the trade of the country infinitely further away than before. It proved in the end to have been a blessing in disguise to us. While that treaty was in existence, the Americans purchased our grain and our lumber, and exported them for us. They acted as our factors, and pocketed the profits of the transactions. When the Reciprocity Treaty was abrogated we were forced to look around and do business for ourselves. We commenced exporting our own products; and, having done so for a short time, the idea suggested itself that we might, besides doing our own business, act as factors for the Americans who had formerly acted in that capacity for us. Why not go to the Western States, thought we, buy their grain and export it from Canada? This would give employment to Canadian shipping and capital, and Canadian mills. For the four years ending in December, 1876, we handled $30,000,000 worth of American wheat and flour, mostly wheat, and exported from Canada during the same period, a total of $42,000,000 worth. Practically, we exported $12,000,000 worth of our own and $30,000,000 worth of theirs. Did we lose anything by this business? Would it have been a blessing to Canada to deprive our commission men, our mercantile marine, and our banks of the business which this vast volume of trade gave them. It was this vast business, and business of this kind which had made Canada a great maritime state; and hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the Chamber proposed to deprive our canals, our shipping, and our business men of this great volume of trade which had conferred such vast benefits on Canada. The proposition was an absurd one. True, they would say they could devise a plan by which, through the bonding system, this business could be retained. He (Mr. Charlton) denied it. So keen was the competition for the transaction of the western business between the American and Canadian channels, that a very slight difference was sufficient to turn the balance of that trade one way or the other; and the effect of a bonding system, no matter how liberally it might be devised, would be to divert the vast trade now going through Canadian channels, and send it to the American seaboard through American channels. Why did we build these canals? Why were we now spending millions of dollars to enlarge the Welland Canal? What was the policy of the Government? Was it to accommodate our own trade? No; our rulers saw that to the west of us was a country with unbounded resources; they saw that the trade of that country, wherever it flowed, gave beneficial results; they saw that it was building up great American cities on the seaboard; and it was to share in that prosperity that these canals had been devised and constructed. And, now, after the expenditure of the millions which had been required to make these channels of communication effective; now, when the Welland Canal could, when the enlargement was completed, bid defiance to all competitors for the western traffic, were we to step in and impose restrictions which would drive the western trade from our channels? The proposition was one of sheer fatuity. As to the duty on grain, we had a parallel case, which would show how little foundation the idea had that any advantage could be obtained from it. The United States imposed a duty, for the benefit of American farmers, on Canadian grain. Did that ever raise the price of the grain raised in the United States one cent, or confer any benefit on the American agriculturist? No; it simply drove from American channels the business which they enjoyed under the Free-trade system which prevailed when the Reciprocity Treaty was in force, for their surplus crops of grain, as well as ours, found a market abroad. He desired to call the attention of the House to the average prices which obtained for various kinds of produce when the Reciprocity Treaty was in force, and the prices which had obtained since its abrogation. The general idea was that the abrogation of that treaty had reduced the price of produce sold by Canada. Whether it did or not, the average prices had been higher since the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty than they were during its continuance. For instance, from 1854 to 1864, we received an average of $77.50 a head for horses; from 1866 to 1876, since the abrogation of the treaty, we had received an average of $94.53. During the continuance of the treaty, the average amount paid for sheep was $1.75; since the abrogation it had been $2.76.

MR. BOWELL: How many years does that run over.

MR. CHARLTON: Ten years.

MR. BOWELL: That includes the period of the American war.

MR. CHARLTON said no; that was included in the time of the existence of the Reciprocity Treaty, which was abrogated in 1866. Their neighbours on the other side had closed up their war first, and they abrogated the treaty afterwards. During the continuance of the treaty, the average amount paid for wool was 30c., during the period since its abrogation it was 34½c. The average amount paid for wheat during the continuance of the treaty was $1.13, and since it had been $1.24. What benefit had the American farmer derived from duties on Canadian grain? What had he realized out of the promises held out to him, to induce him to submit to taxation so onerous as to fall little, if any, short of robbery, in order that a few people might amass fortunes? What benefit could he derive from a duty on Canadian grain, when he was a seller of the very same article, and the price was fixed in the open market of the world? The same proposal made here was a delusion and a snare to the agriculturists of this country.

MR. ORTON: Does the hon. gentleman mean to infer that a reciprocity treaty would be an injury to Canada?

MR. CHARLTON: Not at all; the whole drift of my argument is in favour of free intercourse.

MR. COLBY: The hon. gentleman's object is, apparently, to show how Protection has affected the prices of agricultural products in the United States.

MR. CHARLTON said he was proposing to show what the result had been in the country which had given Protection the fairest trial any country in the world had given it. He had one word to say in reference to the much talked of question of the balance of trade. If a balance of trade existed against a country they were told that it was on the high road to ruin. It would be an astounding fact to his hon. friends on the other side, to inform them that, for the last 17 years, there had been an enormous balance of trade against England which had averaged £113,500,000 in every one of those years. Why was not England ruined? Because the balance of trade represented her profits. He would make a familiar illustration of the manner in which false impressions were derived from Custom-house entries. Suppose Mr. A. B., of Halifax, sent a vessel loaded with lumber or fish to the West Indies; suppose the Custom-house valuation was $50,000, and allow for freight and charges to the West Indies $10,000 more. Suppose that the cargo sold in the West Indies for 25 per cent. advance on the first cost, then Mr. A. B. realized $72,500 on the original cost, freight and profit. He invested that in colonial produce and brought it to Halifax. Adding 15 per cent. for freight and other charges, the entry in the Custom-house, inwards, would be $83,375, the outward entry being $50,000. The books would then show a balance of trade against Canada of $33,375. Had Canada lost that? No; the effect had been to add to the wealth of Canada $12,500; the profit on cargo, the net profit on freight and charges each way would be, say $8,000 more, so that the total amount added to the wealth of Canada was $20,500. The profits of the merchant were the profits on the outward cargo, $12,500; net profit on freight, both ways, $8,000; profits of sale on return cargo, say 20 per cent., amounting to $16,675; total actual profits of the merchant on outward and return cargo, $37,175. Without regard to the merchant's individual gains, part of which were realized by sale of cargo within Canada, the total increase to the wealth of Canada in consequence of the outward and return voyage was $23,500, while the apparent loss, as indicated by the Custom-house entries, was $33,375. Now, suppose another case. Suppose that same cargo cleared from Halifax, and the vessel foundered at sea and nothing was heard of her afterwards. Then the records of the Custom-house would show $50,000 exports, imports nothing; clear gain to the country, $50,000. They could see the absurdity of the calculations based upon the generally received opinions as to the balance of trade.

MR. BOWELL: The richer we get the more we buy.

MR. CHARLTON: Yes.

MR. BOWELL: Where does the money come from to pay for it?

MR. CHARLTON said he felt that he did not need to ask the indulgence of the House while he entered pretty fully into the discussion of the effect of Protection in the United States, because almost every gentleman on the other side pointed to the United States as a proof of everything he said in favour of Protectionist principles. It was worth their while to examine minutely, and carefully and candidly into the operations of Protection in the United States, and he proposed to ask the indulgence of the House to-night while he entered into that question fully, because they had in that country a practical illustration of the operations of Protection and could leave the domain of theory and judge by actual results in place of speculating about fanciful consequences. They could tell, by carefully scanning the effect of Protection in the United States, what the effect would probably be in this country. That system and its opposite, Non-Protection, had been thoroughly tried in that country. No country had given each of those systems a more thorough and satisfactory trial than the United States. There had been three distinct and different non-protective periods, and there had been three distinct and different protective periods; and from statistics, from the experience of that country in those different periods, they could ascertain to a mathematical certainty, what had been the operation of Protection there, and from that they could draw a very reasonable conclusion as to what would be the result here. Their first non-protective period was from 1789 to 1816, their second from 1833 to 1842, and their third from 1847 to 1861. Their first protective period had been from 1816 to 1833, their second from 1842 to 1846, and their third from 1861 to the present time. He proposed to examine, as briefly as he could, into the working of these different periods. He proposed first of all, to direct the attention of the House to the astounding amount of duties and taxation wrung from the consumers of the United States in the last of those periods of Protection, commencing with 1861, and still in vogue.

MR. POPE (Compton): That is the highest.

MR. CHARLTON said it was; but perhaps he had selected it for that purpose, as best illustrating the effect of a thorough system of Protection. The amount collected in the last protective period, as the Custom-house books showed, had been $2,429,978,000. The best authorities in that country—Robt. J. Walker, Wm. Burchard, and other experts in that matter—considered that for every $5 which the Government received in duties under a protective system, the manufacturers received $14 in enhanced prices for the domestics which they produced. If that theory was correct, while the United States Government had received this enormous sum from the producers of food and the consumers of goods, the manufacturers had received, in enhanced prices, $4,873,000,000.

MR. ORTON: What is the hon. gentleman reading from?

MR. CHARLTON: From some tables I have compiled from the Custom-house Returns, and authorities I have cited as to increased cost of domestics under Protection.

MR. ORTON: I thought, perhaps, he might be reading from the speech of the Minister of the Interior at Fergus.

MR. CHARLTON said this was the result of the direct and indirect cost of these duties. This represented the wholesale cost of these duties. Now, it was fair to add to the amount of the profits of the wholesale and retail dealers, not less than twenty-five per cent., then they had $1,700,000,000 increased cost, in consequence of wholesale and retail profits, or altogether $3,504,000,000 as the cost of that precious system of Protection during the last 17 years. What had they got by it? They had made a loss out of it. They had received less for everything they had to sell, and paid more for nearly everything they had to buy. What had been promised to these men to induce them to submit to this frightful taxation? They were promised the same thing which his hon. friends on the other side were promising now. They were promised a policy which should benefit the agricultural, mining, manufacturing, and other industries of the United States. This was the promise made; and a more delusive, a more unfounded promise than this that hon. gentlemen on the other side were making never was made; and the same promise and policy, if accepted, would bring in its train the disaster and loss that had followed the adoption of that policy in the United States. When Protection was introduced into that country, its promoters said to those interested in the agricultural interest: "We assure you, if you adopt this policy, it will create such a vast consumption in the United States that you will have to import agricultural produce from abroad for your own market. Although you will have to pay more for your goods, the system in the end will prove a great gain to yourselves."

MR. COLBY: Who said that?

MR. CHARLTON said that the advocates of Protection said it; Horace Greeley, Henry C. Carey, and every man that wrote Protection articles in the United States, from Maine to Georgia and New York to California, said it; and they not only said it, but they brought every possible argument forward to induce people to believe that Protection would create a market at home for the agricultural surplus of the United States.

MR. YOUNG: That they would have to import into the United States?

MR. CHARLTON said they promised this, and yet, at this very time, after seventeen years of most efficient Protection, and with its manufacturing system unduly developed, that nation was exporting wheat, butter, cheese, beef, cotton, wool, and all the productions of the farm. They had paid enormous sums in order to get this home market, and, although they had adopted the policy of Protection for this purpose, and had been trying all these years to obtain a home market, they had not got it, and had not prospered better than they would have done under Free-trade, as he should be able to show. The agriculturist did not get what had been promised him; he was robbed, not only on the one hand, but on the other: he had to pay enhanced prices for what he bought, and received reduced prices for what he sold. They had an average duty of 44 per cent., which was sufficiently high, if the system could be made efficient. The manufacturing corporations, possessed as they were of vast wealth, had thronged the lobbies at Washington, and spent money lavishly for the purpose of obtaining the legislation they chose to demand. They had had efficient Protection in that country; and, if the system were capable of producing the results promised, those results would have been produced in the United States. The system was a fallacy there, it would be a fallacy here, it would be a fallacy everywhere; and, where adopted, the people would be robbed for the benefit of monopolies. This was so in the United States. The adoption of the system led manufacturers to rapidly extend their operations. They produced a great quantity of goods, and, though profits were at first enormous, the result of the system, which impoverished the consumer from the start, in a few years brought reaction and loss of profits upon the manufacturer himself. Was the development of the manufacturing industries of the United States as much more rapid under Protection than under Non-Protection as might have been expected? Let them look at the returns of the manufacturing industries of the country in various periods. From United States census returns he found that the gross product of manufactures in 1850 was \$1,019,106,616; deducting cost of material, the net product was \$463,982,734. In 1860, after sixteen years of Non-Protection, the gross product of manufactures was \$1,855,861,676; net product \$854,251,584. In 1870, after ten years of Protection, the gross production had risen very largely. It had risen to the sum of \$4,232,325,442; but the increase on the net production had not been so great; it was only \$1,743,898. They found, then, that the percentage of increase in the years from 1850 to 1860 was, upon the gross product, forty-six per cent., and the net product eighty-four per cent. This was without protection, but they found on the other hand that the increase on the gross products, under Protection, between the years 1860-70 was 124 per cent., and on the net products 104 per cent. And if they were to make allowance for the inflation of value in 1870, in consequence of irredeemable currency, gold being at a premium of over 20 per cent., the increase in the net product of manufactures in the protective period, from 1860 to 1870, was about 86½ per cent., as against 84 per cent. during the previous ten years of Non-Protection. That was to say that, in ten years of Non-Protection, from 1850 to 1860, the increase in the net products of the manufactures of the United States was within 2½ per cent. of what it was under Protection during the years between 1860-70. Now, there was one great industry in the United States—the iron industry—which had always made very strenuous demands on the Government for Protection, and argued that it had peculiar claims on the sympathy of the Government. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had informed them that the iron industry of the United States had made great strides under Protection since the time this industry had been established there. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would be surprised to hear that the iron industry was established in the United States in 1700, and that in 1732, they exported a large quantity of iron to England, and, in consequence, the jealousy of English iron-masters had induced them to ask the English Government for protection against that great American industry. What had been the effect of Protection in the case of this industry? Going as far back as 1832, they found that from that year to 1840, in a non-protective period, the total increase in products of their iron manufactures of all kinds was 73½ per cent. From 1840 to 1850, which embraced the same period of Protection, from 1842 to 1846, the increase in the production of pig iron was $77\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The production of iron for 1850, was 563,000 gross tons; in 1860, it was 884,000 gross tons, an increase of 60 per cent. in a non-protective period of ten years. The production of iron in 1870 was 1,663,000 gross tons, an increase of 88 per cent. in ten years under Protection. The production in 1876 was 1,741,000 gross tons, an increase of one-half per cent. in six years of Protection, against 88 per cent. in the preceding ten years, showing that the development of the industry had reached its climax during the first ten years of Protection ending 1870, and that from that time the progress and growth had almost entirely ceased.

An Hon. MEMBER: What was the duty during the period between 1850 and 1860?

MR. CHARLTON said the average duties on the entire list of imports in 1857 were $13\frac{5}{8}$ per cent. This was about the amount charged in Canada to-day, and under that amount the industries of the United States had prospered and grown rapidly. He found that in 1850, the value of all manufactures of iron was \$135,672,000; in 1860, it was \$256,137,000, an increase of 96 per cent. under Non-Protection in ten years. The number of hands employed in this industry in 1850, was 142,000; in 1860 it was 198,000, an increase of 40 per cent. in ten years under Non-Protection in that one single branch of industry. The value of all manufactures of iron in 1870 was \$500,000,000, an increase over 1860 of 91 per cent. during ten years of Protection. The number of hands employed in 1870 was 237,000, an increase during ten years of Protection of 20 per cent., as against 40 per cent. in the ten years of Non-Protection, between 1850 and 1860. The number of blast-furnaces in 1876 was 713, and their annual capacity was 4,856,000 gross tons. The production in that year was 1,741,000 gross tons, which showed that they had created a productive capacity of 3,155,000 tons more than they required, and had expended at least \$100,000,000 under the unhealthy stimulus of high protective duties, in erecting furnaces in excess of the wants of the country, the vast majority of which would not have been wanted for fifty years to come. This vast investment was practically thrown away. It was a dead loss to the country; and, but for the delusive inducements of Protection, it might to-day have been invested in agricultural and other interests, where it would be yielding more or less adequate returns. And not only the iron interest, but nearly every manufacturing interest in the United States had been overdone under the unhealthy stimulus of Protection. A few years ago, it would be remembered, a reservoir had burst, sending a deluge of water down one of the valleys of Massachusetts, which overwhelmed several villages and a great number of manufacturing establishments. Among those destroyed were a number of paper mills, and the calamity was actually viewed as a blessing by the paper interest, because it had reduced the productive capacity, which was too large. In the same way, if an earthquake were to swallow up 400 of the 713 blast-furnaces in the United States, and bury in the bowels of the earth the scores of millions which they cost the owners of the remaining furnaces would hail that calamity as a godsend, because, by an act of Providence, the evil of too much productive capacity would be corrected. So much for the condition of the manufacturing industries of the United States at the present time. The tables he had quoted showed that the increase of the manufacturing industries during the period of Protection from 1846 to 1860 was satisfactory. It was true these tables showed that the increase in the production was stimulated and rendered greater under Protection in the years from 1860 to 1870; but since that time, business had not only been suddenly restricted, but what was the condition of affairs there to-day? A total sum of no less than \$200,000,000 had been invested in manufacturing enterprises beyond the wants of the country or the power of profitable employment, and might be said to have been practically thrown away. The system of Protection had unduly and unnaturally stimulated the manufacturing enterprises of the United States, and to-day we found more than two millions of idle men—more idle men, in fact, in that new country that possessed vast areas of fertile virgin soil, inviting the labour of the husbandman—than in Great Britain and Germany. They were told that in the United States to-day there were one million tramps. What was the reason that there were two millions of idle men and one million tramps in that country? It was because population, by the over-stimulation of manufactures, had gathered together in cities and towns to the neglect of agricultural interests. The agricultural community of the country had relatively received no increase since 1860, and the production of cereals per capita was year by year decreasing. One effect of this aggregation of population in cities was shown by the fact that part of the country was, last summer, laid under martial law, in order to suppress lawless violence. In the second manufacturing city of the United States, from a pure feeling of maliciousness and devilry, a large amount of damage had been done to property by incendiary conflagrations; one railway company having sustained a loss of \$3,000,000 from this cause. Communism had been created, and other social ills had followed the adoption of the extreme Protection which had been in vogue in the United States since the year 1861. He would read some agricultural statistics, and if these figures were true, they told an eloquent tale against the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. It was important for the people of this country, if they were to deal with this question of Protection, that they should understand that question in all its ramifications; and he had need of no further apology for laying before them this information than that it was necessary in order to understand the practical working of the protective principle in the United States of America. Grosvenor's compilations from the census returns of 1860 showed that the additions to the wealth of the country from farm produce, increase of stock, farm betterments, etc., was \$2,600,000,000. Ten years later, and after ten years of Protection, the census returns of 1870 showed the addition to the wealth of the country, from the same sources, had been reduced to \$2,448,000,000. That was the effect of Protection on the agricultural interests of the country, if these tables were reliable, as they probably were. The statistics showed that the amount of land in farms in 1860, was 407,212,538 acres, and in 1870 the amount of land in farms was 407,735,041 acres, or an increase of only one-tenth of one per cent. of land in farms in ten years. The acreage of land improved in 1860, was 163,100,720, and in 1870, 189,921,000 acres, or an increase in ten years of fifteen per cent. The improved lands in 1850 amounted to 113,032,614 acres, or an increase between the years 1850 to 1860, in a period of Non-Protection, of forty-five per cent. The land in farms in 1850 was 293,560,614 acres, an increase from 1850 to 1860 of thirty-nine per cent., as against an increase in the years between 1860 and 1870, under Protection, of one-tenth per cent. in total amount of lands in farms and of forty-five per cent. against fifteen per cent. in improved lands in farms in the same corresponding period. The same statistics showed the production of cereals and potatoes in 1860 was forty-five bushels per head; in 1868 it was forty-two bushels; in 1870 it was forty bushels, and in 1874 it was thirty-eight bushels; showing a continual and regular decrease in the agricultural products of the United States, based upon the population of the country. In fact, these statistics showed that the agricultural interest of the United States was in a languishing condition, and had been, for some reason, the very reverse of prosperous since the introduction of a protective policy. They had heard much from the opposite side of the Chamber, of the wonderful increase in the exports of manufactures from the United States since the introduction of Protection. He found that, in the article of cotton goods, in 1850, after four years of Non-Protection, the exports amounted to \$4,734,000, and that ten years afterwards, during the continuance of the same period of Non-Protection, the exports of cotton goods amounted to \$10,934,000. This large export of 1860 was in the last year of a Non-Protective period of fifteen years. In 1866, after six years of Protection, the amount of export of cotton goods had fallen to \$1,784,000. After seventeen years of Protection, they found that the export of cotton goods was not greater than at the commencement of that period; that in 1877, under the pressure of over-production, under the pressure of absolute necessity to dispose of accumulation of surplus stock, the export of cotton goods had only reached \$10,235,000. The following table gave the export of cotton goods from the United States in various years, from 1850 to 1877. The first five entries were during a period of Non Protection—the last five during the last period of Protection:—

| Exports in 1850..... | $ 4,734,000 |
| do 1857..... | 6,115,000 |
| do 1858..... | 5,651,000 |
| do 1859..... | 8,316,000 |
| do 1860..... | 10,934,000 |
| do 1866..... | 1,780,000 |
| do 1870..... | 3,787,000 |
| do 1874..... | 3,569,000 |
| do 1876..... | 7,722,000 |
| do 1877..... | 10,235,000 |

If the ratio of increase from 1850 to 1860, in a period of Non-Protection, had been maintained, the exports for 1870 and 1877 would have read as follows:—

|--------------------------------|--------------|
| do do 1877.. | 34,000,000 |

It was evident that the friends of Protection had been mistaken in stating that their policy would increase the amount of exports in manufactures, this table plainly showed that, by reason of Protection, the United States cotton manufacture industry had been rendered less able to compete with foreign manufactures in foreign markets than before. Let them take the total exports of all manufactures in various years as further illustration of the subject in hand. In 1857, the total exports amounted to $31,034,000; in 1859 to $33,848,000; in 1860 to $42,488,000; in 1877 to $72,677,000, against $1,000,000,000, the exportation of England during last year. Would the hon. member from Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) say, in the face of these facts, that the United States was jostling England in the markets of the world, and was about to exclude her from them. Now, had the ratio of increase from 1857 to 1860, in the United States been maintained till 1877, the total export of manufactured goods would have amounted, in round numbers, last year to $200,000,000. If they had left the Non-Protection system alone, if they had continued the non-protective policy that prevailed from 1847 to 1860, there was every reason to believe that, in the last fiscal year, instead of exporting $72,667,000 of manufactures, their export would have exceeded $200,000,000. So much for the blessings of this system, so far as it was applied to the interests of manufactures. It had been stated that the industrial classes had actually benefitted by this Protection. This was wrong; for by the introduction of the system there had been imposed over $8,000,000,000 in direct and indirect taxation, as he had previously shown, since 1860. The census of 1870 gave the number of persons employed in all industries at 12,506,933. He had been at great labour to ascertain the number of manufactures benefitted by Protection, and he found that, of the number of work-people mentioned, only 510,000, making a liberal estimate, had been benefitted by Protection. By selecting natural manufactures from manufactures belonging to protected industries, he found that the products of natural manufactures in 1870 amounted to $2,351,733,000; and, deducting the price of material, to $942,767,000 net; and the workpeople employed in these manufactures not only were not benefitted by Protection, but were actually injured by it. Out of the total industrial population of the United States, which was stated at 12,505,000 in 1870, on a liberal calculation not more than 510,000 employed in industries were benefitted by Protection, or about one man in every twenty-five of the population. No better illustration of the utter absurdity of the system than this could be brought forward. The net product of six great protected industries, viz., iron, cotton, woollen, paper, salt and glass, in 1870, was $947,925,000, and, deducting material, a net product of $104,524,000, the gross production, per hand, in natural manufactures in 1870 was $2,322; gross production, per hand, in six great protected industries was $1,378, as per census returns. The net production, per hand, in natural manufactures in 1870 was $895, while the net production of six great protected industries the same year was only $801 per hand, showing that the industries fostered by Protection were not producing so large a net result as the natural manufactures were. This afforded an illustration of the absurdity of endeavouring to build up industries that that country was not prepared for or adapted to. He should bring his remarks to a close by offering some tables showing the relative prices of farm products, labour, etc., during the periods of Protection and the periods of Non-Protection. These tables were of the utmost importance in forming an estimate of the results of a protective policy. The first reliable statistics relating to food prices, derived from the United States Treasury reports, did not date back earlier than the year 1825. Commencing with that year, he would give a table showing the average prices of wheat, corn, oats and cotton in different periods of Protection and Non-Protection, down to the year 1860, as follows:—

| | Wheat. | Corn. | Oats. | Cotton. | |
| 1825 to 1832... | $1 10½ | 62 | 37 | 10¾ | Protection. |
| 1833 to 1842... | 1.35½ | 77½ | 43 | 12 | Non-Protect. |
| 1843 to 1846... | 1.02 | 57 | 34½ | 6½ | Protection. |
| 1847 to 1850... | 1.26 | 68½ | 43 | 9 | Non-Protect. |
| 1850 to 1854... | 1.44 | 71½ | 47 | 9½ | do |
| 1855 to 1860... | 1.69 | 81½ | 48½ | 10½ | do |

This would give an average price of wheat during all the periods of Protection from 1825 to 1860 of $1.06½, of corn 59½c., of oats 35½c., of cotton 8½c. During all periods of Non-Protection, from 1825 to 1860, the average prices were—wheat, $1.43½; corn, 74½c.; oats, 45½c.; cotton, 10½c. The average price of wheat from 1861 to 1869, under Protection, was $1.06. gold. These were contrasts of the prices of the various products of the soil during the periods of Protection and Non-Protection. Did not those figures show conclusively that the average prices of these products were less under Protection than under Non-Protection. The following table showed the comparative prices obtained for flour during different periods:—

| Average price last 4 years, Non-Protection period, 1839 to 1842..... | $5 45 |
| Average price 4 years, Protection period, 1843 to 1846..... | 4 46 |
| Average price 15 years, Non-Protection period, 1847 to 1861..... | 5 86 |
| Average price 9 years, Protection period, 1862 to 1870..... | 4 71 |

He would only trouble the House with two more tables, setting forth the average price of wool and the average price of labour during the different periods of Protection and Non-Protection, and then he should be done with his statistics, which could be left to tell their own tale. He would first call attention to the prices of wool under different periods of Protection and Non-Protection. The United States Treasury report showed the following with regard to prices of wool during the different periods:—

| | Common. | Merino. | Pulled. | |
| 1825 to 1832..... | 27½ | 43½ | 32½ | Protection. |
| 1842 to 1846..... | 32½ | 32 | 27 | do |
| Average..... | 25½ | 37½ | 29½ | During 2 Protection periods |
| 1833 to 1841..... | 34 | 49 | 42 | Non-Protection. |
| 1847 to 1856..... | 32 | 39½ | 31 | do |
| 1857 to 1860..... | 35½ | 44½ | 28½ | do |
| Average..... | 33½ | 44½ | 33½ | During 2 periods of Non-Protect. |
| Price in 1860 av | 38½ | 50 | 29 | Non-Protection. |
| " Gold 1869 " | 36½ | 41½ | 26½ | Protection. |
| " in 1846 at end of Protection period..... | 20½ | 27½ | 22½ | End of a Protection period of 4 yrs. |
| Price in 1850, after 4 yrs Non-Protection | 33½ | 40½ | 34½ | After 4 years of Non-Protection |

He held in his hands a table of wages which established the fact that in the great manufacturing city of Lowell, Massachusetts, the rate of wages in all the different employments was uniformly higher in a non-protective periods than in a protective periods. Taking the woollen and cotton factories, it appeared that the average daily wages paid at that city were as follows: Cotton in 1839,

Non-Protection, $1.32; in 1845, Protection period, $1.05; in 1849, Non-Protection, $1.30; in 1859, Non-Protection, $1.43. The daily wages in woollen mills during the same period were as follows: 1839, 94c.; in 1845, 89c.; in 1849, 84c. and in 1859, 90c. A comparison of the average rates of wages in various trades in 1845, at the end of a Protection period, and in 1860, at the end of a Non-Protection period, would show the following contrasts.—

|--------------------------------------|--------|---------|
| Edge tools, weekly..... | $7 50 | $10 70 |
| Hardware, daily..... | 1 25 | 1 55 |
| Foundry and glassware, daily..... | 1 22 | 1 51 |
| Leather, weekly..... | 6 00 | 8 00 |
| Paper mills, daily..... | 1 00 | 1 23 |
| Farm labour, monthly.. | 9 00 | 14 00 |

Though without thoroughly reliable data, he ventured to say that labour in the United States was more insufficiently paid after seventeen years of Protection than in 1860, after nearly the same period of Non-Protection, and he unhesitatingly asserted that it was vastly more difficult to obtain employment. He might sum up his statement by saying that he considered he had produced abundant evidence of the fact that the effect of Protection on agriculture in the United States had been a disastrous one, and that the effect of Protection on manufactures in the United States had also in the end been a disastrous one. $72,000,000 of goods were exported last year, but the annual interest at six per cent. on the vast sum paid directly in duties since 1861 for the purpose of protecting home industry would amount to almost exactly twice that sum, or to $144,000,000 per annum. He had shown that the production of cereals per head had fallen year by year; that the rates of increase in the agricultural population of that country had diminished; that the prices realized by agriculturists under Protection had been less than under Non-Protection; and that the effect of Protection on manufactures had been to involve the entire system in ruin. He had shown that hundreds of millions of dollars to-day in the United States were invested uselessly and practically lost, and that, in consequence of the evil of over-production, American manufacturers had succeeded in exporting goods to a limited extent which, under the normal action of Protective duties, they would not have been able to do. He had shown that the position of manufacturers in the United States to-day was more depressed than that of the manufacturers of Canada or any other great manufacturing country, and that depression, which sat like a nightmare upon their industrial interests, was the direct fruit of Protection in that country, and that the system of Protection had produced unmixed evil in all the industries of the United States. At a time when the verdict of the American people at the polls had but recently decided by overwhelming popular majorities that Protection was wrong; at a time when the people had declared that the policy of the country should be changed; at a time when legislation was pending in Congress for the purpose of reducing by more than two-thirds the list of articles on which duties were imposed; at this very time certain wise men in Canada gathered together at Toronto, a few weeks ago, from the east, west and north, in solemn convocation, and affirmed, as the leader of the Opposition had affirmed on the floor of this House, that we in Canada want this policy that had caused disaster in the United States,—this absurd policy which had led to the great injury of the agriculturists, the manufacturers, the commercial marine and all the business interests of the United States.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: What fools the Yankees must be.

MR. CHARLTON said the difference between them and ourselves was, that they had seen their folly, and were trying to extricate themselves from a false position, while our fools were trying to step into their difficulties. Those hon. gentlemen opposite reminded him of the story of Rip Van Winkle, who, tradition said, after sleeping for several years, woke up one morning to see things very much changed. Those hon. gentlemen went to sleep ten or fifteen years ago, during the palmy days of Protection; they had woke up, but had not examined their bearings yet, or observed what the results of the system had been. He did not know whether the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), when he was in the United States, was a barn-burner or an old hunker Democrat; but, whichever he was, he was a Free-trader. Though under a Rip Van Winkle spell now, those who felt anxious about his safety might reasonably hope that he would awaken some day and return to his old faith. Hon. gentlemen opposite were proposing to give this country the Protection system of the United States, to re-enact the English Corn Laws that were abolished thirty years ago, and to confer at one and the same time the blessings of dear corn, dear coal, dear salt, and dearer goods. They proposed to seek the prosperity of the agriculturist, the miner, and all other interests in Canada by a process of depletion, of bleeding, of taxation, by robbing one to enrich the other, and then taking from the other to enrich the one, by a process of plunder, and passing the spoils from hand to hand. They were going to adopt a policy which would enrich the country very much as an old Yankee once said that his boys made money on rainy days when he averred that each one, with a jackknife, a top and some odd trinkets, would commence trading with the others, and before night, such was their 'cuteness, each would be found to have made ten dollars, though they had no more knives, tops and trinkets among them than when they first commenced this system of domestic commerce on a small scale. That was very much the system of political economy that hon. gentleman opposite proposed to introduce into Canada. He had only to say that the policy was a disastrous one, that its practical results were before their eyes, that it had been tried in the United States under most favourable auspices; a country with a vast extent of fertile soil, with great variety of climate and production; a country enriched with the boundless endowments of prodigal nature, and comprising in its vast range of resources a miniature world within itself, and yet, under these favourable circumstances, the system of Protection had completely broken down, and had illustrated the fact that its practical results were disastrous, and could only be disastrous in the extreme. The intelligent people of Canada had but to have these facts placed before them for consideration, and they would reject this political scheme of the Opposition, which was adopted by them, not because they truly believed it to be a policy that would benefit Canada; not even because they expected to reconcile conflicting interests and reduce their absurd theories to practice if successful before the people; but because they believed it would be a specious and delusive cry which would catch the popular ear with its vague generalities and loud promises, and might serve to give them a temporary advantage, and lead them to that goal of their prayers and ambition—the loaves and fishes of office—to reach which, they were willing to travel by any road and to profess any principles.

Mr. BUNSTER said they had been treated to a speech from the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond), on the one hand, and to a display of a great deal of American intelligence on the other hand, from an hon. gentleman who, he believed, was an American by birth. For his part, he believed in British more than in American legislation in this House, and particularly in Canadian legislation. He thought it would be more becoming to Canadians on the floor of this House to quote from their own rulings and actions rather than from those of their neighbours across the border, and hence not afford these neighbours so much opportunity for laughing at them, as would probably be the case under the present circumstances. The hon. member for North York had been candid enough to admit that he had not been for a very long time a Canadian citizen, and that, since he had become one, he had only acquired very slight knowledge of Canadian politics. With this statement he perfectly agreed, and there was therefore nothing more to be said on that head. They were all perfectly aware that the President of the United States had two millions of secret service money in his hands to be used for the promotion of peculiar American interests, and for that purpose. They knew very well that it had been employed in the exploration of foreign countries, and it might even be used in the exploration of this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. gentleman to order. He cannot make any insinuation of that kind, and my impression was that the hon. gentleman's remarks tended towards an individual member of the House. This cannot be permitted.

Mr. BUNSTER said that Mr. Speaker had misunderstood the purport of what he had said. He had not alluded to hon. members in the House, he had simply referred to the exploration of foreign countries. He was also perfectly well aware that money had been expended in the exploration of Alaska and British Columbia by the United States. This was done before British Columbia entered Confederation; but the loyalty of its people and their British blood made them prefer Canada to the United States; and they knew well that this country would not part with that portion of the continent. What did the hon. member for North York know about this country? The hon. gentleman had only been five years in it. It would have been much better for the hon. gentleman to have come to the House, under the circumstances, as an independent member than as the bondsman of a partizan newspaper proprietor, or be sent there in his proper capacity as the representative of his newspaper. He (Mr. Bunster) came to the House as the free and independent representative of a free and independent constituency, perfectly fearless and above-board. He was at the bidding of no man, and his sole object was to carry out the wishes of his constituents, and to see what this country was going to do towards fulfilling the obligations it had entered into with regard to his constituents. He considered that this was his duty. He was not at the bidding of any master in any manner, shape or form. He merely served the interests of his constituency in the House; and he would do this fearlessly and honestly. He, for one, was grieved to see the time of the House taken up in the way that it had been during this afternoon; and hon. members would bear with him if he reminded them that he had endeavoured, a short time since, to curtail the expenses of the legislation of this country. When they reflected on the fact that it cost $13,000 odd a day to legislate for the Dominion, he thought that the interests of the people, whose mere agents they were, demanded that this matter should no longer be fooled with. When they heard hon. gentlemen speaking at such length about salt, salt, salt eternally, he could not refrain from thinking that there were salts of which they knew nothing. He questioned very much whether these hon. gentlemen knew the difference between Mexican, Liverpool, and Canadian salt, or that the quality of one was much superior to that of the other. We had salt of our own that was superior to the others; and he was one of the Canadians who, having adopted Canada as his country, believed that he should protect salt, and give our own article the preference. He took up the question of salt because he presumed that the discussion that evening had been tolerably well salted if it had not been liquidated. He did not want to see the discussion dropped until such time as it would probably be sufficiently pickled to carry out, in a reasonable way, their wishes and preferences; but he feared that the pickle had not been properly placed in the interests of the people. It had rather astonished him, during the debate that evening, to hear an hon. gentleman refer back to old discussions of ten years ago, which were now played out. He thought that hon. gentlemen who aspired to seats in this Parliament ought to be more progressive and enterprising than to speak of matters which had taken place ten and twenty years ago, before the hon. gentleman from North York (Mr. Dymond) had even heard of Canada; when they must know that we lived in a progressive age, and that we were far more advanced than we were ten years ago. The man who spoke of the Pacific Railway ten years ago would be considered a lunatic, and he was considered a lunatic, although, in one sense, he was the most intelligent man on the continent of America. When the building of the trans-continental railway to San Francisco was mooted, a great many statesmen had called the projectors of that great enterprise lunatics. We had now, notwithstanding what had been said by statesmen, great Canadian railways. A practical surveyor was sent out, named Waddington; and he was always spoken of by those who knew him with feelings of respect, though he was an Englishman. That gentleman surveyed the coast of British Columbia—that inhospitable coast, as it had been called that evening, a statement which he (Mr. Bunster) denied the applicability of; a statement which, in the interests of the country, should not have been made. Mr. Waddington, having made his survey, told them where would be the place that the Canadian Pacific Railway should terminate. Other surveyors had expressed the same opinion; in fact, that was the only route which could properly command the commerce to be transported across the continent. No time was to be lost; for, in the course of a few years, we would probably have to compete with no fewer than three railways. There was the Southern Pacific Railway which went through the State of Kansas to Texas—he was mistaken; he meant—

Some HON. MEMBERS: Go on.

MR. BUNSTER said he intended to go on, but considered it very unfair that hon. gentleman should be so disinclined to hear anything regarding British Columbia. He felt proud of British Columbia, which was the most extensive portion of the Dominion of Canada. He did not for a moment wish to monopolize the time of the House—

Some HON. MEMBERS: Go on.

MR. BUNSTER said he was going on, and did not wish to be interrupted. Hon. gentlemen, it would seem, did not understand the wants of the country which he represented, and he had felt it his duty to inform them as to what the people of British Columbia wanted, and what they had to contend with. Of the three American railways he had alluded to, two were already in the course of construction. Perhaps there might be some on the Opposition side who wished for further information, and to these he would willingly supply it.

MR. BUNSTER.

AN HON. MEMBER: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. Are we discussing the Pacific Railway or an amendment. I should like to know, therefore, whether the hon. gentleman is in order or not

MR. SPEAKER: My impression is that the hon. gentleman should confine himself to the amendment.

MR. BUNSTER said he merely wished to point out that the Pacific Railway would open up British Columbia and develop its resources. A great deal had been said that evening regarding coal. The transport of coal from the interior was a matter which affected the Province of British Columbia, and the people of that Province felt deeply interested therein. If the railway was opened up, that and other industries of British Columbia would be developed as a matter of course. It would appear, however, that they could not enlist the sympathies of the people on this side of the continent, and the four or five members who came from British Columbia were looked on with a jealous eye. These members, notwithstanding, were determined to assert their rights and demand that which had been promised them—namely, that a railway should be started on their side of the country at an early day. If that railroad was given them so that they might set about developing their resources, they would be able to get a better price for their coal than had been stated that evening, although coal might not probably be included in the amendment of the hon. gentleman. Then the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) went on to depreciate the agricultural resources of the country. He (Mr. Bunster) thought they were as great and as valuable as those of other Provinces, but were we protecting them when we allowed American corn to come in here duty free, to the depreciation of our cereals and coarse grains? Let them look at the amount of corn which was imported; it was used in our distilleries; but, if they could not get American corn, they would use the coarse grain of Canada, and our farmers would then have more interest in clearing the forest and more confidence in a home market than they had now. The Americans probably had their agents in this country, and might have them round this House—he did not say on the floor of the House—watching what action we were taking, as against their interests. When 4,000,000 peo- had to make a bargain with 40,000,000, the 4,000,000 were generally likely to get the worst of the bargain. That was unfortunately the case with Canada, just the same as it was with British Columbia when she made a bargain with Canada, which was not carried out. When British Columbia asked to have Protection granted to her, she was laughed at and derided, although she had tried to represent her case fairly. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had the other evening stated that the cause of the depression in Canada was the depression in the United States. He considered that statement unbecoming a Canadian or a British statesman. He considered that the whole depression in this country was due to the non-carrying out of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to not granting to our farmers the amount of Protection which they ought to have. They might talk about retaliation as much as they pleased, but the people would soon say that it was requisite that such Protection should be granted to our agriculturists. He claimed that, if this Canadian Pacific Railway had been prosecuted in the interests of this Dominion, what with cheap labour, cheap materials, and cheap rates of interest on money in England, which was going begging for the want of safe investment—and the Finance Minister had stated the other day that Canadian investments were good investments—this country would be in a prosperous and growing condition, as he expected to see it in a few years, and probably the only thing which would give people confidence in remaining on British soil, would be to see that great enterprise, the Canadian Pacific Railway, carried out and Protection given to agriculturists. The Province of British Columbia had been the boon of Canada, and he was happy to say that, probably before long, its Custom-houses would outshine any Custom-house in any other part of Canada, in the amount of dues which they would get, when a few more of their inhospitable mountains turned out the gold which would bring thousands, and probably millions, of people to their shores. Then the Government would see that it was necessary to build that road; these mountains of gold would force the Government of the day, or any Government which might be in power, to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, in consequence of the influx of people that would take place. He knew that British Columbia was going to have its population doubled during the next season, in consequence of the good report which was given of their mountains, and of the fertility of their valleys. They could beat any part of Canada in producing cereals, and vegetables, and corn.

AN HON. MEMBER: We acknowledge the corn.

MR. BUNSTER said he was glad to hear it; they took corn-juice once in a while. He concluded by expressing the hope that the Government would adopt the amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston, and would push through the Canadian Pacific Railway.

MR. PALMER moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. MACKENZIE: Of course, then, the debate is adjourned until Monday.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think I must object to that.

MR. MACKENZIE: Object as much as you like.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought private members of this House had some rights. On Wednesday, in consequence of its being Ash Wednesday, the private business of the House in the hands of private members had been thrown over. The hon. gentleman had stated that he would assist as far as possible in getting through that private business. There was no reason in the world why the Government should insist on taking Monday. The hon. gentleman had said yesterday that he would take this motion as a vote of want of confidence. Suppose it were a vote of want of confidence,

Mr. Speaker had already ruled that that was no reason why the rules of the House should be infringed upon. These matters could be discussed on Government days. But, with all due deference to the hon. gentleman, it seemed to him (Sir John A. Macdonald) that it was absurd to call this a motion of want of confidence.

MR. HOLTON: If it were carried, what would become of it?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is just the same as the repeal of a Government measure. It is not a vote of want of confidence, and the Government need not resign.

MR. YOUNG: It is an amendment to Supply.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that in England an opportunity was given every day when any man could move what he liked, bring forward any grievance, or state any fallacy. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) had been so particular in preparing the amendment in this respect that he had not expressed any regret at the course or omission of the Government. The amendment simply stated that the best interest of Canada would be promoted by a readjustment of the tariff which would develop our industries, and that did not force the Government into any line which they did not chose to adopt. It was an assertion that a certain line of policy would be for the interests of the country; but it did not order the Government to bring down a measure during the present Session. No one knew better than his hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) that it was absurd to say that it was a vote of want of confidence, and he had no doubt that that hon. gentleman would not lend his sanction, as an old Parliamentarian, to such a ridiculous statement. It would be attacking the first principle of the liberties of this House to say that no motion could be made on going into Committee of Supply, without the Minister claiming that it was a motion of want of confidence. It looked as if it were done for the purpose of preventing hon. members from making the motions on the paper. He thought it very suspicious. They could remember the way in which the First Minister took the chance of throwing the business over Ash Wednesday. The House had sat last Ash Wednesday.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Well, then, the Session before.

MR. MACKENZIE: No. If the hon. gentleman is so sure, will he show me the place in the Journals.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that was his impression. However, Mr. Speaker had decided this question, and he (Sir John A. Macdonald) insisted that this House was not merely a body to register the decrees of the Government. It was a free Parliament representing a free people; and this was an unheard-of attempt to prevent independent members from calling the Government to account, and pointing out their maladministration, just because the Government chose to say that this was a vote of want of confidence, and, therefore, they would take the private members' days.

MR. HOLTON said he perfectly agreed with the hon. gentleman that this was not a vote of want of confidence by reason of its being moved in amendment to a motion to go into Committee of Supply. What had been often remarked, and had been often asserted, by hon. gentleman on his side of the House was that, in accordance with English practice, a motion put in this connection did not necessarily involve a want of confidence, by reason of its being put in amendment to Committee of Supply. But let them look at the substance of the motion itself. Was the motion, in its essence, a motion of want of confidence? Of course it was. It traversed the whole policy of the Government; it condemned the whole policy of the Government as embodied in the Budget speech of the Finance Minister. The whole speeches from the other side of the House had been in condemnation of the Government policy.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The speeches have nothing to do with it; it is simply a motion.

MR. HOLTON said of course it was the motion, but the speeches might be taken in connection with it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the speeches were made before the motion.

MR. HOLTON said, as establishing the motion, undoubtedly. But the motion was a vote of want of confidence in its very essence. The House might have dealt with it much more freely if brought forward as an independent motion in reference to a change in the policy of the country; but, being put in this connection, it involved necessarily the instantaneous resignation of the Government or the dissolution of this Parliament if it were carried.

Several HON. MEMBERS: No.

MR. HOLTON said he contended that it was an attack, and a deliberate attack, by the Opposition, through its leader, upon the life of the Government, and it had always been held in England, as his right hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald) knew full well, and it was also held by the great leaders of the Liberal party who established responsible government in this country, that a vote of want of confidence must be pursued from day to day, until it was decided. And, as a further consequence, it had often been argued that the Government, pending discussion of a serious vote of want of confidence brought forward by the Opposition as an attack upon the life of the Government, was rendered incapable of proceeding with the necessary administrative business of the country until the motion had been voted upon by the House. This was the English doctrine, and it was a sound and constitutional doctrine. He was quite clear that this was a motion of want of confidence, and consequently that sound parliamentary practice required that it should be proceeded with until finally disposed of.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, if it were, it was not so last year, nor the year before, and the hon. gentleman never made such a pretence last year. It was infinitely more a vote of want of confidence in 1876, but yet the hon. gentleman did not feel that he was called upon to interrupt the general business of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE said that last year he was for taking a similar course, but the Speaker ruled against him. When this motion was introduced on the preceding evening, he immediately stated that he received it as a vote of want of confidence in the Government, which must be pursued to the end, and therefore it must be continued. Did hon. gentlemen think that, after such a motion was carried, he should hold office for a moment? The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) might, but he (Mr. Mackenzie) had a different idea of the position. The hon. gentleman and his followers had said that they were going to carry the country on this; that this was to be a matter they were to pursue to get out the Administration; and now the hon. gentleman said he meant nothing by it; that it was a mere expression of opinion, forsooth. They had taken up this time with a senseless debate, which, according to his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) own statement, meant nothing—that he declared had no meaning except to put this obnoxious resolution upon the Journals of the House.

MR. MASSON said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had himself allowed a Private Bill to be taken that afternoon, so that, if it was a vote of want of confidence, and must be continued to the end, to the exclusion of other business, the hon. gentleman had given up all ground on that point. He would go further, and say that, supposing it were a vote of non-confidence, it was not right for the Government to push discussion if the Opposition did not wish it. In England, the custom was that, when a vote was a direct vote of non-confidence in words, it was usual to continue the debate until the question was determined; but, as was decided by Mr. Speaker last year, when a motion was not a direct vote of non-confidence in words, but by implication, the rule was not to be applied. If the Government were allowed to carry their point in this matter, it would leave the Opposition entirely at their mercy. They might take up any motion and declare it a vote of non-confidence. Properly, they could only do this when both sides agreed that it was a vote of non-confidence. He might go still further. The rule in England was that resolutions introduced by the Government for the taxation of the country might be thrown out, and yet the vote be not considered one of want of confidence, because the Government must leave something to the opinions and wishes of the House. He maintained there was no rule under which the Government could deprive the House of proceeding with the ordinary business, unless the Government gave previous notice of their intention to do so,—the notice required, under Rule 19 of this House, being two days.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Terrebonne did not surely mean to argue that the Opposition were to determine what was a vote of want of confidence in the Government. Some one must determine it, and, if the Government did not know what constituted such a vote, there was no authority in the House which could do so. Every hon. member knew that this was a vote of want of confidence, and he (Mr. Mackenzie) had said that if it were carried he could not remain in office. The motion was proposed for the express purpose of making political capital against the Government in the hope of obtaining a large vote. It was moved and supported by those who were hostile to the Government, and their speeches, and all the attendant circumstances pointed to this as the most direct want of confidence motion that could be moved. He was not called upon to enter into a discussion as to what the Government should do in regard to the business on certain days, but he took the ground that, this being a motion of want of confidence in the Administration, it must be pursued to the end.

MR. CAMERON said the rule was very plainly laid down by authorities on English Parliamentary practice, that, in cases of want of confidence motions, more especially if they were not drawn in direct terms, the debate did not necessarily proceed from day to day. The point was discussed on two prominent occasions in 1870 and 1872, on each of which Mr. Gladstone, as leader of the Government, expressly refused to submit to the doctrine which was then endeavoured to be forced upon him that, because the motion proposed was a vote of want of confidence, the debate should necessarily take precedence of all the other business of the House. A reference to those authorities would show that Mr. Gladstone guarded himself against being bound by any such rule as that a want of confidence motion naturally took precedence. It might or it might not. If it were a direct vote of censure, or a motion of want of confidence in words, it would take precedence; but, if it were only indirect, other considerations must apply, such as the state of public business, the source from which the motion emanated, and various other matters.

MR. HOLTON : What was the motion to which you refer, and by whom was it proposed ?

MR. CAMERON said one was Mr. Fawcett's motion in regard to the Irish University Bill. Mr. Gladstone accepted it as a motion of want of confidence in the Government, and expressly stated that, if it were carried, he would consider it expressed want of confidence in his Government, because it attacked a Bill which was brought down as one of the Government measures of the Session.

MR. MACKENZIE : I say the same now.

MR. CAMERON said in that case Mr. Gladstone refused to allow Mr. Fawcett's motion to take precedence. There was a very animated discussion in the House, and Mr. Fawcett endeavoured to resist the decision of Mr. Gladstone; but had, at last, to submit to it. Mr. Fawcett endeavoured to put himself right by submitting a motion to compel an immediate discussion on the want of confidence motion. The other case to which he had referred was a motion introduced by Lord Bury in respect to the Geneva arbitration. Each of those motions Mr. Gladstone's Government was prepared to accept as votes of want of confidence; but, on both occasions, he refused to allow the ordinary business of the House to be suspended until those motions were disposed of.

MR. SPEAKER said this was a question that had always given him much trouble, and caused him a good deal of doubt. Although he had carefully looked over the authorities, he had failed to find any case in which an hon. member, making an attack on the Government, did not desire to proceed with it. The matter stood just in this position: In this Session, as in last Session, there had been brought about circumstances entirely dissimilar to anything that had ever been known to have previously taken place in Parliament. He would look over the whole question again, which would stand, of course, until it came up on Monday afternoon, when, if the Government chose to demand that the debate should continue, he should be prepared, right or wrong, to give his decision on the point, even though he should reverse the decision which he had endorsed last year.

MR. TUPPER said he was glad to hear that there was to be a further consideration of the matter. Hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to regard this motion as an attack on the Government. The hon. the First Minister, and also the hon. member for Chateauguay, so put it, and he thought there was a little misapprehension concerning this matter. He might state, as a member of the House, that he had no idea that, if this motion were to prevail, the hon. the First Minister would feel it is duty to resign.

MR. HOLTON: There is another alternative.

MR. TUPPER said that the hon. gentleman comprehended his meaning exactly. The hon. the First Minister would not consider it his duty to resign under such circumstances, holding the opinion he did as to the view of the country on this question. He wished to draw attention to the words in which the matter came before the House. The hon. the Finance Minister, in his Budget speech, had expressed the satisfaction he felt because the time had come when the views and the policy of both parties should be fairly placed before the country. They should not lose sight of the fact that this was the last Session of this Parliament, and that they were just about on the eve of an appeal to the people. Under these circumstances, the hon. the Minister of Finance had expressed his satisfaction at the fact that there was to be a square and deliberate issue between the two parties; and the hon. gentleman also defined what he considered that issue to be. In his reply to the hon. gentleman, he had undertaken to state, to a certain extent, the views and opinions of the hon. gentlemen opposed to the Government, and their policy as contrasted with that of the Government. A discussion then arose. No attack was made; and it became desirable in the course of that discussion, for the purpose of carrying out the view expressed by the hon. the Finance Minister, to have these opinions formulated to a certain extent; and this was put in such a distinct form, that it left no doubt upon the minds of gentlemen, in or out of the House, as to what were the issues between the two parties. He regarded the resolution of his right hon. friend as formulating the policy which the hon. the Finance Minister had expressed his desire to have squarely and fairly placed before the House and the country; and hence they were thus really carrying out the wish of the Government, in order that there might be no difference of opinion, and no indistinctness as to what views were held on that side of the House, in relation to this question. Instead of this being an attack on the Government, it was simply a response to an invitation from the hon. the Finance Minister in the direction he had mentioned. He did not think that if the motion were to prevail, there would be any expectation on that side of the House that the hon. the First Minister would feel it his duty to resign, because the other alternative was so close at hand; and he was quite certain he (Mr. Mackenzie) would find the same readiness on that side of the House to grant all the supplies required for the public service, if the motion did not prevail.

MR. PALMER said that this was a matter of great consequence, not so much with regard to the House as with reference to all time to come. The Government could not take charge of the House entirely, and disregard the rules of Parliament. The object of these rules was to protect the minority, as the majority could always protect itself; and the case was very much stronger when they found that the majority could disregard the rules which were for the protection of the minority. If they had a case, and the matter was to be decided by mere force of numbers, the minority could not prevail, but would be entirely prostrate, and what then would be the use of these rules at all. Again, if they had no case, they had a positive rule of the House in this respect, and how were they to disregard it? This plain rule required that there should be authority and precedent for what was done; and, if there were no precedent, as he understood the Speaker to say was the case in this instance, they had a right to hold to the letter of the rule; and therefore, for either reason, he considered that the argument was conclusive.

MR. SPEAKER said that no precedent existed where the Opposition did not wish to proceed with a debate regarding a motion that the Government regarded as a motion of want of confidence. He quite agreed with the hon. member that the rules should be made and exercised for the protection of the minority; but, although he had strong doubts as to his decision last year, he had no hesitation in coming to that conclusion in giving the benefit of the doubt to the minority, and in deciding as he did. This was a matter to which he had given a great deal of consideration since. He had read the speech to which the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) had referred, and the impression that this had left on his mind was somewhat similar to that which it had made on the mind of the hon. gentleman.

MR. MASSON said that, if this were a doubtful matter, if it was one respecting which Mr. Speaker entertained doubts, and on which he was diffident about giving his opinion—

MR. TUPPER.

MR. MACKENZIE: I, at least, do not think that it is doubtful.

MR. MASSON: He should decide in favour of the position taken by the Opposition, in view of the positive rule that existed in this relation. This should be done, if Mr. Speaker was doubtful as to the right of the Government to continue the debate on this question on Monday next.

MR. SPEAKER said he would be very much obliged to any hon. member of the Opposition, who was in the habit of consulting the authorities, if, between now and Monday, he would look up any cases that were at all in point, in order to help him to come to a decision. He would do all in his power to satisfy himself and his judgment as to the course which ought to be taken; but he did claim, in matters of this kind, the help of both sides of the House, to which he knew that he was entitled.

MR. HOLTON said the debate was on the simple question of adjournment of the discussion, as a matter of course. He felt very strongly in this matter; and hon. gentlemen knew that he was not in the habit of taking very strong ground in debate; but the practice seemed to him to be so clear, and the reason so clear, that he thought there should be no doubt about it. There was no room for doubt about it, and it was quite competent, of course, for him, or any other member of the House, to move an amendment to the motion for adjournment of the debate by adding the words, "until Monday, and then to be the first Order of the Day."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is passed.

MR. HOLTON: Oh, no. The debate is on it.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not passed.

MR. SPEAKER: It was passed in the ordinary way. I declared to it be carried.

MR. HOLTON said he certainly did not understand that it was carried.

MR. SPEAKER said that, as hon. members on both sides of the House were aware, these questions were, of course, very generally, put and declared carried without hesitation; and he had invariably stated to the House that he would consider such a decision as that final, unless hon. members objected to the decision.

MR. HOLTON: No written motion is in the hands of the House yet, at all events. I move, Mr. Speaker, that—

MR. MASSON: I rise to a point of order. You cannot move it. I rise to a point of order.

MR. HOLTON: You cannot raise a point of order when I have possession of the floor.

MR. MASSON said he rose to a point of order, and the hon. gentleman must sit down. His point was that the hon. gentleman had no right to move an amendment to a motion of adjournment when the motion of adjournment was carried. Mr. Speaker had decided that it was carried, and he had no right to go back on this decision, unless both sides of the House unanimously approved of such a course. He would go further; the hon. the Premier, when he rose, himself said that the motion was carried.

MR. HOLTON said the hon. gentleman was out of order, in referring to an antecedent speech of the hon. the Minister of Public Works on the subject they had under discussion a short time previously. He had risen to offer a motion; and a point of order could only have been properly raised after he had put the motion in the hands of Mr. Speaker. This was his contention. He awaited the decision of Mr. Speaker on this point.

MR. SPEAKER said he could not, of course, tell, until it was stated, what the point of order was; but he could not see that the hon. member for Chateauguay was out of order. The hon. gentleman had not begun to speak; he had simply said "Mr. Speaker"; and really he, as Speaker, did not know what the point of order was.

MR. HOLTON said he assumed that the motion for the adjournment of the debate was before the House; and he moved in amendment that the words "until Monday next and it be then the first Order of the Day," be added to the motion.

MR. SPEAKER said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Holton) was, of course, quite in order. If he had declared the motion carried, he had done so inadvertently. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) was mistaken if he supposed that whenever the Speaker declared a motion carried or lost, it was therefore definitely carried or lost. He thought that, if the hon. gentleman would consult the authorities, he would find that it repeatedly happened, in the English Parliament, when a decision was made in the matter-of-course way, and Mr. Speaker supposed there was no objection to it, and any objection was raised to it afterwards, that the decision was not held to be binding at all; and they had acted on that principle invariably in the House during every Session.

MR. MACKENZIE: I did not rise to move the adjournment of the House. I rose to have this motion put so that there might be no mistake about it. I never heard the motion declared carried, and I rose for the purpose of pointing out to the Speaker, before he put the motion, that the adjournment of the debate must be until Monday.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said at all events, the motion was put, and there was no doubt about that; and there was no doubt that the motion was carried. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) said he did not hear it; no doubt a great many other hon. gentlemen did not hear it; but there could be no misapprehension about it. The motion was put and carried, and Mr. Speaker said so, and therefore, that being the case, there could be no misapprehension. They claimed it was their right to insist that the motion could not be set aside without the unanimous consent of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have a right to insist on the usual practice followed in this House heretofore.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is no such practice.

MR. MACKENZIE: I leave it to the Speaker, and I am certain he will declare that the passing of the motion be suspended.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Speaker has decided.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes he has; he has declared the motion carried. If the Premier is allowed by the Speaker to interfere with the arrangement made last Session, we, on the Opposition side, may as well go home. This is an evident attempt, on the part of the majority, to prevent the Opposition from having an opportunity of asserting their rights as members of Parliament, and, Sir, it would go to the country as such—as an attempt to throttle the minority.

MR. HOLTON: Upon this point of order I would like to say one word. My hon. friend was a little at fault in making a general speech as to a point of order. He maintains that the motion—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That your motion—

MR. HOLTON: Well, I mean that we were all out of order in the discussion which took place, as to the debate being fixed as the first business on Monday, because there was then actually no motion before the House, and we proceeded on the assumption that there was. Of course, my amendment was not put; but the Speaker, on the other hand, declares that, in conformity with the usual practice of the House, seeing that the motion was passed hurriedly, the motion is still open for debate.

MR. PALMER: My motion was put and carried, so that the attempt now made to put back the motion is simply an endeavour to get out of a difficulty. If the motion was to be put on the same footing as it was before the Speaker declared it carried, it would, of course, be no more good.

MR. SPEAKER: Mr. Palmer moved, and Mr. Farrow seconded, that this debate be adjourned. Almost in the same breath, I declared it carried, without, I confess, giving time for any hon. gentleman to raise an objection to its terms, because I did not anticipate that any hon. gentleman wished to speak. Under such circumstances, it has been my invariable rule—a rule sustained by the practice in the English House of Commons to permit any gentleman to speak who, by the rapidity with which I put the motion, was unable to do so before it was declared carried. The declaration, then, goes for nought, and cannot be held valid; that, at least, has been the plan adopted heretofore.

MR. DECOSMOS: I wish to call the attention of the House to one point which has been overlooked. The motion proposed by Mr. Palmer, and seconded by Mr. Farrow, that the debate be adjourned, was declared by you, Mr. Speaker, to be carried. It will be in your recollection, however, Mr. Speaker, that you stated you would, if time permitted before Monday, consider any authorities that could be produced on the question at issue, which would enable you to arrive at a correct decision. Afterwards, the hon. the member for Chateauguay rose and proposed to move an amendment, as he understood he still had a right to do so. The motion had been carried, however, immediately after it was moved. I do not think there was any mistake on your part, Mr. Speaker, or on the part of the House; and as, on a vote being taken, the motion was carried, it is clear that it was not then considered necessary to move an amendment.

MR. SPEAKER: That is quite correct; but both the Premier and the hon. member for Chateauguay state that they did not hear me declare the motion carried.

MR. MACKENZIE: I certainly never heard the motion carried, and I rose for the express purpose of saying that the debate must be adjourned until Monday. It was for the express purpose of setting the motion right that I rose when I did.

MR. HUNTINGTON: The hon. member for Victoria, (Mr. DeCosmos) has lost sight of the fact that, as you, Mr. Speaker, said there would be an opportunity on Monday to discuss this question, the motion could not be carried at all. The very fact that you allowed the Premier to rise and speak was sufficient evidence that you considered the motion still debateable.

MR. HOLTON: It is very undesirable at this late hour of the night to protract discussion on a matter of this kind. If hon. gentlemen opposite are disposed to leave the matter where it stood before the declaration of the Speaker, then I will withdraw my amendment and await his decision on Monday, as to whether he can go on with the order as proposed or not.

MR. PLUMB: I hope, at the same time this decision is made, you will tell us by what sign we shall know whether the hon. gentlemen who seem to control the parliamentary business of this House in such an arbitrary manner, hear your decisions.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: You have not considered this a vote of want of confidence, because you stopped the hon. member for Terrebonne when discussing matters outside the motion before the House.

MR. SPEAKER: But the hon. member objected, and said he had a right to discuss those matters.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Yes; but he bowed to the Chair.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It would be advisable, and more satisfactory, to allow the question to stand over till Tuesday.

MR. SPEAKER: It is very evident, from what Mr. Gladstone says, and it seemed to be the opinion of the English House of Commons at the time, that a motion of want of confidence should interrupt and intercept all other business until discussed to the end; and I think, as far as I can judge, it is for the Government to say whether they will consent to such adjournment of the matter, in order to afford facilities for bringing forward private business. But Mr. Gladstone lays down that a vote of want of confidence may, properly speaking, take priority of all business. He says:

"I do not wish to be held bound, even by silence, to the doctrine that every motion to be made in this House, which the Government may regard as involving a vote of censure is, therefore, to exercise precedence of all other business, and is to be made the subject of immediate discussion. There are various qualifications to be attached to that doctrine—qualifications according to the circumstances of the case, qualifications according, also, to the intention of the member by whom the motion was made; qualifications according to the support which that motion receives from large portions of the House; and, finally, let me add, qualifications according to the bearings of the motion upon the public interests at the time. Because it is perfectly conceivable that a vote might be moved, not like that of my noble friend, to which he disclaims attaching the character of a vote of censure, but one intentionally carrying the character of a vote of censure, and which might receive considerable support, but for the immediate discussion of which, nevertheless, it might be contrary to the duty of the Government to give extraordinary means, if, in their conviction and knowledge, it was likely to be injurious to great public interests."

So that it will be seen that it is for the Government to determine whether this vote now before the House possesses all the qualities essential to a vote of want of confidence, and whether it is desirable that all other business should be suspended in order to discuss it. I believe, with Mr. Gladstone, that, in a vote of this kind, the intention of the mover should form one of the essential points in deciding the question. I think it must be for the Government to say whether or not this motion must be considered as a vote of want of confidence.

MR. MASSON: Then I would suggest to the Government that they should yield gracefully to our proposal, to allow the debate to come up again for discussion on Tuesday, and then the question may be tested, and the Speaker, by that time, will be fully prepared to decide it.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am quite willing, as has been suggested, that it should be left with the Speaker to decide on Monday whether we can proceed with the ordinary business or not on that day.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would not agree to that.

MR. HOLTON: The hon. gentleman is quite aware that amendments germane to the motion are constantly made, and as often put, without notice. During the Administration under the leadership of the hon. gentleman, such a motion was made very frequently; but the hon. gentleman, having changed sides in the House, has entirely changed his own views upon this question. I venture to say that he would not have consented to regard such a motion in amendment in any other light than as a vote of want of confidence. I hold that, according to the rules of the English Government, it is the substance of the motion, and not the order in which it is put, that makes a vote one of want of confidence. But, whether it is a vote of want of confidence or not, I think the suggestion I made, that the Speaker on Monday should determine, in accordance with an understanding on both sides, whether it is competent for the Government to go on with the motion as a vote of non-confidence, to the interruption of the ordinary business of the House, should be adopted, and that both sides should agree to be governed by the Speaker. If this is done, I will not press my motion.

MR. SPEAKER: I have been looking into this matter, and Mr. Gladstone's doctrine on the subject so fully agrees with what I always felt myself, that I feel myself compelled to decide that the debate is upon a vote of want of confidence. I know that the position I took last year was in opposition to this view; but then I had not seen either of those speeches which I have just read, and how they escaped my observation I do not know.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: We must submit to the decision of the Chair, of course. At the same time, I say that the decision strikes vitally at the independence of Parliament and the privileges of the minority.

MR. COSTIGAN: I want to call the attention of the House to this point, that the motion to adjourn the debate was not carried at the time it was declared by you.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The adjournment was declared carried by inadvertence.

MR. COSTIGAN: If the motion to adjourn the debate was not carried at that time, has it been carried since; and is the House to be adjourned without adjourning the debate?

MR. SPEAKER: We are now considering the question whether this debate be now adjourned.

MR. HOLTON.

MR. MASSON: No; it is the adjournment of the House we are discussing now.

MR. SPEAKER: Mr. Palmer moved, seconded by Mr. Farrow, that this debate be adjourned.

MOTIONS OF WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

SPEAKER'S RULING.

MR. SPEAKER: I have the honour to state to the House that I have made it my business to look as carefully as I could into the important question that arose at an early hour on Saturday morning, and with which I felt then unprepared to deal finally, though I was forced at the time to make a decision. I am satisfied, from the declaration of the hon. the First Minister in respect to the resolution moved by the right hon. member for Kingston, that it has all the character of a motion of want of confidence, and is therefore entitled to whatever precedence a direct motion of want of confidence may be entitled to. Then the question arises as to what that right is. The statement of Mr. Gladstone, which I read here on Saturday morning, and which I had previously seen, was to the effect that it was "the usage of Parliament" that a direct motion of want of confidence should precede all other business of the House, and especially of the Government. That seemed, as I read it then, to be a very distinct declaration that a motion of want of confidence of right took precedence of all other questions and of all other business; but, on further examination, I see strong reasons to more than doubt that that is what the right hon. gentleman meant. As I have stated more than once, my difficulties are increased in this matter, because I cannot find any case precisely analogous to that which is now before the House; nor are there many instances, of late years, when direct motions of want of confidence have been moved at all. However, the last direct motion of want of confidence which I find, was moved, in 1841, by Sir Robert Peel, and this was a direct and express motion declaring that the House had no confidence in the then Ministers. At the end of the first evening's debate, it was moved that the debate be adjourned, and subsequently the adjournment of the House was moved by Lord John Russell, when Sir Robert Peel said:

"Supposing the debate not to be concluded this night, and the House to adjourn till Wednesday, will the debate then take precedence of all other business? I know it has been said that I have brought forward this motion for the purpose of interfering with the debate on the Corn Law question—a motive which I beg entirely to disclaim. If the noble Lord had proposed that the House should meet on Monday or Tuesday, I should have offered no objection whatever; but, if the usual recess be allowed, I shall expect that the debate will, on Wednesday, take precedence of all other business."

He evidently there spoke as if it were the custom and usage of the House, and yet it is not put as if, by right, these questions should take precedence. Lord John Russell, in reply, said:

"I think there will be no difficulty in the House understanding that the debate shall be resumed on Wednesday next in preference to any other business."

There again Lord John Russell did not state that it had, of right, to take precedence; and yet he thought that the House would have no difficulty in so understanding. On looking at the Journals of that year, I find the resolution itself set forth directly that the Ministers did not possess the confidence of the House, etc. I find that the debate was adjourned; and though, as a matter of fact, this debate was taken up from day to day until it closed, yet every day, before it was taken up, a large amount of ordinary business was transacted, and several notices standing on the papers were disposed of by postponement to some subsequent date; so here was a direct motion of want of confidence where the debate was actually continued from day to day, as far as I can judge; but it was so continued rather by consent of the House and of the parties interested than because such a motion absolutely took precedence of right. Coming down to a later period, the year 1859, the Conservative Government of that day introduced a Reform Bill, to which an amendment was moved which traversed quite as completely the policy of the Government of the day with respect to that reform measure as the notice now before the House traversed the policy of the present Government. It was moved that there be left out from the motion all after the word "that," and that the following words be added:—

"This House is of opinion that it is neither just nor politic to interfere in the manner proposed in this Bill with the Freehold Franchise as hitherto exercised in the counties of England and Wales; and that no readjustment of the franchise will satisfy this House and the country which does not provide for a greater extension of the suffrage in cities and boroughs than is contemplated in the present measure."

This resolution was subsequently carried, and upon the carrying of that resolution the Government resigned; but, after the debate had continued for some time, Mr. Wilson moved the adjournment of the debate, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer said:

"He thought that it would be convenient that the debate should proceed continuously and, therefore, he would suggest that it should be adjourned until the next day. Of course, it was in the hands of hon. members who had notices of motion for that day. He had looked through the paper and thought these notices were of an interesting, yet he did not think that they were of an urgent character. He hoped the hon. members would accede to the course which he suggested."

Hon. members did all accede, with the exception of Sir John Trevelyan. On his objecting to the loss of his day, the Chancellor of the Exchequer reminded the hon. baronet that the gentlemen whose notices of motion had precedence of his had given way for the discussion on the Reform Bill; and he was sure, from the well-known courtesy of the hon. baronet, he would not stand between the House and the subject. If he allowed the debate to proceed, he should be happy on some future day, as he had already done, to afford him facilities for proceeding with his Bill. And, therefore, Sir John Trevelyan accepted the proposal made to him, and allowed the matter in which he was interested to stand over. Coming down then to 1872, we find that Mr. Gladstone made that declaration, which I will read again, to show how ambiguous it is at first sight. At all events, he declared what the usage of the House was; and "usage" in the parliamentary sense, as I understand, is equivalent to law. Again, a Bill regarding the establishment of a Catholic University in Ireland, altering the law with regard to University education in Ireland, was brought up in 1873, and an amendment was moved, very simple in its character, merely requiring that the Government should insert in the Bill the names of a certain number of gentlemen who should be the managers or controllers of the Senate or governing body of the proposed University. To that Mr. Gladstone objected, and declared distinctly that it was a vote of censure on the Government; and further said:

"Although in terms the resolution expressed regret, it is really a vote of censure on the Government, as hon. gentlemen are well aware. It would be impossible for Government to insert the names in the Bill without tampering with the free action of the House, and forgetting the respect which we owe to its authority and opinion."

Subsequently it was proposed that the debate on this measure should also proceed from day to day; and Mr. Gladstone then said:

"It might be for the convenience of the House to know beforehand, as far as they could know, the probable course of the debate they were now about to resume. As far as he could obtain information about the number of gentlemen who wished to address the House, it was improbable that the debate would conclude that evening. If then it should be adjourned again, it would be most convenient that the debate should be resumed to-morrow without any further interval of time. Such an arrangement, however, could only be effected by the consent of those private members who had notices on the paper for to-morrow. The Government were willing to do what they could towards bringing the debate to a conclusion. He therefore proposed, in the event of those hon. members consenting to postpone their motions to-morrow, and with the hope that the debate would terminate on that night, that the Government would give up Thursday to them for the disposal of their business. He would, therefore, in the first place, appeal to his hon. friend the member for London (Mr. Crawford), whose notice stood first on the paper, whether he was willing to concur in such an arrangement."

These are the fullest, and some of them most recent, announcements regarding this question, if I may so call them, that I can find anywhere. That the Speaker was ever called upon to give a decision on this question at all, I can discover nothing of that kind for my guidance. As I have shown, leading members on both sides of the House, the Chancellors of the Exchequer, Mr. Disraeli at one time, and Mr. Gladstone who held the same position at another time, have spoken on the subject, and I am forced to the conclusion that, when Mr. Gladstone, in 1872, spoke of the usage of the House, he did not speak of a usage which was, in its nature, equivalent to a law. Under these circumstances, I feel compelled to decide, as far as a decision on the matter rests with me now, or at all events to express my opinion, not making any decision, that, unless both sides of the House consent, or until after a notice of motion to that effect shall be made and carried, the rules of the House, with regard to the order of transacting the business of the House, must be adhered to.

MR. MACKENZIE: I was not aware, Sir, that you were looking into the matter; but, of course, I have considered the course which it would be desirable for the Government to take to-day. It would be a very easy matter, as you are aware, by well-known parliamentary practice, for the Government to intercept all other business and pass to a specific Order of the Day, that Order being one in which we are particularly interested in connection with the motion moved by the hon. member for Kingston. At the same time, I am bound to consider, as representing a very large majority of the House, what will most facilitate the business, both in the hands of the Government and in the hands of private members. There was a good deal of feeling manifested on the Opposition side of the House on Friday evening, when the Government were, in short, accused of endeavouring to trample on what hon. gentlemen were pleased to call the rights of the minority, and by taking their day to deprive them of certain privileges which, by ordinary parliamentary courtesy, at all events, as well as by specific rules, are usually conceded to the minority in the House. I, therefore, came to the conclusion that, although it would be quite possible for me to act upon the notice I gave when this motion was made, that I should consider it as a motion of want of confidence, and insist upon its being disposed of before proceeding with other business,—I have come to the conclusion that, while this is perfectly open to me, it would, no doubt, occasion a good deal of the debate, and a renewal of that kind of debate which it is not desirable to have, if it can be avoided, as it was in the interests, both of the Government and of the Opposition, that we should waive all right that we may have in the matter for the present, and allow the ordinary business of Monday to be proceeded with in the usual way. I say that, however, I think I am fairly entitled to ask hon. gentlemen opposite to facilitate the early conclusion of the debate, in order that we may be enabled to proceed with the more active business of the House. A year ago we had the Estimates very nearly half disposed of at this time. The debate which has been proceeding has only been in substance, and almost the exact terms, a continuation of the debate on the Address, and it does seem as if there could be no necessity for so much debate upon points which have been already spoken of so fully in the House. I do not, of course, presume, Sir, to lecture any hon. gentleman for his speeches. I merely ask the consideration which the state of the business of the House requires from hon. gentlemen opposite, who, I am quite well aware, have the power to retard as well as to facilitate business; and I hope that what I have said will, at all events, show that the Government are disposed to consider the matters which have been discussed in as liberal a spirit as possible.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I can assure the hon. the Premier that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have every disposition to close the debate as soon as possible. Of course with regard to an important matter of this kind, especially during the last Session of Parliament, every member, or a great many members, desire to express their opinions upon the great questions which are involved in the discussion that has been going on for some time. Therefore it is impossible to come to any positive engagement as to the time when this debate will close; but the hon. gentleman will remember that, when I made my motion, I said I did it sincerely with the desire of limiting to some extent the discursive nature of the debate. The debate was a very general one on the Address, as the hon. gentleman has truly said, regarding the policy of the Government both legislative and administrative, and a debate somewhat of the same nature was going on respecting the motion to go into Committee of Supply, when I moved a resolution for the purpose of confining the limits of the discussion to the economical question. In that, however, I have been to some degree defeated by the statement of the hon. the Premier—which he had a right to make, I admit—that he considered it was a motion of want of confidence, which, if carried, would involve of necessity the resignation of the Government. Therefore, of course, the object for which I made the motion as to limiting the discussion is gone, because it becomes now a general discussion on the policy of the Government. However, I can assure the hon. gentleman that every effort will be made by myself and those who act with me to bring the debate to an end as soon as possible, to enable the Government to bring down the remainder of the measures which the hon. gentleman, I think, promised us this week, and I trust he will endeavour to do so as soon as possible. I would call the attention of the head of the Government, Sir, to the fact that this decision which has been given by you is an important one, and it would be well, it seems to me, that it should appear in the Journals, and for this reason: at some future time, if a motion of want of confidence is made, and this Government or some future Government should throw it over and not go on with it the next day, they would be very liable to the charge of being desirous of postponing the discussion; and if it appears on the Journals that, unless by universal consent of the House, a motion of this kind must not of necessity go on, this would relieve the Government of any possibility of such allusion should they really wish to throw the debate over.

MR. MACKENZIE: It would be better to amend the rules of the House. I am not prepared to acquiesce at the present moment in placing your decision on the Journals. It is a decision, in fact, which covers a great deal of ground, and besides the formal decision is a very indefinite one. I would not now be prepared to say in what shape, if at all, it should go on the Journals; but I have no objection to consider the matter.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: All decisions of the Speaker, as a matter of course, go on the Journals, in order that they may be authoritative hereafter.

PETITIONS FROM ALIENS.

REMARKS.

MR. SPEAKER called attention to a petition from certain American citizens interested in the Connecticut Mutual Insurance Company, praying for amendments to the Insurance Law. Under the rules of the House this petition could not be received, and he would like to have an expression of opinion on the matter.

MR. MACKENZIE said it had been the invariable practice in such cases to allow representatives of companies resident in a foreign country to lay their case before a Committee of the House, for the purpose of presenting their views; and it did seem to him, therefore, rather unreasonable that, by adopting a tit-for-tat policy, the House should prohibit parties from coming directly before Parliament. He could not conceive of any possible injury which could be caused by the reception of such a petition, and he would strongly advise that it be received by the House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD did not see any objection to the reception of the petition. It must be remembered, of course, that in England the rule was insisted upon, which excluded foreign corporations from doing business there. Of course, in England any deviation from that rule might be exceedingly inconvenient as regarded anything into which politics might enter, and possibly that was one of the reasons why the prohibition was enforced. Canada, in this respect, was not liable to be inconvenienced in the same way, and he would suggest that petitions should be received by the House subject to special legislation.

MR. SPEAKER said he thought it would be well to have an understanding limiting these petitions to parties, companies or corporations directly and expressly affected by the legislation of this Parliament and its mode of doing business.

MR. KILLAM said many mutual companies in the United States doing business in this country were practically Canadian companies, and petitions sent by directors thereof were entitled to be considered.

MR. MACKENZIE: This is one of the cases in question, and this company does one of the largest businesses in the country.

Petition received.

THE ST. PAUL AND PACIFIC RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. SCHULTZ enquired, Whether the whole or any portion of the following telegraphic report which appeared in the Toronto Globe of 8th March be true:—

“ WINNIPEG, Man., March 7th.—The St. Paul Pioneer Press states editorially that the purchasers of the bonds of the St. Paul and Pacific Railway are Messrs. Hill and Kittson, associated with Mr. Stephen, of the Bank of Montreal, and Mr. Donald A. Smith. It asserts that, through the influence of the latter, the support and co-operation of the Dominion Government have been obtained in the adjustment of their connections with the railway system of Manitoba.

“ It affirms also that they have, in fact, effected a lease on favourable terms of the Pembina Branch, and that this intimate alliance furnishes an ample guarantee that it will be forever free of the competition of the Chicago lines."

The article concludes: "It is deemed proper to make public these facts to disabuse antagonist parties of misapprehensions which may lead to a useless waste of valuable time."

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman must give notice of his question, and he will obtain the required information in the proper course.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 45) Whereby judgments obtained against Railway Companies for debts incurred for working expenses, may be enforced by execution against Railway property; and to authorize the appointment of a Receiver and Manager in certain cases.—(Mr. Irving.)

Bill (No. 46) To amend the Act respecting conflicting claims to lands of occupants in Manitoba.—(Mr. Mills.)

Bill (No. 47) To provide for the transfer of lands of estates, and interests in lands in the Territories of Canada, by registration of titles.—(Mr. Mills.)

SOCIÉTÉ DE PRÊTS ET PLACEMENTS DE QUÉBEC BILL.—[BILL No. 12.]

(Mr. Malouin.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee of the Whole, and reported.

KINGSTON ELECTION PETITION BILL.— [BILL No. 15.]

(Mr. Haggart.)

BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order discharged, and Bill withdrawn.

TRANSMISSION OF TIMBER DOWN CANADIAN RIVERS.

QUESTION.

MR. BABY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, a Bill to regulate the transmission of timber down rivers in Canada which admit of the floating thereof?

MR. MACKENZIE: The question has been under the consideration of the Government.

TRANSPORTATION OF RAILS ON PEMBINA BRANCH.

QUESTION.

MR. RYAN, for MR. SCHULTZ, enquired, Whether the Government intend to advertize for tenders for the transportation of rails for the Pembina Branch from Duluth to Manitoba?

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman will observe, from the newspapers, that tenders have been asked for for a fortnight back.

RAILS FOR NEW BRUNSWICK RAILROADS.

QUESTION.

MR. DOMVILLE enquired, Whether any rails have been apportioned for the projected railroad to start from St. Mary's, N.B., opposite Fredericton, passing through the counties of Queen's and King's and making connection with the Intercolonial Railway at some point between Hampton and Moncton; and, if so, how many tons have been promised?

MR. MACKENZIE: I am not able to identify the railway from the description the hon. gentleman gives of it; but there is a railway, the New Brunswick Central, which lies somewhere near Fredericton; and for this about forty-two miles have been apportioned.

THE CONVEYANCE OF KAMOURASKA MAILS.

QUESTION.

MR. ROY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, for the future, to ask for tenders for the conveyance, between Kamouraska and the railway station at St. Paschal, of the mail delivered at that station by the express train of the Intercolonial Railway?

MR. HUNTINGTON: I may say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that the arrangement at present existing is a temporary one, and it has been the intention of the Government to ask for tenders.

THE MILITIA SERVICE.

QUESTION.

MR. HIGINBOTHAM enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to carry out the following recommendations concerning the Militia contained in the last Report of the Lieut.-General commanding:—

1st. to extend the period of annual drills to 28 days.

2nd. To establish three model training schools for Cavalry and Infantry.

3rd. To raise Brigades of Garrison Artillery at Quebec and Kingston and to reduce the Ottawa Brigade?

MR. JONES (Halifax): It is the intention of the Government to extend the period of drill to 28 days. With regard to the second question, it is not the intention of Government to establish these schools. The remaining enquiry is under the consideration of the Department.

MAILS FROM HAMILTON TO BARRIE.

QUESTION.

MR. McCRANEY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to forward the mails by the Hamilton and North Western Railway from Hamilton to Barrie; and if so, when?

MR. HUNTINGTON: I can say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that the matter is fully before the Government, and it will have fair consideration.

PERMISSIVE LIQUOR BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. APPLEBY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, at an early day during the present Session of Parliament, a Permissive Liquor Bill applicable to all the Provinces of the Dominion, and somewhat similar in its nature to the Dunkin Act, so called.

MR. MACKENZIE: It has already been stated in the Speech from the Throne that a Bill on this subject would be presented, and, of course, it will as soon as it has received proper consideration.

EXTRA POSTAL SERVICE TO LINGAN AND LOW PARISH, C.B.

QUESTION.

MR. McDONALD (Cape Breton) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant extra postal service to the district of Lingan and Low Parish, in the county of Cape Breton?

MR. HUNTINGTON: I may say that, long since, applications by the hon. gentleman's colleague were made to the Department on the subject, and that the matter is under consideration.

MR. HIGINBOTHAM.

OPENING OF NAVIGATION ON THE WELLAND CANAL.

QUESTION.

MR. KIRKPATRICK enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to open the Welland Canal for navigation this spring at the usual time, or to delay the opening, and to what date?

MR. MACKENZIE: Notice was given on the 10th September that the canal would be opened on the 3rd May.

RAILWAY THROUGH CAPE BRETON.

QUESTION.

MR. McDONALD (Cape Breton) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to aid the Local Government of Nova Scotia, by money subsidy or otherwise, in extending a railway through the Island of Cape Breton, to the same extent as they have aided railway extension between New Glasgow and the Straits of Canso in Nova Scotia proper?

MR. MACKENZIE: The Nova Scotia Government is to carry the branch railway thence to the Strait of Canso and beyond.

ELECTION ACT AMENDMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. CAMERON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, a Bill to amend the Act respecting the Election of Members of the House of Commons; and if so, when such Bill will be introduced?

MR. MACKENZIE: It is probable that some amendment will be proposed during the present Session.

NEWCASTLE AND CHATHAM MAILS.

QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to leave a mail at Newcastle and Chatham stations by the weekly train that carries the English mail from Halifax to Montreal?

MR. HUNTINGTON: I may say that instructions were given to the English mail clerks to make up bags for these two places, but it seems delays have occurred because they were not supplied with proper forms. These have now been furnished, and bags for these places are now made up.

INSPECTION OF FISH.

QUESTION.

MR. LANGEVIN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to amend during this Session the law relating to the inspection of Fish?

MR. LAURIER: The question is under consideration.

A UNIFORM COPPER CURRENCY.

QUESTION.

MR. SCRIVER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to adopt measures to bring a uniform copper currency into use in the Dominion?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: The subject has only very recently been brought under the consideration of the Government, and I am not quite prepared to give my hon. friend an answer at present. If he will renew his question, or if he has any special grievance in the matter, and will call on me, I shall be glad to give him such information as I have.

SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAY COMPANIES IN CONNECTION WITH THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to lay before the House, during the present Session, an Order in Council granting a subsidy or bonus to the Canada Central Railway Company, or any other railway company, under the provisions of Section 14 of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874?

MR. MACKENZIE: I am not prepared to state the intentions of the Government to-day.

HOCKLEY POST-OFFICE MAILS.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD, for Mr. McCARTHY, enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a tri-weekly mail with Hockley Post Office; and if not, why not?

MR. HUNTINGTON: I am not able to say more than that the subject has been thought of, and that it is now under consideration.

CANADIAN PACIFIC TELEGRAPH LINE.

MOTION FOR COPIES OF SPECIFICATIONS.

MR. MACMILLAN moved for copies of all specifications on which tenders have been invited to construct the Canadian Pacific Telegraph from Lake Superior to Fort Edmonton; copies of all tenders; copies of all correspondence between the Government and persons tendering for the same; copies of all contracts for the construction of the several portions thereof; also copies of all demands for extras and amounts paid pursuant to said demands, in connection with building said line of telegraph.

Motion agreed to.

WRECKING AND COASTING IN CANADIAN INLAND WATERS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS WITHDRAWN.

MR. STEPHENSON said that, with regard to the motion of which he had given notice, asking for returns of all correspondence, petitions, reports and telegrams now in possession of the Government, and received by them since the 1st January, 1877, relating to wrecking, towing and coasting in Canadian inland waters, he had had several conferences with the Minister of Marine, and other Departmental officials, and he was happy to say that the matter had been disposed of in every way to his satisfaction, and, he trusted, to the satisfaction of those most interested, and he was well pleased with the information given on the subject. As to the latter part of the motion he had put on the paper, asking for the opinion of the Minister of Justice on the reference of the petition of the Windsor Wrecking and Towing Company, in connection with the same matter, given to the Minister of Customs, he believed it was a confidential communication which it was not in the interest of the country to make public just at the present time; and, as he had been informed that the Minister of Customs, with the approval of the Minister of Marine, was about to issue an order in the matter, covering the entire ground of his application to the Government, he begged to return his thanks to those hon. gentlemen for the manner in which he had been treated, and to withdraw his motion, as the object he had in view in making it had been substantially attained.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

NAVIGATION OF SASKATCHEWAN RIVER.

MOTION FOR REPORT.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) moved for a copy of surveys or any examination made of the Saskatchewan River having in view the improvement of the navigation by removing the obstructions which now exist at the Coals Falls and other points between that place and the Grand Rapids.

Motion agreed to.

SURVEYS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

MOTION FOR REPORT.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) moved for a copy of a report of surveys made of Lakes Manitoba and Winnipegosis, the Waterhen River and Little Saskatchewan River. He said the subject of the motion was of great importance to the development of the North-West. It had reference to the opening up of navigation from the city of Winnipeg to Lakes Manitoba and Winnipegosis, and from that to the Saskatchewan River. It was well known to the House that for two or three years past the Saskatchewan had been navigated by way of the Grand Rapids by steamer as far as Fort Edmonton, and it was quite capable of being navigated 200 miles beyond that point, or within 50 miles of the Rocky Mountains. To reach the mouth of the Saskatchewan by the present route, the navigation of some 300 miles was necessary by steamboat. Of this a distance of 270 to 280 miles was on Lake Winnipeg, a steamer fitted for sea or lake navigation being required, that lake being subject to severe storms. All this would be avoided by following the line referred to in this and the preceding motion. It extended from Winnipeg up the

MR. STEPHENSON.

Assiniboine River, some forty miles, to Poplar Point, crossing there to the nearest point of Manitoba Lake, and then crossing from that lake to Lake Winnipegosis, either by the Waterhen River or by a very short portage, and, proceeding from that to Cedar Lake, it would be quite possible to reach the Saskatchewan and save all that extent of lake navigation. The difficulties were not so great as might at first sight appear. The Assiniboine River, in its present state, was navigable during three months of the year, May, June and July, to boats drawing not more than eighteen inches to two feet. During the other months of the year the river was generally very shallow, but still it might be so improved, by removing boulders and other obstructions at the several rapids, as to be navigable the greater part of the season by boats drawing not more than two feet of water. An examination of that portion of the country from the Assiniboine to Cedar Lake was made by Mr. Henry Smith, Civil Engineer, in 1872 and again in 1874. That engineer reports that, at the Meadow Portage, between Lakes Manitoba and Winnipegosis, it would be quite practicable to cut a canal at comparatively little cost, the length of the portage being only three-eighths of a mile, and the water level of both lakes being nearly alike. In this way a steamer could be taken into Lake Winnipegosis and on to Mossy Portage which led to Cedar Lake—the length of this neck of land being only three and a-half or four miles. Owing to the difference of elevation between Winnipegosis and the Saskatchewan, the latter being subject to great fluctuations in course of the season, the construction of a canal there would be both difficult and somewhat costly, but a short railway might be built, and the Grand Rapids route would thus be avoided. Although a tramway had been built by private enterprise from Lake Winnipeg to the head of the Grand Rapids, there were still very great difficulties to be encountered in overcoming the chain of rapids from that point for twelve or fifteen miles in the direction of Cedar Lake, two days being required to accomplish this short distance. The route by the Grand Rapids also presented a further difficulty, that Cedar Lake was somewhat large and steamboats suitable for the navigation of the Saskatchewan very frequently were detained there by heavy weather; while, by proceeding in the direction of Mossy Portage, they would avoid the largest and more exposed part of the lake, and be able to continue their journey. The importance of the navigation of the Saskatchewan by steamboat would appear, when it was remembered that the North Saskatchewan extended to within a short distance of the Rocky Mountains, and it was also believed that the South Saskatchewan was navigable beyond Fort McLeod, thus opening up a vast extent of country not excelled for fertility. It had been ascertained that at or near Fort McLeod, and on the Bow River, there was coal of the best quality and in great abundance. The distance from Cedar Lake to the Forks of the Saskatchewan would be, perhaps, 240 or 250 miles; from that to Fort McLeod about 500 miles more, or upwards of 700 miles of, as it was believed, uninterrupted navigation, with a depth of water of at least three feet, presenting no difficulties except such as could be removed at little expense. The only obstacles in the way were to be found from Winnipeg, by the Assiniboine, to Cedar Lake. From Winnipeg to Poplar Point, on the Assiniboine, was 40 miles; from thence to the nearest point of Lake Manitoba was, to Clendeboye, 11 miles, or to Fort Francis, 12½ miles, over ground which did not present difficulties for canal construction, the ground being entirely free from rocks. From that point to the Narrows of Lake Manitoba would be about 45 miles, while, to the Meadow Portage, the point that would have to be cut to get into Lake Winnipegosis, was about 115 miles. From the Meadow Portage to the Mossy Portage there was a stretch of water of something like 105 miles; the portage being from 3¼ to 4 miles, and then the Saskatchewan was reached, and all the difficulties of going by the Grand Rapids avoided. He believed it had been stated by Mr. Smith, who reported to the Government in 1872, and again in 1874, that the improvements could be carried out for $800,000, which was a very considerable sum; but, to attain the object in view, would be very moderate. His object in bringing forward the motion was for the purpose of obtaining the papers to show what had already been done in the direction of surveys in that country; and, still further, to bring to the notice of the Government and the House the desirability of having a thorough enquiry made into that matter; and that, if practicable, at a moderate cost, the work should be carried out. With that route, and with the Pacific Railway at one side and the Colonization Railway of the hon. the Minister of the Interior on the other, the whole country would be opened up, so that instead of it being, as at present, almost a wilderness, it would soon be overspread with the homes of agricultural settlers, who would add greatly to the wealth and importance of the Dominion. With regard to the Assiniboine, not only might that river be made navigable for the 60 miles spoken of, but, at comparatively little expense, navigation might be carried 800 miles into the interior. To Portage la Prairie, some 60 miles from Winnipeg, steamboats of light draught had frequently ascended the Assiniboine, and it had been the practice of the Hudson Bay Company to bring furs and other products down that river by boats during the freshets in spring for many years back.

MR. RYAN said that, if he correctly understood the speech of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith), his argument was in favour of canalling the Assiniboine River to near the southern extremity of Long Lake, uniting Long Lake and the Assiniboine by a canal, deepening Long Lake where required, and connecting its northern extremity with Lake Manitoba by a canal. This was substantially the scheme which had been investigated and reported on by a Government engineer, Mr. Henry B. Smith, in 1875. The hon. member for Selkirk also advocated such further improvement of the Assiniboine, west of the point where the canalling would terminate, as would make the river navigable for more than a hundred miles west of Portage La Prairie. Although people in Manitoba were not in the least opposed to the expenditure of public moneys in that Province, yet they were sufficiently patriotic to desire that the expenditure should be made in such a direction, and upon such public works as would ensure some adequate return both to the Province and the Dominion. He regretted that he could not agree with the hon. member for Selkirk in advocating the expenditure which would be required to effect the very expensive works suggested by him. He would venture to quote to the House certain passages from the report of the engineer referred to, whose report was embodied in that of the Minister of the Interior for the year 1876. The report estimated the cost of canalling the Assiniboine to near the southern extremity of Long Lake, and connecting it by a canal with Long Lake and Lake Manitoba, at $878,400. This expenditure was estimated to give a depth of water of between three feet and three feet six inches, in the Assiniboine from Winnipeg to near Long Lake, and through that lake and the canal into Lake Manitoba. When it was remembered that this navigation, with a depth of only three feet, or three feet six inches, could only be used during four or five months in every year, it would appear that $878,400 was altogether too large a sum to pay for the benefits to be derived from the scheme. The proposed canal would reach Lake Manitoba at a point about fifty miles west of Winnipeg, between which two points a railroad could be built and equipped in first class style for $15,500 per mile, as had been recently shown to the House; this would make for the fifty miles $775,000. There could be no comparison between the utility of a road and the proposed river and canal navigation scheme of the hon. member for Selkirk, from Winnipeg to Lake Manitoba. The road could be used at all seasons, and would, on many accounts, be infinitely preferable to the canal; and, while the railroad would only cost, fully equipped for traffic, $775,000, the navigation would cost, without estimating the additional cost of the boats required by it, $103,400 more. It seemed unnecessary to say anything more relative to the first part of the proposal of the hon. member for Selkirk. He was sure the House would agree that it would be better for all parties to expend $775,000 in connecting 50 miles of railroad, to be used at all seasons and for all times, than to expend $878,400 to construct a mere temporary and imperfect system of navigation with a depth of only three or three and a-half feet between the same points. From the point near Long Lake, where the canalling of the Assiniboine referred to would terminate, the hon. member for Selkirk proposed so to improve the river as to make it navigable not only as far as Portage La Prairie, but for a great distance west of that point. This was no part of the scheme to which the report quoted alluded; and the very great expense that would have to be incurred would be in addition to the $878,400 above mentioned. As the member for that portion of the Province of Manitoba most particularly interested in this proposal, he (Mr. Ryan) felt bound to say that it was, in his opinion, impracticable and inadvisable. He almost doubted whether it would be possible, unless by an enormous and unjustifiable expenditure of public moneys, to make the Assiniboine really and beneficially navigable throughout the summer as far west as was indicated. In support of his position, he would quote extracts from the report of Henry B. Smith. Speaking of the Assiniboine River in the parish of Baie St. Paul, Mr. Smith said:

"This parish is rather worse than the preceding one. From beginning to end the river is one continuous series of sand and gravel shoals. Any part of the river that is free from these is very much obstructed with snags and submerged boulders from one to two feet in diameter. As a rule the current is mild.

"Banks of clay and sand, from 10 to 14 feet high, and well wooded with elm, ash, cottonwood and bastard maple. Bed of river is mainly pure, sharp sand; but in all probability underlined by a layer of clay. The deepest channel throughout may be taken at 18 inches. Average rate of inclination of river's surface is one foot to one mile.

"Parish of Poplar Point.

"The river in this parish has several stretches of deep water, with gentle currents. However many sand-shoals and banks occur, leaving but little room for navigation. It is possible a channel of two feet might be found throughout. In general, the current is mild. Banks of clay and sand mixed, and from 10 to 12 feet high. Bed of river pure sand, which by its ribbed nature, shows its constant instability. Average rate of inclination of river's surface throughout this parish, 1.18ft. in a mile.

"Parish of High Bluff."

"The river in this Parish is totally impassable. From beginning to end, it is one continuous series of shoals and shallows. Banks ten to twelve feet high, of a clayey nature, well wooded. Current alternately swift and mild; bed of river, sand; average rate of inclination of river's surface, 1.18ft. per mile.

"The River Assiniboine in its present state, seems unfit for any navigation on a more extensive scale than canoeing. As a river naturally navigable at all seasons of the year, it never could exist. The grade is much too great, being on an average 13 inches to a mile. This grade, on a hard gravelly bottom, with firm banks and regular channel would only produce a rapid current of about three miles per hour; but, in the Assiniboine River, its effects are of an entirely different nature. Inasmuch as the banks are of a soft yielding nature, and in many places of pure sand, the action of the water in passing down this steep grade tends continually to carry away their particles and distribute them over the bed of the stream. Hence the formation of sand banks and shoals."

It was not necessary to quote more at length; any hon. gentleman who wished could read the full report, and what had already been quoted was, in his opinion, sufficient to satisfy the House as to the correctness of his position.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): Will the hon. member for Marquette read on a little further from the engineer's report—just the next paragraph.

MR. RYAN: Certainly. The report proceeds:

"According to the accounts of old settlers, the river seems, some 40 or 50 years ago, to have been much narrower and deeper. The constant slips of different parts of the bank and their present appearance confirm these accounts. Every year in the spring floods large portions are carried off; great slides take place, when often masses of earth, many tons in weight, are precipitated into mid-stream. It must be borne in mind that the river is very seldom as low as at present (October and November). Old settlers tell me that, as a general rule, during the months of April and May the river is 10 feet deeper, and that a channel of 3 feet may be relied on all through June, July and August. Since this is the case, steamboats such as navigate the Red River could, with light loads, navigate the Assiniboine during some months of the year with but little difficulty. Indeed I am informed that the steamboat International went up as far as Portage La Prairie last spring.

"Owing to the yielding nature of the banks, the instability of the bed of the river, its crooked course, and the rapid changes of current due to its grade, I am of opinion that the only method of effectually deepening this river is to let into its channel such a volume of water as would keep the volume of water continually up to that of June, July and August. Dredging would not succeed, as no sooner would a channel be made than it would be filled up. Dams and locks or a thorough canalization of the river would succeed, but at an enormous outlay of money and at a great inconvenience to the shipping passing up and down."

Does the hon. member for Selkirk desire me to read more?

MR. SMITH (Selkirk): No.

MR. RYAN said that, as to the measurements actually made by the engineer, and the depth of water actually found by him in the Assiniboine, there was no room for doubt. But, as to the statements made by him on the information of old settlers, they must be taken with a great deal of caution. If twenty old settlers were questioned as to any natural fact, such as stage of water at any particular season, probably one-half would contradict the other in some important particular. It was quite true that steamboats had gone up to the Portage during high water, and it was probable that for two or three weeks each spring they might, in ordinary seasons, continue to make trips to the Portage. But the stage of water was extremely uncertain, some seasons a steamboat might not be able to make more than one trip. Perhaps the average duration of a stage of water sufficient to enable a boat drawing two or three feet of water to go up to the Portage would be about three weeks each spring. The information given the engineer by the old settlers that the stage of water sufficient to give a channel of three feet, between Winnipeg and the Portage, continued through June, July and August, in ordinary years, was, to his (Mr. Ryan's) own knowledge, decidedly incorrect. The result of the question was that, in his opinion, the Government would be justified in expending as much money as would be necessary to remove the boulders and snags which at present formed very serious obstacles to navigation, especially at the parish of St. James, where there were rapids. He had been in communication with a Captain Greuber, of Winnipeg, who had more practical experience in the navigation of the Assiniboine than any other living man, and whose opinion was that an expenditure of a couple of thousand dollars could be made with advantage in the direction indicated. It would be useless to expend any very large sum in attempting such extensive improvements as had been advocated by the hon. member for Selkirk. The navigation of the river was at best only a temporary expedient, to be used pending the construction of a railroad south of Lake Manitoba. The railroad was a necessity, and, if the Dominion Government should desire to shirk the responsibility which rested upon them to build it, the road would be constructed by private enterprise; it was a mere question of time. But, under any circumstances, the road could not be built within eighteen months; so that, for two reasons, the farmers of West Marquette would have to depend principally upon the navigation of the Assiniboine to get their surplus produce to Winnipeg. In order to facilitate the shipping of that surplus for even one or two seasons, he believed the small expenditure of a couple of thousand dollars would be justifiable. He was glad the matter had been brought up by the hon. member for Selkirk, whose well-known influence with the Government might, he thought, be accepted as a guarantee that, the question having been brought to their attention by him, they really intended to do something in the matter.

MR. SMITH (Selkirk) said he was surprised to hear his hon. friend speak of those difficulties in the way of getting to Portage La Prairie. He recollected reading an address presented to his Excellency the Governor-General, last summer, and signed by his hon. friend, in which regret was expressed that the Governor-General had to go by waggon or carriage to Portage La Prairie, instead of by the Assiniboine, which, by a very small expenditure on the part of the Government, would have been rendered navigable and have permitted his Excellency to travel by water much more conveniently than by land. It must be recollected that this was during the month of September, when the waters had become low, and, although it was desirable that the representative of the Government should travel with ease, he did not believe the hon. member intended the improvement for that special purpose, but that it should be a permanent one, and one which would prove a permanent benefit to the country. He regretted the hon. member for Marquette had to-day such a different estimate of the capabilities of that river. He would also state that on the Saskatchewan, steamers required only a draft of water of about two feet or under, with which draft they were able to carry the considerable cargo of one hundred and fifty tons. Boats of that capacity, and measuring one hundred and fifty feet or more in length, had generally been the most successful and had surmounted the great obstacle to navigation during high water, namely, Cole's Falls. It was absolutely necessary that this obstruction should be removed. He was glad to believe that the hon. the Minister of Public Works and the Government desired to do so. The hon. member for Marquette had referred to his (Mr. Smith's) influence with the Government, but he trusted he had never suggested anything to the Government which was not practicable or necessary. He trusted those obstructions on the Saskatchewan would be removed, not simply because one or another desired it, but because such removal would be a public benefit, not only to that part of the country, but to the whole Dominion. That river should be opened in the most effective way and made a highway into the interior for those immigrants and others who desired to settle in the North-West. Stern-wheel steamboats on the Upper Missouri, as on the Saskatchewan, drew eighteen inches to two feet of water, so that, in any canal constructed from the Assiniboine to Lake Manitoba, three feet of water would be amply sufficient depth to meet all requirements, and, there being no rough water to pass, navigation would be rendered practicable for a distance of 1,200 miles in one direction, on the North Saskatchewan, and 800 miles on the South Saskatchewan, if those obstructions were removed. The case presented itself on its own merits in a favourable light to the Government. He was quite satisfied that his hon. friend from Marquette had in view the good of the Province, equally with himself. He did not speak of this improvement as a substitute for the railway, but everyone knew that, if water communication were obtained, freight could be carried much cheaper than by rail, at least as railways were now run. The future might bring some means of cheapening the cost of transport by rail, but, as matters stood now, they knew that, even with the additional expense of a canal in the way, the transport of goods would be much cheaper by water than by rail. If they obtained both water communication and railway communication, their position would be much better than with only the latter means of communication.

Mr. RYAN said he desired to make an explanation in regard to a statement of the hon. member for Selkirk. He (Mr. Ryan) did not consider himself exactly responsible for everything contained in the address to His Excellency alluded to by the hon. member for Selkirk. The fact of his having been chairman of the committee which presented the address did not make him so responsible. But he was quite prepared to take the responsibility of anything contained in the address. It had been a matter of regret that, at the time, owing to the unusual wetness of the season, the roads were in an almost impassable state, as could be testified by hon. friends the members for South Perth (Mr. Trow) and Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), both of whom had then visited his Province. The address stated that a very slight expenditure would have sufficed to make the river navigable as far as Portage La Prairie, and that it was to be regretted that the Government had not expended the money. He was still of that opinion, but only a very slight expenditure would be justified, only what was required to cover the expense of removing the snags and boulders from the river. The hon. member for Selkirk could have referred to an earlier and more authentic record than the address to find a statement of his (Mr. Ryan's) opinions. In 1875, in this House, he took exactly the same view that he now did—that the Government would not be justified in making a large expenditure in connection with the navigation of the Assiniboine River.

MR. MACKENZIE said the question which the hon. member for Selkirk had brought before the House was one which had occupied the attention of the Government in the fall of 1872 and the early part of 1873, and, subsequently, to some extent, in 1874. The country had been examined, if his memory served him aright, by Mr. Rowan, along the shores of Lakes Manitoba and Winnipegosis, and subsequently by Mr. Bender and by Mr. Henry Smith. Mr. Smith's surveys and Mr. Bender's surveys were somewhat detailed, and contained a good deal of information required at the time in connection with the location of the Pacific Railway. At that time, it was anticipated that it might be desirable to endeavour to make the Saskatchewan navigable throughout, and it was a question whether it would be easier to descend the Red River from Winnipeg and go on to Lake Winnipeg as far as the mouth of the Saskatchewan, and build some locks to overcome the Grand Rapids, where the river fell into the lake, or whether it would be better to ascend the Assiniboine, taking the course indicated by the hon. member for Selkirk, crossing to Lake Manitoba by a short canal, thence following the line of the two lakes, Winnipegosis and Manitoba, which lay very nearly parallel and at a distance of about seventy to eighty miles from Lake Winnipeg, and get into the Saskatchewan above the Falls. Examination had been made into the navigability of the Saskatchewan to some distance above the Falls, and it was found that it was quite possible, at a comparatively small expense, to get a navigable route in that manner which would overcome the difficulty at Lake Winnipeg. There were difficulties, however, of a somewhat serious character which presented themselves. Lake Winnipegosis, if he remembered aright, was 18ft. 9in.

higher in its general level than Lake Manitoba. It would require, therefore, not only a canal across Meadow Portage, but also two locks, unless, indeed, one lock might be made to do duty both as a guard-lock and a lift-lock at Mossy Portage, which was somewhat questionable. The navigation of Waterhen River, which connected the waters of Lake Winnipegosis and Lake Manitoba, might be improved; the engineers reported that it was quite possible, by removing some rocks and boulders in this river, to make it navigable for a small class of steamers, but it would be utterly useless, he thought, under any circumstances, to think of these two lakes being made navigable for any very large steamers. In the first place, these lakes were, generally speaking, shallow. Lake Manitoba was, he thought, nowhere deeper than about eighteen feet, and, while it was very shallow in some places, the bottom of the lake was covered with boulders and a stony formation, which made it somewhat dangerous for any steamer to go very near the shore over a great portion of its surface. At Mossy Portage, where this ridge of land divided Lake Winnipegosis and its north end from the Saskatchewan River, the work would be somewhat formidable. The level of the lake was about uniform through the year, while the level of the Saskatchewan River varied very much during the season, as a matter of course; and, although in its normal condition, there was not much difference—he forgot the present difference, but he knew there was scarcely any—between the level of the waters on the Saskatchewan at that point and that of the waters of the lake south of the portage, still, there would be a serious difference between them at certain seasons, and they would either require to have a lock there, or they would run the risk of diverting the channel of the Saskatchewan into Lake Winnipegosis and thence southward, with somewhat serious consequences. The project was not pursued any farther than to obtain information as to what it might be desirable, or, rather, what it might be possible to do, because it was determined to prosecute the survey of the Pacific Railway with a view to invite tenders at as early a day as possible for its construction; and until this was done it was not proposed to do anything further in the direction of making these surveys. There was no doubt a great deal in what the hon. member for Selkirk had said as to the comparative cheapness of freights by water as compared with land carriage; and with these connecting links made between the Assiniboine and Saskatchewan Rivers, there could be no doubt that, with some little improvements in the navigable parts of the Saskatchewan, a vast system of inland navigation could be procured. This was not only quite feasible, but it could be done with less expense, perhaps, than with respect to any system of navigation that had been improved, opening up so much country, in any other part of this continent. On the other hand, they knew comparatively little of the Saskatchewan. In some parts of it there were shifting sand-banks similar to those which existed on some parts of the course of the Mississippi; these sand-banks shifted the channel from year to year, and, although there might be always probably in these places sufficient water for a steamer of reasonable size, this would not always be found in the same place from year to year. A careful survey of the river would therefore have to be made before it would be possible or desirable to undertake any extensive system of navigation, although the system was there beyond all question, and the means existed for utilizing it. He did not propose to give any opinion at all about the improvement of the Assiniboine, from where it fell into Red River to its source, further than to say that representations had been made by the two hon. gentlemen who had spoken to-day, and by many private persons who had written on the subject, which would seem to show that the removal of some boulders would, in the meantime, greatly facilitate the navigation of this river for a considerable distance, and that this could be done at a comparatively small expenditure. He had stated, two or three weeks previously, in the House, in reply to a question, that it was the intention of the Government to have those boulders removed, both from the Assiniboine River and from a portion of Red River, where the navigation was seriously interrupted during low water, between Selkirk and the city of Winnipeg. He did not apprehend any serious difficulty in having this done during the current season, and, while he should have great pleasure in bringing down the various papers and records which the Government had upon the subject proper of the motion; he did not anticipate having to propose to Parliament anything in connection with the expenditure of money in that direction at the present time.

POSTMASTER OF MONTMAGNY.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. LANGEVIN moved for an order of the House—1st. For copy of any complaint made in 1875 against J. S. Vallée, Esquire, Postmaster of Montmagny; 2nd. Copy of the enquête held in 1875 by Mr. Achille Talbot, Deputy Post-Office Inspector, on said complaint; 3rd. Copy of all correspondence to and from the Post-Office Department on this subject; 4th. Copy of the subsequent enquête held in connection with the matter by W. E. Sheppard, Inspector of Post-Offices at Quebec.

NEW BRUNSWICK MILITARY SCHOOLS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS

MR. DECOSMOS, for Mr. DEVEBER, moved for returns showing:

1. The amounts spent yearly since 1867 in the maintenance of Military Schools in the Province of New Brunswick.
2. The number of candidates who have each year received second-class certificates, and the amount or amounts of gratuity paid.
3. The number of cadets who, at the time of attending any school held at Fredericton, N.B., were students of the University of New Brunswick; and whether exceptions were made in their favour as regards the hours of attendance at drill and instructions; with a list of those who have held, or now hold, commissions in the active Militia in New Brunswick.
4. The number and names of all passed cadets who have held, and now hold, commissions in the active Militia in New Brunswick, distinguishing between both.

TELEGRAPH CHARGES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. DEWDNEY moved for a copy of all correspondence or petitions with reference to the reduction of telegraph charges in the Province of British Columbia. He said that, before he left British Columbia, he had understood that representations had been made to the Government with a view of carrying out what was the object of this motion. The principal reason why the business people of British Columbia advocated and pressed on the Government this change was the increase of business anticipated from the large mining developments which had lately taken place in that Province. At present, the rate of charges from Victoria to Cariboo was, for ten words, he believed, $1.50; and the scale of charges, regulated by the distance of the different stations between those places, per ten words, ranged from 50c. to $1.50. It had been considered for some time that these charges were very exorbitant; and, he felt sure it would lead to a great increase in the business if the charges were very much less. For some time, their telegraph line had been in a very bad condition; and the want of faith in the line always had a very material effect in reducing the amount of business which would otherwise have been done. He understood, in fact had, before leaving British Columbia, seen that the Government were putting the line in perfect order, and, in view of the increase of business anticipated, he trusted that the Government would be able to bring down the charges, at any rate, to the prices adopted on this side of the continent. In British Columbia, and particularly in the mining localities, they would feel perfectly satisfied that, if this were done, the increase of business that would follow such action would be extremely great, and he was sure that, under such circumstances, it would be a hundred-fold. The Western Union line, from San Francisco to Victoria, he believed, had now reduced its rates, and their mining developments must increase the business between Cariboo and San Francisco. To-day; a very large trade was springing up in this relation; quartz mills were ordered at San Francisco, and the mining capitalists of California were becoming interested in the mines of British Columbia, and until the Pacific Railway was built, the bulk of their business must be done with that country. He felt perfectly certain that, during the next five or six years, at any rate, the business transacted between California and his Province would amount in value to millions of dollars, and this must necessarily so take place while they had no railway communication with the other Provinces of the Dominion. The Mining Board, consisting of almost all the business men of British Columbia, had passed a resolution petitioning the Dominion Government, asking them to reduce the telegraphic charges in British Columbia. Whether that petition had reached the House yet or not, he was not sure, but he trusted the Government would take the matter into consideration, and, by granting the request contained in the petition, confer a great benefit on the people of British Columbia. While speaking on that subject, he would draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to an important matter which claimed the attention of the House—a change in the sites of the telegraph cables. Great difficulty was experienced in keeping up communication between Victoria and Puget Sound. In the telegraphic connection between Vancouver and the mainland in Washington Territory, 17 miles of submarine cable was used in crossing the channels, of which there were five, the widest being 33,000 feet, and the narrowest 5,000 feet. Those cables were laid at the narrowest points, thereby encountering the maximum force of tides and, in some instances, resting on a very rugged bed. During five years ending December, 1877, five breaks occurred, which interrupted direct and satisfactory communication in all about four and a-half months, and which were repaired at a cost, in round numbers, of about $7,000; the cost and charges of new cable purchased during that time were, say, $19,000, making a total of $26,000; the subsidy to the Western Union Telegraph Company of $4,000 per year during the same period, which, however, could not properly be charged to cable maintenance, and which could not be well avoided until they had the line overland, was $20,000; land line, Victoria to Nanaimo, say, $8,000; cable and connections thence to Burrard Inlet, with all necessary additional tackle for handling the same, $38,000. For about $38,000 a cable might be laid between Nanaimo and Burrard Inlet, and a telegraph line constructed between Esquimalt and Nanaimo, and in this way little, if any, interruption could take place. He would, in closing his remarks, express the hope that the Government would give the reduction of the telegraphic tariff to British Columbia their serious consideration.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo), in seconding the motion, said that the telegraph line to British Columbia, which was the property of the Government, passing as it did for several hundred miles through a thickly timbered country, was liable to frequent interruptions, and the revenue derivable therefrom was consequently seriously affected. If people could not be certain that the messages they despatched would be delivered, they would naturally refrain from sending them to the extent they would otherwise do, and thus the utility of the line was injured to a great extent. It was to be hoped, therefore, that it would, as stated by the hon. member for Yale, be kept for the future in a proper state of repair, and that, by a reasonable reduction in the charges made, the people of British Columbia might be able to take advantage of it more than they had hitherto done. Having visited the various districts through which the line ran, he had arrived at the conclusion that, if the suggestions now made were adopted, instead of there being a deficit of $20,000 a year, there would be a surplus derivable by the Government. That could not be effected, however, while such exorbitant rates as a dollar and a quarter or a dollar and a half were charged for carrying a message 600 miles, but only by reducing the charge to the lowest possible rate. Messages were carried from Halifax to Windsor—that was, from the extreme end of Nova Scotia to the extreme end of Ontario—for 25 cents.

MR. DEWDNEY.

MR. MACKENZIE : 50 cents.

MR. THOMPSON : I beg pardon, I thought the rate was 25 cents.

MR. MACKENZIE : We have to pay additional rates for the Nova Scotia lines.

MR. THOMPSON said that, if the rates were reduced, ten messages would be sent for every one sent at present—fifty, probably, as the hon. member for Yale had said. By the opening of new quartz mines, the business of the line would be enormously increased. During this winter, miners were out continually crossing the mountains on snowshoes hunting for quartz ledges, and, as soon as new discoveries were made, the Provincial Government and press were informed, and telegrams were sent to companies which were being formed in San Francisco and other places by capitalists. If better and more reliable means could be adopted for the transmission of such information at cheap rates, the business of the telegraph line would, he believed, become more profitable than either the Montreal or Dominion lines, which were carried on by private enterprise. It was for the Government to find out how the line, which was their property, could be managed at the least possible expense and the greatest profit. In the place where he resided, which was the extreme termination of the line, there was a telegraph operator of the first standing—a gentleman who received a salary which on this side of the continent might be considered large, but which was not much in British Columbia—and very frequently he was not employed, either because the line was not open or that people declined to send messages at such high rates. Indeed, messages could sometimes be sent almost as quickly, at present, by mail as by telegraph, but, if the line was repaired so that messages could be forwarded quickly at reduced rates, it would be kept busily in operation every day. The remarks made by the hon. member for Yale regarding submarine cables were such as would, he thought, commend themselves to the consideration of the House, as the proposal made was likely to be of great advantage to the country.

MR. LANGEVIN said that, as the mines in British Columbia were now being wrought, anything the Government could do to provide those neighbourhoods with the proper postal and telegraphic communication would be of incalculable benefit. He fully concurred in what had been said by the hon. gentlemen who had preceded him, and was of opinion that a reduction in the rates charged for telegraphic messages would be a great boon. There was a great rush of members in the direction of the newly discovered quartz mines; money would doubtless be invested there, and great advantages would, in time, accrue to the country. He would certainly support a policy that would lead to a large reduction of the present rates for telegraphic messages.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not think any correspondence such as that asked for had yet come to hand. Some letters or petitions might be on the way hither, but he had seen nothing of them. He might mention, however, that the two members for Victoria called upon him some days ago, and with a representation similar to that contained in the remarks to which they had now given utterance. The matter was then very fully discussed, and he felt that, as the revenue derivable from the line at present was very inadequate as compared with the expenditure, it might be desirable to make a change in the direction which the hon. gentleman were pressing. During the last financial year the revenue was only $7,325 while the expenditure amounted to $31,109.

MR. THOMPSON : Including the subsidy?

MR. MACKENZIE : Yes. This year, however, the Government had been forced to place a new cable across the straits, and, as hon. gentlemen would observe, a vote of over $40,000 had been rendered necessary in order to cover outlays which were inevitable unless telegraphic communication was established there. He thought there was a great deal in what had been said as to the desirability of making a less rate than at present, even if it would produce no more revenue. Indeed, the amount received was at present so insignificant, as compared with the expenditure, that a little reduction would not be a very material item. Before the motion was brought forward, the Government had been considering to what extent they would sanction a reduction in the existing rates. He was not prepared to-day to say what reduction would be sanctioned, but he was prepared to say that they had practically resolved to reduce the rates to a sum which he hoped would be satisfactory when it was put in operation.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

FORT FRANCES LOCK.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. KIRKPATRICK moved for a return showing the amount expended upon and chargeable against Fort Frances Lock and works connected therewith, in each calendar year from the commencement of said works to 31st December, 1877; also the amount of work done and earth and rock excavated at said lock in each of said years. The subject was, he said, a very inviting one for remark, but he did not propose, on the present occasion, to take advantage of it, because he hoped another opportunity would be afforded by the Government for discussion thereupon. Perhaps, however, he might be informed whether any change had been made in the construction of the lock, particularly as regarded the depth of water.

MR. MACKENZIE said he could not tell precisely what was done.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he had noticed in the Public Works Report a short paragraph in reference to the Fort Frances Lock, in which a statement was made as to a canal with seven feet depth of water, and, as he understood a change had been made, he put the question to the Premier.

MR. MACKENZIE: A change has been made, but I cannot say what it is.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: There must be a mistake in the report.

MR. MACKENZIE.

INDIAN RESERVES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DECOSMOS moved for a return containing a complete copy of the Report or Reports of the Joint Indian Commission for adjusting the extent and boundaries of the Indian Reserves in British Columbia, with an account of the expenditure respecting the same, and accompanied with copies of any remonstrances of settlers against the decisions of the said Commissioners, and also a map showing the reserves defined and settled by the said Commission. He said he would not occupy the time of the House further than to remark that the hon. member for Yale had already brought the matter before the Legislature.

Motion agreed to.

ADMIRALTY SURVEY OF PORTLAND CHANNEL.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DECOSMOS moved for a return containing a Report and Chart of the latest British Admiralty Survey of Portland Channel, the eastern water boundary between British Columbia and Alaska. He said he would merely draw the attention of the Government to the fact that, though Portland Channel had been surveyed some years ago by the Admiralty, the Canadian Government had never yet obtained a copy of the chart made, and he hoped it would be obtained from the Admiralty immediately.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think that we have no such chart; at least, I have looked through the papers and I have not found anything of the kind. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will let his motion drop, and we will make a further search. I do not think we have a chart referring to Alaska.

MR. DECOSMOS: I am quite willing to withdraw my motion, but at the same time I think it is important that the Government should have those documents.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

ORDNANCE LANDS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. LANGEVIN moved for copy of a return, giving :

1st. A detailed statement of all sums of money received by Pierre Alexis Tremblay, Esquire, Land Surveyor, in connection with the Ordnance Lands in 1876 and 1877 ;

2nd. A statement showing all the sums of money received during the said two years by Dorila Tremblay, as Lighthouse-keeper at Portneuf, from the Department of Marine and Fisheries ;

3rd. A similar statement about Hilaire Tremblay, as Lighthouse-keeper at Baie St. Paul ;

4th. A similar statement about Thomas Tremblay, for services rendered by him in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, in the Quebec Agency ;

5th. A similar statement about William Tremblay, for services rendered by him in the same Department, Quebec Agency ;

6th. A similar statement about Simon Tremblay, as mail carrier from the St. Alphonse and Chicoutimi Wharves, to the Chicoutimi Post Office ;

7th. A similar statement about Louis Guay, as Lighthouse-keeper at Tadousac ;

8th. A similar statement about J. A. Gagné, Esquire, Official Assignee at Chicoutimi, for services rendered by him in connection with the arrest of certain parties on the Island of Anticosti ;

9th. A similar statement about Mr. Johnny Guay, Merchant, Chicoutimi, for services rendered by him in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, Quebec Agency, and in the Department of Public Works, in connection with the lighthouses, lighthouse-keepers, buoys, range-lights, and the Government wharves and slides in the counties of Chicoutimi and Saguenay.

MR. MILLS said he believed no payments had been made, except to the two first named. However, he would enquire into the matter, and any information, not in the report, he should be glad to furnish.

MR. BURPPE : (St. John) I think the information will be found in the Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

ST. ANN'S (N. S.) POST-OFFICE.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. TUPPER, for Mr. CAMPBELL, moved for copy of all correspondence respecting the removal of the post-office at South Gut of St. Ann's, county of Victoria, Nova Scotia.

Motion agreed to.

CONVEYANCE OF MAILS FROM PORT HASTINGS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. TUPPER, for Mr. CAMPBELL, moved for copies of all papers and correspondence regarding the conveyance of the mails between Port Hastings and Grand Narrows, in Nova Scotia, showing the amount of the contract, and whether the lowest tender was awarded the contract; also all subsequent correspondence regarding the changing of the route.

Motion agreed to.

VICTORIA HARBOUR AND WOLFE ISLAND BREAKWATER.

MOTION FOR ENGINEER'S REPORT.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) moved for copy of the Government Engineer's Report on Victoria Harbour and Breakwater, at Wolfe Island; and copies of all communications received since last Session, relating to the said works. He said he he understood an engineer was sent, as a matter of course, to see this harbour, and he should like to see his report with regard to this work. It was a most important work to a very large number of the inhabitants of that portion of the country, and it was urged very strongly upon the Government last year. Nearly all the members from Prince Edward Island had also waited upon the hon. the First Minister with regard to it, and had urged upon him to do something for these people who, for miles, were without a proper harbour for shipping. A small amount of money expended in this harbour would create an intercolonial trade; it would enable the inhabitants to ship their produce and enable them to procure limestone and coal, and would afford a good protection to the fishing vessels, a great number of which came up there during the summer season, and also to small schooners up to fifty or sixty tons. It was promised last year that something should be done during last summer, but, so far as the Government were concerned, the work remained as before. To show how keenly the importance of the work was felt, he might mention that some $12,000 or $15,000 had been expended upon the works by the Local Government, but, under Confederation, it properly came within the province of the Dominion Government, and he did not see any reason why people of that large section of the country should be deprived of any and every accommodation. A large and important harbour and public works were being carried out at another point, and it was much more important that something should be done in the neighbourhood of Wolfe Island, because they had no means of shipping their produce or carrying on their trade. A few thousand dollars would be of material service, and he trusted the Government would give early consideration to the matter. Many demands had been made upon the Government for other public works at Prince Edward Island, but the amount granted had been very small indeed, while large sums had been squandered away on other works of not half so much importance. He saw no amount placed in the Estimates for Prince Edward Island this year. It was true that $25,000 appeared in the Estimates for that Province, but that sum was wholly for damages sustained by public works through a want of care, and for the mismanagement of the public works put there.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: You have no Cabinet Ministers in your Province.

MR. POPE said no, they had not. He did not hesitate to say that the sum of $25,000 which appeared in the Estimates for Souris breakwater was simply thrown away, and might have been saved by a small expenditure. He did not hesitate to say further that the work was very insecurely and inefficiently done; and, although it was represented to the First Minister that the insecurity of the work rendered some protection necessary, nothing was done, and the first storm that came carried part of the works away.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was not aware that, in bringing forward his motion, the hon. gentleman would wish to discuss the Souris Breakwater, or he should have been prepared to meet his statement. The hon. gentleman should have given notice of his intention.

MR. POPE said he merely discussed this breakwater to show that, although they had this sum of $25,000 to the credit of Prince Edward Island in the Estimates, they really received no assistance from this Government, because this money had been squandered away. It was, perhaps, a necessary expenditure now, but it was occasioned through mismanagement. They in Prince Edward Island were not fairly treated. There were two public works down there, the mismanagement of which he would refer to; and worse than mismanagement had taken place down there with reference to moneys expended.

MR. SPEAKER: The objection of the hon. the Premier is perfectly valid. Incidental references to other matters may be made in introducing these notices, but to enter into a discussion upon them can scarcely be permitted.

MR. TUPPER said it had been the practice to allow hon. members introducing these notices to refer to any matter that was considered likely to assist their argument before the House. The hon. gentleman had referred to the Souris breakwater in showing that Prince Edward Island had received very little assistance from the Government. On a strict point of order the hon. the First Minister could prevent him going on, but he (Mr. Tupper) did not think it would be calculated to assist the business of the House if hon. gentlemen were compelled to put specific motions on the paper for every branch of the question to be brought before the House. It would increase the number of motions, and, instead of facilitating business, would hinder it.

MR. MACKENZIE said but little had been said of the subject to be discussed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pope) had gone wholly to another point. He did not object to his stating, if he chose to do so, that there had been very little spent on public works in Prince Edward Island, and therefore that there should be some such assistance given, but he had gone over the other works and had blamed the Government with regard to them, and so on. He (Mr. Mackenzie) held that to be entirely irregular, and it was quite impossible that he could waive his objection to that manner of proceeding.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pope) would see Souris works mentioned in the Estimates, and would have ample opportunity of discussing it.

MR. POPE said he should take the opportunity very shortly of discussing that and other public works, inasmuch as very little had been mentioned in the Estimates for Prince Edward Island. He did hope that in the interests of the people of that large section of the Dominion some small sum would be inserted in the Supplementary Estimates. They had not $500 for the whole of the country, except to repair damages and make up for misapplications of public money for which they were not responsible. Other contracts he would refer to afterwards. A small sum of money, that would not be felt by the Government, would be of material assistance to them, and he hoped it would be voted for the purpose mentioned in his motion.

After Recess.

MR. SINCLAIR said the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Pope) had charged the Government with neglecting the improvements of Victoria Harbour. To some extent, that work had been neglected, but he did not think that, taking everything into account, the Government could be charged with that neglect. Last year, he (Mr. Sinclair) brought the matter before the attention of the Government, and the hon. the Minister of Public Works ordered a dredge to be sent there in July, and remain until a sufficient depth of water had been given to enable coasting vessels to load and discharge their cargoes at the wharf. At that time the Government Engineer came to the Province, and he (Mr. Sinclair) accompanied him to Victoria Harbour. The engineer found there under contract, entered into with the Provincial Government, of $3,000 for extending and improving the wharf, and it was considered that it would be useless to proceed to dredge the harbour until the contract with the Local Government was completed, and it was therefore decided that when that contract was finished the dredge should proceed there and dredge the channel sufficiently for coasting vessels to load and discharge at the wharf. He (Mr. Sinclair) brought the matter before the Minister of Public Works, and he was satisfied that instructions would be given for sending the dredge there next season, and endeavouring to get sufficient depth of water for coasting schooners before leaving. If it was found that a sufficient depth of water could not be maintained in the channel without its being sheltered by a breakwater built on the south-west side of the harbour, he had full confidence in the Government that they would give whatever sum would be necessary for building the breakwater. The improvement of Victoria Harbour was essentially necessary. There was a coast extending over fifteen miles, with a thickly settled front and back settlement, that had no other outlet for marketing their produce, without moving it a long distance, but what this harbour afforded. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would see the justice and necessity of improving Victoria Harbour so as to give and maintain sufficient depth of water for coasting vessels.

MR. DAVIES said the Government could not be charged with neglect, because, until the breakwater was extended into deeper water, dredging would be useless. The breakwater was nearly three quarters of a mile in length, and at its outer end a bank of sand was deposited. The breakwater required to be extended 300 yards further out until it met the current of the Straits of Northumberland, when that sand-bank would be swept away. If the dredges were taken there it would not obviate the difficulty. No sooner would the channel be dredged than it would fill up by the ebb tide. The Local Government had, from time to time, made grants towards the improvement of that harbour, and the inhabitants had subscribed freely, but their means were about exhausted. As that harbour would be to a great extent a harbour of refuge for shipping passing down the Straits, the Government might fairly construct a second breakwater on an adjacent island where there was a prominent light. The Dominion Government could not be fairly charged with neglect up to the present time, because any expenditure made on using the dredge would have been wasted, because the harbour would have filled up as soon as the dredging had been completed.

Motion agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF OLD RAILS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. DOMVILLE moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government, or any person connected with the Public Works or Railway Department, and any company or individual, respecting the distribution or loan of old rails, not yet submitted to Parliament. He said his object in submitting the motion was to trace up the rail question of the Lower Provinces, and he desired to ascertain how they were being disposed of, where they had been promised, and who was to get them. He had endeavoured, from time to time, to get that information without placing a formal notice on the paper, but he found so many difficulties in the way that this was perhaps the most simple way of reaching it. During his travels, he happened, by accident, to be present at a public meeting at which the question of the old rails largely entered into the discussion. He was surprised to hear that letters were passing, or were supposed to be passing, in regard to the disposal of those rails for purposes which he considered were not within the intention of Parliament when it authorized their distribution. He observed by one of the papers brought down to the House that certain railroads that were being built asked for loans of rails. When the Springhill and Parrsborough Company applied for a loan of those old rails, the reply received was that the Government had none on hand. On examining the Blue-books, he found some reference to a valuation, as given in another letter, of twenty dollars per ton, and that there must be some nine or ten thousand tons of rails on hand, if any did exist; and, further, that certain allotments of rails had been made, as, for instance, to the St. Martin road. If those parties bought those rails, they would not exist as the property of the Intercolonial, but the Intercolonial would hold the notes given in payment of them, or the rails were there and the railroad did not get them. One or the other must be the case. When the Springhill and Parrsborough Company applied for the rails, they were told they could not obtain them; that the rails had all been allotted. Yet, to-day, he found the hon. the Premier stating that an allotment of rails had been made for forty-two miles of the New Brunswick Central, to run from St. Mary's to Queen's and King's Counties. He had endeavoured to gain from the public records in the library of this House the length of this road, not being quite satisfied as to whether it was forty-two miles or not. He found a map, published by authority, showing the railway systems of the Eastern Provinces of Canada, but, he was prepared to say this map was not even correct. Its scales were one way, and the distances another. The scale purported to be so many miles to the inch, while the railroad ran just about half of those miles; whether the mistake was intentional or not he could not say. If intentional, it was bad; if not, it was even worse, that the country should have to bear so large an expenditure to print and distribute beautiful plans like this, all wrong, and calculated to deceive every one who might have occasion to use them. He was, therefore, owing to the incorrectness of the map, unable to state definitely whether this railroad was forty-two or sixty miles long. The Springhill and Parrsborough road could not get any rails, yet there were letters sent by the hon. the Premier to members of this House, stating that the Government had allotted them rails. He would read an extract which would, perhaps, convey the matter in a definite form. At a public meeting, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Ferris) was asked to define what he had ever done for his county, and why his county had not got the rails to which they considered they were entitled. The hon. member answered he had obtained those rails; his constituents replied he had not. The hon. member was asked where they were, and he stated in reply that he had Mr. Mackenzie's letter promising the rails, and that he had told Mr. Mackenzie he would not support the Government unless he gave him rails to build the Pacific Railway. A voice in the crowd cried out, "Another corrupt bargain." This was very wrong, very thoughtless on the part of the owner of that voice, as it must have hurt the feelings of the hon. member. He (Mr. Domville) had heard this statement made, and, if necessary, could prove it by one hundred people. The newspaper report was almost a verbatim one. The Government had refused rails to a company whose culverts were completed, whose roads were graded, whose fences were up, and which required only the rails to finish it. Had these rails been procured, there would have been access to the sea, traversing a distance of twenty-six miles instead of forty-five miles; and, the country having been opened up, the Government would have been able to get coal at a cheap rate, and thus to effect a large saving. But, in spite of the resolutions passed in this House, this company could not get any rails, and were obliged to purchase them. Yet, at the same time, the Government granted rails for forty-two miles of a road, the company to construct which, he believed, had not yet been formed. An Act had been passed a few years ago at Fredericton, the local Government had promised a subsidy per mile, and afterwards declined to give it; consequently, this line did not exist. There was no subsidy; they had literally done nothing; yet, here, he found the Government refusing rails to a branch which was really a very important feeder to the Intercolonial; which had collected in one month nine hundred dollars on Government account. Though this important feeder to the Intercolonial could not get any rails, yet an hon. member had a letter from the hon. the Premier, saying he was promised rails for a line which did not exist, and the rails, therefore, if any existed, must be lying useless, while other roads could not obtain any. The hon. member for Queen's said he had told Mr. Mackenzie he would not vote for him unless on the promise of obtaining these rails, and that he had a letter to that effect from Mr. Mackenzie. Was it fair to the country that these rails were to be tied up in that way for ever? That an hon. member could hold a letter in his pocket placing these rails at his disposal; that other important works should remain idle until this road should be completed; that these rails should not be given to people who did not support the Government of the day, as did the hon. member for Queen's? This part of the railroad passed through the county of Cumberland. The Government did not consider it a feeder of the Intercolonial; said it drained the Intercolonial, although it was contributing nine hundred dollars per month to the Intercolonial. He did not propose to take up the time of the House uselessly; he only wished to lay before the House the fact that, if this letter was written in order to get a vote, it would seem to anyone outside the House to be a corrupt bargain. If it had not been written, no reference should have been made to it for a political purpose; if it had been written, it tarnished the good name of so worthy a representative as the hon. the Premier of the Dominion. If the rails were promised, it was a corrupt bargain. If not, it was too bad to abuse the hon. the Premier's name. Therefore, he asked that full correspondence be furnished, and he hoped, when it did come down, he would be able to tell the people down there that the rails were forthcoming; and, if they were forthcoming, the people of King's had as much right to deal with these rails as the hon. member for Queen's. No hon. member should have the power to tell his constituents that he had these rails, and, if they did not toe the mark and elect him, he would keep back those rails. People asked why the road was not built? He (Mr. Domville) answered that these rails did not exist. He could state that there were not sufficient rails to meet the requirements of the Intercolonial. He could prove this fact by the testimony of any of the practical officers, not the principal officers, but the practical officers, who knew everything that was wanting. The Elgin branch was getting rails; the Chatham branch had got its rails; the St. Mary's had yet to get its allotment; but there was difficulty to get a sufficient quantity for them. Outside of these, there were supposed to be forty to forty-five thousand tons of good rails for the county of Queen's. The people were deluded with the promise of getting rails when none existed, unless it were proposed to give them steel rails. The people were not satisfied with a promise of iron rails which did not exist in a condition to lay down. It had been said that he (Mr. Domville) had been hostile to the road running through Queen's, but he would be very glad to see a railway pass through that county. He had too much national feeling to be annoyed because the hon. member for Queen's had got the rails which he (Mr. Domville) had been unable to get. When that line was started it should be built from the Intercolonial up; not commence right up at the Grand River or somewhere, to go nowhere and end nowhere, but should start from a point on the Intercolonial road. He wanted those rails and did not desire to wait until an hon. member should say where that line was to start from.

Mr. FERRIS said he would tell the whole circumstance. In the first place, the Local Government intended to give $5,000 per mile; the railway to pass through the counties of King's, Queen's and Sunbury. The people of his county had a meeting before he (Mr. Ferris) left, for the purpose of ascertaining whether rails could be got to build this line. He (Mr. Ferris) told the meeting he could not promise the rails, but would do his best to obtain them. After he had arrived at Ottawa, Messrs. Burpee, Appleby and himself went to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, who looked over the plans and map and said he could grant a portion of the rails, or something to that effect, to make the road a feeder for the Intercolonial. The hon. the Premier shortly afterwards stated that many applications had been made for rails, that he could not give the whole quantity required, but only a certain proportion to the length of the road. Then there was a resolution passed through the House. Two months afterwards he had received a line from the hon. the Premier, stating the distance for which the rails were apportioned. He had stated this to the meeting, and had told the people that if he had not got the rails he would not support the Government, as they had promised them to him, and he had it in writing from the hon. the Premier. Mr. Domville stated there was not a rail on hand, that he had bought up every rail, and that he would bet $500 not a rail would be got, and, if the Government had said so, it was a fraud. He knew what Mr. Domville was; the hon. gentleman would say anything and do anything, and he (Mr. Ferris) would be believed by any person before Mr. Domville would be. The hon. gentleman said these letters did not amount to much. He would tell what he knew. When hon. gentlemen opposite wanted to get Sir Francis Hincks, a member of the Government, elected for Renfrew, they bought up a man in that place by the promise of a collectorship of Customs. Sir Francis Hincks was elected, and afterwards, that man came down for his appointment, and Sir Francis Hincks took him to Sir John A. Macdonald and said: "Sir John, I want this man appointed Collector of Customs." "Oh," said Sir John, "I cannot do it." "But," said Sir Francis Hincks, "I have promised it." "Oh," said Sir John A. Macdonald, "I have promised it too." "The devil," rejoined Sir Francis Hincks, "I have given it to him in writing." "Oh," said Sir John A. Macdonald, "I have given it to twenty men in writing." These were the men who accused other public men of corruption. These were the men who had been so honest when in power, and who had bought for Sir Francis Hincks a seat. One of the charges that were made was that the late Government had increased salaries $3,000, and members' pay, $400; and he (Mr. Ferris) had said he could prove it by Mr. Domville, but Mr. Domville did not have the manhood to rise and own it; he (Mr. Domville) sneaked out; there was not manhood enough in him to get up and own the truth.

Mr. Domville said that he (Mr. Ferris) was partly right, and that Mr. Wiggins was partly right. He (Mr. Ferris) could not see what King's County wanted to send Mr. Domville to the House for, seeing what little good he did. Mr. Domville said he had never got an office or asked for an office for anyone—

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member is called to order. He is speaking of what took place, as I understand it, at a meeting, and of the gentlemen who were there, and of what they said at that meeting, and I presume he means by Mr. Domville a member of this House, and, if so, he must allude to him as the hon. member for King's.

MR. FERRIS said he would say the hon. member for King's. Even the hon. member for Cumberland had thought he had got a great mare's nest; and what a hullabaloo was made by the hon. gentleman and all the Tory papers. He (Mr. Ferris) remembered when the hon. gentleman was brought up before the House for some of his dirty tricks; and he, for one, not liking to vote against one of his own people down in the Lower Provinces, had left the House and not voted. The hon. gentleman had said he would do anything for him (Mr. Ferris) after that, but immediately afterwards the hon. gentleman would have hung him if he could. The hon. gentleman would hang his own father for power.

MR. DOMVILLE: The newspaper is here and I think the hon. member should confine his explanations to it.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. FERRIS: I have not much more to say; and that is just the truth about the rails. All I am sorry for is that I did not get the promise of more of them.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Show the letter. What about the rails?

MR. FERRIS: I told you all about the rails.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order, order.

MR. TUPPER said he thought the House would regard the statements or rather the absence of statements on the part of the hon. member (Mr. Ferris) as a more serious question than hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to consider it. They had the avowal of an hon. member of the House that he was present at a public meeting, and that at that public meeting the hon. member for Queen's County, N.B., stated:

"I have Mr. Mackenzie's letter promising me the rails; I told Mackenzie I would not support his Government unless he gave me enough old rails to build the Central Railway."

This statement was about as serious a one, perhaps, as it would be possible to make with reference to transactions between any hon. member of the House and the Government of the country; and they had this statement made by an hon. member of this House who declared he was present at that meeting and heard it; and the hon. gentleman had not—

MR. FERRIS: I do not deny it.

MR. TUPPER: Very well.

MR. FERRIS: I will tell you just what I said: I said the rails had been promised by the Government, and, if they did not carry it out, I would not support the Government, for my people expected them; that is what I said.

MR. TUPPER said he was not going to accuse the hon. gentleman of not denying it. It was very much to the credit of the hon. gentleman, having made that statement at a public meeting, that he did not deny it. They had the fact before them that an hon. member of the House had stated at a public meeting that he had applied to the leader of the Government, the hon. the Minister of Public Works, who had a certain quantity of old rails at his disposal, for the loan of some of these rails, and had told the leader of the Government he would not support his Government unless he (Mr. Mackenzie) gave him (Mr. Ferris) those rails.

MR. FERRIS: No.

MR. TUPPER: I will read it again.

MR. FERRIS: Bring your charge.

MR. TUPPER said he had read the statement which had gone uncontradicted by the hon. member down to the present hour, and the truth of which, in the presence of the House, he (Mr. Ferris) had admitted. He (Mr. Tupper) wished to go back a little with reference to this transaction—

MR. FERRIS: That is not so.

MR. TUPPER: And what took place with regard to this matter. The policy of the Government had been to remove a very large quantity of rails from the Intercolonial Railway and give them to railways in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and to relay the track with steel rails. It was not necessary that he should deal with the matter as a question of public policy now, further than to say he believed he was expressing the opinion of every person, who knew anything with relation to this subject, when he said these rails were suitable for the work required of them, and would now be in use, had it not been for the unfortunate purchase of a large quantity of steel rails which the Government could not otherwise utilize. The result was that they had the statement from the hon. the Minister of Finance this Session that they had taken up a large quantity of old rails, and relaid with steel, only because there was a large quantity of the latter on hand.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. TUPPER said he thought the hon. member would find that this was the case; and that this was the reason given by the hon. the Finance Minister for carrying to suspense account some $300,000 or $400,000 worth of these rails.

MR. MACKENZIE: Nothing of the kind was said.

MR. TUPPER said, as the hon. gentleman had said nothing of the kind was said, he would leave the question open, but that was what he had understood—that this would not have been done had not those steel rails been on their hands. At all events, he was in a position to state that a very large amount of rails had been taken up, and that the track had been relaid with steel rails, which would not have been done had that not been the case. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had these rails at his disposal, and it was his policy, and the policy of the Government—with which he was not going to find fault—to loan the iron rails that had been taken up from the Intercolonial, to companies whose roads connected with that railway. Exception was taken at the time such authority was asked for by the hon. member for North Hastings, he thought, to this proposition, as an improper course to be pursued; he (Mr. Bowell) raised the question that it was very unwise to put at the disposal of the Government the means of showing favouritism in a matter of this kind, and that the proper mode would be that the rails should be sold. The hon. the Minister of Public Works was at the time asked, when he (Mr. Mackenzie) took the authority of the House to loan these rails—and he (Mr. Tupper) thought he was safe in saying that this was after the hon. gentleman had already loaned a portion of them, and that a portion of them were then laid down on the tracks of the companies to which they had been loaned, though it was better late than never to ask for such authority—to what companies he proposed to loan them; and he would read to the House what he (Mr. Mackenzie), who then had the applications in this relation before him, stated in reply to that inquiry; it was as follows:—

“He would give the names of all the railways that could in any sense be considered as feeders. There was the branch which might be necessary to reach deep water at Dalhousie, six or seven miles long; the road starting from Chatham crossing the Intercolonial and running towards Fredericton; the road from the harbour of Richibucto to the main line; the road from the main line, crossing the counties of Queen's and York to Fredericton; the St. Martin and Upham road; and the road from Parrsborough to Pugwash.”

And the road from Parrsborough to Pugwash was a road named by the hon. gentleman himself when he was pressed to name the roads that would be entitled to receive these rails. There was very good reason for this. This road was, at the time, being constructed under a large subsidy from the Local Government of New Brunswick; it was twenty-six miles in length, and it connected the Basin of Minas, an important point, with the Intercolonial Railway, to which it would be an important feeder; and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had informed the House that it was one of the feeders and lines that might be regarded as feeders of the Intercolonial. The parties engaged in its construction, not having ample means to carry it on—and by a short line from the Springhill Mines to the Intercolonial Railway, it would be connected with the Intercolonial Railway—applied to the hon. the Minister of Public Works for a loan of rails to assist them in laying down the track, which was, at that time, ready to receive the rails. The road was graded, and the bridging, was, he believed, almost finished—at all events, it was in a forward state, and all it required to open up a valuable traffic and to make communication through an important section of the country, was assistance from the Government in the way of the loan of a very small portion of the rails that had been taken up, to a very large extent, in the Province of Nova Scotia. A motion was made in the House asking for the correspondence with relation to the matter, and they had an extraordinary document brought down by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, which he would read, as follows:—

“Return to an order of the House of Commons, dated 15th February, 1877, for a return showing the quantity of iron rails removed from the Government railways; railway companies to which they have been loaned; the date of such loans; the counties and districts through which said railways run; the quantity loaned to such railway company; the terms upon which such loans have been made; the nature of the security given by each railway company to secure the return of said iron rails; the names of the directors of the companies, respectively, to which iron rails have been loaned; together with all correspondence between the Government and any company or individual making application for such loans.”

As Mr. Brydges was the general superintendent of Government Railways, the Government naturally applied to him, he supposed, to furnish any correspondence that had taken place between him (Mr. Brydges) and these parties, or for any communications he had in this connection, at all events, in the return brought down to the House by the Government, appeared the following letter from Mr. Brydges, which he would read:—

“RAILWAY DEPARTMENT,
“Moncton, N.B., 11th April, 1877.

“SIR,—I beg to return the order from the House of Commons in regard to old rails loaned to different railway companies. I also enclose a statement showing the different branch railways to which rails have been loaned, giving the name of each branch, the quantity loaned, the counties through which the roads run, and the names of the directors of the different companies, as far as we have been able to ascertain. The rails have been loaned in accordance with the resolution adopted by Parliament. There is no correspondence that I am aware of in connection with these matters.

“I have, &c.,

“C. J. BRYDGES,

“General Supt. Govt. Railways.”

He was very much amazed when he received this communication, because he himself had addressed more than one letter to the hon. the First Minister in regard to this matter. He had been applied to by the President of the Springhill and Parrsborough Coal and Railway Company to use such exertions as he could with the hon. the First Minister in order to obtain fair consideration for the road for which they had made application. He had communicated with the hon. the First Minister, to whom he had addressed more than one letter. He had received a letter from the Department stating that the matter had been referred to Mr. Brydges, and, accordingly, he was very much surprised to learn, by a letter from Mr. Brydges, that he was aware of no correspondence whatever. The attention of the hon. the First Minister was called to the character of this return, and it was supplemented by the long return which he held in his hand, but it was not long enough, because he found that one or two letters which he had addressed to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) or the Public Works Department did not appear in it, nor the reference which he was assured by the Department had been made to Mr. Brydges; but this extraordinary state of things did appear: that, while the companies named in this very statement of the hon. the First Minister as those that would be entitled to get rails and receive consideration at the hands of the Government, had sought in vain for justice from the hon. the First Minister—and they had asked for no favour, but for simple justice—to roads that, after great effort, had been constructed and put in a state of forwardness and made ready for rails, and when great and immediate advantage to the country would have resulted from such aid; he found that, without a word of correspondence, as for as he could see—he had, however, run his eye over the return hurriedly—for the New Brunswick Central Railway, 42 miles in length, rails were loaned, according to this return, which was obtained subsequent to the statement of Mr. Brydges that there was no correspondence of which he was aware in this relation, although this return contained correspondence which the hon. gentleman must have been aware of at the time, if he had not forgotten it, because the correspondence from himself (Mr. Tupper) in relation to parties in whom he took an interest and for whom he was making application in this matter, had taken place. He found, on the 15th page of this return, the New Brunswick Central Railway, 42 miles in length, mentioned. That was the fact, and he would draw the attention of the House to the very extraordinary fact that the road, which only required a little assistance in the way of rails to put it in actual operation, had been refused that assistance at the hands of the Government. Although 42 miles of rails were promised to the member for Queen's, and, as he had been informed by an hon. gentleman behind him, a company was organized, not a sod, he believed he was safe in saying, had been turned. Forty-two miles of rails had been taken up in the Province of Nova Scotia, which, he presumed, were promised to the member for Queen's, who, at a public meeting of his constituents, declared that he would not support the Government unless he obtained these rails.

MR. FERRIS: I stated at the public meeting that these rails were promised; and that being so, I would carry out the promise of the Government.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman and himself agreed perfectly, and he gave him credit for the manly statement he had made. There was no correspondence before the House, but with that statement they were not left in any doubt as to why such an extraordinary grant of rails was made to a road only in contemplation, while other roads were refused a similar grant, which they were duly entitled to, thereby requiring the business of the country to be kept at a standstill. He would be failing in his duty as a public man, in his duty to the country, if he allowed the statement made on such authority as that of the hon. member for Queen's, in relation to the Government, to pass without drawing attention to it. In doing so, however, he was not making any attack upon the hon. member for Queen's, who, he had no doubt, used strenuous efforts to obtain what was promised to his county. The question of the distribution of these rails was one that affected the expenditure of over $100,000 of public money. The House, he was satisfied, would require at the hands of the Government some more distinct statement and explanation of a transaction which, on the face of it, was by no means creditable to the Government. The hon. gentleman for Queen's seemed to think that it was very unfair of him (Mr. Tupper) to refer to the expression he had made use of to his constituents. There was, however, no unfairness about it; and he would also refer to a former occasion when, an unjust attack being made upon him (Mr. Tupper) in this House, the hon. gentleman, ashamed of the action of his party, thought he would better assert his own dignity and character by walking out of the House than by joining in that attack. He certainly appreciated the conduct of the hon. gentleman on that occasion, and, if any unfair attack was made upon him by hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, he (Mr. Tupper) would be found prepared to do even more for him. But this was not a matter touching the hon. member for Queen's at all, but one which certainly required some explanation at the hands of the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE said the explanation was very easily given. On the 10th April, 1876, he moved the following resolution:—

"That it is expedient to authorize the Government to make a temporary disposition of the iron rails as they are removed from the Government railways, by loaning them to companies constructing railways which may be regarded as feeders to the Government lines, such rails to be returned weight for weight to the Government stores at the junction of such lines when taken up."

The hon. gentleman, in the course of the discussion, had read a portion of his (Mr. Mackenzie's) remarks, but omitted to read the last lines which, after enumerating a number of railways, were to the effect that these were all the roads he knew of which had any connection with the Intercolonial by crossing it.

MR. TUPPER: Perhaps you will allow me to say I read the whole passage.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman had stopped at the point he had indicated. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had also stated before that there were about ninety miles of iron rails to be lifted.

MR. TUPPER: That is another speech.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes, but the same debate. It must be allowed that it was quite impossible to use both iron and steel rails.

MR. TUPPER: Give one kind.

MR. MACKENZIE said the matter was left, after the resolution was passed, to the General Superintendent of Railways, who submitted a report. He remembered telling the hon. gentlemen opposite, at the time, that the Pugwash and the Parrsborough and Springhill road, instead of being a feeder to the Intercolonial, was the reverse, and that to give for that road iron rails belonging to the Government would simply be to take away trade from their own line.

MR. TUPPER: That was in your letter.

MR. MACKENZIE: But I remember telling the hon. gentleman as well.

MR. TUPPER: I was not in the House when the discussion took place.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, but I told you some time afterwards. I said the Pugwash road would not be a feeder of the Intercolonial.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken, and, if he brings down my letter, which is in his possession, he will find it is quite the reverse.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am not speaking of the letter, but of the conversation.

MR. TUPPER: Well, you have mistaken the conversation.

MR. MACKENZIE: Of course, he is always right, and everybody else always wrong. Perhaps he (Mr. Mackenzie) might be allowed to point out that the Superintendent reported the road as not being a feeder, and the matter, of course, was thus ended. The hon. member for Cumberland was mistaken as to what, in his own peculiar way, he called his hon. friend's admission. In fact the hon. gentleman opposite had a peculiar knack of getting hold of admissions when he liked, and of torturing facts in order to make them suit his own purpose. The hon. member for Queen's did not say he would threaten the Government unless they gave him these rails. What he did say was that a promise had been made, and if that promise was violated he would not support the Government. Such was the admission, as the hon. member for Cumberland called it, which had been made. He (Mr. Mackenzie) would blame no one for opposing a Government which would break faith not only with an hon. gentleman, but with the public and that House which had entrusted the Government with the distribution of those rails. But these rails, it must be remembered, were to be used only for roads that were feeders of the Intercolonial Railway. Such was the principle on which the disposition was to be made, and the Government merely carried out their instructions. One other word. The hon. gentleman opposite said that rails had been taken up which ought to have been left alone, in order that the Government might have the disposition of them. He (Mr. Mackenzie) averred, on the other hand, that no rails had been taken up except by the orders of the superintendent and the engineer of the roads. The process of lifting these rails, in fact, was undertaken long before the present Govern ment came into power, and the quantity then taken up was quite equal to what had been lifted in any succeeding year. It was only in cases where it was absolutely necessary to have roads thoroughly repaired that rails were taken up; and to show the proportion of utterly useless rails, he would read from the return brought down last year, where it was stated that the possible number of tons of rails that were good at the time rails were taken up was 3,230 tons. Of these, Mr. Macnab, Chief Engineer, stated that 1,773 tons, or considerably over the half, were entirely useless except for "scrap," and that 1,457 tons were available for use of branch lines, which, of course, was very much less than half the quantity taken up. He challenged any one to examine into the renewals each year, and give the slightest ground for the assertion, for the insinuation, for the suspicion, for the insinuation of the hon. member for Cumberland, that there was anything of a character which could be blamed, in the transactions of the chief engineer for the railroad. The hon. gentleman knew that the Chief Engineer and the Superintendent were not interfered with in any way by the Government in the management of the railway; and in the renewals which were constantly taking place, the public interest alone, not the interest of the Government, was considered. The Chief Engineer, the General Superintendent, and every other official upon the road, had, in taking up the rails, been left to follow ordinary engineering considerations solely. These were the facts of a very simple matter, and nothing could be more disingenuous than the manner in which it had been brought before the House, and pressed with the usual unfairness, he might say malignity, which characterized the Opposition.

MR. BURPEE (Sunbury) said that, being interested in the matter under discussion, he had, along with the hon. member for Queen's, called upon the Premier in reference to these rails. The company for whom the rails were asked proposed to make a road which would join the Intercolonial Railway after running through a very important section of country, thereby opening up several branches of industry, including coal-mining, in the counties of Queen's and Sunbury. The road referred to was subsidized by an Act of the Local Legislature offering a bonus for its construction. The people residing in the localities through which it passed, and the promoters of the road were very sanguine that, with a loan of rails by the Dominion Government, it would be constructed at an early day. His constituents being interested in this road, he, in company with the hon. member for Queen's, waited upon the Premier in reference to the matter, as he had already mentioned, and, instead of raising objections, the Premier acceded to their very reasonable request. In fact, they had only to show him the maps and plans of the proposed undertaking, together with its prospects and its connection with the Intercolonial as a feeder, to induce him to at once agree to the proposition on the condition that the House of Commons gave the necessary authority. He was present on every occasion that the hon. member for Queen's had an interview with the Minister of Public Works in reference to these rails, and he could emphatically affirm that, far from any pressure being required to extort a favour from him, his assent was given without hesitation. This was only another futile attempt on the part of the Opposition to manufacture scandal out of nothing, and indicated the paucity of material from which they had to manufacture charges against the Liberal members and the Government.

MR. BOWELL said that, when this question was under discussion two years ago, some of the members of the House anticipated just what had proved to have taken place in connection with these old rails. Those who were in the House at the time would remember that he, with others, took exception to placing the power in the hands of any Administration of disposing of a large quantity of rails, because these rails were likely to be distributed, not so much in the interest of the Intercolonial or Dominion Railways, as in that of the Administration itself. Upon that occasion he used this language, that—

"The principle involved in this resolution was vicious; that he did not see why those rails should be given to local roads, though they might be feeders of Government railways, any more than to others in different sections of the Dominion. He could easily see how the adoption of such a scheme as lending those rails would lead to abuses."

The hon. member for Monck used strong language on that occasion in reference to this matter, declaring that, if this power was given to the Government, they would use it to keep themselves in power. Now, the admission made by the hon. member for Queen's this evening had evidenced the fact that, unless he obtained these rails, he would go into Opposition and oppose the Government.

An Hon. MEMBER: No.

MR. BOWELL: The hon. member for North York had better allow the hon. gentleman to speak for himself, and not interfere, as he constantly does, with these interruptions.

MR. DYMOND: I was not interrupting.

MR. BOWELL said that, whenever any member endeavoured to make a remark, he was constantly interrupted by the hon. member for North York, who would better consult his own dignity by rising in his place and making a statement in a courteous manner. The position in which the matter stood was this: the hon member for Queen's denied pointedly and distinctly——

MR. FERRIS: I will tell you what I did say.

MR. BOWELL said he did not desire to be interrupted while he made his statement. The hon. gentleman, he maintained, had denied distinctly the truth or correctness of the report read to the House as published in the newspapers. In the newspaper report the hon. gentleman was reported to have said: "I did tell Mr. Mackenzie that I would not support the Government unless he gave me the old rails to build the railway." That statement the hon. gentleman now denied.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He admits it.

MR. BOWELL: He said he denied it.

MR. FERRIS said what he did state was that there was no pressure in any shape put upon the Government, and he stated at the meeting that, if they did not carry out their promise, he should vote against the Government. To say there was any promise or bargain of the kind referred to by the hon. member for North Hastings, was to say what was not true.

MR. BOWELL said the hon. gentleman had stated exactly the same as the newspaper; namely, that, if he did not get the rails, he should vote against the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. BOWELL: That is his reply; I took it down as he said it.

MR. FERRIS: I said that, if they did not carry out their promise, I should vote against them.

MR. BOWELL said the hon. gentleman could take it as he pleased; it simply resolved itself into this: that a bargain was made, and the hon. the Prime Minister gave a promise, directly or indirectly, that he would send these rails for the completion of a road which was not in existence at the time, and which it had been stated was not in existence at the present moment. They were not told whether these rails were still kept in reserve, or whether they had been distributed. Were they to understand these rails were still reserved for this road? If so, it was another evidence of the most barefaced bargain that was ever made by a Government with any supporter in order to retain his support to their party. And the hon. gentleman for Queen's had risen in his place in this House and stated distinctly that he not only told his constituents that he had obtained the promise of these rails, but that, if he did not obtain them, he would go into Opposition. A more direct and positive proof could not be given in support of the charge made by his hon. friend the member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) two years ago, who said that it would be placing a dangerous power in the hands of the Government to give them the authority to deal with these rails, and that they would use it to keep themselves in office. If one member could be secured by that means, and the hon. member for Queen's, with considerable ingenuousness and candour, had admitted this, there might be a number of gentlemen, even members of this House, who had been influenced by the same means. He held at the time, and he held now, that no individual Province had a right to obtain Government subsidies—and this was nothing more—any more than another, and, if it was right and honest to secure members from the Maritime Provinces by giving quantities of rails, he should like to see the same system extended to Ontario, and then the Government would probably maintain themselves in power a great deal longer than they would otherwise do. He thought the House would come to this conclusion, that the system of giving these old rails to the supporters of the Government in the Maritime Provinces was not only wrong but noxious in principle, and had led—as the hon. member for Monck stated it would at the time the matter was discussed—to corruptness which was in every way unjustifiable. They had not heard from the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Ferris) when the letter in regard to these rails was written, or what it contained. The Minister of Public Works could say whether he wrote such a letter to the hon. member for Queen's. If he had a copy of it he might read it to the House, so that they might be put in possession of the whole facts. They heard that these rails had been removed, and it was reported that they had been given to some of those lines which were supposed to be feeders, not on account so much of the fact of their being worn out, but in order to find room to place the steel rails, improperly purchased some years ago, and which it was desirable to put upon some road as rapidly as possible. He trusted that the House would have sufficient independence to reject any motion which placed a dangerous power of this character in the hands of any Administration,

MR. DYMOND said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bowell) had been giving a lecture to him (Mr. Dymond); but he might tell the hon. gentleman that his words were wasted, for it happened that the interruption which offended him was caused by another hon. member. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bowell) might, of course, at times, find him interposing a cry of "hear, hear," or using some other parliamentary means to attract attention to what was being said, in which he was not by any means singular; but two things the hon. gentleman never found him doing. He never found him complaining of good natured interruptions, or distorting facts,—and the hon. gentleman would do well to follow even the humble example he offered in these two respects, nor had he (Mr. Dymond) sat for six years among a body of members opposed to him in politics, and endeavoured, when a gentleman rose near him to address the House, by loud conversation to interrupt him and prevent him from being heard,—a habit the hon. gentleman had been distinguished for in this House during the whole of the first Parliament. There were plenty of hon. gentlemen then present who would bear testimony to this fact.

MR. BOWELL: I deny it in the most emphatic manner.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. DYMOND said the hon. gentleman had better compose himself. When he addressed his lectures to others, he must expect his own little peccadilloes would be referred to; and, if he thought that he, any more than anybody else, could ignore the proprieties without comment, he was much mistaken. There was not a single member on his (Mr. Dymond's) side of the House, who had watched parliamentary proceedings for years, that would not testify to what he had said, namely, that there was not one member in the House whose conduct—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. BOWELL: Let him go on.

MR. SPEAKER said the hon. member for North York could not refer to the conduct of a member in the House. He trusted that both hon. gentlemen would see that these personal references were scarcely admissible.

MR. DYMOND: I understand we have both been slightly in error.

MR. BOWELL: Oh, no.

MR. DYMOND said he had said all he wished to say upon the point, therefore he bowed cheerfully to Mr. Speaker's interruption. With regard to the subject under discussion, he would call the attention of the House once more to the manner in which the words spoken by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Ferris), at the meeting referred to, had been misrepresented, and, he might say, distorted. The hon. member for Queen's had stated—and the word of a member of Parliament must be taken as true, unless anyone was prepared formally to challenge it, for unless they followed that rule there would be no end to the confusion—that he never used any improper pressure to induce the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government to allot these rails to the line in question, and the member for Sunbury (Mr. Burpee), who, both in Parliament and out of Parliament, was beyond reproach or impeachment, had made the same statement. What had they to oppose to that? A statement in a newspaper, a paper which, having regard to the tone of the report just read, appeared to be decidedly unfavourable to the hon. member from Queen's. But let that pass. Was it not an easy matter for such a statement to arise? The hon. member for Queen's obtained a pledge, a promise from the head of the Government, without any pressure, without the slightest corruption or impropriety attending the whole transaction. The promise was announced to Parliament, and there was no question as to everything being open and above-board. And then the hon. member for Queen's said: "I expected that pledge would be fulfilled, and if it was not fulfilled, and if the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government broke his word, my confidence would be withdrawn from him." Was there anything in this that appeared like a bargain? Had the hon. member for North Hastings been accustomed to having promises made to him that were not kept? Under the late Administration, they had been told just now, twenty men were promised one situation.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is not true.

MR. DYMOND said, if it was true, and they knew it to be true, they were, of course, not entitled to find fault with their leaders and Ministers of the Crown, if they found one of them deliberately breaking his pledge. That was the argument of the hon. member for North Hastings. The hon. member for Queen's said: "I have had a solemn promise from the head of the Government, and I obtained the promise fairly and squarely. It was given to me openly and above-board, and if that pledge is not kept my confidence in the Government will be withdrawn." This was what it all amounted to, even in the report of the case in a partizan paper. His friend, the member for Queen's (Mr. Ferris) might not perhaps be an eloquent speaker, he was not one of those who spoke as often and with the calmness and deliberation of some hon. members; but when he did get upon his feet his words were to be believed, and he was not so often found dealing in blundering distortions and disingenuous misrepresentations as the hon. member for North Hastings.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he rose for the purpose of protesting very strongly against the charge made against the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) of distorting the facts in this case. He thought hon. members would admit that this language was unparliamentary, and he thought that it was uncalled for, and that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) was not justified in making such a statement. He believed the speech of the hon. member arose legitimately from the statement in the newspaper, corroborated to a certain extent by the member for Queen's. The hon. the First Minister had taken up the question, and had said the hon. member for Cumberland had stated in conversation that this railway could not be a feeder to the Intercolonial Railway. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had better have left the matter where it was. He would read a letter in the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Tupper's) handwriting showing what he thought of it then:—

"HOUSE OF COMMONS,
"OTTAWA, March 27th, 1876.

"Referring to the conversation we had at the interview with which you favoured me a few days since, I beg to still further urge upon you the propriety of submitting for the approval of Parliament a loan of all rails for the Spring Hill and Parrsboro' Railway, in the same manner, and on the same terms, as other railway companies have received them from the Government.

"The Spring Hill and Parrsboro' Railway will connect the thriving village of Mill Village with the Intercolonial Railway through the short branch to the Spring Hill Mines already constructed.

"It will lead to the rapid creation of a town at Parrsboro', which must largely increase the revenue, and at the same time draw a good increase of traffic from the Basin of Minas to the Intercolonial Railway. The road is already graded; but, owing to the great difficulty experienced just now in obtaining capital for such enterprises, I fear it will not be finished for some time unless this aid is given by the Government. A large portion of the old rails taken up in Nova Scotia have, I believe, been given to lines in New Brunswick, and I sincerely hope that the application for similar assistance to a road in Nova Scotia will not be withheld.

"Requesting the most favourable consideration of the Government for this assistance to a work subsidized by the Government of Nova Scotia, and which will materially contribute to the development of a large section of the country, and thus make a substantial return to the Dominion Government,

"I remain, yours faithfully,

(Signed) "CHARLES TUPPER.

"To the Hon. A. MACKENZIE."

This showed very clearly that the hon. gentleman's opinion then was that this Spring Hill and Parrsboro' Railway would be a valuable feeder to the Intercolonial Railway. Then, with regard to torturing facts. His hon. friend (Mr. Bowell) had merely read the language that was supposed to have been used by the hon. member (Mr. Ferris). It might have been, as the hon. member for North York suggested, that it was purposely incorrect, because it was a partizan newspaper, but his hon. friend (Mr. Bowell) found that language in the newspaper, and not only did he find this, and he had a right to use it, but, as he was reading this language, the hon. member for Queen's rose in his place and said, "I do not deny it." Therefore, his hon. friend (Mr. Bowell) had a right to argue from the language in the newspaper. Everyone could see that there was a difference between the language as stated and the language as reported, and his hon. friend did not deny that a gloss had been put upon it. It was very obvious that the language reported was quite different from the language used by the hon. the Premier in the exercise of his duty when he made the promise. That promise had not been fulfilled, and yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ferris) had not thought proper to vacate his seat. The statement was that "I told Mackenzie that I would not support his Government, unless he gave me the old rails for the Springhill and Parrsboro' Railway." That, taken together with the letter, showed the statement, as reported, to be correct, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ferris) did not deny it. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) protested on behalf of his hon. friend against the language used by the hon. the Premier, that his hon. friend had garbled the truth. There was a very easy way of settling these things. All that was required was to produce the letter. He took it for granted that it was merely an official communication to carry out the power given him under the resolutions which had been read to the House, that the letter was written in answer to an application made by the hon. member for Queen's for a contribution of rails to the railway in question, the company of which barely existed and the road not at all. Had the hon. member for Queen's made application for a contribution of rails to benefit this road, and received a letter in reply, that letter must have been an official one. A private letter would give colour to the supposition that the construction put by some people on this matter was not without foundation. A private letter of that kind ought not to exist. An answer to an official application should be an official answer. The hon. the Premier would not deny that he wrote such a letter; then, let it be produced. If an official letter, it should have appeared in the return, and it did not appear therein; therefore, the return was not quite so perfect as it ought to be, and all the information had not been sent down. He felt it his duty to his hon. friend to put the case in that light. The hon. member for Queen's had told a story about the same office being promised to twenty people during the late Administration. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) would like to know what office that was. This story which had been repeated by the hon. member for Queen's had come in the first instance from himself. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) had told the story with regard to a very pertinacious friend of the Government, who was very affectionate, for the time being, to the Minister in power, and rather pressing as to his various claims on the Ministry and party. He did not doubt that the hon. the Premier had also a few friends of that type. After having been bored and followed for a long time, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) finally endeavoured to rid himself of the incumbrance by stating he could not give the office requested without bringing it before his colleagues, and then before the Governor-General. But the friend replied, it was a promise; and he (Sir John A. Macdonald) replied that he had given the same promise to thirteen others. This settled the case, and his friend packed his trunk and went home. He merely rose to protest against the want of justice shown to his hon. friend from King's, and against the acrimony introduced in this debate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

MR. DOMVILLE said he rose to make an explanation. As regarded the statement made by the right hon. member for Kingston, he (Mr. Domville) made a statement with similar intent, namely, that it was difficult for the Government to satisfy its supporters, and that he could understand the hon. the Premier giving the hon. member for Queen's a letter, when importuned for those rails, in order that the hon. member might inform his constituents that he had the promise of them. His obtaining the letter was not a guarantee that he would obtain the rails. When the hon. the Premier was importuned and felt obliged to get rid of the applicant, he gave him a letter of that kind. Had this letter been produced, this motion might have been avoided. When he (Mr. Domville) first came up, he asked the hon. member if he had the letter with him, and was told he had left it at home. The only course which remained was to move for the letter. That letter might have been brought up had there been any wish to produce it, as explained to the people at the public meeting. Had that letter been read to-night, or even the terms in which it was couched given, without the letter, it would have been something. The hon. member for Queen's had told the people that he had got the rails for the road. The hon. the Minister of Public Works said he only promised the rails for forty-two miles of it. Taking the hon. the Premier's own statement, one-half of the rails on hand were unfit to be used. Ninety-six miles of rails had been promised, in round numbers 8,640 tons. According to Public Accounts, it was doubtful whether 10,000 tons of rails existed, at the outside; consequently, if one-half were useless, there were not enough to furnish these companies with rails, and he was correct in his statement that it was impossible that this railroad should get rails to lay out seventy-two miles. This letter would show, if produced, how many rails were promised. The hon. member for Queen's went further. He was asked what he had done for his county, and why he did not show he was an independent member. To the first, he replied that he had got one young man a situation; and to the second, that he had shown his independence by stating he would not vote for the Government unless they gave him the rails, and they replied they would give him the rails. Was not that, he asked, the action of an independent man? He (Mr. Domville) had nothing further to say, except that he was present on the occasion referred to, and he challenged the hon. member for Queen's to go on that platform again, and say he did not make that statement before three hundred people. The hon. member had to-night only gone so far as to say that he would refuse to vote for the Government if they did not carry out their pledge. But, when this letter was brought down, the House would see what was promised.

MR. MITCHELL said he felt a good deal of interest in this discussion, as representing a county through which this railway would pass, connecting its capital with the second most important shipping port of the Dominion, along the Miramichi valley. He had endeavoured, with all his powers of persuasion, backed by a good deal of assurance and perseverance, to get the Government to appreciate the importance of one of the most important feeders of the Intercolonial. He had not had justice done him. When he had placed a resolution on the table of the House, with a statement of fact, that it was one of the most important feeders of the Intercolonial Railway, the hon. the Premier, with that courtesy which characterized him, answered that while he would agree to consider a portion of the resolution, but the latter portion should be struck out, which was accordingly done. He would not enter into the question between the hon. member for King's and the leader of the Government. He could realize the fact that the hon. member for Queen's, who had supported for twenty-five years the Administration of which he (Mr. Mitchell) was a member, always looked after the interests of his county, and turned on the screw whenever he could; he had always endeavoured to obtain for his county what he considered it was entitled to. He could quite understand the hon. member for Queen's getting a promise of rails, nor did he blame him for obtaining that promise. The hon. member for Queen's was not the only man in this House who would turn on the screw to get what he thought his county deserved. What he (Mr. Mitchell, found fault with was the distribution of those rails. He had vainly tried to induce the Government to believe that assistance was necessary to get feeders for the Intercolonial; that seemed to be all the cry now that feeders were required. When the Intercolonial was first undertaken, it was predicted that it would be a useless road, that it would not pay for the oil to grease the wheels, that it would not develop any new country, that no traffic would go over it. It had been made a subject of misrepresentation by hon. gentlemen opposite, who were then in Opposition; they had declared, to use the words of the hon. the Premier, that it was throwing twenty-five million dollars into the sea. To-day the same course of misrepresentation was continued. No later than a few days ago, the hon. the Premier, in answer to a question about a statement of the deficiencies in the Public Accounts, stated there was a deficiency of six to seven hundred thousand dollars in the earnings of the Government railways. He (Mr. Mitchell) had devoted some little attention to this matter since then, in order to ascertain whether or not this statement was correct, and, to-day, having made the enquiry, he had no hesitation in saying that the hon. the Premier's statement was entirely incorrect. From the best information he could gather, he believed that the Intercolonial had earned within $50,000 of its expenses. He could explain the manner in which the Government had endeavoured so to manipulate the public records as to discredit the work with which he was particularly identified, perhaps more than any hon. member of this House. The Government had placed to income what they should have placed to capital. The Government had performed one of the most iniquitous acts possible, when they had determined to give away the Pictou Railroad, which was as much a parcel of the Government system as any portion of the road owned by the Government, which formed a leading part of it, because it went through the coal fields of Nova Scotia, in a direction to connect with the direct line to the seaboard at Halifax. After the Government had decided to give away this line, what did they do? There might have been no fault to find with the policy of the Government in merely giving it away; in that connection, some of his hon. friends supported the policy, but he disagreed with them and divided the House on the question. After the Government had agreed to give away that road for the purpose of buying up the Nova Scotia support, they found themselves near the canal becoming corroded, and the subject of remark to every passer-by, and finding no use for them, and being determined to get rid of them one way or other, they took up the old iron rails of that Pictou road, some fifty odd miles, which they had given away, and relaid it with the new steel rails, although the company to whom the line had been transferred, had agreed to make all the arrangements for constructing or repairing it. Thus, there were forty miles of rails disposed of, and, by this transaction, the support of the hon. members from Nova Scotia was secured. The hon. member for Queen's could not be bought, but he looked out for his county, and obtained all he could for it. He (Mr. Mitchell) had tried the same thing. He had proposed the construction of a line from the capital of New Brunswick to the second seaport in the Province, Miramichi; but he could not obtain any rails for that road. The reason was that the Government did not receive his vote and support. But they did obtain the vote of the hon. member for Queen's, and he got a promise of rails; but whether it ever would be fulfilled was an entirely different matter. He was not aware whether the reports in the newspapers, of statements made by the hon. member for Queen's, were correct or not, and if the hon. gentleman denied them, he would not question his word; but the whole arrangement, in regard to the rails, was a corrupt job. The Government relaid a railway with steel rails, and then handed it over to Sir Hugh Allan, and the iron rails which were taken up were handed over to the hon. member for Queen's for a railroad not a mile of which was yet built. The promises of grants of rails had been a monstrous abuse of power, and a means of corrupting the Parliament of Canada. What right had hon. gentlemen to distribute these rails only among their own supporters? When he looked around the House, he saw people who would not have been such ardent supporters of the Administration if they had not been given rails, while such a project as that of connecting his county with the capital of the Province, and with the leading seaport of their Province, and along the valley of the Miramichi, was entirely ignored.

Mr. MacKAY (Cape Breton) said the observations of the hon. member for Northumberland should not pass without a reply. The hon. gentleman seemed to be determined, if possible, to say something against the members from the Province of Nova Scotia. He had stated, with regard to the transfer of the branch line between Pictou and Truro, that it was made by the Government, so that the Nova Scotia members should be purchased. No one knew better than the hon. member that it was the policy, if not of the whole members of the late Government, at all events of the leading members, to transfer that portion of the road to Nova Scotia to aid in the Eastern extension.

MR. MACKENZIE: It was the hon. member himself who did it.

MR. MITCHELL: I have said so.

MR. MacKAY asked how the hon. member could state that it in any way affected hon. members from Nova Scotia, when he was well aware of the fact that the members from that Province now supporting the Government were returned for that purpose. There was no necessity whatever to hand over to that Province that branch line to secure their support. He thought that was the second time the hon. member for Northumberland had made use of slanders such as the present one with regard to Nova Scotia members, and it was high time he should understand he could not do so with impunity, and, further, that there was no foundation whatever for the assertion he had made. The hon. member seemed very much aggrieved that rails had not been given for the projected branch line of railway between a seaport in New Brunswick and the Intercolonial.

MR. MACKENZIE: There have been nine miles laid in the hon. member's own county.

MR. MITCHELL: Did I ask it? You gave them in my county for the purpose of killing me if you could; I do not thank you for it.

MR. MacKAY said he understood the projected line for which the hon. gentleman desired to obtain rails would run through a county which was not very thickly populated. In some three or four of the districts there were only three thousand people, and the claim put forward was not one which should meet with the approbation of the Government. He trusted the hon. member for Northumberland would not make any reference in future to the transfer of the Pictou and Truro Branch in relation to the Nova Scotia members.

Mr. KIRK said, as a member from Nova Scotia, he felt called upon to say a few words in regard to the matter before the House. The hon. member for Northumberland had said that the Pictou Railway was given for the purpose of purchasing the support of the members from Nova Scotia. He (Mr. Kirk) denied that assertion. As a member from Nova Scotia, he went to the polls as a supporter of the Government. He had supported it consistently ever since, and was prepared to go to the polls as a supporter of the Government, and was proud to be able to say that the Government which he had supported was willing to do justice to Nova Scotia, which the Opposition was not willing to do. When the hon. member for Northumberland submitted a motion in the House, to prevent the Government from conveying that branch line as a subsidy in aid of the extension of the railway to the Strait of Canso, every member of the Opposition, except the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), and the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDonald) voted in its favour. He, therefore, held, that the people of Nova Scotia, especially those in the eastern portion, had reason to thank the Government and not the Opposition. He remembered when the hon. member for Northumberland occupied quite a different position from what he did to-day. He was formerly leader of the Left Centre; he did not occupy that position, he did not support the Government, but he had fallen entirely into the arms of the Opposition where, no doubt, he would remain. He (Mr. Kirk) repudiated and denied entirely that there was any truth in the statement that a single member from Nova Scotia was influenced in any action he had taken in this House in consequence of the railway having been transferred.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had never slandered any member of the House.

Mr. MacKAY said it was a slander to say that members from Nova Scotia had been purchased by the transfer of that railway.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had never used the word "purchase." However, if the cap fitted any hon. member, he could wear it. It, no doubt, had happened that some of the hon. members had not obtained the rails they desired, and that railways did not run through their constituencies; but it appeared as if hon. gentlemen were somewhat influenced—although he did not say they were, for they were bound to believe, in a parliamentary sense, they were not influenced—to support the hon. the Premier by donations of iron rails and railways. The Government still pursued the same course they had done in influencing the actions of hon. members—because no one could help believing they were more or less influenced—and indeed he would be influenced himself. He had no hesitation in telling hon. gentlemen opposite that if they would give him 100 miles of railway from Fredericton to Miramichi laid with old iron rails, his opposition would be very much modified.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman, then, could be bought.

Mr. MITCHELL said that, if the Government did justice to him and his constituents, his opposition would be very much modified. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Kirk) had chosen to question his position in the House to-day, and referred to it as being different from what it was in former years. He (Mr. Mitchell) occupied the same position as he had ever since the Parliament was elected, namely, that of an Independent member. As to the allegation that he had fallen into the arms of the Opposition, he appealed to the House as to whether his attitude to-day was different from what it had been during previous Sessions of this Parliament. He occupied the position of an Independent member, prepared to do justice, and was prepared, when the Government acted in a spirit of fair play, to give them favourable and reasonable consideration and support; but, unfortunately for the interests of the country, they had acted wrongly. To-day he stood in the House as an Independent member, acting on his own impulses of what was right and wrong, and guided only by his own judgment and sentiments, but, though a Liberal during his political life of twenty-five years, always elected as such, and elected at the last reconstruction of the House, on the 5th February last, as a Liberal—a true Liberal, not a misrepresentation, of whom there were so many in the present day—he had a strong tendency to support the Conservative leader. Let the hon. member for Guysborough not misrepresent his position, which was that of being one of the few men who dared to speak on all occasions, and was prepared to do it.

MR. RYMAL said that, as the hon. member for Northumberland had referred to the election through which he had recently passed, he would read from a speech made to the electors by that hon. gentleman at Barnaby. In that address he showed his constituents what he had done by his determination of character, and that he had never undertaken anything which he had not accomplished, except the obtaining of some old rails. The hon. gentleman, speaking of the success of his efforts in carrying Confederation, said :

“I, and my colleagues [I, first, of course. Ed.] had to go to work to educate the public mind, to talk up Confederation, and to show the many benefits that we, as a people, would derive from such an alliance. In this I was ably seconded by Messrs. Johnson, Chandler, Fisher and Tilley. [A great many people remember when Mr. Mitchell was glad to be thought an assistant of John M. Johnson.—Ed.] We held a conference at Charlottetown, and another in Quebec. We then appealed to the people and were defeated, 33 to 9. This was another dish-cloth thrown on the Intercolonial.—[Elegant metaphor.—Ed.]

“Did this deter Peter Mitchell? Did he then cave in? Did he give up his darling project of a railroad for Northumberland? I answer you, no! decidedly not! He fought on still, and the verdict was reversed at the polls in the next general election. Yes, Sir, we appealed to the country and were the only Province that did so! The other Provinces adopted the more arbitrary method of passing the Confederation Act by a vote of their respective Legislatures—a high-handed proceeding, to say the least of it. I, Sir, was one of the delegates appointed to go to Britain to confer with the Imperial Government, and we drew up what was called the British North America Act; but I would take no verbal promises from them concerning a railroad. I insisted that a clause should be inserted in that Act, giving us the road, for I wanted it in the bond, and I got it in the bond. I said, let us catch the hare before we talk of making the soup. [This bit of bragging on Mr. Mitchell's part is simply ridiculous nonsense, for the other delegates who went to Great Britain from all the Provinces at the time named, were quite as anxious to have the loan of £3,000,000 stg. guaranteed under the Act as Mr. Mitchell was. He merely assented to what abler men proposed.—Ed.]

“Confederation being consummated, the next great struggle was about the choice of routes. Mr. Mackenzie, in his picnic-circus soirees in 1867, took the opportunity of throwing cold water on our present Intercolonial. He said, ‘If you are to have a road, let us have it down the valley, connecting at Woodstock.’ Tilley fought against the I. C. R. by the North Shore, and advocated the central route, as it was in the interests of his constituents to do so, and his own political existence almost depended on the location of that route. But, Sir, in spite of this determined opposition, we succeeded in bringing it down by the North, and now, Sir, we have a railroad over which you hear the cars running at this present moment. [Mr. M. forgot to mention that he was also opposed to the Intercolonial running by the North—that he wrote a pamphlet advocating the Northern Central; that his friends advocated the same route; that some of these pamphlets are still in existence as a proof that he was opposed to the I. C. R. running where it does at present, and where Sandford Fleming and the British Government insisted that it should be; that he wanted the road to go via Apohaqui—50 miles the other side of Moncton—thereby having it cross our county at about Boiestown. Even after the meeting was over, Mr. Mitchell had to acknowledge, in conversation, that he advocated the route via Apohaqui. In fact, he knows that he only followed the tide in his advocacy of the present route, and pretended to make desperate efforts to have the location where it is after he found that the Imperial policy would sanction it in no other place.—Ed.]”

He wanted to call particular attention to what followed, because it illustrated the power of the man.

“$40 FRIGHTENED OUT OF C. J. BRYDGES.

“Seeing a good looking woman here to-night, Mrs. M—y—”

M—y meant Murray, he presumed.

AN HON. MEMBER: It is Murphy.

MR. RYMAL: Then Mrs. Murphy had lost a cow,—

"And hearing that she lost a cow, puts me in mind of the way in which I frightened the price of a cow out of Brydges."

The hon. gentleman was a terrible man to frighten a Railway Commissioner. The hon. gentleman continued :

"A certain man in Newcastle had a cow killed by the train. He wrote to Luttrell about it as well as several other railway magnates, but could not get anything out of them. He then wrote to me when I was in Ottawa, and I went to see Brydges about it. I said, 'Here, Brydges, is a fair case; here is a man that has had a cow killed by the train, and I want you to see that he is paid for her.' Mr. Brydges took the letter out of my hand, read it, and said, 'Oh! I know all about that case, I won't pay for her,' but I said, 'Mr. Brydges, you must pay for her,' 'No,' said he, 'I will do no such a thing.' And I said, 'Now, Brydges, you will have to do either one thing or the other—I can very easily spend one night in Parliament talking about you, and you know I can talk all night if I like, and I'll give you such a raking as you never got before.' 'Well,' said he, 'I suppose I had better pay for her.' So that cow was paid for. Do you think, if it was Mr. Snowball that was there, that the man would have been paid for his cow. No; certainly not, for he cannot talk like me.

"There was a poor woman lost a cow in Newcastle. She wrote up to me about it I went to Brydges, and told him he would have to pay for that cow also, it was a fair case. He said, 'We are tired of doing that kind of thing, and won't pay any more.' I said, 'Well Brydges, if that cow is not paid for in twenty-four hours you may look out for yourself.' The twenty-four hours passed and the cow was not paid for. It happened that the House was going into Committee of Supply that night, and it was one of those times when we can give the Government the most bother. It was about eight in the evening when Mackenzie rose and asked for $2,000,000 for the Lachine Canal. He asked for this money, and wished to force a vote on it without any debate. Such a high-handed proceeding was never witnessed in any Canadian Parliament before."

MR. MITCHELL: That is all true.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. RYMAL: The hon. gentleman went on to say:

"I got up in my place in Parliament and asked him if such a large amount was necessary, on what portion of the canal was it to be expended, and similar questions. These few words gave him an hour's talking to do. Before this, I had written a little note to him, asking him to pay that woman for her cow. He looked at it, and threw it into his desk. I said to myself, 'I'll teach you to be a little more courteous than you are, or my name's not Peter Mitchell.'"

MR. MITCHELL: And I think I did.

MR. RYMAL.

MR. RYMAL: The hon. gentleman also said :

"When Mackenzie was done speaking, some of our fellows got up and gave him some more trouble. I did not say a great deal in the first part of the debate, but when they were done I got up and made the House ring."

Now, here came another piece of intimidation:—

"When I was done, Vail came across the House to me (that is the man that was defeated in Digby) and said, 'What the devil is wrong with you to-night, Mitchell? I never saw you act so badly before.' I said, 'I'll teach Mackenzie to be polite. Why the devil does he not pay the woman for the cow?' 'What cow?' said he. I told him. He went over to Mackenzie's desk and spoke to him, and came back to me and said, 'That will be all right in the morning.' So that poor woman got paid for her cow. Now, I hear some of you have had cows killed, and when I go up to Ottawa each one of you will please write to me, and I'll see that you are paid for them."

Such boasting as this was ridiculous, though, perhaps, he ought not to call it boasting, for perhaps the hon. gentleman did intimidate the Government and make them feel the mighty power he (Mr. Mitchell) wielded in the way of making them pay for these cattle, and, if cattle were destroyed, probably they ought to have been paid for. He was not saying anything about that; but what he had risen to remark was that this was the first time he had ever heard the hon. gentleman acknowledge that he did not succeed in everything he undertook, and the hon. gentleman had even gone so far as to acknowledge that he would have succeeded in getting the rails if he had only promised to support the Government; and he (Mr. Rymal) would tell the House what he believed the hon. gentleman would have done—he believed the hon. gentleman would have supported the Government if they had promised him the rails.

MR. MITCHELL: One word.

MR. SPEAKER: We have heard three speeches from the hon. member for Northumberland, two speeches by himself and one through the medium of another hon. gentleman.

MR. MITCHELL: I rise to explain, I think I am perfectly in order.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Chair.

MR. MITCHELL said he did not intend to inflict a lengthy speech on the House. The hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) had read in a very humorous way what purported to be a speech delivered by himself, but which was a burlesque on a speech he had delivered; specially reported for the paper of that very ardent supporter of the Administration, Mr. Jabez Bunting Snowball, a gentleman who had been encouraged by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to oppose Peter Mitchell in Northumberland.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. MITCHELL said he was not going to occupy the time of the House for a long time; but he could only say that time would be saved to the country if he were allowed to say what he intended to say. The hon. gentleman had read a burlesque on his speech, written by the paid slave of Mr. Snowball.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. MITCHELL: There is no disorder in that. He is not a member of Parliament. If I had called a member of Parliament a paid slave, that would be wrong, but I did not say so. I said that this man was the paid slave of Jabez Bunting Snowball, a gentleman who is encouraged to oppose me and to continue that opposition, and I expect it.

MR. BLAKE: I rise to a question of order. However desirous I might be that the hon. gentleman should make an explanation, I think the hon. gentleman is abusing the courtesy of the House in making a third speech, and attacking an absent man. This is not a personal explanation.

MR. MITCHELL: The hon. gentleman whose health is so bad.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. MITCHELL: There is no order about it.

MR. BLAKE: I rise to a question of order.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Northumberland is out of order.

MR. MITCHELL: All right; I will take another opportunity of saying what I wish.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member is again out of order.

MR. MITCHELL: All right; go on.

MR. McCALLUM said it appeared that the prophecy which the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had made with respect to the Government taking power to loan old iron rails had come true; but it did not require a very prophetic mind to see what the result would be. He had previously said that this was wrong in principle, and that it would be wrong in practice, and he considered that the explanations which had that evening been given to the House on this subject showed that it was wrong both in principle and in practice. He had even gone so far as to say he did not think that the Government would ask, as a condition for getting these rails, the support of any one; but in this, it appeared, he was mistaken. According to the explanations given that night, it was proved that the loaning of these rails had been made conditional on support in the House. What would the people of the country say about this? When they examined into this matter they would see that these were suckers instead of feeders of the Intercolonial Railway. Reference had been made to the Truro and Pictou Railway. It was true that the late Government had offered to give away this road; but they had not offered to spend $300,000 on it, and then hand it over, but to transfer it as it then stood. He had not expected that the prophecy of himself and his hon. friend, made two years ago, would have come true. It did not require a prophetic mind to make that prediction, because he remembered when the hon. the Premier, then leader of the Opposition, voted for the motion made by the hon. member for Lanark that the Intercolonial Railway should be laid with iron in place of steel rails; and, when he found the hon. gentleman so anxious within the space of two years to take up the iron rails and relay the road with steel, he thought this was cause for alarm in the country, and that the Government would use these rails to keep themselves in power, and things had just turned out as he had believed they would.

MR. PLUMB moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. MITCHELL said he thought he was now in order. He rose to oppose the motion of the hon. member for Niagara. He thought the debate had lasted long enough and ought to be closed. He took this opportunity to set himself right with regard to the burlesque of a speech he had delivered, that had been read by the hon. member for South Wentworth. Many of the points contained in this burlesque he had made, and he was not ashamed of them. He was not ashamed to say that Barnaby's River was as fine a settlement as his county contained; the railroad ran through it, and in it lived people of very moderate means, but who were very independent in expressing their opinions and in giving their votes. These people had stood by him in former years; and they had grievances to redress and claims against the Government for which they received no consideration or settlement. He felt that these people had not had justice done them, and why? Because he opposed the Administration on the other side of the House. He could get no consideration from the hon. gentlemen opposite, and he could tell the Government that he could not induce them to consider the claims he presented except he secured it by, as it were, drawing their teeth. It was true that he had done as represented last Session, because the Government would not pay for a poor woman's cow; and nothing but a sense of the injustice perpetrated made him so act; otherwise he could get no justice out of the Government.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: You cowed the Government.

MR. MITCHELL said he was not ashamed of what he had done in this regard; and the hon. member for South Wentworth, who was always so ready to be used by the Government to cast ridicule on hon. members of the Opposition, might make as much fun as he liked of his remarks. It was true he had told the people at Barnaby's River that he could not get justice done them by the Administration, and that Peter Mitchell would stand in the House night after night, and criticize the Government's acts, and endeavour to force them to do justice to his constituents, no matter how poor they might be; and he was going to do it too. The speech read was a burlesque. It was not the one he had delivered verbatim et literatim. He had told his people how he had got pay for a cow, and how he had forced payment out of the Government; and it was also true that the hon. the Minister of Finance had indicated that he would pay for another cow he had spoken about last year, though the hon. gentleman had not done it.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No.

MR. MITCHELL said such was the case. The hon. gentleman, who was not as deeply interested in the matter as himself, had forgotten it. They were told by the hon. the Minister of Justice that, when these poor people had cattle killed, which happened almost every month, they could appeal to the Supreme Court, but where would they find the money to do so? Their cases concerned, perhaps, a cow worth $40, or a horse worth $100, and retaining fees of $200 or $400 were demanded by these harpies of the law, these lawyers.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. MITCHELL said he was not ashamed to say that he had got payment last Session for a poor man's cow, and he was going to get pay this winter for a poor woman's cow, or else the hon. gentlemen opposite would be none the better for it. He was not ashamed to state, also, that he did tell the people he could not get iron rails to build the road by Miramichi valley, and why? Because he voted against the Government; and because he believed that it was a dishonest Government which did not serve the best interests of the people, and which had not grasped the first principles that the prosperity of the country called for, and that were necessary to promote such prosperity; because he believed that this was an effete Administration, which had not done justice, and which did not try to do justice. This was what he had told his people, and what he had repeated on the hustings. He knew what consideration he got from hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had sent such telegrams down to Mr. Snowball as the following:—"Get the county; save it if you can; drive Mitchell out of it; we will give you all the patronage, whether you succeed or fail." And they had given it to Mr. Snowball. He (Mr. Mitchell) was not able to appoint a man to take care of a hog-gery; but, thank God, he had not asked these hon. gentlemen for anything of the kind. The day was not far distant when hon. gentlemen opposite would have the same treatment meted out to them that they had meted out to their opponents. He could look round to the other side of the House and name men occupying the seats there who could not deny that, when the Conservative party were on the Treasury benches a different policy was adopted. When hon. gentlemen on that side came to him, the case received fair consideration, and was dealt with on its merits, without looking to the political aspect of the men who supported it. Indeed, he had often been found fault with by his colleagues for having shown so much favour to the Liberals, as they professed themselves to be. There was no Liberalism about them, he regretted to say, and they assumed a name which they were not entitled to. Neither justice nor liberality belonged to that party, and, no matter how he might be twitted for having done so, he did rightly in saying he did not belong to the Administration. He was not a follower of Sir John A. Macdonald's party, as they were aware, because he had been a Liberal all his life; but he would assert this: that that party had shown more liberality, more sound statesmanship, more breadth of view, more desire to promote the prosperity of this country, than the gentlemen professing to be Liberal who occupied the Government benches. He did not wish to occupy the time of the House longer in connection with this matter, but, as the hon. member for South Bruce had been so ready to interrupt him, he thought he had not trespassed too much upon their patience when he endeavoured to place the matter before them in its proper light. He thought a gentleman like the hon. member for South Bruce, who possessed such great talents, such ability and astuteness, should have used them in some better way than trying to prevent a gentleman who had been misrepresented to set himself right with the House and the country.

Mr. BLAKE said that, whenever he found an hon. member trespassing so much upon the courtesies extended by the House as to speak three times on a debate, and taking advantage of the license afforded him to attack an absent man, he should treat him as he had treated the hon. gentleman that night.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then you will find me ready to meet you whenever you like.

Motion to adjourn the debate negatived on a division.

Motion agreed to.

IRON RAILS APPROPRIATED BY ORDER IN COUNCIL.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. MacKAY (Cape Breton) moved for return of quantity of Iron Rails appropriated by Order in Council, showing the railway lines so assisted and the quantity allotted to each; the conditions of transfer; those complying therewith; and the names of the railways, if any, which have not fulfilled the conditions imposed, or have not applied for or received the quantities allotted them. His object, he said, was to find out from the Government the disposition of iron rails to which allusion had already been made. He would not take up the time of the House by saying much on the subject, feeling, as he did, that they must be tired of it; at the same time, he felt it was a duty he owed to his constituency and the Island from which he came, to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that, if iron rails were to be distributed at all, they should be distributed in such a way as to be of the greatest benefit to the people, by making lines which would prove to be feeders to the Intercolonial. The people of Nova Scotia were so alive to the advantages which would accrue from the construction of lines of railway east from the Strait of Canso, that they had decided to subsidize certain lines to a considerable extent. In the constituency of Cape Breton there were from 90,000 to 100,000 people, and it seemed to him that the administration should take their case into consideration by transferring to the Nova Scotia Government any iron rails which remained undisposed of or any respecting which the conditions had not been complied with, so as to supplement the subsidy granted by Statute.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS PAID TO SQUARE TIMBER
CULLERS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. FRECHETTE moved for all correspondence relative to the pensions paid to Square Timber Cullers dismissed last year. He said his object in moving this resolution was not only to put before the House a list of the pensions paid to these timber cullers, but also to ascertain if they were not such as required modification. Last year it was considered as a matter of pressing necessity that only eighteen square timber cullers should remain on the staff, and the remainder were, consequently, deprived of the means of supporting themselves and families. The necessity for this step was, he believed, recognized by the cullers themselves; but the amount of the pension, $200 per annum, was certainly not sufficient for a man of good standing, as most of these cullers were. Indeed, double that amount would not be too much. It was true that some of them could be employed in some other line of industry, but others would have a difficulty in entering any other kind of business, because they had devoted the best years of their youth to acquiring skillfulness in their profession. It was hardly fair, either, that men who had been engaged as cullers for 30 or 40 years should not receive a larger pension than a young man who had only been on the staff one or two years.

MR. CARON said he quite agreed with what had fallen from the hon. member, as far as the cullers were concerned, but it seemed to him that the resolution was simply a repetition of what was asked for by hon. gentlemen on his side of the House last year. He, for one, stood up on the floor of that House, with several others, and tried to secure better pensions for these cullers; but, being in the minority, they failed to obtain their object. The hon. gentleman who had brought forward the matter that evening, did not then use all that influence with the Government which he now promised. It seemed to him the matter had been brought forward on the eve of a general election for political purposes.

MR. CURRIER said that, previous to the legislation of last Session, the 36 or 37 cullers then employed, who were paid by fees, accumulated about $470, so the pension of $200 was a very fair one. Besides, it must be remembered that these pensions did not come out of the public funds, but were paid by the lumberers. He admitted, however, that the wages paid to the 18 cullers now employed were rather low, but the whole system was bad, and he hoped it would be changed.

MR. McDUGALL (South Renfrew) said he did not rise to detain the House on this subject, but because the House might not, perhaps, be fairly informed in reference to the conduct of his hon. friend from Lévis (Mr. Frechette) on the question last Session. Of course, he was aware that the hon. member for Quebec County (Mr. Caron) did not want to misrepresent the hon. member for Lévis. His recollection was very distinct on this point, and he could say that there was no more ardent supporter of the rights of the cullers—both those who were to remain and those who were to be pensioned—during the conference which took place with the then Minister of Inland Revenue than the hon. member for Lévis. The sum that was considered sufficient to be given to the remaining cullers was $700 a year; this was a very small sum, but what he particularly wished to draw attention to was to the amounts proposed to be given to the cullers that were to be superannuated. From the murmurs around him, he could see this lumberman question was not of great interest to the House; indeed it was not one that the majority of Canadian constituencies had any interest in, still they had had a full share of attention given to the subject by the House. A Bill was passed last year, after careful consideration, and it would not be well an alteration should take place after one year's trial.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said that, after the discussion of last year, and the Bill having passed through the House and become law, he did not think this question would have been raised for a year or two at least. The cullers were paid by the lumberers, and not by the country; but the country had a right to say the amount which should be earned by these men. He was very glad to learn that the Bill brought in last Session, which dealt with this question, had given great satisfaction, except in one respect. He drew the attention of the hon. the Finance Minister to the fact that the pay of these cullers was kept back from them last year, in a manner which seemed to him (Mr. White) to be a very great injustice. He trusted this would be remedied in future. The amount paid to cullers, about $700 a year, was decided upon by the members for Quebec, and, so far, appeared to have given satisfaction to both lumbermen and cullers.

Mr. LAURIER said he thought the cullers were sufficiently paid by the Bill of last Session. They represented that they had to pay $200 a year for hire and incidental expenses, and this would reduce their earnings to $500 per annum. This, they thought, was insufficient. However, there was another side to the question. The cullers, at least, were paid for the amount of labour they performed, for they were not employed all the year round, but only for the navigation season. The former cullers also represented that $200 a year was not sufficient. The Government was met here by some objection from the lumbermen, and he did not think, from the revenue of this year, that it would be possible to increase the pension to cullers at the present time without increasing the burden they had already laid on the shoulders of the lumber dealer. He did not see that any alterations should be made at present. The Act was only put in force last year and the Session was then somewhat advanced. With regard to the last objection which had been made by the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White), that the cullers complained of the delay in the payment of their salaries, he did not think they had any ground for doing so, because their earnings had to be ascertained before they could be paid.

Mr. WHITE: When a man has earned a certain amount, surely he would be entitled to receive that.

Mr. LAURIER said he supposed it was inconvenient for them to wait until their earnings were ascertained, at the end of the season, before they received any money. He would suggest that monthly advances should be made to them by the Department in Quebec, and this would meet the difficulty.

Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 12th March, 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on Mr. Cartwright's proposed motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go again into Committee of Supply," and the motion of Sir John A. Macdonald in amendment thereto (page 854), read.

Mr. PALMER said that, in rising to address the House on this important question,—one which he was free to admit had been debated already to very considerable length—he had to apologize for feeling it necessary to speak at all upon it; but he felt that it would be totally impossible for him, holding the views he did, to vote on this question, without giving his reason, and claiming the indulgence of the House for so doing. He thought that the first question to be disposed of was whether or not it was necessary or expedient in the present condition of Canada for the volume of taxation to be increased. He had no hesitation in saying that, in his view, it was not expedient that this should be done at all; and, if his hon. friends opposite could make out that what they so firmly asserted was true—that the policy foreshadowed by themselves did not mean an increase of taxation, and that the policy of his right hon. friend from Kingston did mean such increase—he would say he would then support the policy of the Government and not that of the Opposition. He had listened with a great deal of attention to the reasons these hon. gentlemen had put forward to show that the resolution of the right hon. member would necessarily have that effect. It was easy to say that to raise the duties or the taxation of the country was to take so much out of the pockets of the people. Unquestionably this was the case; and, if the Government of the country and its public works could be carried on without any money at all, then it would be entirely unnecessary to raise any money for any purpose whatever; but, unfortunately for this country, neither the one nor the other pretension was true. It was absolutely necessary that a very large sum of money should be raised in this country for the purposes he had indicated; and, indeed, he was sorry to hear from the hon. the Finance Minister that, such was the condition of the country, notwithstanding the enormous sums that had been raised during these years of depression, that there was not yet enough to keep us from going further into debt; in other words, that Canada was in the lamentable condition of not being able to pay her current expenses; or, in other words, that a deficit existed. It might be in order for him to say something as to his opinion on this question; and, at all events, every Canadian must deplore the fact that Canada was in that position, and that she was not able to meet her current expenses; and, whether it was the fault of the present Government or not, this was a matter which perhaps ought to be discussed in relation to the general question at issue, for it had very little to do with the tariff question; but he held that the true policy to be pursued in this respect was that the volume of taxation should be reduced to the very lowest point consistent with the needs of the public service. He maintained that it was totally inexpedient, and that it was doing injustice to Canada, for any Government not to raise from the people of the country sufficient to pay her liabilities. He affirmed that the first principle to which they had to turn their attention, if it were possible by exercising a spirit of economy, was to so reduce the expenditure as to render no larger amount of taxation necessary for the country at all; and that, after having exhausted their ability to do this, then he took it that it was their duty to see that the debts and the liabilities of the country were fairly met by other means. It then, simply, became a question, and he held that it was entirely a truism,—while he maintained, as he said before, that the taxation, except what was entirely necessary, must be put on the people of the country,—to decide, when it was once ascertained that a certain sum was to be raised, and he admitted that this must be the lowest figure which it was possible to reach, how this money was to be obtained. He was unwilling to say, and he was unwilling for hon. gentlemen opposite to lay it to his charge that, because he did not approve of the policy which had been pursued by this Government, he, therefore, favoured an increase of taxation. He would remark at the outset that he entirely repudiated any wish, in any measure, to increase the volume of taxation of this country. The simple question before them, subject to that condition, was this: how is this money to be raised? and involved in it was the issue whether or not it was possible, in raising it, to do so in such a manner as to injure the country as little as possible, or whether it was possible, as he understood it to be laid down by the hon. the Finance Minister, that the Government of the country was utterly powerless to do either good or evil; or, in other words, that they could neither enhance the prosperity of Canada, nor at all injure it by Act of Parliament; and that it was a matter of total indifference how the duties were levied, as the regulation of the tariff was a matter which could neither injure or benefit the country. It was to that doctrine that he humbly conceived the country would take exception. The people of this country, rightly or wrongly, had firmly made up their minds that the prosperity of the country could be largely promoted and might be largely injured by its fiscal regulations; and then, if this was so, his contention was—and he believed that this was the true doctrine—that, in levying the duties, it was the duty of the Government to see how it could foster the productions of every kind in the country to as large a degree as possible. He believed they should always keep in mind the fact that it was the imperative duty of the Government, when levying duties with the view of fostering our native productions of every character and kind, to take care that in no instance the duties should be made so large as to defeat this object; or, what was worse, enable a class of people to band together in rings and monopolies by means of which they might get rich under the pretence of fostering the manufactures or productive industries. It was always the duty of the Government to guard against this, and to guard against duties being so put on as either to take out of the pockets of the people a larger sum of money than was absolutely necessary, or to place upon one class of the people a burden by which another class might be benefitted beyond what was right. Always keeping this in mind, he held that it was the absolute duty of the Government to carefully see to and to so arrange the tariff and taxation of the country as that it would foster and promote all productive industries of the country. He was aware it had been charged upon the Opposition here that, while they had taken this ground, as he understood it, in this House, over and over again; while objecting to the tariff made by the Government, they were unwilling to prepare one of their own. He knew that this question had been raised, and that this view had taken considerable hold on the country; and he had been himself inclined to it, and he had discussed with himself whether or not it was the duty or in the power of an independent member of Parliament to undertake to frame a tariff; and he had found, for the best of reasons in the world, that such a proceeding would not be allowed. To begin with, he would turn the attention of the House for a moment to the 54th section of the British North America Act. He would not be thus particular were it not for the fact that he knew that this question was one which had had some influence in the country. This section enacted:

“It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution or address, or Bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax imposed for any purpose that has not first been recommended to the House by a message from the Governor-General in the Session in which such vote, resolution or address, or Bill is proposed.”

This provision was made, no doubt, for a wise purpose. It was intended to prevent the confusion that would otherwise be introduced into the legislation of the country, and to prevent the very thing which they were taunted with not doing. How was it possible for any independent member of the House, or any member who was not able to get an address from the Governor-General on the subject, to bring forward in the House any resolution regarding any such matter, specifying distinctly what he asked the House to do? And, of course, there was another and a very serious objection to such a policy: that the Ministers of the Crown were paid large salaries, and they were supposed to give their time to the country, while they were furnished with every possible means by the country for the purpose of enabling them to procure statistics and ascertain exactly how the debt of the country was to be paid, what condition it was in, what would be the effect of any particular measure, and how such means were to be provided; and every day and every month returns came to their Departments in this relation. The House and the country furnished them with the ways and means by which to secure all this information, while this was not the case with respect to private members of the House. First of all, the time of the latter, save while in Parliament, was not paid for; and secondly, even if they were not deprived of the means, they had no access to the Departments, and no power to ascertain the exact working of the law in any particular. How then was it possible for such a person to undertake to prepare a particular tariff without all this knowledge? and, therefore, he held that a pretence of this kind was a mere attempt to shift the responsibility, on the part of the hon. gentleman opposite, from themselves to the Opposition. This was, in fact, asking the House and the country to allow the former to receive large salaries and have control of the Departments, and still let the Opposition do the work of the Government; and, therefore, he thought that the country and the House would agree with him that such a pretence was entirely unwarranted. He had no objection whatever, however, and he felt that it was the duty of every hon. member, to indicate the principles on which such a tariff ought to be framed. He could say, without the slightest trouble, that it should be framed in the direction indicated by the resolution of his right hon. friend. It could not be denied, he thought, and if it was, it could not certainly be successfully denied—although almost everything had been denied during the debate—that the productions of this country could be stimulated by legislation and by the mode in which the revenue was collected, because, as he said before, it made no difference to the people how this was done—for, in any case, they had to pay it—so long as it was fairly distributed. He had not the slightest objection as to how the duties were levied if they were fairly distributed, for, if nothing else could be got out of it—no other good than the mere raising of the money, or no other ill than the paying of it—of course this was of little consequence; and if, by a particular mode of doing this, the productive industries of the country could be benefitted in a measure, then the House ought to adopt it. Could not this be done? First of all, this question was involved in it at the very outset: that our productive industries of every class were at the present time in a paralyzed condition. What did hon. gentlemen say on that point? He admitted the candour of the hon. gentlemen opposite. There might be a few exceptions, but his hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) was not an example of these. He, however, took this bold proposition: that there was no distress in this country.

MR. OLIVER: No; I do not.

MR. PALMER said he wrote down the question put by the hon. gentleman at the time, and it was this: "Are the manufactures of this country sufficiently protected or sufficiently prosperous?" The hon. gentleman then went into a long argument to show they were prosperous, and instanced the fact that some of them paid 10 per cent. per year. His hon. friend, he was glad to hear, had made the best possible defence in support of his Government, because, if what he had stated was true as to the prosperous condition of the manufacturers of this country, if also our farmers were reaping the reward they ought to reap, then the policy of the Government was one which must commend itself to all. But, he was sorry to say he could not arrive at a similar conclusion. He had not time to go into details with the view of showing that his hon. friend was wrong, and, therefore, he would adduce no other proof than this: that three-fourths of that gentleman's friends differed from him. Before he pursued the subject further he might, perhaps, pause to notice some of the matters brought forward in the course of the debate. First of all, he would refer to the curious position in which it stood. He, as an independent member of this House, cared very little whether the present Government remained in power or some other, provided that the country prospered; and he certainly was much amused at the inconsistent reasons that were given in support of the Government.

His hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), who was a Protectionist, distinctly avowed that he supported the Government because it had carried out Protection principles; whereas, if he (Mr. Palmer) understood his hon. friend the Finance Minister rightly, it had made up its mind to carry out the principles of Free-trade. His hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said they had nailed their colours to the mast in the same way, and yet his hon. friend from Brant said he was going to adhere to that flag, not because the right motto was added, but because the wrong one was there—because they were carrying out a protective policy. An observation had also been made by the member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) to this effect: "The only effect of Protection"—(as he called it)—"is to raise the prices; if it does not raise the prices, what is the use of it?" He admitted that Protection might have that effect; or rather not Protection, for he did not like the word.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PALMER said that, as his hon. friend the member for North Norfolk had said, Protection had been used in another country to uphold a vicious system for the benefit of certain monopolists. If the word "Protection" merely meant protection to the industries of the country in the way they ought to be protected, he had no objection to it. He did not think, as his hon. friend had stated, that such Protection would necessarily raise prices at all. He admitted that, at the commencement, the prices might be raised, and, if the matter went no further, he would agree with his hon. friend. He denied, however, the position assumed by the hon. gentleman if he meant that the cost of a necessary article would necessarily be greater to the people of this country for a lengthened period because the production of an industry was fostered merely for the purpose of enriching the manufacturers. He wished his hon. friend from Montreal West (Mr. Workman), who he was sorry to see was not in his place, had been present, because his testimony upon that point would have been irresistible. The hon. member for North Oxford had gone over and given an enormous amount of statistics to show the price of articles before the manufactures of Canada were encouraged or begun. He showed conclusively that when industries were protected to the extent of 17½ per cent., the result had been that manufactures were sold at almost half the amount they had been originally. His hon. friend from North Oxford might be right in his assertion, but he must expect people to differ from him, and to believe that the sole effect of Protection or encouragement of industry was not the raising of prices. The next gentleman whose remarks upon this subject he wished to notice, were those from his hon. friend from North Norfolk, and he would readily concur with him if they were correct. The hon. member said: "The United States was taxed, and that country was robbed by its protective system," and then he went on to show, by a large volume of figures, which he (Mr. Palmer) did not pretend to grasp readily, the enormous sum of money which had been taken out of that country. He believed that that money was raised in the United States by the means stated; but surely no statesman would say the people had been robbed. They owed that money, and they had to raise it to pay off their debts. If that money, on the other hand, had not been required, and if it had been squandered or thrown away in unnecessary speculations, then the country was undoubtedly robbed; but he repudiated the idea entertained by those holding that it was robbing money because it was raised. Did his hon. friend think the people of Canada were such arrant fools as not to know that the money referred to had to be raised? Who was it that robbed the country if such was the case?—The Finance Minister? If money was raised which was not required, it was quite clear that the Finance Minister had borrowed money to be recklessly spent. If the Government made purchases or transactions, whether in steel rails or any other method that did not pay, then they might truly be said to rob the country; but if they merely spent what was necessary to carry on the Government judiciously and properly, there was no robbery about it. His hon. friend from North York had said that Protection had exploded, entirely exploded in the United States. If that was the case, he would have no hesitation in concurring in the views of the hon. gentleman; because, in that case, we would not require any reciprocity treaty with the United States. Protection had exploded, had it? Then what was the amount of the duties charged on articles now? The hon. member for North Norfolk had referred to the state of things which existed in the United States nearly half a century ago. He did not exactly know to what period the hon. gentleman referred, but he believed there were three great epochs in the history of the United States. First of all there was a Free-trade policy, then a protective tariff, then a Free-trade policy, then a protective tariff, then a Free-trade policy, and then the protective, and now it would appear that Protection had exploded.

MR. CHARLTON: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will permit me to set myself right. I did not make use of the term "Free-trade," I made use of the words "Protective" and "Non-Protective" policies.

MR. PALMER thanked the hon. gentleman for the correction. He thought "Free-trade" and "Non-Protection" meant the same thing, and, if not, he hoped somebody in the House would explain wherein they differed. He would, however, make use of the term Non-Protection. Did that mean anything different from the policy of this Government? If it did not, then his hon. friend must vote against the Government, because, if its policy was not a Free-trade one, the hon. gentleman had no argument at all. He held his hon. friend from North Norfolk to be one of the highest authorities in the House on the subject, and he would quote what fell from his own lips to show that he had characterized the position which he now assumed as a wrong conclusion; that his statement that this country would not flourish under a protective policy was not borne out by his previous remarks, and that it was a mistake in fact. He had no objection to any member of that House altering his opinions, and if his hon. friend from Norfolk thought it necessary at one time to argue in favour of a protective policy which he now disclaimed, he was, of course, perfectly entitled to do so. Whether the conversion of their friend had been the result of long continued and close application to the subject, or whether, like St. Paul, his conversion was sudden, or whether he looked forward to the fulfilment hereafter of the promise made to those who continue faithful to the end, he could not say, but, in any case, the hon. gentleman should take the House into his confidence and let them know the reason why he had altered his mind, and not put forward at one time a certain statement as a fact, and at another time state exactly the opposite as a fact. He would, however, quote what was said by the hon. gentleman as reported in the Hansard for 1876:—

"Like many hon. members in this House, I had believed that Protection, to a certain limit, would benefit the country. We had been told that a protective policy is one which could only be adopted by patriarchal government—a Government which could not only protect industries, but also limit production. I hold that a protective policy, on the contrary, runs through the whole legislative system of any country. To afford protection to life and property is the duty of Government, and armies are raised and navies built to protect the nation; prisons are erected for the protection of the public; and free grants given for the purpose of increasing the public wealth and adding to the population. It may be safely assumed that no nation has attained to greatness in commerce or manufactures without having, in the course of its history, imposed exactions and restrictions. This has been notably the case with Great Britain herself; and I think the assertion that the development of various industries is necessary to the cultivation of the self-defensive power of a nation is uncontrovertible. We have had an illustration of it in the neighbouring nation. The Southern States were without manufacturing industries, while the Northern States were filled with them, and the advantages this gave them resulted in the suppression of the rebellion. No person will assert it is proper to protect industries that are not naturally adapted to the country; but when they are suited to the land, it is the duty of the Government to foster them. Arts and manufactures do not spring up readily on virgin soil. In the first place, trade has a tendency to remain in beaten tracks. Then, the advantage is on the side of a nation in which manufactures are exhibited, because money is always more easily obtained there than in a new country. Then, again, the possession of organized and skilled labour is an advantage that the manufacturers, in a country where manufactures are established for a long time, possess over a new country. But, although it may be conceded that Protection is to the advantage of the manufacturers, unless it can be shown that it is also an advantage to the other classes of the community and the nation at large, all arguments in favour of Protection fall to the ground. It must be shown that the agriculturists are benefitted by Protection before it is incumbent upon the Government to adopt a protective policy."

Now, as he said before, he did not like that word. He would rather say: by a judicious arrangement of the tariff.

"I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by Protection, and the manufacturer, being brought to the door of the farmer, would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were three thousand miles away. With a home market of this kind established by Protection to manufacturers, the agriculturist can benefit his soil by producing a rotation of crops. The purchasing power of money is not a correct measure of the purchasing power of labour. A farmer raises a bushel of corn which he sells for fifty cents in a foreign market, and with the proceeds he can buy three yards of cotton; but supposing the manufactures are brought to his door, and the better market which it creates increases the price to 60c. or 70c. per bushel, and although import duties are levied on cotton from Manchester so as to add largely to its price, still he may be enabled to buy four yards of cotton with his bushel of corn instead of the three yards it was able to purchase before, as the purchasing power of his labour is increased. We have at our doors all the illustrations and experience of Protection and its benefits required for our government and guidance."

He would ask the hon. gentleman how he reconciled that statement of fact, for it was a statement of fact, with his Free-trade arguments.

"The United States have adopted a protective policy under which their manufactures have been fostered and promoted until, in 1870, their products reached the sum of $4,253,000,000, giving employment to 2,000,000 operatives, and disbursing over $775,500,000 in wages."

What did the hon. gentleman say now? He entirely ignored these facts and said that the United States had prospered under a non-protective policy. Only two years ago, he said:

"It has been charged that Protection has prevented the extension of foreign commerce in that country. That may be true; but it is estimated that the domestic commerce of the United States last year reached the enormous proportions of 200,000,000 tons, valued at $10,000,000,000. What is the foreign commerce of that country compared with the vast domestic trade that goes on increasing without the fluctuations or risks of foreign trade. Look at the progress of the cotton trade of that country. Previous to the import duties on foreign cottons in 1824, British manufacturers crushed out all efforts to establish factories in the Republic; but the imposition of 25 per cent. duty on foreign cottons had the effect, in a few years, not only of building up manufactories, but led to the production of an article better in quality and lower in price than the Americans received from British manufactories before their own industries were established."

When did this new light upon a protective policy dawn upon the hon. gentleman? How had these facts been altered? He would like to ask what reliance could be placed upon the statement of a gentleman who, in two years, could make history tell two such different stories.

"In 1860, the United States were exporters of cotton; exporting nearly 10 per cent. of the whole amount manufactured. The same way with the iron trade. All attempts to establish foreign industries were crushed out by foreign competition, and high prices were maintained at intervals—higher, on the average, than the percentage necessary to produce them in the United States at a profit. But, when a protective duty was imposed, iron manufactories were established, and in a short time the price of iron was brought down several dollars per ton, and it is now sold cheaper than the British iron ever was offered for on that market. The shipping interest of the United States was one of the most signal illustrations of the benefit of a Protection policy that could be produced. Under a protective tariff, the ship-building of the United States had grown, till, in 1860, it was nearly as great as that of England; and there came two causes to ruin it. First, the war, which placed the United States shipping at a disadvantage with all other common carriers; and the second cause was the revulsion of the ship-building trade, caused by the substitution of iron for wooden vessels. Under these combined influences, the shipping trade fell into the depressed condition in which it now remains. Why is it that we are so desirous of selling to the United States articles of food? It is simply because they have, by Protection, built up manufacturing cities with a numerous population that consumes not only the vast products of their own country, but also affords a better market for our products than we in the Dominion possess. The issue in Canada to-day is not an issue between Free-trade and Protection; the issue is: is the protection now afforded adequate for the promotion of our industries?"

This did his hon. friend credit; he had expressed his (Mr. Palmer's) views exactly when he said: "The issue is not between Free-trade and Protection." He (Mr. Palmer) also held that the issue was whether the protection now afforded was adequate to protect and foster the industries of the country or not.

MR. CHARLTON: I ask permission to say that the hon. gentleman is quoting a certain portion of my speech at the very point where—

MR. PALMER: I will read every word of it. My hon. friend must not think because I stop at that particular point that I am not going to read the context. I stop because the point is a particularly good one. He goes on:—

"Although Protection has conferred great benefits upon the United States, I think it can be clearly shown that the amount of protection in that country has been altogether greater than necessary for the purpose of promoting its interests, and, in consequence of that over-protection, monopolies and rings were created, and a gambling element was introduced into all business transactions. Part of this is due to that element brought into the problem, the influence of which is so difficult to measure or define, the element of an irredeemable vicious paper currency. In consequence of that it was necessary to introduce a higher tariff than would have been necessary under a sound monetary system. I am satisfied that the manufacturers of the United States, through lobbying, obtained vastly more protection than they were entitled to, or the country should have granted."

His hon. friend said: "Although Protection has conferred great benefits upon the United States," now he spoke to the contrary. He entirely agreed with the hon. gentleman that it had created a class of people who lingered about the halls of legislation at Washington, and spent their money for the purpose of getting higher duties; but that was not the only country in which men banded themselves together for selfish purposes; there they were called rings, but on the Northern Pacific Railway they were called a syndicate, which was a milder term. Did his hon. friends desire a definition of the term? He recollected Mr. Morrison, the present Mayor of Toronto, Mr. Wood, Mr. Brown, and Mr. Edgar all forming a syndicate upon this railway; and, without paying a dollar of money, they realized and divided some hundreds of dollars. This was what we called syndicate, and not a ring at all; but he confessed these aggregations of manufacturers at Washington was very like a syndicate. The hon. gentleman went on:

"I had supposed that the duty of 17½ per cent. levied upon that list was a duty insufficient for Protection, and the impression I had formed upon that point, I must confess, was very seriously shaken by the statement made by the Finance Minister in his Budget speech. On examination into the subject I find that the imports under the 17½ per cent. list for the last six months of the year 1874 were $28,271,000, and for the corresponding period of 1875 they were $18,142,000, a falling off of $10,129,000, or about 36 per cent. It must be borne in mind that, although there was a heavy falling off in that list, there was a diminution in the total volume of trade; and it is necessary to consider the falling off in the general imports. I find that the total imports for the last half of the year 1874 amounted to $69,193,000, less goods on the 17½ per cent. list $28,271,000, leaving the imports exclusive of the 17½ per cent. list at $41,422,000 for that period; the total imports for the last half of 1875 were $51,923,000, from which deduct the imports on the 17½ per cent. list and it leaves $18,142,000. Thus we have the amount of imports, exclusive of the 17½ per cent. list, of $33,781,000, a falling off of imports, exclusive of the 17½ per cent. list, of $7,141,000 or 18 per cent. of imports for the advantage of our manufacturers in twelve months of Protection. I doubt whether it would be policy to advance that rate 2½ per cent. It is evident that it has acted efficiently as a protective duty, but whether efficiently enough remains to be seen. At any rate, the 17½ per cent. had better be continued for the present."

His hon. friend, two years ago, took exactly the same view as the supporters of the amendment did to-day, because he said, in effect, the 17½ per cent. offered some protection which might turn out sufficient protection.

"There is another feature to be borne in mind. The present duty caused a heavy falling off in receipts and a deficit in the revenue. Were there $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. increase in the tariff, industries would, perhaps, be unduly stimulated. There would be a still larger deficit, and the Government would be still further embarrassed."

In this he clearly informed them that by raising the duty on a certain article they would raise the revenue of the country. He had modified his views on that ground; now he said that by raising the duty they would reduce the revenue.

"With regard to the resolution, I confess I would like to see a retaliatory policy adopted which would bring the United States to terms, and would at least protect us against slaughter invoices."

He would not read this if he did not want to use the best terms he could to suit his own view of the case; the view taken by the hon. member for North Norfolk two years ago. To-day, however, his hon. friend had given up that opinion, and scouted at anything like the idea of a tariff policy. In all this he had changed.

"I doubt, however, whether that is an evil which requires the interposition of Government. I think it is much magnified, and is entirely owing to a state of affairs across the lines which cannot be considered permanent, and which will disappear with the return of good times to that country. Greatly as our manufacturers have been injured, I think their complaints will not last long; and I doubt whether it is good policy, in view of the fact that this is a temporary evil, for the Administration to pursue a course which would lead to retaliation."

Certainly the hon. gentleman was wrong when he said those complaints would not last long, for they had lasted to this time—two years afterwards.

"I am reminded of the anecdote of the Englishman who allowed his wife to beat him. When asked why he endured the treatment, he replied: "Oh, it pleases her, and don't hurt I." That is exactly our position in this respect. A retaliatory policy may please us, but will not hurt them. I hold that what Canada desires is reciprocity with the United States—a short cut to the markets which Protectionists proposed to secure for us. It is a matter of very great importance that we should obtain access to those markets."

In this latter sentiment he entirely agreed with the hon. gentleman.

"A retaliatory policy might have a bad effect in preventing this. In the United States, just now, the Democratic party have a majority in the House of Representatives, and they are favourable to granting us more liberal trade relations than we have hitherto enjoyed. It is not impossible that that party may carry the elections this year, and thus exert a greater influence upon the policy of the country; and it would be folly on our part to do anything to prejudice our case in the meantime."

Well, that might be very good reasoning, but the day had not dawned yet.

"To attribute the existing stagnation to inadequate Protection is a fallacy. England, with her Free-trade, is to-day depressed; and in that highly protected country, the United States, there is a great stagnation. This great wave of depression has swept over the commercial world, and our interests being blended with those of the United States, it is not surprising that distress has visited us. No Government could do anything to mitigate or arrest the trouble under which Canada is suffering."

He must confess that he did not agree with his hon. friend here, but it was a very small point.

"The Government has no more to do with it than the tides of the ocean or the changes of the moon."

The term "fly on the wheel" had not come into vogue at that time.

"The crisis came in obedience to a natural law, and in obedience to a natural law it will pass away. In conclusion, I may state that I am desirous of doing everything calculated to promote the manufacturing interests of this country. But, looking from my standpoint, I believe that the present tariff is adequate; that, at all events, to demonstrate its inadequacy will require more time. I heartily endorse the policy of the Finance Minister in declining to advance the rate beyond $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent."

Now, if this demonstrated that the present distribution of the tariff was the best one, that it was the one which most fostered the industries of the country, then he entirely agreed with him; but, as he said before, the duties should be placed at the very lowest to have that effect. Yet, on the contrary, since that time they found that duties had been fixed upon a variety of things. Yet his hon. friend now talked about taking so much money out of the pockets of the people. So much with reference to his hon. friend. He owed it to this House and to the country to explain, not why he had changed his mind, but how he could reconcile his confident assertion in 1876, that the protective policy had built up the United States, that it had fostered every industry and caused the country to prosper to an enormous extent, with his opinions to-day, as he had stated in this House, that Protection had done nothing of the kind, but had caused a directly opposite effect, that there was a period of Non-Protection, during which the United States prospered, and a period of Protection during which it retrograded, notwithstanding the fact detailed in his speech in the Hansard of 1876. The member for North Oxford had quoted a lot of figures which, no doubt, were correct, with reference to the manufactures of this country. He deserved well of this House for the very bold and commodious statement of figures presented to it. He (Mr. Palmer) appealed to every hon. member whether the facts as detailed by the hon. member for North Oxford were not the strongest proof possible that the policy the Government were pursuing to-day was an injudicious one. Those facts proved that, in 1877, the productive industries, manufacturing and others, of the Dominion were most prosperous, and that his hon. friend from North Norfolk was right in stating that the policy pursued by the Government, of levying a duty of 15 per cent. and then 17½ per cent., was sufficiently protective, considering the value of labour in the United States and the other advantages which Canada possessed over the United States at that time. The result was that Canadians not only had then a market in Canada, but could sell their articles in the States. But that, evidently, could not apply to the present state of affairs, unless it were true, as the hon. member had stated at the outset, that these manufacturers were still prosperous. An hon. member on the Government side, he did not remember who it was, had likened the Opposition to Rip Van Winkle. The comparison would have applied better to his hon. friend from North Oxford, who surely must have been in a similar condition as Rip Van Winkle from 1870 to 1878, since he saw no change and believed the manufacturers of this country were as prosperous now as in 1870. If they were, the hon. member was entirely right, but he (Mr. Palmer) did not think the country would agree with him. Next in order came his hon. friend the member for North York (Mr. Dymond), with whom he felt sorry to disagree, because the hon. member generally laid down his principles very accurately; but it was not the principle, but the conclusion he quarrelled with. The logic of the hon. member and his logic differed in some points. If he (Mr. Palmer) understood the hon. member for North York aright, he had asked what did the Opposition want with reciprocity; in other words, what right had the Opposition to endeavour to promote reciprocity? He (Mr. Palmer) would not say that any member of this House was ruled by anyone out of it, but it was possible that the connection of that hon. gentleman with a certain leading newspaper, said to be owned by a man who had gone to Washington to make a reciprocity treaty, and failed, might have a good deal to do with the hon. member's feelings on this point—unconsciously, of course. The fact that the Hon. George Brown had failed in his negotiations, and that his hon. friend considered that the Opposition had something to do with his failure, might have prompted his taunt to the Opposition as to what cure had they for reciprocity.

MR. DYMOND said he had not complained of the Opposition for objecting to reciprocity. He explained that, so far as the doctrines of their organ were concerned, it had declared against reciprocity; but, so far as the doctrines of the party could be understood, they were in favour of a retaliatory policy.

MR. PALMER: It was not to that I referred. Did not the hon. member use those words: "What do they want with reciprocity?"

MR. DYMOND: No.

MR. PALMER: I endeavoured to take them down exactly as the hon. member spoke them.

MR. DYMOND: I certainly had no idea of using such words, nor do I remember having said anything of the kind.

MR. PALMER said he had understood the hon. member to have taunted the Opposition that they ought not now to say they wanted reciprocity or make any endeavour to obtain it, because they had opposed it formerly in some way or other, and that, therefore, they were now in a position to say they were in favour of reciprocity. He thought his hon. friend had referred to the course followed by the Mail newspaper, and, perhaps, by the right hon. member for Kingston, for all he knew, during the time the hon. member's principal was at Washington.

MR. DYMOND: I made no reference whatever to the circumstance, nor to what the Mail said in that connection. I protest against the hon. gentleman addressing me as he is now doing with reference to my connection with a newspaper.

MR. PALMER said he only referred to what the hon. member had said. If he had no right to do that, then every person connected with that extraordinary newspaper might cry out, "Touch me not." If the hon. gentleman had never mentioned the Mail newspaper during his speech, what right had he—

MR. DYMOND: I did mention the Mail newspaper in the connection I have stated, and in that connection alone.

MR. PALMER said he understood the hon. member had said that, on account of something or other stated in the Mail newspaper, they had no right to do something else. He did not know whether the money, some five thousand dollars, expended on the embassy to Washington, had ever been accounted for to this day; but he did know that, with reference to some Secret Service money expended by the right hon. member for Kingston, at some time during the Fenian raid, there had been a terrible touse over it, and it was determined to find it out and go to law to recover the money back. He did not make it a point against the Government that they investigated this matter thoroughly; but he knew that their time had been quite taken up in the endeavour to get some Secret Service money and some petty sum for costs charged to his right hon. friend. He would ask the House whether the Opposition had not a right to change their mind as well as his hon. friend from North Norfolk. The resolution his hon. friend now put forward was in favour of a reciprocity treaty. The only question was, what was the best mode of securing it. He did not mean to say he would agree to any reciprocity treaty or to any tariff. He thought it was the duty of the Government, and one to which the people would hold them, to judiciously govern the country. The Government would have to decide whether a trade agreement or a treaty would, on the whole, most benefit the Dominion; but the treaty should be fairly made; one which would not injure any particular interest, but which would benefit the whole country. It did appear to him that there was, at present, no means of obtaining reciprocity; it was idle to ask it of the United States as a favour. He had no hesitation in saying it was the duty of every man to have the most friendly feeling towards their neighbours across the border, and he believed he could scarcely find a dissenting voice to an expression of kindness and good feeling towards them. He knew that their kind and generous liberality towards the sufferers by the great misfortune which had overtaken his city last summer would never be forgotten. No one would think of drawing a line between the two countries; they felt that they were brothers and friends, and, if the citizens of Canada could do any good in any shape or form to their friends across the line, they would do it. But friends did not give away their property or their rights to each other. It was idle to talk in that sense. It was not to be expected that out of good feeling Canadians would injure themselves. How, then, was the treaty to be brought about? If Canada had opened her markets, as she had done, to the United States, when Canada wanted to make a treaty to obtain an equally free market in the United States, what had she to offer in return? If the Americans were allowed, without any agreement, to have all the privileges they could have under a treaty, it would be idle to ask then, as a question of policy, to allow to Canada similar advantages. If they asked what they would get in return, there was only one answer. The Canadian Government had nothing more to give than what the Americans already possessed. But, it was said, the matter was so small. The returns showed that the imports from the United States last year into Canada, entered for consumption, were $50,000,000; the exports from Canada to the United States, about half that amount. Was it not idle to argue that the United States cared nothing for this $50,000,000 of export trade? Would any reciprocity treaty which we could fairly ask counterbalance those $50,000,000. If our Government excluded them from the Canadian market, unless they gave a quid pro quo, dollar for dollar, in return, they would see the advantages of a reciprocity treaty. He knew that the resolution of his hon. friend contained a word that had been misunderstood in this debate. The resolution read: it would lead to a reciprocity tariff. He did not understand that to mean that, whenever the United States put a duty on Canadian products, an identical duty should be imposed in Canada. He understood it to mean that, in view of the amount and description of goods imported into Canada from the United States, and the value and description of goods that would be exported from Canada to the United States, were it not for the American tariff, the Canadian Government should take care that, according as the American tariff was made hostile to Canadian interests, the Canadian tariff should be moulded so that it would be equal to some other American interests of equal importance. This was what he understood by reciprocity of tariff. The country expected the Government to act on these resolutions, and so adjust the tariff as to keep, as far as possible, the Canadian market for that class of goods which Canada was best fitted to produce. That policy should be pursued until our neighbours in the United States should enter into another arrangement with us, although, of course, the last treaty that was made with us resulted in an indemnity of $5,500,000. He was pained to see some of the papers of the United States declaring that that money ought not to be paid, but he did not think any people in Canada would believe that would be the result of the treaty. Perhaps it was just as well that matter should be disposed of and that bargain settled up before a new bargain was made; but, as soon as that was done, at all events, he felt it would be a great benefit to this country if some arrangement could be made, not of a character that would necessarily crush out the manufacturing industries of the country, but, beginning as the old treaty began, with the raw products, should be afterwards extended to a certain class of manufactures which it might equally benefit both countries to include in it, and he was sure the country would support any Government that could bring about such a treaty. He had intended to say a few words more with reference to the general policy of the tariff, and he intended to confine himself to that question; but, as he was not present during the debate on the amendment, and he had heard that the hon. the First Minister had declared that motion to be a measure affecting the Government, perhaps it would be well for him to take this opportunity of making a few observations upon that point. Did he understand his hon. friend the Finance Minister aright that they proposed to go on this year without providing for the debt of the country? If so, he held that was a great mistake. He held that it was the duty of the Government to have kept their expenditure within the revenue; or, if they could not have done that, to have provided the means of paying the debt. He held that it would be an incalculable injury to Canada for a Government to be able to come forward and cite this as a precedent; he held that the fact that the Government had been unable to pay the public debt would do more injury to the Dominion hereafter than the whole amount of money involved. He, therefore, condemned the Government for that. The conduct of the Government was reprehensible in another respect. Instead of endeavouring to show that they were right in the way they did, on all occasions they turned round and said that their predecessors in office did something or other that was wrong. When they were charged with the Fort Frances Lock job, they justified it by the Pacific scandal. Whenever Goderich Harbour was spoken of, instead of defending that outlay, and saying it was quite right, the Government replied that Mr. Tupper did something wrong in connection with the Pictou Railway or some Springhill mines; whenever the question of steel rails was brought up, there was some corruption brought up on the other side. He thought the time had come when the people would ask whether a Government were to govern for another five years without any other merits than the demerits of their predecessors. Did these counter-charges against the Opposition prove anything? Was Sir John A. Macdonald on his trial for the Pacific scandal? Was Mr. Tupper on his trial for something or other? Did the country care now, and was it of any importance to the issue to be decided here, whether the charges against those gentlemen were true or false; and had it any earthly bearing on the conduct of the present Government? He thought not. Surely the Government must have a very small idea of the intelligence of the people if they thought so. They undertook to govern this country, with all the professions, while in Opposition, of economy and reform, and they had carried out no reform, and were the most extravagant Government that ever existed in Canada. They said, in point of fact, that nothing could be done by Act of Parliament of any kind. If they thought that, when attacked upon this and upon positive blunders, all they had to do was to say to the country that their predecessors did as bad or worse, they were mistaken; and when they went to the country he thought they would find this out. There was not a single subject upon which they were called to account but they said that the former Government was responsible for the Pacific Railway policy. Whether the Government was right or wrong in that matter, whether it would have been better for the Government to pay Sir Hugh Allan $30,000,000 and have the railway built, or that the Government should build it themselves—and the former was the policy of this Government when they took office, and whether their policy was the better was seen at the present day, when over $20,000,000, the money of the people of Canada, had been spent over that work, or works in connection with it, and scarcely a thing was done yet—was not the question. It might yet be seen that the policy pursued by Sir John A. Macdonald and the former Government was correct. But, he admitted the country condemned the transaction with Sir Hugh Allan, and rightly condemned it. He thought it was not the policy of the Government, it was not the bargain to build that railway, it was not the amount, because unquestionably the bargain was a good one, but it was the fact that there was a quarrel between him and other railway rings, which induced Sir Hugh Allan to subscribe that enormous amount of money for election purposes; and this large sum thrown into the elections in favour of the Government was what the country condemned. Of course, at that time, it was hidden out of sight what the opposite party were doing. The thing was allowed to go on so far, and then the fact that this money had been given and spent in elections was declared, with the means by which it was got, and that settled the matter. The great circle of rings formed at that period to oppose Sir Hugh Allan in railway interests spent enormous sums of money, and there were "Big Pushes," and other matters of that description; but these were kept from the knowledge of the people until the elections had taken place, and the result was that Sir John A. Macdonald and his party were condemned, and rightly condemned. But what had this to do with what was now before the country? Of what importance was it in the debates; and how did it prove this Government to be right or wrong in their policy? Did it prove that the Government were justified, after their professions of economy, in their enormous expenditure in unnecessary public works? The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Oliver) said the late Government had pledged them to the expenditure on these works. He (Mr. Palmer) thought there was scarcely a man in the country who objected to the works per se; it was to the expenditure upon them. Much had been said about the late Government in connection with the Pacific Railway, but the late Government did not pledge the country to St. Frances Locks or water stretches. The present Government might have been pledged by their predecessors to build Goderich Harbour, but they were not pledged to accept a contract from one man which was $30,000 above that of another; and if they were, surely they ought not to have carried it out. It was not that these particular works, per se, were wrong, but it was the mode of carrying them out; the general high-handed policy they had pursued, the making contracts for the Dominion telegraph, on a line of railway not defined, in defiance of the law. They, while in Opposition, undertook to prove to the country they were in favour of reform; that, when they got into power, they would act economically and uphold responsible government; but, unfortunately, every person that was connected with it appeared to be irresponsible to a large extent. He did not know whether it was right, at this point, to refer to the coup d'etat of the Governor of Quebec the other day, but that might be a matter of discussion hereafter.

MR. MACKENZIE: Not in this world.

MR. PALMER said he only referred to it and those other matters as illustrations of the wild declarations of the Government while in Opposition, as contrasted with their arbitrary acts when in power. Anyone who had watched the conduct of the Government from beginning to end, must have seen that they stifled enquiry, and that they over-rode the minority in every possible way. At any rate, he, as an independent member of this House, was not satisfied with the present Government, was not satisfied with their conduct in answering all objections by abusing their opponents. When they went into power, the country admitted that Sir John and his party had done faithful service to the country for a great number of years, but he had made a mistake; a grievous mistake. They forgave him, however, in consequence of his long and valuable services, but at the same time they drove him from power, and returned the gentlemen opposite, with a hope that they would be generous enough to follow in the same course of Government which had proved so beneficial to the country. The Reform party, however, had not kept their pledges; they had been guilty of shortcomings. If any justification of their conduct was asked for; if a charge of disloyalty was brought against a Minister, they replied to the charge by a statement that Dr. Tupper said something or other, and the result was an attempt to prove their opponents as bad as themselves, without an endeavour to justify their own conduct. They heard that the Ministers of the Crown went round the country in the vacation time, making statements which they (the Ministers) themselves could not possibly believe. As he had already said, they had the highly instructive spectacle of seeing this, or of having it published, at all events, that they did do it, though he did not know whether they did or not. He had a pamphlet which purported to contain a speech made by Mr. Cartwright, who, he supposed, was the hon. the Minister of Finance, at Colborne, in which this choice language was introduced:—

"Of the three culprits,—Mr. Cumberland, the Managing Director of the road, who was the immediate instrument in the embezzling—the stealing (to speak in plain English); that highly respectable individual, Mr. Senator Macpherson, the highly respectable receiver of the stolen goods, well knowing them to be stolen; Sir John A. Macdonald, who wisely and judiciously, and with that acumen which he had so long practiced, declined to know whence the money came, declined to have anything to do with it, but had it placed in the hands of his wife's trustees."

He did not know whether this statement was ever made or not, but he desired to say that any person who was capable of making that statement was either a knave or a fool, because it distinctly charged Sir John A. Macdonald with receiving stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen; and any person at all cognizant of the subject knew that this was entirely untrue. The gentleman who made it ought to know that this was a crime of the very highest criminal character and the very meanest description that could possibly be committed by any man; he must know that such a person would be amenable to punishment, and that it would be that gentleman's duty, as a Minister of the Crown, to see that such punishment was inflicted. If the gentleman did not know that, he (Mr. Palmer) did not think it too strong to say that any one in this country who occupied such a position was a fool; and, if he did know it, certainly he must know that this charge was not true; and this, he (Mr. Palmer) considered, proved that a person who made such a statement was a knave. He (Mr. Palmer) happened to be on the Committee in question. Senator Macpherson and Sir John A. Macdonald were examined before it on oath; and all the evidence was laid before the House; and to pretend to say that Sir John A. Macdonald was at all to blame in any way in connection with this transaction, was simply ridiculous; while as to saying that he (Sir John A. Macdonald) was a receiver of stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, surely he did hope that the hon. the Minister of Finance never made such a statement. He should never believe it unless the hon. gentleman himself said he had done so, because he could not conceive it possible for any person holding such a high position to take such a course. He knew, of course, that it had been the fashion, since the shortcomings of this Government had come to light, to abuse Sir John A. Macdonald. He knew that hon. gentlemen opposite had attempted to fill the House and country with such abuse, and to cover the right hon. gentleman with all the vile slanders that envy, hatred, malice, and an unholy ambition could invent, and thereby satisfy a fiendish disposition of revenge by wounding the feelings of himself, his family and his friends; but they could not by such means hide the real character and noble heart of Sir John A. Macdonald from the support of his admiring countrymen, the intelligent people of Canada would readily discern under all such dirt and slum, all the self-sacrificing patriotism and love for Canada that pervaded his right hon. friend's whole being, guided his fine intellect, and had governed every action of his life. Nor could these slanders, in his opinion, distract the attention of the country either from the insincerity or incapacity, or the extravagance of the members of the present Government.

MR. APPLEBY said that, before the debate closed, he desired to make a few observations upon some of the matters under consideration, and he therefore craved the indulgence of the House for a short time. The hon. the Finance Minister, with his usual marked ability, had made his annual statement to Parliament, touching the finances of the country and the future financial policy of the Government. Hon. gentlemen opposite had criticized this statement with great severity; and not only had they levelled their criticism at the Budget speech, but they had attacked the whole policy and administration of the Government, and, to large extent, the personal characters of its individual members. They had heaped charge upon charge, misstatement upon misstatement, fallacy upon fallacy, intending, through the channels of the Hansard and the newspaper press, to send them broadcast over the country, hoping, if possible, by any means, however unworthy, to secure a verdict from the people at the approaching elections. The various charges made against the Government and the several issues to be tried at the polls, seemed to be classed under three heads. Under the first, came the wholesale charges of maladministration, lack of ability, favouritism, jobbery and corruption. Those hon. gentlemen knew well, from past experience, that there was no subject upon which the people of this country were so sensitive as the honesty and integrity of their rulers; they well knew that, if the people could be made to believe that the men in power were corrupt, they would not hesitate to sweep them from office; therefore, these ceaseless and persistent efforts to poison the public mind. But it did strike him that all those charges had been met and answered and effectually set at rest by the hon. the First Minister. The Opposition had been offered Committees of this House, to whom their public grievances could be submitted; they had been solicited time and again to accept Committees, to formulate their charges, to bring forward their witnesses, and to make the fullest, widest and most searching examination into any and all the charges that they had made. The challenge thus made, had been declined on the ground that Committees of this House were always partizan. Such an objection, surely, was not a sound one, as Committees had no power to decide the truth or falsity of the charges; they were merely to hear and report the evidence, which could be read by every voter from Halifax to Vancouver; and if the testimony supported the allegations, the gentlemen now in office would not long remain upon the Treasury benches. But it seemed that hon. gentlemen opposite did not propose to take this course; they would go to the people with their unsupported and slanderous statements, rather than accept Committees and attempt to prove that which, from their own conduct, it was evident they themselves believed to be incapable of proof. And he therefore thought that, when the people came to make up their verdict, every reasonable and fair-minded man would regard these unproved and unsupported statements as worthless electioneering stories, entitled to no serious consideration. Under the second head came the very grave charge that the Government had failed to bring good times into the country by legislation; that they had neglected, by Act of Parliament, to banish the commercial distress which prevailed; that they had neglected and refused to empty the horn of plenty into every man's lap. The whole teachings of gentlemen opposite had been that it was possible for the Government always to have good times within our borders, that the Government had the power, if they chose to exercise it, while administering public affairs, to direct, to regulate, to guide, and to bring to certain prosperity every branch of industry in the country, independent of all private and personal exertions. The burden of their cry, in this House, and on every stump, had been, "Restore us to power, and your expatriated sons will return, trade will revive, commerce will flourish, your bleeding industries will live, abundant harvests will reward the farmer, and every material blessing that Canada seeks will immediately flow from us." Perhaps hon. gentlemen in some remote locality, presuming upon the ignorance of their auditors, might claim to possess these almost miraculous powers, but he would ask them—he would ask the right hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for Cumberland—gentlemen who, no doubt, desired political immortality; whose ambition it was to have their names among the first statesmen of our country, if they were willing that it should go forth to the world that they were the apostles of such absurd doctrines. He (Mr. Appleby) would like these gentlemen to give him an instance in the history of any country, where such pretensions had ever before been indulged in by the most unscrupulous politicians; or, if indulged in, had ever been realized. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had attempted to give one case, and only one, in support of his position, by referring to the removal of the obnoxious duty on kerosene oil, by which the consumers of that article were largely benefitted. But he thought the allusion was unfortunate, as the removal of that duty was merely undoing the former vicious legislation of the late Government. The Opposition had cursed the country with the outrageous burden; the Government had blessed the country by its removal. When his hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby), in 1876, introduced his resolution favouring the reduction of the duty on kerosene oil, he (Mr. Appleby) had voted with him, as the motion was in accord with his well-known Free-trade principles. At that time, the article could be bought in the United States for 12c. per gallon United States currency, but had to pay a duty of 15c. per gallon in gold. The duty was extravagant, an outrageous violation of the principles of Free-trade; and he (Mr. Appleby) had given his influence to remedy the evil. But those hon. gentlemen ought to have been pleased with the tax. They levied it themselves; it afforded a brilliant illustration of their pet theory—Protection; it created a hateful monopoly, and compelled the people to pay more than two prices for a prime necessity of life. Such, however, were the natural results of protecting the languishing industries of the country. The Government had been blamed for not at once accepting the resolution of the member for Stanstead; but, while they did not think fit to revise the tariff at that time, they very frankly stated that a case had been made out, and that they would remedy the evil, which they did the following Session by doing away with the Excise duty and reducing the Customs to 5c. per gallon. The causes that produced a commercial depression ever varied. Hard times prevailing in foreign countries, which were intimately connected with our own by trade relations, affected us. Hard times and panics in the United States would be severely felt here; depression in Great Britain, causing a decline in the price of lumber, would still more seriously affect us; perhaps would be more seriously felt, by the whole Dominion, than any other outside influence. We had also internal causes, such as a succession of bad crops, over-trading, extravagance, waste. These, and other causes that he might mention, contributed, more or less, to our commercial depression. And yet the Government were censured for not regulating and controlling all these influences. They might as well be required to control the tides or the changes of the moon. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite had promised to perform all those wonders, if once more permitted to occupy the Treasury benches. Why had they not been employed to direct the affairs of the United States, where depression had much more largely prevailed than in this country? Why had they not been employed to regulate the financial difficulties of some of the nations of Europe? Why had they not been sought after by the Sublime Porte, in the hour of need? Those heaven-born statesmen, without doubt, would have driven the Russians beyond the Danube, by an Act of Parliament; the Cossacks of the Don would have been destroyed in a single night as were the hosts of Sennacherib.

Their pretensions were like the labels of a patent medicine which promised to heal every disease; one read them and wondered how it was possible for death to visit our globe. But ask the hon. member for Cumberland his opinion of such medicine, and he would at once tell them it was all humbug and quackery, and that doctors who professed to do such cures were frauds. Now, he (Mr. Appleby) would not say that hon. gentlemen opposite were political frauds, or that their policy was all humbug and quackery, as it might be considered unparliamentary, but he was willing to submit it to the intelligent voice of the people. The third point, and the great issue to be tried by the people was Protection against Free-trade; the creation of monopolies instead of a revenue tariff. The right hon. member for Kingston had declared that the country wanted a National Policy, and that our industries and manufactories must be fenced round—he quoted the gentleman's exact words. Such a policy would have the least possible communication with other countries, the least possible exchange, and create monopolies at the expense of the great mass of the people. In his (Mr. Appleby's) opinion, commerce was not national, it was cosmopolitan. It knew no territorial boundaries; it desired to buy and sell in the markets of the world; its object—the acquisition of wealth. It knew no nationality, but traded alike with Gentile and Jew, Indian or European. In one feature it resembled Christianity; it sought out every land, and claimed brotherhood with all races. And the country would soon be asked to say which it would adopt, the free enlightened commercial policy of Great Britain or the more exclusive policy of the Chinese Empire. He (Mr. Appleby) had listened with very great attention to the speech of his hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Palmer), and he was bound to say that the utterances of that gentleman on this occasion were not worthy of his abilities. It had been often said that lawyers, from their habits and training, were able to argue with equal force on either side of a case, but his hon. friend, in this instance, had utterly failed in his attempt to construct an argument on the wrong side; and, if it had not been for the last year's speech of his hon. friend from Norfolk, from which he had read so copiously, his (Mr. Palmer's) speech would have been a very barren one. He (Mr. Palmer) commenced by laying down some sound Free-trade propositions, and ended by declaring his intention to vote for the Protectionist resolution of the right hon. member for Kingston. He regretted that his hon. friend, who was in heart a Free-trader, should betray his own principles, and be induced to support a policy so detrimental to the best interests of Canada, and particularly injurious to the Province from which he came. He (Mr. Palmer) was forced to acknowledge that he did not like the word Protection, and he (Mr. Appleby) would assure him that New Brunswick did not like the word or the principle either; and he felt quite sure that his (Mr. Palmer's) constituents would hold him responsible for the vote which he proposed to give on the resolution before the House. There was a certain kind of protection which he (Mr. Appleby) believed in. Government should protect life and property, should protect every man in the exercise of his just rights. Every citizen should be permitted to enjoy the fruits of his own labours, to engage in any lawful occupation, and to buy and sell wherever he could do so with greatest advantage to himself. The Government should administer public affairs with economy, with an eye to the varied interests of the country. The public debt should not be allowed to exceed its present rather large dimensions, and the burden of taxation should not be increased. The tariff, which should be solely for revenue purposes, should be so framed that it would fall equally upon all classes, and so arranged that the wealth and property of the country should pay the taxes. But when Governments attempt to do more than this; when they, by their tariffs, dictated to the people where they should purchase; when they declared that a few manufacturers should be supported at the expense of the many, they exceeded their functions, and violated one of the fundamental principles of taxation to which he had alluded, namely, that the volume of taxation should be distributed fairly over every part of the Dominion, and be borne equally by all classes and ranks of society. The Protectionist policy of the Opposition would cause a most unequal distribution; falling heavily upon the Maritime Provinces, and relieving the large manufacturing centres of Quebec and Ontario. He was not one of those who asked for any especial favours for his native Province. New Brunswick was able and willing to pay her fair share of national taxation, but was opposed to any system or policy that was not based upon equitable and sound economical principles. Protection disordered trade and commerce, caused an unequal distribution of the national taxation, and supported the few at the expense of the many. But hon. gentlemen said: "Oh, our beneficent scheme will embrace all classes, will protect every branch of industry, and put money in every man's pocket." He would ask how they proposed to protect the lumbering interest, which was one of the most important in the country. We had a surplus of lumber, we supplied ourselves, had large quantities for exportation, and it was not possible for the foreign article to be introduced into our markets. This was at present one of our languishing industries, ample proof of which was to be found in the city of Ottawa. It was quite evident that no protection could be offered to the lumbermen, except in the way of bonuses; and he would ask the people of this country if they were prepared to put their hands in their pockets and pay a bonus on every thousand feet of lumber that was manufactured in it? If they were not willing to do that, by what rule of justice did they propose to tax every article which that important class consumed? The lumber interest could receive no protection; it asked for none, except to be protected from the unrighteous policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. The right hon. member for Kingston also proposed to protect the farmer by excluding all foreign agricultural products. That might suit the Ontario miller and wheat grower, but how would it please the manufacturer, who, above all things, desired cheap bread; or the lumberman, the shipbuilder, the fisherman, and other classes in the Lower Provinces who were obliged to purchase large quantities of flour in Ontario or the United States. He was confident the people in the Maritime Provinces would object to pay a tax on every barrel of flour that they consumed. Hon. gentlemen opposite delighted to point to the United States as an example of the prosperity to which a nation might attain under a policy of Protection. That country had certainly prospered, but it had done so in spite of Protection. It could be abundantly proved that their commercial policy had been a curse rather than a blessing to them. The geographical situation, the climate, the cotton fields, the vast area of wheat and corn, the iron and coal, the gold mines of California, the millions of immigrants and the energy of the people were the elements of her prosperity. Some of the best minds in that country were at the present moment endeavouring to induce their rulers to abandon the suicidal policy of Protection. He (Mr. Appleby) would trouble the House with a single extract from one of their writers on political economy, which would indicate the feeling which prevailed among the best thinkers in the United States. That writer said :

"Does any one believe that our present tariff of duties is the result of calm, enlightened statesmanship, applied with judicial impartiality to all the interests affected by it? Is it the result of any statesmanship at all? He who thinks so is the victim of a good-natured credulity, which is more worthy of the prattling innocency of childhood than of the sober sense of mature manhood. It is just such a set of laws as no man living would make, if it were submitted to his judgment to decide what laws are desirable and wise. It is a clumsy patchwork, which has resulted from a compromise between the conflicting demands and confused clamours of all the great branches of our industry that encounter any foreign competition, besieging and begging Congress for more protection, more protection. The question with our legislators is not whose claims are really strongest and most righteous, but whose clamours are loudest, who can bring most votes to support our party, or if obliged, alienate most votes from it. The bearing of the tariff on the next election has had a great deal more influence than its bearing on the prosperity of our people. That, with resources such as ours, and a national debt of more than $2,000,000,000 to provide for, our revenue system should be so constructed and controlled by such influences as these, is a humiliation of our country in the eyes of the nations. It is disgraceful to our civilization. To this humiliation, however, must we submit, till we throw off this nightmare of Protection. It must also be added to all this, that, in this combination of evil influences, direct bribery of the legislator to procure his vote in favour of the further protection of some particular industry, is, we fear, no uncommon element."

Such was the opinion of a most eminent writer in that country. As he (Mr. Appleby) had before stated, the system of Protection reduced foreign intercourse to a minimum, thus cutting off one great source of national profit. One element of England's wealth was her vast volume of foreign trade. If one of our merchants desired to ship part of a cargo to a distant and unfrequented port, and failed to find a vessel in Montreal, Quebec, St. John or Halifax, thitherward bound, he would first send the goods to London, from which place it would be easy to ship them to any port on the globe. They would find the merchandize of every land sailing up the Thames; yes, and sailing down it, too; for Great Britain, after supplying her own wants, exported yearly from her own shores to other countries foreign merchandize to the enormous amount of over $300,000,000. This vast amount of merchandize had been purchased in foreign countries, carried largely in British ships to England, sold again at a profit, and again carried away in the same ships to other countries. He would give a few statistics, showing the value in pounds sterling of some of the leading articles of foreign merchandize which were annually exported from that country:—

| Wool and Sheep..... | £11,340,000 |
| Coffee..... | 5,760,000 |
| Raw Cotton..... | 4,540,000 |
| Manufactured Cotton..... | 229,000 |
| Indigo..... | 1,500,000 |
| Rice..... | 1,833,000 |
| Silks, raw and manufactured... | 3,091,000 |
| Hides..... | 1,046,000 |
| Tea..... | 2,154,000 |
| Sugars..... | 1,170,000 |
| Copper, wrought & unwrought. | 1,380,000 |
| Iron and Steel..... | 499,160 |
| Peruvian Bark..... | 391,000 |

Great Britain, with a Free-trade policy, exported over \$300,000,000 worth of foreign merchandize annually, being about twenty per cent. of her total imports; while the United States, with a Protective policy, consumed the great bulk of the foreign merchandise, exporting only about \$14,000,000 worth, or about two and one-half per cent. of her total imports. Such statements should cause hon. gentlemen to pause before endeavouring to fasten their Chinese policy upon this country. The first step that a savage people took on the road to civilization was foreign intercourse, and, as they increased in intelligence, so did their commerce increase. But hon. gentlemen opposite seemed determined on a retrograde policy. He (Mr. Appleby) believed in an extension of commerce; that our policy should attract foreign trade, and not repel it; that obstructions in the way of an easy interchange should be reduced to a minimum. By our present revenue tariff, manufactured goods enjoyed a protection of $17\frac{1}{2}$ or 20 per cent.; and, if the manufacturer could not succeed with such an advantage, it was evident he was engaged in a losing business, and one that was unworthy of being fostered; and, furthermore, a wholesome competition was essential to the success of manufactures. Destroy competition, and one of the greatest incentives to excellence was removed. The success of our native industries did not rest upon isolation, but upon the intelligence, skill, industry and energy of our people. With these elements, a prosperous future awaited us; without them, no material progress could hope to be attained. Hon. gentlemen opposite professed to be very anxious to appeal to the people with this cry of Protection; to the people they must soon go. He (Mr. Appleby) had an abiding faith in the intelligence of the people, and he believed that the wise and liberal policy of the Government would be triumphantly sustained at the polls. The protection that the people of this country most desired was to be protected from hon. gentlemen opposite, whose only recommendations to power were their former political misdeeds and delusive promises of a policy based upon the most unjust and unenlightened principles.

MR. FARROW said he did not desire to make a long speech upon this occasion, but, before the debate closed, he would like to have the privilege of getting his opinions on the subject recorded. He did not want to lecture the House this afternoon, as he knew there were many other gentlemen present who understood more about the subject than he did. It was very trying to one's constitution, he thought, to listen to so many speeches on both sides of the House; and, when hon. gentlemen had really nothing to say, they should sit still in their seats. He did not think the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Appleby) could understand the subject at all; he seemed unable to grasp it thoroughly, and made assertions which he could not prove in a Court of law. For instance, he compared the depression in the United States with the depression in Canada, and he affirmed that it was ten times greater in the United States than in Canada. Now, where could be found a single particle of proof for such an assertion? The insolvencies in Canada were greater in number and amount than in the United States, allowing for difference of commerce between the two countries. The hon. member's assertion, therefore, went for nothing. He liked the hon. gentleman's idea of comparing commerce to Christianity. Christianity, he had said, knew no boundaries, knew no people nor tongues, showed no respect to persons. Well, if commerce was like Christianity, Christianity taught one thing: that the man who did not look after his own household was worse than an infidel. He thought his friends opposite might take that home and ponder over it during their leisure hours. Another statement of the hon. member which met his approval was that the best kind of protection was that where one sold highest and bought cheapest. But the great trouble with Canadians was that of not being able to sell. They were prohibited by the tariff of the United States from selling in their markets, while the American goods were allowed free into Canada. The Americans got their wheat, their barley and their oats free into this country; while Canadians could not send their produce into the American markets without paying a certain percentage on its value, and were thereby the losers. His hon. friend had further stated that if $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duty was not protection enough to our manufacturers, they could go the wall—they could burst up. The United States gave their manufacturers a protection varying from 25 per cent. to 85 per cent., encouraging them by every means; while Canada only gave her manufacturers a protection of 17½ per cent., and said if they could not thrive and grow fat on that tariff, they could burst up and go to the States or elsewhere. Was this the idea or the patriotism of men who loved their country? 17½ per cent. in some cases might be sufficient, but in other cases it was not enough. The hon. member for Centre Toronto had said it was enough; he endeavoured to show that this 17½ per cent. with cost of insurance and freight across the Atlantic, gave our manufacturers a benefit equal to 25 per cent. He (Mr. Farrow) thought this was not the case. He would compare the capital of the two countries, Great Britain and Canada. The rate of interest on discounts in this country, even on the best security, was 8 per cent., and sometimes 10 per cent., and if the money was very badly required, 15 per cent. would be charged. In the Old Country the rate of discount was 2 per cent., or, at the outside, 3 per cent. This made a considerable difference in favour of the manufacturer in the old country, and, therefore, he contended 17½ per cent., though sufficient in some cases, was not sufficient in others; and yet the policy of the Government was to reduce the tariff. It was not necessary to raise everything up, nor to pull everything down. Concerning the coal oil question, which had been so much discussed, the duty was too high and should have been pulled down. The hon. member for Stanstead had begged and prayed and urged the hon. the Minister of Finance to reduce the duty; he had told the hon. Minister how much the country would lose if he did not modify the tariff. But the hon. the Finance Minister buttoned up his coat and said that, not being sufficiently convinced of the necessity of the alteration, he would not make it; the country might run any way for another year under the same tariff. And, in consequence, the country lost about \$1,200,000 on its consumption of coal oil. Then the

hon. the Finance Minister determined to modify it, but not before the hon. member for Stanstead rose in his seat and insisted and proposed that it should be done. Then the hon. Minister begged the hon. member for Stanstead to stay a while and see the policy the Government were going to propound. Why did the hon. the Finance Minister not propound that policy before? Why did he not lock the stable door before the horse was stolen? Was it not unjust that the country should, in the meantime, have lost $1,200,000, which came out of the pockets of the people who could ill afford to pay it. But these hon. gentlemen were on the enjoyment of good salaries, they were purse-proud, and could not condescend to notice the wants of those for whom they legislated. But they knew that, if they did not legislate in that direction, they would finally be brought to account, and so the amendment was made. His hon. friend from Carleton had talked about the farmers wanting protection, and said the Government did not intend to give our farmers protection. He could quite understand his argument, but the trouble was that the Government had a little cramped-up kind of policy, while the policy of the Opposition embraced the whole Dominion, from the Pacific Ocean to the Atlantic. The Opposition did not advocate helping one industry and allowing another to decay; but their object was to foster the interests of the whole country. The hon. member had inflicted much damage on the hon. the Premier during his late election tour. He was reported to have said that what they wanted was Protection to prevent trade from going to the lower Provinces from the West. This statement, if not contradicted in this House, would lose the hon. Premier more votes than anything else in the West. It was generally reported that the hon. the Premier would rather trade with the Yankees, give them his money for flour, etc., than have this produce come through the right and natural channel. The hon. the Premier had never contradicted that, and it would be used with effect against him. His hon. friend from Carleton had said the Administration and supporters were anxious to get to the polls. They would get there by-and-bye; some of them had got there already, and had wished they had never got there. He thought the late hon. Minister of Militia was sorry he ever got to the polls; and, if his hon. friend the present Minister of Militia would speak out his mind, he was sorry he ever went to the polls, where his great majority of 2,200 dwindled down to 200. And if, according to report, it had not been for undue influences, he would not have been elected; the powers of earth had been moved to secure his election. He would refer not only to this election, but to the others which had lately taken place throughout the Dominion. He regretted to say that the hon. the Premier in making his picnic speeches was inaccurate. He had said the Opposition won thirteen seats, while the Government gained four. If that were true, it showed the Opposition need not be afraid to go to the polls, since they had gained in the proportion of thirteen to four. But the Opposition had gained more than that. He defied any hon. member to mention the four seats the Government had gained. He believed he spoke the sentiments of the Opposition side of the House when he said they were anxious to go to the polls. It was generally stated throughout the West that, if the hon. the Premier had the same honour as had the English parliamentarians, he would have gone to the polls long ago after those elections going against him; yet the Government clung to office. As he (Mr. Farrow) had said last year, they would die hard, because they were never in such good places before. They never before had the sweets of office such as this. They would cling to office, they would take the shilling as long as possible.

After Recess.

MR. FARROW said he would not further discuss the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton, N.B., although there were many points which could be successfully combatted. During the debate, a speech had been delivered by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) who had displayed his usual courtesy and acuteness. The hon. gentleman had been frequently put forward by the hon. the Premier, when he was in a difficult position, and he had been very successful in extricating the hon. the Minister from many dilemmas, to which he need not refer. The hon. member for West Middlesex had reviewed the financial positions of the two Governments, and had strenuously laboured to convince the House that the present Government was the most economical of the two. Contrasting the expenditure, the hon. gentleman had said that the old Government had increased the expenditure at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, as against one-third per cent. by the present Administration. The fallacy of the argument was shown by a little illustration. If a community was established, consisting of four persons, and at the end of a year numbered sixteen, the increase would have been 300 per cent. When the community attained a population of 2,000, and had an increase of 400 souls in a year, the growth was only 20 per cent. The expenditure of the present Government was ten per cent. plus one-third. It could not be proved that the total expenditure of the Government had been reduced, and on that point he would present a few figures to the House. The increased expenditure by the present Government for 1875 over 1873, was $2,960,336; 1876 over 1875, $717,062; 1876 over 1873, $3,677,398. He was prepared to admit that the present Government were not liable for all that increase, but he maintained, and the hon. the Finance Minister had admitted it, that an increased expenditure of $1,500,000 had been provided for in 1873 by Mr. Tilley. Deducting that amount, and allowing $377,398 for unforeseen expenses, there remained a net increase of $1,800,000. The amount for public works, chargeable to the Consolidated Fund, in 1873, was $1,597,613; in 1875 $1,757,075; in 1876, $1,948,948. The House should look at some of the extra expenditures by the present Government. On Civil Government there was expended, in 1873, $750,874; 1875, $909,265; 1876, $841,995. In Departmental Contingencies, which were an important item, regarding which the hon. the Premier informed the right hon. the member for Kingston there were so many pages he could scarcely squeeze past them, the expenditure was in 1873, $280,717; 1875, $302,327; 1876, $301,602. The cost of Extra Clerks was in 1873 $13,704; 1875, $38,821; 1876, $31,651. It was a well-known fact that there were men employed as extra clerks who did very little work. Indeed, it was said, he did not know with what truth, that there were persons in receipt of large pay who never did anything. That was a matter which had been adverted to on more than one occasion in the House. The extra clerks numbered nearly three times as many in 1875 as in 1873, and two and a-half times as many in 1876 as in 1873. In regard to Administration of Justice, he heard the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) speak of that Department in his address at Teeswater, and he told the people how he had reduced the expenditure. That hon. gentleman, however, only exonerated himself, and had nothing to say on behalf of the other Ministers. In 1873 the cost of the Justice Department was $398,966; 1875, $497,405; 1876, $544,091. The Customs Department showed an expenditure in 1873, $567,675; 1875, $682,673; 1876, $721,008. Although the receipts from Customs and Excise had declined, the expenditures had continued to increase. Those facts would satisfy the House and the country that the cost in connection with the Departments had been creeping up yearly, with the exception of the Militia, which had been cut down. It was singular that the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), when comparing the increases of expenditures by the Government, did not touch upon the expenses caused by the Adulteration of Food Act. The expenses in 1875-6, the year the Act came into operation, were $2,801, and had since risen to $4,903. The hon. member did not refer to expenses connected with Weights and Measures, but that did not suit his purpose, which was to make the expenditure of the present Government appear less than that of the late Government. In regard to the present political situation, he (Mr. Farrow) regretted that the question of Protection and Free-trade had been made a political question, because there were many Reformers who were in favour of Protection, and many Conservatives who were not very much in favour of Protection. It would, therefore, have been desirable to have kept the question out of the political arena. But hon. gentleman opposite had thought otherwise and the Opposition party was now determined to go to the country on this question. The House would remember that in 1854, 1855 and 1856, Canada enjoyed great prosperity. The reason for that unexampled prosperity was to be found in the construction of the Grand Trunk Railway and the progress of the Crimean war. By the building of the railway thousands of dollars were brought into the country and expended. In 1858 there came a crisis, and prosperity passed away. He remembered being in the city of London in 1858, when grass was literally growing on the streets, and nearly every store on Dundas and Richmond streets was closed, and such stores as were opened had trifling stocks. The country then had a Finance Minister, Sir A. T. Galt, who understood the position of the country, and he introduced the first protective tariff this country enjoyed in 1858. Every hon. member was aware that the tariff worked admirably. By the policy of fostering our interests, they sprang up as if by magic, and it brought prosperity to Canada. The next important tariff was that introduced by Sir A. T. Galt in 1866, which seemed almost to reverse his previous tariff, and brought back the duties to 15 per cent. Although the fact that the duties were reduced was often made a peg on which hon. gentlemen hung their arguments, it afforded confirmatory evidence that the country then had at the helm of affairs a gentleman who knew its situation. The question of the Confederation of the Provinces was before the people at that time. The inhabitants of the Lower Provinces had always been, and still were, Free-traders, so far as low duties could be called Free-trade. At that time their duties did not exceed 10 or 12 per cent., and one of the arguments used against Confederation was that the other Provinces had always high tariffs. On account of the country being very wealthy at that time, and an abundance of money being in circulation, the Finance Minister thought the Maritime Provinces might be accommodated in that regard, and that was the reason why the tariff was reduced to 15 per cent. One million consumers of the products of Ontario and Quebec were thus added, and the whole country thereby benefitted. They reduced the tariff to 15 per cent., and, if they had had no tariff at all from 1868 to 1873, it would not have injured their interests. The American war had taken place, and the demand for goods at that time was enormous, and no matter whether the tariff was 20 or 30 or 40 per cent., the Canadian people could have sold their goods in the United States. But in 1873 there came a check. The United States had protected their industries, they had had large revenue duties, and the country had paid high prices for everything; but, after a little time, when the country had begun to regain its abnormal state, their revenue duties were taken off one by one. It was generally known that goods were cheaper in Canada, and they came over here to buy and visited us as smugglers. But now our own people went across the line to smuggle goods from the United States into this country. This was the effect of Protection, and this was why the question was agitating the people of Canada so much. The Finance Minister once stated in a Budget speech: "Let it be understood by gentlemen in this House and out of it that neither this Government nor any other Government, by this legislation or any other legislation, can help to restore prosperity to any country by Act of Parliament." But, if he (Mr. Farrow) had time, he would read testimony that it was in the power of a legislature to benefit the people by a stroke of the pen. He had the testimony in his hand and could read the opinion of Mr. Granger, of Horace Greeley and of Mr. Clay, all of whom testified that the legislature might, with a stroke of the pen, help the struggling industries of a country. Our own experience would prove this, too. The tariff of 1858 showed that legislation had benefitted the people and could help to restore trade. He would point out another instance. In 1872, the Americans took the duty off tea, and Sir Francis Hincks thought it would be wise to follow their example. He took the duty off all tea, but afterwards found that the Americans had made an exception on all tea coming from the west of the meridian of the Cape of Good Hope, which should be charged at the rate of 10 per cent. Sir Francis Hincks saw the mistake he had made, and, to check the United States people in their Canadian trade, he put 10 per cent on also. What was the effect of the abolition of the duty? It destroyed the direct free trade with China. In 1874, the present Finance Minister took off that duty, and, as a result, to-day, our tea merchants and tea shippers in Hamilton, in Toronto and Montreal had gone to New York. Before he left home, a gentleman from the States called upon him for an order for tea. He said to him: "Cannot you carry on your business in Canada; is the legislation against you?" and, though he was a Reformer, he said, "It is, a little." It was the same with sugar. The sugar refiners saw no possibility of getting on in Canada, and they had crossed the border. The hon. gentleman said that the Americans had no advantage over us, but he must by this time have been brought to see his mistake. The American policy since then had destroyed the very last sugar refinery in Canada. They found they were paying duties, and they immediately stopped, and the Americans reduced it 42c., and instead of a $3.60 drawback they only gave $3.18, and still they had the advantage. There had been a great deal said about who paid the duty—the consumer or the producer? He thought that in this point there need be no mistake. We had to pay a duty on everything that came from the United States. He knew that the consumer must pay the duty on such things as we did not raise ourselves, tea, spice, and that kind of things. But, if we sent a cargo of sheep or cattle into the United States we had, on the other hand, to pay to them. About 20 per cent. was collected on the boundary line for this produce. Where did the duty upon these productions of ours go to? It went into the treasury of the United States, and the people of that country had so much less to pay in taxation. He had other testimony that the consumer did not pay the duty, the testimony of the Customs officers on the boundary line. In 1858, what did the Manchester people say when the people of India began to manufacture their own cotton? There was a great stir in Manchester at that time, and at one of the meetings which were held, one gentleman said that £750,000 raised in duties in India on cotton had to be paid by the Lancashire people, that it fell on 80,000 operatives, or about £10 a head. If these facts would not convince hon. gentlemen that the consumer did not pay the duty, they were very hard to convince. The hon. the Premier, in days gone by, used to call this policy of Protection a policy which had sprung from the dark ages. Whether it had sprung from the dark ages or not he could not tell, but it had become the policy of most civilized countries. Whether they looked to France or Germany, Austria, Belgium, Spain or Switzerland, the United States or any other free country—he was about to say England, and they were talking seriously about it there, they were talking about a return to barbarism—they saw the same thing. A gentleman from England, who had completed a tour round the world, went back and told his people that they must have a change; they must have some protection or else they were going to be undersold. England was supposed to be a land of Free-trade, but she was nothing of the sort. She collected in Customs alone no less than $100,000,000 a year. If he had time, he would quote the articles this was collected upon. The principal were: tobacco, £7,399,074; tea, £3,251,203; brandy, £3,248,546; wine, nearly £2,000,000; and there was rum, whiskey, vinegar, and a great many other things. Her Customs in nine years, from 1866 to 1874, amounted to £968,000,000, while the Customs of the United States were for the same time $1,668,349,914. The policy of the dark ages, forsooth; England was a protective country, and talked about more Protection. Up to the beginning of the last century she had the most stringent Acts for protecting her interests. Why, at one time, it was against the law to make a shroud for a dead body of anything but woollen; and it was only when she was predominant in all the markets of the world that she was able to become the apostle of Free-trade. There was another argument that he would like to explode, and this was that, by Protection, the farmer got less for his products and would have to pay more for everything he had to buy. There never was a greater mistake or a greater fallacy. The following figures would show the relative prices obtained under Protection and Free-trade. From 1849 to 1861, a Free-trade period comparatively, the farmer obtained $1.30 per bushel for his wheat; from 1862 to 1874, a period under Protection, he got an average of $1.37 per bushel. This showed he got more for his produce under a protective policy. That Protection increased the price of goods was another great fallacy, because, as a rule, they were reduced. He had copied out a few figures to show that goods were cheaper under Protection than under Free-trade; but, first, he would show the increase of manufactures under Protection. In the United States, in 1824, under Free-trade, the consumption of iron was 35lb. per head; under Protection up to 1835, it rose to 48lb.; under Free-trade it fell in 1842 to 35lb.; but under Protection in 1847-8 it rose to 98lb. Under Free-trade again, it fell in 1858-60 to 80lb., and under the present protective tariff of the United States it was 150lb. per head. He desired to say that he was entirely in favour of a protective policy. Having looked into the subject as well as he could, and seeing the depression we had abroad in Canada and the prosperity of the United States, he had come to the conclusion that a readjustment of the tariff would be beneficial to this country. The hon. gentleman would tell them that, from the President of the United States down to the lowest man in Congress, there was not a wise man to be found amongst that people, and that they were following a policy which would ruin their country; but were they to believe this? Could they believe it? He was not credulous enough to do so. He believed that the United States were progressing and making rapid strides and advancing in civilization, in commerce and in wealth. Were we to sit idly by, and leave them their markets closed against us, while our markets were open to them, and never say a word? He, for one, was not willing to adopt such a course. When the Americans levied on our goods going into their country such enormous rates, he said: "Let us charge such rates too on their goods; let us checkmate them." He thought that this would be the best way of getting what we wanted—a reciprocity treaty. He was not one of those cowardly individuals that was afraid to do so. Hon. gentlemen opposite said that this would offend the Americans. Then let us offend them, he would reply. We had submitted long enough to them, and they kept their doors barred and bolted against us. Let us have a retaliatory policy, if hon. gentlemen liked to call it so; for, with it, we could not be worse off than we were now. A class of people in the House said that the farmers did not suffer loss through Americans pouring their wheat, oats and corn into this country; but these articles that came in here by hundreds of car-loads, and were sold amongst us, brought down prices, and, as a consequence, the farmers were indignant. They saw how this system worked; and of all men he had conversed with, they were most determined to have a change. The hon. gentleman from North Norfolk had told them that the United States were ruining themselves; but this hon. gentleman, two years ago, had declared the contrary. This put him in mind of an anecdote which he might relate to illustrate the hon. gentleman's position. A witness who was once giving his testimony in Court about a horse, had sworn that it was 15 feet high. The Judge, after taking this down, turned around and said: "Have you not made a mistake; instead of saying 15 feet did you not mean 15 hands high?" "Well, my lord, what have you got down?" "I have 15 feet down."

MR. FARROW.

"Well, I will stick to it." He, therefore, thought that the hon. gentleman occupied a position like this; two years ago the hon. gentleman had made a great Protection speech, and last year and this year he had made great Free-trade speeches, and said the hon. gentleman: "I will stick to it." The hon. gentleman ought, no doubt, to be applauded because he had done this; but he (Mr. Farrow) hoped that the hon. gentleman's ideas would be exploded in a very short time.

MR. GILLMOR said he had had the privilege, last Session, to speak after the hon. member for North Huron, and he now had the same privilege. He had listened with considerable satisfaction to the speech of the hon. member. He thought that the hon. gentleman was superior to the average of the speakers on the other side of the House, but the hon. gentleman was not the best speaker he had ever heard. The hon. gentleman reminded him of a young man who once went away to get a few lessons at a theological institution; when he returned, he delivered a sermon, and, after it was over, spoke of it to an old gentleman from whom he wished to extract a compliment. So the young man remarked: "How do you think I have progressed?" "Well," said the old gentleman, "you can whet a case-knife and make it very sharp, but you will never make a razor of it." His hon. friend was a very fair average speaker, but he would never become a razor. He (Mr. Gillmor) had listened for four weeks to the speeches made in the House; he had listened to them from the Opposition benches by the hour; and these hon. gentlemen had been pounding and threshing away at the same bundle of straw without getting any wheat. They had been grinding the same barrel-organ, turning on its own axis to the same tune. They were like the men in the Scriptures who toiled all night and caught nothing. He understood the position of these hon. gentlemen—they were hungry for office. He had seen some hungry people, and some hungry animals, but he had never seen anything that illustrated the greed of these hon. gentlemen, except in the case of a menagerie just about feeding time.

MR. PLUMB: Mr. Speaker,—

MR. GILLMOR said he did not want hon. gentlemen to interrupt him, because he had once chastised a man for interrupting him and was afterwards sorry for it because he found out that the man had been drunk.

MR. PLUMB: Mr. Speaker, I call the hon. gentleman to order.

AN HON. MEMBER: Does the cap fit?

MR. PLUMB: I call upon the hon. gentleman to take back what he has said; I insist upon it that he shall apologize; I never heard before such an offensive remark; and I cannot sit still and submit to it, even though the other side do applaud anything in such very bad taste.

MR. SPEAKER: I have listened carefully to what the hon. member has said, and I was not able to detect that he made the application of that statement to any hon. member in the House. If he has, of course, applied it to the hon. member for Niagara, he has acted very improperly, and should withdraw it.

MR. PLUMB: I insist upon the hon. member apologizing.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. SPEAKER: I must leave it to the hon. member to say whether he did or did not name the hon. member for Niagara. If he says he did not name the hon. member or any other hon. member, I really do not know why he should be called to order for telling one of these stories.

MR. GILLMOR: I will just repeat what I said. I said I was once interrupted when speaking, by an individual, and that I chastised him for it. I was severe upon him, and I was sorry for it afterwards, because I found out that he was drunk.

MR. SPEAKER: That was what I understood the hon. member to say.

MR. MITCHELL: I rise to a question of order.

SEVERAL HON. MEMBERS: Chair.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member refers to a matter which I regard as entirely settled. There is no question before the chair.

MR. MITCHELL: Of course, if you consider that no explanation can be made, I will submit.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. member has no right to make any imputation like that.

MR. MITCHELL: I made no imputation.

MR. SPEAKER: I call the hon. member to order.

MR. GILLMOR said this was the first time he had ever been called to order. He had not intended to violate the rules of the House. He did not intend to take up the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk and read it over and over again, as hon. members of the Opposition had done; nor to bore the House with any such process. He intended to vote against the amendment under consideration, because he was opposed to Protection; because, if it was carried into effect, it would be detrimental to the interests of his constituents; because he believed that it was opposed to the best interests of the Province of New Brunswick; because it was opposed to the interests of the Maritime Provinces; because it was opposed to the best interests of the Dominion of Canada; because it was wrong in theory and ruinous in practice; because it had been conceived in iniquity and brought forth in sin; and because he did not believe there was a particle of honesty in the hon. gentlemen opposite or that they believed it would benefit the industries and interests of this country if it were carried into effect. Hungry as these hon. gentlemen were for office, they thought they could, during this depression, offer something to the poor, something to the farmer, something to the manufacturer and something to the different interests of the country, and thus get a majority. Why had not these hon. gentlemen introduced Protection when it was needed before? Was this the first time there had been depression in the Dominion? Was this the first season that hard times were ever known in this country? Not at all. There had been plenty of occasions formerly when more goods were imported into this country than was the case while the present Government had been in power; and yet these hon. gentlemen had not then thought of introducing Protection; they did not then find any languishing or struggling industries or infant manufactories in favour of which to tax the poor of this country. Not at all. During the years when these hon. gentlemen were in office, when a great deal more foreign goods had been imported into Canada than was now the case, these hon. gentlemen had seen no reason for Protection; but now their bowels of compassion seemed to yearn for the poor of this country. He would refer for a few minutes to the condition of the country with regard to our public debt. It was his impression that this debt, considering the fact that we had never been afflicted with either famine or war, was a great deal larger than it ought to be. He did not believe it was desirable in the interests of the country that our public debt should have increased to such an enormous amount. It was entirely too large. On looking into the Public Accounts, he found that our debt in 1867 was ninety-three millions, and in 1877, one hundred and seventy-four millions; and that our assets in 1867 were seventeen millions, and in 1877 forty-one millions; the interest paid in 1877 was $7,132,408 on our public debt, while the interest on assets was but $648,680, leaving $6,483,728 yearly, or $17,763 paid on interest account every day in the year. He believed that we had been entirely too fast, and that this was too great a debt for the four millions of people, who lived in the Dominion, to bear; that it was too great a taxation on the energies and industries of our people; that too much money had been spent on public works that were unproductive; that, when hard times, such as those we were now suffering under, came upon us, to take six and a-half millions annually out of our revenue, and appropriate it to the payment of the interest on our public debt, was a burden that ought not to have been imposed on the people of this country; and that, irrespective of party, this was a matter which ought to be seriously considered by every person who had the interests of the Dominion at heart. This amount, annually, came out of the country. It represented so much capital and labour sent abroad to pay the interest on the public debt. We had to pay every day in the year, $17,763 in this connection, as interest on the money which had been expended on our public works. He did not mean to say it was not prudent to create a public debt; public improvements and works should be encouraged, but there was a limit to this. He had heard some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side boast about the Intercolonial Railway as a great achievement, as something to be proud of; but he thought those who were the projectors of that railroad ought to be ashamed of themselves. The expenditure of $22,000,000, or $25,000,000 of money in that railway was, taking into account the results derived therefrom, a shameful waste. But that was not all, for the amount required to pay the interest on that money amounted to $1,200,000 per annum, besides $500,000 for working expenses, over the income—one and three-quarter millions annually to run a railway of that description. Had the Provinces been connected by means of the central route, that would not have been the case, for half of the expenditure would have been saved, not to speak of taxes. It was very well for the hon. member for Northumberland to boast of the Intercolonial Railroad, but it would be found in time to come that the amount required for running expenses, instead of being only about half a million of dollars yearly, would reach a million. He believed every right-thinking man would agree with him in saying that this scheme was entered upon unadvisedly, and without proper consideration of the probable burdens it would create. He would almost be inclined to imagine, from the speeches made by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, that the depression which had existed in the country during the past few years, was chargeable entirely to the Government; they talked as if when they were in power there was always plenty, and no poverty, never any distress, and no complaints. But, during his short experience of this country he had seen worse times than the present; he had known provisions to be higher, and labour less easy to be obtained. But the hon. gentlemen opposite took advantage of the depression which now existed to charge the Government with having been the cause of all the ills which were endured both by manufacturers and operatives, as if the Government had it in their power to relieve this distress. There were hard times in 1868 and in 1869, and still these hon. gentlemen would not like to be charged with the responsibility therefor. The fact was, too, that the American manufacturers were even more distressed than our own, and had sent some of their goods here in order that they might get them sold at a price which would at least avert bankruptcy. He lived within 25 miles of the American border, and he had never seen any slaughtering of goods there except in the case of a man who sold three sets of harness, and these, he believed, were stolen. If the Americans wished to slaughter their goods, they could stand it in New Brunswick as long as the Americans could. He did not care how much they sold, or how cheaply, to the thousands of poor who were suffering in this Dominion. But the Yankees were not so green as to sell for less than cost; indeed, no man or body of men would manufacture goods and send them into a foreign country for the purpose of breaking down the home manufacturers. How was it, though, that the Opposition party, who were now making such surprising discoveries, did not find out in 1872 that goods to the value of $111,000,000 had been imported into New Brunswick, nor that, in 1873 the imports there amounted to $128,000,000? He had listened with a great deal of pleasure to the hon. member for Centre Toronto, and, without making any invidious comparisons, he must say that he would rather have been the author of that speech than of any other in this debate. The explanation contained therein gave, he thought, the only proper solution of the difficulty. With regard to these struggling industries, he believed that, if they took the Dominion of Canada from one end to the other, they would find the manufacturers were the richest class; if they wanted to find men who were rolling in wealth, they had only to go to the manufacturers; and yet these were the very people who were coming to Parliament with their beggarly petition—men who were worth their millions and their half millions—asking this House to impose more taxes on the struggling masses of the poor and their children. He looked upon such a proceeding as the quintessence of meanness. If there was a class which deserved commiseration, it was the lumbermen, who had had a hard struggle. These men, year after year, had been forced to sell their lumber at a less rate and still retained large numbers of men, though at a less rate, it might be, than formerly; while the manufacturers, who had ceased to employ operatives, actually had the assurance to ask that the lumbermen might be taxed for their exclusive benefit. When the agitation for Confederation was in New Brunswick, they were told of the wonderful powers they would obtain to bring their iron, coal and cotton into Canada; that mills would be set up, and that the whizzing of wheels would be heard everywhere. They were told that they would be a great manufacturing centre, but the result had been quite the opposite; and yet it was proposed now to tax the lumbermen, the fishermen, the farmers, and the shipbuilders of New Brunswick, to tax their flour, their coal, their cotton, and their corn. To do so was certainly unjust, and the attempt would not result in any good. The hon. gentlemen on the opposite side could not be sincere in saying that they were going to make this country rich by taxing everybody. All logic, reason, and common sense were opposed to such an idea. We all suffered alike from the depression which existed, but he did not think there was more absolute want in the county which he represented now than there was in some former years, but he saw less exports going out because they could not affect the price of lumber in the United States. He would like to know if the hon. gentlemen opposite could invent any process—for certainly they seemed to have very good inventive faculties—by which they could obtain better prices for lumber in the United States and Great Britain then at present. And now with regard to the protection of farmers. That was a very popular sort of thing. It was proposed that, as the Americans charged them for the produce they exported to the United States, a retaliatory tariff should be imposed upon agricultural produce imported into this country. He would not trouble the House with many figures, but would mention that the quantity of butter introduced into New Brunswick from the United States was 8,228 lb., besides 2,521 lb. of cheese, 4,163 lb. of hops, and 180 bushels of potatoes. Actually 180 bushels of potatoes had been imported from the United States. No doubt the farmers could not afford to raise potatoes when such an enormous quantity was received from the United States. Of hay and straw 15 tons had been imported. Only think of 15 tons of hay. No wonder it had been found necessary to protect the farmers of New Brunswick. Of horned cattle, 44 head had been imported—he supposed there were no buffaloes amongst them; and there had been 86 horses and four swine. And yet, he had no doubt, his hon. friend the member for Cumberland, who was a very powerful speaker, making the worse appear the better reason, whose logic, in fact, could make a chestnut horse out of a horse chestnut, would make powerful argument for his party out of the figures quoted. He (Mr. Gillmor) had heard him speak for five hours at a time, and had often thought of the saying: There was a fire and the truth was not in it, there was a rushing, mighty wind, and the truth was not in that. He had heard a five hours' speech from one of the ablest members in Parliament, and would not say what was in that. He did not believe they were going to succeed, but if they did he would not fret. If the people wanted to believe in the efficacy of Protection, let them do so and take the consequences. He could not help it, but he would discharge his duty and state his convictions without regard to his seat in Parliament. To be Prime Minister was not worth stating an untruth, not worth deceiving the humblest man in the Dominion. How bold and how anxious their hon.

friends were to go to the people; but a good deal of that was on the surface. Some of them were trembling. He (Mr. Gillmor) was not trembling; he did not know whether the people would send him back or not, or whether he would present himself again or not, but while here he would do his duty. If the people took his advice, they would not return the men who had proved recreant to their trust, who had plundered the Treasury. This was not a mere assertion about the corruption of the late Government; it had been proved. He might never have an opportunity again of speaking his mind, and he intended to do so before he sat down. There had been a good many comparisons made during this discussion, a great many useless comparisons which the people could not understand. They might take a series of years, and compare one year with another, one Department with another, and arrive at any conclusion they pleased. But there were certain things that could be compared, which would be susceptible of being understood, and which the people could understand. He proposed to trouble the House with a comparison of the contingent accounts in the office of the hon. the Minister of Justice, while that position was filled by the hon. the member for South Bruce, with the contingencies of the same office when the right hon. member for Kingston was Minister of Justice. There were certain things, of course, in that office which might vary from time to time, as business increased, but there were also items which ought not to vary much under any Minister. He would read a statement of the contingent account of the office of the Minister of Justice while the hon. member for South Bruce was in, as compared with contingencies while the hon. member for Kingston was in.

|-------------------------------------|------------|
| In 1873, under Conservative rule, | |
| total cost of contingencies..... | $9,470 39 |
| In 1876, under Reform rule, reduced | |
| to | 4,996 37 |
| In 1877, under Reform rule, reduced | |
| to | 2,787 78 |

There were some items in all Departments which could not be much reduced. The items on which a saving had been effected were such as telegraphing, cab-hire, travelling and postage.

|--|------------|
| In 1873, Conservative rule, telegraph account was | $4,371 88 |
| In 1876, Reform rule, telegraphing was | 1,164 69 |
| In 1877, Reform rule, telegraphing was | 330 00 |
| In 1873, Conservative rule, cab hire was | 1,035 50 |
| In 1876, Reform rule, cab hire was... | 38 80 |
| In 1877, Reform rule, cab hire was... | 14 80 |
| In 1873, Conservative travelling expenses were..... | 1,218 12 |
| In 1876, Reform rule, travelling expenses were | 322 66 |
| In 1877, Reform rule, travelling expenses were | 51 35 |
| In 1873, Conservative rule, postage account was | 493 37 |
| In 1876, Reform rule, postage account was | 228 53 |
| In 1877, Reform rule, postage account was | 125 77 |
| Notwithstanding this great saving, the correspondence had greatly increased. | |
| In 1873, under Conservative rule, the four items amounted to. | $7,118 87 |
| In 1876, under Reform rule, the sum was | 1,754 68 |
| In 1877, under Reform rule, the sum was | 521 92 |

This was a fair criterion of the expenditure of the present Administration as compared with the former one, in items which could not, in the nature of things, vary to any large extent year after year. Thus they had one Minister of Justice spending, for cab hire, $1,035, and the other spending $14.00. In 1877 telegraphing was cut down to less than one-thirteenth; cab expenses less than one-twenty-fourth; travelling expenses, less than one-seventeenth; and postage, less than one twenty-fourth, of the expenditure in 1873, making a total saving under Reform rule, as compared with Conservative rule, of $5,364. That was a comparison which could be understood. He had no disposition to charge anything to hon. gentlemen opposite of which they were not guilty. They had suffered enough, Heaven knows. It would be like pouring water on a drowned rat, but he wanted fair play. There was a great difference in the habits of people. Some people were very popular at the public expense; some people were very popular with telegraph companies through the public money. The Reform party had been in the habit, even if they had to pay a little illegal expense, of paying it out of their own pockets. The habits of the Reform party were, from the first, to economize; they could not afford to be jolly good fellows; they had no King Cole in their party.

"Old King Cole was a jolly old soul,
And a jolly old soul was he;
He called for his pipe and he called for his bowl,
And he called for his fiddlers three."

And he paid for it all out of the public money. It was very easy to be popular, to get the votes of cabmen by spending a few thousand dollars on cab-hire, and the Minister of Justice would be very unpopular, very miserly, who only spent $14. No cabman would vote for him. He perceived there were a good many of those generous and popular people who lived at the public expense. Did they ever see a cow that had spent the night in a neighbour's cornfield. She would stand in the morning ruminating, with a docile appearance, and giving her milk down freely and generously, not caring who got it. You would not think from her look of innocence that she had been eating off her neighbour. That was a generosity he did not believe in. There was a cow a neighbour of his owned, and that cow would invariably get into his garden. He fenced the garden against her; he tried every way to prevent her from entering; he made the gates very narrow; but one night, that cow was hungry, and lank, and lean, and skinny, and she got through. He got up in the morning and there she was, stuck fast in the gate. She had got into his cabbage garden, and had filled herself so full, that she had got caught while endeavouring to pass through. He went out and cudgelled her. That cow did not bother him any more. That was a fair illustration of their Conservative friends; though a very homely illustration, an agricultural illustration. This narrow gate reminded him of the gate into the Northern Railway Company. The Conservatives had gone in there keen, hungry, and lank, and had got so full that they were caught coming out. If that cow had eaten a moderate amount, she would have got out. The Conservatives were in power too long without being detected. They got into the Secret Service money, the Pacific Railroad, and the Fraser-Reynolds transaction, and got caught coming out of all these, and he believed they had better not go in again. With regard, now, to the charges made against the present Government. He did not believe in perfection in human institutions anywhere. There were no perfect men or perfect women. He believed there were decent men and decent women—decent men in public life and dishonest men in public life. The tactics of the Conservatives during the first two years he was a member of this House, were to charge the present Government with imbecility. The present Government was incapable; the Minister of Marine did not know enough to manage his Department; the Finance Minister did not know anything about finance, he had no experience. The Minister of Public Works was also an incompetent. That game was now played out; they had now met these men in Parliament face to face, and in argument had been riddled from top to bottom; they then concluded to try another game. So they adopted the rôle of slander, charging jobbery, political corruption, mismanagement, illegal expenditure, and neglect of duty generally. He would give the late Government credit for not having laid any claim to political purity. The evidence had been so decidedly against such an idea, that they dared not allude to it; but their whole effort had been put forth to blacken the fair characters of the present Government. He had heard these charges reiterated time and again; he had heard the Premier urge and challenge them over and over again to formulate the charges and ask for a Committee to investigate them, in order that the whole truth might be elicited, that the country might have the facts given under oath and under the most searching investigation, so that, if there was any corruption, it might be, as it ought to be, exposed; but the Opposition dared not ask for an investigation; they sheltered themselves under the plea that there would be a majority of Government supporters on that Committee. There would, of course, be a majority of Government supporters on any Committee.

MR. GILLMOR.

It would be a strange system where a majority in the House should not have a majority in Committee—but a majority could not alter the facts, could not change the evidence, and, although a majority might report adversely to the evidence, yet the evidence would go to the country and the people could judge for themselves. Did anyone suppose that the hon. member for Cumberland, or the right hon. member for Kingston, who could be on such a Committee, could not and would not be able, if corrupt practices were proved, to manage to get that evidence before the country? Certainly they could, and they had nothing to fear if their charges were well founded. But the fact was, their charges had no foundation in truth, and they dared not attempt an investigation, fearing, in fact knowing, they would fail and then their stock of slander would be useless. He did not believe a Committee of this House would investigate any matter and report contrary to facts. What had been the case in reference to Committees on the violations of the Independence of Parliament Act? He referred to this matter, because it was one of the cries raised by the Opposition against the party in power throughout the country. The violations of the Independence of Parliament Act had been unfortunate, but he had never yet seen a case in which he thought there was any corruption, and he did not believe that hon. members opposite believed there was any corruption in all the violations which had taken place. But still, there was violation of the law, and it remained for this party and Government to carry out the law. The Tories were never known to unseat one of their party, no matter how flagrant the violation. He had seen a pamphlet which had been sent him, written by an hon. member of another branch of this Parliament. He had looked over that pamphlet, and, if the charges were true, the Government must be a very corrupt one. If they were true, why not formulate them before a Committee of this House? What was the result of the whole affair? The result was that they had asked for a Committee in the Senate—not to prove that there was anything corrupt, but to prove that there was an injudicious expenditure of $180,000 on the Fort Frances Lock. After having published this pamphlet all over the Dominion, after having poisoned the minds of the people here, in the High Court of Parliament, the people's Court, where their representatives sat, they declined to make those charges, but asked, instead, for a Committee to investigate the expenditure of $180,000 on public works. Such a procedure reminded him of the boy who told his mother he had seen a thousand cats run across the garden. That was a great many, said the mother, it could not be possible. Well, he said, he saw five hundred anyhow. Being further questioned, he said that, at any rate, he had seen one hundred. Well, the mother said she was afraid he was telling an untruth; did he not remember what the good book said, that liars had their place in the lake that burned with fire and brimstone? The boy got frightened. Well, he finally said, he had seen one cat sure. Those charges of Senator Macpherson had dwindled down to an investigation into the expenditure, not the corrupt use, but into the expenditure of $180,000 on the Fort Frances Lock. Another fact worthy of notice was that the late Government had sent five gentlemen as delegates to England at different times whose expenses in the aggregate amounted to $20,040, or $4,008 each. The present Government during their term had occasion to send four delegates at a cost of $5,000, or $1,250 each. This was a fair sample of the difference to the public of the cost of a Tory and a Reform delegate. True, this was not a very large matter, but it was one the common people could understand, and, as straws showed how the wind blew, it was an index to the general management of the late Government. Could any one knowing anything of the circumstances believe that a Minister of Justice could legitimately and honestly pay out $1,000 a year for cab-hire in Ottawa for the public service?—about three dollars a day for every day in the year; and yet that amount had been taken from the Treasury for that service by the hon. member for Kingston when he was Minister of Justice, when the same service was performed by the hon. member for South Bruce for fourteen dollars a year. No wonder that the right hon. member for Kingston was popular with cabmen. He (Mr. Gillmor) had seen a delegation of the workmen of Ottawa coming to the buildings to interview the Premier to ask him to find employment for them, when, at the same time, the Government had gone more largely into public works than the conditions of things would seem to justify in order to help the unemployed poor. He (Mr. Gillmor) witnessed that exhibition. The whole matter was a transparent job; they had been brought to these buildings not so much to get work as to get a chance to hurrah for Old King Cole. He (Mr. Gillmor) was opposed to the amendment under consideration, because, if such legislation were adopted, it would be most injurious to the people he represented. He did not believe the people of the Lower Provinces under existing circumstances, or under any other circumstances, should be compelled to pay a dollar a barrel, or even less, on the flour they consumed. There was no reason why they should pay even 50c. a barrel additional on the 250,000 barrels of flour consumed annually in New Brunswick. They could not afford to pay it, and he could not afford to support any measure that would have that effect. The result of the proposed system of Protection would have the effect, if 50c. a barrel was levied on flour imported, of making New Brunswick consumers of this article alone, pay into the pockets of the millers of Ontario the sum of $125,000 annually. The people of New Brunswick could not afford to do that. He could not give his voice to tax the fishermen he represented on the necessities of life, for the sole purpose of enriching the millers of Ontario and Quebec. Neither could he afford to tax the farmers, lumbermen and others for the same object. It was true, a few manufacturers of New Brunswick might be benefitted by Protection, but it was unjust to do it at the expense of the great mass of the people of that Province. He could not afford to tax the large lumbering interest on every article which entered into that business, as they were already bleeding at every pore. He could not support such a policy, to place the Opposition in power, and would not do it to keep the present occupants on the Treasury benches, and in power. He would have great pleasure in voting against the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kingston, as he was opposed to it in every phase in which it could be presented. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Palmer) in the commencement of his speech, viewed Protection as a very hateful thing; but as he progressed, he became quite familiar with it, and at last embraced it. At first, with him

That to be hated need but to be seen;
But seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.”

And so the hon. member ended by making a speech in favour of Protection and in pledging support to the party whose platform was this Protection. He did not discover anything in the hon. member's speech which called for a reply; but that hon. member was very indignant at the hon. the Minister of Finance, because he had alluded to certain gentlemen of the Opposition in his picnic speeches. The hon. the Minister of Finance had had great provocation to do so. If any hon member of the House had been abused, belittled and slandered more than another, it was the hon. the Finance Minister. When it was discovered that he had talent, financial skill, and that he was the man for the position, he received the venomous shafts of the Opposition. That gentleman had paid them with interest. He did not turn the other cheek, or give the coat to him who had stolen his cloak; but gave them payment in their own coin, and now they heard them whine about it and call it coarse abuse. He had only told the people a part of the truth about the hon. gentlemen. He (Mr. Gillmor) had an abiding faith in the integrity and honesty of the great heart of the people of this Dominion. They might be deceived for a season, but public opinion, when the truth was presented, would turn up right; at any rate, he was prepared to risk it, and to go to the people at the approaching elections, feeling that he had acted up to his convictions of right. At all events, he had an approving conscience, which was quite as valuable as a seat in Parliament. It had always been his practice not to fret about the next election. It was his part to do his duty at the present, and the business of the electors to look after their future representative. With regard to parties in the House and in the Dominion, he, like the hon. member for Northumberland, had a sort of preference for the Reform party, as no doubt hon. members had observed. His feelings would be illustrated by the story of the Irishman who had had two wives, both of whom had died, and he was asked where he wanted to be buried when he died; he said just between my two dear wives, but give my head a cant towards Biddy, she had my first love. He had a cant towards the Reform party, because he saw in that party men who were actuated by principle—men who were willing to defend what they believed to be right, without regard to consequences. The Reform party, strong as the milling and manufacturing interests were in Ontario and Quebec, were not afraid to take their stand in opposition to that system of Protection which would greatly burden and tax the masses for the benefit of the few; they were willing to fight the battle out, and he was willing to fight it out with them; and the Lower Provinces had a right to stand by the men who took a comprehensive view of this Dominion, and would not be forced by any class interests to neglect their duty to the whole people. It were much better to meet defeat fighting for the right, than to succeed by compromising convictions. He had not been in Parliament when the late Government were in power, and knew little of them, except what had been proved against them beyond a doubt; but he had been in Parliament since the present Government came into power, and he had discovered in them ability and political integrity. Of course they were not perfect: all men and all human institutions had more or less of imperfection. There had no doubt been errors of judgment, and many things had been done which by the light of experience would again be done differently; but they had never degraded and disgraced their positions and the public morality of this country; they had never adopted a system of plundering the public chest, such as had been proven against their predecessors, and if it were possible to prove against the present Government such conduct as the last had been guilty of, he would say neither were fit for the position, and both should be censured.

Unwept, unhonoured, and unsung”

The time was rapidly approaching, and he believed had now arrived, when the country would have honest men to rule—no matter by what party name they were called—conscientious men; men who had the fear of God before their eyes; men who knew their duty; men who would not condescend to a dishonest act. Politicians, like all others, might be sure their sins will find them out. The only way to be happy in politics was just to do right.

MR. COLBY: I deem it a fortunate circumstance, and I think the country will hail with satisfaction the fact, that the two great political parties have at last found an important, living and vital issue upon which they can fairly and honestly divide, and upon which they can rest their respective claims to public confidence. I think I am not wrong in saying that for the first time, since we became a Dominion, has such an issue arisen. In the main, the two great political parties have been in unison upon those great measures which have been initiated and carried on since the Confederation of the Provinces. There were differences, for instance, with respect to the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, but not with regard to the principle involved, both parties agreeing that that railway was a necessity. There were differences with regard to the acquisition of the North-West Territories; but they were differences of detail, differences as to the terms upon which they should be acquired, not as to the policy of their acquisition. So with respect to the acquisition of British Columbia; there were differences with regard to the terms upon which it should be acquired, but upon the principles involved all parties in this country were substantially in accord. It is matter for regret that the parties which have been arrayed against each other in political warfare have not found better and greater questions upon which to exercise their ability. As a consequence of this, our politics often descended to personal issues and to unworthy attacks on the characters of public men, for which neither of the great parties is entirely blameless. But we have at last a great question, an economical question, a question upon the solution of which will largely depend the future of the Dominion. It is not, I believe, as was stated by the hon. the Minister of the Interior in one of those picnic speeches of which we have a voluminous record, a contest between knowledge and ignorance; it is not a contest between a generous spirit and selfishness; it is not, as had been stated by the hon. the Premier, a question in which the views of one party savoured of barbarism and the barbarous age, but it is a question upon either side of which the best minds of all civilized countries have been for very many years engaged. It is a question on which a certain class of thinkers—able, intelligent, acute, thoughtful men I admit them to be—hold to certain theories and views which they believe are applicable to all conditions of affairs, in which I will freely admit they are fortified by the prestige of the great manufacturing and commercial success of England since she started upon the policy which they so loudly applaud. But, on the other hand, it must be remembered that while the doctrinaires are so strengthened by that illustrious example, they are opposed by the statesmanship of every country with the exception of England; that the leading public and influential men who controlled the fortunes of France, Germany, Russia, the United States, and every other civilized country, so far from having accepted the views of those doctrinaires have acted upon a different policy, upon the policy which is recognized as that of the Opposition in this House to-day; the policy which is affirmed by the amendment proposed by the right hon. member for Kingston. It is not true that the proposition before the House is, as it has been termed by some one, a vague, unmeaning proposition. I maintain that this amendment is a clear, bold, distinct and intelligible declaration of a positive policy, and that those who support the views therein expressed do so maintain them as the result of calm and settled conviction; that they are not put forward for ad captandum purposes, or for the purpose of getting votes. They have been iterated and reiterated for years in this House by thoughtful and patriotic men, whose views are entitled to as much weight as any in this country. The amendment starts with the assumption that the country needs a National Policy. Now, it is not denied by either party that a Customs tariff, as a mode of raising revenue, is a favourite one with Free-traders and Protectionists alike; nor that, largely on the way in which a tariff is framed, depends the existence and the success of the industries to which the tariff applies. A Customs tariff might destroy industries, or it might build up industries. This fact could not and would not be controverted, and the proper solution of the question as to whether they should adopt a Customs tariff that would have the one or the other of these effects, would largely influence the future prosperity of our young country. The amendment before the House is comprehensive, though concise. It implies that it is the duty of every nation to adjust its Customs tariff to its own special needs; that the impossible task is not imposed upon any country, of looking after the interests of every other nation; but a duty devolving upon each nation to adjust its own tariff with special reference to its own peculiar needs, having in view, also, its relations to other countries. Every Customs tariff should aim at developing the maximum of production of which the country is capable. In framing a tariff, we should consider all the resources of the country, all its dormant and unused energies and capabilities; the wealth which lies below the soil in our mines, as much as the wealth of the soil, and the wealth above the soil, in our lumber. We should also consider the resources of the country with reference to its capability of becoming a successful manufacturing nation; and more than that, we should consider the capacity and aptitude of the people, and aim at framing the tariff so as, in the largest degree, to develop the varied powers of all the people, and give them an opportunity of engaging in that calling or department of business to which they may have special aptitude or inclination. We do not believe in the views propounded by gentlemen opposite, that it is not the business of Government to care for any of these things, that Government is a mere taxation and revenue distributing machine, which should move according to certain fixed laws and ultimate principles. The supporters of this amendment claim, on the contrary, that the financial policy of a country should not be based on any ultimate principle of Free-trade or Protection, but that it should be specially adaptive to the conditions of the country to which it is applied. We believe that every Customs tariff should have a distinct and definite purpose and intelligent aim; that it should be based upon a correct estimate and appreciation of all the varied resources and capabilities of the country, and should shape them in the direction of their best possible development. The general views affirmed in this amendment have been more than once stated in this House, by many able and thoughtful members, clearly and distinctly; yet the House will pardon me for stating that the exposition of my honourable friend the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in 1876, then a Protectionist but now an avowed Free-trader, was the clearest and best that has been given. I do not purpose troubling the House with a recital of the hon. gentleman's speech, but will submit an analysis of its main propositions in their consecutive order. I aim at perfect fairness, and beg the hon. gentleman to correct me if I make a misstatement. This reference to the speech is not made for the purpose of placing my hon. friend at any disadvantage, or because he has since changed his opinions; but because it is the most careful, the best considered, the most clear and concise statement of the views now held by the Opposition, that has yet been given on this much debated subject. The hon. gentleman laid down as his first proposition, that a Government could be paternal and yet be free. In this he directly controverted the position taken by his leader, the hon. the Finance Minister, in his Budget Speech last year, and vindicated one of the cardinal planks in the platform of the Opposition. His next proposition was, that no nation had attained to greatness in manufactures or commerce without having imposed exactions and restrictions. This was a plain statement of an historical fact, upon which the Opposition lay great stress, and its truthfulness was clearly demonstrated by the hon. gentleman in his speech on the subject. The next proposition was, that protection was especially necessary in a new country—and ours is a new country—to enable it to compete with countries where manufactures are established. The hon. member recognized in his speech the fact that the cheap money, the acquired skill, and the prestige of older manufacturing countries would take the lead in the race, and, as admitted by John Stuart Mill and other Free-traders, the country that had the lead, all things being equal, would keep it; he held that this advantage an old manufacturing country had, must be counteracted by restrictions in order to enable the new country to get a start in these industries. The next proposition of the hon. gentleman was that judicious Protection benefitted the nation at large, and especially the farming interest; that it created for the farmer a home market, and that the purchasing power of labour was increased. The Opposition believed equally with the hon. gentleman that Protection did benefit the agricultural interest, and they believed also that the purchasing power of the farmer's labour would be vastly enhanced by the creation and proximity of home markets, as was clearly stated by that hon. gentleman. Again, he laid down the proposition, that the experience of the United States, under a Protective policy, was a clear and marked illustration of the benefits of Protection. If this was true when the hon. gentleman so stated it, it is equally true now; and, before I sit down, I will adduce a few facts in corroboration. The hon. gentleman next said that the tendency of Protection was not to increase, but cheapen prices to the consumer. This is an incontrovertible proposition. Protection is merely a defence of the markets of a nation to the people of that nation. It simply gave a fair field to competitive skill, industry, and capital, where the highest prizes are for those who produce the best and sell the cheapest products. The hon. member for North Norfolk cited the iron and cotton manufactures of the United States as indisputable proof of the fact that the tendency of Protection is to cheapen prices. And he went further even than the amendment. He stated the fact, which I think he was justified in stating, that Protection had been beneficial to the shipping interest of the United States as well; so that he covered the whole range of industries which come under the tariff, and he stated so emphatically, lucidly and concisely the various propositions upon which this amendment is predicated, that his speech was not only the most convenient method of formulating these propositions, but it was more effective, perhaps, than I could myself have given, but for that memorable delivery. The hon. gentleman has changed his views; I have nothing to say in regard to that at the present moment, but will refer to it hereafter. I will now state the counter-propositions which are supposed to embody the views and policy of the Government. The propositions embodied in the amendment are clear and distinct as day-light. The counter-propositions are equally distinct. They are the ordinary staple Free-trade dogmas, which we have had frequently in this House, from the lips of men who have thoroughly studied them. One of the first distinct intimations of a new policy with which we have been favoured is in a speech delivered in 1876, by a gentleman who stood very high in his party, and who then foresaw that these propositions might become a party issue. I refer to my hon. friend the member for North York (Mr. Dymond). He said, in this House, in 1876, particularly addressing his hon. friends in this House, that the good old word Reform had served a good purpose in its day, but that the time had happily now arrived when there was perhaps very little to reform; that it was important for the success of the Liberal Party that they should take a new departure, and take a new watchword; that they should place upon their banner a new motto; and the motto he gave them was one very dear to himself (for he was brought up at the very feet of Gamaliel, and had imbibed Free-trade with his mother's milk.) The motto which he proposed to substitute for the word "Reform," and around which Reformers should hereafter rally, was the word "Free-trade." My hon. friend (Mr. Dymond) having uttered the word, seemed to think that, perhaps, he had gone too far, and that it was hardly fitting in him to lay down a platform for the party. Casting his eyes across the House he caught the anxious look of the hon. member for Hamilton, and, dropping his voice to a scarcely audible undertone, repeated: "Free-trade—as it is understood in Canada." His clarion notes, proclaiming Free-trade, had reached away down to Nova Scotia, but his cautious undertone was intended for the ear only of the hon. members for Hamilton and their friends the manufacturers. The "motto," as modified, was calculated to serve the double purpose of rallying the Free-trade party around a grand banner, and, at the same time, of quieting his hon. friends from Hamilton, who were a little restive that the Free-trade nag should be trotted out so prominently. That was the first note, but my hon. friend was cautious not to place himself in a position where it would be impossible to retract, provided that it should be found he had gone too far. But that proposition was followed up by other hon. gentlemen who spoke with more authority. It would not be fair to judge of a party platform by the utterances of any of that party's supporters alone. I am aware that supporters of every party differed in their views with regard to these things. Some gentlemen on both sides of the House told them that the issue between parties was a question of Free-trade or Protection, and others that it was not a question of Free-trade or Protection. One would not be justified in fixing the responsibility of any set of views upon a party based upon the utterances of any individual supporters of that party, however high they might stand in the party's ranks. I find the hon. the Premier, however, making use of these words, and they may be accepted as authoritative:—

"The mere passage of an Act of Parliament would never establish any trade, and would never foster any industry unless it were to change from one pocket to another the proceeds of the industries of the country. If a particular trade or industry were to be fostered, it could only be done at the sacrifice of some other trade or industry. There was no theory more consonant with the dark ages of the world than that which Protection afforded."

Now, this was a cardinal principle of Free-trade; it was the essential principle of Free-trade. It proceeded upon the assumption that if Protection is given to any industry, it is necessarily done at the expense of some other industry of the country, and consequently that Protection must be wrong,—wrong in its very essence, for the country must be injured by it. What did this doctrine do? Preached among the people, it made them believe that every industry in the country was the enemy of every other industry; it taught them to be jealous of the growth of every industry, except the particular one in which they themselves were engaged. The Opposition, on the other hand, believe in the sisterhood of these great industries; they believe that these industries are all of the same family, co-workers, independently, yet inter-dependently working out the prosperity of the country. They do not believe in the principle that because one industry prospers, it does so necessarily by fattening on another industry; or that the growth of one involves the destruction of another. Here is a point upon which these hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, and those who do not concur in their views, differ essentially. Here is the very point where the roads diverge. The Opposition believe that the promotion of one industry betters another. When shrewd old Dr. Benjamin Franklin was in England, when his country was new; when he was concerned with regard to its future; and when he sought information and was endeavouring to draw wisdom from abroad, which should conduce to the prosperity of his young country, and the adoption of a proper policy in its interests, he wrote from England to Humphrey Marshall in the following language, which I quote in illustration and in confirmation of the belief of the Opposition in the sisterhood of the industries, and in their being mutually helpful to one another:—

“Every manufacture encouraged in our country makes part of the market for provisions within ourselves, and saves so much money for the country as must otherwise be exported to pay for the manufactures or supplies.”

He was then speaking of his own country. Of England, he said:

“Here in England it is well known and understood that, wherever a manufactory is established, which employs a number of hands, it raises the value of the land in the neighbouring country all around it, partly by the greater demand near at hand for the produce of the land, and partly from the plenty of money drawn by the manufacturers to that part of the country. It seems, therefore, the necessity of all our farmers and owners of land to encourage our young manufactures in preference to foreign ones imported among us from distant countries.”

Dr. Franklin was a shrewd man; he was an observing man; he was in pursuit of truth; and this was the deduction which he drew from his observations in England, and which he communicated patriotically to his people for their guidance. This harmonized so precisely with the views which the Opposition hold upon this subject, that I have taken the liberty of quoting it to the House. When the hon. the Premier stated that if a particular trade or industry were to be fostered it could only be done at the expense of some other trade or industry, he made an assertion which he will pardon me for saying is unsupported by argument or proof. The hon. gentleman will therefore pardon me if, in answer to that assertion, I make a counter-assertion: if I declare that it is historically and in fact, untrue. It is not true that in England, during the period which terminated at the adoption of what is termed the Free-trade policy, the fostering of her great industries or manufactures which were fostered by the Government with all the ability that was within the competence of the Government—which were fostered by heavy protective duties, in many instances by actual prohibition of imports—which were fostered by export bounties, and in every other possible way—it was not true, I say, that the success of the manufacturing industry was brought about at the expense of the mining industry or of the agricultural industry or of any other great industry of that country. But it is true, contrary to the assumption—the false assumption unsupported by proof—made in the hon. the Premier's proposition that during all that period of the growth under the fostering care of the Government of the manufactures in England, and in consequence of that growth and by reason of it, agriculture prospered more than it had ever done before. It is equally true that commerce then prospered there more than it had ever done before. It is equally true that the mining industry prospered more than it had ever done before, and that all the great industries of the country then prospered there more than they had ever done before, notwithstanding the assumption of the hon. gentleman to the contrary; yet upon that assumption the hon. gentleman has chosen to risk the fortunes of his political party in this country; for that is the very basis and essence of the policy to which the hon. the Finance Minister pledges his adhesion. I will take another instance: Nor is it true as to France, where the special industries of the country have been nurtured by the Government, where they have been protected by the Government, and been brought to a degree of perfection and excellence unequalled in the world—that the fostering care of the Government, in creating these industries, has resulted in the destruction of other industries. I maintain that agriculture and all the other industries in France, as in England, have grown concurrently with the growth of the manufacturing industries, and have kept pace with them. If France has risen from her ashes like the phoenix, after the late war, and stands out before the world a marvel of recuperative energy, it is for the very reason that, by a continuous policy of that kind, the farmers of that country had been able to hoard their savings, in large sums, which they were able to give to the Government in its hour of need, thus redeeming the honour of France, and saving the credit of France, and vindicating the integrity of France, notwithstanding the great blow that had almost stricken her to the earth. If we apply that rule to England, it is historically untrue; and if we apply it to France, it is historically untrue. If, also, we apply it to Germany, to Russia, to the United States, to any other country where the system had been wrought out, we will find that it is historically untrue. This was assertion against assertion, but I will give proofs. I will go further. I will give proofs of industries that have flourished, that have admittedly flourished, that have been built up by a protective policy, and have been of inestimable advantage to the country in which they existed. I beg to refer the hon. the Premier, for an instance, in confirmation of this view and to the overthrow of the hon. gentleman's own view, to the beet-root sugar industry of France and Germany. I will hardly venture to attempt to prove a fact in refutation of a principle so emphatically, not to say dogmatically, laid down, and rest upon any other than recognised Free-trade authorities. I will cite an authority which the hon. gentleman and every Free-trader will recognise as being a good one—the works of J.R. McCulloch, who was as keen a Free-trader as the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Mills) himself. This was his statement with regard to beet-root sugar. This gentleman would not be disputed as a Free-trade authority; he was sound; he was Gospel in this respect:—

“It began in France during the exclusion of colonial products in the reign of Napoleon, and received a severe check at the return of peace by the admission of West India sugars at a reasonable duty. It is probable, indeed, that it would long since have been entirely extinguished but for the addition made to the duties on colonial and foreign sugars in 1820 and 1822. After the last mentioned epoch between the production of beet-root sugar began rapidly to increase, and such was its progress that though in 1826 its produce did not exceed four millions of kilogrammes, it amounted in 1838 to more than thirty-nine millions of kilogrammes.”

MR. COLBY.

Mr. McCulloch, a Free-trade authority tells us that this industry was planted in Protection; that it would have died out early, and was dying out after Napoleon's policy had passed away, owing to the Free-trade ideas that were in vogue after that time—but for another measure of Protection which revived its drooping life. Let us see something further about the history of that industry. The first great impulse it had received was by means of Protection under the first Napoleon, and the final impulse which resulted in its assured success took place in the days of Louis Napoleon, in 1857. I will now quote from an official return which, I think, may be depended upon as correct:

“In 1857, the product of sugar was nearly 40,000 tons. About this time, Napoleon the Third turned his attention to this subject; its protection was secured, and the following results were obtained by protection:—in 1862, 170,000 tons of sugar were made in France; in 1868, 275,000 tons; in 1873, 396,000 tons; in 1876, 462,000 tons, or an increase of 125 fold.”

MR. MILLS: What amount of Protection was given?

MR. COLBY: I cannot, at this moment, state the percentage, but it was sufficient to accomplish the purpose as a strict measure of Protection. It was deemed and recognized as being high—in fact as an advance upon the Protection to which Mr. McCulloch referred. I will give McCulloch again in a moment, with regard to the effect of Protection on this industry, but in the meantime will quote from another high authority:—

“In 1870-76, France produced as much as 462,000 tons of beet sugar annually. Yet she imported about 200,000 tons annually of cane and other sugars. And she so regulated her tariff as to do a refining business in foreign sugars as well as to produce and refine sugars of her own. The whole is refined in France, is 225,000 tons are annually consumed and the balance of about 437,000 tons is exported. The carrying trade in sugar alone, through proper protection to this home industry, has therefore increased in 46 years from 35,000 tons to 862,000 tons, this is counting the importation and exportation of sugar, added to the local consumption. To this enormous trade thus created must be added the consumption of two million tons of coal required for the manufacture of beet sugar alone, besides the innumerable benefits to commerce and still greater benefits to agriculture obtained by the creation of such a stupendous industry. In fact it is well ascertained that France would never have survived from the disasters of her late war had it not been for the immense agricultural wealth created and hoarded all over the country either through its beet sugar factories or its wine culture."

I will now quote again from Mr. McCulloch, and perhaps the hon. the Premier will be able to reconcile it with his assumption to the contrary :

"Hence it would appear that what was long considered as a sort of exotic industry, introduced when colonial sugar was excluded from the continent, and depending in great measure on Custom-house Regulations, will probably become a well established, leading industrial pursuit."

Here was the case of an exotic industry planted in Protection, created and maintained and preserved by Protection, which had become on the admission of a recognized Free-trade authority, a well established leading industrial pursuit. I think the House may consider this a pretty fair refutation of the assertion that one trade is necessarily fostered at the expense of some other trade. Indeed we need not go so far as France to find other evidences. We have had evidences in our own country. We have the boot and shoe industry, which was one of the industries favoured by a larger amount of Protection than any other industry at that time, except one, I believe, and the object of this high protection was to create this industry and give it a foothold in Canada. What has been the result? This—that we now have a boot and shoe industry of great importance in Canada as the result of that Protective measure. An industry of great magnitude and great usefulness has thus grown up in this country, under and as the direct result, of Protection. It has grown to such dimensions, that, according to the statement of the hon. member for North York, and also to the statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk, the other evening, boots and shoes are now made in Canada to such an extent that Canada, in this respect, controls her own market, and fears no competition from abroad. True, it was said that a few were brought in, but these were kinds that are not manufactured or much required in this country. Here was an industry that had been planted in Protection. It had grown up in Protection, and it had succeeded, through Protection. I ask any practical man in this House—and they all know something about leather, as they all wear boots and shoes—if any gentleman could claim that this industry has been built up at the expense of any other industry in this country? Is it not true that boots and shoes are as cheap in this country as could be reasonably asked? We are told that if Protection was entirely removed—if we had Free-trade in this matter—our manufacture is of such excellence, and such cheapness, that it would not be injured by the free importation of American boots and shoes. Then, if that were the fact, this result had not been injurious to the community; but, on the contrary, had it not been beneficial? Had it not done another thing, besides cheapening the price? Were not other industries created by it? Look at the manufacture of leather, the tanning of leather has grown up side by side with it, as a sister industry, and what did this involve? It involved a benefit to the farmer; it involved the purchase of an article that is only marketable and only has a value for tanning purposes, that is the bark that grows on the hemlock tree. It furnishes the farmer with a market for his hides; it furnishes work for a large number of men, and profitable employment for capital. The boot and shoe business also furnishes employment for many persons. Will any gentleman in this House, then, assert that the Protective duty of 25 per cent., which has built this industry, has not benefited the consumer and the farmer, and every other person in this country, either directly or indirectly? But I will not dwell longer upon this. I have endeavoured to make it clear that this assumption, which is the chief cornerstone of the Free-trade edifice, is historically untrue. But, whether true or false, it is in direct opposition to that policy under which this country attained its greatest prosperity. It is in practical opposition to the policy of the hon. the Premier himself, which he has carried out during the whole period of his tenure of office. We are told by the hon. the Minister of Finance that people could not be enriched by being taxed. I would draw the attention of the Government to the canal policy of this country. Now, what did it mean? We have been expending millions upon millions year after year; we have been taxing the ratepayers of this country; we have been issuing bonds and imposing burdens upon the people that will not be wiped off till a very remote period of Canadian history, in order to divert and control the carrying trade of the West. Still that policy has been vindicated by all the public men of this country, and by no gentleman more effectively and sincerely than by the hon. the Premier himself. Now, what did that policy mean? What did we desire to attain by it? If I understand it right, it is a policy intended to foster and promote the great commercial industries of this country, and by artificial means to direct the trade of the great West of the United States, through Canadian channels, in order that Canadian commerce may have the benefit thereof. Now, if that is not a policy of Protection, I do not know what Protection means; and if that is not done by taxing the people, I do not know what taxation means. If, therefore, this enormous expense for canals does not enrich the country, then the hon. the Premier has to account for a heavy sin to the people of this country, for having taken money out of their pockets and piled up a huge national debt without doing the nation any service. That policy, though a Protective one to the great commercial industries of this country, is consistently or inconsistently justified by every Free-trade member of this House. Why did we build our harbours, our lighthouses and our piers away down the coast? We did so for the purpose of fostering and protecting the commerce of this country. We did so to afford protection to the lives and property of our fishermen, and to foster the fishing industry. The whole policy of the Public Works of this country is essentially a protective one; and if it is a wrong policy, then we have been doing a great injustice to the people. Why, again, do we exempt from taxation those articles required for the manufacture of ships, down on the seaboard? We do it in order to protect this branch of industry, for protection may be given as effectively by a system of exemptions from duty as in any other manner. When, therefore, our opponents characterise our policy as being an obsolete, ignorant and barbarous one, they are laying themselves open to self-condemnation, for they have been legislating in that direction ever since they took office. Some light as to the future policy of the Government has been given in a portion of the speech of the hon. the Finance Minister, to which I will now refer. The Finance Minister explained the mode by which revenue should be raised for the public service in terms which are clear and unmistakable. He said that taxation, however disguised, is a loss per se; that it is the duty of the Government to take only from the people what is necessary to the proper discharge of the public service, and that taxation in any other mode is simply, in one shape or other, "legalized robbery." The proposition was clearly stated, and, of course, has a distinct and definite meaning. That meaning is: that duties should invariably be imposed for revenue alone; that no other consideration than the bare question of revenue should determine the mode of raising revenue; that whenever a Customs duty is in the slightest degree protective, and by reason of the protection it gave, takes from the people indirectly any money which does not go into the Treasury, it is to that extent "legalized robbery." In vindication of this position, which subverts the whole system of incidental protection, he declares that he and his associates are willing to fight to the death. The views of the hon. the Finance Minister are laid down in an eminent Free-trade work, no less an authority, indeed, than John Stuart Mill, who expressed the following opinions, which, no doubt, would be listened to with gratification by gentlemen who entertain his views:—

"In countries in which the Protection theory is declining, but not yet given up, such as the United States, a doctrine has come into notice which is a sort of compromise between Free-trade and restriction, namely, that Protection for protection's sake is improper, but that there is nothing objectionable in having as much Protection as may incidentally result from a tariff framed solely for revenue. Even in England, regret is sometimes expressed that a 'moderate fixed duty' was not preserved on corn, on account of the revenue it would yield. Independently, however, of the general implicity of taxes on the necessaries of life, this doctrine overlooks the fact, that revenue is received only on the quantity imported, but that the tax is paid on the entire quantity consumed. To make the public pay much that the Treasury may receive a little, is not an eligible mode of obtaining a revenue. In the case of manufactured articles, the doctrine involves a practical inconsistency. The object of the duty as a means of revenue is inconsistent with its affording, even incidentally, any protection. It can only operate as protection in so far as it prevents importation; and to whatever degree it prevents importation, it affords no revenue."

From their manifestations of assent, I understand that both the Finance Minister and the hon. the Minister of the Interior accept the foregoing extract from Mill's Political Economy as explanatory of the position for which they are willing to fight to the death. Now, if they took a high authority to assist them in making a diagnosis, Ministers should have confidence in the same authority with regard to the remedy to be applied. I will, therefore, again quote from John Stuart Mill:

"Customs duties are, ceteris paribus, much less objectionable than Excise; but they must be laid only on things which either cannot, or at least will not, be produced in the country itself; or else their production there must be prohibited (as in England is the case with tobacco), or subjected to an Excise duty of equivalent amount."

If, therefore, after what has been stated by Mr. Mill, we impose duties on any article manufactured in Canada, we must do one of two things; we must either prohibit the manufacture of certain articles in the country, or put on an Excise duty equal to the Customs duty imposed upon the same. My hon. friend may try to get out of that dilemma by asserting that revenue could not be raised in this way. I tell my hon. friend that he could do it in that way. He could reduce the Customs duties one-half, put on an equal amount of excise duty on articles manufactured in this country, and thus secure about an equal amount of revenue. Of goods paying 17½ per cent. there are imported into this country $35,000,000 worth; on that the Government received 17½ per cent. But there are goods manufactured in this country to the value of $221,000,000. Those would not all be of the class covered by the 17½ per cent. list; but I assume, and no gentleman versed in these matters would dispute the correctness of the estimate, that one-fifth of the entire manufactures of this country, represented in the census returns of 1871, would come under the 17½ per cent. list. That would be $40,000,000. Would not my hon. friend the Minister of Finance get as much revenue by imposing one-half of the 17½ per cent. Customs on the $35,000,000, and the other half as Excise duty on the $40,000,000, as if he imposed the whole on the $35,000,000? We have many articles upon the free list which might be taxed on Free-trade principles. There are many articles upon which we pay a specific duty which are not produced in this country, upon which it could be made out to the satisfaction of every hon. gentleman that there is ample opportunity to levy taxation upon Free-trade principles—taxation which should have the blessed result of not giving Protection to one industry in this country,—and that is the logical result of the principles which hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches ask the country to accept with favour though it will involve the loss of millions of dollars now invested—and as my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) claimed, prosperously invested—in the industries of the country. I do not approve of such a method of raising the revenue. I protest against it. I say it would ruin the country. But it is the method which should be adopted, if the Finance Minister's reasoning is sound, and there is no insurmountable difficulty in the way of carrying it out. Hon. gentlemen must do this or they must accept the alternative, which is: that this is election talk; that they do not mean it; that it is a very good thing to say in Nova Scotia, where there are Free-traders. But in that case they are insincere; they do not mean what they say. Then all this big talk is mere brag; it means nothing; if it does mean anything they would cut down, by one fell blow, every industry which has any start in this country. Otherwise it is mere buncombe. I do them the credit of believing that the hon. the Minister of the Interior is as honest a Free-trader as ever broke the bread of life—from John Stuart Mill, or any other sound authority on that doctrine. The hon. gentleman believes the doctrine, and I think the hon. the Minister of Finance believes it also, and will carry it into effect if the country gives him the opportunity. Now, the Government has invited this country—a new community—to embark upon the sea of experiment. No two nations in the world have ever accepted this view. I am quite willing to admit that, among the doctrinaires of Free-trade, there are many able, intellectual men—men of sharp, bright intellect—who have thought out this question very thoroughly. I do not underrate them. They are called theorists, and properly so, because their views at present are theories; they have not been tried, but they are very able and acute men who were preaching the doctrine in these days. Tyndal and Darwin were able and acute men—none more so—but I am not prepared to accept their views simply on the ground of their acuteness and ability. Swedenbourg, Fourier, and others were acute men. Many of them were like the inventor of perpetual motion, who explained his theory to savans. The theory seemed all right, and it was a long time before any one could find out the error in his calculations. They went over his figures and tried them several times; at last some one blundered upon the fact that he had omitted the element of friction in his calculations—a very important thing to omit, as all must admit. In the same way, there may be something lacking in the calculation of these gentlemen. It is claimed that Free-trade is the adopted theory in England, and very great capital is made from that. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior nodded very approvingly when I said that Free-trade was claimed by the Free-trade schools generally, as the rule of the commercial policy of England. Now, if the commercial policy of England is Free-trade, I do not understand the meaning of terms. It is not Free-trade in the sense of being reciprocal trade with any other country. I believe that this boasted Free-trade of England, of which we have heard so much, is the most ingenious, the most thorough, and the most effective system of Protection that ever was initiated on the face of the earth.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. COLBY: Yes, it is protective, and I will endeavour to convince my sceptical friends that it is an effective system of Protection, and as such designed to protect and foster the manufacturing industries of England and to give them the supremacy of the world. When and why was the present system in England introduced, and how has it worked out its results? England never dreamed of Free-trade—although Adam Smith had taught and written about it, and others, his disciples, had advocated it—until she had built up manufacturing industries which were so efficient that they supplied the entire home market, so that no foreign nation could go into England and compete with her on her own ground. Then she wanted to go abroad and monopolize the markets of the world. If she wanted to protect an industry, how could she do it? Not by the imposition of further duties, because that would not amount to anything. If a Chinese wall had been built around England, it would hardly have given additional protection, because no other nation could compete with her in her own market. How, then, could she protect her industries? She could not do it by the imposition of high tariffs, because they would be nugatory; but she did it by reducing the cost to the manufacturer, by taking off the duties on the raw material and on the food, so that labour and raw material would become cheaper; and to that fostering policy her manufacturers were indebted for their present position. I maintain that the removal of duties from raw material, and the imposition of Customs duties upon manufactured products, are equally measures of Protection. When the Protectionists were asking the Finance Minister to protect the sugar interest in this country—when they represented that it was on the verge of peril, unless the Government did something for its relief—they told the Government that this might be done in one of two ways, either by a higher duty on refined sugar, or by reducing the duty on raw material. Either of those means was Protective, and the latter method would have given that industry the greatest advantage it could have in competition with the markets of the world. The great object should be to foster and protect our industries, and to give them every advantage which the Legislature of the country could possibly afford them. The vaunted Free-trade policy of England is essentially a selfish policy. I do not say that offensively, but it is a national policy in the interests of the nation and designed to give her supremacy in manufactures and commerce all over the world—designed to foster and protect and build the great dominant industry of the world. The Legislature did all that it could do. They did not say that legislatures were helpless, that they could not do anything to help them, that they were flies on the wheel, but they met the condition squarely in the face and said that by legislation they could help this industry, give it an advantage in the world, and lighten the burdens that rested on it. That was what England, in her wisdom, had done from national considerations; from the same principles that prompted us to endeavour to build up our industries by legislation. Those interested in the sugar trade would have been content if the hon. the Finance Minister had taken a lesson in Protection from England's policy, and lessened the duties on their raw materials, and thereby saved them and the country from the loss of an important industry. Sugar refining is the key to a trade with the West Indies in our manufactures, lumber, and farm products, and the blow which struck it down inflicted a serious injury upon these other interests as well. When England adopted this policy of so-called Free-trade, she had already got as far as she could in the other direction. We know that before 1842 the policy of England had been a most rigidly Protective one. She had even gone the length of prohibiting the exportation of machinery. Prohibition of machinery for the manufacture of flax had been continued long after the passage of the Free-trade

Acts. I said it was not in the power of England to assist those industries by the imposition of duties, because she already had control of her own markets. In 1842, the date of the first tariff reform measure, the total amount of customs revenue derived from articles manufactured in England was less than seven and a-half per cent. of the total duties levied by Customs, so that the importation of articles coming into competition with English manufactures in the home market was practically of no consequence whatever to the English manufacturers, as a class. I except the duties upon silk goods, concerning which I will speak in a moment. The imposition of higher Customs duties would therefore have done the manufacturers very little good, even if duties had been prohibitory. The first of the so-called Free-trade Acts was that of Sir Robert Peel, in 1842. It was followed by further legislation in 1845 and 1846, and again by Mr. Gladstone in 1853. Was England a Free-trade nation, influenced by Free-trade considerations? As late as 1853, eleven years after the country was supposed to have embarked on a Free-trade policy, Mr. Gladstone refused to take off the duties on silk, because he would not cause distress among the operatives in the silk industry. There was a howl all over the world. England was preaching Free-trade for the United States and France, and those countries asked why, if Free-trade was so wise a policy, the English Government retained a duty of 15 per cent. on silk. But they adhered to it even after they had been deided by the world; Mr. Gladstone adhered to it in 1853, and it was not until later that England took the duty from the only article really protected by her tariff, namely silk. This was the only article in which English manufacturers had competition. The effect of the removal of the duties on silk was that, while the importations in 1860 were 16 millions; in 1861 they ran up to '8 millions, and have since reached 60 millions yearly. The removal of the duties brought disaster. The home market was flooded with foreign silks, numerous manufacturers of silk failed, thousands of silk operatives were thrown out of employment, and that once prosperous industry was largely prostrated. That was the record of England as a Free-trade country. Having spoken of England, I desire to say a few words regarding our neighbours across the line and the policy they have adopted; but before doing so, I will take the opportunity of referring to some observations that have been made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). In 1876 that hon. gentleman made a speech in the House on the tariff question, and it is no flattery to the hon. member to say that no member has given to that important question more careful study than the hon. gentleman, and that no hon. member, either as a special student of the subject or as a practical business man, is more competent to arrive at a correct conclusion. The propositions laid down by him in that address were the result of thought and study, and they were, I believe, the honest conclusions of that hon. member at that time. We have the best reason to think they were his honest and deliberate opinions, for in expressing them he placed himself in antagonism to the Government which he supported. In 1877 that hon. gentleman made another speech from directly the opposite standpoint. The speech to which the House had listened this Session was not the first Free-trade speech which the hon. member has made. In an address last Session, he expressed practically the same views which he enunciated and expounded with such ability a few evenings since. Between the Sessions of 1876 and 1877 that gentleman's views upon a question with which he had been familiar for many years, and which he had made a special study, changed to the right-about, and from being an intelligent Protectionist, as he was in 1876, he became an ardent Free-trader in 1877. I would be the last to question any one's undoubted right to change his opinions upon any question, however much he might have considered it. The hon. member for North Norfolk justified his change of position by a comparison which hon. members who heard it would remember. The hon. gentleman said the child was told by its nurse that the moon is made of green cheese, and believed it; that when the child grew to be a man he knew the moon was not made of green cheese, for he judged for himself. If that illustration has any point or meaning, the hon. member desired the House to believe that in 1876 he was in the green cheese period, and in 1877 the maggot in the cheese had by some miracle changed into a butterfly that was ranging the heavens; that the scales dropped from his eyes between 1876 and 1877, and whether on his way to Damascus or not we are not informed, and what had appeared to be green cheese in 1876 he could discern clearly by a different vision to be the moon in 1877. He could not only tell us the moon was not made of green cheese, but he could count the inhabitants, and give us statistical data concerning the industries, trades, occupations, and all the domestic affairs in that distant planet. That being the hon. gentleman's explanation, I suppose the House will, in a parliamentary sense, be bound to accept it, and to believe that he was under lunar influence when he favoured us with that formidable array of figures. But I will not so far disparage the intelligence of the hon. member as to think that he desired the House to believe that in so short a period of time, from a well-grounded and thorough Protectionist, he had entirely changed his whole views and become a settled and confirmed Free-trader. I am sure the hon. member would not desire that the House should have such a contemptible opinion of his judgment as to suppose that in that short space of time he had entirely changed the settled opinions and convictions which had grown with his growth and strengthened with his strength, and which were honestly entertained when he made his speech in 1876. The hon. gentleman was not a silent Protectionist then. There was no one so active in promulgating his views, none so active in promoting the Committee relating to depressed industries moved by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood) and making it a success. Hon. members cannot show such contempt for his judgment as to suppose that in such short time, whether by miracle or otherwise, that the scales fell from his eyes, so that he saw things entirely different from what he had done before that date. The hon. member found himself placed in the same position in which other men had found themselves before to-day. He was in the position of Alexander H. Stephens, when in 1861, in Georgia, he made that very memorable and eloquent speech denouncing secession, and brought the whole weight of his ability and eloquence upon the people of his State, to keep them from joining the secession movement; but the moment that movement was determined upon, he, who had fought so strenuously against secession, felt it to be his duty to the party of secession to draw the sword in favour of the party and against the country, to accept the Vice-Presidency of the Confederacy, and to give all the weight of his eloquence and influence to a cause which he had just previously denounced. It is a bad position for the hon. member from North Norfolk to occupy, yet, bad as it is, self-condemnatory as it is, it is a position he has deliberately chosen, as did the distinguished gentleman referred to. The hon. member, no doubt, felt, although his action was grossly inconsistent, it was still preferable to the unenviable position occupied by the hon. members from Hamilton and other Protectionist supporters of the Government, from whom he felt it at that time his duty to sever himself. If he was to serve his party at all hazards, he determined he would serve it in the livery of his party, and that he would sail under his true colours, and take the consequences of that first break, and he has done so. The hon. member having accepted that position, we might expect from him that extraordinary zeal and fervour usually characteristic of new converts; and he has given marked evidences of it. I do not desire, and would not if I could, follow that hon. gentleman through the mass of figures which he prepared with such care and labour, during many weeks and months of industry, to illustrate the point he desired to make, but will say, if there ever was a specious, ingenious and labourious piece of special pleading, the figures which that hon. member had massed together and directed to a particular end, was a most noticeable instance. What was the character of the figures which the hon. member for North Norfolk gave to the House? I assume for the moment that the figures are all correct. The hon. gentleman, although he told the House in 1876 that Protection was beneficial to a whole country, and especially to the agricultural interests, found it necessary, inasmuch as that was a very potent interest, to reconsider and reverse his views upon that question. The hon. gentleman attempted to convince the House and the country that agriculture had been unprosperous in the United States by reason of the high Protective duties which had been adopted there. And how did he test it? That is one of the points respecting which I will show that the hon. member, by the system of special pleading which he adopted, had attempted, I will not say unfairly, but ingeniously, to steal a favourable verdict from the House and country. How did he attempt to make the point that the farmers had been injured by the Protective policy of the United States? Did he give instances of sales of farm products during that period? No. He made the quantity of products exported from the country a test of the prosperity within the country, not stating any particulars as to the prices—a fact of which he seems to think is of no importance. What period did the hon. member select in order to convince the House and the country that agriculturists had been unprosperous in the United States, for the reason that their exports were less during the Protection than during the Free-trade period? He selected the period from 1860 to 1870. Has hon. members no recollection of what occurred in the United States from 1860 to 1870? Does the hon. gentleman think that hon. members in the House and the people in the country have forgotten that during that decade there had been a civil war in the United States? Does he think they have forgotten that during part of that period the cotton export, which formed the principal article of general export had been almost nil? Does he forget there was a desolate South, and that instead of billions of pounds of cotton being exported, only six million pounds were exported, for instance, in the year 1863, and that it dropped to an ininfinitesimal amount? Does he forget that for years and years the great productive region for exports par excellence, the exporting region of the entire Union, was desolate and blotted out entirely as an exporting section? Does he forget, further, that not only did the exports of the great staple cotton practically cease, but when the war terminated there was a desolate country in the South, and that for years afterwards the agricultural products of the West, the wheat and Indian corn of the Western States, had to be sent into that poverty-stricken and starving country to feed the people, and that much of the corn which, in its natural course, would seek the European market, was taken down to feed the South? Does the hon. member forget the great waste and destruction of war, and the destitution caused by one million men being taken from the industries of the country? Does the hon. gentleman forget that during that period the waste was far in excess of the actual consumption? And yet he attempts to make the House and the country believe that the decline of exports during that decade showed the extent to which agriculture has been injured in the United States by Protection. The hon. gentleman was fully aware when giving those figures to the House, that if he had taken another decade, reaching past some of those disastrous years, it would have told an entirely different story. He well knew that in 1867 the exports of the United States were $41,046,034, and ran up in the following nine years of the Protectionist period, until it reached $75,899,008 in 1876, and that the imports of British home produce into the United States decreased from $21,825,703 in 1867 to $16,833,517 in 1876. Did he not know that during the whole decennial period from 1867 to 1876, the exports from the United States to Great Britain increased at the rate of 85 per cent., while the imports of British home produce to the United States, though never above half the value of the exports, decreased at the rate of 25 per cent? These are facts which should fairly have been stated, if the exports were to be considered a test. Yet the hon. member for North Norfolk desired to steal a favourable verdict from the House by entirely ignoring those facts and returns, and simply stating the ordinary statistics for the decade from 1860 to 1870, without calling attention to the abnormal condition of that period. If the returns proved anything it was that the exports had increased 85 per cent. and the imports diminished 25 per cent. during ten years of high Protection. This is the logic of facts, but it does not suit the hon. member for North Norfolk. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Macdonald) in a speech which was very much admired for the clearness with which he made his points, declared that Canadians were suffering from depression in consequence of the diminution of the circulation. That because the discounts had diminished in two or three years 10 per cent., this shrinkage of currency produced such a startling effect on the country as to account, in the hon. member's mind, for much of the depression. But did hon. gentlemen, when considering the question of Protection across the lines, speak in that manner? Did they attribute the present condition of the United States to the expansion of circulation and discounts, the creation of an irredeemable currency, the era of inflation and high prices and of speculation, of madness, I might say, the direct result of that most inordinate overissue and the consequent depression that must naturally be felt in returning to the normal condition? All the ills that have befallen Canada could be accounted for on that theory; but when they come to consider the troubles that have befallen the United States, it was Protection alone that had brought all ills upon that country. Speaking of the United States, we have heard highly coloured accounts from several hon. gentlemen as to the condition of the industries of that country. The hon. the Finance Minister read to the House the other day from a document signed by the Governor of the State of New York about the great distress; it was full of glittering generalities. Now, if I did not think I was able to throw some light on the condition of the industries of the United States, by reading what I am about to read, I would not trouble the House to listen, but I have information from a source which all will recognise as trustworthy. Massachusetts is the leading manufacturing State in that country, and the highest functionary in that State, Governor Rice, in his official address to the Legislature of that State, last month, gave an explanation concerning the condition of manufactures based upon official returns. We have heard of the depression in that country, of the wild lawlessness, of the lurid fires of Pittsburg; and an hon. gentleman has described a pandemonium and pictured hell on the four walls of this building for our edification, as illustrating the condition of this United States. But what said this sober-minded Governor concerning the actual condition of the manufacturing industries of his State? This is not a highly-coloured picture, but a statement of pure facts. The Governor said:

“By the result of an investigation just closed, undertaken by the Bureau of Statistics, of labour in cities and towns producing eighty-six per cent. of the whole products of the State, we are able to make an excellent comparison of the condition of our large industries in 1877 with that of 1875. In all, there has been a decrease of an average of about nine per cent. in the wages paid; but there has been an increase of working time in days. The paper made, shows an increase of nineteen days over the working time in 1875; the manufacture of worsted goods, twenty-seven days; and in the manufacture of cordage, cotton goods, carriages, straw goods, carpetings and wool hats, an increase of working time has been made; while in boots and shoes, leather and agricultural implements, there has been neither improvement nor decrease. In the manufacture of machinery, whips, musical instruments, and woollen goods, a slight decrease in working time is reported. The great industries of carpetings, paper, woollen goods, worsted goods, cigars, boots and shoes, cotton goods, leather and metallic goods report an increase of the number of hands employed, ranging from one to thirty-five per cent. over the number of 1875; while a few of the establishments report a slight falling off in the number of persons employed. On a gold basis, the value of products from the manufacture of hats, carpetings, straw goods, cordage, paper, worsted goods, whips, cigars, boots and shoes, cotton goods, leather, musical instruments and metallic goods, has increased from five per cent. to thirty-six per cent. over the products of 1875; while but a few industries show a falling off. In nearly all, there has been an increase in the quantity of goods made; but depreciation in prices, in some instances, places the value of products on the minus side of the account instead of on the plus side, where they belong when considered as to quantity. The results of the investigation lead to belief that there are no great number of mechanics wholly out of employment, and that our industries are steadily working back to the condition they were in, prior to the panic of 1873.”

Now, that is a calm and reliable statement, showing that the country is gradually and safely settling back to its normal condition. I am inclined to believe this statement of Governor Rice. It is based upon facts and returns brought in, and made before a number of manufacturers who were able to refute him had he spoken in a tone of exaggeration. I must protest against the introduction into this debate of arguments attributing the whole depression of the United States to the system of Protection. The other abnormal conditions are such that no reliable data could be given showing the actual effects of Protection. If we accept that proposition, we would wipe out the results of all the labour and industry which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) has put forth in order to make out his little special case before this House. If we accept that proposition, the hon. gentleman's papers are utterly valueless; they are just so much waste paper, and the days and nights he expended in accumulating them have been in vain. I do not expect the House to receive this proposition upon my individual dictum; but I have a high authority to support it. I give as an authority the name of J. E. Cairnes, M.A., late Professor of Political Economy in University College, London, who, although seeking to establish, by his book, the principles of Free-trade, disdained to make use of arguments similar to those the hon. gentleman uses, and he repudiated their use most emphatically. The Professor said:

“And here we are confronted at once with the difficulty of interpreting an industrial experiment. The system of American Protection, in its present exaggerated form, may be regarded as dating from 1861, when the Morrill tariff became law. If all the other conditions of the case had remained substantially the same since that time, we might now, by a mere inspection of results, pronounce without hesitation on the effect of the policy then inaugurated; but instead of this observe how the facts stand. In the same year the great Civil War commenced, in the course of which the destruction of human life, and of wealth in every form, probably exceeded anything which had before occurred within the same time, in the history of human affairs. This was soon followed by the creation of an immense national debt, entailing a large permanent increase of taxation, and by the issue of an incontrovertible paper currency, circulating throughout the Union, and affecting alike prices and wages in every branch of trade. On the other hand, occurrences of a very different kind marked the course of the period under review; mineral resources were discovered, which are now yielding vast wealth, and oil springs, which have become the source of an entirely new and rapidly increasing trade. Railway enterprise, again, during the same time, appears to have taken on a new activity, whilst the progress of invention in the mechanical arts has never for a moment flagged. In presence of influences so numerous, so novel, and so vast, each affecting industry in its own fashion so powerfully, who shall say what portion of what we now find existing can properly be attributed to any one of them? The problem in its mere statement, brings into striking relief the utter futility of that so-called 'inductive method,' which some writers hold to be the proper one in social and economic enquiries—the method, that is to say, which would proceed by drawing general conclusions as to the operation of particular causes from the summarized results of statistical tables."

The Professor protested against the fallacy of the method used by my hon. friend because there were so many conditions to derange it. The propositions my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) has adopted here, and just put before the House he (Cairns) declares to be entirely fallacious and unreliable as arguments. He went on to say :

"For, assuming that we have taken accurate stock of the present industrial condition of the United States, as well as of that which was in existence previous to 1861—so long as we confine our view to the mere statistical aspect of the case, what warrant have we for attributing any portion of the change that has taken place to one cause rather than to another. Manifestly we have none."

The ingenious compilation of my hon. friend does not prove a single point which he desires to prove. His statistical data, according to the high authority of Professor Cairns, were unquestionably not entitled to weight. We may attempt to measure and weigh and estimate the forces which have been at work in the United States since 1861, but if we are candid we will confess that they are so conflicting, diverse and varying that no human mind can grasp them all and extract a satisfactory conclusion. According to this high Free-trade authority, Professor Cairns, my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton's) summarized statistical data are not entitled to any weight whatever, as tending to prove what he, in his new-born zeal, desires to prove. It is impossible to attribute the condition of that country to any one cause. Thus much concerning the hon. gentleman's statistics taken from the United States. If the House will bear with me I will show equal ground of complaint as to his unfairness in dealing with Canadian statistics. The hon. gentleman came before us with a budget of letters which he did not read, except two—the contents of which we have not seen—but the substance of which the hon. gentleman might have fairly stated. The hon. gentleman said he had written a number of letters to manufacturers enquiring what they thought of the state of trade and he had twenty-one answers. He also informed us that he had written a number of letters to which he had received no reply. Well, on a point of this kind, the man whose business is unprosperous would not be likely to reply and expose the condition of that business, and the hon. gentleman might have calculated upon this in sending out the letters. Not every man cares to expose the state of his business in these critical times, and for aught the hon. gentleman has told us, he might have sent three or four hundred letters to which he had received no replies. He did not state that any one of these letters had been sent to the Province of Quebec. I do not know any manufacturer in that Province who could have given information that either he or any of his neighbours are in a prosperous condition. There might be such a rara avis there, but I would not know where to look for him. I notice that about half of these replies sent to the hon. gentleman were from manufacturers of agricultural implements. Just look at the unfairness of his conclusions, and see how Protection was illustrated in the condition of the agricultural implement manufactures of Western Canada. What is Protection? It is merely the preservation of the home market for the home manufacturer. Now, Protection, that is the preservation of the home market to the home manufacturer, may be the result of tariff legislation, or it may be the result of any accidental cause which produces the same practical effect. We had pretty fair Protection, as against the American manufacturer, from 1862 to 1872, owing entirely to unusual causes, with which the tariff had nothing to do. I believe my hon. friend is acquainted with the fact that the over-production in American manufactures has not occurred in the agricultural implement branch. I am sure the House will be surprised to learn that a leading American manufacturer has stated that no less than 100,000 new harvesting machines per year are required to replace old worn-out machines. There have been such great improvements in reapers and harvesting machines of late that new machines are purchased before the old ones are worn out. There is a manufactory in the State of New York, not very far from Upper Canada, where something like 25,000 machines are made a year; and another manufactory in which 15,000 are made a year; and others in which 10,000, 12,000 and 15,000 are made each year, and yet altogether they have not been able to keep up with the demand in the home market for these implements. They did not send their machines to Canada, and why? because they had better markets there and their own price. Thus the agricultural implement manufacturers here are in a situation precisely similar to that which existed during the American war in regard to all our manufactures. These manufacturers, and certain foundry men, from several of whom replies had been read, had a de facto Protection in Canada, because their rivals in the United States at present have an ample field in their own markets and in new markets which have been established in England and on the continent of Europe for a certain class of reapers and mowers that are made in the United States. I can tell my hon. friend this: that whenever the consumption overtakes the production in the United States, Mr. Noxon had better look out for his business. That gentleman would not be coming to this Legislature and saying he had Protection enough when implements made by the manufacturers in the United States, who made 25,000 machines a year, and who had systematized his business by a division of labour so that he could make these machines at the slightest possible cost, giving to every man a particular department of work to do, came in here to compete with him (Mr. Noxon) in Canada in this class of implements. He would then find that a Protection of 17½ per cent. was nowhere; and that the United States manufacturer with his larger capital, larger experience, his more skilled hands, with all the facilities he has for manufacturing, and for doing a larger business, would override a 17½ per cent. duty as if there were no duty. It would then require 30 or 33 per cent. to protect this happy Mr. Noxon, who now is contentedly enjoying his little paradise up at Oxford, having it all to himself, and contented now because he has no competition. To select that class of industries to make out a case, that there are no suffering industries in Canada, is unfair. There are suffering industries in Canada; industries that the hon. the Finance Minister once had the power to protect and the power to save from destruction, and from being overwhelmed by the unfair competition, by the unjust competition, by the slaughter prices which have been systematically thrust upon us from the United States; and the fact that the agricultural implement business and a few foundrymen in Upper Canada, who have written like letters, have not been so overwhelmed, results from reasons I have just explained, i.e., that in the United States the production has not, as yet, exceeded the consumption in that particular line or department. When the hon. gentleman selected his men to write about an industry which he knew was prosperous, and an industry which had to-day an adequate de facto protection, although not a legal protection, and desired this House and this country to draw the inference that the manufacturers of Canada were in a happy or prosperous or even a tolerable condition—he attempted a most deliberate fallacy. It was an attempt to prove what did not exist by a condition of affairs that does not truly represent or by any means represent, the general condition. I have not yet got through with the United States. While persisting in the statement I first made, corroborated by the extract read from Prof. Cairnes,—that reliable result could not be arrived at from these statistical compilations, there are yet general facts connected with the condition of affairs in the United States that have some bearing on the question we are discussing. I believe it is an historical fact that the earliest Protectionists in the States were from the South—that the cotton interest and the sugar interest of the Southern States believe that their industries would be benefitted by the imposition of duties upon cotton and upon sugar; that the effect would be the creation of manufactories in the United States which would consume those raw products, and that the earliest efforts made in the direction of protection in the United States, emanated from the Southern States. What was the result? The same social repulsion which has always existed between the two sections of that great country existed as far back as that period. The same jealousy of the North against the South and of the South against the North then existed. What was the result of the protective policy thus inaugurated by the South? The expected result was that the North would be their spinners and their weavers; and that the growing trade of the North, the commerce of the North, would be injuriously affected; that this commerce would be transferred to the South, and that the agricultural industries of the South would be built up. But what was the actual effect? A few years' experience showed them very much to their astonishment, as well as to the astonishment of the whole country, that the North was growing out of all proportion in wealth, in strength and in population, compared with the South; that it was rapidly outgrowing the South; that manufactures were springing up; that towns were becoming cities and that cities were becoming very much larger, and more wealthy, so that some cities in the North were more wealthy than some States in the South. From that moment the South changed its policy. When they discovered this, parties changed sides on that question, and thenceforward the North and New England were steadily favourable to Protection—I am now speaking broadly—while the South has been steadily opposed to it. These two ideas of Free-trade and Protection had a full exemplification in that country. It is true that the same tariff has governed both sections, but it is also true that the South has been impressed all along with the correctness of Free-trade ideas; that it has shaped its policy on Free-trade dogmas, and that it carried into effect its Free-trade beliefs; while the North, on the other hand, has been Protectionist in sentiment, has believed that the creation of great industries would directly benefit the Eastern States and indirectly prove a benefit at large, and it acted on that belief. And what had been the result? Let any one look at the condition of the North and of the South. Let any one look at the rapid accumulation of wealth in the North. Let any one look at the poverty of the South, as it was even before the war. Let any one look upon the success which has attended those sections of the country in which various industries, in which all industries have been cultivated, encouraged and promoted. And again, let any one look at other sections where the whole reliance was placed upon one industry. My hon. friend would tell me that I am unfair if I forget the element of slavery, and that this element has affected the conditions there. Doubtless, the element of slavery has, to some extent, affected these conditions, yet I have the authority of that great Free-trader, McCulloch, to the effect that under slave labour the South was able to grow more cotton and sugar and that more cheaply than it has ever been able since, or ever will be able to do by free labour, so that so far as the economical problem (saying nothing about the social or moral question) is concerned, it is believed by the highest authorities that cotton and sugar, the great staples of the South, were produced more cheaply under slave labour than they would be under free labour. Permit me to show to what views those people, the planters, the agriculturists at the South were educated, the beliefs they were taught, and the beliefs upon which they practised. One of their orators, Mr. Garnett, of Virginia, said this: it was sound Free-trade doctrine:

“I demand for American genius and industry that the shackles shall be stricken from their hands; that this absurd Chinese policy of restriction, those worn out relics of barbarism which you call protective tariffs, shall be abandoned, and American labour be left free to choose its own pursuits and to seek its own rewards throughout the wide circle of the earth. Let the people of the North follow the bent of their genius, amazing the world by their feats of mechanical skill, and covering the remotest seas with the argosies of commerce, free as the winds and boundless as the waves that bear it. We of the South prefer the most ancient of human pursuits, the tilling of the fields; we furnish the great staples of the world's exchanges, the bread that strengthens man's heart; and the fleecy cotton that clothes him. We ask no peculiar privileges, no special benefits; we only demand that you shall not tax our industry to support yours; that we shall be left free to sell and buy wherever our interest leads us.”

This was the foundation stone upon which the monarchy of King Cotton rested. They believed in King Cotton. They believed in the potency of that great agricultural staple. They believed in cotton and sugar, their great exports; they believed in Free-trade as the true fiscal policy; and this very same doctrine which had been preached, and which led to the delusion of the South, to the destruction of the South, and to the ruin of the South, is now being preached to the farmers of Ontario, who are invited to idolize King Wheat as the men of the South worshipped King Cotton. The Free-traders of this country are preaching to the farmers of Ontario that they could place their dependence upon the export of wheat and of agricultural products sent to foreign markets. Ontario farmers are being told the same sweet tale, that the orators of the South told to the growers of the sugar and the cotton in the Southern States. This was history repeating itself. Witness the desolation of the South, the inability of the South to cope with the North in the great war, and the collapse of the South; and, on the other hand, the immense resources and wealth of the North, and see how unequal the fight was. Hon. members should look on that picture to-day; one section of the country rich, one section of the country prosperous, one section of the country triumphant, while the other section of the country is blighted, the other section of the country is down-fallen and prostrate and under foot,—just by adherence to that Free-trade dogma, and carrying into practice the belief that they might depend on those great staples of export, cotton and sugar, the same as the farmers of Ontario are now being taught, that they should place their sole reliance in their wheat, in their barley, and in what they exported; and buy goods where they could buy them in the cheapest market! It is true that New England did make money—did accumulate wealth by its industries. Gentlemen in this House discussed this question as if every dollar, taken by the manufacturer was so much lost and sunk in the sea; as if every dollar of profit made by the manufacturer was something to be mourned over by the rest of the community, something out of which the whole community had been robbed, as if it ought to be regretted if the manufacturers were prosperous and making their 10, 15 or 20 per cent. But what have the manufacturers of New England done? The prosperity of the United States to-day resulted largely from the fact that these manufacturers had accumulated wealth, and had judiciously invested it. Look at the magnificent schools of the North; look at the young men these schools have educated and sent abroad into the Union, active, intelligent and practical young men, brought up in these training schools of New England; look at the wealth that had gone to rebuild the desolate and burned Chicago; look at the wealth that had gone to the West to build its railroads. Look at the wealth that was going down South, now, to build mills and factories, to build up that stricken South, that poor poverty stricken South, which believed in its two gods—King Cotton and Free-trade. These were the two kings which the South had deified, and see where that idolatry of and that devotion to a fallacy, had led them. It had lured them to destruction. The Opposition wanted to see the people of Canada have among themselves, for the developments of her resources, self-reliant men, brought up in the schools of toil, brought up to dignify labour, and to honour labour in themselves and others. This policy had produced a community, than which, perhaps, the world to-day had no superior, the people of the New England States. The policy which I would like to see introduced into Canada, and which I believe is the true policy for Canada, is to make this section of the country which we now occupy on this Continent, the New England of Canada, and to plant here those same institutions which have been the harbingers of success in the neighbouring States across the line. Our conditions are precisely the same as theirs. We have the same soil, we have the same facilities for manufacturing, we have all the conditions that are kindred to theirs, and we are shortly to have what they now have, a great North-West opening beyond and boundless, which is yet to be inhabited by millions of people. I desire to say to the farmers of Ontario—here is a lesson for you, consider it. Year after year you are impoverishing your farms by growing your wheat and sending it to England. Year after year the facilities for entering the North-West and bringing its products down to the seaboard, are increasing; year after year in the future there is going to be a steadily increasing agricultural population in the West, who are to be your rivals in the markets of the world. While your lands are being gradually worn out and impoverished, those fields are being brought under cultivation. There is to be the great granary of the Continent. Can we believe that twenty-five or thirty years hence the farmer of Ontario would be able to go on competing with the farmer of the Saskatchewan in the raising of wheat or those products which had to go to a foreign market? The condition of the Ontario farmer is growing worse year by year, and the condition of the Western farmer is being bettered in the same ratio. The contest is an unequal one, and the Ontario farmer will probably find himself in the long run in the same position as those who relied on Carolina cotton. For the Ontario farmer to raise his wheat, to ship it to England, and to buy his goods in the cheapest market, would just be to kill the goose that laid the golden egg. I welcome the day when the West will be opened up, and when Ontario and Quebec will occupy the same position relatively to that country, that New England does to the great Western States. I have been amazed to hear the hon. the Finance Minister, not only in his Budget speeches, but also on the stump in Ontario, preaching the doctrine that the aggregation of people in great cities is injurious to a country. How, I would ask, could agricultural communities be injured by the formation of large towns? It is in such that farmers find their best market. If farmers take an intelligent view, they must see that their success greatly depends on the growth of large cities. When Montreal became as large as New York, and Toronto as large as Philadelphia, and when other large cities have arisen amongst us, would it not be all the better for the farming communities all round about them? Would it not enhance the value of farms and the price of farm products? It is true, as has been indicated by the Finance Minister, that in great centres of population is to be found a great deal of wickedness, a great deal that is wrong, but much also that is good and beneficent. But if these great centres were broken down and the population thereof dispersed among the agricultural populations with whom they would enter into competition, the consuming population would be so much decreased, and the producing population so much increased, that the farmer would sustain a two-fold injury. There is, I believe, a necessity for urban populations, and no class of men had a greater interest in the extension of these than farmers. Before sitting down, I wish to make reference to a matter with which my name has been associated in this House—that is, the action of the Government on the petroleum duties. The late Government in fixing the tariff of the Dominion in 1868, thought it wise to place what seemed to be a very high duty on oil—15c. per gallon, with 5c. Excise duty. I do not think that was objected to at the time by any person in the House; but some time subsequently, new and extensive discoveries in oil were made, better means for extracting it were also adopted, and the price had undergone a change since the time the duty was imposed, and that duty, which had formerly been a very fair one, afterwards became a very onerous one. Whether the Government at that time acted wisely or unwisely, I do not propose to discuss, but would merely state the fact. In 1876, I felt it my duty to propose a reduction of the duty on coal oil from 15c. per gallon to 7½c., leaving the Excise tax exactly as before. The proposition, as made and explained by me, was intended to give protection of from 20 to 25 per cent. upon oil, according to the current prices at that time. It had been stated by an hon. member, in reply to my remarks, that there was another charge of a cent which ought to be added. On calling at the office of the Inland Revenue, however, I found that my hon. friend was mistaken. The proposition to adjust the tariff was made by me, with a sincere desire to obtain results—not for any honour which might attach to myself. I desired that members supporting the Government should use all their influence to have the reduction quietly made, and offered to drop my resolution and leave the matter with them, if they could obtain the consent of the Government. I introduced my proposition to the House on the 3rd day of March, but I left it alone till the 31st, a period of four weeks, in order that every member might have an opportunity of investigating the matter. I certainly did not bring it forward with any desire to embarrass the Government, or to place the Government at a disadvantage; but I told them that this high duty had had the effect of creating a ring who controlled all oil wells and refineries, and stepped between the producer and consumer; who dictated what the price should be and compelled the consumer in Canada to pay just what American oil would cost, with the duty added. It was said, by a gentleman on the other side of the House the other night, that those who advocated a Protective policy were inconsistent, but the want of consistency, I fear, belongs to the other side. We who entertain Protectionist principles hold that the ordinary effect of Protection would not ultimately enhance the price of goods to the consumer. And why? Because, when an industry is protected, those engaged in that industry had an opportunity of making money, and the result was that others finding an industry to be a profitable one would embark their capital therein; thus, competition would regulate prices. In this way rings could not be formed. Why is it that a ring cannot be formed in the boot and shoe trade? Because leather, which is the raw material from which boots and shoes are made, is procurable everywhere; consequently, prices are reasonable. Why could not a ring be formed by those who engaged in the manufacture of furniture? Because the material can be got all over the land, and because competition regulates the prices. It is indeed impossible to get up monopolies in such manufactures as those of boots and shoes, furniture and agricultural implements. But if there was an exceptional industry to which the Protective system did not safely apply, and which was monopolised by a ring, then Protectionists would demand that Protection be reduced on that industry to a point where competition would fairly regulate prices; to tolerate rings and monopolies is a blot, a stain on the national character, and Protectionists are the first to decry it. Of all the industries in Canada, the production and refining of oil is perhaps the only one in which a monopoly is possible—and that is simply because the area of production is limited, and may, by finesse, be brought under one control. There was, therefore, no inconsistency in their urging the Government to make this reduction. The Government is responsible for the interests of the country, the guardianship of which is committed to it. It is bound to repress injustice and rectify abuses, and it was the duty of the Government, in that instance, to make the reduction sought. I claim that the country was suffering loss to the extent of $1,200,000 per year. I clearly demonstrated that by retaining the Excise duty there would be no diminution of revenue in consequence of the change I proposed. My argument and proofs were incontrovertible; no one attempted to deny a single position taken by me except an hon. gentleman who spoke in the interest of the ring. The sentiment of the whole House was with me, and yet the hon. the Finance Minister, while admitting all I claimed, declined to act. And why? Because, forsooth, as he deigned to explain last year, it might have given rise to trouble—some motions. Since he has reduced the duty and taken all the credit of it, the Finance Minister asserts that the country saves two million dollars per year by the reduction. So it has come to this. In order that this Government may not be disturbed, in order to prevent motions that might be troublesome, they, with a majority of sixty in the House, able to open and shut the door as they please, refused to lift a finger, to waste a day, in order to save the country two millions of dollars, as they themselves estimate. Did they think that their devoted followers, who backed their refusal to take off the duty, would have hesitated to vote a reduction of the duty? They could not waste a day of their precious time in order to save the country from a loss which was equal to the entire cost of legislation for the whole four years they had been in power. Five hundred thousand dollars a year about covers the cost of running both Houses of Parliament an entire Session. Yet they could not waste a day of that time to save the country two millions.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: How much must have been lost by hon. gentleman opposite.

MR. COLBY: Some think they can see all about the condition of a country by looking at columns of figures; but there are conditions working to the good or ill of the country which the Public Accounts and Trade Returns do not show. Great leakages and losses sometimes occur through the acts or omissions of Government, of which the Blue-books make no mention. Blue-books and statistical tables are not infallible. So much for the action or inaction of the Government in the Session of 1876. If they are satisfied with the course they took they are quite welcome to all the comforts they can find in it. At a cost of $2,000,000, this Government had taken a year's respite, in order to consider, as they said, and bring in a Bill to meet the entire conditions of the case. They brought in a Bill which embodied their own views. They were not trammelled by anything, but commenced de novo, and remodelled the whole thing. If I am rightly informed, the oil production of Canada is wholly within the constituencies of the hon. the First Minister and the hon. the Minister of the Interior, so they had all the knowledge necessary to guide them to the right conclusion the following Session. And what did they do with all this knowledge, with this year's respite and leisure, to frame an Act to meet the conditions of the case, purchased as they told them at a cost of $2,000,000? What was this Bill? It was a Free-trade Bill which imposed upon this article a Customs duty of from 50 to 60 per cent., while no other article is protected more than 17½ per cent. This Free-trade Government put on this exceptional article in this exceptional part of Canada—this article which was the only one which could be abused by rings and combinations—a duty of from 50 to 60 per cent. When they put on the duty of 6c. a gallon, oil was worth 10c. a gallon; they swept away the whole Excise duty and recouped the country by putting it on tea; but to favour this industry, the only one which could be abused by Protection, they levied a Customs duty of from 50 to 60 per cent., making, according to their theory, the consumers of oil, which is made in Canada, pay, not to the Government but to the manufacturer, six cents additional for every gallon, or an additional profit of 60 per cent. Was that legalized robbery, or was it not? In whose interest was that perpetrated?

MR. COLBY.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: It was a revenue tax and a proper one.

Mr. COLBY: When it was understood that the tax was to be taken off, there was no longer an oil ring, until the Finance Minister determined upon the policy he was to pursue, and then the organizers re-organized in Ontario, and an oil ring more dangerous, because more comprehensive than the old one, has grown up under the legislation they had passed in consonance with their Free-trade ideas. That was an illustration of the views of those gentlemen, and of their ideas as to what a revenue tariff ought to be. Did it put every dollar of the revenue into the Treasury? Did they not know that every gallon bought of a Canadian refiner had paid him, not the Treasury, an additional six cents? Did they not know that two-thirds of the oil consumed is manufactured in Canada, and that every gallon paid six cents more than it ought to pay in consequence of the policy of the Government? If they are proud of their inaction in 1876, and of their legislation in 1877, they are welcome to any satisfaction which they can derive from the contemplation of it. So much for the oil question. There is only one other subject to which I desire to allude. I should not be doing justice to my own convictions of what my duty is in addressing the House upon this question, if I did not make reference to the following proposition contained in the amendment:

"And moving, as it ought to do, in the direction of Reciprocity of Tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade."

If every other member of this House should go back on the proposal contained in this amendment of the right hon. member for Kingston, I certainly could not do so without very glaring inconsistency. On the first occasion that it was my privilege to address this Parliament as a new member, as early as 1868, the doctrine which is there announced, was urged by me upon the attention of the Government, of which that right hon. gentleman was then the head, and upon Parliament, for consideration. I urged that a duty of 5c. a pound should be placed upon hops. I pointed out that while the American hop-grower had free access to our market, the Canadian hop grower had to meet a five cent. duty in the United States; and asked the House, on every consideration of fair play, to grant the imposition of 5c a pound on hops. It was not done at that Session, but it was at a subsequent Session, and it is now on the Statute-book. I know something about the Americans; have lived among them a good deal; was educated among them, and have always lived near them. I, at that time, expressed my settled belief, though it had not then the weight with the leader of the Government that I had hoped it would have, that just so long as we were prepared to permit this unequal system by which we were excluded from the American markets, while the Americans had access to ours, they would consider it better than reciprocity, and would not give us reciprocity. That was the view I then took and still hold, and I then made use of the expression which had been so much lauded and so much abused—"reciprocity of tariffs, if not reciprocity in trade." I believe the reasons I then urged were sound. I believe one need only know the American character, their shrewdness, their practical way of treating such subjects, to be convinced that so long as they have free access to our markets, and we are excluded from theirs, they will consider that they have the best of the bargain. I desire to draw attention to one thought which seems to bear strongly on this question. I know the idea that we can coerce the Americans, that four millions of people can coerce forty millions, is often sneered at, and likened "to the tail wagging the dog." The Americans had found it necessary for the maintenance of their credit to put on high duties. That imposes upon us a corresponding necessity to protect our manufacturers and farmers, so long as this unfortunate state of things exists on the other side. There is no necessity for irritation. It will not be considered a retaliatory policy. I think it might safely be said that to two-thirds, or three-fourths, of the people of the United States, this question of reciprocity is to-day a matter of total indifference. If we went below the northern tier of States, probably if we went to the Middle States, certainly if we went to the Southern, the South-western, or the Pacific States, if we asked any man, except a public man, what were the relations between Canada and the United States, he could not tell whether reciprocity or unequal tariff existed. It does not affect the mass of the people of the United States, who are neutral in regard to this matter. But we have active interests working against us in the States of Maine, Vermont and New York, in those sections along our frontier whose interests are agricultural, and who would be injured if our butter, beef, wool, horses, potatoes, etc., went to their markets. On that account they are intensely hostile to reciprocity. They want to keep Nova Scotia potatoes and Prince Edward Island oats out of the Boston market, and Eastern townships beef out of the Brighton market. They desire to keep up the monopoly of the home market, which alone makes agriculture possible in barren New England. That active influence working upon the inert and indifferent mass of the nation, is what we have to contend against. We have to countervail that influence, we have to create an influence against that. Does the House believe that so long as it could be shown that year by year we are taking more and more of their manufactured products, the manufacturers of New England are going to join us in the desire for a renewal of reciprocity, when it is shown that from 1873 to 1877, while prices had fallen, while imports from England had fallen, the only thing that had increased had been the amount of manufactured goods which we bought from the States—an increase of some 30 per cent. ? Does the House believe that under that state of things we will get their co-operation? Let them, however, feel themselves excluded and embarrassed in getting to that market, which they had heretofore used as their own market, and then we would find that they have a little feeling in favour of reciprocity.

MR. COLBY.

So long as the Americans continue to possess all the advantages they now enjoy, they will not give us reciprocity of trade. The sound and politic course then to adopt, is to put up our duties to where they were before the Reciprocity Treaty was framed; to put ourselves back to where we were then; to place ourselves in a position where we can pinch some classes in the United States and deprive them of some of those advantages which they now so freely enjoy. I thank the House for the indulgence extended to me, and beg to apologize for this abrupt termination of my speech, a circumstance which is due to the lateness of the hour.

MR. DOMVILLE said that, before the House proceeded to vote on the question of Free-trade and Reciprocity, he wished to set himself right before the country. It had been said that no policy was beneficial to New Brunswick and the Lower Provinces, except one of absolute Free-trade. We had what was called a Free-trade policy to-day, but the country was literally doing nothing. If the Dominion was not prospering under such a policy, what was the use of maintaining such a doctrine. He could readily imagine that gentlemen who were engaged in lumbering operations selfishly desired to get communication with the United States in the way of reciprocity, and, prepared to ignore all other interests, were anxious to keep the door of so-called Free-trade open as regarded other articles. He could also imagine that importers would not wish reciprocity. If we had reciprocity in everything manufactured in this country, we should not have large importing firms, and the system of supply-houses. There would be no business for middlemen; the country storekeepers and the small dealers would purchase direct from the manufacturer, and with cash at command would buy as cheaply as the large dealers, and thus effect considerable saving, and that system would place business eventually on a cash basis in this country. He viewed a return to a cash basis or short credit as one of the most desirable results to be obtained for Canada. When speaking of Canada let them consider the policies of other and older countries, and learn a lesson from their experience. If we found Free-trade had always been the rule, and that under it other countries had built up industries, and become wealthy and independent, let us adopt it. But if we found that Protection had been the rule and not the exception, and that under this system they had flourished, we should have no doubt in what direction our National Policy should lead us. We would naturally look to our Mother Country first, and we found her with large industries in many places idle, and in others partially so. How was this? Was not England the workshop of the world, and had she not accumulated the wealth of years in successful trading? And yet we found her working people often idle, her paupers increasing, and her money commanding at home small rates of interest. Professor Cairnes said in his essay on Political Economy, page 248 :

“These Islands, where industrial freedom has for half a century had greater scope than in any previous age, or in any other country; but where also extremes of wealth and poverty are found in harsher contrast than have been found elsewhere, where one man consumes more value in a single meal than goes to feed and clothe the family of another for a month; where the entire land of the country is owned by less than 100,000 persons out of a population of 30,000,000; where one in every twenty persons is a pauper, and where the bulk of the agricultural population look forward with calm resignation to spending their old age in the workhouse, and the artizan population find themselves about once in ten years in the midst of commercial catastrophe, which consigns hundreds of thousands to ruin—I ask if anyone can seriously consider this state of things, and yet repose in absolute satisfaction and confidence in the maxim laissez faire or let alone.”

That extract showed how Free-trade was working in Great Britain as viewed by Professor Cairnes of the University of London. Let him now read a few extracts from some of the English papers of a late date, to show that some of the manufacturers were not satisfied with the working of the English Free-trade policy. The North British Daily Mail, looking at the prospects of British trade in 1878, and discussing the question of Free-trade and Protection, said :

“It is in the iron trade that manufacturers are subjected to excessive competition from producers on the continent, and if they are not able to meet this competition by lowering the cost of their wares, the trade is not likely to revive. They are not only losing their customers in Europe, but are threatened with the loss of the Colonial trade, and even with rivalry in the home markets. * * * This is a trade which, when once lost, is not likely ever to be regained, and the traffic between Belgium and Australia will assuredly not be restricted to railway iron. In Sheffield itself some sales of iron at fabulously low rates have been reported; and there is too much reason to fear that, in the anticipated renewal of trade, the iron masters will either have no part or will participate in its advantages only after a prolonged probation.”

The article went on to speak of the Protection fallacy, as it termed it, and said :

“The truth of the principles of Free-trade remains unshaken, although it may be conceded that its earlier disciples displayed more zeal than discretion, and that it may be desirable, in the interest of Free-trade itself, to apply the lex talionis to those who will acknowledge no other. Mr. David McIver, the member for Birkenhead, takes this view of the situation. He is enthusiastic in favour of Free-trade, and declares that we cannot have too much of it, but denies that we have any at all, and believes that we shall never have any so long as we omit the means of obtaining it. * * * And the Free-Traders may, without inconsistency, advocate reciprocity; and, if they were to do this, they would take the wind out of Lord Bateman’s sails, and take away from the Protectionists the only argument in all their repertory that is of any value.”

That was one of the leading papers in England, and, while professing to be Free-trade, it declared it was impossible to have Free-trade unless they had reciprocity of tariff. The London Engineer said :

“At this moment of wide-spread commercial depression, the question of the expediency of a return to a system of limited Protection, as opposed to that of Free-trade, is undoubtedly once again forcing itself upon the consideration of many thoughtful minds.”

That was also a Free-trade journal, but still it talked of limiting the working of the English Free-trade policy. It said :

“Granted that the theory of free and unrestricted commerce with all the quarters of the universe is as bold as it is magnanimous; granted that the idea, by whomsoever originated—and advocated by no one more consistently than by our late good and wise Prince Consort—it is both grand and glorious in its conception; grant that to give effect to it has been the aim, as it has been a long accepted policy of successive Governments, it cannot be denied that the sting of 'want of reciprocity,' has, from the first, checkmated our philanthropic efforts, and obliged us now to confess, after thirty years of trial, that in practice our Free-trade is at best one-sided; and that, while we are opening our ports to the commerce and manufacturers of the world, free and unrestricted, other countries, without conferring upon us any reciprocal benefit, are taking advantage without scruple of our magnanimous, but disastrous, because one-sided, liberality."

That extract was from a long article on the question of Free-trade and Protection, from which he need not further quote, as it was all very much in the same strain, namely: Although Free-trade might be very good, it was only one-sided in the case of England. If we could compel the peoples with whom we dealt also to give us Free-trade, then that great doctrine could be carried into effect and we would have no reason to complain; but when our goods were kept out of foreign markets while foreign goods were admitted here, the policy could not fail to be injurious to Canada. If articles were cheaper to-day in the United States than in Canada, there was no force in the argument that Protection increased the price of goods. He did not believe such was the fact. He believed, however, that too much Protection was a bad thing, and tended to induce men to establish rival factories, on account of what appeared to be large profits, but, when such manufacturers competed with each other in a limited market, goods were brought down to a normal value, and the consumers were not called upon to pay any larger price than they would under a different policy. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) had laid down the proposition that the farmers of the Lower Provinces would have to pay more for their goods if a protective tariff were adopted. Would anyone declare that those farmers were now prosperous? How could they prosper when the great industry of ship-building was unremunerative? Did not the prosperity of the farmers depend on the prosperity of the various manufacturing industries? The hon. member for Charlotte had read a long list of articles, potatoes, hops, &c., which he had tried to persuade the House would not be imported under any circumstances, and the protection of which, consequently, would not assist the farmers, but he did not tell the people of New Brunswick that, under the present so-called Free-trade policy they paid from $2 to $2.35 per barrel for pork, of which 13,000 barrels were annually imported into that Province. They would have to pay no more than $2 per barrel under a protective tariff—a tariff under which home industries would flourish. It was well known that a country could only be prosperous which was able to produce almost everything it required. He could read many extracts to show that the policy in Great Britain was progressing towards Protection, not a hostile tariff, but a readjustment of the tariff, such a policy as was laid down in the motion of the right hon. member for Kingston; a National Policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, would promote all industries. The motion was not calculated to benefit any particular industry or to raise the price of goods, but it was intended to benefit all, and a National Policy would greatly improve everyone's prospect of being placed in comfortable circumstances. The argument which had been used by hon. gentlemen opposite, with respect to the farmers, would not work in the Lower Provinces. He could imagine hon. gentlemen opposite endeavouring to show that the member for Kingston threatened to tax the farmer by imposing protective duties in order to make them pay higher prices for the articles they consumed; but, when he met his constituents, he could tell them that, if the proposed changes were made, they would have more money in their pockets with which to purchase what they required. What was the use of cheap goods if they had no money to buy with? Under such circumstances men went away disgusted, and such was the feeling of the people of New Brunswick. Were not the people of the United States more happy when they had to pay twice the present price for their goods. Then everything was prosperous, and money flowed in from all directions. In England, Protection was carried to such an extreme in the reign of Queen Elizabeth that "a farmer found exporting wool suffered the loss of his hand, and had it nailed up on the market-house nearest." Yet hon. members were anxious to impress the House with the idea that the fathers of the British nation did not know what they were doing. They adapted themselves to the times, and we should also adopt a policy suitable to the times. We required a National Policy, one which would benefit the country. Some nations were prospering, and others were not, and it was our duty, as far as possible, to imitate the policy of the prosperous nations, and build up our institutions as they had done. What was the position of England to-day? She spread her arms to every nation, and said: "I take everything you can sell me cheaper than I can make it." She had been doing that with what effect? In 1870 there were upwards of a million paupers supported at a cost of £12,000,000 sterling per annum to the nation. All this corroborated Professor Cairnes' statement: "That things are far from right." Other nations, which were following out a protective tariff, were making their competition keenly felt in England; for instance, the Belgians, the French and the Americans. Their iron and other trades were leaving Great Britain and passing to continental countries. They found that the export trade of these and other countries had increased during the ten years prior to 1875, under Protection, in a larger ratio than that of England. The following was a comparative statement:

"Great Britain, increased imports, 30 per cent.; increased exports, 25 per cent.; United States, increased imports, 33 per cent.; increased exports, 72 per cent.; France, increased imports, 13 per cent.; increased exports, 16 per cent.; Russia, increased imports, 104 per cent.; increased exports, 81 per cent."

The above figures were the ratio of imports and exports of merchandize during the ten years ending 1875, as taken from Biglow's work on the Tariff, and compiled from England's Statistical Report of Foreign Countries. Did this not show us that we must not look to low tariffs for success? The French nation had been protected for years, and could not be induced to open their markets on equal terms to foreigners with her own citizens, as reference to their tariff would show. In 1860 the great Free-trade treaty, called the Cobden Treaty, was signed between England and France. How much Free-trade was there in it? They reduced to England their fifty and sixty per cent. ad valorem duties to 30 and 40 per cent. in return for England's free ports, and in return for England's generosity for putting no duties on French goods. Sir E. Sullivan, in his work on Protection, page 64, said:

"We removed the duties absolutely entirely from 43 articles of French industry. They, on the contrary, did not remove the duty on one single article of English industry. We gave them the bread, they returned the kindness with a stone; but still they gave it in such grand style, and we accepted it so humbly and so thankfully that most of us believed we had got a Roland for an Oliver."

And what had been the consequences? The same writer, on page 22, said:

"In a debate in the French Chamber, in 1870, M. Johnson said 'Our exports to England are four times as large as our imports. We have exported goods to the value of 200,000,000 francs more than we have imported from England,' and still in the face of statements and facts such as these, we find Free-trade orators, and Free-trade penny-a-liners, calling on the producing class to be thankful for the blessings of Free-trade."

This was how it worked in France. Here was a treaty by which France was enabled to take possession of the English markets, while she only imported a few things from England. A statement was made in their own Chamber, that France exported four times as much as she imported from England, and for this treaty Great Britain paid 280,000,000 francs. According to the statement of the exchange of manufactured products of the two countries in 1868, the French exported to Great Britain seven times the value of imported goods that Great Britain exported to them. To do this they must have expended seven times as much wages and found occupation for seven times as many hands. Should we not in justice to ourselves, having the experience of older countries to guide us, follow the example of the wisest? Look at their beet sugar manufacture. That industry was commenced in France about the year 1814, when France was blockaded, and had not access to foreign sugar. She commenced to nourish that industry and had done so ever since, and in return the beet sugar industry now paid her an Excise duty that would soon reimburse her for all the expense. Witness, also, that her exports had always been largely in excess of her imports. The Americans had no idea of giving us reciprocity. He would call attention to a telegram taken from the North American paper of the 5th of February. This gave a faint idea of how much reciprocity we could get from America. This telegram contained particulars of a remonstrance from Philadelphia merchants against any reciprocity treaty with any foreign country. It stated: "The signers of this remonstrance will be recognized as many of the best firms in Philadelphia." By one of these the question was asked: "Why should Canada, with four millions of people, be placed on an equality with a country of forty millions? Why should she have the advantage of a market at least ten times larger than the one she offers in exchange?" The Americans held that the trade between the Dominion and the United States could not, from the very nature of things, be reciprocal while Canada continued to be part of the British Empire. If we would be on terms of equality with America, let us put the same duty upon American goods as they put upon us. John Stuart Mill told us in Book 5, Chap. 4, pages 486 and 487: "The only way a country can save itself from being a loser by revenue duties imposed by others, is to do the same." This writer was largely quoted last year as advocating only Free-trade. Let those parties quote the same writer as much as they chose. If his advice was good in one thing, it should be good in another. Stuart Mill did not believe in giving everything and receiving nothing. Then let the policy be for Canada to protect herself by building up a market for her people, for her own consumers and her own producers. Byles,

"She can, by fostering her domestic manufactures and retaining her markets for Canadians, enhance the value of her lands and securities by so doing. Are we not losing millions of dollars every year by importing what could be produced and made at home? Every dollar that could be spent in Canada, and is not, is a loss to Canada. It was admitted in the debate on the Tariff last year, that Canada imported $50,000,000 worth of goods that could be produced at home by Canadians, and would cause to be spent in Canada that amount over and above the value of the goods; or, in other words, put into circulation $100,000,000 of trade, or double the amount of the imports."

So said the great apostle of Free-trade, Adam Smith: "The cost of an article is all spent in its production;" and he said further: "And furnishes incomes or wages to the amount of every dollar to the producers." Supposing an importer brought out from England ten thousand yards of cloth at a cost of ten cents per yard, or a thousand dollars, because he could save a cent per yard on it, or buy it a cent cheaper away than he could at home, he would make $100 on the transaction, but the country would lose the difference between the $100 and the cost, or $900. less the cost of the imported raw material. Taking the amount of the imports at $50,000,000, this would employ 112,500 men. Putting them at a yearly salary of $400 each, and allowing those men a family of two at least, it would represent quite a large population of consumers. They would at least pay fifteen per cent. towards the revenue of the country, and this would amount to $6,750,000. It had been estimated that the value of an able-bodied emigrant into Canada was $1,000 to the country. If so, these 112,500 artisans and labourers, not to say anything about the families, would represent the sum of $112,500,000 of additional value to the country. The interest so depended upon producers, consequently what one gained the other profited by. If we wished to draw capital into Canada, we must offer the inducement of good sound investments; if we wanted immigration, we must offer inducements to emigrants better than they made at home. This was what all countries were doing or had done at some time.

Was there ever a country that increased the way the United States had done? How did they do it? By offering inducements to both capital and labour to come to them. They thus built up a home market for their farmers, and enhanced the value of every inch of property within their borders. It was not their protective policy that hurt business there, but their contracting currency, bringing their currency back to the gold basis. If it was their protective policy that hurt them, how was it that trade was so bad in England, and why was it better in protected France and protected Belgium? It was found in the United States, under the Protectionist tariff of 1842, that the average price of pig iron in New York—from 1843 to 1846, during which time the production rose from 230,000 tons in 1842, to 765,000 tons in 1846—was $28.19 per ton. Under the exclusively Free-trade policy of 1846, the price of pig iron in New York from 1849 to 1857 was $28.94 per ton, while during the years from 1853 to 1856 the product fell off 506,000 tons, and the price averaged $34.20 per ton. Did not this teach us that under Free-trade domestic manufacture was choked or killed, and the price was raised to the consumer? Last Session, the Hon. D. A. Wells was quoted in the debates as the only American worthy of notice. He would call the attention of the House to the figures of the Hon. W. D. Kelly, who stood second to no American statesman. He said:

"In 1847 I have seen with gratification the protective tariff of 1842 succeeded by the revenue tariff of 1846. To promote this change I have laboured not only with zeal and industry, but with undoubting faith that experience would prove its beneficence. It needed but a decade to demonstrate the folly of attempting to create a market for our increasing general agricultural products, and to develop our many manufacturing resources by the Free-trade League. It was just ten years after the substitution of the revenue tariff of 1846 for the protective tariff of 1842 that the general bankruptcy of the American people was commenced by the almost simultaneous failure of the Ohio Life and Trust Company and the Bank of Pennsylvania, and the suspension of specie payments of almost every Bank in the country. In that brief period our steamers had been supplanted by foreign lines, and our clipper ships driven from the seas, and while the families of thousands of employed workmen in our great cities were in want of food, Illinois farmers found in corn, for which there was no market, the cheapest fuel they could obtain; though their fields were underlaid by an almost inexhaustible deposit of coal."

He would call their attention to a letter from Mr. Borden, of Fall River, a gentleman largely interested in the industries of the United States:—

"E. G. Scovil, Esq., Coldbrook Rolling Mills Co. of the Dominion of Canada, St. John's County, N.B.

"WATUPPA WATER BOARD,
"FALL RIVER, MASS.,
"Jan. 17, 1878.

"MY DEAR SIR,—Your favour of the 12th inst., came duly to hand, contents noted, and in reply would say that I am in favour of a protective tariff for any and all new countries, and by this I mean not prohibitory, but such a one as will enable all manufacturers of any material or texture to be entered into by individuals or corporations who have the means, or can command the ability to pursue such business as such by natural endowments, or acquired ability from practical knowledge shall lead the various persons to pursue. This can only be done by having such protection from the Government as will enable parties whose minds are well developed, and whose natural tastes lead them in certain directions, together with application, energy and economy to succeed in their particular enterprise.

"In this way the Government will furnish protection in all the varied mechanical pursuits, and the people be protected, each in his own particular industry, and the Government will be benefitted, inasmuch as it will stimulate the energies and mechanical tastes of its people, so will the Government be strengthened in the same proportion and to the same extent. But a prohibitory tariff will over-stimulate an undue growth of any and all productions, and will be entered into by persons who are not particularly qualified either by natural or acquired talent, and though under this condition prosperity may continue for a time, but there will be an end to it, either from a change of law are worse off than though the enterprise had never been embarked in.

"Nobody is benefitted by the commencement of a business which is eventually to bring bankruptcy and ruin (I mean financially) upon the persons directly interested, as this not only injures the persons engaged, but affects the best interests of the whole city or town where such business is located. Protection means care for and aid to any mechanical mind that is properly balanced, so as to make him (and the country more than him) to have the benefits which must come from such judicious legislation, or will enable him to develop the resources of the country. Not many years since, we required quite a large Protection for our cotton manufacture; to-day, under the fostering care of judicious legislation, I think we can compete with the old world in this product.

Another matter requires serious consideration from your legislators, as I think; this is the quantity of patents under proper restrictions to persons who have from patient mechanical application produced an invention, and for which he ought certainly to have an income for a limited time.

“Yours very truly,

“PHILIP D. BORDEN.”

They would see from this letter that the United States could now compete in the manufacture of cotton with the world, as they had, under a protective policy, built up manufactures and acquired working populations. One could now buy cotton cheaper in the protected United States than in England. This should not be the case if the Free-trader's arguments were correct. Could anybody doubt, then, what should be the policy for Canadians? The Government asked Canadians to pay taxes and all other expenses towards keeping up this country, and in many cases gave foreigners the privilege of selling in Canadian markets without paying anything, or comparatively little, towards the expenses of the country. Now, he asked, was not this protecting the foreign producer? If we allowed him to use our markets where he paid no tax, had he not the advantage over the native manufacturer who did pay a tax? Was it right that it should be so? Let them examine this question. And he wanted those to note it who were such ultra-Free-traders or low tariff advocates, denouncing Protection to Canadians. He asked were they not protecting outsiders and advocating a policy that made Canada a slaughter market for all the world? It was for the interest of the Dominion to become self-sustaining as soon as possible, in order that we might meet our indebtedness. Stuart Mill, chapter 1, page 88, said: “A country can only have what it saves over its consumption; or in other words, we must produce more than we use, in order to save.” He contended that we were not doing so when we imported so much that we could produce at home. We were losing a business of double the imports which would build up home markets for our farmers. All they asked was Canadian markets; and who had a better right to Canadian markets than the Canadians? If there was no other reason for a protective tariff, the fact that our agricultural population were unemployed the greater portion of the year was sufficient. Mill said, volume 2, page 486, “A country purely agricultural will never become wealthy.” The same thing was maintained by others. We must have a diversity of employment for our young men in order to keep them in the country. We must provide them with the employment and remuneration which they could get elsewhere. It was well known that, about as fast as emigrants were brought into this country, young men were leaving it. And it was high time a policy was adopted to keep our young men at home, as well as to induce others to come and settle with us. A protective policy would do this, and it, and it alone would enable Canada to hold out the required inducements for capital and labour to come in. This we could do by producing for ourselves what we now bought abroad. There was a great deal of idle labour that could be made productive had our farmers more local markets. We had minerals in abundance and plenty of water power, but our low tariff policy would never let them be developed. We must do as other countries had done, and were doing, if we ever expected to make the country produce all that it was capable of producing. Without Government assistance guaranteeing the home market to Canadian manufactures, industries could never be developed and surrounded by the working population absolutely required for a cheap production. Mixed farming, they were told, was the most profitable, and it was only in the neighbourhood of home markets that it could be carried out with success. France and Belgium understood this policy thoroughly, and it was in those countries that we found the land brought to its greatest productiveness. Their protective policies had built up working populations all over their countries, forming markets for the farmers. The most or a large part of Holland had been reclaimed by Government aid from the sea, by their thorough system of dykes and machinery. She was now, under her Government policy, one of the most flourishing nations in the world. The policy of this little nation was a contradiction to the let-alone system of the Free-traders. He would read some extracts from the president of the Strasburg (Germany) Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Sengingwald, as translated from the Frankfort-on-the-Main Mercury. He said, speaking of the renewal of commercial treaties:—

“It follows from the elementary principles of the science of public economy that the working of the crude material is most advantageously effected by establishing manufactories in the centre of agricultural communities themselves, and we can go as far as to say that the agriculture of a country has produced everything that it can produce only when cities and large industrial establishments shall have been settled over the entire extent of its territory. This compression of the populations is necessary in order to give the products of the soil their full value. The transportation of the crude products of agriculture is frequently difficult, and over great reaches of country often impossible, as the expense would add excessively to the price of the transported goods. Through the manufacturers a more profitable sale is found for the products of the soil, and they at once assume, as it were, the position of manufactured products of high value, which have come from a distance, and serve in their place as commodities which supply the wants of the country. It has, therefore, been through a great error when it has many a time happened that agriculture and manufacturing industries have been reciprocally incited to antagonism and jealousy. No province can show more clearly than Alsace in what great need each stands of the other. Place yourself, in order to follow my arguments, in some one of our beautiful valleys of the Vosges and picture to yourself what these regions were seventy years ago, when the apostolate of an Oberlin had hardly rescued them from an almost wild condition. Look upon them to-day. Every piece of earth, even the smallest, cultivated. The most trifling water power converted into wealth, dwellings of permanent structure and with friendly expression; in one word, everything in every way bespeaks activity and prosperity. The honour of this change so complete is due to industry with its dependent train of capital. All civilized people intuitively feel that they have need of industries in order to grow to prosperity and power, and they have all commenced with prohibition or prohibitive rates of duty in order to protect their manufactures in their infancy, in order to battle against destructive competition; the several nations have only one weapon, duties. In our modern society, everyone, with the exception of the annuitant, who lives on a previously saved capital, is called upon to play the double rôle of producer and consumer. History teaches us, through the example of Spain and Portugal, what a Free-trade policy will do. Labour is the only firm basis of the welfare of nations, and to bring it to fullness should be the exerted wisdom of statesmen, who should bring, as an offering, the common welfare, not crude principles.”

Frederick List closes the introduction of his work, “National System of Economy,” with the following words:

“History furnishes so many examples of entire nations having gone to ruin because they did not understand the solving, at the right time, the great problem of securing their spiritual, economical and political independence by establishing their own manufactures in a strong commercial and industrial position.”

From the foregoing extracts they would see what the opinions of the Germans were. Adam Smith said, in book 2, chapter 8, “that internal trade is the most profitable for a country.” John Stuart Mill, in speaking of the benefits of commerce, said:

“As the competition of other countries compels us to offer our commodities on cheaper terms on pain of not selling at all, the imports which it obtains are procured at a greater cost.”

Did this not tell us that if we were obliged to take the price made by cheaper producers, we were paying too dear for our commodities? Had we not been selling our commodities often at prices that were established by cheaper producers? For instance, lumber and wheat. England gave us the same price for lumber she gave for Baltic lumber. Baltic lumber ruled the price of the market. England also gave us the same price for wheat she was giving Russia, the East Indies, etc., and as it cost us more to live in Canada than it did in either the East Indies or Egypt, we should have a corresponding price, or else we were buying our necessities at a greater cost. The remedy for this was to make our own goods; that is to say, to have the labour which was spent in manufacturing that which we consume spent in Canada, not in other countries. It would not affect our exports in the least, only our imports. John Stuart Mill said:

“It may happen that home productions, though really the most advantageous, may not become so until after a certain pecuniary loss, which it is not expected that private speculators will incur in order that their successors may be benefited. Therefore, I concede, that in a new country, a temporary protective duty may be sometimes economically defensible.” (Book 4, page 539.)

Why, then, hesitate to give Canadian farmers the benefit of having manufacturing carried on among themselves, and the opportunity of opening up markets they could never have otherwise? The Mother Country accumulated her wealth by a protective tariff. France, Belgium, Russia, the United States—all had carried on the same policy. In France, no matter who ruled, the protective system had been adhered to. Hence, the celerity with which she had paid off her war indemnity. “A country, whether it consumes its own productions or sends them abroad, can have no more than it produces; therefore, the supreme policy is to develop its producing powers,” said Sir J. Byles. Why, then, should we depend entirely on agriculture and the natural resources of the country when we had equal, if not better, facilities for carrying on any kind of manufactures that our markets would sustain? Let them examine the testimony given in an Australian pamphlet. It said:

“It is difficult enough at any time to establish manufactories in a new country, but altogether impossible if the local manufacturers are unfairly handicapped. The foreign manufacturer has possession of the market to begin with; next, he is usually a man of large capital, while the local manufacturers are, as a rule, men of small means. Once in possession of the market, with unlimited capital, it is a very easy matter to maintain it. No sooner is he informed through his agents that a certain commodity which he had been supplying is being superseded by a local production, than the foreign manufacturer immediately forwards to that market an extra supply of the commodity in question. The market being thus supplied with more than is required, prices recede, and the local manufacturers, not having capital enough to enable them to hold out for a remunerative price, succumb to the pressure. The latter out of the way, the foreign manufacturer has the field all to himself, and is able to recoup himself for all his previous losses by increasing prices.”

This was a plain statement of what occurred every day in the colonies

when any attempt was made to compete with old established industries. As a further illustration of how the system worked, take the following statement recently made at a public meeting in Sydney, by Mr. Mort, an old and enterprising colonist of New South Wales. He had, he said—

“Seen a large number of industries perish in this country, not because they had not inherent strength, but because they had been strangled out as it were by the competition of other countries. But he could refer to a time when soap was an article of importation into this country. Every man knew perfectly well that we could make soap a great deal cheaper than we could get it from England, for we had the tallow and everything on the spot to do it with, but constant shipments were perseveringly sent out, which kept down the market price and the consequence was that, unless a man had a very strong back indeed, he could not bear up against them until he could establish his own industry. Take the article of corn flour, with which he was intimately connected. A great many years ago he observed that corn grew here almost spontaneously and was a large industry of our farmers, but yet he saw that corn flour was sent out here and sold at the almost fabulous price of one shilling a pound. He at last met with a gentleman such as he had been long looking for, and with another gentleman he commenced the maize industry. We immediately lowered the price five pence a pound, but we had to contend against shipments which kept dropping in now and then in the hope, as he supposed, that we should be swamped, as indeed we should have been had we not thoroughly believed in the industry. We now sold our maizena, which many people said was better than the corn flour imported, at threepence a pound less, and yet we were in danger of having that industry strangled. We were rich in kerosene shale, and yet thousands of tons of kerosene oil were annually imported, although we had abundance of the material from which we would make it for a less price. It was the perpetual small shipments that came rolling in that swamped us.”

Take another case. The colony of Victoria exported in 1870, according to the statement of the Registrar-General for that year, tallow to the extent of £358,863 sterling, and she imported, in the same year, candles and soap to the extent of £132,129 sterling. A glance at these figures would lead a stranger to suppose that Victoria colonists were not enterprising. This conclusion would be entirely erroneous. Year after year the most systematic and energetic attempts had been made in the colony to make candles and soap, but without success, for as soon as the local manufacturer had supplied a suitable article and reduced the price, large shipments from abroad came pouring in and broke the market. The attempt was repeated time after time, and no sooner had one manufacturer failed and higher prices ruled again, than another competitor was ready to enter the field. So one followed the other, but always with the same result—utter ruin to all connected with the undertaking. Under the tariff of 1871, however, candles and soap paid an import duty of twopence per pound, and other articles were also protected, and there was now a prospect of the manufacture of these commodities being established in this colony. Thus they had seen older countries build up their industries under protective tariffs, and England was the only one that opened her ports to the world. She was now strongly advocating a return to her former policy, and it was only a matter of time when she would adopt Protection again. Protection was necessary to keep our people employed, and to keep a ruinous competition from strangling our infant industries. He had a good many references to give, but, at that late hour, he would not occupy much more time. He had tried to impress on the House the fact that the questions of Protection and reciprocity had a great deal more in them than some gentlemen thought who held that this country would be ruined under Protection. He thought that they might, at least, try, under the circumstances, a wholesome readjustment of the tariff and see what it would do. They should put something on here and take something off there, and, at least, get things in such a position that they might endeavour to keep their factories going, even if they did not make money, and thus they might be ready to enter into competition with the United States when they had secured reciprocity. They were told that the United States had been seriously injured by Protection. In looking over the failures for 'last year, he, however, saw that we had 1 in 30 failures in Canada, while the proportion to the number of traders was 1 in 70 in the United States. Here were the effects of Free-trade and Protection contrasted. There must be some reason for all this. Taking up our local newspapers, they found that, while our imports were falling off with respect to Great Britain, they were increasing with respect to the United States; and, while our exports to Great Britain were increasing, to the United States they were decreasing, that was to say, as he had tried to show, that the United States had secured the cream of our business. He contended that it was the duty of any Government to legislate so as to help the industries of the country and to pass such laws as would enable it to compete with their neighbours. Without professing to be either a Free-trader or a Protectionist, though he believed in the principles of Free-trade, he would not now advocate such a policy. He believed just as much in Free-trade as in a man being perfect, as the hon. member for Charlotte had professed to be that night. He considered that the best thing possible for that gentleman to do was to go home and repeat what he had just said: "I am a good man; I have never done anything wrong, and if I did it my sin will find me out;" and, although the hon. gentleman might be able to do this, it reminded him very much of the man who had self-righteousness and who was still very poorly off. So with Free-trade; the more they had of it just now, when so large a revenue had to be raised, the worse off they were. It appeared, therefore, that they should now try a new policy, which might be called a National Policy or a bread and butter policy, not confining its term to either of the words Free-trade or Protection—a policy that would build up the country and enable the people to earn and save money. They would then find that, where one ship was now built, two would be built. The people would not be frightened by the bare statement that bar iron would cost more, or that cordage would be dearer; they would find that then they would be better able to build ships, etc., and they would be satisfied with a profit of eight or ten per cent. per annum for ships where they now sought for twelve or fifteen; more money would then be in the country, and investment would be sought for it, in shipping, lumbering, or other pursuits. He thought that this was conceded by everyone. The hon. the Minister of Finance had stated that St. John, N.B., had only contributed to the Treasury, in consequence of the great fire, $200,000, but it would be found on looking into the Accounts, that St. John had at least contributed $700,000 in this connection. They were kindly informed, as though it was a favour on the part of the Government, that $200,000 would be required to replace the public buildings of St. John; but, after this sum was expended, the country at large would have benefitted to the extent of $500,000, in consequence of this great calamity. Hence, he did not think that a great deal was being done by the Government for St. John, although it had been presented with $20,000 for general relief purposes, and though $200,000 would be spent in the manner mentioned. He thought that he had put himself straight as regarded the question of Free-trade and Protection. While advocating a change in the policy of the country, he did not wish for a moment to be understood to say he believed in the erection of a wall around this country; on the contrary, he believed in such a readjustment of the tariff as would enable us to carry out the policy which was enunciated in the motion made by the right hon. member for Kingston,—a policy tending to the establishment of reciprocal trade relations with the United States. The policy of the United States as tersely defined by Judge Kelly was to compel Canadians to buy what they had to buy in the United States, and sell what they had to sell elsewhere, until, constrained by the Free-trade legislation of Great Britain to unrequited agricultural labour, and sighing for the prosperity of their neighbours, the people of Canada should, as he believed they would if the policy of Protection was maintained, ask to unite their destinies with theirs. "Our Constitution," he said, "is a fit canopy of a continent, and will yet crown one." Were we to aid in the carrying out of such a policy as this? Were we to quietly allow ourselves to be excluded from the markets of the United States when we had anything to sell, while we went there with our money when we wanted to buy? Were we to settle down to the unrequited agricultural labour which Judge Kelly, and our present rulers condemned us to? Were we to continue in an apathetic state that would tend to make the Constitution of the United States the canopy of the continent? Or were we to meet that policy by one that would checkmate its effect on our trade; to take such measures as would force our neighbours to give us the advantages they required from us; to foster our industries so effectually that unrequited agricultural toil would not be the fate of the whole people; to arouse a national spirit, a feeling of self-dependence, that would keep us under the glorious canopy of the Constitution which our fathers perfected?

MR. KIRK said that, as he came from a Province in favour of Free-trade, he felt it incumbent on him to make a few remarks on this subject. He and the people of his Province had been educated in the principles of Free-trade by the hon. member for Cumberland and the leaders of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia. The hon. member (Mr. Tupper), when he led the Conservative party in Nova Scotia, advocated Free-trade as it was then understood, viz.: the imposition of a tax on imports only for the purpose of raising a revenue, or a revenue tariff policy as opposed to a protective policy such as was now advocated by the hon. gentleman and the rest of the Opposition in this House. Until the year 1875, the hon. member for Cumberland had always, in this House, advocated such a policy as the former, and no other. He (Mr. Kirk) and every hon. gentleman remembered perfectly well how vigorously the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) had attached the policy of the hon. the Finance Minister in 1874, when the latter gentleman proposed to increase the tariff from 15 to 17½ per cent., and how industriously he had laboured to show the House and the country that this proposal of the Finance Minister was "entering the thin edge of the Protectionist wedge," to which he (Mr. Tupper) was, of course, entirely opposed. In the year following (1875), when the hon. the Finance Minister brought down his Budget, the hon. gentleman expected an increase in the tariff, and he (Mr. Kirk) believed that the hon. gentleman had a speech prepared to show the evil results of such a change. The hon. gentleman, however, was mistaken, and, no doubt, disappointed, and had to ask the Finance Minister to adjourn the discussion on the Budget for a few days, that he might have an opportunity to discuss it. Up to this memorable day, the hon. gentleman was as pronounced a Free-trader as any hon. member of this House. Why the hon. gentleman had so suddenly changed his mind, he would not undertake to say, but, as he had to speak against the Finance Minister, the reason was not hard to conjecture. The hon. gentleman had taunted the member for North Norfolk with having changed his mind on the trade policy of this country, and with having become a Free-trader, whilst, formerly, he was a Protectionist. But the hon. member for North Norfolk would hardly agree to this accusation, for he advocated a revenue tariff policy, which, as it existed at present, gave all the Protection the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) ever desired. The hon. member for Cumberland now advocated a Protectionist policy, and had tried, in his speech on the Budget to lead the House and the country to believe that he was a Protectionist in the Nova Scotia Legislature, stating that he had, when there, placed a duty of fifty cents per barrel on American flour. He (Mr. Kirk) thought the House would be surprised to learn that the real duty then levied was only twenty-five cents per barrel, and that it was imposed on all flour coming, at that time, into Nova Scotia—Canadian as well as American. Every hon. gentleman, knowing anything respecting public affairs in Nova Scotia at that time, would remember that this tariff was never at that time spoken of as a protective tariff, nor was any such argument as that of Protection used in its favour. That tariff was imposed solely for the purpose of raising a revenue to meet the expenses entailed on the country by the construction of certain public works. Furthermore, it could not possibly have operated as a protective policy to the people of Nova Scotia, inasmuch as

Nova Scotia had not, nor was it possible that she should have, a flour industry to protect. This, then, was not a protective tariff, nor was it a retaliatory policy. Such a thing was never dreamt of by any statesman of either party in that Province. Hon. gentlemen would remember that, when this tariff was in operation in Nova Scotia, the Confederation scheme was started and was taken up and advocated by the hon. member for Cumberland, so that the people of Nova Scotia never had an opportunity to pronounce fairly on this question alone. He (Mr. Kirk) had no doubt but this policy of taxing the people's bread contributed largely, among other things, in bringing about the result at the next election of leaving the hon. gentleman the sole representative of the party of which he had been leader. He (Mr. Kirk) remembered that this feeling was so strong in Nova Scotia that the advocates and supporters of Confederation in that Province had pledged themselves to follow a revenue tariff policy which, whilst the hon. gentleman and his party held power was consistently followed up and defended, not only by the hon. member for Cumberland, but also by the right hon. member for Kingston. In a speech delivered at London, in June last, the right hon. gentleman gave as his reason for reducing the tariff, that "We had to conciliate the Nova Scotians in order to bring them within the fold." The right hon. gentleman was then willing to sacrifice Ontario interests to bring Nova Scotians "within the fold," and was now willing to put the screws on Nova Scotia, and sacrifice her interests in order to bring the Ontarians "within the fold." He (Mr. Kirk) found that, at least, some of the people in Ontario believed that, in Nova Scotia, they were in favour of Protection, for the President of the Manufacturers' Association of Ontario, in his opening address at the annual meeting held in Toronto, in October last, said :

"Another statement, equally wrong, was that the Maritime Provinces could not have been induced to enter the Union if a protective policy was to prevail. The facts were entirely to the contrary. Near the time of Confederation, the Nova Scotia Legislature imposed a duty of fifty cents on American flour."

This impression must have been produced by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) in the speeches he delivered during his picnic tour through Ontario. It could not have been produced by a study of Nova Scotia legislation, for such a thing as Protection was never thought of before Confederation, nor was such a policy as much as hinted at there. He (Mr. Kirk) remembered that, when, in 1862, the late Hon. Mr. Howe, the then leader of the Government, proposed to increase the tariff, which was only ten per cent., to twelve and one-half per cent., in order to raise a revenue to meet a deficit, the hon. member for Cumberland opposed the proposition, and denounced it with all the vehemence which he could command as a policy calculated to oppress the people of Nova Scotia and ruin her industries. This increase in the tariff only lasted for one year, it having been taken off at the next meeting of the Legislature, after which, the tariff remained at 10 per cent. until Confederation. The people of Nova Scotia could then boast, and were proud of the fact, that, with an overflowing Treasury, they were the lightest taxed people on the face of the earth, enjoying representative institutions and a free constitution. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Donville) had told them that a protective policy would be beneficial to the ship-building interests of the Maritime Provinces, and that we, with such a tariff, would be able to build two ships where we built but one now. If this assertion were substantiated by facts and arguments, he (Mr. Kirk) might possibly favour the adoption of such a policy. Unhappily, however, the hon. gentleman put forward neither facts nor arguments to sustain his position. Furthermore, the experience of the United States, which had been appealed to so often during this debate by hon. members of both sides of the House to sustain their positions, proved that the result would be the very opposite. He (Mr. Kirk) would be pardoned if, for a few moments, he referred to the ship-building interest in the United States. He found from the official reports of that country that, in the year 1860, seventy per cent. of the foreign carrying trade was done in American vessels, and but thirty per cent. in foreign vessels; whilst in 1876, twenty-five per cent. only of the entire foreign carrying trade was done by American vessels. He (Mr. Kirk) also found that, in 1860, the United States owned and had registered, including steam, sail, and barge vessels, 5,353,868 tons, or one ton for every $5\frac{1}{2}$ of her population. In 1876, her shipping declined to 4,279,458 tons, showing a decrease of 1,074,410 tons, or an average decrease of 65,150 tons per annum, and this in spite of the efforts to revive this interest made by granting a bounty to ship-builders. Thus, the United States had, in the year 1860, one ton of shipping for every $5\frac{1}{2}$ of her population, whilst in 1876, she had but one ton for every $9\frac{1}{4}$ of her population. In the year 1845, the total tonnage of United States shipping was 3,334,000 tons, while, as he had first pointed out, it was, in 1860, 5,353,868 tons, thus showing an increase under a revenue tariff policy of about two million tons in ten years. Now, what was the position of this interest in Canada under our revenue tariff policy? He found that, in 1871—the earliest statistics we had for the Dominion of Canada,—we owned and had registered 843,126 tons of shipping, or about one ton for every $6\frac{1}{2}$ of our population. In 1876, we owned and had registered 1,205,565 tons of shipping, or one ton for every $3\frac{1}{2}$ of our population, and 482,435 tons more in that year than in 1871, an average increase of 96,488 tons per annum. He found too, that last year, notwithstanding the commercial depression, we built 126,160 tons of shipping, worth \$4,500,000, of which we sold a quantity worth \$1,576,744, whilst the United States sold only \$195,802 worth. All this went to show that, under a policy of Protection, the shipping interest of the United States very seriously declined, whilst, under a revenue tariff, it had progressed in that country as it now did in Canada. He noticed in the New York Herald of January 30th, a discussion which took place in the House of Representatives on a Bill which had been introduced for the purpose of obtaining a register for a foreign-built ship. It would be remembered, perhaps, that a gentleman named Woodruff, of New York, had organized a company for the purpose of making a scientific expedition round the world, and that, after the company had been organized, a suitable American ship could not be found. Accordingly, one had to be bought in England, and application made to the House of Representatives for a law whereby it might be registered in the United States, otherwise it would have had to sail under British colours. He would read the following discussion which took place on that occasion :

“Mr. KENNA, of West Virginia, from the Committee of Commerce, reported back the Bill to recognize the Woodruff scientific expedition around the world. The Bill grants for the purposes of the expedition an American register to a foreign-built ship.

“Mr. FIFE, of Maine, enquired why it was that no American vessel could be found suitable for the purpose ?

“Mr. KENNA replied that he knew of no better reason than lay in the fact that the system of legislation for the last twenty years had driven American commerce and ships from the high seas.

“Mr. COX, of New York, favoured the Bill, and said that the law forbade Americans to buy abroad, and the tariff forbade them to build at home.

“Mr. PATTEN, of New York, opposed the Bill. He was opposed to the tariff. He would be glad to see the time when ships should be allowed to come in free, but the law should be equal and impartial, and there should be no individual legislation.

“Mr. HEWITT, of New York, enquired why the promoters of the enterprise could not get their ship in a foreign port, and from there sail to any other portion of the globe ?

“Mr. KENNA: Because we do not want to send out Yankees abroad in pursuit of knowledge under a foreign flag.”

This policy of Protection, then, had had the effect of “driving American commerce and ships from the high seas.” When the hon. the Finance Minister introduced the tariff in 1874, a proposition was made to put a duty of ten per cent. upon iron; the hon. member for Cumberland, whose bias towards Free-trade then showed itself very strongly, protested loudly against this tax as being ruinous to the ship-building interests of the Dominion.

The hon. the Finance Minister, yielding to the representations of the members from the Maritime Provinces supporting the Government, reduced this proposed duty to five per cent. The hon. member for Cumberland had changed his mind on this subject, and was now proposing to put a further duty upon iron in order to protect the iron manufacturer, forgetting that such a duty would be ruinous to the ship-builder. The hon. gentleman also proposed to put a duty on flour, wheat and other coarse grains, as well as on cornmeal and salt, thus dealing another blow to our great ship-building as well as other interests of the Maritime Provinces. When the hon. gentleman visited Ontario he talks of Protection to flour, wheat and salt, holding out to the people there the prospect of increased prices for those products as well as for their manufactured articles—a result which could only be obtained at the expense of the Maritime Provinces. When, however, he visited Nova Scotia, he talked only of a tax on sugar and coal, and was careful to lead the people to believe that a duty on flour and meal would not increase their cost to them, thus inconsistently taking away the pleasing prospect held out to the people of Ontario. From an examination of the Trade Returns for 1877, he (Mr. Kirk) found that we imported into Nova Scotia from the United States 121,035 barrels of flour and 136,254 barrels of cornmeal, on which, if we imposed a duty of 30 cents per barrel, as proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, the people of Nova Scotia would have had to pay the handsome tax of $128,666; and, when he found that this tax would fall chiefly on fishermen who lived away from the railways connecting Nova Scotia with the Upper Provinces, and who traded almost exclusively with the United States, as was the case with a large number of the people of the county which he had the honour to represent in this House, he (Mr. Kirk) felt it his duty to protest against the adoption of such a policy, and was glad to learn that the Government were determined to adhere strictly to their revenue tariff policy. The hon. member for Cumberland also advocated a duty on salt. He would see what effect this would have on the fishermen of Nova Scotia, who were the largest consumers of salt in the Dominion of Canada. He (Mr. Kirk) would refer to the evidence taken before a Committee on Salt Interests, appointed in 1876. Mr. Platt, of Goderich, in the county of Huron, who was a salt manufacturer, was examined before that Committee, and, having been asked how much duty he would require on imported salt to enable him to compete with the foreign article in the Maritime Provinces, answered $2 per ton. He also stated that, if a duty of $1 per ton were placed on coal, it would increase the price of salt fifty cents per ton. Mr. Grey, of Seaforth, in the same county, also a salt manufacturer, stated before the same Committee that, a duty on United States salt alone would not be beneficial to the salt interest of Canada, and advocated a duty of seven cents per 100lb., or $1.40 per ton on all imported salt. Now, he (Mr. Kirk) found that, last year (1877), there was imported into Nova Scotia about 43,540 tons of salt, and, irrespective of a duty on coal, it would require a duty of two dollars a ton in order to give the Ontario manufacturers the control of that market, which would mean a tax of $87,080, imposed chiefly on the poor fishermen of Nova Scotia, for the benefit of a few rich capitalists in Ontario, who needed no protection. But he (Mr. Kirk) contended that this was not all; the people of his Province, and the fishermen of his county especially, would have to pay for their salt. He knew that this policy of Protection also meant a duty on coal, which, if it amounted to one dollar per ton, would, as stated by Mr. Platt, increase the price of salt fifty cents per ton, and the duty on that article would have to be increased from two dollars to two dollars and fifty cents, thus wringing from the consumers an additional sum of $21,770 in the annual consumption of salt. If the annual consumption did not increase over what it was last year, which, however, it undoubtedly would, the whole sum thus extorted from the people of Nova Scotia, under this protective policy, would be $108,850 annually, on salt alone. This policy, then, in place of fostering all our industries, would, at least, be ruinous to our fishermen, who would be further burthened with an additional tax on their flour, meal, sugar, tea, boots and shoes, clothing, tobacco and every other necessary of life. He could not believe in the policy set forth by the Opposition, nor could he put much faith in their axiom, that, by taxing everybody, everybody would become rich. He also thought that evil would result from giving a few rich manufacturers the sole control of any one of our markets, as they could then make their own prices, and the people would be obliged to pay them. He had nothing more to add; he had thought it a duty incumbent on him, as a representative of Nova Scotia, to call the attention of the House to these matters, in the interest of his Province, and, especially of his own county, and he hoped that the statement he had submitted would receive earnest consideration.

MR. PERRY said that, if a duty of $1 per barrel was put on flour, the people of Prince Edward Island—more especially the labouring classes—would be forced to pay more for the necessaries of life than at present. If a tax was put on the flour and salt used by the fishermen of the Island, not to speak of the implements they used in the prosecution of their labours, the Government would, no doubt, derive a revenue therefrom of nearly $100,000 a year. He felt thankful, therefore, that the present Government and those liberal-minded men from Ontario had endeavoured to protect the industries of the Lower Provinces. If, however, the policy of Protection proposed by the hon. gentlemen opposite was one of taxation, as he believed it to be, higher wages would have to be paid to the men employed in the coal mines of Nova Scotia, and, consequently, the coal would be less worked by the producers. They were told that every man would be made rich by imposing a tax on the people. He had yet to learn that. His policy was to enable every man to sell his produce in the best market, at the highest price he could obtain, and purchase all articles he required as cheaply as he could. The people in the Province from which he came were able to buy their flour in Boston as cheap as in Montreal, and they paid therefor, not in money, but in fish, cod oil, etc., which they could export free of duty. There was no market in Canada to which they could send their fish in the same way, and, if compelled to buy their flour in a Canadian market, their fish, which would have to be sent to the States, would be sold for fifteen or twenty per cent. less than what it realized at present. When Prince Edward Island was incorporated with the Dominion, they had a tariff of twelve and a-half per cent., and now they had been saddled with an additional five per cent. Hard working people, he was sure, did not want any more Protection, and those of Prince Edward Island, it would be found, would not submit to increased taxation merely to gratify the manufacturers of Montreal or Ontario, who were neither liberal nor generous in their views. He had told the people of Prince Edward Island to beware of wolves in sheep's clothing; he had put them on their guard so that they might not blindly follow those who went about with plausible stories.

Mr. HADDOW said he merely wished to offer a few remarks as to his position in reference to the matter under discussion. The hon. member for Cumberland, in his speech on the Address, had said that he (Mr. Haddow) had assured the electors of Restigouche that he was an Independent; but, while he had told his constituents that he would follow that line of policy, he had also assured them that, if the right hon. member for Kingston introduced a motion favouring Protection, of which he was said to be an advocate, he would certainly vote against it. He must confess that he had come here with pretty strong impressions of the necessity of a policy of retaliation towards the United States, though the word retaliation did not convey the correct idea; he would rather say a fair play policy. But, after having attentively listened to all the speeches on both sides—and he must confess that the speech of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) had made the strongest impression on him of any from the opposite view of the question—yet he had become convinced that such a policy was not truly practicable. He had no doubt that this Protection was first intended for manufacturers; but to obtain favour for it, the agricultural and mining interests had to be included. He deemed it his duty to vote as he believed a majority of his constituents would vote on the question if they had the opportunity, and, believing that they would consider it prejudicial to their interests to support such a policy, it would be his duty to vote against it. He was interested in a business which might be benefitted by the adoption of the amendment, but he felt it incumbent upon him to seek first the interests of his constituents rather than his own. The Americans were allowed to send their canned goods into the Dominion free of duty, while Canadian canned goods were charged in the United States a duty of eighteen cents per dozen pounds, a duty which, according to the hon. member for Cumberland, was about to be largely increased. Under the Washington Treaty, certain concessions were made to the Canadians, for the right to send fish into the United States duty free; but, American, or rather Yankee-like, they taxed the cans which contained the fish, and he thought the Canadian Government ought, certainly, in that case to practice retaliation, pure and simple. The interests of his county were very much the same as those represented to-night by hon. members from New Brunswick. He could not see, if the policy of the Opposition was adopted, that it would lead to anything else than increased taxation to their people. He regretted the hon. member for Charlotte had referred in the manner he did to the Intercolonial Railway, which was a great national boon, and which had greatly benefitted the section of the country he represented as well as the whole north shore of New Brunswick. They had begun to realize its great public importance and utility, and, in a few years, they would find that it was a greater work than they ever anticipated it would be. He desired to give credit to the hon. member for Northumberland for his able advocacy of this enterprise which he had laboured so unceasingly to promote.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) said the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Kirk) assumed that Nova Scotia was a Free-trade Province. In that assumption, the hon. member was mistaken. Nova Scotia, to-day, was not, in the sense in which he understood Free-trade, a Free-trade Province; and, to-day, she would endorse the sentiments and policy contained in the resolution now before the House. At every opportunity which was given her for the last two years of expressing her sentiments in this connection, Nova Scotia had shown them to be in the direction of the policy which the resolution before the House indicated, and the hon. member for Guysborough might find out before long that this was the case, even in his constituency. However, there was one question which interested him more than others, and that was Protection to the coal industry of his Province, which industry was one of the largest in this Dominion, and perhaps of more national importance than all other Canadian industries. Yet, it had been going down, during the last few years, for want of Protection against United States coal; it had gone down so low that now it was nearly ruined. The employés in that industry were, at this time, in a state bordering on starvation. In the county which he had the honour to represent he was sorry to say a large number had even been obliged to flee to the authorities for relieving the poor, and he feared very much that the means at the disposal of these officials were not sufficient to prevent starvation among that class of people. It was well known that a large amount of evidence was taken last year before a Committee of this House in regard to this industry, and he was very much surprised that the Government had not, during recess, prepared some scheme by which to arrest this ruin that threatened the coal industry of his Province. A change was necessary to prevent the people who had been making a livelihood in this industry from leaving the country. If nothing were done to arrest the ruin, the thirty thousand people who had been making a livelihood in that industry for the last several years, would be obliged to leave the country. The coal mining property itself had been gradually decreasing in value. In the vicinity from which he came, he knew a property which represented $1,100,000 of paid-up capital, that had been sold at Sheriff's sale, a few months ago, for two hundred thousand dollars; this property had been one of the best and most valuable in the Island, fully equipped in every machinery required in the shipping of coal, and the depreciation was not so great in its value as the depreciation which had taken place in some other mining properties. He was at a loss to understand why the Government did not propose some scheme by which to arrest this impending ruin by imposing a duty on foreign coal; why they could not tax foreign coal in order to assist that industry, as well as they had been able to protect the coal oil industry in the Province of Ontario. It was well known the coal oil industry in Ontario had been protected, and was still protected, very largely. It was not necessary that he should say much in this connection after what had been said by the hon. member for Stanstead; but last year, when the hon. the Finance Minister delivered his Budget speech, he said, with reference to the coal oil industry of Ontario, that the Excise duty on any industry was much more oppressive than an equal amount of Customs duty, and that, in order to prevent the entire wiping out of that industry in Ontario, he proposed to take off the Excise duty, thus acknowledging the necessity of protection to that industry. If the principle held good in this case of a very small industry compared with the one he advocated, he thought it but just to the people of Nova Scotia and to the whole Dominion that the hon. the Finance Minister should have given the coal industry some protection. But the policy of the party in power was the same as when out of power in this respect. The Reform party had always been opposed to the Lower Provinces, and was now. He would refer to a speech delivered last summer at Clinton, in the Province of Ontario, by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, which showed the policy of the Government and its supporters in this House and in this country. The hon. gentleman had been charged with violating, in power, every principle he had advocated when in Opposition;

but there was one principle he had not violated, that of opposition to the Maritime Provinces. There was no use in talking of sectional jealousies, they could not be prevented from coming to life, and there was no doubt the hon. gentleman was opposed to Maritime interests. On the coal question he said, at the meeting at Clinton, with reference to the resolutions before the House last year, and referring to the Opposition: "They tried last year to carry a tax on coal." Hon. members would remember that, when the resolution was submitted, no one was louder than the hon. gentleman in saying that it meant nothing, and that it was not the intention of the mover to put a duty on coal at all, and to encourage the blind support which he received in the House, but no sooner did he get to the Province of Ontario, than he wished to create sectional jealousy against the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia, and said, "They tried to carry a tax on coal last year." He said, "I asked a manufacturer at Goderich how much he could get coal for, delivered at his establishment. He replied $3 per ton, and that from Nova Scotia he could not get it delivered under $7 per ton;" the object being to make the people of Ontario believe that the people of Nova Scotia wanted a duty put on foreign coal of $4 per ton. If that was the hon. Minister's intention, and no doubt it was, it was not a proper statement for him to make. It was not an honest or truthful statement to make. The people of Nova Scotia wanted only 50c. to 75c. duty per ton. If this duty of 50c. per ton were imposed, it would not raise the price of American coal delivered at Goderich over $3.50. In the Province of Nova Scotia, coal could not be bought for less than $3.50; therefore, if this duty were imposed, coal would not be dearer at Goderich than at Halifax. Then, the hon. the Minister of Public Works went on to say: "It was deliberately proposed to tax the great Province of Ontario to benefit Nova Scotia coal." The sectional feeling which he wanted to create had, perhaps, then begun. He was full of the "great Province of Ontario." How dared the other little Provinces of this Dominion attempt anything which he and the "great Province of Ontario" did not approve. He (Mr. Mackenzie) spoke about distorting facts. Who practiced that more than the hon. gentleman did? The hon. Minister still continued, "Protection is a principle only just when all enjoy it." Did he, then, think of the coal oil duty? Did the people of Nova Scotia enjoy the Protection which that industry received? The coal oil industry of Ontario was protected at the expense of the Maritime Provinces. They received no Protection in return. That speech of the hon. gentleman appeared to have been followed out by his supporters in the House. The hon. member for Brant stated in his speech that the coal oil industry of Ontario was in a very flourishing state, that it gave employment to about one thousand contented people, that its prosperity was due to legislative protection which he approved. And to make his inconsistency and want of justice more distinct, he immediately referred to the coal industry of Nova Scotia. He knew it was depressed, but he did not want any Protection for that. It would be robbing Peter to pay Paul. Yes, he would like to see an interprovincial trade, but not if it required any duty on coal. The hon. gentleman was quite prepared to see the people of Nova Scotia taxed by a duty on coal oil, but would not consent to any duty on American coal to protect the coal industry of Nova Scotia. Coal oil, as the hon. gentleman stated, was protected from fifty to sixty per cent., while Nova Scotia coal was not protected at all. Yet, everything entering into the manufacture of coal was taxed 17½ per cent. He might state that this was not a sectional matter, as had been asserted the other evening by the hon. member for North York, who, referring to the coal industry, stated that Nova Scotia coal could not be placed at Toronto under $1.50 per ton duty. Now, the hon. member should have known better, but perhaps his prejudices against that article might have outweighed his judgment. That hon. gentleman had been the chief man of the Coal Committee of this House last year, and had, therefore, every opportunity of knowing, from the evidence received, that he was wrong in stating that $1.50 per ton duty on American coal was necessary to enable Nova Scotia coal to be placed at Toronto. He (Mr. McDonald) had here the report of the evidence, and the condensed report of the Committee, in which it was stated :

“Witnesses interested in the extension of Nova Scotia trade, stated that if arrangements can be made for obtaining return freights for the Maritime Provinces, they can place steam coal or domestic coal of the finest class on the wharf at either of the cities of Hamilton or Toronto for $4 per ton of 2,240lb., or equal to $3.50 per short ton of 2,000lb.”

There was the evidence of several witnesses who all declared that a duty of 50c. or 75c. would extend the market for Nova Scotia coal, and give them in a short time the Ontario market. There was nothing in the evidence, from beginning to end, that justified the hon. member for North York's statement. With that before the House, he thought it was very wrong to say that $1.50 duty per ton would be required to place Nova Scotia coal at Toronto. Besides that, a gentleman who was well posted in the coal trade of Nova Scotia, had stated that Nova Scotia coal could be placed in the Toronto market for $4.83, and that a duty of 50c. per ton on American coal would secure, in a few years, the market of Ontario to the people of Nova Scotia to an extent of about $200,000. Several others had stated the same thing. But the hon. member for North York was not satisfied with that evidence. “Nova Scotia coal was too dear at any price,” the hon. member said on a former occasion, and he wished to prejudice the people of Ontario against it. He distorted the facts. The hon. member stated also that the Opposition wanted to tax the people of Ontario $750,000 for coal per year. Now, the hon. gentleman was not honest in making that statement, because, if the duty of 50c. was imposed, and Ontario consumed 500,000 tons altogether, it would only amount to $250,000; and he was sure that a return trade would spring up between the two Provinces which would more than counterbalance it. The market which would thus be secured for the agricultural products of Ontario would more than compensate for the loss incurred by the duty; and even the revenue derived by the Government from the coal duty, could be used to encourage the production of some other articles in Ontario. He had made up a statement and a few statistics which went to show the sectional policy pursued by the Government. It was well known that in 1872, at the general election, the cry raised by the Ministerial press was against the better terms to Nova Scotia. In this House, it was raised against the right hon. member for Kingston's supporters, that the Maritime Provinces were no better than sucking calves of the milch cow of Ontario. He would read a few statistics, and begged to call the attention of the hon. the Premier to the same. By the Trade and Navigation Returns, $16,483,148 worth of goods came in from the United States free of duty to Ontario; to Quebec, $7,486,145; to New Brunswick, $1,287,875; to Nova Scotia, $1,952,630; or $10.16 per head to Ontario, $6.25 per head to Quebec, $4.44 to New Brunswick, and $5 to Nova Scotia; or, in other words, the Province of Ontario received goods free of duty to the amount of $10.16 per head, while Nova Scotia only received goods free of duty to the amount of $5 per head. Ontario, therefore, was interested in sustaining the present tariff, and the Maritime Provinces were interested in having it readjusted, so as to obtain justice in this respect. The tariff was sectional as far as that was concerned. The whole amount of goods imported into Ontario, free of duty, was $10.65 per capita; into Nova Scotia, $8.20; and into New Brunswick, $6.48 per capita; which showed that the Province of Ontario had the advantage also in this respect. Then to come to the Customs duties. Ontario paid $3.29 per head, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick $3.54 per head; or Nova Scotia and New Brunswick paid twenty-five cents per head more than the Province of Ontario. He considered that the tariff was unjust to the Lower Provinces and should be readjusted. If the people of Ontario were to pay the same rate as the people of Nova Scotia, they should pay $753,091 more than they had done. He found also, that, by the evidence taken before the Coal Committee last year, the same statement had been made for the past nine years. Mr. Hensham said :

“Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had paid $2.10 more per head than Ontario and Quebec. The population of Ontario and Quebec was something like 3,000,000; if they paid the same proportion as the other two Provinces of Customs duties, they would pay $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 more than they have. The average of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick was $750,000 more than the average of the other two Provinces.”

The representatives of the Maritime Provinces supported a policy carrying this out; a policy taking out of the pockets of the Maritime Provinces $750,000 per year more than out of the pockets of Ontario and Quebec. In the interests of this country, the tariff should be readjusted and this rectified. He might add also that the hon. member for North Norfolk, (Mr. Charlton) the other evening, when reading his letters from the manufacturers of Ontario, stated that some of those letters complained of too much Protection. Well, that only proved the necessity for a readjustment of the tariff. Those manufacturers who had stated they were too much protected, should have that Protection taken off and given to some other industry that required it.

Mr. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said he desired to define his position, and express his opinions in regard to the question before the House. In the first place, he was opposed to Protection, in the ordinary acceptance of the term; that was to say, he was opposed to placing high duties on articles to favour certain manufacturers at the expense of the consumer. But, while he was prepared to advocate Free-trade to a certain extent, he maintained there was no such thing as Free-trade pure and simple; and his impression was that there were modes in which the manufacturers of the country might be encouraged without adopting a high protective tariff. That was the ground which he was prepared to take. Let hon. members look at the administration of public affairs during the seven years the late Government was in power. Canada prospered to a degree to which no other country had ever prospered during a similar period;

the late Government reduced the duties instead of increasing them, and year by year provided for the construction of public works and meeting the public wants; and, notwithstanding their great liberality, amounting almost to extravagance, there was a yearly surplus. When the present Administration came into power, they commenced by imposing additional taxes on the people, and the first act of this Government, which had elevated the standard of purity, which was to be an Administration of economy and reform, was to attempt to strike a blow at the most important industry in the Maritime Provinces; the shipping interest. Although the present Government had yearly increased the duties, it had a deficit for which they were obliged to provide, and at the same time maintain the credit of the country. That was the condition in which we were now placed. He maintained there was plenty of money collected, and that, with economical and proper management, the necessary requirements of the country could be amply provided for without levying any additional duties whatever. There was no question about that fact. But the answer to all charges of extravagance brought against the Government was simply that the late Government had spent so and so until the last year it held office. That was no answer whatever. If the late Government, having surpluses year after year, could afford to be generous, their conduct afforded no justification of the present Administration which, entering office at a time when trade was depressed, should have exercised economy and refrained from increasing the burdens of the people. As a Free-trader and Non-Protectionist, he voted, last year, against the additional duties proposed by the Finance Minister. He thought those duties were unfair and that a readjustment of the tariff might be made, and the additional amount of money required might have been raised in some other way. He was in favour of imposing duties to raise the amount of revenue required, but nothing more. The duties imposed last year on tea and malt were uncalled for, and, particularly, that on malt was thoroughly unjust. By placing a high duty on malt, the Government struck at one of the agricultural interests, for the duty affected the price of barley very materially. A blow was struck at the industry of the farmer by imposing that duty, which did not exist in other parts of the world. While Canadian farmers were prevented from placing their barley on the American market on account of the duty imposed by the United States Government, the Americans were allowed to send their breadstuffs into this country free of duty; among the principal articles thus admitted being corn, which was largely used for distillation purposes. If the Government wished to raise that amount of money by duties, why did they not lay them on rum, whiskey, brandy, wines, silks and satins, instead of upon the poor man's tea? That was an objection he offered to the tariff last year, and he repeated it now, and, at the same time, it must be remembered that the present Government called itself a Free-trade Government, although he could not understand how there was such a thing as Free-trade. The reason why so many articles were on the free list under the present tariff was because they had been left there by the late Government for the purpose of encouraging manufactures. Those duties acted as a protection, and when the Government, through the Finance Minister, made an attempt to strike at the shipping interests of the Maritime Provinces, unless outside influence had been brought to bear to induce him to place the duties proposed at a lower rate than he intended, the Government would have destroyed the best industry of the Lower Provinces. The shipping interest was very much depressed, and it was not profitable to build vessels at the present time; but, rather than give up the business altogether, they continued it in the hope that, when trade revived, they would be in a position to undertake work advantageously. If the Government were to add one dollar per ton to the cost of vessels built in the Maritime Provinces, they would destroy the trade. The shipping interest, with the small Protection now afforded it, afforded employment for a large number of persons; and in Prince Edward Island alone, $500,000 was annually expended on the material and labour used in ship-building. That was a direct advantage, and there must also be indirect advantages flowing from it. Every farmer in the Province, on account of that ship-building interest, received five or ten cents a bushel for his oats more than he otherwise would obtain. A large number of vessels were built in that Province for which the builders provided cargoes, and thus became, to a certain extent, grain merchants, and went into the market to buy produce. Consequently, competition was increased; and if any hon. member thought proper to turn to the prices for which oats were bought in Canada and in Prince Edward Island, they would find that, while they brought in Canada, for example, from 29c. to 32c., they were sold at the Island for from 38c. to 42c. He was, therefore, satisfied that, in addition to the advantage of the employment given, and money paid for labour and material in the shipbuilding interests, each farmer received about $1,000 more than he would otherwise obtain. By reason of ships being built at the Island, and the owners being obliged to obtain cargoes, the Province derived benefit from it. In regard to the sugar interest, if the Government, instead of increasing the duties on raw sugar, were to reduce them very materially, they would not only encourage the refining interest in Canada, but also give employment to a large number of vessels, and enable them more easily to carry products into the markets of the West Indies and bring return cargoes. While he was not prepared to increase the duties or to advocate Protection, he was ready to support a readjustment of the tariff in such a manner as to fall more equitably on those best able to pay the duties, and not on the poor man's tea or on the farmer's barley, and not to encourage the use of spirits. That was really the effect of the policy adopted by the present Government. The principal object of the people of the Maritime Provinces was to obtain reciprocity with the United States, and the question arose: which was the most likely way to get it? They knew their American neighbours were not fools and would not make any concessions unless they could obtain something in return. How did this country get reciprocity before? Simply by protecting our fisheries and by seizing and confiscating their vessels when they come within our waters. As soon as the Americans saw they could obtain advantages by giving Canada reciprocity, they would do so, and not before. With a view, therefore, to reciprocity, as he stated last year, and he repeated now, the people of the Lower Provinces were willing to adopt any policy which would be calculated to bring that about, and to impose higher duties on goods coming from the United States. The question of reciprocity was the most important of all subjects to the people of Prince Edward Island, whose people desired it and were willing to submit to any reasonable taxation to secure it, because the Island never prospered to the same extent as it did during the ten years the Reciprocity Treaty was in force. He hoped the Dominion would hold on to its fisheries and to every privilege and right it possessed, and would not barter them away to any foreign power unless it obtained a fair money value for them. He knew the feeling was strong that what we wanted was a reciprocity treaty. The people were quite prepared to adopt the policy so far as reciprocity went; but the Government did not offer anything, they did not intend to do so, and, therefore, it was the duty of the Opposition, as representatives of the people, to press the Government upon the matter. Something had been said in the House the other evening by the hon. member for Prince that, at the last election, he (Mr. Pope) did not dare to come forward and oppose him, but that he sent someone else, who was beaten by a large majority. He wished to state that he had nothing to do with sending another candidate, and he did not even vote at that election. The hon. gentleman had gone through the country declaring that if this Government did not keep its promises, he would withdraw his support from them. He had made another statement: that in 1852, Prince Edward Island was a stronghold of Liberalism.

But in 1857, he (Mr. Pope) had the honour of being returned to the Conservative Government in the Local House, which was in power for eight years. In 1868, he was leader of the Conservative Government there, and was supported by the hon. member himself. In 1872, again, he was leader of the Government, and was supported by the hon. gentleman. For eleven or twelve years he had been supported by him, and, although the Local Government was not called Liberal, there were almost as many Conservatives in it as Liberals. He was surprised his hon friend should get up and make a statement so far incorrect. He wished, again, to say that he was not a Protectionist in the strict sense of the word, but he was prepared, in the hope of obtaining reciprocity, to vote for the amendment before the House.

Mr. MacKAY (Cape Breton) said he felt it desirable to make a few remarks in connection with the important question which was now before the country, and, to be as concise as possible, he would directly refer to the resolution of the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald). It would be in the remembrance of this House that, some two Sessions ago, the hon. gentleman brought forward a very similar resolution, and it was voted down. In that resolution, reference was made to the benefits of Protection in regard to the manufacturing and agricultural interests of the country, but there was no reference whatever to the mining interests. No doubt for the purpose of inducing hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House to support that resolution this Session, he had thought it desirable to add the word "mining," so that he might thereby secure some additional support. He (Mr. MacKay) had noticed, with a good deal of attention, the remarks which had fallen from the lips of the right hon. gentleman, to see if this resolution was anything more than a political kite, and he had come to the conclusion that it was nothing more than "sound and fury, signifying nothing." In his speech, the hon. gentleman made no reference at all to the coal mining interests of Canada. He spoke of the manufacturing and agricultural interests of the Dominion, but not one word did he say with respect to the coal mining interests. He advocated protecting the salt mining interests of Ontario, but said nothing about protecting the coal mining interests of Nova Scotia. He might, if he had seen fit, put in his resolution words showing his views with regard to these mining interests; he might have inserted the words "that in the opinion of this House it is desirable to impose a duty of 17½ per cent on all imported coal." But he had not seen fit to bring forward anything but the bald resolution, which might mean everything, but which he (Mr. MacKay) believed meant nothing at all, so far as the coal mining interests of Nova Scotia were concerned. Protecting the salt industries of Ontario would certainly not be of any benefit to Nova Scotians, because, such a large quantity of salt being used by their fishermen, it would be very detrimental to their interests, and to many other interests which were dependent upon the fisheries for their support, for the fishermen there would be compelled to purchase salt from the Province of Ontario. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), who spoke now and again in the interests of Nova Scotia, had it in his power to retain the duty of 50c. per ton to protect the coal interest, but, instead of that, he voted for the duty being taken off. That was the time he should have shown his solicitude for the coal interests of the Province, and not now, when he was in the cold shades of Opposition. He did not see that any assistance was intended to be afforded to the coal industry by the resolution, therefore he begged to state his intention of opposing it.

MR. CURRIER said the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) had pointed out that he had acted inconsistently—and the fact had been commented upon by another hon. gentleman—in moving to have the duty removed from pork and have it placed on the free list. He contended that this was not an act of inconsistency on his part, because, in doing this, he was giving Protection to an industry—the lumber trade—that at that time was very much depressed, and still remained so. The hon. gentleman also said that, during the election campaign of last spring, he (Mr. Currier) had taken credit to himself for having had a motion in his desk to remove the duty from pork. It was true he had that motion in his desk, and he looked through the House for a seconder, but was unable to get one. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McNab), in an excellent speech, had claimed that he had a right to speak for the farmers of this country, and that they wanted no Protection whatever; and yet, to his astonishment and surprise, that gentleman had seconded his motion. He did not propose to argue on the question of Free-trade or Protection that evening. He had only wished to clear himself from the charge of inconsistency. With reference to the election of last spring, he might say that certain hon. gentlemen on his side of the House had discovered a mote in Mr. Speaker's eye and in the eye of the hon. member for Lincoln, and measures were taken to remove it. It resulted that an hon. gentleman opposite thought he had discovered a beam in his (Mr. Currier's) eye, and, in order to pluck out this beam, he was obliged to vacate his seat, in which act he was followed by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Norris). He was glad to see the hon. gentleman re-elected, and his first words of greeting to the hon. gentleman at the opening of this Session were to congratulate him on his return, and to say that, had he had a vote in the county of Lincoln, if he could have been there on polling day, he would have cast it in favour of the hon. gentleman. He could say the same thing with regard to Mr. Speaker. If he had been present when the vote was taken in the House, and he was very sorry that this was not the case, he would have voted for Mr. Speaker. His excuse for making these remarks was merely to answer accusations which had been made against him by the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Galbraith) and the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond).

MR. MCGREGOR said that the object of the amendment was to protect the miner and the manufacturer as well as the farmer. He was strongly in favour of protection to the farmer, but, inasmuch as the amendment did not deal with the case of the farmers alone, he was forced to oppose it, and wait until an opportunity presented itself for advocating Protection to the agricultural interest alone. He did not think it just that the manufacturer should be protected and the farmer left out in the cold.

Motion made and question proposed :

That all the words after the word "That" be left out, and the following inserted in stead thereof: "It be resolved that this House is of opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which by a judicious readjustment of the Tariff will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home; will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed; will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market; will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand; will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade."—(Sir John A. Macdonald).

Motion in amendment negatived on the following division :

PRAYERS.

INDIAN EDUCATION IN ONTARIO.

QUESTION.

MR. McCRANEY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to hand over the appropriation made for the education of the Indians in Ontario, and the management of the Indian Schools to the Government of Ontario?

MR. MILLS: I may say that I have had some communication upon this subject with the Minister of Education in Ontario, but no conclusion has as yet been arrived at. The correspondence is of very recent date, and it is now incomplete.

CHESTER EAST POST OFFICE.

QUESTION.

MR. BOURBEAU enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to transfer the post office of Chester East, County of Arthabaska, to the Village of Chester East; if not, whether it is their intention to establish a post office in said village?

MR. HUNTINGTON: I may say that some representations had been made to the Department that such a change would be desirable, and our officers have been consulted; but that is all I know about it.

MR. MCGREGOR.

THE ST. PAUL AND PACIFIC RAILWAY BONDS.

QUESTION.

MR. CASGRAIN, for MR. SCHULTZ, enquired, Whether the whole or any portion of the following telegraphic report which appeared in the Toronto Globe, of 8th March, be true:—

[By Telegraph from our own Correspondent.]

“WINNIPEG, Man., March 7.—The St. Paul Pioneer Press states editorially that the purchasers of the bonds of the St. Paul and Pacific Railway, are Messrs. Hill and Kittson, associated with Mr. Stephens, of the Bank of Montreal, and Mr. Donald A. Smith. It asserts that, through the influence of the latter, the support and co-operation of the Dominion Government have been obtained in the adjustment of their connections with the Railway system of Manitoba.

“The article concludes:—‘It is deemed proper to make public these facts to disabuse antagonistic parties of misapprehensions which may lead to a useless waste of valuable time.’”

MR. MACKENZIE: The Government know nothing about who all the parties are who are connected with that road; but Mr. Stephens of the Bank of Montreal, has been in communication with the Government about the transfer of the traffic at the boundary, from the Pembina branch, upon the ground that he has made arrangements for the furnishing of the road which is now partly finished to that point; and the Government propose to make some arrangements with that company for the transfer of traffic. No lease has been effected, and no lease will be effected, without the sanction of Parliament.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—RED RIVER CROSSING.

QUESTION.

MR. CASGRAIN, for MR. SCHULTZ, enquired, When the Government intend to compensate the owners of lands taken by the Government at the crossing of the Red River by the Canada Pacific Railway?

MR. MACKENZIE: If they are the owners of the land, of course, they will be paid for the land; but if they are not the owners, they are not entitled to any compensation.

CULLERS' REMUNERATION.

QUESTION.

MR. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, an amendment to 40 Vic., chap. 16, for the purpose of increasing the pay of the Cullers in any of the Departments of the Supervisor's office?

MR. LAURIER: It is not the intention of the Government to do so.

RE-MEASUREMENT OF STEAM VESSELS.

QUESTION.

MR. CHEVAL moved for a return showing the amount expended for the re-measurement of steam vessels registered under the Act of the late Province of Canada, now repealed; the names of the steam vessels; their tonnage; the amount paid, and to whom the said vessels belonged.

Motion agreed to.

THE TUPPER HOUSE, HOLLIS STREET, HALIFAX.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. GOUDGE moved for a return of all expenditure for repairs and additions incurred by the Intercolonial Railway Department on the Tupper House, Hollis Street, Halifax, used as a Ticket Office for that Department. He said he would explain the object he had in making this motion. In February, 1873, a certain property in Hollis Street, Halifax, was owned by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), who then was a member of the Government. It had been decided, it appeared, by the railway authorities, that they should have an office more in the centre of the city than the office they had previously had for the sale of tickets in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, and the hon. member's building was considered convenient for the purpose. No doubt the hon. gentleman thought it desirable that he should have the opportunity of making as much out of the revenue of the country as anybody else; as he (Mr. Tupper) had boasted in a speech made in Halifax during the election of his hon. friend the hon. the Minister of Militia. Before he entered the Government, he dispossessed himself of all public property. Having in view, without doubt, the leasing of this property to the Government, the hon. gentleman had caused it to change hands, and on the 8th of February they found that the hon. gentleman deeded this property to his son, Stewart Tupper. He (Mr. Tupper) told them in his speech that this was done for the sum of one dollar, plus the natural love and affection he bore that son, which, without doubt, was very proper; but, nevertheless, he (Mr. Goudge) thought that, in connection with this natural love and affection, the hon. gentleman had his eye on greater advantages to accrue to a member of his family. He (Mr. Goudge) found that in May, 1873, an arrangement was made with the Intercolonial Railway Department whereby this property was to be leased for the term of three years, and that the lease was sent to Stewart Tupper, to the Intercolonial Railway Department, though it was never perfected by the then Superintendent of Government Railways. The consideration given for the lease of this building was $600 a year, and, although it was stated by the hon. gentleman that this was not a greater sum than had previously been received by himself for this property from the former lessee, yet, while this statement was to a certain extent true, it did not contain all the truth; for this building which was leased by the Government for $600 a year had, he believed, something like $1,500 spent on it for repairs and additions and other purposes. He also found that no provision was made whereby, at the termination of the lease, the Government should be recouped for the money thus laid out. This lease was never signed; and when the present Government came into power, they, in view of these circumstances, in their wisdom, and very properly too, felt that it was very desirable that this state of things should not continue; and, consequently, at the end of seventeen months, they cancelled these arrangements and closed this office. He found that something like $350 was paid in rental for this building, while something in the vicinity of $1,500 was paid for repairs, thereby making this a very expensive building for the purposes in question. He did not hesitate to say that a building suitable and properly equipped for the sale of tickets, with every necessary convenience and appliance, could have been obtained in Halifax for, at least, the sum that was paid for the rental of this property, which would have saved the $1,500 mentioned. If the latter sum had been expended solely to fit up the office, this expenditure might seem to some extent legitimate; but when it was known that this money was applied to the building generally for repair, thereby enhancing the value of the property, he thought that a person having the close connection that the hon. gentleman had with the Government, should not have asked the Government to spend such a large sum of money on it. This transaction certainly savored of the character of job; and, therefore, he considered that the House should be put in possession of this information. The transfer to the son, was made on the 8th of February, 1873, and on the 1st day of May that year, the arrangement was entered into, whereby the Government were to become the lessees of this building. It must have been a very expensive arrangement to cost in the vicinity of $1,200 a year for the sale of tickets there, in addition to the salary of the person who was charged with this and no other business. He was not aware that this building was let for any other purpose. The transactions were very costly and the Government had very properly, on acceding to power, made a change whereby a large saving was effected, while the public were quite as well served. When the return came down, he would take the opportunity to address the House at greater length on this subject.

MR. TUPPER said that having on a previous occasion stated to the House that he would be extremely glad if hon. gentlemen opposite would raise the question, and take means to examine into it, he did not at this time feel called upon to say much. The mover of the resolution had stated in his remarks that he (Mr. Tupper) had no connection whatever with the transaction to which he referred, and stated also that he had ceased to be the owner of the property months before it was leased to the Government. He defied hon. gentlemen opposite to prove that the transfer of the property was an improper transaction, and at the time the lease was entered into he had no more interest in the building than the hon. mover of the resolution. He was aware that when the Railway department leased the property, they had to make certain alterations on it for the purpose of adapting it to their own purposes; but what the cost of the alterations amounted to he was not able to state. The amount for which the house was leased to the Department was the same as that for which it was leased to a tenant, $600 a year, and under the lease, any alterations or repairs required, must be done by the tenant. He did not think it necessary to say much more on the subject than this: that the charge made by the present Government, whereby the sale of tickets in Halifax was handed over to a private firm, involved a much greater expense than was caused by the previous arrangement. He thought he was correct in saying that the property had not been offered either to the Government or the Railway department; but it was sought for by them, because, as the hon. gentleman knew, it adjoined the Halifax hotel, which was in the most central part of the city. It was leased to the Department at the same rate as it had previously been to a private tenant, and had since been sold for $9,500 in cash. While in the occupation of the Railway department, it was not only used as a place for the sale of tickets, but there also was a residence for the officer who took charge of the sale of tickets, and who was always accessible to the public. He was glad the hon. gentleman had made the motion which he had just proposed, for the giving of the publicity to the transaction could not be more satisfactory to any one than to himself (Mr. Tupper.)

MR. JONES (Halifax) said the hon. gentleman had not acquainted the House with the whole transaction, but had merely stated that he did not know the nature of the alteration which had been made on his property. It might be said that the alterations in question entailed an expenditure which the Railway department was obliged to renew, but the fact was that the whole interior had been renewed at a cost of something like £100, thereby, of course, improving its value. He did not deny that it was necessary to have an officer to sell tickets, but he did say that there was no necessity for him to reside on the premises. Such was not the case under any previous or subsequent arrangement, and if the Government had taken an office in the centre of Halifax for about $300, no further expense would have been necessary, except, of course, the salary of an official to sell the tickets. No doubt the plea would be raised by his hon. friend that, as his large property had been taken by the Government, it was necessary that some one should always be on the spot to protect it. The hon. gentleman had said he was perfectly willing to have the matter investigated by a committee, which was the more surprising when it was remembered that the hon. gentleman, on a previous occasion, had not expressed that entire confidence in Parliamentary Committees which he now appeared willing to place in them. When it was proposed to submit any matter to a Committee, hon. gentlemen opposite had invariably shrank from the public examination. To him (Mr. Jones) it seemed a very fortunate circumstance for the hon. gentleman that he should have discovered that he held a property so extremely suitable for the purposes of the Government, and that he should have transferred it at such an opportune moment to a member of his own family, whereby he reaped, indirectly, as much benefit as if it was leased in his own name. Such a transaction seemed to him, to carry on the face of it suspicion of an intention to evade the law. Such, also, he believed would be the conviction of those who heard the matter discussed. It would seem to them that the hon. gentleman, knowing what was likely to take place, had transferred the property to his son in order that, by alterations which the railway department, on its being leased to them, would be forced to make on it, would have the effect of increasing its value.

MR. TUPPER said he did not intend to continue the discussion, but he would like to remark that the Railway department, believing that the building, owing to its central situation, would be a great convenience, requested to lease it from his son for the sale of tickets, and an official was subsequently placed in charge, whose duty it was to give the fullest information to any person who wished to travel by the Intercolonial Railway. Before the house was transferred, it was in such a thorough state of repair that he (Mr. Tupper) refused to make any repairs upon it, saying that they must be done at the expense of the tenants. He did not exactly know what alterations had been made by the department, but this he knew: that, since they had vacated it, several changes had been made by the parties who succeeded them in the occupancy thereof, so that, instead of increasing the value of the building by their alterations, the department had actually lessened it.

MR. JONES said the hon. gentleman must have misunderstood him if he meant that he (Mr. Jones) had said there was no necessity for having an officer at the railway ticket office. What he did say was: that there was no actual necessity for renting such a large property merely that such an officer might live there. The subsequent arrangement made by the Government was a much more advantageous and economical one, and the office was open from early morning till as late as the public had any right to expect.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said, after the explanation which had been made, he was desirous that the motion should be carried. The hon. gentleman who had moved it would, however, have shown much better taste had he waited till the evidence contained in the returns sought supported the opinions he had formed, instead of attacking the hon. member for Cumberland by making statements such as those which had been listened to by the House. He might also say that the expressions "love and affection," and "a dollar," had been made use of by the hon. gentleman in such a way as showed that he knew nothing about the mode in which such transfers from a father to son were effected. If the transfer had been in different terms, it would have been a false statement, and it was most unfair that the matter should be brought before the House in such a fashion and referred to in what was intended to be sarcastic language.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he was pleased to learn from the remarks of the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) that the House, in future, would be spared all intemperate language, and that the business would be conducted in a calm, forbearing and conciliatory spirit.

Motion agreed to.

MR. HUNTER'S SURVEY OF THE PINE RIVER PASS.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) moved for a copy of all reports of Mr. Joseph Hunter, C.E., in regard to the survey made by him in 1877 of the pass known as the Pine River Pass in the Rocky Mountains. He said his object in making this motion was to obtain some information as to the results of the survey made by Mr. Hunter last year. Mr. Marcus Smith's report, which was embodied in that of the Minister of Public Works, contained a sort of partial explanation as to what had been done. He would like the report asked for to be submitted to the House before any discussion thereupon took place, but he would read the following from the report made by Mr. Smith. Referring to a survey from Fort McLeod, eastward, to the valley of the River Misinchinca, an affluent of the Parsnip, he said :

"On descending the river, a stream was discovered falling into it from the north, about thirty-five miles above its confluence with the Parsnip. Following this up four miles, it was found to issue from a small lake named Azuzetta. This proved to be near the summit of the Pine River Pass, its altitude being estimated at 2,430 feet above the level of the sea. A little beyond this, the head waters of the Pine River were struck, and the river followed down eastward to the Forks, a point reached by Mr. Selwyn with a canoe from the Peace River in 1875. The exploration was continued 30 miles eastward of the Forks on to the Beaver Plains, which lie between the Rocky Mountains and Peace River. Thus the question of the feasibility of the Pine River Pass is at last solved. The full Report has not yet been received, but the distance between Fort McLeod on the west side of the Mountains, and the Forks of Pine River on the east side, is roughly estimated at 90 miles. The gradients are stated to be generally easy, with the exception of about four miles near the summit of the Pass where they will probably be about 60 feet to the mile, and the works in the construction of a railway would be moderately light, except for a length of about eight miles near the summit of the Pass, and a short length at the Forks of Pine River, where they would be heavy. The land in the Pine River valley for 50 miles above the Forks is described as of excellent quality, and well suited for agriculture and grazing purposes. It should be observed that this fertile strip of land, lying nearly in the heart of the Rocky Mountains, is an extension of the Beaver Plains which connect with the great fertile belt stretching from Manitoba to and beyond the Peace River. Should the engineering character of a line by this route prove, on closer survey, as favourable as reported, the results from this exploration will be amongst the most important that have been obtained since the commencement of the surveys. Some of the serious difficulties in crossing the Rocky Mountains will have disappeared, and this formidable chain, once held to be insurmountable, and even now felt to be a grave obstacle to railway enterprise, can then be passed with very favourable gradients, and with works not exceeding in magnitude those generally required on other portions of the line. In addition to the manifest advantages offered by this route, there is further the important consideration that in place of a bleak sterile country, wherein settlement is an impossibility for hundreds of miles, the line would traverse an area of remarkable fertility, with but a few short intervals of country unfit for settlement. This route also passes between the vast mineral districts of Omineca and Cariboo. The extraordinary results of recent mining operations in the latter give promise, when their resources are more fully developed—as they can only be with the assistance of direct railway communication—of rivaling, if not surpassing, the far-famed gold and silver regions of the neighbouring States, which lie in the same mountain zone. The distance from Livingstone on the located line, over the Yellow-head Pass to the confluence of the Chilacooh and Stewart rivers, near Fort George, is 1,029 miles. The distance between the same points, via the Pine River Pass, measures on the map so nearly the same as the above that a survey alone can determine the precise difference between the two routes."

No doubt the intentions of the Ministry on the subject would be known before the end of the Session; but, in the meantime, he thought Mr. Hunter's reports should be laid on the table, so that hon. gentlemen might be put in possession of whatever information they would afford previous to the railway route being debated.

MR. DECOSMOS said that, before this resolution was accepted, he should like to draw the attention of the House to the importance of these surveys as a means of encouraging settlement and as preparing the best route for the trans-continental railway. They had, he believed, in the possession of this House, a number of reports from various sources. They had the engineers' reports, geological reports, botanists' reports, tourists' reports, and last, though not least, the report of the Minister of the Interior. In these special reports, they found abundance of information, almost full and complete, indicating what route should be taken with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway. So far as the engineers reports were concerned, they had left several lines of route to choose from, one by way of Yellowhead Pass to Bute Inlet, the other branching south-west by Fort George to Bute Inlet, and the third by way of the Pine River and then to a point near to what used to be called Fort George, and then to Burrard Inlet, or nearly to Fort Simpson on the Pacific. The Northern route, so far as could be judged from the description of the country given by the engineers, and more especially the report of Mr. Selwyn in his geological survey of Canada, and the excellent account of Mr. Macoun, one of his staff of botanists, was by far the best. There could be no doubt whatever, by taking the Northern route, by Pine River Pass, and across British Columbia, they would have one continuous line of railway, where settlements could be made, where they could find a rich agricultural country, where they could have a country full of mineral wealth, and a country that would provide traffic for the railway, and where they would have a direct line for the merchandise to pass through the Dominion from its western to its eastern shores. He was aware that it was, to some extent, labour for the House to listen to matters of this character, but he might claim the indulgence of the House to draw attention to the report made by Mr. Selwyn, of the Geological Survey, a gentleman, although connected with the Government, yet occupying such an eminent position in the scientific world that, whatever he said was accepted as being unbiassed and wholly uninfluenced by any sectional feeling, political or otherwise. On page 30 of his book, "The Geology of Canada, 1875-6," Mr. Selwyn stated that he started from the line of the Fraser, in British Columbia, to a point called Quesnel, and from there by Westroad River to Sinkut Lake, following the old overland telegraph line. He said:

"The ground is generally level, or only slightly undulating. There are numbers of small lakes abounding with fish, and although the soil is almost always light, and sometimes on the ridges too sandy or gravelly to be fit for cultivation, there are, nevertheless, considerable tracts of good agricultural land on open or light timbered flats and slopes along the borders of the lakes and along the streams and rivers; among which may be mentioned: Westroad River, Chilacoh River, Nechacco River and Stewart River; also Naltesby, Eulatatzela and Sinkut Lakes. At the crossing place on the Nechacco, and between it and Stony Creek, there are extensive acres of the richest land, covered with luxuriant herbage, and similar fine land occurs along the valley to Fraser's Lake."

Here, then, they had a description that gave them an idea of the country at or near Fort George. On page 43, moving still further westward in the Rocky Mountain region, they found Mr. Selwyn saying:

"Notwithstanding this, I do not think there is any serious impediment in any part of the Pass to the construction of either a waggon road or a railway, especially along the right bank."

So much for the construction of the railway in that direction. In passing further up the Pine River Pass, he remarked (at page 48):

"Charlette cultivates a small garden, and vegetables of all kind grow splendidly. He has potatoes, carrots, parsnips, onions, turnips, French beans, beets and barley. These were all planted between the 15th and 24th May. The potatoes, turnips and onions are already a fair size and fit for use. Wheat has not yet reached this part of Peace River, but would doubtless give an excellent crop."

The date when this was written was July 18th. So much for Pine River Pass and its capacity for cultivation. Again, at page 50, he said—and this was a continuation of the same description :

"The trail though rough in occasional spots, carried us over a very fine country, where the excellent soil and large tracts of fine land facing the south, would offer great facilities for farming. There was, however, a scarcity of wood, but the southern banks and the numerous islands being covered with dense forests, afford unlimited quantities of that material for both fuel and manufacturing purposes."

This was the Peace River country, in the direction of and near the mouth of Middle River. Now, Mr. Selwyn made a tour in order to enter this Pass, and here was what he said of it :

"Mr. King and I rode out to a small lake known as Little Lake (see map), about seven miles to the north-west, on the table land. This lake is one of the resources of Pine River North, which joins the Peace about thirteen miles further down, at the site of the old Fort of St. John. After rising 724 feet we come upon a fine level or slightly undulating country, covered with the richest herbage of astonishing luxuriance; I have seen nothing in the Saskatchewan region that at all equals it."

He would call the attention of the hon. the Minister of the Interior to this fact: that, if we could find a road for our railway by Pine River Pass that would enable us to carry our settlements through the fertile tracts of Manitoba into Pine River Pass itself, he could not see how a doubt could arise in anyone's mind as to the route that railway should take. Here was another remark of Mr. Selwyn :

"Similar fine country extends for many miles up and down the river. Professors Macoun and Anderson walked to the nearest point of Pine River North, and passed the whole distance, seven to eight miles, through similar country."

He did not know what more any people could want in a tract of country. He would now draw the attention of the House to the report of the Minister of the Interior, and, in doing so, would specially refer to the Southern route, known as "No. 2"; and in this report of the Minister of the Interior, they had, on page 68 of the Appendix, a description of one of the Indian Reserves of the country, along the Fraser into the interior. He said :

"The Lower Fraser Valley, extending, say over a hundred miles up to Yale, is not a gorge, but is somewhat opened so as to entitle it to be called a true valley of deposition. The flat land about its mouth rests generally on soft, tertiary formations, but particularly along its low seaward margin, is composed of very modern delta deposits. The greater part of the Lower Fraser Valley is covered with immense deposits, chiefly of Douglas pine. From Yale up to Lytton, which is about 57 miles, the Fraser Valley is a gorge between high, weather-worn mountains, covered with poor timber. Somewhere in the neighbourhood of Lytton, you get through the Cascade Mountains into the arid, interior basin. The Penus Ponderosa, growing scattered over the surface, without underbrush, and looking pretty with its red bark and dark, green foliage, takes the place of the Douglas firs, and you see also the prickly pear, or cactus. The Thompson Valley is more a gorge than a true valley for many miles about its junction with the Fraser at Lytton, but the mountains have a softer outline than on the Fraser, and are lower, and for the most part grassy. By-and-bye, after about 100 miles travel, you get to Kamloops, which is at the junction of the north and south branches of the Thompson. Leaving Kamloops, and ascending the South Thompson, and going along the Shuswap Lakes, you leave the Thompson or Shuswap River (otherwise at this place called Spellumcheen) and pass through a short trough, in which is a gently elevated, almost imperceptible height of land, and reach the O'Kanagan Lake, which, unlike the Shuswap Lakes, discharges itself to the southward, by the O'Kanagan River, past Osoyoos on the Canadian frontier, into the Columbia River, on American territory. There is thus, from Lytton to the frontier, a prolonged cut of about 250 miles, which may be called, at different places, a gorge, a trough, or a valley."

He need not quote further from that report in order to draw the attention of the House to a statement made by an officer of this Government. He would, however, quote from the report of Mr. Macoun, with regard to the Lower Fraser. Mr. Macoun said :—

"The valley of the Lower Fraser, for agricultural purposes, may be said to end at Sumass, but there are numbers of small locations where farming could be done on a limited scale as far up as Fort Hope. Beyond this point, the valley becomes confined between the mountains, and these press so upon the river that, before reaching Yale, the traveller realizes what a canyon is, and the mind is tortured with the thought of what might happen if anything went wrong with the boat or its machinery."

Professor Macoun further added, on page 121 :

"Lytton is a poor miserable place, only having three gardens in the whole village."

On page 133, when speaking of the proposed Northern route via Fort George and Pike Pass, he said :

"The 16th was occupied in getting our baggage across the Nechacco, a broad and rapid stream.

"For nearly seven miles, the trail led through a succession of aspen copse and wide prairies. In the latter, very tall grass and weeds of the usual species, and on the former, the largest aspen leaves I ever saw. Numbers of the trees were over two feet in diameter. The prairie and forest were quite level, and the soil of the best quality—an alluvium with black loam for a subsoil."

They had here another evidence of the rich character of the country which the railway would traverse if it took the Pine River Pass route. On page 134, he said :

"The valley of the Nechacco has an exceedingly rich soil on both sides where the trail crosses, and possibly this extends for many miles above and below. The valley of Stewart's River is not wide where we crossed it, but it is very rich, and there is no doubt whatever, in my mind, but that, after the two rivers unite, the valley all the way to Fort George is rich and fertile and well suited for settlement. From the crossing of Stewart's River to Fort St. James, the country was almost impassable, owing to the constant rains, but the soil is rich, and grass and weeds were very luxuriant. The country around Lakes Tsin-Kat, Tachick and Noel-ki, is very fertile, and from the occurrence of so much prairie, together with the similarity of the flora to that at Edmonton, I consider the climate of the two regions to be much alike. The former, though further north, is less elevated, and this, together with the well-known northern trend of the isothermal lines in North-West America, more than compensate for the difference in latitude. The dry, summer climate, which is indicated by the flora, proves the rainfall to be inconsiderable, and, therefore, the prospects are good for the successful cultivation of grain. Much of the forest country is undoubtedly wet, but it is swamp, and when the lumber is removed, by whatever means, and the swampy lands drained, the soil will become warmer and dryer, and the country be less subject to summer frosts. For many years, barley has been raised at Fort St. James, and certainly the soil in that neighbourhood is not to be compared with that in the Valley of the Nechacco. When a geological examination of the country has been made, a better opinion can be formed of the amount of arable land, as it may be set down as an invariable rule that, wherever limestone is the prevailing rock, there the soil will be suited for agriculture, if the altitude is not too great."

On another page, 142, he said :

"Standing on either Stewart's Lake Mountain or McLeod's Lake Mountain, the observer looks down on a land of rivers, lakes, marshes and swamps, with occasional tracts of dry arable land, indicated by the light green of the aspen. These tracts are generally by the river margins, and are composed of alluvial soil and quite rich. Black spruce in the wet peaty swamps, is replaced on the drier grounds by white spruce, while an intermixture of the latter and aspen always indicates a moderately dry soil. Sandy or gravelly soils are always known by the thick growth of black pine, called in my former report Banksian pine. These tracts are generally level, and, although boggy on the surface, are never marshy. Douglas fir is always at home on the hill side, and although it does not like to have the ground saturated about its roots, it seems to delight in a humid atmosphere. In tracing it all the way from the coast, I found that it cared little for cold, but shrank away from a dry atmosphere. These five species of trees may be said to constitute the bulk of the forest for the whole distance of 270 miles by our trail from Quesnel to McLeod's Lake. There can be no doubt that, when the forest is cleared, by whatever cause, the soil will become drier and the climate will be considerably ameliorated. Owing to the latitude, the sun's rays fall obliquely on the forest, and, as a natural result, there is little evaporation. As Germany was to the Roman, so is much of our North-West to us—a land of marsh and swamp and rigorous winter. Germany has been cleared of her forest, and is now one of the finest and most progressive of European countries. May not the clearing of our North-Western forests produce a similar result in the distant future of British America?"

Professor Macoun made the following remarks with respect to Vermilion, on Peace River :

"Having decided to rest one day at Vermilion, I employed it in making a botanical survey of the neighbourhood. I first examined the field and gardens, and found, with the utmost astonishment that, although two degrees further north than Dunragan or St. John, the barley and vegetables were much further advanced. Barley was standing in shocks in the field, having been cut on 6th August, while scattered ears of wheat, which I found around the fences, were fully ripe (August 12th). Wheat is seldom cultivated in the North-West, owing to the fact that barley is more useful, as the former is only used when boiled with meat, while the latter is fed to horses in the winter. The barley was sown on the 8th May and reaped on the 6th August, having been in the ground just ninety days. The heads averaged from four to six inches in length, and were full of large grains of a beautiful colour. In fact, both wheat and barley were the plumpest I ever saw, and must weigh as much as that brought from Fort Chipewyan. They stood very thick in the ground, and were uncommonly stout, and must have yielded very heavily. Turnips and early rose potatoes were quite large, and both gave indications of a heavy crop."

Having drawn the attention of the House to those facts, he would still further draw their attention to the importance of pressing upon the attention of the Government that no mistake whatever should be made in locating the railway, for, just as sure as the sun shone, that railway, constructed at a vast expenditure, if it took the route by the North Branch of the Thompson, then down the main branch, and thence through the Cascade range to Yale, would be a thorough failure so far as contributing to the settlement of British Columbia or the settlement of the country to any distance east of the British Columbia boundary was concerned. By taking the Northern route, not merely would their pastoral, agricultural and mining wealth be increased, but they would be in a condition to compete with any line on the American side of the international boundary for the trade of the Pacific and the trans-continental trade. He trusted the Government would see its way clear to bring down the papers and maps called for by his hon. friend, so that the House, and particularly the Independent members of this House, might have at their disposal the best means to form a conclusion as to the true route to be adopted for the Pacific Railroad.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is no report in the possession of the Government other than what is embraced in substance in the report of Mr. Smith, embodied in the Public Works Report now before the House, and which states substantially all that Mr. Hunter has stated. Mr. Hunter has to make a detailed report, which he has not yet been able to complete, and he also proposes to prepare a map. It will be observed that his survey was scarcely a complete one; it was not to any extent an instrumental so much as an exploratory survey. He made an instrumental survey of a portion of the more difficult parts of the Pass, respecting which, it is stated, he found the grades would be somewhat difficult for a few miles; some sixty feet to the mile, I believe. It is impossible, therefore, to base any actual decision upon the information which Mr. Hunter has communicated. We knew very nearly as much before receiving Mr. Hunter's information as since, as Mr. Selwyn traversed this part of the country and gave a similar report; that is, that it would be possible to obtain a route for a railroad by that river or so-called pass. All the information which the hon. member for Victoria has referred to, has been before the public and, of course, is known to the members of the Government as well as to other parties, and will, no doubt, exercise its proper influence on the Government in coming to a final determination as to the route which the railroad would take. But there is one point which neither of the two hon. gentlemen has mentioned and which constitutes a serious difficulty in the further consideration of the adoption of this route. In order to obtain an accurate knowledge of the route, which would have to be taken from very near Livingstone all the way up to Fort George, a distance of 1,100 or 1,200 miles, it would be necessary to spend two years in further surveys of the country before the Government could be able to form an exact estimate of the difficulties to be overcome, and the expense to be borne in carrying the route in that direction. I have pointed out on previous occasions the political difficulties which are connected with locating the route. Were the Dominion Parliament and the Government at liberty to deal with the selection of the route purely on its merits as a work of engineering and a work for the promotion of the settlement of the country, we would be placed in a much more favourable position for considering many of the suggestions which naturally arise in the course of an exploration of half a continent. But the hon. members from British Columbia and the British Columbia Government never ceased their importunities about the immediate commencement of the road, and the Dominion Government felt that it was necessary to commence the road as soon as it was possible to obtain the location in British Columbia itself. Acting, therefore, upon political considerations, unless there is an understanding arrived at with that Province for their assent to further delay in the prosecution of those surveys, it would become absolutely necessary to adopt the pass which is already known to be feasible, where the line has been fully located, and the matter in controversy, then, would be limited to the route to be taken from Tête Jaune Cache, westward, either to Bute Inlet, Dean Inlet or Burrard Inlet. This is the position of the matter. Mr. Hunter made, no doubt, some valuable accessions to our knowledge of that country, but none that would have a material effect, particularly, owing to the political considerations to which I have referred. He is at present preparing a map which will show the general character of the country by either of the two lines, namely, that which has been located from Livingstone,—the point of divergence, if the Southern route (already located) was adopted—to Jasper House Pass; and the one which would traverse the country crossing the North Saskatchewan about Fort a la Corne, and taking, as nearly as possible, a direct route by Slave Lake, about the centre of the country traversed by the Smoky River, between the Peace River and the mountains, thence in as straight a line as possible on the slope of the Rocky Mountains to the Pine River Pass. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Thompson) who has moved for these papers, has stated that the distance is about the same, quoting Mr. Smith's report. Apparently, the distance is the same, but actually, it is not. The distance upon the map is, as nearly as possible, the same by both routes, but the distance depends a great deal upon the amount of curvature which would have to be undertaken in crossing some of the formidable valleys which would be reached in the neighbourhood of Peace River, and any rough country which might be reached. I pointed out, a few evenings ago, that crossing one of the small rivers on the route proposed, south of Lake Manitoba in the North-West Territories, necessitated lengthening the line by nine miles, thus adding very materially to the curvature which would have to be overcome. So far as the engineers are able to ascertain, the distance by Pine River Pass to Fort George, the objective point common to both routes, is longer by about fifty miles. The curvature, however, upon the already located route, brings the distance, as nearly as possible, to the same mileage as the Northern route. But, if the percentage of curvature on the Pine River

Pass route should be the same as that on the Jasper House Pass route then the mileage would be increased by the difference which is apparent upon the measurement of the map, namely, fifty miles. These are, generally speaking, the facts which have to be considered in this connection. As soon as Mr. Hunter has his extended report prepared and the map ready, no time will be lost in submitting them to this House, as a matter of course. It is of little use bringing up his hurried and temporary report, as it is really all embraced in the information which Mr. Smith has collected in his general report, which is now before the House.

MR. ROSCOE said that if the Bute Inlet route was selected, the work of construction might proceed from that point to Fort George, while exploratory surveys might be made through the Pine River Pass, to determine whether the road should be brought by that route or not.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is no doubt of that. If the Bute Inlet route on its own merits, taking the whole line, was considered the best, it might possibly be arranged, in that case, that the construction of the part west of Fort George might be proceeded with, and that part east of Fort George might be proceeded with as far as the surveys were concerned.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Fort George is a common point?

MR. MACKENZIE: Fort George is a common point both to the Pine River route and Bute Inlet route as now located; the precise point might not be precisely at Fort George, but within a short distance of it. There is a watershed to be overcome between Fraser River, immediately east of Fort George, and what may be called the summit waters of Peace River; or to speak more precisely, the summit waters of Parsnip River, the great southern branch of Peace River, which joins the other branch before piercing the mountain range through which Peace River flows. We do not know very accurately, indeed, it is very imperfectly known, what difficulties might have to be overcome in obtaining a crossing over the summit at that point. The summit level is really far west of the Rocky Mountains proper so far as the road is concerned, as it passes through the Rocky Mountains, and is somewhat lower than the waters which flow east through the range of hills. Then, we have but comparatively little knowledge of the serious difficulties which might have to be overcome in crossing the deep valleys east of the Rocky Mountains which cross the track of a possible railway. I think—I speak from memory—that Major Butler, in his book (not an accurate engineering work, to be sure, but a book of some interest as giving a tolerably correct description of the country) states that the depth of the Smoky River valley is nearly 1,000 feet below the general range of the level of the prairie region through which it passes. The valleys, however, are of enormous depth and undoubtedly constitute serious engineering difficulties, and might add, not only very materially to the expense, but also, for all time to come, to the serious difficulty of having high grades as well as a large amount of curvature. These are all matters which, of course, the Government is bound to consider before coming to a decision as to the route which shall be followed through British Columbia proper; and I can only say that nothing causes myself more anxiety at the moment than to be able to come to a right decision—one which we trust will not be regretted in after years when the road will be in operation, and when the weight of any blunder which might be made now will be seriously felt on the trade and commerce of the country.

MR. BUNSTER said the discussion had thrown some light on the intention of the Government, and they were now promised two years more delay in the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway for the purpose of securing further surveys. It was evident that the time provided in the terms of Union for the construction of the road would be exceeded by several years. The House had been informed by the hon. the Premier that the British Columbia Government was pressing the Dominion Government to carry out the agreement entered into by that Province. That fact need not be wondered at inasmuch as the people of British Columbia held the opinion that the contract had not been carried out by Canada as agreed upon. Mention had been made of political considerations, but such considerations should have nothing to do with the carrying out of the terms of the treaty with British Columbia and Canada, an engagement which had been solemnly entered into with that Province. It was not very creditable for any Government to make any such allusion as that political considerations should interfere with the performance of a just contract, one that British Columbia would never have entered into if it had foreseen the manner in which it would have been treated, and that, by its loyalty to Great Britain and confidence in Canada, it had been deprived of a railroad which the Americans were anxious to build through British Columbia to Alaska. The credit of the Pacific Province had, moreover, been affected by the action of the Dominion. Not only the British Columbia Government, but the members from that Province and the people whom they represented, felt sensitive in regard to the railroad question. In anticipation of the work of constructing the railway being carried forward in good faith, the Province expended large sums of money, and sent its own agent to Europe to induce immigration there, for they well knew that the Province possessed land well fitted to receive emigrants to cultivate the soil. The House had been told by the hon. the Premier that as soon as Mr. Hunter's report was prepared, it would be brought down; but there was nothing definite about that statement, and they did not know whether it would be within one, two, or three years. Such was not the proper manner to treat hon. members who came to Parliament from long distances at the risk of their lives. The commencement of the work might be delayed until after the general election, and, on that ground, the people of British Columbia had cause for alarm. While he believed there were considerable political considerations affecting the railroad question, he still had faith in the people of Canada to believe they would have sufficient political honour to carry out their promises to British Columbia, and they would know whether such was the case when they went to the polls. If the British Columbia Government had not sufficient faith left to believe that the Dominion Government would yet carry out the terms of Union, it would petition the Imperial Government to sever the connection between the Province and Canada, and it would return to the old flag, not to the United States. British Columbia flourished under the old flag; the Imperial navy frequented its harbours, surveyed its coasts, and took a lively interest in the development of the resources of the country; but since the Province had joined Confederation, they would have declined in prosperity, except for its rich natural resources. Their confidence in the pledge of the Dominion Government to build the railroad had declined; their emigrants had been leaving their shores because the public lands were locked up, and, under those circumstances it was natural that men, who, like himself, had spent the best part of their lives in the Province, should feel aggrieved at the injustice done it. He hoped the Government would see proper to commence the construction of the Pacific Railway at once, and not longer allow the steel rails sent to British Columbia to remain there unladen, and deteriorating. Let the Government commence at Bute Inlet and build eastward. He did not desire to influence the Government in regard to the selection of a route, but he wished the work to be entered upon, so that the people who came to their shores, being desirous to return to the old flag, might do it with a little more confidence than at present. They received many immigrants from Australia as well as the old country, and many of those men who had invested money in lands in the hope that the national enterprise would be carried out had lost their savings through the work not being carried out as agreed upon. That was a gross injustice, and if the case were placed in proper hands, he thought the Government might be sued for breach of contract for the loss sustained by those parties.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said the discussion had taken a wider scope than he expected when he brought forward the motion for those returns. The hon. the Premier had informed the House that Mr. Hunter's report was not yet sufficiently prepared to be submitted. He (Mr. Thompson) hoped, however, that, as Mr. Hunter was in the city, the report would be brought down to the House with as little delay as possible; indeed, it would be satisfactory to the First Minister himself, to have that report when he announced the railway policy of the Government. As had been stated by the junior member for Victoria, if the Bute Inlet route should be adopted, there would be no difficulty in proceeding with the work between that point and Fort George, whether any further explorations were made of the Pine River Pass or not. He hoped the hon. the First Minister would furnish the House with the information as soon as possible.

MR. DECOSMOS said he believed Mr. Hunter's report was written in Victoria, British Columbia, and came from Victoria to San Francisco by the same mail as he (Mr. DeCosmos) did. He had that information on the authority of one of the engineers.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not know who it was in the engineers department who gave the hon. gentleman the information. He could only tell the hon. gentleman that the report was not made yet; only an informal letter had been sent by Mr. Hunter, giving briefly the results.

MR. DECOSMOS said he did not refer to the officers in the Department at Ottawa, but to the Pacific Railway office in Victoria.

MR. MACKENZIE said the statement was not correct as to the report being forwarded. There was nothing yet to bring down except Mr. Hunter's first letter, which he hoped the hon. gentleman would not desire. The motion might, therefore, pass with the understanding that the papers would be brought down as soon as the report was prepared.

Motion agreed to.

MEAT IMPORTATIONS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Mr. McQUADE moved for returns of the value of meat, green, dried, cured or potted, imported into Canada from the United States, and the duty collected on such from 1st January, 1877, to 1st January, 1878.

Motion agreed to.

BETTER TRANSLATION OF THE BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT.

MOTION FOR SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. FRÉCHETTE moved for a Select Committee to enquire as to the best means of securing a better French translation of the British North America Act, 1867. He said he asked to be permitted to make a few remarks in French, with reference to this motion. At the opening of the present Session, he had heard the hon. member for Terrebonne make some very judicious observations with respect to the subject of the translation into French of the debates of the House; and, in this respect, he concurred with the hon. gentleman. He thought that if the country devoted a considerable sum of money towards securing the translation of these debates, this work ought to be done in the best possible manner. What was worthy of being done, was also worthy of being well done. He thought this English proverb—What was worth doing at all, was worth doing well—was a favourite one, he considered, with the French translators of the House, if he could judge of it by the efforts they made every day to effect the disappearance of those vicious expressions and those deplorable anglicisms which for a long time had existed in the official language in French. The motion, which he now proposed, had no reference whatever to politics. It was purely proposed from a literary, or rather lexicological point of view. Despite the well-meant exertions and undeniable ability and knowledge of the translators, there had slipped into the translations, not only of the debates of the House, but also into those of the public documents of this country, many faults of language, for they met every day with an almost insurmountable difficulty, and that was the official translation of the British North America Act of 1867. In the first place, he held that the French translators were not responsible for this translation; it was not theirs; and in the second place, he did not intend to accuse the author of this translation of ignorance with respect to the French language. This gentleman had probably sinned owing to too great national pride in translating "Dominion" by Puissance, and for the remainder, by too great a respect for the incorrect and vicious phrases which existed in the old Statutes. He believed that neither the respect which we ought to have for the science and knowledge of our ancestors, nor the legitimate ambition of desiring to see our country some day take rank among the great powers (Puissances) of Europe, were of a nature to pardon absurd boasting, which could not give to strangers a very fair idea of their notions of the French language of which the French-Canadians were so proud, and which, in the language used by one of their great poets, was one of the finest jewels in the heritage which had been transmitted to them by their ancestors. As to the propriety of the motion which he now made, he believed that he could establish it, at least in the eyes of the hon. members who spoke French, by citing a few of the vicious phrases and faults of language which were to be met with in the translation of the British North America Act. He did not speak for the moment of the translation of the word "Dominion" by the word Puissance; he would, at present, set this defect aside, and refer, in the first place, to Clause 10 in the provisions of this Act, with regard to the Governor-General. The phrase—"To the Governor-General for the time being of Canada, or other the Chief Executive Officer or Administrator for the time being,"—was thus translated: "Au Gouverneur-Général du Canada, ou à tout autre chef exécutif ou administrateur pour le temps d'alors." in place of saying alors en exercice. This was a most vicious locution which should certainly be made to disappear in a careful translation. It would probably take up too much time to refer to each clause in detail; he therefore only asked permission to point out a few of these defects, and show what, from his point of view, was out of place.

MR. MASSON: Go on, and slowly.

MR. FRÉCHETTE: Well, in clause 53, the word appropriation was used for the English word "appropriation," and it ought to be replaced by the word emploi. Another barbarism was contained in the same clause, the word originer, which was not a French word, and the phrase "Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue," was thus translated: Tout bill ayant pour but l'appropriation d'une portion quelconque du revenu public. But this was not French. The locution which, in his opinion, ought to be used was, Tout bill affectant, etc. He had no objection to the word, "bill," because it had really been adopted into their language; and he would say, moreover, that this adoption was a necessity. But he did object to the phrase, bill pour l'appropriation d'une portion quelconque du revenu public, because it was not in conformity with the spirit of the French language. They ought to say, un bill or des bills affectant une partie quelconque du revenu public. In the 60th clause they found that these words, "The salaries of the Lieutenant-Governors" had been translated by the words, les salaires des Lieutenants-Gouverneurs, etc. The word salaires was incorrectly employed in reference to high dignitaries, and could be used only in reference to ordinary labourers.

MR. MASSON: How would you translate the word "salary?"

MR. FRÉCHETTE: By the word traitement. This was the proper word. Unfortunately, this fault appeared in different places in the same translation. In the 90th clause, they had the words: "The following provisions of this Act respecting the Parliament of Canada, namely, the provisions relating to Appropriation and Tax Bills," translated by, Les dispositions suivantes du présent acte, concernant le parlement du Canada, savoir: les dispositions relatives aux bills d'appropriation et d'impôt. He had strong objection to the translation of the words, "the provisions relating to Appropriation and Tax Bills," by the words les dispositions relatives aux bills d'appropriation et d'impôt. There was not a single man having the least knowledge of the French language, who would not admit that this phrase was extremely incorrect. They ought to say bill concernant l'emploi des deniers publics et de l'établissement d'impôt. In the 91st clause, paragraph 15, he found the words, "Banking, incorporation of banks and the issue of paper money," translated by, les banques, l'incorporation des banques, et l'émission du papier-monnaie. This word incorporation was a vicious expression, and it did not belong to the French language. The word "incorporation" ought, in his opinion, to be translated by the words la constitution or l'organisation en corporation. He would now refer to the 93rd clause. The very title of it was given in faulty French; the word "education" having been translated by education. In this acceptance, this word was very improperly employed. The expression, instruction publique, was that which ought to be used in French documents in order to convey the idea in question. But, moreover, in the same clause, the word "education" appeared in another sense, and again the same word, education was employed. The words, "laws in relation to education," ought to be translated by the words, des lois relative à l'enseignement. In the 102nd clause they had translated, "power of appropriation" by pouvoir d'approprier. This again was a most vicious expression. The phrase, "power of appropriation" should be translated pouvoir de disposer. In the same clause, and at the end of it, the word "appropriated" was translated by the word approprié, in place of affecté. The same remark applied to the word "appropriated," found at the end of clause 106. Further, to use the word qualification, for the translation of the English word "qualification," was a very incorrect expression. It should be translated qualités requises. All this, probably, was enough to justify his present motion; but he would go further, and say that all these expressions and all these locutions, however defective they were with regard to correctness of translation, were not binding by law; they were not official, and, in consequence, the translators were at liberty not to use them. But what was still more absurd, and what was considered as having force of law, was the translation of the very name of this country into French—the translation of the word “Dominion” by the word Puissance. In the first place, was this a translation at all? He humbly submitted that the word Puissance was not at all the translation of the word “Dominion.” The word puissance suggests the idea of power of active domination; whilst the word Dominion, on the contrary was employed in the sense of passive domination, of something which was dominated. This idea was perfectly communicated formerly in the appellation of Possessions Anglaises. In consequence, as a translation, the word was utterly incorrect. On the other hand, if he considered the position of the country, it was not more admissible. He could not accustom himself to the idea that this country, which was still a colony, ought to be called a Puissance, when this word all over the world was only applied to countries possessing sovereign power. They could properly say, “the Puissances of Europe,” or “the United States is a first-class Puissance,” etc.; but it had never entered into the mind of any one to say, the Puissance of India, the Puissance of Australia, although this last country was almost a continent by itself. It was then an absurdity, in his opinion, to employ this word, Puissance, for the name of the country, when, in point of fact, this was not a sovereign power. Now, from the lingual point of view the thing was still more absurd, as he had remarked only a moment previously; the word Puissance implied a state of sovereignty. They might consult Bescherelle, or Littré, or Larousse, or the dictionary of the Academy, and all that was written on the subject, and they would find that the opinions of lexicographers were unanimous upon this point. This word Puissance, when applied to a sovereign state, was only used in a general way with regard to the relations of a country with other people in diplomatic language; for instance, it was used when speaking of the comparative importance of different peoples, viz: The representatives of the foreign puissances; the puissances of the first, second or third order.

MR. LAURIER: How then would you translate the word “Dominion”?

MR. FRÉCHETTE said the hon. the Minister of the Inland Revenue asked him how he would translate the word “Dominion.” This was not the question to be solved at the present moment, and he would reply in the words of a person, who said, when asked how he would replace something he proposed to destroy as useless and dangerous, “If I met a wild beast in my way, I would destroy it first and then look about to see how it was to be replaced.” The question now before them was whether the word Puissance was a good translation of the word “Dominion.” He maintained that this was a bad translation, and that it ought to be made to disappear, and, after this was done, they would seek for a word by which to replace it. He asked for a Committee to arrange for a better translation of the British North America Act, as he thought the present translation was most defective. It would never come into the head of any Frenchman, for instance, in speaking of France, to say: “Les armées de la puissance française, les ministres de la puissance française, les chemins de fer de la puissance française,” in place of saying the armies, the ministers, the railroad of the Republic or Kingdom or Empire of France; and France had far more right than this country to assume the title of puissance. Nevertheless, they observed in the public documents, such extraordinary phrases as the following: “Les canaux de la puissance,” “Les revenus de fer de la puissance,” “Le revenu de la puissance.” These expressions did not sound very badly to their ears, because they were accustomed to their use; but, in order to obtain a proper idea of them, they had only to re-translate such phrases into English. The phrase, puissances d'Europe was translated by “powers of Europe,” in English, and what would they say of those who spoke of our canals, railroads and revenue, as being the revenue of the Power, the railroads of the Power, the canals of the Power? The absurdity then became quite apparent. The French of this country ought to be as proud of their language as the English were of theirs, and avoid as much as possible falling into such absurdities. These were important matters. Quite recently it was reported that one of the Consuls who represented France in this country—he believed it was the Consul at Quebec—said he dared not send our public documents to France for fear of turning them into ridicule, because, in the very titles of these documents, appeared the word Puissance, not only a defective translation, but also defective French, and a logical error, which was still worse. He believed that the time had come when they should endeavour to remedy this state of things for the sake of their national honour, and for their own satisfaction. They were proud of the French language, and they were proud of their right to use it in the counsels of the nation; and they would be untrue to the past and the universal spirit of their population if they abandoned the use of the beautiful French language which they all prized so highly. He believed that the need for reform in the direction he proposed was pressing, in view of the approaching Exhibition of 1878. He feared, lest, in the buildings of the Exposition at Paris, there should appear on placards such expressions as the following: Objets exposés par la puissance du Canada, etc., which would appear extremely out of place, and above all, out of harmony with the surroundings in the French capital, to the astonishment of the Parisians. He humbly submitted that this was a question which he was sure those members of the House who spoke French would consider important, and worthy of being discussed before a Committee especially chosen for this object. He would repeat that this was not a political matter at all; nor did he blame the author of the translation of the British North America Act. This was only a question concerning common sense, propriety of language and lexicography.

MR. FRÉCHETTE.

MR. BABY said he did not rise to oppose the motion, but only to offer certain remarks. There was certainly ground for saying that the translation of our laws and of our public documents was faulty, to some extent; nevertheless, it was necessary to add that many of the incorrect expressions in question had slipped into the public documents in some sort of necessity. Each country and language had expressions which were particular to it—adopted by the nation and adopted by the country—and which could not be properly rendered in any other language. It was true, as the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Fréchette) had observed, that many of these phrases were what might be called anglicisms; but certainly it was but right to add that they all recognized several of them as being the locutions which, although not elegant, expressed the ideas they meant to convey. They were to be found all through our Statutes, and should not be removed without some care being taken as to what would be their substitutes, otherwise great confusion would ensue. The hon. gentleman proposed the appointment of a Committee to consider these matters, and to adopt the means requisite to ensure the disappearance of these defects; above all, with reference to the Confederation Act. He thought, however, that the hon. gentleman might, perhaps, have taken another course, in order to attain the end proposed. He considered that, if they found in the Confederation Act, and even in the letter of the law, these errors pointed out by him, it was necessary to remove these defective phrases, to replace them by others which were correct, and, to ensure the disappearance of these vicious locutions, it was requisite to amend the law. They should then propose that law be amended by the substitution of correct words and phrases for incorrect ones. He hardly thought that a Committee could see to this matter; he would rather see the hon. gentleman make a proposition in the direction he indicated; he would certainly give him his cordial support, and ask of the Government permission to replace certain expressions which were not considered to be couched in pure French, or even elegant language, by phrases which were French, and which were recognized as such. It was admitted that their public documents in French had sometimes suffered a little because they were not drawn up in French in its purity; but it was also true that in France, where they were very particular about these matters, very considerable faults of language slipped into public documents; and he thought that everywhere such errors of expression would be found. And they ought not to say that these were due to ignorance on the part of those who drew up these papers, but, as the hon. member had done, they ought to acquit the gentleman in question of any such accusation.

MR. BÉCHARD said he was glad to see that his hon. friend from Joliette (Mr. Baby) admitted and recognized the fact that the corrections, as suggested by the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Fréchette) ought to be made. The hon. gentleman, nevertheless, pretended that, if the Confederation Act was so corrected, it would be necessary to amend the law. He begged to remind the hon. gentleman that the lawful text was the English version, of which the French version was only a translation, and the translation could be corrected without imposing the necessity of amending the law.

MR. BLAKE said he thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. Béchard) was quite right on this point; at least, he did not remember any proceeding of the Federal Parliament which adopted the text that was found at the commencement of the first volume of the Statutes published since Confederation. He recollected that on one occasion this subject had received some discussion, and that his hon. friend, then the member for Chateauguay, had already discussed the question as to the proper translation of the word Dominion, and called Mr. Chauveau, who was well known as an admirable French scholar, and the late Sir George Cartier to account for having permitted that word to be so translated. It seemed to him, however, that the phrases in our Acts passed every Session, were equivalent to those in the British North America Act; they would be similarly translated by the officers of the House, and receive the force of law. Therefore, the question his hon. friend had asked was, as far as his fellow countrymen were concerned, and as far as the Statutes of Canada were concerned, perhaps pushed too far. At the same time, he agreed in substance with the hon. gentleman, and deprecated the mixing of English and French phrases. Sometimes, in the English versions of the Statutes, French phrases were to be met with when it was quite unnecessary that they should be used there at all; and, just in the same way, English phrases were occasionally introduced into the French versions. He held that the English Statutes should be framed as far as possible in pure English, and French versions in perfectly pure French. He could scarcely, therefore, understand the objection made by his hon. friend from Chateauguay that we had no law. We had the British America Act, and we had simply to consider whether it was susceptible of improvement.

MR. MASSON said he did not see why, if this motion was carried, they should not establish a standing Committee for the examination of all the Statutes that had been passed. He thought that in future it might be necessary to alter the Union Act, because some of the phrases which that Act contained were not perfectly correct. If it was necessary to alter the Confederation Act because some of its phrases were not couched in perfectly elegant and correct French, it was obvious that it would be quite as useful and quite as necessary to do so with regard to the whole of our Statutes. There was no reason why the Act mentioned should be corrected and not the others. He knew that, not only were the translations of the Statutes inelegant and incorrect in many places, but even that whole phrases were omitted. He had given an example of this. He would ask what was the use of a Committee merely to examine this Act, if it was not bound to examine also all our legislation of the past and of the future. A Committee of permanence was not a proper body nor even this Committee, to translate our Statutes or any part of them. They had a staff of translators who were paid for translating all the Statutes passed by the House, etc.; and why had these gentlemen been appointed translators? It was because they believed, or were at least supposed to believe, that these gentlemen understood their business and were thoroughly able to undertake the work, and he thought they were far more able to do it than any hon. gentleman who would be taken away from his ordinary pleasant avocations to do work for which he was not qualified. He knew that the hon. gentleman who introduced this motion was a French scholar, and that no man was better acquainted with his language than the hon. gentleman; but, perhaps, other hon. gentlemen did not possess these qualifications in the same degree, and, indeed, they were not supposed to have them. The translators were men who had made this work their profession, and, consequently, they were far better able to do it than a Committee. He consequently advised the hon. gentleman to withdraw his motion, and to consult with the Government and the hon. the Premier, to see whether any means could be devised by which the staff now at their disposal could undertake and make an exact and proper translation, both of the Confederation Act, if required, and also of the Statutes which had already been passed, if this was necessary, as well as of those which would be passed in the future.

Mr. LAURIER said that, for his part, he concurred with what the hon. member for Terrebonne had stated; and thought that there was need of revising, not only the Confederation Act, but also the Statutes which were at present in force. Nevertheless, to do so would be to perform an almost herculean task. Numerous anglicisms were to be found in these Statutes which were at present in force, and the time would probably come when they would be revised and corrected; and he was of opinion that they should then proceed, as was suggested by the hon. member for Lévis, with regard to the revision of our Statutes. Such a revision was necessary before the French version would be presentable. The remark had been made by his hon. friend the member for Lévis that the Consul of France dared not send our Statutes to Europe because he was really ashamed to present them to the French Government and French nation, and every one who was acquainted with this subject was obliged to admit that this objection was well founded. Our Statutes were not what they ought to be. The translators were paid, it was true, to do their work, but, whether it was because their number was insufficient, or because the work given them during the Session was beyond their powers, the translation was not what it ought to be. He was certain that, if the work was done by some of the translators, and they had the time necessary for its proper performance to spare, the work would be very well done; some of them were officers of the House, but while to a certain point they were responsible, and even wholly responsible, for the faults which were to be found in the French version, it was to be borne in mind that this version passed through the hands of the members of the House, and, if they were not correct when the Bills became law, it was because they did not pay sufficient attention to them. He did not blame any person in this relation. It could not exactly be held that the members of the House should act the part of pedagogues in these circumstances; the correctness of the language used in the Bills was in their hands, and suggestions which merited support and upon which they might act, could be made in this relation. He believed that the objection raised by the hon. member for Joliette had been met, and successfully met, by the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake). They did not have an official version, or a legal version in French of the British North America Act. The only official copy of this Act was the English version, as adopted by the Imperial Government, and it had been merely translated. He was not desirous of going further into the question raised by the hon. member for Lévis as to the manner in which the translation ought to be made. There were evidently defects in the translation which ought to be made to disappear. One instance, as the hon. member for Lévis had pointed out, was that the word "education" had been translated by the word education, which was clearly wrong. It was not necessary to insist upon it, so clear was the fact. The moment that a translation was submitted to a Committee which was thoroughly acquainted with the French language, those vicious locutions would be immediately removed and replaced by proper expressions. But there were certain expressions, peculiar to the English language, which it was perfectly impossible to render exactly in the French language, while, on the other hand, there were expressions in the French language which it was completely impossible to render in the English language; and every day, as they saw in Parliament, speakers who used the English language introduced into it locutions which they were not able to give properly in English, simply because it was impossible to render them properly in English. For instance, there was the common phrase par excellence, a locution which it was impossible to express with exactness in English; and the same thing was true in the opposite sense, with regard to the word Dominion. The word puissance did not exactly mean what was implied by the word Dominion, and he did not know a word in the French language which could exactly express the idea contained in the word Dominion. The nearest approach to it would be the word Domaine; but this word would sound as ridiculously as, and be subject to much greater objection than, the word puissance. He had no objection to a Committee being named to seek a substitute for the word puissance, but, he believed that, after every possible effort was made in this direction, they would arrive at the opinion that they must adopt this faulty locution for want of a better. Meanwhile, as he had stated at the outset, he desired that the Act in question should be revised in the manner indicated; the thing was impossible at the present moment; but it was extremely important that the document which formed the basis of our political constitution, and which would be submitted to the schools of Lower Canada, to the scholars, to study as the Constitution under which they were governed, should be drawn up in the very best possible French; and, if this consideration alone presented itself—that this document ought to be placed in the hands of the children attending the public schools—from which to draw their conclusions regarding our constitution, that reason alone, from his standpoint, was sufficient to justify the adoption of the motion which had been made by his hon. friend the member for Lévis.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he quite agreed with the hon. gentleman who had just spoken and the hon. member for South Bruce, that the translation in French of the British North America Act was not legally binding in any way. This was the English Statute, and it had been translated, no doubt, by the translators who were officially employed to translate our own Statutes. Still, he did not know that any legal obligation rested upon them similar to the legal obligation which existed with respect to the official translation either in English or French of our own Statutes. They were published; they were the law of the land; and they could only be amended as his hon. friend the member for Joliette had stated. He did not think, however, that this would apply at all to the translation of a Statute of this kind; but, still, it was of very great importance that the translation having once been made and been widely disseminated, and the expressions which were contained in the French version, no doubt, as was suggested by his hon. friend the member for South Bruce, having been incorporated subsequently on very many occasions in our Statutes, should not be altered, however inelegant they might be, if there was not a manifest or evident error in the meaning of the words used. He thought it would be a hopeless task to introduce anything like elegance in our Statutes. These had been in use; the Judges and the Bar had been in the habit of using them, and these words had now acquired a technical meaning which perhaps a French scholar would say did not properly attach to them by the genius of the French language, but which, nevertheless, existed. It was impossible, as the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue said, sometimes to find a word of the same meaning and force in every respect in one language with same word in another language. There were the words Puissance and Dominion. He believed it would be very difficult to find any other word than Puissance that would really convey the idea in question. Puissance, as the hon. member for Chateaugay said at the time, did not convey the idea thoroughly, although Dominion and power had such an evident relation to each other that it came very near it. Puissance had now acquired a technical and legal signification; and it would be very unwise to alter it; everybody knew what it meant; and it was considered and accepted in this country as the equivalent in French for the word Dominion in the British North America Act. The old Norman-French, that was used for centuries in the English Courts, had never been celebrated for its elegance. It was exceedingly difficult, in French, for the necessities of the case, owing to the adoption of the system of representative institutions and the incorporation of a great deal of the constitutional and municipal law of England into our institutions, to always find exact equivalents in French for these words; and they must accept the nearest translation they could get, if they really conveyed the substance of the meaning. They must disregard the inelegance which, with scholars like his learned friend from Lévis, would naturally jar upon the ear and upon the taste. These expressions might be philologically inaccurate, but, if they conveyed the real meaning, or if, though the word did not originally convey that meaning, by usage in this country it had been adopted as an equivalent, it would be very unwise to alter it, except in case of very manifest error. For very many of our phrases, adopted and used constantly in our law, elegant French expressions could not be chosen; and, if this was the case, the expression used for them should not be changed. The Act in question had been continually referred to both in English and French for the last eleven years; and he had no doubt that the official translators had taken from the French translations very many phrases, and used them in the same sense in our every-day Dominion legislation; and it would be exceedingly inconvenient to alter a phrase in this translation of the Dominion Act because it was inelegant when, perhaps, the same phrase ran through the whole of their domestic legislation. They had better consider whether they would now take up this matter, and whether they ought to commence the system of striking a Committee of the House in order to settle the elegance or inelegance of the French translation, because the same reasons would apply to having a Standing Committee appointed to consider in this way all our Statutes. This would be an almost hopeless and a very expensive task. A Committee was a shifting quantity. Their law clerks were supposed to be, and he believed, were selected with due regard to their qualifications; and it would be safer to leave this matter in their hands, unless where an hon. member thought there was an evident error in the translation of a Statute in French, or that it did not convey really in the same way the meaning of the English Statute.

Mr. BLAKE said that our Statutes were now under process of consolidation. Of course the consolidated version would also be translated, and there would be no difficulty in postponing the taking of effect of any alteration in the British North America Act until the consolidated issue came out, when harmony and improvement would co-exist in this connection.

Mr. FRÉCHETTE said he wished to reply to a remark that had been made by the hon. member for Terrebonne, with respect to the character of his motion. He did not call for a new translation; he simply asked for the examination and discussion of this question—whether a better translation of the Confederation Act could be obtained. This was the question which he now submitted. He would say in reply to an observation from the right hon. member for Kingston, that it was not a question of intelligence, or of elegance, that was at stake, but simply a question of logic, of execution, of language, and of lexicology, and nothing else. It remained for them to see whether the word puissance was the best possible translation of the word Dominion; and, whether for a colony, the word puissance could be employed in harmony with the genius of the French language. It was not a question of elegance, but a question of logic and common sense, that they were called upon to decide.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were read the third time and passed :—

Bill (No. 12) To incorporate the Société de Construction Mutuelle under the name of the Société de Prêts et Placements, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Malouin.)

Bill (No. 11) To reduce the Capital Stock of the Merchants' Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Jetté.)

EVIDENCE IN COMMON ASSAULTS

BILL.—[BILL No. 3.]

(Mr. Dymond.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. DYMOND said the Bill had, on its second reading, been discussed at length, and it had been referred to a Select Committee consisting of eight legal gentlemen and the mover. From them it had received careful attention, especially with regard to the third clause, which, indeed, was the only one that created any discussion. The third clause provided that where a crime, other than common assault, was charged in an indictment, the Judge might try the case if he considered that evidence was made out to justify a conviction for the major offence as one of common assault; at least, he could direct the jury to consider the case as one of common assault and allow the prisoner to be examined accordingly. The objection raised was, that it introduced into the Bill the principle of allowing a Judge to be a judge of the fact as well as of the law—to usurp, so to speak, the functions of the jury. It was perfectly well understood, however, that a Judge frequently took upon himself to advise the jury in such a case; but although a common incident in the ordinary proceedings of Courts, it had never been chrystallized into legislation. The Committee addressed themselves to considering how this objection could be overcome, and they decided to limit the operation of the clause to cases which were tried without the intervention of a jury. The consequence was an amendment in that sense of the third clause, and there was also a slight change made in the phraseology; the term "Court" being employed instead of "Justice" or "Judge"—an alteration which would, he thought, commend itself to legal gentlemen. In the proviso added to the third clause, there was a slight clerical error, made, he was sorry to say, by himself, which altered the sense entirely, namely, the employment of the word "not" instead of "only;" and that would have to be corrected.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he was of opinion that where the evidence of a defendant was at all admissible, it ought to be compellable. If a man was a good witness for himself, he ought to be a witness for the prosecution also, so that the real truth might be elicited.

MR. LAFLAMME believed that such an extension of the principle of the Bill might prove pernicious in cases where a wife might be called upon to testify against her husband. If she consented to give evidence, it was all very well; but it would not be proper to constrain her to give evidence against her husband.

MR. DESJARDINS said that the remarks just made by the hon. the Minister of Justice against the wife being called to bring testimony against her husband, was the best justification of the opposition offered by him (Mr. Desjardins) against the wife being called to bring testimony in his favour; and, vice versa, if a wife could be induced to appear as witness by her husband, or to depose in a case in which her husband was interested, would they not believe that the husband's influence could be employed to force the wife to give evidence in his favour against the acts, if the wife was present when the act that provoked the accusation was committed? Would it not be presumed from this that, if she declines to testify, the husband is guilty, and that, to avoid this presumption, or to force a favourable verdict, a husband could use his influence to force his wife to testify, and even commit perjury for him; and this danger should be avoided in both the one case and the other.

Mr. BABY said he believed that this was an unwise provision at the present time. Under the criminal law, a wife had no right to give evidence for or against her husband, and he considered that this was an extremely sensible practice; because it was well understood what strong and intimate relations existed between husband and wife, and a wife, if permitted so to testify, would often be placed between her conscience on the one side, and her love for her husband and the well-being of her family, on the other. If this provision were adopted, the wife would be really placed in a very difficult position, and if it was persisted in, it seemed to him that a very hazardous and very dangerous principle would be thus introduced into their legislation. In the law of England, where we sought the sources of our criminal law—and in England criminalists had made improvements—up to the present time, as far as he knew, criminalists had not introduced this provision, and he thought it would be a very bad thing for this country to show such a tendency. As the hon. member for Hochelega (Mr. Desjardins) remarked, they would thus expose the wife or husband, as the case might be, to the temptation to commit perjury, and he did not think that, if this clause were adopted, the criminal law would be better administered, or criminal cases be better conducted, or that persons accused would be placed in a better or safer position, or that condemnations would be less frequent than was at present the case under the existing system. Such were his objections to this clause.

Mr. DESJARDINS said that, if the House intended to depart from the principles of the British criminal jurisprudence, even with respect to the petty cases mentioned in the Bill then under consideration, this should be done with the view, as far as was possible, of assimilating to it the system of French procedure; and in this event, in lieu of adopting such legislation as was suggested by the hon. member for North York, power should be given to the Judges to examine defendants; but further than this, they should not go.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that this point would receive the consideration of the Government.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD thought the third clause either went too far or not far enough. If the defendant in a case was a conscientious, honest man, he would not try to exculpate himself of an offence of which he was guilty, whereas a more hardened offender might not hesitate to swear as to his innocence in order to escape the consequences of conviction. If a man, therefore, was allowed to swear on his own behalf at all, he ought to be a witness under any circumstances. There was a great deal of truth in what had been said by his hon. friend the Minister for Justice in reference to a wife being forced to give evidence against her husband. It must be remembered, however, that if she tried to give evidence in her husband's favour, she was liable to cross-examination, so that she would virtually be a witness for the prosecution as well as for the defence. The principle must, therefore, as he had said, be either carried out in its entirety or not at all. He had great objection to a wife being called to give evidence in a case where her husband was concerned, because such a system would have a tendency to interfere with domestic felicity. If, on the other hand, a woman came forward voluntarily for the purpose of supporting her husband by her evidence, her feelings of affection towards the man whose wife she was, the man who was the father of her children, might lead her to screen him more than was proper in the interests of justice. Lord Campbell once objected to a man being called as regarding his personal relations towards a woman, because it would elevate perjury into a virtue. To return to the first point, if it was competent for a person to give evidence in a case, whether civil or criminal, on behalf of a defendant, it should be competent for the same person to give evidence on behalf of the Crown. For instance, to put the case clearly, A.B., a witness, should be regarded as a different person altogether from A.B., a defendant, and was entitled to be examined for the Crown if he was afforded the privilege of coming forward and giving evidence on his own behalf. Otherwise, the mode of procedure in such cases would be an anomaly, and he therefore fully concurred in the remarks made by his hon. friend the Minister of Justice.

MR. DYMOND said he was very sorry that his right hon. friend was not present to hear the second reading of the Bill, when he would have heard its whole scope and principle very fully explained. The present proposal was one of trial or tentative legislation, and, of course, the operation of the Bill could, at some future time, be extended if necessary. A similar Bill, he might mention, had passed a second reading in the English House of Commons, and been referred to a Select Committee. He did not propose to inflict further arguments on the House in support of his Bill, but would merely refer to what had been said as to the admissibility and compulsion of a witness's evidence. He was anxious that the true facts of a case should be got from any quarter, no matter which; we were not very logical in our legislation; the British Constitution itself was exceedingly illogical, and what he had tried to obtain was the practical rather than the logical. Being, however, affected as some of his hon. friends had said, by the Conservative reaction, he was disposed to proceed at first to as limited an extent as possible. He would, therefore, like to see the Bill passed in its present form, unless a strong feeling was expressed by the Committee and the House in favour of extending its principle. The objection raised against the admissibility of a wife's evidence was one that applied with equal force to the testimony of a defendant, namely, that there might be a temptation to perjury. But, in cases of common assault, where respectable persons were often summoned as defendants, there was little or no temptation to commit perjury, because the penalty attachable to such cases amounted, in many instances, only to a slight fine. Most of these cases were the results of petty squabbles, where, it might be, none were present but the defendant, his wife, and a third party, and in order to elicit the truth, it might be necessary to admit the evidence of the defendant or that of his wife. There were gentlemen on both sides of the House better qualified than he was to speak on this matter, but he should have been willing to allow the Bill to pass in its present shape as an experimental piece of legislation.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he regretted that he was not present to hear the second reading of the Bill. He had not, of course, any desire to interfere with its progress, and he would suggest that its further consideration be set down for three days hence, in order that information regarding the points raised might be obtained.

MR. KERR said he had listened with interest to the discussion raised in connection with this Bill, especially with regard to the clause now under the consideration of the Committee. He agreed with the opinion which he believed the right hon. member for Kingston had expressed, that the Bill would work very awkwardly if persons were admitted as competent witnesses if they were not at the same time compelled to give evidence. The tendency of legislation at the present time seemed to be to place females on the same footing as males, and he could not, therefore, understand why a wife, whose evidence was admitted on behalf of her husband, should not be a compellable witness either for or against him. It had been said by some one that the tendency of modern legislation was to reverse the condition of things—to make the man the woman and the woman the man. A married woman had now the right to sue or she could be sued, and, in cases of common assault, which were not very far removed from the category of civil cases, there was no substantial reason why a woman should not be a compellable witness. In its present shape, the Bill would, if carried into effect, be an exceedingly one-sided measure. Of course, as the promoter had said, it was a tentative Bill, and he hoped its scope would be enlarged. He believed that, if they could make a law, it should be one giving the largest possible scope for getting at the truth, and he supposed that was the object of all such investigations, and certainly they would not be as successful in the attainment of that object if the defendant and his wife were taken as competent witnesses, but, at the same time, not compellable witnesses. In his opinion, no substantial damage would be done by allowing the defendant to give evidence, and, therefore, he sympathized largely with the view of making the defendant's wife, as well as the defendant himself, a compellable witness.

Mr. MacKAY (Cape Breton) said he was not present when the hon. member (Mr. Dymond) introduced the Bill, and, consequently, he was, perhaps, not in a position to understand its general features; but, from what he had seen of it, it certainly met with his approbation. He thought, however, that the measure did not go far enough; it would have pleased him much better if in all questions of a quasi civil and of an entirely criminal character, defendants should give evidence on their own behalf. The remarks from the gentleman who had just sat down certainly did not meet with his approbation. He felt that it was not desirable that the wife should be compelled to give evidence against the husband or the husband against the wife, because of the influence it was well known each possessed over the other. He thought that, in many instances, such a law would be most dangerous to domestic happiness, and would be holding up a premium to perjury. The proper course, in his opinion, was to allow the defendant to give evidence on his own behalf, if he saw fit, and, if he refrained, that, of course, would militate against him. It would tell very strongly on the minds of Judge and jury, and slight prima facie testimony, coupled with this fact, should be sufficient to ensure a conviction. He regretted the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dymond) had not seen fit to bring down a Bill of wider scope, so as to give defendants in all criminal cases the privilege of bearing testimony in their own defence, because it seemed to him that every one had a right to claim that both sides of the question should be heard.

WELLAND CANAL CONTRACTS.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming adjourned debate on Mr. Langevin's proposed motion for a copy of a return showing: 1st. The amounts for the six lowest tenders received in September or October, 1873, for Sections 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 12, 13 and 14 of the New Welland Canal, together with names of tenderers; 2nd. The amounts of the six lowest tenders for the same Sections, received in 1874, together with the names of tenderers; 3rd. The names of the tenderers to whom these sections were awarded; 4th. Copies of the Orders in Council awarding such sections; 5th. Copy of all correspondence relating to such award, read.

MR. ARCHIBALD said that, in moving the adjournment of the debate upon this question some time since, his sole object was simply to enable him to make a remark or two upon what fell from the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) with regard to the work generally performed by Committees in this House and the manner in which it was performed, and more particularly with regard to the manner in which the work of the Northern Railway Committee was performed last year. It pleased the hon. gentleman to condemn, not only that Committee, but every Committee appointed for investigating matters. He said there was a majority of Government members upon those Committees, and, therefore, their finding, of necessity, could not be correct and proper: He was pleased to give, as an instance, the Northern Railway Committee of last year. He stated that that Committee was a packed Committee, and went on to condemn, in the most unmeasured terms, the manner in which it had performed its work. Now, that Committee was appointed by this House in the usual way, and, if the majority in the House succeeded in getting six members upon it, while the other side had but three, it was simply a majority of the Committee corresponding to the majority in that House. As to the work of the Committee, the report spoke for itself. They endeavoured, in that report, to make a mere summary of the evidence given, and he did not call to mind that the members of that Committee who belonged to the other side of the House really impugned any portion of that report. He believed the chief objection was founded on one particular clause which was added to the conclusion of the report. That clause was with regard to the payment of certain sums of money and whether it was properly applicable to the payment of a Government lien. It was also charged that evidence had been improperly rejected. So far as he could call to mind, there was but one case of evidence which was presented to the Committee that was rejected, and this was the evidence of Mr. Miall, the accountant, who attended before the Commissioners' Court in Toronto. It appeared that the sum total of his report was a compilation of the figures which appeared in the annual published reports of the Northern Railway, and his opinions upon them. It did not appear that he had made any examination of the books of the railway company; in fact, such an examination could not be made until the specific charge had been investigated by the Committee. With regard to those charges he had access to the books, and only with regard to those. The Committee thought, so far as the work before it was concerned, that this report of Mr. Miall, if report it could be called, contained nothing which, in any sense of the word, could be fairly or properly considered. With regard to its rejection, he might content himself with stating what the reasons were which two members of that Committee saw fit to give for asking for the production of this document:

"Mr. PALMER said: I consider we ought to have this memorandum; first, because it was before the Commission, made at the instance of the Commission and they ought to have acted upon it; second, that this may lead us to subjects of enquiry that we may not have reached; third, it is impossible to tell exactly what that report is, from mere oral evidence, and without we have that report itself.

"Mr. BOWELL: I think it should be produced, because the Committee have been appointed to enquire into and report upon allegations in the report and evidence of the Commission on the Northern Railway Company as to the application of moneys payable to the Government, and also to make searching enquiry into the accounts of the Northern Railway and the Northern Extensions Railway, so as to complete the enquiry begun and left unfinished by the Commission; that the Committee is entitled to have the report made by Mr. Miall and given to the Commission, stating the results arrived at by him as to the financial state of the Company, laid before the Committee."

It did not appear from the evidence that this report had ever been laid before the Commission; and it did not appear that they ever acted upon it, or that they should ever have acted upon it, inasmuch as it was, after all, but a mere compilation of certain annual reports of that road for several years, and it did not appear that that compilation was arrived at from an actual examination of the books, but simply from an examination of certain printed abstracts of the accounts of that company. And, inasmuch as the Committee was appointed for the purpose of examining into those books themselves, they did not consider they were bound to take up any report, document, or compilation which in itself was taken from the very evidence before them. They were instructed to make this enquiry themselves, and, Mr. Miall never having had access to the books, clearly any compilation which he made could have been but of very little use in the enquiry they had been called on to make. So far as the Committee was concerned, he considered it but fair to say that, if any blame rested with any person for the reflection of this report, it should fall upon his shoulders as Chairman of the Committee, and because an appeal had been made to him as to the admissibility of this evidence. An examination of Mr. Miall had taken place as to the contents of that paper, and, from that examination, he was led to conclude that the admission of that paper would have been improper, and the minority of the Committee, if he might so term them, those who had claimed the production of this document, did not see fit to appeal against his decision; therefore, so far as the Committee was concerned, he considered they were exonerated from any fault, if there had been fault in that matter. He did not wish to go into the question at length, but last Session the report was presented so late that it was considered advisable that there should be no discussion raised upon it. He could only say that, if hon. gentlemen opposite were anxious to have a full and complete discussion of the doings and findings of that Committee, and the grounds upon which those findings were based, he would endeavour, before the close of the Session, to gratify them.

MR. BOWELL said, before the motion was put to the House, he thought it was well, as a member of the Northern Railway Committee, that he should refer to the remarks that had been just made by the Chairman of that Committee, as well as to some other points which had been raised in this discussion. It was not usual, when moving for ordinary papers or documents, that a discussion should take the wide range which this one had taken; but, if it had gone beyond the limits of ordinary debate, he thought the hon. the Premier must accept the responsibility, if there were any, for the length and breadth of the remarks which had been made by the various hon. gentlemen who had discussed this question. Instead of confining himself to the subject-matter of discussion, the hon. the Premier had branched off into a review of some of the picnic speeches of hon. gentlemen occupying seats on the Opposition side of the House, as well as to their own utterances upon similar occasions in Ontario, to the writing of letters, the abandonments of Committees, the giving out of contracts, the modes of giving them out, and almost every other conceivable subject had been touched upon. And, if he (Mr. Bowell) pursued the same course, he trusted he would not be considered as transgressing the strict rules of debate. It appeared somewhat strange to himself, and, no doubt, equally strange to the House, that the Chairman of the Northern Railway Committee should lay down the principle that, because he, individually, thought a certain document unnecessary, which the minority, as he thought proper to term them, considered absolutely necessary to the solving of the problem they were given to solve, it should not be produced. The minority had been led to believe that the report of Mr. Miall contained very valuable information; and that, at the instance of the Government—

MR. ARCHIBALD: No; I ask the hon. member to state his grounds.

MR. BOWELL said, if the hon. member had waited a moment, he would have given the reasons for the statement he was about to make. The hon. member said it was not at the instance of the Government. He (Mr. Bowell) had no desire to press the charge; but the Committee had the right to presume that there were some influences brought to bear, from the fact that that same document had been moved for in the House and had been refused by the Government; and when, as a member of the Committee, he made a similar motion in order to have that document produced, to ascertain its contents; and when the chairman, backed by a majority of three, ruled it out of order, he and the minority had a right to presume there was some influence behind the scenes which prompted its rejection. The hon. member for South Bruce in speaking of the North-West investigation, made a statement that a most searching investigation had been made. That was true, literally true. The hon. member went so far in the investigation of the troubles —

MR. BLAKE: I did not speak of any particular Committee.

MR. BOWELL: I, certainly, not only so understood him, but took down at the time the particular Committees to which the hon. gentleman referred.

MR. BLAKE: I never mentioned the name of that Committee.

MR. BOWELL said he accepted the explanation of the hon. gentleman that he did not mention that Committee, but he certainly had made reference to it; and, if the hon. member did not refer to it, he (Mr. Bowell) intended to do so. In that investigation, the Committee did not confine itself to documentary evidence alone. The servants in Sir George Cartier's house were brought before the Committee to give evidence as to what they heard of the conversations which passed between Sir George Cartier and Father Ritchot, and which they had gathered from conversations while outside the door of his bedroom. If the evidence were examined it would be found stated that, upon such a time, on such an occasion, certain gentlemen had an interview with His Excellency and Sir George Cartier, or Sir John A. Macdonald, or Mr. Langevin, and that portions of their conversations had been retailed and given to the Committee. The clerks in the offices and in attendance upon these gentlemen had been summoned to give evidence of what they heard in private as well as in public, yet, when they came to investigate a matter in which the Government were desirous of finding out something which would tell in the country against the leader of the Opposition, the very reports which the officers of their own Departments had been sent to Toronto to make were refused by the Government, and by a majority of the Committee appointed to investigate the charge of misappropriation of public funds. He asked whether, under the circumstances, the hon. member for Cumberland was not correct when he said that he had lost confidence in the Committees appointed by this House? He would call the attention of the

MR. BOWELL.

House to other Committees, not only in this House, but in the Local Legislature, in which the hon. gentlemen who now occupied the Treasury benches were controlling spirits, and where they had just such a majority at their back, at least not quite so large, but sufficient to do their bidding in the appointment of these Committees. He thought the House and the country would come to the conclusion, after investigating these facts, that the minority in this House, against such a Government as existed at present, were quite right and justifiable in refusing to lay any matter before a Committee of their appointing. Most of the hon. members who had read the papers and had paid any attention to parliamentary investigations, would have a distinct recollection of the Proton case in Ontario. Certain charges had been made against a public officer for having used undue influence in a certain election. The Opposition deemed it necessary to have a thorough investigation into the charges against this Mr. Proton Nixon. In order to do so, a leading member of the Ontario Legislature moved a resolution referring the whole matter to a Committee of the Ontario House. How was that motion received? It was met by the then Treasurer of Ontario, the present Premier of the Dominion, and so remodelled, to suit the Local Government, as to destroy its effects. The resolution referred to was moved by Mr. Lauder, and was set at defiance so as to enable the Government to get a report to suit themselves. He (Mr. Bowell) had the motion of Mr. Lauder, and the amendment of Mr. Mackenzie, who was a member of the Local Legislature at the time. That Committee reported, and reported unanimously, with a majority of the friends of the Government upon it, alleging certain points proved, which reflections would fall heavily upon some of the members of the Local Government. The report was kept to as late a period of the Session as they well knew how to keep these things back, and then, under pretext of press of business, its presentation was deferred till the following Session. Was the report then taken up and adopted? Not at all. The hon. member for South Bruce was correct, when he corrected an hon. gentleman on the Opposition side of the House who had referred to the matter, and who had stated that that hon. member (Mr. Blake) was then a member of that Legislature. The hon. member for South Bruce was not then a member, because he had resigned his commission; but he had in that House a representative as ready to do his bidding as were the majority of the House to do the bidding of the leader of the Ontario Government in changing the resolutions of Mr. Lauder. Mr. Mowat, who had been brought down from the Bench and put into Parliament, upon the 11th February, 1873, asked the House not to adopt the report as presented to the House; but, after changing it in toto, so that it was a complete whitewash of one of their colleagues—Mr. McKellar—the majority of the Ontario Legislature adopted it. That was a specimen of the manner in which these gentlemen, who now taunted the Opposition with not referring every subject to a Special Committee, conducted business, and treated a minority. There was another very important Committee moved for in the same House when the late Minister of Justice occupied a position in it, and which was well known throughout the country as the "Speak Now Committee." It was well understood that, upon that occasion, Mr. M. C. Cameron, leader of the Opposition, made charges in the Ontario Legislature against certain Ministers for tampering with a member of the late Sandfield-Macdonald Cabinet, and was called upon to refer the matter to a Committee. He accepted the challenge and moved a resolution, referring the matter to a Select Committee for investigation. Well, there was a Mr. Blake then in the Ontario Legislature, who was supposed to have been, or stated to have been, implicated in this matter; at least, insinuations had been thrown out to this effect. Mr. Cameron moved that a Select Committee be appointed to enquire whether "any corrupt inducement or offer had been made to the Hon. E. B. Wood, a member of this House, to induce him to resign his position as Treasurer of the Province of Ontario, by the Hon. E. Blake or any other member of the Administration." That surely was clear enough.

MR. MACKENZIE: Who was the other member?

MR. BOWELL: I believe there was a gentleman named Mr. Alexander Mackenzie who was one of the other members. In addition to Mr. Blake, there were three others. The hon. the leader of the House will remember who his then colleagues were. What followed? Did they accept this motion? Not at all. Mr. Blake moved an amendment to that motion to strike out the words "by other members of the Administration," thereby confining the investigation to himself, and narrowing it so that, as they had a perfect right to believe would be the case, the Committee, when it met, exonerated Mr. Blake from having used the power of the Government improperly to influence the electors of the township of Proton. He (Mr. Bowell) desired to point out this fact, that the Government, having a majority at their back, refused to allow the charge made by Mr. Cameron to be sent to a Committee in the manner in which they desired the matter should be investigated, for these was no doubt that the report of the Committee would have inculcated some members of the Administration. There had been a Committee, during the present Parliament to investigate into what was known as the "Wallace accounts." Any one who knew anything of the proceedings of the Committee was aware of the manner in which it was conducted. The proceedings were discussed publicly in the newspapers, and he did not wish to repeat them now, but he did not hesitate to say that every attempt was made by the majority to stifle proper investigation. He would go further, and say that portion of such evidence that was taken by the Committee was filtered through the mouth of the Chairman before it was allowed to be placed on record. When the Premier himself was before the Committee and was being interrogated in respect to the accounts, the Committee, which was a sub-Committee of the Public Accounts Committee, rose, and thereby prevented further inquiry, the plea being offered that, as the general Committee was meeting, it could not proceed, but it never met again, and a report was made to suit the Government. The Senate had appointed Committees to investigate certain expenditures in reference to the Fort Frances Locks, and what was known as the Kaministiquia Land Job, and there could be no doubt that those matters would receive a fair and impartial investigation. The hon. the Premier, during the present debate, had made use of language, the use of which would not be permitted by any other member, and it came with an ill grace from the leader of the Government to impugn, as he had impugned, the honesty and integrity of the Senators of this Dominion. Another little matter in this connection was the letter-writing business, which had been referred to and commented upon with a great degree of bitterness and vehemence by the hon. member for South Bruce. He (Mr. Bowell), with many other hon. members, was very glad, after hearing that speech, to find that the hon. gentleman had sufficient vigour left to hurl those home-thrusts, which he knew so well how to send against his opponents. That hon. member had lost none of the power to inflict those thrusts which characterized him in former times, though he had been compelled to resign the position and relinquish the onerous duties attached to the office of President of the Council. He remembered the hon. member for South Bruce had stated that, just so soon as the right hon. member for Kingston made his appearance in the House again, he would call his attention to that now somewhat famous letter, introducing his friend Moore to the Premier in connection with the Goderich Harbour job. He observed, by the hon. gentleman's picnic speech at Téeswater, that he had quoted the remarks of the right hon. member for Kingston in regard to this matter in justification of his action; and the other night he stated that as soon as the right hon. member for Kingston was in his seat, he would appeal to the right hon. gentleman to say whether his remarks were made ironically or in earnest; the reason given by the hon. gentleman being that certain newspapers had stated that those remarks had been uttered ironically and constituted a piece of sarcasm.

MR. BOWELL.

MR. BLAKE: Does the hon. gentleman say that that was the reason I gave?

MR. BOWELL: I understood the hon. member to say he had seen it stated that those remarks were made by the right hon. member for Kingston in an ironical tone, and he intended to ask him, when he came into the House, whether those remarks were made seriously or ironically.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. gentleman said that I had seen it stated in some papers.

MR. BOWELL: That it had been said.

MR. BLAKE: I said that I had seen it reported to have been stated by an hon. member of this House, the hon. member for North Huron. I do not refer to what newspapers say.

MR. BOWELL said he accepted the hon. member's explanation. Anyone who knew the right hon. member for Kingston knew that he would say he was quite sincere and quite in earnest when he stated that the letter to Moore was quite proper. Everyone who knew the right hon. member for Kingston was aware that he never indulged in sarcasm; that it was quite foreign to his nature and his character; and it was surprising that, in view of the acuteness and astuteness of the hon. member for South Bruce, he should think of appealing to the right hon. gentleman to say whether he spoke ironically when he uttered those remarks. If the right hon. gentleman were appealed to, he would, no doubt, say that he was never more in earnest in his life, and that he never indulged in sarcasm. If the right hon. member did not say so, he would disappoint a great many of his friends, and those who knew best the guilelessness of his heart. It was contended by some hon. members that the letter was innocent and proper in its character; but, whether it was proper or improper, it had the effect, whether intended or not, of getting that "friend" of the hon. member the contract, at a large cost to the country. Surely he did not understand the hon. member for South Bruce to say that Moore did not obtain the contract. Undoubtedly, the letter had the effect of getting him the contract at a price $30,000 in excess of the next tenderer, who was just as capable, judging from the records of the Public Works Department, as the contractor who received it. He (Mr. Bowell) knew it was stated that the contract was not given to the lowest tenderer, because he was unknown to the Department, and was a farmer; but the public records themselves, under the signature of the Minister of Public Works, not only stated the fact that he was known, but was doing his contract work at Meaford satisfactory. That letter reminded him of a story which he heard, when a boy, of a volunteer officer named Chambers, who had command of a company, stationed on the Welland Canal during the rebellion, when an American vessel was passing through the canal. He told his men not to pull down the flag on pain of punishment. He turned his back and went away, and on returning found they had pulled down the flag and trampled it in the mud. The result was not that the men were punished, but that the captain, upon being taken before a court of enquiry, was cashiered, and his commission cancelled. There was this difference between the two cases: while the officer was punished for that being done which was quite contrary to the literal meaning of his language, the friend of the hon. member for South Bruce, who presented the letter to the Premier, and who was assured by that hon. gentleman that his friend Mackenzie would give the contract only upon the most fair and equitable terms, got the contract and the money, and the country had lost or would lose $30,000 in connection with it. Hon. members would have a distinct recollection of a very short letter written by the hon. member for South Bruce in connection with a late member of the Ontario Cabinet. They knew it was apparently a very innocent letter which was sent across the House to a member occupying a position in a Cabinet, and it simply said "You had better speak now." There was nothing particularly objectionable in the words "speak now," if the attending circumstances did not prove there was something else behind the scenes. Did any one suppose that a note of that kind would be sent to a member of a Government then in the throes of dissolution from a leading member of the Opposition to "speak now," unless it was the result of some pre-arranged plan; and yet the letter might have been very innocent in itself. Of course, there was nothing particularly objectionable in the use of the words under ordinary circumstances; but, when they found the leader of the Opposition sending such a note to a member of the Cabinet, it implied that there was a pre-arrangement between the gentlemen, or a distinct understanding that the Minister was to sell his colleague. However, it might be honest enough, and if the hon. member for South Bruce appealed to the right hon. member for Kingston he would no doubt say that the words "Speak now" did not amount to much, except under the peculiar circumstances connected with the writing of them. Another little innocent letter was written by the Hon. John Simpson, a prominent politician, in which he told the electors that, if they sustained the Government, his bank would have the use of the Government deposits. That might be innocent enough in its way, but subsequent events led to a different conclusion. He gave these instances to show how language might be used and letters written, which, if they could get behind the scenes would be found to convey something more than that, which, in ordinary parlance, might be called honest transactions. They ascertained, when a certain trial took place at Cobourg, how far these letters affected the Government of the day. It was sworn at that trial that Mr. Cartwright said that the Ontario banks should have a fair proportion of the Dominion deposits. Upon two occasions he (Mr. Bowell) had pointed out to the country, through the House, how far that promise had been carried out. He had shown that a bank, with a comparatively small capital compared with other banks, had the largest portion of deposits, and that without interest; and from an examination of the official returns, made monthly, and published in the Gazette, it appeared that, during last year, about $300,000 of Government deposits had been constantly on deposit in the Ontario Bank, without interest, during the whole of that time.

MR. SPEAKER said that might be a proper matter for Parliamentary enquiry, but he confessed that he could not see its relation to the motion, or even to the other question as to the mode in which Committees should be appointed. It was entirely new matter, and would open up a very wide field of debate, if continued.

MR. BOWELL said he admitted not only the correctness, but the force of Mr. Speaker's remarks. He had premised his remarks by stating that the debate had taken a wider range than the motion had justified; and he held that, the hon. the Premier having challenged that discussion, and the hon. member, who had just taken his seat, not having confined his remarks to the action of Special Committees nor to that of the House in appointing such Committees, he (Mr. Bowell) supposed he had the right to show that hon. gentlemen opposite, not only in this House, but when leaders in the other legislative bodies, had prevented investigations taking place by Committees when Committees were appointed. The extraordinary statement was made a short time ago that a member of the Government, the hon. the Receiver-General, delivered a letter, making a certain offer to a candidate running for the Local Legislature—

MR. SPEAKER said that statement was out of order.

MR. BOWELL said he held in his hand also a statement from a gentleman named Dr. Stewart, who said the hon. the Finance Minister wrote a very interesting letter to a friend in Kingston relative to a member of this Parliament, in which he urged that friend to withdraw a protest against an hon. member of this House. Dr. Stewart was now asking relief from Parliament to get his $1,000 back, which he said he lost through the action of the Minister of Finance.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to state what on earth he is referring to?

MR. BOWELL.

MR. BOWELL: Not only on earth, but anywhere, if you like.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I do not know what other place you have to refer to.

MR. BOWELL said that, if the hon. gentleman would speak plainly enough, so as to enable him to understand what he said, he would be delighted to give him any information he had; but his hearing was not sufficiently acute to hear what the hon. gentleman intended or wanted, from the mumbling manner in which he said it. Dr. Stewart stated that the hon. the Finance Minister had written a letter, in which he asked for the withdrawal of a certain election petition. This letter he was not permitted to read, but he might say that in certain reasons were given for this request; one was that the keeping of the hon. member for Kingston in Parliament would be the means of enabling the present leader of the Government to maintain his position longer than he otherwise would do. He (Mr. Bowell) did not vouch for the correctness of it, though he might draw the inference from it that—

MR. SPEAKER: All this has nothing to do with contracts.

MR. BOWELL said it certainly did relate to a contract made between the hon. the Minister of Finance and Dr. Stewart or his attorney to try and keep the hon. member for Kingston in his seat in order, as he said, that they might retain their positions much longer than would otherwise be the case. He would now drop this subject.

MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid that hon. gentlemen are falling into very discursive habits.

MR. BOWELL said he had no objection to be always kept strictly to the question before the House.

MR. HOLTON: Hear, hear.

MR. BOWELL: And he hoped that the hon. member for Chateaugay, who was singing out "hear, hear" so vociferously would take occasion, in the future, when his own leader went beyond the bounds and drew matters into the discussion which were not at all relevant, to call the hon. gentleman to order. If he did so, hon. members of the Opposition would be quite satisfied.

Mr. HOLTON: I have not called you to order.

Mr. BOWELL said the hon. gentleman never did anything of the kind. He never called any one to order. Most of this discussion had been irrelevant, but this had been due to the remarks made by the hon. the Minister of Public Works. He (Mr. Bowell) could see no necessity for the dragging in of this question of Committees and the manner in which investigations took place in this connection; and, if the debate had been long and discursive, hon. gentlemen opposite had themselves wholly to thank for it.

Mr. GUTHRIE said he did not intend, as he did not keep a scrap-book—

Mr. BOWELL: I will lend you one.

Mr. GUTHRIE: To follow the hon. member for North Hastings through the exploded charges called the "Proton outrage," "Speak now," and "Canoe Couch Damask," which the local politicians of Ontario had at one time considered of vast importance. He rose to speak with regard to the charge made by the hon. member for Cumberland, that something like partiality had been shown by the Special Committee which investigated the affairs of the Northern Railway. He would call the attention of the House to the fact that, respecting evidence which filled something like 200 pages, and translations that covered five or six weeks, the hon. members for Cumberland and North Hastings were only able to take exception to one little transaction, the rejection of a report which no lawyer, having the slightest regard for his reputation, would contend was any evidence whatever. The only exception taken to the work of that Committee had related to the rejection of a memorandum or letter or report—the witness did not very well know what to call it—which was simply a compilation and analysis made from certain printed and other reports, which the Committee had in their hands, and from which they could draw their own conclusions. That gentleman had discovered no facts; he was asked if this report contained the result of anything he had found in the books, and the answer was: "Not a thing;" it was a mere speculation, as it were, on the witness's own part as to what constituted working expenses, and what should be charged to capital account. The House would be surprised when he (Mr. Guthrie) told them that it clearly appeared in this evidence that this compilation was made by a man who knew nothing on earth about railway matters, or the working of railways. This document was utterly worthless, and merely expressed an opinion which that gentleman had no right to express, because he was not an expert; and this was the only thing that these hon. gentlemen could bring as a charge of unfairness against the Northern Railway Committee. Hon. members or anyone had only to read the report presented by the Committee to see that the most ample latitude was given to every member to ask questions. He thought that hardly a question, save one or two of his own, had been ruled out or not permitted, while no witness asked for by any hon. members was refused. The most ample opportunity for calling witnesses, producing documents, examining books, and racking up and down the whole business, was given, and it was utterly unfair and untrue for any gentleman to say that the slightest evidence of partiality on the part of that Committee existed. The findings of the Committee might be open to observation; and perhaps there was room in regard to its conclusion to say that they had shown some partiality; but what was remarkable with respect to the twelve or thirteen findings of the Committee was that not a solitary objection was taken to them, except, as his hon. friend from Stormont (Mr. Archibald) had pointed out, to one finding,—and he supposed wherever the same words occurred in the others—that certain moneys had been misappropriated, and the only dispute was as to whether they could properly say that these moneys were applicable to the payment of the Government lien; and, on examining the record of the proceedings of the Committee and the report, it would be seen that no objection was taken even to the conclusions of the Committee, save to the very limited extent he had just mentioned. He thought that it would be well, since the report of the Committee had been challenged in the way it was, that the Chairman of this Committee should, before the Session was over, move the adoption of the report in order that both the House and country should have the opportunity of seeing whether or not these conclusions were supported by evidence; the matter would then be properly before the House, and would not be brought in by a side wind, as on this occasion. Although he had not had as much experience as others on these Committees, he thought that if other Committees—and he believed that this was the case—had been as fair in permitting evidence to be called, questions to be asked, and documents to be produced and examined as the Northern Railway Committee had been, the charge made against Committees generally was not well made and was one that only gentlemen who were hard driven would resort to.

MR. MILLS said it seemed, from the observations made by the hon. member for North Hastings, that he (Mr. Bowell) had a very much greater regard for the honour and reputation of the Senate than for the honour and reputation of the House of which he was a member. The hon. gentleman had made a speech which was an extraordinary commentary on Parliamentary Government; and had, along with other gentlemen opposite, in discussing the motion made by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) given them to understand that Parliamentary Government was a failure; that, while the Reform party was in power, no Committee, constituted by the House to enquire into any subject, would fairly investigate the matter; that the conclusions at which they might arrive were not to be relied upon, and that the manner in which they would conduct their proceedings would be grossly unfair. The hon. gentleman had undertaken to give some illustrations to establish these propositions which, if they were worth anything, should induce him to seek a change in our Constitution, and adopt some other system of Government; or, perhaps, in order to make popular Government successful, he should disfranchise all those who did not entertain opinions in consonance with his own. The hon. gentleman, like the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy), had had the candour to attack the hon. member for South Bruce after the latter had spoken on this question, when they knew perfectly well he (Mr. Blake) would have no opportunity to reply. The hon. member had referred to the motion made by the leader of the Conservative party in the Legislature of Ontario, to show that the hon. member for South Bruce and the present Chief Justice of Manitoba had been guilty of some very improper transactions, and of forming some sort of conspiracy against the Government of which the latter had been a member; and that some corrupt or improper relations had existed between them. The hon. gentleman knew right well that Mr. Cameron's motion on that occasion was unparliamentary; that it was not properly framed; that it affirmed nothing; and that it was framed for the purpose of fishing for evidence and of establishing, if possible, a charge preferred against hon. members of the same Legislature; while, if it were not successful, it would not involve those who put on foot this enquiry in any responsibility whatever. Mr. Cameron on that occasion moved a resolution in these words:—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to see if any, and, if any, what corrupt inducement or offer was made to the Hon. E. B. Wood, a member of this House, to induce him to resign his position as Treasurer of the Province of Ontario, by the Hon. E. Blake, or any other member of the present Administration, while members of the Opposition.”

The hon. gentleman would see that this resolution affirmed nothing. It did not say that any hon. gentleman therein referred to was guilty of any improper transaction. Mr. Cameron, however, accompanied his resolution with a speech in which he did make all sorts of affirmations of corrupt practices and improper conduct; and, in consequence of that speech, an amendment was moved to the hon. gentleman's motion in these words:—

"That the Hon. M. C. Cameron, a member of this House, having stated in his place that a corrupt inducement or offer was made to the Hon. E. B. Wood, a member of this House, to induce him to resign his position as Treasurer of the Province of Ontario, by the Hon. E. Blake while a member of the Opposition in the Legislative Assembly."

The only persons whom Mr. Cameron named, and respecting whom he wished to make enquiry whether any corrupt practice had taken place, were referred to in this motion. And what Mr. Cameron said in his speech, and what he wished to attain and implied by his motion, was put in the form of an affirmative resolution, of which Mr. Cameron was required to assume the responsibility; but he declined this responsibility and refused to appear before the Committee to prosecute this enquiry. The Committee, nevertheless, sat, and Mr. Blake and Mr. Wood, who were referred to in the motion, appeared before it, were examined, and, after their examination, the Committee made the following report:—

"That no corrupt inducement or offer was made to the Hon. E. B. Wood, a member of this House, to induce him to resign his position as Treasurer of the Province of Ontario by the Hon. E. Blake while a member of the Opposition in the Legislative Assembly."

This was the finding of the Committee, which consisted of Mr. Boulter, Mr. Farewell, Mr. Prince, Mr. Ardagh, Mr. Pardee, Mr. Boulter, Mr. Clarke (Wellington), Mr. Perry, and Mr. Fitzsimmons. Mr. Boulter, Mr. Fitzsimmons, and Mr. Boulter were friends and followers of Mr. Cameron, and they agreed that Mr. Cameron's charge was unfounded so far as it referred to the hon member for South Bruce. The Committee, on that occasion, made a unanimous finding too. The hon. member for Cardwell had intimated that the hon. member for Kingston, in exonerating the hon. member for South Bruce, during the discussion last year on the subject of the Goderich Harbour contract, had spoken ironically, and did not mean what he said; and that, while he (Sir John A. Macdonald) exonerated the hon. member for South Bruce from any blame in the matter, and said that the letter to the Premier was a very proper letter, he did not mean what he said. It was now the duty of the hon. member for Kingston to say whether this rightly represented his meaning or not. These hon. gentlemen said that the letter written by the hon. member for South Bruce to the leader of the Government, stating that Mr. Moore was a tenderer for this work, and that he had informed Mr. Moore that he would no doubt receive justice at the hands of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, was an improper letter; that it meant something more than it said; and that it implied that Mr. Moore must obtain the contract. The hon. member for North Hastings said it was shown that the letter was intended for that purpose, because Mr. Moore did ultimately obtain the contract. It was quite clear, from what had been said by the leader of the Government, and from the facts disclosed, that it was by no means certain that Mr. Moore would get the contract, and it was only by the failure of other parties to whom it was offered that he succeeded in getting it. The hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) said he did not object to Parliamentary Committees. Well, he would not like to take up the ground of the hon. member for Cumberland, and say that Parliamentary Committees could serve no useful purpose whatever. He said sufficient evidence in this matter had already been obtained, so that no further information was required. Looking at the Public Works Report, it was found that Mr. Moore had received the contract from the Government, but it had not been so disclosed for six months after the contract was settled. Mr. Page made a statement which was irreconcilable with the facts, as they were represented by the hon. gentleman opposite. He (Mr. Cameron) assumed that what Mr. Page stated was not correct, and then denied that any investigation was necessary. He (Mr. Mills) remembered stating this to Mr. Page during the only discussion he ever had with that gentleman, and Mr. Page answered that Mr. Tolton was unknown to the Government, that his tender was below the Government estimate, and that one of his sureties was a person who had already given infinite trouble. These, in his opinion, were valid reasons for not giving the contract to Mr. Tolton. If not, then the hon. member for Charlevoix, while Minister of Public Works, had acted wrongfully in refusing contracts from persons whose tenders were lowest. The hon. member had said that, unless some better reason than the lowness of a tender was given, the acceptance of such a contract was a corrupt one. If that was true, then a large number of the contracts entered into by the hon. member for Charlevoix and the Government of which he was a member were corrupt ones. They found, for instance, that he refused the tender of Mr. A., which was the lowest one, though that gentleman's offer was accompanied by satisfactory sureties, and also that of Mr. B. Hon. gentlemen opposite were not in a position then surely to level charges of that nature against the Government. When they were in power they rejected contracts for the very same reasons as those assigned by Mr. Page for the rejection of Mr. Tolton's, and if this was an improper transaction they were equally blameable. When it was proposed to move for an enquiry, these gentlemen would not assume the responsibility. They knew the First Minister would be vindicated. They preferred to slander the majority of the House.

MR. FARROW said he did not want to detain the House very long upon this Goderich Harbour job. The more that affair was looked at, the worse he thought it seemed. The Government had tried in every way to clear themselves in connection with it, but they had only shown themselves in a darker light. Hon. gentlemen on the other side seemed very anxious to have their conduct investigated by a Committee, but he thought any additional evidence which could possibly be brought before a Committee would only place them in a more discreditable position. He did not, however, think it was necessary to have a Committee; they had all the evidence they wanted, the country had all the evidence it required, and they did not wish to receive a partizan report from any Government or interested Committee. All the facts in connection with the transaction were recorded in the Journals of the House, and no additional evidence was required. He had never spoken on the matter at a public meeting or to a private individual but the Government was condemned for the way they acted in reference to that contract. He could quite conceive that the Premier would rather hear them talk of anything else than that, and hence the Minister of the Interior was set up to make a kind of defence—a sham, lame defence. When this subject was brought up last year, when papers were moved for, the Premier was in a great bustle; he seemed to be stunned and scarcely knew what to do. Mr. Page, however, was asked to state the reasons why Mr. Tolton did not receive the contract, and Mr. Page wrote an explanatory letter. That letter, he thought, did not reflect any great credit on the Premier of this Dominion. What did Mr. Page say? The burden of his letter was this, "We do not know Mr. Tolton; therefore, he must not have the contract." Now, had it not been proved over and over again to the satisfaction of every intelligent member of that House that such was not the case? Did not he (Mr. Farrow) show a telegram from a friend of the Premier's explaining Mr. Tolton's position as a man of standing, as a man of means, as a contractor who was acquainted with such work? On the occasion to which he alluded, the Premier had that telegram in his pocket, or at least a copy of it. The forwarder of that telegram, thinking such a message was not sufficient, sent a letter the same evening. That letter, like the telegram, explained that Mr. Tolton was a man of ability and experience, not a man of straw. Yet Mr. Page said he was not known, and that his tender was too low. If it was true that Mr. Page knew nothing about Mr. Tolton, why did not the Premier, with that information in his possession, set him right? Why did not he acquaint him with what he knew of Mr. Tolton's ability to undertake such contracts? Before sending in his offer, Mr. Tolton wrote to Mr. John Brown, who contracted for the Meaford job, and Mr. Brown said he would undertake the dredging work in connection with Goderich Harbour, for a certain sum—just $12,000 less than Mr. Tolton had sought. Then the person who had the contract for the iron work at Meaford Harbour, hearing that Mr. Tolton had sent in an offer, said to him: "I can do something for you: I can go to Toronto, where I have influence with Mr. Brown and Mr. Blake." Accordingly he went to Toronto, but came back, and said to Mr. Tolton: "You cannot get the job; there are others in the way." This took place after that little letter, about which there had been so much talk, was sent, and no doubt it had a good deal to do with the matter. All he (Mr. Farrow) knew about the affair was this, that $30,000 of the public funds were thrown into Lake Huron, or at least might have been, for all the good they did. From that point of view would the country judge of the transaction; there was evidence on the Journals of the House, and that was all he required to satisfy him as to its shameful character.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said he did not want to detain the House; he merely wished to set the hon. gentleman right on one or two matters; and, in order to properly examine into this matter of the Goderich Harbour contract, it was necessary to call the attention of the House to the dates on which certain circumstances transpired. The Prime Minister, if he was rightly informed, took office about the 7th November, and, about a month after, Mr. Tolton made a tender for a contract at Meaford Harbour, which he (Mr. Cartwright) did not understand to have been executed under the direction of the Government, but by the municipality. Mr. Tolton, up to that time, therefore, had not in any special way come under the cognizance of the Department of Public Works. Moreover, it was a well known fact, which he thought every business man would understand, that no Government would entrust a person with a contract involving an expenditure of $200,000 or $300,000 unless they were secured as much as possible under the circumstances.

Mr. FARROW: But Mr. Tolton offered sureties.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: These were not satisfactory to the Department. They consisted of two persons, one of whom was notoriously a man who had given an immense amount of trouble to the hon. member for Charlevoix.

Mr. FARROW: Who was the other?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I know nothing about him.

Mr. FARROW: He was worth $30,000; I know him.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We will not take your simple statement.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT said the fact that one of the sureties was bad was a sufficient reason for neglecting Mr. Tolton's offer. No man had ever dared to say—so far as he was aware—that Mr. Tolton was passed over because he was an opponent of the present Government, or that Mr. Moore, to whom the contract was given, had been selected in consequence of the interest of the hon. member for South Bruce. Mr. Moore did not interfere with elections any more than to give his vote—a right to which every citizen was entitled; indeed, he believed that one of Mr. Moore's partners was said to be an opponent of the Government. Certainly a difference of some $30,000 existed between his contract and that of Mr. Tolton; but it was a recognized principle in the Department of Public Works that, if a man not specially well qualified tendered for a great public work, for a sum greatly below the engineer's estimate, he should be passed over. Now, under the administration of the hon. member for Charlevoix no fewer than 121 such tenders had been passed over, many of them cases where sums of $80,000 and $120,000 were involved, or lost, as the hon. gentleman would say, for the simple reason that they were below the value of the work to be done. Indeed, on looking over some of these he found that they were formally rejected as "not satisfied with experience, skill and resources," and so on. If such was the case during the administration of the hon. member for Charlevoix, then it would appear, according to the hon. gentleman who had last spoken, that there had been some corrupt collusion between the Department and the contractors employed. It did not follow, that, because, after the report of the engineer, the Department rejected a tender on the ground that they did not know whether the tenderer has sufficient skill, experience and resources, to use the ordinary stereotyped phrase, therefore, there must have been any collusion or improper conduct on the part of the Department. If the hon. member opposite (Sir John Macdonald) had the slightest ground for believing there was any collusion between the hon. the Premier and the contractor, it was his duty to ask for an investigation.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. the Finance Minister and others said it did not lie in the mouths of the Opposition to make any charge, because the late Government were liable to mistakes when they were in power. This was really depriving them of their right to perform their duties to their constituents. The Government repudiated any blame, because their predecessors had been guilty of similar offences. Why, this was a new doctrine. This was not a doctrine that came from the Parliament or the British Constitution. Every member in this House was responsible to the people. Supposing all the members of the late Government committed offences, those present were still members of Parliament and had still their duties to their constituents to perform. It was absurd for the Government to endeavour to shirk their responsibility in this way. It was an attempt to get off the charges against them by saying: "It is very true; but you did so before, and, therefore, it does not lie in your mouths to bring charges against us."

MR. CARTWRIGHT: That is not the argument at all.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would give an instance. Supposing a man who had been guilty in his youth of committing a larceny was sworn upon a jury and had to try a man for stealing. That juryman must not find the man guilty, although the crime was proved by the clearest evidence, because he knew that he had committed a larceny himself once in his life. He must not look upon his duty, his sworn duty as a juryman, because, forsooth, he might himself have perhaps committed an offence of the same kind. This was the argument of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and this was the way in which they tried to evade every charge brought against them. But he believed the House and the country would not be satisfied with that line of argument. The question was not what the late Government had done, but what the present Government were doing. If the previous Government had been guilty of all the crimes in the calendar, it was no answer to the charges against the hon. gentlemen opposite, and it showed the weakness of their case when they descended to such an argument. Now, with regard to the Goderich Harbour business, it was quite true that the member for Charlevoix, when Minister of Public Works, rejected many tenders that were lower than the one accepted. He had no doubt that the hon. the Premier had rejected many lower tenders; the law especially provided that the lowest tender need not be accepted. The question was whether the lowest tender was improperly rejected. That was the question in this individual case. It was nothing that the hon. the Minister of Public Works had rejected a great many tenders during the time he held office; but, if he had rejected any on insufficient grounds, he must take the consequence of his acts. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had called the attention of the House to the different system in letting tenders which obtained when the Opposition were in office. In his time every tender was considered, and, as the hon. the Premier knew, they had a number of bogus tenders put in by members of a ring. He was not at all sure that there were not some advantages in the amended system, but there were some great disadvantages. He believed the deposit of security was an advantage in some respects, but it was overbalanced by its disadvantages, because it gave an opportunity for the display of favouritism.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it gave an opportunity for favouritism in this way, that, where a man had a friend in the Government, he could ensure getting his deposit back if he was not successful in his tender. There was a great limitation in the number of tenders by the present system; there was no limitation, no check, no necessity for deposit or security of any kind under the old. All kinds of men, from the ragged subordinate of a late contractor, who wished to get into the contracting business himself, to men of all kinds, could tender and there was then great necessity for closely examining into the tenders, as there was now, and therefore he could quite understand that, during the reign of the late Minister of Public Works, there were a very great many tenders rejected; and there were under the present system for what he (Sir John A. Macdonald) knew. But that was not the question. The question in the present case was whether the hon. the Minister of Public Works had improperly rejected the lowest tender, with respect to the Goderich Harbour contract; and the issue did not rest, as the hon. the Minister of Finance contended, upon a collusion being established between the member for South Bruce and the hon. the Minister of Public Works. The question was whether he had rejected the contract of a man who offered the lowest tender, who was known to the Department, who was recommended to the Department by men in the confidence of the hon. the Minister. The question had been put through the hon. the Minister of the Interior, whether he (Sir John A. Macdonald) meant what he said when he remarked that there was nothing improper in the letter given to Mr. Moore, by the hon. member for South Bruce. He did mean what he said. He did not see anything improper in that letter. He saw nothing in its terms except that it was a friendly letter in favour of the man who had supported the writer, possibly. The letter was guarded, and did not press for the contract to be given to the bearer, Mr. Moore. Now, Mr. Tolton would have performed this contract for $30,000 less than Mr. Moore, then by giving it to the latter gentleman the country had sustained a loss of $30,000. This was clear. It was said that the matter had been left with Mr. Page, but the hon. the Minister of Public Works was not the man to give up his own power and his own responsibility to a subordinate, and he had no right to do so. A subordinate could always shelter himself by the plea that he was acting under instructions from his superior; but a responsible Minister could not shelter himself under the plea that he had instructions from his subordinate. There was such a thing as responsibility of office, and no man should be more distinctly and decidedly held responsible for his acts than the Minister of Public Works. As to the question of collusion between the hon. gentlemen he did not wish to enter into that; but, while he said that the letter was in its terms perfectly harmless and justifiable, he might say the hon. the Minister of Public Works evidently accepted it as a mandate, and gave this contract to the writer's friend, Mr. Moore, simply because his powerful, dangerous, restless and uneasy friend, the member for South Bruce called the contractor his friend. If a harmless letter of that kind—because it simply called the contractor his friend—cost the country $30,000, what would it have cost the country if he had said: "I must have the contract, if possible, for my friend"? The hon. the Minister of Public Works was responsible for giving that contract to Mr. Moore. Yet he had a telegram from Mr. David Stirton—honest David Stirton—a man they all knew and respected, who, he was glad to see, when he left this House, provided for for life, a man too straight and correct for some, a Scotchman and a man who knew what he was about. The Premier had a telegram from him that Mr. Tolton was a good man, a fit man, and that he would do the work well. The hon. the Premier had that information from a reliable man, a personal friend of the hon. Premier, a man who was respected by both sides of the House, and who held an office of trust under the Government. That man had written that Mr. Tolton was a good and fit man to be entrusted with the contract; but the hon. gentleman gave the work to some one else, and now sheltered himself under Mr. Page. The hon. the Premier gave the contract to Mr. Moore on receiving that letter, after having a telegram from Mr. Stirton that Mr. Tolton was a fit man, and having besides stated in his own report that Mr. Tolton was doing the work satisfactorily. The hon. the Minister of Finance said that Mr. Tolton was not a contractor but a foreman.

MR. MACKENZIE: Not a contractor at all; he was an employé of the corporation.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said exactly, the corporation did so much, and the Government so much of that work, and, although he was not an employé of the Government, the Government had to pay part of the expenditure on that labour to Mr. Tolton. And he did his work so well that he was brought to the notice of the Department and mentioned by name.

MR. MACKENZIE: Not till long after that.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that perhaps it did not suit their purpose, and they had left it out.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is as good as the rest.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. the Premier had that letter of Mr. Stirton's and the telegram, and he should have acted on that; but the same day Mr. Page took the ground that one of Mr. Tolton's securities was not a pleasant man. A man might be very troublesome if he was a contractor, and, perhaps, if he was a bumptious fellow, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) would go so far as to prevent his being the principal in a work; but the man who offered security simply had nothing to do with the work. Who was the security objected to? The Sheriff of the county and a well known man. Whether he was a pleasant man or not had nothing to do with it; was his security for $15,000 or $16,000 a good security? He could not interfere with the contract; he had no right to interfere with it. It might be that he was as cross-grained, or ill-tempered, or unpleasant a man as any in the Dominion, yet, if he was a good security, that was all they had to enquire into. What had they to do with Sheriff Sutton's temper or bumptiousness, or want of those characteristics? There was no allegation that Mr. Tolton was a bad-tempered or a dangerous man, and he was the contractor. He was vouched for as a respectable man, fit for the job in every way. Why did he not get it then? Nobody could tell except the hon. the Minister of Public Works, who said that his man (Mr. Moore) was a friend of the member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake), and that he would oblige him to the extent of $30,000. It was a small affair, and the Fort Frances Lock, $130,000, was a small affair too, for a great Dominion like this. This money was lost to the country. This $30,000 would have been saved if Tolton had got that contract. They would not be guardians of the public justice if they did not hold the Government to a strict account in this matter. It was quite evident the Government looked upon this enquiry as a formidable one when they put up two Ministers, one after the other, to support this transaction. When the hon. member for North Huron had stated he knew one of the securities to be worth $30,000, the hon. the Premier stated he would not take his word for it.

MR. MACKENZIE: I said I could not take his statement as to what the man was worth. It was quite impossible that he could know what the man was worth.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was only on reputation one could know what a man was worth. He did not suppose the hon. gentleman held an inquisition in every case to find what a man was worth. He judged it from his reputation, from the opinion of his banker, or his neighbours. How, then, stood this transaction? In this single case, there was a loss of $30,000 to the country. It was said the man who offered the lowest tender was an inefficient man that he was a farmer. But he was not, and never was, a farmer. The men who got the contracts were farmers. The reasons given were that he was a farmer; that he was too pugnacious.

MR. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman say Sutton is a wealthy man? Let him give a particle of evidence of his worth.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had not the register of his property in his pocket. But why was not that given as a reason? That was not alleged; it was alleged he was a disagreeable man, who had given a great deal of trouble to the Department before. What had the Department to do but to carry on the business of the country? and, if a man was a little troublesome, they must put up with it if the interests of the country were to be subserved. There was no doubt that this innocent transaction had done more injury to the Government than even the Fort Frances Lock or any supposed loss of millions of dollars on steel rails, because it showed a want of watchfulness of the public interests, of administrative ability and attention in the great public works, and, more than that, an undue subserviency, when it suited the head of the Department, to vague statements got up for a purpose.

MR. HIGINBOTHAM said he desired to say one word about Mr. Tolton. The hon. member for North Huron had stated that he could prove in this House that one of the securities of Mr. Tolton, in this matter, was worth $30,000. He would not enter into a discussion, because it was well known that the hon. gentlemen opposite were afraid to ask for a Committee of investigation, but wished to use this matter at their future picnics, as they had done last summer. He had never stated Mr. Tolton was worth $30,000; he had only one hundred acres of land, and was worth from $3,000 to $10,000, at the outside. He made this statement in order what hon. gentlemen might know what Mr. Tolton was worth.

MR. MACKENZIE said no doubt the House would allow him to speak again. In the first place, the right hon. gentleman had endeavoured to put his defence of this transaction on a wrong footing in saying that, because he (Mr. Mackenzie) alleged the Opposition had done wrong, he was justified in doing wrong. He (Mr. Mackenzie) had said that he had not done wrong. He claimed this was a perfectly straightforward transaction. What he had said was that, if the mere fact that one tender was passed over for a much larger sum, and, therefore, there was some apparent loss to the public, were taken as prima facie evidence that the transaction was corrupt, then, how corrupt must the hon. gentlemen opposite have been? He had scrupulously guarded himself against acknowledging that there was anything wrong in the transaction. He did know there was nothing wrong in it. Hon. gentlemen opposite alleged that there was something wrong, although they did not know there was anything wrong. The only reason they gave was that the engineer reported that tender as too low. They were loud in their condemnation of passing over a low tender, upon the sole ground that the officers, or the Minister, as was the case in many instances with the hon. gentlemen opposite, decided that the sum was too low, or the party not competent. These reasons were valid when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, but it was perfectly monstrous that he should attempt to justify himself behind the chief officials of a Department. They were asked to believe that Mr. Page would allow his judgment and decisions to be unduly controlled by him (Mr. Mackenzie) or any other authority. The right hon. gentleman had said that Mr. Page was the subordinate, and that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had merely to give orders and Mr. Page would write out anything.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I said the hon. member was responsible, and could not shelter himself behind the report of his official subordinates.

MR. MACKENZIE: I say I can shelter myself under my subordinate. If I ventured, without Mr. Page's authority, to pass over a low tender and take another, I would then not only be directly responsible, but would do very wrong.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is no report of Mr. Page's; only a statement from recollection a year afterwards.

MR. MACKENZIE: Does the right hon. gentleman mean to say that Mr. Page's statement is not to be depended upon; that Mr. Page is a man to write down a thing which he does not believe to be correct?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am not going to make any charge.

MR. MACKENZIE: No; the right hon. gentleman has too little manliness to make a charge. He was not manly enough to come to the charge. Let him make that charge; let him allege that there had been corruption and collusion, and he should have his Committee in any shape he pleased, to examine witnesses, find out facts, and see whether there was anything wrong in this or any other transaction. When the right hon. member was face to face with the hon. member for South Bruce, he accepted his letter at once, in a most generous spirit. At the first picnic he attended after the incident, he said the letter was very nice, but, no doubt, underlined. That letter could be brought to his own city and exhibited to every person; it could be brought here to show how generous he was. The right hon. gentleman could stand face to face with an opponent and be very generous, and then, when he went behind, could stab him in the dark. The right hon. gentleman said further that they passed over a lower tender to reach Mr. Moore. Moore was not reached first; Mr. Ellis, of Toronto, was first reached, and the contract was formally assigned to him, but he declined to come forward. Then they passed on to the next, who happened to be Moore.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Passed over Tolton?

MR. MACKENZIE: Not at all. Ellis was between Tolton and Moore, and Ellis was assigned the contract. The right hon. gentleman is not willing to be fair and listen.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am listening.

MR. MACKENZIE: With a great deal of impatience. But he said we had the letter of David Stirton. I have heard the right hon. gentleman describe David Stirton before now. He was anything but an honest man.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: You never heard me say a word against him in any place or at any time

MR. MACKENZIE: I never knew a man opposed to the hon. gentleman who was not maligned, and Mr. Stirton was too honest to escape the usual course pursued by the right hon. gentleman towards his opponents. It serves his purpose now to laud Mr. Stirton, who, I admit, is one of the best men in Canada; but I will not take him before Mr. Page in a matter where professional knowledge and abilities are required. Another matter about Mr. Sutton. The right hon. gentleman has evidently not a particle of knowledge of Mr. Sutton, and yet he could say he was a gentleman of well known wealth and character.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I know him very well.

MR. MACKENZIE: He knows nothing about Sutton. It is quite impossible he should know he was wealthy.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think I appointed him Sheriff.

MR. MACKENZIE said he knew the hon. gentleman nominated people as Sheriffs who could not pay a twentieth part of their debts. He knew why he was nominated Sheriff. Up to that time he had been on the opposite side of politics—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Like Moore.

MR. MACKENZIE: The right hon. gentleman should content himself with listening, and not interrupt so often. He (Mr. Mackenzie) never interrupted him. A contract had been given out a short time before this at Chantry Island. It was accorded to Mr. Andrew Lindsay for $114,452. If he (Mr. Mackenzie) was not wrongly informed, the party who was the lowest tenderer was this same Sutton, who tendered for the work for $14,268, one hundred thousand dollars below Andrew Lindsay, who got the contract. The sole reason for giving it to Mr. Lindsay was that Sutton had tendered far below the actual value of the work. Yet he was now, when it suited his purpose, a wealthy man.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He is good security.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not think he was any security at all. But the right hon. gentleman went on to say that he (Mr. Mackenzie) knew everything about Tolton; he knew less about Tolton than Moore. The only one he knew anything about was a gentleman from Belleville, Mr. Nelson, whose tender was next to the one accepted, and who was passed over because he had failed before in carrying out two contracts. He (Mr. Mackenzie) knew nothing about the others. When tenders were received in his Department, he never opened them, nor did he ever accept a tender without a close consultation with the Chief Engineer and the deputy head of the Department. He had no distinct recollection, at the time the thing was mentioned publicly, of what had taken place, only that it was a thoroughly straightforward transaction, and he applied to Mr. Page for the reasons which led to awarding the contract. Mr. Page gave his recollection of the circumstances, and there was no man to be found anywhere to recollect what had taken place for many years past. The truth was, so far as he (Mr. Mackenzie) was concerned: Mr. Page, Chief Engineer, and Mr. Trudeau, deputy head of the Department, practically decided this and every other tender, except in cases where some consideration might come in, as in the Welland Canal, for which contract a firm from the United States tendered, who had been accused of improper practices in their contracts there. In such a matter as that, the Ministers of the Crown were, perhaps, more competent than the officers of the Department. But, in all ordinary cases, the practical officers of the Department really disposed of everything in this connection. The right hon. gentleman had said that the country had lost this $30,000; he (Mr. Mackenzie) did not believe the country had, because it was not possible for that man to do the work, and, if he had obtained the contract, it would have resulted in a loss to the Government in being obliged to take it off his hands and finish it in some other way. His recollection was that Mr. Page estimated this work at about $220,000, and that gentleman also considered it to be impossible for Moore to execute the work at the price at which he took it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: They say he bought an estate out of the profits.

MR. MACKENZIE: They say a great deal. "They" said Sutton was a wealthy man, but that did not prove that he was wealthy. With regard to the other point that the hon. gentleman tried to make, he supposed the right hon. gentleman would tell them he was generous enough to make an admission there when they accused him of knowing, by reason of his own report, that Mr. Tolton was of excellent character. Now, the Report of the Department of Public Works was not written by the Minister. It was a synopsis of the year's operations, and his name was attached to it as a matter of form. He knew nothing of its contents, and he never knew of Tolton's name being mentioned in it until some time afterwards. His officers were responsible for the report, not himself. It was a record of events and a series of tables, with information about public works which had to be carried on. But he had this reply to make to this part of the hon. member's speech: In the first place, the report was not there at all at that time; in the second, he did not put it there, and he knew nothing about it; and in the third place, Tolton was not a contractor of the Department. The only statement with regard to him was that he had been employed to work for the Meaford Corporation, and had done it well or satisfactorily. Mr. Page was right in stating that Tolton was not known to the Department as a contractor. The attempt to fasten a charge on him (Mr. Mackenzie) after he had acted in the most perfect good faith after he had acted on the report of an officer whose special duty it was to direct and guide the Minister, and to report for his information, was unfair. The Minister invariably acted under the advice of his officers, unless something of a very extraordinary nature intervened to induce him to change his views of the opinion the officer might give. He had no recollection, at this moment, of Mr. Page and himself ever having had such a difference of opinion about contracts, or, indeed, any other officer of the Department. He invariably managed to act with those gentleman in a most cordial manner, although not one was the appointee of the Government, or a Government supporter.

MR. CASEY said it was very unfair to represent the argument of the hon. the Minister of the Interior as being a tu quoque argument, as had been done by the hon. member for Kingston, who made it appear that the hon. Minister had said, "It is very true, but you did so before." That statement was incorrect and misleading on two grounds: First, it was not admitted that the charges were true; and second, it was not charged on this occasion that the present Opposition did the same thing while in office. The argument of the hon. member for North Huron was that, because a lower tender was passed over with nothing but the engineer's report to sustain that action, there must have been collusion or corruption. The hon. the First Minister, in his argument, undertook to show that tenders had been similarly passed over by the late Government, but he did not say corruptly passed over. The argument was directed at the sincerity of the hon. gentleman who made the charge. Did the hon. gentleman believe, on those grounds, his own leader had acted corruptly? The House would not think he did so believe; hon. members could not imagine he believed the late Government had acted wrongly, or that he considered the argument conclusive against the hon. the First Minister, which he considered non-conclusive against the late Ministers. That, he (Mr. Casey) understood to be the line of argument adopted by the hon. the Minister of the Interior. As to the merits of the case itself, he would not say anything after the clear explanation of the hon. the Premier. He could not avoid, however, calling attention to the credit which the right hon. member for Kingston claimed to himself for making generous admissions in regard to his opponents. That hon. gentleman had said he was too ready to make those generous admissions, to please his own friends, and quoted the generous admission made by him on a past occasion in respect to the letter of the hon. member for South Bruce. That had all the appearance of a generous admission. He would be in order in reading those words to the House:

"The letter written by the hon. Minister of Justice was highly creditable to him—it was a letter which Mr. Moore had a right to get from him. Mr. Moore supported the hon. the Minister of Justice as a candidate for South Bruce in 1877. He was, therefore, a friend of the hon. gentleman, and had a right to receive a letter stating all the hon. gentleman could honestly state. The hon. the Minister of Justice was not in any way personally responsible for the loss of those $29,000 to the country."

That was the statement of the right hon. member for Kingston last year, and it certainly must have given every hon. member the impression that that right hon. gentleman intended to absolve the late Minister of Justice from any corrupt connection with the matter whatever. That was the clear meaning of the words, and it was the impression which the House derived from it. But the right hon. member for Kingston, at a picnic last summer, stated that the word "friend" must have been underlined in the letter.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The statement at the picnic was just the statement I made in the House. The letter was perfectly innocent in itself, but it had the effect of a mandate, the same as if it had been underlined. I am not in the habit of getting other people's letters and reading them.

MR. CASEY: It has been suggested that the letter had been underlined.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It had the effect of a mandate, as it had been underlined.

MR. DYMOND: The right hon. gentleman is reported to have said: No doubt the word "friend" was underlined.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It was not reported so.

MR. CASEY: It was so reported in the paper at the time. Of course it may not have been correctly reported.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is not so reported, as you will see if you look at the newspapers.

MR. CASEY said the right hon. gentleman was mistaken. He had stated, on the occasion of the picnic, that the letter had the same effect as if "friend" had been underlined. That right hon.

gentleman had changed his position from having stated that the hon. member for South Bruce was not responsible, to hinting and insinuating that he might be responsible, and that his letter might have brought this loss. To-night, however, he went a step further. Attention having been called to this variation of statements between his face-to-face statement, and that made behind the back of the late Minister of Justice, he was compelled to choose between them; and he had decided, on this occasion, to adhere to his picnic statement, making it a little stronger by saying that the hon. the First Minister had obliged a man to the extent of $30,000 out of the public funds because he was a friend of the then Minister of Justice. This was the class of general admissions which the right hon. gentleman had made—admissions which carried to the minds of all who heard them the impression that he absolved a man from any corrupt connection with matters charged against him; admissions which he half retracted in the hon. gentleman's absence, and which, when subsequently brought to book, he altogether retracted and replaced by a direct accusation of personal corruption. That was the class of generous admissions which the right hon. member for Kingston was in the habit of making, and the House would estimate his generosity at its true value. Having dealt somewhat with the personal issues concerned, his mind reverted to a quotation made by the right hon. member for Kingston from some distinguished individual to this effect: "Let us consider everybody is in the very worst place, and let us go to business." That was exactly what the Government asked the right hon. gentleman to do; let him get to business and make those charges which he had repeated in public squarely against the hon. gentleman in the House. They asked the right hon. member to appeal to the only constitutional tribunal for the trial of such a case, namely, a Parliamentary Committee. The only objections to that course of proceeding were that a Parliamentary Committee would have nothing to do; that there was nothing further to find out, and that there was evidence before the House quite sufficient to satisfy the hon. member for North Renfrew. He (Mr. Casey) held that these were matters for a Committee to investigate. The defence of the hon. the Premier, in regard to the contract, rested on several grounds; one was that the securities given were insufficient; another was that it would have been impossible to perform the work for the sum named in the lowest tender. Those were propositions which were susceptible of proof; a Committee could ascertain whether the security offered was sufficient, and also whether it was possible that the work could be done for the amount named. While those propositions were susceptible of proof before a Committee, they were not susceptible of proof in the case of a loose discussion in the House. Here, then, was a distinct case for a Committee and not for a discussion on the floor of this Chamber. And then there was a charge that $30,000 would have been saved if Mr. Tolton had got the contract. That was a point which, if capable of proof at all, could be proved before a Committee. He thought, therefore, that the hon. gentleman who had brought those charges were clearly in the wrong and injured their own cause by refusing to take the course which was manly and straightforward, but which was the only course open to prove assertions which were incapable of proof in any other way, except by an investigation by a Parliamentary Committee. Why did they not take that course? They said Committees were partizan. They must be composed of members of both sides of the House, and the only way to avoid that difficulty would be to select an equal number from each side and do away with the Chairman. If there were an equal number and a Chairman, the Committee would still be of a partizan character, and it would be as unfair to have a majority of one as to have the present majorities. It had always been held that the complexion of a Committee should reflect, to some extent, the general complexion of the House. It was said, moreover, that the report of a Committee, whether partizan or not, should deal with nothing but the facts. There were, in this case, facts to report. Why did hon. gentleman opposite not take this parliamentary course? Hon. members supporting the Government had not been afraid to make charges and have them referred to partizan Committees. When a charge was brought forward against the late Government by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) on a memorable occasion five years ago, it was not made the subject of a long-winded, frothy discussion, terminating with no definite proposal. On that occasion, the hon. member rose and moved that, as he, Lucius Seth Huntington, a member of this House, had been informed, and verily believed, that certain transactions had taken place with the Government, a Committee be appointed to try the charges; and the hon. member then resumed his seat. There was no lengthy discussion, no personal attacks upon individual members, no insinuations, no generous admissions and subsequent retractions; there was a simple business-like statement of the charge, and demand for a Committee. They did not fear the Committee, though they knew it must be partizan; but, though the tribunal was appointed by the inculpated party themselves, and was the most partizan tribunal ever constituted, they had no reason to fear the partizanship of any tribunal, providing it was the means of bringing the facts before the public. That was the reason why hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House had no fear of a Committee; and it was the same reason which induced hon. gentlemen opposite to be afraid to accept the challenge to have the whole facts investigated by a Parliamentary Committee.

Mr. LANDERKIN said the discussion had taken a wide range, and many matters had been introduced without proper and sufficient notice having been given. The hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had shown his usual industry in bringing forward new matter. That hon. gentleman had referred to the case of Senator Simpson, which had been determined by the Courts in such a manner as to cause the failure of the attempt of the Opposition to make political capital out of it.

MR. SPEAKER called the hon. member to order, and stated that he had previously called the hon. member for North Hastings to order when introducing that matter.

Mr. LANDERKIN said he approved of the course taken by the Speaker, and had only mentioned the subject as an illustration of the stock charges of the Opposition. About the whole stock-in-trade on which hon. gentlemen had to appeal to the country was the so-called great outrage perpetrated at Goderich. What he desired to understand in connection with that transaction was that the work was let to Messrs. Moore and Wilson at a reasonable price, and on the advice of the Chief Engineer of the Public Works Department. On it being shown that such was the case, he was perfectly satisfied. He was not one of those who believed it was always absolutely necessary that the party sending in the lowest tender should receive the contract. There were many cases where the adoption of such a course would have been very prejudicial to the public interest, and it was desirable that the Government should not be bound by any such rule. He remembered a case in which a gentleman, whom he well knew, and who was considered wealthy, received a Government contract at a too low price, and, endeavouring to carry it out, lost his property, and the public interest suffered from the fact that he was constructing a breakwater, the work on which was destroyed by storms, and all the money expended on it lost. That contract was disastrous to the individual and to the public service. As a warm supporter of the Government, believing they had honestly discharged the duties of their high position and honestly administered the affairs of the country with efficiency and great capability, he did not consider they should be bound down, in every instance, to give contracts to the lowest tenderer. He had heard with satisfaction the statement of the hon. the Premier, in the matter of the Goderich Harbour contract; a straightforward, manly statement, of which he (Mr. Landerkin) approved and would be willing to defend in every emergency when called upon. That statement contained nothing respecting which any hon. member need feel ashamed. The right hon. leader of the Opposition had said that it was no justification to the present Government that honest tenders had been passed over by the late Government, and that they had thus set a precedent for the guidance of the present Administration. The Government would not be guided by any precedent established by the old Government. He believed, however, it was of vast importance that the people should compare the acts of the two Administrations, for by them the people were to judge when called upon to decide which party should govern the country. It was no wonder that the leader of the Opposition did not desire that they should refer to contracts let by the Minister of Public Works in the late Government. He would refer to some of them, and he thought he would show why the hon. gentleman objected to any comparison being instituted. The hon. member for North Huron deliberately said that these $30,000 were as good as thrown into Lake Huron, but how could that hon. gentlemen desire to be consistent, and to stand well with the people of this country, when, without having any knowledge to that effect, he stood up in his place and declared that these $30,000 were thrown away. The right hon. member for Kingston followed in the same strain. What was to be thought of this right hon. gentleman when the Minister of Public Works in the late Government, no doubt acting under his advice and with his consent, let contracts, and passed over the lowest tenders, giving no other reason for this course than that these tenders were actually too low. He would refer to some of those contracts to show how desirous the right hon. member for Kingston and his followers must naturally be, that the acts of their Government should not be closely scrutinized. He would read a few of these cases.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Is that a Blue-book?

MR. LANDERKIN: It is a book that can be relied upon. It is not an Opposition document. It is a reliable document.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Without the "re."

MR. LANDERKIN said that the contract for Wellington Basin was offered for tender, and several parties tendered; but the lowest tenderer did not get it, although his tender was $80,577 less than the accepted tender. In other words, to use the language of the right hon. member for Kingston, the hon. member for North Huron, and other members who had spoken on the Opposition side of the House, these $80,000 were thrown away. What was the excuse given for this waste? This; that the tender was far below the actual value of the work; and the very gentlemen who would sustain this act, because in the matter of the Goderich Harbour contract a tender was passed over in which only a difference of $30,000 was involved, tried to show that the greatest amount of possible corruption had been practised by the hon. the Minister of Public Works. Again, in the matter of the Montreal terminus, the name of the lowest tenderers was J. Courtney & Co.; the name of the contractors who received it was A. P. McDonald & Co.; the amount of money that was thrown away in this instance, to use the argument of the right hon. member for Kingston, was $120,569; and the reason alleged for giving the contract to the latter company was that the other tender was far below the value of the work. He could go on and read a great many similar cases to show how unwilling the hon. members of the Opposition were that these statements should be made and presented to the people of this country. The leader of the Opposition was appealing—he might say frantically appealing—to the people to restore him to power, and he (Sir John A. Macdonald) was desirous of having the acts of his Government, in this relation, ignored, and he did not wish to depend for support upon the strength of his policy and acts in the past in asking for the support of the people. The hon. gentleman desired to have these facts ignored; but, though hon. members of the Opposition had made diligent search through the Departments in order to discover anything that might be amiss, all they had obtained as the result of their search, he believed, was the matter of the Goderich contract; and it was very plainly proved by the hon. the Premier that no wrong was done; that Mr. Tolton, who tendered, according to the opinion of the engineer, was too low in his tender. Then these hon. gentlemen said Mr. Stirton claimed that Mr. Tolton was good and efficient, and able and qualified to do this work. He had no desire to say anything of his own knowledge against Mr. Tolton, but, when the hon. gentleman came before the House and country and declared that Mr. Tolton was wealthy, and an able and efficient contractor, and a contractor of great experience, and indicated that Messrs. Moore & Co. were not contractors of any eminence or reputation whatever, he felt bound to say that, though he had lived in that section of the country, until he heard that Mr. Tolton had charge of work at Meaford harbour, he never knew that this gentleman was a contractor at all. He had understood that Mr. Tolton was engaged in buying grain; and this was honestly the impression he had about the man; though he was aware that Mr. Moore was a contractor, and a contractor who had carried on some very considerable contracts, and was very efficient in that capacity. If he mistook not, Mr. Moore had contracts in connection with Mr. Hill, at Southampton, and at some other places on the lake coast; also very large contracts in the building of gravel roads in that section of the country; and he knew very well that Mr. Moore stood well as a contractor in that section. And it was no matter for wonder that the hon. the First Minister had not known that Mr. Tolton was a contractor, when he (Mr. Landerkin), who had lived in that section, was ignorant of this fact. He knew the people there well, and he had never heard or known that there was a contractor of this name there, or that Mr. Tolton was engaged in any business save that of grain buying. He did not desire to say anything against Mr. Tolton on or about his financial position, but he could tell the House and country that he had heard it stated a short time ago that, after this contract was let, Mr. Tolton made a composition with his creditors; and here was strong evidence that he was not that rich and that powerful man in the financial way represented, not only by the hon. member for North Huron, but also by the right hon. member for Kingston. He would have not made this statement had not this matter been taken up and unfairly represented. Messrs. Moore & Co. were qualified men, who had carried on valuable contracts; and he thought that the Government had acted wisely in giving this contract to them. Hon. gentlemen had dragged the name of Sheriff Sutton into the discussion, and this gentleman was said to be a very wealthy, able and efficient man. The hon. member for Niagara had stated the other night that he (Mr. Sutton) was a most capable man, who was quite able to handle a large contract; but, if the public record was of any force and could be relied upon, this same Mr. Sutton, under the Government of the right hon. member for Kingston, had tendered for a contract at Chantry Island, but, though he was now said to be a wealthy and capable man, he could not then be relied upon to execute a contract to the amount of $100,000, though his contract was nearly $15,000 less than that of the person who got it. He would ask the right hon. member for Kingston why he threw these $15,000 into the Bay. He would like to know the reasons which induced the right hon. gentleman or the former Minister of Public Works to pass over this distinguished individual, who was now paraded before the House as being able, capable and efficient, and rejected and set aside his tender for one that was nearly $15,000 higher. He did not know that he would have spoken at all on this question had not the right hon. member for Kingston said he thought it unfair for the Government or their friends to examine into the conduct of those who had let contracts in former times. It was to these things that they had to look for guidance and direction; and if he had found, when he came into the House, that contracts were being fairly let, and that the Government was administering public affairs honestly, fairly and squarely, he would have considered what claims the late

Government had on his support. He had to look to these matters as well as other members of the House, to find out to whom they should give their support for the administration of the affairs of the country. It was of vital importance to know and scan the history and facts of the present Administration, to see whether they had acted honourably and honestly, and endeavoured to develop the resources of the country and if they had not done this, it was strong reason why they should withdraw from these hon. gentlemen their support; and, if they found that their administration of affairs had been honest, and that they had exercised due discretion in the letting of contracts, and he felt that they had a right to sustain the present Government and ask the country to sustain them because their administration of the affairs of the country had been judicious and economical, and conducted with due regard to consistency in every particular. He was quite prepared and quite able to stand up in his constituency, in view of the explanations he had received, and defend the Government. When the charge was made against the Government, he was most anxious to know whether there was any foundation for it; and, after having looked into the whole facts of the case, he had no hesitation in saying that the Government had done nothing to forfeit the confidence he had reposed in them; and he thought it was unworthy of the Opposition, and beneath the dignity of statesmen, to stand up in the House and say that, because the Government had exercised discretion in the letting of contracts, they had been corrupt, when the whole career and the records of the Public Works Department went to show that the late Government, in letting their contracts, had passed over lowest tenderers, and so given out contracts of over $80,000 and $100,000 without any other excuse or reason being alleged for such course, save that the tenders which were passed over were too low. He did not find fault with the hon. gentlemen for having done so, but, when they turned round and said a corrupt act had been committed because the hon. the First Minister had not awarded this contract to the lowest tenderer, what other inference could be drawn save that the whole system and the whole career of these hon. gentlemen, and their whole system of letting contracts, had been corrupt. He had no desire to arrive at such an opinion, but when he heard them say that the hon. the First Minister had let this contract corruptly, he felt certain that all these contracts which were let by the late Government must have been let corruptly. This was the judgment of these hon. gentlemen. He was quite prepared to accept the responsibility of supporting the Government if this was the character of the charges that could be made against them on the part of the Opposition, which was industriously working for the purpose of discovering whether anything had gone amiss; and he was glad that this was being done, because it showed that the more they looked into the affairs of the Government and watched its conduct and course, the more he thought hon. members would be satisfied that the Government were conducting the affairs of the country with honesty, with ability and with economy, and on strong patriotic grounds, and that they were deserving of the continued support of the House and the county; and when they went to the country—and he trusted that this would soon be done, for he would go to the country and was anxious to do so—he felt certain that, from one end to the other, they would be sustained. He did not dread an appeal to the country. He feared he should, after this was made, miss the faces of some of his hon. friends among the Opposition, but he would try to forget that calamity. He believed that the country would sustain the hon. the First Minister and his Government, because they had endeavoured to administer the affairs of the country with honesty, with ability, with statesmanship, and with patriotism.

4. Department of Justice.....$11,700

In answer to Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that the salary of the private secretary had been increased from $350 to $600, the usual amount granted to a private secretary, at any rate in an important Department. The work of a probationary clerk had been dropped; on the other hand, three or four statutory increases of $50 each had been made to four senior second-class clerks and one third-class clerk, while a small reduction had been effected in the sum paid to a messenger; a boy, he believed, was now employed in place of a man, who had been transferred to the Supreme Court, and the result was a net increase of $100.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would like to ask who was the private secretary.

MR. LAFLAMME: Mr. Power. Owing to a large amount of French correspondence which had now to be done, the former secretary only being conversant with the English language, Mr. Power, who was also an official in the Department, had been transferred and made assistant secretary for this purpose.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he quite understood that his hon. friend the hon. the Minister of Justice required a secretary who wrote French. This was quite proper. In fact, the head of a Department had a peculiar right to have his own private secretary, who should be a personal friend, and one he chose to have about him; and no questions should be asked as to who the private secretary of a Minister was; but he would like to know whether the private secretary of his hon. friend was an officer of the Department.

MR. LAFLAMME said that this gentleman was an officer of the Department, but, as his work was thus increased, an additional amount had been awarded him. As most of the correspondence from the Province of Quebec was conducted in French, it would seem rather awkward if these correspondents of that Department were to receive an English answer from a French-Canadian Minister; and, therefore, it was thought necessary to take the step indicated. The gentleman chosen for this purpose was, moreover, a lawyer from the Province of Quebec, and he greatly assisted in performing the work of the Department.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was simply a question of salary. In his time, when any member of the Government brought in a private secretary, the latter received a salary of $600; but, if he chose an officer of the Department, it did not follow that this person received that addition to his salary, though he got something within the $600 to compensate him for the additional duty performed.

MR. LAFLAMME: That is done. The two secretaries do not receive jointly, as secretaries, more than $600.

MR. DYMOND said that, before the item passed, he desired to call attention to a matter to which it would be proper then to refer, as it bore very closely upon the management of the Department the salaries of which were being voted. He was sure that anyone would admit that, when they voted salaries to public officers, they should know, not only what their duties were, but also whether these salaries secured for them the whole of the time, the attention and the personal interest of these officials. The very fact that a public officer had a divided interest, that the whole of his consideration was not given to the public interest, and that his interest might be contrary, under certain circumstances, to that of the public, was a subject which he thought required the attention of the Committee. He found, on turning to the report of the Northern Railway Select Committee, laid before the House last year, that a gentleman who was Deputy Minister of Justice, had not thought it unbecoming to act in a double capacity; and he desired to know from the hon. the Minister of Justice and also from the hon. member for South Bruce, whether a practice of this kind would now receive or had received, during their tenure of office, the sanction of the head of the Department. He found it stated in the report to which he had referred that, in July, 1868, an account was rendered by the then Deputy Minister of Justice for $500 for fees as parliamentary agent in prosecuting the Northern Railway Act of 1868. He need hardly remind the Committee how the Northern Railway Company was again and again an applicant for relief at the hands of the House; and this Act of 1868 was a measure of relief; it was a measure which required the independent action of the Government, and upon which the Crown should have had the most independent advice possible from its officers; and the Deputy Minister of Justice, although not absolutely at the head of the Department, must, as a practical lawyer, be consulted in connection with such a matter. He put it to the Committee whether anything could have been more unbecoming, more improper, or more indecent, than for a gentleman occupying that position to accept a salary from the Crown and fees at the same time from a private party with whom the Crown was, at that moment, not in litigation, but with whom it was necessary to deal in an independent capacity. He wanted to ask whether anything could be more demoralizing to a Department than that a Minister of the Crown should receive his salary on the one hand, and advise parties who had interests which might be antagonistic to those of the Crown and the public on the other hand? He desired to know whether such a practice as this was tolerated up to the present time? He found, in addition to this, that, in the year 1872, his hon. friend the member for East York (Mr. Metcalfe) had moved for certain returns connected with the Administration of this Department; he moved for a return respecting sums of money paid to departmental clerks for extra writing or otherwise; for a return relating to the collection of money overdue on Ordnance Lands; and for a return of money paid for salaries, extra services and travelling expenses. The first and last-mentioned returns were brought down during the then current Session. There was no hesitation whatever shown as to informing the public concerning these matters; but the second return, relating to the collection of arrearages upon Ordnance Lands, was never brought down by the Government which was then in power. He did not know under what circumstances that return had made its appearance in the House five years afterwards, namely, during the Session of 1877; and it was published in the Sessional Papers of last year—No. 163, Vol. IX. This return showed that, in 1872, a circular to this effect was issued:—

“ OTTAWA, 187 .

“ SIR,—I am desired by the Attorney-General of Canada, to inform you that he has received instructions to institute proceedings forthwith against you at the instance of the Crown in the following respect:—

“ For the collection of $ as Ordnance rent in arrear up to 30th April, 1872, on of side street, in the city of Ottawa.

“ The costs accrued up to this date are $2.50. I have to request that you will at once arrange the amount of your indebtedness at this office, and thus save the incurring of of further costs by you.

“ I have the honour to be, Sir,

“ Your obedient servant,

“ H. BERNARD,

“ Deputy Minister of Justice.

“ Ottawa.”

It did not appear that proceedings were instituted at law against any one of the persons mentioned in this return. He need hardly remark that, in a great number of cases, there would be likely to be persons in somewhat poor circumstances, and the Crown, in such a case, was always a most indulgent creditor. He thought he need hardly remind the Committee, and certainly not hon. gentlemen who were most familiar with business of this description, that it was not customary to compel the payment of costs by a debtor where no legal proceedings were instituted; that even a Division Court attorney would not be entitled to charge unless process had been commenced; and yet he found that the Minister of Justice of Canada had not thought it beneath him to exact—he thought he might almost say extort—from those unfortunate persons sums generally amounting to $2.50 in each case, aggregating to the amount of $545.25. He found appended to this return the following statement:—

“No sums of money were charged or received by the Deputy of the Minister of Justice or by any officer or clerk of the Department of Justice by way of costs on moneys overdue upon Ordnance Lands sold under authority, except officially; and the same were, together with the debts, collected, paid into the Bank of Montreal to the credit of the Attorney-General of Canada, who paid the debts collected to the Minister charged with the management of Ordnance Lands and retained the costs.”

It would appear from this that a prima facie case, certainly, was made out to this effect: In the first place, that there was improper exaction of these costs from the debtors to the Crown; and, in the next place, that, in answer to the circular sent from the Department of Justice, signed by the Deputy Minister of Justice in his departmental and official capacity, costs were collected and paid, not into the public Treasury, but into the pocket of the Minister of Justice of the day. He should like to know from the hon. gentleman at the head of the Department, and from the hon. member for South Bruce, whether, during their tenure of office or that of their immediate predecessors, they had thought it becoming, or honest, or decent to use the Department of Justice for the collection of small debts, and to exact costs which they were not entitled to exact under any circumstances, and, having exacted them, to put the money into their own pockets? The third subject to which he wished to call attention arose out of a return which he took the liberty of moving for last year. He had already called attention to the Deputy Minister of Justice acting in a two-fold capacity—advising the Crown on the one hand, and applicants for relief from the Crown on the other. The third case was that of the Minister of Justice employing himself—acting in the double capacity of principal and agent. It was no secret that the right hon. member for Kingston had been for many years head of the well-known firm of Macdonald & Patton, of Toronto. There could be no doubt, he presumed, as to the qualifications of that firm and their ability to discharge any legal duties imposed upon them. He did not mean to imply that the members of that establishment were not men who, in their independent capacity as counsel, would not do justice to any client, but it must certainly be laid down as a principle that a man could not act on the one hand as the representative of the Crown so as properly to supervise the action of those acting for him, and on the other as a legal agent responsible to the Government. He found that something like thirty-seven suits had been entrusted to this firm, the instructions, in a number of these, having been specially given, no doubt, to Mr. James Patton, one of the partners, the whole firm, however, being responsible, professionally. Let the House consider what was the effect of such an arrangement. In the first place, they all knew what large powers were necessarily vested in a counsel retained in any case. When the Crown retained the services of a learned gentleman or private individuals retained such services, the counsel was able, to a great extent, to control the interests of his clients. The very nature of a lawyer's vocation was such that we were compelled to trust him, almost implicitly, with any interests which we confided to his care. The old saying about a man who was his own lawyer having a fool for his client, was an illustration of the view taken of a legal gentleman's services. Now, however honourable this firm might have been, however assiduous, it was of immense importance that the Minister of Justice for Canada should know that they were doing their duty; he, as the chief legal adviser of the Government—not merely as a private individual—should be able to decide whether, under certain cir-circumstances, these gentlemen had, in their professional capacity, done that which was just and right. He should have the power, also, of supervising their costs; but the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Department of Justice at the time to which he referred was actually employing himself. He (Mr. Dymond) had no doubt the proceedings of the agents were always perfectly satisfactory to the principal, but the Crown had no guarantee, under these circumstances, that its interests were properly watched over and defended. So, again, with the question of costs. The Crown had no guarantee that the work was done at the lowest possible price; that, in satisfying this, that, or the other claim, full value was received—had no guarantee whether the person employed professionally in its behalf, was charging right or not. That, however, was a low view to take of the matter, and he would direct attention to the impropriety, the indecency of the head of a Department like the Minister of Justice, acting as the servant of the Crown; first, in an official, and then in an independent capacity. When they considered the character of the Civil Service, when they knew what a temptation there must be amongst a large number of those men to neglect their duties in order to add to their emoluments; when they reflected how important it was that the head of every Department should be able to exercise the utmost control and supervision over his staff, he asked whether there could have been anything more improper or indecent than such transactions as those to which he had called attention. He should like to know, from the hon. member at the head of the Department and his hon. friend from South Bruce, whether they approved of such proceedings, and whether they were permitted at the present day.

Mr. LAFLAMME, in answer to the question put by his hon. friend, said that, as far as his experience went, no such practice had been common in his Department.

Mr. BLAKE said that, on the occasion of his making arrangements for a new deputy, and when he proposed a slight increase in the salary, which had been fixed at a minimum rate, it came to his knowledge that certain prerequisites had been received by the former deputy. As he believed that to be a procedure calculated to be attended with public inconvenience, he arranged with the new officer that the practice should not be continued, and that he should not occupy any relations towards any individual or company involving the payment of any emolument; that his services should be entirely devoted to the Government, and that he should receive a salary therefor. From that time, he had no doubt the practice was discontinued and would not be resumed during his term of office. With reference to the second point mentioned by the hon. gentleman, the Ordnance fees, he might state that his attention was directed by another member to a complaint regarding an exaction of that description which was proposed to be made. Finding that the complaint was well grounded, he directed that the practice should be discontinued, being of opinion that the procedure was one which ought not to be adopted. Finding also that a small fund had already been collected before his attention was directed to the matter, he obtained an Order in Council whereby it was either remitted back to the various persons who had made payments or placed to their credit. As far as the employment of the Deputy Minister of Justice was concerned, in suits which were entered by the Crown, he might state that no such proceeding as that complained of had ever been sanctioned under his administration.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was glad this matter had been brought up at the present time, because it had been made the subject of discussion outside the House. He was obliged to the hon. gentleman for the warm interest he took in the Department of Justice, and the exceeding pleasure with which he had assumed, for the nonce, the guardianship of that Department. It was a great pity the hon. gentleman was not a member of the legal profession, for then he might do so more efficiently. First of all, the hon. gentleman had stated that the late Deputy Minister of Justice had been employed by parties other than the Crown in cases. No doubt that matter would have passed without observation had it not been that the late deputy happened to be his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) brother-in-law. Any stick would do to attack him; anything was deemed sufficient to divert the attention of the House and the country from subjects of more interest. Though Col. Bernard happened to be his brother-in-law, he was a good officer, and those who followed him (Sir John A. Macdonald) would bear witness to the fact that he had long experience and special skill in parliamentary work. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not see any objection to the present Deputy Minister of Justice, after performing his duties to the public, preparing a Bill for persons who asked him to do so in the exercise of his professional skill; and, if he was so employed, there was no reason why he should not be paid for his services. He could not see any indecency or impropriety in such an arrangement, and he had no doubt Mr. Wicksteed had drawn up many Bills for private persons in this way.

MR. DYMOND: He is not a Minister of the Crown.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he believed, though he could not say of his personal knowledge, that legal draftsmen in England prepared Bills in this way. Col. Bernard was one of the best parliamentary draftsmen in Canada, perhaps, with the exception of Mr. Wicksteed, the very best. People were anxious, therefore, to get his assistance, and, if so, no one had any right to interfere. The hon. member for North York objected to lawyers' letters being issued from the Attorney-General's office, and fees charged therefor, but it must be remembered that the Minister of Justice was not only Attorney-General for the Crown, but legal adviser and solicitor also for every Department. It was the duty of the Minister of Justice, as Attorney-General, to see to the prosecution of every claim, but he could do so either by himself or an agent, just as he pleased. In England, it was well known the salaries of

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Attorney-General or Solicitor-General formed but a small part of their income from their official position; they being paid for all litigious business. By an arrangement which had been made, the Solicitor-General was not paid for non-contentious business, but for all other he received fees. Then, as to the Ordnance Lands, the case was simply this: the people holding a large number of those lands had, for years, neglected to pay their rents, and all kinds of communications from the Department were found to be of no value whatever. The Department of Justice had nothing to do with these rents till they were sent for collection, and the Attorney-General was then forced to sue, either through a Crown agent or directly from his own office, and the Ordnance Office Commissioner thought it would have more effect if the notice that those rents in arrear were to be collected was sent from the Attorney-General's office instead of from a private one. On receiving these notices, the persons in arrear, knowing that they would be forced to pay, sent the money along with the fees, which were ordinary legal charges. The parties suffered nothing thereby, and he maintained that it was the most judicious course to take. But the hon. gentleman said these fees should be paid into the Treasury. How could they? They were lawyers' fees which must be paid to the lawyer to commence the prosecution. It was in the discretion of the Attorney-General to decide as to whether such matters of contention should be proceeded with by himself or his agent, and no one had a right to interfere with him. Before his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) time, the Attorneys-General of Upper and Lower Canada conducted business of that sort, and when he became Attorney-General he did a deal of business in his own office. Not until 1867, when the Dominion became widely extended by the taking in of four Provinces, did he give up such practice; but, believing then that it would be inexpedient that all proceedings should be conducted in Ottawa, he introduced the system by which agents were established in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario, and Quebec. Other Attorneys-General conducted the largest portion of their business themselves, and did it in many respects more satisfactorily than through agents, because they could exercise more immediate supervision. An allowance was made to Colonel Bernard by the Indian Department, and he would tell the House how that arose. That Department had a large fund, and the Attorney-General, Mr. Baldwin, as well as his successors, Mr. Richards and Mr. John Ross, charged for all the business they transacted for it. Having a large fund, there was no reason, of course, why the Attorney-General should do the legal work of the Department for nothing. While Attorney-General himself, he would not bother himself with that kind of business, and it was arranged that such matters should be sent to an agent. That was long before Colonel Bernard had the misfortune of being his brother-in-law—before he (Sir John A. Macdonald) married his sister—and, had it not been for this circumstance, these remarks would not have been made. Subsequently, it was arranged that, as he would not consent to become their counsel, and as Colonel Bernard understood the subject thoroughly, he should undertake the duty. Such was the proposal made by the Commissioner of Public Works, and, if the record was referred to, it would be found that a very small salary was paid for the performance of such very responsible duties; all that Colonel Bernard got being $500 instead of the costs.

An Hon. MEMBER: $400.

STR. JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes, I believe it was only $400. Then, with respect to the firm of Macdonald and Patton, he (Sir John) had a perfect right to conduct that business in his office at Ottawa, and he believed the business had been conducted thoroughly and well by that firm. Indeed, as Attorney-General, he would not have had any hesitation in conducting the whole business in his office, if he thought proper. The Statute imposed the duty on him, and there was no reason why, like the Attorney or Solicitor-General in England, he should not receive the emolument. He surrendered a lot of it partly from carelessness, partly because he was not very mercenary, and partly because his duties had increased to such an extent that he preferred doing the work by agents. But the hon. gentleman had said that it was his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) duty to see that the costs were taxed, and that the firm of Macdonald & Patton did not charge too much. Now, all the bills were taxed by the officer of the Court, and not a single sixpence was paid except by his order. Still further, the hon. gentleman in the exercise of his duties as an independent member of Parliament, not prompted by any outside influence, but believing it to be his peculiar duty, from his antecedents and status, from understanding these things better than anybody else, to do so—took the matter up for the purpose of attacking his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) seat in the House. He seemed to think that he had no right to a seat because it happened that, on the 6th or 7th November, 1873, some of these suits entrusted to him still lingered, and that he received a few hundred dollars after he had ceased to be Minister of Justice and Attorney-General. He would tell the House, however, that, immediately after he resigned, another Minister of Justice was appointed. At that time, there were in his office two or three suits of considerable importance, and in some degree complicated, and the managing man in his office, Mr Fleming, who knew all about these cases, from beginning to end, could conduct them more satisfactorily than Mr. Bethune himself could; therefore, they were left in his hands. This was the sole reason why the whole matter was not transferred in November, 1873. He thought the hon. gentleman was taking a very useful, but rather inglorious position with regard to this matter. Did he want to have recorded upon his tombstone that he was the gentleman who pointed out these facts? Soon after that, the salaries were increased; but his hon. friend (Mr. Blake) had stated that he thought it inexpedient that the Deputy Minister of Justice should be employed in a Department or anything else.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the increase was in lieu of every other business and employment, and the Deputy Minister was prevented from doing anything else. But there was no such restriction in his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) time. He gave him full permission to employ his talents for any person. If Mr. Bernard was required to draft a Bill, he would do it well; and, if he could increase his income by that means, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had no objection to it.

MR. DYMOND said the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) had admitted the truth of the charges against him; in the first place, by confessing to and justifying acts which he (Mr. Dymond) ventured to say every hon. member in that House, in his individual capacity, knew to be wrong and contrary to the public interest. That a gentleman, not a mere clerk, but a Minister of the Crown, the Deputy Minister of Justice, should be entitled to advise the Crown on the one hand, and persons seeking relief at the hands of the Crown on the other, was an anomaly which ought not, under any circumstances, to be tolerated. He (Mr. Dymond) was justified in the course he had taken after the admission of the hon. gentleman that it was not done in one case only, but in many cases, and after the right hon. gentleman's attempt to justify, as a right and proper thing, an officer, after having advised the Crown, turning round and advising the Crown's opponents. That was the right hon. gentleman's view of the matter. But would any lawyer, after taking a fee and giving advice to one party to a suit, think it at all proper, through himself or his partner, to advise his client's opponent? The hon. gentleman considered that was all right, and justified that position. The right hon. gentleman accused him (Mr. Dymond) of bringing up this matter because the late Deputy Minister of Justice was his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) brother-in-law. It rested with the hon. gentleman to drag before the House his family relationships and connections. He (Mr. Dymond) did not know or care whether Mr. Bernard was brother-in-law, father-in-law, or first cousin to the hon. gentleman, but he was not to be brow-beaten into silence by any such tactics as those the right hon. gentleman resorted to. The right hon. gentleman termed him an inquisitor. In future, he presumed, when a report was brought down to this House, or when an hon. member moved for papers, he must not, in the light of day, expose a wrong, he must not attack a Minister who had done wrong, without being insulted or being called an inquisitor. He hoped there were at least 205 inquisitors in this House ready to expose wrong-doing, when they found wrong-doing had to be exposed, by whomsoever committed. With regard to the Ordnance Lands arrears, the right hon. gentleman said he might have employed an agent. He (Mr. Dymond) asked whether an attorney could recover $2.50 for writing a letter demanding payment of a debt. In the case in point, no suits were instituted, but these persons came and paid the money, and the right hon. gentleman put the costs into his own pocket. But the right hon. gentleman now said these exactions were not paid as costs. What were they then? The hon. gentleman put $545 in his own pocket, collected by the Deputy Minister of Justice, or by the clerk to that Department, and now he said these moneys were not law costs, but penalties. Well, when penalties were inflicted, there was some means of conveying them into the public Treasury. He fancied that the Receiver-General or Finance Minister would always find some account to which he could carry them. He did not think there would be any difficulty in finding a small corner in the public Treasury into which that $545 might be slipped. The right hon. gentleman claimed that, when these people did not pay up their rents, he was entitled to fine them $2.50 each, and he did fine them. But, when a magistrate or a judge inflicted a fine he did not put the money into his own pocket. What would be said of him if he did? Why, that he had committed a flagrant act of dishonesty. It was not less improper for an officer of a public Department to appropriate such moneys; and whether he (Mr. Dymond) was called an inquisitor or not, or charged with personal feeling or not, he could not shut his eyes or allow his mouth to be closed when such irregularities were discovered. He could not be charged with personal feeling against the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), for there was no one in the House with whom he must of necessity be on better terms, for he was a gentleman about whom, in a personal capacity, he (Mr. Dymond) knew nothing at all. To him, the right hon. gentleman was a mere figure on the parliamentary stage, a politician of the day, and the leader of a party in that House. He (Mr. Dymond) should always pay the right hon. gentleman the respect due to him on the floor of Parliament; beyond that, he could have no feeling concerning him, no knowledge of him whatsoever. Now, with regard to what had been the practice in old Canada as regarded the Crown law business, he knew nothing. But he knew the hon. gentleman, when appointed Minister of Justice and Attorney-General, was paid to devote his whole time and attention to his office; was it then to be understood that the Minister of Justice of Canada was to be earning fees as law agent of the Crown outside his office, employing himself in fact as a Crown counsel or attorney; that he was to unite the functions of principal and agent in one and the same person? No; and, if he (Mr. Dymond) were to go into this matter, he could, he believed, show that the hon. gentlemen himself was not altogether unconscious of the indecency of his proceedings. If, at that moment, it was found that his hon. friend the member for South Bruce, when Minister of Justice, or the hon. gentleman who now filled that position, was actually employing his own firm as legal agent of the Crown, a cry of indignation would go through the whole Conservative ranks from Dan to Beersheba. He (Mr. Dymond) had discharged his duty, as he always should do, without any personal feeling towards the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald), without saying one word discourteous to him in his private personal capacity, but he would never be brow-beaten into silence.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that, if he were allowed to go on further, he would show I was not unconscious of the impropriety of my conduct. I challenge him to do so; will he be good enough to go on?

Several HON. MEMBERS: Go on.

MR. BLAKE said the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) no doubt had forgotten the explanation which he (Mr. Blake) made on the vote being taken for the appointment of a successor to Mr. Bernard. He then distinctly intimated that, independent of the sum laid down by Statute, it was proposed to add $400. He also intimated that that was not the total amount of emoluments which were received by his predecessor, and which he would receive, inasmuch as there had been for a great many years an allowance of $400 to the Deputy Minister of Justice as solicitor for Indian Affairs, and it was arranged that that allowance should be continued. So, although he (Mr. Blake) personally had an objection to salaries being distributed under several heads, and it was much more convenient for the total amount of an officer's salary to be in one estimate under one head, he did not see any reason beyond this to discontinue that allowance. He thought he was discharging his duty to the House and to the country when he explained the nature of his arrangement. The salary was $4,000, with the sum of $400 additional, which his predecessor had received under another head, and the $400 additional which he asked the House to assent to. He was not going further into this discussion, with the exception of one matter which it seemed to him essential, in the public interest, to refer to. He did not know what the salary of the Attorney-General of Canada was in the old, old days; the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General of England were now paid by public arrangement in two ways. They were paid by salaries—he believed it was £7,000 to the Attorney-General and £6,000 to the Solicitor-General—and besides that, they were to receive emoluments in such contentious business as they discharged. Therefore, the salary of these officers was known to be derived from those two sources: a fixed salary, and fees, according to a regulated tariff, for the contentious business in which they might be engaged. It had not been known to the general public that, since the establishment of salaries equivalent to the fees and other moneys received by the Attorney-General, officers received further emoluments for other work, and in his own experience the amount of litigation with which the Attorney-General was concerned, particularly since the establishment of the North-West Act, had much increased. The number of suits the hon. gentleman had engaged in, in the considerable number of years to which that return referred, was very small; it was only some 37 or 40 suits, some of which were of a trifling character compared with the suits proceeding in these latter days, and the emoluments of the Attorney-General, under the old system, would now amount to a considerable sum, particularly if they included fees for the litigation that took place in the Exchequer Court. The hon. gentleman had remarked upon the position of the Minister of Justice or Attorney-General. His (Mr. Blake's) opinion was that the position of that official was to advise the Government in non-contentious business, and that with contentious business he had better not meddle. He thought that the Minister of Justice should not be placed in such a position as to be called upon to do work of other than a non-contentious character; but that he should advise the Government in non-contentious matters, and be compensated by salary. He believed that all in the Department, no matter whether law officers or others, were compensated in full by the salaries now given, those in which the salaries were not stated under the Statutes being fully compensated by other means. The hon. gentleman said the Attorney-General was entitled to argue in the Courts. No doubt, in his capacity as a member of the Bar of Ontario; but as the Attorney-General he had no standing there. He apprehended that, if the Attorney-General happened to be a member of the Bar of Quebec, his personal standing in the Courts of Ontario or any other Province would be the standing of a litigant; he would appear in his personal capacity as an Attorney-General, but not as a barrister at all. He was not a barrister ex hypothesi. So, if they carried out the proposition of the hon. gentleman, the Attorney-General could not appear as a member of the Bar, and, if he appeared in his personal capacity, he would not be entitled to charge fees. The contentious business which now, and probably for several years, would belong to that office would inconvenience him to a large amount. But there was not the slightest doubt that the whole of his services were to be devoted to the Crown, and that he was in no way concerned with receiving other emoluments than those which belonged to his salary, paid under the liberal or illiberal provisions of the law.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had nothing to complain of in the view taken by the hon. member for South Bruce, and was not sure that he differed very much from him. When the hon. gentleman said he was not at all aware that such practice of receiving fees had been followed, he was surprised, because that practice had been very much discontinued by Sir George Cartier and himself (Sir John A. Macdonald) in their disregard for personal pecuniary affairs. They did not do as their predecessors had done: make the public business the main portion of their income. If he would refer to the gentleman at the head of the Government, he would learn that the whole principle was laid down many years ago, that the salaries of the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General was and should be upon a par with those of the other public officials, because before then the salary of the Attorney-General was small, and that of the Solicitor-General still less; but each had a large practice. The Government then placed Mr. Baldwin's salary on a par with the other public officers, but still it was recognized, in the case of Mr. Baldwin, that he should be allowed to do other work, and subsequently in the case of Mr. Draper. It was the rule also with regard to the Attorney-General until his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) time, and until the time of Sir George E.

Cartier, that he conducted all the public business in the Provinces, and by an Order in Council the Attorney-General was only allowed to charge disbursements if the Crown succeeded in getting a judgment; if the Crown did succeed, he collected the costs and put them into his own pocket. That was an Order in Council obtained in 1867, under the old Province of Canada, after he gave up his business to the present Chief Justice Haliburton, who had his share of the fees as Attorney-General; but afterwards these fees were not collected. It was simply because Sir George E. Cartier and himself had been regardless of the financial part of the business that the ordinary practice did not go on until this moment,—simply because they chose to give up what were certainly the emoluments of their office, and what his predecessors up to 1867 had considered fair and just to receive as part of the emoluments of their office, namely, the proceeds of Crown suits, the only limitation being that of an Order in Council that, when Crown cases did not succeed, only disbursements should be charged. It was quite true, as the hon. member for South Bruce had said, that, except in Ontario, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had to prosecute by agents where he could not prosecute himself. The consequence was that, in the other Provinces, he employed an agent, and he had a perfect right to act himself, individually, or to employ his own partner or agent. Whether the measure introduced by the Government would alter that practice or not, he did not know. He believed that the practice and the whole system in the office of the Minister of Justice could be greatly improved, and he believed the hon. member for South Bruce and himself, being both ex-Ministers of Justice, could apply themselves impartially to the consideration of the measure of the Government, and to make the Department of Justice efficient and sufficient for the growing wants and necessities of the Dominion.

Mr. DYMOND said he would only refer to the return to show how it seemed to him that the right hon. member for Kingston had, at a certain period at all events, a consciousness of danger, if not of sin. From 1869 to the historical period of June, 1873, the firm of Macdonald & Patton were instructed in all the suits mentioned. In June and July, 1873, events were pending which induced the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald), in this, as in some other matters, to set his house in order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Explain the other matters.

MR. DYMOND said he need hardly refer to what took place in regard to certain Secret Service receipts which, just at that period, the hon. gentleman thought fit to prevent falling into other hands. About this time they knew that proceedings had been taken which ultimately terminated in the hon. gentleman's resignation. The handwriting had appeared on the wall, and then a change was made in the arrangements, and, instead of Macdonald & Patton, the Government were to give instruction to Mr. Patton only, and, instead of the right hon. gentleman instructing himself and partner, he instructed his partner alone. This was the ground of his (Mr. Dymond's) suggestion that there seemed to be in the mind of the right hon. gentleman a consciousness that he had not acted in a manner which was perfectly justifiable.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that was a slender ground on which to make that charge that he had betrayed some signs of conscious guilt or sin. Everybody knew that Mr. Patton was his partner and that he (Sir John A. Macdonald) was personally responsible and interested in everything done by the firm. The thing was too absurd.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he thought the discussion which had taken place on the remarks made by the hon. member for North York showed the inconvenience of entrusting that matter to that hon. member to bring up. He had made statements which would certainly never have been made if the hon. member for South Bruce, or the Minister of Justice, or some other legal gentleman had the matter in charge. The hon. member for North York had stated that the right hon. member for Kingston had admitted the principle that the Minister of Justice or his deputy could advise both parties, the Crown and the party antagonistic to it. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) never heard the right hon. member for Kingston make any such admission. If the hon. member for North York had been a professional man, he would have known that there were some principles of honour and etiquette among the profession which prevented them from advising both parties, and he looked to the hon. member for South Bruce to say whether he thought the right hon. member for Kingston or Colonel Bernard would have done such a thing as that. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) did not believe they would.

MR. BLAKE said that the Northern Railway Bill of 1868 was a Bill directly affecting the revenues of this country, to the prejudice of the Crown. That Bill had been revised by the Minister of Justice.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Certainly it had been revised. There was nothing in it antagonistic to the Crown; it had been prepared so that the Crown would not suffer. The hon. member for North York had made a great hullabaloo about the $545; no lawyer, he stated, would have charged $2.50 to those people. Had the hon. member been a professional man, he would have known that the legal tariff, settled by the Judges of the Courts of the Province of Ontario, laid down as a proper charge for instructions $2, and for writing a letter 50c. He was certain the hon. member for South Bruce had put into his pockets many a $1.50 for doing nothing more. He had written a great many letters for which he had received those charges. If not, he had been a most extraordinary lawyer. The hon. member for North York had expressed his utter indignation, his abhorrence of the fact, that a Minister of the Crown, who was paid to give his whole time to the country, should have practised in the Courts.

MR. DYMOND: No.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: The hon. member had stated it a few minutes ago. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) remembered a Minister who practised in the law Courts, and who did not give up his whole time to his country. He referred to the hon. member for South Bruce. He would not enter into the question as to whether the practice was right or wrong; it was one which would involve a good deal of discussion. But it showed that the hon. member for South Bruce did not feel in his own heart that it was abhorrent to every principle of justice and right. They were accustomed, in this House, to look upon the hon. member for South Bruce as embodying a great many of those principles of rectitude, honour and justice, which should be implanted in the young men of this country; and he did not see why the right hon. member for Kingston or his Deputy Minister should be blamed for having followed the same course as the hon. member for South Bruce. An attack had also been made upon Colonel Bernard with reference to the same practice. Colonel Bernard only received $2,600 of salary, until the last few years of his service, when he received $3,200, in addition to which he got those few cases, wherein he received some fees, as a legal draftsman. The hon. member for South Bruce had found it was impossible, when reorganizing the Department, to get a professional man with the requisite experience and ability which Colonel Bernard possessed to a high degree, for the salary alone, prohibiting this private professional practice. He, therefore, paid the new Deputy Minister of Justice a salary of $4,000. This was quite right, but the country lost the difference. He did not begrudge the salary to the Deputy Minister; he thought the hon. member for South Bruce had adopted the proper course. But, while the late Deputy Minister of Justice had a smaller salary, he was permitted to practice, provided he did so in the interests of the Crown, and he was satisfied, from his knowledge of Colonel Bernard's character, given him by the hon. member for South Bruce, and also by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, that he had never exercised that permission in an improper manner, or one adverse to the interests of the country. Before closing his remarks, he would ask the hon. member for South Bruce for some information about these Estimates for this Department of Justice. His hon. friend had quoted from a book, not a Blue-book, which contained a very able speech made by the hon. member for South Bruce, which, he might remark, was in marked contrast with the others in this book. It was a speech which could be read with interest by any person in this country, whether he agreed with the arguments and conclusions, or not. It could be read as a fair speech of a public man, without that feeling of shame which came over one when he read the language used in some of the other speeches. He would, at present, only call the attention of the hon. member for South Bruce to a portion of that speech which referred to the very item under discussion. The hon. member said that when he left office in June last, the amount of salaries was only $10,750. Now he (Mr. Kirkpatrick) found a discrepancy in this statement, only a small one it was true; still, it should have been as correct as possible. On turning to the Public Accounts, he found the salaries in that Department amounted to $18,724; whereas the hon. member for South Bruce had stated, he had made a reduction of $7,250, the total amount being only $10,750.

MR. BLAKE: That is excluding the salary of the Minister, which the hon. gentleman knows is included in the amount he has quoted.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: The hon. member was contrasting the salaries which were paid under the régime of the former Minister of Justice and under his.

MR. BLAKE: In which I excluded the Minister's salary.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: The hon. gentleman should have included those salaries, because, in the time of the hon. member for Kingston, the salary was $5,000, whereas the present Minister drew $7,000. Still, deducting $7,000 from the amount paid last year of $18,724.45, it left $11,724.45, a mistake, at any rate, of one thousand dollars in the hon. member's statement that the amount was only $10,150; still, there was no mistake. These were points which required explanation. In the Estimates before the Chair, the Department of Justice called for $11,700 for 1878-9; last year they voted $11,600; the previous year $10,750.

MR. BLAKE said he had not stated in the speech to which reference had been made that the total expenditure for the fiscal year which then ended was $10,750. He had said that, when he left office in June, the rate of charge at that time was $10,750. If the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) submitted a motion for a statement of the amount actually paid for each month, it would be brought down; and it would appear that the amount paid last June, when he (Mr. Blake) had reduced the expenditure to the lowest possible point, was at the rate he had stated. It was scarcely worthy of that hon. member to have stated that the Public Accounts showed an expenditure of $18,000, when he was well aware that the Minister's salary must be excluded in each case to make a proper comparison. He observed that the expenditure in that Department had increased somewhat since he left office, and, if any explanation were required, the hon. the Minister of Justice should have been called upon to afford it. Having answered those enquiries of the hon. member for Frontenac, he (Mr. Blake) desired to say that, for his own part, he was glad, although for other reasons he was not gratified, that the hon. gentleman had given him an opportunity of saying that Colonel Bernard, who had been a friend of his for many years was incapable of knowingly doing wrong to any one. He thought a great error was committed, but the Minister of Justice might fairly be held responsible for that error.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Certainly.

MR. BLAKE said he did not think the hon. gentleman could have placed any man in the position of allowing him to draft a Bill like that of the Northern Railway Bill of 1868, which affected the interests of the country to the extent of $100,000, and which required the advice of the law officers of the Crown as to its effect. But he would couple that statement with a reiteration of his firm conviction that Col. Bernard would never knowingly do wrong. Nevertheless, he thought the position was indefensible that the Minister or Deputy Minister, with the important functions he had to discharge as adviser of the Crown, should be in such a position that a private company should be able to retain his services to prepare a Bill which would have the effect on the revenues of the country which the Northern Railway Bill had. When he accepted the office of Minister of Justice, he was in the midst of a large practice, and for a short time he endeavoured to discharge the engagements undertaken before his appointment. It was true, moreover, that, while he was occupied in discharging those engagements, he did not refuse to take other business that happened to come in his way, in the particular circuit he was on, instead of sitting idly at the bar; but he found that the office of Minister of Justice would over-tax the humble abilities that he possessed, and he determined at the earliest possible moment to get quit of those engagements, many of which he gave up, and those he could not give up he pushed through as rapidly as possible. From that time until he quitted office, he never appeared in Court, and he did not think he had expended two hours in the discharge of any other duty besides that pertaining to his office. But he wished to say, because it was very important that it should be said, and he was sure the hon. member for Kingston would concur in the statement—indeed, the interests of the country required his concurrence therein—that, while, no doubt, the primary and paramount duty of a Minister, whatever office he had to discharge, was to perform the duty of that office to the exclusion of all other engagements; yet, if there was to be any such reorganization of the Department of Justice as was foreshadowed, it would be found extremely difficult to secure the highest legal talent if the doctrine propounded was to be carried out. It would be found extremely difficult to procure a Minister of Justice and an Attorney-General such as there ought to be at the service of the Crown if the rule was laid down that these gentlemen were absolutely to abandon their private practice. A man spent fifteen or twenty years of his life in acquiring a practice and connection. The law was a jealous profession, one which was much more easily forgotten than acquired, and, if they were to lay it down as a rule that it was contrary to etiquette, contrary to his duty to the Crown, contrary to his relations to the Judges, that a Minister of Justice should appear in the Courts, they would practically say to a man who, as he had said, had spent fifteen or twenty years acquiring a practice: "The price of your accepting the office of law adviser of the Crown is that you give up that practice." Once lost it could not be got back again in a hurry. Once gone it might never return, for there were always fresh aspirants ready to fill the place once vacated. He recollected having had a conversation with the right hon. member for Kingston when he (Mr. Blake) was engaged in Court practice after he was appointed Minister of Justice, and that hon. gentleman had said he was rejoiced to see him there, and that one great mistake he had made in his political life was that he had abandoned his law practice when he had taken office. He agreed with the right hon. gentleman in that opinion. He (Mr. Blake) had not said a word on this subject while he was holding the office of Minister of Justice, as it might have been said that he was speaking in his own personal interest. But now that he did not occupy that position, and after he had been subjected to a good deal of abuse, he thought he was entitled to say in the interest of the public that the cases were rare in which the first legal talent could be given to the Crown if it was laid down as a rule that it was inconsistent or indecorous to practice in the Courts. There was one small point to which he wished to refer in regard to the present discussion. He might be mistaken, but he did not think the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) was correct in stating that according to the law it was possible for an attorney to collect any sum for notice and instructions unless processes were issued.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he did not wish to lie under the imputation of having made an unfair statement. He was about to say that he presumed that $7,000, the Minister's salary, should be deducted from the amount.

MR. PALMER said he wished distinctly to understand whether it was the opinion of the hon. gentleman for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) that the Attorney-General of the Dominion had no right to appear in Court to receive the fees as Attorney-General. This country occupied an anomalous position as we were endeavouring to carry out the British Constitution under a Federation. Until he heard the remarks of the hon. member for South Bruce, he was under the impression that the Attorney-General of the Dominion was the appointee or officer of the Crown authorized to act in the Courts with regard to objects of Federal character; and that the Attorney-General in each of the Provinces was entitled to act in the same manner with respect to Provincial matters. If such were the hon. member's opinion, what course would be adopted, if to-morrow a nuisance were committed, in respect to navigation on any river in the Dominion, and it became necessary for the Attorney-General to appear in Court for the purpose of taking the ordinary proceedings, by which that nuisance could be abated. In his Province, he knew well that, from its earliest history, the Attorney-General was authorized to receive a certain amount of fees, just the same as another practitioner, with one-fourth more added; and these applied to those public prosecutions of a quasi-private character, if he might use the expression, where the rights of the Crown were concerned. The result was that the Attorney-General was paid by this scale of fees. Considered as a question of policy, of course, it was debatable whether it required the alteration his hon. friend (Mr. Dymond) had mentioned. Very likely this was the case; but his hon. friend from North York must understand that previous to that time, the Attorney-General in his Province would, of course, have never accepted the position if nothing save the salary was attached to the office; and, not only did the Attorney-General get the salary and fees he had described, but he also could practice, if he chose, in the Courts, and wherever he chose; and, whenever he went on circuit, if a man was employed, he was the man who got the fees as counsel. He did not know how it was in the other Provinces; but it was the law in New Brunswick, that whenever a man consulted an attorney—and he presumed that, if he consulted the attorney of the Crown, the same rule applied—and gave instructions to take proceedings, the attorney was entitled to fees, which in their highest Court were $4.60.

MR. DYMOND: Is that fee recoverable from the person to whom application is made, or must it be paid by the client, if no process is issued.

MR. PALMER said he was sure that this very thing had led to all the trouble. They would see that, no matter whether the suit was pressed or not, they could not collect against the man sued, but against the man who employed counsel, until judgment was obtained; and, if the suit was settled, it was the universal practice for the person who paid the claim to pay the costs, though not because he was legally liable to pay the costs. This was not the case until judgment was given. He did not know what the rule was in the other Provinces, but, in New Brunswick, they could recover for the instruction and letter, and, before the suit was closed, they could exact fees for the services performed according to the terms of ordinance, but nothing more. It was an entire mistake to suppose that there was the slightest difference. His hon. friend would readily recognize what was to be done. Suppose Mr. Tuck in his Province was employed as the agent, and that the man concerned came to settle, after instructions from the Department to take proceedings were given, and the letter was written; then, if the matter came within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, the charge would be $4.60 on every suit, and the man would either have to pay or else the suit would go on and judgment be given against him. This would be the result. If he rightly understood his hon. friend, the Deputy Minister of Justice was allowed at that time about £600. He would not say a single word with reference to the new arrangement made by the hon. member for South Bruce as to whether it was correct or not. He was inclined to think that it was correct, and better than the system of the old Government; but what he wanted to be thoroughly understood by the country was this: that the latter system had been continued, he believed, in England up to the present time. At all events, this was the case as far as his experience went; and this system cost the country some $1,400 less than the system which had been more recently introduced. Therefore, it was entirely a debateable point whether the Attorney-General should have the fees, because he presumed it was put on this ground that ordinarily somebody was employed to do the work, as the ordinary business of the State took up the time of the Attorney-General. In England, they all knew that a variety of people were employed, and no doubt were paid, in this way. There was no pretence of any impropriety having been committed in what his hon. friend from North York had said. He now referred to fees and not at all to the drawing up of Bills by Col. Bernard, which, of course, was an entirely different thing. It was simply a question whether it was morally right for the Attorney-General in this country, who carried on the legal business and undertook the prosecutions which his office required, and respecting which the law fixed a certain amount of fees, to take those fees. If his hon. friend was a member of the legal profession, he was sure he (Mr. Dymond) would never have asserted that it was a great impropriety for a man, merely because a suit was brought, and not pressed to judgment, to accept fees. If the hon. gentleman instructed him, to-morrow, to sue somebody, and he (Mr. Palmer) wrote a letter, and the person sued came and paid, not only the amount claimed, but the fee exacted under such circumstances, would the hon. gentleman say he did wrong in accepting it? If this was not done, the consequences would be that the hon. gentleman would have to pay this fee himself. And, if the fee was not paid, it would be the last time he would write a letter to such a person; the writ would go first, and it was thoroughly understood that the writing of that letter involved the client in the payment of the fee for it. He thought that, in so accepting a fee, he could hardly be charged with doing so with anything but a proper motive. If he understood the hon. member for South Bruce right, all this was to be changed and a set of officers were to be employed; and he understood the hon. member for North York to say that, if, in these matters, he (Mr. Dymond) employed some other person, the latter could not charge the fees. Surely the hon. gentleman must be wrong.

MR. DYMOND: I said it is not customary that a lawyer should compel a person to pay costs in a matter where no process is issued. We all have abundant experience, when estates are being wound up, in our private capacity, of application for money, to which is appended a request for the payment of $1 "for this letter"; but if you send the money the dollar is never exacted. The hon. gentleman says that, assuming that the person refuses to pay the dollar, he would issue a writ; but I say that to issue a writ without previous application by letter is what no respectable lawyer is in the habit of doing, except in extraordinary cases.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman is quite correct. No lawyer, save under special instructions, would issue a writ without previous notice; but, if previous notice is given, that notice is charged for.

MR. DYMOND: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am an old practitioner of forty years' standing, and it is always charged. My hon. friend the member for South Bruce said he did not know that the charge was made unless process was issued; but it is always charged.

MR. BLAKE: I know that it can not be recovered against the adverse party unless process is issued.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The notice is always charged for, and the charge is always collected; that is my experience; and I think I can place my experience against that of my hon. friend.

MR. PALMER said he was very glad that the hon. member for North York had made that statement. He did not personally know how it was in Ontario, but he would unhesitatingly say that this charge was invariably made in New Brunswick. He had had an experience of thirty years in this regard. He quite agreed with the hon. member for South Bruce that this charge could not be recovered under the circumstances mentioned. The claim could only be recovered after judgment; but this was probably an expense which the man who caused the litigation ought to pay. A man might not pay for the instruction given and the letter sent; and the result of this would be that the charge would fall on the prosecutor. He apprehended that it would be dishonourable not to make the payment. No obligation to send such a letter existed; it was simply a matter of honour to do it; but no honourable man would do anything else. If the client had to pay it, the result would be that no letter would be sent. The point was whether this was not the universal practice, and whether it was dishonourable to take such payment. The fee mentioned might be wrong or otherwise; but in his Province it would be $4.60.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The charge for the instructions and the letter is ten shillings.

MR. PALMER said that, in his Province, it was $1 for the letter and $3.60 for the instructions. He had nothing to say against the change of practice proposed; if it was the intention of the member for North York to attack the right hon. member for Kingston in this relation, never had any attack so utterly failed.

MR. MACDONNELL said he did not know whether hon. members had been treating this matter with references to the charges that prevailed in Ontario or Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Quebec or any other Province. In Ontario, he understood that 50c.

was charged for a letter, while in Nova Scotia the charge was $1. If so, he thought it was impossible to decide the question; and he considered, moreover, that it had taken up a great deal more time than it was entitled to do.

MR. BOWELL said he wanted to ask whether the principle advocated when hon. gentleman opposite were in Opposition, of not permitting departmental employes to be engaged in any other business or to be paid for extra employment was being carried out? His reason for doing so was that the general principle had been discussed as to the propriety or impropriety of Ministers or any one employed in any Department being paid extra when their time and services should be given exclusively to the Crown.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that, in certain special cases, extra pay was allowed when men were worked over their ordinary hours, but no officer was allowed to carry on any other business, except in the case of some officers of Customs whose salaries were below a certain figure mentioned in the Statute.

MR. BOWELL said this did not meet the case he put. He understood that many of the Clerks in the Departments, and, perhaps in none more than in the Finance Department, where it might be necessary to get up work that was behindhand, were sometimes employed after regular hours; he understood that this had been and was still the practice; and they were paid extra for extra services. He found no fault with this, but take the case of a clerk or Deputy Minister, who received a certain salary, and was sent away from his Department upon any business, and was occupied on it for days or weeks; whatever the time might be, was such a person paid for it extra? He could understand that his ordinary expenses should be paid in addition to his salary.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he did not think other payment was made except in very rare and exceptional cases, such for instance as when the services of some officers of the Department were required at Halifax, under the Fisheries Commission. In that case he believed some special douceur was given to two or three officers from the several Departments, that being looked upon as a very important special service, for which some special recognition might properly be given. That, however, was not paid out of the ordinary funds, but was charged against the special vote for the Fisheries Commission. That, he believed, was the only case in which this had occurred.

MR. MITCHELL said he thought his hon. friend was not quite accurate in the statement he made, and he would mention a circumstance which might lead him to utter it. He believed he would find that in certain periods of the year there were special services for clerks charged, and probably that was the case in his own Department.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: For extra work?

MR. MITCHELL: Yes.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: That is not the point in question.

MR. MITCHELL: What is the point in question then?

MR. BOWELL said he knew the question was discussed some years ago, and the principle was laid down by some resolution, if he remembered aright. He found that in the Inland Revenue Department the Assistant Commissioner, Mr. Miall, received a salary of $2,400 per annum, and in miscellaneous accounts he found that that gentlemen was paid for the time during which he was occupied in connection with the Northern Railway Investigation. Clearly, if the principle was good in one place it ought to be good in another; and, if his time was given in connection with the investigation of the Northern Railway accounts, it must have been taken from the Department of which he was the Assistant Commissioner, and some one else must have done his work, or it must have been left undone or caught up afterwards. The payment could not possibly have been for expenses from here to Toronto. The principle was involved in that one transaction, and he (Mr. Bowell) was not prepared to say how many other cases there were of the same character.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said one or two cases had occurred in which this had been done; but they were very rare, and had only occurred when special services had been rendered requiring special knowledge and diligence.

• SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, when they had an employé, he was supposed to be at the service of the Government. The principle had been to avoid extra allowances as much as possible. The whole time of every officer in the public service was due to the Government; and, in the case cited by his hon. friend, Mr. Bowell, if the gentleman had been employed de die in diem, in any special commission, he was not employed in his ordinary department, and was therefore only doing duty during office hours, and should get no extra allowance for that.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he thought the point was fairly well taken. He thought that, in England—he spoke under correction—when an officer was sent away from his ordinary residence, at the conclusion of his services, some moderate allowance was made for the inconvenience to which he was put; and, unless his memory was at fault, that course had been acted upon on various occasions when special services were required. He only recollected three or four instances in which officers had been sent on similar errands. He agreed with the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) and the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) that very considerable care must be taken that no abuse sprang from that. At the same time, if they wanted to detach a man for a special service, they inflicted upon him an amount of inconvenience, and frequently an amount of extra expense, which could not fairly be charged for; and it was on this ground that extra allowance was made. He remembered no cases, except those of the Fisheries Commission and Mr. Miall.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he thought both Mr. Miall and Mr. Whitcher were deserving officers, and had no doubt been properly detailed for these duties. He had no doubt that Mr. Whitcher was, of all others, the best suited to discharge that service, and he might fairly get an allowance, and so, perhaps, might Mr. Miall. He was quite satisfied with the statement of Minister of Finance, that this matter should be carefully guarded, and should only take place in exceptional cases, and, perhaps, these were exceptional.

MR. MITCHELL said it was well to know if this was to be a precedent. He was not opposed to a reasonable allowance being made to officers who had performed extraordinary services such as those referred to in the Halifax Commission and the case of Mr. Miall in the examination in Toronto, or in similar cases which called for extraordinary talent and ability. He wished, however, to know if the principle of extra payments was to be adopted. He was sure that, if it had been practised by the Administration which preceded the present one, it would have been made the subject of attack by his hon. friends opposite, and probably a vote of censure would have been passed on the late Government for establishing a principle of that kind. One would suppose that this economical Administration would avoid leaving themselves open to such an attack. He did not complain, because he did not belong to that economical Administration. As to Mr. Whitcher, during the Washington Treaty negotiation, he had spent two or three months in getting up the testimony necessary in connection with the Fisheries branch of the claim, and in attendance at Washington; and, as far as he (Mr. Mitchell) knew, he had never to this day received one shilling for it. His services in connection with the Fisheries Department had been very great indeed, and he was glad to hear that some allowance had been made to him when he was on duty at Halifax. He did not know whether it was sufficient to compensate him or not. If he had not been remunerated for his services, he thought he should be, now that the Fishery Award had been made and the matter had been brought to a satisfactory conclusion, for no doubt the money would be paid. The Americans were too high and honourable a nation to evade paying it; and they could not afford to ignore an arbitration like that. It was largely due to Mr. Whitcher that we had been enabled to put our case before that Commission in such a way that it had resulted in our getting this award—not what he (Mr. Mitchell) thought we ought to have got, because he considered that we should have obtained $15,000,000, but he did not consider that any amount of money would compensate us for a breach of friendly relations with a neighbouring country with whom we had always endeavoured to maintain such relations, and to keep up personal and commercial harmony. Though not satisfied with the amount, he was willing to look upon the award as a finality to a very unpleasant case.

Vote agreed to.

| 5. The Department of Justice, Penitentiary Branch..... | $ 3,900 |
| 7. The Department of Secretary of State | 35,120 |

MR. MITCHELL asked what had been the revenue in this Department since 1873.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, to the best of his recollection, the Department was not organized in its present shape in 1873. The Department of the Interior was created sometime in July, 1873, and up to that time the two Departments had been mixed together, so that there was no comparison.

MR. MITCHELL: The Minister of the Interior was created years before 1873.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Years before?

MR. MITCHELL: The Secretary of State for the Provinces was created years before, and that is the same.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Not at all.

MR. MITCHELL said it was the same, except in regard to the additional duties caused by the settlement of the North-West. He wanted to know if the same staff of officers was kept up, or if the staff had been reduced?

MR. CARTWRIGHT said an enormous increase of work had accrued to the Department of the Interior in the last few years. Formerly, it had not taken cognizance of the Indian tribes or the North-West generally. This addition to the work of the Department had caused a very large expense to be incurred. The Surveyor's branch alone involved an expenditure nearly equal to the total cost of the old Department of the Secretary of State for the Provinces—between $15,000 and $20,000. Anyone who looked at the enormous extent of territory which we had acquired and the enormous amount of work thrown on that Department in connection with land grants in Manitoba, and the surveys going on in that direction, would understand that the expenses of the Department of the Interior must have increased.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, in 1873, the Secretary of State was the custodian of all the public records, and was the officer carrying on the correspondence generally between the Dominion Government and the Local Governments, and all outsiders. He was the general organ of communication with the outer world. He should be glad to know if any other duties had been put upon the Secretary of State since 1873, and if the character of his duties had materially changed.

MR. MILLS said there was the change of the Police Force, and also a large number of patents which were issued by the Minister of the Interior through the office of the Secretary of State.

MR. MASSON said the increase caused by the transfer of the Police Force was only $2,750, while the total increase in that Department was nearly $8,000.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that, under the Civil Service Act, the clerks were entitled—not by legal right, but by custom—to an increase of $50 a year until they reached the maximum of their class. Under that provision, an increase of from $300 to $1,300 or $1,400 accrued each year. That, he thought, would be found to comprise all the additions made in these five years.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

After Recess.

MR. MASSON asked how it was that the duties connected with the Secretary of State's Department, which had been transferred to the Secretary of the Provinces, and subsequently to the Minister of the Interior, should have entailed an increased expenditure of $8,000, although there was a decrease in the expenses, under the heading of Mounted Police, of about $2,000.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the actual difference, after deducting the $2,750 to which he had alluded was, as nearly as possible, $5,000, and that had been applied towards increasing the salaries of certain clerks who had not obtained their maximum in 1873.

MR. MASSON: But are not the duties a great deal less than they were before they were transferred from the Department of the Secretary of State to that of the Secretary of the Provinces?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: In 1873 there were two Departments—that of the Secretary of State, and that of the Secretary of State for the Provinces. I am not aware that any of the duties of the Secretary of State proper were transferred to the Department of the Interior; indeed, as far as the actual duties of the Secretary of State's Department are concerned, they are rather increased than diminished. A large number of increases were made by the Department of the Interior and these necessarily came under this review.

MR. MASSON: These increases refer to the Civil Service outside.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: There is very little outside service connected with this Department, because it is governed by Statute. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works tells me that the railway clerks had the largest share of these outside increases, and a few were greater in the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments, according to length of service.

MR. MASSON: The reason I ask is that I know some persons employed in the post-office at Montreal, who have given satisfaction for years and yet only receive a salary of $400. If I am not mistaken, this is sheer injustice.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I merely call attention to the fact that it is under the Statute.

MR. MASSON: That Statute was made at a time when we expected that the prosperity we then enjoyed would continue to increase, and that the salaries in the different Departments would be increased. This expectation was participated in by my hon. friend himself.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Not as regards any increase.

MR. MASSON: My hon. friend evidently anticipated that the salaries would be varied, for his Estimates for 1875 were made larger on that account.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: My hon. friend is mistaken.

MR. MASSON: I may be, but if so I want to be put right. There was a time when we received great revenues, but now the country was at a pinch when these large increases could not very well be afforded and it was not right for the hon. gentleman to say that the old Administration did so and so. The old Administration made proposals in the belief that the country would continue to be as prosperous as it was then, and, in view of the present depressed times, the hon. gentleman, instead of blaming the late Government, should set himself to see if some reduction could not be made. The Province of Quebec was promised that, when the Liberal party came into power, they would not increase the expenditure like the late Administration, but reduce it. He would draw the hon. gentleman's attention to what he said a short time before the recess. He said that very often the employés in the Departments were allowed to do extra work, for which they received extra pay. That was to say, that something was given to them as a bonus. He would like to know from the hon. gentleman if this was of frequent occurrence, for it was certainly a bad system. If a man received a proper remuneration in one Department, it was not right to put him into another Department to do extra work at an additional salary. It was impossible for them to perform their duties satisfactorily if they were over-worked.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said his hon. friend was perfectly correct in stating that it was not desirable to give clerks more extra work to do than necessary, nor was such the practice at present. There were, however, times when it was absolutely necessary that extra hours should be imposed upon the clerks, in order that departmental reports, for instance, might be prepared sufficiently early. Not only did the work require to be done expeditiously; it required to be done by those familiar with the details of the different Departments, and hence the Civil Service clerks were better qualified to effect exactly what was wanted than extra hands could possibly be. On the whole, he did not find fault with what his hon. friend had stated, because abuses might arise; but it would be to the public disadvantage if the heads of the Departments were debarred altogether from employing the officials under them to do extra work. Then, as to the other and more important point raised by his hon. friend, he might state that he concurred with him there also. At the time of the introduction of the amended Civil Service Act, he (Mr. Cartwright) stated that it was the intention of the Government to dispense with the bonus of $75,000 heretofore distributed. His object in urging this was that the expenditure might be economized as much as possible. These bonuses, then, were abolished, and the salaries now given, even including the increases which had been made, were rather under in amount what they had been in 1873-4. Looking to the interests of the public service, he did not think it would have been wise to abolish both bonus and statutory increase, though, if any decided expression had been made by members on both sides of the House as to the desirability of putting a stop to these increases, careful consideration would have been given to the arguments brought forward. He had not, however, heard a single word of this kind mentioned till now, either by his hon. friend or anybody else. Besides, it must be remembered that the work of these Departments had increased largely within the last five years. If, therefore, the heads of Departments were deprived of extra work from their clerks, and if their clerks had no prospect of receiving an increase for several years, he was inclined to think the effect on the service would be rather prejudicial, having in view the fact that the bonuses granted had been taken away.

MR. MASSON wished to learn from the hon. gentleman what rules were followed in giving extra pay for extra labour. Did he require very extraordinary labour? Because he (Mr. Masson) considered that these officials, with the good salaries they enjoyed, should do any extra work which might crop up during the Parliamentary Session without additional remuneration. In commercial life, when, at a pressing period, an employer asked his journeymen to work harder and later, they readily agreed to do so without asking extra pay.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said it depended on the particular class of work required to be done. In his own Department, for instance, one or two of the officers were compelled to work till ten or eleven o'clock at night, sometimes for eight weeks at a stretch, making up Public Accounts, and, as that was a thing he scarcely liked to order men to do, he undertook to give them a reasonable allowance. If his hon. friends opposite were ordered to do work of a similar description without compensation, it would be of a vastly inferior character to what it would if they were paid extra.

MR. MASSON said that, when his friends were in power, the employés were always willing to do extra work without extra pay and not the slightest trouble was ever experienced.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said they had taken special pains to have all the departmental reports ready at the earliest possible moment, and, under these circumstances, it was deemed advisable to make some little allowance to the clerks for extra time, taking care to keep within the contingencies which were provided.

MR. MASSON said the principle was a very bad one. If the employés were not sufficiently well paid let them come before that House and make the complaint. He had known cases in Montreal of young men employed in offices working till midnight without additional pay, when press of business rendered it necessary, and there was no reason why Civil Service officials, who had not very much work to do when Parliament was not sitting, should grumble at having to stay late when required.

MR. LANGEVIN said he wished to remark upon the extra work in the Department alluded to by the Finance Minister. He understood him to say these officers would not complain of this extra work. He understood that in this large Department extra work was required, and that a number of persons from other Departments were called upon to work for three, four or five hours a night, for a number of weeks. He was sure his hon. friend would not say that these officers had a right to do this work without getting any extra pay for it.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that for any slight work of that kind the general way was not to pay extra, but for a considerable amount of such extra work, which was sometimes rendered necessary, and which could only be done by those in the Department, in some cases an extra allowance had been made. But this only occurred over periods of several weeks together.

MR. PLUMB said he understood that the Government had decided to dispense with the bonuses, but at the same time there were these extra allowances given within the limit of the amount of those bonuses. He thought this system of extra allowances was objectionable, as it would be liable to considerable abuse. The bonuses were an allowance, and a fair allowance, and were given in a way that admitted of no possible favouritism; therefore, the system that was proposed to take its place should be very closely scrutinized. He did not think the explanation of the Finance Minister, with reference to the charge, was one that was satisfactory. He saw also, that, in the statement they were now discussing, there was an allowance for services of clerks for the Mounted Police, which was now brought into the Department of Justice. They had heard a great deal during the last few weeks about reductions of the expenditure of the Department of Justice, and, as far as he could see, there appeared to be no great addition to the salaries in that Department, but there was the increase in the allowance of third-class clerks. Now, in most of the accounts, that particular item was reduced; in this particular case it was increased, and he should like to know whether that increase grew out of anything which might have happened before the transfer to the Department of Justice. He did not object to increasing the salaries of Government employés, they were not very highly rewarded; and he had no doubt that the heads and deputy heads of Departments, who saw that the work was properly done, were entitled to all the compensation they received from Government. But he objected strenuously to a system which should give the opportunity for a display of favouritism to any class of clerks in any Department, and at the same time give the Government the chance of saying that they had made a reduction in the expenditure, as they were told had been done by taking away the bonuses. He believed those bonuses were well earned, and that an injustice had been done to the employés, for the sake of making a small economy which certainly had been compensated for by very great extravagance in other ways. The hard-working employés of the Government had been deprived of an allowance which had been a regular addition to their salaries, and though of no importance to the Government, was of great importance to themselves. They had to live on small means and economize in every way; they had come to look upon these bonuses as a right, and their removal would in many cases be a matter of great hardship; would cut off some little indulgence for the family, some little outlay in the matter of education, some little privilege, and would be the occasion of great pain to the hard-working man and his family; and in lieu of it they had a system which might be a system of favouritism and abuse. He did not say it was, but he said his hon. friend was right in insisting upon knowing whether it could be used in that direction.

MR. MITCHELL asked whether he rightly understood the Minister of Finance that $5,000 had been added to the annual expenditure of this Department through the Civil Service Act passed during the administration of Sir John A. Macdonald?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: You did.

MR. MITCHELL said the hon. member made it a defence for the increase of expenditure in connection with the Civil Service of the country, that their predecessors had passed an Act which increased the expenditure, and that the expenditure attributable to this cause was as much as $500. What was the policy of these hon. gentlemen? They enunciated to the country a policy of economy; they said their predecessors were extravagant, that they were too liberal, gave too large salaries, gave bonuses to the Civil Service they ought not to have given, and established increases of salary for which there was no necessity. His hon. friend the Finance Minister said he did not approve of that Act.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No; I said that Statutory increases were under the Civil Service Act of 1869. I expressed no disapproval of the Act.

MR. MITCHELL: My hon. friend did say, if I understood him rightly, that he disapproved of the Act.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I said nothing whatever of approving or disapproving.

MR. MITCHELL: What did he say when I asked him whether he approved of the Act or not?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I said nothing whatever about approving or disapproving. He must be mistaken, or is confounding it with something else.

MR. MITCHELL: Then I ask him now that I may be under a mistake no longer: Did he approve of the Civil Service Act and the increase of salaries under that Act? I await his answer.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I do not feel called upon to express any opinion about an Act for which I am in no respect responsible.

MR. MITCHELL: Then does he approve of it, or does he not?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I do not want to express an opinion about it.

MR. MITCHELL said the hon. gentleman could not, in one breath, blame the late Government for the increased expenditure, and in the next decline to making himself responsible by dissenting from the Act by which this increased expenditure arose. He had no right to charge the late Government with increasing the expenditure if he approved of this Act.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Not at all; I only stated how the increase arose.

MR. MITCHELL said then he would take the hon. gentlemen on the other horn of the dilemma. If the hon. gentleman disapproved the Act, how was it that he sat on those benches, with so large a majority behind him—a majority, by-the-way, which had fallen from 88 to 37, and was still decreasing—without attempting to bring in a Bill to reduce the extravagant expenditure in the Civil Service?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I have told the hon. gentleman time after time.

MR. MITCHELL said, if the hon. gentleman complained of the lavish expenditure of his predecessors, why did he not, with all the power and strength of a subservient majority at his back, bring in a Bill to reorganize the Service? The revenues had fallen for three successive years under the careful and wise policy of his economical Government, while the expenditure had increased. Then this economical Government, which boasted so much as to what they were going to do in economizing the resources of the country, now proposed to increase the expenditure by another Civil Service Act.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No Civil Service Act is contemplated.

MR. MITCHELL: Have you not brought one in to do away with the bonuses?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I brought down, as you remark, a proposition to abolish the bonuses, and by this, a very considerable saving will be effected.

MR. MITCHELL said that, with all the talk about economy, the hon. gentleman had consented to this Bill, which was another way of increasing instead of diminishing salaries. The hon. gentleman himself brought in a measure in 1875, by which the salaries of almost all the officers in the lower grade were increased by $100 each, and he only abandoned it because of the reproaches and resistance of some of his followers.

MR. BLAKE said the transfer of the police force to this Department took place some time ago, and the Estimates of last year were voted on that basis. The hon. gentleman was not correct in supposing that it would be legitimate to assume that that transfer was proper to be taken into account in comparing the expenditure of that Department in years gone by, with its expenditure now. That removal and expenditure might properly be taken into account in comparing the increased rate of expenditure from 1873-4 to the time the transfer took place, but did not apply to 1872-3. The Mounted Police Force was authorized by Act of Parliament in 1873. The organization had only then commenced. Although its organization had been attached to the Department of Justice, no arrangements had been made for additions to the staff for the purpose of organizing that new branch. Up to that time, and for a short time afterwards, an attempt was made to carry on that additional service with the staff which the right hon. member for Kingston had had in the office for years before. By consequence, the expenditure, up to the time of the late Government was not predicated upon the expenditure of this large branch, and in making a comparative statement of the total expenditure of the Department between the year preceding the advent of the present Administration and the present time, the Mounted Police item should be taken out of account altogether, simply because then, as now, it did not form part of the expenditure voted for the Department of Justice.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the organization of the Mounted Police was settled in his time. Three hundred men were enlisted, and orders given for one hundred and fifty more. Whether these extra men were enlisted before he went out or not, he did not remember. The hon. gentleman had been quite right in increasing the staff of the Department of Justice on account of the increased duties in connection with the Mounted Police. But he (Sir John A. Macdonald) felt sure, however, that the transfer had not been a fortunate one; it had been made to the wrong Department. There ought to be some affinity between the officer at the head of the Department and the duties imposed upon it. There was no reason in the world why the Secretary of State should have been charged with the whole management and organization of the Mounted Police. The selection had been an unfortunate one, and should not have been made. The force was, in a certain sense, a civil one, and the officers, to a certain extent, were magistrates. It was fitting that the organization of the force the selection of officers, the apportioning of their duties, the general supervision of affairs, ought to have rested with the Minister of Justice; but with respect to the matter of supply, which did not fall properly within the office of the Secretary of State, any more than the duties imposed upon the police force as a force helping to enforce justice, he did not think the matter of supply should have been thrown on the Secretary of State. That ought to have been kept in the Department of the Minister of Justice, or to have been transferred to the Minister of Militia. The force was a civil one, certainly, in one sense, but it must have a military organization. The question of the supply of clothing, of arms, of ammunition, and all the matériel ought to have been thrown upon the Minister of Militia, who was charged with providing clothing, etc., for the Militia. The force was a military one, and would be called on, probably, to perform military duty. There was a great objection to transferring the whole duty to the Secretary of State Department. The organization, and the appointment and selection of officers and men should have remained with the Minister of Justice, who would, perhaps, consult military authorities as to the physique and the capabilities of the officers and men; and, as regarded everything connected with supply of matériel, that should have been entrusted to the Minister of Militia. The new system also converted the Department of the Secretary of State, which was a non-spending Department, into a spending Department. There should be as few spending Departments as possible. The system was a highly objectionable one, and so unsuited that it could not last very long.

Mr. BLAKE said one of the observations of the right hon. gentleman was conclusive, as to the propriety of making a change. The Department of Justice was, by no means, a spending Department. This Department, therefore, fell within the category that should not have been charged with the spending part of the Mounted Police. The Department was not adapted to discharge those duties. Its staff consisted of a few carefully selected and highly trained professional gentlemen; the rest, shorthand writers. To attempt to control this business was impossible, and the service required to be transferred. The right hon. gentleman suggested it might have been divided between the Department of Justice and some other Department. There would be some inconvenience in that. It was convenient that all that concerned the force should be done under the one head. With respect to the Militia Department, he (Mr. Blake) always thought, and he believed the right hon. gentleman had expressed the same sentiment, that every effort should be made to prevent the force assuming the appearance of a military force. It was in its essence a civil force. It was the natural desire of the officers that it should be treated as a military force. He (Mr. Blake) thought that would be a great mistake; there were certain notions with reference to military powers, martial law, etc., which should be kept out of view with respect to the operations of the force. The Government was strongly of opinion that no steps should be taken which would attribute to this force a military character. The force might very properly have come under the Minister of the Interior, but for one reason: that this Department had more than it could manage. It would have been absurd to over-weight it with this additional charge. The amount of business in connection with the settlement of North-West claims, colonization surveys, etc., was growing, and, he hoped, would continue to grow, indefinitely. He hoped to see that Department, as one hoping for the prosperity of his country, become the largest Department in the Government. It was absurd, while the Department was increasing, to propose to add to a Minister already over-weighted, an additional charge of a very vexatious character. He did not see, therefore, that there was anything objectionable in handing it to another Minister, with whom it had no particular connection, but whose office was of such a character that it enabled him to look carefully after the concerns of the force, and to attend with that promptitude which was necessary to the management of the spending part of the Department, which might not have been done in other hands.

MR. MASSON said he did not think there existed anywhere a corps which resembled more the gens-d'armes of France, than the Mounted Police. Both were formed for exactly the same purpose. He must disagree with his hon. friend in saying that it would be regretted that the force should be put under military control. If the force existed here he would understand his objection. But it was to be used in the North-West, where, among the Indians, the strong arm of the law, as manifested in a military force, was necessary. The great objection to the system suggested by the right hon. member for Kingston was that it would be impossible to put it under two single Departments. The gens-d'armes of France, which was a most efficient body, was under two or three Departments. The force should have been put under the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Militia, to be controlled by the Minister of Justice in all that related to the general police of the country, and the orders for executing the mandates of the authorities, and by the Minister of Militia in all that related to military regulations and discipline. A force sent to such great distances in a new country required to be held under strict military rule. It should be considered as a part of our military system. If it had to perform police duties here, there might be some objections, but it had to deal with an exceptional class of men, on whom nothing but the strong arm of the law would have any influence. What were the means they had of enforcing discipline in a body like this? The most they could do was to impose a fine, which could have but little effect. The system established in France worked well, and should be adopted in Canada, and the Mounted Police should have a military organization, and be placed under the Minister of Militia.

MR. MILLS said the hon. member for Terrebonne had taken on this subject an entirely different view from his leader. He (Mr. Mills) was inclined to think both were wrong. The view which the hon. member took, that this force should be a military force on account of the people they had to deal with, so far removed from the centre of civilization, might be very good in itself. But it would require a complete change in their legal system, to authorize a course like that being adopted. The hon. member referred to what was done in France, but the common law of England was not in force in France. The hon. gentleman, of course, was aware that every one in Canada was living under the common law, and, whether in the North-West Territories or here, was entitled to protection under it, and they had no more right to refuse that protection to the wild Indian of the North-West, or the trader or hunter, than to the people of the city of Ottawa. Their positions were entirely the same. It would be necessary to completely revolutionize their system to meet the views of the hon. gentleman.

MR. MASSON said every gen-d'arme was a policeman, and obliged to take his orders from the Prefect of the Police Department.

MR. BOWELL said one of the claims made by the present Government was that they had reduced the expenditure of all these Departments, and held that as a claim for future support. He, with many others, was somewhat amused at the answer of the hon. the Finance Minister to his hon. friend from Northumberland. The hon. gentleman argued that the Bill had been introduced for the regulation of the Civil Service, the provisions of which Bill increased, rather than diminished, the expenditure of that Service. Then he asked why that Bill had been withdrawn. The hon. the Finance Minister replied: "I made no overtures to this side of the House."

MR. CARTWRIGHT: The Finance Minister said nothing of the kind.

MR. BOWELL: You said you made no overtures to this side of the House.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I said nothing about making overtures to hon. gentlemen. I am not in the habit of making overtures to them, nor do I intend to.

MR. MITCHELL: Except the promise about the cow.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I did say this: that I did not hear the hon. gentleman on the other side make any propositions to abolish the statutory increase.

MR. BOWELL: The hon. gentleman said he did not make overtures, or I so understood him.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Then you misunderstood me.

MR. BOWELL: I may have; but, notwithstanding the denial of the hon. gentleman, I think that my memory is as good as his on a matter of this kind.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I again distinctly tell the hon. gentleman that I said nothing of the kind; and, if he persists in putting words into my mouth, I will have to request you to call him to order.

MR. BOWELL said the hon. gentleman was so much in the habit of giving abrupt contradictions to what was said regarding matters referring to him, that he (Mr. Bowell) scarcely believed that the hon. gentleman knew what he did say half the time, and, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's explicit denial, he would again repeat he so understood the remarks made just as the hon. gentleman was sitting down. On looking into the Public Accounts of last year, he found that no less than seven extra clerks had been employed; he did not know whether or not they were on the permanent staff, but, from the entry, he supposed that they must have been employed on over-work. He found that some of them were paid as high salaries as third class clerks, and others much higher; these were $730, $706, $547 and $275; and for extra work, smaller sums. It was quite evidence from these accounts, either that the staff of the Secretary of State was not sufficiently large, or that extra clerks had been employed to do work which ought to have been done by the regular staff. He desired to know whether this amount of nearly $5,000 for extra clerks was to be a permanent charge upon this Department, or whether $4,000, $5,000 or $6,000 was to be taken in this regard from the Contingent Fund every year. He also found in the Estimates of 1873-4, that the appropriation of $27,727.50 was asked for, for that year; while, this year, they were asked to vote $35,120. He knew that the answer would be that the management of the Mounted Police had been added to this Department, but, on looking at the details respecting the Department of the Secretary of State in 1877-8, he found that the appropriation for Mounted Police, formerly under the Department of Justice, amounted to $2,750; and, taking $2,700 from the Estimates of this year, or rather adding it to the Estimates of 1873-4, they had an increase of some $5,000 in that Department alone, without taking into consideration the extra sums paid to the extra clerks, and the additional work that had to be performed by those who were put on, as he supposed, when there was any need for hurry in getting up these documents. The hon. the Minister of Finance, or the hon. the Premier—he was not sure which—had said it was the anxious desire of the Government to lay all these Blue-books and documents before the House at as early period as possible after the opening of the Session. This was commendable; but when they considered the fact that the financial year did not end until the 30th June every year, to his mind it did not seem to be such a heavy task to prepare the reports of each Department in time to be so presented, when they had seven or eight months to do it in. It might be answered, "Oh, our predecessors never laid them on the table at such an early period," but this did not justify the delay which might occur or might have occurred; and he could not conceive that this was a great work to perform. He did not see, therefore, why some $4,000 or $5,000, as in this case, should be added to the expenditure of the Departments for extra clerks and extra work. Perhaps the hon. the Minister of Finance might explain why this was, and whether the year ending 30th of June, 1877, was an exceptional one, or whether this was a usual thing which it was intended to continue.

MR. MITCHELL said that, when he was at the head of a Department, he had never found any difficulty in having the reports ready at the opening of Parliament save with respect to the printers, who caused the delay that had been experienced in this respect. His Department had always been ready and up with their work. They had met with difficulty in connection with the system of printing. The old Government had however, pretty well organized matters with the aid of a very vigilant Opposition, by the time when the hon. gentlemen opposite acceded to office. The Department of Marine and Fisheries in his time had never been behind-hand, save with regard to the printing. He thought that the hon. the Minister of Finance would show a little more respect to hon. members of the Opposition if he answered some points that had been raised, and informed them why these things, to which he had referred, had occurred.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: What particular points? Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to say. I have explained five distinct times, twice before recess and thrice since, how the increase of $5,000 occurred. Does the hon. gentleman wish me to repeat for the sixth time? If so, I can do it to oblige him.

MR. BOWELL.

MR. MITCHELL: To which $5,000 do you refer?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Five distinct times the increase of $5,000 over the expenditure of 1873 in the Secretary of State has been explained. Does the hon. gentleman wish that explanation to be repeated for the sixth time?

MR. MITCHELL said that the hon. gentleman had stated that the reason why this increase had occurred was owing to the statutory increases created by an Act of Parliament passed by the late Government; but why had not this Government, which had had a cast-iron majority behind them during the past five years, repealed them if this was wrong?

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that the hon. gentleman had been told certainly four times that it had been considered sufficient to do away with the bonus of $75,000. He would have either abolished the bonus or the statutory increases, but he did not think that it was in the public interests to do both.

MR. BOWELL said he would like to know whether this was an answer to his question respecting the expenditure of $1,470 for extra clerks in this Department alone.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said his answer was directed to the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). This increase, he believed, was due chiefly, though not entirely, to the very unusual number of patents issued by the Department of the Interior, which he understood had required the employment of extra clerks. He was not quite sure of the number, but perhaps his hon. friend behind him could state the total number issued; he believed, however, that it was many fold in excess of the number that had been issued during the last two or three previous years.

MR. TUPPER said he only rose to draw attention to a remark which had just been made by the hon. the Minister of Finance, which certainly indicated a different view of the question than the one he held. He understood the hon. gentleman to say that the present Government did away with the bonus. If his recollection was correct, when the increase was made to the salaries of the members of the Government and the indemnity of the members of the House, it was contemplated to readjust the salaries of the civil servants, and a vote was taken for a bonus for that year pending such a general readjustment. Authority was taken for this readjustment; and in the meantime, the bonus was granted which enabled the Government to deal with the question up to the 1st of July. The Government went on to distribute the bonus up that date, and also under the authority of the House to readjust the salaries with the means provided for that purpose; but it was never contemplated by the late Government, nor did he think that the House ever contemplated establishing a permanent annual bonus in addition to the readjustment of the salaries. The bonus, as he understood it, was provided temporarily until the readjustment mentioned could be made. They readjusted the salaries; and he held that the bonus did not again require to be voted. He did not think that the hon. gentleman should take credit for doing away with the bonus, when it was not at all contemplated that there should be an annual bonus granted. The expression, however, used by the hon. gentleman would lead the Committee to suppose that the bonus was annual, when it was only intended to be temporary.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, of course the hon. gentleman's authority on this subject might be better than his own. They found the system in question in existence when they came into power, and what they then did was introduce what they were informed, rightly or wrongly, was intended to be done—an Act by which they intended to deal with the bonus system, but that Act was withdrawn, as the House was aware.

MR. MITCHELL: Why?

MR. CARTWRIGHT said it was withdrawn simply because the feeling of the House in general did not appear to be in favour of giving an increase of salaries; and they were not desirous of pressing the matter in opposition to the feeling of hon. members. "Probably in any other than the first year after they came into office, they would not have been very much disposed to introduce a measure for the increase of salaries under the Civil Service Act. In any case, the measure after the second reading, he believed, was withdrawn, and but for this reason the bonus would not have been distributed for another year. Having taken a vote for it, they gave the civil servants the benefit of it, he thought up to the end of 1874 or 1875, and after that they discontinued it largely because he thought that the increases received under the Statute he referred to were as much as these servants were reasonably entitled to. He considered that, on the whole, the civil servants of this country were very well paid. In fact, if any portion of the civil servants were under-paid, this was the case much more in the higher than in the lower branches of the profession.

MR. MASSON: It is the case in the outside service.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said there might be exceptional cases of hardship in the outside service, and he had no doubt that, if these were brought to the notice of the heads of the respective Departments, they would receive consideration. He did not pretend to be conversant with all the details of the outside service, as to the merits of each officer.

MR. MASSON said that, if the civil servants at Ottawa were well paid, and he did not grudge it, this was not the case in the outside service. The hon. gentleman would understand that, when a young gentleman entered, say the post-office of Montreal, or any other office, as a probationary clerk, seven years ago, and having done his duty since, had to-day a salary of $400, this was discriminating rather too much.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I am not aware of any such cases.

MR. MASSON said that, if the hon. gentleman would only enquire into the matter, not as a politician or a party, but for the good of the Civil Service, he would see that the gravest injustice was being done in this relation, though he would not specify any case in particular. Men long in the employ of the Government, because they had been appointed by the late Government, were kept down as low as possible under the pretence that the Civil Service Act did not affect the outside service at all. Men had thus been kept for years without receiving a single cent of increase. More than this, it would be found that men who had held positions for years received less salaries than recent appointees, though they had done their duty faithfully. This was the case in the post-office, and perhaps in the Custom-house, at Montreal; and was not this a reason why the Civil Service Act, whether good or bad, should be extended to the members of the outside service; at all events, the latter should not be left in the position of being at the mercy of the politicians and partizans who came to the Government and recommended their particular friends for increases, or sought to prevent increases, in other cases, as suited their party purposes. If they wished to have a good Civil Service in this country, both outside and at Ottawa, it was but right that the increases of salaries should be regulated, and partizan feeling, in this relation, should be abolished. "Employés," if they proved capable, should be promoted; and, if incapable, they should be dismissed from the probationary class. He knew that there was a good deal of feeling in the country on this subject; and the general public believed that partizan reasons influenced the Ministers of the Crown, with regard to the outside service; and he believed that the Government would deserve credit if they applied the regulations which affected the interior service to the outside service, as well; that was to say, to increase salaries with regard to the number of years of service, and without regard to antecedents or relationship with members of Parliament.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he could not answer general attacks. He could not give his adhesion to the doctrine that, when a man spent a certain number of years in the service, he should be promoted as a matter of course. The end of this would be, that they would have all high class clerks at very high salaries of necessity. No objection need be taken to the statutory increase of $50 up to the maximum of a class if a man behaved himself, but he had no right, necessarily, to be promoted as soon as he obtained the maximum in his class. He did not think that the hon. member meant to imply the contrary. The other system would occasion enormous additional expense, and besides, they must allow the various Ministers to exercise some discrimination between the officers in their Departments. The officers were of various grades of ability and diligence; many were not fit for other than the lower grades; and he did not think it desirable to introduce into the service the principle of promoting men merely because they had served a number of years.

MR. MASSON said he had stated there were many cases of which he had heard in which persons of long service had not been promoted, though they were admitted by the heads of their Departments to be efficient officers.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I do not know of these cases.

MR. MASSON: I just want you to enquire into them.

MR. MITCHELL said he would like to know how the bonus was distributed. He thought that the higher grades of the officers of the Dominion were tolerably well paid. The class that was not well paid belonged to the lower grades. He knew that the opposite was the aristocratic way of looking at the matter. He knew of cases where active and clever young men were married, had four or five children, and supported their families on $700 at this date. He would not go so far as to say that long service alone should be the controllable element in the selection of men to fill the higher positions in the various Departments, but long service, with talent, ability, industry and sobriety, merited promotion, and outsiders who came there for political purposes should not be put in these higher positions, over men of lengthy service because they were political friends of the Government and friends of the Ministers. This was utterly unfair, but such things as this had been done by the present Government.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: What is the hon. gentleman's question?

MR. MITCHELL. Under what system was the bonus distributed?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I think that 15 per cent. was given to everybody.

MR. MITCHELL: I think not. In some instances officers got no bonus at all.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he thought that very few cases of the kind existed—that was to say so long as the bonus of $75,000 was distributed. The bonus was afterwards cut down to $30,000 or $35,000. The hon. gentleman might be right; in some cases the bonus was stopped. He recollected having stopped it in several cases; in one or two because he thought the parties had, otherwise, salary enough. In one or two because he doubted whether it was deserved; in one or two because they had got recent promotion; but in a general way, however, in 1874-5, it was distributed evenly, upon the principle which had been in operation, and this gave them 15 per cent.

MR. BOWELL: The hon. the Minister of Finance has not yet answered the question I asked him with reference to the extra clerks.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Yes, I did.

MR. BOWELL: I did not hear it.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I said, I believe, that it was caused by extra work in the matter of patents.

MR. BOWELL: That is not the question asked.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I understood that to be the question.

MR. BOWELL: I asked the hon. gentleman to inform the House whether the seven or eight clerks who received from $730 to $800, were placed permanently on the list; whether they were still on the staff; whether they were only employed occasionally, and, if so, at what rate they are paid; and why they have been paid more than clerks on the permanent staff.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said these gentlemen, during the whole year

1873-7, were employed, with the exception of two latter ones, who were employed for a part of the year only. Some of the others had, he believed, been dispensed with since, but he could not tell how many were now employed.

MR. POULIOT said in filling up vacancies it was important for the Government to see that the public employés were efficient, and above all, that no favouritism, as regarded nationality, should be shown; the French-Canadians should receive the same consideration as persons of other nationalities; no distinction should be shown; but, certainly, this had not been the case in the past. Vacancies had not been filled as they should have been, and an intolerable preference had been shown to nationalities other than the French-Canadian. This evil state of things should be remedied, and he hoped that the Government would endeavour to carry out the reform that was imperatively demanded in this respect. The salaries of employés of the favoured nationalities were sometimes rapidly advanced from several hundreds to $1,200 a year, while those who were less favoured were kept on salaries of a few hundreds. This was highly unjust. He hoped that the Government was willing to do justice in this particular. It was not right that some families should have all the favours and all the privileges. No favouritism should be shown, and men of every origin should everywhere be placed on the same footing. The rights of persons of French-Canadian origin were in too many instances trodden underfoot. He trusted that the Government would see to this matter.

MR. LAFLAMME: I will say to my hon. friend that these charges are a little general and vague. The hon. member will find, if he looks into the matter, that the French-Canadian nationality is generally sufficiently well represented in the distribution of positions; but, if the hon. gentleman has any special grievances, and any particular charges in this respect to make, I am convinced that, if he will bring them forward, the Government will take them into consideration.

MR. POULIOT said that the evil state of things to which he referred, had existed during a long time past under the late as well as the present Government. He only asked the Government to take steps with the view of rendering justice to all. Complaints had often been made in this direction. They were not concealed. The hon. the Minister of Justice could not deny that a great many complaints had been preferred, owing to the committal of the injustice to which he alluded. These might, in some instances, have been ill-founded; but something should be done. An effort should be made to treat all classes alike. Equal justice should be distributed among all classes of the population, and then we would be really all of the same nationality.

MR. POPE (Compton) objected to the principle under discussion on the ground that, while the clerks who had entered the service years ago with the prospect of being advanced, were only receiving $400 or $450 a year, eight or ten extra clerks in the same Department were receiving from $600 to $750. That was certainly an injustice. In the Department of Agriculture alone there were no fewer than nine extra clerks with salaries varying from $600 to $750. The plan originally intended to be followed in the Civil Service was to take in young men at low salaries and advance them gradually, but now, extra clerks were put over their heads at twice the pay they received. He called the attention of the Government to this anomaly last year, and he then stated that some of the extra clerks were not employed temporarily, but had actually been in one Department for five or six years. Now, although the House would be shortly called upon to vote for the granting of departmental salaries, amounting to $2,800 or $2,900, they would have to grant $500 or $600 more, which did not appear in the statement of the departmental expenditure, for the purpose of paying these extra clerks.

MR. MASSON asked if the hon. the Finance Minister would consent to bring down a return of all the employes in the Custom-house and post-office of Montreal, showing the date of their appointment, their ages, salaries, and the different increases given them.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentlemen had better bring that matter up when they got to the question of the Post-Office Department. He did not think it was germane to the subject under discussion; besides, his hon. friend the Postmaster-General was not present.

MR. MASSON: Then I will let it stand over.

MR. DEVLIN: Why do you confine yourself to Montreal?

MR. MASSON: Because, living near there, I know most about it.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said there was considerable force in what his hon. friend from Compton had said. The business in the patent branch of the Department of Agriculture, where so many extra clerks were employed, had increased to an extraordinary degree, but he could not say to what extent the work, which at first had been looked upon as temporary, had become permanent. A considerable sum had been derived by that Department from the increased business, and that was the reason why temporary clerks, engaged in copying and plan drawing, had been retained so long. He agreed with his hon. friend, however, in thinking that it would be better to make a considerable addition to the Estimates, instead of placing the salaries of these extra clerks in the Contingencies, to which he had intended to call attention. It was rather too late to amend the Estimates in their present shape, but he was disposed to advise the Minister of Agriculture to take the hon. gentleman's suggestion, and, by cutting down the Contingencies, add to the main Estimates.

MR. POPE said the hon. the Minister of Finance was not quite right about the extra expense in the Patent Office. The return from that office had been the same since 1872, when patents from foreign countries were admitted, and the salaries paid to clerks amounted to $1,100 or $1,200. His hon. friend would find there were nine or ten more clerks there now, and their salaries, averaging from $500 to $600, continually appeared in the Public Accounts. Of course that amount could not all be accounted for by the extra work in the Patent Office, because the amount now received from that office was very little more than it was in 1873 or 1874, and the number of clerks was more than double what it used to be; the salaries amounting to five times as much.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he had not the Accounts for 1874 beside him, but his impression was that the revenue derived from the Patent Office then was not nearly so great as it was now.

MR. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) said his impression had long been that the salaries of a great many men employed in the various Departments were far too low, but, when it was considered that there were 206 members in that House, who, on an average, received, at least, one application for office every day—

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Not on this side; not the Opposition.

MR. MACDONALD maintained that the average he had stated was a very fair one, and it would be found, on a calculation, that no fewer than 62,418 applications were received every year. He had received a letter stating that if he did not get a young man into the Post-Office, he might look out for his seat at the next general election. An hon. gentleman had stated the other day that he had promised a certain vacancy to thirteen applicants, and, with all the pressure brought to bear upon Ministers, it was really surprising that they could confine the staff to its present limits. The hon. member for Terrebonne had pointed out that employes in business houses willingly did extra work without additional remuneration, but it must be borne in mind that there was no analogy between young men in business houses and young men in Civil Service Departments; the prizes to be obtained in the former being so much greater. Leaving that out of the question, however, he thought men who, during the greater part of the year, had a considerable amount of leisure at their disposal, ought, as a rule, to be prepared to do extra work in time of pressure without additional pay.

MR. CASEY said a good many points had been raised in the course of that debate with reference to Civil Service employes, some of which, though not urged in an altogether kindly spirit, were worthy of the attention of Ministers. Attention had been called to the fact that in the outside service there was really no promotion, and that, in other cases, persons outside the service had been promoted over the heads of those who had served for several years without giving any cause for complaint. There could be no doubt that the absence of promotion in the outside service was very injurious; it damped the enthusiasm of the employes, and Ministers were almost obliged to give the higher appointments outside as rewards for political usefulness. If, on the other hand, it was understood that the higher appointments were to be filled by men who had graduated in the service, it would become more efficient. The existing system was one for which the present Minister could not be blamed, and, while that system should be remedied, there were posts which it must be left to the Minister to fill. By keeping young men in the lowest grades of the services for several years, where they had nothing but copying work to do, they were unfitted for the higher positions in the service where nothing but good business talent was required. His hon. friend from Centre Toronto had hit the true grievance, and he could endorse that gentleman's statements as to the great number of applicants which were made to members of that House, and the difficulty which the Government experienced in keeping the service within proper limits. The system of patronage was a bad one, tending as it did to the useless increase of the number of employes, and, though the present Government had not yielded to the temptation, it was right that that temptation should be taken altogether out of their way. Before the close of the Session, he hoped to submit his own ideas as to the best way of getting public servants, and those gentlemen who had expressed their disapprobation of the present system would then have a chance of voting for something better.

Vote agreed to.

8. The Department of the Minister of the Interior..... $45,720

MR. MILLS said the Free Lands and the Ordnance Department could not longer be kept separate owing to the character of the work, and, therefore, the Government had united both in the Free Lands Department, under the charge of the Surveyor-General. They had, in consequence, increased the salary of Col. Dennis from $2,600 to $3,200, putting him upon the footing of a Deputy-Minister. On looking further down, the hon. gentleman would see $4,200 for clerks. This allowed for the appointment of another clerk in the Ordnance branch, of inferior grade, in case experience should show the appointment to be necessary; but no appointment had yet taken place.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The salary of the Surveyor-General does not appear in this Estimate.

MR. MILLS: Yet it does as chief clerks.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: It appears under the head of two chief clerks, the Estimate of which last year was $4,750; this year it is $5,400, or an increase of $650.

MR. MILLS: There is the Surveyor-General and Mr. Russell's salary both combined in that item. Mr. Russell got an increase of $40.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that the increase in the Ordnance Lands Department was $1,500, and adding the $600 given to Colonel Dennis and the $40 to Mr. Russell.

MR. MILLS said there were no increases except the statutory increases.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he noticed that the amount of salary paid to Mr. Coffin was still entered, and that it had increased from $2,850 to $4,350.

MR. MILLS said they had not yet filled Mr. Coffin's place, but as it might be found necessary to increase the staff of the Ordnance Branch, provision had been made in the Estimates under that head. No appropriation had yet taken place.

MR. CASEY.

MR. MITCHELL said he noticed that the expenditure of this Department in 1873-4, was $16,950 in the salaries of the staff, and that this economical Government had swelled that amount to $45,720, very nearly three times as much.

MR. MILLS: No.

MR. MITCHELL said his hon. friend said, "No," but the items taken from the Public Accounts showed to the contrary. He should like some explanation as to how the increase in that Department had arisen. He thought, too, that it was somewhat anomalous to have two deputy heads of a Department, and that it was found detrimental to the satisfactory working of it. Not more than one man should be held responsible for the work of the Department.

MR. MILLS said it was well known that the Bill creating the Department of the Interior was passed in the Session of 1873, and it was organized on the 1st July of that year. He did not know the Estimates for that particular year, but he could inform the hon. gentleman that there was not any staff connected with the public service that was more dilligently employed and more constantly at work than the staff connected with this Department was at this moment. He would also draw attention to the fact that, during the past twelve months, there had been more patents issued, by one-fourth, than were issued since the North-West Territory was taken in. For these patents, they had been obliged to make maps and plans of the settlements, and this, in itself, had been somewhat expensive business. At the present time, taking into consideration the amount of work performed in each of these branches, the cost to the Dominion had been less than in 1873. He had a statement in his hand which showed that each particular person in the Department performed a larger amount of work than four years ago.

MR. BOWELL said the hon. member had not referred to the additions to the staff and extra payments, which amounted altogether to $4,000.

MR. MILLS said there were two or three extra clerks employed.

MR. BOWELL said he found a payment to one extra clerk of $30, to another $90, to another $531, to another $138, to another $356, and then there were four or five extra copying clerks in addition to these. The hon. gentleman said he had not the Estimates for 1873-4. The Estimates for that year were $16,920 in the Ordnance Department, and nearly $50,000 in connection with Dominion Lands; since that time, the Estimates had been increased 50 per cent.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he had referred to the Public Accounts for 1873-4 and found that the sum actually expended in the Department of the Interior, created in that year, was $42,556, from which should be deducted $7,000, being the salary of the Minister; making the actual sum expended, as near as might be, $35,556. Now, the difference between the vote asked for now, although considerable, was not at all more than might be expected from the well-known enormous increase that had taken place in the work of this office since 1873-4. The Estimates for that year would afford no accurate criterion at all, for the simple reason that the Dominion Lands branch only contained the estimates of the work of the Secretary of State for the Provinces. The Department of the Interior was reorganized, was created, by the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir John A. Macdonald), and a very important and necessary Department he (Mr Cartwright) believed it to be.

MR. BOWELL: Then we are asked to vote for $45,720.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: An increase of $10,000.

MR. BOWELL said he believed there was a much larger difference.

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman will see that there are $18,350 chargeable to the Dominion Lands branch.

MR. LANGEVIN said that, deducting this item, the increase was $10,356.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: The hon. gentleman is quite right; $10,000 is as near as may be. One-half of that increase, speaking roundly, has been the ordinary statutory increase; the other half is attributable to increase of work.

MR. MILLS: The Indian Lands branch has added considerably to the estimate.

MR. MITCHELL said, on referring to the returns, he found that the Government asked something like $29,000 more than was asked in 1873. He referred them to page 3, under the head of Civil Government items, for the financial year 1873-4.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: There was no Department of the Interior in 1873.

MR. MITCHELL: My hon. friend cannot get out of it in that way. There was a Department of the Interior.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Not in 1873.

MR. MITCHELL said the duties now performed in the Department of the Interior were then carried on in the Department of the Secretary of State for the Provinces; it was simply a change of name. When the Government took credit for having reduced the salaries, such an enormous increase as that required better explanation than to say there were more patents issued and the country had increased.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman was not correct in saying there was a mere change of name. A very distinct Department was created by Act of Parliament, 36 Victoria chapter 14, which created the Dominion Lands Branch, under which the expenditure of the Department which had been called in former years the Secretary of State for the Province, and which was transmitted into the Department of the Interior, was, as nearly as possible, if not quite, doubled. The estimate to which the hon. gentleman referred was simply the Secretary of State for the Provinces, without the Dominion Lands branch, which very nearly doubled the work. The actual expenditure was, as he had mentioned before, $35,000.

MR. MASSON said the Estimates for the Department of the Interior were $16,920, and the Dominion Lands $10,000; total, $27,000, not $35,000. The question was how could they make an expenditure of $42,000 with an estimate of only $27,000. If they had been able to surpass their Estimate in 1873-4, what guarantee had they today that the expenditure would not exceed the estimate.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, in the first place, hon. gentlemen chose in addition to the amount provided by Statute and by estimate to expend $27,000, to increase that amount fifteen per cent. by distribution of bonuses, which amounted to a further sum of $4,000; that would amount to say, $31,000 or $32,000. What other expenditure they incurred, under the different Orders in Council, he could not pick out at this moment.

MR. MASSON said his hon. friend had given the expenditure and had referred to the Statute which provided for it. Did he pretend to say that when expenditure was required, it was not mentioned in the Estimates.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: How could it be mentioned in the Estimates when the Statutes were not passed when the Estimates were introduced.

MR. MASSON: Why were they not in the Supplementary Estimates?

MR. CARTWRIGHT said his hon. friend would not find in any Estimates introduced by any previous Minister the detailed account of expenditure to be incurred under Statutes passed in the same Session. If he could show an instance of such being done, he (Mr. Cartwright) would stand corrected. If his hon. friend looked at the Estimates, he would find that the expenditure under Statute passed in the same Session in which the Estimates were introduced, was never referred to in the Supply Bill, which had nothing to do with the expenditures authorized by Statute. For convenience only, Estimates, after the Statutes were passed, were put in as the expenditure incurred under Statute.

MR. MILLS said the whole expenditure of the Department in 1873-4, was $37,900, not including the bonus of 15 per cent. which would make $42,785, less the Minister's salary. With regard to the work of the Department, hon. gentlemen knew that nearly 50,000 Indians were now under its control, which was not the case in 1873-4. The Indian population had doubled, and the work had been more than doubled, owing to a large portion of the Indians having been found very difficult to manage; and, then, there was also an immense increase in the settlement of the North-West Territories. The previous Administration had left their work undone. Its result was that, in the Public Lands Department, a large number of cases were brought forward which required to be disposed of. The Department had to settle questions which occurred before the present Administration came into power. In the issuing of patents and in the settlement of disputed claims, more had been done during the past twelve months than during the whole preceding period since the North-West Territory had been acquired.

MR. MASSON said he was not prepared to say the work had not been left undone by the late Administration because he knew nothing to the contrary. But the country had only then been acquired a few years, and it could not be expected that the work of a Department such as that could have been completed. The late Administration had been ousted out of power through political treachery, and now they were taunted with having left the work undone. He did not believe that the late Joseph Howe would have permitted an accumulation to gather, as far as he knew him.

MR. MILLS: He never had anything to do with it.

MR. MASSON: He was in as Secretary of State for the Provinces, and did the work of the North-West Department, exclusive of Dominion Lands.

MR. MILLS: No.

MR. MASSON: Had he not the management of Indian affairs and the affairs of the Indian lands with the Lieut.-Governor of Manitoba, during all those troubles? What was there in all this accumulation of work, except the Indian Department, which was not done by Mr. Howe, and Mr. Campbell organized that Department a few months before the late Government went out of office. And yet, the hon. Minister tried to foist on the hon.

gentleman who had preceded him the statement that he left his work undone. He did not believe that Mr. Campbell was a man to leave his work undone, with an accumulation of arrears which led to the increased staff and the increased expenditure which the Government had now charged on the country.

MR. LANGEVIN said the Minister of the Interior had not yet explained this increase. The total amount of expenditure in 1873-4, was $35,556, according to Public Accounts, less the Minister's salary of $7,000; in 1877-8, it would be $45,720, so that the increase this year was $10,164. The hon. gentleman had stated the increased expenditure was caused by the Indian Department, which had a great deal more work than before, owing to the additional 50,000 Indians under its control. The Public Accounts of 1873-4 showed the expenditure for the Indian Department was $10,459; this year the expenditure would be $12,500, or $2,000 of an increase. In the Ordnance Department, the expenditure in 1873-4 was $6,210; this year $5,310 were asked, a decrease of $910. Deducting the decrease in the Ordnance Department from the increase in the Indian Lands Department, gave a net income in the two Departments, which, deducted from the total increase asked for, gave an increase of $8,617 for the Dominion Lands Branch. The hon. gentleman had not yet shown that the work of this branch had increased to such an extent as to require an increase four times as great as the Indian Branch. He had no doubt the hon. Minister would be able to give a more definite explanation than he had given.

MR. BLAKE said the item of land sales and settlements of claims connected with the North-West had, certainly, increased rapidly. In the Department of Justice, the number of land sales and grants were, in 1874, only 645; in 1876 they were 1,340; and in the first half of 1877, 1,326, or 14 less than the total of the preceding year. The hon. gentleman would observe the increase was very large. He spoke only of such items as were referred to the Department of Justice from his hon. friend's Department.

MR. MITCHELL: That was an extraordinary increase; an increase of four patents a day during the whole year.

MR. MILLS said there had been no increased expenditure since he entered upon the duties of the Department. The enquiry might have been very properly made last year, when there had been a great increase over the previous year. But, on looking at the year's Estimates, and seeing no increase whatever, except statutory increases, the hon. gentleman suddenly became alive to the fact that the expenditure was larger than it ought to be, because it was larger than when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, when the policy seemed to have been to see what could be deferred until the morrow. If the hon. gentleman looked at the record, he would see the correspondence had doubled since his time. Further, they had an extensive country which was being settled; they had to take the survey notes coming to them, and prepare maps and plans of all the work done on the ground. They had to furnish copies of those maps and plans to the various immigration offices, to be published with a view of furnishing to intending immigrants all desirable information. In this way, the work had been increased manifold. During the past year, it was more than double the work of 1876, and he had no doubt it would continue to increase. He had endeavoured to do, as long as possible, with the present staff, but the Surveyor-General had informed him that it was impossible to keep the work up without increasing it. However economically disposed hon. members might be, they would feel gratified to learn that the work in the Dominion Lands branch, in consequence of the settlement of the North-West, was, from day to day, rapidly increasing.

MR. WHITE (East Hastings) said he hoped the Department would issue the patents more rapidly, for, at present, patentees grew tired of corresponding with the Department. Several parties who had applied for patents several months ago had not yet obtained them.

He hoped the Minister, who employed so many clerks, would have patents issued promptly to parties who paid for them, and thereby much trouble and correspondence would be avoided. The increase asked for the Department was excessive.

MR. MILLS said that, if the hon. member would send him the name of any party who was entitled to a patent and had not received it, he would see it was issued.

MR. WHITE said he would do so to-morrow.

MR. MITCHELL said he was surprised to hear the statement made by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, that the policy pursued by the late Government was not to do anything to-day which could be done to-morrow. In regard to the Marine and Fisheries Department, over which he presided during seven years, not only was no such policy adopted, but the country recognized that the work was promptly and well done, and that without any of those outside aids which had now become so common in the Departments.

MR. MILLS said the Opposition did not ask for so many returns.

MR. MITCHELL said they had not so many reasons to ask for them, for the public affairs were then not so misconducted. He was not surprised at the increased expenditure, for a new head of each Department had, every year, to be taught his duties. Col. Robertson Ross travelled across the continent at the public expense, and shortly afterwards left the country. General Sir Selby Smyth had made the same trip, and was about to leave the Dominion. In regard to Ministers, Mr. Laird, when he had learnt his business, left the office of the Minister of the Interior. No doubt the present Minister was an able man, and perhaps more of a philosopher than a practical man; but he had to learn his business, and required more officers than if he understood it. It was said that the hon. Minister must have a trip to Manitoba; but he (Mr. Mitchell) did not object to that, for the principal part of his land duties laid in Manitoba. There had been a new Minister of Justice every year the Administration had held office. Mr. Dorion did not occupy the position long before he resigned it to accept a better berth. Mr. Fournier then assumed the office, and, having learned the duties, he retired to the Bench. Then followed the hon. member for South Bruce, who was not such a heaven-born Minister that he had nothing to learn, and he retired. They now had a Minister of Justice who had a good deal to learn, and that hon. gentleman would leave the office as soon as the people had a chance to reject him at the polls. The first Minister of Inland Revenue under the present Government was Mr. Geoffrion who, no doubt, rapidly learned his duties, and was a good Minister. Next came that celebrated man, Mr. Cauchon, and it did not take him long to learn the business. The present Minister of Justice had occupied that position and learned how to gauge a cask and provide against the Government being defrauded. The present Minister would, no doubt, learn the business as rapidly as possible. As Postmaster-General, they had had Lieutenant-Governor Macdonald, Mr. Fournier, and the hon. member for Sheffield, who at present filled the position. The hon. the Finance Minister had come down to the House annually and congratulated the country on magnificent deficits, and since he was a heaven-born Finance Minister, no change was required in his Department.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: You would like to have a change.

MR. MITCHELL: We are likely to have a change soon.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: You are not.

MR. MITCHELL said the change that would take place would be one which would sweep over the whole Ministry. In the Department of Militia, Mr. Ross was a pretty good officer, as far as they could judge, and was appointed Collector of Customs at Halifax, because his position in the Cabinet did not suit arrangements in Nova Scotia, and he was, therefore, well got rid of. Then there was the heaven-born War Minister, Mr. Vail, who was recently defeated; he would say nothing about the present Minister of Militia, because he was not in his seat. That system of change in regard to the Ministers in charge of the Departments, appeared to be the policy of the present Government, and if the general expenditure was increased, as also the salaries of the higher officers, it need not be matter for surprise.

MR. LANGEVIN said that, as regarded the work in the various Departments being in arrears when the present Government took office, such would always be the case. In the Department of the Interior, over which Hon. Mr. Campbell presided with great ability and satisfaction to the public, no doubt there would be some arrears, but they would be very small.

MR. MILLS said the hon. Minister had only been in charge a few months.

MR. LANGEVIN said that it was a new Department, and the work could not have been much in arrear when the present Ministry took office. In the Department of Public Works, over which he (Mr. Langevin) presided, there might have been arrears; and, with all the zeal of the present Minister, no doubt there would be arrears, as the increase which had occurred in the expenditure of the Department, could not be justified by the plea that work was in arrear when the Government took charge.

Vote agreed to.

9. Department of the Receiver-General $20,180

In reply to Mr. PLUMB,

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that, in preparing the Estimates for 1877-8, it had been the intention to promote one senior second-class clerk to the first-class; at any rate, power was taken to do so; but that intention was not carried out, and, by consequence, the gentleman who was voted for as a first-class clerk in 1877-8, remained in the position of a second-class clerk. No appointment had been made. There were three first-class clerks voted for in 1877-8, as the hon. gentleman would see.

MR. LANGEVIN: I see that, in 1877-8, there were three first-class clerks voted for, requiring the sum of $4,850.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Yes.

MR. LANGEVIN: One was dropped in 1878-9, reducing that amount by $1,450.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: The appointment was not made.

MR. LANGEVIN: So far as the money is concerned, we have $3,400 instead of $4,850.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Yes.

MR. LANGEVIN said that, in the second line below, provision was made in 1877-8, for a vote of $3,750 for three senior second-class clerks; and this year it was proposed to make four senior second-class clerks, with an increase of $1,550. Was this senior second-class clerk now appointed?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No. This appointment of a senior second-class clerk to the rank of a first-class clerk, he presumed, was intended, but, this intention had not been carried out as he had mentioned. No new appointment had been made. The number of clerks was left the same. It was simply a case of not carrying out a promotion.

MR. BLANCHET: In the accounts relating to contingencies in connection with the Receiver-General's Department, I see the item of $17.50 for repairing and cleaning cutlery. I wonder what that is for?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I cannot explain the item, but, if the hon. gentleman is particularly anxious about it, I will discover it.

MR. PLUMB: I see that last year there were paid for directories the very considerable sum of $15.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: That is not the item now under discussion. It ought to be discussed when we get to contingencies.

Vote agreed to.

10. Department of Finance..... $51,100

MR. CARTWRIGHT: The House will observe that the increase is $1,300, which is owing to the statutory increases of $50 each, granted to 24 or 25 members of the Department, who are entitled to them, and these, collectively, make up the amount here mentioned.

MR. BOWELL said that, in comparing this item with that of 1873-4, an increase of $5,640 was visible. The estimate for 1873-4, was $45,460. In addition to this, under the head of contingencies, he found, for extra clerks and extra work performed in this Department, an expenditure of $7,555. An extra clerk in the book-keeping branch; three extra clerks in the savings bank branch; two, in outlying Provinces; and two others received salaries of $730 each; others received $547, $196.50, $333.25, and others again smaller sums; the total being $7,555. These salaries, in some cases, equalled and even exceeded those of some of the permanent clerks, showing that these officers were kept on during the whole year. If they were necessary, why should they not make them permanent? Why should extra clerks be appointed with larger salaries than some of the permanent clerks received unless it was on the principle of endeavouring to show that the number of the clerks in the Department was reduced, the contingent vote being used to provide what should really be a part of the working staff of the Department. It was possible that the Finance Department required extra work to be done; but what he complained of was that there should apparently be a decrease in the permanent staff, while they found that work which should be done by permanent employes was thus provided for at an expense of $7,000 or $8,000. He wished to know whether this system was to be continued, or whether it was adopted for the purpose to which he had referred. It took no little trouble to find out what it did really cost to conduct any one of the Departments.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said there could be no object for this such as had been suggested for the simple reason that the contingencies were always taken together in the general statement of expenditure for Civil Government, and, therefore, no Minister could have any particular object in diminishing the expenses connected with the salaries of his Department, while, at the same time, he increased the contingencies. In this particular instance, he perceived that three or four officers had been appointed since that date to permanent employment, while the services of three or four of the remainder had been dispensed with. There was a considerable amount of extra work done that year; and there were also two or three vacancies in the Department for which estimates were taken and which had been filled up during that time. The total expenditure for the Department in that year was, he saw, $2,000 less than the amount he had estimated for. Some three or four of those gentlemen had supplied the places of officers who either had died or were removed from the service, and whose places he did not wish to fill until he was quite satisfied that these extra men were fitted to take their places. Respecting the Savings Bank Branch, and also the outlying Provinces, there was, he recollected, some considerable and an unusual amount of work required from the Department during 1876-7; and, if he recollected aright, one or two officers, in 1877-8, were added to the staff of the Department in order to enable them to get through with that work.

MR. BOWELL: If you look at the number of clerks in the Department as given by the Estimates, there is no increase. The number of clerks in 1877-8 was 40, and the number now, in 1878-9, is 40 also.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Yes, but there is an increase between 1876-7 and 1877-8.

MR. PLUMB said that the expenses of this Department, in 1873-4, were $47,000, and this year they were $51,100. There might be a natural rule of increase, partly owing to the increase of salaries by the Act; but he thought they should look closely into these statements, for the reason that they were told, two or three years ago, that the number of these employes was so great that the hon. the Premier was not able to get through them. Hon. members naturally supposed—because they had the utmost confidence in these statements; they always relied upon them; they knew they were not made for partizan purposes, or to prejudice the public mind in any way, but as a fair and complete statement of the actual facts—that there would be a very large reduction in these expenses. They had talked about these matters here and elsewhere, simply because they supposed, from the course and attitude taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite, there were large abuses to be corrected when these hon. gentlemen came into power, and they were the more particular in examining these small items because they wanted to know where these abuses were. They supposed, of course, that a model Reform Government, pledged to retrenchment and economy, would go further than mere words, and show their economical spirit by their acts. In every Department, however, since these hon. gentlemen had come into power, increases had been made, some larger and some smaller. Of course, this being the very last year of this Parliament, immediately preceding the appeal to the people, it was quite natural that there should be every attempt made to keep and cut down the expenses in order to make a fair show to the people. But, in spite of every effort—and they assumed that every cheeseparer effort had been made by the Administration—the Government were not able to make any reduction, consequently showing by their acts that their criticisms on the extravagance of their predecessors was not justified, for if it were then to exhibit extravagance in having the public buildings so crowded with officials that one could not walk through the corridors without stumbling over them, that must still be the case, but, nevertheless, large expenditures had been made by this Government in every direction and everywhere. The expenditure in every Department since 1872-3 and 1873-4, had been increased. About the latter year, there was some little dispute; and, for the sake of comparison, they were willing to take it after deducting from it those items which were put into the Public Accounts, and which, he did not think, belonged to that year. In the Finance Department it could not be said that any increase of work had taken place. Quite the reverse; the change in the system of making and consolidating loans under one head must have saved a great deal of trouble in the keeping of the accounts; debts due by different Provinces at various times, with different interests accruing thereon were formerly kept separately, but now the statement of finances had been simplified and reduced under Confederation. Having consolidated the various loans—the six per cents., the five per cents., the debt of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and the other Provinces—as they fell due, by one $55,000,000 four per cent. loan, which did not necessarily increase the expenditure, there ought to have been a great saving in the Finance Department as the result of the reduced work. When the Minister of Public Works wished to show the profligate extravagance of his predecessors, he appeared to the people and told them that the salaries in the various Departments would be reduced. That had gone forth through the press and from the platform. No one on the opposite side had failed to make use of that cry, which was the key-note given by the Premier of Canada. Instead of a reduction in the number of Civil Service employes under the present Government taking place, however, they found the corridors crowded with supernumeraries. Especially was this the case in the Department of the Finance Minister, who had charge of the public funds. They looked in vain for any change in the direction of retrenchment, regarding which so many fair promises had been made; they looked in vain for any evidence of that economy which had been promised in contradistinction to the extravagance of their predecessors—their corrupt predecessors as the present Government called them.

MR. LANGEVIN said it appeared that in the Finance Department a second class clerk was to receive a salary of $1,150, instead of $900, which had been paid him last year.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said it was intended that the gentleman referred to should take the place of the senior second class clerk who had died, and who had been paid a salary of $1,350. It was simply a case of filling up a death vacancy at a less cost.

MR. BOWELL asked if the eight extra clerks in the Department, each of whom received $730 a year, were still retained, and if they were to be kept on permanently.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said four of them had been appointed permanently to fill vacancies caused by resignation, death or removal; the others, with the exception of one, had been dispensed with.

MR. MASSON: Did they go in at the ordinary salary provided by the Civil Service Act?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Yes; they entered as junior second class clerks. Most of them were older than, and above the average of second class clerks, but they were appointed under the ordinary provisions of the Civil Service Act in such cases.

MR. MASSON: Does not the Civil Service Act provide that, when such appointments are made, the House must be notified of them?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Not in the case of Civil Service junior clerks.

MR. MASSON: Is it not a deviation to appoint a man as a second class clerk all at once?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No.

MR. MASSON: Is it not the intention of the Act that a person who goes in as a probationary officer, is put in the third class? I do not see why you can put him over the heads of third class clerks and appoint him as a second class clerk.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: If the person is fit for the work, it has always been the rule to do so. Third class or probationary clerks usually enter between 17 and 18 years of age, but, in the Finance Department and some others, we require men of skill and experience, such as are not possessed by persons who have entered in that way.

MR. MASSON: And you appoint these men over the heads of others?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I have had two or three third class clerks in my Department; but my hon. friend must understand that, for the bulk of the work of that Department, we are almost always obliged to appoint men of experience and capacity.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

MR. MASSON: Is that the plan usually adopted also in other Departments where such skill is not required?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No; there third class clerks are generally appointed.

MR. MASSON did not want to find fault with the hon. gentleman, but he thought that to permanently appoint men who, in the pressure of work during the Session, were engaged temporarily, placing them at the same time above the third class clerks, was a dangerous principle. It seemed that, no sooner did these extra clerks perform the work, for which they received from $730 to $750, than they were transferred over the heads of third class clerks in the permanent Civil Service. Such a system was liable to great abuse.

MR. BLANCHET: Will the hon. the Minister of Finance tell me if these extra officers have been continued since the 1st of July?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: They have; or at least four of them have been appointed.

MR. BLANCHET: But there is no provision for them in the Estimates of 1878-9.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I did not appoint new officers, but merely filled up vacancies in the Department.

MR. BOWELL said he could quite understand that men were frequently appointed to the Civil Service, third class, who had not the talent necessary to justify their promotion to vacancies which might occur through death, resignation, or removal; but he thought that the employment of permanent officers of the staff to do extra work was a system that ought to be deprecated. In the Finance Department he found that a clerk who received a salary of $50 for twelve months work, had, during the same period, been paid $243 for extra work. Now, it seemed to him that no clerk could do such an amount of extra work without neglecting his ordinary duties. He found, on looking at the report, that no fewer than eleven permanent officers were em-played to do additional work, besides the eight extra clerks. He was one of those who believed that Civil Service employes did less work, probably, for the money they received, than any other class of clerks in the country; he believed that, if they were made to work harder, and were paid in proportion to the amount of work they did, this service would become more efficient.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the gentleman to whom the $243 had been paid did a quantity of extra work which no one else could be spared from the Departments to do. The work was of a special character, and consisted of the preparation of the very accounts which were now being discussed; it required some special acquaintance with the particular Department, so that real assistance might be rendered to the chief officer. In answer to the hon. member for Niagara, he might state that the work of the Department, during the last four or five years, had increased instead of diminished, particularly in connection with the Savings Bank. The Savings Bank accounts had greatly increased in number, and extra work had to be performed in order to prevent the possibility of fraud. No increase had been made except those which were covered by the statutory increases to which he had referred.

MR. BOWELL said he called the attention of the House, five days ago, to the fact that this gentleman had sent down a memorandum stating that he had to put off making out a return required by the House until the summer vacation in consequence of the additional work imposed upon him, and so he would be robbed of his summer vacation to get out this return. If this gentleman was so necessary to the Department, his salary was much below the sum a gentleman of his ability ought to receive. He saw that it was only $850.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: The hon. gentleman will be gratified to hear that the gentleman in question has received his promotion.

MR. LANGEVIN said that, with regard to the first-class clerks, he saw there were to be three. Would the hon. the Minister of Finance inform him what rule was followed in the appointment of these clerks, and whether there was any rule stating how many first-class clerks, how many senior second-class, and how many junior second-class and so on, should be appointed, or whether it was left entirely to the Government.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said there was no fixed rule, and promotion depended on seniority and length of service. One of the senior second-class clerks had been promoted to a first-class clerkship, it being desirable to do so because of the status his promotion would give him. This was the only alteration required. They had no formal rule fixing the number of clerks in this Department, nor had he made any increase in it for three or four years. This was the only promotion of the kind given for a long time, and he did not think it was an unreasonable one under the circumstances.

MR. LANGEVIN said he did not say it was an unreasonable promotion; all he wished to ask was if there was no fixed rule by which the officers were classified. The officers had good ground for complaint when a promotion took place in their ranks of one of their number who had performed his duty no better, and was no more deserving, than themselves; but, if there was a fixed rule by which the vacancies were filled, they could not expect promotion unless there was a vacancy.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that many of the clerks that had been appointed had been appointed in entirely new branches of work. Whether the Government could venture to make a distinct rule with regard to promotion, he did not know. The matter had been debated two or three times by the Civil Service Board, and two or three reports had been brought forward upon it; but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Langevin) himself did not venture to put the report presented to himself into execution. The Government thought it better to leave themselves some discretion, and came to Parliament from time to time for occasional increases. There was a danger, as the hon. member said, that undue pressure would be brought to bear on Ministers for these first-class clerkships; but the hon. gentleman would see that they had not yielded unduly to that pressure up to the present.

MR. LANGEVIN said one way of guarding against this pressure would be to have a rule that the special authority of Parliament should be obtained in each case to create new officers. It might be said the money was voted in the Estimates, and this was sufficient authority. There was no doubt it was an authority to spend the money, nevertheless, he thought that, if the matter had to come specially before Parliament, in the shape of a Bill, it would act as a check against the increase of officers.

Vote agreed to.

11 The Department of Customs.....$29,200

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Every one of these are statutory increases.

MR. PLUMB said there was an increase in this item as compared with the year 1873-4. The hon. gentleman said there had been an increase, but he held that there was a very marked increase, an increase of something like 16 or 18 per cent. There was a large increase compared with the expenditure of the extravagant Government that preceded this.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that the total expenditure of 1873-4, in this Department, was $25,267.

MR. PLUMB: $24,835.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said $25,267 was the sum stated in the Public Accounts in that year. He must observe, however, that the point to which, in ordinary cases, attention was directed, was the increase as against the preceding year's Estimate, not the increase as compared with the Estimate of four or five or six years previously. He had explained on all these occasions that, under the operation of the Statute, there must be an increase of from $500 or $600 to $1,100 or $1,200, according to the size of the Department, as long as the present regulations remained on the Statute-book. If his hon. friend (Mr. Plumb), or any hon. gentleman, wished to repeal that Statute, or some part of it, he was not at all sure that he should feel it his duty to oppose him. As long as that Statute remained, they must pay these annual increases of $50, and he did not think hon. gentlemen could complain. These increases represented $1,400 or $1,500 per year, and that, multiplied by five, gave $7,000 since 1873-4, and that was the sum total of the increase that had occurred.

MR. PLUMB said it might be possible that this increase only represented statutory increases. It was well known that the business of the Customs Department had been declining for two years; there had been a very large deficit, growing almost entirely out of the decline of Customs revenue, which could not be a reason for an increase in the expenditure. Taking the reductio ad absurdum, they might suppose that the revenue fell off one-half, and still there was no reason for a reduction. The expenditure need not be permanent. He did not object to statutory increases; he thought public servants, particularly the humbler class, the under clerks, were very poorly paid. There were large items which might be discussed in connection with the Customs Department, such as travelling expenses of the Ministers, but he did not know whether he had a right to discuss even them.

MR. MACKENZIE: They come under contingencies.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said there had been no additional appointments since he came in. The only increases were statutory increases. The staff had been reduced because there had been, at one time, a commissioner as well as a deputy; that was now done away with. The work of the Department, instead of decreasing, had gone on increasing, because the statistics had been largely extended, as the returns showed that the increased statistical information was making the volume larger and the work more extended. There were no more clerks on the permanent staff now than then.

PRAYERS.

A PETITION.

SPEAKER'S RULING.

MR. SPEAKER: The petition of the Municipal Council of the Township of Temiscouata cannot be regarded as a petition to this House. After stating their case, they say they hope the Government will, during the present Session, cause a sufficient sum to be voted for the purposes they desire. If they asked the House to appropriate such a sum, it would be out of order; but, in this case, they express a hope; there is no prayer at all.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 48) To incorporate la Société de Construction du Comté d'Hochelaga.—(Mr. Baby.)

| 2. The Department of Inland Revenue..... | 26,767.50 |

MR. LANGEVIN said that, when they were considering the Department of Finance, he had stated that a new office had been created there—a first-class clerkship—and he had asked the Minister of Finance to be kind enough to tell the House on what principle the Government had gone in increasing those offices. He did not remember how the case stood previous to the advent of the present Government, but, so far as he could recollect, there was an organization of all the Departments, and the number of first-class, senior second-class, junior second-class, and chief clerks, and so on was determined either by the Act or by an Order in Council, and no Department could go beyond the number so determined without a special Order in Council and the matter being brought before Parliament. It might be that this extra first-class clerkship in the Department of Finance was needed, but he thought the principle was a bad one. The fact that they could state that the present year's salaries were not on the whole larger than those of the previous year did not answer this portion of the question, how it was that these new offices were created and that Parliament had not the opportunity of voting upon them, except in voting the money required for the Department. It might be that, in a Department where last year they had twenty-four officers, this year they had only twenty-three; but one of these had been a messenger with a salary of $600 or $700. He had disappeared and a new first-class clerkship was created, with a salary attached to it of $1,800. Instead of creating an office commencing at $300 and going to $800, they created one commencing at $1,800 and going to $2,400. It was therefore important for the House to have a chance of determining the policy of the creation of these offices. He desired to know on what principle the Government acted in regard to this matter. He did not say that new offices might not be created; the public service might require them, but he thought Parliament should have something to say before voting the money.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman was quite right in saying that Parliament should have that opportunity, and, as he knew, it was specially provided that no first-class or chief clerkships could be created without a special vote in the Estimates.

He (Mr. Cartwright) was afraid that it was not possible to fix the number of officers required in each Department, and it had been considered inconvenient to pass a new Act of Parliament every time a new office was necessitated. In the Department of Inland Revenue there had been no chief clerk proper. There was an assistant commissioner who, no doubt, ranked as chief clerk, but the officer who was accountant, and who was discharging duties which, in the several other Departments were always assigned to chief clerks, had only the grade of an ordinary first-class clerk; and it had been thought only fair to that officer, who had been a long time in the service without receiving any increase, having come to the maximum of his grade, and having regard to the duties assigned to him, to submit this change to the approbation of Parliament. The question raised by the hon. gentlemen as to whether this ought to be fixed by Statute was important, and deserved the consideration of the Government. He thought the hon. gentleman would see, on reflection, that the practical inconvenience resulting from it would be considerable. These votes were fairly carefully scanned, and the fact that no chief clerk or first-class clerk could be created without a special vote in the Estimates, operated as a check. He quite appreciated the relief which he and his colleagues would find in having this fixed fast and firm, but he was not sure that the consequent inconvenience would not be considerable.

MR. LANGEVIN said the hon. gentleman must see that the vote in the Estimates was nothing else than the vote of the salaries of the whole Department. The House was not called upon specially to vote for each of these new officers, and, therefore, it was quite illusory to imagine there was a special vote. The House voted the whole Department en bloc. The hon. gentleman knew by experience that the tendency was to have higher salaries rather than lower salaries. If the organization of a Department was fixed for one year, he did not see the great inconvenience of waiting the nine or ten months until Parliament met, and stating the increased number of officers required; and, if an increase was really required, Parliament would never refuse it. At present, the only way in which the House could control these items was by moving, on concurrence, to diminish the vote.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No doubt that could be done; but we do not propose to do it this year.

MR. BOWELL said the same complaint which had been made the previous evening existed with regard to this item. In the Estimates of 1873-4 the item for this Department amounted to $19,775, and this year it was $26,767.50, an increase of $6,992. He supposed the House was to understand that the $50 increase was the cause of this. Extra clerks were also employed in this Department, and they received the same pay as in the other Departments, leading one to the conclusion that these must be permanent officers. These salaries were $730, $723, $535, $428 and $328; amounting in all, for extra work and clerks in this Department alone, last year, to $2,950. He called attention again to this matter to show that, in every Department brought under the consideration of the House during the present Session, they found the expenditure for extra work and clerks running from $1,000 to $2,000, and in the Finance Department to nearly $8,000 for the year. He wished to know whether this was a new clerk or a gentleman who had been employed as an extra clerk.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that the gentleman who was to be promoted was one of the first-class clerks. As to the increase, the sum total expended in 1873-4 amounted to $23,773, or, deducting the Minister's salary, to $21,773. The difference of $5,000 was partly composed of several statutory increases, but it was largely due to the introduction of the Weights and Measures Act. One of these first-class clerks was required for the Standards Branch, involving the expenditure of $1,300 or $1,400; a third-class clerk was also required in this branch, and a mechanic, salary $680, in the Weights and Measures Department. Deducting the salaries paid to these three officials, and making allowance for the $50 increases, fully accounted for the $5,000.

MR. BOWELL: I quote from the Estimates of 1873-4.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I quoted from the actual expenditure, as detailed in the Public Accounts. The Estimates of that year were largely modified by Statutes passed in 1873, by which, amongst other matters, the salaries of deputy heads of Departments were increased from $2,600 to $3,200.

MR. BOWELL: After the Estimates were passed?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Necessarily so.

MR. BOWELL: Do I understand that the Estimates laid before us do not include the sums provided for the statutory increases?

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the Estimates never did or could contain any reference to expenditures incurred under Statutes passed during the Session they were brought down. For convenience sake, in various Estimates, it was endeavoured to show the sums chargeable to the Consolidated Fund, and, indeed, chargeable generally. The House knew that they did not take a vote for anything provided by Statute, but only for the various Departments together forming the Supply Bill; and, of course, hon. members were sometimes in danger of confounding together the expenditure incurred under the Supply Bill and the expenditure under the Statute; both were, of course, statutory, but yet they were different.

MR. BOWELL: Does the total amount include the whole of the work done in the Department?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Extra work is always provided for in the contingencies. I simply referred in my quotation to the sum exactly analogous to this particular vote.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue as to the working of the Weights and Measures Act during the past year; whether the complaints against the Deputy Inspectors had been as great and as numerous as in former years; and whether the proficiency attained by the Deputy Inspectors had been what might have been anticipated from greater familiarity with the working of the Act during the past year?

MR. LAURIER said he was sufficiently in possession of information to be able to say that the complaints made against the working of the Act had been far less numerous this year than last and the previous year. He believed that, as the officers became better acquainted with their duties, and as the Act became better understood by the people at large, complaints would be less numerous; moreover the Department had been anxious and had given instructions to the Deputy Inspectors to be as lenient as possible in the execution of their duties, and to enable the Act to work as smoothly as possible. From some quarters they had received complaints of late, and they had immediately given instructions to the officers to see that these complaints were at once remedied; but it was not to his knowledge that, within the last month at least, any complaints had reached the Department from any parties whatever.

MR. CURRIER said that only two days ago, a gentleman who was largely engaged in business in the county of Ottawa, had come to him and made a very serious complaint respecting the way in which the inspection was conducted, though he was not now prepared with the particulars of the case. Generally speaking, the Act had worked very badly; and this gentleman, in consequence of some blunder, by which his weights were spoiled, had been involved in the expenditure of $15 or $20.

MR. LAURIER said he thought this was not a recent case. At least no notice of it had been received by the Department; he knew that last fall, in November or December, complaints were received in the Department, regarding the manner in which the Act was carried out in the county of Ottawa, and, as the grievances were real, instructions were immediately given to have them at once redressed. If anything of this nature had since occurred, he did not think that any complaint had been lodged with the Department; at all events, it had not reached him. He would be obliged to the hon. gentleman if he would lay any such complaint now made before the Department.

MR. ROCHESTER said he was glad to hear this statement. Although no complaints had been made lately, he was sure that there were any number of them made in the county. Last year, in particular, they never reached the Department, owing to the simple fact that no redress was to be got there; but he believed that some redress would now be granted.

MR. YOUNG said he was glad to hear what had been said regarding this matter, because strong interest was taken in the subject throughout the country. The difficulties of the Inspectors had, he believed, now considerably decreased. It was only natural that, in putting an Act into force with which so many people were connected, difficulties would be experienced; and, now that the worst was over, from this time out, there would be far fewer cases of complaint than in the past. It seemed to him there were a few things which, if it were practical to carry them out, would conduce very materially to the success of the different Inspectors throughout the country in carrying out their instructions. One difficulty was found to consist in the fact that, almost immediately after the Inspectors got through their inspection for the first year, which naturally involved very considerable expense to many persons engaged in trade, another inspection for the following year was called for, so that the same person who had just had articles inspected, paying therefor considerable fees, was required by the Inspector, in some cases, to have the inspection again performed. It appeared to him it might be well, where a thorough inspection was made, to let possibly a couple of years elapse before re-inspection was considered necessary. He desired to bring this point before the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. Again, as he had understood it, persons who required to have their weights and measures stamped, had to take them to the officer in all cases. In some cases, at least, he thought the Inspector, particularly after the first year, might go to the persons' shops and inspect the articles on the premises.

AN HON. MEMBER: They do so now.

MR. YOUNG: Not in all cases; at least, such was not his information on the subject. If the officers could go to the different tradesmen and others who had articles to be stamped, this would conduce very much to the satisfactory working of the Act. Again, was it right that those who had their weights and measures stamped and pronounced correct, when these were re-examined and found correct, should be again compelled to pay fees? Of course, if it were decided to remit the fees, this would cause a greater charge on the public revenue, and, consequently, this was a question upon which he would not dogmatically pronounce. He knew that many persons, tradesmen and others, felt it more or less of a hardship to pay the fees again under such circumstances. He was glad to say that, on the whole, he believed the main opposition to the working of the Act had been overcome, and he expected, if the same conciliatory policy was pursued by the Inspectors as in the past, that this Act would in a short time be more generally understood and acceptable. He had not altered the opinion which he had expressed when it was first introduced by the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Tupper) that, under the old Act, very many of the weights and measures in use were entirely incorrect, and, while many persons were cheating the public, many others were cheating themselves, though unaware of the fact. He thought that, when this Act was put fully into operation and the difficulties were overcome, it would be found that it would conduce very materially to the advantage of trade generally, and that through it justice would be done between the different traders throughout the country. The points he had mentioned, if it were practicable to carry them into effect, would, he thought, conduce to making the Act much more popular throughout the country. He recommended them to the attention of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue.

MR. ROCHESTER said he would like to ask whether the Inspectors could take away scales though these were correct. Was it in accordance with the law that an Inspector could walk into a store, take a man's scales off his counter, and carry them away, telling the proprietor, merely, that he was only allowed to use one kind of scales which were made by a certain party?

MR. LAURIER said he thought it was according to the law as it had existed, and as it was framed at first, that the deputy inspector had a right to confiscate scales which were not in accordance with the regulations; but to do this arbitrarily was, of course, out of the question altogether. The officer was supposed to put the law into operation, but it was clearly beyond his power, and an abuse of authority, to say that only such scales as were manufactured by a certain person, were within the law. This could not be tolerated. When such a thing occurred, he considered it the duty of the party aggrieved, not only as regarded himself but also the Department, to report it at once to head-quarters, and have justice done. With respect to what the hon. member for South Waterloo had said, there was no doubt that they had had complaints to the effect that, last year, and perhaps this year also, certain officers were over-zealous in putting the law into operation. The Department had made every effort to prevent this whenever any such case was reported, and the officers had been instructed to put the law into operation, to do nothing more, and to do so as gently as possible. He believed that the second annual inspection was required by the law as it stood. There were certain cases where he supposed this was out of the question, but, whether the inspection took place every year or not, the officers were instructed by circular to go from place to place, and from municipality to municipality, in order to have the law put into operation. He did not conceive it at all desirable in cities for the officers to go from store to store to examine scales; but, in the rural districts, they were instructed to go to every place, and to give notice in advance when they would be present in such or such a place to see that the law was enforced. He did not suppose that the law could be put in operation in any other manner in the country, but, in the cities, the traders knew where the office was, and could easily go there for the purposes in question. The greatest complaint preferred related to the cost of readjustment. In certain places the officers had taken it upon themselves to have a mechanic go with them, and to force the people to employ this person to readjust the scales; but a month or six weeks ago a circular was sent from the Department warning these officers not to do so, and instructing them that people were quite at liberty to choose what mechanics they would employ; and since then, to his knowledge, no complaint to such effect had been received at the Department.

MR. WOOD said he was glad to hear that steps had been taken to remedy this cause of complaint. One of the great complaints made regarding the inspection concerned the enormous charges exacted for adjusting scales. He thought a scale of charges for such adjustment should be laid down. This was an important matter, and such action would do away, to a great extent, with the complaints. It was quite true that the inspector sometimes had a favoured mechanic who accompanied him and who made his charges. The simple adjustment of the scales in his own establishment had cost him $27, and, though he found this a very greivous charge, he was unable to prevent it.

MR. ROCHESTER: What is done with confiscated scales?

MR. LAURIER: I cannot answer that question, as, to my knowledge, only one has been confiscated; any one can see it in the Department, and I am sure it is not worth fifty cents.

MR. ROCHESTER: I know that scales which were used for years in business, and which were examined and stamped every year by the municipal Inspector, have been taken away from honest traders, and sold to brokers who get the benefit of this.

MR. LAURIER: Was this recently?

MR. ROCHESTER said it happened last year. He had asked, last year, whether there was not any redress or compensation, but no satisfaction was given; scales, weights, and measures were removed from stores by the officers without any ceremony whatever, and there was no redress. Twenty or thirty individuals had, last year, been treated after this fashion; and he would ask, was this to end there? The Sultan of Turkey or the Czar of Russia could not act in a more autocratic way than these Inspectors, who thought they could do what they liked with the honest trader. In Ottawa, the people had been obliged to send their scales to a certain blacksmith, as he could prove, and the examination of every scale cost from five to ten dollars. He could also substantiate that these scales had never weighed correctly since such examination, although they had been correct years before. He believed that the operation of this Act had cost one gentleman in Ottawa something like $500. It had certainly never been intended that the commercial community should be abused in this way. He would be able, before the Session closed, he could show that one individual, who lived in Hamilton, was authorized to make all the measures used in the Dominion of Canada. He could bring any number of witnesses to prove that the people were told that the use of no other measures would be allowed. He thought that the hon. member for Hamilton could give information on this point.

MR. WOOD: I never heard such a statement in my life before.

MR. ROCHESTER said that, as far as he was individually concerned, he was willing to render any assistance in his power to prevent the public suffering such a fearful abuse of power in this connection as had been sustained.

MR. DAVIES said that this Act was only recently—in 1876—applied in Prince Edward Island. He regretted to say he believed that, in some of their counties, the Inspectors were not yet appointed. When it was applied there, the local inspection had been dropped, so that, in one or two of the counties, there was now no inspection whatever. This must have been due to an oversight. In his county, the members asked to name a suitable individual for the position of Inspector, and they had done so. Some little delay had occurred, but the appointment was made last year. In his county, owing to its great size, being 100 miles in length, it was impossible for the people to bring their weights and measures to the Inspector, and it was absolutely necessary for this officer to pay periodical visits to distant parts of the county. He hoped that the Department would at once apply the Act to the different counties of the Island. They had now no inspection at all, in fact, and the residents were grumbling a good deal. The farmers were suspicious, thinking that the merchants cheated them. He disapproved of the Act altogether. He thought it revived a system that had died out. They knew that the wine measure prevailed in the United States, and confusion was introduced by the introduction of the imperial measure, which was only used to a very limited extent.

MR. POWER. The law recognizes both.

MR. DAVIES said that this was a great defect. Both measures could be used, and under such circumstances, how were country people able to guard against fraud? They should have one system or the other in force. The system should not be optional.

MR. FLYNN said that, in some districts in the county of Richmond, which he represented, the people had to bring their scales, weights, and measures a distance of six or seven miles to be inspected. This was a great hardship, and, besides, great expense was incurred under the present system. He trusted that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue would try to have this state of things remedied. Instructions should also be given to the Inspectors, stating that henceforth persons could choose their own mechanics to adjust their scales and do any work that was required in this respect. The first time the Inspector came there he brought another person with him, and then, contrary to law, the people were compelled, because he would not verify the measures, to purchase imperial measures from them. He hoped this would not occur again, and he was glad that he had had an opportunity of calling the attention of the Minister of Inland Revenue to the matter.

Mr. BERTRAM said there was a matter to which he also wished to call the attention of the Minister of Inland Revenue. In Hamilton, the makers of scales sold these scales to persons stamped, and charged extra therefor; but it had happened that, on their being tested by the local inspector in the neighbourhood where the purchasers resided, they were found incorrect, and these people were not only forced to pay double fees, but also the cost of readjusting the scales.

Mr. LAURIER said that, no complaint of that kind having come to his knowledge, he could not reply to the hon. member for Peterborough, but promised to be prepared with information when the item of Weights and Measures was under consideration.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he thought it desirable that both sides of the House should unite, so as to make the Bill as unobjectionable as possible. The difficulties at present caused by it were due to its indefiniteness in many respects. In fact, it was scarcely possible to find two inspectors in any part of the country who took the same view of the meaning of the Act, or the Orders in Council in regard to it; neither did they agree as to the amount of fees to be charged. If it were distinctly provided, as in the old Act of 1849, what the duties and fees of these inspectors were to be, it would go far to remove the objections which now existed as to the working of the present Act.

Mr. MITCHELL said he noticed that an item of $521.90 was put down as the salary of the Deputy Inspector for Northumberland—Mr. R. C. Cutler.

That being the county which he represented, he naturally made some enquiries regarding the duties performed by that officer, but from the month of December till the 5th February, when he was living in that neighbourhood, he failed to get any information. At length, he found out that Mr. Cutler had rented a small building, in which a few implements were placed; but these were by no means sufficient to enable him to fulfil his duties properly, and the appointment was a sort of laughing-stock to the people. He did not seem to have done any work in the county since his appointment, and the office seemed to be a sinecure. Now, it happened that, during a previous Administration, Mr. Cutler had sat in that House as a representative for the county of Kent, and was always available when wanted, and it was for this reason alone, no doubt, that this appointment was conferred upon him in the absence of a better. He (Mr. Mitchell) believed that Mr. Cutler would not shirk work if his appointment was a necessary or proper one, but, under the circumstances, some explanation was required. As the Minister of Inland Revenue was young in office, and might wish time, he would not insist on an immediate reply.

Mr. LAURIER said that, not possessing any information on the subject, he was unable to controvert what had been stated by his hon. friend. The officer in question lived at a place very remote from Ottawa, and, consequently, he was not prepared, at once, to answer the question put, nor could he, under these circumstances, even supposing he had been in office for many years.

Mr. MITCHELL said that, if his hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue had been in office for a few years he would, from his familiarity with district reports sent in by these inspectors, have been able to give an immediate answer.

Mr. LAURIER said, if the man had held the appointment since 1875, and had drawn his salary all that time without performing any work, he had not done his duty, and the matter would be investigated. Meantime, he might remark that, if such a charge had been made to the Department before, it would have received proper attention.

13. The Department of Public Works..... $49,780

MR. LANGEVIN asked if there had been any change in the office of assistant engineer.

MR. MACKENZIE said that Mr. Sipple, who had charge of the work in connection with the Lachine Canal, finding that his health prevented him from continuing his duties, tendered his resignation. He (Mr. Mackenzie) tried to persuade him to remain in the service of the Department, but, finding that his health was really impaired, for the time being, at least, Mr. Baillarge was deputed to take his place till he might be able to resume his duties. In the meantime, $3,000 was asked for in the Estimates, but very possibly it would not be expended. Mr. French, a second-class clerk, had been superannuated on account of his age, but had not been replaced by another, and, although the salary was asked for in the Estimates, in all likelihood it would not be required. The only person employed in the Department as an extra clerk was a young Frenchman who, by an accident he suffered while in the service of the Department, had lost one of his feet. It was with the view of making some provision for him that he had received this work, and probably he would be permanently engaged as he gave every satisfaction.

MR. LANGEVIN said he was glad that such a good officer had been put in the place of Mr. Sipple, whom, however, he would be glad to see receive his old position. The explanation given by the First Minister was perfectly satisfactory, and it was a good thing that employment had been obtained for the young man who was injured five years ago.

MR. MITCHELL said the Estimates for 1876-7 amounted to $188,44, while on looking at the Public Accounts for last year he found that the expenditure exceeded $55,000, and he wished to know if the expenditure had been increased by the passing of laws and statutory allowances after the Estimates were made.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. gentleman had evidently included in the Public Accounts of 1876-7, the Minister's salary of $8,000. If that was deducted from the $55,000 referred to it would leave $47,000 odd, which was not in excess, but within the sum voted for the service during 1876-7.

Vote agreed to.

14. Post-Office Department.....$87,850.

MR. LANGEVIN said he wished to call the attention of the Government to the increase in this Department, because it would appear that a number of new offices had been created, while smaller ones were dropped. In the Secretary's office, last year, there were six senior second-class clerks; now there were seven. Last year, there were three second-class clerks, whereas now there would be eight, while eight third-class clerks had been dropped. In the Accountant's office, last year, there were five junior second-class clerks, now there were nine; that was to say that four third-class clerks were to be promoted. In the Money Order office, last year, there was one second-class senior clerk; now the Government asked for three—two to be promoted from the junior class and one from the third class. In the Savings Bank Branch, there were five junior second-class clerks; now the House was asked to vote the salary of another third-class clerk. He did not say that these promotions were not well earned, and that the officers were not deserving—no doubt they were; but, on the other hand, here were thirteen new offices created—or, including two in the Finance Department and two in the Department of the Interior—seventeen altogether, without being submitted first to Parliament, and reasons given for such promotions being made. The system was a bad one, because the sanction of Parliament ought always to be obtained before the money vote was sought. He might remark that the expenses of the Post-Office Department were increasing year by year. No doubt this, in a measure, was due to the opening of post-offices in the various Provinces, but such expenditure should be controlled by Parliament. He did not know what the expenditure of the Department amounted to in 1873-4, not having the Estimates, but he was pretty sure that it was $21,000 less than now.

MR. MITCHELL said that, while the Estimates for 1873-9 amounted to $87,850, those for 1873-4 were only $66,410. When he stated, previously, that the expenditure in the Department of Public Works amounted to $55,000, the Minister of Finance said he had not included the Minister's salary. Now, if the Minister's salary of $8,000 was added to the Estimates of last year, the total expenditure would amount to over $56,000, so that the comparison he made was a correct one.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the member for Charlevoix was, no doubt, correct in stating the Estimate for 1873-4 at the sum he mentioned, but the expenditure for that year amounted to $82,991; so that, deducting the Minister's salary, the amount paid to the officials was, as nearly as possible, in round numbers, $76,000. That would leave an increase of about $11,000, no doubt, for the actual expenditure, taking the ascertained expenditure of that year against the estimated expenditure in this. He might remark that, in that year, the contingencies, which concluded a large amount of extra work, amounted to $47,549, which would be found to be in excess of the vote now asked for, as the contingencies they expected this year amounted only to $30,000 instead of $47,000. If the hon. member for Charlevoix would look at the contingencies for that year, he would find that a very great number indeed of extra clerks were employed. There seemed to have been twenty-two employed. He had no doubt they were required, and he knew that the work of the Department was very heavy and the sum paid ten more people was very small; but, if they put the two items together, it would be found that the sum expended, in 1874, in this Department, was as great, a little greater in fact, than the sum now asked to be expended.

MR. LANGEVIN said that, of course, if the hon. gentleman added the contingencies of 1874, it was only fair that he should add the contingencies of last year. For instance, when he spoke of the number of extra clerks employed in this Department in the year 1873-4, he should have referred to page 60 of the Public Accounts, 1877, and he would find that extra clerks were employed in that year.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Quite true; but not to the same extent.

MR. LANGEVIN said he was not sure of that; sixteen or eighteen were employed in that year, and there were a number of extra hands employed in other Departments. He knew this was not done every year, and he understood that, if they had eight or ten permanent clerks, they would still have to employ extra clerks for special work; for a short time. He did not think the hon. gentleman should include contingencies in this case, unless he did so with reference to the other Departments.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he had no objection to doing that. He had merely referred to the large number of extra clerks in 1873-4 to show that they formed a principal item in the contingencies of any year. This, and the statutory increases came to a large sum every year. The Government had also employed extra clerks for another reason. Once, a man was employed as an extra clerk, and it was utterly impossible to dispense with him, and, by employing temporary clerks, the gentleman had cherished a hope, perhaps, a foolish one, that they should be able to limit the number of permanent clerks.

MR. MITCHELL said he observed in the Estimates the salary drawn by Robert C. Cutler, an Inspector in the county of Northumberland, was $528.22, the $28.22 being for contingencies. This salary had never been drawn for years, and it was quite clear that no work had been done. He never knew that Mr. Cutler had been appointed until a short time ago, It appeared that Mr. Cutler had served the Government faithfully, and had been rewarded by receiving an office where he could obtain his pay for doing nothing.

MR. LAURIER said this was the first he had heard of such a charge; he would have it investigated.

MR. MITCHELL said that, with regard to postal facilities, the people in his county had not had justice done to them. With reference to the item under consideration, he thought it was a pretty extravagant increase, but he would not particularize with regard to it, the Department having established two way-offices in his county. This had cost the country nothing, but still he was thankful to the Government that they had carried out what he wished and made this concession to the people he represented.

MR. JONES (South Leeds) said the Department had done nothing in his county for two or three years. The county of Leeds was twenty-five miles wide, running back about forty-five miles from the St. Lawrence, and from where he lived there was no postal communication whatever with the back of the county, except by a circuitous route. Petitions asking for better postal communication with Gananoque had been sent in two or three times, and the last he forwarded some four or six months ago, and he received a letter in reply that the Department did not see the necessity for doing what was asked. Of course he felt rather annoyed at the receipt of this letter. From Gananoque, it took two days to send a letter to the back of the county, and four days to get a reply.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the Post-Office Department must receive a great many applications for mail accommodation requiring expenditure of money, and they must grant many and refuse many. He was sorry his hon. friend's (Mr. Jones's) application was amongst those to be refused, but he could assure him that the Department was disposed fairly to administer its affairs, so that the people of all parts might have the best postal facilities it was possible to afford. But it was evident that the line must be drawn somewhere to limit the expenditure, and they were obliged in many cases to refuse this year what they hoped to do next. There had been no partiality shown with regard to the places to which postal facilities had been extended, and there had not been a single expenditure connected with it, or a single increase in the expenditure of the Department that he was not able to justify on the floor of that House. He was prepared to defend his Department by showing that the increased postal facilities which had been afforded fully justified the expenditure. He protested against hon. members complaining of the extravagant increase, and, at the same time, calling out for further expenditures.

MR. JONES (South Leeds) said he was sure the people of this country would not begrudge any reasonable amount of money spent upon the extension of the postal system, but he was not so sure that there had been no impartiality whatever in the different counties. The old Province of Ontario had been neglected for the outside places of other Provinces, and within the last four years no change whatever had taken place in the large county of Leeds.

MR. DOMVILLE said the postal system in his own county (King's, N.B.) had had nothing done to it for five years, except perhaps some very trifling matter which had not come to his knowledge. He brought this up without any desire of finding any great fault, but he thought the postal arrangements of the district within a few miles from the city of St. John were very inadequate. He thought the head of the Department should consult with members of Parliament with regard to giving increased postal facilities to certain districts, for what object could the people have in sending a representative if he were not to be consulted on such occasions, and if he was not to give his views of the requirements of his county? The Department ought to receive his suggestions, although they might not always see their way to carry them out. There were places within a few miles of the large city of St. John getting only weekly and bi-weekly postal communication. During the past five years the population had increased and the county had developed in every way, and yet no further facilities for postal communication had been granted to it. Some of his friends had told him that they were going to get it now; that a certain Minister—he would not mention his name—had said that he was authorized by the Government to promise them increased postal communication. Whether this were true or not he was not prepared to say; he did not care if the whole Government were to go into his county. What he complained of was that his usefulness was in a great measure curtailed. He was not supposed to know what were the requirements of the county in which he lived, and was not allowed to take part in what was going on in regard to it. He hoped the Postmaster-General would see fit to do something for this county before the next election, and, perhaps, the hon. gentleman would give him the opportunity of suggesting where increased postal accommodation was most needed in the county, so that he (Mr. Domville) might do something that would strengthen his hands at the next election.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said that, so far as he knew anything of the Postal Department, no threat or promise had been made to injure the hon. member for King's in his election. He should be glad if the hon. gentleman would call upon him and point out to him the postal facilities that would assist him (Mr. Domville) in his next election, and he should be glad to receive any suggestions the hon. member felt at liberty to make, and any advice that would strengthen his Department and enable him (Mr. Huntington) to remain in his present position. Seriously, his Department would not think of denying postal facilities to communities unfriendly to the Government; but, as a rule, they would seek information and advice from those who were friends of the Government, and not from their enemies, who, it might be presumed, had no interest in guiding them to stronger positions as administrators of the public patronage.

Mr. ROCHESTER said he believed the county of Ottawa might have a very greatly improved postal service at a very small cost. He believed these offices would be self-supporting entirely, in time.

Mr. MITCHELL said that, in Northumberland, there was a populated district, twenty miles in extent, without a post-office. He calculated on getting a mail route established there, and he trusted the application he had made would receive favourable consideration.

Mr. BOURBEAU said he desired that the office of Chester East should be located in the village of Chester East, near the church, as being more convenient for and more accessible to the inhabitants of the parish. The Government had sent down its Inspector, Mr. Sheppard, who approved of the demands of the inhabitants, and left people under the impression that there would be a post-office established in the village. But his predecessor, the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Laurier), did not, he supposed, deem fit to urge the matter, because the postmaster of the locality was a friend of the Government, and might have suffered from the change. In this place, the postmaster was accustomed to put the letters in his pocket, and distribute them after mass on Sunday. But it was not only the manner in which the letters were distributed that was not quite proper. The residents had asked, during the past two years, to have a post-office provided for their convenience near the church; and certainly the Government ought to grant this reasonable request. In order not to offend the person who now held the office, and who was a supporter of the Government, and, also in order not to offend the Government, the people affected by this state of things had had the consideration to say: "If you do not wish to change the position of this post-office, at all events establish another in the village." He hoped that this demand would be granted. Moreover, the postmaster was the person who conveyed the mail to the neighbouring parish; he left his office on Saturday morning, and he brought the mail for the week to be distributed in the neighbouring parish; also bringing back the mail for his own parish, in such sort that, to a letter which left here on Monday for that parish, a reply was not received for fifteen days, although this parish was situated about twelve miles from the railway. He would be very happy if the hon. the Postmaster-General would grant him an interview for a few minutes, to give him all the necessary explanations regarding these matters, with the object of having the mails delivered in a manner different to that which was at present in vogue in this relation. A man should be employed to take the mails to the parish in question; and to do this would involve no more expense than was at present incurred in this connection. This would permit the residents of this locality to receive their mails more frequently than once a week; and replies could thus be obtained from that place in the space of eight days. He hoped that the Government would grant this parish the favour of having their mails three times a week, and, if not three, at least twice a week.

MR. ROBITAILLE said he had occasion, last year, to draw the attention of the hon. the Postmaster-General to the post-office in the parish of Nouvelle and Shoobred, county of Bonaventure, which had been removed from the vicinity of the church and the centre of the parish to a place some two and a-half miles distant, and he found that no change had been made. All that was asked was that, if it suited the convenience of the hon. the Postmaster-General to keep a post-office at such a distance from the centre of the parish, he, at all events, should locate a way-office near the church. In the second place, he desired to call attention to the fact that the same state of things existed in the township of Maria in which the post-office had been removed to a distance of a mile and a-half from the church, and placed in charge of a tavern-keeper. If this suited the convenience of the hon. gentlemen on the other side who strongly advocated the cause of temperance, he could do nothing but protest. He hoped, after all, that these gentlemen would reflect upon what they were doing in this instance.

MR. COSTIGAN said that applications had been made for increased mail accommodation from Victoria and Madawaska. So far, no satisfaction had been derived from any of these applications; they had failed to receive any favourable consideration at the hands of the Postmaster-General. He was aware, and the House and the country were aware, that hon. members on the Opposition side of the House could not expect to have much influence with hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. But he thought this was a question worthy of some consideration. The appointment of way-office keepers was a very small affair, the salary being nominal, and the appointment accepted, not for the emoluments expected from the Postmaster-General, which were merely nominal, but for the accommodation of the public. In such cases, he did not see why any political question should be introduced. The gentleman who occupied the position now occupied by the hon. the Postmaster-General had always consulted him (Mr. Costigan) on the appointments to be made, as one better calculated than most people to know the proper person to be nominated, but, since that time, a different mode had been pursued. While all applications which had come through him had thoroughly failed, many of those which had not come through his hands had met with the most favourable consideration. In his own county applications which had been made to establish new offices and new mail roads had been granted for new settlers, while old settlers who had been there for thirty or forty years had no post-office accommodation in their localities. He did not complain that these new settlements had too much postal accommodation; but what he did complain of was that, while the Government had the means and were justified in increasing those mail roads all through new settlements, they did nothing for the older inhabitants. It was only fair that the Government should do something for them, because, after all, his constituents contributed as much to the revenues of the Post-Office

MR. BOURBEAU.

Department as the constituents of the hon. the Postmaster-General himself. If he offered an elector an appointment in order to secure his vote, he would, probably, be unseated; but, after he was elected, the principle of that law, which was to secure the independence of the electors, was entirely set at naught by this fact: that the principle, as laid down in this House, was that the member who voted against the Government would obtain nothing. This was coercion. His constituents understood it, for some of them placed the matter in this way: that the member who did not support the Government could not do much for his constituents, in regard to these appointments. That principle that a member of this House who did not support the Government could do nothing for his constituents, although they contributed as largely to the revenue as other constituents, was a very poor principle to be acted upon, but it had been accepted and had been forced upon the people. He would ask leave to draw the attention of the Postmaster-General to a few cases in point. Application had been made on the part of the inhabitants of Green River, to have a way office established between Grand Falls and Edmondston, at Mr. Smith's. Green River was a tributary of the River St. John, which was settled on both sides. The road along the river intercepted the main road between Grand and Little Falls, about nine miles below Edmondston. The nearest post-office, from the point of intersection of these two roads, was either four miles above or four miles below. Settlers on Green River had to travel down the river till they got to the main highway, and then go four miles up or four miles down to get their letters. The people there did not ask to get a mail road established to carry their mails through their settlement. No, they said: establish a way office at the mouth of this road; but do not force us, after going down that far, to walk up or down four miles further. This would not cause increased expenditure. The mails passed by every day, up and down, and all that was required was the nomination of a postmaster to keep an office at that point. There was another place on the Tobique River where the people are interested in getting a post-office; the Scotch settlement was now so extensive that there was a road from it to the Tobique River. At a point where that road struck the river, through a settled country, there was no post-office for six or eight miles above or below that point. There was a mail road running up along this river. The settlers did not ask for a special road into their settlement; all they required was a way office at the point of intersection of these roads, at Mr. Brymer's, where they might receive and mail their letters. He could understand very well the establishment of new routes being objected to on account of the large expenditure; but, when these demands were so reasonable and entailed no additional expenditure on the Department, but, on the other hand, would greatly facilitate the transmission of letters and other postal matter, he thought, as the whole object of the Department was the accommodation of the public, they should be granted and carried out as effectually as possible. There was also on the River St. John a daily mail from Grand Falls to Edmondston, that continued by the Little Madawaska to connect with Rivière du Loup, on the Grand Trunk line. The settlement along the River St. John, above the Little Falls, was just as important and as flourishing as that below Edmondston. There they had only two mails per week, and asked for increased mail accommodation. He hoped these matters would be thought worthy of the consideration of the hon. the Postmaster-General, and that, in view of the little increased expenditure necessary to carry out the wishes of the people, and in view of the increased facilities which would result, that those people who had applied, for the last five or six years, for some of those changes, might find that their demands would be acceded to.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the Department did not consider political feelings in the matter of affording mail accommodation or the location of post-offices. He might go further and tell the hon. member what he knew very well, and what every man who voted against the Government knew well, that, in taking advice on these matters, they were more likely to be guided by the advice of their friends than of their enemies. He did not believe that, because people voted against the Government, they should not receive their letters. Inspectors were appointed, and, he might say, the general practice of the Department was, when an application was made, to refer it at once to the inspector, who made his report, which then came before him (Mr. Huntington) for consideration. If the Government should decide to make any important changes in the hon. gentleman's county, it might be a question whether they would adopt his views or the views of those who were entrusted with these matters.

MR. COSTIGAN said he did not wish at all that his advice should be acknowledged. He only drew attention to the marked contrast in the manner of treating those demands which had been made by persons outside the county and those which had been made through him. He only pointed out the great inconvenience which resulted from the Postmaster-General not acting on his advice but on the application of parties entirely outside the county.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he had no doubt they acted on the advice of the Inspector.

MR. COSTIGAN said he knew of a case of a small way-office, in which the member for another county was consulted, who knew nothing about the matter. He could not, of course, advise with him (Mr. Costigan), and he wrote to another party living in the county to make enquiries; this fourth party was to report to the outside member, the outside member was to report to the Inspector, who was to report to the Postmaster-General.

MR. BOWELL said that, no doubt, what the hon. the Postmaster-General had said was quite correct, only he did not go quite far enough. He should have said that, when application was made from a constituency represented by an Opposition member, it was referred to the gentleman who had opposed the member at the last election, and if he reported favourably, it was reported to the inspector. It might not be invariable, but it was the general practice.

MR. HUNTINGTON: A very proper practice, at any rate.

MR. COSTIGAN said, when applications were made to him, he forwarded them to the Department; he never made a recommendation, but simply forwarded the letters, merely pointing out the fact that these people occupied positions which merited some little attention, and if they obtained the positions, he was quite satisfied.

MR. BOWELL said he knew that the principle on which the Government acted was "to the victors belong the spoils," and a member of the Opposition would be very foolish to expose himself to a refusal. As long as his constituents approved his conduct, that ought to be sufficient recompense. He would again direct attention to the Estimates. The hon. the Finance Minister had endeavoured to show he was wrong by adopting the same rule of comparison. He (Mr. Bowell) had stated distinctly enough that the Estimates of 1873-4 were £66,410, and this year $87,850, a difference of $21,440. The hon. the Finance Minister had made a comparison, by referring to the actual expenditure for 1873-4, which, he said, he obtained from the Public Accounts. He (Mr. Bowell) had not those to refer to. But, on reference to the Public Accounts, the actual expenditure, last year, amounted to $88,239.40, in which sum was included the salary of the Postmaster-General. They were now asked to vote $87,850, which did not include the Postmaster-General's salary, adding which, gave $94,850, which they were called on to vote at present, in connection with Civil Government in this Department—a considerable increase over last year's expenditure. On referring to the Contingencies last year, in addition to this $88,239.40, there were no less than seventeen extra clerks employed in that Department, obtaining salaries higher than the permanent clerks, which ranged from $750 down to $500. These extra clerks were in a much better position than the permanent clerks, many of them obtaining $730. In addition to the seventeen extra clerks, there were no less than thirty-three persons who had been employed to do this extra work in the different Departments during the year. It would be much better to put those extra clerks under the head of Civil Government, and let the House see exactly what the office cost to manage. It would be a saving to appoint permanent employés instead of the extra clerks at $730.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the hon. gentleman was quite right in indicating that these men should be on the permanent staff, and, with few exceptions, they were on the permanent staff, or had been dismissed. It had always been a practice of the Department that men first appointed on the staff were often appointed and sometimes retained on contingencies, which had this advantage: that they could ascertain the capabilities of a man before permanently employing him. These clerks had all been made permanent or had been dispensed with. Extra work made it impossible that they should not be obliged, occasionally, to have some more men.

MR. ROULEAU said he was extremely surprised to hear the hon. the Postmaster-General affirm before the House that he (Mr. Huntington) had never used the advantages which the Department placed at his disposal to serve the political interests of the party at present in power, and he was the more astonished because this assertion was completely destitute of foundation in fact. In support of this pretension, he would content himself by citing a few instances which had occurred in the constituency (the county of Dorchester) which he had the honour to represent. When the Lévis and Kennebec Railway was opened, this company obtained the contract for the carrying of the mails in the district of Beauce which included the electoral district of Dorchester. The shortest, the least costly, and, consequently, the most advantageous way for the residents of the parish of St. Isidore, who were interested for the conveyance of the mails for this place was to leave them at St. Henri, thence to be taken to St. Isidore. During at least two years, a directly contrary course had been adopted in taking the mails from St. Isidore to Ste. Marie, in the county of Beauce, whence they were conveyed to St. Isidore; that was to say the mails were, without any useful object, transported a distance of eighteen miles, thus causing considerable delay, and this was done with the sole view of encouraging a political friend, to whom was given this contract, without any tenders having been asked for. After repeated requests, his constituents had at last obtained justice, and those mails were now left at St. Henri to be conveyed to St. Isidore. The hon. the Postmaster-General had, at the outset, invited tenders for this contract and all was well so far; several tenders were put in, but, as soon as it was perceived that those which were offered by certain of his friends in the county of Dorchester were the lowest, the Post-Office Inspector of their division was ordered to withdraw the request for tenders, and the contract was given to one of the warmest political partisans of the hon. member for Lévis for the sum of $400, although one of the other tenders did not exceed the sum of $250, a difference of nearly one-half. Last year he had brought before the House the papers relative to the mail contract between Ste. Marie and St. Bernard, where it was again seen that this contract had not been given to the lowest tenderer. It was true that the difference was not very great, but the principle which should govern these matters was always the same, and should certainly not be violated. He now asked whether this was not purely and simply political favouritism, used to the detriment of the public funds and of tenderers who submitted their offers in good faith?

MR. ROBITAILLE said the hon. the Postmaster-General seemed to be under the impression that the Opposition found fault with him because they were not consulted in the appointments he made. As far as he (Mr. Robitaille) was concerned, the hon. the Postmaster-General was very much mistaken. The hon. the Postmaster-General was very unfortunate in the selection of his adviser in the county of Bonaventure. He (Mr. Robitaille) had occasion, last year, to point out to the hon. Minister the fact that, on the eve of the local election, the mail contract, which would have expired in six months, had been arranged by private agreement, without calling for tenders, and this had been done on the eve of the local election in the county of Bonaventure last year. He (Mr. Robitaille) was astonished to hear the hon. gentleman express publicly that he would never use his office as a political engine; he was too pure. Yet here was a case in point which he could not deny.

MR. HUNTINGTON: Will you explain the case?

MR. ROBITAILLE: It was the case of David Kerr, who carried the mail from Grace Point to Paspebiac. He had been a Conservative at first, and, on obtaining the contract, supported the Liberal candidate at the local election.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he knew nothing about David Kerr's application except that it was suggested to him last year by one of his officers that D. Kerr was an excellent contractor and that there was a large petition signed by people on each side of politics in his favour, and he had been told that he was an excellent Conservative. The hon. gentleman said not now. He (Mr. Huntington) had no objection to his being a good Reformer now.

MR. PLUMB said he was surprised to hear the hon. the Postmaster-General disclaim all idea of using for political purposes any of the influences of his office, and in the next breath, state that he would not take the advice of, for instance, the hon. member for Victoria, who had been elected by very large majorities for seventeen years, and who must know something about the wants of his county. The rule, as laid down by the hon. Minister, was that he intended to make political use of his office. There were in all the Departments, large charges for extra clerks, and he was glad to find the hon. the Postmaster-General allude to the necessity of having extra clerks to prepare returns. There were not clerks enough; they ought to get a few more. There was a plentiful lack of information, which must come down from the different Departments. He had asked for a return eleven months ago and he had not yet got it. He had asked for it since several times, each time circumscribing his enquiry, in order not to throw too much expenditure on the Government in the way of extra clerks, as he wished to do everything in his power to facilitate the economy of which they had heard so much, and still he received no return. Early in this Session, he again asked for the return. The hon. the First Minister, with that urbane and courteous manner which characterized him, informed him that he did not propose to attend to business of that sort until the Address was passed. He (Mr. Plumb) then sat down in all humility. After the Address was passed, he again renewed his request. A gentleman from the Public Works Department came and wanted to know all the information concerning his request which he (Mr. Plumb) had given before, and which must have been on file. He (Mr. Plumb) told him he was willing to still further circumscribe the limits of his enquiry. The enquiry was in respect to the purchase of iron by the Government, other than railway iron, or railway spikes.

MR. DYMOND: I call the hon. gentleman to order.

MR. PLUMB: Have you anything to say?

MR. DYMOND: The hon. gentleman is out of order. He is discussing a matter not in the slightest way connected with the subject before the House.

MR. PLUMB. I am discussing the question of the employment of extra clerks, which is not at all out of order. I say that, up to this time, I have not heard anything of that return. If you pay such a large sum to extra clerks, they should be able to perform the duty satisfactorily. It might result in bringing down to the House some important information, perhaps not so important as it would have been a few months ago, but still important, as showing matters of which, I presume, the House will be glad to be informed. I hope the Government will bring down that report without delay.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Might I ask the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government if he is going on with other business than Supply after recess, or if he is going into Supply?

MR. MACKENZIE: I think we will go into Supply, and will likely remain there all summer.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess

MR. PLUMB said that, although large demands were made on the public chest for supernumerary clerks, of which there appeared to be a large number in the Post-Office Department, they seemed to be ineffectual to perform the duties expected from them. There had been great delay in bringing down the returns relating to the Department. The only important return he had asked for had not yet been submitted; and this was a case not only for criticism, but for moderate complaint. He understood that he had unconsciously given offence in some remarks he made before recess; but he had only pursued the course which, as a member of the Opposition criticising the item in question, it was his duty to follow. When returns were wrung out of reluctant Departments, they did not contain the information desired. No doubt other hon. members would support him in the statement that, where there was a large staff employed as supernumerary clerks, the work was imperfectly performed; and, in regard to the returns, much reform was needed.

MR. BORDEN said he desired to call the attention of the hon. the Postmaster-General to the case of a contractor in Manitoba. A man named Evans had the mail contract from Boyne River to Headingley, a distance of 40 miles. In 1876, while performing his contract, Evans was overtaken by a severe snowstorm, which caused him to be unable to obtain shelter until the following morning. He was severely frozen, and when conveyed to the hospital, it was found necessary to amputate both legs. Last winter, he (Mr. Borden) called the attention of the hon. the Postmaster-General privately to the matter and he asked for a report upon it. This written report had been made and the Department was now in possession of a report confirming the facts stated. He desired to ask the hon. Minister whether any provision would be made for that case, which was a very unfortunate one, as the contractor was discharging his duty when overtaken by that misfortune. He called attention to the case because the unfortunate man's father lived in his (Mr. Borden's) county.

MR. RYAN said he was personally acquainted with the facts of the case, and he hoped, if it were possible, some provision would be made for the unfortunate man who was not only poor, but deserving. He desired to call the Postmaster-General's attention to the fact that, in 1875, the postmaster at Westboro', in Marquette County, resigned; that Geo. Moffat, keeper of the Hudson Bay Company's store, was appointed, and that liquor was sold in the store, which was contrary to the post-office regulations. A petition had been presented, signed by all the people using the post-office, except three or four, asking that Mr. Smalley, of the firm of Smalley & Champney should be appointed. Either liquor should not be sold in the post-office, or the office should be removed to other and more suitable premises.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the general policy of the Department was not to encourage the holding of post-offices in buildings where liquor was sold; but some settlements were so remote and the circumstances so peculiar, they were unable to lay down cast-iron rules. With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for King's, N. S., (Mr. Borden), he might say that the circumstances which he had recited were as distressing as they appeared to be to the hon. gentleman. When his (Mr. Huntington's) attention was first called to the subject, he felt it necessary to have information from an officer of the Department, and since then he had received a report from the Inspector setting out the very distressing circumstances under which the poor man lost his limbs. The report had only been before him two or three days, but he must tell the hon. member who had referred to the case, that he apprehended some difficulty in dealing with it on account of the fact that the poor man was not, in any sense, an employé of the Department, and it would not be easy to find a precedent for the action proposed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he desired to offer a few remarks in regard to the exercise of patronage and advice being tendered the Government by hon. members of the Opposition, in matters affecting their counties. He was convinced that "Blessed are they who expect nothing, for they shall not be disappointed." He would not be disappointed if he did not receive anything or his constituents. He quite believed in the doctrine that, when a man had not confidence in the Government, he could not expect to receive any benefit. He was also strong in the opinion that, if a member of the Opposition were asked to give advice to the Government, he should not give it. In 1848 or 1849 when the Baldwin-Lafontaine Government was in power, Mr. Baldwin wrote him (Sir John A. Macdonald) a note stating they were about to issue a new Commission of the Peace for the counties of Frontenac and Addington, one of the constituencies in which he represented, and asking him to give advice to the Government. He wrote Mr. Baldwin thanking him for his kindness, and saying that, as he did not support the Government, he could not properly tender him any advice; and he found afterwards that the principle he then laid down was the correct one. When that was the case, an additional responsibility was thrown on the Government, just in the same way as when a prisoner has no counsel the Judge became counsel for him. So, when a county was represented by a member who could not conscientiously support the Ministry of the day, it was the duty of the Government to see that the interests of that constituency were not neglected or sacrificed for party purposes. He quite understood that the system in England and in British colonies was that the Government could select, as they always did select, their own supporters for office. As a general rule, no doubt, either of the great parties would furnish a sufficient number of persons for the appointments.

MR. BOWELL enquired whether the extra clerks, to whom attention had been previously called, had been placed on the permanent staff or discharged, so that there must either have been a great number of vacancies during the year, or since the return was made out, which were filled out of these 17 extra clerks, or they must have been dismissed—the one or the other. He trusted that next year's accounts would verify the statement of the hon. the Postmaster-General.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he was happy to be in a position to assure the hon. gentleman that his gratification would be real. Ever since he came into the Post-Office Department he had sympathized with the view which the hon. gentleman expressed—that the Estimates ought to show the permanent clerks of the Departments. He had done his best to reduce the staff of supernumeraries. They had not dismissed these persons, but dispensed with their services when their work was done. When vacancies had occurred, instead of importing new men into the Department, he had placed some of the supernumerary staff in their places; and he had sometimes taken the opportunity, when vacancies occurred outside, to supply them with men on this list, as far as he possibly could, in order to reach the desideratum which the hon. gentleman advocated.

| 16. Department of Marine and Fisheries..... | 26,000 |
| 17. Treasury Board, Office.... | 4,100 |
| 18. Departmental Contingencies... | 165,000 |

MR. LANGEVIN said he would like to know on what principle the division was made.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that the several items were given in detail on page 17.

MR. BLANCHET said he would like to know why a great difference was made between the contingent expenses of the Department of Agriculture and other Departments.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that, for a very considerable time back, the expense of the Patent Record had caused the keeping of a considerable number of extra clerks, who had been on the staff for several years. Feeling that there was very considerable force in the view taken by the House as to the propriety of having these clerks represented in the accounts, he was quite disposed on this occasion, at any rate, to accede to the suggestion of the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) and restore the vote there to the ordinary amount of $8,000, and bring down in the Supplementary Estimates an additional vote for the Patent Branch for the number of extra clerks. No great saving would thus be effected, he was bound to say; but he agreed that the principle advocated by the hon. member for Compton was correct. He had communicated his view to the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, who, on consideration, concurred with him; and he therefore would restore it to the previous amount of $8,000, and take in the Supplementary Estimates a vote for the extra number of clerks required. He had found that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pope) was right in stating that these clerks had been employed for a very considerable time, and he was also probably right in believing that the continued expenditure for the Patent Office left no reasonable ground for any expectation that their services would be dispensed with. He would make this item $159,000, on the understanding that $8,000 would be appropriated to the Department of Agriculture; and in the Supplementary Estimates he would provide for the number of clerks who ought to be permanently on the Patent Branch. There would be no difference in the total vote, but it would be placed differently.

MR. POPE (Compton) said he was very glad to hear the statement of the hon. the Minister of Finance. He would again urge that, as these extra clerks were very young, and as they received more pay than a good many officers who had been in the service before them, it was unfair to these other officials to put them on the staff at their present salaries. These young men should have gone in as probationary clerks, and worked themselves up, as the others had done. To put them in at once with salaries of $750 would be to do a great injustice to the others. This had been a cause of great complaint, because it gave the latter no encouragement. The former should not be put on with higher salaries than those allowed to third-class clerks. He would now beg to rectify a statement made during the recent debate on the Budget by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). The hon. gentleman, referring to the immigration question, said:

"That in 1873, 99,000 immigrants landed in Canada, and 49,000 removed to the Western States. In 1874, 80,000 landed and 40,000 went to the United States. But in the year ending June, 1875, the first year of the present Government, 36,000 landed, while only 9,000 left for the United States."

His impression on hearing the hon. gentleman discuss this question was that he (Mr. Ross) conveyed the idea that this number of people left Canada for the United States. If so, the statement was entirely erroneous. These people came through to go to the United States, having bought through tickets in Europe. Their destination was the United States, and, consequently, this had nothing to do with people leaving Canada for the United States. Apart from that, the figures were incorrect. They would bear in mind the hon. gentleman said that, in 1875, the total number which left for the United States was 9,000. He had looked over the figures carefully, and he found that the total number which arrived in Canada was 35,319, while the total number that remained in Canada was 18,047; hence the number that went to the United States was 17,272, instead of 9,000, which made a very important difference. The hon. gentleman also said:

"And in 1877, 32,716 immigrants came to Canada, and 5,640 removed across the border."

This was incorrect. The total number of immigrants that came to Canada in 1877 was 23,532; the total number that settled in Canada was 15,323; and the total number that went to the United States must, of course, have been 8,209; so that, in place of more remaining, in proportion, about the same number remained in this country during those several years. He thought it right to correct this matter now, since the statement had gone to the country, as he had not spoken during the debate in question.

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman show me his figures?

MR. POPE: I would rather not, now. I will, however, send you Mr. Ross's figures if you wish them.

MR. MACKENZIE: I will take another opportunity of calling the hon. gentleman's attention to them.

MR. POPE: I will take the earliest opportunity of discussing the whole matter for the hon. gentleman's benefit, and for the House; and then the hon. gentleman shall have everyone of these figures.

19. Stationery Office for stationery..... $13,000

MR. LANGEVIN: Will the hon. gentleman explain the reduction made in this vote?

MR. CARTWRIGHT said they had not spent quite as much as had been voted under this item in 1876-7. The expenditure then was $13,000 or $14,000, and he thought that they could get on, at any rate, with this estimate. The hon. gentleman, probably, knew that these two votes: Departmental Contingencies and Stationery, were generally put together; he would observe that the items of $175,000 and $20,000 had been lumped together as $195,000, while the total expenditure in that year was $157,479; leaving a total balance, below the estimate, of $37,520. They thought that they could probably get along with $13,000, under these circumstances. The stationery vote was distributed over several Departments. It was not put together in one place.

Vote agreed to.

MR. POPE.

20. To meet the possible amount required for new appointments by an extension of the staff or any other change..... $10,000

MR. LANGEVIN: How much of this was spent last year?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Apparently not more than $2,700. For a considerable time a vote of $75,000 was carried, but it was brought back to the old amount of $10,000. In 1876-7, apparently, about $2,720 was spent. It was one of those items which had been kept at a liberal figure; and, though he did not think the amount asked would all be spent, he thought, as the other items had been cut down closely, it would not be wise to stint this one.

Vote agreed to.

IV.—ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

21. Miscellaneous Justice (North-West Territories) $20,000.

MR. LAFLAMME said the amount asked was the same as that granted last year; it was statutory.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: If it is statutory, why do we vote upon it?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: What is this money for? We have no details.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: It is too general.

MR. LAFLAMME said it was wanted for purposes similar to those enumerated in the Accounts for last year.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Accounts referred to contained a number of items which were not likely to crop up again; they were exceptional items of expenditure.

MR. LAFLAMME said it was necessary to provide for contingencies.

MR. MACKENZIE mentioned that a large sum was expended in the punishment of those engaged in the Indian massacre at Cypress Hills. That expedition alone cost over $10,000.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said that should have been charged along with other unforeseen circumstances.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was a proper item under the heading under which it was placed. Last year only $5,000 was spent, but a large sum of money might have to be expended for conveyance of prisoners in the North-West Territory, and, while there was no necessity to spend money that could be saved, it would not be judicious to withhold the vote, as the item was one that could not be done without.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, as only $5,000 was spent last year, there did not seem any necessity for voting such a large sum as $20,000. The proper course to take would be to calculate the expenditure for several years, under this heading, and strike an average as the sum to be asked for this time. There was no evidence before the Committee of Supply that such a large sum was wanted, and it had always been laid down as a principle in that House that there must be a justification for, not a mere probability of, such expenditure before the estimate was voted.

MR. LAFLAMME said the items under this head comprised not only the North-West Territory, but ordinary cases connected with the administration of justice which would otherwise fall under contingencies. The year before last, the total expenditure in that Department amounted to $14,000.

MR. PLUMB said that more than 80 per cent. of that was for an exceptional affair—the Cypress Hills murder case.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the matter was discussed before the estimate was put in, and this fact, which deserved the consideration of the Committee, was pointed out. Although we had established our Mounted Police stations, the magistrates had not yet fairly got settled at their posts, and the criminals, who, by the better administration of justice in that territory, had increased in number as far as apprehensions went, had, along with witnesses, to be taken great distances for trial, thereby causing great expense. As Minister of Finance, he had no objection to this item being reduced from $20,000 to $10,000 or $12,000, because, at this particular juncture, it was for his interest that the probable expenditure should be as low as possible, but as, at the present moment, there was a tribe of Indians known for their hostile propensities on the frontier, with whom it might be necessary for the Mounted Police to take vigorous repressive measures, it might not be advisable to refuse the vote.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the expenditure connected with the Mounted Police was not taken out of this Department.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that was perfectly true, but expenses incurred by the Police, in the conveyance of prisoners and witnesses, came out of this Department.

MR. BLAKE explained that this vote was first proposed after Confederation. Originally, it was only $10,000, but as, after the expedition to Cypress Hills it was deemed that there should be more elasticity, a vote of $20,000 en bloc was proposed. There could be no doubt that the rapid increase in the population of the North-West districts would cause a much greater expenditure, and, until a Province was organized there, a considerable annual charge would devolve on this Government. Under these circumstances, it would, he thought, be imprudent to propose a reduction of the estimate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, after the explanation which had at length been vouchsafed, he would not push his objection further, and, if his friend the hon. the Minister of Justice had given the information when requested to do so, he would have been perfectly satisfied.

Vote agreed to.

22. Travelling Expenses of Stipendiary Magistrates in North-West Territories $4,500.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD asked how many Stipendiaries there were in these territories now.

MR. LAFLAMME said there were two—Mr. Richardson and Mr. Ryan.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Have they separate jurisdictions.

MR. LAFLAMME: No; they interpenetrate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Where is Mr. Ryan?

MR. LAFLAMME: He is temporarily at Fort Pelly.

Vote agreed to.

23. Circuit allowances, British Columbia..... $15,000

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : How much does the expenditure amount to ?

MR. CARTWRIGHT said $6,287 had been expended, but he was afraid there were other bills to pay.

MR. BLAKE said that, last Session, a temporary Order in Council was passed making temporary regulations with the view of moderating these extra charges and directions for the payment of certain amounts were given to the registrar after being checked by a local auditor, but that sum was found inadequate to meet expenses actually incurred. He hoped, however, that some not inconsiderable economy would be found to have taken place in this respect. He remembered one item which appeared up to last year that had now been changed. The Registrar of the Court, acting as Clerk of Assize, accompanied the Judge on circuit, but it was quite clear that this expenditure should be borne by the local Administration, it not being a circuit allowance. There were several other matters respecting the allowances, but, at present, they were matters of correspondence. He thought that, on the whole, his hon. friend the Minister of Justice would be able to save $2,000 or $3,000 in his Department, but not much more.

MR. LAFLAMME said the Judges of British Columbia had made a large claim for contingencies, and it was under the consideration of the Department how far their claims could be admitted.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD : I suppose that, under the circumstances, we cannot ask what the allowances are.

MR. LAFLAMME said British Columbia was such an extensive country that the expenses of travelling, according to the report of the Judges, was simply enormous. The amount of their claim had not been passed at present, but only a portion advanced ; but the question must be determined. The right hon. gentleman must understand how difficult it was to have a tariff of allowances for such a circuit, because the Judges had to buy horses, and had to have a whole posse of servants to attend them.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said one of the Judges had stated that it cost him $1,500 to go into Cariboo. What principle could the Department apply to ascertain if that expenditure had been incurred ?

MR. LAFLAMME said the Department was aware that the travelling expenses in this Province was very great.

MR. LANGEVIN said he did not know whether $15,000 was required for the general items. They could not travel in British Columbia, especially from Fraser River to Egeria, for any amount similar to what would be expended in travelling over any other part of the Dominion. The difficulties were very much greater, the country not being settled, and the Judges would have to pay a great deal more for horses and people to attend to them. It was stated the other day that for a service which cost $200 here, the cost would be $600 there.

MR. BLAKE said there was no doubt of it ; but, by a little judicious pressure, an economy might be effected in the number of circuits. A circuit costing $3,000 had had one or two cases tried before its Court, all of which ought to have been tried before a County Court Judge or Stipendiary Magistrate. The Local Government and the Legislature fixed the circuits, and this Government paid the expenses. There had been, in his opinion, a too liberal provision of circuit accommodation, but at these remote places, where there were criminals to be tried, they could not be kept many months in gaol waiting for the Judges. He thought the Department would reduce the number of circuits, unless some larger change should take place in the administration of justice, and some of the Judges on the Island of Vancouver should be sent to remoter places in that section.

MR. LANGEVIN said he considered this a good suggestion. The Judges at Victoria had had a long experience of the country, and would be able to perform the duties well. It would, perhaps, be advisable to appoint one more Judge, in order that the distance travelled by any one Judge should not be too great.

MR. BUNSTER said that when they got the railway to the North-West, the circuit allowances would be much reduced.

MR. MITCHELL said he thought the expenses entirely too large, and beyond the resources of the country. $15,000 was entirely too much for the territory of British Columbia, with its population of 19,000 people.

MR. BUNSTER said he did not think it was too large, compared with $120,000 for the Mounted Police in the North-West. It must be remembered that the people of British Columbia were law-abiding people, and the great ability with which the English law had been administered by these Judges had increased the respect in which English law was held. He was surprised that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mitchell) considered the vote too large.

Vote agreed to.

- 24. Circuit Allowances, Manitoba..... $1,500
- 25. Precis Writer of the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court..... $1,900

MR. MITCHELL said he would like to know how this additional expense arose.

MR. LAFLAMME said it was one for which gentlemen opposite were responsible.

MR. MITCHELL said he was surprised at this statement, when he remembered that the Supreme Court was not established until after the hon. Minister's party came into power.

MR. LAFLAMME said the Civil Service Act was passed by his hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald), and the increase that had been made was the statutory increase.

MR. MITCHELL said the Government had taken credit for having passed the Supreme Court Bill, and, to his mind, it was a very expensive morsel. And next summer they would have an immense number of election cases coming up to be tried, the result of the corruption on the other side; and, when they knew that some of these law suits cost $10,000, he trembled at the expenses to that Department.

MR. MACKENZIE: The Court will make a great many of you tremble.

MR. MITCHELL said it would make a great many tremble, and it would prevent many gentlemen from coming forward to contest the constituencies, because they knew the dreadful cost of such suits.

Vote agreed to.

- 26. Clerk of the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court... $475
- 27. Senior Messenger of the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court..... $500

MR. MITCHELL said he thought there was some inconsistency in the senior messenger being paid a higher salary than was paid to the clerk. He did think that the clerk of the highest Court in the land ought not to receive $25 a year less than the messenger in the same Court.

MR. LAFLAMME said the clerk was a junior clerk, and entered this office at the salary fixed by the Statute, and had received the statutory increase. The messenger was a senior officer who had been transferred from the Department of Justice. There were three messengers in this Department during the reign of his right hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald). It was also necessary to have a crier or tipstaff to the Court, and the senior messenger had been appointed to this office, so that he filled both offices without receiving any additional salary beyond the statutory increase.

MR. MITCHELL: Still the clerk of this Court, a high functionary, gets $25 less than the tipstaff who stands at the door.

MR. LAFLAMME: That is not the only clerk; the clerk has $2,600 per annum.

MR. MITCHELL: I thought he was the only clerk. I take back what I said; I had no idea there was such an extravagant salary as $2,600 paid; I do not see it in this estimate.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he considered the expenditure of the Court was very large. The salary of $2,600 for the Registrar was very large, considering that the Court did not sit often or long.

MR. MITCHELL: And does not decide very quickly.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Registrar, fancy, is reporter as well.

MR. LAFLAMME said the précis writer was the official reporter, but the Registrar was responsible for the publication of the reports.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then the précis writer gets $1,900 as reporter to the Court?

MR. LAFLAMME said the précis writer also acted as registrar in the absence of the present registrar. The précis writer was a most important appointment, and he was sure the salary was not more than he was entitled to.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it appeared to him that the clerk was rather a supernumerary.

MR. BLAKE said he was responsible for proposing this officer. The two high officials, the registrar and précis writer, were appointed by the Statute, which also provided for "the appointment of such other officers as may be required." For some time they proceeded with those two officers, but it was afterwards found necessary to appoint one clerk, and this clerk was appointed in the lowest grade in the public service. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) had the opportunity of objecting at the time the appointment was made, when the nature of it was fully explained to Parliament. He admitted there was one objection taken when this vote was proposed, by his friend the hon. member for Frontenac, who exclaimed loudly against the smallness of the sum paid, because he said it was impossible to secure an efficient man at a small price.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Provided he was wanted.

MR. BLAKE: said this officer had not been appointed until it was found absolutely necessary to have him. There were filings going on constantly in that Court, which the registrar could not be expected to attend to, consistent with his other duties. Causes involving no less than four million dollars had been instituted in this Court, which had been given the petitionary right of jurisdiction, during the past twelve months. There was no Court with which he was acquainted, whose staff, considering the number of duties it was called on to perform, was so small in numbers and low in rates. The Court, in its functions and by its constitution, had to deal with causes coming from the Province of Quebec, as well as the other Provinces, and it was necessary to provide an officer who should be a French advocate as well as one who should be an English barrister. In the registrar they had been fortunate enough to secure a gentleman who was a French advocate as well as an English barrister, Mr. Cassels. The time to object to these officers and the salary was when the Act was passed and the salary proposed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Is there not a charge for reports? Are these charges refunded?

MR. BLAKE said there was nothing to refund out of the cost of production. Nothing went to the officers.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said there was great delay in getting out the reports; a year elapsed after the decision was given before it was published, and the profession had to wait for these reports to find out the decision of the Supreme Court. There was also another important grievance, there was no translation given in these reports. Some of the decisions in the Province of Ontario were published in French, and some in the Province of Quebec, in English.

MR. BLAKE said he quite concurred in the opinion of the hon. member that there was delay in bringing out the reports, but it was a new enterprise; the Queen's printer was not accustomed to law reports, and there were many obstacles in the commencement which would not continue subsequently. The last number was now in press, which would complete the first volume of five hundred pages.

Mr. LAFLAMME said it was impossible the reports could be translated. The language of the Court was English, the judgments English, and the reports were English, particularly the cases in Ontario, which were altogether English. In Lower Canada there was no difficulty on this score, as every barrister there knew both languages. It was only the judgments of some of the Judges who gave their judgments in French, which were published in that language.

Mr. MITCHELL said the statement of the hon. member for South Bruce that objection should have been taken when the officers were appointed, was not a correct one. The Government had come down, backed by a majority of seventy to eighty, with a scheme for the Supreme Court and with a staff of officers to carry out the details, and the Opposition had to look on and submit. It was not necessary, because they had voted last year in ignorance of the necessities of this Court and upon the responsibilities of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the same vote should be repeated this year, when it was found the staff was larger than was required. The Supreme Court was a very expensive luxury, but, if it did its work effectually it would be borne with. He would cite the case of his hon. friend from Charlevoix which was expedited very quickly and at an enormous expense; while, in the case of the hon. the Minister of Justice, which had been before that Court nearly a year, no decision had been given. If his election should be annulled, the decision would have no effect, as there would be a dissolution of Parliament at the end of this Session, and the hon. member would have, in the meantime, unjustly retained his seat.

Mr. BLAKE said the case was only argued in the end of January last, so that it could hardly be fairly said to have been twelve months before the Court.

Mr. MITCHELL said when the argument took place was not the first time the case came before the Court. It had been generally given out that the judgment would have been pronounced in the month of January, and it had not yet been pronounced.

Mr. BLAKE said that surely the hon. gentleman, as an independent member, did not desire the Government to approach the Supreme Court and invite them to expedite their decisions or the reverse. The common sense of the House would condemn the proposal of the hon. member.

Mr. MITCHELL said that was not the point he had made. He held that it was the duty of the Government, under the exceptional circumstances, to have called the attention of Parliament, the masters of the Supreme Court, to the fact of the delay.

Mr. PLUMB said that the election law was claimed by the Government as one of its great reforms, entirely forgetting the fact that there was an Election Bill passed in 1873. By a clause inserted in the law, a member having taken his seat during the sitting of Parliament, could not be unseated until after the close of the Session, whatever were the circumstances under which he had obtained it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the vote covered an amount for travelling expenses, and yet the Court had not commenced operations.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the proclamation establishing the Court had been issued, its organization completed, and it would commence its operations with the opening of navigation. The vote was very small to establish a Court of such importance.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had the greatest respect for the learned Judge who had been appointed Judge of the Maritime Court of Ontario, and, no doubt, he would perform the duties efficiently if he had sufficient time, but that learned Judge was already overworked in the discharge of his regular duties as County Judge for the county of York. There was, however, a more serious objection in principle; it was a wrong step to take a local Judge and make him a Judge of the Maritime Court having jurisdiction all over Ontario. He had contemplated that the Government would have selected one of the Superior Court Judges for the position, the Maritime Court being a Superior Court in itself. It had been rumoured that Mr. Justice Moss was to be appointed, and afterwards the name of Mr. Justice Patterson was mentioned. It would have been more fitting, the Maritime Court being a Superior Court having large jurisdiction, had the appointment been given to a Superior Court Judge, and not to a local Judge, however respectable he might be.

MR. BLAKE said he was responsible for the appointment of the Judge of the Court. He did not perceive much force in the objection taken to the appointment of the Judge because he happened to be a County Court Judge. The important question for the public was, whether the Judge was a competent person to discharge the duties. The Judge was as competent as any one in Ontario, no lawyers having made themselves familiar with maritime law, as their practice did not lie in that direction. The right hon. member for Kingston had suggested some other eminent judicial functionaries who should have been appointed. The House could not discuss that question; at the same time, he quite agreed as to the perfect competence of the parties named. He thought, however, there was more objection to assigning special duties which might interrupt the discharging of the joint duties of Judges to judicial functionaries, who were members of a tribunal composed of several Judges, than to appointing a Judge who was a sole Judge. The County Court Judge of the county of York, although he was Judge of a very extensive district, was assisted by a junior Judge, and those hon. members who were acquainted with the energy of Judge Mackenzie, would feel satisfied he would discharge the duties efficiently, and he would not have accepted it unless he had been satisfied in that regard. Moreover, a large portion of the work would be performed by surrogate Judges, whose appointment was contemplated in various centres. If a collision occurred, it was necessary that the evidence should be taken while the crews were on the spot, otherwise the demurrage might amount to more than the damage, and therefore he supposed the hon. the Minister of Justice was engaged in considering at what ports the appointment of surrogate Judges would be required, who would relieve the central Court from some portion of its work.

MR. PALMER said the vote proposed for the Ontario Maritime Court was $500 in excess of that for either the Court at Halifax or St. John.

MR. LAFLAMME said that this vote was just to establish the Court.

MR. PALMER said that the Judge of the Court of St. John received nothing for travelling expenses. Besides, the registrar of the Court there had to buy the seal; and he was not paid a cent, except by fees. This had always been the case, as he knew perfectly well. This had been a subject of complaint ever since he had been in Parliament, but it had never been listened to, though the moment an Ontario Court was started, $500 were wanted, even before the Court was opened.

MR. LAFLAMME said that the ite was a very comprehensive one. Sundry expenses were connected with the Maritime Court of Ontario, with reference to seals, the Judge's travelling expenses, the Law Statutes, Court books, and law stamps, for which this $500 was required. They could not impose on the registrar the duty of buying the seal of the Court.

MR. PALMER: I do not object to $7 for that.

MR. LAFLAMME: As to travelling expenses, if they do not travel no such expenses will be paid; and, if the Judge at St. John is not obliged to travel, he is not entitled to any such expenses.

Vote agreed to.

31. Salary of Registrar of Vice-Admiralty Court, Quebec $666 66

MR. MITCHELL said he had, last year, called attention to the system of administration of law in vogue at this Court. It was the most cumbersome and troublesome system that could possibly be devised, as he knew from practical experience. The hon. the Minister of Justice had said that this Court had been established for half a century; but he believed that its establishment dated almost from the conquest of Canada. Very few changes had been made in it for a century, and it was one of the antiquated institutions which had attached to it the barnacles and fossils of a century. He thought that the hon. the Minister of Justice should look into the matter. The system of administering the law in connection with the Admiralty Laws of the country was such that it had become almost a discredit. If the hon. gentlemen opposite, in another year, retained their present places, he trusted that they would turn their attention to the establishment of a system of legislation which would, in this regard, give more speedy justice, and at a cheaper rate than was at present possible at Quebec.

MR. PALMER said he thought that the Vice-Admiralty Court at St. John had been in existence as long as New Brunswick had been a colony. The system of carrying it on was either in the interest of the country, or it was not. He entirely agreed with his hon. friend the member for Northumberland, (Mr. Mitchell) that the mode of procedure in vogue in this Court, was antiquated and useless. He was delighted when his hon. friend the member of the South Bruce introduced the Bill establishing the Maritime Court, because he was in hope that it would be made to supersede all those Courts. The late Hon. Mr. Hogan, who was the Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court at St. John, had no equal in Canada for ability, and yet he had received no salary, except in the shape of some paltry fees. Besides, not a dollar was provided to secure a Court-room. The matter had been discussed at a meeting which he had himself called, as President of the Bar Association, and it had then been decided to memorialize the Government to get, at all events, some place for the holding of the Court. He was not quite sure whether this duty fell on the Dominion or Local Government, and, accordingly, they had memorialized both the Governments in this respect. Some sort of a Court-room should be provided, and the registrar and officers of the Court should receive some pay. This grievance was felt the more because these services were so liberally paid for at Quebec, where the registrar got very large fees,—even enormous fees—and the marshal, also obtained very large fees, independent of his salary. He appealed to the Government to show there was any necessity for paying $3,000 in addition to the large fees paid in the Court of Quebec, as against $600 at Halifax and St. John. It could not be owing to the trade of the ports, for, he thought, taking the year round, the trade of the one would not exceed that of the others very much. He apprehended that the business done in the Court was not very much different.

MR. BLAKE: Oh yes.

MR. PALMER said this possibly might be the case. Common law lawyers were disinclined to go where civil law was administered; and they all knew that, to persons practising in Quebec, the mode of procedure there was very much more familiar than it was to common law or even equity lawyers. This might be the reason why more cases went before that Court. There was as much occasion for litigation of that description at St. John as at Quebec; and, whether there was or not, the present state of things was not right. If there was more litigation, the registrar and marshal would have more fees, and it could not be right to pay this sum of money, making discrimination, as it were, in favour of one Province as against the other. Judge Waters had complained to him before he came away that he really had no place to hold the Court; and, in consequence of this fact, the great fire had swept away every vestige of the records of the Court, which had been kept in the registrar's office. He protested in this Parliament, and in the face of the country, against this sort of procedure.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the hon. gentleman must know that the salaries of these gentlemen had been fixed long ago. This was the first time he had ever heard the efficiency of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Quebec censured. The late Hon. Judge Black was a man who had no superior in the Province of Quebec, at least, and the present Judge was certainly a man of the highest standing and of the greatest learning, and would, he supposed, compare favourably with the Judges of any other Province. As to the law, it was the English law which was in force in the Province of Quebec in that Court. Complaints about this Court might have been previously whispered, but he had never heard of them. He had never known of a complaint having been made to the Government on the ground of want of accommodation for the Court at St. John.

Mr. PALMER: Are you quite sure of that?

Mr. MITCHELL said he had made complaints last year regarding the efficiency of the Court at Quebec, which the hon. gentleman would have heard if he had been in his place.

Mr. BLAKE said he understood that the hon. gentleman's complaints did not respect the manner in which the Judge of the Court discharged his duty, but the efficiency of the system, the absoluteness of the machinery employed, the practice and the localization, etc.—matters which were beyond the purview of both the Judge and of this Legislature. The hon. gentleman knew that the Courts of Vice-Admiralty at Quebec, Halifax, and St. John were not Provincial or Federal, but Imperial Courts, established under the

Mr. PALMER.

Imperial Vice-Admiralty Act, and the very first step to be taken to introduce improvement in this respect, by Canadian legislation, ought to be to address the Imperial authorities, with the view of making arrangements for the removal of their jurisdiction altogether. They must either get the Imperial authorities to amend their practice and establish Imperial Courts under improved practice, or to remove their Courts and substitute for them their own. The hon. gentleman had, last Session, certainly reflected severely, and, as far as he could judge, not without reason, on the machinery the learned Judge was called on to administer, and which he could not amend. He might say to his hon. friend from St. John, as the hon. gentleman stated that the Vice-Admiralty Court of his Province was of very old duration, that the learned Judges who occupied seats in these Courts, had been from time to time appointed for many years; but at no time had the Imperial or Local Governments provided accommodation or salary for them. The Judge was paid solely by fees, and he was obliged to find his own Court-room. This was the state of things until a comparatively recent period, when, owing to the remonstrances of the late lamented Judge, the Hon. Mr. Hogan, his hon. friend from Kingston determined to vote the salary of $600, and to this extent an improvement was then effected in the position of the Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court at St. John, beyond what it had ever occupied before. Something was to be said with reference to the amount of business done. He felt it his duty, when he was looking into the matter, to get some return of the fees, which were of very trifling amounts, both in Halifax and St. John—$40 or $50 or something of that kind.

Mr. PALMER: Are these the Judges' fees?

Mr. BLAKE: Yes. The amount of work done was very different because, whether owing to the disinclination of the practitioners to enter the Court where such law was administered, or to the unsatisfactory character of the machinery, the work was very light.

The hon. gentleman probably knew better than any one else in that House how large a business was done in the Vice-Admiralty Court of St. John and might probably give them information on that point. He had heard that the work thus imposed upon the learned Judge did not add very greatly to his other onerous duties. With reference to what had been said regarding the want of accommodation, he would suggest that the Court-rooms of large counties be placed at the disposal of the gentlemen appointed as Judges in the Maritime Court. He would not for a moment suggest that a room should be rented which would only be occupied a few days in the year, nor would he propose the erection of a new building. There was not, indeed, the slightest necessity to incur expense if the suggestion he made was adopted. There was an anomaly in connection with the Quebec Court he admitted, and to which he wished to call attention: it was that the registrar and marshal at Quebec received a salary over and above their fees, while other officials of the same description elsewhere were remunerated only by fees. That anomaly he would like to see discontinued.

MR. MITCHELL: So should I.

MR. BLAKE said he strongly held the opinion that some change ought to be made with due regard to the existing interests of these offices.

MR. MITCHELL said he did not argue that the Judges at Quebec were not efficient men, because he really knew nothing about them. What he held was that these Courts were either a benefit or they were not. If he remembered rightly the salaries paid at Quebec were not in accordance with the Imperial standard. The Imperial legislation with reference to all Courts in Canada was the same, and much depended on the legislation of that Parliament as to whether they should continue to pay a salary to the Judge at Quebec or not. If so, he thought it right that the Maritime Provinces should be placed on the same footing. So long as the enormous expense connected with proceedings in the Vice-Admiralty Court was continued, very little business would be transacted at St. John, whatever might be the case at Quebec. That expense could be done away with without an Act of Parliament, for, if the Imperial Parliament itself entirely regulated the Vice-Admiralty Court, the salaries could be fixed or the fees determined by it. There was no reason why the Government should not constitute Maritime Courts with a proper mode of procedure. The present mode was a failure of justice; witnesses, some of whom were probably not very intelligent, were examined, not in open court but secretly in the absence of the parties concerned, and, without the evidence being sworn to, the case was decided, not by a jury, but by persons who might be influenced by outside opinions. For his own part, he would like to see the business of the Vice-Admiralty Court incorporated with that of the County Court to a large extent, by which means it would be subject to better regulations than at present. In the County Courts of England, cases in which as much as £1,000 was involved were, he believed, decided, all cases going beyond that sum coming under the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty. Still, if these Vice-Admiralty Courts were to be continued, and if this Dominion was to pay for its officers, these Courts must be utilized. His hon. friend had suggested that an Act of the Local Legislature would be required in order that Civil Court-room might be used for the purpose of the Vice-Admiralty Court when necessary. To do that, however, would be useless, for, even during the present year, it had come to his knowledge that a Local Court had actually to be adjourned because there was no room.

MR. BLAKE: Get larger accommodation.

MR. MITCHELL: That may be; but it would not do for a Vice-Admiralty Judge to walk into one of these rooms already filled to its utmost capacity and take possession.

MR. BLAKE: But it is not to be understood that we should build one.

MR. MITCHELL: We do not want perhaps to build a Court; what we require is a room in which the proceedings of the Vice-Admiralty Court could be held. To go back to the principal point, however,—if such an anomaly as that pointed out by my hon. friend, in reference to Quebec, does exist, why not sweep it away? Of course we cannot do that now, but I would ask the Minister of Justice to place in his Supplementary Estimates a sum equivalent to $500 in order that a Court-room may be provided.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Vice-Admiralty Court, as far as the two Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were concerned, were in a very unsatisfactory state. The localization of the system was its worst feature. Nothing could be done out of Halifax, as far as the Province of Nova Scotia was concerned; and he was informed that the Province of New Brunswick was in an equally unsatisfactory situation. If a collision took place, for instance, near Sydney—which was about 200 or 300 miles from the city of Halifax—between an American and a British ship, the former might be at the city of Boston and beyond the reach of our law before anything could be done in the matter. Thus no redress could be obtained, and justice miscarried. The fault, however, was one which could be remedied, and he hoped that, before Parliament again met, something would be done on behalf of those two Provinces. When the Bill for the Province of Ontario was passed last year, the hon. member for South Bruce told them to bide their time so that they might profit by the experience they would gain by watching the operation of that Bill.

MR. MITCHELL regretted that, since the attention of the then Minister, last year, was called to the grievance, he did not take some means to remedy it. He hoped the present Minister would endeavour to do away with the expenses incurred in connection with the Admiralty Courts of the Province of Quebec.

Vote agreed to.

33. For the salary of one Stipendiary Magistrate or County Court Judge, to provide, if necessary, for the vacancy created by the death of the late A. P. Bushby, Esq. $2,425

MR. MITCHELL.

MR. PALMER said he wished to make some observations regarding Judges and judicial salaries without the Dominion. It was well known that, before Confederation, the cost of living in the colony of Prince Edward Island was very low, but, on becoming a part of Canada, the price of living was assimilated to that of nearly all the other parts of the Dominion.

MR. BLAKE: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that raising the duties has increased the price of living?

MR. PALMER said the taxation placed upon the people had increased the price of living, but he admitted that, by Confederation, a great part of the country had become more prosperous. He wished to call attention specially to this: that, while the British North America Act provided that Judges appointed should be paid from the Dominion Treasury, those in Prince Edward Island and some other colonies were not paid one-half of the sum received by Judges of the same class in Ontario and other places. In New Brunswick, it must be admitted, a sum of $1,000 was received directly from Canada and a further allowance was made by the Local Government. Now, he protested against that unfair method of paying Judges, because it seemed to imply that the gentlemen appointed in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were not so efficient as those in Ontario, or that the proper administration of justice in these places was not of so great importance. Whenever this matter was brought before the Government, the reply made was "such was the salary paid by the Local Government." That, however, was no answer; the administration of the law before Confederation was a very different matter from what it was now.

MR. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say these were the salaries paid by the Local Government?

MR. PALMER: I mean to say the answer invariably given to me in reference to this matter was that the salaries paid by the Local Government of Prince Edward Island were lower than those paid by the Local Government of Ontario. I do not know whether that was the case or not.

MR. MACKENZIE: I can tell you it was not.

MR. PALMER said he had been informed by his hon. friend from Kingston and his friend from South Bruce that the salaries paid in the small Provinces were much less than those paid in the large ones and that the same proportion had been continued. With reference to St. John, he knew the sums paid to the Judges were inadequate, and living in no place in Canada was so dear as in that city; consequently, four-fifths of the legal gentlemen lived outside the city altogether. The Judges, too, were treated as though they were of inferior standing to those of other Provinces. He trusted something would be done to remedy this great wrong.

MR. McDONNELL said it was very anomalous that the Judges of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick should receive so much less than Judges of the same grade in other Provinces. It was true that the Province of Ontario was much larger in extent than either of those Provinces, and that there was more judicial business to be done; but then the business was divided amongst a great many more Judges. The Judges of the Maritime Provinces had just the same responsibility, of the same character, in every respect; and the fact that they were paid before Confederation less sums than Judges of the Upper Provinces, had nothing to do with the question. When those Provinces entered Confederation, they expected all the officers of the same grade in the Dominion would be paid alike; and there was no sound argument whatever to show why men of equal ability, equal learning and understanding, with an equal amount of duty to perform, should not be similarly paid.

MR. DAVIES said the Judges of the Supreme Court of Prince Edward Island were constantly asking for this matter to be brought before the Government. He was of opinion that they were underpaid, and when he spoke to the Minister of Justice with regard to it, he was told that Prince Edward Island, in proportion to the population, cost more for the judiciary than any other part of the Dominion. It was also argued that the salaries given at present were one-third greater than they were before the Island came into the Union. No doubt these objections had a good deal of force, but still it seemed a great anomaly that their Judges should be paid such small salaries in proportion to the Judges of other Provinces. Their Judges were only paid $2,500 per annum, and the cost of living was as great there as in any other part of the Dominion. He did not think a Judge could properly maintain his position upon such a salary. Of course, it was a bad thing to press this matter when the expenditure of the Dominion exceeded its revenue, nevertheless, he thought these Judges should be placed upon an equal footing with those of other Provinces.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, in addition to the immense cost of the Supreme Court Judges of British Columbia, there were too many stipendiary magistrates; more than they knew what to do with. The first magistrates were appointed from England, and they considered they had vested rights there, which could not be done away with. They were, no doubt, bound to employ them and make them some allowance, but they were not obliged to appoint others. He saw no reason why another stipendiary should be appointed in the place of the late Mr. Bushby.

MR. LAFLAMME said it had been urged upon the Local Government to adopt the system of Ontario, and a correspondence was now going on in regard to this. This system had not been adopted by the Government of British Columbia at present, and, therefore, that amount was entered in the estimate to provide the salary of another stipendiary, should it be found necessary to appoint one.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there was no obligation, as far as stipendiary magistrates were concerned, except that the present incumbents of that office should receive their salaries or some allowance. There was no obligation for more stipendiaries, and indeed they were considered rather excrescences. They were sent over from England at the time of the gold rush in that country, and as in the case of all officers sent from England, the British Government insisted upon it that these men should receive their salaries or compensation for their services, for life. Lord Carnarvon laid it down that these gentlemen should be continued in the service of the Government, and should be engaged in any other employment that was fitting to their rank, and salary and position. These men, therefore, could not be discharged from their office, but when one died there was no necessity to appoint another in his stead, any more than there was for this Government to pay the salary of another. The obligation was to pay the men who were found there at the time of Confederation their salaries as long as they lived, or compensation; but when they died, the Government were not obliged to continue the appointment. He recollected that an Act or by-law, or ordinance of the governing body of British Columbia, whatever it might have been at that time, gave authority to the Local Government to appoint so many stipendiary magistrates from time to time as required. There was no provision and no Act—he spoke under correction, for he was not certain—and no ordinance which made this appointment obligatory.

MR. MACKENZIE asked what was meant in the Union Act by District Courts, and whether the gentlemen who held these appointments did not rank as Judges.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said these stipendiary magistrates had a jurisdiction in some cases, like our old Magistrates' Court had; but they were in no way Judges and did not come within the provisions of the Act as such. He believed they were magistrates and not Judges.

MR. LAFLAMME said that when the Judge (Mr. Bushby) died, there was some difficulty raised, and there were some inducements offered to the Local Government to regulate this matter upon a similar footing to that of Ontario, and, pending the decision, this item had been placed in the Estimates for fear it should be found that the appointment was unavoidable.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I think the hon. gentleman will find that he has no power to appoint a stipendiary, and that such appointment will be void and unparliamentary.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said the opinions now delivered by the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) differed very much from those he used some time ago. He remembered a discussion that took place in this House, when the gentlemen who were sitting on the opposite side occupied the Government benches, and his (Mr. Burpee's) party then objected very strongly to pay these gentlemen retiring allowances. It was urged that they were officers of the Local Government, and the salaries they received from the Dominion Government were paid to them as Commissioners of Lands; but the right hon. gentleman then held that these gentlemen had judicial duties to perform, and that, having discharged duties as Judges, it was the duty of the Dominion Government to pay them. If the hon. gentleman was right now, that they were purely local or Provincial officers, and should be paid by the Local Government, it was quite clear that it was entirely wrong for his Government to pension those gentlemen. Then, he believed, the hon. gentleman also informed the House that, although these gentlemen were not lawyers, they were capable of discharging their duties; but care must be taken in future appointments, so that none but barristers of that Province, or barristers from other Provinces that might go there, should be appointed to fill the positions.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Burpee) was altogether at fault. The reason why he insisted upon the payment of these allowances was this: that it was one of the conditions made by Her Majesty's Government, that these officers should hold their positions for life or receive an allowance for life. Whether they were Judges or not was not material. Mr. Trutch was Surveyor-General, yet they had to find him a pension; and a local Custom-house officer, also had to be provided with an allowance. There was also the Attorney-General, who went away to another Province; he claimed a retiring allowance; but Lord Carnarvon relieved the Government of that claim by giving the gentleman an appointment in some other colony. These were officers who, having been appointed, had to be provided for without reference to what their duties were, because they were appointed by the Imperial Government; that made it a sine qua non that they should have retiring allowances.

MR. MACKENZIE said these stipendiary magistrates exercised civil jurisdiction in certain districts; therefore, they were on the same footing as County Court Judges. This division, under the treaty, did not require stipendiary magistrates as such, but so far as they performed the duties of civil Judge for these districts, it was the duty of this Parliament to provide compensation. He understood a correspondence was going on with the Local Government, with a view to see if they would assimilate their system to that of Ontario, and if they agreed to do that, and make the two systems uniform, it would be necessary that this vacancy, caused by the death of Mr. Bushby, should be filled up because of the civil jurisdiction he exercised at the time of the Union. If they were County Court Judges in the discharge of civil duties, then it would be necessary for this Government to appoint a County Court Judge, and make provision for his salary.

MR. DECOSMOS said that, when the introduction of emigrants and gold miners took place in British Columbia, it became necessary to appoint gold commissioners. They were persons who received applications with regard to mines, and they were also made Justices of the Peace. With regard to the statement of the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir John A. Macdonald) that they were appointed by the Imperial Government, he might say that they were not appointed as stipendiary magistrates or County Court Judges by that Government; they were Government agents, gold commissioners and land commissioners; and a year or two after they had exercised their duties in those respective capacities, the County Court Acts of Great Britain were adopted and applied to the Province of British Columbia, and these stipendiary magistrates were given County Court jurisdiction under those Acts. Those Acts were also applied in time to the old Province of Vancouver Island, but, after the union of these two Provinces, the laws were assimilated. When Confederation came about, one of the objections to the union with Canada was made by gentlemen who formed the Executive Council of the Province with regard to those Judges and stipendiary magistrates, and they insisted that, before they would consent to Union, there must be a provision in the terms of Union for pensions for them in case of their removal. That concession was made, and, as would be found from the terms of Union, it was not a movement on the part of the Imperial Government, but was the action of the Local Government itself—the Government of the Province, of which he was at that time Premier—that these County Court Judges and magistrates should still discharge their duties in the manner they had before Confederation. He had had a great deal to do with the late Administration, and not much to do with the present one, with a view of enabling the Provincial Government to compel these gentlemen to perform the same duties since Confederation as they had done before. But, he believed, these were now, virtually, only County Court Judges, and had managed very successfully to escape from the Provincial duties which it was expected they would perform until the Provincial Government was ready to appoint certified barristers to sit upon the Bench.

MR. MACKENZIE said his hon. friend from Cariboo (Mr. Thompson) had shown him the Acts. The first had been passed in 1867, which established County Court Judges and provided that it would be lawful for the Government of British Columbia to appoint any stipendiary magistrate or Justice of the Peace for the colony to be a County Court Judge. The stipendiary magistrate, as such, was not a County Court Judge, but the Act enabled the Lieutenant-Governor to appoint such stipendiary magistrate or Justice of the Peace, as he might choose, to be a County Court Judge. There was a subsequent Act of the 10th March, 1869, which provided that every stipendiary magistrate should have certain jurisdiction that any one or more Justices of the Peace may have, and so on; showing that the offices of stipendiary magistrate and of County Court Judge were two distinct offices, although they might be held by the same person. The appointment of Superior Court Judges or County or District Judges rested with the Dominion Government.

MR. LAFLAMME said that by the statute of 1873 these magistrates had been admitted and recognised as County Court Judges, and the statute stated positively they should be paid the actual salary so long as they remained in office. Judge Bashby was dead, and, therefore, the Government asked Parliament to replace him. As the Statute recognised him as County Court Judge, the obligation to replace him devolved upon the Dominion Government.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Statute did not provide that a Stipendiary Magistrate was ex officio County Court Judge. They had to pay the salaries of the Stipendiary Magistrates found there. Here was a salary to be provided, of $2,000, and they must, at any rate, strike out the words "Stipendiary Magistrate." He wished to point out to the hon. the Premier the great objection to this item passing as it stood. It would not affect the case of the present Stipendiary Magistrates who, he believed, had, as a matter of fact, commissions as County Court Judges, and who had their salaries fixed; but it did not follow that they should give this salary of £500 sterling to County Court Judges. It would be exceedingly inconvenient to bind themselves to fix all the salaries of County Court Judges at £500 sterling. Whenever this Act came into force, it would become the duty of the Government to settle the salary.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. DE COSMOS said there was no real necessity for the County Court Act to come into force in order to enable the Government to appoint a County Court Judge under the English Statute. Common law applied to the Province of British Columbia; the appointments could be made by this Government as well as the Provincial Government.

MR. MACKENZIE said the salaries were not, at present, at all uniform. One of those Stipendiary Magistrates received $3,400; another, $3,000; this one received $2,425, and there were two others who received $2,250. The salary would not be necessarily fixed, and if it were, it would, as nearly as possible, be the correct one.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the salaries had been fixed according to the comparative duties. Some of the magistrates in the rich gold districts had heavier duties and larger salaries than others. But he thought they should think twice on the matter.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think we ought to put it to the vote.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: You ought to take of vote of $2,000 instead of £500 sterling. That was considered an enormous sum in Ontario.

MR. MACKENZIE said, with regard to County Court Judges, it was extremely difficult at this moment to get a good County Judge. Under the operation of the Act of 1873, the greatest inconvenience had been caused the Government in endeavouring to fill vacant judgeships. At present, it was almost impossible to obtain the best legal gentlemen to fill vacancies in important counties, and the truth was in some cases it was very doubtful whether the existing Judges would retain their places. He had paid little attention, at the time, to that particular Act, but he had never ceased to regret, that it had passed. He did not think it would be possible, in the future, to avoid making some increase in the salaries of County Court Judges, at all events in such counties as York, Wentworth, Middlesex, Simcoe, Halifax, St. John, with their enormous populations, and where the salaries were wholly inadequate to procure the best men.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: In York, the salary is equal to that of a Judge of the Supreme Court.

MR. MACKENZIE: Equal to $4,000 at the outside; that of the Judge of Middlesex was $2,000. A few Judges of some of the smaller districts had larger salaries. He did not think the sum of $2,400 would be too large a salary for a County Court Judge in Columbia.

MR. MACDONNELL said some of the judgeships in Nova Scotia were going begging. They had been offered to several gentlemen. A gentleman whose practice at the Bar was not over $2,000, was hardly a fit practitioner to be allowed on the Bench. If they were to have Judges competent to discharge their duties, there must be some inducement offered in the shape of increased salaries.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said it had been remarked that the salaries of County Court Judges varied. The County Court Judge of Cariboo received $2,400. These had been fixed differentially on account of the expense of living, or the work in some districts being greater than in others. The jurisdiction of the County Court in Cariboo was very extensive, and, since the opening of the new quartz mines, would become still more extended. The County Court Judges had declined to act as gold commissioners, and as receivers of revenue and other offices, as they did previously. What was called the mining jurisdiction of the County Court was a separate Court. The jurisdiction of the County Court proper extended principally to sums not exceeding £500, but the Mining Jurisdiction Court extended to any amount, as it was simply impossible to place a value upon any suit that came in regarding mines. It was necessary that the officer appointed to perform such duty should be a man of experience, calculated to carry out the law thoroughly. The County Court Judge of the district of Cariboo was not a lawyer, and never had legal training, yet had proved himself to be wonderfully adapted for the situation he held. As regards salaries, he thought the amount named, £500, could not be considered excessive. It would be impossible to get a gentleman of legal training, competent to perform the duties of that office, for a smaller sum.

MR. DECOSMOS said that, instead of $2,425, the salary should be $2,500, and he would suggest, if possible, that that amount should be given.

MR. MACKAY (Cape Breton) said that the County Court Judges of the Province of Nova Scotia were dissatisfied with the method which had been adopted of remunerating them for travelling expenses. They were supposed to be put on the same footing as the County Court Judges of the Province of Ontario; yet the latter, who had only one county to preside over, received the same amount for travelling expenses as the former, some of whom had to travel over three districts. He thought the Government should adopt some method of increasing the allowance for travelling expenses to those gentlemen.

MR. MITCHELL said they had a County Court Judge in the northern district of New Brunswick, comprising the three important counties of Restigouche, Gloucester and Northumberland. The salary of that Judge was inadequate to the service he had to perform.

MR. SPEAKER said there was no difference in the salaries paid, but a difference should be made. Judge Waters performed almost as much work as all the other County Court Judges in New Brunswick, and it was work, moreover, of a much more important character. St. John was the great centre of the trade of the Province. For some time, there was no Judge of the Superior Court residing there, and at the present time, there was only one, the remaining four, to suit their own convenience and to enable them to save money, lived at Fredericton. Judge Duff was the only Superior Court Judge residing in St. John, and nearly all the applications in Chambers were made to Judge Waters, in addition to his own work and the heavy labours thrown upon him in connection with the operations of the Insolvent Act. That Judge was occupied every day in the year, except when on circuit, in Chambers; indeed, he did much more work than the Superior Court Judges, and that too, of almost equal importance. The Local Legislature had chosen to extend very largely the jurisdiction of the County Court Judges, and in that way had increased their labours; but from the very circumstances of the case, and the fact that the Bar had a very high degree of confidence in the ability, integrity and industry of Judge Waters, they went to him with every case it was possible to bring before a County Court Judge. He understood the Bar had addressed a memorial to the Governor-General or the Minister of Justice, expressing the opinion, which was one in which every one was acquainted with the work concurred in, that Judge Waters' salary was far too small and should be increased to $3,000, in addition to what he received as Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court. He (Mr. Speaker) did not pretend to say that Judge Williston was overpaid, but, from personal knowledge, he was aware that Judge Waters had a great deal more work to do, and that, in fact, his work, in the course of the year, almost equalled that of the whole of the County Court Judges.

MR. MITCHELL said he had not attempted to undervalue the duties discharged by Judge Waters, who was an old colleague of his, and a gentleman of great ability, and highly respected by the profession. He was not aware, however, of the accumulation of duties which he had been called upon to discharge, and that the Superior Court Judges of New Brunswick should so far have neglected their duties as to have permitted such onerous duties to have fallen upon that Judge, instead of the work being properly divided. If the Superior Judges had removed to Fredericton to reside, for the purpose of effecting economy, and the public interest had thereby suffered, the attention of the proper authorities should be given to the matter; and they should see that those Judges, at all events, divided with Judge Waters the business which they, as Superior Court Judges, ought to perform. While he believed that Judge Waters did not receive sufficient remuneration, he was satisfied the salary paid to Judge Williston, who travelled in the three northern counties, and whose work had been largely increased by Provincial legislation, should be increased.

MR. BUNSTER said he was surprised at hon. members having taken objection to items in the Estimates for the administration of justice in British Columbia, in view of the heavy cost of living and travelling expenses in that Province. It was not the first time the interests of British Columbia had been attacked. Even the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries had not properly discharged his duties, because he was ignorant of the valuable fisheries of the Pacific Province, otherwise he would have made increased grants for the protection of the fisheries, and the maintenance of fish-breeding establishments. Their annual exports of fish amounted in value to $450,000. An additional Judge should be appointed for New Westminster, as his services would be required next season; that district already contained 3,000 people, and before two years had elapsed, would probably have 20,000. It was desirable that justice should be administered in British Columbia after the British model, and it must be remembered that no Province caused less expense to the Dominion in regard to the administration of justice. For the maintenance of the Mounted Police in the North-West, $120,000 was annually required, but the people of British Columbia, recognizing the necessity of maintaining law and order, did not involve any cost to Canada on that head; and it was only reasonable to give to New Westminster a Judge, in case delinquent creditors should desire to abscond to the United States. He felt that the people of that district had no representative on the floor of the House, which should not be the case, and as a British Columbian, he felt he had a double duty to perform. It was well known that the writ had not yet left; and the late member had not dare to come back here, because he had not voted in the interests of the Province, while this was the next most important district to his own. He wished to draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to the importance of appointing a stipendiary magistrate in Westminister.

MR. WADE said that the stipendiary magistrates in the county of Digby were very inadequately paid for the labour performed.

V.—POLICE.

34. Dominion Police..... $11,000

MR. MITCHELL said, by reference to the Public Accounts, page 77, he saw that the expenditure last year under this item was $11,355.62, and a note informed them that Mr. Coursol was superannuated on the 30th November, 1872, and the force under his command disbanded. What, then, was this $11,000 for?

MR. MACKENZIE: Only the Montreal part was disbanded.

MR. MITCHELL: I thought that the Montreal force was a very considerable part of it.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: It was composed of a few detectives, who were appointed some years ago.

MR. MITCHELL: Where is the rest of the force?

MR. LAFLAMME: Here in Ottawa.

MR. MITCHELL: How many are there?

MR. LAFLAMME: Eighteen.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Is the number increased this year?

MR. LAFLAMME: Since the extension of the buildings, two men have been put on, one to act as a keeper, and the other as policeman.

MR. MITCHELL: In these hard times is it necessary to increase the number of police?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I do not think that there are too many for these buildings.

MR. MACKENZIE: I assure you we have not. It is of the utmost importance that these buildings should be looked after, owing to the risk of fire and of people breaking in. It is indispensable to have good men, and to have the buildings well guarded.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: While talking of the necessity of guarding the public buildings, I would mention that I think, last Session, a gentleman, who, I think, is an architect in Ottawa, said to me that some day or other there would be a great fire here, and that all these buildings must go, owing to the great collection of paper in the attics; and that, if a fire once got in, with the long sweep there, these buildings must go. I would like to know if the attention of the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government has been called to this matter.

MR. MACKENZIE said that this had been the case. His attention was called to it immediately after he assumed charge of his Department. A very large portion of the money lately spent on the buildings, was spent in erecting fire-walls to the summit of the roofs, and in making breaks in several places. Orders had been issued by himself concerning the accumulations of paper. A small fire had taken place in this building on a very recent occasion, which, so far as he was able to ascertain by investigation, proved to have originated in some waste-rags, saturated with oil, thrown into a box in a corner under the post-office. This produced a very dangerous fire. He was sorry to say that some serious defects had, in this regard, been discovered in the building, which was supposed to be entirely fire-proof. Since then, another careful examination had been made of the buildings by the architect and his assistants, with the view to see that every possible defect should be carefully attended to. He might further say that they had never thought of insuring these buildings, and they did not think yet of it; but the very serious loss that occurred at St. John, whereby a loss of at least half a million had been caused, had rather changed his own mind as to the desirability of insuring; and they would propose, in the Supplementary Estimates, to take a small sum for the purpose of insuring to some extent the buildings they had in other cities than Ottawa. With the aid of the police and the supervision of the immediate officers of the Government connected with the architectural department, the buildings were rendered, he thought, comparatively safe; and it was unnecessary that they should do anything more than take ordinary or rather extraordinary precautions. The greatest care had been taken in this respect, and he thought they need scarcely fear anything like a panic from fire; but there was one difficulty which was always to be encountered in these large buildings when a little fire took place here. When the late fire took place he went into the building almost immediately after the signal was given, but, small as the fire was, it became almost impossible to live in the dense smoke that filled the corridors. The Government had been considering every possible means of avoiding that danger in the future, and he thought their object had been attained.

MR. MITCHELL said it was rather late in the evening to discuss the important question as to whether the public buildings should be insured or not. He did not want the hon. the Premier's views to go abroad without discussion. There was no reason why the Dominion Government should not be their own insurers, just in the same way as many ship-owners insured their own vessels.

MR. PLUMB thought what had been said by the last speaker would commend itself to members on both sides of the House. It was of no possible use to have an Insurance Department where scope was partial; it should be a general one embracing all the public works, etc., throughout the Dominion, and he trusted the Government would bring the matter forward for discussion.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the interest on the money lost at St. John would have more than paid the insurance on every building in the Dominion.

MR. MITCHELL: For how long?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: For ever.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman is, I think, mistaken.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I make the assertion and can prove it.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. MACKENZIE: And we will prove it afterwards.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he was glad this matter had come up, because it would show the propriety of having statistics as to the value of public property insurable in their nature. The opinion held by the late Government was that they should be their own insurers.

MR. MACKENZIE: I believe the practice of the late Government was not uniform. Some buildings were insured, I think, but these were exceptional cases.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the general principle of the late Government, at all events, had been that they should become their own insurers. He was glad the attention of the Premier had been called to this matter, because he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had been told by a gentleman whose name he was not at liberty to mention, that, if these buildings took fire, there could be no hope for them. He was pleased, therefore, to learn that, by certain improvements which had been made, the security of the buildings had been greatly increased.

Vote agreed to.

VI. PENITENTIARIES.

35. Kingston Penitentiary..... $130,646 52

MR. MITCHELL: I ask the hon. the Premier whether it is right to pass a vote of this kind without information?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: The whole of the information will be found on page 23.

MR. LANGEVIN said the vote was a little larger this year for salaries, while the number of convicts was smaller. In 1877-8 the number was 794; for the current year, 1878-9, it was 765—a difference of 29. He thought it should be explained why the cost was increased for a smaller number of convicts. Besides, he was not sure that amount had been expended last year.

MR. LAFLAMME: I am informed by the chief officer of my Department that there is an increase in the number of convicts for this year of 65.

MR. LANGEVIN said the hon. gentlemen had been very unfortunate in their Estimates this year. Every time they called attention to a difference of this kind, it was a misprint. The same thing occurred the day before with regard to a difference between the French and English copies of the Estimates; and he might mention that there were great discrepancies between the English and French copies of public documents this year. But from these Estimates the number of convicts appeared to have decreased 29, and the cost for officials, wardens, chaplain, surgeon, down to keeper, remained the same. Two keepers had been dispensed with; yet the Estimates had increased.

MR. LAFLAMME said there had been an appropriation of several hundred acres of land for the purpose of connecting a farm with the Kingston Penitentiary. The property was purchased, he believed, from the right hon. member for Kingston; and the addition of such a large tract of land for the purpose of farming had necessitated a stronger guard for the convicts at work in the open air than would have been required if they had been kept within walls. This had occasioned an increase in the expenditure; and another factor in the increase had been a diminution of articles required for consumption.

MR. MACKENZIE said that, with regard to the building at the St. Vincent Penitentiary, it had been decided to do as much as possible of the work themselves, but comparatively few convicts were there on long sentences, and, consequently, comparatively little had been done with the workmen at Kingston. It had been thought better to complete the work by the aid of the convicts, though it perhaps might be found necessary to contract for some of it if the necessary accommodation increase as it had done during the past year.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: If you are in a hurry about the building you could send down stone-cutters and bricklayers from Kingston.

MR. MACKENZIE said that suggestion was worth consideration. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) was, perhaps, aware that, at Kingston, the convicts cut the stone for the Military College; and the whole of the iron work for the Library, which was a very expensive description of work, was also done at the Kingston Penitentiary. The convicts had also made the whole of the iron work, frames and girding of every kind, for the Maritime Provinces Penitentiary. The fact was they had been compelled, in order to find work for the convicts, and, at the same time, avoid all unnecessary conflict with free labour, to employ them in the Government's own work, such as making clothes for the police force, and many articles required for the Indians. Although it was sometimes difficult to find employment for them that would not be competing with free labour, they had succeeded in doing so at the present time. Some of the work in connection with the Pacific Railway had been done there, and some of the work in connection with the Pembina Branch had been done there this year. The frogs for the road between Fort William and Selkirk were made there, and they were endeavouring to get their iron work of every kind done by the convicts as much as possible. Mr. Creighton, the Warden, had suggested other industries in which the convicts might be employed, but the profit upon their labour would be very small at present. For instance, they might make railway spikes, but these things could be purchased at a very low rate, from two and a-half cents to two and five-eighths cents per pound, and they found it quite impossible, considering the cost of machinery and other expenses, to make them at a lower rate. Mr. Creighton had also suggested that the Government printing might be done there, but he (Mr. Mackenzie) was afraid that it would then be done worse than now, and that there would be still more errors in it. They had practically given up this idea, but there were other branches the convicts might be employed in with advantage. The question required to be dealt with carefully, because, with such an enormous amount of prison labour, it would always be a considerable difficulty to keep the convicts employed only on such work as would not compete with ordinary labour outside.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there had arisen a cry, the justice of which had been recognized in England and also in France, against the subsidizing of prison labour in the manufacture of goods that would compete with free labour, and, no doubt, a difficulty of this kind would always exist; but the Government, in employing these people as much as possible in Government work, would, to a considerable extent, remove that cry. Free labour could understand that the country, being put to the expense of keeping these men, must employ them in some way, and that they might fairly be employed in some kind of work. He admitted this was one of the best solutions of this question. He would ask to what extent contract work was carried on in the penitentiaries?

MR. MACKENZIE: I think there is none at all now.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Is there none carried on at St. John now.

MR. MACKENZIE said he believed not.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he might just mention, with respect to these additional convicts, that, as the House was aware, a considerable quantity of land had been bought for the employment of the convicts. This land was situated about three-fourths of a mile from the Kingston Penitentiary, and, a very considerable number of the convicts being marched out there daily to work, it was absolutely necessary that a small addition should be made to the official force, in order to prevent the men escaping, an occurrence which, to his knowledge, had taken place very frequently, and it was particularly dangerous in this place, because they were employed close to some woods, and, if a man got in there, it was impossible to recapture him without a difficult chase. He thought two additional guards were quite as small an addition as could be made, consistent with safety. The vote for maintenance was several dollars less than last year, and the additional expense was incurred in matters connected with the farm. There had also been expenses connected with buildings, independently of a certain claim made by Mrs. Ferris, which augmented the expenditure.

MR. PLUMB said he observed, on looking over the statements, that there was great diversity in the cost of maintaining the penitentiaries. Of course he was aware that the expense was regulated, to some extent, by the number of inmates, and that the average would be smaller for a large than for a small number. There was, however, a very marked discrepancy in the cost, the average per head, per annum, being as follows: $170 at Kingston; $320 at Halifax; $285 at Baie St. Paul; $240 at St. John; $400 in Manitoba; and $600 in British Columbia. The increase in the number of inmates was 35. Those diversities of cost in the maintenance of inmates opened up the great question of the employment of prison labour, which had attracted the attention of philosophers and statesmen in England and other countries. It had been decided in respect to the great prisons in England, such as Pentonville and Millbank, that it was not in accordance with the public interest to place the labour of men imprisoned there in competition with the crowded labour market of Great Britain, and it had there been decided that the prisoners should be employed on work of such an elementary character as not to interfere with the general interests of the artisan classes. Convict labour had always been regarded with the greatest jealousy whenever it came in competition with free labor, although it might be justified in the case of the Kingston Penitentiary that men should be employed in work such as the Premier had just referred to. No doubt the results were a of very clumsy, imperfect and costly character, and this included the work used in our public buildings, and also cabinet-making, iron-work and some of the elementary processes connected with railway plant and machinery. It was evident that the question of the employment of prison labour stared us in the face, especially in these days of commercial depression, when thousands of honest men and women could not find work at half time, and were crying for employment in all directions, and when the Government were not adopting a course which would promote the interests of manufacturers and other employers of labour. This great question would necessarily arise in the Dominion—although our labour market was not so crowded as that of the old world. The Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had recognized that fact, and the convicts in penitentiaries there were employed upon making matting and in other ways which did not come into such direct competition with skilled labour as did the work at the Kingston Penitentiary. He did not, however, pretend to say that the convicts at the penitentiary had not been properly employed. The remarks of the hon. the Premier had opened up a subject of so wide a character and range that he would not venture to enter fully upon it at that late hour of the night, yet a few remarks would not be out of place, as indicating what might be the consequence of any interference with what might be called free labour. It was natural that the honest artisan should look with great suspicion, almost with anger, upon the employment of those who had forfeited their liberty and were imprisoned at the public charge. It was not to be supposed that he would calmly look at the employment of such men, who thus came into competition with the work of men who had resisted every temptation—who, during the period of such depression as was now existing, had seen their families almost starving, and yet kept their hands clear of taking other men's goods. They saw those who had committed crime well fed at the public expense, and enjoying a certain kind of comfort; so much of it that many had sought refuge in prison, rather than endeavour to live out a life of toil. It was a paradox, but, no doubt, to a certain extent, it was true. Those honest men of toil, who had kept themselves free from all contaminations and resisted every temptation, naturally felt the gravest suspicion and alarm when they saw the field of labour occupied by those who had violated the laws of the country. That was a primary consideration in connection with the employment of penitentiary labour, and it behoved every Government to consider well before they permitted, for the sake of an economy which might prove a false economy, prison labour in any way to interfere with the rights of free men who had not transgressed the law. The employment of prison labour might be an economy, and the House would observe that, in the case of the Kingston Penitentiary there had been a large diminution in the cost of maintenance. This diminution of cost was because the convicts had been employed, perhaps at the expense of citizens who had not found work. Mr. Stuart Mill and other philosophers had written on the question, and the doctrine had been accepted in England that Government should not do anything, in its capacity as a Government, to lessen the cost of the maintenance of convicts by interfering with the rights of freemen. The labouring man in France was called the proletaire, on whom all the burdens of the state finally fell; all taxes fell on him ultimately and were really not paid by the rich; indeed, all the burdens were borne by the men who could not make their own bargains, and were compelled by their position to be the slaves of capital. Consequently, the labouring man was, to a certain extent, the ward of the Government and under its protection, and it should always take a special care in any action it took to protect those who were unable to protect themselves. These were obvious truths that lay at the bottom of all political economy; they were the first questions to consider, for they related to the men who formed the basis of national wealth—the workingmen. There was no other wealth than labour. Money was a mere medium; it might be made out of anything, and it had been created from paper in the United States to an enormous extent; gold and silver were merely convenient mediums for the currency of the world; iron money was just as good in the Spartan age; and it was perfectly evident, therefore, that labour was the only capital. The Government must do nothing to injure the rights of that labour; and, however much they might be tempted to practice economy and retrenchment—though the country had not seen much of either in their administration—they should not interfere with the rights of labour. The question of employing convicts and permitting them to compete in any degree with the honest freeman who toiled and kept himself aloof from crime, amid all privations, was one that ought to engage the earnest attention of the Government. It was a mere empirical view of the case to say that it might be proper to employ convicts at Kingston, on iron-work, when every pound of iron which had passed through the processes cost five or ten times as much as if manufactured by free labour in a well organized manufactory, under the guidance of men who had capital at risk and knew that every dollar invested must return its interest, and that the Government would not make good any loss which might be caused by their want of skill. The last thing in the world which should be done was to attempt to carry on any manufactory requiring much skill in a penitentiary. It had always been a failure. Prison labour was notorious for turning out inferior work, and cheap articles were, consequently, made in the penitentiaries. If the boots for the Manitoba Mounted Police had been made in Kingston penitentiary, as had been stated by the Premier, he trusted that as good leather and workmanship had been put into them as would have been the case if the work had been done elsewhere. The question he had suggested for the consideration of the Committee was one of so wide a character, having so many ramifications in every direction, that he could not fully discuss it on that occasion. He only intended, in those brief remarks which had been suggested by the observations of the hon. the First Minister, to give some initial hints which he hoped other hon. gentlemen would be able to work out more skilfully and exhaustively than he was able to do. He was only a cursory student of political economy, and did not profess to understand fully a question of the abstruse nature of the one now under consideration, which, no doubt, would be discussed by other hon. members. During their remarks, other suggestions would, no doubt, be made, and he would be able, at a later stage, to further what he considered one of the first questions of public economy, namely: the discipline and employment of convicts, and the best method of providing employment for them, and protecting them from temptation to crime after their term of imprisonment had expired.

ONTARIO MARITIME COURT BILL.

(Mr. Laflamme.)

FIRST READING.

MR. LAFLAMME introduced a Bill (No. 50) Respecting the Maritime Court of Ontario. He said that the object of the Bill was to give to the decrees of the Maritime Court the same meaning and force as attached to those of the Court of Chancery.

Bill read the first time.

OFFICES OF RECEIVER-GENERAL AND ATTORNEY-GENERAL BILL.

(Mr. Laflamme.)

FIRST READING.

MR. LAFLAMME introduced a Bill (No. 51) Respecting the offices of Receiver-General and Attorney-General of Canada. He said the object of this Bill was to abolish the Receiver-General's office and to transfer it to the Finance Department; also to create the office of Attorney-General, with portfolio, who should preside, conjointly with the Minister of Justice, over the Law Department.

MR. BLANCHET: Its effect is not to abolish the position of Deputy Minister of Justice, I suppose?

MR. LAFLAMME: No.

MR. BLANCHET: Will the Attorney-General be a member of the Cabinet?

MR. LAFLAMME: Yes; certainly.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Mackenzie.)

FIRST READING.

MR. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill (No. 52) To amend the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874. He said: The object of this Bill is to empower the Government to lease the Pembina Branch, or to make running arrangements so as to connect the traffic of the roads joining it to the South. It simply confers on the Government the same power that is provided for in connection with the Georgian Bay Branch in the Act as it passed. Any lease that may be made will, of course, be subject, according to the law as it stands relative to the Georgian Bay Branch, to submission to Parliament. It will require, in other words, to be submitted to Parliament and approved. It is an open question yet with the Government in what shape this road may be best worked. The probabilities, so far as we know at present are that the lines on the Southern boundary will reach that spot sometime in the course of the coming season; and the Government will take steps to have their own line finished so as to have, if possible, railway communication with the Province some time in the fall of the current year. It will be necessary, of course, to make some arrangements for traffic; but whether it shall be done by leasing our own road or by stocking our own road, and making some running arrangements with another company, is a matter yet to be decided; but I propose, as I stated before, that the provisions made in this relation shall be subject, as the other part of the Bill, to the ratification of Parliament.

MR. TUPPER: Any discussion that this Bill may call for would, of course, be better entered upon on the second reading, when, perhaps, fuller information with reference to it may be given. I only rise at this moment for the purpose of suggesting to the hon. the First Minister that, in regard to any lease which it is proposed to make—I am not now dealing with the question of leasing the line at all—in case it is decided to have the line leased to a company outside of the Province, or to a company incorporated with one outside of the Province, it appears to very desirable that means should be taken by the Government to be able, under certain circumstances, to cancel the lease without allowing any very extended period to elapse, and also to provide not only for the control of the rates of passenger fares, but the rates for traffic on the line, and the rate of traffic on the road with which this road will be connected. I merely throw it out as a suggestion to the hon. the First Minister to be taken into consideration in any negotiations or arrangements that may be made, and which it might be convenient to make now, this being preferable to taking exception to them in this respect, when too late.

MR. MACKENZIE: I entirely approve of the suggestions of the gentleman. Those suggestions have already been considered by the Department. It will be, of course, absolutely necessary that we should not merely control the rates on our own portion of the road, but also control them on the road with which we connect, so as to prevent, if possible, discrimination. With regard to the term of the lease, I think we may fairly look forward to the completion of our own road, through our own territory, in the space, say, of four or five years, and no provision will be made in the lease that will prevent the Government—at least, that is my present idea—from having possession of all parts of the Canadian lines, and having it worked as the Canadian Pacific Railway Act prescribes, if possible, by a company. As soon as it is desirable, it should be in the hands of a company. With regard to a short lease, and the probable proceeds of the lease, being a certain percentage either of the gross or net earnings—and the gross earnings, I think, is the best—the proportion to be paid to the Government for a short time, would, of course, be much less than for a longer term; and I think the proper mode to ascertain that is that it should be ascertained by arbitration, but that the Government should be at liberty to resume the line—it might be for a minimum number of years, four or five years, but beyond that time it should be in the power of the Government at any time to resume possession and undertake the management of it in common with the main line, with regard to whatever company we may be able to let the contract to during the coming season.

MR. TUPPER: Is it contemplated to lease the road—that is, the track only, or to furnish rolling stock for the portion of the line within the Province of Manitoba.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, we have both subjects under consideration. The only lease we have had so far in connection with the Government railways was the Windsor lease, which the hon. gentleman is aware was a lease on the roadway under certain conditions as to payment. The company leasing the road in that case furnished the rolling stock themselves. The only difficulty we have in the West is that we might perhaps better control the traffic by having our own stock. On the other hand, it is somewhat awkward to place stock on a Government road in possession of a company; and, if we had the stock ourselves, it would necessitate the creation of a system of workshops which we would very ill like to have to supply at the present time. As the Government have always to contemplate working the whole of the railways by companies, we would not like to have extensive workshops to do repairs and make additions to stock upon so very short a line of road. There are advantages to be gained in connection with both ways of proceeding, and the Government are con-

PRIVATE AND LOCAL BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole and reported:—

Bill (No. 8) To authorize the National Insurance Company to reduce its capital stock, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Desjardins.)

Bill (No. 10) To authorize the Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company to reduce its capital stock and for other purposes.—(Mr. Casgrain.)

Bill (No. 16) To incorporate the Ontario Mutual Life Assurance Company.—(Mr. Bowman.)

Bill (No. 21) Further to amend the charter of the Quebec Fire Assurance Company.—(Mr. Taschereau.)

Bill (No. 22) Respecting the Bank of Liverpool.—(Mr. Forbes.)

Bill (No. 48) To incorporate La Société de Construction du Comté d'Hochelega, as a permanent Building Society, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Baby.)

Bill (No. 49) To incorporate the Regular Baptist Foreign Missionary Society of Ontario and Quebec.—(Mr. Wood.)

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was read the second and third times and passed:—

Bill (No. 28) To revive and amend the Act incorporating the Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Scrier.)

CANADA VINE GROWERS' ASSOCIATION.

QUESTION.

MR. TUPPER, for MR. PLUMB, enquired, Whether an Order in Council has been recently made allowing the Canada Vine Growers' Association to manufacture eighty thousand gallons, or any greater or less quantity of wine or products of the grape free of Excise duty; and, if so, when was the order made, for what quantity, and under what conditions?

MR. LAURIER said that an Order in Council was passed on the 22nd February last, chiefly affirming a previous Order in Council passed in February, 1874, whereby the Wine Growers' Association had been allowed to manufacture, free of duty, 80,000 barrels of spirits within five years, to be computed from the fall of the year 1873, up to the end of next fall, provided they manufactured three gallons of wine to each gallon of spirits.

QUEBEC, MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND OCCIDENTAL RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. TUPPER, for Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, enquired, Whether any agreement or arrangement has been made with or on behalf of the Government of Quebec for the purchase or assumption of the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railroad by the Dominion Government; or whether there is any negotiation pending as to the purchase or acquiring thereof?

MR. MACKENZIE said that all that he had ever heard on the subject was a remark made by a Minister in the House of Assembly of Quebec. When the question was asked, he gave as an answer that the Government of Quebec should make no approach to the Federal Ministers until they were chased out of Parliament by whips and cords.

TORONTO HARBOUR.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to continue the work of deepening the Toronto Harbour; also, whether they propose taking steps to arrest the continued waste of the Island, the preservation of which is so essential to the safety of the Harbour?

MR. MACKENZIE said it was probable that the works at the end of the harbour necessary to make the entrance somewhat safer than it was would be continued. The Government had no information that led them to believe that the harbour was suffering any injury from wash at the east end of the Island, and they did not expect any serious injury to the harbour from that cause.

TRANSPORTATION OF RAILS FROM DULUTH TO MANITOBA.

QUESTION.

MR. SCHULTZ enquired, In what newspapers were advertisements placed asking for tenders for transportation of rails from Duluth to Manitoba?

MR. MACKENZIE: The advertisements were inserted in the Journal de Québec, L'Evenement, Quebec Morning Chronicle, Quebec Budget, Montreal Herald, Montreal Daily Witness, Journal of Commerce, Le National, Ottawa Free Press, Kingston Whig, Toronto Globe, Monetary Times, Hamilton Evening Times and London Advertiser.

NEEBING HOTEL.

QUESTION.

MR. PALMER, for Mr. KIRKPATRICK, enquired, Whether any and how much money has been returned to the Public Treasury on account of overcharges in the price paid for the Neebing Hotel; and when such repayment, if any, was made?

MR. MACKENZIE: I am not aware of any.

TENDERS FOR GUN PLATFORM, LEVIS FORTS.

MOTION FOR COPIES OF TENDERS.

MR. FRÉCHETTE moved for copies of all tenders for the construction of the platform for the gun of No. 1 Fort, at Lévis.

Motion agreed to.

CHINESE LABOUR ON PACIFIC RAILWAY.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

MR. BUNSTER moved:

"That the Government insert a clause in each and every contract let for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, that no man wearing his hair longer than five and one-half inches shall be deemed eligible for employment on said work, and that no person wearing his hair longer shall be eligible to any contract on said railroad, either by the engineers, employés, or any other person or persons so engaged on the said railroad, under penalty for the first offence of one hundred dollars, and not to exceed one thousand dollars for the second offence, or imprisonment for the first offence for three months, and not more than twelve months for the second offence."

He said that hon. members of this House may not have given the same consideration to this question as the inhabitants along the Pacific had been obliged to give to it. The Chinese question was one which had to be dealt with in a peculiar way, but he did not claim any originality in drawing attention to its importance. A motion of similar import had been carried in the Congress of the United States; and the Parliament of South Australia, had, in defiance of the Mother Country, imposed a tax on Chinese immigrants of £50 per head. There were 80,000 Chinese now in California; 50,000 in Australia; in the Cape of Good Hope, about 5,000; in Manitoba 20, British Columbia, 3,000, and, according to information which he had received yesterday, by mail, there would probably be an influx of of 20,000 of them into the latter Province during the present year, in consequence of the gold mines of British Columbia giving prospects of a better return than formerly. In British Columbia, as he had said, there were now about 3,000 Chinese. These immigrants had engendered a great deal of ill-feeling in the Province, and introduced many evils which it was impossible adequately to describe in this House, but he would refer hon. members to several works and authorities in the library, which would give them an accurate description of the evils attending the introduction of this worse than worthless element into any civilized country. These Chinese immigrants were not farmers, they had not the inclination or disposition to cultivate the soil, but congregated in hovels in the cities, and there made their living as best they could. Canadians should take measures to protect themselves against the introduction of a population so detestable, and prevent their manhood from degenerating through the use of the opium drug, which was worse than all the liquor ever distilled, and other evils he would not mention, which had been introduced by these people, and which gave cause for serious reflection to every father of a family as to the difficulties of guarding against them. This question was a national one, and, if the House did not consider it seriously today, the time was not far distant when it would force itself on their attention and demand more stringent measures than were now necessary to regulate

it. It was easier checking an evil at the outset than when it had attained full sway. Hon. gentlemen here might not think this question of much moment, but, in his Province, every white man took it seriously to heart, and regretted having come to a Province where he had to come in contact with such a race. The British Columbians had joined the Canadian Confederacy and had the right to appeal to this House for redress, and they demanded, in the interest of human justice to their families and to their Province, that legislation be adopted to protest against any increase to this immigration. Hon. gentlemen might think this a strange question, and that it had been introduced in a strange way, but there was no other way of introducing it, the difficulty he had to cope with being that every one who came into this country was considered as good a British subject in the eyes of the law as an Englishman or a Canadian. He had assumed the responsibility of bringing forward this motion in the interest of the constituency he had the honour to represent and of the Dominion at large, and all those who had read of the troubles on the Pacific coast must sympathize with it. They all knew there had been large mass meetings in the magnificent city of San Francisco to secure means to annul the treaty which had been made by Mr. Burlingame when Minister at Washington, and there were many Americans to-day who would use every shot in their revolver against Burlingame for having made such an absurd treaty. It would become the duty of the Government to endeavour to do away with the treaty which existed between it and this race, in order to maintain our own race in its vigour and manhood, and to retain in the country the tardy pioneer who went there to develop its resources. To-day crowds of emigrants were leaving their shore for the want of suitable partners—of English ladies, Scotch lassies, or buxom Irish girls—whose places had been filled by these worse than worthless people. If hon. gentlemen had seen the sights he had witnessed they would support his motion. He had been shown at one time by a gentleman who was running large salmon factories on the Fraser River a room in which twenty-four of these people, who wore their hair longer than four inches, were packed in one room, tier above tier, like so many fish. Facts were stubborn things, and it was his duty to inform hon. gentlemen of the knowledge he had gained on this subject. This being a national holiday (St. Patrick's Day), he would not detain the House longer, and trusted the leader of the Government would see fit to support his motion, and so help British Columbia to abate what everyone must acknowledge to be a growing and intolerable nuisance.

MR. MACKENZIE said he hoped the hon. gentleman did not really expect such a resolution to obtain any support in the House. It was one unprecedented in its character and altogether unprecedented in its spirit, and at variance with those tolerant laws which afforded employment and an asylum to all who came into our country, irrespective of colour, hair, or anything else. Besides, he had some compassion for the hon. member who had moved and seconded the address, because, if its terms were strictly carried out, he was afraid both those hon. gentleman would be excluded from any employment on the Pacific Railway, and he did not wish to do anything that would militate against the hon. members themselves. He need hardly say he did not feel disposed seriously to discuss such a proposition. It was aimed, doubtless, at the exclusion of Chinese labour, a question which had, undoubtedly, created some difficulty and a good deal of discussion in some portions of the United States, as well as in some portions of Australia; and, while there might be a good deal in what was said about the unenviable character and habits of some of the Chinese people who crossed the ocean in search of employment, still he did not think it would become us, as a British community, to legislate against any class of people who might be imported into, or might emigrate to, this country. It must also be remembered that a very large portion of the emigration from China was from a British Province—that of Hong Kong—whose people were as much British subjects as were the hon. members who had moved and seconded the address; and, as such, were entitled to the rights and privileges of British subjects anywhere over the entire extent of the empire. He could think of nothing that would more lower the Canadian Parliament than the adoption of such a motion; and he would express the hope that, after the mover had fully stated his views, he would be glad to withdraw the motion, and not have a vote taken upon it, as it was a proposal which he would see at once must be repugnant to an immense majority of the House and the people.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said that, in seconding the motion, he had no idea that it would be adopted, but he had done so for the purpose of allowing the hon. mover to bring it before the House. The hon. the First Minister had stated that neither himself, as seconder of the resolution, nor the mover would be capable of obtaining employment on the Pacific Railway under those terms. He (Mr. Thompson) wished the House to understand that he had no intention of asking employment of the Government on that railway, especially as he believed, so long as the present Government were in power, that there would be no necessity for any person applying for employment on the road which, he thought, they had no intention of building. As regarded the Chinese question, although these people might be useful in some cases in British Columbia, still the immigration of Chinese, to any large extent, was an evil. It had proved to be such in Queensland, where it had been in some measure checked by a legal enactment. Through all the Australian colonies their presence had been found to be injurious. In California, their presence had been found to be so great a nuisance as to almost cause a rebellion in that State. In British Columbia, hitherto, they had not proved such an evil, although they had trespassed, to some extent, on what was generally known as white labour. On the quartz ledges and alluvial diggings they worked for less wages than white people. Of course, there was no legal means of preventing that. In fact, he believed the only way of preventing their immigration was by the white population setting their faces against the employment of Chinese. If it were possible to adopt any means which would prevent a large immigration of Chinese into British Columbia, it would be desirable; but he knew of none except that of imposing a tax on them. If a tax were placed on every man who wore his hair beyond a certain length, including his (Mr. Thompson's), if it was half an inch longer than the regulation length he would be perfectly willing to pay the tax himself along with those whose hair was four or five feet in length.

MR. TUPPER said he presumed the mover of the resolution, like many other great Reformers, would have to rest content to allow his reform, if he considered it such, to advance by slow degrees; and he could console himself with the reflection that many of the greatest reforms ever brought forward had, at the outset, received very severe criticism. He (Mr. Tupper) did not say this would be a reform; nevertheless, the mover would have the consolation of knowing that those who had introduced more important measures had received very little encouragement for some years. He hoped the hon. mover would rest content with having placed his views before the House without forcing a division, as he was satisfied the House was not prepared to entertain a proposition of that character. Although, no doubt, there was a great deal of truth in what had been stated in regard to the character of the Chinese and the unfortunate difference in the habits prevailing among them as compared with those to which we had been accustomed, the fact could not be overlooked that, in view of the difficulties which would have to be overcome in constructing the Pacific Railway, and the great amount of labour that would be required, it could scarcely be expected, if the work were to be undertaken with a due regard to economy, that those who had to grapple with questions of that kind should take steps at the outset of the work to decrease the amount of available labour and to increase its cost. It did not appear to him that this movement would tend to facilitate the prosecution of that great work—the construction of the Pacific Railway.

MR. BUNSTER said that, with respect to the allusion made by the hon. member for Cumberland to the cost of constructing the national highway, the question of the amount was not so important as whether they had the means to pay it. The second of the resolution had alluded in delicate terms to some employers of Chinese labour in his constituency; that was a matter which the hon. member should take into consideration, and the position on the question could be very well understood. While he (Mr. Bunster) would be glad, under other circumstances, to comply with the request of the hon. the Premier to withdraw his motion, he had now a duty to perform in the interest of the country, and hence he could not consent to withdraw it. By an immigration of good white labour the country would be settled and sufficient business would be furnished, not only to maintain the the Canadian Pacific Railway, but also other lines, as was proved in the case of the Central Pacific Road. Canada possessed a public domain which would be sufficient to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway. The sooner the Dominion looked the question of Chinese immigration fairly in the face, and dealt with it in the manner adopted by Australia, the better it would be for the people of British Columbia and Canada at large. The article written in the Globe, regarding the present motion, was such a brainless one that it was unworthy of notice, though he was credibly informed it was written by a member of the House, from whom better things might be expected. After his (Mr. Bunster's) long residence on the continent of America, he could not allow any hon. member who possessed not one-fourth part of his experience to dictate to him what resolutions he should introduce, and characterize his motions as hair-brained and farcical. when he was doing his duty to his adopted country. He treated the Globe article with the contempt which it properly merited, and hoped the next article penned by the gentleman he had reference to would be more in the interest of Canada. He (Mr. Bunster) hoped to see some of his sons acting as engineers on the Canadian Pacific Railway and running trains at a speed unrivalled on the continent. In regard to the argument put forward by the hon. member for Cumberland, that, as a matter of expediency and economy, the Government should not be prevented from availing themselves of that class of labour on the construction of the national railway, he entirely differed from that opinion, and he asked the Canadian Parliament to enter its protest against the employment of Chinese labour. Under these circumstances he could not withdraw his motion, and must refuse to do so.

Motion negatived on a Division.

PENSIONS FOR PUBLIC OFFICERS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved for a copy of all correspondence not now in the possession of Parliament, respecting the pensions for public officers who were in the service of British Columbia at the date of Union, 1871. He said it must be remembered that, at the time of the union of British Columbia with Canada, it was arranged that certain officers in that Province should be removed, and that they should be entitled to pensions unless they were furnished with situations elsewhere. He regarded that provision in the terms of Union as nothing more or less than buying out certain gentlemen in order to get their votes in favour of Confederation. Certain correspondence had passed between the Dominion Government and the Imperial Government, since Confederation, respecting the pensions, and he submitted the motion in order to obtain that correspondence. He believed there were gentlemen who held office in British Columbia at the time of Confederation now holding offices elsewhere and drawing large salaries, and he held that such men, employed by Her Majesty's Government, should not receive pensions from the Canadian Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE : I am not aware of any recent correspondence on the subject. There was at one time, I believe, some correspondence, but whatever there is will be brought down.

RIVER ST. CHARLES IMPROVEMENTS.

MOTION FOR STATEMENT.

Mr. BLANCHET moved for statement showing the names of the parties who tendered for the works now being constructed under the control of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners on the River St. Charles at Quebec, with the amount of each tender and the names of the several sureties ; also the name of the person or persons who individually or as partners were awarded contracts for the said several works.

AGRICULTURAL BANKS.

RESOLUTIONS PROPOSED.

Mr. THOMSON (Welland) moved that the House will, on Wednesday next, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, to consider the following Resolutions :—

1. Resolved, That experience shows that during the past forty years the business and industries of the people of Canada and of the United States have, in times undisturbed by war or pestilence, been paralysed by sudden, ruinous and occasionally long continued depressions and stagnations, and that each such crisis, aided by the steady products of agriculture, has passed away, and fresh activity and enterprise been developed ; and that hitherto no effectual means have been adopted to prevent the recurrence of the wide-spread ruin and misery which always characterises such crises.

2. Resolved, That it is not correct, though often asserted as being so, that over-trading, over-manufacturing and personal extravagance are the causes of these crises, the fact being that the cause must be sought for at the root of the system under which the industries, agricultural, mechanical, commercial and mercantile move, and not from the outcropping of an imperfect system, and that, as a rule, the imperfect being generally the source of imperfection, it is evident that a new system is needed, by which aid would be extended to the agricultural industry especially ; it, and it only being the underlying perpetuator of national and individual life and prosperity.

3. Resolved, That, as mechanical science has within the same period of forty years in a great measure supplanted manual labour, it is probable that a monetary system which sufficed for the former processes of industry, is inadequate to meet the demands of like processes, stimulated by machinery and steam power; and that it may fairly be concluded that from that circumstance results the want of harmony of system which produce those great catastrophes called panics or periodical depressions, which are always fraught with ruin to families and communities.

4. Resolved, That, as the banking and currency system now in force in the country is of a purely commercial character and only sufficient for mercantile transactions; as the only method by which farmers can obtain money is by mortgaging their farms at high rates of interest, generally resulting in ruin to the farmer; as experience has amply proved that no legitimate industry, agriculture, mechanical or commercial, can escape ultimate failure when money is the article of the first and highest profit, it is expedient that a system of agricultural banking should be created to ensure money aid to farmers at a low rate of interest, and upon a system more adapted to the needs of agriculture than that forming the basis of the present mercantile system of banking.

5. Resolved, That to obtain this object a measure should be passed by the Parliament of Canada, to be called the General Agricultural Banking Act, embodying the provisions set forth in the following Resolutions:—

6. Resolved, That an Agricultural Bank, distinguished by the name of the county, may be established in each county in Canada; that the capital stock of each such Bank shall be at least five hundred thousand dollars, in shares of twenty-five dollars each, and that the whole of the said capital stock shall be paid up before any banking business is commenced.

7. Resolved, That so soon as the said capital is paid up in full the same shall be deposited with the Government of Canada, who shall give to the Bank in exchange, free of charge, an equivalent amount of Dominion notes, each of which notes shall be stamped with a distinctive mark denoting the Agricultural Bank to which it has been issued; that upon such capital so deposited interest shall be paid by the Government to the Bank at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, but that such interests shall only be payable for such time as the Dominion notes given in exchange for the said capital continue unredeemed; and that such interest shall be calculated from time to time as the said Dominion notes are redeemed by the Government.

8. Resolved, That all deposits made with the Bank, except only Dominion notes bearing its own distinctive mark, shall in like manner once in each week be deposited with the Government, which, as in the case of the deposit of the capital stock, shall return to the Bank an equivalent amount of Dominion notes; and such deposits with the Government shall bear the same interest with the same conditions as the capital stock, save and except that arrangements may be made between Agricultural Banks for the mutual exchange of Dominion notes received on deposit and bearing the distinctive marks of any of such Banks so entering into such arrangement.

9. Resolved, That the bank shall issue no note or bill of its own.

10. Resolved, That the bank shall lend to farmers only, and for purposes of the farm only, on credits not exceeding one year.

11. Resolved, That the Bank shall not lend on the security of real estate, nor discount any note, nor hold any real estate, except only the premises actually required for its occupation; but that the bank may lend upon open account, with the security of two approved bondsmen, charging interest at not more than 5 per cent. on all moneys as withdrawn from the bank by the borrower; that borrowers and depositors with the bank shall be allowed interest at the rate of 3 per cent. on all balances at their credit, calculated from time to time as deposits are made or amounts withdrawn; that once in each year, or upon the final closing of the accounts, every account shall be balanced and a commission of 1 per cent. on the debits of the account current shall be charged the borrower or depositor towards defraying the expenses of the banking office.

12. Resolved, That the Bank may declare dividends out of its earnings at a rate not to exceed 5 per cent. per annum on its capital, and that any earnings over and above the amount sufficient to pay such dividend shall be applied as follows:—1st, in laying aside a sum not exceeding 10 per cent. upon the capital stock as a rest or reserve to equalize dividends in succeeding years; and 2nd, to reduce the rate of interest to borrowers in succeeding years to as low a point as will ensure the dividend of 5 per cent. hereinbefore specified; but that under no circumstance shall the bank charge a higher rate of interest than 5 per cent.

13. Resolved, That possession of shares in the capital stock of the bank shall be evidenced by the possession of the certificates of shares, which shall be transferable from one person to another without endorsement or transfer noted in the books of the bank; and that for the purpose of exercising the right to vote, each shareholder shall deposit the shares which he holds at the bank at least one week previous to the general or special meeting at which the votes are to be given.

14. Resolved, That the affairs of the bank shall be administered by a board of directors not less than five nor more than fifteen in number, who shall be elected by the votes of the majority of the shareholders present at the annual general meeting, each share entitling the holder thereof to one vote; that the qualification of a director shall be the holding of forty shares in the capital stock of the bank deposited with the bank, as in the next preceding resolution specified, at least one week before the day of election; that during the continuance in office of the director the said amount of shares shall remain deposited with the bank, and if the same are withdrawn by him previous to the expiry of his term of office he shall ipso facto cease to be a director; that the directors shall have power to fill vacancies as they arise, and that the directors, as soon as may be after their election, shall proceed to the election of one of their number to be the president of the bank.

15. Resolved, That the bank shall make monthly returns to the Government in such form as shall be prescribed by the Governor in Council, which returns shall be signed by the president and principal officer of the bank.

16. Resolved, That no dividend shall be made so as to impair the capital stock of the bank; and, if the same be done, that the directors knowing and wilfully concurring therein shall be jointly and severally liable for the amount thereof.

17. Resolved, That if any cashier, assistant cashier, manager, clerk or servant of the bank, secretes, embezzles or absconds with any bond, obligation, bill obligatory or of credit or other bill or note, or any security for money, or any money or effects entrusted to him as such cashier, assistant cashier, manager, clerk or servant, whether the same belong to the said bank or belong to any person or persons, body or bodies, politic or corporate, or institution or institutions, and be lodged with the said bank, the said cashier, assistant cashier, manager clerk or servant, so offending and being thereof convicted in due form of law, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall be punished by imprisonment at hard labour in the penitentiary for any term not less than two years, or by imprisonment in any gaol or place of confinement for any term less than two years, in the discretion of the Court.

18. Resolved, That the making of any wilfully false or deceptive statement in any account, statement, return, report or other document respecting the affairs of the bank, shall, unless it amounts to a higher offence, be a misdemeanour, and any and every president, director, auditor, manager, cashier, or other officer of the bank, preparing, signing, approving or concurring in such statement, return, report or document, or using the same with intent to deceive or mislead any party, shall be held to have wilfully made such false statement, and shall further be responsible for all damages sustained by such party in consequence thereof.

19. Resolved, That an inspector or inspectors of agricultural banks shall be appointed by the Governor in Council, whose duty it shall be to inspect such banks at least once in each six months, and to report thereon to the Minister of Finance; that the salaries of such inspector or inspectors shall be paid by a pro rata contribution from the agricultural banks based upon the amount of their capital; that an inspector shall have power, in the event of any infringement of the Act respecting agricultural banks, to take sole charge of the bank, and to report the case to the Minister of Finance.

20. Resolved, That the Governor in Council shall have power and authority in such case to make such order, either as to the future management of the bank or as to the winding up of its affairs, as to him may seem advisable.

He said it was important that he should make a few remarks with reference to the resolutions which he proposed to submit. To the subject of Finance, as was well known to the House, he had given a good deal of consideration, because he had always felt that it lay at the foundation of all the industrial elements of the country. He could not possibly make the suggestions he proposed, without repeating a little of what he had said before; but he would try to avoid repetitions as far as he could. He had listened to a great many excellent speeches from hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House this Session, all touching the subject of the material prosperity of the country; but it did seem to him that all these speeches had a tendency to skin the surface and not to strike at the root of the matter. They found—which was to him a very extraordinary thing—that money, a thing that was created out of industry and established by industry and established by material progress as in the past, was introduced as the first and greatest profit when it was only made for the purpose of moving industry out of which the profit ought to come; also, that all the money of the country was within what he called the commercial circle. The banking system was created by merchants. The money was made for the purpose of commerce, and it never reached the agricultural class. Now, he believed that the agricultural class was the fundamental class of all the growth, of all the strength, and of all the vitality of the nation. It was the agricultural class which made the merchant, and not the merchant that made the agricultural class. They had in some way or other got the cart before the horse in many ways.

During the forty years, from 1837 to 1877, that he had been actively engaged in business, he had seen a great many of these crises or pressures, and he had noticed that each one of them was a little more intense than the preceding one, and that they began to come a little oftener and last a little longer. He thought that he could say as much in two minutes about the origin of these depressions as could be said in a speech of four hours. He said that mechanical science, which came into activity some fifty years ago, and which placed the steam engine and artificial labour in every village and hamlet on the face of the earth, had made a disturbance in the harmony between supply and demand that the present financial system was not able to regulate. He held that the system which was quite sufficient for the plough and the harrow and all that sort of thing, long ago, was not sufficient for the steam engine and the artificial labour which science had created; and he maintained, therefore, that the mechanical science had to be met by new considerations, and a financial basis equal to the requirements and capacity of production by machinery. It was quite impossible under a proper state of things to have such a thing as over-production. If man were the dearest thing in the market, that is if the monetary power was sufficient to make man's labour worth its value, and worth, instead of $1 a day, possibly $2 or $3 a day, or $5 or $10 a day, etc.,—if the financial system was such that human labour was the dearest thing in the market, the power of consumption would always be great and equal to the greatest capacity of the production of any nation whatever; but, if they made dear products and cheap labour, why, of course, the production, whenever machines came in to help, would overrun consumption; and thus they had crises. There was no escape from them. There was nothing done or said on the face of the earth during the tremendous pressure that had lasted since 1873—there had not been a thought in England or in the United States, or in Canada, as to how another crisis like this was going to be prevented; and now they were just going along, living a little economically, doing a little less business, and trusting to nature and agriculture to bring the country back to a little prosperity. Then there would come a little confidence of credit or credit of confidence, and the people would say: "We have good times again." Then away went the steam engines at full speed; and then came another pressure and another crisis worse than the one before. There was no use in living to have such a state of things going on continuously. There was a way of stopping all this; the money that was made to be the agent of industry should cease to be the master of industry; but that was the position in which we now were. He held that the lesser should not control the greater; that commerce should not control agriculture; agriculture was the fundamental and strongest element, and therefore, agriculture ought to have a monetary system of its own totally irrespective of the mercantile system or of anything else set forth. It was with the view of obtaining this object that he had, the other day, introduced to the House a set of resolutions relating to an Agricultural Bank Bill. There were many features in this Bill which were a little novel, and a good many features which were quite ancient. The working system of it was the old Scotch system. He proposed, for instance, that a bank system be created, to be called the Agricultural Bank for agriculturists. This would require, of course, to be a Government Bill. He suggested the idea, in these resolutions that, whenever a bank was formed by the inhabitants of a county, they should subscribe among themselves, say half a million of dollars, and, singular to say, this only showed the force of the system. They could do anything with this system. He held that it was totally unnecessary to go out of Canada to borrow a dollar, and that every single cent of money that was required in Canada to build the Pacific Railway, or for public improvements, and everything else, could be obtained by means of this system. And this system could be created. He proposed that the farmers should subscribe $500,000 or $1,000,000 in each county; and the very first objection with which he was met was: Where are you going to get the money? Why, every farmer who had $500 could become a stockholder—he would make his stock $25 a share. The farmer could buy twenty shares with his $500. He would make the dividends of the bank five per cent., and the interest five per cent. to begin with. The farmer would put these twenty shares in his pocket-book, and he would have three or four men working for him during the season. The farmer would say to his men: "Now, John, etc., instead of going and spending your money, and wasting it, take a few of these shares. "They would be accepted, and five per cent. dividend would be drawn. Hence, on a farmer employing three or four men, these $500 in shares could be got rid of, and the workmen would be very glad to get them; so that $500 of scrip would be just as useful, and just as good money in the farmer's pocket, as $500 in cash. Therefore, he maintained that this system would double the present pecuniary capacity of every man in the county that could raise its $500,000 or $1,000,000, and never miss it. Instead of taking this million and putting it in the bank, to issue notes upon it, which would not be a fructifying operation, he would say, let every agricultural bank deposit its capital and customers' deposits with the Government; let the Government give a small interest for it—say three per cent.—and let the Government give, in return for such deposits, an equal amount of Dominion notes for the bank, which notes would cause no interest to accrue against the bank until such time as any portion of these notes were returned to the Government for redemption at their counter. The advantage to banks was this: that they had not, while these notes were in circulation, to be at the expense of making their own currency, nor did they require to have a lot of gold in hand to redeem their notes when dealing with other banks. That million of dollars would go to the Government, and the banks would get Dominion notes, week after week, for all their bills of exchange, etc. Now, that meant the use of $100,000 or $200,000 by the Government, for, of course, they did not require to keep more than 30c. or 40c. in the dollar to redeem their own notes, and with that money they could reduce the public debt ten per cent. annually, carry on their public works, make free trade and increase the productive power of the country. The way to cause home production was to place it in the power of farmers to get money, so that they might purchase at the cheapest rate. Many manufacturers consumed about fifty per cent. of foreign articles in their manufactories, and if they got these at the lowest possible rate, while, at the same time, the interest on money came down under this system to two or three per cent., no country could manufacture more cheaply than Canada. Now, he would show the House how he proposed to bring the interest down to two per cent. If he lent a million of dollars in cash to the Government at three per cent., and a million dollars in bank deposits at 3 per cent. also, he would, with the Dominion notes he got from the Government, have two millions to lend instead of one, and by lending out that two millions or so much of it as could be lent, at 5 per cent., he would probably make a total profit or interest of 8 per cent. Ten per cent. of the surplus profit or the 5 per cent. dividend he would set aside by way of creating a sinking fund, and the remainder became a deposit to the interest of next year's dividend. He could, by a calculation, exactly ascertain how much of a surplus he would have to make a 5 per cent. dividend—perhaps 4 or 3, or, if prosperity increased, even as low as 2 per cent. And, when money was brought down to so low a rate, the whole mercantile banking body would rejoice, because their business, like that of the English bankers, would become one of commissions instead of discounts, and banking itself would be a safer business in Canada than at present. It was a bad system to lend money to a farmer at 8 per cent., because that was as much as his farm yielded on what he invested upon it, and, consequently, if he paid as much for money as his farm realized, he made nothing. That was the true secret of depressed trade; that was the reason why a nation could not prosper, and that, also, was why the people were reduced to such straits. Now, if the crisis which had proved so disastrous to this country were to be averted in future, it was necessary to strike at the root of the matter, and, by substituting a cash for a credit system, create a fund which would sustain our industries. Of course, men would not get money without working for it, but, under the existing system, a man did not get any money, no matter how hard he worked. As regarded the amount of money in circulation in different countries, Canada was peculiarly behind other places. In England, the circulation was estimated at $35 per head; in France, at $25; in the United States, at $18; and in Canada, at about $6 or $7. He had listened with much attention to the speech delivered the other night by the hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Macdonald). It was thoroughly mercantile in its character, and, as far as such a speech went, was sound and good. Unlike agricultural production, the mercantile system was one merely of agency, and could not be dealt with philosophically. In all nations, money ought to be diffusive, as a means of creating all the productions necessary to satisfy the needs of a civilized community, and it ought, therefore, to be placed on a substantial basis. No little coterie of retired merchants or men of business, possessing some small capital, should have it in their power to constitute themselves stockholders or directors of banks, and in this way, by controlling the funds of a nation, regulate its industries or productive power. Even with the best intentions in the world, they curbed the energies of the nation, for they did not possess enough capital to enable them to put money in circulation at a reasonable rate. A credit system invariably militated against the soundness of a banking concern, because, by the inability of the persons to whom money was lent at a high rate of interest—as in the case of a farmer which he had instanced—to fulfil their obligations, the banks, being involved in the crisis which generally resulted, suffered greatly. After such a crisis they required time in order that they might be resuscitated, and, of course, a considerable period elapsed before they were able to help anyone. Commercial prosperity and productive industry were thus retarded at the very time they required to be fostered by monetary aid, and, at last, when the crisis was fairly got over, another excitement set in, and before any good results were derived from this seeming prosperity, another crisis occurred. These alternations of excitement and depression had as regularly succeeded one another during the last 40 years, as the rising and setting sun, and, unless some means could be devised whereby this state of things might be remedied, men need not dream of making fortunes, because, when they were beginning to realize their expectations, the occurrence of a crisis swept away all they had accumulated. There was a time when commerce was a great institution—when merchants out of their own private fortunes were able to build ships, carrying guns, and from forty to fifty men on board, fitted, either to conquer a country, to introduce civilization, or, by bringing the ends of the world together, to find new markets for goods. All that had now ceased. By the invention of telegraphs, steamboats, railroads and so on, the peculiar vocation of merchants had passed away, and they were not now the great men they had formerly been. Commerce, now, was nothing but a mere system of brokerage, and the chief clerk in an office was quite as big a man as the merchant himself. But, though the grander power of the merchants had passed away, they were still able to control finance, and to destroy every industrial effort of a country. It was to take that power out of their hands that he suggested the propriety, the necessity, of having a new system. Now, there was no country where such a system could be more easily introduced than in Canada. She was a new country without any great debt, and without any old-fashioned opinions. Canada was a fresh young giant, able to strike out in a new line, and take the slight risk which such a course might cause. If, after a trial of such a system, no one was benefited, it would be found that no great harm had been done; but if, on the other hand, it proved a success, great and lasting good would result therefrom. He had not a word to say against the really excellent speeches which had emanated from the other side of the House this Session. He had a great respect for Opposition speeches, though a steadfast supporter of the Government, because they tended to elucidate some truth and to stimulate thought. He had not, before this Session, spoken on the subject of home industry and protection, however, because there was really nothing in what had been said by gentlemen on the opposite side which called for argument. These gentlemen had not laid down any system of protection which called for special remark from hon. members on the Government side, and, in making this observation, he referred particularly to what had fallen from the hon. member for Cumberland, for whom he entertained the greatest admiration. A system of protection, which would enable a country to send out manufactured articles at a cheaper price than similar articles could be sold for in another country having a tariff, while they themselves were able to buy at the lowest rate, was the only system which could possibly be of any real good. Every penny saved to the people of this country was an addition to their capital or wealth and their power to manufacture, and, if the Government could not make a cheap money, they could not make a free trade. Several things must go together to make up the prosperity of a country; but, while our money was at eight per cent. interest, we could not hope to have a free trade with other nations. Impressed with this idea, he had tried to introduce an agricultural bank, by means of which farmers might be assisted in such a way as to be rendered more comfortable, and able to gain more profits than at present. Under that system, a farmer might borrow $1,000, $2,000 or $500, as the case might be, for the purpose of fencing in one or two more fields, employing a few more men, getting a dairy, buying more cattle, making more butter, or putting up a new barn, on the security of two neighbours—not, however, to pay debts with. No interest was charged on the credits, except as the borrower chose to check out some portion of his credit, and then 5 per cent. was the interest to be charged. In the course of the season further payments were made, and at the end of twelve months the account was closed. In this way the farmer was benefitted and the capital of the bank increased. Then, next season, if the farmer wished to extend his operations, more money would be advanced to him, and the capital of the bank would eventually so develop that the rate of interest might be reduced from 5 to 2 per cent. By the increased circulation thereby created agriculturists would not only be able to buy more cheaply, but they would find a readier sale for their cattle, horses and produce than at present. Now, if they made the circulating medium in harmony with the industrial capacity of the people, wherever there was not a man who had anything to sell, there would be another ready to buy. The same system had proved very successful in Scotland. Twenty years ago, he saw there rough whin hedges and badly cultivated fields, and when he visited the same part of the country a few years ago he found it like a garden. Another process which held in Great Britain was that the Government lent money to the landlords for the purpose of carrying out improvements. This course gave a great stimulus to agriculture. His proposal for an Agricultural Bank would effect the same good for Canadian farmers. There was one curious thing about these crises, too. He had observed that all these crises struck the far-away places first: the places farthest from London and New York and Montreal. The agricultural community were badly treated; the farmer's wife in Canada worked harder, and lived in a state nearer approaching serfdom, than the woman of any other country speaking the English language. Of course, they had everything but money; they had no money to employ servants, and, therefore, they were themselves overworked. He thought that some such system as that embodied in the resolutions was calculated to benefit very materially the agricultural interest.

AUDIT OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS BILL.

(Mr. Cartwright).

FIRST READING.

MR. CARTWRIGHT introduced a Bill (No. 53) For the better auditing of the Public Accounts. He said he might mention, for the information of the House, that it had been found expedient to reprint the whole of the Audit Act, inasmuch as there would be some alterations in matters of detail in addition to the main alteration, which would consist in separating definitely the office of Deputy Minister of Finance from the office of Auditor-General, in accordance with the English custom. This, with the requisite alterations in detail which such a change would involve, was the main feature of the Bill. There were, however, some other alterations, partly copied from the English Act, and partly adopted with the view to better auditing the Public Accounts, under a new system which could be better explained when the Bill was in the hands of members.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the tenure of office of the Auditor-General is to be the same as in England?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Yes; it is proposed to make it similar.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Is it proposed to put the name of the first Auditor-General in the Bill, as was, I think, the case in England?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: No; that is not to be done.

MR. THOMSON.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman had better look into that point, because the English House of Commons, if he remembered aright, was very jealous respecting it, on the inauguration of that office. It occurred to him, that it would be highly advantageous and greatly promote the public business, if the English system were introduced regarding the introduction of Government Bills. The English practice, when such a Bill was introduced, was that there should be a full explanation of it then given. So much was this the case that, on the second reading of a Government Bill, the Minister who had introduced it moved, as a matter of general practice, the second reading sub silentio, having explained the Bill fully on its inception and initiation. His hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) would remember that there was some considerable discussion in the newspapers, or rather that considerable remarks were made when Mr. Gladstone not only explained a Bill—it related, he thought, to the disestablishment of the Irish Church—on the first reading, but also entered into it at length on the second reading. This was considered a rather unusual practice, and as one which sought to pre-engage the attention of the House. It was of very great assistance to the House to get possession of the principles of a measure and of the main details of the policy of the Government in this respect the moment that a Government Bill was introduced in the House.

MR. MACKENZIE: It would require to be a very minute explanation indeed, unless the Bill were printed in the first place.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am supposing that the Government Bills are prepared.

MR. MACKENZIE: The practice here has been never to have a Bill printed until it is read the first time; and that, doubtless, has led to our practice of explaining them on the second reading.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Oh, no. The Bill in England is never distributed until after explanation. The Government explains, of course, the general policy of the Bill—not clause by clause as in Committee of the Whole—and its leading features, so that the House gets possession of the Bill and of the grounds on which the Government presses it on the attention of the Parliament and the country at the time it is introduced. I merely throw out the suggestion with a view to its future adoption.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I dare say there is a good deal to be said in favour of that practice; and I, too, can see many advantages in it, but, as the hon. gentleman knows, that has not, heretofore, been the custom. Had it been so, I would have adopted it.

MR. HOLTON: No doubt my right hon. friend has correctly described the English practice. It has been a special effort of mine, since the year of Confederation, to conform our practice as closely as possible to that of the English House of Commons; but I was not always successful in convincing my right hon. friend when he led the House that this practice had the great advantage which he now perceives it has. I am entirely with him, however, in his suggestion in this respect.

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman has somewhat overstated the English practice. The English practice is to explain the general features of the Bill and to give a summary of its contents, but never to discuss—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Oh, no.

MR. MILLS: The principles underlying it or the grounds on which it is defended; all this is left to the second reading.

MR. HOLTON: Sometimes that is done.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The general practice and policy of the measure, and the reasons which induce the Government to bring it down are briefly explained in the first reading; that is all.

Bill read the first time.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole, to-morrow, to consider the following resolution:—

“That it is expedient to repeal Section 23 of ‘The Merchant Shipping Act, 1876’ as respects all Ships in Canadian waters, from and after the time which may be fixed for that purpose by the proclamation of the approval and confirmation by Her Majesty in Council of the Act to be passed for effecting such repeal.”

He said it was provided in the Merchant Shipping Act of 1876, with regard to deck-loads, that they should be measured at the place of loading, and that the Custom-house officer or the officer of the Board of Trade should have this measurement entered in the company's book, and give the captain a statement of the tonnage of the deck cargo which was to be added to the registered tonnage of the vessel, and on which dues were paid. This must be done at St. John; and she was liable to fees and dues on this deck cargo, plus the registered tonnage of the ship. Such was also the case in England, and what the Government thought was that this was a matter which really came within the competence of this Parliament, and that, in this relation, Imperial legislation should not be made applicable. They, therefore, proposed that the portion of the Act so far as related to the waters of Canada, should not apply at all. He would explain what was contemplated more fully in Committee.

MR. MITCHELL said that this met with his entire approval. He quite agreed with the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that we had a right to legislate with regard to Canadian commerce, shipping or trade or Canadian interests at large; and he held that we ought to endeavour to make such legislation as we thought the interests of Canada required, irrespective of any British legislation that existed, and that wherever they conflicted, our own legislation should govern our own trade, our own vessels and our own interests.

Motion agreed to.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) moved that, on Thursday next, the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

“That it is expedient to provide that so much of the Act of the Parliament of Canada, passed in the thirty-sixth year of Her Majesty’s Reign, and intituled An Act respecting Deck Loads, as would make it lawful for any master of a ship, at certain seasons, to carry live stock on or above any part of the upper deck of such ship be repealed, and that the words ‘any cargo of any description to any height exceeding three feet above deck,’ in the second section of the said Act shall not include or apply to live stock.”

He said that his hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell) would remember that, during his administration of the office over which he (Mr. Smith) now presided, in 1873, an Act was passed regulating the carrying of deck loads. It was provided by that Act that deck loads should be restricted to three feet above the deck. At the time, he was not aware—and he did not think it was the case—that cattle or live stock formed any portion of the exports of this country; but since then, a considerable trade in the export of cattle had been developed. The law of 1873 provided that deck loads, of whatever they might be composed, should not be carried above three feet from the deck. His hon. friend would also know that the Merchant Shipping Act of 1876, a somewhat similar law, had been passed by the Imperial Parliament, regulating deck loads, and this was made largely to harmonize with our own.

MR. MITCHELL: They took a pattern from us.

MR. SMITH: Very much so; with the exception, that, whereas in this country this restriction was not confined to lumber or wood goods, but comprehended every description of cargo, in England it was confined to wood goods; and there no objection was now taken to cattle being sent home on decks, and for a height of over three feet above them. Oxen, horses, etc., were, of course, more than three feet high, and if the provision in question remained in existence, such mode of conveyance would be punishable by law. It was, consequently, proposed to remove this restriction as far as related to live stock. Many reasons for this step existed, which, he supposed, it was not necessary to give at this moment; but at the next stage, of necessity, he would enter into the particulars, and show why such a change in the law was desirable.

MR. MITCHELL said he quite approved of the suggestions made by the hon. gentleman, but he was not prepared to say whether they should permit the carriage of live stock above deck on vessels carrying passengers at all. That was a matter which, when the Bill came up for consideration, ought to occupy the serious attention of the House. He made this suggestion with the view of rendering the Bill as complete as possible, for not only must the security of freights be looked to, but also the security of human life, which, indeed, was a matter of paramount importance. Perhaps, therefore, the best course to take would be to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, who might take the evidence of shipmasters from Montreal on the subject, also the testimony of gentlemen in this House who had considerable acquaintance with the matter. These Bills were generally made departmental, and the evidence of a shipowner interested merely in getting as much out of his freights as possible might be taken, with proper consideration being given to the lives of the crews and passengers on vessels engaged in the carriage of cattle. Indeed, it might be for the Committee to express an opinion as to whether cattle should be carried on deck during winter or not.

MR. SMITH said the point raised by the hon. gentleman was one that merited attention. The Department had made several enquiries into the matters to which the Bill related, and they were thoroughly satisfied with the result of their investigations. He had no objection, however, to consider the suggestions made by the hon. gentleman, because he agreed with him in thinking that it was of the utmost importance that life, as well as property, should be secured.

PUBLIC WORKS ACT AMENDMENT
BILL.—[BILL No. 13].

(Mr. Mackenzie.)

SECOND READING.

MR. MACKENZIE said that, as he mentioned in introducing the measure, it was a very brief one and simply intended to authorize the employment of a shorthand-writer to take evidence before the Dominion Arbitrators. The business of the legal Courts in Ontario had been greatly facilitated in this way, and it was proposed that, as great delay had been experienced last season by the taking of evidence in longhand by the Arbitrators, the testimony of witnesses should be taken down in shorthand by a stenographer who should be previously sworn by one of the Arbitrators; that the notes should be read over at the close of the examination, and that, after being transcribed, they should be signed by the witness, or, in default of the witness not being able to read, by the stenographer. Also, that the expenses incurred in this way should, under the Act, be taxed as costs and paid as such; further, that all cases pending at the time this Act was passed, should be dealt with in this way. That was the whole Bill, and he presumed there could be no objection to it.

MR. THOMPSON (Haldimand) said he wished to know whether the Premier would object to a clause being added providing for the appointment of an Arbitrator by a person sustaining damage. In the county of Haldimand several people who had sustained loss by the rising of the Dunnville Dam had complained of the present system of arbitration, alleging that they had no confidence whatever in the officials appointed by Government and expressed a desire to have some one who would act as an Arbitrator on their behalf.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the adoption of such a suggestion would lead to a change in the entire mode of arbitration. He quite admitted that there was some apparent justice in the request made by the hon. member for Haldimand, but he believed that arbitrators appointed by Government were disposed, almost invariably, to give any claimant the benefit of a doubt which might exist as to the value of property. It had been found that the decisions of arbitrators never differed from those of valutors who had been appointed. In the case of the Lachine Canal, where property to the amount of between $300,000 and $400,000 was taken from private holders, there had not, so far as he remembered, been more than eight appeals against the decisions of the valutors, and of these only three received a small sum in advance of the amount awarded by the valutors, who were very careful in taking evidence as to the values of the properties. The same thing had occurred, so far as he knew, in the case of all other great public works, there being no material difference in the decision arrived at. If the suggestion of his hon. friend was adopted it would have the effect of changing the whole system of arbitration as it at present existed, and cause the alteration of some eight or ten clauses of the Public Works Act. Such a radical change he would scarcely feel himself justified in acceding to at the present time, because he believed it would result disadvantageously to the public. From all the cases that had come under his notice, he did not think private parties had any just reason to complain of the operation of the present Act. No doubt a few parties on the Grand River had complained that they did not receive a sufficient amount for damages, or alleged damages, done to their canal by the raising of the Dunnville Dam; but in all these cases he was inclined to think an exaggerated value was put on the property by the owners, and that general satisfaction was given by the arbitrators and valutors. In two or three cases there might have been a doubt, but these, he thought, were decided to the advantage of the parties who made the claims. The experience the Government had gained, even in that quarter, did not, therefore, give them any justification for making such a radical change as that recommended. He quite admitted that, on the face of the matter, it seemed but just that persons should have an arbitrator of their own, and as he believed, also, that the present system was not wholly satisfactory, he would give the proposition which the hon. gentleman had made his consideration; beyond that, he would make no promise.

Mr. TUPPER wished to ask the hon. the Minister of Public Works whether he had given his consideration to the matter raised in the House a few days previously—namely, as to whether some cheap and inexpensive mode could not be found out whereby, in cases where damage was done to cattle by the Intercolonial Railway, the matter should be referred to some competent person outside the officers immediately connected with the road? He thought this might be provided for by a clause in the Bill in the event of the suggestion commending itself to the hon. gentleman's approval. This very fact of an award being made by the arbitrators in such cases, at present, was a censure on the railway officials, because it seemed to show that sufficient care had not been taken by them. If the person making the claim was admitted to have a just claim, the Government might turn round to the conductor or other official connected with the Intercolonial Railway in charge at the time an ox or a horse was killed and say that he was censurable. Under these circumstances, though the decision given by the arbitrator might be a fair one, it would not give satisfaction, and he thought the arbitrament should be vested in persons who, on the one hand, were not interested in claiming damages from the Government, and, on the other, were not in any way directly connected with the railway. He had on the routine paper two or three cases in relation to which parties complained to him that justice had not been done; the circumstances attending the killing of their cattle on the railway not having received proper investigation. If the hon. the Minister of Public Works had not, under the present Act, power to avert such an anomaly, he might, by the introduction of a short clause in his Bill, enable that object to be attained.

Mr. POULIOT said he agreed with the hon. member for Cumberland in thinking that some improvement should be made in deciding upon cases where cattle were destroyed on the Intercolonial Railway. Several things, he felt convinced, did not receive proper attention; for instance, when an ox or a horse was killed, the arbitrators very seldom considered whether a fence or a gate had been improperly left down. He was inclined to think that other than interested persons should decide upon these cases, and expressed the opinion that they should be referred to a Court where people might be assured that justice would be done.

Mr. BROUSE said a good deal of dissatisfaction existed in some parts of the country as to the present law, whereby all the arbitrators were appointed by Government, and the parties sustaining loss had no voice in the matter whatever. He had been interviewed and written to by many of his friends throughout the section of the country which he represented, who very distinctly asked that the matter might be brought before the Government, so that justice might be done to the people. Very often the Government were forced to take possession of lands, and they brought their arbitrators from a distance, probably, to make an award. It certainly looked more feasible to him for the Government to yield upon this point, and give the sufferers the right to select one out of the two or three arbitrators, for they ought to be allowed a distinct voice in the matter.

Mr. MITCHELL said the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Brouse) had correctly represented the state of affairs in the county which he (Mr. Mitchell) represented. He had repeatedly brought to the notice of officers of the Intercolonial Railway grievances such as those referred to, and he had invariably found that, where damage was done by the killing of cattle or horses that had strayed on the line, by the diverting of streams or by injury to land, there was at this moment practically no redress for gentlemen who, like himself, belonged to the Opposition. A number of these accidents occurred, as the hon. member for Temiscouata had correctly represented, through the negligence of the section men who were on the road. It was their duty to see that the fences were well kept and the gates closed; but they neglected their duty, and the cattle got upon the track. One very noticeable case occurred, in which a herd of cattle strayed on the line only one and a-half miles from a station, and the reckless officers drove their engine right through the herd, killing five of them. If actions must be taken, it occasioned a great expense to the sufferers, besides which, in almost every case that had occurred in his county (Northumberland), reference had been made by the Government to the same railway official whose neglect had led to the accident. He had mentioned to a superintendent of the Intercolonial Railway that a certain portion of the track was without fence, but that gentleman would not believe him,—said it was utterly impossible, that there must be a fence there, while there had never been a fence at that point. He hoped, too, that some steps would be taken so that the investigations into the causes of these accidents might take place in the vicinity of the spot where they happened; where the conduct of the section men and the other officials could be looked into; and where poor people, who might be sufferers, could afford to attend and bring their neighbours as witnesses. He hoped the hon. the First Minister would carefully consider some way in which this might be done, as such an arrangement must give satisfaction.

Mr. MACKENZIE said he was much obliged to the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), for mentioning this matter. It had caused him some anxiety, because of the extreme difficulty there was in obtaining accurate statements of facts with regard to these accidents. He was surprised at the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) when he suggested that, because he was opposed to the Government, his statements did not receive the same consideration as another.

MR. MITCHELL: I do say it.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not think there is any officer on the Intercolonial Railway who has been guilty of such conduct.

MR. MITCHELL: I was not speaking of the officers, but of the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE said that, with regard to the Government, they had always acted upon the recommendation of the officer of the railway in reference to paying claims for accidents. He, himself, had some cases, one in the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Mitchell's) county, where he was quite satisfied that the accident was not caused by any fault of the officers of the Intercolonial railway.

MR. MITCHELL: What case was that?

MR. MACKENZIE said he was not going to discuss individual cases; he was merely making general statements now. It was undoubtedly desirable, as he had stated during the last discussion upon the point, that some person should have authority, in some way, to make investigations in cases where there was a manifest dispute as to the facts, and in looking over the Statute already in existence, a few days ago, he thought they had already a provision that met the difficulty. In the Act to extend the powers of official arbitrators, they had this clause:

"1. If any person or body corporate now has or shall hereafter have any supposed claim upon the Government of Canada for property taken for any public use, service or purpose, not coming within the purview of the Act passed in the thirty-first year of Her Majesty's Reign, chaptered twelve, and intituled 'An Act respecting the Public Works of Canada,' or for alleged, direct or consequent damages to property, arising out of anything heretofore done, or hereafter to be done by the Government of Canada, and not coming within the purview of the said Act; or arising out of any death or any injury to person or property on any railway, canal, or public work under the control and management of the Government of Canada, or arising out of or connected with the execution or fulfilment; or on account of deductions made for non-execution or non-fulfilment of any contract entered into with the head of any Department of the Government of Canada, either in the name of Her Majesty, or in any other manner whatsoever,—such person or body corporate may give notice in writing of such claim to the Secretary of State of Canada, stating the particulars thereof, and how the same has arisen; which notice the Secretary of State shall refer to the head of the Department with respect to which the claim has arisen, who shall then have, with respect to said claim, power to tender satisfaction, and, if it be not accepted, to refer the claim to one or more of the official arbitrators appointed under the said Act; and the said official arbitrators shall then have power to hear and award upon such claims.”

He had not had time to submit this to the law officers of the Crown, but his impression upon reading it, yesterday, was that this Act would cover what was suggested by the hon. member for Cumberland. It was almost impossible to avoid extravagant claims against the Government, and it was exceedingly difficult to reconcile the statements made by the parties interested, and by parties engaged upon the road. The usual practice was not to trust to officials, as some hon. gentlemen supposed, whose neglect of duty might have caused the accident. For instance, the track-master and the men under him might neglect their duty in such a way as to leave the road open for cattle to stray upon it, but the tales to be told at the examination were not left to these officers altogether; there was another person to whom these track-masters were more immediately responsible, Mr. Luttrell or Mr. Brydges, or some one of the local or traffic superintendents, whichever officer could be sent to the place most conveniently, investigated the matter. These high officers were not interested in protecting improperly the subordinates, through whose neglect these accidents had occurred; but, as he had before stated, they had evidence so conflicting sometimes, that a great difficulty was experienced in deciding. In one case, they had some twenty affidavits made contrary to the statement made by the officers. In such a case as that, it was clearly impossible for the Government, intelligently, to make a settlement, and he proposed, if this Act was not sufficient, and he believed it was, hereafter to have some one sent along the line of railway at certain periods, to investigate all cases he might come across, take evidence, and report to the Government upon their merits, irrespective of the testimony of the road officials, except so far as that testimony might be fairly weighed as from competent witnesses in the case. He thought this would meet with the suggestions of the hon. member for Cumberland, and he entirely agreed with him as to the propriety and advisability of having this put into operation.

MR. MITCHELL said there had been cases in his county in which Messrs. Luttrell and Brydges had done nothing, beyond acting upon the information given by others.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said, under that Act, such cases were to be enquired into before an arbitrator, and compensation given by a Railway Committee. This was not always a satisfactory tribunal, and for the reason that it was not in the confidence of the country. The people supposed, erroneously, to a great extent, that this tribunal was composed of officers of the Crown, holding their offices during the pleasure of the Government; and as they were the nominees of the Crown and were paid by the Crown, it was supposed they would regard the interests of the Crown rather than the interests of the individual. This, he believed, was not the case; still, it was true, as the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Brouse) had stated, the country had not confidence in them. If the tenure of office were altered, and if they were men of great experience, perhaps the confidence of the country would be increased. It had always seemed to him, since the establishment of the Court of Exchequer, that this Court should try these cases. If it was more convenient it might sit here, but if it was a case in connection with a large work, such as the Welland Canal, or the Intercolonial Railway, the Judge could go on circuit. One Judge could try these cases infinitely more satisfactorily than the proposed arbitrator. That seemed to be the best means of dealing with the larger claims, that they should be tried by one Judge of the Court of Exchequer, with an appeal to the Court above. The Government would have to pay the official arbitrator's salaries, while if his suggestion were adopted they would only have to pay the expenses of one Judge, if one was appointed. They might also have an officer going over the Government line of railway and making enquiries into smaller claims, loss of cattle and such like. That person might be an officer of the Court. The registrar, précis writer, or additional officer, might be sent by the Court along this line to consider these little claims, and, as a general rule, give judgment upon them, subject to revision by the Court above. In the United States they had a special Court to try all such matters, which they called the Court of Claims. That Court had enjoyed great confidence among the people from the position of the Judge, Judge Loring. He had obtained such high standing in the Court of Claims that he was absolutely made Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was much obliged to the hon. gentleman for his suggestion, but, if he (Mr. Mackenzie) understood him aright, he proposed to supplant the Dominion arbitrators by Judges of the Court of Exchequer.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was this about it; that, in cases connected with the Grand River or the Welland Canal, such as those referred to, the arbitrators examined the ground and judged for themselves of facts upon the subject; they could hardly expect Judges to do that, and he rather thought, if they adopted the suggestion, that they would have to maintain the arbitrators still, but with appeal to one of the Judges in Court. They must either adopt that plan, or that of the member for Haldimand (Mr. Thompson); but perhaps it would be as well to allow the Bill to stand for a time.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there was no objection to the Bill, but he was strongly opposed, in the interests of the public, to a tribunal that had not the confidence of the people. The Crown had no special interest except to protect the public. It was very true, as the hon. the Premier had stated before, and as he (Sir John A.

Macdonald) had frequently had occasion to state from his place, when on the other side of the House, that in an argument, in which the claimant and the Crown were involved, the Crown generally got the worst of it, in the same way as banks, and railways, and insurance companies got the worst of it before a jury, the natural feeling of the jurymen inclining them to act on the theory of giving the poor man a chance, the company or the Government being rich and well able to lose the money. He thought that the consequences, under such a system, would be great loss to the Public Treasury, and excessive awards against the Crown.

MR. TUPPER said he thought the clause of the Act which the First Minister had quoted, covered the case and gave the Government power to deal with it. He believed that, under the law, before a case could be submitted to the official arbitrators, bonds had to be given for the costs. In many of these cases the parties, being poor people, were practically debarred from availing themselves of this tribunal. If the hon. the First Minister could devise some means of meeting that difficulty, such as appointing a single arbitrator to look into the case and have some outside party to judge between the Intercolonial Railway officials and the people, great cause of complaint would be removed.

MR. McCALLUM said the hon. the First Minister had stated the settlements of claims had been satisfactory. He differed from that opinion. The settlement of claims was not satisfactory, owing to the instructions given the arbitrators. Claims for damages from parties along the Grand River were generally caused by the rise of water for canal purposes. When the claims were on account of the overflow of water over the lands, the people were satisfied with the settlement. But there was another claim, arising from the land being washed away by the overflow, with which the arbitrators had no instructions to deal, and a great deal of dissatisfaction was thereby caused.

MR. PLUMB said it was desirable, in the general interest, that some others besides the arbitrators nominated by the Government should be appointed to act in the examination of damages and the appraising of awards. In all dealings between man and man, this was done. It might be possible that there would be sympathy with the claimant rather than the Government, but, on the other hand, it was clear that arbitrators appointed by the Government would, in order to retain their positions, lean somewhat to the side of the Government. The hon. the Premier had repudiated that idea with more severity than the case called for. He thought it would be very natural that employes should take a view favourable to the Government in a case of that kind. He approved of the suggestion that the arbitrators should be chosen, one by the Government, one by the claimant, and a third in the usual way.

Mr. POULIOT said he had a letter in which a man complained that he had suffered for five or six years from excessive water in the spring, owing to the railway fences impeding the drainage. The arbitrators went there in the summer months, and, of course, found no cause for complaint on this score, and made their report accordingly. It was very unjust that proper means were not taken to ascertain whether this complaint was well founded or not.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said the great object of many people living along the line of a railway was to get as much out of the company as they possibly could. It was important that the Government, so long as they had railways to run, should protect themselves, as far as possible, from the imposition of people who lived along the railway line, who should be taught that they themselves should prevent, as far as lay in their power, their cattle from coming on the line. If the Government were lenient, and afforded them every facility of getting paid, it would have a great many claims to settle. He had heard the complaint made by the hon. member for Northumberland, and he put it to the House if it could be possible that an engineer would be so careless of himself and of the passengers as to run a train, at the risk of being thrown off the track, through a herd of cattle?

Mr. MITCHELL: The engineer did so in this instance.

Mr. POPE said had the hon. member the best proofs of this? He could hardly believe any man could be so reckless. He would caution the Government against giving too great facilities to the settlement of such complaints, which would bring expenditure upon the country.

Bill read the second time.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 14.]

(Mr. Laflamme.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

Mr. LAFLAMME said he had already explained, generally, the amendments which were introduced by this new Bill. It was evident, from the anomalous cases which had been brought before the notice of this House respecting the infringements of the Independence of Parliament Act, and particularly from the investigation made by the Committee in one case which had occupied the attention of the House and the public, that the provisions of the Statute had been in many cases misinterpreted, and sometimes ignored. The report of the Committee on the last precedent furnished (the Russell precedent) declared that there must be a distinct covenant assented to by both parties. If this doctrine had been maintained in the cases submitted during last Session, there was no doubt but that the parties whose cases had been brought under examination could reasonably have invoked this precedent as a complete justification, as there was within the terms of this precedent no mutual or continuous contract in those cases. Some very anomalous precedents had been established to show that such had been accepted in the House. Parties had been openly in the receipt of moneys from the Government for occasional work performed, newspaper advertisements and such work, which could not be termed distinct covenants or continuous agreements. When this precedent had been brought under the consideration of the Committee, it condemned the precedent as an illegal one; one violating the Independence of Parliament Act.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: What Committee?

MR. LAFLAMME: The Anglin Committee. Consequently, this last decision was a new precedent; a reasonable and a rational one. The Committee reported that it was advisable to make more explicit provisions with respect to the Independence of Parliament Act, to avoid further difficulties. As matters stood, after the last decision there were two precedents; one in one sense, and the other in an absolutely contrary sense, which would leave open the selection of either one in any future case, according to the then disposition of the House. Upon this account, and particularly on the report of the Committee, which enjoined a re-consideration and a re-enactment of these dispositions, the Government deemed it necessary to bring forward this measure. The first section introduced an addition to the causes of disqualification. Under the previous Act, none but those who held employment, temporary or permanent, from the Government of Canada were disqualified. By this Act, it was intended to apply the disqualification to such as held office at the nomination of any of the officers of any of the Provinces as well as those who held offices under the general Government of the Dominion, and also those who held superannuation allowances. As to those who held superannuation allowances from the Federal Government, they were virtually at the mercy of the Crown in this respect, that, if they were competent to fulfil any office, the Crown could call on them to perform these duties, the salaries attached to which were deducted from the amount of their pensions. That was the principal alteration in the first clause, and it was probably the most important as to its extent in the Bill, as it embraced many parties who formerly were in no way affected by the Independence of Parliament Act. The second section introduced a nominal alteration with respect to those who would hereafter become Ministers of the Crown, in order to avoid the re-enactment of the Independence of Parliament Act to apply to new Ministerial offices which should be created. It was substantially the same as the old Act. The 3rd section was also the same, with an addition in the three last lines, to avoid the recurrence of the fact which was perfectly well known to the House and was known as the "double-shuffle." The second section introduced an important explanation as to the nature of the contract or services performed, or benefits accruing to the party which would entitle him to disqualification; and the words "knowingly and wittingly" had been introduced in order to obviate all difficulties as to the interpretation and application of the Act as it formerly stood. This clause would apply to cases where goods were purchased by a public officer from a firm, some one of which was a member of the House. It had always been a matter of surprise to him (Mr. Laflamme) that a man should be supposed to be guilty of an offence which would entail such a heavy penalty as that of losing his seat in Parliament, when he was not conscious of the fact. According to the present law, the fact that he was a member of a firm which sold any quantity of goods to an officer of the Government would, if the Statute were rigidly interpreted, entail the loss of his seat, and make him liable for all the penalties, whether he was aware of the transaction or not. The present clause was intended to remove the difficulties which existed in such cases.

MR. BOWELL enquired whether the words "knowingly and wittingly" referred to offences specified in the fourth section?

MR. LAFLAMME said it applied to the fourth section.

MR. BOWELL said the words were mentioned in the second section, but not in the fourth.

MR. LAFLAMME said the fourth section applied to any member of the House of Commons who accepted a commission or was concerned in any agreement after he was elected, and no man could accept a commission unknowingly and unwittingly.

MR. MASSON: The second clause applies to cases where there is a written contract, and then you say it must be wilfully and knowingly. The fourth clause does not attack that kind of transaction, but cases when a Government officer purchases an article in the store of a firm in which a member of Parliament has an interest. In that case, should there not be the same restriction, and the words "wittingly and knowingly" inserted?

MR. LAFLAMME said that, if the hon. member thought there was any ambiguity, there would be no objection to adding those words. He believed, however, the section as written, read in connection with the anterior one, removed any doubt on that point. The fifth section was the same as one in the previous Act, with the exception of the alteration in the amount of penalty, $200 per day being substituted for $2,000. He believed the House would admit that it was not the amount of penalty which deterred offenders so much as the certainty of punishment; and, as the law previously stood, sympathy was felt for every man who was brought under it, and made himself subject to the penalty of $2,000 per day, which could not be collected in most cases, and, if it could be recovered, would entail total ruin; and that, notwithstanding the fact that, without intending to ignore the law, he might have thought himself out of its purview. This was certainly more likely to lead to the non-application of the law. After consideration, it was thought that $200 per day penalty, added to the forfeiture of the seat, would be, for such a case, sufficient to meet all the requirements of the Independence of Parliament, in perhaps a more efficient manner than by levying such an enormous penalty as that contained in the previous Act. The sixth clause was interpretive in its character, and was introduced merely to remove difficulties which existed from the ambiguity of the former Act as to transactions which had occurred during the recess of Parliament. There was great ambiguity on that point. A party might, under one interpretation of the law, have avoided any penalty for acts complained of if they had been begun and ended before the meeting of Parliament, because the Statute said: "No man shall sit and vote"; and, if he sat and voted, he would incur the penalty.

MR. MITCHELL asked whether, in the event of a gentleman remaining the representative of a constituency, and not actually coming and sitting in the House while it was in session, that could be construed as "sitting" under the law.

MR. LAFLAMME said he was not called upon to give a decision upon existing laws. The seventh section was a new one. It explained that disqualification could not be incurred by reason of being a shareholder in an incorporated company. A similar provision existed in the Imperial Act, and, as there was no explanation in the former Dominion Act a party might have been liable to prosecution for being a member of an incorporated company having transactions with the Government. If such provision were not inserted, a stockholder in the Bank of Montreal, being a member of Parliament, might be liable to the penalty of the Act because he was one of the stockholders, and, as such, a party to the transactions entered into with the Government. Such, however, was not the interpretation given to the existing law, but such might be the application sought to be made, and in order to remove any doubt on that subject, the section had been introduced into the Bill, and he believed it would be accepted as necessary under the circumstances. The eighth section was also a new one, but it had been taken from the Imperial Act 22 George III. c. 45. The ninth section was also taken from the Imperial Act. The second sub-section was new.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is in the English Act.

MR. LAFLAMME: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It was the Rothschilds' clause.

MR. LAFLAMME: It was a decision given by the House of Commons, but the only Act was 22 George III. c. 45.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There was an Act passed especially to remove doubts.

MR. LAFLAMME said that, so far as he remembered, there was no special provision in the English Act in regard to that matter.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes.

MR. LAFLAMME said that the next sub-section was intended to remove difficulties which might arise from militia officers receiving their statutory allowances, or what was given out for drill purposes.

MR. MITCHELL. We would all be disqualified if they were not excepted, for we are all officers.

MR. LAFLAMME said that the 10th was a new section. It related exclusively to the Senate, excluding Senators from any right to participate in any Government contracts. As they held their offices by patent, it was thought that the Government could not disqualify them; but Parliament could certainly inflict a penalty for violating such a statutory provision as was contained in this Act. No such provision existed in anterior Acts, and this was believed to be owing to the fact that the high positions they held excluded them from the possibility of suspicion with respect to entering into contracts with the Government. In the other British colonies, laws had been lately enacted in this sense now proposed. In Victoria, the Legislative Councillors were elected, and there contractors were disqualified in both Houses. In Queensland, the Legislative Councillors were nominated by the Crown, and there, also, contractors were so disqualified under the new constitution. In Tasmania, the Legislative Councillors were elected, and contractors were disqualified in both Chambers. In New Zealand, where the members of the Upper House were nominated by the Crown, there was, originally, no provision applicable to contractors; but, in 1870, a new disqualificatory Act was passed, rendering contractors equally ineligible in both Houses.

MR. WOOD: But a Senator would not be disqualified if a member of an incorporated company which took a contract for the carrying of steel rails or anything of that kind.

MR. LAFLAMME: No. In New Zealand the same provision now proposed was to be found. The 11th section was taken from the Imperial Act. It provided for a limitation of twelve months with reference to prosecutions respecting any of the penalties provided for under this Act. The 12th section was the same as one contained in the former law; and this was also the case with the remaining sections. These were the principal alterations introduced by the new Act as compared with the existing law relating to the Independence of Parliament. He moved the second reading of the Bill.

MR. CURRIER said that, in the second sub-section, section 12, it was stated that the "Speaker may issue his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery."

MR. LAFLAMME: That is the law as it stands. There has been no alteration in that respect.

MR. CURRIER said that, in another clause, it was stated that the Speaker "shall, on a seat becoming vacant, immediately issue his warrant."

MR. LAFLAMME: When a member wishes to resign, it is provided that the Speaker may issue his warrant, but that when a seat becomes vacant, he shall do so. In the one case it is optional, and the other imperative.

MR. MASSON said he thought that there was a great deal in this Bill which was of a rather extraordinary character, and he might, perhaps, say that some parts of it were of a rather vexatious character. The first clause especially, which related to pensioners, if he was rightly informed, would not be accepted in England. Pensioners, whether superannuated officers or not, should not, in his opinion, be deprived of the right of sitting in the Parliament. It would be advantageous to them, and to the country, if the people wished to make use of the abilities, talents, and experiences of these officers, who had thought proper to retire from the public service, after having, for a long time, fulfilled such duties, and received from the Government an allowance which would be found to be nothing else save an accumulation of portions of their salaries for a number of years, to allow them to do so. He would ask the hon. gentleman whether this clause would apply to Judges or any other persons drawing pensions.

MR. LAFLAMME: Certainly.

MR. MASSON said that such a provision would not be adopted in England. This was the law in England until 1869, and the reason for it was because pensions had been there granted which were subject to the pleasure of the Crown, and hence pensioners were not eligible to seats in the House of Commons. The reason for this was plain: the position of such pensioners and the enjoyment of their pensions were entirely at the mercy of the Crown, and, consequently, they could not be independent members. But in 1869, under a Liberal Administration, a new Act was passed, providing that all pensioners who received pensions in accordance with statutory provisions were entitled to their pensions, given them in accordance with the law of the land, and that they should be eligible to seats in the House of Commons if they found constituencies willing to elect them. In the case of superannuated officials, the case was still stronger. Superannuated officers, if he rightly understood the intention, the spirit and the meaning of the law, were men who, at a certain age, retired from the public service with a certain amount of money given to them annually; but where did this money come from? It was not the free gift of the Government, but the accumulation of money which had been taken from their annual salaries during every year of their service. This was their property to all intents and purposes; only, instead of receiving it annually or from year to year, it had been from year to year taken out of their salaries; and it was provided that, after a certain number of years of service, they did enjoy such accumulation of revenue. Consequently, this money was not the free gift of the Crown, and it was their property as much as the money which any man had earned and placed in a savings bank, or anywhere else, was his property.

MR. MASSON.

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman knows that they can be forced to return to the public service at any moment.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: This is a useless interruption. The hon. Minister of Justice has already stated that.

MR. MASSON said that there was no reason whatever for this interruption. The hon. the Minister of Justice had already made such a statement, and he, of course, had heard it. He thought that too great power was taken by the Government in regard to superannuated officers, to whom no alternative was left. Provision was not made that any person enjoying a superannuation allowance from the Government was ineligible; but that any person entitled to a superannuation was ineligible; consequently, they would thus deprive a gentleman, even in receipt of a small superannuation allowance, for these were not all of the same amount, of the right to abandon his claim to it, and come forward as a candidate. Hence, all superannuated officials in this country would be entirely deprived of the privilege of being parliamentary candidates, though they were willing to throw up such allowances. This was a very objectionable clause, and he had no doubt that the hon. the Minister of Justice would see that it was modified. The hon. gentleman had gone too far in this relation; he had probably examined the law in force in the Province of Quebec, which provided that officers of the Federal Government were disqualified with respect to the Local Legislature. But the hon. gentleman would see that there was a great difference between this Bill and that law. In the Quebec Act, it was provided that any person in receipt of any salary, fees, allowance or emolument of any kind of the nature of an annual salary, etc., should be deprived of a seat in Parliament; but in this Bill this provision extended to any kind of fee, etc., that might be received from the Local Government, or from any Department thereof. If, therefore, a lawyer who had a special aptitude for such matters was consulted by the Local Government, and charged a fee of $20, he would be deprived of the privilege of running for this Parliament. The case came up in the Quebec Legislature, and it was there held by members of the legal profession on both sides of the House that it would lower the profession too much to say that an advocate could not be employed to give legal advice even though he were employed by the Government in the Legislature which had passed the law; and it was for this reason that this Bill was not passed in that shape in the Quebec Legislature. It was so amended that such a fee or emolument should take the character of an annual salary. Members of the legal profession on both sides of the House would see that there was a great distinction between that and this provision. If his hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue, under these circumstances, was consulted by the present Local Government of Quebec and charged a fee of $20 or $50, he would be debarred from being a candidate for this Parliament. This was outrageous and absurd.

Mr. LAURIER: I think that the hon. gentleman is misquoting the Quebec law.

Mr. MASSON said he then did so very unwillingly, as he had taken the trouble to look into this matter. There was another anomaly in this Bill. If a lawyer received a fee of $20 from a Local Government he could not sit in this Parliament; but, nevertheless, a contractor who might receive $1,000,000 from the Local Government was not so debarred. This was a glaring anomaly, which he thought his hon. friend the Minister of Justice would have modified. These were his two main objections to the Bill. It was too stringent, and he was sure it went farther than the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laffamme) had intended. It took away from the people the advantage of making use of the services of men who had special aptitude and ability for the position, and who were willing to render public service; and more, if a Judge enjoyed a pension which was his property, he could not be a candidate for any constituency. This would be a wrong principle to act upon. It was not the candidate who chose the constituency, but the constituency that chose the candidate. He had also made this plea with regard to dual representation—that they must allow the people the right to choose whoever they wished to send to Parliament, and if the people wished to return a superannuated officer or a pensioned Judge, they should be able to do so. He expected that the hon. gentlemen opposite who had always strictly contended for the rights and power of the people, would join with him in asking the hon. the Minister of Justice to withdraw these and all objectionable clauses in the Bill.

Mr. BOWELL thought there were points to which the attention of the House might very properly be called other than those to which the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) had referred. If he rightly understood the first clause, it went a great deal further than the disqualification of superannuated officers or pensioners. He found that this clause disqualified any person accepting or holding any office, or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the Government of Canada or of the Government of any of the Provinces of Canada to which any salary, fee, wages, allowances, or emolument or profit of any kind was attached. Were they to understand from this that, if, in a rural section of the country—he would put a strong case—say in the Free Grant Districts, where the Provincial Government supplied the money for the building of roads, cross ways and bridges, one of the bridges was burned, as very often happened, and if a person living upon the road, who might be a member of Parliament, was employed for the time being, or his horses, or if timber was taken from his land in order to repair the bridge or reconstruct the cross-way, such person would be disqualified under this Act, for he would have been employed temporarily by a Local Government or some of its officers, for purposes similar to those specified, such as repairing a road, building or repairing a bridge, or selling timber off his own land to be used in that way. That was a sort of temporary employment to which wages and fees were attached. It seemed to him, after looking critically at the clause, that the Government had gone altogether beyond what they originally intended in order to meet cases that had come before the House previous to the late Session of Parliament. He found also, on looking at the second clause, the words :

“ Knowingly or wilfully holding or enjoying, undertaking or executing any contract or agreement, expressed or implied, with or for the Government of Canada on behalf of the Crown, or with or for any of the officers of the Government of Canada,” etc.

That seemed to imply that unless a member of Parliament entered into a contract knowingly or wilfully, the Act would have no effect. A case came under the notice of the House during the last Session of Parliament in which a gentleman had, by his attorney, entered into a contract, and he affirmed solemnly that he was not aware that his attorney had done so. He (Mr. Bowell) felt convinced that no one would question the veracity of the hon. gentleman's statement, and yet that contract disqualified him. On the other hand, there was a possibility that, if this Act passed, a member of the Commons might relegate his own power to an attorney, who, again, might enter into a contract of which his client was not aware, directly or indirectly; and it seemed to him that the employment of the words “ knowingly and wilfully ” was simply begging the question. If there was any case in which a member should be disqualified, it would be one where he deliberately entered into a contract with the Government for the purpose of doing any kind of work. He could not understand why the words “ knowingly ” and “ willingly ” should be inserted in the last line of the same clause. The line read thus: “ During the time he holds such contract or agreement, or is knowingly or willingly interested therein.” He did not think it possible that any contractor could hold such a contract unwillingly, because, if so, he could easily relieve himself of the difficulty. Passing on to the third clause—the one to which he wished particularly to direct the attention of the Minister of Justice, in order that an explanation might be given to the House—it reads as follows:—

“ If any member of the House of Commons accepts any office or commission, or is concerned or interested in any contract, agreement, service or work, which by the first or second section of this Act renders a candidate incapable of being elected to, or of sitting or voting in the House of Commons.”

That was one clause of the disqualification, and it was the one specified in the first and second sections of the Act, wherein it was stated that members of Parliament must be knowingly and wilfully parties to a contract. But the clause went on to say:

“ Or sells any goods, wares or merchandise to, or performs any service for the Government of Canada, or for any of the officers of the Government of Canada, for which public money of Canada is paid or to be paid, whether such contract, agreement, or sale be expressed or implied, and whether the transaction be single or continuous, the seat of such member shall therefor be null and void.”

It was clear to him that the words knowingly and willingly did not apply to the ordinary transactions mentioned in this clause, or the mere purchase of goods of which a member might not have the slightest knowledge, and, perhaps, might not have heard of their being so purchased till the matter was brought before the House. It was a different thing when a man entered into a solemn contract by which he might earn thousands and tens of thousands of dollars. In such a case as that he must be knowingly guilty of entering into the contract. But in case of purchasing ten pounds of nails from a member's hardware store, it was not necessary to have known the fact in order to escape disqualification. Possibly the interpretation he put upon the fourth section was erroneous, and he hoped that the hon. Minister of Justice would take the matter into his consideration, because it was desirable that the Bill should be made as perfect as possible in order to meet the necessities of the case. He did not understand why, in the seventh section, there should only be an exception made in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway any more than in a contract for the construction of a large building in which three, four, or five hundred thousand dollars might be involved; a graving dock, a canal, or any other great work, unless it was to meet the case which was before the House, arising out of the Canada Pacific Railway Bill. He thought, if the hon. Minister would direct his attention to the clause, he would come to the conclusion that, if there was to be such a proviso, it should go beyond the Canada Pacific Railway. The Government might possibly buy other railways; indeed it was mooted that they were desirous of buying the Occidental Railway, and it was also reported that they intended to purchase that portion of the Grand Trunk from Quebec to Rivière du Loup, and these roads would have to be repaired and rebuilt as well as the Pacific road. He also wished to refer to the point raised by the hon. member for Ottawa. In all these clauses the issuing of a writ was made imperative, except in cases where a vacancy occurred during the interval between two Sessions, when the Speaker might, upon receiving certain declarations, forthwith issue his warrant. In the 12th section it said:—

“The Speaker may address his warrant, under his hand and seal, to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, for the issue of a writ for the election of a new member in the place of the member resigning.”

In the 13th section it was stated that such warrant should be forthwith addressed and a writ issued in every case, while in the 14th the same expression was used as to the sub-section of the clause. The hon. the Minister of Justice did not, he thought, give a satisfactory explanation why this particular case was made permissive, or why the Speaker—whoever he might be—should be allowed to withhold, for any length of time, the issuing of a writ. He was sure that any hon. member holding the position of Speaker would much rather be relieved from the responsibility of withholding a writ merely to satisfy the wishes of a Government which might desire to accomplish some object by keeping a member out of the House.

MR. LAFLAMME: That is taken from the old law.

MR. BOWELL said the Government claimed to be one of reform, and if there were any defects in the old law, they should remedy it. The argument brought forward by the hon. the Minister of Justice was a very weak one, because, if the old law was to be adhered to, there was no necessity for introducing this Bill. There were many other minor points which might be discussed more properly when the Bill came before a Committee of the Whole House; but he was desirous of calling the attention of the hon. Minister to some matters which, it seemed to him, ought to receive the very serious consideration of the Government. In some cases the Act did not go far enough, while in some cases it went altogether beyond what the law should be. He certainly thought members should be protected against having advantage taken of them in minor matters over which they had no control. A member of the House might be thousands of miles away when an agent, employed by the Government in connection with some public works in the rural districts, such as canals or railways, might obtain supplies from his establishment which were absolutely necessary to make repairs which must be done forthwith; and, though the member might not have the slightest knowledge of the transaction, he would be disqualified. He also objected to the restrictions of the Act so far as they applied to the employment of members of that House by any of the Local Governments. There might be extreme cases in which it might be proper to prevent gentlemen in the employment of Local Governments from holding seats in that House, but he did not think it would be in the interests of the country, or add anything to the intelligence of that Legislature, to prevent the best legal talent that they had in that House being employed by a Local Government when they thought it necessary to have it. Neither did he believe that the mere fact of a Local Legislature giving employment temporarily to a member of that House, in regard to any ordinary work that might be required in the building or construction of roads, &c., or the fact of their purchasing goods from his store, ought to disqualify him from being a member. Individually, he was quite willing to go as far as any other member, and had done so in past days when this matter was before the House, before the present Government were in power, and backed up the efforts of gentlemen then in opposition in order to make the Parliament of Canada as independent as possible; but, in adopting a law of this kind, they should be cautious not to carry it too far, and thereby destroy the object of the Bill, and prevent the most talented men in the country from being elected members of Parliament.

MR. LAURIER said it was satisfactory to know that the objections to the Bill were to the effect that it was too stringent, not that it was too lax.

MR. BOWELL: In some respects.

MR. LAURIER: In the principal points, at least. He specially alluded to what was said by the hon. member for Terrebonne, who stated that the Act was too stringent, and should not apply to those persons temporarily employed by Local Governments, who did not receive a Government salary, but were paid simply by fees. The hon. gentleman referred to the Quebec Statute as bearing out his views, and, though he (Mr. Laurier) did not intend to discuss that point at length, he wished to show that he was in error, so far as Quebec legislation was concerned. The Quebec Act was, in its provisions, similar to the 1st section of the present Bill. He quoted from the Quebec Act of 1872, which was an amendment of that passed in 1869. "Sub-section 1 of Section 2 of an Act passed in the 32nd V. c., intituled: An Act for securing the Independence of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, is hereby amended thus:—

"No person accepting or holding any office, commission or employment of a permanent or temporary nature, at the nomination of the Crown or Lieutenant-Governor, to which an annual salary, or any fee, allowance, emolument or profit of any kind whatever, coming from the Province, is attached, shall be appointed a Legislative Councillor or member of the Legislative Assembly."

That was an amendment to the Act of 1869, which his hon. friend had now in his hands. So far the legislation of the present Bill was in accordance with that of Quebec. The other objection which his hon. friend urged was that the Bill applied to superannuated officers. That objection had already been met by the hon. the Minister of Justice, who stated that any officer entitled to superannuation was to a great extent in the hands of the Government, and if the objection held good at all it held good in the case of an officer not actually superannuated, but who was entitled to superannuation. The argument must be pushed to its extreme conclusion, and any one entitled to receive money from the Crown was of course ineligible. The law might be a hard one, but it was necessary in order to secure the independence of members of Parliament. His hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald) said they did not want to limit the choice of the people.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: As little as possible.

MR. LAURIER said there must be a limit somewhere, the only question was where it was to be made. They on his side of the House said that the limit was to be made where the rights of the people, if they were unlimited, might infringe on the rights of Parliament. His hon. friend said that in this matter the right of the people should not be limited, while at the same time the right of the people to choose a Judge or a contractor was restricted. The limit was to be made in this particular point that, whenever the right of the people would be such that it would infringe on the right of Parliament, then the rights of the people should be restricted. If the law was too stringent, perhaps some modification might be made, but if it was materially altered the rights of Parliament might be also invaded. If it was possible to draw the line of distinction so clear that everyone would see it, he was sure the Government would be ready to accept it; but so far he did not see that any rule could be devised, or had been devised, to warrant the Government in putting aside the rule that any man who drew the moneys of the Crown should not be eligible as a member of Parliament.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) argued that the rights of Parliament were not the rights of the people, and this was a startling doctrine, coming from the Liberals. It was a doctrine which was propounded for the first time, that the rights of Parliament were superior to the rights of the people, and that, whenever they did come into collision, the rights of the people must yield. He thought they were the representatives of the people; that they were sent here to represent them: that they were the servants of the people. and that when the rights of the people and the rights of Parliament—the rights of their representatives—came into collision, the rights of their representatives must yield to the rights of the people. This was a cardinal principle of the British Constitution, and this was the cardinal principle that must obtain, in all free countries and all Parliaments. But the object of this Bill was to secure the independence of Parliament, not the independence of the rights of the people. What was the danger, the hazard that the independence of Parliament was running? The independence of Parliament had to be guarded against the improper influence of the Crown; in other words, had got to be guarded against the influence, direct or indirect, of the Government of the day. That was the object of this measure, and the object of a measure of a similar kind passed in England. The object was, that members of Parliament should be true and faithful representatives of the people, quite independent in their positions of all influence from the Crown; quite free from any chance of the Crown putting on any screw or using any influence or power or authority over them; and so soon as that principle is obtained, so soon as a member of Parliament was free from the chances, or suspicion, or opportunity of the Crown appealing to his personal interest—so soon as that was obtained then the Act could go no further. Then came the great question that the choice of the people should be as much as possible unlimited. Now, if they would look at this Act and at the old Act, they would find that the object of the first clause was to prevent any person holding an office of emolument under the Crown from becoming a member of that House. These officers were at the mercy of the Crown; they might be dismissed, they might be removed to positions more advantageous or less advantageous, their promotion or increase of salary or rank depended on the Crown, and no member of Parliament ought to be so dependent; but whenever such an officer was able to honestly and independently represent the people without his personal interests or position being attacked, then he had a right to come to this House, if he had the qualifications which the law required. Now if they took, for instance, an officer of the Provincial Government, any one of them. His salary was not affected by the Government of the day; the position held by an officer of the Province of Quebec or Ontario could not be affected by this Government; they did not pay his salary, and could not diminish or increase it; why then should the choice of the people be restricted in regard to these gentlemen. It might be said that restrictions of a similar kind had been introduced in some of the Provinces. Supposing they had, it was a matter of no consequence, and affected the conduct of this House no more than the legislation of Tasmania, New South Wales, or Cape Town. What he contended was simply this, that so far as the Independence of Parliament Act was concerned, every man who was, in his position, perfectly independent of the Crown, should not be excluded even though he held an office under a local Administration. They all knew that with regard to the public men of this Dominion the supply was not equal to the demand; that they had practically a great difficulty in working this great governmental machine; it was one thing in the way of their complete success that the supply of men competent to represent the people and to engage in the work of legislation was not equal to the demand. When they considered that the population of the Dominion was four millions, and counted up the demands that were made upon these four millions, in a new country, they found there were fewer men of leisure and of education, men who were able to devote themselves to the public service, than in England. If they reckoned up the members of the different Legislatures of the Dominion, they found them to be nearly the same number of members that represented not only the thirty-four millions in England, but represented and governed the whole of the great British Empire. There were something over six hundred members in the British House of Commons, and counting up all the members of the different Legislatures we very nearly approached that number in the Dominion of Canada; therefore it was one of the greatest difficulties we had to get the requisite number of men fit to hold the position of legislators, and for this reason they ought not unduly to restrict the number, but give as many men as possible the opportunity of being elected. They should always keep before them the grand principle of the independence of Parliament, and that no man should be eligible for Parliament who could be held to be dependent upon the Crown and liable to be influenced by the Crown. Keeping that cardinal point in view, they should rather widen the door of admission to this House than close it; and he said it not as his opinion only but that it was in the highest degree advisable that they should not exclude these men. The House might presume that, the Local Governments having found these men fit for office, it was rather an argument in favour of their being fit to represent the people than against them. The principle did not affect their case at all, because these men did not get their appointments or salaries from this Government, and could not be affected or influenced by it; to exclude them was against the principle that the people should be allowed as wide a range as possible. With regard to the exclusion of superannuated civil servants, he quite agreed with his hon. friend that there was a clause—a nugatory clause which had never been brought forward, and which might as well have been struck out—by which the Government might call upon any superannuated officer to serve in any office which his old age left him still fit to perform; but this was never put into force, and it ought not to exclude men but should bring into Parliament the great official experience these men possessed. He would rather repeal the clause than that they should be excluded. Why, in England, especially in the case of retired Judges, they were eagerly sought for as members of Parliament. Look at the retired Indian Judges, they took their seats in the House of Commons. Sir Erskine Perry, when he returned full of years and experience, was immediately elected. was looked upon in the House as an authority upon Indian and upon legal questions. Their superannuated allowance was not a gift of the Government, it was earned in the first place, and also contributed to out of salary; and, when a man had served his time, and was full of years and infirmities, and no longer able to serve in the active work of the office, he still had his mind, his judgment, and his experience, and he might be the most useful of all men in the House of Commons as a representative of the people. So much was this recognized in England, that the prominent officers in all the chief Departments were made peers, so that they might, in the House of Lords, give to the nation and to Parliament the benefit of their experience. Mr. Hammond, for instance, for many years in the Foreign Office, was now a standing authority upon foreign affairs in the House of Lords; the same with Sir Frederick Rogers, of the Colonial Office, now a peer and a great authority on colonial matters. Lord Macaulay, when he returned from India, was pensioned by the East India Company; and, although, in one sense, he was not a retired pensioner of the Crown, yet the Indian fund was under the control of the Crown. When he returned, he was at once elected for Edinburgh. Sir James Mackintosh, recorder of Bombay, on retiring from that position on a pension, also got into the House. They were pensioned for their lives, and therefore they were independent men, and this Act did not affect them, and so it should be in the case of superannuated officers we had here. The retiring allowance of the Judges was a different thing to the superannuation grant, and perhaps it would not apply to them. And there was no reason why men so high in rank and position should be excluded, simply because they had received their just reward for long service.

After Recess.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that an officer at the end of his service, might receive a gratuity in money as the reward of those services. He received that amount or was a creditor of the Government for so much and could not be considered in any way as a pensioner of the Government. Under the Superannuation Act, he received the interest of it, in the way of an annual allowance, and should, therefore, be considered in the same way. This measure ought not to be considered a party measure, but one in which all sides of the House were equally interested. The Bill required to be made as workable as possible, and to obstruct as little as possible the choice of the people. The only question, as far as the Act was concerned, was whether from the nature and position of a person towards the Government of the day, he was in any way under its influence. With respect to retired Judges, they could not by any possibility come under the same category as superannuated servants, because there was no statutory obligation by which they were obliged to work another day unless they pleased. They ought to follow the English practice in that respect and allow the people to elect a retired dignitary of the Bench. In England, not only did retired Judges sit in the House of Commons, but Judges performing the most important duties now sat in Parliament. Mr. Russell Gurney was a Judge of the highest Criminal Court, he was appointed as Recorder of London and, as Judge of the Central Criminal Court, had tried capital offences, but as his appointment came from the Corporation of London, he could, in no way, come under the influence of the Crown, and a retired Judge, having received by law his allowance, could in no way be considered under the influence of the Crown. The Government could not cut down his allowance, he had a freehold for his own life in that pension, and could not in any way be considered as under the influence of the Crown. He had earned that money and was a creditor of the Government. The case of Sir Thomas Chambers, Auxiliary Recorder of London, was one in point.

He had been a member of the House of Commons for many years, and, at the same time, was a Criminal Judge, and had lately, on the resignation of the Recorder, been appointed to fill his place, but, having been appointed and being paid by the Corporation of London, he was not under the influence of the Crown. The moment the retiring allowance was created, the document giving it was just the same to the possessor as if he held consols to that amount. It was a debt to be paid, and in no way a salary payable in such a manner as to make the Judge in any way dependent on the Crown. With respect to the second clause, although it was a matter that should more properly be brought up in Committee on the whole, he thought it was rather a slovenly mode, an objectionable mode of legislation which provided not only for the present members of the Government, but also for any new office that afterwards might be created. The hon. the Minister of Justice said that that was put in, in order to prevent the necessity of this being repeated hereafter. But, if they created a new office, they must have a new Act, and the appropriate time to make this provision would be when the Act was passed. All that would be necessary was to put in a clause stating that the officer so appointed should come under the category of the second section of the Act. An Act had been passed by the Imperial Parliament with reference to persons receiving pensions, compensations, or allowances on account of having held public offices, which stated that, whereas doubts had arisen as to whether such persons came within the provisions of an Act passed in the fourth and fifth years of King William IV, incapacitating any person who held any pension from the Crown during pleasure, from being elected to the House of Commons, it be enacted that such provision shall not disqualify the holder from being elected a member of the House of Commons. Thus a special Act had been passed in order that men who had earned their pensions should not be disqualified. Why, they wanted all the experience and ability they could get, and should not make such exclusion without cause. Another reason why these exclusions should not be made was, that they were peculiarly limited. The clause stated:

"Or any office which may be hereafter created, to be held by a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, and entitling him to be a Minister of the Crown."

The time was not far off, when they would make Ministers of the Crown without giving them seats in the Cabinet. Mr. Gladstone had declared that the present habitual number of the British Cabinet was too large, and he proposed that under no circumstances the number should be thirteen. Disraeli said the most efficient Cabinet would be a Cabinet of seven, and that the other Ministers of the Crown should be like the Postmaster-General, or the Secretary of Ireland, who were Ministers of the Crown without being members of the Cabinet. Lord Elgin, who was the Postmaster-General under Palmerston; Sir Michael Hicks Beach, who was Secretary for Ireland, and the Lord Advocate of Scotland, were not members of the Cabinet. However, he thought that this limitation was unwise and premature, and should not have been made. Although it might be considered hypercritical, he desired to point out that he thought the word "Administration," at the end of the 3rd Section, ought not to be used. The word was commonly used in colloquial intercourse as synonymous with "Ministry," but Administration was an abstract and not a concrete word. The 2nd Section of the Bill greatly limited the old Act, and, he thought, most improperly so, as the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had pointed out. Any real contractor, with the Crown ought to be excluded, and there ought to be no provision that he must be knowingly and willingly. It would be exceedingly difficult to prove whether a man "knowingly and willingly" knew he was breaking the law, except by his own testimony. The consequence would be that an honest man would swear that he knew all about it; but a dishonest man would give evidence that he did not wilfully enter into the contract. The clause ought to be as it was before: "That no person whatever." The old clause was absolutely necessary in order to keep contractors out of the House; and the limitation afforded by using the phrase: "Wilfully and knowingly acting in contravention of the law," should not be in any Act. There was also a limitation in the last part of the 2nd clause which, he thought, ought not to be there. It said: "No contractor shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, nor shall he sit or vote in the said House during the time he holds such contract or agreement, or is knowingly and willingly interested therein." He would suppose a case: A man had a contract at the time he was elected to Parliament; being thus elected, he must be petitioned against in order to be unseated; and if, during the thirty days allowed for petitions to be presented, no petition was presented against him, he would enter the House and take his seat, though he had been elected under the influence of the Crown, and had, subsequent to his election, given up his contract. If no petition was entered against him within the specified time they could not attack him. If they did attack him it would be bringing into play the paramount power of Parliament, and it would be introducing all the evils which the Controverted Elections Act was passed to prevent, which Act took away from the House the power to interfere with elections. Parliament had declared that the House of Commons was not a party tribunal, although it was held that, notwithstanding the Controverted Elections Act, Parliament possessed the power to intervene as a last resource, and only in such cases as that of O'Donovan Rossa, when a petition would not be applicable. But where a petition could be filed against a man or his seat to attack its validity, it must be done within the time specified, or in fact and in practice all mode of attacking him had gone. Then he was elected—he, a contractor, was elected, provided he was able to pass over the thirty days without being petitioned against. He had been seated by the Government and was anxious to serve it, and the Government was anxious to keep that member in the House. The present laws provided that, if a man was a Government contractor when elected to Parliament, whether he surrendered his contract or not, he was ineligible, and could only be made eligible by going back to his constituents and being re-elected. That was a provision of the present law, and it ought to exist in this Bill as the House would readily perceive. The 4th clause, which had been already spoken to, provided that, if a member of Parliament while such obtained any contract which would render him ineligible to be elected under the first or second clause, he would forfeit his seat, that was to say if he had knowingly and willfully entered into any contract. But the Bill went further; it mentioned "sells any goods, wares or merchandise," but the measure did not say knowingly or wilfully in those cases. Let them take one of the cases decided in England under the Municipal Corporations Act when a quantity of crockery was bought. Or let them suppose the hon. member for Ottawa kept a hardware store, and an officer, subordinate, overseer or workman employed by the Board of Works, bought a hammer or spade over the counter to be used in the Parliament grounds, and say paid five shillings for the spade. Under this clause, the hon. member might lose his seat, although it was a sale for cash over the counter, and the dealer did not know whether the spade was for private use or for the Government. That provision was not right, not just, and he called the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to it, because he was quite sure it would be remedied. The word "implied" both in the second and fourth clause was rather a strong expression, and it should, in some way, be defined. They could all understand an implied contract between a party and the Crown, but it was different in regard to an implied contract, not only with the Crown but with servants of the Crown, and unless it was explained it might lead to people being unseated without their being aware why they were being unseated. The fifth clause was reasonable enough, that the penalty of $2,000 a day should be considered too large, and $200 inserted in its place. The law undoubtedly looked reasonable enough at the first blush, and if the proposed amendment were carried, it would prevent such a pathetic appeal as that made last Session by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in favour of Mr. Speaker in respect to the penalty of £60,000. But a penalty, in order to be effectual, must be efficient for all purposes. A division might be taken in which the Administration might be supported by one vote, and a man who knew he had fortified his seat, might run the risk of giving his vote and paying $200. He would not, however, be so ready to do so if he had to pay $2,000. That consideration should be taken into account in settling the amount of penalty, and, personally, he was not wedded to $2,000.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): He is liable to expulsion.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the view of the law was that that punishment was not sufficient, and that the offender's purse as well as his person must pay the penalty. There was another verbal criticism he desired to offer; it was on the 6th clause, and it was an important one, because a word was used in a wrong sense. The phrase ran: "The 4th and 5th sections of this Act shall extend to any transaction or act begun and concluded during a recess of Parliament." A recess of Parliament did not mean the interval between two Sessions, and the proper expression was that used in the old Act. A recess of Parliament meant an adjournment of more than one day during a Session, as in England at Easter, Whitsuntide and Derby Day; that, however, was a correction which could easily be made. The 7th clause was the last to which he would call the attention of hon. members who wished to see Parliament truly independent. The clause was as follows:—

"This Act shall not extend to disqualify any person as a member of the House of Commons by reason of his being a shareholder in any incorporated company having a contract or agreement with the Government of Canada, except any company incorporated for the construction or working of any part of the Canadian Pacific Railway."

Hon. members would observe how, under that clause, the whole Act might be evaded so that it would not be worth the paper upon which it was printed. Five men could form a company to construct a work, become incorporated under either the general or a Dominion Act, and might get a contract, they having previously gone to the Government, as individuals, and obtained an understanding that if they formed a company they might get a contract. Every man connected with the contract would thus be the slave of the Government, and in spirit and in fact dependent upon the Government as much as if they were not incorporated. There ought to be a provision in the Act in order to prevent contractors becoming the tools of any Government. That could easily be done. It could easily be provided that shareholders in specific classes of companies, such as banking and insurance, were exempted; but that shareholders in companies for purposes of construction, and for selling goods and doing work, with the exceptions indicated, should be excluded just as if the parties forming those companies were acting independently. That suggestion would commend itself to the common sense of the House, and he was quite sure that the hon. the Minister of Justice would give it due consideration. Contractors in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway were excluded by that Bill. What had the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Smith) done, that he should be turned out of Parliament? He understood that hon. gentleman was a member of the corporation that was about to acquire the railway from St. Paul, and was going to have a lease or some working arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway from Pembina to Winnipeg. It was provided by the present Bill that members of any company incorporated for the construction or working of any part of the Canadian Pacific Railway should be excluded. They, the Opposition, would endeavour, in their humble way, and as far as the Minister would allow them, to make the Bill a perfect and workable measure, which would inure to the benefit of the country and the independence of Parliament, both for the present and the future.

MR. BABY said, if he was not mistaken, the Bill was intended to provide for the independence of members of Parliament and nothing else. It was to prevent the action of the Government or Crown on the members who were elected to represent the people in Parliament, and to see that they should represent the views of the electors. The first clause, which was the clause to which he would specially direct the attention of the House, ran as follows:—

There could be no objection to the first part of the clause, but he deemed that portion very objectionable in which it was provided that any member being elected, and receiving a fee, salary, wages, allowance or emolument from the Government of any of the Provinces, was ineligible to sit in Parliament. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) had mentioned that the Quebec Legislature had passed a local Act, setting forth that no party receiving any fees from the Dominion Parliament could be elected a member of the Provincial Legislature, but, he added, that it was only when the fees represented an annual salary. With that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue took issue, and said the Statute was misquoted by the hon. member for Terrebonne, and that no such enactment was to be found on the Statutes, and he cited the Act of 1873 as confirming the point. He had no doubt the hon. Minister acted in good faith, and had no intention of misleading the House. In a Statute passed by the Province of Quebec, in 1869, were the following words:—

“Clause 3. No person accepting or holding any office, commission, or employment, at the nomination of the Crown, or under the Governor-General, to which any annual salary, fee, emolument, or profit of any kind or amount whatever, in lieu of an annual salary from the Dominion is attached, shall be appointed a legislative councillor or shall be eligible as a member of the Legislative Assembly, or, in either case, shall sit or vote as such while holding such office, commission or employment."

The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue said that sub-section one of section two, in the third clause of the Statute entitled "An Act to provide for the Independence of the Legislature of the Province," read as follows:—

"No person accepting or holding any office, commission or employment, at the nomination of the Crown or of the Lieutenant-Governor, to which an annual salary, or any fee, allowance, emolument, or profit, of any kind or amount whatever, in lieu of an annual salary from the Province is attached, shall be appointed a legislative councillor, or shall be eligible as a member of the Legislative Assembly, or, in either case, shall sit or vote as such, while holding any such office, commission or employment."

The first section was repealed, but the third section was in force, so that any member of this House receiving salary, emolument, or fees, was eligible as a member of the Legislature of Quebec. He saw no reason why members of the Legislatures of Quebec or Ontario should be prevented from entering the legislative halls of the Dominion. Undoubtedly such a person might be called upon by an officer of a Provincial Government to give his opinion on a case, and for that opinion charge $5, $10 or $20, and yet, from the fact of having given that legal opinion in good faith to a servant or officer of the Crown, he was rendered ineligible to a seat in the House of Commons, and, if a member, was expelled and condemned to pay the penalty imposed by the Act. He really found this very hard. This Act was, as he had said before, intended to secure the independence of members of Parliament, and nothing else; and was it not an anomaly that gentlemen belonging to the legal profession should have to vacate their seats by reason of the receipt of a fee of $5 or $10 from a servant of a Local Legislature, over which this Government had no power whatever; and that a contractor who received hundreds of thousands of dollars from such Legislature should have the right to sit in this House? Was this to be done because lawyers were in question? He could not conceive why members of the legal profession should be placed in such a position. If they were so very dangerous as to necessitate such a provision, he did not think that they would see so many advocates in the House; and if this were true, he did not see why the hon. the Minister of Justice should be in his place. He moreover found that this Bill was very stringent in small things, and perhaps very lax in regard to many more serious matters.

Mr. MILLS said that, when the hon. member for Terrebonne was speaking, he had taken the opportunity to put to the hon. gentleman a question. He rose for the purpose of putting this question with reference to the superannuation allowance. He reminded the hon. gentleman that the Statute passed in 1871, he thought, when the hon. member for Kingston was the leader of the Government, provided that those parties who were superannuated might, at any time, at the instance of the Government, be called again into the public service; and it did seem to him that, when the Government had this power, such persons could not sit and vote in Parliament as independent members; and, further, that this provision of the Superannuation Act was directly pertinent. He had put to the hon. gentleman this question, and he apprehended that it was always proper, with the permission of the hon. gentleman who had the floor, to put any question it was thought proper to make; but the hon. member for Kingston had then, in a very rude and offensive way, interrupted him, and informed the House that the House already knew what he (Mr. Mills) had stated. It might be that the House had been already so informed by the hon. the Minister of Justice. He was not present during the whole of the period when the hon. gentleman was addressing the House, but whether that was the case or not, the hon. member for Kingston seemed to think it necessary to argue this question seriously, when he had the opportunity of addressing the House. Whether the hon. gentleman supposed that he was the only person who had a right to allude to the question or not, he did not know; but, at all events, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) seemed to think that it was of sufficient importance to address the House upon it. The hon. gentleman said that this provision regarding the Superannuation Act was an effete supervision, which ought not to be there, and which, in fact, was a dead letter. All these observations would have been strictly pertinent if the Superannuation Act had been before the House for amendment. The hon. gentleman himself was the head of the Government who introduced the measure, and he was, as chief law officer of that Government, responsible for its provisions; and he seemed to have thought at that time that a provision of this sort was necessary and proper. Why was it that they had as yet no reason to act on this particular provision of the Superannuation Act? Simply because the pensioners of the Government had not yet found their way into Parliament, and he (Mr. Mills) thought that it was highly necessary and proper, so long as the Government of the day retained the power to call superannuated parties again into the public service, that they ought not to sit in Parliament. The hon. member for Terrebonne had said that he (Mr. Masson) was in favour of the liberties of the people, and that this measure was, in fact, restricting the liberties of the people. In the sense in which the hon. gentleman used the word restriction, the whole measure was a restriction upon the liberties of the people; and if the argument of the hon. gentleman had any force at all, it was good against the existence of a measure of this sort on the Statute-book. Why should they have such a measure? Why should not the people be at liberty to elect a Judge, or a sheriff, or any officer of the Government, or any place-man they might think proper to elect? The hon. gentleman seemed to have a peculiar notion of what constituted the liberties of the people. He (Mr. Mills) supposed that the opinions of the people were expressed in the House; that members were returned here for that purpose; that they came there as the exponents of public opinion; that the views entertained by a majority of the people were those expressed by the majority of the members who sat in the House; that it was the intention of parliamentary government that the opinions of the people should be expressed in a constitutional way; and, that one of the ways in which the opinions of the people might be constitutionally expressed was by a vote of this House. The hon. gentleman said: "Oh, you must leave the people at liberty to choose whom they please; if they choose to elect a man who is on the superannuation list, and dependent on the Government, and who may be recalled at any moment into the public service, and who, because of this fact, could not be an independent member of the House, you should not disqualify these people; you should not put this in the Act, and you should leave the people to choose representatives of this sort as they see proper." How were the views of the people ascertained on this question? The hon. gentleman knew right well that the opinions of the people in a particular constituency were not the views of the people of Canada; and he (Mr. Masson) would not seriously argue for one moment that the views entertained by the people of some particular constituency, that were believed to be in the general interests of the country, should be preferred to those of the entire population of the great majority of the people. The opinion had long prevailed in this country that place-men ought not to have seats in Parliament, and that persons in the power of the Administration should not sit there; and, in fact, that persons dependent on powerful corporations which were in close connection with the Administration for the time being should not sit in Parliament. These were views which he apprehended were entertained by the great majority of the people. They had been in a large measure expressed in these measures which had found their way on to the Statute-book; and they had been there for some years past. He supposed that there was not an instance in which a general election had taken place, when some party in some particular constituency would not have found it advantageous to the party to have had the opportunity of selecting some candidates from among those who were disqualified by this law. They had interfered in the sense in which the words were used by the hon. members for Kingston and Terrebonne, with the liberties of the people in this particular instance, and with those provisions of the law as it now stood; upon what ground had they so interfered? On the ground of the general public interest; and that view of the public interest was entertained by the great majority of the people, and it had found its expression by a majority of their representatives in Parliament. They no more interfered with the liberties of the people in declaring that a gentleman who was in receipt of a superannuation allowance was not a fit person to be elected as a representative in this Parliament, because he might be controlled, for the time being, by the Administration—and they had the same right to exclude such a person from Parliament, and for precisely the same reason—than they did when they excluded any other person in receipt of a salary from the Crown. The hon. member for Kingston said that Judges were permitted to sit in Parliament in England. This was quite true, with regard to retired Judges. The hon. gentleman might have gone further; in the sense in which he used the word, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) would find that Judges who were in the active discharge of their duties on the Bench, sat in the House of Lords and were peers, but the hon. gentleman did not mean to introduce that system into this country, and say that members of the Supreme Court should be members of the Senate Chamber and law officers, and that the members of the supreme judicial tribunal should have seats there. There was just as much reason for these gentlemen having seats in the Senate Chamber, if the system was a good one, as there was for those other Judges to have seats in the House of Lords. He dared say that every member of the House recollected well a discussion which took place on the question whether the Master of the Rolls should be excluded from the House of Commons or not. Mr. Macaulay entertained very strong and decided opinions in favour of retaining that officer, and the last speech, he thought, that Mr. Macaulay ever made in the House of Commons, was in favour of such retention; and he was successful in defeating the measure by which it was proposed that the Master of the Rolls should be so excluded. The principle which excluded officers receiving salaries from the Crown, other than members of the Administration, had prevailed even in this instance; and in 1873 the Master of the Rolls, who, by the way, had not sat in Parliament for 22 years, was by Act declared disqualified from sitting in the House of Commons. The observations of the hon. gentleman were wholly against the tendency of modern legislation, and wholly inconsistent with those provisions of the law which we had recognized in this country, but which, perhaps, we had not hitherto logically and consistently carried out to the full extent, viz., that those who were in receipt of salaries from the Crown ought not to sit in the Parliament of the country. The hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had suggested changes in the measure as it stood. He (Mr. Bowell) suggested that, in the 12th clause, the word "may," after the word "Speaker," be struck out, and the word "shall" inserted. He (Mr. Mills) thought that the use of the word "may" here was a mere oversight, and that the change suggested was necessary. He did not think, after what had been said by hon. gentlemen opposite, that there had been any very serious exception taken to the Bill. One hon. gentleman had said that the Bill was too stringent; that it excluded parties who ought not to be excluded; and another hon. gentleman said that it was, in some respects, too stringent, and, in other respects, too lax, but in what particular way it was more lax than it ought to be, the hon. gentleman had not seen proper to inform the House. He had merely risen to answer the objections raised by the hon. member for Terrebonne, and the answer which that hon. gentleman had thought proper to address to his hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue. The hon. gentleman, when he spoke, seemed to have forgotten the changes made in he Independence of Parliament Act in Quebec, as well as those made in that of the Parliament of Canada. The hon. gentleman had looked at the Act as it was in 1868, and had seemed to forget the discussion which took place on the case of the Hon. Mr. Gray, who had a seat in this Parliament, but he would remember the resolution moved at that time against the hon. gentleman by the hon. member for South Bruce, and that Sir George Cartier, who was then the leader of the Government in the absence of the hon. member for Kingston, had agreed to the introduction of a measure which included in its disqualifying provisions, not only those who were in the receipt of annual salaries from the Government, but also those in receipt of temporary allowances, so that, in this particular, this measure in no way differed from the law as it stood. Its provisions were exactly the same.

Mr. McCARTHY said that this Bill as he understood it, was based upon the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which had not yet, he believed, been adopted by the House. No doubt amendments were required, to some extent, in the direction proposed, but before they adopted these amendments, some of which widened that Act of Parliament in its scope, he thought it important that they should be thoroughly understood. He had not yet understood from the hon. the Minister of Justice or the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat, why these changes were to be made. If they looked at the first section, it would be seen that two very important changes were proposed. One was in the direction of preventing gentlemen who were employed by the Governments of the Provinces from having seats in this House. What was the object of this very sweeping alteration of the law? What was the mischief which it was intended to provide against, and who were those against whom it was directed? He thought that they ought to have known from the Government when introducing this measure, and in seeking to change the law as it stood, the object that was sought to be obtained, not only by this provision, but by other provisions of the Bill. The only persons he could see who would be affected by this change—or, at least, this seemed to be the case—would be the members of the legal profession—gentlemen who were employed by a Local Government to conduct business at the Assizes. There were one or two of such members in the House at present, and one who might now be here, but who was at present conducting Crown business, he believed, at one of the Assizes in the Province of Ontario. He did not think any person pretended to say that any mischief was done by the engagement by the Government of the Local House of that hon. gentleman in the discharge of that duty. He hardly thought it was necessary to exclude all who might come under the provisions of the law, because of the occasional employment of members of the legal profession to conduct the Crown business at the Assizes throughout the country; and it was, as had been pointed out by the hon. members for North Hastings and Terrebonne, an extraordinary circumstance that, while a man might get a contract from a Local Government, and be a contractor to a considerable extent, and not be excluded from sitting in this House, the man was excluded who might get a small fee or be employed, or whose opinion might be asked by a Local Government, in a matter of which he had special knowledge. It had been very ably urged by the hon. member for Kingston, that the object ought not to be to exclude able men from the House; that we did not have a great number of able men in this country, certainly not a superabundance of them and that it ought not to be the object to exclude those who were qualified to take part in the deliberations of the House, and assist in the legislation of the country here. As to the other clause, which excluded pensioners who were entitled to superannuation or a retiring allowance, he considered that the argument of the hon. the Minister of Justice completely failed. As he (Mr. McCarthy) understood it, the only possible reason that could be urged for this was that, under a clause of the Civil Service Act, a certain number of these gentlemen might be recalled to the public service; and that, if they refused to obey this call, they would lose their superannuation allowance. In the first place, this only applied to men under 60 years of age. It did not apply to those above 60; and they know quite well that men were not disqualified from sitting in the House and performing the duties required from members of the House because they had attained, or because they were older than 60 years of age.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I hope not.

MR. MCCARTHY said there was neither force nor reason in the argument that, because a man was over sixty years of age he was unfit for the Civil Service, and, therefore, entitled to superannuation. If that argument was endorsed, then it would amount to an admission that no member of Parliament above that age could properly represent his constituents or discharge his duties towards the people of this Dominion. Such an idea, however, he felt sure would not for a moment be entertained by any member of that House. The result of the adoption of a suggestion similar to that made, would be that an hon. member must either retain his seat in that House or forfeit his allowance: That was a piece of legislation which would have the effect of entirely altering the law which had stood upon our Statute-books for so many years. Passing over the sub-sections of the 1st clause, he found in the 2nd that a dangerous innovation had been made, which would destroy the independence of Parliament. It was true that, in the English Act of Parliament, the words "knowingly and wilfully" were used, but they were employed in a different sense from that of the proposed Bill. The effect of the latter was that no person, either directly or indirectly, holding a contract, could have a seat in that House if they had that contract knowingly. He could not understand why after this the word "wilfully" should be used. Surely a man would not take a contract against his will. When such a clause came to be decided upon by the Judges of the land, they would ask the meaning of these words, for they would not imagine for a moment that the Legislature had made use of them without a reason. The provision referred to was a most dangerous one, and entirely at variance with the spirit of our legislation. In the ninth line of the second page also, there was an omission which he hoped would be explained by the hon. the Minister of Justice. Before, it read thus:—

"For the Government of Canada on behalf of the Crown, or with or for any public office or department, with respect to the Public Service."

Now the clause read thus:—

"Or for the Government of Canada, on behalf of the Crown, or with or for any of the officers of the Government of Canada, for which any of the public money of Canada is to be paid."

He could not see that there was any object in those words, and it must be borne in mind that this law, which was taken from an Act of George III., had been in existence in this country for a great number of years. Unless, therefore, some good reason was adduced, there was no necessity for altering it, and no valid reason had, he maintained, been brought forward. The 7th section of the Act, he agreed with other hon. gentlemen in thinking was an attempt to destroy the object which it pretended to have in view. It was said that the Act was not intended to disqualify any person as a member of Parliament by reason of his being a shareholder in any incorporated company so long as he was not a contractor under agreement with the Government except any company incorporated for the construction of the Pacific Railway. Now, was it right that a gentleman connected with a company incorporated for the construction of such undertakings as the Lachine Canal, the dredging of a harbour, the building of a post-office, or any other work, should be eligible for a seat? Such a principle was an exceedingly dangerous one, and would prove a fruitful source of mischief. It was an affirmation that every person who was connected with a company was entitled to be a member of that House unless he happened to have anything to do with the construction of the Pacific Railway. He did not think any shareholder in a public company, except a gentleman like the member from North York or the hon. the Minister of Militia, who were engaged in the diffusion of knowledge, should, as an interested party, have a seat in that House. There was no reason why advertisements requiring publicity should not be sent to the Globe newspaper, but it would not be right for any member to participate in profits derivable from departmental job printing. Neither was it right that shareholders in banks or insurance companies should sit in that House though the Government dealings with such incorporated associations were very limited. Another clause to which he would direct attention was the 5th sub-section of section 9.

“Any officer of the militia, or militiaman, not receiving any salary or emolument out of the public money of Canada except only his daily pay when called out for drill or in active service.”

Such were eligible for election under the new Act, but by the law as it at present stood, it was provided that officers on the staff, and the militia receiving permanent salaries, also gentlemen connected with the militia receiving a small annual sum for looking after the arms—about $40 a year, he believed—should be excluded. That, however, seemed not to be the intention of the present Government. The words “knowingly and wilfully” ought, he thought, to be inserted in the 4th section and omitted from the 2nd, which was intended to apply to persons who had an expressed, not an implied contract, and omitted from the 4th section which referred to those who had got a contract by inadvertence and who, by the operation of the Act as it at present stood, might not only lose their seats, but be subject to heavy penalties. He would next refer to sub-section 2 of section 9 which was as follows:—

“Any contractor for the loan of money or of securities for the payment of money to the Government of Canada, under the authority of Parliament, after public competition, or respecting the purchase or payment of the public stock on debentures of Canada, on terms common to all persons.”

Now that seemed clear to him to strike at the hon. the Finance Minister.

MR. MCCARTHY.

They had it plain here that the loan on the English market was not, as contemplated by this Bill, put up to public competition, as “common to all parties” to use the language of the Bill, but was obtained by private agreement. If this was wrong, as they contended it was, then the section was right; if on the other hand, the manner of obtaining the loan was right, this section was not as it should be. But speaking on the Bill generally, he had to say that it was dangerous, in his opinion, to introduce a Bill of this character on the eve of a general election. If it was intended to extend the Act of Parliament or alter the law to any appreciable extent, then it was going to be enacted at a time when the people would not have time to understand it; perhaps at a time when candidates were selected whom this law might disqualify. There was no absolute necessity, no reason, why it should pass into law just at present, and, under the circumstances, it might be very mischievous in its results. The very persons excluded, beyond those excluded by the present law, were those under the first section, who were pensioners entitled to retiring allowances or superannuation, or as had been well said already, all those gentlemen, whether Judges or members of the Civil Service who had already acquired a vested right to his superannuation or allowance. When the Judge accepted his position, he did so with the knowledge that, after he had served a certain number of years, he would be entitled to his retiring allowance, and that there was nothing to prevent him going into public life as soon as he left the Bench. The same would apply to the Civil Service; and why these gentlemen who acquired these vested rights to retiring allowances should be prevented from sitting in this House, he was certainly at a loss to understand. He could not help thinking this Bill must be aimed at some person; that it was framed with the idea of preventing some person sitting into this House whom the Government did not desire to see here. He could not help thinking these general terms were put in for a reason of that kind. They on his side had put forth in this House something to be proud of; they had strenuously exerted themselves in the interests of the people, and now, at the last moment, they desired not to leave things as they were, but to make them better. Whether it was better to pass a measure of this kind was a matter of grave doubt. The law was understood very well as it existed, and to introduce a new Act of Parliament, with different provisions, changing the language here, omitting a sentence there, and altering it generally was, on the eve of election, after many candidates had been elected throughout the country, dangerous and productive of mischief. The object of the Bill was really intended to exclude some person who, under the law as it stood, was entitled to offer himself as a member of Parliament. However, if the Government persevered with the Bill, he trusted both sides of the House would assist in making the law as clear as possible. It was an important law, not merely for the gentlemen who had seats in the House, but for the people of the country, who should thoroughly understand who were entitled to a seat here. There should be no antagonism between the people of this country and this House. They all knew contractors were excluded, but he did not know why Judges, who had retired, should be excluded. There were improper influences which the Government could bring to bear upon contractors, and under those circumstances, it was well such people should be excluded. It appeared to him exceedingly unwise, bearing in mind the Constitution of the country, to so narrow the Act as proposed by the first section, and the language of the second and seventh sections he considered dangerous. He looked upon the latter as calculated to destroy the law as it now stood, to destroy the just provisions which had obtained in this country for so many years. He trusted that before this Bill became law the second clause would be amended very materially, and that the seventh clause would either be struck out altogether, or, better still, be defined more narrowly. It should not be left as it was now, open to all persons to become members of this House, except those only who might be engaged in the construction of the Pacific Railway.

MR. LAFLAMME said he agreed with many of the remarks from the Opposition, and particularly with the declaration that this ought not to be a party measure. Certainly it had not been introduced as a party measure, and he was disposed to accept the suggestion that had been made in order to make the Bill as perfect as possible. He did not wish to speak at length upon it, but he would answer a few observations that had been made in respect of one or two points, which seemed to have raised most objection on the part of members on the other side. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) pretended that there was no reason, and he expected some reason, for the exclusion of the local officers from a right to sit in Parliament. It seemed to have been already a subject of examination on the part of the Local Governments, and they had come to the conclusion that it was advisable to prevent the federal officers, whoever they might be, from becoming members of their Local Parliament, and the same reason must apply with respect to the Federal Parliament. Such a clause was necessary in order to keep the two bodies entirely separate, so that a member of the Local Government also a member of the Federal Government might not be influenced or induced to use his patronage in aid of the Federal Government. He believed it was essential to secure that independence which seemed to have been the object of the Independence Act of the Local Legislatures; to adopt the same principle, as there was as good a reason to exclude the local officers from the House of Commons as there was to exclude the federal officers from the Local Parliament. This was the only motive which had dictated the introduction of this exclusion with respect to the local officers. Another objection which had been mooted was in reference to the words "knowingly and wittingly." These words were found in the Imperial Act, and they were introduced as the strict words of the passage would have inflicted injury on innocent parties. If there was any difficulty as to the passage it could be easily remedied when the Bill went into Committee. With respect to the objection raised by the hon. member for Cardwell as to the seventh clause, the moment the hon. gentleman considered how the clause should be worded in order to exclude members of such associations as might enter the House for the purpose of obtaining contracts, it would be found that it was almost impossible to word it in any other way, for every company which had been incorporated had some enactment upon the Statute-book, and the banks generally throughout the Dominion. In England there was a similar provision, which limited the operations of the Imperial Statute to associations which were composed of more than ten members. So in England even common partners would be excluded if the number of partners reached the number of ten; and the incorporated companies, by the Independence Act, would be altogether excluded. He had no objection to adopt any expression which would meet the case and prevent parties using corporations to obtain the contracts themselves. This could easily be introduced into the Bill, and would secure the object which the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) seemed to have in view, which was that the Bill should be worded so as not to allow escape to parties who might take advantage of fictitious corporations for the purpose of obtaining contracts from the Government.

MR. LANGEVIN said that the words "except any company incorporated for the construction or working of any part of the Canadian Pacific Railway" were one-sided, because other companies might contract for the Welland Canal, or the St. Lawrence or Lachine Canal. Should not the same exclusion take place though it were not in connection with the Pacific Railway?

MR. LAFLAMME said there was no corporation for any such purpose, and when a corporation was asked for then the objection would be raised. But with regard to the Pacific Railway, it was evident that a corporation formed for the construction of such a gigantic work would necessarily require legislation, and without this clause there would be an inducement for them to send members of their company to Parliament in order to secure the legislation they would require.

MR. LANGEVIN asked why should a member of such a company should not be at liberty to enter Parliament, just as much as a shareholder in any other company having a contract with the Government of Canada? If the hon. gentleman wished to attain the object this clause said he wished to attain, he must go the whole length. He must say "or any other company in which a member of Parliament shall be a shareholder, and that shall be doing work for the Government, that member shall be excluded from Parliament." He would now refer to the first clause, the provisions of which had been very clearly stated by the leader of the Opposition, and he would give an instance to show how this clause differentiated—if he might use the word—in its results. It excluded from Parliament the lawyer who received a small fee from the Ontario Government, but it would not exclude the legal adviser of the corporation of Montreal, who received $4,000 a year. He would go further than that. Take the Grand Trunk Railway, the Great Western line, the Canada Southern Railway, or the Northern Railway Company—the managers of these great undertakings might be elected to Parliament. Their officers might also be elected to Parliament, and then these companies could come every year to ask for Acts of Parliament. They were interested in Parliament more than the Provincial Legislatures. The Local Legislatures did not come here, or very seldom.

MR. MACKENZIE: But some of them send their members.

MR. LANGEVIN said the hon. gentleman must see that these great companies had a large amount of influence in this House; nevertheless, this Bill would not exclude them, but the lawyer who received $10 from the Ontario Government must be turned out. This was not in accordance with justice; this was a one-sided measure. If the hon. gentleman wished this measure to apply and prevent these great corporations having influence over this House, he should frame it so as to exclude the gentlemen belonging to these great companies. Now he came to the Judges, those who retired upon a pension. That pension was theirs, it belonged to them and could not be interfered with by any one. Nevertheless, having retired from the Bench at sixty or sixty-five years of age, though having great ability and experience, they were not to sit in Parliament, and the great experience they must have acquired in twenty-five or thirty years upon the Bench was lost to the country. There was no logic in this. The Government of the day had no possible influence over such a man, therefore, where was the danger of admitting him into this House. With regard to the superannuated Civil Service officers, as the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) had rightly observed, when these men were over sixty years of age, the Government could not compel them to take any office, so there was an end of the argument of the Government for the exclusion of them. Take, for instance, Mr. Langton, who had such a long experience of the finances of the country; suppose he retired to-morrow, what was there in reason that should prevent his entering Parliament? Take Mr. Fleming; why should not that great engineer, when he retired, give the country the benefit of his vast experience? He had as much right to sit in this House as any man.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Fleming is not in the Civil Service.

MR. LANGEVIN said he would take Mr. Page then, who had been Chief Engineer for years and years. He knew his (Mr. Langevin's) successor would say that Mr. Page was a most able man and an excellent engineer, who had had very great experience in the Public Works Department. Suppose he retired to-morrow; why, if the people chose to elect him, should he not have a seat in this House, so that the country could have the benefit of his great experience with reference to canals and other public works? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laflamme) said there was great danger, as Mr. Page would be in receipt of a pension. Mr.

Page was, perhaps, sixty years of age now, and might be in receipt of a pension of $2,000 or $3,000, but Mr. Page would be perfectly independent of Government after he had retired, and they had no right to exclude him from Parliament if the people chose to elect him. He wished now to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the 10th clause. The hon. gentleman wished, by this clause, to apply the same rule to Senators as he would apply to members of this House. On the fourth page appeared this proviso:

“Provided always, that this section shall not render any Senator who, at the passing of this Act, holds any office, commission or employment in the service of the Crown, or has any contract, agreement or arrangement for which the public money of Canada is to be paid, incapable of continuing to hold such office, or shall prevent him from completing such contract, agreement or arrangement, or render him liable to the penalties imposed by this section.”

He could not understand why the hon. the Minister of Justice made exception for such of the hon. Senators who might have contracts with this Government, but would not make the same exception for hon. Senators who had contracts, or who had made agreements with the Local Legislature. If the proviso with the exception was to be made in favour of one or two Senators who might have contracts with this Government, why should not the exception be applied to other Senators who might have contracts or agreements with the Local Governments of Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. It seemed to him to be invidious to give a chance to one Senator who might have a contract, or have become surety for a contractor with this Government, to secure his seat, while they refused the same privilege to those Senators who might have the misfortune to have an agreement with a Local Government.

MR. LAFLAMME: It does not apply at all to Senators having contracts with any Local Government.

MR. LANGEVIN: Let the hon. the Minister of Justice read the clause.

“No person being a member of the Senate shall be capable of holding any office, commission or employment, other than the offices mentioned in sub-section two of the first section of this Act.”

That applied only to Ministers of the Crown; and further:

“Or shall be a party to, or concerned in any contract, agreement, matter, or thing, which by this Act would render any person incapable of being elected to the House of Commons, and of continuing to sit or vote in the same.”

That applied to both Local and Federal Governments, and, therefore, the hon. gentleman was here making an exception for only one or two Senators who might have contracts with this Government, but would not do the same thing for Senators who might have contracts with a Local Government. There should be no such invidious exceptions made.

MR. LAFLAMME: There is nothing in the Act which conveys the meaning the hon. member attributes to it.

MR. LANGEVIN said it would be better for the hon. gentleman to admit it. His (Mr. Langevin's) language was not English; nevertheless, he understood it sufficiently well to understand this clause. The first portion on page three, applied that clause which disqualified a man from sitting in the House of Commons, to Senators, with the exception of only one or two Senators who might have contracts with this Government. With respect to clause 15, there was no period defined within which the warrant should issue, so that the hon. the Minister of Justice must see that it was himself who would fix the period in which to issue the warrant. It must not be left to the good will of the Government or of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, or of the authorities who might have this under control, to issue that warrant whenever they pleased. There must be a period defined in which the warrant must issue. Under the law which put controverted elections under the control of Committees of this House, a member, having been elected at a general election, could not resign his seat, except after the fifteen first days of the Session. The law had been changed for the purpose of giving to the parties who contested an election, time to contest the seat, and while the seat was contested the member could not resign. But the present law completely changed this. As long as the writ had been returned, as long as the member had been declared duly elected by the returning officer, any party, during the next thirty days, who wished to contest the election might do so. Why should it not be provided that then, after those thirty days, any member who had been elected at the general election and wished to resign, might do so? There was no reason to say that the member who had been so elected should be held to remain until Parliament met, before he could resign, if he had reason to warrant his resignation, but that, after thirty days, he should have the liberty to resign, and the writ should issue in the same way as if he had died or accepted office, which had rendered his seat vacant. He wished to aid the hon. gentleman in making this measure as perfect as possible, and, therefore, had made these few remarks.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said this Bill seemed to him to illustrate the anomalous position in which parties of this House were sometimes placed in regard to certain questions. Hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House argued for the freedom of the people in their choice of candidates for Parliament, while hon. gentlemen on the other side, especially the Free-trade member for Bothwell, the hon. the Minister of the Interior, argued to limit the right of the people in their choice of candidates. Hon. gentlemen opposite had only to go one step further in this Bill to make it perfect. They had restricted it so far that they had only to add that no person should be eligible to be elected to this House who was not now a member or a supporter of the Government. There were some provisions which drew distinctions that he could not understand. A member of this House might have a contract with a Local Government, whereby he drew thousands of dollars from the Provincial Treasury, and not be disqualified; but persons accepting temporary employment from any of the Local Governments, as in the cases mentioned here to-night, of counsel for the Crown, who were generally men of the greatest ability, were declared ineligible to be elected. There should be no distinction drawn between these two classes. If a person were disqualified by reason of his having accepted temporary employment from the Provincial Government, so ought one who held a contract or agreement with a Local Government to be also disqualified. He protested against this distinction before the Bill went through Committee, and trusted the Government would see it was not just and proper. Because the hon. member for Hamilton happened to be employed by the Local Government to conduct the Crown business, were they to suppose he would be influenced by the paltry fee he received? Yet, under the provisions of this Act, he would be disqualified, while, if he entered into a contract with the Provincial Government to perform the same duty, he would not be disqualified. He thought, in the second clause, the words "knowingly or wilfully" were inserted in the wrong place. Last year there were instances of gentlemen who had been trading with the Government, and who, as they had informed the House, were not aware that they had been so trading. The hon. member for Montreal West had stated that he did not know that his clerks had been selling goods to Government officials at Montreal, and it was very hard that he should have been disqualified. This Bill would not remove that injustice; it said the contract or agreement must be knowingly and wilfully made. As the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. McCarthy) had aptly observed, it was not possible that a man should sign his name to a contract without doing it knowingly, without having entered into that contract knowingly and wilfully. He might sell goods, wares or merchandise, through his clerks, without doing so wilfully or knowingly; but the distinction was so drawn that if he sold goods, wares, or merchandise, whether wilfully or knowingly or not, he was disqualified. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) did not know whether or not that was the intention of the Government, but he must decidedly oppose the second reading of the Bill as it now stood. If the hon. the Minister of Justice looked at the 4th clause, he would see that:

"If any member of the House of Commons accepts any office or commission, or is concerned or interested in any contract, agreement, service or work which, by the first or second section of this Act, renders a candidate incapable of being elected to, or of sitting or voting in the House of Commons, or sells any goods, wares or merchandise—" whether knowingly and wilfully, or innocently, was disqualified. Now, that was just the opposite of the way in which it was stated in the English Act. The English Act said: "No one who enters into a contract or agreement with the Crown shall be capable of sitting in the Parliament." Then, the alternative: "Or who shall knowingly and wilfully furnish or provide, in pursuance of said agreement, any goods, wares or merchandise." In the present Bill, the words had been inserted in the wrong place. It should read that those who entered into a contract would be rendered, thereby, ineligible; but, as regarded the selling of goods, it should be done wilfully and knowingly. This was what the English Act contemplated, and what, he believed, this Act also contemplated. With regard to the seventh clause, relating to incorporated companies, it had been proved that this clause, if the Bill passed in its present shape, rendered the whole of the Act nugatory. Any five persons, members of Parliament, who desired to take a Government contract, could form themselves into a joint stock company and take the contract, without coming under the penalty of disqualification. It was reasonable that members of incorporated companies who numbered their shareholders by the hundred, such as banks, and railway and insurance companies, should not be disqualified on account of any contract entered into between such incorporated company and the Government, but the same principle should not apply to members of small companies, trading firms, limited liability companies, such as were incorporated every day; members of such companies should not be allowed to take contracts from the Government and occupy their seats in this House, while they derived just as much benefit from the contract as if they had taken it in their individual names. In England, and even in this country, a great number of trading firms and partnerships were transformed into companies. His hon. friend from Ottawa, who dealt in lumber, or his hon. friend from Montreal West, whose familiar face they missed so much this Session, might form, with four of his clerks, a joint stock company, under the name and style of "Frothingham, Workman, & Co., (Limited)", and supply all the goods this Government might want to an unlimited extent. The seventh clause would have to be entirely remodelled, and made to apply only to incorporated companies, such as railways, banks, and insurance companies, or, perhaps, for the sake of the hon. the Finance Minister, to express companies.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: And of the hon. member for Frontenac, who was lately a stockholder in the company.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he would draw attention to the 9th clause, 2nd sub-section, which stated :

"Any contractor for the loan of money or of securities for the payment of money to the Government of Canada under the authority of Parliament, after public competition—"

They knew that some of the loans had been let without public competition, and they had known the hon. the Minister of Finance to tell this House that he would not give the names of those who had contracted to take a loan. If the hon. the Finance Minister went to England to make a loan, and contracted with people there to take it up, not after public competition but by private arrangement, and then refused to give to this House the names of the parties who had taken up that loan, of what use would be this clause? The words "after public competition" should be struck out, and the exception should extend to any contractors for the loan of money or for public securities, whether the contract was awarded by the Government after public competition or not. There were other clauses, the wording of which required to be amended very materially, if it was desired to carry out the intentions of the Government, and if the Government had an honest desire to exclude placemen from the House. The hon. the Minister of Justice had stated, as a reason for introducing this Bill, that the Local Legislatures had excluded from the Local Parliament persons holding similar employment to those mentioned in the present Act, but the course of the Local Governments was not one by which this Government ought to be guided, in that respect. If contractors with the Provincial Government were allowed to retain their seats, the same should be allowed to gentlemen who only had temporary employments, and who only received the fees or emoluments of a temporary nature from the Provincial Governments. He believed the Local Government of Ontario had repealed the clause which restrained them from employing members of the House or from allowing members to sit in the Local House who had employment from the Dominion Government. He thought this was the course which ought to be pursued and allow the Local Governments to employ members of this House if they chose to do so.

MR. PALMER said that, although he had carefully gone over the Bill, he failed to fully understand what the hon. the Minister of Justice proposed to carry out. Was it that he proposed to exclude from this House all persons who had dealings with the Dominion Government or the Local Governments, whether they knew it or not; or was it merely to exclude those who had such dealing knowingly and willingly? In a certain part of the Bill one policy was pursued, and in other sections another policy. It was almost impossible for anyone to understand exactly what was meant by the old Act, by reason of the different decisions which had been given in regard to it; and it was therefore exceedingly desirable that the new Act should be such that hon. members and the electors might be able to know what was said in the House and what not. If the Bill, however, passed in its present form, it would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer to tell whether a party had a right to his seat or not. Take, for example, the 2nd clause, which was intended to disqualify persons holding contracts with the Government; at the end of the clause it stated that parties should not sit and vote while holding such contracts. If that section were taken by itself, it would naturally mean that, if a person were elected, he would be disqualified to sit; but that, if he got rid of his contract, he could take his seat. But, in the 5th section, that idea was dispelled, and the words in that section were entirely inconsistent with those in the 2nd section. By the 5th section he was not only disqualified from sitting, but liable to a penalty, whereas, by the second section, he was disqualified only. He pointed out these discrepancies because it was important, after their past experience, that the law should be such that it could be readily understood. Would the hon. the Minister of Justice inform the House whether, if the Bill passed in its present form, a man who had an interest in an incorporated company which had a contract with the Government, would be disqualified on that. He (Mr. Palmer) could not tell by the Bill. He would not think so, except it was contained in the seventh section. A lawyer would argue what was the necessity of specially excluding persons connected with a company having contracts with the Pacific Railway. The Bill, in its present shape, would make confusion worse confounded. Suppose a gentleman entered into a contract with the Government, as the hon. member for Lincoln had done, entirely ignorantly, it having been accepted by his agent, he would, of course, receive the money for the work. He would then argue: "I did not know the contract had been entered into, and I put an end to it; and, under the second clause of the Act, I am safe." But the lawyer would say: "You have received money under a contract or agreement, as expressed in the fourth clause, and, therefore, you are liable." A Bill of that description should not be left in that form, and such crude and absurd provisions could not be found in any Act on the subject. In many instances, clauses were introduced when necessary, and contradicted other clauses in the matter. For that reason, he hoped the Government would state distinctly to the House what they proposed to do. Did they propose to allow members of corporations to deal with the Government, all excepting those connected with the Pacific Railway? If they did, let that policy be distinctly announced and placed in this Bill, not by implication but distinctly and plainly. Did they intend that any man dealing with the Government and entering into contracts with it should not be ineligible unless he did it "knowingly and wilfully?" If that were so, let that also be distinctly set forth. If, on the other hand, they thought it in the interest of the country that no man should have dealings or contracts with the Government and still be able to sit in the House—and that was, probably, the safest course—let it be distinctly known. The doctrine of implied contracts, laid down in the Russell case, was only in principle. The only limitation he placed on the whole Independence of Parliament Act was that, where a person had a contract or dealings for a small amount it should not cause disqualification. He had looked carefully into the Bill, because many members had violated the Act unintentionally, and it was desirable that the Government should make the law clear and distinct. He admitted that the question was a difficult one to deal with, but, if the present Bill were passed without amendment, it would make matters worse rather than better.

MR. PLUMB said the necessities which had brought about the introduction of the present Bill did not tell very favourably for the Government of the day. In dealing with a question like the independence of Parliament, a question affecting the dealing of many members of Parliament with the Government, it would scarcely have been supposed that the Ministry would have brought down a measure in any way relaxing the provisions of the law as it existed when they came into power. Upon looking over the Bill, he observed that in some very important particulars it relaxed the stringent and salutary provisions of that law of which the gentleman who had now introduced and become responsible for this Bill were the most ardent advocates, a law which those gentlemen complained did not go far enough, and which they at that time stigmatized as being too feeble, too weak in its operation, and which several of those who were responsible for the present measure were loud in denouncing. He saw nothing in the present Bill that could be called a measure of reform. It had been shown by the right hon. member for Kingston and other hon. gentlemen who had followed him, that the provisions of the Bill, in many respects, were a relaxation of the Act for securing the independence of Parliament, which was on the Statute-book, and of which some hon. gentlemen opposite had reaped the consequences, having had dealings with the Government, while others were to-day absent from their seats when this Bill was being discussed, leaving their constituencies unrepresented, because they violated the stringent and salutary rule which this Bill was in some measure to weaken, and open the door to the same abuses of which the House had such flagrant examples before the close of last Session—such examples as, he trusted, would never again be seen in Parliament. The provision reducing the penalty attaching to a violation of the Act was on face of it a step in the wrong direction. He admitted that the penalty of the present Act was excessive, but, at the same time, it might be said there was no excuse for any violation of the Act, and no reason why the penalty should be incurred; and it was, certainly, a false step to reduce the penalty so that a man with a fat contract in his pocket could afford to pay it. On some very important measure, a man holding such a contract could afford to pay the proposed penalty and vote upon it. The reduction of the penalty from $2,000 to $200 per day, was a great wrong, and it showed at what price the hon. member who had introduced the Bill valued the independence of Parliament. They had set a price upon it—$200 per day. They scarcely expected a move made in that direction by Reformers. The seventh section was the most objectionable that could possibly be conceived. If it was designed in serious earnest to have this Act an effective measure for the purpose for which it was apparently designed, there was nothing easier than the facility with which incorporated companies could be created, and mercantile, forwarding and other associations, even associations having the smallest possible dealings could be formed into companies holding corporate powers; and it was a perfect mockery to say that a man who had been unseated in Parliament because he had had carried a vessel load of iron for the Government, could not take two or three friends with him, give them a few hundred dollars' worth of stock in a propeller or steamer, make a stock company, and then take a Government contract. But this was exactly what an hon. gentleman could do under this Bill. If a new title was to be given to it, it should be: "A Bill to facilitate members of Parliament in holding contracts under the Government"; this was the real effect of it. He was surprised when he read the section. It could not have been seriously brought down by the Government as a measure of reform. It was a reform in no sense whatever. Another clause was equally objectionable, and he was astonished that it should have emanated from a Government professing to be a Reform Government and to desire that, so far as it was possible in consonance with our system of Government, every man should have equal rights and be eligible to be a representative of the people under the qualification which the law had provided. To say that, because a man was the recipient of the Government bounty which he had earned by a long course of service, he should be excluded from having a seat in the counsels of the country, was a mockery; and that a man, who had been, as he had known men were within the past year, superannuated in the most tyrannical manner and driven from Government employment in which they had hoped to spend their lives as long as they performed their duties properly, and that because he had the mockery of a small pension from the Government, should be so excluded, was another mockery which he could not have expected to come from the other side of the House. The principle upon which the Government had carried out the Superannuation Act reminded him very much of the manner—only it was less merciful in dealing with these people who had become advanced in years—in which barbarous nations treated their aged people. It would be much better for the people superannuated by the Government, while fully able to perform their duties—and he knew what he was talking about when he made this assertion—and much less cruel, if they had been exposed as barbarous nations exposed their old people to starvation or drowning in the Ganges, or if they had been served up for dinner, as was done by some nations, who made holocausts of their respected parents and who did not keep any baptismal registers, because, when that system was adopted, he dared say that a little hunger or some other interested motive would prevent a very striking examination into the exact period when that holocaust was to take place. On the same principle, whenever it became necessary to place a favourite in some office, and to put somebody in the place who had earned, through some service to the party in power, the man who had held the office which, though the emoluments might be small, he supposed was to have been a permanency as long as he was capable of performing the duties, and his behaviour was good and no complaint was made against him, was turned out without any reason given for such action; and to this man so superannuated, in addition to the other damage inflicted upon him, the injustice was done him in this Bill of preventing him from entering Parliament. He knew of a case which had happened very near him, in which a gentleman of the very highest character and of the highest business qualification, who was employed by the Government at a moderate salary, who looked upon his position as permanent, and who was educating his family, was turned out of office within the last year without any reason being given for it or any sort of justification, he had ever heard of, while the man who replaced this gentleman was a very unworthy successor. And this man had served the Government for years, was still in the prime of life, and he was obliged to take his children away from school because the scanty pittance which the Government gave him did not enable him to afford them the benefit of a common school education. This was only one case which had come under his observation; and he had heard of fifty such cases.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PLUMB said hon. gentlemen might cry "hear, hear"; but no doubt many of these hon. gentlemen themselves knew of such cases, which had fallen under his observation, because these cases had occurred all over Canada. He had heard of them in every direction. The Superannuation Fund had been made by the Government an instrument of tyranny and oppression, such as it was shameful to relate. He could vindicate the statement he had made by the most ample proof. In this way, these men were to be excluded from Parliament under this Bill, if the people among whom they lived respected them sufficiently to give them an opportunity to serve their country in the House. This was one of the most shameful provisions ever put into a Bill and brought before the public of Canada; and the more it was examined, notwithstanding the jeers of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the less the conduct of the Government with respect to the Superannuation Fund would bear the light. This afforded him an opportunity to stigmatize the measure as he had long desired to do, and, as he knew, it well deserved. A provision was found in this Bill to prevent hon. Senators from holding public contracts, but, if this Bill had gone a little further, it would have been a little better. It dealt very tenderly with that subject, and hon. gentlemen on the other side doubtless knew why. There was one part of this Act with which he was very glad to say he quite agreed, namely, that which acknowledged the principle that contracts for the loan of money upon public securities should be made by open competition. He had been long an advocate for this system in Canada and he had pointed out, and he believed clearly, that this was the only system which was safe and justifiable, and which could secure to us the best price for our securities. If this system had been adopted it would not have been necessary for the hon. the Finance Minister to have taken up at least one-quarter of his Budget speech in endeavouring to exculpate himself from any blame in connection with the last negotiation he had made of public securities in England; and, if so, we should not have had our securities in such a position that the great loan-mongers of Lombard-street could have made the price at any time what they chose, the Finance Minister who went to negotiate the loan being quite helpless in the matter, and the public securities would have been then scattered among small holders and they could not have brought any large sums to bear on the transaction, as was now the case. The men who brought out these loans on the market could at any time make the price. He did not accuse them of having done so; but he held that it was in their power to do so. They could very easily make the price by throwing a sum on the money market and offering it for sale, that the public would not buy, for these securities were not dealt with like consols and other daily securities on the Stock Exchange. The principle which had been acted upon in this respect had been a false one; and the hon. the Finance Minister who had fallen into the hands of those who had advised him in that way, did not understand his business, and had placed himself helplessly hereafter, with regard to every loan which the hon. gentleman might make, in the hands of people who already had it in their interest to fix a low price on our securities. He did not say that they had not done this. He remembered with what indignation the hon. gentleman, in his speech, had charged hon. members of the Opposition in this relation with casting reproach on the bankers and other money lenders who made loans their business on the money market of England. He was glad that this Bill recognised this principle, and he trusted that hereafter what had been said on this subject would weigh with those who had to negotiate our loans, although it was almost impossible, after an improper system had been adopted, to change it; still he would rather see the hazard taken with regard to the next loan of throwing it, after proper notice at the proper time, on public competition, and taking our chances, provided always there was a man at the helm who knew better than to decry the credit of Canada upon every occasion for the sake of casting odium on his predecessors. In every respect, from the beginning to the end, this Bill was in no way an improvement upon the Bill it sought to replace. He had no doubt the Government, after hearing the criticisms of gentlemen of the legal profession with respect to the legal difficulties connected with it, and those made from a business point of view by other hon. gentlemen who were able to view it in that light, would consent to make such serious modifications that, if they pressed it at all, it would meet with the acceptance and favour of those who had directed their attention to it on this occasion. He considered these objections so weighty that the Government would not think of pressing the Bill as it stood; and, doubtless, they would take into consideration the changes suggested by members of the Opposition, who desired, if possible, to secure the passage of a measure which should effectually reach the end proposed, but which this Bill would not reach in any proper degree. One of the great objections to the Bill consisted in the fact that it was left open as to when a writ might issue after a vacancy took place under the circumstances detailed in section 15. Another difficulty, and one more of detail, probably, than anything else, related to the fact that, in default of a Speaker during recess, it was provided that a member wishing to resign, must send in his resignation to two members of Parliament who should issue the writ. It was provided that:

“He may address and cause to be delivered to any two members of the House, the declaration before mentioned, of his intention to resign; and such two members upon receiving such declaration, shall forthwith address their warrant under their hands and seals to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery,” etc.

A man might be so stupid as to make a blunder in this connection. This they knew had occurred in the case of a member for British Columbia, who, he believed, it was publicly known, desiring to resign his seat, had not adopted the right means for effecting his purpose. The resignation submitted was in fault. There should be some specific machinery provided in this relation; the form of the writ should be stated, and the manner in which it should be issued, and the whole of the proceedings should be given so plainly and unmistakeably that no case like that to which he had just alluded could occur. That hon. gentleman, he believed, had got into some difficulty with respect to the violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, under the patronage of the present Government. Provisions should be made by which a member could resign without incurring the long delay that had occurred in this case, leaving the district in question without representation; and, in any case, there should be such a plain and simple process enacted, and such ample and exact statements, placed in the Bill for the guidance of those who wished to resign, that no mistake would be committed, and no risk, either through connivance, or accident, or ignorance, incurred, of leaving a district unrepresented in this relation. This was so important a point that he was surprised it should have escaped the acute observation of the hon. the Minister of Justice. He was surprised that the hon. gentleman had not prepared a schedule to show the necessary steps to be taken to carry out the provisions of the Bill, because they must imagine that no Bill like this should be introduced without mature deliberation, or unless the questions connected with it had been duly weighed and considered, not only by the hon. the Minister of Justice, but also by all the hon. gentleman's associates; and it seemed very hasty and inconsiderate to bring down a measure like this with important matters not only omitted, but pointed out by those who did not profess to be competent through legal knowledge to give any hint to the hon. the Minister of Justice, who might be supposed to embody in himself the whole of the judicial wisdom of the Ministerial side of the House.

MR. CURRIER said that, if this Bill became law as it stood, it appeared to him it would be quite true, as the hon. member for Frontenac, as well as other hon. members had said, that any of the members of the House might form joint stock companies under the Joint Stock Companies Act, Provincial or Federal, thus enabling them to carry on any kind of business, and enter into any kind of contract with the Government, thereby evading the law. If there was not some way of preventing this, he did not see that it would be of any use whatever to enact this law. The only possible remedy for this, it appeared to him, was to exclude shareholders in joint stock companies from having anything to do with Government money. It could not be doubted that his hon. friend from Lincoln and himself, last Session, might have evaded the law if they chose; if such had been his desire, nothing could have been easier for him than to transact his business through a broker and furnish lumber to the Government. Now, if the Bill now under consideration did not provide for such contingencies, it was in no way better than the old Act. With reference to what had been said by the hon. the leader of the Opposition regarding gentlemen who had been superannuated, it appeared to him by no means wrong to exclude those gentlemen from holding seats in that House. So long as they were fit to discharge the duties of members of Parliament, they were quite able to do the duties connected with their Departments, and they should be kept there so long as they were able to perform such duties. When the time came that they were unable to do so, then they should be deemed unfit to hold seats in that House. The same remarks applied also to Judges.

MR. NORRIS said he did not care how stringent the Bill was made, as it was very unlikely he should ever come within the operation of the Act again, but he did not think it right that hon. gentlemen opposite, amongst whom were the hon. members for Kingston, Niagara and St. John, should illustrate what they meant by pointing to himself and other members of the House. To do so certainly evinced bad taste, especially as the hon. member for Ottawa and himself, having appealed to their constituents, were returned to the House the same as before. His hon. friend and himself had, therefore, as much right to sit in this House as any other gentleman in it, and it was scarcely creditable that allusions, such as those to which he called attention, should be made use of. Instead of strengthening his position, the hon. the member for Niagara had only shown his own weakness.

Bill read the second time.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—
[BILL No. 17.]

(Mr. Huntington.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the Bill was a very simple one, and consisted of few clauses. The first clause proposed to amend sub-section 4 of section 10 of the Post-Office Act, 1875. That sub-section gave powers to “Make regulations declaring what shall and what shall not be deemed to be mailable matter for the purposes of this Act; and for restricting within reasonable limits the weight and dimensions of letters and packets and other matters sent by post; and for prohibiting and preventing the sending of explosive, dangerous, contraband or improper articles; obscene or immoral publications, or obscene or immoral post-cards.”

To that the new Bill proposed to add:

“And for prohibiting and preventing the sending or delivery by post of letters, circulars, or other mail matter, concerning illegal lotteries, so-called gift concerts, or other illegal enterprises of like character; offering prizes or concerning schemes devised or intended to deceive or defraud the public, for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences, whether such letters, circulars or other mail matter be addressed to or received by mail from places within or without the Dominion of Canada.”

The 2nd section of the Bill provided that section 41 of the Act be amended by the addition of the following words:

“And whenever the Postmaster-General shall have undertaken or agreed to provide for the transportation of the mails from the United States or any portion of Canada, such mails, when so carried or transported, or required by the Postmaster-General to be so carried or transported over any Canadian railway, shall, for all the purposes of the fifty-eighth section of the said Act, be deemed to be Her Majesty's mails.”

MR. NORRIS.

The reason for giving the powers proposed in the amendment was that, as far as possible, the Government might have the power to check fraudulent enterprises, like those indicated in the clause. A number of these swindlers, who had been driven out of the United States, were endeavouring to make Canada their headquarters, in order that they might be able to carry on their operations. When the Bill was first introduced, however, the hon. member for Cumberland called his attention to what he termed the espionage over letters which passed through the Department, and deprecated such a power being vested in the hands of a Government official. That power, he could assure hon. gentlemen, would be used cautiously; and, besides, the clause did not go so far as the supervision allowed by the Act, as set forth in clause 19 thereof, which he would read from the Hansard for 1875, page 581:—

“The Postmaster-General, upon evidence satisfactory to him, that any person, firm, partnership, or company, in Canada or elsewhere, is engaged in conducting any scheme or device for obtaining remittances through the post-office, by means of false or fraudulent pretences, representations or promises of any kind, may forbid the payment by any postmaster to any such person, firm, partnership or company, of any postal money order drawn in his or their favour; and may provide for the return of the sum named in any such order, to the remitter thereof; and may, upon such like evidence, forbid the delivery to such person, firm, partnership or company of any registered or other letter which he believes to be addressed to or for him or them, through or by reason of any such fraudulent scheme or device, and may cause any such letter to be returned to the sender thereof, marked with the word “Fraud,” as the reason of non-delivery to its address. Provided that no postmaster or other person not authorized by the Postmaster-General, shall open any such letters.”

In the present case it was proposed to deal with a particular class of frauds, and no new principle was introduced into the law as it now stood. The Postmaster-General might, according to the provision of the Act, deal with letters on various fair grounds of suspicion, and an attempt was now being made to restrain the circulation of letters despatched for an illegal purpose. The necessity for making an addition to the Act such as that proposed had been urged upon the Dominion Government by the Government of the United States, where frauds of the nature of those to be dealt with had grown into gigantic proportions. At the present time repressive measures were rendered still more urgent, for such illegal enterprises had been started on an immense scale. In New Brunswick the postage paid on such letters alone amounted to $8,000. Hon. gentlemen, therefore, could easily see that a system of fraud so extensive in its operations must prove hurtful to the people, and that it was desirable such adventures should be stopped. The extension asked for in the second clause was a very simple one, and merely amounted to giving the power to the Postmaster-General of regulating the terms upon which mails should be transmitted over Canadian railways. Under the recent Convention, the United States undertook to transmit the Canadian mails in United States Territory, and Canada undertook the transmission of United States mails here. It was necessary, for the proper carrying of the mails, that the price to be charged by the railways should be fixed, and, in order that there might be no difficulty as to the transmission of letters, etc., he hoped the amendment would be agreed to.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he wished to know if clause 19 of the present Act had been copied from the English Act.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he did not know that there was a like clause, in the English Act, but the Government of England had vested a power in the hands of the Secretary of State similar to that given to the Postmaster-General of Canada. Of course, it must be remembered that the circumstances of the two countries were different.

MR. TUPPER said that the proposed change should be postponed, as the present time did not seem to him to be an opportune one. The hon. gentleman had not shown that any such clause was actually in force in England; the one referred to had been introduced mainly to intercept letters connected with a conspiracy to destroy the life of the French Emperor. Sir, Thomas Graham brought forward a measure to authorize the Government to extend the power of opening letters; but so strong was the feeling which arose against such a proposal—even though the case intended to be met was one of emergency—that Sir Thomas was driven out of public life. He (Mr. Tupper) had no desire to inflict a similar penalty on the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill in the best possible faith; but, on the eve of a general election, he did not think this was a proper time to bring the matter forward. The country was entering upon a struggle between the two great parties represented in the House. It was desirable, therefore, that the correspondence which passed through the Post Office Department during the present year, at least, should be perfectly inviolate, and that communications of an innocent character should not be tampered with. He had not the slightest doubt that the hon. the Postmaster-General had the purest possible intentions, with a view to restricting the growing evil, but he did not think the time was opportune. He thought it would excite suspicion on the part of a great number of people, and in the public mind generally. The mere intercepting of correspondence, the sending it to headquarters—the mere sending it to headquarters for investigation—would have a serious effect upon what hon. gentlemen might consider an extremely important interest, and he thought the hon. the Postmaster-General had better postpone any extension of power with regard to the intercepting and opening of correspondence. He made this objection without the slightest reflection upon the motive of the Government, and simply because he thought that, at the present time, it would be better to leave letters as they were than to excite the public mind unnecessarily.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said that the need of a clause which would cover the case had come under his own observation. Lotteries were illegal in most States of America; he believed in all the States; and parties engaged in lotteries were unable to carry them on there, and had been in the practice of coming to Canada, where, inasmuch as the Post-Office Act was insufficient to meet the case, they had been enabled to carry on their correspondence. The Post-Office Act, as well as the Act relating to lotteries, did not cover the case. Now, the hon. gentleman had stated that there might be a danger in stopping these letters, that harmless correspondence would be interrupted; but, if he read the Bill, he would see it provided against any such difficulty. The letters to which it referred were calculated to deceive or defraud, and others did not come within the clause. He did not suppose that, on the eve of the election, circulars would be distributed from the Post-Office Department which would be calculated to deceive and defraud. He did not expect it on the part of the Opposition at all events. It was true the revenue had been increased by the large number of postage stamps purchased, and these circulars passed through the post to the United States. There was a large number of these circulars continually being sent to the United States, and there was nothing in the Post-Office Act preventing this. The only provision there was for dealing with the case at all, was by imposing a small fine, but these men were prepared to pay that fine. They had no objection to pay that so long as the law allowed these lotteries to be carried on, and they could take the money out of the pockets of the people on the other side. They would come into this country for the purpose of using the mails, and there was no means to stop them, except such legislation as was proposed in this Bill.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Post-Office Act passed in 1875, dealt with the transmission of improper articles, contraband goods, and immoral publications and post cards. He presumed, therefore, that regulations had been made under the 10th section of this Act. What regulations had we under the Act as it now stood? If there were no regulations with respect to immoral matter, there was no necessity of adding to the legislation on the subject; but he presumed those regulations had been observed, and that they had been so successful in their operations that they had brought forward this amendment for the purpose of enlarging them. But this Bill was too vague, unless the regulations were much more specific than the clauses themselves. He would not make any objection were it not that the Postmaster-General, in explaining the Bill, admitted that he had already the power under the clauses of the Act passed in 1875, to open letters for the purpose of ascertaining whether they contained contraband or improper matter. Now, this Bill gave the office no such power. The mere fact of a letter passing through the mail did not give the enormous power to the authorities of opening that letter. The power had always been held under the old Statute, but when the cry was made against Sir James Graham for opening Mr. Stansfeld's letter and Mr. McLean's letter, a Special Committee was appointed to consider the question. The Committee reported that the Act was necessary for the purpose of preventing the Post-Office being made the medium of disseminating treasonable or felonious communications; but the Committee did not go so far, or refused to go so far, as to take away from the Secretary that power, although the report was strongly against opening any letters except in those extreme cases where such prima facie evidence was laid before the Home Department, that a specific correspondence either with regard to treason or felony was being carried on. And notwithstanding the report of that Committee, that Sir James Graham had only performed his duty, as the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) had stated, yet the stream of indignation was so great in England that after a time Sir James Graham was obliged to yield and to resign his position. This showed what a strong feeling there was in England against opening letters. He believed there was no authority for such a step as opening a letter. The letter was the property of the writer until he posted it; the moment he put it into the post-office it was the property of the person to whom it was addressed, and no one could interfere with it. No regulation could be made to prevent its transmission. He took it that, unless there was a specific power given for injuring a man's property, they could not open a letter in transit. The highest proof that there should be a specific power given to open letters was that the only clause—as far as he could find on looking through the Act—which gave any specific power to open a letter was the dead-letter clause. That clause provided that letters or other articles which, from any cause, remained undelivered in any post-office, might be transmitted by postmasters to the Post-Office Department as dead letters, there to be opened and returned. That was the only specific power given by the 38th clause, and that being the case he took it there must be a specific cause given to open any letter, and the mere power of stopping the sending of mail matter could not be sufficient. He hoped the regulations would be brought down before they went into Committee of the Whole upon this clause. It was a matter in which every one would take a deep interest. As to the second clause of the Bill there could be no objection to that. It made clearer the 41st clause of the previous Act, which set forth that the Postmaster-General might transmit the American mails going from one portion of the United States to another over Canadian territory, and make arrangements for those mails being considered as portion of Her Majesty's mail and under her protection, and forwarded with all due speed as her own mail matter. He thought this was a very good clause. He would call the attention of the Government to the fact that public feeling was in favour of these letters being guarded in every possible way that could be conceived. He called attention to the difficulty of deciding whether such letters or circulars which passed through the post were concerning lotteries. Besides, there were certain newspapers which gave gifts to certain subscribers. There were a great many things of that kind which were harmless enough of themselves; but, at the same time, they might be calculated to defraud. He thought the clause dealing with this question was far too vague. Where was the tribunal that was to decide whether certain schemes were "devised or intended to deceive or defraud the public." Surely there should be some tribunal, and some competent tribunal. He believed that in the United States they had followed up this matter with great vigour, and they had passed provisions of a similar character. He might ask if this clause had been based upon their legislation on the subject?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would again draw the attention of the Government to the property right in letters, and again express an opinion that the same sanctity of correspondence ought not be invaded, except upon prima facie evidence.

MR. MACKENZIE said there could be no question as to the extreme impropriety of legislating in any direction to give unusual power to the officers of the Post-Office. On the other hand, it was everyone's interest to aid, as far as possible, in putting down schemes of small plunder, such as the one at St. Thomas, of very recent date, where, if the law had been in force, the circulars issued could have been stopped. The parties who had been concerned in this scheme had gone to St. Thomas, avowedly for the purpose of evading the laws of the United States, and of profiting by the want of a law in Canada on this subject. They had made no secret of their intentions; the character of the envelopes sufficiently divulging the nature of their business. In that case hon. gentlemen would see that it would have been very easy, if the Government had had this power, to stop the mischief to a very great extent. The words to which the hon. member had taken exception did seem to be very broad altogether, "schemes devised or intended to deceive or defraud the public." He quite sympathised with the hon. member for Cumberland, when the hon. member felt that this might interfere with his connection at the coming election. He thought the hon. gentleman should be protected as far as possible, in the exercise of his calling during the election time. The Government would consider the representations made, with a view to altering the wording of the clause so as to guard the public against any danger, to which the hon. gentleman opposite had very properly called the attention of the House. The Government had but one object in this, which was to secure the inviolability of correspondence, and, at the same time, protect the public against those miscreants who sought to make Canada the base of their operations.

Bill read the second time.

KEEWATIN MUNICIPALITIES BILL.—[BILL No. 23.]

(Mr. Mills.)

(SECOND READING.)

Order for second reading read.

MR. MILLS said he had explained the principles of the Bill when he had introduced it. He did not think there was any principle to which objection could be taken; any objection that might be made could be made when discussing the Bill in Committee. The Bill could be read a second time, and then the House could go into Committee on it.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was one of those Bills to which there could be scarcely any objections.

MR. BOWELL said there were some clauses open to a good deal of discussion; as, for instance, the propriety of making the franchise so extensive as it was made in the Bill.

MR. MILLS: It differs very little from Ontario.

MR. BOWELL said it differed considerably, particularly in the power given to voters. In the Province of Ontario they had restricted that power very materially to those who would be directly affected by the creation of the debt.

Bill read the second time.

RAILWAY ACTS EXTENSION (PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND) BILL.—[BILL No. 38.]

(Mr. Mackenzie.)

THIRD READING.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee on the said Bill.

MR. MACKENZIE.

(In the Committee.)

MR. MITCHELL said the second clause was a very extraordinary one:

“Nothing in this Act shall be construed as a declaration that any of the said Acts or any part thereof had not, or has not, or would not have, without the passing of the Act, force or effect in, or in relation to the Province of Prince Edward Island.”

If the meaning of that was that the said Acts did have legislative force, why was it necessary to put such a clause in the present Act.

MR. MACKENZIE said the Act was prepared by the Department of Justice, and there could be no possible harm in the clause referred to. It was simply saving any possible rights which might have existed.

MR. MITCHELL: With respect to the fourth clause, what is the compensation referred to in the Railway Act of 1868?

MR. MACKENZIE: It is a compensation payable for lands expropriated for railway purposes.

Bill ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

STAMPS ON BILLS AND NOTES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL No. 43.]

(Mr. Laurier.)

SECOND READING.

Order for second reading read.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was no question as to the advisability of the Bill; the only question was, whether it should be made compulsory or not, and the Government were prepared to modify it on that point.

MR. JONES (South Leeds) said the Stamp Act had only just got well into operation, and the people throughout the length and breadth of the country understood it, yet they were now called upon—he did not know at whose instance, whether the Government had received any petitions, or not, from the people, or from the Boards of Trade—to change the whole system of the tax. The new system might work very well in cities and towns, or in large centres, but would not suit in the country as well as the present Act. In the rural districts the farmer who had to give a note for two or three hundred dollars, was able to put a few of those stamps in his pocket, but, under the new Act, he would have to procure stamped drafts and carry them about with him. People would be obliged to purchase these stamped drafts in large quantities, whereas now they could get the stamps in smaller quantities. It was a most inopportune time to bring forward this Act. The country had just begun to understand the old Act. The present Act proposed to tax the people a little more, to secure to the Government a little more patronage, to the detriment of the rural districts. He objected to any change being made.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said the second reading of the Bill might stand till another night. It was a most important Bill. Not only was there the question as to whether the payment of this duty should be compulsory or optional, but there were other matters of great importance affected by this Bill, and an opportunity should be given to discuss it.

MR. LAURIER said there could be no objection to the second reading being made. The principle was very simple, and the matter of detail could be discussed in Committee rather than upon the second reading. The hon. member for South Leeds was altogether in error in saying that the present had only been in operation a few years. It had been in operation fourteen years, since 1864. The Stamp Act was first introduced in 1864, and had been ever since upon the Statute-book. Special amendments to it had been made, from time to time, to meet deficiencies. This question of having stamped paper had been discussed on the very introduction of the first Bill in 1864. The Dominion Board of Trade, at its last meeting, had a discussion upon the question, and the Government had, for several years, considered whether it would not be wise to adopt the same system as the one in force in England, of collecting the revenue. The Government was prepared to discuss the question as to whether the use of stamped paper should be made compulsory or optional. This could be done in Committee rather than at this stage.

MR. MITCHELL said he hoped the hon. mover of the Bill would not proceed with the second reading to-day, because the whole principle of the Bill was the question whether it would be optional or not, and it should be discussed upon the second reading. The other details were of no consequence. If it should be made compulsory it would be very far from being satisfactory to the people. He had received letters relating to that Bill, and he thought the Government would do very well to wait a little longer to see what the public would say about it.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman might have noticed the Government were not disposed to insist upon the Bill being compulsory, so that there could be no objection to the second reading on that score. The principle was simply the introduction of stamped paper instead of the stamps themselves. It would benefit the revenue, and there would be no objection to making it optional; the Bill was consistent with the laws of England, the circumstances in this case not being different. The banks desired it particularly as it would prove a great convenience to them.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said from a party point of view he would be sorry to see the hon. gentleman make it optional, as, in its present shape, it would be very unpopular.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the inconvenience that would be felt in country districts had not escaped the attention of the Government. As to the main question, requests had been made very frequently by banks and other corporations, who would derive a considerable advantage from the use of stamped paper as provided in the Bill.

MR. MITCHELL said he was opposed to the Stamp Act altogether, and it had never been found necessary in the Maritime Provinces before Confederation. It was a great source of annoyance to business men and everyone connected with trade, and it would be valuable to discuss the propriety of abolishing the Act and raising the revenue in some other way, unless hon. gentlemen opposite had so exhausted the resources of the country that no other channel was open. In regard to the statement that the banks wanted the Act, he held that Parliament and the country should not be governed entirely by what the banks desired, but what was for the interests of the people. His belief was that, if the Stamp Act were abolished, it would be a matter of general satisfaction. If the hon. the Finance Minister would endeavour to adopt some other mode than the unpleasant system, under the Stamp Act, of raising that portion of the revenue, he would receive the commendation of the country.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said he would suggest to the Government whether greater facilities could not be provided in the case of stamped paper, as had been done in regard to the distribution of stamps. In many rural districts it was impossible to obtain stamps, and, in addition to the inconvenience occasioned, there was a loss of revenue. An arrangement might be made whereby postmasters should keep a supply of stamps, which would cause an increased revenue and serve the convenience of the public.

MR. PLUMB said the Bill not only provided that stamps should be used, but stamped paper. It was legislation in the wrong direction, and manifested a disposition to enact sumptuary laws. The Stamp Act was objectionable in every way, and would be infinitely so if amended as proposed. If the Government were to carry the proposed measure into operation, it would be one of the most unpopular Acts ever passed; at the same time, there was no probability of the Bill being passed in its present form.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was very easy for the hon. gentleman to make that statement, because the House had already been informed that the Government did not intend to carry the Bill in its present form.

MR. BERTRAM said he agreed with the hon. member for Northumberland, that the only amendment that would be really satisfactory to the country would be to abolish the Act altogether.

MR. MITCHELL.

It was a very objectionable mode of raising revenue; but, considering the present circumstances of the country, he was not prepared to say that the Government would be justified in abolishing the taxes thus collected. He was glad to have heard the statement of the hon. the First Minister, that the most objectionable part of the Bill would either be eliminated or made optional. The clause compelling the use of stamped paper was very objectionable, and, he hoped, rather than make it permissive, the law would be allowed to remain as at present.

MR. LANGEVIN said that, when he went over the Bill, he found it very objectionable, and he could not imagine that the Government intended to make the use of stamped paper optional or permissive, when he saw that the sixth clause imposed a penalty. If that were made optional, the Bill was less objectionable, but the question would arise whether, by this Bill, even taking away the penalty, Parliament would care to place in the hands of the bank the power to compel their customers to use their paper. The Bill could not be carried out in country districts. If there were now difficulty in obtaining stamps in some parts of the country, it would be increased, if Parliament compelled the use of stamped paper. He did not think the Bill would pass in its present shape; and it was desirable that the Government should consider the question of having only one Stamp Act instead of two or three.

MR. TROW said that, if that amount of revenue was required, he did not know any easier mode of raising it than that contained in the Bill. He did not think the inconvenience suggested would arise, because the stamped paper would be freely circulated throughout the country; and postmasters and banking institutions would always have a supply on hand. It would be a matter of indifference to the people whether they used stamped paper or stamps.

MR. DYMOND said the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Jones) seemed rather to raise the question whether there had been any public desire expressed for a change in the 'Act. At the late meeting of the Dominion Board of Trade in the city of Ottawa, a motion was moved by Mr. W. E. Sandford (Hamilton), seconded by Mr. F. Clemow (Ottawa)—

“That this Board urge upon the Government the repeal of the Stamp Act upon promissory notes and bills of exchange, believing the revenue from this source is in no sense an equivalent consideration in view of the vexations and frauds occasioned by the collection of this tax.”

A debate ensued upon this resolution, and an amendment was proposed by no less an authority than Mr. Andrew Robertson, of Montreal, seconded by Mr. Darling, of the same city, to the following effect:—

“That all the words after ‘that’ be omitted and the following substituted: ‘The law be so amended as to allow either the maker or the endorser to stamp bills or promissory notes, and that, in addition to the stamps at present in use, stamped paper be introduced to as large an extent as possible.’”

The amendment was carried, and the Dominion Board of Trade gave its adhesion to the proposition which, in its modified form, would be represented by the present Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL asked what was the majority in favour of the amendment.

Mr. DYMOND said the vote was 21 to 11.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds) said the people in cities and towns might be favourable to a Stamp Act, but in the rural districts it was very inconvenient and a cause of great loss. Many sheets of stamped paper would be destroyed, but a person would be compelled to spoil $500 worth before he would be able to have the money refunded. He agreed with the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Northumberland, that it was a most vexatious tax upon the mercantile and business classes; and some other means should be adopted for raising revenue.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew) said that if the Bill were permissive, the principle objection to it would be removed. It would, doubtless, be a great convenience, in many instances, to have stamped paper instead of adhesive stamps, which frequently became detached from documents. Every tax was objectionable to those who had to pay it, and this mode of raising revenue was not more objectionable than others. It was true that stamped paper might be spoilt in using, but provision was made for recovering the amount of stamps. And it appeared to him that some provision should be made by which parties who sold this stamped paper could redeem it in smaller amounts than $5; and that, when they collected $5 worth of stamped paper, it might then be returned. If some such provision were made, and the clause with respect to the use of stamped paper were made permissive instead of compulsory, the principal objections to the Bill would be removed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Centre Toronto) said they had not heard the Government explanations of the Bill, and it might, perhaps, be premature to say what were the explanations of some of the clauses. Under these circumstances, he thought the suggestion of the hon. member for Charlevoix ought to be adopted and the Bill recast. If this Bill were put into operation as proposed, every mercantile man would want to have continually before him what the provisions of the Bill were, and it would be extremely inconvenient, not only to have this Act law, but also to be compelled to refer to the former Act; and hence, it would be well to recast the Act. If the word “receipt” introduced in the second clause was intended to apply to ordinary receipts, it occurred to him that this would be a very harassing clause. Perhaps, the hon. the Minister of Finance would explain that particular item.

Mr. LAURIER: This does not change any provision that at present exists. It is substantially the same clause that is already in the Act.

Mr. MACDONALD said that so far it was satisfactory; but he thought it would be found of very great importance to have the suggestion which had been made carried out, and to have the Bill recast.

Mr. PALMER said he had never understood that the present Act required stamps on anything except promissory notes or bills of exchange; and here it seemed to be provided that they should be placed on receipts or documents of any kind. All this distinctly showed the great necessity existing for recasting the Bill, which, as it stood, would certainly lead to a great deal of confusion. The decision of the Board of Trade proved that fraud had arisen in connection with the Stamp Act, the want of a proper stamp sometimes enabling the person interested to defend it in a Court of law. He entirely agreed with the hon. member for Northumberland, and held that this tax was unjust. It placed too heavy a burden on a particular class in the Dominion; and the very people who were trying to carry on the business and to develop the resources of the country were those most taxed by it. Those who were obliged to borrow were generally poor, and the result was that a very large and onerous tax was levied on that class, which was entirely unjust, independent of the great annoyance it was to everyone concerned to have this taxation levied; and, if it could be raised in some other way, or if the old law was allowed to remain, unless the Government could remodel the whole thing this Session, and put it all in one Act, it would be better to drop this measure of legislation. The interpretation of the Act in this relation in the different Provinces had led to an immense amount of litigation, and he could cite half a dozen cases in which the Judges of the Supreme Court were two one way, and three the other. There were now two or three Acts amending the Stamp Act, he believed; his hon. friend from Richelieu had a Bill before the House, and also, he thought, an hon. gentleman from Hamilton; and, if the Government would drop this Bill and endeavour to consolidate the whole law in this respect, it would be better to follow that course. He hoped that after the election—if this matter was dropped altogether—either the present or some new Government could manage to carry on the business of the country without this taxation at all, and to do so would be to confer a great benefit on the country.

MR. PALMER.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said he sympathized very much with what the hon. member for Centre Toronto had stated respecting the Bill. The law relating to stamps was one which had caused considerable difficulty, and which had been a fruitful source of law suits. Perhaps he should not find fault with it on that account; but, nevertheless, this was the case. He considered the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman one worthy of consideration on the part of the hon. gentlemen who were promoting the Bill. The law should be consolidated, and so distinctly recast that it could be clearly understood; and, if this law was enacted, with the laws already in existence with regard to stamps, the difficulty in this relation would be increased. It was quite evident that this measure would require very close discussion indeed, and, instead of simplifying the law relating to stamps, as it existed at present, this would only add to the difficulty. He was very happy to hear the hon. the Premier say that he did not wish to insist upon the adoption of what was called the compulsory clause. If this was done, it would certainly be unpopular in the rural districts, and it would lead to the difficulty and trouble which had been pointed out. If the Government could see their way clear to the adoption of the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, with respect to the recasting or the consolidation of the law regarding stamps, this would certainly, he thought, give greater satisfaction to the country, and, unless the public interests and pressing necessities at the present time required the adoption of this measure, he must candidly say he believed it would be in the public interest for the Government to consider whether it would not be advisable to withdraw this measure with the view of submitting a measure that would embody the whole of the law relating to stamps.

MR. HOLTON said the remarks of his hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Jones) had led him to refer to the Journals of 1864, when the stamp duties were first inflicted upon the country. He quite agreed with the hon. gentleman that, if the finances of the country were in such a condition as to justify the repeal of this tax altogether, he would rejoice very much. He also wholly agreed with the hon. members for Northumberland and East Peterborough in regarding it as a vexatious tax upon trade which the country ought to be relieved from at the earliest possible moment. He (Mr. Holton), in 1864, on the second reading of the Bill, had moved the six months' hoist, and he found that the name of the hon. member for South Leeds was recorded against his motion, so that it hardly became the hon. gentleman to complain very much of this Government for not relieving the country of the tax which he (Mr. Jones) had insisted on inflicting upon it.

Mr. JONES: I have changed my mind.

Mr. WOOD said he could not add to the stock of information which the House already possessed regarding this law, further than to say he thought the Government would do well to take into consideration the suggestion made with reference to the consolidation of the law relating to stamps. The hon. the Premier had said that the use of stamped paper was to be optional, and the two systems would be preferable to having the use of such paper made compulsory. It would be a great hardship on people in the country who, not being in the habit of drawing notes, frequently spoiled one or two before they did so properly. If such use was made compulsory the best thing that possibly could be done would be to withdraw this Bill and consolidate the whole Stamp Act; and then they would know how it stood. When half a dozen Acts existed, the services of lawyers had to be obtained, and these gentlemen did not aid business men for nothing. The suggestion for consolidation, if adopted, would benefit the country at large.

Mr. CURRIER said he hoped the Government would see their way clear to withdraw this Bill altogether. Of all the taxation we had, that collected by means of stamps was the most objectionable. Unless the hon. the Finance Minister expected to obtain more money by reason of this law than he

(Mr. Currier) anticipated, the Government ought to drop it. Objectionable as the present law was, the people at all events understood how it worked, but to introduce this new system would disturb everything. It would have this other effect: it would serve to make the Stamp Law more permanent than if it were left alone as it was; and he hoped that, before many years passed, the finances of the country would allow this taxation to be altogether abolished; they therefore should do nothing that would in any way serve to make this law any more permanent than it now was.

Mr. COOK said he would like to ask if it was the intention of the Government to make the use of stamped paper permissive, otherwise a very great hardship would be inflicted. It was almost impossible in the rural districts to have all denominations of stamps on the paper, and to enact such a provision would stop in a great measure the business of the country with regard to notes. He was very much of the opinion of the hon. member for the city of Ottawa (Mr. Currier) that, if the Stamp Act was entirely abolished, it would be very much better for those at all events who had to resort to notes for the means of raising money.

Mr. BAIN said he had observed that this Act did not affect the agricultural population so materially as it did the business men. He noticed that, where the amount involved the use of a three cent stamp, the use of stamped paper was not required. He had distributed a few copies of the Bill among his friends; and, in making a flying visit to his constituency last week, some of them drew his attention to this matter, and stated they thought it would be a serious inconvenience to them if they were obliged to find this stamped paper, raising the same objection that had been made by the hon. member for Charlevoix, and he had suggested that, if the Government would make the measure permissive, this would obviate the difficulty, and his friends had agreed that it would, so far as the banking element was concerned; if it was desirable that stamped paper should be introduced, he thought that, perhaps, the difficulty could be obviated by having this provision made permissive, as the Government proposed. He felt that, if the Bill was carried out as submitted, serious objections would be made to it, judging from the expressions of opinion which he had heard from some of his business friends quite recently.

MR. PATERSON said that, no doubt, the hon. the Premier would feel that some material alterations would have to be made in the Bill. He desired to ask the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, in case he proceeded with the Bill, whether he might not, in the interests of the public generally, make alterations in the law as it already existed. This tax was not regarded favourably by any one in Canada, and he agreed in the view that, if the necessary revenue could be raised without it, the Government would obtain the thanks of the community by altogether abolishing the law; but while it remained—and it must remain this year—he thought the House would agree that some improvements might be made in the law which was in force. It seemed to him that provision should be made to abolish the double duty, and compel the holder of the note to stamp it. It was further not desirable that any one should take advantage of the Stamp Act to evade the payment of a just and lawful debt. This had been more than once attempted. It appeared to him that the law applying to the acceptance of a note or draft from the United States, where, instead of the person accepting, the drawer was required to stamp it, might be made applicable to all notes or drafts passing from hand to hand in Canada. A large amount of stamped paper passed through the bank by way of discount; and it would be easy to make a clause compulsory by which all the paper in the banks would be properly stamped, and this would give the holder of the note the privilege of stamping it. A note was only an evidence of the debt given for the accommodation of the party to whom the debt was owed, and there would be nothing wrong in asking the holder of the note to be at that expense; and, if there were, the holder of the note could include it in the amount of the note; the cost would be small and this would do away with a great trouble and annoyance. To this matter, and some other points, the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue might well give his attention and afford some relief to the trading community.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that this Bill seemed to get rather bad measure at the hands of the friends of his hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue; but the hon. gentleman must expect this kind of thing occasionally when a question of this nature, involving the taxation of the people, came up. He rose to say that he was quite surprised to hear hon. members representing rural districts applying for doing away with the stamp duties. It occurred to him that, if we were going to raise a system of taxation at all, this mode of taxation ought certainly to be free from objection on the part of the farmer and of the workingman. They did not suffer any appreciable inconvenience, and it was rather selfish on the part of commercial men to seek to do away with a perfectly fair tax, and render it necessary for the Finance Minister to tax other properties—a system which might, perhaps, press heavily on the rural population of this country as well as the working class.

Bill read the second time, on a Division.

PRAYERS.

LANDS DAMAGED BY WATER.

QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to pay Messrs. Robert Gremly, Thomas Quigly, Thomas Flynn and others, whose lands have been damaged by the officers of the Intercolonial Railway taking their supply of water through their lands; and if so, when?

Mr. MACKENZIE: They were offered the value of the damages, which they refused to accept.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is incorrect.

DAMAGES TO MILLS.

QUESTION.

Mr. MITCHELL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to pay William Jones and Brothers, for damages done to their mills by diverting the water of the stream which supplies their mills for the purpose of supplying the Station at Newcastle with water; and if so, when?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Whenever it is found to be due. The matter is at present under the consideration of the Department of Justice.

PAPERS RELATING TO THE LATE WILLIAM TAYLOR'S SERVICES.

QUESTION.

Mr. LANTHIER enquired, Whether papers relating to the services of the late William Taylor, which were called for by an Order of the House on the 20th February last, will soon be brought down?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am not able to say when they can be brought down, as these papers refer to a long way back; but they will be brought down as soon as possible.

SUPERVISOR OF CULLERS' OFFICE.

QUESTION.

Mr. CURRIER enquired, Whether any permanent Clerks have been appointed in the office of the Supervisor of Cullers, Quebec, since the 1st of November last; and if so, at what salary, and whether it is in contemplation to make any further appointments of Clerks in said office?

Mr. LAURIER: There has been no such appointment made since the 1st of November last, and it is not contemplated to make any appointments that would increase the number of the staff employed in that office.

QUESTIONS BY MEMBERS.

REMARKS.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said, before the notices of motions were called, he would like to call attention to the manner in which answers to questions from members were given. He thought that, if there was any information to be given on these questions, it was, at least, the duty of the Minister who was to make the answer, to endeavour to find out from his Department the facts of the case, and not come down to the House and say he was not aware of this or of that thing having been done. A question had been put to the Ministry, on Monday last, with reference to the re-payment to the Government of any over-charges that had been made on the Neebing Hotel, and the hon. the Minister—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is this discussion in order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is not in order.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: I am not discussing the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I rise to a question of order.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: I wish to call attention to this matter for guidance in the future, to show that care should be taken, that the information which is to be given to the House—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that the hon. member is now lecturing the Government.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: No; I am only calling attention to a particular question. It is sworn that the money had been repaid—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is out of order. It is customary for hon. members to ask the Government for any special information between the various calls from the Chair for the day, before Notices of Motion or the Orders of the Day. I am not aware that any hon. member has a positive right even to do that; but I think he must confine himself entirely to asking the information from the Government, and he must not proceed to descant on the conduct of the Government. This, of course, he can do at the proper time and in the proper way, as, for instance, when going into Committee of Supply.

MR. MASSON: It is not entirely a question of privilege. We have a right to ask questions, and the Government have a right to answer, and the House has a right to require that the answer from the Government shall be true; that is what is complained of.

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. member is not satisfied with the answer he receives from the Government, and if he thinks the House may be disposed to censure the Government for having so answered or refused to answer, or for having answered insufficiently, it is competent for him to put a notice on the paper, but not to stand up here in this manner and talk for half an hour on the subject.

MR. MITCHELL: I move the adjournment of the House.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he only wanted to call attention to this matter. He did not say that the answer given was not true. He was quite ready to admit that it was true, but it was not a full answer. The hon. gentleman said he was not aware of any repayment having been made; and what he submitted was that, when such notice was given on the paper, a Minister should endeavour to find out the facts of the case. They knew, as a matter of fact, that money had been repaid in this regard into the Public Treasury; this was sworn to in the other end of the building, and yet the hon. gentleman said he was not aware of the fact. This was only an illustration that he gave of the way in which these questions were generally answered. It was such as not to give the information sought for by members, and which the country at large desired to have. The answers should contain, not only a true statement, but the full statement.

MR. SPEAKER: Is the motion seconded.

MR. MITCHELL: I withdraw the motion.

MR. SPEAKER: I do not think it is seconded.

MR. SPEAKER.

DAILY MAIL BETWEEN BRITISH COLUMBIA AND PUGET SOUND.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. THOMPSON (Cariboo), for Mr. DEWDNEY, moved for all correspondence or petitions with reference to the establishment of a daily mail between British Columbia and Puget Sound. He said he presumed that the object of the hon. gentleman in bringing this matter before the House was to draw attention to the fact that a daily mail was about being established by the American Government between one and the other end of Puget Sound, and that the establishment of mail communication with Port Townsend at the mouth of the Sound would confer a great benefit on British Columbia, and this too, he believed, at very slight cost.

MR. DECOSMOS said he would like to hear the hon. the Postmaster-General say what he proposed to do with respect to the establishment of a daily mail between Puget Sound and British Columbia—Victoria more particularly. A gentleman had arrived here from Washington the other day, who had carried the mail between Puget Sound and Victoria for the last seven years, and this gentleman had informed him that the American Government were disposed to pay their share for the transportation of the mail to and fro between Port Townsend and Victoria, 40 miles distant. He was aware that this matter had been under the consideration of the hon. the Postmaster-General's Department ever since he had arrived in Ottawa, and he would like to know what prospect there was of securing a daily mail between Port Townsend and Victoria.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he could see no objection to the passage of the motion and to the papers being brought down. As to the observations of his hon. friend, he thought that, as the subject was just now a matter of communication between the Postal Department at Washington and his own Department, he would prefer to postpone explanations for a few days.

Motion agreed to.

PAYMENTS FOR PRINTING.

MOTION TO REFER.

MR. DYMOND moved that the return to the Order of the House for copies of the accounts, vouchers and papers connected with the payments for printing as entered in the Public Accounts for 1873-4, as made out of the Contingencies of the Department of Justice, to I. B. Taylor, the Citizen Printing Company and J. G. Moylan, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts. He said that, shortly after the meeting of the House, he took the liberty of calling attention to what seemed to him to be an unusually large charge in the Public Accounts of 1873-4 under the head of "printing," or rather under head of "Contingences" the item being that of printing for the Department of Justice. He then moved that a return should be made to this House of all accounts and papers relating to the payments in question. When those returns came down, he found that no particular interest would attach to more than one item in the account, and that by far the largest—a charge of $2,500 made by Mr. J. G. Moylan ostensibly for printing in the year referred to. From the nature of the document presented to the House, he felt that this was a matter which must be the subject of investigation before the Committee on Public Accounts, and not desiring in the slightest degree to anticipate the action of the Committee, he moved, without notice and without comment, that the papers should be at once referred. He thought it probable that, had the right hon. member for Kingston been in his place, he would have assented to that proposition, but, as some of his friends objected, he (Mr. Dymond) had no other course open to him but to put a notice on the paper and wait until his turn should arrive. In the meantime, these documents, of course, became public property, and were the subject of some comment; and, therefore, all occasion for strict reticence on his part had been, to a large extent, removed. He now proposed to state as briefly as possible, and he hoped with perfect fairness, what were the contents of the papers which he proposed to refer to the Public Accounts Committee. In August, 1869, Mr. J. G. Moylan was the publisher of a newspaper known, he believed, as the Canadian Freeman, in the city of Toronto, the right hon. member for Kingston then being the Minister of Justice. It would appear that, on the 14th of August, 1869, some communications must have passed between these gentlemen, for he found that, on that date, the following order appeared to have been given to Mr. Thomas Ross, the Accountant of Contingencies:—"The undersigned desires that the sum of $1,200 be advanced by the Accountant of Contingencies to J. G. Moylan, Esq., proprietor of the Canadian Freeman, to be repaid by work in printing for the several Departments." Appended to this, in brackets, was the following addendum, by the Auditor, Mr. Langton: "And that, with this object, the several Departments do send their orders for printing through the Accountant of Contingencies." This was endorsed: "Received the amount, J. G. Moylan." It seemed, therefore, that there were four parties connected with this first transaction: the right hon. gentleman, then Minister of Justice, who made the order for payment, and signed the order; Mr. Moylan, who endorsed the order in the form of a receipt; the Auditor, who was cognizant of the arrangement; and Mr. Ross, the Accountant of Contingencies, whose duty it was, under the order of the Minister of Justice, to carry it out. He (Mr. Dymond) did not find any record of work done and charged against the money advanced. The next document relating to these transactions was dated Monday, 22nd January, 1872, nearly two and a-half years afterwards, and it was in these terms:

"MY DEAR ROSS,—Will you be good enough to make an advance to the proprietor of the Canadian Freeman of $300, to be repaid by printing work?"

"Yours truly,

"JOHN A. MACDONALD."

This letter was also addressed to "Thomas Ross, Esq., Clerk of Contingencies." The next document, which was dated 27th March, 1872, about two months after the one he had just read, was as follows:

"MY DEAR ROSS,—Will you pay Moylan's printing accounts, without reference to the back value."

So far as he (Mr. Dymond) could understand, this order revoked the instructions given to the Departments to charge their printing contingencies against the advances made to Mr. Moylan in 1869 and in January, 1872. Then, again, on the 19th June, 1872—three months after the order revoking the instructions had been given—he found the following:

"Mr. Ross, Clerk of Contingencies, will please to make an advance to J. G. Moylan, Esq., of Canadian Freeman, for printing, of $1,000, and oblige,

"(Signed) JOHN A. MACDONALD."

Now, it did not appear that any one of these payments was entered in the Public Accounts at the time it was made, and it would be for the Accountant to explain in what manner they were carried forward from year to year. It was not until the 30th November, 1873, when the new Government had come into power, that these moneys, amounting in the aggregate to $2,500, were charged in the regular way under the head of contingencies for printing in the Department of Justice. He found on that date (the 30th November, 1873) the following memorandum:—

Applicant, J. G. Moylan; amount, $2,500; service (British).—I hereby certify that each item of this account has been incurred upon the requisite authority, and that the expenditure was necessary for the public service. I hereby certify that the article and services charged for have been received and performed, and that the prices charged are, in my opinion, severally fair and just.—A true copy, Thomas Ross, Accountant of Contingencies, Ottawa, November 30th, 1873.

In the margin was the following note or memorandum: "August 12th, 1869, $1,200; January 22nd, 1872, $300; June 19th, 1872, $1,000—total, $2,500." He (Mr. Dymond) did not think, after submitting these documents, that any hon. gentleman would contend that such a transaction was not a fitting one for investigation, nor would any member of this House, having such evidence before him, be doing his duty if he did not invite discussion thereupon. Neither did he believe that the ex-Minister of the Crown, whose conduct might possibly be more or less impugned in these transactions, desired that any delay should take place in affording him, and those gentlemen connected with the Civil Service who might have acted under his instructions, an opportunity of making the fullest and clearest explanation in their power. As the matter stood, it appeared that $2,500 had been advanced by instalments, covering a period of about 2½ or nearly 3 years, by a Minister of the Crown to a supporter of the Government, for which, so far as evidence went, not one dollar of value had ever been received. It appeared also that a charge had been made in the Public Accounts, which, if these documents were correct, was a false charge. That was to say, there was a charge of $2,500 paid for printing, under the head of Contingencies, no printing whatever, apparently, having been performed. It would not, therefore, be necessary for him to say anything more, in order to urge the necessity for dealing with this matter promptly. He presumed the points on which the Committee would desire to make an investigation, would be something like the following:—1st. On what ground Mr. Moylan, then a political supporter of the Government should be the object of temporary assistance, at the hands of the Minister of the day? 2ndly. On what authority did the First Minister and Minister of Justice, order money to be paid to a private person, except in the ordinary course of business? 3rdly. On what authority he converted by his order, a debt to be liquidated by work done into what proved ultimately to be a free gift? 4thly. How it came to pass that the Accountant of Contingencies failed to account for the advance of those large sums in the Public Accounts for 1869-70; 1870-71; 1871-72 and 1872-63? 5thly. How he came ultimately to file a certificate, contrary to the facts, as disclosed in the papers submitted? 6thly. How it came to pass that the Auditor-General, who appeared to have been cognizant of the original arrangement between the First Minister and Mr. Moylan, allowed that false entry to appear in the Public Accounts? He did not think it necessary to address any further observations on this subject, and he hoped that nothing he had said would be considered as injuriously offensive, or unnecessary to establish his claim for an enquiry. He would, therefore, content himself with moving the motion on the notice paper.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was scarcely necessary for him to make any lengthy reference to the hon. gentleman's remarks, but merely to say he quite concurred in the opinion that the fullest information should be afforded. At the present moment he recollected, or rather knew, nothing more of the transaction than the hon. gentleman himself. Considering, however, that no unwillingness was expressed to the hon. gentleman's proposal that the matter should be referred to the Committee on Public Accounts, he thought it would have been better had the hon. gentleman refrained from making use of such strong terms regarding high officers in the Civil Service until these gentlemen had an opportunity afforded them of explaining to the Committee upon what grounds they gave the certificates referred to. He would not add a single word more to the discussion, which would be in more proper order when the House had the report of the Committee before them.

MR. DYMOND wished to say that he had endeavoured not to use any language which could be objected to, and he appealed to any disinterested member of the House whether his remarks had not been singularly free from strong expressions, and whether the extreme moderation of his remarks did not entitle them to general appreciation.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he might have misunderstood the hon. gentleman, but he supposed that he had accused one of the highest officers in the service of the Government with making a false statement.

MR. DYMOND: I said what on the face of it appeared to be a false statement.

Motion agreed to.

ST. JOHN'S BRIDGE, RIVER RICHELIEU.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. DESJARDINS moved for copies of all correspondence, notices, letters and other documents in relation to the St. John's Bridge, on the River Richelieu.

Motion agreed to.

LOSSES BY FLOODS IN ST. ATHANASE PARISH.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. DESJARDINS moved for copies of all petitions, correspondence and other papers in relation to the application for aid in behalf of certain ratepayers in the Parish of St. Athanase, in the County of Iberville, who have suffered loss by floods.

MR. BECHARD said that, though he represented the county of Iberville, and naturally paid great attention to its affairs, he had never heard of any correspondence or petition such as that referred to being sent to the Government. He scarcely believed either that he had become so unpopular with his constituents that they should take such a step without acquainting him with it.

MR. MASSON: As the hon. the Postmaster-General told us the other day, the constituencies in certain parts of the country, not feeling confidence in their representative, prefer to take the advice of some other person.

MR. MACKENZIE: I think the remark of the hon. member for Terrebonne might have been spared. My hon. friend (Mr. Béchard) has abundance of evidence given him that he has the confidence of the people of Iberville and ought to have the supervision of everything that goes on in his own county.

MR. MASSON: He should, but he has not.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had always made it a rule himself never to meddle with any county represented by a member of that Parliament except his own, but, though he objected generally, therefore, to petitions from a constituency coming through a gentleman other than their representative, yet he did not think there would be any objection to furnishing the hon. member with the papers he sought, provided there were any. His opinion was that there were none and he would suggest an alteration in the reading of the motion. The hon. gentleman in his motion asked for papers in relation "to the application for aid in behalf of certain ratepayers," etc, which seemed to imply that an application had actually been made—an admission which he was not inclined to concede.

MR. DESJARDINS said that he had a perfect right to ask for these papers when he was authorized to do so by the people who sent him.

MR. MACKENZIE: Of course you have.

Motion agreed to.

FISH BREEDING ESTABLISHMENT AT MIRAMICHI.

MOTION FOR REPORT.

MR. MITCHELL moved for copies of the several Reports made in the past eighteen months in relation to the Fish Breeding Establishment at Miramichi by the Inspector of Fisheries of that district; also Mr. Wilmot's report thereon and the Inspector's remarks in reply thereto. He said that when, on a former occasion, he directed the attention of the House to this matter, certain statements regarding himself were published in a paper called the Advance—a Government organ, whose conductor, one Davis Bunting, he defeated at last general election and would do so again if he came forward. That paper claimed at last general election to have received special telegrams regarding the artificial cultivation of salmon fisheries in the river at Miramichi from the hon. the Minister of Marine Fisheries and the hon. the Premier. He had been referred to in the Advance in a very objectionable manner for the position he assumed in relation to this matter. He hoped, therefore, the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would give him the information he desired, as speedily as possible, in order that the public might be able to judge whether the money which had been spent in connection with these fisheries had been properly disbursed or not. There was a strong determination on the part of the Government not to give any kind of justice to his county. He was unable to get the information in any other way than by the one he had taken, and he trusted the hon. the Minister would furnish the information before the vote came up, so that he might judge whether he could support the vote for these institutions or not.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he could furnish the hon. gentleman with the information in the course of a day or two, but he must say that this information asked for was correspondence, and was now in the hands of the printer, and he supposed that, in the course of a week or ten days, it would be in print, as a supplement to his report.

MR. MITCHELL said that, as the hon. gentleman had informed the House that the information would be in print in a week or ten days, he would withdraw his motion. He distinctly stated, and he repeated, that he had not got from the Public Works Department the information he asked for. Last year, he asked for information to which he had a right, but it was omitted from the return he received, and the House had not received that information yet.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

DOMINION ACTIVE VOLUNTEER CORPS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. STEPHENSON moved for a return, giving in detail the amount of ammunition furnished during the years 1875, 1876 and 1877, to the Active Volunteer Battalions and Companies of the Dominion; specifying the Battalion to which each Company belonged, and the amount purchased, and the prices paid by each Company or Battalion respectively; also the amount served out to the several Battalions or Companies for practice, and specifying the Companies or Battalions receiving the same, for which no charge was made.

MR. JONES (Halifax) said the hon. gentleman who placed the notice upon the paper seemed to be under the impression that ammunition had been furnished to some battalions without extra charge. The hon. gentleman would see, when the returns were brought down, that this impression was incorrect.

Motion agreed to.

WINTER NAVIGATION OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

MOTION PROPOSED.

MR. FRÉCHETTE moved :

"That this House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a Resolution declaring it expedient that Government should be advised to take proper steps to test the possibility of navigating the St. Lawrence from Quebec to the ocean during the winter season."

He said that, during the Session of 1876, he succeeded in obtaining the appointment of a Special Committee for the purpose of examining into this matter, and, although the bare idea of attempting to navigate the River St. Lawrence during the winter months brought a smile to the lips of many hon. gentlemen, the evidence adduced to that Committee was so strong and positive, and so convincing, that a report in favour of the scheme was unanimously adopted, and submitted to the approval of Parliament. It would not be uninteresting to read a few lines from this report. It concluded as follows :—

"All these facts, in the opinion of your Committee, are peremptory answers to the principal objections set forth by those who have no faith in the scheme, and their endorsement by the almost unanimous evidence adduced, virtually solves the problem of Winter Navigation in the affirmative; and the tone of the evidence given by the most important witnesses, examined as aforesaid, is so positive and strong, that your Committee cannot but warmly recommend this projected mode of navigation to the most serious consideration of the Government of the country.

"As to the commercial results likely to be derived from the successful operation of the enterprise, very little doubt can be entertained. It is true that, under the present state of affairs, such a mode of navigation having been hitherto considered as very dangerous, if not utterly impossible, it cannot be expected that ship-owners will risk their property, nor insurance companies take risks on vessels and goods passing through that route. But as soon as the practicability of the route is thoroughly demonstrated by practical experience, your Committee do not see why the navigation of the Gulf and River St. Lawrence in winter would not yield as good results as during the summer season.

"There could be no difference of opinion as to that point. In consequence, your Committee have given most of their attention to the physical side of the question—that is, to the material possibility of opening the River and Gulf St. Lawrence to regular traffic during the winter season. Can a line of steamers, properly built, navigate those waters during the whole year with security and without interruption? Such is the principal point which your Committee have tried chiefly to investigate; and the result of the investigation has been of such a nature as to convince your Committee that the scheme is altogether feasible and ought to be tried at once.

"In consequence, your Committee take the liberty of suggesting that steps be taken towards a practical demonstration of this important theory, as soon as the financial position of the country will admit."

Such was the conclusion arrived at by nine representatives of the people of this country, after several days' careful examination of the most competent men, engineers, sea-captains and pilots, all from the neighbourhood of the St. Lawrence, and, therefore, well acquainted with the matter. And what other conclusion could the Committee come to in the presence of declarations such as the following, for instance, from the lips of Captain Fortier, a man who had been in command of a vessel for over twenty-five years, and for eleven years had sailed from the northern coast of Labrador to the Straits of Belle Isle, and from the coasts of Greenland to the Straits of Hudson, through 700 miles of floating ice, in an old wooden sailing ship: "According to my experience and observation," he said, "I cannot but say that the winter navigation of the Lower St. Lawrence is not only practicable, but very easy." Captain Graburn, when he was asked before the Committee whether he had any experience of the Gulf and River St. Lawrence winter navigation, said :

"I have had considerable experience in navigating the St. Lawrence early in spring, and late in the fall. I have been around the coast of Newfoundland and in the harbour of St. John's all the year round in steamships. I have entered the St. Lawrence, and sailed in the latter end of November to Quebec only once: I came by St. Pauls at that time. Since 1867, I have been sail ing the St. Lawrence from Quebec to Europe and the West Indies. In the spring of the year I experienced a great deal of difficulty from ice between Quebec and Gaspé. My ship was a sailing vessel. If it had been a steamer I would not have experienced such difficulties, inasmuch as a steamer has more power in keeping clear of the floating ice. I had no experience later than the 15th December of this year."

And when asked whether, from his experience and general information, he could say that the Gulf and River of St. Lawrence to Quebec could be navigated during the winter months, he unhesitatingly answered, "Certainly." Captain Michel Lecours, who had been engaged in the navigation of the St. Lawrence for twenty-six years, said :

"I have left on the 17th day of February, 1871, to go to the rescue of the ship Prize of England, at Escoumains, below Saguenay, which I took to Tadousac. I have been down the river on two other occasions, three times altogether. The first was in 1869. I was then in command of the steamer St. Andrew. I left on the 2nd day of December, 1869. My steamer was towing down a bark belonging to Mr. Michon. The St. Andrew, which is a paddle-boat, could not return to Quebec, and wintered at L'Islet. The steamer Arctic, for the last few years, and still actually on the ferry between the Grand Trunk Railway Station at Lévis and Quebec, also left on the 2nd day of December, 1869, towing down a brig as far as Bic, and returned to Quebec on the 5th of December. I have already mentioned my trip to Escoumains in 1871. Last year, I left River Ouelle, in command of the steamer Rescue on the 17th of December, and crossed to Tadousac in the course of a single day. The Rescue ran easily through a solid piece of ice certainly over five miles in length, and nine inches thick. That steamer had been built for the lake navigation, and was not well adapted to the winter navigation of the St. Lawrence. Still she went through that piece of ice without for an instant coming to a stop. The ice of the salt water is not as hard as that at Quebec. I left Tadousac on Monday, the 19th December, and safely reached Quebec on the 21st of the same month."

The testimony of this gentleman, from his great experience, was indisputable upon this question. Then they read the evidence of Col. Tarigana, a hydrographic engineer, of very great experience also. In a letter to the Select Committee of the Legislative Assembly of Quebec, he stated :

"In conclusion, I should say that I feel confident that the winter navigation of the St. Lawrence Gulf, with a properly constructed steamer, is perfectly practicable, and that none of the before mentioned difficulties may in any way embarrass navigation. Moreover, I have no doubt that the just experiment of winter navigation will be crowned with success, and will be sufficient to remove from the minds of the public all those doubts which at present prevail."

They had also the declaration of forty experienced pilots of the St. Lawrence, which was just as strong and positive as the quotation he had last made. This document ran :

"We, the undersigned Branch Pilots of the River St. Lawrence, do hereby certify that the floe-ice on the River and Gulf of St. Lawrence would not offer any material resistance to the powerful screw steamers. The absence of fog and sea during the winter months are material advantages in favor of winter navigation. All considered, we are of the opinion that the winter navigation of the Gulf and River St. Lawrence is not only practicable but possible."

In the presence of such positive testimony, what further evidence was required from the projector of the scheme to demonstrate that the scheme was not so visionary after all? Did this evidence not demonstrate that the winter navigation of the Lower St. Lawrence was a practicable and feasible scheme, destined to revolutionize the present system of the St. Lawrence navigation? What other proof could be required? Experience was the crowning of all theories, and they had experience, and successful experience on their side in this case. The Northern Light, in spite of all that had been said against her, had succeeded in achieving one of the greatest triumphs of art and science over material obstacles. She was an unquestionable witness in favour of this theory, for she had been, during the most severe months of the severe winter of last year, among the ice in the terrible Straits of Northumberland, a most eloquent challenge to her detractors. It might be easy enough for a man who was no mechanic himself nor a naval architect, to find fault with her construction, but nobody could deny the fact that, despite the persistent determination of some parties to cry her down and pronounce her a failure and a fraud; despite all efforts displayed to ruin the enterprise, the Northern Light had, during the whole of last year, plied regularly across the Straits of Northumberland without interruption, making, as a general thing, two trips a week; a feat which had never been dreamt of before. It was easy enough to exercise one's spirit of criticism on the construction of the Northern Light, but it was more difficult for this gentleman to shut his eyes to the fact that this little vessel, this failure, had carried the mails and passengers and freight between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, without interruption, safely and expeditiously during the most severe months of the winter, during the same period of the year when the population of that Province had formerly been entirely secluded from the rest of the world, by being deprived of communication with the mainland. It might be easy, putting aside the most important feature of the question, to criticize and find fault with an unclimbed hold and a defective knee, but this gentleman could not deny that this boat had performed what had never been even attempted before its construction.

MR. MITCHELL: What gentleman are you speaking of? There are several here who think it is to one of us you refer.

MR. FRÉCHETTE said he had a right to withhold the name of the gentleman. He had not named the hon. member for Northumberland, and did not believe the hon. member had a right to question him on that point.

MR. MITCHELL: I think I have, and I feel an interest in this question.

MR. FRÉCHETTE said, if the hon. gentleman would only keep quiet and not interrupt, he would have time enough by and bye to answer his arguments. To all this criticism he (Mr. Fréchette) found a peremptory answer in the following challenge, which had been published by Mr. Sewell himself in the King's County Advertiser, on the 7th inst.:

"As to the wild and unscrupulous assertions made with regard to that vessel, all I can say is that she was a ten-year ship, built with the greatest care, under the immediate inspection of two surveyors, and the following additions in excess of the specification were made to the hull, viz: Frame strapped with iron from abreast of the engine-room aft, five strakes of heavy ceiling all through, bolted, and an iron bulkhead pitted forward of the engine-room from the skin clear up to the main deck, for which I never even sent in an account to the Government. In passing through Charlottetown last winter, I issued a challenge, through the columns of the Patriot, to all those who had abused the Northern Light during my absence, yet not one of these people had the manliness to meet me. As to the model, I am prepared to run her against any steamer in the world across the Straits of Northumberland next January for one thousand dollars or two thousand dollars. I leave this challenge open for six months, and if the gentlemen who have been abusing the Northern Light will only communicate with me they will find that I am in earnest."

This challenge was still standing, and none of the gentlemen to whom Mr. Sewell alluded as having abused the Northern Light had the courage to take up this challenge. He would now allude to another article which had been published in the New York Herald on the 16th March, last year:—

"It may seem a novel, if not a preposterous, idea that Canada should be able to teach her republican sister across the border anything in the art of steamboat building, or that results have already been accomplished which leave far behind in the race all the efforts of a similar kind to which the attention of Americans have been directed. Now, observe what has been done in Canada, this country of Arctic temperature, frozen streams and bays and dangerous bergs. Mr. E. W. Sewell, of Quebec, a ship-builder of many years' experience, whose hobby for the last quarter of a century has been the navigation of rivers closed by ice, made a proposition to the Government, which was accepted. He thereupon commenced the construction of the winter steamer, now celebrated throughout the Dominion as the Northern Light.

"With true Canadian energy he finished it in less than six months, and with true Canadian thrift he made it cost him less than $60,000.

"The first trip took place in the month of November, since which time the ferry of forty miles has been comparatively uninterrupted, thus securing to the people of Prince Edward Island practical commercial emancipation. As an illustration of that fact, among the freight recently brought by the Northern Light from Picton were iron knees oakum, copper and iron bars, wire, hemp, &c., articles which enable many of the ship-builders on the island to launch their vessels on the first open water instead of at the beginning of June. It is true that during some of the terrible weather which prevailed there were delays, when the staunch little craft was locked in the fierce grip of the ice for several hours at a time; but all of her experience attests that, for the purpose for which she has been devised, she has proved a greater success than even her projector expected. The object now in view is to establish winter navigation in the river St. Lawrence, thus securing to the Dominion uninterrupted communication with the ou'er world. Mr. Sewell says that with the board ice covering every rock and shoal, the floe ice laying like a great band or shield under the passing ship's lee, and the total absence of fog and sea, this 800 miles of water, with its mirror like surface, presents fewer difficulties to conquer than those which have succumbed to the little steamer in the Straits of Northumberland. Should this undertaking prove to be successful, it may not be long before the Hudson River and Long Island Sound will be kept open during the winter months, and so remain the year round important factors in the commerce of New York.

"Dry as the foregoing details may appear, they are suggestive, and some enterprising man, if not Mr. Sewell himself, may yet make improvements that will produce an entire revolution in the science of winter navigation. What has already been done was regarded in Canada as an impossibility, but after twenty-five years of patient work and waiting the inventor lives to enjoy his reward in the commendation both of the Government and its public spirited citizens."

In spite of all contradiction, he (Mr. Fréchet) maintained that what had been done by the Northern Light sufficiently established that experience was on the side of those who advanced this new system of navigation. Their theory could not be possibly better demonstrated than by the success which had attended the steamer. There was not, perhaps, in the whole continent, or in the whole world, a spot where floe ice gathered in such quantities and raged so furiously as in the Straits of Northumberland. He had not been there himself, but, from what he had heard from those who were acquainted with the locality, he felt authorized to say that the difficulties and dangers which attended navigation in these quarters were so great that they were universally considered impossible to overcome. The members of the Cabinet themselves, when they gave Mr. Sewell the contract to build the vessel, could not admit one moment that she could ply in those waters the whole winter long. If he might be permitted to allude to a private conversation, and he thought he was justified in doing so, he remembered the hon. the Premier stating to Mr. Sewell at the time, to build the vessel, but to remember she was not expected to do more than was really possible; for he (the Premier) had been told that no ship in creation would ever ply in those waters without interruption, at least during the months of February and January. Such was the general opinion on that question a couple of years ago. All those who withstood and hindered the project admitted, as a matter of course, that the ship which could navigate through the Straits of Northumberland would have no difficulty in navigating the lower St. Lawrence up to Quebec. "Well," said Mr. Sewell, "I take the bull by the horns; not only will I build a steamer that will run through the Straits of Northumberland, but, what is much more difficult, as everybody knows, I will establish a regular ferry right across the terrible Straits," and so he did. When the Northern Light first appeared in those waters she was a matter of general criticism; there was not a tailor nor a shoemaker in the Island who could not build an ice boat far superior to the Northern Light. Mr. Sewell himself was pronounced a humbug and a swindler. But, after a few weeks, almost the entire population of the Island were enthusiastic in their thanks to Mr. Sewell for his energy and success in obtaining for them what was a real blessing, uninterrupted communication with the continent. One of the oldest merchants of the Island stated some time afterwards to a newspaper correspondent that he had got a case of "fresh goods" from England, on the 1st of February, by the Northern Light, which, till then, he had always considered an utter impossibility. The arrival of the Northern Light would be considered an important event in the history of that part of the Dominion. The important victory which Mr. Sewell had won in this instance reminded them that, in 1852, the same gentleman had advocated the possibility of establishing a winter ferry between Quebec and Lévis, and that, even then, he was declared to be a kind of enthusiast, entirely lacking common sense and judgment.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRÉCHETTE: He heard hon. gentlemen say, "hear, hear." But he could say in answer to them that the bold project of Mr. Sewell in 1852, had become an accomplished fact, and that his spirit of enterprise had secured to his native locality one of the greatest boons that had benefited her for the last hundred years. When, some time afterwards, the same gentleman declared he could make the Straits of Northumberland navigable during the months of January and February, he was once more looked upon as a lunatic, but once more he had conquered the difficulty. Now, Mr. Sewell stated that winter navigation of the Lower St. Lawrence, from the ocean to Quebec, was not only a feasible but a practicable project, and, though some hon. gentlemen might sneer at this, he thought that all lovers of progress and all the true friends of the country would stand by him and say the matter was important enough to be tried. In the face of the depositions he had read a few moments ago, in the face of the so positive reports of the Committee, in the face of facts which spoke louder than words, of the success which had crowned the first experiments, he claimed there was not a man in this House who could feel justified in opposing a project which, if successful, would certainly increase to a great extent the resources of this country. He might say that this new system of navigation would not only increase but would double the resources of this country.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRECHETTE said that, strange to say, there were some hon. gentlemen who laughed at his utterances on this subject. Strange as it might appear, prejudices were sometimes so strongly rooted in the minds of some people that, after they had been compelled to admit the possibility of winter navigation between Quebec and Lévis, and after they had been forced to admit the possibility of opening up the River St. Lawrence to navigation during the winter, they would still question the result of the enterprise as a commercial enterprise. This seemed to him so absurd that he could not understand how a man of ordinary common sense could entertain such an idea for a single moment. To say that the River St. Lawrence being open to navigation during the whole year would not yield profitable results, amounted to saying that this great commercial artery was nothing but a useless stream which added nothing to the resources and development of the country. Everybody admitted that the great drawback to our country was the winter season, which closed the St. Lawrence to navigation and commerce during almost six months of the year. Yet, when it was proposed to do away with this impediment, at least up as far as Quebec, hon. gentlemen sneered at the project; first, as an impossibility, and then as a useless and foolish enterprise. Minds afflicted with such blindness were to be pitied. In fact, it was now admitted that the cold seasons were the most favourable for the transportation of wheat and other grain, and that such articles of commerce could be transported more conveniently and cheaply, by water than by rail. That might also be applied to the cattle trade which, he was happy to say, during the last few years had assumed considerable proportions. But it was on the principal branches of our exports—the lumber and timber trade—that the new system of navigation would have the greatest influence. It would revolutionize, entirely, that important branch of our national industry. The lumber merchants of England well knew the advantage of not holding large stocks, and if we could export our lumber at all seasons of the year, such merchants would order such materials as they required, sawn to a scantling, and millions of feet of deck planks and ship planking, and other kinds of lumber would be sent from Quebec in considerable quantities, at all periods of the year, reduced to the requisite size. He thought he was safe in saying that, with this new system of navigation, all the pine timber, with the exception of that required for railroads and some other purposes, would be sent to England, sawn to dimensions, thus doubling the employment of our saw mills, increasing by so much the wealth of the country. He would quote a few lines from the evidence on the subject given before the Committee on the winter navigation of the St. Lawrence, by the promoter of the scheme himself:

"The commercial results to the Dominion it is almost impossible to foretell; the most apparent are our securing to ourselves the shortest route between the heart of this Dominion and Europe, over one of the grandest commercial highways in the world.

* * * All western produce now being shipped from Portland and Baltimore would find its way to Europe by the St. Lawrence, which is two or three days' sail nearer than either of the above routes, and subject to 123 miles less of railway freight; this item alone being a heavy tax upon a large portion of our country. The seal and frozen fish trade would be developed. The Americans are now running in and out of the Gulf, up as far as the Bay of Islands, and realizing thousands by carrying the splendid herring of that Bay, in a frozen state, in small schooners to New York, while seal fishing can be carried on at less risk, less cost, and nearer home than from Newfoundland. This country being so much nearer England than any of her other colonies, is destined to be the great food-producer of that country; the frozen meat trade, but lately inaugurated, has already assumed extraordinary proportions; such trade can be carried on at considerably less cost during the winter months, when it will not be necessary to resort to artificial means, and at a time when farmers are most inclined to dispose of surplus stock. A West India trade direct to Quebec will, without doubt, be established as vegetable and other farm produce, which will not bear transportation during the summer months, can be delivered in as fresh state as the day they were shipped. West India produce will be brought direct to Quebec, instead of coming by Portland, from which port into different parts of the Dominion, the railway freights amount to more than the ocean freight."

That opinion, expressed by Mr. Sewell, was fully endorsed by the New York Herald in the concluding portion of the article from which he had already read extracts:—

"Should the effort to apply the principle above described to the navigation of the great St. Lawrence and other rivers be successful no one can foretell what important commercial results may follow in the further development of the power and wealth of this grand Dominion. The same remark will apply to New York."

In opposition to those facts, it would be alleged that ship-owners would not risk their property in making that attempt without insurance, and insurance companies would not take risks on vessels taking the St. Lawrence route in winter. That was proved, to a certain extent, to be the case. But the reason for that was only because this mode of navigation had been considered so very dangerous. But when it would be fairly demonstrated that it was attended with no more danger than that heretofore followed, there was not the slightest doubt but that the insurance companies would waive their objections. When Mr. Sewell advocated the possibility of opening up winter steam communication between Quebec and Lévis, the same argument was used by nearly all his opponents, but now there was not an insurance company, having an agency in Quebec or Lévis, that would not be ready to insure the steamers used in that service at a very low rate. The advantage of very low insurance had been offered to those steamboats but were refused for the reason that it was an admitted fact that these steamboats did not run the slightest danger. When it was practically demonstrated that the navigation of the St. Lawrence in winter was as safe as in summer, the insurance companies would not have any objection to take risks on the vessels. This practical demonstration he had in view in moving the present resolution. In presence of the facts stated, authorities quoted, and the evidence taken before the Committee specially entrusted with the matter, it was the duty of the House to adopt the motion, and authorize the Government, so soon as the financial position of the country would admit, to take the most effective steps in order to test the practicability of that new mode of navigation. If he might be allowed, he would undertake to show the House that what the Government might be expected to do in the matter was by no means an onerous or difficult task. He saw no difficulty, for instance, in building a ship of 700 tons, fitted out with engines of 700 horse power, similar to those in the Northern Light. Such a vessel would perform lighthouse service during the summer season; during the spring and fall she would render assistance to ships in peril, and during the winter she would ply from the ports of the Gulf, say from Halifax to Quebec, regularly until it was sufficiently demonstrated that the winter navigation of the St. Lawrence was safe, to induce steamers from abroad to come up as far as Quebec. It would have this advantage, moreover that the country would not be called on to bear such expenses as were necessary for the Napoleon III, which was certainly a burden on the country. That steamer, inefficient as she was, cost a yearly expenditure of about $39,000, which was enormous, considering the service she rendered, and the sooner she was sold for the price of old iron the better it would be for the Dominion. The vessel he proposed to build would not cost more than $80,000. From that point of view alone it would realize a considerable economy to the country. Moreover, he was authorized to state that a foreign company was ready to establish a line of steamers to perform mail service, summer and winter, for a term of ten years, for a subsidy of $200,000, the first ship to be ready on the 1st of December, 1880, or three years after the signing of the contract. That was not an excessive sum, when it was remembered that the Allan Company received $126,533.33 per annum for that present service. Up to last year, an additional sum of $7,000 had been paid to the Grand Trunk for the same service that new company proposed to perform, making a total of $133,533.33, which, if deducted from $200,000, left the balance of $66,466.67, which the Government would have to pay in excess of the present subsidy. So that, at the expiration of ten years, the Government would, for about a half a million dollars, have secured to this country a boon sufficient to make the name of an Administration for ever dear to the memory of the people of this Dominion. If that proposition did not suit, he had another which was even still more liberal. It was proposed to organize a company which would run one steamer of 3,000 tons gross measurement and 2,700 horse power. This vessel to commence running on the first of December, 1879, the Government paying a subsidy of $70,000 for the first year. Two steamers to run during the following year (1880), the company claiming a subsidy of $140,000. A weekly line to be established in 1881, to consist of six steamers of the tonnage and power already mentioned, the service to be continued for a term of ten years, under a subsidy of $400,000 per annum.

The contract to be terminable by the contractor on giving six months' notice, and by the Government, in case of default. Average passages not to exceed twelve days. The company to be subject to a penalty of $4,000 for every trip not performed, so that the country would have no risk to run, and would be called upon to pay only for services actually performed. He would read to the House some information furnished to him by Mr. Sewell in a private letter, as to the route he proposed to follow during the winter season:—

“The Straits of Belle Isle,” said Mr. Sewell, “which are 150 miles wide at their entrance into the St. Lawrence towards the south, and ten miles in width at their connection with the ocean towards the north, form, as it were, an immense tunnel with its narrow neck opening into the great ice regions. This narrow gap naturally admits but a comparatively small proportion of ice into the Straits, as if nature had taken a proper care to keep that passage as free as possible from ice; so that the more we look into the enterprise, and the more we feel convinced that the difficulties are more apparent than serious. While west of Quebec all is hard and fast in the bonds of the inexorable ice, from that port down to the ocean, on the contrary, the noble St. Lawrence flows on, ever free and unfettered.”

The following were some of the distances between America and Europe: Quebec to Liverpool, by the Straits of Belle Isle, 2,680 miles; Halifax to Liverpool, 2,800; St. John to Liverpool, 3,050 miles; Portland, Maine, to Liverpool, 3,800 miles. It would be seen by those figures that, for the transportation of western produce, Quebec had an advantage even over the port of Halifax of 120 miles less of ocean distance and 800 miles less of railroad travelling. They did not ask the Government to spend millions of dollars, as was done in Germany, England, and the United States, to organize expeditions to explore the Polar regions for the mere purpose of ascertaining certain points of geographical science; they asked only the expenditure of a few thousand dollars which, if successful, would increase to a considerable extent the commerce and wealth of the country. Some hon. members might call this his hobby. Let it be his hobby; he was proud of it. He felt confident that his native Province was deeply interested in its issue, and he would cease to advocate that scheme only when practical experience had proved it to be either a success or a failure.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said the scheme was thoroughly visionary, and one which no reasonable man would believe could be carried into effect. If a steamer could run down the Gulf in the winter season, and all their experience showed that she might make one trip a month, what possible result could be obtained? Even if she could get down, he would like to know what good could possibly result from it in any shape or form. They knew very well how unable a ship would be to accomplish the trip for the simple reason that, when a vessel got out in this ice in the cold of winter, she became fixed in the ice, and was thoroughly powerless and helpless, was carried away before the wind and storms, and could not extricate herself, much less do anything like towing another vessel. It was very well known that, even in the fall, when the ice was beginning to form, the insurance companies would not take risks on sailing ships going into the Gulf at all. In December, the charge was, perhaps, 15 per cent. if any insurance at all was then taken, and in most cases it was at this time refused. He considered that the amount of extra insurance that would be required for vessels coming into the St. Lawrence in the winter would more than pay the freight on all the cargoes that could be sent over the railway to Halifax, where there was a good winter port all the year round, and where cargoes could always be shipped. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fréchet) had frequently referred to some gentlemen who had abused the Northern Light. This was the only experience they had had of winter navigation. The hon. gentleman had stated that this steamer had done her work thoroughly and well and uninterrupted during last season which, he said, was a very severe one. In saying this, the hon. gentleman stated what was not correct. They knew very well that, during the first part of last winter, she had drifted for two or three weeks about the Gulf unable to get from Charlottetown to Georgetown; and reference to the papers laid before the House would show that she only made progress through solid ice about five inches thick; and this was stated, not only by the captain, but also by the agent of the Marine and Fisheries Department in Prince Edward Island. Last year she got on the route just before he came up here, and a gentleman who followed the next day had arrived here four days after him; and they knew that this winter she had stuck in the very first ice she had encountered, and remained there for eight or ten days. She made another trip, and it was three or four weeks before she got back to Georgetown. He did not know what she had done last week, but certainly, during the last five or six weeks, she had not made 100 miles; and, he believed, not two trips to Pictou and back. Last winter, when trips were made, passengers had often to be landed in boats, and go through broken ice for some five or six miles, thus undergoing more hardships, perhaps, than if they had crossed the whole distance. In cold weather, vessels were blocked in and carried away by the ice; and anyone who knew anything of the working of the ice and the navigation of the Gulf, would know that ships had been carried away from and below Quebec in the ice, and had remained drifting in the ice all the winter. There had been ships drifting in the ice clear up to the 1st of May. The tendency of the ice was to move to the eastward; and, when vessels got in it, they drifted away and were perfectly helpless, and could not get clear. They had had one expensive plaything in the Northern Light. He had no interest in depreciating this vessel at all, or in doing any injury to her builder, but he pronounced the vessel a failure. It was said that all hands down in Prince Edward Island had expressed an opinion regarding this boat. It was enough to make them do so when they saw a boat, that had cost $60,000, required a horse and saw to get her out of the harbour. This was done when this boat was sent down there last year. They had had one expensive plaything, and he hoped they did not want to pay $300,000 or $400,000 in attempting to do what, he must say, could accomplish no earthly good. With regard to the running of the Northern Light, she, in his opinion, had not been a success but a failure. She had cost a very great deal too much in the first place, and, in the next place, some $5,000 appeared to have been paid for extras, which, he thought, should not have been paid; and, when parties interested in this boat spoke of the manner in which she was built, and rather reflected upon those who expressed a contrary opinion, all he would wish to do, in reply, was to refer them to the expenditure made on her during the last year. She ran for three or four months, and it was necessary to expend some $13,000, or perhaps more than $20,000, to make her fit for work this spring, and the good resulting from this had, so far, been nothing. This or any other boat would run after navigation closed from Georgetown and across for a month or six weeks, and carry freight and passengers; but after the first severe weather she could not run, and if a boat could not make one or two trips per month from Georgetown to Pictou, he wanted to know what she would do in navigating the Gulf of St. Lawrence. This was a mere visionary scheme, which he believed no sensible man would entertain for one moment; and, therefore, he had no fear, as far as he was concerned, that the project would for one moment be entertained by the House. It was said that they should have another boat at Prince Edward Island, and that two boats could do the work; but if one could not make one trip a month, he did not see why this should be done. One boat was quite enough to have drifting about in the ice; and the better plan for the Government would be to turn their attention to some more practical and preferable method of giving them winter communication at Prince Edward Island. He would much rather see this money expended in carrying out the arrangement made when Prince Edward Island went into Confederation: that they should have winter communication and approaches to the Straits on each side, with a short railroad and proper facilities for winter travel. This was the only scheme on which they should depend to get their mails regularly. A vessel might run there or anywhere in moderate weather occasionally; but just as often as she got stuck in the ice, the mails and passengers would be delayed for days; and on the present scheme, so far as they were concerned, they did not want to depend at all. He could only repeat that no good could result from this scheme of winter navigation under any circumstances. A large amount of money would be wasted on it if it was entertained, and, for his part, he considered that that scheme was thoroughly visionary and should never be entertained at all.

Mr. DAVIES said that, if he was not mistaken, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Pope) was one of the first who proposed to keep communication open between Prince Edward Island and the mainland by steamer. The hon. gentleman was a member of the delegation which came up here to fix the terms of Confederation, and this was one of the conditions. He (Mr. Davies) had never been very hopeful in this relation. He had crossed the Straits very often, and his opinion had always been that there were five or six weeks in mid-winter when no steamer could cross. The present Government were charged with the duty of attempting, at least, to keep up this communication, and to do so, they had built this steamer, which he was bound to say, had surpassed his expectations, and solved the question of the winter navigation of the St. Lawrence, because the hon. gentleman would understand that the difficulty this steamer had to contend with was not out in the main portion of the Straits, but when she was approaching the harbours of Pictou and Georgetown, before which there were bays and some seven or eight miles of ice through which she was obliged to force her way. Out in mid-straits, there was no difficulty whatever; and if she could navigate a narrow strait, certainly no difficulty would be experienced in running her up and down the St. Lawrence. He agreed with the hon. member for Queen's that this, perhaps, was of no practical value. No passenger would go by this route in the winter. Of course they would prefer to proceed by way of the Intercolonial to Halifax, there to take steamer; and with regard to the carriage of goods, the insurance, he supposed, would be so high as to prevent any business being done in that direction in winter, though, he thought that, no doubt, a steamer could be constructed, similar to the Northern Light, and with some improvements, to navigate the St. Lawrence in winter. He considered that the hon. gentleman had rather disparaged the performance of the Northern Light. Last winter, before she first commenced her trips, she unfortunately was frozen in at Charlottetown. The gentleman who built her came down in her, and they understood that he was going to remain to show the people how to work her, having had a great deal of experience in this respect on the St. Lawrence, and having been the projector of the winter steamer which plied between Lévis and Quebec; but, before she made the trial trip, that gentleman returned home, and the persons in charge, though a very good crew, had had no experience in winter navigation, save in schooners and vessels. The winter came on with great severity, and in two days, he believed, one foot of ice was formed. Some alterations was made in the steamer, but she was nipped, and a great deal of trouble was experienced in getting her round to winter quarters in Georgetown. Afterwards the weather was, however, comparatively mild. The reason why she had not made her trip regularly this winter, he understood, was this: a large quantity of heavy polar ice had drifted on the coast of the Island from the Strait of Belle-Isle, and to give hon. gentlemen some idea as to the magnitude of some of these fields, he would mention they sometimes extended over 100 acres. They were very thick and heavy, and it was impossible for any steamer, in his opinion, that could be constructed to get through them at all times. Last winter, this ice did not come up at all. It was only some years that this occurred, and this was the case this year. The steamer was now running very well.

MR. DAVIES.

On two occasions interruptions had taken place, of ten days in the one and of about a week in the other, when she was nipped in the ice. They had had much severer weather down there than was the case this year in this Province. He thought that, from about the 5th to the 20th of January, the thermometer had generally ranged below zero, sometimes to 15° below, and scarcely ever above. It was impossible for the steamer to get out of the ice at times, and she was landlocked in these deep bays. If she was out in the centre of the Strait, or where there was abundance of room, as in the lower St. Lawrence, she would have no difficulty in getting through. She was an admirable vessel for passing through floe or field ice; if she got her nose in a crack in the ice she was sure to get through. He doubted very much whether the scheme proposed would be of any practical value. He did not think it would be, in view of the difficulties that would attend the navigation of the St. Lawrence in winter; the voyage would be so stormy, and increased insurance would quite counterbalance any advantage that could thus be gained. Besides a steamer similar to the Northern Light would not do for the navigation of the Atlantic. These vessels were of very deep draught of water. He thought that the Northern Light drew eighteen feet, ballasted with coal aft, and three or four feet forward; but a similar vessel—though some alterations in the model might be made, and he could not say that this would not be done—while she might descend the St. Lawrence, would not do for the purpose of proceeding to Gaspé. The Northern Light had done better than he had ever expected, and she was suitable for the purpose. He regretted to say that this was not the case when she first came down; though, in the main, a good strong vessel, still a good deal of work had had to be done to her. During the winter she was battered about very much by the ice, and, of course, she needed a good many repairs, which were made in what he looked upon as the best workshop in this regard in the Dominion—Pictou; and, so far, she had sustained no injury whatever. Last week she was plying between these fields of ice, and only this morning she had reached the wharf at Pictou. He thought that the hon. gentleman had rather overdrawn the picture when he said that she was a complete failure. He did not think she could ever be expected to perform the service so regularly as could be done in summer; but he considered that she had performed very good service, and they could not say she had been an utter failure.

MR. MITCHELL said he desired to obtain the opinion of the Government on the motion before it proceeded further. This matter involved a great deal of money, and it was the duty of the Government, before the discussion was concluded, to state what its intentions were in this respect. Before he spoke, he wished to know whether it would countenance the folly comprehended in this resolution, involving, as it would, the expenditure of a vast sum of money.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman will see that the Government is desirous of hearing the opinions of the members of the House. This is a very important subject, even if it should be thought to be visionary by some. There may be something in it. There is something in it. I will be quite prepared to say what I think of the matter myself, but I desire to hear and pay some respect to the opinions of other members of the House.

MR. MITCHELL said that, as the Government were determined not to give any opinion to the House, nor state their views with relation to this matter, he would not follow the hon. mover of the resolution through his various statements, but simply state what he believed, after some considerable experience—and he was not going to give way to his hon. friend from Lévis as to experience with relation to navigation, nor, perhaps, to many members of the House—should be done in this connection. He believed that his hon. friend the Receiver-General had also had a good deal of experience touching this matter, and he would like to hear his opinion about it, when he (Mr. Mitchell) concluded his remarks. The hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Fréchette) had attempted to prove that, because the Straits of Northumberland had been rendered navigable to a certain extent in winter, the St. Lawrence could be navigated also. Such an assertion clearly showed that the hon. gentleman did not understand what he was talking about. An experienced, practical man, who knew anything about the matter, would hold a different opinion. The difference between the two places was as great as it could possibly be. The Straits of Northumberland were only some 40 miles wide; there were no rocks or bars to render the passage of them dangerous. Navigation on the St. Lawrence, on the other hand, extended to about 500 miles, and the passage was one which, in winter—apart from the ice—was one of great danger. In fact, there could be no possible comparison between the two places as far as the capability of the Northern Light or any other vessel to cut through the ice was concerned. It would be absurd to allege that under no circumstances could winter navigation take place, but it was still more absurd to affirm that regular communication by vessels during the winter months could take place. The hon. gentleman gave Mr. Sewell credit for being the projector of winter navigation, but he might recall to the recollection of the House the fact that one of the Cunard vessels had navigated the St. Lawrence during winter twenty years ago. To imagine, however, that vessels could ply regularly on the St. Lawrence during winter, between Quebec and the outlet to the sea at Gaspé, was a delusion, and it would be a reckless waste of the people's money to make useless experiments of that description. He gave the present Government credit for having done a great many good things, and he could scarcely imagine, therefore, that they would be so foolish as to squander the public Treasury in the way suggested by the hon. member for Lévis. He did not mean to say that no experiments should be made with the view of ascertaining if communication could not be established between the Island and the mainland; what he contended was that, by the building of the Northern Light, enough had been done in this way, and that further expenditure was unnecessary. It was idle to expect that that vessel could be made serviceable in the way of carrying any kind of commerce between Quebec and the sea. Even though the Government were to appropriate \$200,000 for the purpose of building a vessel specially intended to carry on this kind of trade during winter, it would end in nothing, no one would be found willing to ship a bale of goods in her. Supposing, as the hon. gentleman suggested, that some kind of vessel was built suitable for the winter navigation of the St. Lawrence, it would be found impracticable to ship lumber for various reasons. In the first place, the lumber being surrounded by ice to the thickness of four or five inches, could not be moved, but if it were it would be well nigh impossible to get it into the hold of the vessel. The carrying capacity of such a vessel, also, would require to be very great in order to allow for the storage of lumber to which such great masses of ice were attached. If, however, by some extraordinary means, all these difficulties were got over, the whole project would fall to the ground when the question of insurance came to be considered. Having had considerable experience, during the last 25 years, in the way of insuring ships and cargoes, he knew something of the charges made in this respect. In the month of July, if a person went to an insurance office for the purpose of insuring a cargo from Montreal to Liverpool, he might do so at a charge of $\frac{1}{2}$; on the 1st of September the charge would be perhaps $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent.; on the 1st of October, $2\frac{1}{2}$; on the 15th October, $3\frac{1}{2}$; on the 1st November 5; on the 10th, $7\frac{1}{2}$; on the 15th or 20th, 10 per cent. and from the 1st December till the month of January the charge would be 25 per cent. of the whole cargo. The scheme proposed by his hon. friend would not, therefore, by any means, prove to be a great boon; in fact, it was altogether impracticable, as no sane man would ever think of sending a cargo up the St. Lawrence from Quebec, when he would have to pay 25 per cent. by way of insurance upon it. The hon. gentleman, had, he thought, been induced to believe in the practicability of the scheme by the representations made to him by Mr. Sewell, but the facts which he (Mr. Mitchell) had set forward could not, he imagined, be controverted by any business man in the House who had a knowledge of the subject. He presumed that it was intended, in the event of winter navigation being commenced, to carry passengers, but he could not, for a single moment, believe that any sane person, wishing to cross the Atlantic, would sail from Quebec in the month of January, when he could take the Intercolonial line to Halifax, whence he could ship direct for England, thus reaching his destination earlier, without undergoing the dangers and hazards which he would most inevitably have to encounter if he went by one of the winter navigation lines. He rather thought his hon. friend the Receiver-General would agree with him in thinking that such winter navigation could never result in any practical good. Believing that the proposed scheme would entail an unnecessary expenditure of public money, he hoped the remarks he had made would be taken in good part by the hon. member for Lévis, because they were uttered in no unfriendly spirit. To adopt the suggestion made, if it were practicable, would simply be to enter into competition with the Intercolonial Railway, which offered every facility for passengers going to Halifax, and for the carrying of goods to that harbour, which was one of the finest in the world. He would call upon the Government to put a stop to the principle now brought forward, which seemed to him to be urged for electioneering purposes. He hoped, also, that the Minister of Marine, who was a large shipowner and who had spent a good deal of money in shipping enterprises, would express his opinion on the subject.

MR. MASSON said he was surprised that the hon. the Premier should make use of the expression that he would form his opinion from the opinions of the members of the House, because, if any party should be in a position to advise them, it ought to be the Government, who were possessed of all the information to be obtained on the subject. The Government were in possession of the report of the Committee appointed two years ago, and that should enable them to judge as to whether the scheme was a visionary or a practical one, and whether, under the circumstances, they ought to recommend it to the House. It was, of course, well known that the St. Lawrence was the only channel by which the wealth of this country could be conveyed to the seaboard, and everything which could be done to foster enterprise through that great channel ought to receive the attention of the Government. He admitted there were great difficulties in the way, but a report of the Committee, which he held in his hand, seemed to meet some of these difficulties. The greatest difficulty urged against the scheme was the prevalence of these great snow storms, which were worse than the ice itself. Another fact was that the ice on the St. Lawrence was said to be on the right and left side of the river, and, consequently, formed a kind of channel through which the ships could sail, and which, according to these men, was safer than an ordinary channel. There was a practical difficulty in the matter which the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Fréchet) had not admitted. It was this that, for this winter navigation, a special kind of ship would be necessary to go through the ice. He was not a practical man himself, and knew little about it, but he held in his hand the evidence of men who did know something about it, and they said that the navigation of the St. Lawrence in winter, so far from being an impossibility, was possible, provided they had properly built ships. They would require, as one of the gentleman, whose evidence the hon. member for Lévis had read, stated, a special line of steamers to navigate properly the river St. Lawrence in winter. He (Mr. Masson) believed that the balance of testimony showed that a specially built ship would be required. In that case it was their duty first to enquire whether these specially-built vessels would be of use anywhere else, if not, the whole scheme fell to nothing, because ships could not always navigate in the same waters, for they could not always get freights if they could not go into the broad ocean, consequently, there were great difficulties in the way. This House should not have a decision upon the question unless they heard from the Government that they were studying the question. He called upon the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Fréchet) to say if he had pressed this question upon the Government to say that they were prepared to take the matter up, and, if they found a feasible scheme, to ask in their Supplementary Estimates for an amount of money to carry it out? Had he done this, or did the Government think the scheme a visionary one or one not of an important character? This House could not form an opinion upon it. It was for the Government to guide the House; to tell them, from information which it was in their power to obtain, whether it was a good scheme or not. He held that, if there was a possibility of obtaining additional navigation, it was the bounden duty of the Government to consider the scheme; and, even if it did cost some money to the country, it was their duty to do all in their power to prove its unfeasibility to free themselves from the obloquy put upon them by those principally interested in the navigation of that river, namely the people of the Province of Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that, when the hon. gentleman opposite called upon the Government to declare their intentions with regard to this scheme, he seemed to think that it was the duty of the Government—whenever a motion was made—at once to proceed to declare their views with regard to that particular question. He (Mr. Mackenzie) did not so consider it their duty. He considered it their duty to deal with every question that came before the House in a national spirit, and to consider whether proposals which might be made by independent members, in the only way which independent members had of making them, were of such a character as to require the immediate or prospective operation of the Government in relation to them. Now, with regard to the winter navigation of the St. Lawrence, he could say at once that it was a matter of the most extreme importance. He could not conceive of anything more important to us than to be able to demonstrate if we could have the St. Lawrence made navigable throughout the whole year. It was true we had the advantage at present of a winter port at Halifax, and a winter port, practically, at St. John, and it was true we could reach either of those spots without any inconvenience whatever, except that resulting from accumulations of snow and ice upon the track during the long winters which we had. The completion of the route to these seaports no doubt gave us a very great advantage which we had not in former years. In former years our winter port was practically Portland, indeed altogether Portland, for five months at least of the year, and we were compelled therefore to seek egress through a foreign country, a most undesirable thing in itself. The carriage by railway to the seaports of Halifax and St. John was a most expensive matter, and for the exportation of the great trade of Quebec, that of timber, it was practically useless for this reason. A certain kind of lumber might, doubtless, be sent by this means when trade was brisk and prices high, but he doubted whether, as a general rule, it was possible to send lumber this way for Europe or South America, where they expected to find a market for that particular kind of produce. Therefore, if they were able to ship such produce as timber and lumber on the St. Lawrence during the whole winter, it would be of the greatest possible importance to this country; and, apart altogether from the commercial idea, it would be most advantageous to us to be able to demonstrate to the world that our rivers were navigable throughout the whole season. He did not possess sufficient nautical knowledge to understand the whole question as it might be discussed by gentlemen acquainted with the shipping interest, and, therefore, he was only able to take the view which an unpractical person must necessarily take. He had observed, however, the operations of vessels in the ice in certain portions of our inland waters, and one of the objects which the Government had in view in making the contract for the Northern Light was to demonstrate by the operations of that vessel in the ice round Prince Edward Island, whether it was possible to navigate the St. Lawrence in winter with vessels similarly constructed. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) had stated that the construction of the Northern Light might enable her to work through the ice in the comparatively still waters of the narrow Straits of Northumberland, but it was not such as would fit her, in carrying capacity, or otherwise, to buffet the waves of the Atlantic; that it was a vessel which might be fitter to work her way in the channels of the St. Lawrence and ceased to be useful, or practically so, when it reached the mouth of the Gulf; and he instanced the vessels employed in the sealing trade; and that, although these vessels were built in England, and were brought across the Atlantic, they were merely brought for the purposes of the trade, for which they were peculiarly fitted by construction; their sealing qualities, perhaps, answered, but it unfitted them as regular traders for crossing the Atlantic. If the hon. gentleman's views were correct, it would follow that, although they might be able to construct a class of steamers—for he presumed only steamers might be able to navigate the St. Lawrence in winter—which could make their way through the ice, they might expect it would require another class of vessels to cross the Atlantic. He understood Mr. Sewell's views, and, although some hon. members might call his views visionary, still Mr. Sewell had devoted much of his time and study to the subject, and his views were worthy of consideration. Mr. Sewell considered that vessels of the ordinary construction might safely navigate the waters of the St. Lawrence during the winter. He (Mr. Mackenzie) recollected discussing this matter with the gentleman and some friends, in his office, some years ago. Mr. Sewell pointed out that it was almost impossible for a vessel navigating the waters of the St. Lawrence to get ashore on the banks. The ice lay on either side, and the current would keep the vessel in the stream, and, although she might encounter some masses of ice, there was no possibility of the vessel receiving damages. Even if she had a few days of unusual pressure of floating ice, it might delay her passage, but the vessel would not be injured. Mr. Sewell stated to him that there were instances on record where vessels which had been abandoned on the St. Lawrence, on the supposition that they must necessarily become wrecks, had drifted in this way during the whole winter, and had been picked up in the ensuing spring, comparatively, and often entirely uninjured. This went to prove the assertion that it was possible to sail vessels down the river with safety during the winter. It had been said that the rates of insurance would of themselves be a sufficient deterrent to any commercial man indulging in such an enterprise. He confessed that he sympathized with that view; he was afraid it was such as would make it impracticable to carry on the trade upon commercial principles. Now, the question arose as to whether it would be a wise outlay on the part of the Government to expend some money for the purpose of demonstrating whether strongly-built steamers could under all ordinary circumstances safely navigate the St. Lawrence. There was another view to be taken of it also. The St. Lawrence would, perhaps, be susceptible of navigation in winter to a certain point, to the city of Quebec, and in connection with this they had to consider whether a great harbour on the St. Lawrence, but at no great distance from the Intercolonial Railway, would facilitate the navigation to the Gulf of the St. Lawrence where it became wide enough to have an open sea-way. He was prepared to give no information upon that at the present moment, although he was satisfied the experiments of the Persia in the Trent affair, and the fact that one of the great ocean steamers ascended the St. Lawrence to Bic towards the end of December, and there discharged her cargo, were in favour of such a project. Supposing there was a great harbour in that neighbourhood, they had to consider the question whether the experiment of the Hyperion, which came there with reluctance and departed with great haste—

MR. MITCHELL: And had to leave her boats behind.

MR. MACKENZIE said that might be from the alarm of the officer rather than on account of the weather. They had been considering the feasibility of such a harbour, both as a harbour of refuge late in the year, and possibly for conveying mails and passengers through the winter if it were found practicable to do so. He confessed that he was not himself convinced at the present moment that it would be practicable to do this, but he was not on that account disposed to shut out from discussion such a subject as this, where the opinion of practical men in the House might give such information as might lead the House to a conclusion one way or the other, as to whether it was practicable or not.

MR. MITCHELL: Where is the money to come from.

MR. MACKENZIE: At present I do not think that the Government have much money to put in that project.

MR. MITCHELL: And I think you are too sensible to put it in that, if you had the money.

MR. MACKENZIE said his hon. friend did not always give the Government credit for too much good sense, and, if other hon. members were to form their opinions of the Government's good sense upon the average opinion of the hon. gentleman, he was afraid they would not trust the Government very far.

MR. MITCHELL: I should hope not.

MR. MACKENZIE said he received the hon. gentleman's compliment with reservation, convinced that it would not carry them far and would not do much to reinstate them in the opinions of the gentlemen opposite. At any rate, that was the position the Government took with reference to this question of navigating the St. Lawrence in winter. They had determined to prosecute their enquiries in such a way as would lead to some practical result one way or the other. He himself was extremely anxious that a solution could be found for it in the direction mentioned by the hon. member for Lévis. He thought it would be a great advantage to show to the world that even the St. Lawrence, which was supposed, generally speaking, with all Canada, to be completely shut up in winter, was at least accessible to ships to a certain point; and in the meantime we had at least our railway system which connected the Dominion with the best seaport on the whole continent, and we were enabled to avail ourselves of it, perhaps, at a little less expense than the nearer port on the St. Lawrence. But, at all events, this navigation of the St. Lawrence must commend itself to every man in the country as one of the greatest advantages we could possibly have in these latitudes. He hoped the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fréchet) would feel satisfied with the discussion he had evoked, and would not seek at the present time to do more than present his views to this House, as he had so ably done. The resolution was not the kind of resolution which could fairly be put to the House, and he trusted the hon. gentleman would not press it further upon the attention of the House than was necessary to evoke the discussion it had produced, and to which he (Mr. Fréchet) contributed so much by his able speech.

MR. SPEAKER said it was not customary to refer resolutions of this character to a Committee of the whole House; the opinion pronounced should be the opinion of the House. The resolution could be altered so that it might appear on the Journals of the House.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 8) To authorize the National Insurance Company to reduce its Capital Stock, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Desjardins.)

Bill (No. 10) To authorize the Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company to reduce its Capital Stock, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Casgrain.)

Bill (No. 16) To incorporate the Ontario Mutual Life Insurance Company.—(Mr. Bow-

Bill (No. 21) To amend the Charter of the Quebec Fire Assurance Company.—(Mr. Taschereau.)

Bill (No. 22) Respecting the Bank of Liverpool.—(Mr. Forbes.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee of the Whole, and reported:—

Bill (No. 26) Respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Mitchell.)

Bill (No. 27) Respecting the Northern Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Cook.)

CANADA SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.—[BILL No. 6.]

(Mr. Thomson, Welland.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said it was his intention, directly after the first clause had been read, to submit an amendment. He knew that a large portion of the Committee had already heard the proposition he intended to move, in the shape of an amendment, notice of which had been already given in the votes and proceedings, and had heard it discussed pretty fully before, in another place. He was again forced to refer to it, and would endeavour to do so as briefly as possible; his only apology being the pressing exigencies of the matter contained in the proposed amendment. He moved that, after clause 1, between section 1 and sub-section 2, the following be inserted:—

“1. That the General Offices of the Canada Southern Railway Company, that is to say, the various Departmental Offices necessary for the management of the said Company and its lines of railway, including the offices under the management and control of the Treasurer of the said Company and the various works properly thereto belonging, and the principal workshops of the said Company, shall be permanently established in the town of St. Thomas, in the county of Elgin, in the Province of Ontario.”

His reason for proposing the amendment was simply that, at the time the charter for this railway had been obtained, and when proceedings were being initiated for its construction, the promoters came into the county of Elgin, as well as into the other counties through which this line passed, for the purpose of receiving assistance; not for the purpose of asking municipalities to take stock in the Company, but to ask them to grant bonuses which the Company, through the new Provincial Act under which it was incorporated, was empowered to receive, and which the municipalities had the authority to give. The town of St. Thomas was mentioned in the Act of Incorporation of 1874, which made this railway a Dominion railway. In that Act it was provided that this railway should pass through the town of St. Thomas, which was situated midway between the extremities of this line. The citizens of St. Thomas and of the county had been led to believe that they would derive great advantages from the establishment of this line. Both municipalities, namely, the municipality of the town and that of the county, had been besought by the promoters of the enterprise, both his hon. friend from Welland and the President of the company, to grant aid in the shape of a bonus, a gratuitous grant, not to take stock in it—no equivalent of that kind was to be given the municipalities in consideration of their grant—but that it should be given simply as a bonus. The people had been led to believe, at that time, that the advantages to be derived from the railroad would compensate them for the amount of money they would contribute, and for which they would be taxed. Believing they would obtain a quid pro quo for their money, they consented to pass a by-law in the county, and subsequently one was passed in the town, granting the aid asked for. At the time the by-law was passed in the county, it was asserted by the promoters of the railway scheme that it would be of great advantage to that municipality, that it would increase the value of property, help to increase its population, and that they intended to make that county their headquarters, to establish there all their principal offices and workshops, in short they were to make it the headquarters of the company. During the discussion at the time that by-law was passed, certain conditions were spoken of, to be specified in that by-law, with a view to binding the contractor to the performance of certain conditions. The promoters of the railway were desirous that the conditions should not be expressed in the by-law, on the ground, as they said, that such might affect the sale of the debentures; not the sale of the bonds, but simply the sale of the debentures of the municipality itself. He was aware it was sought to make confusion between the bonds and the debentures of the municipality; but this had no relation, and did not in any possible way affect the bonds afterwards issued by the railway company as such, but, on the contrary, related entirely to debentures that were issued by that municipality. Relying, then, on the good faith and promise of those gentlemen that they would carry out what was proposed to be done, the by-law was passed on the terms required by them, and debentures were issued which had realized $200,000. Subsequent to that time the town of St. Thomas was asked to contribute also to assist the railway. It did contribute $20,000, not in the way of purchasing stock, but as a gratuitous grant to the railway company. Preliminary negotiations took place from time to time; conversations and interviews were had with the promoters of the railway with respect to this particular matter; and, at last, when the fullest assurances were given, so as to convince the citizens of the town that they would receive all the advantages that possibly could be obtained from establishing the headquarters of the company at that place, the grant was made. Not only was the grant of $20,000 made, but likewise a by-law was passed exempting the company from taxation for a number of years—as far as his recollection served him, for ten years from the passage of the by-law, which was of itself of considerable importance. They were told by the President of the railway company that he proposed to remove from St. Thomas one of the most important offices connected with the company, namely, the treasurer, and if he were to leave, a number of persons who were also employed in the office would accompany him, and thus the population and taxable property of the municipality would be reduced. But that was not the only disadvantage under which they would suffer. There was also the loss of prestige. Property would be depreciated and general disadvantage would arise if such a result should take place. In another place, the Bill had been amended by inserting a provision that the offices and workshops of the company should be in Canada, but while that might be complied with to the letter, yet it might confer no possible advantage on St. Thomas, for they might be placed just across the line, and the company still be within the letter of the law. However, half a loaf was better than no bread, and there was an advantage in having the offices in Canada. He had discussed that question in another place, and the point was conceded. The proposition which he now submitted for the consideration of the Committee, and which he hoped might be adopted as an amendment to the Bill, was not reported upon by the Railway Committee; but he felt it his duty to submit it to the Committee of the Whole, believing hon. members would give it that consideration which it deserved. He believed hon. members who were well acquainted with the manner in which railway companies acted under similar circumstances would declare there was nothing in the amendment that did not deserve, at their hands, the fullest consideration and adoption as a portion of the Bill. Nor did he see it would in any way affect the railway company prejudicially. They must have their headquarters in Canada; they had been, so far, located in St. Thomas, and expended money there, all of which went to show it had been a great convenience to be established there; and, indeed, if this was to be a Canadian railway at all, the town where they had, hitherto, established their headquarters should be the place where they should still remain. As would be seen by the provisions of the Bill, it proposed to make the Canada Southern a link in the chain of an immense system of American railways. He had no objection whatever to its being so called, and he did not wish to prejudice the minds of any members of the Committee. He did not refer to it for that purpose, but to show them that by its being connected in that manner evidently the object had been, and, perhaps, still was, to operate the road, not from any part of Canada, but from another country; and those people who had contributed to assist the railway, and who invested their money in it, and had been led to believe, by the assurance and representations made to them, that the town of St. Thomas would be the headquarters of the railway, that all the advantages to be obtained from that fact would accrue to them, would be deceived. He submitted if, under these circumstances, it was not reasonable to ask the railway company that, at this time, when it came before Parliament asking for legislation upon that particular matter, it should be ready to adopt, as part of the measure, such a provision as was contained in the amendment which he now had the honour to submit to the Committee.

MR. THOMSON (Welland) said he had always maintained before the Railway Committee and on the floor of the House that there never was a promise or pledge made to the town of St. Thomas which had not been fulfilled. Everything that was ever agreed to be performed by the railway company to that town was embodied in a written agreement which the authorities had got and possessed. He held in his hand the St. Thomas Journal, a newspaper entirely favourable to the hon. member for East Elgin, and it contained a report of a meeting of the County Council which took place on March 5th. Mr. Artle, the Mayor of the town, at the time the agreement was executed and signed, discussing the subject, said:

"He was rather surprised when he first heard rumours throwing blame on him for not giving information about the existence of the agreement. The fact was he had forgotten all about it. He was still more surprised when he read in the Ottawa correspondence of the Journal what appeared to be a slur on him, touching his neglect of duty. His explanation of the matter was that there had been but one by-law regarding the bonus of the C.S.R. ever submitted to the people, and Mr. Macdougall had drawn it.

MR. MACDOUGALL.

Previous to this, another by-law had been drafted, stipulating that 300 workmen should be employed at the shops, and with the understanding that the offices would be located in St. Thomas, but the promoters of the road would not listen to it. About three weeks after the by-law first referred to had passed its third reading, he, as Mayor, signed the agreement in terms of the by-law, as a matter of course."

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin):
Read on.

MR. THOMSON (Welland) said he did not think there was anything more necessary to be read. All the railway company ever offered the town of St. Thomas was embodied in the agreement; it promised to build a railway running through the very heart of the town, to raise it from a poor village to a rich one, which the company had done, and to put up workshops which also had been done; and, indeed, they had spent five or six times the amount of money they had agreed to spend. The company, therefore, felt that representatives of that town had no right to come to Parliament and endeavour to interfere with domestic legislation respecting bondholders and everything else, and no right to interfere in a business transaction between the financial people inside the company, when the arrangement with the town was an outside transaction. Reference had been made about removing offices, but they had nothing to do with that matter, and it was assumption on their part to interfere, as the Bill had passed the Railway Committee, after a severe contest, and after it had been opposed by as able men as there were in this House. He had nothing further to say on behalf of the Canada Southern Railway Company and himself, as the promoter of the Bill in Parliament, than that they intended to act honourably and give fair play and justice to all parties concerned, and that they had no intention to do any harm to St. Thomas or any other portion of Canada. The attempt of those persons to interfere with the company's legislation was vexatious, unfair and unjust.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said he desired to offer an explanation; his name had been mentioned in the report of the proceedings to which reference had been made. It was true that a year or so before the transaction to which the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Thomson) had referred, occurred, he was called upon in his professional capacity to draft a by-law for the Town Clerk of that municipality. It contained stringent conditions, and was submitted to the town and passed; but the promoters of the Canada Southern Company did not see fit to accept it, the reason given being that stringent provisions, which were inserted, would prevent the company disposing of their debentures as successfully as they would otherwise do. Subsequently, the President of the company visited St. Thomas and said they could not accept the by-law because it contained certain provisions which, although they were ready to carry them out, they did not wish to have exposed, because they would affect the sale of the debentures. He (Mr. Macdougall) would not have risen if the hon. member for Welland had read, as he asked him to do, the whole of proceedings of the County Council. It was true Mr. Artle made a reference in the Council to him (Mr. Macdougall), as had been stated, but the Town Clerk followed with this statement:

"The By-law drawn up by Mr. Macdougall was not the one that passed, but that which was rejected by the promoters a year before."

That was the case, and the hon. member for Welland, in justice to him (Mr. Macdougall), should have made that statement at that time.

MR. CASEY said the hon. member for Welland had, at the close of his remarks, attempted to show that the hon. member for East Elgin was responsible for the arrangement that actually existed between St. Thomas and the railway company.

MR. THOMSON: I never made such a statement.

MR. CASEY said that was the drift of the quotations read by that hon. member from the newspaper. He had quoted from the St. Thomas Journal to show that Mr. Macdougall had drawn the by-law which finally passed, and settled the agreement between the parties. The hon. member for East Elgin had asked the hon. gentleman to continue the quotation, which would have shown that the hon. member for

East Elgin had not drawn the by-law which had settled the agreement between the company and St. Thomas. It would not have injured the cause of the promoter of the Bill if he had seen fit to continue the quotation, and done justice to the hon. member for East Elgin, as he was requested, and not left the impression on the House that that gentleman had agreed to the conditions which he now complained of. He would pass to the amendment under consideration. They asked for the amendment which had been moved by his colleague, first, on the ground that there was an implied bargain between the parties. The hon. member for Welland had said that the promise was not a written agreement between the town and the company. This they denied, and their denial they supported by evidence. They held first that, not only was there an extra agreement over and above a written one between the town and the company, but also an implied bargain between the county and the company, between whom no writing existed, and against whom (that was, the county) no writing could be pleaded in bar of the other demands. It was the testimony of gentlemen who appeared before the Railway Committee, who had been connected with the railway agitation, that, when the bonus was given to the railway—some of them were in the Council at the time—the general impression had been produced in the course of the canvass that the offices would be located in St. Thomas, and it was certainly a commentary on this that, shortly after the bonus was given, these offices were removed to St. Thomas, as if in furtherance of an agreement. They had formerly been at Fort Erie. So much for the evidence which proved the existence of an implied bargain. The written agreement, he held, was not capable of being brought forward in bar of an implied agreement over and above it. They were told that their interference with the legislation of the company was vexatious, unjust and unfair—language verging very closely on the limit of what was parliamentary—but he maintained that, even in a matter of this sort, they had a right to interfere, and that this was not domestic legislation pure and simple. Any legislation asked for by a railway company was capable of affecting, and generally did affect, many interests outside of those of the company itself; and, therefore, this might be looked upon as public, although it was technically private, legislation. Therefore, it was not only the privilege, but also the duty of any member of the House to interfere with their so-called domestic legislation, and to try to mould it in such form that any public interest should not suffer; and more especially was it the duty of the representatives of the localities particularly affected by such legislation to interfere, and endeavour to mould it in the interests of their constituents. If there was no written or implied bargain in this case, still they had a right to ask for what they did: the location of the offices at a certain fixed point on the road. As a general rule, railway companies should be compelled to act in the public interest, and not with an exclusive regard to their own. By a public interest, he meant not only the interests of the country at large, but the interests of the section of the country in particular for whose service these companies were incorporated, and in consideration of which service they were given such powers and privileges. Every railway company did get these powers and privileges, and they were, or should be, expected to consider the interests of the public, and especially those of the particular section in which they worked. This particular company had not only had these privileges, but also a large bonus from the section of the country in question; and whether there was any agreement or not between them, if what they asked could be shown to be in the interests of that section, it had a right to demand that the railway company should conform to it on certain conditions, provided that their demand did no injustice to anybody else in the premises, and was not unduly onerous on the company itself. What was asked for in his hon. friend's amendment, was for the public convenience. The point at which he asked for the location of the offices was the most central on the road, being situated at the junction of the branch and the main line; and it was the only important point near the middle, between the two ends of the road. Evidently this was the most convenient place at which to have the offices for the convenience of the general public dealing with the road, and who wished to visit its offices. This was as nearly as possible equidistant between the points to which the road ran, and it must be most convenient of access to those who had anything to do at the offices of the company. Therefore, this was for the public convenience. It was especially convenient for the town of St. Thomas in several ways; not only as regarded business, but also with reference to the considerable gain derived by its inhabitants from the location of the offices amongst them—a location which they had always been led to consider permanent. He held, therefore, that the condition was admissible, provided that it was not unduly onerous to the company; and it had not been attempted to be shown that such was the case in any degree, either before the Committee or before this Committee of the Whole, or that the maintenance of the offices at that point would be in any way injurious to the interests of the Canada Southern Railway, as a Canadian railway. The only argument brought forward in favour of the removal of the offices, had been that it would be more convenient for the present President of the road to have the treasurer within easy reach of himself, in order to conveniently consult him on all matters; but, as he had stated before the Committee, the President was an ephemeral being—here to-day and perhaps in New York to-morrow—and it was certainly absurd to ask that the offices should be moved after him wherever the President went. If anything should be done in this regard, the President should go after the offices, and not the offices after the President. There was no reason why they should not, from consideration for the company, insert this provision in the Bill, or why the company should not agree to it. They had the testimony before the Committee of the promoters of the Bill, who told them that the engineer of the road said that Fort Erie, where the offices were then located, was no place for them, and that they must either go to Buffalo or St. Thomas; and that they had decided to go to St. Thomas. It was now settled that they could not go to Buffalo, and, therefore, St. Thomas was preferable to Fort Erie, which was near the present residence of the head of the road, and it was preferable to any other point more distant from it; consequently, St. Thomas was most preferable for the business of the company of all places in Canada, and the company could have no particular reason for objecting to accepting this provision of the Bill; and, if the company did not accept it, the House could put it in for them.

Amendment negatived.

MR. CASEY said he had an amendment to move to the second section. He added that the words from "revenues" to "working expenses," inclusive, be expunged and the following inserted:—

"Provided always that all the property of the said company other than real estate be liable to be taken in execution for debts contracted for working expenses.

The working expenses were properly defined in the remainder of the section. In the past, it had been almost the universal experience of parties along the line of the road dealing with them, either in the way of furnishing supplies or work, that the road had either been unable or unwilling to pay them and, consequently, they had not been paid; and when they had recourse to law in the ordinary form, they were told that all the property, real and personal, of the railway was held under the first mortgage bonds of the company, and, therefore, could not be taken in execution to satisfy their debts. With this provision of the law hanging over them, they found they had to accept whatever the company liked to offer. Sometimes the company chose to offer 50c. on the dollar cash, sometimes the full amount in second mortgage bonds at par, and sometimes greenbacks at par, and, in very few cases, they had paid the full amount of the claims. These parties could absolutely have no recourse to justice in order to enable them to collect their dues. This matter was brought under the consideration of the promoters of the Bill, and they consented to insert this present section, which was not of their own proposing, and it was subsequently adopted. This second section provided that "all claims for working expenses, such as therein defined, shall be a first lien on the gross earnings of the road, before any payment of dividend and interest," etc ; and it was held by the promoters that this was quite sufficient to meet the case. He admitted that it was, perhaps, sufficient in the case of large creditors for supplies, or rent, or charges, such as those of the Inter-colonial Bridge Company, which had a contested claim of $75,000 against the company, but he did not admit that this was the case in their regard, for it was very possible that the earnings of the road might not be sufficient to meet these claims. It had been held by the company's officers, in the past, that the gross earnings had not met all claims, and that, therefore, these had not been paid. To make them a first lien was not absolute security, even in the case of large claims; and, with regard to small claims, the matter was very different. The only mode of enforcing this section was by an expensive suit in Chancery, which took a great deal of time and cost a great deal of money; and the road might then be put in the hands of a receiver to administrate its affairs and pay claims; but, it was plain that creditors for small sums, such as for wages, wood supplies, etc., were utterly unable to take advantage of such a provision; and, therefore, they still had no remedy whatever against the company. Several arguments had been adduced against his proposition. One had been that, if the people who dealt once with the road found that it dealt dishonestly, unfairly with them, they were not bound to deal with it again. This he considered fallacious. It would apply equally to the case of a private individual, and it would be equally fair to say that a man who dealt the second time with a person who he found cheated him, should have no remedy at law. This was evidently the reductio ad absurdum. Another argument against it was that it would injure the security held by the bond-holders; no doubt any execution enforced would, to a certain extent, damage the security held by the bond-holders; but there were two or three reasons why he thought his proposition was fair. The bond-holders really owned the road; they had a right to appoint a receiver, and if they waived this right, they did not, therefore, escape the responsibility connected with the road; therefore, if they had a right to any revenues of the road, they had also a right to pay its expenses; and as no revenue could be really earned until the working expenses were paid, the House had a just right to compel them to pay these expenses out of the revenue, if possible, and if not, out of the actual property of the road. In the second place, a person buying the bonds of a railway, as a rule, must take all the chances of depreciation connected with the road; and if it was carelessly managed by the chief officers, his security suffered depreciation in the same manner as under this Bill a bond-holder took his chances, and if it suffered depreciation in order to pay the working expenses, he did not think that the House would hold that the bond-holder was unfairly treated. It was equal to saying that no man's security should be depreciated in order to pay his just debts, and the individual in this instance, was at once a creditor and an owner of the road—a bond-holder. Another objection was that this was not a provision that should be put in a private Bill, but in the General Railway Act. There was, perhaps, some force in this objection, although he confessed he was not able to see why, if it was sound in principle and fit to form part of the General Railway Act, it should not be inserted in a private Act as a condition on which certain favours were granted. The company had broken up the old arrangement existing between the bondholders and the road, and proposed to reorganize the whole affair, and he did not see why this provision, admitted by a great many to be sound, if applied as a general principle, should not be inserted. It was also said that exceptional legislation regarding this company would not be fair. The legislation asked for by the company was exceptional; and what he proposed was to put it on the same ground with most other companies. In the case of the Grand Trunk Railway, the first mortgage bond-holders had a first lien on nearly all the property of the company; but, even in the case of this great corporation, the fuel was excepted from this rule, so that fuel could be seized along the road by the creditors for supplies and wages. With regard to the Canada Southern, however, there was absolutely no recourse whatever. He thought that he had shown prima facie, at all events until his points had been controverted, that this provision did no injustice to anybody, and certainly it was necessary to secure justice for a large section of the people who lived along the road and to whom justice was refused. He hoped that the House would be inclined to do justice in the matter.

MR. PLUMB said he thought it would be remembered that the provisions of this Bill had been very carefully discussed and examined in the Railway Committee. He did not recollect any Bill which had come before the House that had been more carefully scrutinized. He confessed that, for his part, he examined the Bill with an eye of great jealousy. He thought there were provisions in it which it was very desirable that every member of the Committee should carefully examine for himself in order to protect the rights of all parties concerned. When the Bill came before the Committee they found that everything had been done in a very systematic and business-like manner. The first mortgage bond-holders of the Canada Southern Road were virtually, as the hon. member for West Elgin had very properly said, owners of the road, holding, as they did, a good deal more than two-thirds of the interest therein. The interest on these bonds was then three or four years in arrear, but they consented to waive their claim for that interest, which amounted to 25 or 28 per cent. They also consented to waive for three years the difference between 7 per cent., which they were entitled to on their bond, and 3 per cent. for their railway interest, which amounted to 12 per cent. more. They further consented, for the whole twenty years during which their bonds ran, to take 5 per cent. instead of 7. That was the basis upon which the first mortgage bond-holders consented to the scheme for settling the debts of the Canada Southern Railway. No such liability rested upon them like that which the hon. member for West Elgin proposed, and he (Mr. Plumb) did not think they should be hampered by such a provision as that contained in the amendment to the 2nd section. In addition to that, the holders of other bills, which would have been preferential, consented to a compromise upon their securities, many of which were taken at the rate of 30c. or 40c. on the dollar. As a member of the sub-Committee, he must confess, though with great reluctance, that hon. gentlemen opposite seemed disposed to retard the passage of the Bill. These gentlemen too, be it remembered, were permitted, though not members of the Committee, to be present while the Bill was under consideration and to state their objections. Every courtesy was extended to them, and every opportunity given to them to state their views in the best possible manner in which their case could be presented. The Bill, after being reported to the Railway Committee, was passed by them with a very slight change, and that change, he believed, was made in deference to the wishes of these gentlemen who now opposed it. No piece of legislation in regard to railways had ever been more carefully and thoroughly scrutinized in Committee, and he should like the Bill to be promoted in the interests of the public, not for local or private interests, which he felt sure the House would not take cognizance of. They were told by the gentleman who had just addressed the House at considerable length, that the security of the bond-holders was not to be regarded in legislation of this kind.

MR. CASEY: No.

MR. PLUMB said he begged the hon. gentleman's pardon, but he said that this claim would endanger the securities of the bond-holders. The hon. gentleman must admit that, if the property of a company, such as the rolling stock, was liable at any moment to seizure, and the railway to be stopped from running, the security of the bond-holders was nil. This was illustrated by an attempt at legislation in such cases which was made in Ontario. By the taking away of the necessary plant and appliances for the earning of money, a railway was good for nothing. He did not understand, therefore, why certain hon. gentlemen should be so careful of the interests of the national creditor or those who owned what might be called the floating debt, and they were told by the treasurer of the company that there was no default in any of the floating debt except prior to December last. There was no need to protect a creditor who was a voluntary creditor after all, and if the House did so they were placing themselves in a false position. The section to which he particularly referred contained one of the most important principles that could affect railway legislation, and had been proposed by gentlemen who were interested in promoting the success of the railway by keeping it running. A great deal had been said about its being a foreign corporation. Now, he had always understood that we were anxious to bring foreign capital into Canada, and it would, he felt convinced, be a most unfortunate thing for the whole Dominion if the Parliament set themselves against the investment of foreign capital in Canadian railways. Who built the Grand Trunk? Who brought the money to build the Great Western and other large railways? Were they not outside or foreign capitalists? If so, he trusted hon. gentlemen would withdraw their opposition to the Bill, now that it had been properly discussed.

MR. CASEY said he had no desire to hamper the progress of this Bill through the House so long as it did not interfere with his constituents or those represented by other gentlemen in that House. The only object which he and his friends had in view was to make railway companies pay their legal debts. What he proposed in his amendment was to take past due claims for floating debt, and make them first mortgage claims upon the road. Under this arrangement debts contracted in the past would be made first mortgage claims, and he hoped the same rule would apply to debts contracted in the future. There was, certainly, a danger that evil would result from the stoppage of the road, and, if his hon. friend proposed an amendment requiring a certificate that the road should not be stopped and that the rolling stock should not be interfered with, he would be willing to accept it, provided that it was satisfactory to the House, and that rolling stock was not protected by first mortgage bonds. In the present case they were informed by the solicitor for the road that the floating debt amounted to $240,000, and the men's wages were paid up to December in depreciated currency, or second mortgage bonds, or else 50 per cent. of their claim was deducted. He did not wish to press this to a division, but if the leaders of the House would not agree to some modification, he would bring his amendment to a vote at a subsequent stage.

MR. MITCHELL said he objected to the principle of the Bill, but not wishing to make a long speech regarding it, he would reserve his remarks till the third reading.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said that, before the third clause was adopted, he had an amendment to propose. He was much obliged to the hon. member for Niagara for the amount of time and attention he had thought fit to devote in regard to the point raised by him. The hon. gentleman told them that the measure had been fully discussed by the sub-Committee of the Railway Committee, and that the House should, therefore, be satisfied. He knew that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Plumb) possessed a great deal of knowledge with regard to railways; he knew that he possessed a great deal of influence and a great deal of power. He knew also, as a matter of fact, that he did not take up much time in this House, and, of course, he could, without any feeling of modesty whatever, turn round and say to any other hon. member, "You are taking up the time of this Committee; you have no right to do so because I do not do so." Inasmuch as he (Mr. Macdougall) regarded that gentleman's vast ability, his great statesmanship, and his wonderful knowledge, he felt inclined to obey him, but he felt that he had a duty to perform; he was standing in this House as the representative of the people, and felt that he ought to make himself heard, notwithstanding the powerful dictum of the hon. member for Niagara, who had decided otherwise. Now, he maintained, they had a right to appeal to the gentlemen on that Committee, and, if not satisfied, they might appeal to this House. They had a right to do so, and he submitted that the hon. gentleman, who sometimes took one view and sometimes the other, had no right to say that his (Mr. Macdougall's) colleague and himself, and those who sympathized with them, should not be heard by this Committee. He would not say an insinuation, because that was an unparliamentary term, but something like it had been thrown out that they were there for the purpose of taking up the time of this Committee, and not for advancing the public interest. They believed that they were advancing the public interest, and they protested against it being said that they were here for the purpose of hampering this railway scheme. He would appeal to the hon. gentlemen who had been on the Standing Committee on Railways, as well as the sub-Committee, that they did not wish to embarrass the Railway Company or to hamper them. They stated their case clearly and plainly, and they asked that, inasmuch as the Railway Company was coming to this Parliament for the purpose of asking the Parliament to do equity to it, Parliament themselves should take this opportunity of seeing that the complaints, the grievances, the wishes and requests of the people should be made known. They had endeavoured, in their humble way, for, of course, they could not hope to do it so eloquently and succinctly as the hon. member for Niagara would, to put their views before the Committee; and, notwithstanding that hon. member might veer about and change his opinions, they were determined to maintain their opinions to the end. There was no foundation for the statement that they objected to this company as an American concern, and he did not wish the minds of the Committee to be prejudiced by the statement to this effect. Upon all occasions his desire was to invite and bring in every possible way all the capital they could into the country, no matter where it came from; but, at the same time, the rights of our own people should be properly secured and no undue advantage given to a body of people, no matter whether they were Canadians or belonged to another country. He did think the lecture given to them by the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) was out of place. The treatment he had given them was not the treatment he had received from him (Mr. Macdougall). He was told by the hon. member that, because this matter had been discussed before by some four or five members of the Committee, they had no right to appeal against their decision. This was the sense of justice the hon. member for Niagara had. His ability was vast, his knowledge was great, according to his (Mr. Plumb) own estimate, if they took that as a gauge, but he thought there was probably a little for him to learn yet, that there was something more to add to his philosophy, great though it might be. He moved that the following section be inserted between the second section and the third:

"That no Bond, Coupon, Debenture, Mortgage or other security which has been, or shall be issued by the Company shall, by reason of any lien, charge, incumbrance or preferential claim on the revenue, assets or property of the Company of any kind or nature whatsoever, be held or construed to prevent a judgment or decree against the property of the Company for a debt incurred for working expenses as hereinbefore defined, from being enforced by execution. Provided that no actual levy shall be made by virtue of such execution without an order or certificate being made by a Judge of the Court in which such judgment or decree has been obtained, stating that in his opinion proceedings upon such execution shall not stop the traffic of the Company."

Now, the hon. member for Niagara and the supporters of the Bill objected to a lien for wages, etc., on the stock of the company, their argument being that it might stop the progress of trade and interfere with the working of the railway. All he asked was this: unless the Judge of the Court who issued execution was satisfied that the traffic of the line would not be interfered with, then the execution would not issue. It might be said that there was sufficient machinery created by the second section to cover this. To a certain extent there was. It was provided by this section that a receiver might be provided. They must bear in mind that this road lay entirely in the Province of Ontario. The receiver was a man appointed by the Court of Chancery for the purpose of taking the road in his control, and taking the receipts of it to administer them to the parties to whom debts were due. It was the smaller class of creditors who suffered the greatest irritation. The majority of cases would arise from these small claims that had not been paid by the railway company, or either paid in second mortgage bonds or depreciated currency, or at less than the debts were worth. Supposing this amendment was not adopted, and these small claims were dealt with under the second clause of this Bill. In a case where judgment had been obtained for the small sum of $40 in the Division Court, did they suppose the holder of the judgment would go to the trouble of taking a journey to Toronto, and of getting legal aid for the purpose of having a receiver appointed. Of course his execution would not attach to anything, as the Bill was at present; the only possible way of obtaining redress was to have a receiver appointed, and, in many cases, a man would rather lose his claim than go to the trouble and expense of having a receiver appointed. If a lien was allowed, and there was a quantity of wood or other material on the line, the execution might be satisfied without the traffic being at all affected. If this was correct, and he held that it was correct, there would be no interference with the bondholders of the railway. If the railway company desired to do justice to those to whom they were indebted, and met their debts promptly, there would be no occasion to resort to this; but the introduction of this amendment would give assurance to the people who had dealt with them in the past, and who were considerably irritated by the want of punctuality the company had displayed, that they now had power to compel the company to meet their debts in the way provided in this Bill.

MR. CHARLTON said he considered the resolutions should be embodied in a general law applicable to all railways, and he saw no impropriety in embodying them in the Bill now before the Committee. The Canada Southern Railway Company had managed their business in such a way as to create a very great deal of dissatisfaction and bad feeling along the line of route, and he thought the people along that line of route had a right to ask this Parliament that their rights should be protected. There was no means of giving them a really practical remedy except the equitable proposition contained in the resolutions, and he hoped the House would see fit to insert those resolutions in the Bill now before them.

Amendment negatived.

MR. STEPHENSON said several of the speakers who had preceded him had spoken very fully on this subject, and had in many instances expressed his ideas to a certain extent, and as the Standing Committee on Railways and the sub-Committee had incorporated in the Bill a number of suggestions that he had presented before them, he could now only insist on putting the following provision in the Bill, in order to compel this railway company to meet a certain class of claims incurred by them, and which they had forced the settlement of, by the giving of bonds to the holders of these claims. These bonds were given at a greatly reduced rate, for instance, first mortgage bonds at 85c. on the dollar were given to some creditors; to other parties at a further reduced rate, while again to other creditors second mortgage bonds had been given at 75c. on the dollar, and so on. Now, the Bill before the Committee proposed that these bonds should be paid into the Union Trust Company at New York, and the present holders of them should receive no interest, four years of which was now due, but, and in lieu of them, the holders should be given other bonds of the issue provided for in the measure to which he had alluded. The holders of these bonds were not bond-holders in the ordinary sense of the word; they were not men who had speculated their money in the railway; but they were forced to receive these bonds in payment of claims for cordwood, ties, and other supplies furnished the company in order to complete the road and keep it running, at a period of its history when, if these supplies had not been forthcoming, the line would have come to a standstill. He held that the company were in honour bound to wipe off these small obligations—small when compared with the other class of liabilities proposed to be dealt with—and, if they were small, so much the greater reason, to his mind, was it that they should be paid promptly and in full. He might add that many of the parties who had taken these bonds—or rather who had literally been forced to take them—were at present in financial straits themselves—possibly in as great financial embarrassment as this company which now asked relief—and this company, coming forward before this House and seeking to obtain privileges which, probably, would be granted, or partially so at all events, were it running the road through the very best part of the country, and having facilities given which were not possessed by any other road in the country, should not be placed in the same position as the Grand Trunk Railway; that is, this House ought to secure in some way, if only for the benefit of the few creditors in whose behalf he spoke, any special funds accruing to the company. As many members of this Committee of the Whole House, who were members of the Railway Committee and of the sub-Committee would remember, he had proposed that a clause similar to that in the Grand Trunk Act of 1862, which provided that all moneys received for postal and military services should be held to pay off all floating debts, should be inserted in this Bill, and, at the time his resolution was offered, it was not objected to. If the Grand Trunk Company were compelled to set apart—and they did set apart—in order to carry their floating debt, the money accruing to them from postal services, military and other services, he could not understand why the Canada Southern should not do likewise. This, it was true, had not been included in the first Bill; but, in a later Bill, it was made obligatory; so with the Bill now before the House. The second clause, after a good deal of controversy, had been amended; so that, in the Bill which was now before the House, it was provided that all those debts which were defined as "working expenses," and which had not been settled for by bonds, should be settled in cash from the first money realized from the sale of the proposed new issue of bonds. It was but fair and honest that those who had been compelled to take these bonds in payment of their claims against the company, should be placed in the same position as those parties included in the second section to which he had referred, and which had been so reluctantly inserted by the projectors of the Bill. He therefore moved :

That the Bill be recommitted in order to amend the third clause by adding the following words: "Provided that any party who, for the purpose of settling his claims against said company for 'working expenses,' has received bond or bonds of said company, and is still the owner of such bond or bonds, shall be considered and treated in the same manner as if the company had not settled such claim by the issue of such bonds, and the amount of such bond or bonds shall be considered and treated as a debt incurred and held by the said company on the 12th day of March, 1878, as provided by said section."

MR. MACKENZIE: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the principle of his amendment is that people who had taken bonds in settlement of their claims shall be entitled to have these bonds cashed in full at their par value?

MR. STEPHENSON: These parties who now hold in their possession bonds given in payment of supplies rendered to the company, and which are now classed as "working expenses," should certainly be placed in the same position as those creditors included in the second clause, who are to be paid in full. His wish and intention was, by his resolution, that this class of creditors should be placed back in the same position as though they had never received the bonds at all, it having been patent that they had received them under false representations, and only because they were told that if they did not accept them that they could get nothing else, and would be compelled to forego their whole debt.

MR. MACKENZIE: It would be a dangerous thing for us to give certain bonds a preferential claim over others; it would be an unprecedented and perfectly monstrous class of legislation.

MR. TUPPER said it would, certainly, if it were done under ordinary circumstances; but he understood the proposal of his hon. friend from Kent to relate only to parties who could clearly establish the fact that these bonds had been forced on them, and not purchased as a matter of speculation, but forced upon them at a heavy discount.

MR. MACKENZIE. It is impossible they could be forced on them.

MR. TUPPER said he knew nothing, personally, of the facts. He understood by the statement of his hon. friend that certain parties had become creditors of the railway for supplies furnished to assist in running the road. There were no creditors so entitled to claim from the earnings or the means of any road or corporation as those who had furnished the means of keeping the road in operation. He understood his hon. friend to say that he only asked that those parties who had been compelled to take those bonds at a heavy discount or receive nothing in payment of their claims, should be treated as creditors who had not thus accepted bonds in settlement of their claims. Of course there would be some difficulty perhaps in establishing the claims of certain bond-holders over others, but that would have to be so guarded against as to confine the payment under this clause to those parties who could prove that they had furnished supplies to keep the road in operation, and had been obliged to accept these bonds at a certain rate of discount or nothing. This being done, there would be no wrong done to any person in putting those creditors in the most favourable position.

MR. STEPHENSON.

MR. MACKENZIE said, did the hon. member wish to have a Court of investigation established to enquire into the particular circumstances attending the purchase of every bond? or how could he ascertain that a certain class of bonds were to obtain some preferential claim? In order to legislate in that connection, the allegation should have been proved before a Committee that these people had been forced to take certain bonds, but nothing of the kind had been done. The bond-holders were all upon a certain footing, and it would be the most extraordinary piece of legislation ever perpetrated, to give a certain class of bond-holders preference over others. He could not conceive of a more mischievous kind of legislation. He could quite understand that many of these people, despairing of getting paid, agreed to take bonds, but the moment they took the bonds they became simply bond-holders.

MR. STEPHENSON: They were a little too simple before they took the bonds.

MR. MACKENZIE: And were not more entitled to full payment than any other parties who had taken the bonds. There had been a loss all over, and there was no reason why they should endeavour to discriminate, nor had they the material to discriminate. They would require to establish a Court for the purpose, to prepare a procedure, and embody it in the Bill. This would be a kind of procedure perfectly unprecedented. The conclusion he had arrived at was that the amendment was practically one which could not be carried out.

MR. TUPPER said he could hardly imagine the hon. the Minister of Public Works meant what he said when he stated to the Committee that he considered that bond-holders who had furnished supplies or labour in good faith, believing they would receive payment in money, and then were compelled to accept bonds at a heavy discount for the proceeds of their labour or supplies, had no greater claim on the company than the speculator who had purchased these bonds under the impression that he was doing a good business transaction which would yield him a large return; yet aware, of course, that he ran the risk of meeting a loss. The positions were entirely different. The claims of bond-holders who had purchased the bonds as a matter of speculation were entirely different from the claims of those parties mentioned by his hon. friend, who had become bond-holders against their will and contrary to their intention. He could quite understand the difficulty of meeting the case, but, if these amounts were inconsiderable, why should not the promoters undertake to pay these parties and place them in as favourable a position as parties who had not had these bonds forced upon them at a heavy discount.

MR. THOMSON said he did not think that any of the second mortgage bonds, which were paid at heavy depreciation by the company, had been given for running the road. The second mortgage bonds of the company were practically valueless as long as the first mortgage bonds existed, and the effect of this Bill was to make the second mortgage bond a first mortgage bond, with interest guaranteed, which would make the position of the holder fifty per cent. better than before.

MR. CASEY said no doubt the case was one of great hardship. These people had practically been forced to take these bonds in payment of their claims. Of course the House must remember that they could have refrained from taking the bonds and still have held their claim, and waited for the time Parliament would see fit to provide a means by which they could secure justice, but they chose to take what they could get and give a clear receipt. He was not prepared, off hand, to vote for the amendment of his hon. friend. He did not see that it was legal. Although these parties had been cheated out of their just dues by the company, he did not believe that illegal means should be taken to right their wrongs.

MR. STEPHENSON said, after what had been stated by the hon. the First Minister, he felt it necessary to reaffirm the position he had taken before the Railway Committee and adduce the same facts which he had there made use of, and would, therefore, read some extracts from one letter out of the great many he had received on this subject. The letter stated:

"You are likely aware that the Dominion Parliament allowed them (the C. S. R. Company) to mortgage all the property that they now own, and which they may acquire in future; and, also, that property held by a chattel mortgage cannot be seized or sold for debt. We seized the wood at different points on the road, and the result was we had to pay our own expenses and release the wood. The company then told me that the law held them out of my reach, and that if I did not take $1,000 in second mortgage bonds, they would not pay me a cent, and that they would not renew their paper. Well, they owed me a large sum and I had to be relieved some way, so I took the bond for part and their paper for the balance, which paper they finally lifted at seventy-five cents on the dollar; and now they have applied to Parliament for new license to rob Canadians. I trust you will do all in your power to stop the Bill and let us hold the bonds we have, as I believe the road is worth the money, and that the present bond-holders will be safe if they can hold what they have."

MR. THOMSON: Who signed that letter?

MR. STEPHENSON: It is signed by W. C. Fletcher.

MR. MASSON: What is the rate of discount?

MR. STEPHENSON: $2,000 of 1st mortgage bonds at 85c; and $3,000 of 2nd mortgage bonds at 75c. In view of the facts he had stated, he considered his amendment should pass the Committee and be incorporated in the Bill as an addition to the third section.

CHANTRY ISLAND CONTRACT—SHERIFF SUTTON.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. LANDERKIN: Mr. Speaker, before Public Bills and Orders are called, I desire to make an explanation to the House in regard to some observations I offered the other evening while discussing the motion submitted by the hon. member for Charlevoix. I conveyed the impression in the remarks I then made that Sheriff Sutton was a member of the firm of Batter & Sutton, who tendered for the contract at Chantry Island, and that their tender had been passed over, although it was $15,000 less than that of A. Lindsay. I have discovered that Sheriff Sutton was not a member of that firm, and I take this, the very earliest opportunity that has presented itself, to explain to the House that, when I made that statement, I laboured under a misapprehension. I made the statement in perfectly good faith. I supposed Sheriff Sutton was a member of the firm from what appeared in a record submitted to the country by the hon. the Minister of Public Works. In order further to satisfy the House that I made the statement in good faith, I made enquiries from a gentleman who I supposed would know if the Sutton referred to as being a member of the firm of Batter & Sutton were Sheriff Sutton, and I was informed that he was a member of the firm. I take this, the earliest opportunity of stating that I am now informed that he was not a member of that firm. I desire to make this explanation in justice to myself, and, if any injury has been done to Sheriff Sutton, I desire to remedy it, as I would not willingly do an injustice to anybody; indeed, I am most anxious not to state anything but what will be borne out by the facts. The position I then assumed has not, however, been at all changed from the fact that Sheriff Sutton was not a member of the firm of Batter & Sutton, my contention being that that tender had been passed over, and the contract given to Mr. Lindsay, whose tender was $15,000 higher.

RETURNS.

REMARKS.

MR. STEPHENSON called the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works to the fact that on the 11th of March he moved for a return in regard to expenditure in connection with the harbour of Rondeau, and that the return brought down contained no new information beyond that of last year's return, and that it furnished no account of the amount of money expended in connection with this survey.

MR. MACKENZIE said probably some expenditure had been made by the Marine and Fisheries Department; he would look into the matter.

MR. MITCHELL called the attention of the Premier to the motion moved by him last year for all the correspondence and evidence connected with the killing of cattle on the Intercolonial Railway. The return brought down contained nothing but letters between the Department and the claimant, James Nevin. There had, however, been an investigation held and testimony taken, when seven or eight affidavits were furnished by the claimant to confirm the fact stated by him. He hoped the hon. the Premier would bring down those papers in order to show the House the hardship of the case and the injustice of the decision arrived at by the officers of the railroad.

EVIDENCE IN COMMON ASSAULTS BILL.—[BILL No. 3.]

(Mr. Dymond.)

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading read.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD asked if the hon. the Minister of Justice had examined the Bill with respect to the discussion that took place on it in Committee of the Whole.

MR. LAFLAMME said the only point in regard to which there could be doubt was as to the examination of the wife of a defendant, but as it was proposed to introduce that rule only in cases of common assault, and as the Judge was to declare as to the value of the evidence, he could decide in every case whether her evidence afforded ground for suspicion or not. Many cases might occur where the evidence of the defendant and wife might be of great importance, and where there could be no suspicion as to their character, it might be of the utmost value in determining the case; he could see no objection to the Bill passing in its present form.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD enquired whether the hon. member who had charge of the Bill desired it to be understood that the word "information," in the first clause, applied to information in the nature of an indictment or to an information laid before a magistrate.

MR. DYMOND said he understood it to apply to a complaint before a magistrate; but it was proposed to insert the words "complaint or hearing" in order to indicate that it applied to summary trials.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved in amendment:

"That the Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to insert the words 'summary or other,' after the words 'on the' in the first line; the word 'complaint' after the words 'upon any' in the first line, and the words 'for the prosecution or' after 'witness' in the third line of the first section."

He said that, if a defendant was to be a competent witness, he should not only be able to give evidence to clear himself, but should be in a position to be called on behalf of the Crown. It was an anomaly not known to English law that a person could be called as a witness by one side and not by the other.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said the object of the Bill was to give sanction under oath to what a person charged with assault had the option now of doing. Under the thirty-second section of the Act respecting offences against the person, the complainant in cases of assault could ask to have it summarily disposed of. The first section of the present Bill was intended to apply to cases of that description, and that when the defendant was called upon to make his defence, he should be permitted to hear testimony in his own behalf, if he desired to do so. He admitted the anomaly pointed out by the right hon. member for Kingston, but the Committee to which the Bill was referred did not feel justified in making any greater innovations, by compelling the defendant to give testimony for the Crown, as well as in his own behalf.

MR. DYMOND said he believed the Committee hardly felt themselves justified in going so far beyond the original principle of the Bill as to introduce what would be an altogether new feature in our system of jurisprudence. The question was one, of course, for the House to decide, acting under the advice of eminent legal members. The measure, as it was framed, only placed in regular form and legal shape a very old practice. The House would remember that, a year ago, when speaking on this question in a broader sense, he had called attention to the fact that the prohibition by the Courts of the practice of questioning prisoners was comparatively of a recent date; and that, before the Prisoners' Counsel Bill was passed, it was absolutely necessary for a Judge to catechise a prisoner in order to ascertain the nature of his defence. Believing that the main object was the ascertainment of the truth, and that a good deal of superstition was mixed up with the present practice, and the opposition to the examination of persons charged with offences, he would not, personally, have the slightest objection to the change proposed by the right hon. member for Kingston, though it was introducing an entirely new principle. If the hon. the Minister of Justice was willing to accept the amendment, he should be only too glad to see the experiment tried of it being not only permissible for a man to give evidence on his own behalf, but also compellable for him to do so. These were a peculiar class of cases, as had been remarked. The Bill only applied to cases where a sort of ca-di-justice generally was administered, and where the evidence frequently consisted in numerous minute details which no one but the defendant could possibly explain. Under these circumstances, for his own part, he should be only too glad to see the measure carried to the fullest extent indicated by the amendment.

MR. GUTHRIE said he thought there was no reason why the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Kingston should not be adopted. In a similar law, regarding evidence in civil cases, the defendant and his wife were competent, and were compelled to appear as witnesses; these were competent as witnesses for themselves, while they could be compelled to give evidence for the other party. He, therefore, was prepared to support the amendment of the hon. member for Kingston. With respect to what was said regarding the words "trial or information," he would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the Act of 1869, with reference to procedure before Justices in cases of summary convictions. It stated: "Every complaint and information shall be heard, tried, and determined and adjudged," and so on. Hence the language used in this Bill corresponded with that used in the Act relating to summary proceedings. The word "trial" was, perhaps, not so apt or appropriate as the word "hearing," but, as the hon. member for North York had mentioned that the hon. member for Grey intended to move an amendment to alter the words "hearing of the information," he thought that perhaps it would be better to adopt it as being more appropriate; but still he felt that the language of the Bill in that respect would not create any difficulty, and was in accordance with the Act relating to the trial of summary informations before magistrates.

MR. MILLS said the Bill, as it stood, really did not introduce any new principle; but the adoption of the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Kingston would be the introduction of an entirely new principle. He did not see how the hon. gentleman could stop at the line drawn by this amendment. The provisions of the Bill proceeded on this assumption: that it was quite possible that a party who was the defendant ought to have been the plaintiff, and so, instead of going before another magistrate to make a complaint, he was afforded the opportunity of giving his evidence before the magistrate before whom he was brought for trial. Practically, therefore, the provisions of this Bill did not made any innovation upon the law of evidence as it stood; but, if the amendment of the hon. member for Kingston was adopted, there was no reason why it should not be extended to every other case of criminal procedure, or why, if such a party was compelled to appear as a witness on behalf of the Crown in a case of common assault, he should not be compelled to so appear in a case of arson, perjury, or murder, or any other criminal offence. The House ought, therefore, seriously to consider the proposition of the hon. member for Kingston, before adopting it. This would be a very great innovation upon the principles of English criminal jurisprudence. The House would then be, in fact, introducing the system of inquisitorial procedure, because, if, in the case of a common assault, the person accused could be compelled to appear and give testimony against himself, there was no reason why the Crown should not compel the accused to so appear in another case, however heinous it might be. This Bill, as it stood, was no innovation on the present law. There was now nothing to prevent an accused party from appearing before another magistrate and giving his testimony upon oath, thereby becoming the complainant; but, if the House adopted this amendment, he did not think that it could stop there, and they would be obliged, he thought, logically, and the hon. gentleman defended his motion on the ground of following out the logic of the proposition, to embrace every other class of criminal proceedings as well as the one particularly referred to in this Bill.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would like to say a word or two again on this point, which was one of considerable moment. The hon. the Minister of the Interior had stated that this Bill introduced no new principle. Why, it introduced the principle of allowing the defendant, in cases of assault, to give evidence on his own behalf, which privilege, unless this measure became law, he would not have; therefore, this was an alteration.

MR. MILLS: He does so now, only in another way.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the defendant did not do it now in any other way. If a man considered he was assaulted he might go and lodge his complaint, but he did not give his testimony as a witness; he made his complaint and, therefore, this was an innovation. The hon. gentleman said that, if his (Sir John A. Macdonald's), amendment was adopted, they must go further and adopt it as to every kind of offence. The hon. gentleman promoting the Bill had limited this principle to matters of assault; and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) might just as well inform the hon. member for North York that he was bound to press it to the utmost extent, from high treason down to common assault, and carry out the same principle in all these cases. No; the anomaly was quite the other way. A complaint was made; it was a case of common assault. The complainant came forward; he was the Crown; and if he chose to say "I will leave it to the man who assaulted me, himself—to his own oath," should he not do that? This was his proposition; this was a matter of common assault. The complainant said: "I have laid information on oath on the preliminary enquiry"—this was in the case of a trial before a magistrate or a jury—"I know that, although he assaulted me, he is an honest man, and will not perjure himself, and ask him to be sworn." This was a course to which no one could object. The hon. the Minister of Justice would not object to it; the hon. member who promoted the Bill saw the reasonableness of it. The complainant would thus make the defendant his own witness, and therefore, could not well dispute his testimony afterwards, and it was a wholesome thing, and a wholesome power to give him, and it would tend greatly to reconcile the men afterwards.

Mr. DYMOND said that they did not profess in these matters, and many others, to be strictly logical. They had regarded these cases in discussing this measure, from the first, as cases of quasi civil nature; and they were giving effect in this Bill to a practice which, in a very large portion of the Dominion, was always followed with regard to civil cases. He considered that, under these circumstances, they might forego the logic, and try to see what practice would amount to.

Mr. DESJARDINS said that the hon. member for North York had admitted that the introduction of this Bill was the laying down of a new principle, which he intended to extend as soon as he thought the House would be prepared for it. He (Mr. Desjardins) thought that they did not come here to make innovations, but to enact laws such as the needs of the country required. Despite what the hon. the Minister of the Interior had stated, this Bill comprehended an innovation, and, in his opinion, this was directed in the wrong way. The class which the hon. member for North York wished to protect did not desire this protection; they had ample protection in the law as it stood. As he had stated on the second reading, if they were to change the character of the Criminal Law in this relation, they ought to adopt the system under which the witness was questioned by the Judge and had to answer, but was not examined under oath, and the Judge was the best judge of the value of this evidence. He was not prepared to say he was satisfied with the amendment proposed, but he should prefer to have it carried to accepting the Bill as it stood. He thought that, if the party accused was to give evidence, this should be done in order to secure the truth. He contended that the accused were not at all protected by this Bill, because, if he abstained from volunteering his evidence, this fact went against him. He (Mr. Desjardins) was not aware whether the hon. the Minister of Justice had consented to the principle laid down in the second clause.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said if it was understood across the floor that his amendment should be made, he thought that the other amendments should be made to it, so that the only instruction to be given in Committee of the Whole would be quoad the first section. With reference to the remarks of his hon. friend the member for South Wellington as to the meaning of the word "information," of course every criminal proceeding commenced with an information upon oath. There was no doubt about that; the word "information" was supposed to be equivalent to the word "indictment," and, therefore, he would suggest that it should be on the trial of any person, any complaint, information or indictment. No difficulty would then arise respecting the words complaint and information.

Mr. FLESHER said that the amendment made the intention of the Bill clearer. He had had an experience of over 25 years as a magistrate, and he had found great difficulty in understanding what the intention of the law ordinarily was; and where, as in this instance, the text was doubtful, it was still more necessary to be guarded. He had been somewhat in sympathy with the provisions of this Bill. He had frequently seen cases in which more satisfactory results would have been reached if the evidence of the defendant had been taken. He understood the member for East Elgin to say that the intention was that a defendant should only give evidence in his own behalf, and not be cross-questioned.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) : Not at all. The intention is to provide that, if a defendant sees fit to be called as a witness, he shall be subject to cross-examination like any other witness.

MR. FLESHER said it appeared that, if a defendant once became a witness, he was bound to give evidence, though he criminated himself.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There can be no doubt about that. If he is a competent witness on his own behalf, he can be cross-questioned.

MR. PALMER: If sworn as a witness, he must be cross-examined.

MR. FLESHER said a legal education probably gave some hon. gentlemen an advantage as to the interpretation of the laws which it was likely a great number of the magistrates did not possess. He had great doubts, however, whether it was, and he thought it was not, a move in the right direction to introduce the testimony of the wife. Influence could be used in this relation which could affect the nature of the evidence given, and the wife might to some extent be a party to the case in question. More than one instance had come under his knowledge, where the wife had been compelled to prosecute a husband under perfect knowledge that for doing so she would receive physical injury. He greatly feared that this measure would present a strong inducement to the committal of perjury; and he thought the House would perceive that the moral and legal wrong would be greater in case perjury was thus perpetrated and superinduced than even if an ordinary assault went unpunished owing to the absence of this provision. He proposed that there should be a definite and distinct understanding on the subject, and the amendment was intended to apply to what was called the summary jurisdiction of magistrates. He proposed that, from the first line of the first clause, the words "information or" be struck out, and that "on the hearing of any information or complaint of" be introduced. The phraseology of the clause would then be as follows:—

"On the hearing of any information, or complaint, or the trial of any person on any indictment for common assault, the defendant shall be a competent witness on his own behalf."

That would be similar to the phraseology used in the Summary Convictions Act, and the Offence against the Person Act. He would prefer that the second clause should be amended in the same way, so as to read:—

"On the hearing of any such information or complaint, or such trial, the wife or husband of the defendant shall be a competent witness on behalf of the defendant."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD suggested that the clause, if amended at all, should be altered in this wise:—

"On the summary or other trial of any person upon any complaint, information or indictment for common assault, the defendant shall be a competent witness on his own behalf."

MR. KERR said that, when this question was before the House some time ago, he took occasion to express his admiration for the skill and ability with which the hon. gentleman who promoted the measure launched it upon the consideration of the House. He, at the same time, took the liberty of stating his conviction that they should be very careful not to interfere too rapidly or frequently with the criminal procedure of the Canadian Courts; and he thought they should hesitate, notwithstanding the opinions to the contrary which had been expressed, before they went too far. His own opinion was that the law of criminal procedure and the law of criminal evidence were quite satisfactory. The principle involved in the present measure was not, however, a very serious one. There was a time when, in Ontario at least, neither party to a civil proceeding could be a competent witness in his or her behalf. Subsequently, the Legislature thought that, by allowing a party to be a witness in his or her own behalf, an improvement might be made in the means for the elucidation of truth, but it had since been discovered that such a course of procedure had the effect of largely increasing those cases of perjury which were already of common occurrence. On the whole, the weight of testimony, however, was rather in favour of allowing parties to be witnesses in their own behalf. It was proposed now to introduce an innovation, whereby a person charged with an offence might be admissible as a witness on his own behalf. The cases in which it was proposed to make this change were of such a character as to be scarcely removable from the category of civil cases, and the danger to be apprehended from such a concession was not great. He would even be inclined to go further, and compel a person charged with a minor offence, such as common assault, to be a witness. As the law at present stood, a man who was complainant in one case might be the defendant in another, where the former defendant stood in position of complainant, so that two separate proceedings were rendered necessary in order that the real facts of the affair might be disclosed. With the view of remedying this, he would suggest that the clause be altered in such a way as to admit of a person whose evidence was admissible being a compellable witness for the prosecution.

MR. KIRKPATRICK thought that his hon. friend from East Grey had made use of very correct phraseology in his amendment, which was perfectly in concurrence with the Act of 1869 respecting summary convictions. As the hon. member for Kingston would see, the case was one, not of summary trial, but summary convictions, and when a summons had been issued a justice might proceed on the hearing, information or complaint upon the charge made.

MR. MACDOUGALL said that was provided for under the 43rd section of the Act relating to offences against the person.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there could not be a conviction without a trial.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said the case would be fully met by the insertion in the clause of the words, "on the hearing of any information or complaint, or on the trial of any person on an indictment," because the term "indictment" included "information." He thought the hon. member for East Grey, though a layman, had got the right expression and ought to adhere to it.

MR. LAFLAMME thought the proposition made by the hon. member for Kingston was the clearest and simplest which had been submitted.

MR. MASSON said the word "trial" in a summary conviction should give a sufficient explanation of the meaning the Bill intended to convey.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said no doubt that the word "trial" included the hearing. It was not a summary trial, however, that was meant, but a summary conviction. If a person was brought up for a hearing on an information or complaint not to be tried summarily, and said, "I want to give my evidence on this hearing," the magistrate would naturally say that there was no case to send for trial. Such a case, he presumed, could not be called a summary trial, but a hearing.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I mean the preliminary evidence on oath by the complainant when the defendant is not present.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: But a defendant might say to the magistrate on the preliminary hearing, "If you hear me state the case you will find that there is nothing to send for trial."

MR. MACKENZIE thought the word "complaint" should be put in after "information."

MR. MACDOUGALL: Will the hon. gentleman alter his amendment so as to make it compellable for an admissible witness to give evidence?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: If a person is a competent witness for the Crown he can be summoned.

MR. FLESHER withdrew his amendment.

Amendment (Sir John A. Macdonald) agreed to.

House accordingly resolved itself into Committee.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD moved in amendment:

“That the Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the said Bill by striking out the second clause.”

He had said the other day that, in these matters of common assault, it was inadvisable that the husband should give evidence against the wife and the wife against the husband, as it would induce a life long quarrel perhaps. It was much better that the complaint of assault should fail for lack of such evidence than that for the trial of such a small offence the husband and wife should be set against each other. He thought she would have a good many summary trials in her own house after giving evidence against her husband, and that she would have a good many common assaults.

MR. MACKENZIE: She can give evidence in her own behalf.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That will not remove the black and blue marks.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said the defendant, when giving evidence for the Crown, was practically giving evidence for himself. The principle had been admitted in the first section that the defendant should be a competent witness on his own behalf, and he did not see why objection should be raised to the wife or husband of the defendant also being competent witnesses. It was the same in the Ontario Act and also the English Act.

MR. GUTHRIE said that, in his legal experience, he had observed none of the evils predicted by the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) in regard to the civil cases where the same kind of law applied. In a case of damages for assault and battery, the wife was a competent witness against her husband and was a compellable witness, and he had never heard that this law was unsatisfactory in its working. He thought his hon. friend had drawn on his imagination in his account of the evils which might flow from the adoption of this clause. He (Mr. Guthrie) considered such a clause absolutely essential. There were many cases in which the only witness present, in addition to the parties in the affray, was the wife of one of them, and her evidence would be of value; for it was not to be supposed that the wife was to commit perjury to clear her husband, nor was it to be supposed she would suffer at her husband's hands for telling the truth. The wife now was a competent witness in every description of civil cases, and was a compellable witness against her husband. He was not aware, as a lawyer, of any of the evils pointed out having arisen from the existence of this law.

MR. PALMER said that, as far as his experience went, he did not think the reformation of the laws ought to begin with this little Bill. The second clause, however, did not compel the wife to be a witness, therefore, he thought that was right and that the Bill was best as it was.

MR. DESJARDINS said he was against the second clause, and failed to see its utility. The wife might refuse to attend to give evidence against her husband, and among respectable members of society—from which, according to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond) these cases were generally brought, though he did not agree with him—there would be an unwillingness to bring their wives into such contests as cases of common assault or such matters of the kind.

MR. KERR said that, in nine cases out of ten, in these charges of common assault, both parties were about equally guilty, and it seemed to him that, if the wife of the defendant was not a competent witness for her husband, the wife of the complainant ought not to be a competent witness for the complainant. Instead of this clause being struck out he would like to see it amended so that both the wife of the defendant and the wife of the plaintiff should be competent witnesses for both parties, and that all four of them should be competent to give evidence. This would make the Bill more efficient, more full and competent than at present.

Amendment negatived on a division.

MR. TASCHEREAU moved in amendment:

"That the Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have the power to amend it by adding on line 13 after the word 'witness' the following words: 'for the prosecution or.'"

Amendment agreed to.

House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 55) To amend the law respecting Building Societies.—(Mr. Gibbs, South Ontario).

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

MR. BROOKS said, before the Orders of the Day were called, he wished to call the attention of the House to an article which appeared yesterday in the Toronto Globe. If it had only affected himself he would have abstained from saying anything, but, as it affected a large number of gentlemen belonging to the legal profession, ascribing to them motives that seemed to him to be extremely dishonourable, he would read the article, which was supposed to have been written or inspired by a member of the House. If this was the case, the gentleman to whom it was imputed would have done better if he had made the statement on the floor of the House rather than anonymously. The article referred to a matter of very great interest at the present time—the independence of Parliament in Quebec. It was as follows.—

"Recent revelations have shown that a considerable number of the Quebec representatives in Opposition in the House of Commons have solid reasons for condemning the action of Lieut.-Governor Letellier, and for feeling very sorely, and resenting very strongly, the presence of a Liberal Administration in Quebec. There were several nice pleasant places occupied, till recently, by several of those patriotic gentlemen when they were removed by Mr. Joly. Here are some of them, it being as yet impossible to ascertain the ramifications of the DeBoucherville system of patronage: Messrs. Baby, Macdougall (Three Rivers), Mousseau, Brooks, Caron, Colby, Hurteau, Gill and Ouimet,—all Crown prosecutors in their several districts, getting from $1,000 to $4,000 per year apiece."

He had taken the opportunity of investigating the Public Accounts for the Province of Quebec for the last two years, or rather for the years 1875 and 1876. He had been unable to find in the library or any of the Departments the Public Accounts of Quebec for 1877. He found that nine gentlemen were here charged with being directly in the pay of the Local Government, and with receiving large sums for services said to have been rendered by them to that Government—all alleged to be members of the legal profession. He himself was perhaps the principal offender, and he was quite willing to admit anything that could be fairly charged against him in this respect. For the last seventeen or nearly eighteen years, he had acted as Crown Prosecutor in the Judicial District in which he resided. His first appointment to that position was under the late Sir George Cartier, it was continued by his successor, the present Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals, Sir Antoine Dorion, and also by the successive Attorneys-General up to the present time. When he first received the appointment, it was an office of some emolument, but, owing to a change in the local laws, and the appointment of District Magistrates, during the last ten years since he had been in Parliament, it had been of little importance, and the emoluments had been almost nominal. During the year 1875, instead of being in the pay of the Local Government, and receiving $1,000 to $4,000 from it, he had received $193, for services performed, and in 1876 he received $244.50 for such services, which were performed for the Government as in the case of any other client. He would appeal to any one acquainted with the onerous nature of these duties, and the small compensation granted by the Local Government, whether this money was not fairly earned, or whether it was to be imputed to any gentleman of an honourable profession that he was supposed to be influenced with regard to his seat in this Parliament by having accepted a retainer, either from a private individual or a Government. It was not his province to speak for the other gentlemen mentioned, but he found, on examination of the Public Accounts, that, during the two years instanced, seven of these gentlemen had never received one cent from the Provincial Treasury. These gentlemen were Messrs. McDougall, Mousseau, Caron, Colby, Hurteau, Gill and Onimet. He was authorized to say for his hon. friend the member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), who resided in the same judicial district with himself, that, for the last fifteen years, he had not been actively engaged in the practice of his profession, and, consequently, had not been retained in any way, either for or against the Provincial Parliament, and could not have thus been influenced in any way in the course he had taken in Parliament. He was informed with regard to Mr. Hurteau—though he was not personally aware of the fact—that he did not belong to the legal profession, but was a notary public, and hence he could not have been employed by the Provincial Government in the manner stated.

MR. BROOKS.

He thought it his duty to refer to this article, because if, in regard to politics, attempts of this kind were to be made, and the public was to be influenced by such charges, and if, in anticipation of any discussion there might be with reference to a matter that was of very serious importance to them in the Province of Quebec, the public mind was to be prejudiced by such charges, there was an end to all fair and free discussion, either in this House or elsewhere.

MR. McDOUGALL (Three Rivers) said, as far as he was concerned, he could make a clean breast of it. He did not think that the House would find that he had been influenced much by immense sums of money received from this Government or the Local Government. In his district, about six years ago, the gentleman who formerly conducted the Crown prosecutions died,—they were all liable to die now and then—exactly as the term was coming on. He was the only Queen's Counsel in the district, and, naturally, the nomination came to him. He was written to a very few days before the term came on about it; as there was nothing illegal or improper in accepting the appointment, as far as he could make out. In fact, if he had objected to it, the Crown would have been without a representative, for these nominations only came within a day or two, or within three or four days, of the opening of the term. With respect to the present term there, which was to open to-morrow, the Joly Government had only named their legal adviser yesterday, as he had been informed, being interested in an insolvent case which was to come up. They thus saw how these things were done. He had then considered it his duty, being the only Queen's Counsel there, to conduct the Crown business, and he did so. If the gentleman who had written this article would use his ordinary diligence in looking over the Public Accounts, he would find that, in all his (Mr. McDougall's) lifetime, he had never received more than $30 from any Government whatsoever. When the right hon. member for Kingston was in power, some seven or eight years ago, one or two years, he believed, after he came into Parliament, the right hon. gentleman had a claim against the postmaster in his district, and sent it to him, naturally enough. He (Mr. McDougall) collected and transmitted the money, but made no charge; so his record was clear in this respect. He defied anybody to say that he had so received anything beyond the $80 mentioned. He thought that the effect of the law relating to the independence of Parliament, introduced by the hon. the Minister of Justice, would greatly tend to exclude a considerable number of good men from Parliament. If this Bill was not changed a little in Committee, they should have either a House composed of millionaires or of beggars; and, in this country, it was more likely to be the latter than the former. With regard to his political career, the balance of the account was in his favour, in connection with the Quebec Government. If the North Shore Railway ever existed, it was largely due to the efforts he had expended, the time he had given, and the money he had spent out of his own pocket. He was a Director of this road for several years, during which time he had lost two whole years of his time in advocating the construction of the road. He had also worked industriously in order to secure subscriptions to the scheme.

MR. OUMET said he had never, since he had been in Parliament, received a single penny from the Local Government or any Government in this Dominion.

MR. CARON said one would fancy that a paper pretending, as the Globe did, to occupy a respectable position in this country would, before it made any statement affecting the position of any gentleman in this Parliament, have taken the trouble to investigate it. As far as he was concerned, he could only say that when he, for the first time since he had belonged to the legal profession, conducted any business as Crown prosecutor for the Local Government of the Province of Quebec, instead of $4,000 having been paid to him, his whole account for acting jointly with the previous Crown prosecutor was $140. The account was sent in, and he was not certain that it was paid yet. He might say that, when he joined the firm to which he belonged, it was thought a sufficient reason why the Inland Revenue cases which had been given to that firm should be moved away from that office. As far as the $140 was concerned, he would leave it to any gentleman to say whether such a consideration would interfere with his freedom in voting in this House. He hoped that was not the amount that could secure the services of any writer on the Globe. He could say for the profession that it certainly would not interfere with a gentleman performing the duties which he owed to his constituents and his country, and he was sure that, if some hon. gentlemen who were absent heard what he said, they would agree with him. His hon. friend the member for Hamilton (Mr. Irving) was absent, at the present moment, on professional business which he had a right to conduct, and he (Mr. Caron) was certain that the hon. gentleman performed his duty to the Local Government of Ontario as faithfully as he did to any other client, and, whatever a writer on the Globe might do, there was no reason to suppose that Mr. Irving would allow himself to be influenced by such a consideration. The charge was an insult to the legal profession, and, as such, should be resented by that profession.

MR. BABY said that, as his name had been mentioned, he might be allowed to say that he had never been influenced by the paltry sum he might have received as Crown prosecutor, either in favour of or against any Government. About the time that the hon. member for Sherbrooke was appointed a Q. C., he (Mr. Baby) also received the appointment, and he had had the honour of conducting Crown business ever since. He had been appointed by Sir George Cartier, and the appointment had continued under Mr. Sicotte and Mr. Dorion, who did him the honour of having sufficient confidence in him to know that he could conduct the Crown business without being influenced by the sum he received. He repudiated the charge that he had been so influenced, and said that nothing could induce him to do anything else than follow his political principles, which were well known.

MR. DESJARDINS: A similar charge has been brought against me. I must say this: that I despise the accusation as much as I despise the accuser in that matter. I have nothing more to say.

MR. DYMOND said his name had not been mentioned, but, perhaps, he might be allowed to say a few words. He would have kept his seat, but for the numerous references made, during the present Session of Parliament, to his real or supposed connection with the Globe newspaper. He was not sorry that this matter had been brought before the House, because it gave him an opportunity of saying what, indeed, he had said before, that he never wrote anything which he could not and would not defend. Had he written the paragraph in question, he would have been prepared to defend it, but he had not the slightest idea of the information upon which it had been founded. He neither inspired it nor wrote it, nor did he know anything at all about it till the arrival of the Globe in Ottawa on the previous evening; and he must say it was a paragraph which ought not to have appeared unless on the most substantial information. He had no doubt it was contributed by a gentleman who acted as correspondent for the Globe in Ottawa, and who, on his own responsibility, sent a great deal more which appeared in that paper. When hon. gentlemen felt so keenly charges or insinuations made against them unjustly, they ought to be a little more cautious as to how they made charges against him (Mr. Dymond). A newspaper was the product of many minds, and he was no more responsible for a large portion of what appeared in the Globe than his hon. friend the member for Sherbrooke. It was scarcely to be expected that he should enter into details as to what his precise functions were in connection with that paper, and he would content himself with saying that, not only did he disapprove of the article in question, but he regretted exceedingly that any pain should have been inflicted on those gentlemen who had addressed the House. In making this explanation, he believed he was only doing his duty; as far as any further apology was concerned, his duty must end here.

MR. MITCHELL said he, too, had some reference to make to the Globe newspaper. He must confess he was surprised that hon. gentlemen around him should have entered into explanations by way of refuting the charges made against them. They should not, he contended, have taken the slightest notice of the affair.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex): I do not understand there is any question before the House.

MR. MITCHELL said there was, and he wished to say that, having been assailed in the Globe newspaper, he had the right of explanation. In his opinion, the best way to treat that or any other newspaper was with contemptuous silence.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD was glad to hear the hon member for North York (Mr. Dymond) condemn the article in question in language stronger even than that employed by those hon. gentlemen who were the subjects of the attack. What, he would ask, could be the character of the attack denounced in such strong language by the hon. member for North York? As far as the Globe newspaper was concerned, he agreed with his hon. friend from Northumberland in thinking that the most dignified way to treat it was with silent contempt. A story was told of a young Scotch advocate who, in his zeal for a client and his disappointment at the judgment given, used strong and, perhaps, contemptuous language, saying he was surprised that the Court should have given such a decision. Of course he was charged with contempt and, finding himself in a difficulty, he appealed to John Clark of Elgin, afterwards Lord Elgin, to apologise for him. Clark very kindly did so, informing the Court that the offence arose out of the young gentleman's inexperience. "If," said he, "he had known the Court as long as John Clark of Elgin, he would not be surprised at anything." Just in the same way, he (Sir John) was not surprised at anything published in the Globe, and he, therefore, treated it with silent contempt.

MR. SPEAKER said it had often occurred to him that improper allusions had been made to the supposed connection of the hon. member for North York with the Globe newspaper. That gentleman, it seemed to him, was not responsible to members of the House for articles published in the Globe which did not come directly under the cognizance of the House itself. If any formal charge was made against the hon. gentleman for offensive language it would be sustained, but it seemed to him (Mr. Speaker) that repeated allusions of the kind he had referred to were not right.

MR. MASSON: The hon. gentleman seems to have thought the attack a proper one or he would not have replied to it: consequently, my friends are not guilty of making allusions of that kind.

MR. SPEAKER said that, in this particular case, the hon. gentlemen whose names had been mentioned, were certainly entitled to make explanations, and he must say that their allusions to the supposed author had not been, by any means, so strong as some which had been indulged in formerly. Under ordinary circumstances he did not think it right that hon. members should be held responsible for matters connected with their private business, particularly in the management of a newspaper, because, as the hon. gentleman said, newspapers were the product of many minds.

MR. BROOKS said he did not mean to insinuate that the hon. member for North York was responsible for the article in question.

MR. MACKENZIE: But he was meant.

MR. BROOKS said he accepted the explanation which had been made, not only in a Parliamentary sense, but as an explanation from one gentleman to another; and the condemnation which the hon. member for North York had given to the article, seemed to him (Mr. Brooks) the best reason he could have had for bringing it forward.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. member for Sherbrooke did say that the article was written by a member of this House. If, therefore, he did not mean the hon. member for North York, will he let us know what other gentleman he referred to?

MR. YOUNG said that, as a former member of the press, he wished to say a word or two regarding the matter which had been raised by hon. gentlemen opposite. He had long felt that it was a great injustice to an hon. member of that House, who happened to be a journalist, that reference should be made to him here in his private capacity instead of as the representative of a constituency. It was well known that there were many writers connected with a leading public journal, and amongst members of the profession it was an understood principle that no reference should be made to individuals specially. In spite of the closest supervision, occasionally, reports for which there was not sufficient foundation, found their way into a newspaper, and it was scarcely fair that hon. gentlemen opposite should attack the hon. member for North York because a paragraph to which they took exception appeared in the Globe. They seemed altogether to ignore the fact that, in their own newspaper organ, the Mail, similar charges were constantly being made without the slightest foundation. Day after day charges of corruption were made in that newspaper in connection with the very subject spoken of in the Globe—the employment of legal counsel. The hon. member for Hamilton, and his hon. friend from West Middlesex had, again and again, been assailed in the Mail because they happened to be temporarily retained by the Local Government of Ontario. He could not believe that the hon. member for Kingston was sincere in his remarks regarding the Globe, knowing as he did the manner in which the Mail, the organ of his own party, was conducted. The hon. gentleman should take the beam out of the eye of the Mail before he set himself to take the mote out of the eye of the Globe. Hon. gentlemen opposite who considered themselves aggrieved by the reference made to them in the Globe, repudiated the idea that the paltry sum, as they called it, which they received, could influence them in any way. These gentlemen, however, admitted, to a certain extent at least, that they received fees from the Government of Quebec, and it must be remembered that members of the legal profession liked other things else besides fees—they liked to wear silk gowns for instance. While, therefore, he did not, by any means, justify the inference which had been drawn by the writer of the paragraph, the circumstances were not such as ought to have called forth such very strong condemnation of one particular newspaper, nor should the hon. member for North York have been referred to in his private capacity.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, as the hon. gentleman had alluded to him, he would like to make a remark in reply. Whenever any paper, no matter what its principles might be—whether the Globe, the Montreal Herald, the Montreal Gazette or any other—committed a breach of Parliamentary privileges, promulgated any false news or made any false charges against individual members, that paper should be treated as the Globe had been that day. The hon. gentleman had tried to divert the attention of the House by bringing into the discussion certain newspapers, and why his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) name was mentioned in connection with the Mail, he was at a loss to know. He would tell the hon. gentleman and the House that he had no sort of interest in the Mail, no more pecuniary interest or proprietorial interest in that paper, than the hon. gentleman himself.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, when the paper was first established, he put into it $1,000, but that had been lost and he had given the paper up. He had no more interest, or control, or voice in it than the hon. gentleman had in the Globe, if he went there as a partizan to give his advice, and the hon. gentleman was not justified in making such remarks.

MR. YOUNG

MR. YOUNG said the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald), on a previous occasion, had stated that he had no more connection with the Mail newspaper than he (Mr. Young) had with the Globe. He would tell the hon. gentleman why he connected his name with the Mail newspaper. At the last meeting of the Mail shareholders, he believed a resolution was moved by an hon. member of this House—the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb)—that the newspaper thereafter should be the exponent of the views of the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald). The records of the meeting would show that resolution to have been proposed and carried. This was the reason which he had for connecting his hon. friend with the newspaper in question.

MR. HOLTON said his hon. friend (Mr. Brooks) had introduced this discussion on the ground that it was a question of privilege, but, if it had been brought forward as a question of privilege, a substantive motion should have been made, then this debate would perhaps have been in order. He did not see how his hon. friend could bring it forward in this manner, and he considered that the whole discussion had been exceedingly irregular and very—

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Very profitable.

MR. HOLTON said he did not see the profit or advantage to hon. members of this House conducting their controversies with regard to newspapers outside from their places on the floor of this House, and he thought most inconvenient results must follow if such a course were pursued. He did not propose to take part in the discussion; the matter had already been settled satisfactorily, he supposed, in the view of the hon. gentlemen interested; but he wished to refer to the remark of the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) with reference to the privileges of this House. He (Mr. Holton) held that such a discussion as they had been engaged in was exceedingly irregular, and very much to be deprecated.

PUBLIC WORKS BILL.—[BILL No. 13]

(Mr. Mackenzie.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee on the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. MACKENZIE said this Bill was an amendment of the Act of 1871. He said a few evenings ago, in moving the second reading of this Bill, that he believed that the Act already sufficiently provided for the proposal that he intimated the Government had in view, of sending one of the arbitrators periodically over the line of the railway, and possibly over some of the other public works, in order to have a fair examination made of evidence taken in relation to accidents occurring at those places. He found, however, on examining the Act critically, that such claims must be sent in the first place to the Secretary of State, and by him to the Governor in Council, and a special order would have to be issued. He thought it would be advisable, therefore, to put a clause in this Act providing fully for the proposal which he intimated it was the intention of the Government to carry out, and he suggested that the following would meet the purpose :

“If any person or body corporate now has, or shall hereafter have, any supposed claim upon the Government of Canada for property taken, or for alleged direct or consequent damage to property, arising from the construction or connected with the execution of any Public Work undertaken, commenced or performed at the expense of such Government, or of the Government of the late Province of Canada or of Nova Scotia or of New Brunswick or of Prince Edward Island or of British Columbia or for the defence of Canada, or any claim arising out of or connected with the execution or fulfilment of any contract for the construction of any Public Work or arising out of any death or any injury to person or property on any Railway Canal or Public Work under the control and management of the Department of Public Works—such person or body corporate may give notice of such claim to the Minister of Public Works stating the particulars thereof, and how the same has arisen—and in case the Minister, from want of sufficient or reliable information as to the facts relating to the claim or on account of conflicting statement of facts, does not consider the case one in which a tender of satisfaction should be made, he may refer the claim to one or more of the Official Arbitrators for examination and report both as to the matters of fact involved and as to the amount of damages—if any—sustained. And thereupon the Arbitrator or Arbitrators to whom the claim has been referred shall have all the powers in reference thereto as if such claim had been one coming within the purview of the said Act, entitled: ‘An Act respecting the Public Works of Canada,’ and had been referred to after tender of satisfaction made, but the Arbitrators’ duty in such case shall be confined to reporting his or their findings upon the questions of facts and upon the amount of damages—if any—sustained and the principles upon which such amount has been computed.”

MR. TUPPER: Does it say nothing with regard to expenses to be allowed under the Public Works Act.

MR. MACKENZIE said the Bill made no reference to that. Although there was a provision in the Act with reference to giving security, they had found that impracticable. Before any claim was made, under this or any other section of the Act, the claimant must give security to the satisfaction of the arbitrator for the payment of costs. They really had no rule with regard to the expenses of these arbitrators, except with respect to their salaries, and these were fixed by Parliament, and it had never seemed possible to fix a statement of costs with regard to any of the arbitrators. For instance, the arbitrators would need to arbitrate on half-a-dozen claims in reference to the Welland or Lachine Canal. These were all disposed of in one or two days, and it would be difficult to say what the costs were. The Act did not define it, and practically the question had never arisen, and he did not think it was worth while saying anything about that. He thought this clause would meet it, and certainly it had been prepared after careful consideration.

MR. PALMER: I do not understand how the arbitrator decides questions of liability?

MR. MACKENZIE: The arbitrator decides no questions of law.

MR. PALMER: Then, when the claim which he has allowed comes up, the Government may or may not pay it?

MR. MACKENZIE: That is with regard to a question of law. The arbitrators have only to decide as to facts.

MR. PALMER: I do not see how this system can work, because we shall have one statement of facts proving there is a liability, and another statement of facts showing there is not.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, there might arise a case in which liability was proved by a statement of facts, but in which the Government were not legally liable. The arbitrators would have no power to deal with a question of law, and they have not now. They had to determine if the facts established the amount to be deducted or given.

MR. PALMER: I think the great difficulty has been to determine whether there is a liability, and that would depend very much upon the facts which these arbitrators would have before them.

MR. MACKENZIE: No claim can be referred to the arbitrators, if there is no liability to pay.

MR. PALMER: Oh, clearly; but you must determine the question of liability upon the facts alleged.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: As to legal liability of the Crown, that can only be settled by the Supreme Court, but, after the question of law is settled, then the Board of Works go to the official arbitrator to ascertain the amount.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is so.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was a very important clause, and the House ought to have a little time to consider it.

MR. MACKENZIE: We can take the Bill a stage, and then have it reprinted before the third reading. This would give sufficient time.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Does this clause refer to the arbitrations arising from accidents?

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Yet they have not power to determine who is guilty of negligence, the party who is claiming or the officials. I understand that an arbitrator will not have power to go along the line and deal with these cases as was proposed.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Yes; as to the question of amount, that can be easily settled. But the question is whether the cow being killed on the track was due to the negligence of its owner, or of the officials.

MR. MACKENZIE: The arbitrator would be sent along the line to see with reference to this celebrated cow, whatever its sex may be, for the hon. gentleman has stated it in so many ways, and take evidence with regard to the accident. Supposing he finds that the animal was a trespasser, that it was not the fault of the Government at all, or the railway authorities, that the animal was upon the road, but the fault of the owner; these facts will be reported to the Government, and in that case, of course, it is quite patent that there would be no claim. But, if it were a matter of doubt, then he would report the facts as clearly as he could, and his own opinion upon them, and the Government would take action; but, if it was a case in which there was no liability, the statement of facts would show it.

MR. MITCHELL said the Bill offered no remedy for the grievance he had brought before the House. The hon. Minister had professed to bring in this measure as a means of ascertaining and settling the claims in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. If he understood the hon. gentleman rightly, and he believed that he did, he stated that this Bill was for the purpose of appointing persons to ascertain the facts with regard to accidents, and the damage that should be paid when the accident had arisen in consequence of the negligence of the officials, but that a question of law he could not touch upon; the parties must go to the Supreme Court, at Ottawa. Now, in the case of this veritable cow—worth only $40, perhaps, for he felt bound to vindicate the claim of a poor man or woman as much as if it was the claim of a Rothschild or Sir Hugh Allan—in this very case this remedy which the hon. gentleman proposed to submit to the consideration of Parliament, professedly as a means of giving justice to claimants, was no remedy at all. The hon. Minister said, if a question of law arose, these arbitrators had nothing to do with it. Mr. Brydges had stated that this cow was killed at a crossing, and, being killed at a crossing, there was no legal remedy for the poor woman who had owned it; the arbitrator could not move in the matter because the question of law arose. True, there were no gates at the crossing, and the guards were down; yet, because the cow was killed on the crossing, they refused to consider the case. The question was whether the damages for the loss of that cow, although she was at large, could not be enforced. He held that this professed remedy, which the hon. gentleman professed to bring down for the speedy relief of those small cases, did not cover the case at all. In every case of this kind a question of law would arise, which would put it out of the jurisdiction of the inspector. What he wanted was a speedy remedy for claimants who had grievances against the Government for damages sustained by them, owing to the negligence of the officers of any public work, whether canal or railway, or whatever it might be, which was under the control of the Government. It was the duty of the hon. the Minister of Public Works to provide that remedy. It was not satisfactory to tell that poor woman that there was a question of law involved as to whether the cow had, legally, a right to be there, and that, consequently, the arbitrator had no power to deal with the question. What was required to insert in that Bill was that arbitrators should have power to deal with all cases to the extent of a thousand dollars, whether they involved a question of law or simply a question of fact; but, if every case in which there was an element of law was reserved, then there would be no justice shown to those people, and they would have to go to the Supreme Court at Ottawa, at a cost of a thousand dollars, to recover an amount of, probably, $40. This was not a position which could be justified under the circumstances stated, and in connection with the grievances which he had related as having arisen in the constituency he had the honour to represent. He would oppose that amendment and any Bill which, while it professed to give a remedy, really denied one, since there was not a single case of the killing of cattle or other damage done in connection with the railway in which a question of law would not crop up.

MR. PALMER said, if this Bill was made as it ought to be, it would be a great boon. On reading it over, he did not quite understand its scope. The case of the cow could not, as his hon. friend seemed to think, be carried to the Supreme Court. As the matter stood, the remedy had to be obtained from the employés, or there was no remedy. If he understood the Bill rightly, one of its principles appeared to be that the Government admitted their liability for the action of their employés, whenever such employés made themselves liable to any person by reason of their misconduct. If the employés of the road killed his hon. friend's cow, it did not follow that, because the cow was improperly on the line, the employés were not to blame. If the accident was due to gross negligence, if they wilfully killed the animal, the law made the employés liable, although the cow was wrongly on the track. If the Bill intended to determine the question of negligence, and on proof of such negligence, to indemnify the sufferer by such negligence, it would be a great boon. If the Government assumed that responsibility, and were willing to leave the question of determining to whose fault the accident was due, and whose decision in that case ought to be binding, the Bill would be a great boon and worthy of support.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) said there was no doubt, as the law now stood, that there was no remedy in the Supreme Court for damages sustained through any employé on the railway. He understood the hon. member for Northumberland to have said the other day that, when an enquiry was made into an accident or injury sustained by an individual, reference was made to some of the employés, perhaps to those whose negligence had caused the injury. It seemed necessary to the Committee that there should be some means by which an exhaustive and impartial investigation should be had. The hon. member for Northumberland had said that, owing to his not being a supporter of the Government, a great many cases in his county had not been remedied. He (Mr. Smith) believed he had in his county three cases to the hon. gentleman's one, in which no redress had been given, which had not been met at all, which had been referred in the same manner as those in the hon. gentleman's county, and the parties had obtained no remedy. The proposal now made was that some impartial man be appointed to enquire into the different cases, to examine witnesses under oath—the railway employés, other parties, and those who had suffered wrong—and find out, if possible, the real facts of the case and assess the damages inflicted. If a question of law were developed in the course of the enquiry, it would be referred to the Minister of Justice to decide the liability of the railway and the Government in the matter; if the facts were clear and undoubted, the claim would be promptly settled. The Bill met the case precisely. He was satisfied that those who had sustained injury from the railway only wanted some disinterested man to hold an investigation. People know that the Government were not responsible for injuries brought on by their own fault. People complained of fires having been caused by large sparks from the engine. The engineer, on being questioned, stated the engine was in a proper state, with the fire arrester on, and that the fire could have been caused by the sparks, while the other parties contended the contrary. Here was a controversy which only could be decided by an investigation, and for which investigation the Bill provided.

MR. DOMVILLE said this Bill did not go far enough. In small cases, such as the majority of cases on this line were, the people should not be put to the trouble this Bill put them to. They should find a remedy in the small Courts, when the claim did not exceed a certain amount, and have their cases speedily tried. What was the use in a case of $30 or $40 of summoning arbitrators and lawyers and others to hold an investigation, and as regarded those investigations, they all knew how they might be carried out, either properly or improperly. He would as soon trust a Court of law as any investigation, especially one delegated to people holding their positions under Government. He had brought up a case in this House, year after year, and had never had the satisfaction of being asked to record his claim. A poor man's house had been burnt through sparks from the engine, in broad daylight; when he applied to this tribunal for aid, he was told the fire could not have been caused by the engine, as the spark arrester had been on. The proof given was that a book was kept in which, every day, was written, "The spark arrester is on." This report was a mere matter of form; yet, in consequence of that entry being made, the man got nothing. The tribunal stated they had looked into the matter and found the spark arrester had been on, the day mentioned, and, consequently, under the Act, the railway was not liable. If this case could have been brought into Court, where witnesses would have been examined and the whole case tried before an impartial jury, a different decision might have been given. This Bill should provide a more speedy mode of settling small claims, and he would, therefore, oppose it.

MR. TUPPER said that, as the hon. the First Minister had said this Bill, after going through Committee, would be re-printed and come up on a third reading, it would be then more convenient to discuss it fully than at present. He did not quite agree with his hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), nor with his hon. friend from King's, N.B. (Mr. Domville). He had drawn the attention of the hon. the First Minister, when this Bill, which related somewhat to a different matter, was under consideration, to the question as to whether he could not, by a clause, in this Bill, provide for the questions which were constantly arising, and which must, in the nature of things, would constantly arise for damages for small amounts. He had drawn the attention of the House to the fact that, however just and impartial the decision of employes, to whom, practically, the matter was now left, would be, it would never give satisfaction to the sufferers, because they would suppose, whether rightly or wrongly, that the officers appointed to make the enquiry would feel a certain amount of interest in protecting the employes. Take the question of a horse or ox being killed, and whether the fences were in a proper state of repair. It was the duty of the Government to keep the fences in repair, and the persons who were employed for that purpose said the fences were in repair. The sufferer would say those parties were interested, and that the evidence upon which this question was decided was the evidence of interested parties. The hon. the Minister of Public Works had, no doubt, had his attention called to this subject before, and he had responded to the application to provide means by which there would be an outside and independent arbitrament called in for the purpose of investigating facts, whether on the part of employes or sufferers. They should not forget that, owning as they did a long line of Intercolonial railway, they were exposed to a very great number of claims constantly arising in connection with these matters. And while it was absolutely necessary to protect the public and individuals who were sufferers, it was also equally important to protect the Government against constant claims arising that might not be well founded. If it were to transpire that every horse and cow killed on the Intercolonial railway would be promptly paid for, the number of accidents would be much greater than at present. The first difficulty was to provide an independent arbitrament by which an unobjectionable mode of arriving at the facts would be attained. He did not see the difficulties which were seen by the hon. member for Northumberland in respect to the law. In nine cases out of ten, or probably ninety-nine out of a hundred, purely questions of fact required to be ascertained. While the Government should hesitate about placing itself in a position to be taken every day into a Court of law and before local magistrates to deal with those questions, a great step was gained, so far as the Bill presented itself to his mind at that moment, by the proposition of the hon. the First Minister to promptly send one of the official arbitrators, an independent party, along the line of railway, and take evidence, and present any independent report to the Government. The Government would be disposed promptly to pay any amount reported to them by an independent officer, who had taken testimony in respect to the claim, and would be more liable to error on the side of improperly paying the claimant, than of throwing over the report.

MR. MITCHELL said the hon. member for Cumberland had evidently changed his mind.

MR. TUPPER said he had not changed his sentiments. All he had desired was that means should be taken to have an independent report made to the Government, such as would satisfy the public and the claimants that claims would not be ignored upon the testimony of an interested party. The present proposition, to a large extent, covered the proposal he made to the hon. the First Minister, although the Bill, when printed, might be capable of amendment and improvement. They should not, on the other hand, forget the position of the Government in regard to the enormous system of public works, and, on the other hand, they should do justice to individual claimants.

MR. POULIOT said the people of the Province of Quebec desired that all cases should be referred to the ordinary Courts of law; if that could not be done, that they should be investigated by a person outside of the Government railway employes. In many places, during the winter, the fences would be covered with snow, and the cattle strayed on the railroad and were killed. There was nothing to prevent cattle going on the track during the winter. In 1875, after the Parliamentary Session, he went through his county to see what was the position of affairs, and, in some places, there was from 12 to 15 feet of snow.

Mr. MITCHELL said he widely differed in opinion from some of the hon. members on the Opposition side of the House, with whom he sometimes acted in sympathy, while, as a general thing, he acted independently, and was not advised by them as to the course they were likely to pursue. He could understand the reason why the right hon. member for Kingston and the hon. member for Cumberland adopted that conservative policy, to protect the Government from any possible loss that might occur from claims on the Intercolonial Railway. As those hon. gentlemen expected to occupy the Treasury benches shortly—as they doubtless would do—he could understand why they should oppose the reference of these cases to Courts of law; they had to act, not with a view to the present, but to the future. An official would only require a nod of a Minister of Public Works—which position the member for Cumberland expected to occupy—to travel along the Intercolonial Railway, and, if twenty cattle had been killed, to find some reason why the question should ultimately be decided by the Government. The Bill would provide no remedy whatever for the evils of which his constituents complained—the misconduct of the Government in refusing to pay claims for damages. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries thought that, because there had been three or four cases in Westmoreland to one in Northumberland, there could be no doubt as to the excellence of the Bill, because he (Mr. Smith) was satisfied, although a member of the Administration should have position and power sufficient to obtain justice for his constituents. Although the hon. Minister might be satisfied, having failed to obtain justice, he (Mr. Mitchell) would continue to press the case until justice was done. If the hon. Minister chose to rest satisfied while injustice was shown the people of Westmoreland, he hoped his constituents would learn what the hon. gentleman had said, and, if he did not represent them better, allow him to retire. The Bill was utterly insufficient to carry out the object in view, and the people had the right to demand that in those cases of damages they should be permitted to submit their claims before an ordinary Court of law. He would, therefore, feel it to be his duty to oppose the Bill at every stage.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said the reference he made to cases of claims for cattle killed in his county being unsatisfied by the Government was for the purpose of answering the charge which the hon. member for Northumberland had made without any foundation whatever—that, because he was an opponent and not a supporter of the Government, his constituents did not receive equal favour. He (Mr. Smith) wished it to be distinctly understood that he was not prepared to prostitute his position to satisfy a claimant in his county because he (Mr. Smith) happened to be its representative. He had never used his influence as a member of the Government with Mr. Brydges, the Superintendent, or any other employé of the Government for the purpose of inducing him to adopt a different policy in respect to his (Mr. Smith's) constituents than towards those of the hon. member for Northumberland. That hon. member talked with great assurance and seemed to think he had charge of the whole country. He had not, however, charge of him (Mr. Smith) or his constituents, who knew him and returned him as their representative. The hon. member for Northumberland had indicated that he (Mr. Smith) would not be again returned.

Mr. MITCHELL: I never said anything of the kind, and never hinted at it, but it ought to be so.

Mr. SMITH said he was glad he was not under the control of the hon. gentleman. He was prepared to compare his administration of the Department over which he presided, with that of his predecessor, and, when he wished to institute a comparison, he was prepared to meet the hon. member. If he failed to discharge his duty, no doubt his constituents would condemn him and leave him at home. They knew him well; he had been their representative during 26 years uninterruptedly; and, if the time should come when they thought he had betrayed their confidence and declined to re-elect him, he would cheerfully bow to their decision, whatever it might be.

MR. MITCHELL said the hon. Minister, in endeavouring to make a little political capital in regard to him, had made a mistake. The hon. gentleman had alleged that he had interfered with his county and his Department, but he had not interfered with either. He did not, at the election, send down telegrams to the hon. gentleman's county.

MR. DYMOND rose to a point of order. The incidents of last election did not form the subject of the Bill before the House.

MR. MITCHELL said the hon. member had discussed the administration of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and had chosen to refer to his interference with the county of Westmoreland. He never attempted to interfere in the hon. gentleman's election, but the hon. member, at the last election, sent down telegrams to his (Mr. Mitchell's) county which were read from the hustings.

MR. DYMOND asked if the hon. gentleman was in order.

The CHAIRMAN ruled that the hon. member was out of order, and asked him to confine his remarks to the amendment before the Committee.

MR. MITCHELL said the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had chosen to assume that he had interfered with his constituency, which was not the fact. He had chosen to say, because he (Mr. Mitchell) neglected his duty to his constituents—

MR. SMITH: I rise to a question of order. I do not think that I made any such statement; but, I said I did not prostitute my power, as a member of the Government, to press claims from parties in any county.

MR. MITCHELL said he did not know what the hon. gentleman meant by prostituting authority. Did the hon. gentleman apply that term to him in any way? If this were done outside of the House, he knew what he would do. He had never prostituted his position in the House; he came there to represent the interests of his constituents, and to get justice.

He approached the Government with these claims, but he could get no justice, because he was an opponent of the Administration. He said this fearlessly. It was beyond contradiction. His hon. friend the member for Westmoreland need not bring up these cases in regard to which the hon. gentleman said he did not prostitute his position. Perhaps it better suited the hon. gentleman to occupy the position of Cabinet Minister, to enjoy his salary, than to press the claims of his constituents. If this was what the hon. gentleman meant, he was welcome to it. The amendment of the hon. the Minister of Public Works did not meet the case of which he complained, and would not give speedy justice; it gave no remedy to the poor man. It was stated: Let him go to the Supreme Court; but there was no remedy for him there or anywhere. The Bill proposed to give the Government power to appoint one of their own nominees in this regard, and even his decision was not to be final, save when the Government chose; this was no remedy at all.

MR. HADDOW said he was very glad that the Government had taken some steps in this matter. Not many counties along the railway had more reason to complain in this respect than his own county. Many very serious cases had long been open, which wanted to be settled; and, on coming here, he was asked to seek for settlement. He had applied for it, and he found that, in certain cases, the amounts offered were altogether inadequate for the claims in question. He had asked what was the next step to be taken, and he was told that the only other thing that could be done was to go before the Dominion Arbitrators; but, before doing so, such claimants would have to give bonds that all expenses would be paid, provided the award of the Arbitrators was not equal to what the Government had proposed to pay. A poor man could not do this. He understood that such claimant would be exposed to the payment of counsel and witnesses' expenses, and the Government was likely to employ the best counsel. He was very glad that this amendment was proposed. It was a question whether an Arbitrator appointed entirely by the Government would be altogether impartial; some other way might be devised in this connection.

MR. MACKENZIE: What other way? The Judges are appointed by the Government.

MR. HADDOW said, at all events, he was very glad—as his constituents also would be—to hear this proposal. He had great hopes that it would be effective. They all knew that it was very objectionable to most people to have recourse to law, even though they might succeed. The expenses they thus incurred were considerable, and to have the chance of settlement by arbitration would be considered a great boon by a great many in his county.

MR. LANGEVIN said he was afraid that this amendment of the hon. the Minister of Public Works would not meet the case. He feared that the cost would be very heavy, and it would fall on the Government. In a case of $20, $5 or $30, if the Government were not satisfied with the evidence sent by the complainant, they would have to send down an arbitrator who would have to summon witnesses, hold a court and report. A number of days would thus be occupied; the arbitrator would make a report which would be sent to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and the latter would have to investigate the matter. In connection with such large works as the Intercolonial or the Pacific Railway or the canals, the number of these cases would be very numerous; the arbitrators would constantly be occupied in investigating them, and the cost of this would be very heavy. If he rightly understood the hon. the Minister of Public Works, this cost would be borne by the Government. He really believed that it would be better that these claims should be sent up to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and, if they were not settled within a reasonable period, the party, if he was not satisfied with the decision, should have the right to go before a Court of justice in the same way as any individual now had the right to do with respect to the Grand Trunk, Great Western or Canada Southern Railways. If these cases were left in the hands of the Public Works Department, it would be said that they were decided by those who, in the opinion of the public, had committed the offence, through its officers. He supposed that the hon. the Minister of Public Works, out of 50 cases, would receive the report of his officers, at all events, in 48 or 49; hence the litigants would always have the same complaint to make. They would say they had no chance; that an officer of the Government had been sent down, who had for his witnesses officers of the Government; that these had combined together, and that was the result. But, if the complainant had a right to go before a Judge—he would not say a jury—he would be satisfied; the Judge stood between the Government and the people; was independent of the Government; and let him decide if the complainant was not content with the decision of the hon. the Minister of Public Works. This plan would be less costly than the other. He did not suppose that more than twenty out of one hundred cases, and perhaps a less proportion, would go before a Court of justice. In every case under the present scheme, the party complaining would say that he could not obtain justice, and, if an arbitrator was sent down, that the hon. the Minister of Public Works took the ipse dixit of this officer. He believed that the hon. gentleman, before the report was received from the Committee of the Whole, would reconsider the matter, and would allow these parties concerned in these cases where the sums claimed were small, to go before a Court, as was done in the case of any other railway company.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not think that they could do this. The hon. gentleman would understand that, in many cases where a clear claim was made out, payment was not deferred. This would be only necessary in such cases as were disputed, where the evidence was conflicting, and the railway officers reported that there was reason to believe that the Government was not liable. In these instances only, an investigation was necessary. A very large number of claims were paid as a matter of course. Whenever the claim was clear, it would be wrong to delay payment. He did not think that they were, at present, in a position rendering it advisable to go to the ordinary Courts with all the cases that might come before them relating to these damages. The hon. member for Kingston had suggested that it might be desirable—and in this he thought that the hon. gentleman was right—to establish some sort of a Court which would take cognizance of particular claims in the future. This was a matter which the Government would no doubt consider. It would, before the next Session of Parliament, make enquiry into this matter; but he was not at all disposed, from the information he had, to go further than he proposed to do, as he had explained to the House. They had a very great deal of difficulty in resisting improper claims. Many which were exceedingly improper were made. They had had abundant proof that, in a number of instances, cattle and horses were literally turned on the railroad to be killed, in order that compensation might be demanded; and in these cases it was absolutely indispensable that they should be exacting. They desired to place themselves simply in the same position as an ordinary railway company. There was no fear of any arbitrator doing an injustice merely because he had been appointed by the Government. Judges were appointed by the Government, and no one thought that any Judge on that account would deliver a wrong judgment; and, although an arbitrator might not be in some sense a judicial officer, still he was occupied with judicial functions, and would discharge judicial duties, even if he were not a lawyer. He had no doubt whatever but that the remedy would be found a fair one. Many of these complaints he considered without foundation, and many of them might be just. He felt that the necessities of the Government of the country required that they should protect themselves to that extent, and he thought that the present Bill, taken in conjunction with the Act respecting public works, in its other provisions, would afford a fair and sufficient remedy in connection with these cases. He could not agree with the suggestion of the radical character mentioned by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin); but, if, after the Bill was printed, verbal alterations were proposed, of course he would be very glad to have the assistance of any hon. member with the view of improving the measure to such an extent as might be desirable in order to carry out the idea with which he had started.

MR. LANGEVIN said it was because the Arbitrator did not occupy the independent position of a Judge that he made the suggestion in question. If the Arbitrator could be in the position of a Judge and quite independent of the Government, this would give confidence to the public; but, when they knew that this officer could be removed at any time and was entirely in the hands of the Government, such would not be the case, no matter how honourable the Arbitrator might be. The suitors should have the same confidence in the decision and action of this officer as if the matter was investigated before a Judge. He did not suppose that the Judge would prostitute his position because he was appointed by the Government, and he hoped that such a view would never be entertained in this country. He thought that the hon. gentleman saw that there was a great deal of force in his observations, as he seemed inclined to consider, during recess, the question of bringing such claims before the Courts as was suggested the other day by his hon. friend the leader of the Opposition.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes; but I do not suppose that such a thing could be applicable to these small claims.

MR. LANGEVIN said he hoped that this question would at all events remain over for consideration. Perhaps the hon. gentleman next year might see his way to the settlement of these claims before the Courts, or before some tribunal in which the public would have more confidence than in mere arbitration. He trusted that the hon. gentleman would reconsider the amendment.

MR. FISET said that he would like to make a few remarks apropos of the amendment of the hon. the Minister of Public Works. He had had some correspondence with the hon. gentleman on this subject, in the course of which he had expressed views similar to those enunciated by the hon. member for Charlevoix. He had proposed that the Intercolonial Railway should be placed on precisely the same footing with the other railway companies. This was the case with respect to commerce, and why should not the people be permitted, with regard to this question of damages, to go before the Courts. He was aware of the reason given for not pursuing this course—that it would occasion great inconvenience, owing to the fact that these complaints were very numerous; but he would sincerely say that he did not believe that there was any plausibility in this pretension. He considered that it would be much more just, and even more equitable to the parties concerned, to have these matters referred to the Courts for arbitrament. The people would always, in this respect, complain against the action of the Government. They would say that the Government did not do them justice, because these officers were appointed by the Government; and they would hold that the officer who was required to decide these matters was not independent of the Administration, while, if these cases were referred to the Courts, all these objections would disappear. For his part, as he had already informed the hon. the First Minister last year, and also under other circumstances, he shared the opinion of the hon. member for Charlevoix, and maintained that many objections would be removed if these matters were relegated to the Courts for decision, as was done in similar circumstances in the case of other railway companies.

MR. HADDOW: I would like to ask the hon. the First Minister if there is no appeal from the decision of the arbitrator friend will find this in that Act. We have only had, I think, one instance in my term, where such an appeal was made.

MR. MACKENZIE: Under the Public Works Act, where one arbitrator sits, the claimant can appeal to the whole four of the arbitrators. My hon.

MR. LANGEVIN.

MR. SINCLAIR said he thought that the clause under consideration would be of great benefit to the country. At present it was very difficult for those who suffered loss of property, through destruction by the railway or other public works, to get satisfaction. When the Government appointed a person in this connection, he hoped that they would make a good selection, as he would stand in the position of a Judge; and, when witnesses, whether on oath or not, stated what they believed the property destroyed to be worth, he did not think that this officer would hesitate to pay such value, provided he found out that such destruction was owing to the fault of the Government or the Government's employés. But, while they should stand up for the public interests, they should also uphold the interests of the Government. As had been stated, cattle were placed on the road, which were not worth wintering, to be destroyed, in order that a claim for payment might be made; and, at other times, the people, through neglect, allowed property to be destroyed. For instance, in going backward and forward, hauling wood and other material, a farmer might leave his gates open, and allow his cattle to stray out on the road. It might happen that a man's cattle were killed because he left his gates open when they should have been shut, and the Government, in that case, were not entitled to make good the loss. He had not the slightest doubt that, when a person was sent there to adjudicate between the Government and the public, justice would be done. He fully approved of what had been said by the hon. member for Cumberland, but the House would be better able to judge of the truth of his views when the clause he suggested was printed and placed on the members' desks. He thought the Government were taking the most proper means to have the matter amicably, justly and fairly settled.

MR. MITCHELL said the hon. the First Minister had made two statements which he felt it necessary to refer to before this matter was finally settled. The hon. gentleman endeavoured to refute the argument which he (Mr. Mitchell) advanced, that such cases should be tried in Courts of law, by saying that Judges as well as arbitrators were appointed by the Government. But there was not the slightest parallel between the cases; for, while Judges held their offices for life, and could only be removed by the Imperial Parliament, arbitrators could be displaced by the mere whim of the Government in office. For the time being, these arbitrators were the mere creatures of the Administration, and no assurance could be given that their awards would be strictly impartial, as far as the Government was concerned. The hon. the First Minister had also tried to throw suspicion on the claims which came from his (Mr. Mitchell's) county during his administration. Now he challenged the hon. the First Minister to prove that any one of these was a bogus claim. Seven of these were sworn to, and the hon. gentleman had certainly no right to make such insinuations. Before the motion was put, he wished to give notice that he would move an amendment to the Bill, giving to the persons who were suffering from the misconduct of officials, and the mismanagement and mal-administration of Public Works the right of remedy in the Courts of law.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT BILL.

[BILL No. 14.]

(Mr. Laflamme.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1

MR. LAFLAMME moved an amendment to include within the operations of the clause only those who were permanently employed by the Governments of the Provinces.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the amendment would simply have the effect of enabling a few lawyers to get fees while everybody else employed by a Provincial Government would be excluded. The proposed amendment was entirely opposed to the spirit and principle of the Act, which was simply intended to protect the House and persons dependent on the general Government. It was an attempt to exclude persons from being members of Parliament who were otherwise properly qualified. Why should the clerk, who acted as a legal adviser, the treasurer, or any corporation officers who received salaries be admitted, and the employes of the Province of Quebec be excluded?

MR. MACKENZIE: To what corporations do you refer.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Montreal or Toronto. The officers of the Government of Quebec or any Province were just as free to act in this House and as free from the influence of the Dominion Government as any member of Parliament. The salaries of provincial officers could not be affected by their connection with the Dominion Parliament and why then should they be excluded? Then, as regarded the part of the amendment which referred to permanent employment, he would like to know whether a person who was employed for a year or two years, as the case might be, could be considered as having a permanent appointment. The very fact of its being for a specified time showed that it was temporary, and unless an appointment was one for life no Court would consider it anything but temporary. The Parliament had no right to limit the choice of the people.

MR. LAFLAMME said that, in his opinion, there was just as good reason for excluding an officer of a Local Government as of the Federal Government. A man was just as much in dependence on the Crown under a Local Government as under the Federal Government, and if he did his duty to the former his time and attention would be fully occupied; besides, the Local Government and the Federal Government should be as independent of each other as possible.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: So they are.

MR. LAFLAMME: No, they have not been in the past, unfortunately. The Local Government of Quebec had excluded all the Federal officers from participating in the affairs of their House, and he wished that the Federal Government should take the same course with officers connected with the Local Government, in order to produce the result they were all anxious for—the separation of the Local and Federal Parliaments.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he had no doubt his friend the Minister of Justice would be glad to receive the assistance of gentlemen on the opposite side, because the question was in no sense a party one, and in view of the coming election it was desirable that everything which stood in the way of the independence of Parliament should be removed. It was necessary that all ambiguity as to the law should be removed because it had been admitted by lawyers that, under the present Act, there was no security. Besides, the Legislature of Quebec and that of New Brunswick denied that they should be quite distinct from the Federal Parliament. In deference to the wishes of hon. gentlemen opposite, however, his hon. friend the Minister of Justice, believing that gentlemen who conducted criminal prosecutions on behalf of Local Governments did so merely as lawyers who received a fee for their services, and would not be influenced by other considerations if returned to the Federal Parliament, had agreed to amend the Bill. The question was one of great difficulty, but the line must be drawn somewhere because it would not do to disqualify a man for a trifling matter. The measure was brought forward, not in the interests of the Government, but in the interests of the people. If, therefore, the phraseology made use of by his hon. friend was not sufficiently clear, no doubt he would be quite prepared to modify it.

MR. LAFLAMME.

MR. MASSON: Would it not be better to adopt the law of Quebec altogether?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Will you read the phrase used in the Quebec Statute?

MR. MASSON said there were two Acts. One was passed in 1869, and the first clause of it was amended in 1872. But there was a special clause which was not repealed by the Act of 1872.

MR. MACKENZIE said it was desirable to make the words as distinct as possible, because there were certain classes of officials whom it would not do to admit as members of the House. In Ontario, for example, the Clerks of the Peace and Registrars had the surveillance of the rolls; also to a certain extent the Sheriffs, who were ex officio Returning Officers. Of course they were not bound to act as Returning Officers, but if they did, they ought certainly to be disqualified.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess

MR. OUMET said that the argument of the Minister of Justice was that no member of this House should be under the influence of this Government or the Provincial Governments. If this argument was sound, the consequence would be that not only the permanent employes of the Provincial Government but also the temporary employes of this Government should be excluded from this Parliament. The same principle applied in both cases. The hon. gentleman had laid down a general principle that no member must be influenced by this Government, or by any party outside of this House. That being so, there was no more reason to exclude from this Parliament members who might be influenced by the Local Governments than there was to exclude members who might be influenced by powerful corporations. It was well known that for years the attorney to the corporation of Montreal had sat in this House, as well as members of the council of Montreal. This corporation of Montreal was quite as powerful as the Government of Quebec. He did not think that he was mistaken in stating that the amount raised and controlled by the corporation of the city of Montreal was even larger than the amount controlled by the Province of Quebec; and, if this principle was put into practice, there was no reason why they should not exclude members under the influence of the Montreal corporation, or even members under the influence of any man outside of this House. His idea was that they should stick to the general principle, as proposed by the right hon. member for Kingston, namely, that the members of this House should be independent, pecuniarily speaking, of the Government of the day. This comprised everything, and, if they went outside of that, there was no limit to the principle; it might be carried to the most absurd lengths, and this Bill, instead of being called a Bill to secure the independence of the members of Parliament, should be called a Bill to exclude people from being members, or to exclude people from this House who might embarrass the Government. It had been said by the hon. Minister of Public Works that some employés in the nomination of the Local Government had sometimes to exercise judicial functions in regard to the electoral lists. These officials, the moment they had performed those duties in relation to this House, would, he understood, not be eligible as members of this House, and they would be equally excluded by the general clause. So there was no need for any new legislation with regard to this point. He could not approve of the employés of the Local Government being in this House, but he thought it should be left to the Local Government to protect themselves, and not to allow their employés to come here and take up the time for which they were paid for the performance of other duties. He thought this clause, as amended, was—he would not say absurd, because that was an unparliamentary word, but it was based upon no reasonable grounds, because, if they laid down this principle with regard to the permanent employés of the Local Government, the same objection must apply to the temporary employés, and scarcely anybody would be left eligible for membership of this House. There was another part of the clause which he would like to see amended. This was the 14th line—"Nor any person entitled to superannuation or retiring allowance." The reason given by the hon. the Minister of Justice in reference to superannuated employés held good, in his opinion, because if these gentlemen could be called back after retirement to perform other duties for the Government; they remained the dependents of the Government; and as long as they remained so dependent they could not be elected, unless they chose to give up their superannuation. But he did not concur in the reasons given by the hon. the Minister of Justice with regard to the Judges. It was very well known that, having been fifteen years on duty as Judges they might resign, and then the Government provided a pension for the rest of their lives. This pension was not paid under certain reservations: during good conduct, and there was nothing less than conviction for high treason that would deprive them of it. So these gentlemen were entirely out of the hands of the Government, and entirely free from any influence of the Government, and, therefore, he did not see how they could be excluded.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman is mistaken in stating that Judges may retire after fifteen years' service.

MR. OUIMET said this question had been raised a few days ago, and after looking into the matter himself he understood that, after fifteen years—

MR. MACKENZIE said that was only in cases where the Judge was so afflicted by bodily infirmity as to be unfitted for the discharge of his duty. The particular clause referring to this point laid it down that when any Judge of the County Court became, after having continued in such office of Judge of a County Court in either of the Provinces of Canada for fifteen years or upwards, afflicted with some permanent infirmity which disabled him from duty, or in case he should have continued in such office of Judge in the County Court of either of the said Provinces for twenty-five years or upwards, then and in no other case, should such Judge resign his office and be granted an annuity for the term of his natural life. This was to say that he could resign after twenty-five years' service, but in no case except one of permanent injury could he resign before.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: A Superior Court Judge can resign after fifteen years.

MR. LAFLAMME said they could retire after that period, but the interpretation put upon it was that it was only upon the understanding they could not at that time efficiently discharge their duties as Judge. Not a single Judge had received his retiring allowance before twenty-five years of service, so that established the fact.

MR. MACKENZIE said a case came up a short time ago in which Judge Begby wished to retire at fifteen years, taking that interpretation of the Act, but the Government were not able to accede to that view.

MR. OUMET said all this was nothing to his argument. There were Judges who had retired from their office in Quebec, and supposing one of these gentlemen, whom he considered perfectly qualified to perform legislative duties, should be elected to this Parliament, what was to hinder him from taking his seat? Although he received a retiring allowance he was perfectly independent of the Government, and from his twenty years' experience in the administration of the law he was better qualified than himself (Mr. Ouimet) or many other members of this House. Why should the country be deprived of their ability and vast legal knowledge? He thought this Bill would certainly be improved by striking those words "on retiring allowances," out of it. He was very thankful to the House for having allowed him to express his opinions, and he would be still more thankful to the hon. the Minister of Justice if he would choose to take notice of them and put them in practice in this Bill.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. MILLS said he quite agreed with the observations of his hon. friend from Laval, that no one should be disqualified without some reason, and he thought there was sufficient reason for assenting to the disqualification provided for in the section now under consideration. The right hon. member for Kingston, in discussing this question, stated that disqualification should be confined to persons who might be influenced by the Administration of the day. He did not agree with the right hon. gentleman. In dealing with the subject of the independence of Parliament, they were called upon to legislate with reference to any parliament or body, whether a political body or not, which possessed such influence as to interfere with the independence of Parliament, as much as with regard to undue influence exercised by the Crown. What were the facts of the case? This hon. gentleman did not call in question the principle of legislation upon the subject of officers of the Crown holding seats in this House. They were quite agreed upon that point. They quite agreed that persons appointed by the Administration who depended on the Administration for their salaries and were capable of being removed at any time, ought not to sit in this House. Judges who were appointed during good behaviour, who received their salaries under statutory authority, were as independent of this House and the Crown as any of the gentlemen alluded to by the right hon. member for Kingston, and yet he would hardly say that the Judges of the Supreme Court should be eligible to take their seat. It was quite as improper for gentlemen holding seats or drawing salaries from the Local Government, and holding permanent situations under it, in any one of the Provinces, to be eligible for election to this House. What would be the position of any officer of the Local Government who would take a seat in this House, if that Government came in and asked for aid. Supposing the Government of the Province to which the hon. gentleman belonged came and said they were poor; without the necessary resources to carry on the Government; that they required their subsidy to be increased; that they wished to see the Dominion Parliament made a mere taxing machine for the purpose of raising funds to enable Local Governments to carry on their affairs; would the officer of that Government be free to act according to the dictates of his conscience and of his judgment? He would be a mere pensioner of the Local Government, sitting in this House to do its bidding. It was, obviously, quite as proper, if they were to effectually secure the independence of Parliament, that an officer holding a permanent situation under a Local Government, should be excluded from this House as well as an officer holding a permanent situation under the Federal Government. With regard to the use of the word "permanent," the observations of the hon. gentleman are somewhat hypercritical. The clause of the Bill stated:

"No person accepting or holding any office, commission, or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the Government of Canada, or of the Government of any of the Provinces of Canada, at the nomination of the Crown, or at the nomination of any of the officers of the Government of Canada, or of the Government of any of the Provinces of Canada, to which any salary, fee, wages, allowance, or emolument, or profit of any kind is attached; nor any person entitled to any superannuation or retiring allowance from the Government of Canada, shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons, nor shall he sit or vote therein."

No one could pretend to say that these words were not sufficiently defined. There were certain classes of officers included under permanent and others under temporary officers. The "permanent" included those who held their office under the Statute which provided for the appointment of those officers, and made no provision as to when those appointments should cease. It made no provision, not that the officers should cease to hold office, but that the office should cease to exist. The word "permanent" applied to the office, not to the officer. It was used expressly in the same sense in the second clause, when it referred to officers appointed under the authority of the Local Government. They knew that, besides this word in the old Statute, those additional words, "To which an annual salary was attached," were inserted; those were qualifying words, and they knew how hon. gentlemen opposite interpreted the Statute. They appointed an officer who, from the nature of the appointment, held a permanent position under the authority of Parliament, and who, so far as the spirit of the law was concerned, was appointed in violation of it; but, as this Statute was highly penal in its provisions, and, according to the reading of the rules applicable to penal Statutes, would be practically so construed, this gentleman was paid, not an annual, but a monthly salary, and the Statute was evaded. Leaving out all allusion to salary, it would be impossible, if this clause were adopted as the hon. the Minister of Justice proposed, that any such evasion could be practiced under the provisions of the law. The same expression was used in the Act of 1871, "No person accepting or holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary." It was quite clear the word was used in its proper legal sense, with reference to the continuance of the office, not with reference to the continuance of the officer. If a person were appointed to such an office, he came under the disqualifying provisions of the law. The reasons for extending the provisions arose from the relations existing between the two Governments, from the peculiar relations which might at any time be called into existence by the action of the Local Government. It was proper that no one should sit in this House as the placeman of a Local Government.

MR. MCDUGALL (Three Rivers) said he believed all legislation was intended to remedy an evil, or to avoid a danger. The discussion which had taken place, relative to the exclusion of employes of a Local Government, seemed to be of a nature to avoid danger, but the evil did not exist. Those employes had hitherto had the right to sit in Parliament, even members of the Local House had this right at the beginning of Confederation before dual representation was abolished. Employes were not really excluded by the Local Legislature, and they were now fighting to exclude them. The present Bill reminded him of the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster), to fix the length that a man should wear his hair, and to exclude Chinese from the Pacific coast. Was there any danger that this House should be invaded by an army of employés from any of the Provincial Governments? The danger was so slight that it was unnecessary to think of it. The evil which required to be remedied, and for which they ought to legislate, was not the evil of employés of Local Government, sitting in this House, which was an imaginary one, but that of members of Parliament being disqualified, as was the case last year, on account of having had some small transactions with the Government. The cases of their respected Speaker, and of the leader of the left centre, and the hon. member for Ottawa, were striking instances in point. They had had transactions with the Government of a nature which had really never been intended to come under the operation of the Independence of Parliament Act, but which were included, according to the exact letter of the Act, and those gentlemen had to resign their seats and go back to the country. This was the evil that required to be remedied, not the danger of being invaded by the employés of any Provincial Government. Those employés could not obtain a seat in this House while the people were strong enough to exclude them. The people knew better than to return persons who had been satisfied with small situations under a Local Government, or small or large situations under this Government. There was no necessity for this part of the Bill, and he was of opinion that the people should have full liberty to elect employés if they considered they had the requisite talent and ability. He was an interested man on this occasion. If he could believe the newspaper reports, his adversary at the coming elections was to be the Chief Commissioner of Railways for the Province of Quebec. He certainly did not want to deprive his adversary of the chance of running against him, which this Bill, if passed, would do, but would rather see him come out and try his chance. He had as good wind as his adversary, and would, probably, be back in this House in good time.

MR. McDougall.

MR. BUNSTER said the hon. gentleman who had just spoken had alluded to his motion of the other day. That motion would eventually call for more serious consideration than had been given it. It did not interfere with the Independence of Parliament Act; but, should his Province become swarmed with the people his motion referred to, instead of six members, such as those who now represented the Province, they might have in this House six members or more wearing their hair over five inches long. He would like to see a clause introduced into the Independence of Parliament Act that a member of this House should be ineligible to hold any public office save on the Ministerial benches. This would remove the possibility of any inducement being held to members of Parliament to give their support to any Ministry, and make the Dominion Parliament far more independent than it now was.

MR. GUTHRIE said the argument of the hon. member for Three Rivers, if carried out, would permit the employés of this Government, or of any other Government, to be eligible for election to this House. The hon. member had said, as he understood his argument, that no legislation should be made against any probable or prospective difficulty; but that legislation should be so made, that what the independence of Parliament meant would be well understood. If the people were to have full choice, it would be applicable to employés of this as well as any other Government, and consequently there would be no occasion for any disqualifying clause with respect to the legality of candidates. If there was any probability of the House being invaded, as had been stated by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, by pensioners of other Governments, and his hon. friend from Three Rivers did not undertake to controvert that proposition, but contended that it was not likely to take place to any great extent, it should be legislated against. This measure was intended to be a measure for the protection of the independence of Parliament, not only for this term but for terms to come; and in legislating upon such an important subject, that of hedging the independence of Parliament with all possible safeguards compatible with the interests of the community at large and Parliament itself, it was necessary to provide for all the contingencies that would be likely to occur. Consequently, the provision in this Bill, to prevent anything of this kind occurring, ought to be favourably considered and adopted by the House. With respect to retired Judges, it was evident, as the hon. the Premier had stated the other day, that judges who had retired from the Bench, must have been incapacitated from discharging the duties of their office, that was, those Judges who had retired under the twenty-five years' term. If the Government were so depressed that they required the service of such a Judge, they could withdraw the allowance and get him elected to Parliament. If a learned Judge, who had retired from the Bench, was desirous of placing himself at the disposal of the people, and of being elected to Parliament, he could forego his allowance, and he would feel more free by so doing, in the discharge of his duties and in the exercise of the right placed at his disposal by the people, than if he sat in Parliament the pensioner of the Government, who might initiate legislation to decrease or increase his salary, or abolish it altogether. The principle upon which permanent officers of the Local Governments should be excluded was this, that a Minister of the Crown here should not be enabled to exercise influence upon members, friends of other Governments, which they would not do directly here. Supposing an officer of a Local Government was elected to this House, and that Government were politically friendly to Ministers of the Crown here, that member was under a certain degree of restraint, for, if he voted to displease his friends in the Local Government and in the Government here, he might be dismissed from office. Then, again, favours might be offered, the Local Government might appoint a member of this House to office for the purpose of securing his support to the political party in power here. There was no denying the fact that the Liberals in this House sympathized with the Liberals in all the Provinces, and the Conservatives in like manner. It was their duty to prevent Ministers of the Crown from doing indirectly what they were not permitted to do directly. It was rather amusing to see hon. members, who were in favour of what might be called a retaliatory fiscal policy, condemn that same policy in connection with the Independence of Parliament. The simple argument in favour of the proposal was that Parliament should not permit Ministers of the Crown to exercise influence in this House or the Local Governments, through their friends, that it would not allow local placemen to be here who could be influenced by the Local Government, either by threats of dismissal or promises of office. The question was worthy of consideration whether they might not judiciously go further, and make contractors under the Local Government disqualified to sit in Parliament. With regard to retiring allowances to Judges, the amount they received was subject to the legislation of Parliament, and if they were members of the House they would be in a position to alter the conditions of their allowances, and to vote against a reduction, if such were proposed. If a man occupied the position of Judge during twenty-five years and then withdrew from the Bench on a retiring allowance, he retired from the public service, he should be excluded from becoming a Parliamentary representative, or from holding any office in a Local Legislature that might affect his position in respect of his pension. For those reasons he supported the amendment proposed by the hon. the Minister of Justice.

MR. LANGEVIN said he could not agree with hon. members opposite with regard to the position of retired Judges who had withdrawn from the Bench on retiring allowances. It had been argued that, if such gentlemen had seats in Parliament they could by their votes affect their pensions. It was, however, well known that when a Judge retired he had by law an allowance, and that was his property. Parliament, of course, had the power to deprive those Judges of their retiring allowances, as a neighbor might rob you though he had not the right to do it. According to right, retired Judges were entitled to an allowance for life, and, therefore, their position in Parliament would not affect their positions. In regard to the argument of the hon. member for Laval, with respect to superannuated officers, he was correct so long as those officers were less than 60 years old; but when an officer resigned at that age and received his retiring allowance, he was not subject to be called upon by the Government to fill any office. Such an officer received an allowance the same as if he were a Judge, the allowance was his property, and that officer of sixty years of age having so retired was perfectly free from Government influence. Such officers, for example as heads of Departments, who possessed knowledge and experience, in regard to those public Departments, should not be deprived of seats in the House if the people desired to return them. The question had been raised as to what was the object of the Bill. There could be only two reasons for disqualification, the first was to punish a man either for crime or breach of the privileges of the House or some offence which rendered him unworthy to sit; the second was to prevent a person taking his seat who might be under the influence of the Government. How could the officers of the Local Government be affected by the Dominion Government. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) had endeavoured to show that the Dominion Government might, though a Local Government friendly to them, do acts which they could not do themselves. If, however, the Federal Government desired to violate or evade the law, it was always easy for them to do so. If they wished to give an office or cause an office to be given by a Local Government to a friend in the Federal Parliament, they might say, "If you vote for this Government that is friendly to us, you shall have an office after this Session of Parliament is over." They had no guarantee that such influence would not be used, even after the passage of this Act. If a promise of office were not made to a member it might be given to his son, and, indeed, the Government might always reach men if they wished to influence them. The restrictions provided in the measure before the House might be extended if they were led to proceed from one step to another, until two-thirds of the people were disqualified from sitting in Parliament. Why were hon. gentlemen opposite so much afraid of the people? Surely a large body of them were as clever as their representatives in Parliament, and it was quite unnecessary to tell them not to select certain men for particular reasons. Their discussions at church doors, and on the hustings were to ascertain which political party was worthy of their confidence, and who had been good representatives and honest members. The law, moreover, provided that a certain number of days' notice should be allowed, in order that the people might not be taken by surprise. The present measure restricted the rights of the people and decided for them, and, no doubt, if hon. gentlemen opposite thought they could do so, they would declare that each county should elect a certain person as its Parliamentary representative. The hon. the Minister of Justice gave, as a reason why officers of a Local Government should not sit in the House, that they were paid for performing certain duties, and they should discharge them. It was very kind on his part to point out to Local Governments and their officers how they should act, but Local Governments would attend to that matter themselves as they had hitherto done. During the ten years of Confederation, they had not seen many of those officers in the House of Commons; there was not one such officer a member now, and there had not been one since 1867. When an hon. member had been appointed by a Local Government to an office, he resigned his seat, and did not subsequently return to Parliament. No inconvenience had arisen from the existing state of things. If a large number of officials of the Local Governments held seats, the question might be one for consideration. But there was no reason for legislation on this matter, for there was not a single member an officer of the Local Government.

MR. MACKENZIE: How many were candidates?

MR. LANGEVIN said he had not counted them. If the hon. the First Minister had a list of them, the House would be glad to know the number; but he knew that in his own Province not one of such officers had contested a constituency. The suggestion of the First Minister was that there had been a good many of such candidates. The people had shown, however, that they did not want them, for they had not elected them, and the choice was safe in their hands. That was another reason why he asked hon. gentlemen opposite not to be afraid of the people, who knew their duty and would perform it in the future as they had done it in the past. In regard to the case of officers who occupied positions which enabled them to have power over papers and documents connected with elections to Parliament, it might be matter for consideration, whether they should not be disqualified from sitting in the House the same as Judges. While there might be reason for that action or not, it was unnecessary to provide that these clerks in offices should not have a right to be elected; it would be time enough when they were elected and any danger arose. A question had been raised by hon. gentleman opposite as to what would be the position of an officer of a Local Legislature who should be a member of the Dominion Parliament when his Government asked aid from Parliament. He would not, however, be in a different position from that of an employé of the Grand Trunk and Great Western Railways, or even that of a paid editor of a newspaper. If a measure affecting newspapers was submitted, it would be said that a member who was a newspaper editor could not give an independent vote on it. That, however, would occur with respect to many other measures that came before Parliament. Many hon. members were shareholders in banks, and it could not be said that, on a Bill relating to banking, the fact of his holding bank stock should prevent him acting independently. If that point were maintained a large majority of the members would be disqualified to give a free and independent vote on measures submitted to the House. He hoped the hon. the First Minister would see the propriety of not excluding permanent officers of Local Governments, and would not press the proposal.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he supposed it had been often remarked that the principle which underlay this Bill was that the hon. members in this House should be independent of the Government of the day, and he supposed it might be added that, if human nature was not wicked, and every man, including king and servant, would always do exactly right, there might be no necessity for an Independence of Parliament Act. It was very easy in discussing the subject, to say, "While, I am sure, no member of the Local Government, and no member of this House, will do this, that, or the other; but the Independence of Parliament presumed there might be improper collusion between the Crown, and members of Parliament, and it was to provide against that difficulty that legislation on the subject of the independence of Parliament became necessary. The hon. member for Charlevoix, in dealing with the question of the position of employés of the Local Government, had attacked the hon. the Minister of Justice for having said that those employés ought to be earning their money in their own positions, and had no business in Parliament, and the hon. member said that the Local Governments would themselves look after that matter. Why if there was any reason at all for this legislation, the object of it was to preclude the possibility of collusion between the Local Government and some influence that prevailed here. The Local Government might get five times the value of the salary in the services of placemen chosen to do their work; and, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said, the Local Government might want a subsidy and send their own officers here. The hon. gentleman spoke of the people as if the people could not thus be influenced. He was delighted with the sentiment the hon. gentleman expressed, and with the progress which hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House were making in obtaining a wide appreciation of the responsibilities with which the people might be trusted. There was nothing like opposition for tutorship of that kind. The hon. gentleman spoke as if the Local Government would have no influence over the elections and could exercise no influence in securing the election of their nominees in the different counties. They could well understand a case in which their influence might mean a very great deal. The hon. gentleman said they had had no trouble; they had not had these placemen here; and let them not legislate until they saw these persons here. But they were dealing with the question in the best way they could; they were dealing with a question of very great difficulty; a question in connection with which he ventured to say, even if the hon. gentlemen were to deal with it and draw up a Bill, there would still be debateable clauses. They were dealing with a question which imposed the necessity of providing against the evils that were in conflict with the principle that members of the House must be independent of the Crown; and in order to do so properly, they had to look at probabilities. When they looked to the Local Legislature and considered that it might be possible for collusion to exist between that Legislature and parties in the House, they felt that there might be improprieties, and these they were endeavouring to prevent. When they looked at the cases of retired Judges, they saw that even these men might possibly have improper motives, though by the system under which they sat on the Bench they were supposed to have no such motives, and the policy of the Government was to prevent these persons being subject to any temptation to rise higher, as far as was possible, in order that they might be contented with their lot, and, to a certain extent, bury their ambition, as far as promotion went. They might regard it as possible that sometime in life a Judge might find it desirable to leave the Bench, even for the purpose of improving his position, and it would be seen that they were legislating against all these possible evils that might occur. The hon. gentleman said: wait until they do occur. Why, were they to legislate on this subject of the independence of Parliament every year? Was this the practice in England? They were now dealing with a law that was passed there in the time of George the Third. He hoped that it would be a long time before further legislation would be necessary in this respect; but, surely, where evils were patent and likely to crop up, it was well to deal with them. The hon. gentleman said, with charming simplicity: "Why, you are afraid of the people; why do you restrict the people's choice; why do you not trust them; they know what is wanted, and can take care of themselves." Did the hon. gentleman wish to make a common application of this principle, or only to apply it in the particular direction to which he objected? It was to protect the people that legislation was initiated by which placemen could not sit in this House. It was to protect the people that the influence of the Crown was especially excluded from this House; in order that members might vote independently, without being subject to any of the power which patronage and prestige might sometimes exercise upon them. They were not afraid of the people. The great mass of the people who sent representatives to this House were protected in this way; and, if there were unfortunate counties which did not understand the principle of free Government, and which were willing to elect placemen and send them here to do the work of the Government, and be the henchmen of the Administration, so to speak, then this legislation would stand up in the name of the people, and protect that county against itself. Why were there any restrictions? Why were there voters' qualifications? Why did the hon. gentleman permit any class of men to be declared to be ineligible for election? Why did not the hon. gentleman apply his own principle, and trust the people? The hon. gentleman knew them, and that they would not send any such men here. The fact was that the hon. gentleman made this mistake in his argument: that, while he applied this particular doctrine, and would trust everything to the people,—and surely they were the people, so far as legislation in this House was concerned,—while applying this doctrine to this particular amendment, the hon. gentleman would not think of applying it to analogous restrictions or provisions already found in the law. Again, the hon. gentleman, in regard to another illustration, said: “You can have members in the House connected with a newspaper or a railway company.” This was all very true; and there was no doubt whatever that it sometimes did happen that powerful corporations exercised too much influence, not only in this House, but in other deliberative bodies throughout the world, wherever representative institutions were known. Did the hon. gentleman forget that the object of this Bill was not to deal with banks, and railways and newspapers? The Crown did not control the newspaper editor. What they desired to do and to legislate for was to secure the independence of members as regarded their own relations to the Crown, and not respecting their relations to the proprietor of a newspaper, or the proprietors of a railway, or those who had influence and power in other great corporations; so the hon. gentleman’s argument fell entirely to the ground, and it appeared to him that, while with his usual fluency he made a very charming appeal, the hon. gentleman did not speak with his usual perspicacity; and he (Mr. Huntington) could not see himself—perhaps the fault lay with himself—why the hon. gentleman should be so anxious to trust the people with regard to this restriction, and not as to the others; and why he should seem to draw a parallel between the servant of a newspaper or corporation here and a servant of the Crown. Altogether, the hon. gentleman quite failed to convince him that he made out any case for the conclusion at which he arrived.

Mr. BOWELL said there were two classes of men who were disqualified by this clause. The whole argument of the past hour had been devoted to the class who were disqualified, and who were what was termed “place-men of the Local Government,” by the Ministers who had spoken. He would call the attention of the House to the other class disqualified by this clause. The hon. member for South Wellington, as well as the hon. the Minister of the Interior, pointed out to the House the impropriety of allowing members of this House to be tampered with by the Local Government, by which the latter might influence them in their votes, either owing to their being friendly to the Ministry of the day or in order to obtain something they might require. If this argument be good, it had just as much force against temporary as against permanent employment. The hon. the Minister of the Interior shook his head; but it was true. If the Ontario Government was desirous of assisting the present Government by means of subsidizing a member of this House, it could do it just as well by giving him temporary as permanent employment, because he believed that, if a man would sell himself—it would be nothing more or less—for a permanent office, he would do so, if the amount was large enough, for temporary employment. He was quite satisfied that no one in the House or the country imagined that the hon. the Minister of the Interior, then a member of this House, was influenced in the slightest degree in his vote, or whatever he might have done, because he had been employed by the Local Government of Ontario. Yet, if they examined the Public Accounts of Ontario, they would find that the Hon. David Mills—supposed to be the present Minister of the Interior—figured there for $2,240 for services rendered touching arbitration in connection with the North-West boundary, which was temporary employment. Being favourable to this Government, and the Local Government being desirous of obtaining a better arrangement as to the North-West boundary, why should the Local Government be permitted to employ any gentleman, holding a seat in this House, temporarily to do that work, and pay him more, and not give him a permanent situation? He held that, if there was any argument in the position taken by these hon. gentlemen, it was just as forcible in the one as in the other case. He did not desire to be understood as even insinuating that this employment on the part of the Ontario Government would have the slightest effect on the vote or action of the hon. gentleman. He was quite satisfied that such was not the case. He instanced it to show that temporary employment under this Act might have just as bad an effect as permanent employment. The hon. the Postmaster-General pointed out that the desire of the House and Government was to protect the people from themselves. His idea of the Independence of Parliament Act was that they should protect the people from undue influence being used on their members after they had been elected to this House. If a candidate had temporary employment in the service of this or any other Government, and the people selected him, and they were to provide by law that the people should not select him, though it was a temporary employment, they infringed on the rights of the people to that extent. What he desired to do, and what he thought the Government should desire to do, would be to prevent the possibility of a member being tampered with while in the House, because then the people would have no power to turn him out until the next election. In the meantime such member could be subsidized or receive temporary employment, or almost permanent employment, while in the House, thereby influencing him in his votes, and making him an actual bona fide placeman. The hon. the Minister of the Interior said that the House and country knew how the late Administration interpreted the Independence of Parliament Act. He thought the House did know this and how it came to the conclusion that it was not properly interpreted, and compelled the Ministry of the day to make it still more restrictive; but, notwithstanding those restrictions, the House and country knew how the present Ministry had tampered with members of the House in connection with the same Bill. If the late Government, with an Act permissive in its character allowing temporary employment to members of the House, did wrong, how much greater was the wrong done by the present Administration, in violating the law after it had been made more restrictive by and through their own action? This Bill provided that no person accepting or holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the Government of Canada, or at the nomination of any of the officers of the Government of Canada, to which any salary, fee, wages, allowance or emolument, or profit of any kind was attached, should be qualified, etc., to sit and vote in this House. One or two practical ideas were suggested to him in connection with this clause. Suppose a warden of the Kingston Penitentiary, who was an officer of this Government, advertised for a thousand cords of wood, in any of the newspapers, for the use of the Penitentiary, the money would certainly be paid by the Government, the employment was obtained through an officer of this Government; and, whoever might be the proprietor of the Journal, he would be disqualified from coming to this House. Again, suppose the same warden should purchase a supply of groceries or hardware, or anything else required for the Penitentiary, from any person, that person would be disqualified under this Bill, as also the hardware merchant, who might supply 20lb. of nails, this being an employment to which an allowance or fee would be attached, which allowance would be paid by the Government. Was it the serious intention of the House to enact a law going so far as this? Or, had he put a wrong interpretation upon the language of the Bill? If he had, he would only be too glad to be set right by the hon. the Minister of Justice, who, he supposed, drafted the Bill. This was a very serious question, and it was for the House, the Government and the people to say whether any law affecting the independence of Parliament should be carried to the extent which he believed, under this clause was done. If so, they had better at once enact a law declaring that no member of the House should be connected with any business whatever, nor sell any article that could come into the use of the Government or any person connected with it.

MR. BOWELL.

This was really the meaning of the Bill. He had seen accounts that day in the Public Accounts Committee which would, under the present Act or law, disqualify members of the House. True, the sum was very small, amounting to some $15, $20 and $30; but still these were cases which would come within the meaning of the Bill, and if any person thought proper to send them before the Committee of Privileges and Elections, the members would have to vacate their seats and be subject to the penalty imposed in the 4th section of the Bill.

MR. IRVING said he understood that the Committee was then considering the first section as proposed to be amended by introducing the consideration of the permanent employment of those in the service of any Local Government, and also the propriety of retaining the last words of the clause with reference to the ineligibility of those who enjoyed pensions. Regarding the first proposition, respecting any of these offices which it would be manifestly inconsistent, inconvenient and incongruous in the position of a member of the House he should enjoy, at the appointment of any Local Legislature, — such, for instance, as Sheriff, or Registrar, or Clerk of the Peace or other ministerial officers, many of whom were necessarily employed and continued to be employed in respect to the discharge of the acts which they enacted here—he had not heard any one pretend to answer the difficulty. He had heard it said by the hon. member for Kingston that the word “permanent” would go to a much larger extent than would involve these offices, because it might fairly be asked whether they were really not permanent, being revocable at the pleasure of the Crown, and therefore, in such instances, the enactment would be nugatory. He thought the difficulty might be met by the addition of a clause which would clearly define who were permanent officers. As to the disqualification of any person receiving a superannuation or retiring allowance from the Government of Canada, he need say nothing, because, by the adoption of the principle contained in the Independence of Parliament Act now in force in England, that difficulty might be overcome.

MR. TUPPER said it was of the greatest possible importance that, in a law of this kind, there should be no ambiguity. It had been rightly stated that the Act was one which provided for the independence of members of Parliament, as far as the Crown or the Government of the day were concerned, so that the people might feel confident that no influences could sway their representatives from doing what they considered right. He could not agree with what the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had said as to the difficulty of understanding the existing law. That law had been submitted to no fewer than eighteen gentlemen belonging to both sides of the House—gentlemen of the first legal talent and the highest standing; and they, after a careful examination of the Act, came to a perfectly unanimous understanding as to its meaning, which was expressed in the elaborate report they submitted. Now, he might state that having, as a humble layman, listened to the present debate from its commencement, he was in a state of bewilderment as to what the proposed Act really meant. Almost twenty legal gentleman, on both sides of the House, had expressed different opinions on the subject, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. the Minister of Justice, whose high legal ability they all recognized, had bestowed on the matter all the attention which it demanded. In the Province of Nova Scotia, the Local Government appointed the magistracy, who, in turn, appointed the custos, and he appointed clerks of the peace. Now, he (Mr. Tupper) wished to know if a clerk of the peace in Nova Scotia, thus appointed, was not eligible as a member of that House.

MR. LAFLAMME: If a clerk of the peace is appointed by an officer of the Local Government to an office from which he would derive fees, he would certainly come under the operation of the Statute and be disqualified.

MR. TUPPER said a clerk of the peace was not paid by Government, though there were certain emoluments attached to the office.

MR. LAFLAMME: If a custos is appointed by the Government, and if a clerk of the peace is appointed by the custos, it is evident he is appointed at the nomination of the Government through one of its officers.

MR. TUPPER said he did not think the Act applied to such a case as this, but it was very evident that a diversity of opinion existed as to the construction to be put upon it. He took it for granted that the hon. the Minister of Justice wished to deal out even-handed justice, but his Bill, if passed into law, would not affect all the Provinces in the same way. In the Province of Nova Scotia, for instance, some inspectors of schools who were appointed by Government would be disqualified, while in the Province of Ontario, such would not be the case. The great objection he had to the measure was that it was a retrograde one. It was necessary that the law should be stringent, and the Opposition, recognizing that fact, had, while on the Treasury benches, given the fullest consideration to suggestions made by other hon. gentlemen. He had no hesitation in saying that the independence of Parliament was abundantly secured by the law as it at present stood on the Statute-book. That such was the case was shown by the penalties which some hon. members of that House had to pay for having infringed the terms of the Act. Since attention had thus been drawn to the character and provisions of the law, it had been respected by members of the House and others, and it proved most effective in the way of accomplishing the object for which it was framed. It would, he thought, have been wise to have allowed the law to remain in its present shape, gradually amending its provisions when necessary, because he believed that the proposed measure would have the effect of repealing the Independence of Parliament Act. If those gentlemen who forfeited their seats under the existing law had been elected while the new Bill was in force, they would, he felt certain, have retained their position as members of Parliament, because they would not "knowingly and wilfully" subject themselves to the liability of being disqualified; and, therefore, the very fact that they would have been able to make that statement would, under this law, have left them here in the enjoyment of their seats and the enjoyment of $10,000 or $20,000. Therefore, he regarded this law not as one for securing the independence of Parliament, but as one to abolish the Independence of Parliament, and to leave it open to the Government of the day to violate the Independence of Parliament Act in the future as in the past, without providing a means of dealing with the question or of inflicting the necessary penalty upon the parties infringing the law. It appeared to him that if the hon. the Minister of Justice had used all the skill and legal acumen he possessed for the purpose of framing a law through which any person might drive a coach and four, he had been eminently successful. The hon. gentleman used no terms, in his humble judgment, to explain the purposes of the Bill, but the law, as it now stood, and which secured the independence of Parliament, had been swept away from this Act, or so worded as to render it incapable of being carried out. It struck at particular individuals and classes. Who, listening to the arguments of the Minister of the Interior, the reductio ad absurdum argument to which he was driven, would say there was any defence for excluding retired Judges from Parliament. What was his argument? That we excluded the judges, and, therefore, there was no reason why the retired Judges should not be excluded. Why did we exclude the Judges? Because they held high and important positions, the duties of which required their entire time and attention; and for another more important reason, that, in the discharge of those important duties, they must necessarily be removed from all suspicion of being influenced by political bias, which could not be the case if they were sitting in Parliament. They must be entirely removed from that suspicion, in the interests of the country and of the whole community. Did that apply to the retired Judge who had become entitled to receive so much per annum so long as he lived, and who enjoyed it beyond the power of this Parliament to take it away from him? The hon. the First Minister said: "But we do not give the Judges this retiring allowance until after twenty-five years' service, and until they are unfit for judicial duty; and when they are unfit for judicial duty, they are not fit for Parliamentary duty." These arguments were best disposed of by illustration. He (Mr. Tupper) would give one that the hon. gentleman would be compelled to admit. When the hon. the First Minister was called upon to discharge the important duty of selecting one of the ablest men he could find in the Dominion as the Dominion Arbitrator on the important question of Provincial boundaries, he selected Judge Wilmot, and he agreed with the hon. gentleman that he had done wisely in selecting the most able, clear-headed, and best business man in the country; and this man was a retired Judge. He would like to know if, in the Province of New Brunswick, there could be found any man more able, by his vast experience, by his high talents, and his exalted personal character, to represent any constituency in New-Brunswick, with honour to himself, with advantage to his constituency, or with due regard to the dignity of the House of Commons? Judge Day was another illustrious instance of a retired Judge fully possessed of mental faculties qualified to adorn this House of Commons, or any Legislature in the world to which he might be called. He gave these as instances of the men who were being excluded by this Act; and if the hon. gentleman was not able to make any better explanation, but was disposed to maintain this principle in the ordinary cases of superannuation, he would ask him to do justice to gentlemen holding such positions, and justice to the interests of the country, and of this House, and, at all events, except from this clause Judges who had retired. The principal ground which was now relied upon for the exclusion of superannuated officers was the statement that these officers, in order to claim superannuation, must have been incapable or unfit for service. But he would give an illustration disproving this. One of the most highly-educated and talented men in Nova Scotia, whose intellect was in its highest vigour, was an officer who held a position at the head of of the Statistical Department, and who was superannuated by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie). This gentleman, Mr. Costigan, who, as a public writer, was, perhaps, second to no man in the Province, was at this moment in the vigour of his intellect, and was as able to perform the duties of a member of Parliament as most of the hon. gentlemen in this House. Mr. Cameron was also a man fully qualified for parliamentary duties, and the hon. gentleman had superannuated two other gentlemen, both in the prime of life and the vigour of their intellects, who were able to perform any intellectual work required of them. Those gentlemen were now superannuated and were in a position, to-morrow, unless this Bill rendered it impossible for them to be selected by the people, to be returned to Parliament; and indeed it had been rumoured that one of them, at all events, was about to seek the suffrages of the people. He could give the hon. gentleman a score of instances in which parties had been superannuated who would be qualified in every possible way to discharge their duties to this House and to the country, if they occupied the position of members of Parliament, and he could see no reason why, with regard to them, this restriction should be made. There was another class of persons excluded by this Bill, he believed it must be by inadvertence, for they formed the last class of persons who, in the best interests of the country, should be debarred from entering this House. They might vote money for the maintenance of the military system of this country, but their efforts would fail unless they had independent, patriotic, able men to take the position of lieutenant-colonels. Every lieutenant colonel in this country was shut out of Parliament by this Bill. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laflamme) dissented, but he would tell him that not a single lieutenant-colonel, under this Bill could enter these walls. And what was the emolument they received that prevented it? They received daily pay, and in addition, some $20 for drill instruction, and $5 in reference to looking after the armoury. He was perhaps not correct as to the exact amount, but it was very small, merely nominal, in fact; and yet this small addition to their daily pay rendered these gentlemen, under this Act, ineligible as members of Parliament. Now that he had drawn the attention of the Minister of Justice to this, he hoped it would be remedied; it was unconstitutional and un-English. In England, so important was it held that a high position should be given to both the military and naval officers of the country, that, while the other placements were excluded from seats in Parliament, the doors were open not only to half-pay, but to full-pay officers, both of the army and the navy. Therefore, this clause was un-English, and it was calculated to forfeit from the service of the Crown the valuable assistance of these lieutenant-colonels of the Militia, on whom the maintenance of this important arm of the service depended, because there was no one qualified to fill that position who was not a man of standing and of ability, and of sufficient independence in his circumstances to enable him to devote a large amount of his time and service in providing means for the purpose of sustaining and stimulating and promoting that degree of military enthusiasm and ardour among the people which it was so desirable to preserve. It was of the greatest importance to the House and the country that they should have upon their benches men who were able to give the House necessary information touching the maintenance of the defences of the country. But he would not elaborate this point; he was satisfied it was an oversight of the Minister of Justice, and that he (Mr. Tupper) need only mention it in order to have it corrected. The hon. member for Hamilton had stated that he was prepared to support the Government in reference to this clause, on the ground that it was in accordance with the English Act. He would draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the latter law, which showed that the course of the Parliament of England was steadily to extend the rights of parties holding pensions under the Crown to come into the House of Commons, and it had passed a law upon the point, which he would read. In "An Act to remove doubts as to the qualifications of persons holding Civil Service Pension, or receiving superannuation allowance, to sit in Parliament," passed on the 24th June, 1869, it was enacted:—

"That pensions, compensations and allowances granted for civil services, according to the provisions of the aforesaid Acts of the fourth and fifth years of King William the Fourth and the twenty-second year of Her Majesty, or any other Act or Acts whatever, shall not disqualify the holder from being elected or sitting or voting as a member of the House of Commons."

Now, there was no Parliament in the world that was so jealous of the independence of its members as was the Parliament of England, and to render the representatives of the people independent of the control or influence of the Crown, was a feature of the British constitutional system and the construction of the House of Commons; and yet it had, after deliberation, changed the law again and again until it came to this decision: that the holding of a pension or allowance or compensation of the Crown under an Act of Parliament should not disqualify the holder from sitting in the House of Commons. And, therefore, he held that the Bill now before the House was un-English, while, as he previously stated, it swept away and repealed the independence of Parliament, and ought to be called an Act to remove the difficulties that lie in the way of members of Parliament receiving consideration at the hands of the Government of the day. When it came to deal with individual interests, its character was thoroughly un-English and opposed to the jealous care which the British House of Commons had given to the question. The British House of Commons, after all its deliberations, had found such a clause to be altogether unnecessary. This question was more for the discussion of legal gentlemen than for laymen, and it was only that he had not an opportunity on the second reading of the Bill that he made these remarks which, perhaps, ought to have been made before they came to the consideration of this clause. But he could not refrain from calling the attention of the hon. the First Minister to the fact that we had now a law which had been found thoroughly efficient, which was now distinctly understood and recognised, and he held that it was better to stand by that clearly defined Act than to introduce a new one which was capable of being interpreted a different way, which was surrounded by uncertainty, which would take away the guarantee this country had for securing the independence of Parliament, and the only object of which seemed to be to restrict and deprive the people of the opportunity of electing men in every way fit to represent them.

MR. MACDONNELL said he had nothing to say against the first clause of this Bill. He rose to make a suggestion to the hon. the Minister of Justice and to the House in reference to the wording of this Bill. He quite agreed with the hon. member for Cumberland that, in the light of the experience they had had of the present Act in force, of which this Bill was an amendment, the House should be very careful in the language used in this Bill. There was a certain ambiguity in the former Act which he found continued in this one. It said, "no person accepting or holding any office, etc. shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons or shall sit or vote therein." These two words "accepting or holding" were independent. The object was that any person guilty of one or the other should be ineligible. Take the word "accept." No person accepting an office and so on shall be eligible as a member of the House of Commons. The word "accepting" here, must mean an acceptance before the election, before the eligibility of the party was taken into consideration. It could not possibly have reference to the party after election. If, then, it applied to some time anterior to the time his eligibility was determined, anterior to his election, it was necessary to discriminate how long or at what period before his election he had accepted the office. Substitute for the words "accepting office," the words "committing a felony," and the Act would read "no person committing a felony shall be eligible as a member." Committing a felony and accepting office were the same. It could not be contended, if the words "no person committing a felony shall be eligible," that the person who had committed a felony a year or ten years anterior to his election would be eligible. In this case the result would be that no person accepting office at any time anterior to the time his eligibility was called in question, could, according to the strict construction of this section as it stood, be elected. The word "accepting" was borrowed from the old Act. It had rendered the old Act most ambiguous and incapable of any legal construction. It was an awkward and unnecessary word, and he would suggest to the hon. the Minister of Justice that it was advisable to strike it out altogether.

MR. PALMER said he sympathized very much with the view expressed by the hon. member for Cumberland. He had pointed out the other night, when discussing the general features of the Bill, that it introduced in the law a vast amount of uncertainty. He had hoped that his hon. friend the Minister of Justice would have introduced a clause to remove the defects of the law in quite another direction. He would point out to the House what he considered the only defect in the former law. It was a defect introduced at the desire of the House in passing the Act of 1871, the Act entitled "An Act to amend the Act to further secure the Independence of Parliament," by which certain things were introduced into the old Act which had not been introduced before. Instead of retaining the plain terms "any person holding office under the Government of Canada," another element was added, "in the service of the Government of Canada." This amendment did away with the difference between what in that Act was called permanent, as distinguished from temporary employment. Of course, they all knew it was intended to meet the much talked of case of Colonel Gray.

If hon. gentlemen would look at the Act of 1873, they would see that the terms as therein used "permanent" and "temporary" could not possibly do any harm, while, in the present Act, they were inserted so as to destroy its meaning. In the one clause the word "permanent" was introduced so as to make the clause applicable to one state of things, and again in the same clause, the word "temporary" was introduced, which made it applicable to another state of things. He defied anyone to define distinctly what could possibly be meant by the use of the two words. No member could tell, by this amendment, whether he was disqualified or not. Again, he was not so sure, though the hon. the Minister of Justice might be clear on that point, as to the correctness of the supposition of his hon. friend from Cumberland. If he understood his hon. friend's plea, it was this: that the custos appointed a person to do certain duties in the different counties of the Province of Nova Scotia, and that he came under this section. The form of the section was over-ridden by the other words, stating the person should be in the service of the Government of any of the Provinces, or in the service of the Government of Canada. He claimed that the way in which this clause was drawn would puzzle any man to know whether he was included in it or not. Was any man excluded under this clause who was under the direction of the High Court of Parliament? Was he in the employment of the Government of Canada? Was a servant of this House in the employment of the Government of Canada? As a mere technical expression, employment in the service of the Government of Canada meant they were directly employed as servants of the Government of Canada. Why should an Act be passed when no possible object would be gained by it? Why all this change and confusion when the Act of 1868 was as plain as could be? He held that, under this Act, if it were continued, he could not, in the position he was in, tell at what moment he might be disqualified. He was a small share holder in a firm which owned a considerable number of ships. By the law of this country, he had no power either in binding the captain or the managing owner. Any of the ships could be employed by law, in spite of him, in the service of the Government, and the result would be, it would be impossible for him to know whether he was eligible or not. This was a clear defect in the old Act which ought to be remedied, as, under it, he could be disqualified in spite of himself. The Acts passed in this Legislature forced the majority of the owners of a vessel to employ a managing owner, who might contract with the Government if he chose. The result was that he (Mr. Palmer) being a shareholder, was entitled to a portion of the freight, and the moment he received it he became disqualified under the present Act. That was a clear blot upon the legislation of this country, which ought to be removed, and which was not touched upon in the Act introduced. He thought, also, that small orders sent by the Government to newspapers did not imply contracts, but which, he freely admitted, were matters of doubt. In the law of 1868, distinct reference was made to that class which volunteered to defend their country, and they were not excluded from Parliament, whereas, now, all those who received a certain sum of money were disqualified. He would say very little on the subject of superannuation. The change effected by the Bill was not called for and was entirely unnecessary. This was not the time to make that alteration, on the eve of a general election. There could be no harm done in leaving the Act as it was. The present Bill would render the Government liable to suspicion in every quarter. If any man should be disqualified in one constituency or another, the result would be the Government would be charged with having disqualified him for a purpose, and he thought the Government should have nothing to do with such action.

MR. POPE (Compton) said, in looking over the first clause of the Bill, it appeared to him to exclude from this House a great many men who might be efficient. If not only the officers of the Local Governments, but every man appointed by an officer of the Local Government, were excluded, a number of the hon. members of this House would be disqualified. If they considered the number of local officers employed at our Courts throughout the country, and the men that must necessarily be appointed under them, they would see this Act prevented a great number of people from coming to this House, unless they resigned their positions. This would be the case in every single branch of the service. His hon. friend from Shefford had said the only object of this Bill was to purify the House, to keep it independent, to have every member vote independently, and so forth. In what possible way were the Government making any improvement in that direction. He had listened to the discussions of hon. gentlemen, the majority of whom were lawyers, on this Bill, and he, as a layman, had not been able yet to understand any one single instance where they were going to secure, in as great a degree, the independence of Parliament, as by the old Act. It occurred to him, though he might be entirely wrong, that this Bill was introduced for the purpose of making the Act less stringent—of breaking the independence of Parliament. Under the Act a man who had a contract, who committed a breach of the Act in any way, had to pay a penalty of $2,000. Under the present Bill the penalty was reduced to $200. He did not blame the Government for the action they had taken from their point of view. When he saw a Government which had been supported for the last two years by at least twenty members who had violated the independence of Parliament; that one party to the contract had suffered the penalty of the law, while the other party (the Government), whose duty it was to know the law, went scot-free, and, this notwithstanding the fact that the Government had committed fifty crimes as against one committed by a member, he was surprised at the action taken by the Government in introducing the present Bill to enable them to get over the difficulty. It was only from that standpoint he could understand why the Bill was introduced. The Government had clearly come to the conclusion to make it easy for those hon. members to escape the penalty of their acts, and at the same time they resolved upon a flank movement, and endeavoured to show the people they were about to do some great and good deed, and provide that only perfectly independent men should enter Parliament. They provided in the Bill that men who had been superannuated and were entitled to their allowances must be excluded from Parliament, and officers of a Local Government, which had no more influence with the Federal Parliament than a County Council, must also be excluded in order that the Government might show that they were doing great deeds in order to secure the independence of Parliament. The Government claimed they were doing this for the protection of the people, but hon. gentlemen should understand that, in the exercise of the franchise, the people did not seek Government protection, and they would not thank those hon. gentlemen for placing them in a position in which they could not choose their own candidates. The people would not endorse the measure. The Government had gone too far, in taking away the rights of the people, who were themselves the best judges as to who should represent them in Parliament. While it was quite right that no man should be allowed to sit in Parliament who was dependent on the Government, he could not admit that officers of Local Governments and others, who were outside the influence of the Dominion Government, should be excluded as was provided by the Bill.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he rose for the purpose of vindicating his own position from the attack made by the hon. member for Cumberland, in which he challenged him with having made the statement that the law, as it was at present on the Statute-book, was obscure and ambiguous, and the hon. member affirmed that the Committee on Privileges and Elections, last Session, declared that the law was clear beyond any question of doubt. The Committee confined their decision entirely to a single transaction, and recommended that the law required most careful revision and amendment. That Committee, which comprised the leading lawyers on both sides of the House, made a unanimous report to the House that "The investigation of the Committee has led them to the conclusion that the Act for securing the Independence of Parliament requires careful revision and amendment." The duty was thus placed on the Government of revising the present Act, and submitting amendments in regard to it. He repeated his former statement that he considered the present law on the Statute-book exceedingly obscure, and the House knew that it had been felt to be necessary that some change should be made.

MR. TUPPER said the point on which they had joined issue was as to whether the lawyers had agreed as to the meaning of the Act. It was one thing to recommend revision and amendment, and another thing not to be able to agree, or to indicate a want of agreement as to the meaning of the Act. They went into the question of the publication of advertisements, and decided that the publication of an advertisement by a newspaper proprietor who was a member of the House, disqualified him.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): That is not what they decided.

MR. TUPPER said that was what they decided, as appeared from the report. The Committee did not confine themselves to the case before them, but went into the general bearings and scope of the law as it applied to publications made in newspapers outside of the question in regard to contracts for printing and stationery.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): Will the hon. member let me know from that report what the Committee decided? If a Government official entered a store and bought a yard of cloth from the proprietor, he being a member of Parliament, would that sale violate his seat?

MR. TUPPER: Yes.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): I differ entirely from that opinion. Let me now ask whether, from that report, the hon. gentleman is prepared to say that the fact of a member of Parliament being a member of a corporation having a contract with the Government, rendered his seat vacant.

MR. TUPPER said he admitted the Committee left that an open question, but it remained in the same position under the present Bill. He thought the present measure in this respect was worse than the former one. The Act was silent on the question of stockholders and corporations; but, if the corporation was organized for the purpose of evading the law, there could be very little doubt as to the result. The present Bill swept away that safeguard, and under it half-a-dozen members of Parliament might form themselves into a joint stock company for the purpose of taking public contracts, because the law distinctly stated that only stockholders of joint stock corporations connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway were disqualified.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) said that was the English law.

MR. ORTON said he entirely failed to see any clause in the measure which tended to close the channel by which undue influence might be exercised; but, on the contrary, the Bill seemed to open the way for such improper influence being used. It was utterly impossible to exclude the exercise of influence by giving contracts to brothers and other relations of hon. members, and it was easy to conceive that a Government might secure subservient creatures by adopting such a course. Large amounts of money had illegally passed between the Government and some hon. members, who had thereby forfeited their seats, and the country had witnessed the spectacle of the independence of a large number of the people's representatives being destroyed by such means. The insertion of a clause which would disqualify members of a Government in whose Department any contract or emolument was illegally and wrongly given to any hon. member, would go further to secure the independence of Parliament than any provision in the proposed Act of the Government.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that, under the present law, if a trader, being a member of the House, sold goods or wares across the counter to the Government, such transaction did not vacate his seat. The Committee on Privileges and Elections last year reported the contrary opinion. It was further the opinion of the Committee that each separate purchase of an article across the counter was, in law, a contract. The hon. the Minister of the Interior had argued that it was improper for persons who held office from a Local Government to sit in Parliament on the ground that they were mere pensioners, holding their position at the will of the Local Government, and could not, therefore, act independently. At one time, the hon. the Minister of Public Works was a leading member of the Ontario Government, and then he thought it was very desirable to agitate a question of great importance between the Dominion and Ontario Governments, that of the boundaries, and he appointed the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as commissioner; and the hon. member for Bothwell, in his ardour, and to please his clients, had produced a report showing, he believed, that the boundary of the Province of Ontario was somewhere beyond Manitoba.

AN HON. MEMBER: The Rocky Mountains.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Yes. He could see that the hon. gentleman now found this rather inconvenient, because he was a member of the Dominion Government, and had charge of the very Department in which this question came up.

MR. MACKENZIE: Is that matter under discussion?

MR. KIRKPATRICK said oh, yes. This was only to show that the officers of the Local Government should not be eligible here because their duties might clash and conflict. He could quite see why the hon. member for Bothwell argued in that way so strenuously as he did. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) thought that the change which the hon. the Minister of Justice proposed to make in this Act was a very good one. It was right that only those who were permanently employed by the Local Government should be disqualified from coming here; otherwise, the choice of the people would be restricted too much. He considered it unfortunate that the hon. the Minister of Justice had not informed them, before the discussion commenced, what changes he was going to introduce in the Bill. The hon. gentleman was about to explain them, but he was interrupted. Was the House to understand that the hon. gentleman did not propose to make any other change in the first section?

MR. MACKENZIE said several other changes would be made. It would greatly expedite the business if hon. gentlemen confined themselves to the discussion of the clause under consideration. Almost every hon. gentleman who had spoken had discussed the whole Bill, as if they were on the second reading, and a great many of the speeches had really borne on parts which would be affected by the amendments that were to be passed. The Government had intimated the other day, when the Bill was under discussion, that it desired to utilize the opinions of the House regarding anything required to make the Bill perfect. Of course they listened with every possible attention to the views of hon. gentlemen, although they thought that the words now proposed would meet the case; still, when they came to another stage, they would see whether any further improvement could be made or not; but in the meantime it would be much better to proceed clause by clause.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said it would greatly shorten the discussion if, at this stage, before it went further, the hon. the Minister of Justice would state the amendments he was going to introduce in the different clauses.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the hon. gentleman was proceeding to do so, seriatim, when hon. gentlemen opposite interrupted.

MR. KIRKPATRICK said he believed that this was the case. He hoped that some change would be made in the superannuation clause. They should adopt the English Act.

The superannuation allowance belonged to these persons; it was their money, and their own insurance fund; it was theirs of right, and for its receipt they ought not to disqualify those in receipt of such allowances. These could not be increased or interfered with in any way. These persons were not dependent on the Government of the day, and they ought not to be disqualified.

MR. PALMER said he would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Justice whether Justices of the Peace would be disqualified under this Bill, as they received fees.

MR. LAFLAMME said there was a wide difference between an office created by the Government of the Province to which a salary or fees was attached, and the emoluments given to a Justice of the Peace, which were granted, not to himself, but to his clerk.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Oh, no.

MR. PALMER: That is not the case.

MR. LAFLAMME said that he did not believe that the Justices of the Peace, as such, received any fee in the Province of Ontario; this was not the case in the Province of Quebec.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: You are mistaken; they live on it.

MR. LAFLAMME said that the clerks of Justices of the Peace obtained fees for the issue of summonses, but they certainly received no fees from the Government. These fees were allowed by virtue of the office.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin): The Bill says "from the Government."

MR. LAFLAMME said he had never before understood that a Justice of the Peace received fees from his office and Government.

MR. PALMER: The Act does not say the Government, it says "fees from the office."

MR. LAFLAMME said, if there was doubt as to the Justices of the Peace, he had no objection whatever to add them to the list of exceptions. Fees were not attached to the appointment of Justice of the Peace.

MR. KIRKPATRICK.

MR. TUPPER: Justices of the Peace in Nova Scotia are all appointed by the Government, and the law provides that they may charge, as Justices of the Peace, fees for all the services they perform.

MR. BOWELL: It is the same in Ontario.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): Have they civil jurisdiction in Ontario to collect debts, etc.?

MR. PALMER: Yes.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Justice of the Peace in that respect stood precisely in the position of the Registrar of Deeds, who was always held to be ineligible to be a member of Parliament. This Registrar was appointed by commission from the Crown, he had no salary or emoluments from the Crown, but attached to his office were fees. The Justice of the Peace was exactly in the same position; he, too, was appointed by commission from the Crown, and he was authorized to issue summonses, and convictions and subpoenas, etc.; and a fee, by law, both in Upper and Lower Canada, was attached to every process. He supposed that this was also the case in the other Provinces. Either a Registrar was eligible, though a nominee of the Crown, but not in the service of the Government, or a Justice of the Peace was equally ineligible.

MR. LAFLAMME said that such fees were not so collected in the Province of Quebec.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that was the case in Ontario. Before Confederation, the Attorney-General in Ontario was continually troubled with complaints respecting magistrates who made profit out of their offices by issuing summonses improperly, and by encouraging quarrels. This evil still existed in some parts, and his legal friends would occasionally find a judicial nuisance in the shape of a magistrate who encouraged legislation for the sake of pocketing the fees. Then coroners also got fees from the Crown, and they were all excluded. This clause was becoming more inextricably confused than ever.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said that another class, notaries public, were undoubtedly included in this section as it stood. They were appointed by the Crown, and to their office, fees and emoluments were attached.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Three Rivers) said that a Justice of the Peace received no fees in the Province of Quebec. This was also the case with their magistrates.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that Justices of the Peace and Coroners were not intended to come under the operation of this Bill.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: And notaries public also.

Mr. LAFLAMME: You may as well exclude advocates.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said notaries public in Ontario were very different from notaries public in Quebec; the latter was not a legal officer at all.

Mr. PALMER said he did not believe, that under this clause, they were excluded, because they were not in the service of the Government.

Mr. LAFLAMME: A magistrate is not in the service of the Government.

Mr. PALMER. I think not. Neither is a notary nor a Justice of the Peace.

Mr. COSTIGAN said that this Bill would so exclude a very large portion of the electors of New Brunswick. In the first place, it would disqualify supervisors of the Government, from $20 upwards, on the great roads; these were appointed by the Local Government. In the second place, it would affect the by-road commissioners in his Province, who were appointed generally by the Local Government, though sometimes by municipalities. These commissioners were appointed for sums ranging from $10 to $15 in each parish. They would be excluded from the mere fact that they had the expenditure of $10 of public money under the Local Government, and he could not see why this should be done.

Mr. TUPPER said that the same statement would apply to Nova Scotia, where this Bill would exclude 2,000 people. The road commissioners down to $10 were appointed directly by the Government, and they held commissions for the expenditure of $10, $15 and $20, and received an emolument in the shape of a commission on the money they expended; and yet they, as well as Justices of the Peace, would be excluded under this Bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. LAFLAMME: Are their appointments permanent?

Mr. TUPPER: They are annual.

Mr. SINCLAIR said that this class of people would not suffer any greater grievance than postmasters; and, if they were anxious to be candidates, they could resign their positions. He did not think the Bill included magistrates, as they were not in the service of the Government.

Mr. TUPPER said this was a very important matter. He called the attention of the Government, and especially of the Minister of Justice to it; whether these parties should be excluded or not was another question altogether.

Mr. LAFLAMME said that these officers were municipal officers in the strict sense of the word. They were not in the service of the Government.

Mr. TUPPER; Yes; directly.

Mr. LAFLAMME said they were not permanent officers, and these two conditions must exist to require exclusion.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Tenure of office for one year is more permanent than tenure during pleasure.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said the commissioners for roads in Nova Scotia were appointed neither annually nor permanently, but on the understanding that they were to do a certain amount of work for which they were to expend a certain amount of money—$10, $100, or $1,000, as the case may be.

Mr. TUPPER said that the Government, every year, appointed new road commissioners and these appointments were, therefore, annual.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that these appointments were not issued for a whole year. The commissioners had to do a certain thing within a year; that was a clear distinction.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) said the words of the section could not apply to county officers who were paid out of the fund for the Administration of Justice.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Would they apply to registrars?

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin): No, because they are not paid out of the Government funds.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: And yet the Minister of Public Works says it was intended to exclude registrars, because they have something to do with the voters' list, and act as returning officers.

MR. MASSON: I think the Minister of Justice should explain to us what amendments he intends to make to this Bill, so that we may be familiar with the whole measure.

MR. LAFLAMME said that as objection had been taken to the use of the words "knowingly and willingly" in the second section, he proposed to erase them. He also, to meet a difficulty which had been started, proposed to erase the words "knowingly and wilfully" from the 2nd clause, and insert them in line 23, clause 4, so that it should read "or knowingly and wilfully sells any goods," etc. It was also intended to amend the 7th clause by adding the words "companies undertaking contracts for the building of public works in Canada." Then in the 3rd sub-section of the 9th clause there would be introduced "or any allowance for drill or the care of arms." And in the 10th section, in order to obviate some misapprehension which might arise as to what was intended, he proposed to add, "or the Speaker of the Senate." The only remaining amendment was with respect to the word "shall," which would be used all through instead of "will," as in the former Act.

MR. BUNSTER said he hoped the hon. the Minister of Justice would take into consideration the desirability of not applying that Act to British Columbia. If the Act was carried into operation there, certain gentlemen whom the people desired to return to Parliament would be disqualified—a circumstance which would not tend to benefit the Province. He would move to that effect.

MR. BOWELL said the Minister of Justice had not sufficiently explained the matter regarding which he desired information. To illustrate his meaning, he would give a case in point. Suppose the Warden of the Penitentiary at Kingston, who was an officer of the Government, advertised for tenders to supply wood or anything else, would the person so employed be disqualified from being a member of the House?

MR. LAFLAMME: Certainly; every contractor supplying goods to the Government, or any Department of the Government, is disqualified.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario): Suppose the proprietor of the Globe receives and inserts advertisements from the Local Government, is he disqualified?

MR. LAFLAMME: Not at all.

MR. BOWELL: Would it not be well for the Minister of Justice to add the words, "knowingly and wilfully" in this clause, because the same difficulties may arise which have arisen under the old law. A man might be proprietor of a newspaper and have advertisements sent to his office without knowing anything about them, and, just in the same way, a Warden might go into a grocer's shop and purchase $10 worth of goods without the knowledge of the person to whom the establishment belonged.

MR. LAFLAMME: That is provided for by a subsequent section.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Are you going to take up the question of superannuation or retiring allowances?

MR. LAFLAMME said that, according to the Statute of Ontario, it was held that no Judge was entitled to superannuation unless he was incapable of fulfilling his duties by age or infirmity. Now, if this was the case, after from 15 to 25 years' service, it would be a dangerous precedent to allow a Judge to leave an office which he was capable of fulfilling, to assume the duties of a member of Parliament. If able to perform the duties of a member of Parliament, surely a Judge ought, in duty bound, to give up his superannuation; on the other hand, if he considered himself entitled to a retiring allowance, he ought not to enter Parliament.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said in England Judges who felt themselves no longer possessed of that intellectual clearness and great physical strength which were essential for the proper fulfilment of their duties had yet proved themselves to be most valuable to the State in political life.

MR. MACKENZIE: There can be no possible parallel between Judges in the House of Lords and men coming into the Commons here.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD wished to know where the difference lay. The fact that the Judge received a retiring allowance was no evidence whatever that he was unfit to be a legislator, and there was no reason why, if he was fit to be a legislator in one House, he should not be equally capable in another. Colonial Judges, who had retired with a superannuation, such as Sir James Mackintosh, Sir James Colville and Justice Haliburton, of Nova Scotia, had all, on their return to England, been admitted members of the House. Why, therefore, should such a man as Judge Wilmot be excluded from the Dominion Parliament? Though retired on a superannuation, such great faith was reposed in his ability as an arbitrator that he was chosen by the Dominion to settle the boundary between Upper and Lower Canada. He did not see why these limitations should be placed on men who were free from the possibility of being influenced. Their pensions were for life, and freehold, and no Government could have influence upon a servant who had retired upon a pension.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman knew that the Government had it in their power to call a superannuated officer into their service at any time, if they were considered fit to discharge their duties. True, the hon. gentleman said, there was such a clause in the Act, but that clause no one would think of acting upon. He (Mr. Macdonald) ventured to say that, if a Government had a very narrow majority, and three or four superannuated officers were against it, those three or four would soon find themselves out of the House or without their salaries, at any rate. They would be at the mercy of the Government of the day, and it was quite clear that this was a sufficient reason why they should be excluded from becoming candidates for seats. There was no case in which the coercion of the Government could be used more effectually than in the case of superannuated officers who might hold seats in the House. With regard to Judge Wilmot, he was not superannuated in the ordinary way. That gentleman was offered the Governorship of New Brunswick, and he would only accept it on condition that his position was made what it would have been if he had remained on the Bench; and he (Mr. Mackenzie) believed that it was made so by Statute. At all events, he was not a retired Judge, in the ordinary sense of the term.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He is drawing a pension.

MR. MACKENZIE said that might be, but he was a gentleman in the prime of life, and had retired under special circumstances.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Government could not agree on their own argument. The Minister of Justice and the Premier were altogether at variance in their argument. It was hard to fight a double-headed argument like that. The hon. the Minister of Justice said that a Judge ought not to be allowed to be in Parliament, because he ought not to leave the Bench until he was so old and so incapable that he was unfit for duty anywhere, and that if he was fit for duty anywhere, he ought to go back to the Bench; the Premier said that he ought not to have a seat in Parliament because the Government could call him back to the Bench at any time. According to the former, a man ought not to be superannuated until he was so worn out and so incapable that he could not be sent back to his duty.

MR. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said then the Government would have to find out whether a man was incapable or not. Then the hon. the Premier stated that, if these superannuated officers were admitted into Parliament, the Government of the day would turn them out when it served their purpose.

MR. MACKENZIE: I said that, in case of a narrow majority, the Government of the day might either force an opponent to go back to duty, or lose his superannuation. I am sure the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) would—I do not say any Government would—no matter how infirm they were, he could turn them out to get rid of the majority.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: And this is the style of argument we are to be subjected to. I thought we were discussing the question upon its merits. The hon. gentleman cannot find an argument, and he gives a taunt. I appeal to the House if this is the way to arrive at a just conclusion.

MR. MACKENZIE: I discussed it upon its merits, but the hon. gentleman endeavoured to misrepresent what I said. I say the Government of the day will have it in their power to declare whether a superannuated officer was fit for the discharge of duty or not. I will take back the taunt if the hon. gentleman complains of it. Any Government would have a strong temptation, if the majority was a narrow one, and four or five of their opponents in the House were superannuated officers, over whom they had power to say you must accept such an office or give up your allowance.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No Government could. They would be ashamed to do it.

MR. MACKENZIE: Take the case of John Young; the Government were not ashamed to treat him in the way they did. In passing the Act they gave him a promise, an assurance in this House, that it was not intended to apply to him, that it would not affect him, and directly it was passed they appointed his successor.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario): Who gave him that promise?

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. MACKENZIE: I heard that it was made in the Committee room.

MR. GIBBS: It was said that Mr. Tilley made it, but, when Mr. Tilley was asked with regard to it, he declared that the promise had never been made.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, I heard it was made; several persons in this House knew it was made.

MR. GIBBS: Oh, no.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, we believe it was made, and we give it as our illustration of what a Government could do. At all events my argument is unassailable that a Government would be placed under a strong temptation to do what I said, and no Government should be placed in that position.

MR. IRVING said the hon. the Minister of Justice had endeavoured to narrow his (Mr. Irving's) original allegation that the English House of Commons was open to superannuated public servants by saying that it applied to a narrow class of pensioners growing out of the public service in England. He (Mr. Irving) held that all public servants were now eligible as members of the House of Commons.

MR. MASSON said he thought the only argument the hon. the Minister of Justice had put forward with regard to the eligibility of superannuated officers as members of Parliament was that these officers might be called upon at any time for service. He would ask the hon. gentleman, who was, perhaps, in a better mood than the Premier, whether the 8th section of the Superannuation Act did not limit the right of the Government to send these officers for service again to those under 60 years age? And the point of the hon. gentleman's argument with reference to the question of the Judges was that those officers should give the country the benefit of their ability as long as they were able; but, when they had retired upon their well-earned allowances, why should they be excluded from Parliament? He thought the hon. the Minister of Justice would say that the argument of the hon. the Premier on this point was worthless.

MR. BUNSTER said the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) had paid a very high tribute to the Hon. Mr. Trutch, at the same time stating that that gentleman could be elected for any constituency in British Columbia.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I did not say so.

MR. BUNSTER said he must have misunderstood the hon. gentleman, but he would like to remark that neither Sir Francis Hincks nor any other person could be returned so easily for British Columbia; that colony was determined to send men who understood her needs and requirements, and would represent her interests. They were determined to have a class of men to represent them who knew the wants of the people better, and the same with the officers. At the present time every office in British Columbia was filled by men from Ontario or somewhere else, and British Columbia men were excluded. In relation to what the hon. the Premier said with reference to pensioned officers, he could give several instances where pensions had been given and the recipients had afterwards held high situations. Mr. J. P. Hackett now received a salary of $2,500, and was now Colonial Secretary to British Columbia.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had already called attention to the second sub-section of the first clause. He had suggested very strongly that it was objectionable from an artistic point of view and otherwise, that allusion should be made in this case to any office, which might hereafter be created, to be held by a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada. He understood the reason to be that there was another Bill before the House creating a new office, but it would be infinitely better, rather than passing in the present Bill a provision relating to an office not yet created, to put a clause in the Bill creating this new office that the officer should come in this category.

MR. LAFLAMME said he could not see the objection to making a clause cover not only those offices which existed, but other analogous offices which might be created hereafter. It was much better to do so in the present Act than in each future Act creating the new offices. He could not see what was the objection of the right hon. member.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said there might be one objection, if nothing more, as to the meaning of the words "Minister of the Crown." What was a Minister of the Crown? The expression was not known in English law. A sheriff was a Minister of the Crown for that matter. They were putting into the Statute words which were understood conversationally, but which would not have that meaning in the Statute. Every permanent head was a Minister of the Crown without doubt. The word Cabinet is not known to English law. The Cabinet Council in England was what was called in the time of Charles the cabal or camerilla, the interior sub-Committee of the Privy Council, which the King favoured.

MR. MACKENZIE said he understood the general principle to which the hon. gentleman objected, but it would be out of place to introduce a similar clause in the Act creating the new office; it would destroy its artistic beauty.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On Section 2,

MR. LAFLAMME moved to strike out the words "knowingly and wilfully" in the second clause.

MR. MASSON said that, according to the second clause, a person having a contract with the Government could not be eligible as a member of the House of Commons. This determined his position before he became a candidate, or before being elected. The clause continued: "Nor shall he sit or vote in the said House during the time he holds such contract or agreement, or is knowingly and willingly interested therein." A man who had not a contract with the Government was perfectly eligible. After he had sat in the House one Session, he obtained a contract during recess; the following Session, while the contract was going on, he did not sit in the House. The contract was executed after the Session and payment made. That man, not having taken his seat while he held the contract, he was completely clear of all responsibility before the law.

Mr. LAFLAMME said the fifth section covered this case.

Mr. MASSON said the section did not meet it. It said, "any transaction begun and concluded during recess." A contract was given to a member of Parliament before the Session. He neither sat in the House nor voted. After the Session, the contract was concluded, he was paid and the whole thing was concluded. What was the liability of that hon. member?

Mr. LAFLAMME: Under section four he has forfeited his seat.

Mr. LANGEVIN said in the case of a person who was a contractor at the time he was elected, the only way to contest his election was by a petition within thirty days. If no petition was made against him within thirty days he retained his seat. He might have been a contractor and in the power of the Government at the time of his election, yet, if there were no petition against him, and he had settled with the Government, he could retain his seat. The consequence would be the case would come under the original jurisdiction of the House, and be decided by a vote being taken upon it. This was avoided under the old Act.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said section 4 covered this case.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said if a man accepted office after he had taken his seat in the House, there was no means of unseating him by a tribunal.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said supposing it was not known at the time that a candidate had a contract, would he be eligible to take his seat?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said if at the end of the thirty days he was not a contractor, he would still retain his seat.

Mr. MILLS said if the right hon. gentleman was right, then the power of this House under the Act relating to dual representation would be that no action could be taken unless a petition was made. Take the case of Mr. Southey and Mr. Cowan; those gentlemen had contracts with the Government, and no action was taken against them, but they, fearing that action might be taken in the Courts, sent in their resignations. In the Waters case, action had been taken in the House. The right hon. gentleman's motion, last Session, was then a highly improper one, because the hon. gentleman against whom that motion had been made, had entered into a contract with the hon. the Postmaster-General before the election took place, and, according to the right hon. gentleman's doctrine, could have been proceeded against by action, but no action was taken. Three years were allowed to elapse, and yet the right hon. gentleman did not think that deprived the House of the right of undertaking to deal with that question, and he proposed to deal with it in the most summary manner. It seemed to him that, if anyone entered into any contract or agreement under this section by which his seat was declared to be void, if he took his seat having no right to sit or vote, the House, at any time the matter was brought under its cognizance, could take the necessary steps to enforce the law against the party and compel him to resign his seat. The power conferred on the Judges to deal with controverted elections in no way interfered with the powers of this Parliament relating to privileges and elections, to protect and maintain its independence. There were many cases in the old law which it would perhaps have been impossible to deal in the way proposed by the hon. gentleman. No one but a constituent could take action, and, if the constituents were all in favour of the candidate elected, and refused to take action, the House, according to the doctrine of the hon. gentleman, would have no means of protecting itself. If one whose election had been declared void by the law, came and took his seat, this House could protect itself, whether a constituent chose to interfere or not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Did the hon. gentleman say that Southey was a contractor?

Mr. MASSON.

MR. MILLS: No; I did not say he was a contractor. I said he was disqualified from sitting.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said Southey wrote a letter to the Speaker, stating he was not qualified and would not take his seat. The House allowed the thirty days to expire, and then referred the case to privileges and elections. It was not on account of the petition against Southey and Cowan that they refused to sit, but because they were anxious to avoid the penalties. Both wrote saying they were unwilling to subject themselves to penalties, and that they had not been aware that they had rendered themselves liable as contractors under the Act. No action was taken upon their application until the thirty days had expired. It was at their own request sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the Committee recommended them not to take their seats, because they would be liable to penalty. He quite agreed there never had been a decision given which did away with the permanent right of the House, by the appointment of a tribunal, but it was in the highest degree advisable to look into the possibility of there being such a case, where the House would decide, by a party vote, whether it could be sent to a tribunal. The only case in point was that of O'Donovan Rossa. The House of Commons was greatly opposed to his admission, as he had been a convicted felon, but his having served his time had the effect of a pardon, and he was elected. His election shocked the common sense of the House of Commons, but there was no legal tribunal which could declare him ineligible, and the House, in virtue of the power inherent in it to protect itself, declared that the writ from the Queen to the returning officer, authorized the election of a fit and discreet man, and that no man who had been a convicted felon could be a fit and discreet man, and, therefore, annulled his election. He hoped the words would be struck out, which would leave the clause as in the old Act, and thus prevent the difficulty to which they had referred.

MR. LAFLAMME said it was immaterial.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On Section 4,

MR. LAFLAMME moved the insertion of the word "knowingly" before "sell."

MR. WOOD said that other clauses of the Bill appeared to be aimed at pensioners and lawyers, and this was directed at the few merchants who had seats in the House. The clause was much too sweeping, and, as it might sometimes be in the interest of the Government, in cases of necessity to purchase goods from firms, one member of which might be a member of Parliament, the clause might be amended so as to permit the purchase of a specified amount of goods during a year without unseating a member.

MR. BERTRAM said it was desirable that the amendment proposed by the hon. the Minister of Justice should be adopted, because it was absurd that the seat of an hon. member who happened to be in a position to sell goods to the Government should be rendered vacant by reason of a Government officer entering his store and purchasing goods without his knowledge. He could not agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Hamilton, because, if a member were permitted to sell goods to the value of one dollar to the Government, he failed to see on what principle they could prevent him from selling $1,000 worth.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On Section 5,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said they might well suppose that in case a close vote, on which the existence or success of a party depended, a member might run the risk of paying $200, and give his vote, when he would not run the risk of paying $2,000.

MR. PALMER said the penalty should be at least $500.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It should be $500, by all means.

MR. LAFLAMME: I believe that the amount will be found to be sufficient.

MR. MACKENZIE said such a contingency as was suggested was not likely to occur. It was quite clear that $2,000 was not intended to be realized, but this was intended to be a substantial fine that could be collected. If a member thus sat for a single week, the fine would be $1,200, while for a month, or half the Session, it would amount to $6,000 at the very least.

MR. MASSON said that the difficulty previously had related to knowing whether a member was so guilty or not; but this offence could only now be committed knowingly and wilfully, and consequently a high penalty should be exacted. The penalty should be more.

MR. MILLS said that no Administration could be sustained in Parliament by a single vote. Such a party would have to remain the whole time, and he would be obliged to pay a fine equal to the whole of the salaries of the members of the Administration. It was not likely that this would occur.

MR. PLUMB: The Reform Bill in 1832 was carried by one vote.

MR. GUTHRIE said that the words "knowingly and wilfully" only applied to a very small class of cases. These words had been struck out of the second section.

Section agreed to.

On Section 7,

MR. LAFLAMME moved that after the word "except," in the line before the last, in the 7th clause, there be added the words, "Companies undertaking contracts for the building of public works."

MR. TUPPER asked why they should exclude parties who formed a company to construct public works any more than those who did so to do public printing.

MR. MILLS: The expenditure is much larger.

MR. TUPPER said it might be very convenient for three or four members to form a printing company.

MR. LAFLAMME said there must be a limit somewhere. Generally, in incorporated companies were not excluded, from the fact that not the stockholders but the directors took contracts without the knowledge of the stockholders. This principle admitted, they had only to examine such cases as violated the spirit of the law and attempted fraud—corporations formed for the very purpose of violating the law. They could not enact a law so stringent as to reach any possible case of such violation. Touching public works, he believed they met the only cases where parties would be moved to violate the law and form a sham company of five members for the sole purpose of taking money out of the public chest.

MR. GUTHRIE said that, if members of Parliament combined to evade the law in the way suggested, the second clause would cover them.

MR. HOLTON said it appeared to him that this clause might open the door to greater abuses than any of those which the whole of this legislation was intended to prevent. He confessed that he had not given enough attention to the matter to be prepared with any practical suggestions to meet the difficulty. He saw the difficulty very plainly, however. It had occurred to him, and it had been suggested in conversation with friends, that one mode of preventing some of the more obvious dangers of the clause, of the construction of the law upon which the clause was founded, would be to provide that companies must have a certain number of proprietors,—not less than say 10, 15 or 20, he was not particular about the number, to bring them within the exemptions of the law. But it would be a very easy matter, under some of our Provincial legislation at all events, if not under Dominion legislation, for a firm to transform itself into an incorporated company and thus to operate, one member and the principal member holding perhaps a seat in this House, and being open to a very large amount of business with the Government of the nature which, in a very small amount, had necessitated the disqualification of members under the present law. He regarded this clause as in many respects the most important one in the whole Bill, and it should be very carefully considered. He wished he were better prepared to discuss it and offer a practical solution to the difficulty. The House ought to consider the difficulty very carefully before the Bill passed the final stage.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said his hon. friend knew that the discussion the other night on the second reading showed that this clause might be made the means of destroying the independence of Parliament altogether. If it was carried as it stood, it would, in fact, be inviting individuals who desired to secure contracts from the Government to form themselves into an incorporated company limited under many existing Acts. And after this discussion, persons desirous of being members of Parliament and of dealing with the Government, could take the necessary steps to do so, and would have been warned as to the way in which to do it. He considered with his hon. friend from Chateauguay that this clause should be carefully considered. He had no doubt but that the Premier would give them another opportunity to discuss it before passing the third reading.

MR. LAFLAMME said that the hon. gentleman knew that, in England, ever since the passage of the George the Third Act, it was specially provided that incorporated companies were excepted under the law.

MR. HOLTON: In the time of George the Third, these companies were not so easily formed as now.

MR. LAFLAMME said it was, moreover, provided that companies having ten members had a right to be composed of members of Parliament, and did not incur liabilities under the Act. Then came an insurmountable difficulty; if they said ten members, five persons could associate together just as well, and give five shares to their clerks, or to cousins, or to members of their families. Do what they pleased, if there was a disposition to evade the law, so long as they did not allow the Courts to investigate such cases, in order to reach those who had conspired in this manner to evade the law—this could be done. He defied any member to construct a clause that could not be evaded in some way. He had thought it reasonable to specify in this clause contracts for public works as coming within the meaning of the Act; but hon. gentlemen might think of a wider category of cases, making the clause a more general one, in order to reach them, only they must, at the same time, be careful not to entrap other people.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) said there might be a difficulty in the case of men who banded themselves together to evade the law, but the operation of the Act must stop somewhere. In joint-stock companies, where the entire business was managed by a few directors, the great body of shareholders had absolutely nothing to do with the making of contracts. If, therefore, the thing was carried too far, men would rather not invest their capital than run the risk of being disqualified. His hon. friend had endeavoured to secure the independence of Parliament, as far as the contracts for the public works of the country were concerned, and there was no necessity for going further. He thought that, in the meantime, it would be a safe plan to try the experiment proposed.

MR. BOWELL asked if the amendment proposed by the hon. the Minister of Justice could not be modified so that, instead of saying, "companies undertaking contracts for the building of public works," it should be made to read thus: "having a contract or agreement with the Government of Canada, except companies undertaking contracts for the performing of public work, and not being incorporated for the construction," etc.? That would include all companies incorporated for the express purpose of performing work for the Government; it would prevent any man from forming a printing company and, through the Government, getting control of the whole printing for Parliament. The Act should be made to apply to printing as well as to public works.

MR. MACKENZIE said that such a general view of the case would occasion a lot of inconvenience. At least one hon. gentleman of the House, for instance, was a prominent member of the company which worked the Londonderry Iron Works or the Colebrook Rolling Mills, with both of which the Government had large transactions.

MR. BOWELL said that did not apply to his suggestion, which was to prevent companies being incorporated for the special purpose of getting Government work. The Bill ought to check a carrying company being formed, for instance, to transport 100,000 tons of rails to a distant part of the country on behalf of the Government.

MR. LAFLAMME said he would consider that suggestion afterwards.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

On Section 8,

MR. WOOD asked if a person who undertook a contract to transport, say, 100,000 tons of steel rails across some of the western waters, found he had not sufficient boats of his own, and was thereby compelled to get boats from a member of this House, would the member be disqualified?

MR. LAFLAMME: No.

MR. WOOD: The clause says directly or indirectly.

MR. LAFLAMME: That does not apply to such cases.

Section agreed to.

On Section 9,

MR. LAFLAMME said he wished to add the following words to the 3rd sub-section of the 9th clause:—"Or pay or allowances for local drill or care of arms."

MR. TUPPER: Will the clause, as amended, allow of adjutants being returned to the House?

MR. LAFLAMME: Certainly.

MR. GOUDGE asked whether the Clerks of the Peace for Nova Scotia were included.

MR. LAFLAMME: No, they are accepted as eligible.

MR. GOUDGE: They certainly ought not to be, because they are the depositors of the rolls. I think they are not eligible because they are the appointees of the servants of the Crown.

MR. LAFLAMME said he would adopt the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. LANGEVIN said he was afraid he was not understood on the previous day. He then stated that the Bill would disqualify for the Senate the same party who was disqualified for the House of Commons. Was this so?

MR. LAFLAMME: Yes.

MR. LANGEVIN said he would like to point out that under this clause Senators were exempt. If they exempted one part of the Government of Canada they should exempt the other also in the particular case mentioned. Why should they include servants of a Local Governments?

MR. LAFLAMME said there was no provision in the Act which precluded a contract with a Local Government.

MR. LANGEVIN: The first section includes both.

MR. SMITH: If he is an officer of the Local Government he is a servant of the Crown. It is a mere matter of phraseology.

MR. LANGEVIN said he would draw attention to the other point—that Senators were exempt, and asked for it to be amended.

MR. MACKENZIE: The insertion of these words would meet it: "holds any office, commission or employment under the service of the Crown, as defined under the first section."

MR. LAFLAMME: That will do.

MR. LANGEVIN said he had suggested to the hon. Minister, yesterday, about giving the power to any member after the thirty days during which his election might be contested, the right to resign, in which case the writ would issue as in the case of death or an appointment to an office. Why should a member, if he had reasons to resign after the thirty days, not be allowed to resign?

MR. LAFLAMME: I think it is provided for by the Election Act.

MR. LANGEVIN said, under the old law, he had to wait until the fifteen first days were over. If his election was contested, he could not resign, if not contested, he might resign.

MR. LAFLAMME said this was provided for in the 12th section.

MR. LANGEVIN said the 12th section provided for a resignation between two Sessions. The 14th clause stated:

"If any vacancy happens by the death of any member, or by his accepting any office, the Speaker, on being informed of such vacancy by any member of the House in his place—or by notice in writing under the hands and seals of any two members of the House—shall forthwith address his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for the issue of a new writ for the election of a member to fill the vacancy, and a new writ shall issue accordingly."

And the fifteenth clause:

"A warrant may issue to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for the issue of a new writ for the election of a Member of the House of Commons, to fill up any vacancy arising subsequently to a general election and before the first meeting of Parliament thereafter, by reason of the death or acceptance of office of any member, and such writ may issue at any time after such death or acceptance of office."

There was nothing provided in either of these for the case of a member who had resigned. It might be inserted in that clause where the writ was allowed to issue in case of death, that a member might resign after the thirty days, provided his election was not contested.

MR. TUPPER said that, although the 13th clause provided for the resignation of a member in a certain contingency, it did not provide for the means of issuing a writ except between two Sessions and for a period which had transpired after the election of the new House. It did not provide for a member who wished to resign his seat previous to the first Session or between two Sessions.

MR. MILLS said he thought between two Sessions of Parliament meant between two Sessions.

MR. BUNSTER moved in amendment that the following section be added:—

"That the provisions of this Act shall not apply to the Province of British Columbia, saving and excepting carriers of railway materials and railway employés."

MR. MACKENZIE said as the hour was late he would ask the hon. gentleman to defer his amendment till a future stage.

MR. BUNSTER withdrew his motion.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 22nd March, 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADJOURNMENT FOR LADY-DAY.

MOTION.

MR. MACKENZIE moved that when the House adjourns this day, it stand adjourned until Tuesday next. He said that Monday was a holiday, when many members of the House conscientiously desired to abstain from working, and when it was their custom to attend church.

Motion agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

MR. HAGGART introduced a Bill (No. 56) To amend the Act respecting Controverted Elections.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would like to know what was the principle on which this measure was based.

MR. HAGGART said he would read the clause of the Bill which explained itself. It provided that it should be lawful for any of the Supreme Courts in the Province of Ontario, or any of the Judges of the said Court, to order the payment of any money paid into the Election Court, by way of security of costs, in any case where the petition had been removed off the fyles of the said Court.

MR. MACDONNELL said that if there was anything in this amendment, he thought it should be made to extend to other Provinces as well as Ontario.

MR. HOLTON: It strikes me that this is to meet a particular case. My hon. friend admits that it is; and it ought to be dealt with as a private Bill.

MR. HAGGART: I was exactly of the same opinion; but, on consultation with the Premier, he thought entirely differently; and he advised me to take this course.

MR. MACKENZIE: That was a confidential conversation.

Bill read the first time.

IMPORTATION OF MALT.

RESOLUTION.

MR. LAURIER moved that the Speaker leave the Chair and the House go into Committee to consider the following Resolution:

“That it is expedient to repeal the duty of Customs imposed on Malt imported into Canada by the Act 40 Vic., Chap. 11, Sect. 2, and to provide that British and Foreign Malt, when imported into Canada, shall be immediately placed in a suitable bonding warehouse, provided at the cost of the importer, and approved as suitable for the purpose by a duly authorized Revenue officer, and being so warehoused shall be bonded under the Excise regulation then in force, in respect of Malt made in Canada, and shall be subject to the same restrictions; and when taken for consumption, shall be subject to the same duty as Malt made in Canada.”

He said that as hon. members must be aware, on looking into the Trade and Navigation Returns, the importation of foreign malt, whether British or American, was merely nominal. This never took place, and therefore the revenue from this source was merely nominal, while the above provision was an impediment to trade. The maltsters of Canada themselves had petitioned the Government to remove this duty. The other provision contained in the resolution was simply intended to guard the interests of the Excise when malt was imported. The present resolutions had been copied from the regulation which existed under the Reciprocity Treaty. Their object was to place malt imported under the control of the Excise.

MR. TUPPER said he would like the hon. gentleman to explain why this action was taken by the Government.

MR. LAURIER: It is done on petition from the maltsters themselves.

MR. TUPPER: On what ground?

MR. LAURIER said it was done on the ground that this was simply an impediment in the way of trade. A large quantity of malt was exported from Canada to the United States, while we imported no malt from the United States. The maltsters had petitioned for the removal of the Customs duty, not fearing that any malt would be imported from the United States for the very reason that Canadian was so much superior to American barley, that while the demand in the United States for the former was great, the demand in Canada for the latter was nil.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario): What does the hon. gentleman expect to gain by this reduction of the duty? What object is to be attained by it?

MR. LAURIER said that the policy of this country was to have a revenue tariff.

MR. MASSON: That is what you said we had last year.

MR. LAURIER said that this was also what they said this year. This was the policy of the Government, and they did not vary from it; and if any article was taxed which did not yield any revenue, the policy of the Government was not to leave it on the list, as thus no advantage was gained. While we derived no revenue from this Customs duty, the maltsters of Canada considered it an impediment to their trade, and they, though interested parties, had petitioned for its removal; and if they had nothing to gain from this duty, and if they could give satisfaction to the maltsters themselves, there could be no reason whatever why this should not be done.

MR. MASSON: I think that this duty was doubled last year.

MR. LAURIER : You are not mistaken.

MR. MASSON : Consequently, the Government were induced by the same principles to put on this duty last year, and to take it off this year.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that the hon. gentleman was mistaken. It was not at all the intention to collect revenue in this way. It was merely done for the purposes of the Excise Department as a convenient mode of collecting the Excise, as was frequently done in these cases. Nevertheless, objection was taken to it on the part of the maltsters, who said that it would be abused to the detriment of the malting interest of Canada which they all desired to protect.

HON. MEMBERS : How ?

MR. CARTWRIGHT : That would be affected in this way : it would be used as an argument on the part of the people of the United States.

HON. MEMBERS : Hear, hear.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that the argument in question was most absurd and fallacious, but they had to deal with very foolish people ; and as the revenue was not thus affected, they had decided to comply with the request of the maltsters. If the hon. gentleman objected that any injury would thus be done to the revenue, and could show it, there would be good ground to oppose it.

MR. MASSON : I think that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue could have answered just as well as the Finance Minister.

MR. SPEAKER : This way of debating would better suit the Committee.

MR. MASSON : I think we could discuss the whole thing before we go into Committee.

MR. SPEAKER : But a member cannot speak half a dozen times in succession.

MR. MITCHELL said it was a very extraordinary thing that the hon. gentleman thought it necessary to increase the duty last year, and to remove it this year, though the hon. gentleman said they nevertheless had not departed from their principles, and were now pursuing exactly the same policy which they had followed last year. The hon. gentleman stated that this was done because the maltsters asked for it. He had not seen the petitions ; he knew nothing about them, nor as to the politics of the petitioners ; but one thing was very clear, the hon. gentlemen were not pursuing, with relation to the malting business, the same policy now as last year, and, therefore, his hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue, as far as this statement was concerned, was entirely in error. The reason given for this action by the hon. the Finance Minister seemed very extraordinary. The hon. gentleman stated that this was done for the convenience of the Excise. It appeared to him that this course was inconsistent with the course that ought to be pursued by an Administration that had a definite policy and adhered to it. He could see no adherence in this action to the policy advocated last year by the Government. Indeed, he could see no possible reason for this course. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue told them that Canadian was so much superior to American barley that the latter could not compete with the former ; but they found that in the United States a very heavy duty was imposed on Canadian barley. This duty was in fact enormous. It was not prohibitive, but it took away a very large profit from the Canadian barley grower, whereas we, who had a duty on American malt coming into our country, were told that because we had not imported much of it under the existing duty, no danger to Canadian growers of barley existed on the removal of this duty, which might as well be taken off for uniformity and the convenience of the Excise Department. There were officers enough in this Department to perform its functions and duties, and there was no reason for making themselves inconsistent simply for the convenience of the officers of this Department. They ought to have a higher duty to perform in connection with the legislation of this country than to consult the convenience of the officers of any Department. He opposed this legislation because it was at variance with what he considered was right. He advocated a policy, he would not say exactly of retaliation, though he believed that such a policy would commend itself to the good sense of the country; but he held that we should teach the Americans this: that where they imposed duties on our raw or manufactured articles, we would impose the same duties on their raw products, their agricultural products, and their manufactured articles. Why, then, should this duty be removed? Forsooth, because, as they were told, American malt was not imported. Our malt was superior to theirs, and because their malt could not compete with ours; but the duty once taken off, what would they find? They would find what had occurred with regard to many other Canadian industries. American products would come in, even though inferior to ours, and to the detriment of our interests. He considered this policy a bad one. It was inconsistent; it was not as the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had stated it was—the policy the Government had pursued last year; it ought not to be concurred in by the House; and he trusted that this would be the case.

MR. HOLTON said he differed from the hon. gentleman, when he stated that this proposal was eminently in the interest of the barley-growers and maltsters of Canada. Statistics showed that, whereas we imported no malt whatever from the United States, we exported to that country a very considerable quantity. The very fact that this perfectly inoperative duty existed in Canada, was being used on the other side in order to induce the Government of the United States to increase the duty on malt imported from this country. That, he thought, must be perfectly manifest; but, of course, hon. gentlemen opposite still adhered to their coercive policy towards the United States. The policy to be followed on this side, besides the collection of revenue, should be to foster as much as possible the industrial interests of this country, particularly the agricultural interests.

MR. TUPPER said a moment's reflection would show Mr. Speaker that in calling the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) to order he did not pursue the usual practice followed in the House. The hon. gentleman had not expressed an opinion in reference to the question before the House when called to order, but had merely asked a question for the purpose of inducing the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to give a fuller exposition of his views.

MS. SPEAKER: I did not call the hon. gentleman to order; I suggested that the discussion was taking a course more fit for the Committee than while I was in the chair. The hon. gentleman had made three speeches, and was going to make a fourth when I interfered.

MR. TUPPER: It is the usual practice when a Minister is making an exposition to the House upon any question, to call upon him as often as possible, with the view of further elucidating the subject. When, however, the hon. gentleman rose to speak on the question, he was called to order.

MR. SPEAKER: I suggested that we should go into Committee.

MR. TUPPER said he wished to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to the fact that he had not placed the question before the House in so full and frank a manner as the House had a right to expect. He was sure his hon. friend from Northumberland would have supported this measure had the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue frankly stated to the House what the policy of the Government was upon this occasion. He agreed with his hon. friend from Chateauguay in thinking that the measure was a protective one, and he was glad the Government had discovered that in many cases industries might be protected by lowering the duties just as much as by raising them. What the hon. member had stated was an exemplification of what he (Mr. Tupper) argued, that Protection did not necessarily involve increased taxation. Here was a case in which the maltsters and barley growers asked the Government for Protection, not by increasing the duty, but by lowering it. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue did not need to be so reticent, when he claimed that his policy last year and this were the same, because the anomaly was very evident from the fact that whereas the Customs duty on malt was doubled last year, this year it was proposed to be reduced by 50 per cent.

MR. HOLTON: It is to be abolished altogether.

MR. TUPPER: Well, the policy now laid down is diametrically opposed to that of last year.

MR. HOLTON: We learn wisdom from experience.

MR. TUPPER hoped hon. gentlemen opposite would continue to learn wisdom by experience, and apply that wisdom not simply to the reduction of the duty on malt. The House was now asked to undo the policy of last year, so that the hon. gentleman could not, with any degree of correctness, affirm that the policy of this year was identical therewith. There was another point to which he wished to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the lesson to be derived therefrom was pregnant with instruction to the House. Hon. gentlemen on the same side as himself, had again and again directed the attention of the Government to the fact that we in Canada were under the close surveillance of the Government of the United States and the people of that country, and had urged upon them the necessity for not remaining mere indifferent spectators. The Government of the United States had adopted a most insulting tone towards the people of Canada, whom they seemed to consider a mere handful, and too insignificant to be treated with on a broad basis. They pursued their own policy, regardless of everything that was done in Canada; and it was this, as had been pointed out by the hon. member for South Waterloo, which had influenced the Government at the present time. The reason assigned by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue for the change in the policy of the Government was certainly a very inadequate one, namely: that they had been petitioned by certain parties interested in the malt trade.

No explanation was given as to whether compliance with their request was a matter of propriety. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue ought to have explained that, by doubling the Customs duty on malt, no revenue was obtained, simply because no malt was brought into this country from the United States. That very fact was used as a lever by the maltsters of the United States when they petitioned Congress to levy a corresponding duty on malt raised in Canada and sent into the United States. The Government of Canada here saw a practical illustration of what gentlemen in Opposition had again and again urged, that in the United States the people were not mindful of the policy of this country, and that, if we wished to influence their legislation, we had the means of doing it. The present policy of the Government, which he approved of, by lowering the import duty on certain articles, would give a stimulus to the products of Canadian industry. It was just as much a Protective policy as a policy which imposed higher duties on articles coming into this country in competition with our own. Why was it right to remove the duty in the present case? Simply because the only effect of maintaining a high duty was mischievous, and had been proved to be such. This was not a case in which the industries of Canada were being swamped by the products of a foreign country; it was a case in which there was no outside competition. The policy was eminently a protective one, as he had said, and in this case as in that with reference to the duty on petroleum, the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue would have to learn the lesson that Parliament was not so powerless as he supposed, to deal with Canadian industry in such a way as to depress or promote it. In this case the hon. Minister had taken a course calculated to foster the industry of a particular trade, and he ought frankly to have avowed that experience had taught him to undo the legislation which he brought forward last year.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario) said that the maltsters of the city of Buffalo had recently held a meeting, at which the opinion was expressed—as embodied in the resolutions—that the Canadian maltsters were exporting malt into the United States despite the Customs duties imposed by the latter country. The duty on barley was a specific one of 15 cents per bushel, payable in gold; and that on malt, being a manufactured article, was the same as on flour—20 per cent., if he was not mistaken. The price of Canadian flour was much lower during the present and past years than it had been for years previously, on account of the immense crop which the country had produced, and the inability of the United States to absorb it. The Canadian maltsters were able to send a bushel of barley into the United States at a less price than the exporters there could sell it, and Canadians were actually supplying the United States brewers with malt at the present time. Alive to their interests, the United States maltsters made a representation to Congress at Washington. They said “The Canadian Government charges two cents alb. on malt, and the Canadian exporter sends it into the United States at 20 per cent; yet, by some means, they are able to sell it here at a lower rate than we can.” The hon. member for South Waterloo put a question to the Government the other night, which they considered of so great importance that they stopped the business which was being proceeded with, and at once came to a resolution to reduce the Customs duties on malt. Now, was it not obvious, whether the duty was two or two and a half cents per lb., that the Canadian maltsters could say to those in the United States and the Legislature at Washington, “Your statement is not correct; Canada does not make a discriminating duty.” By the lowering of that duty, also, hon. gentlemen opposite were made to eat their words of last Session; and the policy which they had given expression to this Session showed that they were fostering one of the industries of Canada. The fact of the whole matter was simply this: that the hon. member for South Waterloo expected, by the influence he had been able to bring to bear on the Government, to arrest the legislation about to take place in Washington, so that the United States Government might not impose a heavy duty on malt, as they were asked to do by maltsters of the country by way of retaliation. So long as the 20 per cent. ad valorem duty was less than the specific, so long would the Canadian maltsters be able to send their malt to the United States, and conduct their business as successfully as they had done for some time past.

Mr. YOUNG said it seemed impossible for the Government to please hon. gentlemen opposite as far as the trade question was concerned. When it was proposed to impose a duty they objected, and when it was proposed to reduce an impost, they objected to that also. He was sure the House must have been immensely surprised and amused to hear the speeches delivered respectively by the hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for South Ontario. The House was informed by the former gentleman that reduction of duties amounted to a measure of Protection, but it was certainly a new thing for him (Mr. Young) to learn that, by taking off the duties on articles imported into the country, the Government were favouring a system of Protection. He had always understood that Protection meant the impost of duties on articles imported into a country. The last speaker's argument was an able vindication of the policy of the Government; he went on to say that it was a matter of no consequence whether duties were levied on malt and barley, because Canada was an exporting country. The hon. gentleman contended also that the action of the Canadian Government would have the effect of inducing the Legislature of the United States not to impose heavy duties on malt and other articles imported from Canada into that country. Why, this was the very position that the other side of the House took: that so long as we did not pursue a discriminating policy, there was not likely to be a retaliatory policy pursued on the other side; but the moment we proceeded to raise the duties, the demand of the Americans would become overpowering for prohibitory duties upon every article we sent into the United States. The House knew that the duty on barley in this country last year was simply a nominal duty. He referred to the Import and not to the Excise duty. It was simply a mere matter of Departmental arrangement to protect the Excise; it was merely nominal, and was not put on with the view of obtaining revenue; but the view taken of it in the United States was the opposite to the view held by hon. gentlemen opposite. He contended that this duty made no difference to us in a revenue point of view, and there seemed to be no sound argument why it should not be removed. He maintained, too, that, if it was sound doctrine not to have a duty on barley or malt coming in here from the United States, it was perfectly sound with regard to other products which we exported to a larger extent than we imported. There was no doubt, however, that the particular reason of this action being taken was in consequence of the action taken by maltsters, who petitioned and pointed out very clearly that the result of the increase of these merely nominal duties in the previous year, had the effect of inducing maltsters in the United States to use it as a lever by which they sought to obtain an import duty of 35c. per bushel on Canadian malt going into the United States, the effect of which must have been most disastrous to our malting interests. Hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to think this was an argument in favour of their position; he thought it was the very reverse. What had been the position which had been taken on the other side of the House? That if we put high duties on American goods coming in here, that immediately they would act on the same principle at Washington, and put high duties on our goods. This completely proved the position which the Government had taken, and he contended that if the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite had been carried out, and they had increased the duties as they proposed to do on many kinds of agricultural produce and articles from the United States, that it would have caused an agitation there which would probably have resulted in prohibitory duties on all our produce going to the other side, and the best markets which the Canadian farmer had would thus be completely shut against him. He believed nothing could have been more fatal to the agricultural interests of the country than the policy advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the present fact was a vindication of the wisdom of the present Government in their refusal to make discriminating duties against the United States. He was very glad that the Government had complied with the request of the maltsters in this matter, and he held that by doing so they had pursued a policy the very opposite to Protection. If it was a policy of Protection, it was a Protection that made the means of our trading with the people on the other side more easy. It was really amusing that hon. gentlemen opposite should claim that it was a measure of Protection; it was the very opposite. It was in complete accord with the policy advocated by gentlemen on his side of the House; but it was gratifying to know those gentlemen were forced to commend this policy as being wise and proper in the interests of the maltsters of Canada.

MR. DYMOND said he did not know whether the hon. member for Cumberland was ever a member of the military profession, but if he were, there was one command he was never very loth to obey, and that was "Right about face." Another military manœuvre for which the hon. gentleman was distinguished was—that he could retreat as nobly as he advanced, and generally he could be depended upon to retreat very soon after the advance had been temporarily effected. The speech which the hon. gentleman had given to the House showed that he had returned to his first, or rather his old, love. He could not say what the hon. gentleman's first love might have been, he had had so many. But he had returned to the love of 1874, when he declared that the farmers of this country needed no Protection, and when he used, as an illustration of his strong Free-trade sympathies, the instance of the United States shipping policy as having practically swept their commerce from the seas, after having advocated, as he had done lately, the imposition of duties on raw materials and on foreign goods. Having advocated as he had done again and again, the imposition of duties on all agricultural produce, on coal, salt, and a great many other articles, he had now declared that, after all, the true principle of Protection was to impose no duties at all. He (Mr. Dymond) was glad to see this change in the hon. gentleman, and he was quite willing to welcome him into the ranks of those who did not believe in protective duties. He would welcome him whether he called himself Free-trader or Protectionist, or any other name he might assume. "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet," and the hon. member for Cumberland would still be the same, wherever he went. He might still, if he pleased, be honoured by the name of a Protectionist, as when he held those opinions which he now did not believe in and which he now did not hold. As regarded the member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs), his conversion was still more interesting, more gratifying, because, in a Protectionist sense, he had been a "hard case" for a great number of years. He (Mr. Dymond) never thought to see that hon. gentleman rise and advocate Free-trade doctrines even under the name of Protection. His case seemed quite hopeless, and it showed that there must be a re-action, not exactly in a Conservative sense, in South Ontario; it showed that the great sheet-anchor of the hon. gentleman had probably been taken away from him, and finding that a critical moment had arrived in his life, and that a general election was at hand, he had adopted a change of policy. If he had not changed his principles, he had been open to conviction, and no doubt to his friends and constituents in South Ontario, he would, in future, claim to be returned to this House as a Free-trader, or, at any rate, as an enemy to Protection. The hon. gentleman had not always been in old times—as those who recollected the Banking Act and some other measures of the late Government, would remember—so devoted a follower of the hon. member for Kingston as some others; but he was now, he (Mr. Dymond) would not say a servile follower—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. DYMOND said he would not say servile follower, because that would be unparliamentary, but he would say an extraordinarily faithful follower.

MR. SPEAKER said the hon. gentleman's remarks were not relevant to the subject under discussion.

MR. DYMOND said he would merely conclude the sentence, and say that the hon. gentleman was an extraordinarily faithful follower of the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald); but, if the hon. gentleman would join with his (Mr. Dymond's) party in voting against the imposition of duties on those articles we exported much more largely than we imported, he would not quarrel with him, even although he still chose to sail under false colours. The hon. member for Cumberland, and the hon. member for South Ontario, had now proclaimed their opinions to the world, and what colours they sailed under mattered very little. But the argument of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) was that the course of events at Washington, as regarded this malt duty, was a proof that the policy which he and his friends proclaimed to the House, and the country, would be successful in influencing the United States Legislature. What had they said up and down the country? The right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) had said, with regard to the Americans: "What you do to us we will do to you," meaning by this that they would impose duties on nearly everything we exported to the United States; he (Sir John A. Macdonald) would have a retaliative or reciprocal tariff, or whatever he chose to call it, imposing the same duties on goods coming into this country, as the Americans charged upon goods that we exported. This, in fact, was the grand scheme of Protection which the right hon. gentleman had proclaimed on every platform for six or eight months before Parliament assembled. The hon. gentleman believed this course would bring the Americans to their senses and make them desirous of placing the tariffs of the two countries upon a proper footing; but their action in respect of the malt duty proved just the contrary, and the hon. gentleman appeared likely—as the champion of a retaliative tariff—to find himself in a very small minority indeed. He (Mr. Dymond) sympathized with the right hon. gentleman. The followers of the right hon. gentleman upon this question had deserted him, the first to leave him being the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper). He (Sir John A. Macdonald) had not always been in accordance with the hon. member for Cumberland of late, and now the House had witnessed the final outbreak between them, so far as the question of a reciprocal tariff was concerned. The policy of the hon. member (Sir John A. Macdonald) was, that we should levy on American imports the amount they levied upon ours. He (Mr. Dymond) would ask the House to consider what this would amount to. The hon. member said that if we imposed duties on American imports the Americans would take their duties off. What had been the result in the case of malt? Why, instead of taking the duty off they proposed to put additional duties on. If this instance was worth anything it showed exactly the reverse of that result which the hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches had been predicting. Instead of bringing the American Legislature to their knees, and inducing them to adopt a reciprocal tariff policy, or Free-trade, they found it induced the Americans to regard us as adopting a discriminating, hostile, exasperating and retaliatory tariff, and they proposed to double their duties instead of reducing them. Just let the House consider what the result might have been if the policy of the hon. members for Cumberland and South Ontario (Mr. Tupper and Mr. Gibbs) and a few others had been enforced. It appeared that we now imported wheat from the United States free, while the Americans levied 20c. per bushel on all wheat going into their country. The result of the policy of the Opposition would have been that this duty would probably have been increased to 40c.

per bushel; rye and barley, now charged 15c., would have been increased to 30c.; oats charged 10c. to 20c.

AN HON. MEMBER: How do you know?

MR. DYMOND said this was a fair argument founded on what had already occurred, although he did not suppose the hon. member for North Huron or the right hon. member for Kingston had given much consideration to the probable consequences of their proposals if carried out. Under the policy of the leader of the Opposition (Sir John A. Macdonald), wheat flour, on which a duty of 20 per cent. was now levied, would have had a duty of 40 per cent. imposed upon it, which would probably have excluded it altogether from the United States. On live animals the duty of 20 per cent. would, no doubt, have been increased to 40 per cent.; pine lumber, from $2 a thousand to $4; coal, from 75c. to $1.50, and on salt, the American duty upon which was now 8c. to 12½c., they would probably have had the pleasure of paying from 16c. to 25c. That, according to the evidence they had in the action of the United States maltsters, and the influence they might bring to bear on the United States Legislature, would be the result of following out the policy of the right hon. member for Kingston. The fact was that it would be a discriminating policy towards the United States. We did not import any of those articles, except salt and a little coal, from Great Britain. It would be imposing what the Americans did not impose upon us, for their policy was not in purpose or intention one of discrimination; and what they charged to us they charged to the whole world. It would be a retaliatory policy, an exasperating policy, and a policy which, according to the illustration brought forward by the hon. gentleman, would have helped to double all American duties, instead of securing the result which they mainly hoped to obtain.

MR. ORTON said it might be argued that this action on the part of the Government was in the interests of the maltsters of this country, but he did not think it was to the interests of the farmers. However, he was glad to see that the hon. members on the Government side of the House were beginning at last to give some attention to the agricultural interests of the country. But he thought there was a remedy by which the Government could have benefitted the maltsters more than by this duty, for though it might be argued that the taking off of this duty might have the effect of inducing the Americans to let Canadian imports go into the States on the same terms as their produce was admitted here, yet if hon. gentlemen looked to the past they would find that the Americans did not consider our interest with regard to the tariff. They had not done so in the past and would not do so in the future. He could not help thinking that, after all, this proposal of the Minister of the Inland Revenue was a step in the wrong direction, and that our maltsters would find the removal of this duty would not prove much to their interests in the end. And if the American Government found that Canadian malt would go in and compete successfully with their malt, they would increase the duty upon the Canadian malt in the interests of their maltsters. He found by the Trade and Navigation returns there were last year, 45,000 bushels of malt brought into Canada. If this duty of 2½c. per pound were taken off, American maltsters would begin to compete with Canadian maltsters in supplying the brewers of Canada. Another fact which went to show how the maltsters and barley-growers of this country would be seriously injured, was, that, in the United States, brewers had completed a series of experiments by which they found that beer could be manufactured out of Indian corn, and a large brewery in Syracuse, the Messrs. Groenway's brewery, had been making beer upon a very large scale by using one bushel of malt to one bushel of Indian corn, and the beer produced was of an excellent quality. If this country continued to admit Indian corn free, Canadians would soon be obliged, in face of a heavy excise duty on Canadian malt, to use American corn in the manufacture of beer. It was evident that it would be greatly to the benefit of the maltsters, and also of the farmers of Canada if our Government would lower the excise duty upon Canadian malt and put a duty upon American corn. He would mention another point in this connection which tended to prove that Canadian brewers would have to adopt the American plan of manufacturing beer out of Indian corn. The extract obtained from Indian corn in the manufacture of ale, was far greater than that obtained from malt. 25lb. of Indian corn would yield as strong an extract as 36lb. of malt, and when used with a certain portion of malt, yielded as good beer as could be manufactured. It would be a very serious matter to the Canadian farmer if the consumption of his barley was not only reduced in the States, but also that the quantity used by our brewers in Canada was reduced one half. Some steps ought to be taken to reduce the importation of Indian corn into this country. It did seem strange that this anomaly continued to exist; that, in the manufacture of whiskey, malt made from Canadian barley went in the one mash together with Indian corn produced by the farmers of the United States, yet, while the latter product was admitted free of duty, Canadian malt was subject to an excise duty of 75c.

MR. ROCHESTER said he did not intend to make many remarks on this subject, as he was not in the House when the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue gave his explanations of the Bill, and would defer entering closely into the question until the Bill came before the Committee. In answer, however, to the argument of his hon. friend from South Waterloo, that the United States Government did not care what course the Canadian Government adopted, he would ask why, in that case the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue could not have put his motion in the notice paper, the same as any other hon. member, and have taken the regular course? The only reason which suggested itself was, that the Government was afraid of the Government of the United States; if not, why could not the hon. Minister have just as well put his notice of motion upon the notice papers and taken his turn like other members. The hon. gentleman wanted to get ahead, in order that word should be telegraphed at once to Washington that this House was quite subservient to everything they required. The hon. member for Waterloo had said a good deal with regard to the course pursued by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, which he characterized as turning round to Protection. He (Mr. Rochester) believed it was quite the other way. He thought the hon. member had put the cart before the horse. The hon. gentlemen opposite were turning now to do what the Opposition had been urging upon them for the last two or three years, namely, to protect the agriculturist of this country.

MR. MILLS: We are turning you round.

MR. ROCHESTER said the Canadian maltster manufactured the malt in bond and shipped it to the United States in bond. All the duty he had to pay was 20 per cent. ad valorem, or about 13c. per bushel, while if he undertook to send a bushel of barley to the States, he would have to pay 15c. per bushel. If that was not protecting the farmer, he did not know what was. It was more; it was protecting the manufacturer. The Government was protecting the maltster in this country as well as the farmer, because the maltster purchased the barley raised by that farmer, sent it out of the country at a duty of 13c. per bushel, instead of 15c. per bushel, the duty on barley. He was glad to see that the hon. gentlemen opposite were changing their course in the interests of the agriculturists. With respect to the merits and demerits of the Bill, he would not say anything, but would defer his remarks till it came before the Committee.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. members for South Waterloo (Mr. Young) and North York (Mr. Dymond) make themselves very merry on what they call the change of front of the hon. gentleman who sits behind me, who, they say, is equally ready to retreat as he is zealous to advance. That comes rather with a bad grace from the supporters of the present Ministry on the present occasion. These gentlemen were just as strong Free-traders last Session as they are this Session. At the command of the hon. the Minister of Finance last Session these Free-traders rushed zealously to the front in their charge, and increased the duty to 2½c. on malt. This Session they make a retreat with equal zeal, and take off the 2½c. They advance to the rescue and put on additional duty when they are bid, and are Free-traders; they retreat when ordered and take off the duty, and they are Free-traders. They are, at the same time, Free-traders when they put on a duty and when they take it off. "King Pepin with his valiant men, marched up the hill and then marched down again;" last Session they marched up, now they march down. We are told of all the horrors of a retaliatory policy, if we carry out a National Policy; we would, actually, have a duty of 40 per cent. put upon our wheat and flour. I thought the hon. member for North York had argued that the prices of wheat and flour were settled in the home market, and that it made not the slightest difference what duty the American Government levied on these products. The hon. member for South Waterloo says: "Look, what a suicidal policy; if we put on any duties, the United States Government will quadruple their duties; they will kill our farmers by closing their markets to them." The great authority on the question, the Minister of the Interior, says the consumer pays the duty, and whether 40 per cent. or 400 per cent., it makes no difference. He says the consumer pays the duty, and yet the hon. gentleman finds out an inconsistency in the argument of my hon. friend. The argument of my hon. friend is the argument that I have always used, that the readjustment of the tariff does not involve, or may not involve, an increase of the whole volume of taxation on the people. Experience can only show on what articles an additional duty should be placed in order to protect a given interest, on what articles the duty should be maintained as at present, and on what articles the duty should be lowered. We say the present tariff is inartistic, unscientific, deficient in some parts; that it helps to depress and crush our manufacturing interests, to allow an undue and improper interference with our agricultural products in our own markets, and that there ought to be a readjustment in a scientific sense. I believe the tariff could be so readjusted that unless the future necessities of this country required additional revenue and an increase of duties for revenue purposes, we can give more protection to our agricultural interests, we can give an encouragement to our manufacturers, not only to enable them to maintain this present position, but to relieve them from the existing depression and give them an opportunity for development, and, at the same time, the whole amount of pressure and volume of taxation would not, on the whole, be increased to the people. That is the doctrine we have always held; and the argument of hon. gentlemen near me is the same as my argument, the same as we have always used through the country. But hon. gentlemen opposite cannot say that. As I have just shown, the hon. members who voted last year to raise the duty on malt to 2½c. per lb., being an addition of 1c.—they being Free-traders—now come down to Parliament and say, "It will ruin our malt trade if the duty we ourselves voted for last year is not removed." Hon. gentlemen opposite have been charging us with turning right-about-face. The country will determine who have made their retreat, and who have shown the least interesting portions of their persons to the public.

MR. DYMOND: May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether a retaliatory tariff, as against the United States, would mean the abolition of duties or the imposition of duties on agricultural products.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not see that is particularly relevant to my line of argument. If the hon. member will do me the honour to read my resolution which he voted against, he will find that the resolution says that, until we obtain reciprocity of trade, our true policy is to make an advance towards reciprocity of tariffs, so far as the varied interests of Canada will permit. That is the resolution which has been declared to be a vote of want of confidence in the Government, and on which four hon. gentlemen supporting the Ministry declared their want of confidence in it. We find two strong supporters of the Government are going to declare their want of confidence in the present Administration in the matter of wheat and flour. We find others of hon. gentlemen opposite, though supporters of the Government, are actually about to vote want of confidence in the Administration in regard to corn, rye, oats, and I do not know what else; and bye-and-bye, by slow degrees, the whole Ministerial supporters, on one question or another, are going to declare their want of confidence in the Government. We have been consistent; we are consistent. Hon. gentlemen opposite must take another line before they can convince this country that we are not in this case, as in other cases, carrying out the policy we have enunciated, that there should be and must be a readjustment of the tariff so as to encourage our varied interests, and, if that is carefully, scientifically and properly carried out, the people will find that their burdens are not increased, but their ability to meet increased taxation will be greatly augmented.

MR. HIGINBOTHAM said he desired to read a few statistics in reply to the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Gibbs), who had declared that it was only last year that Canada was able to successfully export malt to the United States. In 1871 we imported from the United States 1,260 bushels, and exported 167,939 bushels; 1872, imported 2,446 bushels, exported 241,889 bushels; 1873, imported 3,417 bushels, exported 374,994; 1874, imported 28,654, exported 481,099; 1875, imported 16,191, exported 101,889 bushels; 1876, imported 5,221, exported 153,923; 1877, old and new tariff, imported 4,133, exported 307,652 bushels. Hon. gentlemen opposite had good reason to congratulate themselves that the right hon. member for Kingston was in his seat when the question came before the House; for during his short experience in Parliament he had never seen more confusion in the ranks of the Opposition than to-day, and they had good reason for exhibiting that alarm. They had been professing a national policy or a policy of tariffs which hon. gentlemen opposite now appeared to abandon. When the very first chance presented itself to impose a tariff similar to that which hon. gentlemen opposite had been advocating, they refrained from urging it. He was glad the country now saw the effect of the national policy which hon. gentlemen opposite were advocating, and that they admitted, as the hon. member for Cumberland had admitted, it was an entire failure.

MR. BUNSTER said the malting trade had been used as a foot-ball in the Dominion, and as he knew something about it, he felt it to be his duty not to allow the motion to pass without offering some remarks on it. Last Session a gross injustice was done to the trade by the imposition of 1½c. per lb. duty on malt used by the brewers in the Dominion. It was now proposed to take off ½c., and allow American maltsters to send in against Canadian farmers malt on the same terms. That was neither fair nor a protection to the farmer. The Americans would not adopt such a policy, but, on the contrary, would impose a high protective tariff. The United States endeavoured in every way to protect their own industries, and it was false policy to allow American malt to come into this country, and thereby cheapen the Canadian product. In the interests of his constituents, and of the farmers of the Dominion, he entered his protest against the proposal of the Government. It was a step in the wrong direction, and should, for the present, be withdrawn. Under the present law the farmers had a protection of ½c. per lb., as against foreign competitors.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to open up a debate, which has taken place on other motions, upon the question of Free-trade and Protection. I think the question scarcely arises upon the present motion, although hon. gentlemen opposite have taken advantage of it, in order to propound their theories for the twentieth time this Session in regard to that question. Every one in his right senses knows that Canada has neither a Free-trade nor a Protection policy. Our policy has been that of a revenue tariff. I, myself, believe in Free-trade doctrines; I believe in carrying them out as far as the circumstances of the country will permit, but our circumstances are such that it is impossible, however willing a Government may be, to give them practical effect in legislation. We have, on all occasions, endeavoured, as an Administration, to consult the interests of Canada. Anyone would suppose, to listen to the remarks of the right hon. gentleman opposite, that he conceives the idea that no one but himself and his associates have that in view. I have no objection he should claim that his policy is one more adapted to the interests of the Dominion, if he pleases; but he should not claim that he alone, with his followers, are disposed to consult the interests of the country, when every Government, both from patriotic motives and from a sense of self-preservation, is bound to consider what is best for the general interests. I believe the policy the right hon. member for Kingston is advocating is a mere political ruse; I believe the hon. gentleman is simply advocating it as a political expedient. I believe his policy would be utterly ruinous to this country if it were carried out; that he must be aware, if he has entered into calculations, it will be impossible to carry out his policy, and nothing is more conclusive on that point than that the hon. gentleman has never agrees in two speeches as to the policy to be pursued. In one case the right hon. gentleman advocates reciprocal tariffs, or a retaliatory policy; in other words, if the United States imposed a duty of 40c. on any article, we should impose 40c. also. On another occasion, he says, all they desire is a readjustment of the Tariff. On another occasion, the right hon. gentleman and his followers say that they merely want to add a little more percentage to existing duties. There is neither consistency nor uniformity in the policy which has been propounded from time to time by hon. gentlemen opposite. But they are obliged according as the political weathercock, which guides them, points in the direction, to indicate one thing or another, such as is most convenient for the occasion. This has been the policy pursued. Our policy, on the other hand, has been consistent. We have adopted as a policy that a revenue tariff is what is suited to this country, that a revenue tariff is such in effect as to afford a very large measure of Protection to every one of those who are engaged in manufacturing pursuits, and anything further in that direction would simply result in a very serious loss to the revenue, and it was impossible to carry out the theory of Protection all around. All interests cannot be protected, because then there would be no persons left to do the protecting. It is a mere fallacy. Protection means in its principle and essence a gross injustice to some classes of the community. It involves that in principle; and, therefore, when the right hon. gentleman and his friends come to close quarters we find these constant evasions and these constant resorts to different statements, at one time advocating reciprocal tariffs—which is another term for retaliatory tariffs—and at other times a readjustment, which is always a very safe expression, and may mean much or little, as the right hon. gentleman or his friends may desire. The hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) suggests another phrase, namely, a judicious tariff. That is another very safe phrase, one which does not commit hon. gentlemen to any policy whatever, because anything is judicious according to the interpretation the person who is speaking may apply to it. We believe, however, in doing in a constitutional manner what is likely to promote the interests of Canada. While I do not wish to protract the debate, I am sure the right hon. member for Kingston would not have thought I had acted respectfully in this matter if I had not replied to what he had said. The right hon. member has boasted of his consistency. We know what his consistency has been with regard to this question. I know what the right hon. gentleman's policy has been for many years in this country, and I know, moreover, what has been the policy of the hon. gentleman who sits beside him (Mr. Tupper), who complained very bitterly some years ago that the Government were legislating in a manner hostile to the interests of his own Province because they were introducing the thin end of the wedge of Protection. In the present matter we are simply desirous of doing what we believe will benefit Canadian interests, and for that reason the resolution has been submitted to the House.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) said he had no objection to the House resolving itself into Committee to consider the resolution. But it embodied a policy which he could not understand, because it declared that articles manufactured in a foreign country should be subjected, when brought into the Dominion, to only the same taxes as were levied on articles manufactured in this country. The policy was an unwise one, and it was evident that the Americans would retaliate and impose higher duties, in order to shut Canadian malt out of the United States. The effect of that policy would, therefore, be a reduction in the revenue of the Dominion. Owing to the unwise increase in the malt tax last year, brewers who could not raise the price for their ale were induced to use molasses, sugar and other ingredients. The brewers could not afford to pay the price charged for the malt, which was, therefore, sent out of the country, and the amount of revenue raised under a tax of 2c. per lb. would be very much less under a duty of 1c.

Motion agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee)

MR. TUPPER said that he did not wish to prolong the discussion, but the Committee would remember that he had confined himself exclusively to the policy that was under consideration with regard to this measure submitted by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, but the hon. member for North York, not content with the fact that he (Mr. Tupper) could not have had the opportunity, without protracting the debate to a great length on a former occasion to notice his remarks, had taken the occasion to reiterate those remarks. He would like to draw that hon. gentleman's attention, and the attention of the House, for a moment to a very remarkable circumstance connected with the policy and statements of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for North York occupied a very large portion of his time on a former occasion, and a considerable portion of his time that day, in doing, what? In endeavouring to show that the policy of the Opposition would be ruinous to this country, and that they were wedded to a policy which if adopted, would be disastrous to Canada? No. The hon. gentleman, on a former occasion, and that day, at great length, had sought to convince the House and the people of this country that the Opposition were utterly insincere. The hon. the First Minister had followed the hon. gentleman in the same line of argument, and, he (Mr. Mackenzie) too said that the Opposition had no intention whatever, if they obtained power, of carrying out the policy they proposed.

MR. DYMOND: Hear, hear.

MR. TUPPER said he wanted to draw the attention of the House to this fact, and to the different attitude on which the two parties in the House stood in relation to each other on this great question of the fiscal policy of this country. The Opposition maintained that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite was a Free-trade policy—an out-and-out Free-trade policy.

MR. YOUNG: No.

MR. TUPPER said the Opposition accused hon. gentlemen opposite of no insincerity; they held hon. gentlemen opposite to the principles they advocated. The Opposition said that this country had suffered, was suffering and would suffer under that policy, and that because those hon. gentlemen held those opinions and principles, the people ought to displace them from office, and bring into power a party which professed and maintained and held opposite and different principles. What did hon. gentlemen say? The whole burthen of their argument was that the Opposition were not sincere, were not Protectionists and did not intend to carry out a protective policy, and that, if they had now the power, they would not protect the industries of the country. Was not this a significant fact for the consideration of the people? What did it mean? It meant that the hon. gentlemen opposite knew that instead of taking the ground that the policy of the Opposition would be disastrous to the country if carried out, they were compelled to say that the Opposition would not carry it out, because hon. gentlemen opposite wished to prevent them getting into power, and to keep them in a minority and to prevent them obtaining the support of the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite, if they were honest, if they believed that the policy of the Opposition was not the policy for the people of this country, and that the sentiments they held did not commend themselves to the judgment of the vast majority of the people of Canada to-day—as he maintained it did—instead of pretending that the Opposition were insincere, they would say to the country: "In the interests of Canada we ask you to keep out of power a party whose policy is disastrous, which policy will be carried into operation the moment they obtain office." So he showed, in regard to hon. gentlemen opposite, that the very course they took and the very charge of insincerity they brought against the Opposition was the best evidence—these statements being made in the face of the people, on the eve of a great struggle between the two parties—that these hon. gentlemen knew right well that the policy they held, and which the Opposition held them to, was a policy that did not commend itself to the approval of the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dymond) was very anxious about his consistency. The hon. gentleman ought to remember a remark interjected by the hon. member for Chateauguay a short time since: that there was nothing so important as for persons to learn wisdom by experience. But, supposing that he (Mr. Tupper) had changed his policy, and that, in the changed condition of the country, he held a policy to-day which he had not held on a former occasion, would he be wise and honest, and be discharging his duty to his country as a public man if he suppressed that change in his convictions, and, for the sake of blind adherence to consistency alone.

MR. DYMOND: Can I interrupt the hon. gentleman?

MR. TUPPER said he would rather not be interrupted, as his voice was in bad condition. The hon. gentleman knew right well that one of the most valuable qualities that a public man could possess was to be open to conviction, and to be ready, if he found he was wrong, or that the policy he had held or pursued at any time was not in the interests of the country to change his policy, and to have the manliness, over and above-board, to avow it. There was nothing to detract from the character of a public man if such were the case; but he wished to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the charge that he was a Free-trader in Nova Scotia in times gone by, established no charge of inconsistency.

MR. KIRK: Hear, hear.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. member for Guysboro' said "hear, hear"; and he too seemed, no doubt, to labour under the fallacy that there was any inconsistency in being a Nova Scotia Free-trader at a time when the population of Nova Scotia was between 300,000 and 400,000—when they were met at the border, 120 miles from the city of Halifax, with a hostile tariff, and when all the natural advantages that Nova Scotia possessed for a manufacturing country with coal, with iron, with limestone, with open harbours, with materials for ship-building, and everything that was calculated to indicate the possible seat of a great manufacturing industry—and a Protectionist now under the changed condition of things. The man would have been simply an idiot who then would have propounded a Protectionist policy for 300,000 or 400,000 people; and it was one of the positions he had in view, and one of the claims that he made upon his countrymen to sustain the policy of Confederation, and find that it would give to the people of Nova Scotia the means of utilizing its great natural resources that nature had given to the country, by opening to them a great market of four millions instead of four hundred thousand people, for the industries which might be created by utilizing the great natural advantages that they possessed. Did the hon. member for North York or any hon. member say that there was any inconsistency in changing a policy under circumstances so entirely changed as these?

MR. KIRK: What about the thin edge of the Protectionist wedge in 1874?

MR. TUPPER said he would come to that point directly. He was glad to find he had convinced the hon. member for Guysboro' of the fallacy of bringing up the policy he had propounded as Minister, when they were a small and isolated Province, surrounded by a hostile tariff and without any field for protecting their industries.

MR. KIRK: We are Nova Scotia still.

MR. TUPPER: What did he do when the Reciprocity Treaty was repealed? He brought down, as the hon. gentleman knew, a policy which imposed or re-imposed the duties on flour and upon all the various articles that came free out of the United States into Nova Scotia.

MR. KIRK: There never was a duty on flour in Nova Scotia that I am aware of.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman knew right well that this fact would only strengthen the case. When at the head of the Government in Nova Scotia, and the Reciprocity Treaty was repealed, he himself proposed the policy of the imposition of a duty on flour, and this was when they were in a far different position as regarded a supply of that necessity of life than they were at the present moment.

MR. KIRK: How did you intend to protect?

MR. TUPPER said what he intended to do was this: he intended to endeavour to put, so far as Nova Scotia was concerned—for to that section of the country his power was then limited—the tariff in such a position as to give them the means of influencing the policy of the United States, and, in fact, to place this tariff, as far as he could, in the position that the tariff of the country then stood when they obtained reciprocity; and he believed then, as now, that, if this policy were adopted by the other Provinces, the result would be what it was on the former occasion: they would have something to offer, as they would be in a position to obtain a reciprocity treaty. Under those circumstances, he proposed the imposition of duties on a large number of those articles; and these were put on the Statute-book, where they were at the time of Confederation. The hon. gentleman wanted to know about his policy in 1874, when the hon. the Minister of Finance brought in a change in the tariff. It would be better if the hon. gentleman would read what he said in 1874 instead of fastening upon a single observation—and he might say he looked in vain for that observation respecting the entering the thin end of the wedge of Protection.

MR. DYMOND: Hear, hear.

MR. TUPPER: In any other paper but the Toronto Globe. He could find it there, but nowhere else. He spoke from memory, but he found the statement reported in the other papers as introducing, step by step, the thin edge of increased taxation. He would not say the report of the Globe was not correct, but having had his attention drawn to it on various references to this matter, he had had the curiosity to turn up the files, and he had found it reported as introducing, step by step, increased taxation in the one case, and in the other of Protection. What was the gravamen of his charge, and the strongest point of his attack against the policy of the hon. the Minister of Finance on that occasion? It related to the removal of the Protection that had existed in regard to the great ship-building industry of Nova Scotia. One of the strongest points he had then made against the policy and tariff which the hon. gentleman brought down, was that the hon. gentleman had stripped one of the greatest industries of Nova Scotia, and of this country, of the Protection which it had enjoyed in having all articles entering into the construction of ships brought into the country free. Instead, therefore, of attacking the hon. gentleman for giving Protection, he had attacked him for taking away Protection by imposing a duty on articles that entered into one of the great manufactures of this country. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kirk) would go back to that speech he would find that he (Mr. Tupper) brought the charge in specific terms against the hon. the Minister of Finance, of taking away and striking down the Protection which the previous Government, of which he had been a member, had given to one of the manufacturing industries. Therefore, this gentleman would have to abandon that subject as a means of bringing home to him any charge of inconsistency whatever. He had then affirmed that the hon. gentleman's tariff, which he (Mr. Tupper) had attacked vehemently, as the hon. gentleman knew, was eminently a Free-trade tariff, and that the changes made in the tariff were all made under the influence and the antagonism with which the hon. gentlemen met, and the hostility which his tariff encountered from the Opposition, and which it invoked in the country. Under this pressure, the hon. gentleman abandoned the Free-trade policy and made changes in the interests of Protection; ad valorem duties were altered from 16 $\frac{2}{3}$ to 17 $\frac{1}{2}$, and the proposal to raise \$300,000 or \$400,000 by the imposition of a special and an increased duty on silks, satins, and articles not manufactured in this country was abandoned. It was a Free-trade policy on the one side, and it increased the ad valorem duties which applied to, and which, to a certain extent, protected the manufacturing industries of the country. It was true that the hon. gentleman destroyed very much of the Protection which that increase in the ad valorem duties would have given, by taking articles that were on the free list and which were used in our various manufactures; but the whole scope of his attack on the hon. gentleman in 1874 was entirely in the line in, and from the standpoint from, which he criticised the hon. gentleman's policy during the present Session; and he pointed to the very fact that the hon. gentleman was not then giving to our industries the Protection to which they were entitled. He also attacked the policy of the hon. gentleman on that occasion with reference to the increased duties on machinery, which the late Government had allowed to come in free. This related to such machinery as could not be manufactured in this country, so, while the late Government protected our manufacturers of machinery, they stimulated our manufacturing industries, and protected them by allowing them to import such machinery free of duty. He then attacked the hon. gentleman for changing that policy, and this line of argument ran through the speech which had again and again been relied upon by the hon. member for North York and other gentlemen to establish the charge of a change of policy on his part. Any hon. gentleman who read that speech from beginning to end, and who examined it in the light of the questions that were being discussed, of the tariff that was before them, and of the changes made in it, would find that it was entirely on all fours with the policy he had advocated during the present Session. He wished to know why hon. gentlemen were anxious to establish this charge of inconsistency and insincerity? If the policy of the Opposition was bad, was this not so much the better for hon. gentlemen opposite? If their policy was unpopular, and opposed to the interests of the people of Canada, was it not so much the better for the party that wanted to keep them out of power?

MR. DYMOND: I want the people to know it.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman opposite should give the Opposition credit for sincerity and exalted patriotism, believing, as they declared they did believe, that the policy of the Opposition was utterly opposed to the sentiment of the people of this country, that it would not be received, and that it would be condemned by the people. These hon. gentlemen, instead of charging them with insincerity, ought to give them credit for the most exalted patriotism

MR. TUPPER.

if they nailed their colours to the mast in defending a policy that was unpopular with the people of this country, because there would be but one reason for this, and it could only be that, in fighting for what they believed to be the interests of the country, they were willing to be immolated, and if, therefore, these hon. gentlemen had any faith in the principles they professed, instead of making these charges of inconsistency and insincerity, they would hold out to the people of this country the fact that the advent of the Opposition to power would mean the carrying out of the principles they had professed, which would be injurious to the people. He wanted no better evidence than that from the Prime Minister down to the hon. member for North York, running through the rank and file of the whole party, that they knew the principles which the Opposition held and had avowed, and which they were prepared to stand up to and follow up, were the principles that had taken a firm and enduring hold on the minds and belief of the vast majority of the people.

MR. DYMOND: You just have deserted them all.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman said they had just deserted them all. Why? The hon. gentleman had talked a great deal about a retaliatory tariff being proposed by the right hon. member for Kingston, the leader of the Opposition; but the right hon. gentleman had not proposed a retaliatory tariff in that sense.

MR. DYMOND: Hear, hear.

MR. TUPPER said he would ask the hon. member for North York if he could find any such proposal in any speech ever made by any member of the Opposition.

AN HON. MEMBER: Yes. Scores of them.

MR. TUPPER: From its distinguished leader down to the humblest member of the party, no member of the Opposition ever proposed such a tariff as this Government had brought forward last year with relation to this question, and which the Opposition opposed. When it was proposed to increase the duty on malt, what did the Opposition do? They opposed it in the interests of the agriculturists of this country. They said that, in other words, it was a tax on barley. He was inclined to believe-- though he was not very intimately acquainted with these questions--that the whole principle of taxing malt was radically wrong, and that, instead of taxing malt, if a heavy tax was put on beer, it would be very much better for the revenue and for the country in every possible way. He held that this increase only on malt was a wrong to the people of the country. They said that it was wrong with regard to our agricultural interests, and that the imposition of a heavy tax on malt was, in other words, a tax upon the growth of barley. They opposed the whole proposition to increase the duty on malt, and, consequently, the Customs duty on malt coming into this country. They opposed any change in the tariff. What was this change? His hon. friend from South Ontario had pointed out to the House very clearly that, instead of this being a retaliatory policy, this policy went far in excess and far beyond anything that was ever proposed by any member of the Opposition or any person in or out of the House in that direction. Why, the effect of the change was to impose a duty of about 90c. as opposed to the United States duty of about 13c. This was the way in which the tariff stood to-day. This was the tariff brought in by the hon. the Minister of Finance, and sustained by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, by the hon. member for North York and all those valiant Free-traders. Those valiant Free-traders, those gentlemen who were so utterly opposed to anything like a retaliatory tariff, and who said that we should keep our duties so immeasurably below those of the United States, actually brought in a tariff which, at this moment, imposed a duty of something like 90c. per bushel on malt as against something like 13c. per bushel on malt with which our maltsters were met when they crossed the borders. Did the hon. member for North York say that it was a retreat for him (Mr. Tupper) to denounce such a policy as that, and that the right hon. member for Kingston ever at any time, or any other member of the Conservative party, proposed that this country should impose a tariff seven times over and above the American tariff. There was no inconsistency whatever in the conduct of the Opposition. He might differ from some hon. gentlemen who might understand the subject better, but he had said at once that he regarded this as a step in the right direction. He believed that the step now taken by the hon. the Minister of Finance, which all the members of the Opposition had opposed last year as a wrong step in increasing the Excise and Customs duty on malt, was a proper one. Under these circumstances, he was glad to see that they had retraced this step, and would only be too happy, with the light which at this moment he possessed, to give to hon. gentlemen opposite all the aid he could in perfecting this measure. But the hon. member for North York must not tell him that he was retreating and making a retrograde step or changing his policy, as no hon. gentleman on the Opposition side of the House, and no friend of the Conservative party inside or outside of the House had ever proposed anything so monstrous as this act of the present Government, imposing a duty exhibiting such utter disparity with the duties levied on the other side of the line. He was glad that this step had been taken, because he regarded it as an evidence that the hon. the Finance Minister felt that a mistake could be made by legislation injurious to the country, and that it might be corrected by wiser and better legislation, and by retracing the step in question. He was also glad of this action, because it gave evidence to the House and the country that the hon. gentleman, at the instance of the barley growers and maltsters of this country, had treated that as giving Protection to them which reduced the duties, and as his right hon. friend had stated, it was just as much a part of their policy to give Protection by the reduction of duty as by the imposition of duty. The Protection given to the great ship-building interest of the country by the removal of all duties on everything that went into the construction of our ships was one of the most valuable measures of Protection that was ever bestowed upon any industry in this country, and it had been attended by the most valuable results. The hon. member for North York was startled with alarm at the prospect of increased duties on their part, increasing those that already existed in the United States. The hon. gentleman said that the imposition of a duty on coal would lead to the Americans doubling the duty on coal. Why, the hon. gentleman surely could not fail to understand what had led to a duty being placed on coal entering the United States. Was this done for the purpose of making the people of New York, Boston and Portland pay a much larger price for the coal they consumed than they would otherwise have to pay if the coal of the Province of Nova Scotia, the most convenient to them, could have entered their market free? The hon. gentleman knew that this duty was imposed because the great coal-mining monopoly of Pennsylvania had power enough in Congress to exclude, by a hostile tariff, the coal of Nova Scotia to a very large extent from coming into competition with theirs, and they were thus enabled to place in the Eastern States their coal and obtain their consumption when otherwise the coal of Nova Scotia would have gone there. Those coal-mining monopolists should be made to see that their game could be played by others, and that they could be met with their own weapons; that by an imposition on the coal they sent into Canada, their profit would be taken from them. They would find it their interest to remove the duty altogether; and instead of such a policy having the effect which the member for North York had intimated, it would result in one of the most important of Canadian industries being placed in a position which would enable it to be of advantage to the whole country. The hon. member for North York ought to know that it was immediately after the Parliament of Canada proposed to reduce the duty on coal to 50c. a ton, that the United States Government reduced that tariff, and continued to do so till, at the present time, it only amounted to 75c. in place of a dollar and a quarter, as formerly. He mentioned that to his hon. friend as an evidence that the Americans understood the bearings of these questions perfectly.

MR. DYMOND: When we took the duty off, they should have put theirs on again.

MR. TUPPER said the adoption of a policy such as that to which he had referred by the Canadian Government, would lead to a reciprocity of trade.

MR. DYMOND: That is the reverse of what the hon. gentleman said earlier in the afternoon. He said he took off the duties in Nova Scotia.

MR. TUPPER said that, if they had a duty of 90c. on a bushel of malt, against $1.35, he would certainly say, "take it off." His right hon. friend had promised, in the most distinct way, to move in the direction of reciprocity of charges, in order to obtain a reciprocity of trade. He wished to take this opportunity of meeting the views and statements advanced by the hon. member for North York, who had brought this question before the House by the head and shoulders. He would only make a moment's reference to this question of duty on flour. As he had already stated, when Nova Scotia was a small isolated Province, having no such means of inter-communication with Ontario as at present existed, he imposed a duty on flour. Since the opening of the Intercolonial Railway, however, flour could be obtained in Nova Scotia from the United States and elsewhere very much cheaper, and there was now no duty at all upon flour. The fishermen of the Maritime Provinces could also send their fish to the United States markets by coasting vessels in exchange for flour, so that they were more advantageously situated in that respect than before.

MR. KIRK was obliged to the hon. gentleman for what he had said for his (Mr. Kirk's) benefit. In his opening remarks, the hon. gentleman said he had formerly been a Free-trader in Nova Scotia because that Province was then an isolated one. Now, he did not see why a Free-trade policy, which had proved beneficial to Nova Scotia when an isolated Province, should not be beneficial to her now and also to the whole Dominion. The hon. gentleman had further stated that, after the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, when a retaliatory policy was adopted towards the United States, a duty of 25c. per barrel was imposed. That was the only article upon which, according to the hon. gentleman, a duty had been levied.

MR. TUPPER: No; there was a large number of articles.

MR. KIRK: Well, I believe the duty on rum, brandy and liquors of other kinds, was increased. But the ad valorem duty of 10 per cent. was not increased; it remained the same for years previous to Confederation, and at Confederation the only article on which he imposed a duty in order to retaliate against the United States and force them to adopt a reciprocity treaty, was flour, on which he imposed a duty of 25

MR. TUPPER: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to say he is entirely in error. If he looks into the matter, he will find that duties were imposed on a large number of articles which came under the Reciprocity Treaty, such as pork.

MR. KIRK said it might have been the case that a small duty was put on pork and beef, and that the duty on tea might have been increased. What he had stated, however, was correct, and the duties in Nova Scotia, before Confederation, were higher than at present. The duty of 25c. was put on to protect the flour of Nova Scotia and to force the United States to adopt a reciprocity treaty. He could not, however, understand how the flour of Nova Scotia could be protected when, as the hon. member for Cumberland had said, no flour was raised there. Nova Scotia did not raise 10 per cent. of the flour she consumed, and he was of opinion the duty was not imposed for the purpose of retaliating against the United States, but to carry on the public works of the Province. Such was his impression, because, since he entered Parliament, in 1874, he had never heard the hon. leader of the Government of Nova Scotia say that that duty had been imposed by way of a retaliatory tariff. He said he had not, in his speech of 1874, made use of the words quoted by him (Mr. Kirk), to the effect that such a policy was nothing more than introducing the thin edge of Protection. However, he heard the hon. gentleman make use of the words, and he ventured to say that many gentlemen in this House heard him also. At the same time, he made use of the expression that it only remained for the Finance Minister of Ontario to adopt such a policy, but, of course, that was never done. The hon. gentleman said that taking off duties was the kind of Protection he wanted. Now, he (Mr. Kirk) ventured to say that that was the policy of the present Government, with due regard, of course, to the interests of the country. As the hon. the Finance Minister had told them, the policy of the Government was to impose such a tariff as would enable them to obtain funds wherewith to carry on public works, and, when the revenue exceeded their requirements in this respect, they would reduce the tariff. The hon. gentleman told them that no duty whatever would affect the price of flour in Nova Scotia, because the price was regulated by the London market. He (Mr. Kirk) agreed with him in thinking that the majority of the flour consumers in Nova Scotia would not be affected, but the fishermen would have to pay more for their flour which they bought at Boston and other places in the United States, to which they sent their fish.

MR. BUNSTER said he would much prefer that the present duty should be allowed to remain, as any change in this direction would not prove acceptable to farmers. He thought much time was being lost in useless legislation, and he would move that the Committee now rise.

Motion negatived on a division.

MR. BUNSTER said he considered this one of the most important measures which would probably come before the House this Session. It would affect the whole Dominion, but especially would it affect British Columbia, where the farmers were doing their utmost to produce a superior article of barley. Those farmers exported their barley to California and other of the States of America, and, if the resolution passed, they would be swamped, not only there, but in the home markets.

MR. MACKENZIE: I hope the hon. gentleman will allow the resolution to pass, so that we may get on with the business. He can speak on the Bill on another occasion, if he desires, but, his motion having been negatived, he should allow the resolution to pass.

MR. BUNSTER said he was more than anxious to comply with any request which the hon. the Premier might make, and as it was almost six o'clock, he would not press the matter then. When, however, the subject came before the House again he would oppose the proposed reduction, because he believed it would have the effect of injuring one of the industries of the Province which he represented, in the event of its being passed.

Resolution ordered to be reported.
House resumed.

QUEBEC PROVINCIAL CRISIS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

A Message from his Excellency the Governor General:—

“DUFFERIN,

“The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons an address from the Legislative Council of the Province of Quebec, to the House of Commons; also an address from the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec to the House of Commons on the subject of the recent Ministerial changes in that Province.”

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE, OTTAWA, 22nd March, 1878.”

MR. SPEAKER read the Address, and it is as follows:—

“To the Honorable the Members of the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada, in Parliament assembled:

“The humble address of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec respectfully sheweth:

“That it appears from the explanations given by the Hon. Mr. Angers, and from the official correspondence communicated to this House, that His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor acknowledges that the members of the DeBoucherville Cabinet have acted in good faith in the discharge of their duties;

“That His Excellency has allowed the measures submitted by the Government to this House, and to the Legislative Council, to be discussed and voted upon without order on his part to suspend them;

MR. BUNSTER.

“That whilst asserting their devotion to our Gracious Sovereign, and their respect towards His Excellency the Lt.-Governor of this Province, this House is of opinion: That the dismissal from office of the DeBoucherville Cabinet having taken place without reason, constitutes an eminent danger to the existence of responsible government in this Province, and is an abuse of power in contempt of the majority of this House, whose confidence they possessed, and still possess, and is a violation of the liberties and will of the people.

“And your petitioners will ever humbly pray.

“LOUIS BEAUBIEN,

Speaker of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec.

“Legislative Assembly,
Quebec, 8th March, 1878.”

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY BILL.—
[BILL No. 27.]

(Mr. Cook.)

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading read.

MR. IRVING said the third clause, which authorized the acquiring of land for the purpose of the line was perfectly unintelligible, for in its present condition the company could enter upon private property and do a high-handed act of injustice, for which there would be no remedy. He, therefore, proposed that the Speaker leave the Chair, and that the Bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to alter clause 3, by inserting the words “doing no unnecessary damage.”

MR. MACKENZIE said there could be no objection to this.

MR. SPEAKER said he thought it unnecessary, therefore, for the Bill to be referred back to the Committee.

Bill, as amended, read the third time and passed.

CANADA SOUTHERN RAILWAY BILL.—
[BILL No. 6.]

(Mr. Thomson, Welland.)

THIRD READING.

Order for third reading read.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) moved, in amendment, that the Bill be referred back to Committee of the whole House, with instructions that they have power to make the following form part of the Bill:—

“That the General Offices of the Canada Southern Railway Company, that is to say, the various Departmental Offices necessary for the management of the said Company and its lines of Railway, including the offices under the management and control of the Treasurer of the said Company, and the various works properly thereto belonging, and the principal workshops of the said Company, shall be permanently established in the town of St. Thomas, in the county of Elgin, in the Province of Ontario.”

He said it was his intention to throw this question entirely upon the House for its final decision. His colleague and himself had endeavoured to present this case as strongly as possible before the several Committees, and likewise before the Committee of the whole House, and he must content himself with saying that they believed they were asking for what was just and reasonable, and with impressing upon the House that these matters were of great importance to the section of the country they represented. Promises had been made with reference to these workshops which had led to investments in property in the neighbourhood, and if these workshops were now removed a great injustice would be done to the locality. He believed the House would see the reasonableness and justice of adopting the suggestion which the resolution offered.

Motion in amendment (Mr. Macdougall, East Elgin) negatived on a Division.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) moved in amendment, that the said Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to make the following form part of the Bill:—

“No bond, coupon, debenture, mortgage or other security which has been, or shall be issued by the Company shall, by reason of any lien, charge, incumbrance or preferential claim on the revenue, assets or property of the Company of any kind or nature whatsoever, be held or construed to prevent a judgment or decree against the property of the Company for a debt incurred for working expenses as hereinbefore defined, from being enforced by execution. Provided that no actual levy shall be made by virtue of such execution without an order or certificate being made by a Judge of the Court in which such judgment or decree has been obtained, stating that in his opinion proceedings upon such execution shall not stop the traffic of the Company.”

He said he had discussed this subject at length the other evening while in Committee, and he thought it sufficiently explained itself.

Mr. CASEY said he need not say that he sympathized fully with the object the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Macdougall) had in view in proposing this amendment. The people along this railway who had had occasion to deal with the Company in lumber or any other commodity, had uniformly found that it was almost impossible to get what was owing from the Company, either from the incompetence or unwillingness of the Company to pay, and the people had now to accept payment in various depreciated forms, to which attention had been drawn by other speakers. The Bill professed to provide for these cases by giving a first lien on the first revenues of the road, but in times past the gross revenues had been insufficient, therefore, this was no remedy. And if it were, it was too expensive to be of the slightest use to the class of people most interested. This Bill was out of the question for a poor man. A man who was a claimant of from $50 to $200, could not afford to go to the Chancery Court, get a receiver appointed, and so on, in order to obtain payment of his small debt; therefore, the people on whose behalf he spoke, were still entirely without a remedy. He thought the law ought to provide a remedy for every man, especially the opponent of a powerful railway company. He quite agreed that the company's property should be made responsible for execution for small sums, but a great many objections had been raised to this, one being that such liability to execution might interfere with the traffic. He had prepared an amendment which he thought would obviate this difficulty. He moved in amendment to the amendment, that the said Bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the Bill by expunging the words of section 2 from "The Revenues" to "working expenses" inclusive, and substituting the following:

" Provided that the property of the said Company, other than real estate or engines and cars in actual use, shall be liable to be taken in execution for debts contracted for working expenses, to an amount not exceeding $1,000—in the case of any such debts."

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Casey) negatived on a division.

Amendment (Mr. Macdougall, East Elgin) negatived on the following Division:—

MR. STEPHENSON moved in amendment, that the said Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend Clause 3 by adding the following words:

" Provided that any party who, for the purpose of settling his claims against said Company for 'working expenses', has received bond or bonds of said Company, and is still the owner of such bond or bonds, shall be considered and treated in the same manner as if the Company had not settled such claim by the issue of such bonds, and the amount of such bond or bonds shall be considered and treated as a debt incurred and held by the said Company on the 12th day of March, 1878, as provided by said section."

He said it was not necessary to make an explanation with reference to this resolution, except for the fact that there were some hon. gentlemen present who might not have heard the Bill discussed in Committee. He would, however, content himself with simply stating the object of the resolution, which was to place these small bondholders in the position of parties who came within the second section of the Bill, and in the same position as they would have been had they not accepted these bonds. He thought they should be placed in that position in consequence of having been forced, as they were forced, to accept these bonds in payment of their claims. All those who supported the Bill had said, of course, that these bond-holders should occupy the same position as others. He held they ought not. Their position was an exceptional one, which was acquired from having given supplies which absolutely kept that road in running order. Had the cordwood and supplies not been furnished, the company would not have been able to run their trains. Having furnished these supplies, they ought to come under the second clause of this Bill, and receive payment in full of their claims.

Mr. CASEY said he merely wished to say that, although he felt that these people referred to in his hon. friend's amendment were suffering hardship, he and his colleague, for whom he felt authorized to speak, considered the means his hon. friend proposed to adopt were scarcely legal, as those individuals had really accepted settlement of their claims; and while he and his colleague had sympathized strongly with them, and had tried their best to get a remedy for them, they could not support the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. Stephenson) negatived on the following division:

Mr. MITCHELL said he did not desire to oppose at any length the passage of the Bill, which was a foregone conclusion. In the Railway Committee, where he had the honour to sit for many days discussing this matter, he had endeavoured to make the Bill as perfect as possible, and to secure the payment of those claims against the company; but the grounds upon which he opposed the passage of this Bill were national grounds. He believed that the Bill which was now before this House was one calculated to do irreparable injury to the trade of Canada. He believed that the original Act left to Canada some control over the Canada Southern Railway, which was a Canadian enterprise, built on Canadian soil, whether with Canadian money or not he was not prepared to say; but, under the legislation which was now being submitted to the House, he felt they were allowing its control to pass out of their hands into the hands of the New York Central Railway, controlled by Vanderbilt. He felt they were allowing the great trade of the West to be diverted from its natural channel, either down the St. Lawrence in the summer, or by the Grand Trunk and Intercolonial through to Halifax in the winter season, to the route through the New York lines. The Americans would then supply, not only the markets of Europe, but the Maritime Provinces, through those lines, with the grain from the West, and the trade of the Canadian roads would practically be diverted to American routes. He called the attention of the House to the fact that they were, by this legislation, placing in the hands of Vanderbilt the power to divert the trade of the West by means of this road, to New York and Boston, as the great outlets for the exports of the West, to which they were giving facilities to obtain a trade that these ports never had before. It might be said the Americans had the railroad, that Vanderbilt controlled it to-day without legislation. True, he might control the administration of the road, but he could not control the Canadian road. This legislation made the road an American one and gave Vanderbilt the power, at all times, to divert the trade from Canadian ports to New York and Boston. He had been told, a few days ago, a system of monopoly over the western roads had been completed. Vanderbilt had for some time controlled the Michigan Southern and Lake Shore, in connection with the New York Central. Within a very short period he had obtained control of the central section of the Chicago & Lake Huron road. The result would be that Vanderbilt, with his millions of dollars and his power of monopoly, would be enabled to divert the traffic from the Canada Southern over the New York Central, and the shipments would be made from the ports of New York and Boston, instead of from the ports of Montreal and Halifax, thus leaving the Canadian Great Western, Grand Trunk and Intercolonial out in the cold. He (Mr. Mitchell) felt bound to warn the people of Canada that this mammoth American monopoly, which, he feared, was bound to control the carrying trade of the west, was, through the legislation passed to-day, to be perpetuated in this country—a system of monopoly which it would be found difficult to get rid of.

KEEWATIN TOWNSHIPS MUNICIPALITIES BILL.—[BILL No. 23.]

(Mr. Mills.)

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

MR. MILLS stated that the number of inhabitants of the four townships comprising the Icelandic Settlements numbered about 1,500. When he visited the Settlement, last fall, he found the people had voluntarily established municipal institutions and to some extent taxed themselves. They were a well informed and intelligent people, and one of the grievances which led to their Iceland was the extent to which the Government of Denmark interfered with their freedom of action. In September last they established a newspaper which was published twice a month, printed in Icelandic language which is almost identical with the ancient Gothic. One half of the paper was devoted to the public affairs of Canada, giving general information with respect to our institutions, mode of Government, employment of the people, and productions of the country; and the other half of the paper was devoted to news from Iceland. Thus the journal was intended for the people of the Settlement, and at the same time to be used as an emigration sheet amongst the Icelandic people. In consequence of the small-pox which had prevailed amongst them, they had become somewhat discouraged, especially as they had been adversely criticized by the people of Canada, who had thought the Settlement a failure, and the Icelanders, being a highly educated people, were exceedingly sensitive to those criticisms. He was surprised at the very excellent English spoken by the settlers, it being far beyond any spoken by other people who had but few opportunities of using it. Another fact was that the Icelandic settlers sent through the mail four or five times as many letters in proportion to the number of the people as Manitoba settlers, showing they were to a very large extent a literary and cultured people. They had, moreover, established a literary institution and formed a general library from the books contributed by the settlers.

MR. WHITE (South Renfrew) said he thought the quorum of the Municipal Council should be reduced from four to three, otherwise the transaction of business might be impeded, owing to the illness or absence from other reasons of two members,

MR. GIBBS: Perhaps that will be taken into consideration.

MR. MILLS: I am not particularly committed to the number, four; I will consider it. At the first election, there being no assessment roll, any person entitled to vote may be elected a councillor. It could not be otherwise to begin with. We must be very liberal at the commencement. None of these people are British subjects.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is quite right. In the fifth clause it is mentioned: "Any persons otherwise duly qualified." You should strike out the words, "otherwise duly qualified."

MR. MILLS: I have no objection to that.

MR. POPE (Compton) said candidates for councillors should have some little qualification—$500 or $300.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): Section eight provides for the first election; the qualification is that such person must be a householder.

MR. MACKENZIE: In Algoma, a new country, the qualification is precisely the same as it is here. They have no qualification there, except that of being voters.

MR. POPE: It is important that councillors should be men having some stake in the country.

MR. MILLS: The hon. gentleman again afraid to trust the people.

MR. POPE: No, I am not; but it would be very easy for people of no status to be councillors under this system.

MR. MILLS: After the first election, a specified property qualification will be adopted. In the first instance there will be no assessors or assessment roll. What qualification would you adopt?

MR. POPE: I would put it low, but sufficient to ensure such a man being really settled there.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): He must be a householder.

MR. POPE: That is all.

MR. SMITH: That is enough, surely.

MR. POPE. I would put it at £50 or £100.

MR. MASSON: Will there be a different qualification for voters and candidates at future elections?

MR. MILLS: Yes.

MR. BOWELL: Will aliens have a right to vote?

MR. MILLS: Yes, all these people are aliens; otherwise, you deny them municipal institutions.

MR. WHITE (Renfrew): Are all these people aliens?

MR. MILLS: Yes; all with one exception.

MR. MACKENZIE: Some British subjects are coming along.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario): No one can vote in municipal elections save British subjects.

MR. BOWELL: Certainly; a new principle is here adopted.

MR. MILLS: The principle is perfectly sound. We have adopted an entirely different principle in this country from what prevails in England. We want the country settled; and aliens can hold property. In municipal institutions you represent property and the rights of property. Certainly there is no other reason for disqualifying an alien and permitting him to acquire real estate than an alien who purchases a share in a boat and votes on it. The principle is exactly the same. This should be kept in view. Whether sound or not, there is no other applicable in a country like the North-West, where we are seeking to secure the settlement of large communities of people who are not, but who are going to be, British subjects. Unless you adopt some such principle, there will be many townships which will be denied the right of taxation and municipal institutions; and this would be a very great inconvenience.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I quite agree with the hon. gentleman. Whether aliens or not, they are settlers, and it is their interest to work this machinery and improve and develop the country. They will not have political rights until they become citizens, but they ought to have the rights, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, as settlers who will become British subjects, of voting and improving their own property—making roads and bridges, etc., in other words.

MR. WHITE (South Renfrew): Are these four municipalities settled by Icelanders?

MR. MILLS: Yes.

MR. MASSON said he would like to know whether those who became British subjects and those who might remain aliens would afterwards be placed on the same footing with regard to their municipal institutions. This involved a serious difficulty.

MR. MILLS: Why should they not be on the same footing if they have property and pay taxes?

MR. MASSON: In our ordinary municipal affairs, all aliens who have property do not vote.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): This is an exception.

MR. MASSON: Yes; but how long will this exception last? These people are not bound in three years to become British subjects.

MR. MILLS: That difficulty can be dealt with when the time comes.

MR. MASSON: Then this is not a permanent Bill. It is a bad principle.

MR. MILLS: We have about 1,500 people there; and we may have 5,000 or 6,000 within two years. If the expectations of these people are realized, this will certainly be the case. The larger portion of the territory, embraced within the municipality particularly mentioned, is still unsettled. There is no better way to prepare the people for becoming British subjects and appreciating British institutions, than to permit them to act as this Bill provides.

MR. MASSON: Then why not limit the operation of the Bill.

MR. MILLS: There is no necessity for it.

MR. LANGEVIN asked if it was intended that ballot papers should be numbered. In the district which he represented the objection had been raised to the present system of voting that a person could leave the polling place with his voting paper and sell it afterwards. If, however, these voting papers were numbered, when a man came back with his paper to put it in the box, the returning officer would be able to check any attempt at fraud.

MR. MILLS said he had already considered this matter, but as the hon. gentleman would see there was not the same incitement to fraud in the case of municipal as in the case of Parliamentary elections. Besides, if the ballot papers were marked with the initials of the returning officer he would be able to check them when they were given back to him. There was also a provision to the effect that no person could leave the polling place till he had deposited his voting paper.

MR. PALMER said it was intended the voting should be secret from every one.

MR. TUPPER said it was almost impossible to keep ballot papers entirely secret unless envelopes were used in which to enclose them.

MR. BOWELL said there was a question in relation to this that, perhaps, he ought to have asked before. It was, whether the feelings of the people of Keewatin had been consulted in reference to the adoption of the vote by ballot system. The House was aware that the Ballot Act was not in force in Manitoba.

MR. MILLS. Because there were so many people unable to mark their ballot papers that it became practically inoperative on that account.

MR. BOWELL: Am I to understand that these Icelanders are able to read and write sufficiently well to understand and carry out the provisions of the Act.

MR. MILLS: Yes.

MR. LANGEVIN: The difficulty will be that many of them being foreigners and not able to understand our language properly, the agent may influence the ballot so that it will be no better than open voting.

MR. PLUMB enquired whether these Icelanders, by their own institutions, were prepared for the exercise of this kind of franchise; and, if this ballot system had not been copied from some other.

MR. MILLS: I have already stated that I have framed the Bill on the Municipal Act of Ontario. I have no doubt whatever, but that the people of Keewatin will prefer to vote by ballot.

MR. MASSON said an hon. gentleman on the other side had stated that the ballot was being adopted all over the Dominion, but this was not so. In Quebec they had no ballot, and he thought that if the people of Keewatin were as intelligent as they were represented to be, they might be trusted to decide this question for themselves.

MR. MILLS: We have adopted this system because we believe it to be the best. I do not know whether they would like this or some other system, but we must adopt some system, and there is no reason why we should ascertain their views with regard to this mode or that mode of voting. By and bye they will have an opportunity of dealing with the matter for themselves, and, if they were dissatisfied with the ballot system they could then adopt some other. But when we find this country gradually becoming more and more homogeneous, it is important that we should have our institutions more uniform and general. The system of ballot is general throughout the Dominion, and there is no reason why these fifteen hundred people should not have the same system as the rest of the Dominion. They have taken the Ontario Legislature as a guide, and have asked me to legalize their institutions upon the same basis as those of Ontario. The Ontario system is voting by ballot, and if the people had any objection to this part of the system of Ontario, they would have stated it.

MR. LANGEVIN said they had not the ballot system in the Province of Quebec, so that the system could not be general throughout the Dominion. The ballot system had been put in the election law for particular purposes, and not with the free will of the people. A number of hon. members had voted for, and a number against it. He, for one, was not unfavourable to the introduction of the system, but the effect of it, as seen in the last general elections and the elections that had followed, showed that the system was open to great objection. Very great frauds had taken place under the new system, and, although there might be less disturbance, the number of frauds and illegal practices had been largely increased. With respect to the Bill under consideration, he considered that the system was too cumbersome and expensive to extend to a community which had a total population of less than 1,600 people.

MR. BOWELL said the Bill contained no provision for nomination. The elections, of course, would be by acclamation, if no more than five members were nominated. Under the 16th section provision was made where polls were required. Under the 51st section, 20th sub-section, provision was made which covered the ground of the regulation of municipal elections and preservation of the peace.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) said this sub-section of the 51st clause provided that the council should have the regulation of municipal elections, and the preservation of peace during said elections. Under that, there should be a special provision by which the nomination should take place on a certain day. If the regulation of the day was left to the municipal council, they might change it every year, and bring about interminable confusion.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is provided for in the 48th section.

MR. MILLS said, in the Bill for municipal institutions for the Province of Manitoba, they made no regulations with regard to the mode of election. All these provisions were left entirely to the municipalities to determine by by-law. It seemed better to the Government to provide some general instructions in this instance as to the mode of election, etc., and, at the same time, provide that the municipality, in each particular case, should regulate the matter for itself. The power was given in the Bill for that purpose.

MR. WHITE said there was an election day appointed, but no nomination day. If a greater number of councillors were named than the requisite number, the election, not being by acclamation, would not take place on the same day as the nomination. What was called the election day in the Bill was virtually the nomination day. After the nomination, some time must elapse before the election could take place, to enable ballots to be printed, etc. This ought to be provided for.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) said if they provided for the nomination day, there would be no necessity to confer upon the council the power of regulating municipal elections and keeping the peace.

MR. BOWELL said these provisions had apparently been copied out of the municipal code of Ontario before the introduction of the ballot. Formerly the electors met in the morning, proposed their candidates, and then proceeded to vote. But it would be impossible to carry out that system under the ballot; a certain time had to be allowed to get the requisite lists, and ballots, &c., in order. In his own constituency, the Ontario Legislature had been obliged to change the law, and give those people one week longer time, in order to enable them to come and give in their ballots. In the Muskoka territory upon the Hastings Road, they had to go a hundred miles south in order to get their ballot papers printed; as the hon. the Minister was aware, there was only one printing press in the whole district. It would be better to make provision for that circumstance before passing the Bill.

MR. MILLS said it would be very easy to provide the day of nomination, in section 48, if it were not desirable to leave it to the municipality. There was a printing press at present in the district, but that might not be kept up. During six months there might not be a printing press nearer than Winnipeg. If the nomination day were fixed it might not suit the convenience of the district.

MR. BOWELL said it was done in the district he had referred to. Before the law had been changed, when the people were in town attending the council, they had blank ballot papers, and after the nomination, the clerk wrote in the names. That was the only way in which they could comply with the law.

MR. BABY said those laws would prove very cumbersome to the people of Keewatin. These people were entitled to laws which they could understand and carry out. In their country municipal laws were quite unknown, and the consequence would be that complications would arise. With the ballot there would be great difficulty in getting at the result of an election. It was not long ago since the ballot system had been introduced in municipal elections in Ontario; in Quebec they had not the ballot. In the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the municipal system, he believed, was of a primitive kind. If he was well informed, it was the Local Government which provided for making bridges and building roads; whereas, according to the rules of the municipal system, it was the people in every parish and county who looked after the making of roads, building bridges, and so forth. Here was a territory which had not even been erected into a Province, and yet the people of that territory were having thrust upon them a municipal system of which they knew not the first letter. He believed in giving them a municipal system of which they could make some meaning—a simple machinery which they could carry out, and from which they could derive some benefit. But it would be impossible for them to make use of the system proposed, and the object of the Government would not be attained.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) said his hon. friend would recollect that the Minister who had charge of this Bill had told the House that he had visited this country and had personal knowledge of it, and that the people approved of the Ontario system and made no objection to the ballot. If the hon. member for Joliette had visited Keewatin and had been told by the people that they approved of the Ontario system, surely he would not object to giving them that system. In intelligence and education they were quite competent to understand the system and work it out.

MR. PLUMB said it had been announced that the Ontario system was that adopted by the present Bill, but such was not the fact. He saw no sufficient reason why the ballot system should be enforced in a new district like Keewatin. The system was an entirely new one in this country, the first election in Ontario, under it, having taken place in 1874. It had already been found to be surrounded with difficulties and liable to perpetration of great frauds, one of the most palpable of which occurred in connection with the envelope system. The ballot had not been fully approved by the hon. the Premier, who had declared he had accepted it because he thought the time had come when it was proper to try it. Hon. gentlemen opposite were not, he thought, so enamoured of the ballot as to deem it necessary to force it on a small community. He (Mr. Plumb) was opposed to it. If a man had not sufficient manliness to come and vote openly for whom he pleased, he was not fit to possess the franchise. There was no excuse in that new Western country for the plea commonly put forward of intimidation, which was the only argument which existed in favour of the ballot. The ballot was one of the most objectionable features of the Bill, and he hoped the Government would take into consideration the propriety of eliminating it altogether from the provisions of the measure before it became law.

MR. MITCHELL said he entirely disagreed with the views expressed by the hon. member for Niagara in regard to the ballot. That system had been in operation in New Brunswick during 12 years, and it had uniformly worked well. It had protected the poor man against his employer and enabled him to vote independently. No man had a right to know how a man voted. The question was whether a man under the ballot was enabled to cast his vote without fear, favour or affection; and it was under the ballot system alone that that could be done in this or any other country. He saw no reason why, in a new any more than in an old country, the ballot system should not work well.

MR. BOWELL said the Ballot had been adopted and was the law of the Dominion, while at the same time there were a great many arguments for and against it. In the present Bill it would be necessary to provide for the nomination of candidates and their election by acclamation.

MR. BABY said the system of the ballot should not be introduced into a new country and made obligatory among a people who never heard of it. The ballot in municipal elections prevailed in Montreal for some years, but the people afterwards abolished it and resorted to open voting. The ballot was not put in operation in Ontario at once, and the municipal system was in operation many years without the ballot.

Mr. GIBBS (South Ontario) said it might be a question for the Committee to take into consideration whether the intricate machinery that prevailed in Ontario as to nomination and election of candidates by the ballot, was the best system that could be adopted in dealing with those new settlements. It was questionable whether the old system of nomination and election was not preferable and should not be adopted.

Mr. LANGEVIN said that the more simple system that prevailed in Quebec should have been that offered to the people of those settlements, and it was absurd that, with a constituency of eighty voters in the municipality, they should be called upon to use all the machinery of ballot boxes, tickets, etc. Why should they not allow these people at the first election to vote as the people voted in the Province of Quebec at the municipal elections; and if they chose to continue this system, let it be done; but if they wished afterwards to take advantage of the ballot system, this could also be put into the Bill. These people should be given a chance in the beginning—they were not rich; they experienced all the difficulties connected with a new settlement, and they should begin with a very inexpensive system, though after a few years, or a year, if it was their wish, they might make use of the ballot system. He would certainly give them the option of open voting or ballot. If, in Ontario, for instance, in a municipality where the people knew very little of the French language, a French Bill was given them to carry into operation, how would they manage? They would hardly understand the language and all the difficulties connected with the machinery of the measure would be in their way. These Icelanders should be given the same chance; they hardly understood the English language, or were up to municipal elections. The hon. gentleman said that these people had adopted the municipal system, but he had not told them that the ballot system had also been adopted.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is not likely, of course; they have only the rudest elements. They have no authority to elect any one, but they have merely agreed to establish certain regulations for voluntary taxation.

Mr. LANGEVIN said that probably three or five men would conduct the affairs of the Settlement. This was another reason why the hon. gentleman should consider this point, whether, for the first few years, they ought not to give these people the opportunity of running their elections without all this cumbersome machinery. Afterwards, they might have the option of the ballot system. If the Bill passed in its present form, he believed that great difficulties would occur. He did not ask that the matter be referred to a Committee, as the measure, being framed to a certain extent on the Municipal Law of Ontario, did not require so much care as would otherwise be the case. When the Ontario Municipal Law was passed, Mr. McKellar had taken a good deal of trouble with it, and the measure was referred to a Committee which sat nearly through the whole Session. He understood that, nevertheless, changes were made in it, and they must look carefully to it, in order that they might not be called upon to alter the Bill next year.

Mr. PLUMB said he wished to disclaim any sort of intention to delay or impede the progress of this Bill. It was one of great length, and they were desirous to get through with it. In view of what his hon. friend had said, he thought that other very important considerations connected with the ballot system might be introduced. One related to the expense which the ballot system necessarily involved, and which should not be thrown upon a young and poor and struggling community. This expense, it seemed to him, was in no way compensated by the advantages which would be gained by introducing the ballot system, though this might be desirable for more advanced communities. Again, most of these people were foreigners, unacquainted with our system and language. He knew that the Icelandic system of education had been so diffused that the people were intelligent; and all who came here were, no doubt, quite prepared to judge matters from their standpoint, which they had the advantage of approaching in their own language. It was quite evident that the proceedings connected with all these municipal arrangements must necessarily be in English, which was unknown to these people; the elder people would not take it up, no matter how intelligent they were, and the circumstances would throw the whole control of these municipalities into the hands of a few persons who understood the language and the working of this machinery. A few men would run the whole machine. Instead of diffusing liberty, and doing what the hon. gentleman desired to do in all the legislation he inaugurated and advocated—giving to each person a voice in the making of the laws in which he was interested—and, no doubt, the hon. gentleman was actuated by a sincere desire to bestow upon all these people an equal chance with respect to their municipal arrangements—it was perfectly certain, and it could not, indeed, be otherwise, that, with machinery like this, these matters would fall into the hands of a few persons whom he would not call designing people, though this might be the case. These persons would elect themselves or other officers; and this it was impossible, with such machinery, to prevent. If the plain, simple arrangement of voting viva voce, without all this machinery, were adopted, however, these people would better understand what they were about. These matters would be conducted in a foreign language, and, however intelligent these people might be, they would not be able to comprehend what was being done, and the few who would understand it, would naturally control the many. This was an objection more serious than any other, and it ought to be taken into serious consideration.

MR. LANGEVIN said he regretted the fact that the hon. the Minister of the Interior had not made an answer with regard to what he had suggested. The hon. gentleman might have said whether it would be considered or not. He had first referred to the ballot paper, and had informed the hon. gentleman as to the difficulties that were met with in our party elections, and other frauds perpetrated on account of these ballot papers not being numbered. They were numbered in the local elections of the Province of Quebec, and, consequently, the same frauds did not exist. The hon. gentleman said they had the envelope in the Federal elections, and that they intended to detect the fraud if attempted in this case, because there would be no envelope, and because the returning officer would have to place on the back of the paper his initials; and when the voter returned from the ballot compartment, the returning officer would see whether his initials were on the back of the ballot paper or not, in order that he might know whether it was a genuine paper or not. Very well; but he would refer the hon. Minister of the Interior to the 21st clause, which provided that no person who had received his ballot paper from the returning officer should take the same out of the voting place, and any person who did so, should forfeit his right to vote at that election, and the deputy returning officer should note the fact of his having done so, on the poll book. If an attempt to defraud was made, it would be done in this manner: An elector would come out with a ballot paper, but he would not deposit it; he would leave the place and give his ballot paper to another individual, who would take it to the committee room where the scheme was being worked. The ballot paper would be marked in accordance with the wish of the person who perpetrated the fraud; this marked paper would be given to a voter who would be instructed to deposit it in a ballot box, and to bring back his ballot paper; this would be done, the fresh ballot paper would be marked, and handed to another voter, and so on. This fraud had been exposed in the newspapers, and the hon. gentleman must see that, by this provision, it would not be avoided. But this fraud could not be perpetrated if the ballot papers were numbered and initialled by the returning officer.

The number would be on the margin, and when the voter came back with it the returning officer would see that the number was that of the ballot paper which he had given him according to the book in which these matters were recorded; hence the fraud mentioned could not be committed under this system. He called attention to this point, because he thought that it was a very important matter. If the election was fraudulently conducted, the councillors would be chosen illegally, and consequently the officers of these municipalities would be managed by those who had no right to do so. He thought that the Quebec system should be adopted, so far as the ballots were concerned. He would like to know whether the hon. gentleman would consider the suggestion.

MR. MILLS: I will do so.

MR. MASSON said that, if the system mentioned were not adopted, a very high penalty would have to be imposed if such frauds were perpetrated.

MR. MILLS: Certainly.

MR. COSTIGAN said that the 22nd clause should in some respects be changed, in order to protect the people. He did not think it was right to give to every returning officer the power of marking any voter's ballot alone. This was not done in connection with the Dominion elections; and he considered that this system ought to be made as perfect as possible. In the Dominion elections, it was provided that in such cases where the elector was unable to mark his own ballot, he might appeal to the deputy returning officer, who must mark the ballot in accordance with the wishes of the elector and in presence, he believed, of the candidates or their representatives. There must be some check on the deputy returning officer to see that he carried out the intentions of such elector; for, owing to the fact that this person was unable to read, he would else be entirely at the mercy of the deputy returning officer, who might take advantage of this circumstance to mark the ballot quite contrary to the wishes of the elector. Such a temptation should not be left open, and such ballots should be marked in presence of the candidates or their agents. The Dominion Election Law also provided that the voting by ballot should be secret, and this was the whole principle of the ballot system; but under this section, as far as this law was concerned, the officer was perfectly free to publish to the world how an elector, who had his ballot paper so marked, voted. If the system was to be carried out in its entirety, so that secrecy might be preserved, provision would require to be made therefor in the clause. Protection would need to be given to the elector that his vote would be deposited according to his wishes, and the fundamental principle of the ballot—that of secrecy—carried out.

MR. MILLS said that, when a ballot paper had to be filled up by the returning officer, it should be so marked in the presence of the different candidates and their agents.

MR. MASSON: I think that is a bad way of preserving secrecy.

MR. MILLS: I think under the Dominion law it is provided that where an elector is not able to mark his own ballot-paper, he asks the deputy returning officer to do so in presence of the candidates' agents, all of whom are sworn not to divulge the manner in which the vote has been given, and in this way the possibility of fraud on the part of a returning officer is prevented.

MR. MILLS said he proposed to amend the 27th clause by adding "no candidate shall have more than two agents at any polling place."

MR. MASSON: There might be two agents present for each candidate.

MR. PALMER: And that would not prevent each candidate from being present also.

MR. LANGEVIN: What is the use of having more than one?

MR. MILLS: I have no objection alter the number to one.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

MR. POPE said that, supposing a man became insolvent, he would have to vacate his seat?

MR. MILLS: Not because he is insolvent, but because he has no qualification.

MR. POPE: What is the qualification of the Ontario Act.

MR. SMITH: $200 freehold and $200 leasehold.

MR. BOWELL said that the qualification was not affected at all by insolvency. If a person qualified as a householder, his insolvency would not take away that qualification.

MR. COSTIGAN said, with reference to the last part of this section, which stated that the party must swear that he was the person whose name was on the list shown him, it was impossible for a man who could not read to take that oath. He had seen parties disfranchised on that account. No man who could neither read nor write would be willing to swear that certain signs shown him were his name. He had seen one or two cases where men of property had been disfranchised and prevented from depositing their votes because they refused to take this oath.

MR. SMITH: That is the case in all municipal elections.

MR. WHITE (North Rensfrew) said, under section 47, the vote of any person wrongfully voting would be struck off and treated as null. How were they to discover for whom he had voted? Absolute secrecy was provided for in the Bill, under the ballot system, yet this section provided that certain votes could be struck off.

MR. MILLS said, if the person had no right to vote, the law of secrecy did not prevent his name being struck off. He could be examined under oath as to the candidate for whom he had voted.

MR. LANGEVIN said, in the first instance, previous to depositing his vote, the man had been sworn, and afterwards he was convicted of the offence of having wrongfully voted. If in the first instance he took a false oath, he would not scruple doing so when under examination, and swear he had deposited his vote for one candidate while he had voted for the other, and thus strike an additional blow at the candidate whom he had defrauded in the first instance.

MR. MILLS said in every case where the ballot was adopted, if a person voted who had no right to vote, the law of secrecy was held not to apply to him. He could be examined, and could not plead the Act for secrecy. True, a man who had voted improperly would not be a very good witness for the candidate whom he opposed.

MR. BOWELL said, with reference to the 49th clause, a week was not sufficient between the election of the council and its first meeting.

MR. MILLS said he thought it was quite sufficient. It was only a township election.

MR. POPE (Compton) said, in a new community like this, the treasurer, clerk, and collector would probably be the same person. By the Act, they were bound to elect three persons.

MR. MILLS said there was no obligation to do so. There would not be sufficient supervision over the treasurer if both were the same party.

MR. WHITE: Is there any provision limiting the amount of taxation that may be imposed by the Council, as in Ontario?

MR. MILLS said he had not introduced such a limit. The provision of this section was mainly taken from the provision of the law in Manitoba. The hon. gentleman was aware that he had not provided fully for the municipal machinery, as it was provided in the Ontario Statute. In fact that Statute filled some three hundred pages of a large volume. He wished to avoid setting out in detail all the various duties of the officers. He deemed it better to follow the system adopted in Manitoba in this case and confer this power upon the municipalities.

MR. MASSON said the Bill should limit the amount of taxation.

MR. MILLS said the difficulty in determining the limit was due to the value of property. In a section of the country, for instance, where land was only worth 50c. per acre, the limit of taxation would hardly be sufficient to build a bridge. It would be very difficult to adopt a limit at present.

MR. WHITE said if the value of property was so very low, people would be less able to pay taxation. It appeared to him to be absolutely necessary that some limit should be imposed on the council there as well as in other parts of the Dominion as to the extent of taxes they might be empowered to raise. The municipalities of Keewatin were clothed, under this Act, with very extensive powers.

MR. MILLS said he did not see how they were to meet it. If they adopted a limit here, the result would be that some sections could not impose a sufficient tax to pay a teacher's salary. The Bill provided for schools as well as municipal machinery.

MR. LANGEVIN said he thought vacancies in the council should be filled as they were in Lower Canada, by the choice of the remainder of the councillors. There was no necessity for new elections, with all their expenses to fill such vacancies.

MR. MILLS: We would not allow a seat to be filled up in this House in that way.

MR. MASSON said that reference was frequently made to the Ontario Municipal Act, but the Quebec Act was just as good. In many instances the laws of Quebec were superior to those of Ontario. It was exceedingly absurd to require a municipality with 80 electors, in order to fill a vacancy for three months, to go through all the ordeal of an election by ballot. The whole thing was absurd. The hon. gentleman was pushing matters to such an extent as to oblige all members who did not support the Government to oppose the Bill.

MR. MILLS: Suppose there were three vacancies, what would then be done?

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario): Suppose there was only one vacancy, and two votes on each side, how would it be decided? There would be a deadlock. We in Ontario would not for a moment entertain the system that is carried out in Quebec.

MR. POPE (Compton) said that the Quebec system worked very well. He had seen it in operation not once or twice but fifty times.

MR. MILLS.

MR. DESJARDINS said that in banks, vacancies were filled by the remaining directors.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario) said he had seen a whole week wasted in the election of a reeve.

MR. MACKENZIE: Leave all to the people that you can.

MR. LANGEVIN: There ought to be a limit. Suppose a vacancy occurred one month before the expiration of the year, would you compel the people to fill the vacancy by election?

MR. MACKENZIE: Certainly.

MR. LANGEVIN: And necessitate a double election?

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes.

MR. LANGEVIN: If the vacancy occurs three months before the term of the council expires, there should be no election.

MR. MASSON: This is sometimes the case in political matters, where they wait so as to avoid two elections.

MR. MACKENZIE: That happens very rarely.

MR. MASSON: I know it is very rare, but it is occurring now.

MR. MACKENZIE: Not that I am aware of.

MR. GIBBS (North Ontario): The question as to filling up a vacancy should be left to the council. It would be absurd, if only for one month of a term, an election was ordered. It should be at the discretion of the council to order a new election.

MR. GIBBS (South Ontario): I would not give them power.

MR. MILLS: It is hardly worth while to make exceptions of all sorts.

MR. MACKENZIE: Such cases occur very rarely.
