When you, or your wife and family want to go to the station, be sure and leave word with the driver of Hay & Kidd's fancy hack. It is always on the street, and meets all trains.—49.

The open weather of this month has been detrimental to business. Every-body is wishing for snow; but the "probabilities" are not very promising at the present time. Thus far January has been a remarkably mild month.

the railroad line, by following which he could regain-th? Marston station or some other. Sometimes he thought he had reached the track, and would want his strength in digging in the snow for the rails. Wearied at last with his vain offorts! the sufferer laid down and burrowed in the snow, making the best possible protection of his buffalo overcoat, without which he soon would have periabed. We are not fully informed in regard to his efforts, his hopes, and his suffering, during that long and blizzardly Sunday, but we believe that when daylight came to Mr. Stordock he dared not again burrow in the snow, being felly aware that he would not raily. He had on his person $2,300 in currency, when though the head of the store of th

Breckinridge, but offered to convey him to that place—twelve miles away. Stordock knew he would die before he could ride half that distance, and, very properly, declined the profered ride. The teamster left the frozen wandere by merely pointing him to a house about two miles away, and advising him to make his way there!

Rev. A. C. Schmidt, pastor of the German Methodist Church, of Elizabeth, was the good Samaritan in this case. On his way from Elizabeth to Breckinridge on Monday, when he reached the house of William Linsay, ton miles from the former and fourteen from the 1ster place, he saw a man out on the level prairie, half a mile away, whose movements arrested his attention. The man seemed to be stumbling about and making but little progress. Mr. Schmidt thought at Linsay's house. "Mr. Schmidt thought at Linsay's house. "He family knew nothing of any man out there, and turning to look, the person had disappeared. This convinced Mr. Schmidt, whose sympathetic feelings were quick to be aroused, that the man whom he had seen but a minute before had now fallen in the snow. So; taking with him Mr. Linsay, they went out in seach of the sufferer, whoever he might be. Half a mile distant they found Mr. Stordock lying on his side, able to speak when spoken to, but helpless. They carried him to the house in their arms as quickly as possible and cared for him the doctor says, in the very best possible manner. As described by Mr. Schmidt, Stordock presented a sadly suffering appearance. His nose was swollen with frost and broken open and bleeding. His moustache and whiskers carried a mass of solid ice, weighing at least three pounds, which prevented him from drinking water, for the want of which he was suffering. His face and ears were badly frozen, but worst of all, his feet were solid to the ankles, and his hands nearly to the wrists. Removing his boots by cutting with a first his feet and hands were at once placed in snow and kept in that condition until thawed. It toos fourteen hours time to fully extract the from with her earnest entreaties that he will give her the bird to gratify the whim of her sick child, who may die if thwarted, offers him ex-change of presents, and produces the neck-lace of jewels which he had given her in the old days. When affairs have reached this point the climax is felt to be not far removed. The truth is finally wrung from the Count, and the lady, no longer able to restrain her long-pent feeling, drops at his feet, confessing his love.

Mrs. Kendal, who appears colored in a silk of a rich russet red tint, and otherwise attired after the fashion of ancient portraits of the Venetian school, presents a comely and noble aspect in the part of Giovanna. Her performance cannot be said to touch any very deep note of pathons; and indeed this lady is generally most successful in parts in which womanly tenderness is largely combined with sprightness and wit. Oppressed by her domestic sorrows, and haunted by the remembrance of a love rejected against the dictates of her heart, the moble remembrance of a love rejected against the dictates of her heart, the moble Tuscan lady is necessarily a somewhat-serious personage. Mr. Kendal, as the Count, errs. we think, in manufacturing a tone of plaintive sorrow with scarcely any break of relief, though praise is certainly due to him for his musical and impassioned delivery of many noble passages. It would be unjust, however, to day that the partial failure of the story to lay held of the sympathies of the audience lies in causes beyond the power of the actors. The careful examination which these matters demand, however, is not possible at colators and hour. The part of the nurse, sustained by Mrs. Gaston Murray, is one of little importance; Mr. Denny represents the serving man, Filippe rather too energetically, but still with humor. A call for the authorat the fall of the curtain produced no result but that of bringing upon the stage Mr. Hare, who challend that though Mr. Tennyson was unfortunately not in the house, his son, Mr. Hallum Tennyson, who has been present at the performance, had promised to convey to his father the news of the favorable reception which had been accorded to his play.

can endure. If half the statements that are made in this revelation are true, William Fitzcharles McCarthy deserves a long, long search in Joliet Penitentiary. In 1874 William Fitzcharles McCarthy was engaged in the real estate and loan business in Chicago. In connection with this he represented a swindling concern known as the American Bureau of Mines, in which gullible fools were induced to place their funds, only to find after a little while that their money had been awallowed up beyond recovery. McCarthy lived at a boarding house kept by a Mrs. Hess. Her daughter, a lovely and accomplished girl, was captivated by the flatteries and attentions of the handsome real existe agent, and yielding to his honeyed words, bewitched by the flattering prespects he held out before her, she yielded him her heart and hand. They were betrothed, and after an engagement of a rory brief period the twain were married. The wedding coremony was performed in the presence of sew invited guests at All Saintis' church, one bitter cold evening a little more than five years ago. The following is a copy of the marrige certificate:

There is no doubt but the soil and climate of a great part of these united Provinces are admirably adapted for the cultivation of sugarbeets, and it has been conclusively proved, by the able, practical and accomplished Director of Agriculture (Quebec) Mr. E. A. Barnard, that the roots grown in your Province are rich in sugar—equal to, even surpassing that of the sugar beet grown on the Continent of Europe, and it is a well-known fact that few crops are more beneficial to the soil than the beet, as it is not a sourging crop, and stock are fed on the tops and punance of the pressed roots, thus returning the crop largely to the seil. The sugar factories must take necessarily be in the heart of the beet growing neighborhood, as the roots are too bolkly and tender to transport profitably or safely for any great distance, and this would give a small manufacturing population in each district suitable for the growth of the beets.

The production of beet-root sugar in Continental Europe was only about 140,000 tons in 1832.
