more easily and wisely arranged in the upper province; and the struggle, though extending itself over a variety of questions of more or less importance, avowedly and distinctly rested on the demand for responsibility in the executive government.

In the preceding account of the working of the constitutional system in Lower Canada, I have described the effect which the irresponsibility of the real advisers of the governor had in lodging permanent authority in the hands of a powerful party, linked together not only by common party interests, but by personal ties. But in none of the North American provinces has this exhibited itself for so long a period, or to such an extent, as in Upper Canada, which has long been entirely governed by a party commonly designated through the province as the "family compact," a name not much more appropriate than party designations usually are, inasmuch as there is, in truth, very little of family connection among the persons thus united. For a long time this body of men, receiving at times, accessions to its numbers, possessed almost all the highest public offices, by means of which, and of its influence in the Executive Council, it wielded all the powers of government; it maintained influence in the Legislature by means of its predominance in the Legislative Council; and it disposed of the large number of petty posts which are in the patronage of the government all over the province. Successive governors, as they came in their turn, are said to have either submitted quietly to its influence, or, after a short and unavailing struggle, to have yielded to this well-organized party the real conduct of affairs. The bench, the magistracy, the high offices of the Episcopal church, and a great part of the legal profession, are filled by the adherents of this party; by grant or purchase they have acquired nearly the whole of the waste lands of the province; they are all-powerful in the chartered banks, and, till lately, shared among themselves almost exclusively all offices of trust and profit. The bulk of this party consists, for the most part, of native-born inhabitants of the colony, or of emigrants who settled in it before the last war with the United States; the principal members of it belong to the church of England, and the maintenance of the claims of that church has always been one of its distinguishing characteristics.

A monopoly of power so extensive and so lasting could not fail, in process of time, to excite envy, create dissatisfaction, and ultimately provoke attack; and an opposition consequently grew up in the Assembly, which assailed the ruling party, by appealing to popular principles of government—by denouncing the alleged jobbing and profusion of the official body—and by instituting inquiries into abuses, for the purpose of promoting reform, and especially economy. The question of the greatest importance, raised in the course of these disputes, was that of the disposal of the Clergy Reserves; and, though different modes of applying these lands, or rather the funds derived from them, were suggested, the reformers, or opposition, were generally very successful in their appeals to the people against the project of the tory, or official party, which was that of devoting them exclusively to the maintenance of the English Episcopal church. The reformers, by successfully agitating this and various economical questions, obtained a majority. Like almost all popular colonial parties, it managed its power with very little discretion and skill—offended a large number of the constituencies—and, being baffled by the Legislative Council, and resolutely opposed by all the personal and official influence of the official body—a dissolution again placed it in a minority in the Assembly. This turn of fortune was not confined to a single instance; for neither party has for some time possessed the majority in two successive parliaments. The present is the fifth of these alternating Houses of Assembly.

The reformers, however, at last discovered that success in the elections insured them very little practical benefit; for the official party, not being removed when it failed to command a majority in the Assembly, still continued to wield all the powers of the Executive Government—to strengthen itself by its patronage—and to influence the policy of the Colonial Governor, and the Colonial Department at home. By its secure majority in the Legislative Council, it could effectually control the legislative powers of the Assembly. It could choose its own moment for dissolving hostile assemblies: and could always insure, for those that were favourable to itself, the tenure of their seats for the full term of four years allowed by the law. Thus the reformers found that their triumph at elections could not, in any way, facilitate the progress of their views, while the executive government remained constantly in the hands of their opponents. They rightly judged that, if the higher offices and the Executive Council were always held by those who could command a majority in the Assembly, the constitution of the Legislative Council was a matter of very little moment: inasmuch as the advisers of the Governor could always take care, that its composition should be modified, so as to suit their own purposes. They concentrated their powers, therefore, for the purpose of obtaining the responsibility of the Executive Council; and I cannot help contrasting the practical good sense of the English reformers of Upper Canada, with the less prudent course of the French majority in the Assembly of Lower Canada, as exhibited in the different demands of constitutional change, most earnestly pressed by each. Both, in fact, desired the same object—namely, an extension of popular influence in the government. The Assembly of Lower Canada attacked the Legislative Council—a body, of which the constitution was certainly the most open to obvious theoretical objections on the part of all the advocates of popular institutions; but, for the same reason, most sure of finding powerful defendants at home. The reformers of Upper Canada paid little attention to the composition of the Legislative Council, and directed their exertions to obtaining such an alteration of the Executive Council as might have been obtained without any derangement of the constitutional balance of power; but they well knew, that if once they obtained possession of the Executive Council, and the higher offices of the province, the Legislative Council would soon be unable to offer any effectual resistance to their meditated reforms.

It was upon this question of the responsibility of the Executive Council, that the great struggle has, for a long time, been carried on between the official party and the reformers; for the official party, like all parties long in power, was naturally unwilling to submit itself to any such responsibility as would abridge its tenure, or cramp its exercise of authority.—Reluctant to acknowledge any responsibility to the people of the colony, this party appears to have paid a somewhat refractory and nominal submission to the Imperial Government—relying, in fact, on securing a virtual independence, by this nominal submission to the distant authority of the colonial department, or to the powers of a Governor, over whose policy they were certain, by their facilities of access, to obtain a paramount influence.

The views of the great body of reformers appear to have been limited, according to their favourite expression, to the making the colonial constitution “an exact transcript of that of Great Britain"; and they only desired that the Crown should, in Upper Canada, as at home, intrust the administration of affairs to men possessing the confidence of the Assembly. It cannot be doubted, however, that there were many of the party who wished to assimilate the institutions of the province rather to those of the United States than to those of the mother country. A few persons, chiefly of American origin, appear to have entertained these designs from the outset; but the number had at last been very much increased by the despair which many of those who started with more limited views, conceived of their being ever carried into effect, under the existing form of government.

Each party, while it possessed the ascendancy, has been accused by its opponents of having abused its power over the public funds, in those modes of local jobbing which I have described as so common in the North American colonies. This, perhaps, is to be attributed partly to the circumstances adverted to above, as increasing the difficulty of obtaining any accurate information as to the real circumstances of the province. From these causes it too often happened, that the members of the House of Assembly come to the meeting of the legislature ignorant of the real character of the general interests intrusted to their guardianship, intent only on promoting sectional objects, and anxious chiefly to secure for the county they happen to represent, or the district with which they are connected, as large a proportion as possible of any funds which the legislature may have at its disposal. In Upper Canada, however, the means of doing this were never so extensive as those possessed by the Lower Province; and the great works which the province commenced on a very extended scale, and executed in a spirit of great carelessness and profusion, have left so little surplus revenue, that this province alone, among the North American colonies, has, fortunately for itself, been compelled to establish a system of local assessments, and to leave local works, in a great measure, to the energy and means of the localities themselves. It is asserted, however, that the nature of those great works, and the manner in which they were carried on, evinced merely a regard for local interests, and a disposition to strengthen party influence. The inhabitants of the less thickly peopled districts complained, that the revenues of the province were employed in works by which only the frontier population would benefit. The money absorbed by undertakings which they described as disproportioned to the resources and to the wants of the province, would, they alleged, have sufficed to establish practicable means of communication over the whole country; and they stated, apparently not without foundation, that had this latter course been pursued, the population and the resources of the province would have been so augmented as to make the works actually undertaken both useful and profitable. The carelessness and profusion which marked the execution of these works, the management of which, it was complained, was intrusted chiefly to members of the ruling party, were also assumed to be the result of a deliberate purpose, and to be permitted, if not encouraged, in order that a few individuals might be enriched at the expense of the community. Circumstances to which I shall hereafter revert, by which the further progress of these works has been checked, and the large expenses incurred in bringing them to their present state of forwardness have been rendered unavailing, have given greater force to these complaints, and, in addition to the discontent produced by the objects of the expenditure, the governing party has been made responsible for a failure in the accomplishment of these objects, attributable to causes over which it had no control. But, to whatever extent these practices may have been carried, the course of the parliamentary contest in Upper Canada has not been marked by that singular neglect of the great duties of a legislative body, which I have remarked in the proceedings of the parliament of Lower Canada. The statute book of the Upper Province abounds with useful and well-constructed measures of reform, and presents an honourable contrast to that of the Lower Province.

While the parties were thus struggling, the operation of a cause, utterly unconnected with their disputes, suddenly raised up a very considerable third party, which began to make its appearance among the political disputants about the time the quarrel was at its height. I have said that in Upper Canada there is no animosity of races; there is nevertheless a distinction of origin, which has exercised a very important influence on the composition of parties, and appears likely, sooner or later, to become the prominent and absorbing element of political division. The official and reforming parties, which I have described, were both composed, for the most part, and were almost entirely led, by native-born Canadians, American settlers or emigrants, of a very ancient date; and as one section of this, more ancient population, possessed, so another was the only body of persons that claimed, the management of affairs, and the enjoyment of offices conferring emolument or power, until the extensive emigration from Great Britain which followed the disastrous period of 1825 and 1826, changed the state of things, by suddenly doubling the population, and introducing among the ancient disputants for power an entirely new class of persons. The new-comers, however, did not for a long time appear as a distinct party in the politics of Upper Canada. A large number of the higher class of emigrants, particularly the half-pay officers, who were induced to settle in this province, had belonged to the tory party in England, and, in conformity with their ancient predilections, naturally arrayed themselves on the side of the official party, contending with the representatives of the people. The mass of the humbler order of emigrants, accustomed in the mother country to complain of the corruption and profusion of the government, and to seek for a reform of abuses by increasing the popular influence in the representative body, arrayed themselves on the side of those who represented the people, and attacked oligarchical power and abuses; but there was still a great difference of opinion between each of the two Canadian parties, and that section of the British which for a while acted with it. Each of the Canadian parties, while it differed with the other about the tenure of political powers in the colony, desired almost the same degree of practical independence of the mother country; each felt and each betrayed in its political conduct a jealousy of the emigrants, and a wish to maintain the powers of office and the emoluments of the professions in the hands of persons born or long resident in the colony. The British, on the contrary, to whichever party they belong, appear to agree in desiring that the connexion with the mother country should be drawn closer. They differ very little among themselves, I imagine, in desiring such a change as should assimilate the government of Upper Canada, in spirit as well as in form, to the government of England, retaining an executive sufficiently powerful to curb popular excesses, and giving to the majority of the people, or to such of them as the less liberal would trust with political rights, some substantial control over the administration of affairs. But the great common object was, and is, the removal of those disqualifications to which British emigrants are subject, so that they might feel as citizens, instead of aliens, in the land of their adoption.

Such was the state of parties when Sir F. Head, on assuming the government of the colony, dismissed from the executive council some of the members who were most obnoxious to the House of Assembly, and requested three individuals to succeed them. Two of these gentlemen, Dr. Rolph and Mr. R. Baldwin, were connected with the reforming party, and the third, Mr. Dunn, was an Englishman, who had held the office of Receiver General for nearly 14 years, and up to that time had abstained from any interference in politics. These gentlemen were at first reluctant to take office, because they feared that, as there were still three of the former council left, they would be constantly maintaining a doubtful struggle for the measures which they considered necessary. They were, however, at length induced to forego their scruples, chiefly upon the representations of some of their friends, that when they had a Governor who appeared sincere in his professions of reform, and who promised them his entire confidence, it was neither generous nor prudent to persist in a refusal which might be taken to imply distrust of his sincerity, and they accordingly accepted office. Among the first acts of the Governor, after the appointment of this council, was, however, the nomination to some vacant offices of individuals, who were taken from the old official party, and this without any communication with his council. These appointments were attacked by the House of Assembly, and the new Council, finding that their opinion was never asked upon these or other matters, and that they were seemingly to be kept in ignorance of all those public measures which popular opinion, nevertheless, attributed to their advice, remonstrated privately on the subject with the Governor. Sir Francis desired them to make a formal representation to him on the subject; they did so, and this produced such a reply from him, as left them no choice but to resign. The occasion of the difference which had caused the resignation was made the subject of communication between the Governor and the Assembly, so that the whole community were informed of the grounds of the dispute.

The contest which appeared to be thus commenced on the question of the responsibility of the Executive Council was really decided on very different grounds. Sir F. Head, who appears to have thought that the maintenance of the connexion with Great Britain depended upon his triumph over the majority of the assembly, embarked in the contest with a determination to use every influence in his power in order to bring it to a successful issue. He succeeded, in fact, in putting the issue in such a light before the province, that a great portion of the people really imagined that they were called upon to decide the question of separation by their votes. The dissolution, on which he ventured when he thought the public mind sufficiently ripe, completely answered his expectations. The British, in particular, were roused by the proclaimed danger to the connexion with the mother country; they were indignant at some portions of the conduct and speeches of certain members of the late majority, which seemed to mark a determined preference of American over British institutions. They were irritated by indications of hostility to British emigration, which they saw, or fancied they saw, in some recent proceedings of the Assembly. Above all, not only they, but a great many others, had marked with envy the stupendous public works which were at that period producing their effect in the almost marvellous growth of the wealth and population of the neighbouring state of New York; and they reproached the Assembly with what they considered an unwise economy in preventing the undertaking, or even completion, of similar works, that might, as they fancied, have produced a similar development of the resources of Upper Canada. The general support of the British determined the elections in favour of the Government; and though very large and close minorities, which in many cases supported the defeated candidates, marked the force which the reformers could bring into the field, even in spite of the disadvantages under which they laboured from the momentary prejudices against them, and the unusual manner in which the Crown, by its representative, appeared to make itself a party in an electioneering contest, the result was the return of a very large majority, hostile in politics to that of the late Assembly.

It is rather singular, however, that the result which Sir F. Head appears really to have aimed at, was by no means secured by this apparent triumph. His object in all his previous measures, and in the nomination of the Executive Councillors, by whom he replaced the retiring members, was evidently to make the council a means of administrative independence for the Governor. Sir F. Head would seem to have been, at the commencement of his administration, really desirous of effecting certain reforms which he believed to be needful, and of rescuing the substantial power of the government from the hands of the party by which it had been so long monopolized. The dismissal of the old members of the Executive Council was the consequence of this intention; but, though willing to take measures for the purpose of emancipating himself from the thralldom in which it was stated that other Governors had been held, he could not acquiesce in the claims of the House of Assembly to have a really responsible colonial executive. The result of the elections was to give him, as he conceived, a House of Assembly pledged to support him, as Governor, in the exercise of the independent authority he had claimed. On the very first occasion, however, on which he attempted to protect an officer of the government, unconnected with the old official party, from charges which, whether well or ill founded, were obviously brought forward on personal grounds, he found that the new house was even more determined than its predecessor to assert its right to exercise a substantial control over the government; and that unless he was disposed to risk a collision with both branches of the legislature, then composed of similar materials, and virtually under one influence, he must succumb. Unwilling to incur this risk, when, as he justly imagined, there was no party upon whose support he could rely to bear him safely through the contest, he yielded the point. Although the committee appointed to inquire into the truth of the charges made against Mr. Hepburn refused to adopt a report confirming these charges prepared by their chairman (by whom the accusation had been brought forward, and by whom the committee was virtually nominated), Sir F. Head persuaded the individual in question to resign his office, and to take one of very inferior emolument. From that time he never attempted to assert the independence which the new House of Assembly had been elected to secure. The government consequently reverted in effect to the party which he had found in office when he assumed the governorship, and which it had been his first act to dispossess. In their hands it still remains; and I must state that it is the general opinion that, never was the power of the "family compact" so extensive or so absolute as it has been from the first meeting of the existing parliament down to the present time.

It may, indeed, be fairly said, that the real result of Sir F. Head's policy was to establish that very administrative influence of the leaders of a majority in the legislature which he had so obstinately disputed. The executive councillors of his nomination, who seem to have taken office almost on the express condition of being mere ciphers, are not, in fact then, the real government of the province. It is said that the new officers of government whom Sir F. Head appointed from without the pale of official eligibility feel more apprehension of the present house than, so far as can be judged, was ever felt by their predecessors with regard to the most violent of the reforming Houses of Assembly. Their apprehension, however, is not confined to the present house; they feel that, under no conceivable contingency, can they expect an Assembly disposed to support them; and they accordingly appear to desire such a change in the colonial system as might make them dependent upon the Imperial Government alone, and secure them against all interference from the legislature of the province, whatever party should obtain a preponderance in the Assembly.

While the nominal government thus possesses no real power, the legislature, by whose leaders the substantial power is enjoyed, by no means possesses so much of the confidence of the people as a legislature ought to command, even from those who differ from it on the questions of the day. I say this without meaning to cast any imputation on the members of the House of Assembly, because, in fact, the circumstances under which they were elected were such as to render them peculiarly objects of suspicion and reproach to a number of their countrymen. They were accused of having violated their pledges at the election. It is said that many of them came forward, and were elected, as being really reformers, though opposed to any such claims to colonial independence as might involve a separation from the mother country. There seems to be no doubt that in several places where the tories succeeded, the electors were merely desirous of returning members who would not hazard any contest with England, by the assertion of claims which, from the proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor, they believed to be practically needless; and who should support Sir F. Head in those economical reforms which the country desired far more than political changes—reforms, for the sake of which alone political changes had been sought. In a number of other instances, too, the elections were carried by the unscrupulous exercise of the influence of the government, and by a display of violence on the part of the tories, who were emboldened by the countenance afforded to them by the authorities. It was stated, but I believe without any sufficient foundation, that the government made grants of land to persons who had no title to them, in order to secure their votes. This report originated in the fact, that patents for persons who were entitled to grants, but had not taken them out, were sent down to the polling places, to be given to the individuals entitled to them, if they were disposed to vote for the government candidate. The taking such measures, in order to secure their fair right of voting to the electors, in a particular interest, must be considered rather as an act of official favouritism, than as an electoral fraud. But we cannot wonder that the defeated party put the very worst construction on acts which gave some ground for it; and they conceived, in consequence, a strong resentment against the means by which they believed that the representative of the crown had carried the elections, his interference in which in any way was stigmatised by them as a gross violation of constitutional privilege and propriety.

It cannot be matter of surprise, that such facts and such impressions produced in the country an exasperation and a despair of good government, which extended far beyond those who had actually been defeated at the poll. For there was nothing in the use which the leaders of the Assembly have made of their power to soften the discontent excited by their alleged mode of obtaining it. Many even of those who had supported the successful candidates, were disappointed in every expectation which they had formed of the policy to be pursued by their new representatives. No economical reforms were introduced. The Assembly, instead of supporting the governor, compelled his obedience to itself, and produced no change in the administration of affairs, except that of reinstating the "family compact" in power. On some topics, on which the feelings of the people were very deeply engaged, as for instance the Clergy Reserves, the Assembly is accused of having shown a disposition to act in direct defiance of the known sentiments of a vast majority of its constituents. The dissatisfaction arising from these causes was carried to its height by an act, that appeared in defiance of all constitutional right, to prolong the power of a majority which, it was supposed, counted on not being able to retain its existence after another appeal to the people. This was the passing of an act preventing the dissolution of the existing, as well as any future Assembly, on the demise of the crown. The act was passed in expectation of the approaching decease of his late Majesty; and it has, in fact, prolonged the existence of the present Assembly from the period of a single year, to one of four. It is said that this step is justified by the example of the other North American colonies. But it is certain, that it nevertheless caused very great dissatisfaction, and was regarded as an unbecoming usurpation of power.

It was the prevalence of the general dissatisfaction thus caused, that emboldened the parties who instigated the insurrection, to an attempt which may be characterised as having been as foolishly contrived and ill-conducted, as it was wicked and treasonable. This outbreak, which common prudence and good management would have prevented from coming to a head, was promptly quelled by the alacrity with which the population, and especially the British portion of it, rallied round the government. The proximity of the American frontier—the nature of the border country—and the wild and daring character, together with the periodical want of employment of its population—have, unfortunately, enabled a few desperate exiles to continue the troubles of their country, by means of the predatory gangs which have, from time to time, invaded and robbed, under the pretext of revolutionizing the province. But the general loyalty of the population has been evinced by the little disposition that has been exhibited by any portion of it to accept of the proffered aid of the refugees and foreign invaders, and by the unanimity with which all have turned out to defend their country.

It has not indeed, been exactly ascertained what proportion of the inhabitants of Upper Canada were prepared to join Mackenzie, in his treasonable enterprise, or were so disposed that we may suppose they would have arrayed themselves on his side, had he obtained any momentary success, as indeed was for some days within his grasp. Even if I were convinced that a large proportion of the population would, under any circumstances, have lent themselves to his projects, I should be inclined to attribute such a disposition merely to the irritation produced by those temporary causes of dissatisfaction with the government of the province which I have specified, and not to any settled design on the part of any great number, either to subvert existing institutions, or to change their present connection with Great Britain for a junction with the United States. I am inclined to view the insurrectionary movements which did take place as indicative of no deep-rooted disaffection—and to believe, that almost the entire body of the reformers of this province sought only, by constitutional means, to obtain those objects for which they had so long peaceably struggled, before the unhappy troubles occasioned by the violence of a few unprincipled adventurers and heated enthusiasts.

It cannot, however, be doubted, that the events of the past year have greatly increased the difficulty of settling the disorders of Upper Canada. A degree of discontent, approaching, if not amounting to disaffection, has gained considerable ground. The causes of dissatisfaction continue to act on the minds of the reformers; and their hope of redress, under the present order of things, has been seriously diminished. The exasperation caused by the conflict itself—the suspicions and terrors of that trying period—and the use made by the triumphant party of the power thrown into their hands—have heightened the passions which existed before. It certainly appeared too much as if the rebellion had been purposely invited by the government—and the unfortunate men who took part in it deliberately drawn into a trap, by those who subsequently inflicted so severe a punishment on them for their error. It seemed, too, as if the dominant party made use of the occasion afforded it by the real guilt of a few desperate and imprudent men, in order to persecute or disable the whole body of their political opponents. A great number of perfectly innocent individuals were thrown into prison, and suffered in person, property and character. The whole body of reformers were subjected to suspicion, and to harrassing proceedings, instituted by magistrates whose political leanings were notoriously adverse to them. Severe laws were passed, under colour of which, individuals very generally esteemed were punished without any form of trial.

The two persons who suffered the extreme penalty of the law unfortunately engaged a great share of the public sympathy; their pardon had been solicited in petitions signed, it is generally asserted, by no less than 30,000 of their countrymen. The rest of the prisoners were detained in confinement a considerable time. A large number of the subordinate actors in the insurrection were severely punished; and public anxiety was raised to the highest pitch, by the uncertainty respecting the fate of the others, who were, from time to time, partially released. It was not until the month of October last, that the whole of the prisoners were disposed of, and a partial amnesty proclaimed, which enabled the large numbers who had fled the country, and so long, and at such imminent hazard, hung on its frontier, to return in security to their homes. I make no mention of the reasons which, in the opinion of the local government, rendered these different steps advisable, because my object is not to discuss the propriety of its conduct, but to point out the effect which it necessarily had in augmenting irritation.

The whole party of the reformers—a party which I am inclined to estimate as very considerable, and which has commanded large majorities in different Houses of Assembly—has certainly felt itself assailed by the policy pursued. It sees the whole powers of government wielded by its enemies, and imagines that it can perceive also a determination to use these powers inflexibly against all the objects which it most values. The wounded private feelings of individuals and the defeated public policy of a party, combine to spread a wide and serious irritation; but I do not believe that this has yet proceeded so far as to induce at all, a general disposition to look to violent measures for redress. The reformers have been gradually recovering their hopes of regaining their ascendancy by constitutional means; the sudden pre-eminence which the question of the Clergy Reserves and Rectories has again assumed during the last summer, appears to have increased their influence and confidence; and I have no reason to believe, that anything can make them generally and decidedly desirous of separation, except some such act of the Imperial government as shall deprive them of all hopes of obtaining real administrative power, even in the event of their again obtaining a majority in the Assembly. With such a hope before them, I believe that they will remain in tranquil expectation of the result of the general election, which cannot be delayed beyond the summer of 1840.

To describe the character and objects of the other parties in this province would not be very easy; and their variety and complication is so great, that it would be of no great advantage were I to explain the various shades of opinion that mark each. In a very laboured essay, which was published in Toronto, during my stay in Canada, there was an attempt to classify the various parties in the province under six different heads. Some of these were classified according to strictly political opinions—some according to religion—and some according to birth-place; and each party, it was obvious, contained in its ranks a great many who would, according to the designations used, have as naturally belonged to some other.—But it is obvious, from all accounts of the different parties, that the nominal government, that is, the majority of the Executive Council, enjoy the confidence of no considerable party—and that the party called the “Family Compact,” which possesses the majority in both branches of the legislature, is, in fact, supported at present by no very large number of persons of any party. None are more hostile to them than the greater part of that large and spirited British born population, to whose steadfast exertions the preservation of the colony, during the last winter, is mainly attributable—and who see, with indignation, that a monopoly of power and profit is still retained by a small body of men, which seems bent on excluding, from any participation in it, the British emigrants. Zealously co-operating with the dominant party, in resisting treason and foreign invasion, this portion of the population, nevertheless, entertains a general distrust and dislike of them; and though many of the most prominent of the British emigrants have always acted, and still invariably act, in opposition to the reformers, and dissent from their views of responsible government, I am very much inclined to think that they, and certainly the great mass of their countrymen, really desire such a responsibility of the government, as would break up the present monopoly of office and influence.

Besides those causes of complaint, which are common to the whole of the colony, the British settlers have many peculiar to themselves. The emigrants who have settled in the country within the last ten years, are supposed to comprise half the population. They complain that while the Canadians are desirous of having British capital and labour brought into the colony, by means of which their fields may be cultivated, and the value of their unsettled possessions increased, they refuse to make the colony really attractive to British skill and British capitalists. They say that an Englishman, emigrating to Upper Canada, is practically as much an alien in that British colony, as he would be if he were to emigrate to the United States. He may equally purchase and hold lands, or invest his capital in trade, in one country as in the other, and he may in either exercise any mechanical avocation, and perform any species of manual labour. This, however, is the extent of his privileges; his English qualifications avail him little or nothing. He cannot, if a surgeon, licensed to act in England, practise without the license of a board of examiners in the province. If an attorney, he has to submit to an apprenticeship of five years, before he is allowed to practise. If a barrister, he is excluded from the profitable part of his profession; and, though allowed to practise at the bar, the permission thus accorded to him is practically of no use in a country where, as nine attorneys out of ten are barristers also, there can be no business for a mere barrister. Thus a person who has been admitted to the English bar, is compelled to serve an apprenticeship of three years to a provincial lawyer.

By an Act passed last session, difficulties are thrown in the way of the employment of capital in banking, which have a tendency to preserve the monopoly possessed by the chartered banks of the colony, in which the Canadian party are supreme—and the influence of which is said to be employed directly as an instrument for upholding the political supremacy of the party. Under the system, also, of selling land, pursued by the government, an individual does not acquire a patent for his land until he has paid the whole of the purchase-money—a period of from four to ten years, according as his purchase is a Crown or Clergy lot; and until the patent issues he has no right to vote. In some of the new states of America, on the contrary, especially in Illinois, an individual may practise as a surgeon or lawyer almost immediately on his arrival in the country—and he has every right of citizenship after a residence of six months in the state. An Englishman is therefore, in effect, less an alien in a foreign country, than in one which forms a part of the British empire. Such are the superior advantages of the United States at present, that nothing but the feeling, that in the one country he is among a more kindred people—under the same laws—and in a society whose habits and sentiments are similar to those to which he has been accustomed—can induce an Englishman to settle in Canada, in preference to the States; and if in the former he is deprived of rights which he obtains in the latter, though a foreigner, it is not to be wondered at that he should, in many cases, give the preference to the land in which he is treated most as a citizen. It is very possible, that there are but few cases in which the departure of an Englishman from Upper Canada to the States, can be traced directly to any of these circumstances in particular; yet the state of society and of feeling which they have engendered, has been among the main causes of the great extent of re-emigration to the new States of the Union. It operates, too, still more to deter emigration from England to the provinces: and thus both to retard the advance of the colony, and to deprive the mother-country of one of the principal advantages, on account of which the existence of colonies is desirable—the field which they afford for the employment of her surplus population and wealth. The native Canadians, however, to whatever political party they may belong, appear to be unanimous in the wish to preserve these exclusive privileges. The course of legislation, since the tide of emigration set most strongly to the country, and while under its influence the value of all species of property was rising, and the resources of the province were rapidly, and (for the old inhabitants) profitably developed, has been to draw a yet more marked line between the two classes, instead of obliterating the former distinctions. The law excluding English lawyers from practise is of recent origin. The speaker of the reforming House of Assembly, Mr. Bidwell, was among the strongest opponents of any alteration of that law, which might render it less rigidly exclusive—and, on more than one occasion, gave his casting vote against a bill having for its object the admission of an English lawyer to practise in the province, without serving a previous apprenticeship. This point is of more importance in a colony than it would at first sight appear to any one accustomed only to such a state of society as exists in England. The members of the legal profession are, in effect, the leaders of the people, and the class from which, in a larger proportion than from any other class, legislators are taken. It is, therefore, not merely a monopoly of profit, but, to a considerable extent, a monopoly of power—which the present body of lawyers contrive, by means of this exclusion, to secure to themselves. No man of mature age, emigrating to a colony, could afford to lose five years of his life in an apprenticeship from which he could acquire neither learning nor skill. The few professional men, therefore, who have gone to Upper Canada, have turned their attention to other pursuits, retaining, however, a strong feeling of discontent against the existing order of things. And many who might have emigrated remain at home, or seek some other colony, where their course is not impeded by similar restrictions.

But as in Upper Canada, under a law passed immediately after the last war with the United States, American citizens are forbidden to hold land, it is of the more consequence that the country should be made as attractive as possible to the emigrating middle classes of Great Britain, the only class from which an accession of capital, to be invested in the purchase or improvement of lands, can be hoped for. The policy of the law just referred to may well be doubted, whether the interests of the colony or of the mother country are considered, since the wealth and activity, and consequent commerce of the province, would have been greatly augmented, had its natural advantages of soil and position been allowed to operate in attracting those who were most aware of their existence, and eminently fitted to aid in their development; and there is great reason to believe, that the uncertainty of the titles which many Americans possess to the land on which they have squatted since the passing of this law, is the main cause of much of the disloyalty, or rather very lukewarm loyalty, evinced by that population in the Western District. But when this exclusion has been determined upon, it would at least have been wise to have removed everything that might have seemed like an obstacle in the way of those for whom the land was to be kept open, instead of closing the principal avenues to wealth or distinction against them, in a spirit of petty provincial jealousy.

The great practical question, however, on which these various parties have for a long time been at issue, and which has within a very few months again become the prominent matter in debate, is that of the Clergy Reserves. The prompt and satisfactory decision of this question is essential to the pacification of Canada; and as it was one of the most important questions referred to me for investigation, it is necessary that I should state it fully, and not shrink from making known the light in which it has presented itself to my mind. The disputes on this subject are now of long standing. By the constitutional act, a certain portion of the land in every township was set apart for the maintenance of a "Protestant Clergy." In that portion of this report which treats of the management of the waste lands, the economical mischiefs which have resulted from this appropriation of territory are fully detailed; and the present disputes relate solely to the application, and not to the mode of raising the funds, which are now derived from the sale of the Clergy Reserves. Under the term "Protestant Clergy," the clergy of the Church of England have always claimed the sole enjoyment of the funds. The members of the Church of Scotland have claimed to be put entirely on a level with the Church of England, and have demanded that these funds should be equally divided between both. The various denominations of Protestant dissenters have asserted that the term includes them, and that out of these funds an equal provision should be made for all Christians who do not belong to the Church of Rome. But a great body of all Protestant denominations, and the numerous Catholics who inhabit the province, have maintained that any such favour towards any one, or even all the Protestant sects, would be most unadvisable, and have either demanded the equal application of those funds to the purposes of all religious creeds whatsoever, or have urged the propriety of leaving each body of religionists to maintain its own establishment, to repeal or disregard the law, and to apply the clergy funds to the general purposes of the government, or to the support of a general system of education.

The supporters of these different schemes having long contended in this province, and greatly inconvenienced the Imperial government by constant references to its decision, the Secretary of State for the Colonies proposed to leave the determination of the matter to the provincial legislatures, pledging the Imperial government to do its utmost to get a parliamentary sanction to whatever course they might adopt. Two bills in consequence passed the last House of Assembly, in which the reformers had the ascendancy, applying these funds to the purposes of education; and both these bills were rejected by the Legislative Council.

During all this time, however, though much irritation had been caused by the exclusive claims of the Church of England, and the favour shown by the government to one, and that a small religious community, the clergy of that church, though an endowed, were not a dominant priesthood. They had a far larger share of the public money than the clergy of any other denomination, but they had no exclusive privileges, and no authority, save such as might spring from the efficient discharge of their sacred duties, or from the energy, ability or influence of members of their body. But the last public act of Sir John Colborne before quitting the government of the province in 1835, which was the establishment of the fifty-seven rectories, has completely changed the aspect of the question. It is understood that every rector possesses all the spiritual and other privileges enjoyed by an English rector; and that though he may have no right to levy tithes, (for even this has been made a question) he is in all other respects in precisely the same position as a clergyman of the established church in England. This is regarded by all other teachers of religion in the country as having at once degraded them to a position of legal inferiority to the clergy of the Church of England; and it has been resented most warmly. In the opinion of many persons, this was the chief predisposing cause of the recent insurrection, and it is an abiding and unabated cause of discontent. Nor is this to be wondered at. The Church of England in Upper Canada, by numbering in its ranks all those who belong to no other sect, represents itself as being more numerous than any single denomination of christians in the country. Even admitting, however, the justice of the principle upon which this enumeration proceeds, and giving that church credit for all that it thus claims, its number could not amount to one-third, probably not a fourth, of the population. It is not, therefore, to be expected that the other sects, three at least of whom—the Methodists, the Presbyterians, and the Catholics—claim to be individually more numerous than the Church of England, should acquiesce quietly in the supremacy thus given to it. And it is equally natural that the English Dissenters and Irish Catholics, remembering the position which they have occupied at home, and the long and painful struggle through which alone they have obtained the imperfect equality they now possess, should refuse to acquiesce for themselves in the creation of a similar establishment in their new country, and thus to bequeath to their children a strife as arduous and embittered as that from which they have so recently and imperfectly escaped.

But for this act, it would have been possible, though highly impolitic, to have allowed the clergy reserves to remain upon their former undetermined and unsatisfactory footing.—But the question as to the application of this property must now be settled, if it is intended that the province is to be free from violent and perilous agitation. Indeed, the whole controversy, which has been, in a great measure, suspended by the insurrection, was, in the course of last summer, revived with more heat than ever by the most inopportune arrival in the colony of opinions given by the English law officers of the Crown, in favour of the legality of the establishment of the rectories. Since that period the question has again absorbed public attention: and it is quite clear that it is upon this practical point that issue must sooner or later be joined on all the constitutional questions to which I have previously adverted. I am well aware that there are not wanting some who represent the agitation of this question as merely the result of its present unsettled character, and who assert, that if the claims of the English church to the exclusive enjoyment of this property were established by the Imperial Parliament, all parties, however loud their present pretensions, or however vehement their first complaints, would peacefully acquiesce in an arrangement which would then be inevitable. This might be the case if the establishment of some dominant church were inevitable. But it cannot be necessary to point out that in the immediate vicinity of the United States, and with their example before the people of Canada, no injustice, real or fancied, occasioned and supported by a British rule, would be regarded in this light. The result of any determination on the part of the British government or legislature to give one sect a predominance and superiority would be, it might be feared, not to secure the favoured sect, but to endanger the loss of the colony, and, in vindicating the exclusive pretensions of the English church, to hazard one of the fairest possessions of the British Crown.

I am bound, indeed, to state, that there is a degree of feeling, and an unanimity of opinion, on the question of ecclesiastical establishments, over the northern part of the continent of America, which it will be prudent not to overlook in the settlement of this question. The superiority of what is called 'the voluntary principle' is a question on which I may almost say that there is no difference of opinion in the United States; and it cannot be denied that on this, as on other points, the tone of thought prevalent in the Union has exerted a very considerable influence over the neighbouring provinces. Similar circumstances, too, have had the effect of accustoming the people of both countries to regard this question in a very different light from that in which it appears in the old world; and the nature of the question is indeed entirely different in old and new countries. The apparent right which time and custom give to the maintenance of an ancient and respected institution cannot exist in a recently settled country, in which every thing is new; and the establishment of a dominant church there is a creation of exclusive privileges in favour of one out of many religious denominations, and that composing a small minority, at the expense, not merely of the majority, but of many as large minorities. The church, too, for which alone it is proposed that the state should provide is the church which, being that of the wealthy, can best provide for itself, and has the fewest poor to supply with gratuitous religious instruction. Another consideration which distinguishes the grounds on which such a question must be decided in old and new countries is, that the state of society in the latter is not susceptible of such an organization as is necessary for the efficiency of any church establishment of which I know, more especially of one so constituted as the established church of England; for the essence of the establishment is its parochial clergy. The services of a parochial clergy are almost inapplicable to a colony where a constantly varying population is widely scattered over the country. Any clergy there must be rather missionary than parochial.

A still stronger objection to the creation of a church establishment in this colony is, that not merely are the members of the church of England a small minority at present, but, inasmuch as the majority of emigrants are not members of the church of England, the disproportion is likely to increase, instead of disappearing, in the course of time. The mass of British emigrants will be either from the middle classes of Great Britain or the poorer classes of Ireland, the latter almost exclusively Catholics, and the former in a great proportion either Scotch Presbyterians or English Dissenters.

It is most important that this question should be settled, and so settled as to give satisfaction to the majority of the people of the two Canadas, whom it equally concerns: and I know of no mode of doing this but by repealing all provisions in imperial Acts that relate to the application of the clergy reserves, and the funds arising from them, leaving the disposal of the funds to the local legislature, and acquiescing in whatever decision it may adopt. The views which I have expressed on this subject sufficiently mark my conviction, that, without the adoption of such a course, the most mischievous practical cause of dissension will not be removed.

I feel it my duty, also, in this, as in the Lower Province, to call especial attention to the policy which has been, and which ought to be, pursued towards the large catholic population of the province. On this subject I have received complaints of a general spirit of intolerance and disfavour towards all persons of this creed, to which I am obliged to give considerable credit, from the great respectability and undoubted loyalty of those from whom the complaints were received. Bishop McDonell, the venerable Roman Catholic Bishop of Kingston, and Mr. Manahan, M.P. for the county of Hastings, have made representations in letters, which will be given in the appendix to this report. The Catholics constitute at least a fifth of the whole population of Upper Canada. Their loyalty was most generally and unequivocally exhibited at the late outbreak. Nevertheless, it is said that they are wholly excluded from all share in the government of the country and the patronage at its disposal. "In Upper Canada," says Mr. Manahan, "there never was one Irish Roman Catholic an executive or legislative councillor, nor has one been ever appointed to any public situation of emolument and profit in the colony."

The Irish Catholics complain very loudly and justly of the existence of Orangism in this colony. They are justly indignant that, in a province which their loyalty and bravery have materially contributed to save, their feelings are outraged by the symbols and processions of this association. It is somewhat difficult to understand the nature and objects of the rather anomalous Orangism of Upper Canada. Its members profess to desire to uphold the Protestant religion, but to be free from those intolerent feelings toward their Catholic countrymen which are the distinctive marks of the Irish Orangemen. They assert that the main object, to which the support of the English church is subsidiary, is to maintain the connexion with Great Britain. They have sworn, it is said, many ignorant Catholics into their body; and at their public dinners, after drinking the "pious, glorious, and immortal memory," with all the usual formality of abuse of the Catholics, they toast the health of the Catholic Bishop, McDonell. It would seem that their great purpose has been to introduce the machinery, rather than the tenets, of orangeism; and the leaders probably hope to make use of this kind of permanent conspiracy and illegal organization to gain political power for themselves. In fact, the Catholics scarcely appear to view this institution with more jealousy than the reformers of the province. It is an Irish Tory institution, having not so much a religious as a political bearing. The Irish Catholics who have been initiated have entered it chiefly from its supposed national character, and probably with as little regard to the political as to the religious objects, with which it is connected. Still the organization of this body enables its leaders to exert a powerful influence over the populace; and it is stated that at the last general election the Tories succeeded in carrying more than one seat by means of the violence of the organized mob thus placed at their disposal. It is not, indeed, at the last election only that the success of the government candidate has been attributed to the existence of this association. At former elections, especially those for the county of Leeds, it is asserted, that the return of the Canadian Deputy Grand Master, and of the then Attorney-General, his colleague, was procured by means of a violent and riotous mob of Orangemen, who prevented the voters in the opposition interest from coming up to the poll. In consequence of this and other similar outrages, the Assembly presented an address to Sir Francis Head, begging "that his Excellency would be pleased to inform the house whether the government of the province had taken, or determined to take, any steps to prevent or discourage public processions of Orange societies, or to discourage the formation and continuance of such societies." To this address the Governor made the following reply;—"The government of this province has neither taken, nor has it determined to take, any steps to prevent or discourage the formation or continuance of such societies." It is to be presumed that this answer proceeded from a disbelief of the truth of those charges of outrage and riot which were made the foundation of the address. But it can excite no surprise that the existence of such an institution, offending one class by its contemptuous hostility to their religion, and another by its violent opposition to their politics, and which had been sanctioned by the governor, as was conceived, on account of its political tendencies, should excite among both classes a deep feeling of indignation, and add seriously to the distrust with which the government was regarded.

In addition to the irritation engendered by the position of parties, by the specific causes of dispute to which I have adverted, and by those features in the government of the colony which deprive the people of all power to effect a settlement of the questions by which the country is most deeply agitated, or to redress abuses in the institutions or in the administration of the province, there are permanent causes of discontent, resulting from the existence of deep-seated impediments in the way of its industrial progress. The province is without any of those means by which the resources of a country are developed, and the civilization of a people is advanced or upheld. The general administration of justice, it is true, appears to be much better in Upper than in Lower Canada. Courts of justice, at least, are brought into every man's neighbourhood by a system of circuits, and there is still some integrity in juries. But there are general complaints of the union of political and judicial functions in the Chief Justice; not because any suspicion attaches to that judge's discharge of his duties, but on account of the party grounds upon which his subordinates are supposed to be appointed, and the party bias attributed to them. Complaints, too, similar to those which I have adverted to in the lower province, are made against the system by which the sheriffs are appointed. It is stated that they are selected exclusively from the friends or dependents of the ruling party; that very insufficient securities are taken from them; and that the money arising from executions and sales, which are represented as unhappily very numerous in this province, generally remains in their hands for at least a year. For reasons also which I have specified in my account of the lower province, the composition of the magistracy appears to be a serious cause of mischief and dissatisfaction.

But, independently of these sources of complaint, are the impediments which I have mentioned. A very considerable portion of the province has neither roads, post-offices, mills, schools, nor churches. The people may raise enough for their own subsistence, and may even have a rude and comfortless plenty, but they can seldom acquire wealth; nor can even wealthy land-owners prevent their children from growing up ignorant and boorish, and from occupying a far lower mental, moral and social position than they themselves fill. Their means of communication with each other, or the chief towns of the province, are limited and uncertain. With the exception of the labouring class, most of the emigrants who have arrived within the last ten years are poorer now than at the time of their arrival in the province. There is no adequate system of local assessment to improve the means of communication; and the funds occasionally voted for this purpose are, under the present system, disposed of by a House of Assembly which represents principally the interests of the more settled districts, and which, it is alleged, has been chiefly intent in making their disposal a means of strengthening the influence of its members in the constituencies which they represent. These funds have consequently almost always been applied in that part of the country where they were least needed; and they have been too frequently expended so as to produce scarcely any perceptible advantages. Of the lands which were originally appropriated for the support of schools throughout the country, by far the most valuable portion has been diverted to the endowment of the University, from which those only derive any benefit who reside in Toronto, or those who, having a large assured income, are enabled to maintain their children in that town at an expense which has been estimated at £50 per annum for each child. Even in the most thickly peopled districts, there are but few schools, and those of a very inferior character; while the more remote settlements are almost entirely without any.

Under such circumstances there is little stimulus to industry or enterprise, and their effect is aggravated by the striking contrast presented by such of the United States as border upon this province, and where all is activity and progress. I shall hereafter, in connection with the disposal of the public lands, advert to circumstances affecting not Upper Canada merely, but the whole of our North American colonies in an almost equal degree, which will illustrate in detail the causes and results of the more prominent of these evils. I have referred to the topic in this place, in order to notice the inevitable tendency of these inconveniences to aggravate whatever discontent may be produced by purely political causes, and to draw attention to the fact, that those who are most satisfied with the present political state of the province, and least disposed to attribute economical injuries or social derangement to the form or the working of the government, feel and admit that there must have been something wrong to have caused so striking a difference in progress and wealth, between Upper Canada and the neighbouring States of the Union. I may also observe, that those evils affect chiefly that portion of the people which is composed of British emigrants, and who have had no part in the causes to which they are attributable. The native-born Canadians, as they generally inhabit the more settled districts of the province, are the owners of nearly all the waste lands, and have almost exclusively had the application of all public funds, might be expected to have escaped from the evils alluded to, and even to have profited by the causes out of which they sprung. The number of those who have thus profited is, however, comparatively small; the majority of this class, in common with the emigrant population, have suffered from the general depression, and share in the discontent and restlessness which this depression has produced.

The trade of the country is, however, a matter which appears to demand a notice here, because, so long as any such marked and striking advantages in this respect are enjoyed by Americans, as at present arise from causes which government has the power to remove, it is impossible but that many will look forward with desire to political changes. There are laws which regulate, or rather prohibit, the importation of particular articles, except from England, especially of tea, which were framed originally to protect the privileges of monopolies here, but which have been continued in the province after the English monopoly has been removed. It is not that these laws have any appreciable effect in raising the price of the commodities in question—almost all used in the province is smuggled across the frontier—but their operation is at once injurious to the fair dealer, who is undersold by persons who have obtained their articles in the cheaper market of the United States, and to the province, which can neither regulate the traffic, nor make it a source of revenue. It is probable, indeed, that the present law has been allowed to continue through inadvertance; but if so, it is no very satisfactory evidence of the care or information of the Imperial Government, that it knows or feels so little the oppressive influence of the laws to which it subjects its dependencies.

Another, and more difficult topic connected with this subject is, the wish of this province that it should be allowed to make use of New York as a port of entry. At present the rate of duty upon all goods coming from the United States, whatever may be their nature, or the port in Europe from which they have been shipped, is such as to compel all importers to receive the articles of their trade through the St. Lawrence, the navigation of which river opens generally several weeks later than the time at which goods may be obtained in all the parts of Upper Canada bordering upon Lake Ontario, by way of Oswego. The dealer, therefore, must submit to an injurious delay in his business, or must obtain his goods in the autumn, and have his capital lying dead for six months. Either of these courses must lessen the amount of traffic, by diminishing the quantity, or increasing the price, of all commodities; and the mischief is seriously enhanced by the monopoly which the present system places in the hands of what are called the 'forwarders' on the St. Lawrence and the Rideau Canal.—If goods might be shipped from England to be landed at New York in bond, and to be admitted into Upper Canada free of duty upon the production of a certificate from the officer of customs at the English port from which they are shipped, this inconvenience would be removed, and the people of the province would in reality benefit by their connexion with England in the superior cheapness of their articles, without paying for it as highly as they do at the present in the limitation of their commerce.

I have already stated, in my account of Lower Canada, the difficulties and disputes which are occasioned by the financial relations of the two provinces. The state of affairs, however, which causes these disputes is of far greater practical mischief to Upper Canada. That province, some years ago, conceived the very noble project of removing or obviating all the natural impediments to the navigation of the St. Lawrence; and the design was to make these works on a scale so commensurate with the capabilities of that broad and deep river, as to enable sea-going vessels to navigate its whole course to the head of Lake Huron. The design was, perhaps, too vast, at least for the first effort of a state at that time comparatively so small and poor; but the boldness with which the people undertook it, and the immense sacrifices which they made in order to achieve it, are gratifying indications of a spirit which bids fair hereafter to render Upper Canada as thriving a country as any state of the American Union. The House of Assembly, with this object in view, took a large portion of the shares of the Welland Canal, which had been previously commenced by a few enterprising individuals. It then commenced the great ship canal, called the Cornwall Canal, with a view of enabling ships of considerable draught to avoid the Long Sault Rapids; and this work was, at an immense outlay, brought very far towards a completion. It is said that there was great mismanagement, and perhaps no little jobbing, in the application of the funds, and the execution of the work. But the greatest error committed was the undertaking the works in Upper, without insuring their continuation in Lower Canada; for the whole of the works in the Upper province, when completed, would be comparatively, if not utterly useless, without the execution of similar works on that part of the St. Lawrence which lies between the province line and Montreal. But this co-operation the Lower Canadian Assembly refused or neglected to give; and the works of the Cornwall Canal are now almost suspended, from the apparent inutility of completing them.

The necessary expense of these great undertakings was very large; and the prodigality superadded thereto has increased it to such an extent, that this province is burdened with a debt of more than £1,000,000; the whole revenue, which is about £60,000, being hardly adequate to pay the interest. The province has already been fortunately obliged to throw the whole support of the few and imperfect local works which are carried on in different parts of the province, on local assessments; but it is obvious that it will soon be obliged to have recourse to direct taxation, to meet its ordinary civil expenditure; for the custom duties cannot be increased without the consent of Lower Canada; and that consent it is useless to expect from any House of Assembly chosen under the suspended constitution. The canals, of which the tolls would, if the whole series of necessary works were completed, in all probability render the past outlay a source of profit, instead of loss, remain in a state of almost hopeless suspension; the Cornwall canal being unfinished, and the works already completed daily falling into decay, and the Welland Canal, which has been a source of great commercial benefit, being now in danger of becoming useless, from want of money to make the necessary repairs. After all its great hopes, and all the great sacrifices which it has made to realize them, Upper Canada now finds itself loaded with an enormous debt, which it is denied the means of raising its indirect taxation to meet, and mocked by the aspect of those unfinished works, which some small combined efforts might render a source of vast wealth and prosperity, but which now are a source of useless expense and bitter disappointment.

It may well be believed that such a state of things is not borne without repining by some of the most enterprising and loyal people of the province. It is well known that the desire of getting over these difficulties has led many persons in this province to urge the singular claim to have a convenient portion of Lower Canada taken from that province and annexed to Upper Canada; and that it induces many to desire an union of the provinces as the only efficient means of settling all these disputes on a just and permanent footing. But it cannot be matter of surprise, that in despair of any sufficient remedies being provided by the Imperial Government, many of the most enterprising colonists of Upper Canada look to that bordering country, in which no great industrial enterprise ever feels neglect or experiences a check, and that men the most attached to the existing form of government would find some compensation in a change, whereby experience might bid them hope that every existing obstacle would be speedily removed, and each man's fortune share in the progressive prosperity of a flourishing state.

A dissatisfaction with the existing order of things, produced by causes such as I have described, necessarily extends to many who desire no change in the political institutions of the province. Those who most admire the form of the existing system wish to see it administered in a very different mode. Men of all parties feel that the actual circumstances of the colony are such as to demand the adoption of widely different measures from any that have yet been pursued in reference to them. They ask for greater firmness of purpose in their rulers, and a more defined and consistent policy on the part of the government—something, in short, that will make all parties feel that an order of things has been established, to which it is necessary that they should conform themselves, and which is not to be subject to any unlooked for and sudden interruption, consequent upon some unforeseen move in the game of politics in England. Hitherto, the course of policy adopted by the British government towards this colony, has had reference to the state of parties in England, instead of the wants and circumstances of the province: neither party could calculate upon a successful result to their struggles for any particular object, because, though they might be able to estimate accurately enough their strength in the colony, they could not tell how soon some hidden spring might be put in motion in the Colonial Office in England, which would defeat their best laid plans, and render utterly unavailing whole years of patient effort.

THE EASTERN PROVINCES, AND NEWFOUNDLAND.

THOUGH I have stated my opinion that my inquiries would have been very incomplete had they been confined to the two Canadas, the information which I am enabled to communicate with respect to the other North American colonies is necessarily very limited. As, however, in these provinces, with the exception of Newfoundland, there are no such discontents as threaten the disturbance of the public tranquillity, I did not think it necessary to institute any minute inquiries into the details of the various departments of government. It is only necessary that I should state my impression of the general working of the government in these colonies, in order that if insitutions similar to those of the disturbed provinces should here appear to be tending to similar results, a common remedy may be devised for the impending as well as for existing disorders. On this head I have obtained much useful information from the communications which I had with the Lieutenant Governors of these colonies, as well as with individuals connected with them, but above all, from the lengthened discussions which passed between me and the gentlemen who composed the deputations sent to me last autumn from each of the three Eastern Provinces, for the purpose of discussing the principles as well as details of a plan of general government for the whole of the British North American colonies. It was most unfortunate that the events of temporary, but pressing importance, which compelled my return to England, interrupted these discussions; but the delegates with whom I had the good fortune to carry them on, were gentlemen of so much ability, so high in station, and so patriotic in their views, that their information could not fail to give me a very fair view of the working of the colonial constitution under somewhat different circumstances in each. I insert in the appendix a communication which I received from one of the gentlemen, Mr. Young, a leading and very active member of the House of Assembly of Nova Scotia, respecting that province.

It is not necessary, however, that I should enter into any lengthened account of the nature or working of the form of government established in these provinces, because in my account of Lower Canada I have described the general characteristics of the system common to all, and adduced the example of these provinces in illustration of the defects of their common system. In all these provinces we find representative government coupled with an irresponsible executive; we find the same constant collision between the branches of the government; the same abuse of the powers of the representative bodies, owing to the anomaly of their position, aided by the want of good municipal institutions, and the same constant interference of the imperial administration, in matters which should be left wholly to the provincial governments. And if in these provinces there is less formidable discontent, and less obstruction to the regular course of government, it is because in them there has been recently a considerable departure from the ordinary course of the colonial system, and a nearer approach to sound constitutional practice.

This is remarkably the case in New Brunswick, a province which was till a short time ago one of the most constantly harrassed by collisions between the executive and legislative powers; the collision has now been in part terminated by the concession of all the revenues of the province to the Assembly. The policy of this concession, with reference to the extent and mode in which it was made, will be discussed in the separate report on the disposal and management of public lands; but the policy of the government in this matter has at any rate put an end to disputes about the revenue, which were on the point of producing a constant parliamentary conflict between the crown and the Assembly, in many respects like that which has subsisted in Lower Canada; but a more important advance has been made towards the practice of the British constitution in a recent change which has been made in the Executive and Legislative Councils of the colony, whereby, as I found from the representatives of the present official body in the delegation from New Brunswick, the administrative power of the province had been taken out of the hands of the old official party, and placed in those of members of the former liberal opposition. The constitutional practice had been, in fact, fully carried into effect in this province; the government had been taken out of the hands of those who could not obtain the assent of the majority of the Assembly, and placed in the hands of those who possessed its confidence: the result is, that the government of New Brunswick, till lately, one of the most difficult in the North American colonies, is now the most harmonious and easy.

In Nova Scotia, some, but not a complete, approximation has been made to the same judicious course. The government is in a minority in the House of Assembly, and the Assembly and the Legislative Council do not perfectly harmonize. But the questions which divide parties at present happen really to be of no great magnitude, and all are united and zealous in the great point of maintaining the connection with Great Britain. It will be seen from Mr. Young's paper, that the questions at issue, though doubtless of very considerable importance, involve no serious discussion between the government and the people. The majority of the opposition is stated by the official party to be very uncertain, and is admitted by themselves to be very narrow. Both parties look with confidence to the coming general election; and all feel the greatest reliance on the good sense and good intentions of the present Lieutenant Governor, Sir Colin Campbell.

I must, however, direct particular attention to the following temperate remarks of Mr. Young on the constitution of the Executive and Legislative Councils:—

“The majority of the House of Assembly is dissatisfied with the composition of the Executive and Legislative Councils, and the preponderance in both of interests which they conceive to be unfavourable to reform;—this is the true ground, as I take it, of the discontent that is felt. The respectability and private virtues of the gentlemen who sit at the two Council Boards, are admitted by all; it is of their political and personal predilections that the people complain; they desire reforming and liberal principles to be more fully represented and advocated there, as they are in the Assembly.

"The majority of the House, while they appreciate and have acknowledged the anxiety of His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor to gratify their just expectations, have also expressed their dissatisfaction that the Church of England should have been suffered to retain a majority in both councils, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the house and the precise and explicit directions of the Colonial Secretary. Religious dissensions are happily unknown amongst us, and the true way to prevent their growth and increase, is to avoid conferring an inordinate power on any one sect, however worthy it may be of respect or favour."

The political history of Prince Edward's Island is contained in the system pursued with regard to its settlement, and the appropriation of its lands, which is fully detailed in the subsequent view of that department of government in the North American Colonies; and its past and present disorders are but the sad result of that fatal error which stifled its prosperity in the very cradle of its existence, by giving up the whole island to a handful of distant proprietors. Against this system, this small and powerless community has in vain been struggling for some years; a few active and influential proprietors in London have been able to drown the remonstrances and defeat the efforts of a distant and petty province; for the ordinary evils of distance are, in the instance of Prince Edward's Island, aggravated by the scantiness of its population, and the confined extent of its territory. This island, most advantageously situated for the supply of the surrounding colonies, and of all the fisheries, possesses a soil peculiarly adapted to the production of grain, and, from its insular position, is blessed with a climate far more genial than a great part of the continent which lies to the southward. Had its natural advantages been turned to proper account, it might at this time have been the granary of the British colonies, and, instead of barely supporting a poor and enterprising population of 40,000, its more agricultural resources would, according to Major Head, have maintained in abundance a population of at least ten times that number. Of nearly 1,400,000 acres contained in this island, only 10,000 are said to be unfit for the plough. Only 100,000 are now under cultivation. No one can mistake the cause of this lamentable waste of the means of national wealth. It is the possession of almost the whole soil of the island by absentee proprietors, who would neither promote nor permit its cultivation, combined with the defective government which first caused and has since perpetuated the evil. The simple legislative remedy for all this mischief having been suggested by three successive secretaries of state, has been embodied in an act of the local legislature, which was reserved for the royal assent; and the influence of the proprietors in London was such, that that assent was for a long time withheld. The question was referred to me during my stay in Canada: and I believe I may have the satisfaction of attributing to the recommendation which I gave, in accordance with the earnest representations of the Lieut.-Governor, Sir Charles Fitzroy, the adoption at last of a measure intended to remove the abuse that has so long retarded the prosperity of this colony.

The present condition of these colonies presents none of those alarming features which mark the state of the two Canadas. The loyalty and attachment to the mother country which animate their inhabitants are warm and general. But their varied and ample resources are turned to little account. Their scanty population exhibits, in most portions of them, an aspect of poverty, backwardness, and stagnation; and wherever a better state of things is visible, the improvement is generally to be ascribed to the influx of American settlers or capitalists. Major Head describes his journey through a great part of Nova Scotia as exhibiting the melancholy spectacle of "half the tenements abandoned, and lands every where falling into decay;" "and the lands," he tells us, "that were purchased 30 or 40 years ago, at 5s. an acre, are now offered for sale at 3s." "The people of Prince Edward's Island are," he says, "permitting Americans to take out of their hands all their valuable fisheries, from sheer want of capital to employ their own population in them." "The country on the noble river St. John's," he states, "possesses all that is requisite, except that animation of business which constitutes the value of a new settlement." But the most striking indication of the backward state of these provinces is afforded by the amount of the population. These provinces, among the longest-settled on the North American continent, contain nearly 30,000,000 of acres, and a population, estimated at the highest, at no more than 365,000 souls, giving only one inhabitant for every 80 acres. In New Brunswick, out of 16,500,000 acres, it is estimated that at least 15,000,000 are fit for cultivation; and the population being estimated at no more than 140,000, there is not one inhabitant for 100 acres of cultivatable land.

It is a singular and melancholy feature in the condition of these provinces, that the resources rendered of so little avail to the population of Great Britain are turned to better account by the enterprising inhabitants of the United States. While the emigration from the province is large and constant, the adventurous farmers of New England cross the frontier and occupy the best farming lands. Their fishermen enter our bays and rivers, and in some cases monopolize the occupations of our own unemployed countrymen, and a great portion of the trade of the St. John's is in their hands. Not only do the citizens of a foreign nation do this, but they do it with British capital. Major Head states, "that an American merchant acknowledged to him that the capital with which his countrymen carried on their enterprises in the neighbourhood of St. John's, was chiefly supplied by Great Britain; and," he adds, as a fact within his own knowledge, "that wealthy capitalists at Halifax, desirous of an investment for their money, preferred lending it in the United States to applying it to speculation in New Brunswick, or to lending it to their own countrymen in that province."

I regret to say that Major Head also gives the same account respecting the difference between the aspect of things in these provinces and the bordering state of Maine. On the other side of the line, good roads, good schools, and thriving farms, afford a mortifying contrast to the condition in which a British subject finds the neighbouring possessions of the British Crown.

With respect to the colony of Newfoundland I have been able to obtain no information whatever, except from sources open to the public at large. The Assembly of that island signified their intention of making an appeal to me respecting some differences with the Governor, which had their immediate origin in a dispute with a judge. Owing, probably, to the uncertain and tardy means of communication between Quebec and that island, I received no further communication on this or any other subject until after my arrival in England, when I received an address expressive of regret at my departure.

I know nothing, therefore, of the state of things in Newfoundland, except that there is, and long has been, the ordinary colonial collision between the representative body on one side and the executive on the other; that the representatives have no influence on the composition or the proceedings of the executive government; and that the dispute is now carried on, as in Canada, by impeachments of various public officers on the one hand, and prorogations on the other. I am inclined to think that the cause of these disorders is to be found in the same constitutional defects as those which I have signalized in the rest of the North American colonies. If it be true that there exists in this island a state of society which renders it unadvisable that the whole of the local government should be entirely left to the inhabitants, I believe that it would be much better to incorporate this colony with a larger community, than to attempt to continue the present experiment of governing it by a constant collision of constitutional powers.

DISPOSAL OF PUBLIC LANDS; EMIGRATION.

I HAVE mentioned the peculiar importance which, in newly-settled societies, is attached to works for creating and improving the means of communication. But in such communities, and especially when only a small proportion of the land has been occupied by settlers, there is a still more momentous subject of public concern. I allude to an operation of government, which has a paramount influence over the happiness of individuals, and the progress of society towards wealth and greatness—I am speaking of the disposal, by the government, of the lands of the new country. In old countries, no such matter ever occupies public attention; in new colonies, planted on a fertile and extensive territory, this is the object of the deepest moment to all, and the first business of the government. Upon the manner in which this business is conducted, it may almost be said that every thing else depends. If lands are not bestowed on the inhabitants and new-comers with a generous hand, the society endure the evils of an old and over-peopled state, with the superadded inconveniencies that belong to a wild country. They are pinched for room, even in the wilderness—are prevented from choosing the most fertile soils and favourable situations—and are debarred from cultivating that large extent of soil, in proportion to the hands at work, which can alone compensate, in quantity of produce, for the rude nature of husbandry in the wilderness. If, on the other hand, the land is bestowed with careless profusion, great evils of another kind are produced. Large tracts become the property of individuals, who leave their lands unsettled and untouched. Deserts are thus interposed between the industrious settlers; the natural difficulties of communication are greatly enhanced; the inhabitants are not merely scattered over a wide space of country, but are separated from each other by impassable wastes; the cultivator is cut off or far removed from a market in which to dispose of his surplus produce, and procure other commodities; and the greatest obstacles exist to co-operation in labour—to exchange—to the division of employments—to combination for municipal or other public purposes—to the growth of towns—to public worship—to regular education—to the spread of news—to the acquisition of common knowledge—and even to the civilizing influences of mere intercourse for amusement. Monotonous and stagnant, indeed, must ever be the state of a people who are permanently condemned to such separation from each other. If, moreover, the land of a new country is so carelessly surveyed, that the boundaries of property are incorrectly or inadequately defined, the government lays up a store of mischievous litigation for the people. Whatever delay takes place in perfecting the titles of individuals to lands alienated by the government, occasions equal uncertainty and insecurity of property. If the acquisition of land, in whatever quantities, is made difficult or troublesome, or is subjected to any needless uncertainty or delay, applicants are irritated—settlement is hindered—and immigration to the colony is discouraged, as emigration from it is promoted. If very different methods of proceeding have effect in the same colony, or in different parts of the same group of colonies, the operation of some can scarcely fail to interfere with or counteract the operation of others: so that the object of the government must, somewhere or at some time, be defeated. And frequent changes of system are sure to be very injurious, not only by probably displeasing those who either obtain land just before, or desire to obtain some just after each change, but also by giving a character of irregularity, uncertainty, and even mystery, to the most important proceedings of government. In this way settlement and emigration are discouraged: inasmuch as the people, both of the colony and of the mother country, are deprived of all confidence in the permanency of any system, and of any familiar acquaintance with any of the temporary methods. It would be easy to cite many other examples of the influence of government in this matter. I will but mention one more here. If the disposal of public lands is administered partially, with favour to particular persons or classes, a sure result is the anger of all who do not benefit by such favouritism—the far greater number, of course—and consequently the general unpopularity of the government.

Under suppositions the reverse of these, the best, instead of the worst, effects would be produced; a constant and regular supply of new land, in due proportion to the wants of a population increasing by births and immigration; all the advantages to which facilities of transport and communication are essential; certainty of limits, and security of title to property in land; the greatest facilities in acquiring the due quantity; the greatest encouragements to immigration and settlement; the most rapid progress of the people in material comfort and social improvement; and a general sense of obligation to government. What a contrast do the two pictures present! Neither of them is over-coloured; and a mere glance at both suffices to show, that in the North American colonies of England, as in the United States, the function of authority most full of good or evil consequences has been the disposal of public land.

Impressed before my departure from England, with a sense of the great importance of this subject, and indulging a hope, founded on the very remarkable success of a new method of disposing of public lands in your Majesty's Australian colonies, that I might be able to recommend beneficial reforms in the North American provinces, I took precaution for instituting a thoroughly efficient inquiry into the whole subject generally, and in detail; and I was the more disposed to do this, because while an inquiry by a select committee of the House of Commons, in 1836, furnished abundant information on the subject, as respects most parts of your Majesty's colonial empire, the North American provinces had been specifically excluded from that inquiry; and I could not obtain in England any authentic, or at least sufficient information as to the disposal of public lands in any of them. Within a very short time after my arrival in Canada, the expediency of a searching inquiry into the subject, became more than ever apparent to me. A common belief in the extent of my powers, revived innumerable complaints of abuse, and applications for justice or favour, which had slumbered during previous years. During my residence in the Canadas, scarcely a day passed without my receiving some petition or representation relating to the Crown Lands Department; and matters belonging to this branch of government necessarily occupied a far larger proportion than any other of my correspondence with the Secretary of State. The information which I now possess was chiefly obtained by means of a commission of inquiry, which, having regard to the probable advantages of an uniform system for the whole of British North America, and to the deep and universal interest taken in this subject by the colonists, I issued in your Majesty's name, and made applicable to all the provinces. Minutes of the evidence given before the commissioners are appended to the present report, together with a separate report, containing the outline of a plan for the future administration of this all-influential department of government. If that plan, or any other founded on similar principles, should be adopted by your Majesty, and the imperial legislature, I do firmly believe that an impulse will be given to the prosperity of your Majesty's North American possessions, surpassing what their most sanguine well-wisher, if unacquainted with the facts, would be capable of imagining; and more calculated than any other reform whatever, to attach the people of British North America to your Majesty's throne—and to cement and perpetuate an intimate connection between the colonies and the mother country. I shall have to return to this point hereafter. I have mentioned it here for the purpose of inviting your Majesty's attention, and awakening that of your ministers and of parliament to a theme which, however little it has hitherto interested the imperial government, is the object of constant and earnest discussion in the colonies.

In the United States, ever since the year 1796, the disposal of public land not already appropriated to particular states, has been strictly regulated by a law of congress; not by different laws for the various parts of the country, but by one law for the whole of the public lands, and a law which we may judge to have been conducive to the prosperity of the people, both from its obvious good effects, and from its almost unquestioned continuance for so many years. In the British North American colonies, with one partial exception, there never has been, until quite recently, any law upon the subject. The whole of the public lands have been deemed the property of the crown, and the whole of the administration for disposing of them to individuals, with a view to settlement, has been conducted by officers of the crown, under instructions from the treasury or the colonial department in England. The provincial assemblies, except quite recently in New Brunswick and Upper Canada, have never had any voice in this matter; nor is the popular controul in those two cases much more than nominal. The imperial parliament has never interfered but once, when, leaving all other things untouched, it enacted the unhappy system of "clergy reserves." With these very slight exceptions, the Lords of the Treasury and Colonial Secretary of State for the time being, have been the only legislators; and the provincial agents of the Colonial Secretary, responsible to him alone, have been the sole executors.

The system of the United States appears to combine all the chief requisites of the greatest efficiency. It is uniform throughout the vast federation; it is unchangeable save by congress, and has never been materially altered; it renders the acquisition of new land easy, and yet, by means of a price, restricts appropriation to the actual wants of the settler; it is so simple as to be readily understood; it provides for accurate surveys, and against needless delays; it gives an instant and secure title; and admits of no favouritism, but distributes the public property amongst all classes and persons upon precisely equal terms. That system has promoted an amount of immigration and settlement of which the history of the world affords no other example; and it has produced to the United States a revenue which has averaged about half a million sterling per annum, and has amounted in one twelvemonth to about four millions sterling, or more than the whole expenditure of the federal government.

In the North American colonies there never has been any system. Many different methods have been practised, and this not only in the different colonies, but in every colony at different times, and within the same colony at the same time. The greatest diversity and most frequent alteration would almost seem to have been the objects in view. In only one respect has there been uniformity. Every where the greatest profusion has taken place, so that in all the colonies, and nearly in every part of each colony, more, and very much more land has been alienated by the government than the grantees had at the time, or now have, the means of reclaiming from a state of wilderness; and yet in all the colonies, until lately, and in some of them still, it is either very difficult or next to impossible for a person of no influence to obtain any of the public land. More or less in all the colonies, and in some of them to an extent which would not be credited if the fact were not established by unquestionable testimony, the surveys have been inaccurate, and the boundaries, or even the situation of estates, are proportionably uncertain. Everywhere, needless delays have harrassed and exasperated applicants; and everywhere, more or less, I am sorry but compelled to add, gross favouritism has prevailed in the disposal of public lands. I have mentioned but a part of the evils, grievances, and abuses, of which your Majesty's subjects in the colonies justly complain, as having arisen from mal-administration in this department. Those evils remain wholly unremedied, most of those grievances are unredressed, and not a few of those abuses are unreformed at this hour. Their present existence has been forced on my conviction by indisputable evidence. If they had passed away, I should scarcely have alluded to them. If I had any hope of seeing them removed otherwise than by means of giving them authentic publicity, I should have hesitated to speak of them as I have done. As it is, I should ill perform the duty which your Majesty was pleased to confide to me, if I failed to describe them in the plainest terms.

The results of long misgovernment in this department, are such as might have been anticipated by any person understanding the subject. The administration of the public lands, instead of always yielding a revenue, cost for a long while more than it produced. But this is, I venture to think, a trifling consideration when compared with others. There is one in particular which has occurred to every observant traveller in these regions, which is a constant theme of boast in the states bordering upon our colonies, and a subject of loud complaint within the colonies. I allude to the striking contrast which is presented between the American and British sides of the frontier line, in respect to every sign of productive industry, increasing wealth, and progressive civilization.

By describing one side, and reversing the picture, the other would be also described.— On the American side all is activity and bustle. The forest has been widely cleared; every year numerous settlements are formed, and thousands of farms are created out of the waste; the country is intersected by common roads; canals and railroads are finished, or in the course of formation; the ways of communication and transport are crowded with people, and enlivened by numerous carriages and large steamboats. The observer is surprised at the number of harbours on the lakes, and the number of vessels they contain: while bridges, artificial landing places, and commodious wharves are formed in all directions as soon as required.— Good houses, warehouses, mills, inns, villages, towns, and even great cities are almost seen to spring up out of the desert. Every village has its school-house and place of public worship. Every town has many of both, with its township buildings, its book-stores, and probably one or two banks and newspapers; and the cities, with their fine churches, their great hotels, their exchanges, court-houses and municipal halls, of stone or marble, so new and fresh as to mark the recent existence of the forest where they now stand, would be admired in any part of the old world. On the British side of the line, with the exception of a few favoured spots, where some approach to American prosperity is apparent, all seems waste and desolate. There is but one rail-road in all British America, and that, running between the St. Lawrence and Lake Champlain, is only fifteen miles long. The ancient city of Montreal, which is naturally the commercial capital of the Canadas, will not bear the least comparison, in any respect, with Buffalo, which is a creation of yesterday. But it is not in the difference between the larger towns on the two sides that we shall find the best evidence of our own inferiority.— The painful but undeniable truth is most manifest in the country districts through which the line of national separation passes for 1,000 miles. There, on the side of both the Canadas, and also of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, a widely scattered population, poor, and apparently unenterprising, though hardy and industrious, separated from each other by tracts of intervening forest, without towns and markets, almost without roads, living in mean houses, drawing little more than a rude subsistence from ill-cultivated land, and seemingly incapable of improving their condition, present the most instructive contrast to their enterprising and thriving neighbours on the American side. I was assured that in the eastern townships of Lower Canada, bordering upon the line, it is a common practice for settlers when they wish to meet, to enter the state of Vermont, and make use of the roads there for the purpose of reaching their destination in the British province. Major Head, the assistant commissioner of crown lands' enquiry, whom I sent to New Brunswick, states, that when travelling near the frontier line of that province and the state of Maine, now on one side and then on the other, he could always tell on which side he was by the obvious superiority of the American settlements in every respect. Where the two countries are separated by the St. Lawrence and the lakes, the difference is less perceptible; but not less in fact, if I may believe the concurrent statements of numerous eye-witnesses, who had no motive for deceiving me. For further corroboration, I might refer indeed to numerous and uncontradicted publications; and there is one proof of this sort so remarkable, that I am induced to notice it specially. A highly-popular work, which is known to be from the pen of one of your Majesty's chief functionaries in Nova Scotia, abounds in assertions and illustrations of the backward and stagnant condition of that province, and the great superiority of neighbouring American settlements. Although the author, with a natural disinclination to question the excellence of Government, attributes this mortifying circumstance entirely to the folly of the people, in neglecting their farms, to occupy themselves with complaining of grievances and abuses, he leaves no doubt of the fact.

This view is confirmed by another fact equally indisputable. Throughout the frontier, from Amherstburgh to the ocean, the market value of land is much greater on the American than on the British side. In not a few parts of the frontier this difference amounts to as much as 1,000 per cent., and in some cases even more. The average difference, as between Upper Canada and the states of New York and Michigan, is notoriously several hundred per cent. Mr. Hastings Kerr of Quebec, whose knowledge of the value of land in Lower Canada is generally supposed to be more extensive and accurate than that of any other person, states that the price of wild land in Vermont and New Hampshire, close to the line, is $5 per acre, and in the adjoining British townships only $1. On this side the line a very large extent of land is wholly unsaleable, even at such low prices; while on the other side property is continually changing hands. The price of 2s. or 3s. per acre would purchase immense tracts in Lower Canada and New Brunswick. In the adjoining States it would be difficult to obtain a single lot for less than as many dollars. In and near Stanstead, a border township of Lower Canada, and one of the most improved, 48,000 acres of fine land, of which Governor Sir R. S. Milne, obtained a grant to himself in 1810, was recently sold at the price of 2s. per acre. Mr. Stayner, the deputy post master general, one of the largest proprietors of wild land in Lower Canada, says: "20 years ago, or thereabout, I purchased wild land at what was then considered a low price, in the natural hope that it would be gradually increasing in value, and that, whenever I might chose to sell, it would be at such a profit as would afford me a fair return for the use of the money employed. So far, however, from realizing this expectation, I now find after the lapse of so many years, when the accumulated interest upon the money invested has increased the cost of the land 150 per cent.—I say I find that I could not, if compelled to sell this land, obtain more for it than it originally cost me." I learned from others besides Mr. Kerr, but quote his words, that "the system pursued in granting crown lands in Lower Canada has been such as to render it impossible to obtain money on mortgage of land, because there is no certainty as to the value: when a sale is forced, there may be a perfect glut in the market and no purchasers." Similar statements might be cited in abundance. It might be supposed by persons unacquainted with the frontier country, that the soil on the American side is of very superior natural fertility. I am positively assured that this is by no means the case; but that, on the whole, superior natural fertility belongs to the British territory. In Upper Canada, the whole of the great peninsula between Lakes Erie and Huron, comprising nearly half the available land of the province, consists of gently undulating alluvial soil, and, with a smaller proportion of inferior land than probably any other tract of similar extent in that part of North America, is generally considered the best grain country on that continent. The soil of the border townships of Lower Canada is allowed on all hands, to be superior to that of the border townships of New York, Vermont, and New Hampshire; while the lands of New Brunswick, equal in natural fertility to those of Maine, enjoy superior natural means of communication. I do not believe that the universal difference in the value of land can anywhere be fairly attributed to natural causes.

Still less can we attribute to such causes another circumstance, which in some measure accounts for the different values of property, and which has a close relation to the subject of the public lands—I mean the great amount of re-emigration from the British colonies to the border states. This is a notorious fact. No body denies it; almost every colonist speaks of it with regret. What the proportion may be of those emigrants from the United Kingdom who, soon after their arrival, remove to the United States, it would be very difficult to ascertain precisely. Mr. Bell Forsyth, of Quebec, who has paid much attention to the subject, and with the best opportunities of observing correctly in both the Canadas, estimates that proportion at sixty per cent. of the whole. Mr. Hawke, the chief agent for emigrants in Upper Canada, calculates that out of two-thirds of the immigrants by the St. Lawrence who reach that province, one-fourth re-emigrate chiefly to settle in the States. It would appear, however, that the amount of emigration from Upper Canada, whether of new comers or others, must be nearer Mr. Forsyth's estimate. The population was reckoned at 200,000 in January 1830. The increase by births since then should have been at least three per cent. per annum, or 54,000. Mr. Hawke states the number of immigrants from Lower Canada, since 1829, to have been 165,000; allowing that these also would have increased at the rate of three per cent. per annum, the whole increase by immigration and births should have been nearly 200,000. But Mr. Hawke's estimate of immigrants takes no account of the very considerable number who enter the province by way of New York and the Erie Canal. Reckoning these at only 50,000, which is probably under the truth, and making no allowance for their increase by births, the entire population of Upper Canada should now have been 500,000, whereas it is, according to the most reliable estimates, not over 400,000. It would therefore appear, making all allowance for errors in this calculation, that the number of people who have emigrated from Upper Canada to the United States, since 1829, must be equal to more than half of the number who have entered the province during the eight years. Mr. Baillie, the present Commissioner of Crown lands in New Brunswick, says, "a great many emigrants arrive in the province, but they generally proceed to the United States, as there is not sufficient encouragement for them in this province." Mr. Morris, the present Commissioner of Crown lands, and surveyor-general of Nova Scotia, speaks in almost similar terms of the emigrants who reach that province by way of Halifax.

I am far from asserting that the very inferior value of land in the British colonies, and the re-emigration of immigrants, are altogether occasioned by mismanagement in the disposal of public lands. Other defects and errors of government must have had a share in producing these lamentable results; but I only speak the opinion of all the more intelligent, and let me add, some of the most loyal of your Majesty's subjects in North America, when I say that this has been the principal cause of these great evils. This opinion rests upon their personal acquaintance with numerous facts. Some of these facts I will now state. They have been selected from a much greater number, as being peculiarly calculated to illustrate the faults of the system, its influence on the condition of the people, and the necessity of a thorough reform, I may add, that many of them form the subject of despatches which I have addressed to your Majesty's Secretary of State.

I have observed before that nearly all of the different methods pursued by the government have had one mischievous tendency in particular; they have tended to place a vast extent of land out of the control of government, and yet to retain it in a state of wilderness.— This evil has been produced in all the colonies alike, to that extent, and with what injurious consequences, will be made apparent by the following illustrative statements:—

By official returns which accompany this report, it appears that, out of about 17,000,000 of acres comprised within the surveyed districts of Upper Canada, less than 1,600,000 acres are yet unappropriated, and this amount includes 450,000 acres the reserve for roads, leaving less than 1,200,000 acres open to grant; and of this remnant 500,000 acres are required to satisfy claims for grants founded on pledges by the government. In the opinion of Mr. Raden-hurst, the really acting surveyor-general, the remaining 700,000 consist for the most part of land inferior in position or quality. It may almost be said, therefore, that the whole of the public lands in Upper Canada have been alienated by the government. In Lower Canada, out of 6,169,963 acres in the surveyed townships, nearly 4,000,000 acres have been granted or sold; and there are unsatisfied but indisputable claims for grants to the amount of about 500,000. In Nova Scotia nearly 6,000,000 of acres have been granted, and in the opinion of the surveyor-general only about one-eighth of the land which remains to the Crown, or 800,000 acres, is available for the purposes of settlement. The whole of Prince Edward's Island, about 1,400,000 acres, was alienated in one day. In New Brunswick 4,400,000 acres have been granted or sold, leaving to the Crown about 11,000,000 of which 5,500,000 are considered fit for immediate settlement.

Of the lands granted in Upper and Lower Canada, upwards of 3,000,000 acres consist of "clergy reserves," being for the most part lots of 200 acres each, scattered at regular intervals over the whole face of the townships, and remaining, with few exceptions, entirely wild to this day. The evils produced by the system of reserving land for the clergy have become notorious, even in this country; and a common opinion I believe prevails here, not only that the system has been abandoned, but that measures of remedy have been adopted. This opinion is incorrect in both points. In respect of every new township in both provinces reserves are still made for the clergy, just as before; and the act of the Imperial Parliament which permits the sale of Clergy Reserves, applies to only one-fourth of the quantity. The select committee of the House of Commons on the civil government of Canada reported, in 1828, that "these reserved lands, as they are at present distributed over the country, retard more than any other circumstance the improvement of the colony, lying as they do in detached portions of each township, and intervening between the occupations of actual settlers, who have no means of cutting roads through the woods and morasses, which thus separate them from their neighbours." This description is perfectly applicable to the present state of things. In no perceptible degree has the evil been remedied.

The system of clergy reserves was established by the act of 1791, commonly called the Constitutional Act, which directed that, in respect of all grants made by the Crown, a quantity equal to one-seventh of the land so granted should be reserved for the clergy. A quantity equal to one-seventh of all grants would be one-eighth of each township, or of all the public land. Instead of this proportion, the practice has been, ever since the act passed, and in the clearest violation of its provisions, to set apart for the clergy in Upper Canada a seventh of all the land, which is a quantity equal to a sixth of the land granted. There have been appropriated for this purpose 300,000 acres, which legally, it is manifest, belong to the public. And of the amount for which clergy reserves have been sold in that province, namely, £317,000 (of which about £100,000 have been already received and invested in the English funds,) the sum of about £45,000 should belong to the public.

In Lower Canada, the same violation of the law has taken place, with this difference—that upon every sale of crown and clergy reserves, a fresh reserve for the clergy has been made, equal to a fifth of such reserves. The result has been the appropriation for the clergy of 673,567 acres, instead of 446,000, being an excess of 227,559 acres, or half as much again as they ought to have received. The Lower Canada fund already produced by sales amounts to £50,000, of which, therefore, a third, or about £16,000, belong to the public. If, without any reform of this abuse, the whole of the unsold clergy reserves in both provinces should fetch the average price at which such lands have hitherto sold, the public would be wronged to the amount of about £280,000; and the reform of this abuse will produce a certain and almost immediate gain to the public of £60,000. In referring, for further explanation of this subject, to a paper in the appendix which has been drawn up by Mr. Hanson, a member of the commission of inquiry which I appointed for all the colonies, I am desirous of stating my own conviction that the clergy have had no part in this great misappropriation of the public property, but that it has arisen entirely from heedless misconception, or some other error, of the civil government of both provinces.

The great objection to reserves for the clergy is, that those for whom the land is set apart never have attempted, and never could successfully attempt, to cultivate or settle the property, and that, by that special appropriation, so much land is withheld from settlers, and kept in a state of waste, to the serious injury of all settlers in its neighbourhood. But it would be a great mistake to suppose that this is the only practice by which such injury has been, and still is, inflicted on actual settlers. In the two Canadas, especially, the practice of rewarding, or attempting to reward, public services by grants of public land, has produced, and is still producing, a degree of injury to actual settlers which it is difficult to conceive without having witnessed it. The very principle of such grants is bad, inasmuch as, under any circumstances, they must lead to an amount of appropriation beyond the wants of the community, and greatly beyond the proprietor's means of cultivation and settlement. In both the Canadas, not only has this principle been pursued with reckless profusion, but the local executive governments have managed, by violating or evading the instructions which they received from the Secretary of State, to add incalculably to the mischiefs that would have arisen at all events.

In Upper Canada, 3,200,000 acres have been granted to "U. E. Loyalists," being refugees from the United States, who settled in the province before 1787, and their children; 730,000 acres to militia men; 450,000 acres to discharged soldiers and sailors; 255,000 acres to magistrates and barristers; 136,000 acres to executive councillors, and their families; 50,000 acres to five legislative councillors, and their families; 36,900 acres to clergymen, as private property; 264,000 acres to persons contracting to make surveys, 92,526 acres to officers of the army and navy, 500,000 acres for the endowment of schools, 48,520 acres to colonel Talbot, 12,000 acres to the heirs of General Brock, and 12,000 acres to Doctor Mountain, a former Bishop of Quebec; making altogether, with the clergy reserves, nearly half of all the surveyed land in the province. In Lower Canada, exclusively of grants to refugee loyalists, as to the amount of which the Crown Lands' Department could furnish me with no information, 450,000 acres have been granted to militiamen, to executive councillors 72,000 acres, to Governor Milne about 48,000 acres, to Mr. Cushing and another, upwards of 100,000 acres (as a reward for giving information in a case of high treason,) to officers and soldiers 200,000 acres, and to "leaders of townships" 1,457,209 acres, making altogether, with the clergy reserves, rather more than half of the surveyed lands originally at the disposal of the Crown.

In Upper Canada, a very small proportion (perhaps less than a tenth) of the land thus granted, has been even occupied by settlers, much less reclaimed and cultivated. In Lower Canada with the exception of a few townships bordering on the American frontier, which have been comparatively well settled, in despite of the proprietors, by American squatters, it may be said that nineteen twentieths of these grants are still unsettled, and in a perfectly wild state.

No other result could have been expected in the case of those classes of grantees whose station would preclude them from settling in the wilderness, and whose means would enable them to avoid exertion for giving immediate value to their grants; and, unfortunately, the land which was intended for persons of a poorer order, who might be expected to improve it by their labour, has, for the most part, fallen into the hands of land-jobbers of the class just mentioned, who have never thought of settling in person, and who retain the land in its present wild state, speculating upon its acquiring a value at some distant day, when the demand for land shall have increased through the increase of population.

In Upper Canada, says Mr. Bolton, himself a great speculator and holder of wild land "the plan of granting large tracts of land to gentlemen who have neither the muscular strength to go into the wilderness, nor, perhaps, the pecuniary means to improve their grants, has been the means of a large part of the country remaining in a state of wilderness. The system of granting land to the children of U. E. Loyalists has not been productive of the benefits expected from it. A very small proportion of the land granted to them has been occupied or improved. A great proportion of such grants were to unmarried females, who very readily, disposed of them for a small consideration, frequently from £2 to £5 for a grant of 200 acres. The grants made to young men were also frequently sold for a small consideration; they generally had parents with whom they lived, and were therefore not disposed to move to their grants of land, but preferred remaining with their families. I do not think one-tenth of the lands granted to U. E. Loyalists has been occupied by the persons to whom they were granted, and in a great proportion of cases not occupied at all." Mr. Radenhurst says, "the general price of these grants was from a gallon of rum to perhaps £6, so that while millions of acres were granted in this way, the settlement of the province was not advanced, nor the advantage of the grantee secured in the manner that we may suppose to have been contemplated by government." He also mentions amongst extensive purchasers of these grants, Mr. Hamilton, a member of the Legislative Council, who bought about 100,000 acres; Chief Justices Emslie and Powell, and Solicitor General Grey, who purchased from 20,000 to 50,000 acres: and states that several members of the Executive and Legislative Councils, as well as of the House of Assembly, were "very large purchasers."

In Lower Canada, the grants to "leaders and associates" were made by an evasion of instructions which deserve a particular description.

By instructions to the local executive, immediately after the passing of the constitutional act, it was directed that "because great inconveniencies had theretofore arisen in many of the colonies in America from the granting excessive quantities of land to particular persons who have never cultivated or settled the same, and have thereby prevented others more industrious from improving such lands: in order, therefore, to prevent the like inconveniencies in future, no farm-lot should be granted to any person, being master or mistress of a family, in any township to be laid out, which should contain more than 200 acres." The instructions then invest the governor with a discretionary power to grant additional quantities in certain cases, not exceeding 1,000 acres. According to these instructions, 200 acres should have been the general amount: 1,200 the maximum, in special cases to be granted to any individual. The greater part, however, of the land (1,457,200 acres) was granted, in fact, to individuals at the rate of from 10,000 to 50,000 to each person. The evasion of the regulations was managed as follows:—A petition, signed by from ten to forty or fifty persons, was presented to the Executive Council, praying for a grant of 1,200 acres to each person, and promising to settle the land so applied for. Such petitions were, I am informed, always granted, the Council being perfectly aware that, under a previous agreement between the applicants (of which the form was prepared by the then Attorney General, and sold publicly by the law stationers of Quebec,) five-sixths of the land was to be conveyed to one of them, termed the leader, by whose means the grant was obtained. In most cases the leader obtained the whole of the land which had been nominally applied for by fifty persons. A report of a committee of the House of Assembly, known to have been drawn up by the present Solicitor General, speaks of this practice in the following terms: "Your committee unwilling to believe that the above mentioned evasions of his Majesty's gracious instructions had been practised with the knowledge, privity or consent of his Majesty's servants, bound by their oaths, their honour and their duty to obey them, instituted a long and patient investigation into the origin of these abuses. They have been painfully but irresistibly led to the conclusion, that they were fully within the knowledge of individuals in this colony who possessed and abused his Majesty's confidence. The instruments by which this evasion was to be carried into effect were devised by his Majesty's Attorney General for the time being, printed and publicly sold in the capital of this province; and the principal intermediate agent was his Majesty's late Assistant Surveyor General."

In order to reward militiamen in Lower Canada, who had served on the frontier during the war, the Duke of Richmond, acting, as it would appear, under instructions from the home government, but of which no copy is extant in the public offices at Quebec, promised grants of land to many thousand persons inhabiting all parts of the province. The intentions of the home government appear to have been most praiseworthy. How effectually they have been defeated by the misconduct of the local executive will appear from a report on the subject in the appendix (A.) and the following copy of the instructions given to commissioners whom I appointed in order to expedite the settlement of militia claims. I would also refer to the evidence of Mr. Kerr, Mr. Morin, Mr. Davidson, and Mr. Langevin:—

"TO THE COMMISSIONERS OF UNSETTLED MILITIA CLAIMS.

"CASTLE OF ST. LEWIS, QUEBEC,
12th SEPT'R. 1838.

"GENTLEMEN—I am directed by his Excellency the Governor General, in furnishing you with some instructions for your guidance in disposing of unsettled militia claims, to state the views which he takes on this subject, and has represented to her Majesty's government.

"His Excellency is of opinion that, if any reliance is to be placed on the concurrent testimony of all from whom he has derived information on the subject, the report of the Commissioner of Crown Lands and Emigration, on which his recent proclamation is founded, contains but a faint description of the injury inflicted on this province, and of the cruel injustice done to the militiamen, by the manner in which the intentions of the home government with respect to these claimants have been defeated by the local executive.

"It appears to his Excellency that the intentions of the Prince Regent in awarding land to those officers and men of the militia who had loyally and gallantly served during the last American war, were, in part, to promote the settlement of wild lands, and the consequent prosperity of the province, but chiefly, there can be no doubt, to bestow upon that body of loyal and gallant men some extraordinary recompence for the privations and dangers which they had cheerfully incurred in defence of the country. His Excellency is satisfied that neither result was obtained in any but so slight a degree as to be scarcely worth notice. But the Governor General perceives on the other hand, that results occurred, as to the great majority of cases, precisely opposite to what the home government had in view. The official delays and obstacles interposed between the militia claimants and the grants to which they were entitled—the impossibility, in many cases, of ever obtaining a grant, even after the most vexatious impediments and delays—the mode of allotting the land in such a manner, that the grant when obtained was often worth nothing at all, and seldom worth the trouble and expense of obtaining it—the necessity of employing and paying agents acquainted with the labyrinths of the crown lands and surveyor general's departments—the expense, uncertainty and harassing trouble attendant upon the pursuit of such a claim—all these circumstances, for which his Excellency is compelled to believe that the public officers were alone to blame, had the effect, he is convinced, in the majority of cases, of converting what the Prince Regent had intended as a boon, into a positive injury to the militia-men. He is assured, as might have been expected, that the militia-men disposed of their claims, often for a mere trifle, to land speculators, who never intended to settle upon the grants, and who have for the most part kept the land in a state of wilderness; thereby defeating the only other intention with which the home government could have determined on making these grants. From a careful inspection of the evidence taken on this subject from official gentlemen, as well as others, his Excellency is led to concur entirely in that part of the commissioners' report, which states, that 'there has been the maximum of injury to the province, with the minimum of benefit to the militia-men.'

"This crying grievance his Excellency finds has been over and over again, and in various forms, represented to the government, but without any attempt, as far as he can discover, to provide an adequate remedy for it. He is encouraged to hope that the measure on which he has determined may, as respects the claims yet unsettled, be the means of carrying into effect, however tardily, the objects of the Prince Regent, by conferring a considerable boon on those meritorious but long-disappointed claimants, and conducing to the settlement of the lands which may thus be alienated by the crown.

"The Governor General further directs me to make you acquainted with his confident expectation that you will proceed, with the utmost despatch not incompatible with accuracy, to determine all unsettled claims; that, in awarding orders to persons whose claims could not have been admitted under the original proclamation, but will now be held valid, you will take care not to admit any claims except those of the six battalions, and of others who actually served for the same period, and precisely in the same manner as the six battalions. His Excellency cannot doubt, moreover, that you will spare no pains in endeavouring to secure to the class of militia-men the advantage which was intended for them alone, and which they ought long since to have received. As one means of this most desirable end, his Excellency is of opinion that you should explain to all claimants, that the orders for a nominal amount of money which you may award will have the full value of money at future sales of crown lands, and ought therefore to be exchangeable for money, if not for the whole sum named in them, still for one of nearly the same amount. I am, &c.

"C. BULLER,

"CHIEF SECRETARY."

The purposes of the home government, judging by the general instructions which they gave to the local executive, would seem to have been dictated by a sincere, and also an enlightened desire, to promote the settlement and improvement of the country. As respects Upper Canada, instructions, dated July, 1827, established as a general rule for the disposal of public lands in future, that free grants should be discontinued, and that a price should be required for land alienated by the crown. The quantity of land disposed of by sale since those instructions were given, amounts to 100,317 acres; the quantity disposed of during the same period by free grant, all in respect of antecedent claims, is about 2,000,000 acres, being about nineteen times as much as has been disposed of according to the new rule.

The instructions were obviously prepared with care for the purposes of establishing a new system, and placing the whole of the disposal of Crown lands in the hands of a commissioner, then for the first time appointed. The commissioner never assumed the control of any other portion of these lands than such as were included in returns made to him by the Surveyor-General, amounting to no more than about 300,000 acres. All the rest of the land open for disposal remained, as previously, under the control of the Surveyor-General, as an agent of the government for locating free grants. The salary of the commissioner was £500 a year, besides fees: the whole service during ten years was the superintendence of the sale of 100,000 acres of wild land. The same person was also Surveyor-General of woods and forests, with a salary of £500 a year, and agent for the sale of Clergy Reserves, with £500 a year.

In Lower Canada, under instructions from the treasury, dated in November, 1826, which were confirmed and further enforced by Lord Goderich in 1831, who manifestly intended to supersede the old system of free grants by an uniform system of sale, 450,469 acres have been sold, and 641,039 acres have, in respect of antecedent claims, been disposed of by free grant; and the object of the new rule of selling was defeated by the large amount of free grants.— Even at this moment, in the two provinces, where I was assured before I left England that the system of selling had been uniformly established by Lord Goderich's regulations of 1831, there are unsettled, but probably indisputable claims for free grants, to the amount of from 1,000,000 to 1,300,000 acres. The main alteration which Lord Goderich's regulations would have made in the system intended to have been established by the treasury instructions of 1826, was to render the price more restrictive of appropriation, by requiring payment in less time, and the payment of interest in the meanwhile. This direction appears to have been totally disregarded in both provinces. As respects Lower Canada, the head of the Crown Lands Department gives the following evidence on the subject:—

"How did it happen that this instruction was not acted upon?—In consequence of a representation from Mr. Felton, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, to Lord Aylmer, the Governor of the province, stating that the terms imposed were too severe, and amounted, in fact, to exacting the whole purchase money down. Lord Aylmer, upon this, authorised Mr. Felton to continue the former practice, and it is understood reported the circumstance to the Home Government. This was in 1832, and the system of longer credit without interest continued to be acted upon until the receipt of Lord Glenelg's despatch of 1837, which required payment in ready money at the time of sale."

I have already pointed out the importance of accurate surveys of the public land. Without these there can be no security of property in land, no certainty even as to the position or boundaries of estates marked out in maps or named in title deeds. In Nova Scotia, says the present Surveyor-General, "there are very many instances of litigation in consequence of inaccurately defined boundaries." Mr. M'Kenzie, a draughtsman of the Surveyor-General's office at Halifax, who is also employed to conduct surveys in the field, says, he "has found it impossible to make correct surveys in consequence of inaccuracy as to former lots of land, from which of necessity he measures, and also from surveys being inaccurately made by persons not qualified. In many cases, also, the boundaries of land granted have never been surveyed or laid out at all. The present state of surveys is inadequate and injurious to the settlement of the land." In New Brunswick, says the present Surveyor-General, "no survey of the province has ever been made, and the surveys of the old grants are extremely erroneous, and expose errors and collisions which could not have been supposed to exist. It frequently has occurred that different grants are made for the same lot of land. I think this system pernicious, and it will some day be very injurious. The usual practice cannot be relied on as giving a settler a grant of land that cannot be disturbed, without great care and a greater expense than a poor settler can afford." In Upper Canada, Mr. Radenhurst asserts that "the surveys throughout the province generally are very inaccurate. This inaccuracy was produced in the first instance by the deficiency of competent persons, and the carelessness with which the surveys were conducted. Latterly the practice introduced by Sir Peregrine Maitland, in spite of the results being pointed out by the then Surveyor-General, of letting out the surveys to any person who was willing to contract for them for a certain quantity of land, produced extreme carelessness and inaccuracy. The surveyors just hurried through the township, and of course made surveys, which, on the ground, are found to be very inaccurate. There are instances in which scarcely a single lot is of the dimensions or in the position actually assigned to it in the diagram. The consequences of this have been confusion and uncertainty in the possessions of almost every man, and no small amount of litigation." As to Lower Canada, the evidence is still more complete and satisfactory. The Commissioner of Crown Lands says, in answer to questions, "I can instance two townships, Shefford and Orford (and how many more may prove inaccurate, as questions of boundary arise, it is impossible to say,) which are very inaccurate in their subdivision. On actual recent survey it has been found that no one lot agrees with the diagram on record. The lines dividing the lots, instead of running perpendicularly according to the diagram, actually run diagonally, the effect of which is necessarily to displace the whole of the lots, upwards of 300 in number, from their true position. The lines dividing the ranges are so irregular as to give to some lots two and a half times the contents of others, though they are all laid down in the diagram as of equal extent: there are lakes also which occupy nearly the whole of some lots that are entirely omitted; I have heard complaints of a similar nature respecting the township of Grenville. I have no reason for believing that the surveys of other townships are more accurate than those of Shefford and Orford, other than that in some parts of the country the same causes of error may not have existed, whether physical causes, such as that of magnetic attraction, where there really was a survey, or, in cases where there was no actual survey, the negligence of the surveyor. The inaccuracy of which I have spoken is confined to that part of the province which is divided into townships. There are 109 townships of about 100 square miles each, including all the land which has been disposed of by the British Government, except the seignories which were erected by that government shortly after the conquest. Similar difficulties to those which might arise in settling a question of title between the Crown and an alleged squatter, arising from the inaccuracy of the township surveys, would extend to all grants and sales by the Crown, and also to all questions of title between persons claiming to have a grant, or to have purchased from the Crown, and alleged squatters on the land asserted to be theirs, and more or less to all cases in which different persons should claim to have received or purchased the same piece of land from the Crown. It is a general observation that this state of the Crown surveys must prove a source of interminable litigation hereafter; it is impossible to say how many cases may arise of double grants of the same land under different designations, arising from the defective state of the surveys. None of such cases have come before me in an official shape, but I apprehend that questions of that nature are waiting in great numbers until lands shall have become more valuable, when the Crown will be called in upon every occasion to defend its own grant, and, considering the state of the surveys, will be without the means of such defence, unless measures to prevent the evil should be adopted before its occurrence. In common with every person who has ever reflected on the subject, I consider this a subject of very high importance, and demanding the immediate attention of Government." Mr. Daly, the Secretary of the province, says—"an accurate survey of the whole of the ungranted lands in the province I believe to be extremely desirable and necessary to quiet doubts that have arisen in the minds of many new settlers as to the correctness of their boundaries." Mr. Patrick Daly, commissioned Surveyor of the province, gives the following evidence:—

"You are just come to Quebec to make a representation as to the state of the township of Durham?—I am.

"What is the point which you wish to ascertain?—Whether I can have authority to establish a new line between the 6th and 7th ranges of the township of Durham.

"What would be the consequence of such a change?—In consequence of a part of the old range line being found incorrect to the extent of 60 perches, whereby the 7th would lose about one-fifth of its dimension, and the same amount would be improperly added to the 6th; the change I wish to make would set this right.

"How did you discover that the line was incorrect?—In consequence of having been employed by Captain Ployart of Durham, to run the side lines of lot No. 15, in the 6th range, in order to determine the extent of his property, he being the proprietor of that lot, I discovered that the line was incorrect, as I have described already; and I cannot proceed to rectify the error without authority from the governor, or some person appointed by the governor, as we have not any laws in the province to enable me to make a new range-line, as the old range-line is not to be found, with the exception of a small part, which is in the wrong place, as I have described.

"Would a new line have the effect of taking away land, in actual possession, from any person, and giving it to another?—Yes, it would.

"Do you suppose that the other range-lines in this township are correct or incorrect?—Some are correct, but they are generally incorrect; my attention, however, has not been particularly called to them.

"Are not the proprietors of the other lots which are incorrect anxious to have the limits of their property settled?—Yes, very anxious; more particularly the inhabitants of the 3rd range, about one quarter of whose property is taken by the inhabitants of the 2nd range, through the means of an erroneous old range-line, as has been proved by various subsequent surveys duly sworn to. I am requested by all the inhabitants of the 3rd range to take steps to obtain a new range-line.

"Have they ever applied before for this rectification of the survey?—Yes; they applied to the surveyor general's department, by a statement made by me, and now in the surveyor general's office; but the answer was, that there was no law in the province to authorize the changing of a range-line, however incorrect, without the consent of all the parties concerned.

"Then all parties did not concur in this case?—No, they did not.

"Why not?—Because many of those who improperly gained by the error wished to retain what rightly belonged to their neighbour.

"As the former application was fruitless, upon what ground do you now proceed?—Upon the confidence that, as Lord Durham has greater powers than other governors, he may be pleased to consider the great loss of property to the people, and give orders to correct the evil.

"Are you acquainted with other townships?—Yes.

"Have you found the surveys of them generally correct or incorrect?—I have found the surveys of the township of Windsor as incorrect, or even more so, than the township of Durham, which can be proved by the most reliable testimony. Generally, with the exception of the township of Wickham, I have found them quite incorrect. I speak only from my personal experience, and not from what I have heard."

Mr. Sewell, recently chief justice of the province, says:—

"I have known of many defects in the surveys, which have appeared in many cases before me, and am apprehensive that they are very numerous. I can only state, from my own opinion, two remedies by which these defects may be in some degree remedied: the one is, by running anew the outline of the several townships; the other, an act to give quiet possession, such as has been heretofore passed in other provinces. I am afraid that running the outlines of the townships would not be of any great benefit beyond exposing the errors." Mr. Kerr says:—"It is generally understood that the surveys in many of the various townships are very inaccurate; and many of the surveys have been found to be so. I had in my hand the other day a patent for four lots in the township of Inverness, three of which did not exist, granted to a Captain Skinner. Three of the lots were decided not to be in existence; and I received compensation for them in another township. A great error was discovered in the original survey of the township of Leeds. The inaccuracy of the surveys is quite a matter of certainty. I could cite a number of townships—Milton, Upton, Orford, Shefford, &c.—where the inaccuracy has been ascertained. Inconvenience from the inaccuracy of the surveys has been felt; but it is only now beginning to be so seriously. As the settlement of the country advances, and land acquires a greater value, great inconvenience must arise in the shape of endless questions of title; and of this many people are so well aware, that they refuse to sell with a guarantee of title."

I may add, generally, that I found the surveying department in Lower Canada so thoroughly inefficient in its constitution, as to be incapable of any valuable improvement; and that I therefore abstained from interfering with it, trusting that the whole future management of the public lands would be placed on a new footing, calculated to remedy this, as well as all the other evils of the present system.

Another of those evils requires some notice here. In the United States the title to land purchased of the government is obtained immediately and securely, on payment of the purchase money. In all the British colonies there is more or less of useless formality, and consequent delay, in procuring a complete title to land which has been paid for. Dr. Baldwin, speaking of Upper Canada, says:—"I do not know that there was any more constant subject of complaint on the part of individuals against the government, than the delays of office, especially in connection with land granting. It frequently happened to myself, and I believe to others also, that during the time when free grants of land, of small amount, were made to actual settlers, persons who had spent their money in waiting for the completion of the grant, have applied to me for employment while the patent was being perfected, and I have furnished it for a short time. The most striking instance that occurred in my knowledge, in which an individual was injured by the delay to which he was exposed in this respect, was that of a man of the name of Burnes, who, in Sir Peregrine Maitland's time, having fallen in debt to some persons whom he had employed, was pressed by them for the money. At this time a patent was in progress through the offices for him. He applied to his creditors to give him time till his patent was completed, which would enable him to raise money to pay them. The creditors were willing, and waited for some time, but at last became impatient, and they arrested him, and he was compelled to go to prison. The patent had passed through the offices, but he was compelled to remain in prison a fortnight, while the patent was sent over to the Governor for his signature, at his residence near the Falls of Niagara." A recent act of the legislature of Upper Canada has greatly mitigated this evil, which, however, remains in full force in Lower Canada. Mr. Kerr says:—"As soon as the purchaser has paid the last instalment, he is referred to the Crown Lands Officer, to whom the payment is made, for patent to the Surveyor-General for the necessary specification. Then the specification, with reference, is sent to the Commissioner of Crown Lands. These documents are next sent to the Secretary of the Governor, or Civil Secretary, who directs the Provincial Secretary to engross the patent. The fees are then levied, and, upon the payment of the fees, the Provincial Secretary engrosses. On engrossment being made, the Governor signs the patent, and the great seal of the province is attached to it. The signature is procured by the Provincial Secretary. The patent is then sent to the Commissioner of Crown Lands to be audited.—At present one of the commissioners audits: this used to be done by the auditor, but the office of auditor has been abolished. When the audit is made, the title is said to be perfected.—The effect of having to refer to so many persons has been the total loss of many references, and the papers connected with them, in one or other of the offices. There have been cases in which I was referred three times for the same patent, all the papers having been lost twice successively. In some cases the papers are found again, but at too late a period to be available. The shortest time within which I have known a title to be perfected is about six weeks, and the longest about eight years. More than ordinary diligence was used in the case of six weeks. I obtained an order from the Governor for a special reference for my patent to take priority of all others then in the office. The average period required for completing a title, after the purchase has been completed by the payment of the whole of the purchase-money, is full fifteen months. I am satisfied that the present system is a serious impediment to the settlement of the country; and that no extensive measure for that purpose can work well, unless the mode of obtaining title after purchase be rendered much more simple. Immediate dispatch with title is what is required to encourage purchasers, and prevent uncertainty and discontent. I have been directed by purchasers to apply for the return of their purchase-money from the Crown, because of the delay which has occurred. The present system is so profitable to agents, that, speaking as an agent, I should be sorry to see it abolished. One of the inconveniences to the public is the necessity of employing agents acquainted with the labyrinths through which each reference has to pass."

The results of this general mismanagement are thus illustrated by the chief Agent for emigrants in Upper Canada:—

"The principal evils to which settlers in a new township are subject, result from the scantiness of population. A township contains 80,000 acres of land; one-seventh is reserved for the clergy, and one-seventh for the crown; consequently five-sevenths remain for the disposal of government, a large proportion of which is taken up by grants to U. E. Loyalists, militiamen, officers and others; the far greater part of these grants remain in an unimproved state. These blocks of wild land place the actual settler in an almost hopeless condition; he can hardly expect, during his lifetime, to see his neighbourhood contain a population sufficiently dense to support mills, schools, post-offices, places of worship, markets or shops; and without these, civilization retrogrades. Roads under such circumstances can neither be opened by the settlers, nor kept in proper repair, even if made by the government. The inconvenience arising from want of roads is very great, and is best illustrated by an instance which came under my own observation in 1834. I met a settler from the township of Warwick, on the Caradoc plains, returning from the grist-mill at Westminster with the flour and bran of thirteen bushels of wheat. He had a yoke of oxen and a horse attached to his waggon, and had been absent nine days, and did not expect to reach home till the following evening. Light as his load was, he assured me that he had to unload wholly or in part several times, and after driving his waggon through the swamps, to pick out a road through the woods where the swamps or gullies were fordable, and to carry the bags on his back and replace them in the waggon. Supposing the services of the man and his team to be worth two dollars per day, the expense of transport would be twenty dollars. As the freight of wheat from Toronto to Liverpool (England) is rather less than 2s. 6d. per bushel, it follows that a person living in this city could get the same wheat ground on the banks of the Mersey, and the flour and bran returned to him at a much less expense than he could transport it from the rear of Warwick to Westminster and back—a distance less than ninety miles. Since 1834 a grist-mill has been built in Adelaide, the adjoining township, which is a great advantage to the Warwick settlers; but the people in many parts of the province still suffer great inconvenience from the same cause."

Mr. Rankin, deputy land surveyor, says, "The system of making large grants to individuals who had no intention of settling them, has tended to retard the prosperity of the colony by separating the actual settlers, and rendering it so much more difficult, and in some cases impossible, to make the necessary roads. It has also made the markets more distant and more precarious. To such an extent have these difficulties been experienced as to occasion the abandonment of settlements which had been formed. I may mention, as an instance of this, the township Rama, where, after a trial of three years, the settlers were compelled to abandon their improvements. In the township of St. Vincent, almost all the most valuable settlers have left their farms from the same cause. There have been numerous instances in which, though the settlement has not been altogether abandoned, the most valuable settlers, after unavailing struggles of several years with the difficulties which I have described, have left their farms." This witness, who was for ten years employed by government as deputy surveyor in the Western District, which I have before described as the finest grain country in North America, states that "nine-tenths of the land granted by the crown in that district are still in a state of wilderness."

For illustrations of the same kind as respects Lower Canada, I would refer to the testimony of the commissioner of crown lands, Mr. Kerr, the deputy post-master general, Mr. Russell, Major Head, Mr. Kough, the late Chief Justice, and Mr. Lemesurier.

Mr. Kerr says, "The main obstacle to the speedy settlement and cultivation of all the more fertile parts of the province is private land remaining wild; inasmuch as the land of the crown is open to purchase, which is not generally the case with that of private individuals, excepting at too exorbitant a price. So injurious is the existence of this quantity of wild land in the midst or in the neighbourhood of a settlement, that numerous cases have occurred in which a settler, after several years residence upon his property, and having expended in labour from £20 to £50 in clearing part of it and building his house, has been driven to abandon the farm, and to sell it for one-third, or even one-fourth of the sum that he had expended upon it. I have myself bought farms which have been abandoned in this way, for the merest trifle. One, I recollect now, consisted of 100 acres, in the township of Kingsey, a beautiful part of the district of Three Rivers, with rather more than 20 acres cleared, and a good house and out-houses erected upon it, for which I paid under £30. I could give very many instances of a similar kind, where I have either purchased myself, or have had a personal knowledge of the circumstances."

One of the most remarkable instances of evils resulting from profuse grants of land is to be found in Prince Edward's island. Nearly the whole of the island (about 1,400,000 acres) was alienated in one day, in very large grants, chiefly to absentees, and upon conditions which have been wholly disregarded. The extreme improvidence which dictated these grants is obvious; the neglect of the government as to enforcing the conditions of the grant, in spite of the constant efforts of the people and the legislature to force upon its attention the evils under which they laboured, is not less so. The great bulk of the island is still possessed by absentees, who hold it as a sort of reversionary interest, which requires no present attention, but may become valuable some day or other, through the growing wants of the inhabitants. But in the meantime, the inhabitants are subjected to the greatest inconvenience, nay, to the most serious injury, from the state of property in land. The absent proprietors neither improve the land, nor will let others improve it. They retain the land and keep it in a state of wilderness. I have, in another place, adverted to the remedy proposed, and the causes which have long retarded its adoption. The feelings of the colonists upon the subject are fully expressed in the evidence of Mr. Lelacheur, Mr. Solicitor General Hodgson, and the Governor, Sir Charles Fitzroy. I may add, that their testimony was confirmed by that of the delegates from the island who visited me at Quebec.

In the above enumeration of facts, I do not profess to have exhausted the long catalogue of evils and abuses which were brought to my notice. But I have stated enough I trust, to establish the position with which I set out—that the disposal of public lands in a new country has more influence on the prosperity of the people than any other branch of government; and further, to make it evident that the still existing evils which have been occasioned by mismanagement in this department, are so great and general as to require a comprehensive and effectual remedy, applied to all the colonies, before any merely political reform can be expected to work well.

I now proceed to another subject, which though intimately connected with the colonization and improvement of the provinces, must yet be considered separately: for it is one in which not the colonial population only, but the people of the United Kingdom have a deep and immediate interest, I allude to the manner in which the emigration of the poorer classes from Great Britain and Ireland to the North American Colonies has hitherto been conducted.

About nine years ago, measures were for the first time taken to ascertain the number of immigrants arriving at Quebec by sea. The number during these nine years has been 263,089; and there have been as many in one year (1832) as 51,746. In the year before, the number was 50,254; in 1833, 21,752; in 1834, 30,935; in 1835, 12,527; in 1836, 27,728; in 1837, 22,500; and in 1838, only 4,992. The great diminution in 1838 was occasioned solely, I believe, by the vague fears entertained in this country of dangers presented by the distracted state of the colonies. I am truly surprised, however, that emigration of the poorer classes to the Canadas did not almost entirely cease some years ago; and that this would have been the case, if the facts which I am about to state had been generally known in the United Kingdom, there can, I think, be no rational doubt.

Dr. Morin, a gentleman of high professional and personal character, Inspecting Physician of the port of Quebec, and Commissioner of the Marine and Emigrant Hospital, says—"I am almost at a loss for words to describe the state in which the emigrants frequently arrived; with a few exceptions, the state of the ships was quite abominable; so much so, that the harbour master's boat-men had no difficulty, at the distance of a gun-shot, either when the wind was favourable or in a dead calm, in distinguishing, by the odour alone, a crowded emigrant ship. I have known as many as from thirty to forty deaths to have taken place, in the course of a voyage, from typhus fever, on board of a ship containing from 500 to 600 passengers; and within six weeks after the arrival of some vessels, and the landing of the passengers at Quebec, the hospital has received upwards of 100 patients, at different times from among them. On one occasion, I have known nearly 400 patients at one time in the emigrant hospital of Quebec, for whom there was no sufficient accommodation: and, in order to provide them with some shelter, Dr. Painchaud, the then attending physician, with the aid of other physicians, incurred a personal debt to the Quebec bank, to a considerable amount—which, however, was afterwards paid by the provincial legislature.” * * * * *

“The mortality was considerable among the emigrants at that time, and was attended with most disastrous consequences: children being left without protection, and wholly dependent on the casual charity of the inhabitants of the city. As to those who were not sick on arriving, I have to say, that they were generally forcibly landed by the masters of vessels, without a shilling in their pockets to procure them a night's lodging—and very few of them with the means of subsistence for more than a very short period. They commonly established themselves along the wharves, and at the different landing places, crowding into any place of shelter they could obtain, where they subsisted principally upon the charity of the inhabitants. For six weeks at a time, from the commencement of the emigrant-ship seasons, I have known the shores of the river along Quebec, for about a mile and a half, crowded with these unfortunate people—the places of those who might have moved off being constantly supplied by fresh arrivals; and there being daily drafts of from ten to thirty taken to the hospital, with infectious disease. The consequence was, it spread among the inhabitants of the city—especially in the districts in which these unfortunate creatures had established themselves. Those who were not absolutely without money, got into low taverns and boarding-houses and cellars, where they congregated in immense numbers, and where their state was not any better than it had been on board ship. This state of things existed, within my knowledge, from 1826 to 1832, and probably for some years previously.”

Dr. Morin's testimony is confirmed by that of Dr. Skey, Deputy Inspector General of hospitals, and President of the Quebec Emigrants' Society. He says—“Upon the arrival of emigrants in the river, a great number of sick have landed. A regular importation of contagious diseases into this country has annually taken place; that disease originated on board ship, and was occasioned, I should say, by bad management, in consequence of the ships being ill-found, ill-provisioned, over-crowded, and ill-ventilated. I should say, that the mortality during the voyage has been dreadful; to such an extent that, in 1834, the inhabitants of Quebec, taking alarm at the number of shipwrecks—at the mortality of the passengers—and the fatal diseases which accumulated at the Quarantine Establishment, at Grosse Isle, and the Emigrant Hospital of this city, involving the inhabitants of Quebec in the calamity, called upon the Emigrants' Society to take the subject into consideration, and make representations to the Government thereon.”

The circumstances described, took place under the operation of the Act 9th Geo. IV., commonly called the Passengers' Act, which was passed in 1825—repealed in 1827—and re-enacted in 1828. In 1835, an amended Passengers' Act was passed—the main features of which, so far as they differed from the former Act, are stated to have been suggested by the Quebec Emigrants' Society. Mr. Jessopp, collector of customs at the port of Quebec, speaking of emigration under the last Act, says—“It very often happens, that poorer emigrants have not a sufficiency of provisions for the voyage; that they should have a sufficiency of provisions, might be enforced under the Act, which authorises the inspection of provisions by the out-port agent for emigrants. Many instances have come to my knowledge, in which, from insufficiency of provisions, emigrants have been thrown upon the humanity of the captain, or the charity of their fellow-passengers. It will appear, also, from the fact that many vessels have more emigrant passengers than the number allowed by law, that sufficient attention is not paid at the out-port to enforce the provisions of the Act, as to the proportions between the numbers and the tonnage. Such instances have not occurred this season (1838)—emigration having almost ceased, in consequence, I presume, of the political state of the province; but last year there were several instances in which prosecution took place. Vessels are chartered for emigration by persons whose sole object is to make money, and who make a trade of evading the provisions of the Act. This applies particularly to vessels coming from Ireland. We have found, in very many instances, that in vessels chartered in this way, the number was greater than allowed by law; and the captains have declared, that the extra numbers smuggled themselves, or were smuggled on board, and were only discovered after the vessel had been several days at sea. This might be prevented by a stricter examination of the vessel. The Imperial Act requires that the names, ages, sex, and occupation of each passenger, should be entered in a list, certified by the customs' officer at the out-port, and delivered by the captain, with the ship's papers to the officers of the customs here. Lists, purporting to be correct, are always delivered to the tide-surveyor, whose duty it is to muster the passengers, and compare them with the list; and this list, in many instances, is wholly incorrect as to names and ages." * * * * * The object of the falsification of the ages is to defraud the revenue, by evading the tax upon emigrants. * * * * * "The falsification of names produces no inconvenience; and I have only referred to it for the purpose of showing the careless manner in which the system is worked by the agents in the United Kingdom." But Dr. Poole, inspecting physician of the Quarantine Station, at Grossé Isle, further explains the fraud, saying—"These falsifications are, first, for the purpose of evading the emigrant tax, which is levied in proportion to age, and the common fraud is to understate the age; and, secondly, for the purpose of carrying more passengers than the law allows, by counting grown persons as children: of which last the law allows a larger proportion to tonnage than of grown persons. This fraud is very common, of frequent occurrence, and it arises manifestly from want of inspection at home."

From this and other evidence, it will appear that the amended Passengers' Act alone, as it has been hitherto administered, would have afforded no efficient remedy of the dreadful evils described by Dr. Morin and Dr. Skey. Those evils have, however, been greatly mitigated by two measures of the provincial government; first, the application of a tax upon passengers from the United Kingdom, to providing shelter, medical attendance, and the means of further transport to destitute emigrants; secondly, the establishment of the quarantine station, at Grossé Isle, a desert island, some miles below Quebec, where all vessels arriving with cases of contagious disease are detained; the diseased persons are removed to an hospital, and emigrants not affected with disease are landed, and subjected to some discipline for the purpose of cleanliness, the ship also being cleaned while they remain on shore. By these arrangements, the accumulation of wretched paupers at Quebec, and the spread of contagious disease, are prevented. An arrangement, made only in 1837, whereby the quarantine physician, at Grossé Isle, decides whether or not an emigrant ship shall be detained there, or proceed on its voyage, has, to use the words of Dr. Poole, "operated as a premium to care and attention on the part of the captain, and has had a salutary effect on the comfort of the emigrants."

I cordially rejoice in these improvements, but would observe, that the chief means by which the good has been accomplished, indicates the greatness of the evil that remains. The necessity of a quarantine establishment for preventing the importation of contagious disease from Great Britain to her colonies, as if the emigrants had departed from one of those eastern countries which are the home of the plague, shows, beyond a doubt, either that our very system of emigration is most defective, or that it is most carelessly administered.

It is, I know, contended in this country that, though great defects existed formerly, present arrangements are very different, and no longer objectionable. For example, in the report of the Agent General for emigration from the United Kingdom, ordered by the House of Commons to be printed 14th May, 1838, it is stated, with reference to that emigration to the Canadas, before the year 1832, which has been described by Dr. Morrin and Dr. Skey, eye-witnesses of the miseries and calamities that took place, that "these great multitudes had gone out by their own means, and disposed of themselves through their own efforts, without any serious or lasting inconvenience." * * * * * "A practice," it is added, "which appeared to thrive so well spontaneously."

The same report states, with reference to the present operation of the Passengers' Act, and the officers employed by the colonial department to superintend its execution, that "their duty is to give ease and security to the resort to the colonies, and to promote the observance of the salutary provisions of the Passengers' Act. In all that relates to emigration they constitute, as it were, in every port, the appointed poor man's friend. They take notice whether the ship offered for his conveyance is safe and fit for its purpose; they see to the sufficiency of the provisions on board; they prohibit over-crowding; and make every effort to avert or to frustrate those numerous and heartless frauds which are but too constantly attempted, at the moment of departure, upon the humbler classes of emigrants." "Every effort," adds the reporter, speaking of emigrants to North America, "is made for the ease and safety of their transit."

At Quebec, at least, where are landed the great majority of emigrants to the North American colonies, an opinion prevails which is greatly at variance with the above representation. Nobody in the colony denies that the Passengers' Act, and the appointment of agents to superintend its execution, is a considerable improvement upon the utterly lawless and unobserved practices of former times; nor, I should imagine, would any one in this country object to such an approach, however distant, to the systematic and responsible management of emigration, which has been repeatedly urged upon the government of late years; but that there is still great room for further improvement, as respects emigration to the colonies in North America, is, I think, established by Mr. Jessopp, and the following evidence of Dr. Poole:—

Dr. Poole holds an important office, of which I am enabled to state that he has performed the duties with great skill and exemplary diligence. He did not volunteer the information he has supplied. He was summoned to give evidence before the Commissioners of inquiry on Crown Lands and Emigration; and it was in answer to questions put to him that he said, 'I have been attached to the station at Grosse Isle for the last six years. My description applies down to the present year. We had last year upwards of 22,000 emigrants. The poorer class of Irish, and the English paupers, sent by parishes, were, on the arrival of vessels, in many instances, entirely without provisions, so much so, that it was necessary immediately to supply them with food from shore; and some of these ships had already received food and water from other vessels with which they had fallen in. Other vessels with the same class of emigrants, were not entirely destitute, but had suffered much privation by being placed on short allowance. This destitution, or shortness of provisions, combined with dirt and bad ventilation, had invariably produced fevers of a contagious character, and occasioned some deaths on the passage; and from such vessels numbers varying from 20 to 90 each vessel, had been admitted to hospital with contagious fevers immediately on their arrival. I attribute the whole evil to defective arrangements: for instance, parish emigrants from England receive rations of biscuit and beef, or pork, often of bad quality (of this I am aware from personal inspection); they are incapable from sea-sickness of using this solid food at the beginning of the passage, when, for want of small stores, such as tea, sugar, coffee, oatmeal and flour, they fall into a state of debility and low spirits, by which they are incapacitated from the exertions required for cleanliness and exercise, and also indisposed to solid food, more particularly the women and children; and, on their arrival here, I find many cases of typhus fever among them.' * * * 'I also wish to mention as loudly calling for remedy, a system of extortion carried on by masters of vessels, chiefly from Ireland, whence come the bulk of our emigrants. The captain tells emigrants the passage will be made in three weeks or a month, and they need not lay in provisions for any longer period, well knowing that the average passage is six weeks, and that it often extends to eight or nine weeks. When the emigrant's stores are exhausted, the captain, who has laid in a stock for the purpose, obliges them to pay often as much as 400 per cent. on the cost price for the means of subsistence, and thus robs the poor emigrant of his last shilling. Such cases are of frequent occurrence, even down to the present year.' * * * 'Parish emigrants are generally at the mercy of the captain or mate, who serve out the provisions, and who frequently put emigrants on short allowance soon after their departure. Complaints of short weight and bad quality in the provisions are frequently made.' * * * 'The captains have in many instances told me, that the agents only muster the passengers on deck, inquire into the quantity of provisions, and, in some cases, require them to be produced, when occasionally the same bag of meal or other provisions was shown as belonging to several persons in succession. This the captain discovered after sailing. The mere mustering of the passengers on deck, without going below, where the provisions are kept, is really no inspection at all; and it frequently happens that passengers are smuggled on board without any provisions.' * * * 'Very few of these vessels have on board a sufficient quantity of water, the casks being insufficient in number, and very many of them old oak casks, made up with pine heads, which therefore leak, if they do not fall to pieces, which often happens. I have had many similar cases from Liverpool.' * * * 'That part of the law which regulates the height between decks of emigrant ships is frequently evaded in the smaller class of vessels, by means of a false deck some distance below the beams, bringing the passengers nearly in contact with the damp ballast, pressing them into the narrow part of the ship, and the beams taking an important part of the room allotted to them by law. It is quite impossible that such fittings should escape observation in the port of departure, if that part of the vessel intended for emigrants be visited.' * * * 'There is another evil which might be readily obviated by a proper selection of vessels at home—that of employing as emigrant ships vessels that are scarcely sea worthy; and which, consequently being unable to carry sail, make very long passages. As the tonnage of the best class of vessels coming to Canada is more than sufficient to bring all the emigrants in any year, the employment of these bad ships ought not to be permitted.' * * * 'The reports made to me by the class of captains and surgeon superintendents, now bringing passengers, are seldom to be relied upon. In illustration, I beg leave to mention a case that occurred last year. It was a vessel with about 150 passengers on board, from an Irish port. The captain assured me that they had no sickness on board; and the surgeon produced a list, which he signed, of certain slight ailments, such as bowel complaints and catarrhs, which had occurred during the passage, and which appeared on the list with the remark 'cured' to all of them. On making my usual personal inspection, I found and sent to the hospital upwards of 40 cases of typhus fever, of which nine were below in bed: these nine they had not been able to get out of bed. Many of the others were placed against the bulwarks, to make a show of being in health, with pieces of bread and hot potatoes in their hands. As there are many most respectable captains in the lumber trade, a proper selection by the emigrant agents at home would prevent this abuse.' * * * 'The medical superintendence on board vessels, obliged by the Passengers' Act to carry a surgeon, is very defective. The majority of such persons called surgeons are unlicensed students and apprentices, or apothecaries' shopmen, without sufficient medical knowledge to be of any service to the emigrants, either for the prevention or cure of diseases. On board a ship the knowledge of the means of preventing disease in such a situation is the first requisite in a medical man, and in this the medical superintendents are lamentably deficient. It is not much better as to the cure of diseases. I boarded a ship last year, of which the captain and three passengers, who had met with accidents, had their limbs bandaged for supposed fractures, which, upon examination, I found were only simple strains or bruises. On examining the captain's arm, I said that there had been no fracture. The surgeon, so called, replied—'I assure you that the tibia and fibula are both broken.' It happens that the tibia and fibula are bones of the leg. This is an extreme case, apparently; but it is not an unfair illustration of the ignorance and presumption of the class of men appointed to comply with that part of the act which is intended to provide for the medical care of emigrants during the voyage."

The Agent-General's report, which was laid before parliament last year, does not even allude to another feature of our system of emigration, on which I have yet to offer some remarks. However defective the present arrangements for the passage of emigrants, they are not more so than the means employed to provide for the comfort and prosperity of this class after their arrival in the colonies. Indeed it may be said that no such means are in existence. It will be seen, from the very meagre evidence of the agent for emigrants at Quebec, that the office which he holds is next to useless. I cast no blame on the officer, but would only explain, that he has no powers, nor scarcely any duties to perform. Nearly all that is done for the advantage of poor emigrants, after they have passed the Lazaretto, is performed by the Quebec and Montreal Emigrants' Societies—benevolent associations of which I am bound to speak in the highest terms of commendation; to which indeed we owe whatever improvement has taken place in the yet unhealthy mid-way passage, but which, as they were instituted for the main purpose of relieving the inhabitants of the two cities from the miserable spectacle of crowds of unemployed and starving emigrants, so have their efforts produced little other good than that of facilitating the progress of poor emigrants to the United States, where the industrious of every class are always sure of employment at good wages. In the report on emigration, to which I have alluded before, I find favourable mention of the principle of entrusting some parts of the conduct of emigration rather to "charitable committees" than to "an ordinary department of government." From this doctrine I feel bound to express my entire dissent. I can scarcely imagine any obligation which it is more incumbent on government to fulfil than that of guarding against an improper selection of emigrants, and securing to poor persons disposed to emigrate every possible facility and assistance, from the moment of their intending to leave this country, to that of their comfortable establishment in the colony. No less an obligation is incurred by the government, when, as is now the case, they invite poor persons to emigrate by tens of thousands every year. It would, indeed, be very mischievous if the government were to deprive emigrants of self-reliance, by doing everything for them; but when the state leads great numbers of people into a situation in which it is impossible that they should do well without assistance, then the obligation to assist them begins; and it never ends, in my humble opinion, until those who have relied on the truth and paternal care of the government are placed in a situation to take care of themselves. How little this obligation has been regarded, as respects emigration to your Majesty's North American colonies, will be seen from the following evidence:—

Mr. Buchanan, the chief agent for emigrants at Quebec, says, "I have no communication from the agent-general of emigration;" and "the instructions I have mentioned, as regulating the proceedings of my office, do not, I conceive, contain any specific directions as to the duties I have to perform. In fact, they were not addressed to my office at all. I suppose that they were transmitted to my predecessor, in order that he might be acquainted with the views of the home government on the subject." "There may have been specific instructions for the guidance of the agent for emigrants, but I am not aware of any. I have myself followed the routine that I found established."

Dr. Skey says, "A pauper emigrant, on his arrival in this province, is generally either with nothing or with a very small sum in his pocket; entertaining the most erroneous ideas as to his prospects here; expecting immediate and constant employment, at ample wages; entirely ignorant of the nature of the country; and of the place where labour is most in demand, and of the best means by which to obtain employment. He has landed from the ship, and from his apathy and want of energy has loitered about the wharves, waiting for the offer of employment; or, if he obtained employment, he calculated upon its permanency, and found himself, at the beginning of the winter, when there is little or no employment for labour in this part of the country, discharged, and without any provision for the wants of a Canadian winter. In this way, emigrants have often accumulated in Quebec, at the end of summers, encumbered it with indigent inhabitants, and formed the most onerous burden on the charitable funds of the community."

Mr. Forsyth says, "Emigration has improved of late years with regard to the destitute sick and to the totally destitute by means of the emigrant society, and the fund raised by the emigrant tax; but with regard to the main body of emigrants, the evil results of a total want of system are as conspicuous as ever. The great evils that have hitherto existed have arisen from the want of system, and especially from the want of all adequate means of information, advice, and guardianship. This want of information necessarily gives a vagrant character to their movements. Unable to obtain information as to the best mode of proceeding in this province, they move onward to Toronto, and find the same want there; they become disgusted, and leave the province in large numbers, to become citizens of the American Union. My observation on the subject has led me to estimate the proportion of emigrants from Britain who proceed to the United States at 60 in 100 during the last few years."

Mr. Stayner says, "Many of these poor people have little or no agricultural knowledge, even in a general way; and they are all ignorant of the husbandry practised in the country. The consequence is, that, after getting into 'the bush,' as it is called, they find themselves beset by privations and difficulties which they are not able to contend with, and, giving way under the pressure, they abandon their little improvements to seek a livelihood elsewhere.—Many resort to the large towns in the province, with their starving families, to eke out by day-labour and begging together a wretched existence; whilst others of them (more enterprising) are tempted, by the reputed high wages and more genial climate of the United States, to try their fortunes in that country. Now and then, some individual better gifted, and possessing more energy of character than the mass of adventurers who arrive, will successfully contend with those difficulties, and do well for himself and family; but the proportion of such is small."

Mr. Jessopp says, "Emigrants sent out by parishes are very generally inferior, both morally and physically, to those who have found their own way out. The parishes have sent out persons far too old to gain their livelihood by work, and often of drunken and improvident habits. These emigrants have neither benefited themselves nor the country; and this is very natural, for judging from the class sent out, the object must have been the getting rid of them, and not either the benefit of themselves or the colony. An instance occurred very recently which illustrates this subject. A respectable settler in the eastern townships lately returned from England in a vessel, on board of which there were 136 pauper passengers sent out at the expense of their parishes; and out of the whole number he could only select two that he was desirous of inducing to settle in the eastern townships. The conduct of the others, both male and female, was so bad, that he expressed his wish that they might proceed to the Upper Province, instead of settling in this district. He alluded principally to gross drunkenness and unchastity. The inhabitants of Quebec and Montreal are subject to constant appeals from persons who arrive here, and linger about in a state of total destitution."

The most striking example, however, of the want of system and precaution on the part of government, is that of the old soldiers, termed Commuted Pensioners, of whom nearly 3,000 reached the colonies in the years 1832 and 1833. A full description of the fate of these unfortunate people will be found in the evidence of Mr. Davidson and others. Many of them landed in Quebec before the instructions had been received in the colony to pay them the sums to which they were to be entitled on their arrival, and even before the provincial government know of their departure from England. Many of them spent the amount of their commutation money in debauchery, or were robbed of it when intoxicated. Many never attempted to settle upon the land awarded to them; and of those who made the attempt, several were unable to discover whereabouts in the wilderness their grants were situated. Many of them sold their right to the land for a mere trifle, and were left, within a few weeks of their arrival, in a state of absolute want. Of the whole number who landed in the colony, probably not one in three attempted to establish themselves on their grants, and not one in six remain settled there at the present time; the remainder generally lingered in the vicinity of the principal towns, where they contrived to pick up a subsistence by begging and occasional labour. Great numbers perished miserably in the two years of cholera, or from diseases engendered by exposure and privations, and aggravated by their dissolute habits. The majority of them have at length disappeared. The situation of those who survive calls loudly for some measure of immediate relief; it is one of extreme destitution and suffering. Their land is almost entirely useless, and they cannot obtain any adequate employment, either as farm labourers or domestic servants. At the commencement of every winter, therefore, they are thrown upon the charity of individuals. In the upper province their situation is equally deplorable, and numbers must have perished from absolute starvation, if they had not been fed by the provincial government. I confidently trust that their pensions may be restored, and that, in future, whenever the government shall interfere, directly or indirectly, in promoting the emigration of poor persons to these colonies, it will be under some systematic arrangements calculated to prevent the selection of classes disqualified from gaining by their removal, and to guard the other classes from the misfortunes into which they are now apt to fall through ignorance of the new country, and the want of all preparation for their arrival.

It is far from my purpose, in laying these facts before your Majesty, to discourage emigration to your Majesty's North American colonies. On the contrary, I am satisfied that the chief value of these colonies to the mother country consists in their presenting a field where millions even of those who are distressed at home, might be established in plenty and happiness. All the gentlemen whose evidence I have last quoted, are warm advocates of systematic emigration. I object, along with them, only to such emigration as now takes place—without forethought, preparation, method or system of any kind.

I have now brought under review, the most prominent features of the condition and institutions of the British Colonies in North America. It has been my painful task to exhibit a state of things which cannot be contemplated without grief, by all who value the well-being of our colonial fellow-countrymen, and the integrity of the British empire. I have described the operation of those causes of division which unhappily exist in the very composition of society; the disorder produced by the working of an ill-contrived constitutional system, and the practical mis-management which these fundamental defects have generated in every department of government.

It is not necessary that I should take any pains to prove, that this is a state of things which should not, which cannot, continue. Neither the political nor the social existence of any community, can bear much longer the operation of these causes which have, in Lower Canada, already produced a long practical cessation of the regular course of constitutional government; which have occasioned the violation, and necessitated the absolute suspension, of the provincial constitution—and which have resulted in two insurrections—two substitutions of martial for civil law—and two periods of a general abeyance of every guarantee that is considered essential for the protection of a British subject's rights. I have already described the state of feeling which prevails among each of the contending parties, or rather their races; their all-pervading and irreconcilable enmity to each other; the entire and irremediable disaffection of the whole French population, as well as the suspicion with which the English regard the imperial government; and the determination of the French, together with the tendency of the English to seek for a redress of their intolerable present evils in the chances of a separation from Great Britain. The disorders of Lower Canada admit of no delay; the existing form of government is but a temporary and forcible subjugation. The recent constitution is one of which neither party would tolerate the re-establishment, and of which the bad working has been such that no friend to liberty or to order could desire to see the province again subjected to its mischievous influence. Whatever may be the difficulty of discovering a remedy, its urgency is certain and obvious.

Nor do I believe that the necessity for adopting some extensive and decisive measures for the pacification of Upper Canada, is at all less imperative. From the account which I have given of the causes of disorder in that province, it will be seen that I do not consider them by any means of such a nature as to be irremediable, or even to be susceptible of no remedy that shall not effect an organic change in the existing constitution. It cannot be denied, indeed, that the continuance of the many practical grievances which I have described as subjects of complaint, and above all, the determined resistance to such a system of responsible government, as would give the people a real control over its own destinies, have, together with the irritation caused by the late insurrection, induced a large portion of the population to look with envy at the material prosperity of their neighbours in the United States, under a perfectly free and eminently responsible government; and, in despair of obtaining such benefits under their present institutions, to desire the adoption of a Republican Constitution, or even an incorporation with the American Union. But I am inclined to think, that such feelings have made no formidable or irreparable progress; on the contrary, I believe that all the discontented parties, and especially the reformers of Upper Canada, look with considerable confidence to the result of my mission. The different parties believe that when the case is once fairly put before the mother country, the desired changes in the policy of their government will be readily granted: they are now tranquil, and I believe loyal; determined to abide the decision of the home Government, and to defend their property and their country against rebellion and invasion. But I cannot but express my belief, that this is the last effort of their almost exhausted patience—and that the disappointment of their hopes on the present occasion, will destroy for ever their expectation of good resulting from British connection. I do not mean to say that they will renew the rebellion, much less do I imagine that they will array themselves in such force as will be able to tear the government of their country from the hands of the great military power which Great Britain can bring against them. If now frustrated in their expectations, and kept in hopeless subjection to rulers irresponsible to the people, they will, at best, only await in sullen prudence the contingencies which may render the preservation of the province dependent on the devoted loyalty of the great mass of its population.

With respect to the other North American provinces, I will not speak of such evils as imminent, because I firmly believe that, whatever discontent there may be, no irritation subsists which in any way weakens the strong feeling of attachment to the British Crown and Empire. Indeed, throughout the whole of the North American provinces, there prevails among the British population an affection for the mother country, and a preference for its institutions, which a wise and firm policy on the part of the Imperial Government may make the foundation of a safe, honourable, and enduring connexion. But even this feeling may be impaired, and I must warn those in whose hands the disposal of their destinies rests, that a blind reliance on the all-enduring loyalty of our countrymen may be carried too far. It is not politic to waste and cramp their resources, and to allow the backwardness of the British provinces everywhere to present a melancholy contrast to the progress and prosperity of the United States. Throughout the course of the preceding pages, I have constantly had occasion to refer to this contrast. I have not hesitated to do so, though no man's just pride in his country, and firm attachment to its institutions, can be more deeply shocked by the mortifying admission of inferiority. But I should ill discharge my duty to your Majesty, I should give but an imperfect view of the real condition of these provinces, were I to detail mere statistical facts, without describing the feelings which they generate in those who observe them daily, and daily experience their influence on their own fortunes. The contrast which I have described, is the theme of every traveller who visits these countries, and who observes on one side of the line the abundance, and on the other the scarcity, of every sign of material prosperity which thriving agriculture and flourishing cities indicate, and of civilization which schools and churches testify even to the outward senses. While it excites the exultation of the enemies of British institutions, its reality is more strongly evinced by the reluctant admission of your Majesty's most attached subjects. It is no true loyalty to hide from your Majesty's knowledge the existence of an evil which it is in your Majesty's power, as it is your Majesty's benevolent pleasure to remove: for the possibility of reform is yet afforded by the patient and fervent attachment which your Majesty's English subjects in all these provinces still feel to their allegiance and their mother country. Calm reflection and loyal confidence have retained these feelings unimpaired, even by the fearful drawback of the general belief that every man's property is of less value on the British than on the opposite side of the boundary. It is time to reward this noble confidence by showing that men have not indulged in vain the hope that there is a power in British institutions to rectify existing evils, and to produce in their place a well-being which no other dominion could give. It is not in the terrors of the law or in the might of our armies that the secure and honourable bond of connexion is to be found. It exists in the beneficial operation of those British institutions which link the utmost development of freedom and civilization with the stable authority of an hereditary monarchy, and which, if rightly organized and fairly administered in the colonies, as in Great Britain, would render a change of institutions only an additional evil to the loss of the protection and commerce of the British Empire.

But while I count thus confidently on the possibility of a permanent and advantageous retention of our connexion with these important colonies, I must not disguise the mischief and danger of holding them in their present state of disorder. I rate the chances of successful rebellion as the least danger in prospect. I do not doubt that the British government can, if it choose to retain these dependencies at any cost, accomplish its purpose. I believe that it has the means of enlisting one part of the population against the other, and of garrisoning the Canadas with regular troops sufficient to awe all internal enemies. But even this will not be done without great expense and hazard. The experience of the last two years furnishes only a foretaste of the cost to which such a system of government will subject us. On the lowest calculation, the addition of £1,000,000 a year to our annual colonial expenditure will barely enable us to attain this end. Without a change in our system of government, the discontent which now prevails, will spread and advance. As the cost of retaining these colonies increases, their value will rapidly diminish; and if by such means the British nation shall be content to retain a barren and injurious sovereignty, it will but tempt the chances of foreign aggression, by keeping continually exposed to a powerful and ambitious neighbour, a distant dependency, in which an invader would find no resistance, but might rather reckon on active co-operation from a portion of the resident population.

I am far from presenting this risk in a manner calculated to irritate the just pride which would shrink from the thoughts of yielding to the menaces of a rival nation. Because, important as I consider the foreign relations of this question, I do not believe that there is now any very proximate danger of a collision with the United States, in consequence of that power desiring to take advantage of the disturbed state of the Canadas. In the despatch of the 9th of August I have described my impression of the state of feeling with respect to the Lower Canadian insurrection, which had existed, and was then in existence in the United States.— Besides the causes of hostile feeling which originate in the mere juxtaposition of that power to our North American provinces, I described the influence which had been undoubtedly exercised by that mistaken political sympathy with the insurgents of Lower Canada, which the inhabitants of the United States were induced to entertain. There is no people in the world so little likely as that of the United States to sympathize with the real feelings and policy of the French Canadians; no people so little likely to share in their anxiety to preserve ancient and barbarous laws, and to check the industry and improvement of their country, in order to gratify some idle and narrow notion of a petty and visionary nationality. The Americans who have visited Lower Canada, perfectly understand the real truth of the case; they see that the quarrel is a quarrel of races; and they certainly show very little inclination to take part with the French Canadians and their institutions. Of the great number of American travellers, coming from all parts of the union, who visited Quebec during my residence there, and whose society I, together with the gentlemen attached to my mission, had the advantage of enjoying, not one ever expressed to any of us any approbation of what may be termed the national objects of the French Canadians, while many did not conceal a strong aversion to them. There is no people in the world to whom the French Canadian institutions are more intolerable, when circumstances compel submission to them. But the mass of the American people had judged of the quarrel from a distance; they had been obliged to form their judgment on the apparent grounds of the controversy; and were thus deceived, as all those are apt to be who judge under such circumstances and on such grounds. The contest bore some resemblance to that great struggle of their own forefathers, which they regard with the highest pride. Like that, they believed it to be a contest of a colony against the empire whose misconduct alienated their own country; they considered it to be a contest undertaken by a people professing to seek independence of distant control and extension of popular privileges; and finally, a contest of which the first blow was struck in consequence of a violation of a colonial constitution, and the appropriation of the colonial revenues without the consent of the colonists. It need not surprise us that such apparently probable and sufficient causes were generally taken by the people of the United States as completely accounting for the whole dispute; that the analogy between the Canadian insurrection and the war of independence was considered to be satisfactorily made out; and that a free and high-spirited people eagerly demonstrated its sympathy with those whom it regarded as gallantly attempting, with unequal means, to assert that glorious cause which its own fathers had triumphantly upheld.

In the case of Upper Canada, I believe the sympathy to have been much more strong and durable; and, though the occasion of the contest was apparently less marked, I have no doubt that this was more than compensated by the similarity of language and manners, which enabled the rebels of the Upper Province to present their case much more easily and forcibly to those whose sympathy and aid they sought. The incidents of any struggle of a large portion of a people with its government are sure, at some time or another, to elicit some sympathy with those who appear, to the careless view of a foreign nation, only as martyrs to the popular cause, and as victims of a government conducted on principles differing from its own; and I have no doubt that if the internal struggle be renewed, the sympathy from without will, at some time or another, reassume its former strength.

For it must be recollected that the natural ties of sympathy between the English population of the Canadas, and the inhabitants of the frontier States of the Union are peculiarly strong. Not only do they speak the same language, living under laws having the same origin, and preserve the same customs and habits, but there is a positive alternation, if I may so express it, of the populations of the two countries. While large tracts of the British territory are peopled by American citizens, who still keep up a constant connexion with their kindred and friends, the neighbouring states are filled with emigrants from Great Britain, some of whom have quitted Canada after unavailing efforts to find there a profitable return for their labour, and many of whom have settled in the United States, while other members of their families, and the companions of their youth, have taken up their abode on the other side of the frontier. I had no means of ascertaining the exact degree of truth in some statements which I have heard respecting the number of Irish settled in the state of New York; but it is commonly asserted that there are no less than 40,000 Irish in the militia of that state. The intercourse between these two divisions of what is, in fact, an identical population, is constant and universal. The border townships of Lower Canada are separated from the United States by an imaginary line; a great part of the frontier of Upper Canada, by rivers, which are crossed in ten minutes; and the rest by lakes, which interpose hardly a six hours' passage between the inhabitants of each side. Every man's daily occupations bring him in contact with his neighbours on the other side of the line; the daily wants of one country are supplied by the produce of the other; and the population of each is in some degree dependent on the state of trade and the demands of the other. Such common wants beget an interest in the politics of each country among the citizens of the other. The newspapers circulate in some places almost equally on the different sides of the line, and men discover that their welfare is frequently as much involved in the political condition of their neighbours as of their own countrymen.

The danger of any serious mischief from this cause appears to me to be less at the present moment than for some time past. The events of the last year, and the circulation of more correct information respecting the real causes of contention, have apparently operated very successfully against the progress or continuance of this species of sympathy; and I have the satisfaction of believing that the policy which was pursued during my administration of the government was very efficient in removing it. The almost complete unanimity of the press of the United States, as well as the assurance of individuals conversant with the state of public opinion in that country, convince me that the measures which I adopted, met with a concurrence that completely turned the tide of feeling in favour of the British government. Nor can I doubt from the unvarying evidence that I have received from all persons who have recently travelled through the frontier states of the Union, that there hardly exists at the present moment the slightest feeling which can be properly called sympathy. Whatever aid the insurgents have recently received from citizens of the United States, may either be attributed to those national animosities which are the too sure result of past wars, or to those undisguised projects of conquest and rapine which, since the invasion of Texas, find but too much favour among the daring population of the frontiers. Judging from the character and behaviour of the Americans most prominent in the recent aggressions on Upper Canada, they seem to have been produced mainly by the latter cause; nor does any cause appear to have secured to the insurgents of Lower Canada any very extensive aid, except that in money and munitions of war, of which the source cannot very clearly be traced. Hardly any Americans took part in the recent disturbances in Lower Canada. Last year the outbreak was the signal for numerous public meetings in all the great cities of the frontier states, from Buffalo to New York. At these the most entire sympathy with the insurgents was openly avowed; large subscriptions were raised, and volunteers invited to join. Since the last outbreak no such manifestations have taken place: the meetings which the Nelsons and others have attempted in New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and elsewhere, have ended in complete failure; and at the present moment there does not exist the slightest indication of any sympathy with the objects of the Lower Canadian insurgents, or of any desire to co-operate with them for political purposes. The danger, however, which may be apprehended from the mere desire to repeat the scenes of Texas in the Canadas, is a danger from which we cannot be secure while the disaffection of any considerable portion of the population continues to give an appearance of weakness to our government. It is in vain to expect that such attempts can wholly be repressed by the federal government, or that they could even be effectually counteracted by the utmost exertion of its authority, if any sudden turn of affairs should again revive a strong and general sympathy with insurrection in Canada. Without dwelling on the necessary weakness of a merely federal government—without adverting to the difficulty which authorities dependent for their very existence on the popular will, find in successfully resisting a general manifestation of public feeling, the impossibility which any government would find in restraining a population like that which dwells along the thousand miles of this frontier, must be obvious to all who reflect on the difficulty of maintaining the police of a dispersed community.

Nor is this danger itself unproductive of feelings which are in their turn calculated to produce yet further mischief. The loyal people of Canada, indignant at the constant damage and terror occasioned by incursions from the opposite shore, naturally turn their hostility against the nation and the government which permit, and which they accuse even of conniving at the violation of international law and justice. Mutual recriminations are bandied about from one side to the other; and the very facilities of intercourse which keep alive the sympathy between portions of the two populations, afford at the same time occasions for the collision of angry passions and national antipathies. The violent party papers on each side, and the various bodies, whose pecuniary interests a war would promote, foment the strife. A large portion of each population endeavours to incite its own government to war, and at the same time labours to produce the same result by irritating the national feelings of the rival community. Rumours are diligently circulated by the Canadian press, and every friendly act of the American people or government appears to be systematically subjected to the most unfavourable construction. It is not only to be apprehended that this state of mutual suspicion and dislike may be brought to a head by acts of mutual reprisals, but that the officers of the respective governments, in despair of preserving peace, may take little care to prevent the actual commencement of war.

Though I do not believe that there ever was a time in which the specific relations of the two countries rendered it less likely that the United States would imagine that a war with England could promote their own interests, yet it cannot be doubted that the disturbed state of the Canadas is a serious drawback on the prosperity of a great part of the Union. Instead of presenting an additional field for their commercial enterprise, these provinces, in their present state of disorder, are rather a barrier to their industrial energies. The present state of things also occasions great expense to the federal government, which has been under the necessity of largely augmenting its small army, on account chiefly of the troubles of Canada.

Nor must we forget, that whatever assurances and proofs of amicable feeling we may receive from the government of the United States, however strong may be the ties of mutual pacific interests that bind the two nations together, there are subjects of dispute which may produce less friendly feelings. National interests are now in question between us, of which the immediate adjustment is demanded by every motive of policy. These interests cannot be supported with the necessary vigour while disaffection in a most important part of our North American possessions appears to give an enemy a certain means of inflicting injury and humiliation on the empire.

But the chances of rebellion or foreign invasion are not those which I regard as either the most probable or the most injurious. The experience of the last two years suggests the occurrence of a much more speedy and disastrous result. I dread, in fact, the completion of the sad work of depopulation and impoverishment which is now rapidly going on. The present evil is not merely that improvement is stayed, and that the wealth and population of these colonies do not increase according to the rapid scale of American progress. No accession of population takes place by immigration, and no capital is brought into the country. On the contrary, both the people and the capital seem to be quitting these distracted provinces. From the French portion of Lower Canada there has, for a long time, been a large annual emigration of young men to the northern states of the American Union, in which they are highly valued as labourers, and gain good wages, with their savings from which they generally return to their homes in a few months or years. I do not believe that the usual amount of this emigration has been increased during the last year, except by a few persons prominently compromised in the insurrection, who have sold their property and made up their minds to a perpetual exile; but I think that there is some reason to believe that, among the class of habitual emigrants whom I have described, a great many now take up their permanent residence in the United States. But the stationary habits and local attachment of the French Canadians render it little likely that they will quit their country in great numbers. I am not aware that there is any diminution of the British population from such a cause. The employment of British capital in the province is not materially checked in the principal branch of trade, and the main evils are the withdrawal of enterprising British capitalists from the French portion of the country, the diminished employment of the capital now in the province, and the entire stoppage of all increase of the population by means of immigration. But from Upper Canada the withdrawal both of capital and of population has been very considerable. I have received accounts from most respectable sources, of a very numerous emigration from the whole of the Western and London districts. It was said by persons who professed to have witnessed it, that considerable numbers had for a long time daily passed over from Amherstburgh and Sandwich to Detroit; and a most respectable informant stated that he had seen in one of the districts which I have mentioned, no less than 15 vacant farms together on the road side. A body of the reforming party have avowed, in the most open manner, their intention of emigrating from political motives, and publicly invited all who might be influenced by similar feelings, to join in their enterprise. For this the Mississippi Emigration Society has been formed, with the purpose of facilitating emigration from Upper Canada, to the new territory of the Union, called Iowa, on the west bank of the Upper Mississippi. The prospectus of the undertaking, and the report of the deputies who were sent to examine the country in question, were given in the public press, and the advantages of the new colony strongly enforced by the reformers, and depreciatingly discussed by the friends of the government. The number of persons who have thus emigrated is not, however, I have reason to believe, as great as it has often been represented. Many who might be disposed to take such a step cannot sell their farms on fair terms; and though some, relying on the ease with which land is obtained in the United States, have been content to remove merely their stock and their chattels, yet there are others again who cannot at the last make the sacrifices which a forced sale would necessitate, and who continue, even under their present state of alarm, to remain in hopes of better times. In the districts which border on the St. Lawrence little has, in fact, come of the determination to emigrate which was loudly expressed at one time. And some even of those who actually left the country are said to have returned. But the instances which have come to my knowledge induce me to attach even more importance to the class, than to the alleged number of the emigrants; and I can by no means agree with some of the dominant party, that the persons who thus leave the country are disaffected subjects, whose removal is a great advantage to loyal and peaceable men. In a country like Upper Canada, where the introduction of population and capital is above all things needful for its prosperity, and almost for its continued existence, it would be more prudent, as well as just, more the interest as well as the duty of the government, to remove the causes of disaffection, than to drive out the disaffected. But there is no ground for asserting that all the reformers who have thus quitted the country are disloyal and turbulent men; nor indeed is it very clear that all of them are reformers, and that the increasing insecurity of person and property have not, without distinction of politics, driven out some of the most valuable settlers of the Province. A great impression has been lately made by the removal of one of the largest proprietors of the Province, a gentleman who had arrived there not many years ago from Trinidad; who has taken no prominent, and certainly no violent, part in politics; and who has now transferred himself and his property to the United States, simply because in Upper Canada he can find no secure investment for the latter, and no tranquil enjoyment of life. I heard of another English gentleman, who, having resided in the country for six or seven years, and invested large sums in bringing over a superior breed of cattle and sheep, was, while I was there, selling off his stock and implements, with a view of settling in Illinois. I was informed of an individual who, 30 years ago, had gone into the forest with his axe on his shoulder, and, with no capital at starting, had, by dint of patient labour, acquired a farm and stock which he had sold for £2,000, with which he went into the United States. This man, I was assured, was only a specimen of a numerous class, to whose unwearied industry the growth and prosperity of the colony are mainly to be ascribed. They are now driven from it, on account of the present insecurity of all who, having in former times been identified in politics with some of those who subsequently appeared as prominent actors in the revolt, are regarded and treated as rebels, though they had held themselves completely aloof from all participation in schemes or acts of rebellion. Considerable alarm also exists as to the general disposition to quit the country, which was said to have been produced by some late measures of the authorities among that mild and industrious, but peculiar race of descendants of the Dutch, who inhabit the back part of the Niagara district.

Such are the lamentable results of the political and social evils which have so long agitated the Canadas; and such is their condition, that at the present moment we are called on to take immediate precautions against dangers so alarming as those of rebellion, foreign invasion, and utter exhaustion and depopulation. When I look on the various and deep-rooted causes of mischief which the past inquiry has pointed out as existing in every institution, in the constitutions, and in the very composition of society throughout a great part of these provinces, I almost shrink from the apparent presumption of grappling with these gigantic difficulties. Nor shall I attempt to do so in detail. I rely on the efficacy of reform in the constitutional system, by which these colonies are governed, for the removal of every abuse in their administration, which defective institutions have engendered. If a system can be devised which shall lay, in these countries, the foundation of an efficient and popular government—insure harmony, in place of collision, between the various powers of the state—and bring the influence of a vigorous public opinion to bear on every detail of public affairs, we may rely on sufficient remedies being found for the present vices of the administrative system.

The preceding pages have sufficiently pointed out the nature of those evils, to the extensive operation of which I attribute the various practical grievances, and the present unsatisfactory condition of the North American colonies. It is not by weakening, but strengthening the influence of the people on its government; by confining within much narrower bounds than those hitherto allotted to it, and not by extending the interference of the Imperial authorities in the details of colonial affairs, that I believe that harmony is to be restored, where dissension has so long prevailed, and a regularity and vigour hitherto unknown introduced into the administration of these provinces. It needs no change in the principles of government, no invention of a new constitutional theory, to supply the remedy which would, in my opinion, completely remove the existing political disorders. It needs but to follow out consistently the principles of the British constitution, and introduce into the government of these great colonies those wise provisions, by which alone the working of the representative system can in any country be rendered harmonious and efficient. We are not now to consider the policy of establishing representative government in the North American colonies. That has been irrevocably done; and the experiment of depriving the people of their present constitutional power is not to be thought of. To conduct their government harmoniously, in accordance with its established principles, is now the business of its rulers; and I know not how it is possible to secure that harmony in any other way, than by administering the government on those principles which have been found perfectly efficacious in Great Britain. I would not impair a single prerogative of the Crown; on the contrary, I believe that the interests of the people of these colonies require the protection of prerogatives, which have not hitherto been exercised. But the Crown must, on the other hand, submit to the necessary consequences of representative institutions: and if it has to carry on the government in unison with a representative body, it must consent to carry it on by means of those in whom that representative body has confidence.

In England this principle has been so long considered an indisputable and essential part of our constitution, that it has really hardly ever been found necessary to inquire into the means by which its observance is enforced. When a ministry ceases to command a majority in parliament, on great questions of policy, its doom is immediately sealed; and it would appear to us as strange to attempt, for any time, to carry on a government by means of ministers perpetually in a minority, as it would be to pass laws with a majority of votes against them. The ancient constitutional remedies, by impeachment and a stoppage of the supplies, have never, since the reign of William III. been brought into operation for the purpose of removing a ministry. They have never been called for: because, in fact, it has been the habit of ministers rather to anticipate the occurrence of an absolutely hostile vote, and to retire, when supported only by a bare and uncertain majority. If colonial legislatures have frequently stopped the supplies—if they have harrassed public servants by unjust or harsh impeachments—it was because the removal of an unpopular administration could not be effected in the colonies by those milder indications of a want of confidence, which have always sufficed to attain the end in the mother country.

The means which have occasionally been proposed in the colonies themselves, appear to me by no means calculated to attain the desired end in the best way. These proposals indicate such a want of reliance on the willingness of the imperial government to acquiesce in the adoption of a better system, as, if warranted, would render an harmonious adjustment of the different powers of the state utterly hopeless. An elective executive council would not only be utterly inconsistent with monarchical government, but would really, under the nominal authority of the crown, deprive the community of one of the great advantages of an hereditary monarchy. Every purpose of popular control might be combined with every advantage of vesting the immediate choice of advisers in the crown, were the colonial Governor to be instructed to secure the co-operation of the assembly in his policy, by intrusting its administration to such men as could command a majority, and if he were given to understand that he need count on no aid from home in any difference with the assembly, that should not directly involve the relations between the mother country and the colony. This change might be effected by a single despatch, containing such instructions; or if any legal enactment were requisite, it would only be one that would render it necessary that the official acts of the Governor should be countersigned by some public functionary. This would induce responsibility for every act of the government, and, as a natural consequence, it would necessitate the substitution of a system of administration, by means of competent heads of departments, for the present rude machinery of an executive council. The Governor, if he wished to retain advisers not possessing the confidence of the existing assembly, might rely on the effect of an appeal to the people, and, if unsuccessful, he might be coerced by a refusal of the supplies, or his advisers might be terrified by the prospect of impeachment. But there can be no reason for apprehending that either party would enter on a contest when each would find its interest in the maintenance of harmony; and the abuse of the powers which each would constitutionally possess would cease, when the struggle for larger powers became unnecessary. Nor can I conceive, that it would be found impossible or difficult, to conduct a colonial government with precisely that limitation of the respective powers which has been so long and so easily maintained in Great Britain.

I know that it has been urged, that the principles which are productive of harmony and good government in the mother country, are by no means applicable to a colonial dependency. It is said that it is necessary that the administration of a colony should be carried on by persons nominated without any reference to the wishes of its people; that they have to carry into effect the policy, not of that people, but of the authorities at home; and that a colony which should name all its administrative functionaries would, in fact, cease to be dependent. I admit that the system which I propose would, in fact, place the internal government of the colony in the hands of the colonists themselves; and that we should thus leave them to the execution of the laws, of which we have long intrusted the making solely to them. Perfectly aware of the value of our colonial possessions, and strongly impressed with necessity of maintaining our connexion with them, I know not in what respect it can be desirable that we should interfere with their internal legislation in matters which do not affect their relations with the mother country. The matters which so concern us are very few. The constitution of the form of government—the regulation of foreign relations, and of trade with the mother country, the other British colonies, and foreign nations, and the disposal of the public lands, are the only points on which the mother country requires a control. This control is now sufficiently secured by the authority of the Imperial legislature, by the protection which the colony derives from us against foreign enemies, by the beneficial terms which our laws secure to its trade, and by its share of the reciprocal benefits which would be conferred by a wise system of colonization. A perfect subordination on the part of the colony on these points is secured by the advantages which it finds in the continuance of its connection with the empire. It certainly is not strengthened, but greatly weakened, by a vexatious interference on the part of the home government with the enactment of laws for regulating the internal concerns of the colony, or in the selection of the persons intrusted with their execution. The colonists may not always know what laws are best for them, or which of their countrymen are the fittest for conducting their affairs; but at least, they have a greater interest in coming to a right judgment on these points, and will take greater pains to do so, than those whose welfare is very remotely and slightly affected by the good or bad legislation of these portions of the empire. If the colonists make bad laws, and select improper persons to conduct their affairs, they will generally be the only, always the greatest, sufferers; and, like the people of other countries, they must bear the ills which they bring on themselves, until they choose to apply the remedy. But it surely cannot be the duty or interest of Great Britain to keep a most expensive military possession of these colonies, in order that a Governor or Secretary of state may be able to confer colonial appointments on one rather than another set of persons in the colonies, for this is really the only question at issue. The slightest acquaintance with these colonies proves the fallacy of the common notion, that any considerable amount of patronage in them is distributed among strangers from the mother country. Whatever inconvenience a consequent frequency of changes among the holders of office may produce, is a necessary disadvantage of free government, which will be amply compensated by the perpetual harmony which the system must produce between the people and its rulers. Nor do I fear that the character of the public servants will, in any respect, suffer from a more popular tenure of office. For I can conceive no system so calculated to fill important posts with inefficient persons as the present, in which public opinion is too little consulted in the original appointment, and in which it is almost impossible to remove those who disappoint the expectations of their usefulness, without inflicting a kind of brand on their capacity or integrity.

I am well aware that many persons, both in the colonies and at home, view the system which I recommend, with considerable alarm, because they distrust the ulterior views of those by whom it was originally proposed, and whom they suspect of urging its adoption with the intent only of enabling them more easily to subvert monarchical institutions, or assert the independence of the colony. I believe, however, that the extent to which these ulterior views exist has been greatly overrated. We must not take every rash expression of disappointment as an indication of a settled aversion to the existing constitution; and my own observation convinces me that the predominant feeling of all the English population of the North American Colonies is that of devoted attachment to the mother country. I believe that neither the interests nor the feelings of the people are incompatible with a colonial government wisely and popularly administered. The proofs, which many who are much dissatisfied with the existing administration of the government, have given of their loyalty, are not to be denied or overlooked. The attachment constantly exhibited by the people of these provinces towards the British crown and empire, has all the characteristics of a strong national feeling. They value the institutions of their country, not merely from a sense of the practical advantages which they confer, but from sentiments of national pride; and they uphold them the more because they are accustomed to view them as marks of nationality, which distinguish them from their republican neighbours. I do not mean to affirm that this is a feeling which no impolicy on the part of the mother country will be unable to impair: but I do most confidently regard it as one which may, if rightly appreciated, be made the link of an enduring and advantageous connexion. The British people of the North American colonies are a people on whom we may safely rely, and to whom we must not grudge power. For it is not to the individuals who have been loudest in demanding the change that I propose to concede the responsibility of the colonial administration, but to the people themselves. Nor can I conceive that any people, or any considerable portion of a people, will view with dissatisfaction a change, which would amount simply to this, that the crown should henceforth consult the wishes of the people in the choice of its servants.

The important alteration in the policy of the colonial government which I recommend, might be wholly or in great part effected for the present by the unaided authority of the crown; and I believe that the great mass of discontent in Upper Canada, which is not directly connected with personal irritation, arising out of the incidents of the late troubles, might be dispelled by an assurance that the government of the colony should henceforth be carried on in conformity with the views of the majority in the Assembly. But I think that for the well-being of the colonies, and the security of the mother country, it is necessary that such a change should be rendered more permanent than a momentary sense of the existing difficulties can insure its being. I cannot believe that persons in power in this country will be restrained from the injudicious interference with the internal management of these colonies which I deprecate, while they remain the petty and divided communities which they now are. The public attention at home is distracted by the various and sometimes contrary complaints of these different contiguous provinces. Each now urges its demands at different times, and in somewhat different forms, and the interests which each individual complainant represents as in peril are too petty to attract the due attention of the empire. But if these important and extensive colonies should speak with one voice, if it were felt that every error of our colonial policy must cause a common suffering and a common discontent throughout the whole wide extent of British America, those complaints would never be provoked; because no authority would venture to run counter to the wishes of such a community, except on points absolutely involving the few imperial interests which it is necessary to remove from the jurisdiction of colonial legislation.

It is necessary that I should also recommend what appears to me an essential limitation on the present powers of the representative bodies in these colonies. I consider good government not to be attainable while the present unrestricted powers of voting public money and of managing the local expenditure of the community are lodged in the hands of an Assembly. As long as a revenue is raised which leaves a large surplus after the payment of the necessary expenses of the civil government, and as long as any member of the Assembly may, without restriction, propose a vote of public money, so long will the Assembly retain in its hands the powers which it everywhere abuses, of misapplying that money. The prerogative of the crown, which is constantly exercised in Great Britain for the real protection of the people, ought never to have been waved in the colonies; and if the rule of the Imperial Parliament, that no money vote should be proposed without the previous consent of the crown, were introduced into these colonies, it might be wisely employed in protecting the public interests, now frequently sacrificed in that scramble for local appropriations, which chiefly serves to give an undue influence to particular individuals and parties.

The establishment of a good system of municipal institutions throughout these provinces, is a matter of vital importance. A general legislature, which manages the private business of every parish, in addition to the common business of the country, wields a power which no single body, however popular in its constitution, ought to have—a power which must be destructive of any constitutional balance. The true principle of limiting popular power is that apportionment of it in many different depositaries, which has been adopted in all the most free and stable states of the Union. Instead of confiding the whole collection and distribution of all the revenues raised in any country for all general and local purposes to a single representative body, the power of local assessment, and the application of the funds arising from it, should be intrusted to local management. It is in vain to expect that this sacrifice of power will be voluntarily made by any representative body. The establishment of municipal institutions for the whole country should be made a part of every colonial constitution, and the prerogative of the crown should be constantly interposed to check any encroachment on the functions of the local bodies, until the people should become alive, as most assuredly they almost immediately would be, to the necessity of protecting their local privileges.

The establishment of a sound and general system for the management of the lands and the settlement of the colonies, is a necessary part of any good and durable system of government. In a report contained in the appendix to the present, the plan which I recommend for this purpose will be fully developed.

These general principles apply, however, only to those changes in the system of government, which are required in order to rectify disorders common to all the North American colonies; but they do not, in any degree, go to remove those evils in the present state of Lower Canada, which require the most immediate remedy. The fatal feud of origin, which is the cause of the most extensive mischief, would be aggravated at the present moment, by any change which should give the majority more power than they have hitherto possessed. A plan by which it is proposed to insure the tranquil government of Lower Canada, must include, in itself, the means of putting an end to the agitation of national disputes in the legislature, by settling, at once and for ever, the national character of the province. I entertain no doubts as to the national character which must be given to Lower Canada; it must be that of the British empire—that of the majority of the population of British America—that of the great race which must, in the lapse of no long period of time, be predominant over the whole North American continent. Without effecting the change so rapidly or so roughly as to shock the feelings and trample on the welfare of the existing generation, it must henceforth be the first and steady purpose of the British government to establish an English population, with English laws and language, in this province, and to trust its government to none but a decidedly English legislature.

It may be said, that this is a hard measure to a conquered people—that the French were originally the whole, and still are the bulk, of the population of Lower Canada—that the English are new-comers, who have no right to demand the extinction of the nationality of a people among whom commercial enterprise has drawn them. It may be said, that if the French are not so civilized, so energetic, or so money-making a race as that by which they are surrounded, they are an amiable, a virtuous, and a contented people, possessing all the essentials of material comfort, and not to be despised or ill-used, because they seek to enjoy what they have, without emulating the spirit of accumulation which influences their neighbours. Their nationality is, after all, an inheritance—and they must be not too severely punished, because they have dreamed of maintaining, on the distant banks of the St. Lawrence, and transmitting to their posterity, the language, the manners, and the institutions of that great nation, that for two centuries gave the tone of thought to the European continent. If the disputes of the two races are irreconcilable, it may be urged that justice demands that the minority should be compelled to acquiesce in the supremacy of the ancient and most numerous occupants of the province, and not pretend to force their own institutions and customs on the majority.

But, before deciding which of the two races is now to be placed in the ascendant, it is but prudent to inquire which of them must ultimately prevail; for it is not wise to establish to-day that which must, after a hard struggle, be reversed to-morrow. The pretensions of the French Canadians to the exclusive possession of Lower Canada, would debar the yet larger English population of Upper Canada, and the townships, from access to the great natural channel of that trade which they alone have created, and now carry on. The possession of the mouth of the Saint Lawrence concerns not only those who happen to have made their settlements along the narrow line which borders it, but all who now dwell, or will hereafter dwell, in the great basin of that river. For we must not look to the present alone. The question is, by what race is it likely that the wilderness which now covers the rich and ample regions surrounding the comparatively small and contracted districts in which the French Canadians are located, is eventually to be converted into a settled and flourishing country? If this is to be done in the British dominions, as in the rest of North America, by some speedier process than the ordinary growth of population, it must be by immigration from the English Isles, or from the United States—the countries which supply the only settlers that have entered, or will enter the Canadas in any large numbers. This immigration can neither be debarred from a passage through Lower Canada, nor even be prevented from settling in that province. The whole interior of the British dominions must, ere long, be filled with an English population, every year rapidly increasing its numerical superiority over the French. It is just that the prosperity of this great majority, and of this vast tract of country, should be for ever, or even for a while, impeded by the artificial bar which the backward laws and civilization of a part, and a part only, of Lower Canada, would place between them and the ocean? Is it to be supposed that such an English population will ever submit to such a sacrifice of its interests?

I must not, however, assume it to be possible, that the English government shall adopt the course of placing or allowing any check to the influx of English immigration into Lower Canada, or any impediment to the profitable employment of that English capital which is already vested therein. The English have already in their hands the majority of the larger masses of property in the country; they have the decided superiority of intelligence on their side; they have the certainty that colonization must swell their numbers to a majority; and they belong to a race which wields the Imperial government, and predominates on the American continent. If we now leave them in a minority, they will never abandon the assurance of being a majority hereafter, and never cease to continue the present contest with all the fierceness with which it now rages. In such a contest they will rely on the sympathy of their countrymen at home; and if that is denied them, they feel very confident of being able to awaken the sympathy of their neighbours of kindred origin. They feel that if the British government intends to maintain its hold of the Canadas, it can rely on the English population alone; that, if it abandons its colonial possessions, they must become a portion of that great union which will speedily send forth its swarms of settlers, and by force of numbers and activity, quickly master every other race. The French Canadians, on the other hand, are but the remains of an ancient colonization, and are, and ever must be, isolated in the midst of an Anglo-Saxon world. Whatever may happen, whatever government shall be established over them, British or American, they can see no hope for their nationality. They can only sever themselves from the British empire, by waiting till some general cause of dissatisfaction alienates them, together with the surrounding colonies, and leaves them part of an English confederacy; or, if they are able, by effecting a separation singly, and so either merging in the American Union, or keeping up for a few years a wretched semblance of feeble independence, which would expose them more than ever to the intrusion of the surrounding population. I am far from wishing to encourage indiscriminately these pretensions to superiority on the part of any particular race; but while the greater part of every portion of the American continent is still uncleared and unoccupied, and while the English exhibit such constant and marked activity in colonization, so long will it be idle to imagine that there is any portion of that continent into which that race will not penetrate, or in which, when it has penetrated, it will not predominate. It is but a question of time and mode—it is but to determine whether the small number of French, who now inhabit Lower Canada, shall be made English under a government which can protect them, or whether the process shall be delayed, until a much larger number shall have to undergo, at the rude hands of its uncontrolled rivals, the extinction of a nationality strengthened and embittered by continuance.

And is this French Canadian nationality one which, for the good merely of that people, we ought to strive to perpetuate, even if it were possible? I know of no national distinctions marking and continuing a more hopeless inferiority. The language, the laws, the character of the North American continent are English; and every race but the English (I apply this to all who speak the English language) appears there in a condition of inferiority. It is to elevate them from that inferiority that I desire to give to the Canadians our English character. I desire it for the sake of the educated classes, whom the distinction of language and manners keeps apart from the great empire to which they belong. At the best, the fate of the educated and aspiring colonist is, at present, one of little hope, and little activity; but the French Canadian is cast still further into the shade by a language and habits foreign to those of the Imperial government. A spirit of exclusion has closed the higher professions on the educated classes of the French Canadians, more perhaps than was absolutely necessary; but it is impossible for the utmost liberality on the part of the British government, to give an equal position in the general competition of its vast population to those who speak a foreign language. I desire the amalgamation still more for the sake of the humbler classes. Their present state of rude and equal plenty is fast deteriorating under the pressure of population in the narrow limits to which they are confined. If they attempt to better their condition, by extending themselves over the neighbouring country, they will necessarily get more and more mingled with an English population; if they prefer remaining stationary, the greater part of them must be labourers, in the employ of English capitalists. In either case it would appear, that the great mass of the French Canadians are doomed, in some measure, to occupy an inferior position, and to be dependent on the English for employment. The evils of poverty and dependence would merely be aggravated in a ten-fold degree, by a spirit of jealous and resentful nationality, which should separate the working class of the community, from the possessors of wealth and employers of labour.

I will not here enter into the question of the effect of the mode of life and division of property among the French Canadians on the happiness of the people. I will admit, for the moment, that it is as productive of well-being as its admirers assert. But, be it good or bad, the period in which it is practicable is past; for there is not enough unoccupied land left in that portion of the country in which English are not already settled, to admit of the present French population possessing farms sufficient to supply them with their present means of comfort, under their system of husbandry. No population has increased by mere births so rapidly as that of the French Canadians has since the conquest. At that period their number was estimated at 60,000; it is now supposed to amount to more than seven times as many.—There has been no proportional increase of cultivation, or of produce from the land already under cultivation; and the increased population has been, in a great measure, provided for by the mere continued sub-division of estates. In a report from a committee in the Assembly in 1826, of which Mr. Andrew Stuart was chairman, it is stated, that since 1784 the population of the seignories had quadrupled, while the number of cattle had only doubled, and the quantity of land in cultivation had only increased one-third. Complaints of distress are constant, and the deterioration of the condition of a great part of the population admitted on all hands. A people so circumstanced must alter their mode of life. If they wish to maintain the same kind of rude, but well-provided agricultural existence, it must be by removing into those parts of the country in which the English are settled; or if they cling to their present residence, they can only obtain a livelihood by deserting their present employment, and working for wages on farms, or in commercial occupations under English capitalists. But their present proprietary and inactive condition is one which no political arrangements can perpetuate. Were the French Canadians to be guarded against the influx of any other population, their condition in a few years would be similar to that of the poorest of the Irish peasantry.

There can hardly be conceived a nationality more destitute of all that can invigorate and elevate a people, than that which is exhibited by the descendants of the French in Lower Canada, owing to their retaining their peculiar language and manners. They are a people with no history, and no literature. The literature of England is written in a language which is not theirs, and the only literature which their language renders familiar to them, is that of a nation from which they have been separated by 80 years of a foreign rule, and still more by those changes which the revolution and its consequences have wrought in the whole political, moral, and social state of France. Yet it is on a people whom recent history, manners, and modes of thought, so entirely separate from them, that the French Canadians are wholly dependent for almost all the instruction and amusement derived from books; it is on this essentially foreign literature, which is conversant about events, opinions, and habits of life, perfectly strange and unintelligible to them, that they are compelled to be dependent. Their newspapers are mostly written by natives of France, who have either come to try their fortunes in the province, or been brought into it by the party leaders, in order to supply the dearth of literary talent available for the political press. In the same way their nationality operates to deprive them of the enjoyments and civilizing influence of the arts. Though descended from the people in the world that most generally love, and have most successfully cultivated the drama; though living on a continent in which almost every town, great or small, has an English theatre, the French population of Lower Canada, cut off from every people that speaks its own language, can support no national stage.

In these circumstances I should be indeed surprised, if the more reflecting part of the French Canadians entertained at present any hope of continuing to preserve their nationality. Much as they struggle against it, it is obvious that the process of assimilation to English habits is already commencing. The English language is gaining ground, as the language of the rich and of the employers of labour naturally will. It appeared by some of the few returns which had been received by the commissioner of inquiry into the state of education, that there are about ten times the number of French children in Quebec learning English, as compared with English children who learn French. A considerable time must, of course elapse, before the change of a language can spread over a whole people; and justice and policy alike require that while the people continue to use the French language their government should take no such means to force the English language upon them as would, in fact, deprive the great mass of the community of the protection of the laws. But I repeat, that the alteration of the character of the province ought to be immediately entered on, and firmly, though cautiously, followed up; that in any plan which may be adopted for the future management of Lower Canada, the first object ought to be that of making it an English province; and that, with this end in view, the ascendancy should never again be placed in any hands but those of an English population. Indeed, at the present moment this is obviously necessary; in the state of mind in which I have described the French Canadian population, as not only now being, but as likely for a long while to remain, the trusting them with an entire control over this province would be, in fact, only facilitating a rebellion. Lower Canada must be governed now, as it must be hereafter, by an English population; and thus the policy which the necessities of the moment force on us is in accordance with that suggested by a comprehensive view of the future and permanent improvement of the province.

The greater part of the plans which have been proposed for the future government of Lower Canada suggest, either as a lasting or as a temporary and intermediate scheme, that the government of that province should be constituted on an entirely despotic footing, or on one that would vest it entirely in the hands of the British minority. It is proposed either to place the legislative authority in a Governor, with a council formed of the heads of the British party, or to contrive some scheme of representation, by which a minority, with the forms of representation, is to deprive a majority of all voice in the management of its own affairs.

The maintenance of an absolute form of government on any part of the North American continent can never continue for any long time, without exciting a general feeling in the United States against a power of which the existence is secured by means so odious to the people; and as I rate the preservation of the present general sympathy of the United States with the policy of our government in Lower Canada as a matter of the greatest importance, I should be sorry that the feeling should be changed for one which, if prevalent among that people, must extend over the surrounding provinces. The influence of such an opinion would not only act very strongly on the entire French population, and keep up among them a sense of injury and a determination of resistance to the government, but would lead to just as great discontent among the English. In their present angry state of feeling, they might tolerate, for a while, any arrangement that would give them a triumph over the French; but I have greatly misunderstood their character if they would long bear a government in which they had no direct voice. Nor would their jealousy be obviated by the selection of a council from the persons supposed to have their confidence. It is not easy to know who really possess that confidence: and I suspect that there would be no surer way of depriving a man of influence over them, than by treating him as their representative, without their consent.

The experience which we have had of a government irresponsible to the people in these colonies, does not justify us in believing that it would be very well administered; and the great reforms in the institutions of the province which must be made, ere Lower Canada, can ever be a well-ordered and flourishing community, can be effected by no legislature which does not represent a great mass of public opinion.

But the great objection to any government of an absolute kind, is that it is palpably of a temporary nature; that there is no reason to believe that its influence, during the few years that it would be permitted to last, would leave the people at all more fit to manage themselves; that, on the contrary, being a mere temporary institution, it would be deficient in that stability which is the greatest requisite of government in times of disorder. There is every reason to believe that a professedly irresponsible government would be the weakest that could be devised. Every one of its acts would be discussed, not in the colony, but in England, on utterly incomplete and incorrect information, and run the chance of being disallowed without being understood. The most violent outcry that could be raised by persons looking at them through the medium of English and constitutional notions, or by those who might hope thereby to promote the sinister purposes of faction at home, would be constantly directed against them. Such consequences as these are inevitable. The people of England are not accustomed to rely on the honest and discreet exercise of absolute power; and if they permit a despotism to be established in their colonies, they feel bound, when their attention happens to be directed towards them, to watch its acts with vigilance. The governor and council would feel this responsibility in all their acts; unless they happened to be men of much more than ordinary nerve and earnestness, they would shape their policy so as merely to avoid giving a handle to attacks; and their measures would exhibit all that uncertainty and weakness which such a motive is sure to produce.

With respect to every one of those plans which propose to make the English minority an electoral majority, by means of new and strange modes of voting, or unfair divisions of the country, I shall only say, that if the Canadians are to be deprived of a representative government, it would be better to do it in a straight-forward way, than to attempt to establish a permanent system of government, on the basis of what all mankind would regard as mere electoral frauds. It is not in North America that men can be cheated by an unreal semblance of representative government, or persuaded that they are outvoted, when, in fact, they are, disfranchised.

The only power that can be effectual at once in coercing the present disaffection, and hereafter obliterating the nationality of the French Canadians, is that of a numerical majority of a loyal and English population; and the only stable government will be one more popular than any that has hitherto existed in the North American colonies. The influence of perfectly equal and popular institutions in effacing distinctions of race without disorder or oppression, and with little more than the ordinary animosities of party in a free country, is memorably exemplified in the history of the state of Louisiana, the laws and population of which were French at the time of its cession to the American Union. And the eminent success of the policy adopted with regard to that state, points out to us the means by which a similar result can be effected in Lower Canada.

The English of Lower Canada, who seem to infer the means from the result, entertain and circulate the most extraordinary conceptions of the course really pursued in this instance. On the single fact, that in the constitution of Louisiana it is specified, that the public acts of the state shall be "in the language in which the constitution of the United States is written," it has been inferred that the federal government, in the most violent manner, swept away the use of the French language and laws, and subjected the French population to some peculiar disabilities, which deprived them, in fact, of an equal voice in the government of their state. Nothing can be more contrary to the fact. Louisiana, on its first session, was governed as a "district"; its public officers were appointed by the federal government, and, as was natural under the circumstances of the case, they were natives of the old states of the union. In 1812, the district, having the requisite population, was admitted into the union as a state, and admitted on precisely the same terms that any other population have, or has been. The constitution was framed so as to give precisely the same power to the majority as is enjoyed in the other states of the union. No alteration was then made in the laws. The proof of this is afforded by a fact familiar to every person moderately acquainted with the jurisprudence of the age. The code, which is the glory of Louisiana, and Mr. Livingstone, was subsequently undertaken under the auspices of the legislature, in consequence of the confusion daily arising in the administration of the English and French system of law in the same courts. This change of laws, effected in the manner most consonant to the largest views of legislation, was not forced on the legislature and people of the state by an external authority, but was the suggestion of their own political wisdom. Louisiana is not the only state in the union which has been troubled by the existence of conflicting systems of law. The state of New York, till within a few years, suffered under the same evil, which it remedied in the same way, by employing a commission of its ablest lawyers to digest both systems of law into a common code. The contending populations of Lower Canada may well imitate these examples: and if, instead of endeavouring to force their respective laws upon each other, they would attempt an amalgamation of the two systems into one, adopting what is really best in both, the result would be creditable to the province.

Every provision was made in Louisiana for securing to both races a perfectly equal participation in all the benefits of the government. It is true that the intention of the federal government to encourage the use of the English language, was evinced by the provision of the constitution with respect to the language of the records; but those who will reflect how very few people ever read such documents, and how very recently it is that the English language has become the language of the law in this country, will see that such a provision could have little practical effect. In all cases in which convenience requires it, the different parties use their respective languages in the courts of justice, and in both branches of the legislature. In every judicial proceeding, all documents which pass between the parties are required to be in both languages, and the laws are published in both languages. Indeed, the equality of the two languages is preserved in the legislature by a very singular contrivance: the French and English members speak their respective languages, and an interpreter, as I was informed, after every speech, explains its purport in the other language.

For a long time, the distinction between the two races was the cause of great jealousy. The Americans crowded into the state, in order to avail themselves of its great natural resources, and its unequalled commercial advantages; there, as everywhere else on that continent, their energy and habits of business gradually drew the greater part of the commercial business of the country into their hands; and though, I believe, a few of the richest merchants, and most of the owners of plantations, are French, the English form the bulk of the wealthier classes. Year after year their numbers have become greater, and it is now generally supposed that they constitute the numerical majority. It may be imagined that the French have borne this with a good deal of dissatisfaction; but as the advantages gained by the English were entirely the result, not of favour, but of their superiority in a perfectly free competition, this jealousy could excite no murmurs against the government. The competition made the two races enemies at first, but it has gradually stirred the emulation of the less active race, and made them rivals. The jealousies in the city of New Orleans were so great at one time, that the legislature of the state, at the desire of the English, who complained of the inertness of the French, formed separate municipalities for the French and English parts of the city. These two municipalities are now actuated by a spirit of rivalry, and each undertakes great public works for the ornament and convenience of their respective quarters.

The distinction still lasts, and still causes a good deal of division; the society of each race is said to be in some measure distinct, but not by any means hostile—and some accounts represent the social mixture to be very great. All accounts represent the division of the races as becoming gradually less and less marked; their newspapers are printed in the two languages, on opposite pages; their local politics are entirely merged in those of the union; and, instead of discovering in their papers any vestiges of a quarrel of races, they are found to contain a repetition of the same party recriminations, and party arguments, which abound in all other parts of the federation.

The explanation of this amalgamation is obvious. The French of Louisiana, when they were formed into a state, in which they were a majority, were incorporated into a great nation, of which they constituted an extremely small part. The eye of every ambitious man turned naturally to the great centre of federal affairs, and the high prizes of federal ambition. The tone of politics was taken from those by whose hands its highest powers were wielded; the legislation and government of Louisiana were from the first insignificant, compared with the interests involved in the discussions at Washington. It became the object of every aspiring man to merge his French, and adopt completely an American nationality. What was the interest of individuals, was also the interest of the state. It was its policy to be represented by those who would acquire weight in the councils of the federation. To speak only a language foreign to that of the United States was, consequently, a disqualification for a candidate for the posts of either senator or representative; the French qualified themselves by learning English, or submitted to the superior advantages of their English competitors. The representation of Louisiana, in congress, is now entirely English, while each of the federal parties in the state conciliates the French feeling, by putting up a candidate of that race. But the result is, that the union is never disturbed by the quarrels of these races; and the French language and manners bid fair, in no long time, to follow their laws, and pass away like the Dutch peculiarities of New York.

It is only by the same means—by a popular government, in which an English majority shall permanently predominate, that Lower Canada, if a remedy for its disorders be not too long delayed, can be tranquilly ruled.

On these grounds, I believe that no permanent or efficient remedy can be devised for the disorders of Lower Canada, except a fusion of the government in that of one or more of the surrounding provinces; and as I am of opinion, that the full establishment of responsible government can only be permanently secured by giving these colonies an increased importance in the politics of the empire, I find in union the only means of remedying at once, and completely, the two prominent causes of their present unsatisfactory condition.

Two kinds of union have been proposed—federal and legislative. By the first, the separate legislature of each province would be preserved in its present form, and retain almost all its present attributes of internal legislation—the federal legislature exercising no power, save in those matters of general concern which may have been expressly ceded to it by the constituent provinces. A legislative union would imply a complete incorporation of the provinces included in it under one legislature, exercising universal and sole legislative authority over all of them, in exactly the same manner as the parliament legislates alone for the whole of the British Isles.

On my first arrival in Canada, I was strongly inclined to the project of a federal union; and it was with such a plan in view, that I discussed a general measure for the government from the colonies with the deputations of the Lower Provinces, and with various leading individuals and public bodies in both the Canadas. I was fully aware, that it might be objected that a federal union would, in many cases, produce a weak and rather cumbrous government; that a colonial federation must have, in fact, little legitimate authority or business, the greater part of the ordinary functions of a federation falling within the scope of the Imperial legislature and executive; and that the main inducement to federation, which is the necessity of conciliating the pretensions of independent states to the maintenance of their own sovereignty, could not exist in the case of colonial dependencies, liable to be moulded according to the pleasure of the supreme authority at home. In the course of the discussions which I have mentioned, I became aware also of great practical difficulties in any plan of federal government, particularly those that must arise in the management of the general revenues, which would, in such a plan, have to be again distributed among the provinces. But I had still more strongly impressed on me the great advantages of a united government; and I was gratified by finding the leading minds of the various colonies strongly and generally inclined to a scheme, that would elevate their countries into something like a national existence. I thought that it would be the tendency of a federation, sanctioned and consolidated by a monarchical government, gradually to become a complete legislative union; and that thus, while conciliating the French of Lower Canada, by leaving them the government of their own province, and their own internal legislation, I might provide for the protection of British interests by the general government, and for the gradual transition of the provinces into an united and homogeneous community.

But the period of gradual transition is past in Lower Canada. In the present state of feeling among the French population, I cannot doubt that any power which they might possess would be used against the policy and the very existence of any form of British government. I cannot doubt that any French assembly that shall again meet in Lower Canada, will use whatever power, be it more or less limited, it may have to obstruct the government, and undo whatever has been done by it. Time, and the honest co-operation of the various parties, would be required to aid the action of a federal constitution; and time is not allowed, in the present state of Lower Canada, nor co-operation to be expected from a legislature of which the majority shall represent its French inhabitants. I believe that tranquillity can only be restored, by subjecting the province to the vigorous rule of an English majority; and that the only efficacious government would be that formed by a legislative union.

If the population of Upper Canada is rightly estimated at 400,000, the English inhabitants of Lower Canada at 150,000, and the French at 450,000, the union of the two provinces would not only give a clear English majority, but one which would be increased every year by the influence of English emigration; and I have little doubt that the French, when once placed, by the legitimate course of events and the working of natural causes, in a minority, would abandon their vain hopes of nationality. I do not mean that they would immediately give up their present animosities, or instantly renounce the hope of attaining their end by violent means. But the experience of the two unions in the British Isles may teach us how effectually the strong arm of a popular legislature would compel the obedience of the refractory population; and the hopelessness of success would gradually subdue the existing animosities, and incline the French Canadian population to acquiesce in their new state of political existence. I certainly should not like to subject the French Canadians to the rule of the identical English minority with which they have so long been contending; but from a majority emanating from so much more extended a source, I do not think they would have any oppression or injustice to fear; and in this case the far greater part of the majority never having been brought into previous collision, would regard them with no animosity that could warp their natural sense of equity. The endowments of the catholic church in Lower Canada, and the existence of all its present laws, until altered by the United Legislature, might be secured by stipulations similar to those adopted in the union between England and Scotland. I do not think that the subsequent history of British legislation need incline us to believe, that the nation which has a majority in a popular legislature is likely to use its power to tamper very hastily with the laws of the people to which it is united.

The union of the two provinces would secure to Upper Canada the present great objects of its desire. All disputes as to the division or amount of the revenue would cease. The surplus revenue of Lower Canada would supply the deficiency of that part of the Upper Province; and the province thus placed beyond the possibility of locally jobbing the surplus revenue, which it cannot reduce, would, I think, gain as much by the arrangement as the province which would thus find a means of paying the interest of its debt. Indeed, it would be by no means unjust to place this burden on Lower Canada, inasmuch as the great public works for which the debt was contracted are as much the concern of one province as of the other. Nor is it to be supposed that, whatever may have been the mismanagement in which a great part of the debt originated, the canals of Upper Canada will always be a source of loss instead of profit. The completion of the projected and necessary line of public works would be promoted by such an union. The access to the sea would be secured to Upper Canada. The saving of public money, which would be insured by the union of various establishments in the two provinces, would supply the means of conducting the general government on a more efficient scale than it has yet been carried on; and the responsibility of the executive would be secured by the increased weight which the representative body of the United Province would bring to bear on the Imperial government and legislature.

But while I convince myself that such desirable ends would be secured by the legislative union of the two provinces, I am inclined to go further, and inquire whether all these objects would not more surely be attained by extending this legislative union over all the British provinces in North America; and whether the advantages which I anticipate for two of them, might not, and should not in justice, be extended over all. Such an union would at once decisively settle the question of races; it would enable all the provinces to co-operate for all common purposes; and, above all, it would form a great and powerful people, possessing the means of securing good and responsible government for itself, and which, under the protection of the British empire, might in some measure counterbalance the preponderant and increasing influence of the United States on the American continent. I do not anticipate that a colonial legislature thus strong, and thus self-governing, would desire to abandon the connexion with Great Britain. On the contrary, I believe that the practical relief from undue interference, which would be the result of such a change, would strengthen the present bond of feelings and interests; and that the connexion would only become more durable and advantageous, by having more of equality, of freedom, and of local independence. But, at any rate, our first duty is to secure the well-being of our colonial countrymen; and if in the hidden decrees of that wisdom by which this world is ruled, it is written, that these countries are for ever to remain portions of the empire, we owe it to our honour to take good care that when they separate from us, they should not be the only countries on the American continent in which the Anglo-Saxon race shall be found unfit to govern itself.

I am, in truth, so far from believing that the increased power and weight that would be given to these colonies by union would endanger their connexion with the empire, that I look to it as the only means of fostering such a national feeling throughout them as would effectually counterbalance whatever tendencies may now exist towards separation. No large community of free and intelligent men will long feel contented with a political system which places them, because it places their country, in a position of inferiority to their neighbours.—The colonist of Great Britain is linked, it is true, to a mighty empire, and the glories of its history, the visible signs of its present power, and the civilization of its people, are calculated to raise and gratify his national pride. But he feels, also, that his link to that empire is one of remote dependence; he catches but passing and inadequate glimpses of its power and prosperity; he knows that in its government he and his own countrymen have no voice—While his neighbour on the other side of the frontier assumes importance, from the notion that his vote exercises some influence on the councils, and that he himself has some share in the onward progress of a mighty nation, the colonist feels the deadening influence of the narrow and subordinate community to which he belongs. In his own, and in the surrounding colonies, he finds petty objects occupying petty, stationary, and divided societies; and it is only when the chances of an uncertain and tardy communication bring intelligence of what has passed a month before on the other side of the Atlantic, that he is reminded of the empire with which he is connected. But the influence of the United States surrounds him on every side, and is forever present. It extends itself as population augments and intercourse increases; it penetrates every portion of the continent into which the restless spirit of American speculation impels the settler or the trader; it is felt in all the transactions of commerce, from the important operations of the monetary system down to the minor details of ordinary traffic: it stamps on all the habits and opinions of the surrounding countries the common characteristics of the thoughts, feelings and customs of the American people. Such is necessarily the influence which a great nation exercises on the small communities which surround it. Its thoughts and manners subjugate them, even when nominally independent of its authority. If we wish to prevent the extension of this influence, it can only be done by raising up for the North American colonist some nationality of his own, by elevating these small and unimportant communities into a society having some objects of a national importance, and by thus giving their inhabitants a country, which they will be unwilling to see absorbed even into one more powerful.

While I believe that the establishment of a comprehensive system of government, and of an effectual union between the different provinces, would produce this important effect on the general feelings of their inhabitants, I am inclined to attach very great importance to the influence which it would have in giving greater scope and satisfaction to the legitimate ambition of the most active and prominent persons to be found in them. As long as personal ambition is inherent in human nature, and as long as the morality of every free and civilized community encourages its aspirations, it is one great business of a wise government to provide for its legitimate development. If, as it is commonly asserted, the disorders of these colonies have, in great measure, been fomented by the influence of designing and ambitious individuals, this evil will best be remedied by allowing such a scope for the desires of such men as shall direct their ambition into the legitimate chance of furthering, and not of thwarting, their government. By creating high prizes in a general and responsible government, we shall immediately afford the means of pacifying the turbulent ambitions, and of employing in worthy and noble occupations, the talents which now are only exerted to foment disorder. We must remove from these colonies the cause to which the sagacity of Adam Smith traced the alienation of the provinces which now form the United States; we must provide some scope for what he calls 'the importance of the leading men of the colony,' beyond what he forcibly terms the present 'petty prizes of the paltry raffle of colonial faction.' A general legislative union would elevate and gratify the hopes of able and aspiring men. They would no longer look with envy and wonder at the great arena of the bordering federation, but see the means of satisfying every legitimate ambition in the high offices of the judicature and executive government of their own union.

Nor would an union of the various provinces be less advantageous in facilitating a co-operation for various common purposes, of which the want is now very seriously felt. There is hardly a department of the business of government which does not require, or would not be better performed, by being carried on under the superintendence of a general government; and when we consider the political and commercial interests that are common to these provinces, it appears difficult to account for their having ever been divided into separate governments, since they have all been portions of the same empire, subject to the same crown, governed by the same laws and constitutional customs, inhabited, with one exception, by the same race, contiguous and immediately adjacent to each other, and bounded along their whole frontier by the territories of the same powerful and rival state. It would appear that every motive that has induced the union of various provinces into a single state, exists from the consolidation of these colonies under a common legislature and executive. They have the same common relation to the mother country; the same relation to foreign nations. When one is at war, the others are at war; and the hostilities that are caused by an attack on one, must seriously compromise the welfare of the rest. Thus the disputes between Great Britain and the state of Maine appears immediately to involve the interest of none of these colonies, except New Brunswick or Lower Canada, to one of which the territory claimed by us must belong. But if a war were to commence on this ground, it is most probable that the American government would select Upper Canada as the most vulnerable, or, at any rate, as the easiest point of attack. A dispute respecting the fisheries of Nova Scotia, would involve precisely the same consequences. An union for common defence against foreign enemies is the natural bond of connexion that holds together the great communities, of the world; and between no parts of any kingdom or state is the necessity for such an union more obvious, than between the whole of these colonies.

Their internal relations furnish quite as strong motives for union. The post office is at the present moment under the management of the same imperial establishment. If, in compliance with the reasonable demands of the colonies, the regulation of a matter so entirely of internal concern, and the revenue derived from it, were placed under the control of the provincial legislatures, it would still be advisable that the management of the post office throughout the whole of British North America should be conducted by one general establishment. In the same way, so great is the influence on the other provinces of the arrangements adopted with respect to the disposal of public lands and colonization in any one, that it is absolutely essential that this department of government should be conducted on one system, and by one authority. The necessity of common fiscal regulations is strongly felt by all the colonies; and a common custom-house establishment would relieve them from the hindrances to their trade caused by the duties now levied on all commercial intercourse between them. The monetary and banking system of all is subject to the same influences, and ought to be regulated by the same laws. The establishment of a common colonial currency is very generally desired. Indeed, I know of no department of government that would not greatly gain, both in economy and efficiency, by being placed under a common management. I should not propose, at first, to alter the existing public establishments of the different provinces, because the necessary changes had better be left to be made by the united government; and the judicial establishments should certainly not be disturbed until the future legislature shall provide for the re-construction on an uniform and permanent footing. But even in the administration of justice, an union would immediately supply a remedy for one of the most serious wants under which all the provinces labour, by facilitating the formation of a general appellate tribunal for all the North American colonies.

But the interests which are already in common between all these provinces are small in comparison with those which the consequences of such an union might, and I think I may say assuredly would, call into existence; and the great discoveries of modern art, which have throughout the world, and nowhere more than in America, entirely altered the character and the channels of communication between distant countries, will bring all the North American Colonies into constant and speedy intercourse with each other. The success of the great experiment of steam navigation across the Atlantic, opens a prospect of a speedy communication with Europe, which will materially affect the future state of all these provinces. In a despatch which arrived in Canada after my departure, the Secretary of State informed me of the determination of your Majesty's Government to establish a steam communication between Great Britain and Halifax, and instructed me to turn my attention to the formation of a road between that port and Quebec. It would, indeed, have given me sincere satisfaction, had I remained in the province, to promote, by any means in my power, so highly desirable an object; and the removal of the usual restrictions on my authority as Governor-General having given me the means of effectually acting in concert with the various provincial governments, I might have been able to make some progress in the work. But I cannot point out more strikingly the evils of the present want of a general government for these provinces, than by adverting to the difficulty which would practically occur, under the previous and present arrangements of both executive and legislative authorities in the various provinces, in attempting to carry such a plan into effect. For the various colonies have no more means of concerting such common works with each other, than with the neighbouring states of the union.— They stand to one another in the position of foreign states, and of foreign states without diplomatic relations. The governors may correspond with each other; the legislatures may enact laws, carrying the common purposes into effect in their respective jurisdictions; but there is no means by which the various details may speedily and satisfactorily be settled with the concurrence of the different parties. And, in this instance, it must be recollected that the communication and the final settlement would have to be made between, not two, but several of the provinces. The road would run through three of them; and Upper Canada, into which it would not enter, would in fact, be more interested in the completion of such a work than any even of the provinces through which it would pass. The colonies indeed, have no common centre in which the arrangement could be made, except in the Colonial-office at home; and the details of such a plan would have to be discussed, just where the interests of all parties would have the least means of being fairly and fully represented, and where the minute local knowledge necessary for such a matter would be least likely to be found.

The completion of any satisfactory communication between Halifax and Quebec would, in fact, produce relations between these provinces that would render a general union absolutely necessary. Several surveys have proved that a railroad would be perfectly practicable the whole way. Indeed, in North America, the expense and difficulty of making a railroad bears by no means the excessive proportion to those of a common road that it does in Europe. It appears to be a general opinion in the United States, that the severe snows and frosts of that continent very slightly impede, and do not prevent, the travelling on railroads; and, if I am rightly informed, the Utica railroad, in the northern part of the state of New York, is used throughout the winter. If this opinion be correct, the formation of a railroad from Halifax to Quebec, would entirely alter some of the distinguishing characteristics of the Canadas. Instead of being shut out from all direct intercourse with England during half the year, they would possess a far more certain and speedy communication throughout the winter than they now possess in summer. The passage from Ireland to Quebec would be a matter of 10 or 12 days, and Halifax would be the great port by which a large portion of the trade, and all the conveyance of passengers to the whole of British North America, would be carried on. But, even supposing these brilliant prospects to be such as we could not reckon on seeing realized, I may assume that it is not intended to make this road without a well-founded belief that it will become an important channel of communication between the upper and lower provinces. In either case, would not the maintenance of such a road, and the mode in which the government is administered in the different provinces, be matters of common interest to all? If the great natural channel of the St. Lawrence gives all the people who dwell in any part of its basin such an interest in the government of the whole as renders it wise to incorporate the two Canadas, the artificial work which would, in fact, supersede the lower part of the St. Lawrence, as the outlet of a great part of the Canadian trade, and would make Halifax, in a great measure, an outport to Quebec, would surely in the same way render it advisable that the incorporation should be extended to provinces through which such a road would pass.

With respect to the two smaller colonies of Prince Edward's island and Newfoundland, I am of opinion, that not only would most of the reasons which I have given for an union of the others apply to them, but that their smallness makes it absolutely necessary, as the only means of securing any proper attention to their interests, and investing them with that consideration, the deficiency of which they have so much reason to lament, in all the disputes which yearly occur between them and the citizens of the United States, with regard to the encroachments made by the latter on their coasts and fisheries.

The views on which I found my support of a comprehensive union have long been entertained by many persons in these colonies whose opinion is entitled to the highest consideration. I cannot, however, refrain from mentioning the sanction of such views by one whose authority your Majesty will, I may venture to say, receive with the utmost respect. Mr. Sewell, the late Chief Justice of Quebec, laid before me an autograph letter addressed to himself by your Majesty's illustrious and lamented father, in which his Royal Highness was pleased to express his approbation of a similar plan then proposed by that gentleman. No one better understood the interests and character of these colonies than his Royal Highness; and it is with peculiar satisfaction, therefore, that I submit to your Majesty's perusal the important document which contains his Royal Highness's opinion in favour of such a scheme:—

“KENSINGTON PALACE, NOV. 30, 1814.

“My dear Sewell,—I have this day had the pleasure of receiving your note of yesterday, with its interesting enclosure; nothing can be better arranged than the whole thing is, or more perfectly I cannot wish; and when I see an opening, it is fully my intention to hint the matter to Lord Bathurst, and put the paper into his hands, without, however, telling him from whom I have it, though I shall urge him to have some conversation with you relative to it. Permit me, however, just to ask you whether it was not an oversight in you to state that there are five Houses of Assembly in the British colonies in North America? for, if I am not under an error, there are six, viz. Upper and Lower Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the islands of Prince Edward and Cape Breton. Allow me also to beg of you to put down the proportions in which you think the 30 members of the representative assembly ought to be furnished by each province; and finally to suggest whether you would not think two Lieutenant Governors, with two Executive Councils, sufficient for the executive government of the whole—viz. one for the two Canadas, and one for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, comprehending the small dependencies of Cape Breton and Prince Edward's Island; the former to reside at Montreal, and the latter at whichever of the two situations may be considered most central for the two provinces, whether Anapolis Royal or Windsor. But, at all events, should you even consider four Executive Governments and four Executive Councils requisite, I presume there cannot be a question of the expediency of comprehending the two small islands in the gulf of St. Lawrence with Nova Scotia.

“Believe me ever to remain, with the most friendly regard,

“My dear Sewell, yours faithfully,

I know of but one difficulty in the way of such an union, and that arises from the disinclination which some of the lower provinces might feel to the transference of powers from their present legislatures to that of the union. The objection to this would arise principally, I imagine, from their not liking to give up the immediate control which they now have over the funds by which their local expenditure is defrayed. I have given such a view of the evils of this system that I cannot be expected to admit that an interference with it would be an objection to my plan. I think, however, that the provinces have a right to complain, if these powers of local management, and of distributing funds for local purposes, were taken from the provincial assemblies only to be placed in the yet more objectionable hands of a general legislature. Every precaution should, in my opinion, be taken to prevent such a power, by any possibility, falling into the hands of the legislature of the union. In order to prevent that, I would prefer that the provincial assemblies should be retained with merely municipal powers. But it would be far better, in point both of efficiency and of economy, that this power should be intrusted to the municipal bodies of much smaller districts; and the formation of such bodies would, in my opinion, be an essential part of any durable and complete union.

With such views, I should, without hesitation, recommend the immediate adoption of a general legislative union of all the British provinces in North America, if the regular course of government were suspended or perilled in the Lower Provinces, and the necessity of the immediate adoption of a plan for their government, without reference to them, a matter of urgency, or if it were possible to delay the adoption of a measure with respect to the Canadas until the project of an union could have been referred to the legislatures of the Lower Provinces. But the state of the Lower Province, though it justifies the proposal of an union, would not, I think, render it gracious, or even just, on the part of parliament to carry it into effect without referring it for the ample deliberation and consent of the people of those colonies. Moreover, the state of the two Canadas is such that neither the feelings of the parties concerned, nor the interests of the Crown or the colonies themselves, will admit of a single session, nor even of a large portion of a session of parliament being allowed to pass, without a definite decision by the Imperial legislature as to the basis on which it purposes to found the future government of those colonies.

In existing circumstances, the conclusion to which the foregoing considerations lead me is, that no time should be lost in proposing to parliament a bill for repealing the 31st of George III., restoring the union of the Canadas under one legislature, and reconstituting them as one province.

The bill should contain provisions by which any or all of the other North American colonies may, on the application of the legislature, be, with the consent of the two Canadas, or their United Legislature, admitted into the union on such terms as may be agreed on between them.

As the mere amalgamation of the Houses of Assembly of the two provinces would not be advisable, or give at all a due share of representation to each, a parliamentary commission should be appointed, for the purpose of forming the electoral divisions, and determining the number of members to be returned on the principle of giving representation, as near as may be, in proportion to population. I am averse to every plan that has been proposed for giving an equal number of members to the two provinces, in order to attain the temporary end of outnumbering the French, because I think the same object will be obtained without any violation of the principles of representation, and without any such appearance of injustice in the scheme as would set public opinion, both in England and America, strongly against it; and because, when emigration shall have increased the English population in the Upper Province, the adoption of such a principle would operate to defeat the very purpose it is intended to serve. It appears to me that any such electoral arrangement, founded on the present provincial divisions, would tend to defeat the purposes of union, and perpetuate the idea of disunion.

At the same time, in order to prevent the confusion and danger likely to ensue from attempting to have popular elections in districts recently the seats of open rebellion, it will be advisable to give the Governor a temporary power of suspending by proclamation, stating specifically the grounds of his determination, the writs of electoral districts, in which he may be of opinion that elections could not safely take place.

The same commission should form a plan of local government, by elective bodies, subordinate to the general legislature, and exercising a complete control over such local affairs as do not come within the province of general legislation. The plan so framed should be made an Act of the Imperial Parliament, so as to prevent the general legislature from encroaching on the powers of the local bodies.

A general executive, on an improved principle, should be established, together with a supreme court of appeal, for all the North American colonies. The other establishments and laws of the two colonies should be left unaltered, until the legislature of the union should think fit to change them; and the security of the existing endowments of the catholic church in Lower Canada should be guaranteed by the Act.

The constitution of a second legislative body for the united legislature, involves questions of very great difficulty. The present constitution of the legislative councils of these provinces, has always appeared to me inconsistent with sound principles, and little calculated to answer the purpose of placing the effective check, which I consider necessary, on the popular branch of the legislature. The analogy which some persons have attempted to draw between the House of Lords and the legislative councils, seems to me erroneous. The constitution of the House of Lords is consonant with the frame of English society; and as the creation of a precisely similar body in such a state of society as that of these colonies is impossible, it has always appeared to me most unwise to attempt to supply its place by one which has no point of resemblance to it, except that of being a non-elective check on the elective branch of the legislature. The attempt to invest a few persons, distinguished from their fellow-colonists neither by birth nor hereditary property, and often only transiently connected with the country, with such a power, seems only calculated to ensure jealousy and bad feeling in the first instance, and collision at last. I believe that when the necessity of relying, in Lower Canada, on the English character of the legislative council, as a check on the national prejudices of a French Assembly, shall be removed by the union, few persons in the colonies will be found disposed in favour of its present constitution. Indeed, the very fact of union will complicate the diffi-calties which have hitherto existed: because a satisfactory choice of councillors would have to be made with reference to the varied interests of a much more numerous and extended community.

It will be necessary, therefore, for the completion of any stable scheme of government, that parliament should revise the constitution of the legislative council, and by adopting every practical means to give that institution such a character as would enable it, by its tranquil and safe, but effective working, to act as an useful check on the popular branch of the legislature, prevent a repetition of those collisions which have already caused such dangerous irritation.

The plan which I have framed for the management of the public lands being intended to promote the common advantage of the colonies, and of the mother country, I therefore propose that the entire administration of it should be confided to an Imperial authority. The conclusive reasons which have induced me to recommend this course, will be found at length in the separate report on the subject of public lands and emigration.

All the revenues of the Crown, except those derived from this source, should at once be given up to the united legislature, on the concession of an adequate civil list.

The responsibility to the united legislature of all officers of the government, except the Governor and his secretary, should be secured by every means known to the British constitution. The Governor, as the representative of the Crown, should be instructed that he must carry on his government by heads of departments, in whom the united legislature shall repose confidence; and that he must look for no support from home in any contest with the legislature, except on points involving strictly Imperial interests.

The independence of the Judges should be secured, by giving the same tenure of office, and security of income, as exist in England.

No money votes should be allowed to originate, without the previous consent of the Crown.

In the same Act should be contained a repeal of past provisions, with respect to the clergy reserves, and the application of the funds arising from them.

In order to promote emigration on the greatest possible scale, and with the most beneficial results to all concerned, I have elsewhere recommended a system of measures which has been expressly framed with that view, after full inquiry and careful deliberation. Those measures would not subject either the colonies or the mother country to any expense whatever. In conjunction with the measures suggested for disposing of public lands, and remedying the evils occasioned by past mis-management in that department, they form a plan of colonization to which I attach the highest importance. The objects, at least, with which the plan has been formed, are to provide large funds for emigration, and for creating and improving means of communication throughout the provinces; to guard emigrants of the labouring class against the present risks of the passage; to secure for all of them a comfortable resting-place, and employment, at good wages, immediately on their arrival; to encourage the investment of surplus British capital in these colonies, by rendering it as secure and as profitable as in the United States; to promote the settlement of wild lands, and the general improvement of the colonies; to add to the value of every man's property in land; to extend the demand for British-manufactured goods, and the means of paying for them, in proportion to the amount of emigration, and the general increase of the colonial people; and to augment the colonial revenues in the same degree.

When the details of the measure, with the particular reasons for each of them are examined, the means proposed will, I trust, be found as simple as the ends are great; nor have they been suggested by any fanciful or merely speculative view of the subject. They are founded on the facts given in evidence by practical men; on authentic information, as to the wants and capabilities of the colonies; on an examination of the circumstances which occasion so high a degree of prosperity in the neighbouring States; on the efficient working and remarkable results of improved methods of colonization in other parts of the British empire; in some measure on the deliberate proposals of a Committee of the House of Commons; and lastly, on the favourable opinion of every intelligent person in the colonies, whom I consulted with respect to them. They involve, no doubt, a considerable change of system, or rather the adoption of a system where there has been none; but this, considering the number and magnitude of past errors, and the present wretched economical state of the colonies, seems rather a recommendation than an objection. I do not flatter myself that so much good can be accomplished without an effort; but in this, as in other suggestions, I have presumed that the Imperial government, and Legislature, will appreciate the actual crisis in the affairs of these colonies, and will not shrink from any exertion that may be necessary to preserve them to the empire.

By the adoption of the various measures here recommended, I venture to hope that the disorders of these colonies may be arrested, and their future well-being and connection with the British empire secured. Of the certain result of my suggestions, I cannot, of course, speak with entire confidence, because it seems almost too much to hope that evils of so long growth, and such extent, can be removed by the tardy application of even the boldest remedy; and because I know that as much depends upon the consistent vigour and prudence of those who may have to carry it into effect, as on the soundness of the policy suggested. The deep rooted evils of Lower Canada will require great firmness to remove them. The disorders of Upper Canada, which appear to me to originate entirely in mere defects of its constitutional system, may I believe, be removed by adopting a more sound and consistent mode of administering the government. We may derive some confidence from the recollection, that very simple remedies yet remain to be resorted to for the first time. And we need not despair of governing a people, who really have hitherto very imperfectly known what it is to have a government.

I have made no mention of emigration, on an extended scale, as a cure for political disorders: because it is my opinion, that until tranquility is restored, and prospect of a free and stable government is held out, no emigrants should be induced to go to, and that few would at any rate remain in, Canada. But if by the means which I have suggested, or by any other, peace can be restored—confidence created—and popular and vigorous government established—I rely on the adoption of a judicious system of colonization as an effectual barrier against the recurrence of many of the existing evils. If I should have miscalculated the proportions in which the friends and the enemies of British connection may meet in the united legislature, one year's emigration would redress the balance. It is by a sound system of colonization, that we can render these extensive regions available for the benefit of the British people.—The mis-management by which the resources of our colonies have hitherto been wasted, has, I know, produced in the public mind too much of a disposition to regard them as mere sources of corruption and loss—and to entertain, with too much complacency, the idea of abandoning them as useless. I cannot participate in the notion, that it is the part either of prudence or of honour to abandon our countrymen, when our government of them has plunged them into disorder, or our territory, when we discover that we have not turned it to proper account.—The experiment of keeping colonies, and governing them well, ought at least to have a trial, ere we abandon for ever the vast dominion which might supply the wants of our surplus population, and raise up millions of fresh consumers of our manufactures, and producers of a supply for our wants. The warmest admirers, and the strongest opponents of republican institutions, admit or assert that the amazing prosperity of the United States, is less owing to their form of government than to the unlimited supply of fertile land, which maintains succeeding generations in an undiminishing affluence of fertile soil. A region as large and as fertile is open to your Majesty's subjects, in your Majesty's American dominions. The recent improvements of the means of communication will, in a short time, bring the unoccupied lands of Canada and New Brunswick within as easy a reach of the British Isles, as the territories of Iowa and Wisconsin are of that incessant emigration that annually quits New England for the Far West.

I see no reason, therefore, for doubting that, by good government, and the adoption of a sound system of colonization, the British possessions in North America may thus be made the means of conferring on the suffering classes of the mother country, many of the blessings which have hitherto been supposed to be peculiar to the social state of the new world.

In conclusion, I must earnestly impress on your Majesty's advisers, and on the Imperial Parliament, the paramount necessity of a prompt and decisive settlement of this important question, not only on account of the extent and variety of interests, involving the welfare and security of the British empire, which are perilled by every hour's delay, but on account of the state of feeling which exists in the public mind throughout all your Majesty's North American possessions, and more especially the two Canadas.

In various despatches addressed to your Majesty's Secretary of State, I have given a full description of that state of feeling, as I found it evinced by all classes and all parties, in consequence of the events which occurred in the last session of the British Parliament. I do not allude now to the French Canadians, but to the English population of both provinces. Ample evidence of their feelings will be found in the addresses which were presented to me from all parts of the North American colonies, and which I have inserted in an appendix to this report. But, strong as were the expressions of regret and disappointment at the sudden annihilation of those hopes which the English had entertained, of seeing a speedy and satisfactory termination of that state of confusion and anarchy under which they had so long laboured, they sunk into insignificance when compared with the danger arising from those threats of separation and independence, the open and general utterance of which was reported to me from all quarters. I fortunately succeeded in calming this irritation for the time, by directing the public mind to the prospect of those remedies which the wisdom and beneficence of your Majesty must naturally incline your Majesty to sanction, whenever they are brought under your Majesty's consideration. But the good effects thus produced by the responsibility which I took upon myself will be destroyed; all these feelings will recur with redoubled violence; and the danger will become immeasurably greater, if such hopes are once more frustrated, and the imperial legislature fails to apply an immediate and final remedy to all those evils of which your Majesty's subjects in America so loudly complain, and of which I have supplied such ample evidence.

For these reasons I pray your Majesty's earnest attention to this report. It is the last act arising out of the loyal and conscientious discharge of the high duties imposed upon me by the commission which your Majesty was graciously pleased to intrust me. I humbly hope that your Majesty will receive it favourably, and believe that it has been dictated by the most devoted feeling of loyalty and attachment to your Majesty's person and throne, by the strongest sense of public duty, and by the earnest desire to perpetuate and strengthen the connexion between this empire and the North American colonies, which would then form one of the brightest ornaments in your Majesty's imperial crown.

All which is humbly submitted to your Majesty

DURHAM.

REPORT FROM THE SELECT COMMITTEE

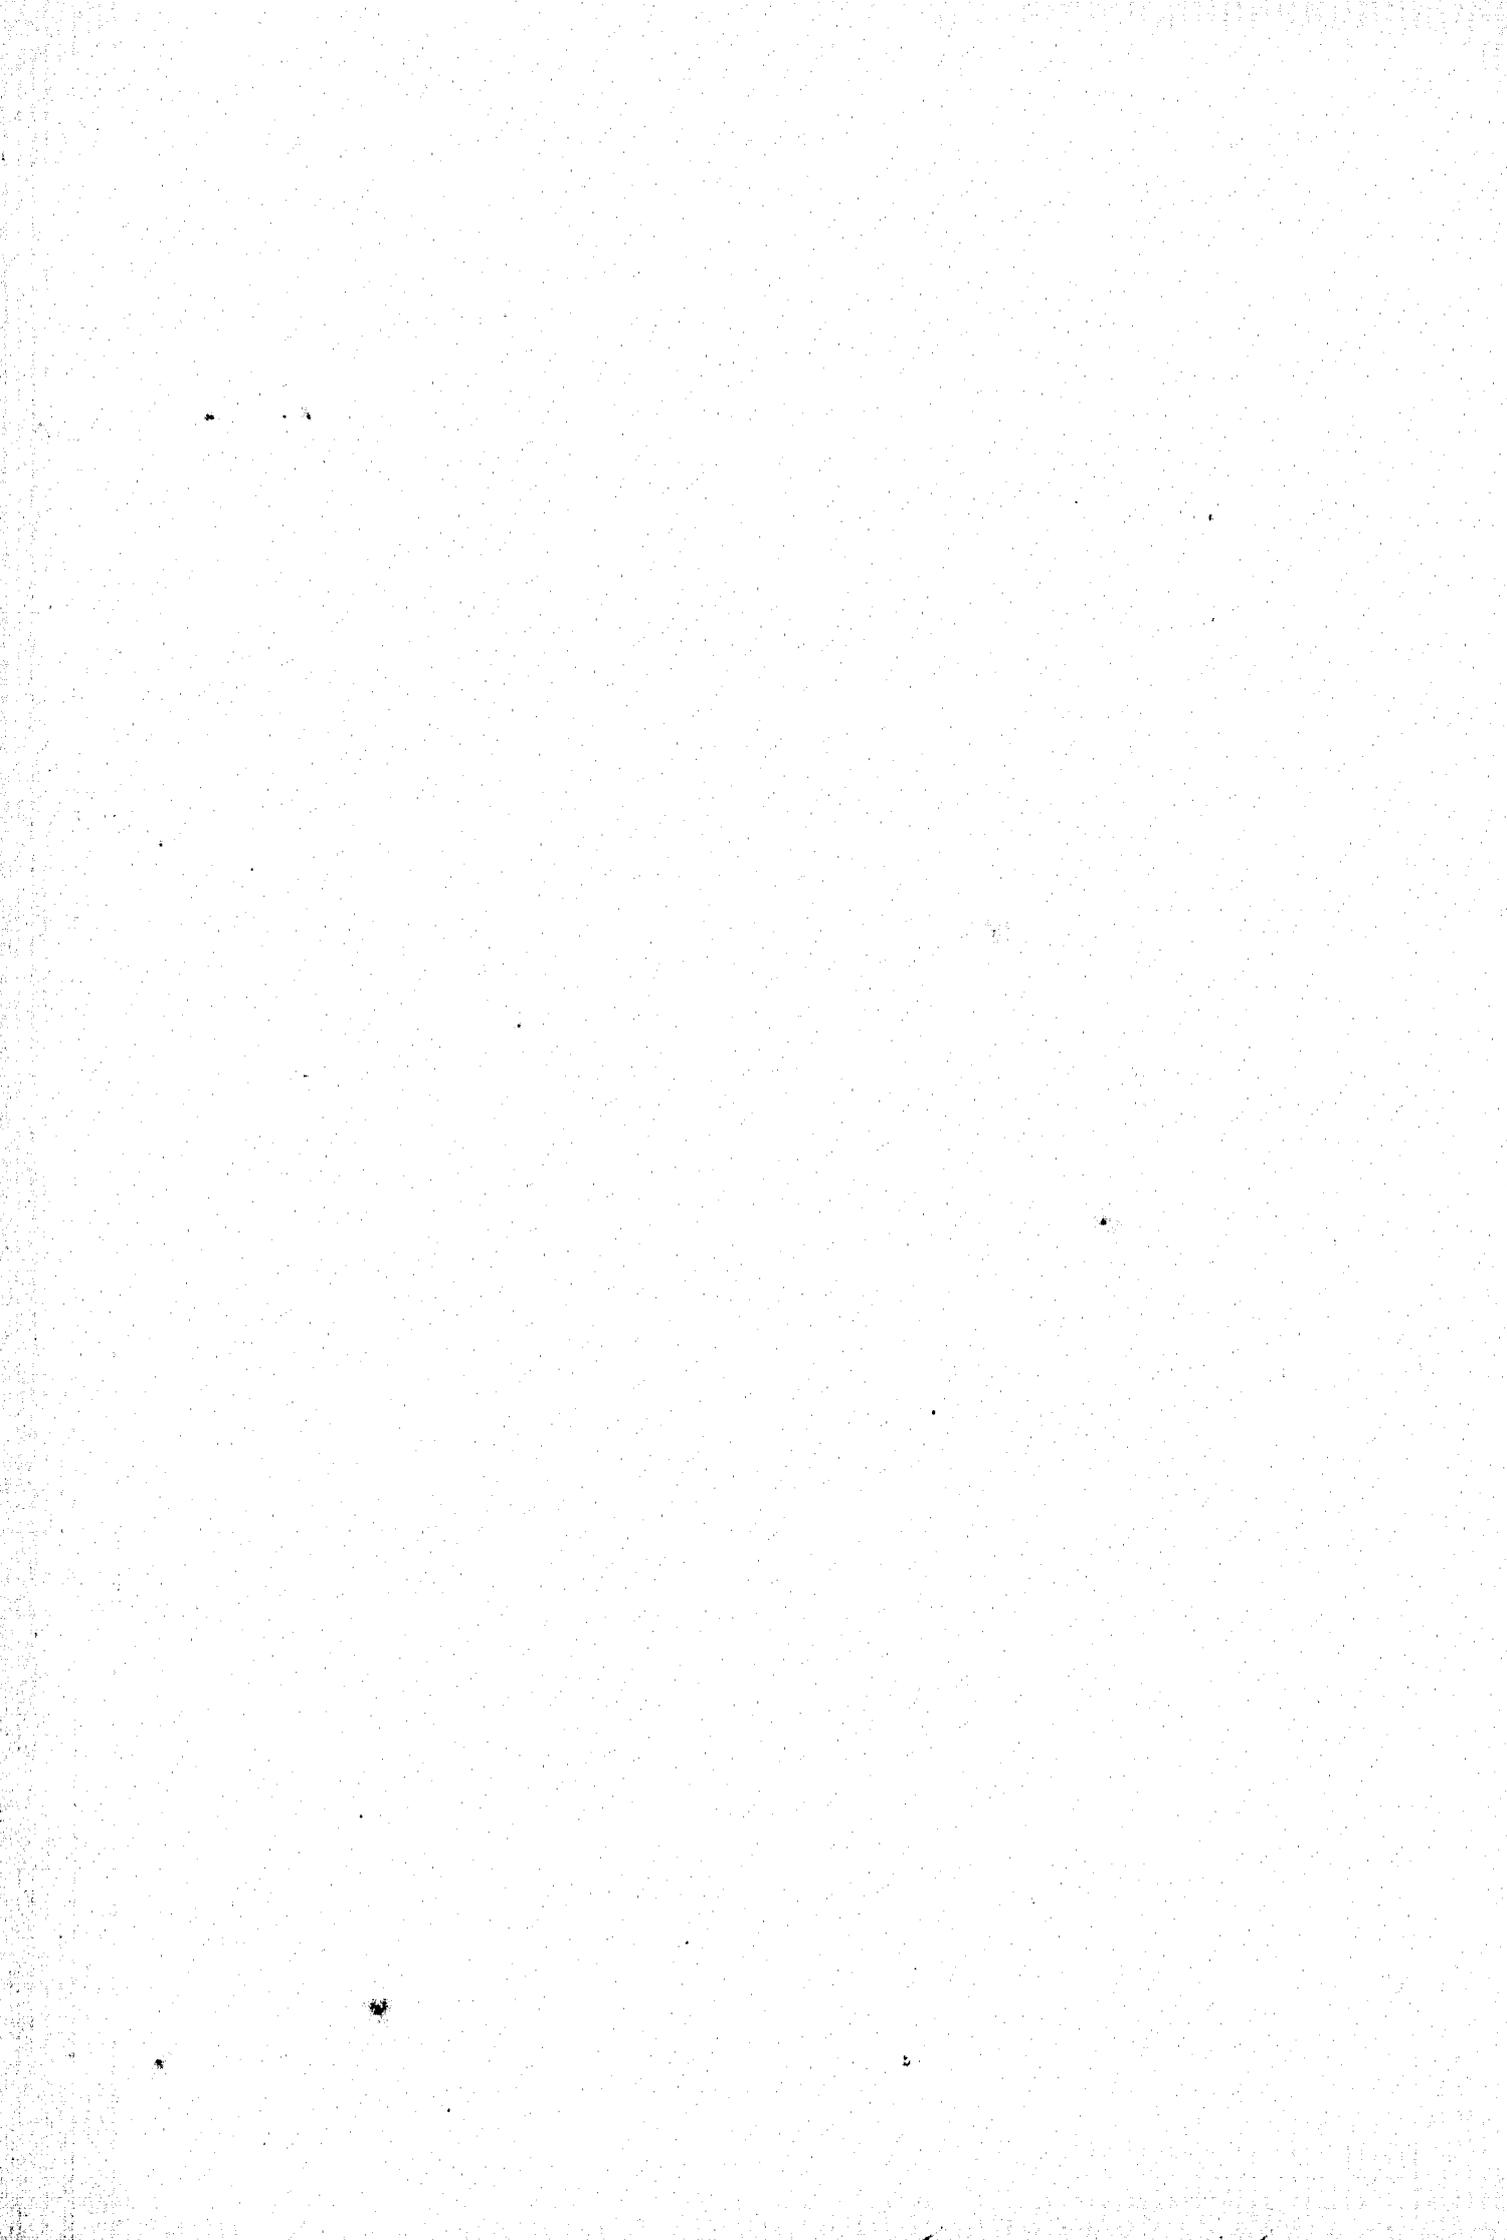

OF THE

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY OF UPPER CANADA,

APPOINTED TO REPORT

ON THE STATE OF THE PROVINCE.

---

TO THE HONOURABLE THE COMMONS HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

THE REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON THE STATE OF THE PROVINCE, (UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED BY THE COMMITTEE.)

IN the Report on political state of the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, adopted by your Honourable House, during the last session of the Provincial Legislature, the following statement is recorded :—

“ The next suggestion to which your Committee beg to draw the attention of your Honourable House, is the necessity (now too painfully obvious) of keeping up a respectable military force within both Provinces.

“ It must be sufficiently apparent, your Committee believe, that this desire for military protection does not proceed from any apprehension of internal revolt in Upper Canada at least.

“ Recent events have proved how small the number is that aim at rebellion, and how ready and how well able the great body of the inhabitants of this province are to suppress any attempt at insurrection: but the civilized nations of Europe will learn, with astonishment, that it ceases to be a question, whether the ‘ great republic’ of the United States of America, boasting of the superiority of its institutions over those of every other country, has the power of controlling its citizens within the limits essential to the maintenance of peace, and the honourable performance of treaties, solemnly entered into by it, with foreign powers.

“ The occupation and conquest of Texas, in the South, and the assembling of an armed force on its Eastern frontier, openly recruited in its principal cities and towns, commanded by its citizens, and by them also supplied with arms, ammunition, clothing, money and provisions, and transported in the presence of, and unrestrained (if not encouraged) by its magistrates and public officers, in steamboats and other vessels, into this province, and landed in it for the avowed purpose of overthrowing the government and wresting the colony from the crown of Great Britain, sufficiently prove—that, if the countries bordering on the United States desire to protect themselves from the inroads of free-booters, pirates, fugitive traitors, and outlaws, they must look for security to their own fleets and armies, and not to the honourable forbearance of the American people, or the efficiency or moral influence of their government.”

Your Committee are well assured that nothing could afford your honourable House greater satisfaction than to feel justified in recalling the imputation which this declaration conveys upon the integrity of a people, with whom it is the inclination as well as the interest of all Her Majesty’s subjects, and especially those residing in this province, to keep up the most friendly intercourse. The detail of facts, however, which it will be the duty of your Committee to lay before your honourable House and the British nation, will too painfully and undeniably prove, that the apprehensions entertained, of want of faith, and of outrage and aggression on the part of the people of the United States upon Her Majesty’s subjects in Upper Canada, was far from being exaggerated in the report referred to, nor was it less truly stated by the illustrious Duke of Wellington, whose patriotic and powerful advocacy of the interests of his grateful fellow-subjects in these provinces can never be forgotten by them—that these outrages and aggressions were committed for no other reason than that the people of Upper Canada were loyal to their sovereign.

The Report from which the above extract is taken bears date the 8th February, 1838, previously to which two distinct invasions of the province had occurred by numerous bodies of American citizens. The first, the occupation of Navy Island; the second, that of Bois Blanc, followed by the attack on Amherstburgh.

Each of these inroads was repulsed by the steady loyalty and intrepid bravery of the militia. Not the slightest disposition was manifested on the part of any portion of the people of this country to unite with the invading force—and it was hoped that the ill-success which had attended them, would induce those with whom they had originated to lay aside all further attempts to disturb the peace of the province—but this hope unhappily proved utterly fallacious; and it will now be the painful duty of your Committee to detail a succession of invasions, piracies, murders and outrages committed by the citizens of the United States upon the peaceful and unoffending inhabitants of this province, such as are without parallel in the history of civilized nations, and, in these days, would be looked upon as disgraceful amongst the most barbarous of mankind.

On the 22nd of February, 1838, upwards of four hundred American brigands assembled at a place called French Creek, in the state of New York, situate on the river St. Lawrence, about twenty-five miles below Kingston, from whence they marched in military array, and took possession of Hickory Island, a few miles nearer Kingston, within the British territory. This band of invaders was headed by an American citizen of the name of Van Rensselaer, who had previously held command on Navy Island, and were armed and openly organized and recruited in the state of New York. As soon as this unexpected movement was known, a few hundreds of the militia of the Midland district and district of Johnstown, assembled, and instantly marched against the brigands, who, however, did not wait the threatened encounter, but fled and dispersed on receiving information of the approach of these brave and loyal men.

About the same period, from three to four hundred pirates from the state of Michigan, established themselves on Fighting Island, near Sandwich, in the Western district, from which position they were driven by a small military force under Colonel Townsend of the 24th regiment, sustained by the prompt and intrepid bravery of the militia. This body of invaders, in their hasty flight, left behind them a field piece, and a large number of muskets perfectly new, which bore the mark of the United States army, and were known to be the property of the government of that republic.

The next invasion of our territory was the occupation of the inhabited island called Pointe-au-Pelé, below Amherstburgh, by a force estimated at from four to five hundred men, headed by a brigand named Bradley, residing at Sandusky, in the state of Ohio, and who is represented as a man of wealth and influence. The circumstances attending this inroad were of a more serious and lamentable character than any that had previously occurred. The brigands, upon taking possession of the island, commenced by making prisoners of the settlers, robbing them of their horses, cattle, corn, and other property, and sending it away to the opposite American shore. Upon the approach of a small force, composed of a detachment of the regular troops and militia, they, conceiving themselves sufficiently strong to resist the attack with which they were threatened, commenced a fire upon our men, and in the course of the conflict that ensued, no less than thirty out of about ninety of the brave soldiers of the 32nd regiment, under the gallant Captains Brown and Everleigh, were killed and wounded; and one militia-man, a spirited young man of the name of Parish, was also slain. Having effected these murders and outrages, such of the ruffians as escaped injury, (it was reported that upwards of seventy of them had been killed or wounded,) fled to their own shores, where they were received with acclamation by their fellow-citizens. Colonel Prince, who on hearing of the invasion of the island of Pointe-au-Pelé, had immediately joined the military force which had marched to that place, on his return to Sandwich, captured a noted brigand of the name of Sutherland, who had been second in command at Navy Island, and who had subsequently directed the attack on Bois Blanc Island and Amherstburgh, and who at the time he was taken was on his way to join his brother pirates, of whose defeat and flight he had not been informed.

This was the last of the succession of invasions of the province that occurred during that period of the year, when the country was accessible by ice and winter roads; and as all of them had been signally defeated, and as the inhabitants of the province were living in peace among themselves, and had not shewn the slightest disposition to unite with any of the parties that had assailed our shores (if exception be made of some suspicious movements on the part of a very small number of individuals in the Midland district, against whom, however, no legal evidence of guilt was established,) it was believed that the public tranquillity was no longer in danger:—and, in the confidence of perfect security, our merchants, farmers, and mechanics, returned to their ordinary occupations; and the people of the country generally resumed their usual intercourse and communication with each other, and with their republican neighbours. It was well known that there were still lurking along the American frontier, a number of the traitors who had fled the province to avoid the punishment to which they were justly liable for their crimes; and it was also well known that some few of the most restless and malignant among them would continue their exertions to produce collision between the inhabitants of the two countries. Yet, it was believed, that the interest, if not the inclination, of the people of the neighbouring states, would induce them to interpose their influence, and such authority as their laws could enforce, to preserve a safe and peaceful communication with Her Majesty's subjects, who were most anxious, on their part, to live in harmony with them.

Unhappily, however, we were soon convinced that our hopes of peace and security were altogether groundless; that we were about to experience injuries far more serious than any we had hitherto suffered; that, in fact, we were not only to be subject to the predatory attacks of detached and independent bands of assassins and pirates, but that a great and influential community were combining secretly, but deliberately, to overthrow our government and our laws—to lay desolate our country, and to murder and destroy all who should venture to oppose their barbarous and wicked designs. It was some time before this unparalleled conspiracy was discovered, and in the meanwhile a series of outrages were committed by small parties of American citizens, to which it is necessary briefly to advert.

The first was the destruction of the Sir Robert Peel steamboat,—This vessel, quite new, and valued at ten thousand pounds, when on her way from Prescott to the ports at the head of Lake Ontario, stopped on the 30th May, at an island in the River Saint Lawrence, called Wells' Island, and within the limits of the state of New York, for the purpose of taking in wood. While lying moored to the shore, in full confidence of security in the port of a friendly power, and in the middle of the night, when all the passengers, (among whom were a number of ladies,) had retired to rest, she was boarded by a band of about thirty pirates, headed by a well-known free-booter;—These ruffians, armed and disguised, rushed into the cabins, hurried the passengers from their beds, and, with brutal violence, drove them on shore. The crew, not expecting the attack, and wholly unprepared for it, were unable to make resistance; the entire possession of the vessel was therefore easily gained by the assailants, who, after pillaging her of every thing valuable, including the money, watches, clothing, and other property of the passengers, towed her into the stream, where they set fire to her, and watched her until she was entirely consumed, and then returned to the American shore.

As might reasonably be expected, an outrage so unusual in any country, and wholly without a parallel in this, produced a powerful sensation throughout the British colonies—and it was believed that corresponding feelings of indignation would have been manifested on the opposite shores; and that every effort would be made to bring the perpetrators of this cowardly and atrocious felony to punishment. But although some expression of dissatisfaction did exhibit itself, it was slight in comparison with what was looked for, and what the enormity of the crime led every one to expect. A proclamation was issued by the government of the state of New York, offering a paltry sum for the apprehension of certain of the pirates; but although the majority of them, including the leaders, were well known, only one or two of them were arrested; who, being placed on their trial, notwithstanding the plainest evidence of their guilt, were, almost without hesitation, acquitted by the jury empannelled to try them. Up to this period, no event had occurred, connected with our border difficulties, that so shocked the feelings of the people of this province as this last;—It caused thousands who had previously indulged the belief, that the government and people of the United States were averse to the unprovoked and lawless aggressions which had been previously made upon us, to doubt the correctness of their opinions. They began to consider it unsafe to enter their harbours; and from that period to the present, it has been with reluctance that any well-affected subject of Her Majesty in this province has approached the shores of the United States, or engaged in intercourse of any kind with the citizens of that republic. The feeling of cordial good will that once existed between the people of the two countries, was greatly weakened, and subsequent events have almost entirely destroyed it. No proffer of indemnity has yet been made by the nation responsible for this great injury to our fellow subjects, and insult to the British flag; nor does it appear to be considered necessary by the American government, for the maintenance of its national honour, to do this plain act of justice without waiting a demand, which, we cannot doubt, is certain to be made and enforced.

The next instance of foreign aggression was the affair of Short Hills, where a bandit of the name of Morreau, headed a party of brigands, supposed to number about one hundred and fifty, who made a sudden and unexpected attack in the night time, on a small detachment of provincial dragoons, stationed in a wooden building in the township of Pelham, who, although assailed by more than ten times their number, defended themselves with the greatest courage and fortitude, and were at last subdued, not by the arms of the pirates, but by the building which they occupied being set on fire. The moment the ruffians got these gallant men into their hands, they robbed them of their property, and stripped them of their clothing, and having plundered the dwellings of some of the farmers and yeomanry in the neighbourhood, they attempted a retreat; but being pursued, twenty-seven of them, including their leader, were captured. There is reason to believe that this invasion was undertaken and directed against the district of Niagara, under the expectation, that so soon as a footing was gained by the brigands in that district, they would be joined by large numbers of disaffected people from different parts of the province. In this, however, they were wholly disappointed, and as the loyalty of the great mass of Her Majesty's subjects had been so clearly and undeniably established, by the constant and entire rejection of every attempt that had been made to seduce them from their allegiance; and as, after the result of this last attack was known in the neighbouring states, there appeared to be a sudden and complete cessation of all further attempts at invasion, the Commander of the Forces considered it no longer necessary to keep up the militia which had been embodied for a limited time of service; and they were accordingly disbanded, and the defence of the country was left to the troops of the line.

The policy adopted in thus lessening the defensive force of the province, was much questioned at the time it occurred; and the apprehensions which many entertained that all danger of foreign invasion was not past, were considerably increased by intelligence which was soon after received, that an attack had been made on the remote settlements at Sarnia and Bear Creek. In the month of July, a party, supposed to consist of about fifty brigands, crossed over from a place called Palmer, in the United States, to the British settlements on the St. Clair River, where they robbed and imprisoned several of the settlers, and then returned. About the same time a loyal subject of the name of Carey, who was also an officer of militia, was shot in the night by a set of murderers, who, it was well known, were from the opposite shore, although they were never clearly identified.

But the most fearful and appalling proof of the existence of a conspiracy among a band of desperate assassins living in the neighbouring states, against the lives and property of particular individuals among Her Majesty's subjects, was given, in the attempt to destroy the dwelling house of the late Sheriff Hamilton, at Queenston, and the treacherous and cowardly assassination, in the dead of the night, of the gallant Captain Ussher,—Both these outrages occurred within a few days of each other, in the month of November last, and were committed by American citizens, living in the neighbourhood of Buffalo—where they are well known, and where it is affirmed, (your Committee believe with perfect truth,) that the murderers of Captain Ussher have openly boasted of their having perpetrated the bloody deed, and that it was committed in retaliation of that lamented gentleman's having been untruly reported to have assisted in the destruction of the Caroline.

In corroboration of the too melancholy evidence which these events afford, that the loyal subjects and servants of her Majesty are living in the neighbourhood of enemies whose actions are neither controlled nor directed by the common feelings of humanity or religion, and who are as ready to engage in secret assassination as in open war and invasion, and who give encouragement to both, without fear or apprehension that the laws of their own country will reach or punish them, or that their magistrates and public officers have either the power or inclination to interfere with or restrain them; your Committee feel it right to notice two instances which they believe cannot fail to strike every humane mind with the deepest feelings of surprise and concern:

A newspaper was some time since established in the city of Buffalo, in the state of New York, which has constantly advocated the invasion of these provinces by foreign brigands, and urged upon the inhabitants of the union to sustain and support them. In one of the numbers of that paper, published a few weeks since, alluding to his Excellency the Lieutenant Governor, and the officers of her Majesty's government, whose painful duty it was to aid in enforcing the laws of the province against domestic traitors and foreign invaders, the following paragraph appeared:—

"It is our deliberate conviction that it is every good man's duty to do all in his power to sweep this murderous tyranny from the western world. To accomplish it, almost any measures are justifiable."

"We have no patience with those bloody wretches, and much as we abhor assassination, we would almost justify it in freeing the world from such monsters."

"Where are those Canadians who swore to avenge the death of every patriot prisoner? Macnab, and Drew, and Arthur, and Prince, and Hagerman, and Robinson, are still alive."

At a later period, placards were posted up throughout the city of Detroit, offering a reward of eight hundred dollars for the dead body of the gallant and greatly calumniated Colonel Prince, and one thousand dollars if brought to the city alive; and, not long afterwards, a person who was strongly suspected of having come over to Sandwich, near which place Colonel Prince resides, for the purpose of murdering him, after being arrested on suspicion, was bailed by the Collector of Customs at the port of Detroit.

These publications and direct incitements to the commission of the most horrible of crimes passed unnoticed by the magistracy of the great communities in which they were promulgated, and the parties who avowed their authorship do not appear to have been considered guilty of any offence.

Your Committee would feel no small degree of gratification, could they here conclude their observations on the outrages to which their enduring and deeply injured fellow-subjects have been exposed, from the faithless and barbarous conduct of the citizens and people of the United States. They would rejoice to have it in their power to ascribe the unprovoked attacks, which they have narrated in the preceding pages of their Report, to the reckless and wanton conduct of a few unprincipled men, who, guided by their own bad passions, had assailed the peace of the province without encouragement or countenance from that portion of the population of the republic who claim to be respectable and enemies of crime.

Well assured that your honourable House would promptly discountenance and disallow the promulgation of any expression that would unjustly assail the integrity of a neighbouring nation and people, who have, until the last few months, been regarded as friends as well as allies, your Committee will cautiously abstain from advancing a sentiment that can be regarded as unjust towards the American people. But while they admit that that portion of them who reside at a remote distance from the boundary which divides Canada from the United States, have taken no open part in, but on the contrary may have condemned the crimes committed by their fellow citizens, to which reference has been made in this Report, your Committee are nevertheless bound in truth and justice to declare, that the brigands and pirates who invaded this province, murdered our fellow subjects, and destroyed their property, at Prescott, Windsor and elsewhere, were encouraged, aided and supported, by all classes of citizens of the republic residing in the contiguous states. The evidence of this fact is too strikingly obvious and conclusive to admit of any doubt.

Your Committee feel it unnecessary to dwell at any length on the occurrences which immediately preceded the invasions that were so signally and gallantly defeated at the two places just mentioned; but it is necessary to advert to them, as well to preserve the narrative entire, as to place before the people of England and of all other countries, a connected detail of the injuries to which we have been subject, and for which we are entitled to redress.

Rumours had for some time been circulated through the province, that a secret and extensive combination was forming in the frontier States of the union, with a view to the invasion of both the provinces of Canada, by a force so numerous, well armed, and organized, as to ensure the overthrow of the government, the conquest of the country, and its separation from the British Crown. These reports were for a time disregarded; but towards the close of the month of October, evidence was laid before the Lieutenant-Governor, and information was simultaneously transmitted to her Majesty's Minister at Washington, of a nature that left no doubt on the mind of any reasonable man, that our lives and liberties were threatened with much greater danger than had hitherto assailed them.

It was clearly ascertained that a secret combination or conspiracy, of vast extent, including many of the most wealthy citizens of the republic, as well as officers of the general and state governments, and possessed of great resources in money and military stores, was then in active progress, and had been for some months on foot within the jurisdiction of the United States, for the purpose of waging war upon both provinces of Canada. This combination extended from Maine to Michigan,—and was carried on by means of local associations resembling Masonic lodges, formed in every town and village along the frontier. The lowest estimate of the numbers of the confederates was forty thousand; and the depositions of some of the informants, who had been admitted into the secret of the conspirators, carried the number very much higher. A pretended national bank was organized, to be established and maintained by the seizure of public and private property in the provinces—and the chief officers who were to compose the "New Republic" were chosen and determined upon, all of them being citizens of the United States.

The superior lodges of the conspirators were established at Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, and Cincinnati—arms and warlike stores were purchased to a very large amount, and secreted in different places; and the services of at least nine steam boats on Lake Erie, as well as of several on Lake Ontario, were secured by the leaders of this felonious association.

With a promptness and resolution for which the loyal people of this province will ever feel grateful, His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor lost not a moment in assuming the responsibility of calling upon and embodying a militia force, sufficient to repel any invasion, no matter in what numbers, that might be attempted by the enemy. And to this noble and patriotic conduct, promptly sanctioned as it was by the Commander of the Forces, the loyal people of this province at least, and probably those of Lower Canada also, are, under Providence, indebted for their preservation from scenes of bloodshed and misery which humanity shudders to contemplate.

Communications were, at the same time, transmitted to Mr. Fox, Her Majesty's Minister at Washington, informing him of the dangers with which the provinces were threatened.— This distinguished gentleman instantly called upon the American government to vindicate its national honour, and effectually to interpose the authority of its laws to put down the atrocious combination, and punish the guilty conspirators, whose names and places of residence they were fully apprised of. Your Committee are merely giving expression to the feeling universally entertained by her Majesty's subjects, that Mr. Fox has placed these provinces under the deepest obligations for the vigour, straight-forward manliness, and statesman-like ability, with which, on the occasion referred to, as well as in many preceding instances, he has vindicated their claims to the interference of the United States government, to protect them from outrage on the part of its citizens. That his admonitions have been disregarded, and that his exertions have proved unsuccessful, in no respect diminishes his claim to our gratitude and thanks.

The timely discovery of the designs of the conspirators, and the preparations made in consequence for their reception, no doubt greatly disconcerted their schemes; and it was at one time believed that they would altogether abandon them. The reverse, however, proved to be the fact. Acting in concert with that portion of the Lower Canadians, who were resolved on making another effort at revolution, an armed force entered Lower Canada early in November, composed of American citizens and a few Canadian refugees. In every instance in which they came in conflict with the loyalists and British soldiers, they were defeated and dispersed; and the feeble insurrection which occurred about the same time at Beauharnois and a few other places, was promptly suppressed by the vigorous measures adopted by His Excellency Sir John Colborne.

Unsubdued, and apparently still confident in their strength and resources, the conspirators determined on an attack upon this province, and having obtained the assistance of the largest American steamboat on lake Ontario, called the "United States," and two large schooners, they embarked at Oswego, and other ports and places along the American frontier, to the number, as it is asserted, of about six hundred, well provided with artillery, muskets, ammunition and provisions, all which must have been obtained at great expense, and which were put on board the different vessels publicly, and in open day, without interruption by any magistrate or other public officer.

With this force, headed by an American citizen of the name of Birge, and the same bandit who had led the pirates that destroyed the Sir Robert Peel, a descent was made on the Canadian shores near Prescott, on the 12th of November. It appears that from some cause not clearly explained, not more than half the number of invaders who had been collected for this expedition landed at Prescott, the rest crossed over to Ogdensburgh, a considerable town immediately opposite; and before any second attempt was made by them to reach our shores, a force arrived from Kingston, commanded by Col. Dundas, of the 83rd regiment, and a detachment of American troops under Col. Worth, from Sackett's Harbour, came down, which, with the small naval force under Capt. Sandom, prevented their joining their ill-fated associates. These latter, finding no hope of escape, resisted the gallant militia, soldiers, sailors and marines, who had hurried to attack them; and, having gained an advantageous post, killed and wounded a considerable number of them. At last, however, the piratical invaders surrendered at discretion, and such as remained alive, nearly two hundred in number, were brought to Kingston, and lodged in the fort there.

There is no doubt that this descent upon Prescott was intended to be in concert, not only with the movements of the conspirators and Brigands in Lower Canada, but also with those which had been planned in the West. In this there was some disappointment; but regardless of the lessons which had been so continuously and in every instance taught these desperate and unprincipled men, the invasion of the Western District was resolved upon by them, and an armed body amounting to about four hundred embarked in a steam-boat called the Champlain, in which they crossed to the village of Windsor, where they established themselves for a few hours, but upon being attacked by a small portion of the gallant militia and volunteers stationed at Sandwich, they were defeated and dispersed, leaving many killed, besides numbers who were afterwards taken prisoners. There is reason to suppose that a much larger force was prepared to cross from Detroit, and would have come over but for the intervention of General Brady, the officer in command of the United States troops at that place.

In closing their observations on the different invasions of this province, and the outrages committed upon its inhabitants, since the commencement of the last year, your Committee feel it due to the honour and character of their fellow-subjects in this province, to record the fact, that in no instance that can be traced, did a single resident of Upper Canada, of any class or origin, unite himself with the assailants after they had landed in the province, and that of those who crossed from the United States, the great majority was composed of citizens of that republic—very few indeed, even of the refugees being associated with them; and if there be any hope of these guilty men being brought to a sense of the crimes which have led them to their own misery, and the great injury they have been instrumental in bringing upon their country, it must be a source of some consolation to them to know, that by resisting the solicitations which no doubt were pressed upon them to join in this wicked and savage warfare, they escaped the horror of witnessing barbarities of the most disgusting and heart-rending description. Not only were the brave defenders of the province shot down and deliberately murdered by their fiendish assailants, but their dead bodies were mangled and mutilated, and hung up as objects of scorn and derision to these inhuman monsters. The body of an intrepid and promising young officer (Lieutenant Johnson) of the 83rd regiment, was thus treated at Prescott, and the lifeless remains of Doctor Hume were exposed to similar indignities in the west, where also a noble-minded negro, who probably had escaped from a land of slavery, to one where he hoped long to enjoy British freedom, was cut down and slaughtered, because he refused to join the band of murderers who called upon him to assist in the destruction of his benefactors.

And these deeds of wickedness and deepest crime were perpetrated by men, claiming to be citizens of the most enlightened nation in the world, and who professed to enter the province for the purpose of conferring freedom and equal laws, general happiness and prosperity upon its inhabitants!

Your Committee have, in the course of the foregoing remarks, alluded to the participation, on the part of the citizens of the United States generally, in the conspiracy which resulted in the hostile expeditions against these provinces, and the inefficiency of the measures taken by the American general and state governments to prevent them:—But they feel it necessary to point out, in a more particular manner, the evidence on which these statements rest, and to direct attention to the small reliance that is to be placed in any efforts of the public authorities of the United States to protect us from future attacks, and thus prove the necessity for calling upon her Majesty to continue to her faithful and loyal subjects, that protection to which they feel themselves to have so just a claim, and which her Majesty has hitherto so generously extended to them.

Your Committee are aware, that at one period great pains were taken by the press, and particular parties in the States, to convince the world that the barbarous outrages, and criminal and disgraceful combinations which they have detailed, were confined to the lowest classes of the population—to the illiterate and notoriously profligate portions of the community.

In the absence of more direct proof of the little credit that should be attached to these statements, it would be difficult to persuade any reasonable person of their truth, when the vast extent and systematic organization of the bands which assailed the province, from time to time, are adverted to. It is not credible that, from 500 to 1000 men, composed of mere rabble, and destitute of any visible means of their own for their maintenance, could for nearly a month be clothed, fed, armed and kept together, on a desert spot of ground, such as Navy Island, upon which there was no shelter from the inclemency of a Canadian winter, unless they received support and encouragement from the opulent; and it is equally unreasonable to suppose, that such an assemblage could be collected for the avowed purpose of overturning, by force of arms, the government of a neighbouring country, with which their own nation was at peace, without the persuasion of men capable of exercising a powerful influence over public opinion. The worst of men are never found congregated in such numbers, and for such a purpose, unless brought together by an influence exercised by men of wealth and intelligence. But it is not upon reasoning of this kind, that the fact of countenance and support having been given by the American people, to the brigands, solely rests. It is now an admitted and notorious truth, that in every one of the numerous instances of invasion of these provinces, by the brigands, the arms of the United States were used by them, and found in their possession; while the steamboats and schooners belonging to their most wealthy merchants were publicly employed in conveying hundreds of men, and quantities of military stores and provisions, from their chief cities and towns along the frontier, to the places of attack. It is equally certain, that during the last summer and autumn, the preparations which were making to invade the provinces, and murder its loyal inhabitants, were known and encouraged by officers of the general and state governments, by justices of the peace, and by citizens of all classes and denominations. Public meetings were called in many places, and attended by persons of the description mentioned, who harangued the populace, calling upon them to aid in overthrowing British authority in the colonies, and subscribing money to accomplish that object. Not long before the attack on Prescott, a meeting of this description occurred in the city of New York, at which two of the principal officers of the customs—persons who held their appointments from the President and government of the United States—took an open and active part—one of them acting as Vice President, the other as Secretary, of the meeting—yet no notice appears to have been taken, by their superiors, of conduct, which, in England at least, would have led to their immediate dismissal and punishment.

After the termination of the affair at Prescott, so disastrous to the hopes of those who planned it, a public meeting was called at Oswego, (from whence a large portion of the brigands took their departure, publicly embarking, as has been already stated, in the largest steamboat belonging to the Americans on Lake Ontario,) for the avowed purpose of recommending the public to abstain from further participation in Canadian warfare.—At that meeting, a Mr. David Brewster, FIRST JUDGE of the county court, a court of extensive local jurisdiction, openly declared, that he had been engaged in "the patriot cause," but that he had become convinced of his error, and therefore had determined to abandon it, and advised his "fellow-patriots" to do the same—one of these was stated to be a Mr. Seth Hawley, post-master, and member of assembly elect; who, however, did not think proper to avow his recantation, although he had declared his intention to do so, and he still, it is to be supposed, remains "a patriot."

About the same period, a paper was promulgated in the county of Jefferson, in the state of New York, containing an earnest and well written appeal to the "patriots of the county," to desist from further hostile aggressions upon the Canadas, and pointing out the destruction and misery which had befallen those who had been concerned in the attack on Prescott, and other places. This paper, evidently written for a good purpose, and by persons well informed of the combinations which had been entered into, contains the following statements and admissions:—

"It was ascertained that a complete civil and military organization had been effected through the medium of certain secret societies, extending along the whole line of territory bordering on the British dominions; that an army had been created—troops enrolled—munitions of war provided, and money raised; and that a blow was about to be struck, for the subjugation of the British government there, (in Canada,) by citizens of the United States, with the expected aid of disaffected British subjects in these provinces. It was known that meetings of these societies were frequently held, and numerous attended, receiving constant accessions of strength. Labourers left their employ—apprentices their masters—mechanics abandoned their shops—merchants their counters—magistrates their official duties—husbands their families—children their parents—christians their churches—ministers of the gospel their charge, to attend these meetings."—"To which the public officer, the magistrate, the conservator of the peace, was only admitted by breaking the official oath he had previously taken to support the constitution and laws of his country."

To these avowals, might be added hundreds of others of similar import; but your Committee deem it unnecessary to notice them, and they will close this part of their report by giving the statement made by Jeremiah Winnegar, one of the prisoners taken at Prescott which was read upon his trial before the court martial at Kingston; and the evidence of a Mr. Brown, a judge of the court of common pleas in the state of New York, and a brother of the late General Brown, commander-in-chief of the United States army. The former was condemned to be executed, but was afterwards reprieved and pardoned by His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor, and is now at liberty in his own country. This old man's story is well known to be true, and although told with more ingenuousness and appearance of candour than marked the account given of themselves by the other prisoners, does not materially vary from most of theirs.

"Jeremiah Winnegar is a native of the state of New York, labourer, resided at Dexter, and became a 'hunter' in October last, was sworn in by Sterling.—His son was engaged to come with the expedition to Canada, prisoner volunteered to come in his stead, his son being lame; came to Millenn's Bay on Saturday the 10th November last, embarked the following day in one of the schooners lying in the bay, in Captain Kemble's company; the schooner ran aground on Monday morning, the 12th November, and prisoner was taken off by the Paul Pry and put on board the other schooner, and landed at Wind-Mill Point, below Prescott. On Tuesday morning, prisoner was called out of a house where he stayed for the night, and went into a field to fight, discharged his musket twice, and retreated to a house, where he remained until Friday evening the 16th November, 1838, when he was taken prisoner; did not expect to fight when he left home; came for the sole purpose of giving liberty to the people of Canada; thought when he was coming that he was doing God service, is of the——persuasion, has a wife and eleven children, heard ministers of the gospel encouraging the people to support the patriot hunters—is in his 59th year."

To this account of himself, he added the following in his address to the court at the time of his trial:—

"I have nothing more to say than is contained in my statement—I can establish by witnesses who have known me upwards of thirty years, what my general character is, but have nothing to prove connected with this affair—I presume many of the court have families—I have a family as near and dear to me as them—I have left a wife—seven sons and four daughters—I have brought them up by honest industry, and have been blessed with health to maintain them—Though a poor man, I have the same feelings as others, and my family are dear to me, and, though old, I am their main support—I have only now to throw myself on the mercy of the court."

George Brown, of Brownville, Jefferson county, judge of the court of common pleas—on the trial of George H. Kimball, and others, before the court martial at Kingston, on the 28th December, 1838, was called as a witness by George H. Kimball, and stated as follows:—

"There is a brother of the prisoner "(Geo. H. Kimball)" about thirty years old, formerly a colonel of militia. He returned home after the affair at Prescott, I called to inquire of him the fate of a son of mine who was there. It is generally understood among us that he was a captain—John B. Kimball told me that General Shoultz had appointed him to act as Lieutenant Colonel, but that he came away during the action. One Fields, also an officer, came away the day before. John B. Kimball stated, that they were rather deranged for want of officers, and that he had acted as Adjutant on the morning of Tuesday, and paraded the men."

On cross examination he said he thought George H. Kimball was "brought into the expedition by a great many of our citizens associating in secret societies to aid in the Canada cause. Great inducements were held out to young men to join. I believe numbers have been thus deceived and deluded. The secrecy of these societies prevented any person from taking measures to counteract what they were doing. I would further add, that being bound by oath, as I understood, to keep every thing secret, no communications could be made of what was going on. It is reported among us, that a bank was formed, and the funds were provided as bank stock, in order to evade our laws. It is the general opinion, it was done by contributions of people in our country."

John B. Kimball, who made these disclosures to Judge Brown, of his participation in the affair at Prescott, has never been prosecuted.

With respect to the measures adopted by the government of the United States, in reference to the hostilities which have been waged against her Majesty's subjects, by the citizens of that country, almost without intermission, since the month of December, 1837, it is obvious that the discussion of them does not properly belong to your Committee; but they nevertheless think it right to advert to facts, which it is of importance that their fellow subjects should be made acquainted with, and which may not, by any other means, be so conveniently placed before them as in the report of your Committee.

It is not to be disguised, that whatever confidence the loyal people of these provinces may have entertained in the good faith of the American government and public authorities, at the commencement of the warfare which has been carried on against these provinces, by the people of the United States, that confidence has been very nearly, if not entirely, destroyed.

Notwithstanding the repeated invasions that have taken place—the murders that have been committed—the acts of piracy and arson that have been perpetrated, by thousands of persons who are well known, and who are now living unmolested in the adjoining States, openly boasting of their infractions of the laws of the Union as well as of this country, not one of them has been subjected, so far as your Committee are aware, to any legal punishment. Neither does it seem in any degree probable that any of them will be molested. In like manner, the conspiracy so extensively organized, during the last summer and autumn, for the overthrow of the government of the country, although undoubtedly known to hundreds of persons holding official situations, was not only not suppressed, but received direct encouragement and support from those whose duty it was to break it up, and to expose and punish all engaged in it.

The military force placed on the American frontier, to prevent the invaders from entering into the provinces, was wholly inadequate and incompetent to the performance of that duty, and does not appear to have been even of sufficient strength to guard the arsenals containing the arms of the government, which were in many instances seized and carried off by the brigands, to be used against the people of this country.

True it is, that Mr. Charles Buller, the Chief Secretary of the Earl of Durham, who left this country some time in the month of November last, has informed the British nation, from his place in the House of Commons:—That the government of the United States has done all that a government could do to prevent the assaults made upon us:—That they passed a law of neutrality, and had kept that law more strictly than we had done:—That they had prosecuted and convicted several gentlemen who had infringed that law:—That they had doubled their army to keep this law:—That the opinion of the people, from one end of the country to the other, was decidedly with us:—And that the Americans dared not hold a sympathizer's meeting in any town in the United States. Your Committee has no right or disposition to question the liberty of speech of any member of the Imperial Parliament; but on behalf of their loyal fellow subjects, they protest against that privilege being used to mislead the British nation on points of the utmost possible importance to their peace and future security.

Mr. Buller's predilections in favour of republican institutions may be very strong, and he may feel a desire to vindicate the conduct of a government which is based on universal suffrage, vote by ballot, and similar popular theories, which, in his opinion, are the best in the world, and are, therefore, the objects of his admiration; but, in advocating these anti-British and anti-monarchical principles, he should be cautious when assuming to make a statement of facts, to be strictly accurate. No doubt Mr. Buller intended to be so, when he made the statements above referred to; and although he resided in this country from June to November, holding daily and hourly intercourse with the most intelligent of the American people, having the most ample opportunity of informing himself correctly, and although on his return to England in the latter month, he passed through a considerable portion of the United States, where he might have corrected any error which he had inadvertently fallen into, yet it is to be supposed that he was so much engaged in the important duties imposed on him as Chief Secretary to the Lord High Commissioner, the Earl of Durham, that he had not time to investigate so closely as otherwise he might have done, the conduct of the government of the republic; and knowing what that government ought to have done, he has too hastily assumed that it had performed its duty. A more careful enquiry, which it must be admitted it is rather singular he omitted to make, would have proved to him that the "law of neutrality" to which he refers had not been kept, but had been wholly disregarded:—that no "gentleman" or any other man had been prosecuted and convicted for infringing that law:—that the American army had not been doubled to keep that law—that, in fact, no addition whatever had been made to it for any such purpose, or any other purpose:—that the opinion of the people of the United States, from one end of the country to the other, was not with us, but decidedly the reverse—and that it was wholly incorrect to say, that the Americans dared not hold a sympathizer's meeting in any town in the United States. These meetings being of constant occurrence throughout the principal towns of the adjacent country, and through several of which Mr. Buller passed, although, probably, not at the moment they were assembled.

Lest it should be imagined that this contradiction of the accuracy of Mr. Buller's statements requires confirmation from more disinterested parties, your Committee will give an extract from the leading journal of the state of New York, remarking on the speech of the learned gentleman, when the report of it first appeared on this side the Atlantic:—

"The Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel animadverted severely on the conduct of this government, in relation to the inroads into Canada, but the President was defended by the MINISTERS, LORD BROUGHAM, and Mr. C. BULLER, an attachè to the DURHAM mission. The latter gentleman, indeed, stated circumstances in favour of our policy, with which ourselves are unacquainted, such as, that this government had doubled the army to prevent the assaults on Canada, and one or two facts unheard of before."—MORNING COURIER AND NEW-YORK ENQUIRER, Saturday, 23rd March, 1839.

Similar remarks might be quoted from many other journals of the union. but upon a fact so obvious and undeniable, it cannot be necessary to cite them.

But your Committee are disposed to regard with far greater alarm and apprehension, certain principles advanced by the government of the United States, in respect to our right to pursue the brigands who may invade the provinces, and attack them within the limits of those states.

The ground assumed by the American minister in London, in relation to the destruction of the Caroline steamboat, if admitted, would at once place these provinces in a situation that would wholly disable them from effectually protecting themselves from foreign aggression,—Mr. Stevenson assumes that the invasion of Upper Canada, by the armed force, under the command of one of his fellow citizens, Van Rensselaer,—at Navy Island, was a case of CIVIL WAR, existing at the time within the province; that civil wars are not distinguishable from other wars, as to belligerent and neutral rights—and therefore, not being able to deny the fact, but admitting it as he does, to be true, that the steamboat in question was engaged in the service of the invaders, and had communicated with them from the United States shore three times in the course of one day; he nevertheless asserts, that we were not justified in following her to her place of shelter at Schlosser, and destroying her there: As a consequence of such mode of arguing,—if Mr. Stevenson be right, it must follow that the government of the United States is of opinion, that if all the steamboats lying at Buffalo, some fifty in number, had been engaged in bringing men, munitions of war, and other aid from that place to the armed body of invaders on Navy Island, there was nothing illegal in such acts, and that our troops would not have been justified in pursuing them into the States, and destroying them wherever they could find them. Your Committee have no apprehensions that any such doctrine will be admitted by Her Majesty's government, if the occasion should occur requiring its discussion; and if precedent were necessary to controvert it, there is no country whose history affords more striking examples in point, than that of the United States, many of which, if it would serve any useful purpose, might be noticed in this place—one only, however, will suffice.

In May, 1818, Pensacola and the fort of Barancas, in West Florida, belonging to the Spaniards, were taken forcible possession of by the American troops, in a time of peace between the two countries—the former "with only the show of resistance," the latter, by capitulation; the garrisons of both being conveyed to the Havana, at the expense of the American government.

The occupation of these Spanish possessions was justified by the government of the United States, on this occasion, upon the ground, that as almost the whole of the tribe of Seminoles inhabited the country within the limits of Florida, Spain was bound by the treaty of 1795, to restrain them from committing hostilities against the United States; "that as she was unable to fulfil this obligation—her inability to maintain her authority over the territory and Indians within her limits, ought not to expose the United States to other and greater injuries," and that, where the authority of Spain ceased to exist, the United States had a right to pursue their enemy, on a principle of self-defence.

"The right of self-defence," says the President, (in one of his messages to Congress, upon the subject of the Seminole war) "never ceases. It is amongst the most sacred, and alike necessary to nations and to individuals. And, whether the attack be made by Spain herself, or by those who abuse her power, the obligation is not the less strong."

“In pursuing the savages to an imaginary line in the woods, it would have been the height of folly to have suffered that line to protect them. Had that been done, the war could never have ceased. Even if the territory had been exclusively that of Spain, and her power complete over it, we had a right by the law of nations, to follow the enemy on it, and to subdue him there.”

The Spanish minister at Washington protested most strongly against these alleged violations of the territory of the King of Spain. He denied that any encouragement or protection had been given by the Spanish authorities to the Seminole Indians, between whom and the United States, they did not even know that a war had commenced, and he called upon the government forthwith, to restore to Spain the places which had been forcibly wrested from her, and the property which had been found in them;—to make indemnity for the injuries and losses which had been occasioned by the invasion; and to punish the general and the officers by whom the outrages had been committed.

The American government, in reply, reiterated the grounds upon which it justified the occupation of the forts. The Spanish minister was however informed, that Pensacola would be restored to any person, duly authorised on the part of Spain, to receive possession of it; and that St. Marks would be surrendered to any Spanish force sufficiently strong to hold it against an attack from the Indians: but the American government declined to inflict punishment, or to pass a censure upon General Jackson, whose conduct was “founded on the purest patriotism, and whose vindication was written in every page of the law of nations, as well as in the first law of nature, self-defence.”—On the contrary, it considered it had a right to claim from Spain, (and which the American minister at Madrid was instructed to demand,) “the punishment of the Spanish Governors who had aided and assisted the Indians in the hostilities against the United States, whom it was their duty to have restrained.”

But referring to the facts of the case stated by Mr. Stevenson, it is not true that a civil war existed in Upper Canada, at the time of the destruction of the Caroline:—there was not a man in arms in the province then, nor has there been one since for any other purpose, than to repel invasion from the United States.

The armed force at Navy Island was not an insurrectionary force, but one that had invaded the province from the state of New York—which invasion was an act of open hostility, committed by American citizens, armed and organised in the United States, and marched, in the presence of magistrates and public officers of the union, without resistance or interruption, into Upper Canada, for the avowed purpose of making war upon Her Majesty; and the steamboat Caroline was openly and notoriously engaged in the service of, and aiding and assisting this invading force—As in the case of the Spanish government in Florida, the government of the United States either wanted the power or the inclination, it matters not which, to restrain their citizens from making war upon the Queen of England, and attempting the destruction of her subjects, and the overthrow of her government; and the subjects and military force of Her Majesty had an undoubted right, not only to follow the steamboat Caroline into the territory of the United States, and destroy her there, but to enter into that country and destroy the preparations there making for their destruction, if it were seen that the American government either could not or would not do so themselves—That this right has not been acted upon by the people of Upper Canada before now, proves their sincere and anxious desire to preserve peace; but it would be folly to disguise the fact, that the repetition of aggressions, such as they have already experienced, may exhaust that disposition to patient forbearance, which has hitherto controlled them.

It would probably be considered that your Committee had not fully discharged their duty, while remarking on the case of the Caroline, if they permitted the opportunity to escape of contradicting on authority which they knew to exist, and of the most conclusive kind, the statements made by Mr. Stevenson of the cause and manner of her destruction, and the wholly unfounded allegations, that a number of persons were on board of her when she was set on fire and precipitated over the Falls of Niagara. Mr. Setvenson says, that the account given of the destruction of this boat by Mr. Fox and the British authorities in this province is, in every essential particular, discredited and disproved by the most unimpeachable evidence; that the evidence transmitted by him to Lord Palmerston, strips the proceeding of every pretext alleged in its justification, and marks it as an act of the most offensive and unwarrantable character. Apart from the admissions which are to be found in Mr. Stevenson’s own communication, and which have been already adverted to as sufficiently contradicting his assertions, your Committee have it in their power to affirm, that it is established by evidence incapable of successful contradiction from any quarter, that the piratical steamboat in question was engaged for what was called the patriot service, several days before she came to the island. A detachment of the brigands was sent from the island to Buffalo, to assist in extricating her from the ice, and fitting her out, and bringing her to the island. She took muskets and other military stores on board, at Buffalo, for the use of the invaders. On her arrival at the island, her captain surrendered the entire direction of her to the chief brigand, who gave orders for her safety, fearing she might fall into the hands of the British. She was openly and publicly employed during the day in bringing over cannon and men from Schlosser to Navy Island.—When she was attacked, the crew on board were armed and prepared for resistance, anticipating an attack: they did resist, and seriously wounded several of the assailants. There was a body of men on shore, armed for her defence in the event of an attack, but they did not venture to go on board the vessel—and lastly, it is utterly untrue that any one was on board at the time she was precipitated over the falls.

Your Committee feel that this statement of the truth of the case is not necessary to vindicate the legality of the destruction of the boat, but simply to remove the imputation that unnecessary severity was exercised towards the persons on board of her, or that in any possible case her destruction was not fully justified.

It has been with feelings of the deepest concern, and, at times, of indignation, that the loyal people of the Canadas have observed the apathy of the government of the United States—notwithstanding the repeated appeals that have been made to them—in restraining and punishing the brigands who are within its reach. It is a fact not only undeniable, but almost universally admitted, that the conduct of the United States is, and from the beginning has been, such as to show that they regarded with satisfaction rather than disapprobation, the attempts made to sever these colonies from the British crown; and although your Committee do not feel authorised to advance their individual opinions as those of your honourable House, when they state their conviction, that there is a very strong desire among the American people and government, to expel monarchical institutions from this continent, yet they believe that the indications of this desire are so obvious, that our Gracious Sovereign and the British nation should be constantly and plainly apprised of them, by those who have the best opportunities of watching them, and stating them with confidence.

Your Committee believe that the feeling to which they have adverted has mainly induced the recent extraordinary movements in Maine, and the sudden and unexpected assertion of the general government, that the exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory on our eastern border does not belong to Great Britain, but that the state of Maine was fully justified in taking possession of it by force of arms. If reference were made to the mere inconvenience that would result from the impunity with which crimes of the most atrocious character might be committed in a country over which no ascertained legal jurisdiction extends, it would be enough to decide the necessity of leaving the territory in dispute under the control of laws by which it had always been governed; but the people and government of the United States are insensible to this or any other consideration that comes in conflict with their designs on the possessions of the British crown. They well knew, and cannot deny, that the territory in dispute has always been under the jurisdiction of Great Britain; and they are equally sensible that the settlement of the true line dividing the two countries has never been retarded or evaded by the English government, but that the fault, if there be any, is wholly on their side. Notwithstanding which, at a moment when it is believed dissensions exist in the colonies, warlike possession is taken of a part of the country that has always been claimed by, and which has ever been in the possession of, Great Britain, and which, if ceded, will completely cut off the land communication of the British North American colonies with each other; and the moment this most unjustifiable aggression is committed, Congress, in compliance with a recommendation from the President, passes a law authorising him to employ the army and navy and militia of the republic, to resist any attempts on the part of Great Britain to enforce by arms her claims to exclusive jurisdiction over what?—over that part of “THE STATE OF MAINE”! which is in dispute between the United States and Great Britain. This enactment would settle the whole matter, if submitted to, since it assumes that the territory in dispute is part of “THE STATE OF MAINE,” leaving further argument or proof, on the part of Great Britain, wholly out of the question.

Your Committee would exceed their province, if they ventured an opinion, however remote, of the course which Her Majesty may take, in reference to this unexpected interference with her undoubted sovereignty; but they may venture to express, on behalf of their brave and generous fellow subjects of New Brunswick, their firm conviction, that not the smallest portion of their rights will be sacrificed to the cupidity of an encroaching and presumptuous opponent. And on behalf of themselves, and of the loyal inhabitants of Lower Canada, they can only say, that the surrender of the territory claimed by the United States, could not fail imminently to endanger the connection of these colonies with the parent state; and most earnestly do they hope that a concession so unfounded and ruinous will never be made.—Neither can it be forgotten by colonists, nor will it be overlooked by the British government, that no compromise can take place which will have the effect of transferring any portion of Her Majesty's subjects to a foreign power. The people of New Brunswick may be released from their allegiance, and cast off from the mother country; but they cannot be transferred, and rendered subject to another power without their own consent. The true line, and that only must determine to what nation they belong.

Your Committee having thus adverted to the events of most prominent importance that have occurred during the last year, feel called upon to impress upon your honourable House the necessity—a painful one it certainly is—of assuring our gracious Queen, that while her loyal subjects in these provinces acknowledge with the deepest gratitude the efficient protection extended to them, by the large military force that has been stationed in the country, they are bound to reiterate the opinion expressed in the Report of your honourable House, of the last session, that the continuance of this protection is essential to their future peace and safety—not, however, from the slightest apprehension of internal revolt—but “because the government of the United States either wants the inclination or the ability to compel its citizens to “yield obedience to the laws of nature and of nations;” and because we believe these citizens are still ferociously bent on repeating the aggressions from which we have already so severely suffered.

Your Committee further earnestly recommend that your honourable House should bring under the consideration of Her Majesty's government, the just and undoubted right of the owners of the Sir Robert Peel steamer, to prompt and complete indemnity for the felonious destruction of that vessel, in American waters, by American citizens. It has occasioned some surprise that this remuneration has not been made ere this; but the ruinous consequences which would result from longer delay, to several of our fellow subjects, imperatively require that your honourable House should press their claims with the utmost earnestness. The more recent burning of the Thames steamer, and of the property of individuals in different parts of the country, by the invading brigands from the United States, should, your Committee are of opinion, receive the early attention of your honourable House, in order that steps may be taken to obtain for the owners a full indemnity for their losses. Your Committee are well satisfied that the people of this province will not permit individuals to sustain ruinous losses which should be borne equally by all. They cannot regard the destruction of the property referred to, as among those casualties that establish no claim for indemnity from the public. They are the consequences of a national calamity, which the whole people are concerned in repairing; and your Committee are well satisfied that such is the opinion of every loyal subject of Her Majesty in the province.

It is not for your honourable House to point out the best means of defending these provinces from future invasion; but your Committee are of opinion, that Her Majesty would not receive unfavourably, the respectful representation, that there are many reasons against employing, for any length of time, the rural population of this new country in military duties. Taking them away from their agricultural pursuits, is productive of much and serious disadvantage to the province, and it would be wrong to overlook the injurious effects which may be produced, on the morals of young men, from habits too readily contracted in a service that cannot demand their constant employment.

If Her Majesty should direct the construction of forts and places of defence along the frontier, it is believed that very great saving would be ultimately effected, by rendering unnecessary a portion, at least, of the militia force which is now embodied; and to the calling out of which, the people of the province are materially indebted for their present safety.

In concluding their remarks upon the struggle in which the Canadas have been engaged during the past year, your Committee will briefly advert to two points, the most gratifying to every loyal British subject. The first is, the noble and cheering declaration of our beloved Queen, that “Her Majesty is firmly determined to maintain the authority of Her Crown in this part of Her Dominions,” and the second, that Her Majesty's subjects of British and Irish descent are not only entitled to, but are eminently deserving of the royal pledge thus given to them.

His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor truly observed, in his speech at the opening of the present Session of the Provincial Legislature,—“That the main foundation of the hopes of the discontented persons in this province and their foreign supporters has been a mischievous notion, industriously propagated, that England would desert her trans-Atlantic possessions in their hour of difficulty and danger.”

These false and pernicious opinions are now dispelled, as your honourable House never doubted they would be, by a pledge the most emphatic and sacred. And while their enemies are thus disappointed in their hopes, her Majesty's loyal people are encouraged to persevere in that noble display of devoted loyalty, and unsubdued bravery, which has so eminently distinguished them on every occasion, and in every conflict, where their services have been required, to expel or annihilate their ruthless invaders. It is in the power of your honourable House to inform our gracious Sovereign, that, notwithstanding all the misrepresentation and falsehood that has gone forth with respect to the political feelings and principles of her subjects here; and notwithstanding the persuasions employed, and the allurements held out to seduce them from their allegiance, they have stood steadfast and firm in their faith and loyalty to their Queen; that not a man among them was found to unite with the invaders of their country; that they spurned with abhorrence the false and delusive offers made to them of greater freedom and happiness, by a foreign people who had basely and criminally dared to interfere with their institutions, and to pollute their soil with their presence; that the truth of these feelings and principles has been tested by the blood of many of their fellow subjects, who have sacrificed their lives in maintaining them; and whose example their lamenting survivors, animated by the same patriotic spirit, are and ever will be ready to follow.

When your Committee were appointed by your Honourable House, they had reason to suppose that the duties with which they were charged, would not extend beyond the subject referred to in the preceding pages of this report; but since that period a document has been promulgated by order of the House of Commons, purporting to be the report of Her Majesty's late High Commissioner, the Earl of Durham, addressed to Her Majesty, on the affairs of British North America, which contains matter so deeply affecting the social as well as political relations of all the provinces, especially of Upper Canada, that it would ill-become your Committee to pass it over in silence. Indeed they regret that at this late period of the session, it is impossible to give the statements and opinions advanced by His Lordship, the extensive investigation their importance demands; but your Committee will apply themselves with calmness, and they trust with dispassionate zeal, to vindicate the people of Upper Canada, their government and legislature, from charges that imply a want of patriotism and integrity, which they know to be unjust, which they did not expect, and which they grieve to find advanced by a Nobleman who had been sent to these provinces to heal, rather than foment dissensions, and who certainly should have carefully guarded against giving currency to unfounded, mischievous and illiberal rumours, for the truth of which he admits he is unable to vouch.

When it was first announced that the noble Lord had been selected by Her Majesty to represent the Royal authority in these colonies, in the two-fold authority of Governor-General and High Commissioner, with powers far greater, as it was asserted, than had ever been confided to any of His Lordship's predecessors, it cannot be denied that a very general feeling of disappointment and apprehension pervaded the royal population of the provinces. His Lordship's political principles were, of course, universally known, and it was feared that he might too readily adopt and act upon opinions that had unhappily been long in the ascendant, and which, from want of an earlier check, had brought upon the country all the misfortunes with which it had been afflicted. Neither were these apprehensions lessened, when it was ascertained who were to be his Lordship's ostensible advisers, and the chief officers of his suite.—Apart from objections of a merely personal character, (although these in an unsophisticated society, such as existed in Canada, were far from overlooked,) it was known that the gentleman named as Chief Secretary as well as some others, were identified with a small knot of politicians, who had undisguisedly advocated the views and opinions of Papineau, and Mackenzie, and whose desire to release these colonies from what they termed “the baneful domination of the mother country,” had been plainly avowed. Notwithstanding these reasonable apprehensions, however, the population, as if by common agreement, determined to receive his Lordship with the utmost cordiality and manifestation of confidence. They were aware that he had been for many years a Member of the Imperial Parliament; that he had for some time occupied a seat in the Cabinet, under Earl Grey; and that he had filled a diplomatic appointment of considerable importance; and they believed that it was quite impossible for him to have been engaged in these various employments, without acquiring a knowledge of public business, and being taught a prudent wariness of conduct, that would prevent his falling into any great or irretrievable error. But that which the loyalists chiefly relied upon, was the character which was ascribed to His Lordship of integrity, intelligence, and love of country. They did not fear the result of his mission, if he were possessed of these great and essential qualities. It was comparatively of little consequence whether he was tory, whig, or radical, in England, if, in Canada, he would exercise a sound, upright, patriotic, and independent judgment. It had never happened that a man, guided by these principles, and possessed of a dispassionate mind, had failed, after a short residence in the North American colonies, to detect the fallacy of the "conciliating" policy that had been so long pursued, or to determine which party sincerely desired to perpetuate the connexion with the mother-country; and which was aiming, under the specious pretext of securing liberal institutions, to sever the union and establish a democracy. Neither was an instance known of a high-minded Englishman, residing in America for any length of time, however strong his predilections might previously have been, who did not leave it with a feeling of disgust at the practical exhibition of republican institutions on this continent. Accordingly, upon his landing at Quebec, Lord Durham was received with the appearance of enthusiasm, and certainly with the most sincere desire to convince him, that no impediment would be thrown in the way of his government by those, who were truly desirous that peace and order should be again restored to the country, and who were heartily tired of the imbecility with which affairs had been conducted for the greater portion of the two preceding years.

The first Act of His Lordship's administration, was the issuing of a proclamation, setting forth the objects of his mission, and the policy he was determined to pursue in executing his high and important duties. He declared that "the honest and conscientious advocates of reform, and of the ameliorations of defective institutions, should receive from him, without distinction of party, races, or politics, the assistance and encouragement, which their patriotism had a right to command, from all who desired to strengthen and consolidate the connexion between the parent state and these important colonies; but the disturbers of the public peace, the violaters of the law, the enemies of the Crown, and of the British empire, would find in him, an uncompromising opponent, determined to put in force against them, all the powers, civil and military, with which he was invested."

This manifesto was received with general satisfaction, by the well-affected in both provinces, they desired no more than that the principles it avowed should be fully and faithfully acted up to; well persuaded that if this were done, the peace of the country would be quickly restored.

Your Committee are not disposed to doubt that Lord Durham sincerely desired and intended to fulfil, to the very letter, every pledge, direct or implied, contained in his proclamation: that his acts would be marked by discretion, and a respect for constitutional principles, and that he was firmly resolved to exert every faculty he possessed, in restoring tranquillity and security to the Canadas; unhappily, however, some baneful influence intervened, or some defect of judgment existed, to mar and frustrate these noble and generous resolutions. Your Committee disclaim the intention of uttering one single sentiment that can be construed into wilful or gratuitous disrespect to the Earl of Durham, or the desire of conveying the most distant imputation on his patriotism or integrity; but in the performance of a duty which admits of no forbearance that may exclude the truth, they are bound to declare, that from the date of this proclamation to the close of His Lordship's administration, almost all his public acts, were marked, either by a disregard of the restraints of law and of the constitution, or the entire absence of that knowledge essential to guide and keep a public man within the limits of the powers confided to him.

Distrust in his Lordship, was first excited by the suspension from office of all the members of the executive council, who had been commissioned by the Crown, and the appointment, as their successors, of gentlemen, who, with the exception of two, (the Commissary-General and the Secretary of the province of Lower Canada,) had accompanied him from England, and who, whatever might have been their general knowledge, were wholly unacquainted with the local concerns of the country, and utterly incompetent to suggest or frame any legislative measure that the peculiar condition of public affairs demanded. These removals were made in the most courteous manner, and your Committee are unable to say, that they did not take place in consequence of orders from England; but the effect was not only to excite uncomfortable feelings in the province, from the ungracious appearance of the act,—but to cast his Lordship upon a sea of difficulties, without a single competent pilot to warn him of the dangers that surrounded him, and it is not to be wondered at, that he was speedily involved in serious embarrassments.

He soon afterwards required the great seal of this province to be affixed to a commission, tested in his own name as Governor-General, appointing certain gentlemen, commissioners, to inquire into the land-granting department in Upper Canada; over-looking, or disregarding, the provisions in his appointment, by which he was precluded from acting in any province, in which he had not actually assumed the government, and been sworn into office. Although this Act was wholly unauthorised, it was nevertheless acquiesced in, that it might not be alleged that his Lordship had been thwarted in any manner, in carrying into effect whatever measures he deemed necessary to accomplish the object of his mission.

A further, and somewhat ludicrous exhibition, of his Lordship's assumed powers, was evinced in the proclamation issued by him, offering a reward of one thousand pounds for the apprehension and conviction of the pirates concerned in the destruction of the Sir Robert Peel steamboat. As the offence was committed in the United States, where alone the power of punishment existed, this proclamation was considered a somewhat singular, if not an unprecedented interference with the administration of justice in a foreign country. To the people of this province, a demand on the American government for reparation would have appeared a more reasonable and legitimate mode of proceeding, and would have afforded far greater satisfaction and more convincing proof, that his Lordship was determined to protect, to the utmost of his power, her Majesty's subjects from insult and injury.

A measure of a much more mischievous tendency soon after occurred, in his Lordship's interference, when in Lower Canada, with the course of justice in the disposal of the prisoners captured at the Short Hills, in the Upper province. This interference, and the cause of it, are detailed in the correspondence laid before your honourable House:—It is, however, unnecessary to refer to it here, for any other purpose than to shew that his Lordship did not regulate his official acts and correspondence by any legal rules, but according to such views as he might chance to entertain, apparently regardless of the embarrassments he might occasion to others in the performance of the most painful and difficult duties.

The remarkable ordinances that consigned to transportation to Bermuda, several of the Lower Canadian traitors, and which enacted that the penalty of death should be inflicted upon others who had been neither tried nor indicted, but who had fled or absented themselves from the province, if they again returned to it; and the disallowance of these ordinances by her Majesty, are subjects within the recollection of every one, and it would answer no useful purpose to discuss them here. But without examining the degree of validity which attaches to those ordinances, or the motives or necessity for their enactment, they undoubtedly, at the time they were promulgated, were regarded by every professional or well-informed person, as unprecedented and extraordinary, if not wholly unconstitutional and void.

The concluding act of his Lordship's government, his Proclamation of the 9th October, requires no comment from your Committee—it was regarded by all lovers of order with silent astonishment and disapprobation, and with what justice is best proved by the terms in which it was noticed by her Majesty, who directed the Colonial Minister to inform Lord Durham that her Majesty had been advised by her Ministers to regard it “not merely as a deviation from the course which had hitherto been invariably pursued by the governors of British possessions abroad, but as a dangerous departure from the practice and principles of the constitution. They considered as open to most serious objection, an appeal, by such an officer, to the public at large, from measures adopted by the Sovereign, with the advice and consent of Parliament.

“The terms in which that appeal had, in that instance, been made, appeared to her Majesty's Ministers calculated to impair the reverence due to the royal authority in the colony—to derogate from the character of the Imperial Legislature—to excite amongst the disaffected hopes of impunity, and to enhance the difficulties with which his Lordship's successor would have to contend.

“The Minister’s of the Crown having humbly submitted this opinion to the Queen, the Secretary of State proceeded to say, that it became his duty to inform his Lordship that he had received her Majesty’s commands to signify to his Lordship her Majesty’s disapprobation of his Lordship’s Proclamation of the 9th of October.

“And that, under these circumstances, her Majesty’s government were compelled to admit, that his Lordship’s continuance in the government of British North America could be attended with no beneficial results.”

Your Committee have noticed these prominent public acts of his Lordship, for no other reason than to draw attention to the proofs which exist of the singularity, if not unsoundness, of his judgement—and as affording room for those not personally acquainted with the facts on which his Lordship founds his conclusions in the Report which he has presented to her Majesty to doubt, or at all events to receive with caution, the statements he has set forth, with respect to the social and political condition of a province in which he never resided, and with which he had scarcely any personal acquaintance. His Lordship’s personal observation was confined to his passing up the River St. Lawrence, and crossing Lake Ontario, in a steamboat, occupied exclusively by his family and suite—a four days sojourn at the Falls of Niagara, and a twenty-four hours visit to the Lieutenant Governor at Toronto.

Your Committee are not called upon to examine or offer any opinion upon that part of his Lordship’s Report which relates to the affairs of Lower Canada. It is, however, evidently drawn up with much greater care, and they believe with far greater accuracy, than that portion of it which relates to this province.

They will, therefore, proceed at once to the examination of those opinions and observations of his Lordship’s, which most seriously affect this community. Lord Durham ascribes, and your Committee believe truly, all the dissensions and disturbances that have occurred in Lower Canada, to a contest between Races of different origin—British and French Canadians; and, forgetful of the mischievous tendency of his remarks, he intimates that the political dissensions of this province are to be traced to a jealousy or disagreement between three classes, and a contest among them for the emolument and patronage of office.

The first of these, his Lordship (borrowing, with questionable taste, a newspaper sobriquet.) designates as “the Family Compact,” and he informs her Majesty that “the bulk of the party consists for the most part of native born inhabitants of the colony, or of emigrants who settled in it before the last war with the United States.” The second is stated to be formed by a body of the same class of persons called Reformers, and the third class comprises, according to his Lordship’s opinion, emigrants from the United Kingdom who have settled in the province since the war above referred to.

It is alleged by Lord Durham that the first party mentioned by him, “for a long time receiving accession to its numbers, possessed almost all the highest public offices; by means of which, and its influence in the Executive Council, it wielded all the powers of government; it maintained influence in the legislature, by means of its predominance in the Legislative Council; and it disposed of the large number of petty posts, which are in the patronage of the government all over the province. Successive Governors, as they came in their turn, are said to have either submitted quietly to its influence, or after a short and unavailing struggle, to have yielded to this well-organized party, the real conduct of affairs. The bench, the magistracy, the high offices of the Episcopal Church, and a great part of the legal profession, are filled by the adherents of this party;—by grant or purchase they have acquired nearly the whole of the waste lands of the province; they are all powerful in the chartered banks, and, till lately, shared among themselves, almost exclusively, all offices of trust and profit. The bulk of this party consists for the most part, of native born inhabitants of the colony, or of emigrants who settled in it before the last war with the United States;” and His Lordship declares that never was the power of the party so extensive or so absolute as it now is.

The High Commissioner in thus describing a class of persons who are evidently held in slight estimation by his Lordship, has been unable to find, or at all events he does not state, any objection to its Members on the ground of want of ability or patriotism; he does not question their loyalty, and he admits that they are numerous and possess much property and great influence, but that in consequence of their having monopolized the power and patronage of the government, they have excited envy, created dissatisfaction, and have ultimately provoked attack; and it is plain, that entertaining the same sentiments with their opponents, his Lordship thinks it necessary that they should be put down, and that the authority and influence of the Crown should for that purpose, be thrown into the scale of the second class—whom his Lordship designates “Reformers,” among whom, however, he says, “it cannot be doubted that there were many who wished to assimilate the institutions of the province rather to those of the United States than to those of the mother country.”

There are two aspects in which these opinions of his Lordship may be regarded, equally unfavourable to his penetration as a statesman, and his character as a safe adviser of the Crown. It could not fail to strike a man of ordinary understanding that if the “Compact” were so numerous, and composed of the class of persons he describes, they must have acquired the influence they possess naturally and as a matter of course, and not by any dishonorable means: and it would be difficult to persuade any one, that the government of the country could be carried on without their support—and certainly there is something inexplicable in the opinion intimated by his Lordship, that they should be cast aside to make way for another party, “many of whom his Lordship says, wished to assimilate the institutions of the province rather to those of the United States, than to those of the mother country”! But your Committee have a higher duty to perform than criticising the language, or endeavouring to fathom the meaning of the Earl of Durham. They feel themselves equally bound to vindicate their fellow subjects of both classes. It is somewhat singular to find it represented that the reformers of this province complain of the existence or influence of “a family compact” composed of persons who are represented to be of the same origin with themselves; but whatever may be the opinion of others, your Committee believe, that the differences which have existed in the province, have proceeded from political disagreements that have unhappily grown up in this, as in every other community, and not from envy of each others prosperity; and although true it is, that the ranks of the reformers have been disgraced by men who have turned traitors to their country, yet the great body of that class of persons profess to lament the circumstance with as much intensity of feeling as any other; and your Committee believe that however much they may feel gratified at finding their political sentiments on the subject of the internal government of the country, approved and recommended by the Earl of Durham, they hold themselves to be under no obligation to his Lordship, for endeavouring to raise up domestic dissensions, which can have no other effect than obstructing, or delaying the restoration of that social harmony, which once happily existed, and which all benevolent men, of every party, anxiously and earnestly desire to see re-established in the province.

If Lord Durham had given himself the trouble to enquire into facts, and to consider them, he would have been convinced of the impropriety and injustice of designating, as he has done, the great body of the people of the country, as a “compact” united to tyrannize over and oppress their less numerous and less powerful fellow subjects.

When the constitution was conferred on the Canadas in 1791, and the first Governor, General Simcoe, assumed the administration of affairs, there were little more than 10,000 inhabitants in the Upper Province.

His Excellency was accompanied by personal friends who had served under him in the War of the Revolution. These, with few exceptions, were appointed to fill the various public offices in the colony. There are few of these most excellent and venerated men now remaining, and none of them who are not superannuated or incapable of further labour. Notwithstanding the natural and reasonable claims of their children and descendants to consideration, very few of them have been appointed to any situations of emolument, and none of them, that your Committee are aware of, have succeeded to their father’s vacant offices. The patronage of the Crown, even during the short period that has elapsed since the organization of the government, has been widely and indiscriminately extended among all classes, and all denominations of Her Majesty’s subjects, without the slightest regard to family or hereditary claims; and so far from a monopoly of office or power being retained by these persons, it was at one time a source of much dissatisfaction and complaint, that they had been ungenerously overlooked. But his Lordship, as if to meet this objection, that he probably apprehended might be raised to the part of his report to which these observations apply, has announced to Her Majesty and the British nation, that the third party to whom reference has been made, viz.:—the emigrants from the United Kingdom, who have settled in the province since the last American war, regard the entire of the original and native population, whether reformers or others, as a “family compact,” combining to exclude them from the enjoyment of offices conferring emolument or power;—that this large and spirited class of people feel as aliens instead of citizens; and that they possess no greater right as British subjects than if they resided in the United States. Your Committee cannot suppose that Lord Durham has imagined such a state of society—they are well convinced that some disappointed or discontented person has imposed upon his Lordship's credulity, and led him to promulgate an opinion, the tendency of which to great and permanent injury, cannot be easily counteracted.

No portion of the community can suffer more directly or seriously from the effects of this erroneous assertion, than the very persons, who, it is alleged, are labouring under the baneful influence complained against; and it is with no common satisfaction that your Committee find among their number three gentlemen well known throughout the province, the representatives of three distinct constituencies, and who, being of the number of those who his Lordship states are regarded as aliens in this portion of their Sovereign's dominions, are best able to pronounce upon the accuracy of His Lordship's statements.

One of these gentlemen, Colonel Prince, is an Englishman by birth, and was bred to the legal profession. He came to this Province six years ago, and brought with him a considerable sum of money, which he has expended in purchasing and improving real estate in the Western District. On the first occasion of issuing a commission of the peace for that division of the province, he was included in it; and at the next general election he was returned to represent the county of Essex, by a population almost exclusively Canadian; and the Legislature, to mark their sense of his gallant conduct upon different occasions, in resisting the invasion of the country by foreign Brigands, passed a law admitting him to practise as a Barrister and Attorney in all the courts. The Lieutenant Governor soon after conferred upon him the rank of Colonel in the Militia, and entrusted him with the command of a battalion embodied for actual service, and which is still on duty. The second is Mr. R. Rollo Hunter, a gentleman of independent property, and a native of Scotland.—He has resided in the Province six years; is in the Commission of the Peace, and has been elected as representative for the County of Oxford. The third, Mr. J. A. H. Powell, is an Irishman.—He came to the country since the last war; his father held the rank of Major in the Army; he sold his commission, and settled at Perth, in the District of Bathurst, of which he was appointed Sheriff. Upon his death, his son (Mr. J. A. H. Powell) succeeded him, and has since been returned a member for the County in which he resides.

That which has been above related of the reception these gentlemen have met with, and the total absence of all ground for considering that they have been treated or regarded as "Aliens," may be said of the whole body of British and Irish immigrants who have taken up their abode in this Province; and the three members of your Committee, to whom special reference has been made, conceive that they are bound in justice, calmly, but unequivocally, to deny that Lord Durham has been correctly informed with respect to the feelings of the original settlers in Upper Canada towards them; on the contrary, they know that if there be one matter more than another that they feel a deep interest in and a desire to promote, it is emigration from the British Islands. They are aware of the immense advantage the country has derived from this source, in general wealth, as well as in their social and political relations; and it is universally considered that the check it has experienced from the recent difficulties in the two provinces, is among the most serious, if not the very greatest, of the evils that have resulted from them. And as a proof of the anxiety of the Provincial House of Assembly here, to promote emigration, and to remove every impediment to its increase, the members, at a time when the House was composed almost exclusively of persons of the first and second classes above alluded to, repeatedly and unanimously, called for the disallowance of an Act passed by the legislature of Lower Canada, imposing a tax upon British emigrants landing at the ports of Quebec and Montreal; a tax which was regarded by them as odious—injurious—and unconstitutional.

With respect to the exclusion of British and Irish emigrants from places of honour and emolument in the province, it is sufficient to state that *the vice-chancellor—the master and registrar of the court of chancery—the receiver-general—the secretary of the province—the solicitor general—four out of five executive councillors—and twelve out of the twenty-nine legislative councillors appointed since Sir John Colborne assumed the government of the country—two-thirds of the clergy of the church of England—a like proportion of district school-masters—and the principal and masters of Upper Canada College, with one exception,—have been taken from that class of gentlemen; and it may be confidently asserted that from among them, a large majority of justices of the peace, militia officers, commissioners of the court of requests, and other local appointments have been made,—while it is a remarkable fact, that of the sixteen battalions of militia ordered to be embodied for actual service for the* defence of the country, ten of them are commanded by British or Irish gentlemen who have recently come to the province, selected without reference to politics or religious creed, but purely on account of loyalty and ability.

Your Committee feel it unnecessary to pursue this subject further; and while they are gratified in having it in their power to offer a complete, and, they trust, satisfactory refutation of opinions and statements, which, if true, would bring discredit and injury upon the province, they cannot avoid repeating their concern that those statements and opinions should have been inconsiderately advanced by a person filling the high station conferred upon the Earl of Durham.

The High Commissioner having thus recorded his opinion of the different parties in the province, proceeds to state various matters connected with the administration of Sir Francis Head, and the different departments of the government, which your Committee will notice in their order, as briefly as possible.

It has happened, unfortunately for Lord Durham, that he employed agents to procure information, or acquired it from parties, evidently incompetent or indisposed to speak correctly upon the past political events of this province; since to this circumstance your Committee are bound to attribute the many inaccuracies contained in His Lordship's Report, which, in themselves, are quite sufficient to cast general discredit upon it.

Thus, His Lordship affirms that Sir Francis Head, on assuming the government of the colony, dismissed from the Executive Council some of the members who were most obnoxious to the House of Assembly, and requested three individuals to succeed them. This is wholly incorrect:—Sir Francis Head did not dismiss any of the Council upon assuming the government, and of course he did not appoint others to succeed them:—the appointments made by Sir Francis were in addition to the Councilors he found in office; and they were in fact made in consequence of the representation of the latter gentlemen that an increase of their members was necessary for the transaction of the public business of the country.

The selection of the new Councillors was, very probably, made to conciliate the House of Assembly, but not at the instance of that body, or at the suggestion of any one of its members.

His Lordship next states, "that among the first acts of the Governor, after the appointment of this Council, was, the nomination to some vacant offices, of individuals who were taken from the old official party, and this without any communication with his Council. These appointments were attacked by the House of Assembly, and the new Council finding that their opinion was never asked upon these or other matters, and that they were seemingly to be kept in ignorance of all those public measures which popular opinion, nevertheless, attributed to their advice, remonstrated privately on the subject with the Governor. Sir Francis desired them to make a formal representation to him on the subject; they did so, and this produced such a reply from him, as left them no choice but to resign. The occasion of the differences which had caused the resignation was made the subject of communication between the Governor and the Assembly, so that the whole community was informed of the grounds of the dispute."

It is to be regretted that Lord Durham had not read the communication to which he refers in the last sentence quoted from his Report, before he gave this account of the cause of the resignation of the Council, he would in such case have avoided the error into which he has fallen; he would have learned that no nomination to vacant offices of individuals taken from the old official party had been made after the appointment of the new Council, and therefore that they had not resigned for the reasons given by His Lordship, but because they aimed at a change in the mode of administering the government, which it was deemed improper to concede, and which was therefore refused by Sir Francis Head.

A second inaccuracy occurs in that part of the High Commissioner's Report which relates to the proceedings of the new House of Assembly, in the case of Mr. Hepburne. His Lordship says, that in consequence of these proceedings, Sir F. Head succumbed to the Assembly, and persuaded Mr. Hepburne to resign his office, and to take one of very inferior emolument; and that this was done to avoid collision with the Assembly, who are represented as having been influenced by exceedingly discreditable, if not base, motives in their proceedings against Mr. Hepburne. The truth of the case is simply this: that Mr. Hepburne did not resign his office for the reason mentioned, but retained it until within a few months of Sir Francis Head's departure from the country, and then voluntarily relinquished it, for appointments far more desirable than the one he gave up.

As Lord Durham has fallen into error upon mere questions of fact of recent occurrence, it will probably not be considered surprising that he should mistake those of more remote date; but His Lordship has misapprehended one subject to which he has adverted, in a manner somewhat remarkable, and which ought not to pass without notice. His Lordship states, that a law was passed immediately after the last war with the States, forbidding American citizens to hold land in the province. In the first place, no such law was ever passed; and in the second, it was wholly unnecessary. Any one of the legal advisers of His Lordship could have told him, that an American citizen, unless naturalized, cannot, by the laws of England, hold lands within the British dominions. It is probable that, in alluding to this subject, His Lordship has been misled by an inaccurate reference to an act of a directly contrary tendency, which was adopted in 1825. This act was passed, and has the effect of confirming the titles of American citizens, who had previously settled in the province, under the impression that they might legally hold lands. With respect to future settlers of this class, the law remains as it always has been, neither facilities nor obstructions being placed in their way. Of the policy of their admission, however, it would surprise no one, if His Lordship, after his experience in the government of this country, should have entertained great doubts: the reverse, however, appears to be his opinion—he seems to think the indiscriminate admission of the citizens of the neighbouring republic, would be of advantage, both to the province and the mother country.

Your Committee will pass over particular notice of the opinions advanced by his Lordship, on the subject of the Clergy Reserve question, “of the policy towards the Catholics,” and the “complaints of Orangeism”—not that abundant room does not exist for the expression of regret, that on subjects sufficiently calculated in themselves to produce excitement, his Lordship should have felt it right to appear as the partizan or advocate of either party, and to express favourable views as to one, and adverse opinions as respected the other. If mischief do not arise from so indiscreet a course, the Province will be indebted to the magnanimity of its inhabitants, rather than to the observations or advice of Her Majesty’s High Commissioner.

His Lordship does not appear to have considered it necessary to recommend forbearance among parties, whose differences involve no great principles of government, but are confined to subjects of a social, rather than political character; but he prefers the attempt to cast aside, and disregard the wishes and pretensions of any portion of the community that happen not to be in accordance with those theories, for which he most plainly evinces a preference.

The settlement of the question which has, undoubtedly, strongly agitated the public mind, with respect to the clergy reserves, has been an object of the most anxious solicitude among all parties in the province, and nothing can more clearly prove that want of success in attaining this desirable end, is not to be attributed to illiberal or unchristian feelings, than that the various measures which have been introduced have met with conscientious objections among all classes of politicians.

Your Committee, however, earnestly hope that the forbearance and mutual concessions which have lately marked the proceedings of your Honourable House, will result in some measure that will prove acceptable to the great body of their fellow-subjects, and put an end to further discussion upon a subject that involves the only point of serious dispute among them.

With respect to what His Lordship is pleased to designate the “policy towards the Catholics,” your Committee are well convinced, that no portion of the inhabitants of the province are more fully aware than the Catholics themselves, that no invidious policy has ever been designed or acted upon towards them,—and ungrateful would such conduct be, if ever attempted. No portion of the people of this province have been more ready to fulfil the duties of faithful subjects, and none are more deserving of the protection and patronage of the Crown.

As regards the statement respecting the existence of “orangemen,” as your Committee do not feel themselves at liberty to comment on particular associations in the province, they will confine themselves to the expression of their conviction, that an universal desire exists amongst all classes of the community, to live in peace with each other, and that this desire will gradually but certainly put an end to distinctions that may be found to create dissensions, and in their opinion, nothing would be so certain to defeat this great object, as the application of violent or coercive measures, or the indiscreet interference of authority. The distinctions referred to by Lord Durham, were not found to damp the universal loyalty and good feeling of the people of this province, during the last eighteen months of peril and invasion;—all parties laid aside their disagreements, and none more readily and willingly than Catholics and orangemen, who were found fighting in the same ranks, side by side, in defence of their laws, their liberties, and their Sovereign. Such men, actuated by such principles, cannot be estranged from each other; they must and will be friends as well as neighbours.

Lord Durham, in his remarks on the physical condition of the province, has considered it necessary to contrast the improvements that are going on in Canada, with those in progress in the neighbouring states, and to draw a comparison very disadvantageous to this province.—Your Committee would extend this report to an unreasonable and unprofitable length, were they to enter into the discussion of the various statements and opinions of his Lordship. They will, therefore, content themselves with remarking that if it were admitted, that the contrast is correctly drawn by his Lordship, it ought not to surprise any one who would take the trouble to recollect the true cause to which it should be attributed. The improvements referred to in the adjacent states, have for their support the wealth of a country containing a population of FIFTEEN MILLIONS OF SOULS—Upper Canada, unsustained by any other than its own resources—cut off from a seaport by the unwise legislation of the mother-country,—unable, from the same cause, to increase its revenues by duties on imports, and containing a population of less than half a million, might well rest satisfied that no just reproach could be cast upon it, if its inhabitants had abstained from all attempts at great and expensive works, and had confined themselves to the ordinary pursuits of agriculture and commerce. But the fact is otherwise; and notwithstanding the inference to be drawn from the High Commissioner's report,—Upper Canada has undertaken, and gone far towards accomplishing works that would do credit to any NATION, and which, if they are not found superior in magnitude and usefulness, will bear an advantageous comparison with any in the neighbouring country. That they have not been rendered more complete and extensive, is not to be attributed to want of enterprise or of patriotism on the part of the people of Upper Canada, but to the mistaken policy already adverted to, which has left them without the means of developing the great natural resources of the country, and which can alone be remedied by the Imperial Parliament. But your Committee believe that the happiness and prosperity of a country does not altogether depend in forcing, after the manner of hot-bed vegetation, public works, or what are termed, public improvements. These are of course useful in their way,—but unless accompanied by obedience to, and a just and impartial administration of the laws, insuring protection of life and property, and social happiness and contentment—they are of small value. In these important respects, the inhabitants of Upper Canada may, with justifiable exultation, claim superiority over their republican neighbours:—But the Earl of Durham has not thought it necessary to advert to considerations of that kind; he does not seem to have had eyes to see, or ears to hear any of the faults or defects of those, by him, commended and admired people. It is possible, however, that it may detract something from the estimation in which they are held by him, when he peruses a report of a select committee of the senate of the state of New York, recently promulgated, which denounces the Erie canal and other great "improvements" so much lauded by his Lordship, as infamous jobs; that they were completed by foreign (British) capital; and, recommending that the debts contracted for their completion should be considered as having been fraudulently incurred, and that they should never be paid. This recommendation, sufficiently republican in its nature, may convince others, if it does not Lord Durham, that it is possible that the exhibition of the public "improvements" in the United States, may not have been altogether so wise or so deserving of the unqualified praise that has been bestowed upon them.—and that certainly it would have been more becoming not to have undertaken them, if the public (chiefly British) creditor is to be refused re-payment of the money advanced for their construction.

The High Commissioner appears to have given no very great attention to the condition of trade in Upper Canada,—he, however, slightly adverts to the want of a port of entry from the sea; and as a measure that would remove some of the embarrassments experienced from this cause, and from the disadvantages arising from the Saint Lawrence being closed by frost for a considerable portion of the year, his Lordship suggests that merchants should be permitted to ship their goods from England, and land them at New York in bond, and from thence to bring them into Upper Canada, free of duty. Your Committee will not remark at any length, upon the objections which the ship-owners and merchants of England would probably raise to a measure of this description, but they are wholly unable to reconcile this suggestion or advise of his Lordship, with the recommendations wisely and patriotically urged upon Her Majesty's government, in his letter addressed to Lord Glenelg, dated Niagara, 16th July, 1838, and which contains the following passages:—

“ Opposite to Fort Erie, immediately on the lake, is the town of Buffalo, the head quarters of the robbers and pirates who have so long infested this country. Its extent and appearance are surprising; the size and respectability of the buildings, and the number of masts which I could discern in the harbour, prove the value of the commerce, and the wisdom of the arrangements which have thus created, in about ten years, a city in the midst of the wilderness.

“ This prosperity is owing to the Erie Canal, which commences at Buffalo, and thus makes it the depot of all the trade of the west, flowing to New York.

“ All these advantages might be ours, by the judicious application of not a large expenditure. The Welland Canal, which commences at the Grand River, in Lake Erie, and strikes the Lake Ontario, a few miles west of Fort George, has great advantages over the Erie Canal; it is open three weeks earlier in the spring, and connects the two Lakes by a short passage.

“ If this canal was completed, and the Saint Lawrence Canal, the water communication by the lakes, the Rideau Canal, and the Saint Lawrence, to the sea, by Montreal and Quebec, would be complete, and all that immense trade which now flows from the west, by Buffalo and Lockport, and the grand canals to New York, would pass through our provinces, and enrich all the towns and districts through which it was carried.

“ This is not a speculation of mine, but it is an admitted fact, by the Americans themselves; the knowledge of which leads the merchants of Buffalo to encourage these border inroads which disturb the peace of our provinces, and prevent our attention being directed to objects which involve their complete ruin.

“ I enclose your Lordship an American paper, published at Oswego, in which you will find all these important considerations to which I have briefly adverted, treated at length. I quote it for the value and correctness of its commercial anticipations, setting aside all reference to the military speculations which it contains.

“ I feel so strongly the importance of this subject, both as a means of restoring tranquillity to the Canadas, and of blessing the North American provinces with a degree of prosperity which has never yet been afforded them, that I feel it my duty to press it on the immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government.

“ I would ask of them a grant of money to be issued on the same principles and securities as those which regulate the assistance given to harbours, rail-roads, canals, and other public works in England. The interest of the money advanced could be satisfactorily ensured, and I feel certain that the value of the tolls would very soon be so great that the principal would be speedily repaid. I believe, my Lord, I am not too sanguine, when I assert that such a step taken would at once put an end to all discontents and disturbances in the Canadas. The Americans would see that their chances of acquiring these provinces, by holding out the temptation of a prosperity which our supremacy does not afford the Canadians, were at an end, and would discontinue their intrigues on our frontiers, whilst the inhabitants of our North American colonies would find in the increase of trade and wealth, which must flow in, pursuits and occupations which would leave them neither the leisure nor the desire for political agitation, or traitorous conspiracies.

“ On our part, we should, by the judicious application of this loan, spare all the immense expense of our army and fleet, and of the volunteers and militia.

“ I again express my earnest conviction that the measure I recommend is, for the reasons which I have adduced above, founded on the best considerations of economy, tranquillity and security, for the present and future, and as such I humbly submit it to the decision of Her Majesty's Government.”

When Lord Durham announced his having written this despatch, it was received throughout the province with the highest possible satisfaction. He truly described it as a measure above all others best calculated to remove dissensions, and to establish the prosperity of the country. It would be impossible to overrate the grateful feelings which such an act of munificence on the part of the British government would excite among all classes; but it is most singular that His Lordship should, when drawing up his final report, have overlooked the fact, that if his scheme of importing goods, free of duty, by the way of New York, were adopted, our magnificent canals would be rendered almost, if not entirely, useless, and the whole advantage arising from the transportation of our imports would be transferred to the boats and canals of the state of New York.

Your Committee need not say how unequivocally they deprecate this unwise and destructive recommendation—nor do they for a moment believe that it will receive countenance in any quarter.

In referring to the great works undertaken by this province, Lord Durham has truly ascribed the inability of the province to complete them, to the impediments arising from the political condition of Lower Canada, and its unwillingness to contribute its aid in works in which they are equally interested; but your Committee regret that this statement should have been accompanied by most unmerited and ungenerous insinuations against the gentlemen who have gratuitously, and at great personal inconvenience, acted as commissioners in superintending the outlay of the public money. There is something so offensive and unbecoming in these passages of the Report, as to induce the Committee, from that and other internal evidence, to believe that that portion of it which relates to Upper Canada, was not written by, and never received the careful revision of, His Lordship.

Your Committee will now direct the attention of your honourable House to such parts of the high Commissioner's report, as more particularly relate to the executive department of the government, and to the legislature. In submitting to the consideration of your honourable House the observations they have to offer on this part of the subject, it is with pain they have to declare, that his Lordship appears to have adopted opinions of the most unjust and injurious description, upon information the most inaccurate, and without thinking it necessary to seek the truth in those quarters where he was most certain to obtain it.

It is somewhat singular, that Lord Durham should have overlooked or disregarded the many obvious objections that existed to his making reference in the public manner he has done, or indeed in any other manner, to the course pursued by the executive government of this province, in the administration of justice in relation to the traitors and brigands, whom it became a necessary but painful duty to prosecute. That the course pursued in Upper Canada did not harmonize with the policy of his Lordship, is not to be denied; but what was done here, was done in accordance with the known and established laws of the province: trial by jury was not dispensed with, and no ex post facto enactments were passed to create unknown penalties against unconvicted offenders;—and no punishments were awarded that were not within the legal authority of the Crown. Although punishments more severe than Lord Durham had the power or the inclination to award, were inflicted in Upper Canada, his Lordship has no right to dispute their necessity; and he is wholly without grounds for asserting that his policy, if known and followed here, would have been attended by any other consequences than resulted from it in Lower Canada, where he was at full liberty to give it effect. In that province, the general impunity which followed crime of the deepest malignity, was followed by renewed rebellion and increased outrage. Upper Canada has been spared that additional disgrace, and saved from the calamities of a second insurrection; whether this cause for satisfaction is to be attributed to that firm determination to vindicate the laws of the country, which your honourable House, without a dissenting voice, has thanked his Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor for exercising, no one can confidently affirm, but it is known to members of your honourable House, that the painful duty of disposing of the numerous prisoners who had subjected themselves to the severest penalties known to our laws, was entered upon with the most earnest and anxious desire to extend mercy to the utmost limits compatible with the safety of the country, and that this desire was firmly adhered to, notwithstanding the strong feeling of an outraged and deeply-injured community; loudly and unequivocally demanding examples of the utmost severity, far more numerous than were inflicted.

Without the slightest mention of the grounds on which the two persons alluded to by his Lordship, as having suffered the extreme penalty of the law, but apparently purposely omitting any notice of them, his Lordship has stated that they unfortunately engaged a great share of public sympathy—and that their pardon had been solicited in petitions signed, it is generally asserted, by "thirty thousand of their countrymen"! The making this statement, if strictly accurate, could answer no useful purpose, but quite the contrary; but to mark how incautious his Lordship is, in referring to facts, it is proper to state that instead of thirty thousand signatures, there were not five thousand appended to the petitions presented.

In connection with this subject, it cannot fail to attract the notice of every one, that Lord Durham appears to have altogether overlooked the outraged feelings, and deep injuries done to the loyal people of this Province, by the convicted traitors. In no part of his Lordship's report does he exhibit sympathy for them—they are the objects of reproach—the guilty are the only parties for whom his Lordship expresses sympathy or compassion.

Your Committee have with regret further to observe, that the High Commissioner, not content to limit himself to ungracious notice of particular acts of the Government, with respect to the public prosecutions, has, in addition, given credit and currency to charges the most ungenerous, not only against the officers of the local Government and the Legislature, but also against a large portion of the loyal people of the country generally. His Lordship has represented to Her Majesty, that "It certainly appeared too much as if the rebellion had been purposely invited by the Government, and the unfortunate men who took part in it deliberately drawn into a trap, by those who subsequently inflicted so severe a punishment on them for their error. It seemed, too, as if the dominant party made use of the occasion afforded it by the real guilt of a few desperate and imprudent men, in order to persecute or disable the whole body of their political opponents. A great number of perfectly innocent individuals were thrown into prison, and suffered in person, property and character. The whole body of reformers was subjected to suspicion, and to harrassing proceedings, instituted by Magistrates, whose political leanings were notoriously averse to them. Severe laws were passed, under colour of which, individuals very generally esteemed were punished without any form of trial."

If one who was not clothed with the official character of Lord Durham, had promulgated the paragraph here quoted, he might justly be rendered personally liable for its publication; but although his Lordship is not responsible for his official acts, as Her Majesty's High Commissioner, to the Provincial Government, and the people his observations so deeply and injuriously affect, yet a moral obligation rests upon him, as an honourable man, to declare to the world upon what grounds he has asserted that "it appeared too much as if the rebellion had been purposely invited by the Government, and the unfortunate men who took part in it, deliberately drawn into a trap by those who subsequently inflicted so severe a punishment on them for their error?" By what authority has his Lordship stated, that "it seemed too, as if the dominant party made use of the occasion afforded it by the real guilt of a few desperate and imprudent men, in order to persecute or disable the whole body of their political opponents?" From whom did his Lordship learn, and who are the injured parties referred to in his statement, that "a great number of perfectly innocent individuals were thrown into prison, and suffered in person, property and character?" Who were the Magistrates, "whose political leanings subjected the whole body of reformers to harrassing proceedings?"—And lastly, what "severe laws were passed under colour of which, individuals very generally esteemed were punished without any form of trial?" The enormities here enumerated could not have been perpetrated without the grossest fraud and tyranny on the part of the Government—the corrupt and guilty co-operation of the Legislature—and the most malignant and wicked participation of the great body of the people. And surely, however great may have been the objections of his Lordship to those different parties—and however strong his sympathy with their political opponents—yet, charged as he was with the deeply responsible and delicate office of Her Majesty's High Commissioner, the most important object of which was, if possible, to reconcile conflicting parties, and to restore peace and harmony to the country—remembering also his first promise to the people of these Provinces, that he would discharge his duty "without distinction of party, races, or politics," he surely ought most cautiously to have guarded against falling into any errors of fact, and carefully abstained from uttering sentiments calculated to inflame the public mind, and to raise up new causes for dissension, instead of allaying those that already existed.

But Lord Durham has, unfortunately, proved himself insensible to the propriety of this prudent and politic course. For the consequences of his Lordship's acts, no party in this Province is responsible—and it will be the duty, (and your Committee trust that the patriotism of the people will lead them to perform it) of all parties, to unite in averting the new dangers and difficulties they are likely to produce.

It is impossible for any one to meet charges so general as those advanced by Lord Durham, but your Committee may venture to remark, that although it is possible that some innocent individual may have been thrown into prison during the insurrection, and although it is also possible that some such persons may have been subjected to harrassing proceedings, instituted by Magistrates whose political leanings were adverse to them—such occurrences ought not to excite surprise, and assuredly ought not to be made the ground of general condemnation. It has never yet happened, your Committee believe, that a political insurrection has occurred, in the suppression of which, some innocent persons have not been subject to suspicion, and oftentimes falsely accused,—but that the Government or Magistrates availed themselves of the occasion of the insurrection in this Province, to persecute or disable the whole body of their political opponents, cannot be asserted with any degree of truth—neither do your Committee believe that any person of intelligence and character among the reformers, will be found to say so.

Referring to the administration of Justice in this Province, Lord Durham remarks that, “it is true, it appears much better in Upper than in Lower Canada; Courts of Justice, at least, are brought into every man’s neighbourhood, by a system of circuits, and there is still some integrity in Juries.” Why his Lordship should have permitted this paragraph to appear in his report, is altogether incomprehensible. Your Committee do not believe that any man who had a regard for truth, was to be found in the Province, so reckless as to attempt to throw discredit on the integrity of the learned Judges of Her Majesty’s Courts in Upper Canada; and the equivocal terms used in referring to the juries, are as offensive as they are unjust. Those who are concerned in the administration of justice, desire no praise for doing their duty honestly and conscientiously; and your Committee believe your honourable House might safely defy the High Commissioner to point out any portion of Her Majesty’s dominions, where these duties are performed with greater uprightness, than in this distant colony of the Empire.

Your Committee will next advert, as briefly as possible, to that part of Lord Durham’s report, in which he endeavours to disparage, and bring discredit upon your honourable House, and directly to impeach the integrity of those loyal and independent men, by whom the majority of the Assembly were chosen. His Lordship states, that “the circumstances under which they were elected, were such as to render them peculiarly objects of suspicion and reproach, to a number of their countrymen.”

As in the instance of the charges insinuated in that part of the High Commissioner’s report which relates to the insurrection, his Lordship adduces no fact in support of allegations, which your Committee are bound to declare have been unjustly made;—while, on the other hand, evidence which did not depend upon the mere assertion of your honourable House, but which was established and confirmed by documents and facts that defied contradiction, were within his Lordship’s reach, and would have prevented him, had he been disposed to consult them, from making the unfounded charges which he has rather chosen to give currency to, that, “in a number of instances, the elections were carried by the unscrupulous exercise of the influence of the government, and by a display of violence on the part of the tories, who were emboldened by the countenance afforded to them by the authorities”—and that “the tories succeeded in carrying more than one seat by means of the violence of the organized mob (referring to orangemen) placed at their disposal.” It will not be expected that your Committee should go over the evidence which has already been laid before the people of this province and the British nation, repudiating these statements:—there is no necessity for doing so, as regards the electors of Upper Canada, and Her Majesty will receive every necessary information from the report adopted by your honourable House, at its first session, on the petition of Charles Duncombe, addressed to the House of Commons. It would seem, indeed, from a perusal of his Lordship’s report, that he had received and adopted, as true, the statements made by this, now, fugitive traitor, wholly disregarding the ample refutation they received in the report referred to. With respect to the degree of confidence that may be reposed in your honourable House by your constituents, it becomes not your Committee to speak—but they feel a great satisfaction in knowing, that in whatever light their conduct may be viewed by those to whom they are responsible, and before whom they must soon and are ready to appear, they have endeavoured faithfully to do their duty to their Sovereign and their country, and they are well satisfied that the great bulk of the inhabitants of Upper Canada, of all parties and creeds, will be ready and willing to shield them from unmerited calumny and reproach.

Your Committee have not overlooked the apparent injustice done, in permitting the statements made by the High Commissioner, so injurious to your honourable House, to be made public, when their refutation was in the hauds of Her Majesty’s ministers, but your Committee feel it right to explain that the whole report of his Lordship appears to have obtained currency in a most irregular manner, and without the concurrence or sanction of the government.

Your Committee will here close their remarks on the various allegations in the report of the High Commissioner, that appeared to them to require particular animadversion. If in the course of their remarks, they have been betrayed into too strong an expression of reproach or indignant refutation, they trust that it will not be ascribed to a wanton indifference to that courtesy and respectful deference that should mark the proceedings of a public body towards those of high rank and station; and on the other hand they trust that they will not be denied the credit of having forborne to apply animadversions of far greater severity than they have used, to many parts of a report, which they can truly affirm, and which they believe they have clearly proved to be most unjust and unfounded, and which are calculated to have a most mischievous influence on the future destinies of these colonies.

Lord Durham professes to submit to Her Majesty and the British nation, a true and faithful account of the state and condition of this, as well as of the other British North American provinces, and there is no doubt that it will be promulgated throughout the country, by those who are gratified at finding their political principles and theories advocated and sustained by His Lordship, that there is nothing in his Report that admits of contradiction, and that whatever discredit may be attempted to be cast upon it, must proceed from disappointment or vindictive feelings. In refutation of this attempt to pervert the truth, if it should be made, your Committee invite the attention of the independent yeomanry and hardy husbandmen of Upper Canada to the following paragraph. Having first described the surpassing prosperity of the United States, for the purpose of contrasting it with the poverty and inferiority of these colonies, His Lordship proceeds to state: "On the side of both the Canadas, and also of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, a widely scattered population—poor and apparently unenterprising, though hardy and industrious—separated from each other by tracts of intervening forests, without towns and markets, almost without roads, living in mean houses, drawing little more than a rude subsistence from ill-cultivated land, and seemingly incapable of improving their condition, present the most instructive contrast to their enterprising and thriving neighbours "on the American side."

Let the farmers of all political parties residing in the districts fronting on the St. Lawrence, the owners of the extensive, beautiful and well-cultivated lands on the Bay of Quinté—in the district of Newcastle—the Home, Gore, Niagara, London and Western districts, read this degrading account of them, and ask themselves whether they would feel perfectly safe in submitting their future political fate, and that of their children, to the dogmas of a man who has so grossly misstated their character and condition. If Lord Durham, after travelling up and down the River St. Lawrence, and along the Niagara frontier, seeing, as he must have seen, even within this limited field of observation, farms of unsurpassed beauty and fertility, occupied and excellently worked by yeomanry who enjoyed every comfort, and whose wealth and independence placed within their reach, almost every luxury that could be desired by man, could deliberately pen or promulgate a paragraph such as has been just quoted from his Report, surely the people of the country may well hesitate before they place implicit confidence in any statement or opinion that he may advance on any other subject.

Nor is it easy to understand what could have been the motives which induced the High Commissioner to give this character to the rural population of the country. Its inaccuracy could not have proceeded from ignorance or want of information; neither could His Lordship be insensible to the injury it was calculated to bring on this country, by diverting emigration to other shores:—perhaps to the highly and extravagantly admired shores of the neighbouring republic! Your Committee, unwilling to entertain this opinion, will pursue the enquiry no further.

Having thus adverted to those portions of the High Commissioner's Report which appeared to your Committee most obviously to require explanation and remark, they will bring the duty assigned to them by your Honourable House to a close, by briefly stating the plan recommended by His Lordship to be adopted for the future government of these provinces.

It is this:—That the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada be forthwith united under one Legislature, and that the act of the Imperial Parliament intended to effect this object should contain provisions by which any or all the other North American colonies may, on the application of their Legislatures, be, with the consent of the two Canadas, admitted into the Union.

Representation to be settled according to numbers of the population.

The existing endowments of the Catholic Church in Lower Canada to be guaranteed.

Provision by law for the Protestant Church to be taken away, by a repeal of the clauses of the Constitutional Act which relate to the Clergy Reserves.

All the revenues of the provinces, except those arising from lands, to be at the disposal of the Legislature, upon condition of providing an adequate civil list.

The revenues and disposal of the crown lands to be confided to the imperial authority.

The independence of the judges to be secured by giving them the same tenure of office and security of income as exists in England.

In the practice of the government, His Lordship advises that no money votes should be allowed without the previous consent of the Crown: and that responsibility to the united Legislature of all officers of the government, except the Governor and his Secretary, should be secured by every means known to the constitution.

The Governor, as Representative of the Crown, to be instructed that he must carry on the government by heads of departments, in whom the united Legislature shall repose confidence; and that he must look for no support from home in any contest with the Legislature, except on points involving strictly imperial interests.

And these several changes, His Lordship recommends should be forthwith made, and without any previous communication with this or the other province.

If it were properly within the instruction of your Committee to discuss the several propositions of His Lordship for the future government of Her Majesty's subjects in Canada, they would feel themselves in a great degree relieved from doing so. The two points of most importance, viz: the legislative union of the provinces, and the responsibility of the officers of government to the legislature, have already undergone the most careful investigation, and received the deliberate judgment of your Honourable House. The first has, under certain specified conditions, been assented to—the second has been pronounced inconsistent with the dependence of these provinces, as colonies, upon the mother country. If, in disregard of your recorded opinions, these two measures should be proposed to, and receive the concurrence of Her Majesty and the Imperial Parliament, it would be of little consequence to attempt to resist, or even to discuss, the other suggestions, which, whether they be objectionable or not, are comparatively of minor importance.

Your Committee, however, are not willing to believe that the great nation to which these provinces belong, and which has hitherto extended to them its powerful—its parental protection, will hastily, and without the most full and ample information, adopt the opinions and act upon the recommendations of any individual, however high his rank or great his talents, that involve the future destinies of Her Majesty's faithful subjects in these provinces.

Your Committee, however, are well convinced, that some great change is about to take place in the system of government in Upper and Lower Canada, but they do not believe that it will involve any departure from the principles of the British Constitution, so far as they can be made applicable to a Colony.

Your Committee submit with their report, the draft of an address to Her Majesty, which they beg to recommend to the adoption of your honourable House.

All which is respectfully submitted.

(Draft of an Address to Her Majesty.)

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN:

We, your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Upper Canada, in Provincial Parliament assembled, beg permission respectfully to approach Your Majesty, with the renewed assurance of our continued loyalty, attachment and devotion, to your Majesty's person and government.

We beg to express to your Majesty, our most grateful sense of the support and protection which your Majesty has been graciously pleased to extend to your loyal and faithful subjects, against the unprovoked invasions of both the Provinces of Canada, on the part of the people of the neighbouring nation. To that protection, and to the wisdom and foresight of our rulers, aided by the never-failing loyalty and gallantry of your Majesty's subjects, we are, under Divine Providence, indebted for the maintenance of our laws and liberties, and the preservation of our lives and properties, from the vindictive and wicked assaults of a depraved and savage banditti.

The vast expense incurred by the British nation, in maintaining the fleets and armies of your Majesty, sent for our support, is cause of deep and serious concern to Your Majesty's faithful subjects: nor can they cease to express their grateful acknowledgments for the noble generosity thus evinced. It however, is a source of no small gratification to us, to have it in our power to say, that in Upper Canada, at least, this burthen has not been thrown upon the Parent State, from any necessity to maintain internal tranquillity, but merely to shield us from the attacks of a people with whom we are professedly at peace—but who, nevertheless, are waging open war against the Crown and subjects of Your Majesty.

There is but too much reason to apprehend, that should Your Majesty withdraw your forces from this country, at the present moment, renewed invasions, and on a more extended scale than any that have hitherto occurred, would be speedily experienced. It is not for Your Majesty's subjects in these colonies, to point out to Your Majesty the means that should be adopted to put an end to these outrages; but as the representatives of the people of Upper Canada, we venture humbly, but confidently, to declare, that these outrages never will cease, until Your Majesty shall have announced to the government of the United States, that Your Majesty holds it responsible for the conspiracies and invasions, formed and conducted by the citizens of the republic, to overthrow Your Majesty's government on this continent, and to murder and destroy Your Majesty's subjects, for no other reason than that they are loyal and faithful to their Sovereign's person and government.

We beg permission, further, most respectfully and earnestly, to draw Your Majesty's attention to the rightful claim of your subjects to indemnity for the destruction of the "Sir Robert Peel" steamboat, while lying in the waters of the United States, in the peaceful pursuit of its ordinary business. This outrage, no less insulting to the British nation, than injurious to the individuals who have suffered from it by the loss of their property, has never been in any way atoned for, and the consequences to the owners of the vessel, are of the most ruinous kind. We therefore implore Your Majesty to take such steps, for the relief of Your Majesty's injured subjects, as you may in your wisdom think right. Neither do we imagine, that when Your Majesty shall have determined on the course proper for Your Majesty to pursue in reference to this particular case, that Your Majesty will overlook the claims which all Your Majesty's subjects, in both the provinces, have for indemnity for the many and great injuries of a similar nature, inflicted on them by a foreign nation, and for which, unless reparation be in some way made, and security given for their future peace, consequences of the most painful character, and which it is feared cannot be prevented, may result from future collisions.

Since the commencement of the present Session of the Provincial Parliament, the final report of Your Majesty's High Commissioner, on the affairs of British North America, has been received in this country. In this report, Your Majesty's faithful subjects find many statements deeply affecting the social and political relations and condition of Upper and Lower Canada, and recommendations of several important changes in the form and practice of the constitution. It is with much concern that Your Majesty's faithful subjects find that Your Majesty's High Commissioner has strongly urged the adoption of these changes by Your Majesty and the Imperial Parliament, without waiting for the opinion that may be formed of them by the people, who are to be most deeply and immediately affected by them. Under these circumstances, we have caused a report to be drawn up, by a select Committee of the House of Assembly, which contains matter referring to this subject, as well as to our relations with the people of the United States, which we respectfully submit for Your Majesty's consideration:—and, in the fullest confidence that Your Majesty and the Imperial Parliament, continuing to act on those noble principles of justice and patriotism that have hitherto been manifested towards this portion of the British empire, will discountenance and disallow every measure, that, in the most remote degree, has a tendency to weaken the ties which now unite the North American colonies of Your Majesty to Your Majesty's Crown and Government;—we commit ourselves to that superintending power, to which, as loyal people we owe implicit obedience.

Whatever measures your Majesty may be pleased to approve and recommend to your Imperial Parliament, we earnestly implore your Majesty's especial attention to the financial difficulties that have occurred to arrest the progress and completion of the great public works in which this province has been engaged. These difficulties, we venture to assure your Majesty, do not arise from any fault of the government and legislature of Upper Canada, but entirely from causes produced by enactments of the British Parliament—by the dissensions in Lower Canada, and the unwillingness of that province to aid in accomplishing undertakings, that are calculated to bring to both colonies great and equal benefits. The remedy for the embarrassments, to which we refer, rests entirely with your Majesty and your Majesty's Imperial Legislature:—and we rejoice that it rests in such hands, well convinced that whatever measure of relief can be accorded to us, will be generously and freely granted.

Your Committee beg to refer, for general information, to the recommendations contained in the Report of the Committee of last year, where the state of our finances was fully entered into, and from whom Addresses to Her Majesty emanated on the following subjects, viz :

- 1st.—To obtain our due proportion of duties formerly raised at Quebec.
- 2nd.—For the control of the Post Office revenue.
- 3rd.—For the investment of funds arising from sale of Clergy and Indian Lands, in the Debentures of this Province.
- 4th.—For the control of the Casual and Territorial Revenue.
- 5th.—For transferring to us the power of regulating the duties on the Inland Trade.
- 6th.—For levying an additional duty of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on imports at Quebec; and—
- 7th.—For a loan of £1,000,000, sterling.

The replies to those various addresses have been unsatisfactory. Your Committee recommend their renewal, with the hope the relief prayed for may be obtained, on those various subjects being fully explained by the Commissioners, in the event of their being appointed by your Honourable House.

They have also taken into their most serious consideration, the situation in which this Province is placed, by the discontinuance of all public works, by which not only much valuable time is lost, but an expenditure is continued, far greater than the difference of the interest of the money, or any loss the country can sustain in the depreciation in the value of the currency. They therefore recommend, as a temporary measure, the issuing of bills of credit, to the amount of £250,000, and have prepared a bill for that purpose.

Bills for the sale of the Bank Stock owned by the Province, and for amending the Act imposing tonnage dues on British vessels, are herewith submitted for the adoption of your Honourable House.

With respect to the following charges in the Estimate Account for the support of the Civil Government, viz :

For trial, &c. of State Prisoners, being an amount advanced from the Crown Revenue for such service, during the year 1838,.....	£4,512 4 9
Estimated amount yet due for same service, for 1838, .....	5,000 0 0
Estimate for same service, for 1839,.....	3,000 0 0
Amount advanced from Crown Revenue, for secret service money, for 1838, .....	1,493 8 11

The finances of the Province are not in a situation to sustain those charges, all of which have grown out of the late Insurrection.

The charge for secret services should not be paid out of Provincial revenue.

Many of the items which compose the other charges, as far as they have been examined by the Committee, appear extravagant and the expenditure generally unsatisfactory.

Your Committee call the attention of your Honourable House to the increased expenditure of our Courts for the last three years, with the hope that some remedy will be provided to ensure greater economy in future.

Your Committee again refer to the Report of last year, in which the Inspector-General is requested to draw up a full Report on the state of every branch of our finances at the opening of each Session.

They further particularly recommend a separate account to be opened with each public work by the Inspector-General, to notify the Directors, Commissioners, or persons in charge of any work on which public money has been expended, and from which the interest of such expenditure is to be paid, to make a return of the same on the 1st of January in each year, or report them as so neglecting or refusing to furnish such return, with a view to have them dismissed;—this your Committee recommend as absolutely necessary to secure the interest, on the various outlays thus made.

All which is respectfully submitted.

Committee Room, House of Assembly,
5th day of April, 1839.

WM. HAMILTON MERRITT,
CHAIRMAN.

The object of the above despatch was to prevail on Her Majesty's Government to facilitate the negotiation of a Loan in the British Market for the use of this Province, by extending to its aid the credit of the Mother Country, it states "that although the debt of this Province is large in proportion to its actual revenue, it has been mainly incurred through incidental causes." In adverting to these causes, it is well to refer to the situation of these Provinces prior to 1812. We were at that time in a far more prosperous situation than the adjoining portion of the United States, the trade of which was conveyed through the Montreal outlet of the Saint Lawrence to the Ocean through Canadian waters and Canadian Ports. The command of the trade, by giving employment to our vessels, ensured us the control of both Lakes, a circumstance to which the safety of the Province, in the late American war, may be in a great measure ascribed.

The completion of the Erie and Oswego Canals diverted this trade to the Hudson, and conferred the advantages we possessed on the inhabitants residing on the opposite frontier.— This instantaneous change to our disadvantage produced corresponding depression, and the necessity of regaining what we had lost became apparent.

A general desire prevailed to improve the natural facilities we were known to possess, but it was impossible to overlook the formidable barrier which the occupation and control of our only Seaport, by a Legislature entertaining separate views and feelings, presented.— Many abandoning all hope of inducing the Legislature of Lower Canada to open the communication, turned their attention to the outlet offered by the Port of New York, and had it not been for the restrictions imposed by the General Government of the United States on our commerce, it would ere this have reached the Ocean by this channel.

Happily a laudable spirit of emulation and rivalry prevailed, a Canal around the Falls of Niagara was commenced by a private Company, which has terminated in a system of improvement of our internal communications on a scale commensurate with the magnitude and importance of the trade of this extensive country. These improvements have already led to an expenditure of £1,167,041, as will be seen by reference to a tabular statement appended hereto, marked A. Those works, when completed, will repay the interest on the cost of their construction, and relieve the Provincial Treasury from the annual amount now paid. To ensure this object, it will be necessary to incur an additional expenditure of £1,000,000. The despatch then states, "that as compared with similar public debts incurred by different States of the neighbouring Republic for the promotion of national objects, the debt of this Province is but small, while future resources and the wants of an increasing population, have been here anticipated to a far less extent."

This statement is clearly borne out by the following facts:—In addition to the Erie, Oswego, and Northern Canals—connecting Lakes Erie, Ontario and Champlain with the Hudson—the following lateral Canals have been completed, viz.: the Cayuga and Seneca, Chamong, Crooked Lake, and Chenango. The Black River Canal, and the Genesee valley Canal, are also in course of construction, forming altogether an extent of many thousand miles of inland navigation, and an aggregate of many thousand feet lockage. In addition to those works, the State of New York has undertaken a system of improvement which, by a report of a Committee of ways and means, published March 12th, 1838, makes the following exhibit :

1st. The amount to expend for the enlarging and construction of Canals under existing laws, .....	$20,000,000
2nd. Estimate for future undertakings, .....	15,000,000
3rd. Amount to be hereafter authorised for extension of present Canals, .....	5,000,000
	$40,000,000

The State of Pennsylvania only commenced their improvements in 1826, since which they have expended upwards of $30,000,000. The States of Indiana, Illinois and Michigan, but recently known as such, have undertaken a greater extent of internal improvement than all the Provinces in British North America combined. Their Legislature authorise the negotiation of large sums of money in London for the construction of their improvements; they issue State Stock, and rely on the sales of land (which are ceded to them by their General Government for that purpose) to meet the interest on the capital they require, until the works are completed. After this fund is exhausted, they rely on the progressive increase of the tolls to sustain them.

It then states, "that the prosperity of the Colony must mainly hinge upon the progressive developement of its resources by the united agencies of immigration and British capital."

The Legislature of this Province has never possessed either the power or opportunity to develop its resources, while every exertion is made by our rivals in anticipating a revenue from the improvements hereafter to be constructed to attain that object. By reference to an extract from the report before alluded to, with a view of shewing their ability to repay the interest on the debt of $40,000,000, which they are about to incur, they state "actual experience has thus familiarized us with the certain operation of an excess of revenue in extinguishing a debt created for public works—within the last twenty years, the Canals have come down to us free from debt, and worth more than twenty millions."

This scheme is based on the estimate of the Canal Commissioners, submitted to the Legislature in which they anticipate, in a few years after the enlargement of the Erie Canal, an annual revenue of THREE MILLIONS OF DOLLARS.

The reason assigned in support of that estimate is, that a million and a half of inhabitants furnish a tonnage of $50,000,000 in value, to their Canals, they assume a population in the Western States of six millions, to furnish a tonnage $200,000,000, they admit two-fifths of their exports to descend the Mississippi, and one-fifth of their imports to ascend that stream, leaving:—

Descending Cargoes after above deduction,.....	$60,000,000
Ascending Cargoes after above deduction,.....	80,000,000
Total Trade,.....	$140,000,000

At the present rates of Toll, say 4 per cent., which is the average at this time, this trade would yield an annual revenue of $5,600,000.

It also states, "that the resources of this Province have not hitherto been increased by taxation levied on the trade of the country. Were the imports increased even to one-half the amount, in proportion to those raised on property throughout the American Union, the Provincial Revenues (provided that tranquillity and confidence were restored,) would be in a flourishing condition, and the interest on the public debt could be met with facility; but unfortunately, the want of a Sea-Port places it beyond the power of the Local Government and Legislature to make any addition to the import duties; and even if this could be effected, the want of confidence that is at present felt, would prevent the measure from being attended with an immediate beneficial effect upon the public credit.

Your Committee feel confident no additional duty on imports will be necessary, but that they may safely rely upon the Revenue to be derived from Tolls, when these public works are completed.

In support of which, they again refer to the origin, progress and final success of the improvements undertaken by the State of New York.

The most sanguine anticipations of their most enthusiastic supporters, fell far short of the actual results, particularly their pecuniary value.

In 1817, the Legislature appeared wholly unconscious of their ability to complete the Erie and Ontario Canal, when they applied for aid to the General Government and all States interested in their success.

In 1821, four years after they had commenced, the Comptroller of the State, in obedience to a resolution of the Legislature, estimated their Revenue for the ten years next succeeding their completion, at $150,000 annually. The amount actually received, during that period, exceeded ten millions of dollars.

In the memorial of Governor Morris, before the commencement of the work, he predicted that within 20 years 250,000 tons, would be annually borne to tide water. In 1836, 697,347 tons reached tide water, by that conveyance, and the total tonnage that year, ascending and descending, exceeded 1,300,000.

The Tolls in 1824, were.....	$340,000.
1825, .....	566,000.
1826, .....	762,695.
1833, .....	1,542,695.

This result affords strong evidence that reliance may be placed on the prospective increase of tolls, on Canals situated in a young and rising country.

They proceed to state, that the unexpected results of the past ten years, enable them to look forward with increased confidence to the succeeding ten years. In adverting to this prospect, they call attention to the magnitude and importance of the country bordering on the inland waters connected with Lake Erie, around which five powerful States, containing 280,000 square miles (twice as large as the Kingdom of France, and six times as extensive as the whole of England) are rapidly rising in importance.—That country contains 180,000,000 of acres of arable land, a large portion of which is of surpassing fertility, and has little short of three millions of Inhabitants; and if the same rate of progress shall be maintained for the eleven years to come, by the year 1850 it will exceed six millions.

Those inland States are making the most energetic efforts to open their communications: three great Canals are to connect the Ohio with Lake Erie, while another, excavated for nearly thirty miles through solid rock, unites the navigable waters of Illinois with Lake Michigan. The aggregate length of these improvements is more than 2,500 miles; constructed at an expense exceeding forty-eight millions of dollars, and all leading to Lake Erie.

The commerce of the interior of this Continent, is destined to be borne to and from the Ocean, by the Rivers St. Lawrence and Mississippi or the Erie Canal. Lake Erie is admitted to be the common centre to which all the internal communications lead. The Legislature of the State of New York is now enlarging their Erie Canal, at an expense of $15,000,000 to divert this trade to the Hudson; the magnitude of the object is worthy of exertion, and any expenditure would be justified to secure it: but we maintain that Nature has favoured us with a less distance and less elevation to connect Lake Erie with the Ocean, than any other route or communication whatever. A Canal of only 28 miles in length with 340 feet lockage, connects Lake Erie with Ontario. Another of the same length, of 160 feet lockage, connects Lake Ontario with tide water, consequently, when completed, this communication will restore the Canadas to the same advantage they possessed, previous to the construction of the Erie Canal, and will secure the greatest part of the transit, on which they so confidently rely for an increase of Revenue.

The price of conveying a ton of merchandize, at present, from London to Montreal, 3200 miles, is One Pound from Montreal; to Prescott, 130 miles, £2 10s. The charge, when the improvements are made, will average from London to Lake Erie £2 to £2 10s., which is less than the present cost from Albany to Buffalo.

The Despatch proceeds to state, that many thousands of Her Majesty's Subjects have merely passed through this Province, and crossed into the United States because English Capital, which was to afford them the means of profitable employment, was to be found there instead of here: while such is the case, it is unjust to eulogise the United States as being so excellent a market for British Manufactures, for, were the facts reversed, in proportion as we had British Capital, so should we employ it profitably to ourselves and to the advantage of those investing it. By means such as these, the country would rapidly increase in value and importance to England, and perhaps, at some future period, prevent the loss of the American trade from being felt, when by the employment of British Capital and British Artizans, the United States shall have been enabled to establish rival Manufactories within her own territory.

The discontinuance of all our Public Works, and the want of employment in this country, at the same time that a contrary state of things prevails on the opposite side, would lead emigration from this Province, if no other cause existed; but when we take into consideration the advantages the Agricultural portion of their population have, for the last few years possessed, in consequence of the unjust operation of the Canada Trade Act, it is but reasonable to suppose Emigrants will avail themselves of these advantages.

By a judicious reduction of duty on certain articles, we will not venture to limit the amount of British manufactures which will be introduced through Canada for the consumption of the inhabitants referred to on the opposite frontier; it must increase in proportion to the cheapness of transportation, and the increase of population.

It appears by the returns from the Port of Quebec, the amount of revenue collected in 1820 was £95,086 11 0; that it increased in 1825, the year the Erie Canal was finished, to £127,854 12 0, since which it has fluctuated from year to year, but up to 1838, in place of increasing in a progressive ratio, it has actually decreased to £115,956.

We also show, by tabular statement B, that for the ten years preceding the period when we lost this trade, property in the State of New York had actually decreased. By comparing this decrease with the rapid increase of property for the ten years succeeding the construction of the New York Canals, we may realize the wealth we may anticipate, on completing our Canals throughout.

2nd. We have shewn the result of the New York Canals; the extent of the trade and country on and above Lake Erie; and the moral certainty of diverting that trade to the Ocean by the St. Lawrence, on the completion of our improvements on their present dimensions.

3rd. We have shewn the amount already expended; the interest we are annually paying therefor, and which we must continue to pay until the entire line is completed, when we have every confidence, those works will repay the interest on the outlay incurred.

4th. We have shewn what rapid strides, aided by British Capital, the different States on the opposite side have been enabled to make, and the exertions they are still making to maintain the trade, we have allowed them to divert from our waters.

It may be well to examine the description and extent of the security they offer British Capitalists, and then compare it with the description and extent of the security the Canadians can offer, for similar investments.

The old States, New York, Pennsylvania, &c., rely—1st, on an internal revenue collected on articles within the State, to pay the interest from the capital borrowed, during the construction of their various improvements, and after those works are in operation, to the progressive increase of Tolls.

The State of Indiana, Illinois, and those recently forced into existence, rely on the sale of lands ceded by the General Government, to pay the interest, during their construction,—when those lands are sold, and this fund exhausted, they have the Canals or Improvements in their place.

If this description of security can be relied on with them, it is doubly secure with us.

1st. We will have under a United Legislature for the Canadas, the same power to create an internal revenue, now possessed by the old States, with the additional source of revenue derived from the lands now possessed by the new.

2nd. From the cheapness of transportation which our communications possess, if the Tolls with them will repay an interest, no doubt can be entertained of the result with us.

3rd. In addition to all those sources, we have the Revenue from Foreign Commerce, an advantage which no single State in the Union can possess. Although one-half the entire revenue of the United States is collected at the Port of New York, that State has never had the controul of any part of it, the whole going into the Treasury of the General Government; whereas, this entire revenue will be appropriated wholly with us, for the benefit of the Canadas. The extent of the revenue anticipated, is shewn in Table C.

Your Committee have long since been in possession of every necessary information, to decide on the necessity of completing those improvements in the shortest possible period, as they can expect no income from them, until that is effected.

Your Committee places every reliance on the estimates heretofore made, and entertain no doubt, that by judicious management, the entire line may be completed within two years from its commencement. Under those favourable circumstances, they rely with confidence on Her Majesty's Government recommending to Her Imperial Parliament, to grant them aid for a limited period, to enable them to complete those works, and Your Committee have prepared a Bill, giving ample security for the payment of the Interest and Principal of the same, together with an Address to Her Majesty.

All which is respectfully submitted.

WM. HAMILTON MERRITT,
CHAIRMAN.

Casual and Territorial Revenue, .....	25,000	0	0
	£225,000	0	0

We may safely assume, if we collect a revenue equal to £225,000 during a period when the trade has been diverted through other channels, when regained, and our approaches to the ocean opened, the tolls alone may be calculated at £125,000; and if a comparison was safely made with the result on the Erie Canal, it would double the amount. But suppose, without increasing the duty, we confine the revenue only to £250,000 per year, it, would enable the Legislature to pay the Civil expenditure, and pay the interest on a debt of at least over £3,000,000, for internal improvements.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS,

ON THE

IMPROVEMENT OF THE RIVER SAINT LAWRENCE.

To His Excellency SIR GEORGE ARTHUR, K. C. H. Major General Commanding, Lieutenant Governor of Upper Canada, &c. &c. &c.

The Commissioners for improving the Navigation of the River Saint Lawrence—

RESPECTFULLY REPORT :

That finding themselves, at the opening of the past season, likely to be involved in much difficulty with the Contractors, in consequence of the want of money, they took every step in their power to remedy this inconvenience, which was at length in a great measure obviated by an order from Your Excellency, for an issue of Debentures to the amount of £32,222 4s. 5d. Currency.

That this sum, though it has not been sufficient to push on the work with vigour, has enabled the Board to carry on the most important part of the Canal, and also to prevent any serious loss by breaking the Contracts for those sections which were nearly completed, and which, if left unfinished, would have cost far more than the Contract prices to complete them hereafter.

That from the Report of the resident Engineer, which is enclosed herewith, it appears that the Canal may yet be made navigable for the sum of £51,297 16s. 8½d. being the balance between the sum stated by his detailed estimate of last year, and the amount which has been since expended ; and the resident Engineer feels satisfied that this sum will be found sufficient for this purpose, provided the necessary funds are procured without delay. The object to be obtained by doing this is so important to the best interests of the Province, that the Board cannot allow themselves to doubt that Your Excellency will, with the assistance of the other branches of the Legislature, now assembled in Parliament, be able to devise means for supplying this sum immediately. For besides the very great extra expense that will necessarily be incurred on account of the damage which this work must sustain, if now left in its present unfinished state, and from a change of Contractors, incidental to a protracted suspension of the work, bearing no proportion to the comparatively small quantity of work to be performed, the large sum which has already been expended on this magnificent undertaking, whereby it has been brought so near completion, will, for the present, be in a great measure useless, and the Province will be deprived of any return for this great outlay. Another, and not unimportant consideration, is the loss which must accrue to the Contractors who are engaged in this great work, and who have, by their zeal in prosecuting it, rendered themselves deserving of the most favourable consideration and protection from all unavoidable injury.

That the Board have sustained a very serious loss in the resignation of their late President, the Honourable Jonas Jones, who, since his elevation to the Bench, has found it incompatible with his judicial duties to devote that attention to this Canal which he had previously bestowed upon it from its commencement, with so much credit to himself and so much advantage to the interests of the Province.

That with reference to claims for damages to property on the line of the Canal, the Board have met with great embarrassments, arising from the very exorbitant demands made by some of the parties concerned ; and as there has been found much difficulty in procuring disinterested Arbitrators to act, and the proper decision of this question is one of very great importance, the Board would therefore beg leave to recommend that the Legislature should pass an Act during the present Session, appointing Special Commissioners for this purpose.

With this Report, the Board beg leave to submit the Report of the Resident Engineer, which will be found to contain a very full and satisfactory detail of the work performed, and that remaining to be done ; the minutes of their proceedings for the past season, with a detailed account of the Receipts and Expenditures of the year, and the accompanying vouchers ; and also, an abstract account of the total Receipts and Expenditures, from the commencement of the Works to the 31st December, 1838;—to which documents, they solicit the attention of the Legislature and which they trust will be found sufficiently explanatory and satisfactory.

(Signed,)

JOHN McDONALD,

PRESIDENT.

REPORT OF RESIDENT ENGINEER.

(Copy.)

ST. LAWRENCE CANAL OFFICE,
Cornwall, 31st Dec., 1838.

SIR,

I am much disappointed in having, at the close of another year, to draw up an annual Report of this Canal, without being able to announce its completion. The cause is well known to the Board, to have originated in a want of money ; but, although much inconvenience and some additional expense will necessarily be the consequence of this delay, I am still of opinion, that it may yet be made navigable for the sum mentioned in my Report, of 30th December last, of which £34,722 4 5 H. C., having been already raised by Debenture, only £51,297 16 8½ H. C., will now be required to be raised to attain this desirable object. But unless this sum be immediately procured for this purpose, and the work be pushed on with vigour, I cannot undertake to say what additional expense may be necessary, in consequence of the very great and serious injury, which the works must unavoidably sustain, if left in their present unfinished state; for, although the money which was granted during the past year has been expended with the understanding that the work would probably be suspended, and therefore with a view of securing it as much as possible, it is quite impracticable in a work of this kind, and of such magnitude, to preserve it altogether from injury, if left without being completed.

I am happy to have it in my power to inform you, that the Work on Section No. One, at the Long Sault, is now so far completed as to prove, most satisfactorily, that there is no reason whatever to doubt its stability. For a long distance, the Canal has been excavated to the full depth, which, in some parts, is nine feet below the surface of the River, and the Bank between it and the River stands as securely as that of any part of the Canal; it also effectually keeps out the water of the River, and therefore I see no reason to doubt its keeping in the water, when the Canal is filled.

In some places, where strata of sand occur, the water was found to filter a little through; but whenever this sand has been removed and replaced by puddle, (which has been effected without difficulty,) the water of the River appears to be kept out altogether.

On this Section 1,357,657 cubic yards have been excavated, and not more than 218,000 yards now remain to be done. The Contractors for the Sub-sections have all completed their work, and this part of the Canal is now in a very forward state. A strong Pier of stones will be required to be formed at the entrance of the Canal, and a coffer dam will also be required to enable the men to complete the excavation.

The present state of the other parts of the Canal is shewn at large in the following detail of work, now required to be performed to each Section, &c. before the Canal can be used.

On Section No. 2, the excavation is completed; a little embankment is required at the bottom, and the Berm requires to be cut out.

On Section No. 3, the excavation is completed; a portion of the embankment, which was formed in very soft ground across Brownell's Bay has settled, and it will require to be made level, which can be done without difficulty. The Berm also requires to be cut out.

On Section No. 4, the Berm requires to be cut out; a small portion of the embankment of this Section has slipped outwards, and it will require an expenditure of about £200 to secure it; some more stones also are required on the outside, in order to give additional security to this part of the work.

On Section No. 5, 123,127 cubic yards have been excavated, and only about 9,400 cubic yards are required to complete it. The Berm requires to be cut out and some puddling to be done.

On Section No. 6, 195,991 cubic yards have been excavated, and only 8,000 yards are now required to be done. The greatest part of the puddling has been completed.

The Board is aware that this is one of the most troublesome Sections on the whole line; but I hope the difficulties have been overcome.

On Section No. 7, the excavation is completed; the Berm requires to be cut out.

On Section No. 8, a small portion of the embankment, which was built across the mouth of a Creek, has settled, and it will require to be made level, which can easily be done. The Berm requires to be cut out, and some French drains are wanted.

On Sections No. 9 and 10, the excavation is completed, and very little is required to the embankment.

On Section No. 11, 104,436 cubic yards have been excavated, and not more than 1,300 yards require to be done; some French drains are also required here.

On Section No. 12, which was a very heavy Section, nothing is required. The embankment here, which is the highest and consequently the heaviest on the whole line of Canal, stands very well.

On Section No. 13, the excavation is completed, and a very small portion of embankment is required.

On Section No. 14, 42,122 cubic yards have been excavated, and not more than 2,300 yards require to be done.

On Section No. 15, a small portion of puddling is required.

On Section No. 16, 25,272 cubic yards have been excavated, and not more than 6,800 yards require to be done.

On Sections Nos. 17, 18 and 19, the excavation is completed, and little or nothing is required to be done.

On Section No. 20, 28,410 cubic yards have been excavated, and not more than 8,800 cubic yards require to be done.

On Section No. 21, 76,849 cubic yards have been excavated, and not more than 12,800 cubic yards require to be done.

On Section No. 22, the excavation is completed, and little or nothing is required to be done.

On Section No. 23, 64,226 cubic yards have been excavated, and not more than 3,800 yards are required to be done, and the Berm to be cut out.

On Section No. 24, 27,708 yards have been excavated, and not more than 350 yards are required to be done, and part of the Berm to be cut out.

On Section No. 25, 36,064 yards have been excavated, and not more than 1,800 yards are required to be done.

On Section No. 26, 22,962 yards have been excavated, and not more than 11,700 yards are required to be done.

On Section No. 27, 42,233 yards have been excavated, and not more than 900 yards are required to be done, besides 11,392 yards to be excavated below Lock No. 6, under water.

The Guard Lock has been kept more backward than any of the others, in consequence of the difficulty in keeping out the water before the excavation below was finished. About 2,300 yards of masonry are required to complete it, and some embankment in rear of the walls also passing at the foot of the Lock.

The Masonry of Lock No. 1 is completed, and the Gates are put up: a small portion of the embankment is required, and some paving will be necessary at the foot of the Lock to prevent the washing away of the bottom.

The Masonry of Lock No. 2 is completed; the anchors are let into the coping to receive the Gates. The Iron work for the Gates is nearly completed; the Wood work is not yet commenced. A small portion of the embankment is required, and paving at the foot of the Lock.

The Masonry of Lock No. 3 is completed; about 2,000 yards of embankment are required, and the paving at the foot of the Lock. The Iron work for the Gates is nearly ready; but the Wood work is not yet commenced.

The Masonry of Lock No. 4 is completed, and the Gates are put up: a very little embankment is required, and some paving at the foot of the Lock.

At Lock No. 5, 3,148 yards of Masonry have been built, and not more than 1,700 are required to complete it. The embankment also requires to be completed in rear of the walls, and the dam below the Lock to be removed. The Iron work for the Gates is nearly completed—the Wood work is not commenced.

At Lock No. 6, only ten yards of Masonry are required to complete it. The Iron work for the Gates is nearly finished; the Wood work is not commenced. Some expense will be required in pumping out this Lock before the Gates are put up.

The Road Culverts at Moulinette, Mill Roches, and Robinson's Creek are completed; the Road leading to the latter requires to be made, which can soon be effected at a small expense.

The Road Culvert at Cornwall is completed, but the Road leading to it is not yet made—some puddling also is required.

A small waste Weir will be required at Mill Roches.

To complete the above Works and render the Canal navigable and fit for use, the above-mentioned sum of £51,297 16s. 8½d. will, in my opinion, be sufficient, provided the work be done immediately. But, this, like all work of this kind, if left in its present very unfinished state, must suffer very materially by exposure to the changes of seasons in this climate, in a very short time; I cannot, therefore, too earnestly impress upon you the very great importance of its being finished as soon as possible. Upwards of £300,000 having been already expended upon this Canal, it can no longer be a matter of doubt whether this comparatively small sum shall now be laid out, in order to secure to the trade of these Provinces the very great advantage which this magnificent work is calculated to confer. It is true that, in order to give it a finished appearance, a further outlay, to a small extent, will, at some future period, be desirable; but this may be left until the Canal is in full operation, as it is not essential to its utility, though it cannot be said that the work will be permanently completed without it.

I have, &c.

(Signed,)

GEORGE PHILLPOTTS,

Major Royal Engineers.

P. S.—Besides the reasons above alluded to for proceeding immediately with the Canal, I may mention another, which is of much importance:

The Contractors for making the Lock Gates having nearly finished those for Locks Nos. 1 and 4, are at present prepared to go on with the others, and indeed they are most anxious to complete their contract as soon as possible; but if this work be now suspended, they will probably not return to it, in which case a very great extra expense will unavoidably be incurred in finishing them.

MINUTES,

Of the Meeting of the Board of Commissioners for Improving the Navigation of the River Saint Lawrence, 1838.

At a Meeting of the Commissioners, held at Cornwall on Wednesday the 21st March, 1838,

PRESENT :

HONOURABLE P. VANKOUGHNET, CHAIRMAN.

GEORGE LONGLEY,
PETER SHAVER,
JOHN McDONALD,
HIRAM NORTON, } ESQUIRES.

The Chairman submitted a copy of a letter, addressed to the Honourable Jonas Jones, by Mr. Secretary Joseph, intimating His Excellency's acceptance of the resignation of Mr. Jones of his Commissionership, and of the Presidency of that Board, which was read as follows:—

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
Toronto, 29th January, 1838.

SIR,

Having laid before His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor your letter of the 26th instant, resigning the Office of Commissioner for Superintending the Improvement of the Saint Lawrence, on the ground of your finding it impossible, consistently with the correct discharge of your judicial duties, longer to continue in that Office, I have the honour to acquaint you that, for the reasons you assign, His Excellency is pleased, though with extreme regret, to accept your resignation of that Office, and in doing so, he feels it his duty to bear testimony to the important services you have rendered to the Province during the period in which you have so ably and zealously superintended the progress of that undertaking.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient humble servant,

(Signed,)

J. JOSEPH,

Secretary.

Honourable JONAS JONES,

&c. &c. &c. Toronto.

Resolved unanimously—That having learned through the Chairman that the Honourable Mr. Justice Jones feeling it incompatible with the correct discharge of his judicial duties to devote, as heretofore, that attention to the interests of the Saint Lawrence improvements, which, as President of the Board, devolved upon him, had tendered his resignation to His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor, which His Excellency, for the reasons assigned by Mr. Jones, was induced with extreme reluctance to accept,—that the Board cannot permit this first opportunity afforded since the period of his resignation to pass, without recording their testimony to the importance of the services which Mr. Jones has rendered to the Works since their commencement, and their regret at the loss of his able assistance in the prosecution of them.

The Members of the Board individually acknowledge with pleasure their lively sense of the very able and efficient services of Mr. Jones as President, and his study to promote a kindly feeling among them; and they are confident there is no individual connected with the Canal who does not participate in the feeling of regret which his resignation has occasioned.

It now but remains for the Board to express their earnest desire that the future life of Mr. Jones, while devoted, as it doubtless will be, to the best interests of his country, may be blessed with that peace and satisfaction which spring from the consciousness of having done his duty.

Ordered—That the Secretary be directed to forward to Mr. Jones a copy of the foregoing Resolution.

The Chairman having been requested to address a letter to the Honourable John Hamilton, urging the necessity of his attendance at the stated meetings of that Board, the following letter was submitted by him and approved:—

*Office of the Commissioners for Improving the Navigation of the St. Lawrence,
CORNWALL, 21st March, 1838.*

SIR,

Your absence from the stated Meetings of the Board, for the last two years, (with one exception,) has elicited from the attending Members the expression of their regret at being deprived of your useful co-operation, and the heavy responsibility and importance of the business coming before the Board, from time to time, having rendered it essential that the attendance of Members be as complete as possible, I have been requested, as Chairman, to urge upon you the importance of a regular attendance, and to express a hope that nothing will prevent your doing so in future.

The next Meeting of the Board will take place on the 24th of April, at which business of very great importance will be brought before it, and it is therefore desirable that every Member of the Board should give his attendance.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient humble servant,

P. VANKOUGHNET,

CHAIRMAN.

Honourable JOHN HAMILTON,

&c. &c. &c., Queenston.

Ordered—That the Chairman be requested to take the necessary steps forthwith for procuring funds requisite for carrying on the Works on the Canal.

Ordered—That in consequence of the resignation of the Honourable Jonas Jones, the Chairman be requested, in the name of the Board, to recommend to His Excellency the appointment of Alexander McMartin, Esquire, to fill the vacancy.

The resident Engineer submitted a Report on the state and progress of the Works, which was read as follows:—

ST. LAWRENCE CANAL OFFICE,

Cornwall, 21st March, 1838.

GENTLEMEN:

I have the honour to report that since your last meeting every thing has gone on satisfactorily, and considering the season of the year, more work has been done on Section No. one than I could have expected, the Bank having been formed across Stewart's Bay and secured with stone; a good deal of excavation has also been performed on this Section and Sub-Section C.

The Contractors for Locks No. 3 and 5 and the Grand Lock, also for the Cornwall Culvert and Sewer appear to have made good use of the winter roads for bringing in stone. The bridge and embankment across Brownell's Bay are nearly completed.

At Section No. 6, that part of the Bank in which I proposed last year to place stone drains has shewn indications of slipping, and therefore those drains have been commenced.— In excavating for them, it has been found necessary to open more of the Bank than I expected, which make this a more tedious work than was anticipated.

I have the honour to be,

GENTLEMEN,

Your most obedient,

Humble Servant,

GEORGE PHILLPOTTS, C. R. E.

THE COMMISSIONERS,

For Improving the Navigation of the St. Lawrence.

The Secretary submitted the opinion of the Solicitor to the Board upon the claim of Mr. Solomon Chesley, which was read as follows:—

CORNWALL, 23rd December, 1837.

SIR,

In the case submitted by you to me in behalf of the Commissioners for the improvement of the Saint Lawrence, I am of opinion that the Commissioners are not liable at law to Mr. Chesley for any damages he may have sustained in consequence of the erection of the Canal Office on his premises in Cornwall.

1st. The Commissioners are not the assignees of the lease, they have merely purchased the building from Mr. Mills, who was an under lessee, and they had no privity of contract by that purchase from Mr. Mills.

2ndly. Admitting that the Commissioners held part of the demised premises by a sub-lease from the original lessee (Mirriam), they are not liable at law for any breach of covenant, inasmuch as they do not hold the whole of the lessee's interest. I have no doubt but that Mirriam, the original lessee, is liable to Mr. Chesley for damages, as the putting up of the building there (if done without his consent) is clearly a breach of the implied covenant contained in the lease, that the lessor, Mr. Chesley, and those claiming under him, should have free egress, &c. from the street to the well, by the way or passage as it was used at the time of the execution of the lease.

An action of Trespass could not be maintained by Mr. Chesley against any of the parties, nor could Mirriam maintain such a suit, as he authorised the erection of the building.

I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE S. JARVIS.

Ordered—That the Secretary intimate to Mr. Chesley that the claim for damages to his premises in the Town of Cornwall cannot be admitted.

Mr. James Groves submitted a claim for damages to his land occupied as a stone yard for Lock No. 2.

Ordered—That the claim of Mr. Groves be referred to the resident Engineer to report upon.

Elijah Burpee, and other inhabitants of the Village of Mille Roches, submitted claims for damages to their property, in consequence of the construction of the Saint Lawrence Canal.

Ordered—That the claim of Elijah Burpee, &c. remain for future consideration.

Mr. William Stewart submitted a claim of £100 for a house erected on Lot No. 7, at the head of Section No. 1.

Ordered—That the claim of Mr. Stewart remain for future consideration.

Messrs. D. and J. L. Wilkinson, contractor for the Lock Gates, submitted a claim for damages sustained by them, in consequence of detention by order of the resident Engineer.

Ordered—That the claim of Messrs. D. and J. L. Wilkinson be referred to the resident Engineer, to report thereon.

Messrs. Reid and Shepherd, contractors for Section No. 17, submitted sundry documents in reference to their claim for extra work, &c. on that Section.

Ordered—That the documents, submitted by Messrs. Reid and Shepherd, be handed to the resident Engineer for his report thereon.

At a Meeting of the Commissioners, held at Cornwall on the 30th April, and 1st and 2nd May. 1838:

PRESENT.

HONOURABLE P. VANKOUGHNET, CHAIRMAN.

“ JOHN HAMILTON,

GEORGE LONGLEY,
HIRAM NORTON,
PETER SHAVER,
JOHN McDONALD, } ESQUIRES.

The Minutes of the preceding Meeting were read.

The Accounts, Vouchers, &c. of the Secretary were examined and approved.

The Chairman submitted copies of correspondence in reference to funds for the prosecution of the works on the Canal, which were read as follows:—

Office of the Commissioners for Improving the Navigation of the River Saint Lawrence,

CORNWALL, 3rd April, 1838.

SIR,

Having been made acquainted by the Receiver General of Upper Canada, by letter, bearing date 24th ultimo, that he had been advised by the last arrival from London, by Messrs. Baring, Brothers & Co. that our Debentures are unsalable, and that those belonging to the Province, sent there for various public works, could not be realized, and consequently that the money which the Board had requested him to forward for the immediate purposes of the Canal could not be furnished by him, I have to request that you will acquaint me at your earliest convenience whether the Commercial Bank at Kingston would be willing to take any of the Debentures, which the Legislature at its last Session has authorised the Receiver General to negotiate for the completion of the Saint Lawrence Canal.

It is not to be wondered at, that Canada Stock should at the date of the Receiver General's letter of advice have been unsalable, when it is taken into consideration, the great alarm which the news of the Rebellion must have created on its first announcement in London; but from recent accounts sent home and the present sound and wholesome state of the country, there can be no doubt of Canada Stock being in a very short time sought after with very great anxiety.

Colonel Phillpotts, Resident and Superintending Engineer upon the Canal, will proceed in a few days to Toronto, for the purpose of laying the thing before the Governor in Council, in order that means may be devised to raise funds to prosecute the works upon the Canal, and on his way up he will make a point of calling upon the President of your Bank.

I have the honour to be,

Sir, &c.

P. VANKOUGHNET,

CHAIRMAN.

F. A. HARPER, Esq.,
Cashier Commercial Bank,
Kingston.

COMMERCIAL BANK, M. D.,
Kingston, 9th April, 1838.

SIR,

Your letter of the 3rd instant did not reach me in time to lay before the Board at its meeting on the 5th instant, but the subject was submitted this day, and I am directed to inform you that this Bank will advance the sum of Eight Thousand Pounds in our notes, on the Commissioners giving their promissory notes at ninety days date for the above sum, from which the discount will be taken as usual—the note to be renewed until the Government Debentures, to be placed in our hands for sale in London, are disposed of at the best rate to be obtained—the proceeds to be placed to the credit of the Commissioners at the current rate of exchange on the day when sold—less expenses of collection, &c.

It is to be understood that the amount of Debentures to be given to the Bank are for Ten Thousand Pounds sterling, payable in London.

Colonel Phillpotts is advised of this arrangement, and expect he will send or bring the Debentures by the William Fourth, on Monday, when all will be arranged, provided the Executive give their assent.

I remain, Sir,

Your most, &c.

F. A. HARPER,

CASHIER.

Honourable P. VANKOUGHNET,
Chairman of the Commissioners, &c.
Cornwall.

Office of the Commissioners for Improving the Navigation of the River Saint Lawrence,
CORNWALL, 2nd April, 1838.

SIR,

The Secretary of the Board, James Hume, Esquire, having put into my hands a letter from the Honourable John H. Dunn, Receiver General of Upper Canada, bearing date the 24th ult., in which he says, "the Legislature, at its last Session, passed a Law granting for the works of the Saint Lawrence the sum of Eighty Thousand Pounds, to be raised by Debenture, at the rate of five per cent. payable in London. By the last arrival from London, I am advised by Messrs. Baring, Brothers & Co., and from other sources, that our Debentures are unsalable, and those in their House belonging to the Province, sent there for various public works, could not be realized,—I therefore consider it quite impossible that by sending any more it would be productive of any good, on the contrary, evil. The Legislature have made no other provision. It is, therefore, with regret that I have to inform you that the money you have requested cannot be furnished to you." I have to request that you will, at your earliest convenience, proceed to Toronto, to lay the case before His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor in Council, in order that steps may be taken, with as little delay as possible, to devise means to raise funds to meet the debts at present due the contractors by the Commissioners, as well as to carry on the works to completion; for should their future progress be suspended for the want of funds, the losses which the Province would sustain by the natural decay of the Canal left in an unfinished state, together with the damages which contractors would be entitled to receive from being unable to prosecute their contracts, would be enormous; therefore, in my opinion, every exertion should be made to prevent an occurrence which would be so serious in its consequences.

I have, &c.

P. VANKOUGHNET,

CHAIRMAN.

Captain PHILLPOTTS,
Royal Engineers, &c. &c.

The Secretary submitted a letter received by him from the Honourable Mr. Justice Jones, which was read as follows:—

Toronto, 17th April, 1838.

MY DEAR SIR:

On my return from New York, I received your letter of the 24th ultimo, enclosing the unanimous Resolution of the Board of Commissioners for the improvement of the navigation of the Saint Lawrence, upon the subject of my resignation of the Office of President and a Commissioner of the Board.

Like the other Members of the Board, I endeavoured to discharge the Office I had assumed with zeal, and it gives me great satisfaction to learn that my conduct has met the approval of my fellow Commissioners.

For the kind terms in which you communicated the Resolution, accept my cordial thanks.

I am, my dear Sir, &c.

JONAS JONES.

JAMES HUME, Esquire.

The Board having proceeded to the election of a President in room of the Honourable Jonas Jones, Mr. Longley proposed that Mr. John McDonald be appointed to fill the vacancy, which was seconded by the Honourable John Hamilton, and carried unanimously.

The Honourable P. Vankoughnet having vacated the Chair, it was taken by Mr. McDonald, as President of the Board.

Resolved, That in the present state of the financial affairs of this Province, the necessary funds cannot be procured to proceed with the works upon the Canal, and that the Secretary be directed to give the notice required in the contracts, in order that the contractors may, for the present, suspend their operations.

A communication from the Contractors on the subject of the suspension of the works on the Canal, and the injurious consequences that would result therefrom, was submitted and read as follows:—

To the Commissioners for Improving the Navigation of the Saint Lawrence.

GENTLEMEN:

We, the undersigned, Contractors for the construction of the Saint Lawrence Canal, have learned with deep concern, that, in consequence of the financial difficulties which the late Rebellion has entailed upon the Province, a suspension of the works is deemed unavoidable.

Convinced as we are of the great desire which individually and collectively you entertain to promote the best interests of the Province, we feel that it is hardly necessary, on the present occasion, to intrude ourselves upon you, but the emergency of the case impel us to entreat that you will pause and deliberately consider before you resort to a measure fraught with such ruinous consequences to individual interests, and, what is of paramount importance, to the interest of the Province and its trade.

Our situation may be briefly described, but its consequences will be long felt by our families, and although we doubt not that the spirit of justice and liberality which dictates the decision of our Provincial Legislature, and feel an assurance that what will seem a fair remuneration for the losses we sustain will be afforded to us, yet we but too well know that no pecuniary return that we could, with a semblance of propriety, demand from the Province, can compensate us for the injuries we shall sustain, if the work be suspended in its present state.

The indefinite period to which a suspension may extend, precludes the possibility of any arrangement being made, with a reasonable hope of advantage, short of a total abandonment of our contracts, and now, with the necessary and very costly expense of preparation for the Spring work completed, we will be thrown (with our provisions, buildings, horses, implements,

&c. &c. on our hands) out of employment and forced to seek, in a foreign country and at a vast distance from where our interests and our affections are centered, the means of supporting our families in the pursuit of that calling which existing circumstances reluctantly bind us to.

Can this not be avoided? Must we resort to the western part of the United States to find a field for our industry, and take along with us those poor but faithful subjects of Our Queen, whose labour is the gold of Canada, and whose hearts are as true to the Constitution as their arms are able to defend it? And how must we go?—our means exhausted in the necessary preparations for a work, the magnitude of which will now prove our greatest evil. The expense of transportation would equal (or nearly so) the value of the materials, should we ever be able to retain them and defray that cost; but this is impossible, and if compelled to resort to the United States for work, we must do so with every disadvantage that poverty entails.

One other consideration (though perhaps it may be deemed of minor importance) we desire to urge. It is the painful, we may say mortifying reflection, that the difficulty of providing a few thousand pounds to carry on the works, has robbed us of those prideful feelings which we should have handed down to our posterity as the Contractors of a Canal, vieing with the world for its magnitude, its splendid workmanship, its unbounded utility, and its connexion with the noble Saint Lawrence.

Should any arrangement suggest itself to your deliberations, which might lead to the removal of the existing difficulties, were it even attended with loss and inconvenience to us, we are prepared cordially to meet your views, and, as far as practicable, co-operate with you in the accomplishment of an object in which the interest of all is so deeply concerned.

Confidently relying on your just appreciation of the facts we have stated, we beg leave respectfully to subscribe ourselves,

Your most obedient

Humble servants,

(Signed by the Contractors.)

CORNWALL, 1st May, 1838.

Resolved—That in compliance with the desire expressed by the Contractors in the foregoing address, to co-operate with the Board in the adoption of such measures as may be deemed advisable to counteract existing difficulties, and in view of the loss that will, in all probability, accrue to the Province from the discharge of the present and highly respectable and efficient Engineers, Contractors, &c. now employed, and the re-organization of the same at a future period, that promissory notes, not under three, nor over nine months date, signed by the President, and countersigned by the Secretary, bearing interest at six per cent., be issued for such sums as shall become due for work performed on the Canal, under the direction of the Resident Engineer.

NAY—MR. HAMILTON.

Several claims for damages, &c., in consequence of the construction of the Canal, having been submitted, it was—

Resolved—That the Engineer be requested to cause a survey of the land taken for the use of the Canal, to be made forthwith, and that Messrs. Norton and Shaver be a Committee to investigate said claims, and report thereon to the Board.

Resolved—That the claims for damages, submitted by the inhabitants of Mille Roches, cannot legally be entertained until after the completion of the Canal.

Ordered—That the claims submitted by Messrs. Caleb Truax, R. and P. McKay, Reid and Shepherd, and Isaac Hardy, be referred to the Resident Engineer to report thereon.

The Resident Engineer submitted a Report upon the documents laid before the Board, at its last session, by Messrs. Reid and Shepherd, in reference to Section No. 17, which was read as follows:—

ST. LAWRENCE CANAL OFFICE,
Cornwall, 4th April, 1838.

SIR,

With reference to Mr. Fleming's Report on Section No. 17, to Messrs. Reid and Shepherd, which, though dated on the 24th October last, was not laid before the Board until your last meeting in March, I have the honour to state that before he commenced the measurement and calculations of this Section, I caused the plans, &c. of this part of the Canal, together with the book of levels upon which our calculations were based, to be shewn to him, and permitted him to take such copies of them as he thought proper. The plan he has alluded to as being defective 140 feet in length of the Section, was not made for any purpose of calculation, but merely to shew the alteration of Canal, on this Section, from a curve to a straight line. He was distinctly told that all the calculations were made from the book of levels in the office, where the distances are all accurately laid down, and he was also told that he might proceed with his survey and calculations below station 455 without difficulty; but that above this station he could not go without an explanation on the ground, which was promised to him whenever he requested it. Notwithstanding this caution, he began above station 455, without further application to this office, and having done so, he had no reason whatever to complain as he has done, that he could not proceed without explanation, which was immediately afforded to him when he applied for it; the Section having been measured in his presence, on the original line, which was laid out for this purpose, when all the distances were found to correspond with the book, within about three feet in a length of 2,616 feet, on which he expressed his surprise that it should have agreed so nearly with the original measurement; for, owing to the difficulty of laying out the old line, which was a curve, it would not have been at all extraordinary if the difference had been greater now that the Canal has been executed on the new line.

With respect to the distances expressed as multipliers of the respective Cross Sections, on which he says he found a difference of 50 feet, it appears from reference to the book of levels, from which he was informed that the calculations were made that there was no such error.

The Cross Section at No. 454 is the one here alluded to, and it is one of those on which he was requested not to commence working without further explanation. Since the alteration of this line, all the distances have been actually noted in the book of levels, and therefore they have not been corrected in the Cross Sections, which were all drawn when the Canal was first laid out; but the moment Mr. Fleming pointed out the discrepancy he has alluded to, in the Cross Section, he was referred to the distances in the book of levels, and expressed himself satisfied with their correctness. For the alleged error, therefore, of 50 feet on this old plan of Cross Sections, there was no cause whatever for the remark he has made. It was not given as his sole guide for forming an estimate of this Section, which could only be correctly done by referring to the book of levels, and this has always been kept with great care and accuracy. From this book it was quite possible for him to have proceeded without making any survey whatever, and therefore my object, in proposing a mutual survey of the ground, was not (as might be inferred from Mr. Fleming's Report) to remedy any incorrectness in those plans, but merely to afford him an opportunity of seeing whether our levels (the correctness of which has been repeatedly called in question by the Contractors) had been accurately taken, and I subsequently understood from Mr. Fleming that the result of this survey was such as to satisfy him completely on this head.

It will, no doubt, be remembered by the Board, that in order to try the correctness of our levels, the Contractors sunk several shafts last year in different parts of this Section, and that all of those which we were permitted to investigate fairly (at some of which you were present) proved that our levels were correct. The Board will also remember that when the Contractors proposed to send for Mr. Fleming, it was chiefly with reference to the alleged incorrectness of these levels,—it was fully understood by all parties that all new shafts were to be submitted to my inspection, and that in fact every examination of the Section by Mr. Fleming was to be made openly, with a view to my having an opportunity of reporting fully on the subject. Shortly after his arrival, one shaft was sunk at station 457, in order to prove that the levels there were incorrect, as constantly stated by Mr. Bowron, the Sub-Contractor; I had an opportunity of attending this shaft with Mr. Fleming, and the result was such as to convince me fully that the original levels were quite correct, and I understood that he was quite satisfied on that head. No further attempt was made, as far as I know, to try these levels, but a number of shafts were afterwards sunk by Mr. Fleming, without my having any opportunity of knowing the result.

When he had informed me that he had made up his calculations of the quantity of work in the Sections, I proposed that he should bring them to this office, in order that we might see whether they differed in any way from ours; he did so; and on comparing his quantities of excavation and embankment, and indeed of the work done on the whole Section with ours, he admitted that the amount, which he made to be due the Contractors, did not vary more than £58 from that which we had allowed them in our estimate; but although this was a very trifling difference in so large a work, I felt so confident of the correctness of our estimate, that I refused to allow any alteration in it, unless he could point out an error in our calculations, and I proposed that we should go through the whole with him if he were not satisfied. This, however, he thought proper to decline, saying that he should advise the Contractors to give it up, as the difference was trifling that he did not think it worth any further trouble. He accordingly went to them from the office to say so, and he certainly gave us to understand that he had no fault whatever to find with our estimate. As you happened fortunately to be present on that occasion by my request, I appeal to you, whether you did not so understand him. And this is further corroborated by the fact of Mr. Reid, one of the Contractors, having afterwards accompanied Mr. Fleming to the office, where the case was stated to him by Mr. Fleming, who asked Mr. Reid if he would send him to examine the calculations, but he answered that £58, in so large a sum, was not worth saying more about, and added that they had been misled by the Sub-Contractor, Mr. Bowron, into all this unnecessary expense and trouble, he having made them believe that a great mistake had been made on this Section to their disadvantage, and concluded by saying that he was himself quite satisfied on the subject, and that if Mr. Shepherd, his partner, was of the same opinion they would give it up.

I have therefore been much astonished, after all this, to see by his Report, that Mr. Fleming has made out an estimate of the work done on this Section, shewing an amount due to these Contractors of £673 8s. 8½d. more than ours.

This has been done by setting up a number of claims, not one of which was urged on that occasion, and all of which are unavoidable; but before I report upon them separately, I feel it proper to call your attention to this very unfair mode of proceeding, because if he had mentioned these several grounds of claim when he was here, I should have had an opportunity of discussing them with him on the spot, and of shewing that some of them are altogether erroneous, and that the others have already been allowed, as will appear when I come to remark upon them.

Mr. Fleming states that the difference between our results and his, in regard to the quantities, seems to have arisen from our having adopted the distances upon a curved line instead of a straight one, which is not correct. The part of the Section to which he alludes, was originally a continued curve from station 443 to 456, and therefore the excavation on the old line was, of course, measured and paid for as on a curve; but the line having been thrown back, this part is now nearly all of it straight, and therefore the distances between the stations have been shortened in consequence, for which Mr. Fleming seems, by his own admission, to have made no allowance, for I understood him to say that he has taken the distances as they were originally measured on the curve, while we, in order to calculate the work on the new line, have measured them on the chord of that curve.

Although the quantities he has given in his report are all that he could make out of the Section by calculation, he says that he does not consider that these quantities compose all that is due to the Contractors, but that allowances should be made for shrinkage, sinkage, and a want of sufficient dimensions given to ascertain the true quantity at present contained in the embankment.

With regard to the first of these, shrinkage, which Mr. Fleming has justly said takes place in a greater or less degree in different soils, the exact proportion cannot be easily ascertained, and therefore it becomes, in most cases, a matter of opinion merely as to how much ought to be allowed on this account. Mr. Fleming assumes that ten per cent. is an equitable allowance on this Section. I differ from him, because we have found from a measurement and calculation of the excavation and embankment of this Section, that an allowance of a little more than seven per cent. will cover all loss sustained by the Contractors on this head as well as any others: we have allowed eight per cent. in their estimate, which therefore is, in my opinion, an ample remuneration. It is true that, in the latter part of his report, Mr. Fleming has found it convenient to object to the principle on which that calculation has been made, though he said nothing about it when he was here, when it was in his power to have examined it minutely, or he might have made a measurement of the whole Section himself, if he had thought proper, which would have enabled him to ascertain correctly how much should be allowed for these contingencies instead of having recourse to suppositions.

With regard to the sinkage which he assumes to be due the Contractors, because the bank was, as he alleges, built on a soft bottom, Mr. Fleming very properly says that when this is not provided for in the first levels, a proper allowance becomes due; or he, however, admits in his report that the difficulty arising from the frequent rains prevented him "from making a regular mode of estimation of this allowance," and then without enquiring whether it was provided for when the first levels were taken, he assumes a mere conjecture "that four inches depth for compression of surface would be a moderate allowance."

Now, on referring to this part of his report to Mr. Samuel Keefer, who took these first levels, I find that a proper allowance was made originally on this account, and therefore I cannot admit the justice of this claim. Had Mr. Fleming given me the slightest notice that he intended to bring it forward, which he ought in common candour to have done, I could have proved to him by two or three persons now here, who assisted in taking these levels, that the rod used on this occasion, the bottom of which is shod with iron, was always forced down into the soft ground before the level was marked in the field book, and I feel quite satisfied therefore that the bank has not sunk lower than these levels, and consequently that no allowance for sinkage is due the Contractors. I am confirmed in this opinion by the examination of the shafts above alluded to, from which it appears that the bank has not settled below our levels. I enclose herewith an extract from Mr. Samuel Keefer's report on this subject, which shews plainly that every care was taken to do justice to the Contractors when the levels were taken.

Mr. Fleming next takes into consideration the effects of the River Saint Lawrence, and also the loss from ice and rains, which have caused many slips, the amount of which, under the head of wastage, he estimates at 3,000 cubic yards. Here, again, I should be disposed to agree with Mr. Fleming, that an allowance was due on account of the slips which have taken place on this Section; but, as I have already observed, that in the calculation of the whole excavation and embankment,  $7\frac{1}{6}\%$  per cent. was found to cover the difference, the allowance of 8 per cent., which we have made on the whole for shrinkage and wastage is, in my opinion, quite sufficient.

The want of sufficient dimensions is the next item for which Mr. Fleming claims an allowance, which he says arises from the Cross Sections having been taken at too great a distance from each other. In remarking upon this subject he has thought proper to charge the persons who made the original surveys of "very culpable neglect or inadvertency," on this account.

Now, as I did not happen to be here when the levels were taken, I am of course no way responsible for any omissions which may have been made in this respect; but when I look at the very great care and accuracy with which that important duty appears, in all cases, to have been performed, (for I think the book of levels, &c. in this office will bear a comparison with that of any other public work on this continent,) I feel it my duty to step forward in defence of those whom Mr. Fleming has thus unfairly attacked, and to shew that his remarks are altogether undeserved. In the case given by him as an illustration of this want of sufficient dimensions, Mr. Fleming has acted most unfairly; for if, as he states, he found this to be the fact, why did he not point it out in your presence, when he admitted our estimate to be within £58 of his own?—or why did he not give us an opportunity of being present when he took the soundings? which he must have taken before he could have drawn the Section he has given in his report, which Section, according to the survey of this part of the River, made by Mr. George Keefer and Mr. McDonald, is not at all correct.

The cavity or hollow which he alludes to at station 458, is that formed by the old bed of the creek, which passes by Colonel Anderson's house, and, like all other cavities of the kind, it increases in breadth rather than diminishes as it advances into the River. In taking the measurement last summer, for the purpose of making the calculations of this Section, Mr.

George Keefer and Mr. McDonald measured this cavity with great care, by taking soundings as near to the bank as possible, and they found it less than eighty feet wide at the top; they found also that the bed of the River, both above and below this cavity, was nearly uniform. The deepest soundings found by Mr. George Keefer was 16,76 feet at station 459, and from the mode in which the calculations have been made, this depth has been allowed to the Contractors to the distance of 50 feet above and below this station, which is, in point of fact, 10 feet each way farther than they were entitled to. This extra quantity I have shewn in the annexed sketch, by a blue shade, by which you will perceive that the Contractors have been the gainers in this instance.

Mr. Fleming is not correct in saying that our cross sections have been taken almost uniformly at 100 feet distance, without regard to the form or surface of the ground. It is true, that this has been generally assumed along the whole line of the Canal, at the distance between the several stations, but intermediate cross sections have invariably been taken, wherever the nature of the ground seemed to require them, and on referring to No. 17, on which 28 cross sections have been taken, I find that 10 of them are at much shorter distances than 100 feet, some of them being within 36 feet of each other, and none of them more than 66 feet apart.

It is very easy for Mr. Fleming to make a general charge of this nature, in his report, but when I see throughout the whole length of the Canal, that every possible care appears to have been taken to do justice to all parties in making these measurements and cross sections, I cannot for one moment admit that there is the slightest ground for this claim, which Mr. Fleming took care not to mention to me when he was on the spot, and when it might have been in some measure investigated; I am therefore of opinion that his observations on this head are not entitled to any further consideration.

Mr. Fleming adds that he is obliged to make another remark on the mode of measurement practised on this Canal, "which," he says, "is a defect in principle"; as far as I can understand his meaning in what he has advanced on this subject, I believe him to assert that when the centre line of the Canal is in a curve, the cross sections should be taken in a direction parallel to each other, and perpendicular to a line joining the extremities of that curve, or in other words, (as all our curves are circular arcs,) that the cross sections, instead of being taken in the direction of the radius of the circle, or perpendicular to the arch, should be all perpendicular to the chord of that arch. This, he truly says, is a subject of very elementary consideration in geometry, a very slight knowledge of which branch of science will shew the absurdity of this assertion. By inspecting the annexed figure, it will be clearly seen that if the sections are taken on a curve, and the cross sections laid off parallel to each other, the perpendicular distances between them, which is of course the only distance that can be taken into account in the calculation, will vary at every station, according as the sections become more and more oblique to the curve, and for the same reasons the cross sections will be prolonged and distorted to such a degree as to render it difficult to make even an approximation to the correct quantity, while the plan which we have adopted of taking the cross sections perpendicular to the curve is mathematically correct, as it gives a series of regular figures which are easily calculated by the common rules of mensuration.

In his remarks on this subject, Mr. Fleming observes that this mode of taking "the cross sections perpendicularly to a curved line, produces a series of solid figures, the measurement or given dimensions of which are inapplicable to find a correct result, as neither affording a mean measure nor compensation in the calculation, and therefore quite inadmissible as an approximating rule, and in which multiplicity of dimensions would not amend." I infer from this remark that he is not aware of what is commonly called the Guldin property of the centre of gravity, which is particularly described in Wherwell's Mechanics, vol 1. page 111 and 112, who says, that its application is also sometimes called the Centrobaryc method, and that it answers the purpose of measuring figures of revolution of a similar nature to those formed by the circular parts of this Canal. It is contained in the following theorem:—

"If any figure in a plane revolve about any axis in the plane, the contents of the solid generated by this figure in its revolution is equal to a prism whose base is the revolving plane figure, and its height the length of the path described by the centre of gravity of the plane figure." He adds that the figure may either be composed of straight lines or of curves, or of a combination of the two, and that the revolution may be either through a whole circumference or any part of it. Hence we may find the contents of these solid figures of revolution whenever we find the area of the revolving figure or cross section and its centre of gravity.

Now this is precisely the system on which the curved parts of this Canal are measured, the area of the cross sections or revolving figures being accurately calculated and multiplied by the length of the path described by the centre of gravity of the plane formed by the cross sections, and it is generally admitted that this mode of measuring solids of this description, will give a result more nearly approximating to truth than any other that can be adopted.

With reference, therefore, to the claims set up for shrinkage, sinkage, wastage, and a want of sufficient dimensions, I cannot allow that Mr. Fleming has established any of them, and therefore the addition of 18,438 yards to the estimate, which he has assumed to be due to the Contractors on this head, cannot be admitted.

The next subject of remark in his report, refers to the quantity of embankment from excavation due to the Contractors, which he makes to amount to 7,533 yards more than we have allowed in our estimate, the greater part of which is on account of a portion of the excavation of lock-pit, No. 2, amounting to 6,096 yards, which was allowed to be carried to the embankment of section No. 17, but as the Contractors received 9d. a yard for this embankment over and above the contract price of 11d. for excavating the lock pit, it was considered last year, when the claim was before preferred, that they have been amply paid for it. Had Mr. Fleming spoke to me on the subject as he ought to have done before he admitted it into his report, I should have been able to convince him that it has already been paid for.

With reference to the quantity of embankment from excavation in this section, Mr. Fleming says, "that in order to make this estimate perfectly intelligible as a matter of calculation," he has annexed a comparative statement or table by which the quantity of embankment, under or above excavation, is seen on each section by inspection, and also what part of the excavation has been carried over 350 feet, which he has returned as embankment from excavation. In examining this table, which he professes to have made in order to shew the accuracy of his calculations, I have been surprised to find that Mr. Fleming has fallen into an extraordinary error, which, for a person who has thought proper to charge the Engineers who made the original survey of the Canal, without any cause, "of culpable neglect or inadvertency," is inexcusable.

It appears clearly that, in taking the difference between the quantity of excavation and the quantity of embankment, in order to ascertain how much is due to the Contractors for embankment from excavation, he has omitted to deduct from the excavation ten per cent., which he asserts to be the difference between the earth when excavated and when it has been placed in the banks, in consequence of which he has given 18,844 yards as the quantity due to the Contractors instead of 12,892, as it ought to have been, if he had calculated it correctly. I subjoin a copy of his table, in which I have shewn his errors by alteration in red ink, for your information.

I cannot suppose for one moment, that Mr. Fleming has done this intentionally, for the purpose of substantiating the charge which the Contractors have made against the correctness of our estimates; but I must say that before he had led them to expect that he had discovered errors in our calculations, he ought to have been particularly careful not to fall into such an egregious mistake as this. If he had calculated correctly, Mr. Fleming would have made the quantity of embankment for excavation, 12,892 yards: we have allowed 17,207 in our estimate—because we have calculated the shrinkage at 8 per cent. instead of 10 per cent. which he has assumed as the proper deduction or allowance for shrinkage.

On a review of the whole subject therefore, I feel fully justified in stating that, in my opinion, Mr. Fleming has failed altogether in proving any error in our estimate; and that the Contractors have no reason whatever for complaint respecting it.

In concluding his report, Mr. Fleming makes some remarks on a plan in this Office, which was made in July last, and which he says "appears as made purposely to show the dimensions of extra cutting on the north side of the Canal, which was taken to complete the embankment." He says that "on examining this plan, he found it entirely exceptional to this purpose, as far as ascertaining the content of excavation." Here again I am obliged to remark the want of candour, in not making any remarks of this kind to you or to me, when he told us that he found an estimate to correspond so nearly with his own; had he done so, I could have proved to him that this part of the excavation, like all the rest, was calculated from the Book of Levels, and the cross sections taken originally, which were extended northerly, as required: and that the plan in question, though quite correct, was not used for the purpose, it having been drawn merely to show the manner in which those cross sections had been taken, and the manner in which the calculation of the excavation has been made from them.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient Servant,

GEORGE PHILLPOTTS, C. R. E.

Honourable P. VANKOUGHNET,
Chairman, &c.

Ordered—That Messrs. Reid & Shepherd, Contractors for Section No. 17, be permitted to take a copy of the foregoing report.

The claim submitted by Messrs. D. and J. L. Wilkinson, Contractors for the Lock Gates, for damage sustained by detention, by order of the Resident Engineer, &c. being reconsidered, it was

Resolved, That the principal of the claim of Messrs. D. and J. L. Wilkinson, for damages sustained by them as superintendents, in consequence of detention, is admitted as equitable and will be adjusted by the Board accordingly, and that their claim for damages in consequence of the advance on Iron, be deferred for future consideration.

Resolved, That the sum of one thousand pounds be advanced to Messrs. D. and J. L. Wilkinson on account of work to be performed on their contract, and of the claim submitted for damages in consequence of detention, said claim to be finally adjusted after the completion of the work.

MR. VANKOUGHNET moved that it be Resolved, That a deputation be appointed to proceed forthwith to Lower Canada, to wait upon His Excellency the Administrator of that Province in Special Council assembled, for the purpose of calling the attention of His Excellency to the importance of immediately taking steps towards commencing the improvement of the St. Lawrence, in Lower Canada, upon a scale corresponding with that in this Province; representing that the large sum already expended thereupon; the advanced state of the work, and the probability of its being carried to completion next season; that the work was commenced by the Legislature of this Province, in full confidence that the Legislature in the Lower would, as frequently declared by many of its leading members, co-operate in this grand undertaking; that unless provision is made for proceeding with the improvement in that Province, the heavy expenditure incurred in this, will in a great measure be lost, and the advantages which were anticipated by both Provinces never realized.

MR. NORTON moved, in amendment, that the words, "a deputation be appointed to proceed forthwith to Lower Canada to wait upon His Excellency, &c." be expunged, and the following inserted, viz.:—a memorial of the Board be transmitted forthwith to His Excellency, &c., be inserted in place thereof, which was carried.

YEAS—MESSIEURS,

The original motion being put was lost.

YEAS—MR. VANKOUGHNET.

NAYS—MESSIEURS,

SHAVER,

LONGLEY,
McDONALD,

Mr. VANKOUGHNET moved that it be Resolved, that the Honourable John Hamilton, one of the members of this Board, having attended in his place but twice, including the present meeting, within the last year; and that at the present meeting matters of great and weighty importance have been brought before it, which had been laying over for several Boards for consideration and decision, for the want of a full attendance of members; and although the Board had been in session two days, much of the most important business has not yet received consideration and decision, it was therefore all important that all the members in session should have continued until an adjournment of the Board would be agreed upon; but Mr. Hamilton having withdrawn before such adjournment, leaving a great part of the important business for the decision of only five members—the President be directed to acquaint Mr. Hamilton that, unless he can make it convenient to give a more regular attendance than he has done, that he will resign his situation, in order that some person may be appointed to fill his place, who will be more punctual in attending to the duties which the Legislature require of him, and share the responsibility with the attending Commissioners.—Which was lost.

YEAS—MR. VANKOUGHNET.

NAYS—MESSIEURS,

McDONALD,
SHAVER,

LONGLEY,
NORTON.

Resolved—That the President be requested forthwith to communicate with the President and Directors of the Chartered Banks in Upper Canada, on the subject of funds for the use of the Canal, and to offer to those Institutions for discount, the joint notes of the Commissioners, at three months date, for £10,000, with an understanding that such notes shall be renewed when due, if necessary, for a like period.

The Resident Engineer submitted a report on the subject of his mission to Toronto, by desire of the Chairman, which was read as follows:—

ST. LAWRENCE CANAL OFFICE,
Cornwall, 30th April, 1838.

SIR,

In compliance with the directions contained in your letter of the 3rd instant, I proceeded by the first steam boat to Toronto, where I immediately waited on the Honourable Jonas Jones, who accompanied me to His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor, who lost no time in laying the matter before the Executive Council, and after minutely examining the Reports and Estimates of last year, they came to a decision which has been made known to you by their minutes of 17th instant, to order the Receiver General to offer debentures to the amount of £10,000, to the different Banks, for the service of this Canal, which sum is directed to be expended in paying off all debts, and in putting every thing in as good a state as possible preparatory to a suspension of the work.

With reference to this minute of Council, I have the honour to inform you, that the sum of £5,000 will be necessary in order to pay off all debts to the end of this month, and that the sum of £4,000 is imperatively required for performing the services mentioned in the enclosed statement, which I consider indispensable to the security and well being of the work, under present circumstances, as the expenditure of this sum, during this year, will save the work from material injury, and put it in a state for resuming it next year, without much additional expense, as far as regards any damage which the work is likely to sustain; but if no more work be performed to the Canal this year, the Contractors, who have made large preparations for going on with their contracts, will sustain very heavy losses, and if they should consequently go away and leave their contracts to be completed by other persons, a very serious additional expense will be incurred, as it will not be possible for strangers to undertake their work, without incurring a large extra expense in making preparations, &c. which the present Contractors have already done.

It will be very desirable to take the opportunity, if the work be suspended, of trying the banks of the Canal, by letting water into those parts which are excavated, and of thus finding out any imperfections that may exist in them.

This will be indispensably necessary before the Canal can, with safety, be filled for use, and therefore I have drawn up a statement, shewing the amount required for this purpose, which will be above £2,500, as some parts of the banks must necessarily be completed before this trial can be made; but I feel it my duty to urge its being done on every account, as the security of the banks hereafter will very much depend upon their being properly and carefully tried in the first instance.

I have the honour to be,

SIR,

Your most obedient

Humble Servant,

GEORGE PHILLPOTTS, C. R. E.

Honourable P. VANKOUGHNET,

*St. Lawrence Canal Office,
Cornwall, 30th April, 1838.*

At a meeting of the Commissioners, held at Cornwall, on the 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th July, 1838.

PRESENT:

JOHN McDONALD, ESQUIRE, President.

HONOURABLE JOHN HAMILTON,

“ P. VANKOUGHNET.

HIRAM NORTON, }
PETER SHAVER, } ESQUIRES.

The accounts and vouchers, &c. of the Secretary, were examined and approved.

IN COUNCIL, April 17th, 1838.

It is Ordered, by His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor in Council, that the Receiver General be authorised to offer for sale, in this Province, Debentures to the amount of £10,000, payable in London, for the service of the St. Lawrence Canal.

And it is further Ordered, that the Commissioners of the St. Lawrence Canal be informed, that in the present state of the London money market, and of the Provincial finance, the Government cannot hold out to the Commissioners a prospect of their being enabled, during this season, to continue expenditure to a greater extent than the sum above-mentioned.

And it is further Ordered, that the Commissioners be instructed so to manage the expenditure of the said sum of £10,000, as to pay, in the first place, all arrears due to Contractors and workmen; and, secondly, to place the work in such a state as to admit of the suspension of operations thereupon, with the least possible damage or public disadvantage, but it is to be distinctly understood that no further advances of money can be made.

And it is further Ordered, that the offer of the President of the Commercial Bank, which the Council understand to be a proposition to advance £8,000, on a pledge or deposit of debentures to be sold by the Bank on account of the Provincial Treasury, be declined, as the law does not authorise the hypothecation of the Provincial securities, on the sale of debentures, except by the Receiver General, with the assent of the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

(Signed) JOHN BEIKIE,
Clerk, Executive Council.

The Honourable
P. VANKOUGHNET,
Chairman to the Commissioners of the Saint Lawrence Canal.

The President submitted a communication from the Civil Secretary, enclosing a Copy of a Minute in Council, on the subject of further advances for the use of the Saint Lawrence Canal improvement, which was read as follows:—

“COPY of a Report of the Executive Council, approved by His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor, on the application of the Directors of the Saint Lawrence Canal, for further advances.

“IN COUNCIL, 27th June, 1838.

“The Executive Council having had under consideration the application, on the part of the Directors of the Saint Lawrence Canal, for further advances, and their statements of loss and damage which would accrue were the work stopped at this time.

“The Executive Council considering the state of the Provincial finances, and the disadvantageous terms upon which only money can be raised, as well as the probable difficulty which may be found in meeting the payment of interest, most reluctantly consent to advise Your Excellency, that the Receiver General be authorised to negotiate Provincial debentures to the amount of Twenty Thousand Pounds, for this service, payable in London at the best rate, not however under par in this Province.

“The Executive Council humbly recommend to Your Excellency, to enjoin strictly that this money shall be expended with a view of placing the affairs of the Canal in a state for the suspension of the work, at least until a more favourable period, and so as to prevent a recurrence of any further demand, under the present circumstances:

“The Council beg respectfully to refer to the Minutes of the 17th April last upon this subject, in which the following passage occurs, which was duly forwarded to the Commissioners.

“And it is further Ordered, that the Commissioners be instructed so to manage the expenditure of the said sum of £10,000 as to pay, in the first place, all arrears due to Contractors and workmen; and, secondly, to place the work in such a state as to admit of the suspension of operations thereupon, with the least possible damage or public disadvantage, but it is decidedly to be understood that no further advances of money can be made.

“The Council are by no means of opinion that it was wise or judicious to press the continuance of this work, so far as it has gone, under unfavourable temporary circumstances occurring during its prosecution, and nothing would induce them to recommend any further advances, at this time, but the positive assurances of ruinous losses which would accrue to the Government from the withholding the means of continuing the work some time longer.”

(Signed,) JOHN BEIKIE,
Clerk, Executive Council.

The Resident Engineer submitted a Report (in reference to the foregoing Minute of Council) on the state of the works, with a detailed statement of extra work required to be performed to effect the security of the Canal, which was read as follows:—

GEORGE PHILLPOTTS, C. R. E.

Canal Office,
10th July, 1838.

The President submitted a copy of the address which was forwarded to His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Lower Canada, on the subject of the improvement of the Saint Lawrence, in that Province, in conformity with the resolution of the Board at its last session, and the reply thereto, which was read as follows:—

To His Excellency SIR JOHN COLBORNE, Baronet, &c. &c. &c., Administrator of the Government, of Lower Canadian Council.

The Commissioners for improving the navigation of the River Saint Lawrence, desire—

RESPECTFULLY TO PRESENT:

That in full confidence in the assurances frequently obtained from the leading Members of the House of Assembly of Lower Canada, that the improvement of the Saint Lawrence, on a commensurate scale with that contemplated in Upper Canada, would be undertaken and carried to completion, so as to perfect the object desired, the Legislature of this Province was induced to authorise the appropriation of £430,000 for the improvement of the River within the limits of the Province, and a Canal of the requisite dimensions for opening a ship communication between the Atlantic and Lake Huron has been undertaken, and is now in a state of forwardness approaching nearly to completion.

That the chief object for which this improvement has been undertaken upon so large a scale, embrace advantages which must result to both Provinces, and as respects their agriculture and commerce, as well as facilities to emigrants in affording the means of access to their destinations from Quebec, exempted from the fatigue and expense of trans-shipment, but unless carried through on a similar scale in Lower Canada, those objects will, in a great measure, be sacrificed, and a vast expense will have been unnecessarily incurred.

That not only does the magnitude of the sum expended, render it important that a speedy application of the Canal to its intended purposes shall afford a remuneration for the outlay, but what is of much greater importance, the increasing population and extending trade of the Provinces, call for the utmost facilities that can be afforded to those paramount objects, and of these facilities none can take precedence of a communication which throws open a channel of access from the seaports to the shores of Lake Huron, and invites the industry, the capital, and the commercial spirit of Europeans, to the ample field which our Provinces afford for their exercise.

It is evident, that so long as the improvement of the Saint Lawrence in Lower Canada, upon a scale assimilated to that in progress in this Province, is incomplete, so long must those advantages be withheld, and the return for the heavy expenditure incurred be materially diminished.

Under all these circumstances, and in view of the important change in the political aspect of the Provinces, and the more confirmed assurances of a perpetuation to the connexion with Great Britain, the Commissioners feel assured that Your Excellency and the Honourable Council, will appreciate the necessity of an immediate attention to this important subject, and that measures will be taken to perfect, with as little delay as possible, an improvement so replete with advantages to both Upper and Lower Canada.

JOHN McDONALD,
PRESIDENT, &c.

CORNWALL, 3rd May, 1838.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
Montreal, 8th May, 1838.

GENTLEMEN:

Having submitted to the Administrator of the Government, the memorial which accompanied your Secretary's letter of the 5th instant, on the subject of the improvement of the navigation of the River Saint Lawrence, I have been directed by His Excellency to acquaint you, in reply, that the Session of the Special Council having terminated, your representation will be reserved for the consideration of the Earl of Durham.

I have the honour to be,
GENTLEMEN,
Your most obedient
Humble Servant,

WILLIAM ROWAN,
CIVIL SECRETARY.

TO THE COMMISSIONERS,
&c. &c. &c.

Messrs. Norton and Shaver (a Committee appointed by the Board at its last session to investigate claims for damages to property, &c. on the line of the Canal) submitted their report, which was read as follows:—

CORNWALL, 10th July, 1838.

GENTLEMEN:

Your Committee, appointed to investigate and report upon certain claims referred to them by a resolution of the Board at its last session, beg leave to report:—

That in pursuing their investigations, they have met with embarrassments, arising from the very exorbitant demands made by individuals claiming damages, the great difficulty of getting disinterested arbitrators to act, the numerous cases which must, in all probability, be decided by arbitration, and the great importance of some of the claims.

Your Committee beg to recommend, therefore, that your Board should adopt a Report, recommending to the Legislature, at its next session, the passing of an Act appointing special Commissioners to settle all claims on the line of Canal for damages done to land and buildings.

(Signed,)

HIRAM NORTON,
PETER SHAVER.

Resolved—That the recommendation, contained in the foregoing report, be embodied in an application to the Legislature at its next session.

The Resident Engineer submitted a report upon the claim of Messrs. R. and N. McKay, Contractors for lock No. 4, referred to him.

SAINT LAWRENCE CANAL OFFICE,
Cornwall, 26th May, 1838.

SIR,

With reference to Messrs. R. and N. McKay's claim for extra work on lock No. 4, I have the honour to report as follows:—

The moving of the site and all the expenses connected therewith, appears to have been fully reported on by Mr. Mills, in his report of 28th May, 1836, to which I beg leave to refer you. The Contractors received £235 16s. 8d. at that time as a settlement of this claim.

The claim of £45 for a pile engine, might possible have been taken into consideration, if Messrs. McKays had procured one and delivered it here in good order. The alleged purchase of Mr. Hardy's, after he had done with it, and the circumstance of its being still at lock No. 1, and in a very bad state of repair, does not, in my opinion, constitute a fair ground of claim.

For wastage on planks, an allowance has already been made in the estimate by Mr. Mills.

Five of the extra items of the masonry were included in the payment of 17s. 6d. a yard, as allowed by a resolution of the Board, dated 12th September last.

The extra work in sinking the coping was caused by their own mistake.

The Carpenter work, in spiking the foundation of the recess, was a part of their contract.

Nothing more has been required to the hollow quoins than to make them fit for the gates.

The extension of the wing walls has already been settled agreeably to the Board's resolution of 12th September last, which was declared to be a final settlement of their claim.

I have the honour to be, &c.

GEORGE PHILLPOTTS, C. R. E.

JOHN McDONALD, Esq.,

President, &c.

Ordered—That the sum of £25 be paid to Messrs. McKay, on account of the pile driving machine, and that they be allowed to retain it, and that they be paid £25 on account of the alteration of the coping stone.

The Resident Engineer submitted a report on the claim of C. Truax, Contractor for Section No. 4, referred to him.

ST. LAWRENCE CANAL OFFICE,
Cornwall, 13th June, 1838.

SIR,

With reference to Mr. Truax's claim for work not paid for on Section No. 12, I have the honour to report as follows:

The estimate for October, 1836, gives him credit for 54,475 cubic yards of embankment, and 2,600 cubic yards additional for sinkage, or settlement of the base below the original surface of the ground—in all 57,075 yards. In the estimate for June following, the quantity of embankment returned was 5,300 yards—in all 57,177 yards. By comparing the two estimates, there appears to be a reduction of 1,468 yards of embankment, and an increase of 1,570 yards of sinkage, so that on the whole he gained 102 yards by the last estimate.

From the limited time, which is necessarily allowed for preparing the monthly progress estimate, it is not possible to take them with that accuracy which is required in making the final estimate of a section, and consequently the October estimate of 1836 was not likely to be so correct as that taken in June, which was taken with great care.

A part of the difference in the quantity of embankment may possibly have been caused by some inaccuracy in the former measurement, and a part by shrinkage or consolidation, as well as by sinkage. The Contractor would not, of course, have any claim in either case, because he was responsible for all shrinkage until he gave up the section which he held, until the spring of 1837, at his own particular request, in order that he might endeavour to resume it, and therefore all the loss caused by shrinkage or consolidation during that period, necessarily fell upon him, as he could have no just claim for any more embankment than was found by measurement, when the section passed from his hands into those of the present Contractor, and if any additional sinkage took place during that time, it has been made up to him by the additional quantity given in the last estimate, the amount of which was ascertained by shafts sunk at the expense of the Commissioners.

Mr. Truax is altogether in error in supposing that 817 yards of embankment was deducted from him to replace the mucking taken from under the bank. This quantity of mucking was taken out at the lower end of the section where the excavation is paid for, and therefore it did not enter into the calculation of the embankment.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed,) GEORGE PHILLPOTTS, C. R. E.

JOHN McDONLAD, Esq.,
President, &c.

Resolved—That the claim of McC. Truax, for work on section No. 12, is inadmissible.

The Resident Engineer submitted a report upon the claim of Messrs. C. Kerr and Co., for extra expense incurred on sub-section E., referred to him.

SAINT LAWRENCE CANAL,
Cornwall, 28th May, 1838.

SIR,

With reference to the claim of Messrs. C. Kerr and Co. for remuneration for extra expenses incurred in a part of their work on sub-section E., I beg leave to refer you to my letter of 13th October last, in which I have stated, on the report of Mr. Bellyard, the Assistant Engineer, at that time in charge of this part of the Canal, that they would have been obliged to excavate the lower part of their work in the manner they have done if we had not required any drain at all.

Mr. Kerr, himself, was absent when I made that report, and Mr. Stuart, his partner, to whom I applied at the time, to point out how the extra expense, here claimed, had been incurred, was unable to say anything on the subject.

Mr. Kerr has since returned, and he still insists that his charge for extra labour on 1,450 yards of excavation, at 8d. a yard, is not more than the extra expense actually incurred by the manner in which he was obliged to work this part of his section; but he admits that if this work had been so far advanced as to have been completed on 1st August, (the period at which he engaged by his contract to finish it,) this extra expense would not have been necessary. It will, therefore, remain with the Board to decide whether, under these circumstances, any thing ought to be allowed. I think that 6d. a yard for 1,415 yards, or £35 7s. 6d., would, at any rate, be quite sufficient.

I have the honour, &c.

(Signed,) GEORGE PHILLPOTTS, C. R. E.

JOHN McDONALD, Esq.,
President, &c.

Resolved—That the claim of Messrs. C. Kerr and Co., for extra expense on sub-section E., is inadmissible.

The Resident Engineer submitted a report upon the claim of Messrs. Reid and Shepherd, for sundry extras on lock No. 2, as follows:—

SAINT LAWRENCE CANAL,
Cornwall, 25th May, 1838.

SIR,

With reference to Messrs. Reid and Shepherd's claim for sundry extras on lock No. 2. I have the honour to report as follows:—

No. 1. For waste of plank in laying. For this item an allowance was made long ago by Mr. Mills.

No. 2. Cutting off stop gate checks. This has been paid for by day work in the estimate.

No. 3. Placing large stones in the breast of the lock for the bolts. Nothing, in my opinion, has been here required to justify any extra charge. They were good backing stones, but not better than required by the specification and contract.

No. 4. All extra cut stone will be included in the estimate, and paid for according to my report of 24th June last.

No. 5. The embankment of lock No. 2, has been allowed according to the agreement.—The Contractors were frequently told not to go on with it, if they were not satisfied with the price.

No. 6. The moving of the site of lock No. 3, was done when Mr. Mills was here. I have twice submitted this claim to him, and he says, in answer to one of my letters, "I think it might be very clearly shewn that the change in the location of lock No. 3, is decidedly in favour of the Contractors; that a claim is set up on this account is certainly very surprising to me. I should not allow it." In another letter, he says, "This lock was certainly moved, and just about the width of Mr. Smith's farm, consequently making the difference of distance of hauling the face stones that much further, and that upon the King's highway. This, which I think not a serious matter, is more than compensated by the circumstance, that as all their timber and plank, and the most of the backing, comes by water, and as they could not have landed on the bank of the River opposite the first location, the nearest point to that location where they could have landed being precisely where it is now located, the change in the location of the lock No. 3, has therefore saved them the hauling all these last named materials by land, a distance equal to the increased hauling of the face stones. N. B. Not on the King's highway. Independently the location would not have effected the proposition originally.

No. 7. Heading of piles and tree-nailing of timbers at lock No. 3. No extra charge is due on this account.

No. 8. The estimate of wing walls. This has been paid according to the Board's resolution of 12th September last, which was declared to be a final settlement of this claim.

The Contractors have never been obliged to return to the quarry, in consequence of the extra work, as they have stated. The quantity of work has not been increased since the summer of 1836, and in the winter of that year, as well as during the past winter, they had to go to the quarry for stone to complete the lock according to the original plan.

I have, &c.

(Signed,)

GEORGE PHILLPOTTS, C. R. E.

JOHN McDONALD, Esq.,

President, &c.

Ordered—That the foregoing report on the claim of Messrs. Reid and Shepherd, for sundry extras on lock No. 2, &c. be adopted.

The Resident Engineer reported on the claim of Mr. Isaac Hardy, to be reimbursed money paid by him to Truax and Co., original Contractors on section No. 12, for a portion of that contract, as follows:—

SAINT LAWRENCE CANAL,
Cornwall, 28th May, 1838.

SIR,

With reference to Mr. Hardy's claim for remuneration, in consequence of a sum of money paid by him to Messrs. Truax and Waters, for a certain portion of their contract on section No. 12, I have the honour to report that Messrs. Truax and Waters having failed in performing their work according to agreement, their contract was declared null and void in the autumn of 1836, and given out to Messrs. Reid and Shepherd in the spring of 1837, at which time Mr. Hardy, who was well aware that it was advertised, ought to have requested permission to retain this portion alluded to, which might have been arranged without difficulty, by excepting it from the portion of the work given to Messrs. Reid and Shepherd, if the Board had thought proper; but Mr. Hardy could not, legally speaking, have claimed this indulgence at that time, as the period when this work was agreed to be performed by Messrs. Truax and Co. had expired, and Mr. Hardy, being a sub-contractor under them, could not have been entitled to any further time than was given by their contracts, and consequently he can have no claim whatever for remuneration on this head.

I have the honour to be,

SIR,

Your most obedient Servant,

(Signed.) GEORGE PHILLPOTTS, C. R. E.

JOHN McDONALD, Esq.,
President, &c.

The Resident Engineer reported on the claim of Mr. Isaac Hardy for damages, in consequence of the alteration of the line at section No 4, as follows:—

SAINT LAWRENCE CANAL OFFICE,
Cornwall, May 30th 1838.

SIR,

With reference to Mr. Hardy's claim for damages sustained, in consequence of the alteration of the line of the Canal on section No. 4, I have the honour to acquaint you, that I am informed by Mr. S. Keefer, who has been on the Canal from its commencement, that the alteration of the line on section No. 3 only extended 500 feet on the upper end of section No. 4, which caused an increase of 4,290 yards of excavation, and a reduction of 2,560 yards of embankment beyond the original plan. The contract price for the former is 6d. per cubic yard, and for the latter 8d.; but in consequence of an allowance of 10 per cent. being made here for shrinkage, the relative prices will be reduced to 6d. and 7<sup>2</sup>/<sub>7</sub>, and therefore the Contractor may be considered as entitled to the following allowance, viz.:

On 4,290 yards excavation 1 <sup>1</sup> / <sub>2</sub> .....	£21	9	0
Add 30 per cent .....	6	8	8
	<hr/>
	£27	17	8
	<hr/>

Which sum of £27 17s. 8d. may be granted to him on this account after this section has been completed, if the Board think proper.

I have the honour to be,

SIR,

Your most obedient

Humble Servant,

(Signed.) GEORGE PHILLPOTTS, C. R. E.

JOHN McDONALD, Esq.,

The Resident Engineer reported on the claim of Mr. Isaac Hardy, for extra work on lock No. 1, as follows:—

SAINT LAWRENCE CANAL OFFICE,
Cornwall, 31st May, 1838.

SIR,

With reference to Mr. Hardy's claim, embracing forty different items for extra work performed at lock No. 1, amounting to £2,226 12s. 7d., I have the honour to report as follows:—

- No. 1. Squaring of piles. This is included in the tender for "laying foundation timber," and therefore no extra charge is due on this account.
- No. 2. An additional price of one half-penny per yard on this lock pit has been paid.
- 3, 4, 5. Allowance for wastage on timber and plank laid. 10 per cent. may be allowed, as here requested on this account.
- No. 6. Extra plank laid under foundation. Mr. Mills allowed 42s. 6d. for this before I came to the Canal, and I think it quite sufficient, as the plank were laid rough, without jointing, and neither bored nor pined down.
- No. 7. This has already been paid in the estimate, 170s. on this account being included in 29,924 square feet, and 70s. extra on this account itself.
- No. 8. This was not omitted, but it is included in 101,144 square feet of plank delivered and paid in the estimate.
- No. 9. This may be allowed, amounting to £4 12s. 6d.
- Nos. 10 and 12. These items are included in the alteration of the plan of the lock, for which 17s. 6d. a yard was paid last year, in conformity with Mr. Mill's report, quoted in my report of 24th June last.
- 11, 14. The cut stone in the lower breast was an alteration of Mr. Mill's, and it was also included by him in the 17s. 6d. per yard. The stop gate checks were in the plan originally given to Mr. Harvey by Mr. Mills.
- No. 13. I have already caused 3s. a foot to be paid for this, which I think quite sufficient.
- No. 15. This is also covered by the 17s. 6d. a yard alluded to in the remark on No. 10, &c.
- 16, 17, 18. I consider that the Contractor was bound to do all these items without any extra charge by virtue of his contract.
- No. 19. May be allowed, according to my report of 24th June, as requested.
- No. 20. May also be allowed, amounting to £4 10s.
- No. 21. Nothing can be allowed for this, no more having been required than was necessary to make the mason-work fit to receive the gates.
- Nos. 22, 23. The extra trouble or expense incurred in procuring the stone here alluded to, has been so trifling that I do not think the Contractor is entitled to any extra allowance on this account.
- Nos. 24, 25. Nothing can be allowed on these, as no work was performed on them which the
- " 26. contract did not require.
- No. 27. In consideration of the circumstance stated, 1s. a day (instead of 3s. 5d. as here demanded for 126 days,) amounting to £6 6s. may be allowed on this.
- No. 28. Nothing can be allowed on these more than the quantity stated in my report of 12th
- " 30. October last, which will be paid for, as there stated when delivered, as required.
- " 31. The Island stone was refused, because there were plenty of the blue stone on the ground, and therefore they were not required. The contractor was desired to use the stone of the same colour as far as he had them.
- No. 29. No additional stop gate checks were ever ordered beyond those shewn in the plan originally given to Mr. Hardy by Mr. Mills.
- No. 32. Nothing can be allowed on this; it was not included in the original contract. The contractor, or his foreman, was told that 8d. a yard only would be paid for it, which was quite as much as the work was worth; and he was also told that if he did not wish to do it he might leave it, notwithstanding which he persisted in going on with it.

Nos. 33 and 34. Have been included in the measurement of the masonry and paid in the estimate.

No. 35. It appears, by the returns given in by Mr. Poitra, who was at that time foreman in charge of the lock, that one stone cutter, only for one day, was employed in cutting or rounding off the corners, during the month of October, which has been included in the estimate. There were five days work done at the chain holes, during the same month, which have also been included in the estimate and paid for.

No. 36. This has been paid for as extra cut stone.

" 37, 38. The number of days returned in the estimate and paid for, corresponds with the number returned by Mr. Poitra, the Master Mason, who has now left the work. Mr. Hardy should have brought this forward while Mr. Poitra was here, if he was not satisfied with his return.

No. 39. I can see no reason for paying this. The Board paid for a quarry in the neighbourhood, and if the contractor choose to go to Kingston for stone, he ought to pay for it himself.

No. 40. It must rest with the Board to decide whether they will allow any part of this claim. As far as I can understand the circumstances, the contractor is not entitled to it.

The above-mentioned items Nos. 3, 4, 5, 9, 19, 20, 27, may be allowed in the next estimate, if the Board approve of them.

I have the honour to be,

SIR,

Your most obedient

Humble Servant,

President, &c.

The foregoing reports, on the several claims of Mr. Hardy, having been read to him, and he being heard in reply thereto:—

Resolved.—That on the claim to be reimbursed the amount paid to the original contractors, for section No. 12, the report of the resident Engineer be adopted.

Resolved.—That on the claim for alteration of the line of canal at section No. 4, the sum of £27 17s. 8d. be paid to Mr. Hardy, as recommended in the report thereon.

Resolved.—That on the claim for sundry extras on lock No. 1—
Item 8 be measured again, and the difference, if any, allowed.

" 14 be enquired into by the resident Engineer, and settled by him as he may consider equitable.

" 13, 1s. per foot to be allowed, in addition to 3s. already paid.

The Resident Engineer reported on the claim of James Grooves, for damage to his land by stone being cut thereon for lock No. 2, as follows:—

SAINT LAWRENCE CANAL OFFICE,
Cornwall, 24th May, 1838.

SIR.

With reference to Mr. Grooves' claim, for damage to his field, by the stone cutters, in preparing stone for lock No. 2, I have the honour to report, that I think £3 15s. will be a fair remuneration.

I have the honour, &c.

(Signed,)

GEORGE PHILLPOTTS.

JOHN McDONALD.

Ordered.—That £3 15 0, be paid to Mr. Grooves, in full for his claim.

Messrs. Thomas Scott, & Co. submitted a claim for detention, by order of the resident Engineer, as Sub-contractors under the late Contractor, for constructing the Cornwall culvert.

Referred to the resident Engineer.

Mr. Hiram Southworth, submitted a claim for damages to his cellar, in consequence of the water from the canal drain filling it up.

Referred to the resident Engineer.

Mr. James Byrnes, submitted a claim for damages done to his cellar, by the influx of water from the canal drain, at Long Sault.

Referred to the resident Engineer.

Mr. Robert Johnson, Contractor for the Cornwall dock, submitted a communication in reference to extra labour alleged to be performed on that contract, not included in the specification and tender.

On reference to the specification, and to the Foreman on the Cornwall dock;

Resolved.—That the claim of Mr. Johnson is inadmissible.

John Archibald, Esq. as representative of the estate of the late Adam Dixon, Esq., Contractor for section No. 5, submitted a statement in reference to a portion of the work on that section having been transferred by the resident Engineer to other persons.

The resident Engineer having explained the circumstances connected with Mr. Archibald's statement, and the necessity for the vigorous prosecution of the work on section 5, which by the terms of the contract he is empowered to facilitate, by the employment of extra labour when a sufficient force is not provided by the Contractor:

Resolved.—That the complaint cannot be entertained.

The claim of John McGilvray, Esq., on behalf of Lady McKenzie, for land, &c. taken for the use of the Canal, having been some time since adjusted, but not having been paid in consequence of the want of funds;

Resolved.—That an acknowledgment for the amount, being £155, be given to Mr. McGilvray, bearing interest at six per cent per annum, from 23d March, 1838, until paid.

Messrs. Reid and Shepherd submitted a report addressed to them by Mr. Peter Fleming, Civil Engineer, in reply to the report of the resident Engineer, upon their claim for extra allowance, &c. on Section No. 17, and Mr. Fleming having also submitted a communication on the same subject, the claimants with Mr. Peter Fleming their Engineer, were heard at considerable length in support of their claim, when it was

Resolved.—That upon a re-consideration and after a patient investigation of Messrs. Reid and Shepherd's claim for work done and damages sustained on Section No. 17, and having heard Peter Fleming, Esq. Civil Engineer, on their behalf,—The Board see no cause to change their views relative to those claims, and do therefore fully concur in the report of the resident Engineer thereon.

The arrival at Cornwall of His Excellency the Governor General being expected in the course of this evening, and it being deemed expedient that an address be presented to him, on the subject of the improvement of the St. Lawrence in Lower Canada, as well as of the financial difficulties which threaten the suspension of the work in progress on this Canal; the President submitted the following address, which was unanimously adopted, viz.—

To His Excellency the Right Honourable JOHN GEORGE EARL OF DURHAM, VISCOUNT LAMBTON, &c. &c. Knight Grand Cross of the most Honourable Military Order of the Bath, one of Her Majesty's most Honourable Privy Council, and Governor General, Vice-Admiral and Captain General of all Her Majesty's Provinces within and adjacent to the Continent of North America, &c. &c. &c.

The Commissioners for improving the Navigation of the River St. Lawrence, in this Province, have learned with much satisfaction, that the subject of the necessary internal improvements in both Provinces will at an early period obtain the attention of Your Lordship, with a view to the attainment of the advantages to be derived from them; and they hail Your Lordship's visit to this part of the Province, on the day of their monthly meeting, as a most auspicious circumstance, inasmuch as it enables them to take this opportunity of addressing Your Lordship, and pointing out on the spot the very great importance of using every exertion for the speedy improvement of this noble River to Montreal.

It may be unnecessary to trouble Your Lordship now with a detail of the many obvious advantages that must result to these Provinces from the proposed improvement of the St. Lawrence, some of which are noticed in an address which the Commissioners have had the honour to lay before the late Administrator of the Government of Lower Canada, and which has been submitted to your Lordship.

In that address it is stated that £430,000 had been voted by the Legislature of this Province to accomplish this great undertaking.

Of this sum £350,000 will have been expended at the end of this season, and between £10,000 and £50,000 only of the remainder will be required to render this Canal navigable.

Your Lordship will learn with much regret, that in consequence of the present state of the finances of this Province, it is not judged expedient to issue the Debentures required for this purpose, and therefore it is to be feared that this work will now be stopped, unless some means can be devised for supplying the money required for its completion next year.

We therefore presume to hope that Your Lordship will feel yourself authorised to cause this sum to be lent to us from the resources of the Lower Province, until the finances of this Province are in a state to re-pay it, as the inhabitants of that Province are quite as much interested in the completion of this important undertaking as those of Upper Canada, and the money so lent will undoubtedly be re-paid by the time it is wanted for the completion of the Canal between the Cascades and Coteau du Lac, which we trust Your Lordship will cause to be commenced as soon as possible.

Should Your Lordship be pleased to devote a short portion of your valuable time, to a personal inspection of the work under our direction, we feel confident that the result will be satisfactory to Your Lordship, and will tend to strengthen the propriety of our claim upon your attention to the object which we desire to attain.

(Signed,)

JOHN McDONALD,
PRESIDENT.

CORNWALL, 10th July, 1838.

Resolved.—That the assertions made by Mr. Vankoughnet, in a letter written by him on the 4th May last to the Secretary, Mr. Hume, as to the motives that induced Mr. Hamilton to attend the last meeting of the Board of Commissioners, are, in our opinion, utterly unfounded, and that the conduct of Mr. Vankoughnet, in thus destroying the good feeling and unanimity that ought to prevail among the Commissioners, is reprehensible and much disapproved of by us.

YEAS—MESSIEURS,

SHAVER,
NORTON,

McDONALD.

The petition of Messrs. Brouse to His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor, having been taken into consideration, the following report thereon, for the information of the Lieutenant Governor, was read and adopted:—

“The Commissioners for improving the navigation of the River Saint Lawrence, in reply to your communication, which enclosed a memorial addressed to His Excellency, from Messrs. George and William Brouse, report for the information of His Excellency:—

“That on the occasion of an application from Messrs. Brouse to the Commissioners, relative to the erection of buildings for milling purposes at the Gallopps Rapid, they were informed that such buildings would interfere with the contemplated improvement of the navigation of the River, and that the water privileges, in front of the property in question, being the property of the Government, any damage that might result to them from the construction of the canal, could not be recognised as establishing a claim against the Province.

“That the present financial difficulties render it impossible to decide upon the plan most advisable to be adopted, in carrying on the improvement from the Long Sault to Prescott, and that therefore they are not prepared to take possession of the portion of land that may be required from the property of Messrs. Brouse for the intended improvement.

“The purchase of the property in question was made by Messrs. Brouse subsequently to the survey of the line of contemplated improvement.”

(Signed,)

JOHN McDONALD,
PRESIDENT, &c.

Honourable JOHN MACAULAY,
Civil Secretary,
&c. &c. &c.

Ordered—That the foregoing report be forwarded by the Secretary to the Honourable John Macaulay, Civil Secretary.

The Resident Engineer submitted a report upon the claim of Robert Howisson and Co., contractors for sub-section D., which was read as follows:—

ST. LAWRENCE CANAL OFFICE,
Cornwall, 7th August, 1838.

SIR,

With reference to my report of the 13th October, 1837, on the claim of Messrs. Howisson and Co., contractors for sub-section D., I have the honour to inform you that they have represented to me that the allowance which I then recommended to be made to them of £13 10s. for the addition of 30 yards to their platform, has proved quite insufficient to cover the extra expense incurred by them on the occasion alluded to, and that instead of an addition of 30 yards to their platform, it would have been necessary to add 100 yards, which, at 9s. a yard, would amount to £45, instead of £13 10s.

Under all the circumstances of the case, I am disposed to recommend this claim to the favourable consideration of the Board, as I believe, on consideration of the inconvenience and extra expenses to which the Contractors were exposed, by being compelled to prepare for the drain through the section, that this sum is not more than a fair remuneration.

I have the honour, &c.

(Signed,)

GEORGE PHILLPOTTS, C. R. E.
AND MAJOR.

Ordered—That the sum of forty-five pounds, as recommended in the foregoing report, be paid to Messrs. Howisson and Co.

Reid and Shepherd, contractors for section No. 17, submitted a claim to be reimbursed £263 over paid (as stated by them) to their sub-contractor, in consequence of an alteration in the Engineer's estimate.

Resolved.—That the claim of Reid and Shepherd cannot be entertained.

Robert Shepherd, one of the contractors for lock No. 2, submitted an application on the subject of the measurement of that lock.

Ordered—That the Assistant Engineer, in charge of lock No. 2, be directed to re-measure the mason work on that lock jointly with the contractor.

Messrs. Howisson and Co. submitted a claim to be paid for extra work on sub-section D., in consequence of the rise of the River.

Resolved.—That the claim of Messrs. Howisson and Co. is inadmissible.

At a meeting of the Commissioners, held at Cornwall on Tuesday, 11th September, 1838:—

PRESENT:

JOHN McDONALD, Esq., PRESIDENT.

HONOURABLE JOHN HAMILTON,
" PHILIP VANKOUGHNET,
GEORGE LONGLEY, Esq.

PETER SHAVER, Esq.
JAMES SAMPSON, M. D.

Dr. Sampson having reported his appointment as Commissioner in the room of the Honourable Mr. Jones, took his seat at the Board.

The minutes of the preceding meeting were read.

The accounts, vouchers, &c. were examined and approved.

The Resident Engineer referred the Board to a report submitted by him at the meeting in July, urging the importance of obtaining a further sum of £3000, to complete the preparations necessary for suspending the works on the canal.

Resolved.—That the application for a further sum of £3000 be deferred, until the decision of the Governor in Council, respecting the suspension of the work, be more definitely understood.

Mr. George Steel submitted an application to be reimbursed a sum awarded against him as damages to Messrs. Reid & Shepherd, in consequence of detention, the cement supplied by Mr. Steel having been rejected by the Engineer, but afterwards approved and used in the works.

Resolved.—That the Commissioners having no connection with the contracts for cement used on the Canal, cannot entertain the claim of Mr. Steel.

The Secretary submitted a report (as directed by the President) upon the facts connected with the contracts for water cement, in reference to Mr. Norton's interest therein, which was read as follows:

Office of the Commissioners for Improving the Navigation of the St. Lawrence, Cornwall, 10th September, 1838.

SIR,

In compliance with your desire, to prepare a statement of all the facts connected with the subject of water cement used in the construction of the Canal, to be laid before the Board, preparatory to affording the information required by His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor, as far as respects the participation of one of the Commissioners in the contract for supplying that material, I beg leave to state, that it having been suspected in July 1836, by the Commissioners, that Mr. Norton, a member of the Board, was interested in the contracts for supplying cement to the canal Contractors, the subject was brought forward, and the decided disapproval of the members was expressed, as well as their desire that Mr. Norton would at once divest himself of all interest in the contract.

At the next meeting of the Board, Mr. Norton produced a bond, purporting to convey the cement contract to Mr. Owis, of Massena.

A suit having been instituted in the United States against Reid & Shepherd, contractors for a part of the mason work, in consequence of a misunderstanding respecting the cement contract, it appeared in the course of evidence that Mr. Norton was still an interested party, and this fact having come to the knowledge of the Board, the subject was again brought forward in July last, when Mr. Norton admitted, that in consequence of having found it impossible to effect any arrangement for the transfer of his interest, he was reluctantly compelled to adopt the course he had taken, and by cancelling the bonds entered into with Mr. Owis, deceived the Board as respected his interest in the contracts. In consequence of the admission made by Mr. Norton, the following resolution was proposed and adopted, viz.:

“That in consequence of the acknowledgment made at the present meeting, by Hiram Norton, Esq., that he was the Contractor for furnishing cement to the Contractors engaged in building the locks, &c. on the line of Canal; and whereas Mr. Norton had assured the Commissioners, at their meeting in the month of July, 1836, that he had entirely divested himself of all connection or interest with said contract, that Mr. Norton is thereby extremely culpable and blameable for having deceived the Commissioners, and that having so acted, the Commissioners consider it inconsistent for him to retain his situation as one of the Board.”

In explanation of the causes which led to Mr. Norton's interest in the contract, he stated to the Board, that having found that a combination was formed by the manufacturers of cement, at Syracuse, (the only place from whence a suitable material had, at that time, been furnished,) and an exorbitant price having been demanded, he was induced to undertake the manufacture of cement at Kingston, and to enter into contract in the name of Mr. Bacon, of Ogdensburgh, with the canal Contractors, and that in the construction of the necessary works at Kingston, he expended about £750. The permission to use the stone at Kingston having been subsequently withdrawn, he was obliged to erect works at Massena, where he necessarily incurred a considerable further expense. He further stated that he had used every possible exertion to dispose, even at a pecuniary sacrifice, of his interest in the contracts, but without effect; and that, under these circumstances, originating in a desire to assist the contractors, and facilitate the progress of the work, he became involved in difficulties, from which he found it impossible to extricate himself.

I have the honour to be, &c.

At a meeting of the Commissioners, held at Cornwall on Tuesday, 9th October, 1838.

PRESENT.

JOHN McDONALD, ESQUIRE, PRESIDENT.

HONOURABLE JOHN HAMILTON,

PETER SHAVER, Esq.

“ PHILIP VANKOUGHNET,

JAMES MORRIS, Esq.

GEORGE LONGLEY, Esq.

James Morris, Esquire, having notified his appointment as Commissioner, in room of Hiram Norton, Esquire, resigned, took his seat at the Board.

The minutes of the preceding meeting were read.

The accounts, vouchers, &c. were submitted, and approved.

The Engineer submitted a report upon the claim of Nathaniel Tait, for a re-measurement of the work performed by him on section No. 9, the amount allowed for excavation being, as he states, short of the work performed, which was read as follows:

SAINT LAWRENCE CANAL OFFICE,
Cornwall, 8th October, 1838.

SIR.

With reference to Mr. Tait's claim for work on section No. 9, I have the honour to report as follows:—

The measurement which he has given as a basis for the first item of his claim, 7,129 yards of excavation, is altogether a fallacy.

Had he submitted the measurement of all the excavation which has been taken to form the banks on this section, a comparison might then have been made with our estimates, from which it would have been quite evident that he is paid for all the bank made on the section, at the contract price for embankment, after deducting the quantity of earth supplied from the excavation of the prism of the canal, from which a deduction of 10 per cent. has been made for shrinkage, in addition to 2,863 yards for the space occupied by the stones taken from the excavation.

The fact is, that in order to supply a sufficient quantity of earth for the bank on this section, the canal was laid out from 10 to 15 feet wider than in other places, and now Mr. Tait, after having been paid the full price of embankment for this work, demands payment for this excavation out of the limits of the canal, from which the earth required to form the bank was supplied, which is quite unreasonable.

With regard to the second item of his claim, on which he demands payment for the mucking and loose stone, which he states to be 4,506 yards, we have already allowed for mucking replaced by embankment..... 850 yards.

Loose stone..... 2,863 "

3,713 yards.

---

Which makes only 793 yards less than he demands.

The difference is easily accounted for, by reducing the loose stones to the space which they originally occupied in the excavation, and by a part of the mucking having been allowed to be placed in the outside of the slope, and therefore I conceive that he has been allowed every thing he is entitled to in our last estimate for this section.

I have the honour, &c.

(Signed,)

GEORGE PHILLPOTTS, C. R. E.

AND MAJOR.

JOHN McDONALD, Esq.,

President, &c.

Resolved.—That the report of the Engineer upon the claim of Nathaniel Tait, for work done on section No. 9, be adopted.

Simon Frazer submitted a claim to be allowed for extra work on sub-section C., by raising the bank higher than originally contemplated.

Resolved.—That on reference to the contract for constructing sub-section C. to the claim of Mr. Frazer, is inadmissible.

Reid and Shepherd, contractors for section No. 17, submitted a renewed claim to be reimbursed £266, stated to be over paid by them to their sub-contractor, in consequence of error in the estimates for work on that section.

Resolved.—That the claim of Reid and Shepherd is inadmissible.

Reid and Shepherd, and R. and P. McKay, contractors for locks Nos. 2, 3 and 4, submitted a communication, in reference to the prices allowed for extra mason work on the locks, and to the alteration of the plans as originally exhibited, &c.

The claims of the lock contractors for the extension of the wing walls having been re-considered, it was—

Resolved.—That an amendment of the resolution passed at the meeting of the Board, on the 12th and 13th September, 1837, the Contractors be paid their original contract prices, as follows, viz.—Lock No. 1, 25s. 10d. per yard; Nos. 2 and 3, 28s. 9d. per yard; No. 4, 30s. and Nos. 5 and 6, 31s. per yard; with the additional per centage allowed on the work generally, while in progress, for such number of yards as shall contain a quantity of cut stone equal in proportion to that of the original plan of the locks, for the remainder a deduction to be made of 3s. per foot, superficial measure, for the quantity of cut stone that would be required to make each yard equal to the other.

At a meeting of the Commissioners, held at Cornwall, on Saturday, the 20th December, 1838.

PRESENT.

JOHN McDONALD, ESQUIRE, PRESIDENT.

HONOURABLE P. VANKOUGHNET,                      PETER SHAVER, Esq.
 GEORGE LONGLEY, Esq.                      JAMES MORRIS, Esq.

The accounts and vouchers were examined and approved.

The President submitted a communication from the Lieutenant Governor, on the subject of erecting Block Houses for the defence of the frontier, with copy of his instructions to the resident Engineer on the subject, which were read as follows:—

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
 Toronto, 27th October, 1838.

SIR,

I am directed by the Lieutenant Governor to request that you will be pleased to give instructions to the resident Engineer on the Saint Lawrence Canal, to erect, as speedily as possible, a stone Block House, near the locks at Cornwall, on a plan which will be furnished to you by the Commanding Royal Engineer at Kingston.

His Excellency's object in making this communication, is to save time in carrying this work into execution at this late season of the year; and understanding that the Engineer, established on the Saint Lawrence Canal, will be able to carry his wishes into effect, His Excellency has thought it most expedient for the good of Her Majesty's service, in this emergency, to apply to you for this assistance.

The funds for the performance of this work will be furnished by the Commissariat Department, on your application, supported by proper vouchers, certified by the resident Engineer on the Saint Lawrence Canal, receipted, &c. in the usual manner.

I have the honour, &c.

(Signed,)

JOHN MACAULAY.

GANANOQUE, 29th October, 1838.

SIR,

I request you will be pleased to carry into effect, with as little delay as possible, the order conveyed by the Lieutenant Governor in the enclosed letter, dated 27th October, from the Private Secretary, and I request that you will apply to the Commanding Royal Engineer, at Kingston, for the plans, &c. to carry it into effect immediately.

I have the honour, &c.

(Signed,)

JOHN McDONALD,

PRESIDENT.

Colonel PHILLPOTTS,

Resident Engineer,

Cornwall.

Resolved.—That as it appears the Military authorities have given directions that the part of the frontier, on the line of the Saint Lawrence Canal, shall be placed in as good a state of defence as possible, and as building will eventually be required at each of the locks, for the persons employed to attend them when finished, the Board will have much pleasure in affording every facility in their power towards their construction, and if any buildings are erected at the locks which can hereafter be available for the lock keepers and their attendants, the Board will also be happy to assume them, and to pay a fair rent for them, or whatever value it may be considered equitable that the Commissioners should pay for them, when they are in funds to do so.

The President submitted a communication from the Honourable John Macaulay, enclosing letters from the Quarter Master General's Department, on the subject of Barracks, and other houses, for the accommodation of the troops in Cornwall, which were read as follows:—

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
Toronto, 3rd December, 1838.

GENTLEMEN:

By the direction of His Excellency the Lieutenant Governor, I beg to enclose you copies of two letters, written by Captain Hurd, Quarter Master General Militia, and Colonel Gore, Deputy Quarter Master General, relative to the Barrack accommodation of the Militia at Cornwall, and at the same time to intimate to you His Excellency's desire, that if there be any unoccupied buildings at your disposal, suitable for Barrack accommodation, or if there be any other way in which, consistently with the powers under which you act, you can assist Colonel Phillpotts, you will do so to the fullest extent.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS,

ON THE

IMPROVEMENT OF THE RIVER ST. LAWRENCE,

---

PRINTED BY ORDER OF THE HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

By Stewart, Printer to the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS,
ON THE SURVEY OF THE OTTAWA RIVER, &c.

To His Excellency SIR GEORGE ARTHUR, K. C. H., Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Upper Canada, Major General Commanding Her Majesty's Forces therein, &c. &c. &c.

The Commissioners appointed under the authority of an Act of the Provincial Legislature, entitled "An Act to provide for a survey of the Ottawa River, and the country bordering on it, together with the country and waters lying between that River and Lake Huron," beg leave to report:—

That in order to carry into effect the intention of the Legislature, and to ensure, if possible, every information calculated to ascertain the practicability of making a navigable communication between the Ottawa and Huron, the Commissioners engaged three gentlemen, who were directed to take different routes, with a view of discovering the nature of the country, the facilities of transport, the quality of the soil, and whether adapted for purposes of cultivation, besides the great object "the water communication."

They beg leave to subjoin the reports of David Taylor, Esq., and of Messrs. David Thompson and Hawkins, the gentlemen employed, who appear to have discharged their duty with zeal and ability.

The plans, which are bulky, are deposited in the Surveyor General's Office, as in the opinion of the Commissioners best calculated to ensure their preservation.

An account in detail of the expenses which have already been incurred, could not be prepared in time to be submitted with this report, but will be furnished before the next Session of the Legislature, with such other information as can be procured.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN S. CARTWRIGHT.

TORONTO, 27th March, 1839.

DIARY of Mr. TAYLOR on Survey of Ottawa.

July 12th, 1837.—Received instructions from Captain Baddeley, R. E., one of the Commissioners for directing the party about to explore the country and waters between Lake Huron and the Ottawa River, to procure provisions and proceed to Toronto, with as little delay as possible, and there receive instructions from the Honourable John Macaulay.

Thursday, 19th July.—Arrived in Toronto, having brought up six barrels of pork, and nine of biscuit, one tent, &c.

Friday, 21st July.—I received instructions from the Honourable John Macaulay, who desired me to proceed to Holland Landing, where I should find Mr. David Thompson, Civil Engineer, superintending the building of canoes, one of which I was to have, and to furnish myself a crew and necessaries, and be in readiness to start with the gentlemen composing the party.

Saturday, 22d July.—Proceeded to Holland Landing, found Mr. Thompson, their canoes finished, paint not dry; sent one of Mr. Thompson's men in search of a crew, with their assistance I got my canoe paddles made, and some of my provisions packed.

Sunday, 23d July.—Heavy sultry weather, with thunder.

Monday, 24th July.—Mr. Thompson's man returned, but with one to add to our number, Louis Tupas, who I entered at three pounds fifteen shillings per month, with the promise, if he behaved well, and exerted himself, something was to be added when our exploring should cease, and sent to his home free of expense.

Tuesday, 25th July.—Employed packing provisions.

Wednesday, 26th July.—Sent a team to Newmarket to procure peas, axes, and sundry small articles—finished packing, and sent stores to the Landing. The Honourable John Macaulay arrived from Toronto to accompany the party to Penetanguishine, weather clear.

Thursday, 27th July, at 4, A. M.—Fine weather; loaded the canoes, at 5. 30 left the Holland Landing, descended the Holland River, crossed the Bay to Roche's point. At noon fresh breezes and fine, wind at north; left the point and crossed over to the west shore.

Friday, 28th July, A. M.—Cloudy weather, preparing to cross the portage to the Notawasaga Creek; found much difficulty in procuring teams, only able to obtain two, and required seven. Mr. Thompson crosses the portage to take charge and secure the provisions and baggage. P. M. Heavy rain.

Saturday, 29th July, at 6, A. M.—Crossed the portage with baggage and canoes to Notawasaga Creek, at 6, P. M., descended the creek as far as the forks—at 11, P. M. landed and encamped for the night—midnight, strong gales with heavy rains.

Sunday 30th July, A. M.—Cloudy, with heavy rain and thunder. At 8 A. M. embarked, descended the Notawasaga. At 11, A. M. landed and pitched tents to receive the provisions from the storm and rain. At 12. 30 embarked, descended the rapids, at 6 P. M. arrived at the mouth of the Notawasaga creek, encamped for the night, moderate and fine.

Monday, 31st July, at 5, A. M.—Embark, fresh breezes from the north-west, landed and unloaded canoes—take advantage of the weather to dry our things. 11. 30 embark, continue along the shore towards the Christian Islands. At 2. 30 landed under the lee of a point to wait for a lull. At 4, P. M. embarked, steering for the Christian Islands. At 8, P. M. arrive and take shelter under the eastern point of a large Island, one of the Christian group, unloaded the canoes and hauled them up. At midnight strong breezes with squalls of rain.

Tuesday, 1st August.—Heavy gales and squally. At 8. 30 steered along the shore towards Penetanguishine Bay. Mr. Thompson remains in charge of the provisions, unloaded two canoes. The Honourable John Macaulay, Surveyor General; Mr. Hawkins, Deputy Provincial Surveyor, and Mr. Taylor, with two canoes, proceeded to Penetanguishine. At 4, P. M. arrived, purchased a cedar canoe for two pounds fifteen shillings. Our object in coming to Penetanguishine is to procure men, being harvest time find but few men. Midnight warm sultry weather.

Wednesday, 2d August, at 8, A. M.—Calm and sultry, with rain at noon, fresh breezes, squally. The Honourable John Macaulay parted company on his way to Toronto. I find men are not to be had. Mr. Hawkins divides his crew with me, and we prepare to start.—Midnight, strong gales and squally.

Thursday, 3d August, A. M.—Cloudy strong winds from the north-west, much sea in the bay. P. M. the same weather. Midnight, moderate and cloudy.

Friday, 4th August, A. M.—Light winds and fine. Left Penetanguishine and joined Mr. Thompson—strong breezes and cloudy, encamped.

Saturday, 5th August, A. M.—Light winds and fine. At 5, A. M. parted with Mr. Thompson, crossed the bay and proceeded to the north, between the Island on the N. E. shore of Lake Huron. At 6, P. M. encamped for the night. The singular archipelago through which I have passed to-day, baffles description. I therefore shall decline making any remark on it, until my return from French River, then I trust to be able to give a general view of the difficulty of its navigation.

Sunday, 6th August, A. M.—Fine weather, wind westerly. At 6, A. M. embarked, steering along the north-east shore of Lake Huron, outside the Islands, at 6, P. M. encamp for the night.

Monday, 7th August, A. M.—Moderate weather, wind south-west. At 6, A. M. embarked, steering along the north-east shore of Lake Huron. Sunset, calm, encamp for the night.

Tuesday, 8th August, 5, A. M.—Moderate and cloudy—parted with Mr. Hawkins, at the mouth of the Shawanaga River. At noon, heavy rain and squally. 4, P. M. encamp, heavy rain, sunset heavy rain and thunder.

Wednesday, 9th August.—Fresh breezes from the south-east, daylight embarked, shipped too much water. Loaded and secured provisions, &c. Heavy rain and wind. 4, P. M. wind changed to S. W., cloudy with strong breezes.

Thursday, 10th August, A. M.—Moderate and cloudy, wind S. W. Embarked, steering along the N. E. shore of Lake Huron. At 4, P. M. observed the high land in the neighbourhood of the Lalloche Mountains. At 6 cloudy weather, encamped, repaired the canoe, found her very leaky. Midnight, fresh breezes and cloudy weather.

Friday, 11th August, A. M.—Light variable winds. At 6 wind S. E., embarked, steering through the Island towards French River. At 7, P. M. encamped on an Island at the eastern entrance of French River. Midnight heavy squalls and rain.

Saturday, 12th August, A. M.—Fresh breezes with heavy rain. Paid five shillings to an Indian to point out the entrance of the River, and the post of the Honourable Hudson Bay Company;—the impracticability of a stranger finding the mouth of this River is soon seen. The islands grouped together forming channels deep and intricate, with many reefs, and sunken rocks, varying in their course, without any feature to distinguish one from the other, and extending themselves as far as the eye can see. The Indians are sometimes at a loss to know the best and nearest channel to a required spot, and indeed when it is considered that all those islands have the same appearance, and the greatest elevation does not exceed 30 feet, frequently not more than 15 feet, as there is much difficulty in finding the River in a boat or canoe, to approach with a vessel under sail, would be extremely hazardous; however, I think a channel could be pricked out, and possibly a good harbour found, by erecting land marks and beacons on the sunken rocks, at the entrance of the River, should necessity require it. At 4, P. M. arrived at a post of the Honourable Hudson's Bay Company, received much kindness from the person in charge of the post, who procured me a guide, and took charge of some provisions, which I left as a depot for my return, also my cedar canoe, which I found too heavy to cross portages. I agreed to pay my guide 2s. 6d. per day; he was to furnish a small birch canoe, in order to carry all my provisions and stores to Lake Nipissing. Sunset cloudy with rain.

Sunday, 13th August, A. M.—Cloudy with rain. Noon, heavy gales and rain occasionally. Midnight, ditto weather.

Monday, 14th August, A. M.—Cloudy with rain. At 6, A. M. embarked, proceeded through a narrow stream in a north-easterly direction, at a distance of three miles we arrive at a portage about 300 yards across, the fall is about 10 feet, river narrow, and impeded with rocks and rocky islets. In the bay there appears occasionally a little wild rice.

No. 1. Geological.—It is with great uncertainty you know whether you are on the main land or on an island. The surrounding country presents the same appearance as the N. E. shore of Lake Huron; the wood is of a stunted growth, and the rocks are covered with mosses and lichens. We pass the portage and ascend the stream, at the distance of three miles we enter a branch of French River, which I have called east branch, being much deeper, and assuming the appearance of a river of some size, as we proceed it varies in its appearance so much, and so many impediments present themselves, such as narrow passages, shoal water, rocky debris, that no true character can be formed of this singular stream, until the whole has been passed. At sunset encamped for the night, four miles from the entrance into east branch.

Tuesday, 15th August.—Cloudy drizzling rain. At 6, A. M. embarked and ascended the stream, current sluggish, passed several channels which my guide informed me led to the main river. The islands are numerous, composed of granite, and resembling, in all respects, those of the north-east shore of Lake Huron. There are but few fish in this river, and very little hunting about the surrounding country; the beaver or otter are extremely scarce; the muskrat are taken more plentifully, and deer are not seen except in winter. At a distance of six miles and a half the channel is almost blocked up by islands. After passing the narrows, a considerable bay runs to the S. S. E. "Poplar Bay." We continue to ascend the river in an easterly direction, with a depth of water varying from 10 to 20 feet mid channel, and on either side a bold granite shore rising to the height of 60 or 80 feet undulating. At a distance of fourteen miles we arrive at the falls of Petit Recolet. The river at this fall takes a direction to the north the fall of Recolet is 20 feet.

Geological No. 2.—And the portage to pass is 150 yards over a steep granite bank. Immediately above the fall the water is shallow for some distance. Sunset, encamp for the night.

Wednesday, 16th August, A. M.—Moderate and fine. At daylight embark;—we ascend the stream running north, for two miles, current sluggish, water shallow, passages between the islands narrow and impeded. We enter the main river running in an easterly direction, the banks are steep, water deep. The width of the river is about half a mile.

Geological, No. 3.—At a distance of 10 miles we arrive at a rapid called Petite Foucile. The intermediate country is granite, covered with a small stunted growth of pine, birch, and poplar. At sunset encamp for the night.

Thursday, 17th August, A. M.—Moderate and cloudy, wind variable. At 7 A. M. ascended the rapids, made a portage across a small island, ascended the river, crossed four portages to avoid the rapids Brisson, Grand Foucile, Croix and Pine, whole rise equal to 57 feet.

Geological, No. 4 and 5.—The banks of the rapids are bold and irregular, mounds of granite rising to the height of 100 feet, undulating, covered with small wood. The channels are filled with sunken rocks and small islands through which the rapids pass.

Thursday, 17th August.—At sunset cloudy with showers of rain at intervals.

Friday, 18th August, A. M.—Moderate and cloudy.

Geological No. 5.—At daylight embarked, ascended the Pine Rapids midst a profusion of small islands. To the right we leave a large island with a channel and four rapids, which lead by a circuitous route to the main river two or three miles above. Also on the north side there is a fall of 25 feet, which fall is the outlet of the waters closed in by an island of considerable extent; and the main land from which some tributary streams unite and disembogue themselves at the fall above named. Continuing eight miles in an easterly direction, we pass two or three small rapids, the river narrow and impeded, and arrive at the falls of Chaudiere; here we cross an island, leaving the falls on the left hand, the portage is a quarter of a mile over a granite rock to the right, and at a distance below there is another fall equally rapid.

Geological, No. 6.—The height of the Chaudiere falls above Pine Rapids is equal to 50 feet—the falls are 25 feet. Above these falls the lake commences, the islands numerous, having the same sterile appearance as those below. At 4 strong gale. We proceed six miles in a N. E. direction, and encamp for the night.

Saturday, 19th August, A. M.—Calm and cloudy—at 6 moderate breezes and fine, embarked, landed and spoke to some Indians on River Bay. I have called it by this name to distinguish it from the other bays of the lake. It commences immediately above the fall of Chaudiere, and extends 18 miles in a N. E. direction, when the lake expands. At noon moderate breezes and fine, observed the meridian altitude of the sun, lat.  $46^{\circ} 14' 56''$  N. long. by account  $80^{\circ} 01' 20''$  west of the meridian of Greenwich.

Summary Sketch of Lake Nipissingue.—Lake Nipissingue is 165 feet above Lake Huron, and is irregular in its shape; in length, from the Chaudiere falls to the north eastern extremity is 28 geographical miles, and its extreme breadth from Turtle River to West River is 28 miles. Several small rivers flow into the lake: the principal ones are, the West, Sturgeon, Turtle, South. The waters are generally shallow, especially in the bays, which are deep and full of rocky islands. The shores are granite, except at the entrance of some of the streams. Alluvial deposit is there met with, forming banks, but too inconsiderable to be worthy of notice in an agricultural point. The fish caught in this lake are few—jack and carp are the principal, in season some sturgeon and white fish, the latter are inferior to those taken in lake Huron. I attribute this scarcity of fish to the extreme sterility of the surrounding country. Game of all kinds are scarce. The grouse and hare appear the most abundant. The animals taken at the fur posts are beaver, otter, mink, and muskrat; but few of either are taken on the shores of the lake, but in the rivers which flow into it. In winter deer are taken on the shores of the lake, rarely moose, last year being an exception 7 moose deer were taken in the neighbourhood of the lake. Encamped at the Honourable Hudson's Bay post.

Sunday, 20th August, A. M.—Squally with rain. 6 A. M. leave a portion of my provisions as a depot in charge of Mr. McKenzie, the officer commanding the post. Noon, the weather is too unsettled to attempt crossing the lake, and my guide does not join me until tomorrow. Sunset, cloudy with rain.

Monday, 21st August.—Left the Hudson's Bay post, feeling thankful to Mr. McKenzie for the kindness he had shown me, and the trouble he had taken to procure me a guide, whom I agreed to pay three pounds fifteen shillings per month. The morning overcast—wind south-east—thermometer  $64^{\circ}$ . We had not proceeded more than a mile when a storm of wind and rain overtook our canoe, and compelled me to bear away for a small rocky island under our lee—landed every thing safe. At 10, A. M., we had just pitched our tent more secure than generally, a gust of wind tore every thing away around us. Our tent remained on the rock after it blew down. The rain descended in torrents, the lightning vivid, and the day unusually dark. The lake, as far as eye could see, one continued breaker. At noon, finding no hope of the storm moderating, I proceeded to erect my tent, made a fire of the drift wood found on the island, cut down the only tree of any size to prevent its falling, should we be visited with a second part, as the appearance then indicated. At 2, P. M. all was set when we received another gust more terrific than the former, inasmuch that we could not stand erect. It continued some time. I never experienced such a scene. It brought to my mind the Boreas of the Adriatic, with this difference, the wind changes from point to point on this lake, blowing equally hard, while those of the gulph alluded to blow from one point. My guide informed me such squalls were not uncommon in the neighbourhood of lake Nipissingue; so much were they dreaded by the Indians that none ventured to cross in doubtful weather any of the deep bays. At sunset, the rain has ceased, the wind blows a gale, and distant thunder is heard at intervals.

Tuesday, 22d August, A. M.—Heavy gales from the N. W. with rain and hail. 8, thermometer 56°. At noon, the same weather. Sunset, heavy gales.

Wednesday, 23d August, A. M.—Heavy gales from the S. E. with rain. At 8, the thermometer 60°. Noon, the same as above. At 4, P. M. more moderate. The sun appears and enable us to dry our wet clothing.

Thursday, 24th August, A. M.—Moderate and fine. At 5, A. M. moderate and cloudy, wind N. W., embarked and proceeded to the mouth of Sturgeon river. At 6, A. M. enter Sturgeon river, the approach to which is through a channel of 10 or 12 feet water, with a swamp of rushes on either side. This continues for about one mile, when sand banks commence on both sides, having a small growth of birch, poplar, ash and willow on them. The current is equal to one mile per hour. From the marks on the banks, I am of opinion that it is very strong during the spring and autumn, and 4 or 5 feet higher than at present. Ascend the river to the distance of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  miles from its entrance, we arrive at Sturgeon falls, 35 feet, tumbling through granite and divided by rocky islets. I estimate the rise of the river 15 feet, which, with the rise of the fall, will equal 50 feet. The portage is on the right hand, as you ascend the stream, and about one quarter of a mile across, rocky and uneven. Having crossed the portage, we embark; the river takes a north easterly direction for 3 miles. The banks assume a sandy subsoil, the top being a vegetable mould. The trees are taller and of a more thrifty growth than those below the falls. There are many soft maple and black oak; but remove the trees, and the soil which now supports them would be lost. At noon, heavy showers. The river trends to the north-east for a distance of four miles, when we arrive at the sand falls, 7 miles from Sturgeon falls, the intermediate current more rapid. This fall is about 20 feet perpendicular, and 125 feet above lake Nipissingue, passing through rocks of granite of the description of those at Sturgeon falls. Quantities of white cedar grow in this vicinity and attain a large size. On landing you fancy yourself in a vast cedar swamp. The banks bear marks of inundation in spring. At 6, P. M. encamp for the night.

Friday, 25th August, A. M.—Moderate and cloudy. At daylight wind N. W., embark and ascend the stream one mile and three-quarters from Sand Fall. A remarkable hill of granite rises abruptly out of the sunk bank of the river to the height of 150 feet from its base, and nearly perpendicular, stretching away to the south-west, and continuing in a south-westerly direction, until lost to the view. On the opposite side of the river, I observed an evident connection with the hill above-mentioned, diluvial masses of great size lie scattered in every direction, rearing their hard heads out of the sand, are again lost, being so covered with alluvial as to appear to have no link to the gigantic cliffs of the opposite bank.

Geological, Nos. 13 and 14.—We arrive at some rapids; distance above the Sand Falls two and a half miles; ascend them, 33 feet fall, and 158 above lake Nipissingue. One mile and a half from the Stone Rapids are Smoke Falls, tumbling over rugged crags 65 feet, and nearly perpendicular. An island of some extent divides the course of the river. At these falls the rocks are granite, many fossil boulders lie on the banks above the falls. The portage is about half a mile over an uneven road or path, which appears but little used. Having crossed the portage we proceed to ascend the river, current sluggish. It may be remarked that the river does not vary in breadth materially, being from one hundred to one hundred and fifty yards from its entrance to the Smoke Falls, widening to a basin as you approach the fall of three hundred yards wide. This is very remarkable in all instances. At 6, P. M. encamp for the night.

Saturday, 26th August, A. M.—Moderate and cloudy. At 6, wind south-east—thermometer 56°. We ascend the river to the Forks, a distance of 14 miles, the branch running to the westward, unites itself by a circuitous route to waters connected with White Fish Lake, and the easterly branch with a small lake, and its tributaries to the north-east. The intermediate distance being a sluggish irregular stream from one to two hundred yards wide, in many places very shallow. The character of the country in the vicinity is principally granite, craggy and broken, the hollows filled with a light yellow sand, rising to a considerable height, and in some places forming the banks of the river alternately with the granite. The timber in the neighbourhood is pine and white cedar, principally ash, beach, birch and larch, of an inferior growth, are also met with; but there is no land that can be appropriated to agriculture. From the forks of the river, one mile in a north-easterly direction, we come to a rapid—the fall, together with the rise of the river, is equal to 80 feet, or 303 feet above Lake Nipissingue, and not more than 15 miles in a direct line to that lake. At sunset moderate and cloudy, encamped for the night.

Sunday, 27th August, A. M.—Moderate and cloudy. At 8, dull weather, wind S. E., thermometer 56°. Embarked and ascended the stream at a distance of one mile from rapid 303 feet above Nipissingue, we arrive and enter the nine mile rapid; the current runs at the rate of 6 miles per hour, and more rapid over the shallow places. At 4 miles we cross a portage of half a mile—river 100 feet above the last portage. The banks of the river are granite and fossil rocks, steep and craggy. Woods in the vicinity are birch, poplar and cedar, some pine; the growth of the whole is small, being about four and a half rings to the inch, of these, and less in proportion to the nature of the tree. At sunset, cloudy with rain.

Monday, 28th August, A. M.—Moderate and cloudy. At 6, A. M. embarked, ascended the rapids—at 8 the wind variable, thermometer 51°. This day we passed five portages.—Whole fall of the nine mile rapid 150 feet. The portages are of the same character, from one to three-quarters of a mile long, rocky and uneven granite and greenstone, the latter dipping to the north in many places, almost perpendicular.

Geological, No. 15.—On the north side the banks are composed of the alluvial sand and boulders of granite, greenstone, slate and porphyry. At the fifth portage we encamp for the night. A pine tree of considerable size fell on my tent, giving me just time to escape; it destroyed my box of sundries and some of my instruments, fortunately those that I had most use for were spared, by being in my haversack. At midnight, rainy weather.

Tuesday, 29th August, A. M.—Cloudy, wind variable—at 8, wind south-west, thermometer 56°. Embarked, ascended the river in an easterly direction, banks rocky and uneven, mica, slate and granite principally; stream rapid. At a mile and a half from the portage, the river, (geological No. 16,) expands to the width of a mile, to a small rocky lake, three-quarters of a mile wide, with a rocky island in the centre; water deep in some places; banks of the lake steep and rugged. After leaving the lake, we ascend a small rapid, in a north direction, with a fall of 50 feet; the river again trends to the eastward, about 150 yards wide, and very crooked; at one mile, we enter a small lake, called Bass Lake, one mile and three-quarters long, and a mile wide, full of small granite islands, on some of which I found slate of a tolerable good quality, resting on the granite. The intermediate and surrounding country, is a succession of granite hills, covered with a small growth of pine, birch and poplar. At 4 P. M., squally, with heavy rain; wind S. E.; encamp.

Wednesday, 30th August.—A. M. squally, with heavy rain. At 8 A. M., wind S. E.; thermometer 52°; detained by stormy weather. At sunset, more moderate.

Thursday, 31st August.—A. M. moderate and fine; at 6, embarked; crossed a small portage of 300 yards, to avoid a rapid of 20 feet fall—(geological No. 17.) At 8, moderate and fine; wind N. W.; thermometer 47°; ascended a narrow, deep stream; passed some singular perforations in the granite, (geological No. 18,) or slate rocks, which form the banks; the principal component of the granite in this section, is mica, which may account for those cavities above named. We cross a (geological No. 19,) small lake, called Red Pine, from the surrounding country being covered with that wood, which is of a moderate growth. The land that surrounds this lake, is much higher than I have before met with, rising abruptly to the height of 300 or 350 feet, with a bold, clear outline, and deep ravines. The lake is one mile and a half long, north and south, and a mile wide; deep, and full of small islands. At the end of a lake, we ascend a rapid, with a fall of 10 feet; cross a portage of  $\frac{3}{4}$  of a mile; after ascending the river a half mile, we come to another portage of  $\frac{5}{8}$ ths of a mile, with a fall of 35 feet. The character of the portages is, as above described, rocky and uneven. (Geological No. 20.) We cross a small lake, abounding with bass and carp, one mile and a half long, full of small islets; the land in its vicinity bold and undulating, formed by slate hills; timber the same as in the neighbourhood of Bass Lake; ascend a rapid 8 feet fall; encamp for the night; A. M. moderate and cloudy.

Friday, 1st September.—Embark; ascend the rapids at 8; wind, north-west; thermometer 44°; crossed Lake Traverse, four miles in north and north-west direction; full of small islands—(geological No. 21); and thence about a mile and a half, in a south-westerly direction, to a rapid which we passed, by a portage, low and swampy, the whole rise of the river from the 8 feet rapid, equals 40 feet. The falls at the portage, are 20 feet, tumbling through slate rocks. These falls I have called Tamagamingue. We ascend a small rapid, four feet fall, into Lake Tamagamingue, which lake I estimate at 715 feet above Lake Nipissingue. There are nineteen portages, and long and continued rapids, where no convenient crossing could be had; we had recourse to ropes, by which means we dragged our canoe up the shore, that we could not ascend with paddles—(geological No. 22.) There is no soil between Nipissingue and Tamagamingue fit for agriculture; nor do I believe there is any to the north or north-west. The Indians I have met, describe that country to be worse than any I have traversed, and from their description of the country through which I have passed being correct, I am of opinion that there is none. At sunset, landed at a winter post of the Honourable Hudson Bay Company, 7 miles from the entrance of the lake, in a north-east direction: encamped.

Saturday, 2nd September, A. M.—Squally, with rain; at 8, fresh gales, and rain; thermometer 44°; detained by stormy weather; noon, fresh gales from the north; sunset, the same weather; midnight, moderate and fine.

Sunday, 3rd September, A. M.—Moderate and hazy weather; wind north; at 8, thermometer 35°; heavy frost during the night; embark, and proceed towards the eastward of the lake. Noon, observe the meridian alt'de. of the sun, latitude 46° 54' 24" north longitude, by account 79° 34' west of meridian of Greenwich. P. M.—Strong breezes and squally, from the north-east; encamped, the wind being too strong for our canoes to make headway; sunset, moderate and fine.

Monday, 4th September, A. M.—Moderate and cloudy; 8, wind south-west; thermometer 39°; embark at 10; arrive at a portage at the eastern extremity of the lake. Tamagamingue is 20 geographical miles in length—its greatest breadth about 3; in some places it is narrow, and full of islands and islets. The water is deep, and beautifully clear; there are several small streams that fall into it, but very inconsiderable in size. The lake abounds with fish—those taken in the summer months are black bass, carp, jack; in the streams that run into the lake there are plenty of trout: and from about the 20th of September until the setting in of the ice, trout and white fish of a good kind, and in quantities—the usual way of taking them is by a gill-net. The animals taken in the neighbourhood are the beaver, otter, mink, muskrat and deer—sometimes moose. The whole of the surrounding country is slate, the outline of which is bold; the highest land about 400 feet above the lake, timbered with pine, birch, poplar—the latter in larger quantities. The waters of this lake fall into the Ottawa and Lake Nipissingue, and receives its supply from the tributary streams which are emptied into it; to the west its connection with Lake Nipissingue is by a succession of lake and rapid streams, and with the Ottawa by a chain of lakes, nearly on a level, and a rapid stream to Lake Temiscamingue, where it enters at the conflux of the Montreal River with that lake. A. M. at 10, pass the portage, and enter a small lake, which is connected by a narrow, shallow stream with Tamagamingue; pass across the lake to another portage, one-quarter of a mile across—then into a lake the same as above: the surrounding country is high slate, partially covered with wood. From the east end of this lake, which may be called a part of Tamagamingue, cross a portage one-eighth of a mile, to avoid a narrow, shoal stream, with scarce any perceptible current, and enter into a lake called Fire Lake, from the ravages of this element with the woods of the country around it. This lake is about 4 miles long, and 1 mile wide, lying north and south, with a deep bay at the north-east end: the shores are undulating hills of slate, about 100 feet high. At the southern extremity of the lake, we cross a portage of a quarter of a mile, to avoid a fall of 22 feet descending, and enter Lake Wapoose, which is an irregular sheet of water, deep and full of slate islets, deep bays—is 7 miles long, lying north-west and south-east, and about one mile wide; surrounding country slate hills, moderately high: quantities of red pine timber of a tolerable good growth, fill the valleys of this section. Sunset moderate and fine; arrive at a portage 300 yards across slate rock.

Tuesday, 5th September.—The fall at this place is equal to 30 feet; immediately below the fall the river is a continued rapid for four miles, running to the north-east. (Geological No. 23.)—Come to a portage 400 yards across; fall 24 feet, running through slate rocks—thence half a mile by a crooked stream, to a fall of 75 feet. The portage to avoid this fall is 2 miles across a slate rock; rocks of slate 200 feet high, and nearly perpendicular, overhanging the river. Half a mile below the fall we encamp for the night.

Wednesday, 6th September, A. M.—Moderate and cloudy; at 8, A. M. wind south-east, thermometer 60°, we embark and descend the stream; enter a small lake, 2 miles long: taking a north-east direction, pass a narrow channel, and arrive at a lake one mile in length, at the eastern end of which there is a portage—the river runs off to the north of the portage; this portage is across a mountain of slate, 300 feet high, and is two miles long: difficult to ascend and descend, from its slippery surface, occasioned by the moisture retained in the top slate. The river at this portage forms a half-moon to the north of the mountain: the opposite shore is equally high, but more rugged—and the waters of the river assume a boiling cataract for about  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles, making a fall equal to 300 feet. My guide could not find a name for the fall I have just passed; we embark and descend the stream—meet with a party of Indians. The name given to the falls by them is “Jashginawasingue,” and the river “Metabegewan.” The river continues rapid until near the mouth, a distance of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles from the fall of Jashginawasingue; it empties at the conflux of the Montreal River with Lake Temiscamingue, and is divided from it by a narrow slate mountain. At the conflux of these rivers with Temiscamingue, there are several alluvial islands, composed of sand and boulders of granite and slate; here the slate ends—i. e. its eastern limit, but continues northward up the lake, on the west shore. The shores to the southward of Metabigewan, on both sides, are granite. At 5, P. M. heavy rain; encamped at the Temiscamingue house, 9 miles N. N. E. of Metabigewan.—Sunset squally with rain.

This lake is 50 geographical miles in length: its extreme breadth not more than 3—in some places scarcely 1; it lies between the parallel 46° 45', and 47° 30' north, and in longitude west of the meridian of Greenwich 78° 48'. The shores which surround the lake are mountainous and steep: granite and slate form the principal character of the rocks in the vicinity; the soil is of a coarse, gravelly nature, not fit for cultivation. About the centre of the lake, the Hudson's Bay Company have a post situated on a neck of land, at which place the lake narrows to about a quarter of a mile; the site chosen for the house and stores of the Company commands a view of the lake several miles up and down, and is picturesque in its appearance. Mr. Hardesty, the gentleman in the temporary command of this station, in the absence of Angus Cameron, Esquire, the Superintendent of the District, informed me that Mr. Cameron had been upwards of 20 years at the Temiscamingue station: that it was his opinion, that no place upon the lake could soil so productive be found as at that station.—Here I am left to form my own conclusions. The soil alluded to is a coarse gravel and sand: much has been done in way of manure to nourish it; the hay cut from the swamp prairies in the vicinity, affords the means of keeping some cows and oxen, which assist in producing manure sufficient to enable them to cultivate a few acres of potatoes, and sometimes a little wheat and peas—this year the wheat was a failure, and the peas poor; I therefore conclude, that there is no country in the neighbourhood of this lake fitted for the purpose of agriculture.—Fish there are but few, and those of an inferior kind. The waters of this lake are dark and muddy; the animals principally taken in the neighbourhood are hare, otter, beaver, minx, muskrat.

Thursday, 7th September, A. M.—Cloudy, with rain; wind south; at 8 A. M. thermometer 60°; wind south; embark, and proceed down the lake; at 2 P. M. strong breezes, and squally, with rain; encamp at the entrance of Montreal River, 8 miles from the Hudson Bay house. Sunset, heavy gales, with rain.

Friday, 8th September, A. M.—Heavy gales; at 8, wind south, thermometer 60°; embark; made a vain attempt to stem the wind—found it impracticable—returned, and encamped. P. M.—Weather continues as above; sunset, heavy squalls of rain.

Saturday, 9th September, A. M.—Strong gales and squally; at 8, thermometer 54°; wind south. Noon, heavy squalls—dark, cloudy weather. Sunset, more moderate. Midnight, fine weather.

Sunday, 10th September, A. M.—Moderate and fine; at day-light embark, and steer down the lake—wind S. S. E. direction; at 8, A. M. fine, clear weather—wind east, thermometer 47°. South of Metabigewan, the fire has laid bare the forest: where the tall pine once grew, the poplar shews its trembling, pale leaf; here and there are the branchless trunks of the pine—(Geological, No. 25, east side: No. 26, west side, below Metabigewan.) At noon observed the meridian altitude of the sun; latitude 46, 55, 28 north, longitude by account 78° 52' west of Greenwich: variation 7 easterly. P. M.—Fine clear weather; passed the Rivers Otter-tail and Bomagawzebe. One mile S. E. of Bomagawzebe, we arrive at the southern extremity of the lake; enter a small rapid—“La Galore”; descend the rapid, and pass down the river, to a distance of 7 miles—encamp for the night. The intermediate country between Rapid La Galore and the head of Long Sault Rapid, is generally high: hills of granite, steep to the margin of the river, forming deep ravines, covered with wood—pine, beach, soft maple, poplar, birch and black oak, all are small in their growth.

Monday, 11th September, A.M.—Moderate and fine; at day-light embark; 8, fine, clear weather, thermometer 35°; descend the Rapids of the Long Sault; pass 3 portages, from 3 to 500 yards across—whole fall of the river from Lake Temiscamingue, I estimate at 222 feet. The shores of the river from the head of Long Sault is one succession of granite hills, with an occasional alluvial flat—on these flats, which are very limited in extent, grow some good red pine timber. The fire appears to have done much injury to the forest: the hunter is rarely met with—for the woods do not afford cover for the object of his pursuits. Sunset—cloudy weather; encamp for the night.

Tuesday, 12th September, A.M.—Cloudy, with frost; at day-light embark and descend the stream; at 8, A.M. wind N.E.—thermometer 31°. Noon, fine weather; arrive at mountain portage; observe the meridian altitude of the sun, latitude 46° 26' N. longitude by account, 78° 34' west of Greenwich; pass the portage and descend the stream—observed several roads made by the lumberers, and much square timber on the shores adrift. The country is extremely rugged; granite is the base—sand fills the ravines and hollows: red pine of a tolerable growth covers the land. This, I think, will be found the north limit of lumbering.

Tuesday, 12th September, P.M.—Since clear weather, pass 2 portages; the rocks at the two last rapids are singularly perforated—many of the holes are 6 feet diameter, and 30 feet deep, forming a most extraordinary appearance; and should they be full of water, as they sometimes are, a stranger might be deceived, and get a ducking before he was aware of it. Sunset, arrive at Matawa River; the shores of the river we have passed to-day are granite, rugged and precipitous, partially covered with wood—pine, oak and birch, being the principal. Encamp at the mouth of the Matawa River.

Wednesday, 13th September, A.M.—Fine, clear weather; at day-light embark, and enter the River Matawa; ascend in a westerly direction, one mile and a quarter current rapid; pass many rocky islets: bottom flat and shallow, full of large granite boulders; shores rugged and irregular, covered with pine and poplar, and a few scattered trees of small growth, such as oak, maple, larch, birch. At a distance of 2½ miles from the entrance, we arrive at Portage Plein Chant.

Geological, No. 27.—The rise of the river at the west side of this portage is equal to 40 feet. Thence in a westerly direction 4½ miles to a Portage de la Rose, in the intermediate distance, the river is free of an obstruction, and from 300 yards to half a mile wide; from 10 to 15 feet deep; current sluggish; shores bold granite, rising abruptly from the level of the river to the height of 150 feet, covered with pine, cedar, poplar, birch; rise above the Ottawa, 55 feet; thence half a mile to Portage de la Compagny. This section of the river is filled with rocks and flats, shallow.

Geological, No. 28.—The shores are irregular masses of granite; rise of the river above the Ottawa, 65 feet; thence one mile and a quarter to Rocher's Portage. This section is full of rapids, narrow in places: shoal, and full of small islands; shores irregular and steep; thence to Needle Rapid.

Geological, No. 29.—Here the river passes through cliffs of ferruginous clay-stone, not more than 20 feet wide, from Needle Rapid to Matawa, full a distance of three and a half miles; the river is from 300 yards to half a mile wide; banks precipitous, of the same character as those at Needle Rapid. Near Matawa Fall, on the right hand as you ascend, in the bank is a singular cave, 25 feet diameter, and 20 feet high inside: its entrance is on the river side—the interior, as well as the exterior, has the appearance of a mine. The gravity of the substance which forms it is equal to iron: it resembles bog iron. Matawa Fall is 30 feet perpendicular, and 115 feet above the Ottawa. Sunset, cloudy—Encamp.

Thursday, 14th September, A.M.—Calm and fine; at day-light embark, and ascend the stream. At a distance of 1 mile from Matawa Fall, we arrive at Portage de la Prairie; the intermediate distance is narrow and impeded: the shores steep or precipitous, covered with wood of a small growth. The river continues rapid, flat, and full of rocks, above this portage for 1 mile; we then pass across 2 shallow lakes, communicating with each other by a channel 20 yards wide.

Geological, No. 30.—From the western end of these lakes the river is narrow, shores precipitous, chiefly red granite, until we come to Hang Fall, distant 1 mile: here the water tumbles over 3 flats of granite rock, 20 feet each, and reaches the level below, at a distance of 100 yards from the first drop. The approach to this fall is by a very narrow stream, filled with deluvial masses of granite—thence across a lake in a westerly direction, 8 miles, is impeded by rocky flats, and narrow passages; shores, granite—steep, and covered with wood. At its western end it is joined by another small lake, by a creek passing through a marsh; this creek is narrow, and overhung with swamp willow and fallen timber: therefore we cross over a portage to avoid it. There is little current perceptible in this creek: the water above being nearly on the same level—thence across another small lake, for one mile shallow and impeded; this is joined by a rivulet running through a bog—thence across another small lake, 4 miles long, narrow and impeded, to a rapid, 4 feet fall; the river at this rapid is narrow, and full of rocks—thence to a lake 8 miles long, with a peninsula running from the west end to the east, the whole way through, making two lakes, which are united by a small channel at the eastern end; the shores of these lakes are granite and sand: those of the north rise to a considerable height, and are covered with pine, maple, birch, beech. Several inconsiderable rivulets run into the lake from the north; the peninsula is rugged granite—south shore, granite moderately high and undulating. Noon, fine; observed the meridian altitude of the sun: latitude  $46^{\circ} 26'$ , N. longitude by account  $79^{\circ} 27'$  W. P.M.—Strong gales, and squally; Encamp. Sunset, squally weather.

Friday, 15th September, A. M.—Variable winds; at daylight, embark; arrive at the south-western end of the lake; from this a small creek descending, leads to Lake Nipissingue, by a winding circuitous course, tending to the south, too shallow in places to admit a canoe, principally through a marsh, with a granite bottom. On approach to the rapids of this creek, the granite lies some feet above the alluvial. We pass two portages, nearly two miles in length, which makes the distance from the last-named lake 8 miles from the last of these portages; the creek widens from 80 to 120 yards, and is navigable to the lake, 4 or 5 miles, in a south-west direction; the current is sluggish, and alluvial banks form the shore, which appears generally overflowed. At sunset, encamp at the entrance of Turtle River; strong breezes, and squally.

Saturday, 16th September, A. M.—Squally, with rain; embark; proceed along the shore westward for two miles; wind strong from the eastward; at noon, strong breezes, and fine; observed the meridian altitude of the sun,  $46^{\circ} 14'$  north longitude, by account  $79^{\circ} 40'$  W. At sunset, land on a small island at the entrance of the south bay, Lake Nipissingue, and encamp; midnight, heavy gales from the eastward, with rain.

Sunday, 17th September, A. M.—Strong gales and squally weather; at 8, thermometer  $33^{\circ}$ ; wind at East. Noon, the same weather as above; sunset, heavy gales with squalls.

Monday, 18th Sept. A. M.—Strong gales; at 8, thermometer  $42^{\circ}$ ; wind S.E.—Noon heavy gales; sunset moderate; wind changes to the north.

Tuesday, 19th September, A. M.—Fresh breezes and squally; at daylight embarked, and proceed from island to island, up South Bay to the entrance of South River; noon, heavy gales; land. This bay is about four miles deep, full of small islands, as you approach the entrance of South River there are a great many flat rocks below the surface of the bay; in every other respect the bay is accessible for vessels drawing 10 feet of water. At noon, heavy gales; land, and wait a lull. P. M. more moderate, embark, and steer round the eastern point of the bay "Point Croix"; thence to an island in a westerly direction 2 miles to camp; sunset, fresh breezes, and cloudy.

Wednesday, 20th September, A. M.—Moderate and fine; daylight, embark and proceed across the lake in a westerly direction. At noon, arrive at the Post of the Hudson's Bay Company. I find it impossible to get a guide to pursue my journey by any other route than French River, being so late in the season. The Indians are all engaged by the Traders, and are not inclined to volunteer their services, their favourite occupation, "hunting," absorbing every thought. Sunset, fine weather.

Thursday, 21st September, A. M.—Fine clear weather. This day I employed the men airing provisions and cleaning their clothes. At noon, observed the meridian altitude of the sun, Latitude  $46^{\circ} 18' 10''$  N. Longitude, by account  $79^{\circ} 41'$  West of the meridian of Greenwich. P. M.—Proceeded in a N.W. course to Grape Island, near the centre of the lake; the greatest depth of water I have found on this lake is 30 feet; the islands in the centre as well as the shores of the lake are granite; sunset, fine weather.

Friday, 22nd September, A. M.—Strong gales, and squally; at daylight discharge my guide (an Indian); received the provisions I had left as a depot in charge of McKenzie; took leave of the good people of this station, whose kindness to forward my pursuits, and give me other aid, I shall long remember. Noon, squally, wind at west; crossed from island to island being the only plan I could take to make headway against the breeze; sunset, heavy gales and squally, with rain and thunder.

Saturday, 23rd September.—Fresh breezes and cloudy; at daylight, embark, and proceed towards River Bay; at noon, arrive at the Chaudiere Falls; pass the portage, and descend the river as far as Pine Rapid; at sunset, encamp for the night.

Sunday, 24th September, A. M.—Moderate and fine; at daylight embark, and descend the Pine Rapids; cross Pine portage, thence down rapids Grand Faucile, Croix and Brisson. P. M. Fine weather; descend Petit Faucile Rapid; thence 18 miles due west, to a small lake; sunset, fine. Encamp.

Monday, 25th September.—Light breezes with drizzling rain; embark, and descend the river; arrive at Grand Recollect Fall; pass the portage; this portage, 100 yards across, I did not pass on my ascent, having come by the eastern entrance; the fall is about 10 feet perpendicular; the river below narrow and deep; shores precipitous; current sluggish, except a rapid occasionally. At a distance of 17 miles we arrive at Fall la Dalla portage, the same as Grand Recollect; from thence I re-traced the river to an opening 3 miles above; thence running in a S.E. direction and joining the east entrance; thence by a circuitous route to the Hudson's Bay post, where I had left a depot of provisions and my cedar canoe. Sunset, heavy gales, with rain. Prepare my cedar canoe for crossing Lake Huron.

Tuesday, and Wednesday.—Heavy gales from the S.E. and N.E. with constant rain, unable to proceed.

Thursday, 28th September.—Strong gales with rain from the N.E.; proceed from island to island in a S.E. direction along the N.E. shore of Lake Huron. Noon, heavy gales; sunset, squally weather.

Friday, 29th September.—Fresh breezes and cloudy; at daylight embark, steering to the S.E. between the islands on the N.E. shore of Lake Huron.

Saturday, September 30th.—Heavy gales, with rain at intervals, during three days.

Sunday—Proceed in a S.E. direction, threading the islands and landing when necessary; at 6 P.M. arrive in Penetanguishine, haul up canoes, and encamp.

Tuesday, and Wednesday.—Employed the crew in drying provisions &c.

Thursday.—Dispose of the remaining stores and provisions at public auction, as per account.

Friday.—Discharge the crew, paid up to the 9th instant; proceed to Toronto.

Tuesday.—Arrive in Toronto; report proceedings to the Honourable John Macaulay, Surveyor General; receive instructions to proceed to Kingston; arrive at Kingston, and proceed to compile report and chart of my route.

REPORT OF D. THOMPSON.

---

REPORT on the examination of the Ottawa River, the Muskrat Lake and River, &c. under the instructions of Honourable John Macaulay, John Cartwright, Esquire, and Captain Francis H. Baddeley, R.E. Commissioners for the Survey of the Ottawa River, &c. &c. &c.

GENTLEMEN,

It was my intention to have drawn up a short report, without giving the levels, plans, &c. but as I proceeded, it appeared to me that such a report would by no means enable the Commissioners to have such a view of the most important part of the Ottawa River, as to enable them to form a tolerable correct view of the Calumet Falls—apparently the greatest obstacle to the formation of a Canal in the whole river: and at the same time a comparative view of a Canal by the way of McNaughton's Brook, the Muskrat Lake and River; by which last, the public have been led to think, the Calumet Falls can be avoided, with certainty of success, and at a moderate expense—and have extended the report in the form now drawn up. I considered an abstract of part of my journal might also be acceptable, to show how that country is at present; and the almost constant rain during the latter part of the summer continued to the beginning of winter, and thus account for the very unusual high water in all the rivers and lakes—which state of high water, if depended on, would lead to very erroneous conclusions.

November 11th, 1837.—Near noon, we arrived at Mr. Alexander McNaughton's establishment of two log-houses and a saw-mill, in charge of Mr. Alexander McDonald, about 5 miles below the channel of the Calumet Falls. Mr. McDonald readily gave us shelter; I explained to him the business I was on, and that it was my intention to proceed directly to Muskrat Lake, &c. &c. He promised to assist me to the utmost of his power—but justly remarked, the woods from hence to Muskrat Lake were next to impassable, from the great quantity of rain lately fallen; the ground and swamps partly frozen, yet not sufficiently strong to bear the oxen that must haul our provisions, &c. but that every exertion should be made. At 2, P.M. a man set off to the Muskrat Lake, a distance of about 9 miles direct, to get the settlers there to come and assist us. At night Mr. McNaughton arrived, who gave orders for every assistance to be rendered to us; all hands worked until late to get a strong ox-sled ready.

November 12th.—Every thing was put in the canoe, and taken down the river, about 1 mile, to a shanty road, and then carried above the second bank; by 10½, A.M. the sled was loaded, and 2 teams of oxen tackled to it—on good roads a single ox would have hauled the weight we had. For the first three-quarters of a mile we had very heavy work, cutting away the fallen trees—after which the road was much better, except the wet grounds, which the oxen got through with much difficulty. At 2, P.M. having come about 3 miles, fed the cattle: then set off, and having advanced about three-quarters of a mile, came to a branch of the brook, about 2 yards wide, over which we had to make a bridge: this took us to 3½, P.M.; we then carried every thing over, by which time it was too dark to cut wood, and lay down without making a fire.

November 13th and 14th.—Were spent much in the same manner, except that for the greater part of the time it required 3 men to clear the road of fallen trees, and the wet pieces of ground were frequent; near sunset we arrived at the Muskrat Lake. The devious road we followed, presented no obstacle to the cutting a Canal; the soil appeared tolerable good, covered with forest of hard woods and white firs—the latter, though of a fine growth, all dry, and in a state of decay. It appears about eight years ago, a peculiar kind of disease attacked all the trees of this species of fir, and of this species only: the top extremity of each tree appears to have been the seat of the disease, as the very upper part of the trees are very much decayed, and the upper extremity gone, while all the remainder of the trees to the root, though dry, is sound and not even attacked by worms. From the information I can collect, this decayed state of the white fir extends over at least 400 or 500 square miles: we remarked it on the Madawaska River; the consequence now is, that travelling through these woods is dangerous, especially in windy weather—and cattle can travel only where men precede them with axes. On arriving at the lake, though late, Mr. McDonald directly went off to procure the loan of 2 log canoes, to take us over the lake, and down the river, to Lac des Allumettes, in the Ottawa River.

November 15th.—Mr. McDonald having procured the loan of two canoes, I sent for them; one of the canoes we may use as long as wanted, the other to be returned on the 17th instant. Having only three men, I engaged a young man to help us, and take back the canoe. Set off, and passed over Muskrat and Mud Lakes: the bays, &c. frozen over.

November 16th.—Snowed most of the day; by 10, A.M. got to the head of the rapids of the Muskrat River—put ashore, and began our preparations to take the levels. On examining the river, found that it had no beach; we were therefore obliged to open a line through the woods, near the bank of the river. Thermometer 24°.

November 17th and 18th.—With three men slowly opening a narrow line and taking the levels; heavy rain came on and continued all night.

November 19th.—At 8, A.M. the rain ceased—the country appears inundated; we had to cut drains before we could make a fire. We then resumed our slow work until the evening—when heavy rain came on, and continued all night.

November 20th.—Thermometer 37°; the rain continued all day and night—the ground like a lake; the river rose about 4 feet. All we could do was to cut bundles of brush-wood, to keep us out of the water, and sit on them; the rain changed to sleet, and the trees became loaded with it.

November 21st.—Thermometer 37°; the same weather continued all night and day.

November 22nd.—Thermometer 36°; close misty rain, which at 9, A.M. became steady rain. The season advancing, and the bad weather continuing, I determined to quit taking levels, and examine the river and its rapids by estimation. With two men in a canoe set off, and went down the river to the carrying place, above the Indian stream—and from thence walked to the sortie of the river, into a fine bay of Lac des Allumettes; but the rain was too heavy to allow me to take the courses &c. of the river. We returned to the head of the rapids.

November 23rd.—Thermometer 24°; a heavy north-west gale, with thick, driving snow—very bad; packed up, and with two men in a log canoe, set off—leaving Mr. Dawson, the Assistant, and man, with the tent &c.: we could not embark. We went about 10 miles to the Narrows, to the open hut of an old soldier, where we found something like shelter from the storm of wind and snow; tried to send the men and canoe back, but the weather was too severe. The Thermometer fell to 17°.

November 24.—Thermometer 14°; N.W. wind; cloudy; sent off two men and the canoe to bring up what remained. Soon after, a Mr. Roberts and a man passed in a canoe, but soon returned, and informed me the river was frozen over; that my men had proceeded only about one mile in the canoe, and then had to break the ice for 150 yards, to get ashore. About half a mile from this hut is a quarry of good lime stone. Thermometer 14°; snow.

November 25th.—Thermometer 13°; cloudy. About 5, P.M. the men arrived: they had to carry every thing nine miles, through a rough country, and much fallen trees—the last mile they came in the canoe. Thermometer 12°.

November 26th.—Thermometer 10°; loaded the canoe, and two men went off in it; the rest of us walked through the woods for two miles, and then for two miles on the ice. Here the lake was frozen over; we fixed our carrying-slings to the canoe, and with its cargo, hauled it over the ice for about one mile, to open water, and held on to 3½ P.M. when we put up for the night at the house of Mr. Newton, who kindly received us. Thermometer 13°.

November 27th.—Thermometer 9°; clear and cold. The men in bad humour, from cold, fatigue and want of provisions; loaded the canoe, and sent it off to land at Mr. James Ross's house—the rest of us walked thereto. Fortunately Mr. Ross was able to spare us 121 lbs. of pork; sent off Mr. Dawson to look for flour: from Mr. Childs he obtained 100 lbs. of flour, and bought one bushel of peas; we have now provisions for some time: before all this was settled, it was getting late—we carried part of the things half a mile and camped. Thermometer 24°. Paul Laronde, my best man, declines staying any longer; he says that fatigue and cold has worn him out, and he returns the morrow.

November 28th.—Thermometer 17°; engaged a man in the place of Paul Laronde; brought the rest of the things to the camp, and began opening a line from the Muskrat Lake to the pond, as direct as the ground will allow us. This pond is the head of the brook that descends to Mr. McNaughton's saw-mill, close to the Ottawa River. It is doubtful which is on the highest level, the Muskrat Lake or the pond; and my work is to ascertain this point, and what is the rise of land and distance between them.

November 29th and 30th.—Variable weather; we have now opened a line to the east side of the first hill that descends to the Ottawa, a distance of 40 chains, and taken the levels of 22 stations.

December 1st.—Thermometer 34°; got all removed to the pond; ground the axes, and camped. The distance to the pond is 2 miles; but as the oxen could only proceed as the fallen trees were cut away, some of them 14 inches in diameter, it was late before we got to the pond.

On December the 5th, the levels to the pond were completed; the distance by the line we have followed, on account of the fallen wood, &c. is 194 chains, 79 links: we then measured the pond on the ice 30 chains, 60 links.

December 6th and 7th.—Continued opening a line, and taking the levels near down along the brook; but the thickets of willows and elders now became frequent, very tedious to open a line through, and we had to keep in the rising ground for a distance of 52 chains, 42 links, being 10 stations: the land good, and for this distance with very slight undulations, may be said to be level, showing only a depression of 2 inches.

December 8th.—Examined the stock of provisions on hand, and found we had only sufficient for 3 days of flour, and 2 days of pork—and as no more can be procured, I had to break up the survey; the season is late—the days short—and the main object for which I came finished. I sent the Assistant, and one man, to Mr. Alexander McDonald, at the saw-mill on the Ottawa River, to come with a yoke of oxen and sled, and take every thing to his place; the rest of us cut a road to the former ox-road.

December 9th.—Thermometer 11°. At noon, the Assistant, and two extra men, arrived; Mr. McDonald told him, that the half-frozen ground would not bear the oxen: that even single and light, they could not get to us—and that we must extricate ourselves the best way we could. He advised Mr. Dawson to engage two men, and go by the back way to the first houses, which men only could do, and there we might get provisions from day to day. Mr. Dawson took this sound advice—engaged two men, and came to me; all hands turned to make a rough double-sled, which, by night, we got nearly completed.

December 10th.—Thermometer 20°; light snow most of the day. By 10, A.M. got the sled ready, and loaded; all hands tackled to it, and hauled over stumps, fallen trees—frequently upsetting at the end of a mile, which took us a full hour. This rough usage broke the sled to pieces, and we had to make a stronger sled, for which we took iron-wood; at 1½ P.M. we had the sled made, and set off, and kept on until dark. We are now on a kind of road that leads to Portage du Fort, on the Ottawa; finished the last of our provisions—a light supper, after no dinner.

December 11th.—Thermometer 24°; light snow. Early set off; the road is so rough we had frequently to stop, and repair our shattered sled: by 3, P.M. we arrived at the first log-house; here we stopped, and got a meal of such as Olmstead had to spare—paid off the extra men. Mr. Dawson went off to procure a team of oxen, to take us to Portage du Fort—to which there is a rough road.

December 12th.—Thermometer 25°; at 10, A.M. Mr. Dawson arrived: could find no person who would risk his oxen on the road. I sent 2 men to go to Mr. McNaughton's mill, and bring down the cedar canoe to Portage du Fort; they have to haul it over 2 miles of ice, to get to the open water. At noon, Mr. Boulton, from the foot of Portage du Fort, arrived; he very kindly interested himself in extricating us from our present situation—for where we are, the farmer can no longer afford us provisions; without too much lessening what he has for his family. Mr. Bolton, the morrow, will send his oxen for our things to his place, a distance of 3½ miles; he informs me, that from his house we must try the Ottawa River, among the drift ice—as for several miles there is no possibility of passing by land, on account of the deep rocky ravines which intersect the country.

December 13th.—Thermometer 14°. Mr. Bolton's oxen came; we loaded the sled and set off—but it was 3½ P.M. when we got to his house. In hopes of the canoe arriving, we left the things in the sled, and waited the canoe; at 5½ P.M. the two men sent for the canoe arrived: they had attempted to haul the canoe over the 2 miles of ice, but in many places found the ice so weak they broke through, and had to support themselves by the canoe—they were obliged to get the canoe on shore, and left it in the care of Mr. McDonald. Here was the end of my hopes, and at a loss what to do; with my cedar canoe, I should care very little for the drift ice, unless it upset us. Mr. Bolton and others strongly advised me to remain, and wait a change of weather that would set the ice fast; but when this will happen is uncertain—but the expense of waiting is certain. It was late—we found a kind reception in Mr. Bolton's house; in the evening, Mr. Boulton agreed to procure us the loan of a birch rind canoe, and he has one, and thus by the mercy of God get on.

December 14th.—Thermometer 3°; N.W. wind—a bitter cold morning; the drift ice increased both in size and quantity. We got every thing down to the beach, and gummed the canoes; they were so brittle with the cold, we could hardly handle them. By 10, A.M. they were ready: we put a board in the bottom of each canoe to strengthen it, and set off—the wide rapid stream covered with heavy drift ice, which required all our skill to prevent crushing our frail canoes. Having proceeded 2 miles, we perceived the river frozen over, and the rapid current carrying the masses of floating ice under the firm ice, in fine style, like so many diving ducks; we had to use some precaution and activity, to prevent our going the same way: with a little injury to the canoes, we got on the ice and unloaded. Of the two boards put in the canoes we made two rude runners, which we soon completed to something like a sled: on this we put our things; the men hauled it, and Mr. Bolton and myself went ahead, to sound the ice, and mark the road for the men; it was weak, and often bent under our feet. We proceeded about 4 miles, where the river was open, with its drift ice; but this distance brought us to the foot of high undulating banks, on the top of which was the farm of a Mr. McDonald, who sent his oxen for our things, and with whom we got shelter for the night. Mr. Bolton and men returned; they lay up the canoes on the high banks of the shore.

December 15th.—Thermometer 7°, to the evening of December 18th, when we arrived at Bytown; we went on mostly in the usual manner, having oxen or horses from place to place, and following on foot—but a road all the way. The settlers in general behaved towards us with kindness, and rendered us every assistance their slender means could admit. On the evening of the 5th November, the men and canoe &c. arrived at Fitzroy Harbour, situated on the south side of the Ottawa River, at the foot of the Chat Falls; at these Falls the River is about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles wide: the whole of this width is a range of islands—the channels between which form the falls, and pour into a spacious deep basin of calm water. At this season of the year (November) several (sometimes one-half) of these channels are dry; but now the river was uncommonly high, as in the latter end of May, and every channel full of water, so that nothing practicable could be done. The bay of Fitzroy Harbour is generally looked upon as the best place for a canal and locks, to avoid these falls; but from the shoalness of the bay, the canal would have to be made a mile around the bay, to bring it to water deep enough for vessels at the mouth of the canal. With Mr. Shirriff, Senior, I walked over the proposed line: it is over level ground, to the discharge of the Mississippi River, at the head of the bay, and foot of the Chat Falls. The soil appears a strong clay; the banks about 10 feet: and if the locks are allowed 7 feet depth on the sill, will require an excavation of at least 17 feet, to which may be safely added 4 feet, for the present height of water, above the average low level of the water—the ground has to be bored, to know how much may be of rock formation, if any. Several of the inhabitants thought this depth could be attained without meeting with rock of any kind: but this cannot be depended upon.

This leads to the waters of the Mississippi—in high water a bold rapid stream, of about 100 yards wide: and will require an aqueduct, as a dam, to cross it—equal to its greatest height of water—to form a basin level to the height of the Lower Falls of the Chat, from which a canal can be taken to the kind of lake above these falls: this distance may require 3 locks. I proposed taking the levels on my return, but the water was too high, and the season too late. The other mode, and probably the least expensive, is, when the water is low, say in September or October, to examine the range of isles that form these lower falls, within the bounds of Upper Canada, and of the channels then dry, or having but little water; select that which is best adapted for the formation of locks, keeping in view the advantage of a safe arrival and departure. The length of these channels in general is not more than sufficient for the locks to connect the upper and lower basins of deep water, and very moderate current; the excavation is partly made, and in my opinion the expense far less—the simplicity and safety of the whole far greater than the plan proposed by Mr. Shirriff, Senior. The Falls and Rapid of Les Chat, say 51 feet in all; the upper basin of deep water extends about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles; then the series of rapids and low falls which extend about  $1\frac{1}{2}$  miles to Lac des Chats. These rapids &c. have isles, but whether a channel of the isles or the main would be the best place for locks &c. I could not determine. A steam-boat plies on Lac des Chats to the foot of Les Chencaux, or Channels; here for several miles the river passes among islands with a strong current. The present steam-boat, with a weak engine of nominal 25 horse power, had made a few trips up to the foot of Portage du Fort, but the river was now too high for a weak engine; a good boat of 30 horse power would readily make her way up these channels to the Falls of Portage du Fort: at this a single lock, I think, will be sufficient.

Calumet Falls.—These falls are supposed to present the most formidable obstacles to the improvement of the navigation of the Ottawa River, and to avoid them is certainly desirable; for this purpose a line of Canal is proposed by McNaughton's Brook, the Muskrat Lake and River to Upper Lac des Allumettes—and the people on the Ottawa River seem to rely on this line for a canal, with certainty of success, and the formidable Calumet Falls no longer an object of attention. As this part of the country appears to me too intricate to be clearly explained in a mere report, I have added a small rough map, which I hope will prove satisfactory; I have added nothing beyond what I thought requisite to make it intelligible, that it should cost as little as possible. By the map, it will be seen the Calumet Falls, along which is the present route of navigation, are in Lower Canada; and therefore I suppose not within the limits of your Commission, and require no further remark.

The Western channel belongs to Upper Canada, it appears to have many islands, but is very little known from all I could learn, it is a close series of falls &c. without those pieces of moderate current between them which are found in the East channel; but how far the West channel is more or less eligible for a canal than the East channel has yet to be known; the level of the falls by either channel is the same. From former hasty views of the falls of the East channel; I should estimate them at 100 feet, but several intelligent men consider the total height to be about 120 feet; every where of rock, and this rock is lime stone to the best of my memory; from the Grand Calumet I formerly took good specimens of sulphate of limo. By the map the Muskrat River will be seen to discharge itself into Upper Lac des Allumettes; above all the Calumet falls the descent of this river to the lake I estimated at 55 feet; allowing the Calumet falls to be 100 feet in height, this places the Muskrat Lake at the level of 155 feet above the foot of those falls. On the map is marked my line of levels from the Muskrat Lake to the Pond; from the surface of the lake, in a direction N. 55½, E. 19 chains, 40 links direct, the land gradually rises to the height of 60 feet 3 inches; the water in the lake was high, and by the account of the settlers has been known to be about 4 feet lower than it then was, and the lowest water level is that which must be taken; this in dry seasons will give the summit level 64 feet, to which add 7 feet for the canal entrance, making a total of 71 feet at the summit or height of land, that is to say, beginning at the Muskrat Lake, with an excavation of at least 7 feet, and for the distance of 19 chains, 40 links, gradually increasing this excavation to the depth of 71 feet at the summit level; from this summit level the land descends 67 feet to the Pond, besides 4 feet for the depth of the canal, equal 71 feet. The surface of the Pond is now supposed to be brought to the same level with the bottom of the canal in the Muskrat lake, provided it keeps at the level of last December. The surface of the Muskrat lake is 155 feet above the level of the Ottawa River at the foot of all the Calumet Falls, which is the same level as the bay at the mouth of McNaughton's brook; therefore from the pond there is a descent of 155 feet, including the depth of the canal at 7 feet to the Ottawa River, to be gradually worked for 15 or 16 locks in a direct distance of 7 miles. From the Muskrat lake to the height of land, and from thence to the pond, and for about 1 mile beyond, the ground appeared to be as favourable as could be expected for a canal; but from this to the Ottawa River, from a hasty view, the ground appeared to have too many small brooks, banks and broken ground, to admit of a direct line for a canal, and in my opinion it must bend to the northward of this direct line; I have noticed the pond as a point of information, not as decisive that the canal must pass that way. But an important question arises; can such a small lake as the Muskrat Lake give a sure supply of water in the dry season for a canal at least 9 miles in length, with 16 locks to the Ottawa River; and also in an opposite direction for a canal from Mud Lake to Lac des Allumettes, a distance of full 5 miles, with 6 locks?—In favour of the canal from Muskrat Lake to the Ottawa River, it may be said that the rills and small brooks may act as feeders. In dry seasons several of them will be dry, and at most could barely supply the loss of water by evaporation and other causes. On the line of canal from Mud Lake to Lac des Allumettes, it may be said the Indian stream can be made to furnish water for this canal. This stream is too near the mouth of the river for such a purpose, unless at a great expense for a very high dam. The principal supply of water to the Muskrat Lake is the Snake River; the almost continual heavy rains of last autumn rose all the rivers and lakes to an uncommon height, so that no accurate estimate could be made; but on examining the Muskrat River, which carries off all the waters of the lake, an experienced eye might easily see from the very formation of the river, its beds and shoals of gravel and small stones, that in dry seasons it must be very shoal. Below Mud Lake, at the head of the rapids, a dam must be erected, to keep the Muskrat Lake to a proper level, for a sure supply of water to the canal which leads to the Ottawa River; this dam will cut off the supply of water for the canal to Lac des Allumettes, so far as to leave the overplus of water not required for a canal of at least 9 miles and 16 locks to the Ottawa River, and what this overpluss may be is very doubtful. Allowing every thing in favour of the Muskrat Lake, the question seems to resolve itself into this—What is the quantity of water required to supply the canal to the Ottawa River, of full 9 miles, 16 locks, and 7 feet deep, on the supposition of six or more vessels passing each day; and also the quantity of water required for a canal in an opposite direction, of 5 miles, 6 locks, and 7 feet deep, to Lac des Allumettes, for the same number of vessels?

In the dry season, say the month of September, what is the quantity of water furnished by the Snake River, and the brooks around the Muskrat Lake. The result of this latter, compared with the results of the two former for the canals, will on this point determine the practicability of a canal by the Muskrat Lake.

I have dwelt longer on this subject, and entered more into detail, than I intended; but it has been done solely with a view to enable the Commissioners to decide, whether, contrary to the public opinion, it is necessary to order a survey of the Calumet Falls &c. on the side of Upper Canada, or abide by the uncertain practicability of a canal by the Muskrat Lake, and save the time and expense of a survey and estimation of the Calumet Falls.

Very respectfully,

Your Obedient Servant,

The Hon. JOHN MACAULAY,
JOHN S. CARTWRIGHT, Esquire,
Capt. FRANCIS H. BADDELEY, R. Engineers.

DAVID THOMPSON.

REPORT OF MR. HAWKINS, DEPUTY PROVINCIAL SURVEYOR.

TORONTO, 2nd February, 1838.

GENTLEMEN:

In accordance with your instructions, dated July, 1837, directing that I would, in co-operation with Mr. David Thompson, Civil Engineer, proceed to ascertain the most practical communication between the waters of Lake Huron and the Ottawa, or Grand River, I have now the honour of submitting to you the following Report thereon:—

It may be necessary to premise that the altitudes of cataracts and rapids, lengths of portages, &c. entered on the accompanying plans, are not the results of actual measurement, being taken principally by estimation, a process subject to error. I have, however, endeavoured to limit those errors as much as possible, and it is presumed that the quantities thus obtained will be found sufficiently correct for the present preliminary survey.

My attention was at first directed to an examination of the River Maganetawang. This river takes its source in a small lake, situated in latitude 45° 46' 15" north, and empties itself in the north-easterly part of Lake Huron, about 90 miles from Penetanguishine. Its length is about 100 miles, including its various bendings—but, in a direct line, it may be estimated at 70 miles. Should it appear that this river offers a fair prospect of being rendered navigable—but, as will subsequently be seen, it does not—the harbour at its entrance would be found suitable to such a project, it being well protected by islands, leaving at the same time an easy entrance; and although I did not take soundings in it, I believe that a channel free from rocks or shoals exists there.

The general bearing of the Maganetawang from its outlet, is easterly 75 miles; it then bears north-easterly, and continues in this same direction to its source. Its waters are navigable about 8 miles from Lake Huron, and average 140 yards in width; its channel then contracts to about 70 feet, and for the next 24 miles, averages between this width and 120 feet—depth seldom less than 5 feet, or more than 20 feet; on these twenty-four miles it ascends 200 feet, after which its channel is navigable 16 miles; a short distance further its size diminishes suddenly, and the remaining distance (30 miles) to the height of land may be considered unnavigable, both from the rapidity of its current and the depth of water. To give an instance, one canoe, though only drawing about 18 inches of water, had either to be towed unladen or carried probably two-thirds of the last fifteen miles before coming to the height of land. Had we passed a month earlier, the water would certainly have been much deeper. The total ascent from Lake Huron to its source is about 340 feet. A portage less than a quarter of a mile in length connects the waters of the Maganetawang and Pittoiwais rivers.

The general bearing of the Pittoiwais is north-east 60 to 80 miles; it then sweeps round to a south-easterly direction, and at about 30 miles empties itself in the Ottawa, opposite the northerly extremity of Allumettes Island. For 15 miles from the height of land the Pittoiwais is but comparatively a small stream, and in many places, even at the distance of 10 miles from the height of land, its channel will admit a passage for canoes. We were frequently compelled to cut the banks before our canoe, though only four feet wide, could pass. From the height of land to Trout Lake, and through which the Pittoiwais passes, is about 30 miles. On this distance it descends about 230 feet; on the succeeding 12 miles it descends nearly 200 feet: This part of the river is a succession of dangerous falls and rapids; thence to the Ottawa it descends more regularly, but its current is generally swift, and in many places so much so, as scarcely to admit sufficient time to take its bearings when sailing down. The total descent from the height of land to the Ottawa is about 450 feet, to which, if 340 feet, the ascent from Lake Huron and the height of land, be added, there will be a total of about 790 feet. Averaging each lock at 10 feet, it would require 79 locks to connect the waters of Lake Huron and the Ottawa by this route.

The route next examined by me extends from Bytown to Lake Huron via the Ottawa, Little River, Lake Nippissingue and the French River. The following synoptic table exhibits the various altitudes.

REMARKS.	Ascent in feet.	Obstructed Navigation. Miles.	Navigable. Miles.
From Bytown to the foot of Lake Chaudiere .....	55	4	0
It is proposed to improve this part of the Ottawa, by cutting a canal from Lake Chaudiere to the seventh lock on the Rideau Canal, and thus taking advantage of the ascent made on the canal.
Length of Lake Chaudiere .....	0	0	30
The Chats Falls and Rapids .....	55	3	0
The rock at these falls is primitive limestone, of a very crystalline appearance.—The Mississippi channel which passes close to, and on the south of these rapids, will probably be found the readiest mode of improving this part of the navigation.
From Chats Rapids to Portage du Fort .....	3	0	26
Nineteen miles from Chats Rapids there is a small rapid, and makes a descent of about 3 feet; I ascended it in the Steamer Buchanan , a boat propelled by a 20 horse power.
Rapids at Portage du Fort, extending nearly to the Grand Calumet Island .....	12	1½	0
From the foot of the Grand Calumet Island, and proceeding by the easterly channel, there are four obstructions on the first six miles, viz. the Sauble Rapid, 200 yards long, descent 3 feet; the Mountain Portage and Rapid, ¼ mile long, descent 14 feet; the Dergee Rapid, about the same length as the Mountain Rapid, descent 6 feet; and the Grand Calumet Rapid, 1 mile in length, and making a descent of 40 or 50 feet; total .....	70	6	0
On the west of the Grand Calumet Rapid, there is a valley or ravine, which will be found of much importance in improving this part of the navigation; the rock here is primitive limestone.
From the Grand Calumet Rapid to the rapid in Lake Allumettes ....	5	0	50
On this distance there are several strong currents, and two small rapids, one of which is below Lake Coulonge—the other, called Pocket's Rapids, is at the foot of Allumettes Island; the shallowest water on these rapids is not less than 5 or 6 feet—canoes, and other boats ascend and descend them without any difficulty.
Rapid in Lake Allumette .....	10	½	0
From the above rapid to the Deux Joachins .....	0	0	30
Rapid of Les Deux Joachins .....	20	2	0
Thence to the Rocher Capitaine .....	0	0	10
Between the last two places there are several strong currents, but not such as to obstruct the navigation.
Rapide de la Rocher Capitaine .....	25	2½	0
From the Rocher Capitaine to the Rapide de les Deux Rivieres .....	0	0	7
Carried forward .....	255	18½	153

R E M A R K S.	Ascent in feet.	Obstructed Navigation. Miles.	Navigable. Miles.
Brought forward .....	255	18½	153
Rapids and strong currents de les Deux Rivieres.....	30	1½	0
Three portages are made at these rapids.
From Les Deux Rivieres to Maganctawang .....	10	½	13½
The route leaves the Ottawa at Maganctawang, and proceeds by the Little River.
That part of the Little River between Matawang and Lake Salon, Lake Salon.....	100 0	4 0	6 5
From Lake Salon to Turtle Lake is about 5 miles, four of which are navigable for boats drawing 6 feet water .....	14	1	4
Turtle Lake .....	0	0	5½
From Turtle Lake to the height of land .....	10	1	0
Results from Bytown to the height of land.....	419	27½	187
By adding the innavigable distances to the navigable ones, there will be a total distance of 214½ miles from Bytown to the height of land—ascnt 419 feet; and about 27 miles innavigable.
From the height of land to Lake Nippissingue is about 5 miles, 3 of which are navigable for boats drawing 4 feet water.....	20	5	0
Lake Nippissingue proceeding in a direct line to the French River...	0	0	24
Length of the French River terminating on Lake Huron by the centre one of three outlets .....	60	4	26
Total .....	80	9	50
Add the results from Bytown to the height of land .....	419	27½	187
Total.....	499	36½	237
Allowing 10 feet for each lock, 50 locks would be required between Bytown and Lake Huron.

If the altitude from Bytown to the month of the Pittoiweis River be subtracted from the result on last page, the difference of the two routes will be obtained. This I find to be about 210 feet, which difference is in favour of the route by Lake Nippissingue, independent of the difference of length of canalling between the two routes. That of the Maganctawang, &c. requiring probably 80 miles of canalling.

In the preceding estimates of heights, I have not made any allowance for currents. For the French River, say 10 to 15 feet.

The formation of the country for 15 miles east of Lake Huron is low and rocky, and is generally timbered with red and white pine, birch and tamarac; it then undulates, and may be considered a hilly country to the height of land and on the Ottawa. The most elevated land, however, does not, in my opinion, exceed 1,000 feet above Lake Huron.

After the above change takes place, the land is generally timbered with beach, maple, birch, balsam and pine, basswood, elm or oak being but seldom seen, except on the banks of rivers or lakes, until penetrating 50 or 60 miles from Lake Huron; the two first of these timbers are there found in abundance, and the latter (white oak) sparingly. It is worthy of remark, that on the entire distance between Lake Huron and the Ottawa, I noticed but one red oak, the hardwood lands to within about 50 miles of the Ottawa forming a belt about 45 miles wide. Thence to the Ottawa appears an interminable forest of red pine, soil generally red or white sand, and frequently rocky.

A large portion of the belt of hardwood is undoubtedly fit for settlement, particularly the first 20 miles east of District boundary, as shewn on plan. The soil of this tract is generally of a good quality, being generally clay or sandy loam, and frequently partaking of the properties of both these soils. The residue of this belt of hardwood may be described as having a loamy soil, superimposed on red or white sand, each of these qualities being irregular in its depth, and generally too shallow for agricultural purposes; it is frequently broken with rocks jutting its surface, and many places are stony, particularly in the vicinity of large lakes.

When the portions of this Province now being settled become thickly populated, I have no doubt but the major part of this tract will be found fit for settlement. This country is comparatively free from large swamps or morasses, but is diffusely supplied with lakes and rivers, which must eventually be found of much importance in forming an internal navigation; and when this country does become an object of settlement, it can only be accomplished, with any degree of advantage, by ascending some of the principal rivers (running into Lake Huron) until coming into what might be considered the first great table above Lake Huron, and having once got on this table it will be found easy to advance the settlement northerly through the large lakes and tributary streams on this table. The rivers chosen to ascend should be as near Penetanguishine as could practically be found, for which purpose the Moose River is well adapted.

The routes I have just mentioned are numerous, and are generally preferred by the Indians; they will have two paramount advantages; the distance is shorter than that by the hazardous coast of Lake Huron, and they pass through the only part of the country fit for settlement.

A large tract of the country explored, as I have previously stated, is timbered with red pine, and is situated east of the dividing, but notwithstanding that a meagre soil does exist on this section, it abounds with an almost inexhaustible forest, the resources of which, even at the present period, form no inconsiderable part of the revenue of the country, and which must continue to increase in a ratio proportionate to the facilities of floating or shipping it off, and which can only arrive at its maximum when the waters of the Ottawa are made navigable.

The scenery of the Ottawa is not, perhaps, equalled, in point of grandeur, by any portion of the Canadas, unless by that of the Saint Lawrence. From Bytown to that part of the Ottawa known as the "Deep River," the Ottawa flows through a wide spreading valley, and has more the appearance of a succession of large lakes than that of a river. These lakes are generally studded with groups of islands, and add much to the beauty of the landscape. Its banks slope gradually, in rear of which the land can be seen to form two or three distinct tables, and where the clearings admit the view, they appear an extended amphitheatre.

Pine is the prevailing timber on the banks of the Ottawa; but it is generally mixed with hardwoods as far as the Pottowais, and the soil between this place and Bytown is mostly of the best quality. From Lake Chaudiere a range of high lands, rocky in appearance, is distinguishable in a northerly direction on the Lower Canada side. As we ascend the Ottawa the same range is frequently in view. At Lake Coulonge it closes within three miles of the Ottawa, and eventually joins it at the commencement of the Deep River, and continues to line its northerly bank about 24 miles. Between Bytown and the northerly front of Allumette Island, there are several settlements, many of which appear in a flourishing condition; there are also some scattered settlements as far north as the Deep River.

The scenery of the Ottawa becomes decidedly changed, though not in point of beauty, at the commencement of the Deep River. This section forces its course through a wide channel, and perfectly straight about 24 miles; its banks are slightly indented, and form a number of projecting points or head lands. The northerly shore, as already remarked, is lined by a range of rocky lands, and elevated about 500 feet above the river. The land on the Upper Canada shore slopes more regularly, and a short distance from the river I noticed some hardwood growing on good soil, but generally too stony for agricultural purposes.

From the Deep River to Matawang, the scenery retains nearly the same appearance, the northerly bank being generally bounded by the most elevated land. At Matawang the route leaves the Ottawa and proceeds by the Little River. The course of this stream is westerly; at its junction with the Ottawa it is 200 feet wide, and about 6 feet deep; a short distance higher up it shallows and passes over a rocky channel about 2 miles; after which it deepens in some places to more than 40 feet, and passes through precipitous banks; its width in this channel is about 80 feet; but this description does not hold correct for more than 3 or 4 miles, as the water changes both in depth and width frequently. There is no good land seen after leaving Lake Allumettes, until coming to Lake Talon, on the north shore of which there is a tract of good land. The same description extends several miles north-west of the Turtle Lake, but does not approach the Little River between these lakes.

From the south-west part of Turtle Lake, the route proceeds by a small creek, and at 240 yards, having passed through a small lake, (the water of which is turbid and of a reddish colour,) we made a portage of three-fourths of a mile in length, and crossed the height of land between the waters of Nippissing and the Little River. On the east of this portage the land is swaly, the highest part of which does not elevate more than 10 feet above the Turtle Lake; out of this swale the waters run in both directions by two small creeks, one of which (10 feet wide) we sailed down towards Lake Nippissing; at one mile this creek contracts in its channel so as not to admit a passage for canoes, in consequence of which a portage half a mile in length is made through meadow land. At the termination of this portage, the small creek we entered at the height of land, is joined by another 15 to 20 feet wide, and about 3 feet deep. From the height of land our course was southerly, but from the junction of these streams we bore south-westerly: at one mile further, there is a rapid making a descent of 8 or 10 feet, to avoid which a portage half a mile in length over swaly land is made; at the foot of this rapid it is again augmented by another branch, the entire now forming a channel about 40 feet wide, and 3 to 5 feet deep; its course continues nearly in the same direction, passing through low lands, timbered with balsam, tamarac, soft maple, and a few pine—banks of the river about 4 feet high, but lowering towards the Lake, and at one mile we came to Lake Nippissing, the depth of channel there is only three feet, passing over Granite Rock.

Canalling from the Turtle Lake to the last portage might readily be accomplished, as scarcely any rock would be met by following the course of the streams just described, and which contain sufficient water for this purpose, and the banks of the last mile sailed down of river would require to be risen several feet, and a lock placed at the entrance of the lake. But the depth of water and rocky channel at this place appear an insuperable obstacle—the entrance of the harbour is also full of sunken rocks and much exposed to all winds bearing between south-west and northwest. The distance from this place to the French River is about 25 miles, and if I may presume to judge from sailing through this lake, it does not appear a dangerous navigation its water being deep—there are several large islands in the main body of the lake, and under the lee of which vessels in time of storm might readily find security.

The French River leaves Lake Nippissing at the westerly extremity of a long bay, and in which there are several rocky Islands, this bay is sheltered from storms by its rocky margin. There are two rapids in the French River on the first mile after leaving Lake Nippissing, each about one eighth mile in length and having the same descent of about 10 feet. The second of these rapids flows through a chasm only 30 feet wide; below these rapids the river passes through a succession of lakes lined by rocky lands, and in which there are numerous deeply indented bays, and which cause the navigation of this river exceedingly critical to those persons unaccustomed with the proper channel. I encountered some difficulty in this respect myself.

Thirty miles from Lake Nippissing the river divides into three branches, and at which place it is about three feet above Lake Huron. The most easterly of these branches is narrow, shallow, and rocky in its channel, the Indian name for it is "Asindibisin" and signifies a river filled with rocks and shoals; its length is about 6 miles. The central branch is about the same length and contains the principal body of water in the French River, and may average about 300 feet in width and is free from sunken rocks or other obstructions with the exception of a short rapid making a descent of 3 feet as already remarked. At this outlet there is a good harbour it being well sheltered from storms by several small Islands on the east and west and one large Island on the south and is about 3 miles from the main land. The third and most westerly channel is about ten miles long, its size and appearance is somewhat similar to the Asindibisin one. These three outlets embrace a front of about ten miles on Lake Huron, and no part of which is approachable by large vessels except the middle channel.

In addition to the routes now described, I explored several tributary streams, and for a description of which I beg to refer to my diary. The object of a preliminary survey, such as the present one, not requiring a detailed report, I have refrained from making it such in most cases, believing that it would only be increased, to an unnecessary length without deriving any additional advantage by it: I allude here to an omission generally of specific descriptions of the various rapids, &c. but the formation of these will perhaps be sufficiently understood from the following brief outline of the geology of the country explored by me.

Commencing at Lake Huron and ascending the Maganatawang River, thence crossing the height of land and following the course of the Pittoiweis; the rock of this extensive tract of country is exclusively of granite order, but so irregularly are the minerals common to it distributed as regards their relative quantities and situation that it becomes difficult to pronounce with any degree of certainty to which class they belong, if there be any constant attribute of this rock (but I believe there is not) it is the uniformity in size of its parts, these are generally small. From Lake Huron, to within 50 miles of the Ottawa, quartz and felspar predominate and are always more fully developed than the mica or third constituent of granite; this last substance is often mixed with hornblend; its stratified appearance in some localities may justify its being classed as Gneiss; and from which it passes frequently into sienite and mica-slate; to each of these formations there are exceptions; those noticed by me I shall describe.

About 36 miles from Lake Huron, vide Plan No 1., and Lake A, there is a precipitous range of rock fronting the west; this rock is friable and reduces by the slightest pressure to particles of felspar and mica; when viewed before it becomes pulverised it is like old or decayed brick, of a dull reddish colour; its height is about 70 feet, projecting considerably over its base, and its appearance is such that the slightest shock would seem to bring it down; a number of masses are now prostrate at its base, and in this manner I should suppose it has fallen for ages. In a small river which empties itself into this lake there are two falls, one of which is 36 feet in height; the rock at these falls is composed of quartz and mica, the latter substance in large lamina. At these falls there are several large boulders, which are composed of felspar, without, as far as I could discern, mixing with any other mineral; twenty miles east of the dividing ridge there is a very visible change in the constituents of the rocks; felspar becoming the prevailing substance and small portions of quartz and mica. This rock in some localities is coarse grained, whilst in others it has the same compact structure as secondary limetone and has always a slaty fracture. The fragments of this Rock form deep deposits in many parts of the Pittoiweis River, and when taken from its bed has a dark purple tinge but when broken it has a reddish colour.

There are four things strikingly peculiar to this section of the country, its timber is red, (red pine,) its soil is red, (red sand, and sometimes red clay,) on the banks of lakes and rivers, its rock is red, and its waters are also red, deriving their colour from the soils and rocks over which they pass. Many portions of the banks of the Pittoiweis have mural faced fronts, and are composed of this compact rock, and which generally have a singular stratification; a part is horizontal from which it radiates (though not in straight lines) until it becomes vertical; in other places it forms arcs of concentric circles; these appearances are often visible in a space of 50 or 100 feet. Miles from the Ottawa on the banks of the Pittoiweis, there is a fine range of this rock, it extends about 200 yards, and is 150 feet high; on many of these cliffs figures of various animals and other devices are skilfully engraven by the Indians. This rock extends nearly to the Ottawa, and there becomes more crystalline; it is very general on the south bank of the Deep River, from which I am inclined to believe it recedes southerly, and afterwards returns, as it is seen through the greater part of the channel of the Little River; on the north side of the Deep River the rock is similar to that on the Maganatawang.

The rock between the Deep River and Maganatawang is generally sienite or gneiss; on the easterly shore of Lake Nippissing felspar prevails, and mixes with mica and quartz; towards its westerly end hornblend prevails, giving the rock a dark colour; on the French River the rock is more crystalline than any previously described; this appearance is ascribable to the prevalence of rock crystal or quartz.

The coast of Lake Huron is not free from changes in its geological structure; at the outlets of the French River the Rock is graphic, and is composed principally of quartz, mixing with small portions of mica and felspar; this Rock is remarkable for its regularity of surface, whether tabular or rounded, both of which shapes it generally takes; this formation extends about 30 miles south of the French River, and then passes into a partially stratified rock, and mica in minute parts becomes the prevailing mineral; the rapid decomposition of this substance often gives the rock a very uneven surface; it is very generally traversed by veins of quartz, varying in thickness from a tenth of an inch to two inches, and these veins are often intersected by others. The coast between Shawenagua, Trading-post and Penetanguishine, exhibits many proofs of this sort of rock.

At Bytown the rock is a secondary limestone, of a light blue colour; the same formation may be traced nearly to the Chats Rapids, where it passes into primitive limestone, colour white and very crystalline. This formation extends nearly to the north end of Grand Calumet Island; at Portage du Fort it is mixed with limestone, of the same colour, but of a finer texture; this sort is known in the arts as statuary marble; at New Edinboro', a short distance below Bytown, and on the south bank of the Ottawa, limestone of a deep blue colour prevails; this is a handsome stone, and might be very extensively used in works of art.

In the Rocha Fender channel, west of Grand Calumet Island, primary limestone prevails, and is curiously indented with rock basins, formed probably by the abrasion of water; these basins are generally about six inches in diameter and perfectly concave; towards the northerly extremity of the Grand Calumet the primary limestone conglomerates with granitic rock; a secondary limestone, of a whitish colour, forms the bed of a great part of Allumette Lake. At Talon Portage, on the Little River, a bed of primary limestone, such as that seen on the Ottawa, commences, and extends about a quarter of a mile further up the river; on each side it is lined by granite rock.

Respectfully submitted.

I have the honor to be.

GENTLEMEN,

Your most Obedient

Humble Servant,

WILLIAM HAWKINS,

Deputy Surveyor.

RECEIVER GENERAL'S OFFICE,

REPORT OF THE WELLAND CANAL COMPANY, FOR THE YEAR 1838.

TORONTO, 7th February, 1839.

SIR,

I have the honour to forward herewith, the Report of the Welland Canal Company, for the year 1838, together with the usual accounts, prepared for the information of the House of Assembly.

The majority of the Board of Directors having desired, that I should submit their particular opinions, in the form of a separate Report, (Appendix A.) the same is also transmitted.

I have the honour to be,

SIR,

Your most obedient,

Humble Servant,

J. MACAULAY,
President, W.C.C.

The Honourable R. A. TUCKER,
&c. &c. &c.

To His Excellency Major General SIR GEORGE ARTHUR, K.C.H. Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Upper Canada, &c. &c. &c.

The Board of Directors of the Welland Canal Company, have the honour to transmit herewith the several annual accounts and returns, usually submitted to the House of Assembly, and to report—

That owing to the financial and other difficulties of the Province, during the past year, no portion of the funds granted by the House of Assembly for the permanent construction of the Canal, has been placed at their disposal; they have therefore been compelled to borrow money from the Bank of Upper Canada, and to appropriate those portions of the revenue of the Company which, under the 7th Wm. IV. chap. 92, should have been set apart for the payment of interest on the grant made by that law, and for a dividend to the private Stockholders, to the ordinary expenses of the Canal. These appropriations have enabled the Directors to cause all necessary repairs to be promptly executed, and consequently to maintain the navigation of the Canal, uninterrupted, during the past season; in consequence of which, the amount of Tolls collected has exceeded that of any preceding year.
