Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—I am satisfied that the only way you can enforce this law is by ascertaining the opinion of the majority of the people in the county or district where it is proposed to adopt it. It is, in my opinion, the safest way. I believe if due authority were given to Local Legislatures to enforce this Bill without an appeal to the people to ascertain whether a majority of the electors were in favor of it, it would just end in the law not being enforced at all. I entirely approve of the principle of the Bill, that it shall only be applied where there is a fair expression of the will of the people in its favor. I have no doubt that county after county will adopt the measure once it becomes law. Temperance people are a zealous, active class of men, who would force their opinions upon the Local Legislatures in such a way, under the proposition of my hon. friend from Sarnia, that they would be sure to influence a majority of the members in its favor, although a majority of the electors might be against it. I have no doubt myself that a less expensive mode could have been adopted for ascertaining the will of the people, but it is a question on which there may be a difference of opinion, and I shall be prepared to vote for the Bill as it is, rather than adopt the suggestion of the hon. gentleman who has moved this motion. Then there is another proposition of my hon. friend, that the party convicted of having obtained liquor shall be compelled to declare from whom he got it. I do not know what mode the hon. gentleman proposes to take to compel a man to give evidence under such circumstances—whether he intends to resort to the old inquisition system of torture, or what it is. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should withdraw his motion, and propose his amendments when the House goes into Committee of the Whole on the Bill.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I would like to state that the reason why I consider my proposition to be, in effect, the same in principle as a plebiscite is, that I presume no Legislature of a Province would venture to take such action unless they were perfectly satisfied that the majority of their constituents would sustain them; and if they wished to apply this principle of a plebiscite, there is nothing to hinder their having a general vote taken on it without any cost, simply by making provision for an additional mark on the ballot paper used at the annual municipal elections. The question of jurisdiction has been suggested as a difficulty in the way of carrying out my proposed plan for provincial action, but to my mind it would be the feature of the Bill least liable to have its constitutional legality called into question, because there would then be concurrent action by both Dominion and Local Legislatures, and there could not, under such circumstances, arise any question of ultra vires as between the two concurring bodies. I cannot consent to withdraw my motion, because I am desirous that my effort in this direction should remain on record, and I am satisfied that it would be sustained by four-fifths of the temperance people in the Dominion.

The motion was lost on a division.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Hon. Mr. Penny in the chair.

The title and preamble of the Bill were read and postponed.

The first clause was read and agreed to.

On the second clause, " Interpretation clause,"

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he proposed to amend this Section to define the word "county" so that it would include every minor municipality or parish in a county, except a city.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL asked if it was not possible to so define a county as to include a city situated within its limits, which is not represented in Parliament, so that a vote could be taken for the city and county together whenever it was proposed to adopt this legislation.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY considered the proposed amendment included every municipality in a county.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the word "county" would embrace all minor municipalities except cities, and he thought that was the most convenient and definite mode of separating the territorial limits. Sometimes there were large cities and small counties, and sometimes small cities and large counties, and in such cases as one would outweigh the other, it was considered better to make the division so that the vote could be taken separately to apply the act.

The further consideration of the clause was postponed until to-morrow.

The Committee then rose and reported progress and asked leave to sit again to-morrow, this order to take precedence of notices of motion.

The motion was agreed to and the House adjourned at 6.10 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, April 3rd.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock p.m.

After Routine proceedings.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD EXTENSION OF TIME.

Hon. Mr. MILLER called the attention of the House to the fact that the time for receiving petitions for private bills had been twice extended this Session, and had again expired. The same thing also prevailed with regard to the presentation of reports of the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills. After the time had been extended twice, he did not think it necessary to ask for any further extension, in fact he did not consider it his duty to do so, as he presumed the management of the business of the House was under the control of the Government, and it was a step that should be taken by the leader of the House. The presentation of reports under existing circumstances was irregular, and he would have to ask the leave of the House to present two reports from the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER proposed to extend the time for receiving reports on private bills until Monday next.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said this showed the absurdity of the rule that limited the time to three weeks after the meeting of Parliament. He thought it was a rule that required amendment, as the time necessarily had to be extended every Session.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY suggested that the time should be extended until Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said a large number of bills had to come up from the other House yet.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER proposed to extend the time until Thursday, the 12th inst.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said an exception ought to be made in favor of bills coming up from the lower House. He gave notice that he would move, on Friday next, to amend the rule, so that it would apply only to bills originating in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he considered the rule was intended to apply only to bills originating in the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

BIBLE CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY BILL.

CONCURRENCE IN AMENDMENTS.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS moved that the House do concur in the amendments made by the Committee on Standing Orders and Private Bills to Bill (K) "An Act to incorporate the Missionary Society of the Bible Christian Church in Canada." He said the amendments made were in effect the same as those that had been made to the Baptist Foreign Missionary Bill, and he did not suppose any objection would be made to the third reading.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said the question of the constitutionality of this Bill still remained unsettled, and he believed it should be referred to the Supreme Court for the opinion of the Judges. No doubt the Bill had been amended in such a way that the Association were not empowered to hold lands, or to have anything to do with education, but they were empowered to accept personal devises, which was a matter affecting civil rights, and as such, it was legislation that belonged to the Local Legislature. He moved that:—

"The Bill be referred to the Judges of the Supreme Court for their opinion on the ques-

Hon. Mr. Miller.

"tion, whether this measure does or does not relate to a matter coming within the class of subjects assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces by the British North America Act, 1867, section 92, sub-section 13, "Property and Civil Rights in the Provinces."

Hon. Mr. AIKINS said if his hon. friend intended to press his motion, he would move to have the third reading postponed until to-morrow, as he only had charge of the Bill in the absence of his hon. friend from Bowmanville. It would be remembered, however, that when the Christian Brothers' Bill was sent to the Supreme Court, the Chief Justice refused to join in the decision upon it, because he did not believe that Court was constituted for passing judgments on bills referred to them in that manner.

Hon. Mr. MILLER suggested that concurrence should be taken on the amendments now, and that the motion of Mr. Bellerose should stand as a notice to be moved on the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL said it would be better if his hon. friend did not refer to any particular clause of the British North America Act, but simply move to refer the Bill to the Judges, for their opinion on its constitutionality.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE allowed his motion to stand as a notice, the amendments were concurred in, and the third reading was ordered for to-morrow.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC REGULATION BILL.

HOUSE AGAIN IN COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the House into Committee of the Whole on Bill (J), "An Act respecting the traffic in Intoxicating Liquors"

In the Committee,

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he had amended the second clause to define the word "county," so as to include every town or other municipality except a city, and also to include a union of counties where they were united for municipal purposes. It was simply to define clearly the territorial limits between cities and counties, the latter to embrace all else than cities within its area, of a minor character.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said there might be portions of counties that were not mentioned, and which by a nice distinction in the working of the Act might be excluded from the county. He suggested that it would be better to make it read "Counties shall include all portions of the territorial area of a county except cities."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he would see that all ambiguity would be removed from the interpretation clause.

The clause was agreed to.

On the 3rd clause, "Repeal of Act of the Province of Canada, 27 and 28 V., c. 18,"

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he proposed to restrict the repeal of the Temperance Act of 1868 to the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th clauses, which were the prohibitory clauses. That was to cover the case of several counties in Ontario, in which votes had been taken under the Dunkin Act, and in which that law would come into operation at the termination of the present year of license, that was on the 30th of April. He thought it better to have the Dunkin Act entirely independent of this Act, so that in the repeal of the Dunkin Act they should employ the same machinery that they had in putting it in force. There was this provision, however, that where this Act might be carried in a county, it practically superceded the Dunkin Act, but if this Act should subsequently be repealed in that particular county, it would revive and bring into operation again the Dunkin Act in those townships in which it had previously been in force.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said after the passing of this Act there would be practically two acts running pari passu in Ontario and Quebec. He considered it most unwise legislation, and after the very general expression of opinion on the part of members of this House as to the necessity for referring this Bill to the Supreme Court for the opinion of the Judges, he would ask the hon. Secretary of State if he was prepared to go on in defiance of that opinion?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he was quite aware of the very strong opinions expressed by some hon. gentlemen, that it would be better to refer this Bill to the Supreme Court. He could not concur in that view, however. In the first place, he would not expect that the judgment of the Supreme Court, given on an abstract principle without a living case before them, would be worth very much. In the next place, he was not prepared to admit it was a question of that character which it was contemplated by the British North America Act, that the House should remit to the Supreme Court, and he considered it would be unfortunate that this House should part with the prerogative of passing an opinion on a measure of this kind. There were gentlemen in this House whose opinion he would have as much respect for as any of the Supreme Court judges. He believed the questions that came up for discussion in the House of Commons and in the Senate qualified the members for gauging the constitutionality of their own legislation as well, if not better, than the Supreme Court Judges whose attention had not perhaps been directed so closely to it, and there had been very few cases in which the prerogative of the two Parliaments—Federal and Local—had clashed. The judges had taken great care when Bills were referred to them to express as limited a judgment as possible in every case. Therefore he felt that they could not really secure from the Supreme Court, such a judgment as he would like to concur in, unless the Judges themselves had the opinions of the judges in the lower courts on a live issue coming before them in the ordinary course of procedure. Unless that were done he did not think that this House should be foreclosed by a hasty opinion of the Supreme Court upon an abstract question, given without an opportunity of having the various points analyzed by all the legal accumen that is necessary to bring an important case fairly before that court.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said, he presumed that the Government had decided this Bill should go through Parliament; that it should be placed on the Statute book, and that it should take its risk as to whether it was constitutional or not. He regretted this course, and thought the Government, without any desire to censure or attach blame to them, would have acted far more wisely, and far more in the interests of this House, and the people whom they wished to serve, if they had submitted the Bill to the Judges for their opinion as to its constitutionality. He could not concur in the remark of the hon. Secretary of State, that it would be very difficult to get the opinion of the Supreme Court, without a case, was regularly submitted and argued by counsel on both sides; the contrary, he believed, was exactly the case. To get an opinion on the constitutionality of the Bill after it became law, they might have to wait until a case should arise, under every feature of it; whereas, if it were referred to the Judges as a whole, it would be competent for them to pronounce upon every feature of it—either in whole or in part—and, after such a judgment from the highest court in the land, the country would have something certain and fixed to guide them in connection with this subject. He regretted the course being pursued by the Government. He did not do this as a temperance advocate, as he did not profess to be a temperance advocate, but he did it as a friend of sound legislation, and in order that they might not place upon the Statute book a law which might create confusion, litigation, trouble and expense. With regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. Secretary of State to the third clause, he thought it unfair that it should be sprung upon the House—he did not use the word in an unfair sense—without communicating the fact that he proposed to make so important a change. The amendment was a very important one, and he thought it should be printed before it was taken into consideration. The intention of the Bill as it stood was, to repeal the Dunkin Act in every part of the Dominion where it was not actually in force, or where it was not in course of being brought into operation. Then, should a county in which the Dunkin Act was in force in some of its municipalities, after a three years' trial of the new Act, chose to repeal it, the Dunkin Act which had remained in suspense during that time, would revive. The object of this Bill should be to get rid of the Dunkin Act as much as possible. Its adoption by a county would be the expression of the desire of the people to get rid of the Dunkin Act, and he could not see why it should be revived in one place, in the event of the repeal of this law, any more than it should in another.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said the object was simply to secure to the municipality that desired to retain its prohibitory law, the right to have the prohibition under the Dunkin Act restored should the county see fit to repeal the new law, after having given it a three years trial. In the event of this Act being unsatisfactory in its operations they did not desire to be without a prohibitory law.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said the hon. Secretary of State had paid the legal men in this House a high compliment when he stated that he had the utmost reliance upon their opinions, but his disregard of the very strong expression of opinion that had been almost unanimously made in favor of referring the Bill to the Supreme Court, was hardly consistent as he should, in deference to those views have referred the Bill to that high tribunal.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said he wished to amend the clause so as to provide that where the Dunkin Act was now in force the people shall have power to repeal it under the machinery of the new law, and when it became repealed by the bringing into force of this Act, it should not be revived by the revocation of prohibition therein provided for. As the Bill now stood the people had not the power to repeal the Dunkin Act where it was in operation except by the machinery provided by that Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—You would repeal the Dunkin Act entirely?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said he would do so wherever this new Act went into operation—that was, he would repeal all the clauses of the Dunkin Act that they had the constitutional power to deal with.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said that was his intention in framing the Bill, but he had invited suggestions from the temperance people in drawing up its provisions, and he had embodied in it all that he could see his way clearly to adopt to meet the views of the parties who were interested in the measure. In this way the Bill had been recast three or four times, as he had had a "multitude of counsellors." It was only in deference to the expressed wish of temperance men that he should not take away from the minor municipalities the right that they now had, that he had acceded to what he considered was a very cumbersome condition. The hon. Senator's proposition would meet his views very much better than the provision in the Bill, if it was acceptable to others who were interested in the measure.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS suggested that the amendments should be printed before they were adopted, so that members could thoroughly understand them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said his experience had been that every day the Bill was postponed, new amendments would be proposed.

Hon. Mr. POWER enquired if this Bill would not conflict with the license law of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is really no conflict whatever. Our law over-rides yours.

Hon. Mr. POWER said the sale of liquor in any county in Nova Scotia was regulated by the vote of the majority of the Quarter Sessions. If this Act came into force, it was doubtful whether that law would not still continue; they could not issue licenses, and it would be tantamount to prohibition.

After some discussion of a conversational character, the Committee postponed further debate on the clause until to-morrow.

On the 9th clause, "What to be set forth in the Proclamation,"

Hon. Mr. MILLER said, while the Secretary of State was making his explanations when introducing this Bill, he had asked him if it were possible, under this law, that elections in the various counties for the adoption of this law could be brought on at the same time as elections for the Local or Federal Parliaments, the hon. gentleman had replied that there was nothing in the law to prevent anything of the kind taking place, and he did not see any objection to it if it did.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman entirely misapprehended me.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said there could be no better means devised to mix up this question of temperance with party strife than to allow the voting on it to take place at the same time as an election for a Local Legislature or the House of Commons. He would, therefore, move to amend the clause to provide that "No election under this Act, shall be held in any city, county, or district on the same day as that of any members of the Parliament of Canada, or of any of the Local Legislatures of the Dominion."

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Aikins.

On clause 17, "Form of Ballot Papers,"

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL suggested that the ballot papers should be numbered in order to prevent ballot stuffing and bribery.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he did not think there would be the same keen rivalry in an election under this Act as there was in political elections.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said he thought the Licensed Victuallers had fought as keenly in elections under the Dunkin Act as they had at any other elections.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL did not press his suggestion and the clause was agreed to without amendment.

On the 58th clause, "Petition adopted."

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said he proposed to move an amendment. If this Bill were likely to be confined in its operations, as in the case of the Dunkin Act, to small municipalities, then he should be content to have the principle of this clause adopted—the decision of the question by a bare majority of the votes polled—but when it was quite possible that the Act might, as it was intended by its promoters, go into effect in counties and cities, where very large interests were likely to be affected by the introduction of a measure of this kind, he thought it was only right that every consideration should be paid to the views of those whose business and property would be injured by it. He thought it was a safer principle and more just, that the Act should only be enforced by a majority of the whole number of electors qualified to vote for a member for the House of Commons. He moved an amendment to that effect.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL concurred in the views of his hon. friend (Mr. Allan) as he did not believe that a law so seriously affecting the liberty and property of a certain portion of the community, should be enforced by a bare majority of the votes polled. If there was any provision that the persons who would suffer materially in their pockets, by the operation of the law, were to be recompensed for their losses, there would be some show of reason in it, but where they were legislating out of existence, interests of such magnitude, there should be some compensation, or in the absence of compensation, the measure should only be adopted by a well determined majority of the electoral vote. He did not think that the interests of the people should be sacrificed without due consideration, and at the very least, the decision should be either by a majority of the electoral vote, or a two-thirds majority of the votes polled.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS said he thought his hon. friend had never worked out the principle of this Bill. According to the hon. gentleman's suggestion all that was necessary to defeat the Bill was for one half of the electors who were opposed to the measure to remain at home, and not poll their votes, and, as a matter of course, a majority of the electoral vote could not be obtained. The principle of the Bill was the same as that adopted in municipal, Parliamentary, and other elections; it was not found to work injuriously to the public interest, and he could not see why it should not be incorporated in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said he did not think the case which his hon. friend had put was analagous. This was an extraordinary law, which would interfere very materially with private rights and private property. An analagous case would be that of an insurance company or a bank in which a measure affecting the property of the minority, as well as of the majority, required a two-thirds majority of the votes of the stockholders to carry it into effect.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said he thought this amendment should be adopted because it would make the bill congruous; in one place, it required the majority of the whole electoral vote to carry one provision into operation, and in another place it required only a majority of the votes polled. He considered it would be a very great misfortune to undertake to put this law in force in any community where there was not a decided preponderance in favor of it—not a preponderance of the active, enthusiastic people who chose to go out and cast their votes and exercise themselves on this question, but a decided preponderance of the whole body of the electors. Surely this was a fair principle; but if his hon. friend would insist that the minority should control the majority, he would be taking away from this Bill the very soundest basis on which it could stand.

Hon. Mr. WARK said he feared that the "earnest enthusiastic" people to whom the hon. gentleman had alluded would be found perhaps in opposition to the Bill, and of the quiet people who staid at home there would be as many in favor of the Bill as were against it, consequently a fair majority of those who voted should carry the election.

Hon. Mr. DEVER said it was the minority who carried the prohibitory law in New Brunswick, and the result to themselves was disastrous when an appeal was made to the people on it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he thought all who were opposed to a Bill of this kind were pretty certain to record their votes against it. His own conclusion would be that those who did not vote were rather favorable, than adverse to the Bill. It would have to be borne in mind that legislation in reference to the liquor traffic had always been exceptional. For instance there might be twenty or thirty persons in a city who had invested a considerable sum of money in erecting and furnishing buildings to carry on saloons or hotels, yet the Corporation did not recognize their right to compensation for their investments when they reduced the number of licenses. Society had always found it necessary to surround itself with certain safeguards with reference to this traffic, therefore the legislation had always been exceptional. In Nova Scotia, for instance, it took a very considerable portion of the people to be in favor of granting a license in order to get one. They adopted the principle that the traffic in liquors was essentially wrong and it was only in deference to a large voice of the people that licenses were granted at all.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS asked if it would not be better to have no vote at all in adopting this law, but to have it adopted on a majority of the signatures of the electors, to the petition?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL objected to such a course being taken, as it would not be as satisfactory as a plebescite.

Hon. Mr. MILLER enquired, if the Secretary of State had accepted the amendment proposed by hon. Mr. Allan.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said, it would not be fair that such a startling proposition should be incorporated in the bill without those who were interested in the measure being made aware of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER suggested, that the clause be allowed to stand, and that the sense of the House be taken on the amendment at the third reading.

The 56th, 57th, and 58, sections were allowed to stand until to-morrow.

On the 77th clause "Treating electors forbidden."

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said, it was a most arbitrary and tyrannical provision to say that a man could not even treat his friend to a cup of coffee, or to a dinner, during an election of this kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said, it was presumed that the friends of the measure would not require anything "strong," but only its opponents.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said, it was ridiculously tyrannical and such provisions as this would do much to make the measure unpopular.

At 6 p. m. the Committee rose and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again this evening.

AFTER RECESS.

THE CANADA SOUTHERN RAILWAY BILL.

CONCURRENCE IN AMENDMENTS.

The House, according to Order, proceeded to the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Committee on Banking, Commerce and Railways, to the Bill intituled: "An Act to authorize and confirm the scheme of arrangement of the Canada Southern Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL moved that the amendments be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. HOPE moved in amendment:

"That the Bill intituled: 'An Act to authorize and confirm the scheme of arrangement of the Canada Southern Railway Company,' as amended by the Select Committee on Banking, Commerce and Railways, be referred back to the said Select Committee with instructions to insert the following amendments in the said Bill, viz:

A. "No Bond, Coupon, Debenture or Mortgage, or other security which has been or shall be issued by the Company, shall by reason of any lien, charge, incumbrance or preferential claim on the revenue, assets or property of the Company, of any kind or nature whatsoever, be held or construed to prevent a judgment or decree against the property of the Company for a debt incurred for working expenses as hereinbefore defined, from being enforced by execution; Provided that no actual levy shall be made by virtue of such execution, without an order or certificate being made by a Judge of the Court in which such judgment or decree has been obtained, stating that in his opinion proceedings upon such execution shall not stop the traffic of the Company."

B. "The chief place of business of the Company with the General and Departmental Offices, Treasurer's Office, and principal workshops of the said Company, shall be, and continue to be, in the Town of St Thomas, in the County of Elgin, and Province of Ontario."

Hon. Mr. MILLER raised a point of order. This was a special motion that required twenty-four hours' notice.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled the amendment out of order.

Hon. Mr. HOPE gave notice that he would move his amendment on the third reading.

The amendments were then concurred in, and the third reading of the Bill was ordered for to-morrow.

SYDENHAM HARBOR COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON moved the second reading of Bill (31) "An Act to amend the Act incorporating the Sydenham Harbor Company." He said the Sydenham Harbor Company, now known as the Oshawa Harbor Company, was chartered thirty years ago. They now desired to extend the harbor by issuing new stock. At one time they had asked power to enable the Harbor Company to build a tramway from the harbor to the village of Oshawa. The Bill was in charge of hon. Mr. Gibbs, but when it went before the committee a number of gentlemen from Oshawa thought that the building of the tramway was not within their power, and the clause had been stricken out. The Company now asked for power to change their name from the Sydenham Harbor Company to "The Oshawa Harbor Company" in consequence of their being another Sydenham harbor on the Lake. The other clause was to give them power to issue $30,000 new stock, on the approval of two-thirds of the stockholders.

The Bill was read the second time.

THE MARITIME COURT IN ONTARIO.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER moved the second reading of Bill (55) "An Act respecting the Maritime Court, of Ontario." He said,—This Bill is to give the Maritime Court of Ontario certain powers which seem to be not clearly given by the Act of last year, organizing that Court. It provides that in all cases where any moneys are payable to any person, the Maritime Court shall have the same powers as the Court of Chancery, in Ontario, has to order and decree, the same powers of enforcing its decrees. Persons to whom any moneys shall be payable by order or decree of the Maritime Court, shall have all remedies possessed by them under a decree of the said Court of Chancery. The second clause provides that any new writ or other process necessary for giving effect to the provisions of this Act, may be issued in the form directed by the Judge of the said Court. The third clause gives to the Marshall or the Deputy-Marshall of the said Court, as to the execution of any such writ, similar powers to those possessed by the Sheriffs of Ontario, as to the execution of similar writs issued from the Court of Chancery.

The Bill was read the second time.

HER MAJESTY'S MAILS IN CAPE BRETON.

RETURNS COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Pelletier,

To resolve, that the return made to this House on the eighth day of March, 1877 to an address of this House to His Excellency, the Governor General, dated the fifteenth day of February, 1877; "in relation to the return to cause to be laid before this House—

"1st.—Copies of all contracts entered into during the year 1876, for the conveyance of Her Majesty's Mails from Sydney to Cow Bay, Little and Big Grace Bays, and Bridgeport, in the County of Cape Breton."

"2nd.—Also, copies of notices for tenders and the titles of the newspapers wherein they were inserted, with all copies of other documents, correspondence, &c., in reference to such contracts."

"Also, copies of all other contracts entered
Hon. Mr. Pelletier.

"into in the years 1874, 1875, and 1876, in the said County of Cape Breton, with vouchers for payments for said services for transmission of Mails," be communicated to the House of Commons, and that the same may be returned to this House.

Motion agreed to.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC REGULATION BILL.

HOUSE AGAIN IN COMMITTEE.

The House, according to Order, was adjourned during pleasure, and again put into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill intitled: "An Act respecting the traffic in intoxicating liquors."

Consideration of the 77th clause was resumed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said this clause was precisely the same as it was in the general election law. He admitted that it did strike at the basis of hospitality, but it was a necessary provision to prevent electors from being unduly influenced.

The clause was agreed to.

On the 79th clause, "Ribbons, &c., not to be furnished or worn,"

Hon. Mr. VIDAL asked that this clause be struck out, as temperance men had adopted a red or blue ribbon as a badge, which they wore at all times, and many of them had become very much attached to it.

After some discussion of a conversational character, the clause was struck out.

On the 93rd clause, "If petition adopted, the second part of this Act may be brought into force by Order-in-Council,"

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said he understood the hon. Secretary of State to say that he would make it certain that the time that would elapse before the law should come into force after the vote had been declared should be five months.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he had no objection to have it stated that the proclamation shall fix a day which shall not be less than five months from the day of polling.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL considered five months, even, too short a time for people whose business was to be affected by this law to make preparation for it and to settle up their affairs. He suggested to amend the clause so as to extend the time to six months.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said if this was the first time that legislation of this kind had been submitted to the House, he could understand the objection that was raised by his hon. friend, but the Dunkin Act had the same provision as this Bill, and the people had not complained of it as being unjust or harsh. Surely, if any persons had found their interests jeopardized, they would have entered an objection to it. He was perfectly willing, however, to make the time six months, but he thought the 93 Section was the proper place for it to come in.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the proposed amendment would give eight months before the Act could be brought into operation after the polling, as there would always be a certain amount of delay.

The amendment was accepted, and the clause, as amended, was agreed to.

On the 94th clause, "No such Order-in-Council to be revoked for three years, and then only on similar petition, notice, and other proceedings,"

Hon. Mr. SCOTT accepted Mr. Vidal's amendment, to provide that in any county or city where the petition for the Act has been negatived, there can be no further appeal for three years.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL moved another amendment to the clause, to provide that where the Dunkin Act was now in force, and the electors desired to repeal it, it should be done under the provisions of this law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Is this the desire of the Alliance?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL.—It is.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have myself endeavored as much as possible to keep clear of the Dunkin Act, as I do not feel at all sure that we are not intruding upon very dangerous ground.

The further consideration of this clause was postponed until to-morrow.

On clause 95, "No liquor to be sold, &c., when and where this part of this Act is in force, except for certain purposes," Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE said he thought the wisdom of this House might suggest more appropriate words in the 3rd sub-section than "the sale of intoxiating liquors for exclusively sacramental purposes." It was, to say the least, of it, irreverent.

The words were changed to "the sale of wine for exclusively sacramental purposes."

Mr. Speaker CHRISTIE called attention to the fact, that under the provisions of the 4th sub-section, manufacturers of pure native wines would not be able to sell the products of their vineries, and he thought they should be allowed the same privilege to sell, as brewers and distillers. He knew a firm in Cooksville, Ontario, who had a large amount of capital invested in a vinery, and the manufacture of native wine, and if this law went into operation, it would stop them from selling, and close up the establishment.

Hon. Mr. MILLER considered manufacturers of cider were as much entitled to consideration as the manufacturers of native wines.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS also considered that cider should be excluded from the operation of this law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said if they were excluded, he could not see how they could exclude lager beer from the operation of the Act. He was opposed to making any exception in favor of any liquor, because if wine, lager beer, or cider were excluded, they would only afford a cover for the use of stronger liquors. It was also a well-known fact that at the Cooksville establishment, there was four times as much brandy manufactured as wine. He believed they were licensed distillers, and were allowed by Statute to manufacture 80,000 gallons of brandy.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said if they were licensed distillers they should come into the same category as other distillers and brewers. Why should not farmers who manufactured wine and cider from the produce of their vines and orchards be allowed to sell it? Some provision should be made for them as for distillers and brewers.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH said that in Nova Scotia the temperance organizations allow the use of cider as a harmless beverage.

Hon. Mr. DEVER said they should limit the quantity of alcohol both in wine and cider.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL suggested the safest way would be to pass over this part of the Bill until a proper clause could be drafted to exclude native wines and cider.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said ginger wine was a drink that was accepted by temperance people, though there was more alcohol in it than in cider.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL suggested that they should except the liquors named below a certain standard of percentage of alcohol.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—How are you going to get them tested?

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE said some of the best ciders were those that contained the maximum amount of alcohol, and they might be excluded under the hon. gentleman's proposition.

The further consideration of this clause was postponed until to-morrow.

On the 98th clause: "Excise officer bound to prosecute,"

Hon. Mr. MILLER said he could not see why the prosecutions in those cases should fall upon the Government. He thought there were persons among the temperance societies who were sufficiently interested in the carrying out of the law to prosecute, without the Government doing it. The country might be involved in serious expense for law suits if it were compulsory on the revenue officer to prosecute on the information of parties who would not think of entering suits if they had to bear the costs themselves.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said it was the same as in the Dunkin Act.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said the temperance men attached great importance to the necessity of having a public officer appointed to prosecute offenders against the law. Without it the Act would be comparatively useless, as people did not like to be called informers; but if it was the duty of a public officer to prosecute, no one could blame him for performing his duty.

The clause was agreed to without amendment.

On the 99th clause. "Before whom such prosecutions may be brought."

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said, he did not believe in giving the Mayor of any municipality jurisdiction in cases under this

Hon. Mr. Dever.

Act, as Mayors had to depend on the popular voice for their office, and the performance of their duty in prosecutions brought before them under this law might injure them with their constituents.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said, the parties prosecuting had their choice of any other Magistrate in the district.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said, it was not right to assume that a Mayor would not do his duty if he were not a member of a Total Abstinence Society. It seemed to him that these things were being pushed beyond all reason.

Hon. Mr. HOPE said, as a rule, Mayors were men of good standing and responsibility.

The clause was agreed to without amendment.

On the 105th clause: "Convicting Magistrate &c. may order that liquor seized on a search warrant be destroyed."

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL asked, if this was to apply to a man who had for instance $10,000 or $15,000 worth of liquor on hand, and had, perhaps unwittingly, infringed upon the provisions of the act. Was all this amount of liquor to be spilled or destroyed?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said, the law had to be made very stringent in order to have it carried out. No respectable dealer would expose himself to such a loss.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said, a magistrate who might have a strong personal feeling, could upon the information of some person of perhaps not very good character, destroy a man's property, under the provisions of this clause.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND—And there would be no appeal from it.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said, he was informed that this clause in the Nova Scotia Act worked very well.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he had felt, himself, in dividing the clause that it was open to that objection.

The further consideration of this clause was postponed until to-morrow.

On the 106th clause:—"Certiorari and appeal taken away in certain cases."

Hon. Mr. MILLER said surely they were not going to make the decisions of such tribunals final in reference to questions involving the rights and liberties of the subject. He thought that clause would not be permitted to stand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have excluded the judgments of Magistrates and applied it simply to those who are recognized judges.

The further consideration of this clause was postponed until to-morrow.

The Committee rose and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

The House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, April 4th, 1878.

The SPEAKER took the chair at 3 o'clock. p. m.

After Routine proceedings.

THE NATIONAL INSURANCE COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill (8) "An Act to authorize the National Insurance Company to reduce its capital stock, and for other purposes," was read the third time and passed without debate.

DOMINION COMPANY'S BILL.

PREAMBLE REPORTED NOT PROVEN.

Hon. Mr. HAMILTON (Kingston), from the Committee on Banking, Commerce and Railways, to whom was referred the Bill intituled: "An Act to incorporate The Dominion Company," reported that the preamble of the said Bill had not been proved to their satisfaction.

On motion of Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL, seconded by the Hon. Mr. DICKSON, it was ordered that the fee paid on the Bill intituled: "An Act to incorporate The Dominion Company," be refunded to the promoters of the said Bill, provided that all expenses are paid.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC REGULATION BILL.

HOUSE AGAIN IN COMMITTEE.

The House, according to Order, was again put into a Committee of the Whole on the Bill: "An Act respecting the "Tariff in Intoxicating Liquors,"

Hon. Mr. PENNY in the chair.

On the 3rd clause: "Repeal of Act of the Province of Canada, 27 & 28 Vic. c. 18,"

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said, with regard to the suspension of the Dunkin Act in the minor municipalities, he was not in favor of it, but he had inserted it at the request of persons who thought their interests would be jeopardized. So far as that was concerned, he could see no difficulty in coinciding with the views of hon. gentlemen. The proposition of the hon. gentleman from Sarnia also met with his approval, if it would not conflict with the prerogative of; the House that was, the adoption of this law in any country would ipso facto repeal the Dunkin Act in that locality. This law embraced the other, and would practically override it, so that the question came up when this law itself was repealed, whether it would have repealed the Dunkin Act so effectually that it would not revive. The amendment which he proposed to this clause was that sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 of The Temperance Act of 1868, should be repealed.

The clause as amended was agreed to.

On the 56th clause: "Petition adopted,"

Hon. Mr. ALLAN pressed his objection to the petition being adopted on a bare majority of votes polled. He still believed that the majority in favor of the petition should be a majority of the electoral vote, and he preferred the amendment in that shape. At the same time if those who, like his hon. friend from Sarnia, had taken a deep interest in this question, were very strongly of opinion that it would throw such difficulties in the way of the working of the Bill as to render it practically useless, he would not press for a majority of the electoral vote, as he did not wish to do anything that would render the Bill inoperative;

he would therefore accept instead a two-thirds majority of the votes polled, to carry the measure.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT regretted that the hon. gentleman should persevere in his opposition to this clause, as the amendment, if adopted, would render the Bill inoperative.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said the hon. gentleman was throwing an obstacle in the way of the Bill, that the adoption of his suggestion would render all its provisions futile. He ventured to say, in the name and by the authority of those with whom he had taken counsel, that if that clause of the Bill were changed, the temperance people did not want the measure at all, but would prefer to have the Dunkin Act.

Hon. Mr. READ thought the wisest course would be to allow the clause to stand as it was.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said he was still unconvinced that his amendment was not the most proper and the most constitutional way to arrive at the will of the people, but he did not desire to do anything that would render the Bill inoperative or useless, therefore he would, with the consent of the House, withdraw it.

The clause was then agreed to without amendment.

On the 95th clause, sub-section 4, "Proviso: distiller or brewer may sell liquor of his own manufacture in wholesale quantities, and to certain persons only."

Hon. Mr. CHRISTIE moved, seconded by Hon. Mr. Vidal, to amend the clause by adding the following words:—

"Provided also that manufacturers of pure native wines from grapes grown and produced by them in the Dominion of Canada may, when authorized to do so by license from the municipal council or other authority having jurisdiction where such manufacture is carried on, sell such wines at the place of manufacture in quantities of not less than ten gallons at one time, except when sold for sacramental or medicinal purposes, when any number of gallons from one to ten may be sold."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he would not object to the proposition if the sale of native wines could be confined to sacramental and medicinal purposes, and even then he would only accept the amendment with very great reluctance.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER said it was idle to talk of pure native wine, as there was no such thing. Unless it was made from the grapes and used at once it would not keep without a certain amount of alcohol in it.

Hon. Mr. CHRISTIE said he had no objection to confining his amendment to the wine grown by the manufacturer, but if this Bill should go into operation without the amendment it would be impossible for the manufacturers of such wines to sell at all. The Advisory Board of the Dominion Temperance Alliance had agreed to accept an amendment of this character.

Hon. Mr. READ said there was no doubt of the beneficial effect of pure native wine on invalids in certain cases. It had been used in his own family to some advantage, and he thought it would be unwise to prevent its being manufactured and sold.

Hon. Mr. DEVER objected to favor being shown to the wine of Ontario while the merchants of the Lower Provinces would be excluded from importing wine and selling it.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said the hon. gentleman was mistaken, because foreign wines could be sold for use out of the county where this law would be in operation, but unless native wines were given the same privilege they could not be sold at all, as there was no provision made for them in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said this Bill had reference only to traffic; individuals could make their own wine and cider as usual. He would, however, have this clause recast to correspond with the amendment proposed by Hon. Mr. Christie and the hon. gentleman from Sarnia, limiting it to the producer of the grape, and placing him, if there would be any competition with others, under the ten gallon clause. Provision would also have to be made for the Cooksville establishment which was authorized by Statute to manufacture a certain amount of brandy.

Hon. Mr. MILLER objected to any such invidious legislation. He could not see why there should be special legislation for one locality, or one particular branch of trade, that would not be extended to others.

The further discussion of this clause was postponed until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL called attention to the fact that the 105 clause, which provides for the destruction of liquor seized, did not limit the quantity to be destroyed.

After discussion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT amended the clause to limit the quantity to ten gallons.

The clause as amended was adopted.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL moved that the following clause be added to the Bill :

On page 21, between lines 50 and 51, insert :

"It shall be lawful for any constable without process at law, to arrest any person whom he may find in a state of intoxication, in any county or city in which the second part of this act is in force, and to convey him to any common gaol, house of correction, lock-up or other place of confinement, there to be kept until he shall have become sober; and such person shall, when sober, be brought before any Judge, Stipendiary Magistrate, or Justice of the Peace, and if convicted of being so found in a state of intoxication, shall be liable to imprisonment in any common gaol, house of correction, lock-up or other place of confinement, for any period not exceeding one month; and if any person having been so convicted as aforesaid, shall refuse upon examination, to give information of the person, place, and time, from whom, where and when he obtained intoxicating liquor, he shall be liable to imprisonment as aforesaid, for a further period not exceeding fourteen days."

In reply to remarks made yesterday on this subject he considered that it was only an act of kindness to confine a drunken man until he became sober, and then, when sober, he should be made to disclose where he got the liquor.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE—Suppose he refuses to do so?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Imprison him for fourteen days. I have taken this clause almost word for word from the Dominion Act for protection of Indians.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE—What does the hon. gentleman consider a "state of intoxication?"

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The whole thing depends upon the man being convicted of being in a state of intoxication. It is only in that case he can be asked where he got the liquor.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN contended there was no analogy between this clause and the one relating to the sale of liquor to Indians, who are looked upon as children, and are protected from unscrupulous traders. A white man who gets drunk does so with his eyes open, and is punished, but there would be something unmanly in attempting to force him to tell where he got the liquor.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE advised the hon. Senator to withdraw the amendment. The law would be unpopular enough with a great many people, but, with this clause added, it would be simply odious.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said it could not be odious because it could only be enforced by a popular vote.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS thought the vendor and the purchaser would equally violate the law, and would deserve equal punishment. The person who would infringe the provisions of this Act by selling the liquor could not be a very reputable citizen, and there would be nothing odious in punishing him.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said the informer was always looked upon as an odious character under any circumstances. The addition of this clause to the Bill would make it very unpopular.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND was ready to do anything he could to check intemperance, but he could never support such a tyrannical clause as this. He was opposed even to the provision which empowered a constable to arrest anyone he suspected of being under the influence of liquor. Many cases had occurred where people seized with dizziness on the street, had been arrested and confined in the cells, and, in some instances, they had died there before morning.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said constables already possessed the power of arresting intoxicated persons.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE saw nothing extraordinary in the suggestion to lock up a drunken man. It was a matter of every day occurrence.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL did not object to that part of the clause, but he protested against the portion which compelled a man to declare where he got the liquor. To drag a man into court because liquor was obtained from him was exceedingly objectionable.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said he understood such a provision was in force in the Quebec License Law.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—It is quite right.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—If you want to make this law effective, you must do all you can to reach the worst offender—that is, the man who sells the liquor.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Suppose a man gets liquor at a friend's house, would you drag him before the public when there may have been no intention to give too much liquor? The man may have got drunk without taking a large quantity, yet you compel him to give the name of the one who supplied it, and drag his name before the public though he may, of all things, abhor such publicity. I believe a man found intoxicated should be kept until sober, but should not be compelled to give the name of the person who furnished him the liquor.

Hon. Mr. POWER thought there was already sufficient provision in the law for the arrest of intoxicated persons, therefore that part of the clause was unnecessary. The second part appeared to him very tyrannical. It was rather late in the nineteenth century to give such inquisitorial powers to anyone.

Hon. Mr. MILLER concurred in this view of the clause. He hoped it would be withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT suggested, there should be an option of paying a fine of say $10, or imprisonment for 24 hours in case of a refusal to disclose the name of the person who sold the liquor.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I am quite willing to accept that.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—That meets part of the objection, but not the whole of it.

After some further discussion the clause was withdrawn to be modified.

On the 107th clause, which was as follows:—

“No conviction, judgment or order, in any such case, be removed by certiorari or otherwise, into any of Her Majesty's Superior Courts of Record; nor shall any appeal whatsoever be allowed from any such conviction, judgment or order to any Court of General Quarter Sessions, or other Court whatever when the conviction has been made by a Stipendiary Magistrate, Recorder, Judge of the Sessions of the Peace, Sheriff or Police Magistrate.”

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said the very reasons which had been given for enforcing this clause were, to his mind, the best reasons for excluding it from the Bill. If there were doubts as to the constitutionality of the law, that was the very best reason why appeal should be allowed. He could not see why an offender against this law should be placed in a different position from offenders against other laws.

Hon. Mr. MILLER suggested that the right of appeal might be taken away but not of certiorari. That was one of the great rights of the subject which could not be taken away except by express provision of Statute. He would not at all object to obstacles being thrown in the way of frivolous appeals from the decisions of magistrates and officers of that sort, but he had strong objections to taking away the other and more cumbrous right of removal by certiorari to the Superior Courts. It was an expensive proceeding, and was not likely to be resorted to, unless there were good ground for it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That clause is exactly the same as the Dunkin Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said the trouble with this legislation was, no matter how extreme it might be, the more did the enthusiasts of the temperance cause stick to it. They thus deprived themselves of the assistance of those who would be willing to go a fair length in promoting the good object they had in view.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said, even with this provision, the Dunkin Act could not be enforced in some counties, and that was why more stringent regulations had to be adopted. In some cases brought under his notice, judges who were opposed to the Dunkin Act had refused to hear appeals. There were two or three counties where the law could not be enforced, simply because there was a sentimental opposition to this class of legislation. He admitted that the law was exceedingly harsh and tyrannical, but exceptional legislation was necessary in this case.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Does the hon. gentleman say there are cases where judges refused to hear cases?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are two cases.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL thought the facts that this provision had been in force for 24 years, and not complained of as oppressive, and that the law would only come into force by the electors so deciding, ought to be sufficient to commend it to the approval of the House. In behalf of the temperance workers, he could not consent to have that clause modified or taken away.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE considered the clause was tyrannical.

Hon. Mr. MILLER moved to amend the clause, so as to take away the right of appeal, but to allow the writ of certiorari in all cases.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I hope the hon. Secretary of State will accept that amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I feel that would destroy the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Will the hon. gentleman tell us why he has brought the charge against the judges?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I stated there were two cases, where county court judges in Ontario had deliberately put themselves up to defeat the Dunkin Act. I will give the names to my hon. friend privately, if he wishes.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said the trouble was, the Dunkin Act was so strict and stringent, it was difficult to get it executed, and that would be the trouble with this measure. He hoped the last refuge of a man who desired to get justice, would not be taken away from him.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE thought the hon. Secretary of State was right in opposing the amendment. It would prevent the law from being effective. It was well known that statutory enactments could not prevent the granting of a writ of certiorari, when a case of injustice or partiality was shown to have occurred.

After some further discussion, the Committee divided on the amendment, which was rejected by contents 18, non-contents 23.

The clause was then adopted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT informed the House that he had been requested by the Premier of Ontario (Mr. Mowat) to add some clauses to the Bill to meet infractions of the License Law lately passed by the Ontario Legislature, as well as of this Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Does the hon. gentleman say the object is to legalize some legislation of the Local Legislature?

Hon. Mr. Vidal.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not to legalize it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—To confirm legislation of the Ontario Parliament which has been found to be ultra vires?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said that was something new. It was the first legislation of the kind since Confederation, and the House would have to consider how far it would be wise to establish such a precedent. It would tend to introduce into the legislation of this country a condition of confusion and contradiction which might be very serious indeed.

The schedules and preamble of the Bill were adopted.

The Committee rose and reported the Bill with amendments.

CANADA SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. DICKSON moved that the Bill intituled "An Act to authorize and confirm the scheme of arrangement of the Canada Southern Railway Company," be read the third time.

Hon. Mr. HOPE moved in amendment that all the words in the said motion after "be" be left out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof "referred back to the Committee on Banking, Commerce and Railways, with instructions to insert the following in the said Bill, viz :

A. "No Bond, Coupon, Debenture or Mortgage or other security which has been or shall be issued by the Company, shall by reason of any lien, charge, incumbrance or preferential claim on the revenue, assets or property of the Company of any kind or nature whatsoever, be held or construed to prevent a judgment or decree against the property of the Company for a debt incurred for working expenses as hereinafter defined from being enforced by execution; provided that no actual levy shall be made by virtue of such execution, without an order or certificate being made by a Judge of the Court in which such judgment or decree has been obtained, stating that in his opinion proceedings upon such execution shall not stop the traffic of the Company."

B. "The chief place of business of the Company with the General and Departmental Offices, Treasurer's Office and principal work shops of the said Company, shall be, and continue to be, in the Town of St. Thomas, in the County Elgin, and Province of Ontario."

• He said the object of the first amendment was to protect small creditors who practically would have no redress unless this provision were made. The Bill had been amended in committee to except fuel and supplies from the operation of the mortgage issued by the Company, but something more was wanted which he believed, was covered effectually by this amendment. It had met with the approval of one of the most experienced railway lawyers in Ontario, and received a large support in another place. The next amendment was to provide against the removal of the company's offices, &c., from the town of St. Thomas. The county of Elgin extends some 60 miles along Lake Erie, and when the council of that important municipality by a vote of 17 against 7, in a full meeting of the reeves of the county, passed a resolution in favor of keeping the offices at St. Thomas, it would be seen it was no mere local feeling that influenced them. He would read the resolution, which, he might add, had been concurred in by the Municipal Corporation of St. Thomas:—

“That whereas the Canada Southern Railway Company have given notice of their intention to apply to the Dominion Parliament to re-arrange the bonded debt of the said Company.

And whereas it has been stated by the President of the Canada Southern Railway Company that it is their intention to remove their offices, together with the books of the said Company, out of Canada;

And whereas such removal of said offices from the Town of St. Thomas, where they are at present located, would be a direct violation of the pledges made by said Company to the County Council of this County, at the time of granting the bonuses to the said Railway Company, to a point outside of the jurisdiction of our Government and Courts of Justice, and at the same time be subversive of the interests of the Canadian creditors of the said Company;

And whereas great inconvenience and loss is caused to parties furnishing supplies to said railway, owing to mens' wages and other supplies used in running said railway, not being a first lien on this property;

Be it resolved, That this Council consider it their duty to call upon the representatives of the County and the members of the House of Commons generally, to withhold their support from the Bill sought for by the Canada Southern Railway Company, unless a clause is therein inserted, or another Bill passed, providing for the non-removal of the said headquarters, offices, workshops, and books, from the Town of St. Thomas, and making the supplies, mens' wages and other running expenses, a first lien on the property of the said Company;

And be it further resolved, That the Warden and County Clerk be instructed to sign a petition to the Dominion Parliament, in the terms of the above resolution.”

On this resolution a long discussion took place. There was a party at the meeting who seemed to represent the Canada Southern Railway Company; at least, he spoke with apparent authority. In his speech he remarked: “Promises of railway promoters are usually ‘high colored.’” A gentleman put the question to him, “Were these promises not distinctly made to us?” to which he replied, “I don't deny it.” That established the fact that promises had been made that the head offices of the company would be placed and kept in St. Thomas. The two municipalities of Elgin and St. Thomas had voted $225,000 as a bonus to the railway, and the interest upon it would bring it up to $350,360 by the time it was all paid. The capital of the company was stated to be $15,000,000. He observed there were three men at a meeting of the company in St. Thomas who claimed to represent 108,132 shares, or $10,813,200. On investigation he found they had paid nothing on their shares except some $200,000 they had paid in for the purpose of organizing the company and getting their charter, and no doubt they recouped themselves by the sale of bonds. To talk about shareholders in connection with this company was an absurdity. The only bona fide shareholders he knew of were the municipalities which had voted bonuses to build the road.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Mr. HOPE resumed his speech. He reverted to the first amendment, and said the bonds of the company were guaranteed by the New York Central and Hudson River Railway Company, one of the soundest on the continent, and this legislation would not have the slightest effect on the value of existing bonds, and could only affect bonds issued in the future. He called attention to the fact that this Bill proposed to mortgage a Canadian corporation for the purpose of aiding and assisting property in a foreign country. The Canada Southern Railway had been built for Canadian purposes, and was a Canadian railway. If the Bill provided that a majority of the directors should take up their residence in Canada, seeing they wished to control a great Canadian enterprise, it would not be unreasonable. The Bill had been amended in the other House so as to provide that the offices should be retained in Canada. This was an improvement, but it was not sufficient. They should be compelled to retain their offices where they were, in St. Thomas. He had a letter from a professional gentleman in St. Thomas, who had drawn up the by-law under which the $200,000 was submitted to the vote of the ratepayers. It contained the following :—

Re Can. Su. Bill.

“The Paymaster informs me that offices are fitted up in Buffalo, ready for them (the C.S.R. officers), and that, apparently, they are to go very soon.

“The impression prevails here that Mr. Tilting has decided on carrying out his intention of removing the Treasurer's Accounting Department to Buffalo, in spite of any Legislation or opposition, or to evade the Act by keeping nominal headquarters here, or at Fort Erie, while the offices will actually be at Buffalo. Of course we want them retained here, but if this cannot be carried, we want the language of the clause prohibiting removal from Canada so clear, full, comprehensive, and explicit, that evasion would be impossible; and, then I think the N. Y. Central would not, out of mere petty spite or revenge, erect and maintain offices at Fort Erie, or elsewhere. We claim that it would only be keeping faith with us to keep them here.”

He thought there was a good deal of force in this. There had been an agreement with the Town of St. Thomas, about the erection of workshops, but nothing had been said in that agreement about the offices. The Company, therefore, claimed the right to remove them to Buffalo; but the Legislature, as far as the Bill had gone, had decided the offices should be kept in Canada. If they were kept in St. Thomas they would be under the surveillance of two powerful corporations—the County of Elgin and the Town of St. Thomas—and they would keep the Company up to the mark. The promoters of this Bill were perhaps the most gigantic railway monopoly in America, before whom the people of the United States stood aghast. With one powerful hand they held the motley crew of Wall Street, and with the other the Legislature of New York. Why not insist upon them keeping their promise to the municipalities which voted the bonuses to build the road? No injury could arise to anyone by compelling them to leave the offices where they had been so many years. Hon. gentlemen would remember the history of the lobster cans—how our neighbors, when it had been stipulated in the Washington Treaty that lobsters should be admitted into the United States duty free, taxed the cans. In dealing with such sharp people, it was just as well to be on the safe side. The language of the Bill should be so clear that there could be no misunderstanding it.

Hon. Mr. DICKSON said this Bill had been introduced in the other House by the hon. member for Welland, at whose request he (Mr. Dickson) had taken charge of it in this House. He had met with some difficulty on the second reading, but managed to get it to the Committee on Banking, Commerce and Railways. The Bill had passed through the other Chamber, and, though he did not hold that as any reason why it should pass this House, he called attention to the fact to show that its various parts had been carefully investigated. It had been referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals, and Telegraphs, where, after discussion, it was referred to a sub-committee of five, who investigated it for five or six days. After every opposition had been given to the measure it was reported back to the committee, and by them reported to the House. It was then argued again, but it was finally passed, the Government giving their weight in its favor. It was then sent to the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Banking, Commerce, and Railways. It was there thoroughly discussed. The amendments now proposed were submitted there, and, after due consideration, rejected. When the Bill was reported back to the House the hon. Senator again pressed the amendments which had been rejected in Committee and defeated in the House of Commons. He hoped they would be rejected in the Senate also.

Hon. Mr. POWER said that the opposition which this Bill had met with so far from showing that the hon. gentleman from Hamilton was unreasonable in moving to amend it at this stage, was very strong evidence in favor of the course which that hon. gentleman had adopted. In the other Chamber sixty votes had been recorded in favor of one of those amendments. That was a respectable minority in a House of two hundred members, and the amendments could not be of that unreasonable character which the hon. gentleman from Niagara represented. If he (Mr. Power) had his option, he would not vote for the first amendment of the hon. Senator from Hamilton, because he thought that its object had been attained by an amendment made in the Committee of this House on Banking, Commerce, and Railways. He looked upon the second amendment as a very proper one, and, as the two amendments could be separated at a future time, if the motion were carried, he had taken the liberty to second it. The corporation of the Canada Southern Railway though originally Canadian, was now American; and though he was not a protectionist, he did believe in protecting, to a certain extent the interests of Canada when they came in collision with either persons or countries outside of Canada. It had been said that this railway had built up the town of St. Thomas. Instead of that being a reason why the company should not be compelled to keep its head quarters there, it was a reason why they should not be allowed to remove them, because their removal would inflict a heavy loss upon the town. It was contended that the company had no intention of removing them; if so then there could be no objections to the adoption of this amendment; but if, on the contrary, the intention was to remove the head quarters from Canada, it was the duty of Parliament to prevent them, and to protect the interest of the people of Southern Ontario.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Has the hon. gentleman any objection to adopting the second amendment?

Hon. Mr. DICKSON—I am not in a position to consent to any change.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—There is something in the objection of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken.

Hon. Mr. DICKSON said, the amendments made to the Bill in committee and which the House had approved of met the case.

Hon. Mr. Power.

The House divided on the motion which was rejected by the following vote:—

THE BIBLE CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON moved the third reading of the Bill to incorporate the Bible Christian Missionary Society. He explained that it was nearly a transcript of the Baptist Missionary Society's Bill, which had passed the House this Session. They were not allowed to hold land or establish Schools in Connection with the Society. The Bill had been carefully drawn, and had unanimously passed the Committee.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved in amendment,

“ That the question be not now put, but that the Bill be referred to the Judges of the Supreme Court for their opinion on the question whether this measure does or does not relate to a matter coming within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces by the 'British North America Act' of 1867, Section 92, Sub-Section 13, 'Property and Civil Rights in the Province;' Sub-Section 11, of same Section, 'Incorporation of Companies with Provincial Objects;' Sub-Section 16, 'Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the Province;' and, lastly, Sub-Section 7, 'The establishment, maintenance and management of Hospitales, Asylums, Charities and Eleemosynary Institutions in and for the Province, other than Marine Hospitals.'"

He said he regretted that it fell to his lot to offer any opposition to this Bill. He had no intention of impeding its passage unless it should be found to be not within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. In 1876, when the Christian Brothers' Incorporation Bill was before the House, the Hon. Mr. Odell moved its reference to the Supreme Court, and, in doing so, stated "his objection to the Bill was solely "due to the fact that it was ultra vires." It was on the ground that the Bill now before the House interfered with civil rights that he (Mr. Bellerose) moved to refer it to the Supreme Court. In the debate on the Christian Brothers' Bill, Hon. Mr. Dickey had stated "it would "cause very much less delay to have this "referred to them (Supreme Court) for "such a decision, than by any other "course that could be taken;" and Hon. Mr. Miller had remarked "it would be a "great advantage to all if it were "decided what the powers of this Parliament actually are with regard to measures of this character." He (Mr. Bellerose) believed this was quite true, and it would be a great deal better to have the opinions of the Judges of the Supreme Court as to whether the Bill before the House was constitutional or not. A decision on this point would save the time of the House, when bills similar to this might come before it in the future.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL asked if the words "Missionary Schools" had been struck out of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL said he had supported the amendment chiefly because he thought it would be better to have this question settled at once by the Supreme Court, and settle the doubts that existed as to the power of this Parliament to pass such a measure. He would not go so far as to say the British North America Act contained any clause specially, and in so many words applying to the present case, and denying such jurisdiction to this Parliament, but he contended that the spirit of that Act was that such measures should be left to the Local Legislature. He specially called attention to the 16th subsection of the 92nd section of the British North America Act, by which it would be seen that powers of a local or private nature could be conferred by the Local Legislatures only, and he contended the object of this Bill was of a private nature. The right to hold real estate was, he understood, struck from the Bill, but it was still objectionable, while the right to possess movable property was retained. The right of holding bank stock, for instance, was a civil right, and came under the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures. Other bills, similar to this, had been rejected by this House, and if this were allowed to pass without a reference to the Supreme Court, it might give rise to a feeling that a certain portion of the people did not receive the same consideration at the hands of this House that others did. It could do no harm to this Bible Society to make this reference, and, as the Supreme Court could give their decision in a day or two, if the Bill were declared constitutional, it would pass both Houses without opposition.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he did not consider the right to hold promissory notes, bank stock and similar assets, was any special gift from this Parliament, because in their individual capacity, they could hold them without an act of incorporation. Practically, this legislation merely incorporated the Society and gave them a name. He would be sorry to come to the conclusion that the Federal Parliament was precluded from the right to grant such a charter unless the object was clearly one of a provincial character. He could not see that the Bill on the face of it professed to be provincial. On the contrary, the object in getting this charter, had been shown to be to save them from the necessity of applying to the Local Legislatures for acts of incorporation. If he entertained any doubts on this subject he would have no objection to referring the Bill to the Supreme Court, but the prerogative of this House would be reduced to a very narrow point if it could not pass such a simple Bill as this, giving a society no power beyond the name.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said he would not be disposed to favor unnecessarily referring the legislation of this Parliament to the Supreme Court, or any other tribunal. Where, however, a clear public advantage would be gained by such reference, the subject should be referred; but the case should be one of very great importance that would justify the House in parting with any of its inherent powers, in judging of matters of legislation to be submitted to it. With regard to the Bill before the House, he was thoroughly in accord with the hon. Secretary of State. This Bill was not one for a purely private or local purpose, but even if it were, it would not be shut out from this Parliament, because then all private bills would be excluded from this Legislature. The 16th subsection of the 92nd section of the British North America Act alluded to matters purely local or private within the Province, which made a very great difference indeed in the present connection. The Bill before the House was intended to incorporate a purely religious and charitable body. If it were confined to one particular Province it would be nothing but right that the charter should be obtained from that Province, but when its operations were intended to be of a general character, extending all over the Dominion, there was no reason why the House should unnecessarily curtail its powers in referring this Bill to the Supreme Court. In this case the Society merely asked to be incorporated for the purpose of diffusing the blessings of Christianity and Christian knowledge, and supporting missions. Missionary schools were mentioned in the Bill, but at the suggestion of some members of the Committee these words were struck out. He thought that unnecessary. He believed the House had the right to pass the Bill as it stood before that amendment was made, because it did not any interfere with the educational system of the Provinces to prevent private individuals or societies establishing schools independent of the educational system of the country. There were numbers of such schools throughout the Dominion, supported by voluntary contributions, as the missionary schools of this Society would have to be, and therefore this Bill could have been passed even with that clause in. He contended if this Parliament had the power to incorporate the society, it had power to give them the civil rights incidental to the organization. If he had any doubts as to the constitutionality of the Bill he would have voted for the amendment without hesitation, but as he had none, he would vote for the third reading.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE contended this argument was not logical. The law gave this Parliament no power over the incorporation of public bodies such as this Society. The argument was good so far as banks, railways, etc., were concerned, because the constitution gave the Federal Parliament power over all matters connected with trade and commerce, but it did not apply to such bodies as this, because the Constitution contained no provision giving this Parliament jurisdiction over them. On the contrary, the jurisdiction was given to the Local Legislatures by the express terms of the Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said, in dealing with banks, Parliament had to deal with civil rights, and they had the power to do so, because the question of banking was assigned to this Parliament. If, therefore, they had the power to deal with civil rights, where the subject was expressly and beyond doubt assigned to the Federal Parliament, they had the same power in regard to subjects over which they possessed an implied authority. The power of this Parliament to incorporate a Society, as in this case was not disputed, and it could not be denied that the power to confer incidental civil rights accompanied it; but such rights were subject, of course, to the laws of the several Provinces in which they might be exercised.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—The hon. gentleman from Arichat (Mr. Miller), inferred that it was not possible to grant a charter without granting some civil right. He (Mr. Trudel) considered that even the granting of the charter, or the right to exist, was conferring a civil right; and that was one of the reasons why he had some doubts as to whether the Bill came within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. The hon. member argued that from the fact of granting the right of existence, followed as a necessary sequence the right to possess what was necessary to that existence. This was what was called petitio principii, because the question in dispute was precisely whether or not this Dominion Parliament had a right to give existence to that Company. The right of the Dominion Legislature to incorporate banks was invoked as showing, by parity of reason, that Parliament had jurisdiction in this matter. The hon. gentleman would remark, what was of first importance, that this right to incorporate banks was mentioned in the 15th sub-section of section 91, of the British North America Act. Looking at the whole section, it would be seen that it was the allusion made to the right to incorporate private companies. It was there specially reserved for the incorporation of banks. It was excepted, and the exception proved the rule. That rule was that the Dominion Parliament had no right to incorporate such companies. Moreover, what benefit would be conferred upon such societies, to grant them such charters? Invariably, their bills were curtailed in such a way as to deprive them of all practical advantage of incorporation. It was said that their object was not merely provincial, as their intention was to act all over the Dominion. In this sense, their object was no more federal than provincial, because the House was told, also, that the Society intended to extend their action all over the world. It was a fact that the object of such societies was not confined to one province or to one country, and he failed to see, since they were practically denied all civil rights to possess real estate in the Provinces without a Local charter, how a Dominion charter would put them in a better position to act in all the Dominion and in foreign countries, than a mere local charter of incorporation. They would be obliged to go before one, at least, of the Local Legislatures, to obtain the right to own real property in one of the Provinces; consequently they would incur double expense. Would it not be more beneficial to those societies to prevent them from coming here, and direct them to the proper place to seek incorporation? Some hon. members had declared they had no doubt on that question. It was very fortunate for them. He did not go so far as to say that he had no doubt on the unconstitutionality of the measure. If he entertained such an opinion, he would act in a different way. Instead of seconding the motion of his hon. friend opposite, (Mr. Bellerose), he would move to defeat the Bill directly, by proposing the six month's hoist. It was because he saw a great deal in the arguments on both sides that he conceived there was great doubt on the question, and therefore advocated the reference to the Supreme Court. In consequence, he hoped the House would adopt the amendment, and settle the question definitely, in order that the House might know how to deal with them in future.

The House divided on the amendment, which was rejected on the following division:—

MINISTERIAL CHANGES IN QUEBEC.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL moved that the fourteenth rule of this House be dispensed with in so far as it relates to the following motion, viz:—

“That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, praying His Excellency to be pleased to transmit to this House, copies of any correspondence with, or communications to His Excellency or to the Secretary of State, from Mr. DeBoucherville, or any other Member of the late Government of the Province of Quebec, since the 26th of March last, on the subject of the recent Ministerial changes in that Province; and also that His Excellency will be pleased to transmit to this House a copy of the commission held by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, and of any instructions issued to him therewith or since.”

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

RESOLUTION.

Hon. Mr. READ moved,

“To resolve, That this House regrets that the mode adopted by the Government in relation to the construction of the Pacific Railway involves the expenditure of enormous sums of public money without any corresponding beneficial results.”

He said:—It must be apparent to this House that great uneasiness, uncertainty, and doubt prevail among the people as to what the effect of the construction of the Pacific Railway will have upon the country. The Finance Minister, in his Budget Speech of 1874, told us that it would cost the Dominion one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty millions of dollars to complete this great undertaking. It should not be regarded from a party point of view, but as a national work, deserving of the patriotic consideration and support of all parties. We all agree as to the necessity of this great highway; the only disagreement between the parties appears to be as to the way in which it shall be constructed. No matter by whom it is built, it must cost the country a very large amount of money. When we come to see the large sums which have already been expended and the small results that have been attained, we may well feel alarmed. As far as can be ascertained from the returns that have been brought down, the total expenditure up to the present time amounts to $10,062,887.96. From this we may deduct $572,144.19 charged to the Intercolonial Railway, leaving $9,490,743.77 as the net expenditure on the Pacific Railway. I find these amounts in the Public Accounts:—

Up to the end of 1875-6...	$6,254,280	21
In 1876-7.....	1,691,149	97
Charged to Con. Fund....	30,148	32
	$7,975,598	50

This was the expenditure up to the 30th of June last. I see by a return which has been submitted to Parliament this week that the expenditure on the Pacific Railway this year has been $1,515,165.27, and this does not include the $572,000 charged to the Intercolonial. No wonder the country is alarmed at such an enormous expenditure when there is so little to show for it. The agreement with British Columbia to build the Pacific Railway was entered into in 1871, and on the 11th of April in that year the following resolution was adopted by the House of Commons:

“Moved by Sir George Cartier, seconded by Mr. Tilly,

“Resolved, That the railway referred to in the address to Her Majesty concerning the union of British Columbia with Canada, adopted by this House on Saturday, the 1st April instant, should be constructed and worked by private enterprise, and not by the Dominion Government, and that the aid to be given to such undertaking should consist of such liberal grants of land, and such subsidy in money, or other aid not increasing

"the present rate of taxation, as the Parliament of Canada shall hereafter determine."

By the journals it may be seen that Mr. Dorion moved, seconded by Mr. Holton, in amendment, to add these words to the resolution: "And not otherwise," for which Mr. Mackenzie, Blake, Mills, Fournier, Huntington, and the whole party, then in Opposition, voted. Subsequently in 1872, as may be seen on the 145th page of the Journals, it was moved by Sir George Cartier, seconded by Sir John A. Macdonald, "That the whole line shall be constructed and worked by one Company; that fifty million acres of land and thirty millions in cash shall be granted as the road progresses, the land to be held by the Government and sold for the Company. The Company to have twenty thousand acres of land in alternate sections, per mile, to aid the construction, the Government reserving the other portions of land." In the Lake Huron and Superior section the contractors were to have twenty-five thousand acres per mile. It may be said that the road could not have been constructed upon these terms, but when we saw two rival companies, composed of the wealthiest and ablest men of the country, on both sides of politics, struggling for the contract, we may at least suppose they knew their business, because we know these same gentlemen had been largely connected with railway business before, and had already acquired enormous wealth. Amongst these names on one side, we find Senators Macpherson, Simpson, Ryan, Price, McMaster, and one hundred and ten of equally well-known capitalists. On the other side we find Sir Hugh Allan, Sir Edward Kenny, David Christie, Donald A. Smith, E. B. Burpee, and a large number of equally wealthy and able men, all of Canada, prepared to risk their fortunes in the enterprise. It was the struggle between these two companies that eventually destroyed the enterprise, through false rumors being circulated both in Canada and in England. The struggle being severe for the mastery, the action taken by the rivals caused the defeat of the scheme, as well as the Government of the day, much to the disadvantage of the Dominion at large. Had this work gone on, we should not have experienced the hard times from which we have suffered during the last four years. While the amendment of hon. Mr. Dorion was not adopted, the Government provided that the railway should be built by a private company, and in such a way as not to increase the taxation. This was the position in which this undertaking stood when the present Government assumed office. The first announcement of a change of policy was in Mr. Mackenzie's address to his constituents in 1874. He declared that the eastern section, north of the great lakes, would be abandoned and our "magnificent water stretches" used, by which a saving of 1,300 miles of railway construction would be effected. At that time there was not a word said about utilizing Rainy Lake and Rainy River. The policy was to use the great lakes and the Saskatchewan, and to construct the Georgian Bay Branch. We all know what became of that scheme. This did not satisfy the people of British Columbia. They complained to the Imperial Government, that the Government of the day had no intention of carrying out the agreement under which the Pacific Province became a part of the Dominion. The result of the appeal was the substitution of the Carnarvon terms for the original agreement. Under that arrangement the Canadian Government agreed to build a road from Thunder Bay to the Pacific coast in 15 years; to build the Esquimault and Nanaimo Railroad on Vancouver Island, and to spend $2,000,000 yearly in British Columbia as soon as the surveys were completed. We know the fate of the Esquimault and Nanaimo Railway Bill. It was opposed by many supporters of the Government in the Lower House, Messrs. Blake, Mills and others, and in this Chamber it was defeated, through the votes of hon. gentlemen who usually follow the Ministry. The Government must have been aware that their agreement was an unwise one, for they neither introduced the measure again, nor tested public opinion upon the subject. I have no hesitation in saying I am sure this House would have passed that measure if they had believed the people desired it. We have not seen that any commencement has yet been made in the construction of the road in British Columbia, although the Government, after the defeat of the Esquimault and Nanaimo Railway Bill in this House, purchased 5,000 tons of rails and fastenings, at a cost of about $320,000, and sent them out to Vancouver Island, where they are rapidly rusting away, as may be seen from the rust scales now lying upon the table. I suppose they are carrying out the other terms of the second agreement quietly, although it is said they do not intend to complete even the road from Thunder Bay to Fort Garry. Then there is the Georgian Bay Branch. There was great haste about that. In 1874 an agreement was entered into for the construction of that section of the railway. Under the Pacific Railway Act, that was a work which this House had no control over. That Act was passed through Committee in this House late on a Saturday night, and Parliament was prorogued a day or two after; the clause providing that the contracts should be submitted to the House of Commons escaped the notice of the Committee. In the course of the debate upon this Bill, the general impression on both sides of the House seemed to be that the contracts must be submitted to Parliament, which means both branches of the Legislature. One hon. gentleman, who is the right-hand man of this Government, said, "These contracts were not to be completed until after Parliament had sanctioned them;" and the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition in this House, in the course of his remarks, said "they should always be submitted to Parliament." I cannot understand how these two or three lines which nobody in this House appeared to have seen, got into the Act. The effect of this clause was that the Senate had no voice in the adoption or cancellation of these contracts. After discussing this Georgian Bay Branch two or three years in succession, I recollect one day the hon. Secretary of State told me I had brought it up every other day. I have nothing to regret in having done so, in view of the circumstances attending the giving of the contract, and its subsequent cancellation. It will be well for us now to see where the ten millions of dollars expended on the Pacific Railway have gone. The surveys up to the present time, so far as we have returns, and what we may anticipate as the expenditure for the current year (judging from past expenditure of this Government) cannot be less than $4,122,747. The outlay has been as follows:—

Hon. Mr. Read.

In 1871-2.....	$489,428.10
" 1872-3.....	563,818.41
" 1873-4.....	310,224.88
" 1874-5.....	574,520.89
" 1875-6.....	791,121.19
" 1876-7.....	754,621.57
" 1877-8 say.....	750,000.00

I have estimated the expenditure for the current year at about the same as that of the last two years, which makes the total expenditure on surveys the amount I have stated. Is there any explanation for an expenditure in two years exceeding the outlay of the former Government in three years, by two hundred thousand dollars? ($200,000!) I have seen nothing to warrant this enormous extra outlay these last three years. It seems to me the Government have been remiss in not deciding upon a terminus on the Pacific coast before expending such enormous sums in surveys through British Columbia. Last year the British Government were asked for a report for a terminus in British Columbia. Admiral De Horsey was called upon to give an opinion as to the proper place for a terminus on the Pacific, which was given last fall; so it is evident up to that time, they had arrived at no decision on this point themselves, though they had been spending millions of dollars in running lines through the Rocky Mountains, and the Cascade Range for three years, without knowing where they wanted to locate the line. In my opinion, the first duty of the Government was to have selected the terminus, and then found the best way to it, for without a good port, the railway would be comparatively useless for commerce. They have to look not only to the growing trade on the Pacific Coast, which has built up such a city as San Francisco, but also to the future trade of a large portion of the North-West, because we cannot expect it will come two thousand miles, when it can reach the sea in less than half that distance. Evidently the Government have not acted on the advice of Admiral De Horsey, nor have they selected the terminus.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—Has the hon. gentleman read the reports of other admirals?

Hon. Mr. READ—I have seen them all. I am not going to discuss the question of where the terminus should be.

What I contend is that some place should have been selected before expending such large sums of money in making surveys which have benefitted nobody but the engineers and others with them. When that expenditure comes to be investigated, I think it will be found that irregularities crop up here and there, just as in matters nearer home. I do not say that the Government have done anything designedly wrong in that direction; I charge them with nothing they have not been guilty of individually, as regards expenditures. Now let us see what has become of the rest of the sum of $10,000,000. I find one little bill amounts to $3,425,665.09, as the cost of steel rails to the country up to the present time, as we find it in the Public Accounts. I might have passed over this subject—it being a painful one—if an hon. gentleman opposite had not thrown out a challenge a few days ago. I told him then I would answer it, and I will do so, stating nothing for which I cannot produce absolute proof. I am prepared to show that, in this transaction, the Government have been guilty of culpable negligence and reckless waste—I will go further, and say, and jobbery as well. The sum of $3,425,665.09 is made up of the following items:—

Hon. Mr. Read.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — Does that include interest on the money?

Hon. Mr. READ—No; I include nothing but what I find in the Public Accounts and returns submitted to Parliament. I will begin at the inception of this transaction—the first advertisement for tenders was as follows:—

“Tenders, in quantities of not less than 5,000 tons of steel rails, will be received by the undersigned not later than Thursday, the 8th October, 1874.

The tenders to state the name of the maker and the price per ton of 2,240 lbs., delivered on the wharf at Montreal during the season of navigation of the year 1875; the last delivery to be not later than 1st October.

OTTAWA, October 3rd, 1874.

We have the statement made, in the returns brought down to Parliament, that "The above advertisement has been sent "to the following papers, with instructions for five insertions:—

"Montreal Herald, Witness, National,

"Bien Public, Trade Review.

"Quebec Daily Mercury, Le Journal de "Quebec, L'Evenement.

"New York, The Herald, Scotsman, The "Coal and Iron Record.

"Toronto, The Globe (daily), Nation."

Strange to say, this advertisement for a contract involving an expenditure of millions of dollars, appeared in only one newspaper, the Montreal Herald.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—It was in the Witness.

Hon. Mr. READ—I believe it did afterwards appear in the Witness, but the most suspicious circumstance was this: although the notice was dated September 29th, the tenders were to be in Ottawa, on the 8th of October, the rails had not only to be procured abroad, but were not like an article kept on hand. The advertisement first appeared in the Montreal Herald on the second of October, and the tenders were to be opened in Ottawa on the 8th of October. It did not appear in the Globe or in any of the newspapers mentioned by the Premier. The files of the New York Herald have been carefully searched as well as other papers, yet it cannot be found there, even it did not appear in the Globe until 13th October. Mr. Darling, Mr. Workman and several other gentleman came to Ottawa and represented to the Government that they could not put in tenders on such short notice, and succeeded in having the time extended. I ask why was the proper notice not given in the first place? Was it a business transaction where so large a quantity was intended to be purchased especially as there was no haste?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because there were not a dozen people who would tender.

Hon. Mr. READ—Such is not the fact, for there were thirty tenders for 350,000 tons of steel rails. They were as follow:—

If the lowest tender had in all cases been accepted, then we would have had nothing to complain of. I do not complain that relatives and friends of the Premier tendered; they had a perfect right to do so, but I do complain when lower tenders than theirs were passed over and the contracts given to his brother's firm. Of the money expended on the steel rails, I find Cooper, Fairman & Co. received $1,561,792.15. That is a large amount, especially if they received ten per cent. above other offers on any part of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear. hear.

Hon. Mr. READ—The hon. Secretary of State laughs, but before I resume my seat I will prove by the returns they had that profit on some of the supplies above what several others had tenders in for. Take the bolts and nuts, for instance, for the supply of which there were seven lower than Cooper, Fairman & Co. It will be seen they received for 160 tons of iron bolts and nuts $101 per ton, while there was one tender in to supply them for $82.73 and two for $92.47. Will the hon. gentleman say they had not a profit of ten per cent. or more on that transaction above other tenderers? Now, let us take tenders for rails. When the Government had purchased 45,000 tons they made up their minds to buy 5,000 tons more, some two months after the tenders were in, to send to British Columbia. The following letter may explain why rails were purchased when not wanted:—

Hon. Mr. Read.

"DEAR SIR, "MONTREAL, 29th Dec. 1874.

"I have just received a cable message through Mr. Gourman on behalf of the makers offering 6,400 Tons best Bessemer steel rails additional at £10 10 0, F. O. B., Liverpool, subject to reply upon Thursday: should you be able to take this extra lot I will secure them at once as the prices will probably advance after New Year. The writer will wait upon you in the morning at the station with reference to this offer.

"Your obedient servant, "JAMES COOPER."

"HON. A. MACKENZIE.

They did not call for tenders for these 5,000 tons, though the market was falling, but the Premier made a direct offer to Cooper, Fairman & Co., his brother's firm. Two days before making this offer, the following order was given:—

"OTTAWA, 5th January, 1875.

"GENTLEMEN.—The Minister of Public Works having reconsidered your offer on behalf of the West Cumberland Iron and Steel Company (Limited) of Workington, to supply 5,000 tons of steel rails in addition to the quantity stipulated in their contract, at £10 (ten pounds) sterling per ton, and on the terms and conditions of their said contract f. o. b. at Workington, I am to inform you that said offer is accepted and to request you will advise the Company accordingly.

"I have, &c., (Signed) F. BRAUN, Secretary."

"Messrs. Cox & Green, Montreal.

"OTTAWA, 5th January, 1875.

"SIR,—In reply to your communication of the 29th ult., offering to supply 6,400 tons of Bessemer steel rails at £10 10s. f. o. b. at Liverpool, I beg to inform you that the Department does not require any more.

"I have, &c., (Signed) F. BRAUN, Secretary."

"James Cooper, Esq., Montreal.

"OTTAWA, January 7th, 1875.

"Telegram to Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., Montreal.

"If freight to British Columbia can be got at two pounds sterling, the Government will take time. Delivery will be at Esquimault, Cowichan Bay or Nanaimo, at all of which places there are good facilities.

"(Signed) F. BRAUN, Secretary."

Hon. Mr. Read.

"OTTAWA, January 18th, 1875.

"By telegram from Montreal to W. Buckingham, Public Works.

"Accept your offer made by telegram on the seventh. Rails ten pounds ten shillings (£10. 10s.); freight forty shillings, insurance not included.

"(Signed) JAS. COOPER."

"13 & 15 HOSPITAL STREET, MONTREAL, 18th January, 1875.

"DEAR SIR,—Referring to the contract you have awarded to our friends, the West Cumberland Iron and Steel Company, for 5,000 tons steel rails, to be delivered at Workington, we are informed you propose this lot to be shipped to the Pacific Coast, in which case we venture to say you would require a sufficient supply of spikes to accompany them; we are not now in a position, but expect soon to be, to give you a quotation for their delivery with the rails at Workington.

"We are yours faithfully, (Signed), COX & GREEN."

"F. BRAUN, Esq., Secretary, Department of Public Works, Ottawa."

"OTTAWA, December 9th, 1874.

"GENTLEMEN,—In reply to your communications of the 30th ult., asking if any more steel rails would be required by the Government during the coming year, in addition to those already purchased, I beg to inform you that should any more be required, tenders will be called for as previously done.

"CHAMPLIN & GILLET, P.O.B., 3,012, New York, U.S.,

"OTTAWA, 21st January, 1875.

"GENTLEMEN,—In reply to your several communications on behalf of Messrs. Naylor, Benson & Co., I am to state that the Government accepts their offer to supply 5,000 tons of steel rails at £10 10s. 0d. sterling per ton f. o. b. at Liverpool, and allows £2 0s. 0d. per ton for freight to the Vancouver ports.

"The Agent General of the Dominion, E. Jenkins, Esq., M.P., will see to the insurance.

"Messrs. Morton, Rose & Co. are Financial Agents of the Government in London.

"I have, &c., (Signed), F. BRAUN,

"Messrs. COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co., Montreal.

A reference to these documents will show that on the 22nd of December a telegram was sent to Cox & Green. in reply to a question whether the Government wanted more rails, and that an answer was given that "No further steel rails wanted, thanks;" and this was only a few days before Cooper, Fairman and Co. were asked to supply 5,000 tons, as will be seen from the following telegram:—

"OTTAWA, Jan. 18th, 1875.

"By telegraph from Montreal to W. Buckingham, Public Works:—

"Accept your offer made by telegraph on seventh. Rails ten pounds ten shillings (£10 10s.); freight, forty shillings, insurance not included."

"(Signed), JAS. COOPER."

This firm had an offer to supply over $300,000 worth of goods, and were at liberty to go anywhere they pleased and make what they could out of it. My complaint is that the Government did not ask for tenders though there was a falling market, and people were urging them to take more at lower rates than were paid Cooper, Fairman & Co. I think the country will say that the public money was expended under very suspicious circumstances in that case. We find that Mr. Mackenzie's brother was then a special partner in this highly favored firm, and that he had an interest of $15,000 in it. I will read the deed of partnership, and hon. gentlemen can judge for themselves whether Mr. Charles Mackenzie, the Premier's brother, benefited by those contracts given in such an irregular manner and under circumstances so suspicious.

"We, the undersigned, do hereby certify that we have entered into co-partnership under the style or firm of Cooper, Fairman & Company, as merchants, which firm consists of James Cooper, of the city of Montreal, and Frederick Fairman, at present residing at Waterloo, in the said Province, as general merchants, and Charles Mackenzie, in the Province of Ontario, as a special partner, the said Charles Mackenzie having contributed fifteen thousand dollars to the capital stock of the said partnership, which said partnership commenced on the first day of January, 1873, and terminates the first day of January, 1878. "HUBERT, PAPINEAU & HONEY, P. S. C."

This was a special partnership, and in law the dissolution to be effective, requires to be registered. We find a new partnership has been registered in the following words:—

"We, James Cooper and Frederick Fairman, both of the city of Montreal. Hardware Merchants and Importers, hereby certify that we have carried on, and intend to carry on business as such in the city of Montreal, in partnership, under the name of Cooper, Fairman & Company, and that the said co-partnership has not subsisted since the fourth day of May last, and that we, the said James Cooper and Frederick Fairman are, and have been since the said day, the only members of the said partnership. Witness our hands at Montreal, this twentieth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five.

JAMES COOPER.
F. FAIRMAN.

"Filed and registered this twenty-fourth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five.

HUBERT, PAPINEAU & HONEY, P. S. C.

It will be observed that Naylor, Benson, & Co. never put in tenders, and if the bolts and nuts had not been left out of the tender of the Mersey Company for 20,000 tons steel rails, which Cooper, Fairman, & Co. represented, their tender would have been higher than several others. This bolt and nut transaction I will allude to again in a short time. When this matter was brought up again in this House last year, we were told by gentlemen supporting them:—

"That they (the Government) had lost money, "was true, and any Government that would "lose over $1,000,000 might expect to hear of "it at the hustings. That was the place for "such clap-trap, not the Senate."

I don't know what the Senate is for if we are not to take notice of such matters. Now, let us see what rails have been selling for since the Premier made this purchase, through his brother's firm, without tender, of 5,000 tons, at £10 10s. per ton. I see that Bolckow, Vaughan, & Co. lately obtained an order in Brussels for supplying 9,000 tons of steels rails at £6 10s. per ton, delivered. Several Belgium firms tendered, but at higher prices. In a falling market, and with firms anxious to supply rails, we do not know at what rate they could have been purchased in January, 1874, if tenders had been called for. Now, let us look at the tender of Cooper, Fairman, & Co., for supplying bolts and nuts. Their tender was $101 per ton, while Darling & Co.'s was $92.47. The following correspondence will explain the circumstances attending that transaction:—

“OTTAWA, 17th Nov., 1874.
“Telegram to W. Darling & Co., 30 St. Sulpice St., Montreal.

“Your tender for bolts and nuts among lowest. For what quantity would you be willing to contract?

(Signed) T. TRUDEAU,
Deputy Minister.”

The answer was as follows, first by telegraph, and then by letter:—

“MONTREAL TELEGRAPH COMPANY,
OTTAWA, NOV. 18, 1874.
“By telegraph from Montreal to T. Trudeau, Deputy Minister of Public Works.

“Will supply one hundred tons: if more wanted please inform us; we are not restricted to quantity.

(Signed) WM. DARLING & CO.”

“MONTREAL, 18th Nov., 1874.
“DEAR SIR,—In reply to your telegram of yesterday, we telegraphed this morning. ‘Will supply 100 tons, if more wanted please inform us; we are not restricted to quantity.’ Should a large quantity be required we will be pleased to have an opportunity to ask our correspondents how much they can undertake to furnish during the season of 1875.

“We are, yours very respectfully
(Signed) WM. DARLING & Co.”
“T. TRUDEAU, Esq.,
Deputy Minister Public Works,
Ottawa.”

The next communication is as follows:—
“OTTAWA, 2nd December, 1874.

“GENTLEMEN,—Referring to your letter and telegraphic message, both dated the 18th ultimo, offering to furnish 100 tons of railway bolts and nuts, I beg to inform you that the parties who have contracted to supply the steel rails will also furnish the bolts and nuts required for the quantity of rails contracted for.

“I have, &c.,
(Signed) F. BRAUN,
“Secretary.
“Wm. DARLING & Co.,
“Montreal.”

That was to get rid of Darling & Co. Several others were got rid of besides. Two or three months pass, and then comes in the acceptance of Cooper, Fairman & Co.'s tender:—
Hon. Mr. Read.

“OTTAWA, 18th February, 1875.
“GENTLEMEN,—The supply of bolts and nuts required in connection with the contract of the Mersey Steel and Iron Co., for 20,000 tons of steel rails required by the Government of Canada, having been omitted from the contract, I am to acquaint you for the information of said company, that their tender for the same at $101 per ton, delivered at Montreal at the same time as the rails, is accepted.

“I have, &c.,
(Signed), F. BRAUN,
“Secretary.
“Messrs. COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.,
“Montreal.”

“We, as agents for Messrs. Robb & Co., of the Toronto Bolt and Nut Works, beg to supply the Laird bolts and nuts as per sample bolt, to be furnished by the Inspector, Mr. C. P. Sandberg of London, the price to be ($101) one hundred and one dollars per gross ton, duty paid, delivered in Montreal or Toronto.

We are, dear sir,
Yours, &c.,
(Signed),
COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.,
Agents for Robb & Co.
The Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa.

“OTTAWA, 5th March, 1875.
Telegram to Cooper, Fairman & Co., Montreal
“Your tender on behalf of Robb & Co., Toronto, for supply of bolts and nuts at $101 (one hundred and one dollars) per ton is accepted.
(Signed),
F. BRAUN,
Secretary.”

Here are two contracts given to supply bolts, although seven or eight tenders were put in at lower prices. It has been attempted to show that Cooper Fairman & Co. paid the duties upon the bolts and nuts, this letter fully explains that they did not do so:—

“MONTREAL, July 29th, 1875.
“DEAR SIR,—We beg as Agents for “The Patent Bolt and Nut Co.,” of Birmingham, England, to supply the Government with the necessary iron fish bolts and nuts to lay 20,000 tons of steel rails on a railway track, subject to “Sandberg's” inspection before leaving the works, to be delivered in bond in Montreal, as per prices accepted and mentioned in your letter to us on this subject, Dated February 18th, in ($101) one hundred and one dollar portion. These are for the Mersey's steel rails.

We are, dear sir,
Your obedient servants,
(Signed),
COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.”
To the Honorable,
The Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa.

They had put in for the West Cumberland Company for 20,000 tons rails, but if they had got the bolts at their prices they could not have got the rails, as there were lower tenders for the whole supply. The rails are given, but not the bolts at the same time, and the bolts are not given to those willing to tender lower. We find spikes supplied by Cooper, Fairman & Co., at £18. 10s. sterling which were supplied afterwards at $57. I complain that the Government gave this favored firm the rails to be delivered in British Columbia without tender, and the freighting of them, when a few days before, several offers had been made by others to supply the rails and transport them, while the Act of Parliament provided that all contracts should be let by tender. We now come to the freighting to British Columbia. First, we have the following telegram :

“MONTREAL TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

“By Telegraph from New York to Hon. A Mackenzie.

“Have just received contract duly executed by Guest & Co., which we forward to you. We learn, through a Transportation Company, that you may want some rails at British Columbia. Will you consider a proposition from us to ship one lot direct there, or for an additional ten thousand tons to be sent there? Please telegraph reply.

(Signed)

“PERKINS, LIVINGSTON, POST & Co.”

Let it be observed that Guest & Co., of the Dowlais Steel Works, which were lower for the rails, and seven dollars and seventy-one cents per ton upon the bolts lower, and who supplied 10,000 tons, were obliged by the Government to deposit with English bankers, $25,000 as security for the performance of their contracts, while Cooper, Fairman & Co., who supplied 25,000 tons, did not make any deposit or give other security, as will be seen by the following correspondence:—

“59 LIBERTY STREET,
“NEW YORK, February 18th, 1875.

“DEAR SIR,—We beg to advise you that Messrs. Guest & Co. wrote us under date of 4th inst., that they have deposited with Messrs. Glyn & Co., $25,000 in bonds of the United States Funded Loan, as the security required by their contract. We take this opportunity of saying that if, for any reason, any of the awards of steel rails you have made will not be carried out, we shall be glad to be apprised of the fact, as we should like to make you a proposition for further quantity.

Hon. Mr. Read.

“Yours, respectfully,

“(Signed),

“PERKINS, LIVINGSTON, POST & CO.

“HON. A. MACKENZIE,

“Minister of Public Works,

“Ottawa.”

“OTTAWA, 22nd July, 1875.

“SIR,—I send you an extract from a letter received from Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co., of London, England, dated 4th inst., viz:—

“Messrs. Guest & Co., of this city, deposited with us, in compliance with the terms of contract into which they have entered with the Department of Public Works of Canada, for the supply of 10,000 tons of steel rails, &c., bond of the Funded Loan (5 per cent.) of the United States of America, for $25,000, which we hold on account of the Dominion Government. These gentlemen state they reserve to themselves the right of the interest on these securities. We shall therefore feel obliged if you will inform us whether these securities are considered by you as satisfactory, and whether we may account to Guest & Co. for the dividends thereon, as they become due. Be so good as to advise what reply is to be made to Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co.”

“I am Sir,

“Your obedient servant

“Public Works Department,

“Ottawa.”

To which the following reply was sent:—

“OTTAWA, 26th February 1875.

“SIR,—In reply to your communication of the 22nd inst., relative to the $25,000 deposited with Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co., London, on behalf of this Government, by Messrs. Guest & Co., contractors for the supply of steel rails, being security for the due fulfilment of their contract, and asking if the dividends accruing on said security can be paid to Messrs. Guest & Co., they having reserved themselves said right on making this deposit. I beg to inform you that they are entitled to receive the dividends as they fall due, as long as they do not fail in fulfilling their contract. In case of any default of the contractors, the Department would have to notify Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie & Co., not to pay any more of the dividends until such default is made good by the contractors. The enclosed extract from Guest & Co's. contract is transmitted for your information.”

Having established the fact that one firm was compelled to give security, while the favoured firm of Cooper, Fairman & Co., did not, let me call the attention of the House to the favoritism displayed in the freighting of these rails. Here is the correspondence:—

"LIVERPOOL, NEW YORK & PHILADELPHIA STEAMSHIP COS., No. 16 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, December 23rd, 1874.

"DEAR SIR,—Having learned from our Liverpool offices of the probability of the shipment of a large quantity of rails during next summer for the Canadian Pacific Railway, of which we are informed you are an officer, we beg to ask at what point they must be delivered, to enable us to offer a rate for carriage through from Liverpool to destination.

"Your early attention is kindly requested.
"Yours very truly,
(Signed), JOHN G. DALE.

"F. BRAUN Esq., Secretary,
Public Works Department,
Ottawa."

"OTTAWA, 5th January, 1875.

"SIR,—In reply to your communication of the 23rd ult., asking the probable destination of the rails lately purchased by the Government, in order to enable you to make offers for the carriage of same, I beg to inform you that the places of delivery will be Montreal and Vancouver Island

"I have, &c.,
(Signed), F. BRAUN,
Secretary.

"JOHN G. DALE, Esq.,
New York, U.S."

Having treated those applicants in this manner, they then give the freighting of the rails to Cooper, Fairman & Co. without tender. I have been in the freighting business myself, as many gentlemen here have been, and we all know that freights vary, being at one time high, and at another time low. I hold it was the duty of the Government to have called for tenders under such circumstances, but there was apparently a little job in the transportation of the rails, as there was in the purchase of them. Tenders were asked for for the transportation of 5,000 tons of rails from Montreal to Duluth. In response to that advertisement we find several tenders were put in:—

"DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS,
"OTTAWA, 20th April, 1875.

"By Cooper, Fairman & Co's tender, No. 8047, of 14th Nov., 1875, endorsed 1st Feb., 1875, the difference in price of rails delivered at Montreal, or delivered at Duluth or French River, is $5.60 per ton.

"Mr. E. Samuel having withdrawn his tender (see telegram dated May 12th, 1875), the offer by Cooper, Fairman & Co. to carry for $6.20, authorized by account 8760, is lowest."

Do you find among these tenders Cooper, Fairman & Co.? There is no mention of them. They thought they had got enough already, and they did not suppose they had such warm and zealous friends in the Government who were looking after their interests and furnishing them with whatever pickings were going. We find the Premier sending them the following telegram:—

"OTTAWA, 28th April, 1875.

"Minister of Public Works would be glad to see you respecting carriage of steel rails westward.

"COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.,
Montreal

"Come up here gentlemen! Here's twelve thousand dollars for you!" That is what this communication means. "You have been remiss, you have not been looking out for your own interests." Mr. E. Samuel had tendered for the transportation of the rails. The following telegrams will show the nature of his tender:—

"OTTAWA, 27th April, 1875.

"By Telegraph from Montreal to F. Braun, Esq., Secretary.

"Are you open to more than the quantity named in my tender; if so, please name the quantity of rails you desire carried on same terms.

"(Signed), E. SAMUEL."

"OTTAWA, 26th April 1875.

"By Telegraph from Montreal to F. Braun, Esq.

"Offer as surety D. Butters & Co., merchants; if more required can furnish security to any amount; guarantee to ship by first class propeller. Answer.

"(Signed), E. SAMUEL."

This tender was the lowest but the Minister of Public Works by a subterfuge puts him off in this way. The following Order-in-Council is passed on the tenders:—

"Copy of a Report of a Committee of the Honorable the Privy Council, approved by his Excellency the Governor-General in Council on the 30th April, 1875:

"On a report dated 29th April, 1875, from the Honorable the Minister of Public Works, stating that proposals have been invited for the transport of 5,000 tons of steel rails and fastenings from Montreal to Fort William or Duluth, Lake Superior, during the season of 1875 the price to include all cost of handling, piling, insurance and charges at all points, and that the undermentioned tenders have been received, viz:—

1st. E. Samuel, Montreal.....	$6.00 per ton
2nd. C. Edward, Kingston.....	6.25 "
3rd. G. E. Jacques & Co., Montreal.	6.30 "
4th. Chs. Stephenson, Montreal..	6.50 "
5th. Cox & Green, Montreal.....	6.50 "
6th. Holcomb & Steward, Kingston	6.74 "
7th. J. H. Beatty & Co., Thorold.	7.00 "
8th. W. H. Perry, Buffalo.....	7.00 "

"That in a tender made in November last, for the supply of steel rails, Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., agents, stated the difference in price for delivering those rails in Montreal or Duluth and French River, would be $5.60 per ton, exclusive of any harbor or wharfage dues at the ports named;

"That those gentlemen now offer on behalf of the Merchant's Lake and Steamship Line (consisting of eighteen first class propellers) for an additional sum of not more than sixty cents per ton to the price of $5.60 asked in their tender of November last, or say a total sum of $6.20 per ton, to undertake the transport of 5,000 tons of rails from Montreal to Fort William or Duluth, and to assume all cost of handling, piling, insurance and charges as required by the advertisement.

"That Mr. E. Samuel, who is the lowest bidder on the list given above is not a steam-boat owner;

"The Minister therefore recommends that the offer of Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co. be accepted.

"The Committee submit the above recommendation for Your Excellency's approval.

"Certified,

"(Signed), W. A. HIMSWORTH,
"Clerk Privy Council.

"To the Hon.

"The Minister of Public Works,
" &c., &c., &c."

On the same day Mr. Samuels telegraphs as follows:—

"OTTAWA, 29th April, 1875.

"By Telegraph from Montreal to T. Trudeau, Dep. Min. Board of Public Works:

"Your early reply to my tender will oblige, so as to regulate movements of propellers pending arrival of rails. Security and propellers will be made satisfactory to you.

"(Signed), E. SAMUEL"

The reply was the following telegraph:—

"OTTAWA, 5th May, 1875.

"SIR.—Referring to your telegram of the
Hon. Mr. Read.

29th instant, relative to your tender for the transport of steel rails westward, I am to inform you that the Minister of Public Works has made other arrangements for this service.

"I have, &c.,

"(Signed) F. BRAUN,
Secretary."

"F. SAMUEL, Esq., &c., &c.,
Montreal."

For some unaccountable reason, seven days after the above was received, Mr. Samuel sent the following to the office of the Board of Works:—

"OTTAWA, 12th May, 1875.

"By Telegraph from Montreal to F. Braun,
Secretary B. of P. W.

"SIR,—For reasons unnecessary to state, I beg to withdraw my tender for transport of railway iron for Lake Superior ports.

"(Signed) E. SAMUEL"

Mr. Samuel having been completely got rid of by this subterfuge, we find the Premier notifies Cooper, Fairman & Co.:

"OTTAWA, 13th May, 1875.

"The carriage of five thousand tons (5,000) of steel rails and accessories, from Montreal to Duluth or Fort William, for six dollars and twenty cents, including all charges, is awarded to you. A contract will be prepared.

"(Signed) F. BRAUN,
Secretary."

"COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.,
Montreal."

By this it will be seen that Cooper, Fairman & Co. got the contract at 20 cents per ton more than Samuels offered to transport them for. It does not appear much per ton, but we find they make a handsome profit out of it—$12,000. That would have been all right if there were not others lower.

"OTTAWA, ONT., November 14th, 1874.

"DEAR SIR—Should the Government prefer to have these rails delivered at the following points: Duluth, Fort William and Georgian Bay, instead of Montreal, we can deliver them at Duluth or Georgian Bay at $4 per ton additional, and at Fort William at $4.75 additional, conditional as to the delivery at points named, that there be a sufficient depth of water for vessels to go thereto, and that the consignees are to unload. Not knowing if it is the intention of the Government to insure the various cargoes on the lakes, we have not included the lake insurances on the inland freights, $4 and $4.75, which would be about 16 cents per ton.

"Your obedient servants,

"The Minister of Public Works."

" 13 & 15 HOSPITAL STREET,
MONTREAL, 17th Dec. 1874.

" DEAR SIR,—Referring to ours of the 7th instant, we would esteem it a favor if you would kindly reply to enquiries we then made, which were as follows:—1st. The latest date at which it is necessary that the draft of the contract for steel rails should be returned duly signed; 2nd. Particulars of the modifications proposed on Sandberg's Standard.

" Our reasons for troubling you on these points we explained in ours of the 7th instant. We notice that a portion of the rails purchased by the Government are intended for delivery on Lake Superior, the Government allowing an extra $5 per ton for this purpose. Should you wish us to deliver our 5,000 tons at that point, we should be glad to hear of this wish as soon as possible, to enable us to make the necessary arrangements for forwarding the rails from Montreal to Lake Superior.

" Apologising for thus troubling you.

" We are dear Sir,
" Yours truly,

" (Signed), COX & GREEN.

" F. BRAUN, Esq., Secretary

" Ottawa.

Both these parties supplied 10,000 tons each. It will be seen by the following letter that while Norris & Neelon and others received five dollars per ton, Cooper, Fairman & Co., got the balance for doing nothing comparatively. In this case there were rings inside of rings, but the public had to pay the piper.

" HAMILTON, Ont., 22nd June, 1875.

" DEAR SIR,—In accordance to your advertisement for tenders to freight 5,000 tons steel rails from Montreal to Duluth, with Messrs. Norris & Neelon of St. Catharines, we authorized Messrs. G. E. Jacques & Co., Montreal, to tender on our account and which tender was accepted. Our propeller 'Lake Ontario' loaded and delivered at Duluth, on 2nd June, 1,084 steel rails, and 960 boxes fish plates weighing 290 tons, 17cwt., 2qrs. 1lb @ $5=$1,454.25; we were informed our freight would be paid by you in Ottawa, and we request you will retain said amount in your hands. The Purser of the boat holds a receipt for above, but as he made the first trip we are not certain if your proper agent granted it or not. The 'Lake Ontario' is again on her way up to Duluth with 1,555 rails and 133 boxes or cases of bolts, weighing 392 tons., 9cwt., 2qrs. @ $5=$1,962.37. We will be glad to hear from you that after unloading above we will be able to get our freight on the two loads. He will proceed to Ottawa on his return, and we trust you will be kind enough to settle for same.

" OTTAWA, 10th June, 1876.

" GENTLEMEN,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day's date, offering on behalf of the Merchants' Lake and River Line of Steamers to carry from ten to twenty thousand tons of steel rails on the same terms and conditions as former contract—namely, at six dollars and twenty cents currency per gross ton for Duluth and Fort William, on Lake Superior, which rate includes piling at port of delivery and insurance, and to inform you that the Department accepts your offer for five thousand tons (5,000).

This is an additional lot, without tenders. They being called for next year they were carried from Montreal at $4.50 per ton, and from Kingston for from 2.75 to 3.50 per ton. As regards the bolts and nuts for which so large a sum was paid Cooper, Fairman & Co., above others tenders, it may be attempted to show that Darling and others were not to pay duty; let us see what is the case with Cooper, Fairman & Co. :—

" MONTREAL, July 29th, 1875.

" DEAR SIR,—We beg as Agents for "The Patent Bolt and Nut Co.," of Birmingham, England, to supply the Government with the necessary iron fish bolts and nuts to lay 20,000 tons of steel rails on a railway track subject to "Sandberg's" inspection before leaving the works, to be delivered in bond in Montreal as per prices accepted and mentioned in your letter to us on this subject, dated February 18th, in ($101) one hundred and one dollar portion. These are for the Mersey's steel rails.

" OTTAWA, 18th February, 1875.

" GENTLEMEN,—The supply of bolts and nuts required in connection with the contract of the Mersey Steel and Iron Co., for 20,000 tons of steel rails required by the Government of Canada, having been omitted from the contract, I am to acquaint you for the information of said Company, that their tender for the same at $101 per ton, delivered at Montreal at the same time as the rails, is accepted.

Then a little further as regards bolts and nuts for British Columbia :—

" MONTREAL, 2nd March, 1875.

" DEAR SIR,—We beg to quote for bolts and nuts for the 5,000 tons rails for Vancouver's Island to be supplied by us to Sandberg's section at (£19 10s.) nineteen pounds ten shillings per gross ton, f. o. b., Liverpool, the said bolts to stand Sandberg's test, and to be paid for by the financial agents of the Canadian Government in London, upon presentation of invoice bills of lading and inspection certificate; deliveries to be made in March, April and May of this year.

This offer was accepted in the face of this letter:—

" 13 & 15 HOSPITAL STREET,

" MONTREAL, February 19th, 1875.

" DEAR SIR,—Your esteemed favor of the 18th is received, to which we hasten to reply. You are quite correct about the price for bolts and nuts, as quoted in ours of November 30th, viz.: £20 sterling in bond delivered at Montreal; but we are under the impression that the contract, of which all three copies are at present in England, named a price in currency, which included duty, and it was therefore, with a view to make a clean job of the matter, and relieve the Government of the additional business of attending to the matter of expense of duty that the quotation was put that shape, as we supposed from the way the contract stated the amount, that it was the desire of the Government of the Dominion to have the matter of the paying duty included, and, as it were, off their hands.

" We are quite prepared, however, if you do desire to have the price made £19 sterling per ton, f. o. b. at Workington, leaving out the matter of duty altogether, and to have that price inserted in the contract.

" Trusting this will be entirely satisfactory.

" We are, dear Sir,

" Yours truly,

Is it any wonder that uneasiness prevails about the public expenditure, when we see the large sums paid to friends, and to all appearances, relatives of the Premier. Here is a list of the amounts paid Cooper, Fairman & Co., which amounts to $1,561,792.15, as far as we have information, and is made up of the following items:—

About 20,000 tons steel rails.....	$1,128,737.35
5,000 tons steel rails.....	265,052.36
Spikes, bolts, and nuts.....	8,530.00

Hon. Mr. Read.

160 tons bolts and nuts.....	16,160.00
73 tons bolts and nuts.....	6,800.69
Spikes, bolts, and nuts.....	17,922.51
Transportation of rails, etc., to Vancouver's Island.....	51,462.96
Transportation of about 10,000 tons rails, etc., from Montreal to Lake Superior.....	67,126.28

Total.....$1,561,792.15

The rails being at Duluth, let us see what became of them afterwards. From this correspondence it will be seen that no tenders were asked for the transportation to Fort Garry, nor was the lowest offer taken sent in reply to advertisements, and when we see that $206,171.33 was paid for this service, we cannot wonder that, last year the Kittson Company were able to divide eighty per cent. upon their stock. It is well known that certain members supporting the Government in the Commons, are deeply interested in that line.

" OFFICE OF THE

RED RIVER TRANSPORTATION Co.,

No. 92, Third Street,

St. Paul, Minn., 21st April, 1875.

" SIR,—I hereby offer to transport railroad iron, chairs, fish-bars, spikes and other material for track, from Duluth, Minnesota, to Winnipeg, Manitoba, or any point on the Red River between Pembina and Winnipeg, at rate of $15.00 U. S. currency per ton of 2,000 lbs.; and I further offer that in case the channel of the Red River at the rapids at St. Andrews, between Winnipeg and the Stone Fort, is improved so as to make a channel of sixty feet in width, free from rocks and boulders, so as to enable boats and barges to pass with ordinary safety, to make the same rate, namely:—$15.00 per ton from Duluth to the point of crossing of the Canadian Pacific Railway, north of said Stone Fort, or in case the said rapids are not improved, I will allow the barges loaded with such material to be run down to said crossing, provided that the Canadian Government will receipt for the material at Winnipeg, and will assume all risk of danger of navigation arising from said rapids on down trip to both boat and cargo.

" The above rate to hold good and be in force during the season of navigation on the Red River, as long as there is two feet of water on the rapids and shoals in said river.

" This offer includes all labor in handling above material from the dock at Duluth, to the bank of the river at point of delivery.

"We have the honor to state that if the Government to take railroad materials to Manitoba via Duluth, we are prepared to carry the steel rails and fastenings required for the Pembina Branch, and for the section of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the crossing of Red River to Lake of the Woods, during the present and ensuing summer, at the following rates (American currency) delivered over the rail, viz:—

"From Duluth to any point on Red River between the Boundary line and Fort Garry, for thirteen dollars and fifty cents, ($13.50) per ton.

"From Duluth to the crossing of the Canadian Pacific Railway over Red River, for the sum of fifteen dollars ($15 00) per ton.

"In either case no custom fees or dues to be charged to us on entering Manitoba.

"Provided the Government obtain permission from the American Government to transport the same through their territory without bonds or on our own personal bond.

"Payments to be made at the rate of ninety per cent on delivery, and that we be informed of the acceptance of this tender on or before the fifth day of March next.

"Sir,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of May.

"The conditions contained in your communication are all in accordance with the proposition which I had the honor to make on the 21st April and 8th inst., for the transport of rails and other materials to Manitoba. Preparations will at once be made for moving the rails with as little delay as possible, after their arrival at Duluth, so that as large a proportion as practicable can be delivered before the season of low water. You will please indicate to me in due time the point of delivery and the name of the agent for the Government who will receive the rails in Manitoba.

"Allow me to bring to the notice of the Honorable the Minister of Public Works, that no mention has been made of the time of payment. I presume the usual mode would not be objectionable—that is, payments to be made as fast as our boats deliver the rails at the point of destination. Will you kindly inform me if this is acceptable, and if so, if any particular form of certificate will be required to be obtained by me from the agent at Manitoba, as a satisfactory voucher to be paid on presentation.

"The Northern Pacific Railway Company will receive the rails on arrival at Duluth.

What with the difference in price, and the difference in the weight of the ton, as one was the usual 2,240 lbs. per ton, while the higher price, Kittson & Co., was for 2,000 lbs. per ton, the country lost in this transaction $3.30 per ton, amounting to nearly fifty thousand dollars. There is another expenditure for which, I think, we have not got much benefit; I refer to the Georgian Bay Branch Railway. A contract was given for that before a survey was made, and a line was located through a country presenting almost insurmountable difficulties. Subsequent surveys have proved that some twenty miles north of that line a practical route could have been found. On the line where the Government selected, it was from 1,000 to 1,425 feet above the level of the sea, and the hills run north and south, whereas the road ran east and west. On a route subsequently surveyed, we find the land is from 396 to 654 feet above the level of the sea; this is near the Ottawa and French Rivers, about twenty miles north of the Foster line. It is hardly necessary to refer to the circumstances in connection with that contract, because it is painful to refer to those things, as they lead to very unpleasant recollections, and point directly to the utter disregard of the public interest when that contract was given to Mr. Foster.

Now, I say that the First Minister is called upon to justify himself to the country, and say why he let this contract in the face of the law, and contrary to law, ignoring all its provisions, and treating Parliament as if they were his creatures instead of being what Parliament always ought to be, the masters of the Government of the day. Parliament always should hold the position of requiring the Government to fulfil the law, or vacate the position which such non-fulfilment shows that they are not worthy to fill; and I say that the hon. gentleman has to justify himself to the country, under these circumstances, for making this enormous contract with Mr. Foster, and making a contract to build a line of railway which they did not know the length of, within 20 miles, at the time; and upon which no survey had been made, and concerning which no estimate had been prepared. The hon. gentleman has violated the law if he has built this work under the Public Work's Act. What does this Act say? It declares that:

"It shall be the duty of the Chief Engineer to prepare maps, plans and estimates for all public works, which are about to be constructed or repaired by the Department."

And yet without a plan, without an estimate, without anything whatever, without even a recommendation from the Chief Engineer, this work is entered upon; and that without a survey, without the slightest means being taken to ascertain what ought to be done with reference to a work which was considered of such vital importance, that it must be rushed through without Parliament having permission to pass on the contract at all. It was thus undertaken, and a binding contract made by the Government. Well, that law also was violated; and where are we to-day? Why, to-day we are told that $41,000 of public money have been paid. Why paid? How paid? Upon a certificate of the Chief Engineer? The hon. gentleman has never received such a certificate. The Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway never signed a certificate for a dollar of this $41,000; and, it was not only paid without such a certificate, but also without proper vouchers. Read the document that was brought down in relation to this matter! Let the attention of this House be drawn for a moment to the paper—the extraordinary paper in connection with this most extraordinary contract, and what will it show? Why, it will show that we have $41,000 paid on the Georgian Bay contract. It will show, that we have the contract cancelled; and, this most extraordinary document will show the mode in which the public work is carried on. On November 27th, Mr. Foster says:—

"We will have the profile of the Canada Central Railway in readiness to submit to the Department in the course of three or four weeks, and the remainder to French River in about two months."

On the 20th December he asks for important modifications. On December 23rd, Mr. Fleming advises an extension of time for one year, and that the substitution of 26 miles of navigation would be reasonable. On the 8th February Mr. Foster says that his total outlay amounted to $63,000. On the 9th February, Mr. Fleming says:—

"That the proportion payable on an expenditure of $38,864 would be $9,716, less 15 per cent to be retained under the 9th section of the contract."

One would suppose that the Government would respect a declaration of that kind from the Chief Engineer, but it appears that this was not the case. It seems that the hon. Minister of Public Works, as I stated before, delights in showing Parliament that he recognizes no authority here or anywhere else, and that anything contained in the Statute-book, or any respect for Parliament, is not worth a moment's consideration. On the 23th of February, a Minute of Council was passed on the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works, advising that this contract be cancelled, and that the $83,000 which the law required should be deposited as a security for the fulfilment of the contract, should be returned. This deposit belonged to the people of Canada, and it ought not to have been returned without the sanction of Parliament to Mr. Foster. That Minute of Council said that:—

"The amount claimed by Mr. Foster to the 1st instant is $38 862.28, $20,000 of which may be safely paid."

On the 28th of April Mr. Fleming says:—

"I find by the accounts furnished by Mr. Foster, that there are only receipts for about $20,000. Accordingly, I would advise that he be called upon to furnish complete vouchers, and that the whole be placed in the Audit Department for examination."

I think that this was a very reasonable and very practical suggestion, and in this, the House will quite agree with me. But instead of that being done; instead of the suggestion of the Chief Engineer being carried out—although the First Minister is so ready to fall back on that gentleman to support himself whenever he can do so—it appears it was treated with contempt, and the answer is an Order-in-Council, dated the 6th May, recommending the payment of $36,838.15 and that the balance on the $50,996, the total sum claimed, be paid on the production of vouchers, and this was done, although Mr. Fleming had shown that only $9,716, less 15 per cent, could be paid under the contract.

“The proportion, therefore, payable on an expenditure of $38,864.28 would be $9,716.07 less 15 per cent. to be retained under the 9th section of the contract.”

The difficulty of readily finding these three statements is, that the return is put together in the most extraordinary manner: one half is backwards, and the other half, I was going to say, is upside-down. In the Order-of-Council, of the 28th April, Mr. Fleming says:—

“I find of the accounts furnished by Mr. Foster, there are only receipts for about $20,000. Accordingly, I would advise that he be called upon to furnish complete vouchers, and that the whole be placed in the Audit Department for examination.”

On the 6th of May, a few days afterwards, without any such audit, the Minister of Public Works recommends that $36,838.15 be paid, deducting the sum of $20,000 already paid. Subsequently, as is shown by the Public Accounts, he was paid $109,000, besides his deposits, $41,000, for useless surveys, and $68,000 for iron rails that are now rusting away. These iron rails were shown to be of the most worthless character. The Government paid him $48 per ton, and afterwards allowed him to take away, for his own use, 227 tons, without any security. He might have taken more for all the good they are to the country, or even will be, but for old iron. Steel rails can now be bought for about $33 per ton, delivered here. Then we have the Fort Francis Lock. I am not a member of the committee investigating that matter, and, consequently, I have a perfect right to express my opinions on the subject. The hon. Senator from Toronto (Mr. Brown) said the expenditure on that work was only $185,000—quite an insignificant sum. I was present when Mr. Mortimer was giving his evidence before the committee, and I heard him state that after the lock was completed, and after an expenditure of $350,000 more upon that route, it might be possible to carry ten tons of freight a day by that route. This was also confirmed by Mr. Dawson. Mr. Mackenzie informed us, when this work was undertaken, that the intention was only to construct two cheap wooden locks. The Public Accounts show that $185,000 have been expended already, and we have not got the lock yet. The hon. the Secretary of State, tells us it may be necessary for carrying lumber, but the Engineer informs us that the Government wanted timber 12 × 12, and they must get it somewhere else. Therefore, I think very little lumber will be got there. The fact is, the Premier, without thinking, rushed recklessly into this expenditure, and then when he discovered his mistake, he was so self-sufficient that he would not abandon a useless work. I have already stated that I heard the evidence of Mr. Mortimer in the Committee the other day.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—The hon gentleman is alluding to something that the House is not in possession of.

Hon. Mr. READ—If the hon. gentleman would attend the meetings of the Committee, he would hear the evidence himself.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I am not under an obligation to be there, and hear the evidence. I think it is quite irregular that these references should be made to a matter which is not before the House.

Hon. M. READ—As I stated, I am not discussing the report which the Committee is to submit to the House. I merely wish to give my opinions upon this matter, and tell the House what I heard, and what any other member could have heard, if he had taken the trouble to attend the meetings of the Committee.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I wish to call attention to the fact that evidence taken before a committee should not be disclosed by anybody. It is a breach of privilege to do so, or to allude to it in the House before the report is presented. I would like to have the decision of the Speaker on this point.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—Mr. Mortimer in his report published last year stated that not more than six tons could be carried over that route. This appears in a bound volume which is in the possession of the House.

Hon. Mr. READ—I will try not to refer to the evidence which is being taken before the committee this Session; but I think we can draw the deduction from the evidence the House is possessed of, that the Fort Francis Lock was an unfortunate undertaking; that the Government entered upon it without a survey, and without ever knowing what it was going to cost. Men were put to work long before an engineer was sent up there, and before a plan was prepared, or an estimate made of what the cost would be. We know when the work was commenced May 11th, a letter was sent to Mr. Sutherland, signed by Mr. Braun, stating:

“When you reach Fort William you will see Mr. Walter Oliver, and, if he has finished the work entrusted to him, he will accompany you to assist in taking charge of the men. Mr. James Macdonald and Mr. Oliver will act as foremen under you, either in the woods or at the works, as you may deem desirable.”

Would it be supposed that, under such circumstances as those, the work of excavation should have been ordered by the hon. the Minister of Public Works on the 11th May? On the 18th April, 1876, nearly a year afterwards, Mr. Braun wrote to Mr. Sutherland:—

“SIR,—I am directed to forward you herewith a copy of plan of lock at Fort Francis, prepared by Mr. Page, which has been approved of by the Minister. I am to authorize you to resume work on the said lock by day labour, and to request that you will submit to the Department an estimate of the probable monthly expenditure for the next twelve months.”

This letter was sent, although the work had been commenced nearly a year before under the direction of the Minister of Public Works. And yet the hon. gentleman would insinuate that I was not doing justice to these statements, because I did not read them in detail. We at last get something practical. It is the report signed by Mr. Baillaige, who had been instructed on the 30th August to proceed to Fort Francis. Mr. Baillaige said in effect that all the money had been thrown away, and that the work was practically useless unless a great deal more money was spent upon it, and showed that the work had proved an utter delusion. He said:—

“The object for which the Fort Francis Canal is being constructed cannot be obtained
Hon. Mr. McLelan.”

unless Rainy River is improved so as to ensure the requisite draft, and the ascent of vessels against the current in the rapid.”

He goes on to speak of the mode of improvement, and says:—

“No definite scheme or estimate can, however, be submitted, unless the necessary levels, soundings, and measurements are taken along the entire line of the proposed navigation.”

It is thus shown that about a year after this work was in progress, an Engineer of the Public Works Department was sent up to the locality and found the Government had not taken the first preliminary step required to be taken before the money was expended. But he gave on 1st September, 1876, a very remarkable statement. He said:

“SIR,—Having been instructed on the 3rd ult., by the Honorable the Minister of Public Works to examine the Fort Francis Canal, now under your charge, and to give such directions as I may deem advisable, I herewith enclose for your guidance a specification of the work to be done, according to the revised plan with which you have lately been furnished.

“This plan was prepared on somewhat limited information, and is based on the high and low water levels originally observed by the engineer who first laid out the work; the low water levels have since been found to be fourteen inches lower at the lower end than represented on the plan. I have, therefore, appended to the specification a list of levels, showing the elevation of the main portions of the work, so as to suit the highest and lowest water levels observed up to the present time.”

So we have, in regard to this work upon which the excavations were commenced on 11th May, 1875, a statement made by Mr. Baillaige on 1st September, 1876, that they were mistaken as to the first principles and initial steps necessary to the very inception of the work. Mr. Baillaige continues:

“As it is important to ascertain the extent and nature of the obstructions, and the cost of removing or overcoming the same, you are hereby requested to examine the sections of the channel referred to, and such other points as may appear doubtful, during the season of low water, and to furnish the Department with a report thereon, together with an estimate of the probable cost of improving the channel for the required draught from Rainy Lake to the Lake of the Woods.”

I hope I have satisfied the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and in reading the text of this remarkable document, I have given the House the best evidence that the work was undertaken without any knowledge of the subject, and after $100,000, were expended, an engineer was sent to investigate and report on the work, showing in the most conclusive manner, that the information which the hon. the Minister of Public Works was bound to have obtained before entering upon the undertaking, was not fully obtained until one year and a half after the work was commenced; and, in fact, a more reckless, illegal, unjustifiable expenditure of public money had never been made by any person in this country. In the report of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, on page 26, what do we find? We find that at this place where Fort Francis Lock is being constructed with seven feet of water on the sills, for forty miles there is a depth of only four feet and a half; yet the public money is used without plans, specifications, or authority of the Chief Engineer; or without any recommendation under which one dollar could be expended, and the hon. gentleman makes an expenditure of $100,000, which, unless followed up by an expenditure of half a million more, will not accomplish the object proposed. But, suppose the works would be completed, what then? Does any one suppose that with a railway from Duluth to Red River, a single ton of freight would be carried by that route? As regards the transportation of rails by this route there would be eight portages, involving sixteen times loading and unloading, putting the rails into waggons and taking them out again; and the most insane Minister of Public Works would not undertake to transport one ton of heavy freight of any description by any such line. Yet, the hon. gentleman adhered to the policy he had presented before he had undertaken to construct a direct line from Thunder Bay to Red River, and went on with this expenditure. But about the Kaministiquia land purchase. I have no doubt it was a capital speculation for the owners of the land. The hon. Senator from Hamilton thinks it is a delirious lightful speculation when a thousand dollars per acre was paid for land at the deep water terminus of the Pacific Railway on Lake Superior.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Five hundred dollars an acre.

Hon. Mr. READ—I am speaking of what the hon. Senator from Hamilton

Hon. Mr. Read.

(Mr. Hope) said. I recollect his words very well. He said it was cheap at a thousand dollars an acre.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—I said the late Government had paid $3,000 an acre for the terminus at the town of Miramichi.

Hon. Mr. READ—The hon. gentleman thought $1,000 an acre for land in a wilderness was marvelously cheap, since the late Government paid $3,000 for land in a large town. The country had to pay $67,150 for that land on the Kaministiquia River, Lake Superior.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The land purchased was one hundred and ten acres.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—That includes twenty acres for streets.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—It was so much the more valuable.

Hon. Mr. READ—Streets on paper. At all events, we got the terminus. The Government paid $67,150 for it, and I hope they are satisfied. I am sure their friends are, who got the money. I find, among the items of expenditure on the Pacific Railway is one of "Miscellaneous payments, $218,553;" nothing is said of what it is for. It will be found at page 383 of Mr. Fleming's report. Now, let us turn to the Intercolonial Railway. There we will find they are getting rid of the steel rails. They had to send them somewhere, and I must say they are better in use than rusting away. I find, however, that in order to dispose of these rails, good rails have been taken up on the Intercolonial railway, and there is now a fight for the possession of them. They may not be used for the purpose of bribing constituencies, but I can read what I heard in another place. I heard Mr. Ferris say, "I told Mr. Mackenzie if I did not get the rails I would vote against him." When charged with it, he did not deny it; and I am informed that the line for which these rails had been obtained is not even surveyed yet. This is the manner in which the Government secured uncertain voters. I find they have $190,000 worth of good rails taken up from the Intercolonial Railway track, and they are holding them out as bait to uncertain constituencies. The purchase of the steel rails was an important one, and there are unfortunate circumstances connected with them. I would not speak so strongly upon this question, if the evidence did not force me to the conclusion that, not only was the blunder committed in purchasing them, but more than one job has been perpetrated with them. This matter of the construction of the Pacific Railway has engaged the serious attention of the people of the country, and they begin to be alarmed at the transaction. I have had a gentleman, a member of this Chamber, a man of large wealth, say to me that he thought the best thing he could do was to sell his property and leave the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, Hear..

Hon. Mr. READ—That gentleman was appointed by this Government. We see $10,000,000 have been spent on this work, and we have only 47 miles of railway built—that is all we can show for this large expenditure. Only 47 miles of the 50,000 tons of the steel rails, enough to lay 550 miles, have been used, although we were told two years ago by the leader of the Government in this House, that in two years all the rails would be used. We find to-day 5,000 tons are piled up in British Columbia, and 11,000 tons have been taken to the Maritime Provinces.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They will all be used this year, except the 5,000 tons in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—They will have to tranship some of them. There are 14,000 tons at Fort William, and they will not be used in that section.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are required in Manitoba now to finish the Pembina Branch.

Hon. Mr. READ—Here is what the Hon. Mr. Letellier said two years ago in this House: He said "he was in a position to state that the greater portion of the "rails would be used during the present "year, and the remainder next year."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no doubt Mr. Letellier thought so, but he could not control events.

Hon. Mr. READ—We find, to-day, there are only forty-seven miles laid, and we have still an enormous stock of rails on hand. I must say it is unfortunate that the Government purchased them. They did not require them, but Cooper, Fairman & Co. wanted to make some money, and the Premier's brother must have his share. That is the fact of it. Denials are all very well, but when the proofs are there to the contrary, denial is useless. To make comparisons with the late Government where some of their subordinates did buy some rails at a high price, does not improve the matter. I don't charge anything against this Government except what they do themselves. I do not charge them with wrong-doing where they have untrustworthy employees. But I charge them with their own actions. The late Government built the Intercolonial Railway, and not a solitary charge could be made either against the Government of the day or the Commissioners. Already we have spent half what it cost to construct the Intercolonial Railway, and charge after charge is made against the Government and distinctly proved, of reckless extravagance and jobbery. The country may well feel anxious when they take into consideration the enormous expenditure that has already been made and the small results which have followed it.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—In rising to second the motion of my hon. friend, I will confine myself to that portion of it which affects the Province from which I come. Anyone who has listened to the debates in this House for the past few days must admit that great blunders have been committed by the Government in connection with the Pacific Railway. When they came into power four years ago, they had the confidence of the majority of the people, and a large majority in Parliament. Even those who differed from them in opinion thought their policy would be one calculated to promote the prosperity of the country. But what do they find? Individually and collectively, the people are suffering; large deficits occur in the revenue; the greatest anxiety is felt throughout the country as to our future, and there is almost a universal desire for a change in the administration of public affairs. A few days ago the hon. Senator from Toronto (Mr. Brown) expressed an opinion that this House was not a place for such discussions as these. For my part, I believe it is our duty to discuss them, and we would be open to censure if we neglected that duty. It is from this House the people expect an impartial opinion upon public affairs, and

I believe they will accept it as such. The Pacific Railway scheme as originally conceived was, perhaps, one of the grandest enterprises of the kind, which had ever been undertaken. The intention was, to furnish means of railway communication from Ocean to Ocean, and we cannot help feeling that the failure to accomplish the great result, which was aimed at in the first place, is due to the fact that the present Government never had any desire or intention of constructing our great national highway.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—Instead of carrying out the policy announced by the late Government in 1873 in reference to this great work, they have adopted a narrow policy of muskeg and water stretches, expecting, I suppose, that they could in this way find mud to throw at their opponents. But what has happened? They are sinking, and with them they are dragging down the country, through their policy, and what would have been the pride and glory of the Dominion will, without doubt, be the shame and humiliation of the Government. I will confine my remarks to what should have been done for the Province of Manitoba and the North-West, and what has been neglected by the Government. In the debates in the House of Commons, in the Session of 1875, I find that the Premier stated:—

I think the House will admit that the policy which has been adopted has been the very reverse of this. What have they done to furnish access through our own country for emigrants to the North West? They are constructing the Fort Francis Lock, a work which will be of no use to this country; and they are building the Pembina Branch. The one will serve the people of Minnesota, and the other the people of Dakota. Manitoba will receive some advantages from it, but the Dominion, which has to furnish the money for both these works, will be injured, because the Pembina Branch will carry the trade of the North-West directly from Winnipeg to St. Paul. I do not blame the Government altogether for this, but it seems to me an understanding might have been arrived at, by which the trade of Winnipeg could be carried to Duluth, and thence via the Great Lakes to the Dominion. In this way the cities of Toronto, Hamilton, Montreal, and Quebec would have derived the advantages from the expenditure of this money, instead of a foreign country. We had the Dawson Route at one time. I have expressed my views with respect to that great work in this House before. The Dawson Route was a necessity at one time, for the opening up of our North-West territories. We had to deal with the Indians at that time, to make treaties with them, to win their confidence, and in that way to prevent trouble. It was under such circumstances that it was a patriotic undertaking, and I do not look upon the expenditure on that road at that time as money lost. If the North-West is of any value to the Dominion at this time, we must acknowledge that we owe it to the existence of the Dawson Route. I regret exceedingly that the Government have discontinued maintaining that Route. Instead of adopting a policy of utilizing the water stretches, it would have been better if they had kept the boats on the lakes, and maintained the road in a good state of repair. Unless something is done to it this year, it will become impassable, and the bridges will be decayed by this summer; after that the expenditure to put it in repair would be too large to justify the Government in undertaking it. The present location of the railway, from one water-stretch to another, I do not look upon as a final location of the road, and I believe the time will come when the money expended in that country up to the present time will be a dead loss to the people. At some time in the future it will be understood that we must deviate from the line actually located and adopt a route presenting fewer difficulties. It has been said that we can build the road in ten years, but I know the difficulties to be surmounted are very considerable, and require a very large expenditure of money. With respect to the Georgian Bay Branch

Hon. Mr. Girard.

(if it can be considered a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway at all) I think the expenditure of $100,000 upon it, without securing any advantage to the people, is very much to be regretted. We had easy access from the Eastern Provinces to Lake Huron without it, and the expenditure was wholly unnecessary. I think the Government will admit in that instance they committed a grievous blunder. We know the circumstances under which the contract was given—it was to reward a political supporter—but in this great national work, I contend, no political considerations should enter. I also contend that the location of the line west of Red River is a mistake. Those who have visited that locality know that seven-eighths of that country cannot be settled. The money expended upon it up to the present time has been thrown away, and not only has the country lost this money, but the settlements in the North-West have been prejudiced thereby. I will take advantage of the present discussion to show the position in which our great City of the West—our pretentious City of Winnipeg, if you like—stands. It is not a large place, but its progress has been such of late years, that we sometimes begin to think it will be a new Chicago. It seems to me the people of the whole Dominion are interested in our welfare, and especially the Government, because a great part of the revenue coming to the Dominion from the North-West is collected at Winnipeg. We say sometimes there, that it will at some day be the capital of the Dominion, but that is a matter which time will decide. At all events, I am sure that everyone in the Dominion will rejoice in the prosperity of our young city, and will be ready to sanction any course which the Government may take to promote its prosperity. In 1874, as far as can be learned from statements of members of the Government, it was their intention to run the railway in the vicinity of Winnipeg. Why they have altered that policy, I cannot tell; but, certainly, the course they are at present pursuing is calculated to ruin not only that city, but the whole Province of Manitoba. The people do not accuse the Government of having adopted this policy with the intention of injuring them, but they have suffered greatly through it, and they have received very little justice at the hands of the Government. Is it any wonder, therefore, that they are dissatisfied? It is painful for me to have to condemn the Government, because I am not here as a partizan. I would have liked to have been able to help this Government with their measures, but an injustice has been done us, and the Government seem determined not to redress it. I have from time to time called their attention to the position in which we stand. Petitions signed by a large number of the people of Manitoba have been presented in this Parliament, and a voice has come from the Executive of that Province, asking the Government to render us justice, but up to now, they have refused to do so. As it is six o'clock, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read the second time :—

An Act to provide that persons charged with common assault shall be competent as witnesses.

An Act to amend the Post Office Act of 1875.

An Act respecting the Maritime Court of Ontario.

An Act to amend the Act respecting conflicting claims to lands of occupants in Manitoba.

An Act further to amend the Act intitled an Act respecting Public Works of Canada.

THE LYON DIVORCE BILL.

THE THIRD READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH moved the adoption of the report of the committee to whom was referred the Bill intitled An Act for the relief of Victoria Elizabeth Lyon.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL called attention to the fact that the report stated that the committee had found the preamble of the Bill proven. As a member of the committee, he was aware that two slight amendments had been made to the preamble, which ought of course, to be noticed in the report.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT thought it exceedingly unfortunate that a report containing such repulsive testimony should be circulated broadcast through the country. When his attention had been called to the nature of the evidence in the case he had endeavoured to prevent its circulation, but it was too late. He thought some means should be adopted to prevent its going abroad.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH said he had been authorised by the committee to ask that the circulation of the report might be prevented, and it was the intention of the Committee that it should not be printed except for the use of members.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL quite agreed with the hon. Secretary of State, that it would be desirable to suppress evidence of this character. He had not read it himself, but he had been informed that it was most repulsive. But as long as the Senate had to deal with such cases, the evidence must be reported to the House. The only way he could see to prevent its circulation was to furnish no copies of it except to those members of the House who asked for it. The evidence had to go to the House of Commons, and the only way he could see to prevent its circulation, was by a consultation of members of the Government and the Speakers of both Houses.

Mr. SPEAKER said, as soon as he had discovered the character of the evidence in this case, he had asked one of the clerks to order its suppression. It was found, however, on sending a note to the Keeper of the Records, that it had been distributed, not only to the Senate but the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLER could not see how this could be avoided as long as the Senate had to try those cases. The evidence must be placed in the hands of the members of both Houses, because it was on that evidence they were called upon to give their decision. The House could do nothing better than leave the evidence in the hands of the members of the Senate and House of Commons, and let them be responsible for the circulation it might obtain.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL — Could it not be kept until members wanted it?

Hon. Mr. MILLER — I do not see how that could be done. Some arrangement might be made, by which it would only be given personally to members.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE asked if the House could not prevent the publication of it in the newspapers?

Hon. Mr. MILLER said it had not appeared in any newspaper.

Hon. Mr. PENNY said the House need not be afraid that newspapers would publish such evidence. He was of the impression, however, that no evidence taken before a committee of either House should be published in the newspapers before it was reported to the House.

The item was allowed to stand until Monday.

The House adjourned at 6:15 p.m.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

THE PEACE RIVER ROUTE.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Victoria) moved:—

“That a humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, the latest Report of the Acting Engineer-in-Chief of the Pacific Railway, together with the report relating to the Peace River Country and Pine River Pass.”

He said:—When the return for which I am about to move is brought down, hon. gentlemen will be better able to understand the question of route involved in my motion. So I will briefly direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to the subject which I may hereafter bring before them. Practically, the line from Winnipeg to Yellow Head is located, but that is no good reason why it should be finally adopted, if a better line has been discovered, a line with less bridging, less cutting, and of a less expensive character generally. I find by the Report of the Chief Engineer of the Pacific Railway for 1877, that the line from Northcote to Yellow Head is of an expensive character. Battleford is a better fixed point, and a more familiar name to honorable gentlemen than Northcote. Well then, this point, Northcote, is 338 miles east of Battleford on the located line, and here is a short description of the work from there to Yellow Head: There are about sixty bridges of an average width of from 30 to 1,000 feet, besides several deep coulees or ravines requiring embankments, culverts and bridges, averaging from 400 to 3,000 feet; also four tunnels and some heavy cutting. I am credibly informed that a line from Northcote to Pine Pass would avoid about half the difficulties above enumerated, be of a far less expensive character, besides the great advantage of passing through a rich agricultural and pastoral country, well adapted for cultivation and settlement, and crossing the Rocky Mountains at an altitude of 1,300 feet lower than Yellow Head, which in itself is a great advantage. I will refer hon. gentlemen to the reports of Mr. Selwyn and Prof. Macoun for a description of the Peace River country, and, with the permission of the House, I will read a few extracts. Mr. Selwyn, the most eminent geologist in the country, at the instance of the Dominion Government, paid two visits, I believe, to British Columbia, and during his explorations visited that portion of the Peace River country lying south-west and north-west of the Rocky Mountains, between latitude 53 and 60, and I cannot do better than let Mr. Selwyn speak for himself. In his report 1875-6, at folio 68, he sums up as follows:—

“As our exploration party was undertaken partly with a view to ascertain the character of the country in reference to the best route for the Canadian Pacific Railroad, it will, perhaps, not be out of place that I should distinctly state the conclusions that I have arrived at on this question. I am not, nor do I profess to be, conversant with railroad engineering, but from what I have myself seen, and from what I have been able to ascertain from others, respecting the route by the Leather Pass (same as Yellow Head) when compared with that (my knowledge of which is also partly from personal examination and partly from the testimony of others) by the Athabaska and Smoky Rivers, and thence by the Pine Pass by Giscome Portage to Fort George, I have no hesitation in saying that the latter route is probably in every respect the best, in the interests of the railroad and of the country at large. But whether this is so or not, there can be no doubt that this route deserves to be more carefully examined than it has hitherto been. Taking Edmonton on the Saskatchewan and Fort George on the Fraser at the initial points, it will, I believe, be found that by Pine Pass the line could not only be carried almost the whole distance through a magnificent agricultural and pastoral country, but that it would be actually shorter than the Leather Pass route, and that it would not probably present any greater engineering difficulties.”

I will now let Prof. Macoun, botanist, who visited the North-West and British Columbia, speak for himself. In the Pacific Railway report, 1877, folio 328, I find the following extracts from his reports:—

“The altitude of the district known as Pine River country, is much lower than the Saskatchewan country, not being as elevated in latitude 56 degrees, close to the Rocky Mountains, as at Edmonton, in latitude 53 degrees 32 minutes, which is 2,088 feet above the sea. Dunvegan, on the Peace River, is only about 1,000 feet above the sea. The whole country between the mountains and Athabaska and Great Slave Lakes is a gently sloping plain, being under 2,500 feet, in latitude 55 degrees. The whole country seen or heard of throughout the region in question is covered with a deep, rich soil, of wonderful fertility, free from boulders and having very few swamps or marshes. The rainfall seems to be less than that of Ontario, but this is compensated for by copious dews, which keep the grass and herbs growing all summer. The clear skies and long summer days, combined with the lowering of the temperature at night, seems to give astonishing vigor to vegetable growth, and to cause grain and seeds of all kinds to be far more prolific here than further south. At Little Slave Lake, in 1872, I found barley in stalk which had been cut on the 12th of August, while that at Edmonton, on the Saskatchewan, was not cut until the 26th. All the rivers and lakes of the district teem with fish of large size and excellent flavor. Whitefish swarm in myriads in Lake Athabaska, Little Slave Lake, and all the lakes and rivers discharging into the English or Churchill River. I was at Isle La Crosse on 22nd September, 1875, and saw potatoes still as green as in July. Here was a flour mill driven by horse power, and all kinds of grain are reported as ripening successfully. On the borders of some of these lakes I saw numerous potato fields cultivated by Chipewyan Indians, who lived altogether on fish and potatoes. I was at the forks of Athabaska on the 8th Sept., 1875, and found tomatoes, cucumbers, wheat, and barley under cultivation, together with all the vegetables found in kitchen gardens in Ontario.”

Mr. Horetzky also speaks of the Peace River country as being well suited for railway purposes, and the soil exceedingly rich and fertile. I could quote at much greater length, but I think we have enough before us to show that this portion of our country deserves the greatest consideration; and before a definite route for the Pacific Railway is selected west of Battleford, the Government, in its own interest and that of the whole country, should order an early survey on the Peace River country and Pine River Pass.

I think I have read enough to convince hon. gentlemen that the Peace River Country is exceedingly fertile and the lakes and rivers abound with fish. Surely there is enough in those statements to justify the Government in exploring the Peace River route before committing the country to the line which has been located, and commencing work which might afterwards have to be abandoned. The report of Admiral DeHorsey on the Pacific terminus of the Railway is before the House, and hon. gentlemen can form their own opinions and draw their own conclusions from it. I have my own idea upon the subject, but lest it should be supposed I am not impartial I will not force it on hon. gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—I have seconded the motion which is now before the House, but I cannot say that I quite concur in the object which the hon. gentleman who has made it, seems desirous of accomplishing. I can agree with him, and I fancy most hon. gentlemen in this House will concur in the opinion, that there is in the Peace River Valley a very large and valuable tract of what will ultimately be agricultural and farming land, but although we may acknowledge that to be the case, I can hardly agree with him in supposing it would be well to delay the construction of the Pacific Railway while surveys are being made there. The hon. gentleman expressed the proper idea when he spoke of running a branch northward. That is exactly what will ultimately take place. There will be a branch from the main line to reach this Peace River country, but the transcontinental railway must take a short and direct route across the country, but in such a line that communication with fertile sections of that country can easily be established. I am surprised that the suggestion should be made to the Government by any representative of British Columbia, to delay, for any reason, the construction of the Pacific Railway, and especially by a representative of Victoria, the largest town in the Province, and the place where the loudest complaints have been made in consequence of the delays which have thus far taken place. I can safely say that any further delay is far from the wish of any patriotic British Columbian.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—I concur in the views expressed by the mover and the seconder of this resolution, but, at the same time, I must say the most of the remarks which fell from my hon. friend from Victoria, conveyed information which is already officially before the House. I venture to think it is possible that in asking for further delays to obtain information in addition to what we already possess, my hon. friend will afford the Government an opportunity still further to defer the commencement of the construction of the Pacific Railway in British Columbia. I do not intend to offer any extended remarks in connection with the different routes for the railroad. Every freedom has been left for the selection of the terminus on the Pacific. After an outlay of several millions of dollars, and after seven years of work, I do not think it is too much to expect that the Government ought to be in a position to declare where the terminus on the Pacific Coast shall be, and that they shall commence work upon the railway in that Province without further delay. With respect to the Peace River route, I venture to think we would be soaring a little too far north if we were to adopt it. In considering the location of the terminus of the railway, it is proper to take into account the harbors that are most available, and the country that can be most easily settled and traversed. The fertile belt follows in the direction of Pine River Pass, and the slope to the Arctic Ocean. I would call the attention of the House to the reports of Sir John Franklin, who wintered at Edmonton, of Captain Vancouver, and the works of others who have visited that country, from which it will be seen that the land in that vicinity is very fertile. One field it was alleged, had grown twenty-five consecutive crops of wheat year after year, without exhausting the soil. I believe at the foot of the Rocky Mountains to the North of Edmonton there is a vast territory that must be tapped sooner or later, and the sooner the better, but that can easily be left to individual or provincial enterprise. I only learned last night from a gentleman in high standing who had lived in Winnipeg for many years, and now holds a very high position under the Government, and who has travelled through every country on the globe, that there lies between Edmonton and the Peace River country a belt of timbered land extending for six hundred miles, and in constructing a road by the Peace River route, it would be necessary either to pass through this or to keep well to the north before reaching the great plateau. The Peace River presents three obstacles. One is the belt of forest to which I have alluded; another, that the exploration of the route would afford the Government an excuse for further delays; and, the other, after you pass the Rocky Mountains, the character of the country does not justify us, at this period in the history of the country, in constructing a railroad through it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—I think it cannot be said that I have any desire to give the Government an excuse for delaying the construction of this Railroad. Year after year I have pressed upon them the necessity of undertaking it without further delay. There is plenty of work to be done in British Columbia and in the vicinity of Red River without touching the central part for some time. At one end of the line there are five hundred miles surveyed, ready to be commenced, and there need be no delay in prosecuting the work of construction at the other. Therefore, the exploration of the Peace River route need cause no delay. I am fully prepared to take the responsibility of advocating that course.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is a new element in the discussion of the location of the Pacific Railway Line. The hon. Senator from British Columbia urges that a still further delay may take place in order that another, and, in his judgment, a very eligible route, may be explored. It is now eight years since the Pacific Railway enterprise was originated, and I believe if another eight years were to elapse before the construction was to commence, there would still be advocates of routes, which, if they had not been fully considered, would present to the minds of many persons attractions well worthy of consideration. It is only another proof of the gigantic nature of this scheme. In British Columbia, after seven years have elapsed, and after a vast amount of money has been expended in endeavoring to find a suitable route, we are asked to still further postpone the work of construction and survey another route.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—This is not in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would lead, as I understood from the hon. gentleman's observations, to a different outlet from British Columbia. I am not going to discuss the multiplicity of routes surveyed. As hon. gentlemen are aware their name is legion. The hon. gentleman has altered his motion since it was put on the paper, and, therefore, I am not prepared to answer it as fully as he might desire, but I may say the assistant engineer has not visited the Peace River country. I will bring my hon. friend's new proposition before the Minister of Public Works, and will be able to advise him to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—I would just refer to one remark of the hon. the Secretary of State. He says, it appears now that British Columbia is in favor of further delay. I can assure the hon. gentleman that is not the case.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The survey of a new route would, of course, involve delay.

The motion was allowed to stand.

INDIAN TROUBLES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

ENQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD enquired:—

"Whether measures have been adopted with a view to giving satisfaction to the Indians in the North-West Territories, and thus averting troubles in that distant portion of the Dominion?"

He said:—My intention in making this enquiry is not to gratify any personal curiosity. From all parts of these eastern provinces large numbers of people are preparing to move to Manitoba with a view to settling there, and, of course, the reports of troubles with the Indians must necessarily cause a great deal of anxiety. For my part, I do not think such troubles are much to be feared. At the same time, the Government cannot too carefully watch the course of events in the North-West, as grievous consequences might result from want of proper precautions. There is always a great deal of exaggeration in such reports, but it is an undoubted fact that there are bands of Indians near the frontier who are prepared to make a movement in some direction when the spring is a little further advanced. I will take the liberty of submitting to the House a letter from a missionary who has spent his life amongst the Indians, and who thoroughly understands their habits, and the Government can decide upon what course they think should be adopted when they hear it. One cause of these troubles is the fact that the original settlers in the North-West have not had their claims recognized in the organization of the North-West Government, and they have felt very jealous about it. Meetings were held, and great dissatisfaction was expressed that not one of them was chosen as a member of the North-West Council, or as stipendiary magistrate. I believe the Government lately did something towards rendering justice to those people, but it would have been better if they had made this movement sooner. Instead of being recognized as liberality on their part it will be thought that the concession was made under the pressure of fear. For over eighteen months I have been seeking for justice to the people of the North-West, but without success. Now that we are in trouble, appointments are made, and I regret that they have been left to such a late hour. Once dissatisfaction is excited it is not so easy to calm it down. I will read the letter to which I have referred :—

“ You have heard, no doubt, the rumors which are circulated in the North-West. I think they are pretty well founded. Whatever Government should do, in view of these difficulties, is to try and calm the Indians, to show that their present and future happiness depends upon their maintaining friendly relations with the whites. That can only be done through those who enjoy their confidence, and understand their habits. A false step in that direction may create very considerable difficulties, and involve the Government in a costly war, which would result in heavy expense, much loss of life, and the eventual extermination of the Indians. It is certain that the Blackfeet, Assiniboines, Crees, Nezperces, and Sitting Bull's bands may sweep the mounted police and all the white people from the country in less than fifteen days, and they can by that procure ammunition enough to last them five years.”

In view of these circumstances it is my duty to warn the Government not to neglect taking the necessary precautions for the protection of life and property in the North-West. For my own part, I do not think the dangers are so serious as have been represented. The Indians of the Dominion are satisfied with the good terms that have been made with them in recent treaties. There may be some local dissatisfaction, because, naturally, some of them have suffered in their pride and pretensions; but on the whole, I think, the treaties have given satisfaction. I will now read an answer, which appears in a Winnipeg paper, in reply to a telegram asking if there was any danger of trouble on the part of the Indians. It is as follows :—
Hon. Mr. Girard.

“ A WORD TO INTENDING IMMIGRANTS.”

“ We have received and replied to a telegram from the leader of a party of intending immigrants to Manitoba, asking as to the truth of the Indian troubles in the North-West. To all such we would say that as yet we know of no trouble whatever, and that even if there were, that in the remote quarter—a thousand miles from our Province—we would hardly be more affected by it than by the late Turco-Russian war.

“ No family need for an instant be deterred from coming to Manitoba on account of Indians or fear of them. We are not wanting troops or arms to fight battles, but stout husbandmen, with willing hands, to take up and occupy our broad reaches of prairie, where peace and plenty sit smiling alike.”

I think that is, perhaps, going a little too far. I rely upon the courage of the people of Winnipeg in case of trouble arising. I think the intention of the Crees and Sitting Bull's bands, is to make a movement across the borders, and that may possibly give rise to complications which it would be well to avoid. As we are near the line, no doubt Manitoba will have its own share of trouble and responsibility through the actions of these Indians. In that event, it is certainly to be regretted we have not a better force there than there is at present; but, as I said before, I can only rely on the loyalty and courage of our people in any contingency that may arise.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—With reference to the unprotected position of Manitoba, I think I can give the hon. gentleman the assurance that it is perfectly safe. Any Indian war that could possibly arise would be from 800 to 1,000 miles away from that country. The subject to which the hon. gentleman has drawn the attention of the Government more particularly, is the Indian troubles in the North-West. The Government are removing, as far as possible, all grounds for irritation on the part of the Indians. The writer of the letter which my hon. friend has just read is, I believe, Father McCoomb.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD — Yes. It is dated the 26th March.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was at his instance, and the instance of two other gentlemen, that the Government two years ago took into consideration the propriety of preventing the slaughter of buffalo. It was urged, unless that was done, the time was not far distant when it would devolve on the Government to maintain the whole Indian population of the North-West. The buffalo is their principal, if not their only source of subsistence. In consequence of those representations, measures were taken by which the buffalo was protected. The Indians were permitted to kill at all times, when it was necessary for their support, but the Half-Breeds were restrained absolutely from killing the buffalo, except at certain seasons; and the same rule applied to traders and other outsiders. The law has been put in force this year, and no doubt has caused great irritation among the Half-Breeds, who are nomadic tribes like the Indians themselves. It was stated no discrimination should be made between the Half-Breeds and Indians, especially in that portion of the North-west occupied by the Crees, Piegans and Blackfeet; inasmuch as the Half-Breed is not, individually, likely to settle down and cultivate the soil, even if considerable inducements are held out to him. The Government considered it was not wise to put the Act in force to the fullest extent. There are other reasons urged why in that particular section between the north branches of the Missouri and Wooded Mountain, the Act should not be put in force to its fullest extent. Through that section of country the international boundary line runs, and great herds of buffalo range from one side to the other, and it was manifestly absurd to prevent this slaughter of buffalo on our side of the line when there was no restriction of the kind on the other side. Therefore, instructions have been given to the Mounted Police and the Government of the North-West, not to enforce the law as absolutely as was at first contemplated. In regard to the apprehensions of danger of an alliance between the Blackfeet, Piegans and Sioux, I am informed there is not the slightest danger of anything of the kind. That is really the danger that my hon. friend pointed to. The Sioux and Blackfeet are constantly coming in contact with the Mounted Police; and if there are any people in the North-West in a position to judge of the temper of the Indians, they are the officers and men of that force, who are always moving amongst them. They report that there is not the slightest cause for any alarm. It is known that there is a very bitter feeling prevailing between the Blackfeet and the Sioux, and there is not the slightest reason to believe that any treaty will be formed between them—and they are the most powerful bodies of Indians in the North-West—certainly not any treaty which would be hostile to the Canadian authorities. My hon. friend has justly observed, the cost of all this is very considerable. At the present time the expenditure for maintaining order among the Indians of the North-West exceeds three-quarter of a million of dollars, which necessarily will be a charge on the public revenue for some time to come. It cannot probably be kept under that. My hon. friend has adverted to the representation of the Half-Breed element in the North-West Council. That has been thought only reasonable and just, inasmuch as they form an important part of the population of that country, and a representative has been selected from amongst them to represent them in the North-West Council. The Indian scare has really no foundation in truth. There are many causes for it which have their origin outside the Dominion altogether. One of the principal sources of the excitement is from sections immediately south of the boundary. Representations are made to the American Government that unless forts are established at particular points the white population will be overcome. The establishment of a fort means the presence of American troops and the expenditure of considerable sums of money, and wherever there is a white population in those States and Territories they desire naturally to have troops in their neighborhood, because it is a matter of notoriety that there never has been a cordial feeling between the settlers of Montana, Dakota and other Western States, and Territories and the Indians. It has been practically a running warfare from day to day between those parties- and they are constantly creating alarm that their friends at Washington may take up the matter with the view of having United States troops in their immediate vicinity. That, I believe, is one of the prolific sources of the constant reports we see in the newspapers of Indian scares either north or south of the boundary line in that section of country lying between the Missouri and the wooded country, which is a country inhabited by roving tribes of Indians.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

AMENDING THE RULES.

RECEPTION OF PRIVATE BILLS.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved that the 49th rule of this House be amended as follows:—Line six after "Bill" insert "originating in the Senate." He said there was no necessity for explaining this motion, as hon. gentlemen understood what it was. It was evident that the rule was intended to apply to Bills that originated in this House, and not to Bills coming up from the Commons, as many of the Bills from the Lower House were coming up to the Senate the very last day of the Session.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said he did not desire to oppose the motion of his hon. friend, but as they were amending that rule it would be well to consider whether further amendments would not also be necessary. As it stood at present, it was practically no rule, as it was never adhered to, and frequently, during the session, the time had to be extended. The rule was: "No petition for any private Bill is received by the Senate after the first ten days of each Session; nor may any private Bill be presented to the Senate after the first two weeks of each Session; nor may any report of any Standing or Select Committee upon a private Bill be received after the first six weeks of each Session." Sometimes the House was in session fully ten days before the committee had a single meeting, and it was an unusual thing for any private Bill to be presented to the Senate until after the House had been two weeks in session. He would suggest that the rule be amended to read as follows: "No petition for any private Bill is received by the Senate after the first twenty days of each Session, nor may any private Bill be presented to the Senate after the first four weeks of each Session; nor may any report of any standing or Select Committee upon a private Bill originating in the Senate be received after the first six weeks of each Session." Perhaps his hon. friend would amend his motion, and take the sense of the House upon it as amended on a future day.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said an hon. gentleman had drawn his attention to the matter, but he had forgotten it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said it was evident that the rule was intended only to apply to Bills originating in this House alone.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS said he understood when the rules were revised last Session that they were to conform to those of the House of Commons. It would appear extraordinary if they should have one set of rules for this House that a Bill could only be presented here at one time, and have another set of rules for the House of Commons that a Bill should only be presented there at another time. He suggested that they should consult with the House of Commons before any change in the rules should be made.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said he was aware that in framing the rules of the House their desire was to make them conform with those of the House of Commons, but he did not see why it should be so. He did not see why, if they had a rule which in practice was not adhered to, that it should be allowed to stand, because it conformed to that of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS asked if this rule as proposed to be amended was likely to be adhered to hereafter.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said it was more likely to be adhered to when the time was extended to a month than it was when the time allowed was only two weeks from the opening of the Session.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE said

the public were under the impression now that they must present their petitions within two weeks after the meeting of the House, and he feared if the time was extended it would have the effect of protracting the business of Parliament, as many would delay presenting their petitions to the last moment, and the time would have to be extended in order to receive them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he did not think there was anything to be gained by allowing a rule to stand on the books that they never intended to be carried out.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD said when the Committee were framing the rules they took into consideration the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, as far as the publication of the terms of receiving private bills in both branches of the Legislature was concerned, and the rules were made similar in both Houses. He perfectly agreed with the hon. mover that it was desirable to change that rule in the way in which he had suggested, but he had thought perhaps it was not desirable to do so until some consultation was had with the other branch of the Legislature, in order to have the rule applicable to private bills the same in both Houses, in consequence of the advertising that was necessary before private bills could be presented.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said there was a very good reason for the uniformity of orders in reference to the question of the publication of notice, because those were outside proceedings which must precede any action in either House. Therefore, it was reasonable that the rule upon that point should be uniform. But this was a question entirely outside of that; it was a question relating to the administration of the affairs of this House. The rule was framed with a view to the most convenient mode of receiving petitions, and receiving private bills, and acting upon reports of committees on such private bills originating in this House. The present rule was never acted upon, and they were constantly asking that it be dispensed with for a given period. He did not see that it would have the effect that had been pointed out by his hon. friend from Wallace, because it would be an inducement for parties who were applying for private bills to send them in early, as they would know when the time was extended that extension would be final.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT enquired of the Chairman of the Private Bills Committee (Mr. Miller) what proportion of private bills had come in and were initiated in this House consequent upon the extension; and whether the majority of those bills were not really measures from the other Chamber.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said the extension of time was necessary in connection with nearly all the bills that had been introduced in this House. He did not see that the change of the rule with regard to the time for receiving petitions, or the time for presenting reports of committees, would at all interfere with the uniformity of notice required by both Houses with regard to the publication of private bills.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD said in order to show what the object of the committee was in framing that rule, he would read a resolution passed by the committee on the 3rd April, 1875, when the rules of the Senate were being revised. The Commons also made some amendments in their rules after consultation between members of both Houses, so as to assimilate the rules respecting private bills.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY asked what was the rule of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD said they were identical. The rule of the House of Commons was as follows:—

“No petition for any Private Bill is received by the House after the first ten days of each Session; nor may any Private Bill be presented to the House after the first two weeks of each Session; nor may any report of any Standing or Select Committee upon a Private Bill be received after the first six weeks of each Session.”

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said he believed the amendment ought to be confined to legislation originating in this House, so as not to shut the door against bills that would come up from the Commons late in the Session.

THE FIRE AT ST. JOHN, N. B.

ENQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DEVER enquired whether, in view of the following statement made by the Hon. the Finance Minister:—

“That there was no obligation on the part of the Government to return the duties on goods that were consumed by the St. John fire, which were covered by insurance, as the duties on such goods would have to be returned to the insurance companies instead of to the insured, it is the intention of the Government to return the duties on such goods as had not been covered by insurance, and which goods had been in the Custom House Warehouse at that place.”

He said:—Hon. gentleman may, perhaps, permit me to say that by the great fire at St. John, three-fourths of the merchandize in the stores, and of the goods and chattels of citizens were destroyed, and there was not a warehouse of any importance standing after the great fire; all the bonded warehouses and large wholesale and retail stores had also been destroyed. It was calculated that the Government of Canada would be largely benefited by the great addition to the revenue of this country which would be caused by the importation that would necessarily take place to fill up this great loss, and on which duty would have to be paid in order to supply what had been destroyed by the fire. Not only the ordinary merchandise of trade, but all the articles that necessarily entered into the construction and furnishing of buildings and dwellings, such as locks, hinges, cutlery, carpets, house furnishing goods, linen, pianos, &c., all expensive articles subject to a duty of seventeen and a half per cent., would have to be supplied a second time. Large quantities of liquors had also been consumed in the warehouses. I see it has been estimated that the probable amount of revenue from this source will not exceed $250,000 or $300,000. This is a wrong estimate. When we take into account the quantity of property consumed was from $27,000,000 to $30,000,000, it is reasonable to suppose that some $4,000,000 worth of dutiable goods have been consumed on which duties will have to be paid the second time—on large quantities of which the duties will be from 200 to 250 per cent.—so that a very much larger amount than is generally supposed will accrue to the revenue of the country from this source. I feel disposed to thank the Government, on behalf of the people of St. John, for their kindness in admitting, duty free, materials for building purposes. This certainly was a great boon to the people of St. John, especially the admission of brick, and, I am sorry to say, our friends from Nova Scotia express some regret at this, but when they hear that neither Nova Scotia nor New Brunswick had sufficient resources to produce on such short notice the quantity of brick that was required to rebuild the city, they will agree with me that it was quite right for the Government to open the port for the introduction of foreign brick duty free. Before the fire, bricks of ordinary quality were worth $14 per thousand in New Brunswick. At this rate, if we were compelled to reconstruct our city with brick, we would have had to spend a vastly greater amount of money than we could afford, and since brick has been imported from the United States free of duty, the prices ranged from seven and one-half to eight and one-half dollars a thousand, which makes a great difference to those who have to rebuild, and we are disposed to express our thanks to the Government for it. The enquiry which I have made to-day has been induced by expressions which have been made use of by the Finance Minister in another place, when reference was made to the refund of duties upon large quantities of goods that had been consumed in that fire. No doubt the Finance Minister spoke for the Government, and he seemed to think, and I think myself, very fairly, that the Government would have no right to entertain any proposition from parties who lost duty paid goods on which there had been insurance. If they took into account the refunding of duties on any of those goods, the refund should be made in favor of the insurance companies. That is apparently quite right, for if parties had their stock stores insured as part and parcel of their stock in trade, it would be unfair that the Government should be asked to refund any portion of that duty. I would point out, however, that other parties had suffered by that fire who were not so fortunate as to have had their goods insured, owing to circumstances that, in my opinion, justified them in running the risk. The Custom House there, a very fine granite block, was considered a fire proof building. It had cost originally I fancy $300,000, though the Government, I think, only paid about $80,000 for it, but they repaired it extensively, and it must have been worth before the fire $150,000. In consequence of the supposition that that building was fireproof, and from the fact of there being a large number of officials in the employ of the Government of Canada about the premises, it was looked upon as very safe, and a number of merchants permitted their goods to remain in the vaults or warehouse beneath uninsured. I know of one merchant who had 127 casks of wine there on which duty had been paid to the Government to the amount of some $1,500. Some of the wine destroyed was under the control of the Government, inasmuch as the lockers had not given it up to the merchant; hence, the wine was to all intents and purposes in the possession of the Government, though they had received the duty on it sometime previously. In ordinary cases it would be quite right to consider that the Government would not be called upon to return duties, but in this case hon. gentlemen will see at once that the quantity of wine destroyed was not consumed in the country, that a duty had been paid upon it; and that a similar quantity on which duty would have to be paid a second time, would have to be imported to make up the deficiency. In that case the Government would clearly receive the duty twice on the same goods. It is evident that is not the intention of the Customs Act. The intention is that duties shall only be paid upon the goods consumed in the country, and parties paying duties once should not be compelled to pay revenue on the same goods a second time. There are persons who feel that the Government might possibly take this matter into consideration. They do not ask it in the spirit of supplicants; they do not ask anything to which they are not fairly entitled, and they do not believe the country will call upon them to pay duties on the same articles twice, under the circumstances I have stated. I may add that it is considered a great wonder that the Customs House should have been destroyed at all. If the least precaution had been taken by the officials; if an engine of any size had been placed on the premises, and any interest had been taken, that beautiful and costly building need not have been lost. Unfortunately it seemed to have been completely abandoned by those who should have looked after it; it seemed to be regarded as public property and was left to the flames, and parties who considered their goods were perfectly safe there, lost all that they had stored in its vaults, or warehouses.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—With reference to my hon. friend's enquiry I may say that Mr. Cartwright's observations were simply an illustration of the difficulties that would arise if such a course were followed as to refund duties on goods that had been destroyed. Once goods pass out of the bonded warehouse they become articles of traffic, and it would be a hopeless task to attempt to trace them. So far as goods that were in bond at the time of the fire are concerned, wherever proof was given that they had been destroyed, the Government have not enforced the bond, but further than that we could not go. I fancy it would take a very considerable time to discover the real claimants, and the quota of value of their respective claims outside of that. The first question that would arise would be the claims of the insurance companies, and what portion of the goods had been disposed of. We know as a rule that many merchants leave large quantities of their goods in bond as long as possible in order to insure safety, and save themselves from having to pay duty on them only as they require them, and as they are removed from the warehouse.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—No doubt there were large quantities of goods in bond at the time of the fire, but those are not the goods I have reference to. I had goods in bond myself at the time, and when the Warehouse Keeper made out a list of what had been destroyed in the warehouses, my bonds were cancelled at once, but I have reference to goods that remained in warehouse bond after the duties had been paid on them. There is no question but what those goods were still in the possession of the Government, in their warehouse, at the time of the fire, duty paid, and consequently they should not be placed in the same category as goods delivered up by the Government, or goods on which duties had not been paid. For instance if a cask of molasses or wine slips out of the slings on being delivered from the warehouse, and is destroyed, the Government refund the duties. In that case they hold that the same quantity of dutiable goods must be again brought into the country, on which the duties will have to be paid a second time. So they refund the duty to the party who sustains the loss by the accident. I expect the Government on due consideration will act similarly in such cases as I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The ordinary course adopted in such cases as the hon. gentleman speaks of, is to refer them to the Treasury Board to be adjudicated upon, where they are treated entirely on their merits.

THE SESSIONAL PRINTING.

FOURTH REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON moved the adoption of the fourth report of the Joint Committee on Printing. He said he wished to call attention to the fact that the cost of the printing services of Parliament for the year 1876-7 was $63,853.25. That was about $2,000 in excess of the expenditure of the previous year. The Committee were in hopes that the amount this year would be smaller than it was last year, although the work was as great. They were now considering the expediency of reducing the amount of printed matter, such as blue books and reports, and thereby lessening the expense of the service. They had also found that Mr. Botterell, who had charge of the Distribution Office, had been obliged to get in one or two persons during Session to assist him in packing up books and reports for the various Provinces. After careful enquiry the Committee were of opinion that there was work enough to justify the continuation of the services of one of the Sessional messengers now on the staff, during recess as a second assistant distributor, at an additional allowance of $300, which would bring his salary up to $500 a year. Mr. Botterell considered that, by getting a regular assistant added to his staff, there would be more efficiency and economy than when he had to depend upon untrained persons. These were the principal features of the report, and he hoped it would be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

BROCKVILLE & OTTAWA. AND CANADA CENTRAL RAILWAY AMALGAMATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. PENNY, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Deccr.

Hon. Mr. Skead, moved the second reading of Bill (9), "An Act to amend the Acts incorporating the Brockville and Ottawa Railway Company, and the Canada Central Railway Company, and to provide for the amalgamation of the said companies."

The motion was agreed to.

HOCHELAGA COUNTY BUILDING SOCIETY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL moved the second reading of Bill (48), an Act to incorporate La Societe de Construction du Comte d' Hochelaga. He said the object of this Bill was to place the Company on a permanent basis. The general clause was to secure existing rights in favor of the Company. One of the provisions was that all shares on which only ten per cent had been paid should be reduced to 90 per cent. The paid up capital was $59,450, and it was provided by the 5th section that this should form the permanent capital stock of the Society. The 6th section provides that by a resolution of the Directors confirmed at a general meeting of the stockholders, the permanent capital may be increased, and they may open classes for temporary shares. The 9th section provides for the discontinuance of the present system of appropriations. The 11th section provides for a reserve fund.

The Bill was read the second time.

THE MINISTERIAL CHANGES IN QUEBEC.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT presented a message from His Excellency the Governor-General transmitting to the Senate a letter from Mr. C. B. DeBoucherville with reference to recent ministerial changes in the Government of Quebec. He said: The hon. gentleman from Kingston, who is not at present in his place, asked me to bring down the commission of his Honor M. Letellier de St. Just, and any instructions given to him as Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. I have brought down the papers, but I desire to inform the hon. gentleman that no instructions were given him of an official or confidential nature, nor have any instructions been since given to him of an official or confidential character.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF CATTLE.

EXPLANATION.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER—As several hon. members have lately asked me if we had any news from England with regard to the Bill now before the Imperial Parliament respecting contagious diseases of cattle, and as we had not received any news for several days, I am very glad to be now able to inform the House that the following very encouraging telegram has been received this morning :—

“Several Canadian witnesses were examined before Lord’s Select Committee on Duke of Richmond’s Cattle Disease Bill. Sir John Rose occupied an hour and a quarter in placing before the Committee the Canadian claims for admission of live cattle to the inland markets. Sir John also answered several questions. In the absence of the Marquis of Ripon, Earl Spencer supported the claims of Canada. Other witnesses were examined, viz.: Mr. John Dyke, Dominion Agent in Liverpool, and Mr. Williamson, cattle dealer of Brampton, Ont. A further hearing was adjourned until Tuesday. It is now probable that the Government will accede to demands of the opponents of the measure, and grant unrestricted admission of Canadian cattle until such occasion arises as proves a disease existing among them, when they will be placed under restrictions equivalent to those enforced as to cattle arriving from continental ports.”

THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

On the Order of the Day being called—resuming the adjourned debate on the Honorable Mr. Read’s motion to resolve, that this House regrets that the mode adopted by the Government in relation to the construction of the Pacific Railway involves the expenditure of enormous sums of public money without any corresponding beneficial results,

Hon. Mr. GIRARD said:—At the adjournment of the debate the other day I was submitting to this House the position of the question in reference to the Pacific Railway. I was drawing the attention of the House to the fact that a large sum of money had been expended on this enterprise without any compensating advantages having been received from it by the country. I was endeavoring to point out what had been done in the various Provinces of the Dominion with regard to this work, and I was obliged to confess before you all that we had not received any work equivalent to the money that had been expended. I was then induced, hon. gentlemen, to ask what could be the cause of all this, or how it is possible that ten millions of dollars of the public money could have been expended on this enterprise without showing any results; and I stated to you, frankly, my opinion was that the Government of the day had not any intention of building the road at all. Their policy appears to me to be, not to build it. We have heard one hon. gentleman after another condemning their policy, and, it is now time, before the next general election, that the people should require of them some decided policy, so that if they do not intend to build the railway, the expenditures shall cease. The Government could not refuse to acknowledge the engagements of their predecessors. Not only was there an Act upon the Statute-books of the country, but a solemn treaty had been made with British Columbia, which had to be fulfilled, so far as the means of the Dominion would allow. But this Government did not know how to deal with such a gigantic enterprise. Instead of carrying out the plan of their predecessors, they adopted a narrow policy, and this they were obliged to change from time to time, unnecessarily expending the public money and accomplishing almost nothing in the direction of benefiting the country. It was only when they began to perceive that public opinion was opposed to them that they tried to do something practical towards constructing the railway. When I moved the adjournment of the debate last Friday, I was endeavoring to show the position in which Manitoba and British Columbia were placed by the policy of the Government. I contend, if they had gone on with the work on any part of the line, the people of British Columbia would have had nothing to complain of, because there was a distinct pledge given by the Dominion which must be redeemed sooner or later. We, in Manitoba, had no such agreement, but it was necessary that the road should pass through our Province, and in 1874 it was enacted that it should pass near Fort Garry. The people of Manitoba understood from this that the railway would pass near Winnipeg, because Fort Garry is included within the limits of the town of Winnipeg, and the Lower Fort is never spoken of by that name. On the strength of that understanding property was purchased, and money was invested at Winnipeg, but, after all, the Government carried the road north of Lake Manitoba. A Committee of this House investigated that subject last Session, and they arrived unanimously at the conclusion, after having heard the evidence of a number of witnesses, that if the line had been deflected in the direction of Winnipeg, and south of Lake Manitoba from section 15, the route would have been shorter, less expensive, and would have passed through a settled country. I look upon that as an important point, because the road is being built in the interest of the entire Dominion, and therefore it should be constructed where the local revenue would be largest. If section 15 had been deflected to Winnipeg, the country would have been saved the loss, not only of a large amount of money, but also of lives. Already twelve young men have met their death on that section, and I do not think it can be completed for four or five years to come. The Premier, on one occasion, stated that unless there were three millions of people in the North-West, it would not pay to build that line. I concur in that opinion, and for that reason I condemn the selection of the Northern route which passes through a country quite unfit for settlement. In Winnipeg there is already a considerable population, and it is estimated that there are 25,000 souls in the western part of the Province of Manitoba. Many of them settled there twelve or fifteen years ago, and suffered all the hardships incidental to the life of pioneers; and if the Government could, without injury to the rest of the Dominion, furnish them railway communication, they should do so. Already there is traffic enough between Winnipeg and the western part of the Province, to pay the running expenses of a railroad. Such was the opinion of Mr. Jarvis, one of the engineers examined before the committee last Session. He is a man of intelligence and high social position. He was engaged in the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, and had been for some time employed on the Pacific Railway survey. I will read a portion of his evidence, as a proof of what I have advanced:—

Q. Had a slight deflection been made from the located line to the south, from Keewatin towards Red River, would the difficulties experienced on section 15 have been avoided? Yes, they would have been obviated to a considerable extent.

Q. What difficulties do you refer to? Difficulties in the construction of the railway. There is some heavy work on the section known as section 15; in the thirty-five miles between Keewatin and Cross Lake, there are heavy rock cuttings which would have been avoided on the southern line. The rock extends the whole distance between these two points on the located line, but on the southern line, the heavy rock work would have ended about half way.

Q. Can you tell us why that route was selected in preference to the one where the work would have been lighter? I believe it was selected as being a more direct line to Selkirk.

Q. Can you tell us why Selkirk was the point specially selected? No, I cannot.

Q. Is the crossing of Red River easier there than at what would have been the crossing had the southern line which you refer to been selected? I think not. I think the crossing I selected twelve miles south of Selkirk and ten north of Winnipeg is better than the crossing at Selkirk.

Q. You think the crossing would be easier and cheaper at that point than at Selkirk? I think so from what I have seen of the crossing at Selkirk.

Q. Would the line southern by the Red River route from Keewatin have been longer than the present located line? The line would have been slightly longer to the river, owing to the river being reached at a point further west, but it would not have added to the length of the Pacific Railway.

Q. Would the facilities of construction afforded by the line first projected to Winnipeg compensate for the difference in length between it and the located line east of Red River? I believe that the extra length would be more than paid for by the difference in work between Keewatin and Winnipeg.

Q. Which line would facilitate more the colonization of the Province? The southern line, certainly. On the located line there is no open country at all east of Selkirk, and there is very little land available for settlement, while on the line to the south there is a belt of prairie country about thirty miles wide fit for settlement.

Q. Does a line from Keewatin to Winnipeg touch any good country? Yes, it would run through thirty miles of the good land.

Q. Would there be any more difficulty in constructing a bridge across the river at St. Boniface than at any other place from Winnipeg to Stone Fort? I think there would be no great difficulty in constructing a bridge just below Winnipeg, but it would probably cost a little more than at the point I speak of.

Q. Would it be more difficult than at the crossing at Selkirk? No, I imagine not.

Q. If a railway were now in existence from the western boundary of the Province to Winnipeg would it pay running expenses at present? I think it would make running expenses as far as the settled portion of the Province extends, about sixty or seventy miles.

Q. What benefit to the Province would the located line from Selkirk west across the Narrows to the western boundary be? It would be of no benefit whatever to the Province of Manitoba.

Q. Which way is settlement growing from Winnipeg? Principally to the west towards Portage la Prairie and White Mud River.

Q. What would be the difference in length between the proposed line of yours, and the located line between Keewatin and Caerlaverock station, at the elbow of the North Saskatchewan? As near as I can scale it on the map, my line would be eleven miles shorter.

Q. Have you any means of forming an estimate of the cost, between the Southern route and the located line? Starting from Keewatin, I should say the Southern line would cost less, because although the expenses may be somewhat heavier in the neighborhood of the Rocky Mountains, all that expense would be more than balanced by the heavier work on section 15 of the located line.

Q. You say that that course is about eleven miles shorter than the present located line? Yes.

Q. In calculating the distance, you have not considered the branch from Winnipeg to Selkirk at all? No.

Q. So that there would be a saving by your line of eleven miles in the length, and a saving, by not having to construct the branch, of another twenty miles? Yes; the total saving would be thirty one miles of railway.

When it was known at Winnipeg that the Government had decided upon running the Railroad north of Lake Manitoba, instead of crossing the Red River at Winnipeg, there was some correspondence between the local authorities at that city, and the Dominion Government. I will take the liberty of reading a portion of the Minute in Council, forwarded to the Dominion Government by the Executive Council of Manitoba. It is dated 22nd January, 1875, and sets forth—

“That the termination of the branch railway from Pembina at twenty-two miles below the city of Winnipeg, would grievously injure the only town of importance which has arisen in the North West, the more especially inasmuch as the Canadian Pacific Railway has been located in such a manner as not to connect in any way with the city.

“As representing the people of Manitoba, they deem it their incumbent duty to urge upon the Privy Council that the Pembina Branch shall be constructed from Winnipeg to Pembina, and not directed to the vicinity of the Stone Fort, representing that the residents of Winnipeg and the surrounding country have made large investments in the erection of buildings, and the entering upon important business enterprises at that city, on the faith of being placed in communication with the American system of railways by the construction of the Pembina Branch.

“They represent that the faith of the Dominion is pledged to the construction of the said branch from the main line near Fort Garry, which is included in the City of Winnipeg to Pembina, and they rely implicitly on the good faith of the Privy Council and the Parliament of Canada to carry out their pledged word as to the construction of the branch in question with terminus at Fort Garry and Pembina.

“They claim the fulfilment of a solemn and statutory pledge, on the carrying out of which the future of Winnipeg mainly depends, and in proof of the existence of the pledge in question they cite the second subsection of 3rd section of the Act 37 Victoria, chap. 14, entitled ‘An Act to provide for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway,’ which expressly provides that a branch from the main line near Fort Garry, in the Province of Manitoba, shall be constructed to some point near Pembina, on the southern boundary thereof, and also the appropriation in the Supply Act of 1874, of $650,000 for the construction of the Fort Garry and Pembina Railway, etc.

“That the Act to provide for the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway distinctly says in section 3rd that the said railway is to pass near Winnipeg, and as the great bulk of the settlement is and always will be south of Lake Manitoba, it would consequently pass through the heart of the population if the meaning of the Act is carried out.

“But on the other hand, if the road should be built north of the lake, three-fourths of the population of the North West will, of necessity, be compelled to seek an outlet through the State of Minnesota."

The answer of the Privy Council, dated 1st May, 1875, is that,

"The Act of 1874 does not provide for any precise location. Winnipeg is not mentioned in the Act. Prior to the receipt of the Minute referred to, the line had been located from Rat Portage to the Narrows of Lake Manitoba, crossing Red River three miles below Lower Fort Garry. Considerations of the present economy and the future saving in working the line, as well as the obvious necessity of considering the navigation of Lake Winnipeg having dictated this line, in which there is a saving distance of over thirty miles."

I think it will be admitted that we have not only been refused justice by the Government, but a great wrong has been done to the Dominion at large. We have been told that the engineers recommend the northern route, but we know very well that some engineers report in accordance with what they know or believe to be the views of those who employ them. I know there are many honorable exceptions to this rule. The committee of this House last Session, consisting of nine members, was unanimous in the opinion that the southern route should have been adopted, and this unanimity was commented upon by the Premier, who seemed to think they had been chosen because they were known in advance to favor that route. I say that committee was composed of men of intelligence, who were perfectly independent in their views, and who conscientiously weighed the evidence that was submitted to them, with a desire to arrive at a right conclusion, and that conclusion was, that it would be better for all parts of the Dominion that the southern route should be adopted. With such a report from the committee before them, the Government, should, at least, have given written instructions to the engineers who were sent to examine the southern route. I find, however, their instructions were merely verbal. Here is the report of Mr. Smith, annexed to the Report of the Minister of Public Works for 1877, of which I will give some extracts:—

"In accordance with the verbal instructions of the Minister an examination has been made of this line (viz: the line from Selkirk westwards, passing south of Lake Manitoba) with instrumental surveys of some of the deep valleys traversed by the line, and at other places where deemed necessary. The line throughout the Province of Manitoba, nearly 100 miles, is very favorable for railway construction, and the land is generally fertile.

"It is evident that no single line of railway can traverse all the fertile portions of a region so extensive, and that even before the trunk line is completed, branches will be required in various directions.

"A branch line could be constructed at a comparatively small cost, to meet the requirements of the Province of Manitoba equally as well as a diversion of the main line, which, if carried out as suggested, could not fail to be injurious to the wiler interests of the Dominion."

I think at the present time it is important that we should have but one line. We have not sufficient population yet to furnish traffic for more than one. If you encourage several lines in a country where the population is so sparse there will be no profit for any of them. For that reason it would be better for the Government to construct the Pacific Railway through the settled portion of the country instead of aiding private associations with the public money, and thus leading to jobbery and speculations which may be profitable to individuals but ruinous to the Dominion. I heard the hon. member from Toronto (Mr. Brown) say :

"He felt, and was sure the great majority of the House felt, that one could only rise from the careful examination of the public affairs of the country during the last three years, with the conviction that a more upright and efficient administration could not have been secured."

Notwithstanding my respect for the hon. gentleman for his long public life, I do not hesitate to say that I felt he could not be serious. If he had been, he would not have left his place without waiting to hear the reply to his remarks. I cannot believe he was serious in saying, in view of all that has been done by the Government with reference to the Pacific Railway, that there is not a single item of which we can disapprove. I would like to be able to agree with the hon. gentleman and tell the Government they have fulfilled their duty in a way to meet the views of the people. My opinion is when the appeal is made to the electors it will be seen that public opinion will condemn their policy with respect to the Pacific Railway. The people will feel, as I do, that if other men are called to administer public affairs, the country cannot be worse governed than it is, but, on the contrary, there is every probability that we may enjoy the prosperity that blessed the Dominion in former years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the debate be adjourned until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

The Bill entitled "An Act to amend the Post Office Act of 1875" was read a third time and passed.

THE MARITIME COURT OF ONTARIO.

The Bill entitled "An Act respecting the Maritime Court of Ontario" was read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC WORKS LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

MOTION TO AMEND.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER moved that the House do go into Committee of the Whole on Bill entitled "An Act further to amend the Act respecting the Public Works of Canada." He explained that the object of the measure was to simplify the procedure in arbitration cases.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT said he had an amendment to propose. He wished to make the meaning of the Bill clear.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER said the Bill was to enable the Minister of Public Works to refer cases in dispute to the arbitrators, instead of sending his employees to make investigations. The object was not to increase the power of the Government, but to save time and expense in such cases.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT said he did not wish to interfere with the Bill any further than to make its meaning clearer, which would be the object of his amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said that struck at the whole Public Works Act.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT said it could not possibly have such an effect. He had learned that since leaving home the engineer for the Maritime Provinces had taken possession of part of his (Mr. Wilmot's) property, and was building a dam 500 feet in extent, in the St. John River, which would pour the whole force of the current on his island. He had taken legal advice on the subject, and his adviser had called upon the Minister of Public Works to know under what authority he was acting, but received an evasive reply, which was no answer at all. His (Mr. Wilmot's) legal adviser had looked into the Public Works Act, and could find no authority for such a proceeding. The engineer who had charge of the Public Works in the Maritime Provinces had stated to a member of this House that the only person he had to consult in the matter was the member for the county that supported the Government, and that was a sort of responsible Government he (Mr. Wilmot) was determined to oppose.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the hon. gentleman was under an entire misapprehension of facts. After the severe strictures passed upon the engineer by the hon. Senator on a former occasion, he (Mr. Scott) had asked him for an explanation. It appeared that the place on which the work was being prosecuted, did not interfere with the hon. gentleman's property at all. The dam was being built out in the stream.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It will throw the current on his farm.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the current, either on one side or the other, would affect either the hon. gentleman's property, or a number of farms on the opposite shore. The engineer's opinion was that it would not injure anyone's property. But if the hon. gentleman's land should be damaged, he would have a case against the Crown. The Bill before the House was simply in the direction of giving larger liberty to the subject, and not of curtailing it in any degree. From the tenor of the hon. gentleman's amendment, it would militate very much against the public works and stop them altogether.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said he understood that in making the improvement at Oromocto Shoals, it was necessary to divert the water to one side or the other, and it was considered better to throw the current on the land of the hon. gentleman, whether from personal or political animosity he could not say. He, (Mr. Miller) did not know enough of the circumstances to justify him in making any serious charge against the Government or their officer. He concurred in the opinion that the Bill was a good one, as it extended the right of parties having claims against the Government and facilitated the means of realizing those claims. He saw no reason why the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Wilmot) should not be made applicable to this one clause, as its object was simply to prevent doubt or misapprehension with respect to it. Perhaps the best way would be to give notice of the amendment and let the Bill stand over another day.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER said the amendment would be depriving the Government of a right they already possessed.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT said the hon. Secretary of State was entirely astray as to the effect of this dam upon the Island, and had evidently taken his opinion from the engineer who planned it. He (Mr. Wilmot) had been the first to advocate the making of this improvement, and if the plan recommended by Mr. Beckwith had been followed there would have been a straight channel down the river, but the Engineer in charge was turning the whole current of the river on his (Mr. Wilmot's) Island.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is throwing it away from your Island.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—I assert the very contrary, It is throwing the current on the Island.

The Bill was allowed to stand until tomorrow.

THE LYON DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH moved that the report of the Select Committee to allow the Bill entitled: "An Act for the relief of Victoria Elizabeth Lyon" be adopted.

EVIDENCE IN DIVORCE CASES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved:—

"That the evidence taken in Divorce Cases before Committees of this House, shall not form part of the Journals of the House; but that such evidence shall be printed for the use of Members, and shall be distributed only to Members"

He said:—I think probably this resolution would have come better from some older member of the House, but, as no other gentleman made any movement, I thought I might be allowed to do so, as the existing state of things was not altogether satisfactory. As far as I can see, there is no valid reason why the evidence in divorce cases—which is not of a character which one would desire to see in general circulation—should go into the Journals of the House, and be scattered throughout the country, or preserved for the reading of future generations. The plan suggested in this resolution, to have the evidence filed with the Clerk of the House, will, I think, accomplish the object we all have in view. Any future Divorce Committee can have access to such evidence by applying to the Clerk of the House, and I think that is all that is desirable. There is another reason for this motion. Looking at the precedents of the House of Lords by the practice of which this House is guided, I am informed that for many years before the establishment of the Divorce Court in England, the evidence in divorce cases did not appear in the journals of the House of Lords, as had been the practice at an earlier period. I think, as they had grown wiser by experience, it would be well for us to follow the precedent established by them. The objections to having this matter printed in such a way that it is not only distributed to the members of the House of Commons, but to representatives of the press and almost every one who wishes to get hold of it, are manifest. Any one who cares to read the evidence in the last case will be satisfied it is not the sort of literature, the dissemination of which should be encouraged. I think it is a very unsatisfactory position for this House to be placed in, that we should be the means of spreading abroad such literature as that. We have just passed a Bill here to extend the powers of the Post Office Department so as to prevent the circulation of improper literature, and I think it is a very anomalous thing that the Legislature, while taking steps to prevent the spread of indecent and improper literature, should be doing so much itself towards circulating it.

Hon. Mr. ODELL—I quite agree with what has fallen from the hon. member who introduced this motion, but I think it is questionable whether he has gone far enough. Something would depend upon what has been the practice heretofore. I don't know whether it is necessary to send copies of the evidence to the members of the other House, but as they form part of the court, I suppose it should be sent to them also.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think it has been usual to send the evidence taken in divorce cases to the House of Commons, and it is upon that evidence they adjudicate in bills of this character. If it is the sense of the House that no record be kept of evidence in divorce cases, the motion could easily be amended so as to include both Houses. The question is, whether, if we exclude evidence from the records of the journals, or the record of the committee, on divorce cases, it should not be kept in some other form. I do not know whether it is necessary this evidence should be preserved in any way. I have no strong opinion on the subject, but if this resolution is passed it will obviate the necessity of keeping any record except what is left in the possession of the Clerk.

Hon. Mr. ODELL—The manuscript will be the record.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—As I understand, the rule sought to be adopted by this resolution is the rule in existence, except that the evidence is not entered on the journals. There is a record kept of it. We passed an order last Session that the evidence should not be entered on the journals, so that it should not be circulated outside of Parliament. We have kept a separate record, so that it may be referred to in case of necessity. It strikes me the House ought to pause before striking out that record, and the means of referring to it. We know that constant reference has been made in divorce cases in the past, to decisions of the House of Lords, which we could not have had the benefit of if we had not some sort of record. We recognize the evils of allowing these purient details to be spread on our journals, and last Session we decided that they should not be so published, but that a record be kept for the use of future committees. The latter part of this rule we have already. Our order is, the evidence shall only be printed for the use of the members, and not be printed in the minutes as they formerly were, and spread broadcast over the country. My hon. friend ought to be satisfied with the rule as it is, and leave the evidence as the Parliamentary record for precedents. I have had some experience on those committees, and I know it is sometimes convenient to have such precedents to refer to, and as time goes by they will become more and more valuable every year.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Victoria)—I moved last Session in this direction, but nothing was done. I spoke to the Clerk afterwards, and he said he had received no orders to leave such evidence out of the journals of the House.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—My impression was that the rule of the House left it to the discretion of the committee whether evidence should be published in the journals of the House or not. In the Committee of which I was chairman it was through neglect that the rule was not observed. The matter might well be left in this way, because it might not be in the interest of the public that the evidence should be entirely suppressed.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I would suggest that the motion be amended so as to provide that the evidence be printed in English only, because there is no necessity for translating it for the use of the French members.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—My hon. friend from Victoria is mistaken in supposing nothing was done last year. There was a resolution passed which will be found in the journals providing that :

“ Hereafter all evidence in divorce cases taken before a committee of this House, which, in the opinion of the committee ought not to appear in the journals, should be entered in a separate book, and be deposited in the archives.”

This came up in the Hunter divorce case, and I stated there was nothing in the evidence in that case which rendered it necessary to suppress it. In the Lyon case—to which, I suppose, particular reference is made now—the chairman of the committee, on reflection, thought the details were of such a character that the committee would not be justified in allowing them to be published in the journals.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I have no doubt the House is pretty unanimous as to excluding this evidence from the journals of the Senate. The question is, how much further shall they go. Should they not keep a record, of some kind, of this evidence ?

Hon. Gentlemen—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Could there not be a book kept showing the justification for the granting of Bills of Divorce? If you prohibit the printing of the evidence in the Minutes without making provision for the keeping of a record, you are going too far. Perhaps the hon. gentleman who has this matter in hand would allow his motion to stand over for a day or two, and see if it could not be amended to meet the general view of the House, as thrown out to-day.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—I must confess, I think the publication of the details of what may be considered a Criminal Court

Hon. Mr. Kaulbach.

—details of a most foul and offensive character—should not be paraded amongst the records of the Senate of Canada. I am told this evidence has been spread broadcast through the country. I should be glad to see all such reports eliminated from the archives of the House, except in cases where they may be required as a record.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Two years ago a committee was appointed to revise the rules of the House, the Chairman of which was my hon. friend Mr. Botsford. It seems to me it would be a most desirable and convenient way if the mover of this motion would allow it to stand as a notice, and in a day or two to move for the re-appointment of that committee, and refer it to them, in order that a new rule may be adopted which would be satisfactory to the House. It would be very desirable that whatever we do now should be final, and that there should not be any necessity for further steps to be taken in this direction. I do not understand the hon. Senator from Halifax to want in any way to interfere with the record of the proceedings. Of course a record must be kept, because it is part of a record of a court of justice. The notice as given does not take that into consideration, and does not say in what way the record shall be preserved, whether in a separate book or in print.

Hon. Mr. ODELL—The suggestion is a good one; and in the meantime I think instructions should be given to the Clerk that this evidence is not to appear in the journals. I distinctly brought the matter up myself in the Committee, and urged that it should not be published in the journals. The Committee agreed that it should not, and I expected it would have been reported to the House in that way.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I fully exonerate every member of that Committee except myself. The report was handed to me, and I signed it in a hasty manner, without seeing that this part of it was attended to. The Committee expressed themselves strongly against the publication of the evidence. I must say, at the same time, I do not consider the publication of this evidence in the journals of the House as disseminating it through the Dominion. They go into the hands of members, and are very seldom looked at, and consequently it could not have that baneful effect upon the morals of the community that some hon. gentlemen suppose.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am prepared to accept the suggestion of the hon. Senator from Kingston, to refer this matter to a special committee. With reference to the preservation of the evidence as a record, I may say I provided for that in the resolution, as it was originally framed, but on consultation with the Law Clerk I was informed it was unnecessary, because, as a matter of course, all the evidence taken before a Committee of the House was preserved by the Court. At his suggestion I struck out that portion of the resolution.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—I agree in the opinion of my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Bellerose) that the evidence of these Divorce Committees should not be translated into French in any case. I think it is the unanimous desire of the French speaking members that there should be no translation.

The motion was allowed to stand.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH moved:—

“That the evidence submitted by the Select Committee to whom was referred the Bill intitled: ‘An Act for the relief of Victoria Elizabeth Lyon’ be not inserted in the Journals of this House.”

The motion was agreed to.

THE ROUTE OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Victoria) moved:—

“That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House, the latest report of the Acting Engineer-in-Chief of the Pacific Railway, together with the map relating to the Peace River Country and Pine River Pass.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

On the Order being called for resuming the adjourned debate on the Hon. Mr. READ'S motion:—

Hon. Mr. Kaulbach.

“To resolve, That this House regrets that the mode adopted by the Government in relation to the construction of the Pacific Railway, involves the expenditure of enormous sums of public money without any corresponding beneficial results.”

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said:—The hon. Senator who brought this motion under the notice of the House expresses in it regret at the mode adopted by the Government for the construction of the Pacific Railway, and points out the very large expenditure that enterprise entails. I can agree with him that the construction of a work of that magnitude does entail a very large cost upon the people of this country; but it would have been very much more patriotic had the hon. Senator in 1871, when the subject was first brought before the notice of the people of Canada, sounded the key note of alarm and painted the future as the last few years have shown it, and described the enormous cost this road would entail on the Dominion, and called attention to the impossibility of carrying out the bargain which the Government were about to consummate with British Columbia. Had he done that he would have earned the gratitude of his country. But the treaty with British Columbia imposed a solemn obligation upon this country to construct within an impossible period a road of this magnitude, a road the extent and expensiveness of which was without parallel in the history of this or any other country. I am not aware that at that time, when the measure was before this Chamber, the hon. Senator called the attention of this House to the very dangerous agreement that we were then making, involving, as it did, such a large outlay of public money or else the sacrifice of the good faith of the people of Canada. As hon. Senators are aware, the terms with British Columbia involved the commencement of that road within a period of two years from 1871, and its completion within ten years. An effort has been made to throw some light on the interpretation of those terms. It has been urged that these terms were to be considered elastic; that Canada was not to be absolutely bound by them; that they were figurative, but I fancy that can scarcely be urged now, in view of the very careful manner in which the proposition was prepared binding this country to terms that are actually in an Act of Parliament.

Canada at that date had undertaken a very large expenditure of public money. She had undertaken the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, knowing its completion would involve a cost, in round numbers of $10,000,000.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—$20,000,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At the time I speak of, in 1871, a part of that money had been spent. I find, however, that in 1871, no very considerable part of the money had been expended on the Intercolonial Railway. Practically, therefore, we had this expenditure of $22,000,000 staring us in the face, and in addition to that we had the policy of constructing and enlarging the canals of this country, involving a sum of at least $20,000,000 more. In view of those obligations this country was committed to, we rushed into this agreement with British Columbia. Her autonomy was entirely annihilated, and she became a part of the Dominion of Canada. No sooner had the union been completed than, the year after, it became perfectly apparent those terms were impossible of fulfilment. Within two years, the term limited for the commencement of that road, although a million of dollars had been expended, no line had been found over any part of the vast country that lies between Lake Nipissing and the Pacific Ocean, that the Engineer-in-Charge felt he could fairly recommend to the Government of this country for the location of that line, : $1,000,000 had been spent simply to find out the places to be avoided—in discovering those localities where the road could not be built. Practically no further information was obtained during those two years, after that large outlay of money. When hon. gentlemen reflect that the country was, at that time, practically committed to the construction of 600 miles of railway between Lake Nipissing and the western portion of Lake Superior, through a country entirely unknown, where not a single settlement existed from one end of it to the other, that it had not a single inhabitant except the trapper and the huntsman, and that it was the most inhospitable portion of the Continent of America—when hon. gentlemen consider the sums of money, and the time, that were exhausted in discovering a route through that country, and that, practically, no information was gained other than it was extremely desirable to avoid it and abstain from locating a railway through that portion, they will conceive the nature of the undertaking. Explorations had also been made between Lake Superior and what is now called Manitoba, and the Red River. Of that section of country very little was known beyond the line that had been usually travelled by the Hudson Bay people and the voyageurs who passed to and fro between Lake Superior and the Red River country. Their line was limited to a route very close to that known as the Dawson Road, which consisted of a series of lakes and rivers by means of which they passed through that country lying between those two points. In British Columbia, practically, up to that time nothing had been gained—no information that has been found up to the present time of any practical value. Such was the condition of things when the present Government took office. One million dollars has been spent and no practical result had been obtained. British Columbia was protesting against the violation of the terms of the bargain. Being the weaker party, and so lately from the control and influences of Downing Street, it was but natural they looked in that quarter for protection against the strong party represented by Canada. They pleaded they had given up their independence under special circumstances, and had a right to demand that the bond should be faithfully observed. Hon. gentlemen are, no doubt, aware of the controversy which continued during the subsequent two or three years, and that the English statesmen who were more particularly charged with Colonial affairs rather favored the views of British Columbia. They felt there had been a breach of honor on the part of this country, and though they believed the bargain had been made with British Columbia on the understanding that Canada could carry it out without increased taxation on this country, and, although it was known our knowledge of the country lying between the Eastern Provinces and the Pacific Ocean was of so meagre a description that we would not be justified in rushing into the construction of the railway, still, after the decision of Lord Carnarvon, who had been referred to as umpire, we thought

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Canada ought to give better proof of her earnestness and sincerity than she had in the past. I will not allude to the Carnarvon terms further than to draw attention to the fact that they were of such a nature that Canada was not in a position to ignore all reference to them. Our position was an extremely delicate one. We were in 1874-75 impressed with the belief that the terms were unwise for ourselves and British Columbia; that she, having become a part of Canada, it was not her interest to overweight this country and press for all that under the contract she was entitled to, but what, under the circumstances, it would have been very unwise for Canada to concede. I think this is the eighth year from the inception of the agreement with British Columbia, and we find ourselves to day not possessing, with regard to many sections of the proposed line of railway between this and the Pacific Coast, that full information which would justify us in going on with the construction of the road. Though the period seems a long one, if we compare it with works of less magnitude and the experiences of the past, we will find the period of eight years is a comparatively short one within which to have gathered sufficient knowledge to locate a railway through a country of which we knew so little anterior to our explorations. The Intercolonial Railway had been discussed for nearly a quarter of a century before surveys were commenced. The people of Canada and the Maritime Provinces for years and years had been discussing the time when the road would be built. Explorations were more or less made; the countries to the east and the west were both inhabited by a considerable population; the gap between, of which very little was known, was a space of probably three hundred miles; that would embrace all the unknown land between the eastern part of the Province of Quebec and the western part of the Maritime Provinces, of which we had not possessed some accurate information. Mr. Fleming was appointed Chief Engineer of that road in the fall of 1867, and he entered that winter vigorously on his work. It was, I think, January 1871 before Mr. Fleming felt he was in a position to advertise for tenders. We all know that the surveys were pushed forward with the greatest possible alacrity, that the Government were forced into action by the desire of the people on either end of the line to have the road under way at the very earliest period, because, in our compact we had made with the Maritime Provinces, we agreed in July, 1867, that the road would be finished in four years. The people who made that compact thought they knew enough of the surveys at that time.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—When was that compact made?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the bargain with the Lower Provinces.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—It was to be begun within a certain period.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My impression was that four years was the time limited for the construction of the road.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—There was a time limit.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The agreement was that the road should be built with all practicable speed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not a matter of very great importance, but, if my memory serves me rightly, Mr. Fleming states in his report the time for completing the road was limited to four years. However, the four years had nearly expired before the work was actually undertaken. I merely mention this as an illustration that hon. gentlemen may comprehend the vast magnitude of the Pacific Railway enterprise as compared with one considered at that time of considerable importance in itself. The Intercolonial Railway is just 600 miles in length; the Pacific Railway is over 3,000 miles. One had the advantage of being in a country accessible at each end and with a fine water-way—the St. Lawrence—along side of it. The other was remote, in the interior of a country of which very little was known and practically inaccessible. In view of the experience we have gained, I do not hesitate to say that if the construction of the Pacific Railway were postponed for another ten years, probably in each year during those ten we would gather some experience that would be valuable to us in re-locating portions of the line. It is idle to say with certainty that the best possible route has been selected any more than to say the best route was chosen for the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend smiles. Would he say if the Intercolonial was to be located again it would be built by such a circuitous route, that there would be such a Grecian bend in it? Would he say that it would be located in such a way that in eight or ten years the construction of other and more direct lines would render it valueless as a commercial enterprise? My hon. friend tells us there have been very grave mistakes committed in carrying out this Pacific Railway project. It is idle to suppose that mistakes will not arise in the expenditure of large sums of money. A gentleman cannot undertake the construction of a house, under his own supervision, at a cost of $10,000, without finding before it is completed that in some respects he could have done much better if it had to be built over again. So it is with railways; so it has been with the Intercolonial and so it will be with the Pacific Railway. We had an illustration of that only yesterday, when an hon. gentleman from British Columbia stated in his judgement it would be better to postpone the construction of the road in British Columbia for another year because a route had not been surveyed which in his opinion presented advantages and attractions far superior to any we have yet explored.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Victoria)—I did not mention British Columbia, it was the North-West.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It meant the same thing. The line had practically to enter British Columbia at a different point, and the whole force of my hon. friend's observations was to induce the Government to carry the road to Bute Inlet, as compared with Burrard Inlet and the valley of the Fraser. It is quite obvious that was the point, because the hon. gentleman who sits behind him, and who resides in the valley of the Fraser, did not coincide with his views, thus showing, however we may attempt to rise above local prejudices, we are all more or less influenced by them, and we all, more or less, favor that particular line or selection that is in accord with our own feelings. We have another instance of a work of this kind and the great cost it has entailed—the Union Pacific. That was built on the plan which my hon. friend suggests ought to have been adopted in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway—that is, given to a company which should receive a subsidy of money and a grant of land. As we all know, the Union Pacific Railway had a very valuable grant of land—equal in value, probably, to any in the world, lands that had valuable mines, coal mines of vast extent and importance. In addition to that they had an issue of six per cent. bonds of the United States Treasury to the extent of $57,000,000, and no sooner was that amount spent than the company applied to the United States Government for another issue of $57,000,000. The Government did not, in the second issue, assume any responsibility, but it allowed the second issue to go in advance of the former securities they had taken on the line, placing them as we placed the Grand Trunk Railway security, behind other parties who came forward and took up the bonds of the road. A bill is now before Congress—and I may say it has been an event of annual occurrence since that road has been built—for better terms, and Congress has from time to time yielded to the powerful influence that such a railway has been enabled to bring on the politicians of the day; and at the present time, apart entirely from credit and lands and other advantages, the Company has received (and the United States Treasury has been depleted of) considerably in excess of $100,000,000 in aid of that road, and we know very well that line ought to be, as a railway, one of the finest enterprises on the globe, going through a section of country to a great extent then populated, and terminating in one of the richest and most fertile sections of the world. The State of California may be regarded as one naturally of the richest countries on the face of the globe, not only from the enormous substantial wealth that comes from the bowels of the earth, but also from the vast quantity of cereals it is now producing, and with which it is supplying the hungry people of Europe. California is, therefore, a terminus for a railway of that kind which presents extraordinary attractions. With the trade they have built up with China, Japan, and the Eastern countries of Asia, and the immense intercourse with the Eastern States of the Union, there were obviously attractions and advantages that can in no case be claimed for the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Had we such a population on the Pacific Coast instead of the 10,000 white people we have in British Columbia, we might be more hopeful of the future. I merely throw out this as in some degree illustrating the ground I have taken, that this railway must necessarily entail a large expenditure on the people of this country. No doubt those who write the history of this Dominion will also write the history of a good many administrations that have seen the building of that road. It will be a fertile source of rocks.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL.—Fort Francis Locks ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am speaking of rocks, not locks — the breakers ahead that necessarily will crop up for any administration that is governing this country in years to come; for many administrations will come and go before the Pacific Railway proper, in Canada, is completed. I do not think it requires the eye of prophesy to foretell that. I have always thought so, and day by day I am confirmed in that conviction. We may within the limited time, be enabled to run a line across, the prairies, but to construct a line through the inhospitable and forbidding country north of Lakes Huron and Superior will, I say, take many a year, and very many administrations will have controlled the destinies of this country before we see any of that portion of the line in operation.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH — Forty years my hon. friend prognosticated.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was an idle prophesy, which, I fear, may come near the truth. The policy of the present Government to avoid constructing the 600 miles of road north of Lakes Huron and Superior, and to use the water communication as far as Thunder Bay, has saved the country the enormous expense of building that section. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Read) criticizes the mode of building this road. I suppose he thinks we should either let the contract without making any surveys, as was at first contemplated, or should go on and complete the surveys before expending anything in construction. I should like the hon. gentleman to call to mind the criticisms and strictures that were passed on this Government because we let the Georgian Bay Branch without a survey, because in that particular case we tried the experiment of letting some forty or fifty miles in that way.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Because that was the last piece of road that was necessary.

Hon. Mr. READ—The contract was for 105 miles.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because we allowed that to be commenced under the principle laid down by the late Administration, we were severely criticized. I will not advert to what everyone knows was the result of that experiment. We had to take the contract off the hands of the contractor. So it would have been, only in a much greater degree, and, more magnified form, had the proposition that the hon. gentleman suggested to be the true one, of giving any company the construction of a road through a country of which they really knew nothing. The illustration of the appeals made to Congress may very well be quoted as what would have been done in Canada, only to a greater degree, because the people of the United States knew very much more of the route of their Pacific Railway than we did of ours in 1871. Emigrants had been in the habit of passing in thousands through that country, year after year; the two ends of it were well known, and the gap with which the people were less familiar, was comparatively small. Therefore, the policy of this Government was, before any portion of it should be submitted for construction, to at least locate the line. As against that, it is very well known the Government were urged at all events to go on and give some earnest of their intention to build the road. Our comparative inaction in seeking first to find the best line was, construed into a desire to practically postpone the fulfillment of the agreement with British Columbia. In the Sessions of 1874 and 1875, hon. Senators from British Columbia, and other hon. gentlemen expressed the belief that the Government ought to have given some greater evidence of their sincerity than they were then doing—that at least some part of the road should have been put under contract. If hon. gentlemen will read the correspondence between British Columbia and the Colonial Office, they will find that was the view also of Lord Carnarvon. He told us we should do something to satisfy the people of that Province, and give them proof of our sincerity. I confess in our anxiety to meet that view, we did recommend to Parliament the construction of that part of the contemplated line, on Vancouver Island. That was also proposed, because we believed the people of British Columbia were entitled to compensation, and it was thought, as the construction of the main line had to be so long postponed, the Esquimalt and Naniamo end might be gone on with. This House thought differently, and I am not going to criticize that decision. In view of circumstances and the experience of the country of late years, that action may have been wise and prudent.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has no doubt saved this country a considerable sum of money. At all events, it was undertaken under peculiar pressure, in obedience to —I will not say] clamor—the earnest appeals that were made by the people of British Columbia, and their friends on the other side of the Atlantic. Conjointly with that, and before the Bill was defeated in this House, 5,000 tons of steel rails were ordered for British Columbia. Had that Bill been introduced and defeated the year before, of course the rails would not have gone there.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Was not the Bill defeated in the Senate before the order was given for the rails?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the correspondence shows it was before that they were ordered.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I think the order was given after the defeat of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was in the end of April, and the order for steel rails for British Columbia was a matter of discussion two months before that.

Hon. Mr. AIKENS—The rails had not been shipped.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Now, with reference to the route, the Government thought proper to drop the 600 miles lying between Lake Nipissing and Lac des Mille Lacs. In view of that, they decided to subsidize the Canada Central Railway and build the Georgian Bay Branch. They believed Lakes Superior and Huron presented all the advantages for transport that the Pacific Railway could afford; that the traffic would be practically summer traffic, and that the country could be saved the expense of building 600 miles of railway. The road from Thunder Bay to Selkirk has been pretty thoroughly discussed, and I need not refer to it again. The hon. gentleman who seconded this motion did advert to that portion of the line west of Selkirk which is located by the Narrows of Lake Manitoba. He has argued very ably and eloquently, as the hon. gentleman no doubt was bound to do, in defence of his views that the line should be carried south of Lake Manitoba. The Committee which had this subject under discussion last year suggested that an enquiry should be made as to whether a practical route could not be found south of the lake. I desire to refer hon. Senators to the report of the gentlemen deputed to examine that southern route and their conclusion upon it. They say, however desirable and eligible a line would be on the south of Lake Manitoba for 100 miles west of Selkirk, between that and the further point where it joins the present located line, there are obstacles of a very grave character, that the wide valleys preclude the possibility of building a line in that direction.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—I don't think the report stated that the valleys were so wide as to preclude the possibility of building that line.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The reasons are given by the gentlemen who were deputed to explore that country, in the Minister's report for the present year. The hon. gentleman devoted the greater part of his speech to what he called the jobs in connection with the steel rails and the nuts and bolts, and, therefore, I shall have to go over that ground. I shall do so as expeditiously as possible, and advert simply to points which I think will satisfy the hon. gentleman the action of the Government in this purchase was a perfectly honourable and proper one. The first paper I shall read on the subject is the following from Mr. Fleming:—

" CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,
 " OFFICE OF THE ENGINEER-IN-CHIEF,
 " OTTAWA, March 24th, 1876.

MEMORANDUM—STEEL RAILS.

" During the summer of 1874, advices from England showed a great decline in the price of steel rails. It was generally considered that they had all but reached the lowest rate, and that an excellent opportunity presented itself of providing a quantity of rails at lower prices than they could in all probability be obtained for at any future period."

" Early in August, 1874, the Chief Engineer mentioned the matter to the Minister of Public Works, and advised that steps should be taken to secure such quantity as might be deemed advisable. On the 13th of the same month he renewed his recommendation, and furnished a draft specification to be acted on if thought best.

" The Chief Engineer was absent from Ottawa until near the end of September, when he again renewed his recommendation to secure the rails.

" A notice calling for tenders on the 8th of October, was advertised on the 29th of September. On the 3rd of October, the time was extended for receiving tenders until the 16th November, and specifications, dated October 3rd, were printed; by the latter, a copy of which is attached hereto, it was provided that tenders would be received on the 16th November, following.

" It was felt that to advertise for tenders for rails for the Pacific Railway, or for any considerable portion of it, would defeat the object in view, viz :—to secure rails at a low rate, and, hence the character of the advertisement and specifications,—' Pacific Railway ' is not mentioned in either, and tenders for a large quantity are not invited.

" Tenders for the delivery of 350,000 tons were received, the prices ranging from $53.53 to $82.73 per ton, delivered in Montreal.

" The average rate was $57 per ton.

" The lowest tenders were :—

From Cox & Green, for West Cumberland Co .....	$53.53 per ton
From Jos. Robinson, for Ebbw Co.....	53.53 "
From Cooper, Fairman & Co., for Mersey Co.....	54.26 "
From Post & Co., for Guest & Co.....	54.62 "

" Contracts were entered into with these parties at the above prices for all the rails they were willing to deliver, viz :—

West Cumberland Co.....	5,000 tons
Ebbw Vale Co.....	5,000 "
Mersey Co.....	20,000 "
Guest & Co .....	10,000 "

Total..... 40,000 "
 Hon. Mr. Scott.

" In addition to the above, it was arranged to accept the most favorable terms for the delivery of rails f. o. b., in England, for transportation to British Columbia. Accordingly contracts were made as follows :—

" West Cumberland Company, F. O. B., 5,000 tons at.....	$48.67 per ton
" Naylor, Benson & Co., 5,000 at.....	51.10 "

" It may be stated that it is no uncommon occurrence to secure rails for a great public work in advance of the time that they can be used.

" The case of the Intercolonial Railway might be mentioned. On the 21st November, 1870, tenders were received for steel rails, and it was stipulated that they should be delivered as follows :—

6 000 tons must be ready for shipment not later than 15th March, 1871.
6,000 tons by the 15th July, 1871.
10 000 tons by the 15th March 1872.
10 000 tons by the 15th April, 1872.
8,000 tons by the 15th May, 1872.

40 000 tons—Total 1872.

" Thus, it will be seen that 12,000 tons were to have been ready by the 15th July, 1871, while the quantity actually laid during the whole of 1871 was only 1,092 tons.

" Again, the whole 40,000 tons required for the Intercolonial Railway were to have been ready by the 15th May, 1872; while the quantity actually laid eighteen months afterwards, viz : to the end of 1873, was less than 15,000 tons, and the whole quantity contracted for in 1870, was not actually used before the end of 1875.

" The geographical position of the Pacific Railway is so different from that of the Intercolonial, that there is far greater necessity for an early purchase of the rails in the one case than the other.

" On the Intercolonial, the line can be approached by sea-going vessels at many points, while the Pacific Railway is a long way inland, and it is consequently a difficult and expensive matter getting the rails taken forward to points where they can be used, involving a great deal of delay.

" It is not always advisable to wait until an article is wanted before it be secured—an enormous additional expense may be, and often is, the consequence of such a policy.

" In building railways, a degree of foresight is indispensable. This is especially the case in a railway situated like the Pacific line. If the purchase of rails was put off until the roadbed was ready for them, a much larger price would almost certainly have to be paid, not only for the rails, but also for their transportation.

"There can be no doubt that the mode and time of purchase of the rails was by all considered most judicious. In the public interests nothing could have been more carefully considered."

"If it should have turned out contrary to all expectations that the price of rails has not rebounded to its former high rate, this circumstance cannot in any way detract from the provident intention of the whole transaction."

"(Signed),

"SANDFORD FLEMING,
"Chief Engineer."

Had the purchase of Intercolonial rails been put off about a year, the increase would have been about £2 per ton, which would amount to $400,000; if put off two years the increase, £5 per ton on the whole purchase, would amount to $1,000,000. I would direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to the prices paid for the Intercolonial Railway steel rails by the late Government. They paid to the Barron Steel Company at the rate of $58.30 per ton for 37,585 tons, delivered in Canada; to the Ebbw Vale Company, $60.07 per ton for 7,000 tons; and to Hawes & Co. as high as $80 per ton.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Was there any contract for that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The latter, I believe, was without tender, and there was 2½ per cent. on one side, and 4½ on the other side for commission. I have read to the House the recommendation of Mr. Fleming, the Engineer-in-Chief of the Pacific Railway, in which he had urged upon the Premier in an earnest manner the advisability of buying steel rails for the road at a time when rails were lower than they had ever been known to be before. He had also urged his experience in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, where, if the rails had not been ordered long in advance of the time they were required, a much larger sum would have been necessary to purchase the amount that was wanted for the road.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Did Mr. Fleming recommend the purchase of any particular quantity?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He does not say anything about it in this paper, but I have no doubt he was fully aware of the amount that was being contracted for. The hon. gentleman seems to think that the publication of the advertisement calling for tenders was too short, although the notice was extended six weeks from the expiry of the first notice. The Minister himself seems to have thought eight days' notice was too short, and he extended the time another six weeks.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Was it not at the suggestion of houses in Montreal?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think so, but probably it would not have made any difference if they had not suggested it. All the houses who were engaged in the steel rails business had their agents in Montreal, and were in daily communication with the head offices, so that an extended notice was not necessary.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—There were twenty or thirty competitors for the contract in consequence of the extension of time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it militates against the position of the Government in any sense. The Premier was only too glad to consider any suggestion that in the opinion of practical men was necessary to give the manufacturers ample notice. The tenders that came in afforded most conclusive evidence that the manufacturers all over the world had ample notice. There were upwards of thirty companies tendered for the contract, chiefly from England, some from the United States and one from Belgium. The quantity offered was 350,000 tons, showing that we had the best markets to choose from. Although the hon. gentleman alluded a great deal to Cooper, Fairman & Co., I do not think he endeavored to establish the point that their tender on behalf of the Mersey Company, as their agents, could in any way be criticized. I explained just now that their's was one of the low tenders; that it was a few cents higher than Cox & Green's proposition; that the latter would not agree to take a contract to supply a larger quantity than 10,000 tons, and that it had been necessary to take the next highest tender and give them the balance.

Hon. Mr. READ—If the hon. gentleman will show any correspondence to the effect that Cox & Green were ever asked to take the whole quantity, and declined, I would like to see it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not desire to delay the House by turning up the authority now, but I am quite satisfied that they were made the offer; I am satisfied that the Premier made the statement in the other Chamber that Cox & Green were asked to take the whole quantity, and they had declined. Mr. Workman had been authorized to make that statement also.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—They had been told in the meantime that the quantity would not be wanted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think not.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—They were telegraphed to on the 22nd of December that no more steel rails were wanted.

Hon. SCOTT—That was after the date for receiving tenders had expired. The tenders had to be dealt with when they were received. Hon. gentlemen who have the statement before them will see that those tenders were the lowest and the Minister was advised to accept them. The statement of Mr. Fleming to that effect will be found in the blue book. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman imputed any impropriety there?

Hon. Mr. READ—I did not impute any impropriety in awarding the contract for 20,000 tons to Cooper, Fairman & Co. for which they had tendered, but I do impute improper conduct in giving them a contract for 5,000 tons more without tenders being called for.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understood the hon. gentleman's charge to be that Cooper Fairman & Co., received a contract for nuts, bolts and fishplates without tenders being asked for. The greatest point I understood him to make was that the contract for the nuts and bolts was originally allotted to the Mersey Company, and that it had subsequently been given to the Patent Nut & Bolt Company. The explanation of it is this:—Under the specification no tender for rails could be accepted unless the parties tendering were prepared to furnish the proportionate quantity of fishplates, bolts, and nuts, as provided in the following clauses in the specification:—;

"Tenders to be for not less than 5,000 tons of rails, with the proportionate quantity of fish-plates, bolts, and nuts."

"In the delivery of the rails the proportionate quantity of fish-plates, bolts and nuts must be made with each shipment, or previously."
Hon. Mr. Scott.

That was a sine qua non. The printed return shows the proposition of the Mersey Company to have been as follows:—

"PUBLIC WORKS OF CANADA.

TENDER FOR FISH-JOINTED BESSEMER STEEL RAILS.

"The undersigned hereby tender to deliver on the wharf, at Montreal, during the season of navigation, in the year 1875, in accordance with the annexed specification and conditions, five to ten thousand Bessemer steel rails, with proportionate quantity of fish-joints, at the following rates;—

Per ton of 2,240 pounds—Bessemer steel rails and fish-plates at £11 3s. 0d. sterling; iron bolts and nuts at $101 currency.

The undersigned are ready to enter into contract for the manufacture and delivery of the above rails and fastenings, or so much thereof as may be required, and will satisfy the Minister of Public Works as to their ability to complete contract.

"The Mersey Steel and Iron Company,
"of Liverpool.

"Per COOPER & FAIRMAN,
"Agents,
"Montreal."

It was in accordance with the clause of the specification to which I have already referred, that tender was accepted by the Department, in the following letter:—

"GENTLEMEN,— "OTTAWA, 2nd Dec. 1874.

"The tenders you have made on behalf of "The Mersey Steel and Iron Company" of Liverpool, for the supply of steel rails, &c., having been accepted, I am directed to send you the enclosed draft articles of agreement, and to request you to have the kindness to have them executed by the Company, and to then return them to me.

"Messrs. COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.,
"Agents, Montreal."

Hon. Mr. READ—There is nothing about nuts and bolts there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The specification on which they tendered was just the same as that sent to all the others, and nothing is said about the nuts and bolts in accepting any of the tenders.

Hon. Mr. READ—The West Cumberland Company did not furnish them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They undertook to furnish them as the specification required, and the contracts were given only to parties who agreed to furnish the rails and the proportionate quantity of fish-plates, nuts and bolts with them. In the Mersey Company's proposition, the nuts and bolts were tendered at a certain price, and the Government accepted that proposition. I have established that it was part of the specification that the contract for the fish-plates, nuts, and bolts, should go only to the parties who supplied the rails. The object was that they should be made to fit the rails, and in order that no mistake might arise, it was provided that the maker of the rails should also furnish the connections to bolt them together.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—That is not in the advertisement calling for tenders.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is in the specifications that were sent to all who applied for them, and any proposition that did not conform to those specifications was not a tender and could not be accepted by the Department. Had any other course been taken; if the Department after issuing those specifications had accepted rails from one party and nuts and bolts from another, the hon. gentlemen opposite would have been the first to condemn the Government, and they would have very justly considered it was highly improper for the Government not to hold themselves bound by their own terms. Cooper, Fairman & Co. acting for the Mersey Company tendered on that specification, and offered to supply the fish-plates, nuts and bolts for $101 per ton, and that offer was accepted. Subsequently when the contract came in from Cooper Fairman & Co., the Department discovered that the company had struck out this item, whereupon Mr. Braun wrote them as follows:—

"OTTAWA, 18th February, 1875.

"GENTLEMEN,—The supply of bolts and nuts required in connection with the contract of the Mersey Steel and Iron Co., for 20,000 tons of steel rails required by the Government of Canada, having been omitted from the contract, I am to acquaint you for the information of said company, that their tender for the same at $101 per ton, delivered at Montreal at the same time as the rails, is accepted.

"Secretary.

"Messrs. COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.,
"Montreal."

Hon. Mr. Scott.

On the second March following, Cooper, Fairman & Co., wrote to the Department the following letter:—

"MONTREAL, 2nd March, 1875.

"DEAR SIR,—In the contract for steel rails, &c., with the Mersey Steel and Iron Company, they make strong objections against having bolts and nuts included in their contract, and they were accordingly left out. The price was to have been ($101) one hundred and one dollars per gross ton, delivered in bond at Montreal."

"We, as agents for Messrs. Robb & Co., of the Toronto Bolt and Nut Works, beg to supply the Laird bolts and nuts as per sample bolt, to be furnished by the Inspector, Mr. C. P. Sandberg of London, the price to be ($101) one hundred and one dollars per gross ton, duty paid, delivered in Montreal or Toronto.

We are, dear sir,
Yours, &c.,

(Signed),

COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.,
Agents for Robb & Co.
The Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa.

Now, I ask hon. gentlemen whether the Government or the Minister of Public Works in deciding to accept that proposition did not follow the course that any other gentleman under similar circumstances, would have pursued? Here was a proposition by the agents of the Mersey Company to fill a contract according to specification. When the time comes the agent says the company are not prepared to carry it out, but another company, having their headquarters in Toronto, are prepared to take their place; not only are they prepared to give the fish plates, nuts and bolts for $101 per ton, the same price at which the Mersey Company offered them, but to deliver them duty free.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—What was the duty?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Five per cent.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—On rails?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; only on fish-plates, bolts, and nuts. So that it made a difference of $5.05 per ton in favor of the Government. The Minister, having no other proposition before him, allowed the fish-plates, bolts, and nuts to be furnished through the same agent, who had the contract for the rails, at a less price. But the hon. gentleman says, "There was an independent bid from Mr. Darling, of Montreal, for these fish-plates, etc." My answer is this: Mr. Darling did not put in a tender in conformity with the specification. He dropped the steel rails altogether, and put in a tender for the fish-plates, bolts, and nuts only, although the specification required that the parties who furnished rails should also supply a proportionate quantity of fish-plates, bolts and nuts. As Mark Twain says, "When all this matter is boiled down, we will see how very little there is in it." Mr. Darling's tender was one that could not be accepted. He coupled it with a number of conditions that could not be acceded to, as will be seen by his letter:—

"30 ST. SULPICE STREET,
MONTREAL, 16th Nov., 1874.

"SIR,—In reference to the tenders for rails and fastenings asked for in your circular of the 3rd ult., we regret to say, that as regards rails, a reply has not reached us, although we have reason to suppose it has been despatched, and we look for a communication by telegraph on the subject from hour to hour.

"As to fish-bolts and nuts, we are prepared to supply them, delivered on the wharf here, at £19 sterling per ton of 2,240 lbs., no charge for packages, with the understanding that we pay no duty upon the goods, and that the Government assume all the risk that cannot be covered by the ordinary policy of insurance. Payment to be made in accordance with terms mentioned in your circular.

"Immediately on receipt of a reply regarding rails, we shall take the liberty of communicating with you on the subject.

"We are yours faithfully,

"(Signed), WM. DARLING & Co.

"F. BRAUN, ESQ., Secretary,
Public Works Department,
Ottawa.

"In explanation of the risk referred to, of which we desire to be held free, we may say, that under the ordinary policy of insurance, damage by sea-water where the ship is not burnt or stranded is at the owner's risk. Such risk may be insured against by a policy covering 'all risks': that is not usual, and would involve an additional expense of about two per cent. If it be desired to have the goods insured 'all risks,' we would undertake to do so, charging the difference in the premium, as compared with the premium free of particular average, this would make the price about £19 7s. 6d. per ton."

That is the proposition of Mr. Darling, who agrees to furnish fish-plates, bolts and nuts at $94.28 per ton, independent of the rails. Some companies who furnished rails were paid for fish-plates, bolts and nuts as high as $114 per ton. My hon. friend took no exception to that, although one company was actually paid $117 per ton. But it did not suit the hon. gentleman to refer to that case, as he could not make a point out of it; but because Cooper, Fairman & Co.'s position was peculiar, he seeks to throw discredit upon this transaction. Taking the rate of exchange at 9½, Mr. Darling's offer would be $94.28 per ton for fish plates, bolts and nuts. The price paid to Cooper, Fairman, & Co., taking the duty off in order to make both equal, would be $95.05 per ton, which would practically be a difference of 77 cents per ton between those two tenders. If hon. gentlemen will follow me out a little further they will see what this amounts to. Taking the difference of 70 cents per ton on the whole quantity, between the lowest tender and the price paid, it would only amount to $122.20, on which sum Cooper, Fairman & Co. would be entitled to about $5 as their commission. When we consider all that has been said in reference to this transaction; after all that we have heard in this Chamber, on the hustings, and through the press of the country, charges of corruption and improper collusion with Cooper, Fairman & Co. in reference to those nuts, bolts and steel rails, hon. gentlemen will be surprised, after it has been thoroughly analyzed and the truth has been got at, to find that there is only a matter of four or five dollars concerned in the whole transaction. Hon. gentlemen want a scandal badly when they have to fall back on such a small piece of business as this. I think it has been decided in the Court of Chancery in England that the sum of money improperly obtained by one of the contractors for steel rails on the Intercolonial Railway was $50,000, and a judgment had already been rendered against the parties.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—How does that bear on this question?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was a steel rails' purchase.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—This is a Pacific Railway Scandal.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The whole secret of this alleged collusion between the Minister of Public Works and Cooper, Fair-man & Co. is the allegation that the Minister's brother has been in some way interested with Cooper, Fairman & Co. That has been repeated over and over again, notwithstanding that from the first hour that the statement was made, the Minister himself denounced it as a lie, and telegraphed a contradiction to Montreal. From that day to this those gentlemen who have repeated so frequently the statement outside,—although they meet him in the House of Commons, where there is as strong a party feeling to-day as can possibly exist in any Legislative Assembly—have not dared to put forward the allegation that there was any impropriety whatever between Cooper, Fairman & Co. and the Minister in relation to the Premier's brother. Ample opportunity was afforded to thoroughly investigate the whole matter by calling for a committee and summoning witnesses to be examined under oath, but it did not suit the purpose of hon. gentlemen opposite to do so.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Premier of this Dominion has been slandered throughout the length and breadth of the land, because those who made the allegations did not dare to prove them. They knew if they attempted to do so they would be deprived of the slender consolation of repeating their slanders throughout the country.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They knew if they had brought it up it would have been met at the very outset by a refutation, and they would have been deprived of the little advantage which in their own estimation they have, by circulating an untruth of this kind. The gentleman attacked, is, of course, the Premier, and let us see what he said of it at a public meeting in the city of Montreal:—

“ You referred to-night, Mr. Chairman, very briefly to the steel rail business—(hear, hear and laughter)—and the result of it in Montreal was that one man who seemed to deserve it was ridden upon a rail himself. (Laughter.) Now, Sir, I have a word or two to say about that, because I see that some papers not friendly and some papers that are friendly have mistaken one portion of my letter. The newspaper charge was that I bought from a firm in Montreal, of which my brother was a member, 40,000 tons of steel rails. My reply was that I did not buy rails from any firm in Montreal; that tenders were publicly advertised for, and contracts were given out after more than a month's notice. I stated simply in addition, not that it was at all necessary to the other part, that besides this, no brother or relation of mine ever in any way, directly or indirectly, received or would receive one cent profit (Hear, hear.) Now, mind you, the charge was that I bought them of a firm in Montreal, and my denial was that I did not buy them from any firm in Montreal. The course was pressed upon the Government by Mr. Sandford Fleming, in consequence of the exceedingly low state of the market. After considering the matter for some days I acceded, and the quantity was subsequently increased, owing to the then favorable state of the market. If there was a fair transaction, upon this earth it was this transaction and these people know it, and when I said the statement in the Gazette was “ a deliberate falsehood ” I said it because Mr. White knew that tenders were on the table of the House of Commons weeks and months before a single rail was shipped in England or delivered in this country—(loud applause)—and the attempt to make a side assertion as to whether my brother was legally or illegally a partner, was a most reckless one. (Hear, hear.) I hold that he had a perfect right to be a principal of the firm who took the contract; he had as good a right to contract in his own name, individually, if he thought proper, as any one in the Dominion, and I vindicate that right; but I said in the communication, as a matter of fact, that he was not interested, not as a matter that wanted defending. (Hear, hear, and applause.) I see that it has been stated since, that it was a bad transaction. Well, that is fair criticism. I believe it was a very good transaction. (Laughter and applause.) “ Well,” it is said, “ they were bought too soon.” I don't think they were. (Applause.) If we had succeeded in getting the Minnesota people to lay their portion to the boundary, the rails would at this moment have been laid down to Winnipeg. We will be able next year to lay 100 miles of these rails between Lake Superior at a cheaper rate than ever a railway was built on this continent. (Hear, hear.) Still I don't object to criticism on the policy of buying the rails; I admit it is fair criticism, and I am prepared to meet it on the floor of the House of Commons. (Loud applause.) That I don't object to; but I do object to insinuations against a Minister or Administration, upon supposition. (Hear, hear.) It was worse than that, for they knew what they were saying. (Hear, hear.)”

Now, if we turn to the Commons Hansard of 1876, we see that the Premier again refers to the matter in the following terms:—

“ In an article published in the Montreal Gazette,” he had been charged with purchasing 40,000 tons of steel rails from a firm in that city, of which his brother was a partner. He had characterized the statement then, as he did now, as a deliberate falsehood. He considered a purchase meant going into some person's office, and buying a quantity of anything at a price agreed upon, there and then; but this was no more a purchase than the contracts given out on the canals. Tenders had been deliberately advertised for and received, and contracts were entered into with those who offered to supply the rails at the lowest prices. The practice of his Department was to let his chief officers open the tenders, and it was only when the tenders were afterwards brought before him with the recommendation of his chief officers that they were dealt with. He invariably took the lowest, and in accordance with that practice Mr. Trudeau placed himself in communication with Messrs. Cox & Green, the lowest tenderers, and they were offered the whole lot at the same price, but they refused to take them. They then passed on to the next lowest. It was the usual practice of iron firms in England to act through agents in this country. The Government did not receive a single tender from any of the principals in England. There were two from manufacturers in the United States. He believed all or nearly all of the tenders were sent in through agents.

“Hon. Mr. Mackenzie—Said he had declined to make any contracts with agents. The contracts were sent to England for approval, and deposits were made as security for the performance of them, and then they were signed. Greater care could not possibly have been taken to guard the public interest and ensure the fulfilment of these contracts.

“As to the wisdom of making the purchase at that particular time, he would say that he had been guided by the views of prominent officers in his Department, when they at all accorded with his own, and he had never seen any reason to deviate from the rule. The Chief Engineer had advised the purchase as absolutely necessary. They discussed the matter for many days, and he came to the conclusion that the Chief Engineer was right.”

Now let us see what Cooper, Fairman & Co. said, when this allegation first appeared, that Charles Mackenzie was a member of the firm when they tendered for the steel rails. They wrote to the Montreal Gazette the following letter:

“To the Editor of the Gazette.

“Sir,—With respect to the charge made by Mr. White against the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, of having favored Mr. Chas. Mackenzie by improperly awarding a contract for steel rails to the firm of Cooper, Fairman & Co., in which firm the said Mr. Charles Mackenzie was interested, we wish to state distinctly that Mr. White's assertion is totally and unquestionably untrue. Mr. Charles Mackenzie was interested in the late firm of James Cooper & Co. in 1872, and for a time in the firm of Cooper, Fairman & Co., but he ceased to have any interest in the latter sometime ago, and has never benefited by, nor participated in the slightest degree in any of the contracts to which Mr. White alluded. So far as Cooper and Fairman are concerned, we would state that they have merely acted as agents in all these transactions, the contracts having been awarded to large firms in England, from which firms all the tenders to the Government came direct. Far from having been favored in these awards, we know of two other houses who obtained contracts at higher prices than those given to the English houses which Cooper, Fairman & Co. represent, this being the best possible proof that these latter were justly entitled to the award of contracts on their own merits.”
Hon. Mr. Scott.

Subsequently the charge was renewed, and the following letter was received by the firm in reply:—

To the Editor of “The Gazette.”

“Sir,—Your article in reference to our firm makes us once more, and for the last time, recur to the matter. You say that the dissolution of the firm in which Mr. Charles Mackenzie was a partner, has not been registered. That turns out to be true, by the oversight of the professional gentleman who had the matter in hand. The failure to register from the same cause is known not to be unusual, and, if you had looked a little further, you would have found evidence of the truth in the registration of the new firm without Mr. Charles Mackenzie's name being in it. Owing to the absence of our Mr. Fairman in England from the months of December to March last, it was impossible to take the formal steps for closing the partnership, long before determined upon, till the 30th April last, so that Mr. Mackenzie was nominally a partner until that time, but, we repeat, he had no interest whatever in our business since December last. And we wish you, and the public to understand the contract made by the Canadian Government was made direct with the Mersey Steel and Iron Company, and the payments are made to them in London, England, by the representative of the Canadian Government. We are employed here by the Mersey Steel and Iron Company to receive the rails, pay the ocean freights, and make proper delivery to the Government on behalf of the company, and are not known in any other capacity to any member of the Dominion Government, and we would further state, in conclusion, that no portion of our commission was earned or received until long after Mr. Mackenzie had ceased to have any interest in our business.”

The whole thing was discussed; it was shown that the whole attack was made under the hollow guise that the dissolution of partnership had not been registered. It is very unfair that a gentleman occupying the position of Premier of this country, after denouncing this charge as an unqualified falsehood when it first appeared, should continue to be slandered by gentlemen in the way that he has been, unless they were prepared on the floor of Parliament to ask for a committee to enquire into the truth of their allegations and summon witnesses and haer their evidence under oath.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Premier himself would never have refused it. He would gladly have sent it before a committee where it could have been thoroughly analyzed so as to remove any doubt that might exist in the minds of the most prejudiced as to the propriety of this whole transaction. But it did not suit the purposes of those who deal in miserable calumnies of this kind to have the unvarnished truth come out freed from falsehood. I think it was due to his position—apart from his being leader of a great political party in this country—that whatever our political feelings may be towards each other we ought not to throw discredit upon the character of the men who are charged with the administration of our public affairs, unless there is some foundation upon which to base the charge.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—Was not the fact of the non registration of the dissolution of partnership sufficient ground for stating that Mr. Charles Mackenzie was still a member of the firm of Cooper, Fairman & Co.?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not after it was explained—and the hon. gentleman knows it as a lawyer—that there are often circumstances beyond the control of professional men charged with the management of such matters, to prevent the registration from being made until long after such dissolutions take place. The dissolution in this case had been made before this steel rails contract had been given, and the new articles of partnership between Cooper, Fairman & Co. had been registered, in which Mr. Charles Mackenzie's name did not appear, long anterior to that date.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—If an action had been taken before a court against that firm previous to the registration of the dissolution of partnership, would it not have been sustained against Charles Mackenzie as a partner?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are not discussing a hair-splitting question as lawyers

Hon. Mr. Scott.

now. I am discussing it on a very much broader ground, as a question affecting the integrity of the Premier of this country, a question that will recommend itself to every unprejudiced mind, that no charge should be made against the character of our public men unless there is the very best grounds for doing so.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—I quite agree with the hon. Secretary of State when he speaks of the consideration that is due to the Premier, and I would be very glad to see the same consideration extended by hon. gentlemen to some other Premiers who are as worthy of it as Mr. Mackenzie.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I first took this case, and I dissected it as if Mr. Charles Mackenzie had been a member of that firm, and I ask the unprejudiced members of this House whether there was anything in that transaction that justified the allegations of collusion, or that any corrupt motive had been exhibited in awarding the contract to Cooper, Fairman & Co. ? I took the broad ground that, assuming he was a member of that firm, was there any impropriety in awarding them the contract for those fish-plates, bolts and nuts at a rate of $122 above the lowest tender, by which they were benefited only some four or five dollars as their commission? I then showed that the dissolution of partnership had taken place anterior to the time of the transaction with the Government, and a new partnership had been signed and registered, and Mr. Charles Mackenzie's name was left out.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—Still that did not change the position of the firm before the public.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But the firm were in a position to deny the partnership. Mr. Mackenzie denied it, and everybody connected with the affair denied it, and no more unqualified contradiction could have been given to the assertion. I say that after all those denials I do think it is most unfortunate that this thing should be repeated here over and over again, as if it had never been answered or refuted, or as if an explanation had never been given; in fact, as if the parties most affected were not prepared at any time to allow a committee of the House to be struck, and the most searching enquiry to be made into the whole transaction. It is most unfortunate that public affairs have come to such a pass that the character of the Premier should be assailed on so slight a suspicion. He is the chief man of the country, and while he is in that position he ought at least to have the halo of a good name and a good fame thrown around him by the people of Canada, provided nothing can be established to damage or destroy his reputation. Flying rumors ought not to be taken, or reports that any prejudiced mind chooses to start should not be accepted as gospel truth, especially after they are denied at the very outset, and after the closest enquiry is challenged. It was the duty of the parties who made this charge when the challenge was given, to call for a committee of enquiry. But has this statement ever been brought face to face to the Premier in the other Chamber? It never has been to this hour, and that I think ought to be the best and most reasonable proof that the gentleman who made the charge did not believe it had any foundation. There are a great many other points in this question, but I have dealt at considerable length with them already, and if I have left anything unexplained, at a future stage of the debate I may return to it. I will not go over the ground again, because I know it is not a subject sufficiently attractive to the House to occupy their time at any length. I have endeavored to be as brief as possible. I am quite aware that I might have given very much fuller explanations of the position I have taken, but I am not one of those who are prone to enlarge and dilate too much upon matters which hon. gentlemen and themselves are as familiar with as I am, and who will be guided in their conclusions, not by what I say or what the hon. gentleman who introduced this motion will say, but will be actuated by broader and more statesman-like views than any that have been brought forward from time to time on this great and important subject.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—I have been called upon somewhat abruptly to answer some remarks of the hon. Secretary of State, and in doing so I shall be as brief as possible, though I cannot allow this debate to pass without, at least, putting on record, an expression of the opinions which I hold on this subject. Hon. genlemen have always forgotten to take into account the amount of money that has been lost to the country by protracting those debates on the wrong-doings and shortcomings of the Government of the day in elaborate speeches and cunningly devised arguments; but of all the bad transactions that have ever blurred the escutcheon of any Government that has administered the affairs of this country, the worst is the steel rails bungle. The hon. Secretary of State seems to think that men who occupy high positions must necessarily be above suspicion. I contend that they should not, under any circumstances, be above criticism. The hon. gentleman would have us think the Premier was like the Mikado of Japan, too sacred to be looked upon by ordinary mortals, or like Caesar's wife, above suspicion. But, while such appeals are made to us on behalf of the Premier by his colleagues and supporters, they are everlastingly talking "Pacific Scandal" to us. The hon. Secretary of State seems to think that because the Premier denies the charges made against him, it is simply dishonorable to repeat them, but are we to believe such denials against the most convincing evidence? Have we not the history of some of his colleagues to justify us in believing them to be capable of acts which would not bear investigation? We can all remember the letter-stealing case, the copper pyrites fraud, and other transactions of a similar character, and yet, while they ask us to remain silent upon these subjects, they are never weary of repeating charges against Sir John Macdonald, which have not only never been substantiated, but have been distinctly disproved by the clearest evidence. And what has been the record of the hon. Secretary of State himself that he should lecture us as to the manner in which we should speak of his colleague? We can all remember when he threw off the Speaker's gown in the Ontario Legislature and came here to become a colleague of his life-long opponents, and we witness to-day the spectacle of a gentleman of his education and experience so far forgetting the proprieties of constitutional government as to continue to hold a portfolio and draw a salary as a member of a Cabinet to whom, on a most important question, he is opposed. For the first time in seven years I feel the least bit angry that

hon. gentlemen occupying the positions that we do should be told that the railway arrangement with British Columbia was an impossible bargain, after I have maintained on the floor of this House and elsewhere, that it was a bargain that could be fulfilled, not by this Government, but rather by the policy of the previous Administration. The fact is, the ten years' condition, as every one knows, only meant that Canada should do the best she could, and nothing more was expected of her. Instead of setting themselves seriously to work to carry out this obligation, however, the Government have undertaken a series of public works that their predecessors had not pledged them to, and they have gone on building Fort Francis Locks, branch railways and engineers' houses, and wasting money in steel rails purchases, while their Pacific Railway policy is yet undetermined. Everything the Government have projected in connection with it is characterized by the most stupendous stupidity. Seven years have been frittered away in this manner, and enormous sums of money have been wasted, the vouchers for which, I am told, fill immense boxes, and are so voluminous that no man could wade through them in a life time; yet, all we have to show for them is some miles of telegraph wire and piles of steel rails scattered throughout the country, corroding for want of use. The hon. Secretary of State has told us that the Canada Pacific Railway could never be a competing line with the Central and Union Pacific road, and that even the latter did not pay working expenses. I have it from undoubted authority that the Union Pacific Railway is a paying enterprise.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—They had eight millions of dollars clear profit in 1875.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—According to the testimony of our engineers, we have an easier line for our railway and a shorter route than the American line, and we have a vast amount of country to be opened up, which, with its healthy climate and rich soil, will be the support of a vigorous race of people in the future, the germs of settlement having been already scattered throughout that territory. All that is needed to send a very large population in there is, railway communication. No other man in public life could have been so marvellously stupid in his desire to depart from the policy of his predecessors, as the Premier was when he inaugurated the scheme known as "The Water Stretches," and the day he made his Sarnia Speech these words should have been emblazoned on his banner, not in letters of gold, but in steel rails rust, such as the sample I now produce, which I have scraped from a pile now oxidizing on the Pacific Slope. (Here the hon. Senator walked up to the table and laid upon it a sample of iron rust.)

Hon. Mr. PENNY moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC REGULATION BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF THE AMENDMENTS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the adoption of the amendments made by Committee of the Whole House to Bill "J" An Act respecting the traffic in intoxicating liquors.

On the 99th Section, sub-section 5.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL suggested that it should be amended so as to permit the sale of lager beer in quantities of not less than eight gallons, as lager beer casks usually contained that quantity.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. PENNY contended that cider should be included in this clause. As the Act stood, the sale of cider was prohibited.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said farmers would not be prevented from selling cider. Under the Dunkin Act, from which this clause was taken, they had always been allowed to sell cider in any quantity.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN contended there should be no doubt as to the meaning of the clause.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said the effect of this clause would be to prohibit the sale of cider in any quantity. If the sale of cider and beer were allowed, it seemed to him the Bill would commend itself much more to the common sense of the people.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS thought the difficulty was met in this way. Cider when sold by the farmers was in a fresh state and was not intoxicating. Consequently this Act would not restrict or prohibit the sale of it in any quantity.

Hon. Mr. PENNY said, suppose it were intoxicating, why not put it in as good a position as whiskey? He looked upon it that there was such a difference between cider and whiskey as there was between chess and cards. A man could stake money upon the result of a game of chess just as well as upon a game of cards, but if he wanted to gamble, he would take the cards. In the same way while a man could become intoxicated from the use of cider if he wanted to get drunk he would use whiskey.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL contended that unless the clause were amended, the sale of cider would be absolutely prohibited. Why should it not be put in the same position as brandy or whiskey.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said the clause as it stood made cider a contraband article altogether: it ceased to be an article of legitimate commerce.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the farmer could dispose of any amount of cider he might make himself, but if the clause should be amended as suggested, it would limit the quantity he would be allowed to sell.

After some further discussion,

The clause was amended to provide that the producer of cider might sell cider of his own manufacture, in quantities of not less than ten gallons at any one time.

Hon. Mr. Penny.

On the 109th clause, providing for the destruction of liquors seized.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER asked, why not destroy the whole quantity seized?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL wished to know if the hon. gentleman would have all the liquor in a wholesale merchant's cellar destroyed in case of seizure?

An Hon. Gentleman—Yes, the whole of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT suggested that the quantity should be limited to twenty gallons.

After a brief discussion, this suggestion was adopted, and the clause was amended accordingly.

On the 105th clause, providing:

“If such prosecution is brought before any two other Justices of the Peace, the summons shall be signed by one of them; and no other Justice shall sit or take part therein, unless by reason of their absence, or the absence of one of them, nor yet in the latter case, unless with the assent of the other of them.”

Hon. Mr. READ suggested that the right of appeal should be allowed in such cases.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said this was simply a provision to enable those who were in favor of this law, to choose magistrates who would be favorable to their own views. The hon. Secretary of State and the hon. Senator from Sarnia would hardly venture to say that all the virtue to this law would disregard their oaths and refuse to enforce it.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL said this provision in the Dunkin Act had been found to work well. It was not new and it had been found very necessary.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL thought there was just as good reason to suspect the fairness of extreme advocates of the law, as of those who opposed it.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS said it was assumed that two magistrates must be either liquor or anti-liquor men, when one might be favorable to the law, and the other opposed to it, or neither of them might take an extreme view of the question.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said the complainant could choose the magistrate he wished to bring the case before, and one could readily imagine the course that would be pursued in such a case.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS believed if a magistrate were known to be an upright, impartial man he would be the first one selected to try such cases.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL said it was just such a provision as this that would show to the House and country the absurdity of enacting a law of this character. He was tired of hearing Ontario referred to so often as though it were the only virtuous Province in the Dominion. He observed by a paragraph in the Toronto Mail that of 71 convicts in the Kingston Penitentiary, 20 were total abstainers, and 20 were intemperate.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS.—What about the rest?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the reason why Ontario was so often mentioned was the fact that the Dunkin Act, which was somewhat similar to this measure, had been in force in that Province for fourteen years, and it was natural that the experience gained during that period should be cited in this discussion. He did not suppose this Act would disturb the hon. Senator from British Columbia. That was too free a country to adopt such legislation. In Nova Scotia there was an excellent license law in force, which worked very well, and in Quebec there was a very wise municipal law in operation. In those Provinces it was not likely this measure would be adopted and, therefore, Ontario was, practically, the Province most interested in its passage.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—Judging from the number of total abstainers in Kingston Penitentiary one would suppose a measure was necessary to prevent total abstinence.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—You have stated that out of 71 convicts 20 were total abstainers and 20 drunkards; please explain what the balance were.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—There were 31 temperate people. What I want to show is that the drunkards and the total abstainers furnished an equal number of criminals.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER said two-thirds of all the commitments in the Recorder's Court in Montreal were the result of drunkenness.
Hon. Mr. Campbell.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD thought Manitoba was as deeply interested as Ontario in the passage of this law.

Hon. Mr. MILLER was not disposed to find fault with the 105th clause. He did not desire to reflect on the magistracy of the country, but it could not be denied that a large number of persons had been appointed who were unfit to discharge the important functions of their office, and he was not sure whether it would be wise to allow the hearing of complaints of this kind to be brought indiscriminately before any magistrates in a county. While he would set his face against encouraging frivolous appeals, he did not feel disposed, where the Act was so stringent and tyrannical in some of its features, to have the liberties of the people under the absolute control of any two magistrates that might be chosen to carry out the law, without any revision by a Superior Court.

Hon. Mr. HOWLAN considered the 105th clause a very good one. If by chance or design a case be brought before a partizan, he could not act without the assistance of another magistrate.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND said the objection was that the two magistrates were to be selected by the prosecutor himself, and he thought it was likely he would choose men who were prohibitionists. There was to be no appeal. It was a monstrous proposition.

Hon. Mr. HOWLAN said he could find nothing in the Act which gave the prosecutor the right of selecting the two magistrates.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said that was the effect of it.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT said he had voted for a prohibitory law in New Brunswick, and he had witnessed the troubles that grew out of it while it was in operation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was not a permissive bill.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT said it was total prohibition. He was sure every member of the Senate would do all that he could to abolish intemperance, but an extreme course would simply produce a reaction against the temperance movement. He would vote for this Bill, but he hoped it would not be made so severe as to injure the cause it was designed to promote.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH said he had, in his practice in the Courts, known of a good many appeals from decisions of magistrates in cases such as were likely to arise under this measure, and it frequently happened that the magistrate was counsel, judge and jury. By allowing the right of appeal it would deter such magistrates from acting improperly. This arbitrary power should not be given to them.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said he believed that this Bill would never come into force in the Province of Quebec, as he thought their municipal laws were so satisfactory that they could do without it, and it was only in deference to the views of hon. gentlemen from other Provinces that he felt it his duty to protest against the clause doing away with the right of the subject to appeal to the higher Courts. He would suggest the addition of another clause to provide that all the cases coming under this Act should be tried in a similar way and under our present laws with regard to justices of the peace out of session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said that there was an appeal provided from the decision of two justices. The reason why any exceptional provisions were in this Bill should be apparent to everybody. This was a law which a considerable minority in any county where it would be enforced, would consider an unjust act; that they were perfectly warranted in resisting it, and they would have no conscientious scruples in using every means to defeat it. It was also peculiar in this respect; there was nobody particularly interested in putting the law in force while there was a very powerful body with a large amount of money at their command deeply interested in defeating the measure. That was the reason why the Dunkin Act had been defeated in so many cases. When people were getting a law enacted they were generally impressed with the belief that the public ought to accept it and enforce it. But as a rule the people did not do so; they did not consider that it was their particular business to put the law into operation, while there was a powerful combination always on the alert to defeat it and would contest it at every stage through the courts. The consequence was, as there were no private individuals or associations who would spend their money in following up the prosecutions the law would fall into disuse. That was the reason why this measure had to be surrounded with all those guards and checks that other laws did not require. The Local Legislature of Ontario had to step in in order to carry out the provisions of their act and appoint a prosecutor in order to enforce it. It was notorious that there were at least one or two judges of county courts in Ontario who were hostile to that law and took advantage of every technicality to defeat it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said he did not think the hon. Secretary of State had advanced any good or sufficient reason why they should deny all right of appeal. Why should they place such an unwise, and tyrannical law in this respect on the statute book? He thought it would be well to take the sense of the House now with regard to allowing the right of appeal by writ of certiorari.

Hon. Mr. HOWLAN asked if under the 105th clause an appeal did not lie from the magistrates?

Hon. Mr. MILLER said since the Bill had been reprinted that came in under the 111th clause. There was no question of the right to appeal from the decision of two magistrates. All he asked was that in such cases as might be considered of sufficient importance as to be removed by certiorari to the Superior Courts of record the right should exist. In obtaining a writ of certiorari there was a good deal of difficulty—more than there was in seeking a remedy under an ordinary appeal, and it would only be resorted to in cases where the law would justify its being granted, in the opinion of the judges of the highest courts in the several Provinces. He was sorry to have heard the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State with regard to some of the judges in Ontario. He was sure his hon. friend would not have made such a charge against any of the judiciary of his own Province if he had not ample grounds for doing so, but he was satisfied that those remarks could not be applicable to any but the judges of the inferior courts. It could not be applied to the judges of the higher courts, who were among the most distinguished members of the judiciary in the country. He doubted the wisdom of the friends of this Bill pushing those extreme points which were calculated in the minds of moderate men, to do the measure much more injury than otherwise. He would therefore move that the Bill be referred to Committee of Whole, for the purpose of amending the clause 111 with the view of preserving to the subject the right of appeal by writ of certiorari.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said he hoped the appeal that had been made to the hon. Secretary of State would be successful, although they would give no appeal to the poor liquor dealers. The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Howlan) had asked whether, under the 105th clause, the appeal did not still remain from the decision of the two magistrates. Upon that point he was under the impression it was taken away. Habeas corpus or certiorari always existed, unless it was expressly taken away; an appeal only existed where the right was given by statute. If there was no appeal given from a decision of two justices it did not exist.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said they had sixteen years experience in Ontario to the contrary.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said the appeal was actually given here, because the Bill was brought to confirm another Act, which gave the appeal, and did not take away the writ of certiorari in such cases.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said there was no doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said if there was any doubt about the question it conveyed the view that the appeal was given only by implication, and it was necessary that the clause should be looked after to remove any doubt as to the appeals from two justices. He thought the Government must have been reconsidering this question as would be seen by clause "F," which provided that, "upon application to quash such conviction, or warrant, enforcing the same," that was a conviction on a warrant or in any proceeding under the Temperance Act, of 1874, or this Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Or the License Act of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said the preceding clause distinctly referred to conviction under the Temperance Act of 1864, or this Act; therefore clause "G" applied to offences under this Act. It was evident his hon. friend, in drafting these clauses, had come to a sense of the justice of the appeals that had been made to him from this side of the House. The difficulty had arisen possibly from the fact of the hon. gentleman having accepted clauses at the suggestion of other gentlemen who were interested in the Bill, and it had caused the incongruity he referred to. Clause "F" provided "that no conviction or warrant enforcing the same, or other process of proceeding, under either of the said Acts, should be held insufficient or invalid by reason of any variance between the information, or conviction, etc." Then clause "G" provided "upon any application to quash such conviction or warrant enforcing the same, or other process or proceeding, or to discharge any person in custody under such warrant, whether such application is made in appeal, or upon habeas corpus, or by way of certiorari, or otherwise, the court to which, or judge to whom, such appeal is made, etc., shall dispose of such application upon the merits, etc." So that it applied to any conviction under the said Acts. If the hon. gentleman said it was a mistake, it could be amended, but he was in hopes that it was an amendment to the clause taking away the right of certiorari. If there was one thing that this House was called upon to do more than another, it was to protect the rights and liberties of the subject, and that certainly could not be done by putting in a clause in this Bill that took away a right which was as old as the constitution itself.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said he presumed the intention of Clause "G" was to cover all cases which might possibly arise under any case of the three acts. Although the right of certiorari was intended to be taken away by this Bill and was taken away by the Dunkin Act, he believed it had not been taken away in the License Act of Ontario, and therefore, it would be necessary to include the certiorari in the clause referred to, although it might be taken away by this Bill and the Dunkin Act. In that view the clause would be applicable and proper. None of the license Acts took away the right of certiorari, and it was only the measure of 1864 and the present Bill, that contemplated anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the clause was word for word taken from that of the Dunkin Act, in which it was considered a wise and prudent provision. His own opinion was that it was an essential element in the Bill, and it would be fatal to the measure to strike it out, as it would destroy its efficiency.

The House then divided on the amendment, which was carried on the following division :

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he considered this was a matter of such importance that he proposed to take a vote on it again on the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE suggested that a clause should be inserted in the Bill, to provide that evidence heard before the inferior courts under this Bill, should not be taken in writing. He said his reason for proposing this was, in many cases, evidence taken in writing before the magistrates was sent to the Superior Court, where an appeal was taken, and he considered that it was much better that the evidence should be heard before a higher tribunal, than to have the case decided upon the imperfect records that might be sent up from the inferior courts.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he would not feel justified in accepting that suggestion, that the evidence on which a man might be convicted should be oral, instead of being reduced to writing. He thought whatever evidence was sworn to should go on paper.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said the practice of the courts in the different Provinces should regulate that. He thought, as a matter of practice, that the evidence taken in courts of inferior jurisdiction was not preserved.

The question was dropped.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said he rose to make another suggestion with reference to the 57th clause, which provided for the adoption of the petition on a majority of the votes polled. On a previous occasion his hon. friend from York had suggested that the votes polled should amount to one-half of all the electoral votes, and it was said on that occasion that such a provision would have the effect of preventing the Bill from going into operation, and that it would become inoperative. His hon. friend from York had yielded to that objection, and said he would not press the amendment, but might bring it up again on a future occasion. He had not brought it up again, however, and he (Mr. Campbell) desired to call attention to it, and he would now make a suggestion that was so reasonable he hoped the hon. Secretary of State would adopt it. Although the suggestion was an exceedingly modest one, it was one to which the gentlemen more particularly interested in this Bill had refused their acquiescence. His proposition was this : that it should require the total number of votes polled for the adoption of this Bill in any county to be at least one-third of the whole electoral vote. The proposition of his hon. friend from York had been that the votes polled should amount to half of the electoral vote. When that suggestion was rejected, it was proposed that there should be a two-thirds majority of all the votes polled in favor of the petition; that proposition had also been rejected. The suggestion he now made was that the total votes cast for the adoption of this petition should amount to at least one-third of the whole electoral vote. He would illustrate his proposition by supposing the total vote of a county to be one thousand; for the adoption of this Bill in such a county it would require the number of votes polled to be 333. It would have to be borne in mind that no compensation was proposed for those who would suffer by the operation of this Bill. There were men engaged in trade whose property would be materially affected by its operation in any county, and it was but reasonable to provide that such persons as were engaged in the liquor traffic should not be disturbed in their business unless it appeared that at least one-third of the electors were anxious for the adoption of the liquor law. He did not desire to do anything that would impede the progress of the Bill, and he did not believe that the adoption of the amendment which he had suggested would be a disadvantage to it, as they had the opinion of the hon. gentleman from Sarnia that there would be no desire to put this law into operation in any county unless there was a much more decided expression of the will of the people than one-third of the electoral vote of the constituency, as they admitted the law could not be enforced unless there was a large majority of the people strongly in favor of it. Apart from this he considered the minority were entitled to protection. He did not think it was right to suppose that every person engaged in the liquor trade was a scoundrel, a rascal whose interest ought not to be protected, and who ought to be put down by the strong arm of the law. There were men engaged in this traffic of all characters, as there were men of all characters amongst the members of Total Abstinence Societies; but they were not to frown down a whole class of people because some of them were disreputable and allowed excesses in their houses. He knew persons who had been engaged in the liquor business for years, who had large sums of money invested in property designed for that special purpose, that could not well be devoted to any other, and that property would be very much affected by the operation of this Bill. Those men should not be disturbed in their occupations unless there was a large proportion of the people who wished to put down the liquor trade in the interest of the community. If a person discharged his duties faithfully as a citizen, paid his taxes, and was guilty of no impropriety or contravention of the laws of the municipality, he should not be called upon to defend his position unless a large proportion of the community desired to test the effect of this law, by bringing it into force. His proposition was a reasonable one that should receive the assent of the Government who were passing this Bill, and the assent of hon. gentlemen who were in favor of such a measure. He did not consider that anything could be gained by making a law too arbitrary, and this measure was so arbitrary that it would defeat its own purpose by turning moderate thinking people against it. The Bill provided that the initiatory proceedings should be commenced at the instigation of 25 per cent of the electoral vote; that was certainly sufficient for the initiation of it, and he thought it was a very reasonable provision: but when the property of the people was to be more or less injured, and its value diminished, it was not unreasonable to say that it should be decided by at least one-third of the population qualified to vote in the county. It should also be borne in mind that everyone enjoyed advantages from the very fact of the tavern keeper having his bar or saloon, as many hon. gentlemen who boarded at the Russell House or other hotels during the Session knew by experience that they enjoyed more comforts in such quarters than they could obtain in a temperance house. His proposition was such a reasonable one that he hoped it would receive the assent of the Government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Are there any other suggestions?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said, if the hon. gentleman considered his suggestions were of any value, he would propose to exclude cider and beer from the operation of the Bill. He thought those who were in favor of the measure were making a most serious mistake in including cider and beer; they were carrying their efforts to such an extreme that the reasonable, moderate portion of the community who were not teetotalers, though temperate in their use of those beverages, would oppose it as arbitrary and tyrannical. Cider and beer were harmless drinks. A person could, no doubt, get drunk from the excessive use of them if he wished to do so, but as a rule men would not make beasts of themselves simply because they were allowed to drink beer and cider. To make the Bill useful to the people it should not be so extreme in its provisions.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT said he quite concurred with the hon. gentleman that it was only doing harm to the temperance cause by including cider and beer.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said, at the third reading of the Bill, he would see how far he would be able to adopt the suggestions of hon. gentlemen. In discussing this matter he had endeavored to hold the scales as evenly as possible; to entertain the views of the gentlemen who were seeking for this legislation to a point that would not militate against its usefulness, and in a manner which ought to meet the reasonable views of those gentlemen who held the principle that prohibition was a wise policy. He moved concurrence in the additional clause "A."

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I have no intention to oppose this clause, but I wish it to be distinctly understood that, if we were called upon to deal with any other subject, I would consider it a most dangerous precedent to confirm the legislation of any Province of the Dominion which is clearly ultra vires. We have introduced here, for the first time in the history of this Confederation, a principle which may entail very serious consequences if we are to regard it as a precedent. Were this legislation on any other subject, I have no hesitation in saying I would be entirely opposed to adopting it, because it will be an encouragement to the different provincial legislatures—and, I fear, in connection with this Bill it will have that effect—to pass laws that are ultra vires, with the expectation of coming to this Parliament and getting a confirmation of those laws. Every hon. gentleman can see the confusion and uncertainty which this should create in our legislation. I feel that it is, perhaps, unwise to pass this measure after the grave doubt expressed as to its constitutionality, without giving it any other objectionable features. It is not a safe thing to pass a measure merely because it has the support of a large number of the electors of this country, and the Government have introduced it to propitiate them. Therefore, it may not receive that severity of criticism which a bill, interfering so largely with the rights of the people, ought to receive; but they should not be asked to concede too much. In view of the exceptional character of this legislation, I do not propose to give these new clauses any opposition, myself, and, under the circumstances, think it would be just as well to let it become law, and give the temperance people all their own way.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I entirely concur in the views expressed by my hon friend, and also in the course which he has indicated. I feel disposed to let the Government take the responsibility of this legislation, entering my protest against it, as interfering with provincial license laws, and the rights of the local legislatures, and as a precedent for the future, in legalizing Ontario legislation ultra vires. When we come to look at the very first of these added clauses, we find it is of a most sweeping character. It not only repeals a part of the Dunkin Act, but it distinctly interferes with the licence acts of all the Provinces, which I think are entirely within the purview of the local legislatures. My objection to it is this—no matter what the reason or the necessity for the legislation, this House has no constitutional right to interfere with the licensing laws of the provinces. We cannot over-ride the legislation of any provincial authority with respect to licensing matters, which I contend are entirely—not merely as a matter of favor, but as a matter of right—within the jurisdiction of the local legislatures. It seems to me not only to be tyrannical legislation in many of its provisions, but legislation which is unconstitutional, and will form a most dangerous precedent for the future.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The reason for the clause is, that this legislation was enacted by the Ontario Legislature, and the courts held that the Province had not the right to touch upon it.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—But that decision has not received the consideration of the highest tribunal in the land, and the hon.

gentleman is not willing to allow this Bill to go before the Supreme Court.

The clauses in the schedule were then adopted en bloc.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill be read the third time to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I should like to have an answer as to what is to be done—how the machinery of this Bill is to be enforced.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said the other day it would entail some expense on the Public Treasury to put it in force.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—An enormous expense.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—So that any agitation can be commenced under this Bill, and the whole expense of the election will fall upon the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The expense will be limited to the payment of the Returning Officer, the publication of the notice in the Canada Gazette, and the payment of the officers taking the vote, and there will be the mileage on the delivery of the instructions to the deputy and the ballot-boxes.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—This will be the same expense as at a general election.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I think some formal explanation should be given on that before the third reading, because it may affect the opinions of hon. gentlemen in this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My opinion of the expense in a large county is, that where there would be thirty polling places, the expense would be between four and five hundred dollars.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That would be the average expense of an election.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In that I was allowing $20 to the Returning Officer. I made the calculation myself.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Could not the municipalities bear this expense?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Take the Province of Nova Scotia, for instance. We will not require this law, because we have already a very stringent License Act. We are told by an hon. member from Quebec that this Act will never be adopted in that Province, and in New Brunswick it is not likely it will be required any more than in Nova Scotia. So it will come down to this,—that the law we are passing will be a law almost exclusively of Ontario, and the whole Dominion is to be subjected to a heavy burden of taxes in order to enable the temperance people in Ontario, wherever they can get up a fever heat in any municipality or city, to endeavor to impose this law upon the people. If they want a thing of that kind, they should be prepared to show their earnestness and sincerity by agreeing to pay the cost of the elections, and not ask the Dominion generally to contribute towards the expense of those contests. Under this law it would only be necessary to get up a requisition signed by 25 per cent of the electors to set the whole machinery of the Act in operation for the rejection or the adoption of the measure. You will have a continual state of ferment from one end of the country to the other in connection with this subject if you place the treasury of the Dominion at the disposal of the temperance men. Under the Dunkin Act, the expense is one means of preventing unnecessary agitation, but if you hold out the inducement of paying from the public treasury for all these agitations, there will be no end to the expense, turmoil and excitement to which the country will be subjected in these continual elections, or attempts at elections. Now, I really do think that the municipality that desires the adoption of this measure should be prepared to pay the expenses of it, or it ought to be made a provincial tax. The Legislature of Ontario, in return for the favor we confer upon them by confirming their License Law, should make some provision for carrying out the elections to be held under this Act. At any rate, you could ask the counties or cities that desire this law to pay for it. It would only be fair in the end, as the people who want the measure would then bear the expense of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think my hon. friend has drawn an exaggerated picture. My impression is that no such consequences will flow from the passage of this Bill. There is no Province more likely to adopt it than New Brunswick, as far as I can gather from hon. gentlemen from that Province. Wherever the Dunkin Act is in force in Ontario, I am inclined to think the people will continue it in force rather than risk an election under this Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Does the hon. gentleman think the Dunkin Act is better than this Act?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, but they may think they would jeopardize the Dunkin Act in trying to get this. Under the Dunkin Act thirty people have the right to set the machinery in motion.

Hon. Gentlemen—But they pay for it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the estimate I have given is the outside of what the cost would be in a very large county where there would be upwards of thirty polling places.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—The expense of an ordinary election is not very much larger than that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are expenses in an ordinary election that are not included in this. It is only the official machinery that will be paid for by the Crown. The people will have to meet the expense of notices, agencies, scrutineers, bailiffs, etc., themselves.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—The treasury does not pay the expenses of which my hon. friend speaks, in ordinary elections.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The expense of the Dominion election in a place such as I have spoken of would be more than double what this would be.

The motion for the third reading tomorrow was agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6 o'clock.

After Routine proceedings.

IMPORTS OF PLASTER OF PARIS AND GYPSUM.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN (Hopewell) moved :—

“That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General praying that
Hon. Mr. Scott.

His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House a detailed statement of the quantities of Plaster of Paris or Gypsum, ground or calcined, imported from the United States during the past fiscal year, shewing quantity received at each port and valuation of same for duty. Also, quantity entered at each port, of gypsum, and Plaster of Paris, not ground or calcined, and of Gypsum not calcined for agricultural purposes.”

He said :—My object in bringing this question under the notice of the Government, or rather, in asking for this information, is that many parts of the Dominion are becoming interested in the quarrying and shipment of this particular commodity, more particularly in the locality in which I reside, where it is a growing industry. The quarrying of gypsum has been confined, until within the last year or two, to one particular part of the country, but during the past year the ridge of plaster has been opened at different points, and what was originally a small business, is growing rapidly into an extensive trade, giving freight to our ships and employment to the operatives at the place where it is calcined, ground, and placed in barrels for export. In Nova Scotia a very large trade has been going on, for a number of years past, in plaster, but it has chiefly been confined to the county of Hants, although some exports have also been made from Cape Breton. I may mention, for the information of hon. gentlemen who take an interest in the matter, that, for the year ending 31st December, 1877, the export of crude gypsum from New Brunswick was 5,030 tons, valued at $5,030; ground gypsum, 14,007 tons, valued at $21,786. Nova Scotia, during the same period, exported 106,952 tons crude gypsum, valued at $93,867, and 72 tons of ground gypsum, valued at $194. I may mention that, as far as the supply is concerned, it is unlimited, and it is quite probable that the industry will become more valuable year by year. It is an article which is required in many parts of the continent, and my object in moving the resolution is to determine how much gypsum is imported into Canada, and what the value of that import has been, in order, if possible, that the producers in the Dominion, by the information thus afforded, may so extend their business as to adapt it to the supplying of the demand for those articles in Canada.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am very glad my hon. friend has moved in this matter; it shows that although he repudiated the idea of protection, yet when it comes down to the article of gypsum he feels it is one of those industries that requires protection.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I said nothing about protection, and the motion has no bearing whatever on that subject.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I cannot see myself why the crude gypsum should be taken out of the country, and manufactured in a foreign country, and then imported into Canada as plaster, instead of being manufactured at home and furnish employment for the laborers of the country. I think this is one of the industries that ought to be protected and developed, and I am very glad to hear my hon. friend has moved in this matter from a protective point of view.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—The reason of there being so large a quantity of crude gypsum imported, as compared with the ground and calcined article, is because of their being no duty on the crude article, while there is a duty on the manufactured article, and in that way it has a bearing on protection.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has asked for the imports of gypsum and plaster through the several ports of the Dominion. To bring down such a return will involve a great deal of labor and delay, because in compiling the tables they do not mark the different ports at which the returns are made; but I can bring down the totals.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DOMINION REVENUE.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. DEVER moved:—

“That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before this House,—A Return of all duties of Excise for this Dominion for the months of July, August, September, October, November, December, 1877, and the months of January, February and March of 1878, as well as the months of April, May and June of 1877.”

He said:—The motion I have the honor of presenting to-day is one which will lead to the consideration of the Customs and Excise duties of the Dominion of Canada during the current fiscal year—1877-8. I have been induced to make this motion in consequence of the declaration of the Finance Minister, in another place, on the 22nd February last, when that hon. gentleman, in his Budget Speech, used the following words:—

“It is, however, very satisfactory to find that at last the tide seems to have been turned in some degree, and to be able to inform the House that the receipts from revenue during the last seven months show a very decided improvement, as compared with the same period of the preceding year. Up to the 10th day of February instant, I find that our receipts from all quarters amounted to $13,434,235, as against receipts to the corresponding period of last year of $12,494,279; that is to say, Mr. Speaker, that the augmentation, in these seven months, reached to the sum of nearly $1,000,000. Now, although it is true that a certain proportion of this increase may perhaps be attributed to the necessity of replacing the mass of goods that were unhappily destroyed in the great fire that desolated the City of St. John, I am glad to be able to tell the House that the increase from that source is not by any means the largest part of the increase I have mentioned; but that every Province, without exception, I believe, shows “a large and cheering increase, and as the question has been raised, how far the general increase is due to this merely accidental cause, I think it is not unreasonable to point out to the House, that the very remarkable character of the present winter has most assuredly diminished to a considerable extent, the consumption of many classes of goods from which we would, ordinarily, have received a good deal of revenue, and that in all probability the $200,000 or thereabout, which may have been derived from the misfortune that I have alluded to, are balanced, and, I dare say, more than balanced by the diminution of consumption arising from that cause.”

After hearing that declaration, hon. gentlemen, and having had some little experience in the profit and loss of business; knowing something about the general character of the business of this country at the present time, I believe instead of there being any revival in trade, that on the contrary, it is still further declining. The fact has been also announced lately in our large cities, especially in Montreal, Halifax and St. John, that instead of business improving, failures to the extent of $700,000 had taken place in one week. Looking at this matter, and knowing as I do the pulse of business, I felt it my duty to investigate this subject, and ascertain if the declaration of the Minister of Finance was being carried out in the Customs and Excise returns of the current year. With that object in view, and without waiting until the returns I now ask for came down, I repaired to the several Departments, and obtained the information myself. This information I am now prepared to offer to the House, and hon. gentlemen will see by it whether the Minister of Finance was justified in making that declaration or not. The statement I hold in my hand is as follows—

And here I may mention that after the fire other large quantities of duty paid goods had to be got from Halifax, Montreal, and other cities, which I leave out of my calculations, and which, if duty paid at St. John would show a further falling off of Customs and Excise elsewhere, instead of the "cheering increase in every Province" for 1878.

I would also ask you to allow me to draw your attention to the following comparative statement of total receipts for Dominion of Canada (exclusive of North-West Territories) during the years ended respectively on 30th June, 1877 and 1878 :—

This statement shows a net increase in the revenue for the whole Dominion, during the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June next, 1878, of only $345,995, which increase, arising as it does from Post Office and other minor sources, cannot be taken as an indication of reviving trade. And here let me state, to avoid any misconception, that in order to arrive at a proper and reliable comparison, as I maintain this to be, I have taken the actual collections, as shown by official returns, for the nine months ended 31st March, 1878, and have only assumed that the receipts for the remaining three months of the current fiscal year will be equal to the corresponding months of the previous year (1877.) Such assumption, I contend, is warranted by the fact that hon. Ministers of the Government have frequently used the same means of arriving at conclusions which have been presented to Parliament for financial purposes.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—Is that deficit greater than last year?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—We will simply have a smaller revenue from Customs and Excise than we had last year. I do not intend to delay the House much longer by dwelling on this subject, except to point out that it is a most astonishing thing that every year since the present Administration came into power, we have had a deficit; and this is more astonishing when I point out to you that on their taking office one of their first acts was the following increase of duties on goods imported into this country:—

OLD DUTY.	NEW DUTY.	p.c. ad. val.
Cigars 45c per lb...	50c and 20c
Tea, green, free....	6c per lb.

Old Tom 80c do..	1.00 do
Taffia 80c do..	1.50 do

Tobacco 15c per lb..	20c per lb.

Other goods had been raised from 15 to 17½ and 20 per cent., and notwithstanding this great increase of duty on articles entering into the daily use of all classes, there has been a falling off in the revenue. Under this tariff, the revenue of this country was intended to be $27,000,000 or $28,000,000: such an amount is quite unreasonable for four millions of people, and I believe that is the reason why the duty has not yielded so abundantly as was anticipated. In consequence of the heavy duties on articles largely consumed by the laboring population, the tax has fallen unfairly upon these poorer classes, and they will not use the goods.

Hon. Mr. Dever.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no objection to my hon. friend's motion going. I doubt if the returns he calls for would give him any information he does not already possess. He seems to have availed himself of all the necessary information on the subject in advance. However, the returns will be brought down.

The motion was agreed to.

THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

ENQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL called attention to the implied understanding come to between the Government of the Dominion, the Government of the Province of British Columbia, and Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies in December, 1876, with reference to the commencement in British Columbia of the work of construction of the Canada Pacific Railway, that "after the very limited delay of a single summer, the Province of British Columbia would find that there was no longer any obstacle to the active prosecution of the undertaking." That, in accordance with that understanding, the Province of British Columbia has since that time awaited, without comment on the question, the decision to which the Government of the Dominion might come; and (seeing that sixteen months have since elapsed) asked the question, when the Government intend to declare their policy in the matter?

"He said: I will not occupy the time of the House on this question, but simply read the notice and await the reply of the Government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In 1876 the Government believed they would have been within the period named in the motion, in possession of the fullest information which would have justified them in recommending to Parliament the selection of the route through British Columbia; but my hon. friend must be aware, from the discussions that have taken place upon subjects akin to this, the Government is not yet sufficiently advised as to the line that it is in the interests of this country to select through that Province. They do hope, however, at no distant day—I hope, comparatively a very short period—to be sufficiently advised to decide upon the route through British Columbia. At present I am unable to say anything more than to inform my hon. friend the Government is not in a position to define the route through British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—Will the hon. gentleman say what further limit of time will be required.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Those time limits have really lost their value with respect to British Columbia. All time limits thus far have failed. I should hope, however, that the time is not far distant. All I can assure my hon. friend is, the Government are certainly pressing forward the surveys in that country as earnestly as possible, and they could have done no more—no Administration could have done more—than they have endeavored to accomplish.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—Another serious undertaking on the part of the Government has fallen to the ground.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend is not justified in drawing any such conclusion. He must have been aware from the remarks which fell from an hon. Senator in this House a few days ago, that there is yet a somewhat divided opinion among even the British Columbia people, as to the best outlet for the Pacific Railway in that Province, and there is a very strong difference of opinion entertained even by engineers on that subject. The Government is not justified in stating that any one line has been sufficiently explored to authorize them in saying that it should be selected.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—Did I understand the hon. Secretary of State to say that the Government are prepared to state in response to this question, that they are going to commence the construction of the railway in British Columbia this year, or not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Government are not in a position to say that the work of construction will be commenced this year. The Government are not prepared to say yet, that the latest line that has attracted their attention is the best line, and, until the best line has been decided upon, it would be unwise and premature to commence the construction. I stated, just now, the Government had pressed forward the surveys with all possible speed; certainly no greater earnestness could be expected than that shown by this Government in the surveys in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Did I understand the hon. Secretary of State, on a former occasion, to say that the report of the Engineer-in-Chief, on this question, was in the hands of the Department, but that the Ministry were not in a position to declare their decision on it—in other words—to adopt it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In answer to my friend's question, I should have to make this observation. There have been a great many reports, and there is a very large number of routes. At different times these routes have all been favored by different engineers. The Government has not absolutely committed itself to any one of those routes. The report to which my hon. friend has reference, I presume is the report made by Mr. Marcus Smith, which I stated the other day had not been brought under the notice of the Government further than to be transmitted to the Minister of Public Works. It has not been so far considered by the Government as to justify them in expressing any opinion upon it.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—It was exactly in that sense I understood my hon. friend to speak the other day. Is there any objection to laying that report on the table?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I really am not in a position to answer my hon. friend. Such reports are usually considered confidential, until some kind of action has been taken by the Government.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—In 1874 this matter was left to Lord Carnarvon, and his award was approved of by the Government—to have this railway completed from the Pacific to Lake Superior by the year 1890, and also to spend $2,000,000 in British Columbia yearly. The Government rashly committed the country to this agreement, and I am afraid, from the manner in which the work has been prosecuted, it will take the 40 years, the time prognosticated by the hon. Secretary of State, to complete it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Lord Carnarvon's proposition was—and so the Government of Canada accepted it—that the surveys were to be prosecuted with all diligence, and when completed, the work itself should be proceeded with, and he thought that it should involve an expenditure of at least $2,000,000 yearly. That was practically the judgment of Lord Carnarvon.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Victoria)—I hope the report I moved for the other day will be brought down as soon as possible, as it bears on this question in an important degree. The Session will soon be over, and unless the report is brought down at once, hon. gentlemen will not have an opportunity of forming an opinion upon that question.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—I trust that the hon. Secretary of State will use his position, as the representative of the Government in this House, to urge upon his colleagues that they should arrive at some understanding during the Session, which will enable them to lay before us Mr. Marcus Smith's report.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Are there any surveying parties out at present on the Pine River Route?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am really not in a position to say whether there are or not.

DUTIES COLLECTED AT ST. JOHN.

MOTION WITHDRAWN.

The Order of the Day being called,

“That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House, a return of all duties of Customs and Excise collected at the port of St. John, New Brunswick, from the first day of July, 1877, to the first day of January, 1878.”

Hon. Mr. DEVER moved that the Order be discharged.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN RESERVES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL moved:—

He said:—This is a matter of great importance to the people of British Columbia. The Indian policy of Canada has been eminently successful, and has been the subject of envy on the part of our neighbors, who have made great efforts to copy it. In British Columbia the Indians have located their reserves in the very best lands of the Province—fertile valleys and deltas of rivers. This has given rise to considerable irritation, in consequence of the encroachments of white settlers on those reserves. So far as I know, the Commissioners appointed by the Government to define the extent of the Indian reserves, have acted wisely, and given perfect satisfaction, but I desire that this correspondence may be brought down in order that there may be no doubt as to the course they have pursued in the event of misunderstandings arising between them and the various tribes in the Province.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This subject, as the hon. gentlemen has truly remarked, is one of very great importance. Correspondence has been going on for the past three years, at all events, between the Government of British Columbia and the Government of Canada in reference to the setting apart reserves for the Indians. A Commission was appointed, and that Commission had been some time at work when it was found that it was entailing a considerable amount of expense on the Local as well as the Dominion Government. At the instance of one of the parties (I think it was British Columbia) it was thought better to reduce the Commission to one. Considerable progress has been made in the negotiations with the Indians in British Columbia, and I am in hopes, ultimately, the irritation will be removed. The policy of the past Governments in British Columbia, to the Indians, has not been of that just and paternal character which has marked the policy of other British Colonies on this continent. Therefore, a good deal will have to be done before the Indians are satisfied. They are quite aware their position has been exceptional from that of the Indian tribes in other British Colonies on this continent, their reserves being limited and no annual grants being made to them. The position of matters a year ago was considered somewhat alarming where the whites were adopting very much the same policy that had been pursued in the United States—encroaching on what the Indians claimed as their reserves, though they had never been set apart by any authority. The correspondence is very voluminous and I suppose my hon. friend only wants a compilation which will develop the policy to be pursued by the Commissioners.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—A compilation will meet my views. Of course I have nothing to say as to the claims of the Indians.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—The hon. Secretary of State has given expression to certain views which he and his colleagues hold, and which are so incorrect that I must refer to them. The hon. gentleman spoke of the causes of irritation among the Indians in British Columbia; he went further and talked about the ungenerous conduct of the Provincial Government in former days and the interference of the whites with Indian rights. The hon. gentleman is incorrect in supposing there are any such causes for the irritation among the Indians in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The correspondence shows quite differently.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—A very erroneous impression has gone abroad upon this subject. When British Columbia became a part of the Dominion, an agreement was come to between the Government of that Province and the Government of Canada that the Indians should be treated with the same fairness that had been exhibited by the Government of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The words were, "no less fairness." It was assumed British Columbia had acted fairly.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—At that time, when British Columbia came into the Dominion, there was not the slightest ill-feeling in any Indian breast in that country with regard to the way they had been treated by the Provincial authorities but since Confederation, from some cause or other—I should say from the unwise interference and meddling of the Dominion Government—irritation has sprung up. From some causes, from the appointment of Indian agents and their proceedings, the Indians were induced to believe they were to be petted and cared for, that large reservations of lands were to be given to them and that the Dominion Government would more or less support them altogether by means of gifts and subsidies. They are disappointed that nothing has been done for them up to this time. It is evident that in this, as in other matters, the Government have sat in their places and done nothing. It is merely another instance of the unfitness of the Government for their position that there should be any cause of irritation among the Indians in British Columbia. Up to Confederation the Indians had been in perfect accord with the provincial authorities and the whites settled among them. Up to that time the Government had given them any reservation, they had asked for and that they had been in the habit of occupying, and there was no disagreement between them and their white neighbors. Since the union with Canada there has been a change and British Columbia has been put to considerable expense and no little alarm has been caused by the slack, procrastinating and injudicious policy of this Government. The hon. Secretary of State is mistaken in supposing that the irritation among the Indians is due to the action of the local authorities or the white population of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I reiterate what I said before, that the irritation in British Columbia arises from the improper action of the Government of that Province. I am sustained in that view, not only by members of this Government, but by public men throughout this country and Imperial statesmen. The policy of Great Britain, in taking possession of this country, was to deal fairly with the Indians; to recognize that the Indians had a patrimony on this continent; that the Indians had a title, and that their title had to be acquired, step by step, by settling with them for it. The people of British Columbia went into that Province and declined to settle with the aborigines. They remained in small communities and had to fight the Indians. They have never to this day recognized the Indians, who are a very large body of people, and, I am told, a very superior class of men compared with other tribes. The people of British Columbia have never extinguished the Indian title. The irritation prevailed when that Province came into the Union. The Provincial Legislature had passed an Act giving to each Indian family an area, I think, of ten acres. The Indians were dissatisfied with this, and declined to accept it. They had reserves of their own. There are Indians there, I believe, who have large herds, and pursue a different life from the Indians we know of in the North-West. Other Indians are fishermen, and they have several avocations in the Province. As we know, they form the great bulk of the population. They were aware (because they are an intelligent race) that the Indians in other Provinces of the Dominion were treated in a different manner from themselves. Therefore, their troubles date back prior to Confederation.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—No, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I quite understand what I am speaking about. At the time of the treaty with British Columbia, of course the attention of Canada had not been called to the subject; otherwise, those who made the treaty would have taken good care to have had a better understanding on this subject. We were made practically the guardians of the Indians, as we are of all the other Indians of the Dominion. We were supposed to be the trustees of the rights they had. It was our duty to look after the Indians, and that was incorporated in the treaty with British Columbia. Assuming that they had been fairly treated before the Union, a clause was added providing that our policy should not be less generous or liberal to the Indians than the policy then existing in British Columbia, but they had never been settled with except in a manner which did not give them satisfaction. I believe the first remonstrance that was made was when the British Columbia Government admitted that ten acres for each family was not a fair concession, and offered to give twenty acres. That was considered unsatisfactory, because some Indians pursued the life of herdsmen and wanted more land. Others did not cultivate the soil or keep cattle, and they sought for remuneration in some other direction. It was reported that the Indians were about to take summary steps to secure their rights, and appeals were made to us to send a force to British Columbia to protect the people there. Reports of Indian scares were telegraphed to the Government here. We were told that the Indians, who were well armed, vigorous, and numerous, were going to rise and annihilate the whites. I think they showed a good deal of consideration under the circumstances. Agents were sent to tell them the causes of complaint would be removed. A Commission was appointed, the Local Government naming one, the Dominion Government another, and the third being selected as referee. The major part of the expense was to be paid by the Dominion. That Commission went on for some time, and, I am told, so far the results have been satisfactory. It was an indication to the Indians that their grievances were listened to. They brought their complaints before His Excellency when he was in British Columbia, and the attention of Lord Carnarvon was called to them. I know he drew up a very able paper, which I recollect reading some time ago, in which he spoke strongly of the action of the people of British Columbia. He regarded it as a matter of great importance that the Indians should be treated in the same spirit as the British Government had dealt with the aborigines on this continent. The Indians also became aware in the last three or four years, that we not only gave our Indians reserves, but also gave them annual subsidies of blankets, guns, etc., and this, no doubt, increased their hopes. They had hoped that when British Columbia was brought into the Dominion, the same generous and merciful treatment would be extended to them as to the Indians east of the Rocky Mountains. The lands of British Columbia are plentiful enough, and such reserves as the Indians require could be set aside for them without injury to the Province. I can assure my hon. friend there very much more in this subject than he is aware of. It may not have been brought under his notice as it was brought under mine, because I have had to deal with the subject practically. It was with very great regret that the Government of Canada had to take up this matter, because it meant adding so much more to our expenditures, and we did not feel it was right that Canada should be saddled with the expense. It was conceded there had been a settlement with the Indians before the Union, and the very words of the Act show that was the construction put upon it by those who framed the treaty. The Indians have been protesting against the treatment they have received from British Columbia. The importance of this subject was forced upon us when it became evident that unless attention was given to it, there would be a large sacrifice of life. The Indians were in earnest, and the whites were alarmed that unless something was done, bloodshed would be the consequence.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—My object in rising was not to complain of this Commission that was appointed to determine the extent of the reservation of lands to be made for the different bands of Indians, but to protest as strongly as I could against the assertion of the hon. Secretary of State, that the difficulty with the Indians is due to the policy of the British Columbia Government and the course pursued by the white residents of that Province. I deny his assertion in toto. All I can say is, I shall take an early opportunity of bringing this matter before the House, and explaining the subject in a more complete way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Has the hon. gentleman seen Lord Carnarvon's paper on the subject?

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—I have read that and Lord Dufferin's speech on the subject.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—I can corroborate what my hon. friend (Mr. Cornwall) has just stated. The rights of the Indians were recognized and protected religiously by the Government and people of British Columbia. I believe, when I was a member of the Cabinet in British Columbia, we guarded their interests by statutory enactments, going so far as to give them the right to pre-empt, occupy and hold lands. The punishment for selling or giving them liquor was severe.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

and I venture to say that a considerable number in the chain gang were sent there for violating that law. The Indians of British Columbia number at least 40,000, and they have always been accustomed to kindly and generous treatment. They are law abiding, except when under the influence of liquor, and they have been found useful in many ways to the white settlers. Our Government always treated them with the utmost kindness, and every Queen's Birthday gave them numerous gifts. In that way they kept 40,000 (some say 60,000) people perfectly satisfied with their condition. The statistics as to the number of Indians in the Province have been kindly furnished by the Roman Catholic missionaries, who have done much to keep them in good order. On reflection, I think, it would be as well that the whole of the correspondence should be brought down. To illustrate the care with which the Indians are protected by our Government I may mention that there is an Act on our Statute Books which punishes severely anyone who molests an Indian grave. When an Indian dies, his horse is killed and the skin is put on the grave, together with blankets, images, &c., and our Government have consulted even the superstitions of the aborigines so far as to make it a penal offence to molest or disturb in any way, such graves. I desire it to be distinctly understood that I offer no opinion as to the acreage the tribes or individual Indians should have, but I do venture to say that if the Commission is reduced from three to one, although it will save expense, it will be fraught with danger to an amicable adjustment of the Indian reserves difficulty in our Province.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Victoria)—I think there is proof in the treaty that the Indians were perfectly satisfied at the time British Columbia entered the Confederation. I have lived all my lifetime in that Province, and I never heard of any discontent among the Indians until after the Union. I think the Government acted wisely in appointing the Commission, and deserve all praise for the care they have exercised in this matter. The Commission has given great satisfaction thus far, but I fear its usefulness will be impaired by the reduction in its number. The Commissioner is a man possessing a good many qualifications for the position he holds, but he has not the local knowledge of the other two.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The reduction was made at the urgent request of the Local Government.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—That was in consequence of the expense. I think this Government should have kept the Commission on for a couple of years longer, until all the grievances were settled. An Indian war would entail a very much heavier expense on the country, and would retard the progress of the Province for many a year. In Oregon an Indian war broke out in 1851, and the people left the country. It injured the progress of that State for many a year.

The motion was agreed to.

"Speaker.

"TIMOTHY WARREN ANGLIN,
"Speaker.

"HOUSE OF COMMONS, April, 1878."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said:—I desire to bring under the notice of this House a subject which I am quite sure will meet with the approbation, not only of the Senate, but of the people of Canada. It is well known that the term of the distinguished nobleman who represents Her Majesty the Queen in this Dominion will shortly be brought to a close. It is a proper and fitting thing that the two Houses of Parliament should present a joint address to His Excellency, expressing the high esteem in which they hold him, and the feelings the people of Canada entertain for himself and the Countess of Dufferin. I need not enlarge on this subject. We know His Excellency during his residence in Canada, has, at great inconvenience to himself, visited the several Provinces of the Dominion, and the utterance that have fallen from his lips at all times have been of immense value to this country. They have attracted the attention not only of England, but of Europe, to the varied advantages which Canada presents as a field of enterprise for the emigrant. In giving expression to our feelings in the address proposed to be adopted, we are but echoing the sentiments of the people of Canada irrespective of creed or nationality. He has fulfilled his duties as Governor-General of the Dominion with marked skill and statesmanlike ability, I shall, therefore, move, seconded by my hon. friend from Kingston, that the address of the House of Commons be concurred in by this House.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I could have wished that some notice had been given to the House that this pleasant duty was to be discharged to-day, that it might have been approached with some little forethought. I am asked to second the motion of the hon. the Secretary of State for the adoption of the joint address which has just been read by Mr. Speaker, and I am quite sure that I never was more the organ of this side of the House than when I say we unite most cordially with the Government in the proposition suggested by the hon. gentleman, the Secretary of State for the adoption of this address on the part of the Senate. Every member on this side of the House will, I am sure, cordially agree in the language which Mr. Speaker has just read to us. I am persuaded that no Governor-General has ever been in Canada who has so thoroughly won the respect, esteem, and I may almost say, the affection of all classes of the community, as His Excellency has.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—It is now five years since His Excellency came amongst us. Very early in his career political duties devolved upon him of a most serious character. We all remember the exciting scenes of 1873, and I think we shall all agree that the position then was one of great difficulty and delicacy for the Representative of the Crown. Looking back upon those eventful scenes, I doubt if there is any one in the community who will not say that those duties were discharged by His Excellency with a knowledge of the constitution and perfect fairness to both parties, and with a tact and discretion which could not have been exceeded. Since that period his political duties have, perhaps, been less onerous, but have always been discharged in such a way as to win the complete confidence of men of both political parties. From his visits to all the Provinces of the Dominion great good has resulted, and His Excellency has become known to, and won a strong place in the regard of an immense number of the inhabitants of this Dominion whom he otherwise would not have seen. We can all bear witness with infinite pleasure to the manner in which all other duties devolving upon His Excellency have been discharged. The munificence of his hospitalities has surprised and delighted every one, and no Governor-General whom we have ever had, has taken the personal trouble which His Excellency has, to identify himself with the general aspirations and exertions of the people under his government. I do not remember any person filling that high office who has given himself so much personal trouble in promoting by attendance, by praise and commendation, everything deserving of encouragement in the country. We can all recall the numerous visits made by His Excellency and the Countess of Dufferin to colleges and schools, whether Protestant or Catholic, in the various towns and cities of the Dominion, and I doubt not that the encouragement and sympathy Lord Dufferin has thus shown has been exceedingly useful, and will long be remembered by the pupils and by the thousands of young people for whom His Excellency so kindly interested himself; and so, in all manly sports and exercises by precept and example, as well as by medals and prizes, His Excellency has shown his anxiety to identify himself with the people of the country. We shall all long and gratefully remember the active sympathy shown by the Countess of Dufferin in the same way. And who will ever forget the gentle dignity and courtesy and kindness with which Her Excellency has met every one who has approached her? I am persuaded that we are deeply indebted to her for her manner of discharging all the social duties which devolved upon her. I cordially and confidently agree with the language in this address that we shall find in His Excellency hereafter a valuable friend in the Parliament of the Empire, where I am persuaded he will always be ready to interest himself in Canadian affairs, which he will be able to do with a complete knowledge of the wants and aspirations of the country, and not, I am persuaded, without considerable affection for its people.

Hon. Mr. MILLER suggested that it would be advisable to have the Address presented to His Excellency in this Chamber in presence of the members of both Houses.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he agreed with the hon. gentleman that it would be advisable to do so, but he was not aware what arrangements had been made by the other House. His impression was that the address was to be presented by the members of the Privy Council, not members of the Cabinet.

BILLS FROM THE COMMONS.

FIRST READINGS.

The following Bills from the Commons were introduced and read the first time:—

“An Act to grant relief to the Canada Agricultural Insurance Company.”

“An Act respecting the offices of Receiver-General and Attorney-General of Canada.”
Hon. Mr. Campbell,

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC REGULATION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of Bill “J,” “An Act respecting the traffic in intoxicating liquors.” He said: In moving the third reading of the Bill, I feel it my duty to make a few observations explanatory of the reasons why I cannot accept the proposition of my hon. friend from Arichat that was discussed yesterday, and which has been carried once each way. The Bill as it originally stood contained a clause taking away the right of certiorari. As to the general principles on which the hon. gentleman debated this question, I entirely concur, and I think the rule he laid down is the safe and true one. I only plead that this particular Bill ought to be an exception to the rule. It is on that ground alone I ask the House to yield a point, and allow their better judgment to go with me on this particular measure, because I think there are grounds to justify the view I took. I was sorry to differ from my hon. friend who has taken a warm interest in this Bill, and has discussed with great candour the different clauses as they came up; therefore I would have been very desirous to meet his views on this subject, but that I feel it would destroy the good results that I hope will flow from this Bill in counties where it may be adopted. I consider the principle of appeal by writ of certiorari ought not to exist in cases under this Act in the same force that it does in ordinary cases. In ordinary suits there are always two parties, each one having an equal interest. In criminal cases even, where the Crown is prosecutor, there is always a private prosecutor, the party who has been aggrieved either by assault, arson, burglary, or any other particular crime by which his private rights have been infringed upon. In the particular cases which will come under the jurisdiction of this measure, there is but one party who takes a strong interest in the proceeding, and that is the defendant, and my belief is—and that belief is not one hastily arrived at—that prosecutions under this Act will not be put in force unless there is always ample justification for the proceedings. My experience of the Dunkin Act has led me to the conclusion that parties will not be prosecuted under this Act, unless for very flagrant offences and breaches of the law. A prosecution under this law before the most partial and most biased justices even, cannot be successful unless there is ample justification for the proceeding. The tribunal that will have jurisdiction under this Bill will be extremely unwilling to punish any man for the infraction of the law unless his conduct had brought him fairly within the power of the law. That, I think, may be laid down as a sound and correct principle; therefore it is in that character exceptional. It is also exceptional in another character, that the defendant is the only one who is personally interested in the prosecution. The private prosecutor is, as a rule, an unwilling witness, as men abhor the idea of being placed in the position of informers on their fellow men, and the private prosecutor will not follow up a case under this Act.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The hon. gentleman is laying down a principle which is the very principle we on this side of the House urge so strongly in reference to the clause where you call upon a party who is taken up under this law to turn informer against the party who sold him the liquor.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That clause had not really come under discussion. It was merely suggested by an hon. Senator here, but it was never fairly before the House, nor was there any vote taken on it. I suggested myself that if the clause were proposed to the House, it should be with considerable modifications. Hon. gentlemen can, of course, quite understand the ground on which I now ask the House to restore the clause as it stood originally, because there will be a very strong interest to defeat or postpone the prosecution of any action under this law, and any benefit that we are likely to gain under it will be entirely lost by allowing appeal to higher courts. Money will not be wanted, and if delay is only gained, the private prosecution will break down. Unless the expenses are absolutely paid by the Government to follow it up, it is not likely that the private prosecutor will do so, and follow up a disagreeable duty that, for the moment, he may have taken upon himself. It is not at all probable that a private prosecutor will waste weeks and months in prosecuting a case before the higher courts, and temperance people are not likely to raise any fund for the purpose; as they have not the same interest at stake that the other side have. When a party is arrested for the infraction of this law it will not be for an offence that would make a case for a higher tribunal; it will be a mere recital of facts that will depend upon the amount of evidence that can be brought forward, and I think parties are not liable to be punished under the Act, unless a very strong case is made out against the defendant, as he will always be given the benefit of a doubt. It is for these reasons I must ask the House to allow me to avail myself of the notice I have given to restore the proposition that was defeated yesterday. I move that the Bill do not now receive its third reading, but that the 11th clause be amended so that it shall stand the same as it was when the Bill first came before the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I have listened very attentively to the remarks of the hon. gentleman, who has debated this subject with much calmness and moderation. I have entertained a very strong opinion on the other side, however, and a large number of gentlemen endorse those views. I do not desire to occupy the time of the House by reiterating the arguments from this side of the House in favor of the view which we have advanced. The House understands the question which it is called upon to decide, and I am willing that the decision shall be taken upon it without further loss of time. If the sense of the House is against us we will only have to submit with the best grace we can.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Feeling that I do not stand here to speak my own sentiments, or to urge my own peculiar views, but representing, as I do, the views of many thousands of persons outside of this House, whose eyes are bent upon us, and who are anxiously watching what action we may take—because this clause as it stood in the Bill, when it was originally introduced, is one of the greatest importance, and cannot be dispensed with— if the amendment is continued in the Bill, it will make it inoperative, as it will give the power to carry suits under this law from court to court, and no benefit can be derived from the operation of the law. I maintain that even as the Bill now stands, offences against its provisions may be tried under the Summary Convictions Act. And in the Summary Convictions Act, I find a most extraordinary clause,—a clause with all this “tyranny”; with all this “oppression”; with all this “taking away the rights and liberties of British subjects”; a Bill introduced into this House by Senator Campbell himself, a Bill carried by the late Government. We find in it the following provision :

“No conviction or order, or adjudication, made in appeal therefrom, shall be quashed for want of form, or be removed by certiorari into any of Her Majesty's Superior Courts of record.”

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—But there is an appeal there.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I contend that this prevention of removing a case by a writ of certiorari into any higher court is embodied in this very Act, and has been the law of the land since 1869, and in defence of this the only argument I would adduce is the argument to be adduced from experience. I have already stated that this section has been the law of the land in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec for the last fourteen years, and that during those years we never had a word of complaint against it.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—What about all the other Provinces of the Dominion?

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I cannot speak for the other Provinces, but I am speaking of a very large section of the Dominion which contains many people who are as jealous of their individual rights and liberties, as the people in Nova Scotia or any other Province, and the very fact of that law being in the statute books for eleven years without any fault being found with it, or any attempt being made to repeal it, is sufficient to prove that it is not injurious to the people. I find on referring to the Act under which prosecutions are to be brought, that any offence committed where the fine exceeds $10, may be brought by appeal before any Court of Sessions and be adjudicated upon there. There is ample protection there. I trust in consequence of the important character that is attached to this question by the temperance men outside of the House who have been so long striving for legislation in this direction, that this House in compliance with their wish will allow the clause to stand as it was in the Bill when originally introduced.

Hon. Mr. SKEAD—I want to ask the hon. Secretary of State if this clause that is now under discussion, is the same as it is in the Dunkin Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it is the same.

Hon. Mr. SKEAD—I have been a supporter of the Dunkin Act for several years, and have fought several elections to bring it into operation, in some of which I have been beaten. Although I am not a teetotaler, I am a sober man, and I believe that the Dunkin Act has done good in this Dominion. If the Secretary of State says this clause is the same as it is in the Dunkin Act, I am going to support it.

A vote was then taken on the motion, which was carried on the following division :—

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I would ask the hon. Secretary of State if he has considered the amendment which I proposed yesterday, to provide that the vote polled shall be at least one-third of the total electoral vote of the constituency.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I conceive that the electors will have sufficient interest in the Act to attend and record their votes.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I understood from the hon. gentleman from Sarنيا that this amendment would be taken into consideration, and that the proposition would be considered favorably.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it would be right to depart from the principle ordinarily laid down, that the majority of the votes shall decide the question.

The Bill was read the third time.

The question was then put whether this Bill shall pass?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Before the Bill finally passes I desire to ask the hon. Secretary of State whether the preamble is in the shape it ought to be. It seems to me there is a much better preamble that sets forth more correctly the position that the Government took in introducing this measure, to be found in the preamble of a bill which has not been used; but which was printed some time ago. That preamble seems to me to lay the foundation of the right of this Legislature to enact this Bill. I would suggest that it be the preamble to the Bill just about to pass.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That conclusion is open to challenge by hon. gentlemen in this House who take a different view, and I do not think it would be wise to predicate it on any such a basis.

Hon. Mr. Skead.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I am afraid the suggestion introduces rather an inconvenient consideration with respect to that very preamble. It begins with the declaration that the legislation in all the Provinces should be uniform, yet, from the beginning to the end of this Bill, throughout, we find there are two kinds of legislation in the same Province, running pari passu, and that these again are different from any other legislation in any other Province; that there is different legislation in regard to the traffic in intoxicating liquors in nearly every Province of the Dominion. Whilst the Bill sets out in the preamble that it is desirable to have uniformity in this matter, it is devoid of that element from the beginning to the end of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Bill is one that cannot be enforced until the people invite it. When the people in any locality invite it, it then becomes uniform in all localities in which it is in force. Being a permissive Bill, wherever it is once introduced it is practically a uniform measure; until then it is nothing.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE—Before the Bill finally passes, the question raised by my hon. friend, as to the expenditure under this Bill, should be settled. I believe it is going to be a very onerous and expensive piece of legislation to this country, that it will be equally expensive as the calling into existence of elections under the General Elections Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE—How does my hon. friend get over it? You have all the machinery of an election—ballot boxes, returning officers, scrutineers, notices, etc., and I think we ought to have some expression from the Government as to whether it is to be a charge that is to be borne entirely by the general revenue of the country. I believe the expenditure is one that ought to be borne by the locality which calls the law into operation, and before the Bill leaves this Chamber, we ought to have some assurance from the Government as to what means they propose to adopt to put this Bill into operation.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I understood we were to have this explanation to-day.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I said from the first when this Bill was introduced, that I did not believe it had the support of the temperance people. I have had my belief that this Bill was intended for another purpose, brought in as it was at the last Session of this Parliament, and I am now confirmed in my belief. The Secretary of State very reluctantly told us yesterday, when he was hard pressed in the matter, and when he was asked by my hon. friend from Richmond as to the question of expense, that it would not cost more than $400 or $500 to put it into operation in a county with say, thirty polling places, and he did not suppose there would be many places where it would be put into force. He believed the Province of Nova Scotia would be satisfied with their own license law, and it would not likely go into operation very extensively in Ontario, because they already had the Dunkin Act there, that probably it might be put into operation in New Brunswick; and we were told by another hon. gentleman that the Municipal law of Quebec was sufficient for that Province. Therefore the hon. the Secretary of State has shown us that no part of Canada is desirous of having this absurd and impracticable legislation. I cannot see what object the Government had in introducing this Bill into the Senate, unless it was to have it defeated here—and thus take credit to themselves and at the same time rejoice in its defeat. There is no other way to account for this sudden temperance conversion, unless it was to gain support in the last days of the Government's existence from a certain class of the community, whom the Government would deceive and ensnare.

Hon. Mr. WARK—I presented twenty-five petitions here myself from ladies of the Maritime Provinces showing that they wanted this law there.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The petitions were not for such absurd legislation as this, but for a prohibitory liquor law.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The petitions I presented were for the passage of this very Bill.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I saw none—and I believe there could not have been many of that character, and my hon. friend has distinctly told us that it was not the legislation asked for by the thousands who petitioned this Senate, and he further showed that it was not at all equal to or as desirable as the License Act of Nova Scotia.

It being six o'clock the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH resumed:—I was about showing, before the House rose for recess, that not only is the license law of Nova Scotia very vigorously enforced on the part of the prosecuting officers, as well as private individuals, but every allurement is frequently offered to tempt people to violate the law. The temperance organizations watch closely the violations of the law, and we have known persons to be so zealous to punish as to offer inducements to men to go and purchase liquor under false pretences, and to represent that it was needed in the family for sickness, and otherwise to lead people into violation of the law, and afterwards, when they yielded, they were prosecuted for it. The hon. the Secretary of State means to say, in fact, unblushingly tells us, that in such cases the right of appeal from an unjust decision would defeat the ends of justice. I believe every British subject should enjoy the sacred privilege of carrying his case to a higher court when he thinks he has been treated with injustice either to his person or his property. The Government have introduced this Bill without consultation with the Supreme Court, to ascertain whether it is within our jurisdiction or not, although after Session the temperance organizations have approached the Government and requested them to have the question of jurisdiction decided. They not only bring in a measure which is regarded by many of the legal minds in this House as ultra vires, but they deprive the Provinces and municipalities of a source of revenue which it is believed they possess under the 92nd section of the British North America Act. They deprive the people of the right of going to a higher court, and ascertaining whether this arbitrary and despotic law is constitutional or not. Why is it not attempted to restrict the pernicious effect of the use of opium—which is well known to exist, and which greater injury to the party enslaved by its use? The Government cannot be sincere, otherwise they would not pass such an Act, one which the Secretary of State sees no necessity for; one which enables persons, too frequently lacking the necessary qualifications, to try such cases, and at the same time depriving the defendants of the right of appeal. The very character of this legislation will defeat its object. The hon. the Secretary of State says, he knows no part of the Dominion that wants it. He has shown that in Nova Scotia there is an excellent license law which works well, and it is not needed there. He has shown that in Quebec the municipal laws furnish all the legislation that is requisite. He has shown that in Ontario the Dunkin Act is in force. He is forced to fall back on New Brunswick. He says that that Province requires it. I think that is rather a stigma on the people of New Brunswick, because we can only draw the inference that the people of that Province are so addicted to intemperance that they require special legislation. The Province of New Brunswick, has under the British North America Act, the undoubted power to make laws for the regulation of this traffic within its own limits. Once the Legislature in New Brunswick passed a prohibitory law, and we all know the result of it. After a short trial it was repealed, and the Government which passed it was hurled from power. The Government have assumed the responsibility of passing a law which I believe is ultra vires, and which an infinitesimal minority can force upon the country, and subject it to strife and enormous expenditure. A more despotic Act has never been passed by any Parliament.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD moved to amend the preamble by inserting the words, "to promote temperance."

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I profess to be a free trader, hence I look upon all these measures which are a restriction on trade as being opposed to the interests of the people and commerce. I am not connected with the liquor traffic myself at present, and I never expect to be in the future. I have no relations engaged in it, and I do not think I have ever drunk a gallon of alcohol in all my life, any more than my honored friend from Sarnia. But I am opposed to the legislation which proposes to hamper trade. I have no desire to be engaged in the traffic at present, either by importation or otherwise, since it is so hardly dealt with, so shackled and so injured. I do not think that any spirited man who understands the trade of the country would permit himself to be engaged in a business that seems to be at present used for the purpose of raising duties for the Government and nothing else. He would simply be not a merchant but a broker for the purpose of raising duties and paying them into the treasury of this country. I desire to do justice to everybody, and as a free trader I look upon it as gross injustice to the liquor trade to pass a measure like this, because I believe Providence made the several countries of the earth that they might produce different articles of commerce to exchange with each other. The West Indies produce the sugar cane and molasses, which, when converted into rum, become an article of export. France furnishes her wines and brandies to Great Britain and other countries. We produce lumber, which is exchanged with the West Indies for their rum or spirits. Thus the trade goes on. The hon. Secretary of State, who occupies a very high position in this country, made the following strange remark: "My own opinion is that alcoholic stimulants of any kind are injurious to the human body." Such a declaration as this, coming from so high a source, will have its due influence on this country. As a great many people do not share this opinion of the hon. gentleman, I fear it will engender a great deal of ill-feeling. But I would remind the hon. Secretary of State that he does not look upon all alcoholic stimulants in the same way, because I understand the hon. gentleman is an excellent judge of the different kinds of wine, and periodically takes pleasure in recommending them. I think he is guilty of inconsistency in that respect, as I find that wines, even of the best kind, contain an average of from 13 to 37 per cent. of proof alcohol, and when the hon. gentleman recommends his friends to take that percentage of that deadly poison, as he considers it, he is neither treating them justly nor acting conscientiously. The hon. Senator from Sarnia, too, in his remarks upon this Bill spoke of this article of commerce as one which could only be represented by the upas tree. The hon. gentleman seems to forget that we derive a revenue of $6,000,000 a year from this same upas tree; and the total revenue from Customs and Excise is not $18,000,000 annually. He will see that one-third of it comes from the liquor traffic, and, I suppose a very considerable portion of it, too, goes to pay the salaries of very high officials in the land; and even members of the Senate, who advocate prohibition, benefit by it also. Another hon. gentleman referred to the condition of affairs in Ireland, and related the experience of the temperance men there. For the purpose of showing the hon. gentleman that his statement was not quite in accordance with facts, I would direct his attention to the extract which I am about to read from the pastoral of an eminent gentleman, known as Dr. Dorrian, one of the ablest Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland. It was directed against a Bill, similar in principle to this one before the Senate, sought to be passed by the British House of Commons. Dr. Dorrian condemned the Bill before the British House of Commons in the strongest language:

"For intemperance" he said, "Sunday closing is not and will not, in our opinion, prove a remedy. It will do other mischief, as was abundantly proved by the evidence given before the Committee of the Commons last year. It will lead to illicit consumption and the worst consequent immorality, from which we are now saved by the responsible and respectable publican. For, if the latter is not virtuous and respectable, then withdraw his license; and this punishment on the seller, as well as a judicious and suitable punishment on the excessive consumer, not on his or her innocent family, will produce sobriety, and prove to be a reasonably just remedy. Sunday is not the day on which the greatest amount of drunkenness troubles the peace of society. The evidence of last year shows it to be the most sober day of the seven, there being one-tenth, and not one-seventh, amenable on that day. We think there may be valid reasons for closing public houses at places of worship where clan fights take place. But where no abuse occurs, to close them is an act of the veriest tyranny, and inflicted by those who do not themselves abstain, on men their equals in virtue and sobriety. In the year 1876 there were over all Ireland, on each Sunday, 182, out of a population of 5,400,000, amenable for drunkenness." With respect to the measure of popular support the bill obtains in Ireland, Dr. Dorrian said:—"It is said the majority of the population is in favor of the measure. The contrary seems to be the fact, if we look to the memorial signed in favor of the Sunday closing. In this diocese fourteen priests have signed out of a total of 120, and some of those with conditions attached. In Dublin seventy have signed out of nearly 400 total. But what is singular, is, that all the signatories are persons who are to be in no way affected by the law, should it pass, and give us no assurance that they shall be adherents, at their own hearths, to the restriction they would impose."

This does not seem to me to carry out the declaration of my hon. friend, who, I might remark, is a new convert to temperance. My opinion is, that a license law is what is required. I believe a proper license law would regulate the traffic, that parties who abuse their privilege of enjoying the fruits of the earth should be punished the same as parties guilty of other offences. I believe that liquor dealers, when found guilty of improper conduct, should have their licenses withdrawn from them, and in this way the cause of temperance could be better advanced than by such legislation as the measure before the House. Besides there are numbers of persons in every country who are conscientiously in favor of taking their liquor or wines. They have their conscientious views, too, as well as those who claim to be teetotalers; and I hold an authority in my hand which expresses those views very clearly. And with the permission of the House, I will conclude my remarks (which I hope will be considered to the point) by reading from it as follows. It says:—

"Every gentleman has wine at his table whenever he has invited guests. Indeed, wine is considered an indispensable part of a good dinner, to which a gentleman has been formally invited. Even if you are a total-abstinence man yourself, you will not, if you are really a gentleman, attempt to compel all your guests to be so against their wish. If you are so fanatical that you have what is called "conscientious scruples" against furnishing wine, then you should invite none to dine who are not as fanatical and bigoted as yourself. You must consider that a gentleman may have conscientious scruples against dining with you on cold water, for there are even temperate, and sober gentlemen, who would go without meat as soon as be deprived of their glass of wine at dinner. The vegetarian, who would force his guests to dine on cabbages, sauer-kraut, and onions, is hardly guilty of a greater breach of etiquette than the total-abstinence fanatic who would compel his guests to go without wine."

The Bill was then passed.

CONFLICTING CLAIMS TO LANDS IN MANITOBA.

THE BILL AMENDED.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved, that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the Bill entitled, "An Act to amend an Act respecting conflicting claims to lands of occupants in Manitoba."

Hon. Mr. GIRARD moved in amendment,

"That it be an instruction to the Committee to amend the said Bill as follows:—

Clause A.

"The first section of the said Act is hereby amended by adding to it a third sub-section, immediately after the word 'aforesaid,' at the end of its second sub-section, as follows:—

"3. Any cases of claims to such lands, in respect of which applications have been made for Letters Patent under the said Acts, or either of them; but it has not been established to the satisfaction of the Minister charged with the administration of Dominion Lands that there has been peaceable possession and undisturbed occupancy of the same; and all such cases, shall come within the purview of this Act as if they were cases of adverse or conflicting claims."

He said, under the Act of 1870, known generally as the Manitoba Act, it was provided in the 32nd section, that all those who were in possession of lands at that time would have their titles confirmed by Letters Patent from the Crown. In 1874 a law was passed by which all those who had claims under the Manitoba Act in parts of the country in which the Indian title had not been extinguished on the 8th of March, 1869, were entitled to Letters Patent. In 1875, it was enacted that persons establishing undisturbed occupancy of land on or before July 15, 1870, should be entitled to receive Letters Patent therefor. Now, his object in moving this amendment was to enable parties who had applied for Letters Patent for lands which they had been using for many years, to have their cases heard, and if they had no good claim then their application should be refused. Their possession had been in good faith, they had paid taxes, and otherwise given proof of their ownership, and it was only lately they learned they were not entitled to Letters Patent in consequence of insufficient occupancy. The Government contended that "sufficient occupancy" meant that there should be a building of some kind on the land. He did not understand that to be requisite according to the usages and customs of Manitoba. It seemed to him that when there had been possession for years in good faith, there should be no hesitation in granting Patents for such lands. His amendment applied exclusively to those whose applications were already filed in the Crown Lands Office at Winnipeg. While the Lieutenant-Governor was a very efficient man for the position of Commissioner, he thought it was placing him in a very delicate position, to ask him to act in that capacity. It would be very much better if the Government would choose some old citizens of Manitoba, who were acquainted with the usages of the country, to adjudicate upon these cases. He was sure there were gentlemen there who, without any remuneration, would go with the Commissioner, and aid him in what he might term the pacification of the country. Many of the claims to which he referred, were only staked out, because in former years, that was the only way of indicating possession—either by putting down stakes or running a plough ridge, sometimes by building a small log house. Yet such claims as these were not recognized by the Government, although in Manitoba they had for years been considered as the very best evidence of ownership. Staked claims had been acknowledged even by this Government, to a certain extent, when provision was made for the relief of the Manitoba settlers. Two years ago the Government took mortgages on lands of this description, and they evidently considered at that time, that there was no dispute as to the ownership. Under all the circumstances it seemed to him the hon. Secretary of State should accept the amendment.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND rose to endorse the remarks of his hon. colleague. He considered the amendment a very desirable one. The parties to whom reference had been made were in general poor people who had not the means of bringing their claims before any tribunal, and were left entirely at the mercy of the local land agent, whose knowledge of their claims must have been in many cases imperfect, and it was chiefly on his reports to the Department that the claims were determined. Of course, when a decision was once given, there could be no redress. It would only be an act of justice to enable those settlers to submit what evidence they could in support of their claims. He thought the Commission should consist of three instead of only one, and it would also be very desirable that the Lieutenant-Governor should not be placed in such a position, especially when there was no lack of persons in that country well qualified to act. It was exceedingly desirable that one or more of the Commissioners should be conversant with the usages and customs of the country. Because it would be only fair that these claims should be judged by such usages and customs. These claimants were generally squatters, and had made more or less improvements, and the trouble was to decide what amount of improvement was necessary to constitute ownership. Therefore, it would be only fair that one or more of the Commissioners should be acquainted with the usages and customs of the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the object of this Bill was to facilitate proceedings before the Commissioners who were charged with the investigation of claims to lands in Manitoba. The hon. Senator from Manitoba (Mr. Girard) desired to enlarge the operation of the Bill by directing that certain things not heretofore recognized, might be brought before the Commissioners and investigated. Under the Manitoba Act, provision was made that all parties in peaceful possession or occupation of lands were entitled to have their rights respected. Subsequently, on three several occasions, that law had been enlarged and extended, giving a much wider interpretation to the original clause than was designed by those who framed the Manitoba Act. There was every desire to meet the wishes of the people there as far as practicable. He was inclined to think no man who had been in that country before the Dominion acquired the North-West Territories had been overlooked. Every one had been given more or less land, either by free grant or in the shape of half-breed lands or home stead lots. From all the information he could gather, the amendment which was now proposed would include claims of a purely speculative character. All well-founded claims had already been recognized. In Manitoba, just before the transfer, parties staked out lands in various places, not lands they lived on or cultivated or improved, but lands they wanted to acquire, and thought by the mere process of putting down stakes they would acquire some title to them. He did not think it would be proper for the Government to recognize claims of that character, more particularly as the claimants had been recognized in some other shape, either as half breeds, homesteaders, or those having the right to pre-empt lands. This amendment, if adopted, would necessarily result in giving certain speculators advantages over their neighbours. He did not think the hon. Senator could point out a single case where a substantial improvement had been made on land, and the party had no other lands, in which the Commissioner had hesitated to recognize the claim. He (Mr. Scott) had adjudicated thousands of claims, and he knew that the leaning was always to the occupant if he could establish any possible occupancy, either in the shape of labour or money.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND pointed out one class whose claims had not been recognized—parties who had been in the habit of cutting hay from year to year, many of them for thirty years, on the same piece of land.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Those claims are altogether a different class, and have been recognized.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND—These are not the regular hay claims, but claims beyond the four miles limit.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the hon. gentleman could not point out one substantial case of grievance or hardship where a party had built a house or cultivated the ground, or expended any of his labor upon it, or taken a crop from it. It was impossible to lay down any abstract principle to govern such cases. However, he would hold that any man who had expended $40 on his land, and had no other lot, should have the title to that property, if he came in at the time laid down in the Act. "Possession" indicated that a man must be in actual possession of land, not once or twice a year, when he might camp on it for twenty-four hours at a time.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND thought the House would agree with him, that a man must be camped more than twenty-four hours at a time to cut two or three hundred tons of hay every season. He knew a case of where a man had owned land for years, which he had cleared of stumps, and otherwise improved, but for which he could not get letters patent under the Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said it would be perfectly idle to leave anything of that kind to the Commissioners, unless the claims which should be respected were designated. The parties were either legally entitled to take the land, or they were not. If not, the commission had no power to give it to them. The question was, what occupancy gave possession? And that was a question which the Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Justice should agree upon. The most generous interpretation had been given to all those claims with every desire to do justice to all parties, but it would be perfectly idle to leave the subject to the Commissioners. If the distance were not so remote, there should be no intervention in the shape of a Commissioner between the claimant and the Government. The leaning had always been in the direction of the person who claimed the land, so long as there was no counter claim.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL believed that the hon. Secretary of State with a kindly disposition, was yet tied down by the usages recognised in the administration of the Crown Lands in the old Provinces of Canada, and did not allow himself to sympathize, as he should, with the exceptional state of things in Manitoba. The hon. gentleman had spoken of his experience in the adjudication of Crown Lands cases. He (Mr. Campbell) might safely say that he himself had had a larger experience himself. The Crown Lands Commissioner, though he might decide adversely in any case, would hear it at all events be it ever so weak or objectionable. He would hear, for instance, such a claim as that of a man who, during low water had used an island, and would give a decision as to whether the claimant was entitled to the possession of that island. All that the hon. Senator from Manitoba asked for was, that these cases be heard. That certainly was but fair and reasonable. Look at the Islands in the Ottawa River and the St. John River; many of the latter being worth £50 an acre. Nobody had ever lived on them, because every spring they were overflowed. Would it be said that in a case of that kind a man was not entitled to the property which he had been cutting hay upon perhaps for 30 years? Would it be said that he was not entitled to have his case even heard? If this amendment were rejected those men in the North-West would never be in a position to have their cases heard. It was simply out of the question that they could send their papers a thousand miles to submit them to the Government here, as suggested by the hon. Secretary. How were those poor half-breeds to present their case? It would be a denial of justice to refuse them the privilege of submitting their claims to the Commissioner who was upon the spot and could hear the evidence. If, on that evidence, it should be proved that they were mere speculators, then they could be refused Letters Patent for the lands they claimed. But, suppose a case were to come up such as the hon. Senator (Mr. Sutherland) had mentioned, where a man had cut 300 tons of hay every season on a piece of land in rear of the hay reserve, and that this sort of possession had constituted occupancy, according to the usages and customs of the country, would he not, in that case, be entitled to receive a patent for that land, or, at any rate, to be heard about it? The usages and customs of the people of Manitoba were as much entitled to respect, in cases arising in that country, as the usages and customs recognized in Ontario or Quebec. He trusted the hon. Secretary of State would not oppose this amendment. Manitoba had but two representatives in this House and four in the other. Of course the majority could say, "You shall not be heard, " because your possession is very slight, " and your usages and customs are different from ours," but that would be inflicting an injustice upon those people, and wounding them in a manner from which they would not recover. It would be acting in a manner all the more becoming, because it was from the strong towards the weak.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD repeated that his amendment only referred to those who had made application for patents, and consequently the number of cases could not be large. He only asked that they should be heard, and that their claims be decided according to the usages and customs of the country. He did not desire that new cases should be brought up before the Commissioners. He referred merely to those who had claims to lands prior to the 15th July, 1870.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY thought there was no great danger in adopting this amendment, because it covered a comparatively small number of cases. In the country from which he came, it would be a new doctrine to say that the fact of cutting hay year after year upon a piece of land did not constitute possession. He believed half of the hay lands in Nova Scotia were held by just such titles as that. There was no such thing as an enclosure. Perhaps two or three proprietors held a track of land in one vast body, extending for miles and miles, yet there could be no question that their title to it was as good as any in the country. After all, this amendment was merely to give claimants a chance to have their cases heard, and it was such a reasonable request, he was surprised that there was any opposition to it.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND said there was just one point which he had omitted which would throw some light on the usages and customs of the country. Prior to Confederation there were no patented lands there at all, and parties having lands beyond where they lived held them by the same title as the place where they resided.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said that on every occasion that legislation, with reference to the Manitoba lands, had come before this Parliament it had been to liberalize, until it would be improper in the interests of the country to go further. Any well defined claim had already been recognized and adjudicated upon. The class of cases which the Hon. Senator from Manitoba desired that the Government should recognize were not covered by what were known as the usages and customs that govern the Council of Assiniboine.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND—We only asked to be allowed to prove our claims.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said that any claimant whose claim was not recognised under this Act had the privilege of buying as much land as he required at a dollar an acre. The Government were trustees for the public, and it would not do to give away the public property right and left. The treatment of those who had resided in the Red River country before the transfer, had been most generous, but it would be unjust to the public to recognize claims of a purely speculative character. The Commissioners had taken up a considerable amount of time in adjudicating upon the many claims submitted to them; and it was a serious expense to the Department to have to investigate matters which led to no result. Any well defined claim was always heard by the Department.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD could not see why those people should have to pay for their lands which they had held for years, and for which, in all justice they should receive titles from the Crown. It seemed to him it was very hard to contest such claims; at the very least the Government should give the claimants a chance of being heard.

The House divided on the amendment which was adopted on the following division:—

THE PUBLIC WORKS AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House was put into Committee of the Whole on the Bill entitled, "An Act further to amend the Act entitled an Act respecting the Public Works of Canada."

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD in the Chair.

The Bill was reported, without amendment, read the third time, and passed.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read the second time:—

"An Act respecting the Port Whitby Harbor Company."

"An Act to grant certain powers to the Agricultural Assurance Association of Canada, and to change its name."

The House adjourned at 10:05 p.m.

THE SENATE.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock p. m.

After Routine proceedings.

PRINTING EVIDENCE IN DIVORCE COMMITTEES.

SELECT COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved:—

"That the question of printing the evidence taken in divorce cases before Committees of this House, be referred to a Committee to be composed of the Honorable Messieurs Botsford, Scott, Campbell, Bureau, Haviland, Miller and Seymour, with a view to their reporting a rule for adoption by the House."

After some discussion the motion was agreed to.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS moved:—

"That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that he will cause to be laid before this House, a statement setting forth the names of the foreign mutual life and stock companies that have not complied with the Consolidated Insurance Act of last Session, in respect of deposits for future business, the amount insured by such companies respectively, in Canada, at last returns made by them."

He said: It will be remembered by many hon. members of this House that when the Consolidated Insurance Act was before this House last Session, it was stated that it would have the effect of driving foreign mutual insurance companies from the Dominion. I believe some of them have retired, and I am anxious to know the names of those companies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will also call for the names of companies which retired during the year before the passage of the Insurance Act. Some companies have been coming in and others have been retiring, and a return confined to one year would give an erroneous impression.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—If there is any correspondence, perhaps it will show whether any companies have retired in consequence of the legislation of last Session. I have no objection to amending my motion to include the returns for the two years, and the correspondence I have referred to.

The motion was amended, as suggested, and agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS IN THE SENATE.

MOTION TO AMEND THE RULE.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved:—

The motion was agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills, reported from the Committee on Banking, Commerce, and Railways, were read the third time and passed.

“An Act to amend the Acts incorporating the Brockville and Ottawa Railway Company, and the Canada Central Railway Company, and to provide for the amalgamation of the said Companies.”

“An Act to incorporate La Societe de Construction du Comte d'Hochelega, as a permanent Building Society, and for other purposes.”

WITNESSES IN COMMON ASSAULT CASES BILL.

HOUSE IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the House do go into Committee of the Whole on the Bill intituled “An Act to provide that persons charged with common assault shall be competent as witnesses.”

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I would like to call the attention of the House to the principle of this Bill. It is of some importance, not so much from the enacting clauses, as from the precedent it establishes in criminal legislation. It introduces a new element in the laws of evidence as applicable to crime, and applies it not only to summary proceedings, but to indictments and informations for common assaults. It is quite true the Bill provides that where another crime is charged as well as common assault, such as aggravated assault, or assault with intent, it shall be competent for the Court to declare there shall be no case except for common assault. There is a proviso in the third section which is entirely new, and takes a good deal from the objections to the Bill; but still I feel it my duty to call upon the House to express an opinion as to the propriety of this very radical change, and what they consider its effect will be. Now, in the first place, as to trials. This Bill proposes not merely to make the defendant a witness on his own behalf, so as to give him an opportunity of justifying himself if he can, but also to compel him when called upon to be a witness against himself. That to a certain extent, is in the interest of justice, but at the same time, it is introducing an obnoxious principle unknown in this country, except in the temperance measure lately under our consideration. There is another provision which makes it peculiarly objectionable, that is, the wife or husband of the prisoner shall be competent and compellable to give evidence for the prosecution or the defence. A man who gets into a row and is indicted for assault, is by this Bill allowed to bring forward his poor, unfortunate wife to be a witness on his behalf. We all know the sort of pressure which a man who is likely to be guilty of assault, would bring to bear on a delicate woman to compel her to come forward and give evidence, and possibly commit perjury on his behalf, while she may be dragged forward to testify against him, and thus imperil her domestic happiness. I need not enlarge upon the subject. I have a further objection to this Bill—its effect as a precedent in criminal legislation. It is all very well to say this is confined to common assaults, but we know what the effect of a precedent is. We know this will be the entering wedge for greater changes in future. It may be said, this applies to cases which are to a large extent private prosecutions. So it may be, but there are many other cases, such as nuisances, obstructions to roads, etc., where parties are indicted and where they would be very glad, indeed, to have a provision in the law enabling them to come forward and give evidence on their own behalf, and thus add to the growing crime of perjury. Is it desirable, in the interest of justice, itself, that a premium should be put upon men testifying falsely in their own behalf, and a precedent established which I have no doubt will be followed very soon by a measure extending the principle to all cases of what may be admitted to be private prosecutions, and ultimately, to all criminal charges? I feel it my duty to ask the House if this is such a case as will warrant them in relaxing the ancient rule of criminal evidence, and establishing a precedent likely to be followed in the future in a manner that will not be conducive to the ends of justice, or to domestic comfort.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I cannot but feel there is a great deal of force in the observations of my hon. friend. We are called upon to notice an innovation in the laws of evidence which should be well considered before being adopted. At the same time, I must say, my own conclusions are in favor of the Bill before the House. My hon. friend well knows that the principle that is now sought to be applied to trivial cases of crime is one that has already had a long application in connection with civil cases. For a long time the law has been that a party interested in a suit is competent to testify on his own behalf, and compellable to give evidence against himself. Although for many years there was a very strong opinion among jurists against the wisdom of allowing interested parties to give evidence, still, I think the weight of the best opinion in regard to that subject, is in favor of the law as it now stands. If it was proposed to extend the principle to serious cases of crime, I should desire to give the subject much greater reflection before expressing approval of any such change, but we are not called upon to do anything of the kind in this Bill, though I am not sure but we may before long be called upon to consider a bill of that character. The subject has received a great deal of attention in England lately; and for the past two Sessions in the British Parliament Committees have been considering the propriety of altering the criminal law so as to permit the parties accused of the more serious offences in the criminal calendar to give evidence in their own defence, and I believe it is not at all improbable you will see, before long, an Act introduced into the British Parliament, which will largely modify the practice of criminal law. We are not called upon to consider that question just now, but may soon have it before us. I think we are apt—and perhaps it is a wise thing in the genius of our people—to cling somewhat superstitiously to old customs and usages, and we are slow, generally, to question the wisdom of things that have long existed. Much of the perfection which our institutions possess is, however, due to this aversion to change, which is inherent in our people. I have no difficulty, whatever, in agreeing to this slight innovation in the criminal law. We are asked to allow parties who are now competent and compellable to give evidence in civil suits in which immense sums of money and all their civil rights are at stake, to give evidence in small cases of common assault, where the penalty, at the outside, cannot be more than a small fine. The amount of money really at stake in any suit that can arise under this Act is so small as not to afford anything like the inducements to perjury, that would result from the most ordinary cases of litigation every day taking place before the courts of the country. Every day the parties who are likely to take advantage of this Act, are having cases before the inferior tribunals of the country, and we see them giving evidence on matters affecting their pockets to a considerable amount, and nobody supposes that, although occasionally there may be instances where perjury has been committed for small considerations, the law has had any other effect, on the whole, than to facilitate the ends of justice. This being the case, in regard to this measure, I do not think it is such an innovation as to cause any alarm, although it was perfectly right that my hon. friend, holding the views he does, should not look favorably on the passage of this Bill. We know at the present time, serious wrong and injustice frequently occur where parties charged with assault are not allowed to give evidence. Nobody knows better than those who are engaged in the practice of the profession, that, as the law stands, it is a race as to which party will get the process first, in order to ascertain who shall have the judgment of the court in his favor. Under the circumstances I shall vote for the measure.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I must say I agree with the remark of my hon. friend as to the unwisdom of going far in advance of what England may do in this matter, but I think in this case it is merely a question of damages, and the practice of the Courts for the past few years shows that we get at the truth in these cases by allowing the parties interested to give evidence, and justice is better done in the premises. We find very often under the existing law parties charged with common assault enter cross actions in order to get at the truth. I must say from my knowledge of the results in civil suits, where the question is purely one of damages, the system works well. The Bill meets with my approval.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL.—I was not present when the second reading of this Bill took place, otherwise I would have thought it my duty to protest against it. I agree to a certain extent with the arguments used in justification of the measure. According to my opinion, the best argument in support of it is that in assault cases one party is allowed to give evidence, and the one who enters the complaint first has an advantage over the other. Although at first sight it may appear perfectly fair that the defendant should be allowed to give evidence too, I consider that the admission of such a principle would be dangerous. In the Province of Quebec the principle of allowing interested parties to give evidence in civil suits is not recognized, and I hope it never will be. I think it would be a very dangerous innovation, as the experience of the Provinces, where the principle has been admitted, proves, if I have been well informed. It is said all comparisons are odious, and, therefore, I would not like to draw comparisons between the various systems of law in force in the different Provinces; but still, I think I may be allowed to assert that the system of civil law in force in the Province of Quebec has been admitted by juriconsults in every country as one of the best in the world. All the authors on civil law in Italy, Germany, Belgium, Switzerland, Spain, and even England—in fact all the European countries—consider the French system of law as the most perfect. I think it would be well to adopt the system in force in many countries, of taking the declarations of interested parties, but without giving them the value which attaches to the evidence of competent witnesses, and great latitude to the judge to draw his own conclusions from such declarations. From a legal point of view, I should say that if the wife be admitted to give evidence for her husband, while the judge may have strong reason to believe that she is influenced by her husband to give false evidence, he is bound by the law to decide the case according to the evidence. I think more latitude should be left to the judge, and that only the declarations of interested parties should be allowed. He could then exercise his discretion as to how much reliance could be placed upon such statements. I shall not oppose the Bill, although I think it a rather dangerous precedent to establish.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.—I am very glad to hear the general current of opinion is not hostile to this Bill; although, as has been observed, it is a new feature in our legislation. Changes are going on in the criminal law every year, and, I think, during the past four or five years they have been in the right direction. The practice of allowing interested parties to give evidence in civil proceedings was long ago introduced in our courts, and, in all proceedings in the Chancery Court, interested parties have, for more than a quarter of a century, been allowed to give evidence, and their evidence is taken by the tribunal for what it is worth. The testimony of all witnesses is not equal. The judge must decide as to its value by the manner in which the evidence is given. The necessity of applying this rule to cases in common assault, must have struck everybody who has taken an interest in the subject. Two parties, White and Green, have a row, and each considers the other the aggressor; White goes to one magistrate and swears out an information; Green goes to another, and has White brought before him. In such a case neither magistrate has the advantage of hearing both sides of the question, and there cannot be the justice rendered under such circumstances that there would be if both sides were heard by the one magistrate. The tendency in England has been in the direction of the principle of this Bill, and I believe the subject was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne at the late opening of the British Parliament. I may mention here that the Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick lately drew attention to the importance of legislation, in this direction. He proposed that interested parties should be competent to give evidence in cases very much more serious than common assault. I think the proposal was to include crimes—that a person standing in the dock under any charge whatever should be a competent witness in his own trial. The Bill before the House does not go any further than to apply the principle to cases of common assault. I think the effect of it will be good.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND—This Bill goes further in my opinion than any other legislation has hitherto gone in England. According to the latest authorities I have read on the law of evidence, in no criminal proceedings are interested parties allowed to be witnesses. There is one clause in the Bill to which I particularly object, and that is the one which authorises the wife to be a witness either for or against her husband. Naturally such evidence will always have more or less, a certain bias, and it will put the wife in a false position altogether. It cannot fail to interfere with the domestic relations of the husband and wife; relations which have been looked upon as so sacred, that it has always been thought far better that the wife's evidence should be altogether excluded in criminal cases. If her evidence should be the means of convicting her husband, it is self-evident that ever afterwards there could not be that domestic peace, harmony and affection between the husband and wife so necessary for the prosperity and happiness of a family. Therefore I am opposed altogether to that clause. I do not see so much harm in the other parts of the Bill; in fact I rather approve of them than otherwise. It is laid down in all the text books on the laws of evidence that the statement of a prisoner is something like Mahomet's coffin, between Heaven and earth; it ought to have more weight than an ordinary statement, but it has not the solemnity of an oath.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will give my hon. friend an illustration which will show the necessity of allowing the wife of an interested party to give evidence. Supposing a man and wife are walking together, and the husband gets into an altercation with another man, and is brought before a court on a charge of assault, would it not be proper in such a case that the wife should be a competent witness?

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND—Reverse it, and what would be the effect?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is for the tribunal to hear all the incidental circumstances. We know the tendency of the wife would be to screen the husband, and that tendency every tribunal would thoroughly comprehend and appreciate.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I must say I am not in favour of such legislation as this. It seems to me to be of a very dangerous nature, because respectable men are frequently assaulted in the streets at night, and if the individual making the assault is allowed to give evidence, the consequences will be most dangerous. I rise, however, to suggest that instead of making this a separate Act, it should be an amendment to Chap. 20 of the Statute of 1869, which relates to offences against the person. It would enable the magistrates who have to deal with this class of cases to refer more readily to it. As the Statute stands, justices of the peace will find it very difficult to familiarize themselves with all the details of the law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I quite agree with my hon. friend that many important changes might be made in the direction to which he refers. But I trust he will not ask me now to engraft this Bill on the Act relating to offences against the person, because I think it would not be wise to do so. The magistrates are from time to time provided with the criminal laws germane to their duties, and after a series of years they are published in one volume; and therefore justices have them in a convenient form for reference. The Bill was not originated by the Government.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—It ought to be a Government Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Perhaps any change in the criminal law should be made by the Government. However, we take the responsibility of this measure.

The House then went into Committee on the Bill, Hon. Mr. Alexander in the chair. The Bill was reported without amendment, and was ordered for third reading on Monday.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The Order of the Day being read for resuming the adjourned Debate on the Hon. Mr. Read's motion—To resolve, That this House regrets that the mode adopted by Government in relation to the construction of the Pacific Railway involves the expenditure of enormous sums of public money without any corresponding beneficial results.

Hon. Mr. PENNY said :—In attempting to address you upon this subject, I feel I ought to apologize in advance, because a great deal of what I have to say has been gone over by the hon. Secretary of State before me. But having looked into this matter from an entirely independent point of view, without any communication with him, I have arrived at the same conclusions as himself, and, therefore, I shall venture notwithstanding the repetition to mention them to the House. Perhaps I may throw some side-lights or new lights on some of the details, but generally I am afraid there will be something like monotony in the remarks I have to address to the House. Of course we all understand that very large expense is always incurred in the construction of a great railway, and I shall not be surprised if at different times a great many expenses have been, and will be incurred, that some gentlemen may think have been improper or imprudent, because it is almost impossible for a work of this gigantic sort to be carried out without some mistakes being made, which experience will show might have been avoided had it been possible to foresee them. I think the resolution before the House, however, is one that would not be justified by the facts. I confess I was very much surprised that the hon. gentleman from Belleville should have gone again over the details of this steel rails question. Not that I imagined that gentleman would have gone back from the opinions he has hitherto formed. I perfectly well understand that many hon. gentlemen in this House think it was an unwise thing to buy the rails at that time, and that loss has been sustained in consequence of it. Perhaps there has been loss, but the question of the propriety or impropriety in buying the rails, does not altogether depend on what we know now of the transaction. Those who had to undertake to build the railway, had to look upon it in the light of experience. They found at that time that rails were at a very low price—at such a low price as had not been touched for a great many years, and never except for a moment. It seemed manifest to many people that it would be a long time before they could be bought at that low figure again. At all events, whether the Government bought profitably or otherwise, they acted on the same principles as a great many shrewd business men who wanted to make money have acted on in general business matters. They bought, believing a great rise in price was certain. To show how impossible it is for the ablest business men to foresee the fluctuation in values during a time of depression, I shall read the following extract from the Chicago Tribune :—

“A remarkable change is to be noticed in the financial articles of newspapers, and the tone of conversation among business men. The confident statements that “hardpan”, has been reached, that the worst is over, that reaction has begun, that things are on the up grade are heard no longer. Three years was unanimously decided in the 3rd year after the panic, to be the extent of the period of restriction; but here, in the fifth year after September, 1873, prices are still going down. The estimated decline of prices in the year has been 10 per cent.”

Now, I suppose there is no one in the world, who, beforehand, would have imagined any such depreciation of prices as that, and the fact that people have been losing money from this depreciation of values shows that this Government, like other people, thought while prices were so low, it was a good time to buy, and failed in their object in consequence of misconstruing the signs of the times. They did nothing more than the shrewdest business men of the country had done. This was a question, however, that was open to everybody, and the gentlemen who were of the same view as the hon. gentleman, the mover of this resolution, now thought it would have been better not to buy the rails until they were actually required. But we all understand how very easy it is to be wise by experience, and, in that light, this transaction is a fair matter for discussion. As to the conclusion which has been arrived at by the hon. gentleman from Belleville, that there has been anything like jobbery or favoritism in the steel rails purchase, however, it is a conclusion that cannot be derived from the printed correspondence and the circumstances set forth in that return. It is a complicated matter, no doubt, and it takes some time to find what is called the "true inwardness" of the affair. My hon. friend on the other side has taken a great deal of pains to make out a case against the Government. But he seems to me to have failed, after all, to understand it, and especially failed in observing the points that tell against the theory he has adopted, and, I think, adopted improperly. I shall say little about the advertising for tenders, because the result of that advertising justifies the mode of it in the minds of all impartial men. Whether the notice was advertized badly or otherwise, need not be questioned, when we see that the largest number of tenders that could be expected by any advertizing were actually obtained. Twenty-eight tenders came in from houses that, I suppose, no man will pretend to say can be excelled by other manufacturers in that trade; so that there can be no question that the advertizing produced exactly the result that a man who wanted to get iron at the lowest possible price would have desired. Those offers were not from one class of people only, nor were they confined to one country. They were offers from English, French, Scotch, Welsh and Belgian firms, and one unlucky man under the high pressure system of the United States, which, we are told, makes everything so cheap, put in a tender which was ridiculously in excess of those of everybody else. The returns show that the contracts were awarded to the lowest tenderers; that is to say, every man who tendered at a low price got the quantity he tendered for, to begin with. The lowest price was that of Cox & Green, and the quantity they tendered for was ordered from them as it was ordered from others, according to the quantity required and according to the quantity that each of them had tendered for. My hon. friend has made this point: he says that after the tenders had been in, and after, I think he said, they had been accepted—the first quantities of them—that Cox & Green

being the lowest tenderers, applied again to the Government and said, "Now, if you want more rails we can let you have them at the same price." I understood him to reason in this way: that Cox & Green were told no more rails were wanted, and then, having disposed of them in that easy manner, somebody else, at a subsequent date, was awarded the contract, to fill the gap made by refusing to take more rails from them at this low rate. I think, if he had looked more carefully at the matter, he would have found that Cox & Green did apply for the supplying of 5,000 tons more than their first tender and the original contract awarded to them. To their first offer of this additional lot, however, they were told, "no more rails wanted, thanks." That was the reply; but it seems that sometime after, Cooper, & Fairman who are supposed by my hon. friend to be the favored individuals throughout, also enquired if any more rails were required, and in the same way they were told that no more were wanted. Now, on the very day that those supposed favored people were thus told that no more rails were wanted from them, Cox & Green received an order for the other five thousand tons that they wished to supply; so that instead of being got rid of, as has been stated, Cox & Green's larger offer was accepted, and the other firm, Cooper, Fairman & Co., was for the time shunted off. There is another remarkable point about the second offer of Cox & Green for 5,000 tons: they did not offer an unlimited quantity, and I have reason to believe they had no unlimited quantity to offer. What they offered was just the additional 5,000 tons, and they stated in their letter that unless this was accepted at once the rails could not be furnished, for the reason that somebody else was in treaty for the lot. I think that shows very plainly that there was no disposition to pass over Cox & Green, or rather their principals, the West Cumberland Company, in order to favor anybody else. Their offers were exhausted before the next lowest tender was come to. That is what I find in the returns that we have before us, and I think that is a very fair commencement de preuve, as we say in Lower Canada, to base further evidence upon. I find then that this view which I have gained from the official papers is further borne out by the statement of Mr. Thomas Workman, made in the House of Commons. I suppose no one will doubt that that gentleman said what was true when he alleged that he had been informed by Cox & Green that the Minister had offered to take as much from them as they could supply at their low price.

Hon. Mr. READ—Is that in the correspondence?

Hon. Mr. PENNY—You will find no offer in the paper from them beyond this 5,000 tons, and there was a condition attached that unless their offer was taken at once the rails could not be furnished. As I have said before, the papers show that the Government at first took all that Cox & Green offered, and that they offered this lot on the condition that it must be taken at once or not at all. Now, I supplement that by the statement of Mr. Thomas Workman as to what Cox & Green had told him. I thought, however, it was best to go to headquarters in this matter, and accordingly I addressed the following telegram to Cox & Green themselves:—

“Did Mackenzie want more rails from you than he got in 1874?”

And this is the telegram I received in reply:—

“MONTREAL, April 11.

“To E. G. PENNY:—

“We obtained a contract for ten thousand tons, which was all our principals, the West Cumberland Company would supply.

“(Signed), COX & GREEN.”

I think this is pretty good evidence—at all events, it is evidence from headquarters—and, unless hon. gentlemen are prepared to go into some examination, that will prove that what those gentlemen state is not true, we are, I think, bound to accept the assurance of men who are as respectable and worthy of belief as any one in this Senate. The hon. gentleman subsequently remarked that he found no fault with any of the awards to Cooper, Fairman & Company, except with the order for the last 5,000 tons, which were given to Naylor, Benson & Company. It is quite true that there was no tender from Naylor, Benson & Company amongst the tenders that were sent in, but what is also true is, that the price on which Naylor, Benson & Company got the order was the lowest tendered for, Cox & Green's offers having been exhausted before this supplementary order was given. That, I think, disposes satisfactorily of the rail question. As to the nuts and bolts, the hon. gentleman made this point: he said that Messrs. Darling & Company offered nuts and bolts at a lower price than any other person; and he said, also, that, comparing the price that they tendered at and the price that was obtained by Cooper, Fairman & Company, or, rather, by their principals, the latter was an excessively high one. On the first blush of the thing, that appears to be not an unreasonable statement; but there are several things that appear in those papers which the hon. gentleman has not brought out, and which, I think, throw a different light on the subject. I am not going into the reasons of the Secretary of State for the form of tender, which made it essential that a proper supply of the nuts and bolts should go with the rails. I am putting that out of the question for the moment, and looking at what the papers disclose. Now the hon. gentleman passed very readily over the tender of Messrs. Watson & Company, as represented by Mr. McIntyre, and he said he did not know much about it. Mr. McIntyre's tender was made out at $92.47 per ton. I think it was the very lowest. That gentleman was then told on behalf of the Government that he was likely to get the contract for the nuts and bolts, but he refused to accept it, and said he felt certain that his principals would not take the contract for those nuts and bolts without getting the contract for the steel rails. The nuts and bolts were a very small percentage of the whole order, and to take the contract for them alone at a very low rate would I suppose have been to lose money. At all events that is what he said. The communication made to Mr. McIntyre on behalf of Watson & Company is this: “Your price for nuts and bolts is lowest, but the rails are higher.” The reply was that he felt sure his principals would only take an order for bolts and nuts, provided they got an order as well for some of the rails. This letter was followed on the same day by this telegram:—“I wrote by mail to day, meantime reserve some of rail order. Watson, I fancy must have order for some rails as well as bolts and nuts.” It shows this, that the price of nuts and bolts by themselves affords no criterion of the propriety of the bargain. Then there is another thing that the hon. gentleman from Belleville did not tell us. He spoke of the $101 per ton paid to Cooper & Fairman as being such a monstrous price that it was no wonder Cooper, Fairman & Co. "grabbed" at it. At all events he represented that those gentlemen had got something by the favoritism of the Government that was wonderfully profitable to them. But, on being asked to deliver the nuts and bolts at this monstrous price, they actually refused to have anything to do with that order until, in the case of one lot, they were compelled to do so by the Government. So that the thing that was represented as being of the utmost value to those gentlemen seems to have been of no value at all, on the contrary, they wanted to get rid of it; and did get rid of it to some extent. As the Mersey Co. would have nothing to do with the nuts and bolts, you will find in the correspondence that Cooper, Fairman & Co., their agents, rather than lose the whole affair, said to the Government: "Take the rails at this cheap price, and we will find other manufacturers who will furnish the nuts and bolts." They accordingly asked, and obtained permission, to supply 5,000 tons of the nuts and bolts, the manufacture of Robb & Co. From another part of the return it would seem that they asked again to be allowed to supply nuts and bolts of another manufacture than that of the Mersey Co. The Government replied, "No." I presume that is one reason why the tender of Darling & Co. for these nuts and bolts came to nothing, as it was something like the case I mentioned of Mr. McIntyre, as tenderer on behalf of Watson & Co. I suppose Messrs. Darling would not, in any case, have taken the nuts and bolts without a steel rail contract as well. If, however, the hon. gentleman from Belleville had informed us of all that he must have found in the papers, he would have told us that, practically, Darling and Co's. tender was withdrawn because they never had the power to offer a price for the rails, because their offer was confined to the nuts and bolts, and because eventually their principals took the matter out of their hands. In the course of the correspondence, the last communication from these gentlemen was to the effect that their principals had tendered on their own account, so that they were practically out of the matter altogether. That I presume to be the case, for we hear no more of their desire to supply the nuts and bolts. My hon. friend from Belleville represented that Darling & Co. were very much injured by the contract being taken away from them. I have rather an extensive acquaintance in Montreal, and I have discussed this matter with many gentlemen in the trade, and especially with one of the late firm of W. Darling & Co., over and over again; I have heard him say that no fairer contract was ever awarded than this. To be quite sure, however, I have by telegraph asked Mr. Darling whether he had any reason to complain of the treatment he had received in the awards for the nut and bolt contract, and the following is the telegram which I received in reply:

"MONTREAL, 6th April.

"To Edward G. Penny:

"Have no reason to complain.

"(Signed) WM. DARLING."

In that case, as in the other, I went to headquarters, and surely if these gentlemen thought that they had been illused, and that higher tenders of other parties had been accepted over their heads, they would have taken an opportunity of protesting against such an injustice. Those gentlemen possess that Scottish character, If I may be allowed without offence to refer to the ticklish question of Scottish characteristics, I should say that these gentlemen possess in the full measure the per servitium ingenium Scotorum, but that being Lowlanders, this energy is shown less in a disposition to appropriate what belongs to others, than in a very powerful tenacity of whatever fairly belongs to themselves.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Then there is another thing that I need hardly refer to, as the Hon. Secretary of State has already alluded to it, but I think it would have been more candid if the hon. gentleman from Belleville had seen fit to remind us of it. He told us of the tender of Darling & Co., which he spoke of as being extremely low; that was, however, to be free of duty, but he should have told us, I think, that in the case of some of the $101 per ton bolts and nuts supplied by Fairman & Cooper, the duty was to be paid. There was a duty of 5 per cent on the nuts and bolts, which made something like half the difference in the two prices. But the true fact I believe was that the nuts and bolts contract was never desired by Darling & Co., by itself, and that as I have already shown it was positively refused by Cooper, Fairman & Co's. principals, who are supposed to have got an enormous benefit from it. With regard to the transport of the rails, I have not perhaps got as much information as I have about the purchase. I am not acquainted personally with any gentleman who had anything to do with the freighting, but I find a table in the return which shows that the price given was 20 cents a ton more than the lowest price tendered for. The lowest price tendered was by Mr. Samuels, but Mr. Samuels withdrew his tender, as is shown by the correspondence in the printed return. The hon. gentleman from Belleville says he only withdrew his tender after he had been told that the contract had been disposed of. I admit that there is an incongruity about the dates at first sight, but I should like to know why he withdrew his tender at all, if he thought he was able to carry it out? It is evident if he felt, as the hon. gentleman thinks he felt, that the contract had been taken away from him in an unfair manner, that he would not be likely to assist the Government out of a scrape by sending them a letter saying he could not have fulfilled the contract. The fact brought out in the correspondence is that Mr. Samuels is not a shipowner, and when he was applied to by the Government to know what vessels he could furnish to fulfill his contract with, he had to reply as his final answer, that he could not do it at all. Perhaps other people had monopolized the vessels that he expected to control. At all events it appears by his last letter that he could not obtain them. I might say that there is an evident error in the dates of the correspondence, and it may be that the notice from Mr. Samuels, that he could not fulfil the contract, had been sent in to the Government before the communication made to him that he would not have it. Anybody who looks at it will observe that there is an error of a whole year in the dates. I am not going to make a point of that, but the gentleman evidently withdrew his tender for some reason known to himself, but quite inexplicable, if he could and wished to fulfil it. I suppose he would not have done so, unless he felt that he was unable to fulfill it. Coming to the other points to which my hon. friend alluded, and which, at least, have something of the charm of novelty about them, I may say what has struck me chiefly is the very chaotic state of opinion that prevails among hon. gentlemen that have taken a leading part in the Pacific Railway question on the other side of the House. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Macpherson) has a very strong opinion upon this subject. We all know he thinks now that the line from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg is entirely a mistake. I say he thinks that now, and the hon. gentleman who sits behind me, showed us the other night that he thought so at another period. But there was also a period—an interim period—when he thought very differently, because I find this is one of the utterances of the hon. gentleman on an occasion between the two periods referred to. He says, in one of his pamphlets, respecting Sir Hugh Allan's Company: "He believed it was the intention of the company to connect at Sault Ste. Marie with the Northern Pacific Railway, and use that line between the two points named." That very thing is what the hon. gentleman had previously thought should be done, and what he thinks should be done now, but in the pamphlet I refer to, he made the following statement:—

"If this is carried on, our great national enterprise, instead of being the successful rival of the American company competing for the Asiatic trade and building up the Dominion as no other undertaking can do will simply be the Canadian branch of the Northern Pacific Railway."

We all of us occasionally alter our minds, and I think it is clear that the hon. gentleman has altered his. At the time when he thought in the manner I have just described, he had the good fortune to have almost all his fellow countrymen in the Province of Ontario with him. But, again, the Hon. Mr. Aikins has a different opinion from that entertained by the hon.

member for Saugeen. He thinks that the most important part of the road that can be made is this branch from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg. The rest may be a very good thing in its way, but it is a matter of very small consequence to Ontario, and all the rest of the world is bound up in the fortunes of that great Province unless this is also completed. There are several gentlemen on that side of the House also who think the Georgian Bay Branch is a very mischievous scheme, but I suppose they observed on the division that took place when that subject was under consideration that three hon. gentlemen from Lower Canada, who usually vote with them, left the House rather than join in their resolution. That, I imagine, indicated that on this subject, at all events, there was a great difference of opinion amongst those gentlemen with regard to this part of the Pacific Railway policy. But then these Lower Canadian gentlemen who did not agree with the majority on the other side in condemning the Georgian Bay Branch were entirely unanimous with the bulk of the majority in regard to the Esquimaux and Nanaimo Branch. But again, there were gentlemen from British Columbia, who usually act with the Opposition, who did not vote with them on that question, and who think it very hard that they should have lost their pet project of the Esquimaux and Nanaimo road at the hands of their friends. We have not all the wisdom on this side of the House, however, and I think the hon. gentlemen on the other side showed their wisdom on that occasion. I showed my faith in their wisdom by voting with them. I mention these diversities of opinion to show the impossibility of unanimous agreement on what is to be done with regard to the routes and branches of the Pacific Railway scheme. It follows that if the Government should be disposed to take the advice of hon. gentlemen opposite, they would find themselves in the unfortunate position of the venerable individual in the fable we all have read of in our school-boy days, who being too good natured and seeking to please everybody, really pleased nobody, and lost an animal, which respect for this body forbids me to mention. I believe, however, I have brought in this rhetorical point a little too soon. I desire to point out that the hon. gentleman from

Hon. Mr. Penny.

Manitoba (Mr. Girard) also has a peculiar idea of his own about this railway. He says he is very much pleased with the Pembina Branch, but he is afflicted by the thought that it is going to take all the traffic of the Province to the United States. I presume that any person who had anything to do with the initiation of that part of the enterprise, however, knew very well from the beginning, that the road from Winnipeg to Pembina went to the United States, and one would suppose that whatever inconvenience there may be from it--if there be any inconvenience in the country being put in communication with the United States--would not have been discovered as it seems to have been, at the very last moment. It shows again the impossibility of the hon gentlemen on the other side making up their minds as to what should be the proper policy. Whatever the Government have done, and whatever they are doing and whatever they may propose to do, however it is approved by some of these gentlemen, others will look upon it as a sheer waste of money, will tell them that they ought to be doing something else, and if they will only take their advice everything will be serene and beautiful. Although I voted with the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition on the occasion of the rejection of the Esquimaux and Nanaimo Railway Bill, hon. gentlemen from British Columbia did not, I think, congratulate themselves on the company they had been keeping, and I am not sure but some other gentlemen will find that it would have been much better if they had taken a more moderate view of this whole question of the Pacific Railway. I have endeavored to show how impossible it is, from the division of opinion that exists on the other side of the House, to fix upon any definite plan with respect to this railway which will please them all. I conclude whatever ministry are in power they will have to fix on their own plan, and carry it out accordingly, to the best of their own judgment. I think it is likely, if the hon. gentleman from Kingston was on this side of the House, he would have a plan that hon. gentlemen who would then be in opposition would have ample cause to find fault with. That, even then, some would be found to assert it should be built at this place or at another place, different from the official choice, that we might easily lament its location and manner of construction, and express our regret, perhaps not unreasonably, that so much money had been uselessly expended. Amongst other things of which the Government have been charged, was involving the expenditure of a great deal of money on the Fort Francis Lock. It needs no discussion to show that this Fort Francis Lock would not have been undertaken had it been known at the time it was commenced that the railway route was to have been laid down on the present location. And my hon. friend from Toronto, in speaking of this matter, said, with a great deal of candour and propriety, that he should not have blamed the Government for building this lock had they stopped the expenditure at a certain point. It seems to me then that the whole problem is this: whether, after expending a large amount of money, it was desirable to abandon the work or go on, and, by an expenditure of another sum of money, make something of it that would hereafter be useful to the country. This depends entirely on the question as to whether the lock is useful or not. I have not been there, but, judging from what I have read in the reports of gentlemen who have been there, the result of this work will be the opening of navigation in one direction, eastward, some forty-four miles, to Kettle Falls; in another direction sixty-eight miles, to Sturgeon Falls, and, on the west, to Rat Portage, about 155 miles, making, in all, a direct distance of 267 miles of navigation—as long as Lake Ontario. But this navigation is really much increased in consequence of the indentations of the coast, and we all know how much more disposed people are to take up land in the immediate vicinity of navigation than back in the interior of the country, even if there be a railway through it.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—But there is no good land there.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—It is the experience of the whole country that people have preferred to settle upon the banks of rivers and lakes rather than upon lines of railways, because railways give them but very narrow means of access while the other affords a very broad one. It has been said that it would be a very expensive matter, apart from the lock, to complete this navigation from Kettle Falls to Rat Portage. I have been informed, however, on good authority that the construction of the lock at Fort Francis has already obliterated by its dam the rapid above it, without any further improvement being necessary at that point. So that there is no difficulty whatever in vessels drawing five feet of water passing through that navigation to the eastward. On the next side below the lock there has never been any difficulty about the depth of water, the only trouble in that direction being the intricacy of the channel in the Longue Sault, which can be improved at a small expense by the removal of a few boulders, and the Manitou rapids. The latter is the first met with below the Fort Francis Lock, and it presents no very great difficulty even now, because a vessel of six horse power comes up against the current with the aid of cattle or horses to tow it through the swift current at that particular point. The conclusion that I would draw from those facts is, that whether the lock costs more or less money it will at all events open a very useful stretch of navigation—I say for the moment extensive, I will not say useful, because I will come to that presently,—but an extensive navigation, at an expenditure not desirable to have undertaken for its own sake at present, but which will have a very valuable return in the increased facilities which it will afford for the settlement of that part of the country. It will afford free communication from one end of this stretch of water to the other, and especially will open up communication with the railway at Rat Portage. I think that the opening of a navigation like this, if it is in a country that possesses a capacity for usefulness, whether it be a matter of a hundred thousand dollars or two hundred thousand dollars expenditure, will not, in the long run, be of any great concern to us. I consider it would have been a great mistake, after having laid out $80,000, to have abandoned this work, when, by going on and completing it, we can obtain a good result. I am one of those unfortunate persons who are obliged to trust to other people for information in this matter. I know there are gentlemen in this House, who have been in that country, but, with all respect for the capacity for observation which those gen-men have, I do not think a rapid passage through a wilderness, such as they made, is just the thing to inform us of its capabilities. On the other hand, I think it rather tends to deceive. I hold in my hand, however, the Sessional papers of 1875, from which I propose to read a few extracts from the report of Mr. Dawson, a gentleman who, I fancy, enjoyed the confidence of the late Government, and, I dare say, with very good reason, as, I believe, he is a man very competent for the purposes for which he was employed. I do not think on this side of the House anyone—although some others may differ from him in opinion—will say he is incompetent. Great stress has been laid on the statement that there are many hundred miles of that country where the foot of white man never trod.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—That was the language of the Premier.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Perhaps it did not refer precisely to the same point. However, whether it was the language of the Premier or not, I dare say it was a very proper remark. I am not complaining of it, because in this country of vast territory there are many stations where white men have never set their feet, and in which we are expending vast sums, I suppose in order to make such places suitable for white men to go into and settle upon hereafter. It has been said that no white man ever could set his foot in the country of which I have been speaking. But, in the face of all this, I find that Mr. Dawson, under the heading of his report, "The Fertile Lands of the Red River Route," referring to the lands lying just about this section of the country, says:—

"I have referred to the Rainy River district in previous reports as being well adapted to settlement, both from the fertility of its soil and the advantages of its situation. Alluvial land of the best description extends along the banks of Rainy River, in an unbroken stretch of seventy-five or eighty miles from Rainy Lake to the Lake of the Woods. In this tract, where it borders on the river, there is not an acre unsuited to cultivation. At intervals there are old parks, like Indian clearings overgrown with oak and elm, which although they have naturally sprung up, have the appearance of ornamental plantations. From the mouth of Rainy River this fine tract continues along the southern coast of the Lake of the Woods, eastward to the Sebaskin (or Labyrinth), a district so called from the intricacies of the channels among innumerable islands. In this stretch of forty miles, two rivers, called respectively the Big Wild Rice and Little Wild Rice, enter the Lake, and on the banks of these rivers, for some distance inland, the soil is equal to that on the borders of Rainy River."

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—That is the Rainy River district.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Yes, but that extends as far back east, at all events, as Sturgeon Falls.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Only to the Lock.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—He says a great deal more than that:

"Having reference generally to the tract under consideration, it may be described as bounded to the east by the lower area of Rainy Lake, which runs thirty miles into the country in a northerly direction, to the south by Rainy River, to the west by the Lake of the Woods, and to the north by the Laurentian Hills. Its area is of sufficient extent to afford room for fifty townships, and although it may not all be of equal fertility, it is known for a certainty that on the banks of Rainy River, on the south coast of the Lake of the Woods, and on the borders of the two streams which I have mentioned, it cannot be surpassed.

Here, then, is a connected water frontage of at least 150 miles, bordered by land adapted for continuous settlement. The advantages of such a means of communication in a new district are strikingly evident. A settler needs but a boat to go to the mill with his grain, or to procure boards for his buildings, and thus finds himself for a long time independent of roads, which, under the most favorable circumstances in new countries, can only be gradually introduced.

"The whole district is covered with forests, and Canadian settlers would find themselves in a country, similar in many respects to the places of their nativity, nor does the climate differ essentially from that of the most favored parts of Ontario or Quebec. Wheat was successfully grown for many years at Fort Francis, both by the old North-West Company and their successors—the Hudson's Bay Company. The Indians still cultivate maize on little farms on Rainy River, and on the islands of the Lake of the Woods. In many places the wild grape grows in extraordinary profusion, yielding fruit which comes to perfection in the fall. Wild rice, which requires a high summer temperature, is abundant, and indeed the flora taken generally indicates a climate in every way well adapted to the growth of cereals."

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—The lower arm of Rainy Lake would be within two or three miles of Fort Francis Locks, as Rainy Lake runs down to within a mile and a half of Fort Francis. The good land is all down Rainy River.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Mr. Dawson further states :

“What has been said of the Rainy River district, is in many respects applicable to the more limited areas of good land, and other parts of the highway to the North-West. On the Thunder Bay road, the Government of Ontario has recently laid off free grant lands which will doubtless prove attractive to emigrants, on account of the ready market which they are sure to find for agricultural produce. At many other places along the route there are tracts of greater or less extent fit for settlement, in proximity to groves of pine, or lands likely to yield valuable minerals.”

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—That is not the good land. The good land is one thing and the forests of pine are another.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Sometimes people go in amongst the forests of pine and establish themselves there. Mr. Dawson further reports :

“Independently of the lumber trade which must spring up from the demand for boards and timber generally in the unwooded prairies to the west, there are evidences that other industrial occupations will arise. The Indians both of Rainy Lake and the Lake of the Woods have among them specimens of native gold and silver ore, which they affirm is to be found, in places known to them, in abundance, and the rock formation is such as to corroborate their statement. Iron ore is plentiful in many sections, and charcoal for smelting easily obtainable. Granite, which experts say is equal in texture and fineness to the best imported specimens, is to be found at the Lake of the Woods, and the slate of which the Indians make pipes, a very valuable article for the construction of furnaces, is abundant at Rainy Lake and Sebaskin. These, together with stone for building which is quite unlimited in quantity, may yet find a market on the prairies, where there is neither stone nor tree. It is important to settlers to know that in establishing themselves in such a district they need not be limited to one occupation, that they can have work in prospect for the winter months, and various branches of industry open to them, in which they may engage.”

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—That is to the west.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—It shows, at all events, that there is some very good land in that neighborhood.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I think what was said on this side of the House was, that the good land is confined to the banks of Rainy River. I do not think you have shown that there is any tract of good land around Rainy Lake.

Hon. Mr. Penny.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I see, at all events, it is stated that, on the west side the good land goes back to a considerable distance. Then there is a large quantity of lumber which will go both ways ; and I am told there are 250 square miles of timber limits already located, and the lumbermen expect to make 150,000,000 of feet of lumber in there.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — That lumber will all go west.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—When the lock is completed you will have for navigation two lakes, with nothing but this lock between them. The outlet is, of course, to the end of the lake. If I were there I should not propose to climb up the 400 feet rise that has been spoken of, nor do I think that anybody ever contemplated that course. In conclusion, I may say, with the hon. Secretary of State, in reference to the Kaministiquia part of this subject, that a fair course has been adopted by the Opposition. I refer to the Committee of enquiry which they have obtained. Against that I have nothing to say, because the hon. gentlemen who conceive there is something wrong in the transaction have taken the right course in asking for a committee and investigating it in the proper manner. I wish that the same course had been pursued in all those cases where attacks have been made upon the Government. Instead of that, charges have been made which have been met by men as responsible as any hon. gentleman here, with flat denials. But, instead of those denials being accepted on the one hand, or on the other any attempts being made to controvert them by the examination of witnesses under oath who are acquainted with the whole of the facts, insinuations have been continued, accusations have been kept up, and I suppose it is intended that they shall be kept up until after the elections, no matter what the facts may be. There is no doubt whatever that the attendance of any of the gentlemen concerned in this steel rails transaction could have been obtained in a very few hours, and the whole matter could have been investigated from first to last before a committee. I do not think anybody can doubt that if it was believed these charges could be substantiated, such a committee would have been called for long ago. My hon. friend the Secretary of State remarked very justly that we ought not to attack the character of our public men in this reckless manner. He spoke of the Premier as occupying a very high position in the country, and said his integrity should not be attacked without good and sufficient reason. I quite admit that all other Premiers should be treated in the same way, and unless the attacks are followed up in such a manner as to establish the correctness of the charges, they should not be made at all. We all know that in a matter, which I do not at present wish further to allude to, that was the course that was pursued. I think it was the proper course. I have not heard an attack from this side of the House on the character of any public man, and I hope no one will be disposed to make them unless he is prepared to accept denials, or to stand by them and establish them by evidence under oath if necessary. I think this is due to all our public men. I do not care which side of politics they are on, they should be respected amongst ourselves in order that our country be respected elsewhere.

At 6 o'clock the House rose for recess.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON resumed the debate. He said: The motion of my hon. friend from Belleville afforded great range for debate, and the hon. Secretary of State certainly took advantage of the scope afforded him, and travelled across the continent along the line proposed for the Pacific Railway. I did not intend to follow him over much of that ground, but the hon. gentleman from Montreal (Mr. Penny) who addressed the House to-day, said so much about the Pacific Railway, and directed so many of his remarks to me, personally, that I must make a few observations on the subject. The hon. gentleman dwelt to some extent upon my own opinions, past and present, with respect to that enterprise. I think my views in the past, and my views at present, are very well known to this House and to the country. I have never changed my opinion as to what the true policy should be in constructing that work. The hon. Senator insinuated to-day that I had changed my mind for a time, or at all events, that I had suppressed my opinion from motives, I think he intimated, of a selfish character.

Hon. Mr. Penny.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—No.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman said my opinions had changed at a certain time, and that there were peculiar motives for doing so.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I made no allusion to it.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I have always been of opinion that the all-rail line was too heavy an undertaking for this country to enter upon; I thought our policy should have been to have begun our railway at Pembina, and carried it across our prairies as fast as our circumstances would permit, and as fast as the settlement of the country might require. That was my policy. While that was being done, we could have explored the country between the great lakes and the Red River, so that in the future, when the population in the North-West became so great as to render an all-rail line desirable, and when the people of that country would be able to aid in its construction, we would know where the best line was to be found. That was my opinion then, and I continue in that opinion still. I would at the same time have improved the Dawson route so as to have it as a route for immigrants to the North-West through our own country. From reading Mr. Dawson reports I was of opinion that that was feasible, for a moderate expenditure, and I still think that that might have been done. At the same time, if the Government had thought well to build the railway from Lake Superior to Sturgeon Falls, and improve the great water stretches between that and the west side of Lake of the Woods, with a railway from the waters of the Lake of the Woods to Red River, I would not have disapproved of that policy, but that, in my opinion, is the utmost railway construction that would have been advisable east of the Red River for many years to come. Then all that would have been necessary to have given us as great facilities as we will have when the all-rail line is finished from Lake Superior to Red River, was an elevator on the shores of Lake of the Woods and another at Sturgeon Falls for the transport of grain during the summer. We shall only have a summer route when the road now in course of construction is completed. I consider the all-rail line from Lake Superior, in the present circumstances of the country, as an exceedingly unwise and unfortunate undertaking. I look upon it as a very grave blunder, a blunder that has committed the country to an expenditure that cannot be estimated, in connection with the Pacific Railway. There is this great difference between the policy of the late Government and the policy of the present Government, in respect to the construction of the Pacific Railway: the policy of the late Administration only committed the country to a limited and defined extent.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The subsidies of money and land were limited and defined, and the policy was to make the lands available for the construction of the railway. By the system of the present Government the building of an all-rail line from Lake Superior, with the public funds, is imposing an enormous burthen upon the people which the other system would have avoided.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—With regard to my present views, while I look upon it as a most grievous and unfortunate blunder that the all-rail line should have been determined upon between Lake Superior and the Red River, yet, inasmuch as that has been done, and as the two ends of that section of the Pacific Railway are far advanced towards completion, and will be utterly useless until the central section is completed, I am, of course, in favor of its immediate construction, as, until that is done, the whole expenditure on the railway between Lake Superior and Red River will be utterly thrown away.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The part of the scheme which the Government seem to think most important, and which they consider should first be proceeded with is, strange to say, the Georgian Bay Branch. I understood the hon. Secretary of State, and other gentlemen who spoke on behalf of the Government, to say that it is the most important section.

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not hear any one say that was the most important.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman said it was the first to be proceeded with?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—We know that it is the one that the Government attached the greatest importance to; it was the first they put under contract without a survey, without an estimate, without sufficient information to justify them in putting it under contract, and they were finally obliged to cancel that contract and abandon the route. It is my opinion that the construction of that branch, if it can be called a branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is not of the first importance in their mind, but there are other reasons connected with it which in their minds are very important. It is a political scheme. The hon. gentlemen think they can strengthen themselves politically through it; they thought so at the time of the last general election; they committed themselves to it then; they referred to it frequently in their election addresses, and until after the elections. When they found they had a handsome majority, they cancelled the contract, and we have heard nothing of its importance until now when we are again on the eve of a general election; we shall see the same thing done over again and history repeat itself in respect to that undertaking. But to talk of it, being important is absurd, and proposing to construct it at present is in the highest degree reprehensible, and to proceed with it would be one of the greatest blunders that even the present Government could commit. I say that to proceed with its construction would impair, and ought to impair, the credit of this country, because it would be evidence of such unwisdom on the part of the Government that it is impossible that capitalists understanding the purpose to which it would be devoted would lend their money to the country. If the country were prosperous; if its coffers were overflowing, and that road was required and very much desired by any particular part of the country it might be proceeded with, but under the present circumstances of the country to propose such a thing is in the last degree reprehensible on the part of the Government. The Esquimalt and Nanaimo Branch was also referred to by the hon gentleman from Montreal (Mr. Penny), I was, of course, opposed to that scheme. I think the Government in proposing to proceed with that work exhibited the greatest weakness. It was not only a blunder, but it was an attempt to bribe the people of Vancouver Island, and was altogether unworthy of the Government of Canada. Fortunately for the country the Senate interposed, but the Government that the hon. gentleman from Montreal supports did all they could to carry it—or at least they professed to have done so.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—When was it defeated in the Senate? What was the date!

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I must refer the hon. gentleman to the Journals. The location of the Pacific Railway north of Lake Manitoba I look upon as another very unaccountable blunder.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—If the object had been to locate that railway where it could not be of any use to the people, a better location could not have been selected.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—A country without settlers.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Without settlers, and without the probability of settlement between Lake Superior and the Red River, and west of Red River on the located line for 150 to 250 miles, thus running 600 miles or more through a country unfit for settlement. The country south of Lake Manitoba is altogether different; there the soil is productive and rich, the country is attractive, and is being rapidly populated, but north of Lake Manitoba there is not nor can there be anything of the kind, and it is through that swampy and barren region it is proposed to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. Senator from Montreal spoke of the Fort Francis Lock, and while he did not justify its construction, he said what he could to excuse it. The excuse, however, was not very decided; it was impossible, coming from him, that it could be decided, for he knows that it has been a very great blunder. If the railway had been constructed to Sturgeon Falls, then the Fort Francis Lock would have been required, but there was no necessity for beginning the lock until the railway was well advanced towards completion to Sturgeon Falls, because it could have been built in a much shorter time than the railway. But that lock was not commenced in the interests of the country, but probably was to provide employment for favored partizans. Then, when it was considered necessary to change the location of the railway and remove it a hundred miles north of Fort Francis, so that the lock could not be made use of for the purposes of the Pacific Railway, they should have stopped the expenditure on it, acknowledged that it was an error, and there would have been very little said about it. The hon. Senator gave the House to understand that there is a country east of the lock on the shores of Rainy Lake which would furnish trade for this canal in the future. Every member of this House who has paid any attention to the subject knows from the evidence of engineers and others who have surveyed and explored that country, from Mr. Dawson down, that upon Rainy Lake there is no land fit for settlement.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—It is spoken of by all who have been through it as a barren, rocky, irredeemable wilderness. At the head of Rainy River the country undergoes a complete change. You leave the rocky, barren territory on Rainy Lake for one of manifest fertility, and as you pass to Fort Francis Falls, which are only a mile and a half from the lake, the country is evidently rich and well adapted for agriculture. So it continues down to the Lake of the Woods, but east of Fort Francis Lock there never can be any settlement and there can never be any trade. No doubt there will be lumbering upon the shore of Rainy Lake—the cutting of saw logs,—but those logs will be floated down the river either to the mill at the falls, or further down. But it is not necessary even to have a slide, much less a lock; saw logs can be taken over the falls. Then at the east end of Rainy Lake you come to the beginning of the 400 feet of perpendicular rise, and there is no land in that fit for settlement, except in the very smallest areas, until you cross the height of land at Lac des Mille Lacs. Then when you begin to descend towards Lake Superior there is a little land fit for settlement, but it is not at all attractive. Such is the description of the country between Lake Superior and Lake of the Woods given by surveyors and engineers who have traversed it, and it is a true description of it as far as my own observation when passing through the country enabled me to judge. All the works connected with the Pacific Railway to which I have referred are a series of palpable blunders—the location of the railway between Lake Superior and Red River, and the construction of an all-rail-line there; the location of the Railway west of the Red River; the building of the Fort Francis Lock, the Georgian Bay Branch contract, the suspension of work on the Pembina Branch, and the proposal to construct the Esquimalt & Nanaimo Branch have all been inexplicable blunders. They all bear the impression of what I must call incapacity.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I shall now refer to the steel rails. When the hon. Secretary of State was speaking the other day I really thought he was going to admit that the purchase of the steel rails had been a blunder. He stated so many facts that should have influenced the Government against making that purchase at the time they did make it, that I thought he must conclude by saying it had been an error; that it had been done with the very best intentions, and that he hoped the House and the country would condone it. The hon. gentleman said that when the present Government succeeded to office upwards of a million dollars had been expended upon the survey of the Pacific Railway, and very little knowledge was obtained of the country; that a very large sum of money had been expended upon it since; and that even now they had not sufficient information to locate the line where it ought to be located. Now, hon. gentlemen, what the hon. Secretary of State said, with respect to the information which the Government had at the time he spoke of, is, no doubt, correct, yet it was at that very time within a year after they had succeeded to office, and while they were still without sufficient information, as he says, to guide them in finding a good location for the road, they bought 50,000 tons of steel rails for it.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I ask the House, if the Government were as uninformed as the Secretary of State says they were, why did they buy 50,000 tons of rails?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The rails were bought in 1875 I think.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—They were bought in 1874. If the Government were not then in possession of sufficient information to locate the line, why did they buy the rails? The purchase of the 50,000 tons steel rails has involved an expenditure up to this time, of four millions of dollars in round figures, and one half of that amount is actually a total loss.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—Does that include interest?

Hon. MR. MACPHERSON—Yes; including interest. The actual outlay upon the steel rails, up to 30th June last, as shown by the Public Accounts, was as nearly as may be, three millions and a half of dollars, without interest, and with interest added up to the time when the rails will be required, the amount will exceed four millions of dollars. We bought them with borrowed money, and are paying interest on all sums expended upon them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You include, of course, the quantity used for re-steeling the Intercolonial Railway?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I speak of the 50,000 tons bought for the Pacific Railway. What has been done on the Intercolonial Railway was done, it is admitted, before it was needed, and the country was put to that expense earlier than it should have been. I am astonished at the defence which some hon. gentlemen have set up here for the steel rails transactions. Not only the hon. Secretary of State but business men around him—particularly the hon. gentleman from New Brunswick (Mr. Wark) justified the purchase by saying, "Well the late Government bought so many thousand tons of rails for the Intercolonial Railway before they were altogether wanted," and the hon. Secretary of State told us the other day if the late Government had waited two years longer than they did, before purchasing the rails for the Intercolonial Railway, those rails would have cost a million of dollars more than they did; so that the fact of the late Government buying when they did, and thereby saving a million of dollars to the country, appears to be the justification of the present Government for buying the rails for the Pacific Railway years before they were wanted, and losing thereby two millions of dollars of the public money.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It shows that our predecessors were better prophets than we were, that's all.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Could any defence be more illogical. I do not understand how hon. gentlemen can stand up here and defend the stupendous blunder of the purchase of 50,000 tons of steel rails several years before they were wanted, on the illogical grounds that they attempt to defend it. Those rails were bought on a falling market, and on the advice of those who were interested in selling rails. The hon. Senator from Montreal did not make a very strong defence for the Government in this matter. I did not until within the last two or three days look narrowly into the details of the transaction. I contented myself with looking at the gross cost of the rails, and the terrible loss by their purchase, so far as I could ascertain or estimate it. I did not, and do not suspect the Premier of having enriched himself by means of it. But my hon. friend from Belleville made such a statement in this House a few days ago that I felt constrained to look through the correspondence in the returns brought down to this House. I was really astonished at the case he presented to this House. I have since looked into the facts myself, and as I have them in very small compass, I shall submit them as briefly as I can. I must say that Parliament and the country are very much indebted to the hon. Senator from Belleville for the trouble he has taken in unraveling this return. A more confused, chaotic bundle of papers it is scarcely possible to conceive. They are not arranged in the order of their dates, or, according to subjects. I believe I have unravelled them, but I fear I shall not be able to agree with the hon. Secretary of State that the whole transaction is clear and creditable to the Government. In October, 1874, the Government advertised for tenders for from 5,000 to 10,000 tons of steel rails. The lowest tenders were those of Cox & Green, for the West Cumberland Company, for 5,000 tons, at $53.53 per ton, delivered at Montreal.

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They offered to take only 5,000 tons at first.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Of the Ebbw, Vale Company for 5,000 tons at the same price. The next lowest tender was that of Guest & Co., for 5,000 tons at $54, and the next lowest tender was that of Cooper, Fairman, & Co., for 5,000 to 10,000 tons at $54.26, and although they had only competed for from 5,000 to 10,000 tons, the orders to them were increased from time to time, until, in the end, they supplied 25,000 tons. I am not going to complain, because it is believed the Premier's brother was interested in Cooper, Fairman & Co.'s contract. That fact per se, in my opinion, is not objectionable. I think the brother of the Premier had as good a right to tender as any other man in the country; and, if his tender was the lowest, he had a right to the contract. If his brother had tendered, and the Premier had said to him: "Your tender is the lowest, but you shall not have the contract, because you are my brother," I think the whole country would have protested against such a decision, and have maintained that the Premier's brother was entitled to the same fair play as other men. But if there was any favoritism extended to Cooper, Fairman & Co. by the Government, no matter whether the Premier's brother was connected with it then or not, it was, of course, highly reprehensible. I shall not state an opinion on that point at present, but I shall submit the facts as I have found them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Fleming certifies that Cooper, Fairman & Co. were the third lowest.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—We have nothing to do with Mr. Fleming. He is responsible to the Government and the Government is responsible to Parliament. The whole question turns upon whether Cooper, Fairman & Co. supplied rails as cheaply as others and it was impossible to ascertain that without competition; but if it can be shown they were favored and nursed, that there was undue favoritism displayed in dealing with them, then the charge of undue partiality will be made out. It is unfortunate that the Government should have purchased so large a quantity of rails as 15,000 tons without having invited the competition of iron masters and dealers in rails. Now, the subject may be said to divide itself into four branches—the 20,000 tons delivered by Cooper, Fairman & Co. at Montreal; the contract for 5,000 tons delivered in British Columbia; the contract for bolts and nuts, and the contracts for the transportation of rails from Montreal westward. The hon. Secretary of State quoted what had been stated by the Premier in another place, to show that the whole quantity of 50,000 was offered to Cox & Green, and that they were given a contract for all they would agree to supply—10,000 tons. If that is the case it ought to be in evidence, but there is no evidence of it in the papers in this return.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Cox & Green were offered the whole 50,000 tons if they would take the contract. They said they would take 5,000 tons more in consequence of the terms of payment being so favorable. They would take no more.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The return is very voluminous, but I do not find anything to that effect among the papers. Such important communications could not have been verbal. Cox & Green's first contract was for 5,000 tons; that was afterwards increased to 10,000 tons. On the 18th December Cox & Green addressed the following letter to the Department of Public Works:

"13 & 15 HOSPITAL STREET,
MONTREAL, 18th Dec., 1874.

"DEAR SIR,—We are to-day in receipt of a cable communication from West Cumberland Iron and Steel Company (Limited,) informing us, that taking into consideration the favorable terms of payment, they are prepared to increase the quantity of Steel rails, which they are contracting to deliver from (5,000) five thousand tons as the quantity now stands, to (10,000) ten thousand tons. We would remind you that our price is the lowest of any, viz: £11 0s. 0d., eleven pounds sterling per ton, delivered in Montreal. We would now, therefore, respectfully request, that you would bring the proposition to the notice of the Minister of Public

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Works, calling his particular attention to the very low price of the rails.

"Soliciting the favor of a reply.

"We are, dear Sir,

"Your obedient servants,

"(Signed), COX & GREEN.

"F. BRAUN, Esq., Secretary,
"Department of Public Works,
"Ottawa."

The reply was as follows:

"OTTAWA, 22nd Dec., 1874.
Telegram to Cox & Green, Montreal.
No further steel rails wanted. Thanks.

"(Signed), F. BRAUN,
Secretary."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There was a telegram also which I will read:—

"MONTREAL TELEGRAPH Co.,
"Ottawa, Dec. 21st 1874.

"By telegraph from Montreal to T. Trudeau,
Public Works.

"See our letter 18th December, to Mr. Braun offering five thousand tons more rails, if wanted; reply quickly as a railroad is in treaty.

"(Signed), COX & GREEN.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — They wrote, and subsequently telegraphed to know, if more rails were wanted, and the Government replied—"No further steel rails wanted, thanks." The next communication was a fortnight later, and was as follows:—

"OTTAWA, 5th January, 1875.

"GENTLEMEN.—The Minister of Public Works having reconsidered your offer on behalf of the West Cumberland Iron and Steel Company (Limited) of Workington, to supply 5,000 tons of steel rails in addition to the quantity stipulated in their contract, at £10 (ten pounds) sterling per ton, and on the terms and conditions of their said contract f. o. b. at Workington, I am to inform you that said offer is accepted and to request you will advise the Company accordingly.

"I have, &c.,

"(Signed) F. BRAUN,
Secretary."

"Messrs. Cox & Green,
Montreal."

On the 29th Dec., 1874, Cooper, Fairman & Co. offered to the Government 6,400 tons of rails F.O.B., in Liverpool, at £10 10s., stg. On the 5th January, 1875, the Secretary of the Department of Public Works replied—"This Department does not require any more," but, two days afterwards, the following telegram was sent from the Public Works Department:—

" OTTAWA, January 7th, 1875.
 Telegram to Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co.,
 Montreal.

" If freight to British Columbia can be got at two pounds sterling, the Government will take five thousand tons of steel rails, shipped at any time. Delivery will be at Esquimalt, Cowichan Bay or Nanaimo, at all of which places there are good facilities.

" (Signed), F. BRAUN,
 Secretary."

Now, I think it will strike the House that the terms in which that communication was made are unusual, going to a private firm. I ask is there not some indication of favoritism here? The answer to this telegram is dated eleven days later, and is as follows:—

" DEAR SIR, " MONTREAL, 18th Jan., 1875.

" We are in receipt of a cable message to-day which enables us to accept your offer of 7th January, for 5,000 tons of Bessemer steel rails at £10 10s., f.o.b., Liverpool, terms cash on delivery and freight to Vancouver ports, viz.: Esquimalt, Cowichan and Nanaimo, at forty shillings per ton—insurance an open question.

" Makers of rails only delivering f.o.b., Liverpool.

" Please confirm the above at your earliest convenience to enable us to confirm sale in England by cable.

" We remain, yours faithfully,

" (Signed) COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co."

" P. S.—We would be glad if you can favor us with the address of your Bankers, to whom we are to present bills of lading of delivery.

" Wm. BUCKINGHAM, Esq.,
 Ottawa."

Hon. gentlemen will see that Cooper, Fairman & Co. had an opportunity of writing to England and ascertaining at what price they could purchase 5,000 tons of rails. There was no competition invited by the Government. Two days before closing with Cooper, Fairman & Co. at £10 10s., they had bought from Cox & Green at £10 per ton f.o.b. No effort was made by the Government to get more at that price.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was open to all the world.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—It was closed to the whole world except to Cooper,
 Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Fairman & Co. Not a single iron firm had an opportunity to tender. The fact that Cox & Green had, only a few days before, taken a contract to supply rails at £10 per ton was an indication of the price. It would have been accepted as such by any man who was acting for himself or acting wisely for the country. Why did the Government not make enquiries before accepting the offer of Cooper, Fairman & Co.? I maintain that was a case of manifest favoritism and dereliction of duty on the part of the Government. Here they bought rails from one firm at £10 a ton, and at the same time they bought from another and more favored firm at £10 10s per ton. At that time there were signs that rails were falling in price. There were enquiries from all quarters to know whether more rails would be taken, and the following letter to a New York firm shows that the Government gave the enquirers to understand that competition would be invited if more rails should be required:—

" OTTAWA, December 9th, 1874.

" GENTLEMEN,—In reply to your communication of the 30th ult., asking if any more steel rails would be required by the Government during the coming year, in addition to those already purchased, I beg to inform you that should any more be required, tenders will be called for as previously done.

" I have, &c.,
 (Signed), F. BRAUN,
 Secretary.

" CHAMPLIN & GILLET,
 P.O.B., 3,012, New York, U.S."

No tenders were called for, however, when 10,000 tons more rails were wanted, but 5,000 tons were bought from Cox & Green at £10 per ton and 5,000 tons from Cooper, Fairman & Co. at £10 10s per ton without competition. The hon. Secretary of State complains of the insinuations and imputations cast abroad over the country in connection with these transactions. I never aided in circulating them, but I do say that there is so much that is unbusinesslike and savoring of favoritism in those transactions it is not surprising there should be rumors abroad injurious to the Government, and imputations cast upon members of the Government. The hon gentlemen have themselves to thank for these. If there was not favoritism, the grossest incapacity was exhibited. But I contend there was manifest favoritism, and I shall show more of it before I sit down. The house in England which supplied the 5,000 tons of rails to Cooper, Fairman & Co. for Vancouver Island were not iron masters, but a commission firm, or merchants. The Government had been in communication just before with all the leading iron houses, and nothing would have been easier than to have communicated with them by cable, through Morton, Rose & Co. They might have received answers from the whole of them within twenty-four hours. But, instead of doing so, they bought from Cooper, Fairman & Co., who bought through a commission house, and thus the country was compelled to pay two profits to middlemen, and if it be true that the contract was completed after the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Bill was defeated in the Senate, the transaction was indefensible.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All the tenders were accepted between the 1st of December and the 21st of January; the Bill was defeated in this House in April.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I am told that the shipment had not been made, and that the contract was not signed, until after the Bill was thrown out.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—Contract No. 10 is dated April 6th, 1875.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I hope the hon. gentleman does not contend that the Government should have refused to sign the contract after the negotiations were closed and the offer was accepted.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I will tell the hon. gentlemen what they could have done. When they found that the 5,000 tons of rails were not required on Vancouver Island, they might have ordered them to Nova Scotia, and not have lost a dollar; or, if they were not required, the Government could have put them in the market and sold them. Either would have been better than to have paid $50,000 freight to Vancouver's Island, where they were not needed, and where, as we had evidence the other day, they are corroding away. I think there can be no doubt on the mind of any hon. gentleman that, in the matter of the steel rails, gross favoritism was shown to Cooper, Fairman & Co. in having given them, without competition, a contract for 10,000 tons of rails, deliverable at Montreal; and also, without competition, a contract for 5,000 tons, deliverable in British Columbia. They had only tendered for from five to ten thousand tons; and they supplied 25,000 tons, including the 5,000 tons delivered in British Columbia, and for which they were paid ten shillings a ton more than the Government had paid to another firm for 5,000 tons two or three days before. I shall now take up the bolts and nuts. They do not represent a large sum of money, but "straws show how the wind blows," and this bolt and nut transaction shows that Cooper, Fairman & Co. were treated with undue favor, and that their sails were steadily filled with propitious gales wafted to them by the Government. The advertisement calling for tenders for steel rails required that parties tendering should also tender for the bolts and nuts required for laying the quantity of rails offered by them. Cooper, Fairman & Co. tendered for bolts and nuts at $101 per ton, delivered in Montreal. Five parties tendered below them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is, if you take the bolts and nuts separate from the rails.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The question is, did the Government extend undue favor to Cooper, Fairman & Co? Messrs. Darling & Co., of Montreal, tendered at $92.47 per ton. It has been said here by the hon. Senator from Montreal (Mr. Penny) that Darling & Co. have no grievance, and make no complaint. I am not here to assert the cause of Messrs. Darling & Co., or of any other private firm, but I do say the country has a grievance, whether Darling & Co. complain or not. I think the course pursued by the hon. Senator is unprecedented. He seems to have constituted himself a committee sole to enquire into those transactions, and to have written to Darling & Co. and Cox & Green to know if they had grievances.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Why don't you have a committee appointed?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The Government should ask for a committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Government have been before the Public Accounts Committee, and they could have been questioned there.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I do not wish to reflect upon a committee of the other House, but if the hon. gentleman will read the newspapers he will see how very hopeless it is to attempt to prosecute an enquiry before the Public Accounts Committee which might lead to disclosures prejudicial in any way to the Government, their supporters, or their employees. On the 16th November Messrs. Darling & Co. tendered for bolts and nuts at $92.47 per ton. Two days afterwards they sent the following telegram :—

"MONTREAL TELEGRAPH COMPANY.
OTTAWA, NOV. 18, 1874.

"By telegraph from Montreal to T. Trudeau, Deputy Minister of Public Works.

"Will supply one hundred tons : if more wanted please inform us ; we are not restricted to quantity.

(Signed) WM. DARLING & CO."

The reply was as follows :—

"OTTAWA, 2nd December, 1874.

"GENTLEMEN,—Referring to your letter and telegraphic message, both dated the 18th ultimo, offering to furnish 100 tons of railway bolts and nuts, I beg to inform you that the parties who have contracted to supply the steel rails will also furnish the bolts and nuts required for the quantity of rails contracted for.

"I have, &c.,

(Signed), F. BRAUN,
"Secretary.

"WM. DARLING & Co.,
"Montreal."

That was a pretty decided answer to Darling & Co., but on the 24th of December there was another communication from the Department, evidently in reply to one from the firm; it was as follows :—

"OTTAWA, 24th Dec. 1874.

"GENTLEMEN,—

I am desired to inform you in reply to your communication of the 19th inst., relative to fish-bolts, which you offer to supply to the Department, that the contracts for the same have been already awarded.

I have, &c.,

(Signed,) F. BRAUN,
Secretary.

"WM. DARLING & Co.,
Montreal."

It is quite evident from these communications that Darling & Co., were anxious to get the contract for the bolts and nuts. They are in very distinct contradiction to the statement of the hon. Senator from Montreal, (Mr. Penny) that the firm felt rather relieved when they found they had not received the contract. Here are three communications showing that Darling & Co., were anxious to get the contract for supplying those bolts and nuts at $92.47, while Cooper, Fairman & Co., were awarded the contract at $101 per ton, as appears by the following letter :—

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

"OTTAWA, 18th February, 1875.

"GENTLEMEN,—The supply of bolts and nuts required in connection with the contract of the Mersey Steel and Iron Co., for 20,000 tons of steel rails required by the Government of Canada, having been omitted from the contract, I am to acquaint you for the information of said Company, that their tender for the same at $101 per ton, delivered at Montreal at the same time as the rails, is accept'd.

"I have, &c.,

(Signed), F. BRAUN,
Secretary."

"Messrs. COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.,
Montreal.

But this arrangement fell through, as the following correspondence will show :

"MONTREAL, 2nd March, 1875.

"DEAR SIR,—In the contract for steel rails, &c., with the Mersey Steel and Iron Company, they make strong objections against having bolts and nuts included in their contract, and they were accordingly left out. The price was to have been ($101) one hundred and one dollars per gross ton, delivered in bond at Montreal."

"We, as agents for Messrs. Robb & Co., of the Toronto Bolt and Nut Works, beg to supply the Laird bolts and nuts as per sample bolt, to be furnished by the Inspector, Mr. C. P. Sandberg of London, the price to be ($101) one hundred and one dollars per gross ton, duty paid, delivered in Montreal or Toronto.

"We are, dear sir,

"Yours truly,

(Signed), COOPER FAIRMAN & Co.,
Agents for Robb & Co.

"The Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa."

"OTTAWA, 5th March, 1875.

Telegram to Cooper, Fairman & Co., Montreal.

"Your tender on behalf of Robb & Co., Toronto, for supply of bolts and nuts at $101 (one hundred and one dollars) per ton is accepted.

(Signed),

F. BRAUN,
Secretary.

The hon. Secretary of State took great credit to the Government for having purchased from a Canadian house. He did not say so in express terms, but you would have imagined from his remarks that Robb & Co., were manufacturing those bolts and nuts at Toronto. He made quite a point of it for the Government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I made the point that we got the bolts and nuts at $5.05 less; and it is a good point, too.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I find, however, that the bolts and nuts were not bought from Robb & Co. after all, as the following letter shows:—

“MONTREAL, July 29th, 1875.

“DEAR SIR,—We beg as Agents for “The Patent Bolt and Nut Co.,” of Birmingham, England, to supply the Government with the necessary iron fish bolts and nuts to lay 20,000 tons of steel rails on a railway track, subject to “Sandberg’s” inspection before leaving the works, to be delivered in bond in Montreal, as per prices accepted and mentioned in your letter to us on this subject, Dated February 18th, in ($101) one hundred and one dollar portion. These are for the Mersey’s steel rails.

We are, dear sir,
Your obedient servants,
(Signed),

COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.”

To the Honorable,
The Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Were not Robb & Co. burnt out that year?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—There was a bolt and nut establishment burnt out, but bolts and nuts manufactured in Toronto would not have been subject to duty. They were to be delivered in Montreal “duty paid.” There does not appear to be anything more on the subject of bolts and nuts till the 10th of Feb., 1876, under which date Cooper, Fairman & Co. wrote as follows:—

“MONTREAL, 10th Feb., 1875.

DEAR SIR,—The Mersey Steel and Iron Company having omitted from their contract the bolts and nuts for the 20,000 tons steel rails, which was accepted by your letter, dated Feb. 18th 1875, we therefore beg you will allow the Patent Bolt and Nut Company to supply the same, price ($101) one hundred and one dollars per gross ton; deliveries, specification, inspection and terms to be the same as contract for rails given the Mersey Steel and Iron Company of Liverpool, makers steel rails.

Any change in deliveries you will kindly advise of.

We are, dear sir,
Yours very sincerely,
(Signed),

COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.,
Agents.

Deputy Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

To which the following reply was sent:—

“OTTAWA, 12th Feb., 1876.

“GENTLEMEN,—Referring to your letter of the 10th inst., requesting that the Patent Bolt and Nut Company be allowed to supply bolts and nuts required by this Department, I am to state that your request cannot be acceded to.

“I have the honor to be, gentlemen,

“Your obedient servant,

“(Signed) F. BRAUN,
“Secretary.”

“Messrs. COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.,
“Commission Merchants, Montreal.”

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think there is something inconsistent in that letter. I have never been able to understand what prompted it, because the offer had been accepted the year before.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The facts are as I have stated: the contract with Robb & Co. fell through, and Cooper, Fairman & Co., in Feby, 1876, asked to be allowed to furnish the bolts and nuts of another maker. That was refused, but the reason does not appear. We do not find anything to show how those bolts and nuts were finally acquired, but the Public Accounts show that $16,160 had been paid to Cooper, Fairman & Co. for 160 tons of bolts and nuts, being at the rate of $101 per ton. This transaction evidenced continued favoritism for Cooper, Fairman & Co. They were allowed to change from principal to principal, as their own interest might dictate. I now come to the transportation, and in this the favoritism to Cooper, Fairman & Co. is most undisguised. Some of the parties when tendering for steel rails, in November and December, 1874, tendered also for their transport to ports on Lakes Huron and Superior. Guest & Co., who tendered for 10,000 tons of steel rails, made the following offer:

“OTTAWA, November 14th, 1874.

“DEAR SIR—Should the Government prefer to have these rails delivered at the following points: Duluth, Fort William and Georgian Bay, instead of Montreal, we can deliver them at Duluth or Georgian Bay at $4 per ton additional, and at Fort William at $4.75 additional, conditional as to the delivery at points named, that there be a sufficient depth of water for vessels to go thereto, and that the consignees are to unload. Not knowing if it is the intention of the Government to insure the various cargoes on the lakes, we have not included the lake insurances on the inland freights, $4 and $4.75, which would be about 16 cents per ton.

"Your obedient servants,
(Signed),

"PERKINS, LIVINGSTON, POST & Co.,
Agents of Guest & Co.
"The Minister of Public Works."

No notice was taken of this. Cox & Green, who supplied 10,000 tons of steel rails, wrote as follows:—

"13 & 15 HOSPITAL STREET,
MONTREAL, 17th Dec. 1874.

"DEAR SIR.—Referring to ours of the 7th instant, we would esteem it a favor if you would kindly reply to enquiries we then made, which were as follows:—1st. The latest date at which it is necessary that the draft of the contract for steel rails should be returned duly signed; 2nd. Particulars of the modifications proposed on Sandberg's Standard.

"Our reasons for troubling you on these points we explained in ours of the 7th instant. We notice that a portion of the rails purchased by the Government are intended for delivery on Lake Superior, the Government allowing an extra $5 per ton for this purpose. Should you wish us to deliver our 5,000 tons at that point, we should be glad to hear of this wish as soon as possible, to enable us to make the necessary arrangements for forwarding the rails from Montreal to Lake Superior.

"Apologising for thus troubling you.
"We are dear Sir,
"Yours truly,
COX & GREEN.

(Signed),
"F. BRAUN, Esq., Secretary
Department of Public Works,
"Ottawa.

There was also an offer, on Dec. 14th, from Cooper, Fairman & Co. to transport 20,000 tons from Montreal to Duluth at $5.60 per ton. None of those tenders were accepted. In the following spring tenders were invited by the Government for the transport of 5,000 tons of rails from Montreal to Duluth. Eight tenders were sent in, ranging from $6 to $7 per ton, that of Mr. E. Samuel, of Montreal, being the lowest. He appears to have been very anxious to have got the contract, as the following telegrams will show:—

"OTTAWA, 26th April 1875.

"By Telegraph from Montreal to F. Braun, Esq.
"Offer as surety D. Butters & Co., merchants; if more required can furnish security to any amount; guarantee to ship by first class propeller.
Answer.

(Signed), E. SAMUEL."

"OTTAWA, 27th April, 1875.

"By Telegraph from Montreal to F. Braun, Esq., Secretary.

"Are you open to more than the quantity
Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

named in my tender; if so, please name the quantity of rails you desire carried on same terms.

(Signed), E. SAMUEL."

"OTTAWA, 29th April, 1875.

"By Telegraph from Montreal to T. Trudeau, Dep. Min. Board of Public Works:

"Your early reply to my tender will oblige, so as to regulate movements of propellers pending arrival of rails. Security and propellers will be made satisfactory to you.

(Signed), E. SAMUEL."

Now, these communications from Mr. Samuel seem, on the face of them, very satisfactory, and there is nothing to show that he was not qualified in every respect to carry out his tender, except that he was not an owner of propellers. That was no sufficient reason for rejecting his tender if, Mr. Samuel was a man in good standing and there is nothing in these papers to show that he was not. The time had come when the Minister must report upon the tenders and assign the contract to some party, but instead of accepting Mr. Samuel's tender, which was the lowest, what did the Minister of Public Works do? He telegraphed to Cooper, Fairman & Co., who had not tendered, as follows:—

"OTTAWA, 28th April, 1875.

"Minister of Public Works would be glad to see you respecting carriage of steel rails westward.

(Signed), F. BRAUN,
Secretary."

"COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.,
Montreal

Now let us see what followed this invitation from the Minister of Public Works, to Cooper Fairman & Co. I shall read the report of the Committee of the Privy Council, It was as follows:—

"Copy of a Report of a Committee of the Honorable the Privy Council, approved by his Excellency the Governor-General in Council on the 30th April, 1875:

"On a report dated 29th April, 1875, from the Honorable the Minister of Public Works, stating that proposals have been invited for the transport of 5,000 tons of steel rails and fastenings from Montreal to Fort William or Duluth, Lake Superior, during the season of 1875 the price to include all cost of handling, piling, insurance and charges at all points, and that the undermentioned tenders have been received, viz:—

1st. E. Samuel, Montreal . . . . .	$6.00 per ton
2nd. C. Edward, Kingston . . . . .	6.25 "
3rd. G. E. Jacques & Co., Montreal . . . . .	6.30 "

4th. Chs. Stephenson, Montreal..	6.50	per ton
5th. Cox & Green, Montreal.....	6.50	"
6th. Holcomb & Steward, Kingston	6.74	"
7th. J. H. Beatty & Co., Thorold.	7.00	"
8th. W. H. Perry, Buffalo.....	7.00	"

"That in a tender made in November last, for the supply of steel rails, Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., agents, stated the difference in price for delivering those rails in Montreal or Duluth and French River, would be $5.60 per ton, exclusive of any harbor or wharfage dues at the ports named :

"That those gentlemen now offer on behalf of the Merchant's Lake and Steamship Line (consisting of eighteen first class propellers) for an additional sum of not more than sixty cents per ton to the price of $5.60 asked in their tender of November last, or say a total sum of $6.20 per ton, to undertake the transport of 5,000 tons of rails from Montreal to Fort William or Duluth, and to assume all cost of handling, piling, insurance and charges as required by the advertisement.

"That Mr. E. Samuel, who is the lowest bidder on the list given above is not a steamboat owner;

"The Minister therefore recommends that the offer of Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co. be accepted.

"The Committee submit the above recommendation for Your Excellency's approval.

"Certified,

"(Signed), W. A. HIMSWORTH,
"Clerk Privy Council.

"To the Hon.

"The Minister of Public Works,
" &c., &c., &c."

The telegram to Cooper, Fairman & Co., was dated 28th April and in obedience to it one of these gentlemen no doubt visited Ottawa. On the following day the Minister of Public Works made his report to Council recommending that the contract should be given to Cooper, Fairman & Co. at $6.20 per ton, and it was awarded to them although they had not tendered for it. Was not this an extraordinary proceeding? Why was Mr. Samuel, whose tender was the lowest passed over? The only reason assigned was that he was not a steamboat owner. But were Cooper, Fairman & Co. steamboat owners?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They were agents for a company.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Was not Mr. Samuel an agent?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He was a man of no means.

Hon. AIKINS—That should have been stated in the Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was a very proper transaction.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman cannot feel that in his heart, he must look upon it as a most unfortunate and indefensible transaction; he glossed it over in his speech, and so did the hon. Senator from Montreal; they did not allude to it at all. The next communication is dated Ottawa 5th May 1875—at least I should have borne that date although I see in the printed return it is April instead of May :—

"OTTAWA, 5th May, 1875.

"SIR,—Referring to your telegram of the 29th instant, relative to your tender for the transport of steel rails westward, I am to inform you that the Minister of Public Works has made other arrangements for this service.

"I have, &c.,

"(Signed) F. BRAUN,
"Secretary."

"F. SAMUEL, Esq., &c., &c.,
"Montreal."

Mr. Samuel having been informed that the Department had made their arrangements telegraphed as follows :—

"OTTAWA, 12th May, 1875.

"By Telegraph from Montreal to F. Braun,
"Secretary B. of P. W.

"SIR,—For reasons unnecessary to state, I beg to withdraw my tender for transport of railway iron for Lake Superior ports.

"(Signed)

E. SAMUEL"

That communication is not explained. On the day following its receipt (the 13th of May) the Secretary of the Department telegraphed to Cooper, Fairman & Co. as follows :—

"OTTAWA, 13th May, 1875.

"The carriage of five thousand tons (5,000) of steel rails and accessories, from Montreal to Duluth or Fort William, for six dollars and twenty cents, including all charges, is awarded to you. A contract will be prepared.

"(Signed),

F. BRAUN,
"Secretary."

"COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.,
"Montreal."

I ask hon. gentlemen if this does not establish the most startling favoritism? I will remind the House that, in the preceding November and December, the Government had received tenders for the delivery of rails at Duluth from three of the parties who supplied the rails—from Guest & Co., at $4 per ton over their price at Montreal, and including insurance at $4.16 per ton; from Cox & Green, at $5 per ton; and from Cooper, Fairman & Co., at $5.60 per ton. All these parties stood in the same position, all had tendered at the same time to deliver rails at Duluth, but the Minister of Public Works does not seem to have communicated with Guest & Co., whose tender was much the lowest, but fell back upon Cooper, Fairman & Co.'s tender of $5.60 per ton. When tenders for transport were invited in April, 1875, neither Guest & Co. nor Cooper, Fairman & Co. tendered, but Cooper, Fairman & Co. were invited to come to Ottawa to confer with the Minister of Public Works, and the result of that conference was, that they got the contract at $6.20 per ton, being 60 cents per ton more than they themselves had asked; $2.04 more than Guest & Co. had asked; $1.20 more than Cox & Green had asked in the previous November and December; and 20 cents per ton more than Mr. Samuel had tendered for in April, 1875, at the time the contract was given. The Minister of Public Works should have communicated with Guest & Co., whose tender was lower than Cooper, Fairman & Co.'s.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He may have done so for aught I know.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—There is no communication to that effect in this return. In the report of the Committee of the Privy Council, Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., are represented as the agents of the Merchants' Lake and River Steamship Line. Strange to say, another firm represented themselves as the agents of the same steamship Company, and tendered at $6.30 per ton. Their letter is as follows:

"MONTREAL, 15th April, 1876.

"SIR,—Referring to your advertisement in the newspapers, asking for tenders to convey from Montreal to Duluth or Fort William, Lake Superior, during the season of 1875, five thousand tons steel rails and fastenings.—

"We beg to tender, on behalf of the Merchants' Lake and River Steamship Line, consisting as understated, for the quantity named; or should you desire it, to the extent in all of 12,000 tons at and after the rate of six dollars and thirty cents ($6.30) per ton of 2,240 lbs.

"The rails to be delivered to us monthly, during the season and not later than the fifteenth day September, at Montreal, free from ocean freight and Montreal Harbor dues, at the ship's side, and carried to the above named ports.

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

"This rate to cover all cost of handling, while receiving and shipping, freight and canal tolls, marine insurance, landing and piling at the port of delivery.

"Good and sufficient wharf accommodation to be provided by the owners of the rails, so as to be discharged without delay to the vessel, and not piled at a greater distance than sixty feet or thereabout from the vessel's side, the vessel having sufficient depth of water provided to lay in safety while discharging.

"Some person or persons to be appointed by the Board of Works to take delivery of rails and grant receipts, payment of freight to be made on production of such receipts.

"(Signed)

"G. E. JACQUES & Co.

"Agents Merchants' Lake and River Line, consisting of 13 first-class Propellers.

"To the Honorable

"The Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa."

I should like to know, and probably some gentleman in this House can give the information, who was the real and authorized agent of the Merchant's Lake and River Line? Was it the firm of Cooper, Fairman & Co., or of Jacques & Co.? The latter stated in their tender that they were the agents; but the Minister of Public Works in the minute of Council represented Cooper, Fairman & Co., to be the agents. At all events, whoever the agents may have been, the line came in for the contract, and Cooper, Fairman & Co., no doubt benefited. The House will perceive the shuffle, for it was nothing but a shuffle, and one that the Government ought not to have been a party to. The contract was for the transport of 5,000 tons, but Cooper, Fairman & Co., managed during the season to increase it to 10,000 tons, as hon. gentlemen will see by the following correspondence:

"MONTREAL, 10th June, 1875

"DEAR SIR,—We hereby agree, as agents of the Merchants' Lake and River Line of steamers to carry from ten to twenty thousand tons of steel rails, on the same terms and conditions as former contract—namely at six dollars and twenty cents currency per gross ton, for Duluth and Fort William, on Lake Superior, which rate includes piling at the port of delivery and insurance; said insurance we bind ourselves to effect to the entire satisfaction of the Department.

"Yours most respectfully,

"(Signed) COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.

" OTTAWA, 10th June, 1876.

" GENTLEMEN,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day's date offering on behalf of the Merchants' Lake and River Line of Steamers to carry from ten to twenty thousand tons of steel rails on the same terms and conditions as former contract—namely, at six dollars and twenty cents currency per gross ton for Duluth and Fort William, on Lake Superior, which rate includes piling at port of delivery and insurance, and to inform you that the Department accepts your offer for five thousand tons (5,000).

" I have, &c.,

" (Signed), F. BRAUN,
" Secretary.

" Messrs. COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.,

It will thus be seen that on the 10th of June, when freights were usually at their lowest, this favored firm was given 5,000 tons more without competition and at the spring rate of freight. There is another somewhat singular letter here which would go to show that after all Cooper, Fairman & Co., were not the agents of the Lake, and River Steamship Co., but that Jacques & Co., were. It is as follows:—

" HAMILTON, Ont., 22nd June, 1875.

" DEAR SIR,—In accordance to your advertisement for tenders to freight 5,000 tons steel rails from Montreal to Duluth, with Messrs. Norris & Neelon of St. Catherines, we authorized Messrs. G. E. Jacques & Co., Montreal, to tender on our account and which tender was accepted. Our propeller 'Lake Ontario' loaded and delivered at Duluth, on 2nd June, 1,084 steel rails, and 960 boxes fish plates weighing 290 tons, 17cwt., 2qrs. 1lb @ $5=$1,454.25; we were informed our freight would be paid by you in Ottawa, and we request you will retain said amount in your hands. The Purser of the boat holds a receipt for above, but as he made the first trip we are not certain if your proper agent granted it or not. The 'Lake Ontario' is again on her way up to Duluth with 1,555 rails and 133 boxes or cases of bolts, weighing 392 tons, 9cwt, 2qrs. @ $5=$1,962.37. We will be glad to hear from you that after unloading above we will be able to get our freight on the two loads. He will proceed to Ottawa on his return, and we trust you will be kind enough to settle for same.

" I remain, Yours truly,

" (Signed), CHAS. JAS. HOPE,

" Manager, Lake and River Steamship Co.

" F. BRAUN, Esq., Secretary,

" Department of Public Works,
" Ottawa."

Now, I confess I do no understand this letter. It requires explanation. It looks as if the Merchants' Lake and River Company were really subcontractors, and did the work for $5 per ton, while the Government paid Cooper,

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Fairman & Co. $6.20 per ton. The whole transaction, from first to last, bore the impress of favoritism, and was calculated to shake confidence in the fair dealing of the Government. I must call the attention of the Senate to another remarkable discovery which I have made in going through the papers laid upon our table relating to the steel rails and their transport. I find that in 1875 the Red River Transportation Company, represented by Messrs. Kittson & Co., of St. Paul, obtained a contract at $15 (U. S. currency) per ton, of 2,000 lbs., for freight from Duluth to Winnipeg, notwithstanding that Messrs. Fuller & Milne, of Hamilton, tendered for it on the 16th April, at $13.50 (U. S. currency) per ton. A member of the firm of Kittson & Co. appears to have come to Ottawa and to have seen the Minister of Public Works, and to have succeeded in securing the business at $15 per ton of 2,000 pounds. There is nothing said in Fuller & Milne's tender about the number of pounds to the ton, but, in Canada, a ton of railway iron means 2,240 pounds, and, so far as I know, it is the same in the United States, unless otherwise expressed. This transaction certainly requires explanation. Here was a contract involving a sum of $206,000 given to a foreign company, when a Canadian firm offered to do the work at a much lower rate. Was it favoritism or mismanagement? Whatever may have been the cause, the public loss through it was large. Cooper, Fairman & Co. received from the Public Treasury, for steel rails and fastenings and for freight, upwards of $1,500,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The contract for the rails was not with Cooper, Fairman & Co., but with the Mersey Company.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I do not know what arrangements existed between Cooper, Fairman & Co. and the Mersey Company. Cooper, Fairman & Co. may have received a commission, or may have bought and sold the rails. Their interest in either case, no doubt, was very considerable; and to that I do not object, if it was obtained without undue favoritism. I repeat that what I have submitted to this House to-night shows that an undue preference was given to Cooper, Fairman & Co., to the Red River Transportation Company, and to the Merchants' Lake and River line of steamers, and that the country has sustained immense loss through the undue favoritism and partiality which appear, from the papers laid upon our table, to have characterized the dealings of the Government with those parties.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—I think this question is one of the most important with which we have had to deal this session. When my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Penny) rose to address the House, I thought his object was to reply to the declaration of the policy of the Government respecting the Pacific Railway. In fact, the Hon. Secretary of State informed us that the Government had dropped that part of the railway from Lake Nipissing to Thunder Bay, a distance of about 600 miles. That announcement, so important to the Province of Quebec and the people of the Ottawa Valley, should have attracted the attention of the hon. Senator from Montreal. We were given to understand last Session, and even in the early part of this Session, that in lieu of the Georgian Bay Branch we were to be given, before the end of the present Session, something calculated to satisfy the Province of Quebec. But now we have the announcement that the whole eastern section of the railway is to be abandoned. We have heard a great deal about the steel rails, and the mover of this resolution in his speech reflected on the conduct of the Premier. The hon. Secretary of State replied very indignantly. Now, while I believe the greatest respect should be shown to anybody occupying the position of Premier, we should not forget the respect that is due to other parties, chiefly to those to whom the hon. Secretary of State alluded when replying to my hon. friend from Belleville. If the hon. Secretary of State had confined himself to the declaration, that we ought to treat the Premier with that respect which is due to his high position, nobody could have complained. But the hon. gentleman added such words as these: "Those who had uttered those accusations had uttered deliberate falsehoods. They were slanderers, who stated what they knew to be false, and they had not the slightest ground to say what they had stated." I think the honor of those gentlemen who have been alluded to in such terms is just as precious as that of the Premier. Of course, those gentlemen are able to defend themselves, and they may take occasion to do so elsewhere. But I think we should not, in this Chamber, allow public men, chiefly the members of the press, to be spoken of in such an offensive manner for having fulfilled an important public duty, and I contend that those who disclosed the facts connected with this steel rails transaction were guilty of nothing unbecoming to a good citizen.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—The matter as it stood at the time was such, that those gentlemen could not have written or spoken otherwise than they did. The circumstances surrounding the transaction were such as to arouse, at least, doubt and suspicion, and make it their duty to disclose it before the public. The documents brought down by the Government, and others that have been published to the country, prove that the Premier's brother was a member of the firm which received substantial advantages from the Public Works Department. I asked the hon. Secretary of State to say, the other day, whether, if a law suit had been brought against Cooper, Fairman & Co. after the contract had been made for the steel rails, the brother of the Premier would not have been included in that prosecution, and if a judgment of the Courts against the firm would not have condemned Charles Mackenzie equally with other members of the firm? It cannot be denied that would have been the case. I think that fact is sufficient to justify all that was said by the newspapers which exposed the transaction. What constitutes a legal presumption sufficient to base a judgment should be sufficient to justify a disclosure in view of the public interest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The members of the firm denied that Charles Mackenzie was a partner.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—We had the declaration of the Premier and a letter from Cooper, Fairman & Co. to that effect. But, on the other hand, we had the deed of partnership to prove to the contrary. The denial of accomplices in case of guilt is no proof at all. I do not go so far as to say there was a job or any impropriety in this transaction, nor do I say that the declaration of any gentleman occupying the position of Premier should not have great weight. We have always held as a principle that great respect was due to declarations of men of such high position as the Premier. The present occupant of that position, however, has laid down a different principle. He has established the rule to make gratuitous accusations against his opponents, and to repeat them after they have been shown to be utterly without foundation in fact. The hon. Secretary of State will admit that when the Premier assumes such an attitude; when the accession to power of the present Government is due to accusations having no better, perhaps not so good a foundation, it is a great temptation for his opponents to retaliate and bring accusations against him, which, to say the least, are as well proved, and are, perhaps, of a more serious character. There can be no doubt that a great many mistakes and even blunders, have been committed in connection with this Pacific Railway by the Government. I do not say that they deserve directly to be blamed for the whole of them, many of those blunders being the necessary consequence of a false system, but they are responsible for this mistaken policy which they are pursuing in relation to this great work. It is that policy which has given rise to the blunders and jobbery of which the country has heard so much. The hon. mover of this resolution informs us that the immense sum of $9,480,743 has been expended up to the present time on the Pacific. This statement not being contradicted, I have no reason to doubt its accuracy. It seems to me that a very large proportion of that expenditure has been made to prove that the late Government had acted unwisely in entering into this engagement, and had adopted a mistaken policy to carry it into effect.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. TRUDELL.—When the present Government came into power they found the country agreed upon the construction of a railway from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific Coast, according to a scheme which had been embodied in a statute, and consequently was the law of the country. Instead of carrying out that policy the Premier announced a new scheme, which he substituted for the former. The hon. Secretary of State has remarked it was quite natural that mistakes should have been committed, because the route of the railway was quite unknown, and its location was a matter of great difficulty. But the mistake of the Premier was that he condemned the scheme of the late Government without being in a position to replace it by something better. Far from that we find that the present Government, after having expended an enormous sum of money in endeavoring to carry out their own scheme, are now obliged to abandon it and adopt part of the policy of their predecessors. The scheme of the late Government was to give the work to a private company, subsidizing them with a limited amount of money and a land grant. What do we find now? One third of the sum which the country had been committed to by the late Ministry, has been expended already with very little to show for it. If this railway had been properly carried out it would have resulted in the rapid development of the North West and renewed prosperity for the whole Dominion. If on the contrary, a wise and statesmanlike course is not pursued it will involve the country in endless difficulties and a heavy burden of debt. The great mistake of this Government has been that they have undertaken this road as a Government work instead of intrusting private companies to invest their capital in the undertaking. There were two ways in which the railway could have been built—either as a commercial under taking or as a colonization railroad. The Intercolonial Railway was constructed according to the former system, because this road was a communication between two densely settled groups of population—the Maritime Provinces and the old Province of Canada, offering immediate business for the road. The Pacific Railway, on the contrary, must, to a large extent, be regarded as a Colonization road, and it should be constructed in such a manner as to settle the country through which it passes. In this way not only would the road promote the settlement of the country, but the settlement of the country would furnish traffic for the railway. It has been asserted that when the first contract was given out for the building of the Pacific Railway it was impossible for the contractors to construct it with the money and land grants that were offered. My opinion is, a private company could construct it for half the money that the Government can do it for, chiefly by paying in land grants, and colonizing their reserves. It is well known that in this respect private enterprise can accomplish often ten times as much as a Government can do for the same amount of money. Take for instance the Allan line of steamships: everyone knows that for the mere purpose of procuring passengers for their steamers they have established agencies all over Europe, and those agents send ten times more emigrants to this country than the agents employed by the Government.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—I think no better illustration could be furnished of the success of private enterprise compared with that of the Government. Another benefit to be derived from that system of carrying together and simultaneously the colonisation and the building of the railway, would be the reduction in the price of labour. Colonies established by the exertions of a company on land grants would do the work for half the price. We had, lately, an illustration of what public works in an unsettled country cost in the Neebing Hotel affair, and Kaministiquia works. Carpenters were paid there two dollars a day and foremen three dollars, while in the meantime mechanics were glad to get employment at 90 cts. per day in Montreal and other cities of Ontario and Quebec. It is a historical fact that this country and the West have been settled and developed by private enterprise—in the first instance by all the great companies chartered by the French Government, and afterwards in a similar manner by British trading companies. It is a question which now occupies the attention of some of the most distinguished men of Europe and America to know what is the best system of colonization, and I think the conclusion at which they generally arrive is that the only sound system of colonization is to give an impetus to private enterprise, because experience has shown that private enterprise can accomplish ten times more in that direction than a Government. As an other illustration I would direct the attention of the House to the results that have flowed from the efforts of the North-West and Hudson Bay Companies. Instead of incurring the expense of establishing colonies at great cost in the West, the British Government gave charters to those companies, who, for the purposes of their own business established trading posts and induced settlers to come in there. Though they never cared about colonization, and did not act satisfactorily in this respect, I have no hesitation in saying that the Government could not accomplish in half a century what we found ready to our hands when the transfer of the North-West Territories to the Dominion of Canada took place. Of course we must guard against establishing monopolies by limiting the time of the charters, or the land grants of those companies. The scheme of the late Government was to give a private company about thirty millions of dollars and fifty millions of acres of land to assist in the construction of the railway—that is between 18,000 and 19,000 acres per mile. If this scheme had been carried out, an immense quantity of land would still have remained in the possession of the Government. If the Company could not have built the road for the subsidy offered it would have benefited the country very much better to have given five or ten millions of dollars more, and have the work completed for a definite sum. As matters now stand we have, for an expenditure of ten millions of dollars, practically only ten miles of railway completed; therefore, I contend that the scheme of the late Government was not so absurd as the hon. Secretary of State would have us to believe. Is it not a fact that, among the gentlemen who formed private companies to undertake the building of that railway, there were many of the most influential men of Canada, and can it be doubted that by the means at their disposal, with what they could have procured abroad, they would have been able to build the Pacific Railway from the Ottawa River to the Pacific Coast? The most striking example of the success of such a mode of building a railway of this character, and of the advantages thereby accruing to the country, is to be found in the Grand Trunk railway. Twenty years ago that undertaking was certainly as gigantic an enterprise to the old Province of Canada as he Pacific Railway is now to the Dominion. The Grand Trunk Railway cost about seventy-five millions of dollars, of which amount the old Province of Canada contributed, as near as I can recollect, about sixteen millions of dollars, the balance having been furnished by private enterprise. Does anyone imagine, if the Province of Canada had undertaken to build the Grand Trunk Railway out of her own resources, she could have accomplished such a work? I contend it would not have been possible to have accomplished it, that it would have ruined the country. The effect of giving the work to a private company was to bring foreign capital into the country, from which the people have derived great benefit. If the same course were pursued in connection with the Pacific Railway, it would be attended with the same results on a very much larger scale. The only fault that has really been found with the scheme of the late Government was, that the country was bound to build the road within ten years, and it is contended that that could not have been done. I consider myself that the time was too short, but was it not understood by everybody that, if the work had been earnestly undertaken, the people of British Columbia would have been perfectly satisfied? Everybody knows that the country was not absolutely bound to build the road in ten years. We find to-day that, although nothing has been done towards commencing the construction of the railway at the western end, the people of British Columbia, knowing the position in which the Dominion stands, have been exceedingly reasonable in their demands and expectations. Does any one imagine that they would have been less reasonable or moderate if the Government had proceeded earnestly and energetically to construct the road, and had failed to complete it within the time limited? The principal feature in the scheme of the present Government was the water stretches. They thought they could utilize the navigable waters between Lake Superior and the Red River, but they knew nothing about the 400 feet of rise and fall between those different rivers and lakes, and that to connect them by means of canals and locks would involve an expense larger than the road itself.

Hon. Mr. Trudel.

Hon. Mr. Truvel.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—They had not the slightest idea of it. Now, what do they know even about another part of the country not so remote from the settled portions of the old Province of Canada? Absolutely nothing. Yet they pretended to substitute a better scheme for the policy of the late Government, and the natural inference which the public have drawn from it is that the Government have expended this immense sum of money, not with the idea of building the Pacific Railway, but with the idea of showing it was impossible to build it.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—I have remarked with pleasure that the Government have shown great anxiety of late to give satisfaction to our friends in British Columbia. That is very well, but I must remind hon. gentlemen there are other parties in the Dominion who have interests to be promoted and guarded as well as the inhabitants of British Columbia. Yet they have been treated as if they had no rights at all. When the treaty with British Columbia was negotiated, and the resolutions were passed, binding this country to construct the Pacific Railway, it was decided that the construction should be commenced simultaneously at Lake Nipissing and on the Pacific coast. If the Government felt that the Dominion is pledged to carry out that agreement so far as the 60,000 people of British Columbia are concerned, surely they are also pledged to the 1,500,000 people in the Province of Quebec and the valley of the Ottawa to build the road from Lake Nipissing westward. Supposing the Province of Quebec and the eastern half of Ontario had refused to accept the treaty with British Columbia, the agreement for the annexation of the latter would not have been carried. That was one of the conditions on which the Province of Quebec gave her support to the Pacific Railway scheme. Now, would they not have as great reason to complain of unfair treatment as the people of British Columbia? As the hour is very late, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ADDRESS TO THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT announced that His Excellency the Governor-General would attend in the Senate Chamber on Tuesday to receive the addresses which had been adopted by both Houses.

The House adjourned at 12.20 p.m.

PORT WHITBY HARBOR COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. HAMILTON (Kingston)—from the Committee on Banking, Commerce and Railways reported the Bill intitled "An Act respecting the Whitby Harbor Company" without amendment.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON moved that the Bill be read the third time.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL said he did not intend to oppose the Bill, but he had doubts as to the constitutionality of empowering private parties to sell this harbor. He desired to enter his protest against such legislation, lest it should be cited on some future occasion as a precedent.

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

THE MINISTERIAL CHANGE IN QUEBEC.

RESOLUTION.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL moved :

"To Resolve,—That the Messages of His Excellency the Governor-General of the 26th March and 8th April be now read, and that it be resolved that the course adopted by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec towards his late Ministry was at variance with the constitutional principles upon which Responsible Government should be conducted."

He said—It is not without a good deal of reflection that I have taken upon myself the responsibility of offering to the House a resolution upon the subject of the recent ministerial change in the Province of Quebec. Great consideration seemed to me to be necessary before any member of this House should ask the Senate to take action in this matter at this time. but I am myself convinced, for reasons which will develop themselves as I go on, that it is better to ask the House to come to a decision on the question even now, and close as we are to where the contest is going on between the rival parties in Quebec, rather than to postpone action. Of course, in dealing with the subject, I am not at all forgetful of the fact that the gentleman who fills the high position of Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was formerly a colleague of ours; that he is known to us personally, and is held in high esteem by those with whom he acted in this House. I also, for myself and for those gentlemen who act with me, must say I approach the subject with a good deal of reluctance in the direction in which I am about to speak, because the natural leaning of my mind would be to support authority, and that is the natural tendency of the Conservative party, but the case is so peculiar that I feel it necessary to ask the House to consider the circumstances which attended the recent dismissal of the Quebec Cabinet. Another reason which makes me think it expedient to move as I am now doing, is the fact that two messages from His Excellency with papers on the subject have been transmitted to this House, not at our request, but on the mere motion and grace of His Excellency. In my judgment some action ought to be taken by us lest our silence be misunderstood, and that is still more strongly the case from the fact of a resolution having been moved in the other branch of the Legislature. If, under these circumstances, we were to take no action on this question, the natural inference would be that we approved of the course pursued by the Lieut. Governor of Quebec. I do not think it would be wise to allow such an impression to go abroad unless such is the feeling of the House. My impression is, the House disapproves of the course of the Lieut. Governor, and therefore I move this resolution to give expression to the views of the Senate. I think it right here to express my regret that no authoritative statement of facts was agreed upon by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec and the late Government of that Province, a statement conveying fully the reasons for the dismissal of the Ministry. Such a statement should have been agreed upon and submitted, I think, to the Legislature of that Province; it is certainly undignified and injurious in a public point of view that contradictions should appear between the statements of the Lieutenant-Governor and those of his late advisers on so important an action as that taken recently by Mr. Letellier. That, however, has not been the case. A statement was submitted to the Legislature of Quebec, which the Lieutenant-Governor in one of the papers on the table says exceeded his permission, and that he did not concur in the facts as stated. I desire to approach the subject with a perfectly fair mind, without prejudice on either side and without any other feeling than a desire to discharge the duty devolving upon me in that spirit which shall most conduce to the public interest. I do not think we can or should shut our eyes to the fact that the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec had, for a long time, taken an active part in politics, first in the other branch of the Legislature in the former Province of Canada, and afterwards in the Legislative Council and the Senate. We had the advantage of his assistance in the proceedings of this House and we cannot forget that he was, during the time we knew him, a gentleman of very strong bias, and very active on his side of politics. I think it is a matter of regret, that a gentleman in that position with those strong party feelings, should have been sent to his native Province as Lieutenant-Governor. That was not the plan originally contemplated by the framers of the British North America Act. I do not mean that there was anything in the Act to prevent it, but that the intention at the time was that a Lieutenant-Governor should not be sent to his own Province.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Tilley, Mr. Crawford, and Mr. Archibald all illustrate the view held by the late Government.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I was going to say it was departed from, but that was not the original view taken by the framers of the Act. Their view was that it would be more convenient to send gentlemen to govern other provinces than their own. That, as the hon. Secretary of State says, was departed from on the very first occasion, but I think it is none the less to be regretted. The consequence is that you will have sometimes a gentleman of very strong party feelings who has been active in the politics of his own Province as was the case in this instance, and sent to govern his own Province at a time when it happens those whom he had been fighting all his life are in power. I admit the example was set by the late Government from the first, but I think it would be a wise thing if we were to fall back upon the plan which was originally contemplated; if the intended Lieutenant-Governor has been engaged in politics he is almost certain to have been a strong and active party man, and it is placing him and those who are to be his advisers in a very unfair position. That was particularly the case in the appointment of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec. He had been engaged with great earnestness in party warfare, and had been a Minister of the Crown at the time of his appointment. He was sent to govern his native Province, and found the Ministry in power composed of the very men to whom he had been bitterly opposed all his life. Some doubt has been apparently felt upon the right and duty of Parliament to take cognizance of a matter of this kind. I do not think that ground will be taken in this House. It seems to me it has been sufficiently answered in the other branch of the Legislature. It must be clear that we occupy in relation to the Lieutenant-Governor the same position as the British Parliament occupies in relation to the Governor-General.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—When the occasion arises for us to interfere, it is our right to do so, in the same way as the British Parliament has interfered in many instances when the acts of governors of British provinces have called for it. We know that from time to time the Parliament of Great Britain, when they had occasion to interfere with the colonial governors, have not hesitated to speak, and their conduct in the discharge of their duties has been the subject of debate in both Houses. I do not think there is any doubt about the legitimate right of Parliament to interfere if it sees occasion to do so. I do not think anyone will contend, on reflection, that this Parliament should not interfere, and express its opinion with reference to the action of any Lieutenant-Governor in the Dominion, if Parliament see fit. But it was contended further—and that was really the reply to a motion similar to this in another place—that this is not the proper time to interfere; that it would be better in the interests of the public that we should wait until some subsequent session, and until the results of the course taken by the Lieutenant-Governor shall have developed themselves; and further that if in the meantime the Province of Quebec shall have pronounced, by the election which is pending, in favor of the new Ministry, that would be a complete answer to all the complaints made against the course pursued by the Lieutenant-Governor—that is, if a Lieutenant-Governor, do what he will, is able to get a Ministry who will go to the country and be returned with a majority, the fact must be held to condone all his faults, and is a sufficient answer to all complaints. I do not agree in that. It seems to me, if that is the rule of Parliament, any malfeasance of office may be committed by the Governor, provided that a majority is returned to support the side he favors. I think that would be a bad rule to adopt, because of its effect on other provinces.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—How is it in England?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I will discuss that in a moment. I would be an exceedingly bad rule to follow as respects other Provinces. Any Lieutenant-Governor might feel that he was at liberty to follow a course, however arbitrary and erroneous, interpose his views and ideas of what was politic on the country, and pursue the same course that has been taken in the Province of Quebec. I think that would be very injurious to the future welfare of the Provinces and to the system of responsible government under which we are all so happily living and which we believe to be the system most likely to conduce to the general weal, and which we desire to see carried out in its integrity and in all fairness. The hon. Senator from Alma asks how it is in England. One great advantage colonies have over England, is on that very point, that the conduct of our governors can be reviewed by higher authority than their own, whilst, of course, Her Majesty is supreme, and responsible only to the English people; but I will show presently what was thought in England, at all events, by very eminent statesmen. Lord Metcalfe took a very strong course in the late Province of Canada. In 1843 he forced a resignation and formed a new Ministry who went to the people and were elected, and commanded a small majority when they returned to Parliament. The situation was the same as if, in this instance, Mr. Joly should come back with a small majority. The language held by an eminent statesman in England, in that case was not such as the question asked by the hon. Senator from Alma would lead the House to suppose would be used. Hon. gentlemen opposite contend that if the result of the election now pending in the Province of Quebec should be favorable to the new Ministry, it would condone the offence of the Lieutenant-Governor. I do not think that is a sound doctrine. So far as the people of that Province are concerned it would, but if it be true that the Lieutenant-Governor has not carried out the high trusts reposed in him in a constitutional manner, I think he is still subject to be censured by the power from whom he derived his authority, no matter what may be the result of the election in his own Province. The success of the new Ministry would leave his responsibility to the Governor-General and this Parliament untouched. We will suppose a case as an illustration. The hon. Secretary of State has mentioned the appointment of Mr. Crawford as the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario. Suppose he had taken upon himself to dismiss, under any circumstances, the Government of Mr. Mowat, who had a large majority at the time Mr. Crawford was Lieutenant-Governor of the Province, I apprehend Mr. Crawford would have been recalled very quickly, no matter what might have been the result of an election in Ontario. Take another instance: the Governor-General dismissing the Federal Government now in power. There have been several elections in the different Provinces which have given an indication that there has been a change of public opinion. Suppose His Excellency had been very much impressed with that, and had dismissed his Ministry with their immense majority in the Commons, and sent for Sir John Macdonald to form a new Administration; suppose an election to have taken place, and a majority to have been returned to support the new Government, would that have condoned the offence of His Excellency towards the Imperial Government? They would have found fault with His Excellency's conduct as a departure from the principles on which he was sent to carry out the Government of the country, as much, probably, as if the elections had gone the other way. He would have been condemned for taking out of the hands of the Ministry representing the majority, the control of public affairs, to run the risk of another election, and would probably have been told that, in so doing, he had departed from the principles which should have governed him in carrying out the powers entrusted to him by Her Majesty. I will read an extract which will show the view taken in England of Lord Metcalfe's action in the case to which I have referred.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Is it expressed by his official superior?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—It is not. Lord Grey, in expressing an opinion on the interference of Lord Metcalfe in dismissing his Ministry in 1843, expressed himself as follows:—

“The effect of this intervention was to place him in direct hostility with one of the great parties into which the colony was divided. Though the difficulty of carrying on the Government was thus obviated for the moment, as the party into whose hands he had thrown himself, possessed a small majority in the Assembly, this advantage was dearly purchased by the circumstances that the Parliamentary Opposition was no longer directed merely against the advisers of the Governor, but against the Governor himself and the British Government of which he was the organ.

Nor was this all. The Governor, by his rupture with one party, was placed to a far greater degree than was desirable in the power of the other, by which he was supported, and lost the means of exercising his proper authority in checking any departure from moderation on the part of those by whose assistance he was compelled to carry on the Government.”

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

That goes to show, I think, that the view taken by the hon. gentleman from Alma is not correct, and that it is not a sufficient answer—assuming for the moment that the Lieutenant-Governor was wrong—so far as the Governor-General and this Parliament are concerned, to say that the Province of Quebec may return a majority in favor of the new Ministry. For the purposes of other Provinces and of establishing a precedent, it is desirable that a rule should be laid down, whatever may be the result of the local election. I admit it is somewhat inconvenient to discuss this question now so close to the scene of the elections which are going on, and it would be desirable if this authority which we are exercising were exercised at a greater distance.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—That is an inconvenience, but it is also an inconvenience to keep silence, because that would be construed into approval of the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor. I think it important that the Senate should pronounce upon the case, not with a view to the effect upon those immediately concerned, but because it is important we should arrive at a sound conclusion for the future. All those views, so far as I could weigh them in my mind, have been governing me in arriving at the conclusion to ask the House to come to a decision now upon the point. It will be seen, I hope, that I have not taken this course without considerable reflection as to the effect of taking action and of refraining from taking action. It seems to me if we refrain from taking action we shall be misunderstood, and it is better for the House, if it believe the course pursued by the Lieutenant-Governor has not been such as to meet with its approval, to say so. I do not agree in the view that has been put forth that the rights and prerogatives of the Lieutenant-Governor as regards what has taken place in the Province of Quebec have been limited by the British North America Act. I believe, so far as the affairs of that Province are concerned, his prerogatives are the same as those of the Governor-General.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—The only way of carrying out responsible government is to admit that and to place the Lieutenant-Governor in a similar position to that occupied by the Governor-General, and to see, so far as we can, that he carries out the duties that thus devolve upon him in the spirit of the Constitution. Having stated this much by way of introduction, and in order that the House may see that so far as I was able I have not been hasty in asking the House to take any action upon this question, I shall now proceed to enquire what the duties of a Lieutenant-Governor are, and how far Mr. Letellier has conformed to them, and, if he has gone astray, whether his mistake has been sufficient to justify us in expressing our opinion adversely to him. I do not propose to go into a history of the rise and progress of Parliamentary Government; I think it would be presumptuous on my part to do so, after the very learned and elaborate statement made on that subject elsewhere, and which must have been seen by every hon. gentleman in this House. Of course the opinion of the Senate should only be given with great care and after great deliberation, and only when the House is satisfied it is useful in the interests of the country that it should be expressed. In order to lay down some general rule as to what the course of the Lieutenant-Governor of a Province should be, I desire in the first place to read an extract from Freeman, in order to show the change which had taken place in the administration of Government in late years, and to place an outline before the House of the general course of conduct which should govern the present system, modified and relaxed as it has been of late years by constitutional usage. The following extract is from "The Growth of the English Constitution" by Freeman:—

"Since the 17th century things have in this respect greatly altered. The work of legislation, of strictly constitutional legislation, has never ceased. A long succession of legislative enactments stand out as landmarks of political progress, no less in more recent than in earlier times. But, alongside of it, there has been a series of political changes, changes of no less moment than those which are recorded in the Statute Book, which have been made without any legislative enactment whatever. A whole code of political maxims, universally acknowledged in theory, universally carried out in practice, has grown up, without leaving among the formal Acts of our Legislature any steps by which it grew. Up to the end of the 17th century we may fairly say that no distinction could be discerned between the constitution and the law. The prerogative of the Crown, the privilege of Parliament, the liberty of the subject might not always be clearly defined on every point. It has indeed, been said that those three things were all of them things to which, in their own nature, no limit could be set. But all three were supposed to rest, if not on the direct words of the Statute law, yet at least on that somewhat shadowy yet very practical creation, that mixture of genuine ancient traditions and, of recent devices of lawyers which is known to Englishmen as common law. Any breach, either of the right of the Sovereign or of the right of the subjects, was a legal offence, capable of legal definition, and subjecting the offender to legal penalties. An act which could not be brought within the letter either of the statute or of the common law would not then have been looked upon as an offence at all. If Lower Courts were too weak to do justice, the High Court of Parliament stood ready to do justice, even against the mightiest offenders. It was armed with weapons fearful and rarely used, but none the less regular and legal. It could smite by impeachment, by attainder, by the exercise of the greatest power of all—the deposition of the reigning King. But men had not yet reached the more subtle doctrine that there may be offences against the Constitution which are no offences against the law; they had not learned that men in high office may have a responsibility, practically felt and acted on, but which no legal enactment has defined, and which no legal tribunal will enforce; it had not been found out that Parliament itself has a power, now practically the highest of its powers, in which it acts neither as a Legislature nor as a Court of Justice, but in which it pronounces sentences which have none the less practical force because they carry with them none of the legal consequences of death, bonds, banishment, or confiscation. We now have a whole system of political morality, a whole code of precepts for the guidance of public men, which will not be found in any page of either the statute or the common law, but which are, in practice, held barely less sacred than any principle embodied in the Great Charter or in the Petition of Right. In short, by the side of our written law, there has grown up an unwritten or conventional constitution. When an Englishman speaks of the conduct of a public man being constitutional or unconstitutional, he means something wholly different from what he means by conduct being legal or illegal. A famous vote of the House of Commons, passed on the motion of a great statesman, once declared that the then Ministers of the Crown did not possess the confidence of the House of Commons, and that their continuance in office was therefore at variance with the spirit of the Constitution. The truth of such a position, according to the traditional principles upon which public men have acted for some generations cannot be disputed, but it would be in vain to seek for any trace of such doctrines in any page of our written law. The proposer of that motion did not mean to charge the existing Ministry with any illegal act, with any act which could be made the subject either of a prosecution in a Lower Court, or of impeachment in the High Court of Parliament itself. He did not mean that the Ministers of the Crown committed any breach of the law of which the law could take cognizance by retaining possession of their offices till such time as the Crown should think good to dismiss them from these offices; what he meant was that the general course of their policy was one which, to a majority of the House of Commons, did not seem to be wise or beneficial to the nation, and that therefore, according to a conventional code as well understood and as effectual as the written law itself, they were bound to resign offices of which the House of Commons no longer held them to be worthy. The House made no claim to dismiss these Ministers from their offices by any act of its own; it did not even petition the Crown to remove them from their offices; it simply spoke its mind on their general conduct, and it was held that when the House had so spoken it was their duty to give way without any formal petition, without any formal command on the part of either the House or the Sovereign. The passing by the House of Commons of such a resolution as this may perhaps be set down as the formal declaration of a constitutional principle, but though a formal declaration, it was not a legal declaration; it created a point for the practical guidance of future Ministers and future Parliaments, but it neither changed the law nor declared it. It asserted a principle which might be appealed to in future debates in the House of Commons, but it asserted no principle which could be taken any notice of by a Judge in any Court of law. It stands, therefore, on a wholly different ground from those enactments which, whether they changed the law or simply declared the law, had a legal force, capable of being enforced by a legal tribunal. If any officer of the Crown should levy a tax without the authority of Parliament, he would be guilty of a legal crime, but if he merely continues to hold an office conferred by the Crown, and from which the Crown has not removed him, though he hold it in the teeth of any number of votes of censure passed by both Houses of Parliament, he is in no way a breaker of the written law, but the man who would so act would be universally held to have trampled under foot one of the most undoubted principles of the unwritten but universally accepted constitution."

I think that gives more tersely and better than any work I have seen, the changes which have come over the administration of our system of government in the last sixty or seventy years. I thought I would read this passage in the House as a proper introduction to the general view which should be taken of the conduct of those who are entrusted with the administration of responsible government under which we are now living. Now, as to the duties which may fairly be exacted from the Lieutenant-Governor, I desire to read some instructions which have been given from two colonial secretaries to the officers entrusted with the government of some of the old provinces of the Dominion. The first is an extract from Lord Grey's instructions to Lord Elgin. Lord Grey is as high an authority on this class of subjects as any one in the Imperial Parliament, and certainly Lord Elgin was not an officer who was likely to let himself go astray. He was as likely to maintain the system of government which he was instructed to carry out as any officer who could have been sent out, and the instructions given to him were not called for by any want of knowledge or disposition on his part, so they may be taken as essential to the guidance of any officer entrusted with the position. He was instructed:—

"The object with which I recommend to you this course is that of making it apparent that any transfer which may take place of political power from the hands of one party in the Provinces to those of another, is the result, not of any act of yours, but by the wishes of the people themselves, as shown by the difficulty experienced by the retiring party to carry on the government of the Provinces according to the form of the Constitution. To this I attach great importance. I have, therefore, to instruct you to abstain from changing your Executive Council until it shall become perfectly clear that they are unable, with such fair support from yourself"

Mind you, that even then, although Lord Elgin was of opinion that, for the good of Canada a new Administration should be formed, in which the French element and the English element should, equally or nearly equally, predominate, yet even then the instructions to Lord Elgin were:—

"I have, therefore, to instruct you to abstain from changing your Executive Council until it shall become perfectly clear that they are unable, with such fair support from yourself as they have a right to expect, to carry on the government of the Provinces satisfactorily, and to command the confidence of the Legislature."

These are the instructions from one eminent statesman to another, directing him, in almost peremptory terms, to take care not to transfer power from one party to another, except when called for by the course pursued in the Legislature of the Province, when it had been shown not to possess the confidence of a majority of the people's representatives. It is only necessary to look at the facts which have taken place in the Province of Quebec to show how far Mr. Letellier deviated from this course. In his case the party in power, so far from being in a minority, possessed a strong majority in both branches of the Legislature. There was not the slightest indication of weakness; the circumstances therefore were diametrically opposed to those under which only Lord Grey supposed it was possible for an officer of the Crown to change his Government. Now, that is a great authority on the Whig side. The other authority, which I am going to read, is on the Conservative side, and is contained in the instructions from Lord Derby to an officer of the Crown in one of the Provinces now forming part of the Dominion. Lord Derby, writing to a Governor of Nova Scotia, advised him to keep strictly neutral in the political struggles of that Province, and said:—

“The object with which I recommend to you this course is that of making it apparent that any transfer which may take place of political power from the hands of one party in the Province to those of another, is the result, not of an act of yours, but of the wishes of the people themselves, as shown by the difficulty experienced by the retiring party in carrying on the Government of the Province according to the forms of the Constitution. To this I attach great importance. I have, therefore, to instruct you to abstain from changing your Executive Council until it shall become perfectly clear that they are unable, with such fair support from yourself as they have a right to expect, to carry on the Government of the Province satisfactorily, and command the confidence of the Legislature.”

Hon. Mr. PENNY—That is a repetition of what you have just read.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I fancy it is part of the printed instructions.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I do not know, but I should think it very unlikely to be part of our printed instructions, but if it were, it would be all the stronger, as it would serve to show that it was the received doctrine of the Colonial Office, no matter what party might be in power. Certainly that view has been departed from by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec. He has changed his Government under circumstances diametrically opposed to the instructions laid down by the two authorities I have cited as being the only circumstances in which a Governor should allow his Ministry to be changed. I desire to read now what Lord Dufferin said in his speech at Halifax as to the duties of a Governor-General. It was during the crisis in 1873, and what he said is in exact conformity to the instructions of Lord Grey and Lord Derby and of other statesmen in England. Lord Dufferin said:—

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

“My only guiding star in the conduct and maintenance of my official relations with your public men is the Parliament of Canada. * * * I believe in Parliament no matter which way it votes, and to those men alone whom the deliberate will of the confederated Parliament of Canada may assign me as my responsible advisers, can I give my confidence. Whether they are the heads of this Party or of that Party must be a matter of indifference to the Governor-General. So long as they are maintained in Parliament in their position, so long is he bound to give them his unreserved confidence, to defer to their advice, and loyally assist them with his counsels. As a reasonable being he cannot help having convictions upon the merits of different policies; but these considerations are abstract, speculative, and devoid of practical effect in his official relations. As the head of a constitutional State, as engaged in the administration of Parliamentary Government, he (the Governor-General) has no political friends, still less need he have political enemies. The possession, or even the being suspected of possessing such, destroys his usefulness.”

The House will see how clearly and earnestly it is laid down that so long as a Ministry is sustained in Parliament, so long is a Governor bound to give the Ministry his confidence. It seems to me that it is very clear that this doctrine was not observed by Mr. Letellier. Mr. DeBoucherville was sustained by a very large majority in both Houses. I will cite a case in which the Lieutenant-Governor of the colony of Victoria was placed in a very embarrassing position by a dispute between the two branches of the Legislature—a dispute which was carried so far that the Upper House refused to pass the Supply Bill, and the Government, in retaliation, dismissed a number of Judges of County Courts and other officers connected with the preservation of the public peace. Even under those circumstances, exceptional as they were, the Governor was directed by the Secretary for the Colonies, Sir Michael Hicks Beach latterly, and Lord Carnarvon in the first place—to support his Government because they had a majority in the House of Assembly. It is put very strongly in the following extract published in the Saturday Review :—

“ In a memorandum submitted to the Cabinet, Sir George Bowen, while admitting the necessity of retrenchment, owing to the stoppage of supplies, records his grave objections to the particular mode in which it was proposed to carry out the reductions in the Civil Service, and especially in the judicial departments. He had grave misgivings in particular concerning the even temporary dispensing with the services of County Courts Judges, Coroners and Police Magistrates.

“ The course he hereby recommended to the Cabinet was to suspend the salaries of the officers instead of dispensing with their services, by which means the public would have retained the services of such of them as were willing and ready to serve for a time without pay. With regard to further reductions, he strongly recommended the Minister to take measures for contradicting the false rumors that had been circulated to the effect that the Government contemplated some interference with the currency and the banks, and reminded the Cabinet that he was precluded by the Queen's instructions from sanctioning any measure establishing a paper currency or prejudicing the trade and shipping in the United Kingdom and its dependencies. The Cabinet rejected this wise advice, and Sir George Bowen determined that as the proposed reduction in the public service only affected persons holding office during pleasure, as he had been assured that a sufficient number of officers would be retained to keep the machinery of justice at work in the district Courts and Courts of Petty Sessions, and as the unpaid Justices of the Peace had everywhere undertaken to perform the duties of Coroners and Police Magistrates during the Parliamentary deadlock, he would not be justified in causing a Ministerial crisis by interfering authoritatively with the policy of his constitutional advisers.”

There was a very strong case—one in which the Governor, for strong reasons, was opposed to the course pursued by his Ministers—one in which the two Houses occupied antagonistic positions, and where, one would suppose, if a Governor ever should interfere with a Cabinet commanding a majority in Parliament, he had reason to do so ; yet, because he was administering a system of responsible government, Sir George Bowen, who was in constant communication by cable with the Colonial Office, did not dismiss his Ministers, but sustained them, though they were acting contrary to his views and disregarding his advice, and the administration of justice was being seriously interfered with.

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Does the Saturday Review uphold that ?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I have merely quoted from the Saturday Review to place the facts before the House ; however, I will read on and see :—

“ At this point the first instalment of papers leaves us. That Mr. Berry was wrong in the course he adopted seems to be clear. But it is equally clear that the statements relative to his policy which reached this country in anticipation of the official despatches were greatly, though perhaps excusably, exaggerated, and that in assenting to that policy, in spite of his personal disapproval of it, Sir George Bowen did not go beyond the limits of his official discretion.”

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Sir George Bowen had a discretion to take the other side.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—His discretion was exercised in supporting the Ministry who had the confidence of the House of Assembly, and he is supported by the authorities in England, and by this paper.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a negative support.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I did not think of quoting the Saturday Review as an authority, but merely as giving the facts. I will now read an extract or two from some high authorities upon the duties of the Executive—the duties of the Sovereign—which are analogous to those of the Lieutenant-Governor. I read from Bagehot's “English Constitution” :—

“ . . . . . The Queen can hardly now refuse a defeated Minister the chance of a dissolution any more than she can dissolve in the time of an undefeated one, and without his consent.

“ An English monarch should not dissolve Parliament against the will and the interest of the Ministry which is in power. No doubt the King can dismiss such a Ministry and replace it by another Administration, whose advice to dissolve Parliament he could take. But even with this precaution, to act thus towards a Ministry which had a strong majority in Parliament would be to strike a blow which it is almost impossible to suppose. We do not believe that Queen Victoria herself, in spite of the popularity and respect by which she is surrounded, to a greater extent perhaps than any of her predecessors, would ever have recourse to such a measure. What would be thought if she should reason thus :—“ The Whigs are in a majority in the existing Parliament, but I think the country would favor a Tory Administration. Let us, therefore, dissolve Parliament, and see whether the country will not elect a Parliament of opposite opinions to those which prevail in the present Parliament. What would be thought? No Englishman can dream even of a catastrophe of this nature, and which to him appears to belong to the phenomena of a world altogether different from that which he inhabits. In practice, in England the Sovereign considers himself obliged to follow the advice of the Ministry which the House of Commons desires to maintain in power. All prerogatives at variance with this principle have fallen into disuse, but the Sovereign may accord to the Ministry the opportunity of securing, by an appeal to the people, a majority which is denied it in the House of Commons, but to strike from behind, so to speak, and strangle by means of an appeal to the country a Ministry sustained by Parliament, would be an event which no longer enters into the calculation, although in former times instances of this occurred in our annals.

"Principle shows that the power of dismissing a Government with which Parliament is satisfied, and of dissolving that Parliament upon an appeal to the people, is not a power which a common hereditary monarch will be able beneficially to exercise. Accordingly this power has almost, if not quite, dropped out of the reality of our constitution. Nothing, perhaps, would more surprise the English people than if the Queen, by a coup d'état, and on a sudden, destroyed a Ministry firm in the allegiance and secure of a majority in Parliament. That power indisputably, in theory, belongs to her; but it has passed so far away from the minds of men, that it would terrify them, if she used it, like a volcanic eruption from Primrose Hill."

Now, I venture to suggest, that is exactly what happened in the Province of Quebec. There was a Ministry strong in power, and it was struck from behind by the Lieutenant-Governor. The extract I have read places as strongly as the English language can place it, the position which Mr. Letellier should have occupied, and shows also in a very glaring way the extreme departure which took place in the Province of Quebec from the rule laid down by those eminent authorities as to the course pursued in England. I read also, with the same view, the following from May:—

"The Governor, like the Sovereign whom he represents, holds himself aloof from and superior to parties; and governs through constitutional advisers, who have acquired an ascendancy in the Legislature. He leaves contending parties to fight out their own battles, and by admitting the stronger party to his councils, brings the executive authority into harmony with popular sentiments."

I think I have shown sufficiently clearly
Hon. Mr. Campbell.

the spirit in which the constitution requires the head of the Executive to carry on responsible government, and that it is one which requires him to submit himself and his views to the Ministry which has the command of the confidence of the majority in the Lower House of the Legislature, and that he should give the Ministry a loyal support; he should sink for the moment his own views and adopt theirs, and assist them in carrying out their policy. It is quite competent for him to advise them, as the Lieutenant-Governor of Victoria advised his Ministers, but ultimately their policy, and not his, is to prevail. Now, I will point out the course pursued by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec. In so doing, I shall be guided entirely by the language of Mr. Letellier himself, and shall only adopt any information derived from Mr. DeBoucherville himself, where it is necessary to supplement the deficient statement of the Lieutenant-Governor; because I think in speaking of the Lieutenant-Governor, we ought, as far as possible, to be guided by the papers which he has submitted for the consideration of His Excellency the Governor-General. With this view, I turn, in the first place, to his own statement and explanations. They are to be found in the message of His Excellency of the 28th of March. They seem to me from the beginning to indicate on the part of the Lieutenant-Governor a spirit completely at variance with that which, from the authorities I have read, should govern the action of the representative of the Sovereign. He did not go there with a mind free and open, and desirous of carrying on the Government according to the well understood wishes of the people, as expressed in Parliament, but, I think, to impose his own views on the people he was sent to govern. He states in his despatch of the 18th of March:—

"From the day that I was, by your Excellency, raised to the position I occupy at present, all my private relations with the members of my Cabinet, up to the time of their dismissal from office, were, I must admit, generally of an agreeable nature; but in those of an official character with the Premier, I almost invariably felt that I did not enjoy that entire confidence on his part, which is the chief element of a cordial understanding between the Representative of the Crown and his advisers."

After having studied the general state of affairs of our Province, after having become convinced that legislative and administrative changes were becoming more and more necessary, I decided upon using with moderation, and with the greatest possible discretion, the influence attached to my position, in order to obtain the realization of that which I deemed to be of the greatest advantage to the Province."

I think that completely reverses the relative position of the Lieutenant-Governor and his Ministers. It is not for the Lieutenant-Governor to make up his mind what changes, legislative and administrative, were necessary. It was his duty to have remained and seen what legislative and administrative changes his Ministry thought proper, and to have adopted them or not, as they advised. But, on the contrary, he seems to have been anxious himself to take the initiative. I do not think anything can illustrate more strongly the different spirit in which Mr. Letellier sat down to discharge his duties from that which should have governed him, judging from the authorities I have read, and the language used by the statesmen whose names I have mentioned. Then he goes on to say :—

"I regret to state to Your Excellency that although Mr. DeBoucherville did, on most occasions, take my advice in good part, and generally approved of it, he, nevertheless, almost always acted as though he had never received it."

It was not for the Governor to advise Mr. DeBoucherville at all. If he had thrust his views on Mr. DeBoucherville and wanted him to adopt them, the Premier as a matter of courtesy, would have to listen, and as those views were not his views, or the views of his Cabinet, or of a majority of the country, he did not wish to carry them out. What could he do but bow and be silent, and carry out his own views and not those of the Lieutenant-Governor? I will read further to show the spirit with which the Lieutenant-Governor thought it was his duty to act, a passage from a letter which he writes to Mr. DeBoucherville about an appointment in Montmagny, in which the Governor took one view and the Ministry took another. It is as follows :—

"(Private and Confidential.)

"QUEBEC, 14th March, 1877.

"MY DEAR DEBOUCHERVILLE;—I have not received any answer on the subject of the appointment of a Councillor at Montmagny.

Hon. Mr. Campbell,

"Those who deceived the Government in order to induce me to perform an Executive act in connection with a question which they then knew to be within the Judicial power, do not, in my opinion, deserve consideration, which cannot but be injurious to the Government and myself.

"The remedy is very simple—rescind the appointment—allow the parties interested to fight it out before the Courts.

"Yours, very truly,

"L. LETELLIER.

I fancy that this is not the sort of letter which the Lieutenant-Governor should send to his Ministry. It is not the persons who deceived the Government he had any right to complain of; if he had the advice of his Cabinet to do any act, he need not have gone behind that. In the letter to His Excellency, he says :—

"It was easy for the Premier to understand, from my remarks and the frequent conversations which I had with him, that I could not consent to see Her Majesty's subjects despoiled of the rights guaranteed to them by Magna Charta, that their property should not be interfered with, except in virtue of a judgment rendered by the tribunals of the country."

That also shows the spirit in which he was acting—that he was to be the ruler and not his Ministry, who were responsible to the Legislature. With reference to the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, the Lieutenant-Governor says :—

"The Lieutenant-Governor expressed, at that time, to the Premier, how much he regretted that legislation; he represented to him that he considered it contrary to the principles of law and justice; notwithstanding that, the measure was carried through both Houses until adopted."

Evidently he thought that his policy was entitled to prevail. Supposing the Lieutenant-Governor was of the opinion it was contrary to law and justice if it was carried through both Houses, it was for him to have supposed he was wrong, and not to have taken the view that the Legislature and the Ministry were to submit themselves to him. Then, I read for the same purpose the summary with which he closed his letter to the Governor-General :—

"It therefore results : 1st, That although the Lieutenant-Governor has made many recommendations in his position as Representative of the Crown, to the Premier, on these different subjects of public interest, his advisers have undertaken a course of administrative and legislative acts, contrary to these recommendations, and without having previously advised with him."

The question of advising him I will speak of presently, but as to their taking a course of administrative and legislative acts contrary to his advice, if they thought it was in the interest of the country, it was their bounden duty to have done so. It is not the province of the Lieutenant-Governor to make a complaint that the Government had taken a course upon subjects of public interest and legislative and administrative acts contrary to his recommendations. It was his duty not only to submit to their advice, but to loyally assist them to carry out their views, whether opposed to his own ideas or not. Then I will read from the same despatch the mode in which the Lieutenant-Governor seeks to satisfy the Governor-General that the Ministry were wrong and he was right. The complaints which he preserved against them serve to show the spirit in which he thought to carry out his Government. They appear to have been of a very minute character, and in one or two respects, not to be sustained by the facts when the facts are known. One complaint is that a bill which was read three times in one Chamber, and only twice in the other, was brought to him for his signature. The explanation was that this was an accident, and the moment it was discovered, which was the very day he gave his assent to the Bill, a despatch was sent to Ottawa pointing it out, and asking that it might be disallowed. A reply came from the Minister of Justice, stating that as it had not received all its stages in both Houses, it was mere waste paper, and it was omitted from the Statute Book. Under the circumstances was it worth saying anything more about? Another complaint was that a Bill had gone through the House with a blank. It was a Bill respecting the destruction of theatres, and had originated in the Upper House. They refrained from filling up the blank, which they might have done, as it was imposing a penalty. It was sent to the Lower House in that shape, and through some neglect the blank was not filled up there. The mistake was subsequently corrected by passing another Bill imposing the penalty, and the second Bill appears on the very next page after the original measure. It seems to me that the Lieutenant-Governor has not acted in a spirit of fairness when he makes a mistake, which was remedied at once, the subject of a complaint against his Ministers. Then, his statement about the absence of his signature to proclamations does not seem to be true in fact. In his despatch to the Governor-General, great stress is laid on the appointment in Montmagny. It was made on the advice of the Ministry in consequence of the illegality of the election in the village of Montmagny. Further facts having been brought to light, they were laid before the Ministry by the Lieutenant-Governor, and though the Attorney-General still held that the appointment was perfectly legal, Mr. De-Boucherville gave way and rescinded the appointment. An informal election was allowed, and the man elected was allowed to retain his seat. When all this was done, it seems to me the Lieutenant-Governor was actuated by a spirit of unfairness in bringing up this matter as a justification for the dismissal of his Ministry a year after it had occurred. I venture to ask the House if from those extracts which I have read one cannot safely and without any straining arrive at this conclusion—that Mr. Letellier, being a man of very strong political convictions, went down to the Province of Quebec to impose his own policy upon that Province, expecting to be able to do so either through the weakness of the Ministry or through their dismissal, and a substitution of a Government which would carry out his views. I think that deduction is not an unreasonable one; on the contrary, it is not only a reasonable one, but, in my judgment, one from which we cannot escape. He was actuated by a desire to control the course pursued by his Ministers in the same way that Governors of colonies did forty or fifty years ago. The Governor defends the course pursued with reference to the dismissal of his Ministry by stating that certain measures of finance had not received his assent, and that he had given no authority for the introduction of the South Shore Railway Bill and the North Shore Bill. I dismiss the measures of finance, because they are satisfactorily explained by the course pursued by the Lieutenant-Governor in sending up a blank for the Government to fill in and the subsequent conversation with Mr. DeBoucherville. These show the disposition of the Governor to give them the usual sanction for the introduction of measures of finance. The power given to the Executive respecting the introduction of measures of finance is not a power given to the Executive for his own sake or for him to exercise personal discretion about. The Lieutenant-Governor assents to any measure of finance that the Ministry advise. So long as they have a majority, he is bound to act upon their advice. The will of Parliament should be carried out, and his assenting to measures of finance is really done for the purpose of preventing such measures from being introduced save by the Government, so that a private member may not introduce such legislation. It is perfectly clear that the Lieutenant-Governor in giving a blank, and in his conversation with his Ministers, authorized them to initiate measures of finance. I will read the conversation detailed by Mr. DeBoucherville, to which I refer. He says:—

“Later I had the honor to ask Your Excellency for a general permission to submit to the House measures concerning many matters, which Your Excellency gave me with your ordinary courtesy. The permission, I may say, had always been granted me by your predecessor, the lamented M. Caron.”

This was after the receipt of what is called “the blank authorization.” Mr. Letellier does not deny the conversation at all, but he says it had no reference to the North Shore Railway Bill; but only to matters of finance. I only contend that the sending of a blank and the conversations go to show there was no disagreement between the Ministry and the Lieutenant-Governor on matters of finance at all events. The course pursued by the Treasurer in submitting his measures to Parliament was, the Lieutenant-Governor admitted, consistent with his duty, and did not in any way contravene the rights and privileges of the Lieutenant-Governor. I say nothing about the South Shore Railway Bill, because that afterwards seems to have been assented to on the advice of the Ministry. I dismiss all the minor complaints, because they certainly do not justify the Lieutenant-Governor's action. On the contrary, they seem to indicate a desire—I do not say this without having, I think, ample grounds—to find out causes of dissatisfaction with the Ministers. He gathered up, as it were, from time to time such facts as would eventually warrant him in taking extreme measures with them. There remains nothing but the North Shore Railway Bill. With reference to that the Lieutenant-Governor says it was introduced without his authority. Before discussing the question of authority, I desire to state to the House accurately what the facts were with reference to that measure. The resolutions were introduced on the 29th of January, after the receipt of the message from the Lieutenant-Governor from Riviere Ouelle with the blank asked for as to the measures of finance. Why the DeBoucherville Government connected that telegram with the North Shore Railway resolutions, I do not understand. It may have been some misconception on the part of the Government, and a belief that the resolutions related to money. Whether it was on that account or whether it was a pure mistake I do not know, these resolutions not being specifically on subjects of finance, but involving the expenditure of money in reference to stations and repairing shops in the City of Montreal for the North Shore Railway. At any rate, after the receipt of that telegram, saying a blank was coming up, the resolutions were introduced. It may well be that I am right in saying that Mr. DeBoucherville believed those resolutions were authorized by the telegram, because the other resolutions respecting the Railway Bill were not introduced at the same time—not until some days afterwards. Day by day the Votes and Proceedings of the Legislature were sent to the Lieutenant-Governor, and he must have known the progress the measure was making. He was well informed personally, of course, but not officially, of the various stages of the measure; but on the 19th an interview took place, when the Bill had passed through the Lower House. On that occasion the Bill formed the subject of conversation; that is mentioned in Mr. Letellier's own paper, as well as Mr. DeBoucherville's. Although the Lieutenant-Governor had been informed from day to day of the progress of the measure, because the Votes and Proceedings were sent to him, and although it was the subject of conversation between him and the Premier on the 19th of February, they separated without the Lieutenant-Governor letting the Premier know he was dissatisfied with what was being done. Does not this indicate the spirit in which the Lieutenant-Governor was administering his high duties? If he had any intention then to interfere, or any really grave complaint to make of having been treated without sufficient consideration and respect, or in violation of the prerogatives of the Crown, should he have allowed the Premier to leave him without making him aware of it? A number of days elapsed—the difference between the 19th and the 26th—before any intimation was conveyed to the Premier that the Lieutenant-Governor was dissatisfied with what had been done. These are the facts with reference to the Bill concerning the North Shore Railway. It seems to me that under the circumstances the Premier had a right to suppose that he had the approbation of the Lieutenant-Governor, even supposing his approbation was necessary. Mr. Letellier knew on the 19th at all events, the interpretation which had been put upon his message sending a blank. He knew it had been looked upon as an approval of the introduction of the resolutions respecting the North Shore Railway, as well as of measures of finance strictly, still he allowed the Premier to leave him without stating there was anything erroneous in that belief, or that he would interfere with the carrying out of the legislation. I think the Lieutenant-Governor has taken an exaggerated view of the necessity of having authority from him to introduce legislation. I do not think any position of that kind can be maintained, and I will explain to hon. gentlemen why. To show that he took an exaggerated view I need only quote from his letter to His Excellency, as follows:—

“It was easy for the Premier to understand, from my remarks and the frequent conversations which I had with him, that I could not consent to see Her Majesty's subjects despoiled of the right guaranteed to them by Magna Charta that their property should never be interfered with, except in virtue of a judgment rendered by the tribunals of the country.”

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

That was directed against the North Shore Railway Bill. Supposing Mr. De-Boucherville had gone to the Lieutenant-Governor with this Bill formally and said “I propose introducing this measure,” the Lieutenant-Governor had no constitutional right to interfere or say “I cannot permit you to introduce such legislation.” He might have said “I think you should not for this and that reason, but the responsibility is with you.” But instead of that he took the exaggerated view that direct and absolute authority must be got from him to introduce it in Parliament. I think the true doctrine was enunciated by the Premier of this country. In another place upon the discussion of this matter there he said:—“Every Bill introduced by the Ministry has the assent of the Crown.” I take it, he did not mean that every Bill was laid before the Governor and his authority asked for its introduction, but that they being advisers of the Crown had constitutionally the assent of the Crown for their measures. The legislation of the country goes on in that way, and the direct formal authority of the Governor for the introduction of measures is not sought for in the way Mr. Letellier supposes. Nobody in England imagines that the Ministry go with every Bill they introduce for the sanction of the Sovereign. It was stated in the other House by a Right Hon. member who had served under five Governors that the practice in Canada has not been so. The hon. Secretary of State knows it has not been the practice with the present Government. Take the two important Bills introduced in this House. Neither of them, I will venture to say, received the sanction of His Excellency in advance of their being introduced, and he probably knew nothing about them until he read the discussions on them. The true doctrine is that when the Ministry introduce a Bill, the fact of their being the advisers of the Crown is the only authority necessary for the introduction of it on the part of the Crown. This is one great reason why the power of vetoing bills has fallen into disuetude, because really Her Majesty gives assent to bills before they are introduced; the Ministry are responsible for them. My hon. friend from Alma Division interrupted me a few minutes ago with an allusion to Lord Palmerston's case, as though that were at variance with this doctrine. But what were the facts? Lord Palmerston had wilfully, and without informing his colleagues, departed from the policy of the Government of which he was a member, and was dismissed by the Premier. In conversation with the French Ambassador, Lord Palmerston had showed a leaning towards Napoleon, and a disposition to condone the coup d'état of the 2nd of December in a way which exceeded the decisions and views of the Cabinet, and he was dismissed on the advice of his colleagues. But that does not affect the question whether or not the absolute authority of the Lieutenant-Governor is necessary to introduce legislation. Supposing such authority were necessary, Mr. Letellier would be in a position to control everybody. But there is no such doctrine. The difference between measures of administration and measures of legislation is perfectly clear. Those gentlemen who have followed the debates in another place will know it was demonstrated there at great length that the difference was of a very vital character. Any member of Parliament could bring in any bill save a money one, but measures of administration can only proceed from the executive authority. The House will see that I have restricted myself to the course which, a Lieutenant-Governor should lay down for himself with reference to the government of a province entrusted to his charge, and it seems to me that Mr. Letellier has departed from the constitutional spirit and that rule. I think it a clear deduction from what has happened that he went down to his native province, determined to impose his own policy upon the country, and not to carry out that of his Ministry. That is a course which no Lieutenant-Governor should be allowed to suppose he can pursue, and whatever may be the result of the elections in Quebec, I think we shall but discharge our duties by pronouncing it here and now to be a departure from the principles of responsible government. I confess, under the circumstances, it might have been wiser for the De-Boucherville Government to have taken unusual precautions and to have gone to the Lieutenant-Governor with the railway bills beforehand, but I hold it was no dereliction of duty on their part that they did not take that precaution, and if they had, Mr. Letellier could only have said

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

"I do not like it, but you have got Parliament at your back, and you must take the course you think best." That would have been done in England, or here. On all these grounds, it seems to me, the course that has been pursued by Mr. Letellier in trying to force his views on his Ministers and on the country was a departure from constitutional usage and principle. The resolution before the House points not only to the dismissal, but to the course pursued before the dismissal. If we do not adopt this resolution, our silence will be construed into an approval of conduct which I think deserves condemnation; and greater danger will result to the State than from our speaking now, even in view of the proximity of the elections. I ask this House with some confidence to pronounce in the words of this resolution, that "the course adopted by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec was at variance with the constitutional principles upon which responsible government should be conducted."

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—It was my intention to address the House in French, but, after reflection, I thought it would only be a matter of courtesy to do so in English, and save the House the weariness of addressing them in a language to which the greater number of hon. gentlemen present are unaccustomed.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I wish, at the outset, to state how deeply I regret the circumstances that have forced this question upon this House. Such discussions are certainly not calculated to increase that respect and veneration which are at all times due to the Crown and to its representatives. True, the responsibility of the evil rests on the party whose acts are to be inquired into, but if the consequences are such as I have just shown them to be, whatever may be the necessity for them, and, in this circumstance, I have no hesitation to state that such discussions are a necessity, nevertheless they are to be deplored by every true lover of this country. For my part I feel deeply on the matter, and so much more that the gentleman whose conduct is the subject of this discussion is a citizen of my own Province and a man of my own origin and nationality that nationality which fought so much some forty years ago against that oligarchy which then ruled over my native Province; a nationality which has sacrificed its most patriotic men to secure the liberties we now enjoy; a nationality which more than any other in this Dominion is interested in the maintenance of our present Constitution.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Hon. gentlemen, had I been told a few months ago, that amongst the many Lieutenant-Governors of this Dominion, Mr. Letellier would be the first, nay, the only one, who would attempt to violate the Constitution in such a way, I could not have believed it, and no doubt many an hon. member of this Senate would have refused to endorse the statement, knowing as we all know that gentleman and his Liberal proclivities. Was he not known by his party as a Liberal par excellence and as the standard bearer of the Liberal party in his Province? How many times have hon. gentlemen in this House heard Senator Letellier vindicating the rights of the majority and proclaiming the sovereignty of the people! Yet all those grand principles, it seems now, Senator Letellier did not believe in, but they were only proclaimed by that hon. gentleman as a means of increasing his popularity and that of his party. At all events, to that conclusion alone can I come when I consider his conduct since his appointment to the governorship of the Province of Quebec. From the very first day of his elevation to that high position, Lieutenant-Governor Letellier seems to have forgotten all the great principles he (as a private individual and politician) had advocated in times past, and has become an arbitrary ruler and an arbitrary Governor. In England and all over the British Empire our most gracious Queen reigns, and never did she attempt to govern and deprive her legal advisers of their rights. But in Canada Lieutenant-Governor Letellier considers it to be beneath his dignity to submit to the advice of his constitutional advisers, and reserves to himself the arbitrary power of ruling and governing. His Honor cares no more for the well understood wishes of the people constitutionally expressed by their representatives. His views must be carried out, or he will find out some means, good or bad, to eject his Ministry from office, whatever may be their popularity or whatever may be the support they receive from Parliament. This brings me naturally to the question of the power of the Sovereign to dismiss his constitutional advisers. May, in his constitutional history of England, has the following:—

Hon. Mr. Bellerose.

“The right of the King to dismiss his Ministers was unquestionable; but constitutional usage has prescribed certain conditions under which this right should be exercised. It should be exercised solely in the interests of the State, and on grounds which can be justified to Parliament, to whom, as well as to the King, the Ministers are responsible.” * * *

“Both (the prerogatives and influence of the Crown) have been exercised wisely, justly, and in the true spirit of the constitution. Ministers, enjoying the confidence of Parliament, have never claimed in vain the confidence of the Crown. Their measures have not been thwarted by secret influence, and irresponsible advice. Their policy has been directed by Parliament and public opinion, and not by the will of the Sovereign, or the intrigues of the Court.”

In the 2nd volume of the same work, I find the following:—

“By the adoption of this principle (responsible government or ministerial responsibility), a colonial constitution has become the very image and reflection of Parliamentary Government in England. The Governor, like the Sovereign whom he represents, holds himself aloof from and superior to parties; and governs through constitutional advisers, who have acquired a ascendancy in the Legislature. He leaves contending parties to fight out their own battles, and by admitting the stronger party to his councils, brings the executive authority into harmony with popular sentiments. And as the recognition of this doctrine in England, has practically transferred the supreme authority of the State from the Crown to Parliament and the people, so in the Colonies has it wrested from the Governor and from the Parent State the direction of Colonial affairs.”

In Bagehot, another writer on constitutional law, we find the following:—

“The Sovereign under a constitutional monarchy such as ours has three functions: to give advice, encouragement and admonition. A prudent and a wise King ought not to desire to have any other rights. He ought to see that being deprived of other rights would place him in a position to exercise those three functions in a more efficacious manner. He could say to his Ministry: ‘On you rests the responsibility of those measures. I have to do what you advise me as being good, and everything that you advise me to do as being good shall receive my entire support."

In another part of Bagehot I find another point bearing on this subject, which I intended to quote, but as it has been referred to by the hon. leader of the Opposition, I will not now do so. The next authority from whom I will quote is Hearn, another writer on constitutional government. He says:—

"Under Sir Robert Walpole the modern system, in most at least of its features, was established. It was to a great extent discontinued under his successors, but was revived at various intervals and with various success during the reign of George the Third. Towards the close of that long reign, or rather of that part of it in which the King himself exercised the functions of royalty, the principles and the practice of what is now called Parliamentary Government were firmly established. The policy of the Crown has since that time been determined, on the whole, by the advice of its Ministers; and the Ministry is changed at the time of the changes of feeling in public opinion and in conformity with those changes."

Another authority on the subject, and not the least—Lord Dufferin—says in one of his speeches delivered at Halifax:

"If there is one obligation whose importance I appreciate more than another, as attaching to the functions of my office, it is the absolute and paramount duty of maintaining not merely an outward attitude of perfect impartiality towards the various parties into which the political world of Canada, as of the Mother Country, is divided, but still more preserving that more subtle and inward balance of sympathy, judgment and opinions which should elevate the Representative of your Sovereign above the faintest suspicion of having any other desire, aim, or ambition than to follow the example of his Royal Mistress in the relations which she has constantly maintained towards her Ministers, her Parliament and her people. No, gentlemen, I understand my duty too well even to allow my judgment or my sympathies to be surprised into political partizanship. My one thought and desire is the welfare of Canada as a whole, to maintain her honor, to promote her prosperity; to do my duty to her and her entire people, is the sole object of my ambition. When I converse with your public men, it scarcely ever occurs to me to remember to what political party they belong. I only see in them persons devoting themselves, each according to his lights, to the service of his country. My only guiding star in the conduct and maintenance of my official relations with your public men is the Parliament of Canada; in fact, I suppose I am the only person in the Dominion whose faith in the wisdom and in the infallibility of Parliament is never shaken. I, gentlemen, believe in Parliament no matter which way it votes, and to those men alone whom the absolute will of the Confederate Parliament of the Dominion may assign to me as my responsible advisers, can I give my confidence. So long as they (Ministers) are maintained by Parliament in their positions, so long am I (the Representative of the Crown) bound to give them my unreserved confidence, to defer to their advice, and loyally to assist them with my counsels."

Then, hon. gentlemen, to help you to arrive at a fair conclusion on the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, let me refer you to the words he himself uttered some five years ago on 13th August, 1873:

"The Royal prerogative cannot be made use of for the purpose of restraining the liberty of the people. On the contrary, that prerogative ought to adapt itself to circumstances, and to be exercised in the interests of the people, regularly shown to be such; if it were otherwise, Parliament might as well be dispensed with, and the people be compelled by violence to obey the commands of the Crown, without any respect for their representatives."

I am much mistaken, if those quotations do not conclusively show that the supreme authority of the State rests in Parliament, and the people, and that the duty of the Sovereign is to place his confidence in such men as Parliament may assign as his constitutional advisers, cooperate with them, and cordially receive their advice. To this view of the question may be objected that, in practice extraordinary circumstances may occur when, in the interest of the country, the Sovereign may not, or even ought not to yield to the advice of his Ministers, supported, as they may be, by Parliament. No doubt such circumstances may occur when the Sovereign may resist, or even refuse to yield to the advice of his Ministers; but then, as stated by May (Constitutional History of England, vol. 1, p. 126.)

"This right of the Sovereign, according to constitutional usages, should be exercised solely in the interest of the State, and on grounds which can be justified to Parliament, to whom, as well as to the King, the Ministers are responsible."

Or, as Mr. Todd says (pamphlet, p. 23.) "The prerogative of dismissing a Ministry, can only be constitutionally exercised on grounds of public policy, and for reasons which are capable of being defended and justified to the Assembly as well as to the Queen."

Or, as another author, whose name I do not now recollect, has said:—

"The act of the Sovereign must not bear the impress of his personal will, but, on the contrary, must show conclusively that his conduct is prompted by grand reasons of State policy."

And even then, according to the above cited authorities, and particularly Mr. Todd, whose words I quote:—

"The Sovereign, in the first instance, should endeavor, by suggestion or remonstrance, to induce his Ministers to modify or abandon a policy or proceeding which he was unable to approve."

And then only, in case his Ministers should not yield, could the Sovereign be competent to use the extreme remedy, and require the resignation of his Ministers, or dismiss them from office; or, what would seem to be the most constitutional course to pursue, if the variance of opinion between the Sovereign and his Ministry should originate on any ordinary question of legislation, the Sovereign should force his Ministers to advise a dissolution of Parliament, and, in case of a refusal to accept such advice, then dismiss them, or force them to give way by using the prerogative of dissolving Parliament. Such a course, to my mind, was the only one open to the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, according to constitutional usages, in case it should be shown that His Honor had sufficient reasons to have recourse to such an extremity. It would also be in harmony with the following words, which Lord John Russell places in a dispatch to Governor Thompson as being the views of our Most Gracious Queen:

"She has no desire to maintain any system of policy among her North American subjects which opinion condemns."

Despatch to Gov. Thompson, 14th October 1839.

Having thus shown what are the conditions, constitutional usages have prescribed to the exercise of the right of the Sovereign to dismiss his Ministry, I come now to the real question for this House to decide, whether His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, in dismissing his Ministers, has done so according to well understood constitutional law, or whether his act was not a violation of the well established principles of that law. The first thing I have now to do is to take up the documents which His Excellency the Governor-General has been pleased to transmit to this House, such documents containing the whole circumstances of the Quebec coup d'état. But the hon. mover of the resolution under discussion having gone over the whole ground, and shown, better than I could afford to do the true state of the question, as well as the relative positions both of the Lieutenant-Governor and his late Ministers, I may fairly dispense with occupying the time of the House in going over the same ground, and refer hon. members to that part of the speech of the hon. mover and to the documents. For my part I must say, after having gone over all those papers with the greatest attention, I could not help coming to the conclusion that the letter of the late Premier DeBoucherville, to the Lieutenant-Governor was the most complete refutation of the reasons or motives given by His Honor. And the letter of the late Premier to His Excellency the Governor-General, I consider the most crushing answer to all the reasons set forth by the Lieutenant-Governor Letellier in his last memorandum that could be possibly given. I regret to state that a careful perusal of all those documents has left me under the conviction, that His Honor in this particular circumstance had been actuated by very different motives than those by him assigned, and that he has proceeded to that extremity of using the prerogative without having such good reasons of state policy to act upon as could justify him in doing so. Nay, more than that, to me it seems that this act of His Honor bears the impress of his personal will; and, I may add, of his determination to help in a party triumph. If such be the case, and I have no doubt but it is, and if my interpretation of constitutional law is sound, what other conclusion can I come to, except to the following: That the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, in dismissing His Ministry, in the circumstances referred to, did so, in violation of the well understood principles of the constitutional law of the Empire, to which we have to look for our guidance. In conclusion hon. gentlemen, I beg to second the motion now before the House.

Hon. Mr. Bellerose.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In rising to make a few observations on the proposition of the hon. gentleman from Kingston, I must say I do not concur in the opinion he expressed in his introductory remarks, that the bringing down of those papers and the placing of them on our table, involves the necessity of our expressing an opinion upon them, or taking any vote in this Senate as to the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. On the contrary, I think it is rather unfortunate that at this particular moment the Senate should discuss a question that is now before the only tribunal that can really express a proper opinion upon it. I shall not, of course, challenge the right of the Senate to discuss this proposition; on the contrary, I think that propositions of this kind are very fit subjects to be debated here, but it is unfortunate that the occasion is one which will prevent that just and fair expression of opinion which might attend the discussion of the subject at another time and under other circumstances. I for one cannot disguise the fact, that on the present occasion political feeling is running entirely too strong to give any weight or value to this discussion. It was obvious from the debate in another place, and will be apparent from the result in this House, we are simply speaking on the subject from a political stand-point. I think the circumstances attending the debate in another place, and the circumstances that will develop themselves here as this debate proceeds, justify me in coming to that conclusion, and, therefore, an expression of our opinion, however valuable it may be under ordinary circumstances, will lose much of the weight and importance that ought to attach to the duty that we have undertaken on the present occasion. The people to whom this subject has been referred, are thoroughly acquainted with the principles of constitutional government. It was in Lower Canada that action was first taken in consequence of misgovernment, that led to the introduction of what is now known as responsible government in this country. Hon. gentlemen will quite understand the circumstances to which I have alluded—the occurrences of 1836 to 1838—and the people of Lower Canada have shown a capacity for thoroughly understanding and appreciating the nice questions that arise in the relative positions occupied by the Lieutenant-Governor, the Legislature, and the people. Having made these observations, I may say, that I do not propose to follow the very carefully prepared speech of the hon. Senator from Kingston, delivered, as it was, with a great deal of equanimity and calmness, but I desire to call attention to one or two points that he, himself, omitted, in illustrating the application of the principle of the power of the Lieutenant-Governor to dismiss his Ministers. I assume, as a starting point, that that power exists. It is a principle of the British Constitution. Of course, it will be urged, and properly urged, that the interpretation of that power means within the spirit of the constitution as administered under responsible government. It is clear, however, that he himself must be the judge of whether his action is wise or otherwise, and it is for the people to say whether the action taken by the Lieutenant-Governor was in their interest or not. I quite concur in a good deal that has fallen from the hon. gentleman behind me (Mr. Bellerose) in quoting the extracts which he did as to the sentiments of Mr. Letellier de St. Just when a member of this Senate. They quite concur, in my judgment, with the course he has seen fit to adopt on the present occasion.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That course was instigated by a desire to allow the people to pass an opinion upon what he considered was the maladministration of his advisers, and here I desire to draw attention to an authority that the hon. Senator from Kingston has entirely overlooked—a gentleman who has watched this matter from its inception; a gentleman who was on the spot at the time, and was capable of judging (being an outsider taking no part in politics) whether the action of the Lieutenant-Governor was in the spirit of the constitution. That gentleman was in the early history of the constitution of this country a very active writer on a leading newspaper in the City of Montreal. He subsequently held the position of a member of a Government in this country, and was himself also First Minister of a Government at the very time the system of responsible government was being worked out and applied in Canada. He was subsequently selected by the British Government as a suitable person to fill the office of Lieutenant-Governor in one, and subsequently in another, of the colonies. The gentleman I allude to is Sir Francis Hincks. He has taken a very active interest in this controversy, and no doubt hon. Senators have read his observations from time to time as published in the press, indicating very clearly that he at least approves of the course adopted by Hon. Mr. Letellier. He laid down the principle that the correspondence, to go no further, justified him in coming to that conclusion. He took the very Bill referred to, "The Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway Act," and showed that it being a measure of a very unusual character, was one that should under the circumstances have been referred to the Lieutenant-Governor before its submission to the House. I quite concur with what the hon. gentleman from Kingston stated, so far as ordinary measures are concerned, that they are considered to have the assent of the Crown when they are introduced; but there are other measures to which the assent of the Crown should be obtained, and this Bill in question was one of that extraordinary character. The city of Montreal had undertaken to give a bonus of $1,000,000 to the railway on certain terms and conditions. A vote for that bonus was carried by the rate-payers on the condition that the road was to take a certain direction; and there were other conditions attached which are not necessary for me to comment upon at present. The Government of the day chose to ignore those conditions; they chose to insist that the city of Montreal should pay this $1,000,000, entirely ignoring the sacred obligations entered upon at the time the by-law was passed; under that condition of things they chose to say, "if the people of Montreal do not pay that bonus, we will carry a measure through Parliament by which we can enforce the collection of the money from them." I gather from the conversations between Mr. Letellier and Mr. DeBoucherville, that this measure was not submitted to the Lieutenant-Governor. Mr. Letellier says so distinctly himself, and it is not denied on the other side. It was supposed he would read the debates of the House, and inform himself as to the legislation that was being carried on, but there is the fact that this measure of an unusual character was being carried through without being submitted to him, or without his approval. He felt, as petitions were coming in one after the other against this sort of legislation, that he was the proper person to intervene between the Government of the day—supported as they were in the House by a large majority—and the people of the country, and he felt it was not treating him with that sense of respect that was due to his position as Lieutenant-Governor of the Province, to entirely ignore him in such an important matter. I assume, from the controversy that seems to have gone on, that the Government had been accustomed to act entirely without the concurrence of the Lieutenant-Governor who had preceded Mr. Letellier, as it was a matter of notoriety that Mr. Caron was in feeble health for years before his death, and it was highly probable that the Government of the day had, perhaps unconsciously, come to believe that it was not necessary to consult the Lieutenant-Governor, or obtain his sanction and support in their legislation, and trusted to obtain his formal assent whenever it was necessary to do so. The year before Mr. Caron died, it was a matter of notoriety. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Kingston, that there are other matters referred to in the document before the House that are not of sufficient importance to take into consideration here. The Lieutenant-Governor had been requested to make an appointment of a councillor, when, in fact, one had already been chosen by the people. That case was an illustration of the Executive intervening between Mr. DeBoucherville and the people, but it was a very much more important one which referred to the by-law of the City of Montreal, where he had also intervened between the people of Montreal and Mr. DeBoucherville's Government. That by-law and its effect ought to have been left entirely to the operations of the courts. The Premier in justifying his action in reference to it, quotes the case of the Municipal Loan Fund of Upper Canada. I do not think there is any parallel between the two cases. In the Municipal Loan Fund case the money was borrowed from the Government and devoted to railway, or other local purposes. He also refers to the action in the Province of Ontario, insisting on payment of the moneys due from municipalities, but they are in no sense parallel either; they are in no degree similar to the action taken by himself with reference to the Montreal by-law which was clearly the introduction of a system of Parliament legalizing a by-law against the will of the people, and over-riding entirely the conditions that had been made between the company and the corporation. A case somewhat similar to this one in Quebec, occurred quite recently in South Africa, in which Sir Bartle Frere thought proper to dismiss his Ministers because they declined to allow the local police to take part with the royal troops in fighting the insurgents in the interior of the country. Hon. gentlemen will say that was a case of considerably greater importance, as it was a matter in which Imperial interests were involved. I grant it was, but it illustrates that there are times when a Lieutenant-Governor might be quite justified in dismissing his Ministers. The main ground I take on the present occasion is that the time is inopportune; that before three weeks pass the people of Quebec will have pronounced on this whole question, and will have decided whether the action of the late Government was constitutional or otherwise. The mere circumstances involved in the discussion which do not fairly disclose the position of that Government towards the people of Lower Canada, the utterances of members of Parliament and of the press of the day, show that the Government had been carried on lately entirely above and irrespective of what might be understood to be the opinion of the people. They had run very recklessly into debt; they had been obliged to borrow money at a very high rate of interest, and had been endeavoring to carry on the Government by subsidizing railways in several sections of the Province. In the conversations that took place between the Lieutenant-Governor and Mr. DeBoucherville, the latter had acknowledged that was one of the reasons why he was compelled to introduce this railway legislation; that he could not keep his party together unless he subsidized those railways through the Eastern Townships and on the North Shore; and the parties who were interested in this railway had practically controlled the legislature. He had made use of the word "rings" in the course of the conversations on this subject, and he had clearly intimated that the House demanded this legislation, and it was a necessity of his Government that it should be granted, although it was known that the finances of the Province did not in any degree warrant those large bonuses being voted to the several railways. These are the questions I have no doubt, that will be discussed, between now and the first day of May, when the people will have to decide whether the action of the Lieutenant-Governor was constitutional or otherwise. I think it unfortunate that this House should at the present moment be occupied in discussing this question, when the whole effect will be to influence the parties outside. We are simply on the one side, or on the other, furnishing arguments to be used over again in the contest outside. The House of Commons that is certainly more allied to the people, elected as they are by the people, and who will shortly go to the people again for re-election, will probably by a very large majority to-night have sustained the action of the Lieutenant-Governor, while this House, having no responsibility to the people other than what they may create themselves, a body not amenable to public opinion, who hold their seats entirely irrespective of governments or the popular voice, will express an opinion the other way. Our action will be in marked contrast with that of the people's representatives who are shortly to appear before the electors to answer for the opinions they have expressed on this constitutional question. But it cannot be concealed that the anxiety to obtain a majority vote in support of the hon. gentleman's proposition, is to gain political support for the friends of the hon. gentleman in the Province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I deny it absolutely.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no doubt the hon. gentleman labors under that belief, and would lead others to believe that he has risen to a higher plane, above and beyond party politics, but I do think his good intentions have been foiled on the present occasion, and if he had wished this to be the result, he would have selected another time when we could have discussed this question free from party bias.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I hope we will not be kept here until after the first of May to give us an opportunity of discussing it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said the vote to-night would prove what I had alleged, that it will be purely and simply a party vote, and that therefore it would not be worth his while to lay down any precedent or expression of opinion which, if it is followed, will be simply that of gentlemen who speak from a party stand point. Hon. Senators may think that observation of mine is an extreme one.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite prepared to hear that view, but in confirmation of what I stated at the outset, that the result would mark that I was correct in the premises I laid down, that this question would be discussed entirely from a party stand point, when the history of this transaction comes to be read in the future, when the House of Commons having taken one view of it, the people of the Province of Quebec having taken the same view of it by sustaining the new Premier and his colleagues, it will place the dictum of the Senate of Canada in anything but an enviable position.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it is unfair to the hon. gentleman who has assumed the functions of Premier to weight him down by the action of this House on this question. He has assumed the responsibility of the action of the Lieutenant-Governor; he has done so boldly and manfully, and I think it unfair, considering the great odds that are working against him to-day in the Province of Quebec, that he should be weighted down by an adverse judgement of this Senate.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Premier of the Quebec Ministry is known to be a man of high spirit, a man who certainly ranks high for his sense of honor and political feeling. It is very well known that had that gentleman chosen, he could have been in positions of trust, and, no doubt, could have been elevated to the position of a Cabinet Minister before now, but he declined for reasons for which all men must give him credit, and the independence of his character no man can call in question. He is surrounded by gentlemen who are highly thought of in the Province of Quebec, gentlemen against whose characters nothing can be urged. They appear to-day before the tribunal of the people, and I think it is very unjust to that new Government that a judgment of this House should be passed which will to some extent prejudice their position before the electors.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Mr. MILLER resumed the debate. He said: It is not my intention to detain the House at any length in the discussion of the question now under consideration. When those papers were submitted to the House under a message from His Excellency the Governor-General, some days ago, I had resolved, should a discussion before this branch of the Legislature grow out of them, to address the House at some length on the constitutional questions involved in the recent Ministerial changes in Quebec, and with that view I carefully looked into a number of authorities on which I intended to support my argument, touching the unconstitutional conduct of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier. Since then this question has been so fully discussed, not only in the press of the country, but in the other branch of the Legislature, and it has been so ably stated and illustrated by the hon. leader of the Opposition in this House, that I would hardly venture to trespass further in citing authorities in support of the views entertained on this side of the House on the constitutional points involved, after they have been so clearly elucidated by others, and supported by a multiplicity of authorities in both branches of the Legislature. I feel that the true constitutional doctrine has been so thoroughly established in this way that there does not appear to me to be the slightest necessity for encumbering the "Debates" with any additional quotations with regard to it. Having come to this conclusion, after the able address of my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell), I put aside the authorities, which I would otherwise read to the House, and now rise simply with the view of offering a few remarks on the general features of the case. In doing so, I think I will be consulting the general desire of hon. gentlemen, that as little time should be occupied in the discussion at this late period of the Session, as is consistent with the duty we owe to our position. I cannot avoid expressing my disappointment and surprise in listening to the extraordinary speech which was made just before the House rose for recess by the hon. Secretary of State. I was astonished at the different and contradictory positions assumed by my hon. friend during the course of his very illogical address. I was not so much astonished at the feeble and incoherent character of his observations, as I knew very well that the hon. gentleman's heart was not in his speech—that gentleman occupies a position, not of his own seeking, nor of his own making, but a most uncomfortable situation where he was called upon to defend an old friend and colleague in conduct which he knew to be entirely indefensible. I feel inclined, and I have no doubt the same feeling of commiseration animates others, to make excuses for a gentleman occupying, like my hon. friend, a leading position in a Liberal Government—a Government belonging to a party, who, in this country, have been the champions and advocates in times past of responsible government—a position which he himself felt to be subversive of true Liberal principles and the traditions of the old Liberal party of the Dominion. I knew if he was not placed in such an embarrassing predicament he would not have made such a feeble defence of the action of his old colleague the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec; for we all know that the hon. gentleman possesses the ability and constitutional knowledge to enable him to do justice to his party in the discussion of such a question as this if his case were a good one, or if it were susceptible of defence. But the hon. gentleman found himself compelled, as a member of a Cabinet very frequently does, to palliate mistakes for which he is not personally responsible, and which he sincerely condemns. He felt it his duty to defend his old friend, Mr. Letellier, in the unfortunate position in which he had placed himself, while it was also his duty to his own record and to the principles of constitutional government which we enjoy in this country not to commit himself by any strong, studied or extravagant defence of his late colleague. I listened, therefore, with a great deal of commiseration to the opening and closing remarks of my hon. friend, because of their necessarily contradictory character. He could not defend Mr. Letellier consistently with the principles he could abandon. My hon. friend commenced by giving a qualified assent to the resolution before the House, but ended by deprecating the course being pursued by the hon. leader of the Opposition. No better proof of the feeling of weakness—of conscious error under which the hon. gentleman clearly labored during the course of that short speech—was required than that my hon. friend could not deliver the few observations that fell from him without falling into the most absurd contradictions between the beginning and end of his remarks. He said at the outset that we had a perfect right to discuss this question in this branch of the Legislature, but he concluded by asserting that we ought not to do so, because we were not elected by the people, but [selected by the Crown; we could not be in sympathy with the people, and were not the best judges of popular rights; that because we were not directly responsible to the people it was unbecoming of us to discuss a constitutional question of this kind here. I contend that the judgment of an independent legislative body, nominated by the Crown, against a tyrannical exercise of the prerogatives of the Crown, should be considered a higher and more disinterested verdict in favor of popular liberty than the judgment of any body whose existence is dependent on the suffrages of the people. I would be astonished, under different circumstances, to hear my hon. friend, whose knowledge of constitutional usage is so extensive, utter such sentiments as he has expressed to-day in consequence of the unfortunate dilemma in which he finds himself placed, if he were free to give an unbiassed opinion. In my humble judgment, if there is a tribunal in this country before whom the discussion of such a question as is involved in the papers before the House is eminently proper, it is the Senate of Canada.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If there is a body in this country whose especial and proper duty it is to deal with questions of this kind, it is this branch of Parliament, and it is our duty, for obvious reasons, to record our condemnation of all violations of the Constitution. I know that we have been spoken of by violent partisans, whose unwise schemes we have often checked with the approval of the country, as a body without any responsibility, but those who have had occasion to feel and appreciate the correctness and weight of our decisions—our judicial decisions—on other matters, know full well that at the present moment the people of Canada look upon the Senate as a body eminently qualified to discuss this and every other question affecting the welfare of the country, and arrive at a wise and impartial conclusion.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—This is not a party question, and should be elevated far above the atmosphere of faction. It should be debated without party rancour, and without regard to personal predilection or antipathies. If we undertook to deal with it from purely factious motives; if with a desire merely to serve party purposes we brought this question here, there might be a serious charge of factiousness brought against this House. But when we are invited to this discussion not by any action of our own, not by our own mere wish and motion, but after the papers have been solemnly laid before us by the representative of our Sovereign, I say we should be derelict in our duty if we did not take some notice of them. If, under such circumstances, we failed to express our opinion upon such a grave constitutional question as has lately arisen in Quebec, our silence or indifference would be looked upon as condoning the unfortunate action of the Lieutenant-Governor, or might even be cited as approving it.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am sorry to find that amongst hon. gentlemen opposite there is a too evident desire on all occasions to limit the rights and privileges of this House.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There is hardly a question of any importance brought before this body, if discussed contrary to the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, in regard to which they do not raise a point as to the right or authority of our Senate to deal with it. Instances of this kind are so numerous that I need hardly waste the time of the House in enumerating them, but time and again the attempt has been made to limit the power of this House in its legislative capacity. We owe it to ourselves to rebuke every such attempt, and to mark with reprobation such endeavors as are inconsistent with the constitution and restrictive of the power of the Senate as an independent branch of the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The other day when we had the motion of my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Macpherson) before this House, an hon. Senator opposite rose in his seat and said the Senate of Canada was not the place to discuss questions affecting the finances of the country; that we had no Public Accounts Committee, and had no right to discuss questions affecting the public expenditure, or the taxation of the country. Although we have no right to initiate legislation involving money votes, still no man who understands the scope of our authority and our constitutional privileges, will deny us the right on every one of those questions to express an independent opinion. Then, on a previous occasion, with regard to an important question intimately relating to this House, when an attempt was made by the present Government to increase their support in this body by using the power intended by the British North America Act to be exercised under very different circumstances, and sending several partisans into this Chamber pledged to support the views of the Government, a matter on which no other body was so competent to express an opinion as ourselves, we had the extraordinary doctrine enunciated that this Senate should not undertake to pass judgment upon the conduct of the Government who had made that extraordinary application to the Crown.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is time we should hear the last of these attempts to restrict the privileges of this House; it is time that hon. gentlemen opposite should learn that they do not elevate themselves, or improve their position before the country by endeavoring to deny us our undoubted constitutional rights. With regard to the question before the House, there are many grounds upon which we are more specially qualified to judge of it than any other body. By the constitution of this House the smaller provinces are so represented as to form a constitutional check on the larger provinces by having much larger numerical representation, according to their respective populations. For instance the large and powerful Province of Ontario, which is represented in the other House, on the basis of population, by eighty-eight has only twenty-four representatives in this Chamber—the same number as the Maritime Provinces who are represented in the House of Commons by forty members. The object of this arrangement was to secure the rights of the smaller provinces, and to guard those rights whenever they are threatened with injury by unconstitutional or tyrannical acts in any quarter.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is therefore the duty of this House when a question which affects the conditions of the federal compact as regards any particular province comes up, and which may at any moment affect any other province—it is for the representatives of the different Provinces in this House to see that no constitutional precedent is established in any one of the Provinces of the Union which at any moment may be quoted and urged against themselves.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We have been told to-day that this question had been relegated to the electors; that the people of Quebec had been called upon to decide on the constitutionality of the action of the Lieutenant-Governor, and that it was indecent and improper that Parliament should interfere at this moment. I admit that, so far as the Province of Quebec is concerned, it has its own fate in its own hands, but we must not forget that if, through side issues being placed before the people, or if through party tactics or local jealousies, or from any other improper cause, the Province of Quebec should condone the despotic action of the Lieutenant-Governor, and should sustain the Ministry of Mr. Joly, unless we from the different Provinces protest against the result being established as a precedent against ourselves—we care not whether Quebec endorses that action or not—we want to insure ourselves against the application of such a precedent to the rest of the Dominion, should Quebec prove so unwise, and its electors so untrue to themselves as to ratify the greatest constitutional outrage, the most dangerous violation of the rights of Parliament, that the country has witnessed since responsible government was conceded to these Provinces.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We will suppose that to-morrow a constitutional question, similar to that of the Province of Quebec, arises in any one of the Provinces of the Confederation, and it is approved not on its constitutional merits, but on local or sectional issues, are we to be told in that case the precedent established would not be dangerous to the rest of the Dominion? Any act or result affecting our constitutional system is an object of interest to the whole of the Provinces of the Dominion. If we desire not to be bound by bad precedents in Quebec or elsewhere, in the other Provinces we should place our opinions on record now against any such arbitrary or high-handed proceedings.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If we allow Mr. Letellier to trample on the Constitution as Governor of Quebec without challenge and without animadversion, we may find that the precedent may be imitated in some of the other Provinces, and have an important influence on our constitutional usages, and on the rights and privileges of the people of this country, and in the end may be seriously detrimental to them. There cannot be a question, that since the Confederation of these Provinces, no subject of similar importance, from a constitutional point of view, has demanded the consideration of the people of Canada as that we are now called upon to discuss, and I feel, myself, in approaching it, all the trammels which one must feel who is called upon to deal with the action of a gentleman like the present Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec with whom I have for many years sat on friendly terms in this House. During eight or nine years of my public life I had the honor and the pleasure of enjoying the personal intimacy of that hon. gentleman in the Senate, and on no occasion have we had any unpleasant personal differences. I therefore wish, in the discharge of my duty, I could see my way clear to sustain his recent action as Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec and not be called upon to condemn it, and place my protest on record against the proceedings which have taken place in that Province under Mr. Letellier's auspices. But in the discharge of our duty we must not allow private considerations to interfere, and while I still entertain for the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec the greatest personal consideration, I feel that it should not prevent me from discharging the duty which I owe to the country. Before saying anything on the general principles involved in this discussion, I would remark to hon. gentlemen who represent the majority in the Province of Quebec, that if there is a province in this Dominion where it behoves the electors to look well to the constitutional principles under which we are governed, it is the Province of Quebec, and if there is one particular in which they should jealously guard and defend their rights more than any other it is in such an instance as the present. We all know that Quebec occupies a peculiar position in this Confederation, and we are all aware if we possess to-day the Federal system of Government it is due to that Province. We all know that in Quebec there exists a state of things that is not to be found in any other Province of Canada. We know that fine Province is inhabited by a people differing in many ways from the other inhabitants of the Confederation; with different languages, a different creed, different laws and different customs from those of the great majority of the people. We know that it was with the view to protecting their laws, their language and their institutions to which they are proudly attached, and for which their forefathers had fought and bled, that they entered the Union under the Federal system; and if there is any Province in this Dominion interested in retaining and vindicating the constitutional privileges which we enjoy under that system of Government it is the Province of Quebec. The people of Quebec fancy, and fancy rightly, that they possess a perfect protection under the Federal compact, for everything they hold dear and sacred, a protection which no force, no violence, or no authority can sweep away while the constitution is respected. While they possess a Local Legislature of their own, with independent functions, directly responsible to the people, and which are guaranteed to them under the Constitution, the people of Quebec, like the people of every other Province of the Dominion, will be perfectly safe in the possession of the privileges which the Constitution guarantees to them. But if it is to be established as a precedent that a Government, sitting at Ottawa, composed of a majority representing the other nationalities of the Dominion, and hostile to the national sentiment and institutions of Quebec—and it is quite possible that such a state of things at some time should exist—the consequence may be that a Central Government, which would be unfriendly to the language, creed, laws, and the institutions, to which the people of Quebec still fondly adhere, could send an arbitrary and tyrannical Lieutenant-Governor to administer the affairs of that Province, who might, by one sweep of his pen—by one tyrannical abuse of his powers—subvert their laws, trample on their rights, and set aside the will of the people, as represented by both branches of the Legislature.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—What do we find now? Here is a Government which, in the popular branch, was condemned by a vote of two to one; a Government also in even a smaller minority in the upper branch of the Legislature, foisted on the country, and placed in control of the public patronage even after the people of Quebec had condemned them by the voice of their representatives in both branches of the Legislature.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—What has occurred the other day may occur again at any time, or in any other Province of the Dominion. It would only require the exercise of the authority of the Central Government to send into a Province an arbitrary Lieutenant-Governor, charged to carry out the will of the Federal authority, in order to sweep away for a time, and perhaps seriously cripple forever, the rights and privileges of a Local Legislature, whilst carrying out the designs of the Central Government.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—This is no imaginary picture. It is the state of things that now exists in the Province of Quebec. The Province of Quebec is not likely to vote confidence at the coming elections in the present Ministry, and if it were not that the necessities of the public service will compel the Lieutenant-Governor to call the new Parliament together before the first of July, that Ministry might retain their offices without the confidence of the people, until the next annual meeting of the Legislature. During all this time the Province would be governed by a Ministry who have not, and never had the confidence of the electors; a Ministry whom the people's delegates had declared to be devoid of their confidence in the slightest degree, but who were placed in power, and might be kept there a whole year by the mere will of one man.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It has been said that the time will shortly come when the people will have an opportunity of expressing their opinion at the polls, and although their constitutional rights may be in abeyance for a short period, and they may be governed by an usurped authority, the people will have an opportunity to deal with the Government at the polls. But I say, even admitting that to be the case, it is well-known that a very short time is sufficient to enable a tyrannical Lieutenant-Governor and an unscrupulous Ministry, acting under the influence of the Central Authority, to interfere with and destroy the rights and privileges of the people. No matter how short the time may be, an incurable mischief may be done. Therefore, it is necessary that on this first occasion that has occurred since Confederation, the Parliament of this country should use no uncertain tone in expressing its condemnation of the unfortunate action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We know that at the time the crisis took place in the Province of Quebec, the Legislature there had nearly performed the functions for which they had been called together. The business of the country had been nearly got through with, and nothing, almost, remained but the last reading of the Supply Bill. Some go so far as to say that it was intended before the last blow was given that decapitated the Ministry, that the public business was to have been completed with the exception of the sanctioning of the legislation of the Session by the Lieutenant-Governor, and then that the whole policy of the Lieutenant-Governor would be to establish the new Government so as to be able to control the patronage of the Province for the ensuing year, and act in consort with the Dominion Government in an attempt to influence the general elections.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It cannot be denied, that if this scheme had been successful, and that even for the short time an illegal Government might be permitted to reign, they might, through the influence which they could bring to bear by the possession of office, in conjunction with the central Government, be able to exercise an overwhelming control over the general elections, and perhaps in that way retain in power a government which would otherwise have been condemned by the people. We all recollect something of the fight for responsible government in this country; of the misrule of those British North American Provinces under the old regime, that caused such a chronic state of dissatisfaction as threatened for a time their severance from the Crown. We all know that it was to avoid any such unfortunate occurrence, and to guarantee to each Province the free and absolute control of their own affairs by the people that we at last secured the great boon of responsible government, under which we are allowed to govern ourselves as we think best.

Before the establishment of the Confederation that system had been worked out satisfactorily; in case of any dispute, or of any improper exercise of authority by any of the Legislatures of the different Provinces, or by the representatives of the Crown, we had recourse to the fountain head of constitutional authority in England, and we all know how the two great political parties in the Imperial Parliament, by their respective representatives in the Colonial Office invariably held the scales justly, and maintained and vindicated the principles of responsible government amidst the heat and clash of contending factions.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If we were not now a confederated Dominion; if the old state of affairs existed in the Province of Quebec, or in any other Province of the Dominion, and such a thing had occurred as we see to-day in Quebec, I ask this House, and the people of Canada, if it were brought before the Imperial Parliament and the Imperial Government, what would be the verdict of the people of England with regard to it? Can there be any doubt that it would have met with universal condemnation? We know there has not been an instance of the exercise of the power which has been, I might almost say, usurped by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec in the annals of British history for nearly half a century—not during my lifetime at least. In the last forty-four years there has not been a single instance in England of the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown in the manner in which the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec has claimed to exercise it, by dismissing a Ministry who had the confidence of a large majority in Parliament. The last instance we have on record of the dismissal of a Ministry by the Crown was in 1834, and that is a precedent which is pointed out, not to be imitated, but to be avoided.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We had one or two incidents of the kind in the reign of George III., but we do not to-day go to the life-time of George III. or William IV. to cite the tyrannical acts of those monarchs as constitutional precedents which we at the present time deem worthy of respect. So that the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec in dismissing his Ministry while they possessed the entire confidence of a large majority in both Houses, has dared to do what the direct representative of the Crown in this country, with British precedents before him, would never have dreamed of doing, and which Her Majesty herself would not at the present day venture to attempt. So little danger is there of any violent or unconstitutional exercise in Great Britain of the prerogative of the Crown, in our times, that the eminent authority who has been cited here by the hon. Leader of the Opposition says, if such a thing were attempted in England by the Queen, the people would be as much astonished as if a volcano had burst forth at Primrose Hill. And has it come to this that the rights and privileges which were guaranteed us under the Constitution, are to be swept away by a Lieutenant-Governor in any of the Provinces of this Dominion, by such an exercise of the prerogative of the Crown, that the Crown or her direct representative would not venture to resort to? When I hear hon. gentlemen cite as precedents in this debate what took place in Australia, in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and in South Africa, I am surprised that they should look for precedents on such a subject, to such comparatively young countries, where constitutional government and practice cannot be expected to be as well understood as it is in the Mother Country. A good deal has been said elsewhere with regard to the prerogative of the Crown as wielded by the Lieutenant-Governor, in contradistinction to the prerogative exercised by the Sovereign herself, or her direct representative. While I think an argument might fairly be maintained as to whether the Lieutenant-Governor of any one of our Provinces possesses the right to exercise the royal prerogative, to the same extent as the Queen or her direct representative, I do not think it is necessary, on the present occasion, to enter into a discussion on that subject. While I do not, however, admit that the prerogative power of the Lieutenant-Governor is at all to be measured by the prerogative of power of the Crown, I say, for purposes of discussion in this case, those who are defending the constitutional rights and privileges of the people of Quebec are under no necessity for entering into any fine-spun theory on that point. Admitting for the moment that the Lieutenant-Governor of a province has all the prerogative power of the Crown, it is not contended that there is any instance within the last 44 years in Great Britain, in which we have witnessed such an exercise of that power as we have seen in Quebec during the past few weeks. Is not that a strong argument against the arbitrary conduct of Mr. Letellier? The hon. Secretary of State, in addressing the House, quoted from the British North America Act, and said it was a strange fact that this prerogative of the Crown had been vested in the Lieutenant-Governors of Ontario and Quebec by the terms of that Act, which was not the case with the other Provinces of the Dominion; but the hon. gentleman overlooked the cause which is, on the face of it, very simple. We all know that at the date of Confederation, Ontario and Quebec formed the old Province of Canada, and it was necessary in separating them into distinct provinces, to provide for them separate Governments. It was to effect this purpose that the clause quoted by the hon. Secretary of State was inserted in the Union Act, and not with the view of giving to the Lieutenant-Governors of the new Provinces any rights or powers not possessed, or intended afterwards to be possessed by the Lieutenant-Governors of the other Provinces of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman showed how hard run he was to find an excuse for the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec when he resorted to so untenable a construction of the British North America Act. In regard to the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the same thing was not done, because we already possessed our separate legislatures, and there was no necessity to make any special provision for working out the principles of responsible government in relation to the Provincial Legislatures. If the argument of the hon. Secretary of State on this point meant anything, it meant that the Lieutenant-Governors of Ontario and Quebec possessed more absolute and unrestricted powers in regard to the exercise of the prerogatives of the Crown, than Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, in consequence of the special provision of the Union Act which he quoted, which would be a contention too absurd to be seriously argued, and which no one except himself has ever ventured to assert. In the discussions that have taken place on this subject in Parliament and in the press, no one has denied, and no one among the friends of responsible government has thought of denying, that the Crown possesses the abstract constitutional right, in certain cases defined by usage, to dismiss its Ministers. The circumstances, however, that would justify this extreme exercise of the prerogative, can rarely occur at the present day, and have not occurred in England for nearly half a century, and within no similar period of Imperial history have constitutional principles been more correctly developed and understood. If we desire to obtain a sound knowledge of those principles, we must look for it, not to times when the influence of any particular branch of Parliament was predominant, but to that period of our history that has seen the fairest illustration of constitutional principles. We all know that the power of the Crown in the present day is not what it was in the reign of George III., although the change is marked by no law on our Statute Book—but it is marked by an equally binding authority. Usage has given a well defined meaning to many of the prerogative of the Crown, which is as obligatory as the written law. The exercise of the royal prerogative must be governed by the spirit, and usage of the constitution. The Sovereign has the power to do some things, the actual doing of which would be not only unconstitutional, but might cost him his crown. The King of England who would undertake to govern his subjects by the strict letter of the law and the constitution, without regard to their spirit and usage, would not long occupy the throne. If, at this day in England, a Sovereign even as beloved by her subjects as our Gracious Queen, were to claim the arbitrary right to exercise the royal prerogative in the dismissal of her Ministers under such circumstances as Mr. Letellier has done in the Province of Quebec, or should put forward the pretensions of that gentleman in another respect, and claim the right to control and inspire the whole legislation of Parliament, how would such unconstitutional pretensions be met by the people in that country? Would such a thing be possible in England at the present time? There can be but one answer to such a question. Would the Queen dismiss a Ministry with a large majority at its back in the House of Commons? The constitutional usage which secures to a Government the confidence of the Sovereign, which has the confidence of the peoples' representatives, is too well understood and respected. If the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec had believed that his Ministers—I do not intend to examine at any length his reasons for dismissing the Ministry—did not possess the confidence of the people of Quebec, his clear course was to tell them so, and let them go to the electors in order to test that question. He had a right to claim that discretion as within his prerogative, and if they declined to coincide in that decision then they should have resigned. That would have been an extreme step considering their majority in Parliament, but I am afraid he did not desire or intend to give them that fair and manly consideration to which they were entitled. When I revert to the papers which have been placed on the table of this House; when I look at the case made by the Lieutenant-Governor, and the answer given to that case by the late Premier of the Province of Quebec, I am struck with its extraordinary character. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, went over many of the grounds upon which the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec attempted to build up a case which would justify him in his treatment of his Ministers, and exposed their absurdity and want of candour. I am sure hon. gentlemen who listened to him must have been satisfied that not one of them was a sound constitutional reason for the arbitrary action of His Honor. I shall not say that the Lieutenant-Governor purposely set a snare to catch his Ministers; but I do allege that the reasons he gave for his course, and his manner of giving them, go far to show his intention from the first hour he became Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec was to undermine his Conservative Cabinet and place the government of the country in the hands of their opponents. If it were otherwise we would have had something stronger and more convincing than the flimsy argument which that hon. gentleman has presented as his explanatory case. The hon. leader of the Opposition spoke of some of the cases on which the Lieutenant-Governor justified his withdrawal of confidence from his Ministers, but I am sure not one of those cases furnishes any justification in the eyes of gentlemen who are disposed to view the question dispassionately. I shall not refer to instances cited by my hon. friend, but there are two or three cases in the argument of the Lieutenant-Governor to which he did not refer, and which I may now mention. One is, that the Ministry had actually called Parliament together without the consent of the Lieutenant-Governor; another, that they had put his name to a proclamation ordering a day of thanksgiving without his knowledge or consent. Those two cases, as related by Mr. Letellier, would appear to be very serious, and I was surprised they should have escaped the notice of my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) in his able address this afternoon. But what are the facts in regard to them? It turns out the Ministers did not call Parliament together without the sanction of the Lieutenant-Governor. A proclamation, it seems, for which His Honor had signed an Order-in-Council, did appear in the Gazette, although the proclamation itself may not have been regularly signed, but it was the usual formal notice proroguing Parliament from time to time. When the proclamation calling Parliament together was published, it was signed by the Lieutenant-Governor. We have that fact vouched for by the late Premier of Quebec and placed on our table in an official paper. If that be true, the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec is placed in a most lamentable position. If it was his intention to make the country believe that the Ministry had taken the liberty with his name of calling Parliament together without his knowledge, I ask the House if it is not fair to look with a good deal of suspicion upon the candour of the whole statement when such disingenuousness characterizes a portion of it. I am sorry to say the other case is equally disingenuous and unfortunate for the Lieutenant-Governor. In regard to the proclamation for a general thanksgiving, we also have it in the clear and emphatic language of the late Prime Minister of Quebec, that it was issued under the following circumstances: A day of general thanksgiving was being arranged for by the various Provinces of the Dominion, and the Premier of Canada, the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, in a despatch to Mr. Letellier, called upon the Government of the Province to join in that laudable purpose. The subject was submitted to the Council with the strong recommendation of His Honor, and an order was passed, signed by the Lieutenant-Governor himself. The despatch from the Federal Government to the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec had previously been placed in the hands of Mr. DeBoucherville by Mr. Letellier, with a request that he would carry out its object; and still, although the proclamation was issued in conformity with such request, and the views he himself had urged, His Honor placed that action in his explanatory case as one of the reasons for dismissing the Ministry, that they had invaded the prerogative of the Crown by issuing that proclamation without his knowledge or authority. It is unfortunate, with these things on record, to be driven to entertain the opinion, which it is inevitable we must entertain, as to the want of ingenuousness of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, from these delusive representations of the facts. I do not intend to take up the papers and go through the whole case, which presents other features of an extraordinary nature, which have already been commented on by the leader of the Opposition. It is evident to everyone who reads those papers, that the Lieutenant-Governor assumed the government of his Province, not for the purpose of carrying out the wishes of the people, as expressed by the two branches of the Legislature, but determined to force his opinions upon his constitutional advisers—that he should rule and they should be mere registers of his policy and decisions. It is palpable, from the whole of the papers laid before this House, and the discussions here and elsewhere on the question, that the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor from beginning to end was hostile, and not in good faith to his Ministers; that it was his intention from the outset to carry out his own policy, and not to help them to carry out the policy for which they were responsible to the people, and which they believed was best for the country. I do not go so far as to say that he was acting in collusion with the Central Government in this course. But it is an extraordinary fact that this procedure should be entered upon just on the eve of a general election, and it is an extraordinary thing that this high-handed act, with a view to securing control of the Government of

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Quebec, should have been attempted at a time when, if successful, it would contribute materially to the success of the Dominion Government in the coming elections. It is unfortunate, because it will compel people to draw the conclusion that it was done with some such object, and it is a lamentable episode in the history of this country that we have to contemplate the action of so high an officer in that unfavorable light. I feel that, if it were wise to go thoroughly into particulars, I might detain the House at greater length in severe criticisms of the many peculiar features of this explanatory case. I believe, however, it is the desire of other gentlemen to address the House on this subject, and take a division upon it to-night; but I would feel recreant to my duty if, with the papers submitted to this Parliament, and the dangerous precedent that would be established by the unconstitutional conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, if this House did not, by an expression of its opinions, and by recording its solemn vote on this question, do what they could to vindicate the rights and privileges of the people, and guard those constitutional principles of government under which it is our happiness to live, and on which their liberties rest.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—It is with much reluctance that I rise to address the House on this occasion, partly because my personal experience of Canadian politics is limited to a few years, also because an amendment to the resolution moved by the hon. gentleman from Kingston has been placed in my hands, which I feel might more properly have been committed to some hon. gentleman who could speak of the leading events in Canadian history from his own personal recollections; and that I cannot pretend to do. But, though my experience of Canadian history is thus limited, I am not altogether devoid of experience in the Province with which I am connected, having there served under three Lieutenant-Governors appointed by the Crown, in the capacity of Executive Councillor or leader of a Government. Thus, though my experience is not of that extended character possessed by some hon. gentlemen here, yet I am not altogether without it. There is one circumstance on which, I think, I may congratulate the House, and that is the exceedingly moderate tone in which the hon. gentlemen opposite have addressed the House on this question. Both the hon. Senator from Kingston and the hon. Senator from Richmond, apparently feel very strongly on this question, and both of them treated it in remarkably moderate terms. This, I think, is a pleasing feature of the case, and it leads me to hope that even yet, the hon. gentleman, and those who co-operate with him, may think fit, in their discussion, to abstain from testing the opinion of this House upon so important a question as that which is now pending in the adjoining Province, and upon which the people of that Province are about to exercise their constitutional privilege. It would be far better, in my opinion, that this House should abstain from expressing an opinion on the course pursued by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, and therefore, I will only move the amendment which I have before me, in case hon. gentlemen opposite persist in taking a vote upon their resolution. I think that the question before us is one of most extraordinary interest. I, myself, coincide with the views I have read, as expressed by a gentleman who was at one time a colleague of the hon. Senator from Kingston, and subsequently Governor of a Province—a man whose memory is even now regarded in the Lower Provinces with reverence, and whose abilities are held in high estimation—the Hon. Joseph Howe.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—That gentleman, I remember, on one occasion expressed the opinion, which I repeat tonight, that the British Constitution was one of recent development; that, in fact, it dated from the period of the Reform Bill of 1832. What perhaps induced Mr. Howe to come to that conclusion may have been the extraordinary character of the House of Commons up to the time of the passage of the first Reform Bill. I could scarcely credit, when in the course of obtaining information on this question, which we are now debating, I came across this passage in May's Constitutional History, describing the composition of the British House of Commons at various periods during the one hundred years preceding the Reform Bill. Speaking of the large majority of that body, who, at that period, were nominated directly or indirectly, yet returned by the people, and the comparatively small number of electors who actually did return the men of their choice, he says:—

Hon. Mr. Haythorne.

“According to a statement made by the Duke of Richmond, in 1780, not more than 6,000 men returned a clear majority of the House of Commons. It was alleged in the petition of the friends of the people, presented by Earl Grey, in 1793, that 84 individuals absolutely returned 157 members to Parliament, and that, in this manner, 357 members—being the majority of the House before the union with Ireland—were returned to Parliament by 154 patrons, of whom 40 were Peers. In 1821, Mr. Lambton stated that he was prepared to prove at the bar of the House of Commons that 180 individuals returned, by nomination or otherwise, 350 members.”

I think, probably, the knowledge of facts such as these assisted the hon. Mr. Howe to come to the conclusion to which I have alluded, that actual responsible parliamentary government dated in England from a period subsequent to the Reform Bill. But, although such may be the case, it does not follow from it that the experience of our forefathers is to go for nothing. I conceive the study of history commencing with the reign of George the Third, and down to the present time, affords many apt illustrations of the position in which we find the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, his Ministry and Parliament to-day, and, with the leave of the House, I shall take the opportunity of quoting some passages in support of this argument. I find, for example, in May's work upon Constitutional Government, no less than three distinct occasions during the reign of George the Third, within a period of twenty years, in which he reiterates in the same strong, forcible language, a doctrine which bears on the recent position of affairs in the Province of Quebec. First, in a general review of the political affairs at the commencement of the reign of George the Third, he speaks as follows:—

mitted to his approval; and when that approval is withheld, his Ministers must either abandon their policy or resign their offices. They are responsible to the King, on the one hand, and to Parliament on the other; and while they retain the confidence of the King, by administering affairs to his satisfaction, they must act upon principles and propose measures which they can justify to Parliament. As he governs by responsible Ministers, he must recognize their responsibilities. They are not his Ministers only, but also the public servants of a free country."

I think in those few lines you find several of the principles which have been debated so warmly in this House laid down at a period when constitutional history was still in its infancy, when our ancestors were struggling to obtain parliamentary, or as we term it, responsible government. I find pretty nearly the same words used again on an occasion of a very different kind—when it was the object of Parliament to prevent a dissolution. Referring to that occasion on the 19th December, 1783, the following are the words used by Sir Erskine May;—

"Secure of their present majority, the first object of the Opposition was to prevent a dissolution, which they believed to be impending. They could withhold the supplies, and press the King with representations against his Ministers. His Majesty had the unquestioned prerogatives of appointing his own constitutional advisers, and dissolving Parliament. The last appeal of both was to the people; and this appeal the Commons sought to deny the King. The day after the dismissal of the late Ministers, the Opposition insisted on the postponement of the third reading of the Land Tax Bill for two days, in order, as Mr. Fox said, that it might not go out of their hands until they should have taken such measures as would guard against the evils that might be expected from a dissolution."

Once more, at a later period, when Mr. Pitt's Government came into power, we find Sir Erskine May using pretty nearly the identical terms that I have quoted. Now, all this experience gained by our forefathers, and struggled for with such intense earnestness and ability, was not altogether wasted. The result became apparent at a far more recent period, in a struggle of less magnitude than those which occurred in the reign of George the Third. We find, in the reign of William the Fourth, a Parliamentary crisis occurring at the time Lord Melbourne was Premier. Lord Althorp had been Chancellor of the Exchequer, and leader of the House of Commons. The death of his father, Earl Spencer, caused his elevation to the Upper House, and the King took that opportunity to dismiss his Ministers. I come now to a period within the recollection of, I dare say, many hon. gentlemen sitting in this House. I, myself, have a distinct recollection of the events to which I am now about to refer. May describes very concisely what occurred, in these words:—

Hon. Mr. Haythorne.

"In October, 1834, the death of Earl Spencer having removed his son, Lord Althorp, from the Leadership of the House of Commons, and from his office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, the King seized this opportunity for suddenly dismissing his Ministers; and proceeded to consult the Duke of Wellington upon the formation of a Government from the opposite party. Lord Althorp's elevation to the House of Lords rendered necessary a partial reconstruction of the Ministry; but, assuredly, that circumstance alone would not have suggested the propriety of taking counsel with those who constituted but a small minority of the House of Commons. Lord Melbourne (the Premier) proposed to supply the place of Lord Althorp by Lord John Russell—a far abler man—but the King was determined that the Ministry should be dissolved. All the accustomed grounds for dismissing a Ministry were wanting. There was no immediate difference of opinion between them and the King upon any measure or question of public policy; there was no disunion among themselves, nor were there any indications that they had lost the confidence of Parliament. But the accidental removal of a single Minister—not necessarily from the Government, but only from one House of Parliament to the other—was made the occasion for dismissing the entire Administration. It is true that the King viewed with apprehension the policy of his Ministers in regard to the Irish Church, but his assent was not then required to any specific measure of which he disapproved, nor was this the ground assigned for his dismissal. The right of the King to dismiss his Ministers was unquestionable, but constitutional usage has prescribed certain conditions under which this right should be exercised."

A little later on we find responsible government practised in a manner more consonant with our ideas, more as it exists in the colonies at the present day. We find it in the case of Lord Palmerston, which appears to me more opposite than any which have been cited. Reference has been made by the hon. Senator from Kingston to the dismissal of Lord Palmerston, but at the same time he appeared to have missed a very important point—it seems to me the most important of the whole. The dismissal is of comparatively small importance compared with the prin-ple established in constitutional government. That was laid down in the memorandum addressed by Lord John Russell, at the Queen's command, to Lord Palmerston. It is as follows in May's pages:—

"In 1851 an incident occurred which illustrates the relation of Ministers to the Crown, the discretion vested in them, and the circumstances under which the pleasure of the Sovereign is to be signified concerning acts of the Executive Government. To all important acts by which the Crown becomes committed, it has been generally acknowledged that the sanction of the Crown must be previously signified. And in 1850 Her Majesty communicated to Lord Palmerston—the Secretary of State for Foreign affairs—through Lord John Russell her first Minister—a memorandum giving specific directions as to the transaction of business between the Crown and the Secretary of State. It was in these words. 'The Queen requires, first that Lord Palmerston will distinctly state what he proposes to do in a given case, in order that the Queen may know as distinctly to what She is giving her Royal sanction. Secondly, having once given her sanction to a measure, that it be not arbitrarily altered or modified by the Minister. Such an act She must consider as failing in sincerity towards the Crown, and justly to be visited by the exercise of her constitutional rights of dismissing that Minister. She expects to be kept informed of what passes between him and the foreign Ministers before important decisions are taken, based upon that intercourse, to receive the foreign despatches in good time, and to have the drafts for her approval, sent to her in sufficient time to make herself acquainted with their contents before they must be sent off.'

There is the same principle which has entered into the difference between the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec and his Ministers. Hon. gentlemen will see this quotation seems to afford a sufficient apology, if indeed an apology were necessary, for the conduct of Governor Letellier in dismissing his Ministry.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, Hear.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—Some importance has been attached by some of the hon. gentlemen who preceded me in this debate, to the question of submitting bills to the Lieutenant-Governors of the Provinces and the Governor-General of this Dominion, and some hon. gentlemen who have served in the capacity of Ministers of the Crown, have given their experiences. Now, I think this is a matter to be deprecated, inasmuch as it is hard to name distinct instances in which difficulties have occurred between the Governors under whom they may have served, and themselves; and it must be most invidious, and I think it improper also for any hon. gentleman who has served in the capacity of a Cabinet Minister, to divulge any instance of a difficulty which had occurred between himself and a governor. Having served in the capacity of an Executive Councillor and as Premier in my own Province, I might quote instances of the kind, but I think it would not be proper to do so. The Governors under whom we may have served, may be deceased, or absent in a distant quarter of the world: at all events, such experience must be given as that of an individual, whose opinions may be so colored that he could not give an adequate idea of the transaction; and, therefore, I suggest no argument should be founded on instances which have occurred either in the Privy Council of the Dominion or the Executive Councils of any of the Provinces. I think we should avoid that course in this House. Some hon. gentlemen referred, though briefly, to the occurrences which have lately transpired at the Cape of Good Hope, where it appears that the Governor, a gentleman of large experience and high political standing, has pursued a course precisely similar to that adopted by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec—I allude to Sir Bartle Frere, the Governor of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope. It appears that a dangerous incursion of armed natives was being made into the boundaries of that Colony—that actual war had been waged there—and the Governor differed from his Ministers as to the expediency of allowing them to nominate the officer who was to hold the command of the forces of the Colony, independently of the commander of the Queen's troops. The Governor considered that the whole of the forces—Imperial and Colonial—should be under one leader, and his advisers thought differently. The Governor took upon himself to exercise his prerogative, and when they refused to concur in his views he dismissed them. That seems to me a precedent for the action of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. It has been said that Colonial Secretaries have, in former times, laid down distinctly the ground on which a Governor may or may not act. I deprecate submitting implicitly to the dictates of any Colonial Secretary.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—I contend that this Parliament, and our Governor and Lieutenant-Governors, our Provincial Parliaments and our people ought to possess, and do possess all the liberties, rights and privileges which the people of Great Britain enjoy. If it were otherwise, I should like to have pointed out to us in this House in what respect our liberties are less than those of the people of Great Britain, so that we can contend against any such imaginary inferiority. Our Governor and our Lieutenant-Governors possess the same privilege of dismissing Ministers and dissolving Parliament as the Sovereign, and though it is not often found necessary that the Crown, or its representative, should exercise these prerogatives, it is not the less certain that they exist. It is impossible for any Colonial Secretary to define, with anything approaching precision, and to provide for all the contingencies that may occur in the vicissitudes of Colonial life, and if he could, it would be highly inexpedient that he should do so, for it would jeopardize our liberties and privileges. There is one view of the case which I think may be put before the House. Suppose we were simply to reverse the case; suppose circumstances had occurred in the Province of Quebec, to which the attention of this House was unexpectedly drawn, without any action being taken on the part of either the Lieutenant-Governor, or the Parliament of Quebec; suppose this House had thought proper to interfere with the domestic affairs of that Province. I would like to ask hon. gentlemen what would be the feeling of the people of Quebec, if this House passed resolutions of any kind with reference to their internal affairs? I am sure they would ignore any action taken by the Parliament of the Dominion, which would have the effect of interfering with their rights and privileges, especially if they were as they are now, on the eve of a general election, when the duty of deciding themselves on the question was before them, and they were about to discharge that duty.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—I am rather disposed to agree with some points which were laid down by my hon. friend from Richmond. For instance, when he says that this Senate of Canada is a very suitable body to take cognizance of occurrences of every kind which crop up to the surface of our political history, and I only wish that we could say with truth that this body, on such occasions as the present one, and on such occasions as my hon. friend has suggested, could divest themselves of all party feeling, and enter upon the discussions on their merits. I admit if we could do so we would be a very proper body to discuss such matters. Unfortunately, I fear party feeling does prevail among us. I fear party feeling is a term hardly strong enough to express the spirit pervading this body—a stronger term would be unparliamentary—and therefore, I leave it to the imaginations of hon. gentlemen to supply the deficiency. I believe, if this Senate could divest itself of party feeling, and exercise its large experience, and enquire into those contingencies of political life which must occur in our national history from time to time, it would be wise and proper for us to do so in a moderate and temperate spirit. But, although it may be said it would be desirable, under favorable circumstances, to discuss such questions, I doubt the expediency of doing so now, in this instance, when elections are pending in the Province of Quebec. I can easily understand, although the electors in some sections of Quebec might desire to hear the opinion of this Parliament expressed in their favor, a large majority would look upon such interference as unconstitutional and unnecessary under the circumstances, and therefore I think it would be wise to abstain from such interference. I do hope hon. gentlemen opposite, who have seen fit, in the performance of their duty, to bring forward this subject for discussion, will abstain from pressing their motion to a division. Just suppose, if it were possible, that in the Province of Quebec at this time no such authority as that which has been exercised by Mr. Letellier existed, that it was doubtful whether the Lieutenant-Governor had such authority. I contend that would be a most disastrous thing under the circumstances for the Province. Quebec was very much in the position that the Cape of Good Hope stood in when Sir Bartle Frere dismissed the Ministry of that colony. The danger, it is true, was of a different kind. The danger that threatened the Cape of Good Hope was an irruption of savage warriors, not without warlike experience, well armed, fearless of danger, and overpowering in numbers. Now, what was the position of Quebec? The danger in that Province was one which hangs over nations far more advanced in civilization than was the Cape of Good Hope. It was a financial danger, a danger most imminent, which threatened the City of Montreal and the whole Province.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—Now, that danger, if it had not been diverted by the prompt action of Governor Letellier, might have placed the Province of Quebec upon the brink of ruin.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—No hand could have been stretched out to save her. She must have fallen into the abyss, and if she had not perished there, she would have come out badly scathed.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—Will the hon. gentleman explain in what respect that comparison is correct?

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—I have explained. There was a danger of a great financial crisis. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Trudel) is still a young man, and he may yet live to see a financial crisis occur. If the Lieutenant-Governor had not exercised his prerogative, the Province of Quebec stood on the brink of a great danger, and no other hand could have saved her. Supposing Mr. Letellier had shrunk from exercising his prerogative, and allowed the late Ministry of Quebec to carry out their financial programme to the bitter end, what would be the result hereafter? Supposing it were found that by the exercise of this prerogative, by the dismissal of a Ministry, and the subsequent dissolution of a Parliament the danger might have been averted—what would have been felt by every one interested in the progress and welfare of that great Province if Governor Letellier had shrunk from the responsibility of exercising the prerogative connected with his office, and had thus failed to save the Province placed under him as Governor? I hold Mr. Letellier to be a courageous and a sagacious man, and I take it that in the exercise of his prerogative he has shown a wise discretion, for which he is entitled, not to the censure of this House, but to its praise.

Hon. Mr. Haythorne.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—I will at present abstain from moving any resolution in amendment, although I reserve to myself the right of doing so in case the hon. Senator from Kingston should persist in moving his resolution, which I hope he will not.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I propose to insist upon moving it.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—Then I reserve to myself the right to move the amendment which I have before me.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I must congratulate the hon. Secretary of State upon the ingenious device he has hit upon, for getting rid of the motion of the hon. Senator from Kingston. He has felt, no doubt, as the members of the Administration and their supporters in another place have felt, that there was no answering the propositions contained either in the resolution now before the Senate, or in the resolution introduced by the leader of the Opposition in the other House, and that a very large number of the supporters of the Government, if the question is put squarely before them, will be exceedingly embarrassed at having worked against the motion now before the House. He has therefore hit upon the plan of getting the hon. Senator from Prince Edward Island, after having duly instructed us with a long list of authorities and precedents, to wind up with a resolution which will enable the followers of the Government to get out of this difficulty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, no.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—He says the resolution was placed in his hands.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The hon. Senator assailed us with a long list of quotations and authorities. It may have been exceedingly crass on my part, but I must confess I could not make out that they were in any way apropos to the case before us, and so far as the example he brought up twice at the close of his speech, of the course taken by Sir Bartle Frere at the Cape of Good Hope, it seemed to me perfectly ludicrous to institute a comparison between the state of that Colony and the Province of Quebec. Why the hon. gentleman justified Sir Bartle Frere's course, on the ground that the frontiers of the Colony were swarming with savage foes who threatened to exterminate every white man. Surely he is not serious in comparing this with the state of things existing in Quebec, which he thinks justified the coup d'etat Mr. Letellier has been guilty of! What is the whole gist of the argument of my hon. friend the Secretary of State, re-echoed by the hon. Senator from Prince Edward Island, but simply this? "We are bound to admit there is no getting over the fact that in the very words of the resolution, the course adopted by Mr. Letellier was at variance with the constitutional principles on which responsible government should be conducted, but we think it is a very inappropriate time to bring forward this motion; we think the Senate will be really guilty of partizan conduct if they pronounce upon an issue of this kind, in view of the approaching elections in Quebec." Well, is it the fault of this Senate that we are called upon now to express this opinion? I confess I regret that such an expression of opinion is required from us at this time; but here are certain messages and certain communications laid before us by His Excellency the Governor-General. What course is the House to take in respect to them? Could we ignore them? If we do, what construction would be put upon it? Let hon. gentlemen opposite who think that we on this side of the House are incapable of acting except from partizan motives, put to themselves this question—these messages having been brought down, if no notice were taken of them by this House, would it not be a fair inference to be drawn by the people of Quebec, who, they imagine, will be so much influenced by our opinion, that either we consider that no such interference had taken place with the constitutional principles upon which responsible Government should be conducted; or, that in this House we were perfectly indifferent to any considerations of the kind? Is that a position in which the Senate should be placed before the country? I contend that we have no option but to deal with the subject matter of these messages, and I apprehend there could be no more proper tribunal to deal with the information conveyed in them, than the Senate of Canada. I do not think there was anything in the whole course of the speech of my hon. friend from Kingston, or my hon. friend from Arichat, to justify the assertion on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the subject was approached in a partizan spirit, or with a desire simply to effect a party triumph. Hon. gentlemen, the question is one of very great importance, and I am free to confess, as stated by the hon. Senator from Kingston, that if I have any leaning at all, I suppose, as a Conservative, it would naturally be to the side of authority; still, from what I have seen of public affairs during the course of my life, I have learned to prize responsible government as we enjoy it in this country, as one of the most inestimable privileges we possess, and one I would not see lightly trifled with by anybody, whether he be a Lieutenant-Governor of a Province or a responsible Minister of the Crown. Therefore, I say, when these messages were brought down there was no other course open to us than to deal with the question in the manner we propose. I think it cannot be denied by any hon. gentleman that viewing the question in its most favorable light, we are bound to come to the conclusion on the papers placed before us, that the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, having strong political convictions and great force of character, was determined from the very first to carry out his own views and impress them on the Ministry, or, failing in that, to dismiss them and try to bring others into his councils who would be more compliant or whose views would be more in accord with his own. I think it cannot be denied that has been the course pursued by Mr. Letellier since he became Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, and if this is granted, then the other proposition follows that his policy has been in direct violation of the principles of responsible government as we enjoy it. If we are convinced that this is the fact, I should like to know if it would be consistent with the dignity of this House if we simply debated the question and allowed the matter to drop without placing an expression of our opinion on the journals of the House? I should be sorry to see the House adopt such a puerile course, and I do not think we have heard anything from the hon. Secretary of State or the Hon. Senator from Prince Edward Island, to prevent us from expressing our opinion as to the unconstitutional conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. Allan.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—If my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island had not repeated the unwarrantable assertion which fell from the hon. Secretary of State, that we would be influenced by political considerations in the discussion of this question, I would not have alluded to it. I do not see how such an assertion can be justified. Is it because this House has condemned some measures of the Government? If so, I think the best proof that we are not influenced by partizan motives is to be found in the fact, that the Government now admit that the measures that we have defeated were not wise. According to the hon. Secretary of State, to have our merits recognized we should vote for all the measures submitted to us by the Government, whether we consider them in the public interest or not. The hon. Senator from Prince Edward Island repeated that assertion, although he knows it was through the action of the Senate the Government were prevented from depriving a large portion of the people of his own Province of the franchise. I could refer to the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railroad Bill, and other unwise measures of the Government which we defeated in this House, and which the Government are now obliged to admit deserved the fate which they met with at our hands. I was surprised to hear the hon. Senator from Prince Edward Island attempting to justify the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec by citing precedents which, in my opinion, have no bearing on the case. I challenge any hon. gentleman to cite an instance in the whole history of England in which the Sovereign has dismissed a Ministry in such an arbitrary manner. There has been none during the present reign. Is there a single case during the reign of George the Third that could at all be compared with the one now under discussion? With the exception of the dismissal of the Ministry in the Cape of Good Hope by Sir Bartle Frere, in every instance that has been cited an opportunity has always been given to the Ministry to comply with the request of the Sovereign, and it was only on a refusal that they were dismissed. To find precedents for the action of Mr Letellier, we must go back to the last century, and even there we find nothing so arbitrary. The first intimation the DeBoucherville Government had that the Lieutenant-Governor was dissatisfied with them was when they were notified that they were dismissed. The hon. gentleman went so far as to say the prerogative of the Lieutenant-Governor was equal to that of the Sovereign, and therefore we had no right to deal with it in this House. I cannot conceive how such an absurd assertion can be made. What are the prerogatives of the Lieutenant-Governor? Has he any rights of his own? He has only the rights which he holds from the Crown, and he is responsible for the exercise of those rights to the Dominion Parliament through whom the Queen has conferred upon him this power, and to whom he is answerable for his acts. It is not necessary to go very far to show that this House has a very well defined right to deal with this matter. I would refer the hon. gentleman to the 59th clause of the British North America Act, in which it is provided that:—

“ Any Lieutenant-Governor appointed after the first Session of the Parliament of Canada shall not be removable within five years from his appointment, except for cause assigned, which shall be communicated to him in writing within one month after the order for his removal is made, and shall be communicated by message to the Senate and to the House of Commons, etc.”

Is it not stated there that the Senate has a direct right to judge of the conduct of the Lieutenant Governor? The Government of the Dominion is answerable for the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governors; and if this House finds a wrong has been committed, and the Government have not fulfilled their duty by remedying or submitting it to the Senate, has not this House a right to deal with the case? “The King can do no wrong,” says the constitutional authority; the Lieutenant-Governor has shown he is more clever—he has done wrong, and a great wrong, as is proved by the papers submitted to this House for its consideration by the Governor-General. But we are told the Lieutenant-Governor has exercised his prerogative, and we ought to respect authority. As I have shown, he is an officer appointed by this Government, and they are responsible for his conduct to this Parliament. I regret that the hon. Secretary of State has repeated in this House the falsehoods contained in the statements of Mr. Letellier. I use the word "falsehoods" advisedly. We have here the right to call things by their name and quality,—the acts of Mr. Letellier as they deserve. As a French poet, the celebrated Boileau, said, we may say: "j'appelle un chat, un chat, et Rollet un fripon." The hon. leader of the Opposition in his speech said we should not refer to matters which are denied by either the Lieutenant-Governor or his late Ministers, but that does not prevent us from mentioning what can be found in the public documents. Mr. Letellier states that Mr. DeBoucherville, in a conversation with him, admitted that he was controlled by railway rings, and that he was obliged to give subsidies of money to them. I do not hesitate to say that is a falsehood, for the simple reason that no such subsidy has been granted. At the time when the subsidies alluded to were granted, I was a member of the Local Legislature. Of course I have not had as much experience as the hon. Senator who told me I was a young man, but I know what has been going on in my own Province during the last five years, and I am in a position to contradict the imaginary case the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island has made out, having in hand the Statute and the journals of the Legislative Assembly of 1873-4. All the railway subsidies granted by the Legislature of Quebec, were granted by Statute long before Mr. Letellier became Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec; consequently Mr. DeBoucherville could not have made the statement attributed to him by the Lieutenant-Governor. The subsidy was distributed, according to a special scheme, amongst all the companies in the Province and it was enacted that if any one of those companies failed to fulfil the obligations and conditions which entitled the company to such subsidies, the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council could grant this subsidy to another company. This was the law of the Province before Mr. Letellier was appointed Lieutenant-Governor.

Hon. Mr. CHAPPAIS—And before the last general election.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—Yes, as everybody knows. How is it that such a falsehood can be repeated in this House?

Hon. Mr. Trudel.

How is it that an hon. gentleman, who has not the slightest idea of what takes place in the Province of Quebec, takes upon himself to teach us what we should do, and think, and know? He compared the state of affairs in the Province of Quebec with the South Africa case. In the latter, Sir Bartle Frere took an extreme step to save the white population from extermination. It was a case of life and death, and one to which applies the rule: Salus populi suprema lex esto. Was there anything similar in Quebec? I will explain what happened in our Province. Money was voted by certain municipalities in aid of certain railroads. The private companies having failed to carry out the undertakings, the municipalities sent delegates to the Government of Quebec and offered to give the same bonuses to them if they would go on with the work. The whole difficulty arises out of the location of the road. The City of Montreal, in which I am a ratepayer, had voted a bonus of $1,000,000, a portion of which they paid, and the Government of Quebec having located the line by Terrebonne, instead of coming directly by Bout de L'Isle, they raised a question whether they were obliged to pay the balance. The question, from a legal point of view, left no room for doubt at all. It is as clear as daylight that they could be compelled to pay. The only case in which there could have been a doubt would have been if the Government of Quebec had gone from Terrebonne to St. Therese without going to Montreal, because a statute said that the junction of the Colonization and North Shore Railway should be within the limits of the City of Montreal. It was to remove any doubt on that point that the Railway Bill was passed, declaring that the Government would continue the line from Terrebonne to Montreal, and fulfil the conditions on the Statute Books, that the two lines should be connected within the city limits. The Government added a clause to the Bill, which, in my opinion, was entirely unnecessary, that if the City of Montreal refused to pay the amount of the bonus, the Government could collect it without process of law. In other words, they claimed the same right that the City of Montreal has enjoyed for many years—to enforce payment without going to a court of justice. While there may sometimes be cause for complaint under that system, on the whole it works very well, and at all events there is nothing new or extraordinary about it. What is there about such a measure that rendered the interference of a dictator necessary? It has been said that because the new Ministry are appealing to the people, we should not discuss it now. But it must be remembered there are two questions involved in this matter. One is whether the Government should have passed the Railway Bill that has been referred to; that is the question which the people of the Province of Quebec have to decide. And the present Ministry, having taken the responsibility of the acts of the Lieutenant-Governor, the people have to judge them on that act—to judge the Ministers, not the Governor. The other question is whether the Governor has acted well. For his acts he is not answerable to the people, but to the authority who appointed him, that is the Federal Government, which is under the control of both Houses. Consequently we have the right to blame the Government for the conduct of its officer. I may mention that the measure doubling the subsidies to the South Shore Railways has been sanctioned by the Lieutenant-Governor on the recommendation of his new Ministers. How is it, if the danger was so great, that this measure should have received his sanction? Two months before the crisis in Quebec, everybody in Montreal knew that the Government of Quebec was about to be upset. It was common talk on the streets and was referred to in the press. If you take this fact in connection with petty reasons assigned in the case of Mr. Letellier, the conclusion is irresistible that the Government of Mr. DeBoucherville were upset by a plot. It is understood that a gentleman well known here, who occupied a seat in the House of Commons, was promised the position now held by Mr. Letellier, but it was said the Government of the Dominion were determined to have the influence of the Local Government in their favor at the next general election, and they thought the gentleman to whom they had promised the position was too "soft," and Mr. Letellier was appointed to overthrow the Local Government. I heard that a hundred times, but I did not believe it until this coup

d'état occurred. I did not believe it until I heard that the man who had raised sectarian strife and national prejudices in the late Province of Canada—the evil genius of our Province—was travelling up and down between Toronto and Montreal, and conferring with Mr. Letellier. When these mysterious meetings took place, it was stated openly in the press that there was a plot to undermine and overthrow the Government of Mr. DeBoucherville. Some of the more zealous partizans of the Rouge party said "You Conservatives have a large majority in the Legislature, but you will see the end of Mr. DeBoucherville's Government in a few days." These are well known facts in the City of Montreal. As I have stated, there are two questions to be considered, one, the legislation with respect to the railways, which the people of the Province of Quebec have to decide; the other, the constitutional question, which this Parliament has to decide, is the act of the Lieutenant-Governor. I contend that when an election is to take place, the late Government should have been allowed to go to the people and ask their judgment on their legislation. They have been deprived of that right. The people of Quebec have no control over the Lieutenant-Governor, and, therefore, it rests with us in this Parliament to say whether he has pursued a constitutional course or not. If he were not answerable to this Parliament, he would possess a hundred times more power than the Queen of England. This very act of the Lieutenant-Governor is used in the Province of Quebec to influence improperly the minds of the people. They entertain great respect for authority, and when they are told that the representative of Queen Victoria has condemned the late Ministry, it is a strong argument with them that they should condemn them also. That is the way the subject is discussed in the Province of Quebec. Shall we allow such an argument to be employed against the late Ministry, when there is such strong reason to condemn the Lieutenant-Governor? Is it not our duty to let the people of Quebec know that the power to whom he is answerable is the Parliament of Canada? What is the position which the Government take on this matter? In the other House the Premier said: "The case was left with the proper judges, the people, and why should this House interfere? They ought to decline to enter into the question as to whether Governor Letellier was right or wrong." And he added: "To do so would be an outrage on constitutional government." In the Senate, on the other hand, the hon. Secretary of State justified the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor. Then according to the Premier's theory, he committed an outrage on the constitution. That contradiction shows the insincerity of the Government and is an additional reason why we should pronounce on this matter. I am as independent of political organizations and as free from party feeling as any member of this House, and I can do the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House the justice of saying I believe they are equally independent. Of course, I cannot speak for hon. gentlemen opposite, but I suppose the hon. Secretary of State speaks for them when he says they are too much influenced by party feeling to consider this matter fairly. The Premier, in his speech on this subject the other night, said: "In Mr. Joly's bold and manly address he accepted the full responsibility of the acts of the Lieutenant-Governor. In uttering these words the Premier showed unconsciously that he himself considered the act of Mr. Letellier most audacious. For, it Mr. Letellier's act was a proper and patriotic one; if he had not violated the constitution and compromised himself, where would be the boldness and the manhood? You say it was an excellent act of administration! He has saved the Province! Then, I fail to see anything very bold or manly in Mr. Joly's accepting the responsibility of such an act! It is a matter worthy of remark that the Liberal party in this country, as in all European countries, have proved themselves the most despotic and tyrannical of all political organizations whenever they have had an opportunity to exercise their power to advance their political interests.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I have listened with attention and patience to my hon. friend from Quebec, (Mr. Trudel) who seems to have lashed himself into a fury in consequence of some remark of the hon. Senator from Prince Edward Island, whose speech was moderate in tone and sentiment. I am sure my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island would have made no reference to the hon. Senator from Quebec, if he had not been unnecessarily interrupted by him. It is just possible that, so far as I am informed, the finances of the Province of Quebec will be brought to a very critical state before long, if the DeBoucherville Government should be restored to power. In reference to this question, I am very sorry to see that the resolution moved by the hon. Senator from Kingston has not been withdrawn. I did hope from the moderate tone of the leader of the Opposition, and the expression of his great hesitancy and doubt in bringing this matter up in this Parliament, that his object would have been obtained after some discussion upon it, and that the resolution would not be pressed to a vote in this Chamber. I regret that he has not deemed it expedient to withdraw it; because I consider it inexpedient, indelicate, inopportune and likely to have no practical effect. The hon. Senator from Kingston, in his opening remarks, spoke of his early acquaintanceship with the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, and I can say myself, so far as my knowledge of him is concerned, I sat here under the late coalition Government, when that hon. gentleman (Mr. Letellier) was the leader of the Opposition, and I can speak of the personal regard which was entertained for him on all sides of this Chamber; but my hon. friend in pursuing his reference to Mr. Letellier, went on to draw upon his imagination, when he said that he had accepted the high and responsible position of Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec with a partizan object. He intimated it was possible he had in view, in accepting that position, the restoring to power of a party in consonance with his own feelings. I think it would have been more charitable if he had drawn on his imagination in the other direction, and conceived that hon. gentleman had assumed that high position with a full sense of its responsibilities, and that he went to the Province of Quebec to govern it on constitutional principles—that he saw in the legislation which was introduced by the DeBoucherville Government a severe infliction on the people of his country, that the rights and privileges of his countrymen were to be ruthlessly interfered with, and that they were to be subjected to onerous taxation without corresponding benefits, while ignoring altogether the usual procedure and the rights of judicial action. The hon. gentleman might have gone further and imagined, what is pretty clearly established by the papers before us, that Mr. Letellier found his Ministers controlled by certain "rings," or corporations, or bodies of men, who were prepared to live and fatten on the spoils of the people, and that he felt he was obliged to exercise the prerogative which he possessed for the protection of the interests of his native Province.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I think all that might have been imagined, and therefore, the hon. gentleman who occupies that high position—whose right of exercising the prerogative of dismissing his Ministers has not been disputed to-night, and certainly has not been disputed by any authority which has been quoted—simply exercised a right which is inalienable and inherent to the position which he occupied—a right which is specially secured to the Lieutenant-Governors of Ontario and Quebec. Therefore, it becomes simply a question as to the propriety or advisability of exercising that right on this occasion. Into that question I do not propose to go. I did not think a resolution like this would be presented to this body, and pressed to a vote. Some hon. gentleman has said that there were no precedents for the act of the Lieutenant-Governor. Well, I happen to belong to a Province in which I was a member of the Legislature when the Government was virtually forced to resign in advance of an appeal to the people upon the question of the Prohibitory Liquor Law: it was a moral reform for which the great body of the people had petitioned, and in which they took a very lively interest. The Government of the day, supported by a large majority, passed that Act. Just when the reaction had set in, before the law could fairly get into working order, and when those engaged in the liquor traffic were very much excited over the operation of the law, the Governor on a sudden conceived that his council at that moment did not represent the wishes of the people. He at once set to work to secure a dissolution. Some of the hon. gentlemen who are here know all the circumstances attending that case. The Ministry were virtually forced to resign, a new Ministry was called in, and a dissolution was immediately ordered. The result was that the Governor was sustained. I thought it was an arbitrary use of the prerogative on that occasion.

Hon. Mr. McClelan.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—But the people of New Brunswick did not think so, though the reasons were far less grave than in this case. The Queen of England did not think so, because the Governor of that day not only was not reproved by his royal mistress, but had new dignities conferred upon him. So also in the case of Governor Gordon on the Confederation question—the Opposition were only seven in number, yet the Government were virtually compelled to make way for other advisers. The people sustained the Governor, who was subsequently knighted. I never heard of the question being discussed in the British Parliament at all. He had felt it his duty to bring about a crisis, and an appeal to the people, and the result was as I have stated. In that case he was resisted by his Ministers, yet by the exercise of his prerogative he forced a resignation and an appeal to the electors. I think any discussion of the question which is before the House is inexpedient. It will scarcely give an expression of opinion such as the hon. gentlemen who support it perhaps think, and I am surprised that hon. members from Quebec would favor a precedent so fraught with danger to the interests of that Province, particularly a precedent such as the interference of the Federal Parliament on this question will establish. The hon. gentleman from Quebec who has just taken his seat contended that the people of Quebec should not be the judges of their own affairs.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—I did not say that. I said they were judges of the question as to matters endorsed by the present Ministry, but it was not for them to judge of the issue between the Lieutenant Governor and the power that appointed him.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—The hon. gentleman said we were the proper judges; that we had the right to sit here and act in a judicial capacity. If that be the case, we can scarcely be expected to found our decision on street rumors and on dits such as the hon. gentleman spoke about in his speech this evening. I think the introduction of this question at this moment is inopportune, in view of the fact that the dissolution has taken place, and the question is now prominently before the people of the Province. Any opinion that we may express will have its effect upon the free right of the people to decide this question for themselves, and such interference is not only wrong, but places this House in an anomalous position. The decision of the people of the Province of Quebec under the circumstances is very likely to be in a direction different from that in which this House will decide, and in accordance with the expression of the popular branch. I can understand that the Lieutenant-Governor, being appointed by the Federal Government, should be amenable to a higher authority, and after the excitement consequent upon the election now in progress in the Province of Quebec has passed away, it would be quite time enough for the Governor-General-in-Council to consider the propriety or impropriety of the course pursued by Mr. Letellier. The Government are responsible to this Parliament, and ultimately it may come before us in a proper and legitimate way, but I trust that when we consider the temperate manner in which this subject has been discussed, the mover of this resolution will not press it to a vote, but that we will be relieved from the necessity of proceeding with a discussion, which, perhaps, may be protracted for some little time, and of voting upon a resolution, which, for the reasons I have given, is undignified and inopportune, and, I believe, can have no practical effect whatever.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The question, as placed before the House by the hon. member from Kingston, is whether we have to consider the conduct of the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec as subversive of the principles of Responsible Government or not. In order to answer that question we have to consider what Responsible Government is; and I was very much gratified to find that—in this House, as in the other Chamber—the gentlemen who have supported this resolution have taken the same view of Responsible Government as we do, and hold that the position of a Lieutenant Governor in the Dominion is the same as the position of Her Majesty in England. The difference between Responsible Government and the system which prevailed before Responsible Government was obtained, is that under the old system the Governor's advisers were responsible only to himself, while now, the Governor is bound to accept the advice of his Executive Council, which Executive Council are responsible to the popular branch of the Legislature, and through that branch to the people. The power of the Lieutenant Governor, so far as regards the question before the House, is the same as that of the Governor General, and the power of the Governor General the same as the power of the Queen. All we have to do is to find out what the power of the Sovereign is, and upon that question I ask the House to bear with me for a few minutes. I should have thought that every hon. gentleman here would have been surprised at hearing the question asked in a British Parliament as to whether the Governor or the Sovereign had the right to dissolve the representative branch of the Legislature. Every gentleman who has read law or made Parliamentary history a study, would take it for granted that that right would not be questioned; and I was very much surprised, indeed, to hear it questioned in the way it has been. I know that this right has been recognized in a certain qualified way by the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution here, and also by the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition in the other House; but it has been denied altogether by some of their friends in the other House, by the press, and by some hon. gentlemen in this House, and I shall have to refer to some of the fundamental authorities to decide this question. Before doing so, I may remark upon the very limited number of the authorities cited to support the views of hon. gentlemen opposite. One hon. gentleman said that there was such a wealth of authority—there had been so much light thrown on the subject—that it was not necessary for him to cite any more. It occurred to me that that was a very easy way of getting out of a difficulty. I think it is a very singular thing that in this House and in the lower House gentlemen of the Opposition have not been able to cite any standard authorities in support of their position. The first authority I shall quote from is "Stephen's Commentaries," 7th edition, published in 1874.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL.—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER.—The hon. gentleman says “hear, hear.” I am very glad that the authority meets with his approval. It is recognized in England and in every British colony as a good authority ; and I shall take the liberty of reading a few extracts. The first one does not bear directly on this question, but it bears indirectly on it, and points out a danger that lies in the way of gentlemen who support this resolution.

Chapter I of Book IV treats of the Parliament. In this chapter at page 319 of the edition from which I read, I find the following language :—

“In all tyrannical Governments, the Supreme Magistracy, or the right both of making and of enforcing the laws, is vested in one and the same man, or one and the same body of men ; and wherever these two powers are united together, there can be no public liberty. The magistrate may enact tyrannical laws, and execute them in a tyrannical manner, since he is possessed, in quality of dispenser of justice, with all the power which he, as legislator, thinks proper to give himself. * * * * * With us, therefore, in England, this Supreme Power is divided into two branches ; the one legislative, to wit, the Parliament, consisting of Sovereign, Lords and Commons ; the other executive, consisting of the Sovereign alone.”

I should like to call attention to the fact that in the Province of Quebec the Government, through the Legislature, enacted certain laws, which laws ought to have been left to be enforced by the judiciary ; but the Legislation of this last Session was to take the execution of those laws out of the hands of the proper authorities and vest it in the Ministry. When a legislature undertakes to do that, to my mind it becomes, what the author here terms, “tyrannical.” At page 326, the author says :

“It is highly necessary for preserving the balance of the constitution, that the Executive should be a branch, though not the whole of the Legislative. The total union of them, we have seen would be productive of tyranny ; the total disjunction of them would, in the end, produce the same effects, by causing that union against which it seems to provide. The Legislative would soon become tyrannical, by making continual encroachments, and gradually assuming to itself the rights of the Executive power.”

And he goes on to instance the case of the Long Parliament.

Hon. Mr. Power.

It seems to me that, at the present period of the nineteenth century there is a great deal more danger of tyranny from the Legislature than from the Executive. The author, in the Book dealing with public rights, speaking the right of the Crown to dissolve Parliament, says, at page 392 :

“A Parliament may be dissolved by the Sovereign’s will, expressed either in person or by representation ; for as he has the sole right of convening the Parliament, so also it is a branch of the Royal prerogative, that he may (when-ever he pleases) either prorogue the Parliament for a time, or put a final period to its existence. If none but itself had a right to prorogue or dissolve a Parliament, it might happen to become perpetual, and this would be very dangerous.”

Upon this point the case of the Long Parliament is again cited. There the law is laid down without any qualification whatever that the Sovereign may dissolve Parliament. Then another principle laid down in this text book, which has not been regarded by hon. gentlemen who have discussed this matter here and elsewhere, is the irresponsibility of the Monarch or his representative. The maxim that “the King can do no wrong” is thrust out of sight altogether ; and, instead of it, I have heard the statement made, that the name of the Lieutenant-Governor should be handed down to infamy. I think that if any names should be handed down in that way, it should be those of the Ministers whose acts compelled him to assume the responsibility he has taken. The next authority I shall cite is Sir Edward Creasy, late Chief Justice of Ceylon. I may remark that he is a Liberal who entertains the highest regard for the powers of the Legislature and the rights of the people ; and that he is not one of those who would wish to extend the royal influence. In his “Rise and Progress of the British Constitution,” speaking of the Crown, he says : “The power of dissolving Parliament is also a strong engine in the Sovereign’s hands, whereby he may protect himself against Ministers personally distasteful to him, and gain, at least, the chance of seeing a House of Commons returned whose feelings may harmonize with his own.” Now, there is laid down in clear and unqualified terms the right of the Monarch to do what Lieutenant-

Governor Letellier did when he removed Ministers that were distasteful to him. Taking the most extreme view of the Lieutenant-Governor's conduct, that he was actuated by personal dislike to his Ministers—which I do not myself believe at all—we have the authority of Sir Edward Creasy that the Governor did nothing but what he had a perfect constitutional right to do. In support of this, I will quote from Professor Sheldon Amos, author of various standard works upon constitutional history, and jurisprudence. He also is a Liberal. At page 10 of his "English Constitution and Government," he says: "The Sovereign can dissolve Parliament whenever he pleases." If it were necessary I might cite several other standard authorities, but I do not think it is necessary to quote any more of that particular character. Yet, at the risk of repeating what has been already said, I shall take the liberty to refresh the memories of some hon. gentlemen in this House on what May says on the subject in the first volume of his History. I imagine that no parliamentarian will question May as an authority on constitutional history and practice. He has lived in the atmosphere of Parliament, being one of the clerks in the British House of Commons, where he has had the best opportunities for being imbued with the true spirit of Parliament. The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Hon. Mr. Haythorne) cited May on pretty nearly all the points to which I am about to call attention, but I find that since that hon. gentleman sat down, some other hon. Senators did not appear to be clear on the subject; and I shall repeat two or three citations that have been given. At page 14 of the edition of 1871, the principle is laid down generally:—

"A Constitutional Government ensures to the King a wide authority in all the councils of the state. He chooses and dismisses his ministers, and this, if it be his pleasure, without the advice of any councillor. Their resolutions upon every important measure of foreign and domestic policy are submitted to his approval; and when that approval is withheld, his ministers must either abandon their policy, or resign their offices. They are responsible to the King on the one hand, and to Parliament on the other; and, while they retain the confidence of the King, by administering affairs to his satisfaction, they must act upon principles, and propose measures, which they can justify to Parliament."

Hon. A. r. Power.

That is a perfectly clear and unqualified statement. There are several cases of this kind which arose in the reign of George the Third, and those cases have been referred to by the hon. leader of the Opposition in the other House, and the hon. Senator from Kingston in this House. There were two of those cases in which the exercise of the prerogative was rather severely criticised by different authorities; but hon. gentlemen will observe that the criticism was not directed against the exercise of the prerogative in dissolving the Commons; it was not questioned that the King had the right to dissolve the House; but it had been held that there were certain circumstances connected with the dissolutions that gave the acts an improper character. In one case—in fact, I think in two cases—in the reign of George III., the King had intrigued with certain outside irresponsible parties for the purpose of overthrowing his own Ministers; and that was the conduct which had been held up to reprobation by constitutional writers as being 'clearly most improper.'

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In the case of the coalition Cabinet, the means taken by the King to overthrow the Government were very unfair indeed. He was not able to defeat them in the Commons, do what he could; and when the India Bill was going up to the House of Lords the King took steps, by allowing his name to be used with the Peers, to prepare for the defeat of the measure in the Upper House. Lord Temple was the agent in the matter, and in order to leave no doubt as to his commission, the following words were written upon a card:—

"His Majesty allows Earl Temple to say that whoever voted for the India Bill was not only not his friend, but would be considered by him as an enemy; and if these words were not strong enough, Earl Temple might use whatever words he might deem stronger and more to the purpose." P. 68.

A message of that kind from the King being carried around amongst the Peers, naturally produced the result that he desired. The Bill was defeated in the House of Lords; and he then dissolved the Commons. We can see at once that cases like that differ from the case of the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec. There have been no 'King's friends' in the case of Lieutenant Governor Letellier as there were in the case of George III. It has not been charged by his most bitter enemy that there was any back-stairs influence going on, or any intrigue with parties in opposition. The Lieutenant Governor appears to have acted solely upon his own responsibility; though I believe that an hon. Senator from Montreal has said there was some collusion between the Government at Ottawa and the Lieutenant Governor at Quebec.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—I mentioned facts.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In 1831 there was another dissolution of the British Commons, which I consider to be a strong case in point, and on which May has the following remarks:—

“The King was called upon, at a critical period, to exercise his prerogative of dissolving Parliament. In 1831, a new Parliament was yet in its first Session, but, having been assembled under the auspices of the late Administration, before the popular feelings in favor of parliamentary reform had been aroused, it had become evident that a Reform Ministry, and this Parliament, could not exist together. The Ministers, having been twice defeated in three days, had no alternative but to resign their offices or to appeal from the House of Commons to the people; and they urged the necessity of an immediate dissolution. The time was full of peril, and the King hesitated to adopt the bold advice of his Ministers, but, when at length he yielded his assent, the prerogative was exercised at once, and by the King in person.” p. 141.

Although this had been the first Session of a new Parliament, the propriety of the dissolution by the King was not questioned at all. The next dissolution was that which took place in 1834.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—Will the hon. gentleman tell us what was the result of the dissolution of 1831?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Ministry were sustained. The dissolution of 1834 is a case on which a great deal of stress has been laid by the hon. gentleman from Kingston; and still greater stress has been laid upon it by the leader of the Opposition in the other House. The reason why that dissolution was not approved of, was, not that the King had done what he had no right to do, but that he had dissolved without any cause whatever; and it is not pretended by any one that the Sovereign, or the Governor, has a right to dissolve Parliament unless he has some substantial reason for doing so.

Hon. Mr. Power.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—May says on page 146:—

“All the accustomed grounds for dismissing a ministry were wanting. There was no immediate difference of opinion between them and the King, upon any measure, or question of public policy; there was no disunion among themselves; nor were there any indications that they had lost the confidence of Parliament. * * * * The right of the King to dismiss his ministers was unquestionable; but constitutional usage has prescribed certain conditions under which this right should be exercised. It should be exercised solely in the interests of the State, and on grounds which can be justified to Parliament, to whom, as well as to the King, the ministers are responsible. Even in 1784, when George III had determined to crush the Coalition Ministry, he did not venture to dismiss them, until they had been defeated in the House of Lords, upon Mr. Fox's India Bill. And again in 1807, the Ministers were at issue with the King, upon a grave constitutional question, before he proceeded to form another ministry. But here it was not directly alleged that the Ministers had lost the confidence of the King. * * * * The act of the King bore too much the impress of his personal will, and too little of those reasons of state policy by which it should have been prompted.”

The one essential in every case, is that there should be a difference of opinion between the King and his Ministers to justify him in dissolving Parliament against their will; and there was no such difference there. There are several other passages in May bearing directly upon the question before us, but, not desiring to weary the House by reading too much, I shall simply refer hon. gentlemen to the following pages of the first volume: 31, 39, 71, 73, 85, 108, and 116. The case of Lord Palmerston has been referred to at length by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Haythorne). I shall now refer to the only authority that has been cited by the hon. leader of the Opposition in this House, and by the leader of the Opposition in the other chamber; and it is a matter of surprise to me that such an authority should have been quoted and relied upon by those hon. gentlemen. The hon. gentleman from Kingston stated in the course of his remarks this afternoon, that he did not attach any weight to the opinion of the Saturday Review writers; yet he held up to the admiration of this House as a most weighty authority on constitutional practice, Mr. Bagehot. We have not been aware before now that Mr. Bagehot has been regarded as a very high authority on such matters; Mr. Bagehot is an extreme Radical; and the book which goes by his name, and which has been referred to by the hon. gentleman opposite, is made up from essays contributed by the author to that very Radical publication, "The Fortnightly Review." It is very strange to see the leaders of the Conservative party cite this Radical writer, the only authority that bears out their view of this case. Of all the other Parliamentary authorities, not one has a word to say in favor of the position of the hon. gentlemen opposite; and the only authority they have to fall back upon is Bagehot. As far as one can judge, almost the only claim Bagehot appears to have to be cited as an authority by those gentlemen, is that he at one time sat beside the Right Hon. member for Kingston at a dinner in London. Bagehot's theory is that the majority of the Lower House are omnipotent; the King has no power at all,—the Executive has no authority whatever; and even the non-elective body, the Upper House, have to give way also. They may, perhaps, be allowed to dot an "i" or cross a "t"; but that is about all the power he would allow them; and I am rather surprised that hon. gentlemen who are so Conservative in their tendencies, and so jealous for the powers and dignity of the Senate, should accept as an authority a writer who deals so cavalierly with the rights of this House, as well as with the rights of the Executive. Hon. gentlemen can see that— if the doctrine laid down by Bagehot is to be recognized as the constitutional law of the future; if we are to forget all the lessons we have learned, and the people of England have learned during centuries—it is well that it should be clearly understood. Heretofore, we have all been in the habit of thinking that the one thing above all others which recommends the British Constitution as a system of government is that it contains in it all the good qualities of all other systems of government; that it combines the stability of a monarchy, the wisdom of an aristocracy and the patriotism which is supposed to be peculiar to a democracy.

THE MINISTERIAL CHANGE IN QUEBEC.

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

Hon. Mr. POWER, in resuming his remarks, said:—I wish, in the first place, to make an explanation for the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Haythorne), who said that he proposed to move an amendment to the motion of the hon. Senator from Kingston. It might be inferred from the manner in which the hon. gentleman had referred to the amendment that he was acting on behalf of the Government, or with the cooperation and cognizance of some member of the Government. I am authorized by the hon. gentleman to say that such is not the case; that he and two or three of his friends—private members of this House—had prepared the amendment, and that he had not presented it on behalf of the Government or in consequence of any understanding with the Government.

Yesterday in my remarks on the resolution before the House, I tried to establish the view that the Governor General stands in the position of the Sovereign, and that the Lieutenant Governor stands in the same position also, as far as executive power is concerned; and that consequently all the rules which apply to the Sovereign of England, as far as this question is concerned, apply also to the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec. I tried also to show that the Sovereign, if there is any difference of opinion on matters of state policy between him and his advisers, has the right to dismiss his Ministers, to dissolve Parliament, and to appeal to the country upon the question at issue. In support of this view I cited several authors. I had intended to quote from Todd; and with the permission of the House I shall now cite a few passages from "Todd's Parliamentary Government in England," which is an authority that I do not suppose any hon. gentleman will question. I understand that the pamphlet written lately by Mr. Todd has been questioned, but in 1873 Sir John Macdonald and Lord Dufferin cited him as a very high authority; and I presume that anything which he wrote previous to that time will be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite as sound doctrine. And I shall quote from his work of 1867. On page 134 of the first volume we find the right to dissolve laid down; at page 154 we find the same right again referred to; and at page 162 Mr. Todd gives a list showing various cases where Ministers had been dismissed by the King, and the House had been dissolved. I should wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman from Kingston, who in his speech cited Lord Brougham—as was also done by the leader of the Opposition in the other House—to Mr. Todd's chapter on the prerogative power of the Sovereign, where at page 206, Lord Brougham is reported as having said of the theory held by gentlemen opposite:—

"With all the disposition in the world to desire that the Royal prerogative should be restricted, and the will of the nation govern the national affairs, we cannot comprehend this theory of a monarchy. It assigns to the Crown either far too much revenue or far too little power. To pay a million a year, or more, for a name, seems absurdly extravagant. To affect living under a kingly government, and yet suffer no kind of a kingly power, seems extravagantly absurd. Surely the meaning of having a Sovereign is, that his voice should be heard, and his influence felt, in the administration of public affairs. The different orders of the State have a right to look to that high quarter all in their turn for support, when their rights are invaded by one another's encroachment, or to claim the Royal umpirage when their mutual conflicts cannot be settled by mutual concessions; and unless the whole notion of a mixed monarchy, and a balance of three powers, is a mere fiction and a dream, the Royal portion of the composition must be allowed to have some power to produce an effect upon the quality of the whole."

"In his essay on Parliamentary Government, Lord Gray thus expresses himself:—
Hon. Mr. Power.

'There is a further safeguard against abuse, in its being requisite that the Ministers of the Crown should obtain its direct sanction for all their most important measures. The Crown, it is true, seldom refuses to act upon the advice deliberately pressed upon it by its servants, nor could it do so frequently without creating great inconvenience. But the Sovereigns of this country nevertheless may, and generally have exercised much influence over the conduct of the Government; and, in extreme cases, the power of the Crown to refuse its consent to what is proposed by its servants, may be used with the greatest benefit to the nation. A refusal on the part of the Sovereign to sanction measures which the Ministers persist in recommending as indispensable, is indeed a legitimate ground for their resignation: and if the question which leads to this is one on which they have the support of public opinion, they must in the end prevail.' p. 208.

"Upon a recent occasion, Lord Derby, from his place in Parliament, gave utterance to the following remarks: 'The people of this country are under a great mistake if they suppose that the Sovereign does not exercise a real, salutary and decided influence over the Councils and Government of the country. The Sovereign is not the mere automaton, or puppet, of the Government of the day. She exercises a beneficial influence and control over the affairs of the State; and it is the duty of the Minister for the time being, in submitting any propositions for the assent of Her Majesty, to give satisfactory evidence that such propositions are called for by public policy, and justified by the public interests. If the Sovereign is not satisfied with the advice tendered to Her,—if either from the suggestions of her own mind, or from objections which may be suggested to her (by the Prince Consort), Her Majesty is of opinion that She will not accept the advice of the responsible Minister of the Crown, the course of the Crown and the Minister is equally open. The course of the Crown is to refuse to accept that advice of the Minister, and the inevitable consequence to the Minister would be the tender of his resignation.' p. 208.

"'It is not to be supposed' says Professor Austin, in reference to the control exercised over Parliament by means of the royal prerogative of dissolution, 'that the King is powerless because this power of control is seldom exercised. As his power depends, in the long run, on the national attachment of the people to the royal office, the permanence of the power would be put in jeopardy if it were indiscreetly exercised. The power of the Crown to control the Houses operates silently. It is rarely exercised, in fact; but it could be exercised in fact if the exercise became necessary, and were sanctioned by the approbation of the country.' p. 209.

"Commenting upon the exercise of this royal prerogative, Lord Brougham has declared that it is in the 'unquestioned power of the Crown to choose and to change its servants,' and that 'no one would think of questioning the foundation of this power, of objecting to its existence, or of wishing to restrict it,' provided only that it is exercised 'on grounds capable of being stated and defended.' The grounds upon which the Sovereign may constitutionally dismiss a Ministry, he has thus defined: 'If they exhibit internal dissensions amongst themselves; if they differ from the Sovereign, or from the country at large; if their measures are ruinous to the interests of the country, at home, or abroad; or if there should exist a general feeling of distrust and disapprobation of them throughout the country.'

"The personal discretion of the Sovereign in regard to his Ministers has been explained as follows: 'The Sovereign exercises his opinion on the sentiments as well as capacity of his Ministers, and if, upon either, he judges them to be incompetent, or in any degree unfit, it is the prerogative and, with perfect loyalty let me add, the duty of the Crown to dismiss such ministers.' For 'the King cannot be required to take advice from men in whom he cannot confide, and, were there no other reason, a diminution of confidence is a sufficient ground for a change in his Majesty's councils.'" p. 211.

For further information upon the relations between the Sovereign and his Ministers, I may refer hon. gentlemen to pages 222, 223 and 230 of the same volume of Mr. Todd's work, and to page 404 of the second volume.

I should like, also, to call attention to certain portions of the British North America Act, which bear upon this subject, particularly Sections 11, 12, 63, 64, and 65, the third and last of which, so far as they relate to the question before the House, I shall read.

"63. The Executive Council of Ontario and of Quebec shall be composed of such persons as the Lieutenant Governor from time to time thinks fit."

"65. All powers, authorities, and functions which were or are before or at the Union vested in or exercisable by the respective Governors or Lieutenant Governors of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, or Canada, individually, shall, as far as the same are capable of being exercised after the Union in relation to the Government of Ontario and Quebec respectively, be vested in and shall or may be exercised by the Lieutenant Governors of Ontario and Quebec respectively, individually."

Then, in the Instructions to the present Governor-General, we find the following provision:—

"If, in any case, you see sufficient cause to dissent from the opinion of the major part, or of the whole of our Privy Council for our Dominion, it shall be competent for you to execute the powers and authorities vested in you by our Commission, and by these our Instructions, in opposition to such their opinion.

In his commission of appointment, the Governor-General is empowered "To exercise from time to time, as you may judge necessary, all powers lawfully belonging to us, in respect of assembling or proroguing, the Senate or the House of Commons of our said Dominion; and of dissolving the said House of Commons; and we do hereby give the like authority to the several Lieutenant Governors, for the time being, of the Provinces in our said Dominion, with respect to the Legislative Councils, or the Legislative or General Assemblies of those Provinces, respectively."

I think it is perfectly clear that the Lieutenant-Governors have the same powers as the Sovereign, and that the Sovereign has the power to dismiss her ministers, and to dissolve the representative branch of the Legislature whenever there is a difference of opinion between herself and her advisers on any important question. I have, perhaps to the weariness of the House, multiplied authorities upon this subject. I do not think however, that that is a mistake, because precedents, after all, are what we have to judge by in a question of this kind; a question into the discussion of which political feelings should not be imported. Bagehot, who is the only authority that has been cited by hon. gentlemen opposite, was the editor of the Economist, and as an authority on markets, no doubt stood very high; but he was not a lawyer nor a parliamentarian, he was simply a doctinaire, and his book has been made up from his essays in the Fortnightly Review. If, after weeks of research in the extensive library at their disposal, the leaders of the Opposition have not been able to find any better authority in support of their views, their case must be a poor one; and I am surprised that, under the circumstances, the hon. gentlemen opposite, and those who sympathise with them in the other branch of the Legislature, should have the courage to introduce even so mild a resolution as the one now before the House—seeing that there is nothing to base it upon. If their views were to prevail, and we were to have a new-fangled constitution introduced instead of the admirable system which we have been taught to believe in, and which has grown up through ages of effort and experience; at any time of commercial distress, or popular agitation, if there should arise a temporary desire for annexation, a House of Commons might be elected a majority of which might be in favor of that policy, or such a majority might be obtained by bribery; a pressure might be brought to bear on the Government in the Lower House to transfer this country over to the United States; and there would be no power to prevent the change. I think that it is only necessary to call attention to some of the possible results of such a theory to show how untenable it is; and I think it is very singular that such a theory should be advocated by gentlemen who profess to be leaders of the Conservative party. I may say that in the United States, which is supposed to be a much more democratic country than ours, they have taken great pains to provide that no one body shall govern exclusively. The President, or the Governor of a State, is to a great degree independent of both branches of the Legislature; and they again are more independent of each other than this Chamber is of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—The President and Governors are elected.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes; and the judiciary there, as a rule, are almost completely independent of the legislative power. In every country where liberty is permanent there must be more than one power; if there is only one body which exercises authority, there will either be tyranny, or freedom will be short-lived. I may say, however, that, after laying down this rather remarkable doctrine, and endorsing Mr. Bagehot, the leader of the Opposition in the other House put in the saving plea that the Governor, or the Sovereign might appeal to the country, if he were of the opinion that the majority in Parliament did not represent the majority in the country; but he took the ground that in that case the Ministry were not to be dismissed. No doubt the theory is correct, that the Executive has the right to send the representative branch of the Legislature to the electors, if it seems to be the fact that they do not represent the majority of the people; but I do not think that the remainder of the theory is correct, that the Ministry from whom the Governor differs, are those who are to go to the country. It is clear that if the Governor thinks that the majority of the people differ from his advisers, and he takes upon himself the responsibility of dismissing them, he must do it under the impression that the electors concur with him, but he takes his political life in his hands; because if his new ministers are not sustained at the polls, of course he is obliged to resign, as his position after that would be untenable. With reference to the supremacy of the Lower House, and to the line taken by gentlemen opposite, as regards the conduct of an Executive in dismissing a ministry who have a majority in the lower branch of the Legislature; I do not think that they weigh fully the meaning of their own words. What is the lower branch of the Legislature? The theory of the British Constitution is, that it is simply the electors; that the whole body of the electors cannot be present in Parliament to carry on their own business; and they select certain persons to do it for them. These representatives take part in the legislation, and look particularly after the imposition of taxation, and the finances; but, if they cease to represent the electors, then it seems to me to be only reasonable and proper that there should be some power to dissolve them; and that power must be the Executive. After the Assembly have sat for the greater part of their term, if the Lieutenant-Governor thinks that he has good reasons for sending them to the country, believing that their policy is injurious to the Province, and not in accordance with the people's wishes; it is absurd to talk of it as an outrage upon the liberties of the country that the electors should be thus afforded an opportunity of pronouncing upon the policy of the Government. I know that it has been stated here, and in another place, that changes were taking place in our constitution; that, although there were no outward signs of it, still changes had taken place; and that the old theory about the three powers in a Government was rather worn out. That view of things may do very well for a gentleman who sits down to write a book in his library, but when we come to put it into practical operation, I think it will hardly work. Men of great parliamentary experience, like May, do not lay down any such theory as that. Todd, who is an undoubtedly high authority, lays down a very different theory, and gives in support of it the utterances of the greatest statesmen of the present century; and I think this House ought to be the last body in Canada to depart from the established principles of the constitution without having some good precedent for doing so. Although we are, perhaps, supposed to acquire greater freedom with each succeeding year, our freedom "broadens slowly down from precedent to precedent," and is not guided or controlled by the visionary theories of such doctrinaires as Mr. Bagehot. It has been the impression that the Conservative party were rather disposed to increase or maintain to its fullest extent the prerogative of the Sovereign. That is supposed to be one of their characteristics; and another characteristic is their slowness to change. But now we find that the Liberal party, who are supposed to be more disposed to change than their opponents, and to hold a very different view about the Royal prerogative, are defending the prerogatives of the Crown, while the party who now rejoice in the name of Liberal-Conservatives, appear to be disposed to go as far in diminishing that power, and to make as rapid changes as the most extreme Radical could desire. I should suggest that their name should be changed, and that they should call themselves "Radical-Conservative" instead of "Liberal-Conservative."

I desire to call the attention of the House to the conduct of the Legislature of Nova Scotia in 1867, at the time of the union of the Provinces. The House of Assembly in Nova Scotia voted the Province into union with Canada at a time when the table of the House was loaded with petitions from all parts of the Province, praying that the matter should not be decided without an appeal to the people. The union was effected by the Legislature, however, and the old constitution under which the Assembly had been elected was destroyed, against the "well-understood wishes of the people." I am not now raising the question as to whether the House had the strict legal right to do so—but to borrow a distinction from our opponents here—the constitutional right they certainly had not; and I think it has been very generally recognized, even by those who were in favor of the Act at the time, that the Legislature of that day in Nova Scotia made a mistake. Supposing that the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, when that Act was about being completed, had stepped in and said: "This is a most important question, and one upon which the people should be consulted; I interpose my prerogative, and send you to the electors;" I think that the general feeling would have been that the Lieutenant-Governor had done his duty, and nothing more than his duty. My own opinion is, that it is very much to be regretted that he did not do so. I should like to call the attention of the House briefly to another case in Nova Scotia. In 1859, the House of Assembly in Nova Scotia expired by lapse of time. The Ministry had, I think, a majority of six or seven. The elections took place in the month of May; and when they were over it appeared that a majority of members, hostile to the Government, had been returned. The leader of the Opposition sent a memorial to the Lieutenant-Governor some time after the elections, when it appeared that the Government did not propose to resign, and called his attention to the fact that a majority of members opposed to the Administration had been elected, and suggesting at the same time an immediate meeting of Parliament. It was brought to the notice of the Lieutenant-Governor that twenty-nine members who had signed a memorial submitted to the Governor were hostile to the Government, and that only twenty-six members had been elected to support them. The Government of the day, which was a Conservative one, did not resign; and the Lieutenant-Governor, did not think that they were bound to resign or that he was bound to summon Parliament until its regular time for meeting in the month of February; when the Government were defeated. I shall refer hon. gentlemen to the Nova Scotia Assembly Journals of 1860, where they will find that the Government were defeated by a majority of four. They did not accept this defeat in the House of Assembly, and they requested the Lieutenant-Governor to dissolve the House, and to go to the country again, on the ground that certain members of the House were disqualified. The Governor represented very properly, that under the law existing in Nova Scotia, at the time, the question of the qualification or disqualification of members was decided by committees of the House, and that he had no means of deciding whether those gentlemen had been properly or improperly returned, and he would have to leave the question to the proper tribunal. Upon this the Government resigned. But the Conservative gentlemen, at that time, were not satisfied to let the matter rest just there. Mr. Johnston, the leader of the retiring Government, addressed a memorial to the Governor, Earl Mulgrave, which is recorded in the second appendix to the Journals of 1861. Mr. Johnston also wrote a letter on the matter to the Duke of Newcastle, at that time Secretary for the Colonies, in which he urged very strongly, the rights of the ex-ministers to a dissolution. Dr. Tupper, ex-Provincial Secretary, wrote another letter to the Duke, not on the spur of the moment, while the dismissed Government felt sore over their dismissal, but months afterwards, in October, 1860, when the Governor's course had been approved in England; and this is the way in which that hon. gentleman at that time spoke about the Lieutenant-Governor's refusal to dissolve the House, which had just met after a general election:—

Mr. Johnston, the leader of the Opposition, on behalf of a vast majority of the electors of this Province, as is shown by the poll books of the last General Election, memorialized your Grace in reference to the unconstitutional refusal of Lord Mulgrave to dissolve the Assembly upon the advice of the late Executive Council, and requested your interposition in favor of an appeal to the people."

Lord Mulgrave's view of the matter, cited by Dr. Tupper was as follows:

"The prerogative of the Crown, under any circumstances, to dissolve, is undoubted; but its exercise is a question, which must at all times demand the gravest deliberation; and in a case, such as is the present, of an assembly only just elected, when the opinion of the electors has been so recently expressed, I think should only be resorted to under the pressure of absolute necessity, either in consequence of the impossibility of carrying on the public business, or on account of the House itself having committed some act so grossly illegal and unconstitutional, as to render such a course unavoidable."

Dr. Tupper, however, was not satisfied with the reasons of Lord Mulgrave, and he goes on to find fault with him in exceedingly vigorous terms, some of which

Hon. Mr. Power.

I shall quote from his letter in order to show to what lengths Conservative gentlemen are disposed to go, when it pleases them, to carry a point.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The following are portions of the letter which I refer to:—

"A decision has been made which cannot fail to induce, in these colonies, the impression that what has been supposed to be self-government, is but a delusion and a snare.

"Can Your Grace, then, wonder that every man of independent mind has anxiously awaited this decision of the British Government, to learn whether we are entirely dependent for our rights and liberties upon the despotic acts of those you reward for services elsewhere, by appointing them to positions from which everybody with Colonial experience and information is excluded?"

And again:—

"The people of this Province have been content, my lord, to pay a salary of fifteen thousand dollars a year to a Governor sent from England, besides a large additional sum to keep up his establishment; while the State of Maine with twice our population, has the privilege of electing that officer from among her people, and pay him but fifteen hundred dollars."

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Who is the author of that letter?

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is Dr. Tupper's letter. Then he goes on—and you can see that there is a threat implied that if things are not made lovely for the Conservative party in Nova Scotia, something serious is going to happen:—

"Can such a condition of things be expected to give satisfaction, with the evidence forced upon us, that we have no rights worthy of a moment's consideration, when weighed against the interest or convenience of a gentleman who has been useful to the Imperial Cabinet before coming here?"

"Destitute of representation in the Parliament of Britain, with our most eminent men systematically excluded from the highest position in their own country, and for which their colonial experience and training eminently fit them, it is impossible that the free spirit of the inhabitants of British North America can fail soon to be aroused to the necessity of asserting their undoubted right, to have their country governed in accordance with the well understood wishes of the people."

"In conclusion, Your Grace will allow me to add that, should it prove true that the Colonial Office has determined to sustain the Lieutenant Governor in the unconstitutional course pursued by him, it will become necessary to lay the subject before the Imperial Parliament, and this country will then learn whether the time has arrived, when important constitutional changes have become indispensable for the acquisition of British institutions, as enjoyed in the parent state."

Now, I shall read two or three lines from the memorandum drawn up by the Executive Council with reference to that letter:—

"The Executive Council regret that a paper, conceived in so bad a spirit, and expressed in language so intemperate and unjust, should be addressed to the Colonial Secretary. But they are consoled by the reflection that His Grace knows something of Nova Scotia, and will not attribute ill-manners to the country, because one of its representatives happens to be indiscreet."

It is rather an extraordinary thing that in no part of this correspondence does the Governor lay down the view that he has not the right to dissolve Parliament when the dissolution is called for. It will be considered remarkable that the hon. gentleman who wrote the vigorous letter I have quoted, is the same gentleman who looks upon the recent exercise of the prerogative of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec as being exceedingly improper. It was, however, a noticeable fact, that that hon. gentleman did not take any part in the debate on the subject, though he certainly voted in support of the motion submitted by the leader of the Opposition. The British North America Act, I have shown, sets forth that the prerogatives of Lieutenant-Governors shall remain as they were previous to the Union; and I have given an instance of what the relations between the Executive and the Assembly were in Nova Scotia at that time. I would draw attention to two cases in New Brunswick, which are both referred to in this pamphlet of Mr. Todd's. One is the case of the Prohibitory Liquor Law, which was passed in 1865. It appears that this law was inoperative, and the Lieutenant-Governor suggested to the Ministry the propriety of a dissolution in order to take the sense of the people upon the question of repealing the Act; but they declined to accept his suggestion.

"Finally, the Lieutenant-Governor states that as he never contemplated a dissolution of the
Hon. Mr. Power.

Assembly without the concurrence of responsible advisers," he claimed that either the Executive Council should assume the responsibility for the issue of a proclamation of dissolution, or that they should retire and enable him to seek for other advisers, who would consent to this Act. As Ministers still demurred to either course, His Excellency directed the Provincial Secretary to prepare and countersign a proclamation dissolving the Assembly. His request was complied with, but immediately afterwards the Ministry resigned. The Governor requested them to retain office until their successors were appointed. In nine days he notified them that he had succeeded in forming a new Administration, who, agreeing with him in the necessity for an immediate dissolution of Parliament, were prepared to assume responsibility for the same." Todd, p. 17.

"In April, 1866, there was a change of ministry in New Brunswick under the following circumstances: At a general election in 1865, the expediency of a union of the British North American Colonies, upon terms agreed upon at a Conference of Delegates therefrom, held in Quebec, in October, 1864, was a test question; and a large majority of members was returned opposed to this project.

The Lieutenant-Governor (Mr. A. H. Gordon) was nevertheless of opinion that the earnest desire which the Imperial Government had expressed, in favor of the union, justified him in again recommending the question to the consideration of the Local Legislature; more especially as he believed that a vast change had recently taken place in the public sentiment on this question. Ministers differed with the Governor in this conclusion, and objected to the course he proposed to take. They reluctantly consented, however, to a less formal discussion of the union question, with a view to discover whether some basis of agreement, in accordance with the declared wishes of the Home Government, might not be found. At this juncture, the Legislative Council passed an Address to the Queen, in favor of the projected union, and presented the same to the Governor, for transmission to Her Majesty. In acknowledging the receipt of this Address, the Governor made use of language which his Ministers deemed to be inconsistent with their policy on this question, and they accordingly resigned; although, at the time, they were able to command a majority in the House of Assembly. His Excellency at once formed a new Ministry, who undertook to sustain his action in the matter." Todd, p. 18.

Those gentlemen resigned, because they found that the Governor was taking advice from parties outside the Ministry, and would not take their advice; and they did what every authority lays down a Ministry ought to do where the Sovereign and themselves differ--they resigned when the Sovereign persisted. This is a subject about which the hon. gentleman from Sunbury (Mr. Wilmot) who was one of the parties concerned in the matter, would be able to give us further details. We have thus in other provinces of the Dominion cases much stronger than that of Quebec; and in all those cases, the Colonial Office approved of the conduct of the Governors. There is no case, I think, where a Governor has been censured for dismissing a Ministry. The hon. gentleman who introduced this matter referred to Governor Eyre, of Jamaica, as a case in point. Governor Eyre's conduct was disapproved by the House of Commons and the Home Government, not on account of any difference between him and the Legislature, but because he was held to have put a number of persons to death without due course of law. It was not a constitutional question at all. Then the case of Governor Darling, also referred to by the leader of the Opposition, is, I think, a very strong one in favour of the view taken on this side of the House. At page 19 of Todd's pamphlet I find this case succinctly set forth as follows:—

“In 1865, the Assembly in the province of Victoria endeavoured to pass a Tariff, to which a majority in the Legislative Council was notoriously opposed, by tacking it to the annual Appropriation Bill. Being constitutionally debarred from amending a Bill of Supply, the Legislative Council ‘laid aside’ the measure. Whereupon the Governor (Sir Charles Darling) gave his sanction to Ministers obtaining a Vote of the Assembly authorizing the new Customs duties to be immediately enforced; and permitted the Ministry to borrow money from a Bank, for public uses, and to pay official salaries, but without the previous authority of an Act of Parliament. For this conduct Sir Charles Darling was severely reprimanded by the Colonial Secretary (Mr. Cardwell.) He was told that the Queen's Representative ‘is justified in deferring very largely to his constitutional advisers, in matters of policy and even of equity. But he is imperatively bound to withhold the Queen's authority from all or any of those manifestly unlawful proceedings by which one political party, or one member of the body politic, is occasionally tempted to endeavour to establish its pre-ponderance over another.’

Subsequently, Sir C. Darling was recalled, or dismissed, on the ground that he had not only sanctioned acts of his Advisers which were legally unjustifiable, but also had placed himself in a position ‘of personal antagonism towards almost all those whose antecedents point them out as most likely to be available to him in any change of Ministry.’

Mr. Secretary Cardwell's conduct, and his dispatches on this occasion, were discussed in the House of Commons, and elicited, ‘from every quarter, the warmest encomiums.’

Hon. Mr. Power.

In a debate in the House of Lords, on 8th May 1868, on matters growing out of this case, leading statesmen, on both sides of the House, averted to the constitutional position of a Colonial Governor, and to his duty to protect the Crown, if need be, against the proposals of his Ministers.”

Now, that is not exactly a precedent; but as far as it goes, it is a precedent for the views taken on this side. I have not investigated this subject nearly as fully as the hon. gentleman who has introduced this resolution. I know that days have been spent by hon. gentlemen opposite in preparing their case, before submitting the resolution to this House and the other branch of the Legislature. I venture to say, however, that we may search through English Constitutional history, and through the history of all the English Colonies in which Responsible Government exists, without finding a single case in which a Sovereign or Governor has been found fault with, because, when there was an important difference between him and his ministers, he dismissed them and dissolved the Legislature.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have pointed out several cases where there have been dismissals and dissolutions both in the history of England and in the history of the Colonies. In none of the Colonial cases has the conduct of the Governor been found fault with. There is just one other point which occurs in connection with the matter, and which has already been referred to, and that is, whether, supposing that the Governor dissolves the Legislature, he has to send to the country his old Ministry or a new Ministry. Now, I think that it will be found that there is no precedent for a Ministry which has a majority in the lower branch of the Legislature being sent to the country by the Crown. We have one case where a ministry, having a majority in the House of Commons, dissolved of their own accord and went to the country. That was the recent case of Mr. Gladstone's Ministry; but I think, as I have said, that it will not be found that, in a single instance has a ministry, having a majority in the lower branch of the Legislature, been sent to the country by the Governor. The uniform rule has been, where there has been a difference of opinion between the Governor and his advisers, that the Governor has got a new ministry, and that that ministry has gone to the country. I should be very much surprised if hon. gentlemen opposite were able to produce any instance where the other course had been followed. I have spoken at length upon the abstract question, which, after all, is the important point. As to the details of what has taken place in Quebec, it is hardly worth while to say a great deal; but I shall call attention to two or three matters in connection with this branch of the subject. It appears, from the correspondence on both sides, that for some time the relations between the Governor and his advisers were not satisfactory. It has been assumed by gentlemen on the other side of the House, that the Governor went to Quebec for the purpose of overthrowing the Ministry. There is no evidence of that in the correspondence before the House. I think it is a most undignified and unjustifiable course for any gentleman in this House to attribute any such improper motives to the Governor. It is very much to be regretted that we have no authoritative statement of the facts in this case. The statement of the Lieutenant-Governor on one side, and of his late Premier on the other, differ in no small degree. Not only have gentlemen on the opposite side of the House taken it for granted that the statement made by the ex-Minister is the correct one, but they go much further than that statement authorizes them, and imagine numbers of things which are not to be found in either of the Messages which have been laid before us. That is one of the evils consequent upon bringing up such a question here, at this time. We are not in a position to deal calmly or deliberately with it. The hon. Senator from Kingston laid great stress upon a passage in the despatch to the Governor-General, in which the Lieutenant-Governor says:—

“From the time I was, by Your Excellency, raised to the position I occupy at present, all my private relations with the members of my Cabinet, up to the time of their dismissal from office, were, I must admit, generally of an agreeable nature; but in those of an official character, with the Premier, I almost invariably felt that I did not enjoy that entire confidence, on his part, which is the chief element of a cordial understanding between the representative of the Crown and his advisers.”

The hon. gentleman, influenced very naturally by his own party feeling, thought that that meant that the Governor supposed that the Premier who gave him his confidence should have followed his advice; but I take it to have meant something altogether different. I may be wrong; but I think it highly probable that the leader of the Opposition is mistaken. What the Governor meant is, that the Premier did not repose that implicit confidence in him—did not point out the policy of the Government, did not disclose their measures to him as fully—as he thought they should. I think that certainly a more reasonable and charitable view to take. There is no evidence that the Governor wished to rule himself. Any one who will read the life of the Prince Consort, or study the authorities on this subject, will see that the Sovereign or the representative of the Sovereign, has a right to be consulted on all important measures. Now, the case of the appointment of a municipal councillor at Montmagny has been treated as a very trifling matter. It seems to me that although it was not in itself a very important thing, it was of a rather serious character, or might have been very serious in its results. The Government induced the Governor to do an illegal act, an act which they themselves afterwards practically admitted to be illegal.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—Will the hon. gentleman take it upon himself to declare that it was an illegal act?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I take it, on the responsibility of the information we get in this correspondence, to have been an illegal act. I presume that the fact that the Attorney-General, who had a very strong opinion at the first, yielded to the view taken by the Lieutenant-Governor, was evidence that the act was not legal.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—It is stated in Mr. DeBoucherville's memorandum that, although the Attorney General continued in his opinion, still, as a matter of courtesy, the Government yielded.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That places the Government in an awkward dilemma. In the matter of the appointment of the Councillor of Montmagny, either the Ministers believed that this officer was illegally appointed, or that he was legally appointed. If they believed that he was legally appointed they did wrong in allowing him to be removed. I think they ought to have looked after the rights of the subject as well as after the feelings of the Executive. I do not propose to say anything about the other matters of difference between the Governor and his Council, except the Railway Bill. Now, it is admitted, practically, by Mr. DeBoucherville, that this Railway Bill, which was a most important measure, was never brought properly before the Lieutenant-Governor; and I may here repeat that it is laid down by Todd, and other authorities, that the Government are bound to submit all important measures to the Sovereign before they are introduced; and that is the way in which the exercise of the veto power has fallen into desuetude. The exercise of the veto power would be an inconvenience; and it is avoided by this provision. There were two or three measures of an important character; and this Railway Bill was one of particular importance, and one which especially required the approval of the Governor before its introduction. It has been said that the Governor, if he chose, might have seen from the Minutes of Proceedings of the House of Assembly the progress this measure was making in the Legislature. The hon. gentlemen who take that ground must remember that it is looked upon as a breach of privilege for the Sovereign or his representative, to take any cognizance of matters transpiring in the Legislature which do not come before him officially; and this Bill never did come before the Governor in a proper manner. It is just one of those measures which peculiarly require the approval of the Governor. It proposed to impose heavy burdens upon certain municipalities, and it was, besides, a case of ex post facto legislation. There had been contracts made between the Legislature—one may put it roughly in that way—and certain municipalities of the Province of Quebec. Those contracts provided that on certain conditions the municipalities might grant certain sums of money to aid the railways. The conditions on which the grants were contingent had not been fully carried out; and then the Legislature, one of the parties to the contract, undertook to step in and to say, by this measure, that, although they had not performed their part of the contract, the other parties to it were obliged to carry out their portion. Now, that was a measure of a very objectionable character. It took away from those municipalities their right to go before the Judges and have the question decided. In the United States, amongst other safeguards against improper legislation, they have for the whole country and for each individual State, a constitution which cannot be over-ridden by the Legislature; and we find in every one of those constitutions a provision that the Legislature shall pass no ex post facto law, nor any law affecting the validity of contracts. Here we have a measure of that obnoxious character, introduced without the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor, and never sanctioned by him. It will be very hard for any one to persuade the electors of Quebec that, in insisting that such a measure as that should be submitted to them, the Lieutenant-Governor has done something deserving of disapproval—something, as was said in another place, which would hand his name down to everlasting infamy. It has been said that the submission of this question to the people will have a bad effect. If the Governor is right—as I hold he is—in dissolving the House, then the appeal to the electors cannot have a bad effect either in the Province of Quebec or elsewhere. The case which recently occurred in the Colony of Victoria, has been cited by the hon. gentleman from Kingston; and he read an extract from the Saturday Review to show that Sir George Bowen's course in that crisis was approved of in England. The full details of the case have not yet been received: the information has been conveyed chiefly by telegrams; and it can hardly be quoted as a precedent; but I should like to read from another English paper, which, I think, the hon. Senator should regard as a better authority than the Saturday Review, and which, I believe, is recognized as the organ of the Conservative Party in England. I find the following in the London Standard of March 20th:—

“The only points deserving of consideration in this country are short, simple, and intelligible. Was Mr. Berry justified in using his power, as Premier, to coerce the Council by sudden, sweeping and startling dismissals of judicial officers, and other public servants of long standing? And was Sir George Bowen justified not only in sanctioning this revolutionary action, but in laying down the principle that, as a constitutional ruler, he had no choice save to follow the 'advice' of his responsible Ministers? These are really very plain questions, upon which intelligent and impartial persons can form opinions for themselves, without needing any special knowledge of Colonial politics. It is evident that if Mr. Berry's conduct be recognized as consistent with constitutional principles, and if Sir George Bowen's docile attitude be accepted as the type of a Colonial Governor's duty, we must modify all our pre-existing notions of Constitutional Monarchy, as practised in this country and her dependencies, and as fortified by the opinions of the most eminent statesmen, dead and living, of both parties. Sir George Bowen has justified his acquiescence in the measures already carried out, by the statement of the broad principle that he is bound to follow the advice of his responsible Ministers; and if this be so, he will, no doubt, consider himself authorized to sign orders for disbanded the police and opening the gaols, should Mr. Berry think it right to recommend those acts of retaliation upon the criminals who have delayed the enactment of the Payment of Members Bill. Does Sir George Bowen really agree with Mr. Berry? If he does, his recall is inevitable. If he does not, why should he surrender that right of exercising his judgment, in reference to executive business, which writers on Constitutional law have always claimed for the British Crown, and which has frequently been enforced by British Sovereigns?"

The Standard, in speaking that way, agrees with the Pull Mall Gazette and almost all the leading papers of England. The hon. Senator on this side of the House who seconded the resolution (Hon. Mr. Bellerose) referred to certain declarations as to liberty made by Mr. Letellier when he was a member of this House, and the conclusion drawn by the hon. Senator was that the Lieutenant-Governor did not believe in his own expressed opinions as to liberty. I think Mr. Letellier has shown the greatest love of liberty by not allowing the majority in the Legislature to override the will of the people, and to permanently injure the Province, without giving the electors a chance to express their opinion on the matter. The hon. Senator from Richmond made a speech, which, as far as I can remember, did not contain a single reference to any authority. It was made up chiefly of rather uncharitable suggestions as to the motives which actuated the Lieutenant-Governor. For instance, he said, amongst other things, that he would not assert that the Lieutenant-Governor had set a trap for his Ministers.

Hon. Mr. Power.

It reminded me of the facetious advice, "Don't nail his ears to the pump!" It implied very strongly indeed that he had set such a trap. The hon. Senator from Montreal (Mr. Trudel) told us that Mr. Letellier had been appointed for the purpose of destroying the Ministry. That also was a statement not justified by the facts.

The resolution before the House does not show any sufficient reason for interfering in the domestic affairs of the Province of Quebec. It is a very mild resolution, like the motion made in the other House. Now, supposing that this resolution were adopted, and it were well founded, what would be the consequence? Simply nothing. If it is to be of any use, it should go a little further, and state that the Lieutenant-Governor should be recalled, or make some decided recommendation. It should censure the Governor if he has done anything wrong; and if he has done nothing wrong, this House should not interfere in the matter at all. I think this is not the most suitable time or place for introducing such a resolution as this. From the speeches made on both sides of the House, I think it is manifest that we are a great deal too near, both in time and space, to the scene of action in the Province of Quebec, to judge as calmly and deliberately as we should in order that our judgment should be of any value. There can be no doubt that the Governor acted within the sphere of his constitutional power. Whether his action was wise or not, is another question, with which, I think, we have nothing to do. In the interests of the Dominion, I think any interference with the local affairs of the Provinces by this Parliament is to be deprecated, because, as was said on the other side, one of those days it may be the turn of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, or some other Province, to be involved in some such difficulty as this; and the interference of this Parliament could have no good effect. It should be our duty to uphold the authority of the Lieutenant Governor, if we had any duty at all to perform in this matter. This resolution proposes a censure, for which there is no precedent or authority to be found anywhere; and it proposes, also, though less directly, to interfere with the right of the people of Quebec to settle this question to suit themselves.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It seems to me that, when hon. gentlemen opposite come to think over the matter, if they could only separate themselves from the party feelings that are necessarily involved in a case of this kind, they would see how extremely unwise, improper, and decidedly unconstitutional it is, on the part of this House, to interfere, in any way, with the elections now going on in the Province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—In rising to speak on this question, I hope I shall not unnecessarily occupy the time of the House. I am struck by some singular remarks made a moment ago by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat. He lays down the singular proposition that it would be a breach of privilege for the representative of the Sovereign at Quebec, to take notice of what is done or passing in the Legislature, except what is officially communicated to him. Such a proposition is so inconsistent even with the complaint of the Lieutenant-Governor, that I cannot conceive that my hon. friend is serious when he advances it. Day after day the Lieutenant-Governor was supplied with copies of the votes, minutes and proceedings, orders of the day, and measures of the Legislature; he had every opportunity, officially, day by day, to make himself acquainted with the course of events, and doubtless he knew everything, and to say that he must ignore all this until he is officially notified, is to assert what is simply absurd and contrary to common sense, reason and practice.

Hon. Mr. POWER—See May, page 28.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I cannot see the application. The King was supposed to be deaf to debates, but such was merely a fiction. He generally knew and heard too much. The reign of George III should not be quoted from now, in these days of popular rights and responsible government. The hon. Senator thinks it would be unwise for this body to pass an opinion on the subject now before us. Mr. Letellier must have felt his act was so unprecedented, and apparently such an outrage on responsible government, that it was necessary for him to explain his position to Earl Duferin, and those explanations, together with the replies of the DeBoucherville Government, have been laid before us by message and address from His Excellency; yet we are asked to ignore this important question. Evidently the intention of the Governor-General was that we should not be restrained from expressing an opinion upon the subject, and it is strange doctrine to say that this Parliament should not condemn the improper acts of its own commissioned officer. I can concur in the view of the hon. Senator from Halifax, that there is no precedent for a matter of this kind. I believe there is none, because such a tyrannical exercise of the prerogative and right of the Crown, was never before heard of. Here we find a Government supported by two-thirds of the House of Assembly, and almost unanimously by the Legislative Council, dismissed upon a simple question of legislation, which had passed both Houses, and which has since been sanctioned and approved of by their successors, and even by the Lieutenant-Governor himself, who refers it for the pleasure of His Excellency. The hon. gentleman may search English history in vain, even as far back as the reign of the Stuarts, for a precedent to justify such a despotic act. It is painful to witness the manner in which the hon. Secretary of State and his supporters have endeavored to gloss over this whole matter. Their insincerity has been marked and unmistakeable. I contend that the prerogative of the Crown is quite different from the constitutional right of the Crown. An act of the Crown might be sustained in a court of law as the legal prerogative of the Crown. Yet, in its exercise it might be very unconstitutional. The prerogative of the Crown, we find, can, as in this case, be exercised in the most unconstitutional way. You can find no case, even in the reign of George the Third, where a Ministry has been dismissed in consequence of its legislation. The difficulty and dissension have nearly always arisen in the exercise of administrative powers. The hon. Senator from Halifax has cited several precedents, not one of which, I unhesitatingly assert, meets the case before us. The right to dissolve Parliament is one thing, and the right to dismiss a Ministry having the confidence of both branches of the Legislature, is another.

other. Except in the reign of George the Third, whose tyrannical exercise of the prerogative of the Crown independent of the advice of his Ministers, resulted in the loss of the American colonies, there are no precedents in the history of parliamentary government for the despotic act of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, and if he, or any other Lieutenant-Governor, were allowed to continue in such a course unchecked, and the people's liberties rudely trampled on by a partizan Governor, the most deplorable consequences might follow. The prerogative of the Crown, in the abstract, we do not deny, but we have ample authorities to show, that it dare not with impunity or safety to the Crown itself, be exercised tyrannically; that the prerogative itself must be advised and directed by the Ministry which represents the people, and cannot be exercised in an arbitrary and capricious manner. It is, happily, true, that under our glorious Constitution, the King reigns, but it is equally true that the Ministers govern, and we say "the King can do no wrong," because he acts upon the advice of his Ministers, who are alone responsible. He may, and does confer with and advise them, and give his opinion, but he carries out their policy and supports their views, not his own, and if the King's prerogative is misused, the Ministers are condemned, not the King. Like George the Third, we find Mr. Letellier determined not only to reign, but to govern, with strong party prejudices such as he possessed, and could not disguise. Anxious, no doubt, to surround himself with his own friends and partizans, we find him, I say, tyrannically exercising the sovereign power and insisting that he shall rule, and the Government of the day must submit to him. I think the hon. Senator from Kingston, has, by numerous and reliable authorities, proved incontrovertibly what we all approve and agree to, that the representative of the Sovereign should hold himself above party and administer the Government on the advice of his Ministers. The Lieutenant Governor complains that he had not the confidence of his Ministers. Such might have been required under the feudal system at the times of the Plantagenets, when the wish of the Monarch was the first consideration. That is exactly what the ambitious, jealous and arbitrary George the Third complained of. They—the Lieutenant-Governor and George III—agree exactly in their wish to reverse the order of things. That they should direct the policy and legislation of their Ministers. They seemed to think that the Ministry should be advised by the Crown instead of the Crown being advised by the Ministry, and if the Ministry did not submit, they should be suddenly thwarted opposed and dismissed. An attempt has been made to justify the act of the Lieutenant-Governor on the ground that the legislation to which he objected would have placed a heavy burden on the people. Yet, strange to say, he tacitly consented to and saw that legislation go on, the bills passing daily before him, without warning or suggesting anything, and then, after all is done, and the legislation is completed with his seeming approval, he suddenly turns upon them and dismisses them. It has been clearly shown that the subsidies to which the legislation related had been granted two years before, and the policy of the Ministry not only seemed to have the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor, but previously had received the sanction of the people at the general election. There was no new burden placed upon the people, and the wisdom of the legislation is admitted by the fact, that it has the approval of the new Ministry chosen by the Lieutenant-Governor, and has been adopted by the new Ministry and sanctioned by the Lieutenant-Governor himself, who only reserves it for the pleasure of His Excellency the Governor-General. It has been contended, that in view of the near approach of the elections in Quebec, this House should not express an opinion upon the matter. I say this is a constitutional question with which we have a right to deal, especially when it is brought before us by His Excellency. I believe this House is peculiarly adapted for discussing such questions, being free from party bias to a large extent, and from the motives which necessarily influence the other branch of the Legislature. We are not here under the control of party leaders, and we are free to act under a sense of the duty we owe alike to the country and to the crown—to the people and to the Sovereign—to preserve the liberties of the people and to guard and protect the Constitution under which we live. The hon. Secretary of State failed to express an opinion as to whether the act of the Lieutenant-Governor was wise or unwise, constitutional or unconstitutional, and his reticence is tantamount to condemnation of the Lieutenant-Governor. The hon. gentleman talked of the English constitution and of its lex non scripta, but he surely did not wish to convey the idea that the Crown by our British North America Act granted and conveyed greater powers than what the Crown itself possessed. He surely will not contend that the 63rd clause gives power to dismiss a Ministry; it simply declares how the Executive Council shall be composed in Ontario and Quebec. And the 65th and 66th clauses of the British North America Act leave not the slightest doubt as to the powers, authorities, functions and duty of the Lieutenant-Governors. Those clauses provide that those powers shall be exercised "with the advice or with the advice and consent of" or in conjunction with the respective "Executive Councils." These clauses plainly show that Lieutenant-Governors must be governed by the advice of their Ministers, and the 66th clause says: "The provisions of this Act referring to the Lieutenant-Governors-in-Council shall be construed as referring to the Lieutenant-Governors of the Provinces, acting by and with the advice of the Executive Council thereof."

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Are responsible Ministers to be reduced to the level of mere lacqueys? Is the Lieutenant-Governor to be guided by the advice of his responsible Ministers having the confidence of both Houses of Parliament? If not, then away goes responsible government. Ministers become a mere form, and responsible government worse than a farce. If we have no right to question the conduct of a Lieutenant-Governor, where else does that right rest? The Government, I contend, that appoints a Lieutenant-Governor is in some measure responsible for his acts, and silence may endorse his acts. He is a commissioned officer to administer the law, and under the 59th section of the "British North America Act" he shall hold office only during the pleasure of the Governor-General, and can be removed from office at any time on cause assigned. We are told by the Secretary of State that we are not to be governed by British precedents, but by the British North America Act. I invite hon. gentlemen's attention to that Act, to the very first page of it, which shows that these Provinces were to continue to be governed by British principles. The very first clause of the preamble to the British North America Act declares that this country must be governed by the principles of constitutional government as it exists in England. The words are, "with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom." It cannot be admitted for a moment that the Lieutenant-Governor possesses greater powers than the Crown or the Governor-General, appointed directly by the Crown, enjoys. The hon. Secretary of State evidently knew and felt the force of the constitutional principles as exercised as well as enjoyed everywhere by British subjects under the British flag, as well as the arguments of my hon. friend from Kingston, and the precedents and authorities cited by him. He had to fall back, as I have already shown, upon an isolated section of the British North America Act, which, he asserted, seemed to give the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec power to call to his council anybody he pleased. That is all right on the forming of a new Ministry, but we must read the Act as a whole, and read in that way, and regarded in that light, it gives no such power as that which has been exercised by the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, to any representative of the Sovereign. I shall not say one word with regard to the capacity and fitness of the late Ministry to govern the Province. The hon. Secretary of State said we ought not to discuss this question, and yet he was the very first to allege that the Quebec Government were corrupt and extravagant, that they were over-taxing the people, and, therefore, that the Lieutenant-Governor was justified in exercising his prerogative. When my hon. friend spoke in that strain I fancied he forgot for the moment the Province of Quebec, and was thinking of the disastrous position of affairs nearer home; of his own incapacity, by which I mean the unfitness of his colleagues for the offices which they fill, of the extravagance and corruption apparent in the public affairs of the Dominion under the administration of the present Government. He talks about debt; is not our indebtedness rapidly increasing? He talks about extravagance; do not the inquiries into the public expenditures of the Dominion daily show that what is worse than extravagance is steadily increasing? He talks about financial difficulties; have we not impaired our credit, and are we not loaded down with annual deficits? He talks about increasing taxation; has not ours been increased since the advent of the present Government to power? If the Lieutenant-Governor for such reasons would have been justified in dismissing his Ministry, is it not the duty of the Governor-General to dismiss the Administration whose incapacity, waste, and extravagance, bordering on corruption, have so seriously impaired the prosperity of the Dominion? The hon. Senator from New Brunswick (Mr. McClelan) cited the case of Governor Gordon as a precedent for the act of Mr. Letellier. The hon. gentleman and the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries were members of the Government which was at that time forced to resign, and they, with the present Speaker of the House of Commons, and others, and their organs, denounced the conduct of the Governor in unmeasured terms. Even to this day they declare his conduct was guilty of moral turpitude. Even to this day they declare his conduct was brutal, tyrannical, and wholly unconstitutional. They have never retracted it, yet they are bold enough to cite that case as a precedent. Their position then was that the Government, having a majority in the Lower House, ought to retain office. But there was discord between the two branches of the Legislature, and a great Imperial measure, on which Ontario, Quebec, and Nova Scotia had pronounced favorably, was before the public. The Administration of the day in New Brunswick interfered with the success of that Imperial measure, and, under the circumstances, Governor Gordon did not dismiss them—but they resigned, a new Ministry was formed, and the Legislature dissolved. The conduct of the Governor was sustained at the polls, and met with the approval of the Sovereign. But here is a case in which no Imperial policy was involved, and not of resignation, but of dismissal of a Ministry with large majorities in both Houses, and the formation of a Ministry from a minority who have been given all the influence and power of the

Hon. Mr. Kaulbach,

Hon. Mr. Kaulbach.

Government to aid them in the coming elections. The two cases are so dissimilar that I wonder my hon. friend from Howell attempts to draw a parallel between them. It only further shows to what extremes they are driven to excuse the act of the Lieutenant-Governor.

At six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH resumed his speech. He said:—At recess I was about referring to the remarks of my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island. In his efforts to sustain the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, he was forced to go back a century or more for precedents. Not satisfied even with the prerogative which the Stuarts exercised and strained so far that it snapped asunder, and for which they were held personally responsible, and resulted, in one instance, in the King losing his head, and, in another, in the King losing his crown, and their families being proscribed forever; he had, like others, to find precedents in the exceptional reign of George III. If he had gone farther back to the time of William III, he would have found the power was in the people, by Ministers responsible to them only and to Parliament for their acts. If he had taken extracts from May's Constitutional History, he would have found that author throughout has laid down the doctrine that, except in the reign of George III, of the twenty years of "King's Craft," and of the Stuarts, the Parliament has ruled since the days of the Plantagenets, and the Crown has been subject to the advice of its Ministers, representing a majority in Parliament. The hon. gentleman would have found few, if any, cases in which the Sovereign had exercised the prerogative of dismissing his advisers, unless it was in some matter vitally affecting not merely the power of the Crown, but the very existence of the Crown itself. Let us turn to the reign of William III, and we find the theory of Ministerial responsibility reduced to practice. May says of that reign:—

"The Government of the State was conducted, throughout all its departments, by Ministers responsible to Parliament for every act of their administration, without whose advice no act could be done, who could be dismissed for incapacity or failure, and impeached for political crimes; and who resigned when their advice was disregarded by the Crown, or their policy disapproved by Parliament. With Ministers thus responsible "the King could do no wrong." If the prerogative was strained, Ministers were condemned and not the King. If the people cried out against the Government instead of a revolution, there was merely a change of Ministry. Instead of dangerous conflicts between the Crown and Parliament, there succeeded struggles between rival parties for parliamentary majorities; and the successful party wielded all the power of the State. Upon Ministers, therefore, devolved the entire burthen of public affairs; they relieved the Crown of its cares and perils, but, at the same time, they appropriated nearly all its authority. The King reigned, but his Ministers governed."

That principle of Ministerial responsibility was known and recognized as far back as the seventeenth century. Although the King was the head and reigned, the people's rights were to govern through the Ministry. My hon. friend, in order to find a case of dismissal, went back to 1784, to the time of Pitt's Government, and to 1807, when another great constitutional question was pending. But if he had given us the whole of that he would have found that the House of Lords were opposed to the representative body; that they were not in harmony with the House of Commons, and had defeated them upon the Indian Bill. The Crown did not venture to dismiss the Ministry until they had been defeated in the House of Lords, upon that Bill being introduced by Mr. Fox. With the permission of the House I will read from May's edition of 1871, page 147-8, to justify my review of the cases given by my friend, (Mr. Haythorne):—

"In 1784, when George III. had determined to crush the coalition Ministry, he did not venture to dismiss them, until they had been defeated in the House of Lords upon Mr. Fox's Indian Bill. And again, in 1807, the Ministers were at issue with the King upon a grave constitutional question, before he proceeded to form another Ministry. But here it was not directly alleged that the Ministers had lost the confidence of the King; and so little could it be affirmed that they had lost the confidence of Parliament, that an immediate dissolution was counselled by the new Administration. The act of the King bore too much the impress of his personal will, and too little of those reasons of State policy by which it should have been prompted; but its policy was so signal as to throw into the shade its unconstitutional character.

ter. But to resort to a similar expedient, when no danger threatened the State, merely for the purpose of concerting ministerial arrangements and party combinations—if justifiable on other grounds,—could scarcely be defended on the plea of precedent."

Therefore, even in the case of 1784, condemned by many writers, and entirely reprobated as it is by May, George III. would not dismiss his Ministers until such time as they were signally defeated on the Indian Bill introduced by Fox. That is the case which my hon. friend lays the greatest stress upon as a precedent, yet, not as a justification for the tyrannical conduct of Mr. Letellier. I will do the hon. gentleman the justice of saying he did not, after all, justify or concur in the action of the Crown in that regard. I should be sorry if he had done so, for, with his strong party feelings, there are mingled high-toned sentiments of right and duty which we all respect, and it would be a sad blow to liberty and responsible government in his Island should he attempt to reign as a despot, when he does, as he may yet do, fill as prominent a position in the Province from which he comes as Mr. Letellier now occupies in Quebec. Then my hon. friend took up the case of Sir Bartle Frere in the Cape of Good Hope, and endeavored to draw from it a precedent for the action of Mr. Letellier. But there is, and my hon. friend must have known that there is, a wide difference between the two cases. In the one, the colony was in danger of being overrun by savages. The Governor differed with his council as to who should command the defence force. It was a question who should command the forces, whether it should be in the hands of the regular military, or in the hands of the Colonial authorities. That was a matter peculiarly and thoroughly the prerogative of the Crown and the functions belonging directly to the Crown—because the Crown alone can call out the military, although the money must be voted by Parliament—that the Governor was clearly justified in maintaining the functions and dignity of the Crown inviolate in the course he pursued. I am sure that case also cannot be fairly regarded as a precedent for the action of Mr. Letellier, and it can be safely affirmed that there is no precedent for his conduct. I was impressed with the remarkable self-assurance of my hon. friend from Halifax, who, with that becoming modesty which characterizes him, compared his own speech with the speeches of the leaders of the Opposition in both Houses, and took to himself the credit—and I believe he was perfectly sincere in his own belief—of having all the authorities and precedents on his side, and of having the best of the argument all through. He not only made that invidious comparison, but also showed, or at least alleged, that he had prepared his case in two hours, while the leaders of the Opposition had been engaged for several days, to his own knowledge, in collecting the information furnished in their speeches. I think it would have been better, after all, if the hon. gentleman had taken more time in preparing and condensing his subject, and perhaps he might have found better precedents. I never saw a more signal failure to bring conviction to the House. It was no fault of his; he evidently did all he could, but his precedents were all at fault. He showed us that several dissolutions had taken place under peculiar circumstances, but he failed to find one where, upon a question of legislation, when both branches of Parliament were strongly in favor of it, and supporting the Government of the day, that the representative of the Sovereign took it upon himself to dismiss the Ministry. I say it, after careful investigation, he can find no writer of English constitutional history who shows a case similar to that which is now under discussion—a case in which the government of the day, supported by a two-thirds majority in the Lower House, opposed by only a few members of the Upper House, enjoying the confidence of the Legislature and of the people for ten years, with their legislation approved of by both Houses, dismissed summarily and a Ministry from the minority called in to take their places and an appeal to the people made under such circumstances. If any hon. gentleman can show us a precedent for anything like that, I should like to hear it. George III refused to take the advice of his Ministers, and his very first Speech from the Throne when he assumed the Crown of England, was prepared by himself and Lord Bute, and delivered without consultation with any of his responsible advisers. When he commenced his career in such a despotic manner, without the advice of his Cabinet Council, and in a manner unknown under our system of government, and which only a despot would use, what could have been expected from him in later years? He was jealous of every other power but his own. He claimed all power in himself, disregarded the counsels of his Ministry and his duties as a constitutional monarch, and claimed to be paramount and beyond the representatives of the people. It is only in his case that anything approaching a precedent can be found for the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. Wherever the hon. Senator finds that principle as practised in the reign of George III referred to in May, he will find on the next page the condemnation of it, showing it was wholly contrary to the precedent established by William III; showing that it was tyrannical and injurious to the nation, and by means of which England lost her prestige, as well as her American colonies. I will read in support of that view of the conduct of George III from pages 51, 13, 55 and 59 of May:—

“It was not the mere rumor of the streets that the King was his own Minister; the fatal truth was evident in every circumstance of the war carried on against America and the West Indies. It was the King's object not merely to supplant one party, and establish another in its place, but to create a new party, faithful to himself, regarding his personal wishes, carrying out his policy and dependent on his will. This ‘influence behind the throne’ was denounced by all the leading statesmen of the time—by Mr. Grenville, Lord Chatham, the Marquis of Rockingham, the Duke of Bedford, and Mr. Bourke. The Marquis of Rockingham described the system of Government pursued since the commencement of the reign as a ‘a prospective system’—a system of favoritism and secret influence. Mr. Fox imputed all the defeats and disasters of the American war to the influence of the Crown. But what has been the result of 20 years of King's Craft? Whenever the King's personal influence had been the greatest, then had been the fiercest turbulence and discord among the people, the most signal failures in the measures of the Government, and the heaviest disasters to the State.”

This is the reign from which we find the supporters of Mr. Letellier have chiefly drawn their precedents, and supported their arguments, and yet with all the tyranny and abuse of the power of the Crown which mark that reign, the hon. gentleman from Halifax has failed to show us such a gross case of the exercise of the prerogative as was lately exercised in the Province of Quebec. That hon. gentleman at last came down to the case of Lord Mulgrave at Halifax. When we come to look at that instance we find the facts to be as follow: The Governor says "I have the prerogative of the Crown, but I use that prerogative under the direction and advice of the majority of the people, as represented in Parliament." He did not say that he would go back of that and see whether the Legislature represented the majority of the people or not. Seeing the Liberal party had four of a majority, although it was strongly questionable whether that majority was legal or not, he clearly laid down the principle that he was not to consider such a question, but was bound to submit to the voice of the majority of the people, as represented in the Legislature. If the hon. Senator takes that case as a precedent, he signally fails in justifying the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec. The hon. Senator also referred to Todd in support of his view of this question. I dare say, if I had time to look through that author, I would find—as in the case of May—that where such precedents are shown, they are condemned, and my friend must know that the same author has lately written a pamphlet condemnatory of the action of the Lieutenant-Governor. If the conduct of Mr. Letellier is sustained, it reduces the Ministry to the mere servant of the Lieutenant-Governor. The whole power is taken from Parliament. Yet, we are told, although he is a commissioned officer of this Parliament, we should not, after the question is brought before us in a legitimate way for our consideration, say anything about it, but that we must leave it to the people. Such a course would be puerile in the extreme. Some of the most important measures, not only in England, but in this country, have been introduced in advance of the people and public opinion, and under such circumstances, if the Sovereign had taken the high-handed course of dismissing the Ministry and dissolving Parliament, it would have endangered such legislation as the Corn Laws and other great measures, and proved detrimental to the best interests of the people. But in this case which we are now considering, we find the Province of Quebec put to the expense of forty or fifty thousand dollars for a general election, which must be followed by an extra Session of the Legislature, at the cost of a hundred thousand more; and all this loss, with the hundreds of thousands of dollars lost by the delay in constructing the railway, is sustained by the people through the tyrannical action of the Lieutenant-Governor. The very act for which he condemned his Ministry has been adopted by their successors and by himself, reserved only for the pleasure of His Excellency. I say, under such circumstances, we would be recreant to our duty if we allowed such an unconstitutional precedent to be established for Lieutenant-Governors in the future, which would be destructive to responsible government in this country. I will once more and for the last time, refer to May, on pages 162-3, showing the influence of the Crown and the wise exercise of prerogative from the beginning and during the reign of Her Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria:—

"From this time no question has arisen concerning the exercise of the prerogative or influence of the Crown, which calls for notice. Both have been exercised wisely, justly and in the true spirit of the Constitution. Ministers enjoying the confidence of Parliament, have never claimed in vain the confidence of the Crown. Their measures have never been thwarted by secret influence and irresponsible advice. Their policy has been directed by Parliament and public opinion, and not by the will of the Sovereign, or the intrigues of the Court. Vast as is the power of the Crown, it has been exercised, throughout the present reign, by the advice of responsible Ministers in a constitutional manner and for legitimate objects. It has been held in trust as it were, for the benefit of the people. Hence it has ceased to excite either the jealousy of rival parties, or popular discontents. This judicious exercise of the royal authority, while it has conducted to the good government of the State has sustained the moral influence of the Crown; and the devoted loyalty of a free people, which Her Majesty's personal virtues have merited, has never been disturbed by the voice of faction."

How much better it would have been for the Lieutenant-Governor and the people of Quebec, had this noble example of our beloved Queen been followed. If the resolution now before us is not adopted, every Lieutenant-Governor might consider himself beyond the control of those who appointed him. We have a right to consider and it is our duty now to consider what has precipitated the election in Quebec, whether it was constitutionally brought about, or whether it was a violent abuse of the executive prerogative, and an attempt to disgrace a Ministry strong in the affection of the people; whether an outrage on Parliament should be shielded by the Crown—acts which the Crown itself in our day would not dare to exercise. The right of representative majorities is a right that the people will not surrender. Governors must be made to know and understand that the safeguards that surround our Constitution cannot be trifled with, and that they must be advised by those to whom the people have entrusted their rights and liberties. If Governor Letellier had sufficient reason to believe that his Ministry had forfeited the confidence of the people he should have requested a dissolution. But in taking the unprecedented course of dismissal, he arrogated to himself powers not his own, and took to himself a Ministry from the minority who never had and were not likely to have, the confidence of the Legislature. Thus he violated in the most high-handed and arbitrary manner the rights and liberties of the people secured to them under responsible government.

Hon. Mr. FABRE—It must strike the impartial hearer that on this question both parties have somewhat changed their relative positions. One would think, at first sight, that we are the Conservatives and that our opponents are the Liberals. Unfaithful to their principles, the Conservatives are trying their best to restrict the power of the Crown, which we Liberals are called to defend. We are not accustomed, either here or elsewhere, to see the Conservatives uphold with such vigor the rights of the people. It cannot be disputed that if in England to-day the doctrine set forth by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Campbell) is followed, it is not due to the Conservatives, who have at all times struggled against any restriction being put to the power of the Crown. Nor has it been different in this country, and if to-day we enjoy responsible government, it is not due certainly to the Conservatives of old times. They battled to the last to build on this continent the old fabric of privileges that was falling to pieces in Great Britain. They have long tried to establish here a kind of administrative aristocracy, and to put the people under the yoke of despotic governors and of petty aristocrats. When my hon. friend from Arichat (Mr. Miller) speaks in such eloquent terms of our past struggles for liberty, he forgets that he is attacking the memory and lowering the deeds of the political ancestors of the hon. Senator for Kingston (Mr. Campbell), who would certainly not have recognized a true Tory in the moderate, rather sceptical and too liberal speaker that we heard yesterday. If from the outside world, I limit myself to my own Province, the difference between the real principle of our Conservative friends and their present professions, is still more striking. The school to which the hon. Senator who seconds the motion belongs (Mr. Bellerose) and to which the hon. Senator who was to second it (Mr. Chapais) belong, is not only Conservative in the accepted sense of the world, it is reactionary. It would abolish, here and elsewhere, self-government if it could be done, and bring us back to the good old times when the hon. leader of the Opposition would have been put to the Bastille for his radical and seditious speech. I deny to such a school the right of speaking of constitutional freedom except to curse it. On the other hand, we Liberals are perfectly consistent, though at first sight it may look strange to see us fighting in favor of the power of the Crown against its usual partizans. We admit that Governor Letellier has used a power that can be of use only in exceptional circumstances, and under the pressure of a great public want; that under all circumstances the exercise of this power must be viewed with a great deal of jealousy. But we may say this also, that in some cases the Crown may be, has been the protector of the people against an ambitious and tyrannical aristocracy in past times, against bribed Parliamentary majorities in modern times. The Crown, or the nominees of the Crown may be the defenders of popular rights against the elected representatives of the people; and when this body opposes the policy that prevails in the other House, which it does so often, it is because it really believes that the Senate represent more fully public opinion than the popular branch. If the Senate did not believe so, and sincerely, it would abstain, I am sure, from obstructing the measures passed by the great majority of the other House. Well, Governor Letellier stood somewhat in relation to his late advisers, and to the majority of the Local House, in the position you would hold towards the present Liberal Government and the present House, if you had the power of dismissing the one and of dissolving the other. Can any one say that, if you had that power, you would not have used it? Governor Letellier has used the power which he undoubtedly possesses, and calls on the people to decide the question between his present and his late advisers. He has done so, because he felt that the Local Legislature was under the influence of railway rings; because the Legislature adopted a legislation that the leader of the House (Hon. Mr. Angers) admitted himself would be a disgrace to the Province; because the credit of the Province, and of the two great cities of Montreal and Quebec, was going to be ruined by the placing upon the market bonds amounting to more than two millions of dollars, signed, not by the usual authorities, by the Mayors, but by assignees under fear of the Sheriff, as if the Province and the cities of Montreal and Quebec were in bankruptcy. The blow was a severe one, and so severe that, in the mind of many of us, sincere friends of the Province, it leads to complications and embarrassments that might eventually bring us to the ruin of that provincial independence which the hon. Senator from Arichat has said must be dearer to us than to any of the other Provinces. You may think that Governor Letellier was wrong, because he was not in the same position as we are. You did not feel as we do the necessities of that position, because you were not to be subjected to legislation of such a character, that it would not be submitted to by any other people, and that its author himself was obliged to admit to be a disgrace to the Province. As I have already said, you may under these circumstances, think that Governor Letellier was wrong. We feel he was right; we feel that having no conceivable personal interest in the matter, he has exposed himself to criticism, to bitter criticism, to the blame of such a body as this whose opinion must always have a great weight with him who has been so long a member of it; and that only for the country's sake. For this, as friends of the Province, we are grateful to him. A man of less manliness, though seeing the danger to which our Province was exposed, would have kept aloof from the responsibility of such a crisis and let the country suffer. He, a true patriot, a true Liberal, has renounced the calm and quietness of his official position; he has risked his fair fame to do what he believes to be in the interest of the people. For this the people of our Province is grateful to him and will show it at the polls; for this manly act he is entitled, not only to the approval and support of his friends, but also to the respect of his opponents. It is not my purpose to treat at length the constitutional question; but I cannot help submitting to the hon. Senator for Kingston, some doubts that have arisen in my mind in listening to his very able and moderate speech. He has admitted himself that there was great inconvenience in pronouncing an opinion on this question when the elections were proceeding in Quebec. With his acute sense of political proprieties, he has felt that it was a strange thing to see the Federal Parliament pronouncing an opinion at the very time when the people of the Province are called to do so; and he has tried to relieve himself of that reproach by saying that the inconvenience would be still greater to establish a precedent such as this. I doubt it. It seems to me, first that this House specially runs a great risk in throwing itself into the arena now open, with the only advantage of pronouncing an opinion, which can have, in the midst of the electoral agitation, but little effect, with the chance of seeing it set aside by the people of Quebec. It seems to me also, that it has a dangerous precedent to establish, far more dangerous than to let the thing go without comment in this House, to interfere by a vote of censure here against the Lieutenant-Governor when the elections are proceeding. It is a direct interference in our local affairs, in violation of the spirit of our institutions, and to the great detriment of provincial independence. If you interfere to-day in such case, when you have no interest in the matter, won't you be tempted to interfere in other cases when you will have a pressing and direct interest to do so? I say, let the Lieutenant-Governor and the people settle between themselves the question in the settlement of which they only are directly interested. By interfering you will create a dangerous precedent in the Confederation from which you may suffer hereafter. Since I am on this subject, I will put to the Honorable Senators simply this question: Do you believe that if a Governor-General had acted as Governor Letellier did, the Imperial authorities would, supposing that they thought he was wrong, censure him openly as you propose to do by this motion, on the eve of the general elections? No, they would abstain, thinking it highly improper, and believing that more harm would be done by the censure at such a moment than by the establishment of a precedent, however objectionable. The hon. Senator from Kingston has made little of the case of Lord Palmerston. With all due deference, I think that more significance ought to be attached to it. Here is a man of the great ability of Lord Palmerston, considered one of the first diplomats of Europe, who is obliged, on entering office, to promise by writing that he will on all occasions consult the Queen on foreign affairs, and submit to Her Majesty the drafts of his dispatches in time for full consideration. Certainly, it was more humiliating for a man of Lord Palmerston's character and special qualifications to submit to this, than for M. DeBoucherville to advise Governor Letellier of his doings in time for consultation. And why was a man like Lord Palmerston dismissed? Simply because he had expressed in an informal conversation an opinion on French affairs. Certainly, this looks strange in this liberal age, though Lord Palmerston admits himself that the practice in England is "that no important political instruction is ever sent to any British Minister abroad, and no note addressed to any foreign diplomatic agent without the draft being first submitted to the head of the Government, in order that the pleasure of the Crown might be taken upon it; and if either the higher authority or the Prime Minister suggested alterations, those alterations were made, or the dispatch was withheld." It is interesting to see what the leader of the Conservatives, Mr. Disraeli, said on the occasion of the explanations given in the House of Commons on this singular incident, and to recommend his words to the hon. Senator for Kingston: "I think it," said Mr. Disraeli, "one of

"the great misfortunes of our time, and "one most injurious to public liberty, that "the power of the Crown has diminished." Would it be considered presumptuous on my part if I ask the Conservatives of this House to listen to the voice of their great English leader, and to remember that in his estimation the great misfortune of our time, and one most injurious to public liberty, is that the power of the Crown be diminished, as it is sought to be done in the Senate. Of all the incidents of the case, as presented to us both by Mr. Letellier and Mr. DeBoucherville, I propose to recall only one that seems to me sufficient to show in what manner the late advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor understood their duty towards him. As the hon. Senator from Kingston recalled it, the blank sent by Mr. Letellier from Riviere Ouelle was to apply to a measure of finance, evidently meaning by that the usual estimates; but it was applied to the railway resolutions, which could scarcely be called, as it was apparent from Mr. Campbell's own explanations, a measure of finance. Certainly this was a worse proceeding than the private conversation of Lord Palmerston with the French ambassador. The resolutions having been presented without his consent, what had Governor Letellier to do? He could not ask his Ministers to withdraw them. He had nothing left but to refuse its sanction to them, and to submit the question to the people, as Governor Manners-Sutton did in New Brunswick, and, I hope, with the same satisfactory result.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—It was not my intention to have troubled the House on this subject, as it has been very fully and ably discussed by hon. members on both sides, and from my long intimacy and friendship with the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec and the gentleman he called upon to take the responsibility of his action—and there is no man in the Dominion for whom I entertain greater respect and esteem—I felt a delicacy in the matter; yet as the circumstances connected with the dissolutions in the Province of New Brunswick, in which, as an adviser of the Lieutenant-Governors in both cases, I took a part, have been referred to in this debate, I feel it incumbent on me, throwing aside all personal considerations, to give the reasons for the vote I shall give.

The question of constitutional government is before the House, and we have to deal with it, and my hon. friend from Kingston, in moving the resolution, has given a clear, concise and lucid statement of what is now considered in Great Britain as the true constitutional policy. The last case that occurred in that country of the dismissal of a Government by the Crown was by William IV in 1834, when the late Duke of Wellington undertook the formation of a Government, but in that case, after the meeting of Parliament, a dissolution took place, and the country returned a majority against the Ministry, condemning the extreme use of the prerogative in dismissing a Government possessing a majority in Parliament. The circumstances in New Brunswick were different, for in both the cases referred to the Administration of the day tendered their resignation. The first case was in 1856, under the Lieutenant-Governor, the late Earl of Canterbury, at that time Mr. Manhers-Sutton, who had himself for a number of years been a member of the British House of Commons, and whose father for a length of time had been Speaker, and he was consequently well versed in the constitutional practices in the Mother Country. He brought under the notice of his advisers, by a memorandum which I will refer to, the subject of the Prohibitory Liquor Law, which at the time was causing a great deal of agitation in the Province, and numerous petitions had been sent him requesting that the House should be dissolved, and the sense of the people taken upon it. In the memorandum alluded to, he said:—

“ This Act has now been legally in operation or some months; but practically it is wholly inoperative. For, although liquors can no longer be imported through the Custom House, and the revenue suffers in consequence, it is a notorious fact that liquor is sold with impunity although in violation of the law, in every part of the Province.”

He says again:—

“ If the Prohibitory Law be capable of enforcement, the Executive Government is bound to enforce it, for it is their special duty to uphold the authority of the law.”

And further:—

“ In the opinion of the Lieutenant-Governor, Hon. Mr. Wilmot, the remedy for the existing state of things is by an appeal to the people, as both the supporters and opponents of the law claim a preponderance of public opinion in favor of the views which they respectively advocate.”

To this the advisers of His Excellency demurred, and after considerable correspondence His Excellency directed the Provincial Secretary to prepare a proclamation dissolving the House. On that, the Government resigned, and a new Government was formed who took the responsibility of advising the Lieutenant-Governor to dissolve the House and appeal to the country. The result was that only two members of the new House voted against the repeal of the Act, and my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. A. R. McClelan) was one of them. In the case referred to, I very reluctantly consented to become a member of the Government, as I thought it rather a stretch of power to dissolve the House when the Government of the day was sustained by a majority, but I was induced to do so by the advice of many of my influential supporters. My hon. friend (Mr. McClelan) and the Liberal party generally charged our Government with an act of despotism, and with having dragged the prerogative in the mud. But in this case the Lieutenant-Governor left to his advisers the opportunity of dissolving, and they were not dismissed, but resigned. I, as Provincial Secretary, countersigned the proclamation dissolving the Assembly. The second case was in 1866, when Mr. Arthur Gordon was Lieutenant-Governor. After the election of 1865, I was called upon by the Lieutenant-Governor, in conjunction with the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Smith, to form an Administration. I had not been opposed to a union of the North American Colonies, but to the financial terms agreed upon at Quebec, and that I was correct in my opinion has been proved by the legislation that has occurred since, and when the Canadian Government proposed to open negotiations on the subject, I differed from my colleagues, a majority of whom were opposed to reopening the question, and consequently resigned my seat in the Executive Council. Governor Gordon again brought the subject before his Council, and the Legislative Council having passed an address in an answer to the speech, favoring Confederation, the reply of Governor Gordon to the address, gave umbrage to his Council, and after a lengthy correspondence they resigned. His Excellency then called upon my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Botsford) to form an administration, and he advised His Excellency to intrust the formation to me, in conjunction with the Hon. P. Mitchell, and a government was formed on the basis of Confederation. We all know the result. When the election took place we were sustained. The distinction between those cases and what has occurred in Quebec is, that in both cases the existing governments were offered the opportunity of dissolving, but declined and tendered their resignations. It is true that the Government of the day were sustained by a majority in the House of Assembly; but in the Quebec case, while the Government was sustained by large majorities in both Houses, it was dismissed without any opportunity being given to them to appeal to the country, a most marked and important difference, and not in accordance with my views of constitutional and responsible government. It certainly is rather an anomalous position in which parties are now placed. The Liberal party who have always professed to be great sticklers for the people ruling by a majority in the democratic branch, are ready to justify a stretch of the prerogative of the Crown, that would not be sustained for a moment in the Mother Country, and it is left to the Conservative party to uphold the principles of responsible government. But even if the electors in the Province of Quebec, justify the Lieutenant-Governor, I doubt whether it would be a precedent that will govern in any other Province of the Dominion. Holding these opinions I shall vote for the resolution of the hon. member from Kingston.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—We are all of us pleased, on all occasions, to hear the hon. gentleman from Kingston, whose moderation, good taste, and good nature are always strikingly exhibited when he addresses the House; and, in general, his arguments are put with a great deal of fairness, and with force which carries conviction to those, at all events, who are disposed to be convinced by his mode of argument. But on this occasion we must all have noticed the laggard expression, very uncommon with him, which conveyed to my mind the impression, not that he did not speak from conviction, but that his conviction was rather the result of acting powerfully on his intelligence than from the spontaneous formation of opinion from the process of reasoning. If I understand his arguments and quotations aright, the result of them all was this: that the Lieutenant-Governor or the Sovereign in the last resort, is incapable, constitutionally, or with propriety, of dismissing any Ministry as long as it enjoys the confidence of the majority in Parliament. That, I think, further implies, not only that he cannot dismiss his Ministry by the direct act of dismissal, expressed in so many words, but that a resignation cannot be forced by the rejection of Ministerial advice; for if the Chief Magistrate shall refuse to accept the advice of his Ministry, and shall persist in acting in opposition to that advice, they must resign, which, to my mind, amounts to the same thing as telling them to go about their business. I can see no difference between the two cases, nor can I see any propriety in the distinction which the hon. gentleman drew between legality and constitutionality, when he said that a Chief Magistrate can do a thing legally, but cannot do it constitutionally. That reminds me very much of the story of the Prince who was also an archbishop, and who, when he swore, did so, not as an archbishop, but as a Prince. If a King can dismiss his Ministry, it matters very little whether he does it legally or constitutionally, if he can do it properly. I was particularly interested in the hon. gentleman's statements about the crisis during the time of Lord Metcalfe. The reason why I felt so interested in it is because, in this House, and in the other House, there are still a few veterans who took a leading part in the political discussions of that day. They have all condemned, and those who are in the Senate, are going, I am afraid, to vote a censure on the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, though, without exception, they supported Lord Metcalfe's dismissal of his Ministers which the hon. member for Kingston now declares to have been unconstitutional, but which, at the time, they considered to be a very constitutional proceeding. At that time the right hon. gentleman, who is now leader of the Opposition in the other House was one of Lord Metcalfe's ministers.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I understood the hon. gentleman to state that he never served under Lord Metcalfe. Lord Elgin was the first Governor he served under.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I think that is correct; but, at all events, it was the continuation of the Ministry who took office under Lord Metcalfe; he went out when the Liberals came in, and he was one of that Ministry who supported and sustained Lord Metcalfe's unconstitutional actions—as my hon. friend from Kingston now regards them. I was very much surprised, as I know the hon. gentleman is well acquainted with the history of this country, that he should express an opinion that the action of Lord Metcalfe was disapproved of by the Imperial Government, and by Lord Grey, as the then Secretary of the Colonies.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I said I understood it was in a work of Lord Grey on Parliamentary Government.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Well the fact is the Imperial Government not only did not censure Lord Metcalfe, but they thoroughly approved of his conduct. I have made a considerable number of extracts from "The Life of Lord Metcalfe," but I will not trouble the House with more of them than is necessary to support my position. The only one, therefore, that I will refer to is a letter from Sir Robert Peel to the Queen :—

"Sir Robert Peel, with his humble duty to your Majesty, begs leave to submit for your Majesty's favorable consideration, the claim of Sir Charles Metcalfe, for some distinguished mark of your Majesty's approbation. Lord Stanley is strongly impressed with the belief that such a proof of your Majesty's confidence and favor would greatly strengthen him in the execution of his arduous task, were it announced at the eventual crisis of the opening of the Canadian Legislature."

That, I think, establishes the point that the Imperial Government did not think it proper to censure Lord Metcalfe for his course, although, in my opinion, Lord Metcalfe was in the wrong.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I think he was
Hon. Mr. Penny.

wrong, and I do not hesitate to say so; but I will tell hon. gentlemen why. I do not think he was wrong in dismissing his Ministry, but he was wrong in interfering with and embarrassing the subsequent expression of the will of the people. That is why I consider George III. and Charles I. were also wrong. In the case of Charles I., he was wrong in dissolving Parliament, because he did so with the intention never to call them together again; and in the case of George III., he was wrong in dismissing his Ministry, or in refusing their advice, because he wished to rule by intrigues through the House of Lords, and otherwise by falsifying the true expression of the wishes of the people. There are some men, as I have already said, still living who took part in the conflict between Lord Metcalfe and his Ministry; and one of them is a gentleman who has served in a great many capacities in political life. He was a Minister under Lord Metcalfe, and was dismissed by him; he was a member of the Ministry that took office after Lord Metcalfe was recalled; and he was a member of the late Ministry in conjunction with the hon. gentleman opposite, (Mr. Campbell.) He also served for several years as Governor in possessions of the Crown. I refer to Sir Francis Hincks. That hon. gentleman ought to be looked upon as an authority on constitutional practice by this House, and I must confess I was surprised that the hon. gentleman who had been a colleague of his only a short time before—a gentleman who knew how much he had written on this subject—not only did not attempt to refute him, but absolutely took no notice of him whatever. I did not suppose, taking the course that he has done, that the hon. gentleman opposite approved of Sir Francis Hinck's opinions in this matter, but I did imagine that those opinions would be entitled to some notice at the hands of the leader of the Opposition; I did think that the hon. gentleman should at least have attempted to controvert them.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I did not care to mention Sir Francis Hincks because the articles attributed to him appeared in a commercial journal of which he is reputed only to be the editor, but I supposed, and I still suppose, I answered his arguments.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—To show that Sir Francis is not now contending for any new principle, but for a principle which he contended for during the time of Lord Metcalfe, I shall read an extract from the writing of a gentleman who is well known by reputation, and who was personally known by many hon. gentlemen during his life-time, when he was associated with Sir Francis Hincks, and was Speaker of the House when that gentleman came into power. I refer to the late Hon. A. M. Morin. He said :—

“The Governor, in the same way as the Sovereign in England, must not identify himself with any party. If he will not act with the Ministry, he must appeal to the people of the Province by means of an election. If the decision of the people is against him, he must submit or resign.”

It may surprise some hon. gentlemen to see how very much like that is to the remark of Gambetta, who said of another ruler who was supposed to have acted in an unconstitutional manner, that after the appeal to the people, he must se soumettre or se demettre. That is a very significant paraphrase on the words of Morin, and it is the constitutional formula. Sir Francis Hincks was of the same way of thinking, and he gives us this account of his own sentiments at the time he was combatting with Lord Metcalfe. It will be seen, therefore, that what he says now of the present crisis is no new principle with him :—

“No pretention was ever set up in those days by the Reformers of the Lafontaine Baldwin school that they would act independently altogether of the representative of the Crown, whereas, the Quebec Ministers have acted, possibly from inadvertence or inexperience, in a manner wholly at variance with the practice in England since the introduction of Parliamentary Government.”

I have shown I think, that some of the veteran politicians of Canada formerly sustained what they are now about to say is very unconstitutional practice on the part of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, and the hon. gentleman behind me (Mr. Wilmot) who is a veteran from another Province is going to do the same thing, and yet he tells us that he himself was one of a government which took the responsibility when Mr. Sutton dismissed a Ministry, which like the

Hon. Mr. Penny.

Ministry of Mr. DeBoucherville had a majority in the Legislature. I heard hon. gentlemen cheer that hon. gentleman's statements. The hon. gentlemen have their own opinions of course; but that seems to me to be a remarkably inconsistent position. The hon. gentleman from New Brunswick (Mr. Wilmot) however tries to make a distinction between the action of Governor Sutton in New Brunswick, and that of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier. He says, Mr. Sutton said to his Ministry “I want you to dissolve the House” and they did not do so; while in Mr. Letellier's case that option was not given, but they were summarily dismissed. But does anyone suppose that if Mr. Letellier had said to Mr. DeBoucherville “You must dissolve the House” that the Premier would have had so tame a spirit as to dissolve on such a command. By no means; I think he would have said “We shall not dissolve the House,” or “we shall not take your advice to advise you to dissolve the House,” and in that case he would have had to resign just as the Ministry in New Brunswick resigned. The best proof that the Ministry of New Brunswick were driven out by Lord Sutton is this: the Governor said to his Ministers, “Gentlemen, your business is to resign!” At first they hesitated to do so, and it was only by what is called in Quebec force brutale that he at last got them out. Hon. gentlemen who will take the trouble to look over the records will see that that was the case. But there is the fact: we have a gentleman who says the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec has acted unconstitutionally in dismissing a Ministry having a majority in Parliament, while he himself went in and sustained a Lieutenant-Governor who had done precisely the same thing. There is another point in which the hon. gentleman perceived a difference between his own conduct and the conduct of Mr. Joly. He says Governor Sutton saw the propriety of getting some one to advise him before turning out his old Ministers. I suppose Mr. Letellier did the same thing. I suppose he knew that Mr. Joly was going to advise him before he turned out his Ministers.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—According to the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Wilmot's) own statement Governor Sutton accepted the resignation of his Ministers, but retained them until others were appointed, as others had to be appointed before they could advise him. There was, therefore, really a period when Governor Sutton had no real advisers in the ordinary sense of the word.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—But the hon. gentleman says Mr. Letellier must have known that Mr. Joly was going to advise him before he dismissed his Ministers. I should like my hon. friend to clearly state that the Lieutenant-Governor must have known that.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I am not stating a fact, but drawing an inference. I am stating what seems to me to have been probable, and I say that in the New Brunswick case there is no hon. gentleman in this House who believes that Governor Sutton did not know that he was going to be supported by new Ministers before he dismissed his old ones. To suppose otherwise would be to suppose that he was more fit to be an inmate of a lunatic asylum than of any other institution that I know of. I had made a large number of extracts from authorities in support of the principle that a Chief Magistrate can dismiss his Ministers if it be to make a bona fide appeal to the people, for it seems to me that the value of those propositions must depend very much upon the authority we derive from books; but my hon. friend from Halifax has gone over that ground so thoroughly as to render it unnecessary to repeat it. I am glad the quotations are put upon the record, and that having been done, I shall not trouble the House any longer with them. There is one extract, however, of which, I think, no notice has yet been taken. It relates to a case which must be considered a modern one. We have been told that there has been no dismissal of a Ministry since 1840, and that in the face of the dismissal of Lord Palmerston. A writer in the "Current Events" of the Canadian Monthly, remarking on this event, says that if Lord Palmerston had been Premier the same thing would have happened, and that then the whole Ministry must have gone; and in speaking of the position of the Crown with reference to its advisers, in discussing this very case, Lord Russell says, as extracted in the Canadian Monthly:—

Hon. Mr. Penny.

"When the Crown, in consequence of a vote of the House of Commons, places its constitutional confidence in a Minister, that Minister is bound to afford to the Crown the most frank and full detail of every measure that is taken, or to leave the Crown its full liberty, a liberty which the Crown must possess, of saying that the Minister no longer possesses its confidence."

The most remarkable thing about the dismissal of Lord Palmerston—which was a direct dismissal, as he was not asked to resign—was that there had been a manifestation of the will of Parliament immediately before, and he had a large majority supporting his policy, upon the particular point upon which his dismissal turned. On this the writer from whom I am now quoting says:

"It also so happens that just before the royal memorandum was penned, the House of Commons after a debate—memorable as the occasion of Sir R. Peel's last speech, only a few hours before the fatal fall from his horse—had distinctly expressed its approval of Palmerston's foreign policy, by a vote of 310 to 264."

So that it will be seen from this, that the Queen dismissed a Minister who just before that had had the highest manifestation of the fact that he had the confidence of Parliament. There is another parallel between this case and the one before us, that the writer of this article draws in a marginal note:

"The case of Lord Palmerston is cited from Mr. Todd's valuable books; but one circumstance is omitted that renders it peculiarly apposite to the present discussion. The royal memorandum was written not in 1852, but in 1850. On receiving it, Lord Palmerston had said "I have taken a copy of this memorandum of the Queen, and will not fail to attend to the direction it contains." In less than eighteen months he repeated his offence and was dismissed. Singularly in November, 1877, according to Mr. Letellier, the ex-Premier of Quebec having been remonstrated with for acting without the sanction of the Crown, promised that it should not occur again. Early this year he was once more treading on unconstitutional ground."

There is, therefore, a wonderful parallelism between those two cases. The hon. gentleman, further to support his extraordinary pretension, read from a speech of Lord Dufferin's delivered at Halifax, in which he spoke very highly of the authority of Parliament, and expressed in general terms that he would be governed only by the authority of Parliament; but here is what Lord Dufferin says, in a pamphlet, in which there is an extract from that very speech—the pamphlet containing his despatch to the Secretary of the Colonies on the Pacific Scandal:—

“Of course it was always open to me to have dismissed my Ministers, and have taken my chance of Parliament approving my conduct.”

I suppose, also, that the parties who drew up the instructions to the Governor-General—which includes Her Majesty herself to some extent—must have been aware of what the Constitution is, and it will be seen from them, the Governor-General is authorized to exercise his authority in opposition to the advice of his Ministers. But if he does so, he practically turns them out, for if they do not go out under such circumstances, they would be the tamest souled Ministers that this Dominion has ever had, or I think ever will have. I think the House now has had ample authority upon our side. Lord Grey has been quoted by my hon. friend to sustain his own opinion, and we have had Lord Grey's opinion on the other side. The same thing has been done with Hearn, who has been made, by one hon. gentleman, to contradict an opinion that was attributed to him by another. So it is with Lord Derby, who was quoted as giving instructions that seem to sustain the opinion that a Ministry were never to be dismissed so long as they had the confidence of the majority in Parliament; but we have also had Lord Derby quoted to the contrary effect. In opposition to all this mass of authority for the right of the Sovereign to dismiss her Ministers, there is one quotation from Bagehot which I am bound to admit was very emphatic and very good for the purpose for which it was made—that is, if Bagehot is good authority. But what I would like to know is, when we are quoting Bagehot, why we should overlook Charles Lindsay, Editor of the Canadian Monthly, a gentleman who has taken a leading part in the politics of this country, and Sir Francis Hincks and Mr. Todd. Bagehot tells us, however, as plainly as all the rest of the writers on the constitution, that the King used to dismiss his Ministers; but then he says that is never going to happen again, that it is just, as likely that Primrose Hill will burst out into volcanic action as that the Queen should dismiss her Ministry if they enjoy the confidence of the House of Commons. But as Her Majesty dismissed Lord Palmerston I see no reason why she should not dismiss some one else. Macaulay and other writers tell us what has been and is. Bagehot informs us what will be. Now, Macaulay asserts that the constitution of Great Britain is built up upon precedents. The hon. member, however has changed all that and taking Bagehot for his guide bases it on prophecies. That, I think, is the difference in the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, supported by Bagehot and his prophecies, and ours on this side who are satisfied with precedents. But for all I can see Bagehot's prophecies are about as valuable as those of Dr. Cumming or Johanna Southcote. None of us know what is to happen in the future, although we all know petty well what has happened in this matter in the past. For my part, I can hardly understand how it is possible to say in the same breath that a Chief Magistrate has the right to exercise a discretion and yet that he must never exercise it. And as to the apparent contradictions of the writers on the constitution there is after all no difficulty in reconciling them. We have on the other side a number of general propositions such as describe the leading principles upon which the power of the Crown is usually exercised; on our side there are exact and specific descriptions of what that power consists of. I think the true explanation of the manner in which those writers have spoken of the necessity of the Chief Magistrate being guided by the majority of the Legislature in the choice of his Ministers arises from this simple fact, that in the majority of cases it is assumed, and justly assumed, that the majority in Parliament represents the majority in the country. I think it is a fair assumption, but as a matter of fact there are many cases in which it is not so. In the instance before us, the Lieutenant-Governor acted under the discretion vested in him to judge whether the Legislature was or was not truly representative of the people. He acted at his own peril, so to speak, when he dismissed his Ministers, and his punishment will be that he must be placed in a humililiating position if he has made a mistake, and has acted contrary to the wishes of the voters who will then send the late Ministers back again. Now, let me ask what has been the conduct of the British Government in dealing with crises in the colonies? Before doing so, however, let us look for a moment at what must happen on such an occasion in England. Has any one of the ousted Ministers in England ever gone with his complaints to any higher authority than the Queen? Why there is no such authority. Does any hon. gentleman suppose if Mr. De-Boucherville had been an English Minister he would have found any authority to which he could complain of his dismissal? No, he would in that case have had to fight it out with the people of England, and the people here must be the tribunal of final resort, as they are there. In England an ousted Ministry can have no grandmama, no big brother to fall back upon, and therefore, if there is anything of that sort here, it is something more than, and different from that which they have in the Mother Country.

Hon. Mr. Penny.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—It is one of the advantages pointed out by Lord Grey as existing in a colony.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Lord Grey may have thought it an advantage; other people are free to think it a disadvantage; but be it one or the other, we have always prided ourselves on having an exact transcript of the British Constitution, and and this fifth leg that some gentlemen think we ought to import into our constitution is plainly not part of that of England, and would be a very inconvenient limb, in my opinion at least. The British Government in dealing with colonial crises, have acted upon the principle that a defeated Ministry must take its chances with the people, and this policy has been pursued in all such cases. Todd mentions eight of those crises, not including the one of Sir Bartle Frere, which makes the ninth. There have been various circumstances attending them, some of one kind and some of another; but no case can be shown where the British Government has interfered or disapproved of the conduct of the Governor. It approved of the conduct of Lord Metcalfe, Lord Head, Lord Mulgrave, Mr. Sutton, Mr. Gordon, Mr. Bowen, and in the same way, more recently, it approved of the conduct of Sir Bartle Frere. The Crown will therefore go on approving of the action of Governors and Lieutenant-Governors as long as they grant a free and full expression of the will of the people, and submit themselves accordingly. My hon. friend from Kingston mentioned one case which seemed at first sight to be a contradiction to this—the case of Mr. Eyre. But Mr. Eyre's misconduct was not misconduct of a constitutional nature. He suffered the censure of the Crown because he decreed that men who were supposed to have been guilty of certain offences should be taken from the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts, and they should be handed over to a court-martial. In one case the trial was proceeded with without counsel being allowed to be heard for the defence. That was the case of Mr. Eyre, and it certainly was not a case of disagreeing with his Ministers. On the contrary, he yielded, unfortunately, to the panic that seized them, and acted with them, even against the dictates of common justice and humanity that should distinguish British statesmen. The course of argument I have adopted will show that I am not disposed to discuss the propriety or impropriety of the Lieutenant-Governor's course. I think it is a matter for the people of the Province of Quebec, but I should say it was a very unwise course if I looked at it from a party point of view. The fact is, if those gentlemen who were dismissed had been let alone they would have died out most effectually, but, as it is, they will go out with a halo of martyrdom about them in the opinion of partizans, whose opinion is all martyrs can hope for. If the Lieutenant Governor had acted in the interests of party he would have, as I should certainly have done, let those gentlemen go on in their own course, and I have no doubt that they only needed a very short time to have disposed of themselves with very much less trouble than we are going to have with them at present. But the Lieutenant-Governor had to act, and he did act in the interests of the people, as we all heard remarked by a very distinguished nobleman in this Chamber of the duty of public men, with very little regard to what might be thought about it. My hon. friend from Kingston in the early part of his remarks told us that, as a Conservative, he was disposed to stand upon the side of authority. As a Conservative, if he would take the humble advice of a Liberal, I would recommend him to stick to that rule. It seems to me the Conservatives are never strong on constitutional questions; they proved it in the case of Lord Metcalfe; they proved it still more fully in the case of Sir Edmund Head, and my hon. friend behind me has proved it in the case of New Brunswick, supposing the theory of my hon. friend from Kingston is to be accepted as correct. Those gentlemen, like some others who have grown wiser by years, desire to gain a reputation for reform at the expense of younger men who perhaps, have not had the same experience in the world, and, in this case, at the expense of the reputation of the Lieutenant-Governor. It seems to me they are unable to comprehend the true principles of constitutional government. They seem to have taken a great deal of trouble with it, but they have learned it only as the sorcerers learned the Lord's Prayer—to say it backwards. Amongst other reasons that led me to this conclusion, was what seemed to me to be a very strange expression of opinion from hon. gentlemen, that the elections that were coming on would certainly settle this question so far as the people of Quebec were concerned. We were told that the election will obliterate any offence that this action of the Lieutenant-Governor may have caused to those who chose to be offended at it in the Province of Quebec; but then we were told that the rest of the people of the Dominion had something to say about it, and that the offence to them would still remain, even after the election, and no matter how the election may go. Now, responsible government is supposed to be government according to the well understood wishes of the people: but of what people? The people of the Dominion, or the people of the Province of Quebec? We were told that the people of the Quebec might settle this affair to their own satisfaction, without aid; but it seems the people of the Dominion are to be very much affronted after all is said and done. I should like to know if the Government of the Province of Quebec is to be carried on according to the wishes of the people of the Province, or is to be carried on according to the wishes of the people of the Dominion? If it is to be carried on ac-ording to the wishes of the people of Quebec, then the whole thing, by the consent of honorable gentlemen opposite, is already disposed of, and that is just what we have the right to expect from constitutional government. If the Federal Government, on the contrary, can be called upon to adopt such a motion as is now before the House, the inference to be drawn is that it can be called on to interfere by orders of a positive kind. If we can say to the Lieutenant-Governor, "you have done wrong because you have committed this act," we can also say to the Lieutenant-Governor, "you have done wrong because you have omitted some other act, and then we can direct him to do it. I think it is under such a principle that the local institutions of this country will be for the first time really in danger. For my part, I believe we are never constitutionally wrong in going back to the people, and I believe that the British Constitution has a much earlier origin than what is supposed by those who think it was never known until a few generations ago. I hold that our great poet, Shakespeare knew something about it when he made the King say to Warwick, who had asserted that even the prerogative came from the people :

Hon. Mr. Penny.

Hon. Mr. Penny.

" And therefore do I prize it,
 " I should guard their liberties and they should strengthen mine,
 " But when proud faction and her rebel crew, insult their Sovereign, trample on his laws, and bid defiance to his power,
 " The people then in justice to themselves,
 " Rise to vindicate the rights they gave."

That, I believe, is the key-note of everything which we contend for on this side of the House. Without this power of the Crown, our Parliament would be like the Congress of the United States. It would have a term of years and have nothing to do but agree with the Ministers in order to be beyond the control of the people. We should then have, so far, a Republican Constitution; we should have a still closer resemblance to the constitution of certain assemblies that during the revolutionary times in France attempted to govern the country by committees of their own without any chief magistrate; we should have what never occurred in Great Britain, except during the time of the Long Parliament, and the Rump Parliament, which endeavored to govern without any chief magistrate, and without any chance of being dissolved by the lapse of time, since they had carried their usurpation in the direction of duration as well as of power. That, like all things of violent action, was followed by reaction, and the effect of such government is to produce rulers like Cromwell and Bonaparte—to give us Prides Purge or a Thermidor. On the other hand supposing that the Lieutenant-Governor has made some mistake, hon. gentlemen must be aware that by the first of May, without any drugs or stimulants, such as it is now proposed to apply, the constitution of the Province of Quebec will be just as well as ever. The scar will be healed, and nobody will be able to know that a wound had been inflicted. If Mr. Joly is sustained it will show that the Lieutenant-Governor was right; if Mr. DeBoucherville comes back to office, it will prove that the constitution provides a remedy for mistakes made in the working of it. The people in either case would be master, and will be all the more master because of the consciousness of having exercised a great act of sovereignty. The act that brings this about, constitutionally or unconstitutionally, is an entirely different one from that which under the name of prerogative, is employed to defeat the sovereignty of the people; as for instance, in the case of Sir Edmund Head, who having called a Ministry to his counsels, next day refused to accept their advice, and so prevented the people from expressing any opinion on the controversy which had been the cause of the new Ministers being summoned by him to his cabinet. The great fact is that the House of Commons or the Legislative Assembly, are not to be taken in all cases like the the people. The House of Commons and the House of Assembly, are constitutionally no doubt the representatives of the people, for the time being, but the people are there, and they may, as they frequently have been, called upon to decide whether the power of attorney which they have given is still to be held valid. The last resort in all those cases is, I repeat, the people, and the whole of this matter may be summed up in the paraphrase of some words of the Great Teacher to a sect of Purists, many centuries ago, when he said "The Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath." In the same way the constitution was made for the people and not the people for the constitution.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND—At this late hour of the evening, I do not intend to detain the House, but I could not sit in my seat and listen to the misrepresentation of history made by the hon. Senator from Alma, relative to the dismissal from power of Lord Palmerston in 1850. The way I read history is: he was not dismissed by the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown, but by the Crown at the request and on the recommendation of the Premier of the day.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Why did the Premier make the recommendation?

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND—We all know what the cause of that dismissal was. As the old phrase says: "There cannot be two Kings in Brentford." Lord Palmerston received deputations upon foreign questions without consulting the Premier or any other member of the Ministry—in fact he was a despot in the Cabinet—and in consequence of his acts at that time, Lord John Russell recommended Her Majesty to dismiss him. I will not give my own words for it, but I will quote from Molesworth's History of England—not the historian's version of it, but the statement made by Lord John Russell in Parliament, in reply to a question from Sir B. Hill:—

"The first important transaction in which Lord Palmerston took a part, since the end of the last Session of Parliament, was his reception of a deputation of delegates from certain metropolitan parishes respecting the treatment of the Hungarian refugees by the Turkish Government. On this occasion I thought that my noble friend exhibited some want of due caution, but I gave him the credit of supposing that this was through an oversight. The next occasion to which I think it necessary to refer relates to the events which took place on the 2nd of December in France. The instructions conveyed to our ambassador by the Queen's Government were to abstain from all interference in the internal affairs of that country. Being informed of an alleged conversation between Lord Palmerston and the French Ambassador, repugnant to their instructions, I wrote to that noble Lord, but my inquiries for nine days met with a disdainful silence, Lord Palmerston having in the meanwhile, without the knowledge of his colleagues, written a despatch containing instructions to Lord Normanby, in which, however, he evaded the question whether he had approved the act of the President. I consider the noble Lord's course of proceeding in this matter to be putting himself in the place of the Crown, and passing by the Crown, while he gave the usual approbation of England to the acts of the President of the Republic of France, in direct opposition to the policy which the Government had hitherto pursued. Under these circumstances, I had no alternative but to declare that while I was Prime Minister, Lord Palmerston could not hold the seals of office, and I have assumed the sole and entire responsibility of advising the Crown to require the resignation of my noble friend."

Therefore it was not by the exercise of the prerogative he was dismissed, but on the recommendation of the Prime Minister because he had taken upon himself the powers and authority of the Government, and carried out his own views in direct opposition to the policy of the Administration, of which he was a member. He was dismissed at the request of Lord John Russell, and the Premier took the responsibility of it. Therefore, the precedent cited by my hon. friend from Alma is scattered to the winds. As to the case of Lord Metcalfe, there was very little known about responsible government in those days. It was merely the commencement of the experiment of responsible government. I must confess I am surprised when I look around this House to find the champions of pure and undefiled Liberalism are the Conservatives, and the champions of old Toryism and despotism are the Liberals.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND—They say history repeats itself, and it certainly does. We know in the days of George III, when the Almighty in his wisdom thought fit to smite the King and to take from him his reason, when the Regency Bill was before Parliament, it was the Conservative party that checked and limited the power of the Prince Regent, and it was Fox and his party who desired to make him a despot. It was at the feet of a greater Gamaliel than my hon. friend from Alma—the late Joseph Howe—that I learned the principles of responsible government. His definition of it is a Government for the benefit of the people, as expressed through a majority of their representatives in Parliament assembled. I am surprised that we should find among the so-called Liberal Party such champions for despotism and irresponsible power—who would even give a Lieutenant-Governor

Hon. Mr. Haviland.

nor absolute control over the Province which he governs. I do not care for the point raised in another place, as to whether a Lieutenant-Governor's power is greater or less than that of the Governor-General, whose commission comes direct from England. I am willing to put them on the same footing, and I contend that, taking that view of it, hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to give greater power to Lieutenant-Governors than the Queen herself dare exercise. I do not want to go into learned quotations, because I know the House is weary of them. We have had them from the hon. Senator from Halifax, until we could not understand the applicability of them to the question before the House; because sometimes his quotations were the very reverse of the opinions expressed by himself. There is one case which I will quote, and it is the only one I remember since 1830, where either the Governor or the King has ever exercised the prerogative of dismissing a Ministry which had the majority in Parliament,—that was the celebrated dismissal of the Melbourne Ministry in 1834 by King William IV. We know that is a precedent which is never likely to be followed again; we know at that time King William IV had strong views—old Tory views. After the passage of the Reform Bill, and the Ministry had been in power four years, he altered his mind very much, although he was the people's William at one time. The occasion selected by the King for dismissing the Melbourne Ministry was, when Lord Althorp, who was Chancellor of the Exchequer, was raised to the House of Lords, by the death of his father, and Lord Melbourne waited on the King and stated the changes he intended to make in the Ministry, in consequence of the vacancy of the Chancellorship of the Exchequer. His Majesty told him that he was of opinion that the business of the country could not be carried on by such a Ministry as it was now proposed to constitute, and that he had made up his mind to call in the Duke of Wellington. In that case, as in the present one at Quebec, there were advisers behind the throne; but the King took upon himself the responsibility of dismissing that Ministry. We know, according to ordinary constitutional rules, the Government of Wellington and Peel, who were then called to office, technically speaking, were responsible for that dismissal; but how is that matter treated by history? Where is the responsibility put? These are the comments of Molesworth:—

“Such was the outcome of this attempt to force a Conservative Ministry on the country. The results were, the needless turmoil and expense of a hotly-contested election; a vast expenditure of money; a great loss of time wasted in party strife, which should have been devoted to public business; a diminution of the Liberal majority, and a proportionate increase of the Conservative Opposition; a consequent weakening of the Melbourne Administration, compelling it to seek strength and stability in a closer alliance with O’Connell and his followers. And now the question arises, who was really responsible for these mischievous results? On the principle that the King can do no wrong, the blame must be thrown first, on the Duke of Wellington, who consented to fill Lord Melbourne’s place provisionally, and, next, on Sir Robert Peel, who accepted it definitively, and accepted with it the responsibility of Lord Melbourne’s dismissal, as he himself honorably and frankly acknowledged. But history must not be arrested in its decisions by constitutional fictions. It judges Sovereigns as well as their Ministers, and, in this instance, it must condemn William the Fourth as having made an unwarrantable use of his prerogative, in order to transfer the Government of the country to the party that he personally preferred.”

That is exactly the case I contend that has arisen in the Province of Quebec. Mr. Letellier has dismissed his Ministry. It is like the old fable of “The Wolf and the Lamb.” He wanted an excuse to get rid of his Ministry in order that he might have M. Joly and the party with whom all his sympathies were, around him at his Council Board. The case of King William, whom Molesworth condemns, was mildness itself in comparison with the high-handed act of Mr. Letellier in dismissing his Ministers, because King William IV. did give a reason, to the effect that they would be too weak without Lord Althorp as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and there was no man in the Ministerial party to take his place and perform the duties and functions of that important office as efficiently as he had done. Here was a reason given, but I look upon the act of Mr. Letellier as the deepest stab that constitutional government has ever received. He dismissed a Ministry which had an overwhelming majority in the House of Assembly, and the almost unanimous support of the Legislative Council.

Hon. Mr. Haviland.

Where can we find a parallel for such a case? With regard to the precedent in the Cape of Good Hope, there were Imperial interests to be protected, and as an Imperial officer, Sir Bartle Frere occupied a two-fold capacity; he was the representative of the Sovereign, to guard Imperial interests, and he was also the Governor of the Colony. Let us see what the case of Mr. Letellier is in this Message that has been laid before us by His Excellency the Governor-General. You will see that, from first to last, he forgot the position which he occupied. Evidently, he was thinking of days gone by, when he was a Minister in this House, and thought he continued to be a Minister, instead of occupying the position of Lieutenant-Governor of a province. Instead of remaining passive and receiving the suggestions of his Ministers, he forced his own views upon them. I have not a shadow of a doubt as regards the vote I ought to give on this question. I have come to a conclusion on reading Mr. Letellier’s defence, as he terms it, without looking at Mr. DeBoucherville’s rejoinder at all. It is one of the most puerile documents in the shape of a state paper that I have ever heard of. It is a list of trifling complaints. One of his reasons is, that a Bill was passed with a blank, another that there was a grammatical error in some measure; and it is on such prettexts as these that he justifies his arbitrary conduct of dismissing a Ministry having the confidence of an overwhelming majority in both branches of the Legislature. It seems to me, from the very hour that he became the representative of Her Majesty, he had made up his mind to bring about the coup d’etat upon which we are commenting to-night. We are bound to speak upon this question. The reason given, that we ought not because a general election is going on in Quebec, is not sufficient. We have had state papers placed before us by His Excellency, and the intention undoubtedly is, that we should express an opinion upon them. And besides, have we not addresses from the late House of Assembly, and from the Legislative Council, asking us to look into this great constitutional question? It is our duty to deal with this matter, regardless of what may be the result of the elections which are now in progress in the Province of Quebec. In this Dominion of ours, where Federal institutions are upon their trial, we want to define for the future guidance of Lieutenant-Governors, what their functions and duties are, while holding such responsible positions. It is not for the Province of Quebec alone, but for the seven or eight other Provinces of the Dominion, that we are asked to express an opinion to-night. If for one moment this act of Mr. Letellier's should be approved of by this House, we might at once haul down the great constitutional flag and give up the liberties which our forefathers fought for in the Mother Country, and in the Provinces of this Dominion, and at once look forward to having over us as a ruler, a despot like the Czar of Russia.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—I would like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite, before proceeding further, who it is that has requested us to interfere with the local affairs of the Province of Quebec? Who suggested such a thing? Because it appears to me they have responsible government in full operation in that Province, and we should find something else to do than interfere with the affairs of our neighbours. I think the people of the Province of Quebec are quite competent to take charge of their own affairs without the Senate of Canada stepping forward to give their opinion on the matters of that Province.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—The Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec appears to have had a misunderstanding with his Ministry; he has dismissed them, and called others to his assistance. He has not only done that, but he has appealed to the people of the Province of Quebec for their verdict upon his action. In doing that he has taken the only constitutional course open to him. It appears to me, that for this Senate to interfere with such an act, is a most uncalled for proceeding. The correspondence which the Lieutenant-Governor had with his late Ministry has been laid on the table of this House. And therefore, hon. gentlemen opposite say, we should take action upon it, but I do not see what action we are called upon to take. It is entered on the journals of the House and there it remains as part of the history of the day. But I think it would be a most uncalled for thing for us to attempt to deal with the internal politics of the Province of Quebec. I think the representatives of that Province might well ask us on what authority we undertook to do so, seeing that the Lieutenant-Governor has taken a strictly constitutional course in what he has done. We have heard a great many precedents quoted with respect to constitutional government. Had Mr. Letellier done as Lord Metcalfe did—dismissed his advisers and attempted to form another administration, and failed, as Lord Metcalfe did, and remained without a Ministry for some eight or ten months, and then appealed to the people—perhaps we might have had some reason for finding fault with his conduct. But Mr. Letellier did nothing of the kind. As soon as he had dismissed the old Ministry, he formed a new one, and dissolved the Legislature, and thus acted within the letter and the spirit of the Constitution. I think the late Government had a very inadequate idea of their responsibility, if we judge from the correspondence that took place between the Lieutenant-Governor and his advisers. For example, no Executive Councillor, no Cabinet Minister ought to have asked any Governor for a blank form to bring down money Bills, and no Governor should grant such a thing to any Ministry. And if he did do so, he might expect it would be abused, as it was in this instance. With regard to the remarks made upon the case of William IV. in 1834, I remember the circumstance well. But there is no similarity between that case and the present one. The King dismissed the Ministry because the Queen hated and feared them, and he assigned no reason for what he did, but after the struggle of a general election, he was compelled to take back the Ministry he had dismissed. But in this case there was legislation of a most objectionable kind—legislation that struck at the interests of the great commercial centres of Lower Canada, and the Lieutenant-Governor, in the strict exercise of his constitutional duties, determined that he would not sanction such legislation. What then could be more uncalled-for and absurd than for this House to step forward, under the circumstances, and say to the Lieutenant-Governor, "You shall not do anything to disturb the Conservative majority in "Lower Canada?"

Hon. Mr. BROWN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—I think our duty is, to do nothing in the way of interfering with the local affairs of the Province of Quebec, but to allow the people of that Province to settle their difficulties themselves, and I have confidence and faith enough in the intelligence, public spirit, and patriotism of the people of Quebec to believe, that they will see that their affairs are properly conducted without the aid or the assistance of the Dominion Parliament.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—My intention at first was not to take part in this discussion, but the peculiar position in which I stand as a French Canadian impels me to say a few words before the debate closes. The hon. Senator from Hamilton says, this House has nothing to do with this constitutional question. That is a matter of opinion. It seems to me we have everything to do with it, because the country expects an expression of opinion upon great constitutional questions from this hon. body. Petitions have been sent here from the Legislature of Quebec representing certain facts, and we have had messages from His Excellency, the Governor-General, laid before us, and, naturally, we are expected to pronounce our opinion upon the question. We would certainly be guilty of dereliction of duty if we failed to pass an opinion upon the action of the Lieutenant-Governor. Quebec Province is agitated from end to end by the action of Mr. Letellier. I regret that I am obliged to say anything against that hon. gentleman. For a long time he was a member of this Senate, and I cannot forget what he did in the past in the interest of Manitoba, when the people of that Province stood in need of relief. On all occasions he was a friend to the Province from which I come. However, I am obliged to say I consider he has misused the prerogative of the Crown in dismissing his Ministry. He did not give them the consideration to which they were entitled. This is not a question of Ministries. Mr. Joly's Ministry can perhaps govern the Province of Quebec as well as Mr. DeBoucherville's did. But the question before us is, whether the prerogative of the Crown can be exercised in an arbitrary and tyrannical way. The late Government of Quebec had the confidence of both branches of Parliament. The Legislature represented the people, and the Lieutenant-Governor, under our system, of responsible government, was bound to accept the decision of the majority, and act upon the advice of their representatives. We have had many precedents cited in this debate, but they all date back to the time when responsible government had not been established and understood as it is to-day. Since 1841, the principle has been affirmed time and again, that the representative of the Sovereign must administer the affairs of the country he governs on the advice of a Ministry enjoying the confidence of a majority of the people's representatives. The Lieutenant-Governor may, under certain circumstances, force his Ministers to dissolve the House and appeal to the people. If Mr. Letellier had done that, I think he would have shown greater respect for constitutional government, and given satisfaction to the people of Quebec. But, instead of taking that course, he dismissed the Ministry, and the reasons he gives for his conduct are such as might be expected from a schoolboy when taken to task by his father for misconduct. He is forced to admit, in this case, that he believes the late Ministry acted in good faith throughout, and this, once admitted, removes all ground for his arbitrary action. I have been a witness of the struggles which have taken place in the Province of Quebec from time to time for the extension of our liberties. I would ask my hon friends from Quebec, if Bedard, Lafontaine, Papineau, and others to whose efforts we are indebted for the constitutional privileges which we enjoy, could be called upon to take part in this debate, do they suppose those great men would countenance the conduct of Mr. Letellier?

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—I am sure they would not; and I think the Province of Quebec will, under the present circumstances, vindicate the rights and liberties which Mr. Letellier has done so much to destroy. The Lieutenant-Governor pretends to say that the prerogative of the Crown was in danger. I would like to know in what way? It was for the Ministry to frame a policy, and as long as that policy met with the sanction of the people's representatives, and the people themselves, it was the duty of Mr. Letellier to have assisted his Ministry to carry it out. Great as the injustice to the Ministry was, a greater injustice has been done to the people. The electors will have an opportunity to vindicate their right, but I say it was not fair to the Ministry to give a minority in the Legislature all the advantages which the possession of the Government affords to a party in a general election. I heard the hon. Senator from Montreal quoting the words of Gambetta to the President of France—"Resign or submit." They had a perfect application to the position in which the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec should have stood towards his Government. He should either have submitted to their advice or ceased to govern the Province. In any event, the utmost he should have done was to force them to appeal to the people to ascertain whether their policy met with the approval or disapproval of the Province. The position in which he stands is unconstitutional, and I do not believe there is another Province in the Dominion in which such a thing could be done—not even in Manitoba, small as our population is. Two years ago the Ministry in that Province resigned. I had the honor at that time to have the greatest part of the responsibility in that Government, and the Lieutenant-Governor did not allow me to resign until after the new Government was formed. I can say with confidence that such an error as Mr. Letellier has committed would not have been tolerated in any other part of Canada. Knowing as I do the ability of the Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, I cannot believe that he has pursued such a course without an object, and that object is evident. As has been asserted by many hon. gentlemen in this House, he dismissed the Ministry for the purpose of helping his friends to get into power. I would like to think that this was a mistake, but I cannot for one moment suppose that it was done for any other than party purposes.

Hon. Mr. WARK moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was declared lost.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—May I ask the hon. Senator from Kingston if it is his intention to press his motion to a division?

Hon. Mr. Girard

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—I stated yesterday, in addressing the House, that a resolution had been placed in my hands, but that I abstained from moving it then, because I was in hopes, from something I had been informed of, that the hon. Senator would have been satisfied with placing his views before the House, and not pressed his motion to a division. I may also state that the members of the Government in this House had no knowledge of my intention to withhold my amendment. It was not placed in my hands by any member of the Government, and since it came into my possession, I have added a few words to it myself. I make this explanation to remove a mistaken impression which some hon. gentlemen seem to entertain. I move in amendment to the resolution:—

That all the words after "To Resolve" be struck out and the following substituted: "That, under the rule of our Constitution; he Federal Government, and the Provincial Governments, each in their own sphere, enjoy responsible government equally, separately and independently; therefore, under existing circumstances, this House deems it inexpedient to offer any opinion on the recent action of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, or of his late Ministers."

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—I rise to a point of order. This amendment has a preamble, gives a citation and arrives at a conclusion.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—A similar amendment was ruled out last year. I have good reason to recollect it, because I was the mover.

Mr. SPEAKER—There is a recital in the beginning of the resolution, but it does not strike me as coming strictly under the category of a preamble. It is a part of the resolution.

The House divided on the amendment which was rejected by the following vote:—

WITNESSES IN COMMON ASSAULT CASES BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER moved the third reading of the Bill intituled "An Act to provide that persons charged with common assault shall be competent as witnesses."

Hon. Mr. DICKEY moved in amendment, to leave out all the words after "Bill" and insert "amended as follows." "Page 1, line 7.—Leave out from 'behalf,' to 'where' in line 10." He said he had given notice that he would move this amendment, because he considered it a dangerous principle to admit the wife of a prisoner as a witness for or against him. It was offering a premium for perjury.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the Bill as originally introduced in the other Chamber, had not contained this provision. He believed it was at the instance of the leader of the Opposition it had been inserted. As he (Mr. Scott) had stated at a former stage of this Bill, the tendency of late years was to widen the scope of evidence. He was disposed to believe that the Bill, in its present shape, would be very much better than if it were amended in the direction which some hon. gentlemen proposed. There might be circumstances under which it would be very important that the the testimony of either the husband or the wife should be admitted. He thought it would be better to let the Bill pass, and if experience should prove it to be wise legislation the principle could be extended to other cases.

Hon. Mr. MILLER concurred in the opinion expressed by the Secretary of State. He could see no danger to result from this measure. On the contrary, he knew, as a professional man, that very often the ends of justice were frustrated by the law as it now stood, for the first party who reached the magistrate, whether he was reliable or not, had the advantage. He could see no danger of an innovation where common sense was in its favor. He had no difficulty whatever in supporting the Bill.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND said he had no objection to allowing the party himself to be a witness, but he objected to admitting the wife's evidence, not on the question of credibility, but because of the consequences that might arise from it to interfere with domestic relations.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not to be used in a hostile sense.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND said she might on cross-examination contradict her own statement.

After some further discussion the House divided on the amendment, which was rejected on the following vote:—

TRANSPORTATION OF STEEL RAILS.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON moved :

“ That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House, copies of all tenders received by the Government, or any Department thereof, for the transport, during the season of 1878, of Steel Rails and fastenings from Kingston to Duluth, or to Winnipeg, or any other place on the Red River”

He said:—I move for this return, because I see that tenders have been invited for the transport of steel rails from Kingston to Duluth and the Red River. My object in moving this address is to have the tenders laid upon the table of this House, and to enquire from the Government whether they have concluded a contract for the transport of those 5,000 tons. Of course, I am not aware whether the Government have accepted any tender, but I have been given to understand that the lowest tender is at a price which will make the rate of freight from Duluth to Winnipeg higher even than was paid to the Kittson Line in past years. That rate was $15 per ton from Duluth to Winnipeg, and I understand that the tender which is likely to be entertained and entered into, is at $19.30 per ton for freight from Kingston to Winnipeg, and that the portion assigned for the lake service is only $2.50, leaving $16.80 for the service from Duluth to Winnipeg. I do not know whether these facts, if they be facts, are known to the Government or not; I do not speak positively and assert that they are facts, although my information comes from a good source. If the Government know that the rate from Duluth to Winnipeg is to be $1.80 per ton more than was paid in 1875 and 1876, I think it should hesitate before entering into such a contract. I am told that the Government might have done better had they advertised generally, without restricting parties tendering to the Duluth route; that thousands of cars return empty from Chicago and Milwaukee in which rails could be carried at very low rates, perhaps cheaper than by Duluth, notwithstanding the fact that the rail route is longer. I called, the attention of the House the other day to the fact, that a Hamilton firm—Messrs. Fuller & Milne—had tendered in April, 1875, at $13.50 United States currency per ton of 2240 pounds, for transporting rails from Duluth to Winnipeg, while the Red River Transportation Co., had been awarded the contract for the same service at $15 per ton of 2000 pounds. The day after, I met Mr. Fuller, of Fuller & Milne, who told me that his firm meant a ton of 2240 pounds and that he was sorry they had not been awarded the contract, because it would have been very profitable. We can readily imagine how remunerative the business must have been to the Red River Transportation Co., at $15 per ton. It is publicly said the dividends of that company are enormous; that their dividend upon the business of 1875 or 1876 was 65 per cent, besides 25 per cent added to their rest. It behooves the Government to make every possible effort to have the steel rails transported to Manitoba cheaply. If there is a preference to be given in matters involving the expenditure of the public money, it surely ought to be to our own people, who will keep whatever profit they make in the country. I will just call the attention of the House to a few items on which the country has sustained serious loss through favoritism or very great mismanagement.

Hon. Hr. BROWN—I rise to a point of order. I want to know whether, on a motion of this kind, for papers, the hon. gentleman should make charges without waiting until the papers on which he bases them are before the House. Is it expedient that this unfair course should be pursued?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—What I am referring to now is not new. The papers have been before the House for a year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But you are not speaking to the motion.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—My remarks are strictly in order and are confined to the subject before the House. I will now submit a tabulated statement of public money lost through the mismanagement of the Government, and favoritism for Messrs. Cooper & Fairman of Montreal, and for the Red River Transportation Company of St. Paul, namely:

On the 5th January, 1875, the Government bought 5,000 tons of steel rails from Messrs. Cox & Green, of Montreal, at £10 stg. per ton f.o.b. in England, and two days afterwards (on the 7th January, 1875) the Government bought from Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., without competition, 5,187 tons at £10 10s. per ton, also f.o.b. in England, for British Columbia.

The country's loss by this act of favoritism was 10s. stg. per ton, and amounted to..... $12,004

In November, 1874, Messrs. Darling & Co., of Montreal, tendered for bolts and nuts at $92.47 per ton, and at the same time Cooper, Fairman & Co. tendered at $101 per ton. Cooper, Fairman & Co. got a contract for 160 tons.

The country's loss by this act of favoritism was.....

$1,365

In 1875 Messrs. Guest & Co., of England, supplied to Canada 10,000 tons of steel rails, and when tendering for the rails in November, 1874, they offered to deliver them at Duluth at $4 per ton more than at Montreal, or, including insurance, at $4.16 more per ton. Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., acting for themselves and on behalf of Messrs. Norris & Neelon, of St. Catharines, and Messrs. Hope & Co., of Hamilton, were paid at the rate of $6.20 per ton.

The country's loss by this act of favoritism and mismanagement was $2.04 per ton on 10,000 tons, and amounted to.....

$20,400

In April, 1875, the Red River Transportation Company tendered for the transport of rails from Duluth to Winnipeg at $15 (United States currency) per ton of 2,000 lbs. Messrs. Fuller & Milne, of Hamilton, tendered for the same service at $13.50 (United States currency) per ton (meaning the usual ton of rails, 2,240 lbs.). The Red River Company got the contract, and transported 15,141 tons.

The difference in the rate of freight and in the ton weight together amounted to $3.30 per ton.

The country's loss by this act of favoritism or mismanagement was $3.30 per ton on 15,141 tons, and amounted to $49,965 United States currency, and in gold to.....

$44,969

The loss on the four transactions which I have enumerated amounts to.....

$79,338

Hon. Mr. HOPE—I rise to a point of order. We have had all this before.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—And you will probably hear it again.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—The hon. gentleman's motion refers to what is being done in 1878, and he is speaking of events which occurred in 1874. Nobody objects to bringing up these matters, but it should be done in a fair and manly way. The hon. gentleman is dodging.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—There is no dodging on my part. It is the hon. gentleman opposite who wishes to dodge the facts. All that I have said is strictly pertinent to the motion. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Brown) complains that I have gone back to 1874. It is only a few days since he went back, in a speech on the Fort Francis Lock, to the time of the Chats Canal and the Baby jobs.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MAPCHERSON—I think the House will admit that I have not exceeded the right which my motion gave me, and that all I have said has had a close bearing upon the subject before the House. I am not at all surprised that hon. gentlemen opposite should like to prevent such facts as I have brought out to-day from being presented in a clear form. I am not surprised that it annoys the hon. Senator from Lambton, who is generally recognized throughout the country as the head of the Government, nor am I surprised that the hon. Senator from Hamilton (Mr. Hope) should feel a little testy; but seeing that the company in which he is interested, and which, probably through his influence, got $20,400 more of the people's money than others would have done the same work for, I think he may bear with equanimity all that I have said.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has given the House a good deal more information than the Government possesses. The position of those tenders, I understand, is this—they have simply been opened and not even taken into consideration by the head of the Government himself.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I am glad to hear it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Minister has been called away to attend a court in the West, and, consequently, I have not had an opportunity to learn anything further than I have stated, in reference to this question. The information the hon. gentleman has given us is very much in advance of the facts. So far from the contract having been signed, the tenders have not been even considered yet.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I did not say the contract was signed; I asked if it was.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman went so far as to describe what the lowest tender was. He seemed to have been behind the scenes and to have known all about it. His conclusion was that the Government had been guilty of favoritism. I deny emphatically that the Government have done what has been charged against them. The case preferred by the hon. gentleman is entirely hypothetical. It is exceedingly unjust to any administration and discordant with the principles of fair play, that such warfare should be carried on—that the hon. gentleman should state a hypothetical case and draw from it the conclusion that $79,000 of the people's money had been squandered in order that favorites of the Ministry might get contracts. There should be some sense of honor in this House which would prevent hon. gentlemen from making such charges when there is no foundation for them. The hon. gentleman asserts that Cox & Green could have furnished the whole 50,000 tons of steel rails called for by the Government in 1874. There were thirty tenders ranging from $50.50 up to $79. All the contracts for the 50,000 tons of rails were awarded within two months after the tenders were called for, on Mr. Fleming's recommendation. There was nothing to prevent any firm from tendering for the full amount; the only restriction was that no tender should be for less than 5,000 tons. Cox & Green tendered for 5,000 tons, and when they stated they would take 5,000 more, the Government accepted their offer. They then took up the next highest tender and awarded to the firm that made it a contract for as much as they would take. This was the course pursued. The only way to analyze this matter thoroughly is to investigate it before the Public Accounts Committee, but it would not serve the purpose of some hon. gentlemen to have the truth established. They would rather have the statement put in the confused way it is before the public. It serves their purpose better. It enables them to say: "Here is an atrocious piece of ras"cality by which the Government have paid $80,000, more than they should to give the work to favorites." I consider that, to use a vulgar phrase, "cut-throat warfare." A Government guilty of such acts as the hon. gentleman charges against them ought not to be in power. If the hon. gentleman believes in his own statements it is his duty to have these matters investigated. I declare solemnly that if the Minister of Public Works were guilty of all the rascality with which he is charged, he is not fit to hold the position he occupies. I know he is not guilty, and those who are personally acquainted with him do not believe he is capable of such misconduct. We are all fallible, but I know the Premier has endeavoured to get the public service performed on the best terms for the country. Ask the contractors whether Mr. Mackenzie is an easy man to deal with.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—That is the trouble.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes; the whole trouble is that he is not so elastic as some of the gentlemen who were at the head of that Department before him. I do not think it tends to elevate the tone of this House or the character of the public men of this country to make such charges against the Government. I repeat, if they could be brought home to the Administration, then the Government ought not to have the confidence of the people. If it can be proved that they have thrown $10,000 into the hands of Cooper, Fairman & Co., or any other favorites, they should not remain in power. The Premier is opposed in the other House by men who are as hostile to him and his Government as political opponents can be, but they do not press for an investigation of those charges, because they know the bubble is empty and would burst. No one attempts to accuse the Premier of such improprieties to his face in the other House, and I do not think it fair to make such charges here without an investigation. I was not even aware that tenders had been called for in 1878, but I am sure the Premier, if he were here, could satisfy the hon. gentleman that in the transport of those rails, as in every other administrative act, he is desirous of having the public service performed in the most economical manner possible. I shall call the attention of the Premier to the extraordinary statement of the hon. Senator, that the Government propose to give a contract at certain figures. If he can point out a plan by which the Government can save money, I am quite sure the Minister of Public Works will be glad to hear it, and call for fresh tenders, in order to have the service performed in the most economical manner. Neither the Premier nor any member of the Government has any personal interest in the matter. I have heard of the Kittson Line, but I do not know who the stockholders are. I believe the stock is largely owned in the United States. They have the key to the situation there—almost a monopoly. From other sources I have heard their charges are enormously high, and that they have availed themselves of every opportunity to extort, but this, of course, is only hearsay. With regard to the nuts and bolts, I went into that subject rather exhaustively the other day. The calculations I made—and I thought the figures were perfectly correct—showed there was a difference of probably two or three hundred dollars between the tenders. There could not have been more than that. The allegation was that this was to serve Cooper, Fairman & Co. It practically amounts to this—the Government had been guilty of some impropriety in order that Cooper, Fairman & Co., might get a commission on two or three hundred dollars. If the Government were going to perpetrate a fraud surely it would have been for more than two or three dollars. When the Premier returns from the West I shall be very glad to give the hon. gentleman the information he desires.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I have never imputed corruption to Mr. Mackenzie. On the contrary, the other day when I spoke on the subject of the unfortunate steel rails transactions, I said I acquitted him of corruption. But I do charge the Government with manifest and gross favoritism towards the parties I have named. If the facts I have mentioned can be explained away, let the hon. Secretary of State give us the explanation but let him not try to carry the House away with him on the ground that the Premier has been charged with corruption. I have abstained from making any small or captious objections to the price paid to Cooper, Fairman & Co. for the large quantity of rails delivered at Montreal. I myself, have very little doubt if a little more pains had been taken in getting tenders for those rails, that they could have been procured at lower prices, but tenders were called for in haste and the rails were bought from middlemen or agents. The charge I have brought to-day is more serious. In January, 1875, rails were offered by Cox & Green at £10. and at first refused but accepted a day or two afterwards. Only two days thereafter, a similar quantity (5,000 tons), was taken from Cooper, Fairman & Co. at £10.10 per ton. I think that does indicate favoritism.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Does the hon. gentleman not know that Cox & Green would not furnish more than 5,000 tons?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Cox & Green were not the only iron firm in the country. No other firm was communicated with but Cooper, Fairman & Co. Five thousand tons of steel rails was not a very small matter, and the Government might have taken a little trouble to enquire, in England, through their agents, at what rate they could be purchased there, at first hand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So we did.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—There is no evidence of it in the return before the House. I can only speak from the papers brought down by the Government. Then, the freight—does the hon. gentleman say an item of $20,400, paid in excess of what need have been paid, should not be spoken of here? Then the transportation of rails from Duluth to Winnipeg—does the hon. gentleman say that the $45,000 lost to the country by favoritism or mismanagement, is not worth enquiring about? In the four items I have mentioned the country has sustained a loss of $80,000, through the gross mismanagement or favoritism on the part of the Government. Is that a matter not to be spoken of in this House? I again beg the hon. Secretary of State not to attempt to divert the House from the real issue, by erroneously alleging that the Premier has been charged with personal corruption.

Hon. Mr. READ—I brought this matter up last Session, and I have brought it up again this Session. What I asserted on both occasions I repeat now, and am prepared to prove by the returns.

The motion was agreed to.

RECEIVER-GENERAL'S AND ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S OFFICES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (51) intituled "An Act respecting the offices of Receiver-General and Attorney-General of Canada." He said:—The proposition contained in the Bill is this—to abolish one office of the Government (the Receiver-General's) and substitute in lieu thereof another office (the Attorney-General's) in connection with the Department of Justice. The Act creating the Department of Justice was passed in 1868. I shall read two sections, defining the duties of the Minister of Justice and Attorney-General. Clause two provides that the duties of the Minister of Justice shall be as follows:—

"He shall be the official legal adviser of the Governor and the legal member of Her Majesty's Privy Council for Canada. It shall be his duty to see that the administration of public affairs is in accordance with law. He shall have the superintendence of all matters connected with the administration of justice in Canada, not within the jurisdiction of the Government of the Provinces composing the same. He shall advise upon the legislative acts and proceedings of each of the Legislatures of the Provinces of Canada, and generally advise the Crown upon all matters of law referred to him by the Crown; and he shall be charged generally with such other duties as may at any time be assigned by the Governor-in-Council to the Minister of Justice."

Clause three defines the duties of the Attorney-General as follows:—

"He shall be entrusted with the powers and charged with the duties which belong to the office of the Attorney-General of England by law or usage, so far as the same powers and duties are applicable to Canada, and also with the powers and duties which by the laws of the several Provinces belonged to the office of Attorney-General of each Province up to the time when the British North America Act, 1867, came into effect, and which laws, under the provisions of the said Act, are to be administered and carried into effect by the Government of the Dominion. He shall advise the heads of the several Departments of the Government upon all matters of law connected with such Departments. He shall be charged with the settlement and approval of all instruments issued under the Great Seal of Canada. He shall have the superintendence of penitentiaries and the prison system of the Dominion. He shall have the regulation and conduct of all litigation for or against the Crown or any public department in respect of any subjects within the authority or jurisdiction of the Dominion; and he shall be charged generally with such other duties as may at any time be assigned by the Governor-in-Council to the Attorney-General of Canada."

Now, as to the first position, I assume there will be very little difference of opinion between any of us as to the advisability of abolishing the Receiver-General's office. Practically, that Department, for many years has had very little work assigned to it. The duties of the Receiver-General are more mechanical than intellectual. The office is dependent, practically, on the Finance Department. Perhaps the more courteous way to put it would be to say that it may be regarded as a sinecure. Therefore, there can be very little doubt as to the propriety of abolishing it. In doing so it was considered that as the office of the Minister of Justice was somewhat burdened, and the work could be more efficiently performed if the duties were separated, it was resolved that the proposition should be submitted to Parliament, that a new Ministry should take charge of one of the branches of the legal department instead of the Receiver-General. The duties of the Minister of Justice have very largely increased of late years. At the time of Confederation there were only four Provinces, and as the Dominion has spread, the work of the Department of Justice has very largely increased. There is a branch of the work of that Department which has not been as efficiently done as it would have been if more time could have been devoted to it, that is, the supervision of measures to be submitted to Parliament. The Minister of Justice, having to attend meetings of committees in the morning, and his Parliamentary duties generally, as well as the work of his Department, cannot devote the time necessary to the framing of measures and the revision of legislation to be submitted to Parliament. The law business connected with the Public Works Department and the Department of the Interior, has also very largely increased. The division of the Department of Justice into two offices will be of great advantage. It will give an additional legal mind to the Government, and great assistance in conducting the business of the Department. No additional expense is entailed on the revenue by the adoption of this Bill, and the work, in my judgment, can be more efficiently performed than it is now.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—I am very much surprised that the Government should have determined, in the last Session of a Parliament, to make an organic change in the Departmental system organized at the commencement of Confederation. Next to the constitutional principles that we have inherited from our forefathers, Parliament should carefully guard the receipt and expenditure of the public revenues. As I understand it, all moneys are received and paid to the credit of the Receiver-General, and no money can be paid out on warrants issued, unless on the joint orders of the Finance Minister and the Receiver General, thus each Department checking the other.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The warrants are not signed by the Receiver-General, but by the Governor-General through his deputies.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—I have had some experience in my own Province as to the mode in which the moneys were collected and the warrants issued, and am well aware that the warrants are signed by the Governor after the accounts are audited and certified by the Auditor-General. At all events, that was the practice in New Brunswick. In Great Britain, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is practically the Receiver-General, as all public moneys are paid into the Bank of England to the credit of the Exchequer, and the payments are made through the Paymaster-General's Department, the Paymaster-General being a member of the Government, and, under a recent Act, the Auditor-General is a permanent officer, who reports to Parliament and communicates with the Committee of Public Accounts in the House of Commons, so that there is a rigid check kept upon the receipts and expenditures of the public moneys. With us, as I understand it, the Receiver-General keeps primarily the accounts with the English financial agents with the banks, and relating to the public debt, and the respective balances are struck every day and reported to the Privy Council and the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Minister of Finance will be the Receiver-General, and there will be an independent officer who will be directly amenable to Parliament.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—But I should prefer that there should be a responsible head to the Department, to act as a check on the Department of Finance; and when we consider the millions of dollars that are now collected and paid out—and with the growth of the Dominion, the sums must necessarily largely increase—the sum of a few thousand dollars a year is of small moment compared with a thorough system of checks and counter-checks. In addition to some 5,000 accounts now kept in the Receiver-General's Department, there have been received from the engravers $23,697,600 of Dominion notes, of which $19,417,600 have been issued, besides a receipt of $500,000 of fractional currency, and an issue of $310,000, besides a large amount of Provincial notes, issued by the old Provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia. Besides these, large amounts of bill stamps are issued on requisition from the Inland Revenue Department, averaging about $25,000 per month. The five and six per cent Dominion stocks are managed in the Department, and a great deal of time is occupied in preparing the half-yearly dividend checks. The Department is like a bank when payments have to be made, powers of attorney have to be examined, and contractors' securities lodged, as well as those of insurance companies. It may be that the circulation of the Dominion may consist much more largely than now in Dominion legal tender notes; they are the people's money, of equal value from Prince Edward Island to British Columbia, instead of the notes of local banks, which are merely evidences of debt due to the holders, and which are not current except in the localities where the banks are established, except at a discount. I think, therefore, the House can see that the Department is a very important one, and the duties connected with it if properly attended to, are not merely nominal. But what does the Government propose in lieu of it? Not a saving from the cost of the Department, but the establishment of another law officer. Previous to the late Minister of Justice

Hon. Mr. Wilmot.

(Mr. Blake) resigning, nine out of the thirteen Ministers were connected with the legal profession. Surely they ought to have legal knowledge enough. I think if the Government possessed more practical and commercial knowledge with regard to the productive and commercial interests of the Dominion, there would be fewer blunders committed and wiser statesmanship.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—In Great Britain the Premier almost invariably is the first Lord of the Treasury, and at the head of the Treasury Board. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is the second Lord of the Treasury, and practically the Receiver-General. According to Todd, page 426, the Premier has, to assist him in fulfilling his multifarious and onerous duties, the advice of one or two members of the Cabinet, whose departmental labors are inconsiderable, and there are three of the members of the Treasury Board, and they have a general supervision of all financial matters. There is also a Paymaster-General, who is a member of the Government, and an Auditor-General, who is independent of the Government, and reports to the Committee of Accounts in the House of Commons, so that there is an efficient system of checks and counter checks kept up, and any defalcation is almost impossible, and soon discovered. I think it is inconvenient that the Premier should be Minister of Public Works, an office that requires the entire attention of its head, and I impute the many blunders that have been committed to this fact, and a consequent waste of the public money to the loss of the tax-payers. We see that great frauds have been committed in the neighboring Republic, and it is the duty of Parliament to keep up a strict supervision. I only hope the British system will be pursued in this country, and then it is unlikely that any charge of fraud can be brought against our public men. Some years ago, in Great Britain, in the Exchequer Bill Department, a man of high position was sent to Botany Bay for life for defalcations to the extent of £300,000. We have had something similar occurring here; and I say, for the sake of a few thousand dollars additional charge on receiving and paying out the millions that form the revenue and expenditure of the Dominion, it is poor economy to do away with the checks that now exist. As I said, the Receiver-General has the issuing of Dominion notes. I know the present Government, if they could, would take away from the people their own circulation, costing no interest, and burden them with six per cent. debentures instead, and yet the Government want to have this issue under the management of the Finance Minister alone, without any check or counter-check upon him. He might be the Angel Gabriel, but we want, if human legislation can do it, to prevent the possibility of fraud. With regard to the legal work of the Government, I am sure no hon. gentleman in this House would object to employing any number of lawyers that may be required. When we see bankruptcies to the extent of $90,000,000 in three years in Canada, we are told by the hon. Secretary of State that the Government are not prepared to do anything to relieve the prevailing depression. Now is the time, if they have any genius or statesmanship, to display it. In New Brunswick, when I first went into the Legislature, we had the principal part of our revenue collected by the Imperial Customs House Officers, under the double system of a collector and controller, entirely independent of each other. When responsible government was introduced in that Province, we collected the revenue ourselves by a Provincial Treasurer and Deputy-Treasurer, with no other check than the Auditor-General. We all have a pretty good idea of what politics and political parties are, and none of us suppose that either one party or the other will be pure or thoroughly honest, and be prepared to do everything right without proper checks. We know it is impossible. Influences are brought to bear whether it is to get public contracts, or offices, and we should endeavor, as far as possible, to prevent those political influences being brought to bear upon our monetary arrangements. In order to collect the revenue in New Brunswick we had no Comptroller, and a practice had grown up in the out-ports of paying the duties at the end of the quarter. This was effected through political influences, and the result was, that nearly all the Deputy Treasurers became defaulters, and at length we were astonished by a defalcation in St. John, of over $30,000, through a loose system that had grown up in consequence of the want of a thorough check. I always protested against the system while I was in the Legislature. I said it would end in fraud. While we had a man of undoubted integrity—the late Beverly Robinson—in the office of Treasurer, it was all very well; but it was the system that was at fault, and not the officials. My hon. friend the Secretary of State thinks that millions of dollars can pass through an individual's hands and present no temptation. I want to put it beyond the possibility of temptation. Before we consider this Bill at all, we should have had the Bill with respect to the Auditor-General before us, and know more about it than we do at present. When my hon. friend tells me the duties are very light in the Receiver-General's Office, I can tell him I know a good deal more about the duties of that office than he does. There must be duplicate receipts there for every payment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Are they signed by the Minister himself?

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—I don't care whether it is the Minister or not; it is under the responsibility of a Minister.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend knows there is not a farthing paid into the Receiver-General's Department. All the moneys are deposited in the banks. No money can be received by the head of the Department, and no moneys can be drawn out by him. They must be drawn out on warrants which issue regularly from the Governor-General, and those pass through the Audit Office. It is the Auditor-General who has practically the check on the outlay.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—Either the head of the Department is responsible for the duties connected with his office, or he is not; and he is either competent to discharge them or he is incompetent. When this Government was formed, there were two members from Nova Scotia taken into it. One was bundled out unceremoniously. I came up with him on the boat, and it was only on his arrival here that he found he had been turned out of office. The other one could not be got rid of so easily, and now this Bill is brought in to take his head off.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no!

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—Well, perhaps they mean to make him the Attorney-General.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear. .

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—I would ask the hon. Secretary of State how it was that there were such frauds and defalcations some years ago in the Receiver-General's office or the Finance Department?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is in reference to an officer who had charge of the municipal bonds. He improperly tampered with those bonds; that could not be prevented by legislation. Some clerk must have access to those bonds, and if he wishes to commit larceny he can do it under any system of checks.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—The more checks there are the less chance there is for larceny. I prefer the British system by which there are checks and counter-checks in every Department, and double receipts are kept for all moneys expended. Without detaining the House longer, I would simply say that this measure is impolitic; that we should not at this late period in the last Session of this Parliament abolish a Department the importance of which the hon. Secretary of State does not seem to know. If the government want more legal knowledge than they possess with their nine lawyers, let them pay for it as any one of us would have to do if we required legal assistance. The lawyers seem to monopolize a very large amount of the patronage of the country. I do not object to it; but I do not think it is necessary to create a new office in the Government to add a tenth lawyer to the Cabinet. I, therefore, move that the further consideration of this Bill be postponed for three months.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not care to give a silent vote upon this question, as I feel a great deal of regret in being called upon to oppose a measure emanating from the Government. I, therefore, feel it my duty to give some explanation of the reasons which have induced me to second the motion of the hon. Senator from New Brunswick. I have no hesitation in saying I fully agree with him as to the inexpediency of abolishing the office of Receiver-General, at the present time. I think it must be clear to the House, from the information that my hon. friend has laid before us, that it is highly desirable that such an officer as the Receiver-General should exist in the Government of Canada. However, even if this were not so clear, I should have a decided objection that a change like this should take place at the close of this Parliament. If this Bill is necessary now, it should have been brought before us long ago, and in bringing it down now they admit that for five years they have kept in the Government of this country an officer whose services were not required, at a very serious expense to the country. I did not think they would be prepared to make so bold a confession of extravagance and dereliction of duty. For myself, I cannot help looking at this Bill as intended to accomplish a purpose to which I do not believe this House will lend itself. At the formation of the present Government, under the peculiar and very unconstitutional position assumed by the Premier, he had forced upon him two colleagues from Nova Scotia, who brought no personal strength to his Administration, and who were not likely to command a very large degree of confidence throughout the country. It is true the Government secured the support of a large majority of the representatives of Nova Scotia, but that support was accorded to them, less from any confidence that the people felt in the new Ministry than from other causes. Very soon after the first Session of this Parliament the Premier ejected the then Minister of Militia from his Cabinet in the most summary and discourteous manner. I believe it is not denied on any side the treatment that Mr. Ross received in being ejected from the Government was unprecedented for its harshness, discourtesy, and want of feeling.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If Mr. Ross was qualified for the position of a Cabinet Minister only a few months before he was kicked out of office, he was just as well qualified at the time he was turned out to make room for another person. It was found that he brought no strength to the Cabinet, and his colleagues made up their minds to get rid of him, to serve their own purposes. They turned him out of office, and I believe I am safe in saying they have been trying during the past four years to relieve themselves of the Receiver-General, but that gentleman is too fond of the sweets of office, and the Government feel, evidently, that it is not so safe to try the experiment of ejecting a second Nova Scotia member, out of the Cabinet, and it is said he has held on to his office despite the Premier and his colleagues. To get rid of the Receiver-General they are obliged to pass a bill to legislate him out of the Government. I say it is neither creditable to the Minister who requires to be turned out in that way, nor to the Premier who resorts to such means to get rid of a colleague. But, apart from this consideration and from the personal relation of this Bill to the present Receiver-General, I think there is another aspect of this measure which deserves to be considered. We all recollect, before the present Government came into power, the Reform party (so-called) told the people it was wilful and gross extravagance on the part of the Administration formed in 1867, that thirteen Cabinet Ministers should be considered necessary for carrying on the business of the country. Some of them went so far as to point to the fact that a little over half that number was sufficient for the government of forty millions of people, and that if a much smaller Cabinet were sufficient for so large a nation as the United States, an equal number ought to be enough for the Dominion. We were promised, if not directly, at all events indirectly, by the utterances of the gentleman who now occupies the position of Prime Minister of this country, and by some of his colleagues and leading supporters, that it would be part of their policy, if they ever came into power, to carry out the views they enunciated in Opposition. The hon. gentleman who leads the present Government has been known to declare on public platforms that seven Cabinet Ministers were quite sufficient to carry on the Government of the country; but when called upon to form an Administration, instead of reducing the number or even confining himself to thirteen, he actually called into existence a Government with fifteen members. It is true that two of those Ministers held office without salaries attached to their positions but it is no less a fact that he considered the number of Cabinet Ministers esta-lished by the late Government, insufficient to represent the various sections into which the Dominion is divided. They have been five years in office and they have made no attempt to reduce the number of Cabinet Ministers below thirteen. They have made no reduction during their term of office, the only five years they are likely to retain power.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think it is generally admitted that as soon as the people have an opportunity of speaking—as soon as the indignant electors of this country have a chance to mete out justice to the present Government they will be swept out of power by a tidal wave of public opinion much stronger and more resistless than the one which brought them to the Treasury benches.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Now, on the eve of going out of office, they make an attempt to do what? To decrease the number of portfolios? No, but to pass an act declaring that they have paid $35,000, of the people's money during the five years they have held office. To a colleague whose duties have been merely mechanical and could have been discharged as well by a third class clerk. I may be told to day, as we were lately when we were discussing a useless expenditure of $200,000 dollars on Fort Francis Lock, that it is a mere trifle,—why should we speak of a paltry $35,000?—just as my hon. friend from Saugeen was met the other day when he showed that the country had lost through mismanagement or favoritism, $80,000 in connection with the carriage of steel rails. We have seen the whole energies and ingenuity—the perverted ingenuity—of gentlemen elsewhere, engaged session after session in hounding one man to the death in connection with an expenditure of $6,000, under circumstances which, in honor, he was bound to conceal, and could not publicly explain. If these sums—the $35,000 paid to a useless officer, $200,000 thrown away on the Fort Francis Lock, and $80,000 paid to favorites—are so trifling when mentioned in this House, why is it that the small amount involved in the Secret Service expenditure and the Moylan contract, where, at most, only a few thousand were involved, are considered so important that they are made an excuse for the persecution, from session to session, of a great statesman? It is because the Reform Party are unequal to anything above or beyond that style of warfare. Since they have been in power they have shown their incapacity to deal in a statesmanlike manner with the great interests of this country, and have proved themselves to be merely a party of scandal-mongers. They are out of their element when they have no scandal on hand. For the last two or three Sessions the majority in the other Chamber, instead of turning their attention to relieving, by wise legislation, the depression which prevails throughout the Dominion, have devoted themselves exclusively to ruining the character of their great opponent, by trumping up petty scandals which were not worth one-tenth of the time expended on them. While I am speaking on this question, I would say one thing in regard to the scandals to which the great Reform Party have devoted themselves so exclusively, with the object of defaming the leader of the Opposition. I believe if there is one thing more than another which has enlisted and entwined round the hon. gentleman who leads the Conservative Party, the affections of the people, it is the unfair, vile, malignant and infamous system of persecution and detraction to which he has been subjected at the hands of his political opponents.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER — They have done more to endear him to the people than anything he could possibly have done himself, by the endless slander and abuse with which they have tried to crush him. And why have they tried to destroy him? Because they fear him. He troubles them in their dreams.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER — He is their nightmare, because they know the people regard him as the statesman who is capable of bringing the country out of the slough of despond into which the present Government has dragged it, and the great mass of the electors only want an opportunity to rally around that great man and to place him in the position he is so well fitted to occupy—at the head of the Government of this country.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Gentlemen—hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—But let me come to the consideration of the change contemplated by the Government in this Bill. If they even now had the wisdom to abolish this office which they say is not necessary, they might deserve some credit for it, although it is late in the day, and I would allow the motive, the very contemptible motive, that animates the Government in introducing this legislation to pass out of view. If they would abolish the office and allow the country to save the large sum of money that is annually disbursed for the maintenance of it, I would support it, but as they do not propose to do that, I am disposed to support the motion of my hon. friend from New Brunswick in preference to creating a double Department of Justice. I do not believe it is necessary to create another head in connection with that Department. Above all, I am opposed to having the Department of Justice presided over by two heads in the manner contemplated by this Bill. Such an arrangement would be a strange anomaly in our system, and would almost inevitably be attended with inconvenience, confusion, and mischief to the public service. As the Bill contains no dividing line between the duties of the two officials, as their respective functions are not in any wise defined, there would certainly soon be a clashing of authority between the Minister of Justice and the Attorney-General, which might seriously impede the public service. The Bill is an absurd innovation on all precedent, and has evidently originated in the disturbing brain of some unpractical politician. If at any time the Minister of Justice require additional help, it would be better to have two deputies under one head than to have two heads to the Department with one deputy. If it is necessary to have more legal assistance in the Department than there is in the Cabinet, I am sure the country will not grudge the money to pay for it; but I believe it will not be a wise policy to have a double-headed Department of Justice, and I am not sure it would end in the Attorney-General becoming, perhaps, a regular practitioner in our Courts, and possibly the Minister of Justice also—which would be a discreditable state of affairs. The change is not absolutely necessary, and the Government should not now make it. It can stand for another year. If, after the general elections, a new government is called upon, as I believe a new government will be called upon—to deal with public affairs, this change should not now be forced on Parliament. I believe in a large country like this, in which the people have not become thoroughly homogeneous, it is necessary to give sectional representation in the Administration to the various Provinces. and I look forward to the time when perhaps it will be necessary even to increase the number of Cabinet Ministers when the North-West becomes settled, and we will have three or more Provinces in that vast section requiring representation in the Government. It may even be necessary to bring into the Cabinet other gentlemen holding other positions, perhaps, for instance, the Speaker of this House, which could be done at a trifling increase of salary. When we become more like one people and one country, perhaps we may be able to do with a smaller number of Cabinet Ministers, but I do not think the time has yet arrived when we should consider any proposition of this nature. I believe it would be unwise to attempt to make the alteration which is contemplated by the Bill before the House at the present time. We know that this Bill contains the first of a series of changes contemplated in the departmental service. It is known that a bill relating to the office of Auditor-General is before the other branch of the Legislature, and that the office of Deputy Minister and Auditor-General is intended to give new appointments for the friends of the hon. gentlemen who have earned their reward for their devotion to their party during the last four or five years. Now, I do not believe it would be right to empower the Government to make important changes of a prominent character which might seriously inconvenience the gentlemen who are shortly to succeed them. Therefore, until another year goes round, and until we see what Government is likely to be in power, I do not feel disposed to allow those changes to take place, as far as I can prevent them. I have great pleasure in supporting the motion of the hon. gentleman from New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. BROWN apprehended that the object of this Bill was merely to provide for the better carrying out of the Departmental system. No party or personal end could be served by the abolition of the office of Receiver-General and the creation of the office of Attorney-General in its place. The Government simply desired this change as a matter of business convenience, and when their four years of experience suggested such a change, this House would surely not be acting consistently in refusing it. He confessed that he agreed with the last speaker as to the number of Cabinet Ministers. He always held the opinion that nine Ministers would be sufficient, and the majority of men of both parties, he believed, were of the same opinion. But this Government and the late Government had found, as no doubt every Government would find, that the number could not be conveniently reduced while there were so many various interests in the Dominion to be represented, and until the different elements of the Confederation were better welded together than they were at present. The proposition of the Government was to abolish the office of Receiver-General, and they promised to give the country as much security in the care of the public funds with one officer as with two. In addition to this, it was well-known that the legal business of the Government was annually increasing.

Hon. Mr. Miller,

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—And that men of experience and high ability were required to attend to it. Those who had a majority in the Senate would not, he thought, be doing justice either to the Government or to themselves if they made use of their majority to obstruct this measure, which was only one relating to internal economy. If there were anything to be gained except a party snubbing to the Government, this Bill would not be objected to for a moment.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I would like to make an observation or two upon the motion, and the Bill to which it refers, but I confess that the tone of my hon. friend who has just sat down is not calculated to commend his views to the attention of gentlemen on this side of the House. The hon. gentleman has taunted this Senate with desiring to deal unfairly with measures coming from the Government, and, as he says, of snubbing the Government merely for the sake of doing so. That is a very unworthy motive to attribute to his colleagues, and my hon. friend will allow me to tell him, if there be that strong feeling in this House against the policy of the Government that he speaks of, it must be due to other causes than those to which he has adverted. In this connection he compels me to remind him of the fact that there was within my recollection, and within his, a very considerable minority in this House in times past opposing the late Government, and when the Government came into power there was a large and respectable minority in this House who went with them; and that although they have made some fourteen new appointments since they came into office, they were only able on a crucial question, like that of last night to muster a contingent of twenty. If my hon. friend will insist upon putting questions in this way so as to call out criticisms which I would gladly avoid, I can only say it is not the fault of this side of the House. My hon. friend has a curious way of commending this Bill to the House, by telling us that the work of this Public Department can be done by deputies. I have no doubt there is a great deal of truth in the contention, but if it is carried through to its logical sequence it is a reason for making a much more sweeping reduction than is proposed in this Bill, in fact, for having no responsible heads of departments whatever, so that the hon. gentleman's speech carries that argument a great deal further than he intended.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—He states very fairly the reasons for the original number of thirteen Cabinet Ministers, but those reasons no longer apply. I should hope, by this time we had become a somewhat homogeneous people, and that these territorial and sectional divisions need not necessarily be kept up when the appointments of heads of public departments are in question. In regard to this branch of the subject, I am entirely in accord with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, for my feelings are in the direction of a reduction in the number of those departments, and I think it will not be very difficult if we had a proper scheme before us, to point out in which direction that reduction should take place. I will take the head of the Privy Council for instance. If there is any office in that body to which can be applied the very mild epithet applied just now by the hon. Secretary of State to the office of the Receiver-General, it appears to me, that of "sinecure" will aptly apply to the President of the Council. The Departments of the Interior and of Inland Revenue bear almost the same name. Then the duties of the Inland Revenue Department are so closely connected with the customs of the country, that it appears to me it would not take very much ministerial talent to effect an amalgamation in that direction, and thus effect a saving of the cost of two departments. Therefore, all my sympathies are in favor of a reduction, at the proper time, of the heads of the departments. I will not go so far as the extreme view of my hon. friend, who says that the present system is inconvenient, because you require to get a number of Ministers together in order to do business. His argument would lead us almost, if not quite, to one-man-government, because it would be much more convenient to get two or three persons together to work out the Government of the country, than thirteen—that is his argument carried to its legitimate result although, I do not imagine my hon. friend contemplates such a result as that. It is proposed to abolish the office of Receiver General. If that question stood entirely upon its merits, I say frankly, before this House and the country, I am in favor of it, if brought up in the proper place, in the proper shape, and at the proper time. I am in favor of it just as I should be in favor—of course, reserving to myself all the circumstances under which it came up—of abolishing the office of President of the Council, and as an appropriate commentary on that, I believe at this moment that office is not filled. To go back to the office of the Receiver-General, my hon. friend from New Brunswick has entered into this matter very warmly, and perhaps there is no person—I may say in courtesy to the Government—outside the Government more competent to deal with it. And my hon. friend on my left (Mr. Miller), argues on the necessity of retaining this office, but those arguments do not commend themselves entirely to my mind, because when we know the fact that the Receiver-General after all is but the figure head of the Department and the business is really conducted by the deputy, that the money does not go into his coffres, but is really paid into the banks, and that the whole object could be obtained by the system of check which is at the foundation of all systems of administrative government, why should we retain an office which really does not appear to be necessary? As connected with the Finance Department, the work could as well be done by the head of that Department if we can at the same time preserve those checks and counter-checks. We have been told that a Bill is before the other branch of the Legislature which will furnish the means of bringing the Auditor-General into some sort of Parliamentary responsibility. I am not prepared to say that that should not be done, but unfortunately we have not got that Bill before us. This appears to be only a part of a system of change in the Department which we are called upon to deal with piece by piece instead of having it before us as a whole. That is very undesirable, and I think the hon. Secretary of State would have acted very wisely had he allowed this Bill to remain in abeyance until we should have the other Bill before us and have cognizance of all the changes to be presented to us. Then we should have known whether in point of fact this office could be safely dispensed with. With regard to the other part of the Bill, I am decidedly opposed to the creation of the office of Attorney-General; I think it is unnecessary, and that no case has been made out to warrant this expense being thrown on the country. My hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Brown) has thought fit to argue this point as if the Government have no interest in the matter, and this after the avowal of the hon. Secretary of State that the office of Receiver-General was filled by a person who need not necessarily have much experience, that it is a sinecure, and was to be got rid of. They were going to create a new office, and we all know that that new office will be a piece of patronage. There is every inducement for the Government to create that office if they can, and thereby get another head to the Department of Justice, which will then be a double-headed department. My hon. friend from Toronto has also urged that it is highly necessary there should be an Attorney-General to carry on the criminal business of the country. Does my hon. friend know so little of the manner in which the criminal business of the country is done?

Hon. Mr. Dickey.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—I deny that I said that. I referred to the penitentiary business and the criminal appeals.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I understood my hon. friend to base his advocacy of this new piece of legislation upon the ground that an Attorney-General was necessary to conduct the criminal business of the country.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Of course I am bound to accept his explanation that he did not mean anything of the kind. We all know very well that the criminal business of the country is, to a large extent, in fact, almost wholly, a local affair, and that it is done as it is in Ontario at this moment and in other Provinces, by Queen's Counsel, and has no connection with the Minister of Justice. We have had Ministers of Justice before the present one, whose capacity to fill that office has never been called in question. We have had the eminent man who lately retired from the office of Minister of Justice, and we had no complaint from that gentleman. But we had a still more eminent man, his predecessor in the late Government, and from neither of those gentlemen have we heard a complaint or have we seen any desire on their part to shirk the duties of their office.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—On the contrary, we have the best authority for stating with regard to the gentleman who held that high office in the previous Government that he not only did his duty thoroughly and well, but without any complaint on his part that he was overworked, and I cannot see how the necessity has arisen for the creation of this new office. I have reason to believe that the late occupant of this high office, the eminent man who so lately retired from it, was an extremely painstaking person, and no doubt devoted as much time to the examination of questions that came before him that peculiarly applied to the Department of Justice as any conscientious lawyer could have done. Indeed, even from the character of his mind he is disposed to occupy more time than was absolutely necessary, but under all those circumstances we have not heard until the present occupant got into office of the necessity of appointing an additional officer to assist him in the discharge of his duties. My hon. friend says it is necessary, because during the session of Parliament the attention of the Minister is too much occupied with committees and parliamentary work. The hon. gentleman knows it has always been the same, and I only wish the Minister of Justice did pay a little more attention to the bills sent up to us, because it throws a great amount of labor upon the legal gentlemen of this House at times to remedy the imperfection of bills from the Lower House.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—But we endeavor to get through this legislation, and so far the public interest has not been in any way imperilled for want of examination of those bills. Under those circumstances I certainly cannot vote for the creation of this office, and the only reasons upon which I hesitate to support this measure are shortly these:—That this abolition of the office of Receiver-General is a part of a change of system, of which we have only a portion before us; that we were not in a position to examine it as a whole, and upon the further ground that we are called upon to consider it at the very tail end of the Session of a moribund House—the last that can be held in the history of the present Administration, unless they are supported by the country—and I think it would be unwise to make such a change in the Departments, admittedly under the guise of economy and retrenchment, but really to give the Government the patronage and power to appoint a new officer; because, although we abolish one office by the Bill, we create another, so that there is no retrenchment, no saving, although the country is told that this is done for the sake of economy. Under these circumstances, I think that the House will do well to let this matter lie over until another Session.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—As this is a Government measure, and I am opposed to it, I should like to say a few words before casting my vote. It appears to me there is no necessity for having two heads to one Department. It is objectionable in every way, and can only be appreciated for its novelty, each having the same status and co-ordinate powers. We have never heard of such power being given conjointly to two Cabinet Ministers, each with a seat in Parliament, in one Department in England; and we cannot suppose that the Minister of Justice in this country has as much business to attend to as there is in the same, or any, Government Bureau in England. Business may have increased in the Department of Justice since other Provinces have been brought in, with laws extended and with the increase of population, but all that is required, if anything is requisite, is increased official help, and that can easily be done with the assistance of another lawyer. Already two-thirds of the Cabinet are lawyers, and to put another into the Department and give him co-ordinate powers with the Minister of Justice, might incur strife, as there is no provision made to prevent a conflict between them. Circumstances do not call for such legislation, and it appears to me to be more than the service, if conducted by one able head, requires. And I do not believe that the business increase is of such a character—as it mostly, I suppose, is in the shape of references from other Departments—as to justify the Government in making any such appointment. They may increase the officials in the Department if necessary, but not appoint another head to it. Under the late Government we had an hon. gentleman who not only promptly and efficiently performed the duties of Minister of Justice, but he was also leader of the Government at the same time. Yet the duties of the Department were performed in a satisfactory manner. The difference between this Government and the late Government is this—that the present Ministry have already had four Ministers of Justice, and whenever they appoint a new Minister of Justice they soon find it expedient to change him, before he can acquire a thorough knowledge of the duties of the office. The consequence is the work of the Department become burdensome to unaccustomed hands and to men who do not understand it. I am very much of the opinion of my hon. friend from Sunbury, with regard to the amalgamation of the Department of the Receiver-General with that of the Department of Finance. It will remove necessary checks upon the payments of money, and the check upon the spending Departments ought not to be abolished. There is no precedent for it. By the proposed Bill of Amalgamation the Department of Finance will apparently order payments and pay its own orders. There should be a distinct check between payments and receipts. It has been said the office of Receiver-General is a sinecure; it is no fault of this side of the House that it is so, and the change now proposed seems me to be only a sort of death-bed repentance on the part of the Government to make this pretence of economy and retrenchment at the end of their five years term. It appears to me the motive is to wedge out of office another Nova Scotian, to turn Mr. Coffin out of office; if that is the object a more frank and manly way should have been taken. If that is not the object they would have made the discovery five years ago, that the office of Receiver-General was only a sinecure. I am also opposed to the appointment of two heads to the Department of Justice, it is not economy but the reverse. I do not think the business of that office has increased to such an extent as to require an Attorney-General to assist in discharging those duties. There is neither economy nor wisdom in this Bill, but increased cost, and I will be obliged to oppose it. I could have supported it if the object of it was merely to reduce the number of Cabinet Ministers. But to abolish the office of Receiver-General in this style and by such a manner, cannot have my approval or support—especially when it is intended to add another officer and increase the cost of administration.

Hon. Mr. Dickey.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think the rejection of this Bill on the part of this House is a matter that requires a little consideration. Of course, being a party man, I do not look upon it from the same judicial standpoint as the hon. gentleman from Richmond; and probably the remarks which I shall make to the House will not be characterized by the same moderation that he has shown. The best way in dealing with a subject of this kind is to look at the measure itself, and not to indulge in speculations as to why it is introduced; and if it commends itself to the wisdom of the House they should approve of it. It is our business to speculate as to the person who is to fill the office; we are simply to deal with the measure on its merits. I think that is the dignified and proper stand to be taken by this House on measures that come before us. It was admitted by both sides in the other branch of the Legislature, that the duties of Receiver-General were not of such a character as to require that there should be a member of the Cabinet to perform them; and the existence of that officer as a member of the Cabinet would be rendered less necessary by the Bill to provide for the appointment of an Auditor-General independent of the Finance Department, and directly responsible to Parliament. The only objection taken in the Lower House appeared to be against the creation of the new office of Attorney-General. The Bill does not create an additional office; it simply abolishes one office and creates another, so that it leaves matters just as they were, as far as the number of offices is concerned; and it will not, be necessary to bundle out a Nova Scotia Minister neck and crop, as has been suggested by the hon. gentleman from Richmond. I think if this change were made the Receiver-General might take another office, and I understood the hon. gentleman from Cumberland to say, that the office of President of the Council was such a one as might be filled by the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of Receiver-General.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Does the hon. gentleman propose that the present Receiver-General shall be transferred to the office of President of the Council.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not say so.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I did not know but that the Government were going to their political death, and they might require a "coffin" to bury them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not in the confidence of the Government, but I can speculate on political changes as well as any other hon. gentlemen; and it seems to me to be likely that the hon. gentleman who now fills the office of Receiver-General might be appointed President of the Council; as I do not see any reason why the representation of Nova Scotia in the Cabinet is to be diminished. The work of the Receiver-General's Department can be done without having the official head in the Cabinet; and the argument that this office has existed for a number of years, and that it is rather late in the day to make a change, goes for nothing. The fact that, after five years experience, the Government have found that this office can be done without, and another office is required in another Department, is a sufficient reason for the change being made; and the Ministers themselves are the best judges in which Department the most assistance is required. There are at present no less than four Ministers who deal with the finances; the Finance Minister, the Receiver-General, the Minister of Customs, and the Minister of Inland Revenue, while the legal business, which is almost as important, all devolves upon one Minister, who takes the place of the Lord Chancellor, Attorney-General and Solicitor-General in the Imperial Government. It seems to me that that is too much work to place on the shoulders of one gentleman. It has been said that under the previous Administration the work was efficiently performed by one officer, but in the discussion which took place on this measure in the Lower House, the fact was elicited that since 1868-9 the business in the Department of Justice had gone on increasing in a very rapid ratio. Take, for instance, the number of questions referred for the opinion of the head of the Department; they have increased from something like 2,000 in 1872, to 7,000 in 1877. This has been no sudden increase, but it has gone on continuously. It has been suggested by the hon. gentleman from Cumberland, as a reason why this additional officer is to be appointed to the Department of Justice, that the present occupant is not as talented a man as the gentleman who preceded him. The late Minister of Justice, the hon. member for South Bruce, is all that the hon. member for Cumberland stated—one of the most industrious and hard-working men in Canada—and this Bill is more the expression of his views after his experience of the duties of the office than of the views of anyone else. I know that he supported the Bill in the other House in a forcible speech, in which he showed that he was, at least, as much convinced of its necessity as any other gentleman. With all the energy and talent that Mr. Blake could devote to the Department, he had found the work too much for him; and under these circumstances, I think we are quite right in concluding that there is a necessity for additional assistance in the Department of Justice. Some hon. gentlemen have spoken of it as a double-headed Department. I may be mistaken, but my impression is that some years ago, before the Provinces were united, there were two legal officers, an Attorney-General, and a Solicitor-General, in the Cabinets of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and my impression is that there was less legal business to be looked after in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia at that time than there is in the Government of Canada to-day.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is perfectly clear that the abolition of the office of Receiver-General will do no harm; this is admitted in the other branch of the Legislature where the Public Accounts are supposed to be studied more carefully than they are here, and the financial business of the country is more familiar to the members than it is to this House. The only opposition manifested there was to the appointment of an Attorney-General, but when it appears to the most eminent legal gentlemen in the country, that the work of the Department of Justice is too much for one man, I think it will be most unreasonable for this House to reject this Bill.

Hon. Mr. HOWLAN—I do not agree with the remarks that have fallen from the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Brown) who stated that nine heads of the departments would do the work more efficiently than twelve or thirteen. I have always been of the opinion that in a multiplicity of councillors there is wisdom, and I question if, under the original scheme of Confederation, you could very well—with due respect to the interests now represented in the Dominion Parliament—do with less than twelve Cabinet Ministers. I was surprised that some hon. gentleman, in this debate, had not alluded to the fact that the Ministers have not been more evenly divided between the two Houses of Parliament. There are only two Ministers of the Crown on the floor of this House, although, in my opinion, we should have four at least. I am aware of the fact that the Government who are carrying on the business of the country, who have the confidence of the people, should necessarily be in a position to state in what way they desire to carry on the public business. It is apparent to anyone of common intelligence that the mere filling up of this office does not require an extraordinary amount of ability, judging, at all events, from some gentlemen who have filled the position. The Customs is one of the most important offices in the Administration, and it has been, up to a short time ago, occupied by a gentleman not very much distinguished for his abilities; but the same cannot be said of the present head of that Department. It is well known that the deputy heads of the Departments are really the gentlemen who carry on the business of the country; and it appears, therefore, that the fitness of a Minister for any particular office, is almost a matter of indifference. While the Government consider it their duty to bring down a Bill for the manipulation of the public service, they have laid nothing before us to warrant so important a change being made in the present system of carrying on the affairs of the country, particularly as we are now on the eve of a general election. I confess if we were in the first session of a Parliament, I should look at the matter with great care before casting my vote; but when it is an open question as to what Government may administer the affairs of this country next Session, I think no great injury can be inflicted on the public service, if this is allowed to remain over until another year. I was struck with the view that has been entertained by some hon. gentlemen of the majority in this branch of the Legislature, when in another Parliament, not very far distant, the majority did not seem to be considered of very great account.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—I do not propose to speak with regard to the advisability of the proposed change; but since I have sat in this House, I have discovered that there is a certain amount of anxiety generally manifested on the eve of a general election to tinker at the Constitution. I do not rise to advocate the retention of the office of Receiver-General, or that it should exist at all under a more euphonic name than that of Coffin, but I do think those constant changes are undesirable, as they unsettle the public mind. I don't think, on the eve of the death of a Parliament, or of a Ministry which, God forbid, there should ever be a resurrection of, it is desirable that this particular change in the Department of Justice should be made, and I shall vote in support of the amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As several gentlemen have adverted to the fact, that another Bill of a similar character to this one has yet to come up from the Lower House, and have stated that they would be better able to come to a conclusion on them if they had the two measures before them, if it is the wish of the House, I shall let this Bill stand over for a few days.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—It appears to me that this is a matter that might very safely be allowed to remain over until another Parliament. I do not think it is wise for a moribund Parliament to change the system under which the public service is being conducted, especially when they had ample opportunity, at any time during the past five years, to make the change if they had found it advisable to do so. The present system, so far as I know—at all events up to very lately—has worked well for ten years, and it seems to me, where the public service has been well conducted for ten years, that it is a strong recommendation that no change should be made, at least until the new Parliament is elected.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That being the view of the leader of the Opposition, I presume it is better to take the sense of the House at once on the Bill. I desire to inform the Senate, that the introduction of this Bill is not a new idea, or one that has arisen within the last few months. It is the result of the observations and experience of the hon. member for South Bruce, and if hon. gentlemen will read the speech that he made last year in addressing his own constituents, they will see he then stated that he had satisfied himself the business of the Department of Justice had trebled within the last six years. It has always been conceded that the ex-Minister of Justice had devoted his entire time and attention to the details of the Department, and it is very well known it was in consequence of the heavy labor devolving upon him in the administration of that office,* and the heavy tax upon his mental and physical powers, that he had to withdraw from it. It was entirely at the instance of the member for South Bruce, this Bill was introduced, and not on the suggestion of the present Minister of Justice. I desire also to call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact, that in the last Session in which he had the honor of leading in this Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to announce that it was then in contemplation to increase the number of the Executive, owing to the addition of other Provinces to the Dominion having caused a corresponding increase in the work of the Administration. That reference was made in a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne in 1873, and I am sure the hon. gentleman from Kingston will be prepared to admit that the Department of the Interior which was subsequently created, is a very large and important branch of the Administration, and one that will necessarily increase. As to the number of Ministers, under our present system, until the several Provinces have become more homogeneous, I do not think it would be wise to disturb the present arrangement, and that the number of Ministers should be increased rather than diminished. With reference to the abolition of the office of Receiver-General, it met with the approbation of gentlemen in the other House who have had a good deal of experience in Governments. They did not agree, however, in the view that the creation of the additional office of Attorney-General was necessary.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—With reference to the increase in the labor in the Department of Justice, I have no doubt it has been very greatly augmented by the number of references that were made to the Minister from other Departments. I apprehend, however, it was practically owing to the want of application and want of determination on the part of the heads of the other Departments. I have a strong conviction that that was the case. If the head of a Department—no matter what Department it is—thinks well to get rid of the responsibility of any question, he refers it to the Minister of

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Justice and avoids it himself. I think, if the number of references came to be enquired into, a great many of them would turn out to be such as I have alluded to.

A division was then taken on the amendment with the following result.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

FIRST READINGS.

The following Bills from the Commons were introduced, and read the first time.

Bill—"An Act respecting the duty on Malt."

Bill—"An Act to provide for the creation and registration of Homestead Exemption estates in the Territories of Canada."

Bill—"An Act to amend Section sixty-eight of the Penitentiary Act of 1875."

Bill—"An Act to amend the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874."

ONTARIO EXPRESS AND TRANSPORTATION COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Bill—"An Act respecting the Ontario Express and Transportation Company," was read the second time.

AFTER RECESS.

THE ONTARIO EXPRESS AND TRANSPORTATION COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. HOPE moved the second reading of the Bill intituled, "An Act respecting the Ontario Express and Transportation Company." He said, this company had been incorporated by letters patent under the Ontario Joint Stock Companies Letters Patent Act of 1874, and they now came before this Parliament asking for Dominion powers.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day having been called for resuming the adjourned debate on the Hon. Mr. Read's motion—

"To resolve, That this House regrets that the mode adopted by the Government in relation to the construction of the Pacific Railway, involves the expenditure of enormous sums of public money without any corresponding beneficial results,"

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL said:—On Friday last, before this House adjourned, I tried to establish that for a country of limited resources the only reasonable way to build a great public work like the Pacific Railway was by interesting private enterprise in it, as was done in the case of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and in the early settlement of this continent. I might add to the example I furnished the other day the example of the East India Company, which has done so much to increase the wealth and prosperity of England. This colony of Canada, when in its infancy, and when its means were very limited, accomplished something extraordinary through its excellent organization. Development was rapid in spite of all the difficulties she met in her way. Receiving no aid from France, Canada had to depend upon herself. At a time not very remote from the conquest, the colony produced more wheat in proportion to the number of its inhabitants than it does now. The quantity produced was equal to thirteen bushels per capita, while according to the last census, if I remember well, we hardly produced three bushels per head. It was the same with other produce. The whole colony was then sustained by the produce of the soil. They imported nothing that was requisite to feed and clothe themselves. At that time the expenses of the colony were comparatively immense on account of the wars which had to be waged for about twenty-nine years against armies as large as the entire population of the country, without speaking of wars against Indians, and we see by the millions expended by the United States what an Indian war costs. Moreover, at that time the hardy pioneers of the colony had already explored almost all the continent of North America from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from our great lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. These are facts which I only mention en passant, and only to show the vitality and strength of a colony established on the principle I have mentioned. It may be said that the present Government recognized the wisdom of their predecessors by adopting, almost in its entirety, the railway policy of their predecessors, by the Statute passed in the Session of 1874, but I shall endeavor to point out the difference there is between the two Acts. The second clause of the Act of 1872 (35 Victoria, chapter 71) provided for the construction of the railway by private enterprise, and to this was added the words, "and not by the Dominion Government," to define even more clearly the policy of the Government. The third clause provided for a subsidy in land and money, and the land was given in alternate blocks on each side of the line in such a way that one-half was retained by the Government for the benefit of the Dominion. This was a well defined and well digested policy, similar to what was called in early days the system of proche en proche, followed for the establishment of the Seigniories.

The present Government, to a certain extent, re-enacted the railway measure of 1872, but they left it optional to construct the road by private enterprise or directly by the Dominion. I consider that a great mistake, and we see the effects of it already in the expenditure of nearly $10,000,000 with very small results to show for it. It may be contended that the grants of land and money offered by the late Government were not sufficient to induce private capitalists to undertake this work. I do not admit that; and I am not aware that the Government have ever taken steps to ascertain what could be done in that way. In fact, the system never had a trial. I think one great reason why no capitalists have come forward and offered to take contracts for sub-sections, as provided by the 8th Section of the Act of 1874 (37 Vict., chap. 14) is because the Government have not commenced the work in a proper way or in the proper place. My hon. friend from Belleville remarked the other day that the first thing to be ascertained in building a road is where you are going to; but it is still more important to know where you should start from, and it was a great mistake that this was not definitely settled by the present Government in 1874. In 1872, by letter dated 9th of July, and which is still of record amongst public documents, Sir Hugh Allan offered, if he obtained the contract, to build, at his own expense, a branch to unite the railways of our Province, connecting the Intercolonial with the Pacific at the eastern terminus southeast of Lake Nipissing. At the time he intended to build the whole Pacific Railway as a private enterprise and he was joined by a number of capitalists, representing immense financial strength. This indicates what might have been done if the Government had encouraged private enterprise. This Senate has lately passed a Bill to put the Canada Central in a position to continue as far as Lake Nipissing. And we are informed that the contract to build that road is signed, thus showing what private capital can do, and how this connection is needed. I contend the only logical way to build the Pacific Railway, is to commence at the eastern end, connecting with this road in the Ottawa Valley, and to build westward. I contend it is the most economical way, and it met with the approval of Parliament in 1872. When British Columbia came into the Confederation, the following, amongst other resolutions, were adopted by a large majority of both Houses:

"Sec. 11. The Government of the Dominion undertake to secure the commencement simultaneously, within two years from the date of the Union, of the construction of a railway from the Pacific towards the Rocky Mountains, and from such point as may be selected east of the Rocky Mountains, towards the Pacific, to connect the seaboard of British Columbia, with the Railway system of Canada; and further, to secure the completion of such railway within ten years from the date of the Union." (Journals House of Commons, Session 1871, vol 4, p. 198.)

The Act of 1872, 35 Vic. Cap. 71, section 1, reads as follows:

"A railway to be called 'The Canadian Pacific Railway,' shall be made in conformity with the agreement referred to in the Preamble of this Act, and such railway shall extend from some point on or near Lake Nipissing, and on the south shore thereof, to some point on the shore of the Pacific Ocean, both the said points to be determined by the Governor-in-Council."

Thus fixing the starting point, referred to in the resolution, on the south shore of Lake Nipissing, and providing that the precise place should be determined by the Governor-in-Council. The same clause was re-enacted in the Act of 1874. Accordingly, Orders-in-Council were passed fixing that terminus, and maps have been issued showing the exact point fixed upon for the eastern terminus. I say the Statute imposes an obligation on the Government to begin the work simultaneously at both ends. That obligation the Government cannot evade; it is the law of the country. The Dominion is pledged to it. The obligations of this Dominion towards the people of British Columbia, have been often, in strong terms, and very properly advocated in this Legislature. The foreign office thought fit to intervene, and to urge upon the Canadian Government the necessity of doing justice to them. A sum of two millions of dollars was offered to that Province to build the Esquimalt and Nanaimo branch as compensation for the delay in building the main road, and if it had not been for the action of this House an additional burden of $2,000,000 would have been inflicted on the country. This is what has been done for the 60,000 inhabitants of British Columbia, and every day we show our anxiety to do them justice. But what has been done for the 1,500,000 people of Quebec and the Ottawa Valley, in whose favour it was stipulated that the construction of the road should be commenced simultaneously at both ends? Surely the resolutions are as binding in their favour as they are in favour of the 60,000 inhabitants of British Columbia? A syngraphic contract was entered into, without which the people of Quebec would not have consented to the resolutions, and they ought to have the clauses in their favour complied with. To justify the contract given for nuts and bolts without tender the hon. Secretary of State invoked the "sacred bond" binding the Government to give them the contract as they had already been awarded the contract for the rails. Does not the law of the country create for the hon. Secretary of State as strong a bond for the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch as it has in the other case? Now I shall endeavour to show not only are the Government bound by Statute to commence work on the eastern end of the line, simultaneously with the western end, but it should be done in the interests of the whole Dominion. It is now admitted by everybody that the water stretches' scheme is impracticable. To its adoption may be attributed most of the costly blunders which have been committed by the Government. Suppose the Government could succeed in building a road from Fort William to the Pacific Coast. I say it would practically be of very little use to the Dominion, and the United States would reap the principal advantages from the expenditure. The policy of running the road to Fort William and stopping there, leaving the eastern section to be built by our grandchildren, is but little better than the "water stretches" scheme, because it can be of no use to us for six months in the year. The effect would be to throw the whole trade of the great North-West into the United States, because the stream of commerce having once made its way towards that country, it will be very difficult to divert it, and bring it back to the Dominion. It is well known that American capitalists are organized to build railways to get the benefit of our large outlay upon our national enterprise. If we were to commence the work of construction as it was originally intended we should carry the road from the Ottawa Valley westward. The trade which it would develop would help to pay running expenses until the development of the North-West would augment trade to such an extent as to yield some return for the capital expended. Our old Provinces would immediately get the benefit of the trade created by the colonization of the country along the road, our settlements would extend toward the west without interruption; and my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture would keep our immigrants on our soil, instead of losing nine out of ten of them when sent to the west through the United States where they almost all remain. I shall now proceed to show how money might have been saved by pursuing this course. For instance, the large amount expended for the transportation of rails and other materials might have been saved if work had been commenced at the eastern end. If the Pembina Branch had been constructed two years ago, there would have been some justification for paying the Kittson Line such an enormous sum for transporting rails for it, on the ground that it would have afforded railway facilities to the people of Manitoba; but the rails are rusting there and the people have no return for the outlay. If that money had been expended in the construction of the eastern section the country would have had the benefit of it. I know one of the greatest objections to it has been stated by the hon. Secretary of State (whose words I have taken down)—that the north shore of Lake Superior is one of the most inhospitable parts of the continent. With all deference to the hon. gentleman, who has, no doubt, stated what he sincerely believes, I am prepared to prove to the contrary. Many parts of this country which are now well settled have, in days gone by, been condemned as inhospitable and unfit for settlement. When France abandoned Canada it was said it would be absurd to send men and spend money to maintain possession of "a few acres of snow." That was the opinion that was entertained in the Court of France at that time, of the country which now forms the Dominion of Canada and the Mississippi Valley. In the Province of Quebec the Valley of St. Maurice, which is now considered a very rich country, and the St. John Lake district, which produces wheat in immense quantities, were but twenty years ago regarded as uninhabitable. I shall now read from Mr. Fleming's report on the Canadian Pacific Railway surveys, a description of the country lying north of Lake Superior, which the hon. Secretary of State regards as the most inhospitable region on the continent. Mr. Fleming says with respect to the section between Lake Nipissing and Lake Nipegon:—

"The exploration from Lake Nipissing to the mouth of the River Pic proved satisfactory. It was found that nearly the whole of the country though which the line is projected in this section, offers a fair site for the railway. Abundance of timber and a proportion of good soil is reported." (Rep. of 1877 P. 50.)

Of course the soil which produces that kind of wood is not always the best, but the report shows that there is good land which produces all the grains which are cultivated in the different Provinces of the Dominion. I will cite from Mr. Austin's report on explorations between Lake Nipissing and River Pic, extracts giving a good idea of the country generally:—

"Following the Lake (Nipissing) shore for about twenty miles, and thence striking directly to the mouth of Smoky River, twenty-eight miles from the starting point, the soil is good, about one-quarter of the distance is brule and the rest generally well timbered with pine and evergreen woods and a variety of hard woods; thence to the fiftieth mile along the valley of the Sturgeon River, level and well timbered; soil good."

And then, going on to describe the country in the direction of Lake Missinabee, he says:—

"Most of the distance up to this is surprisingly level, gravel and sand abounding, with some good soil near the rivers (and the country is all over crossed by rivers) where wild peas, oats and barley, were seen growing luxuriantly, and abundance of timber—spruce, tamarac, balsam, pitch-pine, white birch and poplar."

Proceeding to give a general appreciation of the country all along the line, in this part of the country, he says:—

"Nearly the whole of the country through which the line is projected offers a fair site for a railway, and is what might be called a generally level country, comparatively but little rock existing in the immediate neighborhood of the proposed location. Abundance of wood can be had, although much of it has been destroyed by fire. It consists of pitch-pine, spruce, tamarac, white birch, balsam, cedar and poplar. In places the timber is small as yet. But little clay exists to the eastward of Notosogoma Lake, but abounds towards the Pic River."

We see that, though of not the very best quality, the country is far from being of that inhospitable character which has been represented. It was alleged that such was the character of that country that it would not be possible to establish stations nor the necessary staff for maintaining the road. The foregoing extract is more than sufficient to do away with such an impression, and other reports which I shall cite will show, as a matter of fact, that this country is far more advantageous for colonization purposes than was at first reported. It is known there are many parts of that country called brulés, where the fire has swept over the face of the land and it presents a very desolate aspect. This is what created the wrong impression which prevailed. In our Province, for instance, I know a large tract of country, worth $40 an acre now, which was sold sixty years ago for a barrel of Jamaica. It was a brulé and was not considered of much value. I shall now refer to another report which is quoted by Mr. Fleming. It is from Professor John Macoun, M. A., Professor of Botany, Albert College, Belleville, and reads as follows:—

"During the summer of 1869, Professor R. Bell, of the Geological Survey, examined the region around Nipegon River and Lake, and reported that there were large areas of land, both in the vicinity of the Lake and River, well situated for agricultural purposes. Speaking of the Nipegon country, he says: 'In the Nipegon country, the largest tract of good land appears to be on the southwestern side of the lake, from the Noawatin River northwards, to the Pagit-chigama, a distance of fifty miles, the country is comparatively level, and the soil generally fertile; but we could not ascertain from our explorations how far westward this tract extends. The Indians and others, however, represent it as continuing nearly to the River Winnipeg, and becoming more generally level in receding from Lake Nipegon. Some of the peninsulas in Lake Nipegon, within the above distance, are hilly, but the soil generally is good, even on these, consisting of a brownish loam sufficiently tenacious, when moist, to retain its form after being pressed in the hand. The rivers entering this part of Lake Nipegon, as far as examined, were found to flow with tortuous courses between muddy banks of clay, over-spread with fine sand. The clay, as seen in the banks generally appears sandy from having become mixed with the overlying deposit; but when clean sections are obtained, it is usually found to be stiff tenacious and free from grit. On the higher levels the sand is often coarse and stratified with layers of gravel.

"There is a considerable area of good land around the bottom of South and McIntyre's Bays and on the peninsulas east of the latter Bay and Gull Bay. From the mouth to the first rapid on the Poshkokagon, the loamy banks of the river are from twenty to thirty feet high. The River Kabitotquia is so crooked that, by following its windings from the mouth to the portage leading to Chief's Bay, the distance was estimated to be fully thirty miles, although it is only nine miles in a straight course. On both sides the country is level and the soil sandy, supporting a growth of grass and bushes, the timber having been all burned off by repeated fires within the last few years. The land is free from stones, and very little labour would be necessary to make it ready for the plough."

After this quotation of Professor Bell Mr. Macoun goes on to give his own opinion of the country as follows:—

"A number of other localities are mentioned having a good soil, and capable of supporting a large population.

"During the summer of 1869, I made extensive collections of the plants in the immediate vicinity of Lake Superior, and at some distance from its shore, and in no case did I find boreal plants except close to the Lake. Although the greater part of the land was covered with spruce, it was quite evident that if this were cleared away the land would be drier, and a different vegetation would spring up. In the summer of 1870, very extensive fires took place and much of this timber was consumed. My second visit confirmed the opinion I had formed on my first, that the apparent coldness of the Lake Superior region was caused by a superabundance of moisture. Even three years had made a change, and the vegetation now springing up was indicative of a drier climate."

I have no doubt but that much of the land on the eastern side of the watershed is suitable for cultivation, and that, taken as a whole, it is little behind many parts of the Laurentian country in Ontario."

Of course, I understand that portion of the country is cut by ridges of rock, and some parts of it are not suited for settlement; but it is a fact that all along the north shore of Lake Superior and between the eastern part of Lake Nipissing and south and west of Lake Nipegon, the country presents advantages equal to those of other parts of Canada. I think it was a great mistake on the part of the Government to attempt the construction of the Pacific Railway as a public work, and build it exclusively by grants of money, as is being done. And I would call attention to this fact, that after the expenditure of $10,000,000 upon it, we have not sufficiently interested anybody in the future prosperity of that part of the Dominion where work has been commenced to induce a settlement in it. When this continent was colonized it was by means of grants given as rewards to those who exerted themselves to settle the country. If the Government had appealed to the self interest of the engineers and other parties employed in explorations and the building of the road, by offering to pay them one-third in money and two-thirds in land-grants, they would have exerted themselves to present the advantages of that country to settlers. Every one of them would have become a colonization agent, the founder of a new colony would have made his land grant his home, and would have been bound to the soil in the same way as the early settlers of the country were. That was the plan adopted in the early settlement of Canada. Those who held official positions under the French Government received very little in the way of salary for their services, but they were granted large tracts of country which made the fortunes of their children. I can understand, if we had the wealth of England, the wisdom of building this great railroad by money grants, but in the state of our finances and with our limited means, we must find some other way to construct it. For a young country like ours, with annual deficits, and increasing burdens, it is astonishing how unwisely the public money has been expended. I find there has been expended upon a telegraph system west of Manitoba and east to Fort William, which is of no practical benefit at all, a sum of $305,000. I have just been informed that this line never earned $20 since it went into operation. If the work on this railroad had been conducted properly, the telegraph line could have been made in connection with the building of the road, since it is of no use as long as the road is not built. That telegraph line could have been built for one-tenth of the amount it has cost the country. The Pembina Branch has cost $208,163 and large sums have been expended in the purchase and transportation of rails. It is the same with most of the other works in connection with our Canadian Pacific Railway. If the original scheme had been followed, that is, if it had been commenced at its eastern terminus and built westward, as provided for in the legislation of 1871 and 1872, by private companies subsidized with sufficient land grants, coupled with limited money grants, the greater portion of the money already expended would have been saved. By way of illustration, let us examine the summarized statement of the payments made on the Pacific, as described in Appendix Z. of Mr. Fleming's report, p. 383. On the contracts, 31 in number, a sum of $4,942,739.12 was paid up to the 1st of January 1877. The contracts 1, 2, 3, and 4 for Telegraphs, amount to $305,054. Nine-tenths of that sum would have been saved by constructing the line with the road, and of that tenth, one third only should have been paid in money. Contract No. 5, is for the Pembina Branch, $208,163.00, two-thirds of which could have been paid by land grants, say a saving of $138,775.40. Contracts No. 6, to 11 are for rails and amount, in the aggregate, to $2,812,494.00 without speaking of the blunder committed by buying that immense quantity on a falling market, which caused a loss of more than a million and a half; $1,874,996.00 would have been saved by paying two-thirds of that by land grants. Contract No. 12 is for the Georgian Bay Branch and represents a net loss of $41,000.00. Contract No. 13 for grading and bridging the line from Fort William to lake Shebandowan, cost $239,220.00; two-thirds paid in land grants, would have saved $159,480.00. Contract No. 14 for grading and bridging from Selkirk to Cross Lake cost $214,500; two-thirds paid in land grants would have saved $143,000. Contract No. 15, for grading and bridging from Cross Lake to Keewatin costs $1,594,083; two-thirds paid in land grants would have saved $1,061,696.00. I may remark that this item is left in blank in the appendix, with two other items, which I fill with the valuations made by the engineers of the work under contract. Contract No. 16, subsidy to Canada Central, proportioned to work done, that is $68,000, is a proper expense, but would be useless if the Government were to persist in their policy of abandoning the eastern part. Contract No. 17, for transfer of rails to British Columbia, $51,462.96, was necessary to carry out the former agreement, but two-thirds might have been paid in land grants, saving $34,308.64. Contracts 18, 20, 21, 22, for transportation of rails from Montreal, amounting in the aggregate to $287,929.58, might have been avoided. The road, if commenced at its eastern terminus, would have transported its own rails and other materials, and saved four-fifths of this sum, say a saving of $230,343.67. Contracts 19 and 24, for engineer's houses, are a useless expense, as the establishment of groups of settlements, would have rendered it unnecessary and saved an expenditure of, say $4,683.70. Contract No. 23, for sleepers from Fort William westward, cost $14,648.14, two-thirds paid in land grants would have saved $9,765.43. Contract No. 25, for grading and bridging from Sunshine Creek to English River, costs $129,100; two-thirds paid in land grants would have saved $85,800. Contract No. 26, for engineers' shop and works, $30,989; two-thirds paid in land grants would have saved $20,600. Contract No. 27, for transportation of rails from Montreal, cost $89,060, work which would have cost hardly one-fifth of that sum, had those materials been transported by the railway itself, saving $71,248. Contract No. 28 was not executed. Contract No. 29 for spikes, cost $8,550.00; two-thirds paid by land grants would have saved $5,900.00. Contract No. 30, for bolts and nuts, cost $16,160.00; two-thirds paid in land grants would have saved $10,774.00. Contract No. 31, for bolts and nuts, cost $6,800.00; two-thirds paid in land grants would have saved $4,534. The two last items of this appendix, for inspection of rails, insurance, and commissions, $218,553.06, and engineering and supervision of construction, $216,754.11; in all, $435,317.17 would have been saved—at least four-fifths of it—making a saving in money of $4,519,758.52, which would have been effected on the thirty one contracts enumerated in said Appendix Z, and executed up to the 1st of January, 1877. Now, taking the expenditure on the surveys on the Pacific, up to the 1st of January, 1877, we have, according to Mr. Flemings report of 1877, a sum of $3,136,615.75. Two-thirds of that work, paid in land grants, would have saved a sum of $2,091,077.17, which, added to the above sum, makes $6,610,835.69, as appears by the following table:—

So, out of a total of $9,693,820, expended on the Pacific, and this not covering the expenditures on the Fort Francis Lock, and the Kaministiquia—not less than $6,610,835, that is two-thirds of the whole money expended, should have been economized, and would have remained in the public treasury, if the system recognized in the Act of 1872, and partly re-enacted in the Act of 1874, had been followed. More than six millions might have been economized, when the industries of the country are depressed, and when we have to face a deficit. Now, let us suppose that a proportion of two-thirds could not, practically, have been paid in land grants, one third would still have been economized, or more than three millions; and instead of the enterprise involving the expenditure of an unlimited amount of money, we would have a national enterprise, giving an immense impulse to the colonization of our great North-West, by the expenditure only of a limited sum, adequate to the resources of the country. I may add, I consider it was a great mistake to purchase such an enormous quantity of rails abroad, when we possessed the iron and coal to manufacture them at home. I estimate that by the time our great railroads are all completed, we will have expended $50,000,000 in purchasing rails and other iron material required for their construction. I ask this honorable House would it not be wiser to expend this money at home and develop our iron industries? Would it not be wiser to make a sacrifice of a few hundred thousand, or even millions of dollars, if necessary, to establish iron works at home, and develop the vast resources we possess? In the early days of the settlement of the country, men of science were paid for their services mainly by land grants. If the same course had been pursued in the Pacific Railway surveys, and one-third of the salaries of the engineers and their assistants had been paid in cash and the balance in land grants, two thirds of the $3,136,615.75 expended up to the 1st January, 1877, on the surveys of the Pacific, might have been saved. I think such a policy would be of advantage to the Dominion. In my opinion this great Pacific Railway question is the one of all absorbing interest before the country now. Upon the wisdom shown in constructing that great work depends the future prosperity of this Dominion. Since 1867 we have been engaged in a series of great undertakings. The first was Confederation; next the Intercolonial Railway; then, the enlargement of the canals; the acquisition of the North-West; the union with British Columbia and the commencement of the Pacific Railway. Of these, certainly the most important is the last. If we cannot construct it as a commercial enterprise, we must build it as a national highway to unite the Provinces. In that way the population of the Dominion will be rapidly increased, the revenue augmented and the prosperity of the Dominion established on a sound and permanent basis.

A PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Hon. Dr. CARRAIL moved the adjournment of the debate. He said: My object in moving the adjournment of the debate is to make a personal explanation to this House. I see the hon. gentleman about whom I have some remarks to make (Mr. Brown) is not in his seat. Whether he has gone to Toronto, Bow Park, or to the whist table, I know not, but he is absent, though his visits to this House are like angel's visits, which, we are told on good authority, are few and far between. It is difficult, at any time, to find him, but I shall, without waiting for his presence, proceed to direct the attention of this House to a subject which has pained me more than anything that has occurred since I became a member of the Senate of Canada. I refer to an attack made in the columns of the Globe newspaper on a gentleman whom every honest man must revere, who has been attacked falsely, vilely, and feloniously attacked by a member of this Senate, or with his connivance or cognizance, for, as chief of the paper, he is particeps criminis. Speaking through the columns of the Globe, a paper which has done infinite injury to this country—a paper which railway ticket agents in San Francisco quote to advise you not to travel by the Grand Trunk Railway in Canada, because it is always from five to ten hours behind time with snow blockades and bad management—a paper that abuses and vilifies everybody who differs in opinion from the hon. gentleman who is the putative father or the godfather of the article which I am about to read—an article which will disgust every man who reads it, and which ought to call the blush of shame to the cheek of every man who should have the hardihood to defend it. Speaking of the events which took place in the Commons on Friday night, I have no doubt, with a view to cover up the disgraceful character of the proceedings on the Ministerial benches, he makes use of the following words:—

“To say that Sir John A. Macdonald was on Friday night somewhat under the influence of liquor would be a grossly inadequate representation of the fact; he was simply drunk in the plain, ordinary sense of that word. As the night wore on, he became still more so, and from 6 to 8 on Saturday morning, to quote the conventional language usually employed on such occasions, “thoroughly laid out,” and had to be hid away by his friends, if not in shame, at least in pity, and as an absolutely prudential and proceeding.”

The first reply which I, who took part in the ceremonies that night, desire to make to this article, is that it is false, “falsely than all fancy fathoms”; so false as to lower the dignity of that paper to the lowest depths of public opinion in any community. I say for any member of this House to perpetrate such an outrage upon our leading statesman, a gentleman whom the people of Canada must honour for all time to come, to publish such a wilful, malicious, unforgivable, damnable lie is unworthy the pen or tongue of any person who has any claim to the position of a gentleman. I was in company with Sir John on the night in question myself, and I propose to narrate what took place: Sir John went down, like all other gentlemen of even temperment in the Commons, to the saloon below, where he took eight oysters with a glass of sherry and water, in testimony whereof I can bring the best names in the House of Commons. He was perfectly sober—not a sign of intemperance about him. Yet, we find that right hon. gentleman black lettered next day in the columns of the Globe; a paper which, I regret to say, has done more to drag this Dominion through the dirt or filth, and discredit us amongst the countries of Europe, than the efforts of all the immigration agents and the speeches of Lord Dufferin can counteract the baneful, pernicious effect of for a century. That lying, rascally, villainous organ has for over thirty years been endeavouring to belittle the leader of the Conservative party; it has pursued him through the country, in Parliament, through the corridor, through the lobby, at pic-nics all through his life, with the object of ruining his reputation, and, I desire to say, that this last attempt is a wilful, wicked, wretched, infernal falsehood. I say it because I was with Sir John until after six o'clock that morning. I can bring other witnesses here who not only saw the right hon. gentleman, but breakfasted with him, who can prove the falsity of the Globe's statement. I sat with Sir John and Mr. Hector Cameron of Toronto at one table at the time he is accused of having got drunk.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—How were the oysters served?

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—You can bring on your reporters and take this all down for the Herald. I am bound to bring this thing up and expose it. The reason why I do so is that the hon. gentleman who is the managing director of the Globe and who is my text on this occasion, is popularly supposed to be the author of the article which I have quoted from his paper. Assuming for a moment that we had the pleasure of looking upon his presence here and hearing him disclaim having written it, and that sometimes articles crept into the columns of his paper without editorial supervision; is it presumable that anybody of common intelligence would suppose for a moment that any of his employes—I am not speaking for my words to fall dead upon this carpet; no, it's a case of “Diamond cut Dymond”—would dare to give form and shape to such expressions in manuscript, to telegraph them over the wires to Toronto; to set them in the type of the Globe office; to impress them upon the maiden sheet of paper, and send them broadcast over the country, unless they knew very well that they would not be displeasing to the gentleman who is well known to be the political mischief-maker of Canada since I have been a child. Twice a year he comes down here and flits across our horizon like the aurora borealis, because of the difficulties that beset the Ministry in consequence of their shortsightedness. I am not going so far as to say they telegraph to Toronto to bring him here, but he comes periodically, when the Ministry expect trouble, and he presides over this body with the lofty dignity of Jupiter when Juno is in a rage about her domestic arrangements, to weigh us down with his dictatorial assurance. If he were present, instead of regarding him as a philosopher, I would not be surprised at finding myself styling him a Brahmin, the cow worshipper of Bow Park, who, over the litter of his sacred cow, desires to mould the policy of this great Dominion, not a jot or tittle of which he has ever taken a part in that he has not proved himself to be a most conspicuous failure. There are those who are bold enough to say he writes most of those malicious articles against his old opponent himself, and that he imported his editor from England (Mr. Dymond) and placed him as Crown prosecutor for the Reform party for the last five years, against the greatest statesman this country has ever seen, persecuting him, abusing him, charging him with every crime in the calendar, and then comes down here, and, forsooth, shelters himself behind the impersonality of an editor. Surely he and his master are Arcades ambo. The hon. gentleman from Toronto has not disclaimed the paternity of this article, and we cannot say with Longfellow—

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And departing leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.

He will never leave a footprint that anyone will desire to follow, when he is guilty of concocting such villainous, malicious slanders and sending them broadcast over the world. I am prepared to hold myself answerable for the remarks I have made, not only on the floor of this House, but outside on the hustings or anywhere else that the hon. gentleman may choose to discuss them; and having said this, with the permission of the House I beg to withdraw my motion for the adjournment of the debate.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN resumed the debate on Hon. Mr. Read's motion: He said:—I have not heard the whole of the speech of my hon. friend from Montreal (Mr. Trudel), but I do not think I understood him to coincide in the views of the hon. Senator from Saugueen with reference to the construction of the Georgian Bay section of the Canada Pacific Railway, a portion of the line which that hon. gentleman most emphatically condemns. Those gentlemen who are united in condemning the policy of the Government with respect to the Pacific Railway should be thoroughly agreed on all those points themselves. The resolution itself expresses regret that the mode adopted by the Government in relation to the construction of the Pacific Railway involves the expenditure of enormous sums of public money without any corresponding beneficial results. I do not feel that I can consistently with my own ideas of my public duty support this resolution, if for no other reason than because the gentlemen who have proposed it advocate views with reference to this public work which involve the expenditure of very much more money than the Government seem to be committed to. The hon. gentleman from Manitoba, for instance, (Mr. Girard) advocates a change of the route from its present location to one south of Lake Manitoba. It occurs to me that would be a very strange way of saving money to deflect a through line from a direct route, and make it twenty miles longer through a country much more difficult and expensive for railway purposes. With reference to the location of railway lines, I have here an authority on railway engineering from which I will, with the permission of the House, quote a few remarks bearing on through lines:—

“W. M. Gillespie, A.M., C.E., says:—
‘Straightness of direction is much more important on railroads than on common roads, for two reasons: the economy of straightness and the resistance and dangers of curves. From the great cost of the superstructure of a railroad, and the continually increasing expense of keeping it in repair, it is highly desirable that it should be as straight, and consequently, as short as possible. Suppose the total cost of a railroad to be $30,000 per mile, the interest of which is $1,800; the annual repairs of the superstructure, $1,000 per mile, and the expenses of engines also $1,000 per mile, the total annual expense will then be $3,800, which is the interest of $63,000, which sum might profitably be expended to shorten the road one mile, or $12 to shorten one foot of length. If this single foot gained was the only result of a day's labor of a locating party, it would be a satisfactory equivalent for the expenses of such a day's work. From these considerations it is also seen that a line ought not to diverge from the direct course between its extremities, and thus increase its distance, for the sake of the trade of a small town for whose benefit the time and fare of all the passengers and freight on the whole line would thus be taxed. It would be preferable to make branch track to the town. Curves, too, are necessary evils to be avoided for other reasons, &c., &c."

I see here a reference also to the American Railway Journal, which also advocates the construction of railways upon the shortest routes that can possibly be secured. I can understand the propriety of a resolution urging upon the Government the necessity of shortening a railway line in order to save expense; for, even though it cost more for construction, the saving would be in the future, when the public would not be required for all time to come to travel and transport freight by a longer and more expensive route than was necessary. How the hon. gentleman from Manitoba can consistently urge upon the Government the importance of lengthening the line, at an increased expenditure of probably a million of dollars, merely to favor a locality with comparatively few inhabitants, is beyond my comprehension. In connection with this subject, I might say that one of the great difficulties under which Halifax now labors, in trying to create a winter export trade, is the unnecessary length of the Intercolonial Railway, over which the produce of the west was expected to pass. I referred to this matter on a former occasion, and I was met by my hon. friend from Arichat with the argument that the Imperial guarantee could only be secured by the adoption of the Robinson route. I was rather surprised to hear from the hon. gentleman that the location of the route by the Baie de Chaleurs line was a sine qua non with the Imperial Government on which they should give the guarantee. I have in my hand the report of Mr. Fleming which gives a pretty accurate history of the location of that road and in replying to my observations on this matter I can scarcely give my hon. friend from Belleville credit for as much candor as I would expect from that hon. gentleman. In reading the despatch he only took a portion of it, and had he read the whole of it through he would have arrived at a very different conclusion. The despatch to which I refer is as follows:—

DOWNING STREET,
22nd July, 1868.

MY LORD,

"I have received your Lordship's telegraphic message that the route by the Baie de Chaleurs has been selected by the Canadian Government as the one to connect Truro with Riviere du Loup and thus complete the Intercolonial Railway. I understand three routes to have been under the consideration of the Government of Canada, namely, one crossing the River either at Woodstock or Fredericton, the second in a more central direction through New Brunswick, and the third following the line selected by Major Robinson in 1848.

"The route crossing the St. John River, either at Woodstock or Fredericton is one to which the assent of Her Majesty's Government could not have been given. The objection on Military grounds to any line on the South side of the St. John River are insuperable.

One of the main advantages sought in granting an Imperial guarantee for constructing the railway, would have been defeated, if that line had been selected—the remaining lines were the Central line and that following the general course of the route surveyed by Major Robinson—and Her Majesty's Government, has learned with much satisfaction what the latter has been selected, &c.

I have &c.,
(Signed),

BUCKINGHAM & CHANDOS,

To Governor,

the Rt. Hon. Viscount Monck.

I can find nothing in this whole despatch which expressly states that the Imperial guarantee should not be given if the central route had been adopted, although it intimates pretty strongly that the frontier route would not be favored by the Imperial guarantee; therefore, I think, upon that point I was not satisfactorily answered the other day, and I am inclined to think no despatch can be produced to show that the late Government had been compelled to adopt the very long and circuitous route which has involved so much loss to the country, and especially to Halifax. I contend, moreover, that the guarantee was a mere bagatelle compared with the enormous saving which the country could have calculated on by building the road for strictly commercial purposes on the shortest and most direct line. I have the authority of Hon. William Macdougall, C.B., at one time a member of the late Cabinet, who understood that the location of the road by such a long and expensive route, was done for the purpose of conciliating a particular locality, and that it was a great injury to the country. I quote from Letter VI., Hon. Mr. Macdougall, C.B., to Hon. Joseph Howe:—

"I am disclosing no secret of the Council-room when I affirm that, in September, 1868, except Mr. Tilley and myself, every member of the Government was either indifferent or hostile to the acquisition of the North-West Territories. When they discovered that a Ministerial crisis respecting the route of the Intercolonial Railway could only be avoided by an immediate agreement (and immediate action) to secure the transfer of these Territories to the Dominion, they were ready to act.

"On the same day that Sir John A. Macdonald and Mr. Campbell surrendered the interests of Ontario to Quebec and Mr. Mitchell, and—threw eight millions of dollars into the sea.—I carried a proposition to send a deputation to England, with full power to close negotiations for the purchase of one-third of the North American continent as an offset."

The day on which this eight millions of dollars, as he termed it, was "thrown into the sea," it was thrown away for the purpose of gratifying the people of a certain portion of the Province of Quebec, and he (Mr. Macdougall) secured for Ontario a share of the spoils, by the acquisition of the North-West Territories. It would be an interesting thing to discover, in connection with this matter, what the sop was that was given to the Maritime Provinces for yielding to this arrangement. But, aside from the general route of this railway, divergences were made, contrary to the strong remonstrances of Mr. Fleming, in order to satisfy personal and local influences, and most injurious to the general interests of the Maritime Provinces, because every mile so added, tends to cripple and obstruct the inter-provincial trade, now so much desired by all, and particularly by Halifax. The present Government are to be highly commended if they have the firmness to avoid such egregious mistakes in locating the Canada Pacific. The hon. Senator from Saugeen, in the course of his observations thought proper to refer, in terms of condemnation, to the action of the present Government in reference to the attempt to build, under the award of Lord Carnarvon, the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Branch. He was pleased to designate that effort as an attempt to bribe British Columbia. It will be remembered, however, that the former Administration, by Order-in-Council, which I now hold in my hand, dated 7th of June, 1873, provided for the construction of a road from Esquimalt to Seymour Narrows on the Island of Vancouver. If the building of the forty miles of road involved in the Esquimalt and Nanaimo line can be properly designated as a bribe to catch the vote of the people of that Province, it appears to me that the action of the late Government in providing for the construction of the longer line to Seymour Narrows was a very much more extensive bribe. The inauguration of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo road, as I understand it, was the result of the award of Lord Carnarvon, and the present Government, in consequence of that award, and as a conclusive evidence of their good faith, purchased a certain amount of steel rails for the construction of that particular line. How hon. gentlemen can censure the Government for their action in that matter I am at a loss to conceive; it is a well-known fact that the Senate, controlled by the leader of the Opposition, threw out that Bill, and it has always been a matter of surprise to me that the gentlemen who had under the former Administration provided for the construction of a much more extensive work on that Island should have condemned the present Government for undertaking to construct a section of that line. There is another matter to which the hon. gentleman from Belleville alluded the other day—the steel rails purchase—which has been referred to also by nearly every gentleman on the other side who has taken part in this debate. It seems to be a refrain of the song which is universally sung in connection with the attacks upon the Government, although the fact remains that the present Government bought the rails at $54 per ton, while the late Government paid as high as $84. But the hon. gentleman from Belleville, as a sort of variation in this song of the steel rails, took occasion to remark that he had heard it stated in another place, that a member from New Brunswick had approached the Government and had threatened to desert them unless they agreed to loan some old rails. The hon. leader of the Opposition has also referred to this. Either the hon.

gentlemen do not understand the nature of this case, or they scarcely do justice to the hon. gentleman to whom they have alluded. The facts of the matter are these: the Government had arranged to supply several branch lines as feeders to the Intercolonial Railway with old rails, by way of a loan. This arrangement received the approval of the House of Commons. A company chartered to build a railway through King's, Queen's, and Sunbury counties, applied for a portion of these rails, and some of the members from those counties used their influence in aid of this company. The Premier promised to loan the rails under certain conditions, and the remark which the gentleman in the other House had made at the meeting referred to, was unless that promise were carried out, he should feel inclined to oppose the Administration. As a representative always faithful and efficient in the interests of his constituents, the member for Queen's secured the promise of these rails—a promise, which, as an honest man, he claimed should be fulfilled, and which he naturally expects the Minister of Public Works to carry out in its fullest integrity. I think that is very different from the statement charged against that gentleman. I have for a long time had the acquaintance of the hon. gentleman referred to; he is a man who has accumulated considerable wealth, and raised himself to a good position in his native Province, where his word is considered as good as his bond, and I do not think his statement respecting this transaction can be challenged by any hon. gentleman in this House. The hon. gentleman from Belleville referred to the construction of the Pacific Railway as a subject of great importance, and as causing great uneasiness among the people; in that I heartily coincide with him, and I think, if hon. gentlemen opposite had had any idea of the burthen this work was to entail on the people of this country, they would have been more likely to have supported the view that I had with respect to that undertaking. Before such a disastrous scheme was concluded. But nothing seems to satisfy the hon. gentlemen; everything the Government undertake to do is, in their opinion, a blunder; the Kaminstiquia terminus, the Fort Francis Lock and the Georgian Bay

Hon. Mr. McClelan.

Branch undertakings, all seem to be a departure from the strict rule which those pseudo economists would force upon the country, and after listening to their denunciatory remarks, I have been forced to the conclusion there is really no governmental action that can be taken that will satisfy their minds, unless they can by some means or other secure the patronage of the Departments themselves.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—This recalls to my mind a remark that was made in 1873, when the discussion arose in this House with reference to the claims of the Inter-oceanic Company, and that of Sir Hugh Allan, the Canada Pacific Company. While the hon. leader of the Government in the Senate was speaking in support of the arrangement made for construction, the hon. member for Saugeen (Mr. Macpherson) interposed the remark, that the Government scheme "was not elastic enough," to which the hon. Mr. Campbell, replied, intimating that if the member for Saugeen was only associated with Sir Hugh it would be as elastic as possible.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I have also come to the conclusion from the very extended remarks of the hon. gentleman on the blunders expressed or implied of the Government, that no system of management in connection with this great undertaking can entirely satisfy him, or come up to his idea of propriety unless he is concerned in the administration of it. I have noticed with surprise, and I must say with very much regret, expressions of opinion on this and kindred questions, in which, although there was no direct charge of wrong doing made against the Administration, yet by a multiplicity of words, and by a peculiar way of manipulating figures, that impression is intended to be conveyed though not expressed. I regret very much that this course should be adopted, because I believe that the Premier of this Dominion has a thoroughly earnest desire to carry out every contract and make every disbursement upon just and equitable principles, and I have yet to learn that there has been a solitary charge of favoritism or corrupt practice proved against him. I say it is very unfortunate in the interests of the country that such charges should be made upon mere rumors without foundation, and be repeated by insinuation in this Chamber after the Premier has challenged his traducers to bring those charges before a committee of investigation. In referring to those matters, I notice that while hon. gentlemen seem to be kindled with a degree of patriotism, and apparently manifest an anxiety to protect the people and preserve the public money from being unnecessarily wasted in the construction of this road, I sometimes revert to former days, a few years back, and I find that the same zeal did not then inspire my hon. friends. When large expenditures were being inaugurated and carried on on the Intercolonial Railway, I never heard my hon. friend from Belleville open his lips and use his eloquent tongue to denounce a location which involved not only a waste of the public money, but which restricts the trade which naturally ought to spring up between the West and the Maritime Provinces. The hon. gentleman from Belleville, and the hon. gentleman from Saugeen, must have been conversant with all this wasteful and improper expenditure when it was being made, yet we never heard those hon. Senators, who are now so patriotic and so economical, condemn those transactions. Then there was a suspicious expenditure made under the guise of Secret Service money, the amount of which was enormously large, yet those gentlemen who are now fired with so much patriotism, did not then make any enquiry, or sound any alarm to call the attention of the country to it. It is well known, also, there were very many items of wasteful expenditure connected with the change of gauge on the Intercolonial Railway. Before the change was made, the people's representatives pressed upon Parliament the necessity of adopting the narrow gauge, and the Government were only sustained on their own policy by one or two votes. After the track had been laid, however, they found that the narrow gauge was becoming so popular that it would soon be adopted all over the continent, and they had to come down to what everybody must have seen was from the first inevitable, and the change had to be made after the rolling stock had been ordered, and a very large and unnecessary expenditure had been made, yet I never heard the hon. gentlemen call the attention of this House to it in any way, or sound any alarm over such a waste of the people's money. So, also, of the large and corrupt expenditures on Section 5 of the Intercolonial, and the misappropriation of the Northern Railway funds, with which my hon. friend from Saugeen, (Mr. Macpherson), is so conversant. These and numberless other mal-appropriations which existed under the rule of the late Government—many of which were subjects of investigation—could be referred to, if necessary. The people condemn such things, but these gentlemen who now manifest such new-born zeal and economy never once referred to these matters. But we find at this late period, after the Government have been committed by their predecessors to an enormous work, a work which has to be proceeded with under great difficulties and disadvantages, hon. gentlemen are continually making complaints and insinuating charges of corruption and favoritism—charges which I am sure have never been proved, and which I am confident cannot be proved against the Ministry—and circulating them broadcast throughout the country in order to create an unfavorable impression on the minds of the people, that is contrary to the best interests of the Dominion, and every true principle of truth and justice.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—The hon. gentleman from Hopewell has just now referred to the Pacific Railway as a legacy left to this Government by their predecessors, but I contend that the late Government never left this work or any part of it, as it is now being built, a legacy to their successors. The present Government, when they came into office, repudiated any obligation, and we have the Premier's written words, that they were not bound to carry out the alleged scheme of the late Ministry, to build a railway on Vancouver's Island from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, in proof of which I refer to the Prime Minister's letter of instructions to Mr. Edgar, dated 19th February, 1874, which are plain and emphatic, and with which the Premier sent out his friend and plenipotentiary, with extraordinary powers, leaving Mr.

Edgar, when he despatched that gentleman to British Columbia, to make known to them that they might fully understand the Government were not bound to build a railway on the Island, and further, to seek to obtain by any and all means whatever terms he could with that Province. In that memorable letter the Premier states distinctly, and I want my hon. friend from Hopewell to remember it, that the Government were not bound to build that railway; and when my hon. friend says a portion of the steel rails were sent to the Island in consequence of the Government being bound to construct that work, he is entirely at fault; some other reason must be found; it is in the face of the Premier's own letter to the contrary, and of the fact that the rails were sent long after this Senate (through the aid and assistance of Government supporters that I now see before me) threw out the Bill to construct that railway. And it is also notorious, and a fact, that the very contract for the rails was not signed until after the defeat of that very measure in this House, when the Government well knew that not one rail would be required on the Island. In fact the Government had determined not to build that railway, or else they could have tried the Bill again, as it only required the assistance of the two of their most ardent supporters to carry it—supporters who had so mysteriously voted against the Government Bill. We all know that both political parties were bound to the construction of the Pacific Railway, and yet we know that this Government came into power through not the most honorable means, pledged to defeat the railway policy of their predecessors, and they did crush it and defeat it by scheming and intriguing, although, I firmly believe, if the scheme of the late Government had been carried out, the larger portion of the money expended would have been saved, and instead of only forty miles being finished and ten millions of dollars expended, as we find now is the case, the road would have been pushed on and the larger part constructed before now, at comparatively little cost to the country. In 1871, the hon. gentleman from Amherst, speaking to the motion of the leader of the Government, in this Senate, said it was not intended that we should proceed with this work and complete it in ten years, in the face of insuperable difficulties; and it was then well known the language of my hon. friend from Kingston was clear, that the road had to be constructed through a terra incognita, that there might be many insuperable obstacles to surmount, and the term of ten years was well known to have been merely an earnest of the intention of the Government to proceed with the railway as fast as the resources of the country would permit. This is all plainly declared in the debate on the resolution here in 1871; therefore, the friends of this Government are stopped from saying that all the reckless extravagant expenditure of this Government was forced on them by a ten years' limit, or that the late Government are responsible for the millions of dollars illegally expended and wasted on the rusted steel rails. Yes, the rails themselves are rotting under the corruption that has been referred to and so thoroughly exposed in this debate, and it cannot be said, in any way, that this is due to the policy of the late Administration. It was not the policy of the late Government that induced the present Ministry to bind themselves by Minute of Council, on the 8th December, 1874, to the terms decided upon by the arbitrament of Lord Carnarvon in the month previous; that the railway from Esquimaux to Nanaimo should be commenced as soon as possible, and completed with all practicable dispatch; the construction of a wagon road and telegraph road immediately across the Rocky Mountains; the expenditure of not less than $2,000,000 a year on the Pacific Railway in British Columbia, and the entire completion of the railway from the Pacific Ocean to Lake Superior in fourteen years. It was to be finished before the end of the year 1890.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I say no Government should have dared to agree to such monstrous terms without first having obtained the sanction of Parliament; and I think the Senate at the time pursued, as usual, a wise policy when they rejected the Bill for the construction of the Esquimaux and Nanaimo Branch, and thus saved a debt being imposed on the country of millions of dollars. Had the Government then acted wisely, they would have instantly cancelled the negotations for the purchase (there being then no contract) of the steel rails, which could have been easily done by paying the contracting parties a small consideration for their trouble, and, by that means, a sum of nearly three millions of dollars could have been saved to the country. It is evident throughout, from the very first, the Government and their friends have been the enemies of this Pacific Railway, and had no intention of honestly fulfilling the obligation entered into with British Columbia, and connecting that Province with the rest of the Dominion. In 1875, we find them even attempting to entrap and bribe British Columbia with an offer of $750,000 if they would delay the construction of the Pacific Railway, but British Columbia spurned the offer; it was not money they wanted, they said, but they had been brought into the Confederation on the condition that this railway should be constructed to connect them with the rest of the Dominion as speedily as possible, having a due regard to our resources, and they very properly repudiated any other offer but that. Why, the Secretary of State publicly declared, not long ago, that it would take 40 years to build the railway,—and the Finance Minister said it would cost $150,000,000—and it does now appear that they are bound to be true prophets. They at first declared the scheme and terms offered to the Company as “those ruinous terms,” and yet the Government through the then Minister of Agriculture here, declared that the scheme did not offer sufficient inducements to a company. The Government not only defeated the scheme, but undertook, in the face of their own policy that it should be built only by a company, to build it themselves, with what ruinous results are now plainly seen and condemned by the people; with the waste of millions of dollars, the railroad scarcely commenced, and the country burthened with debt and increased taxation. This state of things cannot much longer continue. The railway must be built. It is a work of Imperial as well as of national importance, and the experience of the last five years has conclusively shown the insincerity and incapacity of the Government. The people will be no longer deceived with the cry of purity and the practice of corruption, with the elevating of the purity standard and bribing the constituencies—putting down corruption with “lots of money.” I shall not delay the time of the House by references to the Kaministiquia land purchase, the Neebing Hotel, the Georgian Bay branch, Fort Francis Lock and the Government blunders in connection with the steel rails. On these and every point to which my hon. friends from Saugeen and Belleville have referred they have shown extravagance, culpable neglect, and a want of capacity in the management of this great national work. At this late hour I shall not detain the House any longer, but trusting that the sense of this Senate will be taken on the motion now before us, I shall vote for the motion of my hon. friend from Belleville.

Hon. Mr. HOPE moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill “An Act to provide for the better auditing of the Public Accounts.”

Bill “An Act to repeal section twenty-three of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1876, as to Shipping in Canadian Waters.”

The House adjourned at 11.05 o'clock p.m.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, April 18th.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock p.m.

After Routine proceedings.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were read the third time and passed:—

An Act to grant relief to the Canada Agricultural Insurance Company.

An Act to grant certain powers to the Agricultural Mutual Assurance Association of Canada, and to change its name.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Hon Dr. CARRALL rose to make a personal explanation. He said:—You are all aware of certain events which have transpired recently with regard to the functions of the press and its relations to this and the other branch of the Legislature. It has been a subject of criticism of a character which I shall not advert to to-day. As I have unfortunately been dragged into the press again this morning, and as the statement published is, to say the least, not true, I feel it due to the gentleman whose name has been associated with mine to read the following explanation:—

I desire to make a personal explanation in justice to myself and also other hon. gentlemen, whose names are mentioned in the newspaper to which I would refer. To-day's Free Press says in a report of the speech delivered by Dr. Landerkin, in another place, that:—

“A Senator had come to the table, (meaning a table in the restaurant of the House of Commons) and complained that he had been accused by the member from South Ontario for getting the member for Kingston drunk. This, the Senator had denied, and had added that Brother Gibbs had better mind his own business.”

From the fact that I was the only Senator present at the place in question, on that occasion, and other reasons, it is evident that I am the Senator referred to. I, therefore, feel it due to myself to contradict the statement I have read, and to state that I did not make use of the words I have quoted. No such accusation has ever been made against me by the member for South Ontario. A jocular remark made by me has been perverted into a grave made accusation, in order to bolster up the vile falsehoods published in the Government newspapers, to which the attention of the House has already been directed. What I did say on the occasion in question, was in a laughing manner, to remark that I would not invite Sir John to take a drink for fear that brother Gibbs would say that I wished to make him drunk. My only reason for mentioning Mr. Gibbs' name, was that I saw him sitting at some little distance, and that I knew him to be a gentleman entertaining strong temperance opinions. It is right to add that the mark was not made in Mr. Gibb's hearing or addressed to him.

THE DECK-LOADS AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER moved the third reading of the Bill intituled “An Act to amend the law respecting Deck-loads.” He said the Bill, though a small one, was certainly of a very important character. It was to amend the Act of 1873 in such a manner as to provide that it should not apply to live stock.

Motion agreed to.

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day having been read for “Resuming the adjourned Debate on the Hon. Mr. Read's motion—To Resolve that this House regrets that the mode adopted by the Government, in relation to the construction of the Pacific Railway, involves the expenditure of enormous sums of public money, without any corresponding beneficial results,”

Hon. Mr. HOPE said:—In the course of the debate on the question now before the House the hon. Senator from Saugeen remarked, after alluding to the various subjects connected with this question, that the expenditure in connection with the inland transportation of steel rails in 1875, was one of the most extraordinary acts of any Government he ever knew of—that, in point of fact, most undisguised favoritism had been shown in the matter. As I consider this a very erroneous statement, I propose to show that his allegations are without foundation, and, in doing so, I shall be obliged to refer to the returns which have been laid before Parliament in regard to this matter; and, in the first place, I shall read a letter from the firm of Jacques & Company, dated the 5th November, 1874. It is as follows:—

MONTREAL, 5th December, 1874.

SIR,—We beg leave to enquire whether the Hon. the Minister of Public Works desires tenders for the transport of railway iron (recently closed for delivery at Montreal during next year) hence to ports on Lake Superior and Georgian Bay. Should such transport be required, we have the honor to state that, representing as we do the Merchants' Line of Propellers, with ample capacity to carry twenty thousand tons or more, commencing on the opening of navigation, and extending to the first week in September, as after that date it would be unsafe to send loaded propellers hence to Lake Superior ports, ample and satisfactory security can be given for the faithful performance of any engagements made by us.

We have the honor to be, Sir,
Your most obedient servants,

(Signed) G. E. JACQUES & CO.

"F. BRAUN, Esq., Secretary,
"Department of Public Works,
"Ottawa."

It will be necessary for me to read these letters seriatim, in order that the whole correspondence may be before the House:

"MONTREAL, 5th April, 1875.

"SIR—We notice in this morning's Montreal Herald" an advertisement of your Department, dated 1st instant, asking for tenders to transport 5,000 tons steel rails from Montreal to ports named in Lake Superior, for season of 1875, in which you desire the tenders to include all costs of handling, piling, insurances and charges at all points.

"Our object in writing is to be asked to be favored with what is covered by "all costs of handling, piling and charges at all points" and what value for insurance is to be placed on the rails.

"We are fully acquainted with the cost of handling here, but do not know what wharfage accommodation, if any, and to what extent, is provided at the place of destination for the reception of the rails, and if the Board of Works will have any person or persons on hand to take delivery.

"As the correct knowledge of these points is essential to a clear understanding of what the Board of Works require, we trust you will kindly accept it as our apology for troubling you.

"Yours respectfully,
"(Signed),
"G. E. JACQUES & Co.

"F. BRAUN, Esq., Secretary,
"Board of Public Works."

"MONTREAL, 15th April, 1876.

"SIR,—Referring to your advertisement in the newspapers, asking for tenders to convey from Montreal to Duluth or Fort William, Lake Superior, during the season of 1875, five thousand tons steel rails and fastenings.—

Hon. Mr. Hope.

"We beg to tender, on behalf of the Merchants' Lake and River Steamship Line, consisting as understated for the quantity named; or should you desire it, to the extent in all of 12,000 tons at and after the rate of six dollars and thirty cents ($6.30) per ton of 2,240 lbs.

"The rails to be delivered to us monthly, during the season and not later than the fifteenth day September, at Montreal, free from ocean freight and Montreal Harbor dues, at the ship's side, and carried to the above named ports.

"This rate to cover all costs of handling while receiving and shipping, freight and canal tolls, marine insurance, landing and piling at the port of delivery.

"Good and sufficient wharf accommodation to be provided by the owners of the rails so as to be discharged without delay to the vessel, and not piled at a greater distance than sixty feet or thereabout from the vessel's side, the vessel having sufficient depth of water provided to lay in safety while discharging.

"Some person or persons to be appointed by the Board of Works to take delivery of rails and grant receipts, payment of freight to be made on production of such receipts.

"(Signed)
"G. E. JACQUES & Co.

"Agents Merchants' Lake and River Line consisting of 13 first-class propellers.

"To the Honorable
"The Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa."

"N.B.—If from any unforeseen accident the rails arrive too late for shipment in 1875, the Department, on due notice to the contractors, to have the right to complete the shipment in 1876."

Messrs. Jacques & Company seem to have acted in this matter with business tact and knowledge. They were desirous of knowing the exact nature of the services they were tendering for, and after obtaining such information it will be seen that their tender included all charges—for receiving the rails in Montreal, for handling and putting them on board the propellers, the cost of insuring during transit, and the expenses of taking from the vessels and piling them at Fort William and Duluth.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—In strict conformity with the advertisement calling for the tenders.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—I shall now refer to Cooper, Fairman & Company's Letter of the 2nd March 1875, which was as follows:—

"MONTREAL, 2nd March, 1875.

"DEAR SIR,—In the matter of rails arriving at Montreal during the summer of 1875 it will be necessary for the Government to have some reliable party to receive and check same from vessels; also to make arrangements for freights and insurance to Western ports. There will probably be some handling, and possibly cartage on part, and Customs entries to pass at Montreal. We would propose to attend to all this properly and with best of our ability, for say one per cent on freight West.

"Or we would undertake to deliver, say 10,000 to 15,000 tons at Duluth Thunder Bay, for five dollars and seventy-five cents gross ton, and to Georgian Bay for fifty cents per ton less, which amounts would cover insurance as well as freight, the Government agreeing to pay any and all charges for handling, car-ge, harbor dues, &c., should there be any against said rails. Good substantial wharfs to be provided by the Government at the places of destination, with sufficient men to take delivery, and pile and properly check and give receipt for said rails, &c.

We are, dear sir,
Yours sincerely,

(Signed),
COOPER, FAIRMAN Co.,
Agents.

Department of Public Works,
Ottawa.

The next personage that comes on the scene is Mr. Samuel; his letter is dated 16th April, 1875.

"MONTREAL, 16th April, 1875.

"SIR,—I beg to tender for the forwarding of the steel rails from Montreal, to Duluth or Fort William, required for the Pacific Railway for the season of 1875, as advertised for by you in the Montreal Herald, for the quantity named in the said advertisement, say five thousand (5,000) tons at the rate of six dollars ($6.00) per ton of 2,240 lbs.

"The rails to be delivered to me not later than 10th September next, at Montreal, free of harbor dues.

"The Department to take delivery of the rails at the port of destination, and grant a receipt for the same, and the freight to be paid on the production of the said receipt.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

"(Signed), E. SAMUEL."
P. O. Box, 483½.

To the Honorable,
The Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa.

The question comes, what did Mr Samuel propose to do? He proposed to have the rails delivered to him in Montreal. Delivered where?

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—According to the terms of the advertisement, in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—He does not say he makes the offer in strict conformity with the advertisement. He says: "The rails to be delivered to me * * * at Montreal, and the Department to take the delivery of the rails at the port of destination." Were they to be carted from the ocean ship to the canal basin in Montreal, and taken out of the vessel and piled at Fort William and Duluth by the Government? Any gentleman possessed of business experience, reading that tender, would see that it binds him to nothing but to carry the rails from Montreal to Fort William and Duluth. The hon. Senator from Saugeen has had large experience in that business. He is an old forwarder himself, and he understands the necessity of having contracts of this kind explicitly stated. Jacques & Co. went about it in a business-like way, and defined exactly what they would do for the $6.30. Mr. Samuel's tender was a mere skeleton which the Government could not accept. It did not state whether he was to take the delivery of the rails in the harbor, or at the canal basin. This would have made a difference of 40 cents per ton. Then there is not a word about insurance. The Government did not say what the amount would be for insurance.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Did not the advertisement specify the insurance?

Hon. Mr. HOPE—The rails were to be insured, but Jacques & Co. asked what amount of insurance would be required, and Mr. Samuel did not. Then, with regard to the delivery of the rails, from this tender of Mr. Samuel's, it is evident he expected the Department to take the delivery of the rails at Duluth or Fort William or as another tender expressed it, that "the consignees are to unload." That would involve an extra cost of at least 25c. a ton. The Government could not be expected to accept a tender of that sort. I estimate the charges which Mr. Samuel did not include in his tender to be as follow:—

Teaming the rails from the harbor up to the canal basin . . . 40cts.

Insurance, say.....	55
Piling at Duluth or Fort William, say.....	22
Total.....	$1.17

All these charges were included in the tender of Jacques & Co., and the difference, therefore, in favor of their tender was 87cts. per ton. I shall now read the report of the Privy Council upon these tenders. It is as follows:—

Copy of a Report of a Committee of the Honorable the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General in Council on the 30th April, 1875.

On a report dated 29th April, 1874, from the Honorable the Minister of Public Works, stating that proposals have been invited for the transport of 5,000 tons of steel rails and fastenings from Montreal to Fort William or Duluth, Lake Superior, during the season of 1875, the price to include all cost of handling, piling, insurance and charges at all points, and that the undermentioned tenders have been received, viz:—

1st. E. Samuel, Montreal.....	$6.00 per ton.
2nd C. Edward, Kingston.....	6.25 "
3rd G. E. Jacques & Co., Montreal	6.30 "
4th Chs. Stephenson, Montreal..	6.50 "
5th. Cox & Green, Montreal.....	6.50 "
6th. Halcomb & Steward, Kingston	6.74 "
7th. J. H. Beatty & Co., Thorold.	7.00 "
8th. W. H. Perry, Buffalo.....	7.00 "

"That in a tender made in November last, for the supply of steel rails, Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., agents, stated the difference in price for delivering those rails in Montreal or Duluth and French River, would be $5.60 per ton, exclusive of any harbor or wharfage dues at the ports named;

"That those gentlemen now offer on behalf of the Merchant's Lake and Steamship Line (consisting of eighteen first class propellers) for an additional sum of not more than sixty cents per ton to the price of $5.60 asked in their tender of November last, or say a total sum of $6.20 per ton, to undertake the transport of 5,000 tons of rails from Montreal to Fort William or Duluth, and to assume all cost of handling, piling, insurance and charges as required by the advertisement.

"That Mr. E. Samuel, who is the lowest bidder on the list given above is not a steamboat owner;

"The Minister therefore recommends that the offer of Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co. be accepted.

"The Committee submit the above recommendation. Hon. Mr. Hope.

mendation for Your Excellency's approval.
 "Certified,
 "(Signed), W. A. HIMSWORTH,
 "Clerk Privy Council.
 "To the Hon.
 "The Minister of Public Works,
 "&c., &c., &c."

With regard to Mr. Samuel's not being a steamboat owner, I may say I never heard of him owning steamboats, and I contend if the Government had accepted his tender they would have been chargeable with culpable negligence. Mr. Samuel never gave the Government an opportunity to bind him to this offer of six dollars for all charges, if it really did include everything; because on the 12th May, 1875, he addressed the following telegram to the Public Works Department:—

"OTTAWA, 12th May, 1875.

"By Telegraph from Montreal to F. Braun, Secretary B. of P. W.

"SIR,—For reasons unnecessary to state, I beg to withdraw my tender for transport of railway iron for Lake Superior ports.

"(Signed) E SAMUEL."

That closed him out.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — How long was that before the Order-in-Council was passed?

Hon. Mr. HOPE—It was subsequent to the Order-in-Council. Mr. Samuel had a perfect right to come forward and express his willingness to transact that business. Why did he not come forward and show that he had vessels enough at his command and was prepared to transport the rails to Fort William and Duluth? Had he got the contract I am quite satisfied the cost to the country, based on his offer, would have been as follows:—

12,000 tons of steel rails at $6. per ton Receiving and cartage at Montreal.....	40c. "
Insurance.....	55 "
Landing and piling at Duluth	22 "
Total.....	$7.17 "

And he could and would have collected that amount on the 12,000 tons.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman has omitted to read the letter of the 5th May. It is dated in the return 5th April. But that is evidently a mistake.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—It is as follows :—

“ OTTAWA, 5th April, 1876. (May, 1875.)

“ SIR — Referring to your telegram of the 29th instant, relative to your tender for the transport of steel rails westward, I am to inform you that the Minister of Public Works has made other arrangements for this service.

“ I have, &c.,
 (Signed) F. BRAUN,
 Secretary.”

“ E. SAMUEL, Esq., &c., &c.,
 Montreal.”

That simply means that Mr. Samuel did not come forward and state the nature of the work he was willing to perform for the six dollars, and hence the Government made other arrangements.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The advertisement ought to give an idea of that.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—He did not cover the whole ground in his tender.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The advertisement did.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—I shall now read the offer of Messrs. Cooper, Fairman & Co., and the reply of the Department, which are as follow :—

“ MONTREAL, 10th June, 1875.

“ DEAR SIR,—We hereby agree, as agents of the Merchants' Lake and River Line of steamers, to carry from ten to twenty thousand tons of steel rails, on the same terms and conditions as former contract—namely, at six dollars and twenty cents currency per gross ton, for Duluth and Fort William, on Lake Superior, which rate includes piling at the port of delivery and insurance; said insurance we bind ourselves to effect to the entire satisfaction of the Department.

Yours most respectfully,

(Signed) COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.”

“ T. TRUDEAU, Esq.,
 Public Works Department,
 Ottawa.”

“ OTTAWA, 10th June, 1876.

GENTLEMEN,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day's date, offering, on behalf of the Merchants' Lake and River Line of Steamers, to carry from ten to twenty thousand tons of steel rails, on the same terms and conditions as former contract—namely, at six dollars and twenty cents currency per gross ton, for Duluth and Fort William, on Lake Superior, which rate includes piling at port of delivery and insurance, and to inform you that the Department accepts your offer for five thousand tons (5,000.)”

Hon. Mr. Macpherson,

“ I have, &c.,
 (Signed) F. BRAUN,
 Secretary.

“ Messrs. COOPER, & FAIRMAN Co.,
 Montreal.”

Mr. Jacques, as agent for the Merchants' Lake and River Line of steamers, was authorized to contract at such a price as would net the owners of the propellers five dollars per ton. All charges of insurance, &c., were to be over and above the five dollars per ton. Jacques & Co. were not bound down as to how the contract was to be made, whether with the Government direct or with any other party tendering at the time. I dare say if Mr. Samuel had been prepared to arrange satisfactorily with Jacques & Co. as agents for the propellers, they might have been perfectly willing and agreeable to have entered into a contract with him. Jacques & Co. appear to have agreed with Cooper, Fairman & Co., to place the eighteen propellers at their service for the purpose of carrying the freight, not at $6.30, as originally tendered, but at $6.20; and the rails were carried at that price. The cost of carrying the 12,000 tons at that rate was $74,400. While Mr. Samuel's tender would have amounted to the sum of $86,040.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—You are making imaginary charges.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—In the minute of Council, the tenders are all represented to be in the same position, and the reason assigned for not taking Mr. Samuel's offer was simply, that he was not a steamboat owner.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—It was not merely that Mr. Samuel had no facilities to do the work, but that his tender did not cover the whole of the work contained in the advertisement for tenders.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Had Cooper, Fairman & Co. propellers?

Hon. Mr. HOPE—They had. They were authorized by the owners of eighteen propellers to use them in the service. It is well known that people sometimes run the chance of offering to do a portion of the work advertised for. For instance in the transportation of steel rails from Kingstons to Duluth and Red River, I am told some tendered only for the transport to Duluth, and others for the transport to Red River. If the Government see that they can make a better arrangement with two parties than with one they will act as may appear best in the interests of the public. I contend that the Government saved, in 1875, by giving the contract to Cooper, Fairman, & Co., in preference to taking Mr. Samuel's offer, no less than $11,360. I now come to the contract of 1876. The Government again advertised for tenders for carrying 18,000 tons in that year. I shall read a copy of their contract.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Is it in the return?

Hon. Mr. HOPE—No.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman must have got it from the Department of Public Works.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—No. I got it from another party altogether.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—There is nothing before the House on that subject.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—In 1876, 18,000 tons of steel rails were carried from Montreal to Fort William and Duluth.

Jacques & Co. were authorized by the Merchants' Lake and River line of Steamers to tender for the carrying of those rails, and they put in a tender along with a number of others. It was thought there would be a great many tenders for the carrying of those rails, and also that there would be large return wheat freights, and consequently the boats would be able to carry at a lower rate than in the previous year. The consequence was, Jacques & Co. tendered for $4.50 per ton. The next lowest offer was by a man named Kimlin. He offered to carry them for $5, but I have been unable to ascertain whether such a man really existed or not. The next lowest offer was that of Mr. McFee, of Montreal, a man of excellent standing and respectability, whose tender was $5.15. Jacques & Co. got the contract; and the Government paid for this service, say for 18,000 tons at $4.50 per ton, equal to $81,000, thus saving $9,000, as compared with the next tender, and taking it to be bona fide. The hon. Senator from Saugeen, who thinks Cooper, Fairman & Co. such a highly favored firm, may not be aware that they tendered at the same time for $5.40 per ton. But, as a matter of course, the Government did not accept their offer, and saved the country $16,200. I think I must have clearly and conclusively shown that the statements and allegations made by the hon. Senators from Saugeen and Belleville, had no foundation in fact, with regard to favoritism shown to Cooper, Fairman & Co., or the Merchants' Lake and River Steamship Line, either in 1875 or 1876. With regard to the New York firm, they made a tender of $4 and $4.75 from New York to Duluth and Fort William respectively, in the year 1875. I may say they are a highly respectable firm. They represent Guest & Co., of the Dowlais Iron and Steel Works. They wrote the following communication on the 14th Nov., 1874:--
Hon. Mr. Hope.

"OTTAWA, ONT., November 14th, 1874.

"DEAR SIR,—Should the Government prefer to have these rails delivered at the following points: Duluth, Fort William and Georgian Bay, instead of Montreal, we can deliver them at Duluth or Georgian Bay at $4 per ton additional, and at Fort William at $4.75 additional, conditional as to the delivery at points named, that there be a sufficient depth of water for vessels to go thereto, and that the consignees are to unload. Not knowing if it is the intention of the Government to insure the various cargoes on the Lakes, we have not included the Lake insurances on the inland freights, $4 and $4.75, which would be about 16 cents per ton.

Your obedient servants,

"(signed),

"PERKINS, LIVINGSTON, POST & CO.

Agents of GUEST & Co."

"The Minister of Public Works,"

I may be wrong; but, so far as my recollection goes, I do not think I heard the hon. gentleman from Belleville, or the hon. Senator from Saugeen, allude to any of the conditions of this offer. To me it seems there was a great want of candour in their mode of stating the matter to the House. The consignees were to unload, and the New York firm did not seem to know what the cost of unloading might be. On the 20th November, 1874, they again wrote to the Public Works Department, as follows:—

"Montreal Telegraph Company.

OTTAWA, Nov. 20th, 1874.

"By Telegraph from New York, to H. A. V. Post, Russell House, Ottawa.

"From Buffalo to three points named, 25 cents per hundred dollars, until September 1st; during September, Georgian Bay, 35 cents; Lake Superior, 40 cents; October, Georgian Bay, 50 cents; Lake Superior, 60 cents; from Montreal to same point double; these rates, all rates are not.

" (Signed),

" PERKINS, LIVINGSTON, POST & Co.,"

These were the rates quoted for insurance for rails shipped from Buffalo. They did not propose, on behalf of Guest & Co., to turn forwarders, and deliver the whole 30,000 tons of rails which the Government sent to the head of Lake Superior. As I understand it, the offer related entirely to the 10,000 tons they had contracted to make and deliver in Montreal. I am willing, however, to take it for granted that the firm of Guest & Co. were prepared to enter the lists as forwarders, and agree to deliver the whole of the rails by way of the New York canals, at the said $4 and $4.75 per ton. I do not think that the people of this country would have been particularly well pleased if the Government had allowed a firm in New York to transport the rails for our Canada Pacific Railway through the New York canals, in preference to our own St. Lawrence and Welland Canals, and especially when there was nothing before us to show that any saving would have been made by doing so. As near as I can make out, 18,000 tons went to Duluth, and 12,000 tons to Fort William. The offer of the New York firm was to convey them to Duluth at $4.00. But there are extra charges which are not specified. There is labor at New York, 25 cents; at Buffalo, transshipment, 25 cents; at Duluth, unloading and piling, 25 cents. insurance, 25 cents. These charges, taken together, make one dollar to be added to the four dollars for freight, which is five dollars per ton on the 18,000 tons, making in all, $90,000. Then, for the 12,000 tons the offer was $4.75, to which we must add the charges that I have specified, making in all, for the 30,000 tons, $159,000. Now, let us see what the actual cost to the country has been. Twelve thousand tons were shipped at $6.20 per ton in 1875, making $74,400. Then, in 1876, 18,000 tons were carried at $4.50 per ton, or $81,000, making in all, $155,400, showing a saving of $3,600.00 in the transportation of the 30,000 tons. But to this must be added the tolls collected on our canals which would be $4,500. So that the country has really saved $8,100, by the course pursued by the Government besides employing our own shipping and our own canals.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman has added in a number of amounts that he chooses to suppose would be charged. It is perfectly preposterous, and an insult to the intelligence of the House.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—The hon. Senator stated that the firm in New York, offered to carry rails for four dollars per ton. But he said nothing about insurance, and the other charges to which I have referred. The hon. Senator has displayed a great want of candour, in my opinion, throughout the whole steel rails discussion.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I showed that the firm in New York offered to carry the rails at four dollars per ton, and including insurance at $4.16. The difference between the amounts at which these gentlemen offered to carry the rails, and the price paid by the Government, is $2.04 per ton.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—They did not know what they were talking about, when they stated insurance would be sixteen cents.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Guest & Co. gave the rate.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—But Guest & Co., subsequent to that, gave other rates. I complain that the hon. Senators from Belleville and Saugeen have not taken cognizance of what Guest & Co. stated at a later period about insurance, and have ignored the fact that they expressly stipulated that "Consignees are to unload" and entirely overlooked the return to the Government of 15 cents per ton, canal tolls on all the rails carried through Canada to Lake Superior, and the expense of handling between the ocean ships and canals boat in New York, and between the canal boat and lake craft at Buffalo—making at least, as I contend, one dollar extra to the \$4 and \$4.75 as proposed by Guest & Co. Looking at the contracts which the Government made in 1875 and 1876, I think they acted in the interest of the country in what they did, and they should not be subjected to the insinuations that we have heard from the other side of the House. With regard to the purchase of the steel rails, we have had no evidence to show that the Government have been guilty of anything wrong or improper. I was in England in 1874, and when in Birmingham, I got a cablegram from this side, stating that the Government wanted a large quantity of steel rails, and, asking me to endeavor to make an offer for supplying some. I saw a large number of iron firms—I do not say manufacturers—and they all said there was nothing to be made at the ruling prices, and that the Government of Canada had an excellent opportunity to obtain steel rails at a price they would never see so low again. That was the opinion of men who had great experience in the trade. It was, at the same time, just a question with makers whether they would tender, or close down their works. They tendered, not direct, but through their brokers. There has been a great deal of misconception on this point, and names have been mentioned of firms in Canada as if they were the owners of iron and steel works, but who did not own a single rail, and who were merely instructed as brokers, by the makers in England to tender on their behalf at certain rates. These brokers ran no risk and, incurred no responsibility, and their brokerage was probably  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Among others, was the firm of Cooper, Fairman & Co. The Government never bought from them, but from the Mersey Co., of whom they were merely the representatives. At the time it was thought rails had reached as low a price as they could ever be obtained for. No one saw anything objectionable in the purchase at the time, but, on the contrary, the most experienced iron merchants in England, of my own knowledge, extolled the action of the Government in making the purchase they did. Some of the rails were destined for British Columbia, some for Red River, some for the Intercolonial Railway, and some are still at Kingston, where they have been delivered lately. We had a childish exhibition here the other day when an hon. Senator from British Columbia produced a lot of rust, done up in an old newspaper, which, as I understood him to say, he had scraped off the rails lying unused in British Columbia. He did not appear to be aware that he was reflecting on the leader of his side of the House, who threw out the Bill for the building of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—For the 228 miles of road between Fort William and Selkirk, now under contract, 21,000 tons will be required; for the Pembina Branch, 9,000 tons; for the Intercolonial Railway, 10,000 tons; there are 5,000 tons in British Columbia, and 5,000 at Kingston. The latter are to be transported this summer to the Red River, where they will be required. Thus, the whole of the 50,000 tons will be absorbed this summer, and I should be very glad if the Minister of Public Works should find it necessary, (which I believe he will do) to go into the market at once for additional rails, to complete the link between Rat Portage and Port Savanne. The sooner an all-rail route is completed, the better will it be for Canada and her North-West Territories.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—It is true, it was thought at one time the water stretches between those two points could be used to advantage, and they are better than no communication at all through our own territory with Manitoba. I hold no government would be justified in attempting to open up the North-West without providing means of access to it, through Canadian territory. I heard hon. gentlemen sneering the other day, when the hon. Secretary of State said the Fort Francis Lock might be useful in case of necessity, for the transporting of troops and munitions of war to Manitoba. They asked, "Do you expect war with the United States?" Certainly not, but we have had trouble in the North-West in the past, and difficulties may arise there in the future, and it is under any circumstances, an exceedingly delicate matter for one country to ask and for another to grant permission to send munitions of war through a neighbouring country, though, when asked, it has been granted in the most courteous manner.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—It was refused at Sault Ste. Marie.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—In that case the State of Michigan claimed the right of stopping the passage of troops and war materials. That was rather a humiliating position at the time for our country to occupy, and it is the duty of the Government to provide a summer route, at all events, as we had between the Maritime Provinces and Ontario and Quebec before the opening of the Intercolonial Railway. I hope to see work prosecuted on the "missing link" without delay.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—A good deal has been said about the slow progress made with the Pacific Railway, but I think the progress has been wonderfully good considering the difficulties under which the Government have been labouring and the obstacles which they have had to surmount.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—I should not have spoken on this subject at all, important though it is, had it not been for the reply of the hon. Secretary of State the other day to a question I addressed to him, with reference to the policy of the Government as to the commencement of construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway this summer in British Columbia. The hon. Senator answered in his usual cool and careless way, as though the matter was of no importance at all, that the Government had no intention of commencing the construction there, but were going to survey a new line to which their attention had been called.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I said the attention of the Government had been called to a new line, and no doubt there were gentlemen in this Chamber who thought it ought to be explored.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—I understood the hon. gentleman to say the Government did not intend to commence work.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said they had a report from Marcus Smith, of the Peace River route, and it had not yet been under their consideration.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—I understood from the hon. gentleman that it was considered necessary to survey another line, and I think I was right in coming to that conclusion, more especially as I remembered that some such probability was foreshadowed in Mr. Fleming's last report. Such being the case, I consider it my duty as a representative of

Hon. Mr. Hope.

British Columbia to speak in a brief way on this important subject; and more especially to answer the speech that the hon. Secretary of State made some days ago on the motion we are now discussing. I must say that speech of the hon. gentleman was a thoroughly characteristic speech, and one quite in accord with the opinions, and the arguments founded on such opinions, used by him on this subject on other occasions. He commenced in his usual complaining way, with the plaintive wail, that the bargain as to railway terms of union with British Columbia was an impossible bargain, and one which could not be carried out. He went on virtually to say that Canada was a poor, small and miserable country, and could not now, or at any future time, be expected to carry out such an agreement; and further, that the disadvantages under which Canada labored, in comparison with the United States in the construction of their Pacific Railway, were very great in three very important particulars, viz., the character of the country through which the line would run, the knowledge of the route that line should take, and as to the possibilities of the present or future traffic to be carried on over that line. Now, I maintain that even if Canada did labor under such disadvantages, the hon. gentleman himself, a member of the Government of Canada, should have been the last person who should have stood up in this House and given utterance to such ideas. We all know the wise proverb that it is indiscreet for a fishmonger to cry "stinking fish" to his intending customers. That is the policy the hon. gentleman has pursued; and if in addition, I can show that he was incorrect on all three points to which he has referred; why then I think that even his own supporters in this House will see that he has not approached this subject with his usual forethought and wisdom. Now, as to the first point, the character of the country through which the two lines run; if the hon. gentleman had travelled over the Union Pacific Railway as often as I have, he would have known that with the exception of some three or four hundred miles west of Omaha, that line runs through a country unfit for agricultural—though not for pastoral—purposes, except in very limited localities. I am credibly informed, and I believe it to be the case, that the Canada Pacific Railway, on the other hand will run, for the 1500 miles west of Lake Superior to the Rocky Mountains, through a country that is not only capable of, but that offers great inducements to agricultural settlement; and in British Columbia, for the remaining 500 miles of its length, it will run, if the proper route is followed, through the best part of that Province. The advantage, consequently, is altogether in favor of Canada, so far as the character and quality of the land on the rival railway routes is concerned. The second point on which the hon. gentleman founded his arguments, related to the knowledge we have of the route to be followed. He absolutely said that, "within a year after the terms of union were agreed to, it was shown that such parts as related to the railway could not be carried out. No line had been found!" To refute that assertion, I have only to refer to Mr. Fleming's report, 1877, the latest published, and one which coming from the principal authority on the subject—from the Chief Engineer employed by the Government themselves—must be received with respect. With the permission of the House I will read from page 13 the following paragraphs:—

"The survey did not begin in British Columbia until the 20th July, 1871, the day upon which that Province became incorporated into the Dominion. Information of great value was obtained. It was found that there would be no difficulty in carrying a line from the valley of the River North Frazer, in the neighbourhood of Tête Jaune Cache, to the valley of the North Thompson, by a low and wide depression in the mountains in that quarter. It was found that the valley of the North Thompson would, in all probability, admit of a line being constructed from Yellow Head Pass to Kamloops, a distance of 255 miles, with grades not exceeding 50 feet per mile.

"It was further found that it was possible to reach the coast from Kamloops by the course and outlet of the Rivers Thompson and Frazer, the line terminating at an excellent harbour on Burrard Inlet.

"Thus it was ascertained that a line was available for the railway through the entire Rocky Mountain region, although portions of it would be enormously expensive."

That is the report of Mr. Fleming on the explorations made in 1871. He says "a practicable route was found through

Hon. Mr. Cornwall.

"the entire Rocky Mountain region," and, therefore, the assertion of the hon. Secretary of State "that a year after the completion of the terms of Union no line had been found," falls to the ground. As this is a matter of importance, I shall refer to it at greater length. When the engineers first went to British Columbia to commence explorations in 1871, they were told by all practical residents of that Province who thoroughly knew the country, that the natural outlet for a railway was by the valleys of the Rivers Thompson and Frazer, from the Yellow Head Pass. For the first year, accordingly, their explorations were more or less confined to that route, with the success to which I have called the attention of the House, as shown in Mr. Fleming's report. However, the engineers, after the manner of such professional gentlemen, I suppose, not satisfied to establish the correctness of unprofessional advice, and not satisfied with what they had seen, considered it was necessary to make further explorations in British Columbia, and find a line for themselves, and they have, consequently, ever since 1871, been engaged in trying to find some route to the coast through the mainland of British Columbia which would take them further north by a longer route, comparatively through Arctic regions of snow and ice, and directly over the summits of enormous ranges of mountains to incommodious and unapproachable harbours. That their efforts have been barren of results and utterly futile, it is quite unnecessary to say; that is shown by the fact that in 1877 they were obliged to return to the route by the valleys of the Rivers Thompson and Frazer, with the result, I am glad to say, that the explorations last year have proved that this line is not only more feasible even than was at first supposed, but that the cost of construction would be much less than was at first feared. Those intermediate years between 1871 and 1877 have been more or less thrown away, and not only has there been that lamentable loss of time, but it has been accompanied with an expenditure of hundreds of thousands, nay, millions of dollars, which are almost altogether lost or thrown away. Notwithstanding this, we have been given to understand that the Government intend examining a still more northerly route than any on which they have hitherto expended their energies and wasted the means of the country. Now, I think I have shown from Mr. Fleming's report, and from what I have thought fit to say on the subject, that the second argument of the hon. Secretary of State, in support of his assertion that within one year after the arrangement of the terms of Union it became apparent that they could not be carried out, because no line had been found, is entirely without foundation. On his third ground of complaint, that the Canada Pacific Railway would compare very disadvantageously with the present trans-continental American line in competition for present and future traffic, I shall also refer to Mr. Fleming's report, where, on page 14, the succeeding one to that which I have already quoted, I find the following observations which have intimate connection with this point:—

“The report which I had the honor to submit, dated 10th April, 1872, pointed out generally the advantages of this line, as compared with the railway extending eastward from San Francisco to New York. Those engineering features, which govern the cost of operating a railway and transporting goods, gave promise of being much more favorable on the Canadian route. The United States Pacific Railway attains an altitude above the sea at four different points, fully double the height of the great continental summit on the Canadian line, and for 1,300 consecutive miles there is no altitude so low on the railway between San Francisco and New York, as the highest summit of the line through the Yellow Head Pass. With respect to distance, it was estimated that from Burrard Inlet to Montreal would be 633 miles less than from San Francisco to New York. It was, at the same time, estimated that the Canadian route would bring New York, Boston and Portland, from 300 to 500 miles nearer to the Pacific Coast at Burrard Inlet, than the cities now are, with San Francisco as the terminal point of their line through the United States.

The distance from England to China would be more than 1,000 miles less by the Canadian line, than by the line passing through New York and San Francisco.”

Now, this is what Mr. Fleming has said on these important points which intimately concern the question of traffic over the line, and in all those particulars Canada has an immense advantage, not only in the character of the country through which the railway line will run, but in the difference in the length of route and the grades on that line. He shows also, that in another most important point, that of altitude, the high levels over which the Pacific Railway will have to run do not at all approach those which had to be surmounted by the American Pacific Railway. If all this is correct, and I do not think any hon. gentleman can refute what I have said, because it is established by the report that has been made, and by the experience that many years of exploration has given us, what becomes of the assertions of the hon. Secretary of State, that the bargain with British Columbia is “an impossible bargain”? I confess when I have listened to that argument, and it has been repeated again and again in this House, I have been astounded at the want of knowledge and of energy, the want of proper appreciation of the position, and the want of patriotism which allowed the hon. gentleman to stand up in his place and make such an assertion on this most important matter! In the latter part of the speech of the hon. gentleman, he alluded to the fact that some evidence of sincerity on the part of the Government of the Dominion of Canada had been required at their hands, both by the Home Government, and by the Province of British Columbia. This is what has been needed in the past, and is what we want at the present moment. What we do not want are such speeches as that delivered the other day by the hon. Secretary of State himself. Unfortunately, to that sort of speeches we have become only too well accustomed. Ever since the present Government assumed the reins of power every individual member of the Cabinet and the Government as a whole, and the press of the country supporting the Government, have spent all their time and all their energies, in trying to find reasons, or to forge reasons why the agreement with British Columbia should not be carried out.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—Is it any wonder that under these circumstances, British Columbia has no longer any faith in the integrity of the present Government? Is it any wonder that no one there who has a head upon his shoulders, and who is capable of forming an opinion on this subject, supposes for a moment that the present Government of the Dominion of Canada have the slightest intention of carrying out the arrangement to which they are bound, by every tie and by every consideration of national honour? There is only one opinion on that point in British Columbia, and as it happens, within two or three days, I received letters from some friends in British Columbia that bear on this point, and I shall read a few words from them in order to show what is the feeling in that Province. The first is from the manager of a Bank in Victoria, an intelligent man, and one prominent in society, who,—referring to the fact that certain news had gone out to British Columbia regarding the commencement of construction of the Pacific railway this summer—said:

“I am precious glad to hear that the Government even take power to commence railway work in British Columbia. I sincerely hope they will energetically make use of the power when obtained, and go ahead whether it be from Yale or elsewhere. There have been so many shams that I am still very sceptical.”

Another letter I have is from a gentleman equally influential in British Columbia—a gentleman holding a judicial position. He says: “The railway news is very encouraging, but I can hardly believe in construction before they actually commence.” This is the feeling in British Columbia. They have there not the slightest hope or belief that the present Government have any intention of doing what they are continually promising to do; and that which they are bound in honor to do. I hardly know that I need say anything further on the subject. I dare not say what I think of the conduct of the Government in plain, honest Saxon English. If I did, I should in a very short time exceed the bounds of Parliamentary usage, and disregard the dignity and decorum which so well characterise the debates in this House. I do not intend to do so; and as I am not gifted with that power of expressing my meaning, while at the same time I veil it in clever inuendo, and indeed not deigning to do so in this instance, I shall not say anything further, except to express the belief and hope I entertain, that ere long there will be such a change in the “personnel” of the advisers of His Excellency the Governor-General, that there will be a thorough change in the policy on which I have commented, and that there will be no further necessity for a member of this House to get up in his place and denounce the action of the Government of the Dominion of Canada in the manner to which I have been constrained.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—With regard to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, I do not propose to contradict them, or to press upon any gentleman the merits of any particular route until the report for which I moved a few days ago is laid before the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—The motion made by the hon. gentleman from Belleville does not quite meet my own view for this reason: When he speaks of there being no corresponding beneficial results for the enormous amount of money which has been expended, it is quite evident to any hon. gentleman, that nothing of that kind can be expected for a number of years. But, if he means the policy pursued by the Government in carrying out the works, it is a different thing, and that part of the motion might be modified, but whether that is done or not, of course the result will be the same. The hon. gentleman in moving his resolution said that, in his opinion, the western terminus should have been first selected, before the location of the line commenced.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—The hon. gentleman will be pleased to know that that was done by the former Government. In 1873, they selected Esquimalt as the western terminus of the Pacific Railway. It was done even under the personal investigation of the Minister of Public Works, who, at that time visited the Pacific Province.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—It was upon the recommendation of Mr. Langevin, as well as the Engineer-in-Chief, that selection was made. And the wisdom of that choice is borne out recently by the report of Admiral De Horsey, who strongly recommends Esquimalt as the best harbor on the Coast. Not only was that harbor selected by the previous Government, but they went so far as to actually stake out part of the route, and to turn the first sod on the branch from Esquimalt to Naniamo.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—Hear

comes in my surprise, that after that was done, this side of the House should be so strongly opposed to the Bill which was brought in here, for the construction of the Esquimalt and Naniamo Railway, as to throw it out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—After their own friends had turned the first sod.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—Yes. Considering the first location was by their own party, I do hope that we have heard the last of this Naniamo and Esquimalt Bill, and that hon. gentlemen will take no further credit for having defeated that measure. Another good reason is, that some of those days they may have to retract their opinions, as there is not the slightest doubt that road will have to be built, either by this Government or some other Government. The hon. Secretary of State spoke about the ruinous bargain that had been made with British Columbia. Whether that bargain was ruinous, or will be ruinous or not, I think the Government have taken very little trouble in the matter, and my own opinion has been confirmed, that this Government would never have put a pick in the ground towards the construction of the Pacific Railway, and, in fact, never have during the five years they have been in office. Can the hon. gentleman mention the difficulty of finding a route through British Columbia? No doubt the difficulty of the route is great. But, as early as 1872-3, it is well known there were two routes, one of which might have been adopted. The hon. gentleman mentioned the Fraser River route, that it was known then that a line could be found by going down that valley.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At that time it was considered that the route by the Fraser River would be so enormously expensive that it could not be constructed without an immense amount of tunneling, and the present Government directed a further survey to be made of it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—It was reported at that time that that route would cost six millions of dollars more than the route by Bute Inlet.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—The Fraser River route was abandoned for a time, until it was taken up again on the motion of the hon. member for Yale, and when the report comes down we will have the latest information before us. The hon. Secretary of State mentioned that, even after seven years survey, they had scarcely found a practicable route. This is not quite in accordance with the facts of the case. In 1873-4, Mr. Fleming, in his report, said :—

“ It may be now accepted as a certainty that a route has been found generally possessing favorable engineering features, with the exception of a short section approaching the Pacific coast; which route, taking its entire length, including the exceptional section alluded to will, on the average, show lighter work, and will require less costly structures than have been necessary in many of the railways now in operation in the Dominion.”

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.—That is the Bute Inlet route, and it is different from his report of it in 1872.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—There is a small section there rather difficult, and the Minister of Public Works in his speech of 1876, referring to the Bute Inlet said:—

“ The Bute Inlet route was surveyed almost completely last year, excepting a distance of sixty or seventy miles, regarding which we obtained some information after Parliament rose last Session. This route is one that we knew tolerably well last year. It has been somewhat carefully surveyed from the head of the Inlet by the valley of the Homathco River. It was thought advisable to examine the east branch of the river last year, and make an instrumental survey of it. This has been completed, and we know now that we can get a more favorable route by the east branch, the highest grade being about 107 feet to the mile, and that for a distance of two or three miles less than the high grade by the west branch, with the additional advantage, that there is a level rest about three-quarters of a mile in the long steep grade which makes it very favorable.”

I will now quote from a speech made by Lord Dufferin in 1876, in which he takes the Toronto Globe for his authority, as he supposed it indicated the views of the Government on that occasion. Perhaps his opinion was almost a correct one.

“ From a recent article in the Globe, it would seem as though the Bute Inlet route had finally found favour with the Government, though I myself have no information on the point, and I am happy to see, from statistics furnished by that journal, that not only has the entire line of the Pacific been surveyed, but that the calculated expenses of construction, though very great, and to be incurred only after careful consideration, are far less than were anticipated. Well, gentlemen, should the indications we have received of the intention of the Government prove correct, you are very much to be congratulated, for I am well aware the line to Bute Inlet is the one which you have always favoured, and I should hope that now, at last, you will be satisfied that the Canadian Government has used, as it undertook to do, all possible expedition in prosecuting the surveys of the line to the Pacific Coast. I only wish that Waddington Harbour, at the head of the Inlet, was a better port; I confess to having but a poor opinion of it."

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—Does the hon. gentleman know that the Globe has changed its principles since then, and has advocated another route?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—No.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—Have you seen the article published in the Globe last January?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—I have not. But it would appear from these remarks that the Government had sufficient information in 1874 to have adopted either of the lines—the Fraser River route or the route to Bute Inlet. But instead of doing that they went on and surveyed northern channels, to which they would never dream of taking a railway—inlets that are liable to be frozen up several months of the year, and in which navigation is rendered dangerous by constant fogs—a route that would offer no inducement for the trade of China or any other port in the world to follow, and this can only be compared with the water-stretch policy. In 1874 I gave my support to the railway policy of this Government. I thought they would bring a great deal of experience and practical knowledge to bear on this work. And I thought they certainly would not give out contracts for a scheme of that kind, unless their policy was thoroughly matured. But since then I have had reason to change my opinion.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—I have seen a great many contracts given out without surveying, and without any judgment being shown. For instance, the Georgian Bay Branch, the Fort Francis Lock, and other works that should not have been undertaken. Because, however useful they may be for colonization purposes, the country cannot afford to deviate from the direct line of the Pacific

Hon. Mr. Macdonald.

Railway, and anything that is spent apart from the construction of that direct line is inadvisable. I, for one, have pressed upon the Government the necessity of keeping in view the construction of the main line only, and I protest against any money being expended upon any other work in the name of the Pacific Railway, that is not on the direct line. The water stretches are only a farce, as they cannot be of any use except for a few months in the year. And even in the summer time the expense of handling freight so frequently over a route like that, will be so great that it can never be utilized for commerce. Therefore, I was forced to come to the conclusion that the Government policy of building this great work was not the one for the country; that the Pacific Railway would never be built on such a policy; and I was forced to the conclusion that no scheme but one like that inaugurated by Sir John A. Macdonald, the construction of the road by a private company, assisted by a money bonus and land grants, will ever be a success.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yet the hon. gentleman condemns us for trying to build forty miles of the railway on the same principle, without having a thorough survey made. But we believe that a thorough survey has been made of the main line.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—I think the advice of scientific men, and responsible men, should influence and govern the Ministry in this matter. And a great many mistakes that have arisen have been in consequence of taking the advice of political friends instead of following that of their scientific men. Charges of this kind are brought forward year after year. No doubt they are disagreeable, but my opinion is, that a fairly critical Opposition are the best friends a Government can have. They point out the dangers to be avoided, and show them many a rock upon which they would split if they had not that warning. In relation to these charges I have heard them made over and over again. But I never heard anyone suggest a remedy. Surely there is a remedy for this evil. Charges of corruption and jobbery are made, not only against the Dominion Government, but in every Province of the Dominion, against every Local Government. The trouble is there is a misconception between the elector and the candidate. Instead of the electors selecting their candidate and sending him to Parliament free from expense, the candidate usually selects himself, and buys his way into Parliament by bribes and promises; so that corruption is at the very base and bottom of the whole system of parliamentary government. What is the next step taken by the Government after getting into office. They fortify themselves in every possible way by promises to their supporters in Parliament and out of Parliament, and look only to a tenure of office. Until that desire for tenure of office is done away with, and until we find men coming forward full of patriotism and with different views for the good of their country, this corrupt practice will continue. Until a Government comes into power that will forget themselves, not looking to a tenure of office, but carrying on the business of the country in a fair and moderate manner, dealing out even handed justice, not overlooking opponents who may be responsible people in awarding contracts, but dealing fairly with all, this thing will go on and corruption will continue. If a Government pursue that course for five years, not looking more to their friends than their opponents, and the country approve of their conduct, and choose to re-elect them, very well. But if not they have the satisfaction of knowing they have done their duty in a patriotic manner. The difference between the present and the former Government is this: the former Government carried on the affairs of the country in a groove they had been running in for years, helping, I suppose, their own friends more than their opponents. But this Government came into power with all those evils clearly marked out before their eyes, and preaching against such abuses for a long number of years. And they came into power with the cry of purity on their lips. They were going to cleanse the political atmosphere, they were going to elevate the standard of morality. But instead of doing this, they went beyond their predecessors in corruption; and after the general elections were over, it is remembered by all, how many members lost their seats through corrupt practices. Since then, the standard of purity has been dragged in the mud, and how the promises made by the Government have been fulfilled, I will leave to themselves to answer.

Hon. Mr. SKEAD—I would like to say a few words with the permission of the House, before this debate is closed. I think it was on the last day of last Session I asked a question across the floor of this House of the hon. Secretary of State, and I think there was a promise made on his part. I would like to know if that promise has been partially fulfilled, or is it going to be fulfilled, and if so, when? From the promise made I thought we would have something done before now. I saw a notice the other day in the papers, that a contract had been signed for the construction of the eastern end of the Georgian Bay Branch, and I would like the hon. Secretary of State to say if this promise he made last Session is to be carried out?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The contract signed the other day had nothing to do with the Georgian Bay Branch. At the close of last Session, I think I said the Government were engaged in a survey from a point on the eastern end of the Georgian Bay Branch to connect with the Canada Central Railway. That survey was completed, I think, a year ago. Owing to circumstances I need not now revert to, Mr. Foster broke down in the proposition he had made to the Government, but I hope that scheme will be revived. The policy of 1874 has not been renounced by the Government. Circumstances beyond their control prevented it from being carried out, but the policy has not been abandoned in any sense. Of course, in view of the construction of the railway from Quebec along the north shore of the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa, it would be quite improper to abandon the Georgian Bay Branch scheme, as I think it is due to the people of Quebec that it should be carried out. Whether this Government will have an opportunity to carry it out or not, the next Government must do so. The Province of Quebec has invested $12,000,000 or $14,000,000 with a view to connecting their great trunk line with the Pacific Railway. I think the promise was made even before this Government came into power, that every facility would be afforded in order that the connection should be made, and now that this road is built from Montreal to Ottawa, and will be built from Quebec to Montreal in another year, no doubt it will be the duty of the Government to see that this promise is fulfilled. No doubt this Government will do it; but if time and circumstances should not permit them to carry out this scheme, their successors will, no doubt, be very glad to do it.

Hon. Mr. SKEAD—There was a statement made in the press a few days ago that a contract had been entered into for the purpose of going on with the road from Pembroke to Lake Nipissing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think that is a contract made with the Canada Central Railway. I heard that Mr Worthington and somebody else in Montreal, had entered into a contract for the extension of the Canada Central Railway west to Lake Nipissing, which is a point some twenty miles further west than the proposed eastern terminus of the Pacific Railway. So that, if they carry their line to Nipissing, it will shorten by twenty or thirty miles the length of the originally proposed line at the eastern end, but it will involve an expenditure to connect it with the waters of Lake Huron.

Hon. Mr. SKEAD—Then we are not to understand that this is a Government contract?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. It is a contract made by the Canada Central Railway Co., with Mr. Worthington.

Hon. Mr. SKEAD—But it is to be part and parcel of the Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it will be so eventually.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—Is it entitled to the Government subsidy of $12,000 a mile?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Of course.

Hon. Mr. SKEAD—I am very glad my friends have been so lenient with the Ottawa interests during this protracted debate. But still there has been an occasional slap given to the Georgian Bay Branch scheme. I had an intimation from the hon. Secretary of State that we would have some news about the extension of the Canada Central Railway at an early date, and I am pleased to hear that it is to be extended to Lake Nipissing. When we get to Lake Nipissing however, what is to be done? Are we to stay there?

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think I have tried to explain to my hon. friend it will no doubt involve the connection from that point with the waters of Lake Huron. It will necessarily involve the construction of a line from Lake Nipissing to some point on French River, or connection with the waters of the Georgian Bay, that will answer fully the purposes of trade for some years to come. I cannot say now that the Government are prepared to undertake it. But it must follow the construction of the line eastward, and, as proof of that, the Canada Central have given the contract.

Hon. Mr. SKEAD—If the navigation of the French River were improved up to Lake Nipissing, it would open a large extent of country for settlement, and would extend the water stretches navigation in connection with the railway. I am glad to hear so much, and I do hope that the Government intend to push on this scheme. It was one of the pledges given at Confederation, and we look upon it as part of the Pacific Railway. So much has been said about water stretches, missing links, and Fort Francis Locks, I have almost forgotten one-half of it. I do not think any hon. gentleman doubts which side of politics I am on, but I do say I think there has been too much harshness shown to the Government in this Pacific Railway matter. A complaint is made that the Government have been surveying for seven years, and that they have nothing to show for it. But, if we take up the great Book of Holy Writ, and go back towards the beginning of the world, we will find that the people in those early days served seven years for a wife—some of them—and at the end of seven years did not get her; and the servitude had to be gone through again. I have no doubt if this change of Government, that is predicted, takes place before the next Government get through with their term, a considerable portion of the railway will be built. And, no doubt, if the present Government get back again before they get through with their second five years of servitude, they will have something to show for it. I hope this Georgian Bay Branch will not be lost sight of. I have no hopes of support for it from the people of Toronto, as our western friends appear to think that everything must be centered at the Queen City. But, I expect, the Maritime Provinces and the Province of Quebec will join with us, and see that the Ottawa interests will be sustained, and that the road will be brought through the Ottawa Valley route as being the shortest and most direct route from the west to tide-water. If the French River were improved so as to open the Nipissing for navigation, it would not take a great deal more to reach the Ottawa by improving the Mattawan River.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I must congratulate my hon. friend on the consistent manner in which he has advocated this Georgian Bay Branch scheme and the interests of the Ottawa Valley, but it appears now there is to be another change of policy with regard to it. We were told on a former occasion when the Georgian Bay Branch was discussed, it was to start from a point thirty miles east of Lake Nipissing, and was to go on to the waters of the Georgian Bay. Now we are told that this contract from Pembroke westward is continued from a point where it was supposed the eastern terminus of the Canada Pacific Railway was to be, thirty miles further to Lake Nipissing, although we were told before that, we could not get near the waters of Lake Nipissing at all. It is perfectly clear, from the explanation of the hon. Secretary of State, that the idea of the railroad being continued to the Georgian Bay has been abandoned, because this railway is to extend further north towards the waters of Lake Nipissing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman quite misunderstands the position of it. I stated that the Canada Central proposed to carry their line to Lake Nipissing, and not to a point south of it. They will make connection with the Government railway which will then be united with the waters of Georgian Bay. It was not proposed to utilize the waters of Lake Nipissing.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Was it not stated distinctly last year that the point of junction of those two railways was to be twenty miles south-east of Lake Nipissing, and now it is proposed to build the line to Lake Nipissing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It saves the
Hon. Mr. Skead.

Government the construction of just so much railway, for the moment the Canada Central goes beyond the 120 miles they get no further subsidy for any excess. And so far as that excess goes it saves the country so much, as it makes the Government line proposed to connect with the waters of the Georgian Bay so much shorter. Hon. Mr. Skead has suggested it might strike French River, and by making improvements there, it could connect with the waters of Lake Nipissing. Of course I am not now in a position to discuss the question, but by so much further west as the Canada Central extends its line, so much less mileage will there be in the Georgian Bay Branch.

Hon. Mr. SKEAD—The terminus of the Canada Central Railway at Lake Nipissing and the improvement of French River will open a large amount of country for settlement. The improvement necessary will extend along about 50 miles of the river. And if we are going to have water stretches from Thunder Bay to Lake Huron we may as well improve the French River also, which will give navigation up to Nipissing Lake. This lake is 142 miles long, with a very fine hardwood timber country around it. If it were made navigable to the mouth of French River the navigation would, in course of time, be opened through to the Ottawa waters via the Mattawa river and become a very important link of the great scheme for improving the navigation from Lake Huron down the Ottawa River to tide water.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—I think it is rather unfortunate that the debate on which we are now engaged should have been so frequently postponed. It is now nearly a fortnight, thirteen days, since my hon. friend from Bellville first introduced his motion into this House, and since then another great question has been introduced and disposed of, and a measure of considerable domestic interest has been discussed and a decision has been arrived at upon it, while this question, which affects the whole Dominion has been allowed to stand. In this way we sacrifice a great portion of its interest, and it is almost impossible to take up the thread of the debate and refer with an degree of precision to the remarks that have been made in its earlier stages, although they may demand some-attention. I wish to refer to some remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Manitoba in the early part of this debate, and I do so because I happened to serve during last Session of Parliament upon the Special Committee which, I think, was moved by that hon. gentleman with a view to determine whether a route could be found south of Lake Manitoba, to supersede the line located by the Government engineers to the north of the lake. That question engaged the attention of the committee for several days, and after a long and industrious enquiry, they reported, unanimously, I think, suggesting to the Government that a further investigation should be made during the ensuing summer with a view to ascertaining whether a practicable route—one which could be adopted without material loss to the general public—might not be adopted through the settled portions of the Province instead of running the railway to the north of it. I find from the report of the Minister of Public Works that such an investigation as had been recommended by the committee had been made during the past summer, and the details which are given by the acting Engineer-in-Chief are very well worth the attention of this House in more respects than one, because, to my mind, they not only set the question of special enquiry, at rest, but throw great light upon the expenses incurred in such surveys and the loss of time which has been to some extent thus entailed on the service. I will, with the permission of the House, read a few extracts from the report. It was urged last year that much uncertainty prevailed as to the character of the line south of Lake Manitoba, as no instrumental survey had been made of it, but this objection has been overcome, and at page 183, under date January 4th, 1878, the acting Engineer-in-Chief reports:—

“In accordance with the verbal instructions of the Minister, an examination has been made of this line, from Selkirk westward, south of Lake Manitoba, with instrumental surveys of some of the deep valleys, traversed by the line, and at other places where deemed necessary—

“The first serious difficulty is the crossing of the valley of the Little Saskatchewan, which is nearly a mile wide at the top, sloping gradually down to the river, where the valley is 225 feet deep. As it is obviously impracticable to cross this at right angles without enormously heavy works, the course of the surveyed line was deflected so as to follow obliquely down one side of the valley and up the other, by which the maximum gradient on the east side was reduced to 0.75 per 100, or 39.60 feet per mile for five miles, and on the west side 1 per 100, or 52.80 per mile for a distance of over four miles in length. Thus it requires over nine miles to cross this valley, carrying the line out of the direct course, which, together with the unavoidable curvature, will increase its length considerably.

Hon. Mr. Haythorne,

“The valley of Birdtail Creek, at the point crossed by this route, is three-quarters of a mile wide and 190 feet deep in the centre.

“The valley of the Assiniboine is over a mile wide, sloping abruptly down to the bottom flat, which is over 200 feet below the level of the plain. The river is 300 feet wide at flood, where it is crossed by a bridge at Fort Ellice. No instrumental survey was made of these valleys, but they could probably be crossed in the same way as the Little Saskatchewan.

“The valley of the Cut Arm Creek is over 100 feet deep where the trail crosses it.

“The Touchwood Hills could be crossed without exceptionally high gradients, but with some rather heavy excavations, and the line would be sinuous, and consequently longer than if a direct course were practicable.

The engineer proceeds to describe a deviation by Quill Lake, and this is what he says of the valley of Shell River:—

“Where the line strikes it is 250 feet deep, over a mile wide at the top and 1,000 feet on the bottom flat. It is possible to descend by the slope of this valley to the bottom flat of the Assiniboine valley, and after crossing that, to ascend by a lateral valley to a table land on the west side; this, however, can only be done by using high gradients, and with a large amount of curvature, by which the length of line would be considerably increased. Some of the gradients used on the survey were 70 feet to the mile; these, however, can probably be reduced to 1 per 100 or 52.80 feet per mile, but only with very heavy excavations.

“The rest of the line to Quill Lake is favourable; a considerable portion of the land is fit for cultivation; of the balance, some is good pasture land—the rest very poor. It should be observed that the Engineer-in-Chief fixed the maximum gradient at 0.50 per 100, or 26.40 feet per mile, rising eastward, and 1 per 100 or 52.80 feet per mile rising westward; and on the located line these gradients have been maintained to a point west of Battleford. They could not, however, be maintained on the line suggested; even with very heavy works a gradient of 1 per 100 each way is the best that could be had for many miles. This, together with the increased length caused by curvature, and deflections from the general course would render the line suggested much inferior to the located line for the economic working of traffic, and would add materially to the cost of moving to the seaboard the products of the large and rich agricultural tracts lying further to the north-west."

Now, hon. gentlemen, I think the statements made upon the authority of the Engineer-in-Chief ought to be sufficient to set this matter at rest, but as there are some other remarks in the Engineer's report which have considerable weight on this subject: I will take the liberty to quote them—

"It is evident that no single line of railway can traverse all the fertile portions of a country so extensive, and that even before the Trunk line is complete, branches will be required in various directions.

"A branch line could be constructed at a comparatively small cost to meet the requirements of the Province of Manitoba equally well as a diversion of the main line, which if carried out as suggested, could not fail to be injurious to the wider interests of the Dominion.

"From all the information obtained up to this time, it does not appear advisable that any alteration should be made in the line as located in this district.

"There, however, appears to be feasible line, which after passing the south end of Lake Manitoba takes a northwesterly course, skirting the eastern base of Riding Mountains, and the northern end of Duck Mountain, and joining the located line in the valley of Swan River.

"The line suggested would be from 20 to 30 miles longer than the located line, but the gradients would be good, and the works moderately light, and it would therefore be somewhat less open to objection, than the other deviations proposed."

Now, hon. gentlemen, I think that disposes pretty well of all the objections that have been made with regard to the deviation south of Lake Manitoba. It seems to be obvious that it would be far preferable for the Dominion, if it is absolutely necessary that a line of railway should be carried through the Province of Manitoba south of the Lake that a branch line should be constructed at the expense of the Dominion rather than that the trunk line should be deflected from the course advocated by the engineers. I will now make a few remarks upon the general subject which has been referred to, and first with regard to the assertion that s

little has been done for so very much money. I think that hon. gentlemen who indulge so freely in that assertion lose sight of the fact that the undertaking is one of enormous magnitude, and although the work that has been performed makes comparatively little display at the present time, yet it was indispensable to the proper commencement of the work. The carrying out of an instrumental survey through such a vast wilderness must, in the nature of things, be an exceedingly difficult and slow work; and further than that, I think it may be remarked that railway work through a region, such as the Pacific Railway has to traverse, must naturally make very small returns, until the whole can be completed or a junction made throughout. By a temporary use of the water stretches, we might thus have communication through our own territories. We all know that it takes a long time with other works of construction as well as railways to show adequate results. In building a ship or a house, for instance, you must wait for results. At first the ship or building is but an aggregation of material, but in time it takes the shape of something useful; and we will have to wait until those surveys are completed, until the different joints, as it were, of the lines shall be connected, and when this is done you may look for results; but to expect them at this early stage of the proceeding, seems to me to be both absurd and extravagant. To give the House some idea of the extent and magnitude of these surveys, I would just refer to the chapter devoted to "work executed" in Mr. Fleming's report. This book which I hold in my hand, and which hon. gentlemen are no doubt familiar with, is itself evidence of the amount and difficulty of the work which has been accomplished, and speaking of the work that has actually been done, Mr. Fleming says:—

"The length of the various lines surveyed, and routes explored amounts in the aggregate to close on 46,000 miles, of which no less than 11,500 miles have been laboriously measured, yard by yard, through mountain, prairie and forest, with the spirit level, chain, and transit. Large as the mileage of examinations undoubtedly is, it yet forms only a very imperfect factor in estimating the energy expended on the work, and but faintly suggests the toilsome, unflagging labor, which has been necessary to encounter difficulty after difficulty; labor too often resulting in failure."

Then he adds what I think is quite becoming in him to mention. He bears testimony to the energy, courage and constancy of the staff engaged under him in that great undertaking. I know of nothing more worthy of commendation and praise than the constancy and courage displayed by the staff employed on the Pacific Railway, in prosecuting so dangerous and difficult an enterprise. I might refer to other portions of this work, to illustrate those points. Mr. Fleming says:—

“Most of the work has been carried on amidst the severities of winter, frequently in an exceedingly low temperature. The surveying parties were far from all habitations, and were supplied with but inadequate shelter and diet, although both were the best circumstances would admit of.

This book also contains a most interesting chapter, comprising the report of Mr. Jarvis, who led a party, in the depth of winter, from British Columbia to Winnipeg, and suffered the extremes of cold, fatigue, and other difficulties. And, I am sorry such difficulties as have been encountered, both difficulties of detail and difficulties connected with the climate of the country that has been explored, ought to have some weight in estimating the work that has been performed. This was no survey carried on in a summer climate, but often at enormous altitudes above the sea, to which places provisions, not only for the men but even for their dog teams, had to be conveyed; all those comparatively unimportant things form important items in estimating the difficulties that have beset the commencement of the Pacific Railway. Looking at all those things, I do not feel greatly surprised that any one should have, perhaps without deliberate thought, suggested the possibility that forty years might probably elapse before the road would be completed. I believe, myself, that history marches rather too fast in our times to delay the completion of such an important works as this, and that money, means and men will be found to complete this undertaking sooner than has been anticipated; but sometimes prophesies prove true. I might point to an English statesman, Earl Russell, who once hazarded the remark that the complete pacification of Ireland might not be completed before the year 1880, and, hon. gentlemen, judging from the recent event that has transpired there, the assassination of a nobleman on his own estate, the opinion thus hazarded upon that subject was not probably far astray. At this late period of the evening, as I have some further remarks to make on this subject, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Haythorne.

CATTLE DISEASES BILL.

ENQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—I would ask the Minister of Agriculture whether, in view of the provisions of the Imperial Act relating to the importation of cattle, it is the intention of the Government to adopt any measure regarding the inspection or regulation of the exportation of cattle from the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not think it is fair to take the Government by surprise by putting a question of that kind to them without notice.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER—I suppose the hon. gentleman put that question in consequence of the newspaper paragraph that appeared to-day. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has put the question, as the subject is a very important one. I have no objection to tell the hon. gentleman that the Government is disposed to do all in their power to prevent the exportation of any cattle without a thorough inspection of them having been made before they leave the country.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—There is a part of the year—five or six months—when the Government can have no control over this inspection when the cattle are exported from a foreign port.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then the cattle would not be admitted into England.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—There is a part of the Dominion where they can be inspected—I refer to Halifax,

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER—We have a cattle quarantine there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The action of the Imperial Parliament will, necessarily, drive the cattle trade to that port, because the importation of cattle from foreign countries will be practically prohibited.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY
HEADQUARTERS.

CONSIDERATION OF A RETURN.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved :—

“That the Return presented on the fifteenth day of March last to the Address of this House of the 20th day of February last, for copies of all Orders-in-Council, reports, recommendations and correspondence, and any other information in the possession of the Government relative to the fixing of the headquarters of the Intercolonial Railway at Moncton, be taken into consideration.”

He said: The papers brought down in reply to a motion which I moved some time ago, were two in number; one, an extract from the minutes of the Intercolonial Railway Commissioners, at a meeting held at Ottawa on the 6th January, 1870, in which they agree to recommend that the headquarters of the railway should be fixed at Moncton; the other, a more important document, a copy of the report of a meeting of the Privy Council held on the 11th January, 1870. The latter is as follows :—

“Copy of a Report of a Committee of the hon. the Privy Council, approved of by His Excellency the Governor-General in Council on the 11th January, 1870. The committee have had before them a report, dated 6th January 1870, from the Commissioners for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, upon the proper location for the main workshops of that line, east of the St. Lawrence. The Commissioners state, that having given the question careful consideration, with reference as well to the existing Railways in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, as to the Intercolonial they recommend that Moncton be selected as the place for establishing the main workshop for the repairs and maintenance of the rolling stock. They further recommend that they be authorised to purchase the necessary quantity of land, and to contract for the buildings and machinery that may be required.

“To the Honourable

“The Minister of Public Works.

&c. &c. &.,”

Hon. Mr. Power.

“The Committee concur in the recommendation of the Commissioners and advise, that they be authorised to carry out their report.”

Now, as I stated when bringing this matter before the House on a former occasion, I do not propose to raise any question as to the desirability of the selection of Moncton. My object was simply to establish certain facts; and the statement I made at that time was, that the late Government had decided upon establishing the offices and headquarters there, and that the change had actually been made before the present Government came into power. If any hon. gentleman will consult the Public Accounts for 1872-3 and 1873-4, he will find that before the change of Government, there were sums amounting altogether to about $150,000, expended in the purchase of land and the erection of buildings at Moncton; and it will be found that after the change of Government there was spent altogether in completing those buildings (which had been begun by the late Administration) the sum of only about $20,000. So it is quite clear that the impression which was on my mind, and on the minds of a majority of persons in Nova Scotia, was the correct one, that not only had it been decided that the workshops and principal offices of the Intercolonial Railway should be located at Moncton before the change of Government took place, but the lands had been purchased, the necessary buildings erected and the principal offices removed from other places at which they had been located to Moncton, before the present Government came into power.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN — The hon. Senator from Halifax is in error in saying that we removed the offices and workshops to Moncton from other points. If he will turn to Mr. Brydges' report, he will find there were 198 men employed at Moncton, and 180 at Richmond, in 1874. So, whatever removal has taken place, has been since that time. It was never denied that the late Government and the Commissioners proposed to have the main workshops at Moncton, as mentioned in the report before the House. But, what was contended by the hon. Senator and some of his friends in Halifax, was, that the late Government had removed the workshops from Halifax. The hon.

Senator will see from the papers that have been brought down, there was no such intention expressed in the recommendation of the Commissioners in 1870, nor in the minute of Council of the 11th January, of the same year. The recommendation was, that workshops should be erected at Moncton, central to a large portion of the Government railways, and that recommendation was made by the Commissioners, sanctioned by the Government, and carried out. But up to 1874, the hon. gentleman will find there were nearly as many men employed in workshops at Richmond as there were at Moncton, within 19; and he will also find there was no removal of machinery or works from Halifax prior to that. If the hon. gentleman will look at the returns, he will find there are not only workshops at Moncton, but at five or six other points on the line. They are necessary, and will always be required for the economical and efficient working of the road. When the hon. gentleman had the question up a few days ago, I mentioned where those workshops were. The Commissioners contemplated there would be workshops at several points along the line, and, instead of the papers which have been submitted, confirming the position taken by the hon. gentleman and his friends, that the late Government removed the workshops from Richmond, the evidence is conclusive that any removal has been made by the present Government.

Hon. Mr. WARK—The hon. Senator has read from Mr. Brydges' report. He ought to have read further, because he would have seen the Commissioners had built shops large enough to do all the work, not only for all the lines then in existence, but also for the Intercolonial Railway from Riviere du Loup eastward. Why did they build such large workshops if they required others? Here is what Mr. Brydges said a very short time after the hon. Senator from Londonderry ceased to be a Commissioner:

"I consider the shops and machinery now at Moncton to be in every respect suitable for the purposes for which they were constructed. The shops have ample capacity to repair properly and economically all the stock that now exists upon the railway. In my opinion Moncton is the proper position at which the repair shops ought to be placed, and I am equally of opinion that there is no necessity for having repair shops at more than one place for the length of the railway, which has to be worked. I say this not only with reference to the existing state of matters, but looking to the fact, that in a short time a considerable length of railway will be added north of Moncton, the repairs for stock upon which will have to be effected at Moncton. It is obvious to me that all the stock upon the line south of Newcastle, will have to be repaired at Moncton, and the shops there are designed for the purpose of accomplishing that object and are sufficient for the purpose, and there is no necessity for having any other shops for the work. There will be working, after the road is finished between Newcastle and Riviere du Loup, twenty engines. A very small running repair shop at Campbelltown will do all that is necessary to keep these engines in repair by sending any that require heavy repairs to Moncton. The existing repair shop at Richmond, according to my judgment, is unnecessary, and is causing a useless expenditure of money."

"I am of opinion that that the actual saving in money by concentration of the work at one place would amount yearly to $20,000 to $25,000."

. This clearly shows what the intentions of the Commissioners were when they constructed these extensive shops—that the whole of the work should be done there, and it shows the object was to save money. It shows that these workshops would have been continued at Halifax doing half the work at a cost to the Dominion of twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars a year more than was necessary. It is true the hon. gentleman said, there would be workshops required west of Moncton for light repairs to accidents that might happen at that end of the line, but the Commissioners clearly intended that the whole heavy work should be done at Moncton, with the exception of small repairs north of that point. Mr. Brydges shows that lumber and other materials cost less at Moncton and St. John than at Halifax. It is clear the Commissioners intended that all the work should be done at Moncton with the exception of small or temporary repairs away up about Restigouche.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—What year was that in?

Hon. Mr. WARK—In 1874.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I think that pretty effectually settles the question who removed the shops.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—My hon. friend is wrong in using the word "whole." If the hon. gentleman will read the report made by the Commissioners in 1870, he will see they did not use the term "whole of the work." They recommended that the main workshops be placed at Moncton. The hon. gentleman knows there are six or seven other workshops scattered along the line at Halifax, Pictou, Truro, Campbelltown, Riviere du Loup, and other points, but the main workshops are at Moncton, as I informed the House on a former occasion; but when Mr. Brydges, in 1874, was endeavoring, in his report to the Government, to make out a case against leaving workshops at Halifax, there were nearly as many men employed at Richmond as at Moncton, and whatever change has been made since then has been on the report of Mr. Brydges.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER—The whole of the repairs cannot be done at any one place on the line. I went through the chief workshops at Moncton last year, and spent, I think, a day and a half in them. I am satisfied that there is no such machinery in connection with railroad repairs and the construction of locomotives, on the continent of America. I never saw better machinery. I never saw workshops in connection with railroads in England or on this continent which were so complete as the shops at Moncton. There is nothing there superfluous, and the work is done with greater economy than in any other establishment of the kind I have ever seen, in consequence of the superior character of the machinery.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I believe I used, inadvertently, the word "removal"; but I do not think I applied it to the workshops. At all events, I did not intend to do so. The head offices were removed from Halifax; but, of course, the workshops are still there. They could not conveniently be removed, and I understand that there are about as many men employed at Richmond now as there were at any time. It is true that Mr. Brydges did, in 1874, recommend that the work at Halifax should be, in a great measure, discontinued. But the Government did not act on Mr. Brydges' recommendation. I should just like to repeat what the Commissioners reported. (Here Mr. Power read the following paragraph of the Order-in-Council again):—

"The Commissioners state that having given the question careful consideration, with reference as well to the existing railways in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia as to the Intercolonial Railway, they recommend that Moncton be selected as the place for establishing the main workshops for the repair and maintenance of the rolling stock."

Hon. Mr. McLelan.

It is clear Moncton was intended as the place for the principal workshops on the whole line, and also of the offices—that was the intention of the late Government. It was only the question of fact that I was desirous of having established, in order to remove the doubts which existed in the minds of some hon. gentlemen with respect to the removal of the headquarters of the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If anything has been established it is that the charge brought against the late Government of having removed the workshops from Halifax to Moncton has not been sustained. I think it has been made clearer than ever that these workshops were removed by the present Government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They have not been removed at all.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—They were removed in 1874. I hope the hon. gentleman has satisfied himself. He certainly has satisfied the House that he occupies a most ludicrous position, and the party to which he belongs may well say, "save me from my friends," because he has clearly shown the present Government is alone responsible for removing the workshops from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE—Not only has the change been made by the present Government, but the removal of the workshops has led to the dismissal of a large number of valuable employes. They dismissed Mr. Taylor and Mr. Johnston, and other efficient men, on whose skill and experience, the proper management of the railroad to a large extent depended.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When the present Government came into power, they found a very considerable sum of money had been expended on the workshops at Moncton, and they were in course of completion. Mr. Brydges speaks of them in his report as of something settled and passed. In view of the Order-in-Council, passed some time before, a large expenditure had been incurred before the change of Government. As to the allegation that officials have been dismissed, I have no doubt the Government thought it was desirable that changes should be made, possibly with a view of reducing the expense or increasing the efficiency of the service, but it certainly was not in connection with the change of the offices.

The subject was then dropped.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER moved the second reading of Bill (63), "An Act to repeal section 23 of 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1876,' as to ships in Canadian waters." He said the Bill contained but one clause, which was as follows :

"1. The twenty-third section of the Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, known as The Merchant Shipping Act, 1876, shall be repealed as respects all ships while in the waters of Canada, from and after the time which may be fixed for that purpose by the proclamation of the approval and confirmation of this Act by Her Majesty in Council."

The final despatch from the Imperial Government on this question, showed that they did not object to this measure, provided it exempted all ships, whether registered here or elsewhere, from certain duties while in Canadian waters.

The motion was agreed to.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

MALT DUTY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER moved the second reading of Bill 61, "An Act respecting the duty on malt." He said it was introduced at the request of the maltsters, to repeal the duty imposed on malt, by the legislation of last Session. The provisions were, first, for the repeal of the present duty ; second, for the bonding of malt when imported; third, for subjecting it to the same excise regulations and restrictions as Canadian malt, and, fourth, for the seizure of malt, if not immediately warehoused when imported. The duty had been put on last Session at the request of the maltsters of Canada, but the effect of it was to furnish the United

Hon. Mr. Scott.

States maltsters with an excuse to apply to Congress for a similar duty there against Canadian malt. As that would have a serious effect upon a large interest in this country, while the imports of malt were exceedingly small—almost nothing—the maltsters applied to have the duty repealed.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—Did I understand my hon. friend to say there was no malt imported ?

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER—A very insignificant amount. It is only in consequence of an understanding that we would repeal this duty that Congress has not imposed a duty on Canadian malt.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER said it was evident from this that a retaliatory policy would have been beneficial to this country if the Government had adopted it long ago.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the people interested thought differently. In this instance, the effect of putting on a duty was to furnish an excuse for retaliation in the United States, which would have seriously injured those engaged in growing barley and manufacturing malt in this country.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER said he was speaking of a protective policy on all articles of Canadian growth and manufacture. He contended if a policy similar to that of the United States had been adopted in this country long ago it would have helped us greatly during this period of depression.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT said it was at the dictation of American interests that this Bill was introduced.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER contended it was solely with a view to benefiting Canadian industries.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL thought this reason a good one, and it showed the advantage which might result to Canada from a retaliatory policy. It also showed how careful public men in the United States were to protect home industries. He thought Canadian statesmen should follow such a wise and patriotic example.

The motion was agreed to.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

HOMESTEADS EXEMPTIONS ESTATES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill 44, "An Act to provide for the creation and registration of Homestead Exemption Estates in the Territories of Canada." He said the principle of homestead exemption had been recognized in Ontario since 1868 and had proved very satisfactory. A similar law existed in the Western States. This Bill limited the exemption to a farm of eighty acres, value not to exceed $2,000, or to a lot in an incorporated city, town or village. Wherever this principle had been recognized, it had been found very attractive to immigrants who desired to protect themselves and their families against their own indiscretion.

The motion was agreed to.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER moved the second reading of Bill No. (69,) An Act to amend section sixty-eight of "The Penitentiary Act of 1875." He said the object of the Bill was to prolong for one year the term within which prisoners could be admitted to the Penitentiaries of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

The motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER moved the second reading of Bill (52,) An Act to amend "The Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1874." He said the object of the Bill was to amend section 16 of the Pacific Railway Act, so as to enable the Governor-in-Council to make arrangements for the leasing of the Pembina Branch for a term not to exceed ten years; such lease to be subject to the approval of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said he would not oppose the second reading of the Bill, but at a future stage he would move to limit the term of the lease to five years, and also to provide that the lease should be subject to the same ratification in the Senate as in the House of Commons.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL FROM THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons by their Clerk with a Bill intituled "An Act respecting persons imprisoned in default of giving sureties to keep the peace," to which they desired the concurrence of the Senate.

The Bill was read the first time.

MANITOBA CONFLICTING LAND CLAIMS BILL.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A Message was received acquainting the Senate that the House of Commons disagreed to their amendment to the Bill (No. 46): "An Act to amend an Act respecting conflicting claims to lands of occupants in Manitoba," for the following reasons:—

1st. That the proposed amendment is at variance with the general scope and title of the Act respecting conflicting claims to lands in Manitoba, under which the question whether any person has a claim against the Crown is not referred to the Commissioners, but only the cases of persons who had acquired some estate or interest in land from the Hudson's Bay Company, or the cases of adverse or conflicting claims between persons under sections three and four of section thirty-two of the Manitoba Act, and in respect of which it has been previously established to the satisfaction of the Minister charged with the administration of Dominion Lands, that there has been undisturbed occupancy of the same. The question whether any person has a claim against the Crown is, and should be determined by the Minister prior to any reference to the Commissioners.

2nd. That the machinery provided by the Dominion Lands Act enables the Minister in charge to make the necessary investigation in the cases provided for by the amendment more expeditiously, efficiently, and cheaply than can be done under this amendment, should it become law.

3rd. That the amendment would prevent the Minister from deciding adversely to the claimant without first making a reference to the Commissioners, although the evidence accompanying the application may conclusively show that the person asking for a patent has no valid claim.

4th. That the amendment would injuriously impede the administration of Dominion Lands in Manitoba, and delay the allotment of some of the half-breed reservations.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD moved that this Message be taken into consideration on Friday next.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day having been read for resuming the adjourned debate on the Hon. Mr. Kead's motion :

"To resolve, That this House regrets that the mode adopted by the Government in relation to the construction of the Pacific Railway involves the expenditure of enormous sums of public money without any corresponding beneficial results."

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE said: When the last adjournment of this protracted debate took place, in addressing this House, I referred to the magnitude of the surveys which had been accomplished. I stated, I think, that some 46,000 miles of lines had been explored, and some 11,000 miles or thereabouts had been carefully measured and gone over with the spirit level, chain and transit. I also referred to the praiseworthy exertions made by the staff of engineers who had conducted the survey, and the sacrifices made by them, and attempted to enlist the sympathies of hon. gentlemen for those who had spent so much of their lives, their youth and strength in attempting to accomplish this difficult and yet national object. There is one point further to which I may refer now, with reference to that same service, the fact, that during the survey which has been accomplished, no less than one thousand men, in different capacities, have been employed at the same time in this service, and thirty-five of those men have lost their lives, some by fire, some by flood, some through the ice, and some in the wreck of a steamer on the Pacific Coast. This is another proof of the magnitude of this preliminary service, which is necessary before much progress can be made with the work of construction. I might further remark, as to the labors which those men have undergone, and the results which they have accomplished, that, starting from the Pacific Coast, no less than eleven different lines have been explored through the mountain region. On eight of them, the distances have been carefully measured, and the cost of construction has been estimated. It will give hon. gentlemen an idea of the enormous cost and magnitude of the road we are about to undertake, when I state that the estimated cost of those eight lines, from the Pacific Coast to Yellowhead Pass, varies from $39,000,000 for the highest, to about $28,000,000 for the lowest, and the gradients and difficulties encountered in the mountain region are unprecedented, at all events in Canada, as yet.

Hon. Mr. Haythorne.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Victoria) —How many lines have been surveyed from the coast?

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—Eleven.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—Probably half that number have been surveyed.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—Probably half that number have been found practicable. I find by Mr. Fleming's report that eight have been measured, two are estimated, and the eleventh, the Port Essington route, is termed "uncertain." There is one point with regard to this railway to which I may refer, and that is the general excellence of the gradients coming eastward from the prairie region to Lake Superior. I find by Mr. Fleming's report that some 1,200 miles are level, or with gradients under 26½ feet per mile, and none rising above 53 feet per mile. This is a point well worthy of attention. The difficulties which have been encountered in the woodland region have been very serious, owing to the vast extent and unbroken character of the forests there. This explains, to my mind, some of those difficulties which I have heard hon. gentlemen refer to in this House, and in committees, occasionally. I have heard them express surprise that the engineers had not diverged from the direct line they were exploring, but when we consider the unbroken density of those forests, it ceases to be a matter of surprise that further investigations have not been made in the woodland region. It seems to me that remarkable energy has been shown by the staff of engineers, and though the expense has been large it is not great when we consider the time and labor expended in this preliminary work. One might refer to the outlay which, even in such a country as England, was found to be necessary in what were styled preliminary expenses. Even there it is stated that preliminary expenses have, in some cases, been incurred per mile sufficient to build a similar length of railroad on this continent, and yet it was found absolutely necessary to incur those expenses; how much more necessary in a country like ours, where there is such an extent of wilderness to penetrate? I wish, hon. gentlemen, to refer to some remarks which fell from my hon. friend who introduced this motion, as it struck me that the references which he made to the purchase of the steel rails were rather uncalled for. His motion appears to me to be either too strong for the occasion or else not strong enough. If it is really a fact that a huge job has been perpetrated in connection with those steel rails, I think, in that case, the hon. gentleman's motion is, perhaps, rather too mild. But I must express my surprise at the course which the hon. gentlemen opposite have thought proper to take in this House. It seems to me, believing as they believe, that a heavy public loss has been incurred, and that that loss has been incurred by the conduct of the Government, it is strange that they did not take the obvious course that should be adopted under such circumstances, and move for a committee of enquiry to investigate it. That is the course that has been adopted with regard to other charges in connection with the Fort Francis Lock, and the Kaministiquia terminus, and although those investigations are still incomplete, I have every reason to believe that the object of those gentlemen—assuming it to be to get at the truth—will be fully attained. Why not adopt the same course with regard to this matter? It seems to me it would have been the natural course to have taken. And I find it is the course which in the other House, the Premier and some member of his Government suggested to the Opposition; challenging them, in fact, to ask for a committee, and to have those charges fully and clearly investigated. But to have statements and charges bandied across the floor of this House, is really no way to arrive at the truth of this matter. If hon. gentlemen want to get at the truth, why not adopt the same course as they have taken with reference to the Fort Francis Lock, and the Kaministiquia terminus affair? I believe there is every probability of arriving at the truth with regard to those questions, and I see no reason why, if a similar course had been adopted with regard to the steel rails, we should not have an opportunity of arriving at the truth of that question also. It is only necessary to take a common-sense view of this steel rails matter, in order to see that the tenders themselves bear intrinsic evidence of the good faith of the Government, and of the uncertain state of the market at the time the contracts were awarded. When the tenders were advertised for, the trade was in such an uncertain condition that no one house would tender for the whole quantity of rails asked for by the Government, the largest quantity taken by any one firm being 20,000 tons. One firm had an offer to supply as much as they pleased, at their prices, but they refused to contract for more than 5,000 tons. These facts speak for themselves, and fairly demonstrate that the manufacturers themselves held that the trade at that time was, in a most uncertain position, and, consequently, very few of them ventured to contract for more than the smallest quantity for which tenders were called. From this fact, I come to the conclusion that the prices were so low and the trade was in such an unsettled state, that no manufacturers would risk a loss by undertaking to manufacture the whole quantity of rails required at that time by the Canadian Government. After all, the quantity was not very large to be taken out of the English market, and I find that this view of the case will occur to any man of common sense. It has been confirmed by my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Hope) who tells us the state of things he found at Birmingham and other manufacturing centres and the unwillingness of the trade to take hold of large transactions at that time. About the time this Pacific Railway scheme first took shape, we know that the coal and iron trades of many parts of England and Scotland were completely demoralized. The colliers were on strike. They refused to work, and the coal necessary for the iron masters could not be obtained, and, as a consequence, a complete stagnation of the iron trade followed. I could illustrate this question by reference to a provincial railway that was constructed about that time in my own Province. The contract was entered into at a time when railway iron bore the lowest price, and was completed when iron was dearest, and thus the contractors missed securing what would have been a very handsome profit on that undertaking, simply in consequence of a rise in the iron market when they were compelled to buy. This affords a solution of the apparent incongruities that have been magnified and misconstrued by the hon. gentleman from Belleville, and some hon. gentlemen who think with him. I found that speaking of the purchase of steel rails, the hon. gentleman from Saugeen takes a milder view of that transaction than my hon. friend from Belleville. He seems to think that Mr. Mackenzie's brother would have been perfectly justified in tendering for the rails, and that it would have been proper for the Department to have accepted his tender if it had been the lowest. There are, however, some objection to that view, and I must say, looking at the question in the broadest light, and observing also the great misconstruction which the Government of the day would have exposed themselves to had Mr. Mackenzie's brother been in the position of a contractor for the supply of rails to this Government, I think he acted with wise discretion in having nothing to do with the affair. I think the very same men who now urge that the Premier's brother had been in a certain underhanded manner mixed up in this transaction, would not have scrupled to state that he had acquired private information from head-quarters before tendering. Therefore, in my opinion, he exercised a wise discretion in having nothing to do with it. Reference has been made to the Esquimaux and Nanaimo Railway. It seems to me that if any blame has been incurred in that matter it does not lie at the door of the Government, as they acted in conformity with the arbitration—not undertaken, perhaps, under the actual name of an arbitration—but on the proposition made by the Imperial Secretary of State, which would have been accepted by the people of British Columbia, but this House in its wisdom thought proper to reject the Bill, which was brought in here in consequence of that arbitration; and there ended that transaction. Now, if I remember right, the hon. member for Saugeen stigmatized that policy in very strong terms. The hon. gentleman styled it "an attempt to bribe—almost a crime." If it had been an attempt to bribe it would not have been almost a crime, but it would have been really a crime, and hon. gentlemen would be doing less than their duty in allowing such a crime to go unpunished. But I cannot see any crime in it at all. There was an attempt made on the part of the Secretary of State for the Colonies to bring about a satisfactory arrangement, but that attempt unfortunately failed. So that no blame can lie at the door of the Government with reference to the transaction. It has been stated in the course of this debate, with regard to the Fort Francis Lock, that no trade will be found in the country east of that lock. I do not, for my part, desire to enter at any length into the discussion of a transaction which is at present being enquired into before a Select Committee of this House, and I think it is better to await the conclusion of their labours, and the report that they shall make to the House—if they do report. Still, a general remark may be hazarded, that in the present state of our knowledge of the country in the neighbourhood of Fort Francis Lock, both to the east and west of it, it is impossible for any one to define what the resources of that region may be. There may be natural resources there—minerals, metals, phosphates, valuable timber, agricultural districts, and other things of which we have very little idea at present. And this view of the case is impressed the more strongly on my mind, because it was only a few days since I happened to be in one of the places of worship in this city, where I heard an address from the Bishop of Algoma who, describing a region over which he had pastoral charge, said at one time it was considered almost worthless, from an agricultural point of view. But so much were people mistaken in their first impressions of it that it was now found there were large tracts of fertile land in that district which were being rapidly settled, and which were growing in wealth and importance. When I hear disinterested testimony of this kind from a quarter which cannot be charged with any disposition to exaggerate or misrepresent, I think, certainly, it is rather hasty on our part to assert, with reference to any half-explored territory through which we are about to run the Pacific Railway, that we may despair of finding any fertile lands for settlement or local traffic for that road. At all events, from anything that has yet transpired with regard to that country, I am not prepared to condemn any portion of it as thoroughly useless, but it will be time enough when such a result has been proven, to make the assertion that there will never be any local traffic for the Fort Francis Lock. It has been asked, with almost an air of disdain, why the Government bought those steel rails. They have been charged over and over again with a want of sincerity in the construction of the Pacific Railway, but I say, the purchase of those rails affords us a remarkable instance of the sincerity of the Government. It demonstrates clearly that they were bent on carrying out the construction of the road, if it were possible to do so, and the result only shows the uncertainty of human plans, as the Government expected to go on with that railway with the greatest dispatch possible, as soon as circumstances would permit of it. It is true that the great difficulties connected with the surveys have interfered with the laying down of those rails. We know very well it was found necessary, after building part of the line west of Prince Arthur's Landing, to abandon part of the route under contract leading to Lake Shebandowan, and deflect the line further north, in the direction of Savanne. Subsequently, some delays occurred from not finding a suitable route, and no one regrets the fact more than I do, that there should be an intervening section of 180 miles not yet under contract between English River and Rat Portage. I most heartily wish the financial circumstances of this country would permit of placing that intermediate section of the railway at once under contract. I say so, not only in the interests of the people of Manitoba and the North-West, but in the interests of emigrants who are going in there to settle in that country. I say so in the interests of the whole Dominion, as the necessity may arise any day, although we all hope that no such event will occur, which would require the sending of military aid to the central portion of our territory as we had to do on a previous occasion. It would be a most disastrous thing that we should be unprepared to send them any assistance that might be necessary, whether in the shape of armed men or supplies which might be required to promote the progress of that country. It is most important that we should be able to send them through our own territory with the least possible delay. Although the water stretches may be advantageously used for a few years, no doubt we must all look forward to the time when the all-rail route shall penetrate the wilderness between Lake Superior and the Red River. I do not see, myself, that any blame can be attached to the Government, or that they can be charged with remissness in this matter. It seems to me every exertion has been used to push on this great undertaking as rapidly as possible, and although those exertions have not been as successful as might be desired, we must recollect that, in the inception of an undertaking of this magnitude, time must be allowed before results become apparent. I think some allusions were made to the character of the work on that road. Of course, a nation like Canada, owning so fine a work as the Intercolonial Railway, would naturally feel some reluctance in descending from the stone and iron structures on that work to the wooden trestlework of the Pacific Railway. But I think we may trust the details of that question to the sagacity and experience of the engineers employed by the Government. In a general way it seems to me that engineers are by no means anxious to associate themselves with works that are not of a durable nature; on the contrary, their desire is to connect themselves with works of the most durable description; and unless they saw the necessity for using, in the first instance, wood in the place of stone and iron on the Pacific Railway, they would hardly be the parties to recommend it. I make those remarks specially, because I find, with regard to the route through British Columbia, that the estimates, to which I referred in the early part of my address, had been made upon the basis of the Intercolonial Railway. Everything in those estimates is calculated to be of the same materials as are employed on that structure: iron bridges and stone abutments of the same substantial character. Of course the outlay for these articles must be very materially reduced by the substitution of wood. But, for my part, I hope the more durable kind will be made use of. I feel, hon. gentlemen, that I have detained the House at considerable length, and, as I presume other hon. gentlemen wish to address you on this question, I therefore resume my seat.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Although the resolution of the hon. member from Belleville has already elicited a very considerable discussion, yet, I consider the question which it involves is of such great importance, that no apology should be expected from any member of this House who desires to express his views with regard to it. The subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway is one that concerns interests of a character at once grave and national; the questions which it embraces are of such magnitude and importance to the people of this Dominion, that we can hardly give it too much consideration in this Legislature. We all admit that the prosperity and future greatness of this country depends to a large extent upon welding together, harmonizing and consolidating the elements of which this vast Confederation is composed; and we all concede, at the same time, that nothing can contribute so much towards that desirable object as the construction of our projected transcontinental railway. The heavy burthens which its construction necessarily entails on the tax-payers of this country is also a subject which engages the attention of the people, who are looking with a great deal of interest and anxiety to the adoption of such a policy with regard to that great undertaking as will save us from the heavy burthen of debt, which the policy of the present Government is likely to entail upon the country.

Hon. Mr. Haythorne.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The resolution of my hon. friend from Belleville contains a very clear and explicit proposition; that proposition is, that the present Government are expending large sums of money in connection with this great public work without any compensating advantages. The discussion so far elicited on that resolution has been almost exclusively confined to the question of the steel rails purchase and the alleged blunder—or something worse—of the Government in relation to that very interesting subject. Now, while I think the steel rails purchase is a matter which deserves all the attention that has been given to it, there are several other things which induce me to vote for the resolution before the House, and which I consider, it will be well to state as briefly as possible in justification of the vote which I intend to give. We all admit, it is not denied even by hon. gentleman on the opposite side, that the Canadian Pacific Railway, is indispensable for the consolidation of this Union—that without this railway it would be impossible to see such a country developed—such a nationality created as it is our desire to see established under British institutions on this continent, and, that without this railway, it would be impossible to look forward to the development of the immense resources which these Provinces contain, and on which the future greatness and welfare of the country depend. While admitting on both sides of this House the necessity for the construction of this railway, I regret to say that gentlemen on the opposite side lose no opportunity of taking every unfair advantage of their predecessors, by endeavoring to make political capital on a question which should be beyond the dishonest designs of party or of faction. They lose no opportunity of unfairly charging the late Government with the entire responsibility of the burden which this great public work necessarily imposes on the country. They invariably refer to the subject as one for which they have no right to be held responsible, and which is all due to the unwise arrangement entered into by their predecessors. Now, I say, however justifiable such a course would be, in regard to the details of the scheme for building the Canadian Pacific Railway, it is not a fair course of argument for those hon. gentlemen to pursue, in regard to the undertaking itself, and if they did not pursue that unworthy course of argument, if they assumed their proper share of responsibility for the building of this great railway as one of the necessities of Confederation, without incessantly harking back on the alleged mismanagement and recklessness of the late Government, respecting the terms of Union with British Columbia, they would perhaps have received from gentlemen on this side of the House more lenient treatment, and less severe animadversion in respect to their own numerous mistakes, than they extend to them.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I would like to ask if the Liberal Conservative party in this country is the only party responsible for the inauguration of the policy whereby this Dominion has been burdened with the construction of the Pacific Railway? We all know that it is not so. We all know that the great Reform party of this country, through its leaders, and through its great organ—I might say something more than its organ, because the Globe newspaper is believed to inspire and control the policy of this Government, as we know it controlled the policy of that party when in opposition—we all know, I repeat, that the Reform party advocated the building of this railway when in opposition. What were the utterances of that journal, and the utterances of the Reform party when in opposition, with regard to the construction of the Pacific Railway? In the Globe of the 3rd February, 1871, some months before the terms of Union with British Columbia were submitted to Parliament, and some months before the bringing of that Province into this Confederation was definitely arranged, that paper contained a leading article on the question of the admission of the Pacific Province and the contemplated inter-oceanic railway. I wish to call the attention of the House to the strong expressions of the Globe on that occasion, and to contrast them with the subsequent course pursued by that journal, and the Reform party generally, with regard to the Pacific Railway. In February, 1871, referring to the contemplated admission of British Columbia into the Confederation, and the proposed terms of admission, the Globe used this strong language:

“The success of our Pacific Railway points to others being constructed, and renders them more than ever a necessity. People could do with none, in fact, better than they will allow themselves to believe they can do with one. Accordingly, a Northern Pacific is already in process of construction, and one through British Territory is a necessity if the new Dominion is to have anything like a fair chance of fulfilling its destiny, and developing its mighty and varied resources.”

Here is the declaration of that organ before the Government had been induced to enter into the terms which secured the addition of British Columbia to the Confederation; and it may be presumed that the Government of that day paid a great deal of respect to the utterances of the Globe, as reflecting the views of the party in opposition, with regard to the necessity for a Canadian Pacific Railway. But on that occasion we find the Globe further contended in refutation of the assertion that a Canadian road was impracticable, or unnecessary in consequence of its proximity to the Northern Pacific Railway, as follows:—

“A very cursory examination of the country to be traversed by the American road from the head waters of Lake Superior will show how fallacious all such arguments are, and how, not only the line through British territory may be carried through from strictly commercial considerations, but must be if British authority is to be maintained on this continent, and our new Dominion made practically as well as in theory a great fact.”

Here we have the organ of the gentlemen now in power maintaining that the construction of the Pacific Railway was a political and commercial necessity, in view of retaining British Columbia, and in order to prevent it from falling into the American Union; and that it was indispensable to our future prospects as a great nation, that we should assume the obligation of constructing this great work. With regard to that question, the Globe further contended, and properly so, that without a railway running through our great territory from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the Union of British Columbia with Canada would never be a reality, and without it the inevitable fate of the Pacific Province was annexation to the Republic.

This was the language then used by the organ of hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury Benches:—

“The connection of all that region with the eastern part of the Dominion would be merely nominal, and when the pear was once ripe, it would naturally fall, as from the first has been desired, into the lap of our very astute and enterprising cousins over the way.”

But further on in the same article we have stronger declarations still. Let me read the concluding paragraph of the Globe's editorial of 3rd February, 1871.

“Our neighbors know the value of the prize involved and are making gigantic efforts to secure it for themselves. Our rulers will be traitors to their country, and to British connection, if they lose a single season in making it practicable and convenient for settlers to go to Fort Garry through our own territory, and in putting things in a fair way for the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is a question not merely of convenience, but of national existence. It must be pushed through at whatever expense. We believe it can be so pushed through, not only without being a burden pecuniarily to Canada, but with an absolute profit in any point of view. Without such a line, a great British North America would turn out an unsubstantial dream; with it, and with ordinary prudence and wisdom on the part of her statesmen, it will be a great, a glorious and inevitable reality.”

Here is language, which, I venture to say, is stronger than any which has been uttered by the friends of the Pacific Railway on this side of the House, used by that great organ which reflects the opinions of the gentlemen now in power, which made them and could unmake them at any moment. I cannot see how that party, thus committed to the imperative necessity for building such a railway before the terms of Union were entered into, and which, no doubt, had a great deal of weight in inducing the gentlemen who were then at the head of the Administration, to agree to the conditions of Union, can now charge these gentlemen with being solely responsible for inaugurating the building of the Pacific Railway, as if it were one of their faults, and not, as was truly the case, the result of national necessity, clearly admitted and accepted, by both the great political parties into which this Dominion is divided.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Yet in the face of these facts, gentlemen on the other side of this House, have the assurance to speak of the Pacific Railway as if it were an unwise undertaking, forced on the country by the bad policy of the late Government, in which they had no hand, and which, if they had the power of undoing the past, they would not submit to. Admitting that the late Government had entered into a bad bargain with British Columbia, we all know that as soon as the gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches succeeded to power, they gave that Province clearly to understand that they would not hold themselves bound by the most important conditions of that bargain, at once set it aside, and went to work to devise other terms which would be acceptable to all parties interested. Therefore, as they refused to be bound by the terms of their predecessors, it does not lie in their mouths now to complain of the manner in which the late Government proposed to construct the railway, after they have repudiated the whole arrangement, and substituted in its place a scheme of their own.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—A great deal has been said from time to time as to the wisdom of the policy of the late Government with regard to this great undertaking; but I think the more this subject is discussed, and the more opportunity we have to consider it in the light of experience—and of such experience as the present Government have favored the country in connection with it—the more thoroughly convinced we must be that the policy of the late Government with regard to the Pacific Railway was a sound one, and the only policy which will ultimately be adopted in the construction of this great undertaking. What was the scheme of the late Government? The policy of the late Government was, to build this Railway by private companies, and not as a Government work, with the assistance of land grants and a liberal bonus in money. That scheme, it is well known, would have proved a success had it not been for the unfortunate political occurrences of 1873, to which I will not allude. It has been contended by the present Government, who were so largely responsible for those occurrences, that that project was impracticable; that it could not be carried out; that no company could be induced to undertake the work on the terms offered, although it is well known, and is a matter of history, that, immediately after the legislation which enabled the Government to place the work under contract, had been adopted by Parliament, two of the most powerful companies that had ever been formed in this Dominion, were organized for the purpose of securing the charter for this work, and that either of them was willing to enter upon the undertaking in consideration of the subsidy offered—thirty millions of dollars and fifty millions of acres of land.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—These facts are matters of history. One of those companies was selected for the purpose of constructing the railway under the proposed terms, and how that company failed, and the reasons why it failed are well known to hon. gentlemen, and are also matters of history; but it was not in consequence of any intrinsic weakness in the scheme itself, for the fact is becoming more palpable every day, that the terms which were offered by the late Government would have been ample to induce a company to build the road with a fair prospect of profit to themselves. We do not want any further proof of the sufficiency of the aid proposed, than the knowledge of the fact, that the Northern Pacific Railway had realized, and were still realizing, for their lands, $5 per acre. Our lands were at least as valuable, and in all probability the 50,000,000 of acres proposed to be granted under the Dominion charter, would build the railway even without the money subsidy of $30,000,000, which the reserves of 50,000,000 of acres would more than doubly refund to the Dominion Treasury. I believe the Northern Pacific will yet work through in spite of its mistakes and mismanagement, on its land subsidy alone. I see the hon. Secretary of State shakes his head. I know there is a difference of opinion on that question, but I have recently seen statements which leave no doubt on my mind that ultimately the Northern Pacific Railway will be pushed through to its destination on the Pacific Coast.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We know that
Hon. Mr. Miller.

the land subsidy granted to that railway has proved to be exceedingly valuable; that lands along that route, which are no better than our prairie lands, have sold, as I have just said, at from five to six dollars an acre, and that the demand for them at that price has been on the increase, so that even without any money subsidy, by means of the land grant of the late Government alone, it is no longer a doubtful question that the Company undertaking the work would have had sufficient means to construct it out of the proceeds of those lands. Fifty millions of acres of land, even at the low price of three dollars an acre—which every one will admit is a low estimate for our rich prairie lands—would realize the enormous sum of $150,000,000, and no one has placed the cost of building the Pacific Railway at anything beyond that figure. So it is clear, if the scheme of the late Government had been carried out, the road would have been constructed without costing the country a dollar beyond the subsidy which had been voted by Parliament. Then, in what position would the country be in regard to our actual money outlay? It can easily be seen that if the alternate blocks of land reserved by the Government on either side of the line had been given away by the Government at one dollar per acre, in order to induce settlers to go into the country, which would be a wise policy, the Dominion would have returned to it, through the sale of the reserved lands, nearly two dollars for every dollar advanced, thus proving the correctness of the Globe's assertion that the project was justifiable on purely commercial principles.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is all very well for hon. gentlemen who have seen the folly of departing from that scheme. to say now, when charged with their mistake, that Sir John Macdonald's scheme was impracticable, but why did they not give that policy a fair trial when they assumed office? With regard to the time limited for the completion of the work, although a great deal has been said about it, we all know that the ten years limit was not expected to be rigidly adhered to, and the delegates who negotiated the terms of Union on behalf of British Columbia did not consider the period fixed to be absolutely binding on the Dominion. All that was expected of Canada was that we should proceed with the work honestly and earnestly, and if it took double the length of time contemplated, as long as we were acting in good faith, there would be no dissatisfaction. The people of British Columbia would not have found fault with the bargain if reasonable efforts were being used to fulfil its conditions. What the people of the Province and the rest of the Dominion have found fault with is that the road has not been, and is not being, pushed forward in good faith, and with a proper regard to the true interests of the Dominion. But hon. gentlemen must not forget that, although the period was limited to ten years, it made no difference to the people of Canada, because, under the scheme of the late Government, a company was to have constructed the road, and it was for the company who received the charter to complain that the time was too short, and no doubt that time would have been extended to any reasonable length if the company showed that they were progressing with the construction as rapidly as could be expected. The time limit was a wise provision, as it gave the Government a salutary check over the charter. It could not do any harm, and it would have enabled the Government of the day to exercise a control over the construction of the work that would have been beneficial in the interests of the country. As a company was easily found who would have undertaken the construction of the railway, even under that limit, I do not think it is any good cause of complaint against the late Government that they were over solicitous for the completion of our national highway. A great deal has been also said of the recklessness of the late Administration in attempting to build a railway across the continent without a survey. But under that scheme the company that undertook to construct the railway were also required to make the surveys, so that it was not necessary that the Government should have a survey made before the contract was awarded, which would have cost the country a large additional sum of money. It has also been charged that the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Branch, in regard to which several allusions have been made in this debate, was to be included in the scheme of the late Government. My hon. friend from British Columbia (Mr. Macdonald) in addressing the House the other day, said, that by an Order-in-Council the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Branch was made a portion of the Pacific Railway. I am not prepared to dispute the existence of that Order-in-Council. On the contrary, I believe there was such a Minute of Council; but under the scheme of the late Government it made no difference whether the road was 2,500 miles long or 3,000 miles long, they were to give a specific bonus of land and money for the construction of the road whatever its length might be, and it was all the better for the country if the Government could secure the construction of the railway on Vancouver Island and down to Esquimalt, for the same land grant and the same money subsidy that would have to be given for the line upon the main land only.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I have likewise heard it stated in this debate, and also on previous occasions, that it was a part of the policy of the late Government to build the Georgian Bay Branch as portion of the Pacific Railway. Admitting, however, that such was the case, for the same reason it made no difference if two or three hundred miles were added to the eastern terminus of the line, as the country were not called upon to pay anything additional for such extension; the Government was only committed to a specific sum wherever the terminal points might be placed, whether on Vancouver Island or the main land on the west, or whether at a point near Lake Nipissing or at the Kaministiquia on the east; therefore, it cannot be urged against the Government on these points that they contemplated imposing heavier burthens on the people of this country in connection with this work than are contemplated by the gentlemen who are now prosecuting it under another scheme.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

At this point (it being six o'clock) Mr. Miller moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned at 6 p. m.

THE JUDICIARY OF NEW BRUNSWICK.

ENQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DEVER enquired :

" Whether it is the intention of the Government in the near future to add to or alter the Judiciary of New Brunswick so as to conform to the reasonable wishes of a large and highly respectable portion of the people of that Province."

He said:—This question leads up to the Judiciary of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, a body of gentlemen I have the honor to know by more than reputation; many of its members I have been personally acquainted with for several years. They possess the confidence of the people of New Brunswick for their moral standing, their kindly disposition and their high legal and judicial attainments. They have the entire respect and confidence of the people, and there is a feeling that they should be considered by the Government, in salaries and position, equal to any Judges of similar Courts in other Provinces. While Judges of the Superior Courts in Ontario and Quebec receive $5,000 each, the Judges of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick are paid only $4,000, though their labour is quite as arduous as that of Judges in other Provinces, and their standing as gentlemen quite as difficult to maintain, inasmuch as the cost of living is quite as high in New Brunswick as in other parts of Canada. In connection with this subject, I may mention a case in which a large section of the people of New Brunswick feel that they have not been treated with proper consideration in the appointment of the judiciary in that Province. It is now understood that another Judge is to be appointed there, and I would call the attention of the Government to the claims of a gentleman (Mr. Watters) for the position. He is a man eminently qualified to fill the highest position to which lawyers may aspire. He has held the office of Solicitor-General in New Brunswick for many years, and I and others cannot explain why his merits have been so long overlooked, unless it has been on sentimental or political grounds. To show the estimation in which he is held in his own Province by gentlemen of various shades of religious opinion, I may be permitted to read an extract from an article in a New Brunswick paper, written by a gentleman who is not of the same religious creed as that of Mr. Watters, a gentleman who once graced the pulpit of one of our Presbyterian Churches, and who now is a member of Parliament and the proprietor and editor of the leading newspaper of that Province. The extract is as follows:—

" The Hon. Chas. Watters was born on the 26th of November, 1818. He is a native of this city, and the son of worthy Irish parents. He received his education at the City Grammar School, where he distinguished himself particularly in the study of classics, for which he was awarded the Corporation Gold Medal. In 1840, he began the study of the law, in the office of Judge Richie, was admitted an attorney at Michaelmas 1845, and enrolled a Barrister in 1847. Since then he has been regularly engaged in the practice of his profession, in this city. In 1854 he offered for the representation of this county in the Legislature and was defeated. In November of the following year, the Hon. Francis Rice, of Victoria, having been elevated to the Legislative Council, Mr. Watters was elected to fill the vacancy thus occasioned. In 1856 a dissolution of the Assembly having taken place on the Liquor Law question, he was again returned for Victoria, and again in 1857, when the Chandler-Gray Government having come to a dead-lock in the Legislature, appealed to the people. In November, 1855, one month after his first election, he was called to a seat in the Executive, and was the first Roman Catholic in the Province who ever enjoyed that distinction. He was appointed Solicitor-General in July, 1857, and has held that office without interruption until the present time. In 1861 he and Mr. Tilley ran together on the Liberal ticket for the representation of St. John city, and were elected. Since he has been Solicitor-General, he has directed his efforts principally to the assimilating of our criminal law with that of England. Through his exertions the criminal code is now in an excellent state, being almost the same as the English law, so that in its execution, our Judges and legal men have the advantage of the criminal judgments of the English Bench. In 1862, Mr. Watters originated and carried a Bill for the abolishment of the death penalty, substituting other punishments for rape, arson, burglarious entry, &c., with intent to kill, by setting fire to ships, &c. Previous to this it was almost impossible to procure conviction for any of these offences, owing to the irrevocable character of the penalty. The Intercolonial Railway Act of 1863, the Militia Act, the Railway Facility Act of last Session, and various laws of a local nature, were all the production of his pen. In the Legislature Mr. Watters has been emphatically a working man. As a speaker he is at times both fluent and brilliant, understands human nature well, and usually puts a point very strongly. His temperament is sprightly, and his nature genial, and these have secured for him many warm personal friends."

I would be the very last to advocate the appointment of any man to a high judicial position merely on the ground of his religious faith, but, I think, on the other hand, the claims of a man of ability should not be ignored because of his creed. It is hardly right that a gentleman possessed of such qualifications, and who has held such a high position in New Brunswick as Mr. Watters has, should be overlooked so long, and it is from that standpoint I ask the Government, in making appointments to the Bench in New Brunswick, to give the claims of Mr. Watters and his friends that consideration to which they are fairly entitled.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman had given me some clue to what he proposed to bring before the House, I would have been prepared to answer him. His proposition was an enigma to me, when I looked at it first. Had he pointed his question in the direction of any one gentleman who, in his opinion, was not sufficiently remunerated, I should have been able to give him a more satisfactory answer. I quite concur in the encomiums which he has passed on Mr. Watters, but I am not aware that he is treated differently from other Judges of the same class in the Province of New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I had reference to the Judges of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, whose salaries are somewhat lower than those of Judges in similar Courts in Ontario and Quebec.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand the hon. gentleman to point to some particular case, and I think he read the biography of some judge. It was in reference to his encomiums of that judge that I expressed my approval. The hon. gentleman does not suppose it would be proper to give one judge a preference over others. I am unable to say that it is in contemplation—in fact, it is not during the present Session, at all events, and that disposes of the question for the next year—to appoint any judge. A great deal of pressure has been brought to bear upon the Government from Ontario in reference to County Court Judges, many of whom do a great deal of work and are underpaid, according to their own estimation. Some counties have a population of fifty to sixty thousand people. In one case, where the population is fifty thousand, there is no junior judge, and the judge complains that he is underpaid, his salary being limited to $2,400 a year. The judges in other Provinces have from time to time made remonstrances, but I have not heard any from New Brunswick until now. No doubt, if judges are appointed in other Provinces, New Brunswick will receive its proper attention from the Government; but at the present moment I am unable to say to my hon. friend that it is contemplated to make any change in the direction that is indicated.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I had no reference at all to the salary of Mr. Watters. He is quite satisfied with it, inasmuch as it is the same salary as other judges of that rank in that Province are paid. I had reference to the salaries of the Supreme Court Judges of New Brunswick, who receive less than judges occupying similar positions in Ontario and Quebec. The only fault I had to find was that the claims of Mr. Watters to elevation to the Supreme Court had not been recognized. I contend that he would be an ornament to the highest Bench in New Brunswick. His claims have not been considered, in some way or other, in the manner that a large section of the people of New Brunswick have a right to expect. I hope they will be no longer overlooked, if other appointments are to be made to the Bench of New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I regret that this subject has been brought before the House, in the way in which the hon. gentleman from St. John (Mr. Dever) introduced it, because for my own part I would sooner not bring sectarian complaints into this arena at all, but when they are brought here they should be boldly, fearlessly and honestly dealt with. The hon. member who makes the enquiry as well as the hon. Secretary of State, both seem afraid of the subject; both appeared very anxious to avoid the real point involved; one is afraid to go as far as he wants to go, and the other is not willing to understand him even as far as he has gone. Now, I blame the hon. member from St. John, as he has brought this subject here, that he should be afraid to express what he thinks and feels regarding it, in such manner as would leave the hon. Secretary of State no pretext for saying he does not comprehend what his question or remarks mean. I am not afraid to express my views on this or any other question that comes before the House, and I shall not stop to ask whether my utterances may be pleasing or displeasing to some hon. gentlemen. I will tell the hon. Secretary of State what the hon. member from St. John desired to say: he desired to say that Judge Watters' religion was a barrier to his promotion in the Province of New Brunswick, and, I believe, there is much truth in that opinion. It cannot be denied that the Roman Catholics in all the Maritime Provinces have not fair play in the distribution of patronage—do not receive justice in regard to the honors or emoluments of public life—and do not stand on equal ground with their Protestant fellow-citizens in this respect in those Provinces. Conceal the matter as we may, there can be no doubt of the truth of these allegations—a Roman Catholic's creed in the small Protestant Provinces is a barrier to his success in public life, and a serious obstacle to his attaining any of its higher distinctions. This is no less true, although there may be an exception to the general rule—although it may not have been politic or possible to ignore the body altogether—and in one instance a high office is held by a representative of the Maritime minority; but that is an office belonging to the Dominion, and the giving of it to that gentleman was not due to the liberality of the majority in the Maritime Provinces, but to the justice of the whole Dominion. That act of justice was done too, to compensate for the intolerance of this party, in denying to the Roman Catholic minority in the lower Provinces a single seat in the present Government. Under the present Government we have been treated from the outset with the greatest contempt and injustice, for which the day of reckoning is not far distant. The Roman Catholics are very nearly one-third of the population of the Maritime Provinces; they comprise 241,000 out of a population of about 750,000. These Provinces have never had less than four representatives in the Cabinet since the present party has been in power, and for a while they had five seats at the Council Board, but no place could be found for a representative of the proscribed minority at that Board. Is it fair, with four or five seats in the Government at the disposal of the Premier, not to find a place for a representative of one-third of the people in the position above all others in which it is most essential that there should be representation? The want of such representation has been too evident in the distribution of patronage under the present Government. I do not deny that some of the lower class of offices have been given to Roman Catholics in the Maritime Provinces within the last few years, but for the higher offices and distinctions, as a general rule the minority are not considered as on an equal footing. There seems to be an understanding not openly expressed, but secretly acted on, that outside of the lowest grades of patronage Roman Catholics are to be quietly ignored. This is the conviction at any rate among a large body of that denomination, and it is well that the whole Dominion should know it. Let me give the House two illustrations. A year or two ago, it became necessary to divide the Province of Nova Scotia into nine districts for the purposes of the Weights and Measures Act. Nine Inspectors were appointed for the Province, but not a single Catholic was appointed in any one of these sections, although many of them were Catholic sections. These selections were of such a character that the proscription must have been intended—it could hardly be accidental. Then in 1876, the Province was divided into seven districts for the establishment of County Courts in Nova Scotia, and seven Protestant Judges were appointed for these Courts. In each of the two eastern districts, including six counties, the Roman Catholics form a majority of the population, and no objection should have been made to placing Roman Catholic Judges in these districts. It is no answer that one of these positions was offered to a Roman Catholic, who, it was known, would not accept it. There were suitable men belonging to that body that would have been pleased to obtain the appointment, but they were passed over. It could not be said that the Roman Catholics had already a fair representation in the judiciary, for out of fifteen Dominion Judges for Nova Scotia, they have only one, while they number 102,000 to 282,000 of all other denominations, and that small instalment of justice they owe to Sir John Macdonald. In New Brunswick the minority form over one-third of the whole population, and out of eleven Dominion Judges they possess but one County Court Judgeship, which they also received from the late Government. In Prince Edward Island the Catholic minority is nearly one-half the population, and out of six Judges they have one inferior appointment, for which they have also to thank Sir John Macdonald. Until Confederation we never had any representation on the Bench, and the little we have received since was at the hands of the late Government, which made a beginning at least in rectifying the unjust state of things that had so long prevailed in that quarter. Since the present Government have been in power they have made ten appointments to the Bench in Nova Scotia alone, three or four in New Brunswick and two or three in Prince Edward Island, but in every appointment they have disgracefully ignored the rights of the minority. They appear to have lent themselves to the old policy of proscription that was so rigidly enforced in the past against us. I must not be understood as claiming appointments for Catholics on account of their religion. What I contend I have a right to denounce, if I believe it to be true (and I do believe it to be true) under this Government, is that being a Roman Catholic in the Maritime Provinces is a barrier in the road of any one of that ignored class in regard to their fair share of distinction and public patronage. It is especially true with regard to the higher offices of the State, such as those I have been alluding to. How differently are things done in the Catholic Province of Quebec? The Protestant minority there is 170,000, or only one-seventh of the whole population, but no party would think of forming a Government for this Dominion without giving that minority a representative therein out of the four seats that Quebec has in the Cabinet. And, considering the large representation of the Maritime section in the Government in proportion to population, it is much easier to do justice there to the minority, and with less cause of complaint to the majority, than in the Province of Quebec. So in all the branches of the public service—on the Bench, in the Commons, in the Senate the Protestant minority of Quebec has double the share of power and patronage that its mere numerical strength would entitle it to. I do not mention these facts to find fault with them, but to show how differently the Protestant minority of Quebec is treated from the Catholic minority in the small Protestant Provinces. I am glad that the treatment of the Quebec minority is not only just but liberal. I believe, if any injustice were attempted towards the Protestant minority of Quebec the majority of Ontario would not look passively on and permit it. So the Roman Catholic majority of Quebec should not look with indifference on the injustice being practised towards the Roman Catholic minority in the Maritime Provinces.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—In the days of Sir George Cartier that minority had a just friend, who would not allow their fair claims to be ignored, and in those days Sir Edward Kenny and Mr. Hugh McDonald had seats in the Dominion Cabinet as representatives of their class. Sir George Cartier was a statesman who believed in doing justice, not only to his own people, but to all classes. The French representatives in the present Cabinet do not even seem to care for their own countrymen—they are too busy in thinking of themselves; and it is no wonder that they do not trouble themselves to see justice done to the minority in the small Protestant Provinces. But there is some consolation in the thought that, although a Grit Government with a large majority in Parliament has been able to ignore the rights and claims of the Roman Catholic minority in the Maritime Provinces during the past five years, have treated us as mere hewers of wood and drawers of water in the political order; although, for a short time they have been enabled by their great strength in Parliament to treat us with contemptuous injustice, they cannot in the approaching elections so boldly disregard our power. They would like (in fact, all parties like very well) to get our votes, but when our votes are once recorded, it seems as if we had no other purpose to serve. If it must be so, let it be so, but I shall not hesitate at all times to denounce the hypocrisy and injustice of men who, professing liberality and fair play, are, in truth, intolerant bigots, and disposed in deed, if not in words, to place the iron heel of intolerance and proscription wherever they have the power to do it, on the class to which I belong. The Catholics of the Maritime Provinces will not forget Grit proscription at the coming elections; and if any party venture to act in the same way in the future, it will not receive my approval. I repeat, I desire to make no claims for Roman Catholics on account of their religion. All I ask is, that their religion shall not be an obstruction to fair consideration in the distinctions of public life. I know Catholics have little chance unless they can show they have power and numbers, which alone command respect in such matters. They ask that when they possess the requisite qualifications for the public service, it should not be objected to give them office in proportion to their numerical strength; they do not ask it on account of their religion, but they will not be satisfied to find themselves treated differently from other denominations, and remain quiet under the injustice. I regret to be called on to refer to this subject in this Chamber, or out of it, but I feel I cannot say less on the present occasion, as other parties have brought the question before the House. It involves a grievance that I am not afraid to touch, however desirous the friends and apologists of the Government may be to palliate an injustice that is undeniable. I have no interest to serve by agitating the matter, as the man who denounces a wrong such as I am pointing out, is the last one who can expect to benefit from its redress. But I am satisfied, if I obtain justice for others; I want no consideration for myself. It is because I could not be supposed to have any personal ends to serve—because I am in opposition to the Government—that I speak as freely as I do, and in language that their supporters dare not use. But the Government have some partizans who are prepared to approve the most flagrant injustice they can perpetrate towards the Roman Catholic minority in the Maritime Provinces. Perhaps, it is hard to expect anything else from some of their champions considering their personal obligations. The wrong that is at the bottom of all the unfair treatment of the minority in the Lower Provinces, is that which exists in depriving one-third of the population of any representation in the Government to advocate their interests and watch over their rights. This wrong is at the foundation of all the others, and I can never support a Government that perpetrates it, neither should the Catholics of Quebec support any Government that treats their co-religionists in the Protestant Provinces with injustice. Is it fair that, with nearly half the population of the Dominion belonging to that denomination, there should only be four Catholics in a Cabinet of thirteen members? or that the Catholics of Nova Scotia New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island should be denied all representation whatever? It is a mockery of fair play, and a strange commentary on the boasted liberality of some people, and the equality of all classes in this country. The equality only exists in name; practically, it has no existence at all in some portions of this Dominion. I again repudiate the idea of claiming political consideration for Roman Catholics on account of their religion, that is not at all my desire—but I wish to show that that large body is, for some reason or other, deprived of its just share of public position and patronage in the section from which I come, and, deny it as much as you please, the only reason that Roman Catholics can believe to be at the bottom of the wrongs they suffer, is their obnoxious creed. That is the feeling, at any rate, among a large class of the people in this country, and I am sorry that facts give it so much confirmation. The present Government have done much, by their systematic neglect of their Catholic supporters, to strengthen this belief; they have shown their true colors by taking advantage of their great strength after the last elections, to inaugurate a policy of proscription, instead of using it to do justice to all classes. The next election, when the people will be called to pass judgment on the manner in which they have exercised the power vested in them, is near at hand, and I have no doubt the minority in the Maritime Provinces will give fitting expression to their opinion of the treatment they have received from the great Liberal party of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he was sorry his hon. friend spoke with such warmth on this subject, because he thought it unfortunate it should be discussed in this way in the Senate. It was unseemly and not in good taste. The minority was too strong a body in this Dominion to be ignored, and he emphatically denied that it had been ignored by this Government. It was the first time he had ever heard it said that the claims of the minority had been ignored by this Administration. It was a melancholy fact that these observations should apply to Ontario, but it was entirely due to other causes, than those to which the hon. gentleman had chosen to ascribe it. It was due, he believed, to the absence of gentlemen suitable for the position in the minority class—to, the fact that they did not seek the higher walks at the bar in the same proportion to their numbers that other classes did. It could not be denied that the minority in Ontario was very powerful, that it had influence, not only in the Local Legislature, but also in the Government of Canada; that it was very largely courted and its claims were recognized, and that in all other appointments it had no cause of complaint. He could prove that in the distribution of patronage, the minority class had had its fair share. He had never heard the question of creed raised in making appointments under the Weights and Measures Act. They had been made in the usual way, on the recommendation of supporters of the Government in the other House. If any class of the population were overlooked, they had the weapon in their own hands. The hon. Senator from Arichat was not justified in drawing such conclusions as he had presented to the House. No doubt he had spoken not for the Senate, but for those he desired to influence in Nova Scotia. Of course the hon. gentleman had a perfect right to do so, but it was not a happy discussion for the Senate to embark in, and it was unfair to spring it upon the House without warning. It was necessarily to him (Mr. Scott) a very tender point. He had some familiarity with the whole subject during the last twenty or twenty-five years, and, therefore, he was in a position to speak upon it, if he desired to do so, at length. He had no impression that the motion pointed to anything of the kind; it was a sort of a puzzle to him until it was explained by the hon. Senator. In regard to Judge Watters, he had been appointed a County Court Judge at $2,600 a year, and subsequently, when an opportunity occurred to give him an additional office, he had been appointed a Judge of the Admiralty Court, because it was felt his abilities entitled him to the position. That added $600 to his salary.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said the only three Roman Catholic Judges in the Maritime Provinces had been appointed by the late Government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Watters was appointed to the Admiralty Court last year.

Hon. Mr. DEVER said the hon. Secretary of State had observed that no appointments had been made in the Province of New Brunswick since this Government came into power, but if he remembered rightly, the Supreme Court Judges were all appointed by this Administration. He held that no man should be appointed to the Bench, no matter what his creed was, unless he was fitted for the position. Every one who was acquainted with Judge Watters knew he was a man of ability and thoroughly qualified for the position.

Hon. Mr. POWER said he thought that it was to be regretted they should have a discussion of this kind in this Chamber, and particularly that such temper should have been imported into it as had been manifested by the hon. gentleman from Richmond. Religion should be kept out of politics as much as possible, and he thought before a charge of the exclusion of any body from any position in consequence of their religious belief should be brought before the Legislature, very convincing proof should be produced that that denomination were being dealt with in an unfair manner. Looking at the present position of public affairs in the Dominion, that could be hardly said of the Roman Catholic body. In Ontario, the Lieutenant Governor, who was appointed by the present Government, was a Roman Catholic.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Mr. Frazer, one of the most influential members of the Ontario Cabinet, was also a Roman Catholic, and he thought that hereafter the Roman Catholics would continue to have the same representation in Protestant Ontario which the Protestant minority had in the Cabinet of Quebec. The Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, lately appointed by the present Government, was also a Roman Catholic. It did not therefore, seem as though the Roman Catholic interests had been neglected in the western part of the Dominion. Then as to the Lower Provinces, which the hon. gentlemen opposite deemed to have been marked by an utter neglect of the claims of the Roman Catholics; on looking into the matter, it would be found that those hon. gentlemen were somewhat mistaken. For instance, the position of Speaker of the House of Commons, one of the most honorable positions in the country, was now filled by perhaps the ablest and most distinguished Irish Roman Catholic in the Dominion. The Hon. Mr. Anglin's election to his present office certainly showed that the majority of the House of Commons had no disposition to proscribe Catholics. It was true that no Roman Catholic Judge had been appointed in Nova Scotia since the present Government came into power, but the reason for that was not very difficult to find. The last appointment made to the Supreme Court of that Province by the late Government, before they went out of power, was a Roman Catholic one, and it was not to be expected that the next appointment would be a gentleman from the same denomination. As the hon. Secretary of State had said, in these matters due regard must be had to other things besides religion—the qualifications of the individual had to be looked at apart from religion altogether. Judge Smith, who had been appointed because he was Attorney-General of the Province, had given unusual satisfaction to the bar of the Province, and to suitors as well. Out of the seven Judges of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, there was not one Presbyterian, and there was a good deal of feeling on the part of that body, who were as numerous as the Catholics, because they had no representative on the Bench.

Hon. Mr. Power.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There was Sir William Young. And what of Judge Henry?

Hon. Mr. POWER said Sir William Young was probably about retiring from the Bench. The seven County Court Judges who had been appointed, had been elevated to the Bench upon the recommendation of the Nova Scotia members of the House of Commons. There was a very fair representation of the Roman Catholics of Nova Scotia in that House, and, if they had considered that their interests required it, they might have had co-religionists of their own appointed. In fact, he understood that the position had been offered to two Roman Catholics, who both declined to accept it; so it could hardly be said that their claims were not recognized. It would also be found that, since the present Government came into power, a very fair proportion of the public appointments in Nova Scotia had been given to gentlemen whose creed was now said to be proscribed. One of the best offices in Nova Scotia, that of Warden of the Penitentiary, was given to Mr. Flinn, a Roman Catholic. Then, when a vacancy occurred in the office of Superintendent of the Intercolonial Railway at Halifax, a Roman Catholic, Mr. Macdonald, had been appointed to it. That did not look as though the present Government had ignored the claims of his co-religionists. The new Superintendent of the Provincial Insane Asylum, and the Provincial Engineer of Nova Scotia, who had been appointed a year or two ago by the Local Government, were also Roman Catholics. Those names had occurred to him on very little reflection; and other instances could be cited if the matter were looked into, to prove that the Roman Catholics had not been ignored by the party now in power. If there was a gentleman of that denomination who was in harmony with the party in power for the time being, who was better qualified than gentlemen of any other denominations, for a seat in the Government, he presumed that he should be appointed, on account of his superior qualifications; but, apart from that, the question of religion should not be introduced at all. As long as the Roman Catholics of the Lower Provinces felt that they were receiving moderately fair play, it did not make much difference whether they were represented in the Cabinet or not.

Hon. Mr. DEVER said the hon. gentleman had no right to speak for the people of New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN said he had not supposed that this question of religion would have been imported into this discussion at all, but when the hon. gentleman from St. John said he spoke for the people of New Brunswick, he had overlooked the claims of a very numerous class to whom he had not alluded at all. He (Mr. McClelan) never knew before that it was the intention of hon. gentlemen opposite that religious tenets should constitute in part the qualification of candidates for the judiciary. There was a very large and influential sect in New Brunswick, the Wesleyan Methodists, who were not represented on the Bench of the Supreme Court at all. There were also the Baptists, another large and very respectable body, amongst whom were gentlemen well qualified from their legal standing and respectability to occupy the very highest positions, yet, they had not a single representative on the Bench of New Brunswick, and yet he had heard no complaints, and such never occurred to him before; but when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dever) had brought up this question, and discussed it in the way he had done, claiming that certain persons should have been appointed to the Supreme Court because of their religious principles, he naturally called forth the claims of other religious bodies to the same privileges.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I did not say so. I was speaking for those for whom I have a right to speak, and for gentlemen who are not bigots.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—With regard to Judge Watters, he had been appointed before Confederation, and he was a gentleman he had known for a long time. He was a man of good attainments, and there had never been any disposition shown to exclude him from any position to which he was entitled. In addition to his salary as Judge of the County Court, he had been drawing a salary for another appointment, which he had received not long ago from this Government, and, no doubt, when any vacancy should occur in the Province, his legal abilities and qualifications would not be overlooked. But if a man's religious convictions were to be made a test of his qualification as a candidate for a public office, it would lead to endless difficulties. Instead of a mere inquiry followed by such a strange discussion as this, it would have been more pertinent had the hon. gentleman from St. John, from his standpoint, proposed a resolution leading to a sort of ecclesiastical tribunal, before whom all candidates for office should be examined, and their denominational peculiarities fully tested, in order to determine their fitness. He (Mr. McClelan) was not fully aware, at this moment, to what church the hon. member (Mr. Dever) himself belonged, and he (Mr. McClelan) confessed he had not, to this time, taken much interest in such a matter. A new idea seemed now to be promulgated, and the acknowledged principle of the Liberal party, namely, to ignore no man's claims because of his religion, was to be repudiated.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I did not speak of applying any religious test.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN—I have referred to the inference which must clearly be drawn from the remarks of hon. members.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said he thought he had made himself sufficiently clear, that he did not desire to put forward any claims for Roman Catholics on account of their creed, but what he contended was that their creed should not be an obstacle to their just consideration. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McClelan) could not have misunderstood him, but with a want of candour that was characteristic of the party he belonged to in New Brunswick, he tried to put a wrong construction on his (Mr. Miller's) words, and even put words in his mouth he had never uttered. That was a style of argument, quite satisfactory to bigots and proscriptionists, by which the claims of the Catholics were treated in the Province of New Brunswick and elsewhere. When that was the conduct openly pursued, they could readily conjecture what would be the policy advocated in the secret conclaves of bigotry and proscription. He left the House to judge what sort of justice the minority of his Province would be likely to receive from such a man as the hon. member from Hopewell.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH said he was wholly unprepared for the range this debate had taken. Yet he desired to avail himself of this favorable opportunity, to call the attention of the Government to the position of the Judge of the County Court of Halifax, in hopes that some consideration would yet be given to his case. He was known to every member of the Bar in Nova Scotia, and the public generally, as prompt, painstaking, and indefatigable in his duties, a man of large experience in his profession, a great success as a judge, and as such, having given great satisfaction in that district. His duties were, to say the least, as heavy as those of the Supreme Court Judges, while his salary was much smaller. It was evident that the Government had thus far failed to do him justice. His salary was not at all commensurate to the work he performed. He tried causes out of term, and had monthly chambers at which intricate questions often arose for adjudication, increased by the insolvent business. It was evident and strongly expressed by the Bar, that his salary was wholly inadequate to the work he did, and the great and responsible duties he performed. It must be remembered that he had no one to assist or share with him in his responsibilities and his labors. He had not the assistance and relief of a jury to determine the facts of the cases brought before him. He must judge and determine on the facts as well as the law in every case; and it was acknowledged by the Bar that his decisions gave general satisfaction. There was but one opinion in the profession, and that was that his salary should be increased. If called on, the Bar of Nova Scotia, he (Mr. Kaulbach) was sure would unanimously solicit an increase of his salary to $4,000. The Government should be commended for having made choice of so able a man to fill an office of such great importance and responsibility; although it was doubtful at the time whether that gentleman would accept the office with such an inadequate salary; but it was believed at the time that the salary would be increased. Otherwise it was doubtful whether he would have accepted the appointment. That he was inadequately paid for the responsible duties that devolved upon him the Government must admit, and he regretted that they had not thought proper to recognize his services in a proper manner. He had before him a memorandum of the business brought before that Judge last year, which was as follows:—

Number of summonses issued . . .	2,074
“ judgments by default . . .	647
“ days sitting for trial . . .	95
“ Chamber applications . . .	489
“ applications in term . . .	119

In the Insolvent Court the number of attachments issued in the same year was 87, and the number of applications to the Court or Judge were 75. In civil suits the most of the actions were brought in his Court, and this could readily be accounted for as the Court had exclusive jurisdiction in actions of tort to $200, and in other civil suits to the amount of $400; and it must not be lost sight of that the Judge had no emoluments or fees outside his salary. This was a case worthy of the attention of the Government, and he hoped they would no longer delay looking into the matter and do justice. He did not intend to say anything on the question that had been raised by his hon. friend from St. John, but there was a strong feeling in Nova Scotia in favour of the views of his hon. friend from Arichat, not only among the body to whom he had referred, but among Protestants. It was remarked no denomination should be proscribed on account of their religion; and it was well that the Government should be made to understand it. The hon. member from Hopewell did not fairly meet the plain remarks of the hon. gentleman from Arichat, who had not claimed appointments on the score of religion, but simply showed how unfairly his co-religionists in the Lower Provinces were treated. He did not claim any rights on religious grounds, but simply that so large and influential a body should not with impunity be proscribed on account of their religion. As for the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax, they seemed to surprise nobody. He had assumed the role of Government advocate on all occasions and under all circumstances, and it mattered not whether the best interests of his Province or of Halifax were sacrificed, he was bound to stand by the Government. To-day he had gone yet further, and had even commended and supported the Government in a course which the hon. member from Arichat had so manfully contended was a flagrant injustice to his co-religionists, who asked no favours, but simply demanded that their religion should not be treated as a barrier to office.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

FIRST READINGS.

The following Bills from the Commons were introduced, and read the first time.

Bill—"An Act to make provision for the winding up of Insolvent Incorporated Fire and Marine Insurance Companies."

Bill—"An Act further securing the Independence of Parliament."

PETITION FOR A PRIVATE BILL.

REFUSED.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD asked leave to present a petition from Ferdinand MacCulloch and others, of the City of Montreal, praying for a Private Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said, as Chairman of the Private Bills Committee, he felt it his duty to protest against any petitions for Private Bills being received at this late period of the Session.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said there was no doubt it would be establishing a very bad precedent if it were allowed in this case. It was desirable that they should observe their rules and not allow people to apply for Bills at such a late period of the Session.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD said he merely desired to have the petition laid on the table for the present.

The petition was laid on the table.
Hon. Mr. Kaulbach.

PENITENTIARY ACT (1875) AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER moved the third reading of Bill (69), "An Act to amend section sixty-eight of the Penitentiary Act of 1875."

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

HOMESTEAD EXEMPTIONS ESTATES BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the House into Committee of the Whole on Bill (44), An Act to amend the Act intituled: "An Act to provide for the creation and registration of Homestead Exemption Estates in the Territories of Canada."

In the Committee, Hon. Mr. Hamilton (Kingston) in the Chair.

On the 2nd clause, "Duration and amount of homestead exemption,"

Hon. Mr. DICKEY asked if the attention of the hon. Secretary of State had been called to the power of this House to pass this legislation?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said so far as the territories were concerned, it was within their power.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said there might be a doubt on that point. They should look forward to the time when the territories would become Provinces, and they would have to consider what effect this measure would have upon the future legislation of these Provinces.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the moment the territories were organized into Provinces, and Local Legislatures were established, they had the power to repeal this law, but they could not disturb anything that might be done under this legislation until it was repealed.

The clause was agreed to.

On the 5th clause: "How homestead in fee simple shall go on decease of the owner."

Hon. Mr. AIKINS called attention to the fact that the provisions of this clause did not extend to grandchildren.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said if the child died leaving children, the same homestead protection would be extended to them during their minority.

After some further discussion the clause was agreed to. The remaining clauses having been agreed to, the Bill was reported without amendment, read the third time and passed.

AUDITING OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (53), "An Act to provide for the better Auditing of the Public Accounts." He said the object of the Bill would be understood from the title, and it was largely a transcript of the present law. The new feature of it was to make the Auditor-General independent of the Government, holding office in the same way as a Judge, subject to be removed only by Parliament. The Bill was somewhat affected by the rejection of the Bill respecting the Receiver-General's office, still it was possible to make such changes in it, in committee, as to make it workable in the absence of the other Bill.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said he had thought when the Bill was first laid upon the table that it was so dependent upon the Bill that had been rejected that it would be necessary to postpone it also, but on examining it he had found it could be so altered as to make it operative. Most of its provisions were adapted to the circumstances of this country, and by going carefully through it and eliminating from it those features which were dependent upon the changes provided for in the other Bill, he believed it would conduce to more careful auditing of the Public Accounts than they yet had in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said the principle of the Bill was one that must commend itself to the favorable consideration of the House, providing as it did for a check upon the public expenditure independent of the Government of the day. The Bill should be very carefully looked into however, in order that no question should arise hereafter that would require its revision.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the Bill as it now stood, recognized the abolition of the Receiver-General's office; it would have to be altered, to conform to the existing condition of things, the Bill for the abolition of that office having been rejected.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT considered this was a Bill in the right direction, as it would bring the Auditor-General in direct contact with the Public Accounts' Committee, and render him independent of the Government of the day.

The Bill was read the second time.

PRISONERS' SURETIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of the Bill (73) "An Act respecting persons imprisoned in default of giving sureties to keep the peace." He said the necessity for this Bill had been pressed on public attention by the Judges and by the Attorney-General, to meet cases with which hon. gentlemen who were of the legal profession must be familiar. For instance, where parties had been bound over to keep the peace, and could not secure bail within the limited time, the Court had to direct them to be imprisoned in default of this security. This Bill was to give to County Court Judges, and corresponding Judges in other portions of the Dominion, authority to interfere after a fortnight, due notice having been given to the plaintiff, and decide whether it was a case in which he was justified in giving the party who was unable to find bail, his liberty.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH said he quite approved of the Bill, as he had experienced the necessity for legislation of this kind in his own practice.

The Bill was read the second time.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day having been called for resuming the adjourned debate on the Hon. Mr. Read's motion—

"To resolve, That this House regrets that the mode adopted by the Government in relation to the construction of the Pacific Railway, involves the expenditure of enormous sums of public money without any corresponding beneficial results."

Hon. Mr. MILLER said—When the debate was adjourned yesterday, I was endeavoring to show to the House that the present Government, or the party which holds power at the present time in this country, was at the inauguration of the scheme for the annexation of British Columbia to this Dominion, as much in favor of the construction of the Pacific Railway as the party which then held power, the only question of difference between them being with regard to the terms upon which this great work had been undertaken. I took the trouble to refer to the opinions enunciated by the leading organ of the then Opposition—the Toronto Globe—in which the most emphatic declaration had been made that the Government of the day would have been traitors to their trust if they had not pushed forward this undertaking immediately and at whatever cost.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—When the question, however, came to be a practical one, those gentlemen exhibited their usual tactics, and factiously opposed the measure when it was submitted to Parliament by their opponents. Still on the general principle involving the necessity for an interoceanic railway—on the absolute necessity of binding those colonies together by a transcontinental railway—they did not venture to attack the position of their opponents. The party in Opposition at that time, it is true, divided on several resolutions opposing the terms upon which it had been proposed to construct the Pacific Railway, but that does not justify the course which they have invariably adopted since, in view of their endorsement of the principle of constructing that road, of charging the late Government with having been the sole cause of placing upon the people of this country the heavy burthen that is now being incurred under the blundering course the present Government is pursuing in regard to the construction of that great highway. Not only were both the great political parties unanimous with regard to the necessity of constructing the Pacific Railway, but in 1872, when the people were appealed to, after the completion of the treaty with British Columbia, the terms of Union were not made a charge against the Government of Sir John Macdonald. The Reform party did not venture to go to the country on such an issue. They did not then venture to condemn, as some of their party now do, the construction of the Pacific Railway, or, if they did, we all know the electors of the whole Dominion pronounced a verdict against them. In the Maritime Provinces where, if anywhere, a sectional feeling might easily have been excited against the Government, in consequence of the large expenditure which it was admitted would be necessary to construct the railway, we are well aware that in the elections of 1872, the late Government were sustained by a handsome majority. In Nova Scotia, after the scheme of Union with British Columbia, only one man was elected at the next general election who was not a supporter of the then Government, and he was returned as an independent member. Such was the result of the appeal to the people after the terms of the Union with British Columbia were completed.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It suits hon. gentlemen opposite to condemn those terms at the present day, and they lose no opportunity to frighten people with reference to the burden the construction of this railroad is likely to place upon them—and certainly we must admit, if it is to be constructed in the manner proposed by the present Government, it will before long impose a debt on this country that it will be impossible for us to bear, and the end of their wild career may be national bankruptcy. But, I believe, and the signs of the times indicate that the belief is well founded, the present Government will be driven from office, and a Government with a wiser policy and higher statesmanship will be placed in power to deal with this and other important questions, in a manner calculated to promote the welfare and prosperity of this Dominion, as soon as the people are permitted to speak their views at the polls.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It must also be remembered that after the terms of Union with British Columbia had been agreed to by Canada, the Province of Prince Edward Island came into the Confederation, knowing very well the nature of the undertaking to which the Dominion was committed. Could any better proofs be adduced that the late Government had correctly interpreted the wish of the whole Dominion in providing for the early completion of our national highway? I say then, the tactics pursued by the present Government since they have been in office, have been most unfair, when all parties in this country look upon the Pacific Railway as indispensable to the autonomy of the Dominion. It is especially essential, if we are ever to settle the great prairie country in the North-West, and convert it into thriving and prosperous provinces. I therefore charge it as the most flagrant dishonesty and hypocrisy on the part of gentlemen opposite, to be continually dinning into the ears of the people of this country that the Conservative party are alone responsible for the burdens which must necessarily be assumed by the country in the construction of this great undertaking. I say there is not in their career, marked and chequered as it has been with political dishonesty, one single instance of disingenuousness more signal than that of misleading the country to suppose the late Government were alone responsible—and without any necessity for embarking in the scheme—for having legislated in such a way as to require this country to construct an inter-oceanic railway. I say it is high time that hon. gentlemen should cease this untruthful mode of attack, and this species of warfare in opposition to their own record and real sentiments. I was sorry to hear my hon. friend the Secretary of State, starting this as the very key note of his address when he rose to answer my hon. friend from Belleville at the commencement of this debate. The Secretary of State started with the piteous whine that in consequence of the acts of their predecessors, the country was called upon to build the Pacific Railway, when he knew it was as well the policy of his own party before they came into power, and they dare not to-day repudiate that policy.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—My hon. friend considers it consistent with what he owes to the intelligence of this House to come before us and open his reply to the practical, common-sense address of the hon. Senator from Belleville, with a doleful lamentation, that it was simply the folly of the late Government that involved the country in this great undertaking. I have shown that the policy of the late Government, with regard to this question, was a wise one, and if it had been adhered to, it would have been fortunate for this Dominion. I believe we have suffered no greater calamity in this country than by the frustration of that policy by untoward events.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If it had not been frustrated, we would have secured the construction of that railway, as I have already demonstrated, with a liberal subsidy of money and a grant of land, and we might have recouped ourselves for every dollar we would have expended, and more than that, from the large reserves we would have retained on the route of the railway. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to claim that the scheme of the late Government was impracticable, and that it could not have been carried out—when it had not a fair trial.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If I am not mistaken, the Government even now, at the end of their term of office, after years of blundering and gross extravagance in connection with this work, after discovering that their whole policy has been a huge mistake, are about to change their policy once more—that they are coming back to the policy of their predecessors. I say it was a great misfortune to this country that the policy of the late Administration was ever departed from, because we would have had all the advantages which would flow from their wise scheme, if the true friends of this Confederation, not its enemies had retained power. Instead of partizans who are willing to use their positions hostilely to Confederation, and every great work calculated to develop and nationalize these Provinces—if we had a Government composed of the true friends of Union at the helm of state, we would not have this great work in the backward condition in which we find it to day, but have it progressing satisfactorily to the people and to the great benefit of the whole Dominion.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The career of the present Government has been an extraordinary one in this respect—all their public professions have been cast to the winds one by one, we have seen them ignore them with the most wonderful indifference. On all occasions their public professions, when they stand in their way, seem to be regarded as mere idle words. I would not recapitulate now the long list of their inconsistencies and broken pledges because it would take me too far from my subject, and the enumeration of half of them would occupy more time than I can venture to claim in this debate. Their whole career is one continuous course of broken promises and professions on which they came into power. Looking at their record to-day we see such a stream of disregarded pledges and promises as, I venture to say, in so short a time never disgraced any Government in any other country in the world.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—And with regard to their record on this great question, what has it been? It has been a record of shameless dishonesty, inconsistency and hypocrisy. Our parliamentary annals show, that when this question was before the Parliament of this country, a resolution was moved by Sir George Cartier that the Pacific Railway be constructed by liberal grants of land and money to private companies, not increasing the present rate of taxation. Hon. gentlemen will here see with what care the late Government guarded the interests of this country in entering upon the construction of this great work. The resolution I am about to read, we all know, was moved with the approval of the Commissioners of British Columbia, who were at the time in Ottawa, arranging the conditions of Union, because Mr. Trutch was present when it was submitted to the House of Commons, and afterwards, at a banquet in this city, expressed his approval of it publicly. The late Government stipulated that the railway was not to add to the burdens of the country, but this is not exactly the point I desire to make. I want to show that that policy was then approved by the gentlemen now in power, but as soon as they obtained office, they disregarded all their previous declarations and took power to construct the railway as a Government work, which policy they have been pursuing for the past four years with the results the country has had so much reason to deplore. Let me read from the Journals of the House of Commons what actually did take place when the mode of building the railway was under consideration. Let me point out the beginning, the most inconsistent beginning of the gentlemen now in power in relation to the question:

“Resolved, that the railway referred to in the Address to Her Majesty concerning the Union of British Columbia with Canada, adopted by this House on Saturday, 1st April instant, should be constructed and worked by private enterprise, and not by the Dominion Government; and that the public aid to be given to secure that undertaking, should consist of such liberal grants of land and such subsidy in money, or other aid, not increasing the present rate of taxation, as the Parliament of Canada shall hereafter determine.

“The Hon. Sir George E. Cartier moved, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Tilley, and the question being proposed, that the Resolution be now read a second time.

“The Hon. Mr. Dorion moved in amendment, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Holton, that all the words after ‘now,’ to the end of the question, be left out, and the words ‘recommended to a Committee of the Whole House, with a view to amend the same by adding the following words—and not otherwise—and that an humble Address, embodying this resolution, be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she may be pleased to consider said Address as part of the one voted by this House on the 1st of April instant, and the above resolution as one of the conditions to be incorporated in any Order-in-Council for the admission of British Columbia to the Dominion of Canada, under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867,’ inserted instead thereof.”

That is, that the road should be constructed by liberal grants of land and money, “and not otherwise.” The words “and not otherwise” were attempted to be added by the gentlemen who are now in power, and the amendment was supported by the unanimous vote of their followers. They added those words in order to deprive the Government of that day of any discretion or any power to depart from that policy in the smallest particular. It is true the resolution did not carry. It would not have been wise to have confined any Government so strictly as these words would have bound them, because occasions might arise when it would be necessary for the Government to depart from the general policy, and it was wise and judicious on the part of the House of Commons to reject that amendment. But what must be thought of the present Government when the first act they did after they came into power was to pass a law, in the face of the resolution which they had attempted to force upon the late Government, to hand over the construction of this great work to themselves, to be built as a Government work, and not in the manner they then advocated?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is the alternative. The other proposition had failed.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The other proposition never had a fair trial. It never had a trial at all from the present Government. Their duty was when they came into power, if they believed in the policy which they endeavored to force upon their predecessors, to have carried out that policy, and to make some attempt to have the road built by a subsidy of land and money. That would have been wise as well as consistent. But they did no such thing. Without trying whether the road could be built in the way most advantageous to the people, and which would have kept the Government out of the many suspicious transactions and blunders which have marked their career ever since, at every turn—instead of adopting the course which, while in opposition, they said was the only right policy, they passed a law by which they took to themselves the power to construct this road as a Government work. I ask this House, I ask the most confirmed supporters of the present Ministry within the range of my voice—I ask the electors of this Dominion—if there is, in the history of this country, an act of more glaring inconsistency, an act of more shameless disregard of previous professions on the part of any party that was evidenced in the very initial step of the Government in reference to this work?

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I defy them to put their hands upon any such act of any other political party in this country within the whole range of its history. It is without precedent as an instance of glaring disregard of public professions. This step was the beginning of a series of unfortunate mistakes. The policy was an insincere one, and consequently it turned out to be a policy of blunders. We all recollect, in the outset, the different announcements that were made by the Premier and by leading members of his Cabinet, with regard to the course which they would pursue in relation to the road. First, they had one policy which was defended with very great earnestness as the wisest thing for this country—as the only thing, in fact, they could do to fulfil the obligations which rested on Canada in regard to the construction of the Pacific Railway. Their first scheme was the utilizing of the water stretches, and portages in the country between Lake Superior and the Red River, a scheme which has proved, on experience, to be so impracticable, to be so utterly absurd for the attainment of the purposes desired, that they had themselves, after a while, abandoned it, under the unanimous condemnation and derision of the country.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We availed ourselves of the principal water stretches—Lakes Huron and Superior. That saved 600 miles.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am perfectly well aware of that, and I think the Government are doing well to avail themselves of the great lakes until the time when the whole land road can be constructed. But the water stretches to which I allude are the streams and lakes between Lake Superior and the Red River, which the scheme of the Government was to utilize as a portion of the Pacific Railway. We all know with what wisdom that scheme was held up to us in the early days of this Government as a most feasible scheme for the settlement of the great North-West.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We all know how unsuitable that scheme has proved to be—that no man of common sense can be found to stand up and defend it, though at one time it was considered the perfection of statesmanship by hon. gentlemen opposite. When that failed, they vacillated for a long time with regard to the location of the road between Lake Superior and Red River. They selected one route at one time, and another afterwards, and I do not think they have got the whole of the route between the Kaministiquia and Selkirk settled yet. These were blunders which marked the inception of their management of this great work, and which delayed the completion of the railway where it was almost indispensable to the settlement of the North-West. One of the most memorable and costly mistakes of the Government in regard to the water stretch policy, was the construction of the Fort Francis lock. After the discussions we have heard upon in this Chamber, and the investigations of the committee last Session in respect to it, everybody must admit it to be a huge blunder, and I think that transaction alone justifies my hon. friend in stating in his resolution, that the public money has been expended without compensating advantages. If we had no other argument in support of the resolution, this would be sufficient to justify the hon. gentleman in moving it in the public interest. We have witnessed in this House the spectacle of the great champion of the Reform party (Mr. Brown), ridiculing the importance which was attached to this blunder, and the $200,000 involved in it; he said it was nothing at all—a mere trifle.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I did not expect anyone in this Parliament could be found to use such an argument, and especially one who has been represented as the great advocate of economy and retrenchment for the last thirty years. I think the people of this country will have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the expenditures in connection with the Fort Francis lock exhibit a condition of things, in other respects, that we should not find in the public service. Then we come to another blunder—the selection of the Kaministiquia terminus. If there were nothing else than the revelations which have been given to the country during the past Session, and the evidence elicited last year by a Committee of this House—that nearly $70,000 have been expended upon the purchase of a piece of wilderness land at the Kaministiquia, not worth one-tenth of the money, that the leading character in the purchase was Mr. Oliver, who had placed the Reform party under great obligations to him for services to which I will not allude—it would justify this resolution. Here we have nearly $70,000 expended in purchasing lands which should have been secured by the Government before private speculators had been able to get possession of it.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There can be no doubt that if the Government had desired to do so, they could have secured the land before it fell into the hands of private speculators, and the people of this country cannot but regard it as a suspicious circumstance that friends of the Government were allowed, almost immediately before the land was wanted, to secure that portion of territory on the Kaministiquia which was especially designed as the terminus of the Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That subject is now under investigation before a Committee, and I can assure my hon. friend the evidence does not bear out what he states.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am not alluding to what has taken place in the Committee this Session. The hon. gentleman has no right to make any observations as to what is likely to be the finding of that Committee, which, I believe, will be contrary to his expectations.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not a fact that $70,000 has been paid for land on the Kaministiquia, or that a considerable part of that has gone to friends of the Government.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I speak in round numbers; it is not quite $70,000—the sum is over $68,000, and the whole of it was not paid for land. We know $5,900 went for the purchase of that valuable property, the Neebing Hotel.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I say if we knew nothing more than the expenditure in connection with the Kaministiquia terminus, that alone would be sufficient to induce hon. gentlemen to support the resolution of my hon. friend. Another blunder by which the Government has wasted the public money was the manner in which they dealt with the Georgian

Bay Branch. We all know the ground they took against the late Government for having been so mad, as they said, as to let out any portion of the Pacific Railway before having thoroughly surveyed it. I believe, myself, that when this great inter-oceanic railway, which we hope to see completed at some reasonable date in the future, is finished, it must pass north of the Great Lakes, down the Valley of the Ottawa, and connect with the Inter-colonial Railway. Therefore, so far as the policy of looking ultimately forward to the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch as a link of that road is concerned, for my own part I approve of that view, and I believe it is the policy which is the true one in the interests of the people of this country when we are in a position to have the whole completed. But I have no hesitation in saying the day is far distant, judging by the rate of progress made by the present Government, when it will be necessary to enter into any agreement for the construction of that portion of the Pacific Railway. Not until we have communication with our Prairie Provinces, not until we have furnished a route to the prairie country from the head of Lake Superior, and thereby have obtained a population which will go far towards paying the revenue necessary for the work, will there be any necessity for the Georgian Bay Branch; but that it will be ultimately built as a portion of the Pacific Railway, I have no doubt. I ask, therefore, what necessity there was for letting it in such haste to Mr. Foster? If it was wrong to grant the original charter to Sir Hugh Allan's company for the construction of the Pacific Railway, without a survey, was it not equally wrong, was it not a less defensible act, on the part of the present Government, who denounced such conduct in their predecessors, to let the Georgian Bay Branch to Mr. Foster in such haste, without any survey? It was certainly wrong in the face of their past professions. It was, however, another of those acts which mark the track of this road wherever they have touched it. It was wrong in the second place, because it was unnecessary to let the contract at that time. We do not like to speak of the gentleman (Mr. Foster) who has passed away, and who was principally connected with that transaction, but we all know he had rendered important services to the Government in the crisis of 1873. We all know he was considered he held the keystone of the position in the Province of Quebec. He gave valuable assistance to the Opposition of the day, in ousting the gentlemen who held the seals of office. We know he had large claims upon their successors for having helped to place them in power. We found that gentleman was afterwards given a public contract, not called for in the interests of the country, and that in connection with that contract the public money was expended in a way which, perhaps, it is charitable not to speak of, since Mr. Foster has passed away; but I say in regard to that subject, the Government were guilty of their usual inconsistency and blundering. It cannot be denied that they wasted in this blunder $109,000 of the people's money.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend is entirely wrong.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I say the whole of that money was as good as thrown away in connection with that unfortunate speculation.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—And, therefore, in regard to that item, I have no hesitation in saying that the mode they adopted in the construction of the Pacific Railway has involved the expenditure of a large amount of money, without any corresponding benefit.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Sixty thousand dollars of that was for rails advanced to the Canada Central Railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Mr. Foster was manager of the Canada Central at that time, and he got the whole of the money.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not intend to go over all the blunders which these gentlemen have committed. They are too numerous. I should expect to keep you here as long as the House of Commons sat on a memorable occasion, if I should attempt to give you a resume of them. The next blunder to which I shall call the attention of the House, was in the selection of the route of the railway through Manitoba. For some unaccountable reason which has never been explained, the road has been taken through a country almost unfit—I am credibly informed—for colonization; taken away from the settled portion of the Province, as if the Government wished to deprive them of the advantages of the road. We have it on the best authority that it would have been quite possible to have taken the line through Manitoba, near the regions where our industrious immigrants have already taken up their abode and commenced to turn the prairie into smiling fields. If the southern route had been adopted, it would have been equally wise and well in the interests of the Dominion, while it would have justly and properly consulted the wishes of the people of Manitoba. I trust that the electors of that Province, when they are called upon to render their verdict upon this and other questions, in relation to the policy of the present Government, will not forget the indifference, to use the mildest term, which these gentlemen have shown to their interests. To condemn this blunder alone, I would readily vote for the resolution of my hon. friend. If any wisdom had prevailed in the councils of the Government, the first thing they would have done, in connection with the construction of the Pacific Railway, would have been to open up direct communication from the waters of Lake Superior to the Province of Manitoba, through our own territory, for the purpose of sending emigration into that country, and furnishing an outlet for the growing trade of that Province. But what have they done? They have made contracts only for the construction of portions of that line. They have commenced the construction of two sections, one at each end, leaving 180 miles in the middle uncompleted. Until that middle section is built, the road will be of comparatively no service to the people of Manitoba, or those desiring to go into that Province. A more egregious mistake could not have been committed. What will be the use of these sections without the missing link? It is a policy which children, one would suppose, would hardly be expected to adopt. Unless one wishes to believe that those gentlemen do not desire to see that country opened up and settled, it is hard to find a reason for the course they are pursuing. I do not suppose they so desire, but I believe their policy is the result of their incapacity to do anything right. Everything they touch they seem to make a muddle of; every step they take is almost sure to prove a costly mistake.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Will the hon. gentleman explain how we are to get at the centre section unless we begin at both ends at once?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am sorry my hon. friend sees himself in such a bad position that he is compelled to make it worse by a remark which will not recommend itself to the intelligence of any man in this House. Even the hon. Senator from Hamilton did not say “hear, hear” to his leader’s question, and if there had been anything in it we know he would be sure to have approved of it. But worse than all, these end sections, I am told by persons who have taken the trouble to visit that country, will have decayed before the middle section can be completed. And here I must pause to pay a just compliment to certain gentlemen in this House who have, at great personal expense and trouble, given this subject the investigation they have done. I consider this Dominion owes a deep debt of gratitude to the leader of the Opposition in this House, to the hon. Senator for Saugeen and to the hon. Senator from Toronto (Mr. Aikins), and one or two others who have taken such a deep personal practical interest in this great undertaking, and have thereby been enabled to expose to the people of this country, the mismanagement of the Government, and who have done much to arrest the extravagance and jobbery of the party in power in regard to this great work.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We are told by those gentlemen who have visited Manitoba during the recess, the sections which are in course of construction, being built of wood—mere trestle work, of a very perishable character—cannot be expected to live more than seven years. Some have mentioned seven, but others whose opinions are entitled to respect, have given five years as the life limit of the material used in these sections. But allowing seven years, we will have this enormous expenditure on two sections of the line which will be utterly worthless in a few years—will have rotted before the middle section is completed, and therefore all this money will be thrown away, which, if judiciously expended on a through line, would be of very great benefit to the North-West. This blunder is one of the greatest in connection with their whole policy, one which must be palpable to the intelligence of the simplest elector in the country, and, I am sure, when the time comes, that these gentlemen who occupy the Treasury Benches are called upon to give an account of their stewardship, their mismanagement of this part of the Pacific Railway will be one of those things which will receive the condemnation of the electors. There are many other points to which I would like to refer, but I shall have to drop them all to devote a few minutes to that much debated, yet still interesting subject, the steel rails. It strikes me, however, that although it has been discussed with a great deal of ability by hon. gentlemen who have mastered the details, and a very strong case has been made out, which certainly the Government cannot defend, there are other features of the purchase, which seem to be lost sight of, and other facts in connection with it that have not been noticed, which deserve to be placed on permanent record. It has been stated that it is unfair to charge the Premier with anything wrong in relation to this transaction, but when we come to examine into the origin of this steel rails business and the position which the Premier, at the very outset, chose to adopt with regard to that question, we have a right to doubt the correctness of that position, and are forced to form an unfavorable judgment upon it. This purchase of the steel rails was first brought to the notice of the public during an election in 1875, in the City of Montreal! The Opposition candidate declared that these purchases had been largely made through a firm in which a brother of the Premier was interested, and more in the interests of his brother's firm than for the benefit of the country. It was a serious charge, but it was made, as it afterwards turned out, upon facts which were very conclusive, and which have never yet been successfully disputed. When this charge was brought by the Opposition candidate in 1875 before the electors of Montreal, what position did the Minister of Public Works assume with regard to it? I have a copy of the telegram which he sent to the Ministerial press, and which was as follows:—

“No steel rails were purchased by me from any Montreal firm—all were obtained by open competition after a month's advertising for tenders, the lowest tenders being in all cases accepted. The contracts were all made with English makers. No brother or relation of mine has any interest, direct or indirect, near or remote, in any of these contracts, or ever received or has any claim to a cent of profit from one or any of them.”

Now, in the light of the information cast on this subject by subsequent events, do we not know that that telegram was a tissue of misstatements? The Premier attempts to justify the first allegation it contains, by saying that the rails were not purchased from the firms in Montreal, but from English manufacturers. Is not this trifling with the case? The largest quantity negotiated through any one house, 25,000 tons, was purchased through the firm of Cooper, Fairman & Co., yet, in the face of that fact, the impression which the hon. gentleman wished to leave upon the electors of Montreal, was that none of those contracts had been made in this country at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The contracts were sent home to be executed.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—They were virtually the contracts of the brokers who made them here. I ask my hon. friend if the contracts were not intended to be made here as the absolute contracts of the parties tendering, without regard to agency, why it was that only six or eight days' notice was originally given for the reception of tenders for this enormous quantity of rails?

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If the purchases were not virtually to be made in this country, on what grounds could my hon. friend justify the giving of only six or eight days' notice as was originally contemplated by the Department of Public Works? It is evident therefore, that the first portion of the statement in Mr. Mackenzie's telegram is not consistent with the facts. No other character can be given to it than that it was a disingenuous dealing with the truth. It was an attempt to deceive the country, and especially the electors of Montreal at the time it was made. He further says, "all were obtained by open competition, after a month's advertising for tenders."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I ask if that was a fair, candid statement? How was the month's notice obtained? It was only through the influence of friends of the Government that the time was extended one month, yet, the telegram was so worded as to lead the public to believe it was the original intention to give a month's notice for the purchase of these rails. I ask if that clause was not disingenuous, and calculated to mislead and deceive those unacquainted with the real facts? No one can deny that it was purposely intended to have that effect.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Cooper, Fairman & Co. do not represent themselves as agents.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I know that is so, but I feel I cannot go further into that feature of the subject. I feel I am trespassing too far on the time of the House, even now, without entering into all the details at greater length.

Hon. Gentlemen—Go on!

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I shall not go into the question, which has been so very fully discussed by my hon. friends, with regard to the fact whether the lowest tenders were accepted. They have shown to the satisfaction of every unbiassed mind how wide that assertion is of the truth. We have it in evidence, in the papers submitted to this House, that some of these rails were given without tender at all, and others of them were taken from one favored firm and not on the lowest tenders, in a way that indicated the clearest favoritism. The details of the evidence on this head are too clearly before the House to require to be recapitulated. To do so, I feel, would be a task which I would hardly be justified in attempting, after having already occupied so much of the time of the House. I come now to the last and most suggestive clause in this telegram: "No brother or relation of mine has any interest, direct or indirect, near or remote, in any of those contracts, or has any claim to a cent of profit from one of them." Now, what are the facts in connection with this assertion? If Mr. Mackenzie's brother was a partner in that firm; if he was dealing honestly and above-board, and with no greater advantages than others, with the Government of which his brother was Premier, there would have been no necessity whatever for any concealment or equivocation on the part of the Premier or his brother. But Mr. Charles Mackenzie was a member of the firm of Cooper, Fairman & Co. at the time this denial was made. Moreover, his position in the firm was, everything considered, of a very suspicious character. He was a sleeping, special partner, whose name was not before the public as such. I do not allege it would be fair to argue that a man who is a sleeping partner in a mercantile concern may not be very honestly and properly so, but when we find a firm who have been engaged in so many profitable transactions, viewed as acts of favoritism, in connection with the Government, and when you find a member of that firm a sleeping and unknown partner, a near relative of the head of that Government, it has on the face of it an appearance by which we may rightly be guided in our subsequent investigation into the conduct of all parties concerned. What do the official records prove? That Charles Mackenzie, in the beginning of 1873, became a partner in the firm of Cooper, Fairman, & Co., and that he continued, even under their own statement, up to May, 1875, to be a partner of that firm.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; December, 1874.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I will produce evidence to prove the correctness of what I have stated. In the Province of Quebec it is necessary that partnerships should be recorded in the Prothonotaries' office. Here are the terms of the co-partnership arrangement of Cooper, Fairman, & Co.:

" Province of Quebec, }
District of Montreal. }

" We, the undersigned, do hereby certify that we have entered into co-partnership, under the style and firm of Cooper, Fairman & Company, as merchants, which firm consists of James Cooper, of the City of Montreal, and Frederick Fairman, at present residing at Waterloo, in the said Province, and Charles Mackenzie, of St. Arna, in the Province of Ontario, as a special partner the said Charles Mackenzie having contributed fifteen thousand dollars to the capital stock of the said partnership, which said co-partnership commenced on the first day of January instant, 1873. Dated this second day of January, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three."

"(Signed),

JAMES COOPER,
F. FAIRMAN,
CHARLES MACKENZIE."

Signed in the presence of }
JOHN C. GRIFFIN, N. P. }

"Filed and registered this seventh day of January, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three."

"(Signed),

[HUBERT, PAPINEAU & HONEY,
P.S.C.]

Mr. Charles Mackenzie became a partner for "special purposes", and I have no doubt that describes very correctly his position in the firm.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The interest which he brought to the firm was of a very special character, as subsequent events prove.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No steel rails were in view then.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—He continued in the partnership until May, 1875, as the following notice of dissolution shows:—

"Province of Quebec, }
District of Montreal." }

"We, James Cooper and Frederick Fairman, both of the City of Montreal, Hardware Merchants and Importers, hereby certify that we have carried on, and intend to carry on business as such, at the said City of Montreal, in partnership under the name of Cooper, Fairman & Company, and that the said co-partnership has subsisted since the fourth day of May last, and that we, the said James Cooper and Frederick Fairman, are and have been, since the said day, the only members of the said partnership. Witness our hands at Montreal, this twentieth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five."

"(Signed),

JAMES COOPER,
F. FAIRMAN."

"Filed and registered this twenty-fourth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five."

"HUBERT, PAPINEAU & HONEY."
P.S.C.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The first thing to which I would call attention in reference to this dissolution of partnership, is the extraordinary manner in which it is worded. It is not a legal dissolution at all. It is not signed by the man most interested. It was evidently a necessity at the time to have Mr. Mackenzie's name dissociated from the firm, and it was done in this way. I submit there is nothing in that paper to bind Mr. Mackenzie, and he continues, legally, to the present day, a member of the firm of Cooper, Fairman & Co. But even taking the dissolution that is recorded, what does it prove? That Mr. Mackenzie was a partner in that firm up to the beginning of May, 1875, and we know all those suspicious transactions of the Government with that combination were before that date.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I put it to this House and to the people of this country, what opinion must they form of the disingenuousness, to use no harsher term, of the Premier when he made the above statement, with a view to deceiving the electors of Montreal, that no brother of his was interested in the purchase of the steel rails, though evidence so conclusive and irresistible could easily have been obtained to prove to the contrary? Scarcely in the history of any country have you seen an instance of a gentleman occupying the position of Premier, in so short a space and in so few words, being able to make so many disingenuous and untruthful declarations as that telegram from Mr. Mackenzie contained. It is impossible to characterize it in any other language than that I have used. It was necessary to review the circumstances connected with the inception of the steel rail scandal to give full force and meaning to discussion, exposing the loss the country has sustained in this business. I say, with such conduct and such acts before us, and such untruthful statements as I have exposed, what right have hon. gentlemen opposite to complain when we challenge their assertions that the Premier is not responsible for the favoritism, nepotism, and I might use a stronger term, that has been developed at every stage from beginning to end of the purchase of these steel rails, and even in the handling and carriage of them—not forgetting the connection of the hon. Senator from Hamilton with them.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not attach any personal blame to my hon. friend. His connection with the rails commenced before he became a member of the Senate, when he was an outside supporter of the Government. In consequence of the denials of the supporters of the Government, hon. members of this House have felt it their duty to charge the Premier with nepotism and mismanagement, by which over $1,500,000 of the money of this Dominion has been irretrievably wasted. I contend if there were nothing else than the ruinous blundering in connection with the steel rails, to justify the resolution of my hon. friend from Belleville, it would be quite sufficient to induce me to vote for it. It is time the public men of this country who are entrusted with power, should deal with this subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway in a spirit of patriotism, and with a wiser statesmanship than they have shown in the past. I was one of those who voted for the terms of Union with British Columbia, and I have seen no reason to regret that vote.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—If the Union has not been so satisfactory to that Province or ourselves as we would wish it had been, it is due to those gentlemen who, in an evil hour for the country, were entrusted with the reins of power in 1873. I do hope a better policy will be adopted for the development of the North-West. Thousands of emigrants are flocking there at the present time, and the rush would be much greater if we had the means of carrying them in and their produce out. If this Dominion is ever to be what we all hope to see it; if the untold resources of British Columbia are ever to be developed, it will only be when it has connection with the rest of the Dominion by means of a railroad. It was my intention to go into a discussion of the policy of the Government, in relation to the location of the line in British Columbia, and which, I fear, from all I can learn now, is going to add another blunder, perhaps the greatest of all, to those which have marked their policy on this subject, but I cannot venture, having encroached so long on the time of the House, to touch upon that question to-day. But I do hope that the time has gone by when we are to have nothing but recrimination against the action of the late Government for having inaugurated a policy in regard to this great work, which is consistent with the highest interests of this Dominion, which is necessary for the consolidation of these Provinces, and which has the support of the wise and patriotic people of Canada, from one end of it to the other.

At six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Mr. POWER resumed the debate. He said: I regret very much that the Senator from Richmond is not present in his place, because the few remarks which I propose to address to the House, are in reply to what he said. The hon. Senator began his speech by stating that all parties acknowledged, about the time the Union of British Columbia with Canada took place, that the Pacific Railway was an absolute necessity. My curiosity was a little stimulated by that statement; and I referred to the official debates of this House in the year 1871, upon the question of the Union of British Columbia with the Dominion; and there I found that, when the terms of Union were laid before this House by the gentleman who is now leader of the Opposition, there was a decided hostility manifested by gentlemen who were then on the Opposition side of the House to the terms which were then proposed to be granted to British Columbia, and the strongest objection was taken to that portion of the terms which related to the Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman who is now Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, was quite decided in his opposition to that portion of the scheme. An hon. gentleman who is now unfortunately no more, the hon. Mr. Sanborn, made a very long and able speech, taking the same view; and several other gentlemen agreed with him. The Senator from Richmond read an article from the Globe of 1871 in support of his statement; but it seems to me that if we are to look for authoritative utterances of a party on a great national question of this kind, the proper place to seek for them is in the utterances of the people's representatives on the floor of Parliament, and not in the columns of a newspaper written by irresponsible persons. It will be found that the representatives of the people, who had a right to speak authoritatively for the party, were hostile to that railway scheme. The Senator told us what everybody knew—that the policy of the late Government, as enunciated in 1871, was to build this road by means of private companies—and he told us further that two companies had offered to build the road for a cash subsidy of $30,000,000, and a bonus of 50,000,000 acres of land. I noticed in reading the report of the debates which took place at that time, that members of this House seemed to think such a sum would not be sufficient to build the road; and they instituted comparisons between the Canada Pacific Railway and the Union Pacific Railway of the United States. The conclusion which most of those hon. gentlemen came to was, that the road would cost $150,000,000, and it is well understood that railway undertakings of this kind always over-run the estimates. Then the Senator drew a picture of the value of lands through which this railway was to run, and told the House that without any money subsidy at all a company could be formed to build this road. The lands were worth, I think he said, three dollars an acre, which for 50,000,000 would have amounted to $150,000,000. According to the hon. gentleman's statement, the road could be built by a company from the grant alone, and the company would have had a handsome profit out of the transaction. If that were so, it is a wonder we have not had some company coming forward and offering several millions of dollars for the privilege of building that road. That would be the natural inference to be drawn from the hon. gentleman's remarks. This Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which was said to have been composed of men of the highest standing in financial circles, in 1873, before this Government came into power, had abandoned the undertaking because they could not raise the money, notwithstanding the subsidy of $30,000,000; and I see that in May of that year, six months before the late Government went out of power, that fact had come to light; for I find that the hon. gentleman from Saugeen, at that time, in a speech on this matter, used the following language:—

Hon. Mr. Power.

“I wish to speak as considerably as possible of the Canada Pacific Railway Company; but it is notorious that they have failed. Private advices in all directions bring the same report, that they have failed utterly—not because of the magnitude of the undertaking, but because the parties interested are, and the enterprise in their hands is, utterly discredited. The course pursued by these gentlemen has not only rendered the failure of the undertaking, in their hands, inevitable, but it has put out of the question the possibility of the achievement of this work by a private company; and it must now be carried out by the Government of the country.”

Now, it appears that the company had failed; and, as far as the public know, the late Government had no other scheme. They could not find any other company to build the road, and had no plan by which the road could be built. They had entered into an engagement with British Columbia to construct the road in a certain time, and no company could be found to undertake it. The only alternative I can see, was that the Government should build the road themselves; for, of course, it would have been utterly impossible to have altogether refused to keep the agreement they had made with British Columbia. The hon. Senator from Richmond, in speaking of the construction of the road by a company, referred to the case of the Northern Pacific Railway. It seems to me that that was an unfortunate reference, because the Northern Pacific Railway has been some two or three years at a standstill, the company having been unable to proceed with the work. The Union Pacific Railway, I think, has cost the United States Government, up to the present, something like $100,000,000 for cash subsidies, in addition to a very large land grant which the company also received from them. That matter was clearly explained by the hon. Secretary of State in dealing with this question the other day. When that railway, running through a comparatively well settled country, with thirty six or thirty-seven millions of people on the Atlantic side, and something over a million of people and an exceedingly prosperous country on the Pacific coast, called for such an enormous amount of pecuniary aid from the American Government, it will give an idea of the difficulty of building our road, almost a thousand miles longer, through a country sparsely populated at one end, and almost without population at the other. The Senator from Richmond undertook to give us an idea of what might have been the case, had the former Government remained in power. He said it was true that the late Government had undertaken to build this road in ten years; but they did not mean it, that it was not a cast-iron bond. I don't know that the Senator from Richmond is understood to have spoken the sentiments of the party which he belongs to, but if he has, I do not think that statement very creditable to the party. I find that the hon. gentleman, when this matter was before the Senate on the 3rd February, 1871, used this language after speaking in the highest terms of the undertaking:—

“It may be said that it was unwise to bind themselves to the completion of this work within ten years. But they saw more changes, more great results achieved, in a decade now, than in a century a hundred years ago; to make the time longer would look like not being in earnest, and he trusted the Government were in earnest in this great work.”

It is evident that at that time the Senator from Richmond did not wish to convey the impression, that the Government did not propose to build the road in ten years.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—If the hon. gentleman will look into it more fully, he will find that in introducing the measure in this House, I said that the period of ten years was fixed, not as a cast-iron rule, but as an evidence of good faith.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was not undertaking to reply to the hon. gentleman from Kingston, and what the hon. gentleman states is perfectly correct. If I had referred to what he had said I should have mentioned that fact. The Senator from Richmond found a great deal of fault with the present Government for the money spent in surveys. And he said that the late Government had not made surveys, because it was a matter for the company who undertook the construction of the road. I do not think it is a matter for a company, but for the Government specially. However, the facts—as is very often the case—are at variance with the statement made by the Senator for Richmond, because the late Government did undertake to make a survey, and sent Mr. Sandford Fleming across the continent; and I remember that the Rev. Mr. Grant, of Halifax, accompanied him as secretary, and wrote a very interesting book—“Ocean to Ocean”—which I presume most hon. gentlemen here have read. The hon. Senator from Richmond said, as a proof that the country did not disapprove of this railway scheme of the late Government, that they had been sustained by a handsome majority in the elections of 1872. The majority, as I understand it, was not a very large one when Parliament met and I believe the people recognized generally throughout the country the fact, that the majority had not been obtained by handsome means. The Senator then took up the Government scheme, after having used some vigorous language with reference to the tremendous string of “broken pledges and promises, blunders, scandals, and jobs”; and he went into an enumeration of the blunders made by the present Government. First, there was the water-stretch policy, which has been discussed a great deal, and as to which nothing can be added just now. I have only to say that I suppose the Government were, to a certain extent, misled by that water-stretch route known as the Dawson Road, which had been the mode of communication between Lake Superior and Manitoba for some time previous to that; and by the supposition that the railway might follow the same route. Then the Government were blamed for selecting one route to-day and another to-morrow. I do not know that any instance in which they varied from the route first decided upon can be found, except one. That the route to Sturgeon Falls was abandoned and the northern location was adopted. The Senator asserted that the Fort Francis Lock was a blunder, or something worse, where there was “sufficient to enable one to form a moral suspicion that there was something very seriously wrong.” It seems to me that if he had called it an immoral suspicion, he would have been nearer correct. A suspicion without evidence of the fact to sustain it is certainly not creditable to gentlemen occupying positions in this House. Then, another blunder he referred to was the Kaminitiquia terminus. I can only say on that point, that I prefer to take the judgment of Mr. Fleming, and other professional gentlemen like him, rather than the opinion of the Senator from Richmond. There also he found jobbery, and he connected with that jobbery a gentleman named Oliver. Mr. Oliver, I understand, is professionally almost, a land speculator, and he had purchased land at Prince Arthur's Landing, Nipegon River, and two or three other places besides the Kaminitiquia, all with the object of making money out of the place where the terminus was to be located. He missed it in two or three cases, but he hit it at Fort William. If this gentleman had not purchased land anywhere else than at Fort William, there might have been a shadow of suspicion that there was something wrong, but not more than that. Then the hon. gentleman spoke of the location of the line north of Manitoba, as another blunder. I understand that the Engineers, in whose hands the location of the road has chiefly been left, are of opinion that the route has been properly selected; and during last year a further survey has been made which, I believe, has not caused the engineers to alter their opinion on the subject. I apprehend that the branch from Winnipeg will satisfy the people of the Province of Manitoba, nearly as well as the main line could do, especially when it is taken into consideration that to have brought the main line through Winnipeg would have involved the expenditure of another million of dollars, besides lengthening the road. The sixth egregious blunder which the Senator charged the Government with, was in the building of the two ends of the road between Lake Superior and Winnipeg, and leaving the central link untouched. Now, I do not know all the reasons that prevailed with the Government in adopting this course. I understand that the middle link is the most difficult of the three, and that the engineers had not finally and definitely located the line at the time that the contracts were let for the other sections. However, there is this to be remembered, that it would be almost impossible to transport the supplies necessary for the construction of the central link, to the places where they would be required; and it seems to me that, taking all these circumstances into consideration, the Government did not make any mistake in what they did there. Having got through those six blunders, the hon. Senator from Richmond said the other blunders made by the Government were too numerous to mention. I notice that this is not an unusual way of putting things. Having enumerated the whole list it sounds better, and is very convenient to end by saying, "and other things too numerous to mention." It reminds me of the manner of publishing petitions in certain cases, giving a dozen names and saying "and a hundred and fifty others," although in reality there might be only one or two. The hon. Senator from Richmond laid great stress on the fact that the bridges and culverts on the sections of the Pacific Railway, now under contract, were to be of wood; and said it was another egregious blunder. In fact, it appeared to him almost incomprehensible. I think the expense of putting up iron bridges in a country like that west of Lake Superior, so difficult of access, would be so great that the Government were justified in building wooden bridges for the present, and by and by, after six or seven years, iron bridges can be substituted at a much lower figure than it could possibly be done for at present. I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that on another Government railway of a very important character, which did not labor under the difficulties that the Pacific Railway does in its construction, a road which lay close to a water route, where iron bridges could have been laid down beside the road almost from the ships' hold; it was with the greatest difficulty that the Government of that day, who had charge of its construction, and the Railway Commissioners acting under them, who were directly in charge of the road, could be induced to build the bridges of stone and iron instead of wood. Any hon. gentleman who has read Mr. Fleming's history of the Intercolonial Railway, and who is in any way familiar with public affairs of that day, will remember that there was an exceedingly long and vigorous contest between the Commissioners on one side, who were in favor of wooden structures, and the Chief Engineer, who was in favor of iron bridges; and it was only after great exertions on the part of Mr. Fleming that he succeeded in having iron structures adopted. Under those circumstances, I think it is drawing too much on our credulity to expect us to look upon the policy of the present Government, with respect to the style of constructing the Pacific Railway, as incomprehensible, when the road is being pushed through a country over which it has been said no white man except a trapper or a missionary had ever trod. Then the hon. gentleman referred to the purchase of steel rails. He did not go at any great length into the unwisdom of that purchase, which has been principally dwelt on by other gentlemen who addressed this House. He took another view of the subject, and thought that there had been a great deal of corruption in the transaction. I was happy to see that the leader of the Opposition (the hon. gentleman from Kingston) and some other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, and people generally throughout the country have abandoned this charge of corruption altogether—in connection with the Premier—and have acquitted Mr. Mackenzie of any improper conduct, and say that he was only guilty of a great blunder. The hon. Senator from Richmond, like a class among whom it is unparliamentary to include him, rushed in were such angels, as one may call them, as the hon. Senator from Kingston, and the hon. gentleman from Saugeen feared to tread. The Senator took up the telegrams sent by the Premier in denial of this charge; and I took down some of the words which he used in connection with it. He spoke of the statements in that telegram as a “disingenuous and untruthful statement, hurled at the electors of Montreal.” I think unless the case is very clear indeed, it is undignified on the part of any member of this Senate to make a statement of that kind. It seems to me that that case was settled long ago, and the Premier’s statement was proved to be correct. It was certainly more truthful than the statement which was put into the solemn agreement or treaty made with British Columbia, that the Pacific Railway was to be completed within ten years, when the hon. gentlemen who were making that agreement and putting it on paper, had no intention of carrying it out. The facts are too well known; and it seems to me almost improper to bring them up again. Mr. Charles Mackenzie was for some time a member of the firm of Cooper, Fairman & Co., in Montreal; that firm acted as brokers for an iron house in England who tendered for the supply of these steel rails. The tenders were advertised for, and offers came in from a number of leading iron houses in England. It seems to me that, if Mr. Charles Mackenzie was a member of that brokers’ firm, or a member of one of the iron firms in England who supplied the rails, it would be difficult to show that there had been any impropriety in the transaction. But the firm to which Mr. Mackenzie had belonged did not tender at all, they merely acted as agents for a firm in England.

Hon. Mr. Power.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Where does the hon. gentleman find that; they do not represent themselves as agents in the return brought down to the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is in the return before the House, and I feel constrained to take official statements of that kind, rather than the suppositions of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Refer us to the part of the return in which “agents” is to be found.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—In No. 65.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Supposing Mr. Charles Mackenzie had actually been a member of the firm that manufactured the iron, and supplied it, I cannot see anything improper in the transaction. Under the previous Government, members of families of Ministers had supplied iron for railways, and a very much larger price was paid for the iron which they supplied than the regular market price. The fraud was so clear and palpable that the matter has since been ventilated in the Courts, and a large sum of money has been recovered from a firm of which Mr. Hawes, a brother-in-law of one of the members of the late Cabinet, was a member. The Premier stated, in his telegram, that his brother was not interested in this purchase. In January, 1873, some eight months before the present Government came into power, Mr. Charles Mackenzie having been, no doubt, endowed with the gift of prophecy, according to the hon. Senator from Richmond, became a special partner in this firm, for the special purpose of making something out of the commission on the purchase of those rails. But, before those rails were delivered—in fact, before the purchase was completed—Mr. Charles Mackenzie had left the firm. The dissolution of partnership had not been advertised before the purchase was made; but the dissolution had actually taken place; and it has been admitted, I believe, that he was not actually a partner at the time those rails were contracted for. And I fail to see, in that whole transaction, that there was anything corrupt or improper. There is one other matter which I should like to say a word about. It will be remembered, that in the course of the discussion of this question, a member of this House made a statement with reference to the extravagance and favoritism of the Government in connection with some supplies of beef in the North-West. I see that that matter has been investigated before the Committee on Public Accounts, in the other House, and the evidence has been published. I have also seen the official evidence, and I find that it is just another example of what a mistake it is to discuss such matters on unsworn and hearsay testimony. It appears that the charge of improper conduct on that matter has not been sustained.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I should like to say a word in reply to what the hon. gentleman from Hamilton said. My argument went to show that there had been favoritism exhibited by the Government towards certain houses in connection with the steel rails matter—towards Cooper, Fairman & Co.; towards the Transportation Company, of which the hon. Senator from Hamilton is a member, and towards the Red River Transportation Company. The hon. gentleman from Hamilton questioned the correctness of what I said with respect to the tender of Mr. Samuel for the transportation of the rails from Montreal to Duluth. I asked the hon. gentleman to read to the House the advertisement calling for tenders, but he did not do so. I consider the hon. gentleman's remarks were calculated to mislead the House. I never before heard an hon. gentleman speak on the floor of this House, whose remarks seemed so calculated—if it were parliamentary, I should say intended—to mislead, as the remarks of the hon. gentleman. The advertisement, which I shall read for the information of hon. gentlemen, is as follows:—"Tenders to be for "not less than 1,000 tons, and the price

Hon. Mr. Power.

"to include all cost, of handling, piling, insurance, and charges at all points."

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Now, the hon. gentleman, who, I take it for granted, must have read the advertisement, gave a list of items which, he assumed, were not included in Mr. Samuel's tender, and which amounted to $1.17 a ton. The items which he enumerated were specified in the advertisement under which Mr. Samuel tendered, and this proves that his tender included those items. How the hon. gentleman could attempt to mislead the House as he did in this matter, is what I cannot understand.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—I stated the reasons I had for saying so.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—There are no reasons for saying so. The hon. gentleman surely knows that all the items he specified were included and covered by Mr. Samuel's tender.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—They may have been in the advertisement, but they were not in Mr. Samuel's tender.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Mr. Samuel's tender was not objected to on that or any other ground. If the Minister of Public Works thought that Mr. Samuel's tender did not include everything named in the advertisement, why did he not communicate with that gentleman? But Mr. Samuel was not communicated with, and no exception was taken to his tender. All that was said was, he was not the owner of steamboats. And I should like to know if Cooper, Fairman & Co. were steamboat owners?

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Cooper, Fairman & Company were authorized to say they had the steamers.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—If there was any doubt—and there was not—that the tender of Mr. Samuel covered all that was required by the advertisement calling for tenders, why was he not communicated with? His tender was the lowest. Why were Cooper, Fairman & Co., who had not tendered at all, invited to come to Ottawa to confer with the Minister of Public Works in respect to this transport, and why was the contract awarded to them at twenty cents per ton more than Mr. Samuel asked? I ask was not that favoritism? The hon. the Minister of Public Works, in his minute of Council, described Cooper, Fairman & Co. as the agents of the Merchants' Lake and River Steamship Company, and Jacques & Co., in their tender, represented themselves as agents of the same line of steamers. The hon. gentleman from Hamilton did not tell us whether Jacques & Co., or Cooper, Fairman & Co. were the real agents. It is possible, if Jacques & Co. had got the contract at $6.30, that they would have been the agents, and we might not have heard of Cooper, Fairman & Co. in the transaction; but Jacques & Co. did not get the contract, and Cooper, Fairman & Co., having been invited to Ottawa, and having been awarded the contract at twenty cents per ton more than Mr. Samuel had offered to do the work for, they became his agents, and the agents of his associates, Messrs. Norris & Neelon. Then there was the tender of Guest & Co., at $4.16 per ton, including insurance.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was the year before.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The tender was sent in the autumn before. I assure the hon. Secretary of State that he is in error, because the tender was for the same season.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was made the year before.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—It was made in November or December of 1874, it is true, but it was for the navigable season of 1875—for the same season that Mr. Samuel tendered, and that Cooper, Fairman & Co. were awarded the contract for the transport of the rails.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was made at a time when the Government had not decided upon transporting the rails.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—It cannot be disputed that the tenders were for the same season in both cases. Guest & Co.'s tender, at $4.16, was sent in at the same time as Cooper, Fairman & Co.'s tender, at $5.60. No notice was taken of either at the time; but in the following April, the Minister of Public Works remembered that Cooper, Fairman & Co. had tendered at $5.60, but he forgot that Guest & Co. had tendered at $4.16. The hon. gentleman from Hamilton told us the other day that Guest & Co. were going to take the rails by the American route, and he talked about canal tolls and other charges, which the Government would have to pay, but the argument of the hon. gentleman was perfectly preposterous.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—What is the reason the hon. gentleman ignores the statement of Perkins, Livingston, & Post, in their tender that the consignees were to unload? Why is that fact concealed from the House?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman is in error. The carrier always lands the freight. If there is any handling beyond what is usual or specified, it is done at the owner's expense. The hon. gentleman knows very well that I omitted items on the other side, which I might have added, and have made the account very much heavier against the Government. One item, the transport from Montreal to Lachine, amounting to about one dollar a ton on the 11,000 tons; all of which might have been saved by accepting the tender of Guest & Co.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman says Guest & Co. did not tender for this service.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was a proposition made the previous year, before the Government knew what they were going to do with the steel rails.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. Secretary of State surely knows that the tender was for the transport of the rails during the season covered by Cooper, Fairman & Co.'s contract.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Was their proposition in answer to the advertisement calling for tenders?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—It was not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That settles the question, I think.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I think not. Did Cooper, Fairman, & Co. tender in answer to that advertisement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Why were they called in then, and why were they awarded the contract at a higher price than Mr. Samuel asked?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because the Government believed they could get the service done cheaper and better by Cooper, Fairman & Co. than by Mr. Samuel.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—It was a case of manifest favoritism.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was not. The Government have no interest in Cooper, Fairman & Co.,

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I dare say the Government had not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Nor any member of the Government.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I never accused any member of the Government of being interested in Cooper, Fairman & Co., but I repeat the charge that I made before, that in this transaction there was the grossest favoritism towards Cooper, Fairman & Co.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman will not get the people of this country to believe that Mr. Mackenzie did not act in the interest of the Dominion in that transaction.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The more this subject is discussed, the more clear it will become to the people, that favoritism was shown to Cooper, Fairman & Co. I pointed out the other day that the country lost on that contract, through favoritism shown to the company in which the hon. Senator from Hamilton is interested, and Cooper, Fairman & Co., no less than $24,000. When the hon. gentleman spoke on that subject, I thought he had been addressing the House seriously, until he gave the Government great credit for having accepted, in some cases, the lowest tender, and went on to show how much they had saved the country by refusing higher tenders for the service. The statement was worthy of Mark Twain. But he might have told of cases in which the Government had not accepted the lowest tenders, as in the case of this freight to which I have been referring, and he might have mentioned the Goderich Harbor job, in which the loss to the country through the Government not accepting the lowest tender, was about $30,000. I gave a list the other day of four contracts by which $80,000 was lost to the country in the same way. The hon. Senator from Prince Edward Island asked why we did not demand a committee to investigate those charges. I think the Government might very well propose a committee. I desire to allude to another point, and that is the agency of Cooper, Fairman & Co. for the Mersey Steel Company. The hon. Secretary of State said that Cooper, Fairman & Co. had not tendered for themselves for the supply of steel rails, but for the Mersey Steel Company. I see nothing in the returns to prove that assertion. I find among the parties who tendered for the steel rails, offering to supply the rails of the Mersey Steel Company, Cooper, Fairman & Co., Frothingham & Workman, Jones & Burland, Cramp, and Crawford; which means, simply, that the reputation of certain iron masters stands very high, and contractors offer the steel rails of those iron masters. It does not mean that the parties offering the rails made by the Mersey Company are their agents, but only that they will supply the rails made by the house named. The parties tendering may be selling either on commission for the makers in England, or they may be the buyers and sellers of the rails.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Cooper, Fairman & Co. had no responsibility at all, they merely got their brokerage.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. Senator from Hamilton said that Guest & Co. had intended to send their rails through the States, and to pay New York State canal tolls.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—The hon. gentleman misunderstands me. I never said anything about the tolls of canals in the State of New York. But I said the Government got 15c. rebate on every ton sent through the Canadian canals.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—If a party tenders to transport rails from Montreal to Duluth, or any point in the west, and is silent about canal tolls, he must pay them. Guest & Co. were silent about the canal tolls when they offered to carry the rails from Montreal at four dollars additional per ton, and for insurance, sixteen cents per ton.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—In the case of Cooper, Fairman & Co., the tender was $6.20, and you must take off fifteen cents for tolls. So far as the Canadian Government is concerned, they would only pay $6.05 per ton.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—And in the other case, does not the hon. gentleman see they would only pay $4.01.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—No, no.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The tolls would have been the same in either case. Of course the tolls have to come out of the freight. The freight, &c., in one case, was $6.20, and the tender in the other was $4.16.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—If it were from Montreal it would be still more against Guest & Co., because the insurance would be 55 cents instead of 25 cents. The rails were to have gone by way of Buffalo. In their letter they stated the rate of insurance from Buffalo, and said from Montreal it would be double that price.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The difference between the tender of Cooper, Fairman & Co. and the tender of Guest & Co., is $2.04. If Guest & Co. tendered in ignorance of the canal tolls, which they could not have done, it was their affair.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—I thought I had so clearly explained everything the other evening when I discussed this matter, that it would be unnecessary to refer to it again. I took all my figures from the returns before the House. With regard to Mr. Samuel's offer, I remarked that people very frequently tender for a portion of the work that the Government advertise for. This Mr. Samuel tendered for a portion only in this case; there was nothing said about teaming in Montreal, but the rails were to be delivered to him in Montreal. When Jacques & Co. could not team the rails fast enough, the Harbor Master placed teams at their expense and at greatly increased cost, to force the removal of the rails more rapidly.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — Did Jacques & Co. get the contract?

Hon. Mr. HOPE—They had the contract in 1876, at all events. With regard to Mr. Samuel, his tender was that the rails should be delivered to him in Montreal, which I contend he might claim to be the Canal Basin, which involved cartage by the Government, and then the Government were to take delivery of them at Fort William or Duluth. That would have thrown upon the Government the cost of handling at Lake Superior.

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—That is not in accordance with the advertisement.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—But he did not tender to do what the Government advertised for, and so far as Mr. Samuel's tender is concerned, the Government would have had to unload the rails at an extra cost.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — Not at all.

Hon Mr. HOPE—The tender of Guest & Co. says "and the consignees are to unload."

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — Does Samuel say that?

Hon. Mr. HOPE—He says "the Department to take delivery of the rails at the port of destination." That means to take them out of the vessel. That is what Mr. Samuel would have expected; and, besides, he would have expected the Government to do the teaming in Montreal and to pay the insurance.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Where does the hon. gentleman find evidence of that?

Hon. Mr. HOPE—In the absence of any offer from Mr. Samuel to do that part of the work.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The Government had issued an advertisement and Mr. Samuel tendered in answer to it. If there was anything ambiguous in that tender, why did the Government not communicate with him?

Hon. Mr. HOPE—The Merchants' Lake and River Line were to get $5 a ton net, and it did not matter to them whether Jacques & Co., Cooper, Fairman & Co., or Mr. Samuel got the contract, provided their boats carried the rails at the price named. After the $5 per ton was taken out of the $6.20 paid to Cooper, Fairman & Co., there was precious little left to them after all the charges were paid. With regard to Perkins, Livingston & Post, they merely remarked they could transport the rails purchased from Guest & Co. to Duluth. That meant by way of New York.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Where is the evidence of that?

Hon. Mr. HOPE—They quote the insurance from Buffalo, and say if the rails were to be carried from Montreal the insurance would be double. In 1874 they wrote the following letter:

RUSSELL HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 21st Nov., 1874.

"DEAR SIR,—I enclose despatch received from my New York firm, and it may suggest itself to you to make enquiries about the insurance from Montreal, and if this information is confirmed it is still another point in favor of the New York route and western delivery via canals and lakes.

"Yours very respectfully,

"(Signed,) H. A. V. POST."

"Mr. TRUDEAU,

"Deputy Minister Public Works."

That was before the Government had advertised for tenders at all.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman is in error again. The Government invited tenders for the delivery of those rails on Lakes Superior and Huron in November, 1874. It is a pity that the hon. gentleman will not deal squarely with this matter. The Government invited tenders in the Autumn of 1874 for the supply of rails, and asked the parties tendering for them at what rates they would deliver the rails on Lake Huron and Lake Superior. In response to that, Guest & Co. offered to carry the rails for $4.16 per ton (including insurance) additional, and Cooper, Fairman & Co., on November 14th, offered to deliver them at Duluth for $5.60 additional. The hon. gentleman knows that very well. Is it not that very tender that the Minister remembered when he called upon Cooper, Fairman & Co. to transport the rails the following year?

Hon. Mr. HOPE—It was not until the Spring of 1875 that the Government called for tenders for the transport of the rails to the Upper Lakes. I have taken my facts and figures from the parliamentary return and I think I have not left the hon. Senators from Saugeen and Belleville a leg to stand on with regard to their statements respecting the transportation of those rails. Any hon. gentleman who will thoroughly and dispassionately consider the statement I have made, and read the printed documents on which that statement is based, will come to the conclusion that the Government got the rails transported at the lowest possible rates.

Hon. Mr. READ moved the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. Hope.

The motion was agreed to.

The House adjourned at 9:30 p.m.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, April 25th.

The SPEAKER took the chair at three o'clock, p.m.

After Routine proceedings,

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. HAMILTON (Kingston) from the Committee on Banking, Commerce, and Railways, reported the following Bills with amendments.

"An Act to authorize the Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company, to reduce its capital stock, and for other purposes."

"An Act respecting the Ontario Express and Transportation Company."

The amendments were concurred in, and the Bills were read the third time and passed.

CONFLICTING CLAIMS TO LANDS IN MANITOBA.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD moved:—

"That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House, a Report made to the Government by the Hon. A. Morris, Commissioner under the Act 38 Victoria, Chapter 53, on the putting into execution of that law and its operation in the Province of Manitoba."

He said: The Hon. Mr. Morris, late Governor of Manitoba, was appointed a Commissioner under the law passed by this Parliament in 1875 for the settlement of conflicting claims. It appears, that in putting that Act into operation, certain difficulties were encountered; it was exceedingly difficult to work, and one of the principle causes of this was the extreme powers granted to the Minister having control of the Dominion lands. It was a heavy responsibility to place upon a Minister, and, at the same time, it caused uneasiness amongst the parties in Manitoba who were interested in the lands. It was very hard for the Commissioners to decide in any case that was not sent to them by the Minister. Up to the present time, we have not been able to obtain justice. During the present Session I have tried to have that law amended, but the Minister of the Interior was in the other House to check every effort I made. I believe a report has been sent in by the Commissioners appointed to carry out the law, indicating what could be done to render it operative. It is important for the Province of Manitoba that the land difficulties should be settled one way or another. We have suffered long enough, and we have had to come to this Parliament too often for protection. The difficulties have always been in the office of the Minister of the Interior, and I believe the question has not always been understood correctly. The Act respecting conflicting claims to lands in Manitoba, has been taken from the Upper Canada law, relating to the Crown Lands. But such legislation does not apply to the claims of people in Manitoba, who held their titles from the Hudson's Bay Company, and were living in the Province prior to the 15th July, 1870. It is the interest of the Government to have this matter settled, and I do not understand why every facility is not given to the people to get titles to their lands. I hope the Government will have no objection to my motion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman from Manitoba never rises to speak in reference to these Manitoba claims without having a fling at the Government. I do not think the matter at all justifies him in taking that hostile attitude. All gentlemen who have had any experience with regard to lands in new countries will come to the conclusion, that conflicting claims must arise. I am bound to say, more have been settled, in any one year, in Ontario, than have ever arisen in Manitoba since that Province became a portion of the Dominion. I know every effort has been made to settle those claims, because the natural desire of any Government is, to remove all imaginable grievances. Many of them are imaginary claims, and others are developed by circumstances, and have no just basis. No Government can have any possible motive to thwart the settling of any just or reasonable claim. No doubt, difficulties will arise in deciding upon those titles. It may not at all times be easy to bring the circumstances affecting them before the Minister in charge of the Dominion lands. But anyone who will look at the multitude of claims which have been settled already, will not believe that the Government are open to the charge which has been made against them. Our policy has been most liberal and generous, and I cannot see any just or fair ground for the criticisms of my hon. friend. With reference to the report of Mr. Morris, I have no objection to its coming down. I believe only eleven claims were settled through his instrumentality.

The motion was agreed to.

INSOLVENT INSURANCE COMPANIES' BILL.

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill, entitled "An Act for the winding up of Insolvent Incorporated Fire and Marine Insurance Companies," be read the second time. He said this measure was to provide for the winding up of Fire and Marine Insurance Companies under the provisions of the Insolvent Act of 1875. That Act did not include fire insurance companies, telegraph companies, or railways. This measure dealt with insurance companies very much in the same way as other incorporated companies, the only exception being that greater care was taken that the interests of the Company were not endangered, or their credit disturbed by the action of any policy-holder who wished to interfere with them. Two months must elapse before any such action could be taken.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said that Bill would be a useful one, if circumstances should arise to demand it, but he was not aware that any necessity had arisen for dealing with Insurance Companies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he understood an insurance company had applied this Session for legislation to be wound up, and it was desirable that there should be a uniform law for dealing with insurance companies in such cases.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said what he wished to draw attention to was, that there was no necessity for a general Bill of this kind at the present time. And he wished to guard against the impression going abroad that the insurance companies doing business in Canada were not able to meet their engagements.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT— I know of only one case.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said he believed the insurance companies were doing business on a sound basis, and did not require this Act.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said the company which had made application to be wound up, was the Canada Agricultural Insurance Company. It was to come under the operation, not only of the general law, but also of any Act that might be passed during the present Session; and, therefore, the machinery of this Bill, now before the House, would be necessary in that instance.

The motion was agreed to.

The Bill passed through committee without amendment.

PACIFIC RAILWAY ACT. AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER moved that the House do go into Committee of the Whole on Bill (52) "An Act to amend the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874."

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I have an objection to the principle of this Bill which it would seem more fitting to state before going into committee. The Bill provides for giving power to the Government to grant a lease of this Pembina Branch, and also to make traffic regulations subject to the approval of Parliament. With reference to the provision to make traffic arrangements, I cannot see any possible objection to that, because I think it is a wise and necessary provision, when this branch is in operation; but as regards the power of granting leases, it appears to me that the provisions of this Act are premature and unnecessary, premature because the railway is not yet finished, and is not likely to be, as we are told, before the end of the year, and the connecting lines have not yet been constructed; unnecessary, because the lease which it is proposed to give would only be binding after being submitted to the Legislature a year hence, and it would have no force or effect until after the next Session of Parliament. It appears to me this of itself would be a reasonable ground for the postponement of this Bill. I can appreciate the natural anxiety of the people of Manitoba to secure railway communication with the outside world as speedily as possible, but it seems to me it may be as well to consider whether they might not purchase that boon at too high a price, and whether they might not be yielding themselves up to a foreign corporation, holding this lease upon terms which may prove to be most onerous and exacting to the people of that country. I do not think it is necessary to refer particularly to the grievances to which the people of Manitoba and those going to that Province are subjected, in consequence of the practical monopoly now enjoyed by the Kittson Line, but it is quite certain if those persons, having already that monopoly, can also secure the monopoly of the all-rail route, they will practically command the situation.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Under those circumstances it appears to me that the principle of the Bill is objectionable, and when we look at all the surrounding circumstances connected with this legislation, it is even more questionable whether this Pembina Branch Railway should be put in a position to be made the principal line of communication for a great many years to come, from the heart of Manitoba. I will not go over the ground so well covered by my hon. friend Arichat last night, but it is obvious the true policy of Canada in connection with this great national work is, that all rail communication should be completed from the Prairie Province to the west shore of Lake Superior, and this trade be carried through our own country to the ocean. It appears to me that the policy of leaving that gap of 180 miles open for years to come is a mistake.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh!

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—The hon. gentleman says "Oh!", but I take it from himself.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said four or five years.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—That is the shortest limit my hon. friend supposed would be necessary, but after the experience, we have had we may safely double that period.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—At all events, I am safe in saying it will be years before that gap will be filled up. No expression I can use can more correctly describe it, than to say it is a policy for which no reasons have been given—a policy of utter fatuity. We are to have communication to the American border, and are asked to pass a bill under which we offer to a foreign company—and for a very considerable time—the entire traffic of our great Prairie Provinces. Now, it appears to me, that is a policy which should not commend itself to this House, and I do say, under the circumstances, the Government ought rather to have expended their energies—and some of those notorious steel rails—in endeavoring to complete this communication through our own territory, and give the benefit of that communication to our own people, instead of leaving the rails to rust, and obliging us, probably, to commence a new course of policy by the time we get this gap of 180 miles filled up. That is the position which I take on this matter. At the same time, I am quite aware of the prevailing anxiety that something should be done to open up communication with the North-West. Guarding myself with this protest, I am quite willing to leave my views in the hands of the House. With regard to the provisions of the Bill itself, respecting the power of leasing, I confess I attach no importance whatever to the particular term of years mentioned. It seems to me it is of comparatively little consequence whether we make the term five or ten years, not only for reasons which are obvious to every one, but for the reason in the Bill itself—power is given to the Governor-in-Council to extend the term, subject to the approval of the House of Commons. I think it would be unwise on our part to put it in the power of the Government, or of any person, to say the Senate had endeavored to interfere with, or cripple the Government by limiting the term of years, or to say that, had their legislation been accepted, and had they been given power to lease the railway for ten years, they might have made better terms. Under the circumstances, I hope my hon. friend from Arichat will excuse me if I suggest that he should not bring forward that amendment.

Hon. Mr. Dickey.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—With regard to the other section of the Bill, in the interests not merely of this House, but for the protection of the rights which belong to the Senate, and for the protection of the people of this country, we should insist that any lease to be made shall be subject to the approval of both Houses of Parliament. This is not a Bill merely for granting money which may come constitutionally, perhaps, within the purview of the other Chamber; but it is a Bill dealing with national property, and therefore it is that we, who belong to a constituent branch of the Legislature, who have a voice in measures affecting that property, should see that this Bill is amended to give to the Senate rights co-ordinate with the House of Commons. There is a precedent for this case; we took a stand on a Bill affecting the Supreme Court, and claimed co-ordinate power to examine the rules of the Supreme Court, equally with the House of Commons, and our constitutional right was recognized by that act. We should be abdicating our functions were we to leave the ratification of this lease to the House of Commons. We cannot escape the responsibility which attaches to us as one branch of Parliament. Under the circumstances I hope the House will not hesitate when the motion is made, to accept that amendment. But I do trust, if it be the sense of the House this legislation should pass, after the protest I have made, that at all events the House will see, it passes in such a form as at once to vindicate the constitutional rights of this House, and to protect the rights and interests of the people of this country.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—I would feel very sorry indeed if serious obstructions were thrown in the way of giving the people of Manitoba railway communication with the outside world. It is unfortunate that so few facilities are afforded to those who desire to settle in Manitoba. If we go by the Thunder Bay route the difficulties to be encountered seem insurmountable; if we go by way of the United States, the communication is broken. A good deal has been said in this House of late on the subject of the Pacific Railway, and I have tried to ascertain the current of public opinion on the subject of the Pembina Branch. I have read the press of Manitoba and consulted with parties living there. They all agree that we must at any price have the railroad. I have more than once expressed the opinion that it seemed as if the Government were building our national highway in the interests of the people of the United States. I adhere to that opinion. So far as the Kittson monopoly is concerned, the only way to destroy it is to construct a competing line, but that would involve a very heavy expenditure. It has been said that the Pembina Branch might be connected with other line—the Northern Pacific or some line in Illinois. I do not think that would be possible for some years to come.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—I know if Manitoba had not been in existence the Northern Pacific Railway would not have been able to sustain itself; that is the opinion of those who live along the line of that road. It depends upon the Canadian trade which has yielded such large profits to the Kittson line. I shall read with your permission the following from the Winnipeg Free Press, the leading paper in Manitoba.—

“The popular feeling is that we want a railroad; and it is the bounden duty of the Government to secure that for us at the earliest possible moment. That they propose to do, and, in doing so, we have the assurances of the Premier that the interests of the people in the matter of freight rates will be properly protected. The natural connection of the Pembina Branch at the boundary line is the St. Paul & Pacific, and did the Government refuse to avail of possible fair working arrangements between these two roads, they would be censurable in a strong degree. (Manitoba has been languishing for rail connection ever since she had an existence, and those who would delay it beyond the earliest possible realization are not the friends of the country.) It was the bounden duty of the Government to close with the first fair offer of connection at the boundary line, whether that offer came from the St. Paul & Pacific or the Northern Pacific, and this it seems they are about doing. The apprehension sought to be raised by linking in the Red River Transportation Company is unwarranted. To begin with, the Red River Transportation Company and the St. Paul and Pacific are not identical—they are far from it. And even if they were, what would it amount to? Until such time as we have more than one outlet, some body of men must have the monopoly; and after all that has been said, and correctly said, of the freight rates to this country, a little investigation will demonstrate that the Red River Transportation Company were not the sole cause. The Northern Pacific, who control a portion of the route, participated proportionately. What does this indicate? Not necessarily that either the Red River Transportation Company or the Northern Pacific are naturally more avaricious than other commercial combinations, but that they simply obeyed a universal law of human nature. The high rates charged by these companies have not been a result of certain sets of individuals having the control, but a result of circumstances, of which all experience goes to prove any other set of men under like circumstances would have taken the same advantage. It is our misfortune that we are, and must remain, for some time at the mercy of a (not any particular) transportation monopoly; and it is a matter of little concern to us of whom that monopoly is constituted.”

The Mctis, a French paper, expresses the same view:—

“Ce qu'il nous faut c'est l'embranchement, et nous avons foi que nous l'aurons avant le mois d'octobre prochain.”

I understand from explanations given in the other House, that even if there should be a monopoly, the rates cannot exceed the average charges in Minnesota. That assurance, in answer to a question put by Mr. Kirkpatrick, was as follows:—

“Sir John thought the hon. gentleman must be aware of the disadvantage of trusting to one company, which would thus be given a monopoly. He asked was there no other line in the United States that would connect with Red River by constructing a branch.

“Mr. Mackenzie agreed that the arrangement would be attended with certain disadvantages, but there was no choice left in the matter. The Pembina Branch would be pushed forward as quickly as possible. Nearly the whole of the grading had been done. Everything was in readiness. The Government had waited in vain for a connection with any line in the United States, but not a word had come in the way of an offer, except from the one company, to operate the Pembina Branch or extend their line to the point on the boundary. It was a question of making the proposed connection or no railroad. It was found necessary to offer some inducements to obtain the connection. He believed a lease of ten years would be the least that would induce the connection to be made with our line.

“Mr. Kirkpatrick said some arrangements would have to be made to keep down the rates of freight between Duluth and Winnipeg.

“Mr. Mackenzie said this would be abundantly cared for in the lease prepared, which, however, did not provide the rates for freight on the Northern Pacific. The rates on the Pembina Branch and connection would not be more than those charged on the rest of the St. Paul and Pacific, and would in no case exceed the average rate of freights in the State of Minnesota.”

Under the circumstances, I think there is no reason why we should be afraid of leasing the line. At all events, we have no alternative, and the position is quite acceptable to us in Manitoba. It will not place us in a worse position than we have been in for the last four or five years with the Kittson monopoly. That Company is a commercial association, and we cannot expect that it will work absolutely in the public interest. Any Company will look to its own interest first, and that is what the Kittson line has been doing. At the same time, I must admit in their transactions with the public they have been honest and upright. That they have made large profits is due to circumstances. I doubt whether the Railway Company, which leases the Pembina Branch, will reap such large profits. There is a great deal of risk in undertaking the running of that road. In the extract of the Winnipeg Free Press, which I have read, there appears the following: “That those who would delay that road, would be censurable in a strong degree.” I would not go so far as that, but the position in which we stand is perfectly understood by this House, I am sure, and everyone is desirous that we should have railway communication without delay. At the present time there are, on an average, 1,200 arrivals in Winnipeg every week, and it is easy to understand how rapidly our population is increasing. Before the end of the summer, about 40,000 souls will have been added to our numbers. I would not like to share the responsibility of leaving those people there without giving them railway communication. We do not stand as beggars before the Dominion; we have got provisions, but we have not provided for such a rapidly increasing population. Suppose there should be a failure of crops this year (which does not seem at all probable now) and we were reduced next winter to the old means of communication—the oxen and ordinary vehicles of the country—we might witness a famine there. I hope the House will recognize our isolated position, and deal with this question in a spirit of liberality. We cannot expect that the monopoly which now exists can be effectually broken until the road from Thunder Bay is completed. The Premier stated in the other House recently, that he expected that road would be in operation in three or four years. That is not my opinion, nor is it the opinion of anyone I have met, who has seen that country. There is not money enough at our disposal to complete it so soon. But suppose it could be in operation five years hence, that would put an end to the monopoly. I fear, however, that we need not hope for such results. The term of ten years for the lease does not appear to me excessive, in consideration of the great risk which those who may lease the line will have to run. It seems to me we cannot give them too much encouragement to undertake the management of that road. More than one man has gone to that country, invested his money and met with heavy loss. I hope those who undertake the running of the Pembina Branch will not have a similar experience. At present we have not population enough to make it profitable, and those who lease the line must look to the future for their profits. It seems to me that the lease should be submitted to both Houses for their approval. As the Senate has never been obstructive to what was right and just, I have no doubt this House, when called to do it, will give its approval to any reasonable arrangements into which the Government may have entered, for the operation of the Pembina Branch. I suppose the Government will not object to the proposed amendment.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND—I think it is unnecessary for me to say anything in regard to the feelings in our Province with respect to the completion of this Pembina Branch. It will be readily understood by this House that we should naturally be exceedingly desirous of having speedy communication with the outside world. I should very much regret, myself, if this House should by any means throw an obstacle in the way of that desirable object being accomplished. It may be said, that I am speaking merely in the interests of Manitoba. But what is in the interests of Manitoba will certainly, in this case, be in the interests of the entire Dominion. It has also been said, though not in this House, that other lines would be built, and it might be possible to get several lines to connect with the Pembina Branch. I do not think that is at all likely. I do not think there is any other company in a position to offer the same advantages which this company possesses. They already have their line partially constructed, and by a comparatively small outlay they can complete it at a less amount than would be necessary to build any other line. More than that, we have no reason to expect, for some years at all events, that we can get any better conditions than this company now offers. It may be said the present steamboat line is a monopoly. That I do not deny; and I do not stand up here to advocate the cause of any company. But in justice to them I must say, that the carrying of a ton of freight from Duluth to Winnipeg cost $17, and out of that amount the Northern Pacific took $9.50 as their share on the shorter part of the distance, and this monopoly that is so much talked of, got merely $7.50 to carry the same ton of freight 115 miles further. So, I do not think we have any ground to condemn them as a monopoly, although, of course, under the circumstances, there is no doubt they have a monopoly. Then, on the other hand, if they should not get this line—and I do not think they are over anxious to have it—they have the key to the position at all events, and they will have all the trade. Therefore, on these grounds I think it would be exceedingly advisable that no obstruction should be thrown in the way of the speedy completion of the road. For my own part I am quite willing to leave this matter of arranging for the lease of the road in the hands of the Government, and let them be responsible for their action to Parliament. As regards one of the amendments proposed by my hon. friend, that is, the submitting of the lease to this House for its ratification, I should hope there could be no very serious objection to such a proposition.

Hon. Mr. Sutherland.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER—Did I understand my hon. friend to say what connection this Pembina Branch is to form.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND—I think it is the St. Paul and Pacific that is said to meet this Pembina Branch.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is the St. Paul and Pacific.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER—I fail to see the object the hon. Senator from Amherst may have in asking to postpone the Bill for another year. He says it is not likely this branch will be completed for a long period, and therefore it is unnecessary to pass the Bill this Session. We are not asking extraordinary powers, and I do not believe that the hon. member need be afraid that we will make any extravagant bargain, as we are so often told in this House, with any company that may undertake to lease the road. Nothing will be binding until the lease receives the approval of the House of Commons. I am glad to see that the representatives of Manitoba accept the Bill as it stands, as to the length of time mentioned for the lease, and that they see the necessity of giving the Government power to enter into such arrangements. If the Bill were postponed for another year the Government would be prevented from making any arrangement. The branch will be completed by the end of September next, and it will be connected with a road in Minnesota in due time. If the Bill were postponed there would be several months lost before the people of Manitoba would have railway communication with the outer world.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER—What time do the Government expect that the road will be completed?

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER—We expect the two roads will be connected by September or October next—at all events, before another Session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This fall.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER—I am glad that the hon. Senator from Amherst suggests the Government be allowed to extend the lease for more than five years, if they deem it necessary. As to submitting it to the Senate for their ratification, while I do not anticipate any undue obstruction on the part of this House, it would certainly be against the rule which has been followed until now to admit such a principle. I see no reason why the ordinary rule should not be followed in this case. I do not believe the Bill would pass if it were so amended, and I hope the hon. gentleman will not insist upon his motion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would strike at the whole principle of the Bill. Of course, if the amendment were carried the Bill would immediately drop.

The House then went into Committee, Hon. Mr. Wilmot in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I gave notice, on the second reading of this Bill, that when the House went into Committee I should move certain amendments, and I now intend partly to carry out that purpose. I shall not, however, move any amendment with regard to the ten years' limit of the proposed lease. On consultation with my hon. friends from Manitoba, and after full consideration of their views, and on further consultation with other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, I have concluded not to propose an amendment to that portion of the Bill. But we did and do yet think, that it is only right and proper that the Bill should be amended to provide that any lease which may be made of this branch of railway to any company shall be submitted to this House for ratification, as well as to the House of Commons.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—My hon. friends who have preceded me have so fully entered into the discussion of that point, that it will not be necessary for me to extend my remarks, with reference to it, to any great length. There are one or two points, however, upon which I desire to state my views briefly. We are asked by this Bill to give power to the Government of the day, to lease the Pembina Branch Railway. By asking us to give that power, it is conceded, of course, that it is necessary for the Government to get, from the three branches of Parliament, authority to do so. We are asked to give power to the Government to lease the contemplated branch railway, when it is constructed, to a company, subject only to the approval of the House of Commons. Now, I believe it would be only proper and fair to this House, that the Government, if they knew the terms on which they would give that lease, should have embodied them in the Bill, and taken the opinion of Parliament on it. That is what would have been the candid course, but it is intended to take from us, by Act of Parliament, our legislative functions, and to vest them in the House of Commons. I do not see why, if it is necessary that this House should have no opinion with regard to the leasing of this road, and should not be called upon as well as the other House to pass an opinion upon the terms on which the lease should be given. On principle, I say, we should not allow ourselves to be deprived of our rights by blindly legislating away our own power, either on this, or any other measure, to the House of Commons. It is bad enough in principle for Parliament to give to the Government power to make orders and regulations in unavoidable cases respecting the public service, but it is more unfair still to either branch of the Legislature, to ask that it should legislate away its right to supervision over any subject of public concern to the other House of Parliament. What would be said if the Government introduced a Bill giving themselves power, say, to do this very act, and should make it contingent upon the ratification of the Senate alone, without reference to the other House? They certainly would not do so; and I see no reason why we should confer on the House of Commons, in such a case as the one before us, the power which we possess as a portion of Parliament. It may be said that it is not a usual thing for the Government to require the approval of this House on contracts entered into by the Government, in relation to the public service. I am ready to admit, with my hon. friend who has this measure in charge, that, perhaps, as a general rule, in relation to the administration of public affairs, and in relation to the making and entering into, and carrying on of ordinary contracts, such, for instance, perhaps, as carrying the mails, or anything of that character, when you cannot in advance know what the terms ought to be, and where it is, after all, only a matter of price or quantity, and where the contracts are contingent on the payment of money by the Government—a subject over which the popular branch has special charge—in such a case as that, it might, perhaps, be inconvenient to require the approval or ratification of both branches of Parliament of the conduct of the Government. I am not prepared to say that I would insist upon such ratification in all instances, but this is not one of those cases in which we should abdicate our functions in regard to it. This is a case involving an important question of public policy. What are the facts? We are spending a large amount of money with a view to opening up that great North-West country. We are assuming a heavy burden of taxation with a view to having ultimately recouped to us a portion of that large disbursement by means of the trade of the North-West. We expect, when the country becomes settled—when it is opened up by our own railways, that it will contribute largely towards repaying us for the outlay which we are now making upon it. Therefore, this Senate can be called on to discharge no greater duty, and it has no greater trust reposed in it, than to see that the future trade of that great region is not diverted from its national channel to a foreign nation. We all know, in the infancy of a country, the channel which its trade is likely to adopt is almost sure to become permanent, and it is with extreme difficulty afterwards that the current can be changed. Hence, it is the duty of this Parliament to see that, in connection with this, the national interests of the Dominion are not sacrificed by allowing the trade of that country, at the present time, to take a direction from which it may not be diverted for one hundred years to come. I say, therefore, that this is not an ordinary contract, but one which involves national interests of a high character, which it is the duty of this House to see properly protected. It is for that reason I think this should fairly be made an exceptional case, and that this House should be allowed to have a voice in the ratification of the proposed lease. We know in the passage of the Railway Act some years ago power was taken by the Government to enter into contracts relating to the Pacific Railway, subject only to the ratification of the House of Commons. I believe the policy of that Act was wrong; that all such contracts should have been subject to the ratification of this House also, because contracts growing out of the construction of the Pacific Railway were not such as are ordinarily entered into by the Government in carrying on the public service. If the Senate had reserved to itself the right, as it should have done on that occasion; if we had not legislated away our right to supervise all the contracts of the Pacific Railway; if we had not, in fact, legislated away our functions, to the House of Commons, I ask would that unfortunate contract for the building of the Georgian Bay Branch, and other unwise contracts which have entailed loss on this country have been consummated? If the Government had known they would have had to come to this House to obtain the ratification of these contracts, I am sure greater care would have been exercised and greater vigilance would have been shown by the Government, from the knowledge that they would have to obtain the sanction of this branch of the Legislature, and very great benefit would have accrued to the public. As this question has already been discussed very fully, I shall not detain the committee much longer, but I do hope that my hon. friend, on re-consideration, will have no objection to allowing the Bill to pass in the amended form I have suggested. I have, at the instance of gentlemen in both branches of the Legislature, who ought to be acquainted with the public sentiment and wants of Manitoba, agreed to withdraw my opposition to the limit of ten years, on condition that this House would have an opportunity, at some future period, of passing upon the lease which the Government may be disposed to make of this railway. I do not wish to say anything unpleasant with regard to this subject. I would rather deal with it on broad principles, but I cannot shut out of view that it is supposed this Bill is intended to favor the interests of gentlemen who are known to be very friendly to the present Government, and to possess large influence with them. I do not say there is any correctness in these suppositions, but I do say such rumours are abroad, and the very fact that they are should make the Government more anxious that the lease should undergo the supervision of both branches of the Legislature. But my chief reason for desiring the amendment I am going to press, is that I do not think it is right for the Senate of Canada in relation to a question connected with the public policy of this country, and the highest interests of the Dominion in the North-West, to legislate away the legitimate control into the House of Commons over this subject, and place the country at the disadvantage of any arrangement which the Government think proper to submit to the House of Commons for their approval. With these remarks, I move that all the words after "line" be left out in the twentieth line, and the proviso be made to read as follows:—

Hon. Mr. Pelletier.

"Provided, that no such contract for leasing the said branch railway shall be binding until it shall have been laid before the Senate and House of Commons for one month, for the approval of both Houses, unless sooner approved of."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The proposition that has been submitted by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, is one that is entirely new under our system of Government, and I think it must be obvious to every gentleman who reflects upon it for a moment, that it entails this consequence—that any Government which rules in this Dominion must have a majority in both branches of the Legislature, if its executive functions are to be controlled by the Senate; otherwise, its administrative functions are necessarily crippled. We need go no further than the very case under discussion for an illustration. Is it not within the recollection of every gentleman who hears my voice, that the policy of this Government, with respect to the building of the Pacific Railway, from its inception to the present day, has met with the condemnation and censure of this House? No one step could have been taken in this House had the Senate been able to control the action of the Government, in giving out contracts with regard to the Pacific Railway, that is, provided also, that action had been in the direction that the Senate has given expression to; whether it was through the Chief Engineer and his staff or not, every particular action of the Government, from the beginning to the end, has met with the condemnation of the Senate. I have not heard the first note of approval up to this hour, when it was given by my hon. friend from Manitoba, of any act of the Administration in connection with the Pacific Railway. Our action in reference to the surveys on the Pacific Coast, our action in relation to the location of the line between Lake Superior and the Red River—

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." He condemns it in toto. He has taken a very strong ground against it. He thinks he is right; I think he is wrong. Another hon. Senator (Mr. Girard) thinks the line west of Selkirk should have been located south of Lake Manitoba, instead of where it is; and he has been sustained by a majority of this House. I would agree with him if the road were not intended as an all-rail route to the Pacific, and I should have been very glad if the engineers had been able to find a line south of Lake Manitoba, that would have met their views in reference to a through route, to enable them to make that diversion. But, the northern route has been condemned over and over again. Gentlemen have taken the ipse dixit of those who, practically, knew nothing about it as against the evidence of the engineers. The gentlemen from British Columbia are sustained in their views, with reference to the location of the line in their Province. Whether it be Bute Inlet or Burrard Inlet, it makes no difference, so long as an opportunity is afforded to condemn the Government. My hon. friend opposite smiles.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I smile at the melancholy tone of the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is unfortunate this Senate has taken such strong political grounds against the Government, that no one act, however unimportant, that the Government submits to it, meets with its approval.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND—What about the Temperance Act?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am speaking of the Pacific Railway. If the Government in 1873, had dismissed Mr. Fleming and his staff, there might have been some reason for this hostility. It was known their political feelings were strongly against us. We had evidence from many sources that they would embarrass us, but we believed in the integrity and honesty of Mr. Fleming and those under him, and the Government made no change. Had there been no change in the Administration, those engineers would probably have located the line just where it is to-day, because no Minister having charge of a Department, more particularly the Public Works Department, could be expected to go and examine personally the several routes, and ascertain the topography of the country in British Columbia and the great North West. It was impossible that the Government could be bound by any opinions but those of professional men, who, it was to be supposed, were guided in the selection of the route, by their experience, and by their belief that they were selecting a line in the best possible position for the people of this country. I lay that down as one of the reasons why it would be unfair on the part of this House to tack on to this Bill the provision that the mere making of a contract for a term of ten years with this company that professes to make connection with the Pembina Branch, should be approved of by this Chamber. I say it is a departure from the principles which have been recognized under our system of government; and it will make that system practically impossible, unless the Government of the day should be sustained by a majority in both Houses of Parliament. The practice of having contracts sanctioned by the House of Commons in this country, was, I believe first introduced by this Administration, and it is following the practice introduced during the last fifteen years in England, that this policy has come into force in this House of late years. Large contracts which involved an expenditure, in many cases greater than the amount voted for the particular services by Parliament, were submitted for the sanction of the House of Commons, and the reason was this: where a contract was entered into for an amount in excess of the Parliamentary appropriation, it was considered only proper that the House of Commons should have a right to pass upon the contract as they had the control of the purse strings. Todd lays down that principle very clearly. He says:

“An important question has arisen of late years with regard to contracts to be entered into between any Department of the executive

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Government and other parties, for the performance of any work or service which has been authorized by Parliament to be undertaken. It is manifest that the responsibility of entering into such contracts properly rests upon the executive alone. But it is equally clear that the Government have no constitutional authority to make a contract which shall be binding on the House of Commons, by whom the necessary funds for carrying on the contract must be supplied; and that if any contract be entered into by any executive department or work to be performed, the cost of which will exceed the amount already voted by Parliament for the service to be contracted for, such contracts should expressly state that payments on behalf of the same would be made ‘out of moneys to be voted by Parliament;’ and, in addition thereto, a copy of said contract should be laid upon the table of the House of Commons for one month previous to its going into operation, in order to afford an opportunity to the House to express its disapproval thereof, if it should think fit to do so.”

* * *

“In fact in the Session of 1862 the Constitutional control of the House of Commons over contracts received a still more extended application. In a previous Session (that of 1860) the House had resolved to grant the sum of two million pounds to construct necessary works for the fortification of the British Coast; and, in 1862, a Bill was brought in to provide for a large portion of this expenditure. On July 10, in Committee on the Bill, a clause was proposed by Sir Stafford Northcote to declare that any contracts to be entered into by Government for this service, which involved the expenditure of a larger sum than that which had already been voted by Parliament, must be previously approved of by the House of Commons. The Ministry, at first, opposed this clause. The Chancellor of the Exchequer remarked that ‘the practical wisdom and the good or bad economy of such contracts was a matter on which the House of Commons, as a deliberative assembly, had not the opportunity of forming an opinion in the same way as the Executive Government; and it was not according to usage that the Government should be able to relieve itself of its special responsibility with regard to these contracts by a resolution of the House of Commons. The responsibility of the Government would be better preserved by giving the House the power of interfering with these contracts before they became valid, than by asking the House to approve each of them by a resolution.’ On a division, the clause was negatived by a majority of five. On July 14, however, the Ministry announced their acceptance of this provision. It accordingly appears in the Statute to the following effect:—That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of State to enter into any contract involving the expenditure of any sum greater than that for which the authority of Parliament has been specifically obtained, without inserting therein a clause requiring that such contract shall not be binding until it has lain for one month on the table of the House of Commons without disapproval, or be formally approved of within that period. The object of this clause is not to insist that every contract entered into by Government for the construction of these works shall be first submitted for the approval of Parliament, but that no such contract shall be made for a greater sum than has been actually voted without the previous knowledge and consent of the House of Commons, so that the Government may not be able to bind the House in such a way as to prevent entire freedom of action whenever a further appropriation is required."

That course has been followed in our Pacific Railway contracts.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is the principle which we lay down in this amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend knows very well the Government is charged by law with the regulating of the tariffs of all railways in the country, and there is no possibility of any railway, by the existence of a monopoly in any direction, charging more than is reasonable and fair, as the tariff can be controlled by the Governor-in-Council. The whole of Mr. Todd's remarks indicate that these contracts should be submitted to the House of Commons only. I have looked through his book, but I find in only one case was a contract laid before the House of Lords, and in that one the circumstances were peculiar. It was the case of contracts in connection with the fortifications at Dover and Portsmouth, involving an expenditure of two or three millions sterling. The popular branch claim the right of having those contracts submitted to them, inasmuch as they furnish the money. The reason I have adverted to the very strong ground taken by the majority of this House against the policy of the Administration will be illustrated by what I am going to say. Parties would be slow to deal with the Government in the construction of the extension from Glyndon to the boundary, unless they were certain the Government would be sustained in any contract entered into with them. They would feel it would be unsafe to make a contract with the Government if it had to meet with the sanction of this House. That is a very strong ground to take, I admit, but I can only appeal to the experience of the last three or four years to confirm what I have said. In no case has this House accorded to the Government feelings of honesty or sincerity.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Day after day I have heard in this House the words "favoritism," "incapacity," "bungling," and "corruption," words which are usually confined to more tumultuous assemblies. But when an attempt is made to have those charges brought home, hon. gentlemen opposite say "we do not mean that Mr. Mackenzie is guilty of corruption," but unfortunately the words are used. I do feel, and I have felt for a long time, that it was really lowering the tone of this House to lend itself to influencing public feeling outside, by making charges of that kind against the Administration. But it has been the practice here, and more particularly in the debate that has been going on from day to day, dragging its "weary length along." Therefore, I say, it is highly improbable that this body of individuals who propose building this extension, would come into the arrangement if the sanction of the Senate had to be obtained while this Administration holds power. The building of this Pembina Branch is a work to which the Government, very soon after coming into office, gave their attention. They entered into a correspondence with the companies which controlled the lines south of the boundary—the Northern Pacific, running from Duluth to Bismarck, and the St. Paul and Pacific, running almost at right angles with the Northern Pacific, and crossing at Glyndon. The position of the Northern Pacific at that time was hopeless. It had been chartered in 1864, with a handsome grant of 47,000,000 acres of land. Since 1864, just 555 miles of that road and its branches have been built. Seven millions of acres of the land grant was in Minnesota, and the balance was in the States and Territories west of that. The bonded debt of that road, with the short distance they have built, is $30,000,000. It has passed out of the hands of the original company. It was practically impossible to have done anything with that road. The St. Paul and Pacific is in practically little better condition. I am informed it has been in very deep water, and is quite unequal to undertake any new obligation. The Government, therefore, were reluctantly compelled to stop any further work on the Pembina Branch, because everybody must know it was perfectly useless to build a road to the boundary line. The Kitson monopoly would not have been defeated, and therefore it would have been spending money for nothing. That is the reason why we were so anxious to make arrangements with the Minnesota Company for completing the building of the extension on the southern side of the boundary. Some four or five months ago, a number of gentlemen, (I do not know the details, and, therefore, I can only speak on this branch of the subject in the most general way) negotiated with the bondholders for the extension of the line, but, with this proviso, that they should make arrangements with the Government of Canada for the exclusive connection with the Pembina Branch. They informed the Government of Canada, unless we made such an arrangement with them, they would not venture to extend the line to the boundary, because, unless they were sure of the traffic on the Pembina Branch for 21 years, they would not be justified in building the line to the Canadian frontier. The Government felt it would be idle to submit a proposition of that sort to Parliament; that it would be hopeless to induce the people of this country to believe that the road should be locked up for 21 years. There was a feeling that it might seriously detract from the future traffic of the Pacific Railway, between Lake Superior and the Red River. It was with great reluctance that proposition had to be abandoned.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER—What is the number of miles to be built in Minnesota?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I believe twenty-nine.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER—I understood it was upwards of seventy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not sure, but I think it is 105 miles from Glyndon, where the St. Paul & Pacific crosses the Northern Pacific, and it is extended a considerable distance north of that. The Government had a good deal of correspondence, and stated they would be willing to entertain a proposition to give the company either a lease or running arrangements for a period of ten years. The company reluctantly consented to entertain that proposition. The lease or the running arrangements would be immaterial to us, except in this particular—giving the lease would relieve the Government from any responsibility, consequent upon rolling-stock and other details. If running arrangements only were made, the Government necessarily would have to furnish locomotives and other rolling stock, depot grounds, &c. There was that distinction between the two propositions. It was believed, and no doubt correctly, that a private company could manage such matters more economically than a Government, and therefore it was desirable that the lease should be effected with the company, and that they should take the entire management of the road and run it. As to their putting up rates on the northern end of it, that would be quite impossible; because the Governor-in-Council, under our law, can control those rates, and prevent them charging anything exorbitant or extravagant. But the Government considered it was their duty to provide further, and they have made provision to regulate the prices so that they would not be excessive to the Northern Pacific. Of course the idea suggested itself, as has been very properly observed by one or two gentlemen in this House, that the company is tempted to go into this arrangement, partly with the hopes of getting the Manitoba traffic. There is no traffic except that, and they are driving the best bargain they can to secure it. Hon. gentlemen know we cannot have the all-rail route communication from Lake Superior in a shorter period than four or five years, and therefore it would seem an injustice that the people of Manitoba should be debarred of this opportunity of having railway communication for a long period. Then it must be remembered that our present route through Canadian territory, even when completed, will only be a summer route. And we must make provision for having access to the North-West in the winter. Therefore, it is the more necessary that some arrangements should be made with one of the Minnesota railway companies; and this company is the only one that can come forward and make a proposition. There has been imported into this discussion—because no discussion takes place on the Pacific Railway, that the Government does not get a rap for some blunder—the charge that a very great expenditure has been incurred, because the Government commenced to build the railroad at both ends. It so happens in that particular country, the centre of the road is totally inaccessible, and the Government thought (although they do not get credit for it) that the building of the road would be largely facilitated if they commenced at both ends simultaneously, and worked towards the middle. In that way different contractors were enabled to go on at the same time. The Intercolonial Railway was commenced to be surveyed in 1864. The country through which it passes was inhabited, with, perhaps, the exception of a gap of 100 miles in the centre, and its route was known. Still, though it was commenced in 1864, it was not opened until 1876.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—The surveys were commenced in 1869.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I still hold to what I have stated.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—If the hon. gentleman wants to go back to the first surveys, they were commenced in 1849.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not going back so far as that. If we put the construction of this link between the two ends of the section, between Thunder Bay and the Red River, at five years, we will even then have built the road, in that inhospitable country, with all the embarrassments attending it, in less time than the Intercolonial Railway was built. And if the remaining part costs no more—and I believe it will cost considerably less—we will have built it for, at least, $10,000 a mile less than the Intercolonial Railway cost.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman analyses the present contracts he will find I am borne out.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The same kind of road?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I grant you it has not the iron or stone structures that you find on the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But the expense of adding them will be considerably diminished if they are built after the road is completed, for it will be easy to get materials in without having to pay $18 or $20 a ton, as we have now to pay for carrying rails. Hon. gentlemen who look at this question ought to place themselves in the position of the Government, and to consider the extraordinary character of the country, and all the difficulties that had to be dealt with—a country entirely new, a country that, ten years ago, no man in Canada could have had the most remote idea of—a country which was known only to Indians and trappers. This Government is blamed and found fault with for every little detail in connection with that work. I say it advisedly, that it will be built for $10,000 a mile less than the Intercolonial Railway cost the country, and that the addition of the iron and stone will not make that difference. If we have lost one million of dollars on the steel rails, we have gained five millions of dollars in the construction of the works.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has not been all loss. Gentlemen ought to consider that if the price of material has fallen so has the price of labor; and contracts given out by this Administration, if they had been signed five years before, I am within the mark in saying, would have cost five millions of dollars more than they do now. It is not all national loss to this country. There have been some compensating advantages in that particular direction. I think hon. gentlemen, in discussing this question of the Pacific Railway, ought to recollect the facts in connection with the building of the Union Pacific and the Northern Pacific. The Northern Pacific, with all the advantages it had, running from Duluth, a large city with a great trade, in 14 years has only built 555 miles of its 2,000 odd miles to carry it to the Pacific Ocean, although it had an enormous land grant. If we compare their debt with the cost of our road it would be found that they have paid double what we are paying. Their debt is some $33,000,000, and practically the Company went into a state of collapse, and a receiver was appointed, and they were not able to go on, even with all the advantages they possessed.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is all right now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is in the hands of the bondholders. It was sold under a foreclosure suit, and bought in by the bondholders, and I suppose the stock has been pretty well watered. I desire here to correct a statement that has been made very frequently of late, in reference to the policy of the Government. It has been assumed, because the Government were anxious to push on this work before the time came for public competition, that we ultimately intended to construct it as a public work. I have explained already that we have no such intention. We felt from the experience gathered in 1872 and 1873, and from the experience gathered in other countries, it was perfectly hopeless for the Government to expect to get a company to build that line until something was known of the country through which it was to be constructed. I deny that Sir Hugh Allan was defeated by any action on the part of those who are now in power. Sir Hugh Allan, and those who went with him to England had every opportunity in the London market to float their scheme. They had the support of the Finance Minister of the day, and his alliances in the City of London, and they came back perfectly satisfied it was hopeless to float any such scheme. When they did so, the Government of this country allowed them to withdraw the $1,000,000 deposit they had made. This Government felt convinced that it was perfectly futile for this Administration to have launched another scheme, after that experience. We would have been accused of trifling with the subject, we would have been laughed at and ridiculed, we would have been told that we failed to learn by experience, and that we simply desired to defeat the construction of the road. Knowing the irritation in British Columbia was growing, and moved by the taunts in this Parliament from the Opposition—because the feeling in this House in 1874 and 1875 was, that we were not going on fast enough with the road—we made every exertion to find the best route between Lake Superior and the Pacific Coast; and we did everything by the same officers that had been employed by the late Administration. The Government had no reason to find fault with them or to doubt their integrity or capacity.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

They had to be guided largely by them, as any administration would have to be guided by its officers in deciding such questions. We acted only under the advice of those who had visited the route, and could speak authoritatively from personal observation, and from a professional stand-point. It is an easy matter for those who are not experts to criticise and condemn. The material is furnished the moment you get a report. Any ingenious mind can point out where mistakes and blunders were made by officers of the Government, if they have been made. I deny they have been made in this case. I say, therefore, the Government, acting under what they believed was the feeling of the people of this country, that the route should be completed at the earliest possible date to the Pacific Coast consistent with our means, as soon as they felt it was judicious and prudent to decide upon the adoption of a route recommended by the engineers, put those portions under contract between Lake Superior and the Red River; but always with the understanding which has been explained every time this question has come up, that it would ultimately be the policy of the Government—so soon as they could feel certain in so important a matter that the best route could be ascertained—to call for tenders for the completion of the whole line. Those portions under way were to be taken from the contractors, and all contracts that have been given out have been made with this condition, that it is open whenever the Government can get parties either to take the whole line, or to take it in sections, that they may assume the contracts that are at present under way. It would be manifestly improper and unjust to the people of Manitoba, and it would be the best evidence of insincerity on the part of the Government if, up to the present time, they had withheld the work of construction between Lake Superior and Red River. They might fairly have said, until the whole line was located, the road should not be placed under contract.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is not before the Committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been before the House frequently; it was before the House yesterday, and will be again this evening. It has been par excellence the subject under discussion this Session. I desire the House to understand this point—that the reason the Government put those portions under contract was because they did not want to postpone, until too late, the period when they would have an all-rail route from Lake Superior to Red River; and one of the clearest evidences of their sincerity was that they put at once under contract those portions which were accessible. Some gentlemen have urged that we should have commenced at only one end. That would have taken double the time. The interior of that country is totally inaccessible except by the railway.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Would it not have been better to have built it all from one end?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would not have been worked so advantageously. You could not have put two sets of contractors to work. As it is now, you can duplicate your forces.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—We were told you would not go on with the middle section for one or two seasons.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is because we could not get there.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—That was not the excuse given.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Did I ever say that the construction of that road would be postponed later than five years?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—The hon. gentleman did. Certainly, the Premier said in the other House, that a series of years would elapse before it would be constructed. He conveyed the impression that fifteen or twenty years would elapse.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My recollection of the circumstance was that he put it at five years. I say again it will then be completed, notwithstanding the disadvantages under which we labor in building the road through that inhospitable country. I maintain the work can be carried on doubly as fast by beginning at both ends, as it could be if the work were commenced at only one end.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The cost seems to be no consideration.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The cost is not increased, but rather diminished, when you work at both ends. There is simply the increased cost of taking your supplies and material to Manitoba, but against that you have got to consider the number of contractors at work. If you have two or three commencing at one end, they must be in each others way. Unless you have rails laid a certain distance, the contractor of say the second forty miles, has got to carry all his provisions and supplies over the first forty miles, and, therefore, I say the construction at both ends will diminish the cost. That has been the sole prompting motive of the Government in going on with those works. It was because they did not want to be accused of retarding the construction. We would then have an opportunity of saying to the capitalists, "You can take it as a whole, or in sections." I owe the House an apology for having digressed from the subject before the Committee, but I do regret that hon. gentlemen, when they get up, condemn the Government on all occasions. However, I suppose, "out of the fullness of the heart, the mouth speaketh." We have got to consider that within five years—it may be less, but I think five years might be the limit—the all-rail route will be completed between Lake Superior and Red River, but I think it would retard very seriously the progress of Manitoba and the North-West if the inhabitants there were debarred from having communication with the outer world during that long term. They raised an excess of wheat last year over what was required for consumption, and some was exported. I am glad to see the wheat has found its way, not only to New York, but to the other side of the Atlantic. If the growth of cereals is to be increased in that country, the greater will be the necessity for having some outlet for them. This extension of the road to the frontier will give them an outlet, and it will not seriously embarrass the building of the road from Lake Superior to Red River. Our route can successfully compete with any other. It will have advantages in point of grade over the road by St. Paul's or Glyndon, and it will be shorter. There seems to be at least two rival companies, between the frontier and Duluth. Assuming that the export or import trade, as the case may be, of Manitoba, has to pass through Duluth, (and it will probably be the quickest way), our road will still have great advantages over that route, for the reasons I have given, and, inasmuch as there will be but one connection, I do hope, if not for the reasons which I have urged, at least for the constitutional reasons which I have laid before the House, and which, hon. gentlemen will see, if not recognized, would seriously embarrass any Administration in its executive functions, that the amendment will not be pressed. It would necessarily involve the Government being sustained in this House. I should be very proud indeed if this Senate thought proper to confirm the action of the Government; but I do fear, from my experience, apart entirely from the constitutional question, that this amendment, if adopted, would seriously embarrass any arrangements we might have the opportunity of making with this company. The hon. gentleman, who addressed the House so eloquently, and went into this question with such admirable judgment from his own standpoint, said the Government ought to be in a position to explain the details now. The Government are not in possession of the details. In a transaction of this kind, as everyone knows, there are preliminary negotiations—negotiations to ascertain whether it is possible to deal at all—and this Bill merely gives the Government power to deal. We ask Parliament to authorize us, either to make a contract for a lease, or to make running arrangements with that Company, whichever may be most suitable. The Government will take care to make the best arrangements they can for reasonable tariff rates. We shall, of course, in making the arrangements with that company, know what their tariff rates are to St. Paul or Duluth, and no higher charges will be imposed upon goods, either coming from or going to Manitoba, than they impose on goods passing over other parts of their lines. As long as they do not discriminate against us, of course we shall have no cause of complaint, and so long as we get the same tariff arrangements as the people living either along the line of the St. Paul or the Northern Pacific Railways, the people of Manitoba will have no just cause to complain. I trust, therefore, the House will not insist upon this amendment. Of course the Bill would go down to the House of Commons and no doubt would be discussed

Hon. Mr. Scott.

there: probably in view of the policy that prevails in the Imperial Parliament, and in view of its being an innovation in this Legislature it would not be concurred in. I have shown that in contracts of this character it has been quite unusual to ask the ratification of them by the Senate; and if my recollection serves me right—I shall not say it positively—the novelty of having these contracts approved of by the House of Commons was first introduced by the present Administration.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—The charge has been made by the hon. Secretary of State that the members on this side of the House are influenced by party spirit in dealing with Government measures. I for one beg to disclaim that I have been influenced by any such motive, in anything I have done in the performance of my duty as a Senator. I may say further, that when called upon to vote on any measure in which the Government were interested, and which has been opposed by the majority in this House, I have voted with great reluctance. I have always considered myself as an independent member of this House, and I feel called upon to protest against the charge made by the hon. Secretary of State against members on this side of the House. I can make every excuse for the speech of the hon. gentleman on this occasion. I confess he has labored under the disadvantage in conducting the measures of the Government, in not being an old member of the Senate, and in not possessing the same knowledge of parliamentary precedents which distinguishes many of the hon. gentlemen who have opposed him, which has placed him in circumstances for which I can make every allowance, when he defends himself in the able manner he does, on every question that comes before the House. I differ from the Government in their railway policy as, I must say frankly, their policy is one which I could not approve of under any circumstances.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—I entirely disapprove of the water stretches policy.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—I could not approve of the policy of the Government with respect to the Georgian Bay Branch, and I confess I never could understand why the Government purchased such a quantity of steel rails at the time they did, leaving the price out of the question altogether.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They will be all used this year except the British Columbia portion.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—The hon. gentleman told us that two years ago.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—They have not been used on the Pacific Railway. I have not time now to go into the question of the powers and privileges of this House as connected with the amendment of this Bill, but I must say it is undoubtedly one of the powers and privileges which we possess under our Constitution to deal with questions of this kind.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—There can be no doubt at all that the British North America Act gives the Senate the right and privilege to enquire into any measure that may affect the policy of the Government with respect to this railway. There is no doubt that the Senate possesses the right to have the same supervision over any contract which the Government enters into as the House of Commons, and I should be very sorry indeed if we should surrender any of our privileges and establish a precedent, especially when such right is challenged, as it has been, by the Hon. Secretary of State.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—On constitutional grounds, I entirely differ from the Hon. Secretary of State, and on constitutional grounds I say we have a right to have that contract submitted to us for our approval.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—The very authorities which the Hon. Secretary of State read show this—that the reason why those contracts are submitted to the House of Commons is to provide that no more money shall be expended on any contract than was voted by Parliament for that particular object. This question is very different indeed, and, as it is upon constitutional grounds we have a right to exercise the power of supervision, I intend to assert that right by voting for the amendment.

The Committee then divided on the amendment, which was adopted. Contents, 32; non-contents, 21.

The Committee then rose and reported the Bill as amended.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER moved that the report of the Committee be taken into consideration to-morrow, and gave notice that he would at that time again test the sense of the House on the question; if the amendment were maintained he would leave the responsibility of it with the gentlemen opposite

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—I wish to make a few remarks in consequence of what has fallen from the hon. Secretary of State. He seemed to infer that the members of this House were entirely influenced by party principles.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—And that the parties were all united in one way. Now, I beg to say—and this House will bear me out in my statement—that I, as one individual member of this House, have supported the Government in many instances, and have endeavored to do so impartially; but, when I find that almost everything they do is contrary to what I conceive to be the true interests of the country, I am decidedly opposed to their policy, and I think it was utterly uncalled for that a charge should be made against the majority in this House, that they were governed entirely by party feeling in dealing with measures that come before us.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—I care not what Government may be in power, if they bring forward good measures, I am prepared to support them, but otherwise, I cannot do so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I confined my observations to the Government policy with regard to the Pacific Railway; I expressly repeated it several times, and quoted, as evidence of the justice of my conclusions, that up to the present time no one instance had occurred in which the hon. gentlemen opposite had approved of the policy of the Government in this matter.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—I consider there has been nothing but a succession of blunders committed by the Government with regard to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We do not seem to have made one sensible move, according to the views of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — Not one.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—The lamentations of the hon. Secretary of State are very melancholy indeed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There seems to be a very strong current of feeling against the Pacific Railway policy in this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The Government ought then to revise their policy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Will the hon. gentleman tell us what policy will suit him?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I have told the hon. gentleman very often what my policy is.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—The hon. gentlemen on this side are charged with being partizan, and with being influenced entirely by party feeling with respect to the Pacific Railway policy. If we are influenced by partizan feeling, I would like the hon. Secretary of State to explain why it is we are not partizan on any other question?

The motion was agreed to.

STEEL RAILS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. WARK moved :

"That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House a Return showing the date or dates at which the Intercolonial Railway Commissioners contracted for the rails for said Railway; the quantity contracted for; the dates at which they were delivered at ports in the Dominion; the cost per ton at such ports; the dates at which payments for the same were made, and the amounts of such payments respectively; the dates at which the rails were laid; the quantity of rails landed at Dalhousie; the cost of removing them thence to their place of destination; to whom paid and the distance to which they were removed.

"Also a Return of the date or dates at which the Government contracted for the rails for the Pacific Railway; the quantity contracted for; the dates at which they were delivered at ports in the Dominion; the cost per ton at such ports; the dates at which payment for the same were made, and the amounts of such payments respectively; the cost of removing said rails from the port of original delivery to their destination, and the distance to which they were removed; the quantity of said rails already used; the dates at which they were laid; and the date at which the balance is expected to be used, and the place where used.

"Also a Return of the quantity of rails shipped by J. Hawes & Co.; the date at which they were delivered at ports in the Dominion; the cost thereof at said ports, and the date or dates at which the same were paid for, and the amount of such payments respectively."

He said he did not propose to renew the discussion on the steel rails question, but, as a difference of opinion had prevailed as to the manner in which this transaction had been conducted, he thought it would be desirable in the future, in comparing the policy pursued by the present Government with that of their predecessors, to have the return which he moved for, laid before the House in a concise manner, so that hon. gentlemen would have an opportunity hereafter of criticising the transactions of the two Governments.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DEFENCES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

ENQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD made the following enquiry :—

“ Whether there has been any recent correspondence between the Imperial and Dominion Governments on the subject of placing the Province of British Columbia in a state of defence, and whether any steps have been taken with a view to keeping the larger portion of the Pacific squadron in Northern waters ? ”

He said : Although there is no immediate danger, it is not improbable that war may be declared between England and Russia. British Columbia is entirely defenceless ; there is not a single fortification in the Province, so that the vessels of the enemy could come in there and do a great deal of harm, and no timely assistance could be obtained. We are at present dependent upon the British navy for our defence, but, unfortunately for the Province, the interests of the British merchants in South America has been sufficient to keep the Pacific squadron in Southern waters. For a large portion of the year we have only one or two small vessels on our part of the coast ; and in case of an attack by a Russian squadron, they would have enough to do to defend their own station at Esquimalt. Last year there were eight Russian war ships in the Pacific—in the harbour of San Francisco—and last year one or two of them paid a visit to our coast, no doubt reconnoitering our harbours and spying out what defence we had there. Probably the Government have been thinking over it, as I saw in a British paper lately, a statement that there had been some correspondence between the Dominion and British Governments on the subject. If a strong request were forwarded by this Government to the Imperial Government to keep the larger portion of the Pacific squadron on the British Columbia station, that would supply all the protection necessary, and I hope the Government will not lose sight of this matter.

Hon. Mr. Wark.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There has been no correspondence that I could bring down to the House, nor has there been any correspondence on the general subject of the defence of British Columbia, or the necessity for placing it in a position to resist any attack from sea. There has been a confidential correspondence, as representation was made by British Columbia, that a number of Russian war ships had visited their coasts. The British Government was duly informed of it, but on enquiry they were not able to ascertain that there was any foundation for the rumor beyond the fact that a single war vessel had been seen in the waters of British Columbia. The people there became alarmed about a month ago that the Russian fleet were going to bear down upon them ; but it was a good deal like the Indian scare that occurred in the North-West—there was no foundation for it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—Eight Russian war ships visited the harbor of San Francisco last fall.

Hon. Mr. CORNWALL—And those war-ships were in San Francisco harbour at the time this representation was made to the British Government.

THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

On the Order of the Day being called for resuming the adjourned debate on the Hon. Mr. Read's motion :

“ To resolve, That this House regrets that the mode adopted by the Government in relation to the construction of the Pacific Railway involves the expenditure of enormous sums of public money without any corresponding beneficial results.”

Hon. Mr. REESOR said : This question has been so fully discussed I do not propose to occupy much of the time of the House ; but there are a few features of the subject that I think will bear a little more debate. I find that the complaint of the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution, is mainly that the expenditure of money in the construction of the Pacific Railway has not been satisfactory, and he pointed out that the location of the line of railway is not what it ought to be—that so far as the location of it is concerned, it does not accord with his views. He has also attempted to point out that the manner of proceeding with the construction of the line is not one that should be followed in the interests of the country. He contended that that portion of the line lying between Fort William and Selkirk on the Red River should not have been commenced at both ends, and that the general expenditure has been without satisfactory results. I shall first notice the point which refers to the location of the line across the Narrows of Lake Manitoba. That question has been brought up not only during the present Session, but during the last Session of Parliament, and a Committee was appointed to make enquiry with regard to it. Now, I confess that my first impression was that very likely a road could have been found to the south of Lake Manitoba that would have been more satisfactory than the present one; a road that would not only be satisfactory to the people who are now settled in that region of country, but one that would not be so expensive in construction as part of the main line. I have listened very carefully to all the arguments on both sides, and have studied the information elicited before the Committee; I have also made it a point to enquire of the engineers who surveyed the route from Selkirk through to the Rocky Mountains—engineers who had not only passed over the line located across the Narrows of Lake Manitoba, but who happened to be the same parties who had made the survey south of Lake Manitoba, with the view of finding a route in that direction. I have been assured by all those gentlemen, who have a good knowledge of the agricultural resources of that country, that not only would the route be longer if it were to pass south of Lake Manitoba, but the gradients would be far less favourable, and the route would be far more expensive in construction than the located line across the Narrows of Lake Manitoba. Then, leaving out of view the increased length of the southern route and the question of greater expense by that route, I asked the engineers if it would not open up for settlement a much larger area of good land than the route located by the Narrows, or if there would not be a greater proportion of arable land suitable for settlement on the southern line than there is along the located line. They said, by no means, the line across the narrows of Lake Manitoba would bring within the reach of settlement, more good land, and the line west of that point would pass through more good land, taking the whole distance from Selkirk to Fort Pelly, than by the southern route.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Who said that?

Hon. Mr. REESOR—Mr. McCloud for one.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND—I want to ask the hon. gentleman if there are any settlers at present on the located line, and whether he knows there are any on the southern line?

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I admit that the popular expectation was that this railway would have been located not only south of Lake Manitoba, but that it would pass through Fort Garry, and that the line would be continued in that direction until it would reach some point north of Fort Pelly, and then be continued across the continent. That being the anticipation for some few years before the location of the line, no doubt it led to the settlement of a great deal of country in that direction, and I have no doubt there are a great many more settlers along the line, that it was supposed a few years ago would have been chosen, than there are along the route which the Government have adopted.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND—There are no settlers at all on that line.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—It is an entirely new country, but that is no objection to the adoption of the line, as long as there is good land in that region. I found it also reported by the engineers who were working on that route, that they had the opinion of a number of Ontario farmers, who had been engaged in transporting supplies for the engineers, that, so far as they had examined other portions of the Territories, they regarded the country along the located line, as being as favourable for settlement as any they had met; indeed, some of them pronounced it superior, on the ground that they could select a farm of 160 acres on this northern route, of which one hundred would be prairie, and sixty acres woodland. This they considered to be a decided advantage, instead of being compelled to do as they were doing further south, haul their supplies of fuel or timber ten or fifteen miles. Taking into account all these circumstances, a shorter and cheaper route, easier grades, and adaptability for settlement, I think the Government would have acted unwisely, and contrary to the interests of the country, if they had adopted the route south of Lake Manitoba. All this criticism and investigation has simply led to more information being elicited, and the result has been, so far as I can see, to confirm the view that the Government have taken, in their selection of the route. Another point upon which a great deal has been said, and about which, complaints have been made, was the commencing of the construction of the 400 miles between Thunder Bay and Red River, at both ends. It will be remembered, that at the time this work was commenced, a great deal of suffering had been experienced by the settlers in Manitoba in consequence of the failure of their crops for two seasons in succession. It was necessary that the Government should extend aid to many of those settlers, and that argument was urged in favor of the Government taking steps immediately towards the construction of the railway, in order to give work to those who needed assistance. I think it was a wise course, and that arrangement was not objected to at the time by any member of this House, because it afforded a means of living for the settlers in that country without their having to be sustained by gifts from the Government, or other acts of charity, whether sent from the old Provinces or gathered in their own, until the return of more favorable seasons. That was a good reason for the course which the Government adopted.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—What public work does the hon. gentleman speak of?

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I am speaking of what was done on the railway from Winnipeg to Selkirk and the Pembina Branch, and what was done on the line leading from Selkirk to Rat Portage.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—The hon. gentleman has made a mistake. He is speaking of the supplies sent in there some years ago.

Hon. Mr. Reesor.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is perfectly correct. He is speaking of the supplies that had been sent in for the Icelanders, and the work that was done by those people to pay for them.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—If the work had not been undertaken as it was, at both ends, it would have involved the necessity of transporting the whole of the supplies from the eastern end hundreds of miles across to Red River. So, I think, the Government showed their wisdom in commencing at both ends of this portion of the Pacific Railway. Furthermore, as stated yesterday by the hon. Secretary of State, the work could not be carried on as rapidly if all the contractors were placed at one end of the line, as they would be continually interfering with each other, and I think the carrying on of the work as they are doing is far more satisfactory. As far as the progress of the work is concerned, about 200 miles of roadway is likely to be graded during the present season, and ready for having the rails laid down upon it. A portion of the rails have already been laid, and the work will be continued, so that about 112 miles are expected to be completed from Fort William westward to Port Savanne; and another section, about the same distance, from Selkirk eastward during the present year—possibly before September. When those two ends are completed, they will afford facilities for transporting men and supplies into the interior, after which the gap of 180 miles can be constructed more economically, and in a much less time, than it could have been done if the work had been carried on entirely from one end. These are two features of which my hon. friend from Belleville has complained, with regard to the policy of the Government in carrying out this work. He has not said anything as to carelessness, indifference or want of energy on the part of the engineers in making the surveys. He has not complained that several trial surveys should have been made. I think the large staff of engineers who have been employed have worked faithfully, and have done as much as men could do under the circumstances. In making surveys in British Columbia it was a very different thing from making a survey through Quebec or Ontario; a very different thing from running a survey where the Intercolonial Railway is located, because they had to work through a country where there was no settlement at all; and they had, in many instances, to carry their supplies with them from the time they started in the spring of the year until they returned in the fall. It was a very different thing from making a survey even in a sparsely settled country, where supplies could easily be obtained from settlers or from distant villages. It required for an ordinary staff not less than fifty or sixty horses or mules to carry their provisions, and as many extra hands to take charge of them. All these things cost money, and involved a great deal of privation and labor in the surveys on both sides of the Rocky Mountains. These are some of the disadvantages which the surveyors had to contend with, yet we have not heard anything said against them in respect to the manner in which they performed their duty. The surveys have cost a great deal of money, but I consider it is far better that they should have been made, and that the Government should have ascertained, not only the shortest but the cheapest route. Under these circumstances, I presume my hon. friend who moved this resolution, does not expect we ought to have a cash return so soon upon the investment. He must have had reference merely to the location of the road, and the manner in which the money has been expended.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—It all ended in rust.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—I think, under those circumstances, that the Government should be commended for their exertions in selecting the best route, as there was nothing definitely known with regard to the whole distance when the work was undertaken. If this road is to be built at all, the surveys should be efficiently made, so that after the money has been expended in the construction of the line, it will not subsequently be found that a better route exists than the one which has been adopted. In regard to the purchase and conveyance of the steel rails so much has been said that I do not propose to add anything to it. I will simply say that the explanation of my hon. friend from Hamilton, as a business man who understands such matters, and the interpretation that he has given of the various tenders made to the Government is very reasonable. The Government certainly would not have been justified in accepting a tender that did not specify in it all the conditions under which the party tendering was willing to take the contract. All the tenders sent in did not contain the necessary specifications, and I think the Government were wise in not accepting any which did not include them, as they would have left themselves open to disputes, law suits, and demands for extras that might have involved the country in a great deal of unnecessary expense. Nothing has occurred to shake my confidence in the slightest degree in the integrity of the head of the Department of Public Works in connection with this matter. So far as the purchase of the steel rails is concerned, any one might fall into an error of that kind. Perhaps they were purchased a year too soon; perhaps they were not. I met, the other day, a gentleman who purchased a house in this city two years ago. He told me if he had purchased it this year instead, he could have got it for $2,000 less. It is not given to all of us to see in advance those different fluctuations in the markets, especially during a period of depression. I remember, it was not very many years ago, when rails were purchased for the Toronto and Nipissing Railway, and it was then necessary to give the order for them a considerable time in advance of their being required, in order to get the rails at the proper time. After that road was completed, and the Credit Valley road and other railways were being discussed, it was said then by Mr. Laidlaw it would be necessary to give the order a year in advance for the rails, because the manufacturers at that time had orders ahead for several months. It is fair to say that the late Government did not hesitate to pay a much larger price for rails when they required them; they paid as high as $85 per ton. A portion of those rails were delivered after the present Government came into power, and they had been purchased not by tender, but without tenders, being called for at all. Then with regard to other purchases, a very great difference was to be seen in the prices paid by the present Government and those that had been paid by their predecessors. In the speech made by the Premier in the village of Clinton, he said :

Hon. Mr. Reesor.

"They (their predecessors) purchased steel springs for the Government railways without tender at twenty-one cents per pound. I bought the same article immediately afterwards for seven and a-half cents per pound."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—There is a very wide difference ; yet these are the same parties who have the assurance to come forward at every public meeting and impeach alike the policy and personal honor of the First Minister of the Crown. I think hon. gentlemen opposite should not pursue the course they do in condemning the policy of the Government ; because all the circumstances go to show that their policy has been a wise and judicious one, and free from the slightest taint of corruption or jobbery. I have nothing to gain or to lose, no matter which party is in power, and I certainly would not sustain this Government, although my sympathy is with the party now occupying the Treasury Benches, if I found them to be guilty of the corruption that is charged against them in connection with the Pacific Railway, or any other public work over which they have charge.

Hon. Mr. WARK—I should say that the hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House on this question, have censured the Government with a degree of severity that is perfectly unwarrantable. When they came into power they found the country pledged to this undertaking ; they found the work already commenced ; the surveying was going on under the direction of the Chief Engineer, and the Government have continued to carry it on under the same management, and with the same staff of officers. If there is anything wrong in the expenditure under this engineering operation, the one Government is as much liable to censure for it as the other. There has not been much said about the Georgian Bay Branch in this debate. It came out in a discussion on a former occasion, that the Georgian Bay Branch was pledged to the people of Quebec by a member of the late Administration, and I think very justly so. I think every one saw that the construction of that portion of the road which goes north of Lake Superior, must be postponed for a great many years ; and if the people of Quebec are to have access to this great western country, it must be through Lake Superior. If the North-West Territories are going to be settled with the rapidity that is anticipated, Montreal and Quebec have a right to as direct communication with the west as the cities of Ontario, in order to send their merchandise through to Manitoba and the North-West, and bring back the products of that region in return. There is nothing unfair in that ; and all those products intended for the Quebec ports must come out by this Georgian Bay Branch. I agree exactly with what the hon. Secretary of State has said with regard to the policy of commencing the construction of the railway at Red River and Lake Superior. I believe the report of Mr. Dawson and others who profess to be familiar with the features of the country, at one time left no doubt on the minds of the Government, that Sturgeon Falls and Rat Portage could be connected by a direct line of railway whenever it was thought desirable to go to the expense of constructing it. That seems to have been the impression, and was what led to the commencement of the Fort Francis Lock. If that plan could have been carried out, the construction of the Fort Francis Lock is all that would have been necessary for a series of years, in connection with the two sections of the railway from Lake Superior to Sturgeon Falls, and from Rat Portage to Red River, to establish communication between the old Provinces and the west. Unfortunately, it was subsequently discovered, that the connection by rail between those two points was impracticable. If it had been practicable the Government would have been free to have gone on at once with the construction of the railway in British Columbia, as it was desirable that something should be done in that Province as quickly as possible. It is now known that in order to connect the two ends of the railway between Port Savanne and Rat Portage, they must expend such a large sum of money, that it would embarrass the finances of the country to proceed with a large expenditure in British Columbia at the same time. One question has come up in this dis cussion which caused me no little surprise; the tenacity with which hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have urged the necessity, almost the absolute necessity, on all occasions now, of accepting the lowest tender in awarding contracts. If any other tender but the lowest is accepted by the Government for any contract, they are charged with corruption and favoritism. What did the late Government enact when they passed the Intercolonial Railway Bill? Here is the language of the 16th section of that Act: "The Commissioners shall accept the tenders of such contractors as shall appear to them to possess sufficient skill, experience and resources." But that discretion is denied to the present Government. They are denied the right to judge whether constructors should possess sufficient skill, experience and resources. Under the authority thus given to the late Railway Commissioners, what course did they pursue, and what course did the late Government pursue in awarding contracts? We hear a great deal about favoritism having been shown to parties who tendered for the transportation of the steel rails, the contract for which was awarded at an advance of 20 cents per ton for 1,200 miles. When the Wellington basin of the Lachine Canal was tendered for, the lowest tender was $381,707, but the late Government let the contract on a higher tender, for $462,284. There was $80,000 difference between the lowest tender and the tender accepted. In section 1 contract, the lowest tender was $498,683, but the Government had accepted a tender for $619,254. There was a difference of $120,000 between the lowest tender and the tender accepted. I might go over a long list of such contracts; I might refer to contracts on the Intercolonial Railway where we would find the fifth, sixth, and sometimes the twelfth tender above the lowest had been accepted. I might go further and show where, in importing their steel rails, they landed them at Dalhousie on the Restigouche, when the same vessel might have gone 16 miles further up the river, and landed them at Campbelltown, for which place they were destined, yet the Government paid two dollars a ton extra for having them carried this 16 miles. Yet the present Government are charged with gross favoritism for giving an advance of 20 cents per ton on a contract for carrying rails 1,200 miles.

Hon. Mr. Reesor.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WARK—Perhaps the hon. gentleman who is now looking at me (Mr. McLellan) and who was one of the Commissioners, will be able to explain why those rails were landed at Dalhousie instead of at Campbelltown, when the same vessel that took them on board in England would have carried them the extra 16 miles up to Campbelltown, for 1s. 3d. more per ton, instead of landing them where the cargo was discharged. I think this ought to shut hon. members' mouths from charging this Government with favoritism. I call the attention of the hon. member from Belleville to these facts in connection with the construction of the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. READ—The Intercolonial Railway is not the question under discussion.

Hon. Mr. WARK—I will inform the hon. gentleman how he can make himself useful in the future in connection with the construction of the Pacific Railway. When the late Commissioners were appointed the Chief Engineer proposed to pay for work done, by quantities—to have the work measured and paid for at a certain and fixed price. The Commissioners objected to this, as they thought a great many of those measurements would have to be made by young engineers, who would be liable to be tampered with by the contractors. I believe that was a very correct conclusion, and I think if the hon. Senator from Belleville would watch in that direction on the Pacific Railway he would find it work there also, if there was not more care taken than there had been on the Intercolonial Railway. Some of the engineers on the Intercolonial Railway were an extravagant lot; I have no doubt of that. I have heard instances of it. I was once connected with an examination of their accounts during a Session of Parliament here. I have known instances of an engineer having hired a team to carry him about ninety miles, and paying fifty dollars for the trip, when he could have gone for five dollars each way by the regular mail conveyance. Hon. gentlemen opposite ought to have corrected abuses of this kind immediately after they had been brought to their notice; but we did not then hear a word from them about extravagant expenditures. The engineers were not altogether strictly honest either in their charges. Their liquor bills, for instance, were paid for under the designation of horse hire.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WARK—I have had the best proof of that. I was very much surprised at the amount charged for horse hire by the engineers in locating a twelve miles section of the Intercolonial Railway. It was more than had been paid by the New Brunswick Government for the same item in locating 112 miles of railway. On one occasion I found that a party of engineers had stopped at a certain hotel over night, and I asked the hotel-keeper if the liquor they used was charged under another name. He opened his book, put his hand on an entry, and said, "This is charged as horse hire, but it is really for liquor." The hon. gentleman from Belleville should look after those matters, and should also look out for bribes that may be offered to engineers by contractors. I remember a friend of mine having read a letter from one of the contractors on the Intercolonial to his partner, in which he said the engineer was pressing him hard for money, and he had to give him a thousand dollars, but it did not appear that either the Government or the commissioners detected one of those frauds until they began to come before the notices of the other House. There it was found on investigation, that a contractor had paid an engineer large sums of money, had made him presents of furniture, and had given him checks at different times—all this came out in evidence. The contractor and the engineer quarreled and they both admitted it. Those are things which require as much to be looked after on the Pacific Railway, and should have been seen to, on the Intercolonial Railway. I was surprised the other day when I heard the hon. gentleman, the late Commissioner opposite, speak in such high terms of the character of that road. I heard a report some time ago, and I fell in with a party who was acquainted with the transaction, that on one of the contracts near where I formerly resided there was a deep ravine which required a very heavy embankment. It was let by the contractor to a sub-contractor, but as it was a very heavy job the sub contractor agreed willingly to give it up again. The contractor came along with a large gang of men and teams one Sunday morning and hauled an immense amount of timber and rubbish into the ravine, until it was near the proper height, then covered it over with earth, and after it was covered in this manner, the engineer came along and took it off the contractor's hands. One would suppose that in travelling over the road, the first thing that ought to have attracted the attention of the Commissioners was the fact that this ravine required a large quantity of material in order to make the embankment, that no cuttings could be seen from which the material could have been taken, and seeing such a large number of fresh cut stumps, they would naturally have concluded where the material for the embankment had come from. I was struck with a short remark in the Engineer's last report, to the following effect :

Hon. Mr. Wark.

"The Intercolonial Railway, in order to serve comparatively insignificant interests, was twisted many miles out of its proper course."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WARK—When Major Robinson surveyed the line between Bathurst and Miramichi, he brought it up the Nipisiguit and the valley of the North-West, where, if I am correctly informed, the gradients were only 25 feet to the mile. The Commissioners in order to meet the views of a member of the late Government, deflected it from that course, and carried it over an elevation of 500 feet to Newcastle, thereby making the grade fifty-two feet to the mile, and there is one grade of this kind three miles and a-half long. The character of the country through which the line was run is thus described by the engineer: "Large tracts of boggy land and swamps are met with, the land is wild, of a poor quality and generally covered with dwarf spruce," and by carrying the road through this dreary region they had to convey ballast forty-five miles to complete it, and then to construct the two expensive bridges over the Miramichi, one of which could have been spared by the other route. Then after crossing the Miramichi, the engineer was required to abandon a line he was surveying through a populous and fertile country direct to Painsic, and to adopt instead the circuitous route through Moncton. Much of the country through which the road was carried was also bogs, swamps and spruce barrens, and here ballast had to be transported fifty-five miles, and a railway seven miles in length built to reach it. The Nova Scotia Commissioner appears to have conceded a good deal to the New Brunswick Commissioner, in order to get his assent to a branch to the Spring Hill Mines, and to get the Grecian Bend put on, that carried it round to the Londonderry iron mines.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—That was located before the Commissioners were appointed.

Hon. Mr. WARK—The hon. gentleman strenuously urged upon the Government that that route should be adopted. There were at that time two lines open for consideration. Mr. Purdy selected the straight line, but the hon. gentleman from Londonderry, and the hon. gentleman from Amherst, advocated the Grecian Bend, and succeeded in lengthening the line four miles, and adding the heaviest gradients between Riviere du Loup and Halifax.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—No, no.

Hon. Mr. WARK—I was forcibly reminded of that fact when the hon. gentleman was so strenuously urging the claims of Halifax as the winter port of the Dominion, and wondered how he was going to get over that heavy grade.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—The grade favors Halifax, as it tends that way.

Hon. Mr. WARK—The gradients on the Grecian Bend, whichever way they run, will always entail heavy wear and tear on the rolling stock that has to pass over it. Now with regard to the charges made against this Government of favoritism in awarding contracts, I would just call the hon. gentleman's attention to the contract for Section No. 5 of the Intercolonial Railway, which has been investigated before a committee of the other House. The lowest tender there was

Hon. Mr. Wark.

$454,000, but the Government accepted the tender above it to the amount of $533,000. This, however, was on the second letting of the contract. In the first letting, Mr. Haycock took the contract for $361,574; he worked a year at it and was paid $48,762, when it was taken off his hands. The Commissioners and the Government had laid down a rule, wherever they could make changes to the advantage of the contractors, that would not degrade the character of the road, they would do so, in consequence of the rise in wages and the contractors not being able to fulfil their contracts. There was no inducement offered to Mr. Haycock to finish his contract, but it was taken off his hands, and new tenders were called for. The lowest tender in that case was $454,000 from J. T. & P. Maguire. They were not supposed, however, to have the necessary skill, experience and resources. The next tender was that of Mr. Peto for $468,000; it was passed over on the same ground. The next tender was H. Macdonald's, for $500,000; it was passed over for the same reason; so was the tender of A. Lepage, for $510,600; the tender of McMillan & Co., for $530,000 was also passed over. Then came the tender of A. Macdonald & Co. for $533,000, who were the first persons the Government considered possessed the "necessary skill, experience, and resources" to fulfil this contract, and their tender was recommended by A. Walsh and A. W. McLelan, the Commissioners who decided this question. What was the result? The tenders were received and decided upon in the month of May. In June, A. Macdonald & Co. discovered that a very material change could be made in the road in favour of the contractors—they had no doubt discovered it before the tendering, but had said nothing about it until their tender had been accepted. It was a singular thing that the engineer had been down there a year and had never made this discovery until just about the same time that the proposition was made that there should be this change in the contract. The result was that the contractors were relieved from the construction of 323,000 yards of earth work, valued at $90,000. But they were required to do some extra rock cutting, which reduced the amount to $83,000. And this $83,000 was allowed to go to them in case there should be a rise in wages at any time, or in case they met with any loss in their contract, although up to that time they had done nothing. In addition to this $83,000 of an advantage that had been given to them, there was the $78,497 of a difference between their tender and the lowest tender, which gave them the advantage in that contract, over the lowest tender, of $161,867. I have no hesitation in saying it is my belief that when Mr. Macdonald went up to treat with the Government, there was an understanding that if he got the contract, and this allowance was made, he would contribute largely to the election fund.

Hon. Mr. READ rose to a point of order, as the question before the House was not the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, but of the Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I hope the hon. gentleman is not in earnest.

Hon. Mr. READ—I am in earnest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it is but just to the Government that this question should be discussed by comparison, and it is only by citing parallel cases that it can be seen whether the course this Government has taken deserves the censure of hon. gentlemen or not.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—I thought he was at Neebing.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—I would like the hon. gentleman to bring all the charges he has in connection with the late Intercolonial Railway Commissioners, and get done with them some time.

Hon. Mr. WARK—Are we ever to get done with the steel rails question?

Hon. Mr. READ—I insist upon my point of order.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The matter under discussion is the alleged improper expenditure of the Government on the Pacific Railway, and it is only by drawing parallel cases as to the course pursued by the late Government in the construction of Public Works of a similar character, that the House can come to a proper conclusion. I know it is disagreeable to the hon. gentlemen opposite to hear those facts, but it is well that the country should be able to judge between the two Governments on their merits.

Hon. Mr. Wark.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I hope the hon. gentleman will not press the question of order whether he be right or not. There is something so illogical in what the hon. Secretary of State has just said, that I should like to hear it discussed. The late Government did what was advantageous to the country in buying rails at a time when the country would benefit by it, and the present Government are to be excused for buying rails at a very heavy loss to the country on that account.

Hon. Mr. WARK—I said, in commencing my remarks, that as the hon. gentleman had made up his mind to keep a very strict watch over the construction of the Pacific Railway, I would point out certain instances in the construction of the Intercolonial which would be a guide to him in his future proceedings. I do not think that is out of order; on the contrary, I think it is very much in the hon. gentleman's favor. I could refer to tenders having been given to members of Parliament which, if done now, would be called jobbery and gross corruption. I dare say the hon. member for Londonderry knows about some of those contracts that were given to members of Parliament at a high rate; perhaps the Government accepted the lowest tender, but, at any rate, those gentlemen were acting at variance with the Independence of Parliament Act. I hope I have not been out of order in my remarks. I hope the hints I have given, and the information I have laid before the House, will be useful to the hon. gentleman opposite who has moved this resolution. My conclusion, after hearing all the arguments that have been advanced, is that the Government have pursued a very straightforward course. When I hear some of the hon. gentlemen opposite charging the Government with incapacity, I wish some of them were in the position the Premier now fills, for six months, and had to discharge the duties of his office: I am satisfied that at the end of that time they would have a much higher opinion of the hon. gentleman who is now at the head of that Department, and a very much more humble opinion of themselves. I believe Mr. Mackenzie to be a man of the strictest integrity, who would not extract a single dollar from the public treasury himself, nor allow anyone else to do so, without giving the country full value for it.

Hon. Mr. LELAN—I did not intend to prolong this discussion, but the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat invites me to make some explanations in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. The hon. gentleman, for years, devoted all his time and energies to discover some supposed job on the Intercolonial Railway, and with all his research, and all the labor he has spent on that work, he has not been able to discover more than an extra charge of three dollars for horse hire.

Hon. Mr. WARK—I spent the time in connection with the route of the road, and not in connection with the manner in which the money had been expended. I only referred to the expenditures incidentally.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—The hon. gentleman points to this as a proof of the extravagance that, he alleges, existed on the Intercolonial Railway; and I ask the House to consider what he has brought forward—three dollars for horse hire—in comparison with what we know to exist now, on the Pacific Railway. The Pacific Railway is only in its inception; we have only 48 miles of rails laid, and the House is familiar with all the blunders and extravagance that have been committed already, resulting in the expenditure of millions of dollars, which have produced no results. Now, I say, let us start fairly. If you invite the attention of the hon. member from Belleville to the Intercolonial Railway for comparisons, it must be remembered that the road is finished; and we should wait until the Pacific Railway is completed, so that we can stand upon equal footing, and then see how the two works will compare. The hon. gentleman says that the Intercolonial Railway was twisted out of its proper course to serve some unimportant interest. I ask the attention of the hon. gentleman to the report of the Chief Commissioner, respecting the main location of the Baie de Chaleur section. Mr. Fleming says:—

“The Chief Engineer, after examining the arguments advanced in favor of each route, placed on record his opinion, that, beyond a doubt, the line by the Bay Chaleur was the route to be adopted.

Hon. Mr. Wark.

“The Imperial authorities never lost sight of the military element which the railway should retain. On several occasions, they clearly intimated that a northern, or Bay Chaleur route, was one which they preferred. Not only Major Robinson, but other military authorities, pointed out the northern route as the proper location.”

That route was favored also by the British Government. The hon. gentleman also called the attention of the House to the location of the road at Londonderry, and I think the Hon. Secretary of State referred to that deflection the other day under the name of “The Geocian Bend,” and said it was so deflected in order to serve small private interests. It is true, as I stated a few moments ago, that that location was made before the appointment of the Commissioners. There was a large iron interest at Londonderry which the inhabitants of that district and parties who were connected with it outside were desirous should be served by the location of the railway. The Engineer-in-Chief desired to take a route which would not serve that interest. A compromise was effected, and the road was located so as to bring it nearer the iron interest, and what has been the result? Why, one of the largest undertakings in this Dominion has been brought into existence, and is now in active operation, in consequence of the deflection of the railway there.

Hon. Mr. READ—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—Let me invite the attention of the House to the result, as shown on the operations on the road itself. I refer to the last report of the Manager, who says:—

“The large iron works in Londonderry, N.S., have been brought into operation, and are giving a large and rapidly increasing traffic to the railway. Pig and merchant bar iron, as well as car wheels, are now being shipped over the railway in considerable quantities to all parts of Canada. Londonderry, which at the opening of the line was completely in the woods, is now, with the exception of the termini, the largest receiving and shipping station on the Intercolonial.”

Hon. Mr. WARK—How much longer than three miles would a branch have had to be made to serve that interest if the main line had been located direct?

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—The existence of the iron works depended wholly on the location. For years they had been struggling for existence, and were about to be abandoned in despair. The location of the railway led to the subscription of a large capital in Britain, and an extension of the works, with the result shown in the official report. The hon. gentleman, however, should not complain. No man in the country was more urgent to have the road diverted from the course laid down by the engineer than the hon. gentleman from Kent himself. He knows that to have taken it where he wished to locate it, it would have cost over $100,000 additional and increased the mileage.

Hon. Mr. WARK—The Engineer-in-Chief had the road explored through the heart of the county, but when the Commissioners were appointed they ordered him to take it through the swamps where it has been located.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—Many explorations were made, and, after comparison, the location was made upon the recommendation of the Engineer-in-Chief, and in that recommendation the Commissioners coincided. With respect to the landing of the rails, the course the Commissioners took was simply this—after they had the route located, and the contracts let, and the time fixed for them to be completed, they found they would require rails for the entire structure. The question whether they should have iron or steel rails was then taken into consideration, and steel rails were adopted. At that time there were comparatively few steel rails in use, but the Commissioners, judging by the results that had been obtained from what were in use on other railways, and by the testimony they had received from those interested in such roads, came to the conclusion that steel rails were the most economical, and would come into general use throughout the railway world, and they decided the sooner they contracted for the supply they required, the better bargain they would be able to make for the country. They therefore published advertisements in England, and all countries where steel rails were manufactured—not in Montreal alone—asking for tenders for the necessary quantity to be delivered at such times as they should indicate at certain points along the line. Tenders were received from the manufacturers of steel rails, not from middlemen, as in the case of the recent purchase, offering to deliver them at certain points along the route where there was deep water, and Dalhousie was one of the points named. The hon. gentleman from Kent says they could have been delivered by any vessel sixteen miles further up the river, but he must be aware that the draught of water at Campbelltown is much less and is not so well known to English shippers, and in tendering for the transport of the rails, very much cheaper rates were obtained for delivering them at Dalhousie, a port that was well known, than to have required them to be delivered at a port that shipmasters were not acquainted with, and had a draught of water only sufficient for comparatively small vessels. The hon. gentleman from Markham seemed to think that our complaint is confined to the location of the Pacific line, and not to the mode of construction. The resolution of the hon. gentleman from Belleville, is that there has been a large amount of the public money expended for which there has been no corresponding benefit to the country. If hon. gentlemen will turn their attention to this, they will see that the sum already paid out, $9,490,743; the amount to complete the sections under contract, and Fort Francis, $3,900,000, and the subsidy to the Canada Central extension, $1,440,000, all amount to nearly fifty million dollars. One half the entire sum proposed to be paid by the late Government for the construction of the whole work is gone or pledged, and no real practical advantage obtained beyond exploratory surveys. We have piles of decaying rails, and two pieces of railway, but separated 185 miles, and absolutely useless unless connected and made all-rail. This is what we complain of, that after this enormous expenditure we have no better means of direct intercourse with our great North-West than before a dollar had been expended. Repeatedly we have been told by the Government that they have gone as far as the resources of the country will permit, and that they do not propose to build the 185 miles to connect the two pieces now under construction but useless until connected. Last year when it was argued here that the construction of the two ends was useless until the connecting link is built, the hon. Secretary of State said :

Hon. Mr. McLelan:

"The argument of the hon. gentleman who has last spoken, was because the country could not build more than a part, the whole should be abandoned. He had understood the sentiment of those who favored this road, was that the Government should do something to show that they were in earnest. Hon. gentlemen might say what was the use to go on with this work without the intermediate link. But we must creep before we can walk, and the Government were going on with the work as fast as they could. Good as our credit is in the English market, if we were to put all our public works under contract at once, we should fail to convince the English capitalists that it was a wise course."

On the following page he is reported as having said :

"The hon. mover of the motion seemed to convey the idea that the Government proposed to construct this railway as a public work. The Government did not propose any such idea.

"Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—What do they propose ?

"Hon. Mr. SCOTT — The Government had announced that as soon as the surveys were completed and the profiles prepared, they would call for tenders. It was the intention of the Government, when a company was found who would undertake the work, that they should take over the portions already built at a price to be agreed upon."

And later in the same debate he repeated the determination of the Government in these words :

"It is not the intention of the Government to go on with it as a public work, as hon gentlemen seem to imagine."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is what I said yesterday.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—That is what the hon. member on behalf of his Government repeatedly says, and that is just what we complain of, that all our means are gone, and no connection made or likely to be made, to enable our people to get into the prairie country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What I said, was that it was proposed to give the contract to a company as soon as one could be found to take it.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—What the hon. gentleman has repeatedly told us is that they are not able to go on with the connection as a Government work.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McLelan,

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—But at the same time you are expending nearly $15,000,000 and not reaching a practical result; you are not giving us direct communication with our western territory on the plea of poverty, and yet, in the papers submitted yesterday, you propose to pay the Canada Central $1,440,000 for an extension of that line, a work important in itself but of secondary interest to the connecting link with the North-West. I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me, and the hon. Premier not long ago himself said that, it is indispensable to the building of the Pacific Railway that a large population should be settled in the North-West, but what facilities, or inducements have the Government provided to induce immigrants to go in ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Pembina Branch is one of them.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—Then I say that is all you have for the expenditure of $15,000,000, towards getting emigrants into the North-West, and even that is an indirect route through a foreign territory.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Are we not building and completing two sections this side of Red River ?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—What is the use of that ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hon. gentlemen will understand that it is not proposed to leave that central link uncompleted. I placed the date for the completion of the all-rail route at five years. It could not have been gone on with until the two ends of the road were completed, and when that is done it will be put under contract under the terms of the Railway Act.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—I understand the hon. gentleman in this way. When the Government have completed the two ends of the road now under contract, they are going to seek in the markets of the world for a company to undertake the building of the rest of the Pacific Railway and take off their hands what has been constructed, charging the company with the cost.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Or build it in sections.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—The House will consider the position the Government are in. They have entered upon engage ments for the expenditure of $15,000,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is nothing like that.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—Including the Canada Central extension, you have engagements that will involve the expenditure of very nearly $15,000,000, and all you have to facilitate the settlement of the North-West is the Pembina Branch, costing completed a little over half a million. Having expended so much money, and having so little to show for it, the Government have made it an impossibility for any company to be found to tender for the completion of the Pacific Railway. The hon. Secretary of State himself has stated, and his friends on that side of the House have repeated it, that the scheme of the late Government to induce a company to undertake the whole Pacific Railway for $30,000,000 cash, and 50,000,000 acres of land, was an impossibility. Now, I ask the House to consider this: if it was difficult then to get a company to undertake that work, is it not now impossible to have it done? The proposition of the late Government was that the company should take the contract, and the $30,000,000 should include surveying and everything. Now, if you were to ask a company to take this road off their hands, and this $15,000,000 expended was to be considered part of the subsidy, it would be impossible to find any company that would undertake it, as the Government have shown to the world the very discouraging fact that they have expended $15,000,000 without result. What we claim is this, that, as the Premier stated last year, having that North-West country and its countless acres of prairie land available for settlement, the course of the Government, in the location and construction of the road, is greatly to be condemned. So far as we can judge, and so far as the testimony of the members from Manitoba goes, the road has been located away from the settlements and far north of the fertile lands, in such a way as to discourage settlers from going in there. The first duty of the Government was to have run the railway through the most fertile lands in order to promote settlement. The disposition of the Canadian people is to go west and settle on prairies. Before we had any communication with our own North-West territory, our people emigrated across the borders and settled on prairie lands in the Western States. The last census of that country shows that 493,000 persons born in Canada had crossed the borders, and of them were born 960,000, making, in all, 1,453,000 Canadians and their descendants who have taken up their residence in the United States. When we acquired the North-West territory, and possessed countless thousands of acres of this prairie land of our own, it was the duty of the Government, at the earliest possible day, to have afforded every facility and inducement to immigrants to have gone in and settled upon those lands, and, with their assistance, we would have been enabled to construct our railway across this fertile tract to the Rocky Mountains, and finally to the Pacific Ocean. Taking the amount paid for the grading of the Pembina Branch, $3,900 a mile, if hon. gentlemen will add to this a fair estimate for rails, ties, ballast, and a reasonable amount for rolling stock, it will only run up the cost of constructing a railway through that prairie land to from $10,000 to $12,000 per mile.

Hon. Mr. McLelan.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—Had the $15,000,000 that has been, apart from surveys, fruitlessly expended, been laid out in constructing the road through the prairie country, it would have built 1,000 miles of railway, and as fast as the rails were laid, the prairie land would have been settled upon by an industrious population from the Red River across to the Rocky Mountains.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would have thrown the whole trade of that country to the United States.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—Even that would have been better than to have exhausted all our means and then not be able to reach the fertile territory. The Government are exhausting the means of the country on such works as the Canada Central extension, the Kaministiquia Terminus, the Fort Francis Lock, the two railways into the wilderness, and such undertakings that do not tend in the least to facilitate communication with the North-West. I contend it would have been better to have settled the North-West first, even supposing for a time the trade should have gone to the United States, than to have thrown away the people's money upon those works that can be of no value until the North-West has been settled. Look at the result that has followed the building of railways on the prairies of the Western States! Take the State of Illinois as an example. It was admitted into the Union in 1818. In 1820 it had a population of only 55,000; in 1870 that population had run up to 1,538,400. How was this brought about? It was simply by the laying down of railways over that prairie country. There are now 7,109 miles of railways in operation in the State of Illinois. The building of those railways attracted population, and among them 33,543 Canadians, and there were born of those Canadian parents 69,000. So that in 1870 there were living in the State of Illinois 102,994 Canadians and their descendants, attracted there by the prairie lands and the construction of railways. In 1875 the returns showed that those 7,109 miles of railway were yielding, after working expenses, $2,818 per mile, or $8.89 for each inhabitant. The State of Minnesota was admitted to the Union in 1858. It had a population in 1860 of 63,000; in 1870 the population had increased to 439,000, and in 1875 to 659,539, with nearly as large a proportion of Canadian born as Illinois. In Michigan the proportion is larger. Wisconsin, Iowa and all the Western States have large numbers of our people, who have been drawn away by the attractions of the prairie farms and railway facilities to send the products thereof to market. We have richer lands but no means of access to them sufficient to attract the emigrant. We are spending enormous sums on immigration, paying the expenses of persons to this country and then see them pass over the borders. If the Government would turn their attention to making all-railway connection with our prairies, even if through the United States for a time, and lay down railways over the fertile lands there, we should need no immigration agents abroad. In the last four years the Government has spent on immigrants over one million dollars, exclusive of quarantine, and have secured comparatively but a handful of permanent settlers. Had they taken this money, with what they have wasted on Fort Francis Lock, Kaministiquia terminus, Georgian Bay Branch and steel rails, it would have completed the Pembina Branch, given all-rail communication with Winnipeg and built two to three hundred miles of railway over the prairie, and brought to us permanently ten times the number that have been brought temporarily, and what is of infinitely more consequence, kept our own people who will move west on our own soil. We are about to complete the Pembina Branch, but to stop there. The Government having, as they state, exhausted their means, are unable to build westward and make the fertile lands available, but at the same time they inform us that they are giving nearly a million and a half dollars to extend the Canada Central. That extension may be important at some future time, but it can only be secondary to the opening of the great West.

Hon. Mr. WARK--I wish, with the permission of the House, to make a short explanation. The hon. gentleman stated that I used my utmost efforts to get a certain portion of this railway constructed out of the route that was recommended by the engineer. The engineer was surveying the railway on a route where I wanted it, through a fertile country and a dense population, where there were numerous mills and other establishments, which would have given a great deal of way traffic for the road. The engineer, when the Commission was appointed, was ordered to see if he could not find a route from Newcastle to Moncton. He had no intention of carrying the route to Moncton, because that would have been away from the population. It was long after the engineer had laid down a common-sense route for the road, that he was ordered to survey a different one. And when he made up the report, he said he had no access to the census.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN--The hon. gentleman is speaking now of one of the subordinates, not the chief.

Hon. Mr. WARK--I am speaking of one of the subordinates; and the chief engineer took the precaution, in handing over the report of his subordinate, to let the Commissioners deal with it. His plan had been departed from, and he handed it over without assuming any responsibility, and without saying anything that could be called a recommendation of it.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—My hon. friend is under this mistake: he is taking the acts of a subordinate for the acts of the chief. The chief sent one of his subordinates to survey the line the hon. gentleman speaks of, and when the report came in, there was not a doubt on the mind of the chief engineer that the route that was afterwards adopted, was a better and cheaper one than the other.

Hon. Mr. WARK—The chief would never have thought it was a better route.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—How does the hon. gentleman know what the chief engineer thought?

Hon. Mr. WARK—I know he looked at the population on the route.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I submit this is not an explanation, it is a speech.

Hon. Mr. WARK—With regard to the Londonderry bend, I never thought that Londonderry mine should not be favored. But I do think the direct line should not have been departed from. The Government might have given them every facility to reach their property without making this bend in the line. They might have aided them in adding a few miles to the length of their branch, and built the main line in its proper direction, and the amount of traffic would have been the same, but with much more advantage to the public.

Hon. Mr. READ—As there is no one else desirous of speaking on this subject, I claim the indulgence of the House while I answer a few remarks which have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. It is in no spirit of hostility to the Government that I have introduced this resolution, but because the public mind is exceedingly exercised about the great undertaking in which we have embarked, and because there is an impression in the country that when we have such small results for the enormous outlay to the present time, it will eventually swamp us. I believe if the enterprise is not entrusted to better hands than the present Government, it will involve us in bankruptcy. When we find $10,000,000 already gone, a considerable portion of which has not been expended according to the Acts of

Hon. Mr. Wark.

Parliament relating to the Pacific Railway, we may well feel anxious about the future. I ask whether the Government have complied with the terms of the 12th clause of the Act which they placed on the Statute Book in 1874? It is as follows:

“In case it shall be found by the Governor in Council more advantageous to construct the said railway, or any portion thereof, as a public work of the Dominion of Canada, the construction thereof shall be let out by contracts offered to public competition.”

As I stated in my remarks, when moving this resolution, half a million of dollars has been expended by the Government without tender, and the hon. Secretary of State has not attempted to disprove that statement. The amount paid, in one instance, was $316,515, and in another, $206,171. The hon. Secretary of State did not attempt to deny that the steel rails for British Columbia had been purchased without competition, though there is evidence in the published return, that a number of makers of rails were anxious for an opportunity to compete for supplying them. In the transportation of rails from Duluth to Red River, $15 per ton, of 2,000 pounds, was paid, when the Government had an offer from a firm in Hamilton, to do the work for $13.50 per ton of 2,240 pounds. In that one instance, the country lost $50,000, at least, by the action of the Government. How much more was lost, cannot be known, because the Government did not ask for tenders. Then, in the purchase of rails for British Columbia, after promising firms, that were enquiring whether the Government needed more rails, that if more were required they would call for tenders, they made a direct offer to Cooper, Fairman & Co. to supply 5,000 tons, at £10 10s. per ton, though they had, only two days before, bought a similar quantity from another firm, at £10 per ton. I should like to know what that can be called, if it is not gross favoritism? Then, in freighting those rails, they did not call for tenders any more than in the purchase of them, but a direct offer of two pounds sterling per ton, was made to Cooper, Fairman & Co., and they were enabled to make such arrangements as would be most profitable to themselves. I do not know what the country lost in that transaction, and the Government do not know themselves, because tenders were not invited. It was, to say the least, an unbusiness-like transaction, and in violation of the Act of Parliament which they had placed on the Statute-book. It was indefensible, and neither the Secretary of State, nor any of his supporters, made any reference to it in their speeches. The hon. Secretary of State did attempt to defend the bolts and nuts transaction, suspicious though it was. Although there were tenders ranging from $82.75 upwards, the Government awarded the contract to Cooper, Fairman & Co., at one hundred and one dollars per ton, and the country lost, in that little transaction, $1,364.80. The Secretary of State tried to mislead the House by telling us that Cooper, Fairman & Co. had to pay the duty while the others tendered free of duty. I shall have to read the following letter to show that was not the case, but that the tender of Cooper, Fairman & Co. was the same as the others:—

“MONTREAL, July 29th, 1875.

“DEAR SIR,—We beg as Agents for “The Patent Bolt and Nut Co.,” of Birmingham, England, to supply the Government with the necessary iron fish bolts and nuts to lay 20,000 tons of steel rails on a railway track subject to “Sandberg’s” inspection before leaving the works, to be delivered in bond in Montreal as per prices accepted and mentioned in your letter to us on this subject, dated February 18th, in ($101) one hundred and one dollar portion. These are for the Mersey steel rails.

“We are, dear Sir,

“Your obedient servant.

“COOPER, FAIRMAN & CO.

“To the Honorable,

“The Minister of Public Works,
“Ottawa.”

I think that was a case of gross favoritism. Again, we find that the people who were supplying rails at the lowest price, and who had offered to supply bolts and nuts at $8.00 per ton less than Cooper, Fairman & Co. received for them, were forced to deposit $25,000 security in the hands of Glyn, Mills & Co., before they could get the contract, while none of the other tenderers were required to put up a dollar. That firm supplied 10,000 tons, and were anxious to supply more, but Cooper, Fairman & Co., who supplied 25,000 tons at higher rates, (besides the bolts and nuts,) were not asked to give one dollar as security, so far as we can see by the returns. Is not this circum-

Hon. Mr. Read.

stance most suspicious, when coupled with the fact that Cooper, Fairman & Co., received $104,314.73 more than others had offered to supply the same material and perform the same service for? Something has been said about the transportation of the rails to Duluth and Fort William, and my hon. friend from Hamilton, who was one of the ring, if I may use that word without offence—

Hon. Mr. WARK—I think the hon. gentleman is out of order when he charges a member of this House with being a member of a ring.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—There are a good many rings in the country.

Hon. Mr. WARK—The language is unparliamentary.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—I do not think it is.

Hon. Mr. READ—I did not mean to use the word offensively.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—I have used the same language with respect to bank rings.

Hon. Mr. WARK—The hon. gentleman did not refer to any member of the Senate particularly.

Hon. Mr. READ—I shall now read Mr. Samuel’s tender. It is as follows:

MONTREAL, 16th April, 1875.

“SIR,—I beg to tender for the forwarding of the steel rails from Montreal, to Duluth or Fort William, required for the Pacific Railway for the season of 1875, as advertised for by you in the Montreal Herald, for the quantity named in the said advertisement, say five thousand (5,000) tons at the rate of six dollars ($6 00) per ton of 2,240 lbs

The rails to be delivered to me not later than 10th September next, at Montreal, free of harbor dues.

The Department to take delivery of the rails at the port of destination, and grant a receipt for the same, and the freight to be paid on the production of the said receipt.

“I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Signed), E. SAMUEL,
P. O. Box, 483½.

To the Honorable,
The Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Delivered where? In what part of Montreal? At the canal basin or in the harbor?

Hon. Mr. READ—Did the hon. gentleman take the rails from the ship?

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Jacques & Co, were paid for taking them.

Hon. Mr. READ—Another party was paid for that service; and the country paid $11,000 that year for removing those rails from Montreal, which is an additional charge. The hon. gentleman has attempted to mislead the House. I am really surprised at him talking to us as if we were children.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Explain Samuel's tender!

Hon. Mr. READ—It explains itself. The extra charges for removing the rails from the ship to the canal basin and wharfage amount to $1 per ton, and bring the cost of transportation up to $7.20 per ton. The same service could have been performed for $4.16 per ton if the offer of Perkins, Livingston & Post had been accepted. The loss to the country is $3.04 per ton.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—What tender are you alluding to?

Hon. Mr. READ—The tender of the party who put up the $25,000 security.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—What about the consignees unloading? Why don't you bring that out?

Hon. Mr. READ—Why don't you give me time to bring it out? The hon. gentleman knows very well; he has been inside. He knows Cooper, Fairman & Co. got their profit, and he got $5 per ton for carrying the rails, though the following year, when it was offered to public tender, he did the work for $4.50.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The difference to the country is $20,400.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Explain Samuel's letter!

Hon. Mr. READ—Mr. Samuel refers to the advertisement in the Montreal Heralt, which says he has to pay the insurance. It is childish to talk to men who have been in business all their lives, as most of us in this House have been, as though we knew nothing of such matters.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Why didn't Mr. Samuel say he would pay the insurance?

Hon. Mr. READ—I know it is a sore point, because the conduct of the Government is indefensible, and the hon. gentleman knows it, but, while the country lost the money the hon. gentleman and his friends got it. I have no complaint to make against him, but I do complain that the Government did not take the lowest tenders, and that they resorted to a subterfuge to get rid of Mr. Samuel by saying he was not a steamboat owner. They give the contract to Cooper, Fairman & Co., who are not steamboat owners, because they represent a line of steamers. Mr. Samuel occupies the same position, and offers any security that may be required for the proper performance of the work. There is a gentleman in this House who knows Mr. Samuel's opinion of the Government, and though he is a supporter of the Ministry he could let us know what that opinion is.
Hon. Mr. Read.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—We should be glad to hear it.

Hon. Mr. READ—Besides the tender of Perkins, Livingston & Post, at $4.16, including insurance, there was a tender from Cox & Green at $5. There is also the following letter at page 50 of the return:—

“MONTREAL, 2nd March, 1875.

„DEAR SIR,—In the matter of rails arriving at Montreal during the summer of 1875, it will be necessary for the Government to have some reliable party to receive and check same from vessels; also to make arrangements for freights and insurance to Western ports. There will probably be some handling, and possibly cartage on part, and Customs entries to pass at Montreal. We would propose to attend to all this properly and with best of our ability, for say one per cent on freight West.

“Or we would undertake to deliver, say 10,000 to 15,000 tons at Duluth Thunder Bay, for five dollars and seventy-five cents gross ton, and to Georgian Bay for fifty cents per ton less, which amounts would cover insurance as well as freight, the Government agreeing to pay any and all charges for handling, cartage, harbor dues, &c., should there be any against said rails. Good substantial wharfs to be provided by the Government at the places of destination, with sufficient men to take delivery, and pile and properly check and give receipt for said rails, &c.

We are, dear sir,
Yours sincerely,

(Signed) COOPER, FAIRMAN & Co.”
Department of Public Works,
Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. READ—Didn't the Government pay $11,000 for removing 11,000 tons of rails from the ship to the canal basin and wharfage? Don't the Public Accounts show it?

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Cooper, Fairman & Co. never got a cent except the $6.20 per ton.

Hon. Mr. READ—I do not say the hon. Senator got it, but it was paid by the Government.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Hon. Mr. READ—No; the Government paid for the handling of the rails in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—The 12,000 tons were carried at $6.20 per ton,

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—There was the $11,000 besides.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. RYAN—They returned it; it was a mistake.

Hon. Mr. READ—The hon. Senator from Hamilton and his friends got $6.20 and the Government paid $1 more.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—They were taken from the ship's side at $6.20, and when the contractors did not take them fast enough, the Harbor Commissioner put on teams and teamed them, and charged them with the amount.

Hon. Mr. READ—The Public Accounts tell a different tale. The Government paid $1 a ton additional for removing them. We never had an explanation of the letter from the same parties offering to do the same work for $5.75, a few days before the contract was given out.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—There was cartage and handling besides.

Hon. Mr. READ—I do not say there was too much paid for the transportation of those rails, but I do say there was gross favoritism shown in giving the contract when there were tenders in from other parties,—one at $4, and another from Cox & Green, at $5.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Cox & Green did not tender.

Hon. Mr. READ—The hon. gentleman will see that they did if he will read.
Hon. Mr. Read.

fer to the following letter of December 17th :

“ 13 & 15 HOSPITAL STREET,
MONTREAL, 17th Dec., 1874.

“ DEAR SIR,—Referring to ours of the 7th instant, we would esteem it a favor if you would kindly reply to enquiries we then made, which were as follows:—1st. The latest date at which it is necessary that the draft of the contract for steel rails should be returned duly signed; 2nd. Particulars of the modifications proposed on Sandberg's Standard.

“ Our reasons for troubling you on these points we explained in ours of the 7th instant. We notice that a portion of the rails purchased by the Government are intended for delivery on Lake Superior, the Government allowing an extra $5 per ton for this purpose. Should you wish us to deliver our 5,000 tons at that point, we should be glad to hear of this wish as soon as possible, to enable us to make the necessary arrangements for forwarding the rails from Montreal to Lake Superior.

“ Apologising for thus troubling you.

“ We are dear Sir,

“ Yours truly,

“ (Signed), COX & GREEN.

“ F. BRAUN, Esq., Secretary
Department of Public Works,
Ottawa.”

I say any business man, acting for himself, would at least have replied to such offers and ascertained who would give him the best value for his money. There are several such letters, and no notice is taken of them by the Department. An attempt has been made to show that the rails were purchased in all cases from the makers. There was no tender in from Naylor, Benson & Co., but it was from Cooper, Fairman & Co., who were given the great advantage to which I have referred. The Secretary of State has said that this House has not given the first note of approval of the Pacific Railway policy of the Government, but I ask any hon. gentleman to point out where approval could be fairly given to any part of that policy. Have they done one thing properly? I fail to find one instance in which they have deserved the approval of this House or of the country. I do not regret having introduced this motion. It has engaged the attention of this House for a long time, I think with profit to the country and advantage to the Government. We have tried to point out the rocks on which they have drifted, with the hope they will avoid them in future. The hon. Senator from New Brunswick called me the “watchman on the tower.” I have no objection to that; I think the Government require watching. We have had nothing but scandals cropping up ever since they came into power. The late Government did not require watching; they discharged their duties in a business like manner. They were capable men. If the present Government have displayed any business capacity in connection with the construction of the Pacific Railway. I have yet to learn where it has been exhibited.

The House divided on the resolution which was adopted by the following vote:—

MANITOBA CONFLICTING LAND CLAIMS BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENTS.

The Order of the Day being read for the consideration of the message from the House of Commons, disagreeing to the amendment made by the Senate to the Bill intituled: “ An Act to amend an Act respecting conflicting claims to lands of occupants in Manitoba.”

Hon. Mr. GIRARD said—It was understood the other day when this question was before the Senate that certain papers would be submitted to this House in time to be of use in this discussion; but they have not been brought down, and I do not desire to delay the matter any longer. I have looked at the reasons given in the other House for disagreeing to this amendment, and I don't think they are sound. In my opinion the question has not been viewed in its true light in that House. They say in the first place :

That is all very true; but in the present instance, it was not absolutely to decide a question with the Crown, but a question which comes under the Manitoba Act. Under that Act parties had acquired certain rights and property in Manitoba, which rights were determined by that law. They were not the lands of the Crown on the 15th July, 1871, but they were the lands of the Hudson's Bay Company, of which the half-breeds and other residents of the Province had taken possession before that time. All that remained for the Government to do was to give patents to those people. The parties whose claims are effected by this amendment, have filed their applications in the Dominion Lands Office in Winnipeg, and their claims have been rejected without any sufficient reason. What appears to me extraordinary is the authority given to the Minister of the Interior to decide all such questions in his office, without consulting anybody. It seems to me it would be only right and proper that such cases should be decided in a court of justice or in some similar way. And it is a great responsibility on the Minister of the Interior to be obliged to discharge the duties of a court of justice. My desire in moving the amendment was to relieve the Government, and especially the Minister of the Interior of this heavy responsibility. The great distance between Manitoba and the seat of Government renders it exceedingly difficult for claimants to furnish evidence of the justice of their claims. If my amendment had been accepted by the Government the facts could have been elicited by the Commissioner on the spot, and it would have been more satisfactory to all parties interested. I have no hesitation in saying, that these land difficulties will cause trouble among the people of Manitoba yet. My desire was not to deprive the Minister of the Interior of the powers he now possesses under the law, but to elicit facts upon which he would be better able to render just decisions. But since he prefers to retain the responsibility given him by the Act, I must submit, and rest satisfied with the consciousness of having done my duty towards the people I represent in this House. There are other objections in the explanation given by the Minister of the Interior, which I certainly cannot understand, and which do not meet the case. When there is a desire to refuse justice it is easy to furnish reasons for it. The second and third reasons are as follow:—

“2nd. That the machinery provided by the
Hon. Mr. Girard.

Dominion Lands Act enables the Minister in charge to make the necessary investigation in the cases provided for by the amendment more expeditiously, efficiently and cheaply than can be done under this amendment, should it become law.

“3rd. That the amendment would prevent the Minister from deciding adversely to the claimant without first making a reference to the Commissioners, although the evidence accompanying the application may conclusively show that the person asking for a patent has no valid claim.

I cannot understand why a decision could not be more expeditiously, efficiently and cheaply rendered upon facts than without them. What has the Minister of the Interior at present to base his decisions upon? He has the application of the claimant, accompanied by an affidavit. That is all. I do not see how evidence can be heard. He may have the advice of some parties in Winnipeg, but that is no proof. Would it not be more satisfactory to give the parties an opportunity to go before the Commissioner and have the evidence taken in writing, and submitted to the Minister here? The decision would, in that case, be satisfactory, but under the existing law the Minister is not in a position to decide in equity the cases submitted to him. I regret that such an arbitrary course is pursued by the Government. The fourth reason given for refusing the amendment is:—

“4th. That the amendment would injuriously impede the administration of Dominion Lands in Manitoba, and delay the allotment of some of the half-breed reservations.”

I cannot concur in that opinion. I believe it would facilitate the administration of the Dominion lands, and, even though it should have the effect of delaying the allotment of half-breed lands, it would be better to do so than to perpetrate an act of injustice. If any one has a good right to property, the Government has no power to deprive him of it, but must give him an opportunity to submit his proof, and, if that proof is good, must give him his title. When the Manitoba Act was passed, the men who would have been affected by this amendment were in possession of lands, and their claims must be preferable to those of the half-breeds. We should begin by doing justice to those who held lands before the transfer, before distributing the reserves among the half-breeds. Sooner or later the Government will be obliged to establish some tribunal in Manitoba, before which claimants can go without expense and have justice done to them. Those people have been in possession of the lands they claim for years; they had been cutting hay and wood upon them: they have been taxed for them, and have always been regarded as the owners. Under the circumstances, I think it should not rest with the Minister of the Interior to decide upon their claims, but with a court of justice, whose decision would be based upon evidence. I have received letters from different parties in the North-West, where the course pursued by the Government is termed an iniquity. That is a strong term, but we cannot see, without a feeling of pain the owners of property exposed to loss through the action of the Government, who should protect them in their rights. I have been influenced by the best motives in coming here so often to advocate the claims of those whom I represent. I am acting upon that impulse now, and I should feel sorry if the Government were to suppose that I moved this amendment with any desire to interfere with their policy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—My only desire is to bring the claims of those people under the notice of the Government, with a view to having them adjusted. I have done my duty, and the responsibility must rest with the Government if any trouble should arise from their policy in the future. I shall not oppose the Bill, because, while it would be much more satisfactory if my amendment were adopted, it will, nevertheless, be of some service to the people of Manitoba. I hope the hon. gentlemen who have given me such generous assistance in this House, will concur in the opinion I have expressed, and my determination not to insist on the amendment.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I am quite sure the sympathies of the House will be with my hon. friend in all that he has said, and that we shall all be glad to bear testimony to the zeal with which he has discharged his duty to that portion of the Dominion he more particularly represents in this Chamber. I am very sorry the

Hon. Mr. Girard.

Government have not acceded to the amendment he proposed to this Bill. I think his views should be received—I dare say they are received—with very considerable deference by the members of the Government; more particularly those in this House, and I regret that they have not been acquiesced in. I am persuaded my hon. friend forms a more accurate and safe judgment of what is best for the people of Manitoba than those who have advised the Government in the course they are now taking. We all know that in the Government there are objections raised to changes. The objections spring, not always from the Minister who happens to be charged with the Department, but from others in the Department, who are wedded to existing laws or usages, and who dread any innovation. Very often they are right, but sometimes they are wrong, as, it seems to me, they are in the case the hon. gentleman has submitted. If it comes from them they are mistaken, and it would have been better to have adopted the suggestion of my hon. friend and amended this law. I think I can make it clear to the House in a very few moments, that that would have been the better course. The original law affecting the lands in Manitoba contained two sub-sections relating to lands in occupancy, and the amendment of my hon. friend referred more particularly to those in occupancy by peaceable possession. This original act set forth, that for the quieting of titles, and assuring the settlers in the Province, in peaceable possession of lands held by them, that for all such lands held by them from the Hudson Bay Company, they should receive letters patent.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That has already been done.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I did not say that it had not been done. It will be observed all these clauses, except the last, turn upon titles derived directly or indirectly from the Hudson Bay Company. The last turns upon lands upon which the Indian title had not been extinguished. That was the state of things, and remained the state of things up to the time my hon. friend proposed his amendment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Was that the amended Act.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—No; it is the original Act of 1870. If the amendment of my hon. friend had been suggested as part of the original Act, I do not think it would have met with any objection, or that anybody would have said it was unfair to consider the cases of those persons who had been in actual peaceable possession, and undisturbed occupancy of lands, although they might not have derived titles from the Hudson Bay Company, and although it was uncertain whether their lands were lands as to which the Indian title had been extinguished or not. The question would have presented itself to the Legislature in this way—if a man is in possession of land, should his title not be examined into, whether he got it from the Hudson Bay Company or not? Now, the Government have said substantially that the title should be respected if the land were cultivated and fenced in, but no consideration should be given to it, and it should not be enquired into whether according to the usages of Manitoba he had a right to the land or not, if the occupancy consisted merely in having it staked out, and in cutting hay upon it. Two cases in which hay has been cut upon such lands have been mentioned by my hon. friend from Manitoba. If that lot had been immediately behind a lot in occupancy, the title would have been good, but if in another place, though the owner may have been cutting hay upon it and his possession may be as clear as though he had been ploughing it, yet his title is not even to be enquired into. We all know that those are possible cases. I know when I was Commissioner of Crown Lands, I enquired for a long time into the occupancy of an Island not far from here, in the Ottawa River. It could not be ploughed because it was rocky, and it could not be occupied because every spring it was flooded by water. There are places in Manitoba occupied for years where the people have cut hay, and the Government say that in such cases they will not even hear evidence as to the title of the claimant. It was to get at that class of cases my hon. friend proposed his amendment. I say if that amendment had been proposed in the original law everybody would have said it was fair. There are several kinds of possession,—ploughing and fencing in, and a possession also entitled to respect, by staking out and by cutting hay. Such claims should be enquired into as well as the others. That should have been enquired into also. It was omitted, and then came an amendment to the first Act, and finally, the Act provided that, before a case went to the Commissioner, the Minister of the Interior should decide whether the occupation was of that character which would justify further enquiry. Now, in practice, the Minister of the Interior says this kind of occupation does not deserve inquiry, and therefore the case goes no further. There may be occupation by a person living there who has been cutting hay for years, and such occupation is entitled to every respect and consideration, and there may be occupation of the speculator who goes there and puts down stakes, and claims by occupancy. I do not defend the second class, but I do defend the first, and competent authority should decide to which class such cases may belong. This is the very point at issue. The explanations from the other branch of the Legislature are:—

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

“1st. That the proposed amendment is at variance with the general scope and title of the Act respecting conflicting claims to lands in Manitoba, under which the question whether any person has a claim against the Crown is not referred to the Commissioners, but only the cases of persons who had acquired some estate or interest in land from the Hudson's Bay Company, or the cases of adverse or conflicting claims between persons under subsections three and four of section thirty-two of the Manitoba Act, and in respect of which it has been previously established, to the satisfaction of the Minister charged with the administration of Dominion Lands, that there has been undisturbed occupancy of the same. The question whether any person has a claim against the Crown is, and should be, determined by the Minister prior to any reference to the Commissioners.”

The Government say they will not accept this amendment, because it was contrary to the scope of the Act. It certainly does run contrary to the scope of the Act, but it is the only way by which parties, in the position described by my hon. friend from Manitoba, can obtain justice. I say it is holding out a stone instead of bread to those men to say they can obtain justice by establishing their claims in Ottawa. As a rule, they are poor, uneducated men living in Manitoba, and how are they to present their claims in Ottawa? Hon. gentlemen who are familiar with the administration of Crown Lands know that to establish occupation involves the examination of a number of witnesses, that there are affidavits to be drawn out, and that a great deal must be done on the spot. I say justice would be much more readily obtained by the adoption of the amendment, notwithstanding the fact that it is contrary to the scope of the Act. Then the second objection is as follows:—

“That the machinery provided by the Dominion Lands Act enables the Minister in charge to make the necessary investigation in the cases provided for by the amendment more expeditiously, efficiently, and cheaply than can be done under this amendment, should it become law.”

I deny that absolutely. I am confident in my own mind the Minister of the Interior cannot make the investigation “more expeditiously, efficiently, and cheaply.” I say it is contrary to our knowledge of business to suppose that a man at this distance from the place where the land is, and where the persons who know all about it reside, can decide such a case “more expeditiously, efficiently, and cheaply” than a man who is on the spot and hears the whole of the case from the persons who know all about it. The third reason is as follows:—

“That the amendment would prevent the Minister from deciding adversely to the claimant without first making a reference to the Commissioners, although the evidence accompanying the application may conclusively show that the person asking for a patent has no valid claim.”

The amendment would throw the decision into the hands of the Commissioners, and I think that would be a great advantage to the people there. This Act is not for the convenience or advantage of the Minister of the Interior, or the Commissioners, but of the people of Manitoba, and, I venture to think, every person who will give himself the trouble to enquire into or think upon the subject will believe that, in the interest of the settler, the cases that arise can be more thoroughly enquired into on the spot. The fourth reason is:—

“That the amendment would injuriously impede the administration of Dominion Lands in Manitoba, and delay the allotment of some of the Half-breed reservations.”

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

That depends upon the way the Act is administered. No delay need arise. I think upon these grounds which I have given, that my hon. friend from Manitoba was right, and that he knows better than those who have prepared these answers what is in the interests of the people of Manitoba, and that his arguments and the reasons he has given are such as to satisfy persons who have no more concern in the matter than we have. I ask any hon. gentleman to put himself in the place of those poor men living there, without education, very poor and not possessing the means of employing a person competent to lay their cases before the head of the Department, and say whether they would not prefer to submit their cases to a Commissioner on the spot, and have an opportunity of getting judgment there and then?

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I venture to think that would be much more satisfactory to the settler, and it is only the settler's interest and convenience that should be considered in a matter of this kind. I heartily supported my hon. friend in endeavouring to get justice for the people he represents, but, as he has said, in a way that should command the sympathy of the House, since there is some advantage to be derived from this Bill, and he will not take the responsibility of insisting upon his amendment, I gladly follow in his footsteps and allow the amendment to drop, though I am persuaded the course he pursued was right, and his amendment would have been in the interest of the people of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Although this question was discussed very fully in this House on a former occasion, it would not be proper to let the speeches of the hon. gentlemen opposite go unanswered. I have already explained to the House that it is impossible to point out one single case of hardship, where occupation had been established, that the Department had not respected. The Minister is represented at Winnipeg; an official is there who receives claims of this sort and remits them to the Department, and all claims up to 1872 of any character—even of the most shallow description—have been admitted.

The hon. Senator says there is a class of claims not admitted, where parties held according to the usages of Manitoba. I deny that. All such claims were respected. Those claims which my hon. friend desires to get in, are cases which I am sure, if the hon. gentleman were a trustee for the people, would not be recognized by him. The class is well known to the Department, and with every disposition to meet the views of all claimants, they could not do so, because it would simply err giving the more energetic speculators an advantage over others. I am just as anxious as anyone can be, to have every reasonable claim respected. I would rather err on the side of generosity than otherwise, where the public domain is concerned. I am quite sure the hon. Senator from Kingston has settled more claims himself, in his own office, when he administered the Crown Lands, than have ever arisen in Manitoba. I know I have, and I have settled them on affidavits or reports of agents who were sent to enquire into such cases, or, where they were of sufficient importance to justify the sending of surveyors, on their reports. The cost of commissioners in the North-West has been something fabulous. You appoint a commissioner, and he gets $10 a day for his services. The consequence is, he takes days to decide a case which should not occupy as many hours. Their object is to delay cases. If my hon. friend can inform me of one case of hardship, I will go with him to the Department and investigate it. I have spoken to Col. Dennis on the subject. He is thoroughly acquainted with the character of those cases, having been in Manitoba himself.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND — Before the question is disposed of, I would like to make a remark or two in regard to the question before the House. I supported the amendment of my hon. colleague with the expectation it would facilitate the settlement of certain claims which I know of, although the hon. Secretary of State says he believes there are no such claims. I know of some two or three claims myself, personally, which have not been settled, and certainly in some of those cases the parties are not in a position to bring forward their claims as they would do if the amendment of my hon. friend were accepted. Their means would not permit them to bring their cases before the Minister in Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend's statement of the case would be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND—I admit there are several claims which should not be recognized and which an impartial commission would reject. I am well aware there are not a great many that would be recognized.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND — Still those claims are subject entirely to the views entertained by the land agent there, and the whole or final decision hangs on his report, the claimant having no tribunal before which he can go and submit his case, or bring a witness, no matter how material the evidence may be. These are the grounds on which I supported the amendment. While I admit there are claims which would not be recognized, there are some others within my own knowledge that I know it would be a very great injustice to reject.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—The hon. the Secretary of State has asked me to mention a single case where justice has not been rendered. I have to-day received a letter from a gentleman occupying a high position in the Province of Manitoba, and with the leave of the House I shall communicate a part of it. I think the hon. the Secretary of State will admit that according to the laws of Manitoba, this gentleman should have been granted his patent nevertheless his claim has been rejected. I hope the Hon. the Secretary of State will take some interest in the matter, and say whether the statement I am about to submit is correct or not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman sends me the letter I shall look into it.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—The land to which I refer is at St. Agathe. The property has been in the possession of the gentleman since 1862, and was surveyed by Roger Goulet, a surveyor under the Assiniboia Government. He possesses two properties in that part of the Province both of which were surveyed under the Assiniboia Government. One property is on the west side of the Red River, and there is a church on it. The other is on the east side, and it is kept as wood land.

It is acknowledged by all the public there as the property of the Mission, and is taxed as such. It is designated by the number 564, St. Agathe. The patent for that land has been refused under the pretext that the property is not occupied. The party has been in possession for sixteen years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the statement be correct the claimant is entitled to his land, because that class of cases is specially provided for. Anyone in possession of land according to the usages of the Council of the Assiniboine, has his title under the law. That is not a case that would be equated into under the amendment.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—The claimant to whom I have referred was refused his patent on the pretext that the land was not occupied, and he informs me that a great many other persons are in the same position. I contend they should be given an opportunity to establish their claims. I hope the Government before long will admit the justice of my views. I think it is not right that the Department of the Interior should become a sort of Star Chamber, where decisions affecting men's claims to property, can be rendered in secret, without the parties interested being afforded a chance to give evidence in support of their claims.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved :—

“That this House doth not insist on their amendment to the Bill intituled, ‘An Act to amend an Act respecting conflicting claims to lands of occupants in Manitoba,’ to which the Commons disagree.”

The motion was agreed to.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. WARK moved :—

“That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House,—A return of the land taken for the purpose of the Intercolonial Railway and its branches, in the Counties of Restigouche, Gloucester, Northumberland, Kent and Westmoreland, specifying the place where situated, the names of the respective owners, the quantity of land taken from each, the dates at which the respective appraisements were made, the value put on the respective lots by the appraisers, the price subsequently paid for such lots respectively, the value put on buildings, or for removing buildings, the amount likewise paid for such buildings or their removal together with the names of the appraisers.”

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AUDIT BILL.

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the House go into Committee of the Whole, on Bill No. 53, intituled “An Act to provide for the better auditing of the Public Accounts.”

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I wish to call the particular attention of the House, and more especially of the Government, to the anomalous position in which we are placed in relation to this Bill, by the postponement of the Bill abolishing the office of Receiver-General. That Bill proposed to abolish the office of Receiver-General, and at the same time to create the new office of Attorney-General. It was objected to by my hon. friend from Sunbury, on the ground that there was no substitute, no check on the public expenditure, and therefore, it was undesirable to proceed with the Bill, and he moved the postponement. I must confess, that when the Bill was introduced in the House, I gave my opinion as to the course we ought to take upon it, and that course was to pass the Bill as it stood, merely striking out the clause which created the new office of Attorney-General, and I so expressed myself on the second reading. I had the misfortune to differ from all the hon. gentlemen who spoke on the question. The hon. the Secretary of State made a passing allusion to the fact that there was a Bill in another place which would provide a check, in substitution for the Receiver-General, but he gave us no intimation as to the provisions of that Bill, and we were left without any idea as to what extent it was proposed to go in that direction. We had nothing but the Bill before us, and we had to deal with it as a measure to abolish the only existing check to the Finance Department, with respect to the expenditure of the country. Hon. gentlemen on all sides of the House stated they were unwilling to remove that check until a substitute was proposed. I took the liberty of suggesting to the hon. Secretary of State that, as I was in favor of abolishing the Receiver-General's office if a substitute were provided, this Bill should be postponed until the other Bill was before us. On some slight objection being taken to that by the leader of the Opposition, the hon. Secretary of State said the House might as well proceed to a division.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I asked the House to allow the Bill to stand, if in their judgment they were prepared to consider the Bill when it came up. The intimation I received, was that the Opposition were determined to adhere to the position they had taken.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I did understand my hon. friend to the effect that he was willing to postpone the Bill until the other came forward. When my suggestion, adopted by the Government, was combated by the leader of the Opposition, the hon. Secretary of State, instead of appealing to the House to carry out his views, in which I think he would have had a very large support on this side of the House, at once gave way and called for a division. The truth is, it left on my mind the impression that the Government would rather have the Bill defeated than have the clause for the creation of the Attorney-General's Department struck out. We are now confronted with this peculiar state of affairs, after having defeated that Bill, and thus retaining the office of Receiver-General, we are now called on to create the additional office of Auditor-General.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is not an additional office.

Hon. Mr. WARK—We have always had the office of Auditor-General.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I adhere to what I have said, that it is proposed to appoint a new officer.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend will see that is not the case when we come to consider the details of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Then the Bill must be modified very considerably. As it stands, it provides for the appointment of a new Deputy Minister of Finance, in place of Mr. Langton, and it creates a new Department independent of the Government of the day, with all the corresponding officers with it, while the Department of Receiver-General is also retained. Therefore, it is an additional Department to the Government of this country, and, as I hold, an entirely unnecessary Department if the office of Receiver-General is not abolished. The Receiver-General's Department is very expensive, costing about $29,000 a year; and it is a question what we should do under the circumstances. I may be asked, "What do you propose to do?" Since my advice was not taken on the former occasion, I hesitate about offering any now. However, I am in favor of passing this Bill, and adding a clause to abolish the office of Receiver-General, and transferring his duties to the Finance Department. In that case we should carry out a very useful reduction in the public expenditure, and establish an excellent tribunal for auditing the Public Accounts without any increase of expense, because I put the expense of the new Department against that of the Receiver-General's Department. I believe, in that way, we should be carrying out a reasonable reform required by the two great parties of this country, because I can conceive no party would desire to retain the Receiver-General as a check on the Finance Department, when we have an independent tribunal—the Auditor-General—as a more efficient check upon that Department.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I distinctly remember what took place when the Receiver-General's Bill was before this House. My hon. friend from Amherst stated it would be better to pass the first clause and abolish the office of Receiver-General, and not to pass the other clauses of the Bill, establishing a new officer in connection with the Department of Justice. But I did not understand him to desire to have the consideration of that Bill delayed until this measure came before the Senate. When the House was asked whether it desired to delay the consideration of the Receiver-General's Bill until this measure came up from the other Chamber, there was but one expression on this side—that it would have been more proper if the Government had introduced the two Bills at once, and not separated them as they had done. Nothing more was urged. That Bill was defeated. It was perfectly competent for any gentleman who took a different view to have moved to strike out the clause appointing the Attorney-General. My hon. friend did not do so. With regard to the Bill before the House, I do not think it contemplates appointing a new officer at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It comes before us with the declaration of the hon. Secretary of State, that it is to be so modified, that it will not create a new office. The Bill, as originally drawn, was predicated upon the supposition the Receiver-General's Bill would have become law. And if it had, it was intended to create, in addition to the office of Auditor-General, a Deputy Finance Minister, who would occupy the position, I presume, in place of the present Deputy Receiver General. At all events, he would take that position so far as the number of officers in the Department is concerned. As that office is not abolished, I understood my hon. friend to say that provision of the Bill would be struck out, and the object of this measure is the appointment of an Auditor-General, under such conditions as are mentioned in the Bill. Of course the existing office of Auditor will be abolished when this act becomes law; and therefore we will impose no additional burden upon the country by the passing of this Bill. I agree with the hon. Secretary of State and the leader of the Opposition, that we are taking a very wise course in establishing that very important office upon a foundation which will render the incumbent independent of all parties, and of the Government, in the discharge of the functions of his office. He will act without any fear of being controlled except by the legitimate and impartial power of Parliament. Under the circumstances, I presume that my hon. friend, the leader of the Government in this House, will carry out the promises he made to the House when the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. Dickey.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The facts of the case have been so fairly and fully stated by the hon. Senator from Arichat, that it is unnecessary for me to enter into any explanations. It is proposed, and I have introduced a clause to carry out that object, to make the Deputy Minister of Finance act also as Deputy-Receiver-General, so that there will be no additional office. I am not prepared to say what reduction will take place in the staff of the Receiver-General, but I must assume that the officers of that Department are employed at necessary work in connection with the debentures and foreign loans, and, therefore, there cannot be much reduction, if any. The duties of the officers of that Department would still have to be performed, whether there was the Receiver-General's Department or not.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I certainly made a suggestion before the House the other day that the Receiver-General's Bill should stand until this measure came before the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certainly; that is my recollection of it.

The House then went into Committee, Hon. Mr. Montgomery in the chair.

On the 4th clause,

Hon. Mr. DICKEY asked on what ground an official could be prevented from serving on a jury? It seemed to him that was a local matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT thought the object was to provide that the officials of the Departments should at all times be in attendance during office hours to attend to the public business.

Hon. Mr. MILLER questioned whether this Parliament had the power to exempt officials from municipal duties.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT thought the hon. gentleman was right, but his (Mr. Scott's) impression was that any Court would respect the provisions of a law of this kind, and not fine an official who failed to attend on a summons to serve on a jury.

After some further discussion, the clause was allowed to stand.

On the 18th clause,

Hon. Mr. WILMOT said he differed from the hon. Senator from Amherst as to the desirability of abolishing the Receiver-General's Department, because it was the right sort of check in connection with income and expenditure. If the hon. gentleman wished to effect a saving, it could be done by abolishing the Inland Revenue Department and allowing the Customs Department to collect all the revenue. That had been done in the Maritime Provinces before Confederation, and he saw no reason why it should not be done now. The Minister of Customs would be quite able to supervise the whole of the collection of the revenue.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said he had not only made that suggestion, but he had gone further and suggested that the office of the President of the Council should be abolished.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said if the hon. Senator for Sunbury would make enquiry he would find that it was impossible for one Department to collect the Customs and Excise duties. The Customs was one of the largest Departments in the Government, and required the attention of a very active head; and the Inland Revenue Department was also very large, the collections being $5,000,000 annually, and its ramifications being all over the country. The Excise duties were not at all similar to the Customs duties. He did not think anything could be gained in that direction.

Hon. Mr. DEVER was of opinion that the office of Minister of Inland Revenue should be abolished. When the announcement had been made in the Speech from the Throne that there would be changes in the public offices, he had hoped that it referred to the abolition of the Receiver-General's office. He regretted that it had not been done.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS called attention to the fact that the Auditor-General was empowered to discharge officials under him, a power greater than a Minister of the Crown possessed.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said the object of the Bill was to establish an independent authority for the auditing of the accounts outside of the Government altogether. Unless the Auditor-General were given some control over those employed in his office, how could he be held responsible for the proper performance of his duties.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—To make it consistent, he ought to have the power to appoint his officers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This provision gives him the veto power.

After some further discussion the clause was adopted.

On the 17th clause,

Hon. Mr. WILMOT contended that the effect of this provision would be, practically, to put the Receiver-General's Department under the Finance Department.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said those who had taken the trouble to analyze how far the Receiver-General was a check on the Finance Department, had come to the conclusion it was not the check that was generally supposed; practically, the check was the Auditor. Under this Bill all checks would have to be signed by three officials.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT said the effect of this Bill was to make the Deputy Minister of Finance control the Receiver-General's Department. He certainly did not approve of it, because it would do away with the check between the two Departments.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said this was based upon the idea that the office of Receiver-General was to be abolished. The further the House proceeded with the Bill the more necessary would it appear that the Receiver-General's office should be abolished.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There is no law creating the office of Receiver-General.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—There is none creating the office of Finance Minister.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said it might be a question whether Government could not drop the office of Receiver-General altogether, and if they could get this Bill in the shape they wanted it, they might do so contrary to the wish of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT thought it was rather extraordinary that the Government should attempt, at the very last Session of this Parliament, to reorganize the Departments. It was simply giving them a much larger amount of patronage than they would have controlled without this Act.

After some further discussion the clause was adopted.

The Committee rose and reported the Bill with certain amendments.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the report of the Committee be taken into consideration to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

THE INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT ACT.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (14) "An Act further securing the Independence of Parliament."

He said: The object of this Bill is to make more clear the laws relating to the Independence of Parliament. The present Bill defines more clearly those clauses of the Independence of Parliament Act, affecting principally the members of the other House. The first section of the Act is much the same as the law stands at present. The second sub-section is a new feature which provides that no person entitled to any superannuation or retiring allowance from the Government of Canada shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons. The second and third clauses relating to Ministers of the Crown are the same as the present law. The fourth is a new clause making more clear that persons having transactions with the Government, the sale of goods, for instance, or by transactions that were not clearly defined under the former Act, shall be ineligible to be elected as members of the House of Commons, or if elected, shall be liable to the penalties provided by this Act. In the fifth clause the penalty for a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act is reduced from $2,000 to $200 per day. The seventh clause is also a new one, because it declares this Act shall not extend to disqualify any member of the House of Commons, by reason of his being a shareholder in any incorporated company having a contract or agreement with the Government of Canada, except companies undertaking contracts for the building of public works, and any company incorporated for the construction or working of any part of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Clause number eight is a clause which has been borrowed from the Imperial Act, which requires that in all contracts or agreements made with the Government, or any of the Departments, there shall be inserted an express condition that no member of the House of Commons shall be admitted to any share or part in such contracts or agreements, or to any benefit to arise therefrom, and subjecting the parties connected with the contract to a large penalty for any breach of this clause. The ninth clause is also a new one. It makes provision that where a contract has existed, and the carrying out of that contract with the Crown is thrown upon a party by devise or inheritance, he shall not be thereby disqualified, as time is given to relieve himself of the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. Wilmot.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is a new clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been suggested to me that a case might arise in Lower Canada where the devisee would be compelled to carry out contracts of this kind, or otherwise might forfeit his share in the estate. The next clause is an important one. It is the first time that any provision has been made to disqualify Senators from taking contracts from the Crown. It provides that Senators entering into any agreements or contracts with the Crown, which, by this Act, would render any person incapable of being elected to the House of Commons shall thereby forfeit the sum of $200 for each day, during which he continues to be concerned in such contract or agreement. Of course it cannot affect the seat of a Senator, as this House is independent of Parliament. Therefore, a Senator having such a contract as would disqualify a member of the House of Commons from sitting, or voting, incurs a per diem penalty while he holds such contract. There is a provision that this section shall not render any Senator, who, at the passing of this Act, holds any office or employment in the service of the Crown, or any contract for which the public money of Canada is paid, from completing such contract or rendering him liable to the penalties imposed by this Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Why is there such a reservation?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because there may be some hon. gentleman who hold such relations with the Government, and it would be very unjust that any such Senator should be made liable to this penalty until he has sufficient time to complete his engagements.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—While there are provisions in this Bill which I have no doubt will commend themselves to the approval of the members of this House, there is one objectionable feature in it which I feel bound, as a member of this Senate, to protest against most strongly; and in doing so, I am sure that I shall have the support of a large majority,—in fact I might fairly say that I ought to have the support of all the members of this House. I allude to the attempt made by this Bill to curtail the rights and privileges of the Senate, and to alter the constitution of this House, as it at present exists under the British North America Act. I do not mean to deny the abstract right of the House of Commons to initiate any measure with respect to this House, if they think fit to do so. But I think it is, to say the least of it, not a very courteous proceeding, and not in keeping with the good feeling which ought to exist between the two branches of the Legislature, that clauses affecting so seriously the rights and privileges of this House should have been first introduced into the Bill in the House of Commons and passed there, instead of leaving them to be proposed by the Government here, and then inserted in the Bill, if after due consideration they met with the approval of members of this House. There might have been some excuse for not taking this course, if the Government were not represented in this Chamber, but I should certainly have supposed that if it had been deemed necessary or desirable to make any changes, or introduce any measure affecting the members of this House, that the honorable the Secretary of State, or the Minister of Agriculture, might surely have been charged with the duty of laying such measures before us, and inviting our consideration of them, instead of presenting us a foregone conclusion already arrived at, to which we are simply expected to give our assent. Of course I am quite aware that the Government do not entertain any very friendly feelings towards this House! The Premier, at all events, is reputed as having said in another place, that he has no confidence in the Senate as at present constituted! And the hon. Secretary of State expressed himself in no very complimentary terms towards the majority of this House the other evening, and we have therefore, perhaps, no great reason to expect more courteous treatment from the Government. I proceed now to notice the clause of the Bill which more particularly affects the members of this House—the 10th clause—which declares that no person being a member of the Senate shall be capable of holding any office, or commission, or employment, other than the offices mentioned in sub-section two and the office of Speaker—or shall be a party to, or concerned in, any contract or agreement with the Government, which by this Act would render any person incapable of being elected to or holding a seat in the House of Commons. So, bringing the members of the Senate under the disqualifications in sub-section (a), and rendering them incapable of holding any office, commission, or employment, temporary or permanent, in the service of the Government of Canada, or at the nomination of the Crown, to which any salary, emolument or profit of any kind is attached. However desirable it may be to exclude members of the House of Commons from such offices, there can be no reason whatever, under the very different tenure by which hon. gentlemen hold their seats in this House, that any such disqualification should be made to apply to members of the Senate. I have heard no good reasons advanced by the hon. Secretary of State—no grounds whatever, alleged upon which the change sought to be introduced by the Bill, can properly be urged. We, in this House, are not in any way dependent on the fate of the Ministry of the day; we are not, therefore, influenced by considerations which would naturally have weight with those whose seats are dependent, more or less, upon the rise or fall of one or other of the political parties into which the country may be divided. Nor are we a partisan body—we neither make nor unmake Governments, and we are not, therefore, likely to be swayed by those influences which the members of an elective body, such as the House of Commons, would be more or less open to, if nominated by the Government of the day to any office within their gift. I think, therefore, that the disqualifications sought to be placed on the members of this House, by the tenth clause of this Act, is uncalled for on any sound constitutional grounds, and, further, would be exceedingly unwise, as tending to exclude a large class of gentlemen who, by their previous training and experience in public affairs, would be peculiarly fitted for seats in this House, from accepting seats in the Senate, if they were to be thereby shut out from filling any of the appointments mentioned in this Act, and might also operate most injuriously against the public interests in preventing hon. members of this House from discharging duties for which they may be specially qualified; but the acceptance of which, if this Act were to become law, would entail upon them a forfeiture of their seats.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They would not forfeit their seat.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The tenth clause says that no members of the Senate shall be capable of holding any of these offices or employments, and imposes a penalty if they do, which practically amounts to a forfeiture of their seats. Now, let us suppose, that this Bill had come up, and was in the shape in which it was first introduced in the other House, with officers or appointments under the Provincial Governments included in the disqualifications. My hon. friend the hon. gentleman from Saugeen, would have been disqualified for filling the important post, for which no public man in Ontario was better fitted, as one of the Provincial Arbitrators, and although that clause has been struck out, yet instances are just as likely to arise in the case of Dominion appointments, where the restrictions in the Bill, as it now stands, may prevent the Government from obtaining the service of the best man for a particular duty. Take for instance as an illustration, the case of Sir Alexander Galt, whom we all know discharged with such great ability and credit to himself, and advantage to the Dominion, the duties of one of the members of the Halifax Fisheries Commission. If he had occupied a seat in this House and this Act had been in force, he would have been disqualified from accepting any such appointment, and the country would have lost the advantage of his great abilities in a most delicate and important negotiation. I think there can be little doubt therefore hon. gentlemen, that one effect of this Bill would be to limit in a way very injurious to the public interest, the choice of gentlemen who may be specially qualified to discharge important public duties, of various kinds, and for that reason among others it ought not to become law in its present shape.

Hon. Mr. Allan.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—But now, hon. gentlemen, so far as the constitutional changes sought to be made by this Bill are concerned, let us see if there is any authority for them in Imperial legislation or practice. We occupy in the Senate to a certain extent, an analogous position to the House of Lords, holding, as we do, our seats for life. Are members of the House of Lords prohibited from holding an office or appointment under the Crown to which any emolument is attached? If this were the case we should not have been able to congratulate ourselves on having had among us for the last five years, one of the most accomplished members of that House, and one of the ablest and most constitutional Governors that have ever represented Her Majesty in this country, as Governor-General.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Then, again, I may quote other examples, such as another member of the House of Lords filling the post of Governor-General of India, and another member of the same House being Viceroy of Ireland. Again, I might quote the case of Lord Monck, a late Governor-General of Canada, and a member of the House of Lords, who is now paid Chief Commissioner of the Irish Church Temporalities. There is Lord Hampton, formerly Sir John Packington, First Civil Service Commissioner; Lord Chichester, Commissioner of Church Estates in England; Lord Tenterden, paid Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. I might quote many more cases, but I think I have said quite enough to show that there is no constitutional precedent for restricting Senators from accepting offices or public appointments under the Crown. Neither are there any good grounds as regards either the usefulness or independence for making such a restriction, while there are many strong reasons in the public interest against it. I will now refer to sub-section B, in the first clause of the Bill, which provides "that no person entitled "to any superannuation or retiring allowance from the Government of Canada "shall be eligible as a member of the House "of Commons." I consider this a most unwise and objectionable enactment, inasmuch as it limits the choice of the people in their representatives, and excludes from that choice a class of men whose previous training and acquaintance with all matters connected with the various Departments of the Public Service, render them peculiarly fitted to discharge intelligently the duties of a member of Parliament of the country. I will take, for example, the case of such a man as the present Auditor-General, Mr. Langton. Suppose Mr. Langton to have retired from the Public Service on a superannuation allowance, and having time and leisure at his disposal to be desirous of entering Parliament, could we have a more valuable man in either branch of the Legislature? I may say of the members of the Civil Service, generally, that in their ranks there may be found men whom we could all readily name, whose presence here, if they were inclined to enter Parliamentary life, after their superannuation, we would most gladly welcome, and I do not see why the people should be restricted from choosing such men to represent them in the House of Commons. To say that their independence is likely to be affected because they are in receipt of pensions from the Government seems to me utterly absurd. They become entitled to their pensions as a matter of right under the Superannuation Act. It lays them under no obligations to the Government of the day, who cannot take their pensions away from them.

Hon. Mr. Allan.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They may be liable to be recalled to the Public Service.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Yes, if they are under a certain age, but it is a very remote and improbable contingency, and so unlikely to occur that it is hardly worth taking into consideration. Now, this clause is also entirely contrary to the whole spirit of British practice. No such disabilities are imposed upon the members of the Civil Service in England; on the contrary, the Imperial Act 32 and 33 Victoria, cap. 15, expressly enacts "that pensions granted for Civil Services "shall not disqualify the holder from being elected, or sitting, or voting as a "member of the House of Commons," and if it is not considered a disqualification in England, where they are quite as jealous of the independence of Parliament as we are, I do not see why it should be considered so here. I give notice, therefore, of my intention, when the Bill goes into Committee of the Whole, to move to strike out the whole of sub-section B, in clause 1, and to move to strike out of clause 10 all that part which declares the members of the Senate to be disqualified from holding any office or employment, retaining only that part which prevents Senators from being parties to contracts with the Government. It has also been suggested to me that in Section C, Clause 1, there can be no reason for including Clerks of the Peace. I shall include it, therefore, in my notice, but leave it to be dealt with by the hon. gentleman who has made the suggestion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are the nominees of the Local Government.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The Government has no control over them.

Hon. Mr. POWER—In Nova Scotia the Clerk of the Peace has control of the electoral list.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is stated that it has been put in that clause to exclude from Parliament one individual, the late member for King's.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN gave notice of his proposed amendment.

Hon. Mr. BUREAU—I have great doubt as to the independence of Parliament, if you permit any hon. member to sit in the House of Commons who is in receipt of a superannuation allowance from the Government. I believe it is not possible for Parliament to declare, by any Act, that the pensions or superannuation allowances of such gentlemen shall not be affected by future legislation. If it were, then I could see how such gentlemen could sit and vote as members of the House of Commons, without a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act; but if, as I believe, an amendment could at any time be proposed, by the Government, to the Act by which such gentlemen's salaries are fixed, so as to take them away, how could they be independent? I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, that the House of Commons has interfered with our rights and privileges, contrary to the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BUREAU—If, for instance, any question arises respecting the qualification of a Senator, or a vacancy in the Senate, the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate. There is the qualification to sit and vote; the qualification of property, and the qualification of residence, all within the purview of this House, and I think it is contrary to the spirit of the constitution that these matters should be interfered with by the House of Commons. I agree with the hon. gentleman opposite, we must at all times be ready to protect ourselves, and that any Bill of this kind ought to originate in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. Allan.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BUREAU—I remember once I was indiscreet enough to interfere with a Bill affecting the Province of Quebec. I had a great deal of experience with respect to elector's lists, and I thought some change might be made in it for the better. I was met, however, with the argument that I ought not to interfere in a matter that affected the rights and privileges of the House of Commons. I think so to-day; the Senate was right, and I was wrong on that point, and I have not changed my views since the lesson I received from my colleagues in the Senate on that occasion. I think this Bill is contrary to the spirit of the British North America Act. The hon. gentleman has cited precedents in the House of Lords, but our position here is quite different. We have a written Constitution, and we ought not to go contrary to any of its provisions. The written Constitution must be interpreted as the law. If we see there is anything wrong or contrary to common sense in that law, we go to work the proper way to amend it. If the members of the House of Commons think they have not sufficient power to control or to impose their wishes on this Senate, they can proceed in the ordinary way to ask by an address of both Houses to amend the Constitution in the direction they consider necessary. I wish it to be understood that I shall certainly sustain the hon. gentleman in setting aside the clause which relates to this Senate.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—While I agree with what has been said by my hon. friend, with regard to that particular clause relating to the Senate, I think he has made a mistake in contending that gentlemen drawing pensions or superannuation allowances from the Government should be exempted from the prohibition which is placed upon others. I think the case which he has put might at first sight strike hon. gentlemen as being appropriate, but we might suppose another case which shows how important it is that this prohibition should exist. For instance, we could imagine a Ministry who might desire to have a member of the Civil Service—or, say, a judge—take a seat in Parliament, and who, in order to do that, might superannuate the judge for the express purpose of enabling him to become a candidate. I think that would be a most unfortunate circumstance.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Mr. Mowat came down from the Bench without any arrangement.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—It was precisely because he came down without any pecuniary arrangement that it was proper to permit him to do so. If the Government had said, "We will give you a pension if you come down," it would have been a very unseemly affair indeed. As a general rule, I do not think it is a desirable thing for a judge to descend from the Bench and enter the political arena. But there is certainly less objection to his doing so when he takes his chances like other men. If the Government say, "We will give you a pension if you come down," it makes his conduct a different thing.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—A judge is not entitled to a pension until after he has served fifteen years, and in that case he would be entitled to a pension by law.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I think there must be preliminary arrangements before a judge retires, and that he does not get his pension de pleno unless he is sick or disabled, and after fifteen years' service.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I think such cases as the hon. gentleman suggests are likely to be very rare.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—If it is likely to be a very rare class of cases, the clause against which my hon. friend protests is not likely to operate injuriously in many cases; and I think, when it was likely to operate at all, it would operate in a practical manner, for a most important purpose.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Supposing a judge did take his seat here, he would be in a totally different position from what he would be in if he occupied a seat in the House of Commons, as he would not be bound to support the Ministry of the day, because his tenure of salary would not depend upon the Government.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I think if any change is to be made respecting the Senate, it is not unreasonable to expect that it shall originate in this House. But, on the same principle, we should not interfere with anything that affects the privileges of the Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—They have not always shown us that courtesy.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Upon reflection, I am free to confess that it is not in accordance with the popular feeling that the changes proposed should have been introduced without first having submitted them to this House. I am sure, however, that hon. gentlemen will not consider that any slight was intended to the Senate by the Government. I think, perhaps, my hon. friend (Mr. Allan) is right in taking the ground that it would only have been a continuance of the proper etiquette that should be maintained between the two Houses, if the Senate had been consulted upon the changes before they were passed upon in the Commons.

The Bill was then read the second time.

PACIFIC RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THE ORDER POSTPONED.

On the Order of the Day being called, "Consideration of the Report of the Committee of the Whole on Bill (52) Canadian Pacific Railway Act Amendment Bill.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER asked, that the order be discharged, and that the consideration of the report be postponed until to-morrow, as he had promised an hon. Senator that he would do so.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said the hon. gentleman had no right to do so without the knowledge and consent of the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the truth was, that the Minister of Agriculture had been asked to postpone the consideration of the report of the Committee by a very vigorous opponent of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said he was not surprised at the hon. gentleman from Arichat taking exception to the course pursued by the Minister of Agriculture, because it was exceptional, that a second expression of the opinion of the House should be taken on the Bill in this manner. The hon. gentleman was not content with one expression of opinion, but insisted upon having another. It was evident that the object in postponing the vote at present was, that some different conclusion might be arrived at, than the decision which had been given by the Committee. Unless the Government were prepared to give some valid reason for postponing the Bill, the vote should be taken.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD said he had asked the Minister of Agriculture as a favor, to postpone for some days the consideration of the report, as he was particularly interested in the Bill, and expected that it would be possible, the Government might, in a short time, arrive at some understanding with reference to the terms of the leasing of the road. He hoped the further consideration of the Bill would be postponed until Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT said there was a very great constitutional principle involved in this Bill. It had been thoroughly discussed, and it was a question whether this House would assert its constitutional right or not, and he thought they were fully prepared to vote upon it. He did not think it should be delayed to suit the convenience of any hon. gentleman at this late period of the Session.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH said the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Arichat had been adopted in committee. It had not been sprung upon the House, but due notice had been given of it at the proper time, and the vote was a full expression of the opinion of the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said there was this advantage in postponing the Bill: the Government might be in a position in a few days to inform the House what terms they could make respecting the leasing of the road, and it would relieve Parliament of any doubt as to whether they should pass the Bill or not. He was not in a position to state to the House that the Government were in possession of all the details of the running arrangements or lease.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Why not go on now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are reasons why the Bill should not be gone on with at present.

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL said it was a matter of courtesy that the further consideration of the Bill should be postponed, when it was so urgently requested by the Government.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said if the Government could give the House any good reason why the Bill should be postponed until to-morrow, he thought hon. gentlemen would be prepared to listen to their suggestion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the longer it was delayed, the more probability there was of obtaining information respecting the arrangements for the lease.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said at this late period of the Session, it seemed to him that the only possible object which the Government had in postponing this matter, was the hope that something might take place that would reverse the vote that had been taken in committee, before the Bill passed the third reading.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD said it would be only courtesy to the Minister of Agriculture to postpone the Bill until to-morrow as was suggested.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said the time had already been twice extended, and he objected to further delay.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER regretted that hon. gentlemen opposite insisted to-day on what they had never insisted on before. It was the first time that a member had been asked to explain why he demanded a postponement of a Bill in this House. It had been delayed before at the request of an hon. gentleman opposite. He therefore moved that the order be discharged, and that the consideration of the report be postponed until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said it sometimes happened that a Bill was so amended as to become a very different measure to what it was when introduced, and it was not an unusual thing then for another member to take charge of such a Bill and carry it through.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said not a Government measure.

Hon. Mr. MILLER — Yes; even Government bills. For instance, if the Government dropped it at the present time, it would be perfectly competent for any member of this House to take it up and carry it through.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said it would not receive the Government's assent; so there would be no use in doing so.

Hon. Mr. MILLER considered the expression that had been given by the Committee represented the views of this House, and the only object of the hon. gentlemen opposite in obtaining a postponement of the Bill was, that they hoped, by some means which he could not understand, to change the majority in favour of his (Mr. Miller's) amendment to a majority in favour of the Bill. How this was to be brought about he did not know. Whether by hon. gentlemen leaving for their homes or by what means they expected to change that vote he could not understand, but he could see no reason why the hon. gentleman who had charge of the Bill should not be compelled to go on with it.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER said the hon. gentleman had a perfect right to insist upon it, but he would ask the House to postpone concurrence until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE considered it would not be courtesy for hon. gentlemen to press this order.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said he was urged by the party to bring this motion to-day, and not to give way, and he was surprised to find hon. gentlemen taking a different course.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE denied that he had been consulted in the matter at all, and he was only acting as an independent member.

Hon. Mr. MONTGOMERY said he did not think the Senate should carry those measures with a strong hand, and if the Government had reasons for desiring a postponement, the House ought to give way.

Hon. Mr. DIXON objected to concurrence being postponed after such a decided vote had been taken in Committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLER explained that he had been asked by hon. gentlemen who opposed this Bill to take charge of the amendment which he had moved in Committee, and to insist upon the division being taken to-day. When he saw hon.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

gentlemen whom he had expected to support him, yield to the request of the Government, he had expressed himself perhaps rather warmly, as he felt he had not been fairly treated in this matter.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD moved the adjournment of the House.

The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned at 6 p.m.

THE REVENUE OF THE DOMINION.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. DEVER moved

"That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House a Return of all duties of Excise for this Dominion for the months of July, August, September, October, November, December, 1877, and the months of January, February and March of 1878."

"Also for a Return of all duties for stamps for this Dominion for the months of July, August, September, October, November, December, 1877, and the months January, February and March of 1878."

"Also for a Return of all duties of Customs for this Dominion for the months of July, August, September, October, November, December, 1877, and the months of January, February and March of 1878."

"Also for a Return of all duties of Customs for the Dominion for the months of July, August, September, October, November, December, 1876, and the months of January, February and March of 1877."

"Also for a Return of all duties for Stamps for this Dominion for the months of July, August, September, October, November, December, 1876, and the months of January, February and March of 1877."

"Also for a Return of all duties of Excise for this Dominion for the months of July, August, September, October, November, December, 1876, and the months of January, February and March of 1877."

"Also for a Return of all duties of Excise for the City of St. John, New Brunswick, for the months of July, August, September, October, November, December, 1877, and the months of January, February and March of 1878."

"Also for a Return of all duties of Customs for the City of St. John, New Brunswick, for the months of July, August, September, October, November, December, 1877, and the months of January, February and March of 1878."

"Also for a Return of all duties of Customs for the City of St. John, New Brunswick, for the months of July, August, September, October, November, December, 1876, and the months of January, February and March of 1877."

"Also for a Return of all duties of Excise for the City of St. John, New Brunswick, for the months of July, August, September, October, November, December, 1876, and the months of January, February and March of 1877."

He said: The motions before you are quite numerous, and, if left to my own option, I would have condensed them to three. The object is to get official returns to sustain some remarks I made in this House a few days ago. At that time I got returns which were not official, and, after some exchange of opinion with friends of mine, it was suggested that I should make the motions which stand in my name today, so as the official, may correspond in number, with the non-official. My principal object is to ascertain the exact amounts received for Customs and Excise duties, especially at the port of St. John, in consequence of the great fire there. My next object is to point out, officially, how much the Customs and Excise are for the nine months ending the 31st March last. According to the best calculation I can make, the Customs and Excise for the first nine months of the fiscal year, 1876-7, were $13,291, 998; and for the first nine months of the current fiscal year, $ 3,478, 441; leaving a surplus only of $186,543, for the nine months of the current fiscal year, ending 31st March, 1878. But, $282,189 were collected in New Brunswick, in consequence of the great fire in St. John; and, deducting this from the revenue from Customs and Excise, I find the amount collected during the first nine months of the current year, was $95,646 less than the corresponding period of the preceding year. I admit that there is an increase in the first nine months of the current fiscal year, of revenue from Public Works, but I maintain that there is a decrease in the revenue from Customs and Excise, and that is the correct means of ascertaining whether the business of the country is improving or not. I find that statements have been made, by telegrams to the ministerial press throughout the Dominion, to the effect that there is a great increase in the revenue, thus far. In a paper published in my own Province, the following is set forth:—

"The revenue of the Dominion for the nine months of the fiscal year, ending on the 31st March, 1878, was $16,505,988.40, and for the corresponding period of last year, $15,774,158.40, showing an increase this year, of $731,829.88. This is a very decided improvement, and there is a great prospect that it will continue, and that we may count upon a handsome surplus at the end of the year, especially as there has been no unusual payments, in anticipation of a change in the tariff."

It is quite evident, from this declaration, that the parties whose object it is to represent an increase in the revenue, from Customs and Excise, have been spreading incorrect reports, and, I hold such a course is mischievous, and calculated to mislead this country in the face of coming elections.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT — I presume my hon. friend has got all the information he requires. Many of the returns he moves for have been published from time to time in the Canada Gazette, and if he is desirous of obtaining them he can find them there. The others he will find in the reports of the Inland Revenue Department.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — I suppose what the hon. gentleman wants is an authentic return.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—That is exactly what I want.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Is not the information in the Canada Gazette authentic?

Hon. Mr. WILMOT -- The monthly statements published in the Canada Gazette do not always correspond with the Blue Books.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—As I understand the hon. gentleman, his opinion is, that injustice has been done to the City of St. John, and he wants an official statement to show that large amounts of revenue have been collected at that city, in consequence of the calamitous fire there, and he wants the returns to be put in such a shape that justice will be done to New Brunswick, and the City of St. John in particular.

The motions were agreed to.

BILLS FROM THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FIRST READINGS.

The following Bills from the House of Commons were read for the first time:—

Bill (20) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the Elections of Members of the House of Commons."

Bill (55) "An Act to amend the law respecting Building Societies."

PACIFIC RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

RE-CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The Orders of the Day having been called,

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER called attention to the fact that, by an accident yesterday, the House had adjourned without disposing of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act Amendment Bill, and, as a consequence, it was dropped from the Orders of the Day. To save time and trouble he had, after consultation with the leader of the Opposition, placed it on the paper, and as nobody desired that it should be dropped, he supposed the House would unanimously consent to allow it to be called as the first order of the day.

After a brief discussion the suggestion was adopted.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER—As the House has kindly consented that the order be called now, I wish briefly to state that when I gave notice to reconsider the vote in Committee, it was with no feeling of disrespect for the committee, but because I was informed that some hon. gentlemen who had supported the amendment, were prepared to reconsider their votes.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I desire to say a word or to in answer to a part of the speech made by the hon. Secretary of State an evening or two ago, not that I wish to answer the whole of it, because it was principally in reply to the remarks of my hon. friend from Belleville in another debate on the policy adopted by the Government in the construction of the Pacific Railway. I shall confine my remarks to that portion of the speech of the hon. Secretary of State, which referred to the rights of this House to ask that the lease, which it is proposed to execute, should be placed on the table of this House, and before becoming operative, should receive the sanction of this House. The hon. Secretary of State took the ground that that was a departure from the usage of Parliament and, he thought, in excess of the rights of this House, and an infringement on those privileges which pertain exclusively to the House of Commons. I do not think the hon. gentleman is correct in that position, and I should be very sorry, if he were correct, to unite with my friends on this side of the House in advocating the amendment which is now under consideration. A great responsibility rests upon us in this as in all matters affecting the rights of the Senate. It is as much our duty, on this side of the House, as it is the duty of the Government, to see as far as we can that the Senate does not exceed its constitutional rights; to take care that we do not, by this amendment, ask for anything in excess of those rights, and that we do not infringe upon the peculiar attributes of the other branch of the Legislature. In the first place, I do not think it can possibly be contended, certainly not successfully contended, that this lease is of the character of those contracts which are required to be laid on the table of the House of Commons only. Those contracts involve the expenditure of money. They are contracts which are made in pursuance of votes of money, and the system has had its origin in appropriations being made from time to time for the beginning or the continuation of great works, but with the apprehension on the part of the Commons that the then vote might not be sufficient to complete the work undertaken, and in order to keep control of the money voted, they require that contracts involving its expenditure be laid on the table of the House of Commons. Contracts relative to the transport of mails, expenditures on Public Works, etc., are constantly laid on the table of the House of Commons in England. But my hon. friend from Arichat made his amendment on the basis that this was not a contract involving the expenditure of money; but was an arrangement involving a question of policy in which this House was as deeply interested as the other branch of the Legislature, and it was just as much the right of the Senate to have it before them for their consideration as it was the duty of the House of Commons. This lease cannot be called a contract in the ordinary sense of the term, because a contract generally involves the execution of work and the expenditure of money. This is a lease of a railway, not involving the expenditure of money. I find in England, in one case mentioned by the hon. Secretary of State, involving the expenditure of a considerable sum of money, but which might also be considered as involving a question of policy—a contract for the construction of large works of defence—was required to be laid on the tables of both Houses of Parliament. But I find in England there are all sorts of matters laid on the table of the Upper House, in which they interfere, growing out of the character of legislation somewhat new, and which has had its origin in the disposition to get rid, as far as possible, of details and throw them on some other tribunal to have them settled, with a proviso they should be laid on the table of both Houses of Parliament. There is a very remarkable case in reference to a large charity in London which was held by the commissioners to come within the general statute for the proper management of such charities, and which enacted that Orders-in-Council might be made with reference to the administration of such charities, which should have the force of law, and should govern the mode in which the funds of the hospital should be administered. These Orders-in-Council were to be laid on the tables of both Houses. It turned out, in the opinion of the House of Lords, in one case, that the commissioners had administered the fund in a way which

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

Parliament had not intended, the distribution of the funds of the hospital were being legislated upon, so to speak, by Order-in-Council in a way beyond that which the Act contemplated. The House of Lords, without the least hesitation, after a debate in which the point now urged was taken by Earl Ripon insisted by a considerable majority on the passage of an address to the Crown, praying that the Order-in-Council might not take effect. That address was presented, and Her Majesty very graciously replied that she would withhold her assent until the matter was again submitted to Parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Order-in-Council had not been previously ratified by the House of Lords.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—It had been laid on the table in each House of Parliament two or three years before. In the case before us there is a very serious question of policy. I put it aside altogether as a question of ordinary contract, it is of much greater importance. Here is a question concerning the railway which is to be the outlet of one great part of the Dominion, and the outlet, not through our own territory, but into a foreign country, and the question arises whether it is not desirable, if that road is to be leased, whether this House should not see and pronounce upon that lease. Are we not as much interested in every provision of that lease as the House of Commons? Will it not be our duty to see, as far as possible, that the great trade which is going to spring up in the North-West shall be directed into our own channels? I cannot undertake to say how far we may be able to control that trade by seeing the lease or criticizing its terms, but it is our duty to reserve to ourselves the right to examine that question. It is so much a matter of public policy that the Bill ought to have embodied the lease, and we could then have expressed an opinion upon it. It is not asking the House, with the proper facts before it, to deal with an important matter of this kind, but you simply ask the House to vote away its powers to pronounce upon the lease. The Government should either have taken upon themselves the responsibility of making this lease, or, if they wanted to adopt the more modern method, they should lay it on the tables of both Houses, but, in one way or the other, they should have acted thoroughly. Now, it seems to me very like a case of this kind: supposing the Caughnawaga Canal, which had been talked of in Canada for a great many years, had been constructed some years ago, and there was a question of the Government leasing it, would not that be an instance where we should know all the terms of the lease? That canal would be the great means of communication between the St. Lawrence and the Hudson. Can anyone say that this House should have no means of pronouncing upon that lease? I do not think any fault can reasonably be found with the House for asking that the lease, in its integrity, should be laid on the table of this House, and that we should be in the same position to form an opinion upon it as the other House. I am told, if we insist upon this amendment—and I say it is right that we should—the Government will withdraw the Bill, and that will have the effect of stopping the railways for one or two years to come. I do not believe that; on the contrary, I believe the railways will go on whether this Bill is passed, or the railway on our side of the border is leased or not. The contract for construction on our side, I believe, has already been given out. At all events, tenders have been received by the Department for the construction of the road, and I daresay the contract has been awarded before now. There is nothing to be done there but to lay the ties and rails. The sixty miles between Pembina and Fort Garry can be laid at the rate of a mile a day without difficulty. The completion of the line on the southern side of the border depends upon the action of a Company whose headquarters are in Canada, and who have acquired a large interest in it by the purchase of its bonds. I should regret if the Government were to say, "We will not have this Bill with the amendment." I think they would be doing what was very wrong if they should take such a stand; but if they should, then the railway will have to be kept in their own hands and worked by themselves, and I do not think that would be very much to be regretted. I should not be at all surprised to find that course would most conduce to the interests of the country, because, in a year or two, other roads would touch the border, roads connecting more directly with our own system, as, for instance, the Northern Pacific Railway, which runs to Duluth, and would bring all the produce of the North-West to that city, to come down Lake Superior and the chain of great lakes to Montreal and Quebec, increasing the trade of our own waters. I think, if we can so work the road as to throw that business into the hands of the Northern Pacific Railway Company, and bring it, by way of Duluth, down the great lakes, we shall be doing that which is most in the interests of the Dominion. There was also another reason which made members on this side of the House very anxious about this Bill, and very jealous of voting away their right to have the lease placed upon the table in this Chamber—the Government had another project of a series of railways in the North-West, railways which were to be constructed by fifteen or twenty-five people, or as many as the Order-in-Council might sanction. If that Bill should be passed—and it having been proposed by a member of the Government in the other House we, in this House, have every reason to believe it will pass the Commons—and the Government were empowered to make this lease at their pleasure, the effect might be to establish a whole system of railways in the North-West, all tending to carry trade away from our own country into Minnesota, in augmentation of the prosperity of the United States rather than of Canada. That was calculated to make this House feel the importance of keeping as far as possible some hold on the lease of this road. All those lines would have the effect of carrying trade away from our own Pacific Railway.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL — Nothing would have been easier than to have projected a road from any point on this railway, which is spoken of as being likely to be completed from St. Paul to Pembina, towards Swan River, and that would have tapped the best part of Manitoba and, by means of lateral roads running to the main line, taken the whole trade of the fertile country in the North-West to the United States. This is, therefore, a grave question of policy which may affect the future of that country, and the prosperity of our own great waters and the interests attached to them all the way down to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, for years to come. It is with reference to those interests this House desires to preserve, as far as it can, the right of seeing that this lease is made, if possible, to bring the trade of the North-West to us rather than to the United States. These are grave questions which do not at all touch the matter of laying upon the table contracts involving the expenditure of money. This is one of those large national questions in which this House is as deeply interested as the other branch of the Legislature, and we are within the strict performance of our duty to endeavor to govern and control those interests and, if possible, so shape that trade as to bring it in its earlier years into that line and direction in which it is most likely to further the interests of this country; and if you give it that direction originally, that direction it will keep. On the contrary, if you allow it to get into another channel in the first instance, it is likely to continue there. I am confident the Secretary of State does this House great injustice in supposing it desires anything else than an opportunity of pronouncing on the lease. I undertake to say the Government will find no difficulty if they submit to us a lease which is calculated to preserve this great trade to Canada, and keep it in augmentation of the prosperity of our own country; they will find that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will be ready to sanction such a lease when it comes to be laid on the table.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—I intend to continue the observations I commenced the other day, but which I was prevented from finishing by the adjournment. This measure has assumed an importance which it would not possess had it not been for the extraordinary position taken by the members of the Government in this House, namely, that it is unconstitutional for the Senate to attempt to amend a Bill of this character. The Government has been sustained in this position by a large number of members who should be deeply interested in maintaining the rights and privileges of the Senate, but who, it seems, are prepared to surrender what I consider are the powers and privileges of this House, as conferred on it by the usage of Parliament and by the Constitution of the land. This, therefore, has become a very important question, and one I do not feel inclined to give a silent vote upon. I am confident that the position taken by members on this side of the House is one that can be sustained not only by the Constitution of the land, but by the precedents and usages to which I shall refer presently. I do not think it can be gainsaid, if we are an independent branch of the Legislature, as it is assumed we are, that we have the power to amend every Bill which comes before us for our consideration, except money bills for the imposition of burdens on the people for the purpose of raising the revenue, or appropriation bills for the purpose of expending the revenue in the manner in which Parliament may determine. In all other Bills it is the inherent right of the Senate as an independent branch of the Legislature to amend Bills coming from the House of Commons. On general principles, I assume we have that right, but when we come to look at the written Constitution by which we are governed, it is confirmed in express terms, as will be seen by the eighteenth clause of the British North America Act, which reads as follows:—

 “The privileges, immunities, and powers to be held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the members thereof, respectively, shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that the same shall never exceed those at the passing of this Act held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the members thereof.” There is no distinction whatever between the powers, privileges and immunities which are possessed by the House of Commons and those enjoyed by the Senate, the only distinction whatever being in the section which declares, “Bills for appropriating any part of the public money, or imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.” There is no other section in the British North America Act which confers any powers upon the House of Commons which are not possessed by the Senate. There is another principle which comes up here, and which, no doubt, the framers of the Constitution took into consideration,—if the House of Commons had conferred upon it greater powers than this Senate, where would be the protection to the smaller Provinces in coming into the Union? It is provided that the country shall be represented in the House of Commons by population, and that, as a matter of course, gives a preponderating influence to the larger Provinces of the Dominion. If the Senate possess less powers than the House of Commons, and they have no right to examine and pronounce upon contracts or leases made by Government, which, in fact, dispose of the property of the Dominion, where would the protection for the smaller Provinces be? To prevent the influence which the overwhelming representation of the larger Provinces in the House of Commons would undoubtedly have over the Government of the day, and to protect the interests and rights of the smaller Provinces, it was wisely enacted that they should have a greater representation in the Senate in proportion to their population than they would be entitled to if the same principle prevailed in both Houses. This is a question also in which the measures of the Government themselves show that the policy of the Administration has been shaped by the preponderating influence of the House of Commons. I would like to ask what influences were brought to bear on the Government to induce it to construct the Georgian Bay Branch before the main Canada Pacific line was even located? If that question had been submitted to the people of the Lower Provinces, do you suppose that policy would ever have been approved—a policy to construct a line of railway not one mile of which would eventually be a portion of the main trunk road? Certainly not. I am sure it never would have been sanctioned by the Maritime Provinces. Again, look at the influences which the large representation from Ontario and Quebec in the House of Commons, would have on the expenditure of money in those Provinces. Look at the large amount of money that has been spent on the canals in Ontario. Is that to be put under the control of the House of Commons alone without the Maritime Provinces having a check in some way? That check has been wisely provided in the Senate by giving the smaller Provinces a larger representation in proportion to their population, than Ontario or Quebec. Therefore, I take it, not only upon general principles of the inherent rights which we possess as an independent branch of the Legislature, but also by the express terms of the Constitution, this House has a right to amend bills of this character. The hon. Secretary of State in his speech the other day, cited May as an authority for assuming that the House of Commons exclusively had the right to have the contracts submitted to them before being executed, and I think the inference he drew from that authority was that a resolution of the House of Commons could override the Constitution of the land. I would like to ask, is there anything in our Constitution to prevent this House from passing a similar resolution? Can a resolution from the House of Commons take from the Senate the power given to it by our written Constitution? I take it that principle cannot be successfully contended, therefore, it is not a sufficient authority to justify the hon. Secretary of State in coming to the conclusion at which he arrived. There is another quotation in May, p. 561, which shows the principle on which this question is dealt with. It is as follows:—

“ Besides the mode of obtaining papers by way of address, both Houses of Parliament are constantly put in possession of documents by command of Her Majesty, and in compliance with acts of Parliament.”

There are acts of Parliament which require contracts to be submitted to the House of Lords as well as the House of Commons. I shall now refer to precedents in our own Dominion as evidence of the usage with respect to legislation of this kind. I think, before I conclude, it will be admitted by hon. gentlemen, that by that usage we undoubtedly possess the right to amend bills of this kind, and in the direction in which we have amended the measure now before the House. The first Act which I shall take up is one of the Imperial Parliament with respect to the Canadian Loan. (See Dominion Laws, 1867, p. 44, Sec. 4.) It contains this provision:

"There shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament, within fourteen days after the beginning of each Session, a statement and account, etc."

I take that to be a precedent, and it is from an Act passed by the Imperial Parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no objection to laying the lease on the table. What I object to is requiring the approval of this House.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—I shall now quote several Dominion Statutes in which provision is made that both Houses of Parliament shall receive the same information, even respecting contracts and the expenditure of the revenue :

Contract between Sir Hugh Allan, preamble recites, "whereas the said agreement is subject to a proviso, that the same is to go into effect, if sanctioned and authorized by the Parliament of Canada, &c.," and in the enacting clauses makes the contract subject to the sanction of Parliament.

Then again, with respect to the Truro & Pictou Railway transfer, we find the same provision.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was an absolute transfer of public property.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—It is exactly a case in point.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—Then, in the case of the Windsor Branch of the Windsor & Annapolis Railway, it will be observed the House of Commons passed a resolution in that case, and, to show the principle on which they dealt with it, they authorized the Government to enter into negotiations to make the transfer, and required that any agreement that should be entered into, should be submitted to both Houses of Parliament, for their sanction.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That also is an absolute giving away of public property.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—What is the difference in principle between giving away public property, and giving up the control of public property to a company? I can find nothing in the Constitution which would prevent this House from exercising the right of ratifying the lease of the Pembina Branch, if it should be made. The late Government taking, in my opinion, a wise view of the powers and privileges of the Senate, and having due regard for the Constitution of the land, were not satisfied with obtaining that resolution from the House of Commons, authorizing them to transfer the Windsor Railway, but my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Campbell) brought that resolution before the Senate, and had it adopted by the Senate, previous to entering into negotiations for the transfer. That is, in fact, the true constitutional mode of proceeding in those matters involving the disposal of public property, and the Government of that day deserve the thanks of this House for sustaining their rights and privileges. I think all the authorities I have quoted go to show what the usage of Parliament is, and to prove that the rights of both Houses of the Legislature are identical, and that the course taken by the Government in opposing the amendment to this Bill, is most unfortunate. I cannot help a feeling of surprise that the Government should have been supported by so many members in this House in their desire to deprive us of the rights and privileges which the Constitution has conferred upon this body.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—I take the liberty to express that opinion, for I have no doubt whatever, when this question is fairly and deliberately considered by hon. gentlemen themselves, and when they have reflected upon the consequence which must flow from giving such power into the hands of the Government, hon. gentlemen opposite will see that by advocating such a principle, they are conceding exclusive powers to the House of Commons, and thereby surrendering the privileges of the Senate, which are conferred upon it by the Constitution. When the members from the Maritime Provinces come to reflect on the consequences of such a course, they cannot fail to see that it will eventually jeo-

Hon. Mr. Botsford.

paradise the harmonious working of the Confederation, if the popular branch can thus encroach upon the rights and privileges of the Senate. It would take away that protection from the smaller Provinces which, no doubt, the framers of the Constitution intended as a check upon the greater influence of the larger Provinces in the popular branch of the Legislature. If this doctrine which has been advocated by the Government and those who support them be sustained, will it not most unquestionably detract from the powers or influence which we possess, in the control which we ought to have over the affairs of this great Dominion? If a resolution of the House of Commons sanctioning the Government in disposing of public property of this Dominion, can be taken as legal and constitutional, without the assent of this House, I should like to ask, what then becomes of the usefulness of this independent branch of the Legislature? In my humble opinion, if that principle be carried to its legitimate conclusion, we will become the mere recording office of the House of Commons.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—And therefore it is that I feel in discussing this question, it is one in which the importance and influence of the Senate are deeply involved. I look upon it as a question which ought to be most seriously considered by all. I believe we possess the power to amend bills of this character, and I believe it would be a dereliction of duty if we did not carry out the legitimate functions which the Constitution has given us. I shall refer to a precedent which has been quoted, in the Act for the construction of the Pacific Railway, which only provides that contracts should be submitted to the House of Commons, and that Bill was sanctioned by the Senate. I confess, that in so doing, the Senate were negligent in their duty to themselves and to the Constitution.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—In my opinion, it was most unfortunate that the Senate did not, at that time, assert their right to amend the Bill in that direction.

But I account for it in this way: The new Government were just about commencing their career; they had not a majority in this House; there was a general impression abroad, from their previous professions, that they were possessed of political wisdom, statesmanship, and purity. I believe one reason why we passed that measure without amendment was, that the majority in this House had confidence in the integrity of the Government, and were disposed to give them every facility to carry out their policy. That is the only way in which I can account for the omission, on the part of this House, to amend that Act to provide that contracts should be submitted to this House for its ratification, as well as to the House of Commons. I do not admit that single precedent can be construed as sufficient to take away the rights we possess under the Constitution. It was certainly an unfortunate omission on the part of the Senate. For the reasons I have given, I am prepared to sustain the amendment which has been proposed to this measure. I think it is absolutely necessary for us to adhere to it, inasmuch as the right of the Senate has been questioned by the Ministers of the Crown and those gentlemen who support them, and, therefore, I think it would be fatal on our part if, under the circumstances, we yielded. If the hon. Secretary of State had opposed the amendment on the ground that it might interfere with a judicious contract being made—one which would be in the interests of the country—and not have contended that we had not the constitutional right to amend, his arguments would not have been so objectionable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—The hon. gentleman did, but he took the ground, also, that it was unconstitutional for us to amend the Act.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Did the hon. gentleman take the ground that it was unconstitutional on the part of this House to amend this measure?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I took the ground that it was unusual, and I quoted the practice of the House of Lords to sustain that view.

Hon. Mr. Botsford.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—I distinctly understood the hon. Secretary of State, when he commenced his argument, to quote May as an authority in saying that it was unconstitutional in this House to insert such an amendment in the Bill under consideration.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was much the same. I said it had not been the practice in contracts of that kind.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—I have quoted several authorities to show it is usual. There is one other point to which I wish to refer shortly. The hon. Secretary of State was not justified in making the insinuation that if this Bill were so amended, and if that contract or lease were to be submitted to the Senate, it would not receive fair and candid consideration at the hands of the majority of this branch of the Legislature—that they would not be influenced by the public good or by the advantages which Manitoba might derive from it. He distinctly charged that this House, in dealing with a question of that kind, while this Government was in power, would deal with it in a factious spirit.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I stated, judging by the past action of this House on the policy of the Government in connection with the Pacific Railway, I could only come to the conclusion that parties would have no confidence in dealing with the Government if that lease had to receive the sanction of this House.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—That is a serious imputation on this House. I must condemn strongly such an imputation. I have not been influenced by such a spirit myself, and I do not believe that the majority of this side of the House would be actuated by such motives; and, therefore, I deprecate such a line of argument as has been pursued by the hon. Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I do not think there is any room for doubt as to the right of the Senate to deal with this question in the way in which they have dealt with it, and which, I hope, they will continue to deal with it; that is, to assert their right to a voice in a final settlement of the proposed lease of the Pembina Branch of the Canada Pacific Railway. I look upon the measure as involving an important question of public policy. It is of special importance to the Province of Manitoba, that the Senate should have a right to pass upon the lease. Her interests will be deeply affected by it, and her representatives in this House must have greater influence than her representatives can have in that much more numerous body, the House of Commons.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I think the hon. Senators from Manitoba will admit that the interests of that Province have always received the most fair and liberal consideration from their colleagues on both sides of this House; and I think the interests of distant Provinces have never been and never will be made a party question in this Senate. If the Government enter into a lease which will be for the interests of the country at large, and especially of Manitoba, they will have nothing to fear from the Senate; their measure will be certain to receive the sanction of this House. In my opinion the Government committed a great error in suspending work when they did upon the Pembina Branch. The rails had been brought to the ground, and all that remained to be done was to have laid the track, when the Government suddenly changed its policy and suspended the work. I have always thought that was a very great error, an injustice to Manitoba, and an injury to the whole Dominion. It prevented the extension of the American railways to the frontier of Manitoba. It was not worth the while of the United States companies to build to the frontier to connect with a line of steamers, which is a close monopoly, and which, through the policy of the Government has been fastened upon Manitoba for several years. I daresay the work was done as well as could have been expected under the circumstances, but it nevertheless was a monopoly; and the effect of what the Government propose to do now, I fear, is to rivet that monopoly upon Manitoba, and upon all the interests affected by it, for the period of the lease.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I should like to see the Government finish that road as quickly as it can be done, (I think they should have finished it long ago), and keep it in their own hands, inviting railway companies to extend their lines to the frontier, and offering liberal running arrangements over the Pembina Branch. There can be no question but that that policy would be the most beneficial to Manitoba, and to the whole Dominion. Competition is what is needed there. If, by leasing a road to a company, you give them a monopoly of the railway, as a steamboat company has now of the river, it will be most prejudicial to the best interests of the country.

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I think the Pembina Branch should be retained by the Government as a means of inducing other companies, besides the one to which it is proposed to lease this road, to build up to our frontier. Whoever will look at the map of the country will see that the company to which it is proposed to lease the railway is the one to which it is least desirable to give a monopoly of the trade of the North-West.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—That company is the St. Paul and Pacific Railway Company. Its terminus is at St. Paul on the Mississippi. Its study will be to accomplish what will be for its own interest, to carry all the trade of our North-West to St. Paul. There is another company, a rival of the St. Paul and Pacific Railway, the Northern Pacific, which is in operation now from Duluth, on Lake Superior, to beyond the Red River. The St. Paul & Pacific Railway crosses that line on its way to Manitoba, so that at the present moment both lines occupy one and the same position relatively to Manitoba. Now, it would be much more to the interest of this country to have our trade—so long as it is necessary that our trade should pass through United States channels, which it must do until we have our own road open—go to Duluth than to St. Paul; because at Duluth the trade would reach Lake Superior, and would descend by the lakes, affording the St. Lawrence route as good a chance as any other route,—perhaps the best chance—of obtaining a large share of that traffic. I think this is very important. It is the only way in which we can secure for years to come any portion of the trade, to obtain which we are spending many millions of dollars.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—But the portion of that trade which would reach the Mississippi at St. Paul would be diverted completely and hopelessly from the St. Lawrence, and from all Canadian channels and markets. This is not a matter of opinion; it is a matter of certainty, and it is unfortunate that the Government should place the trade of that new country in the position I have described if it can be in any way averted. It may be said that the trade of the North-West will not be sufficient to induce two companies to extend their lines to compete for it. That may or may not be true, but we know how apt railway companies are to compete with one another; and if one line is extended to an important point whence there is valuable trade, the other, its rival, is almost certain to follow it. If we retain the Pembina Branch in our own hands and the Government work it for the benefit of Manitoba and its trade, there will be a constant and standing inducement to the other railway company, the Northern Pacific, to come up and participate in that trade. If the lease be given it will no doubt contain stipulations declaring that other companies shall be entitled to make equitable running arrangements with the lessee. But we know what that means. We know the obstacles which a railway company can place in the way of its rival. Those obstacles will probably be insuperable, and the monopoly will be completely in the hands of the lessee. I do not see why a lease should be of such importance to the Company. All that it requires, all that its interests seem to demand, is to be assured of the completion of the Pembina Branch, and that the Government will make favorable running arrangements. It is in the power of the Government, without coming to Parliament at all, to give this assurance to the Company, and if they should require the assent of Parliament it is quite certain that the Legislature would very cheerfully ratify such an arangement. That is all the St. Paul & Pacific Railway Company should ask; that is all that their interests require, and it is certainly all that Manitoba, all that Canada should grant to that company. If more be done in the interests of the Company it will be to the prejudice of Canada.

Hon Mr. Macpherson.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—An hon. Senator the other day spoke of the impossibility of endeavoring to retain the trade of the North-West in our own channels, and of the difficulty of changing the course of trade when it is once established. We have all had experience enough to know that the channels of trade become fixed and settled very quickly, and that they deepen very rapidly. I think it would be deplorable if the Government and the Parliament of this country should allow the great and promising trade of the North-West country to flow into American channels, under such circumstances as would render it exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, during the present generation, to divert it from those channels and direct it into our own. I do not think, hon. gentlemen, there is the slightest doubt of the St. Paul & Pacific Company completing their railway up to our frontier, whether a lease of the Pembina Branch be given to them or not. I do not think my hon. friends from Manitoba have anything to fear on that score. It is quite certain, from the arrangements that have already been made, and the interests of the parties concerned, whether a lease be given or not, that that road will be brought to our frontier at Pembina, assuming, of course, (and it may be assumed with perfect confidence) that the Pembina Branch will be finished, and open to that company to run their trains over. That is all that is necessary to facilitate the extension of the St. Paul & Pacific Railway, and to obtain all the facilities for communication which Manitoba can have in that direction, with the advantage that if this is done, they will not be exposed to the disadvantage of being bound to a monopoly. I cannot imagine any good reason why, if the road is to be leased to that company, this House should not have an opportunity of considering that lease, and determining whether it is in the interest of the country or not. If the lease be made in the interest of the country, it is certain that it will be sanctioned by this House.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Its importance, in my opinion, cannot be over estimated. I look upon it as of much greater importance than the lease which the Government contemplated entering into only two or three weeks ago. I refer to the leasing, or otherwise acquiring of the portion of the Grand Trunk Railway which lies between Quebec and Riviere du Loup, connecting there with the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—There can be no comparison.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certainly not.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Which is the more important in the estimation of the hon. gentleman?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Riviere du Loup Road, certainly. It involves, practically, the question of a million of dollars.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—It is a matter, so far as the real interests of the country are concerned, unimportant compared to the leasing of the Pembina Branch, because it does not affect the question of trade at all.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The only question involved, is whether the Government shall own 128 miles more railway—whether the Intercolonial shall be extended from Riviere du Loup to Quebec.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It will entail an annual charge of some hundreds of thousands of dollars on the country, for all time to come; and that is what my hon. friend thinks unimportant.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The misfortune is, that the hon. gentleman—and and it is not confined to the hon Secretary of State, but extends to all his colleagues—seems incapable of comprehending and grasping the true and great interests of the country. The trade of the North-West may be largely affected by the lease of the Pembina Branch. If there was no trade, or if we did not expect a return, direct or indirect, we would not have built the Intercolonial or Pacific Railways, and we would not have constructed the canals or other public works. But was it not because of the anticipated value to the country, of having such facilities for its commerce, and of the immense aid they would render in increasing the trade and wealth of the country, that they are constructed? We are not getting a direct return from them. But will any one try to imagine what the condition of this country would be to day without those great improvements?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not belittling them. You are challenging my idea of comparison as to which of the two projects is of greater importance.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I think the one that may carry from us the whole trade of the North-West, is more important by far than the one which will simply increase by 128 miles, the length of the Intercolonial Railway. The hon. gentleman is a great advocate of the Georgian Bay Branch Railway; does he expect a return from that work? The hon. gentleman tells us what it will cost a year to maintain 128 miles of railway between Quebec and Riviere du Loup; will he tell us what the cost of the Georgian Bay Branch and its maintenance will be?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Government do not intend to bear any part of the loss, if there is any.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The Georgian Bay Branch was projected as a Government work, and I have not heard of any change having been proposed by the Government in relation to it. I maintain, and I believe that every hon. gentleman who takes a proper view of the true interests of the country will agree with me, that the leasing of the Pembina Branch to a foreign company is very much more important, from a national point of view, than the leasing or acquiring of the Riviere du Loup Branch of the Grand Trunk Railway. I find by a notice given by the Prime Minister in another place, referring to the proposed acquisition from the Grand Trunk Company of that piece of railway, that he proposed to make the arrangement, whatever it might be, subject to the approval of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Now, if Parliament is to have an opportunity of passing upon that arrangement, I should like to know why Parliament should not have an opportunity of passing upon the other proposed arrangement also? I think that this notice of the Prime Minister is a complete answer to what has been urged by the hon. Secretary of State against this House asserting its right to consider whatever lease or running arrangement is made of the Pembina Branch.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The precedent of the course pursued by this House, with respect to the Georgian Bay Branch, has been frequently referred to. I think the members of the Government in this House—the hon. Secretary of State is the only member of the Ministry who was here then and now—should not refer to that case. It is one which I think was not exactly worthy of the Government. That legislation was obtained without the knowledge of this House.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—No, no.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman may say “No, no.” He, as a friend of the Georgian Bay Branch scheme, may have been told what was intended, but I undertake to say that of the few members who were present when that Bill was passed through this House, very few knew that it contained the provision complained of. Very few of the members who were then present knew that they were voting away a portion of their legislative rights, and I will undertake to say that the hon. Secretary of State cannot point to a word of explanation from himself on that occasion calling the attention of the House to the important surrender they were asked to make on that night.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that they were asked to make a surrender.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Our having done so then, is now urged as a reason for doing it again, it has been cited as a precedent. I hope the House will adhere to the resolution arrived at when the Bill was last the subject of consideration, and maintain their right to consider and deal with whatever arrangement is made with the parties interested in the St. Paul and Pacific Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The House seems to be laboring under a misconception in this matter; it has been assumed over and over again that the Senate was hoodwinked in some improper manner, in order to pass the Pacific Railway Act; that it has abnegated some of its functions, and that there was something in the Pacific Railway Act that I ought to have explained on that occasion. The Act had been discussed for some time, both in the House of Commons and in the newspapers of the country; and I am not aware that any part of the prerogative of this House was voted away in the passing of that Bill. What does my hon. friend allude to? In what way has this House been placed in any worse position than the House of Commons with regard to the Georgian Bay Branch?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Any contract or lease made by the Government respecting that road must be submitted to the House of Commons for their approval or disapproval.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This House assume everything against the Government, they do not take the trouble to look into the Statute and analyze it, but point out everything in connection with the Pacific Railway, as an evidence of how the Government have ignored this House, and profess it is a proof that the policy and management of the Government with respect to the Pacific Railway, are not in the interests of the people of this country. This House parted with none of its prerogatives on that occasion, inasmuch as the contracts for the Georgian Bay Branch, or any other branch of the Pacific Railway are not to be laid before the House of Commons. The Pembina Branch contract was not laid before the House of Commons; it did not require ratification there any more than the Georgian Bay Branch contract required their ratification. The eleventh section of the Act provides that:—“No contract for the construction of any portion of the main line of the said railway shall be binding until it shall have been laid before the House of Commons for "one month without being disapproved, unless sooner approved by a resolution of the House." It will be seen that that clause refers to contracts for the main line, and not to contracts or agreements in connection with the branch lines of the road.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL--That is not the point.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT--The point is, when this Bill was passed, it was urged that this House had divested itself of the same right to pronounce upon the Georgian Bay Branch contract that the House of Commons retained. But the House of Commons has no power under the Act to pronounce upon any contract that may be entered into for any branch of the Pacific Railway. The unfortunate contract that the late Mr. Foster took from the Government, did not require the ratification of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLER--Unless you have a special exception or reservation of these branch lines, does not the general rule apply to the branches as well as to the main line?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT--It has never been done. Contracts have not been subjected to the approval of the House of Commons. The Georgian Bay Branch contract was given out after the House rose in 1874, when this was fresh in the minds of everybody, and no objection was made to it. Then the contract for the Pembina Branch was not confirmed by the House in advance.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I spoke of the powers that the Government took under the Act.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL--The power which the Government took with respect to the Georgian Bay Branch was for leasing, and not for construction; and is as follows: "The Governor-in-Council may, at any time after the construction of the said branch of the railway, make with the company or companies over any portion of the said branch of the railway, such arrangements for leasing to such company or companies any portion of the said branch of the railway which may belong to the Government, on such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, &c." That would not have been passed by this House if we had been aware that there was such a provision in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT--It is a different thing.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL--That is the point. It was the very last day of the Session the Bill was passed. The House broke up on the twenty-sixth, and this Bill was in Committee on the twenty-third.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT--It bears out what I said. I state most emphatically that the hon. gentleman who last addressed us, led the House to believe, in regard to the giving out of the work on the Georgian Bay Branch, that this House had been debarred of its rights. I stated that this House was in precisely the same position as the other House in relation to that contract, and that the contracts for branches of the Pacific Railway were not intended to be submitted to either House, and, in fact, were not submitted.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL--I do not understand how the hon. gentleman draws any distinction between the branches and the main line, even on that point.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT--These contracts are always brought down to the House as all other orders are brought down; but that does not confirm the conclusions which the hon. gentleman desires to establish, that, in a matter of this kind, this Bill should be amended to give this House, practically, a veto power over the right of the Government to lease the Pembina Branch. I do not think the evidence brought up by the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland had any bearing on this question, except, perhaps, the postal arrangement made with the Allans, but it was a matter of very great magnitude. It involved the expenditure of $150,000 a year. The hon. gentleman from Saugeen has come to the conclusion that the Government has not acted in the interests of the people of this country in not completing the Pembina Branch years ago.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON--Especially the interests of the people of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT--I explained the other day that had we gone on and built that road and equipped it, we would simply be enabled to run the line into a wilderness without being able to disturb the monopoly of the Transportation Company on the Red River.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Then why was it commenced?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was commenced because we thought we should have induced the St. Paul & Pacific Railway Company to extend their line so as to make a connection with our road at the boundary line. Had the Government brought in locomotives and equipped that road without any connection having been made with the American lines, the hon. gentleman opposite would have been one of the first to ridicule such an absurdity. The Government had certain knowledge that the people who were interested in the Northern Pacific and in the St. Paul & Pacific Railways were anxious to go on with their lines, and there was an understanding that they would push on their roads to the frontier if this Government would go on with the Pembina Branch and complete it. Both of those companies were in deep water, however, and they had all they could do to keep up their lines as they were without extending them. The Northern Pacific Company, notwithstanding their enormous land grant from the United States Government, had only been enabled to build 535 miles of railway, although they had spent $30,000,000, and had practically gone into bankruptcy. The St. Paul & Pacific Railway was in similar circumstances. I think it is within the recollection of hon. gentlemen that the question has been asked here, year after year, whether the Government intended to go on and build this branch, and the answer was, that the Dutch bondholders of the Northern Pacific were considering the question of extending their line, and that a correspondence had been opened with those gentlemen, asking them if they would not make up their minds to build this extension at once, and avail themselves of the advantages of the trade that must necessarily flow to their line by connection with Winnipeg. The hon. gentleman has heard that answer given to the question in this House.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I will tell the hon. gentleman what intimation was given to this House by his colleague, the present Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, in 1875. He told this House that the Pembina Branch would be opened the following summer.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was believed by the Government that those people with whom we were then in correspondence could have been induced to build this extension of the Northern Pacific road; but they were not able to extend it to the Canadian frontier. The Northern Pacific Railway had 104 miles of road to build to connect with our frontier, and the St. Paul & Pacific Railway Company, who have proposed to lease the Pembina Branch, have less than 30 miles to build to connect with our road at Pembina.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The Government ought to have loaned them the steel rails and built that extension.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman would have approved of that I suppose?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I would.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman says if the Government can only make a lease in the interests of this country this House will adopt it. I will ask hon. gentlemen to point out any part of the policy of the Government in relation to the Pacific Railway that the hon. gentleman has approved of? Not a single one! With respect to the Georgian Bay Branch he condemned the Government for giving out a contract to Mr. Foster to build that line without having made a survey, while he seemed to ignore entirely the fact, that the late Government had entered into a contract to build the whole line of the Pacific Railway without any survey of the country having been made. We tried the policy of the late Government with reference to that short piece of line, and we were condemned because we did so. The Georgian Bay Branch was simply put into the Pacific Railway to make connection with the Quebec system; and while it is called a branch it will be practically a part of the main line when the road is constructed north of Lake Superior. We tried this experiment that has been so often urged upon us as being the proper thing to do, and the country has seen the result. But we have been told at the same time by hon. gentlemen opposite, that we failed in our duty in giving out the Georgian Bay Branch contract without having made an exhaustive survey. Has there been any consistency or fair play shown towards the Government? I say there has been no fair play extended to the Government; and no matter what course we take we are denounced by hon. gentlemen opposite, as not acting in the interests of the country. Then we were told it was not in the interests of the country that we should have bought all this land at Fort William. But I think hon. gentlemen in the future, will admit that we have acted wisely and prudently, both in placing the terminus on the Kaministiquia, and in purchasing the quantity of land we did. I am quite satisfied if the Government had taken the terminus to Prince Arthur's Landing, hon. gentlemen opposite would have condemned them, for not having located it at the Kaministiquia.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—The Hon. Secretary of State has no right to make such an assertion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is my own conviction, painful as the conviction is that I have arrived at, and I say it with very great sorrow, hon. gentlemen opposite cannot point to a single act of the Government in connection with their railway policy, that they have not condemned them for, and told them if they had done something else it would have been better for the country. In no instance has any fair play been extended to us. Even when I asked for a committee of this House to investigate the charges against the Government, hon. gentlemen would not give the Government the fair play to which they were entitled of a majority of one on the Committee.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I rise to a point of order. It is not in order for any hon. gentleman to condemn the course which has been taken by this House in the manner in which the Hon. Secretary of State is now doing. He says the House is likely to pronounce against the Kaministiquia terminus, and if the Government had selected Prince Arthur's Landing for the terminus they would be as likely to pronounce against it. I say it is treating the House with disrespect, because no member has a right to speak disrespectfully of the decisions of the House, and I think nothing is more disrespectful than to say, if the Government had selected either of the two places, the House would have pronounced against them. The Kaministiquia terminus is the only terminus that has been before the House. Prince Arthur's Landing has never been before the House as a terminus, and if the House has pronounced against the Kaministiquia, the majority have no right to be stigmatized as pronouncing unfairly against the Government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If my observations have been taken as an offence, I wish to withdraw them. In discussing this question, as I thought I might fairly have done, to illustrate my point, I adverted to other sections of the Pacific Railway, where the charge had been made that the Government had not acted in the interests of the country; not only that, but the hon. gentleman from Saugeen had stated the Government had acted very stupidly.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—That is not what I said. What I stated was, that the hon. Secretary of State did not seem to seize or grasp the important interests of this country as affecting its trade.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will dismiss that branch of the subject, as I do not wish to say anything offensive to the House. I felt that the expressions I made use of, were forced from me by remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite; but I cheerfully withdraw the charge.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—With reference to the diversion of this trade of the North-West to the United States, hon. gentlemen know very well that under the Act of 1872, the construction of the Pembina Branch was authorized, and it was understood that it was really to be the first portion of the road that was to be constructed; and shortly after this Government came into power, they took authority to build it. I do not think it is quite fair, with a knowledge of the fact, that the Government had used every inducement to get the American Companies to extend their lines to the frontier, that we should be charged with a want of sincerity in not pushing on the construction of the Pembina Branch. Three months could have finished the Pembina Branch at any time, but there was no possible object to be gained by finishing it until there was some chance of making connection with other railways.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I would be very sorry to impute anything that was not strictly fair to the Government, but I maintain that the little it would cost to run that railway would have been well spent in the interests of Manitoba. It would have shortened the journey between Winnipeg and the frontier nearly twenty hours, and it would have been a standing inducement to the American railways to push on their lines and make the connection.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They had a standing inducement, as they knew very well that the Government of this country was able to complete the road in a short time, whenever it was necessary to do so. A few months ago a number of gentlemen who have Canadian interests, as well as other interests, made a proposition to the Government, that they would undertake to extend the St. Paul & Pacific road to the boundary line, provided we would give specific advantages in connection with the Pembina Branch; it was purely a commercial enterprise with them, and not a patriotic one. It was important that the people of Manitoba should have some connection with the American railways. At all events, there would be this advantage: if the railway was to be a monopoly they would, at least during the summer season, have a rival route by water. The first proposition was for the twenty-one years running arrangement over the Pembina Branch. This the Government had declined, as they did not wish a diversion of the trade of the North-West into American channels should take place during that long period. It would be giving them extraordinary advantages, and might probably weaken or diminish the value of the road through our own territory when it came into operation. The negotiations went on until they arrived at this particular point, that they were prepared to enter into an arrangement, say, for a ten years' proposition; and that is how ten years came to be stated in the Bill. It is considered it will take five years before the all-rail route between Lake Superior and Red River is completed. During that time the Company would probably have some advantage in the winter season, and the remaining five years of the lease. That is all they would have, because, when our road between Red River and Lake Superior is in operation in the summer time, it would have superior advantages to any that the St. Paul & Pacific Railway could afford for our traffic. In the first place, the distance to Lake Superior would be much shorter, and, in the second place, the American roads would have to make connections with other lines, and the freight and passenger rates would therefore be in excess of what they would be on our line through to Fort Garry. Therefore, it was thought that, in view of the many important advantages that would accrue to Manitoba; and considering the large number of people who are now going into that country, and the great excess of cereals that will be produced in the North-West in the next few years, the Government thought, and I think the House will agree with that view, that it was wise to make this temporary arrangement if they could, and thereby induce the St. Paul and Pacific Railway Company to give us all-rail communication with Manitoba within a few months. I think it is perfectly clear that it was a wise proposition, and I think this House will quite concur in the opinion that the Government acted prudently in proposing the terms they did. The House went fully into the constitutional question the other day, and I do not think it is necessary for me to advert to it again. I scarcely think the precedent quoted by my hon. friend from Kingston is one in point, which was a question of the trusteeship of certain school moneys that were being administered by the Government in pursuance of certain Orders-in-Council. The points quoted by my hon. friend from Westmorland had a greater bearing upon it—particularly that in reference to the postal contract with the Allans, of which I had been at the moment in ignorance. That is the only one that struck me at all as a precedent for the proposed action of this House, and my answer to it is this: that it involved a considerable amount of annual expenditure extending over a very considerable number of years. With respect to the acquiring of the River du Loup branch of the Grand Trunk Railway, I consider there is no parallel between the two cases. My reason is this: that in making the running arrangement with the St. Paul & Pacific Railway Company it is a matter that will act financially to our advantage, and the other would no doubt involve a considerable charge on the revenue of the country for some years to come. That is where I consider there is a very marked distinction between the two cases. I did advert to this important point also the other day, that, inasmuch as this Government had not, unfortunately, a majority in the Senate, and could not count upon any act or policy of theirs being approved of by this Chamber, parties would not feel that confidence in entering into an arrangement with the Government that they would if it was to be only passed upon by the Commons, where the Government have a majority. The Government must, in such matters, have the unlimited confidence of Parliament, and unless their proposition is one that is entirely unjustifiable, they can count on the support of their friends in the Commons. But the case is not similar in this Chamber. It is very well known that the Government are in a very large minority here, and they cannot, of course, have the same confidence in submitting a proposition of this nature to this House, more particularly where the interests of third parties are concerned. This proposition, to be of any value, would have to be commenced very soon after the House rises. It was announced the other day, that before the end of the present Session, the all-rail route would be open to Winnipeg on the assumption that this contract would be entered into at once, between the St. Paul & Pacific Railway and the Government of Canada. Hon. gentlemen have adverted to the reasonableness of the Government informing this House of the terms of the lease, and I stated it would have given me very great pleasure to have done so, had I been in possession of the details of the proposed arrangements, to have laid them on the table. But I state most emphatically, that the Government were not in possession of such information at the time, as to enable them to arrive at the details. The proposition had been made on one side, and was being considered on the other, but not the details. The details were for running arrangements, and were, if such arrangements were made, there should be no discriminating freight or passenger tariff on the other side of the line; that the mileage rates on the northern side of the line should be the same as on the south side; that no monopoly should be given, practically, even to this road; that they should have the Canadian traffic, but only on terms that were not in excess of any terms that any other road within reach would be willing to offer. In other words, if the Northern Pacific Railway Company were willing to carry our traffic between Glynndon and Duluth for a certain rate, that the St. Paul & Pacific Railway road should not charge any more for carrying it round by St. Paul. In this there was the greatest necessity to protect the interests of the people of Manitoba, and in order to do so, it was necessary that the rates to be charged on the northern side of the line should be subject to approval by the Governor-in-Council. Practically, that is the whole point with the exception of this particular one which I previously adverted to; that is, whether it is better the road should be leased, or whether we should simply make running arrangements. In one case we would be relieved of considerable expense in providing rolling stock, and of the annual charge of maintaining and officering the road. It is a matter, I think, that will be conceded, that the Government cannot successfully run a railway, and that a private enterprise can do it much more successfully and much more cheaply. I do not think the Government will be in a position, when the House rises, to say which proposition they will be likely to enter upon.

Hon. Mr. Scott,

At 6 o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY resumed the debate. He said: On approaching the discussion of this question, I desire to do so in the spirit indicated by my hon. friend from Westmoreland, not with a view to party triumph, but to the best interests of the Dominion, and it is because I believe that the majority of this House will consider in the same spirit, any lease that may be submitted to them, that I venture to advocate the amendment which reserves to this Chamber its undoubted constitutional right of passing upon that lease.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—The hon Secretary of State, in addressing the House on a former occasion, gave reasons why this House should not pass upon that lease, and he thought it not unbecoming for him to say, in substance, that he could not expect an unprejudiced expression of opinion on the terms of that lease from the majority of this House. He has repeated that statement to-day, and I feel myself justified in calling upon the hon. member to assign his reasons for flinging such a taunt across the House. The hon. gentleman has not ventured to give us a reason for that opinion, except by referring to our action in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not stop to inquire into the almost trivial objection which he took to the course taken in this House on moving for a Committee to investigate the Kaminstiquia matter, when he told us the House showed its feeling—although he did not express the term, he conveyed it—its partial feeling by refusing to give the Government an equality on the Committee. He knows it necessarily must be composed of an uneven number. At the time I ventured to call his attention to the words of quite as great a man in the country to which we look for much of our inspiration on such a question. I referred to Mr. Gladstone's complaint of the composition of a Committee in the English House of Commons, because it was supposed to be unfavorable to him, and he undertook to say in even stronger language than my hon. friend has used, he would have no confidence in that committee, but the Premier of the day in England was too good a parliamentarian in a matter in which an implied change was made against the Government, to insist upon the appointment of a committee composed of a majority of his supporters. My hon. friend when asked to furnish a reason for his argument with reference to the matter which has come up this afternoon, mentioned the case of the Georgian Bay Branch; but it was because my hon. friend cited that as a precedent applicable to this case that the question was of any importance at all. He said the legislation of 1874 furnished a precedent because it placed the leasing of the Georgian Bay Branch, under the approval of the House of Commons alone. My hon. friend has been obliged to tell us to-day, and to tell us truly, that there is nothing in that Act about the leasing of the Georgian Bay Branch.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—He might have gone further and told us, there is nothing in that Act respecting the leasing of the Pembina Branch. It is a significant fact that Section 15 refers, not to the Georgian Bay Branch—that is, the branch extending from the Eastern terminus of the Pacific Railway to the Georgian Bay—but to an entirely different line, the line extending from the Eastern terminus to the Canada Central.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was answering my hon. friend from Toronto, and I showed conclusively that the contract to which he referred did not require to be ratified by either House.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—My hon. friend said truly there was nothing in that Act requiring the ratification of either House. The matter itself would have had no significance if it had not been brought forward as a precedent to be followed in this legislation. The question of submitting the terms of the contract with regard to the Georgian Bay Branch arose entirely on that part which has, perhaps by some confusion of terms, been spoken of as the Georgian Bay Branch, the part extending from the Eastern terminus of the Canadian Pacific to the Canada Central. There was in addition to that, the 14th section granting $12,000 a mile to that extension, and the contract for that portion was to be submitted to the House of Commons for its ratification. Why? Because it was a matter involving a grant of money, while this involves no such grant, and my hon. friend will see that all the precedents he quoted the other day referred to the very same principle, to cases in which there were contracts requiring grants of money, and, as a matter of course, while in England, as here, the initiation of money grants remains with the House of Commons, it was right that contracts involving the expenditure of money should be submitted to the House of Commons. My hon. friend himself was obliged to quote precedents in regard to a large contract involving the expenditure of some millions of pounds on the Portsmouth fortifications where it was required to be submitted to the House of Lords as well as the House of Commons. We have had precedents brought before us to-day showing in a very analogous manner how those questions have been treated in our own Parliament. While there is nothing in this Pacific Railway Act referring to the question of leasing these lines, the 19th section shows clearly what was the obvious intention and spirit of this Act with regard to those contracts.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That provides for giving Parliament all the information.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Certainly. The whole spirit of this Act was that the Senate as well the House of Commons should have control not merely with regard to expenditure, but to contracts entered into by the Government. While reference has been made to the Georgian Bay Branch contract, I do not intend to go back to the manner in which this Act was passed. It happens, so far as I am concerned, I had no responsibility in that matter, because I was not here when it was before this House; but I can imagine that an Act introduced on the eve of prorogation, containing a great many sections, and passed hastily, might contain such a provision without attracting the notice of hon. members. No opportunity was given to examine minutely into all its sections. So far from regarding that as a precedent to be followed, if my hon. friend will remember, it has been a standing cause of complaint in this House that such a provision was contained in the Act. If this is to be cited as a precedent, the best answer to it is that if it were to be done over again there could not be found a majority in this House to consent to such a departure from the well understood principles of the Constitution. While I am upon that subject I may as well pass to the only two cases which, by any possibility, can be brought forward by my hon. friend as bearing upon his very severe criticism of the conduct of this House. Those cases are the Georgian Bay Branch contract, and the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Bill. With regard to the Georgian Bay Branch, I contend whether that was a question that ought or ought not to have been submitted to the Senate, the event proved that we were right, and when we objected to that contract, not merely because it was made without any survey, but upon other grounds, we had our best justification in the subsequent conduct of the Government, who were obliged, within a few months, to cancel that very contract.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—With regard to the only other question which arose, the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway—I am not going into the details of that case. It is only necessary to remind my hon. friend in regard to that question, that we were not only supported by a good many gentlemen on this side of the House, but by some who usually support the Government, and so far from it having been treated as a party question, it was opposed, as I contend all other questions relating to the Pacific Railway have been, upon its merits. Within five months after the defeat of that Bill, the Government adopted the very view held by the majority in this House, and embodied that view in a minute of Council, giving the very reasons urged by the majority here. That is an historical fact that cannot be got over, and a gentleman who protested against that bill in the other House, (Hon. Mr. Blake) subsequently became a member of the Government, and gave his talents to the preparation of the state paper to which I have alluded.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I have already spoken of the puerile attempt to create a feeling against this House, because in this Chamber, where the Government rather boast that they are in a minority, we would not give the Secretary of State a majority on a committee to enquire into the conduct of the Government. If the hon. gentleman can furnish a precedent for that demand, I shall be glad to hear it, but I believe there is none. My hon. friend has gone over a great deal of ground where I do not propose to follow him. He has given us a dissertation on almost every phase of the Pacific Railway, from ocean to ocean. I shall not attempt to follow him in his extraordinary argument that, though the Government lost a million or a million and a half of dollars on the notorious steel rails purchase, yet they more than made it up by postponing the work until labor got cheap. In other words, the poor laborer is to be consoled by the fact that the Government, instead of trying in any way to alleviate the commercial depression that has brought down laborers wages, with the other industrial interests in this country, have atoned for this loss by the gain in the reduced price.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I do not propose to follow my hon. friend into this extraordinary feature of his case, nor do I propose to go into any discussion as to whether the Intercolonial Railway was built in seven years, as I always believed it was, or fourteen years, as my hon. friend made it out the other day. He has quoted precedents; I will give him another precedent that is not very old, it is only as old as the very present day on which we are speaking. The hon. gentleman disputes the doctrine that the Senate would have any power or control over this lease. He has been well answered on that point, but the hon. gentleman introduced a Bill here which was under discussion to-day, and I refer him to the 12th section of that Bill—the Auditor-General's—which struck me as it was passing through Committee. There, in a matter which concerns merely the public expenditure, my hon. friend and his Government have thought proper to embody the correct constitutional principle that the Senate even in that case should have an equal voice with the House of Commons. In presenting this question to the House on the second reading, I commented somewhat strongly perhaps upon the policy of this measure, and I am happy to find my views on that point sustained to-day by two of my hon. friends from Toronto. I do not propose to follow the Hon. Secretary of State in his wandering through Minnesota, and his remarks as to where the road should begin or where it should end, all of which was evidently intended to draw us away from the point at issue, which is that the lease should be submitted to the Senate as well as the House of Commons. I shall confine myself to the main question. In addressing the House on a former occasion, I took the ground that this was a question relative to the disposal of national property. That is the great point. My hon. friend seems unable, or if willing, indisposed, to recognise the distinction between making a contract for the leasing of a branch railway, and a contract for disposing of public property. Whether it be for a long or short time, is of no consequence, the principle is the same—that is, you are dealing with national property, and disposing of it. That was my contention; and I am happy to find it supported by the precedents which my hon. friend from Westmoreland has saved me the trouble of quoting, especially the two cases exactly in point—the disposition of the Windsor and Annapolis line, and the Truro and Pictou Branch of the Intercolonial Railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We gave away those lines absolutely.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—The Government gave them away it is true, but it is of no consequence whether they were given away, sold or leased. In any case, before the Government could have power to deal with them, they had to submit a resolution asking this Senate as well as the House of Commons, to sanction that transfer.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—It makes no difference whether it was leased for the term of ten years or a hundred years, or an absolute transfer, the principle is the same. My hon. friend has glossed over the Ocean Mail contract, which he admits is a strong case in point; but he has very ingeniously, if not ingenuously, overlooked the other two cases to which I have referred, which are exactly in point. Under the circumstances, the hon. gentleman need not be surprised that we on this side of the House desire to maintain the constitutional power which belongs to this Senate of enquiring into all measures affecting the policy of the country, and especially the disposition of public property. That argument has never been answered, never grappled with. All the precedents of my hon. friend apply to the voting of money for after purposes, but he has found no precedent in the Railway Act, or any other legislation, for giving power to the Government to transfer or lease the public property without the consent of the two Houses of Parliament. I must say in conclusion, that the whole of this question lies, after all, in a nut-shell. Is it desirable or constitutional that this House should delegate the undoubted powers which it has under the Constitution, to the Government and to the House of Commons?

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—That is the question. If not, then we should retain the powers we have. The question as to the terms of this lease is of comparatively minor moment to the great constitutional question, whether we should denude ourselves of the power of considering those terms at all. I confess when that lease is produced I shall look principally to it to see whether it is likely to afford speedy communication to our friends in Manitoba. It is with that view that I and every member on this side of the House, I believe, will look at it. I should like some better reason than any I have yet heard, why this House should be deprived of the power of examining that lease, and why it is that we should be met with such distrust. What right has the Secretary of State to distrust this House, and to state boldly that he has no confidence in the majority here? I have shown with regard to this Canadian Pacific Railway, he has no grounds for this imputation. He has himself stated that all his criticisms are confined to our action with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I venture to say there is nothing in the antecedents of this House which will justify the limitation of its powers in the way the Secretary of State has suggested. I do hope this House will stand up for its constitutional rights, and I hope the members who are called upon to vote to-day to shut out this

Hon. Mr. Dickey.

House from the power of examining this lease, will reflect what the effect of that precedent will be in the future. The accident of to-day places this side of the House in a majority, but the accident of to-morrow may give hon. gentlemen opposite a majority, in antagonism to the majority in the other branch of the Legislature. And then they would find themselves, by the precedent they are desirous of establishing to-day, denuded of the right of examining into anything in the nature of a lease for disposing of a part of the public domain of this country to foreigners, as we are asked to do by our votes to-day.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER—I was very much pleased with the statement made by my hon. friend from Westmoreland, that this House protected the rights of the smaller Provinces. I shall confine my remarks to Manitoba, because I consider that the North-West Territory will very soon—before half a century—be the backbone of the Dominion. I am exceedingly anxious, therefore, that we should at once give that country railway facilities. I think it is my duty to state to the House the facts with which I am acquainted, with reference to the transportation of emigrants to that country, and the large amount of luggage they are taking with them. The reason why the question comes up at this time, is the fact, there is business enough to support a railway, and a railway must be constructed very soon. If the Government do not build the railroad in Manitoba to Pembina, they will be neglecting their duty; because the number of emigrants going there now is so great that, if anything like the grasshopper plague should occur this year, there might be a famine in the land, and no means of transporting provisions for the people of that country. When business grows up, you will find plenty of people to build railroads, and run them, and that is what has led capitalists to invest money to extend the line of the St. Paul & Pacific Railway towards Pembina. The Grand Trunk Railway Company is now taking a car-load from Prescott to Fisher's Landing for $200, or at the rate of 14 cents a mile. The railway from St. Paul to Fisher's Landing is 320 miles in length, and for that portion the St.

Paul & Pacific Railway Company take the same mileage as we do; that is 14 cents. The distance from Fisher's Landing to Winnipeg will be about 125 miles by rail; and according to the rates charged you will get freight conveyed over that road, when completed, at $17 per car load. At present the distance by the river is 350 miles, and it costs from Fisher's Landing to Winnipeg $49 per car load. That is the rate paid to the steamboat company instead of $17 which the railroad would charge when constructed.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER—It is most essential to the opening up of that new country that the people should have the advantage of railway communication. I cannot understand what fear the Government have in making a contract for running connections from Pembina to Winnipeg, with the St. Paul & Pacific Railway. I have had a conversation with those interested in building that short distance of 75 miles from Fisher's Landing to Pembina, and they are perfectly willing to take the same rates that the Grand Trunk Railway is now receiving; they look for nothing more. It is well known that a lease or contract for running arrangements in these days can be settled in 24 hours; and I cannot see what difficulty the Government can have in making an arrangement with the company, or why they are postponing the matter until next Session. I think the route ought to be opened this fall, because every facility should be given to those who are emigrating to the North-West to settle there. Great numbers have gone from Montreal and from this section—Ottawa district—this spring. The Grand Trunk Railway Company carried 110 persons in one party, and 30 or 40 in another; and hundreds are ready to go with car loads of luggage. The freight is very large in proportion to the number of passengers. If this section between Fisher's Landing and Winnipeg were opened it would cost from Prescott to Winnipeg $217 per car load, without transshipment, while the price paid now is $249.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER—I believe this Hon. Mr. Ferrier.

Senate would make a very great mistake in resigning their right to examine the lease or running arrangements that may be entered into by the Government. I cannot understand what objection the Government can have to submitting that lease to the Senate for our approval, because I am sure there is not a member on this side of the House that would refuse to sanction a scheme such as the Grand Trunk Railway is making every day, with railroads with which they have connections. Whether the Government make any arrangements or not, I am fully convinced that these gentlemen who are taking up this road, seeing the profit that is to be made out of it, will carry out their intention whether the Government lease the Pembina Branch or not, if they will only construct that road at once. I base my opinion on the fact, that there is a most profitable business for a railway to do; and that is the reason why I believe the road will be constructed in Minnesota to the boundary. It is not every day such a certain return for an investment in a railroad presents itself; and the emigration to the North-West has only begun. With such a fertile country there, and the depression in trade in the Eastern Provinces of the Dominion, the thousands that will travel by that road must make it pay. If I were a young man I would go to Manitoba; because I believe it is the place for every young man who has energy and spirit to look after his interests. If the Government, by any political feeling—I believe there is nothing else in their objection—are prevented from giving to Manitoba the communication to which it is entitled, they deserve the censure of this House and of the country.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—Naturally, I have reflected seriously on this question, because I am deeply interested in the result of this vote. I have to consider the interests of my Province, and at the same time the rights and prerogatives of the Senate. I must say, when this measure first came before this House, not only were many hon. gentlemen prepared to limit the lease to five years, but some were determined to reject it altogether. After some explanations, they agreed that the term of ten years should remain, but with the understanding that the Bill should be amended to give the Senate the same right as the House of Commons to pass upon the lease. I thought then, and I think now, they were right.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—We ask no favor from the Government, but we claim the exercise of a right which has been recognized from time to time. The Pacific Railway Act of 1874 cannot fairly be cited as a precedent. It was passed at a late hour on a Saturday night immediately preceding prorogation, and this clause was overlooked. It seems to me the Government have, in the 16th and 19th clauses of the Act, all the power they require to lease the Pembina Branch, without coming here for the sanction of Parliament. The 16th clause is as follows:—

“The branch of the said railway from Fort Garry to Pembina, in the Province of Manitoba, shall be built either as a private enterprise, on the terms and conditions on which the main line may be constructed, or as a public work of the Dominion, under such contract or contracts as may be agreed upon and sanctioned by the Governor-in-Council.”

And the 19th section provides:—

“That the Minister of Public Works shall, within one month of the opening of each Session, lay before the two Houses of Parliament, a Report of the progress of the works and of the sums expended, together with copies of all contracts entered into since the last Report made to Parliament, for the construction of the said railway or any portion thereof, or for the running or working of the same.”

We may go through the other statutes of the present Parliament without finding another from which the principle for which we contend has been omitted. I find in 1874, in the transfer of the Windsor Branch of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, and in the purchase of the harbor of Cow Bay, the principle is recognized. In the Supreme Court Act, passed in 1875, it is provided that the rules of procedure of that Court shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament. The Act passed last Session to establish the Maritime Court of Ontario, contains a similar provision. In the Act passed the same year, to authorize the transfer of the Truro and Pictou Branch of the Intercolonial Railway, I find that such transfer must be subject to the approval of Parli-

Hon. Mr. Girard.

ment at its next session. Many other precedents have been cited, and I merely mention these to show that I have taken a deep interest in the question. This prerogative is one of the most important we possess, and it should not be surrendered. I know it is important for Manitoba to have this road built, but it is, at the same time, the duty of the Government to furnish railway communication to the Province. It seems to me this House has never pursued an obstructive policy. All the important measures which have come before this House have received such attention that the Government must feel rather encouraged to consult the Senate in such matters; and I have no hesitation in saying, that many of the errors which have been committed in connection with the Pacific Railway would have been avoided, and a large portion of the money which has been uselessly expended might have been saved to the country, if this House had been allowed an opportunity to pronounce an opinion upon the contracts entered into by the Government.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—I would feel very sorry in any way to prejudice the interests of Manitoba. The people of Winnipeg are watching our proceedings here with deep interest, but I have no fear to appear before them, and I think they will understand that I have done my duty towards them and towards my country, in acting as I have done, because, if at the present time we have the Bill before us I think it is greatly due to my efforts. The other day, when the question was before the House, I was accused by the Secretary of State of having been continually opposed to the policy of the Government on the Pacific Railway question. I do not know whether that accusation was well founded or not, but I have a duty to perform here, and it is not my fault if the policy of the Government on that great question has been such that I cannot support it.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—I have not complained of all the blunders committed by the Government, but I have had occasion to refer to some of them, and to deplore that so much of the public money of the Dominion has been expended without profit to the people of Canada or of any of the Provinces. A great responsibility rests upon this House, and although we have not control of the public money, we recognize the duty we owe to the country. I have been actuated on all occasions by a desire to do my duty and nothing else, because it is always unpleasant for one in my position, representing as I do one of the smallest Provinces in the Dominion, to have to oppose the Government. Personally I have nothing to get from the Ministry. I look for nothing for myself, but I have frequently to ask for favors for those I represent, and I know my chances of success would be much better if I were a supporter of the Administration. So long as their policy is calculated to promote the prosperity of the Dominion, they will find me ready to assist them, but their Pacific Railway policy is unjust to Manitoba, and ruinous to the country, and I am obliged to oppose it. The hon. Secretary of State says that the engineer sent to survey the route south of Lake Manitoba reported against it. That is very true, but the inference from his report is in favor of the Southern line. You cannot find a resident of Manitoba, or any one who has visited the country through which that line runs, who does not prefer it to the Northern route, and I think the time is not far distant when the question will be better understood, and the country will know that it is as much in the interest of the entire Dominion as of Manitoba that the line should run south of the Lake.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—It is right to look to the interests of future settlements in the North-West, but surely the pioneers, those who have opened up that country, should not be neglected. If one-half of the money which has been wasted on this enterprise by the Government had been expended in opening up communication through the fertile country between Winnipeg and the western boundary of Manitoba, it would have promoted settlement, and there would very soon be paying traffic for the road. Manitoba will always be the slave of the Dominion. I say this in no complaining spirit. Every dollar expended there will be repaid a hundred fold in the future. The Dominion Government possess the lands and they collect the customs and excise duties. Consequently, as the population increases, the revenue from that Province will increase. The Government have nothing to fear from this amendment. I am sure, if the lease is in the interests of this country, it will be ratified by this House. The Premier has promised that as soon as railway communication is open from the boundary of Manitoba southward, the Pembina Branch will at once be constructed. That was the reply which he gave to a delegation, of which I was a member, that waited upon him on one occasion. The surplus wheat from last year's harvest in Manitoba was five or six hundred thousand bushels. This year, from appearances, it is likely to reach one or two millions more, and all this grain must be removed. Until railway communication is opened to that country it must remain there. All Canada is interested in Manitoba. It is the hotel of the Dominion. Every Province has contributed to its population, and there is hardly a family in Ontario or Quebec that has not a member there. I shall sustain the amendment, but with this reservation—if the other House should refuse to accept it, rather than see the measure drop, I shall vote for the best interests of my Province.

Hon. Mr. READ—Perhaps there is no measure that has ever come before this House that I have felt a greater interest in than this. I believe the Senate is now chafing under the neglect of its duty to itself and to the country when it allowed the Pacific Railway Act of 1874 to pass without noticing the omission from it of the provision requiring the Government to submit contracts to this House for its approval. It was understood by everyone that the Bill contained that provision because every hon. gentleman who spoke in the debate upon it seemed to be under the impression in both Houses that all contracts must be submitted to Parliament, and not merely to the House of Commons. In consequence of that, perhaps the Bill was not so closely watched as it should have been. I know I never was more surprised than when I read the Pacific Railway Act at home, and found that contracts were to be submitted to the House of Commons only. I have always said if any Bill of that kind came before us again while I had the honor of a seat here, it should not be passed with my consent, without containing the provision for which we are now contending. The only information which we get concerning the work on the Pacific Railway is contained on one page of a blue book, and is merely a statement of the date of the contracts and the expenditures, submitted to us in accordance with the Act of 1874. I recollect how that Act was passed in this House. It was introduced late on a Friday night, and prorogation was to take place the Tuesday following. The leader of the Opposition suggested that the discussion might take place in Committee, and the Bill was accordingly read the second time without debate. At 10:30 o'clock on Saturday night the House was moved into Committee on the Bill, the leader of the Government in this House giving no explanations. It was passed hurriedly through Committee, and the House adjourned at 11:30 o'clock. It was read the third time on Monday, after a very brief discussion, and the House was prorogued the following day. In my opinion it never would have been passed without amendment had the omission of that provision been detected. So far as I am concerned, I have always regretted our negligence on that occasion, and I shall take good care, while I hold a seat in the Senate, not to be caught in such a manner again. Some of the mistakes made by the Government would have been avoided possibly if the Senate had the power of judging of the wisdom of some of these large expenditures, especially the steel rails purchase, Fort Francis Lock, and other such outlays.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—I wish to make a few remarks on this subject, because I concur in one of the later views expressed by the hon. Senator from Amherst, that the question lies in a very small compass. I intend to support the clause as it came from the House of Commons, and I desire to vindicate myself from any idea which may prevail, that because I can support that clause, therefore, I am indifferent to the rights and privileges of the Senate. I venture to say

none of the hon. gentlemen who made such powerful speeches on the other side of the House, entertain stronger views as to the rights and privileges of this House than I do, yet those views are not inconsistent with supporting the clause before us as it came from the House of Commons. I support the clause because I am a firm believer in ministerial responsibility, and if you allow it to be frittered away and divided between the Ministry, the House of Commons and the Senate, the responsibility amounts to nothing at all. How will it be next Session, supposing you are called upon to confirm a lease between the Dominion Government and some railway company in Minnesota, if the House of Commons and the Senate should sanction it, and some half a dozen years hence it should turn out to be an unprofitable arrangement to Canada? Who would be to blame? If you wish the Ministry to be held responsible for good, bad and indifferent acts, you must make them solely responsible for what they do. It is on that principle I am disposed to accept the clause as it comes from the House of Commons. My own individual opinion is that the Bill would be a great deal better without the provision requiring such lease or agreement to be submitted to the House of Commons. I think it will be within the recollection of every hon. gentleman here this evening, that within a recent period this House adopted a similar course with regard to a Bill which passed through this House. I allude to the Act relating to the inspection of penitentiaries, which amended a former Act by removing a board of three commissioners and establishing one commissioner instead. Although a good deal of objection was taken to placing a single individual in that responsible position, the House concurred in the view of the Government. I think, it is an innovation in our Constitution to submit contracts to Parliament for their approval. It seems to me to be so thoroughly inconsistent with the efficiency of the public service, that I cannot understand why it has been adopted. How is any Ministry to negotiate with a railway company or any other body upon such unfavorable terms as must necessarily be the case if a contract before it can take effect must be submitted to both Houses of Parliament, which may differ from each other as widely as the poles are asunder? How rarely has it happened in the last four or five years that this House has been in accord with the other House on questions of public policy!

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—Having thus differed on the conduct of public affairs, how can any Ministry negotiate with foreign companies under such conditions? Four or five, possibly eight or nine months must elapse before the Government can give effect to a contract. I say, too, that it is not in conformity with the analogy of our Constitution, nor to that of Great Britain. The treaty making power belongs to the Crown which acts upon the advice of responsible Ministers, but treaties made with foreign powers are not submitted to either House of Parliament for ratification though they are submitted for information and approval. In like manner I could approve of the submission of any contract that the Government might enter into with a railway company in Minnesota to both Houses of Parliament for their information, but this House already possesses the power of calling for papers of that kind whenever it may see fit, and of censuring the Government, if it consider their conduct detrimental to the public service. To state that any privilege, real or imaginary, of this House is imperilled by a measure of this sort is most ill-timed. I prefer a more suitable occasion, when the public service is not to be compromised, to do my best to maintain all the privileges the Senate can reasonably and justly claim; but whatever our rights are, I think it is highly inexpedient in the present instance to assert them. I might refer to numerous antecedents in history which confirm the views I have expressed. I will merely mention one with reference to the Senate of the United States. There the Upper House possesses the right of putting a veto on the treaty-making power, and I would just call to the recollection of hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly the hon. Senator from Kingston, who took a part in the negotiations with the United States Government upon the Treaty of Washington, which must still be fresh in his mind. There were no less than three treaties of peace negotiated between Great Britain and the United States, upon the question of the Alabama claims, and other collateral claims and differences which arose between England and the United States about the same time. One of the American ambassadors, Mr. Johnstone, negotiated a treaty. It was submitted to the United States Senate and rejected. Mr. Motley, the historian, negotiated a second treaty. That also was rejected by the United States Senate. There was a third and final treaty negotiated, which took effect with the aid of the Geneva Convention, the Halifax Convention, and by the submission of our rights in the Straits adjoining Vancouver Island, to the arbitration, of one of the European potentates. The result of the latter was unfavorable to us. We lost an important point in those Straits, which renders Victoria open to foreign attack in a way very disadvantageous to the Dominion. It may be said the United States gained by the abrogation of two treaties. They certainly obtained a large sum of money from the British Government in the third treaty to which they were not entitled, but the result does not at all defeat my argument, inasmuch as it shows the great inconvenience to which nations must be subjected by the want of individual action in such matters as the making of treaties. It may be said, this is no treaty; but the day may come when we will have to negotiate treaties with foreign powers, and a disadvantage may be felt in having to submit them to both Houses of Parliament. We can now only compare small things with great, and this treaty with a company in Minnesota may be compared with a treaty with a foreign power. It is in that way the inexpediency of diminishing the responsibility of Ministers, by allowing either or both Houses of Parliament to claim the right of ratifying such agreements, can be appreciated. On that principle, I shall vote for the clause as it came up to us from the other House. I do not wish to diminish the power of either branch of the Legislature, but I wish to impose the sole responsibility for such measures as this on the Ministers themselves. With reference to what has fallen from my hon. friend from Manitoba, and the hon. gentleman from Montreal, who spoke largely of the railway interests of Manitoba, the impression is strong in my mind, and I say, as a general supporter of the Government, with every wish to sustain their policy, I must express my firm conviction that it is their duty, as speedily as possible, to put under construction those 180 miles of road which intervene between Port Savanne and Rat Portage, in order that the all-rail route may be completed between our older Provinces and the younger sister, Manitoba, at as early a date as possible.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—I would be quite prepared to submit to somewhat heavier taxation than we have at present. I would be willing to increase our liabilities, and even strain our credit, if necessary, to accomplish an object which I consider so desirable.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—I consider it would be shirking my duty to allow this measure to pass without putting my views on record. I am opposed to leasing that road, or any portion of that road which the Government has promised this nation, to construct, at least until the whole of the work is finished. For by leasing that road to a company whose interests would not be amongst us, they would give the control of that road to men who might place it in such a position as to be almost ruinous to a large portion of this country. That road will for years be the inlet and outlet to Manitoba and the only desire of a company that would have no sympathy with us, and with the undertaking we have been working for years to accomplish, would be to make money out of it. No company wants that road unless to profit by it, and I think if there is any profit in it the Government should reserve it for the country, and change the tariff from time to time to suit the interests of the Dominion. The people of Manitoba must know that this Parliament and this country have the interests of the North-West at heart, and that Provinces which have no railroads themselves contribute to the construction of this railroad for the benefit of the North-West. No link in the chain of Provinces forming this Dominion has benefited so much by the Act of Union as Manitoba; and if the establishment of railway communication should be postponed for a year or two in the interests of the whole Dominion, I say they have nothing to grumble at, because the whole of this country is contributing to further the interests of that Province. Look at the amount we are contributing every year for immigration, all of which is enriching Manitoba and the settlers who have been established there for years past. I protest against the Government giving that road into the hands of any company that may eventually divert the trade of the North-West into the United States.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SMITH—St. Paul will benefit for all time to come from it, and no gentleman in this House will live to see that trade come back to this country if you let it pass away out of our hands now. By this Act you give the Government authority to lease that road. If there is any profit to be made in running it, give it to our own people who pay the taxes to build that road. The bondholders at a distance would consider it strange that we should give a foreign company a lease of a Canadian road and enable them for all time to come to divert the trade of the North-West from Canada, to depreciate the value of Canadian securities, and by that means injure the credit of the country hereafter. Let us vote to night for the Government to hold the road in their own hands, and control the growing trade of the North-West for the benefit of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND—I do not rise with the expectation that anything I may say is going to convince any member of this House a great deal, but still I feel that the Senate is deeply interested in the future of that great North-West country, and would not willingly do anything to interfere with its material prosperity. I consider it exceedingly unfortunate, and it may eventually be disastrous to our country that this question, to us a question of vital importance, should be made dependent upon a disputed constitutional point. I consider it would be nothing short of criminal on the part of any individual or body that would prevent the building of the Pembina Branch. It has been said by some hon. gentlemen, that this road should be left open, so that other lines could compete for its traffic. In the same breath they tell us that, if leased, it would divert the trade of the North-West from Canadian channels. In that case a monopoly would best protect the interests of the country, because high rates would have a tendency to check trade in that direction. We should deal with this question entirely independent of party.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SUTHERLAND—I do not say that my views and judgment are better than those of any other gentleman in this House, but I would not like to assume the responsibility, for the sake of party, of giving the Government a chance, if they were so inclined, to say that we prevented them from giving Manitoba railway communication. I will vote for the Bill and leave the responsibility of making a wise arrangement with the Government.

Hon. Mr. REESOR—The constitutional view that has been so fully discussed in this question, I think, bears two or three interpretations. We have precedents where measures of this kind have been referred to the approval of Parliament, and have been referred for the approval of the House of Commons only, so that taking either view I think the House would be quite justified in adopting such a course as they may think proper. To my mind it is only a question of policy whether it is necessary in this instance to restrict the action of the Government, as to compel them to come back to the Senate for their sanction to such contract as they may enter into with a company to lease the Pembina Branch Railway. My own view is that it would be perfectly safe to leave it in the hands of the Government, even though they did not bring it back to the House of Commons for ratification, but if it is claimed that it should come also to the Senate there is this difficulty in the way. The Government do not control a majority in the Senate, and the majority work continuously against the action of the Government, as the Ministry have not their confidence. The position of this Senate is different from that of the House of Lords in England. The House of Lords, as a rule, have confidence in the Government of the day, and there is a provision in the Constitution also, by which the Government can add to the number of the Upper House, in the event of a dead-lock between the Lords and the Commons. There is no such provision by which this House can be induced to act in harmony with the House of Commons, if they do not choose to do so when they have a majority against the Government.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Is it not well that it should be so if the Senate is in the right?

Hon. Mr. REESOR—It is, perhaps, better that it should be so, if the Senate is in the right. But, we will soon have a general election, and if the Government come back, having been sustained by the country, and enter into an agreement with this company, what position would they be in if we vetoed that agreement? We would simply be acting in direct opposition to the will of the people, as expressed at the polls. I think we may safely leave this matter in the hands of the Government, inasmuch as we have precedents for that course in the policy that has been pursued with respect to the contracts on the Pacific Railway, both with regard to the main line and the branches. It has been asserted that there is great safety in submitting matters of this kind to the Senate, because the smaller Provinces are better represented in this House than they are in the House of Commons. The Georgian Bay Branch scheme was submitted to the Senate and received their sanction that the Government should be authorized to let contracts for it. Now the Senate condemn it, and the fact of submitting that agreement to the Senate proved no more a guarantee of the ultimate advantage to the work than if it had been submitted to the Commons alone. However, as the work proceeded it was found to be impracticable and the Government very properly set it aside without having to submit it to either House of Parliament. Under the present circumstances, the railway being now so very desirable, and that it should be completed as soon as possible to accommodate the large stream of immigration that is going into that Province, I think the House would be safe in allowing this Bill to go through in the shape in which it came up from the other House, and leave the responsibility with the Government until after the election of a new Parliament. If the majority next Session should then be in harmony with the majority in this House, they will have the right either to modify or set aside the contract entered into by the Government, but if the majority returned by the people express themselves in favor of that contract I do not think it would be right for this Senate to step in and oppose the will of the people. Under such circumstances I consider it our duty to sustain the Bill as it came up from the other House.

Hon. Mr. Sutherland.

Hon. Mr. WARK—An hon. gentleman has thrown across the floor of this House the taunt that if we vote for this measure we will be voting away our rights and privileges. I am just as tenacious of the rights of this House as the hon. gentleman who made use of that language, but there are times to assert those rights, and on the present occasion it is neither expedient nor opportune to do so. This is a case in which persons residing in another country are concerned. They have stated the conditions on which they would extend their line to connect with the Pembina Branch, and unless the Government are in a position to comply with those conditions at once, it is very likely that the arrangement will fall through altogether, and this important Province will be thrown back perhaps for years for want of railway accommodation. If anything were wanting to convince this company that it would be entirely useless and unsafe for them to enter into any lease with the Government for that road, if it had to be confirmed by this House, the course which this debate has taken would at once show them the danger and inexpediency of entering into any such arrangement. We have only to look at the diversity of opinions that has been shown to exist amongst hon. members who wish this question to be submitted to the Senate. One hon. gentleman argued that it was not to the interests of the Dominion to allow the trade of Manitoba to be diverted into the United States at all. Another hon. gentleman argued that the road ought not to be leased, but it ought to be held by the Government, giving other rival roads running arrangements over it; it would be all the better for us if there were several of them. And other hon. gentlemen argued that the road ought not to be leased at all. What chance, then, would there be for the Government to enter into any lease, when such a diversity of opinion exists. Then, as to the question of diverting the trade out of the Dominion, would not that argument have broken down the project for building bridges across the St. Lawrence? For what are they built, if not to promote intercourse between this Dominion and the United States? Here you say to connect this road with the United States, would direct the trade of Manitoba in the direction which is not for our advantage that it should be directed; but the people of Manitoba should be permitted to sell their produce in the best markets. And I agree with my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island in saying, the sooner the connecting link between Lake Superior and Red River is built the better, and then the people will have their choice of the best markets to sell their produce. The singular arguments I have heard convince me that no Government would be safe in entering into a lease if it had to be submitted for the approbation of this House. What would the company say, when the Government proposed to lease this road. They would naturally ask, "can you guarantee, if you have to submit this lease to the Senate, that the majority in that House who are so divergent from the Government on almost every subject that comes up, will ratify it?" Only two days ago, the Government brought in a measure to re-arrange the departments. What question in the world was more appropriate for the Government to deal with, than that, after having several years experience of managing the affairs of the country, and finding one officer broken down in health from overwork, in his department, and another officer who has so very little business to perform, that he has practically nothing to do. Yet, when the Government came in with a measure to re-arrange these departments, so as to distribute the work more evenly, it was rejected by this House.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—Does the hon. gentleman deny our right to reject such measures?

Hon. Mr. WARK—Certainly not, though I may question the expediency. But it shows they use their right to refuse their sanction to important arrangements which the Government might enter into. Therefore, I say, no Government would attempt to enter into an arrangement under such circumstances.

The House divided on Hon. Mr. Pelletier's motion, which was lost on the following division:—

STAMPS ON PROMISSORY NOTES AND BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (4): "An Act to amend the law relating to Stamps on Promissory Notes and Bills of Exchange." He said: The object of this Bill is to amend the law relating to Stamps on Notes and Bills of Exchange in those particulars in which the existing law is somewhat silent. There has been some doubt as to the stamping of certain kinds of paper made outside of Canada, but payable in Canada. This Bill provides that such paper shall be legal if it is stamped when it is first presented for acceptance. The second clause makes provision for making such paper valid by means of double stamps, when it is not properly stamped in the first hands. The third clause provides for stamping paper or securities of a deceased person that may come into the hands of an executor or administrator, giving validity thereto by affixing double stamps. The next clause makes provision for putting double stamps on the record where an action has been brought to recover the amount of a lost or destroyed note, draft, or Bill of exchange. The Bill is to remove doubts in the existing law rather than to initiate any new principle.
Hon. Mr. Wark.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—I congratulate the Government upon having presented to us a Bill which has so few objectionable features in it as the present one; a very different Bill from what it was when it was first introduced in another place.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not a Government Bill.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—It has been adopted by the Government by their having taken charge of it in this House. I trust it is the only Bill which we shall have presented to us on the subject of stamps during the present Session.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL gave notice that he had an amendment to propose when the Bill went into Committee.

Hon. Mr. BUREAU said he also proposed to move an amendment in Committee to remove doubts respecting stamps on notarial documents.

The Bill was read the second time.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AUDIT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved concurrence in the amendments made by the Committee of the Whole to Bill (53): "An Act to provide for the better Auditing of Public Accounts."

Hon. Mr. POWER called attention to an amendment which he considered was altogether inconsistent with the action of the House a few days ago, when they had decided that the Receiver-General's office should continue to be an independent department. The real acting officer of the Department was the Deputy Minister of Finance; but under this amendment the Deputy Minister of Finance was made to be ex-officio Secretary of the Treasury Board. In other words, it did away with the Receiver-General's office, while they paid the officer himself his salary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the Deputy-Receiver-General and the Deputy Minister of Finance would be one and the same individual, so that there would be no inconsistency in it.

The amendments were concurred in, and the Bill was ordered for third reading to-morrow.

The House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

ST. PETER'S CANAL.

CONSIDERATION OF RETURN.

Hon. Mr. MILLER moved:—

"That the Return to the Address of the Senate during the present Session, for copies of Contracts, Reports and Orders-in-Council relating to the St. Peters Canal, be taken into consideration by the House."

Hon. Mr. Scott.

He said:—The question of the St. Peter's Canal is one with which the House must be familiar, as on several occasions I have felt it my duty to bring the subject before the Senate. I regret to be compelled on the present occasion to do so again, and the more so because I find it a very unpleasant duty to be compelled so frequently to animadvert upon the conduct of the Government with regard to this and other public matters. The occasions have been so frequent when it became the duty of hon. gentlemen occupying independent positions in this House to censure the Government—especially in connection with the administration of the Public Works Department—that I would really avoid doing so now if I could feel it consistent with the duty I owe to the people of Cape Breton, where this work is situated, and where I reside. The St. Peter's Canal is a work that was constructed under the Government of the late Province of Nova Scotia. Before Confederation the Provincial Government deemed it of so great importance that the inland waters of the Island of Cape Breton should be connected with the waters of the Atlantic on the Southern coast, that it was decided to cut the narrow neck of land which joins the two great divisions of the Island of Cape Breton together at St. Peters, and thereby open up communication with the interior of the island, which would be a great benefit to the country in developing its trade and resources. Previous to Confederation the Province had expended about $200,000 in completing the canal which, after some time, was found to be inadequate for the purposes of the trade of that section of the country. After the canal was opened it required a few years to test its adaptability to the commerce and requirements of the country, and, in 1873, after five or six years, the subject having been urged frequently upon the Government of the day that a survey should be had with the view to coming to some conclusion with regard to the enlargement of the canal, in the summer of 1873, Mr. Purley, an engineer of the Public Works Department, was sent down by the late Government to Cape Breton to make the survey, and during that summer he made the necessary examinations. In other discussions which have taken place upon this question, in has been denied that there was any minute or record in the Government offices to show that this step had been taken under the late Government, while Mr. Langevin was Minister of Public Works, but the fact is so notorious that the survey was made in 1873 by Mr. Perley, that unless we are prepared to deny that the Government of Sir John Macdonald was in power in 1873, when Mr. Perley made the survey, we are not in a position to dispute the authority and instructions under which that engineer acted, during the summer of that year. According to Mr. Perley's report, it was recommended that the canal should be increased to 55 feet in width, and 15½ feet in depth, and that the locks should also be enlarged. This report was presented to the Government early in January, 1874, and was submitted to the new Government after the change of Administration. On that report a sum was placed in the Estimates, in 1874, for the enlargement of the canal, and the members from Cape Breton in both Houses believed that the plans of Mr. Perley would be adhered to by the Government in making that expenditure. About a year after the appropriation was made, tenders were called for, but, strange to say, the plans were altered, reducing the dimensions of the canal from 55 feet in width to 36 feet; and from 15½ feet in depth to 15 feet. This was done by the Minister of Public Works without consultation with any one public man interested in that undertaking, and it naturally produced a great deal of dissatisfaction among the people of the Island of Cape Breton. In the first place, it showed such an utter disregard for the interests of that portion of the country, and was such a high-handed and arbitrary mode of dealing with the Public Works, without consulting any one who was in a position to give correct information with regard to the matter, that a general feeling of indignation was excited throughout the Island. The consequence was that, after a year of agitation, the plans had to be changed, and the work was proceeded with on an enlarged scale. I should state, under the first notice, the contract was given to a Mr. Tuck, of St. John, on a certain schedule of prices for the work contained in the contract, amounting in all to $203,000. During the following year the indignation of the people became so great in the Island of Cape Breton at the high-handed and impolitic act on the part of the Minister in reducing the plans, that it was found necessary again to depart from the contract and to enlarge the canal to a width of 48 feet. On investigation—such an investigation as the Minister should have made before he ventured to interfere with the original plans—it was found that 48 feet would be the least width and 18 feet the least depth that would be suitable for the vessels likely to use that canal. Then the Government were in this position, the contract had been let to Mr. Tuck under certain specifications, that the canal should be enlarged to certain dimensions, and it was necessary, of course, to come to an arrangement with Mr. Tuck. But Mr. Tuck refused to do the additional work at the same rate, although it was work that would not be any more costly, unless he got increased prices. The Government had to give him, for excavating rock in his second contract, $1.20 per cubic yard, which he had agreed in his original contract to do for 99 cents per cubic yard. They had to increase the price of timber also, and had to agree to give him a very considerable sum in addition, for pumping out the water. Under the original contract he had $18,000 for building coffer-dams at both ends of the canal and keeping the works free from water. We all know that a great portion of the expense in connection with that item was building the coffer dams and putting engines on the ground, which, once there, entailed little additional expense. But in addition to the $18,000, another sum of $8,000 or $9,000 had to be added to the contract price for pumping in connection with the first extra work. Mr. Tuck's contract increased the cost of the work to about $250,000; and no doubt there was a loss to the Government of $10,000 or $20,000 in consequence of that change, which might have been saved to the country if the work had been properly let at the outset. But this was not all. One would suppose, that having made a blunder in setting aside the first specification for that work, and that blunder having been brought to the notice of the Government, and having had to rectify it at the expense of the country, they would have taken care to see, if it were possible, if there were any other blunders, and rectify them all at the same time. But they did not do so. They had reduced the contemplated depth of the canal half a foot. We always considered 15½ feet too little, and the people of Cape Breton would not listen to any proposal to reduce that depth. In consequence of that reduction an agitation was commenced, and such pressure was brought to bear upon the Government, that they finally had to make another alteration in the contract, and a new contract had to be entered upon. In this new contract, of course, Mr. Tuck had them again at his mercy, as they were obliged to a large extent in dealing with him to accept his terms. Where Mr. Tuck got 39 cents per cubic yard for the removal of clay in the first instance; he then insisted upon 49 cents, and they had to give it to him. Where he had received 99 cents per cubic yard for the excavation of rock, and which they had increased to $1.20 in the second contract, he made them go as high as $1.55 per cubic yard in the third contract. So in this way the additional contracts which were given have cost the country much more than they ought to have cost, had the Minister of Public Works assured himself in the outset that the plans and specifications were what they should be.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I have heard a great deal of the blundering in connection with the Pacific Railway, but I doubt if there is a single instance in connection with that undertaking in which the Government have made greater blunders than they have in connection with the St. Peter's Canal. In addition to what I have mentioned, when they gave the original contract, they did not take any precaution to secure the land required for the execution of the work. The land on both sides of the canal belonged to private individuals. The contract was let, and when the contractor went down in the fall of 1876 to commence work he was told by the proprietors that he could not trespass on their lands, as the Government had made no expropriation of it. The contractor was thereby kept idle the whole autumn and winter with a large staff of men and horses at heavy expense, not able to do a single day's work, in consequence of the Government not having secured the land before giving out the contract, and to-day he has a large claim for extras against the Department, which will no doubt form a subject for the Exchequer Court to deal with. In the original contract the retaining walls were to be of wood, and I believe no alteration has been made in that section of that contract yet. Now, I want to inform the Government if they persist in making those retaining walls of wood, they will be committing a very grave mistake, as no wood will stand in that canal more than three or four years, such is its liability to be destroyed by worms. The present contractor got out a large quantity of material the first year he was in charge of the works, and among that material was a quantity of very valuable timber. That timber is to-day, I am told, perfectly perforated by worms, and unfit to be used in the work. Worms are very destructive to wood in that canal, and in the Bras d'or Lake, and I am told by authorities on the subject that wood will not stand in those retaining walls more than four years at the outside; and it will be unfortunate, if after a heavy expense has been incurred in the enlargement of this canal, it is found that a mistake has been made which will entail a great additional outlay, and the closing up of the canal again in order to have the blunder rectified. The additional cost of making those retaining walls of stone would be very trifling, and it would be money well invested. I also wish to impress on the Government the imperative necessity of increasing the length of the lock in the canal to 250 feet. As the gates enter inwards, the space is not sufficient for large vessels (making allowance for their fore and aft rigging and booms) such as will use the canal after its enlargement. These two things should be attended to immediately, and I hope the Government will not be afraid, on account of their previous mistakes, to rectify these faults, as it can clearly be done under a power vested in the Minister of Public Works in one of the clauses of the first agreement. Let it, therefore, not be neglected, if the Government care anything about the suitability of the canal. But there is a strange feature in this contract. Rumor has it, that certain friends of the Government in St. John are the parties who are beneficially interested in this work. This is the opinion in the Island of Cape Breton, and there are circumstances which point strongly in confirmation of that rumor. Although Mr. Tuck was manager of the works up to a recent period, during all the time of his management there were other gentlemen in charge of the labor and disbursements, almost independent of him, although nominally under him, who are supposed to have been the agents and representatives of the parties in St. John who were beneficially interested in this contract, and those parties are believed to be a number of gentlemen who are known to be prominent and influential members of the Government in New Brunswick. Now, all those increases which I have referred to, have made this contract a valuable one, and all those enlargements have been apparently made, as much with the object of benefiting those people who are behind the scenes, as for any other cause, and certainly they will have the effect of putting a large amount of money into the pockets of persons who are believed to be friends of the Government. Last fall, Mr. Tuck became embarrassed and unable to carry on the works. It was quite clear, from the outset, that he was not managing his affairs as he should have done, by pursuing a proper system. For instance, he got a large quantity of material on the ground at first, that was not necessary until towards the completion of the work, and, being short of means, he so involved himself that he found it necessary to retire, largely indebted to merchants, laborers, vessel owners and others. When his liabilities were such, that he found himself unable to meet them, what did the Government do then? Did they put this important work up to tender again? No. Nothing of the kind; but they gave the work to a friend of the gentlemen behind the scenes, a Mr. Kennedy, a wharf builder of St. John, to whom they assigned Mr. Tuck's contract, and took the canal off his hands, without paying for the material that had gone into the work, or the labor of the men who had not received their wages from the previous manager. I say the Government should not have allowed that contract to have been assigned to Mr. Kennedy for the benefit of the securities, without seeing that those poor people who had been induced to advance their means and to furnish supplies and labor, were duly paid. That is what has been done in the case of Mr. Tuck, and it is possible it may be done again. If ever there was a case in which the Government should have stipulated that the first claims of the laborers, traders, quarrymen and others, whose means and toil had gone into that work, should have been protected, it was in this case. They should have seen that those honest debts were discharged by those who got the completion of the contract, or that it was taken out of the ten per cent drawback that had been retained on the contract. But, though the contract gave the Government the power to retain ten per cent upon the work done, nearly the whole of that sum had been advanced to Mr. Tuck, through the interest of his friends, the individuals who, I believe, are interested in this contract, and a large number of laborers who had toiled all summer on the work, were actually left in a state of destitution. I say the Government were guilty of culpable connivance, when they neglected to see that the interests of those poor people were absolutely protected as a condition precedent in taking the contract off Mr. Tuck's hands. In conclusion I would again call the attention of the Government to the necessity for increasing the length of the lock of the Canal. As it would cost very little more to increase it to 250 feet, I trust they will take the matter into consideration, and see that this improvement is made. I also call particular attention to the necessity for stone instead of wood in the retaining walls. I am sorry to have to deal so severely with the management of this public work by the Government. But from the outset the Department of Public Works have acted in a most high handed and capricious manner in relation to this Canal, and have done nothing properly but what they have been forced to do by an indignant public opinion in that country. I say it is unfortunate that we have had to wring these concessions from the Government; they have been forced by fear of the ballot-box, and not by a sense of justice, to deal with this question in the way they should have done. I do not know whether the Government have yet the power to see justice done to the poor people who have been left unpaid by the contractor, or if it is possible for them to see that those claims are still met; but I do hope as they neglected at the right moment to secure these people, they will still use their influence to have justice done to men who have been kept out of their hard earnings during the past winter, and in these dull times. I feel it my duty to bring this subject before the Senate again this year, as I believe the only way to keep some people to the mark is to make them feel a vigilant eye is kept on their proceedings, and because I have always taken a deep interest in St. Peter's Canal. But there is another reason why I do so on this occasion; it is because those whose especial duty it is to look after and protect the interests of the labourers and others are more bent in currying favor with the contractor for the sake of his political influence, than disposed to fight for the rights of those whose friendship is not so well worth securing.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I can appreciate the fact that the hon. gentleman required to preface his remarks with an apology, in which he expresses great regret in having to criticise the conduct of the Government in reference to this canal. I think the hon. gentleman will require to work himself up to a very high state of feeling in order to have any possible justification for reflecting on the policy of the Government with respect to that work. It is unfortunate that the hon. gentleman should have taken this view of the subject, and I was quite unprepared to hear the attack which he has made on the Minister of Public Works. For long years, between 1867 and the time of the change of Government, the hon. gentleman, and those coming with him from Cape Breton had failed to obtain justice at the hands of the late Administration. They had failed to induce that Government to believe that it was in the interest of the people of Cape Breton, or that it was the duty of the people of Canada to contribute a quarter of a million of dollars to the enlargement of the St. Peter's Canal. All that the hon. gentleman has got to show that there was any action taken by the late Administration, is the existence of a report made after the present Government came into office. He cannot find that on any one occasion the demands of the hon. gentleman have received any consideration at the hands of the late Government. He cannot point to a single Order-in-Council, to a State paper, or to an item in the Estimates for the construction of the St. Peter's Canal. All he can say is, that Mr. Perley was sent down there, but he cannot point to any instructions even that had been given to him, but simply that there had been a report from Mr. Perley shortly after the change of Government, recommending the enlarging of the St. Peter's Canal. Hon. gentlemen know very well that the engineers in various quarters of the Dominion make such reports to the Department of Public Works, suggesting changes and improvements in the works of the various Provinces, but it in no way binds the Government to carry them out. I can point hon. gentlemen to dozens of such reports that have been made to the Government during the last few years, and it would be very desirable to have carried them out if the means of the country permitted it. But what did the Government do in this case? They did not allow a single year to elapse without trying to meet the wishes of the people of Cape Breton. They did not bind themselves to carry out the canal on the scale recommended by Mr. Perley, but they had plans made of the work on a smaller scale, and called for tenders for the construction of the work. That was the spirit in which the present Administration approached this undertaking in the very first year of their existence.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The first contract was entered into two years after the Government came into power—in September, 1875.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You will find a vote in the estimates of the first year. But all those things require time; the specifications had to be prepared, and tenders had to be called for, and there is necessarily always a delay before work of this kind can be put in operation. After the work had been let, the friends of the Government brought it under the notice of the Minister of Public Works, that it was very much to be regretted that the work was not commenced on a large scale. It was a mere matter of money, and although in the opinion of the Government the work was a valuable one as it was first, in order to meet the wishes of the people of Cape Breton, they consented to enlarge the canal. A condition was inserted in that contract, as in all other contracts, that it was competent for the Government to increase or decrease the work according to a certain schedule of prices. The hon. gentleman says the canal had to be deepened, and the effect of deepening it was to entail so much more cost; but does not every hon. gentleman in this Chamber, who has had even a cellar dug, know that for every foot you go down, so much more is the cost increased; and for every foot a contractor goes down in a canal, there is a recognised scale by which he has to be paid for the increase. It is a matter that is perfectly understood, and it is idle for the hon. gentleman to say that the Government paid this money improperly, in consequence of the contract having been departed from. The hon. gentleman says, in consequence of the divergence from the contract, the contractor made a large sum of money; but he also told us afterwards that the contractor broke down; that he was not able to pay his men; that he could not pay for the materials on the ground; and that Mr. Tuck had given up this "valuable contract." Then the hon. gentleman says the Government had not called for tenders in re-letting the contract. If they had done so, it would have involved the measurement of the work that Mr. Tuck had done, and a most minute examination would have had to be made, and new quantities would have to be arrived at—all of which would have involved a delay of perhaps a year, before new tenders could have been obtained. The Government, I think, acted wisely and prudently in this, as they have acted on other occasions. A party came forward, a Mr. Kennedy, who offered to take Mr. Tuck's contract on the same terms, and it was given to him. I don't know that he is a friend of the Government, or that there was anything political in the giving of the contract to him, and it is unfair to make such charges unless there is some justification for them. We hear hon. gentlemen using such adjectives as "the high-handed conduct," "the arbitrary and unjust conduct of the Minister of Public Works." There was no compulsion on the part of the Government to give out this work at all, other than they thought it was a fair and just thing to commence this undertaking. Although Cape Breton had been some what neglected for some years by the late Administration, now the hon. gentleman has all censure for this Government, and all praise for the late Administration, notwithstanding the fact that on several occasions he had brought the subject under the notice of the late Government, who had given it very little consideration. I now come to that history of the case where the contractor broke down. The Government found that Mr. Kennedy was ready to come forward and take the contract just as it stood, and to leave a deposit of $10,000 in the hands of the Government. The securities were perfectly willing that he should have the contract, and he was to carry it on and finish it on the basis previously agreed upon with Mr. Tuck. Was it, or was it not a commendable action on the part of the Government to accept that proposition? I ask the hon. gentleman whether, under the circumstances, the Government would have been justified in saying "no," and putting it up to tender again? Instead of having any quarrel with Mr. Tuck about quantities, they allowed Mr. Kennedy to step into his shoes; the securities were satisfied to accept him, and the work was proceeded with without interruption. My hon. friend says "yes, but the workmen were not paid!" I confess I am extremely sorry for that; no one more deeply regrets that such an occasion should have arisen than the Minister of Public Works. I know on several occasions he has arbitrarily interfered and taken a part of the ten per cent. deposit made by the securities in order to pay the workmen, although he had no legal right to do so. The sureties and the contractor might very well step in and say it was no affair of the Government's; the Government have no control over the men, and have no responsibility to the men, that they should have stepped out of their true line of administration, in order to go into those details. It was Mr. Tuck that was indebted to those men; they ought to have seen to getting their wages every week regularly. I think it is always desirable, as far as possible, that the Government should see that the men are paid by the contractors, and not allow any contingency to arise that will prevent them from getting their wages, but in many instances the Minister of Public Works has been perfectly powerless to deal with cases of this kind. He would not have been justified in putting his hand into the public chest, and paying the men who had been working for the contractor. It would be a very improper thing if it were known all over this country that in any public contract the Government would protect the laborer in getting his wages, as it would make the workman less careful to exact his money from his employer, when he knew he could fall back upon the Government for it. The hon. gentleman called attention to several important and valuable improvements that he would suggest in the construction of the canal. For instance, the substitution of stone for wood in the retaining walls, and increasing the length of the lock. If the hon. gentleman had commenced his observations in the fair and reasonable way in which he concluded, then I would not have had occasion to speak as I have done, as the Minister of Public Works is always glad to hear explanations and suggestions about the public works of the country. It is a proper thing for gentlemen who are familiar with such matters to call the attention of the Government to them, so long as those suggestions are conceived in a proper spirit in the interests of the country; and the Government are always willing to entertain them. It is merely a matter of money whether they can be carried out or not, and whether the Public Treasury is equal to the large demands made from time to time upon it. I think the people of Cape Breton are scarcely justified in coming to the conclusion that the Minister of Public Works is actuated by any but the most anxious desire to meet the views of that locality in the carrying out of this work.

THE FISHERIES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

ENQUIRY.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL enquired whether the papers he had moved for in connection with the Fisheries of British Columbia had been submitted to the House.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said all the papers connected with that question had been brought down. There had been simply a couple of communications respecting the lease of the fisheries of the Fraser River, and the answer of the Department had been that the Government were not in a position to adopt any definite policy with respect to the fisheries of British Columbia until they had had further information respecting them.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS AUDIT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill 53, "An Act to provide for the better auditing of the Public Accounts," was read the third time and passed.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT BILL.

HOUSE IN COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the House into Committee of the Whole on Bill (14), "An Act to amend the Act respecting the election of members of the House of Commons."

In the Committee, Hon. Mr. Dixon in the Chair.

On the 1st clause, "No person holding an office of emolument under the Government of Canada, or of a Province, to be a member of the House."

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE objected to this provision, as it would exclude retired judges and other persons from holding seats in the House, who would be eminently fitted to serve their country in such a capacity. For instance, Mr. Langton, the Auditor-General, would be a very valuable addition to the House of Commons, if, after he had retired on his superannuation allowance, a constituency should choose him as their representative, but under the provisions of this Bill he would be disqualified as a candidate.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said he had given notice, when the Bill came up for second reading, that he would move in Committee to strike out the second part of the first clause.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the principal argument he could adduce in favor of its retention, was that, so far as the Civil Service was concerned, no member of it was supposed to be allowed to retire on superannuation allowance as long as his physical and mental powers were sufficient for the discharge of his duties, even though he had passed the age of sixty-five years. If a Civil servant had retired on a pension on the ground of ill-health, and his health should subsequently be restored, he thought the country would be entitled to call upon such person to return to his duties, and not continue to be an unnecessary burthen on the public revenue. In the event of any amendment being made to the Bill, he thought it would be inexpedient for this House to disturb any part of it affecting the position of the House of Commons. He would regret if the House of Commons should think proper to disturb, or advise the disturbance of any conclusion that this House should reach with reference to itself, and in the same spirit he thought the Senate should not interfere with the clauses affecting members of the other House.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS said the House of Commons had not thought proper to confine themselves to that rule.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the House of Commons knew very well that the Senate had to pass on the clauses affecting it, and that they were satisfied this House would not allow them to make any changes in their constitution without it was acceptable to this Chamber.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL said the hon. Secretary of State could not point to a single instance in the history of the Senate where they had in any shape attempted to interfere with the qualifications of members of the Commons.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said he could not see much force in the argument of the Secretary of State in favor of excluding retired Civil Servants from the Commons. In many of the public offices the duties were so heavy, and they were such a tax upon the energies and health of the persons who occupied them, that they were obliged in some cases, to retire from the service after a few years. It did not follow that with comparative rest the health of such a person should not be sufficiently restored to enable him to discharge the duties of a member of Parliament, although not enough to resume his labors as a civil servant. With regard to the suggestion which had been thrown out by the hon. Secretary of State that the Senate should confine themselves to the clauses of the Bill affecting their own seats, his own inclination would be to follow that course, although he did not think the Government could claim it at their hands, after introducing the Bill and carrying it through the other House, without any previous consultation with the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Bill would be effete until it had our approval.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said with regard to clause ten, "Members of the Senate not to hold certain offices or become contractors," the amendment which he proposed was to strike out the first portion of the clause that declared no member of the Senate shall be capable of holding any office, commission, or employment that would render any person incapable of being elected to the House of Commons, and retaining the second part of the clause relating to contracts or agreements. He should prefer to strike out the whole clause, and, if necessary, a short Bill could be introduced in this House declaring that no one having a contract or agreement with the Government of the day should be eligible to a seat in the Senate. By this means they would establish the point that the House of Commons had no right to legislate for the Senate in the way they had attempted to do.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL said that the right of this House to interfere with the qualifications or disqualifications of parties elected to the Commons should be limited only so far as it did not interfere with the rights of the people. He did not consider, for instance, that the other House would be justified in enacting a law that would exclude any class of citizens, lawyers, doctors or any other class, from the Commons, nor should the Senate be permitted to force upon the other House a measure to exclude any particular class from being appointed members of the Senate. He contended that a retired Civil Servant should be eligible as a candidate for a seat in the Commons, as his superannuation allowance was paid to him out of savings from his own salary, and why should a qualification be required from him that was not required from members of any other class of the community? He believed that the people should be limited in their choice of representatives as little as possible, as it was well known that the number of persons qualified to fill such positions was comparatively small even in England, and to a much greater degree in a young country like Canada. There could be no good reason advanced why the country should not avail themselves of the services of retired judges who had the ability and training that were necessary to wise legislation. He objected to this clause, and hoped it would be modified.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he desired to make a proposition to the House. If the Senate were disposed to accept the clause relating to the House of Commons, he would undertake to strike out the clause affecting the Senate, and introduce a new Bill in the Senate which could be discussed, subject, of course, to such changes as the majority in this House might think proper, and it could then go down as an original Bill to the other House.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said he did not think that this proposition would meet the circumstances in which the two Houses were now placed. If the Government had taken that position originally, and had left out all reference to the Senate in this Bill, they would have been in a better position to make the suggestion, and this House would have been in a better position to adopt it. It seemed to him that the qualifications or disqualifications of members of the Commons were not to be settled by the Commons, but by Parliament—both Houses. It was as much the duty of the Senate as it was of the Commons, to see that the choice of the people was not unnecessarily limited, or in a way that this Senate thought it ought not to be limited, or so as to interfere with the proper discharge of the public duties of such men as the Dominion offered. The clause which his hon. friend from York had proposed to strike out, did limit that choice in a way that was prejudicial to the public interests, and he did not think they could get rid of the difficulty by the proposition which the hon. Secretary of State had made, as he considered it would be an abnegation of the functions of this House, which it was necessary, in the interests of the country, they should discharge.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said he was very glad to hear the suggestion of the Hon. the Secretary of State, because it was quite evident that upon reflection he had come to the conclusion that by this Bill they had no constitutional right to interfere with the qualifications or disqualifications of Senators. But the hon. gentleman had suggested that they should bargain for that by allowing the clause with respect to the qualification of members of the House of Commons to stand. There was just this distinction between them and the Commons; that by the Constitution the Commons had clearly no right whatever to legislate on or send up a Bill like this to the Senate; but it was otherwise with regard to the qualification of members of the House of Commons as would be seen by section 41 of the British North America Act:—

“Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all laws in force in the several Provinces at the Union relative to the following matters, or any of them, namely:—The qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected, or to sit, or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several Provinces; the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the Returning officers, their powers and duties, etc.”

All these were left to the Parliament of Canada, not to the House of Commons, or one particular body. They were now called upon after the expiration of ten years, after this subject had been legislated on, and asked for the first time to adopt this principle of excluding from Parliament persons who were in receipt of pensions or superannuation allowances from the Government. The whole clause was open to very serious objection; by it they were asked to restrict the power of the people to select their representatives.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said any person who asked the Senate to do that should give some strong and overwhelming reasons why they should do so. Such reasons he had not heard, and did not expect to hear. The principle upon which they excluded from Parliament persons holding office or receiving money from the Government was that they were supposed to be subservient to the Crown, and in order to protect the people from such influences they were made ineligible to sit or vote in the Commons. But that principle could not apply to persons who received their allowances by Act of Parliament over which the House of Commons or the Government of the day had not the slightest control.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH said he could not see any necessity for this Bill at all until some occasion should arise for it. There was no House more jealous of its independence than the British Parliament, yet they had not attempted to go as far as the Bill now before this House would go, and the Government had failed to show any necessity for this legislation. He did not see why people should be deprived of their rights by limiting their choice in selecting their candidates. In many places the choice was not very large, and he believed retired judges or superannuated civil servants should be allowed to sit and vote in Parliament if it was the desire of the people that they should do so.

Hon. Dr. PAQUET—I regret not being able to concur in what has been said by my hon. friends from Kingston, from De Lanaudiere, and from De Salaberry, particularly with respect to retired judges. I think that clause in the Bill which forbids their return to public life, that is to say their sitting in the House of Commons, should be retained. This House will understand how much the independence of the Bench will be threatened, and to how great a loss of prestige in the eyes of the public the judges will be exposed when it becomes known that after fifteen years' service, while still in the prime of life, they may be elected to the House of Commons, and still draw two-thirds of their former salaries. Instead of being deemed to have become, on their elevation to the Bench, independent for life of all political connections, they will be suspected of paying court to a political party which they aspire to serve again at a given time; and the tendency of this will be to diminish considerably the prestige of the justice they are called upon to administer. It is alleged that the liberties of the people must not be restricted; but does not the law already keep judges at a distance from the electoral arena by refusing to them the right of voting? And do we not see from that how necessary it is to keep them continually outside of the political sphere? In my opinion, that clause of the ministerial measure ought to be maintained, and I shall vote accordingly.

Hon. Mr. POWER said he was very sorry that when the hon. Secretary of State had expressed his willingness to accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman from York, to strike out that part of the Bill affecting the Senate and introduce a new Bill, the hon. Senator should have changed his mind.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said he had not suggested it.

Hon. Mr. POWER said that he was so understood. In England, each branch of the Legislature was supposed to be the best judge of the qualifications of its own members. It had been asserted during this debate that by this Bill they were limiting the choice of the people. But he did not think that that was a very forcible reason why they should reject this section. He thought that when civil servants retired from their duties on superannuation allowances, owing to age or infirmity, they were not, as a rule, the kind of men to become members of the House of Commons; as he thought the life of a member of the Commons was very much more prejudicial to health than the duties of a civil servant. As a general rule, it might be assumed that a man who was too old and infirm to act as a clerk in the public offices was not just the man to send to the House of Commons. The hon. Senator from York had also given as a reason for not adopting this principle that it had been departed from in England; but it must be remembered that the English House of Commons contained 600 members while ours had but 200; and even if there were no difference at all in the tone of public life in the two countries, that difference in number was something that ought to carry weight.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—There is a difference in population also.

Hon. Mr. POWER said there was much more danger to be apprehended from half a dozen men who were not independent in a House of 200 than from three times that number in a House of 600. The object of this Bill, as the name implied, was to render members of Parliament independent of the Government. Was a retired civil servant in receipt of a pension as independent of the Government as a member should be? Under the statute of 1870 the Government had power to recall any person who was receiving the superannuation allowance, who had not passed the age of sixty years; or, if he refused to comply, to stop his allowance. Could it be said that such a man would be independent, when the Government could at any moment compel him to vacate his seat or forfeit his allowance? Retired officials should be treated exactly in the same way as active officers—they should be obliged to relinquish Government pay before becoming candidates for parliamentary honors. There could be no hardship in requiring a man to choose between the House of Commons and a pension. The objection to allowing judges to enter into the Legislature was still stronger. We boast now, with truth, that our judges cease to be partisans when they ascend the Bench. Being removed from the arena of politics without a prospect of returning to it, they cease to be influenced by political considerations, and their decisions command respect. But if, after fifteen years service, a judge may retire on a pension and re-enter public life, the effect must be injurious. Suppose that judge, before retiring from the Bench, to be called upon to try an election case, would it not be natural to suppose that his leanings would be with the candidate who belonged to his own party, and would not public confidence be shaken in his decision? In a recent election case tried in the Supreme

Hon. Mr. Power.

Court, although there was no inducement for the judges to decide otherwise than fairly, yet, because some of them had been politicians, they were charged with having been influenced by political considerations in rendering their decision. Suppose a case were to come before a judge who not only had been in public life, but was likely again to enter the political arena, would not confidence be shaken entirely in the Bench? As the law now stood, a judge who felt desirous of entering public life, could resign his position. He thought it would be unwise to adopt this amendment.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE believed the arguments of his hon. friend from Halifax were not sound. If he desired to have impartial judges, Parliament should legislate in such a way as to prevent the Government from appointing members of the Cabinet from the Bench. If there were complaints about the Supreme Court to day—and he believed there was justice in those complaints—it was due to the fact that some of its members had been taken from the Treasury Benches. The result of such decisions as the one lately rendered by the Supreme Court, would be to destroy public confidence in that tribunal. As to the objection that an official who had been superannuated might be recalled into public service, he saw no danger in such a thing, at all events while the present Government was in power. The truth was, the difficulty had been the other way. Comparitively young men, full of life and vigor, had been forced to accept superannuation; but no man who had once been superannuated, had ever been forced to return to his duties. The late Government, on appointing a Commission on the debt of Ontario and Quebec, had named Judge Dey as one of its members, and that gentleman was admirably qualified for the position. Now, supposing the people had confidence in Judge Dey, and desired to send him to the House of Commons, should it be said that they ought not to be allowed to select him as their representative, simply because the Government might call upon him to fulfil some duty? The objection raised by the hon. Senator from Halifax, that because Judges were called upon to decide election cases, therefore they should not be allowed to enter public life, only served to show that the system of trying controverted elections by Judges was bad in itself. Experience had proven it was no better than the old system. If there had been party feeling in Parliamentary Committees, there was also party feeling on the Bench. The difference was, no scandal arose when the committees decided election cases, while it was a very great scandal indeed that the judiciary should be accused of partiality. He repeated, without hesitation or qualification, that the public were losing confidence and respect in the judiciary, in consequence of the political bias that had been shown lately in deciding some election cases.

Hon. Mr. PENNY said the remarks of the hon. gentleman who had just sat down served to show very pertinently the impossibility of passing the Bill as it stood, in that part relating to the judges. As to the ordinary civil servants, it was a matter of very little consequence whether the Bill was amended or not. As a class they were not very much known to the people outside the service, and he thought it would be a very rare case, indeed, where a civil servant would wish to go into public life after being superannuated, or that, if he desired it, he would have an opportunity of doing so. He thought it right that retired civil servants should be excluded from Parliament. The remarks of the hon. Senator (Mr. Bellerose) upon the decisions of judges only showed the impossibility of rendering a decision which would give satisfaction to all parties. In the Province of Quebec it was a common saying that "every pleader who lost a case had the privilege of imprecating the court for twenty-four hours after it." Suppose one of those judges that the hon. Senator believed were influenced by a party feeling, was about to retire from the bench on a pension, with the intention of running as a candidate for some county, would not that be a great scandal? Nothing could be more scandalous. It was one of those extreme cases that was not likely to occur, but it was precisely to avoid anything of the kind that it was desirable to prevent it. As an hon. gentleman opposite had remarked very justly, so far as principle is concerned, it was not desirable to limit the choice of the electors unnecessarily. The whole question turned on what might be considered "unnecessarily." To his mind what he had mentioned was one of the cases in which a limitation of the choice of the people was necessary.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said the remarks he had made with respect to the judiciary, expressed not only his own views, but the views of a great many people who had viewed with pain the growing distrust in the judiciary. Lately in the Province of Quebec a judge had decided a case on certain evidence against the successful candidate, and a few days afterwards a similar case in which the evidence against the successful candidate was not only similar to the evidence against the other, but was even stronger, in the opposite direction. It was when such glaring injustice as this was perpetrated, that the public confidence in the judiciary was diminished. If such judges wished to preserve their self-respect, and the respect of the public, there was but one course open for them and that was to enter into public life, and openly declare themselves in favor of the party of their choice.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON thought whoever had listened to what had been said by the last two or three speakers, must regret that the duty of trying election cases had ever been assigned to our judges. He ventured to say had that not been done, the bench would never have been spoken of in Parliament as it had been in this debate, to which he had listened with great regret. Until our judges had presided at election trials, no question had ever arisen as to their politics, after they had ascended the bench. He was not prepared to say they could be charged with political bias now; on the contrary, as far as Ontario was concerned, he believed no such charge was well founded.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — But there could be no question the tendency of assigning such duties to judges, would be to keep alive in their minds the same political feeling which might possess them before they were placed on the bench. In listening to the remarks of some hon.

gentlemen, one would have supposed that the object of this Bill was to qualify judges who had retired on superannuation to enter Parliament. No one would suppose that the change which was proposed was one to prohibit their entering Parliament. Had such a case ever occurred? He was not aware of one; on the contrary, he believed none had ever occurred, and he wished to know what necessity there was for such legislation?

Hon. Mr. PENNY—We do not want it to occur.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON thought if there was any reason, it should be given. Throughout the whole country there could never be half-a-dozen retired judges who would be possessed of the health and strength requisite for public life. The great objection to a measure of this kind was that it limited the choice of the people. If a retired judge or a superannuated civil servant retained the health and strength necessary to serve the people in Parliament, why should not the people be allowed to elect him? All those limitations were in the wrong direction. He thought the abolition of dual representation had been an evil. The effect was to restrict the choice of the people and place the Local Legislatures in the hands of men comparatively inferior to those in the House of Commons. But for that limitation a higher class, intellectually, would go the Local Legislatures. He would regret very much to see that limitation carried further, and for that reason would vote for the amendment of the hon. Senator from Toronto.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY regretted this question of the judges had been imported into the discussion, and he thought the Government must share in his regret that it had been introduced by the hon. Senator from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said nothing against any judge.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said the hon. gentleman had distinctly laid down the proposition that a judge sitting on the bench and trying an election case might be influenced by the fact that he might in the future be a candidate himself. The hon. gentleman used that argument with the full knowledge that three ad hoc judges had been appointed in Nova Scotia to try election cases, and those three judges had subsequently been appointed by this very Government as judges of the land in three different courts. The argument was an extremely unfortunate one, because the conclusion to be drawn from it was that these ad hoc judges must have gone on the Bench influenced by party feeling, which would necessarily arise from trying election petitions. With singular inconsistency, the hon. Senator, in another portion of his argument, had stated that a judge who went on the Bench was supposed to be removed from politics, entirely impartial and unprejudiced. In this the hon. gentleman was right; but, having got a judge in this position, he thought after fifteen years of service on the bench, he should be disqualified for life in Parliament.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said the hon. gentleman had quoted a section of the Superannuation Act to show that a retired civil servant could be called back to the service by the Government, and this had been referred to as something unprecedented; although there were scores of half-pay officers in the House of Commons of England, all those men could be called back to their duty, and possibly might be so recalled this very year by the Government. Yet, no one ever made that an objection against them. The hon. Senator from Halifax used another argument—that, in England, all matters with respect to the qualification or disqualification of persons fitted to sit in the House of Commons, were usually referred to that House itself to decide. The hon. gentleman seemed to be unaware, or to have forgotten, that the Reform Bill which dealt with the questions, not only of the proper candidate for election, but electoral districts, and qualifications of electors, had been time and again rejected by the House of Lords; and since the crisis in the constitutional history of Great Britain, in 1832, every bill dealing with the qualifications of members of the House of Commons had been sent to the House of Lords, and very often amended.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Always amended.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Otherwise it would have been a perfect farce to send it to the House of Lords as it would be to send this measure to the Senate if they had no power to amend it. The argument which he (Mr. Dickey) had drawn from the 41st section of the British North America Act had not been met, and it appeared to him the argument he had drawn from it was irresistible.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL thought the argument of the hon. Senator from Halifax, that each House should be the best judge of the qualifications of its own members, was a sound one, but no one would venture to say that a retired judge or a superannuated civil servant, was unfit for public life. The question was whether it would be in the public interest that a man who had occupied a seat on the bench, or been an officer of the Government, should represent a constituency in Parliament. Regarded in this light, it became a question of public interest which the Senate had a right to consider. The strongest reason which had been urged against permitting a retired judge from becoming a candidate for Parliamentary honors, was that a judge who was about to retire, perceiving that he might enter into politics again, might not be impartial in trying election cases. There was something in that; but was there not a stronger objection to placing an active politician upon the bench, and, very soon after his appointment, calling upon him to decide an election case arising out of a general election in which he had, himself, been engaged? Fifteen years was a long period, and the judge whose labors on the bench had extended over that term, might, if he desired to return to public life, find among his allies the opponents of former years. If a retired judge should be excluded from politics, why not exclude all judges? Why allow a wealthy judge to descend from the bench and enter the political arena, while the judge possessing more limited means, was excluded? The fact that half-pay officers were admitted into the British Parliament, had been mentioned. In all the European countries, officials similar to deputy-heads of departments here, held seats in the Legislatures, although they held no Cabinet positions, and were paid salaries like other civil servants. He thought it would be a decided advantage if the same system were adopted here, because the deputy-heads of the departments would be familiar with details of the Public Service, and could furnish valuable information in the debates of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. REESOR thought it undesirable for a Judge to enter into public life. Was it desirable that other officials in the employ of the Government should take part in politics? He thought not. The knowledge of the fact that they could, after retiring from the service, enter into public life, would stimulate them to take sides in politics during the time they held office. This would be very objectionable and would produce a state of affairs similar to that existing in the neighboring country where it was found necessary at every change of Government to dismiss all the officials appointed by the preceding Administration. Under our system of Government both parties were desirous of preventing the introduction of such a principle, and the only way to succeed in it would be to discourage civil servants from taking part in politics. In fact, he believed himself, that they should not be allowed to vote at all. He would, therefore, vote for the Bill as it stood.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said it was the practice under our system of Government to make laws to remedy abuses as they arose. They were not made to meet speculative cases, but only when experience had shown the necessity for them. He would like to know if a case had ever arisen, in the history of this country, where a superannuated servant of the Crown had ever held a seat in the House of Commons. Certainly none had occurred since Confederation, and he was not aware of any having arisen before it. Where, then was the necessity for this legislation? He thought it unwise for Parliament to curtail or limit the selection of the people of the representatives they desired to serve them in the House of Commons. It had been well said that it was inpolitic in a new country like this, where no class of men make public life a specialty, to limit the choice of the people by any legislation which was not shown by experience to have become an actual necessity. He would like to know what reasons had induced the Government to attempt this legislation. Were there any superannuated Civil servants who might probably take a seat in Parliament next Session, and was it desired to exclude them? During the past four or five years men perfectly competent to discharge their duty had been superannuated to make room for the hangers-on and place-seekers of the Government. Were the Government afraid that those men might appear in Parliament next Session and denounce the injustice perpetrated upon them and the injury inflicted on the public service? Legislation of this kind was never attempted except to meet given circumstances, and he could conceive of no other reason for it than the one he had given. He knew two or three instances where superannuated servants of the Crown were very likely to seek and receive the confidence of constituencies, and, if elected, he believed they would be valuable members of the Commons. Instead of keeping them out, he believed Parliament should be disposed to facilitate their entry into public life.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE said, under any ordinary circumstances, he should be reluctant to interfere with or criticize very closely a measure from the House of Commons to regulate the election of its own members. He quite admitted that circumstances might arise in which such interference would be necessary, as in the case of the Bill which affected the election of representatives to the House of Commons from the Province of Prince Edward Island. In that case, the Senate had interfered with excellent effect, and he should always be grateful to this House for their action on that occasion, because it had saved from destruction the political franchise of a large portion of the population in the Province from which he came.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE (continuing)—But in the present case he could not see anything which would justify this House in amending the Bill. The hon. Senator from Arichat clearly anticipated that superannuated civil servants would, at no distant day, become candidates for seats in the House of Commons. He (Mr. Haythorne) deemed it highly inexpedient that a man who had been a subordinate of a Minister of the Crown should occupy such a position. After a certain term of service, he could claim his superannuation. There might be doubts as to the propriety of that claim, and Ministers were sometimes accused of undue favoritism, or other improper motives, in superannuating public servants. It would be highly improper, under such circumstances, that the quondam public servant and the Minister should meet each other face to face, a few months afterwards, on the floor of the House of Commons. They might meet as leader and political follower, or they might meet as opponents, but in either case, it would be most unbecoming that they should meet in the House of Commons at all. There might be most unpleasant contrasts drawn between the administration of the Department in which he had been employed, under different Ministers, or in the conduct of that identical Minister at different periods of his own career, and such contrasts would be exceedingly out of place on the floor of the House of Commons. It was undoubtedly true that the choice of the people should be limited as little as possible, but this limitation could do no harm, because, as the hon. Senator from Richmond had admitted, no case had ever arisen where a retired judge or superannuated civil servant had been elected to the House of Commons.

At six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE resumed his speech. He said:—While the accession of retired judges or superannuated civil servants to the House of Commons might be useful in some respects, if a civil servant should be hurried from his Department or a judge from the Bench to defend a Minister who seriously needed that defence, it would be in the last degree objectionable. The hon. Senator from Richmond had contended that it was unnecessary to anticipate difficulties. In that view he (Mr. Haythorne) could not concur, and is seemed to him the condition of the House of Commons last year was an example of the want of direct and suitable legislation as to the position of hon. members of that House. He was aware of cases in which the representatives of the people felt themselves in an equivocal position—not from anything they had recently done, but from having been members of companies which had existed for years before they became members of Parliament, and which had received money from the Government for work done—yet they felt themselves in a critical position, and one hon. gentleman had actually divested himself of his property in consequence of the position he occupied in the House of Commons. It was deemed desirable, and very justly so, that the status of members should be defined by the law, and that the Act should declare who should be members of the House of Commons, and who should not. It would be better to anticipate evils than to await them. To show the light in which this question should be viewed, and the duty of the Legislature to anticipate every occurrence which was likely, or even unlikely to happen in the course of legislation, he would quote from an author of a former time, who had a high reputation in his day—Sydney Smith, the well-known essayist. In his review of Bentham's works, Sydney Smith made these remarks:—

“The object of laudatory personalities is to effect the rejection of a measure on account of the alleged good character of those who oppose it, and the argument advanced is, ‘The measure is rendered unnecessary by the virtues of those who are in power,’ their opposition is a sufficient authority for the rejection of the measure. The measure implies distrust of the members of His Majesty's Government, but so great is their integrity, so complete their disinterestedness, so uniformly do they prefer the public advantage to their own that such a measure is altogether unnecessary. Their disapproval is sufficient to warrant an opposition; precautions can only be requisite where danger is apprehended, (and I hope the hon. gentleman from Arichat will note this). Here the high character of the individuals in question is a sufficient guarantee against any ground of alarm.”

Then follows Sydney Smith's comments in these words:—

“The panegyric goes on increasing with the dignity of the lauded person. All are honorable and delightful men. The person who opens the door of the office is a model of approved fidelity; the junior clerk is a model of assiduity; all the clerks are models—seven years models, eight years models, nine years models, and upwards—the first clerk is a paragon, and ministers the very perfection of probity and intelligence; and as for the highest Magistrate, no adulation is equal to describe the extent of his various merits. . . . The effect of such an argument is to give men of good or reputed good character, the power of putting a negative on any question not agreeable to their inclinations.”

Then follows another extract from Bentham, to which I beg the attention of the House, because the views it expresses seem directly opposed to those of the hon. member from Arichat:—

“In every public trust, the Legislature should, for the purpose of prevention, suppose the trustee disposed to break the trust in every imaginable way in which it would be possible for him to reap from the breach of it, any personal advantage. This is the principle on which public institutions ought to be formed, and when it is applied to all men indiscriminately it is injurious to none. The practical inference is to oppose to such possible (and what will always be probable) breaches of trust, every bar that can be opposed consistently with the power requisite for the efficient and due discharge of the trust. Indeed, these arguments, drawn from the supposed virtues of men in power, are opposed to the first principles on which all laws proceed.”

He (Mr. Haythorne) could see no ground for opposing this Bill, and he would be happy to support it, reserving to himself the right to act in the future as circumstances might dictate. He concurred in the remarks of the hon. Senator from Amherst with respect to the reflections cast upon judges. This House was not the place in which such criticisms upon the conduct of judges on the bench should be made. If any member of Parliament thought a judge had acted improperly, he could bring up the question in a formal manner, and if his charges were sustained, the judge might be removed at the option of both Houses. That was the legitimate and only way by which the action of judges could be assailed in this House, and in his humble judgment it was a practice that would be more “honored in the breach than in the observance.”

The Committee divided on the amendment which was adopted:—

Hon. Mr. MILLER moved to amend section "C" by striking out the words "Clerk of the Peace." In Nova Scotia a clerk of the peace was an officer appointed either by the Sessions or the Custos of the county. He was a county officer whose duty was merely of a clerical character, and there was no reason why he should be made ineligible to be elected a member of the House of Commons. It was true the electoral lists were filed in his office, but he had no judicial or other duty to exercise in regard to them, except to furnish copies of the lists to those who might desire them. The only control over the lists was with the revisers, and if any class of county officials should be disqualified, they should. By way of illustration, he might mention that in a certain county in the Province of Nova Scotia, a gentleman who had been reviser during the last year was to be a candidate at the next general election for the House of Commons, and he had made an attempt in revising the list in his own county, to add five hundred names. This occurred in the County of Cape Breton, and he had been credibly informed that the reviser would be a candidate in the Government interest at the next general election. The other two revisers refused to add the names, and when they did so, he took the lists away in his pocket, and they were obliged to get other lists to complete the duty of revising. The electoral lists in Nova Scotia were made up by officers of the Local Government for the local elections, and the elections for the House of Commons were also run upon them. He could not understand why a clerk of the peace, who was merely the custodian of those lists, which were matters of record, and about which there could be no falsification, should be rendered ineligible for an election. A gentleman in King's County, Mr. Chipman, who had formerly been a member of the House of Commons, had written to him (Mr. Miller) to say that he believed this clause was a blow struck at him. Mr. Chipman was a clerk of the peace in King's County, and he was likely to be a candidate at the next election; and his statement was that his opponent had written down to Nova Scotia that he (Mr. Chipman) would have to sacrifice his office if he wished to run for election. He did not think this House would allow such special legislation to be aimed at anybody.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the gentleman to whom reference had been made, considered himself of more importance than others did. It was the first time he (Mr. Scott) had ever heard that this clause was intended to strike at him specially. In Ontario and Quebec, clerks of the peace were appointed by the Local Government, and in Ontario they were, practically, the county attorneys; so that, as far as this legislation was concerned, it was directed principally to the larger Provinces, inasmuch as it was very objectionable so important an officer of the Local Government as the county attorney should be permitted to become a member of Parliament. He was rather inclined to believe that they were excluded by the present law quite as much as a sheriff or registrar would be, and the reason would be very much greater, inasmuch as clerks of the peace had more or less to do with the final revision of the roll. The ground, however, on which such officials were excluded was that they were officials of the Local Governments.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said in that case the amendment of the hon. Senator from Arichat would have the effect of excluding the Crown County Attorneys in Ontario, while the Clerks of the Peace in Nova Scotia would be eligible.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT--That would be an absurd anomaly.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL thought not; because in Ontario the Clerk of the Peace was an officer of the Crown, while in the Maritime Provinces the Clerk of the Peace was not appointed by the Government, but by the Custos, and removed by the Quarter Sessions of the Peace.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY concurred in the opinion of the hon. Senator from Arichat. The Clerk of the Peace in Nova Scotia was a purely local officer. If he were to be excluded, where was it proposed to stop? The Clerk of the Peace, in regard to the electoral lists, had no function whatever except mere copying. He had nothing in the wide world to do with the preparation of the lists; yet the officers who did prepare them, by a strange inconsistency, were not excluded.

Hon. Mr. POWER thought while it would be wrong to legislate to exclude any individual, on the other hand it would be wrong to make exemptions to allow certain individuals to become candidates. He thought it improper that a man who had complete charge of the electoral lists for months, should be allowed to become a candidate under those lists. There was no security at all that he would not tamper with the lists. It was too much temptation for human nature. He thought if there was any officer mentioned in this section who ought not to be a candidate, it was the Clerk of the Peace.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE thought if there was any local officer who should be excluded, it was the assessors. The Clerk of the Peace had no opportunity, even if he were so disposed, to tamper with the lists, because he would be liable to prosecution. The reviser had a great deal of power, because if he struck a name off the lists, it was almost impossible to get it on again.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said it would be impossible for a Clerk of the Peace to tamper with the lists and conceal the fact, and it would be an offence which would inevitably subject him to the severest punishment. No one who would aspire to a seat in the House of Commons would think of perpetrating such a crime. If any officers were to be disqualified it would be the Assessors and Revisers: because they had more control over the lists than the Clerk of the Peace. He saw no reason in the public interest why the Clerk of the Peace should be disqualified, and he hoped the Committee would adopt the amendment.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said it was a most improbable supposition that a Clerk of the Peace would tamper with the lists after they were placed under his charge. This law, which would exclude the Clerk of the Peace, made no reference to the Custos, who was appointed by the Local Government, or the Assessor and Reviser who had judicial functions with respect to the electoral lists.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH said when

this Bill had been first introduced in the House of Commons it contained no reference to the Clerk of the Peace. It was inserted at the suggestion of a party in the other House who knew well it would disqualify a popular candidate who was likely to oppose him in the coming election. It was also well known that this same member had sent down to Nova Scotia and proclaimed in the County of Kings that Mr. Chipman was disqualified. He would be very sorry to see either the Clerk of the Peace or the Custos disqualified; but if one were disqualified both should be, and also the Revisers and Assessors.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT said there were many Clerks of the Peace in New Brunswick qualified to be members of Parliament, and he could see no reason why the people should not be permitted to choose them as their representatives. The Revisers' lists were distributed in such a way that it was impossible to falsify them. He considered this anything but a liberal principle. It was a singular fact that the so-called Liberals had become the champions of restrictive measures.

The Committee divided on the amendment, which was adopted:—

On the tenth clause

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved to amend the clause by striking out from "Senate," in line 37, to "shall," in line 41, and after "contract," to insert "or."

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said there was a very important principle embodied in this section, which concerned the privileges and immunities of this House. With regard to the part proposed to be struck out, he took it for granted there would not be the slightest objection to it, for the reasons which had been stated in so lucid and exhaustive a manner by his hon. friend before going into committee. It might be mentioned that the effect of this clause, had it been the law of the land a short time ago, would have been to prevent a gentleman from accepting a position which he had well and faithfully filled some two years ago, in representing this Dominion at the Centennial Exhibition. Whether that gentleman patriotically gave his services gratuitously or not, was not a question to be considered; this clause would have prevented him, or any other gentleman in this House, from holding that position. He (Mr. Dickey) went further in his objection to this clause than any other gentleman who had spoken upon it. It was contrary to our Constitution to legislate in a way affecting the tenure of office of members of the Senate. By the British North America Act, section 23, the qualifications and disqualifications of Senators were strictly defined; and it was further provided by another section that the Senate was made the sole judge of these qualifications and disqualifications. With regard to the House of Commons, the British North America Act provided that Parliament was to fix the qualifications and disqualifications of members of that body. The members of the two branches of the Legislature held their offices by an entirely different tenure. The Senators held their offices for life; they were not hereditary, but they were made as fixed as they possibly could be. The 31st section of the British North America Act mentioned the disqualifications of a Senator to be: absence from Parliament for two consecutive sessions; the taking of an oath of allegiance to a foreign power; if he became bankrupt, or was attainted of treason, or convicted of felony, or if he ceased to be qualified in respect to property. Then the 33rd section provides: that if any question arises respecting the qualification of a Senator the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate and the Senate alone. It was a curious fact in reference to this subject that the tenure of office of the Legislative Councillors in the Province of Quebec was entirely similar to that of the Senate, and if by any legislation, or by any precedent of legislation, this House affected the qualification or disqualification of Senators, they equally affected those of Legislative Councillors in the Province of Quebec, because, by the 73rd section of the Act it was provided that the qualifications of the Legislative Councillors of Quebec should be the same as those of the Senators for the Dominion. Following out the complete analogy between the two cases, the 76th clause provided: "If any question arises respecting the qualification of the Legislative Councillors of Quebec, or a vacancy in the Legislative Council of Quebec the same shall be heard and determined by the Legislative Council.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said this Bill did not strike at the qualification at all.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said there was no doubt if this legislation should in any way affect the qualification of Senators, it necessarily affected the qualifications of the Legislative Councillors. He had already called the attention of the House to the fact that while they were under a written Constitution, and had secured to them their tenure of office, they had the qualifications and disqualifications of Senators for that office distinctly defined, and that the Senate alone was to be the judge of those qualifications. With regard to members of the House of Commons, it was entirely different. There was no qualifications there defined for them, except the qualifications which had existed in the several Provinces at the time of the Union, and power was given to Parliament, at any time, to alter the tenure of the members of the House of Commons; but there was no such provision with regard to Senators; as their tenure rested upon the Act entirely, and could not be affected by any legislation originating in the House of Commons. But the hon. Secretary of State had suggested that this Bill did not affect the qualifications of Senators. One of the provisions of this Bill, however, was to make Senators liable to a penalty of $200 a day, if any person being a member of the Senate should become a party to or concerned in any contract or agreement with the Government. The hon. Secretary of State had suggested that this Bill did not affect their qualifications, but only subjected them to a penalty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—The Bill proposed to make it penal for a Senator to take his seat in this House under certain circumstances, when by the Act of Union he was not prevented from doing so. That was their argument, and he would put it to the House if it was one that would commend itself to the intelligence and common sense of hon. gentlemen. Was it common sense to suppose that they could get rid of the effect of the British North America Act by simply passing laws of this kind from time to time, subjecting members of this House to penalties for holding their seats, although they held them in conformity with the Constitution under which the Senate existed? Another serious objection to this legislation was this: If they struck out a part of this clause and left the remainder of it it would become a precedent in legislation, and they would probably find in the future that it would be followed by other attempts to cripple the independence of this House; because if the Commons could put heavy bonds and penalties on gentlemen holding positions in the Senate they could apply to them all the effects of complete disqualification. What gentleman, for instance would undertake to hold a seat in this House if he were to be liable to a penalty of $200 a day for holding it, although he was qualified by the Union Act to hold his seat and all the privileges connected with it. He trusted the House would strike out the clause altogether. There was another reason for it. Two or three years ago a case had occurred in which a member of this Senate had entered into a contract with the Government, and that gentleman with a proper appreciation of his position at once resigned his seat. He took it for granted that any other hon. gentleman placed in the same position would at once do the same thing, but if he had not done so he (Mr. Dickey) would have been the first to propose, if the Government of the day did not think proper to do it, a Bill in this House to disqualify such members. He understood the hon. Secretary of State to have suggested that if they would strike out this clause altogether, and allow the remainder of the Bill to pass as it was, he would bring in a Bill to prevent any member of the Senate from holding a contract under the Government. He would approve of that, and would be one of the first to support it, as it would be a bill of their own, and the principle would be confirmed that the Senate were made the judges of their own disqualifications. He warned the House that if they consented to a measure of this kind, and accepted one part of this clause, it would have the same effect as if they had passed the whole clause, and they would have other penalties and other provisions introduced that would prevent this House from asserting its fixed and independent action in the legislation of this country.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said his hon. friend was usually so clear, cogent, and logical that he was always ready to agree with his arguments; but he could not agree with the position he had taken on this occasion. It was quite true that under the British North America Act Senators should be qualified for certain reasons, and disqualified for certain other reasons, and that these reasons were permanent; but it by no means followed that Parliament was prevented from saying, "If you take such another step, then such a penalty shall be enforced against you." He desired to draw the attention of this House to the difference in the qualifications and disqualifications imposed by the Imperial Act, and the provisions of this Bill. If under this Bill a gentleman who chose to take a contract should be liable to a penalty of $200 for every day he held the contract, it seemed to him those things were as distinct as possible, that although a member's seat might be perfectly secured under the Imperial Act, yet, if he chose to take any other step, and entered into a contract with the Government, under this Bill a fine would follow. He did not think any one desired to see sitting amongst them any member holding a contract with the Government, but it would have been far better to have allowed this legislation to originate in this House. The House of Commons had a perfect right to originate a measure affecting the position to be occupied by members of the Senate who saw fit to take contracts; but, from his point of view, it would have been better had they left it to the Senate to originate it themselves. He did not think they could take the position of rejecting such legislation, as it was a position they could not maintain. For instance, in the British Parliament, the Bills affecting the seats of Irish and Scotch peers in the House of Lords originated in the House of Commons, and there was no objection taken to them on that score. There was no doubt that Parliament had a perfect right to originate in either House a measure which should have for its object the enactment of a clause to prevent a member of this House from holding a contract. There was no question as to the power, it was only a question of choice or discretion whether it should originate in the other House or in the Senate. He thought the wisest plan, and the only principle they could maintain permanently, was to adopt the Bill, and amend it to suit their views. They should bear in mind, that in changing the clause relative to the Senate, they would change the clause relative to the House of Commons also, and it would be very odd to say that nothing should originate in the House of Commons affecting this House, and at the same time say the Senate should legislate affecting the seats of members of the Commons, that they could blow hot and cold at the same time, and that when they undertook to correct the Bill, they undertook to correct each and every part of it; and the House of Commons, when they undertook to legislate upon the subject, had the right to legislate upon every part of it. It was merely a question of discretion whether they should do so or not. This Committee had seen fit already to correct two paragraphs of the Bill relating to the House of Commons. He thought they were quite right in doing so, and they should be wrong in now taking the position that the House of Commons had no right to interfere with the Senate. This Bill did not propose to interfere with the seats of Senators so long as they merely discharged the functions that belonged to them. He felt bound to dissent from the position taken by his hon. friend, as it was a position that, for the reasons he had given, they could not maintain.

Hon. Mr. POWER said his view of the matter coincided with that of the hon. gentleman from Amherst. He thought there should be a courtesy between the two Houses which was not, perhaps, binding in law, but which ought to bind them, and he considered it was a violation of that courtesy for the Commons to undertake to deal with the qualifications of members of this House. Had they introduced a Bill simply to affect the qualification of members of their own House, he did not think the Senate should have interfered very much with its details unless there was something very objectionable in them. On the other hand any measure affecting the qualifications of Senators should have originated in this House. It seemed to him that there was just as much reason why Senators should be free from any influence which being interested in contracts which the Government might have over them, as members of the House of Commons, if not more so. They were a smaller body, and their votes, as had been shown during the present Session were just as influential, and perhaps a little more so than those of the House of Commons. Members of the Lower House were responsible to their constituents, who would hold them to account for any improper use of their positions, but Senators held their positions for life, and should parties become pretty evenly balanced in the Upper House and the Government desire to pass some obnoxious measure they might influence the votes of some of its members by promises of office or emolument and in that way gain a majority which they had no right to. This House would appear very badly before the country if they should affirm the principle that a member of the Commons should not be allowed to hold office under the Government, while they declined to allow themselves to be placed under the same disability.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD said he thought the hon. Senator from Kingston had met the objection of the hon. Senator from Amherst as to the authority of this House to amend this Bill in any way they might deem fit, and that it was perfectly within the power of the Commons to originate the measure.

The clause was carried on a division.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY gave notice that he would on concurrence move to strike out clause 11.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT gave notice that he would move on concurrence to restore the two paragraphs that had been struck out in Committee.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE gave notice that he would move in amendment to clause 12, as a new clause, “ CLAUSE A.

“ No member of the Senate or of the House of Commons of Canada, shall be appointed to any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of Canada, to which any salary, fee, wages, allowances or emolument or profit, of any kind is attached, unless he has ceased for twelve months previous to hold a seat in the said Senate or House of Commons of Canada."

The Committee then rose and reported the Bill with amendments.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the report of the Committee be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said he hoped the hon. gentleman from Amherst would not move his amendment, and that the Secretary of State would not persist in asking for another division on the amendments after they had been adopted in committee.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said his course in this matter was entirely within the undoubted constitutional rights of this House; at the same time he would bow to the wish of the majority. He would bring up the matter on concurrence and have it entered on the record that he had moved to strike out the clause, and have it declared lost on division.

BILL RESPECTING THE ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

SECOND READING.

The Order of the Day being read for second reading of the Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Act respecting the election of Members of the House of Commons,"

Hon. Mr. RYAN, with the leave of the House, presented a petition from His Honor Chief Justice Meredith, and their Judges Stuart, Bossé, Casault, McCord, Caron, Johnson, Mackay, Torrance, Dorion, Rainville, and Papineau, of the Superior Court for the Province of Quebec, praying against certain provisions of the Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Act respecting the election of Members of the House of Commons," imposing certain duties on Judges.

The petition was received and laid on the table.

Hon. Mr. Bellerose.

Hon. Mr. PELLETEIR moved the second reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

BUILDING SOCIETIES' BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved the second reading of Bill (55) "An Act to amend the law respecting Building Societies."

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

STAMPS AND BILLS OF EXCHANGE LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the House into Committee of the Whole on Bill (4) "An Act to amend the law relating to Stamps on Promissory Notes and Bills of Exchange."

In the Committee, Hon. Mr. Ryan in the chair,

The first five clauses having been read and agreed to,

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL moved that the following be inserted as clause A:—

"After a note or instrument requiring to be stamped under this Act has been settled or paid, no penalty shall be enforced against any party thereto, or against any person or corporation who had been the holder thereof, by reason of such note or instrument having been insufficiently stamped, or the stamps thereon insufficiently effaced; unless it be proved, that the party from whom a penalty is demanded, was aware before, or at the date, of the maturity of such note or instrument, of the defect in the stamping thereof, or in the effacing of the stamps thereon, and did not thereupon affix double stamps thereto, in the manner provided by this Act. And the reception of such note or instrument by any party to such note or instrument, or by the holder thereof, whether such holder be a corporation or not, or by any employer or agent of such party or holder, shall not be evidence sufficient to justify a conviction or such penalty."

He said this clause had been prepared by an eminent lawyer in Montreal to meet a difficulty which had arisen in Ontario, and it seemed to meet that difficulty, otherwise banks and other parties were liable to a penalty for having negotiated insufficiently stamped paper, although the knowledge of it had not been brought home to them at the time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the only objection he had to it was, that it might lead to very great laxity in affixing stamps, and in that way rather defeat the revenue.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said he did not think it would create any difficulty of that kind. So far as the banks were concerned, they would be very keen to find out if there was any defect in the stamps on paper passing through their hands.

Hon. Mr. MACMASTER objected to the amendment, as he feared it would cause a loss to the revenue, but he thought there should be some leniency shown in this matter.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY considered that the people who required protection were not the sharp bankers, brokers or business men, but the people in the rural districts, and others who were entirely ignorant of the requirements of the law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT asked to allow the amendment to be printed, and it could be considered on the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BUREAU said he also had an amendment to offer, so as to define the law respecting notarial documents. It was as follows :—

Clause B.

"7. Neither the said Act nor any Act amending the same nor this Act shall be construed to require that any stamp be impressed on or affixed to any instrument, executed en brevet or otherwise, before a notary in his official capacity."

He gave notice that he would move this amendment at the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said it would be very much more consistent if the hon. gentleman would bring in an independent bill to that effect than to press his amendment and he hoped he would withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. BUREAU said he was very sorry that the hon. gentleman should adopt a parliamentary tactic to defeat his amendment. It was an amendment that was absolutely necessary to this Bill. When the Stamp Act was enacted nobody thought it would affect notarial documents, but the judges of the Superior Court had decided that notarial documents came within its provisions. It was not just that the people of Quebec, who did the principal part of their business with notaries, should be subjected to this Stamp Act. It was a thing they were entirely ignorant of, and they were liable at any moment to have their notarial documents declared null and void. He would insist upon having a vote of the Senate on the matter, and if the Government would not accept it, he would see if he could not have it tested by the electors at the polls. He had no doubt that if the Judges of the Province of Quebec were consulted, they would say at once it was only a matter of justice that such an amendment should be adopted. He would insist upon pressing it at the third reading.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL said his hon. friend was perfectly right, as the highest courts in Quebec had declared that certain notarial documents were subject to the Stamp Act. If such documents were of the character of a promissory note they should be stamped, but if they were not they ought not to be subject to the Stamp Act. There had been contradictory judgments given on the matter and it was necessary that the Legislature should intervene and declare what was the law. He would support the amendment of his hon. friend.

The Committee rose and reported the Bill.

The House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

THE SENATE.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT
BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being read for the consideration of the Report of the Committee of the Whole on the Bill intituled: "An Act futher securing the Independence of Parliament."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that clause "B" which had been struck out yesterday in Committee, be restored.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE asked the hon. Secretary of State what was the difference between a Clerk of the Peace and a Registrar in the Province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the Registrars were excluded under this Act, and it was desirable to exclude the Clerks of the Peace also.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said Registrars held the same positions as Clerks of the Peace in Nova Scotia, and he did not see why they should be made an exception of in any one Province.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said the objection was this. The Registrars in Quebec and Ontario were nominated by the Local Governments, but in the Province of Nova Scotia they were nominated by the municipal authorities.

The House then divided, and the motion was lost on the following division:—

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved to restore the words that had been struck out of clause "C" by the Committee, and to add after, the words, "when appointed by the Local Government."

This motion was declared lost on the same division.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY moved that clause 10 of the Bill as amended in Committee, be reconsidered and struck out. He said he did not wish to weary the House by entering into a detailed argument on this subject. He had shown the House yesterday that by the written Constitution embodied in the British North America Act, the qualifications of Senators were fixed by law. He had also shown that the disqualifications of Senators were fixed by law, and that the sole tribunal for deciding the qualifications and disqualifications, was the Senate itself. He had likewise pointed out that the qualifications of the Legislative Councillors of Quebec, were by the British North America Act made dependent upon the qualifications of Senators; therefore, anything that affected the qualifications of Senators would also necessarily affect the qualifications of members of the Legislative Council. The Legislative Council was made the sole judge of the qualifications of that body. He had also called attention to the fact that the qualifications of Senators were entirely different from those of members of the House of Commons. Their qualifications under the Union Act were temporarily to be those that obtained in the several Provinces for members of the Local Legislatures; but they were to be subject in the future to the control of Parliament, and to have such qualifications and disqualifications as Parliament should determine, and it was upon that ground that this House had reconsidered the question as to the qualifications of members of the House of Commons yesterday and to-day, as they had a perfectly constitutional right to do. But the British North America Act had fixed the qualifications and disqualifications of Senators without reference at all to future legislation. The position he had taken then was, that as the Senate were living under a legal Constitution, they had no right to tamper with that Constitution, and if they began to tamper with it, it would be difficult to say where it would end. His hon. friend from Westmoreland had argued last evening that the House of Commons and the Senate had, respectively, the right to originate any measure, but that was not the question here to-day. The question was one of much broader character. If it was true the House of Commons had the abstract power to originate a measure affecting the tenure of office of the Senate, surely the latter had the same power with respect to the House of Commons. But he would like to ask his hon. friend how a measure of that kind, originating in this House, would be received in another place? Supposing they were to do with the Commons as the latter had thought proper to do with the Senate, and originate a measure affecting the qualifications or disqualifications of members of the other House, he would like to know if twenty-four hours would pass before that measure would be returned to them? He contended there was no usage that would confirm any proposition of that kind. It had been said in this connection that it would be irritating to the Commons if they were to strike out this clause; but they had already undertaken to strike out a part of it, and he would like to know how that irritation was to be increased by striking out the remainder of it? If it were irritating to the House of Commons to strike out this clause, surely it must be irritating to them to amend a clause which affected their very existence. The Senate ought not to be placed in the position of having this Bill affecting their tenure of office thrust upon them. Any such measure ought properly, and according to constitution and usage, to originate in this House; just as any measure affecting the qualification or disqualification of the members of the Commons should properly originate in that House. It had been asserted that this 10th clause did not disqualify, but what did it do? It imposed a disability upon a member of not being able to sit or vote under a penalty of $200 a day, and it appeared to him as trifling with the common sense of this House to say in one breath, "I grant you, you have no power to disqualify a member, but you have the power to impose any amount of pains and penalties upon him for sitting as a member." If this could be done, why not leave the penalty two thousand dollars per day, and why not add imprisonment to it or any other penalty? It was sufficient for his argument to show that they were imposing the disability upon a Senator of paying two hundred dollars a day at a time when his qualification was secured to him for life by the British North America Act. He was perfectly willing, whenever a case arose showing the necessity for such legislation, that the Senate should themselves prepare a measure and pass it, preventing any person holding a contract or agreement with the Government, from having a seat in this House; but if they were not to stultify themselves now, they would keep to the position they had occupied yesterday, and their short answer to this clause would be: In the first place it should have originated in this House, if at all, and in the next place they objected to this clause because it was practically an infringement upon the British North America Act, and lastly because no necessity had been shown for this clause. Under the circumstances, he would ask the House to strike the clause out of the Bill. He had intimated yesterday that he was willing that his motion should be declared lost on a division, if the hon. Secretary of State would allow his motions to be disposed of in the same manner, but as the hon. gentleman had not seen fit to do so, he would ask for a division.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said his objection to the course which had been proposed by his hon. friend, was this: The Commons had a perfect right to introduce this Bill; and to say that there was anything in the British North America Act which prevented them from doing so, was untenable. The British North America Act defined upon what terms a member should hold his seat in this House: so long as he simply discharged his duties and functions as a Senator, nobody could interfere with him; but this clause suggested that if he went beyond his duties and entered into a contract or agreement with the Government, he should be subject to a penalty. It was impossible to show that this was an interference with the basis upon which a Senator held his seat in this House, and it was not, therefore, an interference with the British North America Act. He did not think it was desirable to strike out the clause because it was assuming this position; it was saying "although we are quite content to amend the language of the Act, so far as regards the House of Commons, and interfere with the qualification of the members of that House, we are not willing to legislate that no person in this House shall hold a contract under the Government." He did not think it was a desirable position to take. No matter what they might think of the taste or discretion of the Commons in originating the Bill there was no doubt of their right to do so. There was a want of clearness in the clause, which had been pointed out to him by his hon. friend from Sarnia, which he considered was so serious as to call for amendment. The language of the clause was "If any person, being a member of the Senate, becomes a party to or concerned in any such contract, agreement, matter or thing, he shall thereby forfeit the sum of two hundred dollars for each and every day, during which he continues to be such party or so concerned, together with all the emoluments and profits thereof, etc."

That was evidently not the intention of the Government; the intention was that such person should forfeit two hundred dollars for every day he sat and voted while he held the contract. He thought this should be amended by adding after the word "day" the words "sits and votes."

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD said since he had addressed the House before on this question, he had taken occasion to look up authorities and had found that this legislation was sustained by precedents in the Imperial Parliament where Bills of this nature had originated in both branches of the Legislature, and neither branch had taken exception to the action of the other. It was clear, however, that neither the Senate nor the Commons had a right to originate Bills to alter or amend the British North America Act; it had to be done by an address of both Houses to the Imperial Parliament. The hon. gentleman from Amherst was wrong in assuming that the Commons had no right to introduce this Bill, and he was also wrong in stating that the Senate had no right to introduce a Bill affecting the qualifications of the Commons. He would sustain the amendment as one which he thought should be sustained by every person who wished to stand by the Constitution. He thought it undesirable to give to any Government the liberty to influence members of this House by entering into contracts or agreements with them.

Hon. Mr. BUREAU asked if it was reasonable to suppose that because a firm in which a Senator had an interest should sell goods to the Government or their agents, perhaps without his knowledge or consent, that he should be exposed to this penalty? The Government could not deny that such was the interpretation of the Bill. He thought it would be wise under the circumstances to strike out the clause as no one could see how far-reaching the effect of it would be, and it was inexpedient to enact laws that they did not thoroughly understand. He had not heard one reason advanced by the Secretary of State to justify them in passing this clause, and he would support the motion of the hon. gentleman from Amherst to strike it out.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND said his interpretation of the Act would be, that under this tenth clause a Senator would be liable to this penalty if he was a partner or had the most infinitesimal interest in a contract with the Government. He believed the Commons had the constitutional right to initiate this legislation but the question now before them was this: whether the clause that had been introduced into this Bill, affecting the Senate, was not inserting the small end of the wedge into the British North America Act? If they allowed it to be established as a precedent, and sanctioned it with their votes, that measures interfering with their rights might be introduced in the Commons in the future, the British North America Act would be no longer the charter of the rights and liberties of the Senate; it would be merely a piece of waste paper that could be altered from time to time as the Commons desired. He did not believe in Senators holding contracts under the Government, but the proper way to prevent it was by an address of both Houses to the Imperial Parliament, asking them to amend the British North America Act in that direction. Under these circumstances he would vote for the motion of the hon. gentleman from Amherst.

Hon. Mr. BENSON said he could see no necessity for this clause, and he would have to vote for the erasing of it altogether from the Bill. It was quite time enough for them when the necessity arose for it, to change the qualifications of Senators, which change should emanate from this House without saying anything whatever as regarded the rights of the other. He was prevented from taking part in the debates of this House by a physical disability, but he could not let this subject pass without expressing his opinion upon it.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON said he was in favor of excluding Government contractors from this House, and of anything that would raise the standing of this Senate in the estimation of the country; but he considered that any change affecting their qualifications should originate in this House, and should be prepared with very great care. If they enacted this law without due consideration, they did not know what construction the Judges might put upon it, and they were running a good deal of risk in consenting to have their rights and privileges affected in this way. It was quite certain if they committed an error now it never could be remedied, and their rights and privileges would be gone from them forever whether it had been their intention to part with them or not. He considered that the House should have another day to consider the clause, but he would not pledge himself to support it even then; if it was pressed to a division now he would vote against it.

Hon. Mr. SMITH asked if the selling of supplies to a Government vessel, that might call into a port could be construed into a contract.

Hon. Mr. Haviland.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—No.

Hon. Mr. SMITH said there was a difference of opinion on the subject. If a Government steamer, for instance, called at the wharf of a member of this Senate and bought from his clerk, agent or partner a supply of coal, the invoice would be issued in the Senator's name, and, perhaps, he would not get his money from the Government for months afterwards. Would that constitute a contract under the terms of this Bill? Or would the selling of anything to the Intercolonial Railway be construed into a contract? He considered that very great care should be taken or they might place themselves in a false position without knowing or intending it.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved that the further consideration of the Bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said it was a broad question whether this Bill conflicted with the privileges conferred by the British North America Act or not. The hon. gentleman from Kingston had expressed his (Mr. Scott's) views, and he did not think any other conclusion could be reached if the subject were given due consideration. If any Senator rendered himself liable to the consequences of this Bill his seat was not attacked—he was merely punished for breaking the law. It was purely optional with a Senator whether he should take a contract from the Government or not, but the position of a Senator should be above suspicion. So far as the present Senate was concerned, they might feel satisfied that no hon. gentleman would lower his position; still, in making laws they should legislate for those who might be less careful than themselves. The Bill was drawn with a full knowledge of the effect of the 10th clause, and was drawn to meet every case as it at present stood; that a Senator should not only be subject to the penalty for the time he sat and voted, but that he should be prevented from holding a contract under the Government the remaining nine months of the year, or by absenting himself from the House one session, from holding a contract twenty-one months. He was still a Senator whether sitting in the House or not, and the object of the law was to deprive the Government from having any power or influence over a Senator or member of the Commons; in fact, to take away the possibility of corruption. Surely Senators did not wish to be placed in any different position in this respect than the members of the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—There is something in that point, and it is another reason why the Bill should be postponed for another day.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—It is a reason why we should strike the clause out altogether.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the Bill was a Government Bill, and it could have been introduced in either House with equal propriety, as the Government were represented in both Houses. It was not, therefore, subject to the criticism that had been attempted by the hon. gentlemen opposite, that it was a Bill that originated in the other House and was brought up here; it was originated by the Government and was brought by them down to the Commons.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD asked if a Senator who purchased Dominion lands in Manitoba would be considered as having entered into a contract or agreement with the Government under the provisions of this Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he was quite safe in saying in an off-handed way that he could buy all the lands he required from the Government in the North-West, and it would not affect his seat under this Bill, as it did not go further than the law as it existed in old Canada. No member of Parliament had ever been debarred from purchasing Government lands as long as he paid the regular price for them, and did not obtain any special privilege or advantage over private individuals.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH said there was evidently a great conflict of opinions here between legal gentlemen on this question. He thought the Government did not thoroughly understand the full effect and scope of the Bill, as different answers to those of the Secretary of State had been given by Ministers in the other House to the same questions that had been asked here.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL considered that a purchase of Dominion lands would be construed into a contract with the Government.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH said he was willing to go the length of declaring that persons appointed by the Government, and who depended on the Administration of the day for their salaries, and were in a position to be removed at any time, ought not to sit in either branch of this Parliament. The law should remain as it was, and its provisions should be gradually amended as the necessity arose. The people's rights should not be restricted further than was found necessary. He was willing that no contractor should sit in the Senate, but such legislation should emanate from the Senate. He could not see why judges should be disqualified. They were entirely out of the hands, and free from the influence of the Government. They, with all others superannuated, were not under Government control; the money they received was their own money—their own insurance fund—and they received it as of right, not at the will or pleasure of the Government. Many of them he personally knew who, if elected to Parliament, would bring a vast amount of useful knowledge, experience and ability with them. The people should be at liberty to decide in such cases. There was no Parliament so jealous of the independence of its members as the British Parliament, and yet superannuation was no disqualification there, and no reason had been given why it should be a disqualification here. Under this Bill shareholders in vessels might be disqualified if they were not in an incorporated company—and yet he could see no difference between them and corporated companies owning vessels, as the business was generally conducted entirely by the ship's husband and agents abroad, the individual shareholders seldom knowing or being conferred with as to the contracts entered into. Bankers seemed generally to be a favored class. They might make any agreement they pleased with the Government. He contended that any Minister of the Crown who induced any member to violate the Independence of Parliament Act, should be liable to the same penalties and forfeitures as the member himself.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—With regard to the constitutional question involved in this Bill, he viewed it in much the same light as his hon. friend from Amherst. This was as an entering wedge, and would create a precedent. He was not prepared to admit that the Commons had any right to initiate legislation to curtail and restrict the Constitution and rights of the Senate, as guaranteed and given to it under the British North America Act. The 23rd section of the Act states what the qualifications of a Senator shall be; the 31st section clearly states what the disqualifications shall be; and the 33rd section declares that any question arising as to the qualification or vacancy, the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate. By this the Senators are constituted the sole judges in all such matters. But it is otherwise with members of the House of Commons, for the 41st section of the same Act provides that Parliament has the power to determine the qualification and disqualification of its members. It was in vain for the Secretary of State to say that the Bill did not disqualify Senators, but only punished them if concerned in a contract. The 10th clause was virtually a disqualification. It should be struck out of the Bill. It was an attempt to infringe on the rights of the Senate under their Constitution, which rights they should jealously and strictly guard. He would support any legislation proceeding from the Senate, preventing Senators from contracting with the Government, but would oppose any such legislation proceeding from the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER could not see what objection the Secretary of State could have to the striking out of this clause altogether, and bringing in an independent Bill to prevent Senators from entering into contracts with the Government.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS said they all knew that last Session several members of the Commons had become liable to a penalty for a breach of the Independence of Parliament Act, and a Bill had to be introduced and passed to relieve them from the consequences of it. It had been stated at that time by the Premier, that a Bill would be introduced this Session to amend the Act, but he did not see why it had been made to apply to this House if it had not been to give some gentlemen who entertained a bad feeling towards the Senate an opportunity of ventilating that feeling. He believed the clause should be struck out altogether as there was no doubt, if his hon. friend Mr. Sutherland purchased a quarter section of land from the Government, it would render him liable to the penalty under this Bill.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT thought the clause was absurd as there was no saying when a member of the Senate might innocently subject himself to a penalty under it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said if the proposition of his hon. friend from Amherst should be negatived, he was prepared to allow the Bill to stand over until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. REESOR said it was perfectly clear that there were certain classes of contracts that a Senator would be perfectly justified in entering into with the Government, such as purchasing lands from them, and he thought the Secretary of State should allow the Bill to stand over until to-morrow, to see if the clause could not be amended so as to define what class of contracts Senators should be excluded from.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT pledged himself that the House might submit any amendments they proposed to make to-morrow; all that he asked now was that the absolute proposition should be negatived.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE said he would vote for the motion of his hon. friend from Amherst if it was pressed.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY thought the course suggested by the hon. Secretary of State was the logical and correct one.

Hon. Mr. MACMASTER did not think that this House should claim to be free from disabilities which were recognized in the Commons. The question was whether the members of the House of Commons were not as much to be trusted as members of the Senate. They were equally responsible, wealthy and independent, and moreover, they had to go to their constituents every five years, while the members of the Senate had not. Senators were entirely irresponsible and independent of everybody, hence the necessity for their being placed under the very same restraints as members of the Commons. Hon. gentlemen were in the habit of referring to the House of Lords in questions coming up here, but he could see no analogy between the House of Lords and this Senate. The House of Lords was composed of gentlemen the great bulk of whom possessed great wealth, and those who were not wealthy had family records that they could not think for any consideration of sully in any way.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—You think we might here?

Hon. Mr. MACMASTER thought it came with very bad grace from the Senate, in view of the fact that they were entirely independent of the people, that they should seek to be freed from restraints to which the members of the other House had to submit.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT contended that shareholders in ships should be placed in the same position as shareholders in banks, insurance, and other incorporated companies.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE hoped that the motion of the hon. Senator from Amherst would not be withdrawn, but he considered the motion to let this matter stand over until to-morrow was a proper one.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN'S motion was carried on a division.

ELECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on Bill (20) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the election of Members of the House of Commons," Hon. Mr. Dickey in the chair.

Hon. Mr. Macmaster.

On the 14th clause,

Hon. Mr. RYAN said he had presented a petition from the Judges of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec, which he hoped the House would carefully consider. He had spoken to the hon. Secretary of State, who seemed to think the Judges wished to shirk their duties as judges, whereas they only asked to be exempted from something which they had designated as making them deputy returning-officers. There were no County judges in the Province of Quebec, and the Superior Court Judges objected to this clause which imposed upon them the labor of counting over the ballot papers and issuing notices. When they had accepted positions on the Bench it had never been expected that such duties would be imposed upon them. The proper officer, in his opinion, to discharge such duties would be the Prothonotary. He suggested that the clause should be allowed to stand until to-morrow, when the suggestions of the judges could be received by mail.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said he had received a letter from one of the Judges of the Superior Court, which gave the reasons why they were opposed to the Bill. Three reasons were that it brought the judges down to the level of deputy returning officers, throwing upon them perfectly unjudicial duties. They considered it was, in fact, calling upon them to decide election cases without imposing, especially in the counties, the responsibility of declaring the result of the ballot vote. It might happen that a judge would be called upon to count a vote in a case which might have to come up before him afterwards on a petition. He believed this one reason should suffice to show that this clause ought not to pass.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL thought these duties should not be thrown on the judges and it seemed to him it was quite possible to avoid it. He hoped the clause would be allowed to stand until to-morrow until the suggestions of the judges should be received.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said this was really the only means that could be adopted for this purpose. It was the most important trust under the election law. Judges in the highest Courts in Ontario had been obliged to sit day after day inspecting the ballot and decide whether the votes had been properly counted. It had been so in the Lincoln case. The duty of the Judge was to decide whether the Returning Officer had decided correctly or incorrectly to count or reject the ballot. He saw no reason why the judges of the Province of Quebec should be relieved of this duty any more than the judges of other Provinces. The object of this legislation was to save expense and delay. If a party made oath that there had been an improper count of the ballot, and there had been a deposit of one hundred dollars, then the judge could decide the matter, while the whole circumstances were fresh in the minds of the parties interested. The Temperance Act, which had been passed the other day, contained such a clause as this.

Hon. Mr. RYAN—How did you deal with Quebec?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We must have named the same judges.

Hon. Mr. RYAN—I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said there were no other judges named. The moment Parliament gave up the decision of election cases by committees and threw it upon the judiciary, it became necessary that the judge should be the arbitrator to decide whether a candidate was properly elected or not. It was the only security the public had, and whatever might be said to the contrary, no one would like to return to the old system of deciding controverted election cases. However repugnant it might be to the judges to perform those duties, it was important that they should devolve upon them alone. Election contests were sometimes very close, and the adoption or rejection of one or two ballots improperly might decide the whole thing one way or the other.

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

Would Parliament desire to put into the hands of an irresponsible party—perhaps a political partizan, the right to say whether a candidate was properly elected or not? Under the present system, such a case would ultimately go before the judge, and would it not be better to have it disposed of while the whole thing was fresh, and save time and expense? There might not be more than two or three cases of this kind after a general election throughout the whole Dominion, but it was most important that in such cases the judge should decide them, and that their decisions should be final.

Hon. Mr. PENNY said the judges had a natural repugnance to the whole of this electioneering business, and desired to get rid of it as much as possible. Though he had been disposed at first to take the same view of this measure as the judges, he had on reflection, come to the conclusion, that it imposed no new duties upon them. Under the present system the whole question of the counting of ballots in a disputed election could be brought before a judge on a petition.

Hon. Mr. RYAN—It comes judicially.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Precisely. The object of this Bill was not to impose new duties upon the judges, but to direct them to discharge a duty imposed on them now, at an earlier period. The effect would be to save a great deal of time, trouble and expense, and in many cases to enable the judges to render decisions before instead of after a session of Parliament. With every desire to relieve the judges of a task of this sort, he could not see that this Bill imposed any new duties upon them, but, on the contrary, it was relieving them and others, in many cases, of a great deal of trouble.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL challenged the hon. Minister of Agriculture to point out in the whole system of procedure in the Province of Quebec, anything which could be compared with the duties imposed upon the Superior Court Judges by this Bill. They were required to write notices, count ballots, and discharge other duties that even a prothonotary would assign to junior clerks. He did not think this Parliament had power to impose such additional duties on the judges, and it was not necessary that they should. It frequently happened in the Province of Quebec, that special work was assigned by the judges to experts, upon whose reports the judges acted judicially. The procedure proposed in this Bill would interfere with the organization of the Superior Courts of the Province, because they would be obliged to suspend their regular duties to discharge those imposed upon them by this Bill.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER—By the law at present, election cases have precedence of all other business.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL said that was true, but election cases had to be inscribed regularly like other cases, and, consequently, they did not interfere with the other business of the Court. Election cases were not the only ones that had precedence, as there were bankruptcy and capias cases also. He challenged the hon. Minister of Agriculture to show any instance in which judges were required to discharge the duties of clerks.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER said the hon. gentleman could not suppose that the judge would be required to do the clerical work himself.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL asked in what other way it was to be done? The Prothonotary could declare it was none of his business, because he was not even recognized in this Act. Nothing remained, therefore, but for the judge to do the work himself, and it was not even stated whether it was to be done in Chambers or on the Bench. He might be required to do it at his private residence.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER said he had great respect for the opinions of the judges, but he thought in this case they had exaggerated the duties imposed upon them by this Bill. Certainly they were not new, and he could not see why the Judges of the Province of Quebec should be exempt from these duties any more than the judges of the other Provinces. This Bill simply required them to do in shorter time what they had now by law to do. It enabled the judge summarily to dispose of some cases which now involved a great deal of time and expense.

Hon. Mr. Trudel.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said there was no possible circumstance that he could conceive that would justify Parliament in adopting any other tribunal than the judges to discharge these duties—duties that were the highest that could be thrown on anybody by this Act. It had been decided in England, that the only safe tribunal for those election cases, was the judicial one, and that principle having been adopted in this country, the duties mentioned in this Bill were incident to it.

Hon. Mr. RYAN—It does not come before them in a judicial character.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said his hon. friend was mistaken—it did. The judges, when they were placed on the bench, were required to decide matters that the people of this country thought proper to submit to them.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL suggested that the clause should be allowed to stand over until to-morrow, in order that the suggestion of the judges, which he understood had been mailed, might receive the consideration of the House.

The motion was agreed to. The Committee then rose and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again to-morrow.

The House adjourned at 6 o'clock p.m.

THE SENATE.

The amendments were concurred in, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

TRANSPORTATION OF RAILS' CONTRACT.

ENQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON asked the Secretary of State if he was prepared to furnish the information he had asked for about a week ago, respecting the transportation of rails to Duluth and Red River.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall endeavor to do so at the next meeting of the House.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON asked the hon. Secretary of State to include in the return the advertisements for tenders for the service. He made this request because a gentleman interested complained that injustice had been done to him by changing the advertisement.

“May 2nd, 1878.

“The Minister of Public Works advertised for tenders for the transportation of steel rails from Kingston to Duluth or Winnipeg, the tenders to be received up to the 19th of March last. Very shortly before that date the Government advertised a change in the forms of tender, calling for direct transportation from Kingston to St. Boniface (Winnipeg). Sufficient time was not given to parties who were willing and ready to tender for lake freight to Duluth to ascertain the cost of transportation inland from Duluth. The change was evidently made in the interest of friends of the Government at the Red River end of the route. I sent for forms of tender, and was prepared with another person here to freight the rails to Duluth for $2.50 per ton, including the lake insurance, wharfage thereon, and handling at both ends of the route. When the forms of the tenders were changed we were debarred from bidding. I am satisfied Norris & Co., with their propellers, could not carry them for the price for which I would have done the work, unless they could make up on the freight from Duluth to St. Boniface.”

Hon. Mr. Penny.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Does he say what the rate would be from Duluth onward?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would help us very much if he would say what he was prepared to do.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—He was prepared to tender for the transportation to Duluth only.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He ought to have known at what rates he could have obtained freights from Duluth to St. Boniface.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—He says he was not able to do that in time, but if the Government had not changed the advertisement, he would have tendered for the service to Duluth. The Government debarred themselves from making the best arrangement, in the public interest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Of course I have not seen the tenders and I do not know anything about them at present.

The subject was then dropped.

STAMPS ON BILLS OF EXCHANGE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the adoption of the report of the Committee of the Whole House on Bill (4) intituled, “An Act to amend the Law relating to Stamps on Promissory Notes and Bills of Exchange.”

The motion was agreed to.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

LAW OF EVIDENCE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL moved the second reading of Bill (40), “An Act for the Amendment of the Law of Evidence in certain cases of Misdemeanor.” He said this Bill was of the same nature as the one recently discussed in this House by which in common assault cases the husband and wife were allowed to give evidence. He saw no reason why this measure had not been incorporated in that Bill before being sent up to this Branch of the Legislature. It consisted of but one clause which was as follows:—

“On the trial of any indictment or in any other criminal proceeding for the non-repair of any public highway or bridge, or for a nuisance to any public highway, river, or bridge, every defendant to such indictment or proceeding, and the wife or husband of any such defendant, shall be admissible witnesses and compellable to give evidence.”

As the law now stood, if a civil action were brought the husband or wife could be a witness; but, if it took the form of an indictment, they could not, although the effect of both suits would be to dispose of the same matter.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND thought after the passage of the Bill relating to evidence in common assault cases, there could be no ground for opposing this. It looked to him very much like patchwork bringing in those Bills separately. The principle, once admitted, should be applied to every case of misdemeanor.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said he had to oppose the Bill relating to evidence in common assault cases. He did not approve of allowing a wife to be a witness in her husband's case. It would place her in the dilemma that she must either give evidence for him or incur his displeasure. He had also stated that he regarded it as the thin end of the wedge, and that it would very likely soon be followed by a law extending it further. There was a good deal of force in the contention of the hon. Senator from Richmond, that the Bill which had passed the Senate related merely to petty squabbles in which it would be a race between the parties who should get to the Justice first; but that argument did not apply to this measure, because it was a Bill which affected the whole public interest. There were a good many analogous cases of injury to property in which the evidence of husband and wife were not admitted. The introduction of this Bill showed the soundness of his contention, that if this principle was to be introduced at all it should not be taken up piecemeal, but it should be dealt with by the Government as the law of the land. This Bill went further than the measure relating to common assault cases, because it not only admitted the wife to give evidence but compelled her to be a witness for or against her husband. He thought it was the duty of the Government to protect the public against legislation of this character. He appealed to the hon. Secretary of State not to allow the Bill to go any further.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said this Bill followed the principle of the measure that had been passed the other day, but went further. His view was, as he had expressed it the other day, that such evidence should be admitted and the tribunal should be left to weigh its value. The only objectionable point that struck him in this measure was that the wife should be compelled to give evidence against the husband. That was a principle that he did not wish to favor, therefore, he thought it might be worthy of consideration whether it should not be amended in Committee.

Hon. Mr. BROWN hoped this Bill would not go any further. It appeared to him it would be a very unfortunate thing if the husband should in the witness box swear one thing and the wife the opposite. It would destroy the peace and harmony which should prevail in a family.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH said if he thought the Bill would only make the wife a competent witness, he would be inclined to support it.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said he had been opposed to the Common Assault Cases Bill, but he was still more opposed to this for the reasons which had been given. But there was an additional reason: this Act would be administered not merely by judges in cities, but principally by magistrates throughout the country, and he objected strongly to legislating every day, three or four lines at a time, and scattering them over the Statute Book where the magistrates would be unable to find them. Such legislation ought to be in the hands of the Government, and he therefore moved that this Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day three months.

The House divided on the motion which was adopted on the following division:—

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON moved the adoption of the Report of the Joint Committee on printing. He said this related to the distribution of public documents. It had been carefully considered by the sub-committee first and afterwards by the Committee; and there was a general desire, if possible, to curtail the publication of so many documents. While they had limited the distribution very greatly they had reduced the number of documents to be printed. Instead of giving three copies of each public document they would give only one. The provision for exchanges was the same as before; in fact, they had rather extended the exchange list by including the States of Michigan and

Hon. Mr. Simpson.

Illinois. They had decided to continue the newspapers, the number being 490. It would cost $2,500, yet they did not see how it could be remedied. It was proposed to keep a reserve of 150 copies of every document. They had cut off Austria, to which they had been in the habit of sending all their documents, because a package was returned to them for want of postage, and they had to pay postage both ways. The saving effected by these reductions would be about $10,000. The Committee found they would have to print the whole of the report of the Fisheries Commission. There was one trouble about the translation; it would make about four volumes of a thousand pages each. The Committee had decided to ask Parliament for the use of their translators, of whom there were ten in the House of Commons and two in the Senate, and it was believed there were sufficient to do the work without calling for more. It had been decided to print the entire evidence, though some objection had been raised to it.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Certainly; print it all.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON said it might be important hereafter. It was proposed to print 250 in French and 500 in English. It was estimated the cost would be from $8,000 to $10,000, which would be saved in the reduction proposed.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE said, as a member of the Committee, he believed a great deal of useless expense would be saved by this change. The papers had been distributed most lavishly. There was one thing which had been discussed in the Committee, which he had been somewhat surprised to learn, that was, several of the Local Legislatures to which public documents had been regularly sent had never reciprocated. One of those Legislatures was that of Nova Scotia, and he believed it was the same with the Legislature of Prince Edward Island. The Committee had decided to send no more documents to Legislatures which did not reciprocate.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY said it was fortunate that the saving which would be effected by the system recommended would cover the cost of printing the report of the Fisheries Commission. It would be difficult to overrate the importance of having a full report of that important Commission printed for future reference.

Hon. Mr. BUREAU said with respect to the report of the Fisheries Commission, he had been requested to have an interview with the Premier on the subject. The Committee had adopted a report by which they expressed the hope that the Fisheries Department would undertake the printing and translation of that important report, but Mr. Mackenzie objected to it, and thought it should be printed in the ordinary way. The Premier did not want the evidence in the Fisheries Commission printed, and he (Mr. Bureau) would like to have an expression of opinion from the Senate upon this point.

Hon. Gentlemen—Print it by all means.

Hon. Mr. BUREAU was glad to hear this expression of opinion; because ten years hence these same matters might come up again, and the report of the Fisheries Commission would be an exceedingly valuable document. He had spoken to several members of the Commons on the subject, and they were all of opinion that it would be a mistake to omit any part of the report.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON moved the adoption of the eighth report of the Joint Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being read for the consideration of the amendment made by the Committee of the Whole House to the Bill intituled: "An Act further securing the Independence of Parliament."

Hon. Mr. DICKEY moved:—

"That clause ten of the Bill, as
Hon. Mr. Dickey.

"amended in Committee, be reconsidered and struck out."

The House divided on the amendment, which was rejected by the following vote:—

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved: That the following be substituted for the 10th Clause of the said Bill, intituled: "An Act further securing the Independence of Parliament."

"No person being a member of the Senate, shall directly or indirectly, knowingly and wilfully be a party to, or concerned in, any contract under which the public money of Canada is to be paid, and if any person, being a member of the Senate, shall knowingly and wilfully become a party to or concerned in any such contract, he shall thereby forfeit the sum of two hundred dollars for each and every day during which he continues to be such party or so concerned, and such sum may be recovered from him by any person who will sue for the same, by action of debt, bill, plaint or information, in any Court of competent civil jurisdiction in Canada; provided always this section shall not prevent any Senator, who, at the passing of this Act, has any contract for which the public money of Canada is to be paid, from completing such contract, or render him liable to the penalties imposed by this section, nor shall it render any Senator liable for such penalties, by reason of his being a shareholder in any incorporated company, having a contract or agreement with the Government of Canada, except companies undertaking contracts for the building of public works, and any company incorporated for the construction or working of any part of the Pacific Railway."

Hon. Mr. FLINT said he preferred this amendment to the clause which had been struck out. That section seemed to have been drawn expressly to place the Senate in a false position.

Hon. Mr. BROWN said it appeared to him the amendment was a very good specimen of the way "how not to do it."

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—It is precisely the same as it was in the Bill originally.

Hon. Mr. BROWN thought it a mistake to reduce the penalty. What would the hon. Senator from Saugeen have thought of $200 a day when he was holding one of his great contracts?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Only $73,000 a year.

Hon. Mr. BROWN thought Senators should be placed on the same footing as members of the House of Commons. To say that Senators, who were appointed for life and could not be controlled in any way by the public, should sit in this House as the paid servants of the Government was an utter outrage.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said if the amendment were a specimen of "how not to do it," the Government were responsible for it, the amendment being precisely the same as the clause in the Bill. The last thing he desired was to make this penalty a mere sham.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY thought, while he could not vote for the amendment, that the hon. Senator from Toronto had spoken of it unjustly. It was more stringent than the clause relating to the House of Commons. No member of the other House could be made liable to the penalty under this Act unless he chose to sit and vote, while a Senator would be liable to the penalty for every day during which he continued to be a party to a Government contract, whether he sat and voted or not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said while he would have preferred section 10, he was prepared to accept the proposed amendment.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN (Hopewell) called attention to the fact that while shareholders in incorporated companies were exempt from the operation of this law, shareholders in ships were not. He had prepared amendments to this clause with a view to placing shareholders in ships in the same position as shareholders in banks and insurance companies.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND said the gentleman was in a false position, having voted for the 10th clause as it stood, while he was desirous of amending this clause, which was a great improvement on the one which had been struck out.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN said he had prepared this as an amendment to the 10th clause.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT thought it was an invidious distinction to subject a shareholder in a ship to penalties from which a shareholder in an incorporated company was free.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH was in favour of the amendment suggested by the hon. Senator from Hopewell.

The House divided on the amendment, which was adopted by the following vote:—

ELECTIONS LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Order of the Day being called for, again putting the House into Committee of the Whole, on Bill (20) "An Act to amend the Act respecting elections of members of the House of Commons."

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said he had anticipated yesterday that he would have had a letter from one of the judges in Quebec suggesting an amendment to relieve the Judges of the Superior Court from this duty. If convenient to the hon. Secretary of State, he would like to have the third reading still further postponed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT hoped his hon. friend would not press for a postponement. He did not think the House of Commons would consent to the change, as it was a matter of very great importance to the members of that House, that the judges should perform this service. No tribunal in this country was too high to be exempt from the adjudication of such questions.

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said those judges had been appointed for the purpose of deciding disputes between Her Majesty's subjects, such disputes having actually arisen. In this Bill it was proposed to ask them to discharge duties which were not judicial, and which were anterior to any dispute arising which ought to be referred to them. He thought it was not proper work for a judge, to assist a returning officer with a view to prevent disputes arising. However praiseworthy it might be, it was hardly proper to say that the Judges of the Superior Court should be employed in that work. All that he asked was, that the further consideration of the Bill be postponed until the suggestion of the Judges should be received.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY regretted that he could not adopt the view which his hon. friend from Kingston had expressed with regard to this Bill. It appeared to him that the duties which the Judges would be called upon to discharge under this Bill were strictly judicial; they would be required to decide the validity of ballots, which was only the same sort of duty they might be called upon to discharge upon a petition afterwards in the regular course of their duties; therefore it was imposing no additional duty upon them in point of fact. As to the objection that such duties were undignified, everyone knew that the manual and clerical labor would be performed by clerks, and the duty of the Judge would simply be to preside and to decide as to the validity of the ballots.

Hon. Mr. RYAN thought the Prothonotaries should be substituted for the Judges of the Superior Court.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER said in the Province of Quebec some Prothonotaries were not even lawyers.

Hon. Mr. RYAN said it was simply a question of counting ballots, and he believed that duty could not be assigned to any class of people better qualified to discharge it.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND was strongly of the opinion that the functions to be exercised by the Judges under this Bill, were judicial. It was not simply a work of addition, adding up the votes, etc., but the Judge had to decide whether the ballots had been marked according to law—in fact to exercise the same functions as the higher Courts had already exercised in the Montreal West election case. He thought this Bill was a move in the right direction, as it would save time and expense, because it would enable the judges to decide such cases in a summary manner.

Hon. Mr. RYAN moved that the Committee be instructed to amend the 14th clause of the Bill by striking out the words "Judges of the Superior Court," wherever they occurred, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Prothonotary."

Hon. Mr. FERRIER said he had a letter from one of the judges, in which very serious objections were raised to this Bill.

Hon. Mr. PENNY asked what difference there would be in deciding a question of this kind before a petition was presented and afterwards? It was only a matter of name; call it a "suit" and it was quite proper for the judges to try it, but call it something else and it was not proper. There was no other tribunal to decide a case in which a candidate thought himself counted out improperly but the judge. The prothonotaries were a very respectable class of men and discharged very important duties, but there was no reason why they should be made to do the duties of judges.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL said the count would only be a preliminary proceeding, and the case would come before the judges again.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the decision of the judge would be final.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL thought not. It seemed to him when all the Judges of the Superior Court of Montreal and Quebec, with one exception, had protested against this Bill, there must be something in that protest, and he hoped, at the very least, the further consideration of the Bill would be postponed until their suggestion should be received. The Judges of the Province of Quebec had already twice too much to do, and it was not fair to impose those additional duties upon them. Why not ask the district magistrates to exercise those functions?

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH regretted that the opinion of the judges had not been received. In the absence of it, however, he was in favour of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON said he would support the amendment, because he considered the duties imposed upon the judges by this clause would be lowering to the office. It was constituting them simply revisers of the duties of returning officers.

The House divided on the amendment; which was rejected on the following vote:—

THE BOUNDARIES OF THE DOMINION.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

A message was received from the House of Commons with the following address, in which the Senate was invited to unite :

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty.

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,—

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, humbly beg leave to approach Your Majesty for the purpose of representing :

That doubts exist regarding the Northerly and North-Easterly Boundaries of the North-West Territories and Rupert's Land, transferred to Canada by Order of Your Majesty in Council, of the 23rd June, 1870, incorporating the Territories of the Hudson's Bay Company and the North-West Territories with Canada.

That the discovery and working of minerals in the vicinity of Cumberland Sound, have recently been reported, and other matters have transpired which make it important that all doubt respecting the jurisdiction of Canada over those parts of British North America should be removed with as little delay as possible.

That correspondence has taken place on the subject, between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, which, through the Right Honorable the Secretary of State for the Colonies, has intimated its willingness to transfer, to the Dominion of Canada, all the Territories in question, and has invited an expression of the views of the Government of Canada respecting the propriety of legislation for that purpose.

That it is expedient that the right of Canada to all of British North America, and the islands adjacent thereto, (not including the Province of Newfoundland) should be placed beyond question, and that the offer of Your Majesty's Government to transfer the said territories to Canada be accepted.

That, to avoid all doubt in the matter, it is desirable that an Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, should be passed defining the North-Easterly, Northerly, and North-Westerly Boundaries of Canada, as follows, that is to say : On the East by the Atlantic Ocean, which boundary shall extend towards the North by Davis Straits, Baffin's Bay, Smith's Straits and Kennedy Channel, including all the islands in and adjacent thereto, which belong to Great Britain by right of discovery or otherwise ; on the North the Boundary shall be so extended as to include the entire continent to the Arctic

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Ocean, and all the islands in the same westward to the one hundred and forty-first meridian west of Greenwich ; and on the North-West by the United States Territory of Alaska.

That it is desirable that the Parliament of Canada, on the transfer of the before mentioned Territories being completed, should have authority to legislate for their future-welfare and good government, and the power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting them, the same as in the case of the other Territories ; and the Parliament of Canada expresses its willingness to assume the duties and obligations consequent thereon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved : To agree with the House of Commons by filling up the blank with "Senate and."

The motion was agreed to.

The House adjourned at 5.40 p.m.

FORT FRANCIS LOCK.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

The Order of the Day being read for the consideration of the Report of the Select Committee of the Senate appointed to enquire :—

“ 1st. Whether the Fort Francis Lock when completed can be used for the purposes of commerce, in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, so as to form part of the through communication from Lake Superior to Manitoba, and if not, what improvements will be indispensable (in addition to the said Fort Francis Lock) to afford unbroken communication for steamers between the railway stations of Port Savanne (Lac des Mille Lacs) and Keewatin (Rat Portage) and the probable cost of such improvements ?

“ 2nd. What will be the use to the Dominion of the said Fort Francis Lock if it cannot be used for the purposes of commerce, in connection with the Canada Pacific Railway, so as to form part of the said communication ?

“ 3rd. What is the distance between the said Lock and the point nearest to it on the Canada Pacific Railway ?

“ 4th. What are the dimensions of this said Lock, its estimated and probable cost, the amount expended upon it and upon works connected with it, or in any way incidental to it, so far as is known ; the appropriation from which the money expended upon it has been taken ; whether such application of the money has been in all cases according to law, and whether the said Lock is being built by contract or otherwise ?

“ 5th. And generally to inquire into all matters relating to the Fort Francis Lock.”

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON said :—I think the evidence which has been laid upon the table of the House will satisfy every hon. gentleman that, in asking for a Committee to enquire into the expenditure upon the Fort Francis Lock, as well as into the usefulness of that work, I only asked for that which was necessary in the public interest. The hon. Secretary of State, at the time the Committee was granted, admitted that if it had not been supposed a line of railway would have been practicable from Lake Superior to the waters of the Lake of the Woods, by way of Sturgeon Falls, the lock would not have been commenced. The evidence clearly shows that the lock cannot be used for purposes of commerce. If the Canadian Pacific Railway could have been constructed by way of Sturgeon Fall, then, unquestionably, the lock would have been of great service, as, by means of it, unbroken navigation would have been opened between Sturgeon Falls and the waters of the Lake of the Woods, at the Narrows, or at Rat Portage. This great water stretch would have formed the connecting link between the two ends of the Lake Superior section of the railway which is now being built, and perhaps, in this way, have served the purposes of the country sufficiently well for many years to come. Now, I maintain that the Government should have known, before they proceeded with the expenditure upon the Fort Francis Lock, that a suitable line for a railway could be found connecting with the water at Sturgeon Falls. The railway between Thunder Bay and Red River is not being built for the sake of the country it traverses. That country is a wilderness ; the reports of all who have passed over it agree that it is unfit for settlement, and, therefore, the railway is being built for the purpose of reaching the country beyond the Red River. It is simply a country that has to be passed over, and the more economically that that can be done the better. Suppose it had been determined to build a bridge across a broad river, what would be said of the engineer or of the Government who would proceed with the construction of an abutment on one side, and a pier in the middle, without first ascertaining whether it would be possible to build the abutment on the other side of the river in line with the pier and the first abutment ? Could anything be more imprudent than that would have been ; and if a suitable site could not be found for the second abutment, necessitating the abandonment of the work which had been done, would not the builders be held up to the world as men devoid of prudence and foresight ? Yet, that would be exactly parallel to what has been done in respect to the railway between Lake Superior and the Red River. The Government took it for granted that a line could be obtained from Sturgeon Falls to Rat Portage, and, without ascertaining the fact by survey, proceeded with the construction of the Railway from Lake Superior, by way of Shebandowan towards Sturgeon Falls, and with the Fort Francis lock. I think there can be but one opinion as to the unwisdom of the course which the Government pursued in taking those steps. The Government are further chargeable with want of diligence. They succeeded to office in November, 1873, and it was not until April, 1875, that the Shebandowan section of the railway was put under contract, and not until June of that year was work commenced on the Fort Francis Lock. Now, here was an interval of eighteen months. Surely, if diligence had been used, it could have been ascertained in that time whether there was a feasible route from Sturgeon Falls westward or north westward. Surely an exploratory survey could have been made. Extensive surveys never were made between Sturgeon Falls and the Narrows of the Lake of the Woods, and they should have been made before the work on the Fort Francis Lock was undertaken. A survey of the Narrows was made under the direction of Mr. Dawson, measurements and soundings were taken and laid down upon a map. The engineers who visited the Narrows in 1875, as will be seen by the evidence, came to the conclusion that the islands were not exactly as represented on the map; but they made no actual survey to ascertain whether they were or not, and, without making a survey, they condemned the place as unsuitable for a railway crossing, and the line by that route was altogether abandoned. When the Government determined to abandon the route by Sturgeon Falls, whether on sufficient ground or not, and carried it 100 miles north of the Lock, they should also have abandoned the Fort Francis Lock, because that work would be of no use to the public, unless it connected with the railway. At that time the expenditure upon the Lock, as nearly as can be ascertained, had reached the sum of $73,940. That was at the end of the season of 1876. Now, I think it would have been very much better for the country, and more creditable to the Government, if, when it was discovered that an error had been committed in commencing the construction of the Lock at Fort Francis, the Government had plainly and manfully admitted it, and said, "such was our desire to open up the communication with the North-West, that, taking it for granted that the railway could be extended beyond Sturgeon Falls, we commenced the lock, but we now find that the line of that route cannot with advantage be selected for the railway, and, although we have expended nearly $74,000 upon the lock, we consider it best in the public interest to stop the construction and to let that work remain unfinished." It would have been wiser to have done so than to have gone on with an expenditure which, according to the evidence, will amount to $250,000 before the work is completed. The lock will be of no use as a part of the through communication; it will be of no use to the locality in which it is situated; and, therefore, the money expended upon it will have been practically thrown away. It would have been wiser to have put up with the loss of $73,000 rather than to have persisted in error and so increased the loss to $250,000, as is being done. I think it would have been very much more creditable to them if they had taken the country into their confidence when the error was discovered, instead of continuing the expenditure on the ground that it was a portion of the Pacific Railway. Last Session the Premier, speaking in another place, told the country that there were only a few short portages, which would be easily overcome, between the railway station at Port Savanne and Rainy Lake, and that the only serious obstacle on the route to Rat Portage was at Fort Francis. The hon. Secretary of State in this House reduced the portages to two.

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not last Session, certainly.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — Even last Session the hon. gentleman said so, as will be observed by referring to page 70 of the official report of the Debates of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It will be seen that I spoke in a general sense, and that I afterwards corrected the number further on.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Parliament was told as late as last Session, that the lock would be a useful means of connecting the two ends of the railway. Now, that has been proved to have been incorrect. The Secretary of State has repeatedly said that the Government were forced to incur expenditure in connection with the Pacific Railway—that such was the pressure by the people of the country to have money expended, nominally for the advancement of the Railway, that the Government felt obliged to go on with the Fort Francis Lock before knowing whether it would be useful or not. I believe that in making this change, the Secretary of State does the great body of the people of this country grave injustice. It may be true that great pressure may have been brought to bear upon the Government by self-seekers and favorites to incur expenditure, and I fear they yielded to that pressure unwisely, but that the great body of the people wanted money expended without knowing whether it was usefully expended, is really a slander upon them. The evidence clearly shows that neither the water stretches, nor the lock, can be used as part of the through communication. As an improvement of local usefulness the Government has scarcely attempted to defend the lock. In the amendment moved by the Hon. the Secretary of State to the report of the Committee, and which is to be found in our minutes of Tuesday last, no attempt is made to defend the lock on that ground. It was clearly proved that whatever produce may be grown west of the lock, even if it were grown within sight of it, will descend Rainy River, and go by way of Lake of the Woods to Rat Portage, even if its destination should be eastward to Montreal, or Liverpool; and that even if any produce were grown on the shores of Rainy Lake, it would take the same direction. It could not be transported to Port Savanne, because the portages are insuperable obstacles. The Government seem rather favorable to a scheme for overcoming those portages, but which I cannot believe they, at the present time, seriously entertain. It is quite true the Secretary of State supported an amendment advocating a scheme which was submitted to the Committee by the superintendent of the Fort Francis Lock, and I am surprised that a member of the Government would for a moment allow himself to appear as a possible supporter of a project so impracticable and absurd. It was so in evidence by Mr. Mortimer, the engineer, that soon after the present Government came into power, an idea was entertained of improving the portages and water stretches, on what is known as the Dawson route, and if that could have been done, and the route made useful as part of the through communication, it would have been a most desirable improvement, but it could only have been an improvement of the Dawson route—a temporary communication with the North-West, but not as the connecting link between the two ends of a costly railway. There are nine portages to be overcome between Port Savanne, near Lac de Mille Lacs and Rainy Lake. Mr. Mortimer was employed to survey the route and report upon the improvements necessary. He did so; and he told the Committee that the Chief Engineer came to the conclusion that the expenditure would be more than the improvements would be worth to the country. Mr. Mortimer submitted his plan to the Committee. It was to provide for transporting only ten tons per day, and he estimated the cost at \$341,000. Mr. Mortimer was asked by your Committee, “why not make it capable of carrying one hundred tons instead of ten tons;” he said it would cost a great deal more. The plan which was submitted by Mr. Sutherland, was estimated to cost \$150,000, and to provide for the transport of forty tons a day. The details of the plan will be found in Mr. Sutherland’s evidence. Mr. Baillairgé, an engineer in the employment of the Department of Public Works, reported that the lakes on the Dawson Route do not open before the 25th May, and that they close on the 20th October. Evidence was submitted to the Committee to the same effect. A witness said that one season, to his knowledge, Lake Shebandowan was not open on the 24th May, but that it opened on the following day. That proves the correctness of Mr. Baillairgé’s report. We have no evidence to show at what time the navigation closes. Persons travelling on that route I imagine, endeavor to get over it before winter sets in. I may state that my hon. friend from Kingston and myself camped on the shore of Lac des Mille Lacs on the night of the 8th of August last. It was very cold. The following night we camped on French Portage, and it was exceedingly cold, and our men told us in the morning that there had been frost during the night. The delicate foliage had assumed its autumn hue, and there was every appearance of a continuance of cold weather. As we descended and went further west the weather became much warmer. Lac des Mille Lacs may be said to be on the height of land. I may state that I went up to Port Savanne, and I was told there that the frost was not out of the railway banks, and it was not expected it ever would come out of them. I was told that people digging for wells could only go a few feet down before coming to frost. Mr. Sutherland's scheme for improving the Dawson Route as a means of connecting the two ends of the railway, I really think bears absurdity upon its face. Mr. Marcus Smith, who was examined by your Committee upon that subject, said the navigation is closed for half the year. The navigation is closed for very much more than six months. It is really closed for eight months. One witness, examined before your Committee, who had been superintendent of transportation on the Dawson Route for Carpenter & Co., during two years, stated in his evidence that one hundred and twenty-five days was looked upon as a long season, and when you remember that Lake Shebandowan does not open until the twenty-fifth of May and closes on the twentieth October, you can see that there are only four months of navigation, or of a working season. Now, in view of that fact, let us consider what Mr. Sutherland's scheme is. His plan, I may say to the House, is to carry freight in cars without breaking bulk—that is, as I understand him, in small cars that would be run on tramways across the portages, and run on to steamers on the lakes without the contents being handled between Port Savanne and Rainy Lake. The freight would be transferred to a steamer on Rainy Lake, which would carry it without further transshipment through St. Francis Lock to Rat Portage, where it would be transferred again to the Pacific Railway and conveyed westward. I will ask hon. gentlemen to remember that the capacity of this route as proposed to be improved by Mr. Sutherland, is to be forty tons a day for a season of one hundred and twenty-five days. Mr. Sutherland put the rate of freight at from twenty-five to forty dollars per ton. I will take wheat, an article which all are familiar with, for the purpose of illustration. Thirty-three bushels of wheat, of sixty pounds, weigh in round figures one ton. The lowest rate of freight named by Mr. Sutherland—twenty five dollars per ton—would make the charge for wheat seventy-five (nearly seventy-six) cents per bushel from Winnipeg to Fort William. The rate of freight from Fort William to Montreal may be assumed at not less than fifteen cents. That would be ninety cents per bushel from Winnipeg to Montreal. I would ask my hon. friend from Manitoba how much would be left to the producer of wheat in Manitoba if he had to pay ninety cents per bushel for freight to Montreal? I further ask the House if it is likely that anyone would pay that rate, when the rate of freight from Winnipeg to Montreal by Duluth is only thirty-five to forty cents per bushel, or less than one-half the rate which Mr. Sutherland said would have to be charged by way of the portages and railway. Then, again, the westward freight I put at the lowest rate he named, twenty-five dollars per ton. The Government have had freight carried at fifteen dollars a ton—a very high rate it is—from Duluth to Winnipeg; or ten dollars less per ton than would have to be charged by Mr. Sutherland's route. I ask if this is a project to be entertained by the Government of this country? Then take the capacity of the route if improved as proposed. Mr. Sutherland estimated its capacity at about forty tons a day each way. I shall again take wheat for a standard of illustration. Thirteen hundred and sixty bushels weigh about forty tons. I will take fifteen hundred bushels, as the daily capacity of the route each way, which for one hundred and twenty-five days (the full season) would be one hundred and eighty-seven thousand five hundred bushels. Hon. gentlemen know that Manitoba produced last year a surplus of two or three times that quantity. What is the bulk of one hundred and eighty-seven thousand bushels of wheat? How many vessels do hon. gentlemen suppose it will load? The vessels that will pass through the enlarged Welland Canal will have a carrying capacity of sixty to seventy thousand bushels, so that if the Sutherland route was occupied to its full capacity through the entire season, it could only carry equal to three cargoes of wheat. Is it surely unnecessary to say more to prove the utter absurdity of the scheme. The chief object of opening this communication, is for the purpose of getting immigrants into the North-West. Mr. Sutherland very frankly said he did not expect the route would be attractive to passengers, and that he intended it as a freight line. I have shown what its utmost freight capacity would be, and that the rates by it would be twice as much from Winnipeg to Montreal, as by way of Duluth. Now, I ask again is this a project to be entertained by the Government of this country? It is exceedingly desirable, that the produce of a harvest should be got to market as quickly as possible, and one great desideratum for the people of Manitoba, is facility to get as much as possible of their harvest to market during the season it is produced. To what extent would the Sutherland improvements aid in achieving that object? It cannot be assumed that the forwarding of the harvest to market would be commenced before the 20th of September, and we have evidence to show that the water stretches are unsafe from ice after the 20th October; so that there would be but thirty days after harvest during which the route would be available for the transport to Lake Superior of the produce of the North-West. The capacity of Mr. Sutherland's scheme would be only fifteen hundred bushels a day, which for thirty days would be forty-five thousand bushels, or less than one cargo. There would be no possibility of carrying on business on such a scale. Vessels would not call daily at Fort William for dribbles of fifteen hundred bushels of grain; but, unless they did, the produce would have to be stored until a cargo accumulated, which is what no owner of grain would submit to. The great object is to get it to market as early and as rapidly as possible. Ships would have left Montreal and Quebec before any considerable quantity of Manitoba grain could be got to those ports. It must be perfectly manifest to every hon. gentleman who has given the matter consideration that the route, with the proposed improvements, would be utterly useless for purposes of commerce. I think I have shown that the scheme is simply ludicrous. Now, consider the approaches to Mr. Sutherland's proposed tramways. At the Lake Superior end there would be a railway seventy miles long to Port Savanne, and at the other end a railway one hundred and fourteen miles long, from Rat Portage to Red River—a costly first-class railway when finished, although it is now being constructed in a temporary manner; but, even constructed only temporarily, the Prime Minister stated in another place, a few days ago, that it would cost \$25,000 a mile. It is to be laid with steel rails and equipped as such railways are understood to be. I ask hon. gentlemen to consider what will be the result. A larger quantity of freight cannot be carried on the two ends of this costly railway than can be carried on the central division by Mr. Sutherland's tramways. If the central division is equal only to the transport of forty tons a day, that is all that can be transported on the two ends. What do forty tons represent in an ordinary freight train? It means just four car loads, so that the contents of four freight cars are all that could be forwarded daily over the central division. Instead of running a daily train of four cars all that would be necessary would be to run weekly an ordinary freight train of twenty-four or twenty-five cars. It has been stated in another place by the Prime Minister, that the two ends of the railway, when fully equipped, will cost five millions and three-quarters of dollars. But what equipment will they require until the centre division is finished? Is it fair and right to represent the equipment of those two pieces of railway as being equal to the equipment of such a road as the Pacific Railway is expected to be, and as the Intercolonial is? All that would be required until the central division is completed, would be a couple of locomotives at each end, thirty or forty freight cars, and a passenger car which would have to be put on for appearance sake. It is said to be the intention of the Government to leave the central section of the road, from Port Savanne to Rat Portage, incomplete for some years to come. The hon. Secretary of State said it was pressure from the people that made the Government proceed with the lock, and with the two ends of the railway before the country was surveyed throughout. In saying this, he does the people very great injustice. The Government may have been influenced by a desire to put the steel rails out of sight. I may remark, before I move the adoption of the report, that the depth of the Fort Francis Lock has been reduced nearly one-half, from 7 feet to  $4\frac{1}{2}$  feet. Your Committee found that the Government was warranted, under a vote of Parliament, in spending money upon the lock, but not in the manner in which they have expended it. The Pacific Railway Act declares that all works constructed under it shall be constructed by contract, and not by day's labor. The Fort Francis Lock was considered, and declared by the Government to be, a portion of the Pacific Railway, and the money expended upon it was taken from the appropriations for the Pacific Railway; therefore it should have been done by contract, and not by day's labor. I think this House will agree with me that there was a necessity for this enquiry, and that the report of the Committee is fair and moderate. I beg to move its adoption, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Campbell.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The subject has been so frequently before this Chamber the last two Sessions, that I deem it unnecessary to go as fully into the history of the Fort Francis Lock as I would had the House not been informed by the discussions that have taken place of the true bearings of the whole subject. It will be necessary, however, very briefly to advert to the early inception of what is known as the Red River Route. We all know that in 1868 and 1869 this country felt it necessary to open communication through British territory with the North-West. Mr. Dawson was placed in charge of the line between Lake Superior and Manitoba, and what was known as the Dawson Route, was opened up. That route proved to be an extremely expensive one to the people of this country. We have had evidence to show that down to the time of the change of Government, the sum of at least one and a quarter millions of dollars had been expended on the communication between Lake Superior and Winnipeg. I mention this because it must necessarily convey to the House an idea of how extremely expensive are works carried on in that section of the Dominion. It was considered by the people that there should be a line of communication established between Lake Superior and Winnipeg through our own territory; because it was felt that we should not be entirely dependent upon the American route. The Dawson Route, however, was practically a failure, because the number of persons who went through in that way was so insignificant that one cannot refer to it as affording the channel that was originally contemplated for travel; nor did it justify the large sums of money that were voted by Parliament from time to time in order to keep it open. The Dawson Route lay in a direct line from Thunder Bay by Shebandowan, thence followed a line of lakes, rivers, and small portages to Rainy Lake, thence down Rainy Lake to Lake of the Woods, and from Lake of the Woods to Manitoba. When Canada decided to build the Pacific Railway, the section that we considered of primary importance was that portion between Lake Superior and Red River, and in seeking a route for the proposed railway we naturally looked to the only section of the country that was then known—that portion of the country through which the Dawson Route passed. In addition to that, Mr. Dawson, from the time he had been originally charged with the opening of that route in 1869, had from time to time brought under the notice of the Government the great facilities that were presented for the construction of a railway by his particular route—that is, from Thunder Bay to Shebandowan, thence to Sturgeon Falls, and from Sturgeon Falls to the Narrows of Lake of the Woods—and his recommendations were considered of sufficient importance to be embodied in the report of the Minister of Public Works. When the railway staff first sought for a line they naturally took the only section of country that was known that led in the direction indicated by Mr. Dawson, and in making explorations they had no difficulty in reaching Shebandowan, and from that point to Sturgeon Falls, an arm of Rainy Lake, and some ten or twelve miles beyond it. Finding that line a practicable one, it was located, and believing that Mr. Dawson had proved a good authority up to that time, and that his conclusions regarding the country from Sturgeon Falls to the Narrows might be taken, the Government at once commenced the construction of the line, knowing the desire that existed that as speedy communication as possible should be opened up with Manitoba. Acting on that belief, and anxious to facilitate the opening up of the line, the Government naturally looked to the improvement of such portions of the water-ways as would give us a considerable length of communication in connection with the railway. Rainy Lake and River, and Lake of the Woods presented a good water communication of over 180 miles, interrupted by only one obstacle—the falls at Fort Francis, a slight rapid above it, and a couple of small rapids further down the river. By the removal of those difficulties it was apparent that we had water communication from Sturgeon Falls, the supposed point where the railway would touch the waters of Rainy Lake, to the Narrows of Lake of the Woods, and, in view of that, it was perfectly justifiable, and, indeed, it was the true policy of any administration, to at once seek to make that communication perfect; and that was the object of the Fort Francis Lock, and the removal of the difficulties in the river. A year ago most extravagant statements and criticisms were made in this Chamber, and elsewhere, of the enormous sums of money that were being wasted by the Government in that country, and the improvements to the water-way were put down at from four to five hundred thousand dollars. It was used, of course, as a political lever to mislead the public. But what have the labors of this Committee disclosed? By their report it will be seen that the whole improvements on the lock and in removing the difficulties in Rainy River will involve the expenditure of $250,000. That is the sum total required to be expended in order to give us that long water stretch of 180 miles. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that for nearly two years the engineers prosecuted their explorations between Lake Superior and the Narrows of Lake of the Woods. They had reached a point in the second year twelve or fourteen miles beyond Sturgeon Falls. For nearly a season and a half subsequent to that they endeavored to find a line from Sturgeon Falls to the Narrows, or to Rat Portage. Mr. Dawson had made so many representations, and he proposed to have made an exploratory survey—

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—No; not between Sturgeon Falls and the Narrows of Lake of the Woods. He made no survey there.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Dawson said he had information that satisfied him that a practicable line could be found between Sturgeon Falls and the Narrows. He assumed that such was the case, and the only apparent difficulty was in the crossing of the Lake of the Woods at the Narrows, of which he said he had an accurate survey and soundings taken. My hon. friend from Saugeen said, in making his observations, that the line of country between Sturgeon Falls and the Narrows was not thoroughly surveyed.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Not exhaustively surveyed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The gentlemen on whom I shall rely for evidence on this point, are Mr. Fleming and Mr. Rowan, who were examined before the Committee. Mr. Fleming, in adverting to that last year, said:—

“Sometime afterwards, the importance of getting a direct route that would tap the navigable waters of Rainy Lake at Sturgeon Falls, being fully understood, we again attempted to get a line for a railway in that direction. We succeeded in getting a practicable line from the east to Sturgeon Falls, and a little further west, but where we encountered an exceedingly rocky, broken, rough, impracticable country, and we were compelled to abandon any further examinations in that direction. . . . I should state here that we have made surveys in every conceivable direction through the whole of that country, and I feel satisfied we have now got the line located on the shortest and best route that can be had between Rat Portage and Thunder Bay. I do not mean to say that it cannot be improved, as I hope we shall yet be able to improve the located line in some parts before construction actually begins.

Q. Had you the country between Sturgeon Falls and Lake of the Woods thoroughly surveyed and explored.—Yes; we went in from both ends and had explorations made, but the reports were so extremely unsatisfactory that we did not deem it advisable to make further surveys. Instrumental surveys were continued, but we were driven off the direct line altogether.

Q. Did the operations extend north and south over a considerable portion of the country?—Yes; they explored to the right and left over a considerable area.

Q. What is the character of the country east of the Narrows of the Lake of the Woods?—The country is very much like a continuation of the Lake of the Woods, full of lakes and islands—about as much water as land. You can hardly tell where the lake begins, and where the land ends. That is the general character of the country.

Q. Is it so north of Sturgeon Falls as well as west?—Yes, north and west from Sturgeon Falls. I speak of what is called the country to the east of Lake of the Woods. It is full of islands and inlets, and deep water filled channels."

In addition to that, we have the evidence of Mr. Rowan, assistant Engineer-in-Chief, who was directed by Mr. Fleming to visit the Narrows of Lake of the Woods to endeavor to ascertain whether a crossing could be found. Mr. Rowan states in his evidence, that he visited the spot, and the islands, as laid down by Mr. Dawson on his plan, do not exist. Those islands were to have formed the abutments of the proposed bridges; and the depth of water, in some instances, was from forty to sixty feet, and the width of the channel, in several cases, was from one-eighth to half a mile. He pronounced it utterly impossible that a crossing could be found by the Narrows. In addition to that, Mr. Harris, another gentleman attached to the staff of the Pacific Railway, and employed in that country, was called to give evidence. He had gone there to point out the Narrows to Mr. Hazlewood, the engineer in charge of that section, to ascertain whether in his opinion a crossing could be obtained. Mr. Hazlewood is, unfortunately, not now alive, and his evidence cannot be obtained; but Mr. Harris stated that Mr. Hazlewood was so satisfied that the crossing was impracticable, that he did not deem it necessary to make an instrumental survey of it; that he did not find the islands at all, as they were laid down by Mr. Dawson on his plan. As it had been stated that these islands had been actually located and laid down on the boundary survey, the plan was obtained, but it bore out the statement of Mr. Rowan and Mr. Hazlewood, that the islands were not as laid down by Mr. Dawson on his plan, and that disposed of the practicability of crossing at the Narrows, as it was absolutely impossible. We had the evidence of those three professional gentlemen who had visited the spot, and the evidence of the Chief Engineer, who had gathered his information from the reports that had been from time to time brought to him by his assistants, all pointing in the same direction. An effort had also been made to connect Rat Portage with Sturgeon Falls. A body of explorers and engineering corps had been sent up to explore the country, but it was found impossible to locate a line, and it had to be abandoned. At the time of this abandonment, hon. gentlemen will recollect that the works at Fort Francis were under way, and the sum of $73,000 had been expended. The hon. gentleman says it would have been a proper thing for the Government to have then abandoned any further expenditure on the work. The Government thought differently, however. They felt it must be some very considerable time before the railway communication could be completed between Lake Superior and Winnipeg, as it involved a distance exceeding four hundred miles, through a country that presented many grave difficulties; that the central section was one of the most expensive portions of the line, and it could not be got at until the road had been constructed from both ends. The hon. gentleman says we have abandoned the middle section; I say we have not.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I asked if the Government were going to abandon it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We never contemplated abandoning it. But it seems impossible, for any reasonable cost, to go on with it at present, as it is a country that is totally unexplored; unless you go in from either end, and had the policy the hon. gentleman advised—building from only one end—been adopted, it would have delayed the construction of the road for many years, as only one contractor could have gone on with it. I have stated that it is impossible to name the period within which that intermediate link of of 180 miles can be constructed, but I put it at about five years—it might be more or it might be less. As one-third of the whole cost of the improvements on Rainy River had been incurred, we did not think it was advisable to abandon them; and I have no doubt if they had been abandoned the hon. gentleman would have been prepared to censure the Government for having done so; instead of having given us credit for thrift, economy and wisdom, he would have condemned us because we had not gone on and utilized the work, as in my judgment it can be utilized. I have always stated frankly in the discussions that have taken place in this House with reference to this work, that it would not have been commenced had it not been believed that the railway would have gone to Sturgeon Falls. If it had, it has been admitted by every one that this work would have been of great advantage. The hon. gentleman belittled very much a project which I thought worthy of bringing before the notice of the Committee, that was, Mr. Sutherland's suggestion of utilizing the portages and water ways between Rainy Lake and Port Savanne, the point where the railway will strike Lac des Mille Lacs. The hon. gentleman has stated that there were nine portages to be overcome between Port Savanne and Rainy Lake. My remembrance of the evidence was that it was six, and Mr. Sutherland gives that number in his evidence.

Hon. Mr. M<sup>C</sup>LELAN—He makes it six after having connected some of the water-ways by improvements.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Sutherland submitted a plan which, to my mind, seems to be reasonable—without admitting that the Government are in favor of it, or that it has even received their consideration; still I thought it was worthy of placing before the Committee. His proposition was this: that, with an expenditure of $150,000, he could place tramways on the portages, and, by means of horse-cars, would be enabled to transport passengers and freight at as cheap a rate as is at present charged between Duluth and Winnipeg, and he put down the amount of freight per day, exclusive of passengers, at forty tons. He did not speak of it, nor did I urge it, as a probable route by which wheat would be carried through. It was simply regarded as a temporary expedient that would be available for the transport of merchandise and for emigrants; because it was urged that the emigrants who now pass through the United States are beset on all sides by American agents who are interested in diverting emigration to the United States, instead of into British territory. It was, therefore, urged that if we could utilize our own route by the expenditure of $150,000, it was worthy of consideration. Mr. Sutherland computed that the time spent between Lake Superior and Winnipeg, would not be any greater than by the present route. I am now speaking of it as the American route at present exists, not as it would be if there were through railway communication between Duluth and Winnipeg. It may be that we may have to adopt that scheme. I am merely uttering this expression quite unauthorized; but I cannot see, without choosing to disclose circumstances that might arise in the future, how it would not be advisable and prudent for us to have this communication through our own territory, and $150,000 would be a small sum compared with the large annual expenditure of former years on the Dawson route, of a million and a quarter of dollars. The hon. gentleman had no condemnation for that expenditure at the time, but here is a substantial improvement, costing absolutely less than was expended in one year on the Dawson Route, by which we could transport passengers and freight to Winnipeg in the same time that is now occupied in travelling from Duluth to Winnipeg. I am not prepared to say that the Government are going to adopt this scheme, or that it has received that consideration at our hands that would justify me in making such an announcement, but it is a project that has been submitted by Mr. Sutherland, whose testimony has been borne out by Mr. Gardner and Mr. Carpenter, who gave evidence before the Committee. The latter gentleman said he had made some such proposal himself when he first took charge of that line, and he believed that had the Government then acceded to his proposition, the line could have been made a useful one, as by putting tramways at the portages, it would have enabled him to carry a larger amount of freight and traffic, and to compete with the American line. The hon. Senator in alluding to this question referred to the plan proposed by Mr. Mortimer; but Mr. Mortimer did not speak with a knowledge of all the facts. His estimate of the cost of removing the obstructions from Rainy River, for instance, was considerably in excess of what it will really cost, and his proposition for tramways for utilizing locomotives instead of horse power, was an expensive one, and was a work far beyond the temporary structure proposed by Mr. Sutherland. Mr. Sutherland's proposition, to my mind, seems very feasible, and one that might be adopted with very great advantage. I think this is the first time this House has taken upon itself the responsible duty of condemning the Government for an act or policy which was quite within the proper scope of their action, and in which it cannot be alleged that the Ministry were influenced by anything but a desire to benefit the people of this country. It cannot be alleged that any particular persons were to be benefited by it. There were no incidental advantages in any possible direction. It was simply conceived in the best possible spirit, and in an anxious desire to meet the well expressed views of the people of Canada, that we should have communication through our own territory, at the earliest possible period, with the North-West. We all know the enormous cost of sending through the military expeditions under Sir Garnet Wolseley, a few years ago. I do not know what particular event might occur that might necessitate our sending troops through to that country again. I hope the day is far distant when we will have to do anything of the kind; still it is the duty of the country to be fore-warned and fore-armed, and the Government might some day be severely censured if they had not made proper efforts to have a line of communication through our own territory to Manitoba. If it could have been urged that the Government had any motive to serve other than that of the general public interest, there might have been some justification for the formation of this Committee, but their report, if it is analysed, simply shows that the work could have been abandoned when the Government abandoned the southern route for the railway. They did not pretend that the Government had not acted wisely in building the lock if the southern route had been adopted. Two members of the Committee dissented from this report, and presented a report which appears in the Votes and Proceedings. I thought myself, on looking over the printed report, that the minority report should have been included in it. I do not know that the practice of the House would justify the publication of the minority report, but I think it ought to have been included with the other, so that it would be in the possession of members of this House, and go before the people of the country.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I gave no instructions to the Committee as to the omission from the report of the paper to which the hon. Secretary of State refers. It struck me, when I saw this report, that the other ought to have formed a part of it, and I asked the Clerk of the Committee about it. He said he had followed the only precedent which was to be found in our records; but I should here say the Secretary of State is wrong in describing it as a minority report. It was moved as an amendment to the motion for the adoption of the report. I desire to give my authority for saying that there had not been an exhaustive survey between Sturgeon Falls and the Narrows of Lake of the Woods. It was the evidence of Mr. Rowan, which will be found on page 66 of the report, where he was asked distinctly if an exhaustive survey had been made there, and he replied there had not been.

The report was adopted on a division.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of the Bill (68) "An Act to amend the Act, Chapter Eleven, "Thirty-eight Victoria, intituled: "An Act to establish a Supreme Court and "a Court of Exchequer for the Dominion "of Canada."

He said the object of the Bill was to make some minor changes in the Supreme Court Act. The most important seemed to be one requiring the judges to hold four terms instead of two, as at present.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said there was more in the Bill than the hon. Secretary of State seemed to be aware of. He quite agreed in the provision to which the hon. gentleman had called attention—the creating of four terms instead of two, but the second clause proposed to substitute a new language for the existing clause, number seventeen, and the difference he thought, was very important with reference to the Courts of the Province of Quebec. The original language of the clause was:—

“Subject to the limitations and provisions hereinafter made, an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from all final judgments of the highest Court of final resort, whether such Court be a Court of appeal or of original jurisdiction, now or hereafter established in any Province of Canada, in cases in which the Court of original jurisdiction is a Superior Court, etc.”

In this Bill the words “highest Court” were left out. The change was very important for Quebec, where there were two Courts of final resort, one being the Court of Appeals, and the other the Court of Review, the former composed of the judges of the Queen’s Bench, and the latter of the judges of the Superior Court. The decisions of the Court of Review in Lower Canada were considered to be final, and up to the present time the Supreme Court had held that there was no appeal from that Court. The object of this Bill was to change the right of appeal from the Court of Appeal and Court of Review, and to change it in such a way as to carry the right back to cases now in Court, which, he was sure, if the hon. Secretary of State had so understood he would not have failed to direct the attention of the House to it. It seemed to him to be doubtful whether it was desirable to give the right of appeal in cases which had gone to the Court of Review. If a man desired to have his case appealed in Quebec he could refrain from going to that Court; if he took that course he would put his case in the way of being appealed; the law of Lower Canada had so established it and it was entitled to consideration in that particular. Under the Constitution the various Provinces were empowered to organize Courts of Appeal, and it did not follow because this Parliament had jurisdiction to create a Court of Appeal for the Dominion that it did away with the rights of a Province to establish a Court and say its decisions should be final. The Province of Quebec had a right, under the Constitution, to organize the Court of Review, and say that its decisions should be final, and it seemed to him that their decision in that respect should prevail, and the right of appeal from it should not be established as this Bill proposed to do. But supposing the gentlemen from Lower Canada should take a different view, there should be a provision introduced into the Bill to prevent its application to cases now before the Court, or cases pending. The effect of the Bill would be to give the right of appeal where it did not now exist. He suggested that this Bill should be referred to a Special Committee of professional men to see whether it should go through in its present shape.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the Bill had not been yet distributed as it had passed the Commons, and he thought it would be better to leave the discussion on it until the next stage. The hon. gentleman from Kingston had raised the point as to whether the Court of Review under the Constitution should be recognized as an ultimate Court. He dissented from that view. If that proposition were a sound one, then it would be competent for all the Provinces to make their Courts those of final resort, and defeat entirely the Court which the Dominion had established. If the Dominion had the right to establish a final Court of Appeal, it necessarily followed that all the other Courts should be subsidiary to it. The point that had been raised by the hon. gentleman from Kingston with reference to ex-post-facto legislation, was one to which he would like to give some consideration before passing an opinion.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL said the Bill was one of very great importance to Quebec, as there was no doubt it seriously interfered with the administration of justice in that Province. Under the British North America Act it was left to the Province to organize their courts, and the effect of this clause would be to destroy altogether the superior jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal. The Court of Review was not properly a Court of Appeal; it was the Superior Court reviewing its own judgments—it was so much so that according to law the same judges who rendered judgments in the Superior Court, could sit in the Court of Review. It was not considered by any one as a Court of Appeal. This clause would practically destroy any appeal from the inferior tribunals in that Province, as the first appeal would be to the Superior Court. It was well known under the existing laws of Quebec, which were peculiar to that Province, it was quite natural that, having in the persons of the five judges of the Court of Appeal, men who were well learned in the laws in force in that Province, the people had more confidence in that court than in any other tribunal. This Bill would allow parties to escape the jurisdiction of that Court of Appeal, and he thought it should not be allowed even to pass the second reading.

Hon. Mr. POWER said, with regard to the alteration in the number of terms of the Supreme Court, that from the information he had obtained, four terms would be too many, and he did not think they were rendered necessary by the amount of business before the court. At the last term there were only twenty-two cases inscribed, and there were only seven cases inscribed for the coming term in June. This represented say thirty cases a year, and it hardly required four terms to dispose of that amount of business. The ground had been taken by some gentlemen who favored the Bill, that it would accelerate the business of the court, and judgments would be rendered more promptly. He failed to see how it would have that effect, as the judges now rendered their decisions whenever they were ready, without waiting for any particular term. In addition to their duties as Supreme Court judges, sitting en banc, they had also to perform other duties in trying Exchequer cases, and cases on petitions of right which obliged them to leave Ottawa frequently for that purpose; and if there were four terms of the Supreme Court it would interfere with those duties. In one or two important cases in Nova Scotia, there had been a good deal of difficulty in getting the judges to go down there under the present system; and if the number of terms was increased to four, it would increase the difficulties of getting the judges to try those cases. The Bill provided that the autumn term should commence on the first Monday of October. The vacation of the Court ended at the beginning of September, and as under the rules of the Court cases for argument had to be entered at least a month before the Court met, the practitioners would be obliged to prepare their cases during vacation, in order to enter them on the first of October. He had understood that there was a feeling in the minds of a great many members of the profession that three terms would be sufficient, commencing on the first Mondays of January, June and November.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said he also had had conversation with gentlemen who had considerable practice before the Supreme Court, and they had informed him that four terms would expedite the business of the Court very much.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER said the general impression seemed to be in favor of four terms.

The Bill was read the second time on the understanding that the House was not committed to the principle of it, and the debate would be continued at the next stage.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THE COMMONS DISAGREES WITH THE SENATE AMENDMENTS.

Mr. SPEAKER read the following Message from the Commons:—

“HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Monday, 6th May, 1878.

“Resolved, That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honors that this House disagrees to their amendments to the Bill (No. 52) intituled: “An Act to amend ‘The Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1874,’” for the following reasons:

“Because it is contrary to the uniform practice of Parliament that contracts into which the Executive is authorized to enter should be made subject to the approval of the Upper Chamber.

“Because in recognition of the practice the Executive was authorized by the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874, to make all contracts for the construction of that great work, subject to the approval of the House of Commons only.

“Because in further recognition of the practice the Executive was by the same Act authorized to make contracts for leasing or working one of the Branch Railways in connection with any other Railway subject to the approval of the House of Commons only.

"Because on the principle on which the approval of the Senate was not required to such contracts, it ought not to be required to a contract for leasing or working another of the Branch Railways.

"Ordered, That the Clerk do carry the said message to the Senate.

"Attest.

"ALFRED PATRICK,
"Clerk of the Commons."

The messenger having withdrawn,

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said:—It is to be regretted that there should be any conflict of opinion between this House and the other branch of the Legislature upon any subject, particularly with respect to a question such as this. Hon. gentlemen are aware that in those contests the upper branch of the Legislature usually suffers. Then, there are attributes and strength about the Lower House which we have not, and in the contest for what is right and constitutional, we should bear in mind that there are many influences against us. For my part, I think I speak the sentiments of every hon. gentleman in this House, when I say we wish to approach this subject with very great consideration, and with every desire, as far as possible, to avoid anything which will be calculated to make wider any possible breach between the two Houses. At the same time it is necessary, in my humble judgment, that the duties of this House should be discharged, if hon. gentlemen conceive themselves to be in the line of such duty, even if it brings us, unfortunately, into the position which I so much deprecate. When this Bill came before this branch of the Legislature it provided for the disposal of an important public work, and the terms of its disposition were to be settled without this House having an opportunity of pronouncing upon those terms. A very large majority of this Chamber thought it was taking from the Senate an opportunity of discharging their duty upon a very important public matter—not a contract for which a sum of money was to be paid, but with reference to the course to be pursued in leasing a public work peculiarly situated and likely to control for some years to come the whole trade of the North-West and of Manitoba. A majority of this House thought it was essential that this Chamber should have an opportunity of pronouncing upon the terms of that lease which was to govern the course to be pursued by the Government with reference to that railway for a period of ten years. I am surprised that the Government did not proceed in this measure by a Bill which would have embodied in it the lease—which has been done on several occasions in the past history of the Dominion. I am not aware whether the lease is in existence or not. I had supposed a few days ago, partly from the observations of the hon. Secretary of State, that it was likely to be in existence in a day or two, and I think the hon. gentleman said he would gladly have seen a little delay, so that the Government might have an opportunity, perhaps, of submitting it to the House. If the lease is in existence it certainly would have been far better to have proceeded by Bill embodying the lease, so that the House would have an opportunity of seeing its terms. If it is not then in existence, and it was necessary to anticipate it by legislation, it should have been provided that the lease, when prepared, should have been laid on the table of both Houses, as it involves the future of a very important and peculiarly situated railway. The reasons given by the Commons for dissenting from the amendment which was passed in this House, in the direction of which I have spoken, is as follows:—

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

"Because it is contrary to the uniform practice of Parliament that contracts into which the Executive is authorized to enter, should be made subject to the approval of the Upper Chamber."

I think that overstates the practice of Parliament. The practice of Parliament is, I think, that contracts involving the expenditure of money for the prosecution of works which have been sanctioned by Parliament, should be laid before the Lower House only, but to say, as this does, that all contracts into which the Executive is authorized to enter should be made subject to the control of the Lower House only, is pushing the doctrine and practice of Parliament further than precedents establish it, and to a degree which, I think, will be found to be very injurious to the public interest.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—If it is necessary to have two Houses at all, then I think in a matter of such great importance as this to the future of the country, we should have an opportunity of pronouncing upon the terms of the lease, involving as it may possibly do, the course of the whole traffic of the North-West and Manitoba, until the all-rail route from Fort William to Winnipeg is established through our own territory. That lease, if it is not drawn in the interests of the country, might have a tendency to direct all the trade and traffic of our North-West through the United States, and if drawn in another way, it might have the effect of diverting that trade to the port of Duluth, and thence to Quebec via the St. Lawrence. I cannot see why there should be a reluctance to afford this House an opportunity to pronounce upon the terms of that lease. I cannot imagine that there is any sound reason for refusing it, and I do not think any sound reason exists. It cannot be that we are not as much interested in it as the other branch of the Legislature; it cannot be that we are so prejudiced and so influenced by party feeling, and a desire to thwart the policy of the Government, that this it may be important policy, should be pursued without our sanction. I do not think so poor a compliment can possibly be paid to us. I say this with reference to the first reason that is given by the Commons, that it is pushing entirely beyond any authority that can be given for it, to the inconvenience of the public service, to the detriment of the public interests, and in a way to certainly diminish the opportunity for the usefulness of this House. The second reason is:—

“Because in recognition of the practice the Executive was authorized by the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874, to make all contracts for the construction of that great work subject to the approval of the House of Commons only.”

That was the course taken under the Canada Pacific Railway Act of 1874, and for my part I do not object to that. I think all contracts for the completion of works for which the Commons has voted money should be submitted to the Commons only.

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

The contracts may, or may not, run over several sessions, and it has been the practice of Parliament that the Commons should keep their hands upon such contracts, and be in a position to deal with them at any time it may be found necessary.

The third reason is:—

From the fact I do not dissent, but from the conclusion I do dissent very much indeed. I beg to draw the attention of the House to this fact in connection with it. In the first place, the railway referred to is not a portion of the Pacific Railway, as one would infer from the reading of this reason. It is a railway for the purpose of connecting the eastern end of the Pacific Railway with the Canada Central. That piece of railway the Pacific Railway Act authorized the construction of in one of two ways; either by a company or by the Government, and the provision to which reference is made in this reason, is for the leasing of it if constructed by the Government. Undoubtedly this is an instance of the power being granted which is claimed in this case, because the lease was not to be laid on the table of this House, but I dissent from it, from the circumstances under which that Act was passed, and which, I think, were such as to prevent any conclusions being drawn, so far as members of this House are concerned, in the direction which this reason seeks to give. The Act was brought up during the last days of the Session of 1874, and was only in Committee the day before the prorogation. Those members who were present on that occasion, will recollect we were not able to go through it clause by clause. A great deal of it was passed en bloc for want of time, and, in the hurry of the moment, this clause escaped observation. I am quite sure if it had been observed, a check would then have been placed on the effort which was made to pass by this House, and carry on important matters of Government, such as leasing railways, without requiring the sanction of the Senate. I think it is our undoubted right to have an opportunity to pronounce upon the lease of an important railway. When this question was under discussion here on a former occasion, my hon. friend from Westmoreland drew attention to several cases in which a course precisely contrary to this was pursued by the late Administration, and even by the present Government. The first case was that of the Windsor Railway, which belonged to the Government. It was proposed to give it away to the Western Counties Railway Company, for the purpose of assisting them in making a railway across the Isthmus of Nova Scotia, from Annapolis to Yarmouth. There was an instance in which it was proposed to deal with the property of the country, and the arrangement made by the Government was to be submitted to both Houses. It was not because they were parting with the property as suggested by the hon. Secretary of State, but the same course was taken with reference to the disposition of the property, in the meantime, until the Yarmouth and Annapolis Railway became entitled to it. So I think it is a complete precedent for the course which I propose to ask the House to take here, and to insist that the amendment is one which we cannot constitutionally, or with a fair regard to our duty to the country, give way upon. The next case is that of the Pictou and Truro road. In that case we proposed to give the railway from Pictou to Truro, which belonged to the country, to any company which would construct a railway from New Glasgow to the Gut of Canso. In that instance the provision was, any agreement to be made should be laid on the tables of both Houses of Parliament, and receive the sanction of both Houses before it should take effect, and that course was pursued when the transfer was made. The other cases, which do not run precisely on all fours with those I have cited, are the contracts with the Allans for the Ocean Mail Service. Those were contracts which, at first sight, I should say should not have been laid on the table of this House; but it was deemed necessary to do so, because very large public interests were involved in the transportation of the mails—such as the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway and the cities connected with it. It was, therefore, a matter which involved considerations outside of the mere payments of money,—questions of public policy—and in two instances—in 1869 and in 1873—contracts were made in each case, containing a clause providing that the sanction of both Houses of Parliament, must be received before they could take effect. In both cases a Bill was introduced and received the sanction of both Houses, putting the contracts in force. In both cases resolutions of the House of Commons preceded the action taken by the Government. It was also done in the case of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway transfer, and in the case of the Pictou and Truro road. It seems to me, in these cases, we find the reason given by the House of Commons is completely answered; because instances have been cited where the very contrary course was pursued. The other reason, which is an important one, in reference to the leasing of the Pacific Railway from the eastern terminus of the road to the beginning of the Canada Central, I have already explained. It passed through this House—I will not say by surprise offensively in any way, but it was a matter of surprise to many of us that it had passed. With these observations I beg to move:

“That the Clerk do go down to the House of Commons, and carry back the Bill intituled: ‘An Act to amend the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1874,’ and acquaint them that the Senate doth insist on their amendments made to the said Bill to which the Commons disagree, and for the following reasons, viz:—

1. That the Senate doth insist on the said amendment, for the reason that without it the Bill would provide for the disposal of public property for a term of years without obtaining the sanction of both Houses to the terms of the transfer.

2. And for the reason that the terms of the lease of a railway running to a foreign country, and forming the only outlet for the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, until the completion of the Pacific Railway easterly from Red River, involve questions of public policy likely materially to effect the course of traffic and the prosperity of the Dominion, and is one of those agreements which should be laid on the Table of the Senate, as well as on that of the Commons, before becoming operative.

3. And for the reason the practice of Parliament referred to in the first reason given in the Message from the House of Commons has never extended beyond contracts for the completion of Public Works, for which money voted by the Commons is in the course of being expended, other contracts having been constantly submitted for the approval of both Houses,—for example :—

(a.) The transfer of the Windsor Branch Railway, Nova Scotia, to the Western Counties Railway, and the working it in the meantime. Resolution of the Commons, 23rd May, 1873, and of the Senate of the same day, Chap. 16 of the Statutes of 1874.

(b.) The transfer of the Pictou and Truro Railway authorized to be made to any company constructing a railway to the Gut of Causo, and to provide for its temporary disposition in the meantime. Resolution of the House of Commons, 19th May, 1874, Chap. 43 of the Statutes of 1877.

(c.) Contract for the Ocean Mail service, in 1869, (32 and 33 Vic. Chap. 5) and that in 1873 (36 Vic., Chap. 33) on account of their general bearing on the trade and business of the Dominion, were made subject to ratification by both Houses of Parliament.

4. The Pacific Railway Act of 1874 was only submitted to the Senate towards the very close of the Sessions, and was in Committee the day before the prorogation; the Bill was not considered clause by clause, and the provisions for leasing a branch railway to connect the Eastern terminus of the Pacific Railway with existing or proposed lines of railway escaped observation, or it would not have been sanctioned."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When this subject was before the Senate on the passage of the Bill relating to the lease of the Pembina Branch Railway the question of the prerogative of this body to interfere in contracts of this kind was very fully discussed. I endeavored to show from authorities produced from Todd, and other sources, that the practice in England was that all contracts required to be passed by the House of Commons did not necessarily require to be pronounced upon by the House of Peers: on the contrary, I think there were only one or two cases that could be found, and those singularly exceptional ones, in which a right to express an opinion upon contracts was exacted by the House of Peers. One was in reference to a large expenditure on the fortifications at Dover and Portsmouth; the other in reference to the educational fund adverted to by the hon. leader of the Opposition. They do not, to my mind, lead to the conclusion that the privileges and prerogatives sought to be obtained in this House have been exercised by the House of Peers. On the contrary the current of authority was in support of the view taken in the other House. The precedents cited do not apply.

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

The transfer of the Pictou Branch Railway was in no case an analogous one. That was an absolute disposal of a piece of property belonging to Canada, on certain conditions. The circumstances attending the transfer of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway were akin to that. The people of Canada were parting with that property on certain terms and conditions, and it was impossible to do so except by virtue of an Act of Parliament. In this case, where arrangements are sought to be made with roads south of the boundary line, no such power was contemplated. It is merely to make an agreement for the carriage of freight, either by leasing our own road, or by an interchange of freight or traffic. I think the hon. gentleman gives up the whole case when he quotes the action of Parliament in the authority they gave the House of Commons to pass upon contracts for leasing a branch of the Pacific Railway. That is clearly a case similar in all its circumstances to this, and the only answer the hon. gentleman can give in combating that point is that the Pacific Railway Bill passed this Chamber without the Senate practically understanding it. Whether it is desirable such a statement should go to the people, that this Chamber permitted such an important measure to pass without knowing its contents, I leave hon. gentlemen to judge for themselves. There is the law and it is in confirmation of the action the House of Commons have taken. I think, in view of the very decided vote given in the other Chamber—92 to 32—against this amendment, the Senate should recede from it. It would, of course, gratify me very much if this Chamber saw fit not to insist upon the reasons that prompt them to make the amendment. I very much fear from the vote taken upon it in the House of Commons, that it is not likely to be reversed, and we may witness the unseemly spectacle of a discordance of opinion between the two branches of the Legislature on a matter of so much moment as this. I discussed the matter so fully on a former occasion, that I do not feel it is necessary to go into the question again.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—As I quoted precedents not only from the Imperial Parliament, but from the Parliament of this country since the Union, I do not feel it necessary to go over the same authorities again, showing the usages of this country with respect to the right of this House to be considered in measures connected with the general interests of this Dominion. The Secretary of State tells us in his observations now that, inasmuch as the amendment has been rejected by a large majority in the House of Commons, therefore this Senate should not insist upon it. Now, the point was just simply this: have we, by the Constitution of the land and the usages of Parliament, the right to make such an amendment? I contend that the authorities which have been quoted and which were cited in the resolutions now before the House are conclusive on that point—that this Senate has the constitutional right to amend that Bill in the direction we have amended it, and that the unanimous vote of the House of Commons cannot take away the rights and privileges of this House, which we hold under its written Constitution. I believe neither House should attempt to encroach upon the privileges of the other.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—I think it is unwise for either Chamber to undervalue the rights and privileges which the other possesses, and especially is it unwise and impolitic in the Government of the country to attempt by the majority in the House of Commons, contrary to the usage of Parliament, and, in my humble opinion, contrary to the powers and privileges which are given by the Constitution of the land, to interfere with the privileges of this House. Now, the first resolution passed by the House of Commons is certainly incorrect. It simply states:—

“Because it is contrary to the uniform practice of Parliament that contracts into which the Executive is authorized to enter should be made subject to the approval of the Upper Chamber.”

After considering the authorities and precedents which have been cited with respect to the usages of Parliament since Confederation, that resolution cannot be said to be correct. The usage of Parliament with respect to the disposal of large Public Works of this country has, in all cases, been to require the sanction of both Houses of Parliament, and no authority has been quoted to prove that the usage has ever been to the contrary. The hon. Secretary of State draws a distinction, which it must be obvious to every gentleman cannot be sustained, between the transfer of a railway and the lease of it. If the Government have the right, with the consent of the House of Commons, to lease the Pembina Branch for five or ten years, does it not follow they have the right to lease it for one hundred years, or to give a perpetual lease? With respect to the Georgian Bay Branch, the only part of the resolutions passed by the House of Commons which appears to affect our rights, it is quite clear that it was an oversight on the part of the Senate. But can one single case like that form a precedent for taking away the undoubted rights and privileges of this House? If the argument of the Secretary of State be correct, one single case of negligence is sufficient to deprive us of the rights we enjoy under the Constitution. If the Government can dispose of public property in the manner proposed by this Bill, what is the use of this House? We have our canals, the Intercolonial Railway and other large works, and if we concede what the Government claim in this case, they would have the right to dispose of those public works without consulting this body. What then would become of the check which was intended by the Constitution this Senate should possess over Acts connected with the public interest? The check which the provision affords the smaller Provinces,—that they shall have a large representation in this branch of the Legislature,—would be swept away at once. This Act for the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway, shows that the Government, in 1874, did not intend to take the power to lease or dispose of the whole of the railway and its branches. It only proposed to lease a portion connecting, not with the main line of the Pacific Railway, but an extension of the Georgian Bay Branch. If the attention of this Senate had been called to that point at the time of passing the Bill, I have no doubt this House would have amended it in the direction that no lease of any portion of the road should have been binding until submitted to this House. I regret as much as any hon. gentleman, that this apparent difficulty between the two branches of the Legislature should arise, but I appeal to hon. gentlemen who hold seats in this House, to look at the consequences if those principles contained in the resolutions which have been passed by the House of Commons should prevail! What would be the consequences to the influence, rights, privileges, and usefulness of this branch of the Legislature?

Hon. Mr. Botsford.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—A seat in this House, if the Government of the country, backed by the majority of the House of Commons, could dispose of the public property of this Dominion, would not be worth having. What would be the use of this body to the country if it had no right to be consulted on important matters, or to amend bills like this? This matter seems to me to require the deep consideration of members of this House. If the views of the Government prevail, then the usefulness and dignity of this House must be seriously deteriorated. I should like to refer to two great authorities on the usage of Parliament, which, I think, bear on this case.

At six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

AFTER RECESS

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD resumed his speech. He said—I was, before recess, about to quote some authorities on parliamentary usage, but I shall not weary the House by reading them. I shall simply refer hon gentlemen to page 289, Vol. I., of Todd's Parliamentary Practice, which shows clearly that such measures as this should be laid before both branches of Parliament. The other authority to which I would refer, will be found at page 496 of Todd's Parliamentary Practice, which shows clearly that the Government do not attain authority solely from the House of Commons, but from Parliament. I consider those very strong authorities as regards the usage in the British Parliament. There is an Act of the Imperial Parliament—a late one—authorizing the Government to enter into certain contracts which are specified in the Act, and the Government are required to submit their Acts and proceedings, under the provisions of that measure, to both Houses of Parliament. I do not intend to weaken the able and calm argument made use of by the hon. leader of the Opposition in introducing these resolutions, but I do say, that I think any member who has a regard for the rights and privileges of this Senate must have been convinced by that argument that in this case they have right on their side, that they have the constitutional right to amend this Bill, and that they have not only acted in accordance with the written Constitution of the land, but also with the usages of Parliament. The Ministers of the Crown, supported by a majority of the House of Commons, have denied our right to amend a Bill affecting the general interests of this country. If, under the circumstances, the Senate should recede from their amendment, they would surrender the rights and privileges, which I hold, they possess under the Constitution since Confederation. If a collision should arise between the two branches of the Legislature, the blame cannot be laid at the door of the Senate. We have acted strictly within our rights, and with a full consideration of all the circumstances that flow therefrom; but whether a collision occur or not it is utterly impossible for this House now to recede from the position they have taken upon this question, because the House of Commons have denied that the Senate is entitled, under the usages of Parliament, to the power we have exercised. If we recede from our amendment we concede a principle which, in my humble opinion, it is absolutely necessary for the Senate of Canada to oppose, if they wish to maintain their usefulness and influence in the government of this country.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—I think the step the House is about to take is of much greater importance than perhaps appears from the way in which it has been presented to the Chamber to-night. I think hon. gentlemen have tried to make it appear as if there were an onset by the House of Commons on the rights and privileges of the Senate. If I believed that, I should be the very last to rise and oppose the motion of the hon. the leader of the Opposition. But I do not look upon it in that light, and I think it would be well for us all to divest ourselves of partisan feeling in the matter, and come to the consideration of it influenced by no desire save to do our duty in view of the interests of our country. I apprehend the position this House holds is one of a very peculiar character. I am the last to do anything to interfere with the high position this House should occupy in the eyes of the people. But I think we have to pursue a very delicate course if we expect to maintain the confidence of the people of this country. I hold in my hand the Act sent up to us from the House of Commons—an Act to amend the Pacific Railway Act of 1874. It goes on to say, that section 16 of the Act already in existence, shall be amended in such a way as to empower the Government to lease the Pembina Branch or to make running arrangements with companies in the United States, and that such lease or arrangements shall be submitted to the House of Commons for ratification at the next Session of Parliament. Now, that is the whole point. It is not the building of the road—that is already provided for. It is not handing over any property to those parties, but simply to make a lease of the road or to make running arrangements over it—an arrangement which, I apprehend, if it is carried out with that sagacity and with that regard for the interests of the country which we are all sure the Ministry will exhibit as far as they can, will be very much for the benefit of the Dominion. What is the condition of it now? We have a railroad under the Act which we are now appending to run from Winnipeg to the Province line, and then there is a space of 70 miles between that and the next railway point in the United States. When you reach that point you can run down from Winnipeg to St. Paul, and from St. Paul to Chicago, and at Chicago you can connect with the whole Canadian system of railways. Now there is a company formed, with its headquarters at St. Paul, but, as we all know, their proprietors are largely in Canada, and the whole, almost, of the proprietors have their interests in our Western Provinces. They say: "We intend to make our main line with the Northern Pacific Railway of the United States, but if you will make arrangements with us for your traffic beyond the Province line, so that we may have our fair share of the trade which comes from your country through the United States, then we are prepared with our own money, at our own cost, and within the space of this year, to complete our line to the boundary by building 70 miles of road. What we ask from you is a lease of your line, or running arrangements by which we can get your traffic."

Hon. Mr. Brown.

Hon. Mr. RYAN—I don't think that appears in any way before this House.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—I think so.

Hon. Mr. RYAN—Does the hon. gentleman say that any such arrangement or proposition has been submitted to this House?

Hon. Mr. BROWN—The proposition has been made to the Government.

Hon. Mr. RYAN—I have not seen it.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—I have not seen it either. But I have heard from Canadian proprietors exactly what they want. They have made no secret of it. It has been a distinct proposition made to the Government of this country and that proposition is, "if you will make an arrangement with us by which we shall connect your Pembina Branch Railway with our American line, we being in connection with the whole Canadian system of railways, then we will be in a position to build these 70 miles and so give you connection with the whole world, until your line is completed from Fort William to Winnipeg." Now, what do we find? The Government, I apprehend, had a perfect right to do that. You have authorized them to build that railway, to put rolling stock upon it and to run it. And do you mean to tell me, because they say, "We intend to go on and make some arrangement, and will put it before you at the earliest possible moment, and make no bargain with any railway company except on the principle that, unless it is approved by the representatives of the people of Canada, it shall be null and void," that they are not to be entrusted with this power? It is in that position at this moment. The Secretary of State will correct me if I am wrong.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I explained when the Bill was up, that preliminary propositions had been made to the Government, but that the arrangements were not in such a shape as could be submitted. In fact, they were inchoate. It was because Parliament must necessarily rise before the arrangements could be completed that this authority was required at all.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I never heard of that until now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I stated that the arrangements were not complete, that propositions had been made, but that nothing definite had been decided upon.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I never heard of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sure hon. gentlemen in this Chamber heard me.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I am sure it is as the hon. gentleman says. All I say is I never heard it.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—I have not heard one single word with regard to this matter from the Secretary of State or any other member of the Administration. What I heard was from a gentleman of great energy, ability and influence, and controlling great wealth.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—We have not seen him either.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—The hon. gentleman does not live so far away that he has not seen him.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I assure the hon. gentleman I have not seen him.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—I have, and so, I am sure, have other members of this Chamber. The gentlemen who have made this proposition are some of the most enterprising of our citizens, and the very men into whose hands we should desire to place this railway, and it is for us to take very good care that they shall not have an undue advantage.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—That is just what we want.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—You do not propose to allow us the opportunity of taking such precautions.

Hon. Mr. Brown.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—I am not in the habit of allowing railway bills to pass through Parliament without enquiring carefully into them and protecting the interests of the public.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER—Perhaps my hon. friend will enlighten the House by telling us what objection there can possibly be on the part of the Government to entering into running arrangements with the company that desires to lease the Pembina Branch. What is the reason we cannot have from the Government the running arrangements submitted to us—arrangements which every road on the continent is making constantly? The Grand Trunk Railway Company is making running arrangements every week or two, and there is no difficulty about it. If there is nothing else, there is no reason why the matter should be delayed till next Session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The arrangements are not made.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—I am very glad my hon. friend has put that question. If the road in Minnesota were all in existence now, his question could be answered. Of course my hon. friend will see there are seventy miles to be constructed, and these people must advance the money to build it, and it is in order to tempt them to do that that the Government ask power to negotiate with them. They are trying, no doubt, to drive as good a bargain as they can, and the Government are standing out for the best terms they can get in the interests of Canada. How can they tell you about a thing that has no existence?

Hon. Mr. FERRIER—They have declared positively that they only want the running rates now being paid to them for the freight passing over the Grand Trunk towards Manitoba. The Grand Trunk has running arrangements with that same road.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—But those seventy miles are not built yet, and if we can get them completed this Fall, it is a consideration of very great value to Manitoba and the whole people going west, and to the entire Dominion. If there is anything we are interested in, it is in filling up the North-West with an industrious population, and we can best do that by making as hard a bargain as we can for the immediate completion of that link of railway, and allowing emigrants to go in there at the very earliest possible moment. That is the position in which this measure comes before us. We are now at the end of the Session. We are to sit here for two days. Do we say the moment we find this proposition made, "Here is the very thing we wanted"? Not at all. We, the Senate, in the plenitude of our great power, begin to pick insults to ourselves in it. This arrangement must be submitted to us if we desire it. Any member of the Senate may, at the very first day of next Session, move for a copy of it, and no Government would refuse it for a moment. It is no matter of fact we are at variance with the Lower House about. We are deprived of no valuable consideration. There is nothing of a tangible character that has been cut off from us. It is simply the idea that the Senate is not placed on the same footing as the House of Commons. That is the whole point from beginning to end, and upon that point we are prepared to say to the people of Manitoba, "We had the power to give you a railroad within the next six months, and rather than allow our dignity to be infringed upon for a single moment, we defeated this measure, and now you can make the best arrangements you can." I hope the Senate will not put itself in a position to say they will refuse that section of the country, to which there are 20,000 emigrants finding their way now, railway communication. If we really have an offer from the St. Paul & Pacific Railway Co., it would be the most unpatriotic and most injurious thing this Senate could do, to pass this resolution. It seems to have been forgotten altogether in the debates on this question, there are three branches of the Legislature. Hon. gentlemen seem to keep in view only the Senate and House of Commons; the Executive power is entirely lost sight of. I am afraid it is not only here this is beginning to be forgotten, but also in the House of Commons. We hear sometimes of encroachments on the Executive power, which are just as dangerous as any encroachment can be on the privileges of the Senate or the rights of the House of Commons. Now, what is the fact? No one will deny it that there are a thousand things of this kind done by the Administration every day, that do not go before the House of Commons or the House of Lords, that the Executive has power to do. The leader of the Opposition told us, "We want, in the interest of the people, to overhaul and to put our veto upon it next Session, if the lease is a bad one." There is not a single word he said, forcibly as it was put, that would not have applied as well to the Supply Bill. There are many parts of the Supply Bill, had we the right to pick and choose for ourselves, that it would be well for the country if they could be thrown out. Is that a reason why we should assume that privileges? The hon. gentleman does not contend that we should, or that in anything affecting the taxation of the people, we ought to take that position, and yet every single word he spoke on this subject to-night would apply to taxation just as well as to this measure. No doubt this is a material matter, but not of the importance the hon. gentleman attaches to it in a constitutional point of view. It is a great thing for the progress and prosperity of the North-West, but I apprehend there is nothing so particular in the giving of running powers over a railroad connecting one part of the country with another part, to say it is absolutely necessary the Senate should be consulted before the arrangement takes effect. There is no force in that argument. I put it to this House, how are you to carry on responsible government if you insist on this? Here is a Government which is pledged before the country and the whole world, to construct a railway across this continent. Both parties are committed to it. We may regret it is so; perhaps we might desire to postpone it as far as possible until our finances are fit to proceed with the undertaking, but we cannot deny that the country is committed to the construction of this great work at the earliest possible moment. How is our Cabinet constructed? Every executive act has to be done by the Governor-General on the advice of his Cabinet, and these Cabinet Ministers, before they enter office, are obliged to swear in the presence of the Almighty they will give faithful advice on all public matters they deem necessary for the public good. But it is not to be only the measures they think wise they are to give advice upon ; they are to be responsible as much for the things they neglect to do as for the things they do. The Government have advised His Excellency that it is desirable and necessary in the interests of the country, to enter into this arrangement to give railway communication to Manitoba, and this Senate rises up and attempts to take that prerogative out of the hand of the Executive. They say :—

“ We cannot trust you to make that bargain. We, the Senate, who have no responsibility, who are sent here for our whole lives whose numbers cannot possibly be increased, who can at any time put a veto, if we choose, upon the affairs of this country—we, the Senate, step in and say, with regard to this particular thing, that lease or arrangement must be submitted to us before it can be put in force.”

What is the difference between you and the House of Commons? There is this difference: There is some sense and reason in submitting this lease to them, because if they disapprove of it, the arrangement must fall through. If the Government do not choose to bend, they have control of the purse strings, and can stop the supplies. Do we desire that this House shall express one opinion upon this contract, while the House of Commons expresses another, to find our advice mocked at while that of the Commons prevails? I apprehend we do not desire to put ourselves in such a position, or that the Ministry of the day should be put in such a position. It is impossible that they can please both Houses while the majority here is opposed, in all public matters, to the majority in the Commons. It is mere mockery to amend this Bill as you propose, when we all know very well that if the Commons should determine the other way, your protest will be as unavailing as the wind. I hope the House will not put itself in any such position. I go further, and say you have no right to do it. With regard to all those cases that have been attempted to be made out, there is no use in discussing them. What my hon. friend says may be perfectly true, that this original Bill was passed without his knowledge, and no one took cognizance of this clause; that when the great Canadian Pacific Railway Act, with its $100,000,000 responsibility, was passed, they did not know the contracts and other papers were to be submitted to the House of Commons only. That may be so; it may have been an oversight, but what would you have gained by amending that clause? Did you not get all the papers you asked for? Was anything submitted to the House of Commons that you did not receive? Have you not had your committees, examined witnesses, and exercised all the power you possessed, but can you stop the policy of the Government? You cannot do it, and you are attempting to take what you have no power to enforce. I spent this forenoon in hunting up precedents, a thing I have not been in the habit of doing for years; and I confess I was astonished at the clearness with which the Lower House has managed to maintain its right over all essential money matters. If this is not a money affair, I would like to know what is. Unless this road is leased, we will have to work it ourselves, which is the very worst way a railroad can be managed. It is very strange that in all those different bills and resolutions that have been brought forward, in regard to matters of high public interest in England as well as Canada, there is scarcely a parallel for it. The Senate is rushing to try to establish a right which can only be sustained, looking back two or three hundred years, by one or two doubtful precedents.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—The whole practice of laying contracts before Parliament at all has arisen within twenty years, and the hon. gentleman has been looking back hundreds of years for precedents.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—The practice has certainly arisen within twenty years, and before that the Crown never looked for the approval of Parliament in such matters. They took it as a prerogative. Fortunately we have got into a far better state of things; but it is one thing that which has been done for us as a matter of reform and liberality through the progress of public opinion, and it is another, this House getting up, and in the plentitude of its strength, passing a resolution which it cannot enforce. The Senate rises and says, “ Now

"I will force the House of Commons to take this amendment, at the last day of the Session, without consideration," though we have been getting everything we have desired by simply moving for it. There is not a single member of this House who does not believe that the lease will be laid before this branch of the Legislature next Session, if it be desired. This is a matter which requires no precedent; it only wants common sense; but I shall give hon. gentlemen opposite a precedent. I would refer them to page 544 of the last edition of May, in which the principle is laid down that the House of Lords, in all matters affecting the cash interests of the people, can only assent or refuse, but cannot amend. I turn to other portions of May, and also Todd, in which I find the doctrine is clearly laid down, that the responsibility of the Ministry to Parliament, as it is now constituted, is practically a responsibility to the House of Commons; because the fate of the Ministry does not depend upon the vote of the Upper House. I find that in a number of the colonies these same difficulties have arisen with regard to where the line is to be drawn between that which properly pertains to the Upper House, and that which is solely committed to the House of Commons; and they have done what we might wisely do here—that is, appoint a committee of all the most thoughtful and able men among us to sit down and deliberate how we should maintain our proper position, and avoid doubt as to whether this or that measure, coming up from the House of Commons, is really within our province or not. We should no more desire to encroach upon the rights of the House of Commons, than allow the House of Commons to encroach on ours. I find in all the recommendations of the committees to which I have referred, the same point is kept in view—to steer clear of all measures affecting the solid cash of the country, and warning them not to interfere with such matters. If I could exercise any influence over the House, or induce my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, to take a reasonable view of this matter, I would suggest to him that the very first thing that should be done next Session, would be to set to work to arrive at an understanding of what our rights and privileges really are. It is useless for me to suggest it I know, and to say that my view is right, because there are many who oppose me who think the contrary. I ask, is it wise that we should go on, not really knowing what we can or what we cannot do? Is it right that we should, at the end of the Session, send a Bill like this to the Lower House? Is there no way to waive this dispute and let the people of Manitoba get the benefit of this railway, and let us discuss our privileges at another time? This is a thing that has never been done before, and what pretext have we for this except one or two precedents quoted by my hon. friend opposite, (Mr. Botsford), but which really, from his own point of view, amount to very little? Is there any necessity for enforcing this amendment when we are getting everything we want from the Government? I do think it is a very purposeless dispute which has been raised, and raised, too, from the other side of the House. We can find only one Bill in the whole record of the Imperial Parliament which contains a provision such as this House has inserted in this measure, and that relates to great works in which there was a grave doubt on both sides of politics as to whether it was wise or not, but all parties were agreed it should go on—that the experiment should be tried, and reports could be brought down every year to Parliament, and if necessary the work could be stopped. There is no other precedent in the whole record of the Parliament of Great Britain for this—no single instance in which the House of Peers attempted to insert such an amendment as that which has been adopted here. Trained in the House of Commons, where there are very strict rules against referring to former debates, I have not referred to anything that has taken place in this Chamber of a kind to irritate the House of Commons, but I think hon. gentlemen will admit at once, if they will place any faith in the Administration, that when it is understood that this lease shall be laid before the House of Commons next Session at the earliest possible moment, it is unwise for this House to insist upon amending the Bill in a manner distasteful to the other House. This is only adding to a bill which has already grown up to considerable dimensions. We amended another measure here which I understand has been rejected in the House of Commons—the Bill referring to the Independence of Parliament. I admit the clause relating to the Senate should not have been sent up as it was, but I believe it was not intended as a discourtesy. It has often been done before; it has been done in England, and the Peers never objected to it. I do think it would have been far better if that Bill had not been amended. I would rather have had it stronger than we got it. I know I am in the minority here. Had you protected the purity of the elections more than the Bill did, you might have been justified in interfering to make clauses to suit yourselves, but to strike out a clause which would have excluded pensioners from the House of Commons is seriously objected to in the other House. I think it would have been well if this Chamber had agreed to what the Lower House did; but instead of doing so it amended that Bill, and now we are following it up with this. Does not all this show that we had better have a clear line to follow? Would it not be far better to ascertain what our rights are than to be hunting up musty volumes and searching for precedents in the Imperial Parliament? I appeal to the House to take a patriotic stand now. Let the people of Manitoba have their Bill, and let this great public work go on, and relieve the people from the necessity of spending six or seven million dollars probably, where it is not expedient it should be done, to complete our own link. Hon. gentlemen say there is no fear—the Government will go on and do it. I say, if I were a member of the Government and this House were to insist upon this clause and say that this lease should only be ratified if they consented to it, I should let a dozen roads go before I would submit to it.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—Hon. gentlemen may cry "hear, hear," but I have no hesitation in saying that I would never submit to it. If we were in the majority here and you had a majority in the Lower Chamber, do you think you would permit us to do it?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—The hon. gentleman knows better than that. He would say, "No, I have got the power to do this. Parliament has given me power to build this road, to put rolling stock upon it, and to put up the buildings requisite for the running of the railway, and why should I, when establishing railway communication with Manitoba, be compelled to submit this lease to the Upper House, and be snubbed by them?" Do you think the Government, under such circumstances, could effect an arrangement? Do you think those sharp capitalists are likely to spend money on the seventy miles in Minnesota subject to the approval of the majority here? The thing is utterly absurd. I have never spoken to any member of the Government on this subject. My communication has been solely and entirely with those who have been making the proposition, and I can only judge what would likely be the case under such circumstances, no matter what the politics of the Government might be, provided they were opposed by a majority in this Chamber. We are all undoubtedly well aware that the Constitution of this Chamber is anomalous. There is no country on the face of the earth, except two or three colonies of Great Britain, with such a Chamber as this. Everyone knows very well that there are many who would very much desire a change in the Senate. For my own part, I cannot see how any change could be effected which would make it anything like as good as it is at present, provided we limit our pretensions as the House of Peers does in England. You can find no case in which the House of Peers has ever interfered in so trumpery a matter as this. It is not the railway that is in question; it is simply that the name of the Senate shall be put into this Bill, for a thing they have always had, that they have now, and that nobody seeks to take away from them. That is really what it all means. We are at the end of this Parliament, and about having a general election. There will be an appeal to the people, and you cannot prevent candidates from making the action of this Senate a matter of public discussion. Is that wise? For my part I think it is not. I think it would be far better for us to waive this matter. There are ninety-two members in the other House who have recorded their opinion that we have no right to make this amendment, and only thirty-two who think we have.

Hon. Mr. Brown.

Hon. Dr. CARRALL—That was a snap vote.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—I might proceed at much greater length to urge the House to recede from this amendment, but I think the reasons why we should do so are so clear that it is unnecessary I should discuss the matter at greater length. There should be no trouble in having both these Bills settled in such a way as would be honorable to this House and in the interests of the country.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I hope the hon. Senator from Lambton will pardon me if I venture to say that his severe morning studies have not been very productive, inasmuch as all the authorities he has cited prove points none of us call in question, while the hon. gentleman has passed by altogether the distinction drawn by the hon. Senator from Kingston and the hon. Senator from Westmoreland, between the power of this House to deal with money matters, and the power we possess under the Constitution, and which we are now contending for, of dealing with a question of great public interest, and which may very largely concern the trade and future prosperity of an important part of the Dominion. It is very difficult to follow the hon. gentleman's arguments, because he shifts his ground so often. He began by speaking of some very important and advantageous arrangements made with certain influential gentlemen for the construction of a railroad from the Province line into the United States territory, to connect with the American railway system, upon condition of their receiving a lease of the Pembina Branch of the Pacific Railway. Of these arrangements we have never had any official information laid before us. The Secretary of State did speak the other night of what he termed an "inchoate" lease or agreement as being in existence. Of the particulars of this lease, however, we know absolutely nothing. But then the hon. gentleman says that the lease is a trifling matter!

Hon. Mr. BROWN—The building of the road is a very important matter, but the mere lease itself, and it being laid before this House, is a trifling matter which we should not insist upon. That is my point.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Well, there is a very wide divergence between the hon. gentleman and those on this side of the House, as to what is really the point involved in this discussion. We contend that the point is this: the Government either have already made, or are going to make, arrangements for the leasing of the Pembina Branch of the Pacific Railway, which may involve very large public interests, and which, if not properly guarded, may have the effect of diverting the trade and traffic of the North-West into American channels altogether, to the detriment of our own Pacific Railway when completed, and against the interests of the Dominion generally. We contend that this is a matter of public policy and public interest, in which this House is as deeply concerned as the House of Commons, and in which we have an equal right to be considered with the other branch of the Legislature. The hon. gentleman, on the other hand, says it is only a matter of dignity that we are standing up for, and that in asking to have the lease submitted to us, we are going beyond our constitutional right, and trespassing on the privileges of the Commons, and, in fact, might just as well attempt to interfere with the Supply Bill when it comes up to us! The hon. gentleman did not always hold such low views of the constitutional right of the Upper Chamber! I remember when I first entered the Parliament of old Canada, a very warm discussion taking place in the Upper House on the subject of the removal of the Seat of Government (in accordance with the alternate system) from Toronto to Quebec for five years. The buildings here were so far completed, that there was every prospect of their being ready for the meeting of Parliament in a year or eighteen months; and it was contended that to make the double move, first to Quebec and then here, was a useless expenditure of public money. Now, this was really a money question, which might seem to appertain almost entirely to the House of Commons, but the hon. gentleman highly approved at that time of the course taken by the Upper House!

Nay, even when we went further—for I was one of the delinquents, and so was my hon. friend the member from Kingston! but we were young and inexperienced in Parliamentary life then, and I don't mean to say that we would take the same course again!—when we went further, and voted against the Supply Bill, because it contained the obnoxious item providing for the expenses of the removal to Quebec, the hon. gentleman patted us on the back in the columns of the newspaper which he then as now controlled, and declared that our conduct was noble and patriotic in the highest degree!! The hon. gentleman shakes his head! But those were his opinions as expressed in the Globe newspaper of that day! The hon. gentleman now lectures us on our want of patriotism and even common sense, in insisting upon our constitutional right in asking to have this lease submitted to this House of Parliament as well as to the other, and threatens us with the withdrawal of the Bill, and the failure of the arrangements for establishing railway communication with Manitoba, as the consequence of our obstinacy.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—I know nothing more about the matter than this, that if we do not meet the wishes of the Government and withdraw the amendment, they will drop the Bill. How could they go in with it?

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—They can consent to submit the lease to us as well as to the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Our persevering in our amendment does not necessitate the dropping of the Bill. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to jump to the conclusion, that if the lease were submitted to us, we are going, as a matter of course, to disapprove of its provisions: nothing of the sort. If the arrangements are of so advantageous a character as described by the hon. gentleman from Lambton, why should we do so? But we should certainly be wanting both in patriotism and common sense, if we abnegated all our duties and responsibilities in a matter which very deeply concerns the interests, not only of Manitoba and the North-West, but of the whole Dominion, and did not, therefore, insist upon the lease being laid upon the table of this House. The hon.

Hon. Mr. Allan.

gentleman also asks us if we have forgotten that there are three estates of the realm, and that to the Executive belongs the right to make such contracts without consulting either House of Parliament. I admit that this was the general practice half a century ago, but the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that it has become more and more the custom within late years in the Imperial Parliament, to have important contracts laid on the table of Parliament; and if this lease is to be laid on the table of the House of Commons, it does not surely imply any want of respect for the Executive that we should ask to have it laid before us also. As to the charge which the hon. gentleman makes of our obstructing matters at this late period of the Session, I have only to say the fault lies at the door of the Government, not at ours. Why was not this Bill introduced at the beginning of the Session instead of nearly at the end of it? We, on this side of the House, are certainly not responsible for an important measure like this having been put back until the last week of the Session, when it might just as well have been before us a month ago. I have no fear that even if the Government do think proper to drop the Bill upon our persevering in our amendment, that it will prevent the construction of the road from the Province line, and the establishment of railway communication with the North-West, and I am perfectly satisfied that the course which the majority of this Senate have taken, will commend itself to the approval of the country.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—I shall not occupy the ground which has been taken by some speakers that have addressed the House before me with regard to precedents; but I come down to the simple facts connected with our organization as a Senate. No person knows better than my hon. friend the principles upon which this Confederation was formed. He knows perfectly well it was under the British North America Act, and not on the principle of representation by population, except in the other branch of the Legislature. He knows that the Senate was formed specially for the protection of the smaller Provinces. That was the principle insisted upon, and on that principle I am prepared to give up no particle of the constitutional right we possess under the British North America Act. My hon. friend says we can get all this information next Session, and that common sense would be satisfied in getting it at that time and in that manner. I think common sense demands we should see to it beforehand. I was for a long time a member of the democratic branch, and I have every respect for an expression of opinion by the people through the House of Commons. At the same time, I stand here to defend the Constitution under which this Senate has been formed. I say it is based upon the principle of territorial representation, and that we are here, at all events, to form our own judgment, according to the best of our ability, upon what is best for the interests of this Dominion, whether there is a majority in the House of Commons who may think differently or otherwise. I am sorry to say, while the Government have been able to appoint some fourteen or sixteen members to this Senate, instead of gaining the confidence of this Chamber, they have been losing it continually.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—My hon. friend will not tell this House that all the members who vote against the Government, here, are actuated by party spirit. They have exercised their common sense and judgment, and they feel as strong and patriotic an interest in the Dominion as the Government or their supporters; and if the House of Commons or the Government come forward here to limit the constitutional rights of the Senate, or to destroy our territorial representation, I say, as a member from one of the smaller Provinces, I shall oppose that to the death. I am not prepared to have our rights ignored. In order to show we are not a legislative union, but that we are a federal union, and under a written Constitution, I shall refer to the British North America Act, which describes our legislative powers. Section 18 is as follows:—

“The privileges, immunities, and powers to be held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that the same shall never exceed those at the passing of this Act, held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons

Hon. Mr. Wilmot.

House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the members thereof.”

I shall also refer to the statute defining the privileges, immunities and powers of the Senate and House of Commons. It says;—

“The Senate and the House of Commons respectively, and the members thereof respectively, shall hold, enjoy and exercise such and the like privileges, immunities and powers as at the time of the passing of the British North America Act, 1867, were held, enjoyed and exercised by the House of Commons and the House of Lords respectively, etc., etc.”

Now, I think our rights are defined by statute clearly enough. We are not governed in that particular by the Constitution of Great Britain. We have powers that the House of Lords have not got. We have the same powers that exist in the House of Commons, except in so far as restricted by the British North America Act—that is, we could not initiate money Acts—and if we are to keep up this Federal union, we had better guard, in this branch of the Legislature, the rights of the smaller Provinces. We have the right to see the lease which the Government proposes to make, and judge of it beforehand, not after everything is done. My hon. friend from Lambton says, in the Pacific Railway Act of 1874, the rights for which we now contend were not insisted on. I made the same charge against the previous Government that I do against this—that in the last two or three days of the Session they bring in their most important measures. They might as well throw a cartload of documents on the table and expect us to swallow them wholesale. I object to that, and I am satisfied that, had it been known at the time by the Senate what the Government were empowered to do by that Act, it would have been rejected. I think it is more a charge against the Government of the day for keeping those things back, than it is against this Parliament for passing them. I shall most decidedly vote for the resolution moved by the hon. Senator from Kingston, and I shall not be influenced in the slightest degree by the consequences which may result from this amendment.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I think we would be recreant to our duty in this House to the public did we allow ourselves to be deprived of our constitutional rights in the way sought at the present moment. I believe we not only have precedent and practice, but constitutional right for what we have done. It is attempted to lease the public property of the Dominion without the sanction of one branch of the Legislature, and the Act of 1874 passed inadvertently in the last days of the Session, has been cited as a precedent. If we yield in this matter we will furnish another precedent to be cited against ourselves. After the manner in which this House has denounced the conduct of the Government in regard to the Pacific Railway, we would be liable to censure if we gave them further power to act without being controlled by both branches of Parliament. If we give up our rights on this occasion the Government may lease the whole of the Pacific Railway without the sanction of the Senate. The hon. Senator from Lambton has talked a great deal of the injury which will be done to the Province of Manitoba if we insist upon our amendment. I am sure every member of this House would hesitate to do anything to injure that Province; but I do not think anything of the kind will result from our action. The hon. Senator from Lambton tells us, if we did not part with our constitutional privileges what he would do—that he would act the despot and sacrifice Manitoba rather than concede to us what we believe to be our rights. I believe the Government has more patriotism than that. I have yet more faith in their sense of justice than to believe they would sacrifice the interests of Manitoba sooner than concede to us our constitutional rights. It has been shown in the case of the Windsor Railway transfer to the Western Railway Company that not merely the lease but the running powers required the sanction of this House. It was the same in the case the Pictou and Truro Railway transfer. In that case the present Government came to us not only for power to dispose of that railway, but to make temporary provisions for running it. Therefore the hon. Senator from Lambton is mistaken when he says we have no precedent for the demand we make. Considering that the policy of the Government throughout has not been such as to meet the approval of Parliament, I think we would be recreant to our duty if we divested ourselves of any power we have to supervise and control everything belonging to the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think this is hardly a matter upon which this House ought to take a stand. It is not one of those questions upon which we should base a great fight for our privileges and dignity. Practically looked at it means this—the Government propose to enter into a contract with certain gentlemen for the construction of a railway, and the Government propose, in consideration of their constructing a road to our border, to allow them a lease of some few miles of road in the Province of Manitoba, for a period of ten years, under regulations made by the Government for the protection of the interests of the people of this country. The Government are just now about to go to the electors, and they say that this lease or agreement which they are to enter into shall be submitted, not to the present House of Commons, but to the House of Commons which comes fresh from the people.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND—The Bill does not say that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hon gentlemen know the election will be before the next meeting of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND—We do not know that there will not be another Session of this Parliament.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We deal with things that are probable.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND—There is nothing in this Bill which says the lease must be submitted to the next House of Commons. We do not know anything about the future Houses of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I will suppose a case—and it is supposing a case which is the only possible one I think. Suppose that after the general elections this House should condemn the lease, and the other House were to approve it, this House would be obliged to recede in the end.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—This assertion has been made on the other side of the House two or three times. The hon. gentleman supposes of necessity the Senate will disapprove of the lease—we may approve of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—While I do not think that this is a matter worth making a fight on, for the dignity of this House, I think the consequences to the country will be very serious indeed should we insist upon this amendment, and ought to make this House pause. Just now immigrants are pouring into the Province of Manitoba at a very rapid rate—something like one thousand a week. Supposing that there should be a bad harvest, or anything should happen in that Province to cause distress, the difficulty of getting supplies to that rapidly increasing population would be very great, unless railway communication were established. This company proposes to give that communication during the present season. Now, if this amendment is adhered to by the Senate, and the Bill passes with the amendment, it of necessity defers the construction of that road for another year.

Hon. Gentlemen—Why?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The reason is very simple. The Bill as amended provides that no arrangement shall be binding until it shall have been submitted to and approved by both Houses of Parliament. No company is likely to go to the expense of building seventy miles of railway under such circumstances.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND—According to the hon. gentleman's argument the House of Commons should not have the right to pronounce upon the lease.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think there is a great deal of force in what the hon. gentleman has said; but we are simply aggravating the case. There is this to be remembered,—certain gentlemen in this House, and very prominent gentlemen too, have, during the course of the debate here, at a former stage of the Bill, given expression to opinions which went to show that they, at all events, would not approve of any agreement of the character proposed by the Government. The hon. Senator from Saugeen, who is one of the leaders of the Opposition in this House, in his speech which he delivered on this subject the other day, certainly intimated in the plainest possible manner that he disapproved of the whole scheme. Another hon. gentleman from Toronto endorsed those views.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I stated most emphatically, if the Government entered into a lease, I would be most anxious to approve of it, if it were in the interests of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not remember those words. But the hon. gentleman's conviction of the impropriety of the arrangement would be likely to overpower his anxiety to sustain the Government. I think it is quite clear that the consequences of the action of the Senate may be very serious indeed. The almost certain consequence is that, if the Bill passes as amended, the road will not be constructed until after the next meeting of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—That would be very unpatriotic on the part of the Government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the Government had to build the road, it would be.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—It is the Government that has to build the road.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The road which is to be constructed does not extend within our borders more than seven or eight miles, while there are seventy miles to be built south of the border. No company composed of prudent men, looking at the course which the Senate has taken on the question of the Pacific Railway, and at the expression of opinion from the hon. gentleman from Saugeen, and the hon. Senator from Toronto, would risk money in such a matter. I think, myself, the Government were to a certain extent in error in making the validity of this lease depend upon the action of the House of Commons. The Government are charged with the administration of the public affairs of this country, and they are responsible to the House of Commons and to the people for that administration. If after the Government had done what they thought best in the interests of this country, their action did not meet with the approval of the House of Commons then they would have to suffer the consequences ; but I think they should not be hampered by such a provision as this. While the House of Commons are responsible to the people, and have a certain claim to be called upon to ratify this lease, the Senate are not responsible to the people, and I do not think they have any strong claim to be consulted in the matter. Certainly, the Government are not responsible to this House, and it would upset our whole theory of responsible government if things done by the Government of the day, in the legitimate exercise of their functions, were to depend upon the will of this House. Government would become impossible altogether unless the two Houses were in accord, and the result would be steps would be taken, which would be successful, to so alter the constitution of this House as to bring it into harmony with the other branch of the Legislature. The hon. Senator from Kingston, in speaking on this matter, dealt with certain precedents, and among others he referred to the Georgian Bay Branch, which was hostile to his view. He undertook to draw a distinction between it and the present case, but to my mind the distinction does not appear to be at all clear. In both cases the Government were dealing with roads which were branches of the Pacific Railway. The Georgian Bay Branch, as its name indicates, is a branch of the Pacific Railway. It has been treated as such in the legislation of the country, and it is, in my opinion, quite as much a part of that great enterprise as the Pembina Branch. I do not think the precedents cited by the hon. gentleman and others are quite in point. Some of them were cases in which documents had to be laid on the table of the House of Lords, but the fact is the Government never undertakes to withhold any paper asked for, and the difference between this case and a great many cases referred to by the hon. Senator from New Brunswick is, the papers were laid on the table after the action was taken ; therefore the action of the Government did not depend for its validity on the sanction of the Upper House. If the conduct of the Government did not meet with the approval of the House, it could pass a vote of censure upon them. The case of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway has been cited by the hon. Senator from Kingston, and other gentlemen on that side of the House, but it differs entirely from this. The Windsor Branch was being given away absolutely. Resolutions were passed in the House of Commons, but there was no bill, as in this case. The resolutions were not sufficient in themselves for the transfer of the road. They simply authorized the Government to enter into negotiations for the transfer. The Government did enter into those negotiations, and the transfer having been arranged for, the act of the Government was legalized by the Bill which had to receive the assent of both Houses of Parliament. In this case, the Bill comes before the arrangement. The case of the Pictou and Truro Branch Railway was of a similar nature. In that case, property to the value of $1,500,000 was transferred to a company under resolutions adopted by the House of Commons, and it was after the arrangements had been made that the Bill was introduced and submitted to us.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD—The resolutions were passed in the Senate, authorizing the Government to negotiate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The only case, to my mind, which appears to be in point, is the Allans' contracts, but, I think, possibly, the reason they were submitted to this House, was the fact that the hon. gentleman who was at the head of the Post Office Department at that time, was also the leader of the Government in this House.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—That was not the reason they were submitted in both Houses.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As to the fearful consequences which might flow from leasing this road for ten years, I cannot agree with the hon. gentlemen opposite. In the first place, the Government have, by their conduct, shown that they are not willing to come to the views of the gentlemen, who wish to lease the road, as a matter of course. They have been obliged, as the hon. Secretary of State tells us, to abate the demands they made at first. The worst that can be done is to lease the road for ten years, on the best terms the Government can make. Some hon. gentlemen think it should not be longer than five years, but the road from Fort William to Winnipeg will probably be completed within five years, and after that there will be competition, and it is quite clear the country will not suffer a great deal from any extortion on the part of the company which will have control of the Pembina Branch. There is only one other fact which is worthy of consideration in connection with this subject, and that is, that the division in the House of Commons was very strong against accepting the amendment of this House: it was 92 to 32.

Hon. Mr. MACFARLANE—The House was not full by any means.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It was a snap vote.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is a circumstance which ought to carry weight with this House.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman, I am sure unintentionally, misstated my views to the House. I stated very distinctly that I would have preferred that the Government, after completing the railway, should have kept it in their own hands, and have made arrangements with any company that would build to the frontier. I think that would have been the best course in the public interest; but the Government ask for power to make a lease, and if that lease were laid on the table, I should look to its merits as a lease, and not in any other respect—and certainly that is all I should or would do.

The House divided on the motion, which was adopted on the following division:—

LIQUOR TRAFFIC REGULATION BILL.

CONCURRENCE IN AMENDMENTS.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons by their Clerk to return the Bill intituled: "An Act respecting the Traffic in Intoxicating Liquors," and to acquaint this House that they have passed the said Bill with several amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved concurrence in the amendments.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Is there no provision about the working of the Bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I see there is an item in the Supplementary Estimates of $5,000 to meet it.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Is it left to the discretion of the Executive who shall be paid, and what amount shall be expended?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT — I have made a very careful estimate, and in a very large county it would be less than $500.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—One would suppose there would be an amendment made in the House of Commons showing how much the returning-officer, constable, and other officials should get. That should not have been left without some provision.

The amendments were agreed to.

The House adjourned at 10:15 p.m.

PILOTAGE REGULATIONS IN NOVA SCOTIA.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

Hon. Mr. MILLER moved :

“That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to cause to be laid before this House, copies of all Pilotage rules and regulations made by the Commissioners of Pilots for the Ports of Pictou, Sydney and North Sydney, and approved by the Governor-in-Council.”

He said he had made this motion because he desired to learn precisely what were the actual pilotage rules, orders and regulations, at certain ports in the Province of Nova Scotia, namely, the ports of Pictou and Sydney. He had asked for the Arichat returns a few days ago. Until very recently there was no pilotage system at the latter port, and the want of pilots there had never been a subject of complaint either by local ship-owners or others. Why he considered pilots were not required at the port of Arichat, he would state to the Senate before he resumed his seat. He would first speak with respect to the pilotage systems of the ports of Sydney and Pictou. Hon. gentlemen were aware that these are the two chief coal ports in Nova Scotia. Many years ago, before he (Mr. Miller) was a member of the Provincial Legislature, loud and serious complaints were constantly heard of the injustice of the pilotage tax on vessels visiting these ports in the prosecution of the coal trade. Year after year the subject had been brought before the Legislature, and the unfairness exposed of placing a pilotage tax on vessels whose masters, many of them with an experience of a quarter of a century of constant navigation of these harbors, were in no need of the assistance of pilots, and therefore should not pay towards their support. But the local authorities had, under the law, the control of the subject; they did just as they pleased, and always paid more regard to the wishes of the pilots than to the just grievances of the ship-owners. These vessels were obliged to pay half pilotage rates every time they entered the coal ports, and in the course of a season this tax, for a useless service, amounted to a large sum of money. In many instances the masters and mates were better pilots than those who levied mails on them. It was then contended that the tax was necessary to keep up a system of pilotage, and if that statement were true, it might be a good answer to the disaffected. But it was not true, because the actual demands for pilots were enough to keep up a sufficient staff. The trouble was that the staff was made so large, that the legitimate demand for pilots at all these ports was not equal to their support. This fact had been frequently pointed out, but the local authorities would pay no attention to it. In 1864, he (Mr. Miller) procured an amendment of the pilotage law of Nova Scotia, under which every master and mate of a provincial vessel, who was qualified to navigate his vessel into any of the coal ports, when engaged in the coal carrying trade, should be entitled to receive a license as a pilot, which exempted the vessel of the holder from all liability to pilotage fees. This provision had been completely set aside at both the ports of Pictou and Sydney, by the power given to the Commissioners of pilots to make rules and regulations, to be approved of by the Government, in regard to pilotage matters at these ports. Under these regulations, it would be almost as well for a ship master to pay the pilots' fees, as to take a license now. Such regulations should never have been approved by the Government, but the fact was that the powerful political influence of the members for Pictou had induced the Government to approve them, while the coal carriers had no one to urge their views and protect their interest before the Government. Their interests had been silently and shamefully neglected by those whose duty it was to prevent them becoming the victims of the present unjust means resorted to, in order to impose taxation on them for the benefit of the pilots. In former days when the ship-owners complained so loudly of this grievance, the coal trade was prosperous, and all engaged in it were making money, and everyone knows when people are doing well they submit to a good deal of injustice without complaint. But this was considered so great an imposition that they would not even then submit to it. How must the ship-owners, and especially the coal carriers now feel, when that great industry is nearly paralyzed in all its branches, and it is impossible for those engaged in it to make ends meet, to find such a time of unprecedented depression chosen to re-impose this irritating and unfair tax? It was too bad and should not be tolerated. If he (Mr. Miller) stood alone he would denounce it and protest against it, and it was astonishing to find that no other voice had hitherto been raised against it, not even to the utterance of one word of remonstrance. It was not his duty to specially champion this or any other interest, but he could not refrain any longer from exposing a neglect of duty somewhere in not having this subject brought to the notice of Parliament and the Government, with the view of having the wrongs complained of redressed. He wished to get the necessary papers that he might be prepared next Session to press the subject on the attention of the Minister of Marine. These regulations should be altered to suit the requirements and justice of the case, so that while those who really wanted pilots at any of the coal ports should be compelled to pay for them, those who did not want them should not be taxed to support a larger staff than was necessary. With regard to the port of Arichat, the pilotage system had been applied to that port by the Government during the present year, and he was very sorry for it. He did not believe this step was a wise one, and it had never been considered necessary to create pilots at the Port of Arichat, when the shipping of the port was much larger than now, and when times were much better, and ship-owners would not feel taxation as they do now. Anyone who knew the port of Arichat would say that the present was a strange time to impose additional taxation on its vessels or trade. The vessels resorting to that harbour were chiefly those owned there, or American fishing schooners since the Washington Treaty, calling in for bait and other supplies. During the last few years the latter had resorted very largely to the harbors adjacent to

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Arichat, as well as to Arichat for these purposes. The masters of these vessels did not want pilots; they were good pilots themselves. They had done much good to the fishermen, especially by purchasing in the spring of the year the poor herrings then caught that had only a small market value as an article of exportation. For these poor fish, at the most trying season of the year, after the long winters have exhausted their supplies, the fishermen received a good price in ready cash, which helped to meet their wants in many ways, and enabled them, with fair luck, to keep ahead of their other creditors for the rest of the fishing season. The trade of these American fishermen was a great advantage to this hardy class of our population. Since the establishment of pilotage taxes at the port of Arichat, the masters of these vessels declared they would discontinue their visits to the place, and, if that result should follow, it would be a serious loss to the whole community, and a grave charge against all those, the Government included, who had been the means of creating this new and unnecessary means of adding to the burdens of our trade and shipping interests. With reference to the vessels owned and sailed by inhabitants of the port of Arichat, surely no one would say that the masters of these vessels required pilots to be created? Every one of these men—every man on board of these Arichat vessels down to the cook—was a good pilot for that harbor. The local ship-owners could not have desired the establishment of the pilotage system of that port, because they could not expect to escape being treated as other ship-owners were treated. There could not be one set of rules for local ship-owners and another for outsiders. If such an anomaly were attempted, it would not be allowed to exist long after being brought to public notice. Then there remained the vessels visiting the port of Arichat requiring pilots—very few in number, he was sorry to say, in the absence of any trade, to bring them there—but when any such did come, there never was any difficulty in picking up a dozen fishermen to bring them into port at the shortest notice. The entrance to the harbor was very prominent, and every vessel approaching it could be seen for miles away. The coast was thickly settled, and any signal, at night or in day, would bring on board a dozen trustworthy fishermen long before they were wanted to steer the ship to her moorings. That class of vesse's, therefore, should not have necessitated the establishment of the pilotage system at the Port of Arichat. Why, therefore, was this thing done? He (Mr. Miller) could only come to one conclusion—it was with the hope of making a few votes for the Government candidate at the next election. He was sorry to have to think that such a thing could happen, but many of the ship-owners of Arichat believed the same thing. He felt confident, however, that the Government would be told as soon as the opportunity offered, that it would require something more than the few votes that could be manufactured in this way, to prevent the independent electors of the County of Richmond, in union with the other constituencies of Nova Scotia, inflicting on them the just punishment on their general imbecility and many misdeeds. He wanted all the papers connected with this pilotage business, in all the ports named, and requested that they be given as soon as possible, as the Session was drawing to a close.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he was sorry that he was unable to furnish the information asked for. The best he could do would be to draw the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the subject of the hon. gentleman's complaint. That Minister would be the last one to authorize or approve of regulations which would be harsh, cruel or oppressive to the people affected by them.

The motion was agreed to.

THE HALIFAX FISHERIES COMMISSION.

TRANSLATION OF THE REPORT.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved :

“ That copies of all documents and pleadings relating to the questions decided by the award rendered at Halifax on the subject of the indemnity of five millions five hundred thousand dollars, under the Treaty of Washington, particularly the 22nd and 23rd articles of that Treaty, and copies of all letters and despatches between Her Majesty's Government and those of the United States of America and of Canada on the same subject, since the rendering of the award laid before this House, in return to an Address on the 24th day of April last, be translated into French by persons to be selected for that purpose by the Hon. Messieurs Chapais and Bureau, under the superintendence of the Clerk of the Senate.”

Hon. Mr. Miller.

He said he had made this motion because it was understood that the ordinary translators of both Houses would not have time during the recess to translate such a voluminous document.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT thought there could be no difference of opinion as to the necessity of translating and printing this important document. He was amazed, however, at the concluding part of the motion delegating the right to select the translators to certain hon. gentlemen in this House, inasmuch as the Parliamentary translators, who could not be employed for twelve months of the year, should give their time to this work. They were very handsomely paid, and they should be utilized for such service as this. He was not prepared to say they should not be assisted, but certainly they should devote such time as could be spared to the work. He was prepared to support the resolution so long as the assistance was supplementary to the staff belonging to both Houses.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD said the objection which had struck his mind when the motion was first made, was similar to that which had been expressed by the hon. Secretary of State. If this motion were carried, the whole expense of the translation would be thrown on the contingencies of the Senate. There could be no manner of doubt these important documents should be translated into French; it seemed to him that the work should be done under the control and direction of the Government, and they should make use of the translators of both Houses so far as would be just to them, and so far as their time could be fairly devoted to that purpose. If additional translators were required, the Government could, of course, employ them, and they could be paid in the usual way.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said he had made no observations in moving the resolution, because he thought no objections could be made to it. The hon. Secretary of State seemed to forget that after the Session there wasso much work in the translators, office that French members had generally to wait until the year was nearly over before they could receive French copies of public documents, and had they not been exceedingly reasonable they would have complained of it long ago. Those papers were just as important to the French as to the English members. They were very voluminous, and would make four thousand pages of printed matter. That amount of work could not be done short of sixteen months if it was left to the Parliamentary translators. He had been told by gentlemen of experience that it would be impossible for them to do the work in time to have it printed for next Session, and, therefore, he considered it his duty to make this motion in order to have this report before the public at once. The French members asked this not as a favor, but as their right.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said there could be no doubt that the translation should be made as quickly as possible. He could not say it was exactly within his own knowledge, but he had been informed that no substantial assistance could be obtained from the translators of either House. He had been informed that, before they could get through their ordinary duties, so long a period would have elapsed that this work would have to be thrown over to another year. If that were correct, there would seem to be no alternative but to employ other translators, and the choice of them should be left to the French speaking members. He suggested, not by way of amendment, but simply for the consideration of the hon. gentleman who made the motion, that the translating, or printing, or both, should be done under the superintendence of the Clerk of the House, and the Joint Committee on Printing. Another thing which should be guarded against was, that the translation should be done at the same rate which had hitherto been paid by Parliament, otherwise it might run into a very extravagant expenditure which nobody would regret more than the gentlemen who were looking after the translation. Certainly, if any assistance could be given by the translators of the two Houses, it should be obtained; but he was satisfied that would only delay the publication of the work.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said it was understood that the translation would be done at the ordinary rate. If the House desired it, he would have that stated in the motion.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL suggested that the hon. gentleman should make interest with the Government to put an item in the Estimates to meet the cost of this translation.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said that was the reason he had moved in this matter without giving the usual notice.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS said this matter had been very fully discussed in the Printing Committee. Inasmuch as those papers had been brought down in this House, the Senate would have to bear its share in the translation unless the Government made an appropriation for it. The expense would probably be some eight or ten thousand dollars, but the other House would have to bear its share pro rata to the number of copies it would take, and the same might be said with respect to the Departments. With regard to the translation, the translators of the other House were not likely to have any time, and if they had, as it was extra work, they would have to be paid for it. The Clerk of the Committee had pronounced very distinctly and definitely on that point; there was, therefore, no other course open than the one suggested—to employ outside help.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said, if the expression of the House was, as he understood it to be, in favor of the translation in the manner described, no doubt provision would be made for it, whether the sum was mentioned in the Estimates or not. His observations had been predicated on the assumption that the translators were not employed.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON said he had spent about half an hour looking over the papers and had a very clever expert with him. They had come to the conclusion that it would be necessary to print an English edition of 500 copies, and a French edition of 200 copies. It would make a volume of from 5,000 to 6,000 pages. The translation, at a dollar a page, would cost about $5,000, and the printing would cost

$8,000 or $9,000. All that could be asked of the Parliamentary translators was to translate the ordinary work that came before Parliament. For extra work, they would have to be paid extra. The translators of both Houses were very competent men, and it was likely that, with some assistance, they could accomplish the whole of it under the direction of the Clerk of the House.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to state that the Committee on Printing have no power to order the translation of those documents into French?

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON—We have not.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE wished to know how it was that documents were translated every day, and brought down in French, and he would like, also, any hon. gentleman to point out the clause of the British North America Act, which declared that they had no right to order the translation. If the Printing Committee could not have it printed in French, they could not have it printed in English either. Both languages were on the same footing under the Constitution.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON said the Joint Committee had a right to order the translation of the ordinary documents brought before the House; but this was the report of a commission. If the House adopted the report, provision would be made for the printing.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT thought the Government should take this up as a matter of course. He could see no reason why the expense should come out of the contingencies of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. McCLELAN called attention to the fact that the contingencies had increased since 1867 from $80,000 to $140,000. There had been a steady increase since Confederation.

Hon. Mr. HAVILAND said, as a matter of course, the contingencies would increase. Three Provinces had been added to the Confederation since 1867, and within the last few years the Senate had taken a more active part in the public affairs of the Dominion than in times past.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY TERMINUS AT FORT WILLIAM.

THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

“The House, according to Order, proceeded to the consideration of the second report of the Select Committee appointed to continue the investigation, and to inquire into all the questions relating to the purchase of the property at Fort William for a terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway.”

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—At this late hour of the Session, I must ask the indulgence of the House, because I am sure you have had no time to give that report the consideration to which it is entitled. Yesterday you were invited to consider a report with reference to the Pacific Railway question—the Fort Francis Lock. That report was to the effect that the work done at Fort Francis was unprofitable, and that a large sum of money was uselessly expended upon the lock there. In this time of depression we all regret this waste of public money which, if judiciously employed, might have relieved much suffering and been profitable to the Dominion. The question submitted in the report now before the House is also one of great importance—having reference to the terminus, or rather the beginning of the Pacific Railway. Your Committee has been sitting twenty-nine days consecutively, and examined a number of witnesses. At the beginning no one anticipated the investigation would last so long, but the gentlemen representing the Government on that Committee thought proper to bring a large number of witnesses to justify their conduct, and it was thought necessary to bring other witnesses to furnish evidence on the other side. Every member of the Committee would have been glad to have found the Government justified in their conduct; but they were obliged to report that the expenditure was injudicious and not in the interests of the Dominion. Voluminous evidence was taken—in the first instance in reference to the harbour—whether Prince Arthur's Landing or the Kaminiistiquia River furnished the better terminal point for the Railway. No less than seven or eight mariners of long experience were examined by the Committee, but their evidence was conflicting. The opinion of the Committee is that both are good harbors, with this difference, that the Kaministiquia presents certain difficulties, which necessitate continual dredging at the mouth of the river, while the other harbor could by very little work be made accessible for vessels at all seasons of navigation, while it remains open eight days longer than the other. The Committee goes further, and says the site chosen by the Government on the Kaministiquia is not the right place. We see by the report to the Government, made by Mr. Murdoch, an engineer, employed by them, that there was a place further down the river, towards its mouth, which should have been selected, and which would have afforded better navigation, and which would have remained open later in the season. The gentleman who controls the destinies of the Dominion to-day declares he always accepts the decisions of his engineers. Why he did not do so in this case I cannot imagine, because the place recommended by Mr. Murdoch would have been much better than the one selected. He said in his report that it would have afforded lower levels and a longer navigation in the full of the year. When the Committee arrived at a conclusion as to the terminus, they had to enquire whether the Government had done all that should have been expected of them in the selection of the lands for the terminus. On that, they came to the conclusion that a large amount of money could have been saved by following the wiser course, and not allowing so many speculators to get possession of the lands there. The Government decided upon the terminus in June, 1874; but from that time up to 1876 nothing was done towards securing the lands. If the terminus had been placed somewhere in the vicinity of the McKellar farm, it has been ascertained that a quantity of land could have been bought there on very easy terms, perhaps for $70 or $75 an acre. Through the delay of the Government, speculators were allowed to get possession of the land intended by the Government for the terminus, and all the speculations have been profitable to friends of the Government. It was only in 1876 that valuator were appointed to report upon the value of the lands selected for the terminus. These valuator had to follow the course laid down by the Railway Act of 1868, which provides that, in deciding the value or compensation of such lands, they had to take into consideration the increased value given to them by reason of the construction of this railway. In this instance, a Mr. Brown,—a gentleman who was an associate of Oliver, Davidson & Co.—was appointed to examine the titles and advise the valuator. When asked how they should value the lands, he advised them to do so without allowing for the increased value given to them by the railway going there. We know what the value of that property was before there was any talk of the railway there; the lots having been offered for sale by the Ontario Government for a long time at four dollars each. The speculators bought them up at from $80 to $90 each, and resold them a little time afterwards to the Government for $200 to $300 a lot, and for some eight acres required by the Government, outside the town plot, no less than five to six hundred dollars an acre was paid by the Government. If this property had been chosen at the time it was known where the terminus would be, it could have been secured at a very much smaller price. Another question to which the attention of the Committee was called, was the purchase of the Neebing Hotel. The intention, certainly, never was to open that building for the accommodation of travellers, but rather to make money out of the Government. When the hotel company commenced to construct it they were notified that it was on the land reserved for the railway terminus, and that very likely they would not be entitled to any remuneration for the building; nevertheless they proceeded with its construction and told their informant that they were sure of getting well paid for it; and so they were. They received $5,029 from the Government for the building. And here I must do justice to the valuator. When they reported to the Government they mentioned the fact that the hotel was there, but did not take it upon themselves to put any price upon the building. Oliver, Davidson & Co., however, received the whole amount which I have mentioned without having made any affidavit as to the cost of the building. The House will learn with satisfaction, at all events, that the sum of $500, which would have been lost to the country, having been paid twice over, was refunded when the error was discovered by the committee. It is evident there has been indiscretion somewhere. I do not like to accuse the Government of anything, but either some member of the Government, or one of their employees, has been guilty of indiscretion; because a long time before the public were informed of the selection of land on the Kaministiquia for the terminus, parties in Toronto knew of it, and stated they had received correct information, and that information could only have come from some member of the Government, or some one in the public offices. The result was that those who obtained the information were given a chance to profit largely by speculation. The Committee by a large majority came to the conclusion that the information had leaked out some way. When the report was adopted in the Committee, a resolution was moved in amendment justifying the choice of the Kaministiquia as a harbor, but it did not go further in any way. I do not know if the minority of that Committee are ready to endorse all the rest of the report, which is certainly grave enough, but certainly they did not take exception to any other part of it. I think the House will agree with me that the majority were right in the conclusion at which they arrived; because the report contains nothing which is not founded upon evidence. I must express my regret at having found it my duty during the present Session to condemn the Government so frequently for their administration of public affairs. I hope it will be the last time that such a painful duty will be imposed upon me, because I would be far more disposed to give them a helping hand than to oppose them. Certainly no one would feel happier than myself if I could conscientiously commend their public policy; but I have a duty to perform, and I cannot help saying that I regard the policy and conduct of the Administration of the day as injurious to the best interests of this Dominion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I desire to explain why I think this report ought not to be adopted, and why I think it does not fairly disclose the true position of matters and things that incidentally arose during the investigation. I shall endeavor to be as brief as possible, travelling over merely the general circumstances, leaving the details either to be discussed by other members, or to be elucidated by the testimony of the witnesses themselves. The first point is in reference to the terminus. The hon. gentleman who has moved the adoption of this report, says the Government are condemned because the terminus has been fixed at this particular point on the Kaministiquia. I desire to advert to the evidence showing how and why this terminus was selected, and the persons by whom it was chosen. The first witness I shall submit is Mr. Fleming, in whose evidence, I find the following:

Hon. Mr. Girard.

“ Q. But who located that particular point? The Government selected the terminus of the Pacific Railway on Lake Superior.

Q. Who selected the particular piece of ground? I did; I recommended that particular piece of land, shown on the plan before the Committee, colored red, as the land required for the Pacific Railway.

Q. Did you do that under instructions from the Government? No; the Government selected the spot where the railway should terminate, and I recommended that all this land (pointing to the map where it was colored red) should be secured for railway purposes.

Q. Why did you think it necessary to take up the south-easterly section of the land marked in red on the map? Because it is easier to get it now than it would be fifty years hence.

Q. Did you select all this land on your own mere motion? I have recommended the selection of the land shown red on the map, on my own motion. I was asked by Mr. Mackenzie if it was not too much, and I said that I thought it would be better to err on the safe side and get plenty, as it would be much easier getting it now than in the future, when it would be probably all occupied by buildings. I had felt the inconvenience, more than once, of having a terminus for a railway, and I instanced Halifax where too little land had been taken up in the first place, and the Government had been compelled, subsequently, to purchase more, at an enormous cost. The land at Halifax, I think, originally belonged to the Government, and they very unwisely reserved too little for the terminus there.

Q. At the time you reserved this land at the town plot, you thought it could be obtained for a nominal price? I thought it would cost very little compared with what it would years hence, and what it actually did cost.

Q. You say you selected this land after conference with Mr. Mackenzie; did you ever express an independent opinion as regards this terminus? I am not very clear upon that point, but I think I would have expressed myself the same as I have done to-day, to the effect that this was a better point than Prince Arthur's Landing.

Q. Did Mr. Mackenzie show any special desire to have Kaministiquia selected in preference to Prince Arthur's Landing? Not that I know of.

Q. You say the main reason for selecting it was, it was the shortest available point? It was the point on the navigation of the lake nearest the prairie region of the west, which we would reach by rail. We have navigation at nearer point, but we cannot reach them.

Q. Did Mr. Mackenzie suggest that it was desirable to have an extended water frontage?—I suggested that myself. I am inclined to think that Mr. Mackenzie objected to taking so much land at first; but he yielded to my views after a time, when I pointed out to him how much easier it would be to obtain the land now than hereafter, and if it was not required in the future it could be easily disposed of.

Q. Do you know whether that land could be disposed of—any surplus of it—at a higher figure?—I think it could be very easily disposed of, but it would be very unwise to give it up for the present or for a long time to come.

Now, I think that shows pretty conclusively the opinion of the Chief Engineer, who was bound to give advice to the Ministry. I shall now take Mr. Mackenzie's own evidence given on oath before the Committee, as it properly comes in here on that particular point in reference to the terminus:—

“When we obtained information regarding the work, in the spring we (that is Mr. Fleming, Mr. Trudeau, my deputy and myself), had repeated consultations about it, and my own impression was that it would be better to bring the railway to Pointe des Meurons, that being the head of the deep water navigation in the Kaministiquia River, so as to have the whole length of the river for harbor purposes and save so many miles of railroad. Mr. Murdoch, I understand, had, in the meantime, surveyed a portion of the river bank where it was ultimately located. Mr. Fleming, Mr. Trudeau (my deputy) and myself had frequent consultations about it. I knew nothing technically about the position myself. I had been in the Kaministiquia River and knew generally what sort of a river it was, the formation of the banks, the depth of the water and also the water on the bar. I had that general information, and Mr. Fleming seemed to be quite clear, as well as Mr. Trudeau, that that was the best place to locate it. I coincided with that view, and it was selected with general acquiescence of the heads of the Department: the Chief Engineer; I also understood, the district engineer, my deputy and myself.”

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Q. Your own opinion, however, was that the site should have been higher up than the point ultimately chosen?—Yes; it was my impression, and Mr. Fleming and Mr. Murdoch both said the high banks above would make it practically impossible to get to any point high up on the river bank.

Q. Is that a correct statement of the facts?—I should say, in the first place, while a member of the Ontario Government, we determined to dredge the mouth of the Kaministiquia as being the best harbor; that was in 1872, and that Government did expend $22,000 on that work. With regard to Mr. Fleming's remarks about the navigation there, I may also say up to that time we had Mr. Hazlewood's and Mr. Murdoch's reports. I was wholly in favor of Nipegon myself, and up to the time we had the final consultation late in December, I was still of the impression that Nipegon was the best place to go to, for the reason, if the road could be constructed equally well to Nipegon from Red River, it would be more in the direct line eastward, when that section came to be constructed, than Thunder Bay.”

In the first place, Mr. Mackenzie objected to the Kaministiquia altogether, and then, when he yielded on that point, he thought Pointe des Meurons was the proper place, because it was higher up the river, and so many more miles of navigation would be availed of, for which the country would receive a benefit in shortening the road. He was overruled by Mr. Fleming, and also by Mr. Murdoch, the engineer the hon. gentleman quotes. I shall now refer to Mr. Murdoch's evidence. He is asked when he first went to Thunder Bay, and he replies, in 1872, a year before the change of Government; and the examination proceeds as follows:—

“Q. Had you any conversation with Mr. Mackenzie as to that point?—I had.

Q. Can you give it?—Mr. Mackenzie asked me where the head of navigation on the Kaministiquia was. I said to him the head of navigation on the Kaministiquia was about the west line of the town plot. He asked why I said so; he understood the head of navigation was Pointe des Meurons, ten miles from the mouth of the river. He said he understood from Mr. Fleming and from Mr. McIntyre it was so.

Q. That was the reason for selecting that point—that it was the head of navigation?—

Yes ; I said that Pointe des Meurons could not be the head of navigation."

Remember Mr. Murdoch was a hostile witness to the Government, because they had been obliged to dismiss him in consequence of improper conduct on his part. He came before the Committee and gave his evidence with marked hostility, and yet he gives the following evidence :—

" Q. What were the instructions given you by Mr. Sandford Fleming ?—The instructions given me by Mr. Fleming were that ' I was to commence from the head of navigation on the Kaministiquia River, and locate a line between that and Lake Shebandowan and Lac des Mille Lacs.'

Q. What instructions did Mr. Mackenzie give you ?—Those instructions consisted in commencing that survey from the head of navigation on the Kaministiquia.

Q. Is the located terminus at the head of navigation on the Kaministiquia ?—It is literally at the head of navigation."

Now, here is Mr. Murdoch, who, as I have stated, was a hostile witness, who gives the reason why the point Mr. Mackenzie preferred could not be selected. Up to November, 1874, the Premier opposed the selection of the Kaministiquia ; he thought the terminus should be at Nipegon. He yielded to his officers, and now the insinuation is thrown across the Chamber that he selected Fort William because political friends had got possession of land there. That is what it means in plain English, and that is asserted in opposition to the sworn testimony of the Chief Engineer and of Mr. Murdoch, who was dismissed by the Administration for misconduct, and in opposition to the testimony of the Premier himself. The hon. Senator from Manitoba knows that Mr. Mackenzie was questioned as to whether, at the time of the selection of Fort William was made, he knew a single individual who owned land at that place, and Mr. Mackenzie swore, on oath, that he did not. In the face of that fact the hon. gentleman asks this House to adopt the report of the Committee, because the Government were guilty of corruption in selecting Fort William as the terminus for the purpose of benefiting their friends. Is it right that the Senate should be prostituted for such a purpose ? Is it right that this Chamber should be asked to adopt a report in opposition to the evidence I have read. I think the Senate has gone far enough in investigations of this kind. It was no part of its duty in its past history. I have known something about it, although I had not a seat here, but I had heard of it as being high above political exigencies, that it subserved an independent purpose, and that all Administrations were treated fairly and justly by it. I regret that time has gone by. I feel pained to make the observation, but when a report full of calumny and falsehood is foisted upon—

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Gentlemen—Order, order !

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I make that observation after having given my proof, and not before. I have made no charge without furnishing evidence in support of it. That evidence is in black and white, and the people of this country will be able to judge whether the Government have been arraigned before an impartial tribunal, if that report is carried today by a majority of this House. I make these observations with deep pain and deep regret. No one feels more pained than I do at the present moment that such utterances as have fallen from my lips, are necessary. Is it fair that this report should be foisted on the people of this country as an expression of just and honest conclusions ?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—What is the passage in the report that the hon. gentleman characterizes as a falsehood ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The charge I make is that the report does not fairly interpret the evidence given before the Committee ; that it is falsely asserted Fort William was selected to serve the purposes of friends of the Government.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Where is that stated ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The report may not express it in exact words, but that conclusion is reached. That is the charge made against the Premier. I shall go on and analyze the report, and point out statements in it at variance with the truth. For instance, take the following in the first paragraph of the report :—

"The harbor of Prince Arthur's Landing is only exposed to easterly winds, a quarter from whence gales or squalls rarely blow on Lake Superior. The safety of this harbor was proved in evidence given by Mr. Marks before your Committee, that, of 1,500 vessels which reported at the Custom House at Prince Arthur's Landing since 1869, not one of them had sustained damage, to his knowledge, from storm in the harbor, or had to leave it for shelter. Mr. Kingsford, an engineer of the Department of Public Works, gave a clear and very intelligent evidence before your Committee, and submitted plans for a pier or breakwater, which, for a comparatively moderate sum, would provide the shelter needed to make Prince Arthur's Landing one of the most commodious harbors on the great lakes, and, in point of safety, a perfect harbor of refuge."

Everybody who has been at Prince Arthur's Landing knows it is quite an open place. The Welcome Islands are about twenty miles from the Landing, Isle Royal is about thirty, and Thunder Cape about twelve miles. Yet the report is drawn up with the intention of representing it as a safe harbour, exposed at only one point. I make a specific charge that the report does not fairly interpret the evidence.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—That is a very different charge from saying it is a falsehood.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Kingsford went up there and made a careful survey of both places. Here is what he says in his evidence :

"Q. Which can be made an efficient harbor at the least expense, and be equal to the ordinary traffic that may be anticipated in that section?—I hold that Prince Arthur's Landing should be eighteen feet in depth. If it is conceded that it should be eighteen feet permanently, you make your crib eighteen feet, and you dredge only as the necessities of the harbor require. My estimate for Prince Arthur's Landing is $643,000 for a harbor of eighteen feet and permanent work; but if you only made it fifteen feet, it would be $440,000. If you made a large harbor with a depth of only fifteen feet, it would cost $390,000. If you made a smaller harbor, eighteen feet deep it would be $282,000. You must make the Kaministiquia eighteen feet deep on the bar, and seventeen feet in the river. We have laid off a winding basin at the junction 300 feet wide and 1,200 feet long. It is included in my estimate. By making the river seventeen feet deep, one hundred feet wide, and 200 feet wide through the bar, the cost of dredging would be $81,700. To make it only 100 feet across the bar, it would be $64,000."

One is $600,000; the other is $81,000. Am I not justified in saying that the report does not fairly interpret the evidence?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—No.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—According to my reading of the evidence it does.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—If the gentleman will read the next paragraph he will find annual expenses are contemplated.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He estimates the cost of dredging at $7,400, but that is merely a matter of opinion. Mr. McKellar's evidence satisfied me that the Kaministiquia is not a river that is filling up. There is no evidence whatever to show that dredging would be necessary every year, or that it would take a whole season.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—He says "periodically."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That might be every three or every five years. Mr. Kingsford, further on, says:—

"Q. In your opinion do the two harbours compare, supposing the expenditures you have described were made on them?—I consider the Kaministiquia is just the same as the harbour at Chicago or Milwaukee."

If hon. gentlemen will turn to the evidence of a number of boat captains who had been in the habit of sailing into Chicago for many years, they will see that even now the Kaministiquia in its present condition is equal to what the Chicago River was up to the time the improvements were made. Many of those captains say there is only one harbor at Thunder Bay; that Prince Arthur's Landing is an open roadstead. Lake Superior has an immense sea up on it in a gale, and many of the witnesses stated that vessels with side wheels could not lie at the wharf at Prince Arthur's Landing when there is a stiff wind blowing, but were obliged to go into the river for protection. Any one who has been at Prince Arthur's Landing must know that it is no harbor at all. It is on the lake shore. The Committee state in their report:—

"The length of the season during which the Canadian Pacific Railway can be used to bring the products of the North-West to the marts and shipping ports of the Dominion, will depend upon the navigation of the waters with which the railway will connect. If it is made to terminate upon the bank of the Kaministiquia, its business season will be governed by the navigation—not of the great lakes, but of a sluggish stream of about 350 feet in width. As a rule, the Kaministiquia River closes, according to the evidence given before your Committee, about eight days earlier than Thunder Bay at Prince Arthur's Landing, and the placing of the terminus of the railway on the bank of the river will shorten, by the same number of days, the season during which the harvest of Manitoba can be transported through Canada to the seaboard."

I say distinctly the evidence does not justify such a conclusion.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I can bring intelligent witnesses, four to one, who will prove that the Kaministiquia opens earlier than the other harbor. The only captain who kept a regular log is Capt. Symes, the oldest sailor on the lake. His log is the only written evidence, and is as follows:—

ABSTRACT OF SHIP'S LOG.

"1869. Arrived at Thunder Bay, May 18th. Bay full of ice. No ice in the river. Left Thunder Bay, November 4th. No ice in bay or river.

"1870. Arrived in Thunder Bay, May 8th. No ice in bay or river. Left November 7th. No ice in bay or river.

"1871. Left Thunder Bay, November 27th. Ice making very fast in bay. River frozen; 22 below zero.

"1872. Arrived in Thunder Bay, May 18th. Could not get to the landing for ice; landed passengers in small boats 1½ miles east of Prince Arthur's Landing. River clear of ice. Took in nine cords of wood from Fort William out to the steamer in H B C. Schooner. Left November 15th; no ice in bay or river.

"1873. Arrived at Thunder Bay, May 12th. Bay full of ice from Thunder Cape to Welcome Islands, but clear from Welcome Islands to Prince Arthur's Landing. No ice in the river. Left November 13th; no ice in bay or river.

"1874. Arrived in Thunder Bay, May 16th. Ice from Thunder Cape to Welcome Islands; clear from Welcome Islands to Prince Arthur's Landing. River clear of ice. Left October 13th; no ice in bay or river.

"1875. Arrived in Thunder Bay, May 23rd. Bay full of ice from Thunder Cape to Prince Arthur's Landing; solid ice east of Welcome Islands clear to the west ("Chicora") lying at anchor at the mouth of the Kaministiquia, landing her passengers in small boats at Fort William. She could not get to the landing for ice. Left October 5th; no ice in bay or river.

"1876. Arrived in Thunder Bay, May 19th. Bay full of ice from Welcome Islands to Prince Arthur's Landing. Went up the river and discharged load at Fort William, and returned to Sarnia. Left November 1st; no ice in bay or river.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

"1877. Arrived in Thunder Bay, May 21st; no ice in bay or river. Left October 20th; no ice in bay or river."

My language in speaking of the report of the Committee may have been strong; I admit it was not parliamentary, and therefore I withdraw it, but I ask honorable gentlemen to consider the difficulties I had to encounter from the very beginning with a Committee that was selected for the purpose of condemning the Government in advance. At the time it was appointed, I appealed to the House for fair play, but I was refused it. I said it was monstrous that the Government should be subjected to a trial by a jury of their opponents. I asked nothing more than the lowest criminal in the land was entitled to, but I was refused it.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman is out of order. He has no right to reproach the House with having selected the Committee for the purpose of condemning the Government in advance, because the Committee did not sit with that view.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think on several occasions my hon. friend should have been called to order for the language he has used in the House to-day. It may be a little policy on his part to use that language. If it is, we are prepared to deal with it in the proper manner.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Committee was struck by the House. I rose in my place and stated I did not think it was fair to the Government of this country that a hostile Committee should be selected to pass judgment upon the acts of the Administration; that it was usual for the Government to have a majority on all Committees, but that I would be satisfied if an equality were given to this side of the House. My hon. friends opposite challenged the right which I claimed, and when I named an additional member, to equalize the number the hon. gentleman opposite also named one, and both were added to the Committee, leaving the Government in a minority.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think it was clearly shown on that occasion that the usual course was pursued, and that it had never been the custom to select the majority of a committee from the minority of the House. I do not think the hon. gentleman is right in saying the House selected the Committee for the purpose of condemning the Government.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—While it is perfectly true, as appears by the rule of the House, consideration shall be given in appointing committees to the comparative numbers on the two sides of the House, yet the hon. gentleman may search the whole records of the House of Peers, from one end to the other, without finding a parallel for such a Committee as this—a Committee of general accusation against the Government—and no legislative body in the world would ever have thought of denying the Government of the day a majority in a committee.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—If the hon. gentleman would read the records of the House he would not have indulged in such uncalled for remarks. This Committee was appointed at the suggestion of the hon. Secretary of State himself, and more than that, as anyone will see by referring to the Official Report of the Debates, he suggested the matter should be referred to the same Committee which was closing its investigation of the selection of the route for the Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We all know how the Committee was chosen.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The Committee of which the hon. Secretary of State has been speaking, was the Fort Francis Lock Committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I did not take any exception to the Fort Francis Lock Committee. That was selected in the ordinary way, by a courteous understanding between the hon. gentleman and myself. The next paragraph in that report is that in which the Government are condemned practically, because they did not take the road down from Murillo station to some lower point on the river from the terminus. How did they come to that conclusion? They took a blank sheet of paper and said, "why could you not run a straight line, and cut off that bend by bringing it down to a point below Fort William?" They assumed a straight line should be taken, and, at the same time, there is not a tittle of evidence brought by any engineer that the line was ever surveyed, or that it ever entered anybody's head to suggest it until it was looked at in the Committee room. They then say, and my hon. friend adverted to it, that Mr. Murdoch recommended it should be brought lower down, but Mr. Murdoch did not recommend it to cut off this bend. He was appointed in 1872, and ran the line along the bank of the river, following the general route the Government adopted. But they say Mr. Murdoch recommended to Mr. Fleming that this line should be brought further down, and his argument was, the river would be open some days earlier or later near the mouth. From Mr. Murdoch's evidence, it does not appear that this short line could be taken, or that any exploratory survey of it had been made, and yet the Committee undertake to censure the Government because they did not follow that line. As I have already stated, Mr. Murdoch was a hostile witness. The Government had to dismiss him from their employ some time ago. I found out, in the course of the inquiry, that Mr. Murdoch had a very good reason for wishing to bring the railway nearer the mouth of the river. I found out that in 1873, while Mr. Murdoch was an officer of the Government, he had directed one of his subordinate officers, a Mr. Simpson, a provincial land surveyor, to make a survey at a point below the Hudson Bay Company's Post, on land belonging to the Ontario Government. I produced the field notes and report of Mr. Simpson, and asked Mr. Murdoch in whose pay Mr. Simpson was when this survey was made. He said in the pay of the Government of Canada, and that no reduction whatever was made in his pay for this. The evidence is as follows:—

"Q. Are you aware that Mr. McIntyre sent in an application to the Crown Lands Department for the land in that survey?—I am.

Q. That was in the spring of 1873?—Yes.

Q. Had you and Mr. McIntyre any conversation with reference to it?—Yes, we had.

Q. Was it considered that you were to have a share in the land?—Not necessarily.

Q. Did you never admit to anybody that you expected a share in it?—Mr. McIntyre said he would give me a share in it, but there was nothing drawn out between us to that effect."

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman has omitted one answer. He states distinctly that he did not expect an interest.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Now, could there be any clearer evidence than that? Certainly, Mr. McIntyre did not make a deed of the land to him, or give him a bond for it. He was not such a fool; but do the Committee pretend to say the people of this country are going to be misled by such twaddle as that? The Government are condemned because they did not bring the line down to where Mr. Murdoch and Mr. McIntyre were going to have a speculation, and place the terminus there. Mr. Murdoch was, of course, very bitter against the Government, because we thought proper, in the interests of the country, to dismiss him, and I think the evidence shows we did not dismiss him a day too soon. He opened his bosom, so to speak, to his confidant and friend, another speculator, and told him he had it in for the Government because he had lost $10,000. Mr. Murdoch's explanation is that he lost it in point of salary—that if he had not been dismissed he would have earned $10,000. Now, is this a very likely story? We are asked to believe that, and not only that, but to condemn the Government for not playing into his hands and putting $10,000 into his pocket, and helping Mr. McIntyre. Of course, hon. gentlemen will understand this evidence was very difficult to get at. No witness desires to condemn himself. I knew we had to defeat the designs of a man who had betrayed us, who had been dismissed from the public service and was lending himself to condemn the Government because he was smirking under the very severe censure administered in the loss of his office. I shall now quote from Mr. McClellan's evidence, which, I may state, was given very reluctantly—I had to drag everything out of him:—

"I know, of course, that he had recommended the location of the Pacific Railway terminus at a different place from where the Government had selected it, and I knew it was a grievance between him and the Government. I also knew from what conversation I had with him that he felt very much disappointed and annoyed at his dismissal, and said the Government had not made anything out of it, but he had lost ten thousand dollars."

And this is our model engineer that hon. gentlemen hold out to the people of Canada as the proper person to advise the Government, and are prepared to condemn the Premier because he did not act upon such advice! This House is asked to sustain that report and condemn the Government because they dismissed a man who, on his own showing, wanted to locate the terminus of the Pacific Railway at a certain point in order to put money into the pockets of Mr. McIntyre and himself at a time when he was in the pay of the Government! The next paragraph to which I desire to call attention is the value of the land. During the winter season it was impossible for me to get any witness down to speak of the value of the land. Therefore, during the early part of the investigation, it was assumed, on Mr. Mark's testimony, that the Government could have had Mr. McKellar's land at about $70 an acre. That was taken as the basis of everything, and it got to be at last firmly believed by the Committee. When the navigation opened, I immediately took steps to bring Mr. McKellar here, and ascertain whether he was prepared to give his land for that price. He told us that he had twenty-five or thirty acres cleared in the front, and that his improvements had cost him between $3,500 and $4,500. This is the piece of land that the Committee were told could have been bought at $70 per acre. When asked if he had offered to sell it in 1874, he replied "I never proposed to sell it," and he proceeded to show that in the winter of 1875 he was paid for lots on his farm at the rate of $1,100 and $1,200 per acre, double the average rate paid by the Government for lands at Fort William. In 1876, the time the arbitrators were there, he was getting $1,200 to $1,300 per acre, and for a lot owned by his sister in the town plot, which was taken by the valuers, he had been offered in the winter of 1875 by private parties, $500 to $600 per acre. He declined to sell, and the valuers took it under the statute, and he lost from fifty to a hundred dollars on it. He says he knew in 1872 the Pacific Railway would either be on one side of him or the other, because the surveys were going on there, and he had a motive in putting a higher value on his property since then. In reference to Oliver, Davidson & Co., the Committee state here that a short time before, the Ontario Government had sold lots in the town plot for four dollars each, or something like that, when in fact the Ontario Government had sold some of those lands twelve or thirteen years ago—as far back as 1865. At the time I was Commissioner of Crown Lands, I do not think the Crown owned ten lots in Fort William. That was in 1873. Certainly, the larger portion of the purchases had been made anterior to 1872. Yet this report says a short time before the Ontario Government were selling those lots at four dollars each.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Where does that appear?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The words used are “previous to that,” while the evidence of Clark and Savigny shows that the land was selling at very much higher rates. Then, I think there is an insinuation that the Government conveyed in some way information to friends of their own where the terminus was to be. The paragraph is as follows:—

“After having heard and weighed the evidence which has been adduced during the enquiry, your Committee find it difficult to believe that the persons who enriched themselves at the expense of the people of Canada, had not in some way ascertained, in advance of the public, that the Government had determined to locate the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway on the town plot of Fort William.”

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—That does not accuse the Government.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—Who is it?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—It may mean that those parties who enriched themselves had some friend in the Crown Lands Department at Toronto.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—Why not state so?

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—It seems to me it is so stated.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Committee think proper to quote a letter to Mr. Pardee as an intimation that the lands were to be reserved for railway purposes, and that after that they were sold to private individuals.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Where is that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Committee point to the evidence of Clark and Savigny as though their statements were conclusive, although they are flatly contradicted. Clark swears that Savigny was present when Davidson had an interview with him in the fall of 1874, and showed him a plan of the railway terminus, which he said he got from a very high authority, and it is conveyed by one of those witnesses that Mr. Mackenzie was the high authority.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—There is nothing of that kind stated in the report.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is conveyed in the report.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Where is that brought out?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The evidence of Clark and Savigny is met positively by Mr. Davidson, who swears it to be absolutely untrue, and he goes on to show how it is untrue. He says he did not get the information until 1875, when the plan was fyled.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—That is in the report.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What I complain of is that the Committee was not justified, where the evidence of two witnesses on one side was met by the undoubted testimony of three on the other side, and when Clark and Savigny did not agree on an important point (as to both being present on the occasion they speak of), in giving so little prominence to the evidence of the Premier, Mr. Davidson, and Mr. Leys.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—The evidence of all three is given. The statements on both sides are given.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do think it was unfair to give that prominence to the evidence of such men as Clark and Savigny, inasmuch as the statements on the other side were supported by collateral evidence. We have evidence to show the plan was not fyled until the 14th of December, that it was Mr. Leys first communicated to Mr. Davidson that he knew where the railway terminus was supposed to be, when it was open to the whole world. No advantage could have been gained by any one individual, and we have the absolute testimony of Mr. Mackenzie that he never communicated the information to any individual soul. Is the Premier going to be contrasted with a couple of land jobbers? Clark says Savigny was present at the alleged conversation with Davidson; Savigny swears he was alone and got it confidentially—that Clark was not present at all—so I practically broke down those two witnesses. The whole gist of the charge is that Oliver, Davidson & Co., were friends of the Government, and that the Government located the terminus at Fort William for their benefit. What is the fact? Oliver, Davidson & Co. invested $100,000 in a mill at the mouth of the Kamistiquia River in 1872. I believe Mr. Brown's law partner is a Conservative and Chairman of the Conservative Club in London. He had an equal interest with Mr. Brown in his share. Oliver, Davidson & Co. invested money as any other firm would have a right to do. Mr. Brown swears they had a larger interest at Prince Arthur's Landing than at Fort William. They invested $13,000 at Sault Ste Marie and bought a large quantity of land at Nipegon under the impression the terminus would be there, showing that, to their minds, at all events, that was the proper place for it. They had also bought largely on the south shore of Lake Manitoba, believing, as the hon. Senator (Mr. Girard) does, that to be the true route for the railway. They were mistaken in two or three places. I venture to say their speculation of $13,000 at the Sault is worth very little, from what I know of it. But we have testimony which, I think, should be considered conclusive—the statement of the Premier that he did not know the owner of a single lot at Fort William. I suppose I knew as much as any member of the Government was likely to know on that point, having been Commissioner of Crown Lands, and I could not tell who was interested in land at Fort William.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—The report does not say to the contrary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It insinuates that the Government had put the terminus

Hon. Mr. Scott.

there to serve their friends. That is what was directly charged against the Government by the hon. Senator from Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—I said it gave them a chance.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. gentleman said the friends of the Government had benefited by the location of the terminus at Fort William.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I deny emphatically that only the friends of the Government were benefited. I do not think that we could have bought lands in any part of the country where friends of the Government would not have been benefited, because the friends of the Government are very numerous.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At the same time friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite were benefited, but they are kept in the background, because the word "job" would not apply otherwise.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Where the hon. Secretary of State does injustice to my hon. friend from Manitoba is in saying he charged the Government with conniving at it. He did nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I ask if the Queen's English could be tortured in such a way as to point to any other conclusion? You say the terminus was located in the wrong place, and you say the friends of the Government benefited by it. The only inference that can be drawn from that is that the object in locating the terminus there was to benefit their friends. I confess, when I read that report first I was shocked, and expressed myself in a way that caused changes to be made in it, and it is not so objectionable now as when it was first presented to the Committee. I shall simply say, in conclusion, that the Premier, as the evidence shows, was practically forced to select this piece of land for the terminus. He protested against the site, in the first place, and afterwards against the amount of land that was taken. He was overruled by Mr. Fleming, who said: "You will have to buy it at a much higher price in the future." If it is thought we have more land than is necessary, we can sell half of it for more than the whole of it cost us, and have a terminus for nothing, that will do us for the next twenty years.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not prepared to say that is not the true policy, notwithstanding what Mr. Fleming thinks. The Government did what any Administration would do—tried to find two honest, fair men who would deal between them and the owners of the land. Mr. Mackenzie wrote to Mr. Pardee to recommend a man who knew the land. He sent for Mr. Wilson, a life-long Conservative, who had surveyed the lands there, and associated with him a Mr Reid, of London. The Government lost all sight of it when it was delegated to gentlemen who were supposed to be respectable and who knew all about the subject. The valuers went about their work in the ordinary business way. Some hon. Senators seem to think the proper way would have been to arbitrate. The experience I have had of arbitrations—and I have bought right-of-way for railways—has been that, whether it be a Government or a company, the purchaser always suffers, and it is always better to make bargains in advance. I asked Mr. Reid if he thought the Government had made a better bargain of it than if they had submitted the matter to arbitration. He said, certainly not, or he would have done so. It is assumed that Mr. Brown was an interested party who was the legal adviser of the arbitrators. The evidence on record is this: Mr. Brown was employed simply to examine the deeds; but the Committee say, "you should have instructed him as to what he should not have done." What did Mr. Mackenzie do when he heard Mr. Brown was interfering with the arbitrators? Would it not have been only fair to Mr. Mackenzie to have put that letter in the report?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—If the hon. gentleman had said so in the committee, the letter would have been put in the report. It is referred to in the report, and it is in the evidence.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Here is what Mr. Mackenzie wrote:—

"(Copy)

"OTTAWA, 2nd August, 1876.

"SIR,—I am informed by the valuers at Fort William that you gave an opinion that no legal notice of the intention of the Government to take possession of certain parcels of property had been given.

"When the valuers were informed they could consult you on any difficulty in titles, it was certainly not the intention of the Department to submit to you the interpretation of an Act of Parliament, but simply to render any legal help in the routine business they might find necessary to ask. The opinion you did give, is repugnant to the law and contrary to the interests of your employers, (and, of course, is in the interests of the former owners of the land,) who took possession of it in January, 1875.

"Your duty was simply and solely to see that titles proffered were good and sufficient before payment could be made to the owners.

"I understand, also, that you are personally interested in some of the lots to be conveyed. Of course, the titles of such lots cannot properly pass to us except through the hands of another solicitor.

"I shall await your explanation before adopting any new course. In the meantime I have directed the Secretary of this Department to request you to take no further action in the business.

"I am, sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"(Signed) A. MACKENZIE.

"P. J. BROWN, Esq.,

"Ingersoll."

Would it not have been fair and just to Mr. Mackenzie, when less important matters appear in this report, to have quoted that letter?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—It is noticed in the report.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It ought to have been prominently set forth in the report, and attention ought to have been called to the fact that, when Mr. Mackenzie found what Mr. Brown had been doing, he at once snubbed him, and in a way that professional men are not accustomed to, yet we are told that Mr. Mackenzie was playing into the hands of Oliver, Davidson & Co.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—If the hon. gentleman will look at page five he will find an extract is given from Mr. Mackenzie's evidence.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I must apologize for having gone at such length into this matter. There are a great many other things to which I would like to call attention. I do not think the report is a fair one. Part of the evidence is taken that meets the views and feelings of the hon. gentlemen who drafted it, and the rebuttal testimony is either kept in the background or it is not considered of sufficient importance to outweigh and overbalance the views which the hon. gentlemen wish to put before the House in this report. I daresay I have made, in my observations, some remarks which I should not have allowed to escape me, but the House has been very lenient with me, I must confess, and I am ready to withdraw any unparliamentary expressions I have used. But I must say I am justified, under the circumstances, in showing some feeling. I think it is unjust to attack the Premier of the country in this way.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—In what part of the report is the Premier attacked?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All through, the insinuations are in that direction.

At 2 o'clock p.m. the House adjourned during pleasure.

The SPEAKER took the chair at 3 o'clock, p. m.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY TERMINUS AT FORT WILLIAM.

THE DEBATE CONCLUDED.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—I desire to make a few explanations in reply to the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State. I was sorry to see him lose his usual good temper and fall upon me in a way that I feel I did not deserve. I never said the Premier's word should not be accepted as true, and if my words conveyed any such meaning, it was due to my defective knowledge of the English language. It is not the first time the hon. Secretary of State has endeavored to give a false interpretation of my words. Mr. Mackenzie is my political opponent, but I know what is due to the Premier of this country, whoever he may be. In my remarks on the motion which I have submitted to the House, I endeavored to make no statement which was not borne out by facts, and I am not ashamed of anything I have said. I am prepared to let the public decide between the Government and their opponents in this matter, and I have not the slightest doubt as to what the verdict will be. Is it my fault that the railway policy of the Administration has been a succession of jobs and blunders? I have nothing against any member of the Government personally, but I cannot conscientiously support men whose policy is so injurious to the country. As far as I can remember, the only allusion made to the Premier during the discussion, was that he had not accepted the report of Mr. Murdoch, one of the Government engineers, and the expression I made use of was, that it was to be regretted he had not done so. It was on that slender foundation the hon. Secretary of State made his assertion; but I suppose he was speaking for the outside public rather than for this House. I only wish the whole of this debate could go before the public, and then the public would not be misled by the interpretation the hon. Secretary of State has put upon the statements of hon. gentlemen in this House.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Perhaps it would be just as well in considering this report, to ascertain what was the cause of the appointment of this Committee. It will be within the remembrance of most hon. gentlemen of this House, that in asking for certain papers in reference to the dredging of the shoal at the mouth of the Kaministiquia, last year, I referred to a document that had been brought down to this House, and which at that time was printed, showing the cost of the lands purchased for the terminus at Fort William. In that speech before the House I made these remarks: I referred not only to the price paid for the land, which I considered extraordinary and exorbitant, but also to the fact that these lands had been purchased the summer before for four dollars a lot, and that although some of them might have changed hands their intrinsic value was not increased at all—that the value was given to them by the railway. I also referred to the fact that a good many of those lands were held by Oliver, Davidson & Company, and not only that, but the Neelby Hotel had been erected there after the ground had been selected by the Government, and after the parties must have known that the reservation had been made. The Secretary of State, feeling he could not meet the force of the statements, because they were true, suggested at that time that I should accept a committee and prove the statements I had made to the House. I shall read what he said in referring to the information about the dredging. He said there was no objection to the papers coming down, and he added :—

“The statement that these lands had been purchased at $4 per acre, and sold to the Government afterwards at $500 per acre, was not true to the extent the hon. gentleman supposed. Some of these lands might have been purchased from the Ontario Government years ago at low prices, but in many instances they had changed hands frequently, and at prices quite as high as the valuers had placed upon them. He suggested that this matter might be investigated by the same Committee that was now engaged in enquiring into the best route for the Pacific Railway. It was a duty the hon. gentleman owed to the country, if he believed the valuers to be guilty of fraud, to have them examined and this matter thoroughly investigated.

“Hon. Mr. Aikins—I did not say they had committed fraud.

“Hon. Mr. Scott said if the charges against them were true they had committed fraud.”

That is, that they had paid five or six hundred dollars for lots which had shortly before been purchased from the Ontario Government for four dollars a lot. Then he goes on to say, that if I asked for a committee, he would second the motion. He has not only fallen foul of that Committee, but also of the House, because it refused to alter the names on that Committee at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Allow me to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the Official Report of the Debates, and to show him that if he had not allowed his feelings to get the better of his judgment, his memory would have served him better. I find, in reference to the appointment of the Committee to inquire into the communication with the North-West, a question did take place as to who should constitute that Committee, which was asked for by the hon. Senator from Manitoba (Mr. Girard). The hon. Secretary of State said it was quite unprecedented for an Opposition to have a majority on such a committee; but the Committee was appointed, and it had about got through with its work, when the hon. Secretary of State was so well satisfied with the manner in which the Committee conducted the investigation, that he was quite willing this reference should be made to it, and he actually suggested it himself. He has nothing to complain of now, and certainly no ground for making the charge that the House refused to allow any one who had been suggested by the Government to be appointed to that Committee. The reference was to inquire into the lands purchased on the Kaministiquia. The hon. gentleman to-day would leave the impression on the House that, had that Committee dealt fairly with him, or had the opportunity been afforded him, he would have brought evidence to fully establish—more than establish—the ground he had taken that the Government had not paid too much for these lands, but had acted fairly throughout this whole matter, and that the best point had been selected for the terminus.

Hon. Mr. Aikins.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not say the Committee had prevented me.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—The hon. gentleman said he had not an opportunity of calling some witnesses.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said I could not call Mr. McKellar during the winter.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—The hon. gentleman said, when the reference was made, that three witnesses would be all he need call before the Committee to satisfy them and the House his statements were correct, and he named those witnesses. They were Mr. Sandford Fleming, and the two valuers; but the hon. gentleman has called no less than twenty-one witnesses.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—To meet evidence on the other side.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—The number of witnesses called on the other side was only ten, and some of those would not have called had not the hon. gentleman brought down several lake captains. It was not my intention to call any until those captains were summoned to give evidence on a point that was not referred to the Committee. The Committee then decided other witnesses should be heard on the other side. The hon. gentleman called twenty-one witnesses, and I have no hesitation in saying those witnesses established everything I stated on the occasion of the appointment of that Committee. The Secretary of State says that this report misrepresents the facts, and he takes exception to nearly every clause in it. With regard to those two harbors,—Prince Arthur's Landing and Kaministiquia—I think the report very fairly presents their comparative advantages, and that the evidence will sustain the finding of the Committee. More than that, I do not think there is one statement in this report which is not based on evidence given during the investigation. The Committee say, either the Landing or the River would make an excellent harbor—the Kaministiquia by dredging, and Prince Arthur's Landing by a moderate expenditure on permanent work. I think it would be just as well for us to enquire into what the Kaministiquia has really cost us in dredging up to the present time. I find by the report of the Minister of Public Works for 1876, that it was expected to have made the channel through the bar thirteen feet deep and fifty feet wide, during that season. We find that dredging did proceed in 1876 and 1877, and there is now a channel of fifty feet wide and thirteen deep. I think the Secretary of State will not object to the evidence of Mr. Kingsford, which was given very fairly. Mr. Kingsford says, in his evidence, the expense for last year was $8,050—that was the season of 1876—and the expense for 1877 was $10,000. He says, in order to complete the work—that is forty-four feet wide, and thirteen feet deep—would involve an expenditure of $10,000 more. Now, bear in mind that over $8,000 was expended in 1876, $10,000 last year, and $10,000 more will be required this year, making $28,000; and that the Ontario Government expended $22,000, which makes $50,000 already spent to obtain a cut through this shoal fifty feet wide and thirteen feet deep. Now, it is necessary that we should understand really what that work is going to cost us to make the Kaministiquia a harbor, in order to compare it with Prince Arthur's Landing. Mr. Kingsford, in his evidence, says, that the cut should be at least one hundred or one hundred and fifty feet wide through that shoal. If it has cost $50,000 to make a cut forty-five feet wide and thirteen feet deep, how much will it cost to make a cut one hundred and fifty feet wide and thirteen feet deep? Mr. Kingsford says it would cost about $64,000 in order to cut through that shoal eighteen feet deep, and in the river to make it seventeen feet deep.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Judging from what has been spent on the shoal already, it is extremely difficult to ascertain how this extra work can be done—to make it five feet deeper and ten feet broader for any such amount. However, these are his figures. It must be taken into account, also, that Mr. Kingsford did not refer in his evidence—because it did not belong to his department—to what it would cost to protect the banks of the river. Gentlemen who were up the river last year, must have seen that the banks are beginning to slip into the river. Mr. Kingsford made no estimate for dockage, but he gives us an estimate of what it would cost to make a pier or breakwater of permanent work at Prince Arthur's Landing, which would answer all the purposes of docks there; and that work he puts at from $280,000 to $600,000—the estimate varying according to the extent of the work. Hon. gentlemen must bear in mind until that railway is completed from Thunder Bay to Red River, there will be very little freight passing through it. It is a matter of very little moment whether the Kaministiquia may be used or the Landing, except for the provisions required by the contractors, and the materials necessary for the construction of the railway. Up to the present time, since Confederation, we have it in the evidence of Mr. Marks, that of the 1,500 vessels that reported themselves at the Custom House at Prince Arthur's Landing, not one to his knowledge, had to leave the harbor or dock from stress of weather. Now, that is certainly a very important statement, but the Secretary of State to-day, leads us to believe that it was impossible to lie there in case of storm—that if a vessel should lie there, it would be lifted on top of the dock by the waves. It appears that only one vessel ever got into trouble there. Captain Symes had in 1874 to leave the dock, but at that time it was only three or four feet high, and he had a side-wheel steamer. The surges lifted the steamer, and the wheels caught on the dock. The question was asked if the dock had been as high then as it is now, would he have left the harbor, and he said "No." That is the only case in which a vessel had to leave Prince Arthur's Landing during bad weather, from 1869 up to the present time, notwithstanding the large number of vessels annually reporting themselves there. Now, I thought that the Committee, in this clause of the report, really put the case very fairly. They stated that permanent work would be required at Prince Arthur's Landing. We know there is no necessity for that work now, because there is nothing to warrant such an expenditure until there is some freight passing over the railway; and that will not be until after the link of 180 miles between English River and Rat Portage is constructed. There is another feature in connection with the Kaministiquia. Mr. Kingsford very frankly admits there would have to be constant dredging there. The hon. Secretary of State says it is not a river that is filling up, and he would lead the House to believe that it is as deep now as ever.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So Mr. McKellar stated, and he took the soundings.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Mr. McKellar is but one of a number of witnesses, and we have to take the whole of the evidence. We have had the evidence of Captain Anderson, and every member of the Committee who heard that gentleman give his evidence must have come to the conclusion he was speaking honestly. He was captain of the steamer "City of Quebec," which he has commanded for three or four years, and which he has taken there one hundred and six times.

Hon. Mr. Aikins.

He went there this spring, and before trying to go up the river he ascertained whether he could enter it or not. He chartered a tug, and took soundings up and down the river, and though he had gone up with the same steamer last fall, he refused to go up this spring, but discharged his freight at the landing. If that cut were as deep to-day as it was last fall, he would not have found it necessary to leave his freight at the Landing.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON—The water is lower this spring by nearly a foot than it was last fall.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—There is the fact at any rate, and with that staring us in the face, and with the evidence of an experienced and intelligent man, that constant dredging will be necessary to keep the channel of that river open, the hon. Secretary of State contends that the Kaministiquia is a superior harbor to Prince Arthur's Landing. As to whether the channel outside will fill up, I cannot say, but a large amount of silt is carried down every year; there can be no doubt of that. The bar in the mouth was formed that way. The hon. gentleman says that the evidence given in favor of Prince Arthur's Landing, was not such as could be depended upon. I think I can appeal to the members of that Committee, to say if the opinions of captains that have been most frequently there, and whose opinions certainly ought to be entitled to some weight, do not sustain the evidence of the inhabitants of Prince Arthur's Landing. We have the evidence of Captain Dick, who has been sailing on Lake Superior for three years in the "Rescue," and who was one of the first captains that had sailed there. However rough the lake might be outside, in the bay it was comparatively calm, and, to use his expression, "the vessel rode like an old shoe," it was so easy. We have the statement of Captain Henderson, for four years master of the "City of Quebec," as follows:—

Q. What is your opinion with regard to the comparative merits of Prince Arthur's Landing and Kaministiquia River, as a harbor? In their present state I would prefer Prince Arthur's Landing, but if the river had what I consider necessary, I think it would make a noble, good harbor.

Q. What do you consider would be necessary to make it that? I consider it would need to be thoroughly dredged at the bar, to at least 200 feet wide, or 250 feet; then pierce and pile on the outside, and a fog whistle established at the outer lighthouse, so that we could find the entrance in foggy weather.

Q. To what depth would the dredging be required? Almost sixteen feet.

Q. With a similar expenditure at Prince Arthur's Landing, for improvements in the shape of a breakwater, how would you compare the two then? Then I would rather go to Prince Arthur's Landing.

Q. Would it be necessary to widen the channel through the bar to a width of 200 or 250 feet, and also dredge the river? I think it ought to be at least 150 feet wide on the bar between the piers.

Q. You think the channel outside the mouth ought to be pierced? Yes.

We have also the opinion of Captain Robertson, who has sailed there four years, and who has been over one hundred times at that place. His statement is, that however rough Lake Superior may be, the moment you get inside Thunder Bay it is perfectly safe, and he never had any trouble at the Landing. Then we have the opinion of Captain Macdonald, who has sailed there one hundred and thirty-six times off and on. He commanded the "City of Duluth," one of the largest vessels on the lake,—that is, calling at the ports on the north shore,—and his evidence is in the same direction. He would give the preference to the Prince Arthur's Landing. On the other side, the hon. gentleman brought a number of captains. Captain Murray has been there thirty-nine times; and then we had three brothers MacMaugh—three brothers who are captains of small vessels, and brought up the railway iron to Thunder Bay. Their opinion is decidedly in favor of the river. One of them was only twice there, another five times, and the other four times. But the evidence of all the captains goes to show this—that so far as Prince Arthur's Landing is concerned, they considered it a good harbor. Captain Symes is the only one who gives the preference to the Kaminstiquia. His vessel is a small boat, and draws but eight or nine feet of water. He can, therefore, go up there with less difficulty than larger vessels experience. He expressed himself very strongly in favor of the river; but an extraordinary thing has occurred to Captain Symes this spring. In his first trip he went to the Landing. He was going up the river on a bright night, the range lights were up, the water was calm, and yet Captain Symes ran aground.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The vessel struck a crib that moved in the winter.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Mr. McKellar does not say it moved in the winter. He says the vessel struck the crib. But a man like Captain Symes, who had been there so often and knew the place so well, on a bright night, without any fog, and with the range lights up, ought not to have stuck fast there if the river was all that he described it. Now, a statement has been made by the hon. Secretary of State with regard to the closing of this river. He says there is not a tittle of evidence to show that the river closes eight days before the harbor does.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I say there is no authentic record kept regularly.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—"No evidence in print," is what the hon. gentleman said.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I contrasted the evidence given by a gentleman who kept a log with the evidence of men who had only their memory to depend on. Captain Symes was the only one who submitted a regular log. I could not stultify myself by saying there was no evidence in print.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—The hon. gentleman left the impression on my mind, and must have left it on the minds of many hon. gentlemen in this House that the only evidence was given by Captain Symes.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—Not at all. I watched the hon. gentleman's statement very closely. He spoke of written evidence as in contradistinction to that which was oral.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—I do not think it is material any way and for this reason, we do not find that Captain Symes left the harbor so very late in the season as to ascertain whether it was frozen or not. He left the latter part of October.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The only time he refers to it the river was frozen.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—We have the evidence of Mr. Dawson who says that the river closes from two to three weeks earlier than the bay. Mr. Marks' evidence is about the same. Then we have the evidence of Mr. Sutherland that the river was frozen when the bay was quite open. Captain Dick was up to Fort William on the 13th November, and at that time the river was frozen, but there was no ice in the bay. We have the evidence of John Clark who took a schooner loaded with lumber down the bay, and actually brought the lumber down from Fort William on the ice and put it on the schooner at the mouth of the river. I think the Secretary of State was scarcely warranted in stating to this House that there was not one tittle of evidence that could be relied upon except that of Captain Symes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All the rest was from memory.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. Secretary of State was misleading the House.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—There is one idea that might have occurred to the hon. gentleman if he was very anxious to know when this river closed—why not ask Mr. McKellar, who lived there for years? The Committee were so thoroughly impressed with the fact that the river closed earlier than the bay that the hon. gentleman did not question Mr. McKellar on the point.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought I had sufficient evidence without questioning him.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Now, as to the terminus; the hon. gentleman took a very strong ground to-day, and he endeavored to make the House believe that the terminus was selected by Mr. Fleming.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I read the testimony.

Hon. Mr. Aikins.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—The hon. gentleman only read part of the testimony. I think any hon. gentleman who reads Mr. Fleming's evidence, can come to but one conclusion. He says the Government selected the spot where the railway should terminate, and that he recommended all this colored portion to be purchased. He (Mr. Fleming) is distinct in stating the Government fixed upon the town plot. Then we have the evidence of Mr. Murdoch, who says that Mr. Mackenzie wanted the terminus to be at the head of navigation. Mr. Murdoch said at once: "If you want to select the head of navigation, then the town plot is the place." And Mr. Murdoch got his instructions based on that, that he was to take the place which was at the head of navigation. That statement was corroborated by Mr. Mackenzie himself.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Coupled with the statement that Mr. Mackenzie thought Pointe des Neurons was the head of navigation.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Mr. Murdoch said the town plot was the head of navigation, and Mr. Mackenzie therefore selected the town plot; but the hon. Secretary of State tried to make a point by saying that Mr. Murdoch received his instructions from Mr. Fleming. Certainly he received his written instructions from Mr. Fleming, and he could have received them from nobody else. The hon. gentleman must have been seeking to mislead the House when he represented that the selection was made by Mr. Fleming. So much with regard to the selection of the terminus. In this report the contention is, that the Kaminstiqua having been selected as the harbor, the best place on that river has not been chosen. The hon. gentleman, in order to break the force of the evidence, impugned Mr. Murdoch's evidence, and represented that the Committee based all their statements upon that evidence. But we have the evidence of Hugh Wilson, one of the valuator, and a man who has known that section of country well for years. In his opinion, I suppose, exercising the common-sense which he has—and inasmuch as he was qualified to act as valuator, he should have been able to select the best place for the terminus—the best site for the terminus was not chosen.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Would you have him locate the terminus ?

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—I would not ; but Mr. Wilson had common-sense enough to know that a place twenty-seven feet above the water level was not the proper place for the terminus. Then we have the evidence of Mr. Savigny, who surveyed the land there ; and more than that, we have Mr. McKellar who gives his evidence in regard to that. He considers that lower down the river is in every way more suitable for the terminus, the bank there being from six to ten feet above the water level, whereas at the town plot the land declines from twenty-seven feet down to about twelve feet, so that in making up trains it would be necessary to run on a grade nearly all the time. All the members of that Committee; I am free to say, if the selection were to be made again, would have taken the McKellar farm instead of the place chosen. We come now to the purchase of the land. The hon. gentleman says that this town plot was laid out in 1865.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Over ten years back.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—It was laid out in 1859. He says, in 1872 all the lots were sold.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said in 1873 very few lots were left.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—In the report brought down, it appears that four acres were obtained from the Ontario Government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That must have been a reserve.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Be that as it may there is this extraordinary fact, that the Government made that selection in June, 1874. The hon. gentleman shakes his head ; but that is the evidence given by Mr. Fleming and Mr. Murdoch. Mr. Murdoch was instructed in June, 1876, to make the surveys there, and he surveyed from that point to Lake Shebandowan and Lac des Mille Lacs. That is when it was selected.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—This is the evidence given before the Committee, and it has never been impugned. If the hon. gentleman thought that important, he should have examined some witnesses to ascertain the facts.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I read Mr. Fleming's evidence, in which he says January, 1875.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—Mr. Fleming, in his evidence, says instructions were given to Mr. Murdoch to commence the surveys in 1874, and that is the time the selection was made. Now, after the location was made, no action was taken for two years, and we find that, although Mr. Fleming wrote to the Government warning them that speculators were getting hold of the lots, the Government took no steps to have the necessary reserves made. We find that Mr. Clark, who had bought lots at four dollars a piece, sold them after the Government had determined that the terminus of the road should be on the Kaministiquia, at sixty dollars a piece, and one lot at eighty or one hundred dollars. This was in the fall of 1874, and the Government actually paid two hundred and fifty to three hundred dollars a piece for the same lots in 1876, though they had been purchased in 1871 for four dollars each. Then there was a sale of lots in 1870. How many of them the Government got we do not know. There were twelve lots sold to Allister Clark for fifty dollars a piece. Mr. Clark, in the fall of 1874, sold them for ninety dollars a piece to Oliver, Davidson & Co., who sold them to the Government for two hundred and fifty to three hundred dollars a piece. The hon. gentleman, in the face of these facts, tells us that these lots were worth all the Government paid for them, and that they could sell a portion for the cost of the whole. Fifty or sixty dollars a piece were speculative prices, paid by parties who were speculating on the chance of the railway going there. They were sold to a gentleman who knew where the terminus was to be, and he had the advantage of disposing of them to the Government for two hundred and fifty to three hundred dollars a piece. The firm of Oliver, Davidson and Company obtained from the Government for their property at Fort William, including the Neebing Hotel, about $20,000. The cost of these lands up to the present time, so far as can be ascertained by the Public Accounts, is over $67,000, and Messrs. Oliver, Davidson and Company appear to have received nearly one-third of the whole. It must strike hon. gentlemen as being something extraordinary that these gentlemen should have been so extremely fortunate as to be able to secure those lots at such very low figures, and sell them to the Government at such very high prices. Had the Government acted promptly and taken possession of those lands in time, they would not have had to pay one quarter as much as they cost the country. Oliver, Davidson and Company owned lot number six in the township of Neebing, a wild lot just adjoining the town plot on the west. Of this lot, about eight acres was required by the Government, for which the valuers allowed about five hundred dollars an acre, or $4,000 for the whole, although this lot, containing one hundred and thirty-seven acres, had been purchased in 1872 for less than five dollars an acre. It cost six hundred dollars, and yet a portion of this lot, only eight acres, was sold to the Government for $4,000, though that land did not touch the river at all. The front lots are still held by these gentlemen, and last summer they were erecting a hotel upon it. In the statement I made last year before this House, I referred to the gentleman associated with the valuers, Mr. Brown, and I understood at that time that he was merely the "Co." of Oliver, Davidson & Co. It appears that another gentleman is associated with them. He has one-sixth interest of the whole. Mr. Brown was sent up there in connection with the valuers. In our report we say we do not think he ought to have gone up there, for the simple reason that he was an interested party. He went up there with instructions which might leave him open to give advice to the valuers if he thought proper to do so. He did give advice, and such advice that the Minister of Public Works wrote a very sharp letter to him; and more than that, he gave advice which, if acted on, would have benefited himself. Now, the Railway Act of 1868 makes the provision that where a portion of land is taken, when estimating the value of that land, the arbitrators are to take into account the increased value given to the rest of the property. This would apply to lot No. 6, in Neebing Township. They had one hundred and thirty-seven acres, of which about eight acres were taken. But the valuers were informed by Mr. Brown that the Railway Act did not apply.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Read did not take the advice.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—But Mr. Brown did advise; hence you can see a person who would advise that, was not a fit man to be sent there. We all know how much the valuers would be influenced by the opinion of the solicitor sent there by the Government. We know they did ask an opinion when they were not decided as to what course they should pursue, and we know the advice he gave them. I think this report is well sustained by the evidence given in that Committee. More than that, I think every statement I made in my place here has been verified by that Committee. I have no desire to reflect on the hon. gentleman, but it struck me if he had been a little more calm, and presented his view of the case in more moderate language, it would have been more acceptable to the House.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—As one who served for many days on that Committee, I feel it incumbent upon me to make some remarks; and I must say, while speaking on this matter, though personally my own feelings are not touched, I am wounded through my friends, and consequently on all occasions I may not keep from saying words that might be better unsaid. However, I shall endeavour to keep myself within the bounds of Parliamentary usage, and say nothing distressing to hon. gentlemen. At the same time there are circumstances connected with this enquiry which are of a very aggravating description. I may further remark that members who are supposed to represent the minority in this House have acted on that Committee at great disadvantage. I at one time understood an application had been made in this House for leave to have evidence printed from time to time and have it delivered to members as printed, but the resources of the printing houses in this city fell short of the necessities of the case, and the consequence was the evidence soon got into arrears. Trusting to receive the evidence in print, I failed to take notes as I should have done; consequently, I find myself with nothing but my memory to fall back upon. I must say, in regard to the speech of the hon. Secretary of State, that it was so exhaustive in its character, and so satisfactory to myself individually, and I am sure to every gentleman who has been in the habit of supporting the Government, that it leaves very little indeed to be said further on that question, and I feel in going over the report I am only treading in the steps of other hon. gentlemen. There are some circumstances I feel it my duty to refer to. I must state this in the commencement, that although I do not charge against the majority of the Committee that there are deliberately untrue statements in their report—that would be unparliamentary, and perhaps inconsistent with the fact—I do contend it is a colored report.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—It is a report taken from one part of the evidence only, without regard to the evidence favoring the minority. Sufficient prominence is not given to far more impartial, and, in my judgment, more truthful, evidence of witnesses whose evidence was given in the interest of the Government. I think, in looking through the report, that statement can very fairly be borne out by facts, and by reference to the evidence itself. The report commences with a discussion of the respective merits of the rival harbors—Prince Arthur's Landing and the Kaministiquia River. I must say that, after all, the really important interest centres upon that, because the other details, to which a great deal of prominence has been given, and on which a great deal of evidence has been taken, are comparatively unimportant in face of the preliminary enquiry in the first passage of that report, with reference to the relative advantages of the two harbors. In my judgment the majority report has not given a fair statement with regard to the Kaministiquia River. The advantages of Prince Arthur's Landing have been put too prominently forward, while the still greater advantages of the Kaministiquia River have been kept in the background. Take, for example, the dredging on the Kaministiquia. That, I think, has been exaggerated; and the statements also which have been made by hon. gentlemen in this House, with regard to an unfortunate choice of site on the river—there, again, is another point in which the majority report has been unsatisfactory—the real fact of the matter, with regard to the lower parts of the river, is that the water is shallower. By reference to Mr. Kingsford's evidence, that point is clearly brought out, and any one who will take the trouble to consider the nature of the bar at the mouth of a river like the Kaministiquia, will believe that the water next the bar is shallower than at other parts of it. That is confirmed by Mr. Kingsford's evidence, in which he says:—

Hon. Mr. Haythorne.

“ You must make the Kaministiquia eighteen feet deep on the bar, and seventeen feet in the river. We have laid off a winding basin at the junction three hundred feet wide and twelve hundred feet long. It is included in my estimate. By making the river seventeen feet deep, one hundred feet wide, and two hundred feet wide through the bar, the cost of dredging would be eighty-one thousand, seven hundred dollars. To make it only one hundred feet across the bar, it would be sixty-four thousand dollars.

Q. And what depth?—Eighteen feet across the bar and seventeen feet in the river. But for a channel throughout, 100 feet wide and 17 feet deep the estimates is $64,000. Of course periodically it would have to be dredged to keep it open. As a rule, the cost of dredging for a season, including wages, keep full all repairs, and wear and tear, is $7,400.”

That, I think, shows the engineers displayed a correct judgment in preferring a terminus higher up the river than opposite the McKellar Farm, and other localities held forth by hon. gentlemen in that Committee as superior to the town plot. Then, again, there is a period during which this river remains open. An effort has been made to depreciate the testimony of Captain Symes on this point; but it does not appear to me that effort has been at all successful, inasmuch as Captain Symes bases his experience on a log he kept on board his vessel, and that is about the most impartial testimony which can be furnished, because it is utterly impossible that Captain Symes could have had any design when he made those entries. He could not have anticipated he would have been called before a committee, to give evidence as to when the river closed. Captain Symes' evidence impressed me most favorably as to his intelligence, and the reliance that might be placed on his testimony. I do not mean to derogate in any way from the evidence of the other captains who were called on the other side; but one of them, Captain Anderson, had very substantial reasons for preferring Prince Arthur's Landing to the Kaminstiquia, because, I think it came out in evidence that he had received a very handsome present in gold from the citizens of Prince Arthur's Landing. I dare say he was a worthy man, and thoroughly deserved the present he obtained, but it would be no matter of surprise if that gentleman should have predilections in favor of Prince Arthur's Landing. To show the animus which sometimes enters the breast of some hon. gentlemen, my hon. friend, (Mr. Aikins) speaking of his friend Clark and his lumbering operations on the Kaminstiquia River, said that gentleman had on a certain occasion loaded a steamer with lumber which had been drawn down the Kaminstiquia on the ice, and put into the vessel at the edge of the ice. I have been accustomed to dealing with ice myself, as I live by the seaside, and I have been troubled a great deal by it myself. I was rather suspicious of the statement that anybody could venture on the river with the ice in that state, because we know he would risk the loss of his horses. I asked the witness if he brought it down with horses. No, he said, it was with dogs and Indians. I presume that a river that would not bear any vehicle heavier than a dog-train and the weight of some Indians, would not prevent the traffic of the North-West getting out in the fall. That is an example of the animus of the hon. gentleman. He could overlook the fact it was brought down to the schooner's side with dog-trains.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—They have no horses there.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—What weight of lumber was drawn down on each occasion? Would it weigh as much as a horse?

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—It is very

Hon. Mr. Haythorne.

seldom sleighs break through the ice, it is the horses.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—That is no answer.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—It is; because you can spread a load over a considerable area of ice; a horse's hoof would go through it like a hammer. A good deal of importance has been attached to Mr. Murdoch's evidence by the majority of this Committee. I shall approach that subject with the greatest diffidence. I, myself, owing to circumstances which have been detailed in this debate, and circumstances also proved by the Committee, cannot attach any importance to Mr. Murdoch's evidence. But, at the same time, looking at the circumstances under which that gentleman left the public service, I should be very glad to abstain from referring to him at all. I do say the Government were perfectly justified in rejecting Mr. Murdoch's proposals, inasmuch as he had been charged with misconduct which led the Government to withdraw their confidence from him, and the culminating point—that of having employed a person under his charge on work which was not Government work, and having, himself, the expectation of receiving benefits from the carrying of the line to McIntyre's estate—shows me that no statement from Mr. Murdoch, as to the relative advantages of the upper and lower portions of the Kaminstiquia as a terminus, can be depended upon. The Committee proceeded to reflect upon the system pursued in purchasing land at Fort William. I must say, having had some experience in the locating of a railway in the Province to which I belong, and with that experience before me, the conclusion I arrived at in regard to this matter is quite the contrary to that reached by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who signed the majority report. I conceive that the Government took the proper course in acquiring this land that they obtained a most appropriate and valuable terminus, and obtained it on the whole on terms by no means disadvantageous to the country. I venture to say no member of that Committee approached the enquiry with less bias than myself. I knew nothing about the locality, and after all the gross charges that had been made throughout the length and breadth of the land, I commenced the investigation almost fearful lest the Government should be unable to clear themselves of some of those charges which had been brought against them. There may be a few details which have not been explained, but in the main points of the enquiry the Government have come out scathless. I am confident from the experience I have had in other places, that to have left the question of indemnity to those separate owners whose lands were taken for the terminus, to individual arbitrators, would have cost a vastly larger sum and ultimately would have given less satisfaction to the people of Canada than the course pursued by the Government. They appointed valuers who were not authorised to close, but whose duty it was to report to the Government. They did report; and it is evident they entered into that enquiry with a sense of the duty imposed upon them, and an honest desire to discharge that duty faithfully. I must say I think they conducted that valuation with great discretion, and the results they arrived at, with some inconsiderable exceptions, ought to be satisfactory to the people of this country at large, although the majority of the Committee did not appear to think so. With reference to the clause of this Railway Act to which so much importance has been attached, I know that in my own Province, when the railway was projected, the same precaution was taken, and a clause was introduced in the Railway Act in almost the identical words of that which has been referred to in this enquiry, and although every effort was made to keep the prices within moderate bounds, it was found most unsatisfactory. I recollect one instance which will serve to show the great rise in the value of land, which must inevitably occur when railways are anticipated to pass through a country. A great deal of blame has been thrown on the Government in that respect, and the rise in the value of those lands has not been fairly stated by the majority of the Committee in their report; because it is evident that rise in value had commenced long before it was ultimately decided that the terminus should be there. In Prince Edward Island we noticed precisely the same thing. I recollect in the town of Summerside, in 1869, before there was any probability of a railway being carried through it, I was offered land for Government purposes at a price equal to about $2,000. Two years later, that very same land was taken by the Government for a railway station at $12,000. I can quote another instance in the same town, where a very small strip of land, so small a piece that it was scarcely susceptible of measurement by the yard, was cut from the back of a ship-yard, and for that little strip $10,000 was paid by the arbitrators. That place has ever since gone by the name of the golden ship-yard. It shows how difficult it is to arbitrate as to the value of property where the Government is concerned. I might quote from our experience to show the vicissitudes which take place in the prices of property under such circumstances. If the hon. Senator opposite (Mr. Haviland) chooses, he can confirm what I have said with regard to the extraordinary differences in the prices of land in the Province of Prince Edward Island, owing to the location of the railway. Now, it appears to me there has been a disposition on the part of the hon. gentlemen who signed the majority report—

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The report is the report of the Committee. There is no minority report or majority report.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—In the report that has been laid before the House, there has been a disposition to put everything in an unfavourable light to the Government. With respect to the Neebing Hotel, the inference has always been that it was built, and sold to the Government, with the view to enrich certain men who are favorable to the Administration. I cannot see that there are the slightest grounds for that. It seems to me the explanation of the building of that hotel is a perfectly natural one. I should say the hotel has been built, not with a view to making a large sum of money out of the Government, because no candid man would suppose for a moment, that men like Oliver, Davidson, Leys, Peter Brown and others who launched $50,000 to $100,000 in a speculation, would trouble their heads about such a trumpery matter, in which a couple of hundred dollars would fall to their own share, or build the Neebing Hotel to make money out of the Government. The natural explanation why that hotel was built was this, they had speculated largely in lands there, and it was their interest to add to the value of those lands by every possible means in their power, and they knew one way to draw the people to that country was to provide shelter for them. Of what use would it be for people to go to Fort William if they found no shelter to go to when they got there. Then they knew there would be a vast number of laborers employed about Government works, or prospective buildings about to rise in the town which was to become the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they came to the conclusion it would be a very successful speculation there, and that if it were in operation for three or four years, or even a shorter time than that, a large profit would be made out of it—much larger than the price of the lumber put into it—and consequently it was not with a view of imposing on the Government, but for the purpose of adding to the value of their own land that it was built. That, I think, is the natural explanation of the reasons which influenced Oliver, Davidson & Co. to construct the Neebing Hotel. They found in Mr. Henderson a man suitable for the purpose they required, and, being a builder, they sent him to erect the hotel. The basis on which he was acting was simply this—the Neebing Hotel was to be charged to him at cost price. His interest, therefore lay in keeping down the cost as much as possible, and he was to have the privilege of renting it for five or ten years afterwards; and it appears he lost no time in getting possession of it, for no sooner had he two or three rooms completed than he applied for a tavern license, and he had a New Year's ball in the building on one occasion. That is a more natural explanation than that which has been given by hon. gentlemen opposite of the motives which influenced such men as Oliver, Davidson & Company to construct a hotel.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. Secretary of State calls them "land jobbers."

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—Considerable stress has been laid on the evidence of Mr. Savigny and Mr. Clark, and it has been endeavored to implicate the Premier in a job. Mr. Mackenzie's character was too elevated, I should have thought, and too pure to have been spoken of in such terms.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Where is that done?

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—There is nothing implicating Mr. Mackenzie in the report any more than it gives undue prominence to evidence which tells against him and his friends. For example, this testimony of Clark's is, to my mind, by no means reliable. If I were a jurymen in the case I should not attach much importance to his evidence, because it is not consistent, and otherwise is not so reliable as the testimony of Mr. Davidson. I carefully abstain from giving expression to my real opinion upon that point, because, perhaps, it would be improper to say what I believe with regard to Mr. Clark's evidence. I believe it is untrue, but I say possibly he may have been mistaken in dates, that the periods at which he says Mr. Davidson told him he had shown him a map which he had received from headquarters, was later than he supposes. I believe his statement was utterly untrue. Moreover, we have Mr. Mackenzie's evidence on that point, for he states explicitly he never said, directly or indirectly, where the terminus should be.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—No one imputes it to him.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—It is true the Committee have not said in so many words that Clark charged Davidson with saying he obtained the information from Mr. Mackenzie; but you have given more prominence to Mr. Clark's evidence than to that of Messrs. Davidson and Leys, who are far more worthy of credence than Clark and Savigny, who contradict each other. After the very exhaustive speech of the Secretary of State, I do not feel disposed myself to go at any length into this question. I believe there are gentlemen here who can undertake the defence of the Premier of this Dominion more effectually than I can; but to no one else will I yield in my thorough belief in and admiration of that hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HAYTHORNE—I believe his conduct in relation to this matter is beyond reproach, and it is perfectly evident, by the letter to Mr. Brown, his care of the public interest was paramount that the public interest was ever before his mind; and any one who will take Mr. Mackenzie's evidence, and read it carefully with an unprejudiced mind, will come to the conclusion that he has used his best abilities to serve the country faithfully.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—It seems to me the hon. Secretary of State almost forgot his position as a Minister of the Crown when he spoke in such a violent manner of this House, charging them with having prostituted their high position and the Committee with having brought in a false report. He went so far as to say the Committee had been appointed for that express purpose and also for the purpose of condemning the Government. When asked to show the evidence on which he based his charge that the report was false, the hon. gentleman failed to do so except by manipulating some extracts from a part of the evidence which did not bear out the position he took. After having made such reckless assertions and unfounded charges, he apologized for his unparliamentary language. This is not the first time the hon. gentleman has used very violent language in this House, which he has refused to withdraw at the time, though, at the close of his speech he has apologized for the use of it. I am sorry that a gentleman who occupies such a high position should let his feelings so far pervert his judgment that he uses language for which he is obliged to apologize to the House. The hon. Secretary of State stigmatized the witnesses Clark and Savigny as "land jobbers," forgetting when he did so that he also stigmatized the very men he brought to refute the position taken by the mover of the resolution in this House. I shall not enter into a discussion of the relative merits of Prince Arthur's Landing and the Kaministiquia River. It has been conclusively proved, to the satisfaction of a large majority of this House that there can be no comparison drawn between the two harbors—that it was a mistake to abandon Prince Arthur's Landing after the large amount of money expended upon it. The hon. Secretary of State and the hon. Senator from Prince Edward Island, being unable to get over the evidence of Mr. Murdoch, endeavored to stigmatize him as untruthful. The Government not only dismissed him from the public service for some reason which I have not seen or heard justified, but they are endeavoring to ruin his character. They tell us they believe he has not spoken the truth under oath. I have read the evidence and have failed to discover any ground for such an assertion. Then my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Haythorne) talks of the Neebing Hotel—that shadow of a substance of nothing, that rickety, ramshackle shed—as a building to shelter travellers and accommodate guests. It amounts to nothing at all; it is absurd and ridiculous to call it a hotel. I am sure nobody who has any feeling for dumb animals would put his cattle into it. Oliver, Davidson & Co. put this structure across the line of the railway, selected six months before, and after the engineer had warned them not to erect it there. Then they came to the Government and sold it for an enormous sum of money, without submitting any certified accounts to show the value of the structure. A couple of hundred dollars would build such a shed as that anywhere else. If we look at the material the hon. Secretary of State had before him and the arguments he had to construct out of them, we must congratulate him that he has, so far, "from nothing made the wrong appear the better cause," but I would advise the hon. gentleman to adopt the injunction of Shakespeare:—"O! while you live, tell truth and shame the Devil!"

Hon. Mr. Haythorne.

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—If the hon. gentleman had followed that injunction he would not have fallen into the mistakes he did during the whole of his speech. If he would confine himself more to facts, he would deserve the respect which we all desire to show for one who occupies so high a position in this House. I contend, from the evidence which has been reported by the Committee, no sufficient reason has been shown for deflecting the railway in order to make it enter the town plot of Fort William at the western limit, and then pass through the front lots to the eastern limit. The Government did not follow the usual course pursued to purchase the land for the railway. Instead of tendering the price they thought right, and proceeding to arbitration, valuers were appointed. The Government fixed on the Kaministiquia as the terminus in June, 1874. At that time the Government plans ought to have been fyled, and speculation in the lots prevented. In December, 1874, Mr. Fleming furnished the Public Works Department with plans of the land the Government would require, and urged that there should be no delay in getting possession of the property required for the terminus. In 1875, Mr. Fleming acquainted the Government that speculation was still going on in these lots, yet the valuers were not appointed until 1876. Lots sold in 1874, when the Government determined on the site for the terminus, at from $60 to $90. The same lots were sold to the valuers in 1876 at an average price of $260 to $300. Mr. Brown, of Oliver, Davidson & Co., was appointed Government Solicitor and advisor to the valuers, and that firm got $500 an acre for what had cost them only $5 an acre not long before. They got $3,000 more for eight acres than they had paid for the whole 137 acres. The same firm placed a dim shadow of a hotel on the very land reserved for the terminus by the Government six months previous, after having been notified by the Government Engineer that it was on the reserve. These parties must have been improperly informed in 1874, that the Government intended selecting these lands for the railway. How else can their proceedings be accounted for! How else is the mystery to be solved! Why did Oliver, Davidson & Co., strong supporters of this Government, manage in 1874, to pick out of the vast Lake Superior region, the exact spot selected for the terminus of the Pacific Railway! It could not be attributed to the law of chance. But we have the sworn testimony of John Clark, taken before the

Hon. Mr. Kaubach,

Committee on the 20th of last March. Let us refer to that evidence, and we have everything explained. The following is from the deposition of Mr. Clark:—

Q. When was this last sale carried out? A few days after the other. It was the same fall. It was either the latter end of November or the beginning of December, 1874.

Q. Did Mr. Davidson give any reason for purchasing then, after the sale? Yes. He said he knew the terminus was to be there. It was not generally known whether it was to be there or at Prince Arthur's Landing.

Q. But he said the terminus was going to be there? Yes.

Q. Did he tell you how he knew it was going to be there? Yes.

Q. What did he say? He said that he got his information from Mr. Mackenzie.

Q. Information that the terminus was to be there? Yes.

Q. Did he say at what place Mr. Mackenzie told him? I remarked, I thought it was not likely Mr. Mackenzie would write to him about the terminus; and he said Mr. Mackenzie was in Toronto and had told him that. To satisfy myself—because I rather doubted it—I made enquiries, and found Mr. Mackenzie was in Toronto at the time.

Q. That was at what time? The latter part of November, 1874.

Q. Did Mr. Davidson show you any map that he had of the railway reserve there? He did. He came in and showed me a map. It was colored the same as the plan, exhibit "A."

Q. Did he say where he got this map? He said he got it from Ottawa.

Now, let us look at Mr. Savigny's evidence. We find in this report, the following:—

Q. In negotiating the sale of those lands sold to Davidson, had you any conversation about the best place for the terminus? It all had been settled then.

Q. What time was that? It was in 1875 or '76.

Q. Was that the time he showed you the plan? No. He showed me the plan in the fall of 1874, or the winter of 1875.

Q. Have you that plan in existence? I have not got it; he kept it.

Here we have the evidence of two witnesses to show that Davidson had a plan of the site of the railway terminus in the fall of 1874, by means of which Oliver, Davidson & Co. were enabled to secure the lots which they afterwards sold to the Government; and we have the evidence of Mr. Clark that Mr. Davidson informed him he had got his information from the Premier. It is true, Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Davidson deny that, but the facts remain, that Oliver, Davidson & Co. bought up the lots before the valuers were appointed, and made an enormous profit out of them. It is very easy for the Government to say they did not allow the information to get out, but why did they not secure the lands they required before they had got into the hands of speculators? Why did they allow two years to elapse, after having selected the site for the terminus, before taking steps to secure the lands they required? In this, as in other matters, we find the Government allowing their friends to step in and make fortunes out of the country; we find money lavishly expended in every direction except where it would be of service in the construction of the Pacific Railway. I believe if the money that has been wasted by the Government had been properly applied we would, by this time, have had direct communication with Manitoba through our own territory. They have shown from the first, not only that they are opposed to that great enterprise, but that they have not the capacity to carry it out.

The House divided on the motion which was carried on the following division:—

AID TO PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN MANITOBA BILL.

THIRD READING.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons by their Clerk with a Bill intituled: "An Act to authorize the advance of certain sums to the Province of Manitoba, in aid of the Public Schools therein," to which they desired the concurrence of the Senate.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Forty-first Rule of this House be dispensed with, in so far as it relates to the said Bill, and that the same be read a second time presently. He said, the lands originally intended for school purposes had not been allotted, and it was thought best to retain them until they should become more valuable. The people of Manitoba asked for an appropriation in aid of their schools, and the Government thought it better to advance money than to hand over the lands to the Manitoba Government and run the risk of having them put on the market at a time when they would command a very small price.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD said certain lots had been set apart in every township for school purposes, and, in order to prevent them from being settled on by squatters, the Local Government wished either to have them transferred to the Province or to have somebody appointed to look after them. The money which it was proposed by this Bill to advance to the Local Government, might be regarded as capital, and he desired that some provision should be made to prevent it from being employed to sustain the schools. Under a law passed by the Manitoba Legislature at its last Session, it was proposed to raise money by a tax on wild lands, for school purposes. If this money which was to be advanced by the Dominion were appropriated to the building of school houses, it would serve the purposes of the Province for years. He would suggest before the final passage of the Bill that it should be amended in such a way as to provide that this money should be expended in building school houses, and should not be devoted to any other purpose.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS asked whether it was the intention of the Government to sell any of those school lands.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not at present.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS said he was glad to hear it. These lands would be a magnificent endowment for the schools of that Province if they were preserved, but if they were sold now they would be sacrificed. The ground taken by the hon. Senator from Manitoba was the correct one, that the Government should not divest itself of those lands, but should keep them for school purposes. The hon. Senator had stated a tax on wild lands had been appropriated for school purposes—what amount would that yield?

Hon. Mr. GIRARD could not say exactly, but his opinion was the tax would give five or six thousand dollars. There was also an appropriation of $7,000. If it should once become known that there was this addition to the funds of the Province, the provision made by the Local Government might take another course, and after three years they might have to provide again for the fund. He thought it important that the Bill should be amended as he had suggested.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS thought the suggestion was very appropriate. He was quite willing that Manitoba should receive assistance, but, at the same time, he thought the House should be careful not to induce the local authorities to pursue a course which would be inimical to their own interests and not serviceable to the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said this legislation was at the instance of the Local Government, and the money was to be advanced out of the revenue that would ultimately be appropriated for school purposes. They wanted either the land or the money.

Hon. Mr. Girard.

This Government thought it would not be well to give the land when it would be sacrificed, and therefore an advance of money was made, and it was charged against the lands.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD approved of the Government holding the land at present; his objection was to applying the capital to the maintenance of schools, and, therefore, he suggested that the Bill be amended to provide that the money be devoted to the building of school houses.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said it would be quite impossible for the Dominion Government or Parliament to control the expenditure of the money. It was advanced at the ordinary rate—five per cent—and would be recouped to the Federal Exchequer whenever school lands were sold. He assumed that the money would be devoted strictly to school purposes.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—My hon. friend must take the Bill as it is or not at all.

The motion was agreed to.

The Bill was then read the third time and passed.

BILLS FROM THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FIRST READINGS.

The following Bills from the House of Commons were read the first time.

Bill for the Better Prevention of Crimes of Violence in certain parts of Canada.

Bill to amend the Act 37 Victoria, Cap. 8, intituled "An Act to impose License Duties on Compounder of Spirits; to amend the Acts respecting the Inland Revenue, and to prevent the adulteration of food, drink, and drugs."

The House adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

The SPEAKER took the chair at eight o'clock p.m.

After Routine proceedings.

THE SUPREME COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the Bill intituled "An Act to amend the Act, Chap. 11, 38 Victoria, intituled 'An Act to establish a Supreme Court and Court of Exchequer for the Dominion of Canada.'"

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL said the second section of the Bill re-enacted clause 17 of the Act of 1875, and added something to it. The most important change consisted in the omission of the word "highest." It was proposed to allow appeals from judgments which involved the constitutionality of Acts of this Parliament, or of the Local Legislatures. He was in favor of that amendment. The next amendment, however, was objectionable. It provided for the right of appeal in cases relating to "any fee of office, duty, rent, revenue, or any sum of money payable to Her Majesty." He believed the Court of Appeal of the Province of Quebec gave ample protection to the rights of the Crown. The next amendment related to "any title to lands or tenements, annual rents, or such like matters or things, where the rights of the future might be bound." He thought that amendment was unwise. When the Supreme Court Act was passed in 1875 this point was fully discussed, and it was the general feeling of members of the legal profession that the right of appeal in such cases should be limited as much as possible. He had occasion to speak to some members of the legal profession in the other House on the subject, and was informed that many of them had been absent when this Bill was discussed in the House of Commons. He proposed, therefore, to strike out that portion of the amendment, and he would also move to have the word "highest" restored to the clause. He believed that word had been omitted through a misconception. He understood the reason why it had been omitted was this: they did not see any reason for keeping the word "highest" in the clause because they thought the words "Court of final resort" implied the highest Court. Theoretically that might be so, and it was so, until a few years ago, in the Province of Quebec; but in 1872 or '73 a Bill had been passed in the Local Legislature of that Province, to restrict the appeal from the Superior Court sitting as a Court of Review. It had always been considered that the Court of Review sat in revision of its own judgments; so they were not the judgments of different Courts. It was not, properly speaking, a Court of Appeal. By the legislation of the Province of Quebec, it was enacted that, in all cases involving less than five hundred dollars, if the appellant chose to ask a review of the judgment of the Supreme Court, he was not allowed to appeal from that Court to the Queen's Bench, but in that case only the judgment of the Court of Review was a final judgment. That had been done because it was thought well not to multiply the costs of appeals. If the right to go to the Court of Appeals has been denied in such cases, he thought there was greater reason still to deny an appeal to the Supreme Court from the Court of Review. If it was wise to legislate in 1872-3 for the protection of suitors from the costs of litigation, surely there was a still greater reason why appeals to the Supreme Court should be limited to the judgments of the highest Courts in the several Provinces. That was the reason why the word "highest" had been inserted in the Act in the first place. He did not think the feeling of the Bar of the Province of Quebec had changed since that time. The effect of this change would be to create an abnormal state of things by preventing a party from appealing to the highest Court in the Province, and yet allow him to go to the Supreme Court. He thought the House would agree with him that the word "highest" should be restored in this clause, and that the Bill should be otherwise amended as he had suggested.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER said it was a strange reason to give for opposing this measure, that certain gentlemen of the legal profession had not attended to their duties in the other House during the Session. The simple reply to that, was that they should have been there. He had seen members of the Bar, not only in the House of Commons, but outside of it, who had almost unanimously approved of this measure. The word "highest" had not been struck out by mere accident. In 1872 or 1873 Mr. Irvine had introduced a Bill in the Quebec Legislature to prevent an appeal from the Court of Review to the Court of Queen's Bench. Since that time the Supreme Court had been established to take the place of the Privy Council. The object of this measure was to give every facility to reach the highest tribunal in Canada. This change had been sought not only by members of the Bar in the House, but by the Bar of the Province of Quebec. As to the other amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman, he might state that the right of appeal in matters involving rent, or where future rights might be bound existed already, and the hon. Senator surely did not wish to give up a right which suitors already possessed.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE was surprised at the argument of the hon. Minister of Agriculture with reference to the absence of members of the other House from their seats when, as a matter of fact, the hon. gentleman's own friends left their benches for a few days, and if their opponents from the Province of Quebec were absent on the same occasion, it was evident Quebec had very little representation in the other House when this measure was before it. But the extraordinary part of the argument was the statement that the lawyers of the House of Commons were unanimous in support of this legislation. Was Parliament to legislate for the benefit of the lawyers or of the people at large? The people of Quebec Province, as the hon. gentlemen opposite (Mr. Trudel) had to-day shown, were opposed to such legislation as this. The only means of ascertaining their opinion on the subject was from the legislation of the Local Legislature, and the direction that had taken, was to limit appeals as much as possible. They had refused the right of appeal from the Court of Review to the Appeal Court of the Province; how then could this Government step in and declare, contrary to the express will of the people of the Province of Quebec, that there should be an appeal, not to the courts of the Province, but to the Supreme Court of Canada? He thought this measure was detrimental to the public interest, and being in this House as a representative of the people, and not of the lawyers, he would support the amendment. He would have occasion to move another amendment with reference to appeals to the Supreme Court in connection with by-laws of municipalities. He would propose, at the proper time, to amend the Bill by providing that only in the case of by-laws upon which the vote of the people has been taken—such as by-laws granting bonuses in aid of railways—shall the right of appeal exist. When the Supreme Court Act was passed in 1875 it had met very strong opposition in this House, and its opponents were asked to allow it to pass, and when experience in its working would show its defects they could be remedied by Parliament. If there was one thing which the people of Canada had to complain of against this present Government it was the establishment of the Supreme Court. He said this, not because of any lack of confidence in the Judges of that Court, because of their ridiculous and absurd decision in the case of the Christian Brothers' Bill which they had declared was unconstitutional because it referred to education. If all judgments given in appeal were as absurd as that, it was no wonder that the people were losing confidence in that tribunal, and considered the $75,000 a year which it cost the country was money thrown away. He had been a member of this Parliament ever since Confederation and he had used his efforts to prevent his friends from establishing the Supreme Court. The experience which had been gained in the working of that Court had confirmed the view he had always entertained of it. In Quebec it would be very much better for the people to go to their own Appeal Court, the judges of which were eminent men who had thoroughly studied the laws of the Province. In the Supreme Court two-thirds of the Judges had studied English law all their lives, and they knew very little about French law. Was the country to pay thousands on thousands of dollars every year to maintain a tribunal in which they had no confidence? Yet this Bill proposed to allow appeals on almost every question to the Supreme Court. This legislation might be in the interests of the lawyers, but it certainly was not in the interests of the people of the Province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL thought the amendment proposed by the hon. Senator from DeSalaberry were in the right direction. It seemed to him that to allow appeals from Courts which were not the highest Courts of final resort in the several Provinces was a bad principle. If it were extended to the Courts of the Province of Ontario there should be appeals from the Division Court.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said even if that were not strictly correct, the very possibility of such a thing showed it was not advisable to omit the language which was used in the original Act, and which only gave the right of appeal from the Court of highest resort. Certainly the Courts of the Provinces should be exhausted, as it were, before a case should be allowed to go to the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he did not profess to be sufficiently familiar with the practice of the Courts of the Province of Quebec to discuss this question in the way he should like to do, but he understood the inconsistency of this clause which it was intended to amend was this: at the present moment an appeal to the Court of Review, if unsuccessful, could not be carried further by the party bringing it to that particular Court. This measure practically allowed the appeal to go on from that Court, which was one of final resort, and was composed of inferior judges. It was practically giving to the Province of Quebec similar rights to those which existed in the other Provinces of the Dominion. In Ontario, the appeals naturally followed up from one court to another. He thought it was very unfortunate that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bellerose) had introduced the question of the establishment of the Supreme Court. That Court had been long in contemplation—from the time of Confederation. It had been proposed on two or three occasions, in the Speech from the Throne, showing that the necessity for its existence had long been felt. He had been led to believe that the Province of Quebec demanded it especially, because appeals to the Privy Council were far more numerous from that Province than from any other Province in the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. Campbell.

To this day, the feeling in the Province of Quebec was to go to the Privy Council. The celebrated pew case, of St. Andrew's Church, Montreal, had been appealed to the Privy Council, and he understood there was another case with regard to the power of the Provincial Government to impose stamps on brokerage transfers, which was also to be appealed to England. Since the establishment of the Supreme Court, very few cases had gone to the other side of the Atlantic, compared to the number that had been appealed to England in previous years.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL—There is some mistake about this matter. It was said by the Secretary of State the intention of the Bill was to remove an anomaly, by giving parties the right of appeal which, in fact, they do not possess to-day—that is, parties having inscribed their cases before the Court of Review are deprived of the right of appeal. If the people of the Province of Quebec come to the conclusion that they ought to have the right to appeal from the Court of Review, is it not more logical to go to the Court of Appeal of that Province. All that would have to be done would be to repeal the Act introduced in the Local Legislature by the Hon. Mr. Irving in 1872 or 1873, and then the appeal from the Court of Review would remain as it had been before. I do not understand how the representatives of the Province of Quebec, who ought to be jealous of the rights of that Province, as we understand them, who know that we have fought to preserve our institutions and laws, can support this measure; because in passing such legislation they are reducing to insignificance our Court of Appeal. How is it after our Local Legislature feels bound by public opinion to abolish the appeal from the Court of Review and the Court of Queen's Bench, because it is too costly, that this Parliament should step in and say that there shall be an appeal from the Court of Review directly to the Supreme Court, in which the cost would be two or three times greater? The logical way to go about it would be this: let us restore the jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench, and then, if the people are not satisfied with the decision of that court, let them appeal to the Supreme Court.

A party has always the right to appeal ; but if he chooses to inscribe his case in review he loses his right to inscribe in appeal. The other party is allowed to go to the Court of Queen's Bench, because he has not had the choice of his court. It is proposed by this Bill to give the party who has selected the Court of Review an appeal, which is now denied. We all know the character of the Court of Queen's Bench of the Province of Quebec. While I very highly respect the Supreme Court, and would not like to draw comparisons, I must say that the decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench are respected, and in 99 cases out of 100, give more satisfaction than the decisions of the Supreme Court. The proof of it is that, notwithstanding the expense of an appeal to the Privy Council, cases are still carried there instead of to the Supreme Court at Ottawa, and I will tell hon. gentlemen the reason. According to the rule of the Supreme Court, parties are required to have all their documents translated ; that is not necessary if they appeal to the Privy Council. In the Supreme Court the French authorities and the French law, which is the law of the Province of Quebec, cannot very well be cited from the French authors. In the Privy Council the lawyers of the Province of Quebec find jurisconsults as well versed in the French law as our own judges in the Province of Quebec. It is well known that the judges in England understand the French law thoroughly. The judges of the Supreme Court at Ottawa are not all familiar with French ; but we find in the Privy Council a tribunal which understands the French law perfectly well, and knows the jurisprudence which forms the basis of our system of law. Of course it is somewhat delicate to mention such matters here, but they are facts that cannot be denied. I was surprised to hear the Minister of Agriculture say that there is an appeal from the judgments of the Court of Review to the Privy Council. I challenge the hon. gentleman to mention an instance where a case has been appealed from the Court of Review to the Privy Council. The thing has never been attempted, and cannot be done for the reason that it is well known the Court of Queen's Bench alone has the right to adjudicate upon an application to go to the Privy Council. The hon. gentleman has fallen into an error which he should have perceived immediately. The object of this Bill is to reverse the legislation of the Province of Quebec. If you can do this, where are the rights of the Provinces? I am amazed that such a Bill should receive the support of Quebec representatives who know how precious in our own estimation are those institutions of our Province ; and that admiration of those institutions is not confined to the French speaking people of Quebec. None of our judges, French or English, would consent, under any circumstances, to change the system now in force in that Province. I appeal to the Senate, whose special duty it is to guard the rights of the Provinces, to amend this Bill in the manner proposed. I cannot understand how the Minister of Justice can consent to give concurrent jurisdiction to the Supreme Court of Canada and the Court of Queen's Bench of the Province of Quebec. It would leave poor people at the mercy of the rich ; because no poor man could afford to carry his case to the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER--I am really surprised to hear the hon. gentleman say seriously that it will be against our interests in the Province of Quebec to have the right of appeal to the Supreme Court. He is entirely astray in supposing that the effect will be to multiply costs. The effect will be quite the reverse, as must appear to the hon. gentleman if he considers for a moment that instead of having two appeals there will be only one. What we want is to allow a litigant to go direct from the Court of Review to the Superior Court, instead of having first to appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench, and then to the Supreme Court.

The House then went into Committee.
Hon. Mr. Ryan in the chair.

On the second clause,

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL moved to amend the clause by inserting the word "highest" in the twentieth line.

Hon. Mr. MILLER said he did not think it was wise that appeals to the Supreme Court should be allowed, except-from the very highest Courts in the Province. The appellant who chose the Court of Review was bound by the decision of that Court. If the decision were in his favor, the other party had the right to appeal. This, he thought, was a very wise provision for checking and restraining litigation. This measure would go further and give the appellant the choice of another court. As this legislation was opposed by the representatives of Quebec Province, he would support the amendment.

Hon. Mr. PENNY said it might be in the interest of lawyers to have as many courts as possible, but it might not be in the interest of their clients. In the Province of Quebec there were four courts—first, the Superior Court, then the Court of Review, then the Court of Appeals, and last of all the Supreme Court of the Dominion.

The Committee divided on the amendment which was adopted.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL moved to further amend the clause by leaving out the words from "Majesty" to "provided."

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER hoped the hon. Senator would not insist upon this amendment, as it would be depriving us of a right we already possess.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL said the question was practically this—for instance, a man had an annual rent of ten dollars; it was due by a party who was wealthy, and who wished to avoid paying the rent, yet under this Bill as it stood, the case might be carried to the Supreme Court, and the landlord might be obliged to travel five or six hundred miles from his residence, and spend hundreds and hundreds of dollars trying to collect that trifling amount of rent. It would lead practically to his abandoning his rights. In the Province of Quebec, parties had been denied the right of appeal from the Court of Review to the Court of Queen's Bench, on account of the cost which it entailed, and, for the same reason, he hoped this amendment would be adopted.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved in amendment, "That all the words after 'be' in the main motion be left out, and the clause be 'amended' by 'inserting in page 2, line 14, after 'by-laws,' the words, 'for the passing of which, the vote of the freeholders or the ratepayers is required.'"

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said there might be many by-laws besides those of the character mentioned in the amendment, which it would be desirable should be appealed, such as the opening of streets, etc. He did not think, in cases of that kind, individuals should be deprived of the right of appeal to the Supreme Court. It often happened that municipalities got into the possession of rings, who controlled them against the public interest.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL concurred in the opinion of the hon. Secretary of State. The by-laws which required to be sanctioned by the rate-payers were very few. It was only where it was intended to incur some obligation. This amendment proposed something entirely new, and it would be difficult to say how far it would go; though some of the by-laws of municipalities were unimportant, others which did not require the votes of the rate-payers were exceedingly important, and parties should have the right to appeal against them.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said he would have no objection to change the motion so as to make it less restrictive, but he would like to see the municipalities protected.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT wished to know if the hon. gentleman could mention any case of a grievance that had arisen under the existing law.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said he did not; but under the existing law, any by-law passed by a council might be tried in Court, and a wealthy man—he knew of one in his own county who was not willing to submit to anything—could disregard a by-law of which he did not approve. It was well known that when judges looked over the forms of most by-laws of rural municipalities, they were found to be defective. It was to guard against unnecessary litigation, which would have the effect of preventing municipalities from entering upon necessary improvements, that he desired to have this amendment adopted.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL said there were many by-laws which affected individuals very closely, and which would render litigation necessary for the protection of their rights, which were not voted upon by the ratepayers. In such cases it would not be proper to deprive individuals from the right of appeal.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said there were great difficulties on the other side also, and some means should be found for doing justice to both parties. If a by-law were injurious to any one, he could go to the Superior Courts of his own Province and receive justice as well as he could in the Supreme Court. In the case of granting a bonus it was quite right that appeal to the Supreme Court should be allowed; but he did not think it should be the case with ordinary by-laws. He knew two or three counties in his own Province where the municipalities hesitated to make public improvements because they were afraid of two or three wealthy men who were determined to oppose them. That was a bad condition of affairs.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL hoped the hon. gentleman would not press his motion.

The amendment was declared lost on a division.

The Committee rose and reported the Bill with amendments, which were concurred in. The Bill was then read the third time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the Bill do now pass.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said he felt so strongly on the question he had presented to the House that he would like to have a vote taken upon it. He therefore moved the amendment which he had proposed in committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT hoped the hon. gentleman would not press his motion, which struck at a principle which was extremely dangerous to deal with.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said by the clause as it now stood any by-law of a municipality might be brought before the Supreme Court, and small municipalities could not afford to run the risk of such litigation. The judges in the several Provinces would understand the laws of those Provinces better than the Judges of the Supreme Court. Surely an appeal to the highest Court in the Province ought to be sufficient.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If a municipality has right on its side, a party interfering with that right would have to pay the costs.

Hon. Mr. MILLER had a strong desire to allow these cases to go before a higher tribunal than other cases that the hon. gentleman had suggested, because there would be less danger of tyranny or injustice in the passage of municipal by-laws based on an electoral vote than in other by-laws, and although it might be the case that two or three wealthy men in certain counties might give a great deal of trouble and harrass poor municipalities, still there was another side to look at. He would be very sorry to do anything which might operate as a serious personal injustice. He could not support this amendment.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL hoped the hon. gentleman would not press his amendment, because there were numbers of by-laws involving dear rights, and it would hardly be right to prevent appeal in such cases. To limit the appeal as suggested by the hon. gentleman would be to confine it to one case in a hundred.

Hon. Mr. PENNY said where there happened to be one wealthy man who oppressed the municipality, there were many municipalities that harrassed poor men.

The motion was declared lost on a division.

The Bill then passed.

THE HALIFAX FISHERIES COMMISSION.

MOTION TO PRINT THE REPORT.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON moved the adoption of the tenth report of the Joint Committee on printing. He explained it recommended that the report of the Halifax Fisheries Commission be printed.

Hon. Mr. BROWN hoped great care would be taken to have a full and accurate index to the report.

Hon. Mr. SIMPSON said one of the instructions of the Committee was that a good index should be prepared.

The motion was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF CRIMES OF VIOLENCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER moved the second reading of the Bill intituled "An Act for the better Prevention of Crimes of Violence in certain parts of Canada until the end of the next Session of Parliament."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This Bill is predicated on a condition of things which, I am happy to say, has not existed in Canada in the past; and I hope in the future nothing will arise to require it to be put in force. It can only be enforced under proclamation of the Governor-in-Council in certain districts where violence is anticipated and where the ordinary means at the disposal of the local authorities are insufficient to put it down. The Bill gives very extraordinary powers to local officers, justices of the peace, and others charged with the preservation of the peace—powers entirely new in the history of this country—but it has been thought circumstances may arise which will necessitate its existence. I hope such circumstances will not arise. The measure will be carefully watched by the people and no Government will presume to put it in force unless circumstances should absolutely require it.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I agree in

the expediency of the Bill, and I join in the hope expressed by the hon. Secretary of State that it will not be necessary, though I have grave apprehensions to the contrary. I hope the measure will be useful whenever put in force. I would like to know if it contains any provision to enforce it only in such portions of a municipality as may require it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Then, it would be necessary to put the Act in force in a whole city, only one portion of which might render such a thing necessary. It is a very delicate subject to talk about, but it certainly might be the case that the inhabitants of one part of a city might differ entirely in their feelings and disposition from the inhabitants of another portion, and it might be very alarming to the law abiding part of the community to have this law put in force in their part of the town. I have no amendment to offer, but I suggest that the Government might have power to put this Act in force in any portion of a municipality as circumstances might require it. Do I understand that no person, under this measure, is allowed to have arms at all except by license?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the provision. The Act would create no apprehension whatever on the part of law-abiding men, or in any portion of a city or municipality where the people are disposed to be orderly. When this law has been put in force in other countries it has extended over large areas. If enforced in small sections, it would create invidious distinctions and give rise to very unpleasant feelings.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—In looking at the Bill, my objection to it was in an opposite direction to that of my hon. friend. I fear it is not sufficiently explicit in regard to the extent of the proclaimed district. It says "any municipality or judicial district." That may be a very small portion of a city. I should think it would be only wise, in applying the Act to a city, to extend it to the whole municipality, instead of any portion of it, because, in the first place, it would be creating a very invidious distinction, and, in the second place, law-abiding people must, at times, give up some of their rights for the general good. I think the Act is in the right direction, and although fears exist in this country at the present time which give it special significance, I think they are greatly exaggerated on both sides. Still, if we had no such grounds for apprehension, it would be wise to have such an Act on the Statute Books, because there may be difficulties in connection with large public works, and circumstances may arise at any time which would render it necessary to put it in force. Such powers, under institutions like ours, are never likely to be abused. The probability is in the other direction: there would be too great hesitation in resorting to extreme measures. I think the law is a very wise one, independent of any circumstances which may be expected to give it special application.

Hon. Mr. RYAN—The occasion of this Bill is an unusual one, and it is very greatly to be regretted that a necessity should arise for infringing on the liberty of the subject. However, it is temporary, and I believe it will serve a good purpose. It is an exceptional law, but that very fact requires that it shall be very stringent. The only objection I would have to the Bill, is that in some particulars it is hardly stringent enough. In the sixth clause I think it is a little vague. It mentions a certain quantity of arms to be taken in any particular house, fixing the number at five. We know that if five stand of arms can be kept in any one house, quite a large depot of arms can be kept in a particular street or locality. I would suggest that the words "exceeding five in number," be struck out of the clause. Then, again, I think the power given for the trial of offenders is not sufficient. It gives the right of trial by jury, and we all know that allows a delay of, perhaps, three to six months; and where political or religious differences may be concerned, it would be exceedingly difficult to get an impartial jury. I shall move, in committee, to amend this clause in such a way as to provide for summary conviction. I think such offences as are contemplated under this Act, should be dealt with in a prompt and summary manner. If delay is allowed, this measure will be altogether without effect.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—I regret very much the supposed necessity of a Bill like this. I think it is a particularly unfortunate one, especially as it appears to apply to the whole of Canada, from Halifax to Victoria, and I am not aware that it is required anywhere except in one municipality. If that municipality is lying in the gutter, I do not see why we should be asked to lie down beside it. That municipality has asked for this Bill; let it apply to that municipality and to that alone. I suppose this Bill when it is passed, will be distributed over Europe by American emigration agents, and people will say: "Why, there is a second Ireland in 'America!'" I should imagine, with the spread of civilization and Christianity, a thing like this would be unnecessary.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—I am sorry to hear the hon. gentleman making this attack upon the Government.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—I am not attacking the Government, but I remember the coercion bills that used to be passed for Ireland. I was a good deal amused at a letter I received from a friend in Montreal to-day. He expressed the same view that the hon. Senator from Montreal did—that those people ought not to be tried by a jury. In Montreal they are very attentive to business, but they do not give much attention to municipal matters. In the Western cities there is no necessity for this Bill. As a matter of public policy, I disapprove of all processions on public streets, which belong to Her Majesty, and should be used for the ordinary intercourse of life and for the ordinary traffic of the country. They were never intended for processions—Protestant, Catholic or any other kind. I think every man ought to worship God after the dictates of his own conscience; but people who display their religion in the streets are like those Pharisees who loved to take prominent seats in the synagogues. If this Bill is a necessity, I should like it to point out the municipality where it is required, and it will be time enough to extend it to other parts of the Dominion when circumstances call for such a measure.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—I think this Bill may be very useful. No doubt crimes of violence have been committed lately which we all regret, but they are no worse than crimes which are committed every day in many parts of the United States, and I do not think it is right to say, as we do in the preamble of this Bill, that crimes of violence are so numerous in the country, as to call for exceptional legislation. I say it is not so. The people of Canada are as orderly and law-abiding as any population in the world. The preamble should, therefore, be dropped from the Bill. If it should appear in its present shape on our Statute Books, it will at some future period in the history of the country be pointed to as evidence of the prevalence of crime in Canada. While I admit the Bill may be very useful, it seems to me some provision should be made for enforcing it promptly, if occasion call for it, in the distant Provinces. I would suggest that the local authorities of British Columbia and Manitoba should be vested with the power which is conferred upon the Governor-in-Council. Telegraphic communication with those Provinces is through the United States, and the distance from the capital is very great.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER—I hope this Bill will receive the support of the House. In one city we find men being shot down in the streets, and there is a feeling of insecurity among the people. I am very glad the Government have introduced this Bill, and I hope they will accept the amendment that has been proposed.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER—With reference to the preamble of the Bill, unfortunately we have too much reason to say that crimes of violence are committed in one of our cities, and we have reason to fear that matters will be worse before long. As to the other suggestion of the hon. Senator from Manitoba (Mr. Girard) that we should empower the local authorities in Manitoba and British Columbia to put this law in force if circumstances should require it, I think it would be unwise. This will not be a permanent Bill, and, I hope, even for this year, after the precautions we have taken, it will not be necessary to enforce it.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Bill, Hon. Mr. Belterose in the Chair.

On the 6th clause,

Hon. Mr. RYAN moved in amendment that the words "exceed five in number" be struck out.

The motion was agreed to.

On the 10th clause,

Hon. Mr. RYAN moved, page 2, line 45, leave out from "determine" to "the," where it occurs the first time in page 3, line 7, and insert

"10. Whosoever is charged with having committed any offence against the provisions of the third section of this Act may be tried and dealt with by three Justices of the Peace, or by any functionary or tribunal invested by the proper Legislative Authority, with power to do alone such acts as are usually required to be done by two or more Justices of the Peace in pursuance of the Act passed in the Session held in the thirty-second and thirty-third years of Her Majesty's reign Chapter Thirty-one, intitled: 'An Act respecting the duties of Justices of the Peace out of Sessions, in relation to summary convictions and orders.'"

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he should have preferred to have left the tenth clause as it was, as the liberty of the subject would have been better protected. This amendment would give extraordinary powers to magistrates. Of course all the circumstances connected with this Bill were exceptional. The three magistrates might be a fair tribunal, or they might not, and the Police Magistrate might be a prejudiced individual one way or the other. This was a most delicate measure, and it would be necessary to have the concurrence of the people that the powers the Legislature were conferring on the Judiciary were vested in magistrates above suspicion who would be able to hold the scales of justice fairly on the most delicate questions when the public were drawn into the vortex one way or the other. He was free to confess there were advantages in having justice quick, sharp, and decisive if it were possible to be sure of the tribunal, and to convince the people that the judge was without prejudice one way or the other. But otherwise the people who supposed their rights were taken away from them would say

The Bill was read the second time.

Hon Mr. Girard.

it was a prejudiced tribunal. He was not wedded strongly to the tenth clause.

Hon. Mr. FERRIER said in the only city where it was likely this measure would be required the two magistrates were very superior men.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL thought the Bill would be of very little use unless it were amended as proposed. Of course it would only come into operation under very exceptional circumstances. If in a community exposed to great excitement, there should be trial by jury what chance would there be of getting a conviction or enforcing the law? Unless such an amendment were made, the Bill would be useless. It did not say that cases should be referred to any single magistrate, but to a single class of magistrates, men on whom reliance could be placed. There were certain classes of magistrates who under certain cases usually did the duty that three magistrates ordinarily did, and to that class those summary trials would be referred, this was a guarantee that they were men of certain attainments, and that certain reliance could be placed on their integrity, knowledge and firmness, and that they were worthy of the public confidence. He felt that unless there was summary jurisdiction the Bill would turn out to be of little use.

Hon. Mr. PENNY said the facts to be adjudicated upon were extremely simple. The only questions to be decided was whether a man had arms upon him or not. It would be a very rare case indeed where injustice could be done in such a simple matter.

Hon. Mr. BROWN said most of the offences that would be tried under this Act were of a semi-religious character, and the satisfaction which the decisions would give would depend very much on how the magistrate felt towards the man being tried.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—Suppose it were trial by jury.

Hon. Mr. BROWN said the jury would then be mixed: if it were a case for conviction, the jury, would convict; if not.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

they would discharge the prisoner. In such cases, it was very difficult to control a community which was divided, and where there was strong feeling, and both sides were convinced they were right. He doubted the expediency of doing away with the protection of trial by jury. Everyone knew how those cases were brought on; some foolish person, without consideration, gets excited, perhaps under the influence of liquor, pistols are fired and men rush in, thinking it their duty to take a part in the disturbance; they are brought up before the magistrate of an opposite opinion, in the midst of an excited community, and it would not be felt satisfactory to leave the decision in the hands of any one man.

Hon. Mr. BOTSFORD said he was one of those who thought in cases of this kind prompt and decisive punishment was the only way to put down rioting. However, this Bill had originated in the House of Commons, and they had thought fit not to take away the right of the subject, and he thought the amendment should not be made.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL said it should be borne in mind the whole character of this Bill was exceptional, and there was nothing more exceptional in the amendment than in the other clauses. It was unfortunate that in the place where this Bill was likely to be put in force, the population was divided into two camps, one party pretending to be the party of order and of peace. They would say, if disarmed: "We are not in a position to defend ourselves, while the other party are not disarmed." If the circumstances were not very exceptional, this Bill should not be passed at all; if they were, then it was necessary to make it as stringent as possible, in order that it might be efficient. Therefore, he thought the amendment should be adopted. Perhaps the whole extent of the evil was not known to this House. Everybody knew that Montreal was the place referred to by the hon. Senator from Hamilton, in his remarks a few moments before. If he (Mr. Trudel) had a right to speak for the population of Montreal he would say "let us alone and we will manage our own affairs provided you pledge yourselves that nobody outside of “the City of Montreal will come to create ‘disorder in our city.’ Suppose the people of the city were disarmed, what could happen? On the morning of a certain day perhaps five thousand people would come from one side, and five thousand from another, well armed, and in what position would be the people of the city be under such circumstances? Would it be possible to disarm them and apply the law? In his opinion there would be the greatest danger. It was a matter of regret that occurrences which were known to everybody were laid to the charge of the population of Montreal. It was well known a poor man was shot under certain circumstances, and it was said this man was a victim of the Catholics, yet the murderer could not be found.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL hoped the hon. gentleman would not pursue the subject further.

Hon. Mr. TRUDEL contended that Montreal would be in a position to settle all those difficulties provided no outsiders interfered, and he saw nothing in the Bill directly to prevent them.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN said the suggestion thrown out by the hon. Senator from Alma in connection with that of the hon. gentleman from Victoria, was well worthy of attention. The evidence on which a party could be convicted was of such a simple character that no difficulty could occur. A person apprehended or brought before a justice would not be charged with rioting or attacking another person, but simply with having been found with arms on his person; therefore no strong party feeling was likely to enter into such a case. It was unfortunate that the practice of carrying firearms was becoming more prevalent in Canada, and deplorable circumstances were resulting from it. Firm measures should be taken to put a stop to it. If parties found with arms in their possession or with more than the lawful quantity in their house could appeal to a jury the very object of this Bill would be defeated. He hoped the Government would consent to the amendment.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH concurred in this view; prompt conviction was necessary in order to deter people from those crimes. If delay occurred witnesses would be got out of the way. He did not think a jury would be as impartial in such matters as the judiciary.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—There is one other consideration we ought to keep in view. This is the first time anything of this kind has been passed in our country, and it is probably done under a momentary irritation, which we have seen quite equalled on many occasions before. We were looking forward to one particular day of the year and told there was to be a great outrage, and great excitement about it, but when the day came it passed away.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL — Colonel Prince’s Act was against carrying arms in the same way, but there was no searching in houses.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—There must have been some searching, because I went to the rooms of the Chief of Police, and he had a perfect armory there.

Hon. Mr. BROWN—I think we ought not to put on the statute book so severe a measure at the first sound of danger. A great deal of that irritation arises from the depression, and the large number of people that are out of employment. Probably with the opening of navigation and better employment, it will die away. As to five thousand persons going into the city, I do not believe any such number can go there. I think the municipalities ought to take very prompt steps to quell all such disturbances, and there would then be no need of a Bill such as this. The municipalities should all understand quite clearly it is their duty to prevent any man or number of men being interfered with in the exercise of their undoubted rights. Whether it be marching in procession or anything else—the right of the citizen should be maintained no matter at what cost, and so long as they do not commit breaches of the peace, they are entitled to the full protection of the State. I think that principle should be applied to all parties. There is no force in the argument that outsiders have no right to go there because a certain class of people do not like it. We can turn away our eyes from the things we do not like to see. I suppose it is necessary that some such Bill as this should be passed; but I do not like to go the length of saying that a subject shall be deprived of the right of trial by jury.

Hon. Mr. RYAN—It appears to be conceded on all sides that there is some necessity for this Bill. A measure somewhat in the same direction was enacted last Session with regard to the carrying of arms, to put a stop to that practice, but it has proved an utter failure, because it did not give the right of searching the person. It has been inoperative. The difficulties to which reference has been made do not arise from people being out of employment. I believe the evil is not temporary, but is growing, and will increase, and I should be very sorry to pass an inoperative Bill again and share the responsibility of allowing such a state of things to exist, as I think will arise unless strong measures are resorted to. This Bill is temporary. Parliament will take it under its cognizance next Session, and can say whether it has been useful or not. With reference to what the hon. Secretary of State has said respecting the apprehensions of the people being excited about the doing away of trial by jury in some cases, I believe the well-thinking and good citizens of every city where lawlessness prevails will be only too happy and grateful to the Ministry for passing this Act, and it is with that view I have urged the amendment I proposed, and without which I think the Bill would fall to the ground utterly and entirely useless.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It seems to me the hon. member from Lambton overlooks a very important fact in connection with this Bill. He speaks of it as a bill to go into operation after it receives the Governor-General's consent. That is not the case; but, on the contrary, a condition of things must arise which will induce the Government to enforce it, and they will be exceedingly slow to take such a step in any district without the gravest and most imperative necessity exists for its application. When a community gets into that condition of affairs which will justify a Government in applying such a law as this, the better class of people will be satisfied to deliver up their personal liberties for a while, or to allow their personal liberties to be interfered with for a while in order to secure the greater end of public safety and peace. Therefore, I cannot see any necessity for this buncombe about popular rights and trying this kind of legislation in a new country. We all admit those general principles. They do not require any assertion here. We all admit that anyone doing anything without provoking a breach of the peace should be allowed to do it. With regard to processions I do not believe they are the wisest thing in which people could occupy their time. I would be very glad to see all processions done away with, and especially party processions. I think they are exceedingly out of place, founded as they are on feuds or differences which do not belong to this country at all. No matter what class they belong to, these things are very improper in a country like ours; but while they are legal, and while people have the legal right to walk in processions, parties who have chosen to exercise that right should be protected at any cost. We all agree in that. Not one of us would disapprove of those general principles which the gentleman is so solicitous about; but we are talking about a different matter. I would not consider it an unreasonable thing to have a law like this, at any time, throwing the responsibility on the Government of applying it when circumstances might arise. I can fancy many instances where it would be desirable to have such a law on the Statute Books. I do not look on this as a measure to prevent contemplated events occurring next summer. I look upon it more in regard to its effect upon the community itself. Take the City of Montreal, where the contending factions will be prevented from carrying arms. So far from interfering with the friends of the hon. Senator from Lambton, or the hon. Senator from Hamilton, if they wish to go to Montreal and exhibit their colors, I think this measure will be rather to their advantage; but I hope nothing of the kind will take place. I do not see how any one can have any objection to the application which is intended by the amendment. I think it would be very wise if circumstances justified it, that there should be some restriction to the right to carry fire-arms in this country.

which is becoming so great an evil that it was found necessary to legislate on it last Session.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—We must all feel that this is an exceedingly grave measure to put on the Statute Books, and one which is entirely new to the Dominion. It is, of course, of importance that life should be made secure, but the passing of such an Act should only be under circumstances of exceptional gravity. We ought to consider what the effect of it may be. A great deal will depend upon the discretion of the magistrates. If a feeling should get abroad among those who are likely to be affected by this measure—those given to lawlessness, or who may be suspected of lawlessness—that they will not receive justice at the hands of those who have the dispensing of justice summarily, the consequences might be very serious indeed, and it would require a very much larger force than any at the disposal of the authorities to maintain peace in a city like Montreal. The responsibility of putting this measure into operation must be placed upon the Government. I wish it were possible to give them some discretion in the matter, so that they could be governed by circumstances as they might arise. We can imagine a condition of things which might not render it necessary to suspend the trial by jury, and we can imagine another condition of things which might render it exceedingly desirable. I should like to see the Bill so amended as to enable the Government to put it into operation partially, leaving trial by jury open to those who may be arrested under certain circumstances, and if the circumstances should become still graver and render it expedient in the eyes of the Government to suspend the right of trial by jury, let them put the Act fully into operation.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—The Bill lasts only until next Session.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I know that; but it is for the next two or three months we are legislating. While we should give the Government power to prevent lawlessness, we should take care not to increase lawlessness by taking such a course as may appear to a large class to expose them to injustice.

Hon. Mr. Miller.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We have given equal power to stipendiary magistrates already.

Hon. Mr. RYAN—I would suggest to my friend it would defeat summary justice to a great extent if you were to allow discretion to the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Bill was reported as amended, read the third time and passed.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT ACT.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons by their Clerk in the following words:—

“HOUSE OF COMMONS,

“Wednesday, 8th May, 1878.

“Resolved,—That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honors that this House agrees to their third amendment to the Bill (No. 14) intitled: 'An Act further securing the Independence of Parliament,' and disagrees to the first and second of their amendments, for the following reasons:—

"Because the independence of this House (which it is the object of the first clause amended to secure) might be impaired if persons entitled to superannuation or retiring allowances were eligible for seats in this House, as some of such recipients might be called into active service by the Administration of the day under the penalty of abandoning their pensions or allowances.

"Because it might lead to the superannuation of civil servants in order to make them eligible for election to this House whereby the public service would be injured and the independence of the House affected.

"Because another class, viz., judges, are entitled to retiring allowances only when suffering from bodily or mental infirmity, disabling them from work or are retired under the discretionary power of the Government for reasons alleged to affect the administration of justice. It would therefore tend to affect the independence of the Bench as well as interfere with the independence of this House.

"As to the second amendment:—

"Because it is contrary to sound policy to allow the Clerks of the Peace, who are in several Provinces the custodians of the lists of voters which must be used at the elections of members of the House of Commons, to become candidates.

"Ordered, That the Clerk do carry the said Message to the Senate.

"Attest.

"ALFRED PATRICK,

"Clerk of the Commons."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The subject was very fully discussed when the Bill was before this House, and when the Senate undertook to make very serious changes in the clause relating to the qualifications of members of this House. The clause affecting members of the other House was very much more stringent than the one affecting Senators. The House of Commons have accepted the terms upon which a Senator shall be disqualified; but they decline to accept the amendment made by the Senate to the clause affecting members of the other House. I think they furnish very substantial reasons for their refusal to concur in the amendment made to the Bill in this House. It seems to me as they have acted with such courtesy to this body, it would be but right for the Senate to recede from the amendment to which the Commons object. I simply make the appeal to the House as to whether it would not be in better taste and better feeling to accept the conditions which the House of Commons seek to impose on candidates for seats in that Chamber. I therefore move that this House does not insist on the first amendment to which the Commons disagree.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—It is very satisfactory in this case that there is no dispute as to the question of jurisdiction. The message does not contend for a moment that this House is not quite as competent to legislate upon this subject as the House of Commons. I do not think any question of courtesy arises. Both Houses are actuated by a desire to do the best they can in the interests of the public service. The fact that the proposed amendments affect the House of Commons does not interfere with our duty to decide on the possibility that we are right and they are wrong. The reasons which are given in this message do not strike me to be very strong. The Secretary of State seems to think they are. The first reason given is that the recipients of pensions are liable to be recalled by the Administration of the day, under the penalty of abandoning their pensions or allowances. That pre-supposes the Administration of the day would interfere unjustly, and contrary to their duty, with the members of one branch of the Legislature. It pre-supposes an act which would be wrong in itself, and which would be a complete dereliction of duty on the part of the Ministers of the Crown who might so interfere. I cannot imagine, if it should so happen that a person entitled to a pension were to serve in the House of Commons, that his independence there would be attacked by the Ministry of the day, by an attempt to recall him to the public service. Neither this House, nor the other branch of the Legislature should pre-suppose such a wrong doing on the part of the advisers of the Crown. I regret that such a reason has been given in the Message from the House of Commons; but the circumstances are so remote, it is almost out of the question that they can ever arise. A person in the enjoyment of a pension can only be recalled if he be under sixty, and if tendered an office not less in importance and pay than the one which he had formerly held. In addition to this, we all know how unlikely Ministers of the Crown would be to forego any patronage they might possess to recall an old public servant. In England, under the Superannuation Act, from which our Act is copied, a civil servant is liable to be recalled at the same age, and under the same circumstances as under our Civil Service Act, and yet there is an express clause in the Imperial Act, not only justifying the election of civil servants enjoying pensions to the House of Commons, but absolutely inviting their being elected by expressly declaring that they shall be eligible. There is a separate Statute to that effect. They have taken the pains expressly to enact that a person who is in receipt of a pension, shall be eligible to sit in the House of Commons, and there are persons in both Houses of Parliament enjoying pensions, to the great advantage of the public interests. The second reason is, "Because it might lead to the superannuation of civil servants in order to make them eligible for election to this House, whereby the public service would be injured, and the independence of the House affected." That also pre-supposes wrong doing on the part of Ministers of the day—that they would, for some improper purpose, give pensions to persons not entitled to them. The third reason is, "Because another class, viz: judges, are entitled to retiring allowances only when suffering from bodily or mental infirmity, disabling them from work, or are retired under the discretionary power of the Government, for reasons alleged to affect the administration of justice. It would, therefore, tend to affect the independence of the bench as well as interfere with the independence of this House." I submit, with great respect for the other branch of the Legislature, that is but a partial statement of circumstances under which judges are allowed to retire. They are entitled to retire after fifteen years service, besides being allowed a retiring allowance when suffering from bodily infirmity. This reason also pre-supposes that a judge would be tampered with for the purpose of making him eligible as a candidate. Now, all these reasons seem to me—and I say it, I hope, with all proper respect, and yet, at the same time, with a proper sense of what we are entitled to in this House—not to meet the case. The pension of a civil servant becomes an annuity which no more ties him to the Crown than a life insurance ties a person to the company from which it is received. The Superannuation Act must be administered by the Government under their responsibility to Parliament, and that is the great security the people have that the wrong expected will not be done. I think the reason given for their inability to assent to our second amendment is sufficient, and that it would not be wise on our part to insist upon that amendment. I did not realize when we were discussing this matter before, the Clerks of the Peace are, in the different Provinces, custodians of the voters' lists, and there might be some apprehension on the part of the opposing candidates that the lists might be tampered with, therefore, I propose to inform the House of Commons that the Senate doth not insist upon its second amendment to that Bill. I move,

"To Resolve, That the said Bill intituled: 'An Act further securing the Independence of Parliament' be returned to the House of Commons with a message to the effect that the Senate doth insist on their first amendment to the said Bill for the following reasons:

"1. Because in view of our system of Government, under which the people of the different Provinces are represented in Local Legislatures and in general Parliament, a large number of suitable representatives is needed as compared to the educated population, and it is unwise to restrict the choice of the people by declaring ineligible a class likely to present from education and knowledge of affairs, persons with strong claims to the confidence of an electorate.

"2. Because when once a superannuation allowance is granted under the Statutes to retire Public Officers, it becomes an indefeasible right and cannot be withheld at the discretion of Ministers of the Crown, or except for cause defined in the Statute.

"3. Because the Superannuation Act is administered under the responsibility of Ministers of the Crown to Parliament, and they would be amenable to the censure of Parliament for any infringement of public or private rights in connection therewith.

"4. Because the tenor of Imperial Legislation of late years has been to justify the presence of retired Civil Servants in both Houses of Parliament on account of the great public advantage to be derived from their knowledge and experience in public affairs, and no inconvenience has resulted from their liability (under any circumstances very remote) of being recalled to the Public Service."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is one point to which I desire to draw the hon. gentleman's attention with reference to civil servants. It is assumed, when a civil servant is superannuated, he is unfit, from bodily infirmity, or age, for the duties of his office. Now, we have some men in the Public Service who are over seventy. It is only on a civil servant becoming unfit for the work allotted him that he is removed.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—I cannot see any reason why we should not allow the electors to choose the gentlemen they wish to represent them in Parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—With regard to the amendment which was made at my suggestion, for my own part, I had no personal interest one way or another in it; but I did consider, and had good reason from reliable authority to believe, that the disqualification of Clerks of the Peace was intended as personal legislation, at the instance of some members of the other House, and I thought, therefore, it should not be tolerated. The Clerks of the Peace have no power whatever to falsify the voters lists. They are made out at first by the assessors who should be disqualified, if the reasons given by the House of Commons are sound, because it is very easy for them to value property in such a way as to increase the number of voters on one side or the other. In this way large numbers of votes are made by partizan assessors in the Province of Nova Scotia where the Local Government controls the municipal organizations to a large extent, and there is a great deal of jerry-mandering in the appointment of assessors and revisers. The revisers have a sort of judicial authority to deal with the names of persons, and have great power to strike off or add to the lists. I think, therefore, if any local officials should be disqualified it should be the assessors and revisers, and not the clerks of the peace who are merely custodians, and who are not in a position to falsify voters' lists. As I mentioned when this subject was before the House on a former occasion, one instance occurred recently in which a reviser attempted to add five hundred names to the voter's list. It so happened in that instance that he was not assisted by the other two revisers. That reviser is the acknowledged candidate of one of the two parties that will contest the county in the coming election. With regard to what the hon. Secretary of State said—that the House of Commons had treated the Senate with a great deal of deference in having accepted the amendment to the clause relating to ourselves—I think it was a most unfortunate and uncalled for remark. The truth is, on every possible occasion a certain party in that House have gone out of their way to treat this Senate with indignity. From the very inception of Confederation men holding leading positions in that party have gone out of their way to throw obloquy on this branch of the Legislature, and it was only the other day I heard the Premier say he could not get justice from a Committee of this House. In view of these facts, it is too great a venture on the part of the Secretary of State to talk of the deference or courtesy which those gentlemen have paid us in this respect. The policy of the Government seems to be to find fault with every act we do, and to impute a wrong motive to every word we utter. The clause which they inserted in this Bill was intended as an insult.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I tell the hon. gentleman I believe it was. What they imagined was that we would resent the indignity and throw it out, and then they would get out the cry that we desired to hold office without any check. Otherwise, they desired to make us swallow a very unpalatable Bill. It was largely at my suggestion that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in this House acted in dropping the second amendment. I hope the House will have no hesitation in carrying the motion.

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—I am sorry the hon. gentleman who has just sat down had anything to do with dropping the second amendment. I think the ground that was taken in this House was a very good one for making that amendment; at the same time, I am prepared to yield. I say, if any local officials should be disqualified it should be the assessors and revisers, and not the clerks of the peace.

The House divided on the amendment, which was adopted on the following division:—

THE SUPPLY BILL.

READ AND PASSED.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT introduced the Supply Bill. He said:—I am sorry, from unavoidable causes, the Supply Bill has not been printed and distributed here. However, I do not know that it contains anything new, and, therefore, I do not propose to weary the House with any full exposition of the subject matter it contains, other than to convey to the House the general conclusions that are developed in that Bill. The Estimate for the year is represented by a sum of $23,669,000. Our expenditure during the last year of which we have any record, amounted to $23,519,000. If we are enabled to keep within the limit that has been fixed in the Supply Bill, the expenditure next year will not exceed that of 1876-7 by a larger sum than $150,000. The receipts for 1878-9 are estimated at $23,850,000. Whether they will reach that sum or not I am unable to predict. Since 1874-5 the revenue has declined. Our exports and imports fell off in a marked degree, and we have suffered, in common with other countries over the world, from a great depression. Canada was not peculiar in that respect. In the Supply Bill that is now before the House, the amount asked for, in addition to the ordinary sums chargeable to consolidated revenue, is considerable. There is $7,000,000 required for the redemption of bonds falling due in 1878-9, and which will, of course, be met in the usual way by issuing a corresponding amount. A considerable sum will be required to complete the canals of the country. It is hoped within another twelve months, if not the whole, at least the greater part of the expenditure required for the Welland Canal will have been reached, and that the charge on capital account in connection with that work will have been absolutely extinguished. A considerable sum appears in the Supply Bill in connection with the Pacific Railway, though, no doubt, the whole of it will not be expended. It is highly probable the Government, during the year, will ascertain how far the scheme laid down in 1874 will prove attractive to the capitalists of the world, whether they will be induced to tender for the construction of the road from Lake Superior to the Rocky Mountains, or probably to the Pacific Coast. I do not know that it is necessary for me to advert to any other points. I shall be very glad to answer any questions with regard to it. I move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. Scott.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Before the motion is carried I should like to say a few words upon the subject of the finances of the country. The hon. Secretary of State has told us what the Estimates amount to, and what he expects, according to the Estimates, the expenditure will be for the next fiscal year. The hon. gentleman attaches great importance to the Estimates, while I, on the other hand, know that estimates are what the word implies—merely an approximation to the expenditure. The approximation ought to be very close, but, unfortunately, it is not always so. The expenditure for the financial year ending on 30th June last, was $457,896 more than estimated in the previous Session, and I complained that so large a sum should have been expended in excess of the amount estimated and voted. It was a very large sum to have been expended without the authority of Parliament, but it was only a little more than one-half the amount which has been expended during the current year, and charged against income in excess of the Estimates. The Supplementary Estimates brought down by the Government, only two or three days ago, show that the expenditure chargeable against income during the current fiscal year (which ends in about seven weeks) has been $848,290 in excess of the proper estimates of last Session. Then, the expenditure from capital has exceeded the estimates by no less a sum than $1,873,114, so that the Government has expended $2,721,404 during the current fiscal year without the authority of Parliament. I think that must surprise those of us who remember the importance that the hon. Secretary of State attached to Mr. Tilley's Estimates of 1873, and the responsibility which he attached to the Government, of which Mr. Tilley was the Finance Minister, for his Estimates, urging that the expenditure should correspond with the Estimates almost to exactness. I ventured then to say that the expenditure according to the Public Accounts and not the Estimates, were what we should judge governments by—that the Public Accounts furnished the only true test; that the Estimates were an approximation, the closeness of which might depend very much upon the mental temperament of the Finance Minister, and still more upon the sincerity of the Government. If a Government should desire to appear economical, and wished to present a moderate estimate to Parliament, it is an exceedingly easy thing, if the Government be insincere, to prepare delusive estimates, but the truth has to come out sooner or later, and the following Session it becomes necessary to state what the expenditure really had been for the year, and to bring down supplementary estimates to provide for what had been short-estimated the previous Session.

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Now, I must say that this large sum of $2,724,000 is altogether an inexcusable amount to have been short-estimated last Session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think my hon. friend perhaps is in error. The last year of which we have any account—1876-7—the expenditure was not in excess of the estimate.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—If the hon. gentleman will turn to the Statutes of last Session, he will find in Schedule A, of the Supply Bill, chargeable against income, $457,896, as the supplementary estimate for the then current fiscal year, and I presume he will not deny that the Supplementary Estimates of the current fiscal year, and included in the present Supply Bill, ask for $848,790 chargeable against income, and $1,873,114 against capital. I repeat that Supplementary Estimates so large as these, are altogether inexcusable. The Minister of Finance ought to have known last Session very much more closely what the expenditure would be both on account of capital, and of income. Both have been enormously exceeded, indicating extravagance or ignorance on the part of the Government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certain items are exceeded and certain others are not. The hon. gentleman will hardly find a single Session in which Supplementary Estimates have not been brought down.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention, and the attention of the House to the fact that there is not much reliance to be attached to the Estimates of the present Government. It is not in their Estimates, but in their expenditure as detailed in the Public Accounts, that we must seek for evidence of the economy or wastefulness of the Government. The hon. gentleman and his supporters seem to think lightly of the discovery of the facts which I am submitting, that the estimates of last year were worthless, and have been greatly exceeded. In fact there is an absence of that regard for accuracy (to use the very mildest word) which ought to characterize public men, and which in former days did characterize the public men of this country.

We have come to the end of another Session which has cost the country $600,000, in round figures, for legislation, and we have also come to the end of the Parliament which has cost the country $3,000,000, and I would ask hon. gentlemen to look back at the legislation of the past five years, and to point to measures worth what they have cost—something that has been given to the people by Parliament in return for the confidence reposed in it, and the enormous cost of legislation. I have in my hand a list of the bills passed this Session. In casting my eye over it, I fail to discover any Act of real importance, any Act that was indispensable. Most of the Acts I may describe as local in character, Acts that might have been passed by the Local Legislatures, and which, so far as their importance goes, might be passed by any of our county councils in Ontario. There is scarcely a bill worthy of this Parliament, and yet three hundred gentlemen have been sitting here for three months at a cost to the country of at least $600,000. This last Session is but one of five equally barren of useful legislation. The promises were very great indeed, and the hopes of the country were high, but the result has been infinitesimal, except in the broken promises of Ministers and their supporters. This is lamentable. Has the Government attempted to do anything for the prosperity of the country? Was there ever so much necessity for a wise policy on the part of the Government? Who but the present Government doubts that it was in their power to promote the prosperity of the country? But they proclaim that they are helpless. In fact, they have had no policy, and, therefore, there has been a feeling of uncertainty as to what policy they might adopt; the people have lacked confidence in the Government, and this has had an evil effect upon the trade and industries of the country. The depression, while this Government has been in office, has been unexampled. I do not hold them responsible for the whole of it by any means, but they have done nothing to mitigate it. The distress in the country has been unprecedented; the insolvencies have been altogether without parallel, and if they are diminishing in number, I fear it is very much for the cause which checks great conflagrations—the want of material to consume and destroy. This is the condition of the country. It is exceedingly distasteful to me to speak of the Government of my country as I have done. I should much rather be able to hold them up to commendation and speak of them as a Government which once existed in England was described—as the Government of all the talents—but unfortunately I cannot do that. On the contrary, while there may be some men of ability in it, yet the Government has unquestionably exhibited a marvellous want of capacity, an extraordinary failure to realize the responsibility which rests on the rulers of this country, and an inability to seize and grapple with the great interests of the Dominion. To such an extent has this been the case, that I very much fear the historian of the future will speak of this Administration as “the Government of the Incapables.”

Hon. Gentlemen—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—There are gentlemen in it who will be excepted, but the Administration as a whole may be spoken of as “the Government of the Incapables.” Now, if we have not got useful measures, what have we got from the Government? I will tell this honorable House what the country has got during the years this Government has been in office. The annual controllable expenditure was increased up to the end of the last financial year, the 30th June last by the immense sum of $2,300,000. How much that sum will be further increased at the end of the current financial year remains to be seen. Our annual expenditure may fairly be looked upon in the same light as the interest upon our debt. It is an annual charge, which to realize the burden of, must be capitalized. If you will capitalize this increased annual expenditure, of $2,300,000 at five per cent, it will give you as the product the immense sum of $46,000,000, that is, the increased annual controllable expenditure incurred by the present Government is equal to the interest at 5 per cent upon $46,000,000. In addition to this, the public debt has been increased since 1873 by no less a sum than $44,932,402. If you add this to the capital represented by the increased annual controllable expenditure of $46,000,000, you will find that the increased burden imposed upon the people by the present Government amounts to the stupendous sum of $90,932,402. The facts are plain and susceptible of proof. Every individual should realize in his own affairs, and should keep in view that each time he increases his annual expenditure by $5, or whatever the annual rate of interest may be, he places under pledge $100 of his capital. The gross amount of debt which the country is carrying now is $174,675,834. Of that amount the sum of $3,867,068 has not been received at all. The public debt is larger by this sum than the proceeds of the loans netted to the country. And what has the country got in return for the enormously increased burden which the present Government has placed upon the people? A large proportion of it is sunk in unconnected and widely-separated sections of the Pacific Railway, which will be useless and unused for years to come; in piles of corroding steel rails; in the useless Fort Francis Lock, and in unnecessary and injudicious expenditure in buildings in the North-West. These are some of the costly evidences which exist in Ministerial mismanagement and incapacity. The annual burdens of the country have of course also increased. The interest on the public debt is $1,583,000 more than it was in 1873, and the annual controllable expenditure has increased in the same period $2,300,000, making together $3,883,000. In round figures, I may call it four millions. Hon. gentlemen will see from this that the annual burden of the country is increasing at the rate of about $1,000,000 a year. The amount which had to be sent abroad to pay the interest on the public debt, for the financial year which ended on 30th June last, was $7,132,408, and this charge will continue to increase year by year. I ask if the condition of the Dominion is such as to enable it to bear the strain that has been placed upon it? Can the affairs of the country have been prudently managed when the result is what I have described? The increase has been at the rate of a million a year—four millions in four years! Then there are our deficits. We have had, during the last two years, if our accounts had been fairly made up, an annual deficit of $2,000,000 in round figures. I have shown in this House that the accounts last year were not fairly made up. An item of $343,591 I pointed out, had not been charged to the expenditure of the year, although the money had been expended, and therefore that amount did not appear in the deficit as it ought to have done. I ask if, in the face of the extreme depression which the experienced gentlemen around me are well aware exists in the country, the facts I have mentioned are not appalling? I used the word in speaking of the finances of the country two years ago, and it was considered too strong then: I ask if it is not too weak to-day to apply to the condition of the country? How have the deficits been met? Has any provision been made? Have the appalling facts been admitted and presented to the country as they should have been? On the contrary, they have been practically concealed. The people have been told the times are improving, that trade is increasing, and it is believed that in another year the revenue will overtake the expenditure. There is not a gentleman in this House who does not know that this is not likely to be the case—not one who does not know that the people are being deceived when they are told this flattering tale—not one who does not know that new sources of revenue must be found, that some new system of taxation must be devised, unless a scheme of great retrenchment is inaugurated and rigidly practiced. The Government and their supporters know that the liabilities of the country cannot be met unless they resort to a policy of economy such as was promised by them when they were seeking office, but which they have utterly failed to carry out during the five years they have been in power. If they should get a new lease of office, which I think, in the interests of the country, it is to be sincerely desired they should not get; they will have to resort to a system of taxation which will burden this country beyond anything which can be imagined now. They will be stigmatized as taxatonists of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—My hon. friend who says "hear, hear" knows what a serious charge that is to bring against a Government. An Administration we all know of has lately suffered from the consequences of having such a charge made against it. I tell the hon. gentleman and the country that the charge of being grievous taxationists will lie more fairly against the Mackenzie Government than ever it did against any other Administration in this country, federal or local. Notwithstanding the depressed condition of the country and the increased burdens that have been imposed upon the people; notwithstanding the falling revenue which may continue to fall (I hope not, but I see no sign of improvement); notwithstanding these facts, the expenditure of the country is being increased most recklessly and wastefully. I venture to say that never before was a Supply Bill submitted to the Parliament of this country in which there were so many items which might have been omitted altogether, as in the Supply Bill now before this House. Never before did a Supply Bill show such an absence of all thought of honest, earnest retrenchment.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We are to have an election soon.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—As my hon. friend suggests, we are on the eve of a general election, and a great many items in this Supply Bill look as if they were intended to be useful in that election. Every hon. Senator knows that items are included in it which the state of the finances of the country should forbid the expenditure of some items for purposes which are not pressing, and which might be delayed for years, and some which are not required at all. Nothing could be more wanton and wicked, considering the state of the finances of the country, than this Supply Bill, and, judging by the past, it does not show what the expenditure will be. We have in its schedule "A," upwards of $2,724,404 which ought to have been estimated for last Session, but which the Government was silent upon then, and expended the money without its having been voted—expended it without the authority of Parliament. Of this sum, $848,290 is chargeable against revenue; almost exactly what was short-estiimated for the year before under that head. Next Session, a million or a million and a half may be required to meet the short-estimate of this year. It is a very easy way to deceive the country if the Ministry of the day feel so disposed. The Finance Minister brings down supplementary estimates to cover the short estimate of the previous Session; the money has been expended; what is to be done? We are not given to impeaching Ministers; if we were, the Minister who would adopt such a course would deserve impeachment, but in this country there is nothing for it but to vote the money, and grumble, or try to look pleasant. There are large items in this Supply Bill of which we have no explanation. Here is one of $300,000 for "Pacific Railway, Lake Superior to Kewatin." What does that mean? It requires a knowledge of geography which few people in this country possess to understand it. I suppose it means between Lake Superior and the Winnipeg River, at Rat Portage, and possibly between Lake Superior and Rainy Lake. In this item may be included an amount for Mr. Sutherland's connecting link between the two ends of the Canadian Pacific Railway. $150,000, or more, may be intended to carry out that ill-considered scheme—a scheme which, if completed, would give the two ends of the Pacific Railway a carrying capacity of only 1,500 bushels of wheat a day. I hope, for the country's sake, that no part of the public money will be wasted on Mr Sutherland's project. A portion of the item of $300,000 may be intended to pay what remains owing for land at the terminus at Fort William. I believe the whole cost of that terminus has not yet been paid. The Public Accounts show that upwards of $67,000 have already been paid for the ground, including the Neebing Hotel. Now, the cost of that terminus is enormous, and wholly unjustifiable. As many hon. gentlemen know, the railway need not have touched the town plot of Fort William at all. Without increasing its length, it might have been brought to the River at McKellar's farm and the land for the terminus could have been got probably for $50 an acre instead of $500 to $600 an acre as it has cost in the town plot. Among the items in this Supply Bill, and one that I do think is not creditable to the Government, is one for the

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Pickering Harbor. That harbor belongs chiefly to a Mr. McClellan, who gave evidence before your Kaministiquia Committee. He was brought in my opinion very improperly and unfairly to injure the character of Mr. Murdoch, an engineer. I did feel that that was a base proceeding, one unworthy of a Minister of the Crown to have played a part in. We now find in the Supply Bill an item of $5,000 for Mr. McClellan's Harbor. There is another fact in connect on with this which I may state. It is a small matter, but it shows wastefulness of the public money or worse. This Mr. McClellan came here doubtless to induce the Government to put an item into the Estimates for his harbor, and, while here he was called upon by the Government to give unimportant evidence before the Committee, and for this he was paid out of the public funds his travelling expenses from Pickering to Ottawa and back, and allowed besides $4 a day for a certain number of days while here, although his real business in Ottawa unquestionably was to get an appropriation for his harbor. It is quite evident that the gentleman is one of the special favorites of the Government, who is held in higher regard than the people. When speaking of that terminus on the Kaministiquia, I may state that the railway was actually deflected into the town plot, instead of being taken, as it might have been, almost in a straight line to the McKellar farm.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—What can the McKellar farm be got for per acre?

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—We have it in evidence that Mr. McKellar would have been willing to have sold a part of the farm for $75 an acre.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I read it that he said distinctly the reverse.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—He is not very distinct upon it, but he said he would be willing to have taken $75 per acre for it.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Yes; if the railway had gone to Nipegon.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—He said if the railway had come to his place he would have been willing to give 15 acres towards the terminus.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I asked him if he would have refused $50 an acre for the whole farm, and his answer showed clearly he would have considered that a good price before the railway terminus was located on the town plot. The hon. Secretary of State has frequently asserted that the Government cannot acquire land as advantageously as a railway company can. I do not see why that should be the case. If a railway company had been surveying the Canadian Pacific line, and hesitating as to whether the terminus should be at Fort William, Prince Arthur's Landing or Nipegon, they would have taken good care to have got a sufficient quantity of land for a terminus under offer at all those points. Had the Government done this a large sum of money would have been saved to the country, and in addition to the terminus grounds they might have secured enough for a town plot, the sale of which would have helped to pay for the railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. Secretary of State thinks that could not have been done. I will tell him of a case which came within my own knowledge where a large sum was saved through the prudence and forethought of a Minister. The late Government, in 1869 or 1870, determined to build a new post-office at Toronto. They fixed provisionally upon what they believed to be the best site. The land was owned by several parties, and the Government got all the lots required under offer before they committed themselves to any of the owners. I will tell the hon. Secretary of State how I know this. The hon. Senator from Kingston was then Postmaster-General, and in March, 1870, during the Session of Parliament, he told me what the Government had determined upon, and said that the time within which the lots were under offer to the Government would expire before the money could be voted. He added that the land would cost the Government a considerable additional sum if those offers were allowed to lapse. And he asked me if I would prevent this by advancing the money to pay for them. I did. The amount was some ten or eleven thousand dollars.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—For which I suppose, you were paid interest.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Only at the rate of six per cent per annum and the money was not re-imbursed to me until the following September. I have no doubt the Government saved a large sum in that instance owing to the prudence of the then Postmaster General. The present Government should have secured the terminal grounds for the Canadian Pacific Railway before the public knew where the terminus was to be. The manner in which the site for the Toronto post office was purchased, shows what can be saved by the Government acting for the country as prudent individuals would act in the management of their own affairs. Speaking of Fort William I might say something of the harbors of Prince Arthur's Landing and the Kaministiquia River, but I do not think it is necessary. The people at the Landing have built a railway to connect with the Pacific Railway but the Government forbade the connection. They even entered a suit in Chancery, I understand, to prevent the Prince Arthur's Landing Company entering on the Pacific Railway Reserve. That can be but for one reason—the fear that for a considerable part of the year that little railway of six miles would take the whole business from the costly terminus on the Kaministiquia and demonstrate that Prince Arthur's Landing was the proper place for the terminus. The people of Prince Arthur's Landing no doubt understood the Pacific Railway would be completed through to the Red River as a first-class railway, and be ready to do a large business, instead of being restricted to a carrying capacity of only 1,500 bushels of wheat a day. If the people of Prince Arthur's Landing had built a horse tramway like the proposed Government make-shift between Port Savanne and Rainy Lake, it would have answered every purpose until the Canada Pacific Railway is finished to Red River, but they have gone to the expense of constructing a solid railway, equipped with locomotives and other rolling stock. They asked the Government to lend them rails, but they met with a refusal, although there were piles of steel rails at Fort William lying corroding. Of course there are other unfortunate features connected with that terminus, which I might enlarge upon—such as the Neebing Hotel. I ventured to say, a few days ago, that the transfer of the building to the Government involved a fraud. No one can read the evidence without coming to that conclusion. I state again in this connection that I do not mean to impute any wrong or corruption to the Premier. I wish to state this unqualifiedly. I do not think there is anything in the report that would convey such a charge or suspicion; at the same time I think there was a great imprudence, and great favoritism. I think information respecting the terminus leaked out, not through any fault on his part, but through another Department. I shall only further say upon the subject of the Supply Bill that I wish the members of the Government would endeavor to practice economy in their departments. I am afraid there is a rivalry in expenditure in some of the Departments. I am afraid that some of the subordinates may think that the costliness of their Departments will be accepted by the public as indicative of their usefulness. I hope the heads of the Departments will guard against expenditures, except for the most necessary purposes. I venture to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to the fact that there may be in the immigration branch of his department a vast amount of useless and wasteful expenditure, unless it is most carefully guarded against. I have seen that it was stated in another place that unless the usefulness of his department increased this year, the expenditure would have to be reduced. I was very glad to see it. In the Supplementary Estimates there is an item of $6,000 for extra clerks in the Department of Agriculture.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER—It is to pay extra clerks who have been in the office for years, and who have always been paid heretofore out of the Contingencies. This does not add a cent to the expenses of the Department.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I am very glad to have elicited that information. I have been told that the number of extra clerks employed this year in the departments and in the House of Commons, exceeds that of any preceding year. I think every hon. gentleman must be aware that fewer returns have been brought down this Session than usual. Perhaps the elections may have something to do with the employment of extra clerks.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—More returns have been brought down this year than in any preceding Session during the past five years.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Not to this House. I wish I could induce the Government to realize the necessity there is for economy, and the burden that taxation is becoming to the people, who are poorer than ever they were before. They are making less money, and they are less able to pay taxes, while they are called upon to contribute more revenue than they ever were before.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has certainly drawn up a long bill of indictment against the Administration. The first charge is that we have been guilty of spending a large amount of money on the present Session, and of having protracted the meeting of Parliament. I confess the Session has been a protracted one, but that has been against the desire of the Government. It is very well known that comparatively few bills were intended to be introduced, because it was not considered that there was necessity for much legislation; but it is notorious and cannot be contradicted that the policy of the Opposition during the present Session has been to debate all manner of subjects for the purpose of getting various matters before the public. Day after day the Government were delayed and prevented from bringing in their measures. The Bill which comes up to us to-day has been before the House of Commons for two months.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—It is always the case.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; he cannot point out a solitary instance where a Supply Bill has been so long before the House. It is notorious that the desire of every Administration is to shorten the Session. It was never calculated that this meeting of Parliament would last more than seven or eight weeks. The Government were powerless to shorten it. Committees of enquiry were struck to investigate charges made against the Administration. It would have been improper for the Government to have refused those committees an opportunity to bring home their charges. They were given all the facilities they required to prosecute their investigations, but they were unable to establish their charges. The hon. gentleman says the trade of the country is terribly depressed, and he says the Government have done nothing to relieve this depression. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that we can by Act of Parliament, and by increasing the taxation of the people, add to the wealth of the country? Even if by such a policy we could add to the manufacturing industries of the country, we would have to raise a certain amount of revenue from some other source. The hon. gentleman has got some visionary notion there is a policy which none of us have been able to discover yet, by which the prosperity of the country can be restored: whether it is to tax wheat, or coal, or salt, or the various woollen or cotton goods that every family must use, the hon. gentleman fails to tell us. The hon. gentleman is a great patriot. He advanced ten to fifteen thousand dollars when the Government wished to buy land for the Post Office in Toronto. He actually trusted the Government for that amount; and yet when he sees, as he says, this country going down day by day he will not disclose this great policy which is to relieve the country, not even in this pamphlet which he has scattered broadcast over the country. He has failed to tell us where this grand panacea is, where we are to get prosperity and come up to the plane where the Dominion was before the misfortune fell upon it by the change of Government in 1873. I do not think the hon. gentleman has come up to the patriotic point which the country has a right to expect from him. The hon. gentleman never gets up that he does not advise the Ministers of the Crown how they are to conduct the business of their offices —how they are to reduce their staffs and cultivate economy. He seems to think that Ministers do not feel the responsibilities which rest on them, that they are entirely reckless in their expenditures of the public money; and yet, forsooth, the hon. gentleman, who possesses this great secret for restoring the prosperity of the country—this philosopher's stone—fails to tell us all about it. He is waiting, I suppose, until his friends come into power to make the announcement, and then the country will come up again, and we will all become wealthy in some extraordinary way. I do think the hon gentleman ought to inform us how we can legislate in such a way as to remove the prevailing depression. The hon. gentleman has told us of the terrible blight which has fallen on the country in the shape of the present Administration. He has pointed out items in the controllable expenditure which could be saved, and he says that $2,000,000 have been added unnecessarily. I have the table before me that has been quoted so often, and in the Blue Book which my hon friend takes as his authority, and which is the only authority we can recognize for the last fiscal year we have any record of, I find the controllable expenditure in that year was $6,835,000, and that for the former year it had been $8,569,000. This Administration, when a year of depression came, cut down the expenditure at once, and saved $2,000,000 instead of adding that amount. Running back to 1875-6, I find the expenditure was $7,868,000—a million dollars more than the expenditure was in the last fiscal year—and I find that in 1873-4, the last year of the late Administration, the controllable expenditure was $8,324,000, or nearly $2,000,000 more than we expended last year, notwithstanding the fact that we have carried on improvements on the canals of the country, and have been proceeding with the construction of the Pacific Railway, for which large sums of money had to be raised in England. On those loans we have had to pay interest, and yet we have been able to keep down the expenditure to the figures I have mentioned. The gross expenditure of 1876-7 was $23,519,000, against an expenditure in 1873-4 of $23,316,000; showing an increase of only $200,000, notwithstanding the fact that we have been prosecuting great enterprises, and notwithstanding the steel rails purchase, of which we have heard so much, the expenditures on the Welland and Lachine canals, the expenditure on the Pacific Railway, and the admission of Prince Edward Island to the Union. How was this done? Because our Finance Minister, whose abilities have been depreciated so very often in this Chamber, and who, like myself, is one of the incompetent colleagues of the Premier, has managed to get our money at a very much cheaper rate, notwithstanding the depression of the times, and the loss of a considerable portion of our trade, than former Finance Ministers did. We have all these facts staring us in the face.

Hon. Mr. Macpherson.

Hon. Mr. Scott,

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—But they are not the facts. The hon. gentleman says the present Finance Minister got money cheaper than any other former Finance Minister. I deny that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I say he did get money cheaper. There is the proof of it—that the expenditure last fiscal year was only $200,000 more than the expenditure of 1873-4. There are the figures; they cannot be denied. Whether the money is charged to the suspense account, or any other account, the figures are there, and they cannot be combatted. The hon. gentleman has stated that the country lost $3,000,000 by Mr. Cartwright's loans, yet the system pursued by Mr. Cartwright is now being tried in other countries.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—Did not Mr. Rose try it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He could not. Mr. Cartwright obtained the loans at four per cent., and by that means he has gradually brought down the expenditure year by year; and anybody who studies the Public Accounts will see that the effect of the reduced interest will be considerable in a short time. As our Public Works increase, the actual amount we will have to pay for the larger amount of debt will be less than we have been paying for the smaller amount—in other words, we are practically getting our Public Works constructed without any additional charge to the country, because we are getting our money cheaper than ever before.

Hon. Mr. HOPE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not propose to go into other details, except to allude to one fact, and that is the purchase of the McKellar farm. I will just draw the attention of the hon. Senator from Saugeen to the evidence of Mr. McKellar in reference to the amount of improvements that he had on the front twenty-five acres of his farm. It cannot be denied, apart from Mr. McKellar's evidence as to what he would take for it one time or another, that if his farm had been utilized for the terminus, it must have been the twenty five or thirty acres fronting on the river. Mr. McKellar, in his evidence, stated he had spent before that period on this land fronting on the river, from $3,500 to $4,500, and he described what it was—his house, out-buildings, clearing and dockage, he had there. If we take the twenty-five acres alone, supposing we take the middle figure, $4,000, the land on the front part of the farm had cost Mr. McKellar $160 per acre. He had paid that much out of his own pocket the year before.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — How many acres?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Twenty-five acres.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON — There was more than that required for the terminus.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But you must have that land in front. In 1875 he sold part of that land at the rate of eleven or twelve hundred dollars per acre.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON— Yes ; after the terminus was selected.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not going over the details. I have given you Mr. McKellar's own statement.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The hon. Secretary of State will not imagine, I hope, that I accused him of incapacity. I know he would not like me to say anything in praise of himself at the expense of his colleagues, and I would not do what would be in such bad taste ; but I must say that whoever has witnessed his labours during the Session will certainly not suspect him of want of capacity. I have regretted more than once that in the discharge of my duty I had to pursue a course which increased his labors.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—It is very unfortunate that matters of this sort come up at such a late hour in the Session that we really cannot look into them. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Secretary of State to some facts contained in the returns just laid on the table to-night. If I read the speech of the Finance Minister correctly, I think he stated that the increase of revenue for the year, supposing it were to go on as it had done, would be something like a million dollars in excess of what it was last year. Now, we have returns of the amount of revenue actually collected during the first nine months of the current fiscal year. The amount of customs collected during those months was $9,635,676, as against $9,363,159 in the corresponding period of the preceding fiscal year. In the port of St. John, the Customs collected was $850,403 during the first nine months of the current year, as against $582,607 for the corresponding period of 1876-7. So that the increase of revenue during the first nine months of this year, over the corresponding period of the preceding year, was only $277,000 ; and as will be seen by the returns of duties collected at the port of St. John, that increase is due entirely to the great fire which occurred last year. The returns brought down by the Secretary of State show, instead of an increase of $1,000,000, there was an actual falling off, if we include the returns from the port of St. John.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The increase for the nine months is nearly $700,000.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—I take the returns brought down by the hon. gentleman himself, and prepared in the public offices.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have got the returns from the Finance Department. For the first nine months of 1876-7, the total revenue was $17,141,484 ; for the first nine months of 1877-8 the revenue was $17,788,923. The hon. gentlemen is, therefore, in error.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—The Customs and Excise are the barometers of the state of the trade of the country. I have shown that there is no increase from Customs, apart from the port of St. John. These figures speak for themselves. Now, let us see what the revenue has been from excise. For the first nine months of 1876-7, the collections from excise amounted to $3,928,758, and for the corresponding period of the current fiscal year, $3,847,948; showing an actual falling off during the present year in the revenue from Customs and Excise. I ask the hon. Secretary of State to explain where this increase, that the Finance Minister and himself claim, has taken place in the revenue? In the face of such facts, I cannot help a feeling of regret that the financial affairs of this country are in the hands of such a financier as Mr. Cartwright. The hon. Secretary of State speaks of his having got money at a lower rate of interest than ever before. That is easily explained. Never in my experience have I known money to be so low in the Bank of England as at the time when that loan was negotiated. The rate was actually only one per cent. Does it show any great ability on the part of the Finance Minister that he was able to obtain money at four per cent when the people of England were afraid to invest in foreign loans, and when money was held at the Bank of England at one per cent interest per annum. The Secretary of State said that nothing can be done by legislation to improve the condition of the country, that although bankruptcies involving $90,000,000 have occurred in one year, nothing can be done by the Government to restore the prosperity of the Dominion. I take issue with him on that point. I tell him we are importing from abroad products which our own people could be profitably employed in producing. I have read recently the words which fell from Bismarck, the German Chancellor, with regard to the policy they have been pursuing in Germany. He admits that the policy of free-trade has proved a failure and that they have got to adopt the policy of France in order to put Germany in a proper position. I tell the Secretary of State if there is any common sense in this country, any knowledge of the interests of the Dominion, or any desire to improve its condition, there must be a change when the elections come round, and there must be a condemnation of this do-nothing policy. We must have men of genius and statesmanship in office, men who can put the country in a better condition than that in which we find it to-day. I have quoted from those returns to show that the statement made by the Finance Minister was entirely fallacious, misleading and contrary to the facts.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—The hon. Senator from Saugeen in addressing the House, began by submitting estimates, and it seems to me he took a rather singular way of regarding them, considering the views he expressed earlier in the Session. In referring to the Estimates before the House he regarded them as the minimum, and contended that the expenditure would certainly exceed them. On a former occasion, speaking of Mr. Tilley's estimates, he insisted that they by no means represented what the expenditure would have been if the late Administration had remained in power; because, he contended, they were in excess of the contemplated expenditure.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—What I intended to show was that the Estimates could not be regarded as any indication of what the expenditure would be.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—The Estimates of all Governments are under, rather than over, the amount actually expended. That is one of those financial axioms of which no one entertains any doubt. I need not refer to what has been said about the length of the Session, because the hon. Secretary of State has disposed of that. I think nobody is so simple as to suppose that the Ministry would desire to keep us here all this time, if they could get through with their business in six or eight weeks.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I did not refer to the time so much as to the product. The time does not increase the expense much.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—The hon. gentleman seemed to forget when he spoke of a Ministry "of all the talents," that it turned out one of the most incompetent that ever occupied the Treasury Benches in England. So I do not want anybody, or any other Administration "of all the talents" to come into power here. Such governments are very much like precocious children—they turn out more stupid than those from whom less is expected in their youth. As to the product of the Session, I think it is the result of having too many legislatures. Nothing was more absurd than the portion of the Confederation Act which established so many legislative bodies. It is preposterous and ridiculous, and the system will break down some time—and the sooner the better. It was one of those grand blunders for which no Ministry in particular is answerable—one of those insanities which sometimes seize upon people, and from which they do not recover without paying pretty dearly for them. I fail to see any great products of any session since Confederation, except the admission of a few Provinces into the Dominion. But it has been well said, "Happy is the country whose history is not long." I do not believe that legislation could improve the condition of the country. On the contrary, I believe that quackery of all kinds is deleterious to the constitution (human or national) that suffers from it. The hon. gentleman is one of those who, here and elsewhere, have, I believe, always professed not to be protectionists. I can understand that the hon. Senator from New Brunswick (Mr. Wilmot) who is a protectionist, and says the Government ought to do something to relieve the country, is perfectly right from his point of view, but, except protection, I have not heard of any policy which has been suggested that the Government could adopt to improve the condition of the Dominion. I should like to know what particular theory the hon. Senator from Saugeen has. The hon. Senator from New Brunswick (Mr. Wilmot) is not only a protectionist, but he is a currency doctor, and perhaps, according to his own view, legislation might accomplish a great deal, but whether it would be beneficial or injurious to the country could only be known by experience. But my hon. friend from Saugeen is not a currency doctor. One of the last ideas with him I should imagine, would be to issue shinpasters, for according to the hon. Senator from New Brunswick this is the only way of saving the country. As to this depression which prevails, it is not confined to this country. It is experienced throughout the whole of the world. Take the State of New York. During the last three months an enormous amount has been lost through bankruptcies.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—There have been more in Canada in proportion to our population, as Dunn, Wyman & Company's report shows.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Take the country that we all look up to as presenting the greatest financial success—England. I was reading in the Pall Mall Gazette today, an account of a great strike in Lancashire. The masters are demanding that the men shall submit to a reduction of ten per cent. in their wages, and this after reduction upon reduction of wages for months past. It is shown that in a factory of five hundred spindles there is a loss of £3,000 this year, and when the reduction of ten per cent. is made, there is still to be a loss of £1,500 a year. I should like to know if that is not a state of depression.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—That is the result of free trade.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—The hon. gentleman thinks his own side is right, evidently; but in England there are men like Gladstone on one side, and Sir Stafford Northcote on the other, who do not go in for any such policy as the hon. gentleman believes in. They are doing what a wise physician does with a patient—leaving nature to cure what he cannot touch without making things worse.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—Bismarck thinks differently.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I do not regard Bismarck as a successful financier. He made a good man in blood and iron, but he has shown himself anything but a good political economist. He had an opportunity of bringing more gold into his country than any other financier in the world, and the result of his management has been to bring the country to the verge of bankruptcy.

Hon. Mr. McLELLAN—He has found out his mistake.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—He has not only found out his mistake, but he is going to try what France has done, to see if he can accomplish the same result.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—France has not done so well as the hon. gentleman imagines. At all events, she has not got the prosperity she possesses in the way my hon. friend supposes.

Hon. Mr. WILMOT—She got it precisely in that way.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Of course the expenses of the Dominion are increasing. We all know that. How is it possible to build railroads and canals without adding to the expenditure of the Dominion. I am sure the hon. gentleman cannot explain how it would be possible to enlarge the Welland and the Lachine Canals, and to build all the railroads we are constructing without increasing the expenditure. If the hon. gentleman has any contrivance to prevent that, I should like to hear it.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I have often stated what I would have done in connection with the Pacific Railway, and how great saving could be effected.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Will the hon. gentleman say what he could save, for he must know it is only a question of degree after all.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—There is one thing I would mention. When the present Government came into office, such was their strength, they could have set their faces against a vast amount of this expenditure, and stopped it, and saved the Dominion from the predicament in which we find it to-day.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—They could stop the Welland and Lachine Canals half done, and the Pacific Railway, with the gap which hon. gentlemen complain about. To complete those works, money must be expended. If this Government has got to impose taxes, another Government would also have to do so. The moment Confederation was established, all those enterprises depended upon it—the enlargement of the canals, the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, and this Pacific Railway, to extend from one side of the continent to the other—from that moment we knew what was coming; and, if hon. gentlemen pretend to have only found it out now for the first time, they must have been very blind up to a recent period. The hon. gentleman says there are certain things in the Supply Bill which are intended for the elections. He alludes particularly to the improvements in piers and harbors. My hon. friend from Arichat talks a great deal about elections, and yet he has one of those little items of his own—the St. Peter's Canal—and he expects the Government to expend money upon it. I suppose, as long as the hon. gentleman continues to be a Senator, he does not want to be elected, and yet, if we are to suppose that all these improvements are to be made to influence the elections, we must come to some conclusion of that kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The St. Peter's Canal is a work for the benefit of the country.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I am saying so. The hon. gentleman is elected for life; but if his canal involves no electioneering jobbery, I should imagine other canals and public works would be in the same position. The hon. gentleman speaks about the land on the Kaminstiquia, which, he says, might have been bought for $50 an acre. I think there is nothing in the evidence to show that.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—I do not say there is anything in the evidence to that fact. What the evidence shows is this: Mr. McKellar offered a part of his farm for $75 an acre, and admitted that $50 would have been a good price before the railway terminus was fixed there.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I do not read the evidence that way. He never offered it that I can see. He said if the railway had gone to Nipegon he would have considered fifty dollars an acre a fair price. The value of land there is put up by the railway. We will suppose the town plot to be a farm, and McKellar's another; McKellar gets a thousand dollars an acre for his farm, and yet the owners of the other are expected to take fifty dollars an acre for it. When the railway was located there it raised the value of the property.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—The land should have been secured before the railway was put there, in the way that railway companies manage.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—We know that a number of people were going about buying land everywhere they thought it possible the railway terminus would be located. Some went to Sault Ste. Marie, some to Nipegon, others to Prince Arthur's Landing, some to the town plot, and some went to all those places. Now, when a man goes to all the possible places it would be very odd indeed, if he did not hit the right one. But the hon. gentleman says the Government should have bought land at all those places. At what period should they have done so? We have evidence that Mr. Murdoch was surveying at this town plot in 1872. That was the time the late Government should have secured the land.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—There was no question of a terminus before the change of Government.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—When the railway was proposed it must have been known there would be a terminus. Mr. McKellar says: "In 1872 I knew the railway was going there." That is, he knew it would come to some of those three or four eligible places, and the place selected was the most eligible. The hon. gentleman says the Government should have bought at Nipegon. Why did not the old Government buy there? As soon as they began surveying, they knew there must be a terminus somewhere. The hon. gentleman has told us of a financial expedient of the late Government which seemed to me not to be of remarkable value. If it be an advantage to the Government to borrow a little money from individuals, I could not lend them as much as the hon. gentleman did, but I would be happy, as far as my means would allow, to advance money on such terms.

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—It was not a question of borrowing money, but of buying land.

Hon. Mr. Penny.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—I can understand the Postmaster-General, instead of buying property in his own name, buying in some other person's, but why he should borrow money from a private individual I cannot understand.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—There was no appropriation for it. As I have described, the land was under offer, and that offer would lapse in a month unless the purchase was made within that time. Instead of going to the bank to raise the money in any way which would have appeared improper in the Public Accounts, he got it from me.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—There may be a distinction, but I do not see it.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—If the present Government had taken the same precaution, it would have saved $100,000 for the land at the Kaministiquia, or about that. The point is that when they determined on placing the railway terminus at the town plot, they must have known what their intentions were before outsiders were informed of it, and they should have got the land under offer to them; and if they had done so they would probably have got it at ten dollars an acre.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—There was no probability of anything of the sort. Two years before that the country was all agog. When you come to buy land for a railway station everybody knows what that means. Speculators are on the alert. There is one paragraph in the report of the Committee appointed to investigate this land purchase to which the hon. gentlemen alluded—the one which says that certain parties were informed of the place where the terminus would be before the public knew of it—and it goes on with what professes to be a paraphrase of the evidence, the effect of which is that two gentlemen, Messrs. Savigny and Clark, swore that Mr. Davidson told them he had received information in advance from a very high authority. If that high authority means anything it means Mr. Mackenzie. When this was stated last night we were told that no reference was made to Mr. Mackenzie. If that be so, then it means nothing; but is it fair play to refer to the evidence of Messrs. Clark and Savigny and not to give the statements of Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Davidson, which were most positive? I think it would have been but fair to have contrasted the evidence of the Premier and Mr. Davidson with that of Messrs. Clark and Savigny.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—Hon. gentlemen opposite complain of the length of the Session, and the numerous attacks on the Government. It has been somewhat protracted, but that is not our fault. There have been attacks on some of the many failures of the Government to discharge aright their duties, and some hard things have been uttered in discussion, a good many pleasant things and some things rather surprising have been said. But I venture to say that nothing has more surprised this Senate, or is more calculated to astonish the country than the declaration just made by the hon. Secretary of State, that their financial administration has been so admirable as to improve the credit of the country among capitalists; thereby largely reducing the rate of interest. The country will be slow to believe that the position to which the Government has reduced us—the surplus gone; trade largely reduced; the industries of the country prostrate, and annually recurring deficits of millions—is calculated to inspire the money lenders of the world with such confidence as to give us larger rates of interest. The explanation has been repeatedly given that the position in which the late Government left our finances, as shown by Mr. Cartwright when he went to borrow, induced a low rate, and a large amount of money having been borrowed at that low rate to take up old bonds bearing a high rate, the change makes the lower average rate that we are paying. In considering the Bill before us I have to repeat the complaint made by hon. gentlemen on this side, that at the last hour of the Session we are called on to sanction the expenditure of so many items, and in the aggregate, such an enormous sum. The hon. Secretary of State says the Bill has been detained in the Commons two months by the Opposition. I am not surprised at that opposition. In fact the true friends of the country would have been false to their duty had they not protested against the amount demanded by the Government—an amount extraordinary under any circumstances, and in the condition of our revenue and the limits which taxation has reached, really alarming. A few years ago the gentlemen now in the Government, but then in the Opposition, professed to be horrified at the proposition of the late Government to expend in a period of ten or more years thirty millions for the Pacific Railway, and here to-night in this Bill, brought down at the last hour, they call on us to vote nearly fifty per cent more than that sum—over forty two millions. To complete the year 30th June, 1878, they ask us to vote, chargeable to income, $848,290; and chargeable to capital, $1,873,114; and for the year 1878-9, $39,998,204; making a total, at one vote, of $42,719,608. Enormous as this sum is, we know that they will expend beyond it. It is their custom to under-estimate—to vote in advance a small sum, and then spend the summer in boasting of economy, and, as proof thereof, holding up the amount provided in the Estimates. It is a mode of deception that must be short-lived. So late as the 25th of September last, Mr. Cartwright, at one of those celebrated picnics as reported (page 162) said: “The sum we demanded to meet all services was $23,378,000.” He makes this statement, has it carefully reported, and allows it to stand, that his followers all through the Session, may boast of his economy; and now, at the last hour, adds to it nearly a million dollars, chargeable to income, besides nearly two millions more to be added to our debt. And just so will it be that the Government will expend more for 1878-9 than we are now asked to vote. What we have been promised, and what we had every reason to expect was reduced expenditure. We have had a succession of deficits, and there is every indication that there must be a third. The sum voted last Session for the year ending June '78, was $23,378,000. We are asked now to add to it, chargeable to income, $848,290, making, together, $24,226,290, whilst the total expenditure last year charged to income was $23,519,301, showing a contemplated increase of $706,989. With last year's expenditure the deficit was, exclusive of the disputed suspense account, $1,460,027, making, together, $2,167,016, which would be the deficit for this year, provided there is not an increase of revenue. Now, we have had the returns from the Custom and Excise receipts for nine months laid on the table to-day. Taking them, and adding the same amount for the remaining three months as was given by the corresponding three months of last year, we find that it is actually less than the receipts of last year by $105,000—that is, taking the whole of the Dominion, except the city of St. John, where the sad destruction of property caused increased imports, making an increase of revenue of $282,000. So that, judging by the returns of revenue submitted, there will be, taking the benefit of the St. John fire, a net gain of $177,000. There has also, we find, been an increase from Public Works, railways and canals, but there will be increased expenses to charge against that increase of receipts. But, for the time, giving them the full benefit of it, the total increase in revenue would be, say, $600,000. This will leave a deficit of $1,567,000 as near as can be calculated, so far as we have the returns. In the face of such a result is it not marvellous that the Government goes on continuing and even increasing our enormous expenditures, which must assuredly result in increased taxation in some form? The hon. Secretary of State and his supporter, the Senator from Montreal, call upon my friend (Mr. Macpherson) beside me to give to the public the policy by which he claims that the condition of the country may be improved, and then they go on to say that in any scheme we have or may have, they can see nothing but increased taxation. We deny that any scheme, entertained for a moment by us, is designed to increase in the slightest the burdens of our people, and it comes with an ill grace from the gentlemen opposite, to charge us with desiring to impose additional taxation on the prime necessities of life, when that is just the course they have been pursuing; and not that alone—not only increasing the taxes on the necessities of life, but by their trade policy rendering it more difficult, for want of remunerative employment, to procure these necessities. They were hardly three months in power when they increased the taxation three millions a year, and as opportunity offers, they add to it. From their policy and extravagant expenditure, they have a succession of deficits of nearly two millions a year, and they have not met these by additional taxes, for the only reason that they are undecided where or how to levy the necessary taxes. They have raised the 15 per cent. ad valorem to 17½; they have added to the duties on spirits and tobacco; whilst tea, coffee, and other things, free under the late Government, have been taxed; and they now only pause because they know not where else to lay the tax-gatherer's hand heavier. They would tax the water we drink, and the air we breathe, if they only knew by what means they could collect the revenue. Not long ago I read an article written by one of their party of free-traders in which he argued that it is immaterial in what mode the taxation is collected, and he very gravely proposed a tax on milk. Should the article meet the eye of the Government, we must not be surprised (inasmuch as it accords with their policy) to find the Ministers of Excise and Finance, having taxed the tea and coffee of our breakfast table (which the late Government made free) imposing an excise on milk; regulating the rich man's cream and the poor man's milk dish; whilst the Minister of Justice frames clauses for the prosecution of the infant on its mother's breast, should it exceed the regulations of their lacteal tariff. Time, however, will not allow me to enlarge farther on the trade policies held by the two parties, nor will it permit of a consideration of all the items upon which we are asked to pass to-night. We can do little more than enter our strong protest against their general extravagance and appalling recklessness in the condition of our trade and revenue. A few words on one or two items in the Bill. We are asked for an appropriation, and thus to sanction the extension of the Georgian Bay Branch to connect with the Canada Central. There is, perhaps, no fact more plain than that the successful settlement and prosperity of our great North-West depends upon our having direct and easy communication through our own territory with it. The settlement and prosperity of that great prairie land with direct communication with the rest of Canada must have an immense influence on our trade, manufactures and general progress, and yet the Government whilst they on the floors of Parliament, on the platform at picnics and where an opportunity offers, tell us that, important as this may be, we have not the means—we are not in a financial position that will permit us to construct the link which is necessary to connect the two sections now under contract—and yet for political purposes, to influence the elections, they give a million and a half to the Georgian Bay Branch. We are expending six millions on two separate pieces of road that will form part of the connection with the great North-West, and whilst declaring our inability to connect them and make them of any value (and without connection there is no man, Hugh Sutherland of Fort Francis perhaps excepted, that would venture to say that they will be of the least possible value) the Government, to secure a few votes, give a million and a half in round numbers to a work which may at some time have its importance, but which by no possibility can compare with that of putting in the “Missing link” to Manitoba. I am at a loss for words sufficiently strong to condemn such an outrage upon the people of Manitoba and the North-West—such an outrage upon the people of the whole Dominion. Reference has been made by those who have preceded me in this debate to the payments for the Kaministiquia terminus, and, from the sums proposed to be expended from Thunder Bay westward, there will probably be additional payments to land jobbers. There is no man who has given to this question the least possible attention that can have any other opinion than that the lands for which we have paid $67,000 and have more yet to pay, were, apart from the railway, comparatively worthless, having no commercial value whatever. The hon. Senator (Mr. Penny), who just addressed us admits this.

Hon. Mr. PENNY—Yes, I admit it.

Hon. Mr. McLELAN—Well I am glad the hon. gentleman admits this, but for the benefit of those who have not studied the case, permit me to group a part of the evidence. It is fresh in the recollection of gentlemen around me that the Chief Engineer, accompanied by the reverend gentleman who is now at the head of the Kingston University, made the trip along the proposed route of the Pacific Railway, and that Dr. Grant published an account of that trip: “Ocean to Ocean.” On page 31 of that book he speaks of the journey from Thunder Bay and along the Kaministiquia and says of it:—

Hon. Mr. McLelan.

“Not half a dozen settlers are on the road for the first 26 miles, and for the next 20 not half that number. How many cotters, small farmers and plough-boys in Britain would rejoice to know that they could get a hundred acres of such land for one dollar an acre, money down; or at twenty cents per acre after five years settlement on it. This was the information about the price of the land that the settlers gave us.”

The district even adjoining Thunder Bay may be said to be almost destitute of population, and we have, in addition, the testimony of the Premier, that the road runs into a wilderness, where the foot of white man had never been until his engineers surveyed the line. In this state it is preposterous to suppose for a moment that the land has any value other than ordinary wilderness. The men who were sent out by the Government to value the land, admit in their evidence before the Committee, that the value placed upon the lots was the value given to them by bringing the railway there. On page 2 of the evidence, Mr. Wilson is asked, “Would you have given the same value for those lands if there had been no railway there, or any likely to be constructed?” “No, certainly not.” Again, “What would have been the value of those lands before it was publicly known that the railway was located there?” “Not very much.” Mr. Reid, the second valuator, on page 32 of the evidence says, in answer to the enquiry what he would give for the lots without the prospect of a railway, “Personally, I am not a speculator, and I would not have given anything for them.” It will also be remembered that last year when only $51,000 had been paid, Mr. Fleming, in giving his evidence before a Committee, expressed his amazement at the sum then paid. It is claimed by the defenders of the Government in this transaction, that the low price for those lots was at some period long past, but the evidence of the notorious P. J. Brown, the “advisor of the valutors”—the “Agent of the Government,” the man appointed by Mr. Mackenzie, and the partner in the firm of Oliver, Davidson & Co., who were under various names interested in nearly all those lands, as well as engaged in a number of contracts under Government—he, Peter Johnson Brown, in his testimony, gives the price of those lands in 1873. I was present when that gentleman gave his testimony. He was asked about the ownership of certain lots, and answered that they (five) were in his wife's name; that he "wanted to invest some money for the benefit of his wife, and he bought those lots in her name." Hon. gentlemen, when I heard the witness make this statement, I was immediately prejudiced in his favor. I said to myself, "the man who thus provides for his wife must have his good points, and when my hon. friends from Saugeen and Toronto are hard on him, and when even, perhaps, the Government are giving him the cold shoulder, I'll stand up for Peter Johnson Brown—I'll speak a word for the man who, perhaps, has by pinching and saving—denying himself the luxuries of life, and from the sweat of his brow—been investing for the security of his wife and family." But hardly had I formed this conclusion, when the Senator from Toronto put this plain and, I admit, very proper question, "What price did you, in 1873, pay for those lots?" And the answer, I regret to say, was—four dollars! Ah, it is painful to reflect how suddenly the fairest fabrics fancy builds are overthrown! "Wanted to invest money for the benefit of his wife!"—"Four dollars," Artemus Ward, of patriotic memory, in the hour of his country's need, in a gush of enthusiasm, freely offered for the war "all his wife's relations," but I am sure, patriotic as Artemus was, he would not have hesitated to have kept them at home and invested, not only for Betsy Jane, but each of her relations, four dollars in lots at Kaministiquia; especially if he had had any warning, intuitive or otherwise, that he would be the agent of the Government and advise at their valuation, and have the extreme felicity of paying $600 for what cost four dollars. Hon. gentlemen, I need scarcely say that I have abandoned Peter Johnson Brown, and you may press him as hard as reason and justice demand without a word on his behalf from me. And yet he is scarcely so deserving of censure as is the Government that employed him. Brown, though employed and instructed by the Government, attended to the interest of himself and partners. The Government gave the valuator a copy of the Railway Act, which declares that all lands shall be valued independent of the enhanced price that the road shall give them. A copy of this Act, with the clauses containing this declaration, specially marked by the Minister of Public Works, was sent to the valuator. They were also instructed, as Mr. Reid, at page 35, tells us, that no improvements made after the date of taking the land in January, 1875, should be paid for. These were plain, positive and unmistakeable instructions to the valuator. It is curious, however, to notice that these instructions were given at a time when the Premier, in his evidence on page 152, says he did not know that "Oliver, Davidson & Co. owned any lots in the town plot which had been laid off for the terminus." The valuator holding these instructions, visit the premises, but, advised by P. J. Brown, the agent of the Government and the partner in Oliver, Davidson & Co., who are interested in nearly all the land taken, set the instructions aside. On page 33 of the report, one of the valuator tells us that Mr. Brown advised that the Act which Mr. Mackenzie gave for their guidance did not apply to their case. Brown, being interested in nearly all the lots, seems to know better than the Government how they should be valued, and, strange to say, brings the Government to the views of himself and his partners. The Premier, when first informed of Brown's advice, says, in his evidence, on page 152, that he was greatly "surprised and wrote him a somewhat angry letter." That letter is dated 2nd August, 1876, and I shall trouble the Senate with this extract:—

"When the valuator were informed they could consult you on any difficulty in titles, it was certainly not the intention of the Department to submit to you the interpretation of an Act of Parliament, but simply to render any legal help in the routine business they might find necessary to ask. The opinion you did give is repugnant to the law, and contrary to the interests of your employers, and, of course, is in the interests of the former owners of the land who took possession of it in January, 1875."

The Premier starts well—he calls the attention of the valuator to the Act of Parliament, and gives the correct interpretation of it. He also points out to the valuator that no improvements made on any lands after January, 1875, should be paid for, and, I am sure, this House and the country will be curious to know what reasons, what pressure prevented the Premier from acting up to his written and repeated instructions. The Premier, when he named the valuator and gave them their instructions, and appointed Brown as agent for the Government, did not know that Oliver, Davidson & Brown owned the land. Brown is supposed to have an interest in protecting the Government, but it will be admitted his own interests are stronger; hence he advises the valuator. Mr. Mackenzie tells him, August 2nd, that that advice is "repugnant to the law and contrary to the interests of his employers," the Government. Nevertheless, Brown's advice prevails, and he pays the enormous sum of $67,000, mostly to self and partners, for lands which, apart from the railway, had really little if any value. The most flagrant violation of all the proprieties was the Neebing Hotel. The instructions to the valuator were to allow for no improvements made on any of the lots after the plan was fyled, January, 1875. Brown assures the Premier, in his letter of August 5th, 1876, that the valuator is abiding by this. Now, the plan taking possession of the land was fyled January, 1875; in the following August, Oliver, Davidson & Brown, and one or two others formed the Neebing Hotel Company, and proceed with the erection of that huge shanty directly on the line of railway, and opposite the wharf and within fifty feet of the bank, in such a position that it was impossible to extend the track, or make necessary sidings, without passing through the building. The valuator is informed by Brown that the Government will pay for this structure and he (Brown) the agent of the Government, and one of the owners of the building, makes up an account of what he tells them is the cost of the structure, and all materials on the ground; but more than double what others on evidence valued it at. This is forwarded to the Government—the Government that had instructed the valuator, and declared that nothing placed on the lands after January, 1875, should be paid for; and, strange to say, is paid for. It is unfair to gentlemen to detain them by further comment on this incomprehensible transaction at this late hour. A matter that has occupied considerable of our attention this Session, the Fort Francis Lock, has provided for it in the Bill before us, $60,000. This is one of the, to use the mildest possible term, many expensive blunders into which the Government have fallen. It was never recommended by any engineer, and no man who values his reputation will say a word in its behalf. Even if necessary, there was no necessity for starting the work until the two sections of railway were under contract, and well advanced, as it is work less difficult or requiring less time to complete than 200 miles of railway, and without the railway, under any circumstances, it was useless. But when it was decided that the road should be moved north of Sturgeon Falls, and eight or nine additional portages brought into the "water-stretch route," then it was madness to go on and absolutely throw away $200,000. The plea set up is that sixty or seventy thousand had been expended, but it would have been more honest to have acknowledged the error and borne this loss than to go on and add $200,000 more, and pretend that it can ever be of any practical value. Mr. Marcus Smith, acting Engineer-in-Chief, in his evidence before the Committee, says that he never recommended or proposed the construction of such a work, and the House will remember that Mr. Fleming last year stated that he had never been consulted, nor had he ever advised its construction. The Government will not, therefore, I think, venture to shelter themselves, as is their fashion, behind the recommendation of an engineer. Nor can they bring an engineer of any standing to certify to its value. Mr. Smith, in his evidence, is asked this question:—

Hon. Mr. McLellan.

"For the purposes of commerce, will this lock (Fort Francis) be of any use whatever in connection with the Pacific Railway?"

"Answer—Not in connection with the railway."

Again, the moment the railway is completed it is of no use at all, and this answer is in substance repeated to several other questions. Other witnesses familiar with the transportation of goods to Manitoba, confirm this. Indeed, all we require is common sense to satisfy us that neither passengers nor freight will ever pass over this route, and the money might as well have been cast into the river. In conclusion, I have again to protest against the enormous expenditures contemplated by this Supply Bill, expenditures wholly unwarranted in the condition of our revenue, and which, I fear, must end in disaster.

Hon. Mr. GIRARD—Before closing the debate, I had intended to express my satisfaction at one item—$550,000 for the construction of the Pembina Branch. I do not know that it is the intention of the Government to expend that amount, but I suppose that it will be spent, and that we will have the road. Any information that the hon. Secretary of State can give on that point, will be received with great pleasure by the Province of Manitoba.

The Bill was read the second and third time.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON—Before the Bill is actually passed, I would like to ask the hon. Secretary of State if the return he promised me a few days ago, respecting freighting rails from Kingston to Fort Garry, has been brought down.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said it had been brought down in the shape of a memorandum.

The Bill was then passed.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS AMENDMENT BILL.

THE SENATE INSIST ON THEIR AMENDMENTS.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons by their Clerk, in the following words:—

“HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Thursday, 9th May, 1878.

“Resolved, That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honors that this House disagrees to their amendments to, the Bill No. 68, intituled ‘An Act to amend the Act 38 Victoria, Chapter 11, intituled ‘An Act to establish a Supreme Court and a Court of Exchequer for the Dominion of Canada,’ for the following reasons:—

“Because the first amendment, by inserting the word ‘highest,’ will in effect destroy this Section which was intended to remove doubts as to the provisions of the law as it exists, respecting the right to appeal from the Court of final resort;
Hon. Mr. McLelan.

“Because the second amendment would deprive parties of a right of appeal to the Supreme Court in matters wherein an appeal lies to the Privy Council, and because there seems to be no reason why an appeal should be refused in matters relating to titles to land, annual rents, or such like matters or things where the rights in future might be bound.

“Ordered, That the Clerk do carry the said Message to the Senate.

“Attest,

ALFRED PATRICK,
Clerk of the Commons.”

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved seconded by Hon. Mr. Pelletier, that this House do not insist on their amendments to the said Bill, intituled ‘An Act to amend the Act 38th Victoria, Chapter 11, intituled ‘An Act to establish a Supreme Court and a Court of Exchequer for the Dominion of Canada.’ ”

Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL—The amendment to which the Commons has dissented, is the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from DeSalaberry, who is not now in his place, and it was assented to in Committee, and by the House itself. It was for the purpose of maintaining the right of appeal as it now exists in Lower Canada. I do not suppose there is any occasion to dwell upon it, or that the House will depart from the decision which it arrived at on the previous occasion. It does not seem to me that the reasons given by the Commons are satisfactory; they simply say they desire to remove doubt by leaving that doubt out. No doubt existed at all, as I understand, upon the subject, and there was no appeal from Lower Canada except from the Court of final resort. The object of this amendment was to keep the Bill just as it is now, and as the people of Quebec are content that it shall continue to exist. There seems to be no reason for altering the law, except that the Commons desires to change it. I move in amendment, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Armand, to leave out all the words after “That,” and insert “it be “Resolved, That the said Bill be returned “to the House of Commons with a Message informing that House that the Senate doth insist on their said amendments “for the following reasons:—

“As to the first amendment:—

“That it is unwise to allow an appeal, save from the highest Court of final resort in each Province, and the word ‘highest’ was inserted by the Senate’s first amendment, to prevent doubt on that point, and maintain the right of appeal as it now exists.”

“As to the second amendment:—

“That the words struck out apply to cases involving the title to, or questions relating to the laws of immovables in the Province of Quebec, laws derived from France which are not familiar to the majority of the members of the Supreme Court, nor is the French language, and that an appeal to Her Majesty’s Privy Council from the Courts of their own Province, affords in both respects a satisfactory tribunal to the people of Lower Canada; and that it is unwise to deprive them of the right they now enjoy in this respect.”

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I feel myself in a very embarrassing position just now, inasmuch as there is evidently a misconception with respect to the facts of the case. From the language of the Act, one would naturally conclude that there was an appeal from the Court of Review, and we must assume that the House of Commons would scarcely commit itself to that expression of opinion unless, in the judgment of the gentlemen who participated in the debate they felt they were justified in coming to that conclusion. In reference to the other point, I think it is fairly open to discussion whether it may not be in the interests of the people of Lower Canada that an appeal, even under the laws that are peculiar to Quebec, should not come to the Supreme Court rather than to the Privy Council. The Province of Quebec has been more interested in appeals than any other Province in the Dominion, as they have sent a larger number of cases across the Atlantic than all the rest of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—And they want to continue to send them there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Only one-half the cases have been sent there since the Supreme Court has been established. Having established the Supreme Court here, it does seem reasonable that it should be the Court of final resort.

The House divided on the amendment, which was carried on the following division:—

SENATE AMENDMENT AGREED TO.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons by their Clerk in the following words:—

“HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 9th May, 1878.

“Resolved, That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honors that this House doth not insist on its disagreement to the first amendment made by the Senate to the Bill (No. 14) intituled: ‘An Act further securing the Independence of Parliament,’ and that it now agrees to the said first amendment.”

TRANSPORTATION OF RAILS.

ENQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON asked if the Government had awarded the contract for the transport this season of rails to Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said he was not aware that they had. He thought the tender of $18 from Kingston to Winnipeg was very low, and the reason the Minister of Public Works had made the change in the advertisement was that it was impossible for the Government to make any contract with the monopoly on Red River; but it was believed by throwing it open to competition to private forwarders they would make better terms with the railway people. The result had proved that the Minister of Public Works was right, as the tenders received were considerably below the prices paid on a former occasion.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON said he noticed that the Red River Transportation Company's tender was $15 per ton of 2000 pounds, and that the lowest through tender from Kingston to Red River was $18, which would leave the difference for the lake freight. He had read a letter from a party the other day who stated he was prepared to offer to freight rails from Kingston to Duluth at $2.50 per ton but for the change in the advertisement calling for tenders, and he (Mr. Macpherson) understood there were parties prepared to tender at $1.50 or less per ton for the lake freight; so that the country had lost through the change of advertisement. He should congratulate his hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Hope) on the result. A great deal of skill had been displayed by the hon. Senator and his partners. The tender of his own company was $22.50 per ton; Cooper, Fairman & Co.'s tender $19 per ton; Neelon & Co., $18 per ton. The latter were the lowest tenderers, and they doubtless were acting with the hon. gentleman from Hamilton.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said the Minister of Public Works had got the lowest figure that had ever been offered, and he could not understand how the hon. gentleman from Saugeen could state there was somebody else willing to do it lower, but did not tender.

Hon. Mr. MACPHERSON said it was because the advertisement had been changed, and the parties had been restricted to tendering from Kingston to Red River. If the Government had left it optional with parties to tender from Kingston to Duluth, or to Winnipeg, they would have had greater competition than they had for the lake freight.

The House adjourned at 11.05 p. m.
Hon. Mr. Scott.

After which His Excellency the Governor-General was pleased to close the Fifth Session of the Third Parliament of the Dominion with the following speech :

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I am glad to be able to relieve you from further attendance in Parliament after a somewhat long and laborious Session.

I shall take the necessary steps, at an early day after the close of the financial year, to give effect to the measure you have passed for the better auditing of the Public Accounts.

I shall call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to your Address praying that all of British America, except Newfoundland, shall be, by Imperial action, declared to be within the Dominion of Canada.

I rejoice that during the term of my administration, this final step to consolidate British interests on the continent of America has been taken with so much unanimity, and that henceforth the Dominion Government will, under Her Majesty, exercise undisputed sway over the northern half of this continent.

I am happy to be able to state that, pending the final settlement of the question of boundary, a conventional line has been adopted by my Government and the Government of the United States, between Alaska and British Columbia on the Stickine River.

The large sums you have appropriated for the great works of internal improvement will be expended with the most rigid regard to economy, and in the expectation that the principal canals under construction may be nearly completed within the next financial year.

The settlement of Manitoba and the North West Territories has been proceeding this year with unexampled rapidity, and if the efforts of my Government to obtain a railway communication with Winnipeg, at a very early day should be successful, I anticipate, next year a still larger increase to the population.

It is specially gratifying to find so many Canadians who had in former years emigrated to the United States now returning to the newly organized territories of their native land.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I thank you for the supplies which you have granted for the various public services.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

Nothing could have given me more gratification than the joint Address with which you have honored me on the eve of my departure.

My interest in Canada shall not cease when my mission as Her Majesty's Viceroy shall have terminated, and I am glad to know that you have taken so favorable a view of my efforts to fittingly represent our most gracious Queen in this the most important of Her Majesty's Colonial Possessions.

I now bid you farewell, and earnestly trust you may find in the future the manifold blessings which I shall ever pray may be continually showered upon you.
