

Technical and Bibliographic Notes / Notes techniques et bibliographiques

The Institute has attempted to obtain the best original copy available for filming. Features of this copy which may be bibliographically unique, which may alter any of the images in the reproduction, or which may significantly change the usual method of filming are checked below.

L'Institut a microfilmé le meilleur exemplaire qu'il lui a été possible de se procurer. Les détails de cet exemplaire qui sont peut-être uniques du point de vue bibliographique, qui peuvent modifier une image reproduite, ou qui peuvent exiger une modification dans la méthode normale de filmage sont indiqués ci-dessous.

- Coloured covers / Couverture de couleur
- Covers damaged / Couverture endommagée
- Covers restored and/or laminated / Couverture restaurée et/ou pelliculée
- Cover title missing / Le titre de couverture manque
- Coloured maps / Cartes géographiques en couleur
- Coloured ink (i.e. other than blue or black) / Encre de couleur (i.e. autre que bleue ou noire)
- Coloured plates and/or illustrations / Planches et/ou illustrations en couleur
- Bound with other material / Relié avec d'autres documents
- Only edition available / Seule édition disponible
- Tight binding may cause shadows or distortion along interior margin / La reliure serrée peut causer de l'ombre ou de la distorsion le long de la marge intérieure.
- Blank leaves added during restorations may appear within the text. Whenever possible, these have been omitted from filming / Il se peut que certaines pages blanches ajoutées lors d'une restauration apparaissent dans le texte, mais, lorsque cela était possible, ces pages n'ont pas été filmées.
- Additional comments / Commentaires supplémentaires:

- Coloured pages / Pages de couleur
- Pages damaged / Pages endommagées
- Pages restored and/or laminated / Pages restaurées et/ou pelliculées
- Pages discoloured, stained or foxed / Pages décolorées, tachetées ou piquées
- Pages detached / pages détachées
- Showthrough / Transparence
- Quality of print varies / Qualité inégale de l'impression
- Includes supplementary materials / Comprend du matériel supplémentaire
- Pages wholly or partially obscured by errata slips, tissues, etc., have been refilmed to ensure the best possible image / Les pages totalement ou partiellement obscurcies par un feuillet d'errata, une pelure, etc., ont été filmées à nouveau de façon à obtenir la meilleure image possible.
- Opposing pages with varying colouration or discolourations are filmed twice to ensure the best possible image / Les pages s'opposant ayant des colorations variables ou des décolorations sont filmées deux fois afin d'obtenir la meilleure image possible.

Various pagings.

Pages iv, 411, 696, 739, 752 & 1032 are incorrectly numbered pages vi, 41, 996, 73, 52 & 102.

306

DEBATES

OF THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS

OF THE

DOMINION OF CANADA.

T. J. RICHARDSON AND G. B. BRADLEY,
Editors and Chief Reporters.

FIFTH SESSION—THIRD PARLIAMENT.

41 VICTORIA, 1878.

VOL. IV.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE SEVENTH DAY OF FEBRUARY, 1878
TO THE TWENTY-SECOND DAY OF MARCH, 1878

FIRST VOLUME OF THE SESSION.

OTTAWA:
PRINTED BY MACLEAN ROGER & CO., WELLINGTON STREET.
1878.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TO

HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES.

VOLUME IV.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 7TH.

| | PAGE |
|---|------|
| MEETING OF PARLIAMENT— | |
| THE MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE attend at the BAR of the SENATE, by command of Sir WILLIAM BUELL RICHARDS, Knight, Deputy Governor..... | 1 |
| VACANCIES in the Representation during the Recess..... | 1 |
| NEW MEMBERS ELECTED during the Recess..... | 2 |
| NEW MEMBERS taking their Seats..... | 2 |
| ELECTION OF A SPEAKER—Moved— | |
| “That the Hon. Timothy Warren Anglia do take the Chair of this House as Speaker.”—(Mr. Mackenzie)..... | 2 |
| Motion agreed to on division. Yeas, 116; Nays, 53..... | 11 |
| Declaration of Election by Clerk of the House..... | 11 |
| Mr. Speaker returns his acknowledgments..... | 11 |

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 8TH.

| | |
|---|----|
| THE SEAT FOR NORTHUMBERLAND— Mr. Mitchell introduced..... | 12 |
| OPENING OF PARLIAMENT— | |
| THE MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE attend at the BAR of the SENATE, by command of HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL..... | 13 |
| Mr. Speaker makes known his Election to HIS EXCELLENCY..... | 13 |
| HIS EXCELLENCY, through the SPEAKER of the SENATE, acknowledges the information..... | 13 |
| NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED..... | 13 |
| BRAUCE CONTROVERTED ELECTION—Judge's Report..... | 13 |
| Oaths of Office Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Mackenzie) and read the first time [Bill 1]..... | 14 |

| | PAGE |
|---|------|
| His Excellency's Speech— | |
| Reported by Mr. Speaker —To be considered on Monday next..... | 14 |
| SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES—Ordered..... | 15 |
| LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT—Librarian's Report presented by Mr. Speaker..... | 16 |
| OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES—Remarks: Mr. Mackenzie and Sir John A. Macdonald..... | 16 |

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11TH.

| | |
|--|----|
| ACCOUNT CURRENT, HOUSE OF COMMONS—Report presented by Mr. Speaker..... | 16 |
| OFFICIAL REPORTS OF THE DEBATES—Committee appointed..... | 16 |
| INSOLVENCY LAW REPEAL—Introduction of Bill proposed..... | 18 |
| Address in answer to His Excellency's Speech— | |
| THE SPEECH taken into consideration..... | 19 |
| ADDRESS in reply thereto moved by Mr. De St. Georges | 19 |
| Seconded by Mr. Charlton | 22 |
| DEBATE ON ADDRESS—(Sir John A. Macdonald)..... | 29 |
| Debate adjourned on motion of Mr. Mousseau | 78 |

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 12TH

| | |
|---|-----|
| DEBATE ON ADDRESS resumed (Mr. Mousseau)..... | 78 |
| Debate adjourned on motion of Mr. Plumb | 146 |

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 13TH.

| | |
|---|-----|
| DEBATE ON ADDRESS resumed (Mr. Plumb)..... | 146 |
| Debate suspended at six o'clock. | |
| THE SPEAKERSHIP—Personal explanation (Mr. Masson)..... | 167 |
| THE SEAT FOR LINCOLN—Personal explanation (Mr. Norris)..... | 167 |
| DEBATE ON ADDRESS resumed (Mr. Sinclair)..... | 170 |
| Debate adjourned on motion of Mr. McCallum | 200 |

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 14TH.

| | |
|---|-----|
| DEBATE ON ADDRESS resumed (Mr. McCallum)..... | 200 |
| Debate adjourned on motion of Mr. Macdougall (East Elgin)..... | 253 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

v

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 15TH.

PAGE

| | |
|--|-----|
| A RETURN.—Remarks | 252 |
| DEBATE ON ADDRESS resumed Mr. Macdougall (East Elgin) | 254 |
| Motion agreed to, a Committee appointed to draw up an Address, Report brought up and Address agreed to—To be presented by Privy Councillors | 347 |
| SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES—Committees to prepare Lists appointed..... | 347 |
| SUPPLY—Moved— | |
| “That this House will, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.”—(Mr. Cartwright .) | |
| Motion agreed to..... | 347 |
| WAYS AND MEANS—Moved— | |
| “That this House will, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.”—(Mr. Cartwright .) | |
| Motion agreed to..... | 347 |
| PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT—Report presented by Mr. Mackenzie | 347 |
| MARINE AND FISHERIES—Report presented by Mr. Smith (Westmoreland)..... | 347 |
| DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR—Report presented by Mr. Mills | 347 |
| PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—Presented by Mr. Cartwright | 347 |
| DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—Penitentiaries Report presented by Mr. Laflamme .. | 348 |
| TRADE AND NAVIGATION—Tables presented by Mr. Burpee (St. John)..... | 348 |

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 18TH.

| | |
|---|-----|
| POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—Report of the Postmaster-General presented by Mr. Huntington | 348 |
| INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT—Report, Returns and Statistics, presented by Mr. Laurier | 348 |
| Supplementary Report No. 1, presented by Mr. Laurier | 348 |
| Supplementary Report No. 2—Weights and Measures—Presented by Mr. Laurier | 348 |
| Supplementary Report No. 3—Adulteration of Food—Presented by Mr. Laurier | 348 |
| MILITIA DEPARTMENT—Report presented by Mr. Jones (Halifax)..... | 348 |
| UNFORESEEN EXPENSES—Statement presented by Mr. Cartwright | 348 |
| ALLOWANCES AND GRATUITIES—Statement presented by Mr. Cartwright | 348 |
| PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS..... | 348 |
| PETITIONS FROM FOREIGNERS— Mr. Speaker's Ruling..... | 348 |
| SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES—Report of Committee appointed to prepare Lists presented by Mr. Mackenzie , and concurred in so far as relates to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders..... | 349 |
| LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT—Select Committee appointed | 349 |
| Insolvent Acts Repeal Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Barthe) and read the first time [Bill No. 2]. | 349 |

| | PAGE |
|--|------------|
| Evidence on Common Assaults Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Dymond) and read the first time [Bill No. 3]..... | 349 |
| Stamps on Promissory Notes Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Irving) and read the first time [Bill No. 4]..... | 349 |
| Rate of Interest Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Barthe) and read the first time [Bill No. 5] | 350 |
| CHANGES IN THE GOVERNMENT—Ministerial Explanations (Mr. Mackenzie)..... | 350 |
| SUPERIOR COURT JUDGE FOR RICHELIEU DISTRICT—Question, Mr. Barthe ; | |
| ANSWER, Mr. Laflamme..... | 352 |
| MAILS ON THE MONTREAL AND OCCIDENTAL RAILWAY—Question, Mr. Christie ; | |
| ANSWER, Mr. Huntington..... | 352 |
| NORTH-WEST BOUNDARY OF ONTARIO—Question, Mr. Masson ; ANSWER, Mr. | |
| Mackenzie..... | 352 |
| RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES—Question, Mr. Béchard ; ANSWER, Mr. | |
| Mackenzie..... | 352 |
| PAYMENT OF LABOURERS ON PUBLIC WORKS—Question, Mr. Fiset ; ANSWER, Mr. | |
| Mackenzie..... | 352 |
| RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES—Question, Mr. Casgrain ; ANSWER, Mr. | |
| Mackenzie..... | 353 |
| BANKRUPT LAW AMENDMENT—Question, Mr. Casgrain ; ANSWER, Mr. Laflamme. | 353 |
| ASSIMILATION OF TRADE LAWS—Question, Mr. Casgrain ; ANSWER, Mr. Mac- | |
| kenzie..... | 353 |
| REVISION OF THE DOMINION STATUTES—Question, Mr. Casgrain ; ANSWER, Mr. | |
| Laflamme | 353 |
| EXPENSES ON ACCOUNT OF SITTING BULL—Question, Mr. Casgrain ; ANSWER, | |
| Mr. Mackenzie..... | 353 |
| IMPROVEMENT OF THE RIVER SYDENHAM—Question, Mr. Stephenson ; ANSWER, | |
| Mr. Mackenzie..... | 354 |
| BREAKWATER AT RONDEAU—Question, Mr. Stephenson ; ANSWER, Mr. Smith | |
| (Westmoreland) | 354 |
| MAILS ON THE MONTREAL AND OCCIDENTAL RAILWAY—Question, Mr. Desjar- | |
| dins ; ANSWER, Mr. Huntington..... | 354 |
| REPEAL OF DUTY ON NATIVE TOBACCO—Question, Mr. Bolduc ; ANSWER, Mr. | |
| Cartwright..... | 355 |
| EXPRESS FREIGHT ON GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—Question, Mr. Oliver ; ANSWER, | |
| Mr. Mackenzie..... | 355 |
| ABOLITION OF STAMP DUTY ON PROMISSORY NOTES—Question, Mr. Borden ; | |
| ANSWER, Mr. Cartwright..... | 355 |
| THE DUFFERIN IMPROVEMENTS IN QUEBEC—Question, Mr. Caron ; ANSWER, Mr. | |
| Mackenzie..... | 355 |
| LEASING THE PEMBINA BRANCH OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY—Question, Mr. | |
| Schultz ; ANSWER, Mr. Mackenzie | 355 |
| MAILS BETWEEN QUEBEC AND THREE RIVERS—Question, Mr. De St. Georges ; | |
| ANSWER, Mr. Huntington..... | 355 |
| THE GRANT FOR VETERAN MILITIAMEN—Question, Mr. Roy ; ANSWER, Mr. | |
| Jones (Halifax)..... | 355 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| | PAGE |
|---|------|
| PUBLIC WORKS CHARGEABLE TO CAPITAL—Motion for Return (Mr. Oliver)— Motion agreed to..... | 356 |
| PAYMENTS FOR PRINTING—Motion for Return (Mr. Dymond)—Motion agreed to | 356 |
| PURCHASE OF THE RIVIERE DU LOUP BRANCH, G.T.R. —Motion for Return (Mr. Langevin)—Motion withdrawn..... | 357 |
| ADMISSION OF CANADIAN SHIPS INTO FRENCH PORTS—Motion for Correspondence (Mr. Langevin)—After short debate, motion agreed to..... | 360 |
| FORT FRANCES LOCKS—Motion for Report (Mr. Masson)—Motion agreed to.... | 366 |
| W. B. O'DONOGHUE—Motion for Orders-in-Council (Mr. Masson)—Motion agreed to..... | 366 |
| PURCHASE OF RIVIERE DU LOUP BRANCH, G.T.R.—Motion for correspondence (Mr. Fiset)—Motion withdrawn..... | 366 |
| BRITISH COLUMBIA TERMINUS OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY—Motion for Reports and Correspondence (Mr. DeCosmos)—Motion agreed to..... | 366 |
| PROJECTED HARBOUR NEAR MORPETH—Motion for Return (Mr. Stephenson)— Motion agreed to..... | 367 |
| RENEWAL OF THE RECIPROCITY TREATY—Motion for correspondence (Mr. Bourassa)—Motion withdrawn..... | 367 |
| TRADE AND COMMERCE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—Motion for Return (Mr. DeCos- mos)—Motion agreed to..... | 368 |

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 19TH.

| | |
|--|-----|
| RECEPTION OF PRIVATE BILLS—Motion to extend time (Mr. Rymal)—Motion agreed to..... | 363 |
| SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES—Motion for Concurrence (Mr. Mackenzie)— Motion agreed to..... | 363 |
| JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING—Message to be sent to the Senate informing their Honours of the names of Members composing the Select Standing Committee on Printing..... | 363 |
| Canada Southern Railway Company Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Thomson, Welland) and read the first time [Bill 6] | 369 |
| Ontario Express and Transportation Company Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Oliver) and read the first time [Bill 7] | 369 |
| National Insurance Company Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Desjardins) and read the first time [Bill 8]..... | 369 |
| Brockville and Ottawa Railway Company Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Galbraith) and read the first time [Bill 9] | 369 |
| Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Casgrain) and read the first time [Bill 10] | 369 |
| Merchants Bank of Canada Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Jetté) and read the first time [Bill 11]..... | 369 |

| | PAGE |
|---|------|
| Société de Construction Mutuelle Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Malouin) and read the first time [Bill 12]..... | 369 |
| Kingston Election Petition Deposit Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Haggart) and read the first time [Bill 15]..... | 369 |
| Ontario Mutual Life Assurance Company Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Bowman) and read the first time [Bill 16]..... | 369 |
| Public Works Act Amendment Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Mackenzie) and read the first time [Bill 13]..... | 369 |
| Independence of Parliament Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Laflamme) and read the first time [Bill 14]. | 369 |
| THE CASE OF JUDGE LORANGER—Remarks, Mr. Masson | 369 |
| RAILWAY IRON RETURN—Remarks, Mr. Plumb | 372 |
| Message from His Excellency— | |
| THE ESTIMATES | 372 |
| SUPPLY—IN COMMITTEE— | |
| III. CIVIL GOVERNMENT..... | 373 |
| Vote 2 agreed to. | |
| IMPROVEMENTS ON THE SAGUENAY—Question, Mr. Cimon ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 373 |
| MONEY PAID TO BRITISH COLUMBIA—Motion for Return (Mr. DeCosmos)—After short discussion, motion agreed to | 373 |
| MAILS BETWEEN QUEBEC AND MURRAY BAY—Motion for Returns (Mr. Langevin)—After short discussion, motion agreed to | 382 |
| PERSONAL EXPLANATION—(Mr. Langevin)..... | 386 |
| — | |
| WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 20TH. | |
| Post Office Act Amendment Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Huntington) and read the first time [Bill 17]..... | 386 |
| Dominion Grangers Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Snider) and read the first time [Bill 18] | 387 |
| Port Whitby Harbour Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Burk) and read the first time [Bill 19] | 387 |
| Message from His Excellency— | |
| APPOINTMENT OF INTERNAL COMMISSION OF THE HOUSE..... | 387 |
| MAIL TO LAKE ST. JOHN—Question, Mr. Cimon ; Answer, Mr. Huntington | 387 |
| NOTRE DAME DE LATERRIÈRE MAIL SERVICE—Question, Mr. Cimon ; Answer, Mr. Huntington | 387 |
| COASTING REGULATIONS—Question, Mr. Stephenson ; Answer, Mr. Smith (Westmoreland)..... | 387 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| | ix |
|--|-------------|
| | PAGE |
| BREAKWATER AT MAIN-A-DIEU —Question, Mr. McDonald (Cape Breton); Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 388 |
| MAILS TO EBOULEMENTS AND MURRAY BAY —Motion for Returns (Mr. Langevin) —Motion agreed to. | 388 |
| SERVICES OF WILLIAM TAYLOR OF COTEAU DU LAC —Motion for Return (Mr. Lanthier)—Motion agreed to..... | 388 |
| REPAIRS TO MILITARY BRIDGES AT LÉVIS —Motion for Return (Mr. Blanchet) —Motion agreed to. | 388 |
| EXPENSES OF SPECIAL COMMITTEES —Motion for Return (Mr. Young)—Motion agreed to | 388 |
| TRADE WITH AUSTRALIA —Motion for Return (Mr. Young)—Motion agreed to. | 389 |
| BOUNDARY LINE BETWEEN UPPER AND LOWER CANADA —Motion for Reports (Mr. Lanthier)—After a short debate, motion withdrawn | 389 |
| SURVEY OF MATANE HARBOUR —Motion for Papers (Mr. Fiset)—Motion agreed to | 389 |
| THE HOUR OF ADJOURNMENT —Moved— “That it be an Order of the House that if, at the Hour of 10 o'clock, p.m., the business of the day be not concluded, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair, and the House shall stand adjourned until its next regular meeting, unless it be otherwise resolved by a majority of the members present at that hour; and, in case there is any desire to continue in Session, Mr. Speaker, shall, on being requested by not less than five members, put the question without debate.”—(Mr. Blain.) After debate, motion withdrawn..... | 395 |
| THE “NORTHERN LIGHT” STEAMER —Motion for Accounts (Mr. Perry)—After debate, motion agreed to..... | 395 |
| ACCIDENTS ON RAILWAYS —Motion for Return (Mr. Fleming)—motion agreed to..... | 406 |
| ————— | |
| THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 21st. | |
| Quebec Fire Insurance Company Bill — Introduced (Mr. Taschereau) and read the first time [Bill 21]..... | 407 |
| Bank of Liverpool Bill — Introduced (Mr. Forbes) and read the first time [Bill 22]..... | 407 |
| IMMIGRATION AND COLONIZATION COMMITTEE —Motion to employ shorthand writer (Mr. Trow)—Motion agreed to..... | 407 |
| DUTY ON MALT —Question, Mr. Young ; Answer, Mr. Cartwright | 408 |
| CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION —Question, Mr. Ryan ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 408 |
| THE GEORGIAN BAY BRANCH OF C.P.R. —Question, Mr. White (North Renfrew); Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 409 |
| OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE DEBATES —First Report of Committee concurred in | 409 |
| CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY —Motion for Correspondence (Mr. DeCosmos)— Motion agreed to..... | 417 |
| ALASKA BOUNDARY LINE —Motion for Report (Mr. DeCosmos)—After discus- sion, the motion was slightly amended by consent and agreed to..... | 419 |
| EXPENSES OF CANADA AT THE PHILADELPHIA EXHIBITION —Motion for Return (Mr. Pope, Compton)—Motion agreed to..... | 419 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| EXPENSES OF CANADA AT THE SYDNEY EXHIBITION—Motion for Return (Mr. Pope, Compton)—Motion agreed to..... | 419 |
| THE NUMBER OF MEMBERS IN PARLIAMENT—Moved— | |
| “ That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she may be graciously pleased to cause a measure to be submitted to the Imperial Parliament for the purpose of amending the British North America Act, so as, while adhering to the principle of representation by population underlying that Act, to confer upon the Parliament of Canada the power of determining the number of Members which shall from time to time constitute this House, and, further, so as to confer the power upon the Parliament of Canada of readjusting or reducing the number of Senators in that Chamber.—(Mr. Blain.) | |
| After a short debate, motion withdrawn..... | 426 |
| DEATH OF MILITIA VETERANS—Motion for Return (Mr. Fiset)—Motion agreed to | 426 |

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 22ND.

Messages from His Excellency—

| | |
|--|-----|
| REPLY TO THE ADDRESS..... | 427 |
| IMPERIAL EXTRADITION ACT OF 1870..... | 427 |
| RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES (CONSOLIDATED FUND)—Statement presented by Mr. Cartwright | 427 |

Keewatin Municipalities Bill—

| | |
|--|-----|
| Introduced (Mr. Mills) and read the first time [Bill 23]..... | 427 |
|--|-----|

Insolvent Act Amendment Bill—

| | |
|---|-----|
| Introduced (Mr. Bourassa) and read the first time [Bill 24]..... | 427 |
|---|-----|

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET—

| | |
|--|-----|
| Order for the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the supply to be granted to Her Majesty—(Mr. Cartwright)..... | 427 |
| A debate arising thereon, the same was adjourned on motion of Mr. McCarthy | 484 |

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 25TH.

| | |
|--|-----|
| THE PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—Motion to refer to Public Accounts Committee (Mr. Young)—Motion agreed to..... | 484 |
| Canada Southern Railway Company Bill [BILL 6]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Thomson, Welland)..... | 484 |
| Ontario Express and Transportation Company Bill [BILL 7]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Oliver) | 485 |
| National Insurance Company Bill [BILL 8]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Desjardins)..... | 485 |
| Brockville and Ottawa Railway Company Bill [BILL 9]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Galbraith)..... | 485 |

| | PAGE |
|--|------|
| Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company Bill [BILL 10]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Casgrain) | 485 |
| Merchants Bank Bill [BILL 11]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Jetté)..... | 486 |
| Société de Construction Mutuelle Bill [BILL 12]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Malouin)..... | 486 |
| Kingston Election Petition Deposit Bill [BILL 15]— | |
| Second reading postponed (Mr. Haggart) | 486 |
| Ontario Mutual Life Assurance Company Bill [BILL 16]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Bowman) | 486 |
| Quebec Fire Assurance Company Bill [BILL 21]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Taschereau)..... | 486 |
| CARILTON CANAL AND DAM—Question, Mr. Currier ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie ... | 486 |
| OVERPAYMENTS BY STEAMBOATS—Question, Mr. Cheval ; Answer, Mr. Smith (Westmoreland) | 486 |
| DEEPENING THE CHANNEL AT THE MOUTH OF THE MIRAMICHI—Question, Mr. Mitchell ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 486 |
| IRON RAILS IN CAPE BRETON—Question, Mr. MacKay (Cape Breton) ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 487 |
| OBSTRUCTIONS IN THE RED RIVER AND THE ASSINIBOINE—Question, Mr. Smith (Selkirk) ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 487 |
| MAIL COMMUNICATION WITH THE BRITISH WEST INDIES—Motion for Correspondence (Mr. Langevin)—After a short debate, motion agreed to. | 487 |
| PERSONAL EXPLANATION—(Mr. Plumb) | 495 |
| THE PACIFIC RAILWAY ROUTE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—Motion for Return (Mr. DeCosmos)—After a short discussion, motion agreed to... .. | 495 |
| CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES ON INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—Motion for Statement (Mr. Pouliot)—After a short debate, motion agreed to..... | 499 |
| THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—Motion for Return (Mr Ross, West Middlesex) —motion agreed to | 510 |
| THE LACHINE CANAL—Motion for Correspondence and Contracts (Mr. Caron) —motion slightly amended and agreed to..... | 510 |
| VISIT OF THE GOVERNOR GENERAL TO BRITISH COLUMBIA—Motion for Details of Expenses (Mr. Mitchell)—After debate, motion amended and agreed to | 525 |

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 26TH.

| | |
|---|-----|
| THE CASE OF JUDGE LORANGER—Explanations and Remarks (Mr. Speaker)— Postponed for further consideration..... | 526 |
| PAYMENTS FOR PRINTING, DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, IN 1873—Motion to refer Return (Mr. Dymond)—Objection taken, motion ruled out of order..... | 529 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| Sale of bottles used in the manufacture of Mineral Water and other Drinks Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Macdonald , Centre Toronto) and read the first time— [Bill 25]..... | 531 |
| Grand Trunk Railway Company Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Mitchell) and read the first time [Bill 26]..... | 531 |
| Northern Railway Company of Canada Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Cook) and read the first time [Bill 27]..... | 531 |
| Montreal and Champlain Railway Company Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Scriver) and read the first time [Bill 28]..... | 531 |
| Canada Agricultural Insurance Company Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Kerr) and read the first time [Bill 29]..... | 531 |
| OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES—Remarks, Mr. Pouliot | 531 |
| RETURN OF GOVERNMENT ADVERTISEMENTS IN NEWSPAPERS—Remarks, Mr. Bowell | 532 |
| SUPPLY—THE BUDGET— | |
| Debate Resumed (Mr. McCarthy)..... | 534 |
| Debate Further Adjourned on motion of Mr. Wallace | 566 |
| GOVERNMENT BUSINESS—Remarks..... | 566 |
| — | |
| WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 27TH. | |
| BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—Motion to adjourn (Mr. Mackenzie)..... | 567 |
| Agricultural Mutual Insurance Association Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Macmillan) and read the first time [Bill 30]..... | 567 |
| Sydenham Harbour Company Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Gibbs , South Ontario) and read the first time [Bill 31]... | 567 |
| Non-forfeitable Life Assurance Policies Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Trow) and read the first time [Bill 33]..... | 567 |
| Colonization Railways Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Mills) and read the first time [Bill 32]..... | 567 |
| DOMINION GOVERNMENT PENSIONERS—Question, Mr. DeCosmos ; Answer, Mr. Cartwright | 568 |
| ST. JOHN HARBOUR COMMISSION—Question, Mr. Domville ; Answer, Mr. Smith (Westmoreland)..... | 568 |
| ISLE BRULÉE WHARF—Question, Mr. Roy ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 568 |
| BAY OF CHALEURS RAILWAY—Question, Mr. Robitaille ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 568 |
| MIRAMICHI VALLEY RAILWAY—Question, Mr. Mitchell ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 569 |
| TELEGRAPH LINE FROM CHATHAM TO ESCUMINAC—Question, Mr. Mitchell ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 569 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

xiii

| | PAGE |
|---|------|
| PASSENGER AND FREIGHT DEPOT AT ST. JOHN, N.B.—Question, Mr. Donville ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 569 |
| FOG WHISTLE ON RACE ROCKS—Question, Mr. Thompson (Cariboo); Answer, Mr. Smith (Westmoreland)..... | 569 |
| MILITARY CAMPS OF INSTRUCTION—Question, Mr. Thompson (Haldimand); Answer, Mr. Jones (Halifax)..... | 570 |
| SURVEY OF PACIFIC RAILWAY BETWEEN RED RIVER AND BATTLEFORD—Motion for Papers (Mr. Kirkpatrick)..... | 570 |
| Debate suspended at six o'clock. | |

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 28TH.

| | |
|---|-----|
| IMPORTATION OF CANADIAN CATTLE INTO ENGLAND—Question, Mr. Higinbotham ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 593 |
| HARBOUR WORKS AT SOREL—Remarks, Mr. Barthé | 593 |
| SURVEY OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY BETWEEN RED RIVER AND BATTLEFORD— Further consideration of proposed motion for Papers (Mr. Kirkpatrick)— After a short debate, motion agreed to..... | 595 |

| | |
|--|-----|
| Evidence in Common Assaults Bill [BILL 3]— After debate, read the second time (Mr. Dymond)..... | 599 |
|--|-----|

| | |
|---|-----|
| Stamps on Promissory Notes Bill [BILL 4]— Read the second time (Mr. Irving)..... | 616 |
|---|-----|

BIENNIAL SESSIONS—Moved—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she may be graciously pleased to recommend that a measure be submitted to the Imperial Parliament for the purpose of amending the 20th clause of Section 4 ‘Legislative Power’ of the British North America Act 1867, so as to have a Session of the Parliament of Canada once in every two years instead of once in one year as at present exists, unless in cases of great public emergency, when His Excellency the Governor General, by and with the advice of His Executive, shall have the power to call such extra Sessions as may be deemed expedient in the interim, thus saving to the country one-half of the present enormous expense of legislation which may be said to cost annually, say in round numbers, House of Commons $350,000, Senate $200,000, which amendment would be of great advantage in saving of time to the public men of the Dominion, and would be the means of saving so large an amount of the public revenue as would materially help to build many miles annually of the Canadian Pacific Railway.”—(Mr. Bunster.)

| | |
|---|-----|
| Motion negatived | 616 |
| THE PACIFIC RAILWAY—Motion for Return (Mr. DeCosmos)—Motion agreed to. | 618 |
| WELLAND CANAL CONTRACTS—Motion for Returns (Mr. Langevin)..... | 623 |
| Debate adjourned on motion of Mr. Archibald | 662 |

FRIDAY, MARCH 1st.

| | |
|--|-----|
| Calais and St. Stephen Railway Bridge Company Bill— Introduced (Mr. Appleby) and read the first time [Bill 34]..... | 663 |
| Banque Jacques Cartier Bill— Introduced (Mr. Casgrain) and read the first time [Bill 35] | 663 |

| | PAGE |
|--|------|
| Railway Passengers' Safety Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Trow) and read the first time [Bill 37]..... | 663 |
| G. B. Burland Letters Patent Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Casgrain) and read the first time [Bill 36]..... | 663 |
| GOVERNMENT BUSINESS—Moved— | |
| "That the Government business shall have precedence immediately after Routine proceedings on Thursdays, for the remainder of the Session."—(Mr. Mackenzie .) | |
| Motion agreed to..... | 663 |
| SUPPLY—THE BUDGET— | |
| Debate resumed (Mr. Wallace , South Norfolk) | 663 |
| Debate suspended at six o'clock. | |
| Bank of Liverpool Bill [BILL 22]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Forbes)..... | 682 |
| Grand Trunk Railway Company Bill [BILL 26]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Mitchell)..... | 682 |
| Northern Railway Company Bill [BILL 27]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Cook)..... | 682 |
| Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway Company Bill [BILL 28]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Scriver)..... | 682 |
| Agricultural Mutual Insurance Association Bill [BILL 30]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Macmillan)..... | 682 |
| Sydenham Harbour Company Bill [BILL 31]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Gibbs , South Ontario)..... | 682 |
| Port Whitby Harbour Company Bill [BILL 19]— | |
| After a short debate, read the second time (Mr. Burk)..... | 682 |
| Canada Agricultural Insurance Company Bill [BILL 29]— | |
| After a short debate, read the second time (Mr. Kerr)..... | 683 |
| SUPPLY—THE BUDGET— | |
| Debate resumed (Mr. Oliver)..... | 684 |
| Debate adjourned on motion of Mr. Plumb | 708 |
| Dominion Grangers Bill [BILL 18]— | |
| Order for second reading discharged and Bill withdrawn (Mr. Snider)..... | 708 |

MONDAY, MARCH 4TH.

| | |
|--|-----|
| Railway Act, 1868, Extension (Prince Edward Island) Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Mackenzie) and read the first time [Bill 38]..... | 709 |
| Canada Vine Growers' Association Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Smith , Peel) and read the first time [Bill 39]..... | 708 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

xv

| | PAGE |
|---|------|
| INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY RETURNS—Question, Mr. Domville ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 708 |
| THE ALLEGED PICHÉ LETTER—Remarks..... | 708 |
| Calais and St. Stephen Railway Bridge Company Bill [BILL 34]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Appleby)..... | 711 |
| THE DUTIES ON CANADIAN TOBACCO—Question, Mr. Bourbeau ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 711 |
| KING'S COUNTY, N.B., POSTAL SERVICE—Question, Mr. Domville ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 711 |
| BAY OF CHALEURS RAILWAY—Question, Mr. Robitaille ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 711 |
| LAKE ST. JOHN RAILWAY—Question, Mr. De St. Georges ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 712 |
| THE WILLIAMSBURG CANALS—Question, Mr. Gibson ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie ... | 712 |
| PROPOSED ISLE BRULÉE WHARF—Question, Mr. Roy ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 712 |
| DOMINION LANDS OFFICE IN MANITOBA—Motion for Return (Mr. Schultz)—After a short discussion, motion agreed to..... | 712 |
| WELLAND CANAL CONTRACTS—Motion for Returns (Mr. Langevin)—After a short debate, motion agreed to..... | 714 |
| SUPPLY OF SPIKES FOR PACIFIC RAILWAY—Motion for Return (Mr. Langevin)—Motion, slightly amended, agreed to..... | 718 |
| PACIFIC RAILWAY LANDS—Motion for Return (Mr. Plumb)—Motion agreed to..... | 718 |
| CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION—Motion for Return (Sir John A. Macdonald)—Motion agreed to..... | 718 |
| LEASES OF RIVERS IN QUEBEC—Motion for Return (Mr. Fiset)—Motion agreed to..... | 718 |
| CANADA SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY—Motion for Returns (Mr. Macdougall, East Elgin)—Motion agreed to..... | 720 |
| WINDSOR AND ANNAPOLIS RAILWAY—Motion for Papers (Mr. Tupper)—Motion agreed to)..... | 721 |
| LAPSED APPROPRIATIONS OF 1876-77—Motion for Orders in Council (Mr. Tupper)—Motion agreed to..... | 721 |
| PEMBINA BRANCH RAILWAY—Motion for Copy of Tenders (Mr. Tupper)—Motion agreed to..... | 721 |
| THE NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE AND THE INDIANS—Motion for Copies of Tenders (Mr. Tupper)—Motion agreed to..... | 721 |
| SURVEY OF LINGAN HARBOUR—Motion for Copy of Report (Mr. McDonald, Cape Breton)—Motion agreed to..... | 722 |
| EXPENDITURE ON PUBLIC WORKS—Motion for Return (Mr. Oliver)—Motion agreed to..... | 722 |
| THE DAWSON ROUTE—Motion for Papers (Mr. Langevin)—Motion agreed to... | 722 |
| LACHINE CANAL TENDERS—Motion for Return (Mr. Langevin)—Motion agreed to..... | 722 |
| EXPENDITURE ON PACIFIC RAILWAY—Motion for Statement (Mr. Ryan)—Motion agreed to..... | 722 |
| QUEBEC AND CHICOUTIMI MAIL SERVICE—Motion for Correspondence (Mr. Cimon)—After a short debate, motion agreed to..... | 722 |

| | PAGE |
|---|------------|
| COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, PORT OF RIMOUSKI—Motion for Report (Mr. Fiset)— Motion agreed to..... | 723 |
| LAKE HURON INDIAN LANDS—Motion for Return (Mr. Bowell)—Motion agreed to..... | 723 |
| THE NORTHERN RAILWAY COMMISSION—Motion for Return (Mr. Bowell)— Motion agreed to..... | 724 |
| CONTRACT TWENTY-FIVE PACIFIC RAILWAY—Motion for Papers (Mr. Bowell)— Motion agreed to..... | 724 |
| CONTRACT FIFTEEN PACIFIC RAILWAY—Motion for Papers (Mr. Bowell)— Motion agreed to..... | 724 |
| CARRONBROOK AND CLINTON BONDED WAREHOUSE—Motion for Correspondence (Mr. Horton)—Motion agreed to..... | 724 |
| REMOVAL OF NEW CAMPBELLTON CUSTOM-HOUSE—Motion for Papers (Mr. Campbell)—After a short debate, motion agreed to..... | 724 |
| POST OFFICE CHANGES AT CAMPBELLTON—Motion for Papers (Mr. Campbell)— Motion agreed to..... | 725 |
| MAIL SERVICE IN THE COUNTIES OF LEVIS AND DORCHESTER—Motion for Return (Mr. Rouleau)—Motion agreed to..... | 725 |
| IMPORTATION OF TUBING—Motion for Return (Mr. Orton)—Motion agreed to... 726 | 726 |
| INGONISH HARBOUR BREAKWATER—Motion for Papers (Mr. Campbell)—Motion agreed to..... | 726 |
| IMPORTATION OF HORSES, CATTLE AND SHEEP—Motion for Statement (Mr. Hig- inbotham)—After a short debate, motion agreed to..... | 726 |
| POSTAL SERVICE, PARISH OF PERTH, VICTORIA Co., N.B.—Motion for Copies of Petitions (Mr. Costigan)—Motion agreed to..... | 726 |
| BRITISH COLUMBIA FISHERIES—Motion for Returns (Mr. DeCosmos)—Motion agreed to..... | 726 |
| OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY—Moved— | |
| " That the interests of Public Morality and the physical well-being of all classes of the community, alike render it desirable and necessary that there should be a strict and uniform observance of the Lord's Day on all the Public Works which are under the control of the Dominion Government. That in the opinion of this House, there should be an entire closing and cessation of labour on all Canals, Railways, and other Public Works which are under the control of the Dominion Government, during the twenty-four hours comprehended the Lord's Day, save and except only such services as may be of absolute and unavoidable necessity." —(Mr. Christie)..... | 727 |
| Moved in amendment— | |
| " That the interests of Public Morality and the physical well-being of all classes of the community, require that the Lord's Day should be strictly observed by persons engaged in the Public Works under the control of the Government of Canada, so far as it is practicable to do so ; That in the opinion of this House there should be a cessation of labour on the Lord's Day on Canals, Railways, and other Public Works, which are under the control of the Government of Canada, so far as in the opinion of the Government it shall be found practicable to do so."—(Mr. Macdougall, East Elgin.)..... | 731 |
| Motion in amendment agreed to | 735 |
| THE MILITARY COLLEGE—Motion for Return (Mr. Langevin)—After a short debate, motion agreed to..... | 735 |
| DISTRICT OF QUEBEC MARINE—Motion for List of Employés (Mr. Fréchette)— Motion agreed to..... | 738 |
| BIRD ISLAND LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER—Motion for Correspondence (Mr. Camp- bell)—Motion agreed to..... | 738 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

xvii

| | PAGE |
|---|------|
| MALPEQUE BREAKWATER —Motion for Return (Mr. Stephenson)—Motion agreed to | 738 |
| LIGHTS AT TIGNISH BREAKWATER —Motion for Return (Mr. Stephenson)—Motion agreed to..... | 739 |
| ENLARGEMENT OF ST. PETER'S CANAL —Motion for Correspondence (Mr. Campbell)—Motion, slightly amended, agreed to..... | 739 |
| EXTRA HOUR FOR NOTICES OF MOTION —Remarks..... | 740 |

TUESDAY, MARCH 5TH.

| | |
|--|-----|
| ADJOURNMENT FOR ASH WEDNESDAY —Moved— | |
| “That when this House adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until Thursday at three o'clock.”—(Mr. Mackenzie .) | |
| Motion agreed to | 740 |
| Law of Evidence Amendment Bill — | |
| Introduced (Mr. Kirkpatrick) and read the first time [Bill 40]..... | 740 |
| Larceny of Things Attached to or Growing on Land Law Amendment Bill — | |
| Introduced (Mr. Palmer) and read the first time [Bill 41]..... | 740 |
| EXTRA HOUR FOR NOTICES OF MOTION —Enquiry..... | |
| | 740 |
| SUPPLY—THE BUDGET. | |
| Debate resumed (Mr. Plumb)..... | 741 |
| Debate adjourned on motion of Mr. Mousseau | 800 |

THURSDAY, MARCH 7TH.

| | |
|--|-----|
| Hochelaga Building Society Incorporation Bill — | |
| First reading proposed (Mr. Jette)..... | 801 |
| Intercolonial Railway Act Amendment Bill — | |
| Introduced (Mr. Tupper) and read the first time [Bill 42]..... | 801 |
| Stamps on Bills and Notes Bill — | |
| Introduced (Mr. Laurier) and read the first time [Bill 43]..... | 802 |
| Homestead Exemption Estates Bill — | |
| Introduced (Mr. Mills) and read the first time [Bill 44]..... | 802 |
| THE MINISTER OF MILITIA —Personal explanation (Sir John A. Macdonald) | |
| | 803 |
| SUPPLY—THE TARIFF — | |
| Debate resumed on Mr. Cartwright's proposed motion, that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair (Mr. Mousseau)..... | 809 |

| | PAGE |
|---|------|
| Moved in amendment— | |
| "That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that this House is of the opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the Tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion; that such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade."—(Sir John A. Macdonald)..... | 854 |
| Debate adjourned on motion of Mr. Dymond | 863 |
| GOVERNMENT BUSINESS—Remarks | 863 |
| — | |
| FRIDAY, MARCH 8TH. | |
| QUEBEC PROVINCIAL CRISIS—Personal explanation (Mr. Mitchell)..... | 863 |
| SUPPLY—THE TARIFF— | |
| Debate on Mr. Cartwright's proposed motion, "That the Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply," and Sir John A. Macdonald's motion in amendment, resumed (Mr. Dymond)..... | 863 |
| Debate suspended at six o'clock. | |
| Kingston Election Petition Deposit Bill [BILL 15]— | |
| After a short debate, order for second reading postponed..... | 885 |
| Banque Jacques Cartier Bill [BILL 35]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Casgrain)..... | 887 |
| SUPPLY—THE TARIFF— | |
| Debate resumed (Mr. Dymond)..... | 887 |
| Debate adjourned on motion of Mr. Palmer | 937 |
| MOTIONS OF WANT OF CONFIDENCE—Short debate on | 937 |
| — | |
| MONDAY, MARCH 11TH. | |
| MOTIONS OF WANT OF CONFIDENCE—Mr. Speaker's Ruling | 946 |
| PETITIONS FROM ALIENS—Remarks | 950 |
| THE ST. PAUL AND PACIFIC RAILWAY—Question, Mr. Schultz; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 950 |
| Judgments against Railway Companies Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Irving) and read the first time [Bill 45]..... | 951 |
| Manitoba Conflicting Land Claims Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Mills) and read the first time [Bill 46]..... | 951 |
| Transfer of Lands and Estates Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Mills) and read the first time [Bill 47]..... | 951 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

xix

PAGE

Société de Prêts et Placements de Québec Bill [BILL 12]—

Considered in Committee (Mr. Malouin)..... 951

Kingston Election Petition Deposit Bill [BILL 15]—

Order for second reading (Mr. Haggart) discharged, and Bill withdrawn. 951

TRANSMISSION OF TIMBER DOWN CANADIAN RIVERS—Question, Mr. Baby ;
Answer, Mr. Mackenzie..... 951

TRANSPORTATION OF RAILS FOR THE PEMBINA BRANCH—Question, Mr. Schultz ;
Answer, Mr. Mackenzie..... 951

RAILS FOR NEW BRUNSWICK RAILROADS—Question, Mr. Donville ; Answer,
Mr. Mackenzie..... 951

KAMOURASKA MAIL SERVICE—Question, Mr. Roy ; Answer, Mr. Huntington.... 951

THE MILITIA SERVICE—Question, Mr. Higinbotham ; Answer, Mr. Jones
(Halifax)..... 951

HAMILTON AND BARRIE MAIL SERVICE—Question, Mr. McCraney ; Answer, Mr.
Huntington 952

PERMISSIVE LIQUOR LAW—Question, Mr. Appleby ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie.... 952

EXTRA POSTAL SERVICE TO LINGAN AND LOW PARISH, C.B.—Question, Mr.
McDonald (Cape Breton) ; Answer, Mr. Huntington..... 952

OPENING OF NAVIGATION ON THE WELLDAND CANAL—Question, Mr. Kirkpatrick ;
Answer, Mr. Mackenzie..... 952

RAILWAY THROUGH CAPE BRETON—Question, Mr. McDonald (Cape Breton) ;
Answer, Mr. Mackenzie..... 952

ELECTION ACT AMENDMENT—Question, Mr. Cameron ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie. 952

NEWCASTLE AND CHATHAM MAILS—Question, Mr. Mitchell ; Answer, Mr. Hun- tington 952

INSPECTION OF FISH—Question, Mr. Langevin ; Answer, Mr. Laurier..... 953

UNIFORM COPPER CURRENCY—Question, Mr. Scriver ; Answer, Mr. Cartwright. 953

SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAY COMPANIES IN CONNECTION WITH THE PACIFIC RAILWAY—
Question, Mr. White (North Renfrew) ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie..... 953

HOCKLEY POST OFFICE MAILS—Question, Mr. McCarthy ; Answer, Mr. Hun- tington 953

CANADIAN PACIFIC TELEGRAPH LINE—Motion for Copies of Specifications (Mr.
Macmillan)—Motion agreed to..... 953

WRECKING AND COASTING IN CANADIAN INLAND WATERS—Motion for Returns
(Mr. Stephenson) with leave of the House withdrawn..... 953

NAVIGATION OF SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—Motion for Report (Mr. Smith, Selkirk)—Motion agreed to 954

SURVEYS IN THE NORTH-WEST—Motion for Report (Mr. Smith, Selkirk)—
After a short debate, motion agreed to..... 954

POSTMASTER OF MONTMAGNY—Motion for Papers (Mr. Langevin)—Motion agreed to..... 961

NEW BRUNSWICK MILITARY SCHOOLS—Motion for Returns (Mr. De Veber)—
Motion agreed to..... 961

TELEGRAPH CHARGES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—Motion for Correspondence (Mr.
Dawdney)—After a short debate, motion with leave of the House withdrawn 961

| | PAGE |
|--|------|
| FORT FRANCES LOCK —Motion for Return (Mr. Kirkpatrick)—Motion agreed to..... | 964 |
| INDIAN RESERVES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA —Motion for Return (Mr. DeCosmos)—Motion agreed to..... | 964 |
| ADMIRALTY SURVEY OF PORTLAND CHANNEL —Motion for Return (Mr. DeCosmos)—Motion with leave of the House withdrawn..... | 964 |
| ORDNANCE LANDS —Motion for Return (Mr. Langevin)—Motion agreed to..... | 965 |
| PORT HASTINGS MAIL SERVICE —Motion for Papers (Mr. Campbell)—Motion agreed to..... | 965 |
| VICTORIA HARBOUR AND WOLFE ISLAND BREAKWATER —Motion for Engineer's Report (Mr. Pope , Queen's, P.E.I.)—After a short debate, motion agreed to..... | 965 |
| DISTRIBUTION OF OLD RAILS —Motion for Correspondence (Mr. Domville)—After debate, motion agreed to..... | 969 |
| IRON RAILS APPROPRIATED BY ORDER IN COUNCIL —Motion for Return (Mr. MacKay , Cape Breton)—Motion agreed to..... | 989 |
| PENSIONS PAID TO SQUARE TIMBER CULLERS —Motion for Correspondence (Mr. Fr chet)—After a short debate, motion agreed to..... | 990 |

TUESDAY, MARCH 12TH.

SUPPLY—THE TARIFF—

| | |
|--|------|
| Debate on Mr. Cartwright's proposed motion, "That the Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply," and Sir John A. Macdonald's motion in amendment thereto, resumed (Mr. Palmer) | 991 |
| Motion in amendment (Sir John A. Macdonald) negatived on division. Yeas, 77; nays, 114..... | 1071 |
| Original motion (Mr. Cartwright) agreed to | 1071 |

SUPPLY—IN COMMITTEE—

| | |
|-----------------------------|------|
| III. CIVIL GOVERNMENT | 1072 |
| Vote 3 agreed to. | |

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 13TH.

| | |
|--|------|
| INDIAN EDUCATION IN ONTARIO —Question, Mr. McCraney ; Answer, Mr. Mills | 1072 |
| CHESTER EAST POST OFFICE —Question, Mr. Bourbeau ; Answer, Mr. Huntington | 1072 |
| ST. PAUL AND PACIFIC RAILWAY BONDS —Question, Mr. Casgrain ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 1072 |
| CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—RED RIVER CROSSING —Question, Mr. Casgrain ; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie | 1072 |
| CULLERS' REMUNERATION —Question, Mr. McDougall (South Renfrew); Answer, Mr. Laurier | 1073 |
| RE-MEASUREMENT OF STEAM VESSELS —Motion for Return (Mr. Cheval)—Motion agreed to..... | 1073 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

xai

PAGE

| | |
|--|------|
| THE TUPPER HOUSE, HOLLIS STREET, HALIFAX—Motion for Return (Mr. Goudge)—After a short debate, motion agreed to..... | 1073 |
| MR. HUNTER'S SURVEY OF THE PINE RIVER PASS—Motion for Reports (Mr. Thompson, Cariboo)—After a short debate, motion agreed to..... | 1076 |
| MEAT IMPORTATIONS FROM THE UNITED STATES—Motion for Return (Mr. McQuade)—motion agreed to..... | 1084 |
| BETTER TRANSLATION OF THE BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—Motion for Select Committee (Mr. Frechette)..... | 1084 |
| Debate suspended at six o'clock. | |
| Société de Construction Mutuelle Bill [BILL 12]— | |
| Read the third time and passed (Mr. Malouin)..... | 1092 |
| Merchants Bank of Canada Bill [BILL 11]— | |
| Read the third time and passed (Mr. Jetté)..... | 1092 |
| Evidence in Common Assaults Bill [BILL 3]— | |
| Considered in Committee (Mr. Dymond)..... | 1092 |
| WELLAND CANAL CONTRACTS—Adjourned debate on Mr. Langevin's proposed motion for Return of Contracts, etc., resumed (Mr. Archibald)..... | 1095 |
| Debate further adjourned on motion of Mr. McDougall (South Renfrew). | 1119 |

THURSDAY, MARCH 14TH.

| | |
|-----------------------------|------|
| SUPPLY -IN COMMITTEE— | |
| III. CIVIL GOVERNMENT | 1120 |
| Votes 4 to 10 agreed to. | |

FRIDAY, MARCH 15TH.

| | |
|---|------|
| TEMISCOUATA TOWNSHIP COUNCIL'S PETITION— Mr. Speaker's Ruling..... | 1163 |
| Société de Construction du Comté d'Hochelaga Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Baby) and read the first time [Bill 48] | 1163 |
| SUPPLY—IN COMMITTEE— | |
| III. CIVIL GOVERNMENT | 1163 |
| Votes 11 to 20 agreed to. | |
| IV. ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE..... | 1182 |
| Votes 21 to 33 agreed to. | |
| V. POLICE | 1190 |
| Vote 34 agreed to. | |
| VI. PENITENTIARIES | 1200 |
| Vote 35 agreed to. | |

MONDAY, MARCH 18TH.

| | |
|--|------|
| Ontario Maritime Court Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Laflamme) and read the first time [Bill 50]..... | 1204 |
| Offices of Receiver-General and Attorney-General Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Laflamme) and read the first time [Bill 51]..... | 1204 |
| Canadian Pacific Railway Act Amendment Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Mackenzie) and, after a short discussion, read the first time [Bill 52]..... | 1205 |
| National Insurance Company Bill [BILL 8]— | |
| Considered in Committee and reported (Mr. Desjardins)..... | 1206 |
| Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company Bill [BILL 10]— | |
| Considered in Committee and reported (Mr. Tasgrain)..... | 1206 |
| Ontario Mutual Life Assurance Company Bill [BILL 16]— | |
| Considered in Committee and reported (Mr. Bowman)..... | 1206 |
| Quebec Fire Assurance Company Bill [BILL 21]— | |
| Considered in Committee and reported (Mr. Taschereau)..... | 1206 |
| Bank of Liverpool Bill [BILL 22]— | |
| Considered in Committee and reported (Mr Forbes)..... | 1206 |
| Société de Construction du Comté d'Hochelaga Bill [BILL 48]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr Baby)..... | 1206 |
| Regular Baptist Foreign Missionary Society of Ontario and Quebec Bill [BILL 49]— | |
| Read the second time (Mr. Wood)..... | 1206 |
| Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway Company Bill [BILL 28]— | |
| Read the second and third times and passed (Mr Scriver)..... | 1206 |
| CANADA VINE GROWERS' ASSOCIATION—Question, Mr Plumb; Answer, Mr. Laurier..... | 1206 |
| QUEBEC, MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND OCCIDENTAL RAILWAY—Question, Sir John A. Macdonald; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie..... | 1207 |
| TORONTO HARBOUR—Question, Mr. Macdonald (Centre Toronto); Answer, Mr. Mackenzie..... | 1207 |
| ADVERTISING FOR TENDERS FOR TRANSPORTATION OF RAILS FROM DULUTH TO MANITOBA—Question, Mr. Schultz; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie..... | 1207 |
| NEEBING HOTEL—Question, Mr. Kirkpatrick; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie..... | 1207 |
| TENDERS FOR GUN PLATFORM, LÉVIS FORTS—Motion for Copies of Tenders (Mr. Fréchette)—Motion agreed to..... | 1207 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

xxiii

CHINESE LABOUR ON THE PACIFIC RAILWAY—Moved—

PAGE

“ That the Government insert a clause in each and every contract let for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, that no man wearing his hair longer than five and one-half inches shall be deemed eligible for employment on said work, and that no person wearing his hair longer shall be eligible to any contract on said railroad, either by the engineers, employes, or any other person or persons so engaged on the said railroad, under penalty for the first offence of one hundred dollars, and not to exceed one thousand dollars for the second offence, or imprisonment for the first offence for three months, and not more than twelve months for the second offence.”—(Mr. Bunster.)

Motion negatived on a division..... 1207

PENSIONS FOR PUBLIC OFFICERS—Motion for Correspondence (Mr. DeCosmos)—
Motion agreed to..... 1211

RIVER ST. CHARLES IMPROVEMENTS—Motion for Statement (Mr. Blanchet)—
Motion agreed to..... 1211

AGRICULTURAL BANKS—Motion for Committee of the Whole to consider certain proposed resolutions (Mr. Thomson, Welland)—After explanation, debate adjourned on motion of Mr. Killam..... 1211

TUESDAY, MARCH 19TH.

Audit of Public Accounts Bill—

Introduced (Mr. Cartwright) and, after a short debate, read the first time [Bill 53]..... 1218

Calais and St. Stephen Railway Bridge Company Bill
[BILL 34]—

Order for second reading (Mr. Appleby) discharged, and Bill withdrawn.. 1219

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT—Moved—

“ That it is expedient to repeal Section 23 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1876, as respects all ships in Canadian waters, from and after the time which may be fixed for that purpose by the proclamation of the approval and confirmation by Her Majesty in Council of the Act to be passed for effecting such repeal.”—(Mr. Smith, Westmoreland.)

Motion agreed to..... 1219

DECKLOADS ACT AMENDMENT—Moved—

“ That it is expedient to provide that so much of the Act of the Parliament of Canada, passed in the thirty-sixth year of Her Majesty's Reign, and intituled an Act Respecting Deck Loads, as would make it lawful for any master of a ship, at certain seasons, to carry live stock on or above any part of the upper deck of such ship, be repealed, and that the words ‘any cargo of any description to any height exceeding three feet above deck,’ in the second section of the said Act, shall not include or apply to live stock.”—(Mr. Smith, Westmoreland.)

Motion agreed to..... 1220

Public Works Act Amendment Bill [BILL 13]—

After a short debate, Bill read the second time (Mr. Mackenzie)..... 1221

Independence of Parliament Bill [BILL 14]—

After debate, Bill read the second time (Mr. Laflamme)..... 1226

Post Office Act Amendment Bill [BILL 17]—

After a short debate, Bill read the second time (Mr. Huntington)..... 1258

Keewatin Municipalities Bill [BILL 23]—

Read the second time (Mr. Mills)..... 1262

| | PAGE |
|---|------|
| Railway Acts Extension (P.E.I.) Bill [BILL 38]— | |
| Read the second time, considered in Committee, read the third time and passed (Mr. Mackenzie)..... | 1262 |
| Stamps on Bills and Notes Bill [BILL 43]— | |
| After a short debate, read the second time (Mr. Laurier)..... | 1262 |
| — | |
| WEDNESDAY, MARCH 20TH. | |
| LANDS DAMAGED BY WATER—Question, Mr. Mitchell; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie. | 1268 |
| DAMAGES TO MILLS—Question, Mr. Mitchell; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie..... | 1269 |
| SERVICES OF THE LATE WILLIAM TAYLOR—Question, Mr. Lanthier; Answer, Mr. Mackenzie..... | 1269 |
| SUPERVISOR OF CULLERS' OFFICE—Question, Mr. Currier; Answer, Mr. Laurier. | 1269 |
| QUESTIONS BY MEMBERS—Remarks,..... | 1269 |
| DAILY MAIL BETWEEN BRITISH COLUMBIA AND PUGET SOUND—Motion for Correspondence (Mr. Thompson, Cariboo)—Motion agreed to..... | 1270 |
| PAYMENTS FOR PRINTING—Motion to refer Return (Mr. Dymond)—After a short debate, Motion agreed to. | 1271 |
| ST. JOHN'S BRIDGE, RIVER RICHELIEU—Motion for Correspondence (Mr. Desjardins)—Motion agreed to..... | 1273 |
| LOSSES BY FLOODS IN ST. ATHANASE PARISH—Motion for Correspondence (Mr. Desjardins)—After a short debate, Motion agreed to..... | 1273 |
| FISH-BREEDING ESTABLISHMENT AT MIRAMICHI—Motion for Report (Mr. Mitchell)—Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn..... | 1274 |
| DOMINION ACTIVE VOLUNTEER CORPS—Motion for Return (Mr. Stephenson)—Motion agreed to..... | 1274 |
| WINTER NAVIGATION OF THE ST. LAWRENCE—Moved— | |
| " That this House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a Resolution declaring it expedient that Government should be advised to take proper steps to test the possibility of navigating the St. Lawrence from Quebec to the ocean during the winter season."—(Mr. Fréchette)..... | 1275 |
| Debate suspended at Six o'clock. | |
| National Insurance Company Bill [BILL 8]— | |
| Read the third time and passed (Mr. Desjardins)..... | 1290 |
| Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company Bill [BILL 10]— | |
| Read the third time and passed (Mr. Casgrain)..... | 1290 |
| Ontario Mutual Life Insurance Company Bill [BILL 16]— | |
| Read the third time and passed (Mr. Bowell)..... | 1290 |
| Quebec Fire Assurance Company Bill [BILL 21]— | |
| Read the third time and passed (Mr. Taschereau)..... | 1290 |
| Bank of Liverpool Bill [BILL 22]— | |
| Read the third time and passed (Mr. Forbes)..... | 1290 |
| Grand Trunk Railway Company Bill [BILL 26]— | |
| Considered in Committee (Mr. Mitchell) | 1290 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

xxv

| | PAGE |
|---|-------------|
| Northern Railway Company of Canada Bill [BILL 27]— | |
| Considered in Committee (Mr. Cook) | 1290 |
| Canada Southern Railway Company Bill [BILL 6]— | |
| Considered in Committee (Mr. Thomson, Welland)..... | 1290 |
| CHANTRY ISLAND CONTRACT (SHERIFF SUTTON)—Personal Explanation (Mr. Landerkin) | 1303 |
| RONDEAU HARBOUR RETURN—Remarks | 1304 |
| Evidence in Common Assaults Bill [BILL 3]— | |
| Considered in Committee, read the third time and passed (Mr. Dymond)... | 1304 |

THURSDAY, MARCH 21st.

| | |
|---|-------------|
| Building Societies Act Amendment Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Gibbs, South Ontario) and read the first time [Bill 55]... | 1311 |
| QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE (PRESS CORRESPONDENCE)—Remarks..... | 1311 |
| Public Works Act Amendment Bill [BILL 13]— | |
| Considered in Committee, amended and reported (Mr Mackenzie)..... | 1317 |
| Independence of Parliament Bill [BILL 14]— | |
| Considered in Committee, amended and reported (Mr. Laflamme)..... | 1327 |

FRIDAY, MARCH 22ND.

| | |
|---|-------------|
| ADJOURNMENT FOR LADY DAY—Moved— | |
| “ That when the House adjourns this day it stand adjourned until Tuesday next.” | |
| Motion agreed to..... | 1359 |
| Controverted Elections Act Amendment Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. Haggart) and, after a short discussion, read the first time [Bill 56]..... | 1359 |
| IMPORTATION OF MALT—Moved— | |
| “ That it is expedient to repeal the duty of Customs imposed on Malt imported into Canada by the Act 40 Vic., Chap. 11, Sect. 2, and to provide that British and Foreign Malt, when imported into Canada, shall be immediately placed in a suitable bonding warehouse, provided at the cost of the importer, and approved as suitable for the purpose by a duly authorized Revenue officer, and being so warehoused shall be bonded under the Excise regulation then in force, in respect of Malt made in Canada, and shall be subject to the same restrictions; and when taken for consumption, shall be subject to the same duty as Malt made in Canada.” | |
| —(Mr. Laurier.) | |
| Motion agreed to..... | 1380 |
| QUEBEC PROVINCIAL CRISIS—Message from His Excellency submitting Addresses from the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec to the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada, respecting Ministerial Changes..... | 1380 |
| Northern Railway Company Bill [BILL 27]— | |
| After a slight amendment, read the third time and passed (Mr. Cook)..... | 1380 |

| | PAGE |
|---|------|
| Canada Southern Railway Company Bill [BILL 6]— | |
| Order for third Reading read (Mr Thomson , Welland) | 1380 |
| Motion in amendment (Mr. Macdougall , East Elgin) negatived on a division | 1380 |
| Motion in amendment (Mr. Macdougall , East Elgin) negatived on division. Yeas, 60; nays, 74..... | 1382 |
| Motion in amendment to amendment (Mr. Casey) negatived on a division. | 1382 |
| Motion in amendment (Mr. Stephenson) negatived on division. Yeas, 42; nays, 99 | 1383 |
| Bill read the third time and passed..... | 1384 |
| Montreal and City of Ottawa Junction Railway Company Bill— | |
| Introduced (Mr. McNab) and read the first time [Bill 57]..... | 1384 |
| Grand Trunk Railway Company Bill [BILL 26]— | |
| Considered in Committee, read the third time and passed (Mr. Mitchell). | 1384 |
| Keewatin Townships Municipalities Bill [BILL 23]— | |
| Considered in Committee (Mr. Mills)..... | 1384 |

DOMINION OF CANADA.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THE MINISTRY

OF THE

HON. ALEXANDER MACKENZIE,

AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE FIFTH SESSION OF THIRD PARLIAMENT, FEBRUARY 7, 1878.

| | |
|--|---------------------------------------|
| Minister of Public Works..... | Hon. ALEX. MACKENZIE, Prime Minister. |
| President of the Council..... | Vacant. |
| Minister of Justice and Attorney-General.. | Hon. R. LAFLAMME, Q.C. |
| Minister of Marine and Fisheries..... | Hon. ALBERT JAMES SMITH, Q.C. |
| Minister of Finance..... | Hon. RICHARD JOHN CARTWRIGHT. |
| Minister of Agriculture..... | Hon. C. A. P. PELLETIER. |
| Minister of the Interior..... | Hon. DAVID MILLS. |
| Minister of Customs..... | Hon. ISAAC BURPEE. |
| Receiver-General..... | Hon. THOMAS COFFIN. |
| Secretary of State and Registrar-General.. | Hon. RICHARD WILLIAM SCOTT, Q.C. |
| Postmaster-General..... | Hon. LUCIUS SETH HUNTINGTON, Q.C. |
| Minister of Inland Revenue..... | Hon. WILFRID LAURIER. |
| Minister of Militia and Defence..... | Hon. ALFRED GILPIN JONES. |

NEW MEMBERS SWORN.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1878.

| | |
|---|---|
| Digby —John C. Wade. | Nicolet —François Xavier Ovide Méthot. |
| Drummond and Arthabaska — Zéphirin | Northumberland —Hon. Peter Mitchell. |
| Désiré alias Olivier Désiré Bourbeau. | Ottawa —Joseph Merrill Currier. |
| Gloucester —Hon. Timothy Warren Anglin | Quebec Centre —Jacques Malouin. |
| Halifax —Hon. Alfred Gilpin Jones. | Quebec East —Hon. Wilfrid Laurier. |
| Lincoln —James Norris. | Restigouche —George Haddow. |

FRIDAY, APRIL 12, 1878.

New Westminster—Thomas Robert McInnes.

LIST OF MEMBERS

OF THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS

IN THE

FIFTH SESSION OF THE THIRD PARLIAMENT OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA.

ADDINGTON—Schuyler Shibley.
ALBERT—John Wallace.
ALGOMA—E. B. Borron.
ANNAPOLIS—William H. Ray.
ANTIGONISH—Angus McIsaac.
ARGENTEUIL—Thomas Christie.
BAGOT—Joseph Alfred Mousseau.
BEAUCE—Joseph Bolduc.
BEAUHARNOIS—Ulisse J. Robillard.
BELLECHASSE—Jos. Godéric Blanchet.
BERTHIER—E. Octavian Cuthbert.
BONAVENTURE—Hon. T. Robitaille.
BOTHWELL—Hon. David Mills.
BRANT, N. RIDING—Gavin Fleming.
BRANT, S. RIDING—William Paterson.
BROCKVILLE—Jacob Dockstader Buell.
BROME—Nathaniel Pettes.
BRUCE, N. RIDING—John Gillies.
BRUCE, S. RIDING—Hon. Ed. Blake.
CAPE BRETON— { William McDonald.
 { Newton L. Mackay.
CARDWELL—Dalton McCarthy.
CARLETON, (N. B.)—S. B. Appleby.
CARLETON, (O.)—John Rochester.
CARIBOO—Joshua Spencer Thompson.
CHAMBLY—Pierre Basile Benoit.
CHAMPLAIN—Hippolyte Montplaisir.
CHARLEVOIX—Hon. H. L. Langevin, C.B.
CHARLOTTE—Arthur H. Gillmor.
CHATEAUGUAY—Hon. L. H. Holton.
CHICOUTIMI and SAGUENAY—E. Cimon.

COLCHESTER—Thomas McKay.
COMPTON—Hon. John Henry Pope.
CORNWALL—Alexander F. Macdonald.
CUMBERLAND—Hon. C. Tupper, C.B.
DIGBY—John C. Wade.
DORCHESTER—François F. Rouleau.
DRUMMOND and ARTHABASKA—Olivier
 Desiré Bourbeau.
DUNDAS—William Gibson.
DURHAM, E. RIDING—Lewis Ross.
DURHAM, W. RIDING—H. W. Burk.
ELGIN, E. RIDING—Colin Macdougall.
ELGIN, W. RIDING—Geo. Elliott Casey.
ESSEX—William McGregor.
FRONTENAC—Geo. Airey Kirkpatrick.
GASPÉ—John Short.
GLENGARRY—Archibald McNab.
GLOUCESTER—Hon. T. W. Anglin.
GRENVILLE, S. RIDING—W. H. Brouse.
GREY, E. RIDING—William K. Flesher.
GREY, N. RIDING—George Snider.
GREY, S. RIDING—George Landerkin.
GUYSBOROUGH—John A. Kirk.
HALDIMAND—David Thompson.
HALIFAX— { Hon. Alfred G. Jones.
 { Patrick Power.
HALTON—William McCraney.
HAMILTON— { Æmilius Irving.
 { Andrew Trew Wood.
HANTS—Monson H. Goudge.

- HASTINGS, E. Riding—John White.
HASTINGS, N. Riding—M. Bowell.
HASTINGS, W. Riding—James Brown.
HOCHELAGA—Alphonse Desjardins.
HUNTINGDON—Julius Scriver.
HURON, Cen. Riding—Horace Horton.
HURON, N. Riding—Thomas Farrow.
HURON, S. Riding—Thos. Greenway.
IBERVILLE—François Béchard.
INVERNESS—Samuel MacDonnell.
JACQUES-CARTIER—Hon. R. Laflamme.
JOLIETTE—Louis François Geo. Baby.
KAMOURASKA—Charles François Roy.
KENT, (N.B.)—George McLeod.
KENT, (O.)—Rufus Stevenson.
KING'S (N.B.)—James Domville.
KING'S (N.S.)—Frederick W. Borden.
KING'S (P.E.I.)— { Hon. D. Davies.
 P. A. McIntyre.
KINGSTON—Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, K.C.B.
LAMBTON—Hon. Alex. Mackenzie.
LANARK, N. Riding—Daniel Galbraith.
LANARK, S. Riding—John G. Haggart.
LAPRAIRIE—Alfred Pinsonneault.
L'ASSOMPTION—Hilaire Hurteau.
LAVAL—Joseph Aldéric Ouimet.
LEEDS and GREENVILLE, N. Riding—Charles Frederick Ferguson.
LEEDS, S. Riding—David Ford Jones.
LENNOX—Hon. Richard J. Cartwright.
LÉVIS—Louis Honoré Fréchette.
LINCOLN—James Norris.
LISGAR—John Christian Schultz.
L'ISLET—Philippe Baby Casgrain.
LONDON—James Harshaw Fraser.
LOTBINIÈRE—Henry Bernier.
LUNENBURG—Charles Edward Church.
MARQUETTE—Joseph Ryan.
MASKINONGÉ—Louis Alphonse Boyer.
MEGANTIC—Edouard Emery Richard.
MIDDLESEX, E. Riding—D. Macmillan.
MIDDLESEX, N. Riding—R. C. Scatcherd.
MIDDLESEX, W. Riding—G. W. Ross.
MISSISQUOI—William Donahue.
MONCK—Lachlin McCallum.
MONTCALM—Firmin Dugas.
MONTMAGNY—Henri Thos. Taschereau.
MONTMORENCY—Jean Langlois.
MONTREAL, Centre—Bernard Devlin.
MONTREAL, East—Louis Amable Jetté.
MONTREAL, West—Thomas Workman.
MUSKOKA—Alexander Peter Cockburn.
NAPIERVILLE—Sixte Coupal dit La Reine.
NEW WESTMINSTER—Thos. R. McInnes.
NIAGARA—Josiah Burr Plumb.
NICOLET—François Xavier O. Méthot.
NORFOLK, N. Riding—John Charlton.
NORFOLK, S. Riding—William Wallace.
NORTHUMBERLAND, (N.B.)—Hon. Peter Mitchell.
NORTHUMBERLAND, (O.) E. Riding—James Lyons Biggar.
NORTHUMBERLAND, (O.) W. Riding—William Kerr.
ONTARIO, N. Riding—Wm. H. Gibbs.
ONTARIO, S. Riding—Hon. T. N. Gibbs.
OTTAWA (City)— { Jos. M. Currier.
 Pierre St. Jean.
OTTAWA (County)—Alonzo Wright.
OXFORD, N. Riding—Thomas Oliver.
OXFORD, S. Riding—James A. Skinner.
PEEL—Robert Smith.
PERTH, N. Riding—Andrew Monteith.
PERTH, S. Riding—James Trow.
PETERBOROUGH, E. Riding—Jas. Hall.
PETERBOROUGH, W. Riding—J. Bertram.
PICTOU— { James W. Carmichael.
 John A. Dawson.
PONTIAC—William McKay Wright.
PORTNEUF—Esdras A. De St. Georges.
PRESCOTT—Albert Hagar.
PRINCE, (P. E. I.)— { S. F. Perry.
 James Yeo.
PRINCE EDWARD—Walter Ross.
PROVENCHER—A. G. B. Bannatyne.
QUEBEC, Centre—Jacques Malotin.

- QUEBEC, East—Hon. Wilfred Laurier.
QUEBEC, West—Hon. Thos. McGreevy.
QUEBEC, (County)—P. A. Caron.
QUEEN'S (N.B.)—John Ferris.
QUEEN'S (N.S.)—James F. Forbes.
QUEEN'S (P.E.I.)— { Hon. J. C. Pope.
 Peter Sinclair.
- RENFREW, N. Riding—Peter White, jr.
RENFREW, S. Riding—J. L. McDougall.
RESTIGOUCHE—George Haddow.
RICHELIEU—George Isidore Barthe.
RICHMOND, (N.S.)—Edmond P. Flynn.
RICHMOND and WOLFE, Q.—Hon. Henry Aylmer, jun.
RIMOUSKI—J. B. Romuald Fiset.
ROUVILLE—Guillaume Cheval.
RUSSELL—Robert Blackburn.
- ST. HYACINTHE—Louis Delorme.
ST. JOHN, (N.B.) City— { Hon I. Burpee
 A. L. Palmer.
ST. JOHN, (N.B.) City and County—
 J. S. Boies De Veber.
ST. JOHN, (Q.)—François Bourassa.
ST. MAURICE—Charles Lajoie.
SELKIRK—Donald A. Smith.
SHEFFORD—Hon. L. S. Huntington.
SHELBURNE—Hon. Thomas Coffin.
SHERBROOKE—Edward Towle Brooks.
SIMCOE, N. Riding—Herman H. Cook.
SIMCOE, S. Riding—William C. Little.
SOULANGES—Jacques P. Lanthier.
STANSTEAD—Charles C. Colby.
STORMONT—Cyril Archibald.
SUNBURY—Charles Burpee.
- TÉMISCOUATA—Jean Baptiste Pouliot.
TEBREBONNE—Louis F. R. Masson.
THREE RIVERS—William McDougall.
TORONTO, Centre—John Macdonald.
TORONTO, East—Samuel Platt, sen.
TORONTO, West—Hon. J. B. Robinson.
TWO MOUNTAINS—Jean B. Daoust.
- VANCOUVER ISLAND—Arthur Bunster.
VAUDREUIL—Robert Harwood.
VERCHÈRES—Hon. Félix Geoffrion.
VICTORIA, (B.C.)— { Amor DeCosmos.
 Francis J. Roscoe.
VICTORIA, (N.B.)—John Costigan.
VICTORIA, (N.S.)—Charles J. Campbell.
VICTORIA, (O.) N. Riding—H. Cameron.
VICTORIA, (O.) S. Riding—A. McQuade.
- Waterloo, N. Riding—I. E. Bowman.
WATERLOO, S. Riding—James Young.
WELLAND—William A. Thomson.
WELLINGTON, Centre Riding—George Turner Orton.
WELLINGTON, N. Riding—Nathaniel Higinbotham.
WELLINGTON, S. Riding—D. Guthrie.
WENTWORTH, N. Riding—Thomas Bain.
WENTWORTH, S. Riding—Jos. Rymal.
WESTMORELAND—Hon. A. J. Smith.
- YALE—Edgar Dewdney.
YAMASKA—Charles Gill.
YARMOUTH—Frank Killam.
YORK, (N.B.)—John Pickard.
YORK, (O.) E. Riding—Jas. Metcalf.
YORK, (O.) N. Riding—A. H. Dymond.
YORK, (O.) W. Riding—David Blain.

ERRATA VOL. IV.

Page 76, 1st col., for Mr. Masson's remarks, substitute the following:—

"I have always objected to politicians speaking of religion in public meetings and on the hustings. I still object to it; it is a disgrace. The proper place to speak of religion is in the churches."

Page 81, 2nd col., line 32, for "courts" read "Grits."

Page 84, 2nd col., line 36, for "allowed" read

"Gave the Federal Government the power to allow or disallow."

Page 85, 2nd col., line 18, for "it" read "he."

do do 19, for "palace" read "lawyer."

do do for paragraph line 39 to 45, substitute the following:—

"The game was tried in the county of Soulanges. His friend the hon. member for Soulanges, had news of it and wrote a letter to know what Mr. Doutre, at Mr. Laflamme's request, had written them, and he got an answer which was published in the Minerve of the 3rd of July."

Page 85, 2nd col., for paragraph line 53 to 56, substitute the following:—

"After having done all that, they now declared that they had been always friendly to and in accord with Protestants."

Page 86, 1st col., line 27, for "treated him unjustly" read "traded and lived on religion."

Page 86, for paragraph 1st col., line 59 to 2nd col., line 2, substitute the following:—

"The Prime Minister, when in Opposition, used to say they could not pass through the lobbies without stumbling over Government employes."

Page 121, 2nd col., line 24, for "the scrutineer vote" read "a scrutiny of votes."

Page 121, 2nd col., line 27, for "started" read "stopped."

Page 568, 1st col., after line 39, insert

(Bill read the first time.)

Page 682, 1st col., in Bill No. 26, for "Mr. Mills" read "Mr. Mitchell."

Page 908, 1st col., line 46, after "lines" insert "from the United States."

Page 944, 2nd col., lines 7 and 46, for "DeCosmos" read "Costigan."

Page 1073, 2nd col., line 10, for "public" read "personal."

Page 1197, 1st col., line 29, for "$2,400" read "$3,400."

Page 1206, 2nd col., before Bills 47 and 49, insert "SECOND READINGS."

Page 1273, 1st col., at commencement of 1st and 3rd paragraphs, for "Sir John A. Macdonald" read "Mr. Tupper."

THE DEBATES

OF THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS OF CANADA

IN THE

FIFTH SESSION OF THE THIRD PARLIAMENT OF THE DOMINION OF CANADA, APPOINTED TO MEET FOR THE DESPATCH OF BUSINESS 7 FEBRUARY, 1878, IN THE FORTY-FIRST YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 7th Feb., 1878.

The Parliament which had been prorogued successively from the twenty-eighth day of April, 1877, and thence from time to time to the seventh day of February, 1878, met this day for the despatch of business.

The Members of the House being assembled,

A Message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:—

GENTLEMEN,

Sir William Buell Richards, Knight, Deputy Governor, desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate, when the Speaker of the Senate said:—

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate, and Gentlemen of the House of Commons:—

Sir William Buell Richards, Knight, Deputy Governor, does not see fit to declare the causes of summoning the present Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law, but to-morrow at three o'clock in the afternoon, the causes of calling this Parliament will be declared.

VACANCIES.

And the Members being returned,
The Clerk of the House, standing on the lower step below the Speaker's Chair, said:—

I

I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery copies of warrants showing vacancies which have occurred in the representation, namely:

Of the Hon. TIMOTHY WARREN ANGLIN, Speaker of the House and Member for the Electoral District of Gloucester, by resignation; of WILFRID LAURIER, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Drummond and Arthabaska, by acceptance of the office of Minister of Inland Revenue; of the Hon. JOSEPH EDOUARD CAUCHON, Member for the Electoral District of Quebec Centre, by acceptance of the office of Lieut.-Governor of the Province of Manitoba; of the Hon. ISIDORE THIBAudeau, Member for the Electoral District of Quebec East, by resignation.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Patrick, I conceive that you cannot, as Clerk of the House, undertake to perform the duty of Speaker, and to make these announcements. I object to your doing so. Your only duty is, if any member speaks, to point to him and mention his name.

The Clerk proceeded to announce the vacancies:

Of JOSEPH GAUDET, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Nicolet, by resignation; of GEORGE MOFFATT, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Restigouche, by resignation; of the Hon. WILLIAM B. VAIL, Member for the Electoral District of Digby, by resignation; of ALFRED G. JONES, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Halifax, by resignation; of the Hon. PETER MITCHELL, Member for the Electoral District of Northumberland, N.B., by resignation; and of JAMES CUNNINGHAM, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of New Westminster, by resignation.

ELECTION OF NEW MEMBERS.

The Clerk also announced that he had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, certificates of the election and return of the following Members, viz. :—

Of the Hon. TIMOTHY WARREN ANGLIN, for the Electoral District of Gloucester; of JOSEPH MERRILL CURRIER, Esq., for the Electoral District of the City of Ottawa; of JAMES NORRIS, Esq., for the Electoral District of the County of Lincoln; of ZEPHIRIN DÉSIRÉ alias OLIVIER DÉSIRÉ BOURBEAU, Esq., for the Electoral District of Drummond and Arthabaska; of JACQUES MALOUIN, Esq., for the Electoral District of Quebec Centre; of the Hon. WILFRID LAURIER, for the Electoral District of Quebec East; of FRANÇOIS XAVIER OVIDE MÉTHOT, Esq., for the Electoral District of Nicolet; of GEORGE HADDOW, Esq., for the Electoral District of Restigouche; of JOHN C. WADE, Esq., for the Electoral District of Digby; and of the Hon. ALFRED G. JONES, for the Electoral District of Halifax.

NEW MEMBERS.

The following Members having previously taken the oath according to law, and subscribed the roll containing the same, took their seats in the House, viz. :—

Hon. TIMOTHY WARREN ANGLIN, Member for the Electoral District of Gloucester; ZEPHIRIN DÉSIRÉ alias OLIVIER DÉSIRÉ BOURBEAU, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Drummond and Arthabaska; JOSEPH MERRILL CURRIER, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the City of Ottawa; GEORGE HADDOW, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Restigouche; Hon. ALFRED G. JONES, Member for the Electoral District of Halifax; Hon. WILFRID LAURIER, Member for the Electoral District of Quebec East; JACQUES MALOUIN, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Quebec Centre; FRANÇOIS XAVIER OVIDE MÉTHOT, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Nicolet; JAMES NORRIS, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the County of Lincoln; and JOHN C. WADE, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Digby.

Hon. PETER MITCHELL having presented the duplicate of the indenture of his election for the Electoral District of Northumberland, N.B., to the Clerk of the House, and having taken the oath according to law, and subscribed the roll containing the same, took his seat in the House.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Patrick, I beg to move, Sir, seconded by Mr. A. J. Smith,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

“That the Honourable Timothy Warren Anglin do take the Chair of this House as Speaker.”

I need only say, in making that motion, that I believe I am expressing the opinions of the entire House when I say that that hon. gentleman gave the most entire satisfaction when he occupied the chair of this House, and that I think I am consulting the general interests in making the motion I now place in your hands.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I regret very much that the hon. gentleman opposite has made this motion. I regret it on public grounds. I regret that, under the circumstances which we all know as members of this House—except, perhaps, the new members—this motion was made, especially by the head of the Government and the head of this House. The Speaker, Mr. Clerk, is chosen to sit judicially between the parties. He is to free himself from all political connection, and therefore the rule in England—the wise rule and practice in England—has been, although unfortunately we have not introduced it into this country, and we now see more than ever the disadvantage of not following English precedent, that the Speaker is not to be nominated by a member of the Government. This practice has not been introduced here, where the rule has always been that the Speaker has been proposed by the Government and considered as a Government candidate. We now see, in this case, the wisdom of the English rule and the impolicy of our having departed from it. I think it would have been well if the Government under the circumstances—having felt it their duty to support the motion, if not themselves to call for the motion, by which a vacancy took place in the county of Gloucester, had not made the present proposition—but had left the House to deal with it. I shall call the attention of this assembly, for it is scarcely yet to be called a House, to a Parliamentary rule, or a question of constitutional practice as to whether the members now sitting here have the power to elect Mr. Anglin. I shall try to speak in a judicial spirit, because it is not of so much importance that any individual member should be ected Speaker, as it is that the practice and rules and law of Parliament should be observed. If this had been the first Session of a Parliament, and if, as was the case in the first Session of this Parliament, the majority or at least a large number of the members were new to Parliament, and there might be a difficulty in choosing a member to be Speaker who had sufficient Parliamentary experience, then there might be a reason for selecting a man who had experience of the practice of Parliament. But this is the last, or, at all events, the fifth Session of this Parliament, and those who have been here before have had sufficient training during four Sessions to be able to fill the office of Speaker creditably. Therefore, there was no necessity for this motion being made by the hon. gentleman. He might have found in the ranks of the House, and in the ranks of those who accord him their confidence, many gentlemen who might have filled the office as creditably as the late Speaker, against whom I do not wish to say anything in his character of Speaker. I think, therefore, it is unfortunate that the motion should have been made, and the hon. gentleman must know that it is rather straining the rules of Parliament to take this course. It is setting a precedent, setting aside the old rules of Parliament and the precedents which have been established by the wisdom of centuries, simply because the hon. gentleman prefers one particular individual over all the members of this House. If there were no other person fit for the duties, or as fit for the duties, there might be some justification or excuse for the motion. But, Sir, I contend that we, the members here, are but a crowd until we have, as the old phrase was, the mouth of Parliament. Until we have a Speaker, we are but an assemblage of members of Parliament, meeting in the hope and belief that, in accordance with the summons of the Crown, we will be constituted a House. We are not a House as yet. We must proceed according to the rules of Parliament. We cannot suspend the rules of this House, or rather of this assembly, which will be a House; and, in saying assembly instead of House, I think it will be found that, in the time when the privileges of Parliament were perhaps more looked at, and more carefully scanned than at any other time—during the existence of the Long Parliament and the protectorate of Oliver Cromwell—that a case arose when the House declared that, the Speaker being absent from illness, they were a mere assembly, and they entered on the records that, divers members of the House having met in assembly, and no Speaker being there, they could not even move an adjournment, but ex necessitate they dispersed. They came again next day, and a member was desirous of leaving to attend a lawsuit, which, as he said, was of the greatest possible consequence to the State, and in those days no man could leave without the special permission of the House. The members said that by connivance they might allow him to go, but that without their Mouth they could not even give him leave of absence. And, Sir, we have a rule, the 120th Rule, I think, of our House, which says:—

“In all unprovided cases, the rules, usages and forms of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, shall be followed.”

This is an unprovided case, and the rule, the practice of the Parliament of England, the Commons of England, must be followed. Now, what is the rule of the Parliament and House of Commons of England that was established years ago? On the 23rd of February, 1688, it was resolved that the ancient order be observed, that upon new members coming into the House, they be introduced to the Table between two members, making their obeisances as they come up, that they may be better known to the House. That rule was in 1688 resolved upon, and repeated the ancient rule, as it is expressed, that whenever new members were introduced, they should come into the House and be introduced to the Chamber between two members. We cannot set aside that rule. The House of Commons of this country, as the House of Commons in England, is to a very great extent master of its own rules; with the Speaker in the Chair, it can, upon due notice being given, alter any of its rules, or, by unanimous consent, set aside its own rules, and without such unanimous consent, even when the House is fully constituted, it cannot set aside those rules. But here we are no House; we cannot suspend any rules; we must carry out the practice of Parliament; we are obliged to carry out the practice of Parliament; and any act we take which is not in accordance with the Act of Parliament is illegal and invalid. The rule is, therefore, upon new members coming into the House, that they be introduced to the table between two members, making their obeisances as they come up, in order that they may be better known to the House. It was—I have no doubt it will be mentioned—stated, perhaps, that we have set aside that rule in this House and allowed members to take their seats without being introduced to the Table. You all can remember, or those who were in the House during the last two or three Sessions, the course of our practice in that respect; and I say that there are cases in which the House of Commons could, by unanimous consent, suspend the rule. We have had that power, but we cannot now make a new rule. We cannot now suspend the rule. We must now carry out the rules of Parliament as we left them at the end of last Session. Had we a Speaker, and had any of the numerous gentlemen who were elected since last Session, by the unanimous consent of the House taken their seats, then, of course, the rule is not altered, but it is dispensed with for the occasion, by the unanimity which so often enables Parliament to set aside a rule without repealing it. Such a rule is not repealed. It still exists, and as long as it exists it must be the only governing principle, and the only governing principle which is to be used at this moment. It may be said, Mr. Clerk, that this rule does not apply to the hon. member for Gloucester who is now proposed for Speaker, and that as to the rule respecting new members coming into the House and being introduced to the Table, he is not a new member, that the House knows him, that he cannot be better known than he has been, and, therefore, that this rule does not apply to him. Well, Mr. Anglin—I may use his name, because his name is mentioned in the motion—is either a new member or an old member. That is quite clear. If he be a new member, he must be introduced between two members, under this rule, before he can take his seat in this House; and if he is not a member of this House, the practice in Parliament goes to show that he cannot be elected Speaker. But he is not a new member, he is an old member. Then I would call the attention of the House to the 45th clause of the British North America Act, which provides that in case of a vacancy happening in this office of Speaker, by death, by resignation or otherwise, the House of Commons shall, with all practicable speed, proceed to elect another of its members to be Speaker. If he is a new member he must be introduced, and until introduced he cannot be elected as Speaker; if he is an old member, and, by death, by resignation or otherwise, his seat is vacated, another member must be elected by the express words of the clause I have mentioned. There is no way of getting over that. There is the law of the land; you may discuss what was the actuating cause which induced the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, of the United Kingdom, to pass this clause; but there is the law, that in case of vacancy by death, by resignation or otherwise, such a course must be taken. Well, this vacancy is not occasioned by death, I am glad to say, for the sake of us all; it is not occasioned by resignation of the Speakership; but it has been occasioned otherwise, by resignation of the seat, which involved the loss of the Speakership. It comes under the third of the instances in which there is a vacancy, and when the House is to elect another of its members Speaker. Now, by no possible argument can another of its members be made to mean the same member. If a new member, he cannot be elected in his absence; he cannot take his seat until introduced; and, therefore, under that clause, under the rule of 1688, he cannot take his seat; while, if an old member, and if that rule does not apply to him, then another member, and not the same member, must be elected and take his seat as Speaker. But, in respect to this rule, the question is whether we can dispense with it. Sir, the House of Commons the other day, in the Kenealy case, thought that it was a matter of the very greatest difficulty, with a Speaker in the chair. One would have thought that, if it was a matter of but little importance, he might take his seat as sundry members have done to-day, and that the act might pass sub silentio. But, when Dr. Kenealy presented himself, he could not get, as we all know, in the whole House of Commons, two gentlemen to introduce him; and this shows the very high standard, and the very correct standard, that prevails in the Imperial House of Commons. The question then arose there whether the rule should operate so strongly as to prevent a man, with all Dr. Kenealy's faults, with all Dr. Kenealy's supposed delinquencies, taking his seat; whether a man could be kept out of his seat after having been elected by the people, because he really could not get two men, an introducer and a seconder, to introduce him. That point was discussed, and the debate was a very interesting one, showing the importance which the House of Commons in England attaches to the Constitution and to the maintaining of the old rule that, whenever a member was elected, he should be introduced by two members. And the necessity of the case was such that Mr. Disraeli, then at the head of the Government, moved that the resolution of 1688, which I have mentioned, should be dispensed with on that occasion, because the Speaker announced, when Mr. Kenealy presented himself to take his seat, that he (the Speaker) was obliged to carry out the rules of Parliament.

"Mr. Edward Vaughan Kenealy, who had been returned to the House for the Borough of Stoke-upon-Trent, in the room of Mr. Melly, who had accepted the office of Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds, came to the table to be sworn without being introduced by two members according to custom, whereupon Mr. Speaker said: I have to point out to the hon. member that, according to the uniform practice of this House, when a new member comes into the House for the first time, it is usual that he should be introduced by two members of the House, and I have to ask him whether two members of this House are prepared to so introduce him according to the practice of the House."

Mr. Kenealy said:—

"I am aware, Mr. Speaker, of the practice of the House; at the same time I am not aware of any law or any rule which deprives the House of the right of administering the oath to me, as member for the Borough of Stoke-upon-Trent."

Mr. Kenealy then went on to argue the case, and Mr. Speaker said:—

"I have to call the attention of the House to a resolution of this House on the 23rd of February, 1688 with reference to this practice. It is recorded in the Journals of this House in these terms:—

"The House being informed that it was an ancient form and custom of the House, that upon new members coming into the House, they be introduced to the table between two members, making their obeisances as they go up, that they may be the better known to the House,—Resolved, that said order and custom be for the future observed."

"This resolution has been invariably acted upon by this House up to this time. I have had diligent search made in the Journals of the House and I do not find that any departure from the practice has ever been sanctioned. The House will observe that the object of the Resolution appears to be to identify the member. It is my duty in this chair to see the Resolutions of this House enforced; but, should the House think fit upon this special occasion to dispense with its former Resolution, it will give the necessary directions.

"Mr. Kenealy: Am I to understand, Mr. Speaker, that you will not hear me on this matter?"

"Mr. Speaker: While a question of this nature affecting the conduct or action of a member is under consideration, it is in accordance with the practice of the House that the hon. member should withdraw."

I, however, do not request the withdrawal of the hon. member for Gloucester, who is in the House at this moment. Mr. Kenealy withdrew and Mr. Disraeli said:—

"I hope, Sir, that in this case the ordinary rules will not be enforced. The identity of the new member cannot, I believe, be questioned. Although for myself I think the rule in question an excellent rule, and it is one which I trust will be strictly observed in the future, yet I think there are circumstances connected with the present case which render it desirable that we should not insist upon its enforcement. I beg to move that the rule be on this occasion dispensed with."

The motion was made and the question was carried, that such resolution of the House be dispensed with on this occasion. So that, if that special motion had not been made, and the rule not dispensed with, Dr. Kenealy, although the elected member for the borough of Stoke-upon-Trent, could not by any possibility have taken his seat. That case is in all essentials similar to the present one, and it seems to me it is out of the question that this motion can be adopted in accordance with the law and practice of Parliament, and it is of the more consequence that the law and practice of Parliament be sustained in this country, having a subordinate jurisdiction, than in the Parliament of the United Kingdom. There they are the supreme and paramount authority. There, by an old prescribed right, the House of Commons, through descended privileges, decides upon rules, unless disputed in the House of Lords and vice versa; these matters were thus disposed of and settled long ago, and for all practical purposes, it may be said, both the House of Commons and the House of Lords in England settle their own practice, and there is no appeal from the highest court of jurisdiction in the world. We all know that the Supreme Court taught us the other a day a lesson which, as every lawyer knows, we did not require to be taught, viz., that we have only statutory jurisdiction; that we are created; that Colonial Legislatures have occupied such a position ever since the great case of Kelly vs. the Speaker of the House of Assembly of Newfoundland; that we are the creatures of the statute, and that we have none of those prescribed rights which belong, from mere prescription, to the Parliament of England—to the House of Commons and the House of Lords. We must go by rule; we must go by law, and we must go according to the law, and our rights; our position, if we go against the law and contrary to law, will always be liable to be disputed. I will give an instance. Suppose we illegally elect a Speaker, and suppose that this Speaker, while acting illegally as Speaker, hereafter orders warrants to issue to enforce the demands of this House, and parties outside bring action of trespass and false imprisonment under the Speaker's warrant, then the whole question of the legality, the whole question of the validity of the election of Speaker can be brought up, can be adjudicated upon, and may be decided against this House and against the order of this House, and against the appointments of this House. Why then, Mr. Clerk, I would say, should we run any such risks as these? It is of no great importance who presides in this Chair if he be a competent member of Parliament, and a man of experienced competency. I do not deny the competence of the gentleman proposed, and I am not disposed to do so; but I say, at least, when a good man of equal competence can be found, when the Premier can find a man of superior competence, in my opinion, in his own ranks and among his own supporters, and thus give a feeling of confidence to the House. Why does he not adopt that alternative? At the time when the election of Speaker was proposed in the Session of 1874, I took the liberty of stating that I thought there was one principal supporter of the Administration who, from his great experience, from his prominence in knowledge of Parliamentary practice, would have been and ought to have been selected—I mean my hon. friend the member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton.) Why was not this done by the hon. gentleman opposite; and why did he (Mr. Mackenzie) not now attempt to relieve the House from this difficulty by nominating that hon. gentleman; and he cannot refuse if he is nominated and elected. No member can refuse to act if elected Speaker by this House. Every member is bound to obey the order of the House, even if he does so against his will. I do not know what may be the feeling of the hon. member for Chateauguay on this point, but I am quite sure that his known sense of duty would impress upon him the necessity to relieve the House, and to prevent questions of this kind from being raised, and that he would sacrifice his own sense of ease and his desire to remain on the floor of the House, and would accept that position. I regret very much the fact that a course of that kind has not been adopted by the hon. gentleman opposite. My hon. friend here calls my attention to the fact that the present nominee of the hon. gentleman opposite expressed strongly his opinion, while in possession of the chair as Speaker, as to the necessity of knowing that the rule should be strictly observed and the House knowing that it was strictly observed; but, whether strictly observed or not, whether the rule was set aside by universal consent or by no one taking objection to it or not, is a matter of no importance. The House could set aside and suspend the rule just as the House of Commons in England suspended the rule in the Kenealy case, and this assemblage of members—for it is not yet a House, not yet having a head, and not yet having a mouthpiece, cannot take any such duty, any such responsibility, upon itself. They have no power, they have no such authority; and if they do so, the invalidity may crop up in the most inconvenient way, at the most inconvenient season, and without any reason at all for it. Now Mr. Clerk, having spoken upon this point, I must say that I feel so strongly upon it that I shall ask for the votes to be taken in the House upon this resolution, in order that we may stand before the country as not yielding in any way to an unconstitutional and an unparliamentary proposition. Then, Sir, as to the appointment itself. I regret extremely that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Anglin) should have been nominated. I regret extremely the fact that this hon. gentleman should have been chosen by the Government as their nominee. I regret extremely that this same Government, having felt it their duty to support, as far as they could support, the ground taken that the hon. gentleman had forfeited his seat by becoming a Government contractor, should now press that appointment. I remember the discussion—we all must remember that discussion, that unpleasant discussion of last Session, that disagreeable discussion of last Session, upon these points, and we can remember especially the argument of the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) when the Government was attacked by the resolution introduced by the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell). And something essentially like it was moved from the Government side regarding their course with respect to the Speaker. Then the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Blake's) argument—and a very ingenious argument it was, and all his arguments are so—was, that the Government was not in fault, but that the Speaker was in fault; that the Government had a right to give to any hon. gentleman in this House a contract, because the moment he became a contractor that moment he ceased to be a member of this House, and was civilly dead, and actually dead as a member of this House; and, therefore, the giving to a member of this House of a contract, was certainly not corrupting that member, but the fact of the acceptance of such contract deprived the acceptor of his position as member; and, therefore, the Government was free from censure, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) at the same time passed the strongest possible censure on the Speaker, when he, in effect, said that he, sitting in that chair, he, the pronouncer of rulings in this House, he, the chief organ and the mouth-piece of Parliament, pretended to be a member of Parliament, while, according to the law properly laid down by the hon. gentleman from South Bruce, he was no more a member, as I said before, and had no more right to interfere with the proceedings of this House than the pages who run about carrying the letters. So he was a stranger in this House, and was open to the censure that I think was properly attributed to him by those who voted on that occasion for the motion of my hon. friend from North Hastings (Mr. Bowell). And that censure will now be felt through all the country with redoubled force, and the course taken by the Government will be considered as even infinitely more censurable, in now attempting to fill up this office in this manner, than its original course. It was said on that occasion, by the hon. the Minister of Finance, that this matter was not discovered for some time; that it was a mistake of the Post Office Department; that the Government was not aware of it until January, 1876, and that the moment the error was discovered, the practice was stopped. But we all felt then, Sir, that this statement aggravated the cause, the reason of the censure which was included in the motion then before the House; for, if in January, 1876, the Government found out that they had been committing a breach of the law of Parliament in giving contracts to a member of this House, and if, on having found out that they had committed this breach of the law, they ceased these contracts, they must also have known, and they did know, that from the 1st of January, 1876, and before that time, the then Speaker of this House had forfeited his seat in the House and his seat in Parliament, and yet was continuing in the House until the end of the Session of 1877. The Government who had admitted that they had found out there were improper practices going on, and that they had found that this hon. gentleman (Mr. Speaker), in becoming a Government contractor, had forfeited his seat, had kept him in his place, concealing from the House, concealing from the country, and concealing from everybody, knowledge of the fact that the hon. gentleman who sat in the Speaker's chair—he, the judge, he, the arbitrator, he, the arbiter, he who decided between right and wrong, he who decided between one side of the House and the other, he who was to hold the balance of justice equally between all the members of the House—was no member of Parliament at all, and no Speaker at all. The Government did so, and they continued this course until the matter was forced upon them by the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Bowell), passing censure on them for their supineness. We supposed it was supineness, but, when we got that admission, we learned that it was not supineness, that they were aware of it, and yet, after they knew of it, and after they knew that the Speaker had forfeited his seat in the House, and after they knew he was no longer Speaker of this House, they kept him there, and retained him in the Chair contrary to every law of Parliamentary practice, and contrary to everything like propriety or decency, and they are now attempting to replace him in that position. Sir, the Speaker should be like Cæsar's wife, not only pure, but free from suspicion. How can we suppose that the Speaker who sat in that Chair for two years after he must have been told that the contracts were stopped, and after he was told by the hon. gentleman opposite that his dealings with the Post Office Department were improper and illegal, and within the description of Parliamentary corruption, can hold the balance of justice equally hereafter. Mr. Clerk, it occurs to me that the answer which will be given to this by the country, at all events, will be that the Government has not had the magnanimity to admit that they are wrong, nor the magnanimity to admit that they committed an error, nor the magnanimity to say: "We did make a mistake, and we committed a great error, but we will not commit it again." But how do we find it? The point I take, and it is a point, I think, which cannot be answered, is that this House of Parliament cannot dispense with the rule, cannot dispense with any rule, cannot alter in the slightest degree any rule of Parliament. They have no right to dispense with the rule; no right to change its effect. They must be governed by that in every respect. And yet the hon. gentleman moves, in effect, to dispense with the rule in order to continue the original wrong done in keeping the hon. gentleman in the chair as Speaker, and moves that a Parliamentary principle should be broken for the purpose of carrying out his original proposition made in January, 1874. Sir, it looks something like power gone mad. The hon. gentleman seems to have lost his head, and thinks, because he has a majority, that he can set aside every rule; that he can set aside every principle of reason. It will ring through the country. It will ring from one end of Canada to the other. It has rung through the country, as the hon. gentleman knows, and it will continue to ring through the country, and the course the hon. gentleman is taking will tend to intensify the feeling in the country, as I think will be shown unmistakably, by every means by which we can understand that the feelings and opinions of the people can be judged. The hon. gentleman is starting out on the same old principle. The hon. gentleman kept him (Mr. Anglin) in the chair after he ceased to be a member, and the hon. gentleman is going to force him into the chair before he is a member, for he is not a member until he is introduced here. Yet this is the course taken by the hon. gentleman, and I say there must be a termination to a course of this kind. I say that the hon. gentleman is, as it were, delivering himself into the hands of his enemies by making this proposition when there was no necessity for it whatever. On every ground, Mr. Clerk, I oppose this motion, and especially on the ground that, until introduced, according to the rules of Parliament, with the Speaker in the chair, no member can take his seat. I say, moreover, that the hon. member might have been introduced with the Speaker in the chair, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had chosen to follow the principles and practice of Parliament; for the hon. gentleman might have so managed as to have had a Speaker elected and the hon. member for Gloucester introduced, the Speaker thereafter resigning and the hon. member being appointed. But the hon. gentleman has not adopted that course, but is now trying to carry this motion at the point of the bayonet, and to override all Parliamentary practice and constitutional law. He will find, however, that this is a free country, and that it does not understand arbitrary government even at the hands of the Parliament of Canada. Mr. Clerk, I shall call for a division of the House on this resolution.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Patrick, I never was more astonished at any speech I ever heard than at that just delivered. The hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) has endeavoured to prove that no one can be a member of this House until he has not only taken the oaths in the customary way, but until he is introduced into the House before the Speaker, or rather introduced to the Speaker of the House. The whole force of the hon. gentleman's argument is this: he says that no one is a member,—that Mr. Anglin is not a member because he has not been introduced to the Speaker, and not being a member is not capable of being elected to any position which an hon.

member might hold. That is the ground which the right hon. member for Kingston has distinctly stated. Therefore, every one who has entered the House, either to-day or any other day, is not a member of the House until he is introduced. Now, Sir, what will you say, what will hon. gentlemen in this House say, when I tell them that the hon. member (Sir John A. Macdonald) was never introduced? Yet we have been compelled by hon. gentlemen opposite to listen to a speech of nearly an hour from a person who, according to his own showing, has no business here, and is not a member of this House. If other hon. gentlemen have no position here, what gives to the right hon. member for Kingston a standing? Is he to set aside by the mere force of his power, whatever it may be, rules which the rest of the House must obey? The right hon. gentleman knows that all his speech has no foundation in real argument. What is to be looked to is the broad ground, whether a member has obtained the sanction of the people by being elected, whether the member has properly taken the oaths and is here present. Why, Sir, the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) rose in his place last Session to excuse an hon. member who entered the House, not only without being introduced, but without taking the oaths. The right hon. gentleman never made a motion to expel the hon. member for his misconduct, but the House allowed that the hon. member's position was one capable of explanation because the hon. member was able to show he had been properly elected. The first element in regard to the position of a member of this House is that he shall have been properly elected, and the hon. member who, unwittingly, no doubt, violated the rules of the House in taking his seat without being sworn, was able to show that he had been duly elected. Now, Sir, let me deal with the argument proper of the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald). He says that the 120th Rule of our Standing Orders says, that, in all unprovided cases, the rules, usages and forms of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, shall be followed. But, Sir, the rule in Great Britain is that a member must be sworn before the Speaker. Our rule is that he is not required to be sworn before the Speaker, but he is sworn before the Clerk, upon producing his indenture; he is sworn, therefore, not before this House at all, and, that being a departure in what forms the very essence of the argument, a departure in our rules from what obtains in England, the rules entirely fall through; because, a member once elected, once sworn, and the documents verifying his election having been deposited with the proper officer, he takes his position as a member of this House; and there is no power vested in you, Mr. Patrick, or in the Speaker of the House, if there were a Speaker in the chair, to set aside that gentleman's election and compel his exclusion until he has been introduced in the manner indicated. That matter of introduction was discussed here as a mere form which might or might not be dispensed with. We know that the right hon. member for Kingston, who claims to be a constitutional authority—and I admit he is—set aside this rule. He believed it was not necessary: he believed it was a mere form that might or might not be observed, and he gave the strongest proof of his faith in that position by himself declining to be introduced.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is not the position I took.

MR. MACKENZIE: I hope the right hon. gentleman was not in the position of Dr. Kenealy, who could not find two members to introduce him. The right hon. gentleman has spent a long time in telling us that this is a rule which must of necessity be observed; and yet he himself did not observe it. He thought it was quite unnecessary in the case of Sir John A. Macdonald, but quite necessary in the case of Timothy Warren Anglin. The privileges of the House, the liberties of the people are all at stake, because Timothy Warren Anglin is not required to do what the right hon. member for Kingston was not required to do in his own estimation. But the right hon. gentleman, if his theory were carried out, might disfranchise a very large proportion of the members of this House; he proposes to disfranchise a dozen members here, and there might have been a great many more.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: As it is in England every Session.

MR. MACKENZIE: The circumstances are wholly different.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The practice is all the same.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have shown that the rule in England is not the same. The rule with regard to the swearing in of members is this: As soon as the House is elected, and the House meets, and is authorized to proceed, the Speaker himself first alone standing on the upper step of the chair, takes the oath of allegiance and supremacy, and takes and subscribes the oath of abjuration, and also delivers to the Clerk of the House a statement of his qualification, and makes and subscribes a declaration that he is duly qualified, in which ceremony he is followed by the other members who are present. The Speaker is elected by the members before a single one has taken the oath. In the language of the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), they were no House, they were a mere assemblage, and though he says the oath was necessary in every case to constitute them a House, yet they were constituted a House and elected a Speaker before any one had taken the oath. Notwithstanding all this, the right hon. gentleman endeavours to apply the rules in England to us,—rules which are wholly inapplicable under the circumstances. I shall not show the bad taste the right hon. gentleman has exhibited in discussing matters which were fully discussed last Session, in regard to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Anglin) whom I have proposed to take the chair. I shall not introduce any discussion of that kind, but confine myself strictly to the object which we all have in view, the organization of the House in a proper manner. I have thought much over this affair, and I am quite satisfied that the course we have proposed—that I have proposed as leading the House—is the only one that could properly be proposed. But I may be permitted, perhaps, to cite an authority in favour of it. Sir Erskine May, on being informed of the position of the matter, writes thus :

MR. MACKENZIE.

“It appears to me that as there are official records of the resignation of his seat by the Speaker, of his re-election and of his having duly taken the oath, the Clerk, in the absence of the Speaker, may properly communicate those records to the House. It is not improbable that objections may be raised to any departure from the accustomed course of proceedings; but, I cannot but think, it is justified by the exceptional circumstances of the present case.”

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There must be a correspondence from which the hon. gentleman has read, and I would like to have the whole correspondence brought down.

MR. MACKENZIE: I cannot give the whole correspondence. I have no objection that the right hon. gentleman should see the correspondence.

MR. MASSON: Another point of order is this; the hon. gentleman, who is citing precedents in England, well knows that, when papers are read, they must be deposited on the table of the House of Commons.

MR. MACKENZIE: We will discuss that by-and-bye. In the meantime, I think I have shown sufficiently clearly that the circumstances under which the House meets in Canada are wholly different from those under which the House of Commons in England meets; that it would be impossible for us, in fact, to act under the rules of the House of Commons in England, and that members being sworn are entitled to enter the House and take their seats. I am very glad—although I do not always follow his lead and accept his authority—to be able to cite the distinguished example of the right hon. member for Kingston in favour of the view I have taken, because the right hon. gentleman acted upon this interpretation of Parliamentary law which I now submit; and it is because he acted upon that interpretation he is able now to address the House upon this subject, although, taking his own argument, he has no right to be here at all, far less to address the House.

Question put.

MR. MASSON: I rise to a point of order. I think the House is about to commit a serious error. A rule in the English House of Commons is this, that there cannot be a vote taken on the question of the appointment of a Speaker unless there is more than one member proposed. I, therefore, object to a vote being taken, and I ask a ruling from the chair on this point.

MR. MITCHELL: There seems to be some doubt, from the statements made, whether I, not having been introduced and presented to the Speaker, have a right to sit here. I shall, therefore, withdraw to place myself in a correct position, and, as soon as a Speaker is appointed, I will then come in.

Mr. Mitchell then withdrew.

Motion agreed to on the following Division:—

| YEAS : | |
|-------------------|--------------------------------|
| Messieurs | |
| Appleby | Jetté |
| Archibald | Jones (Halifax) |
| Aylmer | Kerr |
| Bain | Killam |
| Barthe | Kirk |
| Bécharde | Lafamme |
| Bernier | Lajoie |
| Bertram | Landerkin |
| Biggar | Langlois |
| Blackburn | Laurier |
| Blain | Macdonald (Cornwall) |
| Blake | Macdonald (Centre Toronto) |
| Bolduc | MacDonnell |
| Borden | Macdougall (E. Elgin) |
| Borrón | McDougall (South Ren- frew) |
| Bourassa | MacKay (Cape Breton) |
| Bowman | Mackenzie |
| Boyer | McCraney |
| Brouse | McGregor |
| Brown | McIsaac |
| Buell | McNab |
| Burk | Malouin |
| Burpee (St. John) | Metcalfe |
| Burpee (Sunbury) | Mills |
| Cartwright | Norris |
| Casey | Oliver |
| Casgrain | Paterson |
| Charlton | Perry |
| Cheval | Pettes |
| Christie | Pickard |
| Church | Pope (Queens, P.E.I.) |
| Church | Pouliot |
| Cockburn | Power |
| Coffin | Ray |
| Cook | Robillard |
| Coupal | Ross (East Durham) |
| Dawson | Ross (West Middlesex) |
| DeCosmos | Ross (Prince Edward) |
| Delorme | Ryan |
| De St. Georges | Rymal |
| Devlin | Scatcherd |
| Dymond | Shibley |
| Ferris | Sinclair |
| Fiset | Skinner |
| Fleming | |
| Flynn | |
| Forbes | |

| | |
|------------|----------------------|
| Galbraith | Smith (Peel) |
| Geoffrion | Smith (Selkirk) |
| Gibson | Smith (Westmoreland) |
| Gillies | Snider |
| Gillmor | St. Jean |
| Greenway | Taschereau |
| Haddow | Thompson (Haldimand) |
| Hagar | Thomson (Welland) |
| Hall | Trow |
| Holton | Wallace (Albert) |
| Horton | Wood |
| Huntington | Yeo |
| Irving | Young.—116. |

NAYS :

Messieurs

| | |
|-----------------------|------------------------|
| Baby | McDougall (Three Riv.) |
| Benoit | McKay (Colchester) |
| Blanchet | McCallum |
| Bowell | McCarthy |
| Brooks | McQuade |
| Cameron | Masson |
| Campbell | Monteith |
| Caron | Montplaisir |
| Cimon | Mousseau |
| Colby | Quimet |
| Cuthbert | Pinsonneault |
| Daoust | Platt |
| Desjardins | Plumb |
| Donahue | Pope (Compton) |
| Farrow | Robinson |
| Flesher | Robitaille |
| Gibbs (North Ontario) | Rochester |
| Gibbs (South Ontario) | Rouleau |
| Gill | Roy |
| Haggart | Stephenson |
| Hurteau | Thompson (Cariboo) |
| Jones (Leeds) | Tupper |
| Kirkpatrick | Wallace (S. Norfolk) |
| Langevin | White (East Hastings) |
| Lanthier | White (North Renfrew) |
| Little | Wright (Ottawa) |
| Macdonald (Kingston) | County)—53. |

And the Clerk of the House having declared the Hon. Mr. Anglin duly elected, he was conducted to the chair by Messrs. Mackenzie and Smith (Westmoreland).

MR. SPEAKER, standing on the steps of the Chair, said: I thank the Members of the House sincerely for the high honour they have done me, in having elected me to the responsible and dignified position of Speaker of this honourable body, and I can only assure them that, while I continue holding the chair, I will endeavour, as I believe and trust I have endeavoured in the past, to discharge the duties of that position impartially and fairly, to the satisfaction of every honourable and fair-minded man, and in such a way as to add to the dignity and respect due to this honourable body.

Then the Mace was laid upon the Table.

House adjourned at Twenty minutes after Four o'clock.

MR. MITCHELL.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 8th Feb., 1878.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

THE SEAT FOR NORTHUMBERLAND.

The HON. PETER MITCHELL, Member for the Electoral District of the County of Northumberland, New Brunswick, was introduced to the House by Mr. Kirkpatrick and Mr. Wright (Ottawa).

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Peter Mitchell having been duly returned to represent the Electoral District of the county of Northumberland, has taken the oath and subscribed the roll, and now desires to take his seat.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon gentleman having taken his seat yesterday in this House, I think may now fairly resume it.

Mr. Mitchell took his seat.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, I presume that it is by order of the House that you made that statement. I presume the Speaker is only the mouthpiece of the House, and can only speak when directed by order of the House, and not otherwise.

MR. SPEAKER: I merely made a statement of fact as to the competence of the hon. member to take his seat.

MR. HOLTON: Mr. Speaker, I was about to object to the hon. gentleman's being again introduced when you spoke.

MR. MITCHELL: Mr. Speaker, I think it something remarkable that the head of this House should have made the remark that he did on the presentation of a member. I felt yesterday, when objection was made to members taking their seats without being presented to the Speaker, by a gentleman whose right to speak with relation to the practices and privileges of the House of Commons of Canada cannot be questioned here, that I should take the step which I have taken. When he (Sir John A. Macdonald), yesterday pointed out the fact that no new member had the right to take his seat in the House until, according to the rules and privileges of Parliament, he had subscribed the oath and been presented to the Speaker, I felt that this practice should be followed. I took the oaths yesterday, and I then supposed that no doubt could arise with regard to my taking my seat. I believed that I had a right to my seat; but, when that objection was made by my hon. friend who leads this side of the House, it seemed to my mind fit that I should place myself in a proper position before the House. When, as the House knows, and the country knows, that owing to the objection taken from the other side of the House last Session, I found that I had unwittingly placed myself in such a position that great doubt existed as to whether I had the right to take my seat or not, I felt, as I feel now, that I should wipe off and remove the objection made against me; and having done so—having gone back for re-election in my county, at considerable inconvenience to myself, and to the great inconvenience of the numerous majority in my county who so nobly sustained me—I say I did not deserve the slur which was thrown out against my having taken my seat yesterday when I was ignorant as to whether I had the right to take my seat or not; and what I would further remark is that, wishing to set myself right with the country, I do not think that the fact of my innocently having so taken my seat, and having innocently infringed the rules of the House affords any justification for such comment; and when I attempt to set myself right and place myself in such a position that no man on either side of the House can raise the question or the slightest doubt about Peter Mitchell taking his seat, or the right of the county of Northumberland to send me here, I think it comes with no very good grace to make such a remark on my seeking to remove the only difficulty that exists with regard to my possession of my seat in this House.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

A Message from His Excellency the Governor General, by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:—

Mr. SPEAKER,

His Excellency the Governor-General desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, with the House, went up to the Senate Chamber;—and then

Mr. Speaker spoke to the following effect:—

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:—

The House of Commons have elected me as their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me. If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am.

The Speaker of the Senate then said:—

Mr. SPEAKER,

I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor-General to assure you that your words and actions will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

And the House being returned,—

ZEPHIRIN DÉSIRÉ alias OLIVIER DÉSIRÉ BOURBEAU, Esq., Member for Drummond and Arthabaska; JACQUES MALOUIN, Esq., Member for Quebec Centre; and FRANÇOIS XAVIER OVIDE MÉTHOT, Esq., Member for Nicolet, were respectively introduced to the House, and took their seats.

BEAUCE CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

JUDGE'S REPORT.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from the Hon. Mr. Justice Bossé, one of the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, his judgement in the matter of the Controverted Election for the Electoral District of Beauce.

NEW MEMBER.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery,—Certificate of the election and return of the Hon. Peter Mitchell, to represent the Electoral District of Northumberland, N. B.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS OF OFFICE
BILL.

[BILL NO. 1.]

(Mr. Mackenzie.)

FIRST READING.

MR. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill (No. 1) Respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.

Bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

MR. SPEAKER reported His Excellency's Speech from the Throne, and read a copy thereof to the House, which is as follows:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In again summoning you for the despatch of business, I am glad to be able to say that nothing beyond the ordinary business of the country requires your attendance.

It afforded me great pleasure to have had an opportunity, before my departure from Canada, of visiting the Province of Manitoba and a portion of the outside Territories, which visit I accomplished during last Autumn. I have now had the advantage of visiting every Province in the Dominion during the term of my government of Canada.

I am happy to be able to say that the arbitration on the Fishery claims, under the terms of the Washington Treaty, has been concluded. An award has been made by the Commission of $5,500,000 as compensation to Canada and Newfoundland for the use of their Fisheries during the term of the present Treaty. This amount is much less than that claimed by my Government, but having assented to the creation of the tribunal for the determination of their value, we are bound loyally to assent to the decision given.

The exhibition of Canadian manufactures and products at Sydney, New South Wales, was successfully carried out. I trust that the result will be the opening up of a new market for Canadian goods even in so remote a region as the Australasian colonies, shipments of Canadian productions having already been made. The expenditure will slightly exceed the estimate, but I doubt not the cost to Canada will be amply repaid by the extension of her trade.

MR. SPEAKER.

Preparations have been uninterruptedly carried on, during the last six months, for securing an ample but select exhibition of Canada's products and manufactures at the great exhibition to be held at Paris during the current year. A further estimate will be required to meet the expenditure. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, as Chairman of the British Commissioners, has assigned a most prominent place to Canada in one of the main towers, where a Canadian Trophy is now being erected.

A very disastrous fire occurred in June last, in the city of St. John, which caused the destruction of a large portion of the city, including all the public buildings owned by the Dominion Government. My Government deemed it necessary to contribute $20,000 to assist in relieving the immediate wants of the people who were rendered destitute by so appalling a calamity. I also sanctioned the appropriation of some public money, with which to commence the erection of new buildings for the public business, which acts you will be asked to confirm in the usual way.

During last summer my Commissioners made another treaty with the Blackfeet, Blood and Piegan Indians, by which the Indian title is extinguished over a territory of 51,000 square miles west of Treaty No. 4, and south of Treaty No. 6. The treaty has been made on terms nearly the same as those under Treaty No. 6, though somewhat less onerous. The entire territory west of Lake Superior to the Rocky Mountains, and from the boundary nearly to the 55th degree of north latitude, embracing about 450,000 square miles, has now been acquired by peaceful negotiation with the native tribes, who place implicit faith in the honour and justice of the British Crown.

Early in the past summer a large body of Indians, under Sitting Bull, from the United States, crossed into British territory, to escape from the United States troops, and have since remained on the Canadian side.

The United States Government made a friendly but unsuccessful attempt to induce these Indians to return to their reservations. It is to be hoped that such arrangements may yet be made as may lead to their permanent and peaceful settlement, and thus relieve Canada of a source of uneasiness and a heavy expenditure.

The surveys of the Pacific Railway have been pressed to completion during the past season. A complete instrumental survey of the route by the valleys of the North Thompson and Lower Frazer Rivers has been made with a view to ascertain definitely whether that route presents more favourable features than the routes already surveyed to Dean Inlet and Bute Inlet respectively. It is believed that the additional information now obtained will enable my Government to determine which route is the most advantageous from Tête Jaune Cache to the sea. Full information will be laid before you at an early day of the season's work in this and other directions.

I am happy to be able to congratulate you on the abundant harvest reaped in all quarters of the Dominion; and I rejoice that under this and other influences there has been some improvement in the Revenue returns, thus indicating, I trust, that the commercial depression that has so long afflicted Canada, in common with other countries, is passing away.

My attention has been called to some imperfections in the existing system of auditing the Public Accounts, and a measure providing for their more thorough and effective supervision will be submitted for your consideration.

The prospect of obtaining, at an early day, greater facilities for reaching the North Western Territories and the Province of Manitoba is sure to attract a larger number of settlers every year, and, as much of the prosperity of the Dominion depends on the rapid settlement of the fertile lands in these Territories, it is desirable and necessary to facilitate such settlement as much as possible. In order to effect this, measures will be submitted for your consideration concerning the registration of titles, the enactment of a Homestead Law, and the promotion of railway enterprise in districts not touched by the Canada Pacific Railway.

Your attention will be called to a measure for better securing the independence of Parliament.

Experience has shown that certain changes may advantageously be made in the departmental arrangements existing at present. A Bill will be submitted to you for accomplishing this purpose without increasing the expenditure or the number of Departments.

It is very desirable that there should be uniform legislation in all the Provinces respecting the traffic in spirituous liquors. Hitherto that trade has been regulated by Provincial laws, or laws existing before the Confederation of the Provinces, although there has been lately a conflict of authority as to the jurisdiction of the local authorities. A Bill making the necessary provision will be submitted for your consideration.

Various measures found necessary for the amendment of existing laws will also be submitted for your approval.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The Estimates for the ensuing year will be laid before you at an early day. They have been prepared with an anxious desire to provide for all the branches of the public service and the execution of pressing public works, within the limits of the expected revenue, without increasing the burden of taxation.

I have directed that the Public Accounts of the past financial year shall be laid before you.

MR. MACKENZIE moved

“That His Excellency's Speech be taken into consideration on Monday next.”

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

MR. MACKENZIE moved,

“That Select Standing Committees of this House, for the present Session, be appointed for the following purposes:—1. On Privileges and Elections; 2. On Expiring Laws; 3. On Railways, Canals, and Telegraph Lines; 4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills; 5. On Standing Orders; 6. On Printing; 7. On Public Accounts; 8. On Banking and Commerce; 9. On Immigration and Colonization,—which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records."

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House the report of the Librarian of Parliament, on the state of the Library of Parliament.

OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE DEBATES

REMARKS.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that on Monday next he would propose the appointment of a Committee regarding the supervision of the reporting of the debates. In the meantime, he thought it might be perhaps well for hon. gentlemen to consider whether it was desirable that the system of last year should be continued; the one volume which contained the debates of last Session being extremely voluminous and inconvenient, and whether it might be desirable or not to curtail the reporting of the debates somewhat so as to compress it within one reasonable volume, or to extend it indefinitely according to the character and extent of the debates. He merely asked the attention of the House to the subject in order that, when the Government asked for a Committee on Monday, the House might come to some definite understanding on these points.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he quite agreed with the hon. member that it was extremely inconvenient to publish the debates in so large a volume. It was not a pocketable by any means, which could be carried about anywhere; but he would be very sorry to see the reporting of the debates curtailed, for, to be valuable, it should be as full as possible, perhaps not the ipsissima verba, but nevertheless so full as to give as nearly as possible the whole sum and substance of whatever each member said. Otherwise, the value of the reporting would be greatly diminished. As regarded the portability of the volume, he thought some arrangement might be made by which the debates of each Session would be spread over two volumes, and in a few years he believed three would be required for the purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

House adjourned at Twenty minutes to
Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 11th Feb., 1878.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House—Account Current of the Accountant of the House of Commons, of the amount received and disbursed by him for Contingencies, from the 1st July, 1876, to the 1st July 1877 with the Auditor's Report.

OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE DEBATES

COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex) moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed, to supervise the official Report of the Debates of this House during the present Session; with power to report from time to time; said Committee to be composed of Messrs. ROSS (Middlesex), Oliver, Dymond, Béchard, Charlton, Tupper, Bowell, Desjardins and Colby."

Mr. HOLTON said he did not object to the motion on the ground that it was not a right and proper motion, for, of course, it was the settled policy of the House to continue these reports, but they had strong complaints last year of the extraordinary delay which took place in the distribution of the reports. The delay was so great that the reports were really of no practical value, except as records of proceedings for reference in after years. He hoped the Committee proposed by his hon. friend, the member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) would see that arrangements were made this year to secure a prompter distribution of the reports than took place last year. He was quite sure that such was the sense of the House at large, and he hoped that expression would be given to that sense by other members.

MR. MASSON said he had no complaint to make about the Hansard; he understood the difficulties the reporters had to contend with, especially with regard to himself; but what he had to complain of was the translation of the Hansard. The translation two or three years ago was something awful. That of last year was a great deal better; there were parts of it that were excellent, but there were other parts that were really absurd. As an instance, he might mention that, when he spoke upon the question of the prayers, upon which he took strong grounds, he said that the first Commoner should say the prayers, but the French translation of the Hansard made him say to the House, "que ce devoir devrait être rempli par le premier venu." If the matter were not so serious, he would be inclined to laugh, and he could not but think that the matter should receive careful consideration. This was the record for or against hon. members, and, in going through some parts of the country, among the French population this year, he had found the Hansard everywhere; but it was natural that the French would not refer to the English Hansard to see what their representatives had been doing, but would go to the French copy. And not only in the Hansard, but in the Statutes, he had the same thing to complain of, and in the translation of the Sessional Papers also there was ground for complaint. He had compared the French with the English copy of the Hansard, and, in the former, had found that the most absurd and damaging things appeared. He believed the motion would meet with the approbation of most of the French speakers. They must have a Hansard which expressed their ideas as they were expressed in this House.

MR. DESJARDINS said it would be unjust to leave unanswered the remarks which had just fallen from his hon. friend the member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), and leave the House under the impression that the French translators had not done their duty last year. They were bound to remember that this work had been executed under very difficult circumstances. The steps that had been taken to secure the translation of Han- sard had only been decided on late in the Session, and the hasty selection of the necessary staff had caused part of the translation to be confided to persons who were, perhaps, of inferior ability. But it being understood that the work would be given this year to the same officers who had charge of it previously, he anticipated that the translation for the present Session would be such as would render justice to the speeches delivered by hon. members.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) said he was quite aware there was considerable delay in having the bound volumes of the Hansard issued at the close of last Session, and considerable delay in having the daily report of the speeches laid upon the desks.

MR. HOLTON: I did not complain of the bound volumes, but of the daily reports. We did not get them last Session until August.

MR. ROSS said this matter came before the attention of the Committee of the House last Session, and a new indenture was drawn up between the House and the contractor for the Hansard, in which a clause was inserted to the effect that the contractor should forfeit a penalty of $15 per day if his share of the work was not completed in time. Of course last Session their contractor had entered for the first time upon this delicate and difficult task, and the Committee were aware there were many difficulties to be surmounted which he would not expect to encounter during the present Session. He hoped they would be able this Session, by the removal of several difficulties, as well as from the increased skill and experience of their contractor, to comply with the intentions of the Committee, in having the reports laid upon the desks of hon. members at least within twenty-four hours of the time at which the speech was delivered. The matter was one which had been surrounded by great difficulties from its inception, but he believed these difficulties were being removed from year to year, and he hoped the result this year would be more satisfactory than in previous years.

MR. DECOSMOS said he trusted the Committee would take into consideration the question whether it would not be much better to allow hon. gentlemen who desired to revise their speeches, to have a printed proof of their speeches instead of manuscript that was exceedingly difficult to decipher.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said that to his certain knowledge, in the Hansard of last Session, two or three rather important statements were omitted. He knew that the reporters experienced great difficulty in following the proceedings, and particularly interjections; but occasionally statements were made from one side of the House to the other that, to a very large extent, bore on the question at issue. Now, it must be understood that the Hansard, although very reasonably faithful as showing the general tenor of the speeches, and very often giving the exact language, could not, as it was at present, be regarded as an absolutely authentic record.

Motion agreed to.

INSOLVENCY LAW REPEAL.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL PROPOSED.

MR. BARTHE moved for leave to introduce a Bill to repeal the Insolvency Law now in force in the Dominion.

MR. TUPPER said he would like, in this connection, to enquire of the hon. the First Minister if the report was authentic which stated that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, on the occasion of his appeal to his constituents in Drummond and Arthabaska, had stated that it was the intention of the Government to repeal the Insolvency Law.

MR. LAURIER said he thought he could appeal to his hon. friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) as to the fact that he never made such a statement. He never stated that it was the intention of the Government to repeal the Insolvency Law or any other Act. He had been sworn in the day before, and it was only natural for him to make no statement of that or any other kind as to the future policy of the Government. He said there, as he had stated elsewhere, that, as far as his own personal sentiments went, he was in favour of the repeal of the Insolvency Law. Even if he did make the statement attributed to him, and he did not think that he did, he spoke of his own sentiments and not of the policy of the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not think it fair that any hon. gentleman should ask such a question without previous notice.

MR. MASSON said the hon. gentleman need not have answered the question, but he did. He was sorry the hon. gentleman had made an appeal to him. He had only gone into the country twice. As the hon. gentleman said he had not made the statement, of course he could believe that he did not intend to make it, but he had understood him to say that he was opposed to the Insolvency Law; that it would not be repealed at this Session, but probably at the next Session. He remembered it particularly, because he had spoken of it to his friends at the time.

MR. MACKENZIE said he really must ask hon. members not to discuss in that House things said by others in another place.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, with regard to the remarks which had fallen from his hon. friend the member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) there was a motion before the Chair, and it was quite germane to ask if certain remarks in reference to this subject had been made by the Minister of Inland Revenue at any time. Notice would be required of the question put to the Premier, because, without it, he could not have the opportunity of enquiring of his colleague. This was a discussion on the first reading of a Bill, and perhaps it was unusual to introduce a Bill at all, except the measure which was always introduced to assert the rights of Parliament, until the Speech from the Throne had been answered. But, the motion having been made, the discussion was quite in order.

MR. MASSON said it was painful to see hon. members who had been known always to speak the truth, holding different opinions on matters of fact. It was painful to him to again refer to it, but, when he did so before, his hon. friend wished to make him believe that his (Mr. Masson's) memory was at fault. But he remembered the occasion particularly, because when the statement was made, he made the remark that his hon. friend was going too far, that he was pledging Parliament two Sessions. This was what struck him at the time, and made him remember the fact now.

Mr. Ross.

MR. LAURIER said he had appealed to the testimony of his hon. friend because he thought there could be no doubt about it. His memory was not in accord with that of his hon. friend (Mr. Masson), but, although they were at variance, his hon. friend did not impugn his statement, and he did not impugn that of his hon. friend. Still, they were at variance, and one might be at fault. It seemed to him that it was quite natural that, having been sworn in only on the previous day, he could not state what would be the policy of the Government.

MR. MOUSSEAU: I heard the hon. Minister use exactly the same words as those remembered by the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson).

MR. SPEAKER: I would suggest to the hon. member (Mr. Barthe) not to press the Bill at present. It is contrary to our usual practice to introduce a Bill before the Speech is answered.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said the motion which was always made, was to protect the right of the House to introduce Bills if they chose, but even then it was considered not exactly respectful to the Crown, and therefore the motion for the second reading was not made. He would suggest that the hon. gentleman should allow his motion to stand until after the Address. It would be considered that the motion was not made, and that it was still on the paper.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

MR. DE St. GEORGES: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to propose that a humble address be presented to His Excellency in reply to the Speech from the Throne; and at the outset, I hasten to solicit the indulgence of the House, convinced as I am, that the task which has devolved upon me, is much beyond my power. I am about to have the honour to serve the House with a bill of fare, which certainly should give satisfaction to the most exacting; but which, nevertheless, the hon. Leader of the Opposition will not fail, as usual, to find very meagre. I remember that last year, the hon. member (Sir John A. Macdonald) made us this compliment, but that did not, meanwhile, prevent three long months, and sittings prolonged at times until the morning being required, though the Government used all possible diligence to forward the despatch of business, before we passed through all the programme that was submitted to us. As His Excellency has very appropriately remarked this year, nothing beyond the ordinary affairs of Parliament requires the convocation of Parliament; the country at present being in a most satisfactory condition. It is true that we have suffered and still suffer from commercial depression, but this is a misfortune common to-day to all civilized countries, and, after all, we can say that we have suffered here less from it than any other country, no matter where situated, and that Canada occupies a relatively prosperous condition. The commercial position of the country has improved during the past few months, and our revenues have increased. The second paragraph of the Speech from the Throne informs us that, when Parliament will be convened anew, His Excellency Lord Dufferin will have ceased to be here the representative of the British Crown. This news, I am sure, will give rise, everywhere in our midst, to a lively sentiment of regret, and the Canadian people, without distinction of nationality or of religion, will look upon the departure of His Excellency as a misfortune. Lord Dufferin, whose presence each city, each town and each locality in the Dominion, has disputed since his arrival amongst us, has known how to make himself loved, alike by all the races and by all the creeds amongst us, and, I may add, by all the political parties of our country, and not only here but also even in the United States Lord Dufferin has known how to make himself popular. It would detain me too long, were I to essay to enumerate all the claims which Lord Dufferin has upon our gratitude; permit me merely to say that, by his affection for the Canadian people and the lively interest which he takes in their prosperity, he has a right to our most earnest acknowledgments; for it is incontestable that the administration of Lord Dufferin and the manner in which he has acquitted himself have in no slight measure contributed to unite in closer bonds the divers elements of our population. Later on, the Canadian people will effectually remember their former Governor, His Excellency, and it is only just to add that the name of Lady Dufferin will always be equally dear to them. Representative of Her Majesty amongst us, His Excellency Lord Dufferin has wished to acquaint himself personally with the needs of the people by visiting the various Provinces of the Confederation. Last autumn, His Excellency paid a visit to the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territory, and the accounts which the newspapers have given of the incidents of this trip, suffice to enable us to predict the advantages to the country which will result from it. The information that His Excellency has gathered regarding the immense resources of the North-West Territory will permit him to make the Imperial Government sensible of the importance of the annexation of this vast domain to the Dominion of Canada. Besides, His Excellency has already had occasion to acquaint the English people with the resources of Canada, and particularly of the western portion of it, and, beyond doubt, the authority that his words carry with them will favour the development of the work of colonization in this part of the Confederation. The settlement of the fisheries dispute, although it has not given us all that we expected, has, nevertheless, created general satisfaction, and when it is known that, of the fifteen million award paid by Great Britain to the American Government on account of the Alabama claims, one-half remains in the hands of the American Government, we cannot but believe that they will not hesitate to pay the five and one-half millions of dollars that the Arbitrators have awarded to Canada. En passant, I must say that the system of settling these difficulties by arbitration, as adopted by the two Governments interested in the matter, is the wisest that could be devised, and I believe that it will be more and more generally followed with regard to international difficulties in the future. It gives me pleasure to state here, to the honour of Canada, that this is one of the first countries which has afforded such an example to the world. I now reach the paragraph relating to the treaties which have been concluded with the Indians. These treaties, one of which assures to us the full enjoyment of 52,000 square miles, and the other the full enjoyment of 450,000 square miles of territory, suffice to convince the House that the interests of Canada in the West have not been neglected. The generous proceedings which we have always adopted with regard to the Indian tribes reflect great credit upon the political system adopted by the Government, above all when we recollect that everywhere else the relations of Europeans with the Indians have always given way to bloody conflicts, while our own relations with these tribes, on the contrary, have always been of the most pacific character; and all this goes to show that respect for plighted faith is the first condition requisite to live in peace with these Indians, and that, in fine, this mode of treatment will be the most economical means that we can adopt towards them. We are in a position to state to-day that the North-west Territory, which, a few years ago, was given over to anarchy and brigandage, is now rapidly advancing in civilization, and that, thanks to the wise policy pursued by the present Government, the completion of the Pacific Railway route will enable the House to decide what it ought to do regarding this enterprise, and will convince it that it is necessary for us to establish, as soon as possible, railway communication with these western regions. No question requiring solution at our hands presents greater difficulty than this one. In engaging in this gigantic enterprise, we have contracted obligations which are in themselves enormous and almost inconceivable when we compare them with our resources; nevertheless, in view of the fact that advantages of direct communication with the Pacific will, to an equal degree, be very great in my opinion, it will be important to proceed gradually towards the realization of this project and to unite in the execution of it firmness with prudence, and this, furthermore, has been done in fact by the present Government. The next paragraph informs us that a Bill concerning the independence of Parliament will be submitted to the House. It is clear, owing to what has occurred during the past two years, that certain portions of the existing Statute have become quite vicious, and nothing proves this more conclusively than the fact at present stated that a very great number of the members of this House have violated the provisions of this Act, not only without the intention of doing so on their part, but also without any suspicion on their part that they had contravened the law, incurring thereby a ruinous penalty without actual benefit. The House will, I trust, receive favourably every proposition having for its object the maintenance of the independence of Parliament, while at the same time it clearly defines the precise limit existing between the privileges of Parliament and those of members, and provides for the severe and reasonable punishment of any member guilty of an infraction of the law. By new legislation touching the means for the hastening of the settlement of the North-West Territories, the Government proves that it desires to draw an immediate advantage from the late visit of His Excellency to that portion of the country. This work is not yet finished, but we have the experience of other colonies to guide us in the enactment of such laws. In the last paragraph, His Excellency expresses the hope that the abundant crop with which Providence has favoured us will contribute greatly to the restoration of the well-being and prosperity of this country. The commercial depression which during several years has afflicted Canada is not limited to this country only, but is a common evil which we unfortunately share with other countries more advanced and more rich than our own. Besides, Canada, owing to its geographical position, could not avoid experiencing the shock of the crisis which at the time prevailed among our neighbours. I consider that, if we wish to discover the true cause of this great commercial crisis, we will find that it had its origin in that period of extravagance, excitement and recklessness which followed the American War, and to these foreign and inevitable causes were united others more immediate in their nature. It is an incontestable fact that our importations and the products of our manufactures have largely exceeded the wants of the country. These importations and this excess of production distributed throughout the country had the double effect of seducing from agricultural pursuits and launching out into commercial affairs a large number of people who abandoned their patrimony, and of introducing amongst us a credit system which equally ruins the trader and the consumer. Here are to be found the true causes of our commercial misfortunes. It is to be regretted that the Opposition, in place of aiding the Government to diminish the effects of this system, has sought to render the Administration responsible for this state of things. The members sitting on the other side of the House know better than any one else in what position the present Ministry found itself on assuming the reins of power. They are well aware what a burdensome heritage they have bequeathed to their successors—consisting of contracted obligations and questions difficult of solution. To have given their assistance towards emergence from these difficulties would only have been just, but, far from adopting this course, the Opposition has sought to compel the Government to bear the responsibility of a situation which it had not created. Obligated to pass through a financial crisis without precedent in our history we required an honest, economical and wise Government which desired to bring about an equilibrium between the receipts and expenses, the receipts having been considerably diminished during these years of depression. I believe that I am expressing the sentiment of the House and of the country when I say that the Government of the day has perfectly understood the position of affairs, and that it has a strong claim upon our gratitude for its wise policy of retrenchment and economy. Commerce anxiously awaits the end of this crisis. Although an abundant crop has temporarily diminished the severity of the general depression, nevertheless, as long as the lumber business, our principal source of export, does not attain on foreign markets its former proportions, and so long as the equilibrium, broken by the surplus of importation and of production of which I have spoken a moment since, is not re-established, we cannot hope that our commercial affairs will resume their normal and regular course. The other measures announced in the Speech from the Throne are of an important though purely administrative character, and it would be at present premature to say anything about them before they have been submitted to the House. We now find ourselves at the last Session of a Parliament which was convoked under circumstances that are not as yet forgotten. While casting a glance upon the career of the present Government, I can say that those who, at the outset, gave to it their confidence, have certainly no reason to repent of having done so. One of the first cares of the present Administration on its succession to office was to bestow upon the country reforms for which its members had contended during many years. At the first Session of this Parliament a law was passed which for a long period had been demanded, but which had always been refused—I now refer to the Election Law. It was then decided that at the general elections the people should possess the full enjoyment of their electoral franchise, and that the poor workingman should be able to vote with the same degree of independence and liberty as the millionaire, depositing his ballot in the electoral urn, solely under the eye of God and of his conscience. Everybody to-day recognizes the benefits of this legislation; and if, since that period, the most lively contested elections—such as those which have taken place in various districts, and in particular in Quebec East and Quebec West—have occurred without the accompaniment of riots, seizure of the polls, and murders, which we could not but deplore, all this is due to the ballot law. We also owe to the Liberal Government important amendments made to the Bankruptcy Law, and the law concerning contested elections, which assure a prompt and efficacious solution of the cases brought before the Courts created for this especial purpose. Again, it is this Liberal Government which has settled the amnesty question, and it will be lauded in the history of our country for having had the courage to take up this question immediately after its accession to power, and for having so happily succeeded in settling it to the satisfaction of all—at least, of all those who are capable of being satisfied in this regard. I now beg to finish, Mr. Speaker, for I would engage the time of the House at too great length were I to attempt to enumerate and pass in review all the important laws that we owe to the present Government, and all the reforms that have been accomplished since its accession to power; but, previous to taking my seat, permit me, Sir, to repeat, that those who have accorded their support to the illustrious statesman at the head of the Government, and to his able colleagues, cannot but felicitate themselves on the patriotic line of conduct they have followed, and I am fully persuaded that, when, in the course of the present year, they seek anew the suffrages of their constituents, the latter will again repose their confidence in those whom they have charged with the defence of their interests, and who have so honourably acquitted themselves of this important duty.

MR. DE ST. GEORGES.

MR. CHARLTON: Mr. Speaker, in rising to second the resolution of my hon. friend, in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I shall crave the indulgence of the House while I refer briefly to some of the points referred to in that Speech. The country, Sir, is to be congratulated upon the fact that His Excellency is enabled to assure this House that nothing beyond the ordinary legislation of the country will require its attention. At this moment, Sir, when the great powers of Europe confront the possibility, if not the probability of a general war,—at this moment, when the great nation to the south of us is agitated by discussions over a proposed financial measure, which, if it become the law of that land, will for the first time inflict the stain of commercial dishonour upon the legislation of the general Government of that country, and will protract, if it does not intensify, the commercial evils under which that nation now labours,—we are enabled to meet at this time with no fear of invasion threatening us, with no fear of internal discord to disturb us, and with no mistakes of our rulers to be provided against or condemned. Sir, the second paragraph of the Speech of His Excellency makes incidental allusion to a coming event which I could fain wish, and which I doubt not the vast majority of the people of Canada could wish, was an event in the more distant future than it is. I refer, Sir, to the probable recall of His Excellency. I cannot forbear at this time from paying my humble tribute to the excellences of the Viceroy of Her Majesty in Canada. Lord Dufferin has shown a just and generous appreciation of the advantages and the resources of Canada, and of the intelligence and the energy of its people. He has made praiseworthy and energetic efforts to make himself acquainted, from personal observation, with every Province in this Dominion; and certainly the assertion would not be an invidious one, if I say that no Viceroy who has preceded him as the representative of Her Majesty in this land has had so accurate a knowledge of its resources, of its advantages, and of its wants, as the knowledge possessed by Lord Dufferin. Lord Dufferin, Sir, in various ways, has conferred immense benefits upon Canada; notably, through the influence exerted by his speeches in Canada and in England. Those speeches, coming from so high an authority, necessarily attracted great attention. Those speeches, Sir, did Canada full justice. They made the people of Europe aware of the advantages that Canada had to offer to the emigrant. They were more potent as an agency for promoting emigration than all the emigration agencies and emigrant agents that we have at the present time in Europe.

An HON. MEMBER: Except the Agent-General.

MR. CHARLTON: When, Mr. Speaker, at some future day, Canada shall have assumed national importance in wealth and in population, as she now possesses it in territorial area, we will look upon Lord Dufferin as one of the principal foundation-builders of that nationality. I have pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in the belief and in the knowledge that Lord Dufferin is held in high estimation not in Canada alone; and I may be permitted, in this connection, to refer to the reception which he met with upon a recent visit to Washington, when the President of the United States returned his visit,—an honour which President Grant refused to accord to Prince Alexis, and one which no President of the United States has ever before conferred upon any Prince or foreign Governor. That honour was conferred by President Hayes upon Lord Dufferin. In the ranks of artists, of authors, of scholars, and of statesmen, Lord Dufferin occupies a proud position; and, Sir, the popular regrets at the approaching withdrawal of Lord Dufferin from Canada, will not be upon his account alone. Her Excellency Lady Dufferin, through the graciousness and amiability of her manners, the beauty of her person, and her intellectual refinement, has endeared herself to the people of this country. Reference is made in the Speech, Sir, to the award recently made at Halifax, upon the claims put forward by Canada, under the Treaty of Washington, in connection with our fisheries. Unfortunately, our expectations have not been fully met in that award; unfortunately, the amount that we claimed has not been awarded us. We expected vastly more than we are likely to receive. Nevertheless, Sir, the people of Canada will undoubtedly cheerfully acquiesce in, and abide by, the terms of that award; and it is to be hoped that, although this system of arbitration does not always give exact and equal justice, yet that it may ever be preferred to the costly and terrible arbitrament of the sword. Had the parties to this arbitration engaged in war, for however brief a period, its ravages and its losses would have inflicted greater damage upon them than the total amount claimed by Canada as compensation for her fisheries. I can only express a humble trust and hope that in the future the members of the community of Anglo-Saxon commonwealths, which now exert so great an influence, and will in the future exert a still greater influence upon the destinies of mankind, will ever have the sense to settle their disputes in the manner that this dispute has been settled. Reference is made, Sir, in the Address, to the exhibition of native manufactures at Sydney, New South Wales. The result of this exhibit, as well as our participation in the exhibition at Philadelphia has been very important to Canadian interests. As a result of the Sydney Exhibition, I am informed that already large shipments of Canadian manufactures are made to Australia, and that the only practical bar to the springing up of a large trade in this respect is the difficulty of procuring shipments for small consignments, and the necessity at present of sending cargoes. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to state my belief that the state of the manufacturing industries of Canada is comparatively prosperous; that the state of the manufacturing industries of Canada is one for which we should be thankful.

Some HON MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON: I hear from the opposite side of the House cries of "hear, hear." The gentlemen that indulge in these cries, are not aware that at the present time, in the most highly protected country in Christendom, the greatest commercial depression prevails, and the greatest distress amongst manufacturers. Perhaps the gentlemen are not aware that throughout the world the greatest commercial depression exists; and perhaps the gentlemen are not aware that in Canada, although commercial depression exists, it is less severe than in other countries. While, Sir, our manufacturers are shipping implements to the United States, our manufacturers ask but a fair field and no favours; and they are prepared to compete with any and all nations; and, Sir, if a comparison is made between the present policy of the Canadian Government and the policy of the United States Government at the time when their manufacturers had the most stable and enduring prosperity, we will find that the two systems are almost identical. I may be pardoned if I digress so far as to state that the Golden Age of her industries was from 1848 to 1861, under a period of non-protection, when the progress of manufactures, of agriculture, and of commerce went hand in hand, and that during that period of non-protection the manufacturing prosperity of that country was greater than at any time before or since. I may point out the fact that from the year 1850 to the year 1860 the production of iron in the United States increased from $135,000,000 to $256,000,000; that the importation of iron in that country at the end of that non-protected period was seven per cent. only of the total amount of iron consumed in the United States; that during the free-trade period, in fact, the United States had emancipated themselves from all dependence on foreign nations for iron. I might ask permission to contrast the condition of that country at the end of that non-protected period, in 1861, with the condition of that country to-day. I might point out the fact that to-day, after seventeen years of protection, the manufacturers are so much less prosperous; that to-day, $100,000,000 of investments in iron furnaces are useless, and the money might as well have been thrown away; that to-day, millions and millions of money have been invested in other enterprises beyond the needs and requirements of the country, and that that money might as well have been thrown away; that to-day, throughout the United States the value of real estate is less than seventeen years ago, at the end of the non-protective period. I can point to the fact that the consumers of the United States have for the last seventeen years paid in duties $2,429,000,000, and I may also point to the fact that these same consumers have, in addition to this enormous sum, paid in the enhanced cost of domestic production, in profits, upon duties and upon this enhanced cost, more than three times as much more. I may also point out that the producers of the United States, during the last seventeen years, while paying this enormous sum of over eight billion dollars, have actually received hundreds of millions less for their agricultural productions than they would have done but for this condition of things; that, while they have paid enormous exactions to the manufacturers, the result of that system has been to give them very much less for their production, because the system did not redeem its promise, and give them a home market. During all this time they were paying these enormous duties, they were sending the surplus of their production to England, and England, as the natural customer, being impoverished by that very system that kept us out of her market, and being unable to pay the prices she would otherwise have been able to pay, the United States have been during all these years, as was said by Professor Sumner of Yale College, in the condition of Issachar,—“A strong ass couching down between two burdens,”—the burden on the one hand of enormous duties, and the burden on the other hand of diminished receipts. Well, Sir, here we have opened for our inspection a period of history. Let us profit by its teaching; let us not be regardless of its lessons. The next paragraph of the Speech, Sir, refers to a matter of the utmost interest to a large portion of the people of this country, for the French-speaking population of Canada, although subjects of the British Crown, and loyal subjects, living in the enjoyment of civil and religious liberty, still must necessarily take a deep interest in all that pertains to the land from which they derive their origin, and must naturally desire that Canada, in the approaching Exhibition to be held in the most beautiful capital of Europe, should make a creditable exhibition. We have shipped a portion of the exhibits of the Exposition at Paris upon one of our own steamers. She arrived at Havre and proceeded up the Seine as far as Rouen, seventy miles in a north-west direction from Paris. The reception with which the officers of that vessel met was little short of an ovation. The Customs duties and tonnage dues were remitted. The captain received an address and was presented with a medal, and the inhabitants of the towns along the river Seine were very much interested in knowing from whence came this new flag. We trust, Sir, with the blessings of Providence, and under wise legislation, to make that flag in a few years well known in all the commercial ports of the world, and upon the distant seas. His Royal Highness, the Chairman of the British Commissioners, inquired of the Canadian Government whether they desired to erect a memorial trophy. That inquiry, Sir, was taken by this Government in the light of a command, and it was determined to erect one. The plans were submitted to the British Commissioners; those plans have been approved; the materials for that trophy have been shipped, or are about being shipped, and its erection, I have no doubt, will be one creditable to Canada. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that the members of this House, and the country at large, may anticipate highly favourable results from the participation of Canada in the Exhibition at Paris. The Speech makes allusion to that event which thrilled the sympathies of Canada in June last, when the citizens of the stricken city of Saint John saw the midnight heavens illuminated with unwonted splendour by the light of a great conflagration, which laid in ashes that beautiful city, and made thousands of citizens homeless and destitute. No doubt the measures taken by the Government for the relief of the inhabitants of that city will meet with the cordial approval of the members of this House. Reference is made also in the Speech to the extinguishment of the Indian title through a large portion of the North-West Territory. The settlement of that country and the extinguishment of the Indian title in the North-West is a matter of the greatest importance to the Dominion of Canada. The extent of territory already acquired from the Indians of that country equals in extent 288,000,000 acres. This territory would make 5,760,000 farms of 50 acres each. Of course this land is not all arable, but estimates of the capacity of this country for furnishing food and sustenance to the human race vary from 15,000,000 to 40,000,000. The future value of this country to Canada can scarcely be over-estimated. Here, Sir, will be the seat of Canada's power. The old adage, "Westward the star of empire takes its way." will be realized in our history, and in a few years the prairies of that country will be dotted with cities, towns and villages. In a few years that Great Lone Land will be the site of thriving and busy communities, and the desolate places of that country will be made glad. Of course, in effecting treaties for the extinguishment of Indian titles, heavy annuities have to be paid, and large burdens have been incurred. But the importance of maintaining amicable relations with those Indian tribes can scarcely be over-estimated, and I need not say that heavy annual annuities will be found much cheaper than the lightest war expenditure. Reference is made in the Speech to the presence of Sitting Bull, and a large body of Indians, on Canadian territory. I do not suppose, Sir, that our authorities invited Sitting Bull to make us a visit; I presume he can hardly be considered a welcome guest. This, however, is a question which requires delicate handling, and it was not thought proper that measures for the expulsion of Sitting Bull and his band should be adopted. Reference is also made to the efforts of the United States Government to induce Sitting Bull and his band to return to their reservation, which I hope will be crowned with success. And, in this connection, I may take occasion to say that much misapprehension exists in the public mind in Canada in regard to the nature of the Indian policy of the United States. An impression, I am persuaded, is generally prevalent that the United States, in their Indian policy, are inhuman and unjust in their treatment of the Indians, and that their only desire is to pursue to a successful termination the policy of extermination. Such, Sir, is far from being the case. The policy of the United States Government in the treatment of its Indians is liberal, much more liberal than the policy of our own Government. Their payments to Indians are greater in proportion than the payments of Canada in the form of annuities; the United States Government has made provision for the Indians in the reservation of very large tracts of land; it has set apart for that purpose a very large section of the United States; it has, in addition to this ample accommodation for the Indians in various parts of the United States, taken every means to induce the Indians to adopt agricultural pursuits, and has offered to furnish implements and even gone so far as to offer them houses. But the efforts of the United States Government in this regard have been thwarted by the malpractices of frontier men and the villainies of agents. I have no doubt that the House will be pleased to learn that the United States Government is about to turn over the management of its Indian affairs to the Department of War, and, from the proverbially high character of the American officers, we are warranted in believing that most happy results will flow from this, especially upon our own borders. The next reference made in this speech, Sir, is to the Pacific Railway surveys. I need hardly refer to the difficulties that have attended the selection of the route of the Canadian Pacific Railway—difficulties greater, perhaps, than have attended the surveys of any similar enterprise. These difficulties may be fairly measured by their enormous cost. The cost of these surveys up to the present time, has exceeded $3,140,000. And, Sir, the time occupied in the prosecution of these surveys, which has somewhat exceeded seven years, is a commentary upon the absurdity of the original contract to commence this road within two years and to build it within ten years. The country will naturally desire that the utmost prudence shall, in the future, characterize the policy of the country in the carrying out of this gigantic project, and it must be admitted that it is warranted in the belief that, under the present Administration, that prudence of conduct will be exercised. The next reference in this speech is to that gradual lifting of the cloud of gloom and depression that has settled over this country for the last few years, which has resulted from the late abundant harvest. One happy effect of this has been an increased revenue. So far as the present Government is concerned, I might here appropriately indulge in a word as to hard times. It has been said, probably by way of a joke, that these hard times were to be attributed to the shortcomings and misdeeds of the present Government. It should require nothing but the assertion to carry belief, in these times, that the hard times under which Canada has laboured did not originate in this country; were not due to any shortcomings, either sins of omission or commission on the part of any Government or any public movement in this country. I might, Sir, reasonably take the ground that the hard times and the depression which has existed in Canada, were due to the injurious effect of an extreme policy of protection in a neighbouring country, which, suffering first, under the evils of war, secondly, from the evils of an inflated currency, and, thirdly, from the evils of undue protection, has brought itself to the verge of ruin, and in doing that, has necessarily involved all commercial nations, to a greater or less extent, in the consequences. How was it possible for a country, having such intimate relations as Canada with the United States, to escape the consequences of the derangement of that country. Why, Sir, the fact that the lumber trade has fallen to 4,500,000 from 13,500,000 annually, will show that Canada did suffer most severely from the depression in the United States, and the hard times under which we have laboured, and which are fortunately improving, were almost entirely due to the existence of those causes over which we have had no control; the removal of which will bring relief which cannot be expected before. Reference is also made in this Speech to a proposed change in the system of auditing the Public Accounts. Although not in the secrets of the Government, I presume the intention is to copy the English system and make the auditor more independent of Government control. Reference is also made to the prospect of obtaining, at an early day, greater facilities for reaching the North-West. The importance of the rapid settlement of that country, Mr. Speaker, cannot be over-estimated. It is a fact to which I should call the attention of hon. members, that our public domain is just becoming available when the public domain of the United States is becoming exhausted, and we may reasonably hope that the ratio of increase in this country will from this time, for many decades to come, be much greater than the ratio in the United States. The importance of a simple and effectual method of registration of titles in reference to it, and a measure to effectually insure them, is referred to, and we are also promised a Homestead Law. The benefits to be derived from the Homestead Law have already been demonstrated by the experience of the United States for many years, and such a law will satisfy a great need in Canada. Railway facilities in the North-West have also been foreshadowed, and no question can be more vital to Canada than such a policy. Owing to physical causes, intercommunication in that region must, to a very large extent, be furnished by railways. Its rivers flow to the north; it has no natural outlet to the sea; and I have no doubt that a wise and judicious measure on the part of the Government for the promotion of railways in that important section will prove of immense service. Reference is also made, Mr. Speaker, to a measure for better securing the Independence of Parliament. I suppose experience has suggested to every member of the House modifications and improvements that might be made in the present measure. Reference is also made to changes in the Departments of some nature which, not being in the secrets of the Government, I cannot definitely explain. However, Mr. Speaker, changes securing efficiency of management, without increase of cost, are always desirable. The experience of years naturally develops the desirability of changes from time to time, and if any change is made by the efforts of the Government, it will not be the first change of this kind made in the experience of Canada. You will bear in mind that a change was formerly made when the office of Secretary of State for the Provinces was abolished and the present Department of the Interior was substituted. The country will be deeply interested in the reference made in this Speech from the Throne to temperance legislation. Uniformity of legislation upon the temperance question throughout the Dominion is, of course, in the highest degree desirable. The terms of the late decision of the Supreme Court are held to be indefinite and ambiguous. The Government, I have no doubt, have foreshadowed a measure that will at least be more satisfactory to the country than the present Temperance Act, and will go as far as it is possible to go to meet the wishes of temperance men. The Speech closed with a reference to the Estimates for the ensuing year, and I may, in this connection, be permitted to indulge in some remarks with reference to the growth of expenditure under the old and under the present Administration. The expenditure the first year after Confederation was, in round numbers, $13,500,000. The expenditure had increased during the seven years they held office to $23,316,000; in other words, under the late Administration, the expenditure had increased at the rate of somewhat more than $1,400,000 per annum. I believe that the gross expenditure of the past fiscal year will be found to be in round numbers, $23,500,000, an increase in four years of $200,000, or $50,000 per annum against an increase under the preceding Administration of $10,000,000, or $1,400,000 per annum. At the time that the present Administration entered office, Canada was, if I may be allowed the expression, entering upon a new phase of her national existence. Canada was just about to be called upon to make vast appropriations in carrying out pledges made by the late Administration. An empire had, but a short time before, been added to the domain of the Dominion, and it devolved upon the present Government to lay the foundations of an empire there; to make provisions in that country for the protection of its settlers; to purchase from the Indian tribes of that country the lands which they had from time immemorial occupied; and, in the payment of Indian annuities, in expenses incurred for the maintenance of a Mounted Police Force; in giving to that country civil institutions, and in other expenses rendered necessary in connection with that region,—the Government was called upon to incur vastly increased expenditures—expenditures which the Government of Canada had never been called upon to incur before. This Government was called upon to carry forward, in some modified form, the Pacific Railway scheme, and, in the prosecution of that enterprise, vast sums of money have necessarily been expended. The Government was called upon to carry forward the policy of enlarging the canals of the Dominion, and, in carrying forward this policy, vast sums of money were expended; and it had to incur expenditures in connection with various other enterprises in the Maritime Provinces; and, in not one of the items of expenditure that I have named, did the Government enter upon the expenditure of money in consequence of its own acts, but in every one of these cases they were entered into by its predecessors; and, in the carrying out of these expenses, the Administration of the present day has been called upon to expend millions annually in addition to the ordinary expenses of Government under the previous Administration. And yet, in view of this fact, they are enabled to present such an exhibit as I have named to the country. They have effected a saving of millions per annum. They have necessarily retrenched sharply in various directions. If this be the case, this Government has been in the highest degree economical, and has been singularly successful in reducing the expenditure of Government; and I am happy to congratulate the Government upon their discretion as shown in the character of the legislation that they have put upon the Statute-book; I am happy to congratulate the Government upon their economy, as shown in the policy of the reduction of the expenditures of this country; I may congratulate the Government upon their success in the management of the fiscal affairs of this country during a period of despondency and gloom; and I may congratulate the Government upon the happy circumstances under which, by the blessing of Providence, it is permitted them to meet Parliament at this time. I have great pleasure in seconding the resolution of the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. De St. Georges).

Mr. CHARLTON.

STR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the House has listened with great pleasure and great instruction—because we have heard some novelties—to the speeches of the hon. gentlemen who have moved and seconded the Address. They have done it with all the ability of experienced parliamentarians. It used to be the practice for the Ministry of the day to get young members of Parliament to file their maiden swords in moving and seconding the answer to the Queen's speech. The hon. gentlemen have changed that practice, and, instead of giving younger members an opportunity to show what they were made of, they have, perhaps wisely, placed their case in the hands of men of experience. Why young men were not asked, I do not know. Perhaps the article is scarce now, or perhaps the Government think that their case is such that they require all the experience and ability which those hon. members, the mover and seconder, possess beyond a doubt. I should have been very glad—it would have assisted us a good deal in the discussion of the Address—had we been favoured with some explanations as to the changes in the Administration since we last met. We have had dissolving views which would have done credit to the greatest artists and professors of diorama. The changes have been so great, so frequent and so continuous that one cannot help thinking of the statement of the old monk, who, when showing the pictures of the convent to a stranger, said, "I have been here so many years, there have been so many changes, I have lost so many of my companions, that I am beginning to think that the pictures are the realities and we are the shadows." While the House of Commons is the substance, the Ministry of the day since 1874 are but the shadows flitting along the wall, which, by-and-bye, with the light of day and the intelligence of the people, will disappear. We are not, however, to get these explanations until by-and-bye. We will wait for them with all patience—patience if we are obliged to observe it. The country is patient with the present Government, although there are some signs of impatience, as I think hon. gentlemen opposite will admit; and we must be also patient until we get these explanations. The seconder of the resolutions has made a most admirable speech and a carefully prepared one, for he always takes care that he speaks with due premeditation, after fully weighing the value of his words, and, in consequence, his words are more valuable because they are not the result of sudden impulse. I know the hon. gentleman carefully thinks out a speech before he delivers it. I have known him to think out carefully the whole question of the revenue of the country, and I have, with great delight and great pleasure, heard him deliver a magnificent speech, showing that Protection was the one thing requisite for this country. The hon. gentleman says he congratulates this country on the first paragraph of the Address, that we are only called upon to attend to the ordinary business of the country while England is threatened with war—which we are not going to have—and the United States is threatened with discredit in connection with the Silver Bill. I have simply to say that we have perhaps enough to do with managing our own affairs, without throwing discredit upon the affairs of our neighbours, who are able to attend to their own business; for, with all the ability of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), I think there are men in the United States of equal ability. The hon. gentleman has said that the United States had conferred great honour on the Governor-General by the President returning his visit when His Excellency was in Washington. It was a great honor, but no doubt His Excellency would survive it. But I can assure the hon. gentleman that, if he continues to use such language as he has just used regarding the United States, namely, that the legislation of the United States was going to bring discredit on that country, I think it very unlikely that a President or any public man of the United States would return a visit from him. But we are congratulated on the fact that, while war is threatening the Old World and discredit the New World, we are above all affairs of war and discredit, and have only to attend to the ordinary business of the country. I am very glad to hear the announcement that at last we have a Reform Government with nothing to reform, and only the ordinary business of the country to carry on. I can cordially agree with my hon. friends, the mover and seconder of the Address in the language they have used with respect to the illustrious individual who now so worthily represents the Queen in this country, and who, to the regret of both sides of this House and those whom we represent, will not be much longer with us. His career in this country it would be presumptuous in me to speak of. I shall only say with respect to Their Excellencies that I quite agree that no language is too strong to convey my opinion and the opinions of the gentlemen forming the Opposition in this House, as well as the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the opinion of the whole country, as to the conduct of His Excellency the Governor-General since his arrival in this country. He will take with him the good wishes, the esteem, the regard and, I may say, the affection of the people of Canada; and, as he is a young man, and apparently a strong man, we may look forward with some expectation and hope that he will for many years in the ripe career that awaits him in the future, be our friend in the Parliament of England and in the counsels of the Empire; and not only a friend, but a friend who is acquainted with all the desires, all the wishes, requirements and resources of this country. He possesses, I am glad to know it, information that he has gathered from every Province in the Dominion, and I can only regret that he is taking that information away with him, and that when he visited the various sections of this country, he did not have some of his Ministers with him, especially when he went far west to the Pacific slope, for there they might have obtained some information which I am sorry to say they are in need of at present. With regard to the arbitration clauses of the Washington Treaty, I am glad to know that that arbitration has been concluded, that an award has been made, and I have no doubt—unless hon. gentlemen opposite will inform us there is a doubt—the award will be carried out according to the terms of the Washington Treaty by the United States, and by the United States Government. We are congratulated, and we are called upon to congratulate His Excellency, that the exhibition of Canadian products at Sydney has been successfully carried out, and we are also called upon to thank His Excellency for informing us that preparations have been carried on during the last six months with regard to the Paris Exhibition. These are important clauses in one sense, and, although we are not told we are to get a report with respect to the Australian Exhibition, and although the Speech does not contain any promise that the papers will be brought down, I hope, notwithstanding there is a lack of promise, there will be abundant performance in the way of submitting the papers to the House. The success of the exhibition made by Canada at Paris is of very great importance, I believe, to the future of the Dominion. I believe there can be, and there ought to be, increasing commerce between France and Canada. It ought to be encouraged and assisted in every possible way, and I believe the exhibition of our products at Paris, if fairly and properly laid before the continental world, will be of great benefit to this country. I urge and implore the Government to consider well whom they have to represent there. I ask them to consider whether they should not select men of good manners without too much self-confidence, who will listen a little and be at all events civil to Canadian exhibitors and strangers who go to do their part in showing what Canada really is to the Parisian, French and European public. But the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who seconded the Address, while he highly approved of those two clauses, said our manufactures are flourishing, that our manufactures are, comparatively speaking, in a most successful position, and that those manufactures have been developed by the Australian Exhibition and will be developed by the forthcoming Exhibition at Paris. Much as I would like to have our manufactures develop in France and Australia, I would much prefer that they should have been fully developed at home; that we should have a home trade, a system of home manufactures and encouragement to home manufactures, which is twice blessed—which blesseth him that gives and him that receives—the giver and the receiver alike being in our own country. Why the hon. gentleman will not admit, apparently, that our manufactures are undersold in their own market by those of the neighbouring country whose misery and wretchedness he deplors, and whom he speaks of in a rather depreciatory way when comparing the commercial and manufacturing condition of the United States with that of Canada, and, strange to say, while the United States is in such a state of depression, while there is such misery there in consequence of the protective system—a system which the hon. gentleman advocated, I am told, with wonderful ability on the floor of the House, and within three years too—while he deplors the miseries of the position of United States manufactures, and, while he compares with exultation the flourishing state of our manufactures, he loses sight of the fact that the whole of the manufacturing population of England is at this moment awakening to a feeling of alarm at being undersold in their own markets by American manufacturers. The hon. gentleman is always offering a challenge to bring on a discussion on the trade question; but I think we must postpone that till by and bye, for the hon. gentlemen will have many opportunities during the present Session of vindicating his present opinions, if they continue to the end of the Session, or maintaining the opinions which he so ably advocated three Sessions ago. We most all concur in the language of the address with regard to the misfortune which happened to the city of St. John—a wonderful misfortune, a dreadful misfortune. A great woe passed over one of our commercial cities, and, while I would compliment the Government for their promptitude in coming forward in the manner they did, still I believe the country would have sustained them, and the Opposition in this House would have sustained them, had their aid not only been immediate but twice as liberal. With regard to the treaties with the Indians, of course we cannot judge of them until the papers are laid before the House. I am glad, however, to know that they no more onerous, or scarcely as onerous, as previous treaties. If it is so—and the House has no reason to think otherwise—of course we shall congratulate ourselves and the country must join in the congratulations and felicitations contained in the Address on that happy result having been arrived at. But with respect to the next paragraph, the eighth paragraph, regarding a number of Indians having come into this country, I think I must ask the hon. the Premier to make an alteration in its terms by amending it slightly, for I think it commits us in a manner to which I do not think the House will willingly commit itself. The paragraph reads:—

“That we learn, with much interest, that early in last summer, a large body of Indians under Sitting Bull, from the United States, crossed into British Territory, to escape from United States troops, and have since remained on the Canadian side; and that the United States Government made a friendly but unsuccessful attempt to induce these Indians to return to their reservations. And that we agree with His Excellency, in hoping that such arrangements may yet be made as may lead to their permanent and peaceful settlement, and thus relieve Canada of a source of uneasiness and a heavy expenditure.”

For my part I would be infinitely more pleased if arrangements could be speedily made to effect their peaceful removal, rather than their permanent and peaceful settlement.

MR. MILLS: It is so.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is quite the contrary. The Indians are in Canada, and their settlement must therefore be in Canada. I don't mean to say that such was the intention of hon. gentlemen opposite, if they say so, but they might obviate any difficulty by amending the clause so as to read: "And that we agree with His Excellency in hoping that such arrangements may yet be made, as may lead to their permanent and peaceful settlement or their peaceful removal."

MR. MACKENZIE: The intention certainly was settlement on their own reservations in the United States. We have no objection to make the change.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I hope the Government will consider it to be their paramount duty in dealing with these Indians, to remember that we have enough Indians of our own, and that we don't want the presence of others in our midst, especially of such as come to this country with the sanguinary feelings of a recent war rushing in their veins, and animated from day to day with these impulses to which savages are liable to rush across our borders into the United States and carry devastation, outrage and murder into that country. I observe there is no allusion whatever to the visit of the hon. the Minister of the Interior to Washington, which we saw mentioned in the newspapers, and there is no promise of papers in connection with that mission. Of course, what the nature and extent of the mission was we know not until we obtain these papers; but, looking at it as an outsider, it occurs to me, on the first impression, that it was a great and obvious mistake. The United States Government are bound to keep their own Indians out of our country as we are bound to keep our Indians out of the United States. It is true there must be a reasonable understanding between the two countries. We must control our Indians, we are constitutionally bound to do so; that by a savage impulse they shall not rush across our borders into the neighbouring country. The United States, could not, however, prevent those people coming into our country, although they were constitutionally bound to do so, and there must, of course, be a system of mutual concessions on account of the exceptional nature of the invasion. Nevertheless, the position is this: our borders were crossed and our country invaded by red-men from the United States, and we had a right to hold the United States, technically and constitutionally, to account for those Indians coming across into our country; but, if we send an ambassador to Washington where he makes terms to keep Sitting Bull still sitting in our country, I would prefer to present a petition to deprive him of his seat rather than keep him in the Dominion. It is quite clear that, unless that mission was of the most guarded nature, the fact of the hon. the Minister of the Interior or any member of the Canadian Government going to Washington to settle the matter there, instead of the United States Government sending an agent here to account, to apologise, to excuse or to justify the invasion from the United States, was an error that must be accounted for. There is no doubt regarding that point. In the Address we are called upon to state our pleasure at knowing that the surveys of the Pacific Railway have been pressed to completion during the past season, and we are told it is believed that the additional information now obtained will enable His Excellency's Government to determine which route is the most advantageous from Tête Jaune Cache to the sea. Well, it occurs to me that, if this information has been in the hands of the Government for any length of time, it should have enabled them to inform us that they have determined such route, whereas this resolution simply states that it is hoped, that it is believed. We on this side of the House are desperate believers: we may believe, and may be called upon to state that we believe that the additional information now obtained will enable them to determine which route is most advantageous. But when, how, or at what time is not stated, not even whether it is to be determined during the present Session or a year hence. We are not told when the information received will enable His Excellency's Government to determine the proper route. Hon. gentlemen opposite, after having seven year's surveys, to which the seconder of the Address has significantly alluded, and after having the whole results of the summer's surveys, ought to be now enabled—unless there are special reasons to the contrary—to determine as to what the proper route is. “Man never is, but always to be, blessed,” and we will be blessed by-and-by; and we will hope that some time in the early part of the Session the Government will be able to state what route has been determined on. One thing is clear: that the Government has determined that the Yellow-Head Pass is the pass through which the railway will go. I trust the Government will, at an early day, lay on the table all the surveys and reports they have received in order to justify that final conclusion. The 10th paragraph is a very remarkable one, and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) dwelt upon it with great unction. The paragraph reads:

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

“That we receive with much pleasure His Excellency's congratulations on the abundant harvest reaped in all quarters of the Dominion, and that under this and other influences there has been some improvement in the Revenue returns, thus indicating, as we trust with His Excellency, that the commercial depression that afflicted Canada in common with other countries, is passing away.”

I do not hear the passing bell. I think the depression still exists. If hon. gentlemen will look at any of the evidences that are patent before them, I think they must agree with us that the depression exists still. Look at the city of Montreal, at the state of the lumber trade in Ottawa, at the number of insolvencies here compared with the number in the United States; look at all or any of the evidences, and you will see we are called upon to be most desperate believers to believe that the depression is passing away. I would be glad if I could agree with that opinion; I would be happy to think that our abundant harvest or any other cause would remove the commercial depression, or was likely to remove it. The members of the Government are very modest. They claim no merits for removing it themselves. The fly-on-the-wheel policy still exists. The Government still feel that they must trust to the harvest, trust to atmospheric influences, trust to everything but statesmanlike conduct and administration. A feeling exists in the country that the Government might have, if only at first by an expression of sympathy, taken a step in the direction of assisting our industries and manufactures. If they had taken some such step, some confidence might have been placed in them. But there is a great feeling of want of confidence in the Government. Even with the abundant harvest, there is a want of confidence in their administrative power and in their faculty for legislating. The bill of fare shows what they have to submit. We are to have an improved system of auditing accounts. That is a very important thing in its way. Then we are to have greater facilities for reaching the North-West, a Homestead Law in the North-West and a registration of titles for the North-West. These are very well in their way, and I dare say to the inhabitants of Manitoba of some little use. We are to have an Independence of Parliament Act. These Independence of Parliament Acts require a great deal of legislation. And what is the first thing we shall have to consider in securing the independence of Parliament? The first thing will be to secure the electors of this country against the undue influence of the Crown; against the undue influence of Ministers of the Crown behind the back of the Crown. It is of more importance that we should put an end to that system of wholesale corruption and intimidation which has been used, I do not hesitate to say, by the present Government, than to prevent a single instance of bribery by a single candidate at a single election. I do not hesitate to say that there has been a system of Government influence used by the present Government for carrying elections which has been unheard of before in this country, and since the days of Walpole has never been heard of in England. Look, for instance, at the O'Donoghue case. And I call the attention of the House to it, not only with reference to the independence of Parliament, but with reference to the responsibility of Ministers to Parliament. Hon. gentlemen have charged us with acting as prerogative men, with over-riding the authority of Parliament, with not being sufficiently under the control of Parliament, with being negligent in the expenditure of public money; and we were told that with new men there would be new measures, that an age of purity would be introduced, and, more than all, there should be a complete system of Parliamentary control by which Government would be strictly a committee, an executive committee, bound to carry out the desires and expressed wishes of the representatives of the people in Parliament. Now, Sir, what have we in regard to the O'Donoghue case? When the hon. member for Victoria, N. B. (Mr. Costigan) made his motion last Session, and when he put into his resolution the reasons why this man O'Donoghue should receive no greater punishment than Riel and Lepine, which was pressed strongly on this side of the House and as strongly opposed by the Government, some of the language used by hon. gentlemen opposite on that occasion was most remarkable. One hon. gentleman, the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young), charged this side of the House with want of loyalty for voting in favour of any such resolution. That was in the spring of 1877. In November, 1877, an election was going on in Quebec, and, in order to secure a seat for one of the Administration, in order that the Government might not be placed in a ridiculous position, having taken him into the Ministry, after he had been driven from his original constituency, the Government came down and published a proclamation deliberately setting aside the vote of this House and the solemn declaration of Parliament. And why did they do it? They did it to secure the election of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. It was stated in the newspapers that the original Order in Council was passed in September. If that be not so, I should be glad to hear how it came to pass. But if it be so, the case stands still worse, because within four months, certainly within five, after the hon. the Premier had called upon his party to vote against the resolution I have referred to, they passed an Order in Council and carried it out for the purpose of influencing a body of people who they had found out were dissatisfied with their extraordinary conduct. How are the hon. gentlemen opposite to account for this wanton insult to Parliament. How is the hon. the Premier to account for setting aside the decision of his own friends, the decision of the majority in Parliament, after stating that it was disloyal to submit such a proposition. In this House, the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Ross) stated in April that he always voted, and always would vote, against any such proposition, and we, who always considered ourselves the embodiment of loyalty, were charged by the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young), with disloyalty. The House came to the conclusion, at the request and suggestion of the Government, and after a most able speech from the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) in defence of the policy of the Government of that time, that this man O'Donoghue had no right to an amnesty; and yet, four or five months after the rejection of that resolution by a vote of 106 to 60, for fear of the loss of some votes, the Government threw back in the face of their own followers and supporters, in the face of the representatives of the majority of the people, the resolution they themselves had voted against, and granted a pardon, a conditional pardon, which they had refused with contumely, which they had insulted the Opposition for pressing, and they granted it, no doubt, with a regard to the independence of Parliament. With regard to this independence of Parliament, hon. members may remember that some time in August last a deputation came up to Ottawa and waited on the hon. the Premier to enquire whether the Government could not do something to obtain the admission of Canadian shipping into French ports at reduced rates. The hon. the Premier received them, "with all that courtesy and kindness which is his distinguishing characteristic," as the newspapers say, and told them he could do nothing for them, that there must be an application made through the British Government to the French Government; Lord Carnarvon must be communicated with, and he must be asked to communicate with Lord Derby, who, in turn, must be asked to communicate with the French Government. In fact, he intimated to the deputation that a circumlocution office must be opened, and most politely bowed them out. But again a necessity arose. Quebec East must be won; the hon. gentleman the Minister of Inland Revenue must be elected. So down there comes a letter from the Premier to my dear friend Alderman Shehyn, who had met with the refusal I have mentioned, which he writes that some good and no harm might be done by his going to the French Consul, and trying to open communications with him with a view to an arrangement with the French Government for the reduction of rates upon Canadian ships entering their ports. That was on the 5th November, just as the election was coming on. It could not be heard of in August. It must be done through Lord Carnarvon and Earl Derby, and those connected with the Government of France; but in November the election was coming on, and so Alderman Shehyn was told to go and see the French Consul and make an informal arrangement.

MR. MACKENZIE: Read that letter.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I will read the letter, which is very striking. The hon. the Premier wrote:

"As you seem to think that some arrangement or understanding may be arrived at, though not formally concluded, with the French Consul, I need hardly say that I would be very glad indeed to have you communicate with that gentleman in any way you think best, and if anything can be done through him to facilitate the object we all have in view, to secure close commercial relations with France in articles produced by both countries, I shall be very glad."

That had not occurred to the hon. Premier when Mr. Shehyn came to Ottawa in August. The hon. the Premier did not say "Go to France, and if you cannot make a treaty make a basis—a preliminary, as they talk of it in Turkey just now—for a preliminary treaty." He did not say, "You send your suggestions to me, and I will send them to Lord Carnarvon, who will send them to Lord Derby, and they will go to Paris, and they will do something like what you suggest." He did not see it in that light then. He did not so see it until his spectacles were rubbed by the handkerchief sent by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, who would say, "There must be some way of doing it; I must be elected." I was saying that I hope the Bill for better securing the independence of Parliament may include a definite, strong and specific clause, prohibiting anything like Government influence at elections, or the Government finding out, at any particular moment, that any particular policy was best at the time; this should be met by a clause that no Minister who has just been sworn in, and could not possibly know the policy of the Government, should state in more than dubious terms that a certain policy would be carried out—for example, with respect to the repeal of the Insolvency Act. I think a clause of that kind would be of great service, and would protect the people against that sort of influence which is more dangerous—specimens of which we have seen at Quebec and Halifax—than the buying up of individual votes by candidates. There is a clause in the Address respecting some alteration in the Departments, the merits of which will depend on the terms of the measure introduced. Another clause states that is very desirable there should be uniform legislation in all the Provinces respecting the traffic in spirituous liquors. I am very glad the Government is going to bring the subject up before the House. It is a subject of the utmost importance and should be treated with due consideration of all the difficulties which surround the question. I hope the hon. the Premier will overcome all these difficulties, and I hope that he will not be deterred from carrying out any views on the subject at which he may arrive, by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). I hope that the hon. the Premier will have the opportunity now, and will embrace the opportunity,—he has embraced the opportunity, but I hope he will see it carried out, and that he will not allow the hon. member for West Middlesex, as he has been doing for the last two Sessions whenever any attempt has been made to deal with the question, to set it aside by a motion. I hope the hon. the Premier has taken this opportunity to free himself from the trammels of his followers, and will press for a total abolition, which was always his first love, and to which he recently told the people he was strongly attached himself. We are told in the last clause that the Estimates have been so prepared that all the branches of the public service shall be attended to, and that the public works shall be pressed forward without increasing the burden of taxation. We are to have no alteration of the tariff, no protection of any kind, no holding out of the hand to any interest, but the burden of taxation is not to be increased. I wonder what the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young) is going to say about that. Will he not insist upon a bounty for beet-root sugar? Will he not insist that that growing interest, on which he spoke so eloquently and so well the other day in the western country, where he had a responsive, a sympathetic, and an admiring audience,—will he not put his foot down and say that there must be always a protection for beet root sugar? If he does not, I have no doubt the hon. gentleman will have the independence of character which has always distinguished myself, and will shake the dust off his shoes, and will look to other sources for protection to that great and growing interest, beet-root sugar, in which his department is so strongly interested.

MR. YOUNG: I am afraid I would look in vain.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I was going to say I am afraid that my hon. friend, up in that country, if he does not do it, will be one of the dead beats, and to prevent that consumation I hope the hon. member will press upon the Government to reconsider that question, at all events as far as concerns beet-root sugar. If he will move that, and promise not to withdraw it at the end of the Session with the help of the Minister, I promise to support him. With these remarks I shall not move any amendment to the Address.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I have but very few words to say in reply to the remarks of the hon. gentleman opposite. I quite admit that, on this occasion, free comments may be made upon Ministerial utterances in the Speech from the Throne, although it is now and has been the practice for many years so to construct that document that there shall be nothing which will necessitate on the part of the Opposition the moving of any amendment, it has been thought desirable in our Parliamentary practice that it is better to postpone debates upon specific subjects of discussion in the House until those matters are brought forward before us by Bill or resolution, and I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman admits that the speech has been constructed this time fairly in that respect. Several matters, however, have called for a remark from me, and I shall make them in passing from one subject to another, following the hon. gentleman. He somewhat complains that no report of the exhibition at Sydney is promised. I have only to say that I expect to be able to lay that report before the House in a few days. I will make no remark upon the remarks of the hon. gentleman upon the person who represents Canada at Paris. I have only to say that the one paid Commissioner at Paris is a gentleman well known to himself and to the greater portion of the members here, from this quarter at all events—Mr. Thomas C. Keefer, selected for special considerations to represent the Government, a gentleman at once conversant with the French, German and English languages. I have no doubt whatever but that the mission will be well managed, and managed perhaps more economically than any other thing of the kind has been done hitherto. The hon. gentleman objected to the course we pursued with regard to the irruption of fugitive Indians from the United States into Canada. He told us that we were bound to call upon the United States to prevent their Indians crossing into our territory. I am sure the hon. gentleman could not have seriously meant that.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No, I did not say that.

MR. MACKENZIE: Well, I certainly understood so. I have taken down the words of the hon. gentleman. He said that we were bound to keep our Indians from their territory, and they ought to keep their Indians out of ours.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No, I said that by constitutional law adjoining countries were bound to prevent incursions over the border upon a neighbouring country; but, of course, this is an exceptional case, because neither the United States nor Canada could have control over these Indians.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes; but this was not a hostile incursion at all. This was a flight of fugitives from justice, perhaps, but they were simply fugitives after a hard fight with the United States troops; and I would no more think of using the official power of Canada to prevent them from seeking an asylum in our country, than I would in former days have prevented fugitive Negroes from receiving an asylum in this country. Canada is subject to these incursions at all times; and, if it really does impose a serious burden upon us and cause us uneasiness, still it is better that we should preserve our proverbial hospitality to fugitives of every kind. But I quite admit that it was desirable a representation should be made to the United States Government concerning the coming of these people into our territory. That representation was made in the regular way, through the British Minister at Washington, and I am bound to say, as the Speech says, that the United States Government made a friendly and I may say a zealous, although undoubtedly an unsuccessful, effort to have these Indians removed to their reservations. These Indian Chiefs were warned that it would be quite impossible that we should allow them to make our territory a base of operations against the United States, but that, if they remained peaceable, we should not refuse them that asylum which they sought, believing that they were safe only upon our territory. At the same time, it is undoubtedly desirable in the interests of both nations, and in the interests of the Indians on both sides of the border, that they should remain in their own territory—that our Indians should remain within our own boundaries, and that their Indians should remain within their own boundaries. Our Indians have remained within our own boundaries, and we have been compelled to concentrate a larger portion of our police force in the immediate vicinity of these poor fugitives in order to ensure respect for our national obligations. I am bound to say that up to this moment—and I say it with a great deal of pleasure—these American Indians have fairly understood the duties devolving upon them as citizens of another country, and that so far we have had no reason to complain of any overt act of theirs against those whom they consider their hereditary enemies. Now, Sir, with regard to the Pacific Railway paragraph, the hon. gentleman takes exception to it, that we ought to have been able to state at the present moment to the House whether we have chosen any route, and what that route is. The hon. gentleman will observe that the language is very guarded. I have stated there explicitly that “the additional information now obtained”—that is, it is obtained by the engineers, but the engineers have not been able to place the whole of that before us up to the present time, and probably two or three weeks will elapse before it is possible to present the whole features of the survey of the routes examined last year in such a shape as would justify the Government in coming to a final decision; and I am sure that I must command the sympathy even of the hon. gentleman when I say that it would be a great misfortune for the Government to be too precipitate, or, until they have the fullest possible information before them, to make a final decision on a matter so important to British Columbia, and so important to the interests of the Dominion. I have no doubt we shall be able, long before the House rises—that is my impression at present,—to lay not merely the information before the House, but also the final decision of the Government on the question. I trust this is all that any hon. gentleman will reasonably ask at our hands. The hon. gentleman says that depression is not passing away; that he sees no signs of it; that improvement in the revenue returns is no sign to him. I would have scarcely maligned the hon. gentleman if I had said he feared it was passing away. In one of our comic papers, some months ago, there was a representation of a dilapidated figure called "Hard Times," who was taking his departure from Canada, while another—not an hon. gentleman who speaks on this subject sometimes—who represented the hard times politically, was begging and entreating this lonely desperate-like fugitive not to take his departure now, for he wished to avail himself of his services for the coming election.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He is going to do it.

MR. MACKENZIE: I am afraid he will not do it. The truth is, Sir, that the hon. gentleman is much more concerned about struggling politicians than struggling industries. He finds much more difficulty in keeping the heads of the struggling politicians above the water than the manufacturers do with their struggling industries. However, Sir, I do not propose for a moment to enter upon the discussion of trade matters at the present time, further than making these passing remarks. I object entirely to the sweeping assertion that the hon. gentleman made, that this Government did, this last year, or in any year, or at any time, use its official influence in intimidating, as he says, the electors of this country; and I am sure that I can venture to defy the hon. gentleman to point to a single instance where anything of the kind was done. With regard to what the hon. gentleman says about the shipping interests of this country in connection with the French tariff, he must remember that papers came before this House two years ago on that subject—two Sessions ago,—that a gentleman in Quebec certified that, on the occasion of a visit of mine to Quebec (not Mr. Shehyn, for I never saw him on the subject), at that particular visit to Mr. Rosa, a well known shipbuilder and a well known political ally of the hon. gentleman opposite, in that discussion—in that friendly discussion with this gentleman in an office in that city, I discussed fully what could be done. His sole desire was that we should negotiate with the French Consul. I pointed out to him that it was quite impossible to do such a thing; that no negotiations could be made with any person except through an official source. But, seeing a letter from that gentleman in the papers, I addressed a communication to the French Consul to ask whether he was authorized in any way whatever to have any communication with this Government upon that subject. The reply of the Consul showed that he was not so authorized to do anything of the kind. These letters were all published in the newspapers, and it was natural, when my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue was a candidate in the city of Quebec, and it was publicly denied by some parties that any efforts whatever had been made by this Government in the direction of procuring a modification of the French tariff, that I appealed publicly to these letters and advised the parties to apply to Mr. Rosa for them, who would be able, and no doubt, willing to state all that had been said on the subject. It was not necessary that we should resort to anything at all unfair and improper, and we did not resort to anything unfair and improper. And in that, as in other matters, I have no doubt that when the papers that may be asked for are brought down, it will be seen that we acted with the utmost possible judiciousness, and that, while avoiding any course which would bring us in conflict with the Imperial authorities, through whom all actions of this kind must be taken, we did not commit ourselves to any action with the French Government irrespective of Imperial or other considerations. I have only to say further, Sir, that, when the measures which are foreshadowed in the Speech come before the House, I have no doubt that they will realize in this Session as they have in past Sessions the approbation of the general public as well as of the vast majority of the members of this House. The hon. gentleman has on this occasion, as he has on previous occasions, alluded to the paucity of the measures foreshadowed in the Speech, the meagreness of the bill of fare, as he calls it. On a former occasion, I contrasted our legislation with that which he left upon the Statute book when he crossed the floor of the House, and I think I was able to show, as I might show now, that not only is our bill of fare in excess as to quantity of any offered by that hon. gentleman, but that it is altogether superior to it as to quality. As to the legislation promoted by the Government in former years, I am not afraid to trust the reputation of this Government in a comparison between its legislation and that of the previous Administration. I do not desire to say anything with reference to some remarks of the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), as I am desirous that a fair latitude should be given to any hon. gentleman in his position on an occasion of this kind. I am able to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address upon the manner in which they have accomplished their tasks. It is quite true, Sir, that my hon. friend who seconded the Address has on many occasions addressed the House with that remarkable intelligence which characterizes all his utterances, but I think the hon. member for Kingston might have remembered that my hon. friend from Lower Canada who moved the Address, and moved it so well, to all intents and purposes, was one of the younger men, a young and rising man, one who has not hitherto made any long speeches in this House, but has confined himself to a modest discharge of his duties. That he is capable of supplementing his able discharge of legislative duty by his addresses in the House, has been abundantly proved to-day. The hon. gentleman reverted to some intrigue in connection with placing O'Donoghue on the same footing as Riel and Lepine, and contended that the action of the Government was dictated by a desire to aid the Minister of Inland Revenue in his election. The hon. gentleman will find, when the papers come down, that the matter was practically settled long before we anticipated an election in Quebec at all. He will also know that the matter was never referred to publicly, that I am aware of, at the election in Arthabaska. The hon. gentleman will find that we proceeded from a view of public policy, for which, be it right or wrong, we are responsible to this House, and are prepared to bear the responsibility. But I utterly deny that we resorted to anything in connection with that matter to influence the election in Quebec. On the contrary, we abstained purposely from such a course, because the matter had been referred to after we had come to a formal decision, which was referred to the authorities at home for approval. This, Sir, is the entire course of the Government in regard to that particular matter, and it is one of which the Government need not be ashamed, nor has any member of this House any reason to find fault with it.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. MASSON said he would have been happy to congratulate the hon. mover of the Address in the quality of a junior member of the House, but he could hardly claim that quality, and every member would be quite justified in judging him with all the severity usual in commenting upon the utterances of an older member. He (Mr. Masson) would however, sincerely compliment him on his happy début, which would entitle him to say that it was to be regretted that the hon. gentleman's debating powers had not been exercised sooner and when the great interests of this country and his Province were at stake. He feared that the compliment conferred by the Government on the hon. member was not a very flattering one, and that, knowing his great abilities, the Government might have availed itself of his services when it had need of all the ability which unmistakably existed on the Government side of the House and hailing from the Province of Quebec, and not when the Speech from the Throne told the House that nothing but ordinary administrative questions required the attendance of the people's representatives. And why had the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) selected an old member to do this duty? It was evidently because he (Mr. Mackenzie) could not find a newly-elected French-speaking Canadian from Lower Canada who would approve of the facts of the Government. Nevertheless, three elections had taken place within the last year in the Province of Quebec, one in the District of Montreal, one in the District of Quebec, and one in the District of Three Rivers; and the Government could not find one hon. gentleman of these returned who would take the responsibility of endorsing its past conduct. These hon. gentlemen were, nevertheless, perfectly qualified for the task in question. Those who knew the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Bourbeau) were aware that he was capable of proposing the reply to the Speech from the Throne if he desired to do so; and everybody knew that the hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Méthot) was able creditably to perform this duty; and, besides, there was the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Malouin), who replaced the Hon. Mr. Cauchon, and who also was perfectly competent to undertake this duty. But not one of these hon. gentlemen desired to do so, not one of them would accept the responsibility of endorsing the acts of the Government. The hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. De St. Georges) had been extremely unhappy in spite of the excellent speech he had made. The hon. member had committed a mistake, and it was this: he had forgotten that the occasion of moving the reply to the Speech from the Throne was not a favourable one for raising a stormy and recriminative discussion. He considered the hon. gentleman very unhappy in alluding to the amnesty question, for, if there was a political party which should lower its head in shame when speaking of this subject, it certainly was the Liberal party for Lower Canada, which had obeyed the absurd and humiliating instruction given them by the First Minister. And, if to-day the Government could not induce a new member from Lower Canada to propose the Address, it was perhaps precisely on account of the reaction which had there taken place with regard to the Government and its policy, as manifested under the present circumstances. And one of the principal causes of this reaction in the Province of Quebec, felt by the Liberal party of that Province, was due to the policy of the Government regarding this amnesty question. The situation

MR. MASSON.

they presented naturally proved the justice and reasonableness of the course which was adopted by the Conservative members of the House from Lower Canada two or three years ago. They were evidently right when they had then demanded an amnesty touching the North-West difficulties, and as he had declared at that time, he now repeated, that a great fault had been committed by both political parties, by not granting a general amnesty, as was customary among all civilized nations, under such circumstances. Only two or three years before the sad events in the North-West, an insurrection of a graver nature had, if he remembered well, broken out in one of the Turkish islands of the Mediterranean. Several lives were lost, property destroyed, and, nevertheless, one or two years afterwards a general amnesty had been granted to the insurgents and peace restored. Could they have demanded less from the Government of a more civilized country under the circumstances? They had insisted upon securing such an amnesty; and had their friends from Lower Canada on the Ministerial side of the House assisted them, they, united, would have forced the Government to do justice in the matter, and prevented the existence of the difficulty which now existed. In place of doing so, the Government had caused to be passed some time since an illogical and absurd resolution which set forth that an amnesty had been promised by his right hon. friend from Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), and nevertheless did not accord it. The fact was disclosed that Riel had, under charge from the Crown, taken up arms in defence of his country and consequently, it was absurd that a man who had so defended his country, should during the space of five years have been banished and made to bear the mark of the pariah on his forehead. And, if the Liberal members from Lower Canada had acted as they were in duty bound to have done, their humiliation of to-day would have been spared them. He was not only forced by the circumstances to reproach the Liberal members from Lower Canada with their conduct, but also the Irish Liberal members of the House. To the Liberal party who now spoke of and wished to make political capital of the case of O'Donoghue, he to-day said, as he had said to the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Devlin), two years ago,—“It is your fault if O'Donoghue is not pardoned; it is your fault if he is not included in the amnesty for which my hon. friend (Mr. Costigan) moved.” This hon. gentleman had proposed a resolution, the wisdom of which the Government had since admitted, and had these Liberal members followed the course adopted by the French-Canadian Conservatives, the difficulty of to-day would have been removed. Despite the appeal made by his hon. friend (Mr. Costigan), the member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Devlin), and the member for Halifax (Mr. Power), remained dumb in their seats, or, rather, one of them, instead of remaining dumb, rose in his place to say that O'Donoghue was an informer, and they all voted against the motion made by his hon. friend (Mr. Costigan). The Irish Liberal members had acted towards his hon. friend (Mr. Costigan), who was defending the Irish cause, in the same manner as the French-Canadian Liberals had acted towards his hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), and himself two or three years ago; and those hon. members were certainly the most to be blamed if the amnesty which was demanded had not been granted. He would remind the Irish Liberal members of the House, that they had no right to reproach the Government because O'Donoghue was so long kept an exile, but the Conservative members had such a right. The Irish Liberal members could not reproach the Liberal Government in regard to this matter, because the Government had only done what they had told them to do. A different course should have been taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and, if they had not been able to secure that complete amnesty which all Lower Canada demanded, they ought to have remained silent, and not have compromised the cause in question by a sham amnesty, which yielded up the whole case to the dissatisfaction of the parties interested. Nevertheless, a complete amnesty would yet be granted, and he would tell the Minister of Inland Revenue that such a full amnesty would be obtained in spite of them. The general movement of indignation which existed among the population, in this regard, and in particular among the Irish, who had considered themselves ill used, indicated that an unreserved amnesty would one day be granted in spite of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

MR. BLANCHET: And before the general elections.

MR. MASSON: Precisely. He would tell the French Liberal members that they should have followed the example set to them by their fathers in 1843 or 1844. When Papineau was in exile they had demanded an amnesty for the rebels of 1837. The petition of the Legislature was refused. Did they then say as the Liberals of to-day said: “It is impossible, England will not consent.” No; they reiterated their demand, and reiterated it until at last it was granted. What would the old Liberals of 1837 and 1844 have said if the Government of the day had dared to come to them and ask them to consent to the banishment of their leaders, and to attach to them the stigma of guilt? They would have unanimously answered, “Condemn them if you choose, but at least do not ask us to be parties to their condemnation.” If those who once believed that a complete amnesty should be granted had stood together, past events had proved to them, that M. Riel would not to-day be in an insane asylum, and O'Donoghue would not be an exile. And why had not such an amnesty been accorded? If an amnesty had been promised, it had been promised to O'Donoghue as well as to the others, and if it had not been promised the Liberals had no right to vote that it had been. The resolution which had been presented to the House pleased him from another point of view, inasmuch as it completely justified the course which had taken by his hon. friend from Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) with regard to two important questions—the Washington Treaty and the North-West Territories, to the latter of which he would only refer. It was declared in the resolution that the prosperity of the Dominion depended in great part on the rapid colonization of the fertile lands of the North-West, and that it was desirable and necessary to facilitate this as much as was possible. The House would remember that some years ago the late and lamented Sir George E. Cartier was attacked by his opponents on all the hustings of the Province of Quebec, and accused of having annexed that country, that immense territory which would be the ruin of the old Provinces. With this question and those of the amnesty, and of the New Brunswick Schools, they had hounded down that noble statesman and, he did not fear to state, had hastened his premature death. The House remembered all this, and, nevertheless, to-day they saw the policy of that much-abused statesman receive its full justification at the hands of his most inveterate adversaries. The latter declared that the annexation of the North-West Territory would ruin this country, but Sir George E. Cartier had maintained that there lay the future of this country. Sir George E. Cartier could not but have wondered at the immense strides made by the neighbouring republic, and have seen that this was not due to the progress of the Eastern States, however great they might have been, but to the immense advancement of the Western States. If they examined the census of the United States in all its parts, they would see that the population had not, on the whole, increased in the Eastern States as it had in the Dominion of Canada, but that the great inflow of population, and the increased prosperity and trade of that country as a whole was to be ascribed in a great measure to the very great prosperity of the Western States. The member for Kingston and this great man (Sir George E. Cartier) were of opinion that the future of this country also lay in the West; that those fertile tracts were destined to be peopled by our children and the children of our children. But the leaders of the Quebec Liberal party, imbued with those advanced ideas by which they were so eminently distinguished, maintained that the acquisition of the North-West would be the ruin of this country. And it was not so very long since the Finance Minister had told the House that it was not desirable to press forward too rapidly the colonization of that country, as the grasshopper scourge would imperil the crops in that region. Two paragraphs of the Address were devoted to the Sydney and Paris Expositions. If he desired to speak with the severity which had characterized the hon. member opposite, he would say that these two paragraphs were mere talk; for what useful purpose was served in announcing that we were about to secure openings for the sale of our industrial products in other countries, when we were not able under existing circumstances to supply the consumption of our own. It was now three years since the Minister of Public Works promised to obtain outlets for our industrial products in the West Indies. In 1875 the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) had spoken of the importance of the West Indies as a market for our products, and the Minister of Public Works had replied that the Government would look into the matter. In 1876, the subject came under notice once more—and the Minister of Public Works had again replied that the Government would look into the matter. In 1877, the Minister of Public Works had made the same response. The trade and shipping of the Maritime Provinces demanded such an opening; return cargoes in sugar were required; and, nevertheless, the Government had done nothing. But they said that they would make reports and open up a market at the antipodes when they could or would not open up one with countries at our own door. This was, to use a French idiom—mettre la charrue devant les bœufs—putting the cart before the horse. The first thing to be done in this regard was to protect our industries and to create such national industries as would suffice for our needs; and this was to be accomplished before we should attempt to seek an outlet for surplus products that in fact did not exist and would not exist for a long time, if the Government did not abandon its fly-on-the-wheel policy.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MR. MASSON said that when the House rose he was drawing their attention in French to what he considered one of the most evident proofs of the reaction which was going on at the present day in this country, and his statement was justified by the fact that the mover and seconder of the Address, instead of being taken from the junior ranks of the House of Commons, had to be taken by the Administration from the older members. That applied more to the Province of Quebec than any other Province. In that Province since the last Session three elections had taken place, and at those three elections had been returned three members who were every one of them fit and competent to deliver themselves creditably before this House. As the Address was usually confided to the junior members of this House, how was it, then, that the Government had not chosen one of those? For the very reason that they had not been able to return a single man who was ready to abide by and ready to endorse the action of the Government of Canada. Why was that reaction going on in Quebec as well as in other Provinces? Why was it spreading so fast over this country, and especially over the Province of Quebec? There were many reasons. The first of those reasons was the dissatisfaction with which the Province of Quebec, and the Liberals themselves of the Province of Quebec viewed their present leaders, not on account of their lack of ability, but their lack of energy and their failure to act up to the traditions of the Liberal party. He was not the judge whether the Liberal party were right or wrong in their views of their leaders. The manifestation of their discontent dates from the withdrawal of Mr. Fournier from the Cabinet. Last year he had stated how the Quebec section of the Liberal press had on that withdrawal indicated that it was only preparatory to the retirement of the others,—Messrs. Letellier, Geoffrion, and Huntington, who should make place for others who would better bring in accord the best traditions of liberalism with the exigencies of new situations, and Mr. Cauchon was chosen to fulfil this task. A few months afterward the press again showed clearly that Mr. Cauchon did not represent the feeling of the Province, and declared that he did not truly represent the feelings of the party, and that there was a new star arising in the horizon, and that new star was the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Laflamme). No sooner had the Minister of Justice taken his seat as a Minister of the Crown than the Liberal party, rightly or wrongly,—he (Mr. Masson) was not their judge—decided that the present Minister did not represent the feelings—prejudices, if they chose—of the Province, and he also fell into disfavour. What did an hon. gentleman, the friend of the Minister of Inland Revenue, one of the most able and liberal exponents of liberal ideas (Mr. Fabre) say on the appointment of the present Minister of Inland Revenue?—not that the Minister of Finance had justified the expectations of his friends, but on the contrary he, in most unmistakable terms indicated that the nomination of Mr. Laurier was the commencement of a new era; that Mr. Laurier was not a man who would be led; that the want of the moment was a more complete representation of the wants and requirements of the Province; wants and requirements which must be met under penalty of falling into discredit. It was not generally advisable to give too great importance to newspaper articles; nevertheless, the editor of the "Evenement" was the nominee of his Government in the Senate, an intimate, personal and political friend of the Hon. Minister of Inland Revenue, and he was quite justifiable in presuming that he did represent the feelings and sentiment of the Liberals from the district of Quebec. How could they be surprised that the reaction has existed, and how could they be surprised that reaction continued strongly at the present moment. Not only did the Liberal party not have that confidence which they should have had in the present leaders from the Province of Quebec, but the usual inspirer of his hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue went still further, and admitted that the position was not that in which they should be at the present moment; that the leader of the Government himself was not the proper man in the place he occupied. In citing that article from that newspaper, he was citing the opinions of a man who was considered in the Province of Quebec to be not only the intimate friend of the Minister of Inland Revenue, but to have the same ideas, the same aspirations and the same desires as those of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue and of the gentleman who took him by the hand after his defeat and procured his return for Quebec East. The friendship between them had been mutual, because they had the same high intelligence and the same political belief. He should read the opinion of the sole exponent of Liberal ideas in the French Press of the city of Quebec, and it was only a corroboration of the opinion of the Liberals of the Province. It gave the key to the whole situation in that Province, and they would understand the situation in that Province as well as it could possibly be understood from the following extract:—

“The news of Mr. Blake’s retirement has naturally caused a deep impression in the country. This is the second time since the accession to power of the Liberals that this eminent statesman resigns his portfolio. The motive assigned to his first withdrawal was his desire of devoting himself exclusively to his profession. The reason given this time is ill health. It is unfortunately certain that this reason is to a great extent real, and that Mr. Blake is really suffering.

“This is not, however, an ailment which comes within the category of ordinary ailments. It is rather moral than physical. To understand it thoroughly one must remember that Mr. Blake is one of those men who can only be content with the first positions, both on account of his great talents and his independence of character. In a secondary position, under a leader inferior to themselves, and obeying intellectual aspirations quite different, they are uneasy, and cannot give the full measure of their abilities, and this state, for a superior mind, is the most painful of annoyances. Obligated to follow a current different from that which their powerful genius (souffle puissant) would have created, they suffer at the idea of not being themselves, and at being unable to spread out freely their wings. They feel themselves as prisoners, and bite their bit.

“In Mr. Blake’s particular case, it is quite evident that, on the one hand Mr. Mackenzie has too much personal worth to be a mere figure head, but, on the other he has not enough personal worth to absorb his rival. Hence overstretched relations between the leader, and the follower greater than the leader. Mr. Blake does his utmost to accept a secondary rôle. Under pressure from his friends he now and then enters the Ministry, but it is only to think about retiring from it. His free intelligence is smothered in this business atmosphere, and his powerful faculties, with difficulty, yield to those petty resorts which move parties.

“Mr. Blake has for five years occupied in our ranks a position of which everybody has felt the awkwardness (la gêne) and of which he should have freed himself in retiring from public life during the present Parliament. He would not then have embarrassed his friends, nor weakened his own prestige, nor would he have been subject to the contre-coups et tiraillements of a rôle too narrow for his abilities. Unable to betray his party, he has abandoned for its sake the realisation of his hopes and of his ideas. He has allowed his Aurora speech to fall into oblivion; he has done his best to follow in the wake, and to enclose himself in the rather narrow political circle we are running in. He has uselessly worn himself out in this sterile work, and one must not be surprised if intellectual impatience now and then takes hold of him, and if he attempts to escape from the obscure undertaking into which circumstances have condemned him.

“If Mr. Blake had stood aloof during five years, he would to-day be the man of the day, and he could impose himself on all, Liberals and Conservatives would be obliged to accept him. It is a pity for the country that things cannot be so. With a man like Mr. Blake at the head of the Government, our policy would have changed; it would have become far more fruitful and bold than under the direction of a positive mind like Mr. Mackenzie, or of an old tactician like Sir John A. Macdonald; instead of diminishing ourselves in petty party strife, we could have undertaken under the impulsion of a powerful mind, solution of the problem of our future.”

He did not wish to endorse this rather uncomplimentary article on the Hon. the Premier.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear,

Mr. MASSON: Hon. gentlemen thought he was not sincere, but he was entirely sincere and he was one of those men who liked to be proud of men on each political side, and the higher the character of the members of the Government the higher he thought of his country and himself. He was not, however, reading his own sentiments but the sentiment of the organ of the party. How could they be surprised if there was a reaction in the Province of Quebec when the Liberal party had no confidence in their leaders? What had been going on since the general election of 1874? There had been about eighteen or nineteen elections in the Province of Quebec. Of these nineteen the Conservatives had carried all but two, or in every case they had either increased their majority or decreased their minority, or had taken the constituencies from their opponents. These results were felt from down the Gulf, and came up nearly to the county represented by his hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton). In the county of Dorchester four years ago, his worthy friend, the present member (Mr. Rouleau), was elected by a majority of 21. He had to go back to his electors, and he was re-elected by 46; majority. His friend, Mr. Harper, was elected in 1874 by 45 majority in the county of Gaspé, and he was now replaced by an hon. gentleman (Mr. Short) as efficient as himself, who had been elected by a majority of 250. In the county of Joliette his hon. friend (Mr. Baby) was elected in 1874 by a majority of 45. He went back to his constituents and was re-elected by a majority of 163. In L'Assomption his hon. friend (Mr. Hurteau) was returned at the general election by a majority of 61; but, on going back, he was elected by acclamation. In 1874, Montreal West returned a gentleman to support the Government by a majority of 594. At that time Montreal expected great things from this Government. They expected that our industries would have been fostered, and that a railway would have been built, according to the plan of the late Government, across this continent, which would have brought wealth and prosperity to the city of Montreal. They were disappointed, and that majority dwindled down to some 50 at the last election. The county of Beauce was represented in 1874 by an out-and-out supporter of the Administration, who was elected by acclamation. The Opposition could not get a man to put in the field. At the last election that county returned the present member (Mr. Bolduc) as an Independent, and, as a rule, he had acted as an Independent.

MR. DYMOND: We are all Independents on this side.

MR. MASSON said, if that remark had come from any one but the hon. member, it might be serious. Quebec Centre had been represented by a Minister of the Crown, but the present member had been returned as an Independent, and, at all events, he had not proposed the Address. Berthier was represented in 1874 by Mr. Pâquet, who was all powerful in that county, but the electors had returned the present member (Mr. Cuthbert) by a Conservative majority of 272. Chambly elected Mr. Jodoin to support the Government in 1874, by a majority of 100; but it was now represented by a Conservative who had received a majority of 150. Charlevoix had elected Mr. Tremblay by 203 majority. It was now represented by Mr. Langevin.

MR. MACKENZIE: What was his majority?

MR. MASSON: Greater than that of the Minister elected in Jacques Cartier. If they took the counties represented by Ministers of the Crown, they found them falling one after the other. By whom were they replaced? In Napierville, Mr. Dorion was raised to the Bench, and an Independent was elected in his place. In Bellechasse, Mr. Fournier was raised to the Bench and that county was now represented by his hon. friend Mr. Blanchet, who was elected with a comparatively enormous majority. Kamouraska, again, had been represented by a Minister of the Crown, but, when once the county was opened, his hon. friend the present member (Mr. Roy) was elected. Then let them take Drummond and Arthabaska, and if there was one county in which the verdict of the people had been fairly given against the Government, it was the county of Drummond and Arthabaska; if there was a county in which the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue should have been elected, it was that county; if there ever was a member who had everything in his favour in regard to his election, and in regard to his popularity, and who deserved to be elected, and probably would have been elected if he had not entered the Government in this House, where he was an honour to his party, it was the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier). But he had been beaten by Mr. Bourbeau by 230 majority. The defeat was not a personal one against the hon. member, but the county had elected a gentleman equal to himself in business transactions. It was not Mr. Laurier, but it was the Government of the day that was defeated. He would not enter into the question of the reasons which changed that majority by 200 or 300 at this time. What was the reason of the downfall of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec, the rapid disintegration of that party, their falling in crumbs all around in every part of that Province? It was this, that they had had at their head men whom he esteemed, but who did not possess sufficient energy to cause their ideas to predominate when it was in their power. Instead of doing that, they had availed themselves of the opportunity to use the prerogative of the Crown to place themselves in office. The most able and considerate of them all, Mr. Dorion, who was to change and undo all the wrong done by poor Sir George Cartier, was no sooner on the Government benches than he was already thinking of taking a position on the Bench, and now he had accepted a position which he worthily filled, but which it would have been more pleasant to them in Lower Canada to see him accept under other circumstances. Then there was Mr. Fournier, who also worthily filled his present position in the Supreme Court. But was it to give him that position that the Liberals of Lower Canada gave him their confidence? No, it was in order that he might be in a position to speak their views, and defend their interests. He was, however, not one Session in that position before he went on the Bench. Take another minister, one who occupied the highest position in Lower Canada to-day. He was a man who the people believed would be useful to his party, which declared, or at least some of them did, that he was able to defend their principles and ideas. He, however, also got his position. The next year—for a Lower Canadian Minter dropped out every year—Mr. Cauchon gave to himself the high position which he occupied to-day; and public rumour said another Minister, before four months were over, would also have left the Government. It was not, therefore, matter for surprise that the reaction was going on in the Province of Quebec, when he had shown, as clearly as possible, first, that the Liberal party in that Province had, rightly or wrongly, no confidence in its leaders; and secondly that leaders in whom they trusted had, one by one, abandoned them, not to remain as private members, but to obtain for themselves lucrative positions. There was another reason for the reaction which is going on in the Province of Quebec. There was a time when the old Conservative leader, Sir George Cartier, was exposed to all the contumely which a political party could thrust upon him. He was considered by the Quebec Liberals as the old Tory and accused by the whole Liberal party as being a priest-ridden man. A few years after death had carried him away, the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue delivered a lecture in Quebec, and instead of depreciating Sir George Cartier, raised him almost to Heaven, so high that they could scarcely look upon him. He said in his lecture that the Conservatives of to-day were not like Sir George Cartier, but were endeavouring to form a Catholic party, and to cast away those high and noble principles of the British Constitution. Sir George Cartier was a Constitutionalist, they said. But, if Sir George were to rise again, said the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue in his lecture, he would no longer know his followers. The people of Quebec were sensible and understood hon. gentlemen opposite very well. They said they could not have confidence in the Liberals when they now sought to raise an altar to Sir George Cartier whom they had previously denounced. There was yet enough public morality to render it useless to endeavour to prove that a man was a rogue and an honest man at the same time. Not only the Conservatives, but a large body of the Liberals of the Province of Quebec, were becoming discouraged and disgusted with the Government. Those gentlemen, before acceding to power and shortly afterwards, made many promises. They declared that the industries of the country were going to ruin, and nothing else but a protective policy would protect them. He had proved this by the words of Mr. Joly himself. It had been said by the Minister of Inland Revenue in his contest that such was only his private opinion. He had stated before, and repeated now that it was not simply Mr. Joly's private opinion, for protection to manufacturing industries was a principal part of the policy of the National party before 1874. Mr. Joly did not make that statement as an opinion, but as a fact, as every member could see by referring to his letter on the subject, and any contradiction on that score is a contradiction of Mr. Joly himself. There was another reason why the people of Lower Canada were disgusted with the Liberals generally. That party all over the world pretends to be the party of progress. They pretended that they were for progress, for the advancement of their country. He did not mean to attack the Liberals of Ontario—he believed they were better now—but there was no body of men less inclined for progress than the Liberals of the Province of Quebec. When Sir George Cartier was building the Grand Trunk they were hounding him down as extravagant, but many had since declared that they had been very foolish. They were opposed to the building of the Grand Trunk Railway, which, while it had cost the country a considerable sum, had repaid it two hundred fold. They opposed the Intercolonial Railway scheme, which was to unite the Provinces of the Dominion together, and their leader was so much against it that he resigned office. Then there was the great Pacific Railway, which, whether it was built in one way or another, would be to the mutual advantage of the Provinces through which it passed; it was a necessity for our trade; we could not exist without it,—we must fill up that country as fast as possible. What did the Liberals do? From the beginning, to the present moment they had opposed it; they had condemned the mode of making it; they had said it was a useless sacrifice of money; and they had told the people of the country that it would involve an expenditure of two hundred and fifty millions; it would ruin the country, and yet they were building it by a more expensive process than the former Government proposed. There was a railway enterprise started in the Province of Quebec, an enterprise which deserved the approbation and commendation of every gentleman present, and which was commended by many Liberals from other Provinces, but the Liberals from Quebec opposed it entirely; they not only opposed the execution, but they opposed the enterprise itself. They said it would raise taxation, and if it had not been for the Globe newspaper and his friend the Minister for Public Works—if they had been left to the tender mercies of the Liberals of Quebec—those connected with the enterprise would have been ruined and the country seriously embarrassed.

MR. MASSON.

MR. SPEAKER called the hon. member to order.

MR. MASSON said he was speaking upon a matter of history and he believed that he was in order.

MR. SPEAKER said he could not speak of matters appertaining to another House.

MR. MASSON said that Mr. De Boucherville had been accused of being a Reactionist and behind the times in his ideas. He had, however, carried out that of which Quebec Liberals would never have dreamed, the North Shore Railway, and that great desideratum of all progress—the ballot—was given to Quebec by Mr. DeBoucherville and his Government. There was another reason why the Quebec Liberal party would be swept away, and the members of the party and the people knew it. It was that they had taken from the Conservative ranks men whom they (the Liberals) had always despised and held up as the incarnation of corruption. The most damning accusation that could be brought against hon. gentlemen opposite was to repeat what they had said of one another. Did they think the people of the Province of Quebec were entirely blind? Did they think that, after stating that Mr. Cauchon was the most corrupt man in the country, and accepting him subsequently, the people would believe them in regard to other matters? The people said that the Government had taken the most corrupt man amongst the Conservatives and placed him in the Liberal ranks, and he had only to shift from the Conservative ranks to find himself placed over their shoulders. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had said, in Drummond and Arthabaska, in his (Mr. Masson's) presence, that he had never approved of the position given to Mr. Cauchon, and he said this: "If we have taken him dirty, we give him back clean to you." He remembered the fact very well, because he had hinted at the time to one of the hon. gentleman's followers: "That is not very clever; you cannot clean a dirty thing without dirtying yourselves." This was not all. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue—he spoke under correction from the hon. gentleman, for he had not heard this himself—speaking in his own county, said that he had been offered a seat in the Cabinet in 1876, and that he had refused it on account of a certain matter which he wished to see rectified. He desired to direct the attention of the hon. the Premier to this matter, which was of great importance. Before last Session, he had heard it stated in Quebec that a seat in the Government had been offered to the present Minister of Inland Revenue, and the report was spread broadcast over the country that that hon. member was too proud, and justly so, to accept it, on account of the presence of Mr. Cauchon in the Cabinet. He (Mr. Masson) had put the question before the House thus, as seen in Hansard:

"The explanation was very good so far as it went, but the hon. the First Minister must not forget that rumours were circulated in the Province to the effect that more than one gentleman had been offered a seat in the Cabinet, and more than one had refused. The rumour went that certain most extraordinary reasons were given by a gentleman who now sat in this House for refusing a seat in the Cabinet. The statement in regard to the offer of a seat to Mr. Joly, and to that gentleman declining it, was made in such a way as to lead the House to believe that no similar offer was made to any other gentleman."

Mr. MASSON.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MASSON said he was glad to hear such was the fact. It would be, therefore, desirable that the report of a Cabinet seat having been offered to others should be denied, and they should know if the hon. the head of the Government went freely and openly to Mr. Joly and offered him a seat, and offered it to no one else, and that no gentleman was placed in the position of refusing it because the President of the Council was a member of the Cabinet. It was, then, a fact that no member of the Liberal party had given as his reason for refusing to accept a Cabinet seat, that he would not sit with the President of the Council, and that none could, therefore, take credit for having done so. The statement of the hon. the Premier was a most serious one after what had been said by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue in the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska. Of course if that hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) said he did not make that statement, the House was bound to accept his denial.

Mr. LAURIER: Go on.

Mr. MASSON said he would quote the hon. gentleman's remarks as they appeared in an elaborate report which was not published until some days after the delivery of the speech, so as to give ample time for reflection. The speech was delivered at Stanford, and according to the report in the National, an organ of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue said—and this had been repeated to him by many gentlemen who were present—"In 1876 I refused a portfolio in the Government of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, because there were some things I wished to see rectified." That serious matter must be explained between the hon. gentlemen themselves. A Minister of the Crown, when interpolated by the leader of the Opposition as to the changes which had taken place in the Government, was expected to give, and no doubt thought he gave, a true statement of the facts; but the statement must not only be exactly true, but the hon. gentleman must avoid leading the House into error, and if he had a single mental reservation, he was bound in honour to give it to the House. The hon. the Premier distinctly admitted that a seat in the Government had not been offered to any other gentleman; yet, according to the speech of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, he was offered a seat in 1876 and declined it. If that were not so, the hon. gentleman had been much slandered, for while he had heard the matter frequently referred to, he had not heard any other version than that which he had now given to the House. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue also said, in a lecture which he gave, that he was not one of those Liberals from the Province of Quebec—those demoniacs, as he called those who had inherited from the L'Avenir newspaper. His models were not here, but comprised the great Liberals of England. The gentlemen on this side were no models for him, he must find them in Palmerston, Gladstone, and Hartington, and the great leaders of public opinion in England. He would ask the hon. gentleman whether they were to judge him or judge his party by the principles of the leaders of the Liberal party of England, or whether they had not a right to tell him "What do we care about your principles, whether they are like those of Palmerston or Hartington? What we want is honest legislation and honest dealings in public life." Would Lord Palmerston, the Marquis of Harlington, or Earl Grey have accepted a seat in the Cabinet with a man whom they despised? In 1845, when there were difficulties in England on account of the Corn Laws, and Earl Russell was trying to form a Cabinet, Earl Grey refused to join the Administration because he had objected to a particular man. He refused to yield; the Administration was broken up, and Sir Robert Peel then formed a Government and passed the Corn Laws. Was that the model of the hon. gentlemen? It was not sufficient for him to raise himself upon that pedestal; if he professed to hold the principles of the great Liberal leaders of England, he must follow in their wake; he must do as they had done. But he had not done so. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue became the successor in the Cabinet of Mr. Cauchon, whom his party had always despised. The defence made by the hon. gentleman was that he did not accept a seat with Mr. Cauchon, who was no longer a Minister. Everyone who knew anything about constitutional law and usages, knew that an hon. member joining an Administration was responsible for the acts of his predecessor. The hon. gentleman said the Government had appointed Mr. Cauchon Governor of Manitoba before he (Mr. Laurier) was a member of the Cabinet; but the hon. gentleman should have known that in entering the Cabinet he was making himself responsible for the acts of the Government, and more so for the act which secured him his portfolio. Was it, therefore, matter for surprise that the electors of Drummond were against the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. It was stated that credit was taken of the fact that Mr. Laurier did not consider Mr. Cauchon fit to sit next to him, and yet that was the man whom he found fit to have a seat on a throne and to represent the Queen in Manitoba. It was on this ground the people of Drummond and Arthabaska set aside the hon. gentleman who, upon his own personal merits, would have been elected. The Government had picked out from among the Conservatives not those whom they most admired but whom they most despised. The National had announced that Mr. Archambault had become the leader of the Liberal party in the Legislative Council of Quebec. Mr. Archambault was a gentleman of high education, high attainments, a good Conservative, a gentleman whom he (Mr. Masson) respected, and who had the respect and esteem of his party. But what had the Liberals said of that gentleman? They had continually attacked not only his public character, but his personal honour; in fact, if Mr. Cauchon had not existed, Mr. Archambault very likely would have been the worst man in creation; but, as Mr. Cauchon lived, Mr. Archambault occupied the next position. There was another gentleman from the Province of Quebec—he would take the liberty of naming him—Mr. Chapleau—an honour to this party and to his country. He had for years been the object of the continual and most bitter attacks of his opponents; he was branded all over the country as one of our most corrupt politicians—one of the Tannery men. Mr. Chapleau, in a generous move, tendered the hand of fellowship to the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. His intentions were mistaken by his opponents as having political significance, and, all at once, he who had been the most reviled of French Conservative public men, became the object of their admiration. At a meeting at which the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue was present, during his election, it was freely stated that with such men as Mr. Laurier, Mr. Chapleau and another whom he would not name, a great deal could be done for the Province of Quebec.

Some HON. MEMBERS: "Name, name."

MR. MASSON said he would now leave it to the most partisan follower of the Government, if under the circumstances, those old Liberals of the Province of Quebec, who for so many years had been expecting wonders from their leaders, would not be justified in turning their backs upon them and seek elsewhere for men to uphold the interests and honour of their Province. He had gone much farther than he intended, but there were many other topics; these were only betrayals, weaknesses, and pusillanimity on a small scale. He hoped that other members of this House would show how these men had deceived public opinion in the Province of Quebec on other questions; how they had raised vain expectations in the Province of Quebec, on questions not only of morality but of justice. For his own part he thought he had said enough to explain to the House, and to explain to his friends from the other Provinces,—from the Lower Provinces and from Upper Canada,—the real state of things in the Province of Quebec. They had tried to deny it; but they had the proof to-day, and any fair-minded man would say that if what occurred in the Province of Quebec had occurred in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick, or in Ontario, the same reaction would have occurred on the same scale. The people would not be deceived twice. They could not make people believe that they must adore what they had burnt, and burn what they had adored; and the time was coming when, notwithstanding the high abilities, which he admitted, of those from the Province of Quebec who were in the Government to-day, considering their weakness, their want of energy, they and their friends would be swept away in that Province.

MR. MASSON.

MR. LAURIER said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Masson) had stated that during the recess three members had been elected in the Province of Quebec from among whom the Government should have chosen the proposer of the Address. The hon. gentleman had been kind enough to say that the Government could have addressed itself to the hon. member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Malouin). He was kind enough to say that the Government could have addressed itself to his hon. friend the member for Nicolet (Mr. Méthot); and, finally, he was kind enough to say that the Government could also have addressed itself to his hon. friend and successor, the hon. member for the county of Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Bourbeau). This was very agreeable advice on the part of his hon. friend (Mr. Masson), but it was advice which the Government was not prepared to accept. They were unable to select the hon. member for Quebec Centre for a very simple reason—and this was one which ought to have struck his hon. friend Mr. Masson without putting him to the trouble of mentioning it—the hon. gentleman in question was an Independent member. In the Electoral Division of Quebec Centre, where the Liberal party and the Conservative party had made ruthless war upon each other, these parties had united at the last election and chosen an Independent member, and it would certainly have been an act of the greatest indelicacy on the part of the Government to have asked such a member to perform that duty. They had not chosen his hon. friend from Nicolet to propose the Address for a reason which he would be sorry to mention or to introduce into the discussion. He was not bound to mention this reason, but it was a very sufficient one. As to his hon. friend the member for Drummond and Arthabaska, the Government had not asked him to perform the duty in question because he was an opponent of the Government; and it was not a principle of the Liberal party to choose an opponent to move the Address. He had heard it said—he had not been present at such a time—that it had been a common custom with the late Government to make advances to members of the then Opposition in order to induce them to come over to the Ministerial side of the House. This was a practice that they repudiated;—such, therefore, was his answer to the first part of the argument of his hon. friend. His hon. friend had devoted a great portion of the argument which he delivered in French to a reply to an assertion that had been made with a very great deal of justice by his hon. friend the member for Portneuf (Mr. De St. Georges). This observation related to the action of the Government on the amnesty question. His hon. friend had the audacity to say that never again should the Liberal party pronounce the word, Amnesty. But, if any men were to be found in the Province of Quebec who should never breathe this word, they were not to be found on the Ministerial but on the Opposition side of the House. His hon. friend had gone so far as to say that, if they had followed the example set them by the Opposition and done what the latter had done, the position of affairs in this regard would have been very different. He was obliged to say that he perfectly agreed with his hon. friend on this point, for if the Ministerial members had not acted as that they had done, and pursued the policy that they had done, of a certainty the position of affairs would to-day have been far different from what it actually was, and the position of the Province of Manitoba and of the population of Manitoba would also today have been very different. If it had not been for such action, Lepine would to-day have been in his tomb; he would have expiated a political crime on the scaffold. If they had not had the courage to act as they had done under the then circumstances, and if the present Government on their arrival in power had not had the courage to take the question up, and risk their popularity and existence in some measure on it, Lepine to-day would not have been a free man; he would have been sleeping in his grave, having expiated on the scaffold a political crime; Louis Riel himself would have been condemned to perpetual exile, and all the other accused persons who had been concerned in the North-West difficulties would have been in prison. All this would have been the case to-day if the Government which was supported by his hon. friend (Mr. De St. Georges) had not had the courage to take up this question and act as they had done. All this would have occurred had the French-Canadian members of the Liberal party followed the lead of hon. gentlemen opposite in this matter. The Government had exhibited great courage in settling the amnesty question, which was surrounded with great difficulties, political passion having been greatly excited respecting it, not only in the Province of Quebec, but also elsewhere. His hon. friend (Mr. Masson) had taken the trouble to tell the House that the late Government had promised an amnesty; they had done so in fact, but they did not have the courage to fulfil that promise. One year passed, two years passed, and three years passed, but, nevertheless, that Government never redeemed its pledge. They had done nothing in the matter, and the leader of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Masson) had declared that such an amnesty had never been promised. This was the manner in which the Conservative party had acted with regard to this great and very difficult question. This was the manner in which they had fulfilled their promises. Retribution had fallen upon the late Government for the policy which they had pursued in this respect, and the present Government were entitled to great credit for the courage with which they had taken up and settled a question replete with difficulty, and requiring the greatest tact and skill in settlement. Now, his hon. friend (Mr. Masson) had spoken of those who in the Legislature of Canada had demanded an amnesty and pardon for those who had taken up arms and been concerned as rebels in the difficulties of 1837. His hon. friend had had the audacity to compare the conduct of Conservatives to-day, touching the North-West difficulties, with the conduct of those patriots, who were patriots indeed, but if these men were to return on the earth to-day they would not place themselves behind his hon. friend, but on the benches to the right of the Speaker, because the attitude which the French-Canadian Liberals had assumed was identical with the position taken by the Liberals of the Legislative Assembly at that time under those circumstances.

MR. MASSON: No.

MR. LAURIER: His hon. friend said no; but he (Mr. Laurier) said yes. Particularly that day and at two or three other different times, he had noticed that the memories of Conservatives were not very faithful; they not only forgot what existed, but they also remembered what did not exist, and if they could not, with exactness, recollect public events that had taken place within the past four months, with much greater reason were they less likely to be exact respecting events that had occurred forty years ago. He maintained that the attitude of the Liberal party to-day regarding the amnesty question was identical with that adopted by the Liberal party and all French-Canadians—because these were at that day all Liberals—respecting the amnesty question forty years ago.

Some HON. MEMBERS: No, no.

MR. LAURIER: The House would find that he was right in this matter in a few moments. The only thing with which his hon. friend (Mr. Masson) had reproached them was in not having exacted a complete amnesty, and in having rested content with a partial amnesty. His hon. friend urged that if they had remained firm and insisted upon a complete amnesty, they would have obtained it. They had, however, demanded what they could get, and they had demanded as much as they could get. His hon. friend had said that the Liberals of the House of Assembly after the Union had demanded a complete amnesty always and under all circumstances; but his hon. friend was in error. The first motion that had been made for an amnesty in this connection he held in his hand and it was a motion for a partial amnesty. It was moved in 1841, and it was not until 1844, three years afterwards, that a motion for a full amnesty was proposed.

MR. LAURIER.

MR. MASSON: What was the reply to the first motion?

MR. LAURIER: It was in the negative.

MR. MASSON: They persisted and obtained it, but you withdrew your demand.

MR. LAURIER said that those people had much more reason than the Conservatives to-day for demanding a complete amnesty, because from 150 to 200 persons were then exposed to painful deaths in consequence of political offences; but the Liberals then resolved to secure at the outset the liberty of some fifty. In 1841, Mr. Barthe moved that an humble address be presented to His Excellency, praying him as the representative of the Crown in the Province to exercise the Royal prerogative and give complete amnesty for all crimes and all offences committed during the last troubles that had taken place in the Province of Lower Canada by subjects of Her Majesty, in so far as such concession did not conflict with the security of the Crown and the Province. His hon. friend (Mr. Masson) ought at once to perceive the distinction which was made in this resolution. A difference did exist, and in what respect? Was an amnesty demanded in favour of everybody? No; but only in favour of such persons as those to whom pardon could be granted without endangering the security of the Crown and of the Province. Was there not here evident a very important distinction and restriction? Did it not say that, in the opinion of the House, of those who voted for this resolution, there could be found among the accused some to whom it would not be prudent to accord an amnesty, because in such case the surety of the Crown and the Province might be endangered? The difference indicated by the language was apparent. The second resolution was passed in 1844. It contained no limitation and it commenced in this manner:—"That an humble address be presented to the representative of Her Majesty, praying him to use the Royal clemency toward all Her Majesty's subjects for all the offences committed during the insurrection."

MR. MASSON: And it was granted.

MR. LAURIER: This motion was not granted. His hon. friend was again in error, and he (Mr. Laurier) was sorry to correct him. Certainly a number of cases were favourably considered in connection with this resolution, but it was not until 1848, after a third resolution had been passed by the House, that a full amnesty was accorded. Finally, he would ask with what his hon. friends and colleagues could be reproached? With regard to the first motion the Liberals of the former House of Assembly had acted as they had done recently, requesting of Her Majesty a partial amnesty and not a complete pardon to all persons accused of participation in the insurrection, without any distinction. On the contrary, in 1841, Her Majesty was petitioned to grant an amnesty to those to whom it could be extended without endangering the surety of the Crown and of the Province, and it was three years later before, with the progress of events, another resolution in favour of complete amnesty was proposed, no restriction being entertained on this occasion. He would now ask his hon. friend what reproach could the members of the Conservative party, which his hon. friend represented, cast against the Liberal party of to-day, to which he (Mr. Laurier) belonged, with respect to the attitude assumed by the patriots in connection with the troubles of 1837, since the patriots of that day did just what the Liberals had recently done—that is to say, they demanded a partial amnesty because they were convinced that they could not at the time secure a complete amnesty; and they all knew that they could not obtain a full amnesty touching the North-West difficulties when they had before them the despatches received from the Colonial Office in this relation. They had consequently asked for the second thing which they could pray for, and this was that, in fulfilment of the promise made by the late Government to the accused, a partial amnesty, at least, should be accorded and the exercise of the Royal clemency extended towards the accused in so far as this was possible. If, on the contrary, they had acted as his hon. friend on the left (Mr. Masson) desired, Lepine would have been conducted to the scaffold, Riel would have been condemned to perpetual exile and the other prisoners would have been left in their cells; and under such circumstances, the Conservative party would no doubt be able to boast of their liberality and of their patriotism in the Province of Quebec. The persons concerned in the North-West troubles never had worse friends than their pretended friends the members of the Conservative party, and the best proof of this lay in the fact that if the Liberals had acted like the Conservatives—this conclusion could not be avoided, such data being given—the former accused, who were now at liberty, would now have been either in their tombs or they would have perished on the scaffold. He would now appeal to every impartial man whether their sympathies were with the Conservative party, considering its action in regard to this matter, or with the Liberals who had consequently acted like the patriots of 1837, and under similar circumstances with them. When the events of the history of to-day were judged as we now judged the events of the history of the period of 1837, the judgment which was now passed on these patriots would be equally passed on them, and this judgment would be favourable to the Liberals of to-day because they had said they would take up this difficult question as it stood, putting aside their own connections and sentiments respecting it, and do what they could under the circumstances to obtain as much as they could, though they could not get all they wished to have. He would now approach that part of the argument of his hon. friend (Mr. Masson), which he dealt with in English. The main proposition, the only proposition in fact which he asserted in it, was that there had been a reaction in the Province of Quebec against the Liberal party, and in favour of the Conservative party. The Conservative party in the Province of Quebec had always been in the great majority. The Liberal party had obtained in that Province a majority at the last election, and they still hoped to secure a majority of the members from it at the next general election, but they had lost a few seats in the meantime, because it could not be expected that the population would change its allegiance from the one side to the other in the mere course of a few years; this was the reason why there existed what was called a reaction of the Liberal party in that Province. And he was astonished, he must confess, when he saw and heard, one after the other, the reasons alleged to account for this so-called reaction. One of these reasons was that the Liberal party had changed its leader every year ever since its accession to power; but on the floor of this House ever since the present Government had been in power they had had one leader who was now the leader of the House, and outside of the House they had one leader, who was the Hon. Mr. Dorion. Ever since the withdrawal of their beloved and most respected leader Mr. Dorion, they had had no leader in the House. They followed the flag, they followed the banner which Mr. Dorion had left them, but they had not as yet chosen a leader in the House. There was this difference between the Liberals of Quebec and the Conservatives of Quebec—the former did not have to be led—they were independent-minded, but he could not say as much of the Conservatives of Quebec, as it was the greatest pleasure of the latter to be led and they never could be happy unless they were led, indeed. He might say of the Conservatives of Quebec what was said of the wives of Russian peasants: they were never pleased, but thought they were unfairly treated, until they received a sound thrashing from their husbands. There was something amusing about their unhappiness if they were not led. Sir George Cartier was their leader for twenty years, and there never was a more gentle or docile flock in the world. The Liberals were not so fond of being led. After Mr. Dorion's withdrawal from public life, they were not in a hurry to elect a leader; they left it to time to bring forward the one who was manifestly qualified for the post. He remembered, and his Liberal friends remembered it also, that the very first thing that was done by the Conservatives of the Province of Quebec after the demise of their late leader, Sir George Cartier, was to proceed to elect another. If he remembered right, the election took place on the very day of the funeral of Sir George Cartier; but, whether it took place on that day or on another day, at any rate it was a day not distant from the funeral of Sir George Cartier. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Langevin) was elected leader. Now, that was in 1873, about the month of June of that year. Less than fifteen months after that—a little over a year after that—another election took place, and his hon. friend the member from Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), was chosen the leader. He was sorry he had not a report of the proceedings before him, but he certainly read in the remarks of that gentleman, at a meeting at which a large number of his friends were present—those that sat behind him, and gave in their adhesion to him as their leader—that he saw another leader whose star was now dawning in the orient. There was a gentleman who was not now present, but who at the next election would certainly seek a seat in this House, who was also talked of as the future leader of the Conservative party. There was this difference between the Conservatives and Liberals of the Province of Quebec: the Liberals had been three years without a leader, not wishing to elect one, because they knew that leaders were not elected, but asserted themselves; but the Conservatives in the space of three years had already a committee of leaders—they were not satisfied with one, and they had three. The Liberals did not want to be led so much, but they followed the banner which had been left to them by the regretted and most beloved leader Mr. Dorion; and they were in no hurry to put that banner into another man's hands.

MR. LAURIER.

MR. MASSON: Your leader is distanced.

MR. LAURIER: Proceeding from that branch of the subject, his hon. friend had directly attacked him for the speech which he had delivered in Quebec during the month of June last, in which he asserted that they were trying to form a Catholic party. He would not have mentioned that topic, and it was with regret that he approached it; but he had to do it, since the words which he made use of there were challenged on the floor of the House. What he said there he repeated here; and he arraigned the gentlemen here before the House, as he did before his Province in the month of June last, and accused them of attempting to create a Catholic party in this Dominion. It was to be regretted that they had spoken of this subject; he would prefer, under all circumstances, to leave these discussions to his own native Province, to be fought on the soil of that Province. To the gentlemen opposite belonged the responsibility of introducing the subject on the floor of the House of Commons. But since he had been taken to task for the language then made use of, he was justified and bound to assert and prove what he asserted there; and he would prove it by these gentlemen's own language. It had been for ever so many years past the policy of the gentlemen opposite to represent the Liberals from the Province of Quebec as a party of infidels and heretics; and the only battle ground upon which they ever attacked the Liberals before their constituents had been that ground and no other. That system had always been increasing; and, if Sir George Cartier were to come back, he would not recognize his party, because he was sure such language as was daily uttered by the Conservative members of Lower Canada, could not be uttered if Sir George Cartier were still alive. In the Nou- veau Monde of the 2nd of June, 1875, the gentleman stated:

"The Bishop of Montreal, in his pastoral letter upon the election, declares without any ambiguity and without any reticence, that those who have forfeited their duty by refusing a complete amnesty, and by refusing to vote a redress of grievances to the Catholics in New Brunswick, were not worthy of public confidence."

Now here were his premises; here it was asserted by the members of the Conservative party that the Bishop of Montreal had asserted certain things. Then he went on again—this was from another paper, the Canadien, of the 4th October, 1875, commenting on the pastoral letter of the Bishop of Montreal:—

"The letter of the Bishop is the most energetic condemnation which ever reached the Liberal party of this Province. All the protestations of the Liberals have been denied."

Now another paper which was published in the Liberal interest said this, commenting upon this and similar language held by Conservative members from the Province of Quebec:—

"It is a shame for our nationality that such a political game should be played with impunity; and we feel sure that the Bishops whose teaching they are odiously prostituting will be forced to put a stop to this scandalous abuse."

To this language the Canadien answered in the following manner:—

"Our contemporary undertakes to prove that the pastoral letter of the Bishops of the Province, and that the action of the members and the clergy thereupon, constitute an insane war which has been waged during the local election upon a party which ran only upon political questions. This is as much as to say to the Bishops, 'You have calumniated us, you have declared that we were men that wanted to mislead the people; you have warned them that we wanted to exclude religion from politics; you have told a lie; you have waged upon us an insane war.'"

He was sure that, if Sir George Cartier were alive, his press would never tolerate such language as that which he had just quoted. His press would not tolerate especially such language as the language which was made use of against the highest tribunal of this country. He could quote almost for an hour from the papers which he had in his hands; but he would content himself with one or two more. The Nouvel Monde of the 5th March, 1871, speaking of the election in Charlevoix County, said:—

“They (the Liberals) threaten the Church, and when the Church uses liberty of speech to defend itself, they call to the civil power to close its mouth.”

The Franc-Parleur of the 1st of March, said:

“That Protestant and English justices should have consecrated by their decisions the supremacy of the State over the Church, there is no cause of wonder. They have consecrated by most decisions an outrageous attack on the liberty of the Catholics of this Province.”

Was he right, then, when he said that these gentlemen were endeavouring to create a Catholic party in this Province? Of course, when these gentlemen were on the floor of this House, they pretended to be Liberal, they pretended to be Constitutional; but, when they were in the back parts of the country, when they were among their abettors, they made game of all this. This was the reason why he said that these gentlemen were attempting create a Catholic party.

MR. MASSON: When did I say that? I deny the whole thing.

MR. LAURIER said the hon. gentleman of course had said that he did not share in these ideas. He believed him to be above his party in that respect; but the hon. gentleman was like the late King Victor Emmanuel. The late King Victor Emmanuel never pretended to have anything to do with Garibaldi when Garibaldi invaded the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, or any other part of Italy; but he was always there to reap the benefit of it. So the hon. gentleman repudiated this language; he was never there, and never had anything to do with it; but he was always ready to reap the benefit of it. Now, if his hon. friend was alive to his duty, seeing he was the leader of his party, he would tell his people, he would tell those that supported him: “We shall raise no religious questions in this country, we shall have nothing but political questions to discuss.” His hon. friend had never yet missed the courage to impose his views upon his followers; and this was why he blamed him. If he had been worthy of the position he occupied he would come out to relieve the Province of Quebec, not only from this great grievance, but from this calamity, for it was a calamity in their Province, that they should have to discuss such a question as this. Such questions as this never ought to be discussed, because this was a free country; every race was free, and there was not on the face of the earth a more free and more privileged Church than their Church in that Province. If such was the case,—and it was the case,—it was the more to be deplored that his hon. friend had not been encouraged to rise above his party, and to use his influence with his party to make them put down such language as this.

MR. LAURIER.

MR. MASSON: We all agree.

MR. BLANCHET: Mr. Speaker, will my hon. friend permit me to ask a question? The hon. gentleman has passed through two elections within a few months; will he tell the House if any religious questions were raised in the Drummond and Arthabaska election at the public meeting when he was elected a Minister?

MR. LAURIER said he could say with great pleasure that the clergy did not interfere in his election, but the laymen had proved themselves to be, as was always the case, much more Catholic than the clergy. He had been represented as a Protestant minister; there was not one of the canvassers of the hon. gentleman opposite that did not represent to the people that he was not a Minister of the Crown, but that he was a Protestant minister. He ran to represent a mixed constituency, where a large section of the community was of English origin, and of Protestant origin. These gentlemen on the opposite side did not tell the Protestants that he had become a Protestant minister; but for them they had another story ready,—the fact that, when he was a boy of twenty, he had become a member of an association which had sworn to crush out the English race from the American continent. He was sorry to have to go into these details, but the responsibility would not rest upon him. This was the kind of warfare which he had to deal with in Drummond and Arthabaska. The hon. gentleman had also brought another accusation against him; the accusation of inconsistency. He had said that since the Government had come into power, they had initiated a new programme, they had become Free-traders while they had formerly been Protectionists, and in the programme of the National party, made out in 1872, they had asserted as one of the planks in their platform the doctrine of protection. He told the hon. member from Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) at Lotbinière, when Mr. Joly might have given his personal opinion of the matter,—and he had the official document in his hand, the very programme of the party—and if his friend would only look at it he would see that there was not even a mention of the word “protection” in the whole of that programme.

MR. MASSON: Here is Mr. Joly's letter.

MR. LAURIER said he did not deny that there had always been amongst the Liberals of the Province of Quebec a strong tendency to protection. It was with them a matter of tradition; their leader had been a Protectionist, and all the young people of the land, all those that venerated his name, had more or less adopted his views and were to a great extent Protectionists. But, to say that these views were to prevail so much as to become one of the planks in the platform of the party, he for one would say to his hon. friend that he was totally in error; and the best evidence of it was the platform of the party itself. They had not opposed the policy of the Government of Quebec in regard to the North Shore Railway, but treated it on the same principle as they had the Grand Trunk Railway, and for the same reasons. The hon. gentleman had said they would be driven to direct taxation; a friend of his, however, of whom he had made a great eulogy, had said that the policy of the Government would lead them either into direct taxation or legislative union. He (Mr. Laurier) would now come to the last part of the speech of the hon. gentleman, a part which was personal to himself. The hon. gentleman had laid great emphasis on the fact that he (Mr. Laurier) had not approved of the entrance of Mr.

Cauchon into the Administration. The idea that a man who was a supporter of the Government could still retain his independence of mind, and not blindly approve the acts of the Administration, was evidently not a Conservative idea—which was that, if a man was a supporter of the Administration was bound to it hand and foot, and, when any question, great or small, in politics was raised, he was bound to approve of its action. A Liberal Government did not require more allegiance from its supporters than their conscience would allow. This was the allegiance which he had given to his leaders, and he was sure that they would never have exacted more from him; but, if they had, they knew it was not in the mind of any Liberal to give such blind allegiance. It was true that he had not approved of the entrance of Mr. Cauchon into the Cabinet. He had nothing to say against him. His relations with him had been altogether of a social character, and had been very pleasant. But, rightly or wrongly, he had been accused of being connected with certain transactions whilst he was allied with the Conservatives. Now, he (Mr. Laurier) had the honour to belong to the Liberal party of Quebec—to a party which for twenty years of its career was led by a man so pure that even calumny never could attack him, and he had made up his mind long ago that, as long as he should have anything to do with that party, as far as he was personally concerned, he would do his utmost to keep up the fair fame which had been bequeathed to his party by Mr. Dorion. Perhaps he was over-sensitive in regard to Mr. Cauchon, because it was said that he had severed his connection with the Conservative party; that, on account of the Pacific Railway scandal, he had left his former friends and given up his allegiance to them. That might be true, but, if he (Mr. Laurier) had been wrong then, he was wrong still. He did not attach any blame to his friends in regard to this matter, because their ideas were different from his on the subject; but it was simply because he determined that as long as he had anything to do with the Liberal party of Lower Canada, no stain should attach to its fair fame. He did not mean to say that any stain had attached to his party because the Liberal Government had been presided over by a Conservative. If it were a stain or a shame for any body of men to be led by a Conservative, he would rather accept the experience of his hon. friend opposite upon that question. In reference to another statement which had been made, he desired to say that he never could have said that he had refused a seat in the Government because such an offer was never made to him. What he did say at Stanford was that, knowing the terms between himself and the Government, he might perhaps have been a member of the Government before that time; because, before then, his friends from Lower Canada had wanted to press his appointment on the Prime Minister, but he had refused for reasons personal to himself. All these accusations had been made by the hon. gentleman in order to prove that there was a reaction in the Province of Quebec. He was quite ready to admit that the Opposition had won a few seats.

MR. MASSON: Oh.

MR. LAURIER: Well, many seats; but the last laugh was always the best, and they, the Liberal party, intended to have the laugh at the next general election. He accorded to the hon. gentleman the pleasure of recording his victories, and of celebrating them if he chose. If there was a reaction in the Province of Quebec, in whose favour was that re-action? It could not be in favour of the Conservative party, because they had always held the upper hand in that Province, but there was a reaction from the Liberal ranks.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. LAURIER: He meant from the Conservative ranks. It was evident that hon. gentlemen opposite had nothing much to boast of, as they would even take advantage of a slip of the tongue. He did not generally, as a habit, boast à deux mains, but he would challenge his hon. friend to the next general election.

MR. LAURIER.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: When?

MR. LAURIER: And then you would see who had the best right to laugh.

Mr. LANGEVIN said, that if the hon. gentleman opposite had desired to refer to any controverted elections, he should have alluded to those which had taken place on his own side of the House; to those members who, at the commencement of this Parliament occupied seats in the House, but had since been disqualified. The hon. gentleman had spoken of the amnesty to O'Donoghue. The late Government had always met questions of that kind fairly and squarely, as was showed by the fact of their having retained the support of the Province of Quebec. The press supporting the Liberal party had pretended to call for an amnesty to Riel and Lepine; but when hon. gentlemen opposite got into power they did not meet the questions fairly. When the history of that period was written, it would be seen that the members from the Province of Quebec in the Conservative Government of 1873, with himself (Mr. Langevin) at the head of them, called upon their respected chief, the head of the Government at that period (Sir John A. Macdonald), about this amnesty question. He (Mr. Langevin) told him that their usefulness would be lost and gone should they not obtain an amnesty for these men in the North-West; that they thought the time had come when the amnesty could be given without danger to the peace of that country, or to any portion of the Dominion of Canada; and Sir John A. Macdonald answered that immediately after the Session he was to go to England, and would lay the matter before the British Government, with whom it rested; and that, if then, the matter were not settled, he (Mr. Langevin) would be at liberty to take the course which he had indicated, and that course was that if the amnesty were not granted within a reasonable time by the Government, they, the leaders of the Conservative party of the Province of Quebec, would withdraw from the Government. That was the course they had taken. They were not afraid of the question. They met it fairly. They had all their friends, who were then members of the House, here to consult with, and he (Mr. Langevin) told them that they would take that course—if the amnesty were not granted he would withdraw from the Government. Therefore, when he heard the hon. gentleman speak of his sacrifices, or of the sacrifices of his party, on a question of that kind, he could not compare them to the sacrifices which the Conservative party were about to make; because the withdrawal of the Ministers from the Province of Quebec from that Government would have sent away from the Ministerial ranks into those of the Opposition all the members from the Province of Quebec. They would not have hesitated a moment on a question of that kind, which was a question of principle. But how did the members of the Liberal party from the Province of Quebec act? For a year before, they had been calling for amnesty, or pretending to. Their papers had columns after columns calling upon the Ministers from the Province of Quebec to grant that amnesty. They were favourable to it. They came down to the House with motions to that effect, but, when the late Government left office, and they, the Liberal party, had the power in their hands, what did they do? Did they grant an amnesty? No; they did not. They said that these men should remain out of this country for five years, and be deprived of their rights for that time. If these men were worthy of amnesty two years before, were they not equally worthy when those hon. gentlemen had the power in their hands to grant it? But it was all a sham. Not only did they deprive Lepine and Riel of their liberty and rights, and without the liberty of remaining in this country for the next five years; but they said that another man, O'Donoghue, should be excluded altogether from the amnesty. And what had he done? It was shown that he was less guilty, if guilt was to be punished in that way, than the other two men. Yet they said there should be no amnesty for that man; and it was stated all through the country that he could not have an amnesty from that Government, because he was an Irishman, and it was so believed, and the hon. gentlemen found that the people believed it. So much was that the case that, when the election of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue took place in Quebec, after his defeat in Drummond and Arthabaska, they came down with an amnesty, proclaimed in the same terms as that to the other two men, and they prided themselves on their generosity in the amnesty which they had granted. History, however, would not give them credit for such an amnesty, and would say that this last amnesty to O'Donoghue, the change of a sentence of exile for all time to come to exile for five years was brought about simply to carry the election in Quebec East—in the same way as the Government had acted in the other matter with regard to the ships. That was brought up at that period expressly to carry the election, as his hon. friend the First Minister had said.

MR. MILLS: The First Minister?

MR. LANGEVIN: The First Minister to be. As his hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir John A. Macdonald) had just said, it was brought up at that time just to carry that election. The First Minister had said to the deputation that went to him in Quebec, that nothing could be done except through the French Consul, and yet four months afterwards he wrote to Mr. Shehyn, the local member for that constituency, and said: "If you believe, after all, that it can be done, if an interview with the French Consul in Quebec could bring about an arrangement, I am quite willing it should be done." They all knew the object. That letter was published throughout the constituency; all the papers published it; it was read at all the meetings in Quebec East, and the First Minister was just made to canvass the constituency for the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. The First Minister had stated that he never used the patronage of the Crown in an election, but he did in this case, and if this had been proved before the Supreme Court, the hon. gentleman might have been deprived, to the great sorrow of the House, of his seat for seven years to come. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had stated that the Government had acted in the same way as the Parliament of the Province of Canada in 1841, 1844 and 1848. The resolution of 1841 read as follows:—

“That it is the opinion of this Committee that an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, as representing the Crown in this Province, praying for the exercise of the Royal Prerogative for granting a free pardon, indemnity, and oblivion, of all crimes, offences and misdemeanours connected with the late unhappy troubles in the late Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, to such of Her Majesty’s misguided subjects, in so far as may be compatible with the safety of the Crown and the security of the Province, and of all attainders and outlawries during the period of four years.”

This was a full amnesty to all of them, provided that was the proper time to grant it. That was the meaning of that resolution, and this was so well understood in England, that they, believing that was not the time to grant the amnesty, did not say: “We will not grant it to this man or the other, but we won’t grant it all now.” And when, in 1844, a resolution was passed in favor of granting the amnesty, it was a full amnesty without a hint of the proper time to grant it. That was again refused. Did those gentlemen, the forefathers of the present race, become discouraged because of that, and say we will make an exception, we will not ask for a free pardon to all? No. They came in 1848, and though he (Mr. Langevin) was not a member of the House at that time, he was old enough to be present at the sitting of the House when the matter came up, and that vote was passed by Parliament with cheers, because they thought the time had come when oblivion and a free amnesty might be granted to these men. And the amnesty was granted to the chief men, who were called the great rebels of 1837-38. Mr. Papineau, who was then in France, came back to Canada, and was soon afterwards elected for the County of Saint Maurice, or for that of Two Mountains, he forgot which; and very soon after, their late friend and chief, Sir George E. Cartier, was seated in the House, though he had taken a part in those troubles. These men were not discouraged; they commenced by asking for a free amnesty to all, provided that was the proper time to grant it. In England they thought not, and refused. Three years afterwards they asked again, without speaking of any time. That was refused again; but public opinion was too strong, and at last, in England, they found that it was desirable that a free amnesty should be granted; and when in 1848 their forefathers asked for a free pardon to all it was granted. Why did not the hon. gentleman opposite ask for a free pardon to all?—he did not say the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue because he was not then a member of the Government. The Minister of Inland Revenue said that the Government had asked for all they could obtain. How did they know that? The way to know it was to try it. Why did not they ask Her Majesty the Queen to grant a free pardon to all these men, in order that all these troubles might be forgotten, and that we might have peace from one end of the country to another? Surely the crime of these men, as it was called, was not greater than that of the Fenians, who entered this country and killed some of our young men at Ridgeway and elsewhere. But they were not now in our dungeons. They had their liberty; but Riel himself remained in the United States till the end of his five years, and Lepine had his liberty, only because he refused to take the amnesty. The hon. gentleman (the Minister of Inland Revenue) afterwards passed on to speak of the internal economy and arrangements of his party, stating that they had a leader who was head of the Government, but that while the Liberals of Quebec had had a leader in the present Chief Justice of the Province of Quebec, they had had, since Sir A. A. Dorion went out of public life, no leader except the present leader of the Government. Of course, that was a matter of internal arrangement in the party, with which he (Mr. Langevin) had nothing to do, for he cared not whether they had one, two or three leaders. He would have expected that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue would have acted in like manner towards the Conservative party and allow them to arrange their internal matters as they thought proper. But he would tell that hon. gentleman that they had as a leader of the Opposition a man of whom they were all proud, and under whom they were fighting a good battle in which they intended to fight to the last. If that afforded comfort to the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue he was welcome to it. That hon. minister had accused hon. members on the Opposition side of the House with having attempted to form a Catholic party in the Province of Quebec. He was thus endeavouring to stir up religious feeling in this House and in the country; but he might rest assured that they would not allow him to make such accusations against them without receiving their answers. The hon. gentleman had no right to quote one, two or four articles from newspapers and declare that they were the utterances of the Conservative party, and that the programme of the party was to form a Catholic party in the Province of Quebec. They, the Roman Catholics of Quebec, professed their religion, stood by their doctrines and intended to remain attached to the Roman Catholic religion in which they were born. That fact did not, however, interfere with their relation or action with other parties in the House or outside of it. They went hand in hand with Protestants in political matters, and never allowed their religion to interfere therewith. Whenever religious matters were brought up in the House, as sometimes occurred, for example, in the question of divorce, Roman Catholics and a good many Protestants were found voting against the granting of divorces, but that did not prevent them shaking hands with and working with other members of the Conservative party in regard to other measures. In elections, they did not introduce those matters as part of their political creed. He visited the county of the hon. the Minister of the Interior, and there he met three of the hon gentleman's friends at a meeting held at a church door. As it was a mixed community, he had to address the people in French and English; and the hon. gentleman might be sure of the truth of what he now stated, that he never introduced the religious question either there or at any time during the election. Two of the hon. gentleman's friends, one especially, tried to put him (Mr. Langevin) on the religious question, tried to drag him upon it; but he stopped him, stating that the question of the Bishops or of the doctrine of the church had nothing to do with the question at issue, which was, whether Mr. Laurier, who was the candidate, was the proper man to be elected to represent the county of Drummond and Arthabaska; whether his political course had been such that he was entitled to their support, and whether the course of the Government was such as to entitle them to support. But in Quebec East, where he (Mr. Langevin) took also an active part, he knew his friends did not use that weapon against the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. It was, however, a favourite mode of attack by hon. gentlemen opposite that they should make that charge, but he took that opportunity of stating to the House and to the country, that the Conservative party did not act in that manner, and further, that they did not intend to thus act in the ensuing general election, but that they intended to fight the Government on political grounds as he had twice fought them in his own constituency. He had fought them entirely on political grounds. Hon. gentlemen opposite might say, as they had said, that he had lost his seat on one occasion, because certain priests had delivered sermons in his county regarding the election. But hon. gentlemen knew perfectly well that he was not responsible for those discourses, because he knew nothing about them. Those priests did as they thought they should do; it was their business, not his; but at the second election he took great care that he would not even pay a visit to the clergy of his county, so as not to be connected in any way, directly or indirectly, with anything they might say, if they thought their duty was to say anything about it. In that way they followed the traditions of their respected leader, Sir George Cartier; they knew what he taught them, and they intended to follow in his footsteps. The political doctrines—for he always taught political doctrines—that he taught in his lifetime, that he promulgated during his lifetime, while at the head of the Quebec Conservative party, they intended to be their programme for the future in their campaign against hon. gentlemen opposite. When the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), alluding to the great reaction which had taken place in Quebec, cited his (Mr. Langevin's) election, the hon. the First Minister sneered at his majority of 56. But the hon. the Premier did not sneer at the three majority of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Higinbotham); at the 54 majority of the hon. member for St. Maurice (Mr. Lajoie); at the 55 majority of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. McDougall); at the majorities of the two members for Pictou, Mr. Carmichael with a majority of 55, and Mr. Dawson with a majority of 1; at the 14 majority of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Smith); or at the majority of 50 of the hon. member for Montreal West (Mr. Workman) who was not in his place, and had not been during the Session. What did the hon. the Premier say to the majority of 22 for the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Ryan), of 29 for the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, of 40 for the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Macdonald), of 42 for the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Buell), of 50 for the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Wallace), and a number of other members that could be enumerated, having small majorities. Those were esteemed large majorities, because those hon. gentlemen were supporting the hon. the First Minister; but when the Conservatives carried a constituency which had elected supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite for years, by a majority of 56, the hon. the First Minister sneered. Perhaps that hon. gentleman might himself be proud some day, to have a majority of 56 votes. He did not wish it, for the hon. gentleman's sake, but stranger things had happened. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had stated that the Conservatives had accused the Liberals of Quebec of having repudiated their programme of 1872, respecting Protection. The hon.

gentleman surely had not forgotten that one of the articles of that programme was to obtain the absolute right of regulating our commercial relations with other countries, so as to secure the establishment of manufactures in Canada. If that did not mean Protection, he (Mr. Langevin) did not know what it meant. How did that agree with the answer which the hon. the First Minister gave on 3rd August, 1877, to a deputation in Quebec, when he said this country could not obtain closer commercial relations with France, or any other country, except through the Imperial Government. Notwithstanding that one of the articles of the programme was the obtaining of the right to Canada to regulate her commercial relations, the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, and the hon. the Minister of Justice, permitted the hon. the Premier to inform a deputation that the Dominion Government could do nothing, and could not send a Minister or any one else to France to ascertain what action they might take, or even send a person to the French Consul in Quebec, to inquire whether the French Government would be willing to allow Lower Canadian-built ships to enter French Ports, on payment of a tax of two shillings per ton instead of forty francs, and thus place them on an equal footing with English-built vessels. The Government could not do that; everything of that kind must be done through the Imperial Government, said the hon. the Premier. That, however, would not have been the first time such regulations had been made by legislation. The Dominion Parliament had the right to make its own legislation, and in that case it would not affect the rights of the Empire, because it was not seeking an advantage for Canadian ships over those of Great Britain, but simply placing them in the same position. The arrangement could have been effected in that way. The French Government, he had no doubt, was perfectly well disposed to meet the Canadian Government in a matter of that kind. But, of course, some concession would be required at the hands of the Dominion. The Government had largely increased the duties on French wines, and precluded their importation except in small quantities, and therefore when the French Government saw they could obtain nothing in return they naturally said, "If you do not give us anything in return, we cannot allow you to enter your ships at two shillings instead of forty francs per ton."

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman show me where they said that?

MR. LANGEVIN said that if the hon. the Premier had been disposed to act towards the Province of Quebec as he had done towards other Provinces he would have obtained that boon, but he did not enter into the question in the same spirit. If that strong will had been put forward to carry out an arrangement which the hon. the Premier had exerted in other matters to which he (Mr. Langevin) could not allude, but to which he would allude at a future period, an arrangement would have been entered into with France, whereby Canadian-built ships would have been admitted into French ports on equal terms with English-built vessels. If he were not mistaken, when the correspondence was brought down, of which he had given notice that night, it would be found that the hon. the Premier was at last disposed to admit French wines at the same duties as were charged in England. But the hon. gentleman should have known that such a condition would not have been accepted by France, because the ground on which France refused to renew the commercial treaty with England was that the duties levied on French vessels were too high, and France could not have entered into a treaty with Canada on terms to which the French Government did not accede in the case of England.

MR. MACKENZIE: The treaty with England is in force at this moment.

MR. LANGEVIN: It is in force now, no doubt, and the hon. gentleman must know that they were negotiating about it.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not know it.

MR. LANGEVIN said that every merchant in this country, every commercial man in this country, knew it, and he trusted the hon. gentleman would take advantage of that, as it would be a fine feather in his cap to obtain not only for his own Province, but for the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, that great measure of relief for their trade which he boasted he could obtain. This was an important matter for all the Provinces, and he hoped the hon. gentleman would give that consideration to it which he knew how to give when he wished a measure to be carried, and he sincerely hoped it would be carried. He hoped, too, that the Province of Quebec would take the matter into consideration; it might not be in their line of study, but it was a matter which must recommend itself to their recommendation. He did not know what Government would carry it; but he believed that any Government might do so that had the will to carry it. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had called the attention of the House to another point. He had accused the Conservatives of having opposed the North Shore Railway and other undertakings. Well, the hon. gentleman seemed to take a delight in stating that his party opposed the Grand Trunk Railway, and one member of the Conservative party, who were in office at the time, (Mr. Lafontaine), was termed by them a great Tory, but after the great man had gone to his grave they said that was one of their men; and they claimed the late Mr. Moran the same way; and he had the expectation of living long enough to see them claim the late respected chief of the Conservative party, Sir George Cartier, as a great Liberal. The fact was they wanted to claim all the good for themselves and to lay all the blame upon that side of the House; and when his hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was gone—and he hoped it would be long before that time came—no doubt they would also say that he was a great man and a Liberal; Liberal in his views, Liberal in his measures, Liberal in everything. But the Liberals not only opposed the Grand Trunk Railway but also the North Shore Railway as well. They said it would run their property to death, and that they would have to tax the people to pay for the undertaking. Did they not also say the same of the Victoria Bridge and of the Intercolonial Railway? They said the Intercolonial would be the destruction of this country, and that it could not earn sufficient money to put grease on the car wheels; notwithstanding that they had heard the hon. the First Minister, as they expected, able to tell them that it was not so, that its revenue was large, that it was increasing, and that its revenue was such that at some day it might be self-supporting. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had stated, as a little bit of history in regard to how matters went in his party, that they never called upon a Liberal member to vote for a measure; he never voted unless his conscience told him to vote. These gentlemen must have but one conscience then, for they were never seen to be divided; they all went together; they had full confidence in themselves that they were always right; their chiefs were never wrong; every measure they brought forward was good, and everything that proceeded from the other side of the House must be bad. Well, that might be a very good way of conducting a party, and he had no doubt the hon. the First Minister was happy in having such a party. Hon. gentlemen on his side of the House were, however, different. Their convictions made them vote, whether a measure was brought forward by themselves or by the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side when they saw it was in the interests of the country. They had succeeded more than once in improving measures brought forward by the party opposite, and he supposed they might do it again. But at all events, those hon. members might be sure of this, that his party had convictions also, and that they voted according to those convictions. They had principles, and they were going to stand by those principles. Having said so much in answer to the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, he would say a word or two in reference to one of the paragraphs in the Address, which stated that there was "Nothing beyond the ordinary business of the country requires your attendance." It was very strange that the Government, especially the hon. the Ministers from the Province of Quebec, should not have found that anything could be said in the Speech except "the ordinary business of the country." He did not know if they had visited the Province of Quebec, or any other Province of the Dominion, but if they had, they surely must have seen, that something besides the "ordinary business of the country" required their attention. They must have seen, both in the Province of Quebec and elsewhere, the great depression in trade, the stagnation in commercial business; how the Insolvency Court was full of cases; how the Official Gazette every week contained the names of hundreds of merchants who had gone to the wall and whose goods had had to be sold. They would have seen that the trade of Quebec had gone down immensely; and in the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, let them compare the amount of imports from Great Britain and other parts, with the volume of a short time ago. The imports at those places were diminished largely; but they would also see that the imports of Ontario and the western Provinces had increased somewhat. If, therefore, hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches had looked at this, they must have seen that there must be something wrong in the east; that trade must not be flourishing, manufactory must be stopped. And if they had gone down into the Eastern Provinces they would have seen that the manufactories which were flourishing four or five years ago were closed; that other industries which had employed thousands of operatives were not at work; that the ship-builders were idle; that hundreds and thousands of workmen, who formerly worked at that trade, were now idle, and that no ships were being built. In his own constituency, 4,000 people were out of work; the manufacturers had been mad enough to support the hon. gentleman the leader of the Government, and his free-trade principles. The hon. gentleman's principles afforded no protection to manufacturers. They wondered at the time how the manufacturers could support the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue at the Quebec election, but they saw now how it was. It was a desperate game which was played; and they saw to-day that of the three manufacturers who had supported that hon. gentleman, one had gone down, and hundreds of operatives were thrown out of work, and their families deprived of bread. Notwithstanding this fact, the hon. the leader of the Government told the House that "nothing beyond the ordinary business of the country requires your attendance." Their attention might have been called to the state of the shipping trade in the Province of Quebec and elsewhere. He would not repeat what he had said already about the help that might have been given to ship-building, but he might mention, if the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had not had time to look over the tariff, that a number of articles that entered into the building of ships were now taxed that were not taxed in 1873. He would find that to build a vessel of 800 tons, $420 or $450 extra had to be paid in that way. Now, the hon. gentleman might say that this was a small sum, nevertheless it was over fifty cents per ton; and in these days four or five hundred dollars would be of material assistance to a ship-builder on a small ship. But the hon. gentleman said they would not do it, they would not have Free Trade, they would not have Protection, they would not protect ship-building, and the result was that the ship-builders were now idle, the ship-yards were closed. While upon this subject he might say also that the hon. the First Minister had not given them other information which he might have given in the Speech. There might have been some allusion to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Quebec. The hon. the First Minister must remember that three or five months ago, at a meeting of the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway held in London, Captain Tyler, the president of the company, stated that they were in negotiation with the Government for the leasing or purchasing of the Grand Trunk Railway from Chaudière Junction or Lévis or Rivière du Loup. It would be interesting to know whether the Government intended to bring it before the House this Session. The completion of the Intercolonial line to Quebec was an important matter, and they therefore expected that something with regard to it would have appeared in the Speech. Nevertheless, he would take another opportunity of obtaining that information from the hon. the First Minister.

MR. LANGEVIN.

MR. TASCHEREAU said the hon. member for Charlevoix had made rather an astounding and bold statement when he declared that the religious question had nothing to do either with his first or second election. If they took his first election the Supreme Court of the Dominion had settled that point; and as to the second he would read an extract from a circular which was printed at the printing office of the hon. gentleman's organ at the time, and which had been spread broadcast through the country, perhaps not by the hon. member for Charlevoix, but still it was published and circulated by the hon. gentleman's agents, and especially by his legal agents. The circular stated:—

"In the contestation of the Charlevoix election the Bishops have been directly attacked. There is more, the authority of the Pope himself is despised. The Supreme Court, composed of four Protestant judges, two priest-eaters, declares that our Lords the Bishops have committed a misdemeanor and a punishable crime, by issuing their pastoral letter, and that consequently our Holy Father the Pope is as guilty as they are, since he approves their letter. The electors have to declare by their votes whether they approve Mr. Tremblay to have brought up the Supreme Court to censure the Pope and the Bishops. Before they take a decision let them remember that the curse of God is the reward of those who touch the church or its ministers."

MR. LANGEVIN said he had no doubt if the hon. member made enquiry he would find that the circular was printed at one of the printing offices connected with the Government side of the House.

MR. DESJARDINS said that when he heard the members of the Liberal party crying out that the raising of the religious question in the Province of Quebec was scandalous, he could not refrain from calling to remembrance the numerous advances which had been made by those same gentlemen in the years 1871 and 1872, in order to secure the exercise in their favour of that clerical influence which to-day they so warmly denounced. With regard to all the questions that had been discussed in this House in 1871 and 1872—questions through which the present Government benefitted, and by the aid of which it attained the enjoyment of power, he well remembered that the Liberal party had formerly been extremely anxious to secure for themselves, by all possible means, the influence of these same clergy which they to-day denounced. He recalled to memory, amongst other things, that a deputation had left Ottawa to go and see the edition of a certain paper, supposed to be connected with the Catholic clergy of the Province of Quebec, with respect to the school question; and he also remembered that upon this occasion that deputation promised in the most open manner possible, that if the Catholic clergy would abandon the attitude of distrust which they had assumed regarding the Liberal party, this party in turn was ready to do justice to the Catholic minority of New Brunswick, and even concede amnesty to the Métis. One of the members of this deputation still occupied a seat in the House, and another member of it now ran about frequenting the hustings and busying himself in each election that took place in the Province of Quebec, denouncing what he formerly had claimed as due to the Liberal party—that was to say, the influence of the clergy for which the National party contended, and to obtain which that party was founded. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had quoted an extract from the Nouveau Monde to shew that the Venerable Bishop of Montreal had denounced the conduct of the Liberals of the Province of Quebec touching the amnesty and school questions. Eh bien! he would simply say that besides their uncontested rights as citizens and as Catholics, to protest against this conduct of the Liberals, the Bishops had been provoked by them to interfere, for the Liberals themselves had promised the Bishop of Montreal and others, that this question would be settled in the interests of justice.

MR. LAURIER: Permit me to interrupt. The extract in question was taken from a letter published by the Bishop of Montreal in the Nouveau Monde.

MR. DESJARDINS.

MR. DESJARDINS said that the hon. member would perceive that if the Bishop had intervened in this question this was done because he had been provoked to intervene by the Liberal party themselves, whose members had passed from presbytère to presbytère and from Evêche to Evêche, begging that the influence of the clergy should be exercised in their favour, trying to make them believe that this question and certain others, regarding which they considered that the leaders of the Conservative party had not done all its duty, would be settled satisfactorily by the Liberal party, and let them understand by such representations that the Liberal party were ready to secure that justice which they had then invoked in vain for some years back with respect to those issues. Hon. members would all bear in mind that there had been cited an alleged scandalous article contained on a flyleaf, of which they did not know the origin. This had been cited in an election as an undue means for influencing the result. But what had been done in 1874 in respect to the amnesty and school questions? During the Session that year pretended telegrams from Archbishop Taché and the Archbishop of Quebec were circulated in the lobbies by the Liberals, in order to let the members believe that Conservatives were showing an exaggerated zeal regarding these questions, and to justify by them their turning their back to all the promises made by them on the hustings, in public papers and in private to the priests and the Bishop of the Province of Quebec. Furthermore, he did not forget that when the famous National party was founded, one of its coryphees, and one of its most advanced and enthusiastic men, and one of its most faithful supporters in the Province of Quebec, Mr. Mercier, said in a public letter addressed by him to the leaders of the National party in Quebec:

“The clergy will record our actions with an attention replete with reserve, but nevertheless not wanting in favour. Let us cause to disappear this reserve which indicates fear, and let us increase this favour which will guarantee our success, by a worthy and wise course of procedure. Let us reassure the clergy by affording to them unequivocal proof of the sincerity that animates us, and let us prove to them that the sacred words of religion and of country are in our thoughts; and that we are no more insensible to the interests of the one than to the future of the other. Our clergy is national in its glorious conditions, as well as in its patriotic aspirations, from the day that it will have acquired the conviction that we are sincerely working to secure the prosperity of the country, and that our cause is that of religion and of our native land. It will also then aid us and support us, owing to its immense influence in the great interests, the triumph of which we are endeavouring to insure."

So little anxiety or opposition was shown at that time by the Liberals with respect to the views entertained by the Catholics of the Province of Quebec, that their Protestant allies themselves did not raise any objection against them; and this was so much the case that the principal organ of the Protestant Liberals, the Herald, stated in 1872, after examining the Catholic programme which many of these gentlemen had not hesitated to sign, but which they utterly denounce now, they had nothing to say against it on the part of the Protestants with respect to the questions discussed in that programme, inasmuch as it declared that the Catholics were prepared to accord to the Protestants the liberty which they themselves demanded. It was true that this took place on the eve of the general election, when the Catholic members had their vote to record in one way or the other. He would ask the House, after having heard the reading by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, of the extract which supported most strongly, it must be supposed, the pretension of the hon. the Minister of the Interior, where was the evidence of the existence of this famous plot, by means of which it was alleged that the Catholic Conservatives of the Province of Quebec intended to strangle Protestantism in that Province. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), had quoted from the Nouveau Monde, an article in which the Bishop of Montreal had denounced the Liberal party, but the hon. gentleman did not seem to remember that the Liberals had sought to take away the suffrages of the Catholics from the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec. Later on, the hon. gentleman had quoted something which bore on the election in Charlevoix county, but he (Mr. Desjardins) also remembered some things that had passed in the county of Charlevoix when Mr. Tremblay, the then opponent of the present hon. member for that county (Mr. Langevin), had quoted from letters which were mutilated in such a manner as to make them bear a meaning that they really did not possess, in order to show that the clergy of the Province of Quebec were on his side rather than in favour of the present member for Charlevoix county. He imagined that he had said sufficient on this question to prove to the House on what side illegitimate attempts were made to use the influence of the clergy in an undue manner; and it was when the Liberals saw that all their efforts to carry the clergy with them were in vain that they turned round against the clergy, and he could further add that an attempt had been made in the Province of Quebec to sow division between the Catholics and Protestants; this had been done by the Liberals. This had been done in fact. Hon. members could recollect insidious articles which had been published in Liberal newspapers, denouncing the Catholics to the Protestants as those who were plotting together with the view of destroying the rights and privileges of Protestants in the Province of Quebec. The House would also remember that in the speeches and lectures of the hon. the Minister of the Interior, who talked so much of liberality and his spirit of independence and his elevated ideas, the hon. gentleman had done all in his power to excite the prejudices of the Protestant minority of the Province of Quebec against the Catholics of this Province in order to secure their suffrages. He would now ask leave to pass on to another subject. He had, with some surprise, heard certain speakers affirm since the opening of this debate, that the country was prosperous, and that it could compare, as to its commercial position favourably with that of the United States and other countries. He, however, had some figures in his possession of such a nature as would exhibit that picture in an altogether different light. In this regard he would give the number of failures that had occurred during certain periods in the United States and in Canada. In 1876, the United States commercial reports showed for the first nine months of that year, the number of failures was 7,050, while their number in Canada during the same period was 1,256. In 1877 this exhibit for the United States proved that they had passed through the most critical period of the commercial crisis, and had begun to emerge from it, thanks to the degree of protection accorded their industries and to the efficacious measures adopted by the American Government in order to assist them. They saw that for the first nine months of last year the number of failures was 6,565 showing a diminution in their number of 485, while in Canada, during the same period of 1877, we had had over 1,600 failures, showing an increase of 390 over the corresponding period of 1876. If they now compared the liabilities for the two countries, they would find that in the United States during such period for 1876, these amounted to $156,272,000 against $141,952,000 for 1877, showing a diminution of $14,320,000 during these two years; while, on the contrary, such liabilities in Canada had advanced from $17,786,000 in 1876 to the enormous sum of $20,904,000 in 1877, showing an increase of $3,118,000. If, again, they compared the commerce of the United States and Canada which, respectively, held the ratio of one to ten toward each other, they would find that the total sum of the figures respecting the number of bankruptcies indicated a proportion of one to four, and of liabilities of one to seven, for the United States and Canada respectively. These figures were in themselves most eloquent, in his opinion, proving though the United States like all other countries, including of course Canada, had been struck by the commercial crisis, yet thanks to the energetic action of the American Government and to the protection of its manufactures, its commerce had been enabled to resume an ascendant position far more quickly than our own; and while we were still struggling with a frightful crisis, we saw the business transacted by the United States increasing rapidly, not only in connection with their manufacturers, but also in connection with their commerce as well as their marine. To-day, though the marine had been ruined by the late civil war, the United States was the second maritime power in the world. England alone was their superior in this respect; and, nevertheless, despite the fact of the existence of such a marine, foreign vessels conveyed from American ports a very considerable amount of merchandise, taking outward and inward cargoes, and the exports from the United States to European countries had increased very considerably. While, in addition to all this, our Republican neighbours to the south of us was to-day in a condition to compete on equal terms with England with regard to a large number of manufactured articles. On the other hand we daily regretted to see new manufactures shut down in our country while none of the signs of the times were of such a nature as could induce us to believe that a change for the better was at hand. The hon. member for Charlevoix (Hon. Mr. Langevin) had mentioned the fact of the failure of a considerable manufactory at Quebec. The hon. gentleman had also shown what significance he attached to this fact in view of the action of the manufacturers in question—in company with others—in the election in Quebec East, when he was so blind—else he did so with the intention of deceiving his creditors—as to boast he had no need of Protection, and that he could sustain and maintain a prosperous manufactory without it while bankruptcy was so near his doors. He desired to draw the attention of the House to another matter. Last Session, on the occasion of a discussion provoked by an hon. member of the House—whose name he did not then remember—on the subject of the Georgian Bay Branch, the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Jetté) said that it was not, perhaps, the time to discuss the Pacific Railroad route, but he took the opportunity to state that the Province of Quebec favoured the connection being made between the provincial railway system and the Pacific Railway. The Province of Quebec, the hon. gentleman continued, had expended large sums on railways, and hoped that such communication would be established. During the last days of that Session the hon. member for Montmagny had returned to the charge, and, interpellating the hon. the First Minister, had said he desired to remove the uneasy feeling that existed in the Province of Quebec touching the intentions of the Government respecting this matter, and mentioned the fact that a rumour was current in the Province of Quebec that the Government intended to abandon this line; also, that such a step would be to the great disadvantage of that Province, which relied upon the fulfilment of a policy that would render equal justice to the Province of Quebec and the Province of Ontario, and that the Province of Quebec had resolved upon going to considerable expense in order to make connections between the Pacific Railway line and the commercial centres of the Province of Quebec. The hon. the First Minister had stated in his reply, amongst other things, that the policy of the Government in this regard had in no wise changed, and that the proposed line was still adhered to by the Administration; and finally, that they hoped to be able to present some measure respecting it at the present Session of Parliament. He (Mr. Desjardins), in view of this declaration, had expected that some allusion would be made to this subject in the Speech from the Throne, but in this he had been disappointed, nothing had been announced in this relation. Reference had been made to the Pacific Railway touching the North-West Territory and the British Columbian route; but, as regarded the portion of that subject in which the Province of Quebec was interested, and that, too, in the most especial manner, not a word was said. It might prove to be, that this was a simple omission. He hoped that the zeal of the hon. members for Montreal East and Montmagny, would awaken in this relation earlier this Session than had been the case last Session; and that they would show something effective as the result of their efforts in emulation of the apparent anxiety established by their political friends in behalf of the interest of the Province of Quebec on other theatres. At Montreal and Quebec, those gentlemen had proved that they were very ardent and very zealous and very courageous in defence of the interest of the great cities of Montreal and Quebec; but here these gentlemen seemed to change their manner. The base of action was changed, and those who below were veritable lions, here resolved themselves into docile sheep. Such indeed was their zeal for the protection of the railway interests of the Province of Quebec, that they had almost set the cities of Montreal and Quebec in a flame, and if the populations of those two cities had listened to their counsels—above all the citizens of Quebec—not a brick of the Parliament Buildings would have been left standing at Montreal. Things had not gone as they had desired. They had displayed, it was true, much zeal and patriotism and great foresight regarding the intentions of the Government of Quebec, but these facts did not prevent the people of Montreal remembering that during the past four years, the Liberals had been in power at Ottawa—that their Ministers had been in command of a considerable majority in the House; and, nevertheless, the interests of the Province of Quebec, touching the matter of the Pacific Railway, seemed to have been completely forgotten by them. The First Minister (Hon. Mr. Mackenzie) had been permitted to change again and again the route, and to place the terminus as far from the Province of Quebec as he (Hon. Mr. Mackenzie) pleased, as was allowed by the Act of 1874, and still not one word of protestation on the part of these pupils of the hon. gentleman with the view of reclaiming the rights thus menaced of the Province of Quebec. He trusted that during the present Session, these hon. gentlemen would show themselves more in earnest in this respect. The elections were at hand, and everyone was aware that when this critical moment approached, such hon. gentlemen were usually full of resources. This had been visible in the late election in Quebec East and in other situations, such as the elections of 1872 and 1874; then these hon.

MR. DESJARDINS.

gentlemen were replete with fine promises, and doubtless these promises would be renewed during the present Session. Nevertheless, these hon. gentlemen had better see that their promises were accompanied by sufficiently effective measures, with the view of protecting the Province of Quebec, and that the Government favoured their pretensions, else their fair protestations would be of no avail to them in the presence of their constituents.

MR. BOURBEAU said that in the course of the interesting discussion which had taken place in the House in this relation, certain incidents which occurred during the recent election in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska had been brought in question, and he considered it his duty to state certain facts that had been in some measure denied by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) had said that at a meeting held in Stanford on the 30th of August last, the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had declared he did not wish to accept a position in the present Ministry, owing to certain matters in connection with the Ministry which were not agreeable to him. He (Mr. Bourbeau) begged to say that this was the case. The hon. member who had moved the Address had stated that the country was becoming prosperous, and he (Mr. Bourbeau) believed that under the circumstances the electors of the county of Drummond and Arthabaska would not be satisfied with him if he did not declare that prosperity did not, at least, exist everywhere in our midst. Such a statement as that made by the hon. member (Mr. de St. Georges) would not be well received in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska. The principal portion of the electors of this county were farmers, and when he asked them if they were prosperous, they answered no. They said it did not pay them to sell their produce at very low prices. During the election, the struggle had turned at least in part, upon the question of Protection, and upon the fact that the late member for that county (Hon. Mr. Laurier), had refused to protect by his vote the interests of the electors, whom he then represented in this House. Discussion during the contest had not been raised touching the question of religion and he felt it due to himself to say that, when he accepted the candidature, he had announced to the electors, and directed all those who wished to assist him in the contest, that he desired that the discussion of the religious issue should in no manner take place. He considered that this matter had been debated long enough, and as in the county he represented, different beliefs existed, and inasmuch as he respected these various creeds, he did not wish that this subject should be brought upon the tapis. This was the first time that he had risen to address the House, and, consequently, he would not essay to make a speech of any great length, but at some future occasion he hoped to be able to deliver an address of greater length upon the same interesting subject.

MR. DESJARDINS.

MR. LAFLAMME said it was somewhat strange to hear the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) making so loud a complaint against the policy of the Government for their not having brought the question of amnesty forward, as if they had forgotten entirely the history of the last three or four years. He did not intend to comment upon the subject at any length, but would only call the attention of the members of the House to some facts in reply to the very enthusiastic appeal which had just been made with reference to the unfortunate people who were connected with the troubles in Manitoba. The hon. gentleman asked why they should not obtain an amnesty of a more extensive character. It was not granted more fully on account of hon. gentlemen opposite; it was their fault, and upon them the responsibility rested. If this were true he would ask the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) how could he support his hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and sit for three years on that side of the House, when he knew that that amnesty had been promised unconditionally and fully. The right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) declared that no such amnesty had been granted, and they had, on the other hand, a most positive avowal that that amnesty had been promised in most positive terms. How was it that the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) appealed to their patriotism and asked why they did not raise their voices to obtain a full amnesty, when he himself had sat silent for three years, knowing that the promise had been made, and yet not daring to ask his leader to put the promise into execution? How came it that he never thought of bringing up that question until the present time, when he made it a charge against hon. members on the Government side of the House, who denied that any promise of that kind had been made. The hon. gentleman knew very well that the amnesty could not be granted by the Government, that it could not be obtained except by the sanction of the Imperial Parliament. And the leader whose phantom the hon. member liked to allude to as the great leader of the French Conservatives of that time—he alluded to Sir George Cartier—declare!—and the hon. gentleman had not forgotten it—that it was of no use to attempt to obtain a full and complete amnesty; that he declared, in words written under his own signature, that Riel was a murderer and that no amnesty could extend to him. Well, but were the party to blame? If, on the one hand, this amnesty was promised to the knowledge of the hon. member; if, during these three years, he never thought proper to call upon the one who made that promise,—when, after that, they could not possibly, after the declaration of Sir George Cartier himself, who declared that not only the amnesty could not be granted, but that the prosecution of Riel should be proceeded with—when the hon. member approved, or at least never raised his voice when the prosecution of Riel was brought on by the right hon. leader and the hon. member—when Riel was brought to trial, when Lepine was brought to trial, when Riel was prosecuted for contumacy and declared an outlaw,—he was an outlaw and pronounced an outlaw by the Attorney-General Clark, who was acting under the direction and under the inspiration, and who had been appointed by—who were the

Mr. MASSON: Who appointed Judge Wood?

Mr. LAFLAMME said Judge Wood was merely carrying out the instructions and the declaration of Sir George Cartier himself. Sir George Cartier said in positive terms that Riel must undergo his trial under the laws of Manitoba as they then stood; consequently if Sir George Cartier's instructions were followed, what reason had the gentlemen opposite to complain, when the condition of opinion was such that it would have been more than madness to call upon the people, whose feelings had been irritated —

Mr. MASSON: By whom?

Mr. LAFLAMME: By the declaration of Sir George Cartier himself, who declared it to be a foul murder. How was it possible, after Sir George Cartier had declared to the whole Dominion of Canada that this man had committed a murder for which no indemnity could be granted, to obtain from the representatives of the Dominion of Canada, a great majority of whom were conceded to be friends and fellow-countrymen of this man Scott,—was it reasonable, would it have been rational for any man having at heart the freedom even, and the amnesty of these men, to call upon these gentlemen, who were in that condition of mind, and who were convinced, as Sir George Cartier declared, that it was a foul murder to vote a full and complete amnesty? No. Under these circumstances it was the wisest course, and it was in that state of feeling an act of forbearance and generosity on their part to consent to an amnesty with the conditions under which it was obtained at that time. He would just refer the hon. member to two or three passages of Sir George Cartier's letter, which was in the Appendix No. 6.

Mr. MASSON: What is the date of the letter?

Mr. LAFLAMME said the date of the letter was the 5th of February, 1873.

“I have much pleasure in enclosing you a note from Lord Lisgar, of yesterday, in which he states exactly what passed between him and Father Ritchot in my presence on the 19th May. He made no promise of any amnesty. He merely stated he would not fail to forward to Her Majesty the petition for an amnesty to which Father Ritchot alluded. Bear in mind that with Father Ritchot and the Archbishop, I always took the same ground we both did, namely, that the question of amnesty was not for our decision, but for the Queen and Imperial Government."

There Sir George Cartier declared that no amnesty was ever promised. He referred to the memorandum, document 131, page 173, the French version.

"The principal, and indeed the only difficulty which presents itself to the undersigned as being in the way of Her Majesty in being pleased to grant a general amnesty in favour of those parties concerned in the disturbance at Red River, during the period stated in the petition, is the unfortunate shooting of Thomas Scott, under a pretended sentence of a court-martial, in the eye and letter of the law illegally organized by the Provisional Government.

"No one, outside of the circle of the difficulties existing for some time in the Red River Settlement, can come to any other conclusion than that the shooting of Scott, without speaking of the illegality, was, to say the least of it, an act of excessive abuse of power, and of cruel brutality; but, to well appreciate the character of the deed, one must, as it were, transport oneself into the midst of the excited community at the time the deed was perpetrated, and must consider well the habits and current of thought of that community, and also consider well the links in the chain of illegal events which unfortunately took place for several months before the perpetration of the deed."

"It was an excessive abuse of authority and cruel brutality," those were the terms in which he characterised the deed. Then in the same memorandum at page 177, he said:

"After the above preliminaries, the undersigned can better appreciate in its true aspect the position of Riel and his co-actors in the shooting of the poor man Scott. There is not the least doubt that, in the eye, and according to the letter of the English criminal law, Riel and his co-actors can be indicted not only for high treason, levying of war and rebellion against Her Majesty, but also for the crime of murder of the unfortunate man Scott in furtherance of that rebellion. It is obvious, however, that Riel and his co-actors can be tried for these high crimes only before the ordinary tribunal and under the jury system now prevailing in the Red River settlement."

There he declared that Riel could be brought to trial not only for high treason, but for the crime of murder of the unfortunate Scott. Now, he knew that the hon. gentleman would not have brought up this subject only in a moment of excitement.

MR. LAFLAMME.

MR. MASSON: No, no!

MR. LAFLAMME said that really the proposition which the hon. gentleman tried now to insinuate that this Government ought to have given a full amnesty under those circumstances, was answered by the fact in such a way that no rational being in Lower Canada would pretend that the Government under those circumstances could have done more than they did. Now, with respect to O'Donoghue, the fact was established beyond all doubt at that time by the Archbishop himself, that he had no interest whatever in the country. He came there as a Fenian invader, and he turned traitor to his associates and accused them; and after he had left the country he (Mr. Laflamme) heard the hon. gentleman himself state in this House that the letter he had written under the circumstances for which he claimed to obtain his indemnity was a tissue of falsehoods. The letter was a direct accusation of Riel and all the other parties, accusing them of the murder of Scott, and exonerating himself from all responsibility in that deed. An exception was made against O'Donoghue on account of his having brought in an element which did not have justification and protection and the rights which the other parties connected with the rebellion had; the exception was made temporarily, and it had been since removed. Certainly there was no reason to say that he was in a better position, or should be in a better position than the other parties, and that the indemnity should be more favourable to him than to the other parties, who certainly ought to have been thankful, and were thankful, because the cry made as to the insufficiency of that amnesty was raised by none of the parties directly interested, but raised for political purposes only in the Province of Quebec, where now the matter was so dead that it could not be resuscitated to any advantage whatever in favour of the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House. He would now say a few words in answer to the hon. member's accusation of having traduced Sir George Cartier about the acquisition of the North-West, and that the Liberal party were opposed to everything like progress.

This he absolutely contradicted. The mode of the acquisition of the North-West was contested, and was debatable; but as to the denial of the advantage of colonization in that part of the Dominion of Canada, that never was the subject of dispute amongst either Liberals or Conservatives in Lower Canada. It was no more disputed than the Grand Trunk Railway, as it was exposed; no more than the Pacific Railway scheme, which was contested, disputed, and criticised; but the necessity of developing the resources of the country by opening thoroughfares and highways and railways was never contested or disputed by the Liberal party in Lower Canada. He should not follow the hon. gentleman through all the insinuations he made about the changes in the leadership of the Liberal party in Lower Canada. He would be content with stating what his hon. colleague, the Minister of Inland Revenue, had stated. It was a misfortune, no doubt, that the gentleman who had so well, so successfully, and so independently led the Liberal party in Lower Canada should have disappeared; but whilst he was in the administration of affairs he never heard, and no one had ever heard, such flattering compliments as had been uttered since he withdrew from the political scene. He never would have been thought worthy at Conservative hands to be entitled even to a seat in the Superior Court; he was always considered such an inferior man, a man unworthy of any confidence, that he would not even have had the paltry offer of a judgeship in the Superior Court by the Conservative party. Now, as he had disappeared from the scene, his merit was known, and he was the greatest man that ever lived. (Cries of "No, no.") Probably if he could hear the universal expression of opinion which came from his former enemies and his former traducers, he might perhaps be induced to come and take hold again of the party which was no more to be constituted of a fraction, but would be constituted—if they could believe in the sincerity of the eulogium of the hon. gentleman opposite—not only of a section of the party in Lower Canada, but of the whole Province of Quebec. But unfortunately the thing was impossible. Meanwhile, those who had succeeded him, had inherited the misfortune of the abuse, which must be entailed upon all who had the misfortune to be opposed to the hon. gentlemen opposite; but so far, he must certainly make an exception in favour of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), who seemed to have left out entirely the habits of those who had been up to this time directing all the political discussions of his party. His tone and remarks had been so far of a perfectly gentlemanlike character. Gentlemen had spoken as if they had discarded entirely any connection with questions of religion in politics. Even the hon. member for the county of Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), who had traded on religion, and actually lived on religion, had just declared that politics had nothing to do with religion, and that it was the Liberal party of Lower Canada who had made an appeal to religious feelings, and who wished to enlist the hierarchy and the religious instinct on their side. It might be in the eyes of the hon. gentleman, but there was one fact which every one in Quebec knew, and which every one in the Dominion knew, that the Conservative party of the Province of Quebec had made of every question for ten years a religious question. Every political question was characterised on one side as a holy question; and on the opposite side, those who contested it, who denied the truth of it, were put down as infidels and as people who had no other object in view but the subversion of everything that was sacred; and religion, order and society were to be completely upset if the Liberal party was allowed to reach the Treasury Benches. This was the principle upon which the politics of the country in the Province of Quebec had been treated. There never was, to his knowledge, one contested election in any part, where there was a warm contest, where the clergy, and the press which denominated themselves the organs of the clergy, did not declare that no man could vote conscientiously, and compromised his eternal salvation, if he did not support the Conservatives. This was the general tone and mode of discussion of politics. There was even in that very paper which was published by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) discussions without end on the danger of Parliamentary institutions. If his theory had been adopted, they should have had a Parliament House to let; no Parliament was necessary. This was the doctrine that was promulgated and given out to the people as the only true doctrine which men were bound to believe, not as a political principle, not in the interest of their material welfare, but in order to protect their eternal interests. He knew something of it by experience; he had been the victim of it to a certain extent; and he was happy to see a better tone and different ideas springing from the gentlemen on the opposite side. He would refer to a document which it was pleasant to hear. The hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) might, but for his part he never would have alluded to such a thing as clerical or religious questions interfering with politics and being mixed up with politics. Notwithstanding, they found this in the judgment of the Supreme Court, which was a public document, regarded now as one of the precedents to be hereafter looked to, and probably as a historical record to show what progress we have made. It appeared at page 190 of the Supreme Court reports:—

“It appears, in fact, that through one Mr. Onésime Gauthier, the respondent, the Hon. Mr. Langevin was invited to come and solicit the votes of the electors of the county of Charlevoix; that gentleman replied that he would not accept the candidature except upon the condition that the support of the clergy of the county was assured to him. Mr. Gauthier assured himself of the good feeling of the several curés in the county, and upon the report which he made to the respondent, the latter accepted and entered upon his electoral campaign; he met with and visited the curés; at a public meeting the respondent declared that the members of the clergy were favourable to him, and that the electors should listen to the voice of their pastor; and at Eboulements, in the presence of the respondent, one Mr. Gosselin, vicar of the parish, publicly declared that all the clergy supported the respondent, and had unanimously selected him as their candidate. Taking as a sequence of all this, the sermons which a large number of those curés delivered from the pulpit, denouncing Mr. Tremblay and his political party, evidently with the view of favouring the avowed and well-known candidature of the respondent, it is indubitable that that gentleman is responsible for the consequences of the conduct of those curés, if the evidence shows on their part the exercise of undue influence provided for by the electoral law.

MR. LAFLAMME.

“Let us remark here that the law does not require that the agency should be established by means of a written or even of a verbal authority; it is inferred from the relations of the parties—from the bonâ fide support which the agent affords to the candidate with the sincere view of ensuring his election.”

Here is what is stated, quoted in the judgment, and given as evidence:—

“I met Mr. Langevin in many parishes, and in each of his speeches he invariably spoke of the clergy, stating that the electors were obliged to obey the voice of their pastor, and answer to the call of the bishops or of the bishop, for I took a note of that expression at St. Agnes, held at Mr. Joseph M'Nicolls', ‘that he had the unanimous support of the clergy of the county;’ and when, at Eboulements, the truth of this was questioned, the vicar, Mr. Gosselin, from the garret window of his parsonage, asserted, in the presence of Mr. Langevin, that he was certain M. Langevin had the support of all the curés in the county; that at St. Fidèle he stated the same thing as to the unanimous support of the clergy. At St. Agnes, Mr. Langevin said ‘the electors must obey the powerful voice of the clergy.’ I noted the expression. The notes I took were in writing.”

MR. BLANCHET: Who is the party that gives that evidence?

MR. LAFLAMME: It is taken from the notes of the judgment rendered by the Supreme Court.

MR. BLANCHET: Who is the witness?

MR. LAFLAMME: Mr. Tremblay. It was undisputed and undenied.

MR. BLANCHET: That is enough.

MR. LAFLAMME continued to read from the judgment of the Supreme Court, as follows:

“Here, then, we have the respondent, before determining to run the election, stipulating inter alia that he should have the support of the clergy; and on receiving from the gentlemen who asked him to run, and who, he understood, had gone into the county and had met at Baie St. Paul a certain number of the priests of the county, the assurance that he would have their support, he accepts the candidature, and after such acceptance goes himself into the county, calls on all the clergy, talks with them about the election, and, no doubt, from his testimony, received confirmatory assurances of their favour and support; and at public meetings promulgated the fact that the clergy favoured and desired his candidature, and publicly proclaimed to the people that they should listen to and obey the voice of the clergy."

This was not an exceptional case, his hon. friends upon the other side of the House knowing as well as he did that this was one of the many instances of elections carried by the alliance in favour of the Conservative party by the tyranny, activity, and energetic influence of the clergy in the Province of Quebec.

MR. MASSON: How do you account for that; I judge the communists are for you?

MR. LAFLAMME said that some communists came there and were sent back. They were brought by the Conservatives and sent back by the Liberals to purify society. He would leave to better hands the duty of dealing with the objections which the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition made with respect to Protection and the absolute want of legislation mentioned in the Speech, to put an end to the insolvencies which have occurred so frequently throughout the Dominion, to restore trade, to bring back ship-building not only in the Province of Quebec but in the other Provinces. He believed it was almost crime on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to have left the country so long in that unfortunate state of depression. The Government had attempted to restore it to prosperity. If they would only show a plan by which even this continuing depression could be terminated he was ready to support it. He was ready—he was more than that—he would give the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) his support with the greatest pleasure in the world if he could show with any hope of success, by any possible legislation, to bring back not only the former prosperity of the country but terminate the present distress, and show that the country was returning to that prosperity which had rapidly disappeared since the late Government had left the Treasury benches. That was an act which certainly would be patriotic on their part, to at least indicate the course to be taken; and he was certain, if they desired a reaction, they could depend upon it that the moment they should show this, if members on the Government side of the House refused to accept and follow such valuable instruction, hon. gentlemen opposite were sure to have a greater reaction than ever appeared in any country; and if they were not brought back to power, notwithstanding their previous commissions and omissions, it will be singular. But unfortunately, the reaction which was so much spoken of was a reaction which was more apparent than real, and which would certainly not take place when the electors were put in possession of the whole facts regarding the conduct of the Administration. The result would be not a reaction in favour of the Conservative party, but in favour of those who had honestly administered the affairs of the country; the reaction which had been spoken of should be entirely on the other side. He would recall to the hon. member from Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) a fable of La Fontaine, a translation of which he had never seen in English. It was the fable of the donkey which carried the relics. La Fontaine, who was a very good Catholic, mentions a donkey, which having been used for very modest purposes, was employed one day to carry relics, and he found it very extraordinary how well he was received and treated. Everybody was bowing as he passed along, and he thought he had become something extraordinary; he flattered himself of his great success. When, after having deposited his relics, the boys came and threw stones and treated him as usual, the animal found he was nothing but what he had been before—

MR. MASSON—A donkey?

MR. LAFLAMME: A donkey. In mentioning the anecdote he did so without making any comparison between the present political parties. But he intended to refer to the influences which hon. gentlemen opposite had used. They had had the advantage of influences which he hoped would not be again exercised, for he understood the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) to have expressed regret that politics and religion should have gone together.

MR. MASSON: I said I regretted to see that politics and religion must interfere, and I say the same now. It is a disgrace, and I hope this disgrace will cease in our Provinces, and this will bring the reaction of which I spoke.

MR. LAFLAMME said that another accusation which the hon. gentleman has brought against the Liberal party was that its leaders had taken advantage of the position given them by the confidence of the people in order to place themselves in comfortable situations; that the hon. the late Attorney General of the Dominion, the Hon. Sir Antoine Aimé Dorion, the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals of Quebec, did abandon the party at a most critical moment, as also the Hon. Mr. Fournier; and the hon. member for Terrebonne believed that ought not to be tolerated, and that it was the cause of the present reaction which is manifest in the Province of Quebec. But the hon. gentleman forgets that since Confederation the Conservative party had taken into their ranks and to the Ministerial benches, St. Narcisse Belleau, who was appointed a Governor; Hon. Wm. Macdougall, who was appointed a Governor.

MR. MASSON: Sir Narcisse Belleau never was a Minister of the Dominion.

MR. LAFLAMME said the list also included Hon. W. P. Howland, appointed Governor of Ontario; Sir Edward Kenny, Administrator of Nova Scotia; Mr. Morris, appointed a Judge and then a Governor; Mr. Archibald, appointed a Governor; Mr. Howe, appointed a Governor; Mr. Tilley, appointed a Governor; Mr. Hugh Macdonald, appointed a Judge; Mr. Dunkin, appointed a Judge. Before Confederation, cases were of frequent occurrence, among the number being those of Mr. Draper, Mr. Moran, Mr. Morrison, Mr. Vankoughnet and Mr. Spence, who was appointed Collector of Customs. All these gentlemen were taken from the Treasury benches.

MR. TUPPER: No; Mr. Archibald was not. He was a private member of the House when appointed.

MR. LAFLAMME.

MR. LAFLAMME: I speak subject to correction. I am told positively he was a member. If you compare the list there are no less than ten since Confederation and six before.

MR. MASSON: How many in Lower Canada.

MR. LAFLAMME: I do not know how many in Lower Canada.

MR. MASSON: Not one.

MR. LAFLAMME said they probably did not consider the position worthy of being held. They enjoyed the sweets of office rather than the position of a judge. Every one knew that the late Sir George Cartier would never have thought for a moment of taking the position of a judge, because he considered the position which he held in the country as a leading politician and having power in his hands was superior, as he was confident no one could take it from him, and that position was to his active mind better suited to him than the quiet retired life of a judge on the bench. From Lower Canada there were Mr. Christopher Dunkin, who was appointed a judge, and Sir Narcisse Belleau, who was appointed a Governor.

MR. MASSON: He never was a Dominion Minister.

MR. LAFLAMME said the objection he made to the hon. gentleman's consistency with respect to the amnesty also applied to the question of Protection. He had become a consistent and worthy follower of hon. gentlemen opposite. During all that time he was perfectly satisfied with the fiscal policy of the Government. There never was a question raised as to 15 per cent. being the highest tariff imposed. There never was a proposition urged by hon. gentlemen opposite in the interests of the Province of Quebec, which hon. members opposite seemed to think had been so much in need of a proper system of protection, in favour of protection during the time the hon. gentlemen were in office. The tariff of the late Government was esteemed by hon. gentlemen opposite a model tariff, and required no modification. Since this Administration came into power there had been an addition of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Was that enough, or was it not enough? This was certainly more than the Conservatives had ever given to the manufacturers of the Dominion, and we had at the present moment a more protective system than when hon. gentlemen opposite were at the head of affairs. They cried for protection only when they were out of office, and he was positive—for he had too much confidence in their intelligence, the learning of the gentlemen of the other side to think otherwise—that if they were managing the affairs of the country they would not attempt to introduce a more protective system than the one that exists. It would be utterly impossible to obtain the revenue, and to protect at the same time the manufacturing interests beyond the amount for which they were protected to-day. The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) had spoke of the disasters to the country, and referred to the failure of one of those manufacturers who supported the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue in Quebec. That gentleman was a boot and shoe manufacturer. If all the boot and shoe manufacturers in the country were to-day asked if they required more protection, not one would reply in the affirmative. It was not the want of protection that had brought disaster on the boot and shoe manufacturers, but rather the over-protection, for there had been more boots and shoes manufactured than the Canadian market—which was our only market—could consume, and it was found that the manufacturers could supply the requirements of five times the present population of the country. Having no other market but that of Canada, they must limit their operations, and when they multiply their stocks too largely they must cease. At present, manufacturers had $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duty to protect their manufacture, and the difference between the freight and the commissions raised the amount virtually to 20 per cent. protection to manufactures in this country, 20 per cent. the consumer had to pay for the luxury of having a manufactory in the neighbourhood. The manufacturers which required more than 20 per cent. protection were not legitimate manufacturers; their labour was not productive and they cannot contribute to enrich or develop the resources of this country. That subject would, however, be better treated by abler men than himself on a subsequent occasion. He had never found, as the hon. gentlemen had given the House to understand, that all those who belonged to the National party were protectionists. There never was any such question mooted in the Party National, and the idea expressed by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) of the principles laid down in the programme of that party and the declaration that they required more facilities to enter into commercial treaties with other countries, certainly could not establish the principle that from laying down that plank in the platform, the party insisted on and required protection. The question of protection, however, was Incidental Protection. It could never be made the absolute question of dividing parties. There were gentlemen on the other side of the House who were Free-traders, while there were some on the Government side who were Protectionists; but every man would admit that there could be but one interest, and that was to find out what was really the best policy for the development and prosperity of the country. He believed the tariff, such as it was, and the rates, such as they were, for the protection of manufacturers, were sufficient. Some of the ablest writers for the protective system had of late completely changed their minds. He took as an example, the representative organ of the Protectionist party in Montreal, the Gazette, whose editor was certainly one of the ablest writers on that side of the tariff question. He, nevertheless, had accepted the decision of the Dominion Board of Trade, which has always been held up by the gentlemen on the other side as being the only competent judges in matters of trade, because they happened to approve the policy of the Government in former days, they had however come back—and they were representative men of their class—and at their last meeting they declared that the free tariff was the tariff required of this country, that it required no alteration, and that the protection given was sufficient. Now, probably, hon. members on the other side would declare that the Dominion Board of Trade had lost its influence and could not understand the question as it did in previous years when they thought proper to bring forward a condemnation of the politics of the Liberal party.

MR. MOUSSEAU moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Fifteen minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 12th Feb., 1878.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

MR. MOUSSEAU said the hon. gentlemen opposite had now been in power for almost the space of five years; their term of office was drawing to a close, and this Session was the last of the present Parliament. These hon. gentlemen had presented the House with a bill of fare which contained nothing at all—in effect it set forth this fact itself. The House had been merely called together for the transaction of ordinary business, and nothing of an extraordinary nature, nothing of any importance was proposed to be done. No assistance was to be extended to the country suffering under general commercial depression; in fine, nothing whatever was to be done. Of course, the House, as well as the country was very seriously dissatisfied with this programme and the Speech from the Throne. With regard to the Address which was moved in reply, he considered that it was the duty of every member to inform the House in what manner he looked upon the policy pursued by the Ministry.

MR. LAFLAMME.

They would tell the Administration they had done nothing. It was true that bankruptcies and commercial disasters existed throughout the country, but nevertheless, the Ministry had done nothing. They had not made use of the means at their disposal, either in the direction of protecting our industries or of reducing the public debt or of diminishing the public expenditure. What was the answer received by hon. members on making these statements? It was always the same, viz:—that the leader of the Opposition, his hon. friend from Kingston, had pursued the same policy; and that the Conservatives had done the same thing when in possession of power. Well, he thought that the country was beginning to be disgusted with this reply; the hon. gentlemen opposite had not attained office to live on the past career of the Conservatives, or on the past faults or blunders of the Conservative party. They obtained office in order that they might live their own life and exemplify by their deeds, their acts, their measures and their reforms, the famous reform principles of which they had heard so much. Nevertheless, these hon. gentlemen hesitated, or refused altogether to put those principles into practice. If hon. members would closely examine the five years which had elapsed since the hon. gentlemen opposite had taken office, hon. members would find that the legislation presented to the House and the country by these hon. gentlemen was almost nil, such legislation as increased the burden of taxation, and the expenses and the public debt in addition, excepted. The only measure of any importance which these hon. gentlemen had passed was one which he was glad to say he had opposed most strenuously,—the establishment of the Supreme Court. This was the only measure, properly speaking, that had been submitted to Parliament during their five years of office by these hon. gentlemen. Now, he had always understood—and so history taught them with respect to all other countries—that when new men reached office, it was not to secure fat situations and sinecures for themselves, nor to play the role of place-hunters and office-seekers, but because they were presumed to be better men, or because their principles and their measures or their social and political reforms which they presented to the country, were better than those of their predecessors. He would repeat that, during the past five years, the hon. gentlemen opposite had done nothing of the kind; and it was not to be wondered at, as had yesterday been stated, that the country generally, and the Province of Quebec particularly, were disgusted with the present supremacy of the Liberal party. And in many instances it had been shown that this disgust was so deeply seated, that it was impossible for the electors of the Province of Quebec to endure the yoke of the Liberal party. This feeling had been exemplified and illustrated in the numerous instances that had been afforded to the electors of the Province of Quebec for the rejection of Ministerial candidates, at partial elections since the year 1874. In one matter, and in one matter only, would public opinion, as represented in the House, concur with the statements contained in the Speech from the Throne; and this related to the expression of regret the Speech contained with reference to the approaching departure of their Excellencies, Lord and Countess Dufferin from this country; and every one would endorse the eulogium which had been paid these high personages, and what had been so well said in this regard by the right hon. member for Kingston. In view of the high literary attainments, high social position, real talents and practical statesmanship of His Excellency, they hoped that he, Lord Dufferin, would, on his arrival in England, be accorded by his party a position worthy of all his great merits, talents and attainments. One of the chief boasts of the Liberal party on attaining office had been, that they took office resolved to raise their now famous standard of public morality. This was exhibited as the leading plank in the Reform programme and platform. The Liberals and Grits on taking office had declared their intention to replace the corrupt Administration of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Etienne Cartier, with purity, and to raise aloft the standard of public morality; and one of the special means by which this was to be accomplished, was to prevent the interference of Ministers and high public officials in the elections of the representatives of the people. During the many years that the hon. gentlemen were in opposition, many speeches, many discussions, and many motions had been made with that object in view; and not later than in 1873, the last Session that the Conservatives were in power, the present hon. the Prime Minister had made a motion which he would read to the House. It had been made in 1873. Mr. Mackenzie had moved:

“It is highly criminal in a Minister, or the Ministers, or other servants under the Crown, to directly or indirectly use the power of their office in the election of representatives to serve in Parliament, and any attempt at such influence is at all times to be resented by this House as an insult to its own dignity, honour, and independence.”

A few moments subsequently, these hon. gentlemen had succeeded to power on the resignation of the late Government, and taken the seals of office; and a few years afterwards, during last November, an election had taken place in Quebec Centre. A member of the Government, the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, had just been defeated in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska, because he (Mr. Laurier) had been unfaithful to all his past promises, and consequently the Ministry had been obliged to create a vacancy for him in the ancient city of Quebec. What did they then see? He would answer frankly—nothing less than direct bribery, offered to the electors of Quebec East. A portion of these electors were told that if they voted for the Minister of Inland Revenue, the Government would grant them the free importation of French wines, while others were informed that if they voted for the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue they would secure for them the free importation of Canadian-built ships into France. He had heard the explanation given on this point by the hon. the Premier. He could not contradict the hon. gentleman, but he was sure that the whole country would endorse his opinion that the transactions or dealings which had taken place with regard to the duty on French wines and the duties imposed by France on Canadian-built ships, would always bear the appearance of direct and positive bribery, offered to an entire constituency by the Government, which desired to have one of their number, who had been defeated, elected by these means. It was not the first time during this Parliament that he had had occasion to see practice placed in opposition to theory and those famous principles—especially that principle which related to the raising of the standard of public morality. He had heard in the House in 1874, during his first Session. Major Walker explained to the House, with great show of indignation, how he abandoned Sir John A. Macdonald, and how he had separated himself from the Conservative party. Major Walker had spoken in magnificent terms of the great extent to which corruption was practised by all the Conservatives, and had said that they, in effect, infected the whole of public life by the corruptions which they practised in the carrying on of the elections and elsewhere. This was during the Session of 1874; and a few months, if not a few weeks afterwards, that same gentleman was proven before a court of his country to have freely expended some $30,000 in the carrying on of his election. This, he had no doubt, was expended in order to raise the standard of public morality. That same gentleman who had spoken in such strong terms in the House in favour of upholding the public morality, and in announcing the corruption alleged to have been practised by others, had got his deserts and was disqualified. But, nevertheless, that gentleman did not lose in the estimation of his friends, the hon. gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches, and he (Mr. Mousseau) understood that this Major Walker had, since that time, obtained promotion in the militia; and that those who had pre-eminently aided him in his election and used direct bribery, had received excellent appointments of lucrative births under the Administration. Another illustration and exemplification of the manner in which public morality was vindicated by the hon. gentlemen had also been witnessed in the county of Chambly, which at the present time was so ably represented by his hon. friend Mr. Benoit. An election had taken place in that county, as everybody was aware; first two or three elections, and we have contested them all, and he thought it required a third election before his hon. friend had succeeded in turning the former member out (Mr. Jodoin). The first election had been decided before the courts, and thorough investigations had taken place, exhibiting a vast amount of corruption and bribery. They would see how at the beginning of the new reign of the Liberals in the Province of Quebec, and they had tried to imitate the Grits of the Province of Ontario in the manner of carrying elections and in their manner of raising the standard of public morality—a cardinal principle of the hon. gentlemen opposite. The principal witness heard in the contestation of the election was the brother of the respondent; and the following comprised the small amount of money which he had expended in order to raise the standard of public morality in the county of Chambly:—

MR. MOUSSEAU.

“I am the brother of the respondent; I took an active part in the contest; a central committee was organized at Longueuil; I went there frequently; I expended money of which the committee and the respondent were ignorant; I gave $500 to M. Auguste Beaudry, $400 to M. Antoine Rochelau, $400 to M. Hilaire Benoit, $100 to M. Luc Champagne, 100 odd dollars to M. P. G. Charlebois, about the same amount to Chas. Poirier and François Poirier, $400 to Isaire Lespérance, $250 to Dr. Roy, $100 to Nazaire Charron, $200 to Thos. Gréfontaine, $50 to Laurent Achin, $200 to M. Duchatel, $150 to M. Lemoine, $50 to one M. Perrault, $40 to another Perrault, $75 to M. Leduc, $75 to M. H. Vian, from $75 to $90 to Joseph St. Germain, $100 to M. Chaffer, $100 to M. Robert; I gave after the election $300 to Jos. Pattenau, $300 to Andre Ste. Marie, $300 to Jos. Richard, $1,000 to Eusebe Gibeau, $900 to Auguste Beaudry; I paid Chas. Racicot $40, Chas. Charron $20, Auguste Dufort $20, Alf. Longpré $15, Abraham Deragon $60, Jos. Allard from $125 to $160, Louis Birs from $60 to $75, Joseph Boyd $12, Toussaint Lespérance $30, Albert Lapointe $200, Eucher Lavoie from $6 to $8, John Deloge $6, J. B. Fausse $20, Albert Morin $6, Nazaire Morin $6. The total of the disbursement for the election was $9,000.”

The number of electors to whom money had been given was very numerous, and in toto the small sum of $9,000 had been spent with a view of raising the standard of public morality in that county. He regretted to say that a gentleman whose name he was obliged to give, had been connected with these proceedings. The examination continued as follows:—

“Where did you obtain this money? I got it from a friend. M. Louis Tourville, merchant, of Montreal; I received money before, during and after the contest, between the day of nomination and the day of polling, I obtained from $2,000 to $3,000, the balance was given me before the day of nomination and after polling day; M. Tourville gave me this money in his office on Commissioners Street; I think that it is M. Rudolphe Laflamme, lawyer, of Montreal, who advised me to go and see M. Tourville.”

This gentleman had been advised by Mr. Rudolphe Laflamme, of Montreal, to go and see Mr. Tourville. The Minister of Justice had been working in that county as the hon. gentleman's friend had worked in London, both being intent on raising the standard of public morality; and some parties thought that this Mr. Rudolph Laflamme was identical with the present Minister of Justice, and in a few of the details which he had given concerning this election, which were insufficient,—probably his hon. friend the Minister of Justice might complete them, as the hon. gentleman might recollect the facts much better than he did himself,—that though so high ground had been taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite in order to raise the standard of public morality, of which so much had been said, the hon. gentlemen opposite had done exactly the contrary to what they had promised the country that they would do. Much had been said yesterday touching the amnesty question, and a great deal by the hon. gentlemen the Minister of Inland Revenue and the hon. the Minister of Justice on the subject. He regretted very much that he could not agree with these two hon. gentlemen, because they had either misrepresented some of the facts or they misunderstood them entirely. That question had taken the form which it had assumed, owing to the steps taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite. It was brought forward in that guise by these hon. gentlemen and not by the Conservative party. He was quite prepared to acknowledge that a great many difficulties had been encountered by their friends in 1871 and 1872, and particularly in 1870, touching this matter, and he was more ready to admit the existence of these difficulties, as he was well aware of the keen feeling entertained by the English-speaking population on this subject. He had been accustomed to tell his hon. friend at the time—and he repeated it to the House here, and before the House and country to-day with pleasure—that the law-abiding character of the English population, which had been exemplified in a most remarkable manner some years ago, owing to the fact that an English subject had been killed in Abyssinia, and the amount of £7,000,000 had been expended by the English Government to avenge his death. He had remarked at the time that such being the case, they could not expect that the English-speaking population of this country would witness without anxiety and without indignation the death of that man, Thomas Scott. Subsequent circumstances, besides, had embittered this feeling. It was the use made of that offence and crime in Ontario which had intensified the public feeling on this subject. In the Province of Ontario the courts had done their best to excite a feeling of indignation among the English-speaking population against his right hon. friend, the member for Kingston, and the right hon. gentleman's friends, because he (Sir John A. Macdonald) was suspected of having made some promises of amnesty to the rebels of Manitoba, or in the Province of Quebec. An exactly contrary state of things existed throughout that ancient Province. In all its cities, in all its towns, and in all its parishes, a similar, but contrary, state of feeling had been excited, and a universal cry had arisen in the elections of 1872 with regard to this amnesty question, and the greatest calamity that had befallen the late Sir George Cartier and his friends was precisely due to the fact that the Liberals had reproached him in his party, and all his friends, in not having granted such complete amnesty to the persons involved in the North-West difficulties. This was the great war cry of the Liberal party during those elections. It was used with great effect in Montreal East and in the counties, and in fact throughout the Province. He would not assume to say that they were wrong at the time; but at the time when, in 1875, the hon. gentlemen opposite had consented to grant merely a partial amnesty, he thought they were in the wrong, if they knew anything of the politics and anything of the great difficulties which we had first in this country, in the solution of such difficult questions. The hon. gentlemen opposite had either acted in bad faith in 1872, or they had acted in bad faith in 1875. For if it was impossible to grant a complete amnesty in 1875, it was still more impossible to grant it in 1872, when, owing to the use which had been made of the question in the Province of Ontario and in some parts of the Province of Quebec, and in the Maritime Provinces, a great state of public indignation existed on the subject. Hence it is no excuse for the hon. gentlemen opposite, to now come before the House, and say that they had done their duty in this particular instance. "No," as in all other circumstances, the hon. gentlemen opposite had also in this case been false to themselves, and unfaithful to the promises which they had made to the electors. In this particular they had acted as they had done under other circumstances, and that was in bad faith; curiously enough the hon. mover of the Address, the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, and the hon. the Minister of Justice had fallen into the same contradiction. They tried to assume a strong position against the right hon. member for Kingston and the late Sir George Cartier. They had denied the correctness of the allegation that an amnesty had been promised, and then they denied having done so; and in 1875 these hon. gentlemen voted precisely the contrary in this resolution which was so carefully and accurately drawn. He believed, that by the then hon. Minister of Justice, the hon. member for South Bruce, a partial amnesty was granted, based upon the famous promises which were alleged to have been made by the right hon. member for Kingston and the late Sir George Cartier. This was positively set forth in the preamble of the resolution, which was as follows:

MR. MOUSSEAU.

"That from the evidence reported to this House by the Committee appointed last Session on the questions arising out of the North-West troubles, it appears that the late Sir G. E. Cartier, Minister of Militia and Defence, and during Sir J. A. Macdonald's illness, acting Minister of Justice, leader of the Government, and its representative in its negotiations with the delegates from the North-West, at various times gave divers persons of prominence in the North-West, amongst whom were Archbishop Taché, Father Richot, the Hon. M. A. Girard, and the Hon. J. Royal, assurances that a complete amnesty would be granted by the Imperial Government in respect of all acts committed by all persons during the North-West troubles, and requested that these assurances should be, as they were, communicated to the interested parties, etc."

He said he left gentlemen to try to make that fact agree with their professions of to-day. Another inconsistency of the party of the gentleman opposite, and especially of the Liberals of the Province of Quebec, was their policy on the economical matters of Free-Trade and Protection. He was fairly surprised when he heard the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue try to prove or, at least, assert that the party, as a party, had not promulgated the doctrine of Protection in 1872. He did assert most positively, and it could be proved by everybody who is familiar with our history, and especially with our struggle in 1871 and 1872, that the old Liberal party and the old National party did have as a feature of their principal platform, Protection all through, not only in 1872, but in 1871; during the campaign of 1871, during the local elections for the Province of Quebec, when the National party was beginning to form at that very time, although it was at that time not the proper opportunity. They tried to inculcate in the minds of the electors for the Province of Quebec, that all the blame was to be laid at the door of the late Sir George and the hon. member for Kingston. If there was so much emigration from the Province of Quebec; if there were so many French-Canadians in the United States; if we were poor; if we had no manufacturers, it was the fault of those two statesmen. He said he had read here one of the best speeches delivered by the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Jetté) against the lamented Sir George Cartier in 1872. It was an inflammatory speech; there was one column of that part reported in the National of the 25th of July, 1872, in which there was a long demonstration tried to be made by the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Jetté). He was then a candidate. He tried to show that all the evils that we suffered in the Province of Quebec; that there was a want of manufacturers and a migration of French-Canadians to the United States which was due exclusively to the Conservative party, to the lamented Sir George and the hon. member for Kingston. If that migration did take place; if we were poor; if we had no manufactures, it was because we were afraid of the English, and the best means to get manufactures would be either to get them from England or by some other mode. But it was the chief platform of the hon. member for Montreal East with which he succeeded in defeating Sir George Cartier. He said that during the late election he went into many counties of the Province of Quebec, and wherever he met a Liberal or a National it was the same platform—protection in order to start the manufactures of this country; the means how to provide the funds to start a national industry. And there were loud complaints against the Conservatives, against the lamented Sir George, and against the hon. member for Kingston, because they did not raise enough to protect our struggling industries, and it was of the same sort, later, too. It was but too well known that in the programme of the National party it had not been included. Well, we know why it was not included. The nestor of the young and rising party, the hon. member for Chateauguay (Hon. Mr. Holton) had always been a Free-trader, and as they could not bind him, they tried to conceal that principle of theirs under the disguise. He was sure he read it in the first programme published. He thought the word protection to all manufactures was one of the arguments; however, he had not had time to search and look through the papers to find it. As it was read yesterday, or rather in the book which the Hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue held in his hands, there was found an article which he did not dare to read. As it was, it was sufficient for those who understand the French language or the English language to know that it meant protection to manufactures; to regulate our sales, our commercial relations, so as to provide for the establishment of our manufactories. If that did not mean through the independence of other's territories, or the independence of some one or another, that we will be the masters of our position and of our tariffs and our trade, he did not know what it could mean. But he would go further and would tell them that it was one of the platforms which had been accepted by all the French Nationals and French Liberals of Quebec. At the time of which he was speaking, in 1871 and 1872, it was a very good argument and a very good pretext against the Conservatives, and against Sir John, and against Sir George. If it were not put in the article in words as complete as it was in the speeches, it was to keep good company with the Liberals of Ontario and the hon. member for Chateauguay. It was not to disturb the peace of the party at that time. It was not to peril by the platform the arriving of that party to power. But there were documents which could bear out exactly what he had said. The leader of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec did understand it that way. He did understand that party as a National, or Liberal if they liked—he should have a word to say about that in a few minutes—was pledged to the policy of that party; that the party was pledged to the protection of manufactures, and this he had spoken at the time in their own party. They knew what they were about. They had studied and knew about all these mechanical questions far more than is known either by the hon. the Minister of Justice, or the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. They knew very well that there were years of prosperity. They knew very well that there had been times of the greatest prosperity we had ever known in this country, and they knew, as had been admitted by his hon. friend himself, that their imports had become so much in excess of their exports that it was necessary to stop that, and the only means to stop that was to try and encourage our manufacturers in order to keep here the money sent every year to England.

“QUEBEC, 24th March, 1876.

“G. T. ORTON, M.P.,

Chairman Agricultural Committee.

“MY DEAR DOCTOR,—I only received today a printed form of questions from your Committee, in the labours of which I take a deep interest, and hasten to send you my answers. I am afraid they are rather lengthy, but I must acknowledge that I feel some satisfaction in being allowed to give my views on the subject, however little weight they may carry. It is a sort of protest against the accusation of inconsistency which has been brought against me during this Session of the House of Commons, and in the press, for having given up the main plank of the platform of our Parti National. We claimed, above all things, a National Commercial Policy. My friends have been twitted with having given it up, and I was brought in as the leader of the Parti National; but I have not given it up. If I remember correctly, you helped me in 1873 to obtain the exemption of the duty for the beet-root sugar manufacture, and I hope you will approve my views on the subject.

“I remain, my dear Doctor,

“Yours sincerely,

“H. S. JOLY.”

Here was the leader of the National party himself coming to protest; and what did he say in that letter? First, that it was an article of the National party's programme, and for a National policy, which he explained in his answers, as could be seen in the Blue-book. There the leader of the National party (Mr. Joly), admitted positively that one of the articles of the programme of the National party was protection to manufactures, and that article, that part of the programme, had been given up by his friends, whilst he himself was still adhering to it. But other measures, other pretended reforms, were brought forward during those elections in those times. One of them, with which they did a great deal of mischief to the Conservative party, was the question of the New Brunswick schools. He had already said that in Montreal East, in 1872, inflammatory speeches had been made, both by the actual member and by his friends, on two questions—the question of emigration and protection to manufactures—because they attributed the diminution of manufactures and the great emigration of Canadians to the United States to the policy of Sir George Cartier. But at the same election there was another question raised, and which was made use of in the most dishonest way, as was confirmed later by their own conduct, for which hon. gentlemen opposite, especially the Liberals of Quebec, would never be able to meet their electors. They reproached Sir George and the whole Conservative party with not having come to the aid of these Catholics of New Brunswick. He would quote one of the speeches made at that time, and these speeches he read in every county he happened to be in; they were used in every county, in every parish, and at every church door during the year 1872. Having read the speech in the French language, the hon. gentleman went on to say that the quotation was too long to be translated, but it might be summed up in this way: He explained that the Catholics of New Brunswick were ill-treated by the legislation which had been passed through in 1871 and 1872; and that the Catholics of New Brunswick, being thus prosecuted, had appealed to the Federal Government, and that they (the Conservative party), led by the hon. member for Kingston and the lamented Sir George, refused to come to their aid, and had refused to make use of or employ the clause of the constitution which allowed local legislation, and by refusing to make use of that law they had in fact refused to come to the aid of the Catholics of New Brunswick. Everybody knew what these gentlemen, when in power, did to come to the aid of those Catholics. When they were brought face to face with their past promises, which they did not fulfil, and with their past principles, which they had betrayed, they had an answer ready, and would say that they would not mingle politics with religion. That was the only answer that could be got from them; that was the only answer that could come from the lips of two Ministers of the Crown. When told, with much solemnity and indignation, that the Conservatives wanted in the Province of Quebec to form a Catholic party, he was ashamed that such an accusation should be brought before this House by a member of the position and standing of the hon. Minister. He was ashamed of it because the hon. Minister knew when he brought that accusation that it was unfounded; he knew perfectly well that it was pure imagination or party tactics. When the Liberal party failed to secure the help of what they called the clerical party, they turned round and tried to secure the Protestant vote of the Province of Quebec. He was sure that when the hon. Minister brought that accusation, he had lost his temper under the accusation of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson). If he had not lost his temper he would not have done so. He brought his accusation with much solemnity and much apparent indignation; but what were his proofs? Two or three insignificant extracts from newspapers with regard to the New Brunswick school question, that the advice of the Bishop had been such a way and not such a way. This was the evidence brought by an hon. Minister of the Crown, coming forward and throwing to the whole party, and to the whole Province an accusation most dangerous, and calculated to do the greatest mischief in this country—an accusation which those themselves who made it knew to be utterly baseless, and utterly groundless. He would tell another story; he would show the reverse of the medal. Those gentlemen who were working so hard to get the Protestant vote of the Province of Quebec, began by courting the clergy. They began in 1871 and 1872, those gentlemen who were for the programme, by saying that it was published in the Montreal Herald. They told the Protestants of Quebec that it counted for nothing at all calculated to injure the interest or the position or the estates of the Protestants of the Province of Quebec. They were going from Bishop's palace to Bishop's palace, from presbytery to presbytery, and from priest to priest, begging their aid and making lots of promises, and at that time they were the best Catholics in the world. But after the scene of 1875, some Ministers felt the necessity of going before the electors; and what was seen then? The hon. the Minister of Justice made a speech, saying that he was for the Syllabus, that he was for the independence of the Pope, and he was the best Catholic in the world. It was a nice movement, or something else which he did not like to qualify. But the hon. gentleman did the same again elsewhere. He did himself (Mr. Mousseau) the honour, in 1872 and 1876, to come to his county. They had a local contest there, and all the stars of the Liberal party were there. There was the Minister of Inland Revenue, and there was the Minister of Justice; and a famous speech, a good speech, of course, the Minister of Justice made. He did the same thing there; he put himself under the waistcoat of the Pope, and he brought the best evidence in the world, because it was the Bishop's palace. They did that in 1872, and they did it in 1875 and 1876; they would do that every time they wanted. But in 1875 there was some disagreement, and they felt quite discouraged, and then they changed their minds. They had begun to be known, and there was some disagreement. So they changed their minds, and instead of trying to secure the help of the clergy they tried to sow division, the most awful division, in the Province of Quebec. Those very men who had made use of the programme of 1871 and 1872 went to their friends and implored them at certain elections, when they were with Protestants, to tell them that the Conservative candidate would not give as much satisfaction to the Protestants as would the Liberal candidate. His friend the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) had news of it, and wrote a letter to know what he had written them, and he got an answer which was published in the National of the 3rd of July. In that letter what did they see? They saw that after having been to the Bishop's palace, after having been good Catholics, after having done all they could to approve the programme in 1872—

MR. LAFLAMME: I never approved of it.

MR. MOUSSEAU: After having done all that, he now declared that he had been a right good Protestant; and then those very gentlemen coolly told the Conservatives that they wanted to form a Catholic party.

Well, they had begun to be known now, and Protestant Liberals after the next election would be very few indeed; he could tell them that. Now, the results of that were damaging to a certain extent. Before the election, of 1875, an article appeared in L'Evenement stating that Mr. DeBoucherville's Government were threatening the liberties of all Protestants in Quebec. Of course that statement appearing in a French journal was viewed in a serious light by Protestants and there was no wonder that Protestants came forward to defend their co-religionists. But it was well known what these accusations meant. The hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Jetté) in his celebrated letter published in La Minerve, claimed that the Liberals were as good Catholics as the Conservatives, and that the church placed them on the same footing. The hon. the Minister of Justice accused the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) with having treated him unjustly. That accusation was very serious, and he was sure the hon. Minister on reflection would see the necessity of withdrawing the expression. The hon. member for Hochelaga, who possessed much talent and influence, and was an excellent writer, was placed in a difficult position, for the Liberals and Nationals did their utmost to stand well with the Church through that hon. member, and when he proved that they were treasonable to the interests they had advocated in opposition, particularly in 1872, they felt injured. Hon. gentlemen opposite were fond of casting accusations against that hon. member, but instead of injuring him they would only increase by hundreds of votes the majority of that hon. member at the next election, as compared with that of the hon. the Minister of Justice in Jacques Cartier. The hon. the mover of the Address had stated that the country and the House should feel thankful to the Government for the economy and retrenchment they had practised. But he would be glad to know wherein they had practised economy and retrenchment, for the amount of expenditure and number of officials had increased. In some sections it was difficult to travel far without stumbling on some Government employé. Not only did the Government not decrease the number of the employés, but so largely increased the number that it was necessary to erect a new building for them. Those observations were sufficient to prove why and how the people of the Province of Quebec became disgusted with the Liberals of that Province, and more particularly with regard to their false promises.

MR. JETTÉ said that as the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) had constantly referred to him in the course of his remarks, he felt called upon to make a reply. The line of argument followed by the hon. member was certainly not specially addressed to the House, but rather to the people of the Province of Quebec, and especially with a view to the general election in that Province. It were well, perhaps, that a brief answer should be made to his statements, one of the principal of which was ever that the Liberal party in 1871-72 endeavoured to win the support of the clergy in Quebec under false pretences and to cause the elections to turn upon questions in which the support of the clergy could have been obtained. It was a well-known fact that in the Province of Quebec the Liberal party for years past had received opposition, not especially on political, but on religious questions. That was a fact so well known that in 1871-72 it was found necessary by some persons, who desired to meddle with politics and enter the field, to seek to put these religious questions aside and to enter into the contest able to say to the Conservatives, "We are as good Catholics as you are, and we want to talk politics and nothing else." In 1872, when the programme of the National party was framed, it contained only political measures and ideas, and when the election of 1872 began, it was fought merely on political questions. It happened—and he stated this as evidence of what he affirmed—that in 1872, the Conservative party had not secured the support or approbation of the clergy in Quebec. The question of the New Brunswick School Law was before the country, and the Conservative party had not done its duty towards the Catholics of New Brunswick on that question. The question was discussed, and it was argued that the Federal Government had the power to disallow the law that had been passed by the Provincial Legislature, and that the Federal Government had, nevertheless, not disallowed that law. The elections were contested on that question, no doubt, and he was free to admit, that in every constituency in Lower Canada, in 1872, that question was one of the most prominent of those discussed before the electors. Upon that question he took sides against the Government of the day, and against the conduct of the then Minister of Militia—Sir George Cartier—and stated that in his (Mr. Jette's) opinion—with the reservation that was in his speech, and which the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) had stated, and without judging as to the propriety of exercising at the time the power granted by the Constitution—that power of disallowing that law was certainly given to the Dominion Parliament by the British North America Act. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) and the country knew what the Liberal party and the Parti National had done in this House upon that question, and it was useless to revive a discussion on the New Brunswick School Act. The House well knew what amendment was proposed, what course taken by the Liberal party in 1873, and what would have been the result if they had been sustained by only a few members on the other side of the House. Since that time the question had been settled, not in a way to entirely satisfy him (Mr. Jetté), but in a manner to satisfy those most immediately interested, and, as he believed, that must be held to be sufficient, he had nothing more to say upon that point. Although in 1872 the question of the New Brunswick School Act was before the electors, the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) said the Liberals had endeavored at that time to win the support of the Catholic clergy, and to lead the electors to believe that they were the candidates favoured by the clergy. He (Mr. Jette) might mention this fact; that in 1872 a fly sheet was published during his election stating that he was a favorite candidate of the Bishop of Montreal. It was published by some unauthorized person who thought he could assert such a fact. The statement was contradicted by himself, for having gone to the source they learned there was no reason for it, and more than that, he could say it was not a fact; on the contrary, that the Bishop of Montreal had declared at that time, that he was favorable to the candidature of Sir George Cartier. He gave that instance to show that the Liberals had not sought under false pretences to obtain the support of the clergy, but that they conducted the elections on a discussion of political topics on their merits, without reference to religious questions. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) had referred to a letter sent by a Montreal gentleman to the electors of Coteau Landing. He was glad to have the present occasion to state that he did not approve of that letter, and immediately after its publication, which was during the local election of 1875, in the Province of Quebec, he took the first opportunity afforded at a public meeting held in favour of Mr. Duhamel, in Montreal East, to declare that he repudiated that letter, and all the sentiments expressed in it.

Mr. MASSON: You carried the election with it.

Mr. JETTE said that such was not the case. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) had asserted that the Conservative party had never sought to obtain the support of the Clergy against the Liberal or National party, and that the charge that the Conservative party had tried to form a Catholic party in Quebec, and expel from the Church, Liberals and Nationalists, was false. It had, moreover, been asserted that at the late elections in Drummond and Arthabaska and Quebec East, the clergy had not interferred. That fact, which was acknowledged by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, he (Mr. Jette) was glad to say was true, and he hoped it would continue in future. It was an important fact which could not be ignored, and which would probably help much to change the result so often predicted by Quebec Conservatives, that whenever the Conservative party was left to discuss political questions without reference to religious questions, the Liberal party was always successful.

MR. MASSON: Look at Drummond and Arthabaska.

MR. JETTÉ said it was to be hoped that the time had arrived when political questions alone would be discussed at elections, and under those circumstances the results to the Conservative party would not be such as were predicted by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) had alluded very briefly to the amnesty question, and for the very good reason that his position was a rather peculiar one on that question. That hon. member had charged Quebec Liberals with having asked, in 1872, for a full amnesty for all persons implicated in the North-West troubles, and yet been willing to accept a partial amnesty in 1875, and that, therefore, they had acted in bad faith during one of those two years; adding that, perhaps the action was not so wrong in view of the fact that there probably were political reasons behind it. But he was able to demonstrate that the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) himself occupied an anomalous position on this question. When, in 1874, on the motion for the expulsion of Riel, the hon. member for Bagot moved that an amnesty, full and entire, should be given to Riel, he was reproached with not being sincere; and the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), whom the hon. member for Bagot had described as a very good writer, published an article accusing the hon. member with having made a motion injurious to the cause of Riel. The hon. member for Bagot was then very devoted to the interest of Riel. He had, however, read in a newspaper published by that hon. member, opinions so decidedly adverse to the course taken by Riel in the North-West, that he was surprised to find the hon. member prepared to condone the execution of Scott and ask for a full and unqualified amnesty. The following were from an article published in that hon. gentleman's paper:—

MR. JETTÉ.

“We are led to believe that the French press was in error about the troubles in the North-West. This error we shared with our contemporaries, and we are not ashamed to confess it. But most valuable and reliable information, coming to us from a venerable source, deserve to be mentioned “Surely, if these informations are correct, and we have not even the least shadow of a reason to question their correctness, we understand the alarm of the English population. On another account, the capital punishment inflicted to Scott, cannot be explained neither in law nor reason. After all Riel has only an usurped authority, and if Scott annoyed him so much, he had only to imprison him in Fort Garry, as he did so many others. We bitterly regret this execution of Scott, because it will do much to diminish French influence in that latitude; we are even told that it could, perhaps, entirely destroy and prevent Bishop Tache's intervention. We sincerely hope that, at least on this point, our correspondent is in error.

“This murder, it is difficult to call it otherwise, necessarily inspires suspicion against all Riel's intentions. How can we believe that he sincerely desires annexation to Canada, as he has it written to the Courrier de St. Hyacinthe, when he throws a corpse, an insuperable barrier, between him and the Imperial and Federal Governments.”

He understood very well that the writer of such an article could not be very much at ease on that question, having his article of 1870, his motion of 1874 being in conflict with the sentiments expressed in that article. The Liberals were in a more logical position; they had claimed an entire amnesty for Riel, but when they saw that the feeling among the population was so strong that an entire amnesty was not possible, that it would have created troubles probably, they accepted what they thought it most politic to accept, and they were glad to see the Government take the matter in their hands and endeavour to settle it to the satisfaction of every one. The hon. gentleman had spoken of Protection. The hon. gentleman knew his opinions upon that question, and that he had always, not only by his speeches but by his votes, affirmed what he said during that campaign. Now, the hon. gentleman reproached him, because in 1872 he had stated that the country was suffering from the bad Government under which it had been for over twenty years, and said that it was wrong for him to say that if the French Canadians had emigrated to the States, it was due to the state the country was in, and on account of their having no protection for their manufactures and industries, and no means for part of the population to live. This, if he was not mistaken, was exactly the line of argument followed on the previous day by the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), when stating that the present Government was responsible for the state in which the country then was, and he was glad to think that, when in 1872, he spoke of the state of the country in the way he did, he only stated it six years before the hon. member for Kingston. The result of all this was only to show that those gentlemen on the other side were very proud in stating that they had won some elections in the Province of Quebec, and they boasted that they would win more during the next campaign. He believed their position was now changed, and he was quite sure the Liberals would be ready in 1878, as soon as the elections commenced, to meet them upon political grounds alone, and that they would be able, not only to maintain their ground, but would probably be able to cover a larger area.

MR. HUNTINGTON: The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau), complains that the defence of the Government is a declaration, "You did so yourselves," and I quite agree with him, that if the Government had no justification for the course they pursue, except that their predecessors pursued the same course, it would be but a poor defence; but I would ask with what decency can the hon. gentleman reproach this Administration for their acts of policy, and for pursuing the same course which his own party pursued at a time when they were in office? The policy may be right, or it may be wrong, but it is not from their mouths that the reproach should come. The Government have certainly little to stand before the country with if they rely upon the answer that they have followed the course of their predecessors, especially when our enemies promise that the state of things which afflicts the country will be altered in a moment if they take the places of the Government; but when they were denouncing so fiercely the policy that has been pursued—it may be wrong and we may have to defend it—it is the best evidence of the hypocrisy of our accusers that they did all these things themselves—that with which they are now charging the Government. From the very first the policy of the Opposition has been one of misrepresentation on the one hand and recrimination on the other; but they themselves have been guilty of the blunders they wish to charge upon others. The hon. gentleman has delighted the House, and we have had some cheers from the opposite side about the calamities of Colonel Walker and poor Mr. Jodoin of Montreal. They can denounce as much as they choose; I have no objection. I would merely remark that when the hon. gentleman approached that subject, from the cheerful countenances of the hon. gentlemen opposite—which have not been so cheerful the last day or two—I thought the hon. gentleman had discovered a mare's nest that had never been discovered before. You would not think, from the manner in which allusion was made to Mr. Jodoin's disqualification, that the hon. member's leader had been unseated for corrupt practices. He did not tell you that. You would not suppose that the judge on the bench who tried the case said that he abstained from exercising his power to inflict disqualification, and that, perhaps, he was doing wrong in giving the accused the benefit of the doubt. Why some of this eloquence which comes from this trampling upon dead men, as the hon. gentleman seemed to believe, came of following the example of those who had represented this country for twenty years. Now, Mr. Jodoin had never contested an election before, and Col. Walker had learned his politics from the right hon. gentleman opposite. The right hon. gentleman, however, had had the experience of a life time in politics, and yet he was unseated and would have been disqualified but for the charitable doubt the judge exercised in his favour, and the judge felt it his duty, at the same time, to express his opinion with regard to the case. And yet we have these lamb-like expressions from the hon. member who yet is ashamed to have attention drawn to the fact that his friend the leader is tainted with the same crimes with which he would charge others. I do not say it was right of Mr. Jodoin to corrupt the electors, but if he had been as happy in his witnesses as some others were, I do not think we should have got all the details of this election expenditure. I dare say if he had gone to New York, or somewhere, and fairly kept away from the services of processes, that the details would have been very scanty, and disqualification might have been avoided, at least there would have been applied to it no such strong terms as in the other case to which I allude. I recommend to the hon. member silence; I recommend to him the doctrine "those who live in glass houses should not throw stones." And if the hon. gentleman's representations as to the corruption of this side of the House were true, and the circumstances of the case of Colonel Walker were fairly represented as he represents them, he has, in the leader of his own side of the House, as bad a case. For the hon. gentleman to say that they must not hurl back this accusation and refer to the case of Sir John, is a babyish defence, and unworthy of the respectable position which the hon. gentleman occupies in this House. Having shown that if the accusations of the hon. gentleman were true, that it does not lie in his mouth to make them, I would say that the policy of the Liberal party throughout the Dominion has always been for purity of election, and I say that the policy of the Conservative party has always been for maintaining the opportunities for corrupting the electors; and that every amelioration of the Election Law that has been proposed during the last twenty years has only been yielded by the right hon. gentleman and his followers, when they have been forced by irresistible public opinion. That amelioration has been proposed by our side first, and has by them been voted down again and again. In 1863, if I am not mistaken, Mr. Dorion proposed an amelioration of the Election Law, which, if carried out, would have accorded to the electors many of the benefits which this law proposes; but the right hon. gentleman and his followers strongly opposed it. No doubt the right hon. gentleman, before he left office, began to speak as though he had some respect for purity of election. Perhaps he had; but the traditions of his party, the exercise of patronage, and the policy which he followed, finally destroyed him. If he was really in favour of an amelioration of the Election Law, why did not he pass the measure before 1872. For years we insisted upon having speedy remedies for the corruption that existed; we have seen instances in this House where all the obstructions possible had been raised to cause delay. Committees were appointed again and again, used as partizan tools; and sometimes the members were seized with sickness, which made it impossible for them to report until the opportunity was lost, and their party purpose was served. These were the tribunals by which they wished to be served, "These were thy gods, O, Israel!" But I may tell his hon. friend, the member for Bagot, that an opportunity for speedy justice at length arrived, and in order to raise the standard of politics in this country, the hon. gentleman now at the head of the Government, with the aid of his friends, passed an Election Law by which electoral corruption became practically impossible in this country; a law, the necessity for which the Conservatives were generally agreed upon; a law for which the Liberal party had been struggling for twenty years. And when that law was passed where did it find our people? Our people went to the elections of 1874, educated by the right hon. gentleman opposite as to what was indispensably necessary; educated by the system which had sustained the right hon. gentleman; and they forgot the provisions and stringency of the law, and some of them fell by the way. But do you charge that against this party—charge it against the hon. gentleman at the head of this party, when he furnished the guillotine to apply to his own best friends? Do you charge it to him because these men, in the first election after the Bill was passed, never used it because they believed to be true what was said while the Tories were in power, that a Liberal who had not cash was a fool to present himself before the people?

MR. BOWELL: They got the money.

MR. HUNTINGTON: The hon. gentleman says they got the money. If he thinks so all he has to do is to prove it.

MR. BOWELL: You said so.

MR. HUNTINGTON: At all events I know what I now say, I will again repeat, because I do not think that the solemnity of the hon. gentleman's face seems to indicate his appreciation of his responsibility—that all the corruption which was here practised was partly due to the weakness inherent in human nature; but all these corrupt practices are the results of the system by which the Conservative party, when in power, educated the people of this country up to corruption during a rule of twenty years. Let them look at the facts, for this is a more important subject even than it has been made out to be in the eloquent speech of the hon. member, because it was the staple in trade of the hon. gentleman opposite for years. Let them look at the facts as they existed while the Liberal party was in Opposition. How could we then have spent money? We had no friends at Court—we did not have any opportunities. The truth is that the Liberals are so honest that they told the truth when they were accused. They learned the lesson which had led them to so expose themselves, but then they had not learned the diplomatic art of keeping the truth to themselves. Why, I remember when the Opposition in this country was very small; but then it grew a little larger and still a little larger, always the while endeavouring, on great constitutional questions, to aid the Government of that day, and denouncing a corrupt mode of administering the public affairs. What did the then members of the Opposition have to corrupt the electors with? Where had they the blandishments and the caresses of patronage and power to attract the people to their side? No; they had none of these things. They had only those who stood by men who lived up to their principles, and these men stood by them because they had nothing to give in return for such support save their adhesion to their principles. They had nothing to bestow in return for that steady support which in history is given to men claiming the support of their country. It was the hon. gentlemen opposite who had the opportunity of rewarding their supporters. Hon. gentlemen opposite, with a loose election law and with loose means of distributing patronage, enjoyed such opportunity; there were no means for detecting them, and there was no power in this country, as had been for years believed, able to resist the artifices of the right hon. gentlemen opposite. It was the hon. gentlemen opposite who possessed the means of corruption, and God knows that they had used it well. His hon. friend behind him says unsparingly, and perhaps this is the better word, these hon. gentlemen used them "not wisely but too well." I only rose to make this point. I am sure that there are on the opposite benches hon. gentlemen who would be sorry to be misled, and I think it would be well for them to go back to the cardinal principles. I will say this, that the man who believes that any great political party can be so administered, that, on the one hand, it shall make no mistakes, and that, on the other hand, no one in that party would be guilty of wrong-doing, must be—I will not say stupid, but at all events—a very confiding person. It has been, beyond question, necessary for this country, and the electors of this country, that a stringent law against electoral corruption should be passed; protecting, moreover, those whom the people sought as their representatives against the corruptions which had been becoming dominant, and which, if they had not been checked, would have caused the ruin of the country. Before many more years had been passed over, this would no doubt have been necessary; and I must say that when the hon. gentleman rose and attempted, or pretended that something like political wrong, something like a political fallacy, had been committed by the hon. the Premier, who, the hon. gentleman pretended, had undertaken on the floor of the House to raise the standard of public morality, the hon. gentleman did not do it because he was able to show that a few of the friends of the Government—and very few, by the way—have fallen under the operations of the Electoral Law. The hon. gentleman knows that the fact that a few of the friends of the Government have fallen owing to the stringency of the provisions of our own Electoral Law, was no proof of insincerity of desire on the part of the Government to raise the standard of public morality; and to denounce the Ministry on this basis of facts, as the hon. gentleman has done, is a piece of misapprehension which is very rare save on the other side of the House.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I might mention to the hon. gentleman that those gentlemen, including myself, who fell under the operations of the Controverted Elections Act, did so under the Act which was passed and introduced by myself, and not by the hon. gentleman.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I will just mention to the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) that I remember the vehemence with which that hon. gentleman resisted efforts made in the direction of electoral reform a great while ago. He is now becoming an old man, and if the hon. gentleman and his late colleague, Sir George Cartier, whose death we all regretted, have registered on the Statute book of this country, and on the legislative proceedings of this country, one thing more than another, it is the fact that they were the enemies of freedom of election. Those hon. gentlemen were always opposed to the reforms which had been introduced. These they had always resisted. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not interrupt me I am sure for the sake of permitting me to ornament my speech with the consequences of it. The hon. gentleman reminds me that he (Sir John A. Macdonald) leads a party which is not much in the habit of originating great reforms. This country up to the present time has been in a prosperous condition, and the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald), I believe, calls himself the father of Confederation. The hon. gentleman is, moreover, in some places, called a "Baldwin" Reformer. Why, Sir, time works wonders. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, takes to himself the credit of having proposed the construction of the Intercolonial Railway. The hon. gentleman also takes credit to himself for having, in his younger parliamentary days, assisted in the settlement of the Clergy Reserve and Lower Canadian Seigniorial questions, why the hon. gentleman was in power for twenty years, and there could have been no legislation which he did not pass; but then he was forced to do so by the then Opposition which had taken up these measures, and such legislation in each case he had previously denounced and declared to be improper and unnecessary for the country. I do not deny that a Government may necessarily have to yield to the growth of public opinion. I do not deny that a Government in 1850, may not have been able to accept a measure which, in 1860, they might think it worth while to pass; but what I say is this—that it is an act of indecency on the part of the hon. member, or of any part of a House, which had resisted certain concessions to the death, and then passed them rather than resign their seats to the Opposition by which these reforms were passed, to now make a comparison, as if they had been the originators of these great measures when they were only the hewers of wood and the drawers of water in this regard, for which they have been paid. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mousseau) would allow him to ask him if he pretended that hon. gentleman on his side of the House had originated the law for the trial of Controverted Elections. I said, and I think that the hon. gentleman cannot disprove it, that there was not an amelioration made in the Election Law during the past twenty years which had not been suggested by the Opposition in some form or other, and which the hon. gentleman, then at the head of affairs, had to accept; and I said, moreover, and

MR. HUNTINGTON.

I repeat now, that the traditions of the Conservative party for years and years have been to resist the freedom of elections. They have distrusted the people. They have not dared to give them the franchise. This is not peculiar to this country. They have dreaded the consequence of inviting the people to take part in the management of their own affairs. I place this responsibility upon their shoulders. It has been so with regard to the question of franchise; it was so with regard to the machinery by which the franchise is manipulated. Let the hon. gentleman stick to his colours, and either be penitent and declare that his party were mistaken during the last twenty years, or not pretend now that his party absolutely passed all the measures, carried even by himself, for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of the masses of the people. The Conservative as we have studied him, and the Conservative as we have known him for years, is a man who distrusts the people. He loves the working man sometimes; he is very fond of the people at some demonstrations; but if you look at the Legislature and Parliament as regards Conservatives, you will find that there the original idea which they express is resistance to the ameliorations that extend the blessings which are to be conferred on the people. You will also find that when, at last, they come to yield and carry through the beneficial measures pressed upon them by those who are too strong to be resisted; they are complaisant and very happy men while they are sitting on the Treasury Benches and carrying out those very measures. And it has not rarely happened, as it has happened to-day, that they boast not only of what they have thus done, but they also deny to those who forced them to do it the credit of having forced them on. The hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) says that he passed the Controverted Elections Act; why, the hon. gentleman says a great many things in this House, and a great many things in this country, concerning which he must be either oblivious himself as to the exact condition of things, or have a great belief in the fact that his followers throughout the country and in the House are partakers of the waters of Lethe. The hon. gentleman did pass the Controverted Elections Act under the circumstances I have mentioned, but in 1872 he voted against it. I think I am not wrong in stating that my hon. friend the member for South Bruce introduced the Bill, and the hon. gentleman voted it down, and I think I can suggest to the House a sufficient reason why. Though the hon. gentleman knew that the Bill had to pass, he voted it down for a little season. Mr. Speaker, I told you that I did not intend to occupy the House even as long as I have done on this subject. I have no desire to reproach the hon. gentlemen in this House who feel impatient at the notion that sectional discussions should occupy our attention here; but I am sure that hon. gentlemen have felt that we of Lower Canada have sometimes fallen into sectional discussion which, confined almost entirely to the interests of the Province, had better be fought out on local ground.

MR. MASSON: That will not be stopped so soon as you desire.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I am not endeavouring to stop the hon. gentleman. I would not even object to hear the hon. gentleman speak again. I was on the point of saying that I am a Lower Canadian, and to tell the House it seemed to me that although our subjects are not so broad as they might be, and though they do not cover the whole ground, still we have as much interest here in this Legislature in ventilating the public questions that affect us, as is the case with regard to matters affecting Nova Scotia and the other Provinces, and therefore the fair and square discussion of these subjects here to a greater degree than we are accustomed, would, perhaps, be a good thing. I am not desirous to say anything about the religious question, but I have not listened without interest to the very delicate discussion which has taken place on this subject. I have not listened to it without interest and gratification. My views in this relation are well known, and nothing gave me greater pleasure than to hear the opinions expressed last night by my hon. friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Masson.) I feel that the hon. gentleman's opinions are worthy of him, and of the position which he occupies in this House; and I am prepared to say more—I am not prepared to deny to the hon. gentleman that a change in the policy of his party may have been to some extent due to the position he has assumed himself. I do not want to confer an embarrassing honour on him, but I do not think a great while has elapsed since an honour of that kind would have been sufficient to crush him. And if, by acting wisely and cautiously and as a just leader should do, he has really succeeded in banishing from our politics in Lower Canada those dangerous elements which the hon. gentleman denounced last night in terms so happy and so gratifying, I think, to every lover of his country, and every member of this House, and if he has really succeeded in removing those asperities and unfavourable influences, I do not imagine that anybody in this House will grudge to see the Conservative party led by one leader, and that leader my hon. friend (Mr. Masson). But I could not but be amused, as a looker-on in Lower Canada, at the feeling of horror which the hon. gentleman from Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) had at the idea that a Liberal should get up before the people and say, "I am a good Catholic." Why should he not? When assailed as being a Communist—

MR. MASSON: No.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I would suggest, Sir, to the hon. member for Terrebonne not to throw away his laurels. Let him leave these absolute denials to a gentleman who sits a long way on his right.

MR. MASSON: I was at several meetings and never heard it.

MR. HUNTINGTON: We know, Sir, that, though the hon. member for Terrebonne might think a Liberal might be a gentleman, the general tone in Lower Canada has been to give the Liberals no standing-place of respectability, if not to cast upon them the imputation of rascality; and, although the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) has cast oil on the troubled waters, and banished or exorcised those spirits which have been so turbulent, I was amused to see the old spirit break out on the part of my hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) who has made so many stump speeches in the country, and has now repeated them here. My hon. friend says he (the Minister of Justice) pretends to be a Catholic. Sir, when my friend from Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) shall have taught gentlemen opposite that an honest man, who does his duty and loves his God and his country, has equal rights, be he Catholic or Protestant, in this country, then my hon. friend will have fulfilled his great mission of last night, and I shall be pleased to give him every honour for having accomplished it. In the discussions which have occurred in this House on this subject, and more particularly last night, mention was made of an hon. gentleman who had been a member of this Government, and who, like myself, and perhaps like all of us, has been sometimes traduced, and sometimes, perhaps properly, blamed. He has exercised considerable influence in his native Province, and I have, in the course of his long public life, sometimes thought him a sterling man,—sometimes a dishonest politician. But, Sir, in regard to the present Lieut.-Governor of Manitoba, I cannot help taking this opportunity of saying that having acted with him for sometime as his colleague, and in Opposition when hon. gentlemen opposite were on these benches, I never saw anything to induce me to believe that he was not a most faithful Minister—faithful to his party, and faithful to his country; and while circumstances I will not recite here may have given some comfort to the enemy and some trouble in our own camp, I will not believe, in regard to the Hon. Mr. Cauchon, who for years acted with the party of hon. gentlemen opposite and built up influences in Lower Canada for which they would now be glad to crush him, that the mere fact of his crossing the House would be a justification for the foul calumnies with which they followed him.

MR. MOUSSEAU: They were not from us but from yourselves.

MR. HUNTINGTON: There, again, Mr. Speaker, we see the charming simplicity of my hon. friend. We hear sometimes of the manner in which an English statesman would be dealt with. I remember once that I alluded in a public speech to the right hon. gentleman opposite (Sir John A. Macdonald), whose abilities we are all very happy to admit, and I said I thought some things he had said or done would not have been said or done by Gladstone or Disraeli. The Mail newspaper, which I think he knows is published in Toronto, says he is a clever man and a desirable man to have in public life. He answered that English statesmen would not have given such provocation; they would not have bought rails and this, that, and the other. Now, at the commencement of a Session, in a discussion in which the country is interested, and when, I believe, we are preparing for an exciting contest about to come upon us—

MR. HUNTINGTON.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hear, hear.

MR. HUNTINGTON: The right hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," but let him look out that he is not unseated next time; because, if the law at the last election had been the same as it is now, I believe he would not be here to-day. Though, in the excitement we may be led to fear exists on both sides, and the interest which is felt in the character of the legislation and administration of the public affairs of the country, certain things may be said which would not be uttered in cooler moments; there is a certain sense in which everybody charged with the administration of affairs has a right to expect candid treatment. The hon. gentlemen opposite are Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. They have a duty to fulfill as well as my hon. friend the leader of the Government and those who sit beside him. Their duty is to criticise faithfully the acts of the Government—a duty for which they are as much responsible to the people of this country, of course, not in a constitutional sense, but at all events in a moral sense, as if they were themselves responsible for the Government of the country. If, therefore, a leading member of the House, on that side, takes trouble to stir up animosity, and endeavours to excite the minds of the people by fulminations which the public interest does not require, for the purpose, and in the hope, of gaining a momentary advantage, it is as wrong as any malfeasance of office, no matter how great, would be on the part of my hon. friend at the head of the Government.

MR. TUPPER: Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed some strange scenes in this House, but I think, amongst the strangest of them all is the speech just delivered by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. We have occasionally had a good deal of liberty taken with the intelligence of the House and the intelligence of the country, and we have seen gentlemen exhibiting an amount of daring that, perhaps, might be called presumptuous; but I must confess that, during the period I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I have never listened to a speech addressed to this Parliament so characterized by all these features as the one to which I have just listened. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat—or rather, I should say, has just left his seat—has ventured to say that the party to which he belongs, the Government of which he is a member, have been characterized, eminently characterized, by an adhesion to principles. A venerable member of this House, on a former occasion, characterized the hon. gentleman opposite as an "organized hypocrisy," and I would ask whether the experience of the past four years has not carried the conviction home to the mind of every honourable and intelligent member of this House, that no two words in the English language would better characterize the gentleman than the language presented by Sir Francis Hincks in those two words. I say that, if an insult could be offered to the intelligence of this Parliament, it is for any gentleman to venture, in the light of the last four years' experience, upon the presumptuous, the unfounded, the daring statement, that those gentlemen have paid any attention to principle at all. I stand in the presence of an intelligent Parliament, and I ask where is the man who will at this hour—I will not ask them to establish the assertion that has been made; I will not ask them to attempt to justify that declaration, that they have been always characterized by an adhesion to principle—but I challenge them to stand up and show me one single principle professed by them, propounded as their platform, urged upon the people of this country as the ground upon which they asked confidence and support that they have not—not only not adhered to, but trampled under their feet. For years this Parliament rung with their denunciations against coalitions. Night after night, sitting on this side of the House, they declared that the combination of men holding opposite political opinions, who had been separated by party ties, was a corrupt combination, and that any party who would make that combination, deserved the condemnation of this country. What did they find? They found men on the other side of the House, when the late Parliament was in power, men who had been called Liberals, and men who had been called Conservatives, agreeing upon all the public questions of the day, upon the ground that the time had come when past political issues should be dead and buried, and that they would take their stand upon the new state of things which had been brought about by the union of the Provinces. The Members of the then Opposition maintained that that was a false ground to rest upon; that it was the duty of parties to fall back on the old party lines and old party designations. They rallied the Reform party to the cry that no combination could be formed between parties who had been severed in the past without its being a corrupt combination, and unworthy of the confidence of the country. But, the moment after there had been an appeal to the people; after the people, having had an experience of five years of the policy and the views and the sentiments of both the great parties of the country, had decided that the great Liberal-Conservative party was entitled to their continued confidence, what did they do? Why, Sir, when the opportunity of obtaining power by trampling that principle under foot was presented, you found them making one of the most corrupt alliances ever made on the floor of a Parliament, or in the face of a free people, in order that they might obtain power. And, having obtained power by alliance with men who, from year to year, had voted down every measure which they had proposed to Parliament, they made that corrupt combination in the face of this country, and showed how utterly worthless was that great cardinal principle which they had offered for the acceptance of the people of this country. They seem to have gloried in their shame; for, if they could find a man who, for long years, had been held up to public execration and contempt as the most corrupt man that could be found in the ranks of their opponents, they took him to their bosom and presented him as a fit Minister for the people of Canada. I ask the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, to point to any language used by any hon. gentleman on this side of the House reflecting on Mr. Cauchon. I never heard it. They have been brought face to face with their own denunciations, and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House would be failing in their duty if they did not bring them face to face with their own declarations, and show that, in order to maintain themselves in power, they made an alliance with the very men who had been the subject of their constant execration, and had been held up as the vilest of the vile; but to-day no man could be found who was too vile to become a member of this Government which had obtained power largely by means of raising a cry against coalition. Not only have they forfeited all claim to the confidence of the people by trampling their principles under foot, but they have gone out of their way to convince the people of this country how utterly unworthy they were of confidence when they were seeking power at their hands. Need I tell you, Sir, or need I tell this House, that another ground on which these hon. gentlemen sought the confidence of the country was the ground of economy. They denounced the late Government for their extravagance; they said a great deal more money had been expended than ought to have been. I admit that the expenditure of the late Government was a liberal expenditure, but we had the money to expend. With the lowest tariff ever in force in this country, as these gentlemen have shown, we had enough money to provide liberally for the public service, and also were enabled to reduce the taxes of the people by $2,000,000 per annum, and to roll up a surplus revenue of $16,000,000 during six years. What was the first demand there gentlemen made? The taxation which had given an abundance before was not enough for them. They themselves say that the amount of $23,316,000 was the largest expenditure we ever made. The estimates that they made and obtained for their first year from this Parliament were for $26,800,000. You will find that these gentlemen, who said that the taxation upon the people of this country would not give them money enough to meet their expenditures, and that they must levy an additional taxation of $3,000,000 upon the people, instead of retrenching their expenditure have increased it. You will find, then, that by a correct statement of the accounts—by a correct comparative statement of the accounts which I have made again and again publicly, and which has never been successfully assailed—you will find that their expenditures in three years were $5,000,000 more than the expenditure in the largest and most extravagant year of that Government which they had denounced for corruption; and yet the hon. gentleman, the hon. the Minister of Finance, is now levying $3,500,000 of additional taxation. Instead of having a surplus revenue to reduce the public debt, as the late Government did, they are rolling up deficits year after year. What is the reason that this Speech that is put into our hands has no reference to the balance of the public accounts for this year? What is the reason that this Finance Minister, who in 1874, when no deficit existed, declared in the face of the Speech of the Governor General that there was a deficit—that the expenditure had exceeded the income, does not inform us how the account now stands? What is the reason that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is put up to give a statement of the public accounts for the past year, which no gentleman has ever seen, and yet leaves the House in doubt as to the balance of the public accounts during the past year? I tell you why it is; it is because he has to admit, and will be compelled by the Public Accounts to admit, that they show a deficit this year of something like $1,500,000 added to the $2,000,000 of deficit that he met Parliament with last year. Yet this gentleman, expending $5,000,000 more in three years of the public money of this country, levying $3,500,000 more taxes per annum on the people of the country, rolling up deficits year after year to the extent of about $3,500,000, notwithstanding their enormous additional taxation, this is the gentleman who declares to this House that they have been characterized by an adhesion to principle. There is a principle that they have adhered to—the greatest extravagance and most wasteful expenditure of the public money; and not only wasteful, but corrupt, and levying that out of the additional taxation wrung from the people of Canada. Well, Sir, there was another great principle that this gentleman propounded. I ask you, Sir, who heard the declamation from this side of the House in reference to Colonel Gray, what their views were with reference to the independence of this Parliament—an important subject, a great principle, worthy to be propounded by statesmen who had at heart the honour and the character of the Parliament of which they were members. But, Sir, how has that declaration of principle been maintained? They maintained that Parliament, to be respected, must be independent; that every man in this House, to be respected, must be independent of the Crown. They maintained that the foulest wrong that the Government of the day, or the Crown, could do was to expend a single dollar of public money upon any member of the Parliament of the country. What is the result? While the hon. gentleman talks about adhesion to principle, does he not blush when he recollects—

Mr. CHARLTON: Not a bit.

Mr. TUPPER: If he is not incapable of blushing, I say he would blush when he reflects upon the monstrous fact, now patent, and rendered patent by this Government to the whole country, that from the day they came into power they were corrupting the members of this House by an illegal use of public money; that, from the hour they obtained power, so actively did they use their power for the corrupt and improper expenditure of the public money, in violation of the independence of Parliament, that before this House had ever met—before the present Parliament had ever met—they had rendered incapable of sitting here, except in violation of the law, a large number of members; that more than one Minister of the Crown had been by his own act rendered incapable of sitting in this House. Yet these are the gentlemen that talk about adhesion to principle. I say that was a principle that was worthy of enunciation by statesmen, and worthy of the acceptance of this Parliament. It was accepted by the passage of a law so stringent as we trusted it would render it impossible for any gentleman to accept the slightest amount of public money from any Government, under any circumstances, without voiding his seat. Yet, as I say, one gentleman walked out of this House admitted and proved to have been the recipient of $40,000 under a contract received from these hon. gentlemen while a member of this House; a contract negotiated by the hon. member himself in connection with the Public Works Department; a contract given, not only in violation of the law, but a contract given without public tender; a contract given over a lower tender, a lower offer, made for the performance of the same service. Yet the Hon. Postmaster General dares to stand up in the face of this intelligent Parliament, this House of Commons, and say to us that they have paid the slightest attention or regard to the principle that they have propounded. I challenge them again, as I did at the outset, to name to me one single public principle that for long years they fought and contended for on the floor of this House, that they have not shown that principle to be not held as a public principle should be held by public men, from the conviction of its importance, but a principle propounded to deceive the public in order to obtain positions that they have dishonoured after they had obtained them. Well, Sir, what about local government? Does the hon. member not remember that the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) with the hon. the Minister of Public Works, both, on many occasions, in Parliament and out of Parliament, maintained the gross impropriety of connection or alliance between a local government and the Government of this Dominion? Does the hon. gentleman forget that that was one of the greatest principles that they propounded? Sir, I shall show, before I sit down, that this Government has not only used, but it has abused the patronage of the Crown in forming an alliance, and in acting in conjunction with the Local Government; that there is no principle that they have shown a more utter, open and thorough disregard of since they have obtained power, than in reference to this very question. Then the hon. gentleman talks about electoral corruption. I venture to say, in the face of the history of Canada for four years, in the face of the records of the courts of this country for four years that are covered with the evidences of the enormous and gigantic electoral corruption of the hon. gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches, and around them, and their supporters,—I say, in the face of evidence the most strong and the most damning that ever stood on public record in reference to the career of a great party,—that their whole system has been one of gigantic corruption. Why, the Minister of Public Works on a recent occasion said: "Supposing that Mr. Cook did spend $30,000 of money, it was his own." What difference does that make? Does it matter that the money was his own? Is that what they mean by electoral purity? Does it matter whether he spent his own money or whether he spent the money subscribed by political friends for the purpose of aiding him in his election? When we find that the man branded by the decision of the courts and the most corrupt man in Canada—when we find men, with the strongest condemnation out of the mouths of the most illustrious judges of the land, marked with the brand of infamy put upon them, and incapable of exercising even the franchise, put forward as the leaders of this party, dare the hon. gentleman stand up and talk about electoral corruption in the face of so shameless a transaction as that? I refer now to Colonel Walker, who was proved in the courts to be one of the most corrupt men that had ever run an election in Canada. Yet these great political purists put him forward in a Reform convention last week as one of the leaders of this great party of electoral purity. Why, they have done all that men could do to show that if any man was especially notorious, if his position was one of gross and unqualified corruption, that man was the person that they proposed to canonise, and hold up to the admiration of the people of this country. So with the hon. the Minister of Militia; how does he come to hold his present position here to-day? Why, I hold in my hand a narrative which the Government cannot profess to be in ignorance of, because it is a public document, brought down and laid upon the table of this House. I will show from this document, and from the papers that relate to it, that if ever there was an act of gross and unqualified corruption, it was the act that deprived the hon. gentleman of his seat in this House; and that act was in connection with members of this Administration. What was the story? Mr. Vail has given it over his own signature. In his card he says that Mr. Jones and himself, and some six other gentlemen, entered into a partnership for the publication of a newspaper, a private, personal speculation. I will not stop to inquire whether their object was pecuniary or whether it was political, or whether it was both combined. They succeeded, it appears, in pretty effectually and thoroughly combining them both. What was done? It appears that they came to this House,—that these gentlemen, one of them a member of this House at that time, came to this Government, this pure Government, this Government that would not permit a dollar of money to be spent corruptly for the world, this Government that would not allow a member of Parliament to share in the division of the public funds,—they came to this Government for public aid and for public patronage. At that time the Hon. William Ross was the Minister of Militia in this House; and this document brought down by the Government, furnishing the information itself, shows that while that hon. gentleman was a member of this House, the Citizen Publishing Company in the remaining portion of the years 1873 and 1874 obtained $2,420. Well, Sir, it was not sufficient. These gentlemen having entered upon this speculation, must have assistance; and they knew that this Government believed most thoroughly in the doctrine of supporting their supporters. What followed? Why, Mr. William Ross was driven out of this Government by Mr. Alfred Jones, by the present Minister of Militia; was driven out to make room for his partner, to make room for Mr. Vail, one of the partners in the concern in which Mr. Jones was interested. I say it was done by Mr. Jones because I am speaking in the hearing of the members from Nova Scotia, supporting the Government, and they will not contradict what I say. When Mr. Alfred Jones' influence was sufficient to drive Mr. William Ross out of his office, and to bring in a gentleman who had never had a seat in this Parliament, and who had no claim to be placed there, over the heads of a number of gentlemen here of greater ability than his own in every sense of the word,—when that act was done, it was met by a remonstrance from several of the members from Nova Scotia against that act. Therefore, I say, it was his influence; the only right that Mr. Vail had, thus to be placed over the heads of so many gentlemen in this House, was the fact that he was the partner and the instrument of Mr. Alfred Jones at that time. Well, what happened? Why, this account, brought down here by the Government, which gives us testimony that is their own, will soon show what happened. Instead of getting a paltry $2,420, for the company of which Mr. Vail and Mr. Jones were partners, these accounts show that in the first year of Mr. Vail's presence in the Government, he had paid out to himself—paid out to the company of which he was a private partner in connection with Mr. Jones,—$10,174. But it appears that that was not sufficient to meet the necessities, or the desires, at all events, of this rapacious company; for the next year, Mr. Vail was able to put his hand in the Treasury, of which he was the sworn guardian, and take out of the public money, in violation of the law that he was bound as a member of this Parliament to preserve intact, not less than $14,198.68. In two years, over $24,000 of public money taken out of the Treasury of the country, in defiance of the law; taken out by one partner to be divided with another, who was also a member of this House. These gentlemen seem to think it is quite a sufficient answer that they did not make any money by the speculation. Mr. Jones stated on a public platform, if I remember right, that instead of making any money, it had cost him $2,000 out of his own pocket. He seemed to consider that that should absolve him from all question as to the propriety of the transaction. It is a fine distinction to draw. They got $26,000 of public money,—and, perhaps, the House would be curious to know—what that service cost, which required over $12,000 a year, under Mr. Vail's administration, for the paper in which Mr. Jones and he were partners—what that service cost under the previous Administration. The House will be, perhaps, a little surprised to learn that the average cost for the six years previous, for the same service, was $3,935 a year. The hon. the Minister of Militia says in answer to that, "Aye, but the change was made of the way offices in the meantime in Nova Scotia, into post offices." But I happen to have a little evidence upon that question, which will at once dispose of the fallacy that is raised there. I put the question across the floor of this House to the hon. the Postmaster-General as to the effect of changing these way offices. I mean the late Postmaster-General, the Hon. D. A. Macdonald. I have his answer here.

MR. TUPPER.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

MR. TUPPER.

After Recess

MR. TUPPER continued. He said: When the House rose I was speaking as to the character of the charges that have been made by Mr. Jones and Mr. Vail, as the Citizen Printing Company, in connection with the amount of public money which they have illegally been enabled to take from the Treasury of the Dominion Government, and I draw the attention of the House to the fact that, whereas, the amount paid per year for the six years for the public printing of the Post Office Department at Nova Scotia, and passing into the hands of that Company, was $3,935, or $23,610 for the six years. These gentlemen have succeeded in abstracting from the Treasury of Canada, for the same services, no less than $24,452 in two years, or an average of $12,226 per annum. I said before the recess that it had been argued in extenuation of these transactions, that the way offices in Nova Scotia had been made into post offices, and the expenses had consequently been increased by reason of this alteration. I happen to have an authority upon this point, which will not be disputed—that of the hon. late Postmaster-General, the Hon. D. A. Macdonald. It will be found in the 1087th page of the Hansard of 1875, and if gentlemen will take the trouble to look there, they will see that after this experiment had been fairly tried, Mr. Macdonald was enabled to state to the House that it had involved no increase of expense. He said, in reply to a question:

"The Department was making the way offices in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia post offices as fast as possible. This policy had been adopted during the last six months and did not involve any increased cost."

I think that will be regarded as tolerably strong evidence as to what the character of these charges were.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not see it.

MR. TUPPER: Well, Sir, if the hon. the Prime Minister is not satisfied with that, I will give him the evidence of the Postmaster General, who sits by his side. He declares that this service in Halifax cost 50 per cent. more than the same services cost in Ottawa. I hope that will satisfy the hon. the First Minister. On page 74 of the 1875 Hansard, this subject was under consideration, and the hon. the Postmaster General used this language to the House: "It costs fifty per cent. more to do the work in Halifax than in Ottawa; but, by a new arrangement, hereafter the printing will be done here by contract." He gave that as a reason. This shows that, in fact, this hon. gentleman and his hon. colleagues had been permitted to take out of the treasury of this country $24,000, when they were only entitled to $12,000.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I think the hon. gentleman and the House will not wish to have the matter misrepresented. I stated that the printing for Nova Scotia was costing forty or fifty per cent.—I do not remember which now—more than before, and I stated that we had changed it; that we found the people who had done it now were making more money than those who had done it before; and I stated here that the prices at which it was being done were cheaper than those charged under the Government of the right hon. gentleman. The system to which the hon. gentleman draws attention grew up in Confederation, and when in office I put a stop to it.

MR. TUPPER: He deprived those people of the printing, and gave it to some one who charged fifty per cent. more. I hope we shall have the hon. gentleman's reason, and that it will be a satisfactory reason. Of course, the moment it became patent that they were paying fifty per cent. more than they ought to, that they were receiving $24,000 for the service when they were only entitled to $12,000, he would have been unfaithful to his duty if he had not put a stop to it.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I must persist in being understood. I did not say that we got fifty per cent. more for the service than we were entitled to. I might have said that in the retail way in which work was done in the provinces it would cost more than fifty per cent. more, but that under the contract system, which the hon. gentleman complains of our having adopted, it would be done cheaper.

MR. TUPPER: Does the hon. gentleman see the force of my argument—that for a service which cost $3,935 they paid $12,000.

MR. HUNTINGTON: No, I do not.

MR. TUPPER: Then it would be difficult for the hon. gentleman to see the force of anything. There is the fact; I give the figures; I say that they paid $12,000 per annum for services done in Ottawa, which cost, on the average, less than $4,000 in Nova Scotia previously.

MR. HUNTINGTON: His misrepresentations are patent to every intelligent man, but I wish to repeat myself because the hon. gentleman speaks as though this increased amount was paid for the same services. In that, he is wrong. The service was changed. There were some six hundred way-offices turned into post offices, and this cost a considerable extra sum. As to the cost of printing, the prices paid by measurement were cheaper than those previously paid, but the volume work was dearer.

MR. TUPPER: I have introduced his authority not to show—

MR. HUNTINGTON: Mr. Speaker—

MR. TUPPER: I hope the hon. gentleman will not interrupt; if he wishes to address the House again he will have an opportunity, I have no doubt.

MR. HUNTINGTON: If the hon. gentleman misrepresents me I shall interrupt him.

MR. TUPPER: I shall show that he put statements into the mouth of his predecessor that were the very reverse of truth. Instead of saying that there would be any additional cost in the change from the way office keeper to postmasters, the hon. gentleman declared that, not only in relation to the salaries paid, but in relation to this policy of change generally, that it would not involve any additional cost. I read his words in Hansard. He said "This policy had been adopted during the last six months, and had not involved any increased cost." But I will give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Huntington) more; I will give him evidence from Halifax, from the very point where this work was done. I will prove, by testimony, to the hon. gentlemen of this House that these charges were not only extravagant but scandalous. I have shown that the cost was increased from $4,000 a year to over $12,000, and I have shown, on the authority of the late Postmaster General, that none of these extra costs were involved by change of service. If any further testimony is required upon the point, I shall show that the Citizen Publishing Company was brought before the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia, and that the matter was referred to a Committee. I have the report of that Committee, signed by six gentlemen, three of whom are strong supporters of the present Government, and one of them now a member of that Government—the hon. gentleman who represents Yarmouth—and whose independence and honesty can be vouched for—and friends of the company against which the charge is brought. This Committee say:—

“That said printing has been enjoyed almost wholly by the proprietors of the following papers, viz: The Acadian Recorder, the Morning Chronicle and the Citizen”

“Your Committee feel they have been unable, owing to the pernicious system by which the public printing has been performed to arrive at the exact amount paid by the Province for that purpose, but that the sum is very large, and has not varied to any great extent since 1867 in the prices charged.”

“Your Committee wish to call attention to the fact that, thus far in their researches, they find $26,582.50 has been paid out the last year for this service, yet the Financial Returns laid upon the table of the House, show only a cost of $6,416.”

“While referring to the inferior quality of the work done in some cases, we cannot but seriously invite the attention of the Legislature to the enormous prices charged for this service, as shown by the tabulated statement hereto annexed, which has been carefully compiled.”

This Committee of five gentlemen, three of whom were strong supporters of the present Local Government, and three of whom were closely in alliance with the Citizen Publishing Company proprietors, had witnesses brought before them and examined them on all the points. They brought forward the evidence of persons who could speak to the value of the work done, and they have appended the evidence to their report in order to show the enormous charges paid by the Government. And then they show that for 2,400 copies of public documents, the Citizen Publishing Co., Messrs. Jones, Vail & Co., for work, the mean estimated cost of which was $466, charge $1,100. I am in a position to give authentic testimony as to the charges made by the Citizen Publishing Company, and—

MR. TUPPER.

MR. SPEAKER said he thought the testimony would hardly be relevant.

MR. TUPPER: Having given the evidence of the late Postmaster General am I not in order, when that is controverted—am I not right in showing that by the unanimous report of the Committee of the Legislature, comprising the friends of Messrs. Jones and Vail—three of their friends—the evidence is correct. It is stated that $4,850 are charged for work which would only cost $1,825. If you say, Mr. Speaker, that this is irrelevant to this matter, I will at once close that branch of the subject. But I think I shall not close before I have been able to adduce evidence, clear and satisfactory evidence, to every gentleman on both sides of this House, that one of the most scandalous transactions for which this Government or any Government could be arraigned, is the fact that they permitted one of their followers in the Government to take out of the Treasury over $24,000 of public money in violation of the law and for a service which the present Postmaster General declares to have cost the country fifty per cent. more than it ought to cost and which I shall endeavour to show was more than fifty per cent. over what the cost of work would be in the city of Halifax, where that work was done. I am quite willing to leave that branch of the subject. But why is it that these gentlemen, who search the whole of the country for fit supporters, seem unwilling to bring a gentleman into the Government as a colleague unless he has been qualified for association with them by transactions of such a character as this. I have stated that the hon. Mr. Ross was driven out of this Government without any cause being assigned, in a more harsh and unfeeling manner than any gentleman was ever expelled from the Cabinet of this country. And for what? I have shown that a gentleman was brought into the Government who never had the honour of a seat in this House, who had not fought their battles, and was of no greater ability than the gentleman who was expelled. I have shown that by a raid on the treasury of Canada, $12,000 a year was taken to divide among this gentleman and his associates, of whom his colleague was one. I have said that one of the principles propounded by the present Prime Minister, and on which he takes his stand—one of those great principles which the hon. the Postmaster General says they have distinguished themselves by adhering to—was the entire separation between the general and local Governments. I hold in my hand an extract from a speech delivered by the hon. the First Minister in April, 1871, in the House of Commons. He said:—

“It has been frequently asserted that there is a close connection between this (Sir John's) Government and the Governments of the Local Legislatures. It is desirable that there should be no connexion whatever between the central and local Governments, and I feel it my duty to bring this principle before the House.”

This is one of the principles upon which the hon. gentleman takes his stand. The hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) also said:—

“The position of the Reform party in regard to the Federal Government is that they argued against alliance, as well as hostility. Their position is that the Local Government should be perfectly independent of the Central Government, and should neither be entangled by alliance or embarrassed by hostility. The independence of each of the Provinces is necessary for the working of the Federal system.”

I will show the House how those hon. gentlemen have carried that out in practice. I will accept the challenge of the hon. the Premier to point to a single case in which the General Government have ever used their power for the purpose of assisting in carrying elections. The present hon. Minister of Militia was floated to the surface on the great anti-Confederation wave that swept over Nova Scotia in 1867. Down to that time that hon. gentleman had been a hearty, zealous and enthusiastic supporter of the party with which I had the honour of being connected. In all the struggles with what were called the old Reformers of Nova Scotia, Mr. Young, Mr. Howe and others, there was no more zealous opponent of that party and those gentlemen than the present hon. Minister of Militia; and all the qualification for admission into the Reform party he can claim is that on the great question of the union of these Provinces, he abandoned the party with which he had always been associated to oppose Union and to which he had given a most determined and unflinching opposition. Before I resume my seat I shall probably be able to show that the same animus that induced the hon. gentleman to give his hostility to Confederation still exists in his bosom, and at no distant day found expression in no measured terms. I assumed a very considerable responsibility in carrying the question of the Provinces so far as Nova Scotia was concerned. The hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake), in this House, and the hon. the Minister of the Interior, out of the House, and the Globe, assailed me in bitter, and I might almost say vindictive, terms, for the mode by which I gave my assistance to that great party-combination in Canada, which was formed for the purpose of carrying the union of the Provinces. The great charge they brought against me was, that I had carried that measure without a reference to the people at the polls. The hon. the Minister of the Interior—in the collection of ministerial speeches made during last Summer, and for publishing them in their present form he tendered him and the hon. gentlemen opposite his hearty thanks, because the volume would be exceedingly convenient in dealing with public questions. Under the heading of “Betrayal of Nova Scotia,” the hon. gentleman holds me up to public execration for having carried the union of the Province of Nova Scotia with the other Provinces without a reference to the people at the polls. The hon. gentleman knows, or ought to know, that the measure was carried in Nova Scotia, after it had been legitimately placed before the country and the Legislature. The hon. gentleman should know that as long ago as 1860, when I was out of power, I mooted the question of union. When called upon to open the Mechanics' Institute at St. John, N. B., I brought forward the question of a Federal Union of the Provinces of British North America, and urged that a union of the whole people of this country, was the great object at which they should aim. When out of power, I committed myself, in the fullest and most unreserved manner, to the policy of a Federal Union of the British North American Provinces. Mr. Howe, who was the leader of the Nova Scotian Government, perceiving this was a subject deserving attention, submitted at a later period to the House of Assembly, a resolution in favour of the union of the Provinces, which I seconded, and it passed unanimously. Subsequently, I was brought into power. Having pledged myself, when in Opposition, to use the power of the Government, if confided to me, for the accomplishment of that great object, I not only delivered that lecture in New Brunswick, but I repeated it by invitation in many parts of Nova Scotia, and at Halifax, so that my advocacy of the question—the question of the union of the Provinces was well known. A combination of the two great parties in the Provinces of Old Canada, Ontario and Quebec, took place upon that basis. Their representatives attended a conference that had been arranged with a view to the union of the Maritime Provinces; I having stated, when I moved the motion, that I hoped it would be only a step towards the union of the whole Provinces. Those representatives, including Hon. George Brown, Sir John A. Macdonald, and Sir George Cartier, came down to Prince Edward Island, where the first meeting was held, and requested permission to put the broader question before us. They did so, it received our approval, and we adjourned our conference with regard to the union of the Maritime Provinces. We went to Halifax and placed our views before the people at a great public meeting, at which the Lieutenant-Governor and all the leading men of the city were present. The subject was discussed at various places and at various times, and no evidence was given of the deep-seated hostility that already was excited in reference to that question. At Quebec the terms were arranged, and when the matter came before the Legislature I had the authority of a two-thirds vote of the House of Assembly and the Legislative Council authorising me to join with those gentlemen in bringing about a union of the Provinces. The constitutionality of that proceeding was challenged, and I met the question. It was fought out fairly and squarely by the parties sent to England to oppose me. And I should like to call the attention of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond), who now finds it convenient to use his pen, and the great power of the press with which he is connected gives him for the purpose of damaging my position on this question by stating the fact that at that hour I was acting in conjunction with Hon. George Brown, and at his instance. He came down to Nova Scotia, and did me the honour of being my guest for a week, for the purpose of assisting me to carry out union, not by reference to the people at the polls, but by reference to the existing Legislature.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. DYMOND: I may say that I have no knowledge of those facts; I was not in Canada at the time, and I know nothing about them.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman knows them now, and I hope they will make an impression on his mind. I refer him to the file of the Globe for 1865, by which he will find that my efforts and action were enthusiastically endorsed by the Globe, and which was regarded as settling once and for ever the constitutionality of the course I adopted. I give that to the hon. gentleman as a reason, which, if there were no other, should prevent that great organ of public opinion from assailing me in reference to that question. But let me tell the hon. the Minister of the Interior that every blow he strikes at me, every denunciation he utters to the people of Ontario against me for having assisted in the great work of union, in which the Province of Ontario, from its position, benefitted in every possible way, recoils on the hon. the First Minister. I may quote the speech of the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) who, on a public platform affirmed that the greatest boon ever achieved by Canada was the union of the British Provinces; and of all the Provinces, Ontario had most reason to be proud and satisfied. The resolution that two-thirds of the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia voted down, asking that the question be referred to the people at the polls, was only a copy of the resolution moved in the Legislature of Canada, and voted down by the hon. the First Minister, as one not required and not constitutional. I, therefore, wish to remind the hon. gentleman that every intelligent man in Ontario will feel that the hon. member is using a boomerang which comes back and strikes himself and his friends. It was upon the question of the Union of the Provinces that the hon. the Minister of Militia deserted myself and the party with which I was connected, and that is his sole title to the claim to be a Reformer. Nevertheless, the very man who did his little best to prevent that great measure being carried is received with open arms by a First Minister, who justly considers it one of his proudest boasts to have had a humble share as a member of the Parliament of Canada in bringing about the accomplishment of that great result. I need not say that, under the hostility that was excited, under the base betrayal of myself by the parties to whom I had most right to look for support in Ontario and elsewhere, in the press and otherwise, a great anti-union wave swept over Nova Scotia, and the hon. the Minister of Militia floated to the surface. We went back, after five years, after experience had exposed the fallacies by which that great question had been met. What was the result? It was that the hon. member for Halifax was defeated, and that I had the proud triumph of coming back to this Parliament, and being able to say on the floor of this House that not a single man had been returned from Nova Scotia opposed to the Government of which I was a member, and only one who was in a position to be called an Independent member. I need not go through the various steps that led to the downfall of the Dominion Government in 1873. In that year the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) was called upon to form an Administration. What then? As every one knows, the hon. gentleman made a midnight surprise and attack upon the constituencies of Canada. I will not use the words of Mr. Disraeli in relation to a somewhat similar act done by Mr. Gladstone, when he said it was an act of "black treachery!" I will not use such strong language, but say it was a midnight surprise, because I wish to be moderate in the expressions I use in relation to this and other matters, and the strength of the position will enable us to exercise that moderation. It was a midnight surprise. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie), at a recent public demonstration in Ontario, asked the question if anybody supposed he was idiot enough to attempt to carry on the Government with the Parliament elected in 1872. I think what has taken place between 1874 and the present time will satisfy every person that the hon. gentleman exercised a wise discretion in going to the country at that time. It was, however, a surprise, not to me, not to the Conservative party in the country alone, but it was a bitter surprise, not only to the gentlemen who sit behind him, but to his own colleagues. When I tell this House that the first information one of the Cabinet Ministers had that there was a dissolution and that he was to go back to his constituents, was from your humble servant. That the hon. Premier had not entrusted to his own colleagues the fact that he intended to dissolve Parliament, I think I am warranted in using strong language. The hon. the Premier, when called upon to form an Administration, sent half a dozen gentlemen to their constituencies for re-election, and then, before they took their seats, dissolved the Parliament to which they were elected. That it was a surprise to his friends was not more evident than that it was a venture to which he had not made up his mind before the Ministers were re-elected. When I told one of those gentlemen, who was returning from an election campaign in which he had been able to struggle into his seat, that the House was dissolved, he laughed at me. "It is impossible," he said, "do you think that Mr. Mackenzie would have sent me to a remote part of Nova Scotia to run an election, and dissolve the House before I took my seat? you must jest!" He found when he got to Halifax that the jest was a pretty serious one, and that all those constituencies were to be put to the trouble of another election. But the hon. gentleman took credit to himself that if he did have an election he was perfectly consistent in having it simultaneously. I deny it. I say there was another principle which he had violated most unfairly and unjustly without the slightest warrant whatever, and for the purpose of increasing his party triumph. What did he do? He said, "In order to be perfectly consistent, though we are bound by no law, (we have found that, is true), we ordered all the elections in the Dominion should be held on one day except in British Columbia and Cape Breton, Prince Edward Island and Algoma." It was not, however, Cape Breton to which he applied it, but to Nova Scotia, knowing we had carried Nova Scotia from end to end when in power. He thought he would try the same course. He said on a recent occasion, "I have got a majority in Ontario, and the smaller Provinces will go with those who have the majority," or something like it. That was the principle the hon. gentleman brought into play. He violated that principle in regard to the whole Province of Nova Scotia, although a delay of one day would have enabled him to reach the most remote part of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman violated his principles, and held over the elections for the whole Province until the leader of his party, the present hon. Minister of Militia, was able to say to the people of Nova Scotia, "You observe that the elections have been carried by the Government in the greater portion of the country, and if every Nova Scotian member is elected in opposition, they will be out of power for five years, because the Government will have a large majority in spite of anything they can do." That was the advantage it gave them. What use did he make of it? He made the most corrupt use of it possible to conceive. Armed with authority, known to be the bosom friend of the hon. the Prime Minister, known to be the leader of the party in Nova Scotia, it enabled him to accomplish the most gigantic act of corruption ever performed in Canada. You talk about electoral corruption, about a law to prevent a voter being bribed by a candidate; that hon. gentleman, by a majority of 93, had been swept aside and left out in the cold. And what did he do? He turned a majority of 98, by the corrupt exercise of the power of the Crown, by corrupt bargains that he made, and bargains that have been fulfilled and carried out by the hon. the First Minister, as I will show, into a majority of 2,147. The House will remember that hon. gentlemen opposite have amended (?) the Election Law, which was enacted. They found on the Statute-book an efficient law to prevent bribery and corruption, and it was amended so as to enable them by withholding a writ, in defiance of law, to allow certain members to retain their seats until the House was about to meet. Although they knew the hon. gentleman could not take his seat in the House, and that one of his colleagues by a report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections had no seat; although they knew those two hon. gentlemen sat in the House and voted; though "their seats were void as if they were dead" in the words of the law, they brought into the House an amendment to the Statute which renders it open to any hon. gentleman to bribe as extensively as he likes, provided it is for the last Session. What is the effect? They brought in this amendment—that it is not possible for the court to try an election case during the sitting of the House; and withheld the writs for Halifax and Digby until no proceedings could be taken before their seats were again vacant by dissolution. That ought to place me in the position of being able to say, but I will bow with all respect to the ruling of Mr.

MR. TUPPER.

Speaker, if I cannot say, what I ought to be able to say, that the most scandalous bribery and corruption was used personally in the election which has just taken place. I am now dealing with the gigantic corruption practiced by the hon. gentleman, which enabled him to turn a minority of 98 into a majority of 2,147. I will show how the hon. the First Minister redeemed the pledges made, and carried out the corrupt bargains which enabled the present hon. Minister of Militia to make that enormous change in his position to the electors who had already rejected him, and then the House will see whether I have answered the challenge of the hon. the First Minister to show a case in which the power of the Crown was ever exercised to help a struggling candidate. What did he do? This hon. gentleman, who had proclaimed to the world that the policy of himself and his party was to punish the men who had carried the Union, this gentleman who had attacked and assailed Mr. P. C. Hill, again and again, as having bartered away the rights of his country in aiding and assisting the carrying of the Union induced him to desert his party. He is known to be the most influential gentleman in the whole county of Halifax. He supported myself and the policy with which I was connected; and he was the gentleman who was invited to take the office of Provincial Secretary, which I had rendered vacant by my resignation. He was placed at the head of the Union party of Nova Scotia, but he was taken out of the hands of the Union party, by the action of the hon. member for Halifax, at the sacrifice of all the principles which he had professed. What was the nature of the bargain which was then made? When I tell you that Mr. Ross had to resign and Mr. Vail took his place, and Mr. Hill took Mr. Vail's place as the leader of the party with which the hon. member for Halifax is connected, in the Province of Nova Scotia, you will see how the power of the Crown was used to make a vacancy and carry out the bargain by which Mr. Hill, and a thousand men at his back, whom he was able to influence were transferred from the Union ranks, and went over and supported the hon. member for Halifax. If that does not satisfy the hon. the Prime Minister, I will give him—if he asks me for them privately—the names of three other leading men, independent supporters of the policy and the party with which I was connected—who went over at the same time to the enemy, changing this minority of 98 into a majority of 2,147, and who have since received at the hands of the First Minister of the Crown three of the highest positions in this country. I do not intend to name these gentlemen or the offices which they received, but I hold myself responsible to satisfy the First Minister that I am warranted in making this statement, and if I am wrong he may correct me before the House.

MR. JONES (Halifax): Name them.

MR. TUPPER: There are reasons why I should not do so.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Name.

MR. TUPPER: I dare say the hon. member would like to have every person, however high the position he may hold to-day, occupy the same position which he occupies in the esteem of this country.

MR. MACKENZIE: I have only to say that I beg the hon. gentleman to exercise no reserve on my account.

MR. TUPPER: I am not exercising any reserve on the account of the First Minister. I do not think I should feel so disposed to spare him if I had not higher and more important reasons for not making the statement.

MR. JONES: The hon. gentleman has referred to Nova Scotia gentlemen, as having been bribed to leave their own party by the present Government through myself, and I claim that having mentioned that here, he is bound to give the names here.

MR. TUPPER: Now, I think I have shown a tolerably close alliance between the Federal Government and the Local Government; but I will go further, and I will say that under the advice of the hon. gentleman, and under the advice of Mr. Vail, an office was created in Nova Scotia. A gentleman was appointed to fill it, but suddenly he was tumbled out of, turned out of, and dismissed, from office—and for what purpose? Why, the exigencies of the Government of Nova Scotia came again to the fore. Mr. Weeks was offered a seat in the Local Government, and a vacancy was needed to carry out the designs of these gentlemen. A seat was wanted for him as Attorney-General, and a vacant seat was purchased by appointing the member for Guysboro' to the office created by the Government of the Dominion. This was rendered vacant by the expulsion from that position of the gentleman whom they themselves had appointed to it, and a member of the Local Legislature was placed in it, and even when the local Attorney-General went to run the election in that county, we found that again the power of the Crown had been exercised. He could not be elected, and we found the leader of the Opposition in that county suddenly in the ranks of the hon. gentleman opposite, in return for a high office conferred upon him by the Dominion Government. And I say that if the hon. gentleman wants evidence, not only of an alliance with the Local Government of the clearest and most unqualified, and also of the most corrupt character, the records of the Province of Nova Scotia and their dealings with this Government, furnish the most abundant and undoubted evidence of it. Well, Sir, I would like to ask the hon. the First Minister, whether he considers, with the knowledge before him, that the seats for Digby and Halifax must be vacated—of the fact of these gentlemen having received an immense amount of public money,—I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he thinks it was a just or correct thing for a Government professing such exalted purity and such an exalted standard of public morality, to keep a Minister in that position with the evidence before him furnished by a Committee on which half-a-dozen members of the Government were to be found, that his seat was void. Yet they kept that gentleman and one of his colleagues in the Cabinet until the issue of the writ followed so closely upon the meeting of Parliament as to make it impossible to apply the law in relation to those elections, in addition to the opportunity thus afforded for the use of illegitimate means in carrying the election. There is one other reason which I can suppose influenced the hon. gentleman, and that was this: they found it convenient to issue the writ contemporaneously with the time when the citizens of Halifax, when every man, woman and child in Halifax who had any intelligence, were eagerly and anxiously struggling to secure the advantage to Halifax of being the winter freight port, and the merchants were negotiating with this Government for it, so that if the hon. gentleman wants evidence of the power of the Crown having been used in this regard, I think that he will find it in his own statements as a candidate on the hustings, with relation to this vital question that every person of all parties felt the deepest interest in.

Mr. TUPPER.

MR. MILLS: What about the case of the hon. member for Northumberland.

MR. TUPPER: I do not know what the case of the hon. member for Northumberland has to do with it.

MR. MITCHELL: Allow me to answer, and I will soon tell the hon. gentleman what it had to do with it. My public card informs the country of the reason why the member for Northumberland delayed his resignation. It was because he felt it to be the duty of the First Minister, with forty seats affected and with the names of forty gentlemen so assailed in this House, to have purified the House, and in accordance with his principles, gone to the country. This was the only reason why I delayed my resignation so long. I delayed it until I saw there was no hope for it; and there is a gentleman in this House, a leading member, who supports the hon. the leader of the Government who knows that my conviction as late as last July was that the House would be dissolved, and my conviction was so strong that I was prepared to stake something more than an opinion on it, and I am looking at that gentleman now.

MR. TUPPER: I consider the allusion of the hon. the Minister of the Interior to the case of the hon. member for Northumberland unfortunate for himself, for the case of the hon. member for Northumberland forms a bright contrast with the case to which I have referred. Only a technical difficulty arose, and the hon. gentleman, finding this technical difficulty, naturally withheld his resignation until he found that the hon. the First Minister was not going to discharge his duty to the House and the country by dissolving it and making an appeal to the people. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mitchell) then threw himself into the hands of his constituents, and with what result? Why, all the hon. gentleman had to show was his record of straightforward and uncompromising hostility to the hon. gentlemen opposite to be sent back here by acclamation by one of the finest counties to be found in the whole Province of New Brunswick. When the hon. the Premier was seeking to help the cause of his struggling candidates, when his Minister of Militia was floundering in the deep, when he was despatching all the telegrams he could send, and exercising all the official interference which he could use in that election for the purpose of bolstering up his cause, when he (Mr. Jones) was struggling to keep the surging waters from submerging him altogether, where was the hon. member for Northumberland? Why, he was floating on the crest of a triumphant popular wave that sends him here to vindicate the interests of the country in this House. All the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mitchell) had to do was to place himself in the hands of his electors, and he had nothing to fear. What more? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones), in his card of thanks to the electors, says that his election was a Free-trade triumph, and this, Sir, in a constituency where in 1874 he had a majority of 2,147, a strictly party majority.

MR. JONES: Oh!

MR. TUPPER: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he did not expect to have that majority?

MR. JONES: I might have thought I would be likely to have more.

MR. TUPPER: Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that after the coalition with Mr. Hill, and with the additional support obtained from the leaders of the Conservative party there, through the means to which I have referred, and the use of the power of the Crown in his favour, that majority was one on which he could not rely, and that he did not expect to have it at this election? I pause for a reply.

MR. JONES: Mr. Hill was not with me.

MR. TUPPER: Mr. Hill was the ally of this Government, and can the hon. gentlemen opposite say that there was no alliance when the spectacle was there presented of having their Minister's battle fought all over the country by the Premier of Nova Scotia.

MR. JONES: But in 1874?

MR. TUPPER: In 1874, Mr. Hill was with the hon. gentleman, and in 1874, Mr. Hill's adhesion to the cause of hon. gentlemen opposite, and his withdrawal from the Conservative party in connection with other parties, changed the majority of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones). That Hill-Jones alliance gave him the majority of 2,147. But if this was not the case—if Mr. Hill joined the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite subsequently, then the case became a great deal stronger, because the hon. gentleman ought then to have had a much larger majority with Mr. Hill's support than he otherwise would have had. The hon. gentleman seems to question his confidence in being entitled to that majority. I will give the House evidence on that point which he will scarcely be able to controvert. I hold in my hand an article which was published in the Acadian Recorder, one of the most violent and determined portions of the press supporting the hon. gentleman, and this shows what was thought when this statement was made on January 18, 1878. It says that the battle was fought by the same party that fought the battle of 1874, and that the hon. gentleman could confidently expect the same majority now as then. It states:—

“In 1874, when, as we pointed out last evening, the same gang as are now fooling

Mr. M. H. Richey were engaged in playing off Mr. Robb, when Drs. Parker and Almond and Hon. James Macdowall and the others were doing all in their power to secure Mr. Robb's election, the vote in this county stood, totals, Jones 2,979, Robb 834. We see no reason why, if the citizens of Halifax are true to their own interests, Mr. Richey should receive a larger vote than Mr. Robb. The latter had greater claims to the support of a large number of the electors than has Mr. Richey. We think there are very few of those who voted for Mr. Jones in 1874, but will do so now; and it is quite certain that many who were led away by strong partizan sentiment in 1874 to oppose Mr. Jones, will now in the interests of Halifax give him their support."

There was the statement which was made by one of the strongest supporters in the press of the hon. gentleman, and it declares that he had a right to expect that the same parties which sustained him in 1874 would sustain him then, with this addition, that a large number of gentlemen, seeing the interests of Halifax trembling in the balance, as was the case at that moment, would not work against a Minister of the Government with whom they were negotiating. But I happen to have evidence that the hon. gentleman has the greatest respect for, and which will settle this question and satisfy the House that he expected, or that if he did not expect, he ought to have expected the same majority which he had in 1874. I will give the hon. gentleman the evidence of his own statements. I undertook to say on the floor of this House, a year ago, that a great change had taken place in the city and county of Halifax, and in the public sentiment of the country; I ventured to say that on that occasion, because of what had taken place, when a Senatorship fell vacant. Every man in Nova Scotia, as well as every gentleman in this House, agreed that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Power) was entitled to it, and this position was offered to that hon. gentleman and was accepted by him, but it was abandoned because, when these gentlemen called a meeting of their supporters for the purpose of selecting a successor to run the election, they found that it would not be well to go into such an election at all. Now, I will give the answer which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) ventured to give me in this House on that point, and I will convince him that if he did not think that his majority of 1874 was a strictly party majority, he thought it was a majority on which his party could rely now, or at all events he ought to have thought so, because he said so. The hon. gentleman then said:—

MR. TUPPER.

"The hon. gentleman, in referring to the condition of the public mind, said that the government had not ventured to open the constituency of Halifax, because they were afraid that an Opposition member might be returned. There was no one more anxious than himself, that his colleague, who had so long and worthily represented the county, should have taken that position, if he had thought it consistent with his own feelings. If, however, the hon. gentleman had done so, and there had been an election he would have been returned by as large a majority as he (Mr. Jones) had at the last election."

There, Sir, is his own declaration; that is, that his majority of 1874, was, last election, as I contended it was, secured with the same condition of parties that existed to-day, but with this difference—that the people, the intelligent electors of that fine county and city, had had the opportunity of witnessing the record of this Administration and its mal-administration of affairs for four years, and with that difference the parties ostensibly stood in the same position now as then. And I will invite the attention of the First Minister to the verdict he has obtained—a verdict obtained, as I have shown, by an alliance formed between the hon. gentleman and the strongest men who formerly were opposed to him, in violation of all the principles he had professed and which were professed by the Government of which he is a member. No one can look at that majority of 2,147 cut down to a miserable majority of 228 votes, without seeing that without the power of the Crown being exercised, as it was exercised, in this instance, and the withholding of the writ down to the last moment, so as to make this question, then trembling in the balance, valuable for the Government—instead of having a small majority of 228, in place of a majority of over 2,000, the hon. gentleman would have been in a miserable minority. And

I have no hesitation in saying, as I said to this House a year ago, that an overwhelming change had taken place in the county of Halifax. I also say that those who live to see a general election will find everything reversed, with the conviction in the public mind that these men will not be able to exercise the power of the Crown for or against anybody for many months. I have no hesitation in saying that, under these circumstances, when the election takes place, the city and county of Halifax will prove to be one of the surest constituencies that the great Liberal Conservative party can rely upon; and I will leave my reputation as a prophet dependent on the realization of that prophecy. I have shown that all the qualifications which the hon. gentleman possesses, and all the reasons that could entitle him to the support and the confidence of this Government, is that he had shown himself to be a high-priest in corruption; and that the First Minister concluded that he had given such evidences of his qualifications to enter that great party to uphold the standard of public morality, and that he was so distinguished a corruptionist, that he must actually be canonized, and therefore he brought him (Mr. Jones) into the Administration. Were there no reasons, no public reasons, why he should not be a member of this Government. I think there were; and I think that although we differ upon the question of coalitions—for my right hon. friend the member for Kingston holds now, as always, that men who honestly agree on the great public questions of the day might differ on other questions, and that whatever their past record had been they may unite in forming an Administration to carry on the public affairs of the country,—there is one ground upon which we agree. The position of my right hon. friend, which I have mentioned, has been controverted by the hon. gentlemen opposite; they have held that no person but a life-long Reformer should enter the Government; but, nevertheless, the Minister of Militia, who exhibited hostility to the Union in 1867, after a life spent in opposing the parties with which these hon. gentlemen had been identified, was taken into the Cabinet. But, however we may differ on the question of coalition from that point of view, there is one ground upon which we all agree or ought to, and that is—that no more demoralising public spectacle can be exhibited in this country than the formation of an Administration or a combination of men who, on important leading public questions, are in open and avowed antagonism. We are all agreed that whatever views we may hold on theories respecting coalitions, we are agreed that there can be nothing more monstrous, and nothing more corrupt, and nothing more disgraceful than that of a combination of men who take office for the sake of office, and who, for the sake of office, sink their differences upon leading and important public questions, doing all this for the sake of combining together and sharing office and power. I will say nothing about the emoluments.

MR. MILLS: Hear, hear.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman says, "hear, hear;" but I will put the views of that hon. gentleman side by side with those of the hon. gentleman, the Minister of Militia, and I will show him whether they can sit in the same Cabinet together without one or the other giving up their views or sentiments as contained in the public records of Parliament, on the most important and leading questions. I refer now to the great sugar-refining interest, a question that the hon. gentleman says, "hear, hear," to. I refer to a question respecting which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) stated one year ago in this House that it was a vital one; that the Government were failing in their duty, that it was a question, not merely of a few persons engaged in sugar-refining, but of a West India trade worth three or four millions per annum to this country. He argued that this question was one of not only gigantic importance, but one of vital importance to the constituency he has the honour to represent in this House. What did the hon. gentleman say upon that subject in 1876 on the floor of this House. He then spoke as follows:—

"He thought that they had abundant proof that whereas in this case on the raw material 50 per cent. duty was paid, only 40 per cent. was paid on the refined article, affording to foreigners a very considerable advantage. The Government would be justified in asking the House to authorize them to impose on refined sugar a duty equal to the bounty granted their refiners by foreign governments. He was willing that we should trade with the United States on fair terms, but if by a bounty system they tried to control our market and utterly ruin our interests it was the duty of the Administration to levy such duties as to place Canadian on an equal footing with foreign manufacturers. He gathered from the observations of his hon. friend that the abolition of the sugar duties had had the effect on the sugar refinery at Montreal which he had anticipated, and the result had been an advance of $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound on the sugar manufactured in this refinery. This was natural and was to have been expected. The qualities of the sugar which had been manufactured in Montreal were excellent; and it was to be remembered that inexperienced people could with ease be led to believe that sugar was of high, when it was in reality of a very inferior, quality."

He said again:—

"If the refinery in Montreal could have been worked under the present system, no application would have been made; but it had been sufficiently demonstrated that it was impossible to keep open refineries in the face of the bounty allowed by the United States. It was no use tinkering with the tariff, but the Government should be prepared to deal with the American system which was annihilating our trade, when $2.50 duty per 100 pounds was paid, and a drawback of $3.60 was allowed, which was equal to half a cent per pound. It was plain to be seen that no tariff would enable a refinery to exist in Canada unless a duty was imposed equal to the bounty; it would be no use trying to do anything."

So much for the hon. gentleman's views in 1876. I will now show that these views were not changed in 1877, when the hon. gentleman again reiterated his sentiments in the strongest terms on this subject, and declared that a West India trade of three or four millions, in which his own constituents were vitally interested, hung in the balance. We will now see what the views of his colleague, the hon. the Minister of the Interior, was on that question. They were as follows:—

"He was unable to perceive that any drawback was given in the States, and he would quote figures from the Trade and Navigation Returns which proved that this was the case. No refinery in the Dominion could be closed owing to the policy pursued by the American Government. Supposing the American refiner obtained 55 cents of drawback per 100 lbs, this put \$2.50 into the public treasury. What system must be followed in order to secure instead of 70 lbs. or 88 lbs. of the highest quality— $13\frac{1}{2}$ lbs. of inferior variety and $11\frac{1}{2}$ lbs. of syrup from 100 lbs. of the unrefined article? and if an inferior article was used, a larger quantity must be produced to obtain the same result. This was sufficient to show that the statement with reference to the bounty afforded under that system was preposterous."

And the hon. the Minister of Finance told him it would take $600,000 a year out of the treasury of Canada for the purpose of building up and supporting a refinery in this country, so that on a question of the greatest import to the whole country—a question, regarding which, according to the hon. gentleman, every person in this country was to suffer by having the price of sugar increased, after the refineries had been crushed by the policy of this Administration—he was at variance with the Government. The hon. gentleman, when an Independent member of this House, maintained that the interests of his constituents were intimately and largely connected with this subject; and that the whole of the West India trade of this country was going to be sacrificed unless the hon. gentlemen opposite could be induced to change their policy. But suddenly—at the very time when he was putting forward to the electors of Halifax, as one of the reasons why they should elect him, the fact that he was one of the Independent members of the House—for as an Independent member of the House he was fighting against the Government on that question at that moment—the hon. gentleman has office presented to him, and having office presented to him he forgets his declarations on the floor of this House; he forgets his antagonism with the Government on this important public question; he forgets the interest of his own constituents; he accepts the shilling and enlists to serve under the banner of the Government whom he himself declared was, on a vital and important public question, utterly in antagonism with the interests of this country, and especially with the interest of his own constituents. I say that was a reason why the hon.

MR. TUPPER.

gentleman should not be offered a portfolio, and why it could not be accepted by him if offered, because one of two things was certain, either the Government must change its policy and accept that of the hon. gentleman, or he must abandon the battle he has been fighting in the interests of his country and of his constituents. I say, that it was impossible, under these circumstances, for the hon. gentleman to accept office. It is impossible for gentlemen under these circumstances of open and avowed antagonism to the Administration of the day upon an important question—a question which is admitted to be vital—it is impossible for this gentleman to go into the same Administration without his country feeling that both the Government on the one side and the gentleman who joins them on the other is in accord in this: that office, power and place are to be obtained at any price. Is it of little consequence if the demoralizing spectacle is presented to the country of an abandonment of principle for the sake of office and for the sake of power? But, Sir, there is another reason why the hon. gentleman should not have accepted office. He says it was a Free-trade triumph. A Free-trade triumph! Why, Sir, I hold in my hand a manifesto of the hon. gentleman's opinion published during this very contest—a letter addressed by himself to Sir Francis Hincks—in which he argues not only the question of protection to sugar, but, incidentally, in connection with that, the whole question of Protection in the most able and convincing manner. And that was given to the public before the portfolio was offered to the hon. gentleman as the creed to which he had subscribed, and the grounds on which he asked for public confidence. What does he say? He publishes the letter as evidence of his sentiments, he says, on this important protection question. I will read this, and the hon. gentleman opposite may say "hear, hear," as he recognizes passage by passage maintaining in the clearest and ablest manner the doctrine which this side of the House hold as essential to the advancement of the country at large.

"You may, perhaps, remember that during the last Session of Parliament we had several conversations on the subject of the tariff, which was in some measure before Parliament, when the Bill to abolish the duties on tea and coffee was presented to the House. At that time I ventured to draw your attention to the inequalities that existed with respect to levying the duties on raw and refined sugar; and as a business man taking a lively interest in all that relates to the financial prosperity of the country, with which financial interests are so naturally identified, and having given a good deal of thought to some branches of the subject, and having, I may add very considerable experience in these branches, to which I purpose referring, I take the liberty very respectfully of submitting my views."

Are these his views now? He published them as his views when he asked the electors of Halifax to elect him as a member.

MR. JONES: Yes, Sir; they are my views.

MR. TUPPER: Then the hon. gentleman must ask his colleagues to change their views, and the position they hold towards the country will not be a very edifying spectacle.

"I take the liberty very respectfully of submitting my views, with the hope that they may be found not only in accordance with your own, but also as likely, by a satisfactory settlement of a difficult question, to promote the best interests of the country at large. I may commence by saying that when the present sugar tariff was introduced by Sir John Rose in 1868"—

I am reading the letter not as it was written exactly, but as it was given by him to the press, or, at least, as it was published in the press.

"the basis aimed at was a compromise between all parties without being very satisfactory to either. Since that time, however, very and important changes have taken place, arising not only out of the great improvements in the process of refining, but also with respect to the more liberal excise concessions which have been made by our American neighbours with the object no doubt of directing a large portion of our trade into their hands, and which, in my opinion, calls for immediate action in our own Parliament on the subject."

But he does not call so loudly as to prevent the hon. gentleman's mouth being closed by a portfolio.

"I, of course, should not presume to offer any opinion as to the amount of duty that should be levied on this sweet; but bearing in mind that the article cannot be produced at home, and that it enters very largely into daily use in every household in the Dominion, coupled with the fact that both the Imperial and the American Governments have recently, by large reductions in duty, been cheapening this article of prime necessity to the consumer. It appears to me that it is desirable to make Canada a cheap country to live in, and thus attract immigration to our shores. It must follow that it would be wise policy on the part of the Government to do all they could by judicious legislation to place such an article of daily consumption as much as possible within the reach of the masses, assured as they might all be, that any temporary reduction would very soon be more than made up by the increased consumption that would result from it. I said at the beginning that the present duty was a compromise between all parties, and not altogether satisfactory to either. The dissatisfaction arose chiefly on the specific duty which being based on classification is not and cannot always be fairly applied. In the course of my experience I have known several instances where what was considered under No. 9, at one port of the Dominion, was classed over that number and subjected to a higher duty at another port of entry; and the parties who had purchased on the faith of the first classification being correct were called on to pay the increased amount, which would seriously affect the result of that operation. This want of uniformity does not always arise from the want of ability or faithfulness on the part of the appraisers but, as will frequently happen, the sample drawn at one time will not correspond with those taken at another, drawn perhaps more or less carefully or from different parts of the package. Under these circumstances, I think it would be extremely desirable if this difficulty could be obviated, and this I think, could be easily accomplished by abandoning the principle of specific duty, and by substituting in its place the fairer one of an ad valorem duty for the full amount required."

And yet the hon. gentleman, unable to induce the Finance Minister to make this change, which, he says, is so easily accomplished and will accomplish so much, becomes a colleague of the Ministers who refuse to make the change; he says:—

"The present duty according to public returns averages a trifle over 2 cents per lb., on all kinds, and if this average is to be maintained, I would recommend that the specific duty be repealed altogether, and an ad valorem duty of 40 per cent. be substituted, with this difference, that the 40 per cent. shall only apply to raw sugar, while refined should pay 55 per cent."

That is an application for an amount of protection that exceeds anything that has ever been asked by any other parties in this country. So far as I am aware, the hon. gentleman is not only a protectionist, but a most ex-trême protectionist, demanding—as was remarked by an hon. gentleman on this side of the House—that a Chinese wall be raised in reference to the importation of sugar into our country. Well, what more? I now come to the mode in which he argues for the protection of sugar, and which the hon. the Minister of the Interior will find is equally applicable, and equally convincing, applied line by line, and principle by principle to the whole question of Protection, as advocated by the gentleman on this side of the House in favour of Canadian industries at large, he says: "This apparent protection"—the most monstrous protection that has ever been asked, greater than Mr. Dunstan, of Halifax, or Drummond, of Montreal, have ever asked. This gentleman, who, at that time, in justice to him I must say, had become recently a stockholder in a large sugar refinery about to be built in Halifax.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. JONES: No, Sir; I had not.

MR. TUPPER: I have the hon. gentleman's prospectus in my hand, in which he puts out his name as one of a provisional director, an inducement to persons to become engaged with him in building up this industry:

"This apparent protection is defensible on many grounds—"

Mark these grounds; and mark how in every line and word the hon. gentleman cuts the ground from his colleagues, whom he has joined, and raises the cry of Protection in this industry.

"This apparent protection is defensible on many grounds, chiefly because in Great Britain they have large refineries, with all modern improvements, with cheap labour, cheap money, and a large market to buy and sell in. For this reason they can manufacture more cheaply than in any part of the world, with the advantage of a large market at home to take off their goods."

He now deals with the question of slaughtering in all its bearings, and urges Sir Francis Hincks to prevent the slaughtering of Canadian industries by foreigners outside. He said:—

"But, although they have this large market, it often happens that rather than reduce their prices at home, they prefer making shipments and loss, if any, abroad, and hence it is that large shipments are at times made to all parts of the Dominion and thrown into the market, generally at a loss, to the great injury of the refiner, without, on the average, being of much advantage to the consumer; for this reason that source of supply cannot be depended on, for none comes forward if the market at home admits of their selling it there to advantage."

What do the hon. gentleman's colleagues think of that for a Free-trader? He argues, out the whole question of slaughtering, and shows that unless we protect our own industries, they will be crushed out; not by legitimate trade from abroad, but by parties who will not reduce their prices abroad, but crush out our industries by reducing the price in our market. What does the hon. Prime Minister tell you? And what does the hon. the Finance Minister tell you? That this great reduction of price is a great advantage, because our people can buy for less than they would otherwise have to pay. What does the hon. the Minister of the Interior think of the doctrine that no advantage is secured by that reduction, because of the slaughtering of Canadian industries, since the foreigner can have exactly the same price he charges at home so soon as he has crushed out our industries?

"Again, you are no doubt aware that the American Government—"

Mark, Sir, this American Government, that we are told is sacrificing everybody in their country by a high protective policy, is held up by this Minister of the Militia, to the admiring gaze of Sir Francis Hincks, as a Government that is alive to the interests of their own country. He says:

"Again, you are no doubt aware that the American Government, always alive to the interests of their people, and all that relates to the prosperity of their country, have recently passed a Treasury Order, increasing very considerably the draw-back on white refined sugar, the result of which, I learn, has been that the great bulk of that quality now used in Canada comes from that quarter, and their manufacture is entirely abandoned at Montreal, where formerly large quantities were made; hence, it follows, that if our trade is to be encouraged or sustained, such exceptional legislation as I have referred to, must be met by corresponding legislation on our part."

Exactly what we claim; but then he goes on to the general question of Protection. Hear him, again! what does he say?

"On principle, I am not one of those who advocate or believe in the policy of high protective tariffs—"

Mark, Sir, he qualifies—he does not say he is not an advocate of a protective tariff on principle. He is not an advocate of a high protective tariff. I will show you that he was an advocate of the highest protective tariff ever asked or proposed anywhere—the highest tariff ever proposed in this country. I will show you that he is an advocate of a tariff as high as 150 per cent. on petroleum, which the hon. gentleman advocated and maintained against a gentleman on this side of the House.

"On principle, I am not one of those who advocate or believe in the policy of high protective tariffs, but I have before me the policy of the Government which has frequently been affirmed by Parliament, whereby a protection of 15 per cent. to 20 per cent., is afforded to many manufacturing interests of the country; and I only ask if that policy is to be continued that an interest so large as the one I refer to should be placed on as favourable terms. I may mention that boots and shoes, brooms and baskets, caps and hats, soap, clothing, warp, cottons and woollens, leather, machinery and nails, sails, vinegar, etc., and many other articles have a protection of 15 per cent, while rum and whiskey, tobacco, petroleum, and beer, are all protected to a much larger extent. On this ground, therefore, and this alone, I believe the people of Canada would not object to the refinery interests of the country being placed on an equal footing as indicated in the preceding suggestions; and I trust from your well known familiarity with the subject, that these views may commend themselves to your judgment. I presume it will be generally admitted that every branch of industry should be placed on the same footing, and I cannot for a moment conceive how this interest, from which nearly one-fourth of our revenue is collected, should, so far as tariff arrangements are concerned, be placed at a disadvantage. Our great staples of exports are fish, lumber and coal, which find a market in the West Indies. From thence the course of trade is that our vessels bring back their proceeds in sugar and molasses. Formerly we had a large and increasing trade in these articles, but since so much English and American refined sugars have been coming in the market it has fallen off very considerably, being directed chiefly to Boston; where the refiners have the benefit of our vessels as their carriers; and after the sugar is refined they then send it to the market where it should have come in its raw condition. I feel assured if my views were carried out, that it would give an important stimulus to the refining interests and tend to the establishment of refineries in all the large ports of the Dominion. At the time of the Union, a large establishment was in the course of erection, fostered by the Act of the Local Government admitting raw sugars at 50 cents less duty for refining purposes, which law, no doubt, still remains in force; but the competition from abroad has been so great that parties have hesitated embarking so large a capital as this outlay would involve, until a readjustment of the tariff took place, which I hope may be during the coming Session. The views I have thus hastily committed would, I feel sure, be approved by the entire mercantile community interested in this branch of commerce, and, if necessary, I could obtain their recommendation at any time.

"I have the honour to remain,
"Your obedient servant,

"A. G. JONES."

I have read the entire letter in order that the House may see not only what views the hon. gentleman held, but, in fact how he has answered all objections raised by hon. gentlemen opposite against protecting our own Canadian industries from foreign competition. What applies to sugar, applies, as he himself points out, to all other manufactures. He claims that even a protection of 150 per cent. on petroleum furnished a basis; and the protection given to whiskey, furnished a basis for having all industries placed upon the same footing. Now, Sir, I intend to leave that branch of the subject and to draw the attention of the House to another point in which, I think, the hon. gentleman's divergence from the opinions of his colleagues ought to have been sufficient to have prevented them upon their part receiving him, even if they were willing to receive him at a sacrifice of principle, or his accepting that hon. gentleman's position in the Cabinet. I refer to the question of British Columbia. Every person knows that, consistently with the gentleman's bitter hostility to the Union of the Provinces, he was one of the most violent opponents of the introduction of British Columbia into this Dominion. Those who do not know, I will tell. One of the strongest charges brought against the party to which I have the honour to belong, and the Government of which I had the honour to be a member, was the representation given to British Columbia. He excited and exasperated, as far as he was able, only the other night, his own constituents—he exasperated his constituents, as far as he could—against what he characterized as the unfair representation given to British Columbia in this House of Commons. But there is a more important question than that. He is known to be a violent opponent of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I would ask the House to contrast his opinions with the declarations made by the hon. the First Minister to the electors of this country, when he first assumed office, on that question, in which he mentioned that it was of the greatest importance to have a great highway between British Columbia and these Provinces. The hon. gentleman—although he has not been as energetic or as successful in carrying out that policy—from that time to this he has been spending millions of the people's money in preparing for the construction of the Pacific Railway. Now, what were the views held, not half-a-dozen years ago, but last Session, on that question by the hon. member for Halifax. The hon. the First Minister said the other day that this Hansard was a very inconvenient book. I am inclined to think, Sir, that his views will not be changed on that point after I have drawn his attention, on a few occasions like the present, to the sayings of some of the hon. gentlemen with whom he is connected. I hold in my hand a speech of the hon. gentleman made on that subject at the last Session of this House. What does he say? He says: "The late Government, by the aid of a large majority, had forced on the House bringing British Columbia into the Confederation and leading this country to an expenditure which they themselves now admit we were incapable of literally fulfilling. The only fault that he had to find with the Government was that they had not repudiated the whole transaction." On that question the hon. the First Minister says: "The Crown is bound in honour to carry out in good faith, as far as it is able, the engagements made to the Province of British Columbia." That is the doctrine of the First Minister. What is the doctrine of the hon. the Minister of Militia, who has just gone into this Government? Why, he says: "The only fault he had to find with the Government was that they had not repudiated the whole transaction." There is an open avowal of bad faith; there is an open avowal of repudiation advocated by the hon. the Minister of Militia as lately as the last Session of Parliament. Why, the people of British Columbia at this moment are agitated, and naturally agitated, at the belief that the present Government of Canada have been trifling with this important question of railway communication with British Columbia. The people have charged the Government, in memorials to the Imperial Government, with bad faith in not attempting to carry out their engagements. They have double reason for their suspicions—I trust they are nothing more than suspicions—but they have double reason for it when they find that a gentleman on the floor of this House, in fact, only the last Session of this House, said that the only fault he had to find with this Government, in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, was that they had not repudiated the whole transaction. I think that is another reason why the hon. gentleman should not have been regarded as a person who could be a member of the Government in the interests of Canada, and of the harmony that ought to prevail, and that it is desirable should prevail, in every section of this great Dominion, and why he should not have been brought into this Government to give force and point to the suspicions and feelings which have agitated to so large an extent that important section of this country. But, Sir, there is another reason more important, I regret to say, than either of those to which I have referred, why the hon. the Minister of Militia should not have been a member of any Canadian Government, and why that hon. gentleman should not, of all persons, have been entrusted with the portfolio of the Minister of Militia. Sir, this is a loyal country; this is a loyal House, I am glad to say. Thank God that, though we may differ on the abstract questions of Government, there is one question the people of Canada do not differ upon, and that is in their loyal allegiance to our Gracious Sovereign. There is an overwhelming sentiment in the mind of the people of this country to maintain the Crown, and the connection of Canada with that Crown, whatever side of the House gentlemen may sit upon. However much we may differ on questions of finance, on questions of abstract politics, there is no difference of opinion on that great question of devoted loyalty to the Throne under which we have the happiness to live. Yet, I say, if there were no other reason why the hon. gentleman should not be a Minister of this Government or any other Government, it is because of his past record. He has placed himself in a position, by his public sentiments, that ought to prevent him from occupying any such position in this country. Sir, that was bad enough —

MR. TUPPER.

MR. JONES (Halifax): Where?

MR. TUPPER: I will tell the hon. gentleman where: it was in a public meeting in the city of Halifax, where the hon. gentleman declared, in the presence of the assembled citizens, on an occasion when they had been called together to give a loyal reception to the Queen's representative—where the Queen's representative had come down to receive a Prince of the Royal blood. It was on that occasion when the citizens came together for the purpose of tendering a loyal reception to the Queen's representative, that the hon. gentleman, in the presence of the citizens, stood up and made a most violent and inflammatory speech, which he concluded by the words, "That he would take off his hat and cheer when the British flag was hauled down from the citadel."

MR. JONES (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I shall answer that presently. In the meantime, I say it is a falsehood.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman will find me on this occasion, as on all other occasions, when I make a statement in this House, prepared to give the evidence, clear and incontrovertible evidence, of the accuracy of my statement. I hold in my hand a letter addressed to me by Her Majesty's representative at that time in Halifax, Sir Hastings Doyle; and for the benefit of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond), I hope he will be wholly satisfied as to whether this letter is a forgery or not, as from necessity he was bound to insinuate it was in the columns of the Globe. I hold the autograph letter of Sir Hastings Doyle, dated 28th February, 1871. It is as follows:—

“HALIFAX, 28th February, 1871.

“MY DEAR TUPPER.—Mr. Alfred Jones has, I understand, left Halifax for Ottawa. I hope it will not be forgotten while he is there that he said at a public meeting here in the course of a most inflammatory speech, that when the British flag was hauled down on the Citadel he would take off his hat and cheer—upon which the Chief Justice and Judge Desbarres took up their hats and left the room. The Chief Justice mentioned this circumstance to me, and the consequence has been that for the last two years he has never entered my house, or have I looked at the same side of the street with him. I wrote to you this morning, so I have nothing to add.

“Yours sincerely,

HASTINGS DOYLE.”

MR. JONES (Halifax): Let us see it.

MR. TUPPER: I have another letter just as strong, and the hon. gentleman will find that it is not only not a private letter, as Sir Hastings Doyle invariably marked all his private letters to me—and I had a lengthened correspondence with him, but it is written for the purpose of showing—and in order to let the people know—the views and sentiments of the hon. gentleman when he was coming up here. I ask the hon. gentleman now, with the letter in his hand, is that Sir Hastings Doyle's writing?

MR. JONES (Halifax): Yes, it is.

MR. DYMOND: The hon. gentleman will allow me to say that if it is not a forgery, it ought to be one. It is a disgrace to the man who wrote it.

MR. TUPPER: So, Sir, everything ought to be a forgery that brings those hon. gentlemen before the bar of the public opinion of this country—where they have to answer for the statements they have publicly made and proclaimed as their sentiments. The other letter is as follows:—

MR. TUPPER.

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE.

“HALIFAX, 1st March, 1871.

“MY DEAR TUPPER,—

“More about my friend (?) Alfred Jones! Herewith I send an account of the meeting at which he made use of the disloyal expression that “when the British flag is hauled down from the Citadel he would take off his hat and cheer.” The judges who were present most distinctly heard him say so, and Thomson (Howe's son-in-law), and others who were at the meeting, all declare to his having made use of those expressions, and that his whole speech was of a most inflammatory nature. The occasion of his making use of the above-named disloyal harangue was at the meeting held to prevent the Governor General receiving an address, or being in any way recognized by the Local Government, who strictly abided by their decision. I have telegraphed you to-day to remind you of this speech, so that when he makes his appearance at Ottawa you may not throw your arms around him and embrace him! I do not venture to dictate to others what line they should adopt towards persons who publicly preach disloyalty, but it is but right that I should remind my friends at Ottawa that he was guilty of making that speech, and that I have sent him to Coventry ever since.

“Vail, who is somehow or other related to him, came to me, some time ago, to say that what he (Jones) did utter was in the heat of the moment, and that he never intended to say what had been attributed to him—that what he meant to say was that he would cheer when the British flag was hauled down from the Citadel, because Nova Scotia could then fight Canada and shake off her yoke, but this he did not add, because his voice was drowned with hisses and hooting. I told Mr. Vail that I would not sit at the same table with him until he publicly denied his disloyal sentiments, but he has never done so. If he would even now do so publicly at Ottawa, I would make bygones be bygones.

“Yours, sincerely,

“HASTINGS DOYLE.”

Now, Sir, take it upon the hon. gentleman's own explanation; take it upon the afterthought; what does it mean? It means that the First Minister of the Crown thinks he is doing his duty to the loyal people of Canada by putting the militia forces of this country under the control and in the hands of a man who says “What I want to pull down the British flag for is that Nova Scotia may fight Canada and throw off the yoke.” At that time the Union was an accomplished fact, as much as it is to-day, and yet, long after that Union had been accomplished that hon. gentleman proclaims to the world that his object and ambition is to use all the power that he can obtain to bring Nova Scotia to fight Canada, and break up this British North American Union. I said, Sir, that we had a loyal people and I thank God that we have a loyal militia in this country, and we know that that body of loyal militiamen is discharging its duty, which is one of the most important to the people of this country, at a great personal sacrifice of time and money to themselves. I want to know if the loyal militiamen and militia officers of this country, who are preparing themselves to shed their blood, if need be, to defend our homes and hearthstones, and protect our country from any invader from without; if these men, sacrificing as they do, their time and money to qualify themselves to defend our country, are to have placed over them a man whose utterance, on the occasion I have alluded to amounting to an open defiance of the Crown and a flagrant insult to every loyal subject? I can readily understand how his presence in this Cabinet would be greeted by the hon. the Postmaster General, but I hope he is the only man in this House, or in this country, who would give a hearty cordial echo to the utterances of the hon. the Minister of Militia. I will not do the hon. the Postmaster General, as after his very extraordinary speech, he has left his seat in the House, any injustice. I will not quote any speech he may have made under excitement, but as he has questioned this statement in another place, I will quote his own deliberate statement, first spoken and then written and published to the people as his deliberate sentiment which, to the best of my knowledge, has not been withdrawn up to this moment. He says in a pamphlet on the independence of Canada: "It is true that in my humble way, I opposed that scheme (Union) in great part, because I was timid about the early assumption of sovereignty, which I thought I foresaw then must follow. I stated in my place in Parliament, after the coalition of 1861, that Confederation, if it should really prove what its promoters pretended, an antidote to annexation, was the first step towards the independence of the country. But opposition was useless, for Confederation was the policy of the Empire, and Imperial influence is always too powerful for colonial dissent. I have accepted the situation in its fullest sense, as faithfully and loyally as if I had originally promoted it." And mark, Sir, what follows; mark in what sense the hon. gentleman has accepted the opinion of the Province on that Union, which, on the very title page, declares that the object of it is the preservation of the tie which connects Canada to the Crown. "But, the first step having been taken, I see dangers in delay, and I believe it is expedient to take measures for the severance of our present relations to the Empire. This is a momentous step and requires grave consideration. It must create differences of opinion, and the broadest tolerance should be accorded to discussion. I propose to speak candidly and dispassionately, I have no party battles to fight nor personal preferences to gratify. Holding strong opinions as to the future of this country, I submit them frankly for the verdict of my countrymen." That is the doctrine of the hon. the Postmaster General as deliberately given to the people of this country—a doctrine which he has never, I believe, withdrawn. I do not for a moment question his right to hold those sentiments. If he honestly believes there is danger in delay, if he believes it is the duty of every man in Canada, in the interests of the country, to sever our connection with the Crown, he is right in advocating those views, but no man holding those sentiments should have been permitted to sit side by side with the hon. the First Minister, who has declared that the interests of the country are closely connected with the preservation of the tie with the Mother Country. And with those opinions the Postmaster General should never have taken the oath of office, being obliged by those opinions to use all the power he had, or he can obtain, to bring about that which he maintains, deliberately, to be in the interests of the country. I can imagine how he hailed the entrance of his friend the hon. the Minister of Militia into the Cabinet; how he assured him that the two will cheer when the British flag is hauled down in Canada. Those gentlemen are arcades ambo, but they never should have been, or should be the colleagues of the hon. the First Minister of the Crown either in this Government or in any other. I do not intend to go over the subjects dealt with so ably by hon. gentlemen—at all events on this side of the House—in the discussion which has taken place, but I wish to make a suggestion to the hon. the First Minister as to an alteration in the first paragraph of the Speech. It is:—

“In again summoning you for the despatch of business, I am glad to be able to say that nothing beyond the ordinary business of the country requires your attendance.”

I think whoever supplied that paragraph to the Speech failed in his duty to the House, and to the country; and I think it should have been:—

“It is my duty to announce that the unmistakable evidences of the withdrawal of public confidence from my Government are such as require me to ask you to vote the supplies preparatory to an immediate appeal to the people.”

That is the only alteration which I propose, and in doing that I am quite serious. I say that the hon. gentleman is bound by Parliamentary precedent, by constitutional precedent, to take the course which I have stated. I say that the hon. gentleman will find in constitutional practice in England an eminent example for the course to which I invite his attention. Mr. Gladstone when he had a majority at his back felt bound to dissolve Parliament and go to the country because he had evidence from defeats in local elections of a loss of public confidence. What evidence has the hon. gentleman had? By seizing the opportune moment he was able to snatch a hasty and ill-considered verdict from a large majority of the people. He had a majority after the last general election of from eighty to one hundred I think it was about ninety.

MR. MACKENZIE: Say two hundred.

MR. TUPPER: The Globe said 102, but I think I am not exaggerating when I say ninety. I think the hon. gentleman himself said eighty-seven.

MR. MACKENZIE: When?

MR. TUPPER: Well, I know that at first we were called a corporal's guard, and were treated with all the contempt with which the hon. gentleman could possibly treat us. I am happy to say that has passed away, that the action of the people has relieved us from that statement; and during the last two Sessions, at all events, we have not been taunted with our inability to discharge the duties of an efficient Opposition. I will call the attention of the hon. gentleman to a few changes that have taken place in the majorities which he previously obtained in different constituencies. In East Toronto, in 1874, he had a majority of 137, it was changed in the last election into a majority against him of 414; in West Toronto, a majority in his favour of 211 was changed to one of 351 against him. In the city of London, a majority in favour of the Government of 61 was changed to 128 against them; in North Ontario a majority of 92 in favour of the Government was changed to a majority of 87 against them; in South Ontario a majority of 151 in their favour was changed to one of 38 for their opponents. In North Renfrew they had a majority of 48 in their favour.

MR TUPPER.

MR. MACKENZIE: Does the hon. gentleman remember who was elected in North Renfrew in 1874?

MR. TUPPER: I do remember; but I remember that since that he had a gentleman sent here to support him, Mr. Murray, by a majority of 48; and a subsequent election has given a majority of 210 to a member on this side of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE: Who was elected in 1874?

MR. TUPPER: I really forget.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew): I can tell the hon. the Premier that I had the honour of obtaining the return for North Renfrew in 1873, but by a minority of the whole vote of something over 200. There were three candidates running at that election.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is a specimen of the hon. gentleman's statements, and yet he was claiming that the hon. member who has just spoken was a supporter of the Government.

MR. TUPPER: I say that the gentleman who sat in the House supporting the Ministry defeated my hon. friend the present member by 48. That is now changed, by the contest which neither the First Minister nor myself will soon forget, to a majority of 200 in favour of my hon. friend. That was the time when the First Minister went into the constituency and told them it was for them to decide between the two great parties, and he got his answer.

MR. MACKENZIE: I want this distinctly understood: the hon. gentleman is contrasting the general election of 1874 with what has taken place since. He is proclaiming a triumph when he had failed there in 1874.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. member for North Renfrew has explained that.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew): Both the gentleman who ran against me in 1874 claimed to give a support to the Government. One of them claimed to give an out-and-out support to the Administration, and the other said that he was prepared to give the Government a fair trial. The aggregate vote of those two gentlemen, though I defeated them both, was something like 225 greater than that which I obtained. So that the subsequent election of 1875, instead of indicating a change of opinion in favour of the Administration, decreased the majority which they had in 1874.

MR. TUPPER: I hope that will satisfy the hon. the First Minister as to the change of sentiment in North Renfrew. In South Norfolk the vote was changed from 123 in their favour to 72 against them. I am afraid the hon. gentleman has not given the attention to those figures that they deserve, or probably he would have adopted the views which I suggested to him a few minutes since.

MR. MACKENZIE: This is the twentieth time I have had this statement.

MR. TUPPER: Then the memory of the hon. gentleman is not very retentive. North Victoria gave four votes in favour of a supporter of the Government, and that has been changed to a majority of one against them.

MR. MACKENZIE: Was there an election in North Victoria?

MR. TUPPER: Yes. Mr. Maclennan sat in this House.

MR. MACKENZIE: He was unseated on petition, and there was no change—not even of a single vote.

MR. TUPPER: As I only claimed a change of two votes the difference is not very great.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. member who sits now for Victoria was member at first.

MR. BOWELL: There were two elections.

MR. TUPPER: My hon. friend and the leader of the Opposition concur in the idea that there was only one election but I believe there were two elections, if my memory serves me.

MR. BOWELL: Mr. Maclennan was elected by four; he was unseated and re-elected by three. Mr. Cameron was then seated on the scrutineer vote.

MR. MACKENZIE: By one.

MR. BOWELL: Of course as soon as he got a majority, he started.

MR. TUPPER: In Berthier, a supporter of the Government was elected by acclamation, and the county has since returned a member to oppose them by 272 majority. In Bellechasse also we were unable to put a candidate in the field, but a subsequent election returned a member of the Opposition by 225 majority.

MR. FRECHETTE: A minority.

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes, taking the North Renfrew view of it.

MR. TUPPER: A gentleman who has been elected by a majority of 255, should not have slurs thrown out against him in this House. In Chambly, 106 majority for the Government, has been changed to 150 against them; in Two Mountains, where a supporter of the Government was elected in 1874, by 155 majority, at a subsequent election the Government could not find a candidate to put in the field at all, and my hon. friend the present member was elected by acclamation. In Charlevoix, a majority of 273 in their favour had been changed to one of 211 against them.

MR. MACKENZIE: Give the result of the next election.

MR. TUPPER: Kamouraska elected a supporter of the Government by acclamation, but is now held by a supporter of my right hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald), who was elected by a majority of 54. Victoria, Nova Scotia, at the general election, returned Mr. Ross by acclamation, while my hon. friend who now represents that county in this House (Mr. Campbell), was elected as a most pronounced opponent of this Government by a majority of 98. In Queen's, Prince Edward Island, Mr. Laird was elected by acclamation, and subsequently, my hon. friend the present member (Mr. Pope), was elected by a majority of 88. In Montreal West, as has already been stated, a majority in support of the Government of 600 at the general election was changed to a majority of 50 in favour of the sitting member, after he had pledged himself to vote against the Government on every important point—the Canadian Pacific Railway policy, the fiscal policy, and the treatment of the banks by the Finance Minister.

MR. HOLTON: That is the reason his majority was so small.

MR. TUPPER: I am afraid he felt that that was the only means by which he could get a majority at all. That was the state of things when the House rose, and I think the House will agree with me that it was a rather serious matter for the First Minister to consider whether he would call this Parliament together again. The House heard the statement last night of my hon. friend on my right (Mr. Masson) that, out of 19 elections in the Province of Quebec, since 1874, all had been carried against the Government but two seats, and of those Mr. Abbott had only previously carried Argenteuil by a majority of one, and in Montreal Centre the popular and eloquent gentleman who now sits for that constituency (Mr. Devlin), was able to turn a small majority on one side into one for the other. We have had five new members this Session who, if not introduced, have at all events taken their seats in the House, and yet not one of the five offered himself to the electors as a supporter of the Government. I presume the hon. gentlemen will act as they said they would, though I am not in a position to say. I presume those who were elected as Independent members will redeem their pledges and act according to their conscience, irrespective of party.

MR. MACKENZIE: They have so far,

MR. TUPPER: If they do support the Government, my case is the stronger. The hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Haddow), was claimed as a Government supporter. If he was so, it would be a strange victory, seeing that he was returned only by assuring the electors that he was an Independent candidate. If the leanings of these hon. gentlemen are in favour of the Government, so much the more clear then is the proof of the feelings of the country; because they knew that it would be the death-knell of their hopes if they avowed their preferences for this Government. But out of five new members who have taken their seats in this House, three came as pronounced supporters of the great Liberal Conservative party in antagonism to the Government, and the other two are returned as Independent. There is not a man out of five who has been able to take his seat as an avowed supporter of the Government. Then take into consideration the overwhelming defeat of Mr. Vail in Digby, and the defeat of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, one of the most popular men inside this House, or out of it, in his own constituency. When you find a man of his great talents, and great power of advocating his cause, defeated by the overwhelming change in the constituency which he represented, where all his social ties existed, where his personal claims were known as well as his great abilities, then the hon. the First Minister has an evidence, which no man can shut his eyes to, to inform him as to the public sentiment of the country. Then the Minister of Militia goes down to his county. I have been taunted with having only one follower in this House from the Province of Nova Scotia, but when the public sentiment has swollen my one follower into something like one-fourth of the members from that Province, when the Minister of Militia is beaten in his own county of Digby, and when, in the great metropolitan constituency of Halifax, a majority of over 2,000 is brought down to one of 228, which would not have existed at all but for the means that were used, and which could not have been used under other circumstances, if the hon. First Minister does not see the handwriting on the wall then the hon. gentleman is blind to the evidences which are apparent throughout the country, and to which no other man can shut his eyes. He will fail in his duty if he does not see here in this declaration of the people of Canada that his day is past, and that the sooner he places his trust in the hands of the sovereign people from whom he received it, the sooner he will be acting in accordance with constitutional precedent. Mr. Gladstone adopted the same course, under circumstances not a tithe as strong as that. He resigned his trust and called upon the people of England to say whether he was to continue in office or not—not because he had not a majority, but said, “I cannot be blind to the fact that day after day the people in these individual elections”—and every one knows the power that the Government of the day can exercise in individual elections, which they cannot exercise in the general elections, and we know the unscrupulous manner in which that power has been used by this Government—“have evinced the withdrawal of public confidence from me in a number of constituencies. I will not be false to my country or to the duty I owe to the will of the country, and will not hesitate a moment in placing the power in the hands of the people themselves to say whom they wish to reign over them.” There is another great Liberal authority, one who is regarded as one of the strongest Liberal authorities, perhaps, to be found in the ranks of the Liberal party in England, the former Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Robert Lowe. He says, “That the Prime Minister owes it to himself and to the country, the moment he sees these significant indications of his failure to carry these local elections, to resign his trust to the people.” Mr. Lowe further says:—“A Government regulates itself by the public pulse. When it has a good working majority in the House, that is evidence of the prima facie kind that it enjoys the public confidence. But it often happens, that, while this majority obtained at a general election or otherwise, still give the Government its best support, the popular confidence in the Government is shaken or lost. It often happens, in short, that although the Government has a majority, and perhaps a large one, the people, the source of power, are so hostile to it that a general election would result in its complete overthrow and the complete disappearance of that majority. Now, no Government, worthy the name, would consent to hold office when it found itself in the position just outlined. Mere bureaucrats might, but statesmen in a free country have more respect for its institutions, and I may add, more self-respect than to attempt or dream of anything of the kind. A Government is informed of the state of public feeling, among other things, by the result of what I may call intermediate elections, isolated elections held after a general election. If these elections go against the Government, one after another, if seats long accounted theirs, suddenly return members of the party opposite, why then they know—for are they not told in a manner at once brusque and striking—that their majority in the House is no longer proof that they enjoy popular confidence. Knowing that, what are they to do? Hold on to office? Continue to conduct the affairs of a free country when the majority of the people are palpably hostile to them? Why, that would be usurpation! We have been called disturbers, but usurpers, never! Does the hon. gentleman wish to be considered a usurper! The hon. the First Minister, has referred to my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, as anxious about struggling candidates. I have not seen any struggling candidates. All we have to do is to place a candidate before the people, and say he is an opponent of the present Government, to prevent him from being a struggling candidate.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. MACKENZIE: I never used that phrase. I said struggling politicians.

MR. TUPPER: Very good, struggling politicians. Are we struggling politicians, or are they? Are the men struggling politicians who go where they are invited, and present a fair, open, manly exposition of their policy on the public questions of the day before the country, and contrast it with the conduct of the gentlemen on the Ministerial benches. Are we struggling politicians, adopting a course like that? Or, are those struggling politicians who, clinging to the Treasury benches, despite the public sentiment, as expressed through all those channels in a most unmistakable manner, still say to the country that their duty to themselves, if not to the country, requires them to cling to office and disregard the strongest manifestation the people can give that the confidence of the public has been withdrawn from them. I am glad to know that the time is near at hand when, struggle as they may, their hold will be loosened. I am thankful that the time is at hand when the mighty public sentiment of Canada must be let loose, and will have an opportunity of dealing with those hon. gentlemen as they deserve, when they too, must share the fate of so many of their unfortunate candidates who have undertaken to be their standard-bearers in the unpopular cause they have advocated.

MR. JONES (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great amusement, I cannot say with much interest, to the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. I say not with much interest, because that Address is not new to me, and, I presume, the main portion of it is not very new to the hon. members of this House. Perhaps all due allowance may be made to-night for the hon. gentleman for the tone in which he has indulged, because he has just returned from a contest in Nova Scotia, in which the electors of that Province have shown how they regard that hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman did me the honour of attending the election that was held in the county of Halifax recently. We are always happy to have the assistance and attendance of able men from any part of the Dominion, and we welcomed the arrival of all those distinguished individuals who came down to pay particular attention to the county of Halifax on that occasion. I said to my friends, we have always won in this county, there is no necessity to make a great effort; all we have to do is to beat them sufficiently, because we will not be favoured in future with the attendance of all those distinguished gentlemen who are now encouraged by a small minority in the hope of converting it into a majority for themselves. I pointed to the action of the successful oarsman, George Brown, who always kept his antagonist a little behind him so as to give him the wash of his oars. I told them all that was necessary was a sufficient majority to show that the great metropolitan county of Nova Scotia was fully in accord with the public sentiment of this country. When the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) presented himself before the electors of Halifax there were issues laid before them, there were slanders and imputations made with respect to myself and the Government of which I am a member, which up to that time none had ventured to place before the people of Nova Scotia. Three gentlemen came to Halifax. In the first place there was the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper). He, no doubt, thought himself able on usual occasions to instruct the people of Nova Scotia; but on an occasion as important as the one to which I refer, he had to be accompanied by a gentleman from Montreal, Monsieur Thibault. What the record of that gentleman is, is best known to the House, and hon. members can judge respecting it as well as myself. It is certain that wherever he went in the county I have the honour to represent, he did me more good than harm. Then we had another—I do not know what to call him—a luminary, known throughout this Dominion as the great stretcher. He came also, and I must say that he exceeded on that occasion all the previous efforts which he had made. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper), has devoted a large portion of his address to myself, to my previous political opinions, and the position in which I now stand. He has dwelt at very considerable length on the circumstances, which led to the resignation of Mr. Vail and myself; and the hon. gentleman, as is usual with him when addressing this House, has treated this question in a partizan and unfair spirit. If he was disposed to treat it fairly he could have told us that when this question of printing was before the House, it was explained that the great cause of the increase was the changes which the Government of the day had made in converting the way offices into post offices. It was proved on many occasions, by comparison of rates charged, that in the majority of cases the prices charged by the Citizen Publishing Company were from twenty-five to fifty per cent. less than was paid to the Halifax Reporter, which did the printing under the Government of the hon. member. The hon. gentleman would imply by his accusation that the head of the Post-office Department had been guilty of collusion with the Citizen Publishing Company. How else could it have happened that the bill of the Citizen Publishing Company should be so much in excess of the amount paid by the previous Government, unless the extra work was wanted and unless it was ordered by the Inspector of the Nova Scotia Post Office, a gentleman who has been in that position for the last thirty years. When the hon. gentleman made that accusation he was accusing the Inspector of the Post Office in Halifax, because no account could be rendered or paid by the Government, unless it were passed in the usual way by the Inspector for Nova Scotia. But I have another proof, which I think the hon. member will regard with respect, as to the prices paid and the reason for the difference in the accounts. I hold in my hand a report of the evidence given by Mr. Griffin, Deputy Postmaster General, before the Committee of Privileges and Elections last year, when a similar case was brought before its consideration. The evidence reads as follows:—

MR. TUPPER.

“Q. Mr. Griffin, can you tell us why the amount of printing should be so much greater during those two years than it was formerly? It was owing to the changes in the Way Post Offices in New Brunswick; in order to assimilate them in accordance with the other parts of the Dominion they had to be furnished with entirely new blanks and forms.

“Q. What did you mean this morning when you said that the prices under this schedule averaged less? My impression is that the prices were less than those previously paid; there had been no previous schedule.

“Q. I understood you to say the amount of work was largely increased by changing the Way Offices into Post Offices, and that the work was much larger for those two years than for other years. Will you have the kindness to state to the Committee what was required during these two years? Each of these offices required a different set of forms and blanks. It required about $25 worth to fit each of them out. Indeed, for my own information, I went into the matter, and found it cost nearer $30 than $25, altogether for each office, and there were some five hundred offices. It was substantially the same as establishing five hundred new Post Offices.”

Now, the only difference in that was that it should be six hundred instead of five hundred, and the six hundred way offices that were converted into post offices, at a cost of $30 for each office, would account for the sum of $18,000 out of the $26,000 which was paid the Citizen Publishing Company, and that would only leave $8,000 for the two years, which is actually less than the amount paid by the late Government during the time they were in office. This is the explanation with regard to that matter. The hon. gentleman, during his address in Halifax, pointed out a way in which the accounts were, perhaps, paid. The hon. gentleman, with that familiarity with these matters that doubtless he acquired during the time he had been in the late Government, said that all Mr. Vail, a member of the Government, had to do was to touch the Auditor on the shoulder and say, “I am interested in those accounts,” and it would be all right. The hon. gentleman has occupied a high position in the country, and he should have recollected that any one who had occupied the position of a Minister of the Crown should weigh well the language he used, because that language would be referred to and criticised in all parts of the Dominion. The language the hon. member used tended to cast a slur upon the Civil Service of this country.

When Fraser, Reynolds & Co's accounts came to be paid, did the hon. gentleman touch the Auditor on the shoulder and say, "Pass these accounts, they are for my friends?" Because if he could do it in a case in which he was himself interested, the same principle would apply if he could do it for a friend he desired to serve. Did he touch the auditor on the shoulder when he paid for car springs, 200 or 300 per cent. more than they cost? It was a foul slander on the Civil Service of this country, and most unworthy of a gentleman occupying so prominent a position as the hon. member for Cumberland occupies, as one of the leading members of the Opposition. I know nothing of the gentlemen connected with the Civil Service of this country, but I believe they faithfully discharge their duties; and I believe that it is a foul slander to say that all the hon. member or the entire Cabinet of Ministers have to do, is to touch the auditor on the shoulder, and say, "Pass that account, because I am interested in it, or have a friend interested in it." I took the earliest occasion, there as here, to remind that hon. gentleman that he should be more careful in his remarks about the Civil Service and the character of the gentlemen engaged in it. Now, the hon. gentleman has been good enough to refer to the resignation of Mr. Vail and myself, I have done nothing in that transaction to be ashamed of. I stated from the first, that I had a small interest in that newspaper, and I was not aware then, and not until the last moment, that my indirect connection with the company would have affected my position here, because my name did not appear; the paper was printed by the Citizen Publishing Company. I had no control or part in the management, rendered no bills or received any payments; and I had no idea my connection with the company, indirect as it was, would in any way imperil my seat. I never took the trouble, as I might have done, to get rid of that liability by transferring it to some other individual, or by doing the same as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) did. In 1873 he was a member of the late Government, and they wanted an office for railway purposes in Halifax; and by one of those fortunate circumstances that sometimes occurred to members of the Government, the hon. gentleman owned a house in Hollis Street. He knew very well that he could not let that house to the Government; that if he did, as a member of the Government and as a member of this House, he would imperil his seat; so he set about finding other means by which he could evade the law and at the same time reap all the advantages of his connection with the Government. In February, 1873, Dr. Tupper deeds to his son Stewart Tupper, the house in Hollis Street, "in consideration of one dollar, plus natural love and affection." It was a very nice thing to have natural love and affection, but the hon. gentleman never discovered that natural love and affection until he discovered that the Government wanted an office at Halifax; and he then schemed how he could let his house to the Government and how he might get rid of his responsibility in the transaction. That house was handed over to his son and very shortly afterwards, in July, this young gentleman granted a lease of this house in Hollis Street for three years, to Mr. Carvell, at $600 per annum. Now, what a natural transaction. Here was a loving father, anxious to put his son into possession of this house for one dollar, plus natural love and affection, and anxious to serve the Government that they might have the benefit of this house, and that they might increase its value by spending a large sum of money on it. The hon. gentleman might just as well have received the $600 himself; he was bound to maintain his son, and he derived just as much benefit from the transaction as if it had been done in his own name. The hon. gentleman ought to blush to refer to matters of this kind. But, Sir, I shall not go further into that transaction, because, as I said before, it will be made a subject of further enquiry. The hon. gentleman has referred to my desire to get hold of public money, to make a grab on the Treasury. Why every cent that was paid to the Citizen Publishing Company was for value received, and not only for value received, but for work that was necessary under the circumstances, and it was done at prices that were less than those paid under the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member. Any charge of corruption coming from that source may well be treated with contempt. He is the last man who, here or elsewhere, should charge any man with corruption; for if there is one man who has done more than another to lower the tone of public men, if there is one man in Canada—and I regret to say he comes from Nova Scotia—whose course since entering public life has tended to degrade public life, it is the hon. gentleman the member for Cumberland. I could bet the hon. gentleman that I did not have to send a begging letter to the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia asking if he had insinuated that he had made money out of the Pictou Railway. I should like an explanation of the hon. gentleman's policy in the Local Legislature—whether he did not go to Lieutenant-Governor Archibald and ask if he had not insinuated that the hon. gentleman had made a sum of money on account of improper connections with the Pictou Railway during the time he was leader of the Nova Scotia Government. The Lieutenant-Governor did not require to say, in direct language, that the hon. gentleman had been directly connected with the railway; but anyone who read the speech which the Lieutenant-Governor delivered on that occasion, could draw their own deductions from it; and anyone who was fair-minded could see that the Lieutenant-Governor meant to convey the impression that the hon. gentleman had an advantage in that railway transaction. Then we had another such transaction in connection with the Springfield coal areas. The hon. gentleman was leader of the Nova Scotia Government, and there were certain coal fields which had lapsed and had not been applied for, and they passed an Order in Council that these should be open to the public. That order was made three or four days before the issue of the Royal Gazette, which was printed late on Wednesday evening for early issue on Thursday morning. On Thursday morning early a friend of the hon. gentleman applied for these valuable coal areas known as Springhill. The Commissioner of Mines said they were not open to the public, and that no action could be taken with regard to them. The hon. gentleman's friend pulled from his pocket the copy of the Royal Gazette—which had not then reached the Department—and pointed to the Order in Council, of which he must have had previous knowledge. The official could not then refuse the request and these valuable coal mines were taken by the hon. gentleman's friend, and he was the head-centre of a coal ring. And he was the man who a few months afterwards was offering that coal field for sale in England, and he valued it at £50,000. I brought this before the electors of Nova Scotia the other day. And what was the hon. gentleman's explanation? "Why," he said, "it is perfectly true I had an interest." Mark, it never cost him a cent; he took his share of the proceeds simply for connivance in the transaction. I hold in my hand the whole of the transaction, and I have stated it before the electors of Halifax, that the hon. gentleman made thirty-five or forty thousand dollars out of the transaction. Did he deny it as he would have done if he had been clear of it? No, he admitted it, and in an unguarded moment he said I had not overstated the amount. He admitted that he had sold it for a large sum, and said that if he had held out a little while longer, he would have made more money out of it. For this transaction the hon. gentleman excused himself, on the ground that at the time he sold the property he had ceased to be a member of the Nova Scotia Government, but passed out of office at the time of the Union. But he was a member of the Dominion Government. He acquired the property while he was a member of the Government of Nova Scotia, and during the time that he was a member of the Dominion Government, he sold these valuable mines, which never cost him a cent, for $40,000, and put the money into his pocket. And yet he charged me before the electors of Halifax with dishonesty. Now the hon. gentleman says that my only right to serve with the present party arises out of my hostility to the Union. I did service in the ranks of the Conservative party during the time that it was led by Judge Johnson, but the moment he retired from the leadership of the party I found that if a man valued his self-respect and consistency he would have to seek for other alliances than with the Government of the hon. member for Cumberland. The hon. gentleman brought this scheme of Union to Nova Scotia, and I asked him to submit it to the people. He has spoken here to-night of Gladstone and other gentlemen as showing that if the Government saw marks of public disfavour they should hesitate taking any step without an appeal to the people at large. I ask him how he treated the people of Nova Scotia in 1867? There were remonstrances from one end of the country to the other. The strong public feeling was shown by the result of the elections in following years. I deny that the question of Union was ever before the electors of Nova Scotia before that time. I take the opportunity of saying here that that question never had been before the electors of Nova Scotia before the election of 1863 took place. The hon. gentleman may have his private opinion about this, as he has on other matters, but I say distinctly that the question of Union was not the ground, upon which his party was returned to power in 1863. The hon. gentleman took an unwarrantable liberty with the people of Nova Scotia, and taking advantage of the position in which they had placed him he swept away their constitution without their wish and against their remonstrances. The hon. gentleman says I was elected in 1867 on a great wave of public opinion. That appears to be exactly the observation I have made, that there was a great wave of public opinion in Nova Scotia. When we came to this House in 1867 the hon. gentleman was the only member returned from Nova Scotia to support the question of Union. We won that election; and when I came to this House, who did I find supporting the views which I have taken with regard to this question? The Reformers of Ontario and Quebec. Men,

MR. JONES.

MR. JONES.

Sir, who had publicly, here and elsewhere, expressed their approval of the principles of Union, while they were anxious these Provinces should be confederated, still never justified that any Province should be treated in the way Nova Scotia had been treated by the hon. gentleman. Therefore, it was perfectly natural that in coming here that we should cast in our lot with the Reformers, because they not only represented principles dear to Nova Scotia, but in that great struggle they sympathized with Nova Scotia and stood shoulder to shoulder with them in every discussion arising out of that question. I went back to my constituency in 1872, and the hon. gentleman has pointed to the position which I have occupied in the country from the first time I entered public life. When I was returned in 1867 I had 2,381 votes; in 1872, when I was defeated by about 70 votes, owing to the over-confidence of my own friends, I had 2,430, or fifty votes more than when I was elected on the previous occasion. I had more votes in 1872, when I was defeated, than at the previous election when I was elected. But was there any withdrawal of public confidence in me, or is the statement of the hon. gentleman that there was any change in the views of my own friends at that time correct? No; my whole defeat arose simply from the fact of over-confidence on the part of my friends, who thought there was no necessity for making any special effort in my behalf, as they considered that the opposition offered me did not amount to anything. And I venture to say this to the hon. gentleman, that if he states what he knows to be the fact, he will admit that no man more than himself and his party was surprised when Almon and Tobin were elected in 1872. When, in 1874, I was elected at the time of the general elections, I was opposed by a young man, a mechanic; he was decent enough, but he was brought out simply in order that I might not go in by acclamation. What was the result? It was this—that it was not a party contest, and one of the leading organs of Halifax, edited then by the gentleman who now edits the organ of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper), in Halifax, supported me at that time, and denounced the opposition offered me as unworthy of Halifax, and as only intended to give me trouble, and declared that it was not offered in any party sense. It is quite true that then I obtained a large majority, because this young man only polled a small vote,—800 to my 2,979. Whereas, in 1872, I only polled a vote of 2,430. And at the election in 1874, I had 200 official votes, which were cast by railway, post office and other public employes who voted at that time with the Government, for this reason: it was an open vote in the first place, and the Government had a large majority in the next place. These employes consequently cast in their lot with the Government, and gave me their support. I went back to my constituency last month, and what was the result? Without those 200 votes—because these employes are now disfranchised, owing to the fact that the Dominion has adopted the Provincial franchises, and consequently these 200 officials could not vote for me on this occasion—I, nevertheless, polled a vote of 2,981, or more than I polled with them in 1874, when I had a majority of 2,000. Sir, does the hon. gentleman mean to say, will he take the responsibility of saying in face of these figures and of these facts, that public opinion in Halifax has changed? No; if there has been any change at all, it is a change against the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper), and if any change has taken place, it is against the views which that hon. gentleman represents, because out of 770 additional votes polled, I polled 550, and that is the best evidence in support of my declaration, that the views of the county of Halifax have not changed during the last four years. I may also say that Mr. Hill, to whom the hon. gentleman has referred, is one of the ablest and most influential men who formerly supported the hon. gentleman; but he (Mr. Hill) found that if he wished to preserve his self-respect he would have to disassociate himself from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper). When Mr. Hill ran under our auspices as leader of the Government, he naturally brought with him a very considerable support from his own side, at least we thought so, and I believe that he did. But how many votes did he poll against Dr. Ormiston? Mr. Hill polled 2,862 votes, or 130 votes less than I polled last week. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) mean to say that, under these circumstances, there is any cause for congratulation on his part concerning the result? Will the hon. gentleman take the responsibility of saying that there is any change in favour of the views which he represents, or of the party with which he is associated? Sir, I venture to say this, that if the hon. gentleman lives to see the general election, and I hope he may, he will find, when it comes round, that the city of Halifax will return those who present themselves in the Government interest, whether myself or any other hon. gentleman. He will then find that the county of Halifax will return members to support the present Government by an overwhelming majority. I say now as I said last year, regarding the question of electing a successor to Mr. Power, that if it had not been for the grossest misrepresentation, and if it had not been for the promises which the hon. gentleman held out, and which could bring him before a judicial tribunal, we would have had very nearly as large a majority there as we had on a previous occasion. Sir, the hon. gentleman came before the electors of Halifax, and what did he promise them? When the late Government was in power, it was their policy to remove the workshops connected with the Intercolonial Railway to Monckton, but when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) was in Halifax last year, on the question being put to him, he evaded it by saying that this was done before he became a member of the Government, though that statement was not true. That when he was in Halifax the other day, when this question was put to him, he said it was not done until the present Government came into power. It was, however, not done by us at all. And he further said, in public—I have his speeches with me—that if they would only return him to power they would have these workshops back again in a short time. Why, the hon. gentleman knew very well he was stating what could not be carried out. He stated there, and he excused himself for the position in which he stood, by saying that it was Mr. Brydges who had made all this change, but Mr. Brydges had been appointed by the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member. The hon. gentleman went from ward to ward and from meeting to meeting, and the great staple of his argument to the mechanics and electors of Halifax was, that if they would only defeat me, if they would only give the Dominion Government another blow by defeating another Cabinet Minister, it would be the death blow of the Dominion Government; he would return to power, and he would guarantee the restoration of all these workshops under those circumstances. These are the facts. This was the argument of the hon. gentleman. He did not think it beneath him to address an audience after this manner. I think that this was beneath the position which the hon. gentleman occupies in this chamber, and beneath the position to which he aspires, though not beneath perhaps the position which he occupies in the esteem of all honourable men. The hon. member has accused the Government of holding back the election, in Nova Scotia and elsewhere, in 1874. Why, the hon. member must have remembered very well that this question was before the House on a previous occasion, when it was pointed out to him—as he well knows, for he only repeats the statement here that it may go broad-cast over the country, and do its work where the facts are not understood—that the elections in Nova Scotia could not have been held at the same time as elsewhere, because the law there was different. It required a different notice in Nova Scotia than it did in other parts of the Dominion; and the hon. gentleman knew that the Sheriff in Nova Scotia required a different and a longer notice than was required in other parts of the Dominion; but what was the course which was adopted by the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member. In 1867 and in 1872, we know well that the late Government ordered the elections in all the constituencies which were strongly in their favour, first, proceeding thus from one county to another until they had obtained a majority, or as near a majority as was possible, and then they went to the counties which they thought were against them, and told the electors it was of no use to return members opposed to the Government because it was sure of a majority. They went from county to county in Nova Scotia, in this manner; after they had secured a majority, and we well knew how that majority was secured. The hon. gentleman referred to the Government as having used intimidation at the late elections; but does he not remember that his former colleague and fellow member of the then Cabinet wrote letters which appeared in the public press of Nova Scotia, denouncing every man who would not support the Government candidate or the Opposition local candidates. Does not the hon. gentleman also remember that he himself addressed a letter to the newspaper in Halifax, saying that if they dared to return my colleague (Mr. Power) and myself, he would wash his hands clear of the duty of looking after their interests in the future. The hon. gentleman knows very well that they manipulated the electoral lists in Nova Scotia, and they would not allow the elections to be run in Nova Scotia under a franchise similar to that which was employed at the local elections. If, Sir, you refer to the Statutes of that year, you will find that they introduced a special Act in order that they might have the benefit of the votes of the railway and other public officials, whose votes they thought they could control. Why, they then had 250 officials in Nova Scotia at their beck and nod, and when the elections came round a telegram was sent from the Department at Ottawa, ordering these men, not requesting them, on pain of losing their positions, to come up and vote against my colleague and myself. And these men were marched up to the polls under the direction of the Heads of the Departments in Halifax, and every man recorded his vote against Mr. Power and myself. That telegram was sent into their public office in Halifax, and one of these officials, who was my personal friend, came to me and stated he felt he was in a very awkward position, owing to the receipt of this order from the Head of the Department at Ottawa, directing the employes to vote for the Government candidate. And I say more than this—that the railways under the control of the hon. member for Charlevoix were prostituted at that time to the carrying of electors free from one part of the county to another, and that railway passes were given all over the Province of Nova Scotia to such men as would go and vote for members supporting the Government, by the hon. member for Charlevoix. These railway passes were distributed with great freedom, and given to any man who would go and vote for the Government of that day; therefore, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) should not accuse us in regard to that matter. The hon. member has referred to Mr. Hill, and other gentlemen, who, he says, were bribed to desert his party and go over to the party with which I am associated; but I will challenge the hon. gentleman to prove this assertion. It is a cowardly act for any man, Mr. Speaker, to stand up in Parliament and point the finger of scorn and suspicion at any public man in Nova Scotia, without taking [the] responsibility of naming him, in order that it may be known to whom he refers. There are a great many public men in Nova Scotia, and we cannot now know whether the parties thus implicated by the hon. gentleman's insinuations are innocent or not. I, therefore, say it is the duty of the hon. gentleman to make that statement good and assume the responsibility, as a member of the House, of giving here the names of the gentlemen to whom he has referred, in order that I, or some other gentleman, may explain the circumstances under which the transactions in question took place, and defend themselves from the vague aspersions which he has thus cast upon them. The hon. gentleman has referred to the Government's action with regard to the winter port and the late elections, but if the hon. gentleman had watched the affairs of Nova Scotia as carefully as he has watched them of late, and if he had watched the discussions that have been going on in Halifax during the last two years as carefully as he has done during last month, he must have known that the question of the winter port was settled long ago. Does the hon. gentleman not know that the question regarding the winter port was settled last fall twelve months, and that Halifax has been made the winter port for the reception and despatch of all the ocean mails of the Dominion ever since that time. There was nothing, therefore, for the Government to do, and no means for the Government to intimidate or exercise in any way any undue influence on public opinion in Halifax at the present moment in this connection. It is known also that a gentleman was sent out west by the Chamber of Commerce to negotiate with the brokers and merchants there, respecting the making of Halifax the shipping port for grain for the Dominion. That gentleman came back after having had an interview with the Government of the most satisfactory kind, in which all his views were met.

MR. JONES.

MR. TUPPER: Hear, hear.

MR. JONES: The hon. gentleman says, "hear, hear," but after the Government had met the delegates views, and stated that they were willing to give the route a fair trial. That gentleman returned to Halifax, and reported to the Committee which sent him, that everything was now complete, and that the only thing then necessary, was for those who desired to make such shipments—for which the Government was in no way responsible—to do so in order to crown the whole scheme with perfect success. This gentleman stated that the Government had met his views in every possible way; and he gave the Government the credit to which they were justly entitled. This was before the election was thought of. The hon. member for Cumberland afterwards came down, and falling in with this delegate, he (Mr. Tupper), so impressed him with his sanguine views that he persuaded him the Government would be defeated in that contest. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper), thus made use of the bluff game which he and his party have carried on in this country: for the game which has been played by the Conservative party towards the Government has been nothing but a game of bluff. They are going about the country shouting that they have gained this seat and that seat, and they will carry others, and occasionally they—a man like the hon. member for Cumberland—comes across a weak man like Mr. Black, and persuade him, as the hon. gentleman did persuade Mr. Black, that the Government will be defeated. The hon. gentleman had done this, and if the true history of that transaction comes out, I venture to say it will be found that promises were made to Mr. Black to the effect that if he cast in his lot with the hon. member at the last moment and produce information—not information that he had but his opinion merely—and so affect the constituency at the present time as to defeat me, he should be placed in a position there as the agent for all the shipments which were to come down. I believe that was the arrangement made between the hon. member and Mr. Black; and Mr. Black; after having been sent by the Committee and nominated by myself, and after having been met by and received from the Government every consideration, and secured every arrangement which he considered necessary, at the last moment, at the instance of the hon. member for Cumberland, came out with a letter saying that there was no hope of Halifax being made the winter port under the present Government, and that the only way to get Halifax made the winter port for such shipments was to secure a change of Government, and that to defeat me was the easiest and earliest way of bringing about the desired consummation. The hon. member for Cumberland knew that his own word would not be taken, and that in Halifax any statement coming from himself would be looked upon with very grave suspicion; hence he provided himself with a letter from the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) who told us at the last moment, that he had always taken the greatest possible interest in the city of Halifax, and that he would be happy to do everything he could, if he ever had such opportunity—which

I do not think he will likely have very soon—to make it the winter port. These are a few of the means—these are some of the representations, Mr. Speaker, with which the hon. member for Cumberland sought to delude the electors of Halifax. You know very well how much attention they paid to his representations. Now, the hon. gentleman has done me the favour of reading a letter which I addressed to the late Finance Minister on the sugar question. I am glad that the hon. gentleman did so, though perhaps it was inflicting too much on the House, and I will not read it again, but the hon. gentleman must have seen, and I am sure that every hon. gentleman who heard that letter read, must have seen that the whole scope and meaning of it was simply this, that an interest like the sugar interest should be placed on the same footing as that which other industries occupy in this country. I took that position in 1873, I took that position last year, and Sir, I take that position to-day. I believe, Sir, that a large interest like this, representing so much capital, and in which so many interests are concerned in Nova Scotia, should be dealt with on the same grounds of public policy as have been kept in view with regard to other matters. I stated then, Sir, that it was simply a matter which was to be considered in the light of the legislation of the day. That legislation had granted certain protection to certain industries, and I claimed then, as I claim now, that an unquestionable right which the people of this country have a right to expect from the Government is that no one industry shall be placed at a disadvantage with respect to any other industry, and I said, in conclusion, on this ground therefore, and on this alone, and on no other ground—because I have announced that I was not in favour of protective tariffs—I thought that the Legislature of the Dominion should not hesitate to deal with a question of that kind. The hon. gentleman may make what capital out of it he likes, but any fair-minded man, I repeat, taking the whole scope of that letter and reading it all over carefully, will observe that I only asked the Government and Parliament then to place that interest in the same position in which other large interests stood.

MR. TUPPER: And let it be done now?

MR. JONES: It can be done.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Is it to be done?

MR. JONES: If the hon. gentleman will give notice of his question, we will give him an answer in the usual way. With regard to the other question, my observations of last year, I spoke with reference to the bounties granted by the United States, and my hon. colleague was not able to satisfy himself that these bounties existed at that time. I think that my hon. friend, perhaps, may have changed his mind somewhat since that time because the Americans themselves have recently appointed a commission which has shown that the bounty granted was excessive. It has now been reduced very materially, and therefore I say that is the best evidence of the fact that my views at that time were perfectly sound. What did I say? I said, as Lord Derby stated in England, that it was in the interests of and not against Free-Trade principles that duties should be imposed to countervail bounties given or a duty equivalent to a bounty by which a foreign government sought to control another market. Matters are very much changed, I am ready to admit, at the present time, and, therefore, it is not now necessary for the Government to ask of the House power to impose as high a duty as was necessary on that occasion; because, as I then stated, there was no use in tinkering with the tariff at all unless the House was prepared to give the Government power to impose countervailing duties to meet the exceptional bounties under which the Americans were sending productions into this market. The only article thus situated was sugar; and in England, when deputations waited on Lord Derby, he pointed out the distinction to which, as I think, the hon. gentleman will see, I referred to in my speech at that time. Lord Derby then laid down the doctrine, most distinctly in accordance and perfectly consistent with the principles of Free Trade, that when a foreign government sought to control a market by means of bounties, to meet that bounty by a countervailing duty of equal amount. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) says I could not differ with my colleague (Mr. Mills) on this question. Does he expect that the members of the Government are going to agree on every question, and that their minds on every minor point are to run in the same groove? What did the hon. gentleman tell us in Halifax the other day, when he was denouncing me for not, as he says, dictating to the Government on this sugar question, and for not placing myself in opposition to them if they did not make the changes which I thought necessary in the interests of my constituency? He said he took a very different stand when the Banking Bill was brought down by the Government of which he was a member, and that he had gone to Sir John Rose and told him that the Bill should not pass.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. member is mistaken, I was not then a member of the Government.

MR. JONES: That makes no difference, I was not a member of the Government at that time.

MR. TUPPER: Precisely. I was an Independent member of the House.

MR. JONES: Was the hon. gentleman ever an Independent member?

MR. TUPPER: Yes; I was supporting the Government, certainly.

MR. JONES: I was in precisely the same position.

MR. TUPPER: Precisely—Yes.

MR. JONES: The hon. gentleman says he went to Sir John Rose and Sir John A. Macdonald, and stated that the Bill must not pass; and that Sir John Macdonald asked him what he would do if it passed? "Why, I will go to the other side of the House," was the answer; and the bill, the hon. gentleman added, did not come down the second time. But the hon. member did not consider it inconsistent with his views, or the opposition which he had offered to the policy of the Government, to go into the Government at a subsequent time. Either the hon. gentleman must have changed his views on the question of banking, or the Government, which he subsequently joined, must have changed theirs, and I leave him to accept whichever horn of the dilemma he chooses. The hon. gentleman, in the next place, has pointed out a good many reasons why I should not be a member of the present Administration; and he has brought here and trailed about the old story about the flag. Sir, it would be well to know the desperation to which the hon. gentleman was driven when he had to publish that letter at the last moment in Halifax. I tell the hon. gentleman here that nothing that he could have done, that nothing that he could have said, that nothing that any friend of mine could have said in Halifax, did me so much good with all honourable men as the publishing of that letter. I heard it denounced from one end of the city to the other as a violation of confidence; I heard it denounced by men of his own party as unworthy of any public man occupying a prominent position in this country. Sir, when that letter was written by General Doyle, I venture to say it was never intended to be made public, although I grant it is not marked private. When that old soldier comes to know the use that has been made of it, I venture to say that no man will be more indignant than himself. Sir, the history of that transaction was simply this: 'It is perfectly true that General Doyle and myself were not on speaking terms for some time. I made a speech on the occasion of Sir William Young's visit, which I shall read presently. What was the result? The first time I met General Doyle he looked on the other side of the street. I said, "All right, my old friend, the street is wide enough for both of us." I knew very well that he had been lied to, like the prophet of old. I did not care whether Sir William Young—who was one of the most violent politicians we ever had in Nova Scotia down to the present moment—I do not care whether it was Sir William Young or any other man, I say that when they went to that old soldier with that story they went with a foul slander. What took place? A few months had not elapsed before I heard from different sources that General Doyle said to them that he found he had put himself in a false position with regard to myself. Time after time gentlemen have come to me and said that General Doyle wished very much that this difficulty between ourselves should be got over. Time after time,—not once, but a dozen times,—has General Doyle said to others, that he regretted the step which he had taken, because he had found out that he had been misinformed. That old soldier, with the frankness which characterized him, the moment he found he had made a mistake, was the first man to seek to undo the wrong. What took place? In 1871 or 1872, at the time of the arbitration that was going on there in the public building—when we wrested $80,000 from the Government of Canada for the Province of Nova Scotia against the opposition of the hon. member for Cumberland (Dr. Tupper)—when that arbitration was going on, General Doyle sent a friend to me and said he wished this misunderstanding should be made up between us. He said he was going to have an official dinner, and he wished very much that I would accept an invitation to come. I said, "Give my compliments to General Doyle, and say I have no ill feeling against him. I knew the time would come when he would find I had been misrepresented; and to show that I am willing to meet him half way, as I am not anxious to go to his dinner, you may tell him I will call and put my name down on his book at Government House." The messenger went away, and came back a second time, and said, "The General is very anxious that this question should be settled once for all. He has urged me to come back to you again, and in fact has given me an invitation; which I have in my pocket, but I am not to give it to you unless you will accept it," because, naturally,—I understood it,—he did not wish to be snubbed by refusal; "but he is anxious that you should come on this occasion." I met the old man in the same frank and friendly manner; and I said, "Give me the invitation; I will accept it." I went to the Government House, when the General came forward, and said, "I am very glad to see you again, let us not say a word about the past." I said, "All right, General;" and, from that day, to the day he left Halifax, he was one of my warmest friends. I was one of those who not only subscribed to a testimonial to General Doyle when he left Halifax, but was on the Committee to present an address, and to show that mark of respect to him to which I considered he was entitled; and I venture to say when these papers reach General Doyle, and he finds the base use which has been made of his letter on this occasion to defeat me by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), that his sense of fair play, and the indignation with which he will treat the source pursued by the hon. gentleman, will be made manifest, or I mistake him very much. He is an honourable old soldier, and has been dragged into a controversy here by a man who ought to respect the position which he occupied. He has been dragged into a position here by the member for Cumberland, when, (for I know the old gentleman well), he would never have permitted it for one moment, and would rather have had his right hand cut off than to have permitted this wrong in his name. And the hon. member, if he does not regret it already, will live to regret the day when he violated the confidence of General Doyle to defeat me on this occasion. Now, Sir, I said that I would read my speech. Sir, I stand by that speech to-day, as I delivered it then. It was taken down at the time—with which I had nothing to do—and the sentiments which I uttered then I repeat to-day. Now, Sir, what were they? The Governor General was paying a visit to Nova Scotia. It was shortly after Mr. Howe's secession from our ranks; when the public mind in Nova Scotia was, if possible, more exasperated than it had been at any previous time; and after Mr. Howe had left our party and gone over—bought with an office by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper)—they came down to Nova Scotia, and expected the party with which I was associated to tender a vote of welcome to the head of the Government in this country. The Governor General had delivered a speech in Quebec on his way down, indicating that if the people desired independence, he believed the British Government would freely grant it.

AN HON. MEMBER: He was advised.

MR. JONES: Of course; that was when he was advised by the gentlemen opposite. Of course, he had a member of his Cabinet with him. But not only that, Mr. Speaker, in the very first speech which the hon. gentleman put into the mouth of the Governor General, when he opened this Parliament in 1867, will be found these words:—that "To-day we inaugurate a new nationality." These were the words which the Government of that day put into the mouth of the Governor General; and the Governor General, on his way to Halifax, was only carrying out the views of the Government, doubtless inspired by the gentleman who now leads the Opposition. I said: "Sometimes distinguished gentlemen make speeches that meet my approval, and the one lately delivered by His Excellency at Quebec is of that description. We had it editorially published and approved in the Colonist, the organ of the Union party, wherein he says that if the people of British America desire a change, either of allegiance or a new nationality, he felt sure the British Government would give their prompt and cordial acquiescence. For myself, I am disposed to take His Excellency at his word, and, if we cannot go back to where we were, to go forward; and if Great Britain may desire us, as it would now appear, to assume an independent position, when she hauls down her flag and takes her last soldier from the Dominion, I have enough confidence in the intelligence of the people that they will shape for themselves their own destiny in the direction their feelings and interests would point; and whatever that may be, constitutionally expressed, it shall have, if not my approbation, my cordial acquiescence." Sir, there is not a word that I retract to-day. I say, speaking of the policy which the Governor General had announced or had foreshadowed, I was speaking of the views which the Governor General had announced at Quebec, doubtless inspired by the members of the Government who accompanied him,—I said then, that if we could not go back to the position we had occupied previous to the Union, we would go forward; and when the people of Nova Scotia, or the people of this Dominion, had an opportunity, constitutionally, of expressing their opinion upon their future position and their future interests, that it should have my acquiescence. Sir, I did not say it would have my approval; I said—because I reserved that, because I would have to acquiesce in it if it was constitutionally carried, although I might not approve of it—I said it should have my acquiescence if not my approval. Those were the words I used on that occasion. Sir, I do not take back one word to-day in the changed position in which I now stand. But, Sir, I was disloyal, it seems. This hon. gentleman has found out at the last moment—I will not say at the last moment, because he has trailed this flag story for the last seven years in this House. Hon. members will recollect that seven or eight years ago the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), when he sat on this side of the House, brought the flag story here, and I explained it then, as I explain it now; and I should not think it necessary to refer to it again, but for the fact that there are many hon. members in this House to-day who did not occupy positions here at that time, and who are not aware of the circumstances under which that transaction arose. But I was disloyal, was I? Where was the Minister of Militia under which the hon. gentleman served,—the late Sir George Cartier? Sir, did not the late Minister of Militia, Sir George Cartier, not only express disapproval of the course of the Government, but take up arms against the Government? The hon. gentleman laughs, and the hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) laughs. I ask him to deny the statement if his own Minister of Militia did not take up arms against the Government of the Dominion, and if a reward was not offered for his apprehension. The hon. gentleman says "No."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No; I did not say anything about it.

MR. JONES: The less you say the better; that is all I can say. Sir George Cartier, at a critical time, took a leading position on a public question.

MR. JONES.

Sir George Cartier,—I can say this for him, as far as I knew him,—was one of the strongest upholders of British authority on this continent. Well, what about Mr. Howe? During that celebrated anti-Confederation campaign, if strong language was used, it was used by that gentleman. If strong language could be used, no one could use stronger than that Mr. Howe used during that election campaign in 1867 and 1868. Sir, there must be many hon. members in this House that will recollect well the denunciations of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Howe), as he stood on that side of the floor in this House, the first session he came to his Parliament. Why, language was not strong enough to denounce, not only the Union and all who had carried it, but the hon. member for Cumberland as well (Mr. Tupper), and the Government of the day, and everything connected with them. Sir, he went further than ever had been gone by any man in Nova Scotia; but still, when it was necessary in the interests of the Government—when they thought they could get additional support from Nova Scotia—they forgot all these treasonable utterances; they opened their arms to Mr. Howe, and took him into their Government, and he remained in their Government until within a few months of his death. Now, that is a specimen of the consistency with which these hon. gentlemen dealt with that public question. But, Sir, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) was a member of the Local Legislature when in Opposition. The Chief Justice of the day was a leader of the Government; and the hon. member for Cumberland was denouncing Lord Mulgrave in language which I should be unwilling to quote on the floor of this House. Sir, I have no doubt he is ashamed of it himself to-day. He was a younger man then; he was not known; he had come fresh from the country, with more vigour, if possible, than he possesses to-day. He came into Parliament, and the language which he used with reference to Lord Mulgrave's action on that occasion, would not be tolerated for one moment in this House to-day. Sir, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales visited Halifax; and because Lord Mulgrave would not yield to the dictation of the hon. member for Cumberland—because he would not dissolve the House and go to the country, as the hon. member desired he should do, the hon. member refused to attend to meet the Prince of Wales when he landed. Sir, the hon. member refused to meet the Prince of Wales; and it was only when he was shamed into it by his own party, of which I was one at that time,—it was only when he was shamed into it, urged into it, driven into it by Judge Johnson and the leaders of his party, that he went unwillingly to meet the Prince of Wales at the dockyard at Halifax. And this is the loyal man that is going to teach me loyalty, is it? I respect myself first, and then I respect all constitutional authority. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has gone over all the recent victories with which the Opposition orators generally close their addresses. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), last night favoured us with an account of all the great victories which had been won in Lower Canada and other parts of the Union; and the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) has supplemented that statement to-night, and added, in his own way—subject to correction, of course—the victories which he had not only won, but which he confidently predicts in the future. He referred to the election in Digby. Why, the hon. member knows well enough, if he would state it here to the House, that there was no man so surprised at Mr. Vail's defeat as the hon. member himself. The hon. member knows that when he returned from Digby, he stated to his friends in Halifax and elsewhere that it was no use opposing Mr. Vail in Digby, because he was sure of his election, despite himself and despite Mr. Thibault.

MR. TUPPER: The statement is the very reverse of the fact.

MR. JONES: I can prove it. Now, Sir, I say here, and I take the responsibility of saying it, that Dominion politics had no more to do with the Hon. Mr. Vail's defeat than the politics of Russia to-day. It was a local question entirely. It was a question arising out of local taxation owing to the passage of the Western Counties Railway through the Counties of Digby and Yarmouth.

MR. WADE: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question? He was not present, and I trust will answer a square question squarely put.

MR. JONES: The gentleman says "squarely put."

MR. WADE: Yes, Sir. I represent myself as side by side with him. We now stand on the platform as two Confederates. He supplanted me as an anti-Confederate. I stood before the honourable electors of Digby side by side with him on the Confederate platform. That was a square question, and the county of Digby decided squarely on the question.

MR. JONES: The hon. gentleman says they stood side by side on a square Confederate platform. That had nothing to do with the result of the election. That had nothing to do with the question as between the Government and the Opposition. I am not making any observations against the hon. member for Digby; I say that no matter who ran against Mr. Vail, under present circumstances Mr. Vail was sure to be defeated.

MR. TUPPER: You did not think so.

MR. JONES: Owing to an accident, as it were, the taxes which were to be collected for the right of way of that road through the county of Digby were about being collected at the time he was running his election. Those people were paying the taxes for the first time, and the road was not finished; and they were dissatisfied with Mr. Vail and voted against him on that ground, and on that ground alone.

MR. WADE: No.

MR. JONES: Sir, I have reason to know that they have already repented of the course they have adopted. I have seen, and I am in possession of letters from all parts of the country, saying that no one regrets the defeat of Mr. Vail more than those who, in a fit of spite only, against him as the cause of their taxation, voted against him and elected the hon. member for Digby. I say, and I take the responsibility of saying here, that another year, when that county is appealed to, and the principles of the present Government are placed before them, and the past history of the Opposition and all their record are placed before the electors of Digby county, I have no doubt and no fears of what the result will be. Sir, the hon. gentleman refers to a change of sentiment in Nova Scotia. I advise him to watch his own county. I have received from the county of Cumberland an address signed by a large and influential body of the electors of that fine county, congratulating myself upon the victory I had won, and the position I hold. Sir, that address is signed by an immense number of the leading merchants, the leading barristers, the leading justices, and the leading and influential men in that county; and I venture to say, and make this prediction here—and I will prove myself a true prophet—that when the election comes round next year the hon. member for Cumberland will find ample employment in his own county. He may find the war carried into Africa; and if the hon. gentleman is understood there—beginning to be understood there, as I am told he is,—he will no longer be able to misrepresent the public opinion of that county. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman knows that he never carried the county of Cumberland unless by bribery and corruption.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Order.

MR. SPEAKER: I tried to call the gentleman to order.

MR. JONES: Well, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say nothing that is unparliamentary; but I say this, that when the hon. gentleman again appeals to the electors of Cumberland, that he will not have all those adventitious aids which formerly assisted him. I say that when he goes to the electors of Cumberland, under the strict and pure Election Law which the present Government have given to the electors of this country, that the hon. member will find that he will be in a very different position from that which he occupied when he was there before.

MR. JONES.

Sir, I venture to say that when notice was given of the contestation of the hon. gentleman's seat at the last election, that his election bills were never paid until that contestation was settled and withheld. I know very well the whole history of that transaction; and knowing that, and knowing the people of Cumberland, the position he occupies, I venture to prophesy, and I think I will be found a truer prophet than he will with reference to the prophecies that he has made, he will find enough to do to hold the county of Cumberland, if he can hold it at all. With regard to the affairs in Nova Scotia, time will tell. I think it is not worth while for any man to be boasting beforehand. We have had enough of the game of bluff from the other side. They go about the country, they go about Nova Scotia, saying, "We have carried everything; we have won here, and we are going to win there." They may impose upon a few credulous and sanguine people like themselves; but, Sir, that game is played out. I venture to say to-day that the Government stand in a better position in the public confidence of this country than they have stood since they assumed office. I know, so far as regards my own province, that all those misrepresentations which the hon. gentleman and his friends made there with regard to the policy and acts of the present Government have been explained away and are fully understood. The hon. gentleman went into a section of my county, one of the most intelligent sections of it, and I did not think it necessary to follow him. I had been there before; and I knew what the result would be when they came to contrast his exaggerated statements with the plain facts which I had been in the habit of placing before them. Instead of injuring me in that section of my country, I got ten more votes than I ever polled on any previous occasion. I, therefore, invite the hon. gentleman to pay another visit to that part of the country at the next election. That is the way the hon. gentleman's statements are regarded there. I was quite prepared myself for all that he has said on this occasion. I knew, when he made his sudden exit from Halifax, the result of the Halifax election, when he could not take part in the great festivities and rejoicings which he himself had prepared for my defeat; when he could not send telegrams to all parts of the Dominion to light the bonfires which were ready for the torch at Jones' defeat in Halifax; that the hon. member for Cumberland would not stay in the city of Halifax for a long time to come. I knew, Sir, that all this spleen must come out; and the hon. gentleman, after having cleared himself pretty well to-night with all that refers to myself, will, I hope, for the future, discuss public matters on their own merits. I think it is more becoming the dignity of a leading man like the hon. member for Cumberland to discuss public questions on their own merits, without reference to the opinions of the gentlemen who advocate them. Sir, having joined the present Government, I am prepared to take my share of responsibility for all that concerns the administration of it; and I am not only prepared to take my responsibility for all that concerns the administration of it, but I am prepared to take my share of responsibility for all that is past, all the Government have done during the time I have been a member of this House, supporting them. Sir, if I had not supported them in that policy, it would have been my duty to have gone over and supported the hon. gentlemen opposite; but I believed that the policy which they had inaugurated and carried out was in the interests of the country at large. It was no selfish and narrow policy; it was not setting section against section, religion against religion, one district against another district, advocating one policy in one part of the country and another policy in another part of the country; but it was a broad, statesmanlike policy, which was intended in the interests of the people at large. I feel honoured, as any man might feel honoured, in joining a Government which, I am sure, stands high to-day, and possesses the confidence of the people of the Dominion.

MR. TUPPER: I will claim the indulgence of the House for a few minutes. I will not take the time for the purpose of replying to the speech which the hon. gentleman the Minister of Militia has made, but for the purpose of adverting to three personal matters.

Leave being given,

MR. TUPPER said: I am quite certain that the House will concur in the feeling expressed by the hon. member that matters should be confined to the discussion of public subjects. I am quite certain that those who heard any remarks which I have made here to-night will acquit me of having attempted to deal for a single moment with any other questions than those of public concern. I only intend, at this moment, to deal with three charges brought against me by the hon. the Minister of Militia; first, with reference to the lease of the house on Hollis Street; second, with reference to the Pictou Railway; third, with reference to my being interested in coal mines. I may say, in regard to the first matter that, having learned that the hon. the Minister of Militia had stated at a public meeting in Halifax that the transference of my house in Hollis Street to my son was a colourable transaction, I tested his sincerity in that statement when I met him in the drill shed, in the presence of the electors, and I said: "Mr. Chairman, I will deposit in your hands $500 if Mr. Jones will do the same; and I will not ask him to prove that it was a colourable transaction, but I will forfeit that money for distribution among any charities in Halifax to which you may be disposed to give it, if Mr. Jones will bring me before the Committee of Privileges and Elections, and if I do not prove that it was a bonâ fide transaction and not a colourable one; that I had no more interest in the property when it was leased to the Government than Mr. Jones himself had." Mr. Jones felt it desirable—at all events he declined my offer, and thus gave the best evidence that he could, that he himself does not believe that the transaction was a colourable one. So much for that. I am still willing to deposit $500 in the hands of any gentleman in this House, on the same terms, if Mr. Jones will bring me before the Committee of Privileges and Elections, and I do not prove that the property was as much the property of my son as any property that Mr. Jones possesses is his, and I have no more to do with that property than he has.

MR. JONES: You have the benefit of it.

MR. TUPPER: I have not a single farthing. On the contrary, the property was leased to the Government at the same rate that it was leased previously to a private individual, and I have not the slightest interest in that,—no more than Mr. Jones. If I do not prove that by the testimony of the highest and most credible witnesses that can be produced in this country before the Committee of Privileges and Elections, I will forfeit $500 to be distributed among charities anywhere, if Mr. Jones will do the same thing. Next, Sir, he has ventured to refer to the question of the Pictou Railway. The Government of which I was the leader made a contract with Mr. Sanford Fleming for the construction of the Pictou Railway. We had previously let it by public tender and competition; and the contractors who undertook the work broke down, one after the other, being unable to go on with the work. Under those circumstances, the Government made a contract with Mr. Fleming, within the amount of his estimate, and for which the road had been let, for its completion. The Government of which I was a member had Judge Henry as its Attorney General. He drew that contract. It had Mr. Justice Ritchie, one of the most honourable men in Nova Scotia, and another of my colleagues was the Hon. Mr. Leonard Shannon. An honourable man of as high a character as can be found in Nova Scotia. If there was any collusion, or any wrong done, then these gentlemen—one of them put here by Mr. Jones' own advice in the position of a Justice of the Supreme Court—are corrupt and dishonourable men.

MR. JONES: I did not put him there.

MR. TUPPER: No; but he was the leader of the party in Nova Scotia who put him there, and concurred in it. That is the foundation upon which the hon. the Minister of Militia ventures to indulge in a dishonourable imputation for the support of which there is not a particle of proof. All the evidence that ever was adduced was a speech of Mr. Archibald's, leading the Opposition at the time. He challenged our act, and criticised it in the closest manner, as an Opposition member should challenge the actions of a Government. It was submitted to the Legislature, and we were sustained by a large majority; and Mr. Archibald, at a subsequent day, publicly declared years ago, that he believed that the Act was in the public interest, and the public interest had been served by it. The moment Mr. Archibald found that his name had been used, years afterwards, as having intended to insinuate that there was any private interest of any member of the Government in connection with the transaction, he came out in a letter to me in which he repudiated it, and said he never entertained such a thought. That is all the testimony the hon. gentleman has in support of an imputation only dishonouring to himself.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. JONES: Did not you ask the letter from the Governor?

MR. TUPPER: When the statement was made in my county by a candidate running in opposition to me, Mr. Archibald was quoted, and I wrote him a note to say that that statement had been made on his authority. It was in answer to that that he sent me a letter declaring that he had never intended the slightest imputation on the personal character of any person in relation to it. Now, I say that if in this House a gentleman can venture, on a foundation such as that, to impugn the standing of a public man, public life would become utterly intolerable. I appeal to gentlemen on both sides of the House if such is not the case. Then, Sir, he has referred to the Springhill Mines. Well, he knows perfectly well that the press of his party had been two years reiterating these slanderous falsehoods in the Province of Nova Scotia; and he knows that at the end of that two years I came out over my own signature and gave a straightforward account of the whole transaction. I showed that I had never had an interest in mining property in Nova Scotia to the extent of one dollar, until after I ceased to be a member of the Government of Nova Scotia, and was as free as the hon. gentleman himself to speculate in mines or in anything else. I showed that the Order in Council which was passed in relation to the mines was put by the Government of Mr. Annand on the Statute-book afterwards. I showed that the publication of that Order took place when I was three thousand miles away. I showed by the evidence of Mr. Black, one of the first merchants of Halifax, that he had no connection with me; that he had never exchanged a word with me; and I that knew nothing whatever of his action, when, with the Public Gazette in his hand, published on Wednesday, on Thursday morning, he went to the office and claimed the right to apply for these mining areas that were open to all, and for which at that moment there was no application on the record. He had his statement in his hands of the metes and bounds. Why? Because he had public access to the mining office; and taking the information he believed he had, he associated with other parties who believed that there was valuable property there. He had the same opportunity that any gentleman had to take these metes and bounds, and he had his application prepared. He went to the office and made it. I was, as I say, three thousand miles away; and the only evidence adduced is that in 1868—a year after I had gone out of the Government, and a year after I was as free as any gentleman in this House to speculate in mines—I, with a power of attorney from Mr. Black and representing other gentlemen associated with him, offered these mines for sale, and in 1869 engaged to go into the speculation with them for the development of the property and its subsequent sale. It was a most successful speculation; but it was one just as open and as free to me as a similar speculation is to any hon. gentleman in this House. I hold in my hand the statement with which I met these slanderous attacks; and with the sworn testimony of the gentleman who issued the Gazette, and the sworn testimony of the Clerk of the Council, with the testimony of Mr. Black, and the testimony of Mr. Shannon, who said he was the person who had held back the Order in Council at the first instance with a view to its reconsideration. Upon testimony the most clear and conclusive that ever a public man vindicated himself upon in any country in the world, I threw back all these slanders, and showed that they had not a tittle of evidence to sustain them. What was the verdict? I had been followed by these slanderous attacks day by day, and year by year, for two years; and when I came out and gave this vindication, and did what no man in any country is called upon to do,—proved a negative—not only challenged them to show a single jot or tittle of evidence for what they had stated, but proved the falsity of all their statements. When I did that, I appealed to the country; and what was the answer? The answer was an overwhelming condemnation of these lying slanders. His Grace the Archbishop of Halifax, the late venerated and venerable Archbishop Connolly, addressed a letter to me—the most congratulatory letter, perhaps, that any public man ever received in any country, and he came out in a letter to the Morning Chronicle, a paper that had been publishing these slanders, and told them that by their slanders they had made me the greatest man in Nova Scotia; that public opinion had risen in an indignant manner to crush these slanders; and I, whose character during the whole period of my career in public life in Nova Scotia no man ever ventured on the floor of Parliament to impugn, and nothing had ever touched my honour in the slightest degree. I, and assailed by one who up to the question of Union arising was one of my supporters—

MR. JONES: No; no.

MR. TUPPER: Yes, Sir; he said he was one of my friends. At the very period in which he challenges my conduct in relation to Lord Mulgrave, I had no more ardent supporter in Nova Scotia than the hon. gentleman himself; and it is upon such a foundation as this that hon. gentlemen are to be assailed! They had their answer on that occasion from the hon. gentleman's own constituents, who defeated him and elected a gentleman that I, in a public letter over my own signature, urged them in the interests of the country to sustain and support. I thank the House for the indulgence they have given me. I will not abuse it by saying a single word further; but I will ask permission to hand in, instead of detaining the House while I read it, a succinct narrative containing evidence which refutes the insinuation with which the hon. gentleman has ventured to assail, not only my public character, but my private character, here to-night, which no gentleman, while I was on the floor of the House of Assembly in Nova Scotia, bitter as party struggles were in that Province, ever ventured to impugn. I say more, after I ceased to be a member of that House, while it was under the control of the hon. gentleman's friends opposite, this very question of the Springhill Mines was submitted to a most exhaustive examination and investigation before a committee, and they were unable to establish one jot or tittle of evidence in support of the statement which the hon. gentleman has made here to-night.

“ OTTAWA, February 5, 1872.

“ TO HON. JAMES McDONALD, M.P.P.

“ MY DEAR McDONALD,—

“Although I have on principle refused to make any defence against the vile slanders upon my public character invented and published by the Anti-Union press of Nova Scotia—because I thought it would establish a very improper practice if a public man were called upon to defend himself in the press against unfounded calumny unsupported by any show of evidence—I would like you to be prepared to meet any charges that may be made against me in the Legislature of Nova Scotia, as I will be prepared to meet them in Parliament. Well knowing that the enemies of Union, finding our cause rapidly commending itself to the approval of all intelligent men, are anxious to assail it through me, I feel that I owe it to the country to crush their lying inventions by an array of evidence which must silence them forever.

“ You will remember that many persons interested in mining, urged upon the Government of which we were members, the policy of allowing additional rights of search to be taken out for the same area—that it was well known that this question was engaging the attention of the Government for some time previous to the 25th May, 1865, when an Order in Council making the proposed change was approved by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. That Order was published on the 28th of June, and on the 29th, C. H. M. Black, Esq., and at least two or three other persons, made application for rights of search under its provisions.

MR. TUPPER.

“On the day after the Order in Council was approved by the Lieutenant-Governor, I went on a mission to Fredericton, to arrange with the Government of New Brunswick a joint delegation of the two Provinces to England, with the object of securing the construction of the railway from Moncton to Truro. I was absent a week, and on my return was engrossed with business preparatory to my leaving for England, which I did in company with my colleague, the Hon. W. A. Henry, and the New Brunswick delegates, on the 22nd or 23rd of June. It will thus be seen that I was not in the Province on the day when the first Gazette issued after the Order was approved in Council, nor when it was subsequently published. As the publication of Orders in Council was the duty of the Clerk of the Executive Council, and for the reasons mentioned, from the time that Order was approved, the subject passed from my mind, until I read the attack upon myself contained in the Morning Chronicle of August 7th, 1871.

“When Mr. Black obtained his license to search, I was on the other side of the Atlantic, and had never exchanged a word with him upon the subject. While I was a member of the Government I steadfastly refused to have anything to do with either gold or coal mines, and when I resigned my seat in the Government on the 30th June, 1867, I did not own one cent's worth of mining property.

“Having said this much in general terms, I will now furnish you with the evidence bearing on every point on which I have been assailed. It is admitted that the Order in Council made a valuable change in the law, but it is asserted that I gave Mr. Black private information which enabled him to anticipate all other parties in making application under it. The only evidence that, in the absence of any to sustain this charge, could be required to disapprove it, is furnished by the admission of the Chronicle itself, that when Mr. Black made his application, after 10 o'clock a.m., on the 29th of June, he had the Royal Gazette of the 28th in his hands, containing the Order under which he applied.

“It is notorious that the Royal Gazette is almost invariably printed late in the evening of Wednesday, and sent to the public offices some time in the forenoon of the next day. It is not pretended that any one was refused a copy at the Queen's Printers, where it always could be had on Thursday morning as early as the office opened.

“Having thus disposed of the question of the suppression of the Gazette, I now come to the charge that the ‘Order in Council’ was suppressed for four weeks before publication.

“As I have already said, from the day on which the Order was settled in Council in 1865, until these attacks were made in 1871, the matter had not crossed my mind, and until I, last autumn, met James H. Thorne, Esq., who was the then Clerk of the Council, and whose duty it was to attend to the publication of the Order, I did not myself know why this delay had occurred. He at once said that he had recently met the Hon. S. L. Shannon, who told him that he (Mr. S.) had been the innocent cause of the delay, when they both remembered the facts as narrated in the following affidavit of Mr. Thorne and note from Mr. Shannon. You will no doubt recollect, as I do, that Mr. Shannon differed in opinion with the majority of the Council upon this question, and it appears that, as I had gone to New Brunswick before the next Gazette was published, he asked Mr. Thorne to withhold the publication of the Order, as he thought it might be reconsidered by the Council. In the pressure of business preparatory to the Attorney General and myself going to England, the matter was not brought up before we went, and Mr. Shannon, thinking that it could not properly be done in our absence, Mr. Thorne was directed to publish it in the Gazette, all of which is fully shown by the following affidavit of Mr. Thorne, and note from Mr. Shannon:—

“I, James H. Thorne, of the City of Halifax and Province of Nova Scotia, make oath and say, that I held the offices of Deputy Secretary and Clerk of the Executive Council of the Province of Nova Scotia, during the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five,—that the duty of furnishing the Orders in Council to the Queen’s Printer for publication in the Royal Gazette devolved exclusively upon me,—that the order relating to Licenses to Search for Coal, approved in Council on the twenty-fifth of May, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five, was furnished by me to the Queen’s Printer in the usual way,—that I never received any intimation, directly or indirectly, from the Honourable Charles Tupper in reference to that Order; and that the said Charles Tupper was absent on a mission to the Government of New Brunswick when the first Gazette issued after the approval of the said Order in Council, and that he was absent on a mission to England when the said Order was placed by me in the hands of the Queen’s Printer for publication; and further, that the publication of the said Order in Council was deferred by me in consequence of an intimation from the Honourable S. L. Shannon that the said Order in Council might be re-considered.

(Signed) JAMES H. THORNE.

“Sworn to at Halifax this 30th of October A. D. 1872, before me,

“GEO. P. MITCHELL, J. P.”

“I may here state that the articles which have appeared in the Halifax papers, defending me from the slanders of the Anti-Union press, were written and published without my having seen any of them.

“When it was shown that there was not the slightest foundation for any aspersion of my public character—that I was on the other side of the Atlantic when the Order in Council was published, and rights acquired under it, and my assailants were challenged to adduce the slightest evidence that I had any property in mines while a member of the Government, the Chronicle was obliged to confess that all the evidence they could adduce in support of their charges was that I had offered to sell the Spring Hill Mine. It is quite true that I did offer to sell the mine, but it was not until I had received a Power of Attorney, executed by Mr. Black, in the office of Hon. J. W. Ritchie, on the 4th day of June, 1868, eleven months after I had ceased to be a member of the Government, and which was forwarded to me when I was in England. In 1869 Mr. Black conveyed to me an interest in the property of which he held leases from Mr. Annand’s Government, as will appear by the following authenticated copies of Power of Attorney and letter from Mr. Black:—

“Know all Men, that I, Charles H. M. Black, of the City of Halifax, in the Province of Nova Scotia, merchant, have nominated and appointed, and do nominate and appoint the Honourable Charles Tupper, of Halifax, aforesaid, now in London, England, a Companion of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, to be my true and lawful Attorney for me, and in my name and stead, absolutely, to bargain, sell, and dispose of six several licenses of occupation, issued to me on the thirteenth day of June last, A. D. 1867, under the hand and seal of John Rutherford, Esquire, Chief Commissioner of Mines for the Province of Nova Scotia, and now in force, granting to me the exclusive right of opening mines, and getting minerals, other than gold, for the period of two years from the date last mentioned, at Spring Hill, County of Cumberland, Nova Scotia, within the limits in the said licenses marked Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, respectively described, being six hundred and forty acres in each license, or six square miles in all, and any or either of such licenses, with all rights, powers, privileges, and appurtenances hereto belonging, including the right to take out before the expiration of the said two years, a lease or leases of the said areas respectively from the Commissioner of Mines aforesaid, or from the Crown, for the purpose of getting the said minerals, and to make such sale by private contract; and also for me, and in my name, and as my act and deed, to make, sign, execute, and deliver to the purchaser or purchasers thereof, their heirs, executors, and administrators and assigns, from time to time, good and sufficient deeds or instruments of conveyance, and transfer or assignment of the said premises, and every part thereof respectively as aforesaid, and to receive the purchase money, and give acquittances and discharges therefor to the purchaser and purchasers aforesaid; and generally for me, and as my Attorney to do and execute all such acts and deeds as may be needful for conveying and assigning the said property in whole or in part to the purchaser or purchasers thereof, I hereby agreeing to ratify and confirm all acts that my said Attorney may lawfully do in the premises by virtue of these presents.

"Witness my hand and seal at Halifax, this fourth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight.

(Signed)

"CHARLES H. M. BLACK. (Seal.)

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of "S. B. MURRAY."

* * * * *

"HALIFAX, 19th DECEMBER, 1871.

"HONOURABLE CHARLES TUPPER, C. B., OTTAWA,—

"MY DEAR SIR,—After the repeated attacks upon you by a portion of the city press, touching the Spring Hill Mine, I have thought it but right that I should state the fact that I had no communication with you respecting licenses to search for coal at Spring Hill or elsewhere, previous to the application made by me in June, 1865, and that I received no intimation from you that an Order in Council had passed authorizing the granting of second rights to search.

"In June, 1868, when you were in England, it was thought by the friends interested with me that you could be of essential service to us in bringing the mine to the notice of English capitalists, and I accordingly executed a Power of Attorney, authorizing you to sell the mining rights I had acquired, which was duly transmitted to you; and in 1869 it was determined to convey to you one undivided fifth of three square miles, of which I held leases from Mr. Annaad's Government.

"You are aware this explanation was at your service last summer, and you can now make what use of it you please.

"Regretting you should have been the subject of so much unmerited abuse,

"I remain, yours very truly,

(Signed) "C. H. M. BLACK."

I will not detain the House further. I thank them on both sides of the House for the indulgence they have extended to me in giving me this opportunity to make this statement. I can only say that when the hon. gentleman, in the presence of his own constituents, attempted to adopt the line which he has adopted here to-night, as the only means of diverting attention from his own misdeeds—public misdeeds—he was met by the sentiment of an overwhelming majority of the electors of Halifax who were assembled on that occasion.

MR. JONES: I have just one word to say in regard to the explanation of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper). The hon. gentleman says that matter of Springhill Mines had been made the subject of inquiry by a Committee of the House composed of my own political friends. That is quite true. They found it necessary, when they assumed power, to inquire in regard to the subject to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and to which I felt it my duty to direct the attention of the House. But mark the difficulty they had to contend with. The prime conspirator—not the prime conspirator, Mr. Speaker, but the deputy of the prime conspirator, Mr. Black—because the prime conspirator was the hon. member himself—

MR. TUPPER.

MR. SPEAKER called the hon. gentleman to order.

MR. JONES: The principal operator.

MR. SPEAKER asked the House whether the hon. gentleman should proceed?

MR. JONES proceeded: The hon. member for Cumberland has impugned a statement which I made to the House. I say that the question was submitted to a Committee of the House, and Mr. Black, the friend of the hon. member who negotiated the transaction and who divided the spoils with the hon. member, refused to attend a Committee of the House when summoned to do so. Now, with regard to the Pictou Railway, I will read the speech of the Hon. Mr. Archibald, the present Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia. It is perfectly true, as stated by the hon. member for Cumberland, that the building of the road had been given out to contractors, but that, by an understanding between Mr. Fleming and the Government led by the hon. gentleman, the contract had been taken out of the contractor's hands and given to Mr. Fleming without that information being imparted to the House to the country. When the House met, Mr. Archibald, who was leading the Opposition, said:

"Everyone must see that the whole thing has been pre-arranged—that the engineer was prepared for the proposal—that the correspondence was so arranged as to make it appear as if the matter had been the subject of care and deliberation, while every step from beginning to end shows that the whole thing was a farce—that the rehearsal had taken place before, and the parts of the different actors made ready.

"We have seen the Government of this country, not in the absence of law, but in direct defiance and in the very teeth of the law, undertaking to put their hands into the treasury and dispose of two millions of the public money at their own free will and pleasure. This is an act so gross, so far in excess of any ordinary exercise of the power of the Government that it may well excite our dismay. Gentlemen will recollect when these papers were read at the table the look of blank astonishment that fell upon the countenances of gentlemen on both sides of the House on being told that that which not the boldest imagination of the boldest opponent of the Government, could conceive, and become an accomplished fact and that these gentlemen had not only dared to do this act—to take the public money in violation of the public law, but for two months had shrouded the deed in such darkness that not a man in the Province, besides themselves, was aware of the fact.

"The Government of this country, the men to whom you have entrusted the interests of Nova Scotia, descending to the miserable position of the pettiest offender, have for two months carried on the affairs of a great public department under false pretences—have been holding out a man as their engineer who was no engineer, and using him in the name of a disinterested agent, but with the reality of an interested contractor, to impose upon and deceive the entire community. I say, as bad and illegal as the transaction was—bold and hazardous as was the act of putting their hands into the treasury and taking from it two millions of money—there was something in its very boldness that redeemed it from contempt, but the miserable policy of shrouding themselves in darkness under the wretched pretext that they might thereby be in a position to make better bargains with the contractors, alike degrades the Government and the people."

That was Mr. Archibald's opinion at that time, and the hon. gentleman says that Mr. Archibald retracted that opinion. Well, I shall read Mr. Archibald's letter in reply to an application from the hon. gentleman for a certificate of character, when the whole inference of Mr. Archibald's speech had been in the direction which I have already suggested, and no other inference could be arrived at from reading it carefully. When the hon. gentleman felt it was an inference which would undoubtedly fix itself on the public mind, then the hon. gentleman, in his extremity, applied to Mr. Archibald for a certificate of character. It was in 1874. Remember this is since Mr. Archibald was at Government House, and years after he had made his speech in the House of Assembly of Nova Scotia. Hon. gentlemen will observe that Mr. Archibald did not volunteer the letter; that it was only given at the supplication of Mr. Tupper, who found that the public had settled to but one conviction with regard to that transaction, and he therefore requested a certificate of character, as I have already pointed out. The letter was as follows:

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
HALIFAX, N.S., 31st January, 1874.

"MY DEAR DR. TUPPER,—In reply to your note of yesterday, stating that Mr. Hibbard charged you on the hustings with having made money out of the Pictou Railway contract, saying that his authority was my speech in the Legislature, and asking me if I ever made such a charge against you, I have to say that I never did.

"The printed report of the speech made in the Assembly is the best evidence of what I said on that occasion, and if you refer to it you will find that it contains no such charges.

"I have the honour to be,

"My dear Dr. Tupper,

"Yours, very truly,

"A. G. ARCHIBALD.

"The Hon. C. Tupper, C. B., " &c., &c."

Now, will any hon. member, taking the whole circumstances into consideration, reading carefully Mr. Archibald's criticism on the conduct of the hon. gentleman when he presided over the Government, transferring those contracts for public works to his own engineer, by a secret agreement, not be satisfied that the hon. member felt it was necessary to go to Governor Archibald for a certificate of character to save what reputation he had left. Mark how guarded Governor Archibald is in his reply. He does not state what his own opinions were on the point to which the hon. member had particularly invited his attention. He merely says he had not made the charge and refers them to his speech. Of course he made no such charge, but his speech, taken in connection with the suspicious circumstances of the secret transfer, which he exposed in such scathing terms, could only lead an intelligent public to but one conclusion; and when the hon. gentleman emerged so suddenly from a chrysalis state of pauperism to a full-bloom millionaire, which subsequently enabled him to endow his first-born with houses and lands in possession at a most convenient time for their mutual interests; no certificate of character from Governor Archibald or any one else could change the feeling which had passed from suspicion to conviction in the public mind. Sir, the hon. gentleman was a suppliant for this certificate of character, and I have read it to the House. Hon. members will doubtless form their own conclusions.

MR. PLUMB moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

House adjourned at Five minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 13th Feb., 1878.

The Speaker took the chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

MR. PLUMB said that the debate on the Address had taken a very wide range. It seemed to have been discussed so far almost Province by Province. In the first instance, perhaps, the members for Ontario had taken part, but it being taken out of their hands by members from Quebec, and subsequently members from Nova Scotia, who had conducted a very stormy discussion. Proceeding in reverse order, he would say something with respect to the discussion that had taken place the previous evening. Elections in Nova Scotia had been the most recent stirring political events, and it had drawn public attention in all directions. The causes of these elections were well known. They arose from circumstances which he trusted would never again occur in the history of Canada—the infringement of that salutary Act which lay at the very basis of parliamentary liberty. And these infringements had not been committed by gentlemen who were not acquainted with parliamentary law and procedure, with those constitutional instructions and the general rules which governed Parliament and the country in relation to parliamentary action, but by gentlemen of long parliamentary experience—gentlemen who had been political leaders in their own Province, and who had held high official positions before they came into this House. Such were the men who had violated the Act of Parliament, and who had been compelled, at the last moment, to lay down their office as members of Parliament, and resign their seats and the trusts placed in their hands by their constituents for different purposes from those for which they had used them, and go back to their constituencies for election. One of these gentlemen had been a member of the Government. What was the result of his appeal to his constituents? It was this: an indignant and betrayed constituency, disgraced in a measure by his acts, had permitted him to stay at home, and but very scant regret seemed to have been felt in any quarter when this was known. He had not seen any of the public prints in mourning afterward, on account of that event, nor any loud lamentations raised in consequence of it. On the contrary, the scantiest courtesy possible was shown that gentleman after he had cast himself into the gulf; he (Mr. Vail) had been covered over with indecent haste, and merely a few contemptuous lines had appeared in the leading Reform organ of Ontario with reference to his exit from public life. This organ in noticing the results of that election said:—

MR. TUPPER.

“As we pointed out while the contest was still proceeding, Mr. Jones' election is the declaration of the constituency, not only of confidence in Mr. Mackenzie, but of the desire of the people of Nova Scotia to maintain and strengthen the bond of union between themselves and the western sections of Canada with which the Premier of the Dominion is personally more particularly identified.”

The bond of union between Nova Scotia and the western section of Canada was to be maintained and strengthened by the man who said he would take off his hat and cheer when the British flag was lowered from the citadel at Halifax, and explained through his connection, (Mr. Vail), that he meant to add because they could then fight Canada; and said only a few days ago, during his election contest, that the protection Nova Scotia wanted was protection against Ontario.

“But it stands to reason that the presence at the Council Board of so able and well-informed a man as Mr. Jones must tend to bring the interest of the constituency and Province more prominently into view.”

Hard upon poor Mr. Vail, this, but the unkindest cut of all followed:—

“We regret Mr. Vail’s absence from the House of Commons, the more so as his appeal to the electors was brought about by a cause purely technical, and not even from any action through which such a necessity was contemplated. But Mr. Vail, we are sure, will be one of the first to admit that the presence of Mr. Jones in the Cabinet was a thing to be greatly desired, and would give to the Liberals of Nova Scotia, as their recognized leader, one eminently qualified to hold that position”—

This was terribly severe on poor Vail. There were none so poor to do him reverence in his humiliating downfall. When they remembered what they had lost in the retired Minister, the brilliant eloquence with which he adorned his position, and the wavering of his plumed casque when he rose to address the House, he (Mr. Plumb) thought the leading organ might have bestowed more than the passing notice which was almost a reproach. But the poor gentleman was gone, they would draw the veil over him, say to him vale et valet and let him go. But very serious considerations attended this ministerial defeat. No sooner had the news reached Ottawa than the Government hastened to replace their ex-colleague by a gentleman who was said to be eminently qualified to fill the position. He had certainly nothing, in the way of disparagement, to say of this gentleman personally, but very serious questions agitated the public mind in respect to the appointment upon other grounds. These questions had been raised in the course of the previous evening’s discussions—discussions which perhaps bore evidences of the heat and excitement of the late contest. These questions still affected the public mind, and the public had a right to investigate them closely. He thought he would be only serving the public interest by aiding the investigation. It had long been charged upon that hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones), that on the occasion of a great public meeting in Halifax, he had used expressions which had compelled the late Governor of Nova Scotia (Sir Hastings Doyle) to withdraw from him his acquaintance. The amiable character of Sir Hastings Doyle, a distinguished soldier and courteous gentleman, his kindness and urbanity, which were well-known, made it evident that unless he (Sir Hastings Doyle) had good, yea, solemn grounds for doing so, he would never have assumed such a grave responsibility; and not only did these grounds exist, but he (Sir Hastings) had felt compelled to state them to a leading member for Nova Scotia of the House of Commons, who then sat in this House. Sir Hastings Doyle had felt compelled to write this statement two years after the event occurred—so that it was not on the spur of the moment, but after ample time for enquiring into and understanding all the circumstances, and for receiving any explanations that could be given for it had elapsed, ample time was allowed for making any enquiry he was bound to make before he took so grave a step. This letter had been produced the previous evening, and it was certainly sufficiently explicit. It could never have been written except under so grave a provocation.

An HON. MEMBER: It should never have been produced.

MR. PLUMB said there was a very grave difference of opinion between gentlemen of his party and gentlemen holding prominent positions on the other side in respect to the use and publication of private correspondence, not belonging to the user and publisher. The letter in question was as follows:—

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
“HALIFAX, 1st March, 1871.

“MY DEAR TUPPER,—

“More about my friend (?) Alfred Jones! Herewith I send an account of the meeting at which he made use of the disloyal expression that when the British flag is hauled down from the Citadel he would take off his hat and cheer. The Judges who were present most distinctly heard him say so, and Thomson (Howe's son-in-law) and others who were at the meeting all declare to his having made use of those expressions, and that his whole speech was of a most inflammatory nature. The occasion of his making use of the above-named disloyal harangue was at the meeting held to prevent the Governor General receiving an address, or being in any way recognized by the Local Government, who strictly abided by their decision. I have telegraphed you to-day to remind you of this speech, so that when he makes his appearance at Ottawa you may not throw your arms around him and embrace him. I do not venture to dictate to others what line they should adopt towards persons who publicly preach disloyalty, but it is but right that I should remind my friends at Ottawa that he was guilty of making that speech, and that I have sent him to Coventry ever since.

"Vail, who is somehow or other related to him, came to me some time ago, to say that what he (Jones) did utter was in the heat of the moment, and that he never intended to say what had been attributed to him—that what he meant to say was that he would cheer when the British flag was hauled down from the Citadel, because Nova Scotia could then fight Canada and shake off her yoke, but this he did not add because his voice was drowned with hisses and hooting. I told Mr. Vail that I would not sit at the same table with him until he denied his disloyal sentiments, but he has never done so. If he would even now do so publicly I would make bygones be bygones.

"Yours sincerely,

"HASTINGS DOYLE."

This was not a private letter. It was intended to be used for general information on the subject. It was intended to be made use of publicly. Probably it might not be uninteresting, as it was a bit of contemporaneous history, to read a small paragraph from a newspaper of Halifax, taken from its issue the morning after this meeting had been held. After recounting the first part of the proceedings of the meeting which was held August 11th, 1869, for the purpose of making preparations for the reception of the Governor General, the paper states:—

"His Worship the Mayor presided, and a considerable number of the most influential citizens, including all the judges of the town, were present, and after the appointment of a Secretary, the Hon. Mr. Mitchell read a motion to the effect that an address and banquet should be proffered to His Excellency by the citizens of Halifax. This motion was seconded by M. McDonald, Esq., in a few appropriate remarks, expressed in a conciliatory spirit, and deprecating the introduction of anything like political feeling. The brief speeches of Messrs. Ritchie and McDonald were well received. Mr. J. D. Nash followed in a few judicious and sensible sentences, showing that a courteous reception of the Governor General ought to have nothing whatever to do with our political differences. So far all was well, when Mr. Alfred Jones rose and began to deliver what was evidently a carefully-prepared harangue."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: So it was not said in the heat of the moment.

MR. PLUMB continued reading the letter:

"He had not spoken three minutes when his violent language produced a great amount of noise and general disorder, the disposition of the meeting was evidently not to listen to the mouthings of Mr. Jones, but the Mayor in a most peremptory manner demanded that he should be heard, and that he should cause any one attempting to interrupt Mr. Jones to be removed from the meeting; this produced a temporary calm and the speaker proceeded. It was plain, however, that what Mr. Jones wanted was a row, and accordingly, almost immediately, he gave utterance to language so unmistakably disloyal about the British flag disappearing from Citadel Hill, that a scene of uproar ensued which beggars description. At this point when the rowdiness of the Repeal party was at its climax, and the friends of loyalty were determined that Mr. Jones should not be heard, the venerable Judge Johnston rose, and the old man, eloquent though he did not open his lips, showed by his look and bearing how completely he was shocked at what he had been obliged to hear. Chief Justice Sir William Young, Judge Desbarres, and nearly the whole of the leading men in the meeting, took up their hats and left."

It seemed almost impossible that the then Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia should have had any predetermined idea of putting the hon. member (Mr. Jones) in Coventry, or of creating an impression that the hon. gentleman had uttered language which he had not uttered; nor could it be possible that Sir Wm. Young, Judge Desbarres or Equity Judge Johnston, and other leading men who heard the language and reported it, could have been mistaken. And the explanation which Mr. Vail gave in his behalf, admitted the language, but stated that it meant that Mr. Jones would cheer when the British flag was pulled down, because he could then fight Canada; while the report, published in Mr. Jones' behalf, denied that he had used the language at all. The evidence that he used it was unmistakable and irrefragable, and it was to be remembered that highly honourable gentleman, who were witnesses of the statement in question, had promptly resented it. Their evidence could not be gainsaid. Until some other, and a better explanation of this disloyal, and in fact, treasonable utterance had been laid before the country, it would be persuaded that the Government had not done well in placing in the hands of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones), however worthy he might personally be, the defence of the country, and the control of our brave volunteers. To fight Canada was to fight England, of which she was, and he trusted long would be, a faithful possession.

MR. PLUMB.

Mr. JONES: Hear, hear.

Mr. PLUMB said the hon. gentleman might say, "hear, hear," in any manner he liked, but he could not remove this fact from public cognizance. The only explanation he (Mr. Jones) had made of it before the House, only strengthened the opinion which previously prevailed; and although the hon. gentleman said that a reconciliation between him and that brave old soldier had taken place, still his manner of making the statement had not conveyed a clear impression concerning all the circumstances which had given rise to it. This, besides, did not prove by any means, that the words in question were not spoken; and the manner in which the hon. gentleman had made his statement in this relation last night had looked very much as if he had not repented of them. It was perfectly natural that this kind, generous-hearted old soldier (Sir Hastings Doyle) before he left this country, should wish to bury all animosity. Confederation had long since become a fixed fact; and the opposition to it of the recalcitrants of Nova Scotia had long ceased. That officer had naturally, no doubt, been willing to let by-gones be by-gones; but they did not know what preliminary steps to effect this reconciliation had been taken. These had not been explained. The hon. the Minister of Militia, had certainly stated — and they had a right to believe the statement, — that he afterwards had dined with the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia — but the tone of the hon. gentleman's statements only confirmed the opinion that he (Mr. Jones) made use of the language in question, and that he still adhered to that position. At a meeting held during the recent election, on Saturday night, the 18th of January, the hon. gentleman addressed it at great length, and in the course of his remarks, received a telegram announcing the result of the Digby contest; this news might have made the hon. gentleman quite bitter in his statements, though as to this he, (Mr. Plumb) of course, could not speak with certainty. He could only take a report of the meeting at which he (Mr. Jones) was said to have spoken as follows. The hon. gentleman was now present and could correct it if it was wrong:—

"Mr. Jones rose to speak * * He challenged Mr. Tupper to state an instance of the good he had done Halifax. He (Tupper) removed the workshops to Moncton. * * * If we want protection at all we want it against Ontario. We are overrun with the products of Quebec and Montreal. Erect a barrier against Canada and we are all right."

Protection against Ontario was the kind of Chinese wall which the hon. gentleman treated of in discussion, and this was what was called harmonizing sectional interests. This could be seen in the echo of the speech to which he now referred. He might here observe with regard to the letter of Sir Hastings Doyle, that the hon. member for Cumberland would have been derelict in his duty, if he (Mr. Tupper) had not made the use of it he had. He (Mr. Tupper) had a perfect right to do so, and at all events it did not come with good grace from the other side of the House, when they lectured the Opposition with reference to the reading of private letters. The exigencies of the Government, which its friends claimed was gaining steadily in the public confidence, had been so great, that they had appointed, almost by telegram, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) to one of the highest offices in the Cabinet, because, as this hon. gentleman had already resigned, they did not run the risk of opening another constituency. This was proof of the extent in which the Government was losing public favour, and was no good lesson to teach our volunteers, to let them know that the Head of the Militia Department, who had control of the defences of Canada, was a gentleman who had uttered such disloyal language as had been mentioned in respect to the flag under which he lived. This was after Confederation had long been accepted by Nova Scotia, and when it was the duty of the minority who might feel themselves aggrieved, to support with all proper loyalty the measures adopted in regard to it; and this hon. gentleman had now repeated words that were equally objectionable. This was no example to set to our loyal young men in Canada. He was astounded, to use a favourite expression of the hon. the Premier, that the Government should have taken such a course as the admission of this hon. gentleman to the Cabinet, in view of the loud-mouthed professions of loyalty they have been heard from the Premier on all occasions and in all directions. It was quite certain that the country would not and should not overlook this circumstance, and it would be a sad day for Canada when it could be brought to overlook the circumstances which had brought about this appointment. The hon. the Minister of Militia would, himself, be a constant evidence of the manner in which a Reform Government had kept its promises of reform; and he (Mr. Plumb) for one, did not regret the return of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) to the House for a brief space, for he was sure it would be only for a brief space. The position which the hon. gentleman held in the House was an evidence of the transgression of a most salutary Act of Parliament; and the hon. gentleman's presence in the House was evidence of the fact that he had been largely in the receipt of public moneys, while holding a seat in the House; and to use the argument of the late Minister of Justice, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) had had no right to that seat from the moment he made the contract with the Government and was in receipt of public money until his re-election. This argument they well remembered. Nevertheless, and knowing his own disability, the hon. gentleman had persistently, and until the last moment, which was just before Parliament met, retained that seat and voted in the House. The hon. gentleman having resigned, his return was no great matter for wonder, having, as he had, the prestige of an appointment from the Government, his normal influence in his constituency and the sympathy which a man received who merely asked to be enabled to serve out his parliamentary term—at his back. Despite all these circumstances, however, the hon. gentleman had been returned by a largely diminished majority—a majority which was meagre indeed compared with his majority in 1874. He (Mr. Plumb) had no doubt that the harmony of sentiment, which had always distinguished the Ministry since its accession to office, would not be shown in the harmonious views shared by the hon. the Minister of Militia and the hon. the Minister of the Interior on the sugar question. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) had already stated that the course of the Government, with regard to the sugar duties, was destroying Halifax; in fact he (Mr. Plumb) had heard the hon. gentleman on one occasion say on the floor of the House, that the policy of the Government in this regard was such that it was rapidly making Boston the capital of Nova Scotia. This fact might have been agreeable to the hon. gentleman, but certainly the hon. gentleman had made as severe an attack on the Government as he dared to make in view of his relations with it. He thought that the late Nova Scotian election bore their lesson with them, and it was a lesson which the people of this country would not fail to profit by; and however much the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) might find that he himself had profited by the result, he would find that his triumph would be of short duration; and he (Mr. Plumb) believed that when the question was fully ventilated by the country, he would regret that he had not taken a more private station where he would be less before the public eye and less amenable to the public censure. The discussion did not rest with reference to Halifax only, but it took a wide range over the Province of Quebec where they had had two or three specimens of the progress which was being made in the direction of the increasing popularity of the present Government. It would be remarked that not long ago a vacancy was created in the Government, which was filled by the appointment of the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Laurier), an appointment in regard to which as, respected its personality, he fancied no one could say a word. The gentleman who was appointed to that office had certainly, throughout this Parliament—during which he (Mr. Plumb) had had the honour and pleasure of his acquaintance—made himself generally acceptable to the House. He went back to his constituents with the advantage of a ministerial appointment in his pocket, placing him in a higher position as a member of the Government, and he appealed to his constituents to ratify that appointment. He referred to his record during his four years in Parliament. He had all the power that the Government could bring to bear at his back. He had some of the very ablest members and supporters of the Government sent to aid him in his canvass, and he had a sharp, active and powerful contest. He (Mr. Plumb) did not know that he might not quote some of the words that the hon. gentleman had used in Montreal in regard to other means that might be brought to his aid—"physical persuasion," or something of that kind were the words he used.

MR. PLUMB.

An Hon. MEMBER: Devices.

Mr. PLUMB: Yes; devices. Those devices which he alluded to were meant to strengthen his cause; but somehow or other the people of Drummond and Arthabaska did not endorse the political course of that gentleman; on the contrary, they did something very different. They chose to tell that gentleman in unmistakable terms that his course in Parliament had not been consonant with his pledges and his promises when he was elected, and that he might be permitted, so far as they were concerned, to remain at home and deprive the Ministry of his assistance; and they put some one else to fill his place in the House—a gentleman whom they were glad to welcome here as a sound exponent of the principles of the party which he (Mr. Plumb) had the honour to belong.

An Hon. MEMBER: What are they?

Mr. PLUMB said he should be glad to explain them to the questioner at any convenient time, perhaps not exactly at this moment, or entirely to his satisfaction. His hon. friend from Drummond and Arthabaska was rejected by his constituents, in spite of that reaction which was going on in favour of the Liberal party in Quebec—in spite of that flood of popularity of which they had heard so much, and of which his eloquent friend the hon. the First Minister spoke on one occasion, as like the torrents of the Saint Lawrence, notwithstanding its eddies and its counter-currents, a great and overwhelming flood, sweeping away all opposition. But, somehow, in this case, it carried off the wrong man, floated away the other fellow in fact, who fell a victim to misplaced confidence. What then was to be done? Where was he to find a landing? There was scarcely a constituency but would turn and rend the hon. gentleman who went back to them in the same way that it had turned upon and rent this amiable young man from Drummond and Arthabaska, who was too gentle to have received any treatment like that. He was like Acteon pursued by his hounds, and he did not know where to find refuge. Well, they found a place for him, and how did they find it? They found it by the resignation of an old member of this House, and not long afterwards a gentleman of the same name was appointed to the Senate. As people said sometimes, they might put that and that together, but he did not wish to make any insinuation. These were plain facts enough to be brought against the Government. They had been congratulated in the course of the Halifax election by the leading organ of the Reform Government, the Reform Administration, the Reform party, the organ par excellence, which said it might be noticed that the appointment and re-election of Mr. Jones gave three of the commercial capitals of the Dominion, Quebec, St.

John and Halifax, representation in the Cabinet. It was a fortunate circumstance that Quebec was honoured by representation in the Cabinet. It certainly was not the fault of the hon. member formerly of Drummond and Arthabaska. The Reform organ seemed to consider it a very small crumb of comfort, of which they swallowed a morsel and gave a little to their friends, for they had not got much of it in any direction. Before he dropped the subject which had been among the first under discussion—that of the violation of the law under which Mr. Jones and Mr. Vail were obliged to become private citizens for the time,—and it was only during that period that he proposed to speak of them,—he would show that there had been a report published in Nova Scotia upon the public printing, which went far to contradict the statements which were made by the hon. the Minister of Militia in his place last evening in respect to the low prices of the work. That report showed that there had been an enormous increase in the price of public printing charged by the hon. gentlemen to the Nova Scotia Government, where they also had a lion's share:—

“ The Committee wish to call your attention to the fact that they find thus far in their researches that $26,582.50 has been paid to them or printing altogether, of which $24,000 was paid during the past two years. Yet the returns laid upon the table of the House show only a cost of $6,416—”

MR. SPEAKER: I think I must interrupt the hon. member. I think I recognized that paper yesterday as one which relates to one of the Local Legislatures.

MR. MASSON: Mr. Speaker, I think it must be important; of course I bow with great respect to your decision. Although the Local Legislatures are independent of ours, still it is a matter of history for us.

MR. SPEAKER: Perhaps the hon. member does not quite understand the basis of my ruling. It is that it is not at all on any subject before the House. It is not a report, or even an expression of opinion of the value of any work done for the Dominion. It is for work done for the Local Legislature, and no connection between that and anything belonging to the contract for the Dominion Government is shown in anyway.

MR. PLUMB.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I beg to point out that the cost of printing, whether it is done for the Provincial Government or the Dominion Government, is the same; and it is a very fair argument, when you are discussing the cost of printing under this Government, to cite the report of a party of experts as to the cost of the same kind of printing. It is a germane argument. It may not be a comparable argument, but certainly not an irrelevant argument. We contend that the Dominion printing can be done at the same rate as the Provincial printing. Although it may be a good ground of argument that the printing did not affect the Dominion Government, is not the same kind of printing mentioned in that report?

MR. SPEAKER: The report does not furnish grounds of comparison between the two, otherwise I would say it was relevant.

MR. BLAKE: In order to show that it is even remotely relevant, it would be necessary for the hon. gentleman to say that the printing had been done at the same rate that it was being done for the Postal Department. If they had shown that, then the opinion of experts on the cost of exactly the same kind of printing might have some relevance. But when the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), in reading this statement last evening, and when the hon. gentleman who is now making use of it, have undertaken to establish the first proposition, it is obviously necessary, in order to show relevancy, that there is a similarity of price. It is not a matter of argument, it is a matter of the relevancy of this report. The report which the hon. gentleman refers to is out of order, because he has failed to show the similarity upon which the relevancy must depend.

MR. TUPPER: I may be permitted to say, on this point of order, that it is a matter of some little importance, because it is going to have a very wide and extensive application. I undertake to prove that, dealing with the relevancy of the charge made by the Citizen Publishing Company to the Post Office Department of Canada for work done, that is a question which is established by the Postmaster General, that the work performed was fifty per cent. more expensive than the same work done here. We have that basis. Now, the point that I made in citing a document of the Legislature of Nova Scotia, a report of a Committee there, was to prove that for the printing done by that same company for the Local Legislature, by the unanimous evidence of the Committee, they have charged not only double, but three times the price at which it could have been done. I agree that that perhaps is not positive testimony in relation to this, but it is very strong evidence. I maintain that, if you can establish that that company charged the Government of Nova Scotia nearly three times what they were entitled to charge, it was presumptive evidence certainly that they would not be very modest in reference to their charges to the Dominion Government. If we are able to show, by evidence, that for the services for which $4,000 was sufficient under another printer—the Reporter Office in Halifax—they received $12,000 per annum, I think you have the fair inference that they charged the Dominion Government at the same extravagant, enormous and unjust rate that they charged the Local Government.

MR. BLAKE: No, Mr. Speaker; the point is this: These hon. gentlemen are trying to say that there has been an overcharge against the Post Office Department. Now, what evidence do they bring to establish that fact? Why, they say that certain parties overcharged the Government of Nova Scotia. Now, whether they did or not is not a question with which we have anything to do. Unless these gentlemen can establish the fact that the charge against the Post Office Department was the same, or greater, than the charge made against the Government of Nova Scotia, it is impossible to refer to the charge in Nova Scotia as a matter of evidence, and it is entirely irrelevant.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: It is quite evident from the statement of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, that it is a very bad argument. There is no relevancy, he contends, unless it were the same kind of work. It is not for the House to say whether the argument be good or bad, the question simply is whether the hon. gentleman is speaking to the question. Here is an attack made upon the Government for allowing an excess of printing in Halifax, fifty per cent. over what it was done here for. It is an attack upon the Government, and the object of making this quotation is that these persons who are doing the printing at Ottawa for the Post Office charged three prices to the Government at Halifax, therefore there is a greater reason for the Government here and the Post Office Department to watch over and prevent any such charge here. The fact that these people did overcharge the Local Government renders it the duty of the Post Office Department to see that their prices were subject to strict supervision.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman thinks that it is in order to prove that the Government of the Dominion must see that the printers are not charging the Local Government three prices.

MR. SPEAKER: I think I allowed the hon. member for Cumberland to read the whole of the document, or nearly so, last evening, before I interrupted him. I did so from the fact that I supposed some comparison was stated that would inform the House as to the character of the charges made to the Post Office, and that some scale was laid down which would be a guide in order to show that they were excessive. I found no evidence from his reading it but that it was simply a report of what took place in Nova Scotia, as between the Citizen Publishing Company and the Nova Scotia Legislature. There was nothing whatever to enable this House to form any opinion on the character of the charges made in this particular instance; therefore, I thought it then irrelevant. I confess that in this particular debate the question of relevancy is not of very great importance or I should press it, because the divergencies have been so many and so great that I thought I would make up my mind to allow as much latitude as possible; but recognizing this paper again I thought it my duty to say it was the same paper. The argument, that because a party acted dishonestly and charged excessively in one case, therefore it should be assumed that they charged excessively in another case, may be an argument of some value. On that ground there may be some reason to make the statement that they did charge excessively, or to read this document in support of that statement; still I think I would be justified in saying that the document itself is incorrect.

MR. PLUMBSaid he would bow to the decision of the Chair, but he supposed it would be quite in order to read from a Return from the House of Commons in regard to the same thereof—from which he found the amount paid for printing in 1874 to be $2,420.80; in the year 1875, $10,174.74; in the year 1876, $14,189.35. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) had had a great deal to say about the effect of the presence of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) during his election, and said that his majority was increased by the presence of his hon. friend. He could only say that if the hon. member for Cumberland had not been there he would like to know what the hon. gentleman's majority would have been. They might judge some of the effects of the presence of his hon. friend during that campaign by a few lines which he would read as a tribute wrung from one of the ardent supporters of the hon. the Minister of Militia, during that campaign.

MR. McDOUGALL (South Renfrew): More truth than poetry in it.

MR. PLUMB said the extracts he was about to read were from a Halifax paper published since the late election in Halifax. The first was:—

"We supported Mr. Jones on our own account, on our own responsibility, and without reference to his supporters in any way; paying our own bills, never entering once his committee room, or advising with his party. Perhaps we accomplished something. If we did, we yearn for no eclat; if we did not, we still have the proud satisfaction that we did to the best of our ability what we could."

MR. SPEAKER.

And the writer almost rose into poetry in what followed:—

"But we fear we shall never make politicians; our impulses lie too near the surface. We found ourselves admiring the grim pluck and persistency of the man, who, though accustomed to lead in the halls of legislation, and command the applause of the assembled wisdom of the selected of the people, could still voluntarily face the hardships of a winter's campaign on a coast like this, and conduct it with such ability that this one-man power had made the most powerful, most formidable, most really successful opposition the records of the Province have shown for years, and this too after four long years of fighting the fold from the outside; this one man, coming into the enemy's camp, and alone stumping the country, and that night—the eve of the election—turning up at Sambro, after speaking for eight hours and visiting every district for twenty-five miles, still right on hand, drenched to the skin, sick, worn out, utterly exhausted, standing up in that dimly-lighted, badly-ventilated hall, and speaking till midnight. Well, 'tis no use. All the very cutting things, the witty points, the taunts, the denunciations we had cherished since his attack on our representative died on our lips. We could not abuse Dr. Tupper and we would not. Perhaps we lost some votes, but at any rate we did not lose our self-respect."

Well, there was no need to read more, though it might be well worth while to go on. We commended it to the gentlemen opposite, who had been making merry over the abuse cast upon Mr. Tupper—on the previous day the House had had the speech—incident to the occasion, and the usual arguments had come up, and there had been the usual discussion with reference to the expenditure and with regard to the influence of the Church in Quebec. Now, the gentlemen on his side of the House had never presumed to bring such a question as the latter, into a controversy upon the floor of that House. This was reserved on all occasions for the hon. gentlemen on the other side. He never knew his right hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald), or his followers to take the initiation on such questions; and he thought the gentlemen on the other side had succeeded in showing that they were, at least, not the zealous champions of the true interests of the Church or its sons, that they wished the country to believe they were. He could not blame his hon. friends for coming forward to repel the attacks which were made upon them by the leaders of the Liberal party in Quebec, in this House, such as had been made in the course of the present discussion. They had a speech from the new Minister of Justice, his first speech since he had held the appointment, which was certainly a remarkable production, an edifying speech in respect to its religious references and anecdote, and there were two or three words in it worthy of notice. The hon. gentleman went out of his way, and certainly departed far from his usual habit, to make a Protection speech, and his arguments in its favour were certainly most laughable. His hon. friend who preceded him had talked about making Canada a cheap country, and the hon. the Minister of Justice to air his Free Trade and Protection ideas, followed in the wake of his hon. friend. But his speech was brought abruptly to a close, whether of his own motion or not was uncertain, before he had quite finished with the subject; and before he resumed an argument upon the tariff he ought to make himself better acquainted with the subject. As it was, the argument was scarcely worth while replying to, but he must notice that his hon. friend the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, made use of an expression which they had often heard from the hon. gentlemen on the other side, and this was the one with reference to making Canada a cheap country to live in. It was certainly most desirable to do so, but it will not be a desirable country to live in under the direction of those associated with the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. His (Mr. Plumb's) idea of a cheap country to live in was one where the wages of labour were remunerative, where a man was able to obtain a good day's wages for a good day's work, and where the necessaries, and if need be, the luxuries, of life were within his reach. But the hon. gentleman's policy was to prevent him getting good wages and to drive him out of the country to seek his subsistence in other lands. Once for all, they must dispense with the idea that Canada was a cheap country. It was cheap to the man who had the means to buy, but a mockery to the man who had not such means. A cheap country to live in! Why California had been the dearest country to live in in the world, yet it was then the most profitable to the labouring man; for if he paid five times as much there as here for what he had to buy he obtained ten times as much for his labour. Canada could be no cheap country to live in until it would give him labour, and steady labour; and he thought the effect of policy, or rather want of policy, which has been pursued in this country for the last four years by the Government, was not to give steady labour or remunerative wages to the working man and labourer, and the working man and labourer were beginning to find it out. Something was said in the course of the discussion on the previous evening in regard to the tyranny which was inflicted upon the Province of Nova Scotia by his hon. friend the member for Cumberland, and others who acted with him, in bringing it into the Union without submitting the decision to the direct vote of the people of that Province. If the speaker, the new Minister of Militia, had ever read the debates of Confederation, he would find that in this he was bringing a very serious charge against his own party. The hon. the Premier, in support of his past and present leader—the grand old Reformer, Mr. Brown, then a member of the Government with Sir John Macdonald for a colleague—distinctly refused to have the question of the Union of these Provinces submitted to the people of Ontario. He was sure that he was correct in making that statement; and if not, it was easy for the gentlemen opposite to correct him. He knew well that it was urged, with regard to the Province of Ontario, that it was not necessary to refer the question of Confederation to the people. Although many members of the House strongly urged such a course, the hon. Mr. Brown, who was a leader in that movement, and the Premier of to-day, both advocated that it was not necessary that the question of union should be submitted to the people of Ontario; and what they argued was not necessary for the people of Ontario, they must have considered unnecessary for the people of Nova Scotia. The Canadians were the same, and the same arguments would apply to either case. The hon. gentleman must be aware that he was speaking on one of the gravest questions of the day, and he advised the hon. gentleman to be better acquainted with these affairs before he again brought a charge of that kind, which, like a two-edged sword, cut both ways. Then they had the eloquent speech of the seconder of the Address, to the extraordinary discursive manner in which he treated the duty which was put into his hands, opening up such a wide discussion, the hon. members of the Opposition were very much indebted. They were indebted to him for the numberless suggestions which fell from him during that able speech, for it had given a wide range to that debate, one which he (Mr. Plumb) was sure would be salutary for the best interest to the country, useful to the Parliament, and one which had given the Opposition the opportunity of taking up and discussing questions which, under ordinary circumstances and under the usual rule, they would not have been at liberty to discuss. He proposed to glance at some of the statements made by that gentleman, the hon. member for North Norfolk—made with that ability he certainly possessed; that ability which sometimes led him to take one side of an argument, and sometimes, with equal facility, the other. He had the happy faculty of doing so with remarkable impartiality; and, therefore, even if his latest utterance was accepted it was not easy to know his exact position, and it was very difficult to arrive at what might be called the sincerity of his convictions. He seemed, throughout his speech, to be impressed with the idea that he was in some respect responsible for the legislature and for the general financial position of the great nation on the other side of the border; and he sometimes held it up to us as a good example which we ought to follow, and at other times as an evil example which we should shun. But there had been no consistency between the various utterances the hon. gentleman had made during the last four years. He had taken both sides of the great questions which had been from time to time discussed by him, with equal power and equal eloquence, and, it might be said, with equal honesty; and he (Mr. Plumb) was really at a loss to know what the hon. gentleman's position was with regard to one question, perhaps the foremost question which agitated the public mind of this country. He has given not one uncertain sound with regard to that question. He dwelt upon the statement in the speech that nothing beyond the ordinary routine legislation required the attention of this Parliament. He entirely ignored the fact that the country was in a condition, when it did appeal to this Parliament and to this Government, for some action which would relieve the condition of commercial stagnation and manufacturing stagnation, and the sufferings of all classes of people, so far as it should be possible for the Government to take any means for its relief. That subject was studiously ignored in his speech. It was not intended to refer to it; and yet, at a moment when, more than at any other time the country required the fostering hand and kind care and sympathy of the Government, they asked for bread and a stone was thrown at them. They were met with a bold, hard speech, such as that delivered by the hon. gentleman upon a subject which was so interesting, so important, and of such vital consequence to the whole community. The hon. member himself was largely connected with commerce, and no man had better information than he with regard to the condition of the country; and yet he could be induced by party considerations to endorse that clause in the speech, which would feign that there was nothing for Parliament to meet for except the ordinary routine business. If that were so Parliament might better not have met than to meet for routine business at a cost of six or seven hundred thousand dollars to be taken from the already depleted treasury of the country. Every one would re-echo the sentiments of the hon. gentleman with reference to Her Majesty's Representative, the Governor General. Perhaps he (Mr. Plumb) might not be able to clothe his sentiments so well, or be able to pay such delicately worded and refined compliments both to the Governor General and to Her Excellency, especially to the latter as the hon. member; and he would merely say that he endorsed this part of the hon. gentleman's speech in many respects, though he might hesitate to adopt its language phrase by phrase. That the speeches the Governor General had made throughout the country would be of great service to the country there could be no doubt: but what could they say when, after his glowing, genial, warm, persuasive utterances had been published broadcast, setting forth the inviting character of the soil and climate and our advantages, the Ministry had, in effect, forbidden the emigrant from approaching our shores? The hon. the Finance Minister had screened a harsh note warning him not to cumber the prolific soil of Canada, while, on the other hand, His Excellency was endeavouring to encourage him to turn his face to the setting sun and come among us and share with us the blessings and benefits of our land of plenty and of peace. The great West had one especial need, that of population. The enterprising, industrious tiller of the soil might be tempted by its promise to cross the ocean, but he was met by a shriek of warning instead of a shout of welcome. Hon. members had been told on the floor of the House, by the present rules that it was not in accord with the policy of the Government to encourage emigration at present, for if they went into the West the grasshoppers would devour their crops, and Government would have to provide for their sustenance. That was the stimulus emigration received from the opposite side of the House. He heartily concurred with His Excellency and with the hon. member for North Norfolk, in the wish that the abundant harvest would ameliorate the distress under which the people of the Dominion were suffering. He heartily concurred with the hon. gentleman, that it was most desirable that everything that could be made out of the abundant harvest should be given to the husbandman. But he failed to see in the policy of the Government, of which for the moment the hon. member was the mouth-piece, anything encouraging to the agricultural portion of the community. He failed to see that they had done anything to supplement what the husbandman had received from his own labour, and from a beneficent Providence; on the contrary, so far as he could learn, an abundant harvest had brought with it such prices as to make it more a misfortune than a blessing. And why was this? It was because the barley from the west, the principal crop raised there, and which had yielded so abundantly this year, was shut up in the farmers' granaries, and could not be sold at 50 cents a bushel, being encumbered with a malt tax of 72 cents a bushel. This was the way in which agriculture was encouraged. He had been told that in the counties of Stormont, Dundas, Glengarry and Prescott the two-rowed barley, the principal crop there, would not germinate in the malting process with the American barley, and therefore could not be mixed with it. Upon the barley tax of those countries the malt tax fell so seriously as to destroy its value. He had heard also of two propellers loaded with oats arriving at Sarnia from Wisconsin, and, as a consequence, the price of oats at that point immediately declined five or six cents a bushel, thus, to that extent, injuring our own producers. In Iowa oats were now selling at 15 cents and corn at twenty cents a bushel. The great crops of the Western prairies were admitted duty free into Canada to compete with the crops of our farmers who improved our lands, supported our institutions, contributed to the payment of our taxes, and employed and paid Canadian labour; this competition was not beneficial to anybody, while it was ruinous to our agricultural interests.

MR. PLUMB.

MR. CHARLTON: Have they protection in those countries?

MR. PLUMB said he thought they had too much of it just now but they would have that discussion by-and-bye, and his party were ready for it. He only meant to say that when the hon. gentleman spoke of the benefits the farmers were to receive from the great crop, he ignored the fact that through the policy, or want of policy, of his friends—those whom he followed and those whom he knew so well how to argue against when it served his purpose—they were deprived of the benefits of the abundant harvest upon which in the Address they were congratulated. He believed the agricultural community, if they had not understood the injurious policy, the policy of the Government towards them hitherto, were beginning to understand it pretty well now, notwithstanding the eloquent speech of the Minister of the Interior and his colleagues at Fergus and other places. The hon. member for North Norfolk said that we should take example from the prosperity of the great country across the border during the years 1845 to 1860. He thanked the hon. member for bringing it before the House. If he recollected the hon. member's language, he designated the fifteen years between 1845 and 1860 as the golden age of the United States; he stated that that was the period when manufactures flourished, when the iron trade was greatly developed, when all classes of the community were prospering, when a tide of wealth was pouring into the country from the golden lands of California; and from the vast harvest fields of the virgin west, as well as from loom, mine and workshops, supplemented by a flood-tide of immigration, which spread over half a continent, a thrifty, hardy and industrious population. The hon. member claimed this vast accession of wealth and power, as the effect of Free Trade, and asserted that the ruling policy of the United States, during this period of great prosperity, to be followed by such great disaster, was a Free Trade policy. That they might trace the prosperity, as effect to cause, to the Free Trade policy of the country. The hon. gentleman dwelt at great length upon this view, and the same matter had frequently in that House been made the basis of an argument which the Opposition never had accepted and never would accept. They would not accept of the legislation of any other country as a guide for theirs. They held that Canada, with the exceptional circumstances that surrounded her, should have her own policy. They believed that one grain of common experience was worth volumes of musty theory, no matter from what country they might come. They did not want to govern by the theory of Mr. Mills, or the theory of Mr. Carey, or of Mr. Wells, or of Mr. Adams, or of the Chicago Tribune, or even by the theory of the hon. the Minister of the Interior. The airy unpalpable fine-spun arguments of the hon. gentlemen, had no solid, practical value—no basis in hard common sense which should make fact and experience the guide, rather than fancy and theory. The farmer would not call in the hundred conflicting writers upon political economy, to aid him in judging whether it was good for his pocket, to have the value of the products of his farm destroyed by foreign competition; and the people could judge whether it was good for them to have their manufactories idle, and their labourers without work. They could judge of this without reference to what had been said by Mr. Mill or Mr. Carey, or the Minister of the Interior, or any other gentleman who work up old theories and endeavour to put them upon the shoulders of a new country. But with regard to the argument of the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk, what would be said when he (Mr. Plumb) told the House that from 1845 to 1857 there was a strict and heavy tariff in the United States, and no such thing as Free Trade there at all? He would show the nature of the tariff introduced and passed in the United States Congress in 1846: Schedule A (duty 100 per cent. ad valorem) comprised brandy, other spirits distilled from cordials, absinthe, &c. Schedule B (duty 40 per cent. ad valorem) comprised various spices, preserved fruits and meats, cigars, snuff and all other manufactures of tobacco, and all wines or imitations of wines. Schedule C (duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem) comprised a large list of articles, among which are ale, beer and porter in casks and barrels; all manufactures of fur or articles of fur shall be a compound part. Carpets or carpeting, ready-made clothing, coach and harness furniture, coal, coke, diamonds and other precious stones, earthen, china and stone ware, iron in bars, blooms, loops, pigs, slabs, rods, slabs or other form not otherwise provided for; jewelry, real or imitation; manufactures, articles, vessels and wares not otherwise provided for, of brass, copper, gold, iron, lead, pewter, platina, silver, tin or other metals; manufactures of cotton, linen, wool, silk, worsted, of embroidered or tamboured in loom or otherwise; manufactures of glass, leather, marble, paper, paper maché, wood or wool not otherwise provided for, medicinal preparations, molasses, muskets, rifles and other firearms, sugar of all kinds, syrup of sugar, unmanufactured tobacco, fire-wood, unmanufactured wood. Schedule D (25 per cent. ad valorem) comprised flannels, cables, cordage, cotton, laces, manufactures comprised wholly of cotton not otherwise provided for, woollen and worsted yarn. Those were the principle items affecting the principles of protection. It would be seen that Schedule C protected manufacturing entirely of nearly every kind that can be successfully prosecuted in the United States by a duty of 30 per cent. The remaining leading items of manufacture were subject to a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem. A high protective tariff, the Opposition had never advocated, and, more, never desired. It did not require a very deep knowledge of political economy to teach that very high tariffs stimulate our protection. Their opponents were never weary of charging the Opposition with desiring to inflict such a tariff, and at the same time insisting that they were not in earnest in promising a tariff of any kind which should be protective. The tariff of 1846 continued until 1857. At the time when it was adopted the entire public debt of the United States was $388,000 only. It fluctuated from that time up to the time of the alteration of the tariff in 1857, but was never higher than twenty millions of dollars. But the revenues of the country were so great that the debt was paid off long before it was due, at a premium of from 15 to 25 per cent. In 1857 there was a great commercial panic, a great commercial crisis and crash throughout the country, and at that time there was a reduction of the tariff. By some strange coincidence the reduction of the tariff and the change in the prosperity of the country occurred at the same time, for, between 1857 and 1860 there was a reduced tariff. The policy of the United States, however, long has been, and long will be, he ventured to say, a policy of protection; but the attitude of the South favouring free-trade, compelled a compromise between the manufacturing interests of the South which took the form of incidental or revenue protection, but was in fact direct protection to the extent he had recapitulated. The reduced tariff was in operation until the winter of 1861, when a high protective tariff was introduced, and had been the rule of the Government ever since. The period of the greatest prosperity that was ever known in the history of the United States was between the years 1846 and 1857, after its slow recovery from the great depression of 1836 and 1837, which his hon. friend (Mr. Mills), would doubtless remember. So that during the time mentioned by the hon. member, as one of the greatest prosperity, a higher tariff prevailed in the United States than had ever been dreamt of by any Protectionist. This was the answer to his hon. friend, the member for North Norfolk. When that statement was introduced in the hon. gentleman's speech he was very much surprised, knowing that the hon. gentleman was generally so correct in his information, and he could not imagine upon what grounds he was warranted in laying such a statement before the House. There was no doubt that there were great troubles arising out of the condition of the United States tariffs since 1861; from these Canada could very easily draw a lesson, but no sophistry will bind them to confound them with those of a reasonable tariff, such as they thought were needed here. His party had been persistently and falsely charged with advocating such a high tariff for this country; it was said that they wanted to build a Chinese wall, but it is the hon. member for Halifax, a Free-trader, who wished to erect such a wall to shut out Ontario and Quebec from free relations with his Province. They had advocated, and they intended to advocate, a protective policy; and they wished the day would come when it would bring its fruits, for a tariff in protection of the interests of Canada, could not but be beneficial to the people of Canada, and could not but promote their prosperity. When the check which was put upon legislation in the United States, by the Southern members of Congress, was removed by secession of the States, and withdrawal of their representatives, pressure from Pennsylvania and New England was brought to bear on the Government of the United States, and a tariff was made to suit every body's interest,—a tariff which, without doubt, has been disastrous in many respects. But, after all, the general effect of the tariff upon the United States has been far from disastrous, this temporary trouble may have arisen from it. Look at her cities springing up and extending their borders in all directions; look at the vast increase of the area of cultivation year by year, and the general prosperity which has marked her career for the past eighteen or twenty years. She had met with a check. There had been over-production, they did not dispute that; and that did not dispute that a high tariff engendered over-production; but it was not necessary to din that into their ears when speaking of protection to their struggling manufacturers in Canada. No such proposition had ever been made or thought of by the gentleman who had been authorized to speak for the party of which he was a humble member, as had been put into their mouths by an opponent whenever the question of Protection had been agitated by the hon. gentlemen opposite, on their summer perambulations. He saw the other day, that in Illinois, which was not known as a great manufacturing State, the manufactures for the last year amounted to two hundred and five million dollars. If that was correct it was better that sum should be produced by manufacture than by mere agriculture; and nobody would tell him that it was not to the advantage of the country that cities should grow and thrive, and that we should restrict the growth of communities in those aggregations which were the centres of culture and refinement. Nothing could be more conducive to the wealth of the country than a farming community, intelligent and industrious, and loyal as was the farming community of Canada; but a country required something more. It was insane to talk about any policy which would prevent or restrict other developments of industry except in the direction of agriculture. He believed that a few gentlemen who were favourably disposed, at least to what was called by courtesy the great Reform party, held such a policy of restriction. He had seen it persistently brought forward and argued, not only with earnestness but with a bitterness and virulence which the occasion did not certainly seem to call for; and he could not understand why they could not hold their own convictions and reason upon those convictions without constantly misrepresenting the convictions of others who held them upon as good a foundation and with as good a reason as those held by their opponents. He never had known anything that had been so bitter and so uncompromising as had been the crusade against the manufacturing and other interests of a manufacturing character, by certain gentlemen who pretended to lead the Reform party of this country. He was astonished, because he did not see how any good could possibly be gained by it, and he was sure the course that had been pursued was not one calculated to advance the interests which the gentlemen had taken into their special charge.

MR. PLUMB.

MR. PLUMB.

MR. MILLS: The Kingdom of Heaven suffered violence.

MR. PLUMB requested the hon. the Minister of the Interior to take him into his confidence as to the remarks he had just made, which he (Mr. Plumb) did not hear, and regretted that his request was not complied with. He continued by saying, that notwithstanding the commercial trouble and disaster which had fallen upon the United States, to which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had so frequently referred, he had seen personally the greatest prosperity flowing out of the manufacturing interests of a large city, with which he was very familiar. He visited that city four weeks ago, and was astonished, as he drove through its suburbs, by the improvement and extensive piles of buildings which had sprung up in all directions. He was surprised to find that its population had increased from 60,000 to nearly 100,000 within the last ten or twelve years, and to observe evidences of wealth which far exceeded anything within his former knowledge of that city in which he had long been a resident. On enquiring from the gentleman with whom he was driving as to who were the owners and occupiers of the long lines of spacious and costly mansions and numerous rows and streets of comfortable dwellings, he reclined and replied that they were men who had accumulated wealth from manufactures and other industries. It was explained that the city had at one time a large wholesale trade in dry goods and hardware, but that the trade had been carried further west, and in its place manufactures had sprung up and given the people increased prosperity. That prosperity had extended to the surrounding country, and it was astonishing what a change had taken place in old farms formerly held under feudal tenure, where, on account of the restrictions on the land, in the form of quarter sales, service and labour and rent in kind, there was not the encouragement which should be given to the occupants. The gentleman who held those lands allowed the rents to run in arrears, and the farms, owing to the difficulties respecting tenure, became almost valueless. Since that time, owing to the prosperity of the city to which he had referred, and the rise of another city six miles distant, having a population of 50,000 or 60,000, built up by manufacturers, having iron works, rolling mills, a Bessemer steel manufactory and other industries, the lands in the neighbourhood for twenty or thirty miles round had doubled in value, and there great and permanent prosperity had been established, notwithstanding a temporary check by reason of the depression of which they had heard so much, and which no one could deny, and which they knew prevailed not only there but elsewhere. The universal trade depression was not caused by the depression in the United States, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) asserted; it had been caused by excessive protection. The causes laid far deeper and the consequences were more extended, they could not be thrust away by a paragraph in the Address. The House was told there were signs of returning prosperity. He failed to perceive that such signs existed. They usually began with the people, and were not usually first brought to notice through a speech from the Throne. Honourable members should first discover evidences of returning prosperity among their constituents, but he regretted to say that he had failed to find them. Anything that would show there was returning prosperity, they upon the Opposition side of the House, as well as all other patriotic Canadians desiring to promote the interests of the country, would hail with pleasure. It was a scandalous slander on the hon. members of the Opposition, that was uttered by the hon. the Premier in replying to the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), when he said, referring to a cartoon in a comic paper, that they of the Opposition were seeking to detain the spectre of hard times, and bring it to their aid in the coming election. Patriotism did not, however, all lie on the other side of the House, and the Conservatives had equal right, considering the record of the right hon. member entrusted with the leadership of the party, and who was the most maligned and most abused man in Canada to-day, to claim an interest in the country, and not to desire any continuance of the disasters that were occurring on every hand, of whatever political advantage it might bring to either, though he doubted whether it could benefit either side. They did not desire that the country should suffer what it had suffered during the last three or four years, for which he and many others were of opinion the present Government was to a very appreciable extent responsible. The House had heard from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) a little tall talk, or the old story about the Pacific Railway. The insinuation had been thrown out that owing to the tremendous responsibility which had been cast by the late Government upon their successors, the surveys of the road had been dragged along year after year at an enormous cost, and that the gentleman having had all the possible and impossible routes surveyed including that through the Rocky and Cascade Mountains, had not yet been able to make up their minds as to the Pacific terminus. He was afraid they would not have engineering light enough to enable them to make up their minds until after the next election. He was afraid there was a reason why it was not desirable, probably in their view, that a question which might have a little effect on the result of the elections in British Columbia, though he did not believe it would make much difference, should not be decided; but he thought the Government should select the terminus without delay and without fear of the consequences. The House had heard that because the surveys had been so extensive, because the Government had run lines through parts of the country where there was no chance or possibility of finding feasible routes for building the road on account of the inhospitable climate or the impracticable country, that this was another evidence of the recklessness of the previous Administration in undertaking to build the Pacific Railway in ten years. Hon. gentlemen opposite knew it had been stated over and over again that the time it was proposed to carry out the scheme for building a Canadian Pacific Railway, vast railway projects in the United States, many almost important as the one then in contemplation by Canada, were being pushed on to completion. The great railway across the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada was built by private enterprise, and the most difficult part, viz: that leading from the connection with the Union Pacific to the Pacific Ocean, making its connection north in Utah, was built through the indomitable perseverance of four or five unknown men living in Sacramento and its neighbourhood, who took the enterprise in hand and carried it to completion in four years. They had the iron upon the track at the rate of one mile and one mile and a half a day. One of the tracklayers gave him last year a memorandum of track laid at that rate under his supervision. The enterprise, of course, received Government aid, but the inception and carrying out of the scheme was due to the foresight, courage and perseverance of four or five men who took the work in hand, when no other parties would take it up, and successfully accomplished it against ten times the power of argument and sarcasm which had been expended in this House to crush the Pacific Railway scheme which the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) and his colleagues submitted to Parliament in 1871. Not only had that Union Central road been built, but it was a paying success; it had earned enough to pay seven or eight per cent. on a capital which had been enormously watered to the extent of double its cost at least; the price of its gold bonds had never been below par, even during the worst commercial depression. It could not be denied that Canada, with all its resources, great advantages and the untold wealth of its undeveloped territory, and with the whole power of the Dominion united, as it should have been, in the building of a Pacific Railway, could not carry out what four or five men unaided had accomplished and made profitable. The construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was not—as they were told by the Premier it was—a mad scheme, the advocacy of which should cause the Opposition to be held up to universal execration; but it was a feasible and reasonable scheme, which not only the Conservative party had taken up, and the completion of which, within a reasonable period, it had urged, and not urged alone and unaided, but it was in full accord with the views of the great organ of the Reform party which advocated in 1871; a scheme the delay of which would be ruinous to the country. It told them that there should be no hesitation, that the scheme should be pushed forward then while the Northern Pacific was threatening us as a rival route. They were then told by the Globe that there were no engineering difficulties in the way, and that this country should not only build the road but build it upon a line well within our own territory and far out of the reach of danger from frontier troubles or the competition of rival routes and, thus bind the provinces, so recently brought together, with iron bonds which would go far towards making the Union perpetual. They were taught their lesson by the Globe; but he could not rise to the flights indulged in by that journal when urging immediate construction of the railway upon us without delay, and without better examination or knowledge of the country than the reports of Traders and Indians—for this was in 1871. The pressing duty of the hour, it urged, was to enter at once upon the construction of the railway, and if Parliament did not promptly proceed to fulfil that duty it would be false to the interests of Canada and recreant to its public trust, and would be compelled to proceed by the voice of public sentiment. The Government took ten years in which to complete the work, although the Globe urged its immediate construction, and said that without it Confederation would be a delusive dream. No one, however, believed that in making that arrangement the country would be held to the strict letter of the law. It had never been claimed by any hon. member from British Columbia that if the Government went on with the work and evinced its honest intention to complete it within a reasonable time, it would be held to the strict terms of the agreement; but what they did complain of was the flattering, shuffling, half-hearted policy adopted by the present Government in carrying forward the work, knowing that the Government had associated with themselves from time to time, men, who, like the hon. the Minister of Militia, the hon. the Minister of the Interior, and the late hon. Minister of Justice, had pronounced their hostility to it and desired to break down and throttle that great enterprise. He would direct the attention of the House to the present position of the Pacific Railway project. He had not originated the discussion. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who possessed larger Parliamentary experience than himself, who was always put forward as one of the most eloquent and ablest of the hon. members sitting behind the Government, who was delegated sometimes to do most delicate work for the Government, such as the Secret Service persecution, and who had distinguished himself on more than one occasion by carrying out faithfully, and to the letter, his instructions. He it was, who suggested the line of comment which he (Mr. Plumb) was at present pursuing. It was owing to that hon. gentleman's masterly effort that he (Mr. Plumb) was enabled to look further into the question, and in treating it he had followed precisely the route which that hon. member, who was the mouth-piece of the Government for the time, chose to adopt. The hon. member for North Norfolk had no doubt that the best commentary that could be made on the absurdity of the original contract for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway in ten years, entered into by the late Government, was the difficulty experienced in the surveys, the cost of which had exceeded $3,140,000. That was just about the same sum, principal and interest, that the celebrated steel rails cost at the present day. Up to this time the purchase of those rails had been of no benefit to the country, except to show it what might be expected from the further prosecution of the work by men who had made such an enormous blunder at its very outset. Although the surveys had cost $3,140,000, the Government had not yet expended enough upon them to prepare themselves to decide on the route beyond the Rocky Mountains, and the pass through which a passage would be cut to the waters of the Pacific. It might have been expected that there had been time enough during the last three or four years to have arrived at a conclusion; but he had hinted at the reason, and ventured to say that the hon. gentlemen opposite would find out where they are and whither they ought to go, only when the people had an opportunity of telling them, as they would have before another year rolled round. He doubted whether those hon. gentlemen would then be ready to interrupt him with a sneer, and an endeavour to convey covert sarcasm as they had been to-day during his remarks. The hon. member for North Norfolk had been kind enough to inform the country that the present Administration had effected a saving of millions per annum, and had carried out retrenchment in various directions. He had stated that during the first year the late Government was in office, their expenditure amounted to $13,500,000, and when they left office they were expending $23,000,000 a year. Hon. members had, however, heard before the same line of argument used, the same suggestions made and inferences drawn. These gentlemen who told them that the public expenditure had been $13,500,000 at the inception of Confederation, always forgot to mention the fact that after this was accomplished large works were undertaken and that the consolidation of the Dominion was the care of the Administration. It devolved upon the then Government to constantly increase the outlay by a system of liberal and judicious expenditure which the present Government had been unable to change in any salutary direction; and he had to say that, even upon the day when this very Budget was brought forward, showing an increase in the public expenditure during seven years from thirteen millions to twenty-three millions, his hon. friend, the present Finance Minister had nothing to say except to congratulate the then Finance Minister upon his Budget Speech, and upon his exhibit, both as to the expenditure and the receipts of the country, and to tell him that perhaps he might be a little oversanguine in his future anticipations, but yet the country must be congratulated. So far as the reports preserved the then speeches of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright), he had not at the time uttered one of those comprehensive criticisms which he would have expected to find, from the subsequent record of that hon. gentleman, that he (Mr. Cartwright) had indulged in on all occasions when the fiscal policy of the country was under discussion. Then the hon. gentleman sat, he (Mr. Plumb) might venture to say, firmly on the Government side of the House; at any rate, he was supposed and he claimed to be an intelligent critic of the fiscal affairs and the fiscal policy of the country. The hon. gentleman then took no exceptions to this policy. It had been only reserved to him (Mr. Cartwright) to attempt to show to the country that there was something culpable in the then increase of the expenditure. The natural growth of this expenditure was not objected to at that period when the Government had large surpluses every year, showing a prosperity such as was never equalled in the history of the country; and when the Government not only were able to make these large expenditures for the current and general expenses and wants of the country, but also to put from ten to twelve million dollars, at the lowest calculation, into works properly chargeable to capital, though this amount was taken from the revenue of the country. These sums were not, however, charged to capital as the Government might properly have done had they been half as reckless and half as devoid of economy and prudence as their successors. In 1873 Mr. Tilley's Budget amounted to 19½ millions, an increase of 6½ millions since the first year of Confederation; there was also a large increase in 1874. This was unquestionable; and he could say that Mr. Tilley's estimates were not such as they had been represented in the general speeches that had since been made on the fiscal condition of the country, in which comparisons had been made between the two Administrations. And it was well known that in the Supplementary Estimates, Schedule A., of 1874, large additions were made to Mr. Tilley's estimates. And he undertook to say that when that gentlemen returned to the House,—which he trusted would be the case at no distant day—he (Mr. Tilley) would be able to show that the greatest possible liberty, to call it by the least objectionable name, had been taken by his successor, the hon. gentleman opposite, in adding to the expenditure of that year, after he had left the House and could no longer protect or defend himself or his policy, in swelling up a larger schedule and a larger

MR. PLUMB.

MR. PLUMB.

Supplementary Estimate, larger by a million almost than was ever brought into the House by any of his predecessors. The Supplementary Estimates of nearly 25 hundred thousand dollars had even been made larger without justification by more than a million. Everyone knew that so cautious, and so careful, and so capable a financial authority as Mr. Tilley was universally acknowledged to be, could not possibly have left over, to be added to the Supplementary Estimates of the next year, the vast sums which had been subsequently added to his Budget, and which were now settled upon him in order to conceal the true position of the country at the time when the hon. gentlemen opposite took office, and to attempt to show—and in this they had signally failed—that they had not been derelict in carrying out the economies which they had so loudly promised while in Opposition. Mr. Tilley did say there would be a necessity, owing to the fiscal legislation of 1873, of adding somewhat to his first Estimates, and that this would be about $1,500,000. The additions made by the present Finance Minister amounted to over $2,500,000; but notwithstanding all this, the present Opposition did not consider that the year 1874 furnished a fair comparison in this regard, because they did not control its final results and the Supplementary Estimates. He acknowledged that the first Estimates were those of Mr. Tilley, but the actual expenditure had not been equal to the Estimates for that year, though it was never explained by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Estimates for that year far exceeded the expenditure. There had been an increase in the public expenditure for every year since these hon. gentlemen had acceded to office, and notwithstanding the fact that the House had been told by them that certain systems of expenditure were to be terminated within two years of their accession to office, that the large amount expended on public buildings, the large expenditure for the Intercolonial Railway, and other expenditure of that kind, would necessarily terminate, this had not been the case. What had taken place? There was as great an expenditure now and a larger expenditure than had formerly been made. The expenditure in most of those great items, and in every department of the Government had increased, and it is useless for these hon. gentlemen to talk about the recklessness of the Estimates, and the recklessness of the legislation of 1873. It was in vain for the hon. gentleman who now held the high office of Financial Minister to declare on a public platform that these Estimates seemed to have been made by an infuriated and drunken crew, who had broken into the spirit room and were trying to scuttle the ship before they left it. This was not the language which should be employed in public speeches by the gentleman who was entrusted with the management of the finances of the Dominion. This hon. gentleman ought to be removed from anything like partisan feeling; his colleagues might so express themselves in violent and extreme terms, but what importance was to be attached to the hon. gentleman's statements, of what good were his Estimates with regard to the great fiscal questions of the day, if the Financial Minister was so biased by political feeling that he was capable of making use of language so unworthy of his high position? He was unable to characterize in parliamentary terms such language. He only mentioned it to show the recklessness with which the hon. gentlemen attempted to fasten upon their predecessors, the sins of omission and of commission, of which the present Government had been notoriously guilty. From those unfair statements and violent harangues, however, the Opposition could safely appeal to the Public Accounts, which were true, calm and impartial witnesses. These accounts made no such speeches. They had no personal purpose to serve, and they exhibited the facts of the case in their true light. In these accounts the condemnation of the Administration was recorded. The hon. gentlemen opposite, when in Opposition, had promised reduction of expenditure, on accession to office, and the inauguration of thorough and far-reaching economy, with an honest administration of public affairs, the supremacy and independence of Parliament and the elevation of the standard of public morality; but their record was now a batch of scandals, of recorded jobs and misdeeds, such as could be laid to the charge of no other Government of Canada. He had not been in the habit of bringing up unfounded charges, either there or elsewhere. He had waited his time; and he could back up by figures every statement which he made. There had been a profligate increase in the expenditure of every Department since this Government had taken office, and this, too, in the face of a decline in the revenue, and in the face of the vaticinations of his hon. friend the Minister of Finance, who had told the House at the very outset that the House would have to face deficits, and that we were entering upon those seven years of famine which were to follow our seven years of plenty. Despite all this he looked in vain in any Department of the Public Service for anything like that reform or retrenchment, or economy, which the hon. gentlemen opposite had been so loud mouthed in promising during the long years of apprenticeship which they had served in Opposition. He trusted that their recent experience would be a good lesson to them when they returned to the cold shades of Opposition. The increase in the expenditure for 1875 over 1873 was $2,960,000; and these figures, which the Public Accounts contained, could not be gainsaid. Not only so, but the increase in the expenditure for 1875-6, was $717,000 over the heavy expenditure of 1874-5, while the increase in the expenditure of 1876 over 1873 was $3,677,000. And if all this could be placed on the shoulders of the late Government, by those who now controlled the financial affairs of this country, he would congratulate them on performing a task which would have been impossible even to the questionable financial astuteness of John Low, of Mississippi scheme fame, and he would say they were worthy of a high place among those financiers and fiscal exponents of the day, who were rather more distinguished for shrewdness than for fair dealing; he knew that everything of which the Government had been guilty, was charged to the legacies left them by the late Administration, and they were taunted with breaking into the spirit room and scuttling the ship. He did not see any reason for recklessness on the part of the late Administration. There had been no appearance of a coming change in the Administration at the opening of the year 1873, when hon. Mr. Tilley prepared his Estimates; he certainly had no reason to conceal anything, either as to estimated receipts or expenditure. Even if he (Mr. Tilley) was capable of doing so—which he (Mr. Plumb) ventured to say no hon. gentlemen, however bitter a partizan, would assert—he (Mr. Tilley) had no necessity for doing anything of the kind. They must accept that gentleman's statements as correct; and this they were bound to do in his absence. He (Mr. Plumb) admitted that large additions had been made to the expenditure in 1873-4. He held the late Administration responsible for the items in the Supplementary Estimates of 1874 to the amount of $1,500,000, the expenditure for that year, and he thought this was stated by the Finance Minister in his last Budget Speech. And in allowing this he thought they had allowed all they had any reason or right to allow, and beyond that all the expenditure which he charged upon the Government was legitimate. He was perfectly well aware that this was not the period for an exhaustive discussion respecting the finances of the country, and he would not have referred to it had he not been fully justified in doing so by the remarks of his hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) whose comments he thought he had at last somewhat exploded. He might say, respecting the hon. gentleman opposite, as was so ably and pungently said by an authority who had been quoted with a good deal of relish by his friend the Finance Minister, during his picnic speeches last summer—

MR. PLUMB.

They taste the sweets of public life
And plan their little jobs,
And suck the Treasury—no great harm,
For it's as dry as cobs.

This was the context of some of the verses quoted by his right hon. friend in one of those eloquent addresses for which he had made himself so famous last year. He could only agree in one or two instances with the speech of his hon. friend, the hon. member for North Norfolk, and those who followed and preceded the hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. He dissented entirely from the view which that hon. gentleman had been pleased to take regarding the present condition of the country, and he had no doubt that in subsequent discussions on the public affairs of the country they would be able to address the House in language equally energetic, and he fancied somewhat more sincere, than that of the hon. the Postmaster General. They could as truly say that they had no public money and no patronage at command for election purposes, and he could add that they would not use it in that direction; and by implication the words of the hon. the Postmaster General are not free from carrying a suspicion that he might avail himself of such aids if occasion required, and that such had been the practice on the other side of the House. The Department presided over by the hon. gentleman had been the source of scandals which had startled and aroused the country. He (Mr. Plumb) predicted that there would be an indignant reversal by the people at the coming election of the verdict which they had been misled into giving in 1874. Although he differed widely in his views from the hon. the mover and seconder of the Address, he would at present content himself with the statements he had already made in respect to it, and express his acknowledgment to the House for the patient and kind manner in which they had been received.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THE SPEAKERSHIP.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. MASSON said: I ask the indulgence of the House for a moment on a personal affair, which I think the House will consider I have a right to consider painful to myself. It is an article published in the newspaper which is currently reported to be the property of two Ministers of the Crown and of an hon. Senator. The paper is enquiring into the causes which should have led this House to take a vote upon the Speakership—upon your position at the present moment. The paper goes on to say:

“This inquiry is the more curious, because even the miserable following that Sir John had made up of members who could hardly have been expected to follow him on such an occasion, who it is very certain followed him very unwillingly. If there is a prominent High Church Catholic in the House of Commons, it is Mr. Anglin; though he does not feel that his religion compels him to be a Tory, and to believe any particular economic theories. He is, moreover, the first Irish Catholic who has filled the Speaker's chair, and who has filled it with such success as to obtain all praise. He is no such man as Masson, who always puts religion in the foreground of his politics.”

You should understand, Mr. Speaker, how painful it is for me and for my friends, but for me particularly, and how discouraging it is after the position which I have taken in this country upon religious questions, when I have always strenuously abstained from ever mixing religion with politics, to have such an article written against me by a paper which is reputed to be the organ of two Ministers of the Crown and a Senator. Sir, I have but one more word to say. I would, under the circumstances, have deemed it my painful duty to vote against you had you been a Protestant; I was consequently open to vote against you though you are a Catholic.

THE SEAT FOR LINCOLN.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. NORRIS: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay this House but a very few moments, because I believe that many of these discussions that have taken place for the last three or four days might have been avoided, and we might have gone on with the work that should have been done at an earlier day. I believe that many of these matters will come up in their proper time; and the proper time to discuss them is at a future stage. I do not intend to reply to the hon. gentleman that has just sat down; but I intend to say a few words in my own defence against the sweeping charges that the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) has made against a large number of my friends on this side, and myself in particular. He has been kind enough to state to this House that I had taken $42,000 out of the Treasury of the people's money, and put it in my pocket. Well, Mr. Speaker, that may go abroad, for the people will believe such a thing from the member for Cumberland. I do not believe they will if they know him; but if it should go abroad that that is true, or has the semblance of truth, then I say I stand here to defend myself and say it is not true. I need not say more than the plain, straightforward statement I made here last year, in the last Session of Parliament, when I resigned my seat in the House of Commons, and made a straightforward, plain statement, and put that on record; and I have yet to learn, even with the bitterest opposition that I have got in my own county, and they are bitter enough,—I have yet to learn that any man would dispute my word. Mr. Speaker, it is quite true that I employ a number of a large line of steamers, and did carry steel rails. There is no denying that fact; it is quite true that I did; and it is quite true that I did receive a fair and reasonable compensation for that work, as the rest of the line did. But it is quite true also, that in doing that work in that line of steamers, that I, as a member of this House, was not aware, until the right hon. member for Kingston had brought it up on the floor of this House, that I was guilty of violating the Independence of Parliament Act. I make that statement plainly; and, as I said before, I had many among the members of the other side as well as my own side come to me and tell me that they believed at all events I told the truth. I do not claim it as an excuse, because I did not make money on the line of steamers to which I belong. It is quite true they did not make money out of the operation. We did good service, and cheap service, for the money we got. I have suffered considerable annoyances; but, Sir, the country has not suffered one single cent. We carried these rails at a cheap rate; and I will say, further, that there was no line of steamers at that time—at the time the tender was asked for on our inland waters—that could have done the service at all. It is not necessary for me to say one word more upon that score. Sir, he mentioned my name as one who had committed an unpardonable sin; the hon. gentleman forgot that on his own side, right by his left, and behind him, gentlemen who have been his supporters for many years, men of old parliamentary experience, and who should have known better than I, because I was a young member of this House—that they also were in the same box as myself. I have no doubt, if the right hon. member for Kingston had known at the time he made that charge against myself, and asked for a writ to be issued for the County of Lincoln, I have no doubt that if he had known at that time that so many of his own friends and supporters were in the same position that I was, I have no doubt he would have been the last man to have done what he did. Nevertheless, these gentlemen, as well as myself, did resign our positions, and we appealed to our constituencies. When this thing came up first, I always had believed, I always held out, that it was my duty when there was any particle of doubt about my position, no matter how small that doubt was—I believed, and took the ground, that it was my duty as well as that of every man in the same position, to resign my seat like an honourable man. I did it at an early stage; I took that opportunity, as you all know. Mr. Speaker, I took the earliest opportunity of resigning my seat into your hands, and I appealed immediately to my constituents to approve or not approve of what I had done. Well, Sir, I need not tell you what my constituents have thought of my position. I need not tell you that the county of Lincoln returned me again to the House. I need not tell you that many other gentlemen,—some other gentlemen, at all events, on the opposite side of the House—were returned on the same day as myself; one of the most respectable Conservatives that supports the leader of the Opposition to-day. But, Sir, he is put forth, of course, as a man that has never done anything. I believe him to be a respectable man; I believe he was like myself exactly; I believe he did not know he was guilty of violating the Independence of Parliament Act, any more than myself; but I do not know why the hon. member for Cumberland should make a scapegoat of me, and pass over these gentlemen. Perhaps, if we were all as well versed in political mysteries as the hon. member for Cumberland is, from what we have heard here to-night, I should have sold my boots to my son. But I do not do things in that way; I do things in a manly and honourable way, and I trust to public opinion. Sir, I do not think it lies in the mouth of the hon. member for Cumberland to sneer or insinuate at any of those gentlemen who were returned again to their constituents, and who have been again returned to this House. I believe we have as much right to our seats as any member of this House. I think it is time that these charges and recriminations were put an end to. I need not tell you that my election at that time in Lincoln was an isolated one. I need not tell you of the efforts that were made by the Opposition to defeat me. I was put forth as a man that was holding up for a foreign Government in Ottawa. My opponents went to Government officers and Government employes that had been appointed by the Opposition when they were in power, and they told them if they could only defeat me the Government at Ottawa must resign. Well, I do not really know, myself, nor do I believe now, that I had any such influence or such power; but at all events that was the tactic used by the Opposition; and in their extremity they sent for the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), to go over to Lincoln, and the hon. gentleman did go over to Lincoln. He spoke there at a very large meeting of over a thousand of my fellow citizens; and I can only say I do not believe that the hon. member for Cumberland will go back to Lincoln again. Sir, I only state what they said themselves, that he lost the election—that he was the cause of their losing the election. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I only state what some of my opponents have said upon that occasion.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I thought it was the merits of my hon. friend that caused him to be elected, and not the speech of the hon. member for Cumberland.

MR. NORRIS: Mr Speaker, I noticed that the hon. member for Cumberland stated here, in a sweeping charge last night, that the Government in all these elections had used influence to corrupt the electors; that promises were made, and that every means were used by the Government to elect their supporters in these isolated elections that have taken place since we met in this House last Session. Sir, I defy the hon. member for Cumberland, or any other member, or any other man, in the county of Lincoln or anywhere else, to say that any influence was used on my part, or on the part of the Government for me, in any way to influence that election. I stood upon my own ground; I advocated my own cause; I told the truth—what probably some others that went to Lincoln did not—and I am glad to say that I was elected without any Government influence. I will tell you how far Government influence was in my favour. It is true that when it was known by my supporters that the hon. member for Cumberland was coming there, they were taken by surprise, of course, because it was jumped upon them at a moment when I was away from the place on a tour in the back parts of the county, and on my arrival home they told me that Mr. Tupper was coming that evening, and they said they had telegraphed to Mr. Mackenzie, I believe, and two or three other members, to come. I told them they had done wrong; I did not want any member of the Government there; and the Government very properly and wisely refused to go to the county of Lincoln to assist me. I defy the hon. member for Cumberland, or any other man, to say that I used one single promise, or anything else, to influence the electors, more than to proclaim to them that I was a supporter of the Government. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cumberland stated here last evening that he prophesied, and that he was a true prophet; and that at the next general election we will see this great Conservative reaction taking place. It is not the first time that the hon. member for Cumberland has been a false prophet; it is not the second time he has been a false prophet. The hon. member for Cumberland left St. Catharines on a Monday morning, or Sunday, I am not sure which—considerable dispute arose on that question I believe—but he went to Toronto, and he told his friends in Toronto that the county of Lincoln was sure to go for the Opposition; and everything was in readiness, both there and at St. Catharines in the county of Lincoln, to celebrate that wonderful reaction that was to take place. Well, Mr. Speaker, on that occasion, the hon. member for Cumberland was a false prophet. I have no doubt whatever that the hon. member for Cumberland, as my friend the Minister of Militia stated last night, had told his friends that Mr. Jones would be defeated at Halifax; but he was a false prophet upon that occasion also; and I have no doubt he will be a false prophet when the general election comes. My friend the hon. member for Cumberland stated last evening that all they had to do was to set up the members on their side, and they would be elected. Well, they did set up a member in the county of Lincoln against myself—a member of no mean ability, there can be no question of that—a member of gigantic strength and gigantic intellect—a man that probably is equal to the member for Cumberland himself,—but the Reform party of the county of Lincoln returned me in spite of all they could do against me. In the city of St. Catharines, in which I have lived for some years, the great expectation of the Conservative party was that they were to gain the election, and that I was to be defeated. Everything was in readiness to make the great rejoicings which took place on that occasion. Perhaps, with all the contest that my friend had in Halifax, we had just as exciting a contest as they had there. A gentleman from a distance was telegraphed to on the day of the election. My good friend the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) was sent for on that occasion, and he came there—

MR. PLUMB: I was not sent there on that occasion.

MR. NORRIS: He came there with the view of making a great oration; he was to make the spread-eagle speech that would tell the people of St. Catharines, and the people of the world, that the reaction had taken place. He was to enjoy himself at this great wine supper of my friend. I saw him—I am not mistaken in the gentleman, I know him well—I saw him coming into the town in the evening, and I also saw him going out in the evening. He did not go out exactly as pleasant as he came in, I assure you. He expected to be the great orator of the evening at these great rejoicings; but he was very much mistaken. That did not take place. The hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) went home very much discomfited, and very much annoyed over the matter. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to delay this House any longer, because I believe that we should go on with business; and these criminations and recriminations which have been going on here for the last few days should be left at home in the different Provinces from which they came. I would not have said one single word to-night, were it not to defend myself against the charge which the hon. member for Cumberland has made against me.

MR NORRIS.

THE ADDRESS.

MR. SINCLAIR said that in the fertile agricultural Province from which he came, there had fortunately been no political campaign this year; therefore, he was not going to inflict a speech upon the House on that subject. But there were two or three paragraphs in the Speech from the Throne that he wished to allude to. The first was the arbitration of the fishery claims under the terms of the Washington Treaty. He believed, when these claims were paid, there would be about $4,000,000 going into the Dominion Treasury after paying expenses and giving Newfoundland the share that belonged to them. Four millions of money at 5 per cent. would be $200,000; and if the fisheries were worth $200,000 a year, he hoped the Government of the day, whoever they might be, would see that these fisheries were fostered. He believed the best fisheries in the St. Lawrence were at Prince Edward Island; and the strongest evidence before the Commissioners proves that Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island fisheries were the most valuable mackerel fisheries in North America. He hoped the Government would see that the improvement of their harbours and fostering of their fisheries were carried out in a handsome manner. Another subject in the speech was the liquor traffic. He was happy to see that the Government of the day at last saw their way clear to bring down, in a Speech from the Throne, notice that they intended to bring in a bill to be general over the whole Provinces. This question had been agitated in the Dominion from one end of it to the other; and of late the Government had been induced to take hold of it in a different manner from what they ever did before. The conviction was almost unanimous now that liquor should be abolished out of the country; and he hoped the bill of the Government would be of such a nature as would enable the people to work effectually the abolition of the liquor traffic. Another clause on which he wished to make a few remarks was that in regard to our good crops, the abundant harvest reaped in all quarters of the Dominion, and the increase in the revenue returns on that account, showing that the hard times are likely to be passing away. He fully agreed with the Government in that; he believed we had seen the worst of the hard times; we might not have the improvement that some expected in a very short time; but he believed the time had gone past when so many of our mercantile community had burdened themselves on account of overtrading. The hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) had stated that this country would never prosper except under an increase in the protective tariff. He begged to differ with the hon. gentleman. His conviction was that a 15 per cent. tariff would yield more revenue to the Dominion of Canada than any other figure they might place it at. He believed the increase of the tariff to 17½ per cent. was an error. At the time of Confederation, there was a pretty clear understanding that the revenue tariff was to be fixed at 15 per cent. He thought that when the Government changed it from that they went astray; and any Government that would raise it higher would go farther astray.

MR. BUNSTER said he wished to review the Speech as a whole. It opened with the statement that "nothing beyond the ordinary business of the country requires your attendance." Here he begged to differ, inasmuch as he thought there were things in connection with the Dominion at large, which very much required consideration. There was nothing said definitely in the Speech as to when the Pacific Railway would be commenced. It was well known to the people of the Dominion, and to their shame, that faith had been broken with the Pacific Province as regarded the commencement of that railroad, notwithstanding the Carnarvon award, granting another year for a further survey, when they had a survey complete some three or four years ago, sufficient to commence the construction of this all-important national undertaking. The Government had been surveying the Fraser River route, which everyone knew was not so eligible as that which they had already surveyed. That was an expenditure entirely unnecessary and uncalled for. The hon. seconder of the Address had stated that the depression in Canada resulted from the hard times in the United States. He differed from the hon. member for North Norfolk, in the opinion that the depression in the United States, affected Canada so much. The people of this Dominion should rely on their own resources, and build their own railway as the people of the United States had done, instead of squabbling over political questions. This had always been a drawback to the advancement of Canada. When British Columbia entered the Confederation it did so in good faith, believing that the people of the Dominion would carry out their pledge and build the Pacific Railway according to the terms of Union, which could easily have been done, as had been shown by the construction of the Union and Central Pacific Railways, across the continent in three years and a few months, the people of the United States at the same time carrying on a great civil war. But in Canada we had been carrying on bitter political struggles which had prevented the railway being proceeded with. The Government, it was true, sent some rails out to Victoria, British Columbia, where they had been lying rusting, in the place of being placed as they should have been on a line of railway from Nanaimo to Esquimalt, which was part and parcel of the Canadian Pacific Railway, for if it were not so the Government had no right to bring it before the House. The Government possessed an advantage in discussing the question, as compared with private members, who had not access to the engineer's reports. He remembered that a year ago there was much harping by hon. members on the Carnarvon, terms as there was now in respect to political matters in each hon. member's district. They might, however, rely that if they were worthy of being returned, their constituents, who were the best judges, would send them back, and instead of alluding to that matter, as had been done during the Debate, they should put their shoulders to the wheel and push forward the Canadian Pacific Railway.

MR. METHOT said that the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who had preceded him, had, above all, based their arguments on two facts. They, in the first place, pretended that the commercial crisis, which, during a long time past, had hung over the country, was on the point of disappearing, and that this depression had been experienced less severely in this than in any other country; and in the second place they argued that it was not the fault of the Government if the country was not in a prosperous condition; and they had also endeavoured to make the House believe that the country was satisfied with the policy of this Liberal Government under these circumstances. He admitted, with the Speech from the Throne, that, thanks to a kind Providence, the crop was quite good in all parts of the country. He accused the Government of not having profited by that abundance; on the other hand, the fact that the crop was abundant was not owing to the Government; but it was in consequence of the policy which the Government had followed that our farmers had been obliged to sacrifice their produce, being forced to sell it for nothing or almost nothing.

MR. BUNSTER.

God had not been so extremely unjust as to reserve this abundance to our country alone. If the Government, in place of leaving our markets open to the slaughtering in it of foreign productions to our great injury, had granted the country a reasonable degree of protection, our farmers to-day would find an opening for the sale of their products; our money would remain in the country; our population would commence to pay their debts, and we would not have witnessed as many financial disasters as we had done. Now, then, they alleged on the other side of the House that this crisis was felt in this country less severely than elsewhere; but how was it then that in the United States during the past year the number of bankruptcies had diminished from day to day, while in Canada these bankruptcies had increased in number daily? It was easy to explain this state of things. The United States enjoyed the benefits of decided protection; and profiting from the abundance of the present time, and the money which was obtained for their produce, was there distributed among their own population. In that country, thanks to the protective system, the farmers and the manufacturers had found a remunerative opening for the sale of their products, while in a young and free-trade country like ours, owing to foreign competition, our agricultural, as well as our commercial interests, were ruined. Did hon. members believe that the people were not sufficiently intelligent to understand these facts? This was certainly not the case, and the strength of the Conservative reaction which was passing over the whole country was sure proof of the fact that the people understood the real state of affairs. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue—who, he regretted, was not in his seat—had attempted on Monday last to pass the electors of the county of Drummond and Arthabaska off for imbeciles, but he affirmed it was simply because these electors of the county of Drummond and Arthabaska were intelligent, and because they had understood, and witnessed the manner in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) had acted, that they had driven him (Mr.

Laurier) from that county. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) had the other day stated "that if he (Mr. Méthot) had a seat in this House it was because he had no right to sit in the Local Parliament for the Province of Quebec." If he (Mr. Méthot) occupied a seat in the House of Commons as the representative of the county of Nicolet, it was because the electors of the county of Nicolet had been satisfied with the manner in which he had represented them for the space of five years in the Local Parliament; and they chose the first occasion that presented itself to manifest this confidence in him by sending him to occupy a seat which was still higher than the one he had formerly held. Could the hon. member for Quebec East say as much with regard to the electors of his former county of Drummond and Arthabaska? Certainly not. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had succeeded in seizing upon the confidence of the electors of Drummond and Arthabaska, owing to the splendid promises which he had made, and also in consequence of his brilliant speeches in the Parliament of Quebec in favour of Protection to our manufacturing and agricultural interests, followed as they were by his having proved himself false to these his pledges. And if the electors of that fine county had driven him from it in ignominy, it was not, as the hon. gentleman pretended, because it was rumoured in the county that he (Mr. Laurier) was a Protestant Minister, but because they perceived he (Mr. Laurier) had deceived them, and because they saw that after he had preached Protection at Quebec, he had become a Free-trader at Ottawa. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue by aid of his promises had succeeded in securing his return for the electoral district of Quebec East; but he had better beware, for the electors of that constituency were not patient, and they would soon discover the real character of their present representative and the value of the promises which he had made them. The hon. gentleman, under these circumstances, would doubtless again seek to try his fate in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska; but his speech of Monday evening last had effectually closed that door upon him, if indeed any door was then open to the hon. gentleman. He would not conclude without touching upon another paragraph of the resolution in reply to the Speech from the Throne, by which he had been struck in the twelfth paragraph. He believed it was stated that on the colonization of the North-West Territories depended in a great measure the future prosperity of this country, and he heartily concurred in this declaration; but why, he would ask, should we go to foreign countries to bring from thence immigrants in order to people those vast solitudes in the west, while we had a numerous population all ready to go and establish themselves in Manitoba. He referred to the Canadian population which at the present time was languishing in the United States. He hoped that the Government would do all in its power to favour the repatriation of our countrymen at present in the United States, and he trusted such efforts would have the effect of directing a vast current of immigration from the United States to the regions of the North-West. In closing, he desired to thank the hon. member for Sorel for the promptness he (Mr. Barthe) had exhibited this year in bringing before the House a measure which in his (Mr. Méthot's) opinion was one of great importance. He now alluded to the measure intended to secure the repeal of the Insolvency Law, and if the hon. member did not succeed in obtaining such repeal in toto, he at least hoped he (Mr. Barthe) would be successful in protecting against its operations the agricultural population. Such a step would have his most cordial support. He would also have liked to have announced to the House the introduction of a bill directed against another of the striking evils of the country, and that was against usury. He trusted that before the Session was closed, the hon. members of the Government would furnish the House with an opportunity of voting on this question. Asking pardon of the House for having taken up so much of its time, he would resume his seat.

MR. BOWELL said, before the question was put, he thought there were one or two points to which, with some advan-lage to the country, he might refer. Every one who had heard the speech of the seconder of the Address (Mr. Charlton)—he had not been sufficiently acquainted with the French language to understand the gentleman who moved the answer to the Address, and therefore he was unable to speak as to the merits of that hon. gentleman's comments—had listened to it with the pleasure with which the House always listened to any remarks that the hon. gentleman had to make, whether they approved of the sentiments the hon. gentleman uttered or not. It was well, they were told, that this country, while the tumult of war existed in Europe, was at least free from invasion. Perhaps had the hon. gentleman informed them that there was such an eminent military gentleman at the head of the War Department in this country as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones), that might have been a very good reason why there was little danger at the present time of any invasion from foreign countries or from internal broils. It was, however, something new, not only to himself, but also to those who heard the hon. gentleman utter the sentiment, that when our vessel was sailing up the river Seine, in France, that the sight of the flag of Britain was so unusual there, that the people ran along the banks and asked whence it came. He might add that had those people known that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) was the custodian of that flag at the present time, they would not have been in ignorance as to the country from whence it came. He proposed, before referring to other questions, to call the attention of the House, as briefly as possible, to the sentiments which were not only uttered, but which he was bound to believe were held, by the hon. member for North Norfolk, a short time ago, and compare them with those uttered now on the question of the trade policy of this country. After he had heard the hon. gentleman's last speech, it forcibly reminded him of a western orator, who, having delivered one of the grand eloquent western orations which they were in the habit of reading occasionally,—found that his utterances were not in accord with the sentiments of his hearers, coolly said to them, "Well, gentlemen, if these sentiments do not please you, I can easily change them." In 1875, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) had delivered, he thought, one of the cleverest Protection speeches ever made in the House; but the sentiments then uttered were not in accord with those of the Ministry he (Mr. Charlton) was supporting; and finding that, in order to be a consistent supporter of them and to defend their policy when he went before his electors, he acted as if he had said to the Ministers—"Well, gentlemen, if these sentiments do not please you, why, I am prepared to change them," and change them he did. They had this astounding statement made by the hon. gentleman—that all the financial troubles, commercial depression and bankruptcy which existed at the present moment in the United States, were the result of its fiscal and protective policy which existed in that country at the present day. The hon. gentleman also said that extreme protection in the United States was the cause of the present depression and bankruptcy which exists in this country; and that during that period in the United States when free-trade existed the greatest prosperity existed in that country. Now, without desiring to be tedious, particularly after the lengthy debate which had already taken place, he thought it was well that the antidote should go to the country with the poison which the hon. gentleman had endeavoured to instil into the minds of the people; and he knew of no better physic and of no better mode of administering it than by allowing the physician to administer his own antidote. And acting upon that principle, he proposed to read some portions of the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman on the question of Protection in 1875, and allow those who had read the one to read the other and judge between that hon. gentleman's sentiments of 1875 and those of 1878. The hon. gentleman in 1875, while discussing the tariff, spoke as follows:—

"Like many hon. members in this House, I had believed that protection, to a certain extent and within certain limits, would benefit the country. We have been told that a protective policy is one which could only be adopted by a patriarchal Government—a Government which could not only protect industries, but also limit production. I hold that a protective policy on the contrary runs through the whole legislative system of any country. To afford protection of life and property is the duty of Government, and armies are raised and navies built to protect the nation. Prisons are erected for the protection of the public, and free grants given for the purpose of increasing the public wealth and adding to the population. It may be safely assumed that no nation has attained to greatness in commerce or manufactures without having in the course of its history imposed exactions and contributions. This has been notably the case with Great Britain herself; and I think the assertion, that the development of various industries is necessary to the cultivation of the self-defensive power of a nation, is incontrovertible. We have had an illustration of it in the neighbouring nation. The Southern States were without manufacturing industries, while the Northern States were filled with them, and the advantage this gave them resulted in the suppression of the rebellion.

* * * * Then again the possession of organized and skilled labour is an advantage that the manufacturers in a country where manufactures are established for a long time, possess over a new country. But although it may be conceded that protection is to the advantage of manufacturers, unless it can be shown that it is also an advantage to the other classes of the community and the nation at large, all arguments in favour of protection fall to the ground. It must be shown that the agriculturists are to be benefited by protection before it is incumbent upon the Government to adopt a protective policy. I believe that the interests of the nation at large would be promoted by judicious protection; I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by protection, and that the manufacturer being brought to the door of the farmer would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were three thousand miles away."

He thought the hon. gentleman had forgotten those sentiments when he sneered at the remarks of his hon. friend from Niagara (Mr. Plumb), on his referring to the low price of oats purchased last year in the Western States and brought into Canada to compete with the oats raised by our own farmers. The hon. gentleman continued:—

"With a home market of this kind established by protection to manufacturers, the agriculturist can benefit his soil by producing a rotation of crops. The purchasing power of money is not a correct measure of the purchasing power of labour. A farmer raises a bushel of corn which he sells for fifty cents in a foreign market, and with the proceeds he can buy three yards of cotton; but supposing the manufactures are brought to his door, and the better market which it creates increases the price to 60 or 70 cents per bushel, and although impost duties are levied on cottons from Manchester so as to add largely to its price, still he may be enabled to buy four yards of cotton with his bushel of corn, instead of three yards it was able to purchase before, as the purchasing power of his labour is increased. We have at our own doors all the illustrations and experience of protection and its benefits required for our government and guidance. The United States have adopted a protective policy under which their manufactures have been fostered and promoted until in 1870 their products reached the sum of $4,253,000,000, giving employment to 2,000,000 operatives, and disbursing over $775,500,000 in wages. It has been charged that protection has prevented the extension of foreign commerce in that country. That may be true, but it is estimated that the domestic commerce of the United States last year reached the enormous proportions of 200,000,000 tons, valued at $10,000,000,000. What is the foreign commerce of that country compared with the vast domestic trade that goes on increasing without the fluctuations or risks of foreign trade. Look at the progress of the cotton trade in that country. Previous to the import duties on foreign cottons in 1825, British manufactures crushed out all efforts to establish factories in the Republic; but the imposition of 25 per cent. duty on foreign cottons had the effect in a few years, not only of building up manufactures, but led to the production of an article better in quality and lower in price than the Americans received from British manufacturers before their own industries were established. In 1860 the United States were exporters of cottons, exporting nearly 10 per cent. of the whole amount manufactured. The same way with the iron trade. All attempts to establish iron industries were crushed out by foreign competition, and high prices were maintained at intervals—higher on the average than the percentage necessary to produce them in the United States at a profit. But when a protective duty was imposed, iron manufactures were established; and in a short time the price of iron was brought down several dollars per ton, and it is now sold cheaper than the British iron ever was offered for on that market."

This, he thought, was a sufficient answer to the theory indulged in by Free-traders that the imposition of a protective duty raised prices so enormously as to make it a burdensome taxation upon the people. The hon. gentleman said further that "The shipping interest of the United States was one of the most signal illustrations of the benefit of a protective policy that could be produced. Under a protective tariff the shipbuilding of the United States had grown till in 1860 it was nearly as great as that of England. * * * Why is it that we are so desirous of selling to the United States articles of food? It is simply because they have, by protection, built up manufacturing cities with a numerous population, that consumes not only the vast products of their own country but also affords a better market for our products than we in the Dominion possess."

He could go on and read page after page of this speech which was delivered by the hon. gentleman before he (Mr. Charlton) found it necessary to place himself in accord with the Cabinet which he was supporting, were it necessary; but he had read sufficient to show that the hon. gentleman was very much like, in that respect, an eminent statesman in this country who had delivered a very able speech against the Union of the Provinces, and who afterwards at the request of those with whom he was acting, delivered another speech in favour of Union; and when he was complimented upon the latter speech replied: "Ah! You did not hear my speech on the other side."

MR. CHARLTON: I must object to the hon. gentleman making garbled extracts from a speech of mine delivered three years ago. The extracts read are calculated to give an impression different from that given by the entire speech. I rise to make this protest against an advantage so unfair being taken by any hon. member of this House, and submit that the whole speech be read.

MR. BOWELL said perhaps the hon. gentleman would be kind enough—as he doubtless had the official debates in his possession—to point out to the House any portion of that speech which contradicted what he had read, or explained it in any other way than that in which he had read it. He would be very glad to accommodate the hon. gentleman by reading the whole speech, and though it might be flattering to him (Mr. Charlton), if he did so, it would not change the meaning of a single sentence in it.

MR. CHARLTON: If the hon. gentleman will permit me to say so, he will find on continuing the perusal of that speech that it takes the ground that the duties imposed by the present Government of 17½ per cent. are ample as protective duties, and that under the operation of those duties our manufactures were steadily increasing and assuming a more prosperous condition, and that the policy of the Government was perfectly reconcilable with the position taken by Protectionists in this House; and it is in this sense that he has read a garbled portion of the speech which gives to the House and country a false impression as to the position which I took in the matter. I protest against so unfair an advantage being taken.

MR. BOWELL.

MR. BOWELL said he had neither garbled the hon. gentleman's speech or given an incorrect interpretation of the sentiments which he had there uttered. He knew there was a paragraph in it in which the hon. gentleman referred to the 17½ per cent. duty; but if his recollection served him correctly, the hon. gentleman made this statement—that he had believed 17½ per cent. would not be ample protection; but after hearing the Budget Speech of the hon. the Finance Minister, when moving the House into Supply, he considered that 17½ per cent. would be sufficient protection, but that did not affect the general principle of protection and free-trade, as Protectionists might differ as to the amount of duty necessary to accomplish the end desired. Why, the hon. gentleman actually advocated a retaliatory policy towards the United States. He said:

"With regard to the resolution, I confess I would like to see a retaliatory policy which would bring the United States to terms, and would at least protect us against the slaughter market."

MR. CHARLTON: I again protest against this as unfair.

MR. BOWELL: Of course, the hon. gentleman protests. There is no doubt of that. The sentiments of 1875 being so much at variance with those of 1878, that to hear them makes the hon. gentleman wince.

MR. CHARLTON: If the hon. gentleman makes a quotation from the speech, let him give the whole of it.

MR. BOWELL said he had no objection to do so, as the whole speech was an admirable and unanswerable defence of protection.

He would be delighted to have the whole of the speech, which the hon. gentleman delivered in 1875, published broadcast; and that particularly to have it placed in the hands of every voter in the hon. gentleman's own constituency, then at least they would have an opportunity of comparing the sentiments which the hon. gentleman uttered in 1875 with those which he delivered last year and repeated to-day, in order to show his devotion to the party, at the expense of principle. It would be the best possible evidence of the vacillation of the hon. gentleman's opinions, and form the best possible antidote to the speech he had made, in moving the answer to the Speech from the Throne. He had no doubt it was unpalatable to the hon. member to have his former arguments brought to his memory and the memories of the other members of the House on the present day, and particularly before the younger members who had not heard him; this might be very unpalatable, but when a man changed his opinions every twenty-four hours, or at least, every year, to meet the political exigencies of his party, he must not expect that those who did not so change their views were to accept his dictum even on the trade policy of the country. The answer to the Address from the Throne contained very few points to which a reference was necessary, and though the Opposition did not intend to move any amendment to it, he was not prepared—neither did he think that any one on either side of the House, who had taken a calm view of the state of trade and of the country, commercially, at the present moment, would be prepared—to accept all that was contained in this answer as either correct or probable. He took particular objection to the following paragraph:—

“That we receive with much pleasure His Excellency's congratulations on the abundant harvest reaped in all quarters of the Dominion, and that under this and other influences there has been some improvement in the Revenue returns, thus indicating, as we trust with His Excellency, that the commercial depression that afflicted Canada in common with other countries, is passing away.”

He did not believe, though we had had, comparatively speaking, an abundant harvest during the last year, that the commercial depression was passing away. If they turned to the city of Montreal and other commercial centres at the present moment, they would find that instead of the depression passing away, failures were continually taking place, and that the artisan and the labourer were out of employment. And if they went into the towns or picked up the Official Gazette, or turned to the advertisements in the columns of the local journals, they would scarcely find an issue in which there were not instances of bankruptcies following bankruptcies continuously. It might be said that these were the results of the past depression; this might be true to a certain extent, but it was more than that; and the depression existed still, and the want of labour and employment was driving our people out of the country. To make the assertion, therefore, contained in this answer to the Address, was to assert that which certainly was not borne out by the facts. There was another paragraph, which referred to the independence of Parliament. The hon. member who seconded this motion said that the experience of the past had been such as to justify the Government in amending the law. But when the House and the country reflected, they must come to this conclusion: that if the law was too strict in its present provisions and operations, this was in a great measure due to the hon. gentlemen who occupied the Treasury benches at the present moment. These hon. gentlemen had forced upon the late Government those restrictions and stringent clauses, which now exist in that bill; and although the operations of the Act might have been detrimental to some members of the House, and though it might to some of them have caused the loss of their seats, one thing was certain that one hon. gentleman, at least, had profited by it; a Minister of the Crown had been compelled to go back to his constituents for violation of this law. He (Mr. Vail), had lost his seat; and another member, his partner, in violating the law, now occupied his seat in the Cabinet. So that if that hon. gentleman had lost the profit arising from $10,000 to $12,000 a year of Post Office printing, he had gained at least $7,000 a year as a Cabinet Minister; and he, at least, (Mr. Bowell), ventured to say, would have no cause to regret the operations of the Independence of Parliament Act. When the bill to which reference was made, came before the House, they would be better able to discuss it; but he candidly confessed he feared that any tinkering with this law would be detrimental rather than beneficial to the independence of the House. If, by amending its clauses, loop-holes were left, they would find that these would be taken advantage of whenever opportunities for so doing presented themselves, and it would become almost a dead letter. If, with the present restrictions, Ministers of the Crown conferred patronage upon themselves, and their relations, and their partners in business, to the extent of from $10,000 to $12,000 per annum, what would they not do if the law was so amended as to enable them to put their hands into the public chest without any fear as to consequences? The temperance legislation referred to was, he thought, misnamed. There was nothing in the Address that referred to what they understood as temperance legislation. It was true it was stated that the Government were prepared to submit a bill dealing with the liquor traffic, but in what way he did not know. It might be by prohibition; it might be by extending the operations of the Dunkin Act to the whole Dominion, and making it more restricting, and less difficult to operate. For many years he had been in favour of that Act, but having seen its operations in many parts of the country, he had come to this conclusion: that the passage of the Dunkin Act meant very little more than, and very little less than, free-trade in liquor; for wherever it had been put in operation in any part of the country of which he had any knowledge, liquor was as freely sold as ever it was, without the restrictions which follow the licensing system; and it was done publicly, because no one would become informers. The result was that little whiskey shops could be found at nearly every corner throughout the different townships, and in almost every little shop where the person keeping it could raise enough money to buy five gallons of liquor. He considered that there was an omission in the answer to the Address. The Government had referred in the Speech from the Throne to Sitting Bull, a very important personage no doubt, for he was considered of sufficient importance to be given a place in it.

MR. MILLS: He whipped the United States army.

MR. BOWELL: He did, eh? If he did it was a great pity that he had not stopped there, and enjoyed the fruits of his conquest. It was to be regretted that he (Sitting Bull) should have come to this country, and put the hon. the Minister of the Interior to the great trouble of going to the unnecessary expense of proceeding to Washington to negotiate terms, either of surrender, or as to the disposal of this conqueror. But they had no explanation of the causes which led to what was probably equally important to the country—and it certainly was much more important to the hon. gentlemen who occupied the Treasury benches—this was the granting of the amnesty to O'Donoghue, which they had refused upon every other occasion. The hon. the First Minister had said that the decision of the Cabinet upon this question, had been arrived at a long time before it was promulgated. If this were so, why was it not promulgated previously? Why was this announcement of amnesty left to the very eve of a certain election? The reason, no doubt, was to be found in the past, that the Government desired to influence a certain vote at the election in Quebec East; and they thought the best way to do it was by issuing a proclamation, granting that which before they had decided O'Donoghue was not entitled to. He thought that the hon. gentleman who formerly occupied so worthily, and performed, he had no doubt, the onerous duties of President of the Council (Mr. Blake), should have given the House some explanation as to the reasons which led him to change his opinions on this question so rapidly. In 1875, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) had spoken very strongly upon that point; and they knew that in 1876 and 1877 this hon. gentleman repeated those sentiments. But neither the House nor the country, he supposed, was to receive any explanations as to the causes which led that hon. gentleman to change those views. For fear that there should be any who were not aware what those sentiments were, he (Mr. Bowell) would read a short extract from a speech of the late Minister of Justice and late President of the Council, in order that the country might be reminded what strong opinions regarding this matter that hon. gentleman had held a few months before he became a party to the granting of that which he previously declared should not be granted. In 1875, the hon. gentleman said, in the debate upon the motion for enquiry made by the member for Victoria, (Mr. Costigan:—

MR. BOWELL.

“There was a ground existing in reference to Riel and Lepine which did not exist in O’Donoghue’s case. In fact, O’Donoghue was largely responsible for the extreme conditions of affairs which led to the outlawry of Riel and Lepine. He (Mr. Blake) always believed that O’Donoghue was one of the principal actors in that crime.”

In the year following, the foregoing sentiments were considered not sufficiently strong, so the hon. gentleman gave utterance to the following expressions of opinion:—

“What was the attitude of the three chief actors at the time? On the one hand they found O’Donoghue leading an insurrection against Her Majesty’s subjects, while the others were found on the opposite side. The act of O’Donoghue on that occasion was such as precluded the House from taking a favourable view of his case. * * * The House is bound to consider the whole position and attitude of any person to whom it was prepared to extend the prerogative of mercy. I maintain that the conduct of O’Donoghue was such as to disentitle him to any favourable consideration at the hands of this House, or of the Crown. * * * I do not think the House would be disposed to say that it would be the duty of the Government to institute an inquiry into the facts alleged by O’Donoghue in his letter, in order that justice might be done.”

These were his opinions in 1876. In 1877, the hon. gentleman expressed sentiments equally strong, and yet, a few months afterwards, they found this hon. gentleman advising Her Majesty’s representative in this country to grant an amnesty to O’Donoghue, though but a few months before he refused even an investigation to ascertain whether such amnesty should be granted; but neither the House nor the country would be surprised or astonished at the course of the hon. member for South Bruce on this question. He would here repeat what the hon. member for Cumberland had said the previous evening, so well and so ably,—that there was not a principle which this hon. gentleman or his colleagues ever advocated when in Opposition, that they had not directly violated since they had been in power. As early as 1867, the hon. member for South Bruce had moved a resolution in this House, condemning the acceptance of an executive office without emoluments or salary attached thereto; and yet he was the first man, both in the Ontario and Dominion Governments, who accepted such a position, though he had condemned such a procedure in the strongest possible language, not only by his voice, but by resolution, which stood upon the records of Parliament. The hon. gentleman also said that the Cabinet was not only too large, but ought to be reduced; yet he was prepared to, and did, accept, in both the Provincial and Dominion Governments, a position which added to the number of the Cabinet. True, in both cases, it was without salary; but that only added to his inconsistency, because he had, but a short time previously, condemned such a course in a public man. Another important declaration of that hon. gentleman was—that the Cabinet Ministers ought to be paid only in proportion to the labour which they had to perform; and the country supposed that when the hon. gentleman accepted a position in the Cabinet (the Presidency of the Council), to which it was generally understood there were no very arduous duties attached, that they should have a measure recommended to this House upon the subject, and that he would be prepared to advocate that the salaries attached to the office he held should be reduced, and that he, with his high sense of honour, refuse to take as high a salary as his colleagues. But they had heard nothing of the kind. They found that those utterances of his, and that the principle advocated in his picnic speeches and his speeches to the House, were altogether forgotten by him. The acceptance of the hon. member for South Bruce of a seat in the Cabinet, had changed his views upon that, as well as upon other questions. The same might be said with regard to his opinions respecting the re-organization of the Senate. Since he had occupied a seat in the Cabinet they had heard nothing of those sentiments. They had seen no attempts made to change the constitution of the Senate; and yet both in the House and in his speeches to the people, he had advocated, in the strongest possible manner, a change in the Constitution of this country. "I do not believe," said the hon. member in his Aurora speech, "it is consistent with the true notions of popular government that we should have a Senate selected by the Administration of the day and holding their seats for life."

MR. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

MR. BOWELL said the hon. gentleman's followers were ever ready to cry "hear, hear." Had he sought to carry his opinions in that direction into effect since he obtained power, or was the reason why the hon. gentleman had left the Cabinet that his colleagues would not consent to have his peculiar ideas embodied in law? Or had he left the Cabinet because he was not willing to do in the House what he certainly did not do in his speech at Teeswater last summer—defend the Government in all their actions? They also had a strong declaration on his part that compulsory voting was the great panacea for all the corruption and ills which exist in this country at elections. In the same speech he said:—

"I think those who remain on the roll should be compelled by law to deposit their ballots, and that a law establishing some penalty for the breach of this provision, unless they excuse themselves by proof of illness or absence from the constituency, would be a good law."

Well, if he believed that, as no doubt the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Macdougall) did, why was not such a law laid before Parliament? If the hon. member for South Bruce did not believe it, then he was quite right in the course he had pursued in not mentioning or referring to it while he was in the Cabinet; but, to be honest, he should avow his change of opinion. Those were but a few of the evidences that the principles advocated by those hon. gentlemen when in opposition, and which they advocated before the people as being absolutely necessary for the well-being of this country, were forgotten or put in their breeches' pocket the moment they reached the Treasury benches and were receiving the power and emoluments which pertain to their office, to be brought forth again the moment they crossed the floor. But, said the hon. the Postmaster General, it did not lie in the mouths of the Opposition to cast those things back at the Treasury benches; or, in other words, it was quite right for hon. gentlemen opposite to advocate certain measures and principles in order to obtain power, and the moment they obtain it, to tell the people: "Oh, there is nothing to reform, and we will go on and do precisely as our predecessors did." It did lie in the mouths and it was the duty of hon. members of the Opposition to tell those hon. gentlemen they were false to their principles—if they ever had any;—and that if they had none they were false to their professions in deceiving the people by stating that certain acts and principles were necessary for the well-governing of the people, and the moment they obtained power to either forget or refused to carry them out. There was one feature in the debate which hon. members would agree with him in saying was quite unnecessary to drag into the discussion, and that was a rehearsal of past debates in regard to the North-West troubles and difficulties. The first speaker who referred to them, if his recollection served him aright, was the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue—

MR. BOWELL.

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. MASSON: It was the mover of the Address (Mr. St. Georges).

MR. BOWELL said he had prefaced his remarks, by stating that he was not sufficiently acquainted with the French language to understand the remarks of the hon. mover of the Address, who spoke in French; and, consequently if the hon. gentleman did refer to the matter, he was not aware of the fact. But when the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue spoke in English, he (Mr. Bowell) understood what he said, and was surprised to hear him utter the sentiments, so often uttered by hon. gentlemen opposite, and refuted, that it was the Conservative party in Ontario which raised the cry, and inflamed the passions of the people of this country, in regard to that question. People repeated stories so often, until they began to believe them.

MR. BLAKE: Here, here.

MR. BOWELL said the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake), was the last man, who should refer to it in a sneering manner. Who was it who raised the agitation in Ontario, but himself? Who was it who denounced the Conservative party because it would not follow in its wake, and said they were a priest-ridden body, bound hand and foot to the French Hierarchy of Lower Canada, and the French rebels in the North-West? Who was it who offered a reward for the apprehension of Riel, and then amnestied him, but that hon. gentleman? Who was it who went to the country and denounced the right hon. member for Kingston, on that question, but the same gentleman? And yet the hon. member for South Bruce would sit in the House and sneer at the remarks of those who knew all the circumstances connected with the North-West troubles, and the tergiversations of the gentlemen opposite. No sooner did these hon. gentlemen get into power, than—they did with that question as every one expected—they swallowed their convictions, if they ever had any; and if they did not have any, they proved to the world that the remarks of Sir Francis Hincks was literally true, that they were an "organized hypocrisy." What he desired to call the attention of the House to was this fact: The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue and the present Minister of Justice had proved beyond a doubt the position he (Mr. Bowell) took in 1876, and endeavoured to impress on the House and the country that no amnesty had been promised by the late Government or by the late Sir George E. Cartier. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue told the House, last night, that no such amnesty had been promised. The hon. the Minister of Justice read from Sir George Cartier's letter to show that no promise had ever been made, and that, consequently, the late Government were to blame because those people had not been amnestied, and that they, the present men in power, the men who had inflamed the worst passions of human nature against the Conservative party and the late Government, because they had not hanged those people, were now entitled to all credit for having granted a partial amnesty to those people. If the hon. member for South Bruce had referred to the resolution moved by the hon. the Premier for the purpose of addressing Her Majesty, asking for the pardon of a certain portion and a limited pardon for others, he would have found that the whole resolution was predicated upon the presumption, not only the presumption, but the declared fact, that that amnesty was promised by the late Government; and yet they found their colleagues here to-day declaring that that which that resolution contained was not true, though they voted for it. For fear there should be any misunderstanding on the matter, he would read a portion of those resolutions. It would, indeed, be well, if before members of the Government entered the House, they would try to agree and not contradict each other, and not have two members of the Cabinet denying that which the Premier declared was the fact. It could not be that any new light dawned upon the minds of those two hon. gentlemen, for they were in Parliament at the time, and voted for the declaration that an amnesty was promised. The extracts which they read last night were read on that occasion, and it was only for the purpose of endeavouring to prejudice the minds of their supporters by representing that they were not only the true friends of the people connected with the North-West troubles, but granted that which others had refused. He was quite in accord with those hon. gentlemen on that point. The House would remember that he occupied some little time on a former occasion in endeavouring to show that the late Government had never made such promises, and that the preamble based on that presumption, was incorrect and unfair, and notwithstanding that fact, two Ministers of the Cabinet now told the House that all he (Mr. Bowell) contended for two years ago was literally and in fact correct. The resolution to which he referred was the following:—

“That from the evidence reported to this House by the Committee appointed last Session on the questions arising out of the North-West troubles, it appears that the late Sir G. E. Cartier, Minister of Militia and Defence, and, during Sir J. A. Macdonald's illness, Acting Minister of Justice, leader of the Government, and its representatives in its negotiations with the delegates from the North-West, at various times, gave divers persons of prominence in the North-West, amongst whom were Archbishop Taché, Father Richot, the Hon. M. A. Girard and the Hon. J. Royal, assurances that a complete amnesty would be granted by the Imperial Government in respect of all acts committed by all persons during the North-West troubles, and requested that these assurances should be as they were communicated to the interested parties. That from the same evidence it further appears that the envoy of the Canadian Government, Archbishop Taché, acting in the bonâ fide belief that he was authorized to do so, assured the people of the North-West that the Imperial Government would grant such an amnesty, and the Canadian Government did not communicate to the people any disavowal of his action.”

He contended then, and he contended now, that there was no evidence in the report of the Committee appointed to consider these North-West troubles to justify the preamble just read; and he was gratified, even if it were two years after, that two Ministers of the Crown should step forward and, in order to make political capital, state that what he then uttered with regard to this point was true. The hon. the Premier and the other colleagues of the hon. gentleman must reconcile the differences of opinion between them upon this point as best they could. It was not his intention to pursue the argument further, and more particularly did he desire to leave as uttered certain sentiments expressed the previous evening by the hon. the Minister of Justice in reference to certain matters connected with the North-West troubles. Without referring to that hon. gentleman he (Mr. Bowell) thought he might safely say, and every gentleman who had given his attention to the matter would bear him out, that the hon. gentleman had exhibited as great a want of knowledge of the facts connected with those troubles as a child, who scarcely knew its a, b, c. The hon. gentleman had said that Archbishop Taché made certain references in regard to O'Donoghue, which he (Mr. Bowell), though a member of the Committee, failed to recognize as having been uttered by him, were not contained in the evidence laid before the House. It was only in justice to the Conservative party, to which he belonged, that he had referred to this subject, in order to point out the inconsistency of every man now in power. He had heard over and over again, during his term of membership in that House, utterances such as he heard last night. Almost every hon. member who spoke declared that the Act referring to trials of elections to the Judges was passed by the present Government. This had been so often repeated, that the hon. members who gave utterance to it fancied it was correct and true; even the member for South Bruce began to believe it, though he and his friend knew that it was passed by the Government of the right hon. member for Kingston in 1873. He was surprised, if anything could surprise one in these days of political degeneracy, to hear the hon. the Postmaster General refer to two or three old questions, stating that the Conservative party improperly laid claim to the secularization of the clergy reserves, and the settlement of the seigniorial question in Lower Canada. He (Mr. Bowell) had a distinct recollection that when he was assisting at the election of his predecessor, hon. Sidney Smith, for the Trent Division, after he was defeated in Northumberland, that this was one of the questions they had to combat in the county of Peterborough, North Hastings and Lanark, which composed the electoral division at that time. The cry was raised by the Reform party, led by the Globe, that the taxpayers of Ontario were being robbed in order to pay the seigniors in Lower Canada, and the present right hon. member for Kingston was held responsible for all that. He did not say that the hon. gentlemen opposite did not agitate the question for years before it was settled, but he did say that they were in power for years and years, and might have settled it, but did not, and that it was only when the Conservative Government came into power, that it was wiped from the Statute-book, and their opponents were prevented from further using it for political purposes when they went to the country. They, in Ontario, had to defend that Act, and the people of Ontario were led by the Reform press to believe it was a gross outrage on the country, wantonly putting their hands into the pockets of Upper Canada farmers for the purpose of paying off seigniorial dues in Lower Canada.

MR. BOWELL.

MR. HUNTINGTON: Will the hon. gentleman inform the House whether that measure was not carried by the right hon. member for Kingston because he could not resist it.

MR. BOWELL said the defence they made was that the measure was just, and the time had arrived when the Conservative Government, as it always did, should carry out those reforms which were necessary.

MR. HUNTINGTON: And which they had often voted down.

MR. BOWELL said that they might have voted down abstract resolutions, but they introduced a bill, and settled the question when the country was ripe for it; and it was precisely the same with the Clergy Reserve question. Ever since he had known anything of politics this had been used as a stalking horse. The Liberals were long in power, and did not settle it, but when the Conservatives took their places they distinctly stated that if the public voice was in favour of a settlement of that great and vexed question, they would be prepared to grapple with and settle it; and they did settle it in a way that did justice and gave satisfaction to all classes of the community, except to the leaders of the great Reform party, of which the hon. the Postmaster General was such a shining light. That was another utterance of the hon. gentleman which would be somewhat surprising to those who did not know him. And when he began to talk of political purity and political honesty, it certainly would be enough to, at least, shock a man with less tender sensibilities than himself. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had given as a reason why he would not enter the Cabinet while Mr. Cauchon was a member, was that he was so tainted that he, as an exponent of purity, would not consent to stain the escutcheon of the Liberal party of Quebec by becoming a colleague of Mr. Cauchon, who had formerly belonged to the Conservative party. The Postmaster General told them that it was only when he entered the present Government, that the grossest language and most foul calumnies were heaped upon his head. He had forgotten to read the words of his own friends. If he had not done so it would be well to remind him that the utterances which condemned him so vehemently for acts which he had committed in connection with the Beauport Asylum, were the utterances of his own paper, the paper of which he was part proprietor—the Montreal Herald. He might not have been so then; he (Mr. Bowell) did not say he was. It was the Herald, the Globe and L'Evenement, which denounced him, stating that his crimes were so great that if they had been committed by any one else, the offender would have been thought a fit subject for the gallows, and that his crimes smelt so strong that they ascended to the heavens. They found that the Minister of Inland Revenue, while so sensitive as to the character of the Cabinet, did not hesitate to accept a seat in a Cabinet with another gentleman who had certainly been denounced not only by the newspapers, but by the courts of the country as having been guilty of acts which—if he used the proper term it might be considered unparliamentary—would disgrace any man in his business operations in this country. The hon. gentleman had forgotten all the acts, and the decisions of the court, and the opinions of the Judges in reference to two of his present colleagues, in connection with operations which certainly would stain the commercial reputation of any one, much less the reputations of those occupying the positions they did at the present time. The House was told they were so pure that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue would not come in contact with Mr. Cauchon, though he had no hesitation in accepting a seat and becoming a bosom friend of the hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Postmaster General. The hon. gentleman told that House, if he did not misunderstand him, that no English statesman would ever think of attacking a man who occupied the position of Mr. Cauchon at the present time. He (Mr. Bowell) questioned very much whether one could find, in an analysis of English Parliamentary history, an English statesman who would consent to occupy the position that those gentlemen occupied at the present day. He questioned if they could find in the whole Parliamentary annals of Great Britain a member occupying a seat in the Cabinet, and another member, closely connected with him in business operations and also a political ally, both resigning their seats for a gross violation of the law, the one for taking—while a Minister of the Crown—money for that which the law said he had no right to do, going back to the people for re-election, and the moment he was defeated, the Government turned round and put in his place the man who had been equally guilty with himself in these transactions. It would be well if they were to take a lesson from the statesmen of England upon questions of this kind; and if they did, and if they would remember what they read and had any regard for their own reputation, they would be the last to talk of political corruption on the part of their opponents. But the innocent simplicity of the hon. the Postmaster General, when he told them of their pure lamb-like candidate—who was so innocent and so young in political life, but so wealthy that he could afford to scatter his money about to be elected—Mr. Jodoin, of Chambly, and it was not to be expected that he should keep within the law. But that gentleman had the advice of the hon. Minister himself, or certainly the advice of the hon. Minister of Justice, who gave, or caused to be given to the agents of that gentleman, some $10,000. That was in the sworn testimony. But the old heads, said the hon. Postmaster General, those who had been running the elections for many years, should certainly have known better, and not have been caught in the trap. If the hon. gentleman had read the evidence that was given in the courts in connection with his own party, and the extracts from the letters written his supporters at the different elections, he might have saved himself and his party the humiliation of having them read in the House. For the hon. member's benefit and that of the House, he would show how those hon. members endeavoured to carry the elections. They were so pure and innocent that when an election law was passed that could reach them they forgot all about it, and spent their money and their friends' money as if no law was in existence, and the result was that they were caught in their own trap. He would commence by reading from the evidence of one who they had just elected, one of the vice-presidents of the Reform Association of Ontario. It was a fact, however strange it might appear, that if a man was found guilty of corrupt acts and denounced by any of the Judges as having been more guilty than others, he was sure to receive favours from the present Cabinet. Colonel Walker, who was, as now, the bosom friend of the hon. the Premier and other members of the Cabinet, appears, though standing in the position of a disqualified member for a certain number of years, on almost every platform with the Premier, and the Liberal party had now honoured him by appointing him to a position where he could direct young members of the party, when the general elections came on, how to conduct them. That gentleman's friends wrote: "Come along, John, come and help us to put down bribery and corruption. We've lots of money." It would also be found that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Norris), who had just addressed the House, and explained his position, for violating the law, had spent $8,000 or $10,000, which he had entered in his expenditures as missionary expenses. At least, it was so stated at the time. It was evident, at any rate, that the hon. gentleman was not so verdant as the hon. Postmaster General would have them believe that the younger candidates for parliamentary honours usually were. There was one gentleman (Mr. Currie) who stated in his evidence that when he treated he treated with "raspberry syrup." Perhaps he was a teetotaler. He would now refer to one of the older members of the party, who was not one of these simple unexperienced candidates, but who had had a great many election contests, and knew how to carry them among his own people. This gentleman, one Dr. McGill, a Reform candidate, declared in his address to the electors of South Ontario:

MR. BOWELL.

"I again present myself as a candidate for your suffrages for the Legislative Assembly. In 1867 I linked my fortunes with those of the leader of the Reform Party, the Hon. George Brown. I gave him my support, believing him, what he professed to be, the uncompromising enemy of corruption in every form. Unfortunately, his conduct during that election, utterly destroyed my confidence in his political integrity. Early in the canvass I refused to contribute a sum demanded by him to a fund which I had reason to believe was being used for corrupt purposes. This led to a rupture between us, which has never been healed."

Mr. J. B. Lovekin said in his evidence before the late trial, Queen vs. Wilkenson, "that he spent $800 of his own money to elect Mr. Blake in West Durham." Mr. H. H. Cook—whether that was the present member of that name the House was able to judge—gave this evidence in an election Court, when having his election contested, that:

"In the spring of 1871, I canvassed the constituency for a month or six weeks; in 1872, for a similar length of time. Speaking from memory, the expense of my campaigns were as follows:—In 1871, they might have amounted to $13,000, but I do not charge my mind with $2,000 or $3,000 in election matters. In 1872, my expenses did not exceed $15,000. In 1874, the expenditures were much smaller, because I thought I would have the sympathy of the people in consequence of my expenditures in 1872, and that my opponent would hate to carry the Pacific Scandal on his back."

No doubt the hon. gentleman was right, having in 1871 purchased his seat and in 1872 supplemented that purchase, he thought that at least in 1874, when he went back to the people whom he had twice purchased within two years, that it would be sufficient. Whether they would remain bought, remained to be seen in a very few months. The hon. John Simpson said he mesmerised the people of North Ontario and "turned a hundred that night at Glen's," and attempted to mesmerise the people of the Maritime Provinces. But he would not read what that Senator said of them, as it might offend ears polite. The way he mesmerised, no doubt, was by the influence of his Bank, as he had been promised favours from the Government, as might be seen from his evidence in the trial before referred to, which is as follows:—

"Mr. McCarthy to Mr. Cartwright.—Q. Did you ever tell him (Mr. Simpson) that you had considered it (the application) favourably? A. I don't think I ever made any special communication with him.

"Mr. McCarthy to Mr. Simpson.—Q. Then what did he (Mr. Cartwright) say? A. He said if they (the Government) were sustained, the Ontario Bank would have a fair proportion."

This same Hon. John Simpson in his evidence stated that he mesmerised those he met at Mr. Glen's house in batches of fifteen or sixteen, and turned one hundred that night at Glen's. The means by which he did it was sufficiently explained in the letter which he issued to the electors at that time, and the manner of his election. Mr. Holland, of the Ontario Bank, sent out a circular to this effect:

"We are very largely interested in the success of the present Government, as their continuance in power will add largely to the success and prosperity of the bank, and, through them, of the business people of the community. Our President, the Hon. John Simpson, is calling upon all our friends to give us a hand for Mr. Cameron."

In reference to the election for one of the Hurons, Judge Hagarty, who was one of the Judges who tried the case, said:

"There are strong grounds for thinking that the respondents, (Malcolm Colin Cameron, ex-M.P. for South Huron) was guilty of personal bribery, and had the learned Judge who tried the case and unseated him, found the respondent guilty of personal bribery, we should have sustained the judgment."

With reference to the London election and the unseating and disqualification of Col. Walker, Vice-President of the Reform Association, the same Judge, on appeal, used this language:

"I can as readily believe it possible for the respondent to have been immersed in the lake and to have been taken out dry, as that the class of bribery which the evidence discloses to have been committed on his behalf, almost under his eyes in his daily path, with means of corruption proceeding from his own headquarters, and from the hands of his confidential agent, could have been committed otherwise than with his knowledge and consent."

In regard to the Montreal election, the following evidence was given by Mr. Brown, Chairman of the Workmen's Committee.

"When I go into an election, I go in to win; and don't care a damn what it costs."

Most of the members of the House will remember the late Malcolm Cameron sent round a circular, demanding to be recouped for the money expended by him, in elevating the standard of public morality, stating:

"I spent $6,000 in contesting Russell, which contest I claim to have had a good effect in subsequently securing that constituency to the Reform Party. I spent time and money in carrying South Ontario and defeating an ex-Minister of the Crown."

There was another way by which those gentlemen, who were so pure, could affect elections in the rural sections of Ontario. They found that Mr. Paxton, M.P.P., for North Ontario, was desirous of assisting the hon. member for Muskoka, and in order to do that, was prepared to use the money of Ontario to do it. It was to be done in this manner: It was a letter of introduction of a Mr. Card to Mr. A. P. Cockburn, but like the introduction given by the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) to his friend Mr. More to hand to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and who subsequently got the Goderich Harbour contract at a loss to the country of over $30,000. Of course, no wrong was intended to be done. But Mr. Paxton was not so careful as the hon. member for South Bruce in writing the letter, and he cautioned him to be careful how he acted. This was written for Mr. Card to present to the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Cockburn):

"Mr. D. M. Card is authorized to do some work for the Ontario Government in your part, wishing to make your acquaintance and get your advice. * * * Mr. Card is a first-rate man in an election contest. Of course, I am aware, he must be cautious what he is doing under the circumstances."

MR. BOWELL.

Allow him to introduce to the Premier, Mr. Moore, a friend who was desirous of having a contract—but, of course, the hon. the Minister of Public Works would not do anything wrong—so the hon. member for South Bruce carefully said if you are entitled to this contract you will get it, but under no other considerations. But, Mr. Card, who was a very valuable man in an election campaign, and particularly in a constituency where the Government was spending a large sum of money on colonization roads, and was so described by Mr. Paxton; but, he added, "I know he must be cautious how he acts." The results of those operations, how much money was spent through those means, and the majority that followed the expenditure of the money at the last election, he was not able to state, though a reference to the Ontario Public Accounts might show this system of bribery and corruption so generally practised by the great Liberal party—that party of purity extended itself down even to Nova Scotia. The Hon. W. Ross, he believed most members had heard of him before, said:—

"I placed with my Committee a certain amount of money to relieve honest, worthy men, and to prevent their properties being sacrificed."

The affidavit made by Kenneth McLennan, of Victoria, Nova Scotia, also gave this testimony in reference to this very matter of spending money when they were trying very hard to carry elections by the pure means which they always adopt.—

"The Hon. W. Ross told me to go to Alexander Cameron, of Baddeck, Collector of Customs for that port, and the keeper of the Savings Bank there, who, Ross stated, was the treasurer of his Committee at Baddeck, aforesaid, and who had money sent from Canada to help him gain his election, and which he would distribute for that purpose."

Whether he owned to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier the disbursing of the funds to carry the county of Chambly to the tune of $10,000 at the time or not, they were not told. But they all knew that the evidence given in connection with this very matter was that this Collector of Customs in Baddeck did distribute this money to those that desired to vote against his hon. friend the present member, Mr. Campbell. And yet they were told, and it had been repeated by the Prime Minister yesterday, and had been reiterated by those of his colleagues who had spoken, that the members of the Government did nothing through their officers, or others to corrupt the electors of this country. Let them look for a moment at the number of these purists, these elevators of the standard of public morality in this country, who are so fond of having electoral purity, and it will be seen how many have been unseated within a few years, and the amounts as near as could be ascertained which they themselves had stated had been spent in connection with their election. He would commence with the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Aylmer). He had said in his evidence that he had given some parties an Ayrshire bull.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Any relation to Sitting Bull?

MR. BOWELL said he would refer that question to the hon. the Minister of the Interior, as to whether this Ayrshire bull was a near relation of Sitting Bull, who was now under his paternal charge. The next member unseated was the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Biggar). He (Mr. Bowell) had read the evidence very carefully, and he had no desire to do that hon. member an injustice, and it was the conviction of his own mind, from what he had read, that there was nothing in connection with that hon. gentleman, personally, which would unseat him. It was entirely the act of a committeeman, but that did not alter the fact that the party to which the hon. gentleman belonged was doubly corrupt. Then Mr. M. C. Cameron, of South Huron, in his own evidence, acknowledged that he had spent over $10,000 in carrying that constituency. Mr. H. H. Cook, the member for North Simcoe, acknowledged that in two years he had spent from $28,000 to $30,000. How much more they did not know, because he did not charge his mind with such insignificant sums as two or three dollars. Mr. Cushing, of Argenteuil, was disqualified. Mr.

Devlin, of Montreal, was unseated, and had to go back to his constituency, and even their friend from North York was unseated. They never could find out how much he or his party spent in that election. He threw up the sponge; he acknowledged the offence; and the result was that no evidence could come before the Court in order that it might be discovered how much he really had spent.

MR. DYMOND: I can tell the hon. gentleman what I was unseated for. It was for the payment of three dollars by a man I did not know.

MR. BOWELL said that bore out what he had just stated. The hon. gentleman having selected one small matter on which to fall, allowed it to be proven and then threw up the sponge. They knew that that course had been pursued in several cases in Ontario, by which course they were aware that nothing could come out discreditable to them, and so took a small matter to fall on like the member for North York.

MR. DYMOND: It was the only one I could find.

MR. BOWELL: And you took good care the Court should not find out the rest. Then in North Wellington the member was in the same position as the hon. member for North York. In the city of Hamilton his hon. friend behind him, who, with his colleagues, had been so jolly over the reading of these names, had taken the same course as the other two gentlemen to whom he had referred. They knew they would be unseated; they knew they had spent thousands, he thought he might say tens of thousands of dollars, in that election. But the moment they acknowledged the violation of the law they selected a minor point to fall back on; they said: "If you drop the suit we will acknowledge the whole thing and go back to our constituency." And the lawyer who was acting for the petitioner, the late John Hillyard Cameron, accepted the offer.

MR. IRVING: I never told you a word which justifies that being stated as a fact.

MR. BOWELL said he frankly admitted that the hon. member never told him a word which justified him in making that statement. He also admitted that the hon. gentleman had never told him the facts about his being unseated; and he also frankly admitted that the hon. gentleman had never told him anything about being unseated, nor did he (Mr. Bowell) ever say he had. He did not usually obtain that kind of information from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Irving), but the records of the public print furnished him. The knowledge which he had obtained, without applying to the hon. gentleman for his opinion, were, he thought, sufficient to justify him in giving utterance to the sentiments he had. Next came Mr. Jodoin, who was disqualified for personal corrupt practices, and that election was shown to have cost from $15,000 to $20,000, although the constituency is a very small one; and the hon. the Minister of Justice, who had been preaching to the House lessons last night of purity and the necessity of elevating the standard of public morality, had instructed one of the agents in that constituency where he could get $10,000 in a lump. In West Northumberland the present members adopted precisely the same course as some of his colleagues, and he (Mr. Bowell) remembered stating that the hon. gentleman had received his instructions to throw up the sponge from the hon. the member for South Bruce, which, by-the-by, that hon. gentleman denied, and he was bound to accept that denial.

MR. KERR: Will the hon. gentleman tell us something about certain revelations in reference to the Grand Junction Railway, by way of variety?

MR. BOWELL said if the hon. gentleman thought that that question had anything to do with the elections to this House, he (Mr. Bowell) would be glad to enter into a discussion of it with him. But if the hon. gentleman desired to insinuate that there was anything wrong in his connection with that road he had insinuated that which, if he did not know to be untrue, he (Mr. Bowell) could prove to be as false as falsehood itself; and he challenged the hon. gentleman, either in the town of Belleville, on the floor of this House, or in any other place, to bring or insinuate his charges, if he had any, and if he did not prove them to be false, if he did not prove that he (Mr. Kerr) had made an insinuation that nothing in the records of the courts or elsewhere could justify, he would resign his seat within five minutes after. If he did not prove that he (Mr. Kerr) was a second class Kerr, and a third-one too, he was willing to sacrifice the position with which the people had trusted him here. Then there is the county of Glengarry, and the division of Montreal West where an expenditure of from $12,000 to $15,000 had been proven, and then the case was given up. In South Renfrew he believed the hon. gentleman had stated, in his own evidence, what it cost him; and he thought they had also evidence from that hon. gentleman's mouth that the power of a Minister of the Crown was used to assist in carrying his election. He believed the hon. gentleman stated in that evidence that the present Secretary of State, Mr. Scott, had promised that his influence would obtain the sum of $8,000 from the Ontario Government, to assist in building roads in that part of the country.

MR. McDUGALL (South Renfrew): No; no.

MR. BOWELL: The hon. gentleman said, "No; no." Well he would refer to the evidence, and see what he did swear to. Here it was.—

"Q. Did you mention the name of the Minister who told you the $8,000 was to be given?—A. I mentioned that it came through the Hon. R. W. Scott.

"Q. You did not say you had his word for it?—A. No; I said this, that R. W. Scott, having been a member of the Government before, had stated to me that $8,000 would be placed in the Estimates to be spent on these roads.

"Q. The Hon. R. W. Scott was then in the Dominion Government?—A. Yes.

"Q. What position did he hold?—A. He was then without portfolio. He spoke to me about having grants for this part of the country, but the exact sum he did not mention; but that night in Shamrock Village, Hudson told me Scott had fixed the sum at $8,000."

The hon. gentleman stated further:—"I said I thought they would be affected"—that is, the obtaining of these grants,—“by returning a supporter of the Dominion Government." Showing that the two Governments were in accord, and were acting together in the carrying of these elections; and the Secretary of State, one of the Ministers of the Dominion, was prepared and ready to use his influence with the Ontario Government in order to obtain money to build roads and construct bridges in the free-grant territories, which the present member from South Renfrew represented. No one knew better than he did,—because he (Mr. Bowell) represented a constituency in which there were large free-grant territories,—the power and influence that were wielded by the present Ontario Government at every election, when they sent their minions through different parts of the country and promised bridges, and the cutting of new roads, and the repairing of bridges. Hence he could easily understand how these influences were brought to bear by the Local Government in favour of the Local candidates, or in favour of the Dominion candidates, whom they desired to elect. Next, they had Mr. Macgregor, of Essex, unseated; Mr. Murray, of North Renfrew; Mr. Norris, of Lincoln, who carried to his missionary account, according to the statements made at the time, some $8,000 to $10,000.

MR. BOWELL.

Mr. NORRIS: That is enough. I defy you to find any such evidence.

Mr. BOWELL: I am repeating what transpired and was published at the time.

Mr. NORRIS: No—in some Tory paper. I will forfeit my seat if you can find that in the evidence. I do not think it is gentlemanly.

Mr. BOWELL was glad to learn that the hon. gentleman's missionary account was not so large. Next, Mr. Stewart, of South Norfolk; Mr. Wilkes, of Centre Toronto; Mr. Wood, of Hamilton; and, Mr. Walker, of London, fell through corrupt practices, while professing a desire to elevate the standard of public morality. He could read another list, almost as long, of the Ontario Liberal or "purity" party, who were some of them disqualified, and others unseated for the very offence that the Ministers of the Crown and their supporters had been deprecating so strongly.

Mr. BERTRAM: Will the hon. gentleman, as he has read that list, read the list on the opposite side, beginning with the hon. member for Kingston?

Mr. NORRIS: And the hon. member for Niagara, if you please.

Mr. BOWELL said he was very glad he had so many assistants. The accusation had been thrown broadcast, not only in this House but continuously for years; that all the electoral corruption existed among the Conservative party. If any were unseated, it only justified to that extent the charges which had been brought against them by those gentlemen who had been giving utterance to these accusations. He had read this list to show that almost a majority of themselves, if they had gone into the Courts, all those very men who had been preaching purity and denouncing corruption, almost every man of them that were taken into Court, were either disqualified or sent back to their constituents. That was his reason for referring to this matter. He did not deny that some of the seats of the Conservatives were not only contested, but successfully contested. But it did not—to use the language of the Postmaster General—lie in the mouths of these gentlemen, every one of whom that were attacked for corruption at the elections was either unseated or disqualified, to be hurling the stone at their neighbours from one end of the year to the other. He would not detain the House any longer upon questions of this kind, further than to refer to another act of the leading member of the party, and he thought it well to reproduce it, together with the opinion of the learned Judge upon that question, showing that the corruption that existed and exists at the present day in the "Grit," or Liberal, or Radical party in Ontario was not of recent date. In 1872 the great leader of the Reform party of Ontario, the Hon. George Brown, wrote the following letter to the Hon. John Simpson:—

"The fight goes bravely on, but it is hard to work up against the enormous sums the Government candidates have in their hands.

We here have expended our strength in aiding the out counties and helping our city candidates; but a big push has to be made on Saturday and Monday for the east and west divisions, if we are not to succumb to the cash of the Government. We could carry all three divisions easily but for the cash against us, and if we carry the first on Saturday, the other two will go with us in spite of all the cash they can muster. We, therefore, make our grand stand on Saturday. There are but half-a-dozen people that can come down handsomely, and we have done all that we possibly can do, and we have to ask a very few outsiders to aid us. Will you be one? I have been urged to write you, and comply accordingly."

When this question was before the Court what did the learned Judge say in reference to this letter? He said:

"It is of course a plain demand for money to oppose, it is said, the expenditure of the Government candidates at the Toronto elections; and it is an admission that the writer, and those co-operating with him, had expended their strength, which I suppose means their money, in other constituencies for the like purpose. It is a letter written for corrupt purposes, to interfere with the freedom of elections. It is an invitation to the recipient, as one with some others and the writer, to concur in committing the offence of bribery and corruption at the polls."

MR. DYMOND: Will the hon. gentleman allow a question,—whether he would have the fairness to read the sworn affidavit in which any corruption in connection with that transaction is solemnly denied?

MR. BOWELL: I presume that the evidence was before the Court when the Judge delivered his judgment.

MR. DYMOND: No; not the sworn affidavit of Mr. Brown, in which he afterwards defended himself against the injurious aspersions contained in the remarks of Mr. Justice Wilson. I ask the hon. gentleman, as a man of honour and fairness, if he makes a charge, to supply the sworn denial. If he fails to do it, the House will know what estimate to place upon his statements.

MR. BOWELL: I can inform the hon. gentleman that it is a matter of little consequence to me in what estimation I am held by that gentleman. I have read from the records of the Court, which are indisputable.

AN HON. MEMBER: Ex parte.

MR. BOWELL: I say that I have not given an ex parte statement. I have given a letter written by the Hon. Geo. Brown in its entirety. I have given the opinion of the Judge who tried that case in connection with it.

MR. BOWELL.

AN HON. MEMBER: No.

MR. BOWELL: Yes. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would like me to quote the foul language used by the scribes of the Globe—perhaps himself (Mr. Dymond), I do not know—in reference to this learned Judge, because he had the audacity, as they say, to express an opinion upon a letter which conveyed its own meaning. But, Mr. Speaker, you must remember this, and the House must remember, that this was not an old foggy Tory Judge who gave this judgment; he was a member, when he was in political life, of his own party, of the Reform party.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: North York.

MR. BOWELL: Yes; he sat for the very constituency for which the hon. gentleman who now interrupts me, now sits; and if my recollection be right, was placed upon the Bench by his own, and not by the Conservative party. I have, therefore, a right to quote his judgment, without the imputations and insinuations thrown out by the hon. member for North York. I could, it is true, read the foulest calumny that ever disgraced the columns of a newspaper, very likely written by the hon. member for North York, the scribe or amanuensis of the man on whose conduct in this matter the Judge commented, and like a good and obedient servant, obeyed his master and wrote as he was told.

AN HON. MEMBER: Mr. Brown admitted writing that letter himself.

MR. BOWELL: I am referring to the attacks upon the Judge, not the letter. I think, Mr. Speaker, I have given this House sufficient evidence to show—

MR. MACKENZIE: No.

MR. BOWELL: Of course, the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Government will say "no." He says "no" to everything that does not please; denials have become chronic with him. I have, I repeat, given sufficient evidence to show that if political corruption exists in this country, it has its headquarters in the present Government, and among those who are its supporters. I know that the hon. the Postmaster General told the House last night that certain gentlemen had a particular way,—or a diplomatic way, was the expression,—of hiding up their offences and keeping them from the public. I have a distinct recollection, when that hon. gentleman made certain charges—and when he desired to be judge, witnesses and jury himself, and because we have his speech to that effect—that because he could not be at the head of the committee and try his own charges he shrank from the responsibility of going before a Court composed of the Judges of the land and give evidence when he was subpoenaed; and the only reason, I believe, was, that it was utterly impossible for him to substantiate the charges which he made.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: I gave my reasons in a letter.

Mr. BOWELL: I know you gave your reasons for shirking the responsibility; but upon a matter so important as that was, if the hon. gentleman had had a particle of courage, or believed the charges he made, he would have gone before these Judges and sustained his accusations.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: When shall we three meet again?

Mr. WHITE, (East Hastings): In the copper mines.

Another Hon. MEMBER: Would you like to have a mine?

Mr. BOWELL: I should, very much; but I should dislike, if I had a mine, to have it taken into the English Courts, after floating it upon the market, and have to disgorge the ill-gotten gains. I would like, if I purchased a mine, and it belonged to me, whether copper, gold, or silver, that the proceeds from it should go into my own pocket; and it should be done in such a way that the Court could not take it out again.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: Will the hon. gentleman elaborate a little that insinuation? He has been very kind in other matters; will he elaborate the facts which induce him to make that insinuation?

Mr. BOWELL: I think the hon. the Postmaster General is so well acquainted with the facts that he had better elaborate it himself to the House. Perhaps, I may refer him, and I do it in the best and kindest spirit, to the plea of justification which has been placed on the records of the Lower Canada Courts for months, in which I do not hesitate to say, there is not a member of the party who has read that justification, but will say that it contains the most damning evidence of an act which, if it were not unparliamentary, I would say ought to drive the man who committed it from political life, and into political oblivion. If that plea of justification be not true, put in, as it is, in reply to an action entered by the hon. Postmaster General, against the Montreal Gazette, for $100,000 damages, for having charged him with certain acts which I am not going either to characterize or elaborate, because that elaboration, and I have a copy of it, is now in Court, where he can meet and explain it.

Mr. HUNTINGTON: Read it.

Mr. BOWELL: I will give it to the hon. gentleman if he likes to read it to the House.

An Hon. MEMBER: Oh, read it.

Mr. BOWELL: No. I would ask his own friends what they think about it. If it be false, why has the hon. gentleman allowed it to stand on the record for months, staring him and every man in the country who can read, in the face; and if it be true, stamping him as a man who should not occupy the position he does at the present moment? Why has he not punished the man who gave publicity to what he declares to be a slander? Why has he not pushed,—he ought to make a "big push"—to clear his own reputation, by carrying it before the Courts and a jury of his country? That is the answer I make to that matter. If he desires it elaborated, and will retire with me to a private room, I will read it all over to him; but for his own benefit, perhaps the best thing to do would be for the gentleman who put in that plea of justification, to print an extra lot of copies, and send one to each member of the House, and they can read it for themselves and form an opinion. I do not say it is true.

MR. HUNTINGTON: No; yet you insinuate that it is true.

MR. BOWELL: I will say this. If that were not true, I would not allow it to remain on the records of the Court for a number of years. The suit was entered two or three or four years ago. If the hon. gentleman is desirous of continuing the contest upon political purity, or any other kind of purity, with gentlemen on this side of the House, we will be quite prepared to meet him upon any occasion where these facts can be brought before the country. I could read, if it were necessary, the Judge's opinion upon this prosecution. I should show that some of those gentlemen were compelled to disgorge as large sums as £10,000 and £12,000 sterling, which was paid to them for floating what is termed to be—I do not say it is, but it is termed to be—a bogus concern, to use a mild phrase. People will be uncharitable enough to call it a swindling transaction on the stock market of the old country. One thing is certain, the Courts compelled some of these men, when brought before them, to disgorge the proceeds that they had obtained in order to float the stock upon the market. Well, Sir, I leave that matter with the hon. gentleman. I do not desire to refer to it, but perhaps, if he desires the matter elaborated, before the Session is over we will be enabled to elaborate it still further, if not to his advantage, at least to the advantage of the country. I might profitably under this head—particularly when we are accused, on this side of the House, of being corrupt in every sense of the word—show what the Judges of Lower Canada think of the present the hon. Minister of Justice in connection with certain transactions which were called "Peter Funk" auction sales. I think I could also show the opinions of the English Judges in reference to a certain transaction of that hon. gentleman, in which language is used that would not be considered—in England, at least—to be a recommendation to the position which he now holds, but for the present I let that pass. I do not desire to enter into the Halifax or Nova Scotia discussion, but there are one or two points connected with the explanation of the hon. the Minister of Militia that did strike me as somewhat singular. I do not hesitate to say, from my standpoint, listening to his remarks, or his defence, for such it really was, that if the speech read by him were his only utterances upon the occasion, when it was said he ordered the British flag to be pulled down, there was nothing particularly objectionable in it. It is guarded around and hedged around, in such a way, that certainly he practised some diplomacy when he or the reporter wrote it. But this I do say, that if that speech is all that he said, there could not have been the slightest justification for Judge Johnston and Chief Justice Young picking up their hats and leaving the hall in disgust at his utterances. And if that be all that he uttered, why should his late colleague in printing contracts—why should the late Minister of Militia, his own brother-in-law, Mr. Vail, go to the Governor and explain to him that the interpretation put by the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Hastings Doyle, upon that language was not justifiable, but that he only meant that he (Mr. Jones) desired to have the flag lowered, in order that he might be the better able to attack and fight Canada? If he never uttered these words, why should he send an ambassador to the Governor to explain them away? That explanation confirms, if anything could confirm it, that he did give utterance to other language than that contained in the speech which he read to us last night. I repeat again, if he never used the language, there was no necessity to send Mr. Vail to Sir Hastings Doyle to explain to him that it was not Great Britain he desired to injure, that it was not the British flag he desired to pull down in order to separate the Colony from England, but that it simply meant that in his excitement, arising out of the Confederation agitation at the time, it was only Canada that he desired to reach. Now, Sir, these are points that I think the country should weigh well in connection with this matter, and that still remain unexplained; nor did the hon. gentleman in his explanation tell us that Sir Hastings Doyle ever withdrew the charge that he had brought against him. It is true that they made friends, as many do, after quarrelling, whether with sufficient or insufficient cause. But I think the impression must have been left upon the mind of every impartial man in this House, that there was other language used, and that that language would bear the construction put upon it by those who communicated the fact to Sir Hastings Doyle. I have shown plainly enough that the Government of the day have been recreant to almost every promise, and recreant to every profession of principle, to which they ever gave utterance either in the country or in the House. I have shown, from the most incontrovertible evidence, that if corruption exists in the country, it exists not only in the rank and file, but the very worst possible corruption exists in the Ministry that control and guide and direct that rank and file. They say they never interfered in elections. Why did they send their Minister to Quebec? Why did a Minister telegraph to Argenteuil directing postmasters how they should vote? Was not that direct interference? I might go on for hours enumerating acts, not only of the Ministry directly and indirectly, but of nearly all those who sit behind them and support them, to show that not only are they prepared, but that they have, on every opportunity that presented itself, spent their money to carry elections by every means, whether corrupt, foul or fair. And the country will learn, and has learned, long ere this, that they are men in whom profession is one thing and practice another.

MR. BOWELL.

Mr. HUNTINGTON rose to make a personal explanation.

Leave being given,

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he was not going to make any reply—he should think very few men in the House would think of taking that trouble—to the speech which had been made by the hon. gentleman. He had alluded to a statement made regarding him, which he supposed the people of this country had appreciated at its true value. The hon. gentleman had insinuated that that statement was of such a character, that he (Mr. Huntington) was unworthy of the confidence of the country, and a disgrace to public life. The statement to which the hon. gentleman referred was a tissue of falsehoods from beginning to end. He was able to state to the hon. gentleman—promising that he would be the judge of the management of his own law suits—that the slanders which the hon. gentleman and his friends had heaped upon him had never injured him in any degree, either socially or otherwise; because there was not a Tory who knew him,—and there were plenty of them in this House,—but knew how false the story was, yet they sat by in silence hearing an old friend slandered, through the cowardice which party policy imposed upon partisans. On one occasion,—perhaps an unfortunate one,—he was induced to become interested in a copper mine in Lower Canada. Better men than himself had been interested in these mines as well. He devoted a great deal of time and trouble in attempting to develop these mines; and he had sent large quantities of ore from them to Liverpool, Baltimore and Boston. These were the mines that were represented to be a sham. He sold those mines in England, and from that day to this he had never had any difficulty or controversy about them with the parties who purchased them. On his return to this country, as they were of a particular character, he was asked to assist certain parties on the other side in obtaining other mines of a similar character, which had been more or less developed. He undertook, by arrangement with other gentlemen who had property in Lower Canada, to obtain the option of these mines, as it is called; and in order that he might be in a position to say to the capitalists on the other side that he could deed them these properties, he did obtain the option of several of them. He thought there were nineteen of them. He obtained them at low prices, after an examination by engineers, as he was requested to do. He went to England, as he was asked by these parties to do, in order to be in a position to give them these titles. He had never seen these properties; one or two of them he had seen, but he had never seen the others. He had no idea of being regarded as a promoter in London. He simply went there under this arrangement. He was in a position to convey the properties, and he did convey the properties by a deed in which it was specially declared that he was neither responsible for the descriptions nor the titles to those properties which the parties well knew he had never seen. They got their information from reports which had been made, and from engineers whom they trusted. He came back to this country having sold these properties, and he might say he never made anything out of the company which purchased them. The only thing he was to have was some stock in the company, which he never got. He sold these properties and came back to this country. Unfortunately, there came to his knowledge circumstances which induced him to make grave charges against the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald). He had never, until that time, heard a word of complaint, about these mines. The hon. gentleman promised him an investigation, which, Session after Session, he had demanded at the hands of those who saw fit to accuse him; and he was glad to know that the hon. gentleman promised now to move.

MR. BOWELL: I made no such promise.

MR. HUNTINGTON: The hon. gentleman does not promise; he only insinuates.

MR. BOWELL: Go to the Courts where you have taken the case and sustain your own innocence.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he was speaking to the House, and not to the hon. gentleman. After his return to this country, the first information he had that there was any difficulty was from the right hon. gentleman Sir John A. Macdonald. Months passed, and no demands were made upon him until Parliament met in November. Then he received a private letter from

MR. HUNTINGTON.

Glasgow, telling him that very startling declarations had been made about fraudulent statements he had made, and that the reports regarding these came from parties on this side of the water. The Toronto Mail and other papers published the scandal, and stated that Mr. Huntington was going to have to pay smartly. A public dinner was given him at Montreal, and the report was circulated that he was to be arrested at this dinner for crimes he had committed. Time went on, and he was sued in Glasgow; and every conceivable thing that the lawyers could allege against him was alleged to void the contract. He had been sued for more money than most men in America had been sued for, and he might tell the Speaker in confidence that if judgment had gone against him he could not pay it. He was sued for £500,000 stg. No judge ever spoke of his case, because its merits never went before the Courts. The company sent an agent over to investigate the circumstances. That investigation it was unnecessary for him to enter into; but the Committee which the hon. gentleman insinuates he would move for, and which it was his duty to move for under the circumstances, if he sought to attack him in his public life on account of this transaction, could investigate into the whole circumstances. The company withdrew their action by a deed of settlement by which their matters of difference against him were settled. They declared in the deed of settlement that the action had been brought upon representations made from this side of the water, and they had found that these were utterly unfounded and incorrect; and the hon. gentleman knew that very well. This was the simple history of the only transaction which he had had with any copper mining company, in reference to which he had had any controversy. He never assumed obligations to these parties, because they knew he was not acquainted with the property. He never undertook to guarantee anything, nor was he responsible for the titles and descriptions of the property. Finally, when these men found out that he had been maligned, they came forward, and by a deed of settlement relieved him from all responsibility.

The hon. gentleman said: "Why don't you go into the Court?" It was none of the hon. gentleman's business. So far as this House was concerned, if his private conduct was of such a character as to disgrace him as a public man, it was the duty of the House to say that he should not remain there; but the member of the House who was willing to insinuate these things against him, when he had neither the courage nor the means to prove them, was a mean coward and a slanderer, when outside of the House; although, when there, by mere courtesy, which everybody was obliged to exercise towards members of the House, he was an hon. gentleman. He did not especially blame the hon. gentleman in this matter, for they knew what was said about fools rushing in where angels feared to tread. The hon. gentleman would not move for a Committee. The hon. gentleman would do nothing but indulge in cowardly insinuations, which were as baseless as the fabric of a vision. The hon. gentleman dare not do anything regarding this matter, except to indulge in cowardly insinuations, and he told the hon. gentleman that he did not regret having attacked his leader in 1873. He did not regret the consequences of that attack. He did not regret the hatreds which had been heaped upon him by hon. gentlemen opposite, owing to the attack which had led to results that should have driven the right hon. member for Kingston, out of public life, after he had disgraced the position which he occupied. He, moreover, would tell the hon. gentleman, that when he (Mr. Huntington) preferred the charges in question, he did so openly, speaking from his place in the House. He had then taken his political life in his hand, but he had never insinuated anything against the right hon. member for Kingston or any member of the House, nor had he said anything against their private character. He had done his duty to his country touching this question, and for having done so he was followed by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and assailed with their fierce hatred and cowardly slanders; and these accusations which were preferred against him by hon. gentlemen opposite, were as baseless as they were mean, and cowardly and slanderous.

MR. BOWELL said that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Huntington) had one particle of honesty in his bosom. He would tell the House that he had not referred in any way to the hon. gentleman's copper mine transactions.

MR. HUNTINGTON: But you insinuated it like the coward that you are.

MR. BOWELL: The hon. member (Mr. Huntington) had, when an hon. member referred to the copper mines, asked him to elaborate that transaction, and he had then referred him to the plea of justification which was filed in the Court in reference to that transaction.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I take care of my own law suits.

MR. BOWELL: The hon. gentleman talked about cowards. If he were not mean, dastardly and cowardly, he would not have entered a suit in justification of his own character and then fail to push it and punish his accuser. He had acted in this matter precisely as he had acted in the matter to which he (Mr. Huntington) had alluded, and which he said had brought down upon him the hatred and the vengeance of the Conservative party. Why the hon. gentleman was unworthy the hatred of anyone. He was not in the habit of man-worship; if he were the hon. gentleman was by no means the standard of man, privately or politically, he would fall down and worship. If he had referred to the matter at all, it had been because the hon. gentleman had asked him to do so, and because the question was suggested by another. But he did not hesitate to say that the hon. gentleman had acted not only like a coward, but meanly in connection with this law-suit as well as in connection with the Pacific Scandal, otherwise he would have put in an appearance in Court, and before the Royal Commission, and produced evidence in proof of the falsity of the one charge and the truth of the other. Not having done either it was for the House and the country to judge where the cowardice and meanness lay.

MR. SPEAKER said he was sorry that such statements had been made about the floor of the House. Such language was unparliamentary, and he thought they must all regret its use. He hoped that now this matter was passed over, hon. gentlemen would endeavour to pay some regard to the proprieties.

MR. COOK said that the remarks of Mr. Speaker had been very apropos with regard to what had occurred. He felt convinced that ever since the opening of the Session the Opposition had organized in order to make a violent attempt to injure the hon. gentlemen on the right of the Speaker. His name had been brought before the House and bandied about from the lips of the hon. members for Cumberland and North Hastings; and no doubt it would be re-echoed by the hon. gentlemen hereafter. It had been stated by hon. gentlemen that he had spent $30,000 in carrying his election; but any hon. gentleman who on the floor of the House ventured to make such an assertion, stated what he would know on reading the evidence, was incorrect and unfounded. At the election in question his political foe had been unscrupulous, and had resorted to unfair means; and he (Mr. Cook), therefore, believed it was his duty as a candidate in the interests of his party and of himself, to meet that man with his own weapons. When he made that expenditure he had done so, knowing that only a very small portion of the money spent on the opposite side came from his opponent's pocket, though a very large proportion came from Sir Hugh Allan's heavy contribution. The right hon. member for Kingston had perambulated the country in the summer, holding picnics—which, by the way, were not altogether favourable to or for the well-being or honour of his party—and on such occasions he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had had the assurance to state, time and time again, that H. H. Cook had spent $30,000 in that contest. He admitted—and he had done so on oath—that he then spent $15,000. What were the facts? If an Election Law, such as was now on the Statute-book, had then existed—if such an Election Law as the Reform party had sought to place upon the Statute-book—and were opposed by the Government of the day in 1873, when he had had the honour of a seat in the House—had been enacted, matters would have been in a different position; but the then Administration would not accept the law introduced by the Opposition, though the right hon. member for Kingston saw that an Election Law of some kind had to be passed. Such an enactment was demanded by the people of this country; and what did the right hon. gentleman do? He put an abortion of the Election Law on the Statute-book. Had the present Election Law been in force, he thought it could be proven that in the contest in question his then opponent, the present member for Cornwall, had spent at least $10,000 more than he (Mr. Cook) had done, making up the sum of $25,000. He was not personally acquainted with these facts, but political friends of the hon. member (Mr. McCarthy) had, to his knowledge, stated time and again that this sum of money had been spent by the hon. gentleman on that occasion. Former supporters of the hon. gentleman now supported him, and he was glad to be able to inform the House that a large number of his former political supporters had abandoned the hon. gentleman. He (Mr. McCarthy) had stated in this House that he was prepared to stake his political future on the result of the next election in North Simcoe. But a few days ago a convention of the Conservative party had been held in the county of Simcoe, and what had the hon. gentleman then done? He telegraphed to the delegates not to make any nomination, but to hold it in abeyance. What did this mean? It was an act of cowardice on the part of the hon. gentleman, who, he was sorry to say, was not now in his seat, being absent from the House, as was usual in his case, on personal business. The hon. gentleman dared not meet him, and the party he had the honour of supporting, at the next general election. Regarding the evidence which had been spoken of and read that evening, he could truthfully and correctly assert that it was garbled. It had not been taken down as he gave it. For instance, when Mr. McCarthy had said to him—“I suppose that your brothers would have a sympathy with you and assist you?” he had replied—“I suppose the same sympathy would be extended to me as your brother extended to you when he carried the money that was sent up from the fund of Sir Hugh Allan." The hon. gentleman had tried to represent in the House the constituency of North Simcoe, but he was confident that he (Mr. McCarthy) would never obtain that honour. Hon. gentlemen had repeatedly spoken of a reaction having taken place in Ontario, but no such feeling was exhibited in the county of Simcoe. In 1871, at the election for the local member in that county, Mr. Ardagh had obtained a majority of 981; eight months later, he (Mr. Cook) was returned to the House by a majority of 56, and at the general election in 1874, his majority was 154. He had been unseated owing to the act of an individual who had offered money to an elector, a political opponent, though he had no idea whatever that it would be accepted; and he understood it was merely offered to him in a joke. When this party came to the polling booth, he took out the money, handed it to the chairman of the Conservative committee for the town of Collingwood, and said to that gentleman, "There is the money I got for my vote, I would not vote for Mr. Cook. I will vote for Mr. McCarthy, and if Mr. Cook is elected, you can unseat him." After he was unseated for that reason, Mr. McCarthy had stated to several of his friends, he knew Mr. Cook had been harshly dealt with, and that he would make amends by allowing him to be returned by acclamation. He (Mr. McCarthy) had also advised his friends not to allow his friends to open the campaign, and he (Mr. Cook) was induced to refrain from canvassing, thinking he would be elected by acclamation. The result was exactly what he told his friends it would be. He had no confidence in the integrity or truthfulness of the hon. gentleman, because, he having known him for a long time, he was aware that his word could not be trusted.

MR. SPEAKER.

Mr. PLUMB rose to a point of order. He asked, were not these naughty words, in view of the previous ruling of the Speaker, particularly out of place in the absence of the hon. gentleman who was attacked? The hon. member (Mr. Cook) had always chosen such an opportunity for such attacks.

MR. SPEAKER said that as the gentleman to whom reference was made was now a member of the House, he thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cook) ought not to use such language.

MR. COOK said if the hon. member for Cardwell was not in his place, he should be, and if the hon. member ever expected to represent a constituency more than one term, he would have to be more punctual in his attendance on the sittings of the House. He did not know that the hon. gentleman could secure his re-election for his present constituency at the North Simcoe nomination. In December, 1874, a mine was sprung upon him (Mr. Cook), and the hon. gentleman also, who had been actively canvassing, was proposed a candidate. Nevertheless, though without organization and without canvass, save in the towns and villages, he was elected by a majority of 74; while his opponent had the advantage of regular organization and of the formation of committees throughout the riding. With proper organization, his majority would have amounted to 400 or 500. It was very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to allude to matters that had taken place in the courts of law. But he supposed that if in these contests, any individual had spent his own money of his own free will, the Government was not responsible for his expenditure, which was made voluntarily on his own account, nor should the Reform party be made responsible for any faults he might have happened to commit. He admitted that some of his acts were wrong; but, as he had stated, he had had to meet Old Nick with fire. If one man attacked another with a revolver or any deadly weapon it should not be repelled by a rawhide or stick, and the assault should be resented with the same weapon. The hon. gentlemen opposite were always talking about what the supporters of the Government had done; but he remembered that in the course of an investigation which took place last year regarding the Secret Service Fund, it appeared that the sum of $6,000 had been given to an hon. Senator. This fact had a very suspicious look. What had been done with this money? An election had been progressing at the time in Kingston, but they did not know what had become of that money. And what was more strange, was the fact that when the right hon. member was unseated—and he should have been disqualified—the hon. Senator in question was non est, and was not to be found. It was said that the hon. gentleman had gone to Dixie's land, and he might have gone to the other side of Jordan for aught he knew; all this was very suspicious. It was not known how the money was expended, but it might have been used in tampering with the free and independent electors of Kingston. They, however, knew, in connection with the Pacific Scandal, how constituencies had been corrupted by the use of money on the part of the hon. gentleman opposite; they knew that the right hon. gentleman opposite had refused to pass an Election Law by which members could be elected without any sign or semblance of corruption; they knew that all these things had been withheld, and that inducements had been extended to supporters of the right hon. gentleman "to go in and win, my boys." The late Government was to have been saved at all hazards. Taking all these matters into consideration, he thought they looked very suspicious.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: You should not be so suspicious.

MR. COOK said, he regretted the absence from the House of the hon. member for Cardwell, whom he was equally ready to meet on the floor of the House or on the stump. He knew that the hon. gentleman was able; but as he (Mr. Cook) always had the best side, being on the right side, he had a great advantage over the hon. gentleman: and this made all the difference in the world. A Reform convention would be held in a few days, to nominate a candidate, and there the right hon. member for Kingston might hold one or two or a dozen picnics in the constituency, for the more he held the larger would be the majority the nominee of the convention would receive at the next election. If the right hon. gentleman would send the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), they would be glad to see him also, for there was an impression among the people which he would not like to state to the House. He had received, with the greatest gratification and pleasure, a visit from the right hon. gentleman; and if the leaders of the Opposition would favor him with just another visit, they would see what the reaction amounted to. They would then see what the constituencies of Ontario were; they would see whether all the constituencies from Sarnia to the Eastern border line of Ontario would be taken from the party in power and given to a party which would not again be in power for many years. He hailed with pleasure the time when the Conservative leaders would visit his constituency for they would have good times. The Opposition talked about midnight attacks. Every hon. member who had read the Mail newspaper would have observed that during several months it had been endeavouring to educate the Government not to have a dissolution, alleging that it would be a weak act; and the hon. members reiterated those statements and remarks made by a newspaper which never gave a fair report. Any one who would read the summary of Parliamentary proceedings in the Mail, would be satisfied that it was written for the purpose of leading the public astray. But, thank God, the Ontario people are not to be caught with such chaff; and that the right hon. gentleman, with all his blandishments and suavity of manner, backed up by the Mail newspaper, would not for a moment induce the people of Ontario to leave the true party in which they had been travelling for a number of years; but, on the contrary would send back Reform representatives, perhaps much stronger than they were to-day. Although that was a subject in the discussion of which he had not desired to participate, for he would prefer some other subject; nevertheless, the Opposition had made an attack, and it was his duty, as representing one of the largest and most intelligent constituencies in the Dominion, to give hon. gentlemen what was their just due.

MR. COOK.

MR. DYMOND: Mr. Speaker, I had no intention whatever of taking the slightest part in the present debate, and I only desire to intrude on the House for a few moments.

MR. BOWELL: Is that the Globe you have before you?

MR. DYMOND: The Globe is a terror to evil-doers only, and a praise to them that do well. The hon. gentleman need not begin to squirm at the first sight of the Globe. I only trouble the House in consequence of an attempt that has been made—I think a most unfair and ungenerous attempt—by the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) to convey the impression to this House, which the party with which he is identified has sought again and again to convey to the whole country, that a celebrated communication known as the "Big Push Letter" was indicative of widespread corruption in the Reform ranks, and a corrupt intention on the part of the hon. gentleman who wrote it. I have a special repugnance to appearing in this House—even on the present occasion, when I am led to do so by an imperious sense of duty—as the defender of the Hon. George Brown. There are gentlemen in this House who have delicacy enough of feeling to understand the remark I have just made. It has seldom happened in the course of the four years I have had the honour of a seat in this House, that any hon. gentleman has so far forgotten what was due to himself and to the profession to which I have the honour to belong, to violate that principle of impersonality which is the journalist's great protection, and which is needed as a protection less by me than many of the men who write at the bidding of hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House. I can say, at all events, after being eight years connected with the public press of Canada, that I am not ashamed to acknowledge to any man one sentence I have written, and that I have never been asked to write one word which my conscience did not approve or which I to-day desire to retract. I propose to read a few extracts from the sworn affidavit of the Hon. George Brown, when charged with contempt of Court before the Queen's Bench, at Toronto. As a remark was made with respect to Mr. Justice Wilson, and attention was called to the fact that he was formerly a member of the Reform party, that he was in political life a member for the riding which I have now the honour to represent, I beg leave to say this, and I say it with a full sense of my responsibility as a member of this House, that a graver case of forgetfulness and of what was decent and becoming has not been witnessed in any judge on the Canadian Bench during the period of which I know anything of the history of Canada than was the action and conduct of Mr. Justice Wilson, when he made the remarks which the Globe so gravely impugned. As it was suggested by the hon. member for North Hastings that I was the writer of that article, I may as well just say that he knows, as well as I do, that the article was acknowledged by the hon. George Brown when he was before the Court, as having been written by his own hand. It appears there has been a plan, perhaps it will not be parliamentary to say a conspiracy, to bring before this House a vast mass of matter—documentary to a large extent—which will naturally find its way into the pages of the Hansard, and form a sort of cheap literature for circulation by hon. gentlemen opposite during the coming elections. That seemed to be the object and motive of some of the speeches, and especially that of the hon. member for North Hastings. Fair play is a jewel, and I therefore claim for the paragraphs I am about to read,—and I will select only those necessary to my case—the same publicity that will no doubt be given to the speech of that hon. member. The paragraphs which I desire to read from the sworn affidavit of Mr. Brown, are the following:

"26. I am aware that at the general elections for the Canadian House of Commons, which took place in the year 1872, there was a General Election Fund for promoting in a legal and proper manner the political interests of the Reform party of the Province of Ontario; I have a personal knowledge of the extent and objects of that fund, and of the manner of its application; and I say that the entire amount of the said General Election

Fund was less than thirty-eight hundred dollars, and consisted entirely of voluntary subscriptions from members of the Reform party; and I say further, I have no doubt whatever that this was the only General Election Fund of the Reform party for the Province of Ontario at the said General Election of 1872; as I never heard of the existence of any other such fund, and had any such existed I am sure I must have known it.

"27. I say that the said fund was raised for the purpose of promoting the success of the Reform party in various constituencies at said election, by defraying the travelling expenses of public speakers, by printing and circulating political documents, by assisting to pay the legal and necessary expenses of candidates unable to bear the lawful expenses of election contests, and by aiding in similar necessary and lawful expenditures.

"28. I say that no part of the said fund was asked or contributed for corrupt or any other illegal or immoral purpose; that those who apportioned it paid out no part thereof for corrupt or any other illegal or immoral purpose; and that, so far as I know and believe, no portion of the money was applied to any such purpose by those to whom it was apportioned.

"29. I say that the letter written by me on 15th August, 1872, to the Hon. John Simpson, requesting him to subscribe to the said General Election Fund, and which was commented upon by Mr. Justice Wilson in his judgment of 29th June, 1876, was one out of either three or four similar letters written by me to personal and political friends; that no other such letter, and no other letter of any description, was written by me requesting subscriptions to the said General Election Fund of 1872, or to any other political purpose at that election; that I have no knowledge of any letters having been written by anybody requesting subscriptions to the said fund, except the said three or four which were written by me, and I do not believe that any were written.

"30. I say that the Hon. John Simpson did not contribute anything to the said General Election Fund in response to my letter, or in any other way, and that the entire amount sent or received in response to the said three or four letters written by this deponent was either $122 or $123. And I say further that the largest amount I hoped to receive from Mr. Simpson in response to my letter was $100.

"31. I say that my said letter to the Hon. John Simpson was not written for corrupt purposes—was not written to interfere with the freedom of elections—and was not an invitation to anybody to commit the offence of bribery and corruption at the polls. I say that it was, on the contrary, simply an application for a reasonable subscription from a member of the Reform party towards maintaining the efficiency of his political party, and thereby promoting the cause of good government.

"32. I say that the urgent tone of my said letter to Mr. Simpson arose from the fact that in making preliminary arrangements in regard to a Liberal candidate to represent the East Riding of the City of Toronto, in which we anticipated (and rightly anticipated, as the event proved) a very hot contest, it became necessary to give a promise that the sum of $500 would be contributed from the said General Election Fund to the actually necessary and lawful expenses of the Liberal candidate in that Riding; that this promise was given by me on behalf of myself and others; that when the time came for its fulfilment the General Election Fund had been exhausted, and a special effort had to be made to provide the said sum of $500 or break faith. I say that the said amount not having been forthcoming, I paid it from my own funds in order to fulfil my promise, the balance between the said sum of $122 or $123 received as aforesaid being a personal contribution by me to the said fund; And I further say that the said sum of $500 was the only apportionment of so large an amount made to any constituency from the said General Election Fund; that the next highest sum given was either $250 or $300, and that the balance of the $3,700 composing the fund was apportioned in sums varying from $20 to $200.

"33. I say that the 'grand stand to be made on Saturday' at the East Toronto election spoken of in my said letter to Mr. Simpson, referred to the thorough organization of the Ward Committees, and the systematic arrangements for bringing up promptly and fully the voters for the Liberal candidate, and the vigilant exertions at the polls to detect and prevent the admission of fraudulent votes. The 'big push' spoken of in the said letter had the same meaning."

I believe I need not apologise to the House for having taken up their time, for I think there is not more than one hon. member who would desire to prevent an absent man from having justice done him.

MR. McCALLUM moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and Debate adjourned.

House adjourned at Twenty minutes to Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 14th Feb., 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

MR. McCALLUM said that in the few remarks which he should make in reply to the Address moved in reply to His Excellency's Speech from the Throne, he would endeavour to confine himself as far as possible to a fair criticism of the Government's policy or want of policy. Previous to doing so, however, he would comment briefly on statements which had fallen the day previous from the lips of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Norris). That hon. gentleman said he did not want any assistance from the Government. He knew that the hon. member was a very popular and very strong man in his constituency; but, nevertheless, he had had assistance from the Government. It could not be otherwise, and he would not say that it was illegitimate. In that part of the country a large amount of money was expended on public works by the Government of the day, and a large number of men were employed by the Government; and, consequently, it was no matter for wonder that the county of Lincoln, through the Government, should return him to the House. The hon. gentleman said he did not want any Government assistance; but the truth was, they could not aid the hon. gentleman, in fact the support of the Government would be almost sufficient to defeat the hon. gentleman in that constituency—and why? this was because the people of Lincoln were not in accord with the Administration respecting their trade policy. The hon. member was very strong and popular in his county, but the Government was not so, as the three elections that had taken place in that constituency proved. He claimed, and he would endeavour to prove to the House and the people of the country, that the Government had obtained the confidence of the people under false pretences. Let them look for a moment at what had formerly been the party cries of the hon. gentlemen opposite. What were they? They were these—pure party Government, no coalition, economy in all public expenditure, control by Parliament over the expenditure of the people's money, independence of Parliament, and the letting of contracts for public works to the lowest tender without favouritism. He would not deal with all these questions; but he would discuss some of them. The issues of the day were now pretty well before the country, and they had been so placed before the people during last summer by hon. gentlemen sitting on both sides of the House.

MR. DYMOND.

He observed in the speeches delivered by the hon. gentlemen opposite—and, for instance, in the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton)—the declaration of the same old cries: economy and purity. He had endeavoured in the House to show to the people of the country, as the representative of Monck, that these hon. gentlemen had no claim to the practice of economy. He would examine in this relation the departmental expenses of last year, and he contended that if the Government could not control this expenditure, made immediately in their departments, it could not be expected that this could be done by them elsewhere. He would read over a few items, and make a comparison between such expenditure for 1873 and 1876,—the former being the last year when Sir John A. Macdonald's Government was in power. The expenditure for the Governor General's Secretary's office in 1873 amounted to $8,240; in 1876 these amounted to $9,325, showing an increase of $1,085. The salaries paid in the Privy Council office in 1873 amounted to $8,909, and in 1876 they were $11,250; increase $2,341. In this manner he could proceed to the end of the chapter; that same increase was visible in every department. The expenditure for the Department of Justice, which had been for a long time presided over by the hon. member for South Bruce, was in 1873, $7,967; in 1876 it was $12,700 increase—$4,735. He was aware that the late Minister of Justice had stated at Teeswater that he (Mr. Blake) had saved money to the country and retrenched the expenditure for his Department. He (Mr. McCallum) hoped that this was the case. It was about time that such retrenchment should be made; and if this had taken place, it must have been due to the criticism which had been passed in this relation on the policy of the Government by members of the Opposition. It was announced that a saving in expenditure for cab hire had been effected, and the country ought to rejoice thereat. But it might be that some of the work which had been formerly done in this Department had been transferred over to some other one, necessitating the same amount of expenditure. The expenses connected with the Department of the Secretary of State for 1873 were $28,054; for 1876 they were $28,730, increase $676. The expenses for the Department of the Minister of the Interior in 1873 were $15,206; in 1876 they were $37,030, increase $21,824, and these increases were paid out of the pockets of the people and the resources of this country. He had taken these figures from the Public Accounts. As to the Department of Militia and Defence, he did not know but that the new Minister of War might retrench its expenditure, but no such thing had been done by the late Minister; in 1873 the expenditure for this Department amounted to $29,366; in 1876 it amounted to $33,750, increase, $4,384. The expenses for the Receiver General's Department—the duties of the Receiver General, he would remark by the way, must be very arduous—were in 1873, $15,418, and in 1876, $16,825; increase, $1,407. The expenditure of the Finance Department in 1873 was $41,690, and in 1876, $52,050; increase, $10,360. In the Customs Department the expenditure in 1873 amounted to $21,027, and in 1876 to $24,550; increase, $3,523. The expenditure for the Inland Revenue Department was in 1873, $15,977, and in 1876, $20,830; increase, $4,853. Other departmental expenditures were as follows:—Public Works Department, 1873, $37,124 1876, $45,534 increase, $8,410. Marine and Fisheries, 1873, $16,436; 1876, $23,060—increase, $6,624. Department of Agriculture, 1873, $22,240; 1876, $26,455—increase, $4,015. Post Office Department, 1873, $65,743; 1876, $82,445—increase, $16,702. He also found a large increase in the contingencies item besides. He could proceed in this manner throughout the public service. All the other facts, as to expenditure, were in keeping with those which he had mentioned. The same thing was true of the Government's administration throughout the country, where three men were employed to do two men's work.

An HON. MEMBER: This cannot be so.

Mr. McCALLUM: This was a fact.

Mr. McCALLUM.

He never desired to state anything which he did not believe to be correct, to the House. He would refer to another matter relating to the Pictou and Truro Branch Railway, N.S. It was known that a resolution had formerly passed the House according to which this railway was to be given to a company on certain conditions, but what did they find to have taken place last year? In the interim, and before the bill had passed the House, to confirm this arrangement, the Government had expended something like $300,000 in order to relay this road with steel rails, and then handed it over to the company without taking the House into their confidence. He felt satisfied that more had been done in this regard than had been known, and that the Government was anxious to bury and put out of the way that monument of their folly,—the piles of steel rails which were now rusting in this country; but he had not for a moment thought that the Administration would give away the amount of $300,000 for steel rails and for repairs to the ferry and wharves at New Glasgow.

An HON. MEMBER: What did they do with the old iron?

Mr. McCALLUM: What had the Government done with the old iron? That was the question. He must say this, that at the time the resolutions in question were before the House, and when the Government had taken authority to give away the old iron rails, he had risen and stated that if such power were bestowed upon the Administration, they would use it in order to keep themselves in power; and the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) had also then said the Government should not be clothed with any such authority. He (Mr. McCallum) had further declared that the then proposition of the Government was wrong in principle, and that the House would find it would be wrong in practice; and if he was to believe what appeared in the press of the country, an hon. member from the Province of New Brunswick had stated on the hustings that he had received a letter from the hon. the Prime Minister, informing him that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had sufficient old rails to lay what is called the Central Railway. And if, what the press stated was correct, that hon. gentleman had further said he had made the bestowal of old rails conditional with the hon. the Prime Minister in return for his support of the Administration. The predictions of his hon. friend from North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) and of himself, in this connection, had come true. The Government were using these old rails in order to keep themselves in power, in lieu of selling the rails to the benefit of the people, who were taxpayers in this country. He knew that his hon. friend the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was an authority regarding the trade of the United States, and he (Mr. Charlton) was a gentleman whom he (Mr. McCallum) very much respected. On a former occasion, that hon. gentleman had made a very strong Protection speech in this House. He was not going to accuse the hon. gentleman of having done anything wrong in changing his opinion on this question, for every man had a right to change his opinion. But when this hon. gentleman told them that the protectionist policy of the United States,—that great country to the south of us, which he might say was the country of the hon. gentleman's birth,—had been extremely disastrous to that country, and further, that we should avoid copying that policy, he preferred by far to take the dictum of the Secretary of State for the United States on this question, for this latter gentleman was a much greater authority on that subject even than his hon. friend Mr. Charlton. And what did Mr. Evarts say? In the first place, he would ask how they were going to ascertain that a people were prosperous? By what means were they to discover that a nation was prosperous? This must be done by learning what had been their increase of population and of trade. What were the facts? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) had the other day told the House that the prosperous period of the United States was the period which elapsed between 1850 and 1860. He (Mr. McCallum) knew that the United States were at that time prosperous; but he thought that his hon. friend from Niagara (Mr.

Plumb) had knocked the pins from under the feet of the hon. member, when he (Mr. Plumb) showed the degree of protection which the United States then enjoyed. What was the fact as far as the United States were concerned? In 1850, twenty-seven years ago, their exports amounted in value to $136,941,912, and their imports to $178,138,318, showing a balance of $41,196,406 against them. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) in his address to the House, had endeavoured to convey the idea that the United States had stood still, as far as prosperity was concerned, for seventeen years; and that the United States were in a less prosperous condition to-day than they were twenty-seven years ago. In 1860, the exports of the United States amounted in value to $378,189,274 and the imports to $362,166,252, showing a balance in their favour at that time, it was true, of $16,023,022; but his hon. friend had sought to make the House believe that the United States had not made any progress since that time—seventeen years ago. The fact was that in 1877, the last fiscal year for which they had returns, the exports of the United States amounted to $658,637,457, and the imports to $492,067,540, showing a balance in favour of that country of $166,539,917. How then could the hon. member undertake to show that the United States had remained in a stationary condition? He thought he could prove that the hon. gentleman was mistaken in this respect. In 1860 the exports and imports of the United States amounted in value to $740,355,526, and in 1877 to $1,150,704,991, showing an increase for these seventeen years of over 50 per cent. and this was the country that we should avoid copying, and which was going to ruin. They were asked to take the statement of the hon. member on this subject no matter what any other authority, or what any member of the American Government might say. The hon. gentleman asked this House and the people of this country to accept him as their authority on that great question. He (Mr. McCallum) declined to do so. He would now read the opinions of some eminent men in the United States and see what they said as far as Protection to encourage the industries of the people was concerned. He did not advocate Protection for Protection's sake. He maintained that the tariff of this country should be levied so as to encourage the industries of our own people. He claimed that this should be done. He would see what Mr. Evarts, the Secretary of State for the United States, stated. It was as follows:—

“Although there may be many signs of reviving industry, no great and thoroughly felt movement in this direction can be expected until some comprehensive policy be adopted to disenthral the contracted sphere of American trade. By this I do not mean that the industrial interests of this country demand Free Trade. I am fully advised and convinced by correspondence, study and reflection, that this theory is not a true one for this country. The first duty of a Government is the judicious protection of the products of the capital and labour of its own people. In our country, the agricultural classes of the west, as well as the manufacturing classes of the east, have a mutual interest in the preservation and promotion of home industry, for no one class of our people can thrive long without the co-operation of the productive labour of the other. As an instance of the disadvantages of what is known as Free Trade, in its radical sense, it is but necessary to look to the deplorable condition of the iron trade in Germany. The loss on last year's operations amounts to $2,000,000 on a capital of $75,000,000 in iron and steel companies alone; and this, it is found, has disastrously affected other interests. Even such a reliable English authority as the Iron and Coal Trade Review, alluding to the defeat of the bill in the German Reichstag reimposing duties upon iron and steel, admits that the iron trade of Germany received a disastrous blow through that action. In France the value of the Protection policy is held. According to the report of the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, there is shown, against 3,907,000,000 francs of exports and imports in 1859, 7,625,000,000 francs, the value of the same in 1874. The same has been the experience of Russia; and according to a late communication from Minister Layard, at Constantinople, the largest share of the imbecility and poverty of the Turkish people, as now demonstrated in the condition of the empire in its struggle in the existing war, is attributed solely to the edicts in the interest of unqualified Free Trade. The Free Trade system of England may have been beneficial to the industrial interests of that country; but with increased cost of material and labour, sooner or later inevitable, the conditions now favourable to such a policy will be greatly modified.

“I cannot be willing to sacrifice the developing interests of my country to an abstract idea. In regard to this protective system I do not entertain the opinion that legislation of a prohibitory character would be a wise policy, but Protection to the extent of guarding home industry against ruinous foreign competition. In the introduction of improved appliances in the way of machinery, the cost of production has been lowered, so that, by a judicious encouragement of American manufactures, the competition now being felt by foreign manufactures from American articles will be greatly strengthened and enlarged. Protection and Free Trade are abstract terms, vague in meaning, and but little understood. My view is, that it is not Protection or Free Trade so much as full trade that we require. The vast resources of our country need an outlet, as we have recognized so disastrously during the past five years. Production is greater than our home demands; and unless an outlet is found for this excess we must still continue to feel the depressing effects. It is the duty of the Government, as already intimated, to protect all classes—not only the manufacturers, but the agriculturists and miners.”

That was the authority that was given to this House. The policy of the United States was to protect the agriculturists of the country as well as the manufacturing and mining interests. Who did the House imagine they would protect the people against? Against the competition of the Canadians, who were alongside of them. He hoped that this Government would soon, at least, if they did not do it now, re-arrange the tariff to meet this state of things, or they would find to their sorrow that they were doing injustice to the people. He agreed with the hon. member for North Norfolk, when he said that this country wanted a fair field and no favour. He agreed with him that it was very desirable that there should be a fair field and no favour. He asked no favours. He believed that the Canadian people should have a fair field and no favour, and they could compete in any branch of business with any other people in the world. He believed they were economical and industrious; but he would ask the hon. gentleman if they now got a fair field and no favour? That was the question. He would endeavour to prove to this House, before he sat down, that they had not got a fair field and no favour. He thought he could show that the people of this country, through the unjust trade relations between this country and the United States, were losers to the extent of $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 a year. Hon. gentlemen might say that that could not be done; but he would endeavour to do it. Last year, at least as far as he had got the returns, we sold the Americans $26,085,263 worth, but of that, $1,475,330 went in under the Fisheries Treaty—it was the product of the fisheries; therefore, in making up this calculation, that must be thrown out, so that there was left $24,609,938. How much did it cost the people of this country to take advantage of the United States market to sell them that amount of goods? What was the tariff of the United States? He held in his hand a statement of the average of duty on all goods going into the United States,—first upon dutiable goods alone, and also upon free and dutiable goods. It was as follows:—

MR. MCCALLUM.

| | Dutiable. Per Cent. | Free and Dutiable. Per Cent. |
|-----------|------------------------|---------------------------------|
| 1867..... | 46 | 42 |
| 1868..... | 48 | 44 |
| 1869..... | 47 | 42 |
| 1870..... | 47 | 42 |
| 1871..... | 43 | 38 |
| 1872..... | 41 | 36 |
| 1873..... | 38 | 26 |
| 1874..... | 38 | 26 |
| 1875..... | 40 | 28 |
| 1876..... | 44 | 30 |

They sent from Canada free goods to the United States, and they also sent dutiable goods. Taking a fair average, let us see what it cost this country to sell goods to the United States to the amount of $24,609,938. According to that tariff of 30 per cent., upon the amount of goods sold to the United States, this country paid a duty of $7,318,981.40. Now look at the other side of the question, and see how much the United States paid—how much money this country collected of the United States. This country bought from the United States $46,065,384 of goods, and collected of them $4,104,487; but if we were to charge them at the same rate that they charged us, we should have collected $13,819,615.20; so that they had the advantage of this country by the arrangement to the extent of $9,418,128. That was the way the matter stood to-day; that was the position that our country was in with the United States. Was that what the hon. member for North Norfolk considered a fair field and no favour? He knew that hon. gentlemen would say, "If you raise the duty and exclude the Americans, we will not get the goods into the country." That was just what this country wanted. If they did not take American goods into this country, the Canadian people would manufacture for their own consumption. This was another of the questions that the Government would have to meet at the polls. He did not know that he should take up the time of the House much longer, as that was the principal point he wished to make. He might, however, look back a little at the policy of this Government when they were on the Opposition side of the House—at least of the present men in power—what they used to advocate when they were on that side of the House. Take their policy on the Pacific Railway. What did the organ of the party say in reference to that? What was the policy of the organ of that party—which was their policy at that time—as to the necessity of a railway through British territory for the development of its mighty and varied resources? In an article in the Toronto Globe, of the 3rd February, 1871, it was stated as follows:—

"1. A Pacific Railway through British territory is a necessity, if the new Dominion is to have anything like a fair chance of fulfilling its destiny and developing its mighty and varied resources.

"2. The line through British territory must be carried through, if British authority is to be maintained on this continent, and our new Dominion made practically, as well as in theory, a great fact.

"3. The desire of the Canadian people to remain in connection with, and as an integral portion of, the British Empire, has its root in something stronger than either tradition or romance, and to maintain this connection, they are prepared to make great sacrifices; but, it so happens, that in this case the sacrifice would have to be made and encountered, not by putting through a costly line of railway over British territory, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but by refraining from the work.

"4. Politically it is a manifest and pressing necessity, while commercially it is of the very highest importance for Canada. In this way alone can this country have any chance for her fair share in the lucrative trade with the North-West, which will assuredly spring up, and in the varied traffic with the Pacific world which, to a great extent, will pass through Canadian territory, if once, what will be the shortest and easiest route from ocean to ocean, is in working order.

"5. Our rulers will be traitors to their country and to British connections if they lose a single season in making it practicable and convenient for settlers to go to Fort Garry through our own territory, and in putting things in a fair way for the Canadian Pacific Railway.

"6. It is a question, not only of convenience, but of national existence. It must be pushed through at whatever expense. We believe it can be pushed through, not only without being a burden pecuniarily upon Canada, but with an absolute profit in every point of view. Without such a line the great British North America would turn out an unsubstantial dream; with it, and with ordinary prudence and wisdom on the part of her statesmen, it will be a great, a glorious and inevitable reality."

That was the position of the organ of the party in 1871. Had the hon. gentlemen done anything to carry out that policy? He would be sorry to say, with all their extravagance, that they were traitors. He would not use the language that was foreshadowed at that time; he dare not use it, and he would not. But how did the matter stand now? They were little further ahead now, except in the expenditure of between three and four millions of money in the survey of the road, than they were in 1874. This question would be discussed at the polls at the next general election—there was no doubt about that. He would leave this question of the Pacific Railway, as he did not intend to detain the House, right there, where the Toronto Globe put it, when they said that any men that would lose a single year in putting forward that work would be traitors to their country and the British connection. But there was another question—that all public works should be let by tender. This Government had inaugurated a new policy, as far as letting the public works of this country by contract was concerned. They had inaugurated the system that a man must pay down five per cent. on the whole outlay of the contract before he could get any work, which I consider injurious to the best interests of this country—in this way: that a man who could raise five per cent. of the money was almost well enough off not to go into contracting at all. It gave the Government a power that it should not have. It gave it the power to discriminate in favour of its friends. In the case of friends they could take swamp lands and railway stock well watered; but if they were opponents of the Government they must come down with the hard cash. The way this used to be done formerly, was, for the Government to keep back fifteen per cent. of the actual value of the contract on the estimates. The Government made the contractor give security besides. They made him give two solvent sureties to the Government for the performance of the work, and that should be sufficient without the Government taking that power to discriminate in favour of its friends. He would say one word, before sitting down, in reference to Goderich Harbour. It had gone to the people of this country that the country had lost $29,910 by that contract, it might be more and it might be less; but he thought that hon. gentlemen when they came to examine into the cost of the work at Goderich Harbour would find it $40,000 instead of $30,000. And why? Because the cost of that work, as to the letting, was made up on an approximate estimate. If that work had cost 33½ per cent. greater than the approximate estimate, of course the difference between Mr. Tolton and Mr. Mohr's tenders would be just the same difference exactly. So that in not accepting the lowest tender, in place of losing $30,000 we lost $40,000. That was the position of that question. It had been discussed last year as to whether it had been a great—he would not say swindle, for that would not be right. Mr. Tolton did not get that work—Mr. Mohr got it. It was amusing to him when he read the explanations given by the engineer for the wrong done in letting that work, and it was surprising to him that Mr. Tolton's telegram did not have the effect of making known to the Department of Public Works who that gentleman was, because he had a contract with the Government at the same time. What did the Prime Minister of this country do with that telegram? Did he put it in his pocket? He was censurable to the fullest extent if he did. He did not say he was liable, but he ought, personally, to be liable for the $40,000 that this country lost. The hon. gentleman, in 1874, gave us an excuse for appealing to the country—that the former House was elected under corrupt influences. That was the excuse given to the country at that time for putting it to the expense of a general election. The hon. gentlemen opposite were so pure they could not associate with the members elected to that side of the House; but he thought, after last year's exposure of the House, that the hon. the Minister of Public Works, the Premier of the Government, if he wanted to carry out earnestly the purity of this House, he would send the members to the right-about. But he did not. He and his colleagues were bound to hang on to the ship,—to hang on like barnacles until they were swept away. But there was a day coming when they would have to answer for all their sins, sins of omission as well as commission. In the Speech from the Throne there was an expression of thankfulness for the large harvest. What had the Government to do with that? Did they call down the rain from heaven, or give us the fine weather to make the crops grow? What have they done to assist the farmer to market his crops? They had done nothing, yet they had allowed the products of the United States to come into Canada from all quarters to knock down the prices of our own farm produce. The hon. gentlemen were thankful for small mercies, but that would not do very long.

MR. McCALLUM.

MR. YOUNG said he desired to make a few remarks on some of the points contained in the Address, which, in his humble judgment, indicated the ability and care with which the Government was administering the affairs of the country. This was the first debate of any length that they had had upon the Address for several years; and the character of the debate had been such that it was to be hoped they would not be troubled with further debates upon the Address in future Sessions of this House. He had never known so much dirty linen washed in public as they had had within the last two or three days.

AN HON. MEMBER: Whose shirts were they?

MR. YOUNG said that if these old stale slanders, many of them utterly exploded, had been new, they might have listened to them with some attention; but he believed the great majority of the members of the House, on both sides, felt the repetition of these old, stale, and exploded slanders which they heard from the member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell), was calculated to degrade Parliament and tarnish our institutions. They could not but, in political matters, speak with a certain amount of directness, and when something was done that was absolutely wrong, they might properly condemn it in strong language. But he believed he expressed the opinion of the members generally when he said that, above and beyond their party conflicts, they should recollect that they were Canadians; and that to unjustly and improperly assail the character of their public men was to trail the fair institutions of this country in the mire. He felt sure that, after the very pointed and frequent references made to himself, by the distinguished gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir John A. Macdonald), that right hon. gentleman would feel disappointed if he entirely left unnoticed the very kind allusions which he made to him during the earlier part of the debate. He would not follow the right hon. gentleman and apply to him words with a double intente, one of which might be interpreted in an equivocal, and even scurrilous way. He differed from the right hon. gentleman. He had his own ideas whether that gentleman's public career in this country had elevated Canada or had lowered it; but he believed he had always treated him with respect; he had, at least, endeavoured to do so.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I hope the hon. gentleman does not suppose that anything that fell from me was meant from me in a disrespectful sense, that I said during the present debate, towards him. Certainly I did not wish to attack him in any disrespectful way. I simply said that possibly if he did not carry out beet-root protection he would be dead beat himself, that is all.

MR. YOUNG said it was a phrase of an equivocal character. An excess of language of that kind might be proper enough on occasions of political picnics, when people got more spirited than usual; but he would say to the right hon. gentleman, an old Parliamentarian, that he ought to be an example to them all, and that such expressions were open to objection, and were hardly in good taste within the halls of legislation. They had recently the honour of a visit from the right hon. gentleman to his county—the county of Waterloo—and he appeared to be rather anxious as to its political future, more especially the South Riding. He knew something of the people of that Riding; he had lived among them from childhood, and he could assure the right hon. gentleman that they were determined to do, as they had done for the last twenty years, whenever they had had the opportunity, to condemn him and the policy which he had carried out as a statesman in this country. Nothing, however, would more certainly tend to that result, than a second visit from the right hon. gentleman. They had an election for the Local House there last year, when the Conservative party as usual was unable to start a candidate of their own stripe. Two Reformers ran against each other, and they had a close contest; but the old policy of "Divide and conquer" could not be played so well again, and if any thing was more certain to give a handsome majority to the Reform party in that riding, it would be a second visit from his right hon. friend.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am anxious for your re-election; I should certainly go.

MR. YOUNG said that at this late day, before such an audience as his right hon friend had at Galt, one of the most intelligent audiences that ever assembled in any constituency in Canada, an audience which had high views, both politically and morally, when his right hon. friend undertook to defend his transactions with Sir Hugh Allan, and gave as one of his reasons for acting as he did, one of the reasons for accepting the amount which was accepted from Sir Hugh, that when he looked back he was really amazed at his own moderation in not asking for more money. When the right hon. gentleman supported his position by arguments such as that, there could be only one result, and that result was to produce in the community a more determined conviction than ever, how dangerous it would be to allow him once more, as Premier, the control of the destinies of this country. In 1867, when he had the honour to be elected to this House in the first place, he received a majority of 366 votes; but so utterly crushed was the party of the right hon. gentleman that they had never been able, from that time to this, to get up an opposition to him, and he had had the honour of being elected on each occasion by acclamation. But he would like to know how it had been with the hon gentleman himself. He had represented the city of Kingston for about thirty years; and in the earlier part of his career it was utterly useless for anybody to oppose him. His majorities were counted by hundreds, but what did they find to be the result at the last election? In the "Parliamentary Companion" he found, that at the last election, in 1874, the hon. gentleman's majority was reduced to 38. He would not dwell on the subsequent facts with regard to the right hon. gentleman losing his seat. He would not comment upon the facts of the Judge's reference to the doubts that he had upon his own mind whether he should not disqualify him. He would not allude at length to the fact that his bosom friend and companion, a worthy Senator in the other end of the building, was conveniently absent at the time of the trial, and all efforts to find him were fruitless. He would go on to the subsequent election, when the hon. gentleman was only returned to this House by a majority of seventeen votes; and so much in fear was he of defeat, that he took the almost unprecedented course of going to the polls and recording a vote in his own favour.

MR. YOUNG.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I had only seventeen. I am very glad I got off with that, I can tell you.

MR. YOUNG said he had no doubt that was the case, and that the hon. gentleman was very glad to be returned even with so small a majority as seventeen. But he could assure the hon. gentleman, that instead of taunting other hon. members with their small majorities, he had better look to himself, for there was reason to believe that after thirty years' wandering in the wilderness, the limestone city had determined to return a Reformer at the next general election.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: They did when they returned me.

MR. YOUNG said that when he made the remark the other day that Protectionists would look in vain to the hon. member for Kingston, he did so for several reasons. First of all, when the hon. gentleman was in power and able to carry out such a policy, he resolutely set his face against it. He (Mr. Young) had examined carefully all his speeches in this House, and the various motions he had made, and on no occasion had the hon. gentleman announced that he was a Protectionist, or unequivocally committed himself to such a policy. Only last Session, he declared he agreed with the views of Mr. Mackenzie that neither an extreme Free-trade nor Protectionist policy was practicable, and that a revenue tariff only was consistent with the best interests of this country. There was not one of his speeches upon Protection in which he had not left for himself a loophole that he could easily creep through if he got into power again. They all knew his fertility of resource in this respect. They had a good instance of it in the debate upon the beet-root sugar question in 1873. On that occasion a motion was made by the present leader of the Opposition in the Province of Quebec (Mr. Joly) to exempt beet-root sugar from excise duty for ten years. His hon. friend was on the free-trade side of the fence then, and he not only opposed the motion, but both he and his Finance Minister denounced him for being in its favour. He charged him with quoting the only passage in John Stuart Mill's "Political Economy" in favour of protective principles—and asserted that, at the request of his friends, Mr. Mill had subsequently withdrawn that passage from his work. After this the hon. member got into the cold shades of Opposition, and being uncomfortable in that region, began to utter equivocal expressions in favour of Protectionist principles; and he (Mr. Young) was much amused last Session to hear that passage in the works of Stuart Mill—which the hon. member had declared had been taken out of the work at the request of the author's friends,—actually quoted by the right hon. member in support of the position he then took up. So it would be seen that the hon. gentleman could adapt himself to circumstances with the greatest readiness. But he (Mr. Young) maintained that the time had come when the hon.

gentleman should declare unequivocally to the people of Canada, whether he meant, if again returned to power, to adopt a similar policy to that of the United States, which had been so ruinous to the manufactures of that country.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Oh; oh.

MR. YOUNG contended that any one who read the recent debates in Congress, any one who read the proposed new American tariff, and carefully considered the grounds on which the duties were to be reduced, must know that the system had completely failed there, and that it had been very detrimental to the industries of the country. His hon. friend was in favour of that policy for Canada. If he was or if he was not—in either case the time had come to declare himself unequivocally. If he failed to do so, the people of Canada would see that he was only making use of the question as a stepping-stone to office. At the elections of 1872, his hon. friend talked and acted very much as he was doing now. He then went to Toronto and Hamilton, and made specious promises about Protection to influence the manufacturing vote. He suddenly became deeply interested in the manufactures of the country; and he visited the various workshops, shook workingmen by the hand, and lead many to believe that he really meant to do something for Protectionist principles. In some way, when in Galt, he visited almost every manufactory in the place, and it had been told with some amusement, that almost invariably his closing words were, "Would you not be the better for a little Protection here?" A very pleasant way of putting matters indeed. In London, owing to the Great Exhibition of 1851, the street cry was, "How's your poor feet?" and in Galt it almost became the standing joke, after the hon. gentleman's visit, to inquire, "Would you not like a little more Protection around here?" Another political device of a similar kind to that largely used in 1872, was the series of workingmen's testimonials to the hon. gentleman which had been got up all over the country. He (Mr. Young) could speak for his own town, and he did not hesitate to say that anything more utterly bogus than those workingmen's testimonials was never got up and carried out in this country. Who were the originators of these testimonials? Almost in every case expectant Conservative candidates or interested politicians who had an eye to the results of the next election—a few working men being placed in the foreground as decoy ducks. The hon. gentleman would find, however, that the great mass of the mechanics of this country knew their own interests too well to cast their votes in any other way than for the Reform Government and Reform candidates. During his visit to the workshops, the hon. gentleman met with several manufacturers who did not believe in Protection, who could not see how taxes upon coal and iron, and the other raw materials they used in producing their finished articles, could benefit their trade. But if the hon. gentleman was unable to make much in a political sense, some of the manufacturers knew enough to profit by his visit and turn it to good account. There were some shrewd men in that part of the Dominion, and they took good care to make something out of him. The various articles of clothing, including unmentionables recently bestowed on the hon. gentleman, evinced a sharp eye to business on the part of the donors, for they shrewdly and clearly perceived that he was fast becoming one of the cheapest, if not one of the best advertising mediums in the country. In 1872, the hon. member pursued the same tactics at the elections. He (Mr. Young) was present at Hamilton when the hon. gentleman talked about our struggling industries and Protection very much in the same way as he had been talking lately in this House. And what was the result? When the elections were over he came back to Ottawa, and never proposed one single measure to protect the manufacturing interests of the country. The cry was forgotten as soon as the elections were over, and they never heard a single word of the promises after they had served their purpose. The fact was the hon. gentleman was endeavouring to accomplish the very difficult task of riding two horses at once. He knew that there were in Ontario a small number of people who favoured Protection. He knew equally well that in the Maritime Provinces, they were strongly in favour of Free Trade, and he was attempting to ride the Protection horse in Ontario and the Free Trade horse in the Maritime Provinces. He would be very clever, indeed, if in the end he did not come to the ground between them. So well was it becoming understood that the whole thing was merely a political game; only a card for election purposes, that but very few Reformers would be caught with it; they were leaving the agitation solely to Conservative politicians who were glad of any vestige of a principle—any covering, however scanty—which would serve to cover their past political transgressions.

Mr. Young.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Is my hon. friend saying that I am advocating an unpopular cry for the purpose of carrying the next election?

MR. YOUNG said his hon. friend knew from long political experience that he might do whatever he liked as leader of the Conservative party, and his party would follow him. He knew perfectly well that if anything whatever could have secured his deposition from the leadership of the party, it would have been his own acts in the past. Yet his party were ready to support him through thick and thin, and the hon. gentleman thought that if he could detach a few Reformers by the Protection cry—appealing in this way to the selfishness of a section of the public—he might gain the end which he had in view. The overwhelming majority, however, were opposed to any policy which was in the interest of a small minority and not the great mass of the people. Nothing seemed to give so much uneasiness and unhappiness to the hon. members of the Opposition as the fact mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, that "the commercial depression was passing away." For himself, he admitted that he would like to see it passing away faster than it was, but at the same time he did not think any person could candidly and honestly examine the position without feeling that the worst was past, and that they were tending towards a better state of trade.

An HON. MEMBER: What does the Board of Trade say on the matter?

MR. YOUNG said the Board of Trade had recently decided that the best and fairest tariff for Canada was a revenue tariff, and that 17½ per cent. was sufficient protection. Among the evidences that went to prove that the commercial depression was passing away, was the fact that the importations and public revenue had again begun to increase. It had been urged that the record of failures, lately published from unofficial sources, went to prove that the commercial depression was as bad as ever. Those returns, when examined thoroughly, proved the very opposite. During the first nine months of last year the average number of failures, during each three months, was about 550, but during the last three months of the year the number had fallen from 550 to 220. The average liabilities during the first nine months of the year was $7,500,000 each three months, but during the last three months of the year, only $4,500,000. This reduction was a striking and significant fact, and proved that it was true that a change had taken place and for the better, and that the great commercial depression was passing away. He could state, too, that not a few manufacturing establishments which had been closed, had started again during the last six or eight months, whilst some had lately been running their machinery night and day to fill their orders. These were facts which might have come within the knowledge of hon. gentlemen. One manufacturer had told him that it was many years since he had had as many orders for fulfilment during the coming summer, as at the present time.

An HON. MEMBER: In what line?

MR. YOUNG said it was in the foundry business. It was a fact that there were men who went into manufacturing businesses, who had neither the skill nor the capital to conduct them successfully, and so long as the laws of trade remained as they were, those businesses would not pay. There had been considerable improvement in our manufacturing industries during the past eight or ten months, and the only depression that really was increasing, was the depression manifest among their political friends on the other side of the House. It was a remarkable fact that as the commercial depression passed away, depressions settled more and more upon their friends opposite; but he could assure them, they could no more arrest the wave of commercial depression that was passing away, or stem the tide of commercial prosperity that was returning in its place, than Mrs. Partington, with her mop, could push back the Atlantic Ocean. It was unpatriotic to allege that the country was in such a ruinous condition. Such reports, going to the United States and other countries, were calculated to do this country a serious injury, and were propagated solely because it was believed they would help the political fortunes of the gentlemen opposite. He was glad, during the earlier part of the debate, to hear the announcement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and commented upon by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), that the expenditure of the Government during the past year had only been in round numbers $23,500,000. This was a most important fact bearing upon the financial management of the Government of the day. First, let them compare the expenditure with that of the previous year. The expenditure for 1876 was $24,448,372, which showed that during 1877, the Government had reduced the public expenditure of the Dominion by nearly one million of dollars. This was a fact that ought to go forth to the people; it ought to be known in all parts of the Dominion, that by the economy of the gentlemen now on the Treasury benches, for the first time since Confederation, the public expenditure had been reduced by nearly one million dollars. He recollected that four years ago, when those gentlemen took office, the Finance Minister detailed how much he felt the responsibility of the legacy left him by his predecessor. It was no less than $42,000,000, if he (Mr. Young) recollected rightly, which that Minister had to meet during his year of office. He (Mr. Young) stated at that time that if the Government were able to hold the public expenditure of Canada in check for a few years, they would have proved the exercise by them of the most rigid economy, and have done a real service to the country. In the year 1873-4, the Estimates for which the late Government made out, and the obligations therefor, they incurred, the expenditure amounted to $23,316,316; the expenses for the past year, ending 30th June, 1877, were only about $23,500,000, showing that in four years the present Government had only increased the public expenditure, after paying off the enormous obligations left by their predecessors by about $200,000. The hon. gentlemen opposite had increased the public expenditure at the rate of nearly two million dollars per annum. During the last three years they were in office, they increased the public expenditure by $7,693,854, and the present Reform Government—which he maintained had been true to its pledges of economy—had only increased its expenses during the same period by about $200,000. This was taking the gross figures in the public accounts without any explanations; without going into the fact, which was perfectly true, that they had also had to pay millions of expenditure which they did not originate, but which were the obligations of their predecessors. He should not trouble the House to read all the items of expenditure thus left to the present Government; the facts were well known to the House and to the country. But if they deducted those amounts, the economy exercised by the Government would reach to between two and three millions of dollars. There had been a vast amount of misrepresentation on this point; the present Government was said not to have redeemed its pledges, and it had been argued, again and again, by quoting particular items, that they had largely increased public expenditure. The facts which he had stated, and which no one could disprove, showed that if there was one principle more than another to which the Government had proved true in the administration of public affairs, it was to the pledges of economy which they made to the public when in

MR. YOUNG.

Opposition. There were several points in the Address which appeared to him to indicate that the Government had acted with great care and prudence in the management of the general affairs of the country. They had taken a firm hold of all branches of the public service, they had initiated quite a number of administrative reforms that reflect credit upon them. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) alleged that public contracts were given out improperly. Nothing could be more illustrative of the foundationless character of many charges than a statement of that kind. What were the facts of the case? During the time the Conservatives were in power, the right hon. member for Kingston let contracts for twenty million dollars, out of which only seven million dollars were let to the lowest tenderers; while under the Administration of the present Prime Minister out of contracts to the amount of nineteen million dollars, not less than sixteen million dollars had been let to the lowest tenderers. And he need not speak to the House of what every one knew—of the use that was made under the regime of the hon. member opposite, of public contractors. When there were critical views before Parliament, that House swarmed with contractors, using their influence in all directions. Now-a-days, they saw no contractors filling the lobbies of the House, and it could not be truly asserted that one public contractor had ever been asked for money or assistance in any way, to aid the Government of the day. Nothing was easier than to make charges if one did not undertake to prove them. An amusing illustration of the way charges could be made, was shown in the case of that great organ of Conservative opinion, the Mail, which was as much the newspaper of the hon. member for Kingston, as the Globe was that of the Hon. George Brown.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman has stated that the Mail is as much my organ, as the Globe is the paper of Mr. George Brown. I have no more interest in that paper than my hon. friend (Mr. Young) has, except political interest.

MR. YOUNG said the Mail was as directly inspired by him, as the Globe was by the Hon. George Brown. They would recollect that two or three years ago it was rumoured that the Government intended to make the western terminus of the Pacific railway at Nepigon Bay, and almost immediately the Mail alleged that a great outrage had been perpetrated upon the Canadian people, that Mr. Mackenzie had selected Nepigon Bay to enrich himself and his friends who had mineral lands in that quarter, whilst everyone knew the right place for the terminus was at Thunder Bay. Time passed on, and it was ultimately decided that the terminus should be located on Thunder Bay, whereupon, that journal immediately turned round and denounced Mr. Mackenzie for having located it at Thunder Bay, to enrich himself and friends interested in mineral lands, whilst everyone knew the terminus ought to have been located at Nepigon Bay. Whatever might be the action of the Government, therefore, it was easy to make charges against them when little regard was paid to truth. He had been speaking, before this slight digression, with regard to the administrative reforms made by the present Government. And the reform which reflected credit on the Administration was the manner in which they had managed the Intercolonial Railway. When that road was placed under their control, hon. members knew what was the condition of things. They knew that the officials were principally political favourites,—men who knew little about railroading,—that the supplies for the railway were bought at prices 40, 50 and 150 per cent. above regular rates, and that wide-spread corruption existed in connection with the running of the road, for such had been proved by evidence laid before the House. They knew that it was only one year under the control of the hon. the Premier before he had purged the railway of these abuses and placed it on a commercial basis; not only had he given the public better service, but the very first year it was under his control he had saved $170,000 in the running of the line. The cost of running the road was over one million dollars at the time the Minister of Public Works took the control of it, but after two hundred miles had been added to the railway the running expenses were still $80,000 less than they were before it came into his hands, a fact which shows that he had managed the railway not as a political machine or an instrument for maintaining himself in office, but strictly as a commercial undertaking. This course made enemies for the Government and required courage on the part of the Ministry to carry out, but the people of Canada would find in it evidence that the Government had honestly striven to carry out such administrative reforms as they were able to effect. Hon. members would read with great gratification the paragraph in the Address in relation to the result of the Fisheries arbitration. In almost all our diplomatic dealings with the United States, Canada had come off second best. The strong claim which this Dominion had to compensation from the United States in connection with the Fenian raid, an incursion of armed men from the adjoining country, in which property was destroyed, and some of our young men slain, was undeniable, and yet not one dollar of indemnity was obtained from the United States for that act. At the very time, Great Britain was compelled to pay fifteen millions in connection with the Alabama Claims, the much stronger case of Canada was surrendered without the slightest indemnity. It was gratifying under those circumstances to find that the course taken by the Government with respect to the Fisheries arbitration, in appointing not foreign diplomatists, but intelligent and well-known Canadians, had resulted in our obtaining something like justice, whilst we had not got all that we should have obtained, for the Dominion owned the first fisheries in the world. Still, owing to the shrewdness and care of the Government, we had, for the first time, succeeded in getting Brother Jonathan to pay something near a reasonable price for the right to fish in our waters.

MR. HOLTON: An instalment.

MR. YOUNG said he was also very much gratified to notice the paragraph referring to Australian trade, which was a matter of vital importance to the country, and of far more interest to the people of Canada than any of the little statements that had been made in connection with last elections and other matters of minor importance. It was well known that when the Centennial Exhibition took place in the United States, and the Government undertook to send exhibits of Canadian manufactures and other industries, a very considerable coldness was shown towards it by hon. gentlemen opposite. He knew well the difficulties that the Commissioners had at first experienced in inducing gentlemen holding Conservative opinions to send their goods to that exhibition, the idea having got abroad that if the Dominion made a fine exhibit it might in some way tend to the credit of the Government now in power.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Absurd.

MR. YOUNG said he must be allowed to form his own opinion on that point, and that was at least partly the reason why certain gentlemen holding Conservative views were adverse to sending their articles to that Exhibition. The Government, however, went ahead, and the result was an Exhibition which tended greatly to raise Canada in estimation of the whole civilized world.

MR. BOWELL: Is that the reason why Mr. John Bright objected to England sending certain articles to that Exhibition?

MR. YOUNG said they were discussing Canadian affairs at present, and not Mr. John Bright's opinion. He was glad also to find that, following up the policy initiated at Philadelphia, the Government, acting in the interest of Canadian industries, took advantage of the Exhibition at New South Wales, and had an exhibit of Canadian manufactures sent there. They were very happy in their choice of Commissioner in the Hon. John Young, of Montreal, and most important results had flowed to the Dominion from their enterprise and spirited action in that matter. It was well known that many orders for manufactured goods had been received from Australia since the Exhibition had taken place. He knew that in his own town (Galt) four or five firms were now engaged in making articles for Australia. Through the wise action of the Government, new markets were being opened up for Canadian manufactures, and they were beginning to have a field for their industries which they would occupy with profit. That, he contended, was the true way of advancing and promoting our manufacturing industries. It was not the unwise policy which some hon. gentlemen advocated—though the member for Kingston was too shrewd to take up that position—of building up a high tariff wall around Canada with its four millions of people, and hoping to become a great manufacturing country by a policy of isolation; on the contrary, the true policy, and the only policy, to make this Dominion a manufacturing country, was by a moderate tariff on imports, and by giving manufacturers their raw material at the lowest price, thus enabling them to procure their articles at a cheap rate. That was a policy which would not only enable our people to have their own markets, but to avail themselves of the markets of Australia, the West Indies, South America and other parts of the world. They had heard, again and again from the hon. gentlemen opposite, during the debate, that the present Government had trampled upon every principle which they had advocated when in opposition. It would be sad indeed if such a state of things were true, but he maintained that it was utterly without foundation. What were the measures advocated by the Reform party when in opposition, and what were the great questions that they urged upon the Government of the day for settlement? They were many; among them was the question of having all the elections held on one day; that measure was now to be found on the Statute-book. They advocated vote by ballot, so that every man in the country might be able to go to the polls and vote as his conscience dictated, none daring to make him afraid; that question had also been settled. They advocated that there should be a termination to the shameful scenes which had been witnessed in that House, gentlemen having majorities of two or three hundred being kept out of their seats by partisan election committees, and that the election petitions should be tried by the judges of the land. The hon. gentlemen opposite asserted that it was the late Government which carried that measure. It was very true that that Government carried it, but when did they do it? When the elections of 1872 was coming on, and it was necessary to take steps to secure a pure election, they voted down that measure as well as a pure election law, they knowing perfectly well that a gigantic political struggle was about to take place. They had been preparing for this election, and making arrangements to carry it; and when the Reform party urged that a law should be enacted to secure a fair and pure election, those hon. members voted it down, and it was only after the elections were over that they carried out that measure; in other words, they were ready to lock the door after the steed was stolen, and it was directly due to the agitation of the Reform party that that measure was placed on the Statute-book. Reformers were not so particular as Conservatives as to whom might carry the measures they advocated. The whole aim of the Conservative party seemed to be to sit on the Treasury benches, but the Reform party were always glad to accept any measure of real reform from whatever Government was in power at the time. They also advocated that there should be a stricter parliamentary control over the public expenditure; and he did not think any candid person would dispute the fact that, under the present Government, there had been a stricter control exercised than had ever taken place in the Dominion or in the old Province of Canada. It was never advocated that every little contract should be laid before the House, but they held that it was very improper for the late Government to award such contracts as those for the Pacific Railway without laying them first before Parliament; and the present Government, true to their principles, had laid every important contract before Parliament, and had obtained the sanction of the peoples' representatives thereto. The Liberal party had also advocated the abolition of dual representation, and that measure had been passed into law. They had advocated there should be a strict election law to put down the widespread bribery and corruption which was sweeping over the land; and the measure that had now become law was directly attributable to the long agitation of the Liberal party when in opposition—a measure which had been so successful that our elections were now as pure as those carried on in any other country in the world. They also advocated more economy in the expenditure of the public revenue, but he had already touched upon that point, and need not enlarge upon it. It was unnecessary to enumerate every other measure of the Government, but he defied hon. gentlemen opposite to find any Government, either in Great Britain or in Canada which, in the same space of time had crystallized in legislation more of the measures they had advocated in opposition; to find a Government which, although mistakes may have been made—for as long as men were human, Governments would sometimes make mistakes—which had been truer to their principles, than the hon. gentlemen who now occupied the Treasury benches of this country. With the record which he honestly believed the present Government had, they need not fear either to meet Parliament or the country. The House had heard much boasting from the gentlemen opposite as to what they were about to do at the next general election, and with regard to certain constituencies carried by them. It was not surprising, however, that a small number of constituencies had been carried lately by the Opposition. They were so utterly defeated in 1874, they were reduced to such a small body in this House, that it were impossible the Reform party should retain such an overwhelming majority, and possibly it was not well that the Government should be so strong as it had been during the present Parliament. That accounted, perhaps, for the Opposition winning a very few seats since. But he could assure them that they would find, when the great contest came on, that the public opinion of the country was strongly opposed to the Conservative party getting into power again. The people of Canada much resembled those of England in some respects, for they were not prepared to destroy until they could see how to replace. He would like to know what the gentlemen opposite were offering to the country as a reason why they should be placed in power; would hon. gentlemen tell the House one single principle which they advocated, one shred of policy which they, as an Opposition possessed. They had not one principle or shred of policy to offer the people of Canada, and yet they professed that the country was about to pull down the existing Government, and replace it by themselves. Probably he had been too severe in saying that hon. gentlemen had no principles whatever. Probably they had the principles alluded to by old John Randolph, of the United States, who once said of a political opponent, that he had seven principles, which consisted of five loaves and two fishes. The Conservative party had no aim or object but office. They had no policy to offer to the country, no principle on which they could ask the confidence of the country, and they would find that the electors of the Dominion were far too intelligent, under these circumstances, to assist them in regaining a position which they did so much to disgrace only four years ago. The Reform party had served a fair apprenticeship in opposition and had become journeymen. Hon. gentlemen opposite were as yet simply apprentices, and they would find that it was one thing to hope for success and another thing to achieve it. They would find, as the Liberals had found, that it required a much stronger case against the Government, and a great deal more effort than they had yet put forth to carry the people of the country with them. Not five years, not ten years, would be sufficient, in the eyes of the people of Canada, to deodorize the Conservatives from their past political transgressions. Before the last local election in Ontario they were sanguine of success, declaring that Mr. Mowat's Government was about to be completely swept from power; but the result was that Mr. Mowat was sustained by an overwhelming majority, and that was the last heard of Conservative reaction. He had little doubt that such would be the experience of hon. gentlemen opposite at the next general election. The people of Canada were intelligent, and carefully examined the management of public affairs; they knew the record of the present Government, how that, in the main, they had closely adhered to the sound principles of the Reform party; they knew the past dark record of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who had no policy whatever on which they could ask the confidence of the people; and he (Mr. Young) had every confidence as to what the result would be. He felt assured the people of Canada knew their duty in this crisis, and that they would do it; and that as in 1874, they would punish the Conservative party for its past political sins, so, on the first opportunity, they would sustain Mr. Mackenzie and the Reform party for their able, economical, and honest administration of public affairs.

MR. YOUNG.

Mr. Young.

MR. GIBBS (North Ontario) said the debate had taken a much wider range than either the Government or the House anticipated, and hon. members would feel satisfied of the wisdom of the course which had invariably been pursued in the British House of Commons in selecting young members to move and second the reply to the Speech from the Throne. The discussion which had been created on the present occasion in consequence of the old course not having been followed, which was, no doubt, due to the fact that the Government was unable to do so for want of material, was such as would not tend to a continuance of the departure from the former practice. It was true that, although there had been several elections since Parliament last met, the Government found itself unable to supply material for that purpose, unless indeed they had taken the recently elected member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) and the junior member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), to perform the duty of moving and seconding the Address. Had it not been for the course pursued by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who, with so much credit to himself, performed the duty devolving upon him, in travelling so far out of the record, instead of confining himself to the text or brief laid before him, the debate would not have taken such a wide range. That hon. member had taken up the different clauses of the Address, and when he came to the fifth clause, had he been satisfied with congratulating the country upon the fact that the Government had successfully made an exhibit of Canadian manufactures in Australia,—for which he (Mr. Gibbs) thought the Government was deserving of commendation, and for which they received his approval,—the debate would not have assumed such lengthy proportions. Had the hon. gentleman satisfied himself by making that statement, and that alone, this debate, he fancied, would not have taken the wide range, or attained the proportions it had; but that hon. gentleman could not resist the opportunity which this gave him, of enlarging upon the views he now held upon the question of Free Trade vs. Protection, as compared with those he formerly enunciated to the House on Protection, during the Session of 1875. After he had heard portions of that hon. gentleman's speech read (by the hon. member for North Hastings), the preceding evening (for he had not had the honour of having a seat in the House in 1875-6) he understood very clearly how they could read so plainly between the lines of the speech which the hon. gentleman had delivered in this House last year, and how these were to be accounted for; and also that, however eloquently or illogically that hon. gentleman now declaimed upon that point, what greater pleasure that hon. gentleman would have felt if he could have stood upon the left of the Speaker and advocated Protection, or if he could have been permitted by his political exigencies with relation to the Government of the day, to have argued on the other side of that subject. He admitted that the Government, in having Canadian manufactures represented at the Philadelphia Exhibition, had done well, and they were also entitled to credit for having performed the duty incumbent upon them, in sending our manufactures to the Sydney Exhibition; but the course which the Administration had pursued in relation to this matter, reminded him very much of that which at times was pursued by benevolent and religious societies, who, desiring to look after the unfortunate in other parts of the world, forgot and neglected those at home, in the by-streets and slums of their own towns. If, while the Government was endeavouring to open new markets for our manufacturers, they also took care to secure to our manufacturers the great advantage of their own market, then they would deserve more credit at the hands of the country, as they would thus meet some of the wants, and requirements, and hopes, and entreaties, of the manufacturers of this country, which they had, up to the present, failed to do. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) in his remarks, made the statement that our manufactories were prosperous, that we should be thankful for their present condition, and that they did not need protection; but he could not believe that the hon. gentleman was ignorant of, or indifferent to, the fact that the manufacturing interests of this country were not in a prosperous condition; that they were in a state of depression, and that many of them were gone into bankruptcy and that a large proportion of them were merely endeavouring to keep their establishments open, as it would be utter ruin to close them; that the best of them were only holding their ground, and that many of them were consuming their capital rather than close their factories, and were in anything but a prosperous condition, and in anything but a condition for which we should be thankful. The hon. gentleman argued that Free Trade was the proper system for our manufacturing industries, and therefore must be prosperous, notwithstanding the facts, which were patent to all, showed that they were not. This reminded him (Mr. Gibbs) very much of a story he had heard a very short time ago, about a man who was suddenly cast into gaol. This person sent for his lawyer, before whom he laid his case. The lawyer said to him, "My dear sir, you are perfectly safe. They cannot put you in gaol upon any such accusation as that which is brought against you." The man replied:

"But I am in gaol." The lawyer rejoined: "I tell you that according to the laws of this country, they cannot put you into gaol." "But," persisted the man, "I am in gaol." The hon. gentleman said to the manufacturers of this country that Free Trade was best calculated to promote their interests and prosperity, and therefore they must be prosperous. The manufacturers replied: "We are being ruined, we are not prosperous, and we are not holding our own;" but, nevertheless, the hon. gentleman said to them: "You have Free Trade and you must be prosperous, they cannot put you in gaol, and therefore you must be all right." This was precisely the position that had been taken regarding the manufacturers of this country. It was perfectly useless for any gentleman of any intelligence to try and advocate or establish abstract principles upon which to conduct the affairs of the manufacturers and the merchants of this or any other country; and more especially was this the case in a young country like ours with a population of four millions, situated contiguous to a very powerful and prosperous nation of forty millions and over. It was simply absurd to advance abstract theories in this relation. The country wanted practical legislation. Theories would not answer us. Practical results were before the country and it must be guided by them. The hon. gentleman said it was true that protection had built up the manufacturing interests of the United States, and consequently towns and cities had followed in their wake, but this had failed to give the return which was claimed for it, as an indirect advantage, viz.: a home market. He proposed, on this point, to answer the hon. member for North Norfolk by the hon. member for North Norfolk, and in doing so, he would turn for a moment to the Hansard of last year, page 493. That hon. gentleman, in speaking of this question, said:—

"The hon. member for Cumberland alluded the other night to the most gratifying condition of the export trade of the United States; and to the fact that the United States had last year exported of domestic manufactures the enormous sum of \$58,993,000. That was a considerable sum, but what proportion did it bear to the production of the manufactures of the country. According to the census of 1870, the manufacturers of the United States produced \$4,000,000,000, and between \$58,000,000 and \$60,000,000 was only $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the entire production."

Therefore, their own market had consumed no less than $98\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the whole product of the manufactures of the United States, amounting in value to the enormous sum of four billions of dollars. Let them examine for a moment whether the Americans had also succeeded in securing a home market for their cereals as well as for their manufactures. He could not lay his hand, unfortunately, at the moment, upon the statistics of the Bureau of Agriculture of the United States concerning the amount of the wheat crop for 1877, but that of 1875 was 292,136,000 bushels; and he thought he was correct in stating that the wheat crop for 1877 there, according to a statement which he had seen a short time since, was 400,000,000 bushels. Of this quantity it was estimated that from 80,000,000 to 100,000,000 of bushels (the largest ever known) would be exported. It would take 40,000,000 bushels for seed, and therefore they had a balance of 260,000,000 bushels as the amount of wheat consumed in the United States, and this was brought about by the large population which that country, under the system of protection, had so rapidly obtained. He would now read from page 495 of Hansard for 1877, where the hon. member for North Norfolk went on to give an illustration of the advantages attending the importation of corn into this country free. He wanted to show some of the illogical conclusions that this hon. gentleman had arrived at while making those statements. The hon. gentleman said:—

"As to corn, he proposed to give a few statistics. In 1874, we imported 5,331,000 bushels, costing $2,676,000; we exported 2,680,000 bushels, receiving therefor $1,778,000; leaving 2,651,000 bushels in the country, costing $988,000. The average cost of the entire quantity imported was 50 cents per bushel, and deducting the amount received for the portion sold, this left the net cost of what we retained for consumption at 34 cents a bushel."

This was an extraordinarily illogical statement. The hon. gentleman held that because 16 cents had been added to the price of the cost of the amount of corn brought from the United States to the sea-side, therefore the corn which was left and consumed in this country was benefitted by the increased cost which had been added to the amount of this by transportation. Let them look how these 16 cents were added to the price, and if the hon. gentleman succeeded in carrying out to a practical conclusion the solution of the problem which he gave here, he was in a fair way of making a very speedy and rapid fortune. This 16 cents was simply made up of freight, insurance, commissions, bank agencies and interest; and therefore because this amount of money was added to that which was exported to be brought to the sea-side, the hon. gentleman claimed he should deduct that sum from the cost of what was consumed in this country; but a more incorrect, or a more illogical solution of that problem could hardly be given by any intelligent man. If such was the case, if the hon. gentleman paid double freight, double the bank interest and commissions, and shipped double the amount, and retained the same quantity in this country, the balance would cost him nothing. This would be following the problem of the hon. gentleman to a legitimate conclusion. The hon. gentleman further said:—

“In 1875 we imported 3,679,000 bushels, costing $2,457,000; we exported 2,080,000 bushels, receiving therefor $1,589,000, leaving 1,599,000 bushels for consumption, standing the country in $868,000.”

Again, the hon. gentleman deducted the cost of the transport of the quantity of wheat brought from Chicago to the sea-side from the balance left in the country for consumption. The hon. the Minister of the Interior, in a similar illustration which he gave to the House, took this extraordinary position—that because we imported corn which, in Chicago, cost fifty cents, it was worth 70 cents when it left the country, and, therefore, we had made twenty cents of profit by the transaction. If the hon. gentleman had contended that the forwarding or the carrying interest of this country had benefitted by carrying the same, then he would have been logical and correct, as everybody who understood the subject knew. If the hon. gentleman (Mr.

Mills) would, for once, give it a practical test and import 100,000 bushels of corn and take it down the St. Lawrence and sell it, he would soon see the difference between the selling and cost price, and he would then understand perfectly how the difference was made up. This showed the fallacy of testing such questions in the way in which theorists were apt to do. When corn was to be exported from the country, the shipper was obliged, for statistical purposes, to give a value to these exports, and in doing so he gave a nominal amount, which approximated to the cost at the point of purchase, with the charges and other incidental expenses that had accumulated up to the time of shipment added; and therefore what cost fifty cents in Chicago when shipped, was entered in the Statistical Returns as worth 70 cents, although the country had not made a solitary cent on the transaction. What the forwarders got was another matter; but the idea of coming to the conclusion, as both these hon. gentlemen had done, that the cost of the balance left in the country was reduced by the cost of transportation of the amount of grain shipped from this country to Europe, was so absurd that he was astonished that these hon. gentlemen had not seen its absurdity before they presented such a problem to the House. The hon. gentleman further said, vide page 495 of Hansard for last year:—

“On the Welland Canal a great number of mills were erected, in which were invested $1,000,000, and their owners were employed in buying, grinding and exporting American wheat. Was this business detrimental to the country? These mills gave employment to millers, coopers and others, and the business in which they were engaged was advantageous to the country. The other night the hon. member for North Ontario, with relation to this very canal question, told them that these canals were built for the Americans.”

He quite agreed with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) that the gentleman who ran the mills on the Welland Canal, ground the wheat, and employed coopers, millers and many mechanics, benefitted the country. He (Mr. Gibbs) had never argued to the contrary; and the hon. gentleman must have entirely misunderstood him—for he could not for a moment think that the hon. gentleman desired to make a mis-statement intentionally—when he (Mr. Charlton) stated that he (Mr. Gibbs) had argued that the canals were built for the benefit of the Americans. What he had said was this: that while we had Free Trade, while we permitted the Americans to come and sell their grain in this country free of duty, and expended large sums of money for the extension and enlargement of our canals, not for the purpose of carrying Canadian products, but for the purpose of getting the carrying of the products of the great West, we were doing an injury to the farmers of this country. It was not because we were enlarging the canals, nor was it because we were getting this carrying trade that he had said so, but because our Free-trade policy permitted the wheat of the great West to come into competition with our own free of duty, and this we were enabling them to do more successfully by enlarging our canals, thus cheapening the expense of bringing these products into this country—and thus doing a grave injustice to the interests of our farmers, and consequently of the country generally. We could do this carrying trade as in the past, in bond; the mills could grind the wheat, the coopers could make the barrels, and the flour could be exported for the benefit of the country, and without injuring our agricultural interest; but the moment that a portion of this grain was sold in this country free of duty an injustice was done. Abstract theories and disquisitions on the abstract principles of Free Trade might be very nice; but it did not take a great deal of intelligence—and we had an intelligent agricultural, artisan, and labouring population in this country—to discover that while American grain was admitted into this country free of duty, such a policy could not be fair to our agriculturist, when we were compelled to pay a duty of 20 cents per bushel on the wheat, and 15 cents per bushel on the barley that we sent into the United States. He imagined that the hon. member for North Norfolk would have a very great difficulty in to-day convincing the farmers who lived in his own county, so near the United States, that the consumer paid these duties. Whatever difference of opinion might have existed last year on this point, however unsettled or unsatisfied some farmers in the country might have been in the past, respecting this question, he thought that during the past year they had generally come to the conclusion that those who held that the producer and not the consumer paid the duty were right, our farmers were obliged to take an unremunerative price for their grain; and he had no doubt that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) would have very great difficulty in convincing them that, while their barley on the one side of the Detroit River was worth 50 cents per bushel, it brought, when of the same quality, 65 cents on the other side of it, that therefore the producer had not paid the duty. The same thing applied to other matters. It would require a great deal of argument and exposition on the part of the hon. the Minister of the Interior and the hon. member for North Norfolk to make a farmer believe, when he received 70 cents per bushel for his barley in Canada and 85 cents for it in the United States, where he entered into competition with another farmer, he did not pay the duty of fifteen cents in gold, the difference between the price here and the price there, out of his own pocket. The right hon. member for Kingston had given a very lucid and happy illustration of this fact in one of his speeches last year, when he compared the difference of value between grain grown in different ends of the same field, if situated on the boundary line; this being the amount of the duty, which in the case of barley was 15 cents per bushel. The same reasoning applied, whether it was a line, a fence, or a lake that separated the grain in question. It was unquestionable that the Canadian farmer paid this duty. It seemed as if the hon. gentlemen opposite were not satisfied with the disadvantage under which the Canadian farmer laboured, when he took his barley into the American market, for last Session they had placed a very heavy excise duty on malt in this country. At all events, until the Americans gave us reciprocity, we should place duties on their products coming into this country—nothing short of this would content the Canadian people. And there was no earthly reason why the products of the United States should not be taken in bond through this country, without infringing, at the same time, on the rights and destroying the markets of our farmers in our own country.

MR. GIBBS.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. GIBBS said that when the Speaker left the Chair, he was about to make some remarks in connection with the exposition of the opinions of the Government, through their mouth-piece, for the time being, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in reference to the eleventh clause of these resolutions, wherein they were told—

“That we receive with much pleasure His Excellency's congratulations on the abundant harvest reaped in all quarters of the Dominion, and that under this and other influences there has been some improvement in the Revenue returns, thus indicating, as we trust with His Excellency, that the commercial depression that afflicted Canada in common with other countries, is passing away.”

He fully concurred in those congratulations. He had no objection whatever that the opportunity should be taken to express thankfulness to Providence, which had given us so bountiful a harvest, that was so much needed; but he only regretted that that harvest, thus far, had not realised the anticipations and the hopes of those who looked forward very sanguinely to the results that would accrue therefrom. He was also very sorry that the Government were not enabled, in consequence of the relief which would be brought to the commercial interests of the country by that harvest, to have used a stronger term than that they “trusted” it was passing away; that they were unable to say they “hoped” it was passing away. Hope, we are told, was composed of expectation and relief; and he was afraid that would have been too strong a term in the present condition of affairs. The hon. member for North Norfolk, in connection with the matter of the depression of the commercial affairs of this country, had not changed his opinions upon that point very much since he addressed the House on the same topic last year. In his speech on the tariff (last year), the hon. gentleman made the same assertions, and used very much the same argument—that the commercial depression of this country was due mainly to the excessive depression which prevailed throughout the United States, which resulted from the over-production by the manufacturers of that country, and the high tariff, which had brought disaster to that country, which had reached our own in common with other countries. Further, he said that the depression which had reached Canada, was not greater than that which had reached other countries. He then said :

“In this way the depression affected Canadian industries, and over these causes they had no control whatever; and any assertion to the contrary could not be made without insulting the intelligence of the people. Was this prostration greater than it was in the United States, in England, or in Russia? On the contrary, the condition of this country exhibited comparative prosperity. The Dominion, as to its material interests, had suffered less than older, more commercial, and more wealthy States.”

He joined issue with the gentleman in that part of his remarks, on this occasion, as well as in the past. He found, on referring to the statistics furnished by the Business Outlook, issued this year by Messrs. Dunn, Wyman & Co., the following table, which exhibited the number and amount of failures among the traders of Canada for five preceding years:—

| Year. | No. of failures. | Am't of liabilities. |
|-----------|------------------|----------------------|
| 1873..... | 994..... | $12,334,192 |
| 1874..... | 966..... | 7,696,765 |
| 1875..... | 1,968..... | 28,843,967 |
| 1876..... | 1,728..... | 25,517,991 |
| 1877..... | 1,890..... | 25,510,147 |

For three consecutive years, the liabilities of our failed traders exceeded $20,000,000; and while those of 1877 showed an increase in number over the previous year, they differed but a fraction in the aggregate amount. Their number was greater than in any of the years tabulated with the exception of 1875, being 1,890 out of 56,000 traders, or one in every 29, while the year previous, there was one failure to every 32 doing business,—the proportion in the United States at that time being but one in 69. This was a very painful picture to present; it showed that the failures in Canada were more than double those in the United States during these four years, in proportion to the numbers that were engaged in trade. These gentlemen, in concluding their remarks, said that during the past three years the failures in Canada had been in greater proportion to the number engaged in trade than in any other country; and yet they were told by the hon. gentleman that the depression in this country was only in common with that of all other countries, and that it was less in this country than it was in others. Stubborn facts, however, were things they had to deal with, however much they might neglect them; and such were the facts before them, as he had stated. The hon. gentleman had said that the depression was due to the extreme production in the United States; that its effects had been so disastrous to that country that they had sought a market in this country to get rid of their surplus manufactures, and thereby had caused a stress and loss in this country. If that was the fact, then instead of the Government being, as they said they were, as impotent as flies on a wheel, to resist or to do anything to grant relief to the suffering country during a state of depression, it was their duty to have risen equal to the occasion, to have devised some means and sought out some way in which they might bring relief to the country. What was the condition of affairs when this country sprang from disunited Provinces into a Dominion? When the American war broke out, the right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, then the leader of the Government, and the Government with which he was associated, were enabled in consequence of the then war which was raging in the United States, and in consequence of the high price of labour and of everything else in the United States, without doing injury or without affecting unfavourably in any way the manufactures of this country to reduce, at once, the tariff of this country to a lower point than it had been before. He was enabled to do that because the circumstances were of an unusual character in the nation with which we stand so closely related as neighbours; and availing himself of that,—showing that he was equal to the occasion,—showing that he understood the necessities and requirements of this country,—showing that he was enabled in consequence of that abnormal state of things that existed in the neighbouring nation to grant the necessary relief that was required, or the reduction of the tariff that was asked for by the Maritime Provinces, who were coming into the Dominion,—that was done at that time without influencing in any improper manner the manufactures and general prosperity of Canada. Then when the converse took place,—when the position of things was reversed,—when the hon. gentleman who now leads the Government of this country occupied the Treasury benches, when they found that this abnormal state of things was passing away in the United States, and the price of labour was becoming low, and goods were being thrust upon this market to the detriment of this country,—then they should have risen to the occasion and shown that they were men who could do something that was required at the hands of a Government, to stop that undue depression, that slaughtering of our industries by the importation of American goods into this country, and they should have re-arranged the tariff to meet the converse of what the right hon. member for Kingston did when things were in a different shape. Had they done that, a different state of things would have existed from what they had to-day. He held that the present Government was responsible, not because of the depression of trade that took place, not because of bad harvests, but because they made no effort whatever to prevent that state of things, and thus enable the country to pass through without the tremendous depression, and without the number of failures, unprecedented in this country, and unequalled in any other country in which statistics are taken. The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Young), tried to take some little comfort out of it; he wished he could join with that hon. gentleman in the belief that because the number of failures for the last quarter were less than they were in the preceding three-quarters of the year—he only wished he could see in that a ray of hope that we had passed the worst; but if that hon. gentleman would take the trouble to mingle with commercial men—if he would take the trouble to go into the commercial centres of this country and converse with men largely engaged in the commerce of this country—he would find that every one of them feared that the worst was not past; yet there were counterbalancing circumstances which did not foreshadow that we had seen the worst; namely, that although the numbers were less, the amount for which failures were taking place was very much larger than they were before. This circular went on to show that although the number of failures had been reduced considerably, nevertheless it showed an increase in the average amount, being $18,800 per failure as compared with $13,500 in the previous quarter; showing that the average of failures was something over $5,000 more than before. He feared we had not seen the worst. It was not because this Government had done anything to bring that about, if there was any apparent improvement, but it was in spite of their indifference, in spite of the folding of their arms and their looking on, in spite of their indisposition to show the slightest fostering care of the manufacturing and other industries of the country. He could not say he was disappointed that there was nothing in the Speech which was put into the mouth of the Governor-General to shadow forth that the Government did intend at the last moment, even in this repenting Session, to make some alteration in the tariff. Judging them by their past, he expected nothing; he felt, and not only himself, but this House, and the country felt, that there was nothing to be hoped from them, except this: that their term of office was speedily coming to an end, and that when the time arrived for them to give an account of their stewardship, they would be told that they should be stewards no longer.

Mr. MILLS: Will the hon. gentleman permit me to put a question? When he refers to the number of failures, and the amounts for which the parties have failed, does he refer to the failures of traders or of manufacturers?

Mr. GIBBS: Both. Sir, you cannot separate the several interests of this country. We are a Dominion, or we are not a Dominion; we are a combined interest; and you cannot affect one member of the body without affecting the whole body. That is the ground I take. You cannot affect the interests of the manufacturers without affecting the interests of the agriculturists; you cannot affect the interests of both of these without affecting the general commercial interests, and in that way you affect the whole interests of the country.

Mr. MILLS: You would propose to improve the position of the importers by taxing the articles which they import.

Mr. GIBBS said he was very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for again reiterating what had been reiterated so often—that while these gentlemen had increased the tariff from 15 to 17½ per cent., they had done more than ever was done by the late Government. It had been reiterated often enough that the circumstances were exceptional, and that the duty of 15 per cent. was a far greater protection than to the manufacturing interests than a duty of 20 or 25 per cent. would be to-day. These gentlemen, when they addressed this House, and when they addressed their constituents; when they went forth to public meetings, as they had done during the past summer in the country, edneavoured to instil into the minds of the public of this country that the Opposition desired to increase the taxation of this country. They said the desire of those who asked for protection was to make things dearer. He asked the hon. gentlemen what was the experience of the past? Look at the boot and shoe trade; how was that interest compared with what it was when the duty was small? In an intelligent, active, ambitious community like that of Canada, there was not the slightest danger of fearing that Protection would make things necessarily dear. There would be sufficient competition always to prevent a thing of that kind occurring. That had been abundantly manifested in the boot and shoe interest, as well as among other interests. The only thing there was a danger of over-protection in, was in any article that might be confined to a limited space or to limited numbers, where rings could be formed. Look at the article which was raised in the county of Lambton, which the hon. the First Minister represented—an article which to-day has a duty of 60 per cent. upon it, and which these gentlemen had held at over 100 per cent.—why? He wanted no rings, he wanted no extreme protection. The gentlemen asked if they desired the same amount of protection that the people of the United States had. They did not; they did not require it, but they wanted such an arrangement of the tariff as should take off the duties on goods which they could not produce, and put them upon those that they did. The revenue would not then be altered. All the Government required was that a revenue of $23,000,000 should be raised. It was a matter of no consequence upon what articles the tariff was raised, whether it were less upon one article and more upon another. That was where he wanted the Government to show their statesmanship and their ability to manage the affairs of this country, by lessening the duties on tea and on articles which they could neither raise nor manufacture, and increasing them on others; and in that way they would still raise the revenue, and still be able to protect the manufacturing interests of the country. When the hon. the Minister of the Interior interrupted him, he was going on to make a few remarks in connection with something that dropped from the present hon. Minister of Justice, and also from the hon. the Minister of the Interior. In their speeches last night on the subject now before the House, they attempted to answer the many assertions that had been made in this House and out of the House, that there had been a reaction affecting the popularity of the present Government in the country. They were forced to admit and did admit that there was a reaction, but the hon. the Minister of Justice qualified it by saying it was more apparent than real. He did not know how apparent it might be, but he fancied that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Laurier) would admit it to be real as well as apparent. He must have felt that his position had been very much changed since the time when he gave them to understand that, in early life, when he set out as a public man, and took a position in the public affairs of this country, he had raised for himself lofty and high standards—so high that he could not find them even in this country—and that he looked to Gladstone and to Bright, and other men of high position in Great Britain, as those whom he desired to follow, and whose example he desired to emulate. The hon. gentleman went on to speak of his own position, and the hon. the First Minister must have felt very uneasy when he was speaking as to the question whether he had been offered a seat previously in that Cabinet, when he stated that he might have had one, but if he had been offered it he would not have taken it; he felt he never could have condescended to that, while a gentleman of whom such hard things had been said by his colleagues in former days was a member thereof, and therefore tainted it—he felt he could not take a seat in it until that gentleman was removed. But when the hon. gentleman condescended to rather lower his standard and his ideals, and what should be to him his object in life, as to take a portfolio from what might be called a moribund Government, if not an effete Government, he certainly lowered his ideal very much; and he thought the day would come when that hon. gentleman would feel that that was the mistake of his life—when he would feel that if he desired to emulate the principles of the gentlemen whose names he mentioned as statesmen in Great Britain, he would not have consented to take a portfolio from a Government in whom the country had voted, election after election, and year after year, since they had been in power, a want of confidence. If he understood anything about the position of this country—about responsible Government, and what was expected and required of it under the constitution of this country—it was that this body formed the popular branch of the Legislature of this country; that the Government must be in accord with that, and they must be in accord with the public sentiment of the people; and, whenever they ceased to be in accord with the people, then it was their bounden duty to appeal to the country, to see whether they were or were not to give place to those in whom the country had confidence. What further was required in order to convince these gentlemen that this reaction had taken place? They had had, since the last Session of Parliament, no less than two Ministers who had gone back to their constituents and had been unseated. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had himself been unseated—a gentleman who stood high personally, a gentleman of scholarly attainments, a gentleman who was popular, living in his own county, yet he failed to carry the constituency, though going back with all the prestige, and all the increased influence which a portfolio and a seat in the Ministry gave him. This Government had succeeded in retaining their places for the past four years, very much in the same way that Mark Twain said his grandmother was able to make a pair of stockings last for seven years—that was by knitting new feet to them every year and new legs every other year. These gentlemen had retained their position in office for four years by continuous changes. Something like a dozen of them had been changed, so that they had an almost entirely new Government. About a dozen of them had made for themselves beds on which to lie comfortably the balance of their days; and, if rumour was correct, there were several more of them looking for soft places to lie down in. Notwithstanding the assertion of the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young), this Government had gone back on every principle they had asserted or maintained, had broken every promise or pledge they had given to the country before they took office, and had violated every profession they made while they were in Opposition. What was to become of the public men of this country, and of the public opinion of this country, if, while gentlemen were in Opposition, they enunciated certain principles, and after they had succeeded in displacing their opponents, they thought they had done all that was required of them and, therefore, they were not to carry out the promises and pledges they had made, and which had induced the country to give them the position they now occupied? If that was to be the case, what assurance could the country have that, at any future time, the public men of this country would carry out their pledges, or that they had any higher ambition than that of simply getting seats on the Treasury benches? The present Government must have felt that they desired to be saved from their friends, when the gentleman who last spoke addressed the House—the member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young)—who stated that if there was one thing more than another, for which this Government had retained the confidence of this House and the country, it was that they had carried out every principle they had enunciated while in Opposition; that they had performed every pledge and fulfilled every promise they had given. What was the illustration he gave when he was asked what they had done? Why, the illustration he gave was that they had forced the late Government to pass the Controverted Elections Act—when they were still the Opposition—like the hon. the Postmaster General, who told them the other night that for every good Act upon the Statute-book of this country, they were indebted to the fact that the then Opposition, those who now occupied the Ministerial benches, had forced this Government to pass it. If that was true, the assertion made by the hon. member for Waterloo, that they had served a long apprenticeship, that for twenty years they had been journeymen in Opposition, showed that they were a great deal more efficient as journeymen than they had ever shown themselves to be as masters. Like many other journeymen, like many other men who were good servants and were able to do the work that others cut out for them, they were perfectly incapable of originating and carrying out any work on their own account. They had better go back into Opposition, where he was willing to admit they did show some little ability, and where they did endeavour at times to assist the Ministry of the day to carry out measures for the benefit of the country; but they had thoroughly failed, since they took office, to carry out such measures in the least iota. His hon. friend from Victoria, New Brunswick (Mr. Costigan), for the past three years, had asked that there might be an amnesty granted to O'Donoghue. The Government of the day, backed up by their followers, voted that down; they said, by a very large majority, that such a measure should not be carried. Those same gentlemen, when in Opposition, had stated that they would see the authority and dignity of Parliament maintained; that Parliament should have full control of all matters connected with the State. When they obtained power they over-ruled every law, and did what Parliament had thrice said they should not do. They over-ruled the vote of Parliament thrice told, when, during the recess, they granted a partial amnesty to him to whom they had refused to do justice before. When his hon. friend from Victoria pressed that matter on them, they refused to pass the vote; but in the recess they passed an Order in Council to do that which Parliament had repeatedly said should not be done. He (Mr. Gibbs) was one of those who voted last Session that the amnesty should be given to O'Donoghue, believing that he had no part whatever in the murder of Scott; and that his being an Irish Roman Catholic was no reason why he should be treated in a different manner from the others. But those gentlemen who in Opposition said Parliament should be paramount, should be omnipotent, called upon their followers to vote down the act of justice that was asked for O'Donoghue, and then, by an Order in Council, trampled upon the rights of the people and upon the authority and power of Parliament. They were told that the Order in Council was passed in September, but it was not made known till after the election for Drummond and Arthabaska. The hon. the Premier evidently intended to keep back the information until they should be prepared to spring a general election upon the country; but the necessity of the case was urgent, and, finding their seats were imperilled, they were forced to bring that act to light at the election for Quebec East, in order to influence the large number of Irish Catholic electors there to secure the seat for their colleague. He would pass to another clause in the resolutions, referring to the treaties which had been made with the Indians in the North-West. He was very glad that the policy of this country and the policy of Great Britain had ever been a humane, a judicious and a wise policy towards our Indians. He fully agreed with that policy, but joined issue with the remarks of the hon. gentleman who seconded the resolution, who travelled out of his way to pass a high eulogium upon the policy of the American Government in regard to their Indians, which, he stated, was superior to that of Canada. He (Mr. Gibbs) denied that altogether, and held that no country had a better policy than this country for dealing with and protecting the red man of the woods. He was pleased to add his congratulations on our having become possessed of that vast tract of country in the North-West, and believed it would prove of great benefit to this country, although hon. gentlemen on the other side had always opposed the acquisition of that part of the country. An hon. gentleman said the other evening that he did not oppose the acquisition, but the manner in which it was made. Well, they could always find some reason when they wanted to oppose anything; but while they were discussing and quibbling over the payment of £300,000 for a territory which was larger by 86,000 square miles than the whole of Russia in Europe, which made Canada larger than the whole of the United States, the acquisition was carried out in spite of them. And now they found that Canada had not only gained something in dominion, but the nucleus of what would make her one of the foremost nations of the earth; and, when that fertile country became the home of teeming millions, the vast home of industry and commerce—and he trusted of manufactures also—the people of Canada would know to whom they were most indebted. He was glad to know that another successful treaty had been formed by the Government with those Indians, and that so large a portion of their country had been ceded to Canada. He quite agreed with the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that it was better to pay a handsome sum yearly than to have to go to war, at the cost of bloodshed and treasure, as the Americans had had to do; but he differed altogether with the hon. gentleman as to the manner of treating Indians in the States being better than that of Canada. While he was in the city of Bangor, he listened to a lecture by the Hon. Wendell Phillips upon this subject. He (Mr. Gibbs) heard from him accounts of the barbarous manner in which the United States Government had treated the Indians; how they had spent a hundred million dollars to exterminate them, and how they had been robbed of their possessions; and the lecturer wound up an eloquent discourse by taking up a blue-book and reading from it the evidence of a gentleman who had been a United States Commissioner for many years. In this evidence he said that, for over fourteen years, in all the treaties that had been made between the Indians and the United States, in no single instance had he known them to be violated by the Indians; but, on the other hand, the United States Government had broken every treaty they had ever made. The lecturer wound up with a long allusion to the policy of Canada and the British Government towards their Indians, and the small amount of expense incurred. They would see that the result of that policy was that the Indians of Canada were loyal to the British Crown; and, if a war between the United States and Canada occurred the next day, they would come in arms to the support of the Government that had treated them so well, against the Government that had behaved to them in so different a manner. These were not his own opinions simply, but those of Mr. Wendell Phillips, one of the first orators in the United States. Before he sat down, he desired to make one or two remarks in reference to the boasts he had heard hon. gentlemen make on the other side of the House, more especially the hon. members for North Simcoe (Mr. Cook) and South Waterloo (Mr. Young), that they should be returned to the House by much larger majorities than before. They claimed that there had been a reaction in favour of their party; but, when they went to the country, they would find that that reaction had been very slight. The time to boast was not when a man was putting on his harness, but when he was putting it off. They should wait until the next election, and then those gentlemen who were so very sanguine and positive might find they had misunderstood the feeling of the country. He spoke in general terms and had no idea of referring to his own county. It was a matter of little importance whether he were returned or not; but he courted the earliest possible opportunity for the country to pronounce upon the derelictions of duty on the part of the present Government, regardless of what it implied to himself, if by a general election that Government was turned out of office. What was the result of their action? They said the election of 1872 was a corrupt election. But, when they had gained power, did they pass a law that there should be no interference with the free vote of the people? No; they did not pass the Election Law until after the general election, and the result was that nearly one quarter of their number were unseated for corruption and bribery, showing that they ought to have passed it. Again, one of the hon. members had raked up a hornet's nest by referring to the public expenditure. He must have forgotten that the Government had expended millions of dollars without the consent of Parliament, after the statement made by the Government in Opposition that Parliament should have full control over all expenditure. He would not detain the House any longer upon this point, as he hoped to have an opportunity, when the Budget came down, of making some further remarks upon the question of the commerce and trade of the country. He could only say that he hoped those hon. gentlemen who had control of the House and held the reins of Government—and he said it in the kindest manner—would give the country an early opportunity of expressing its opinion upon the conduct of affairs under the present Government.

MR. GIBBS.

MR. PATERSON said that if they were to go over the different points contained in the resolution, and define all the points in the Speech from the Throne, they would find there were materials for a long and important speech. They found three subjects of the first consideration to this country, and such as might well find space in a Speech from the Throne. In the first place they learned that nothing beyond the ordinary business of the country required their attendance in Parliament.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. PATERSON said he anticipated these cries of "hear, hear," but he would tell the hon. gentlemen who uttered them that they would have an opportunity of speaking, as some had already done on that point. He would ask them, if there was anything more than the ordinary business of the country that demanded their attention, what extraordinary thing it was for which they had been summoned? If, as had been pointed out, they were summoned in order to carry on the "ordinary business of the country," they might congratulate themselves that they had not, like many other nations and other Parliaments, any extraordinary business to discuss. They had, next, the congratulatory fact that His Excellency had been able to visit some of the Provinces which, during his term of office, he had hitherto not been able to reach; and they had also the pleasing fact that he had not only personally visited, and made himself acquainted, with every Province constituting this Dominion, but that its vast outside territories had been also explored by him. The next point they had to congratulate themselves upon was the settlement of a question that, for a long time, had received grave consideration, and this was the Fishery Claims. The information reached them last year that a decision had been arrived at by the Arbitrators, and this decision was that, for using those valuable fisheries of Canada and Newfoundland the American nation should pay $5,500,000 compensation. The country bowed to that tribunal and accepted the amount; they, nevertheless, knew the full value of their national rights, and felt that the tribunal might have given a greater amount without doing injustice to the other party. They came next to a matter of very great congratulation to the people of this country, to the subject of the great progress that was being made in arts and manufactures—notably in manufactures and productions. They were called upon to congratulate themselves that such great success had attended the efforts of the Government in opening up a trade with the Australian Colonies by availing themselves of the Exhibition held at Sydney, where their products and manufactures were shown side by side with those of other nations, and bore away the palm from countries that had been engaged in manufactures for centuries past. There had been statements made with regard to the depressed condition of the country, but he was glad to hear those statements were not borne out by facts. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had pointed out that, notwithstanding the difficulties which surrounded the manufacturers here, they were still thriving and still progressing, and by doing so made himself the butt of the opposite side of the House, so that a denunciation of the arguments and statements of the hon. member had formed the bulk of the speeches delivered. He thought some of the gentlemen who addressed the House might have dealt a little more fairly with the hon. member. There was such a thing as fair criticism; and when they charged a member with abandoning the principles he had previously advocated, they should be careful that they understood his language, and that their criticisms had a basis of fact. He would not attempt to defend the hon. member for North Norfolk, or ask that mercy or clemency should be shown to him; but he wished to make it understood that the sentiments of the hon. member on the Protection question were precisely the same as those uttered by him two years ago. The hon. member for North Hastings (Mr.

MR. GIBBS.

Bowell) informed the House that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in his able speech, when he had the honour of seconding the Address, told them much in contradiction of what he had said two years before; and, to justify the position he had taken up, said he would read the actual words of the hon. member. He did read extracts from the speech made by the hon. member two years ago; such extracts as served his purpose. He took certain expressions from that speech and left out others, and then asked the House to form a comparison between the two speeches. He (Mr. Paterson) considered that was not honourable, and he would recommend the hon. member for North Hastings to read the lecture given by himself to the member for North York (Mr. Dymond) under circumstances somewhat similar. On page 106 of the Hansard for 1876, they would find that, in a debate that took place on the depression of trade, the hon. member for North Hastings took to task the hon. member for North York for misquoting Mr. Thomas White and his resolutions at the Dominion Board of Trade, and he said:

"It is very fortunate for the hon. gentleman to forget sometimes, although it is not an excuse for the hon. gentleman to forget anything. I suppose he has the same frailties as other people; but I say to the House that the hon. gentleman did not quote the whole resolution, but a portion of both resolutions, and by a quotation to this House of only one-half, he left a false impression on the minds of hon. members; a proceeding which should be beneath the dignity of a gentleman occupying his exalted position in this country."

And yet he did the same thing with reference to the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk, delivered two years ago. The hon. member for North Norfolk then took the ground that we should have a tariff levied on manufactured articles, so that, whatever amount of tariff there might be, precisely the same amount of protection might be given on the articles upon which the tariff was levied. And the remarks of the hon. member on that occasion were these: "The issue is not an issue between Free Trade and Protection; the issue is this—is the protection now afforded adequate for our industries?"

That was the basis of his reasoning, and wherein lay the contradiction. The hon. gentleman took the ground that Canada had protection in the tariff as it stood, and that the issue laid before the House and the country was not whether they should have protection or free trade, but whether they should have protection to a greater extent than the country had at present? Then he went on to advocate the tariff known as the revenue tariff—a tariff which, while securing revenue, at the same time gave protection to the manufacturers of articles upon which the tariff was levied; and now, in 1878, he was found to be advocating precisely the same tariff, and showing now, as he did in 1876, that the extreme protection of the United States had damaged not only that country, but also the manufacturers of that country. He thought he had now shown that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had been misrepresented in his statement to this House. Now, if they would consider for a moment this question of trade which had arisen out of the consideration of this paragraph, he would say, speaking for himself, that his views were the same as those of the hon. member for North Norfolk two years ago, and his views were the same now as they were then. He believed in the maintenance of a tariff which levied duties on goods which were manufactured and produced in this country, because he believed that the existence of manufacturing industries in our midst was a benefit to our whole community. Now, as then, he believed that, if they adopted the United States tariff, which was a prohibitory tariff, it would prove a curse alike to the community and the manufacturers. There was a certain point to which they could go in this matter of Protection; but when they went beyond it they destroyed alike their revenue and their manufacturing interests. What they had to consider was the argument that under the present tariff our manufactories were being crushed. They had heard the hon. gentleman read Dun, Wiman & Co.'s list of failures—a black list, as he admitted; but, when the hon. gentleman was asked whether they were manufacturers or traders who were in that list, he said, both. It was an easy answer; but let him give a truthful answer to the question of the hon. the Minister of the Interior, and he would find that a vast proportion of the failures were failures on the part of traders rather than on the part of manufacturers. Our manufacturers were now thriving and prosperous, considering the state of things which now existed. If the statement of the hon. gentleman was correct, that the present tariff was destroying our industries, that under that tariff they were languishing or dying, that with foreign competition they were being cut off and destroyed, then all the manufacturing establishments in the country must cease. If it was the competition of the United States manufacturers with our own that was closing some foundries, some machine shops, some boot and shoe shops, then everyone of the same kind of manufactory must inevitably close its doors also; but if any manufactories in the different lines were at the present time making money while others were losing it, the argument was inevitable that what had closed some of our manufactories had been not outside competition but home competition. Then it would not be protection against the American manufacturer, the English manufacturer, or the German manufacturer, that would confer any benefit; but they would require protection against the home manufacturer—the neighbour who was making money while his neighbour lost it. If there was one boot and shoe manufactory in this country that was making money and enriching itself, it was proof positive that it was not American, English or German competition that had closed other manufactories of a like kind, but that it was the keen home competition. Viewed in that light, he pointed them to their woolen mills, their cotton mills, their iron works, their rolling mills, their boot and shoe manufactories, the various industries which were running on full time, and contended that where they could find one of those making money, that one stood forth as a living testimony to the falsity of the argument that the manufacturers who had to close their business did so because of outside competition. It was because they had been going at a pace a little too fast; it was because, having such an amount of protection as they now had, men had put their capital into enterprises recklessly, and too many of the same kind had sprung up in the country. He was himself engaged in three different lines of manufacture; and he spoke with a knowledge, not of those only, but of all those industries which were suffering, not from outside competition, but from the erection of too many industries of the same kind in this country. He, as a manufacturer, rejoiced that, through the efforts of this Government, people were beginning to see the facilities there were for putting Canadian goods side by side with those of other countries, and of opening up a larger market than our own. The right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) had said that he was very glad that Canada had been successful at the Exhibition in Sydney, New South Wales, and that steps were being taken to show Canadian goods at the Paris Exhibition this year; but he would have been still more glad if they had directed their attention to our own home market. The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) had declared that he thought it money well expended in conveying our goods to those foreign exhibitions. He (Mr. Paterson) conceived that this meant that, if we could exhibit manufactures in Australia, and the Government of this country expended the public money in order that manufacturers might be enabled to exhibit the products of their manufactories at distant points like that; they, as intelligent men, must accord a meed of praise to that Government, because they anticipated that by that means a great international good would arise, and a great international trade spring up, with the other nations of the earth. He held that the hon. member for North Ontario, as well as the right hon. member for Kingston, in voting this money, were cognizant of the fact, and admitted that they believed that they would in that way do what would tend to develop our industries. Then, what sense was there in saying that we could meet the United States in Australia, and sell our goods there in competition with them, and not be able to do the same thing at home. It was for that reason that he (Mr. Paterson) rejoiced that such facts had been communicated to the House by His Excellency; and he called the attention of the manufacturers and producers of this country to the energy which had been displayed by this Government in seeking to build up, in this legitimate manner, in which they might fairly do it, the industries of the country, in order that our manufacturers might find their proper place, and that our trade might be extended far beyond four millions of people; that we might go to homes which not long ago were savage homes, and there find articles which had been created by the artizans, the mechanics and the workmen of this country. He desired to say no more on this subject, as a discussion upon it might arise on the occasion of the Finance Minister making his Budget speech, but he would refer to a few other subjects that had been touched upon. Although he sat on the Opposition side of the House, it would be understood that when he used the expression "this side of the House," he was excepting himself. For it was pretty well known that, though he faced the hon. the First Minister, he did not face him in Opposition.

MR. PATERSON.

Mr. PLUMB: We will not claim you.

Mr. PATERSON: You will not claim me, Mr. Plumb, and I am rather glad we do not claim you.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman will please address the Chair.

Mr. PATERSON said that, when the hon. gentleman had interrupted him, he (Mr. Paterson) thought he might address him in return. He had been about to say something in regard to some other matters which had been touched upon by hon. gentlemen in Opposition who sat upon that side of the House. Perhaps they were not aware that in the remarks they had made they had used language which was, perhaps, stronger than circumstances would warrant. There had been some temper shown, some expressions used, and some allusions made which, he thought, both sides of the House would agree had better have been left unsaid. He regretted that it was necessary for members of one party in this House when speaking of another party in the House, which was at least quite as numerous and respectable as themselves, to use the term the first use of which was attributed to Sir Francis Hincks, though he did not know by whom it was originated, and call the Ministry of the day and its supporters an organized hypocrisy. He did not quite understand the meaning of the term, but he supposed it meant that they were a band of organized hypocrites. If it could be charged that the supporters of the Government had been banded together for the purpose of making hypocrisy successful, then they ought to be driven from the place which was now theirs, and consigned to the oblivion which they deserved; but they were glad to know that the statement that they were an organized band of hypocrites was not necessarily true because the hon. gentlemen had uttered it. It would be better if those hon. gentlemen would be more careful in what they said. What constituted a hypocrite? It was a man who professed to desire something and mean something, when he did not desire and did not mean it. But in regard to the Ministry of the day, and the principles which they had enunciated in Opposition, was that statement borne out? What were the principles enunciated by them in Opposition? The member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young) had gone over them, in a measure, and he (Mr. Paterson) would still further allude to them. What did they advocate in Opposition? Did they not advocate simultaneous elections, so that the country should not be kept in a state of turmoil and excitement for a long period? Would the hon. gentlemen dare to say that they were hypocrites in that respect? He would remind the hon. gentlemen that, when the elections of 1874 were brought on, there was not a law in the Statute-book which compelled the Government to bring them on simultaneously; that it was quite in their power, and they had as much right as the leader of the previous Government had, in the election of 1872, to put up candidates in the constituencies where they were strongest, in order, as Conservative orators had lately been doing, that they might parade a list of members in whose elections they had been successful, in the hope of influencing other elections which were to follow. But the members of the Government were men of principle, and the moment they got into power their inherent idea of right led them to bring on the elections of 1874 simultaneously. It would be necessary for hon. gentlemen of the Opposition, if the supporters of the Government were an organized band of hypocrites, to prove that they were about to do away with the present law on this subject before the next general election, in order that the advantage of separate elections might be theirs. But had there been any such attempt? This was one of the principles which they had contended for in Opposition, which had been placed on the Statute-book of the country, and which had been carried into effect; and yet men would rise, and, in the hearing of truth, loving and intelligent men, would charge them with being an organized band of hypocrites. He called the attention of the House to the fact that there was not one single principle which the present Government had enunciated in Opposition which had not been carried out by them. He had given them one instance, but he would not cease there. What was another principle contended for by the present Ministry when they were the leaders of the Opposition? It was that they should have, in the case of controverted elections, an appeal to the judges of the land, men removed from political bias and partisanship; that those trials should be taken away from the partisan committees before whom they took place in days gone by, in order that the rightful occupant of every seat in this House might keep it; they placed that law on the Statute-book, and there that law remained. But, notwithstanding that, hon. gentlemen still said they were an organized band of hypocrites. That law was to-day on the Statute-book, and to prove the hypocrisy of the Government, hon. gentlemen would have to prove that they intended to remove it. Another principle that was contended for by the Reform party was the absolute necessity, in the interest of public morality, that they should have a more pure and stringent Election Law; that bribery and corrupt practices should be put down with a strong hand. Hon. gentlemen told them that the Ministry had violated that principle. He challenged the hon. gentlemen who made that statement to prove it. The right hon. member for Kingston had taken credit that he was the one who placed the measure on the Statute-book; but it had been told to the right hon. gentleman, and he scarcely denied it, that he only did it because he was led or driven thereto by the strenuous efforts of members of the Reform party. He knew that that measure had been introduced by the hon. member who now led the Government, that it was pressed upon Parliament, resisted by the followers of the right hon. member for Kingston, and tossed out of the House; but, when they came back from the general election of 1872, and he found the Opposition was stronger in the country, and in the House, than he thought, he at last consented to enact the law; and, he would ask, should the credit be given to the hon. gentleman and the party who up to the last moment had resisted the measure, or to the party who pressed it on him, till, as a last resort, in order to obtain office, he was forced to yield? The hon. gentlemen of the Opposition laid great stress on the argument, and had endeavoured to prove, that there had been an abandonment of principle on the part of the Reform party who had desired purity of elections, because some contested election trials had resulted unfavourably to members of that party. He (Mr. Paterson) desired to make no personal allusions. He thought the point on which the members of the Opposition were weak was personal allusions. He did not know that it was ever claimed by the Reform party that, as individuals, they were purer than the members of the Opposition; but they had claimed that it was in the interests of purity that an Election Law should be placed on the Statute-book compelling members of their party, as well as their opponents, to be pure. They had recognised the tendency of human nature to seek success, and perhaps sometimes to go beyond what was strictly right in order to obtain it; and they desired to placé such strict watch on the conduct of public men that if they went beyond what was right they should be deprived of their seats. Therefore, if many of the Reform party had been unseated because of corrupt practices—many of them of a very trivial nature, which proved the stringent character of the law passed by the Reform party in this House,—it simply proved that those gentlemen had departed from their principles, which were that the electors should be left to give their full, free and unbiassed votes in favour of the men whom they desired to enunciate their principles in Parliament. There was another principle that was advocated by the Reform party when they were in Opposition, and that was the principle of voting by ballot. Were the Ministry and their followers an organized band of hypocrites in advocating that? Let them look at the records. Let them read the denials of the statement which had been uttered here in the fact that voting by ballot was now the law of the land, and was made so by the party now in power, who advocated it while in Opposition. Another great principle had been maintained by the Reform party in Opposition, and this was that the House, the representatives of the people, should control the public expenditure.

AN HON. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

MR. PATERSON said he was glad to know, from the cry of "hear, hear," that the hon. members of the Opposition understood Reform principles so well; he only wished they would practice them a little more. This principle had been violated by the then Government of the day, and vast sums of money had been taken out of the hands of Parliament and vested in the hands of the thirteen gentlemen who at the time composed the responsible advisers of the Crown. But the first act of the present Government had been to hand back the control of the public expenditure to the representatives of the people. The grand and distinguishing principles of the Reform party had been carried out in their practice by the Government of the day. The hon. members of the Opposition should be more careful with regard to the expressions they made use of in relation to the Reform party—a large majority of the members of the House had been branded as an organized hypocrisy. That the Ministerial party was an organized party he did not pretend to deny, but they were not organized on the basis or the platform of hypocrisy. They were united by the only tie that should bind public men together, and this tie consisted of the great and grand principles which they advocated. And it was because they were so united in an organized band, and because their opponents knew that they could not weaken the ties which banded them together, that they were thus roused to fury. These hon. gentlemen declared that they (the Ministerialists) were an organized hypocrisy, but they were organized on the grand principles for which they had contended in Opposition, and which they had put in practice since their accession to power. They did not claim to be perfect, but their party was pure; and, when he spoke of the purity of the Reform party, he wanted the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition to understand distinctly that he did not claim purity for all the members of the party individually. He did not think it tended to the elevation of the tone of Parliament to have one member pointing out how another member had acted disgracefully. He claimed that, as a party, the Reform party was the party of purity; and he did so because they had advocated measures which tended to keep parties pure. On this ground he held that their party was the party of purity, and not because they themselves were individually more pure than others.

MR. PLUMB: Are you pure innocents or pure in no sense?

MR. PATERSON said that, though pure innocents, they were quite capable of looking after the hon. gentleman; their innocency was not of that kind which prevented them from seeing through the tricks made use of by hon. members of the Opposition. Innocent as they might be in matters of guilt, yet, when those hon. gentlemen attempted by a flank movement to snatch a partial success, they knew how to defeat it. They were not quite as innocent as hon. members of the Opposition at times desired. A matter on which the Reform party felt very strongly related to departmental management, the management of the affairs of the Government and the country in a just and economical manner. They felt there should be economy combined with efficiency. Charges had been made against the Government that they had departed from the principles which they had advocated in Opposition in reference to this matter. It was alleged that they had increased the departmental expenditure and become extravagant. He should not pretend to discuss this question now; an opportunity would be offered for doing so when the Public Accounts were laid before the House and the hon. the Finance Minister detailed to the House the financial condition of the country; but he ventured to say that when they looked into the Public Accounts up to the present year, the Opposition would find it impossible to substantiate their charges of extravagance, corruption and waste made against the Administration. While the late Government had run up its expenditure at the rate of two millions a year—10 millions in five years—the ordinary expenditure of this Government was almost the same last year as was the expenditure made during the last year of the late Administration, notwithstanding the great and extraordinary expenses entailed upon them, owing to the engagements of the late Administration. If the hon. the Finance Minister could show that he had reduced the expenditure to a point even lower than that of the previous Government,—and he hoped this would be the case, though he was not in a position to say that it was so—he thought the refutation thus afforded against the attacks of the Opposition would be sufficiently plain, clear and distinct. Leading members of the Opposition had gone about the country making such accusations, but they had taken care to do so when no one was present to reply to and expose their mis-statements. He regretted the fact that—as far as he was able to understand the policy of the Opposition,—these hon. gentlemen were not at the present time banded together by any principle upon which respectable and honourable members of the House should be banded together. They had listened in vain for the enunciation of any principle or platform upon which the Opposition might combine. It was idle and useless to talk of the Opposition as being united, and as standing together upon any great platform. It was beyond the comprehension of any man in the House to know what their principles were with reference to the great trade question before the country. They found the hon. member for North Ontario advocating, in one part of his speech, the levying of duties equal to those levied by the United States Government, while in another portion the hon. gentleman took care to tell the House that the Opposition did not wish such duties to be levied. The hon. gentleman did not even understand what he meant himself; and how could he (Mr. Gibbs) expect hon. members of the House to understand what he meant. He gave the right hon. member for Kingston credit for knowledge on various points, but the right hon. gentleman was no authority on the trade question of the day; the right hon. gentleman did not comprehend the real position of commercial affairs, nor was he in a position to lead any members of the House in this connection. The motions which the right hon. member had made in this relation, during the last few years, might be read either way—as in favour of free trade or of a retaliatory tariff. They were neither explicit nor clear. These resolutions were without meaning, and the Conservative party was without meaning and equally without principle. The spectacle which the Opposition had presented before the House and country during the last two or three days, and the last two or three years, has been a lamentable one. Their policy was one of slander of the country's public men; it was infamous; they invented slanders only to be compelled to withdraw them on notice that otherwise they would be called upon to establish the truth of such charges before the Courts. The Opposition insinuated—as had been done on the previous evening—charges which they dared not make publicly before the House; and when that foul slander was insinuated by a member of the Opposition on the evening previous, they had witnessed the way in which the slander, together with the slanderer, had been crushed. The House was the tribunal of the people, before which such charges, if at all founded, should be formulated in the manner in which the hon. the Postmaster-General had preferred his charges against the late Government. The Opposition sought to destroy the characters of the public men of the country in a cowardly manner by circulating through the press, foul slanders and charges which they dared not make in the House. If these charges were well founded, he held that the Opposition was recreant to its duty in not formulating them before the House. If established, he would withdraw his confidence from those so assailed; but he would tell hon. members of the Opposition that they could not shake the faith of any follower of the Reform Administration in it by such a course as they were pursuing. If the hon. gentlemen thought otherwise, they were mightily mistaken. Their faith in the Government was only increased in consequence of the fact that the Opposition had invented, without any foundation, slander after slander. The managers of the organs of the Opposition had, in more than one case, gone down on their knees and penned the most abject apologies that ever were indited to save themselves from prosecution in this connection. He asked hon. members to read the apology made to the Hon. George Brown, owing to the circulation in print of a foul slander against that gentleman, who was one of the first men of this country. He would refer for a moment to the Independence of Parliament Act. It had been a source of regret to him, as well as to other hon. gentlemen he believed, to find that whether wittingly or unwittingly—and he believed it was done unwittingly—certain members of the House had violated the Act in question, and thus in a measure brought reproach upon the Reform party for which, they could have wished, no reason had ever existed. But it could not be charged against the Government that there was anything corrupt in the relations that had led to these violations of this Act. The spirit and object of the law was to prevent the Government of the day assuming a position whereby they might force hon. members to act contrary to their convictions and principles, in order to carry through some measure repugnant to the well-being or the interests of the country; but he ventured to say that, if the violations of the Act which had occurred were weighed in this light, it would be found that the letter, and not the spirit of the law, had been broken. The Government had never exercised the slightest influence upon any hon. gentleman who had offended in this connection; and these hon. gentlemen belonged to both sides of the House. It could not be charged that the hon. member for Lincoln, who was a life-long staunch Reformer—he might say the hon. gentleman was born a Reformer—had been influenced in his attitude to the Administration, owing to the fact that he (Mr. Norris) had been interested in a contract for the carrying of steel rails. The hon. gentleman had long been a tried friend of the Government of the day; nor could it be said that the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier) had been improperly influenced by the Administration, of which he was a steadfast and steady opponent, in connection with his unwitting violation of the law. No restraint had been placed upon any member of the House in this regard, as had been shown by the manner in which the hon. gentlemen had voted in the House; though the letter of the Act had been broken, its spirit had been kept as pure as though these transactions had never occurred. So hard had the Opposition been driven for charges to formulate against the Government, that they had not hesitated to attack the First Commoner in the House, and to utter words with reference to him which should have been left unsaid, especially as that gentleman, owing to his position, had been unable to reply to the attacks made upon his character. And this attitude of the Opposition towards the Speaker had been continued after that gentleman had been re-elected and purged of anything that was corrupt about the transaction, if any such thing existed. Nevertheless, either in an unguarded moment, or in a moment of honesty, the leader of the Opposition a year ago had placed upon the published reports of the House, in Hansard, a high tribute to the gentleman who was the Speaker of the House. The right hon. gentleman had stated that, if the letter of the Statute was violated in the Speaker's case, its spirit at least was not, because, in every decision he (the Speaker) had delivered, the utmost justice had been done. He was glad to know that this was the case and on record, because this formed a kind of offset, to the rather unkind remarks which that hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) had thought it incumbent on himself to make on the occasion of the re-election of the Speaker. There was no proof that the Government were parties to the violation of the Statute; they had had no intention of corrupting the First Commoner in the land. He would beg to remind the House that, when an attempt was made, without trial, and without the facts being properly before the House, to dispossess that gentleman of his seat, this attempt was resisted by the Ministry and its supporters, who were animated by that sense of fair play which should be inherent in every man's nature; the matter was referred to the Committee of Privileges and Elections which had had to overthrow a precedent that had been established in this relation, before they could make the report they did; and it was well known what a sacred thing, almost, precedent was in British history. What was the result? It was this,—that before the Committee could report that the hon. the Speaker had been guilty of aught wrong in itself or aught in violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, they had to wipe out and set aside a precedent which had been established by the previous Government; and, instead of using any means to shield the hon. the Speaker, they had rendered that precedent nugatory, and then reported that the hon. the Speaker had violated what they conceived ought to be the spirit of the Independence of Parliament Act. The ma-majority of the members of the Committee were Ministerialists, and this report showed the spirit which animated the Reform party and its members with reference to the maintenance inviolate of the Independence of Parliament Act.

MR. PATERSON.

MR. FARROW said at that late hour he would content himself by giving an illustration, from which he trusted the House would judge the whole of the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson). The hon. gentleman said the Opposition charged the Government and Reform party with being an organized hypocrisy. Sir Francis Hincks had given them that name, and he was quite satisfied that Sir Francis Hincks should bear the odium of it. And they all knew that Sir Francis Hincks was a very good judge of human nature, as well as being considered a gentleman of extraordinary financial ability. The best manner in which to rebut the pretensions of any man was to quote his own language. They were aware that, when the Government acceded to power, they were very eager for office on the Treasury benches, and very eager for money. It was not long subsequently that the hon. the Finance Minister hastened to London to borrow a large sum, and no doubt the English capitalists then asked him what security he could offer for a loan. The record of the late Government had then just terminated; and he (Mr. Farrow) wished to see whether the House would call the conduct of the hon. the Finance Minister on that occasion hypocrisy, or whether they would look upon it in the light of the song which used to be sung in Canada some years ago—"We all wear cloaks." The hon. the Finance Minister, with reference to the financial condition of the country, then declared:

"The whole of the debt has been incurred for legitimate objects of public utility. The indirect advantage, from these public works, has already been found in the remarkable rapidity with which the commerce and the material prosperity of the Dominion have been developed; while a substantial increase in the direct returns may fairly be expected from the improvements now in progress, and to follow the steady progress of population and trade. The revenue has shown a continuous surplus, during each year since Confederation in 1867, although it has, in the interval, been charged with much heavy expenditure of an exceptional kind, such as the outlay connected with the several Fenian attacks on the country, the acquisition and organization of new territory, and providing an adequate defensive force for the Dominion. The eight years since Confederation, therefore, exhibit an aggregate surplus of £2,443,111 (equal to $11,889,808, and not including the sinking fund) which has been partially applied in the redemption of debt, and partially expended in new works. The annual payment for sinking fund is included in the current expenditure, and forms, in the aggregate, a further sum of £700,000 (or $3,406,668) since Confederation."

MR. PATERSON.

This was what the hon. the Finance Minister said in England; and when he was brought to book for these very remarks, what did he say? If not in words, in substance he said that he only just held out this to hoodwink them; he did not mean what he said. Now, he wanted this House and this country to understand this, because it was very material; and, if, after that, they would place any reliance on any man that would utter such sentiments, he could not. Was Sir Francis Hincks right when he called them an organized hypocrisy? He would not say that, but he would say they were pretty close to it. He was convinced in his own mind that this Government would not learn a lesson until they went to the polls. After eighteen or nineteen elections had settled the problem in Quebec, and nearly every election elsewhere,—their Ministers having been defeated as fast as they had been set up,—yet they said there was no reaction. Their unbelief was like that of the Jews of old; he could compare it to nothing else. With such light before them, they said there was no reaction; and the polls alone would cure them. He was thinking a little while ago, when they had been thoroughly defeated,—“They have ears, but they hear not; eyes have they, but they see not; they have hearts, but they seem to feel not; and their consciences are seared.” He had occasion to go to one or two picnics, and he might say that his Riding was specially honoured by the hon. the Premier during last summer. He went as a humble hearer. He was not invited on the platform,—yes, any Conservative was invited to go and take up Mr. Mackenzie's idea of the steel rail transaction. They had a large concourse of people, and some of the Reformers said: “Now is your chance; go forward.” He was not inclined to go forward; and he would say here what he was not inclined to say there. He would not tell this House the burden that was upon Mr. Mackenzie's mind that day, when he challenged the Conservatives to come forward and review what he had done in regard to steel rails. He was glad that the hon. the First Minister was in the House, listening to him; and he was glad that he had this opportunity, here on the floor of Parliament, where he could get a hearing, to say what he could not there. He was not afraid to meet the lion in his den on this very subject. Mr. Mackenzie said: “Gentlemen, what do you think is the cry against me about these steel rails? Why it is just this, I bought rails at $54 per ton, while the late Government, when they were in power, paid $84 a ton for them; so I saved $30 a ton.” That was the way he explained the steel rail transaction. Now he (Mr. Farrow) wished to explain it, as he had not the chance to explain it there. Mr. Mackenzie paid in England for these steel rails the enormous sum of $2,923,900; adding to that $15,000 of freight on 4,000 tons, coming to Canada, and it made a total of $2,938,900. Then there was insurance on these rails, and inland transport, $222,884, and then they had the interest to pay to the 30th of June, 1877, $271,365, making a total, in round numbers, of nearly three-and-a-half millions. Now look at the profit and loss account, in a few words: Cash paid in England, as he had mentioned, $2,938,900; they could have been bought last spring,—and this was the charge he brought against the Premier, that he bought these rails before they were needed, and without the authority of Parliament—for $1,800,000; a clear loss to the country of $1,138,000. Let the Premier dispute this if he could. This was not all the loss. Add the interest up to the 30th of June last, $271,365, then add that loss of rails that was given to the Pictou Railway, a clear loss of $235,120, and the account of loss now was $1,645,385 dollars, while the interest, month after month, was increasing to the tune of $13,500. In the Clinton speech the Premier was very abrupt, though he (Mr. Farrow) thought he behaved and quitted himself like a child. The Premier could not let the Conservatives alone. Speaking about protection, he said: "I suppose your member, Mr. Farrow, is a great Protectionist; he proclaims himself a Protectionist and a friend." He (Mr. Farrow) supposed that the Premier did not know he was a farmer, though he split rails, and mowed, and ditched; he supposed the Premier thought he was in some lawyer's office, and did not know anything about work. Not only that, but he referred to the fact of his being opposed by Dr. Tupper and Dr. Orton, the farmer's friend, and said it put him in mind of an anecdote of an old Yankee. He said there was an old Yankee attending a meeting at which they were all applauding the farmer. This old Yankee wanted to be higher than the rest; he wanted to be a farmer above all the rest. "Well," says he, "gentlemen, my grandfather was a farmer, my father was a farmer, and I am a farmer; in fact I may say I was brought up between two rows of corn." Another old Yankee says, "Yes, by jingo—pumpkin." Therefore, Tupper was a pumpkin, and Orton was a pumpkin, and Farrow was a pumpkin. That was a sample of his reasoning. But they were pretty well preserved; and he was quite content to be called a pumpkin because he thought the Government would pretty soon go "squash." He had almost forgotten to say, while on that subject of steel rails, that he would be glad, and he thought the country would be glad, if a committee was asked for to enquire into that steel rail transaction. There was more in it than had ever been brought out; and the charges that were formulated in the Gazette newspaper of Montreal, neither the Premier nor any of his followers had ever cleared up yet. This Government talked about letting contracts to the lowest tenderer, while in that very transaction they had never tendered at all; but the particular favoured firm got what they liked, and the people had to sweat and toil to pay the money. He hoped and trusted that there would be an enquiry made this Session of Parliament into the whole matter; it was rotten. There was "something rotten in Denmark" on that subject, and he trusted an inquiry would be made into that transaction. The transaction required investigation; and the hon. the Premier had already, he thought, confessed that it was a mistake, and that he erred in judgment. He hoped the hon. gentleman would think twice before he acted again like that. He (Mr. Farrow) was also at the Teeswater picnic. He thought he would go to hear his brilliant friend, the then Minister of Justice (Mr. Blake.) It was circulated that there would be from fifteen to twenty thousand people there; but when he got there, although it was a beautiful day, he found only about fifteen hundred all told. It was a great come down from their expectations, and those who had provided accommodation lost by their enterprise. They scarcely could make a cheer; they tried to get up a little cheering, but there was scarcely any heart in them big enough to venture a good cheer. The hon. the Minister of Justice, he was sorry to see, was looking very unwell; he was glad to see the hon. gentleman looking better now, and, if looks were any indication of his general health, he was glad to see that he was entirely recovered. However, he spoke that day three hours and a quarter, but he was very much worn out, and had to be supported off the platform. He wanted to mention one little incident in that speech. He did not know whether he ought to find fault with their leader (Sir John A. Macdonald); he thought he would find fault with him. When that Goderich Harbour job was up last Session, he had the honour of bringing it forward. This House understood that there was a little letter written by Mr. Blake in favour of Mr. Moore to Mr. Mackenzie. Of course there was no harm in this little bit of a note. He heard they were very sensitive, and it had troubled them ever since; and Mr. Blake had to explain this little note at Teeswater. He said: "Why, gentlemen, to show my innocence, to show that I had nothing to do with it in the world, the right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald exonerated me from everything connected with that."

MR. FARROW.

Well, now, it appeared that the hon. gentleman, learned as he was, and astute as he was, one of the greatest jurists in the country, did not know what irony was. Probably the best piece of irony they had in the whole English language was that passage where the prophet met the false prophets, four hundred strong, and, when there was no answer by fire to their sacrifices, he said: "Cry aloud, probably he is on a journey, or perhaps he is asleep." That was a fine piece of irony. Sir John Macdonald's was a fine piece of irony, too; and the hon. gentleman palmed it off on his constituents that Sir John A. Macdonald had exonerated him. That was a piece of irony of the very keenest cutting power that was ever manifested in this House, and the hon. gentleman knew that very well. He wanted now to say a word or two in reference to one or two paragraphs in the Address. It said:—

"We accept with thankfulness Your Excellency's congratulations on the abundant harvest reaped in all quarters of the Dominion; and we rejoice with Your Excellency, that under this and other influences, there has been some improvement in the Revenue returns, thus indicating, we also trust, that the commercial depression that has so long afflicted Canada, in common with other countries, is passing away."

Well, they were passing away; their grandfathers had passed away, some of their fathers had passed away, and they themselves would pass away; and he hoped the Government would soon politically pass away. The cloud was a dark one yet; there was no light in the sky; there was no silver lining in the cloud; go to the west, the east, the north, or the south, and but one cry was heard. Go to the small storekeeper, and he would tell them that it was harder to make his collections than it was last year; go to the man higher up in business, in retail, and he would tell them the same thing; go to the wholesale merchants, and they would find that it was the experience of nine-tenths of the wholesale houses in Canada to-day that their collections were far below what they were last year at this time. They might say that the grain had not been marketed on account of want of snow. He denied it. In Western Canada, where they had railways in abundance, and where they had such admirable wheeling instead of sleighing, and where the people were so hard up for cash, there was no sign of this cloud passing away. He could fain wish that they could rise up some morning and all would be bright and beautiful; but it was not so. Clothe it and hide it as they might, it was not passing away; and yet this fly-on-the-wheel Government would not move one single finger. Yes, they did when the coal-oil question was pressing hard on the people last year; when the hon. the Minister of Finance had to admit that this country had lost $1,200,000 through his neglect; when the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) got up in his place the very first thing, he said: "Let it alone, I have seen my error, I have seen my mistake, and I will rectify it," and he had to rectify it; the people were all clamouring for it to be rectified; and it was rectified, and coal oil came down from 50c. to 25c. immediately. Did not the House think that the Government could help to remove this great weight of depression? He was sure they could if they would only try; but, because they had not tried, because they had sacrificed the industries of the country, they would be swept away from power; and he would say "Amen." Passing away? As one of his friends had asked, did the Government take credit for the good harvest?—they did not make the sun to shine, they did not send down the showers. Well, he did not know about that; they might be very devoted men; they were very strict observers of the Sabbath; they were very moral men; he hoped they were men of the right stamp, and, if they were, they might have a great deal of power here and elsewhere. He was not going to say anything about that; he was glad to say they had had a better crop throughout the country this year than last; but he must say that the crop was not what it was said to be. This increase in the revenue returns was all the worse for them. Did they remember last June, the delight when the crop was promising all over the country, and the newspapers said "Oh, there is an abundance"? Reports came in from all parts testifying that there was an abundance; and what did the wholesale merchants do? They were encouraged by that, and they ran away to England, Scotland, Ireland and the United States and laid in large quantities of goods; and then their business was to throw these goods out to retail. Then the crop did not turn out what it was said to be. The revenue returns were large, but he believed the country was worse off for it, because the crop had not turned out what was expected. There were large yields here and there, but the wheat crop was not extra, the oat crop was poor, and the potato crop was a mere nothing, and the hay crop was a mere nothing. The newspapers did a great wrong to the country when they told the country that there was an abundance anywhere; and the wholesale merchants did very wrong when they bought so many goods in prospect. The hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young) launched out in very strong terms, and seemed to say that the Government had saved up and been very economical. They went into power to be economical; they professed that they were economists; but, after all, he came to the conclusion that they were worse than the late Government by $200,000. He had not time to lay their whole financial savings and losings before the House to-night, but he wanted to call the attention of the House to one little point—the cost of bringing out emigrants under the two Governments. In 1873 the late Government brought out nearly 37,000, at a cost of $7.76 per head. That was in 1873. In 1875 this beautiful Government, this, as Sir Francis Hincks called them, organized hypocrisy, brought 16,000, and they cost $18.90 per head. But it was worse in 1876; they then brought 10,900, at a cost of $26.55 per head. At that late hour, and knowing there were other gentlemen who wished to speak, he should exercise his common sense and sit down.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P. E. I.) said they were told in the Speech from the Throne that nothing beyond the ordinary business of the country needed their attendance; that there was no legislation required. That was a matter of congratulation, and both the House and the country should rejoice that Canada had reached such a happy state that no legislation was required. He had the strongest conviction that not a single important measure had been added to the Statute-book while the present party had been in power; and therefore they might conclude from that that the country was left in such a state by the Conservative party that no more legislation was necessary. In the second resolution, reference was made to the departure of the Governor-General from this country. This was a matter of regret in which he heartily joined. His Excellency had made himself acquainted with all the Provinces of the Dominion, and conversant with the wants and wishes of the people. He had gained a great deal of information which he would necessarily carry away with him, and he looked upon his departure as a national loss. He was sure that His Excellency and Her Excellency, when they left this country, would carry with them the very best wishes of the community. Further on in the speech they were told that Sitting Bull had come into this Dominion. Well, he wished him a pleasant time; he was sure the gentleman was welcome, but he did not know that they should feel any very special interest in him. But, as there was nothing to legislate about, his opinion was that the hon. the First Minister—whom he looked upon as a greater man than Sitting Bull, as he occupied a more important position in this country—should have told the House a little of his own excursions during the summer. He might have told them of his political raid through the Maritime Provinces, and of the success which attended that raid; how the people flocked round him, and how satisfied he was at leaving—particularly Prince Edward Island, where there had been no reaction and where he expected that at the next election there would not be one Conservative returned. When the hon. gentleman arrived at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, he set to work at once to gather people together to hear his political harangues. The Railway Superintendent sent a message to Ontario that large placards were posted all over the Province inviting people to hear the hon. gentleman, and about one-third of the people were there. He had no objection to an hon. gentleman who occupied such a high position, getting a good reception. He would like to hear that the hon. the First Minister had a good reception, and that he was treated with the respect his position entitled him to; but, when he (Mr. Pope) saw the public institutions of the country used for political purposes, he considered it would be well for every man to vote against anything of the kind. Well, the hon. the Prime Minister did have a great political meeting at Charlottetown, and he addressed the meeting for a long time. During his speech three cheers were asked for for Sir John A. Macdonald, and three-fourths at once cheered for the Opposition. This was an indication that six Liberal members were to be returned for Prince Edward Island at the next election. It would have been much better for the country if the hon. member, when he was down there, had looked a little more to the interests of his country, and had done the duty that the responsible office which he held required at his hands. He (Mr. Pope) referred to the great public work down at Souris, for which this House had voted sixty or seventy thousand dollars. If the hon. the Minister had gone to look at that great work, he would have seen that, unless something were done to protect it when the autumn gales came, it would be washed away. A small amount would have saved it; but, although the engineers recommended that something should be done for its protection, nothing was done; and, when the first gale came, three or four hundred feet of the work was washed away. He (Mr. Pope) had been told that the work had been run up and never properly secured; however, something decided would have protected it in a great measure, and a large amount would have been saved; whereas, now thirty or forty thousand dollars would be added to the cost of the work to make it what it should be. There was another matter in regard to which some remarks might have been made in the Speech. The Government had spent a large amount of money to improve the winter navigation of the Northumberland Straits, and they might have known what the result of putting the Northern Light there would be. That boat cost sixty, or seventy, or eighty thousand dollars, and this year probably twenty or thirty thousand dollars had been spent to make her fit for sea. They might have heard something of that boat in the Speech. But he did not blame the Government for that so much as this fact: last Session when the matter was brought up in this House, the members of the Senate from Prince Edward Island, and one from New Brunswick, waited upon the First Minister and urged upon him the necessity of sending the mails by another way. One of those hon. gentlemen stated they had lived a lifetime in those parts, and had crossed the Straits for thirty years, and supposed they knew a little about them. This was a most important matter to the people of Prince Edward Island. Well, the first ice this winter, this steamer, stuck and remained for eight days about seven miles from Pictou. They had an ice-boat but no crew to take the passengers on shore. The passengers at last got to Georgetown, where they remained several days; and the people of Prince Edward Island were eight days without a mail. The boat was cut out the other day and went back to Prince Edward Island. Then she made another attempt to cross the Straits, and he had received telegrams from influential gentlemen the previous day,—a post office inspector, a railway manager and others, stating "No Northern Light since Saturday; sixteen miles from Pictou, with mails. No communication since Saturday." If the Government wished to try experiments with this boat, let them send it where they would, only allow the people of Prince Edward Island to get their mails. It was a strong cause of complaint, and he did hope that the hon. the Postmaster-General would at once make arrangements so that the mails should be regularly received. This boat might have done well in running when there was no ice. This and last year they had had exceptional winters, but they never could depend on having the mails sent in winter by that boat. Let them experiment with the boat at Wallace or Pugwash, or where they liked, but the mails must not be detained for days and weeks together. Now the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had made a statement that six members of his politics would be returned from Prince Edward Island at the next election. He could only say this—give the people of that Province the opportunity and the hon. gentleman would see what he would get. And he contended that an early opportunity should be given to the people of this country, because he thought Ministers had no right to carry on a Government so long, when they had every reason to believe that they had not the confidence of the country with them. The evidence of the elections was that they had not. In eight out of every ten single elections that had been run during the past year, the supporters of the Government had not been returned. In Queen's County they had a candidate who was looked upon as a thoroughly strong supporter of the Government; but, notwithstanding the influence the Local Government brought to bear on the election, he (Mr. Pope) was returned. He thought they could not have stronger evidence than that that the people were against the present Government.

MR. FARROW.

MR. CARON said every hon. member of this House must certainly admit that this very lengthened debate was one of considerable importance, inasmuch as it had allowed most of the new members to put before the House and the country their views on the leading topics of the day. It was especially interesting to Conservative members from the Province of Quebec, as it had brought before their notice some facts which he, for one, must admit he had been ignorant of, in connection with the Liberals of that Province. He would not take up the time of the House did he not wish to challenge some of the statements which had been made by the hon. gentleman who moved the Address (Mr. De St. Georges), and several other gentlemen from the Province of Quebec who had spoken in reference to that Address. He must say that the hon. member for

MR. POPE.

Portneuf had moved the Address in a manner which certainly deserved all the eulogium which had been passed upon it by both sides of the House; but he had made some statements which he (Mr. Caron) would have liked to have seen dealt with more fully, so that they might have been better understood by the public. He was surprised when he heard the hon. member,—coming from the Province and living in the city of Quebec—speaking of the commercial depression which had been affecting the country already for a lengthened period, state that this depression had entirely disappeared. It was impossible to understand where the hon. member got his information from. It might be that the crisis did not affect the people who returned the hon. gentleman to Parliament; or, if it did, that the reaction had commenced earlier in Portneuf than in any other section of the country. But he would ask the hon. gentleman simply to go about the manufacturing district of Quebec; he would ask him to visit the shores of the river St. Charles, where, for years, ship-building was carried on on such an extensive scale, giving work and happiness to such a numerous population, and say whether the commercial crisis had ceased so far as that industry was concerned. He would ask him to go round the different manufactories which, for years, had prospered in the city of Quebec, and then to state if it was not a fact that nearly everyone of them had closed and were incapable of giving the labour and the bread to the large population they used to feed. It seemed to him (Mr. Caron) that these were all signs which could not be mistaken. He would ask the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue whether, in the particular district represented by him, one large shoe factory had not been closed, which, for years, had been prosperous, but unfortunately conducted by a gentleman who was a Free-trader, who supported the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue at his last election, and only a few days after carrying the day, added his name to the already too long list of insolvents. If this were the reaction the hon. member for Portneuf had seen fit to boast of, it was one he (Mr. Caron) had not been able to see, although he should like to be able to congratulate the country, as the hon. member had done, upon an improvement in commercial affairs. The hon. gentleman (Mr. De St. Georges) had spoken in very discouraging terms of the frightful financial burden which the present Administration had to take from the hands of the Government when they came into power. He (Mr. Caron) should not attempt to convince the hon. gentleman of his error by quoting the figures of gentlemen of the Opposition; gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House were supposed to know nothing of finance; all the financial talent was reserved to gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches; but he should quote a letter of the present Finance Minister when in England—a gentleman in whom the hon. member (Mr. De St. Georges) placed implicit confidence, and this letter he was perfectly certain would show the hon. gentleman that he was perhaps a little hasty in speaking of the frightful legacy the present Government had received. The document was well known to the House and to the country, and he should not take up the time of the House by reading it in full, but he would read a couple of paragraphs which, to his mind, would decide the question. In that letter the hon. the Minister stated: "The whole of this debt"—not reading the whole of the figures, which were here given—"has been incurred for legitimate objects of public utility." Every detail was given to show how the debt was made up. The items he would read were:—

| | |
|--|--------------|
| "Canals, about..... | £5,500,000 |
| "Railways, including advances to, and the cost of those actually owned by Canada, about..... | $12,000,000 |
| "Lighthouses, River Improvements, Harbours, Roads, and Public Buildings..... | 2,000,000 |
| "Compensation to the various Provinces for property and revenue surrendered to the Dominion, the purchase and organization of Territories, and the freeing of Lands in the Province of Quebec from the feudal tenure, etc..... | 5,000,000 |

"The indirect advantages from these public works has already been found in the remarkable rapidity with which the commerce and material prosperity of the Dominion has been developed, while a substantial increase in the direct returns may fairly be expected from the improvements now in progress, and from the steady advance of population and trade."

The hon. the Minister then stated that the debt incurred for perfectly legitimate objects, was not a heavy debt for Canada, and went on to say :

"It need hardly be observed that Canada possesses many important branches of revenue still untouched, and that the population, though exceedingly well-to-do in the mass, contribute a comparatively small amount per head, as compared with most other countries."

That letter was dated London, October 19th, 1875, and was signed by Richard J. Cartwright, Minister of Finance for the Dominion of Canada. That evidence showed that those taxes were considered to be very high as compared with the resources of the country. Taking that statement as given by an hon. gentleman who possessed the full confidence of the hon. member for Portneuf who had moved the Address, it seemed very difficult to understand how, in the face of that letter, that hon. gentleman could state that the present Government had inherited a crushing load from the Government which had preceded them in office. It might be that that letter was not distributed among friends of the hon. the Minister of Finance and that it was merely laid before the English money market when it became necessary for the hon. the Minister of Finance to get English funds into Canada, and, as had been stated by hon. gentleman on the Opposition side of the House, it was merely intended to hoodwink English capitalists and not affect any of the friends or followers of the hon. gentlemen who sat on the Treasury benches. The hon. mover of the Address had declared himself very grateful to the Government for the economy which they had displayed and the policy of retrenchment which had distinguished the Administration ever since they had been in office. It might be that that hon. member was perfectly grateful, but he was grateful for very little. It seemed that small favours might be very gratefully received, but in the present instance it was impossible for him to understand how the hon. gentleman could appear before the House and the country and state that he, a public man, representing an important county, should feel grateful for that retrenchment and economy which, according to the particulars which had not been, and could not be, controverted, amounted, since 1873, to an increase in public expenses of $1,800,000. If those were deeds which satisfied his hon. friend, he (Mr. Caron) was perfectly willing that hon. gentlemen should go before the country and try and convince the people of the gratitude which they owed to the hon. gentlemen now in power. Another question brought up by the hon. gentleman opposite, and also by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, was that of the Amnesty, and he (Mr. Caron) could only repeat what the hon. member for North Hastings said yesterday: that perhaps it might have been as well had those discussions, which had been fought out on so many different occasions in the House and before the people, not been again revived. He, therefore, wished to refer to the Amnesty question, without going fully into details of the question, and to answer a few statements which might be misinterpreted when the parties would have to discuss them again before the people. According to the statements of the mover of the Address, it would appear that on the question of an amnesty for political offenders in Manitoba, all the efforts in their behalf were made by the Liberals. He begged to differ from the hon. gentleman, and it appeared to him that the statement was not borne out by the facts as found in the political history of that period. He would show that all the efforts made on behalf of Manitoba political offenders were commenced and carried on by the Conservatives of the Province of Quebec.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. CARON said it was very easy for hon. members to say, "Hear, hear," but it would be more difficult to answer the facts which he would give and which were unanswerable. He claimed that, in the Province of Quebec, when it became necessary to agitate in favour of the political offenders of Manitoba, the Conservatives originated every meeting, prepared all the petitions, which were covered with hundreds and thousands of signatures, and sent them to the Government to initiate a movement which, according to their views, was considered to be in the interest of those political offenders. He was perfectly willing to admit, and he did admit, that the question of amnesty was a very difficult one to handle, and it was so felt to be by the late Government. Why did it become such a difficult question to handle, decide, and settle. No hon. member, either on the Opposition or Government side of the House, could contest the fact that the agitation against the political offenders in Manitoba was originated by the Grits of Ontario. He remembered reading at that period, and following up the events, which were of considerable importance, that the first motion placed on the paper in respect to these troubles in Manitoba, was a motion by the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal). He remembered also that the motion of the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) came later in the day; the first motion against Riel being moved by the hon. member for South Wentworth. Following that motion and shortly after it, a vote, $5,000, was made for the arrest and punishment of Riel, by the Legislature of the Province of Ontario, the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) being head of the Government, and the hon. the Premier (Mr. Mackenzie) being one of the leading members of the Administration. No doubt it was supposed at that time, that this was the best means the Liberal-Conservative party could adopt to injure the right hon. member for Kingston in Ontario. It was supposed that this would harm him, and harm him alone at that period; but, when the hon. member for Lambton acceded to office, probably he felt that the agitation which had been directed against the right hon. member for Kingston at that time now proved very injurious to himself, and placed him in a very difficult position as regarded the settlement of that question. But, casting aside those issues which were fought and decided on the floor of Parliament, he left the question to be decided by those directly interested in it. Ha would leave it to the people of Manitoba, and to the Archbishop of St. Boniface, who, probably, exercised more influence than any other man among the people of Manitoba. They had the letters and petitions—even the last pamphlet of the Archbishop—expressing the thanks of the whole population to the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) and the Conservatives who had fought their battle in Canada; and they were sufficient proof that the hon. the mover of the Address was wrong in declaring that the Liberals, and they alone, had done their duty on this important question. The question of the amnesty having been brought before the House, of course it was impossible not to refer to the last scene which had occurred in reference to it. When the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue was fighting his battle in Quebec East—after being rejected by the electors of Drummond and Arthabaska—the question of an amnesty for O'Donoghue, placing him in exactly the same position as the other political offenders in Manitoba, was decided. It had been pretended that long before that election in Quebec East, the question had been decided in Council. It had been argued that the settlement of the question could not have influenced that election, because the settlement had been decided long before it took place. But there was one extraordinary feature in that statement. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, when fighting the battle in his own county of Drummond and Arthabaska, must have been informed, or should have been informed by those whom he had just joined as part of the Administration, that the Cabinet had passed a resolution practically settling the question of amnesty; but not a word was said in Drummond and Arthabaska in reference to the amnesty to O'Donoghue. It was only subsequent to the agitation by which the Conservatives had kept the question alive during the contest in Quebec East, and when the Conservatives told the people who took an interest in O'Donoghue that this question had not been settled, that the hon. gentleman, in replying to a deputation, which waited upon him, said the matter was going to be settled. It thus appeared that, if it had not been for the Conservatives, O'Donoghue would have remained in the same position as last Session, when the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, who was to-day so anxious to help O'Donoghue, voted against the motion of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan). Last Session, that hon. gentleman considered it was impossible to grant an amnesty to O'Donoghue; but this year, when he fought the battle in Quebec East, he deemed it was indispensable to grant an amnesty to him.

MR. CARON.

MR. LAURIER: It was decided on two months previous to my election.

MR. CARON said he had heard that statement, but he was astonished that the people of Drummond and Arthabaska never heard about it. There was abundance of time for consultation between Drummond and Arthabaska and Ottawa if it was decided two months before the election in Quebec East. It might have been decided, but it was kept as a secret, and O'Donoghue could not benefit by it until the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue was elected for Quebec East. That hon. gentleman had referred to the election in Drummond and Arthabaska, which he had not been successful in carrying, and had spoken very harshly of the Conservatives of the Province of Quebec, and he (Mr. Caron) was really astonished, knowing that among them he had so many friends, that he should have imagined the Conservatives would have been guilty of the enormous crime of passing him off as a Protestant minister or Presbyterian preacher in Arthabaska, expecting by such means to prevent him from being elected. Those means never should be resorted to in any political contest; he was perfectly satisfied it was one of those undue influences which would be undoubtedly severely punished by the the Supreme Court, if brought under the notice of that high tribunal. However he had heard this statement, of passing the would-be M.P. for Quebec East off for a Protestant minister, denied most emphatically by every one of their friends who had been in the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska.

He did not, however, wish to challenge the statement of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. The hon. gentleman might have been told that he had been palmed off as a Protestant minister, but that must have been a mistake. It might have been that some of the hon. gentleman's own supporters had mistaken him on a dark night for some clergyman, and reported over the county that the hon. gentleman was not unlike a clergyman in his appearance. But, supposing it had happened, the same means had been resorted to before by those very men in the case of the Hon. Mr. Chapleau in Quebec, who was put down as a Dissenting minister. While he did not remember the exact denomination to which Mr. Chapleau was attached, he was certain that gentleman was abstracted (politically speaking) from his own Church and proclaimed to the people of his county as having become a Protestant minister, and this was done by the political friends of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, who complained so bitterly to-day of the same thing. It seemed that, after the hon. gentleman had spoken of that misfortune in regard to his religious standing in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska in his speech—eloquent as usual, but which, by the warlike tone which pervaded it, contributed greatly to give rise to the present lengthened debate—in that he almost adopted the very religious rôle which he complained of having been given him in consecrating to the discussion of the religious questions in the Province of Quebec, the greatest portion of his address. He (Mr. Caron) did not pretend to enter into the merits of the question, he merely uttered his own feelings, and he believed the feelings of all Conservatives who took a leading part in the politics of that Province, and he considered those were the principles of the Conservative party. He had stated outside of this House, and he repeated it now, that the people of the Province of Quebec were proud of their clergy. It was not a foreign clergy, but one taken from their own ranks. Their brothers or connections—and he had the advantage of having a brother who belonged to the church—instead of adopting a profession, chose a more perfect life and entered the Church. Those gentlemen who thus entered into holy orders possessed exactly the same rights as did the laity, and took the same interest in the future prosperity of the country; and the Conservative party in Quebec were proud of their clergy and proud of possessing their confidence. But the Conservatives who had been attacked by hon. gentlemen opposite on account of their religious views and the manner in which they looked upon religious questions in the Province of Quebec, were happy to live alongside of other nationalities and of people professing different religions, and glad moreover, to accord to them the same privileges and rights which they themselves enjoyed. Those were what he understood to be the views of the Conservative party, and those gentlemen in the Conservative ranks, who had taken a leading part in politics for a number of years. Those were the views which, so far as he personally was concerned, he professed, and which he was ready to stand by and defend. It was not a matter for surprise if the clergy of Quebec elected their allies in the Conservative ranks. It was not so many years ago since the Liberals of Lower Canada thought fit to publish their own programme. It was not a programme published as expressing individual views; but a party programme, and the platform of a party which its leaders were giving out to the people of Canada as embodying the principles which they had decided upon advocating and defending in public life. Those principles were contained in the programme of L'Avenir in 1847 and of the Pays in 1854.

MR. CARON.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear,—that is too far back.

MR. CARON said it was evidently too far back to please hon. gentlemen opposite, who he knew could never remain very long attached to any programme. He was aware that hon. gentlemen did not wish to go back more than a couple of years in any discussion of the principles they advocated; but, if that was too far back, there were more modern programmes which were equally abandoned and forsaken by those who had adopted them,—the programme published in 1872, called the programme of the National party. The Pays of course, never belonged to hon. gentlemen opposite; it was quite a discovery to them to hear of such a paper; but no doubt the hon. the Minister of Justice would remember it, if no one else did. In that programme it was announced that the privileges which the clergy had possessed under treaties, such as the tythes, &c., were to be thrown overboard. Was it, therefore, surprising that the clergy sought their allies outside of the ranks of that party? He knew that hon. gentlemen found out their mistake shortly afterwards, and that it became necessary for them to try and find new papers, a new banner, and a new programme. In 1872 such were discovered. It was given out that all the old issues were abandoned; that they must start a new party on a new platform and have a new programme. A new programme came out. It was one of those programmes which contained a great deal about Protection; but, as was the case with all the political principles of that party, the principle of Protection was abandoned and it was impossible to tell whether the new or old programme, or one between the two, was the present programme of hon. members sitting behind the Treasury benches. In adopting the new programme it was, no doubt, believed by hon. gentlemen that it would be the means of securing the influence of the clergy. It was supposed that, coming out under new colours and in a fresh garb, as the National party, they would succeed in obtaining a good deal of that influence. He remembered distinctly that several of those hon. gentlemen, including the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Jetté) and his friend Mr. Perreault, offered, timidly at first, the right hand of friendship to the hon. member for Hochelaga, owner of the Nouveau Monde, which, by-the-by, was a very bad paper according to the present views of hon. gentlemen across the House; nevertheless, they endeavoured in that way to acquire some of the influence they had. They did acquire some at first, but the constraint—for such it was to the Liberals, disappointed at not succeeding better in carrying the whole of the clergy with them—could not last long. Thereupon L'Evenement and Le National immediately sounded the note of war against the clergy, accusing the present Government of Quebec (Mr. de Boucherville's Administration) of being a priest-ridden and Ultramontano Government, of committing all imaginable excesses and exercising a disastrous influence over the people of the Province. Although he had fought many political battles in different counties, he would leave it to hon. gentlemen on either side to say whether he had ever introduced the question of religion into any political contest. He regretted to say that those questions were occasionally brought up, but certainly not by Conservatives, who merely resisted attacks of this kind. Usually those questions were introduced on the hustings, by Liberals who began the attack by stating that the Conservatives were originally Ultramontanes, a priest-ridden people, possessing no intelligence, and unable to judge for themselves; until the Conservatives, who were prepared to fight their battle on whatever field it had to be contested, were compelled to resist these attacks, and this they always did successfully. He hoped that hereafter these questions of religion would not be dragged into any political contest. However, as they had been mentioned in the House during the debate, it must be remembered that the hon. the Minister of Justice had continued the discussion. Of course, with his usual ability, he had argued the case well, as one who had pondered over such problems, and given much thought to their consequences. He closed his remarks by quoting a fable of Le Fontaine, who, as they all knew, was an author that every man who studied French was fond of reading, as being not only classical in his writings, but full of wit. He, however, failed to perceive how the fable related to the House by the hon. the Minister of Justice applied to the religious question. It seemed to him very much out of place. He had related how an unfortunate donkey, barded with relics which it was carrying to some church to be enshrined, mistook the respect the people paid to his load as intended to himself; but, when he had deposited the load, he fell back into his unhappy ordinary position of receiving blows from the boys, and stones from the people. While he could not perceive the application made by the hon. the Minister, the fable was very suggestive. It reminded him a good deal of those people who also carried their gifts and decorations to the altar, and deposited their precious load at its foot; but, as soon as they had left it there, returned to their old habits and haunts and principles. The fable was undoubtedly very suggestive; nevertheless, in a matter of that importance, although that was not the first time the hon. the Minister of Justice had made use of amusing illustrations, they were very much better omitted. He was much surprised at the statement of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue that, ever since Sir A. A. Dorion had forsaken public life to accept the Chief Justiceship of Quebec,—a position which he very ably filled,—the great Liberal party of Lower Canada had never acknowledged any other leader than the hon. the First Minister. He would like, for the convenience of the whole country, the members of the Liberal party to come to some understanding as to their utterances. For instance, he would like to see the hon. the Postmaster-General and the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, arrive at some understanding about the present Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had stated, not once, but on several occasions, that he did not consider Mr. Cauchon fit to sit in the Cabinet, and that he had a very poor opinion of him as a public man. The hon. the Postmaster-General, on the other hand, said he never sat more comfortably in a Cabinet than he did when alongside of Mr. Cauchon, the present Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. He was much surprised when the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue dropped out the names, as leaders of the Liberal party, of men who deserved not to be forgotten at the hands of their party. Immediately after Mr. Dorion's resignation, no one who had studied

MR. CARON,

Canadian political history could pretend to deny that the Hon. Mr. Fournier,—one of the eminent judges of the Supreme Court, a man who had contributed probably more than any other member of the party towards its success, a man who had been loyal to his party and was always looked upon as deserving a position in its foremost ranks,—was looked upon as the leader of the party. The party journals mentioned Mr. Fournier as the leader, and his position as such was never contested before except by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. Immediately after the Hon. Mr. Fournier came the Hon. Mr. Geoffrion, who also rendered as many and as important services to his party as any public man belonging to any party in the country had done. This was not an interested statement on his part. He was happy to be able to express his own views on this point; and if he required to be convinced of the correctness of his statement he would find it corroborated in the organs of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. This hon. gentleman said he never had a leader save the hon. the Premier; but the National of the 18th May, made the following statement:—

"After a most severe illness, which brought him to the doors of the tomb, the estimable and esteemed leader of the Reform party of Quebec, Mr. Geoffrion, has returned to Ottawa, where he will resume his duties as a colleague of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie. The friends of the Reform party will learn with pleasure that the health of Mr. Geoffrion is completely re-established, and that they can still count upon his devotion to the interests of the party, and his assiduity in attending to the needs of the good cause."

By the "good cause," this paper no doubt meant the cause of the Liberal party. The article continued:—

"Frank, loyal, honest, and firm in his convictions, Mr. Geoffrion has highly merited the distinguished position which he holds in his party, no one was better fitted than he to assume the place of Hon. Mr. Dorion."
* * * During almost a year the Reform party has been deprived of the counsels of this distinguished leader, but it has supported this great misfortune in the hope that a better future was in store for it."

Later, as they all regretted at the time, it had been thought advisable that the Hon. Mr. Geoffrion should release himself from the performance of the arduous duties of a Minister of the Crown, and simply retain his seat on the floor of the House; and so strongly was this hon. gentleman looked upon at that time as the leader of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec, and so completely was he so recognised by the whole party, that his retirement from the Cabinet was thus noticed in the National of the 27th October, 1876:—

“Mr. Geoffrion retires possessing the esteem of his colleagues and the respect of his opponents, and to the sincere regret of his friends. Never could a political leader have regarded the future with more pride and hope than he, when, in 1874, he took the place of the Hon. Mr. Dorion.”

The National went on to quote from L'Evenement of Quebec as follows:—

“It is not our intention to indicate any person in particular to occupy the position about to become vacant. What we desire is the effectual organization of our forces under the command of a leader determined to lead in reality, and who will have been loyally accepted by all the party. Unity and vigour of action is what we require if we wish to triumph.”

The National then also quoted from the Gazette, of Sorel:—

“As to the Hon. Mr. Geoffrion, we deeply regret his retirement. He was by far the most useful and devoted Minister that our Province possessed. We think that his successor, if such there will be, should not be chosen en petite comité of five or six, but that the members who support the Ministry should be consulted in the matter. A meeting of our representatives should take place in order that this may be done. Nothing is ever gained by forcing a leader upon a party; the merit alone of the man who may be destined to be the leader, forces him upon the party. Away with petty intrigues.”

His hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) had not only forgotten the existence of these two leaders but also another of his leaders—the hon. the Minister of Justice. He (Mr. Caron) was quite surprised that the hon. the Minister of Justice had not entered his protest when his hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue deposed him without the slightest ceremony, and ignored him as completely as though he (Mr. Laflamme) had never been in political life at all. The National of the 13th of November said:

“L'Evenement receives with satisfaction the nomination of Mr. Laflamme, and acknowledges in common with ourselves that the new Minister has only to show his force of will to satisfy the wishes of his party. With our confrères we consider that the Reform party requires leaders who are inclined to remain in political life.”

Several of the other leaders of the Quebec Liberal party had disappeared very suddenly and L'Evenement very prudently considered that, prior to the election of a new leader, it was necessary to select for that position a gentleman who had determined upon remaining for some time, at least, in active political life. The National also said:

“Our wish will be completely satisfied in all points, for Mr. Laflamme is firmly inclined to consecrate his time and his energy towards the reorganization of the party and to the defence of the interests of our Province. The responsibility which he assumes does not in any way frighten him; he wishes to fulfil his duty conscientiously and work in the interest of the country and of his political friends.”

The same paper continued again, quoting L'Evenement:—

“The Conservative press cannot accuse Mr. Laflamme, a Minister, of seeking to accept a position, since he commenced by refusing the highest possible judicial position to which he could aspire, shewing evidently that his ambition was in the political career and not outside of it. This is a great and important qualification for a Minister who leads a party.”

This showed that the hon. the Minister of Justice had been chosen leader of the Liberal party from Quebec, in room of the Hon. Mr. Geoffrion, and the Gazette de Sorel hoped that this hon. gentleman (Mr. Laflamme) would prove by far the most useful and devoted Minister in the Government. This was immediately after the retirement of the Hon. Mr. Geoffrion from the Cabinet, when it was decided, as these newspapers showed, that the hon. the Minister of Justice would succeed that hon. gentleman as a leader of the party. The hon. the Minister of Justice was the new leader; but the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue appeared to be ignorant of the fact that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laflamme) had led and re-organized the Quebec section of the party. These were evidences taken from the organs of the Liberal party, which proved, beyond a doubt, that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue was completely mistaken when he set aside some of the gentlemen to whom he had alluded, such as the Hon. Mr. Fournier, the Hon. Mr. Geoffrion, and the Hon. Mr. Laflamme, past and present leaders of the Liberal party. This section of the party had also had another leader who became the leader of all these leaders of the party, and this was the present Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Manitoba. He was astonished to find that his hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) would not, now that the Hon. Mr. Cauchon was no longer in the Cabinet, give him, at least, the consolation of believing that he (Mr. Cauchon) had for some time been his leader, as leader of the Liberal party of the Province of Quebec. He (Mr. Caron) considered that the hon. gentlemen who represented the Province of Quebec in the Government either had no influence or else did not choose to exercise it on behalf of the Province; and in making this statement he was not expressing his own views, but those which he had heard expressed in the city and in different parts of the Province of Quebec, where it was said that Quebec was sadly neglected by the present Administration. In this opinion he concurred. On a future occasion, he would have the opportunity of showing upon what grounds he formulated his accusation. The interests of the city of Quebec had been sacrificed by the Government. This city had lost the naval school, the military school, and the execution of the Dufferin improvements last year. The hon. the Premier, last Session, had not even known what he (Mr. Caron) meant, when he appealed to the hon. gentleman to learn whether a sum of money was to be granted for the making of those improvements. He was told by the hon. the Premier that he was not understood when he put this question; he thought he had made a very plain enquiry, but the hon. the Premier informed him that he (Mr. Mackenzie) did not even know what he (Mr. Caron) meant. They had lost all these things, but he hoped that now a new Minister had entered the Cabinet, he (Mr. Laurier) would be able to induce the Government to pay some attention to Quebec interests. He (Mr. Caron) was anxious to obtain what he considered to be simply their rights—nothing more. He hoped that the interests of the Province of Quebec would now receive fair play. He regretted being obliged to make these remarks. He thought it was very important that no sectional cries should be raised in the Dominion. He believed that hon. members must forget, when in the House, to a certain extent, that they lived in any particular Province. They had to consider general interests, if Confederation ever meant anything; and if it was to continue to increase and improve, there must be a fair union of all the different Provinces, whereby one would not get more than another, but yet each would receive a fair share in the distribution of the public moneys, and what the Government of the Dominion had to bestow on the different Provinces. He remembered an enterprise which, in Quebec, was looked upon as an enterprise of the greatest possible importance, and he was perfectly certain that the hon. members from that section, with the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, who now represented a division of Quebec city, would agree with him when he said that the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway was looked upon in Quebec city as one of the greatest importance, and as a road which was destined to do more probably for the prosperity of that city than was possible for any other road. It would open up a very rich and vast district, which was able to maintain a population of a million and a half, according to the statement of one of the surveyors. It was perfectly well known that old rails had been distributed among the different railways of the Lower Provinces, and hence the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway Company had appealed to the hon. the Minister of Public Works for a loan of some of these rails, taken from the Intercolonial, for this road. On the 25th of April, 1876, a letter was addressed to the hon. the Premier, by the President of the company in this connection; and on the 28th of April, 1876, another letter was despatched, which they fancied would carry the day, as it was signed by the leading friends of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) in Quebec, including Senator Fabre, Mr. Thibaudeau, and others; and on the 28th of April, a letter was sent in this regard by his hon. friend from Chicoutimi (Mr.

MR. CARON.

Cimon), who had taken a very deep interest in this enterprise. He observed that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue laughed at this; but those who took an interest in this matter could not deny that this road was most important to Quebec. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue would perceive that, if he (Mr. Laurier) laughed at this scheme, he might get into very serious difficulties with the electors of Quebec East; but, no doubt, the hon. gentleman would find some other member kind enough to retire into private life, in order to furnish him with a new constituency, if he was defeated in that division. He advised the hon. gentleman to be more prudent. The letter of his hon. friend for Chicoutimi (Mr. Cimon) and others had been sent on the 28th April, and a petition from the Council of Chicoutimi to the same effect, on the 29th of May, 1876. On the 26th of June, 1876, the Board of Trade of Quebec had also presented a request for a grant of these old rails, considering that this road was not one which was to be laughed at, but one of great importance for Quebec. On the 24th of July, 1876, the hon. the Premier had answered that it was quite impossible to grant the request, as these rails were kept for feeders of the Intercolonial. No doubt this was an objection, but then it was an objection which could have been very easily removed. It would have been very easy for the hon. gentleman, if he had chosen to do so, to have introduced a Bill at the next Session, which would have allowed him to grant these rails to the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway. This was perfectly feasible, considering more especially that, ever since the present Government had been in power, they had done nothing for Quebec, and this request might certainly have been granted. These rails were lying unused at the time, and this would have conferred a great boon and a great advantage upon the city of Quebec. He was sure that, if this had been done, he would have been one of the first to say that Quebec should be grateful for such a favour. Shortly afterwards, another petition, signed by the Archbishop of Quebec, and some of the most influential citizens of the city, had, in this connection, been forwarded to the Government, but this letter had been left unanswered, and they never knew whether or not it had reached its destination, though, at the same moment, as would be seen by reference to the public records, the Government was distributing rails for the laying of some 96 miles of road, to the following different railways in the Lower Provinces:—

| | Miles. |
|-----------------------------|--------|
| Chatham Branch..... | 9 |
| Elgin and Petcodiac..... | 12 |
| Northern..... | 15 |
| St. Martin's and Upham..... | 15 |
| New Brunswick Central..... | 42 |
| Hillsborough Branch..... | 3 |

96

The objection that the Quebec and St. John Railway was not a feeder of the Intercolonial he thought was debatable, though of course it could never be such feeder if it was not built. If the hon. the Premier would only help to build this line, he would convince the hon. gentleman that this road might make a very useful feeder to the Intercolonial Railway. In spite of all their efforts, the application had been unsuccessful; the last petition, which was signed by the Archbishop of Quebec and several leading citizens, had not been even answered, and Quebec was unable to secure the advantages which had been conferred upon other portions of the Dominion. He hoped that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, who would, for some time at least, represent Quebec East, where, for the present, at all events, he had made his political home, would consider the possibility of helping them to build this road. He was confident that, if the hon. gentleman did so, he would increase his popularity, and make himself stronger than he had yet been in his new constituency. Of course his hon. friend should not laugh at the project, else this might have a very different effect. He was glad to hear the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, in his different political contests, state his intention of introducing a Bill covering the ground of the measure which he (Mr. Caron) had proposed last Session and the Session previous in reference to the Insolvency Act, in order to protect the farmers from the evil effects of this law as far as their own debts were concerned. He was sure that, if any such measure was passed, it would be well received by the population of the rural districts, where the Act in question was looked upon as being very unjust in its operations towards the farmer.

Mr. YEO said he was much pleased to see it stated that there had been an increase in the revenue this year, and also to find that the wave of public depression had passed over us. He hoped that such was the case. He regretted exceedingly the approaching withdrawal of Lord and Lady Dufferin from this country, but this was a matter over which the House had no control. He was glad to see the allusion made to the labours of the Fisheries Commission at Halifax, and he hoped the award of five and a-half millions would be paid over to the Dominion Government. He felt that the award was much smaller than it ought to have been—it should in justice have been three or five times that sum; but, nevertheless, they ought to be grateful for every favour received when it could not be made greater. He trusted that the Government, when the money was paid over, would see their way clear to the expending of a large portion of it in improving the harbours on the coast of Prince Edward Island. From the evidence taken on the Fishery Commission, it had been very clearly stated that it was the best fishing place on any part of our coast, or in fact on any part of the coast of America; and, as they were situated so that they were isolated seven months out of the twelve, he thought the Dominion Government ought to take a careful view of their situation and light up the coast. The question of breakwaters to facilitate the fishing interests in the island, for that was one of the biggest interests that they were engaged in at the present time, ought to receive the speedy attention of the Government; it was nothing but their right, and he hoped they would get it. He agreed with the right hon. member for Kingston that they had been badly treated. Whose fault it was he could not say. He crossed the Straits on the usual routes between the two capes about the 1st February, in two hours and a half, and immediately on crossing he ascertained that the boat, the Northern Light, was fast in the ice. He took upon himself to telegraph to their Inspector in Prince Edward Island to change the mail and send it by the cape, as the coast was good, which was done. On his arrival at Ottawa he went to the Post Office Department and consulted the Postmaster General on the subject. He wished the mails to be continued, that was, until the boat had a regular fair crossing. By some mishap or other the mail got back and the Northern Light stuck again. On the previous morning he had received a telegraphic message from a person at the cape, saying that they were without mails since Saturday. He immediately went to the Department and they promised him to telegraph a change of the mail, and not to continue them on that boat until the boat could run in clear water. With respect to this boat, he thought the Government had done everything in their power to obtain the best model they could get and give her as much power as could be contained in a boat of her size. Last winter was a very exceptional winter; they had considerable ice, and the boat was driven through it. Nothing would stand a boat being rushed into the ice with such power as she had got. The expense of keeping that boat up must be something enormous. He would like to see the Northern Light placed in conjunction with the old ice boats, and, when she could run in clear water, then the route could be changed. He wished to call the attention of the House to the terms of Confederation which gave them steam communication, winter and summer. He contended that it was the place of this Government to give them a branch line from some point running from Cape Tormentine, or from Cape Traverse, to some other point, and give them such a route that there need be no change; and this, he thought, would be carrying out the terms of Confederation. If the Government did not do that, he thought that the Province would not be fairly dealt with. Allusion had been made to the Premier's visit to the Lower Provinces last summer. The Premier, of course, was at Prince Edward Island, and they had a meeting of all classes and of all grades of politics, both Opposition and Government; there was no difference at all known there; they were all pleased and happy to meet him, and any leader of the Government or of the Opposition would have been treated precisely in the same way. So far as public works on Prince Edward Island were concerned, they had been very well attended to. The hon. member for Queen's County had told this House that, if there was an opening in Prince Edward Island, six members would be returned to support the Opposition. That was something he could not say anything about. The hon. member perhaps was speaking rather too largely himself. But this he would say, that the hon. member ran last year by a pure accident, and unfortunately got in, with not a very big vote. There was a very small vote polled. The Government party had been assured of success, and a great number never attended the election at all. The other party started out and gave the hon. member a vote; but he could tell that hon. gentleman that, when he went back to Queen's County, he would have the hardest time to get in. If he (Mr. Yeo) were spared until that time, he intended to run himself, and if the hon. member liked to go there again, he would have as hot a time as he ever had. He had always found this Government liberal, and ready to carry out terms in good faith, and therefore he gave them his support.

Mr. CARON.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin) moved the adjournment of the Debate.

MR. MACKENZIE: I certainly calculated last night on getting through with the debate to-day. It has taken a new turn to-day, for some members have taken occasion to air grievances which are generally left until the time when the Estimates are before the House, in moving into Supply, or on some special motion for papers. I think it is undesirable that advantage should be taken of the debate on the Address to air these local grievances, which could as well be ventilated at another time. The attack on the policy of the Government is a somewhat different thing. But I mention it now in order to ask hon. gentlemen not to pursue this course to-morrow; it can serve no purpose, and abundant opportunity will be given, so I wish they would choose for it some other time more appropriate. I wish to say that I am desirous of closing the debate upon the Address to-morrow, and I hope I may look to hon. gentlemen opposite to endeavour to close their remarks to-morrow in order that we may get to the general work of the House. We have now been a week and a day in session, and it is high time the committees were organized and the committee work started. I hope this will meet with general approval, and that we shall endeavour to close to-morrow, even if it should require a late sitting to do so.

House adjourned at

Thirty minutes past
Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 15th Feb., 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

A RETURN.

REMARKS.

MR. PLUMB said that, on the 10th April last he had given notice of a motion for an Order of the House in respect to a return of all iron purchased for or on behalf of the Government for other than railway purposes, and had moved it on the 16th. He received a letter from the Department asking if he wished to extend the enquiry to British Columbia. He replied that he did not. Then he received another letter asking what particular kind of iron he referred to, and replied to that. No return had been brought down in reply to that request, and he would like to enquire whether such a return had been made in conformity with the Order of the House, and whether it would be brought down to the House without further delay.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not propose to attend to any further business until the Address is passed.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

MR. MACDOUGALL (East Elgin), said he would not impose upon the good nature of the House in continuing the debate if it were not that he was fully sensible that other hon. members besides himself were desirous of addressing the House. That being the case, he thought he might venture to make a few remarks on the subjects that had excited discussion during the debate. He was a little surprised at the remarks made by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Gibbs), who paid a high compliment—though probably he did not intend it as a compliment—to his (Mr. Macdougall's) respected and hon. friend the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He said this debate would not have arisen, nor would it have been prolonged to the great extent it had been, were it not that the member for North Norfolk had been selected to move the resolutions now before the House. He (Mr. Macdougall) thought no higher compliment could have been paid to the hon. member for North Norfolk than the assumption, or rather the declaration, by the hon. member for North Ontario, that the hon. member for North Norfolk had been the means of creating such a disturbance and of drawing forth such eloquence, and logic, and knowledge of the political affairs of this country as had been received from the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. He was sure the hon. member for North Norfolk, and also his constituents, would be highly honoured indeed to know that he had been the occasion and cause of the House and the country having been favoured with such eloquent declamation, such wonderful knowledge of political economy and the whole range of political science, from the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), the Finance Minister in embryo, and the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Gibbs). He agreed in the expression of deep regret at the near departure of His Excellency the Governor-General, who has presided with such grave dignity and such great success over the affairs of this country. The beneficial effect of his labours and the discharge of his high duties with such great success would never be forgotten by the grateful people of this country; and he (Mr. Macdougall) only regretted that the circumstances were such as to occasion his withdrawal from Canada. But he had no doubt that the same judgment which characterized the Government which selected His Excellency and placed him in the high position that had been filled by him with such grace would select, as his successor, one who was capable of discharging the grave duties which His Excellency had discharged with such eminent success. He (Mr. Macdougall) was rather amused, on the previous evening, when he heard the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Pope) say he could not support the present Government for the reason that, during the time they had been in office they had not been able to introduce or carry, with the influence they possessed in Parliament, any measure of reform, and that they had not placed on the Statute-book any reform. He would not trouble the House with endeavouring to explain, or rather to contradict, that proposition of the hon. member. He only invited him to look at the Statute-book of the country, and see the Acts that had been passed by this Parliament, under the control and direction of the hon. the Prime Minister, and to say whether, in his judgment, they were not measures which showed that those who devised and introduced them were men of eminent ability, that they had given to the subject the greatest attention; and if the preparation of those measures did not show those men were possessed of the ability which characterized great statesmen. He would not trouble the House to go over with him the number of measures that had been introduced; he would only instance one Act—the Election Act of 1874. That, in itself, had entitled the Government to the respect and appreciation of the people of the country. That measure was passed in the first Session of this Parliament, and along with it was likewise passed an Act for the trial of controverted elections. He would not refer to any other Acts; he simply referred to those two measures as a specimen of the legislation which the Administration of the day had given to this country. And speaking of the Election Law reminded him—and he did not think it out of place to make some allusion to it here—that it had been stated, in the course of this debate, first by the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell), and again by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) that the Reform party had been guilty, to a large extent, of electoral corruption; and the hon. member for North Hastings put himself to considerable trouble for the purpose of proving that such was the case. As an instance, he referred to the election that took place at London in 1874, and he adduced that as evidence to support his declaration. Now, let them enquire what that election was, who were the candidates, and who was the gentleman stated by the hon. member to be the representative of the Reform interest. With whom was he allied before that election? Was he allied with the Reform party, acquainted with the Reform party, with the practice of the Reform party, with the manner in which they conducted their elections? No; he was associated with the Conservative party; he was associated with the party of which the hon. member for North Hastings was one of the most prominent and brilliant leaders. He was associated with that party, and was one of the bosom friends of the gentleman he afterwards opposed, Mr. Carling, who took a very active part in this House, probably not in the debates or active business, yet still was a great aid to the hon. gentleman who led the House in the Conservative interest at that time. The hon. member for North Hastings said that, at that election of 1874, his quondam friend and ally, Colonel Walker, was guilty of the grossest corruption, that he used money for the purpose of corrupting the electors. For this, the hon. member charged the whole Reform party. He would ask him with whom was Colonel Walker connected before the election? He had not acted with the Reform party, but with the Conservative party; he had acted with the party to which the candidate he was opposing belonged. And when, after the election contest, the trial came, when the virtuous mind of the hon. member for North Hastings had been so outraged, and his moral sensitiveness had been stunned to such a degree that he could not contro^l his judgment or his feelings, and he came forward to express his awful horror of the corrupt transactions and the manner in which his feelings and the respectability of the community had been outraged in consequence of that election,—he would ask the hon. member why it was that Mr. Carling did not claim the seat; why did he not ask that he should be seated instead of Colonel Walker? It was because his own case would be enquired into. He knew that both he and the man who opposed him used those arguments which told with such force in the Conservative camp, and that they would compel him in the Courts of justice to declare what had taken place; and then, when they added up the figures, when they had the whole secrets of the prison-house exposed, they would have found that the balance was on the other side instead of against Colonel Walker. But all this ado against the Reform party, because Colonel Walker had seen fit to associate with the Reform party since that time, did not arise, he feared, from a virtuous feeling. He had no doubt but that, much as Colonel Walker was calumniated, much as he was pointed at by hon. members as a most detestable example of everything that was bad and wrong, and much as the Reform party had vicariously to suffer for his sin, if he would again return to his first love and ally himself with the Conservative party, they would not be slow to extend the hand of friendship and cordial welcome to him. He could fancy the large-heartedness of the hon. member for North Hastings going out in gushing tenderness to him, and his face lighting up with smiles as he prepared to welcome him back to the ranks of the Conservative party. They had felt his loss the more because he understood their practices so well; because he was a ready scholar, who had graduated in their own school, and because he had learnt to use the weapons that were forged in their armoury, and had practised all this against them. Hence the virtuous indignation against him; hence the charges made against the Reform party for taking him into their ranks, and the attempt to hold them responsible for what took place at the 1874 election. Now, when the Reform party took credit for having passed the Election Act of 1873, and the Trial of Controverted Elections Act of the same year, the Opposition told them that the right hon. member for Kingston had introduced that measure into Parliament; that he did so after the elections of 1872; that his master-mind and the ability which he possessed in so eminent a degree, and which he (Mr. Macdougall) did not desire to detract from, was devoted to the preparation of a measure of this kind, in order to prevent corrupt practices and punish them with the punishment they so thoroughly deserved. He would admit that the hon. gentleman introduced that measure, and, if he did, there was not the slightest doubt that he understood the measure and its provisions, and how it should be applied in every particular; otherwise, he would not have understood it. He could not for a moment doubt that the hon. gentleman brought to the preparation of that measure his intelligence, his knowledge of law, his accuracy and his profoundness of judgment before submitting it to the House. He assumed that, in every particular, he understood the measure when he introduced it into this House, and was only too ready to do what he possibly could in order that the measure should be carried out faithfully, so that his judgment should be approved by the successful result. Well, it seemed that there was an opportunity of putting his judgment in that respect into force. That opportunity presented itself much sooner than was anticipated or even wished by the hon. members on the other side of the House. When the Act was passed it was not expected that the elections would take place in such a short time. But revelations were made in that House which caused the resignation of the Government of the day, and eventually led to a dissolution of Parliament and an appeal to the country. An election took place in the constituency represented by the right hon. member (Sir John A. Macdonald), and he was returned. But his seat was afterwards contested; it was submitted that the election had not been carried on in accordance with the law of the day; and this gentleman, who understood all about that law, all about the working of the law, was found to have violated his own provisions, having been found guilty of corruption. There was an opportunity for him to show how far he was desirous that the law should be faithfully carried out, and the sequel showed itself in the election trial in the city of Kingston. The hon. member for North Hastings the other night, probably not so much for the purpose of informing the House as for its going abroad to the country, made certain references to decisions of eminent Judges throughout the land, Judges of the Province of Ontario particularly, who had tried certain contested elections; but, as it happened, these quotations and these judgments were all referring to the Reform party, and were quoted for the purpose of showing that the Reformers, whose seats were contested, were guilty of corruption. If the hon. member was to be the historian of this House and the historian of electoral corruption in the country, he should act fairly in the narrative he gave. Why did not he give some selections from the eminent Judge who tried the Kingston election? Probably he forgot it. He was an impartial man, they knew. He desired to do what was right to both sides of the House. They had ample proof of that from time to time. The fair manner in which he had treated the Reform party, the Premier in particular, proved beyond a doubt that the hon. gentleman had acted fairly, and he (Mr. Macdougall) assumed that he forgot to make any quotations from the decisions of the eminent Judge who tried the Kingston election. He had the highest respect for the hon. gentleman, and trusted that his name would go down to posterity—as no doubt it would—as a fair historian. That being so, he hoped the hon. gentleman would permit him to take the liberty of adding some quotations to those given, so that, as a fair historian, the hon. member would be able to give a complete narrative of the election frauds of 1874. They were aware, or rather it was intimated to them by hon. members on the other side of the House, that there were several leaders of the Conservative party, that that party was one of great ability, that it was a moving party, an elevating party, a party of progress, and one leader was not sufficient: that it required several leaders in order to manage that wonderful moving and elevating party, and that the hon. gentleman, the member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) was one of its prominent leaders. Now, there happened to be, in another place, a gentleman who occupied a prominent position in the country, who was an eminent lawyer, and well acquainted with political affairs, and who was a close and intimate friend of the right hon. member for Kingston, as well as one of his closest and strongest allies. That gentleman happened to live in Kingston, and, being well acquainted with that constituency, he happened to take a part in the election of 1874; but, when the trial came, and his evidence was highly necessary, in order to complete the true narrative of the electoral depravity of the country which the hon. member for North Hastings had been pleased to give the House—exceedingly necessary in order to effect that object that he should be present at the trial, it was convenient for him to be absent; he was beyond the jurisdiction of the Canadian Courts, and could not be brought forward to give testimony at that trial, testimony which there was not the slightest doubt would have disqualified the chieftain, the great statesman, the leader of the Conservative party of this country. What did the learned Judge say? He said:—

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. MACDOUGALL.

“It clearly appears that the respondent himself contributed $1,000, and his friends, to his knowledge, a much larger sum, for the purposes of his election; and that a sum probably equal in the whole to $3,000 was raised for that purpose, the larger part of which passed into Mr. Campbell's hands, a warm personal and political friend of the respondent; that no consultations took place between them as to where or in what way the money should be used, or what, if any, precautions were to be taken to prevent illegal or corrupt use of this large sum of money; that Mr. Campbell, as far as we know, gave it to all or any of the committeemen that applied for it who were employed in furthering the respondent's election, without any instructions from him as to how it was to be spent, or warnings against any improper use of it; that a great deal of this money was admittedly spent in corrupt purposes, some in direct bribery and in treating, to the extent of voiding the election, and some of the parties who made this improper use of the money, in giving their evidence, spoke of it in a way which might induce those who heard them to suppose that they rather took pride in having violated the law rather than feeling that they had done acts which were culpable, disreputable as far as they were concerned, and seriously injurious to the candidate to whom they pretended to be friendly. It cannot be denied, judging from the demeanour and manner of giving evidence of some of these witnesses, that Mr. Campbell was guilty of great carelessness, if not reckless indifference to consequences, in placing the unrestricted use of considerable sums of money in such hands as these, and in this respect he certainly failed to serve the true interests of the friend for whom he was acting, and apparently showed an indifference as to whether the law of the land was violated or not, which certainly is not commendable, to say the least of it, in a gentleman in his position.”

Why did not the hon. member for North Hastings, with the characteristic fairness he had always shown to this House, give this instance, so that it might have gone down to posterity, as another instance of electoral corruption in the year of grace 1874? Judges were not in the habit of dealing in irony or sarcasm, but plainly stating what they had to say; and, if he (Mr. Macdougall) did not know that to be the case, that Judges simply said what they meant, he should certainly have thought the Judge was dealing in fine irony, when he told the hon. member:

“The fact that the respondent might have relied on Mr. Campbell, as a lawyer and a good business man, not permitting any expenditure that was improper may, perhaps, be something in his favour. But the result shows, as far as we can see, that Mr. Campbell did not take any steps whatever, to prevent improper expenditure, and it might therefore be inferred from his conduct that he thought it best not to take a different course for fear that it might have prejudiced respondent's chance of success in the contest.”

What he wished to draw attention to particularly was this: the fact that the respondent might have relied upon the Hon. Mr. Campbell as a lawyer and a good business man, not to permit improper expenditures. This might probably be something in the right hon. gentleman's favour. They would notice it was claimed for the right hon. member for Kingston, who introduced this measure, that it was entirely his own. That right hon. member knew all about it. He was the Attorney-General of the day, and the learned judge said he (Sir John A. Macdonald) probably relied upon Mr. Campbell, as a lawyer, to see that things were properly done. The first quotation which he had read pointed out that no instructions whatever were given, and that nothing whatever was said in this regard. He would ask the hon. member for North Hastings whether he (Mr. Bowell) would have done the same under such circumstances; would he not have warned his agents as to what they should do and given them instructions? He had not the slightest doubt that the hon. member would entirely agree with him in regretting that he (Mr. Bowell) had not referred to this decision, and that the hon. member would thank him for having done so in order that the narrative which the hon. member had given to the public might be further supplemented, revised and corrected, by having this desirable addition made to it.

MR. BOWELL: Has the hon. gentleman sufficient honesty to read Mr. Campbell's letter and thus complete the narrative.

MR. MACDOUGALL said he saw no letter in the judgment. He would only ask the hon. member why had not Mr. Campbell appeared at the trial to support the defendant and exculpate the character of the hon. member for Kingston, the chieftain of the great party, from the wonderful charges made against him. He had not the slightest doubt that if it had rested with the pure and impartial mind of the hon. member for North Hastings, who would not allow partizanship to interfere with the proper exercise of his judgment or the discharge of his rightful duties, the Hon. Mr. Campbell would have been present on that occasion. He had only given this as an instance, and he might have spoken of others. He thought that, when the right hon. gentleman who introduced this law, who knew all about it and who was one of the first to put it into operation, acted in the way he did, and so far failed to observe the provisions of the law, this showed the object the right hon. gentleman had in introducing it. In connection with the most notable instance that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bowell) had given them of electoral corruption and impurity of election, the person selected was a gentleman who had been associated with the Conservative party in times past. This was one of the Reformers who had been mentioned as guilty of this horrible corruption. He was happy to say that this gentleman had now got into a clearer and purer atmosphere, and was forgetting the things of the past and looking forward to things more hopeful in the future. Being in good company and good society, he had not the slightest doubt that Colonel Walker would improve and probably reach the elevated place of, if he did not go a little higher than, his hon. friend the member for North Hastings. The hon. member for North Ontario, yesterday, had urged that the Government should appeal to the country. That hon. gentleman was exceedingly desirous that the Government should go to the people. He had heard the hon. gentleman express this desire previously; but the time was not far distant when this longing would be gratified, and when he (Mr. Gibbs) and the other members of the House, who saw fit to seek a renewal of the confidence of the people, would have an opportunity of doing so. He did not think that the Reform party were afraid of that emergency, or that they dreaded the consequences. They had had the pleasure throughout the Province of Ontario—he could only speak for his own Province in this relation—of hearing the leaders of both sides of the House appeal to the great electorate of the people. The Conservative leaders had addressed immense demonstrations throughout the country, and the leaders of the Reform party had done the same. The former had first gone through the country iterating and reiterating their charges against the present Administration, and then the latter had appeared before the people. Both sides of the picture had been presented to the electors and members of both parties had had the opportunity of judging of the capacity, ability and worth of both sides of the House. Before the leader of the Administration had gone through the Province of Ontario, some of them were charged with incapacity. The people had not had the pleasure of seeing some of these hon. gentlemen, who had been so accused, and probably some impression had been made on the minds of the people, by constantly reiterated charges of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, and perhaps an impression had been produced in some quarters that these hon. gentlemen were not capable of occupying the prominent positions they held. Notably among these hon. gentlemen—he asked the pardon of the hon. gentleman for this reference—was the hon. the Minister of Finance. Every possible charge had been brought against that hon. gentleman. He (Mr. Cartwright) was accused of incapacity, of mismanagement of the affairs of the country, and with having improperly dealt, owing to incapacity, with the finances of the country. But the hon. gentleman had since visited parts of Ontario where he had never been seen before; and he thought it must be gratifying to him (Mr. Cartwright), as well as to the hon. gentleman's supporters, to know that, where he had been heard, the members of both parties united in declaring that these charges were without any foundation. The hon. gentleman, moreover, held a place in the esteem and respect of all classes of the people, and of all sections of the community which any man, no matter how high his position, might well feel proud of at the present time. He considered that the hon. the Premier of the Dominion had no reason to fear the result in his own Province. The hon. gentleman knew how he had been received by the immense body of the people of the Province of Ontario; he (Mr. Mackenzie) knew the people of his own Province; he knew that the people were moral and intelligent, and that they could appreciate morality, virtue and intelligence. And the hon. gentleman also knew that in that appreciation, in that gauge or measurement of capacity, he (Mr. Mackenzie) had no reason to dread what the consequences might be. To tell them that a reaction was in progress in the Province of Ontario, and that the Conservatives would carry Ontario, was to tell him something which it was impossible for him to believe and impossible for any old Reformer to believe. The Conservatives had never, in his recollection, carried a majority of the constituencies in Ontario except in the year 1867, and they knew what means were resorted to in order to obtain it; and they also knew that the majority of the Liberal party in Ontario had not been decreased. The hon. member for North Ontario desired the Government to appeal to the country. When the proper time came, the Government of the day would do so. The record and the legislation of the present Administration was well known, and also what the Opposition had done in times past; and the sins and political transgressions of the Opposition would not be forgotten. He assured the House that these political sins of the Opposition would ever be kept prominently before their eyes, in order that they might think of them and ponder over them, and that their repentance might be more intense and more sincere the more frequently references were made to them. A great contrast existed between the two parties, between the hon. gentlemen who occupied seats on the Treasury benches now, and those who occupied them in times past and who sought to occupy them again, and it was to be hoped, in the interests of the country, and of morality, of intelligence, and of general progress, that it might be far, far in the distance, before the hon. gentlemen would have the opportunity of again occupying the positions by which they had degraded the character and the fair fame of the people of this country.

MR. MACDOUGALL.

MR. WADE said he would have remained silent, but in consequence of the wide range which the debate had taken, he felt that he would ill discharge his duty if he did not make some reference to matters which had been brought forward in the course of the discussion. He also felt that he would ill discharge the duty he owed to the county of Digby, which he had the honour to represent, if he did not, at the earliest moment, and at the earliest opportunity which presented itself, reply to the statements made by the hon. the Minister of Militia, who had incorrectly represented to the House the manner in which he had been recently returned to the House. If that hon. gentleman had known the facts of the case, and if he had not been misinformed in this connection, he (Mr. Jones) would not have made the statements to the House that he had. He believed that the hon. gentleman had been misled by the man whom he (Mr. Wade) had defeated. On this hypothesis alone could he account for the way in which the hon. gentleman had addressed the House with reference to the manner in which the recent contest had been carried on in the county of Digby. What were the facts of the case? The late Minister of Militia had gone down to the county of Digby, which had given him (Mr. Vail) its support for eleven years, to see how matters stood in that county. That gentleman knew he had to return to the people for election or rejection, and that he was disqualified, owing to his violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. Some few months before the election took place, he (Mr. Vail) had come down to and gone around the county to discover whether his election was at all certain, for he thought he was warranted in saying that the object was to know whether his seat was safe, for this gentleman dared not meet again the House of Commons until he had purged himself of the disqualification under which he lay. An attempt had been made to surprise the constituency, and the first thing he (Mr. Wade) knew of the new election that was ordered was when he saw the notice, in this relation, posted up at the office of the Sheriff of the county, which office adjoined his own. The county was taken by surprise, and the election, he might say, was ordered without a moment's warning. What had he done? In that county, like in all others, little difficulties existed, but no sooner were these adjusted—and this was quickly accomplished—than he was unanimously chosen by his party to oppose the late member. He laboured under a great disadvantage in the contest, as the late member had already visited the different portions of the constituency, but these difficulties he had successfully surmounted. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) was mistaken in saying that he (Mr. Wade) had been returned on the strength of issues outside of and beyond the real questions of the day which were before the people. The issue lay directly between the Government and the Opposition of the day; and on these grounds he had won the seat. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) was aware of the position he had taken regarding the railways of the country in the past. He had then acted with due regard for the common interests of the country, and after seventeen days' debate he had announced to the Legislature the position which he took. He assumed the responsibility of the vote he had decided on giving, and on that vote the Government of the day was sustained, and the Opposition prevented coming into office. He then supported the late Joseph Howe, and the leader of the Opposition was the late Judge Johnston. What was his next step? For this he would refer to the hon. member (Mr. Jones). Some years subsequently, he (Mr. Wade) was called upon to enter on a great struggle, which involved no mean issue. It was a question of equal importance to that which concerned the railways of the country; and indeed it far transcended that issue, as it involved the equal, civil and religious rights of the community. What had he then done? Feeling that the party with which he was connected at the time was doing what was wrong with regard to a great public question, he had severed from it, left his hon. friend the late Mr. Howe, and crossed the floor of the House, joining the Opposition. The next great question related to Confederation, which was unpopular with the people of Nova Scotia as had been the railway policy to which he had alluded, at the time when he had taken up his position on it. When this issue came before the House, he occupied the honourable position which Mr. Speaker filled with credit to himself in this house; but he had not taken advantage of his office, as he might have done when that great public question came before the country, and kept silence on the subject. He came down on the floor, while the House was in Committee, and announced his opinion on this great public question of the day, although the feeling of the people in his county was against the position he had assumed on it. He had then taken upon himself the responsibility which he had a right to do, and ought to have done, and thereupon the news went forth upon wings of the press among the people. He was, in consequence, hounded down, and by none more so than by the late member. The opponents of Confederation then said that, if the Province entered the Confederation, the Canadians would gobble it up and ruin it. A portion of the population of the county was imposed upon by misrepresentation, as was the case in all counties, more or less; and to them it was announced that, with Confederation, the very potatoes in the field would be taxed. His electors had been indignant on account of the position he had assumed on this question, but he fully believed that he was right in the stand he had taken. He had acted conscientiously in this matter, and he had looked to the future of this country. He had not been recreant to his duty for the sake of retaining his seat, and he had kept his public record constantly in view. When he came down to the people, however, they did what was their right and privilege, and elected another man in his stead; and this was the late Minister of Militia. This was just the cry that the late member wanted, and on the anti-Confederation cry he carried the constituency. But at the late election they had again met side by side on the hustings, and there he heard the observations made by the late Minister to the electors on the occasion of his re-seeking their suffrages; and he could not refrain from saying that the explanations in question were very meagre. They were not what he conceived a Minister of the Crown should have given under such circumstances. Mr. Vail had endeavoured to show that he had not been in fault with regard to the printing contract in question; and he had sought to prove that, though disqualified in consequence, and compelled to resign his seat, he had done nothing wrong intentionally, but had merely been the victim of misfortune. Mr. Vail had also attempted to justify the policy of the Administration; and he had then observed to his opponent that no side issues were now in question, and that they were there on a public platform engaged in a fair contest. Mr. Vail was not then there in the guise of an anti-confederate. Those issues were settled, and they both were there to measure swords with regard to the policy of the Government of the day. This was the main issue which was presented in this contest. He trusted that, in his reply to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones), he had clearly placed his position before the House. The hon. gentleman said he had in his pocket letters which stated that side issues had decided this contest in the county of Digby and that they were the cause of his election. He would ask that hon. gentleman to rise in his place and give him the names of those parties; and, if he found that these letters were genuine, he would invite the hon. gentleman to go down to his (Mr. Jones') native county—Digby was not his (Mr. Wade's) native county—and contest the seat with him. If his offer was accepted, he was quite satisfied that the electors of the county of Digby would ask the hon. gentleman to remain at home. Straws showed how the wind blew, and it might be that owing to the result of the present contest in that county, the hon. gentleman would fear somewhat to meet the people. He felt that he had no sins of omission or commission here, because this was his first Session; therefore, in the remarks he had to make, he would lay down the platform on which he intended to act for the future; and however that platform might affect him, he felt that a public duty rested upon him, and, as he had done in the past, he would never flinch from it in the future, for the man ill-represented a constituency who upon a great public question would sacrifice his public duty to private interests. It was the duty of the Government, instead of coming here on the eve of an election as they had done, to come forward with some measures in regard to the future. Did they intend simply to rest upon their seats? The country generally knew how the Government of the day clung to power; but he said their duty was to arise before this House and give communication of their future policy, in order that the country might decide upon it. But he would not wait for that; he would give his own people the platform on which he would act, and it was—Protection to Canadian Industries, Inter-Provincial Trade and Reciprocity. These were the principles that he would go down to his people with; and, if it was their wish to return him again to this House, it would be upon these grounds. When he had the honour of a seat in the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia, the party with whom he acted were bound to decide in favour of Confederation; and every man that went back was stricken down, except his hon. friend from Cumberland. He was left alone; but that noble county, the county of Cumberland, said to its member: "Go up there; hold the fort and your country will send you troops; it will send men to help you; hold the fort." He did go; and when the Province of Nova Scotia got a chance to speak out, what did it say? It spoke from away north; the hon. member for that county was the first man that came back here and carried out the views of the people. Last of all came the War Minister of that Administration; and the people of Digby had arisen in their might, and had sent another to reinforce the hon. member for Cumberland.

MR. WADE.

Mr. FRÉCHETTE said it was not his intention to occupy the attention of the House at this late stage of the discussion, by going through the long speech delivered by the gentleman who had just spoken about his political career, which he thought so creditable to himself, and which was certainly more interesting to him than to the country at large; but still he could not allow that gentleman's utterances about the late election at Digby to pass unanswered. He was present at that contest himself, and he knew the means that had been resorted to, to defeat Mr. Vail, the late Minister of Militia. He thought that, if there was an election victory that a party ought not to be proud of, it was that one. If the hon. member for Digby thought it was very creditable to himself to have defeated Mr. Vail in the late contest, he was the only man of that opinion who knew something about what had been going on in that county at the last election. As an instance of what he had been saying, he would quote a few lines about a certain individual who appeared to be just now the standard-bearer of Conservatism in the Province of Quebec,—he referred to Mr. Thibault. Mr. Thibault was a notorious character; he was noted all over the Province of Quebec as a most despicable individual, who had not his equal on this continent for rascality.

Mr. MASSON: You will have a chance of saying that before him.

Mr. FRÉCHETTE said he was not afraid to say that before him, since he said it before the House.

An HON. MEMBER: The hon. gentleman did not dare meet Mr. Thibault.

Mr. FRÉCHETTE said he would not so insult the hon. gentleman as to compare him to Mr. Thibault; but he seemed to be one of his followers, for Mr. Thibault seemed to be one of the most important leaders of the Conservative party for some time, and the party were responsible for his utterances. An article published in the Morning Chronicle of Halifax, of the 22nd of January last, said:

"Thibault, Dr. Tupper's worthy coadjutor in the Digby contest, to whose good offices the Opposition are so largely indebted for their victory—a man who was driven out of Quebec East for his insulting reference to a lady, and who is one of the worst characters in the Tory ranks—said, in his addresses to the French electors, that he was sent down from Montreal by the Bishops of that place; that he had received a telegram from the Pope himself ordering him to proceed to Digby and evangelize the French people of that county. He read a telegram that was bogus, of course, and said that he had in his pocket a rosary (beads) that had been sent to him by the Pope, as a reward for his numerous services in similar circumstances. 'I am no stranger among you,' he said; 'my grandmother was born down here. When only five years of age, I was stolen by the Indians, and now I come back, and old Acadia, my mother, has recognized me. Here is Mr. Fr chet, who is going to speak in Mr. Vail's favour; but you must not believe him, gentlemen, for he has been excommunicated by all the Bishops of his Province, and by the Pope himself. He is a jail-bird and he has been sentenced to twelve years of penitentiary for stealing money, but the Ottawa Government keeps him out to work for the thief Vail, and people of his stamp. Yes, yes, gentlemen, Mr. Vail is a thief who stole $26,000 of your own money out of the public funds. He is supported only by Protestants and Orangemen.'"

MR. WADE.

Now, Mr. Thibault was the leader of that famous Conservative party who never allowed any of their members to use religion as a political tool, to serve party purposes. It might be tedious to the House to quote—

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Go on, go on.

Mr. MASSON: That should have secured Mr. Vail's election.

Mr. FR CHETTE said that was a very poor compliment to pay the electors of Digby.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Who made that report?

Mr. FR CHETTE: I am not the editor of that paper, sir.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: The rumour is that the hon. gentleman wrote that report.

Mr. FR CHETTE: Am I to understand that the hon. gentleman pretends that I wrote that report?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: I say the rumour is, in Halifax, that you wrote that report.

Mr. FR CHETTE said that rumour was founded on a lie. He neither wrote the report nor inspired it. If the right hon. gentleman wanted another proof of what had been said by Thibault in the county of Digby, he would read another letter, which was published on the 30th of January, in the same paper, coming from a resident in that constituency. Besides that, he could confirm, from the first word to the last, all that this paper said about it, for he was present himself. He dared say that this report was a very mild one indeed, compared with what was said by that man. Here was a letter signed "A Resident," coming from Digby:—

"He (Thibault) told the people that the Honourable Mr. Vail, not satisfied with his $8,000 salary, as Minister and representative, had taken $20,000 from the Treasury for postage; that he had voted to deprive the Catholics of their portion of the school funds, that the leading members of the Government were Freemasons and Orangemen, and were the enemies of the Catholics and the Catholic religion."

Such were the means that were resorted to in order to defeat Mr. Vail in the county of Digby; and now the Tories would boast about having won a great victory. He thought a victory of that kind was more dishonouring to the party and to the individual than the greatest defeat they could meet. He listened on the previous evening with the closest attention to the elaborate and rather long speech delivered by his hon. friend from the county of Quebec (Mr. Caron) which was delivered very fluently, and in a manner most creditable to his ability; but, after the speech he had heard a few days previous from the great pontiff of political Catholicism in the Province of Quebec,—he meant the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin)—and the still more unexpected declarations made by another high priest of the same persuasion, namely, the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), he had reason to believe that that most tedious and fatiguing discussion was over; but since the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Caron) had thought proper to bring this delicate question once more before the House, he thought it his duty not to leave his utterances unanswered. He did not, of course, think proper to answer the speeches made by the hon. member for Charlevoix and Hochelaga, for he thought that such an olla podrida, as they said in the Spanish language, brought its own refutation in itself. But this was going rather too far, and the House must put an end to such discussions. When the Conservatives of the Province of Quebec came before the House and stated boldly that they never used religion as a political tool for party purposes, they said what was untrue, and they knew it. Such conduct was nothing else but a repudiation of their principles, of the principles that they had advocated for the last five and twenty years. For twenty-five years the Liberals of the Province of Quebec had made vain endeavours to drag the Conservatives on to political ground, and they never could succeed. For twenty-five years they had had to answer, both on the hustings and in the press, accusations and charges, not against their political creeds, but against their religious persuasions and convictions and nothing else; and these gentlemen were always hidden behind the altar and the priest, and they now came before the House, and, in order, he supposed, to calm the alarms that might have been created in the minds of the Protestants of this country by their fanaticism, they said they never used religion as a political tool.

MR. CIMON: Does the hon. gentleman say that he himself never used religion for political purposes?

MR. FRÉCHETTE said he never did. The matter was so important, and the crisis was so great in the Province of Quebec with regard to that use of religion, that the Sacred Congregation of Rome had sent a most eminent delegate to this country to ascertain whether the Liberals of the Province of Quebec were to be condemned by the Church or not. They had not forgotten,—nobody in that Province had forgotten—how the mandements of the Bishops had been so strangely and so falsely interpreted both in the pulpit and on the hustings. There was not a man in the parish of Baie St. Paul, for instance, one of the parishes in the constituency of the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin), but would remember the famous scapular that was exhibited in the presence of a whole crowd at the church door, during the election of the hon. member—

MR. MASSON: The hon. gentleman should explain what is a scapular.

MR. FRÉCHETTE: By Mr. Tarte, who was a member of the Local Legislature of Quebec, and the editor-in-chief of the authorized organ in Quebec of the hon. member. Surely there was not one man in the county of Charlevoix but would remember that the hon. member for Charlevoix himself made about the same use of the Cross of St. Gregoire le Grand, which he exhibited before the people so many times, and boasted of having rendered so many great services to the Church, not telling, perhaps, how much he had paid for it.

MR. FRÉCHETTE.

MR. MASSON: The Pope had been paid to give the cross to Mr. Langevin, I suppose?

MR. FRÉCHETTE said Mr. Langevin had not received that cross from the Pope himself. Surely that gentleman would never deny the use he made of the letter that was written to him by his brother, the Right Reverend the Bishop of Rimouski, in which his opponent, Mr. Tremblay, was treated as a most dangerous man, socially and religiously.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Shame, shame.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I hope the hon. gentleman will be allowed to speak.

MR. BLANCHET: Let him go on. It is the best punishment he can have in this House.

MR. FRÉCHETTE said he would say more in the presence of that gentleman who the other day said he never uttered a word of religion; and he would remind him of the fact that in 1863, in his (Mr. Fréchet's) presence, in the parish of St. Bernard, in the county of Dorchester, the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) charged the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Taschereau) with the great crime of not going to confession often enough. He (Mr. Fréchet) heard that with his own ears; and yet that hon. gentleman would come here and say he never heard the word religion made use of in politics. He said shame on him, and on that famous circular that was quoted the other day, by the gentleman he had just referred to—the famous circular that was spread by thousands over the county of Charlevoix, in which the Judges of the Supreme Court were so roughly handled. The House had heard the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) rising from his seat and saying that that circular had been printed in a Liberal establishment. Perhaps the hon. gentleman said that as a joke, and he would give him the benefit of the doubt. But, if he said that as truth, and if the hon. gentleman would stand up and repeat it seriously, he could but tell him that he was worthy of having on his forehead the stigma—he would not say the word, because it would be unparliamentary, but it was true. He would not go on quoting all the papers in which the Liberal party had been represented as being opposed to the Church and opposed to all good religious principles. It would be a bad compliment to pay to this House to suppose that they were not aware of this fact, that for the last twenty-five years at least it had been the tactics of the Conservative press of the Province of Quebec to represent their opponents as men utterly unworthy of public confidence, as far as their religious principles were concerned. If he were to quote only the articles of the Nouveau Monde, which was edited by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), in which the Liberals of the Province of Quebec were represented as communists, as heretics, and as men of the worst character, he would have to quote a whole fyle. An hon. member had said in his speech the other day, that the Liberals had gone from presbytery to presbytery, from Bishop's palace to Bishop's palace, begging for the support of the clergy. That was utterly false.

MR. SPEAKER said the hon. member could not apply such language to the House, for it was quite unparliamentary.

MR. FRÉCHETTE said that, if the word "false" was unparliamentary, he would substitute the phrase "utterly incorrect," and he denied the statement most emphatically. They had done their best by using all honest and legitimate means to destroy the prejudices that had been created in the minds of a certain portion of the clergy by unscrupulous opponents; and to demonstrate to that portion of the clergy that the Liberals were no more the enemies of Christ and religion than were the Opposition; but they never went round to presbyteries in order to obtain some clerical influence in their favour at the election. But he knew that a certain gentleman belonging to the city of Montreal, an editor and representative of the county of Hochelaga, went round from committee-room to committee-room, begging the support of the Liberals, in order to secure his election by acclamation, and he succeeded. That hon. gentleman deceived the Liberals so much as to induce them to allow him to be returned by acclamation, and now, he never missed an opportunity of slandering those to whose influence he owed the seat he now occupied.

MR. SPEAKER: The word "slandering" is unparliamentary.

MR. FRÉCHETTE said the hon. gentleman quoted the other day a letter from Mr. Mercier in order to establish that the Liberals who belonged to the Province of Quebec were just as strong Catholics as the Conservatives, and consequently just as dangerous as the Conservatives to the Protestants. What could they think of a man who occupied his life in abusing his fellow-countrymen in regard to religious questions, and who afterwards came to the House and denied the fact. What could they think of a man who, as a journalist, would take every opportunity of representing his countrymen as men of no character or standing, and very dangerous men socially and religiously; and then, when he took his seat in the House, stated that those men were just as good as the Conservatives in their religious convictions. What could they think of a man who declared to the Catholics of the Province of Quebec that the Liberals were the enemies of their creed, and that they sided with the Protestants, and yet declared in the House that the Liberals were as strong Catholics as the Conservatives, and, therefore, as dangerous. Surely, if there existed what was termed by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) a party of organized hypocrisy, it was not on that side of the House, for such a conduct of the Conservative leaders was double hypocrisy. He defied the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) to publish in extenso in the Nouveau Monde, which was the organ of a certain religious faction in Montreal, the speech he made in the House the other day. He defied him to publish the speech delivered by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) in which he declared that the doctrines of the Bishop had had nothing to do with the late contest in Drummond and Arthabaska. It was perhaps in anticipation of those speeches that the right hon. member for Kingston suggested at the opening of the Session that the speeches should not be reported in full, and he was perhaps wise in that regard.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No.

MR. FRÉCHETTE said he felt grateful to the hon. gentlemen opposite for the good character given by them to the Quebec Liberals. For a long time they had been endeavouring to impress on the minds of the people of the Province that the Liberals were no more the enemies of the Church than the Conservatives of the same Province; and for a long time they had endeavoured to remove from the minds of the people the prejudices that had been created by the utterances of the Conservative press in respect to that matter. Since they acknowledged the fact, he was glad that the matter was now at rest. With respect to the remarks made by the hon. member for Quebec County (Mr. Caron) regarding the Liberal leaders, it was strange to say that that hon. member did not find fault because they had no leaders but because they had too many. While he might tell that hon. gentleman that that was not his business, but that of the Quebec Liberals, he would say that in their camp they chose for leaders men of great ability and unspotted character, and if they had many of them it was so much the better for the Liberal party and for the country. If the hon. gentleman was unable to make the same statement with regard to his own party, he (Mr. Fréchet) tendered him his sincere sympathies, but that was not his fault. He would allude to the remarks of the hon. member for Charlevoix in respect to Protection. That hon. member, who once was the leader of the Conservative party in Quebec, had stated that the Conservative party always stood by their flag and never changed their principles; and alluded to Sir George Cartier, his predecessor in the leadership of the Tory party of the Province, as a great Protectionist. He would quote some remarks from a speech delivered by Sir George Cartier in the presence of the hon. member for Charlevoix, on the 23rd December, 1869, at a banquet given to him by the English merchants of Quebec. Sir George Cartier said:

MR. FRÉCHETTE,

"Manufacturers frequently ask for Protection. It is absurd, as is also the notion of extreme Free-trade. As to it, you must pay the amount of your duty to the Government by direct taxation. With extreme Protection you destroy your foreign trade, as the Americans have done, and this again leads to direct taxation. We are not going to commit such a folly. We have adopted the proper policy of imposing merely an income duty, not a protective one."

On the same occasion the hon. member for Charlevoix said:—

"He agreed entirely with what Sir George had stated, and as far as he was concerned would endeavour to carry out his leader's policy."

Nevertheless, that hon. member would no doubt rise in his seat from time to time during the Session, and declare that the Conservative party had always held the same principles and views respecting the tariff question. That quotation was sufficient to show that the hon. member was far from accurate when he made that statement. He wished to say in conclusion that in his reference to the cross exhibited by the hon. member for Charlevoix during his election, he did not mean to say that he had paid any money to the Pope for it, as was so uncharitably insinuated by the hon. member for Terrebonne, but he alluded to what it had cost in solicitation and influence displayed.

MR. MASSON said he did not insinuate anything. The hon. member had used the words "paid for it."

MR. LAURIER said that, when a hon. member rose and wished to explain what he meant by using certain words, his motives should not be impugned.

MR. MASSON said he had not impugned anybody, but had stated a fact.

MR. BLANCHET said that, after the painful exhibition which the House had witnessed, it was almost unnecessary to say a word. After such a spectacle as the House had seen, when the friends of the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Fréchette) were bowing their heads with shame, he thought the best punishment would be to allow the hon. member to proceed without answer, because, if he was amenable to right sentiments, it would be the greatest punishment he had ever received in his life. The hon. gentleman had uttered expressions which were unworthy of the British or Canadian Parliament, and more suitable to a Jacobin club. Never in any British Parliament or in this country were expressions uttered so insulting to the head of the Church as those uttered by the hon. member for Lévis. That hon. gentleman would not receive the congratulations of his friends for his speech, and the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue would soon find out that he had caught a Tartar. Some few years ago, in 1873 he thought, the hon. member for Lévis, in addressing a meeting in St. Roch, Quebec, used, respecting the late Sir George Cartier, that illustrious Canadian, true patriot and father of his Province, who had died some few months before, the expression of charoigne.

MR. FRÉCHETTE: I deny that most emphatically.

MR. BLANCHET: You cannot deny it.

MR. FRÉCHETTE: I do deny it.

MR. BLANCHET said it need not, therefore, be surprising that the hon. gentleman was now able to use such expressions as he had applied toward the head of the Catholic Church. The aspirations of that hon. member were very great. He was born in the Province of Quebec and in the county of Lévis, and his countrymen of that locality were not very much honoured by the position he had taken to-day. After practising his profession for a few years he proceeded to Chicago, and returned one day as a carpet-bagger—he used the term in a parliamentary sense—and presented himself to the county of Lévis, for parliamentary honours. The first document that hon. gentleman took from his pocket was a certificate from a Roman Catholic priest of Chicago, named Côté, who was a respectable priest, stating that the present hon. member for Lévis was a good Catholic, and attended the sacraments of the Church. That was very good, and he did not blame the hon. gentleman for it; but it showed that, when he found it necessary to obtain the influence of the Roman Catholic clergy, he sought it. The hon. gentleman came back from Chicago with the reputation of being a great poet and orator. The House would be able to judge whether he had shown himself a great orator to-day. The hon. the Minister of Justice had quoted a fable from Le Fontaine. There was another fable in his writings, describing, in his excellent language, how a stick floating on the waves resembled at a distance a vessel, but on approaching the shore it was found to be only a floating stick. The hon. gentleman much resembled that stick. He was a bag of wind.

MR. SPEAKER: Order.

MR. BLANCHET said he used the phrase in the parliamentary sense of the word. "At a distance, it is something, but near at hand it is nothing." The hon. gentleman was not over-disciplined by his party. Last year, when Mr. Pelletier was chosen a Minister, rumour said that the hon. member for Lévis telegraphed to the hon. the Premier at Ottawa, stating that he would not accept Mr. Pelletier. He did not know whether such was true or not, but it was so stated. When the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue accepted a portfolio, the hon. member for Lévis accepted him, saying: "Let him pass—my turn will come." But he was convinced that, if that hon. member did not show more respect, decency, ability and sense of honour, he would never have a portfolio in any Cabinet, and he was satisfied the electors would send him to the right about.

MR. FRÉCHETTE: What about the county of Bellechasse?

MR. BLANCHET said he would refer to his county. He was elected in 1875, after the appointment of Mr.

Justice Fournier to the Supreme Court, and of all the candidates who presented themselves not one dared pledge himself a supporter of the present Government. Even a young lawyer of Quebec—Mr. Larue—president of the Institut Canadien, who invited the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to deliver his celebrated address at Quebec, where he was recognized as the leader of the Liberal party of Quebec, presented himself as an independent candidate. He did not dare to endorse the measures and policy of the Government. He had told his friends not to appear in the county, or say a word in his favour, because it might compromise him and prove injurious to him. It was only on the Sunday, two days before the election, they appeared, seeing there was no danger, and endeavoured to rally in favour of their friend the little popularity left to the Government. But not one of the many candidates in the county dared to support the policy of the Government. The hon. member for Lévis had thought fit to read extracts from the newspapers of Nova Scotia relating to Mr. Thibault. He (Mr. Blanchet) had not the honour to know Mr. Thibault. He had, however, read some songs written by the hon. member for Lévis against that gentleman.

MR. FRÉCHETTE: That is another statement I deny.

MR. BLANCHET said the hon. member was known to make a little poetry, and it was naturally said that those songs were made by him. However, he accepted the denial. While he did not know Mr. Thibault, he was satisfied the hon. member for Lévis would not dare to utter in Mr. Thibault's face the expressions he had uttered to-day. He did not dare in the last election to meet Mr. Thibault in Digby, and the hon. member for Lévis came back from that county,

"Honteux comme un renard qu'une poule aurait pris;

Serrant la queue, et portant bas l'oreille."

Mr. Thibault had been made a great man by hon. gentlemen opposite, and would very probably be in the House next Parliament to meet the hon. member for Lévis if he had the honour of a seat in the House. Mr. Thibault had denied altogether the speech which was put in his mouth by the Halifax Morning Chronicle. The respect enjoyed by Mr. Thibault in Montreal was shown by the fact that he was a member of the Montreal City Council and a lawyer of standing in that city. He read a certificate signed by members of the bar of Montreal, amongst them Messrs. Kerr and Laflamme, stating that Mr. Thibault was a lawyer of good standing, who could represent the Crown in criminal cases. The hon. gentleman had referred to the charge against him of trying to use the influence of the clergy. Now he (Mr. Blanchet) had been informed that in 1875 the hon. member went down to Chicoutimi, where there was an election going on for the Local Legislature, between Mr. Price and Mr. Guay, and that in an address to the French electors the hon. member said that it would be a shame for the Catholics to vote for a Protestant like Mr. Price.

MR. BLANCHET.

MR. FRÉCHETTE: That I deny; there is nothing in it.

MR. CIMON said he heard the hon. member for Lévis, in the county of Chicoutimi, make that statement during the local election of 1875, to the people there. The candidates were Mr. Price and Mr. Guay, the former being a Protestant and the latter a Catholic. The hon. member for Lévis went down to the county accompanied by Mr. Tremblay, the late member for Charlevoix. At the meetings in the county Mr. Tremblay repeated the statement made by the hon. member for Lévis—that it was a shame for a French Canadian Catholic constituency to elect a Protestant to the Local Legislature. Mr. Price was, however, returned by 500 majority, though there were not more than 15 Protestant votes in the whole county.

MR. FRÉCHETTE: The hon. gentleman, who has just taken his seat (Mr. Cimon) must have been greatly mistaken. I never in my life uttered such a word. I tell him he must have been mistaken, or else he does something worse than committing a mistake.

MR. BLANCHET said the hon. member for Lévis had, in the course of his remarks, paid a poor compliment to the Province of Quebec in stating that there were no leaders in the Liberal party. The same remark had been made by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue a few days ago. He stated, moreover, that they recognized no leader of the Quebec Liberals, except the hon. the Premier, who was worthy of the position of leading that party in the whole Dominion. The hon. member for Lévis had stated that the Liberals chose, as their leaders, men of the highest talent and eminence. He (Mr. Blanchet) admitted that Sir A. A. Dorion, now Chief Justice of Quebec, was a man of high standing, great ability and great personal worth. If no leaders had been chosen since that time, was it because no hon. member was considered qualified to occupy the position? If that were so, and he (Mr. Blanchet) did not hold that view, it was certainly not a high compliment to the hon. the Minister of Justice and the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. He thought he had said enough with respect to the hon. member for Lévis, whom he would now leave with Mr. Thibault, and perhaps that gentleman, whom the hon. member seemed to despise, would meet him, if not in his own county, at some other place, and when they were face to face Mr. Thibault would prove a match for the hon. member. With respect to the Address itself, it mentioned many matters which the House took for granted; but he could not concur in the paragraph which announced that the crisis under which the country had been suffering, and was still suffering, was passing away. For his part he protested against that part of the Address. It was not because the revenue of our ports had increased that the people saw that there was a change and improvement in the affairs of the country; and, if they visited any city in the Dominion—he did not speak, of course, of the rural population, which had been blessed this year with an abundant harvest, for which they thanked Providence, though the unfortunate farmers had no market for the advantageous sale of their produce—if they went to any of our cities they would see that the commercial depression had not passed away. A glance at Ottawa would reveal the same state of affairs which prevailed all over the Dominion; and he observed by the newspapers that the Government were paying the travelling expenses of labourers from Ottawa to Montreal to afford them the advantage of working on the Lachine Canal. The hon. member for Lévis might look to his own county and he would see at Quebec the manufacturers struggling and doing their best to tide over the depression, but, unfortunately, as had been stated by several hon. members, in spite of their efforts and their expressions of satisfaction with the present Government, they had been obliged to liquidate their estates and come to terms with their creditors. The hon. the seconder of the Address had mentioned the United States as an example of the injurious effects of a protective policy. The hon. gentleman, he supposed, had not seen resolutions adopted some days ago at Pittsburg, where thousands of people from the Western States had assembled to protest against the tariff as proposed to be passed in the American Congress, though it was far from being a Free-trade tariff. Those men belonged to the Western States, where there was the most moderate number of Protectionists, and yet they had passed resolutions in favour of Protection and, entering a protest against the tariff, had sent it to Congress declaring Protection to be a necessity. The same course must be followed by Canada, which should no longer follow an abstract theory. Protection and Free-trade were in themselves abstract propositions, and in practice it was impossible to apply to any country the absolute principle of Free-trade or Protection. If they endeavoured to give every country Free-trade it would be equivalent to dressing every man and woman in a dress of the same size, which was impossible. There must be commercial tariffs and laws framed according to the conditions of the country to which they were to be applied. What was good for one country was injurious to another. Free-trade was a very good policy for England, but bad for Canada; indeed, it was impossible for a new country to adopt a principle of Free-trade; and, though the hon. the First Minister had stated at Montreal and Hamilton that he was in favour of the principle of Free-trade, yet he recognized the necessity of Incidental Protection for the interest of this country. In regard to the programme of the Parti National, it was well known that in 1872 a new party was organized in the Province of Quebec bearing that name. Why it was called National no one could say. It was not French, or English, or Rouge. Whether they were Annexationists or not he did not know. He supposed they were not; but they wanted to gain power by all means. The leaders of the Liberal party, and the leaders of the Rouges, were so much compromised in the Province of Quebec that they thought it proper to arrange the theatre in some other shape and change the scenes. Mr. Dorion was then in Europe; his name was not mentioned in the programme, but new men and new ideas were adopted and the programme was published. The gentlemen who were at the head of the party in Quebec were Mr. Joly, who was now leader of the Liberals in the Local Legislature; Mr. De St. Just, now Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec; Mr. Langelier, who had for near two years had a seat in the Local Legislature, and Mr. Laurier and some others were the members of the committee appointed to frame the programme.

MR. LAURIER: I never saw it.

MR. BLANCHET said that though the hon. gentleman was perhaps not consulted, yet he (Mr. Blanchet) read in the Herald of 1872 that, on the formation of the National party, the name of the hon. gentleman was mentioned as one of the Committee charged with its organization.

MR. LAURIER: My name might be mentioned, but I never approved of it.

MR. BLANCHET said the hon. gentleman repudiated the programme which was his own child. It was always the way with the Liberals of Quebec; they had been obliged to repudiate one day what they had promulgated the previous day. He would not enter into the programme of 1847, which was disavowed last night, or speak of the programme of 1854, which was too strong for the time; but he would refer to the programme of 1872.

MR. MILLS: You supported that programme.

MR. BLANCHET: Which?

MR. MILLS: That of 1854.

MR. BLANCHET said the hon. the Minister of the Interior should not make that statement. With regard to the programme of 1872, the first article was "Election of Senators by the people or Local Legislatures." He would like to know if the hon. the Minister of the Interior had abandoned the scheme for the re-organization of the Senate.

MR. MILLS; I have not.

MR. BLANCHET said that, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's disavowal, he did not see anything in the Speech respecting that subject. If the Senate was such a useful machine in the State, he (Mr. Blanchet) saw no reason why they should change its constitution, and the expression used by the hon. the Minister of the Interior would tell against him when he was again out of power and endeavouring to be returned to Parliament. It would be said that in such a year the hon. member admitted that the Senate was a good institution, that there was no necessity for calling the House together because affairs were not extraordinary, and that all for which Parliament was required to assemble was for voting the money necessary for the public service.

MR. MILLS: The Speech does not say that.

MR. BLANCHET said the Speech recognized that we were in ordinary times, and that everything was going on well. If such were so, why should they change the constitution of the Senate? The second article of the programme was "Reform of the Electoral Laws of the Dominion, and of the Province of Quebec." He admitted that the Electoral Laws had been changed since that pro-programme was adopted in 1872, but the Act relating to Controverted Elections was passed in 1873 by the present Opposition party, led by the right hon. member for Kingston. The law relating to the ballot, and the law relating to the holding of elections on one day, and the abolition of the property qualification, he admitted, were passed in 1874. But it was the only article in the programme they had sustained since they were in power. The third article of the programme was the reduction of the number of Ministers. The present Government had been in power during four years, and no measure had been proposed to diminish the number of Ministers. He did not know whether the late President of the Council had resigned in order to carry out that article; but if they were to believe the newspapers it was not so, because it was stated that the hon. gentleman would not be replaced during the Session, but immediately afterwards, and before the general elections. The fourth article of the programme was in favour of "A reduction of the salary of the Governor-General." He did not observe anything mentioned in the Speech from the Throne regarding that matter, and no proposition had been made during the last four years the present Government had been in power, to have the salary reduced. It was only clap-trap. No one in the House thought of or wished for a reduction in the salary of the Governor-General. The sum granted was necessary to maintain that high functionary who was at the head of the Dominion in his proper place and position; and he was satisfied that no one would suppose that, if the present party was in power ten years hence, any member would come forward with a proposal to diminish the Governor-General's salary.

MR. BLANCHET.

MR. MILLS: It would be a great disappointment to you.

MR. BLANCHET said the country resolved to maintain the present salary of the Governor-General in 1868. The fifth article of the programme was for "Reducing the number of public employés." He did not see, however, that any change had been affected in that respect; the same number of employés still crowded the lobbies of the House, and the corridors of the Public Departments as some years ago, when the hon. the Premier stated that he was choked by the crowd of functionaries in the corridors and passages of the House. This was one more article in the programme of the National party which there had been no attempt to carry out. The next article in the programme promised "A re-organization of the Militia," in such a way that the force should only be used for the maintenance of public order. Perhaps they had carried out the article in that respect, because they had allowed the number of the militia to dwindle down to almost nothing; but he was sure, in spite of the Liberal party of Quebec, though the Government had thought proper to let the force diminish, he was afraid they would by this time have seen it was not a very wise policy. The seventh article of the programme was "Improvement of the internal ways of communication, so as to increase the facilities for trade by the St. Lawrence route." Every one was agreed with regard to that subject; it was the policy of both political parties, and had been carried out in good faith by the present party in power, though it had been first adopted by the present Opposition when in office. Then another article was: "Opposition to the construction of the Pacific Railway by Government grant until the North-West Territory was colonized." He did not observe that any change had been made in reference to the construction of that railway, except that the Government had given up the policy of the last Administration to have the line constructed by a private company, and had adopted the policy of having it constructed as a Government work. He admitted that it was a wise policy, and, indeed, the only possible policy to get such a large undertaking carried out by the country. The policy of the Government, or rather the policy of the First Minister, was the construction of the Pacific Railway, in spite of his colleagues, the members of the Government, and the members of the Liberal party of Quebec. Another article in the programme of the Parti National was "The obtaining of the absolute right to negotiate our commercial relations with other countries so as to secure the establishment of manufactories in Canada." The answer given last summer by the hon. the First Minister to a deputation of gentlemen from Quebec interested in ship-building was in conflict with that article. He told them it was impossible for Canada to do anything in that regard except through Great Britain, and yet, a few months afterwards, owing to the election for Quebec, he changed his views, and wrote a letter to Mr. Shehyn, which had been read to the House, stating that he would give him power to write to the French Consul and arrange an informal treaty so as to secure to Canada reduced dues on Dominion ships entering French ports. The letter read as follows:—

"As you seem to think that some arrangement or understanding may be arrived at, though not formally concluded, with the French Consul, I need hardly say that I would be very glad indeed to have you communicate with that gentleman in any way you think best; and, if anything can be done through him to facilitate the object we all have in view, to secure close commercial relations with France in articles produced by both countries, I shall be very glad."

MR. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear; I have no objection to that.

MR. BLANCHET said that in the previous interview the hon. the First Minister had stated that the fullest representation had already been made to the French Government, through the only constitutional channel, and the Government of Canada could not delegate any person to represent them in any foreign country. It was sufficient to say that the hon. gentleman expressed that view on the 3rd August, 1877, and the view contained in the letter addressed to Mr. Shehyn, on the 10th November.

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. member is quite mistaken. The two statements are quite consistent. The House will observe that I stated—what I state now, and what I must of necessity state—that there could be no official communication held by the Government of Canada, or anybody appointed by the Government of Canada, with any foreign Government. They must of necessity go through the usual channels; and I simply stated in the letter to Mr. Shehyn that if anything could be done through the French Consul that might facilitate the object we have in common, I should be very glad, as I should be now.

MR. BLANCHET.

MR. BLANCHET: Through the French Consul or the British Ambassador at Paris?

MR. MACKENZIE: Any way you like.

MR. BLANCHET said that statement was entirely contrary to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman to the deputation that waited on him from Quebec.

MR. MACKENZIE: Not at all.

MR. BLANCHET said he had risen because he thought it was his duty to answer the remarks of the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Fréchette) which were so unwarranted and unparliamentary; and he was sure that the hon. gentleman's electors, when they read in the newspapers the expressions used by him in that House, would be ashamed of him—as his colleagues were—and would not again return him as a member of that House.

MR. FRÉCHETTE: I rise to make a personal explanation. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Blanchet) has thought proper to talk a little of religion, and with regard to his misfortune in the county of Lévis; and he stated that, in 1871, during the local election, I had used a letter coming from a priest of Chicago, in which I was represented as being a good Catholic. I say it is utterly incorrect: I never used any such letter.

MR. BLANCHET: He is ashamed of it now.

MR. FRÉCHETTE: I only interrupted the hon. member to deny his incorrect statement. I say that, in 1871 or 1872, I had to publish in the newspapers a certain letter coming from a French priest in Chicago denying a certain letter that had been published at the suggestion or instigation—

MR. BLANCHET: No, no.

MR. FRÉCHETTE: Or at the instigation of the hon. member's party, in the county of Lévis, a letter in which I was represented as a man who had betrayed his religion and become a Protestant; that was published in L'Echo de Lévis. It was only in reply to that letter, published by the hon. member for Bellechasse, or his party, that I published the letter from the Chicago priest.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that before the House adjourned he wished to call attention to the fact that, as the time for receiving petitions and private bills expired on Monday, it had become an absolute necessity to close the debate that evening in order that they might be able to get the committees organized. He was sure everyone would recognize the necessity of doing this. He had interfered with the debate as little as possible, nor had he had an opportunity to speak himself, except a few words in reply to the Opposition. He asked hon. gentlemen to consider the position in which the House was placed, and to make a point of closing the debate that evening.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK said it was not his intention to take part in the debate, for he conceived that the discussion had gone far beyond the limits of the Address; nor was there anything of sufficient importance in the Address to His Excellency, that called, in his opinion, for so lengthened a debate. But two or three members on the opposite side of the House, commencing with the hon. the Postmaster-General, and ending with the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Macdougall), had referred in so unfair and unjust a manner to the Hon. Mr. Campbell that, in this hon. gentleman's absence, he conceived it to be his duty towards his absent friend to read for him the defence which he (Mr. Campbell) offered at the time. The Hon. Mr. Campbell had been accused by the hon. the Postmaster-General and the hon. member for East Elgin, of having fled to escape the service of a process or subpoena in connection with the trial of the election petition versus the right hon. member for Kingston. At the time, the Globe had made this accusation against the hon. Senator, who had replied in the following letter, dated Nov. 2, 1874:—

"SIR,—The conclusion to which you jump in the article on the Kingston Election Trial in this morning's Globe, that, because I was not present at that investigation, I had made what you term a 'fight' to avoid it, is, I venture to say, excessively unfair. I was in Montreal up to Saturday evening last. I had had no intimation of any kind that my presence would be needed or my evidence desired at Kingston. The business which called me to New York involved the meeting on last Tuesday of several gentlemen from different parts of the United States, and one who sailed for England by the Prussian on Wednesday. It had been agreed, towards the end of October, that we should meet when and where we did. Surely, in the absence of any subpoena, telegram or other intimation that my presence was desired at Kingston, I was at liberty to go where my private affairs called me without exposing myself, in any reason or fairness, to comments such as those contained in your article.

"I am, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"A. CAMPBELL.

"Toronto, November 2nd, 1874."

He thought that, with this letter before the hon. gentlemen in question, they ought to have hesitated before they criticised the conduct of that hon. Senator in such a manner; and he submitted that letter as a sufficient vindication of his character from those aspersions. The hon. member for East Elgin had quoted at some length, from the judgment of that eminent judge, Chief Justice Richards, in connection with this case. He would like to supplement these remarks by a very brief article from the Globe, which said:

"The very elaborate judgment of Chief Justice Richards in the case of the Kingston election petition, which we published this morning, declares the election void, and relieves the respondent, Sir John A. Macdonald, of all responsibility attaching to actual and express knowledge of the illegal and corrupt proceedings of his agents."

He conceived that this also sufficiently indicated the fact that his hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was in no way responsible further than the law implied for the conduct of his agents, who were, as the hon. gentleman opposite said, too zealous in the cause. He would tell the hon. gentlemen opposite who had alluded to the Kingston election of 1874, that, if they knew the facts connected with these elections, they would hesitate to bring those elections into discussion before the House. These two elections which were held in 1874, were the very last elections to which hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House should refer. He was acquainted with some of the facts connected with them, and he believed that never, in the history of Canada, was the power of the Government so prostituted as it was in these cases, in attempting to intimidate and corrupt the electors of any constituency. More open or more shameless intimidation had never been practised in Canada. Even a Minister of the Crown had not thought it beneath his dignity to enter the public departments on the day of polling and allow the voters in his presence to be canvassed, with a request in his name that they should go to the polls and vote for the Government candidate. One, at least, of those officials had been so intimidated that he actually took refuge in the coal cellar; and another official who had the manliness to say "No," to the request, had suffered for it to this day, he having had officials put into his department over his head, and placed in the receipt of higher salaries, although he was competent in every respect to fulfil the duties of a higher position. He would not allude to the case of an individual who was dismissed from his position because he ventured to vote for the right hon. member for Kingston,—on the ostensible ground that this official had canvassed for the right hon. gentleman. This official was not a member of any committee, nor had he attended any public meetings; and it was simply because, among his private friends, he stated his mind freely, that this man suffered dismissal from the public service with the ignominy attached of the announcement in the public Gazette, that His Excellency the Governor-General had no further need for his services. He (Mr. Kirkpatrick) could also tell the House of acts of corruption committed by the Ministerialists at these elections. On the very day of nomination, at the second election, opposite to the building in which the nomination took place, and within hearing of the persons who addressed the meeting, workmen, labourers and voters began to pull down the fortifications; and these men were then so engaged on the part of the Government, not by tens, or twenties, or fifties, but by hundreds. And these men were employed through tickets given them by the committee of the Government candidate, and it was said to them: "Here is the Government giving you work." He thought the right hon. gentleman was correct the other night when he said he was thankful to secure his election by a majority of seventeen; and he (Mr. Kirkpatrick) could add that those who supported the right hon. gentleman in that city were thankful for it too, when they considered the means used to defeat him. The demolition of these walls was also commenced at the period of the election, before the ice had formed, in order to give the carters and teamsters double work. If they had waited until the ice had formed, they could have removed the stones, which were said to be required on the opposite side of the bay, by a direct cut across the bay. These stones were removed to a certain distance, where they were piled up, and then, a fortnight afterwards, another job was given in their removal across the bay. These were facts which were well known in Kingston, and, if the hon. gentlemen opposite had known these facts as they were known to the people of Kingston, they would have been very careful about referring to that election and to the diminished majority by which the right hon. member was returned. He regretted his having been obliged to introduce this subject; and he also regretted the introduction of these subjects into this debate.

MR. KIRKPATRICK,

MR. ORTON said it was not his intention to follow hon. gentlemen in their wise or unwise course, by entering into fulsome praise of the political party to which he belonged, or into charges of corruption or personal recrimination, because he thought that at the present time the people of this country had made up their minds in reference to the accusations which had been made. At any rate, this was the case in Ontario, where the people were perfectly familiar with all the circumstances connected with these charges on both sides. He thought the people had made up their minds that though the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) might have, in political contests, committed a wrong, this had been far more than counterbalanced by the exhibition which had been made by the other side of the House before the Election Courts, and also by the acts of the Administration since it came into power; such as, for instance, the steel rails transaction, the Goderich Harbour job, and the Fort Frances swindle. He believed that the country expected something more from the Government than the making of charges against their opponents. It expected from the Administration some broad and expansive scheme for raising this country out of the cloud of depression which weighed so heavily on our commercial and industrial classes. The first paragraph of the reply to the Address was as follows:—

“That we learn with satisfaction, that His Excellency, in again summoning us for the despatch of business, is able to inform us that nothing beyond the ordinary business of the country requires our attendance.”

This clause, in conjunction with one or two other clauses in the Address, he thought sufficiently indicated that the present Government did not consider that the great financial distress, the continuation of the hard times which had been pressing so heavily upon the people of this country, required any exertion on their part. This was indeed a humiliating confession on the part of the Government of their own inertness and their utter inability to grasp the wants and requirements of the people of this country, or to enter into the genius and spirit of the people of Canada. It would be well for them to consider for a short time some of the reasons which had led to the many years of commercial despondency and general distress that had prevailed in this country. He thought it would be generally acknowledged that these were the causes of the depression: first, over importations; second, imports of shoddy or worthless goods; third, the unfair tariff relations that existed between this country and the United States; fourth, the great increase in the cost of Government since Confederation; fifth, the high rate of interest that was exacted in this country; and, sixth, the policy of the present Government which had been such as to decrease the volume of our foreign trade, and to assist, as far as the Government could do, the other causes in bringing about this depression. The Government seemed to be of opinion that all this was utterly beyond their control, but he considered the people of this country believed that any Government in which they could have confidence, must exert themselves and endeavour to remove these causes of depression. He thought there were few intelligent business men in Canada but felt that the Government should at least do something to give some little ray of hope to our struggling industries. He thought it would be acknowledged, in the first place, that over-importations could be reduced; and one way of doing that was to re-arrange the tariff so as to collect the taxation which was required to carry on our affairs in a manner that would be less burdensome to the people. Such a re-arrangement could be made as would give encouragement to every class of our population, whether labourers, who, at present, all over the country, were only half employed—able-bodied, willing men, who were left unproductive, and in many instances were unable to provide their families with the necessaries of life—or the great agricultural class of the country, who felt they had not received that justice they had a right to demand from the Government. He believed that the Government could control the importation of shoddy goods and their manufacture in this country. Some scheme might be inaugurated by which that drain on our national wealth would be reduced or stemmed. A scheme to prevent the importation of shoddy goods would meet with the general approval of the people of Canada. The tariff question had been ably discussed in the House, and it was likely that during the present Session this matter would receive full consideration from both sides of the House. The high rate of interest exacted should receive the earnest and serious consideration of Parliament. It was well known that our people were weighed down by the heavy interest they had to pay; and it was also a notorious fact that nearly two-thirds of the property in Canada was to-day mortgaged, to a large extent to foreign capitalists. They also knew that certain societies in this country were carrying on operations with the sanction and approval of the Government; and these institutions had done a great deal of injury to the progress of many of our most industrious and worthy people. Many instances in his experience had occurred where men who had for years struggled hard on farms in Western Canada, in order to make for themselves and their families a home, had had that property ruthlessly taken away from them through the operations of these societies. One farmer had mortgaged his farm for $2,000; and, after paying a large amount in fees and other costs to obtain the money through this mortgage, which was taken on the principle of the building societies, namely, payable in twenty years in annual instalments, interest the same every year after paying for three years both interest and principal, the failure of his crops had obliged him to sell his place to enable him to meet the fourth instalment. To sell he required to have the mortgage released; but, when he applied to the society for such relief—and a lawyer was employed in the case,—he found he was obliged to pay the sum asked by the society, $2,250, though he had paid some $700 during the three years in question besides; so that he had to pay nearly $1,000 for the use of less than $2,000 for three years. This was one of the grievances which ought to receive the earnest consideration of the House. They also found that our commercial men were borne down in these hard times by the heavy interest they were obliged to pay to carry on their business until times revived; and that our lumber and manufacturing interests were suffering in the same manner, and many men were driven to the wall, and many more would follow. Some scheme might be devised which would stimulate our industries, and create greater prosperity in this particular. When they looked at the amount of currency in Canada, and compared it with the amount which was in circulation in other countries, they found that, while in this country there was at the present time something like $31 per family of currency in circulation, in the United States there was $88 per family; in France, which had been remarkable for the wonderful rapidity with which she had recovered from her war debt, the circulation was $200 per family; and, in Great Britain, $142 per family. He thought that was a matter that ought to receive the earnest and serious consideration of this House and the Government. and, if they had to issue legal tender notes such as were issued by Sir Francis Hincks and which it had been stated saved the country $400,000, he believed it would be of immense benefit, and would tend to reduce the interest which our various industries were obliged to pay on borrowed money, and at the same time act as a stimulus to our manufacturing and other industries. It took at least one-fifth of the able-bodied population of this country to support the present system, working at a dollar a day to pay the interest upon the mortgages which existed upon property in this country, and by this they could form some idea of the importance of this matter, and how very urgently it was required that some steps should be taken in the direction he had indicated. The cost of Government was a matter that he thought might worthily receive the earnest consideration of this House. Since Confederation the cost of the Government of this country had increased two-fold. He thought that there might be vast improvements and great reforms made in this particular; but the Government of the day seemed to satisfy themselves with having passed an Election Law, and prided themselves that they had carried out what the great Reform party of this country expected and desired. He was greatly mistaken, if, when the general election occurred, they did not find out that the great Reform party of this country had expected better things from the present Government. Where.

MR. ORTON.

he would like to ask, was that great reform so eloquently pourtrayed for two Sessions by the hon. the Minister of the Interior—the reorganization of the Senate? Where was that reform which was to relieve us from many of the heart-burnings and the sore feelings which existed between the different classes in this country—representation of minorities? Where was the scheme for compulsory voting; where that great and lofty reform by which the British Empire was to be reorganized—all foreshadowed by the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake)? Echo answered “Where?” But were there no reforms that could be made in the management of our various Departments? He thought there were. He thought there was not one single Department at the present time in which there might not be made great and substantial reforms, by which the cost of the Government of this country might be very materially reduced, to the great benefit of the people of Canada. But how could they expect that from the present Government? The hon. the Premier had, in picnic speeches, said that in accepting office he had not abandoned the least of the principles he had professed. In a speech at St. Catharines in 1870, he expressed himself as follows:—

“A man who did one thing in Opposition, and another when he was in power, was a demagogue in whom the people could have no confidence whatever; and he was prepared the moment when any Reform Government should come into power, when they were ready to depart from the principles which actuated them in Opposition, to take the same grounds against them that he took against their natural enemies now.”

He (Mr. Orton) would like to ask this House and the country whether the hon. the Premier had fulfilled these high principles, and lofty expressions of political sentiment? He would first ask whether he had maintained that great principle of the Reform party, the importance of preserving intact the Independence of Parliament Act? They had heard very much of the features of this Act in this House; and he thought there were one or two cases which ought to have been brought before the House before now, and that were, at any rate, of as grave, if not of a more grave character, than those which had already been brought to the notice of the House and the country. He referred, in the first place, to the case of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Bannatyne) whose absence from this House during the present Session was very marked. It was generally understood and known throughout the Province of Manitoba that that hon. gentleman's sympathies were not thoroughly in accord with the present Government, but they found that his name figured in the Public Accounts for a very large sum of money; his vote was always found with the Government. Was it a bought vote or not? The consequence of this carelessness and recklessness on the part of the Government, to say the least, if it were not corruption on the part of the Government, was that the constituency of Provencher was to-day left unrepresented in this House. Had the people of Manitoba no rights to maintain in this House that they could afford to be represented by only three representatives, instead of four? If he was not mistaken, the people of that country would feel that a great wrong had been done them through what he might almost term the criminal conduct of the Government in this respect. It was said that the hon. gentleman had offered a resignation of his seat in this House; but, through the intrigues of members of the Government or their friends, he was induced to withdraw his resignation, because it was felt that to open any constituency in that Province would be very injurious to the interests of this Government. It would be like Digby, N.S., and many other constituencies that had been rendered vacant, where the Government had been unmistakably defeated and condemned at the polls. The hon. the First Minister had said, at a meeting in North Lanark, that he could find no possible reason for a coalition—

“Unless it would be alleged that the leading men of the Reform party are not capable of forming a Government and carrying on the affairs of the country. The cry is raised ‘measures, not men,’ but if good measures are wanted, you must have good men. He for one knew that within the ranks of the Reform party there were men who could form a pure Government without going to the highways and by-ways for so-called Independents and loose fish. He objected to coalitions; first, because they were not necessary, and second, because associations formed on that ground were iniquitous, and had been condemned universally."

He would simply point, in reply to this, to the various changes which had taken place in the Cabinet, as well as to the first formation of the present Cabinet; and what did they find? Did they find that, within the ranks of the Reform party, men had been found capable and able to occupy these high positions as Ministers of the Crown? He thought not; but they found that the following Tories—old, life-long Conservatives—had been taken into the Ministry to form the backbone of the present Cabinet:—Mr. Cartwright, Mr. Scott, Mr. Smith, Mr. Vail, Mr. Burpee, Mr. Coffin, and, lastly, Mr. Jones, and he might also mention the late President of the Council, Mr. Cauchon. Surely, if there was any ground for the reason which the Prime Minister gave in 1870 for objecting to coalitions, that was one, when he said that such associations were iniquitous, and had been condemned universally. Again, they found Mr. Huntington and Mr. Laflamme, whose public reputation was perhaps not of the highest, in consequence of certain transactions which had been brought before this House. The next platform of the Reform party was shown in the speech made by Mr. Mackenzie in London in 1870:—

"While the finances of the Provinces were formerly administered by one Minister, they had now four. He could not see that there was any necessity for such amplification, there was no necessity for a Cabinet of thirteen. The United States had a vast population and a vast territory, still they got along with seven Ministers, and one Secretary of the Treasury conducted all the financial business."

The present Government had forgotten that platform. He thought he had now sufficiently shown that the hon. Premier had not fulfilled the obligations which he undertook to the people of this country when he entered office. He now wished to refer shortly to another paragraph in the Address. It stated:

"That we receive with much pleasure His Excellency's congratulations on the abundant harvest reaped in all quarters of the Dominion; and that under this and other influences there has been some improvement in the Revenue returns, thus indicating, as we trust with His Excellency, that the commercial depression, that afflicted Canada in common with other countries, is passing away."

This seemed to him like a cruel sarcasm upon one at least of the largest industries of the country; for, if ever a Government were guilty of trying to prevent prosperity in any one class, it was the present Government, who had continuously and persistently refused to do justice to the great agricultural population of this country. It appeared that the Government were looking, as they all looked, to good crops and the prosperity of the farming population of this country as the backbone and mainstay of our country, and the source from which, perhaps, the largest amount of general prosperity would come; but they found that the policy pursued had reduced the profits derived from farming in this country, through the unfair competition of American produce, to such an extent that there were not 100 acres in this country occupied with good farming land upon which from $50 to $100 a year more could not be made if we had something like fair relations with our neighbours across the border. Circumstanced as we were, with a long frontier extending from ocean to ocean, where we were brought into direct competition with our neighbours across the border, our farmers felt it more heavily every year. This year they had had a good crop, but he must say that it had been far over-estimated. In his section of the country, for quite a circle round the county of Wellington, where he lived, he was sorry to say they had had bad crops for a number of years, and in his immediate neighbourhood they were even worse than last year. The same state of things existed to some extent in many other parts of the country; but, he was free to confess that, taking the country throughout, they had had a fair average crop. But they found, in his county, American oats coming in at 28c. and 30c. a bushel, reducing the price of Canadian oats. In the village in which he lived, one miller alone had imported from the United States 60,000 bushels of American oats. Another miller, in the same place, had imported a larger amount. He wished to show, in a more marked way, how the trade in farm products between this country and the United States existed at the present day, compared with what it was ten years ago. In 1868, or during reciprocity, and before that period, they exported large quantities of farm products of every description to the United States, both cereals and animals. But what did they find now? That, since 1868, the amount of those products for which they could get a market in the United States had year after year been decreasing, while the American farmer had year after year obtained an increasing market in this country. In 1868, there were only some forty horses imported from the United States into Canada; in 1875 there were no less than 1,225, or thirty times as many horses brought from the United States into Canada. In 1868 they only imported four horned cattle into this Dominion from the United States; in 1875 they imported not less than 4,580, or a thousand times as many cattle. In 1868 there were only seven live hogs brought into the country; while in 1875 there were 28,256, or four thousand times as many. In 1868 they imported 55 sheep; in 1875 they imported 8,690. In 1868, they imported 40,450cwt. of meat-stuffs, whereas in 1875 they imported 195,874cwt., or five times as much cured meats in 1875 as was imported in 1868. He might also point out that there was a very large market obtained in this country for flour and meal by the Americans. The American millers sold for consumption in this country no less than $3,034,683 worth of flour and meal, only $38,000 worth of which was re-exported. There were also over six million bushels of wheat imported in the same year, three millions of which were re-exported, leaving $3,200,000 worth of wheat to be consumed in this country. The farmers of this country had found, especially, that the price of their hogs had been terribly decreased through the importation of live hogs into this country, brought into direct competition with the pork of our farmers in our own markets. The Government were also chargeable with still further decreasing the profits of the agricultural population of this country by the imposition of the duty on malt. It was well known that this country was highly adapted for the growth of barley. A large quantity of barley was every year grown in Canada; but, owing to the imposition of this increased duty, which amounted to 72c. per bushel, or 25 per cent. more than the price they obtained for barley, there had been a great decrease in the consumption of barley in Canada for malting and brewing purposes. A serious injury and wrong had been done to the farmers through this tax. It was stated by the hon. the Minister of Justice a few nights ago that, if this side of the House could show him how prosperity could be restored, or even the depression retarded, he would gladly give the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) his place and lend him his assistance. He thought that, if the Government would put forth some endeavour to reform in this direction which he had pointed out, the widespread depression which existed in Canada would be greatly decreased, and their prosperity again brought back to them. It seemed the Government were putting their old trust in something that was intangible. They said they "trusted that this commercial depression was passing away." Were they trusting to a Russian war, or some other adventitious circumstance, instead of endeavouring to do what lay in their power to restore prosperity? He could not agree with the statement that the improvement in the revenue returns was a sure indication of returning prosperity. As was stated by the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow) on the previous evening, it was a well-known fact that the wholesale merchants in this country imported very largely this year, expecting that there would be an immense sale for their goods in consequence of the good harvest which the newspapers had stated existed in this country. But, in every town and village in this country, large quantities of goods were remaining on the shelves of the merchants unsold, and they also found that the wholesale men had been unable to dispose of anything like the whole of their goods; the result of which would be, he feared, instead of an increase of their prosperity, a continuation of the failures which had occurred throughout this country, and he thought the increased revenue was from this source, and, therefore, could not be a certain indication of returning prosperity. It might also be that, in consequence of the policy that had been pursued, many of their manufactures having been driven out of the country had caused an importation of foreign manufactured goods, and thereby increased the revenue, but at a very serious cost to the people of this country—at a cost of a large part of their population and a large part of their wealth. It had been stated also by the hon member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that the manufacturing prosperity of the United States was not as great as the manufacturing prosperity of this country. All he could say was that the exportation of manufactured goods from the United States had, year after year, increased; their trade abroad had increased to a wonderful extent. He would read to the House what Consul Shaw had stated in reference to the trade of this country and the United States:—

MR. ORTON.

“The United States Consul at Toronto has forwarded to the Department of State a report of the commerce of the Province of Ontario with the United States. The Consul says that as far as trade and commerce are concerned, Ontario is the same as one of the States of the Union. He reports a large and continually increasing trade in American manufactures, their superiority in style and finish having completely obliterated old prejudices against them. At present the feelings of the people, politically and commercially, are thoroughly American. The Consul thinks that for the future Ontario will rely upon the United States for all her manufactures, as it would now be impossible to start any manufactories there which could hope to compete with those of the United States, and no foreign manufactures can. The imports into Ontario during the year 1875 (the last official reports published) amounted to over $42,000,000. Of this amount over $26,000,000 were from the United States, against $15,000,000 from Great Britain. The exports during the same year from the forty-six ports of the Province amounted to a little over $18,000,000, more than $8,000,000 less than the imports from the United States alone. The failures in all Canada during the last two years are represented as amounting to more than $50,000,000, but, on account of the American system of cash sales, it is thought that $600,000 of this total will cover American losses. A perseverance in this cash system, having all goods equal to representation, together with caution not to overstock the markets by pushing sales, and the future trade of the United States with Ontario will be both large and profitable.”

MR. ORTON.

He would also, in order to show how the cotton manufactures of the United States had increased, read a statement from an American paper:—

“Since 1875 our annual exports of cotton manufactures have run up from $4,071,882 to $10,235,843. American piece goods are now sold in every town in England at a lower price and of a superior quality to English goods of a corresponding grade.”

He might go on to show how the manufacturers of the United States were increasing in prosperity, and enlarging their markets, while our home market was being continually reduced by the unfair competition of American manufacturers; but he would not detain the House longer. He would conclude by expressing the hope that, notwithstanding the meagre character of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, wiser and more patriotic counsels would yet prevail in our Government, and would lead to some measure of endeavour, at least, on their part to do their duty to the people of this country during the present Session. He hoped the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young) would not plead in vain for protection for the manufacture of beet-root sugar, an industry which he (Mr. Orton) believed could be developed successfully in this country, and which he thought should receive the serious consideration of this Government and of this House.

MR. POULIOT said that, although the discussion had already been very long and acrimonious, he could not let it terminate without replying to some of the observations of hon. gentlemen opposite,—Conservatives from the Province of Quebec. These hon. gentlemen, not content with endeavouring to make the country believe that to them all the merit of the excellent measures which the then Opposition had forced them to adopt, when they were in power, was due, also wished to impress on the country the belief that to them was due the merit of the excellent measures adopted under the present régime, and that the Liberals not only had no right to any praise for the good they did, but, further, were responsible for the evil which those hon. gentlemen themselves had committed. He had certainly been far from expecting that these hon. gentlemen would again attempt, at this date, to excite the minds of the people with regard to a question that the present Government had settled several years since; but he had forgotten that we were on the eve of a general election, and that these hon. gentlemen still believed, without doubt, that they could obtain some advantage by reviving this question—he now alluded to the North-West troubles—in which the unfortunate Riel and his companions were concerned. To listen to these hon. gentlemen one would believe that they alone laboured to secure the settlement of that matter, and, addressing the Liberals of the Province of Quebec, they said: "If you had joined us, we would have obtained a full and complete amnesty." He was ready to believe that these hon. gentlemen were sincere, and that they really wished to secure such an amnesty; but really, considering how they had acted, and what they said to the Liberals to-day, one was persuaded to think that they had not desired an amnesty, or that, well aware that they could not obtain it, they wished to profit by this circumstance to embarrass the Government and overthrow it, if possible. He purposed showing, with the papers in his hand, that if these hon. gentlemen had been sincere, they would have, in effect, secured an amnesty, in the first place, by means of their friends, when these were in power, by exercising their influence on Sir George Cartier, since they were in office more than two years after the North-West troubles took place. Let them see what was done when this question was brought before the House. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) could tell them something about it, as he (Mr. Masson) was one of the members appointed to look into the matter. It was not forgotten, doubtless, that the Government had promised to grant an amnesty if it was established that this had been promised. It was also known—and the report of the Committee was before them showing it—that his Grace Archbishop Taché and the Rev. Father Ritchot had stated before the Committee, that the amnesty had been promised them by Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir George Cartier and Sir Clinton Murdoch; and further,—and this would be seen on consulting the report—how the hon. members for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) and Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) had testified before the Committee. Why, then, had not the Conservative members from the Province of Quebec aided the right hon. member for Kingston to refresh his memory, and reminded him of what had taken place? If they had acted in this manner, the House would not have witnessed so much forgetfulness in this regard, on each occasion when their leader was questioned as to what had passed between Mgr. Taché, Father Ritchot and himself. Why, also, when the Rev. Father Ritchot said that the amnesty was promised him by Sir Clinton Murdoch, in presence of Lord Lisgar and of the hon. member for Charlevoix, had not this hon. gentleman stated openly what was then done? But, no; the hon. gentleman took advantage of his position as Minister of the Crown to decline to reply. It seemed to him that, under these circumstances, it was not for the hon. member to refuse to answer, but he ought to have waited until objection was taken to his testimony by one of the parties interested, according to the practice of our Courts before doing so. Besides, he (Mr. Pouliot) maintained that the hon. member was not then present in his capacity as a Minister of the Crown, but in the position of an ordinary witness, and that he should have answered and informed the Committee whether or no an amnesty had, at that time, been pledged to the Rev. Father Ritchot. He consequently affirmed that, if the Conservative members from the Province of Quebec had then sincerely wished to obtain an amnesty, they would have induced their friends the hon. members for Kingston and Charlevoix to answer before the Committee otherwise than they had done, and an amnesty would have been granted. But this was not all; let them see what followed. The long discussion which took place on the motion of the hon. the Premier, in favour of an amnesty such as was granted, would be remembered without doubt—and also the active part that the right hon. member for Kingston had taken in it. It was further known that to this motion the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) proposed an amendment, demanding a full and complete amnesty. What number of votes were cast in favour of this amendment? It was only twenty-three. Even the Conservatives from the Province of Quebec were not united on this point; for, in addition to the French-Canadian Conservatives, he (Mr. Pouliot) found among that number only two English-speaking Conservatives from Quebec, (Mr. Macdougall and Mr. Wright of Ottawa) besides the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster). He looked in vain on this list for the name of the right hon. member for Kingston, who had taken so leading a part in the debate. That right hon. gentleman's name was not included in the division either for the affirmative or for the negative. Where, then, was the hon. gentleman? It pained him to say, with regard to an hon. gentleman of his position, that, when the division bell sounded on that occasion in connection with a matter of this importance, the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) in place of remaining in his seat to perform his duty, precipitately left the House. And this was not all,—the vote was immediately afterwards taken on the principal motion, and then the name of this right hon. gentleman was found in the front rank among those who did not wish any amnesty whatever to be granted; and, more surprising still, they saw the Conservatives from the Province of Quebec, who were fully satisfied with the conduct of the hon. gentleman, accuse the Liberals of that Province with being responsible for the fact that a complete amnesty had not been granted. He, in view of these circumstances, would ask the House and the country—supposing for a moment that they, the Liberals, had acted regarding this matter as their friends the Conservatives from the Province of Quebec had desired—what would they have obtained? The Liberals had done all that it was possible for them to do under the circumstances, and, for his part, he could say with certainty that he had been in some measure instrumental in securing the settlement of this question in the manner in which it was settled, and that nothing he had done in his parliamentary career had given him as great pleasure as this fact. Further, what followed was a proof of the wisdom of this settlement, as peace had since reigned in the country; and this fact not only delighted himself but also the country and Riel himself, since Riel could in a short time return to live in peace among his countrymen. He would pass on to another question. The Conservative members from the Province of Quebec had also brought before the House a matter which should certainly not be discussed, either there or elsewhere by the laity; but, since these hon. gentlemen had mentioned it, he could not refrain from saying a few words in this connection. Once again, he would repeat that these hon. gentlemen, not satisfied with appropriating to their own account the good which the Liberals had accomplished, wished to impute to the latter the evil which they themselves had done in this relation. Really, it was somewhat extraordinary—and all the Province of Quebec would be greatly surprised when it saw—that these hon. gentlemen, forbidden any longer to drag religion into politics, and ordered to put an end to abuses, the existence of which they themselves admitted, in view of what they had just said, desired to create the impression that it was not they but rather the Liberals who had thus begun to introduce religion into political discussions, and to take advantage of this circumstance. This was the way in which these hon. gentlemen wished to falsify history, and this pretension he could not allow to pass in silence. In fine, it was an evil to mingle religion and politics together. Why had not the Conservatives, the born guardians of all good principles, protested in the press and elsewhere against this abuse? Why, during all these years that religious matters had thus been discussed in the press, as well as in public meetings and everywhere else, had not the Conservatives appealed to Rome where such matters should be decided? Would they to-day deny that it was the Liberals, with a certain number of good Conservatives, he would admit, and a considerable proportion of the clergy, who had appealed to Rome in this regard? For it was not to be believed that the Conservatives were supported by all the clergy as they would have it believed; on the contrary, the Liberals had on their side a large number of priests, and those two rev. gentlemen, who were among the most distinguished, the most influential, and the most able of their order; and these gentlemen, justly alarmed, owing to what was passing in their midst among the Catholics, had with one accord appealed to Rome, where, as it was known, the Conservatives were represented by ecclesiastics of great ability, and where, as was also known, all the politico-religious questions which divided them, were discussed so lengthily and ably that Rome, after having heard the pros and cons, did not think it proper to come at once to a decision, but sent out to Canada that eminent personage whom they all knew, Mgr. Conroy, who, after having collected the requisite information, had informed them through the proper channel that, with reference to religion, the two parties that existed in Canada, Liberal as well as Conservative, were not condemned the one more than the other, and that each elector could vote for the candidate of either party as his conscience dictated to him. It would be thus he (Mr. Pouliot) hoped in the future, for, as a Roman Catholic, he was happy to see and to say in this Chamber that the faith of their fathers was still so firmly established in Canada, that all, whoever they might be, or to whatever party they might belong, Rome having spoken, submitted, without distinction of persons. He dared hope, then, that, in future, the Conservatives would leave to those who were specially charged with these matters, the supervision of religious questions, and that they would no longer be seen to introduce them in the press, in public meetings or elsewhere. It seemed to him that there were enough of other questions of public interest that they could discuss, above all in the Province of Quebec, and they would do better to endeavour to come to a mutual understanding than to create divisions among themselves. He could not but disapprove of the expressions which the hon. member for Lévis had made use of, that afternoon, and to which hon. gentlemen opposite had not failed to give the most unfavourable meaning possible. He did not think that the hon. member had desired to impart to his words the meaning which hon. gentlemen opposite did; but, in any case, he could not but regret that the hon. gentleman had used such expressions, and disapprove of them. He also regretted the manner in which the debate had been carried on during the past few days. In place of discussing the Address, hon. gentlemen had taken up almost all their time in handling offensive personalities. Really, when the people saw what was passing in the House, they would ask if the members came there for such a purpose, or to busy themselves with the public business of the country. He, consequently, trusted that hon. gentlemen would abandon this mode of debate and introduce a little more decorum in the discussions. Like other gentlemen who had preceded him, he perceived that he had hardly as yet referred to the Address; and he did not wish to take his seat without saying a few words about it. He observed that one paragraph treated of the fertility of the North-West Territories, and alluded to what ought to be done to facilitate the settlement of those regions. Hon. gentlemen opposite had at once seized the opportunity of saying that, in consequence of this fact, it was wrong to censure the conduct of Sir George Cartier when he purchased that country. He (Mr. Pouliot) believed that public opinion had not changed on this point, at least in the Province of Quebec. They had never denied that these territories were fertile; but what they had condemned was the enormous sum that was paid by the Dominion, and which we ought not to have paid for them, and the fact that these things had been done much more rapidly than should have been the case. For his part, he regretted that the present Government followed a little too closely the steps taken in this regard by the late Administration, thus expending too much on those Provinces and not enough on the old Provinces. He considered that a little too much attention was paid to the North-West Territories by the Government, to whatever party it belonged, and he dared hope that their hon. friends the Ministers from the Province of Quebec, above all, would remind their colleagues, and the hon. the First Minister particularly, in his capacity of Minister of Public Works, that there were still some desirable strips of territory in the east, and that they would, from time to time, draw his attention to them, and especially to the eldest daughter of the family, whom they seemed to wish to neglect some what, causing him particularly to see that, if there were fertile lands in the North-West, there were also very fertile lands in their Province, where at least, a million of souls could be settled, and that in consequence of the financial condition of that Province (Quebec) there was still more need, in this regard, of some aid from the Federal Government.

MR. POULIOT.

Mr. FRÉCHETTE said he desired to make an explanation to the House with regard to certain expressions of which he had made use that afternoon, and which had been interpreted in a sense which he had not intended to convey. He had not purposed formally declaring that the decoration that the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) possessed had been purchased by the hon. gentleman at Rome; but he had wished to say that it had been secured through many sacrifices, and many démarches, and many solicitations, perhaps, on the part of the hon. gentleman. He hoped that this explanation would be satisfactory to the House, and that hon. members would not give any other meaning to the expressions in question than that which would be agreeable with this explanation. He had spoken previously in English, and he was unable to express his thoughts in that language with the same facility that he could in French. He trusted that this explanation would be accepted in the same way that he would accept any such explanation on the part of any other hon. member.

MR. POULIOT.

Mr. COCKBURN said he apprehended that the Speech from the Throne would be generally acceptable to the people of Canada. He was very much pleased to find that the Government had finished the instrumental surveys of the whole line of the Pacific Railway, and he thought it important that at least some four or five sections of the road should be proceeded with as soon as possible, and particularly the portion which was formerly known as the Georgian Bay Branch. A large number of people in the northern part of Ontario, and also, he believed, in Quebec, were looking forward anxiously to the construction of this section, and he hoped that no further delays would occur. He regretted the fact that so many unexpected delays had taken place in the past; but he believed these were due to causes over which the Government had no control. He could not refrain from alluding to some remarks which had fallen from the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell) while filling his favourite rôle of slanderer the other evening.

MR. SPEAKER: I must call the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. COCKBURN said he hurled back the insinuations of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bowell) in regard to his constituency, which, however, had suffered from the corruptions and manipulations of the late Government. It was untrue that the Ontario Government had taken any part whatever in securing his return; and, in defence of both Conservatives and Reformers in his constituency, he hurled back the statements made by the hon. member (Mr. Bowell). He would not recount the incidents attending the election in 1872, but he had all the papers; and, if he gave a narrative of these events, it would not be at all flattering to the hon. gentlemen opposite. Reference had been made to a letter of introduction to himself, given by a member of the Local Parliament of Ontario to a certain person; but this was nothing extraordinary, as a great many people who came up into that part of the country brought introductions to him, scores of which, moreover, were never delivered for want of opportunity. A few unscrupulous opponents of his had, in 1872, not only stolen his letters, but also a poll-book. The right hon. member for Kingston had then pursued a most ridiculous policy regarding the choice of returning officers; and he (Mr. Cockburn) was to have been denied his seat, although he had clearly obtained the majority at the election; and he was under great obligations to the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) for the way in which he had forced the then Government to do him justice. If he gave the details in this connection, they would not redound much to the credit of the leaders of the Opposition. The Ontario Government had not interfered in his favour, and he affirmed, without fear of contradiction, that no member of the House had been more freely chosen than himself. He would not allow officials in the employ of the Ontario Government, nor even his own employés, to interfere in his behalf if they so felt inclined. He was sure that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bowell) and the Mail were incorrect in saying that the party to whom allusion had been made had received some $2,000 or $3,000 from the Ontario Government for services rendered in 1872. Mr. Card was a stranger to him, and had never interfered in his election. He would not allow this for a moment, on the part of Mr. Card, or of Government officials. The whole amount which Mr. Card had received for repairing roads and paying hands, and for his services, he was confident, had not exceeded $1,000. An employé of the Ontario Government had interfered in his election in 1874, but it had been on behalf of his opponent. In 1874, on the day of nomination, he had gone to his opponent and said to him: "Now, let us carry out this election as elections should be conducted; give me your hand that you will spend no money save for travelling expenses." His opponent had agreed, and, in his belief, had carried out the agreement faithfully, though that gentleman's business partner, without his consent, had spent $600 or $700. [His own expenses had not been $200. No Government officials had interfered in his election, although some unscrupulous individuals belonging to the other side had once carried matters with a very high hand in his constituency; but he was very glad to say both Conservatives and Reformers, setting their forces against these individuals, had driven them out. Peace, contentment, and fair play now prevailed in his constituency. He was neither able nor willing to spend money in his elections, and he did not wish anybody else to do so; and he was bound to say that the same thing was true regarding the Conservatives in his constituency. They acted fairly and squarely in connection with these matters.

Mr. ROY said that, as a Canadian, as a Catholic and as a member of the House, he was one of those who regretted the unfortunate words which had fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Fréchette). He was willing to admit that the hon. member for Lévis had not meant all that his words implied, but, on the other hand, there was much to be said in support of what the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Blanchet) had stated. The language used by the hon. member (Mr. Fréchette) had not redounded to the credit of the French-Canadian nationality. He had raised the religious question. A newspaper extract had been mentioned, the truth of which his hon. friend would not guarantee, in reference to Mr. Thibault, and his action was said to have been intended to assure the success of the Conservative candidate. These accusations were either true or false. They were either altogether true or altogether false. There were two perfectly distinct parts in the quotation given to the House by the hon. member for Lévis. If this report was true, he protested energetically against the conduct of Mr. Thibault; and, on the other hand, if the facts referred to in the said report were true, the hon. member for Lévis had no right to take his seat in the House. It was well known to all that the hon. member for Lévis had been traduced in this extract as a thief, etc.; and there was not a member of the House who did not believe that these things were not true; but, if they admitted that the last part of the report, referring to religious questions, was true, what were they to say regarding the truth of the first portion referring to the hon. member for Lévis. They knew perfectly well that Christian charity did not oblige people to be merciful to those gentlemen who might act as Mr. Thibault was said to have acted; and, if the hon. member for Lévis had been treated in the course of the election in Digby as he described, why had he not taken the matter before the Courts and brought out the truth. It was because the hon. member himself considered the report to be a falsehood which must be rejected altogether. Another consideration evolved out of the arguments of the hon. gentleman, was that, as a Canadian and a Catholic, supposing this report were true, it did not reflect honour upon the hon. gentleman to throw discredit upon the Catholic Acadian population of Nova Scotia. Was it possible that, in a country, civilized, and with a population educated like our own, any person could be brought to believe that any man, speaking on the hustings at the doors of the churches, was an emissary of the Pope and a new apostle? This was utterly absurd from the beginning to the end. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fréchette), with the oratorical talent that distinguished him in the course of his harangue, had taken the opportunity of calling the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) the high priest of the Conservative party; but he (Mr. Roy) was persuaded that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Langevin) would attribute this remark to the same thoughtlessness as had characterized other statements of the hon. gentleman on that occasion. If the hon. member had better understood his duties as a French-Canadian, he would not have been the first to cast irony upon a countryman worthy of a high consideration among all his fellow-citizens, and more especially with regard to a badge of honour which every Catholic should be proud to receive. The hon. member for Lévis, alluding to the speeches delivered by the hon. members for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) and Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin), had challenged them, saying they would not dare to publish in their own party papers the speeches delivered by them on the floor of this House; but he (Mr. Roy), not only differed from the hon. member for Lévis on that ground, but would add that, notwithstanding their readiness to accept such a challenge, should there be a proposal to the effect that neither these gentlemen's speeches nor that of the hon. member for Lévis be inserted in the public records, he (Mr. Fréchette) would joyfully grasp at such a proposal, so as to have a chance for himself to remove from these records the unhappy speech he had himself just delivered before the House, and moreover, perhaps, he would offer compensation.

Mr. Roy.

MR. BLANCHET: Yes, and one heavier still than the cost of the badge.

MR. ROY said he also believed it. He alluded to the length of time spent in discussing the principles of the Opposition, but he was at a loss to know why this discussion had not been brought on the principles—if any there were—advocated by the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House; for these were the principles which should have been made known by them, to show to what extent they were, or might be, entitled to the public confidence at the next general election. Hon. gentlemen had sneered at small majorities, and he (Mr. Roy) was made to believe that the Government expected a courteous return from counties in which these small majorities were given. He stated his majority to have been 54, but he was perfectly satisfied that, under the circumstances in which the last election had taken place in his own county, this majority was to be considered as a serious one. The religious question had been brought forward; but he could safely appeal to the gentlemen who were acquainted with the facts as to whether, when he had the honour of asking for the support of the electors in the county of Kamouraska, he had ever introduced other than purely political issues. The religious question had not been introduced in any way into the contest. He would say in the House what he had stated everywhere.

in the county of Kamouraska, when he had met the Hon. Senator Pelletier in the county. He was well acquainted with the personal merits of the Hon. Senator Pelletier as a citizen and a Catholic, and that gentleman had not lost the confidence of the electors of the county of Kamouraska because he was less a Catholic or a Christian than himself (Mr. Roy), but purely because he was a member of a Government in which those electors had no confidence. This was the reason why the Hon. Mr. Pelletier had been beaten in that contest; and this was the reason why he (Mr. Roy) had then obtained the relatively considerable majority of 54 votes in the county of Kamouraska and this majority, under the present state of things, could not, for that reason, be displaced. The House should mark this well, for he spoke with confidence on this subject. Since 1851, from which date took place the great political struggle in the county of Kamouraska, he was the only one who had obtained so large a majority as 54 in the Conservative interest. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who had made a brilliant speech on which he felicitated him, had referred to the intervention of the religious question in politics; but the hon. gentleman knew perfectly well that this question had not been introduced into the contest in any parish of the county of Temiscouata. The hon. gentleman had also spoken of the amnesty question, and, from his statements, it appeared that, if they had secured an amnesty for their friends in Manitoba, it was due to the hon. the Premier. This matter had been discussed at such length that he would say little about it; but the hon. gentleman should not forget the declaration of the hon. the First Minister that, if he granted an amnesty, it was only on account of the pourparlers that had taken place in this connection between their friends in Manitoba and the members of the late Administration. This was the real state of the case. In fact it might be said that otherwise the Government would have positively refused to grant that concession.

Mr. ROBINSON said that, in common with the great majority of the members of the House, and he believed of the people of this country, he viewed with surprise the statement contained in the first paragraph of the Speech from the Throne, which declared that nothing beyond the ordinary business of the country required their attendance. How could this be in view of the fact that our manufacturers were complaining that foreigners had possession of their markets, and also of the fact that, under the present system, the wages of our artizans of almost every grade were kept down and their comforts diminished? In order to draw hon. gentlemen from the right track, the hon. member for North Norfolk had been put up to second the Address, and had told them that the Americans, under their system of protection, were suffering more than the people of any other country from commercial depression. He would ask, if this was true, how it was that the Americans were now paying the interest accruing on their enormous debt, besides having paid off four or five hundred millions of the principal during the last few years? How was it, if the Americans were suffering so much as was represented, that their exports exceeded by 151 millions of dollars their imports. He would ask the hon. gentleman further, considering the supposed suffering of the Americans, and taking the state of trade between the greatest commercial country in Europe and the United States, how it was that, while ten years ago the balance of trade was $37,000,000 in favour of England, it was now, after the lapse of a few years, under the protection system, $275,000,000 in favour of the Americans? Why, if the Americans were suffering so much and protection was such an evil to the country, was it that American calicos were seen every day upon the counters of Manchester firms, and in other towns surrounding Manchester? How was it that, in that old town of steel renown, Sheffield, the steel of Pennsylvania and of Pittsburg was rivalling that of the old town itself? How was it that, under this system of protection, in the old city of Coventry, the watch-trade had been eclipsed by American watches? How was it that America, and not Europe, to-day ruled the price of the leather trade of the world? How was it that hundreds of thousands of rifles and other vast war material were now being furnished from Rhode Island instead of Birmingham? They were told by a gentleman who occupied the position of Superintendent of Statistics in the United States, and who ought to know, that in the ten years ending in 1860, the tariff of the United States was not a free-trade tariff, as described by the hon. member for North Norfolk; but that it was a tariff which gave twenty-five per cent. average of a protection duty; and, further, that, in the ten years ending in 1870, under an extremely high tariff, the ratio of increase had exceeded that of any ten years in the history of the United States, and had exhibited a manufacturing and commercial success such as had seldom been known in any country before. While hon. gentlemen like his hon. friend from North Norfolk and the members of the Cobden Club in England had been spinning their theories, the people of the United States had been steadily reducing the great volume of their foreign imports, so that in the fiscal year ending June last there was a balance in favour of exports of $151,000,000. They had not only built up this vast foreign commerce which had alarmed free-trade England, but, step by step, they were absorbing and supplying almost the whole of their own home market of 45,000,000 of people who, up to a few years ago, in most of their great staples of trade, were supplied by other countries, chiefly by England. And not only had the United States people increased their exports to this vast extent and taken possession of their own home market, but they were now, under their protective system, boldly and successfully competing with other nations in the leading markets of the world. As one fact to show that protection benefited a country, he mentioned that Sanderson & Sons, one of the oldest and richest manufacturers of Sheffield, had transferred a branch of their business to Syracuse in the United States, supplying it with a capital contributed, they were told, from Sheffield itself.

MR. ROBINSON.

Mr. Ruskin, a gentleman well-known in England, had lately declared that the time had come when the cliffs of Dover should no longer be kept a free counter for goods brought from other countries. We were here, with a long stretch of frontier, and the time had come when the people of this country should consider whether the north bank of the St. Lawrence should any longer be used as a counter for the people of the United States to place their goods upon, to the detriment of our own manufacturers, and without contributing anything to the support of the people or Government of this country. Another fact, to show what Protection did in the United States, was that, in the six great leading protected industries there, namely: woollen and worsted, cotton, paper, glass, iron and steel, there was invested an amount of capital equal to something like $400,000,000; these four hundred millions of dollars, according to reliable statistics, producing an annual return of something like eight hundred millions of dollars. They could easily fancy the vast amount of good which the distribution of so much annual wealth must be to the country. Then, again, he believed it was a fact that, in the six great manufacturing States of the Union, as they were called—such as Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island—the riches accumulated by the people of these States were greatly in excess of the wealth accumulated by the other States of America. In twenty years' experience the result had been that the savings of the people in the banks of these six States, where manufactures were carried on, amounted to something like $1,400,000,000, whereas the savings of the people in the thirty-one other States, including the nine Territories, only amounted to $600,000,000. That was a fact to which he would also call the attention of the hon member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), when he accused them of being ignorant of the fact that the United States of America was suffering at the present moment more than any other great commercial country, under the system adopted by them, and that Protection was of little use to any state or country. He would also state, as an incentive to Canadians, that these six manufacturing States employed the labour of nearly two and a half millions of people directly, and of nearly double that number, or five millions, indirectly. He defied the hon. gentleman, with all his knowledge of statistics, to impugn these statements. There was this also in Protection, which the history of the United States, during the last ten years, showed—that, notwithstanding their high protective tariff, the consumers in that country got most of their goods at a cheaper rate than the people of Canada did, while at the same time they kept their money in their own country. His hon. friend could not deny that they paid more in Canada for some of these goods under their comparative Free-trade, while in paying for these commodities they sent their money abroad. That was just the difference; and, by encouraging manufactures, employing their people and keeping their money at home, the United States had paid the interest on their vast accumulation of debt, notwithstanding they had among themselves, during these last ten years, a war so great as to be without precedent in the history of the world.

Mr. MILLS: Does the hon. gentleman say that we pay more in Canada than they do in the United States?

Mr. ROBINSON: We do pay more for some goods.

Mr. MILLS: Then Canada is not a slaughter market.

Mr. ROBINSON said we paid more for a certain class of goods, but the hon. gentleman must recollect that we paid our money to foreigners, while the United States kept their money at home. The statistics of iron, notwithstanding the bankruptcy of the United States, as alleged by the hon. member, showed that the product of iron during the past year was double the amount it was in any year previous to the war, while the production of iron for the last year in the old country, had become so diminished that it had created some alarm, and they were inquiring there how it was that the United States, under their protective system, had produced so large a quantity of iron and steel, as cheaply as produced in England, while under their Free-trade system they found not only that their market in foreign goods was growing less, but that they were being greatly interfered with at home. How was it, if Free-trade was such a popular doctrine, that it was now boldly impeached in the old country? How was it that it was necessary now for the statesmen of the old country, one after another, to repeat—which they did not do some three or four years ago—that there was, after all, something very valuable in this system of Free-trade? The workmen there had begun to see differently, and great discontent was spreading among the working classes in the old country. In a speech made the other day by Lord Hartington, the Liberal leader, he was forced to declare that the workmen of the old country were not in favour of this freedom of commerce, as it was called, and their numbers were beginning to make them formidable. If this statement were true, and if, while America was gaining in her commerce, old England was getting behindhand, the hon. gentleman should do something else besides taunting the Opposition side of the House with being ignorant of facts of which it might, with greater truth, be said that he himself was ignorant. As against this steady development of policy in the United States which had done so much for that country, what had they in Canada to show? Nothing, except an obstinate adherence to a policy here which had already destroyed their tea trade and their sugar trade, and which was ruinous to other trades, and which had thrown out of employment some 400 people in Montreal, who were at work in a refinery there. These were facts which the working people in this country were now beginning to consider. They saw that, not only their present, but their future support depended upon the policy which the Government of this country might adopt in reference to the principle of Protection or Free-trade. He knew it was said by some of the friends of the present Ministry that they had made this a very cheap country to live in. It might be so;

no one could deny the fact that it was so cheap that the workingmen could not now get an honest day's wages for an honest day's work. While this lasted, there was little use talking about the cheapness of commodities. How was it that hundreds—he should not exaggerate if he said thousands—of our artizans were now employed in factories in the United States, and supporting that Government, when, if justice were done to them, they would be here in support of our factories and our Government? A good deal had been said touching the position of the hon. the Minister of Militia (Mr. Jones), and a correspondence had been exhibited which would strike the people of this country with astonishment. The militia of our country were a bold, high-spirited and sensitive people; and he believed they would resent the attitude of the present Minister of Militia, on the occasion referred to. He would not have adverted to it had the hon. the Minister expressed the slightest regret for the language he had used. He believed that at many a fireside of militiamen in this country, for months and years to come, that language of the gentleman who was at present at the head of the militia, would be quoted only to be condemned. They all knew the regard which not only the militia, but the people of this country had for that flag about which the hon. the Minister had so flippantly talked. The history of this country taught him that, in trying times, the militia breathed the breath of true liberty into the people of this country, and by their gallant conduct, had inspired the rest of the community with a spirit which, thank God, still existed; and in proportion to the affection and devotion with which they regarded that flag, a stain upon which they would resent as a wound, would be the distrust and suspicion with which they would regard the Ministry who had appointed the gentleman who now held the high post of Minister of Militia. Coming from Ontario, he (Mr. Robinson) also regarded with suspicion the language which the Minister of Militia had used touching the trade of Ontario; particularly when he said that if the people of Nova Scotia required any protection, they required it from the people and commerce of Ontario. If this language represented the true spirit of Nova Scotia, why had they agreed to Confederation, or what was the benefit to be acquired from it? He hoped that the hon. gentleman had also used this language in a time of excitement, and would yet regret it. Did he believe that it would be better for Nova Scotia to deal with the United States than to try and encourage a commerce between the two Provinces? There was little doubt that, with good laws, such as prevailed in other States united together, and such as ought to prevail in this country, the flour and provisions of Ontario would be taken down to supply the wants of the people of Nova Scotia; who, in return, would furnish us with their coal and give steady employment to the 5,000 men now in their coal mines, and to that capital which was now lying stagnant. Something had been said touching the result of the late elections which had been held not only in Ontario, but in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; and, although they had been called together for no other purpose than to discuss the ordinary affairs of the country, the people had, during the recess, taken the liberty of discussing the misdeeds of the Ministry in a way not to be mistaken, by electing gentlemen opposed to their policy. There was no free country in which a Ministry, taking possession of power in the triumphant way in which the gentlemen opposite did four years ago, had been rebuffed by the people in the way that they had been. The popular sentiment had so changed that eighteen constituencies had reversed their verdict, and several Ministers had themselves been defeated. The time was coming when members on the Opposition side would have an opportunity of arraigning the policy of the Government before the people. They had to appeal to their constituencies, and ask them whether they approved the shifting and uncertain policy of the Government in the construction of the Pacific Railroad; whether the practices of the gentlemen opposite had been equal to their pretensions at the time they took office. They had to ask the people whether they approved of such transactions as the Lachine Canal affair, the steel rail purchase, the Georgian Bay Railroad and other matters. For himself, he believed that, during the time Sir John A. Macdonald held power, the people of this country were prosperous; that there was then a fair day's wages paid for a fair day's work, but now all this had changed. Their manufactories were being crippled, and their artizans' wages cut down, and their comforts diminished; and he thought the time was coming when the people of this country, when the question was put to them, would decide in favour of the policy pursued by the right hon. gentleman who so ably led the members now in Opposition, and the Liberal-Conservative party in the country; and that they would say the present Government had falsified the principles with which they came into power, and had done a great injustice, not only to the position which they occupied, but to the vital interests of the working men, and to the electors of the Dominion of Canada.

MR. ROBINSON.

Mr. Fiset said that, in rising to make a few remarks, he had no intention of following the example of several hon. gentlemen who had said the same thing, and nevertheless had spoken for an hour, and even longer. He had been glad to hear the explanations of the hon. member for Levis with regard to what that hon. gentleman had said concerning the hon. member for Charlevoix. If, indeed, those remarks bore the meaning which some hon. members of the Opposition had given them, they could not be approved of, and, as a supporter of the Government, he, in such a case, considered it his duty to disavow all personal responsibility for them. He was far from approving of the manner in which this discussion had been carried on since the commencement of this debate. He believed that the country had little to gain from it; in fact, what had they seen? They had seen hon. members rise and accuse and reproach each other with matters which were almost personal to themselves. And then the religious question had been dragged into the discussion. He did not think that this was the place for it, since both the Conservative and Liberal press in the Province of Quebec no longer treated of this issue, and no longer connected it with political differences. It seemed to him, that the press of the country in this respect, presented an excellent example; and the gentlemen who had the honour of sitting in the House ought to follow and ought not to debate it there; while, Christians and Catholics as they were, in the Province of Quebec, they ought to submit to the decisions of the clergy in spiritual matters. Hon. gentlemen had also spoken of the Amnesty and New Brunswick School questions, and of Protection. No mention was made of the Amnesty and School questions in the Address; but, nevertheless, it was permitted to hon. gentlemen, in relation to the Address, to introduce any issue whatever in the discussion. He would say one word about the Amnesty question, which had been discussed at great length, during a long time past. He remembered perfectly the circumstances in which they were situated at the time. In agreement with some hon. gentleman who supported the Government, but one of whom had since passed into Opposition, he had steadily laboured to obtain the most favourable possible solution of this question. Perceiving, nevertheless, that it was impossible to secure a complete amnesty, he had been forced to accept a partial amnesty, considering that such an amnesty was better than none at all. Such an amnesty was granted; and, for his part, he believed that all that could have been obtained had been accorded them. The same was true with regard to the school question; and if they had supported, in 1874, the amendment proposed in this regard by the Hon. Mr. Cauchon, it was because this amendment had received the support of a high religious authority; and was it possible to have settled this matter otherwise? He did not think so, though he might be wrong. It was not enough to hurl reproaches at the Government and say that they had not settled these questions as they should have done, but hon. members who made these attacks ought also to indicate the means by which a better solution could have been arrived at. Had these hon.

gentlemen done so? No; they certainly had not. With regard to Protection, he believed that it would come before the House at a later date. The Government was charged with not having taken measures to lessen the effects of the commercial crisis which now effected the country; but he believed that this was unjust. We were suffering less severely from this crisis than England and the United States; and if such a charge was well founded here, was it not well founded in a greater degree with reference to the Imperial Government, for England was in a worse state, in this relation, than was our country, while the same observation was true with regard to the Government of the United States for a similar reason. The members of the National party were accused of inconsistency on this question, because in 1872 they advocated Protection. But he knew that, in the county of Temiscouata, and in the county of Rimouski, which he represented, this issue had not entered into the contest that year. Nevertheless, the members of this party were said to be inconsistent, and, under the circumstances, they ought to see whether the hon. gentlemen who made these charges were themselves consistent. In 1874, when the Government raised the duties from 15 to 17½ per cent., the members of the Opposition and the Conservative press of Quebec raised the cry that the taxes were being increased, and this was made a cause of censure against the Government; and these gentlemen said that the Government, when in Opposition, had promised to reduce the taxes when they obtained office; while, on the contrary, on this consummation, they had advanced the rate of taxation. This accusation had gone from one end of the Province of Quebec, at least, to the other, and had been circulated by the Conservative press. But now these gentlemen were not satisfied with 17½ per cent., they desired 20 or 25 per cent., and perhaps a higher rate levied, though in 1874, they had blamed the Government for increasing the duties 2½ per cent. These gentlemen who accused the members of the National party of inconsistency, had begun by being inconsistent themselves. He would not pass in review the different paragraphs of the Speech from the Throne, but he would mention one of them that contained information which grieved him; this was that His Excellency Lord Dufferin was about to leave us. Hon. gentlemen more eloquent than himself had stated what a wide and deep feeling of regret would be felt in this country when His Excellency quitted the Dominion, and he knew that in the Province of Quebec, where His Excellency had known how to win for himself the esteem and friendship of all parties and all nationalities, the departure of His Excellency would be generally looked upon almost in the light of a calamity.

MR. Fiset.

MR. BÉCHARD said that hon. gentlemen sitting on both sides of the House had drawn the discussion to a question concerning which, it seemed to him, he should say something. He had not to ascertain whether one party more than the other had solicited the assistance of the clergy in connection with the elections, and hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House had seemed to repudiate, in the course of the debate, the responsibility of having done such a thing; and, as each placed this responsibility on the shoulders of its opponents, it consequently appeared to him that they had a right to conclude that on this point, at least, both were agreed. This was ground on which they could meet each other, as both parties pretended that they should carry on their political struggles without seeking the intervention of that venerable body, the clergy. He thought they were justified in believing that both sides of the House should regard this question as settled; and he hoped that in the future neither party would merit the reproach of having appealed to the clergy to intervene in the elections. An hon. gentleman, during the discussion, had said that the programme of the Liberal party was the programme which had been laid down by the Avenir. Now the Avenir was a paper which was published in the city of Montreal twenty-five or thirty years ago, and he considered that to accuse the Liberal party of endorsing that programme was to do this party a great injustice, and to make a charge which was wanting in sincerity. It was unjust to hold the Liberal party, as it was to-day organized, responsible for writings published twenty-five years ago by a few young and enthusiastic students, and in which philosophical opinions of doubtful orthodoxy were set forth; to do so was to commit an act of injustice, and to pass the limits prescribed by respect for the truth, to as great a degree as it would be to accuse the hon. member for Chateaugay (Hon. Mr. Holton) and Sir Alexander Galt of holding, as their political programme, the Annexationist manifesto which both had signed in 1849. However, he was convinced that there was not an honest man, either in the House or in Canada, who doubted, for an instant, the loyalty of these two gentlemen, and who considered them as being to-day Annexationists. He would say nothing of Amnesty. It had been treated of at length, and his opinion was that the discussion of it could now lead to no practical result. This matter was now settled, and in his judgment it had been settled not in as satisfactory a measure as they could have desired in the Province of Quebec, but nevertheless in as satisfactory a manner as was possible under the circumstances, when they took into consideration the declaration that had been made by the Minister in charge of the Colonial Department on this subject, in which that gentleman had stated that he would not hear of a complete amnesty being granted. After this declaration, he considered they had a right to believe that the Conservative party, if it had been in power at the time, would not have settled this question in any better way. It was useless to try and raise this issue in connection with the battle that was to be fought at the approaching elections, and he thought it would not be resuscitated. It was painful for him to reply to an insult addressed by an hon. member of the Opposition to the hon. gentlemen representing the Province of Quebec, sitting on his side of the House. He alluded to his hon. friend the member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), who had gone so far as to treat them as sheep. The hon. gentleman said that upon the hustings they were lions, but that in the House they were sheep. They had, however, at all events, an advantage over the hon. gentleman; and it was this—the hon. gentleman was not a lion anywhere. He (Mr. Desjardins) had neither the appearance nor carriage of one, and whoever looked at him could not discover the guise of that noble animal. The Government was charged with being responsible for the commercial crisis which prevailed in this country, and he was astonished that the hon. gentlemen opposite did not also hold the Government responsible for the crisis which existed in the United States, England and the rest of the world. This would be clearly absurd, and it was as absurd to say that the Government were responsible for the commercial depression that existed in this country. Great stress was laid on this point; he had heard it repeated on the hustings, and he had no doubt that it would also be repeated at the next election. It was argued that, if we had changed the Government, we would have been prosperous, and that if we changed the Government now, the prosperity of the country would return, and the working classes would have bread again; and when he heard this pretension he could not help being reminded of like declarations made on the part of distinguished demagogues in another country, and which had resulted in the assembling of 200,000 men who erected barricades in the city of Paris, a preliminary step to the overthrow of the throne.

Mr. THOMPSON (Cariboo) said the discussion had travelled over so many diverging paths, that he would not weary the House with any personal allusions, or by going at any length into the Resolution before the House. In fact, he should have said nothing whatever in reference to the Address proposed, had it not been that he could not sit in silence and allow it to go forth to the world that the Address proposed was received with satisfaction on the Pacific coast of the Dominion, although he presumed it mattered little to the other Provinces of the Dominion or to the Ministry what they in British Columbia thought, or what they cared. They had always been treated with so much contempt, and their wrongs and grievances had been slighted so much, that it made little matter whether they were pleased with the Address or not. Since the accession of the present Ministry to power some four years ago, their Province had suffered under a worse incubus than that to which reference was made in the ninth paragraph, as being sustained by the people of the North-West. British Columbia was visited with a worse incubus than Sitting Bull proved to the poor settlers in the North-West; and while he fully concurred in the hope expressed in that paragraph—that such arrangements would be effected as would lead to a permanent and peaceful settlement of that warlike individual, who smoked his pipe of peace in our dominions so calmly, he also concurred with the hon. gentleman from West Toronto (Mr. Robinson), and hoped that through the results of the next general election the last line of that paragraph with regard to our friend Sitting Bull might also apply to the gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches, “and thus relieve Canada of a source of uneasiness and a heavy expenditure.” He must regret that the allusions contained in the 10th paragraph of the Address with reference to the survey of the Pacific Railway were not more definite. They were told that these surveys had been made—

“That a complete instrumental survey of the route, by the valleys of the North Thompson and Lower Fraser Rivers, has been made, with a view to ascertain, definitely, whether that route presents more favourable features than the routes already surveyed to Dean Inlet and Bute Inlet respectively; and that it is believed that the additional information now obtained will enable His Excellency's Government to determine which route is the most advantageous from Tête Jaune Cache to the sea; and that we thank His Excellency for the promise that full information will be laid before us at an early day, of the season's work in this and other directions.”

Now this information should have been given two years ago. From the information which had been placed before them in 1876, they were led to believe that the line would have been located that year, and they were now only informed that when the reports were brought down, they would learn which of the routes would be the most advantageous; but the Government had not told them what they proposed to do when they had ascertained this. The Government gave them no guarantee that any steps would be taken to build the line either by one route or by another. In fact, the people of British Columbia were under the impression—he hoped it was an erroneous one—that the present Government had no intention of building this road at all. He only trusted that the papers, etc., that would be brought down, would show that they were wrong in entertaining this idea. The general belief in British Columbia—and he regretted to say that he agreed in this opinion—was that the Government's only purpose in putting off these surveys from year to year, and in not now laying information before them as to what they intended to do, was simply for the purpose of procrastinating the time until the general elections, and then throwing up their hands and saying that they did not intend to build the railway at all. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. Cockburn) had that evening congratulated the Government on the result of these surveys, and had expressed the hope that they would begin the work by building the Georgian Bay Branch at once; but the people of British Columbia considered that if the Government commenced to build the line, or any portion of it, work ought to be commenced simultaneously on the completion of the surveys at each end of the road, and that the line starting from the Pacific coast should be commenced at once. They had now waited for this in vain from year to year, and it was only hope deferred again and again. They should, however, know more about it, he supposed, when the concluding portion of the paragraph was carried out, and further information laid before Parliament. In the next paragraph, they were told to accept with thanks His Excellency's congratulations concerning the abundant harvest that had been reaped in all quarters of the Dominion. He only hoped that there was more truth in this than in a great many other statements which had been placed before the House during the present discussion; and that if such was the case, its results would prove permanent. He thought that hon. gentleman who had congratulated the House and country upon the bountiful harvest that had been reaped, might have travelled in thought across the continent and made some reference to the abundant harvest which it was anticipated would be reaped in another year from the mountains of British Columbia, where last year they had made such discoveries as he believed should, in some measure, attract the attention of the Government. However, the Administration was not much disposed to assist them in British Columbia; they were left to do the best they could to help themselves; and Providence, it was said, assisted those who helped themselves. They looked forward to favourable results in this relation. Members of the Ministry, from the Premier down, had of late travelled through the various cis-montane Provinces, attending picnics and political gatherings and blowing their own trumpets; but no Minister of the Crown during that time, he need not remind the House, had ever crossed the continent, or cast his shadow on the waters of the Pacific. The only Minister who ever did so was the Minister of Public Works of the late Government, who visited British Columbia six or seven years ago; and that hon. gentleman had given the results of his mission in a work which, at the time, was widely circulated throughout the country. He thought that if some one of the present Ministers had visited that portion of the Dominion, he would have derived some satisfaction; but, no; these hon. gentlemen and the party by whom they were supported, had, in the first place, opposed the admission of British Columbia into the Union, and ever since they had done their utmost to retard the advancement of that Province; but thanks to the indomitable energy of some of the old pioneers who had first settled in that inhospitable sea of mountains,—as those hon. gentlemen would persist in calling British Columbia,—they had now made such discoveries as to show that they had in their Province, and in their mountains, inhospitable and barren as they might be, such resources of wealth as to prove, in their opinion, at least—and this they hoped to be able to establish in the course of a year or two, and this was due to their own exertions and not to the assistance of the Ministry—that the District of Cariboo alone would equal, if not excel, any Province in the harvest contributed to the Treasury of the Dominion and the world at large. And to do this, they would trust to nothing, save to their own strong arms and to the energy of their people. They would ask no assistance from the Government, and give the Administration no thanks for anything they had done, because they (the Government) had done nothing to assist the people of their Province when they required a helping hand.

MR. THOMPSON.

MR. GOUDGE said that the statement of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Robinson) required on his part some reference and an answer. Although he had not had the pleasure of being present when the hon. the Minister of Militia delivered the very excellent speech he made to the House, he (Mr. Goudge) had read it in the newspapers. With regard to the flag story, he thought that any reference to it on the part of any hon. member in terms contrary to the spirit of the explanation which had been given by the hon. the Minister of Militia was improper and unbecoming. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) had made a full explanation, and he was convinced from the report he had read that this explanation had been perfectly explicit and satisfactory to the House. The hon. gentleman had completely exonerated himself from any charge of disloyalty; and in this connection he (Mr. Goudge) would refer to the fact that a member of the late Government, a gentleman who had since passed away, Sir George E. Cartier, was once a rebel to the Crown, though he afterwards became a member of this House and of the Government, connected with the party that had made the present charges. Hon. gentlemen opposite had referred to the conduct and language of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). In connection with this flag story, he (Mr. Goudge) begged to draw the attention of the House to the strong language used by the late Mr. Howe, during the Confederation troubles, stating that he and his sons would take up arms in the event of Confederation being forced upon the Province of Nova Scotia; yet it would be found that hon. gentlemen opposite, notwithstanding all the charges of disloyalty against Mr. Howe, had no hesitation in taking that hon. gentleman into their confidence and asking him to accept positions under the Crown. But the matter did not end there. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), at Halifax, and also in this House, had charged the Minister of Militia with disloyalty. He (Mr. Goudge) desired to draw the attention of the House to the statement made by the hon. member himself while a Minister of the Crown, not in connection with the Dominion Parliament, but in connection with the Government of Nova Scotia, and to the fact that the circumstances under which the statement was made were not those under which the statement was made—if it was made—by the hon. the Minister of Militia. The statement, if made by the hon. the Minister of Militia, was made under very peculiar circumstances. Nova Scotia had, without her consent, been deprived of her Constitution; they applied to the British Crown to have that Constitution returned, but they met with a refusal; and he did not think, even if the statement attributed to the hon. the Minister of Militia had been made, that it could be charged against the hon. member, it having been made in the heat of the moment. Though he (Mr. Goudge) would not yield for a moment to any person in his loyalty to Her Majesty's person or her Crown, yet, at the same time, he could not avoid saying that there might be circumstances with regard to the country of ones birth, and the Constitution under which one might live, such as to lead a man to use such an expression as the hon. the Minister of Militia was alleged to have used, and yet say nothing improper. He would draw attention to the language used by the hon. member for Cumberland at the time he was a member of the Legislature of Nova Scotia; not made under such circumstances as the statement was said to have been made by the hon. the Minister of Militia, but made at a time when there was nothing beyond the ordinary rivalry between constitutional parties, and when the hon. member for Cumberland was anxious to occupy the Treasury benches. The question was whether Mr. Howe should be leader of the Government or the hon. member for Cumberland should occupy this position, and become one of the Ministers of the Crown. In the organ of the party of that day, the Colonist, of which the hon. member for Cumberland was said to be editor, or, if not editor, to have completely and entirely inspired its utterances, was found an article, an extract from which he would read. The circumstances were the following:—The Opposition were anxious to occupy the Treasury benches; they thought they had a majority in the House, and without waiting until the House met to decide, by constitutional vote, the question of confidence or want of confidence in the Government, they appealed, by petition, to His Excellency Lord Mulgrave for a dissolution of the House, and because His Excellency preferred to wait the constitutional period, and did not accede to their wishes, the following language was used by that paper:—

MR. GOUDGE.

“It is our unanswerable arguments, which instead of meeting like men who have a just cause, they by sheltering themselves beneath the gabardine of the Lieutenant Governor, and then cry out from their dignified hiding place: ‘Hands off, don't touch Her Majesty's crinoline.’”

Then came the following:—

“But don't say a word—the Prince is coming—let bribery and corruption flourish in the land,—permit a Government to be sustained by perjury,—look coolly on while the Legislature of your country and all your most cherished institutions are brought into contempt; behold with indifference the prerogative of Majesty, to which, at such a crisis in our history, we naturally turn for redress, dragging in the dirt, while the voice of the people is stifled. * * * Lord Mulgrave may slumber and fancy that all is serene, and that a spiritless people will tamely submit to see a position maintained by perjury rewarded by the royal favour. Time will tell.”

This occurred in 1860, the year of the visit of the Prince of Wales. The Prince of Wales being about to arrive, His Excellency had not considered it desirable to convene the Legislature, but sent an invitation to the members of the Assembly desiring them to be present and pay their respects in person to the Prince upon his arrival. The invitation was as follows :—

“ Though it has been considered unnecessary to summon the Legislature at a season which may be inconvenient, Lord Mulgrave commands me to say that he will be exceedingly glad if all the members of both branches of the Legislature can visit the capital for a few days to express in person the sentiments embodied in their address of last Session, and to take part in the festivities with which it is intended to greet His Royal Highness.”

The following was an extract from the reply of the hon. member for Cumberland :—

“ I feel compelled, as one of that body, (the Legislature) to decline respectfully the invitation to Her Majesty's Dockyard, with which I have been favoured.”

He appealed to the House if, under the circumstances under which they were written, and the time given for their consideration, the sentiments of disloyalty expressed in those words were not far stronger than those which were said to have been uttered by the hon. the Minister of Militia, or any person in Nova Scotia, during the exciting period through which the Province had passed at the time of Confederation. He thought it came with an ill grace from hon. gentlemen opposite, in view of the facts to which he had referred, to charge any member on the Government side of the House with being disloyal or uttering disloyal sentiments. Reference had been made by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Robinson), to the speech made by the hon. the Minister of Militia during the election campaign, in which he was reported to have said that, “ In Nova Scotia, they needed protection as against the Province of Ontario.” The people of that Province (Nova Scotia) were now in the Dominion of Canada, and they were obliged to make the best of it, and, therefore, whatever might be the result, beneficial or otherwise, they must submit; but he desired to place before the House the facts in connection with the case, and he had no doubt that, after being in possession of those facts, the House would see that, as a community, the people of that Province had not been benefitted commercially by their entrance into the Confederation, and that there was very good reason why Nova Scotia should protest against any increase of duties for protective purposes. While they might be obliged, for the purposes of revenue, to submit to an increased tariff, they should not for protective purposes. When they entered Confederation, the duties in Nova Scotia were ten per cent., and they were sufficient for all purposes, including payment of the Civil List and the building of railways, roads and bridges; at the same time, their credit abroad was as good as that of any of the British Provinces. Upon entering the Dominion, their duties were increased to 15 per cent., the difference in which, as an hon. member had remarked, was sufficient to complete the Pictou Railway. The fact that the Province of Nova Scotia had been compelled to pay fifty per cent. more duty upon all dutiable articles than it had previously paid, was one of the objections to the Union. What was the consequence of the increase of duty? Instead of, as before, going into the markets of the world and buying in the cheapest, they had been obliged, in consequence of the increase in duty, to buy their goods in Canada instead of spending their gold abroad, where they took their wares to sell. During the investigation in connection with the coal trade held last Session by a committee of the House, of which he (Mr. Goudge) was a member, among other questions asked of one of the witnesses was the following: “ What is the value of trade as between the Upper and Lower Provinces?” The answer was given—“ At least eight millions.” He said to the witness—“ What proportion of that eight millions is contributed by the Upper Provinces?” The reply was, that out of eight millions, six millions were contributed by the Upper Provinces. That was, the Lower Provinces took six millions from the Upper Provinces, and sent to them in return two millions. Deducting the two millions from the six millions, there was a balance to be paid, in gold, of four millions, to the old Province of Canada. That was one of the benefits which accrued to the Lower Provinces from their connection with the Upper Provinces in the matter of Confederation. The trade of the Lower Provinces was mainly made up from the fisheries, the shipping, lumbering, plaster and coal; and, while there might be some benefit arising to them from being in the Confederation, yet, looking at the commercial aspect of the case, they were compelled to admit that, on the termination of ten years they were, financially, not benefitted by the transaction, but were in a worse condition; and, moreover, that any increase of the tariff for protective purposes meant that the Lower Provinces should pay a higher price for their goods than hitherto, without reaping any corresponding advantage. With regard to the manufacturers of the Lower Provinces, in the matter of boots and shoes, for example, they had not to fear competition from England or the United States, but from the Upper Provinces. He had no sectional feeling, but, on the contrary, desired to see the country one in feeling; and he was happy to know that the exasperated feeling that existed in regard to Confederation, had in some degree passed away. But, if it was entirely to be removed, and we were to become one in feeling and trade, it could only be by each section of the Confederation deferring in some degree to the wants and necessities of the other sections. Nova Scotia, it was true, was not a very large portion of the Dominion; but, having been brought in unwillingly, and its trade being principally abroad, and in natural products more particularly, he thought a great deal of consideration should be given to it and the other Maritime Provinces in the matter of the arrangement of the tariff, and that they should not be obliged to pay increased duties for protective purposes. They might be willing and obliged to do it for revenue, but not for protective purposes; and if it was insisted upon by the advocates of protection, they would have to urge a policy in a contrary direction and ask for a lower tariff. He hoped, indeed, that, when opportunity offered and the revenue was in a flourishing condition, instead of advancing the tariff, the Government would be prepared to lower it. What was the question which had been agitating the country and making the principal cry of the party in Opposition for the past year or two? It was that of the necessity for an increase of duties for protective purposes. Yet, at the last meeting held in the city of Ottawa of the Dominion Board of Trade,—a body whose tendency, he had reason to believe, had always been towards Protection—they came to the conclusion, and passed a resolution embodying it, that the present tariff of 17½ per cent. was a fair one and such as should afford the manufacturers of the country sufficient protection. He, therefore, hoped that no hon. member, looking at the whole interests of the country, would seek an advance in that direction. It had often been stated that the present Government were rapidly losing their hold upon the affections of the people of the Dominion; but, from his knowledge, he was aware that, in the Province of Nova Scotia, in the constituency which he had the honour to represent, such was far from being the fact; on the contrary, the Administration occupied a higher position in the opinions and affections of the people than at any previous time. True, it had been stated, in a letter said to have been sent from Windsor to the organ of the Conservative party in Nova Scotia, and used a day or two before the last election in Halifax,—probably with a view to influencing it,—that he (Mr. Goudge) had been through the county—probably referring to Hants—and, having heard of the defeat of Mr. Vail and the probable defeat of Mr. Jones, had stated that he had come to the conclusion that the days of the present Government were numbered, and that he had decided to link his fortunes with the Opposition party. He had been through the county during the last two months, and he was glad to find that, so far from having discovered such a state of feeling as had been reported, the people were generally satisfied with the administration of public affairs by the Government, and he had every reason to believe that they would return a representation to support the present Administration.

MR. GOUDGE.

He believed that the state of feeling which he had indicated extended beyond the county of Hants; and that Nova Scotia, when appealed to, if it had any regard for its own interests and for good government, would return men who would support the present Government. A paragraph in the Speech with which he was especially pleased was that with reference to temperance, a subject that had much engaged the attention of the people of the Dominion, and at no time in the history of the country had it occupied a more important place than at the present. He was glad to learn that the Supreme Court, at its last session, decided on the question of jurisdiction, and, in consequence, the Government had inserted that paragraph in the Speech with the view of presenting to the House its views upon the subject, or, at least, that the subject of temperance should engage the attention of the House. He had not yet had an opportunity of learning in what direction the legislation upon this subject would be framed; but, having every confidence that the Government had the subject at heart and desired to see the progress of temperance in the Dominion, and that any measure they might bring forward would be of such a character as would forward the interests of temperance, he desired to leave it to their wisdom to present to Parliament such a resolution or Bill as might assist the progress of that great movement.

Mr. PERRY said he had been amazed that hon. members should have introduced religious questions into politics in the course of this debate. He trusted that a resolution would be placed on the Journals so that language such as the House had heard during the past two days would be entirely abolished. It was disgraceful that religion should be brought down to the level of politics, and it was desirable such action should cease. An attack had been made on Prince Edward Island, from which he came, on the ground that the hon. the Premier had not been received as might have been expected by the people of that Province. He (Mr. Perry) was present on all the occasions of the receptions tendered to the hon. the First Minister, with the exception of that in his own county. He happened to be in Halifax on the arrival of the hon. the Premier and accompanied him to Souris. When he came to Mount Stewart, he was surprised at the large meeting and hearty cheers. At Souris, although the time for organizing the meeting was very short, the meeting was attended by two thousand people and was on a grand scale. The following day the hon. the First Minister held a great meeting at Charlottetown, at which he (Mr. Perry) had the honour of being present; the hon. the Premier made a speech, but it could not be supposed that he could give an outline of the policy of the Government of which he was the leader. When cheers were proposed for the hon. the Premier, they were unanimously given by the crowd. The same evening a banquet was given to the hon. gentleman, which was attended by the great majority of the wealth, respectability, and intelligence of Charlottetown, a circumstance to which he could testify, having been present. He would not attempt to defend the hon. the First Minister, because the hon. gentleman was well able to do it himself. He merely made these remarks for the information of the House, and in order to place Prince Edward Island in a right position before hon. members. Special reference was made in the Speech to the Fisheries Commission which sat at Halifax last summer. He was present and gave evidence before the Commissioners with respect to the advantages which the Americans obtained from fishing near the shores of the Island. He was gratified with the manner in which the Commission was conducted; and he was convinced from what he saw there that much was due to the evidence given from Prince Edward Island for obtaining the award decided on by the Commissioners. The Hon. Mr. Davies, who had charge of the evidence from the Island, had performed his duties to the entire satisfaction of all parties concerned; and to the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was due a great deal of the credit of having brought about the award, as the evidence submitted from Prince Edward Island had been largely the means of securing the award of five millions and a half of dollars. He hoped the Government would see that the public wants of the island were attended to in a proper manner. He was surprised to hear hon. members from Prince Edward Island state that a reaction had taken place on the Island. A reaction took place there many years ago, as far back as 1848. At that time the Conservatives had full sway. They even went so far that, when the Liberals attempted to settle the land question in a fair and equitable manner, and raise the land tax of the Province sixpence per hundred acres, they bribed the Governor of the day to back up the landlords. In 1851, the Conservatives opposed the measure in favour of Responsible Government. In 1852, when the Land Purchase Bill was passed in order to enable every man on the Island to become a freeholder, the Conservatives opposed that measure. In 1856, they opposed the Franchise Act, and, two years afterwards, when the Compensation Act was passed, the Conservatives opposed that measure. Since 1851, the Liberals had possessed a majority on the Island, and had it at the present day. Hon. gentlemen had been pleased to say that at the next general election six members would be returned from the Island to support the present Opposition. Reference, however, must have been made to some other island than that of Prince Edward, perhaps Anticosti. He was satisfied such remarks did not apply to the Island from which he came, at all events not to the county which he had the honour to represent, for it could not return one Conservative; on the contrary, it would return two staunch Reformers to support the Reform Government, and it was impossible for the county to do otherwise. They had been identified with Liberal principles since 1848, and were becoming stronger every day. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Pope) did not face himself or his colleague at the last general election, but sent down two of his friends and supporters. The result was that he defeated the strongest of those candidates by 1,200 votes. He would run at the next general election in company with his present colleague, and some electors who had voted against them at the last election would give them their support. That was what he called a reaction, and a reaction in the right direction. It was impossible for the majority of the people of the Island to become Conservatives, for they were naturally Liberals and intended to continue so. It was well known that the two great questions of the day were Free-trade and Protection. The policy of the present Government was one of Free-trade. The policy of the Opposition had been, as far as he could understand, Protection; which meant that the consumers would have to pay more for the articles which they consumed. The hon. member for Queen's county advocated Free-trade, and yet, notwithstanding all that he had said, he belonged to the Opposition, whose policy was Protection. If the hon. gentleman said he would send six members to support the present Government, then he (Mr. Perry) could understand him; but if he said he would send six members here to support the Protection policy,—to support the policy of the late Government,—then he did not understand him. He said he was going to return six members, but the hon. gentleman would have hard enough times to get himself returned. The Examiner newspaper, published in Charlottetown, which was supposed to be the organ of the Conservatives, and the Protectionist paper of Summerside, called the Summerside Progress, had, of late, changed their policy; they saw that that policy only made the Opposition less popular. When these gentlemen came forward and declared their policy to be a Free-trade policy, that was the policy he would support. He did not care so much for parties, whether Government or Opposition; he believed in action, he did not believe in arguing. He did not believe in Orders in Council, such as they had in 1873, and nothing done. When the Government said they would build a lighthouse, he wanted the lighthouse built; when they said they would build a pier, or a breakwater, he wanted it built; he did not want any of these humbugging Orders in Council, which were a mere delusion, passed for the purpose of catching votes. He wanted an honest policy.

Mr. PERRY.

Mr. BAIN said that, in rising to address the House, he did not propose to add much to the stock of information they had got; but, as the Opposition had intimated that they did not intend to propose any amendment, and as they had systematically followed a certain line—he he could not help feeling that it was only justice to himself and to his constituents that he should, in a few words, express his views with respect to some of the resolutions referred to in the Address, in reply to His Excellency's Speech from the Throne. So far as the first clause was concerned, which referred to the fact that they were called together simply for the discharge of the ordinary business of the country, he thought it patent on the face of it that they had not just now any of those great political issues that divided political parties in years gone by, and which were on those occasions burning questions; therefore, he could coincide with the Government in putting that statement before the House. But the Opposition were evidently determined that, if they had no great political issues to divide them, they would take very good care that the party lines should not be obliterated in consequence of that, but that they would keep up a distinctive organization, by which they had always been known as Conservatives, and that their line of policy would be one of continuous attack upon the Government and upon their measures. In respect to the reference that was made in the next clause to His Excellency's visit to the North-West Province of Manitoba, he concurred entirely with the remarks made by the seconder of the Address. While he regretted that this was probably the last occasion in which this Parliament would be opened by His Excellency Lord Dufferin as Governor-General, yet he rejoiced to remember that these visits that he had made throughout the length and breadth of the Provinces would, at a future day, bear fruit that would be of benefit to us as a Dominion; because it was manifest that a gentleman who had taken so much pains as Lord Dufferin had to inform himself of the wants and necessities and capacities of the various Provinces constituting this Dominion, with the tact and versatility he had displayed in reaching various classes of the community, would be eminently valuable in dealing with Colonial affairs at a future period in the Imperial Parliament. In respect to the efforts referred to in the following clauses of the Address, in promoting the exhibition of Canadian manufactured products at the Exhibition in Sydney, New South Wales, as well as at Paris, these efforts had been so far eminently successful, and he was happy to find that both sides of the House concurred in giving a fair meed of praise to the Government for the efforts they had made in that connection. While there were many things in connection with their line of policy which the Opposition had attacked on public grounds, yet, in looking at the efforts of the Government to introduce in these distant countries the productions of the Dominion, he felt that their policy in that respect was one that would commend itself to the calm consideration of everyone that had the welfare and the future prosperity of this Dominion at heart. They had heard a great deal about the necessity of building up our local manufactures, and they had had pointed out to them the progress that the United States had made in consequence of the line of policy that had been there pursued. He remembered at the present moment that our interests were wide and varied; that we were not alone a manufacturing or an agricultural Dominion, such as the western Province with which he was more immediately connected might claim to be. He remembered that down on the shores of the Atlantic they had a hardy and vigorous population, who had all their lives long followed maritime pursuits, and had found an outlet for their energies in sailing. He thought, when the Ministry of the day took those steps to secure an exhibition of our manufactures in those distant countries, they were doing just the very best thing to build up the future prosperity of the Dominion. He conceived that any steps they could take to develop our merchant marine and shipping interests, to keep up that inter-communication with distant countries, by which they would take from us our natural and manufactured products and give us in exchange their natural and manufactured products, would go to build up the substantial welfare of the Dominion at large. He was no friend of that particular policy—that Chinese-wall policy—that would exclude anyone from participating in our business connections. He did not believe that the Government of the day would consult the best interests of this Dominion by endeavouring to exclude that inter-communication with other countries which would develop our marine, and give our ships and vessels on the ocean that business which he conceived would be to the best interests of the eastern portion of this country. He could not help thinking that their friends from the west, who were advocating that particular Protection policy, which they were told was one of the planks of the Conservative platform, were not taking into account the whole interests of the Dominion, but were somewhat circumscribing their views to the interests of particular localities. He could not but remember that one of the schemes which was now being actively carried out by the Government, which was endorsed by the country at large, and started by the Administration of his right hon. friend who now led the Opposition,—he referred to the enlargement of our canal system,—was one that had involved us in a very large expenditure. He could not help thinking that that enlargement of our canals, placed alongside and parallel with the extreme tariff of our American friends, was not one that would yield to us any adequate return for the expenditure connected therewith, if we adopted the policy advocated by the Opposition. He could not conceive that we could adopt any policy that would be more agreeable to our friends south of the line, who were actively competing for the carrying trade of the great North-West States, which were now rapidly becoming their chief grain-producing region; he did not think we could more efficiently aid our American neighbours than by adopting the policy that had been suggested by the Opposition. In thus expressing himself in respect to that, he was at the same time quite as far removed from holding those extreme Free-trade views that their friends in Opposition were so particularly anxious to attach to the Government and their supporters on the present occasion. Without alluding to the necessities of this country, that would require a revenue tariff for many years to come, to meet our obligations and enable us to keep our credit good with our creditors outside, he, at the same time, believed that there was a certain meed of protection to which our manufactures were entitled; and he could not help heartily endorsing the action of the Dominion Board of Trade in their recent session in this city, when they passed that resolution expressing their approval of the tariff as it stood, and expressing the opinion that, if the necessities of the Dominion at any future day should require an increased tariff, it should be so arranged as to promote in the best manner the welfare of our manufacturing industries. He could not help thinking, in looking at the interests of the Dominion at large, that the policy of the Government, as thus endorsed by the Dominion Board of Trade, was one that would commend itself to moderate men on both sides of the House. There was another feature in connection with this matter that had been brought prominently before the House, more particularly by the member for North Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) and the member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton). His hon. friend from Centre Wellington seemed to take under his particular care the agricultural population of this Dominion. He did not know what particular line of medicine he proposed to deal out to them that was going to specially facilitate their interests. As an agriculturalist himself—it was the occupation he had been brought up to from his earliest days, and it was the occupation he expected to follow, after he either was driven from political life or ceased from it of his own accord; and from its having been his life-long occupation, it was one in which he had a special personal interest—he could not help thinking it would have been just as wise on the part of that gentleman if he had been a little less anxious to propagate particular nostrums for the curing of what he considered agricultural ills. He could not help thinking that, so far as the agricultural population was concerned, they might be fairly left to attend to their own interests, and might be left to express their own views and sentiments. He had never heard that they had been at all anxious to come before this House and urge Protection in their own particular interests; it had been left entirely to gentlemen such as his hon. friend. Local politicians sometimes said that there were other interests involved as well as the good of the country at large; but he would not say that on this particular occasion they came to the surface. In connection with this same matter he could not help noticing that in another paragraph of the Address reference was made to the development of the North-West Territories and the Province of Manitoba, with the view of attracting in that direction settlers, and giving them better facilities for the improvement of their territory. They were told that,

MR. BAIN.

“As much of the prosperity of the Dominion depends on the rapid settlement of the fertile lands in those territories, it is desirable and necessary to facilitate such settlement as much as possible.”

In his position, as a member of the Committee on Immigration and Colonization, he had had, personally, not a little intercourse with men whose reputation was above suspicion, and who were most intimately acquainted with the wants and capacities of that North-West Territory, and who spoke highly of it; and it was only yesterday that, along with other members of this House, he had had the pleasure of listening, in another Chamber, to a very instructive and interesting address from His Lordship the Bishop of Saskatchewan, in which he expressed very strong views respecting the fertility and capacity of that North-West Territory. These views and sentiments were endorsed by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), who had been for some time chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Colonization. He could not help thinking that, so far as the agricultural population of these older Provinces, and that of the more eastern parts of this Dominion, were concerned, before many years they would be called on to compete with the natural grain productions of that North-West Territory, where, undoubtedly, both wheat and barley, and the staple cereals could be produced at a much less cost than they could in the older settled portions of this Dominion. When his friend from Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) was dilating so fluently, as he always did, in connection with this same protection that he asked should be extended to the Canadian farmer, against the agricultural productions of the United States, he could not help thinking they would have, before very long, to face the enormous production of our fertile prairies of the North-West that must, before many years, largely increase our exports of grain. He was pleased to find this particular paragraph in the Address, because, although the natural productions of that region would compete with them as farmers in the more eastern portion of the country, yet he was satisfied that, if the policy that the present Government maintained in connection with the business of our country was in future carried out, they would have open to them other markets that would yield quite as favourable returns to make their business profitable, which the policy enunciated by his friends in the Opposition would operate against our successfully occupying. While our American cousins were quoted to us as an eminently successful people, by the adoption of an extreme protective tariff, he remembered, looking at it from the agricultural standpoint, that, notwithstanding the extraordinary progress that nation had made in manufacturing, yet they had never been able to overtake the steady increase of agricultural production in that country; and to-day they found his hon. friend from Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) lamenting that American oats were sent into our market from the West, and sold here at 31c. and 32c. per bushel, to the detriment of the farmers here. He also knew that the production of wheat, corn, and other staples of that class in the United States was not dependent upon the home market there for the price that the agriculturists should receive for their productions. The price they received at home was regulated, not by the amount of consumption that had been created by these manufacturing centres, but by the proportion of that surplus production that was placed upon the world's market in England, less the cost of carrying that grain to that market. He could not help thinking that, if these results occurred here, as undoubtedly they did with our American cousins, who shipped a very large amount of surplus grain to the English market, the farmers would have their price regulated by that market; and, if the Western American farmers with their protective tariff had to be content with such prices for their oats as had been quoted by the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), and compelled to put them on our market at such low rates, he could not help thinking that that system was one that we did not want repeated here for our agricultural population, and he thought the policy of the Government was better calculated to promote the interests of the farmers. They found, so far as barley was concerned, both the Canadian and American markets had been glutted this season by over-production; and it was to the fact that commercial men found an outlet for this staple on the world's market in England that they owed the fact that they were realising the price for their barley that they were. When they remembered that the great plains of the North-West would undoubtedly produce cereals at a cheaper rate than they could be produced in the older Provinces, he thought they ought to pause and ask themselves whether the propositions of the member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), or the declarations of the Conservatives at large, were likely to be for the benefit of the agricultural interests of this Dominion. In speaking of the style of Protection which their Opposition friends proposed to accord to the farmer in Canada, he could not help thinking that they sometimes under-estimated the intelligence of the agricultural population, when they told them that the tariff that the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) initiated during the short period of what he called his National Policy, was a tariff that was created in the interest of the agricultural population of this Dominion. At an earlier day, before he embarked in politics, he remembered hearing the millers talking loudly of the benefit that tariff was to the Canadian farmer, and what a clear gain it was to them, this being before they had this intimate connection with the Maritime Provinces which now constituted them a Dominion. But, when he looked into the arrangement of that tariff, it was not so clear to him that it was created at all in the interests of the agricultural population. What were the facts in connection with that matter? He found that, on the great staple of wheat, they had placed a duty of four cents a bushel; but they had not placed exactly an equivalent duty on American flour to make it correspond, but had placed a duty of 25c. a barrel on American flour; thus practically giving the miller a premium of about seven or eight cents on every barrel of flour that he made out of American wheat, rather than out of Canadian wheat. He could not help remembering, when he heard the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Gibbs) promulgating these particular theories, the time when the late Government used to repeat the same thing to the farmers, and tell them they were being protected. He did not appreciate that class of Protection; but he was free to admit that he believed it was the only style of Protection they would be able to realise from the right hon. gentleman who led the Opposition, should any political changes place him again in the control of the affairs of the country. He was satisfied that, so far as the agricultural population of this Dominion were concerned, what they wanted was a fair field and no favour, and to be severely let alone. He believed that, if they began shuffling the dice for the purpose of getting the advantage in this Protection race, they would certainly come out behind. He had no faith in the man that had enunciated this protective theory in the agricultural interest.

MR. BAIN.

So far as this agitation was concerned, it was not commenced by the agricultural population, but it was commenced by such gentlemen as he had referred to. He could not congratulate his friends in Opposition upon the line of policy that they had developed so far. They had, during the past summer, held a series of meetings throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion, in which the political doings of the past had been freely and fully discussed; and they had had a repetition of that same bitter line of attack that the Opposition indulged in here during the past Session, only, if possible, with increased intensity. They had, in connection with that, a reiteration of charges freely made of corruption and improper conduct against the Ministry of the day. They had been told that they had granted contracts to political friends whereby they had sacrificed the interests of the country; that, for the purpose of benefitting their individual relatives, they had improperly let contracts. They had had no end of that class of charges freely made throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion. He remembered that, when the political party that now controlled the destinies of this country were in Opposition, when the present Postmaster General formulated his charges against the late Government, he did not go out to the country and make wild insinuations and statements in respect to that matter, but he came before the House and stated that he had reason to believe that, if he had an opportunity, and they would give him a committee, he could substantiate grave charges against the Government of the day. The House would remember also, in connection with the Secret Service money investigation, that the charges were not paraded around the country, but were first brought directly before the House; and the extraordinary revelations of corruption in the Northern Railway management, involving members of this House, were brought out also before a committee of investigation. When the Opposition clamoured about the mismanagement of the present Government and the misappropriation of public funds, he wondered whether they remembered that they had been prepared to accept a hundred thousand pounds sterling in settlement of the liability of the Northern Railway, while the present Government, after investigating the affairs of the railway, managed to collect just double that amount? In addition to which, after a further investigation before this House, that Railway Company had been asked to hand over a misappropriation of $27,000 to $30,000 additional. That matter was not paraded around the country by the supporters of the Government; the investigation was gone straight into; the facts were brought to the surface, and those who had perpetrated the wrong had to bear the responsibility and the blame. Without attempting to interfere with the line adopted by the Opposition in attacking the Government of the day, he would say that, looking at what had transpired in the past, he thought it would be much better for those hon. gentlemen, instead of making charges at picnics, to ask this House for a committee before which an investigation might take place, and the charges be substantiated by sworn evidence. As a humble member of the House, he should be pleased to do everything he could to enable them to have the means of substantiating their charges before a committee of the House, and he thought it was due to their position as a great political party to do something more than bandy these charges around the country as they had been doing. He felt, so far as he was personally concerned, that he had trespassed upon the patience of the House, but his only excuse was that, while he claimed the right to address the House as often and at such length as he pleased, he had generally abstained from troubling it. But there were times when he thought it right that individual members should express their views in regard to the leading questions of the day, and he personally did not feel inclined to withdraw from the present Government that support and confidence which they had received from him in times past, simply because of the charges made by hon. gentlemen in Opposition. If they withdrew their confidence from the gentlemen now in power, they had to ask themselves, as wise men should, whom they would place in office? He did not complain of the attacks made on the Government of the day, because he considered that an active Opposition was in the interest of the country; for, however pure any Government might be, it was better for being looked after, and no set of men were better able to watch a Government than the members of the present Opposition. They were conversant with the ins and outs of political life, and the investigations to which he had referred showed that the present Government had not had any peculiar monopoly of the means of improperly controlling public affairs. For himself, while there were no burning political issues dividing parties, such as there were in times past, while the questions for consideration were largely those of administrative capacity, he did not feel inclined to withdraw his support from the Government of the day, who he believed had administered the affairs of the Dominion to the best of their capacity, and, he believed, had more efficiently and economically administered them than the hon. gentlemen now in Opposition. While the Government continued to act in this manner, he should continue to extend to them his support.

Motion made and question proposed :

"1. That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to thank His Excellency for his gracious Speech at the opening of the present Session; and further to assure His Excellency: that, we learn with satisfaction that His Excellency, in again summoning us for the despatch of business, is able to inform us that nothing beyond the ordinary business of the country requires our attendance."

Motion agreed to.

Motion made and question proposed :

"2. That it affords us great pleasure to know that His Excellency had an opportunity, before his departure from Canada, of visiting the Province of Manitoba and a portion of the outside territories, which visit His Excellency accomplished during last autumn, and that His Excellency has now had the advantage of visiting every Province in the Dominion during the term of his government of Canada."

MR. TUPPER said he wished to avail himself of this opportunity afforded by the motion which was just put by the Speaker, to make as brief a reply as possible to the statement of the hon.

the Minister of Militia, in reply to the remarks he (Mr. Tupper) had addressed to the House on a previous occasion. He might say, at the outset, that he quite concurred in the remarks made by the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young), that, if anything was to be deprecated in this House, it was any hon. member bringing forward old, stale refuted charges, and he thought gentlemen on both sides of the House would acquit him of being open to any censure of that kind. He had endeavoured, in his remarks, to avoid subjects of that kind, and to confine himself to reasons which he had thought sufficiently strong against the entrance of the Minister of Militia into the Cabinet. He had confined himself, therefore, to that question. He had deduced, as a ground of objection, the fact that the hon. gentleman was in strong, clearly defined antagonism to the Government of the day on a question of public policy which he (Mr. Jones) had described as involving three or four millions of dollars per annum, namely the West India trade, in which the constituency he (Mr. Jones) represented was largely interested, and which was a question involving not only the interests of his (Mr. Jones's) constituency, but almost the entire Province of which he was one of the representatives. He had presented to the House, as he had felt it his duty to do, the great objection which existed to the advent of a gentleman to a Ministry which was uncompromisingly hostile to the views which he had propounded as being in the best interests of the country. He (Mr. Jones) replied that gentlemen in office might differ on minor points. So that what a year ago was a question of burning interest in the estimation of the hon. gentleman—a question which required him on two occasions to remonstrate with the Government of the day—became, when it was convenient to the Government to ask him to be their colleague, and to associate himself with them in office, a minor question. He (Mr. Tupper) left it to him to settle with his constituents, and to justify the attitude which he occupied in relation to that matter. He (Mr. Tupper) also drew the attention of the House to the fact that, on a question of the gravest importance to this country—the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway,—to which the First Minister and his colleagues stood committed in the most decided manner, and which the great organ of the Government had declared to be of the most vital importance, the hon. gentleman had not only avowed, no longer ago than last Session, his opposition to the scheme, but had declared that his opinion was that it was the duty of the Government to repudiate that obligation in toto. He (Mr. Tupper) thought he was not exceeding his duty when he called the attention of the House to the fact that, when the hon. gentleman propounded the policy of total repudiation, some explanation was required on the part of his (Mr. Jones's) colleagues and himself for the presence of those gentlemen in the same Administration. The hon. gentleman closed his somewhat lengthened and animated address without any reference to that matter, he (Mr. Tupper) presumed, because he (Mr. Jones) felt there was no answer that could be given, because, on such a question, involving such a large expenditure of money, nothing could justify the association in the same Government of gentlemen who declared that it was necessary to go forward and carry out the responsibility which rested upon them in relation to that great work, and a gentleman who only last Session told this House that they ought to have repudiated the whole thing. He (Mr. Tupper) had drawn the attention of the House to the position the hon. gentleman occupied as having held sentiments which were utterly inconsistent with the views of the present or any other Canadian Administration. He had also stated to the House, on what he considered competent authority, that the hon. gentleman had, on a former occasion, committed himself to what was so utterly at variance with loyal sentiments, so utterly at variance with loyalty to Canada, so utterly hostile to this Confederation as it now existed, as to render it impossible for him to take a seat in the Government as it now existed, without some retraction of the sentiments he had then expressed—unless they chose to present a spectacle of utter inconsistency to the country. What was the hon. gentleman's reply? In the language of the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young) he had used charges which were not only old and stale, but which had been refuted and abandoned—charges which had been so utterly refuted that they had ceased to be used as weapons of political warfare. These, however, the hon. gentleman, unable to defend himself, had found it necessary, on a recent occasion, to bring forward. He (Mr. Tupper) supposed he had done that for the same reason as that which had animated him in the contest in Halifax. He had stated there that, until he (Mr. Tupper) presented himself on the scene, the contest had been carried on in an orderly manner. The hon. gentleman knew that he was unwilling that he (Mr. Tupper) should be present at a meeting which was arranged between the other candidate and himself; the result being that he (Mr. Tupper) addressed a public meeting for two hours, and then went to Digby; and that there he had made no references to the hon. gentleman, except to say that, as he was to meet him face to face soon, he would not refer to him, but would discuss other questions. He had only said that, by his own admission of a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act, the hon. gentleman had been obliged to present himself again before his constituents. But what did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) do, when he (Mr. Tupper) was a hundred miles away, at Digby? He had devoted an entire evening to him; so much so that Mr. Richey, his opponent, said: "Take Dr. Tupper out of Mr. Jones's address, and I have nothing to answer." The hon. gentleman had then brought up a charge of his (Mr. Tupper's) being disqualified to sit in Parliament, because he had leased a house in Hollis-street to the Government; because he had been interested in the Pictou Railway contract, and because he was improperly connected with the Spring Hill mines—charges the two latter of which had been refuted long ago, and, in regard to the other, the hon. gentleman knew that there was a very easy manner of dealing with it. He

MR. BAIN.

(Mr. Jones) had said that he would bring that before a Committee of this House: he (Mr. Tupper) invited him to do so. The hon. gentleman had said that the transaction was a colourable one. The colourable transaction consisted in this: that when the Government applied to his (Mr. Tupper's) son, who was the owner of that house, they obtained it at $600 a year, precisely the same price as the previous tenant was paying for it, and that, soon after, his son had sold this house, which he had leased to the Government of Canada for $600 a year, to a building society of Halifax for $9,500. The House could, therefore, judge whether there was any extraordinary or undue charge made to the Government for the property while it was in their possession. The hon. gentleman had said the transaction was colourable, because his (Mr. Tupper's) son was a minor, and, therefore, he (Mr. Tupper) received the benefit. The hon. gentleman ought to have known the circumstances before he spoke. He (Mr. Tupper) had stated that, if the hon. gentleman would take the case before the Committee of Privileges and Elections, where witnesses could be sworn, he would undertake to show, by witnesses, that there was not the shadow of a shade of foundation for this matter being brought before the House at all. He was prepared to show that his son was of age months before the house was conveyed to him by himself (Mr. Tupper); he was prepared to show that he had no interest whatever in the property, or in any rents to be derived from it; and that, on matters where it was easy for the hon. gentleman to obtain the fullest knowledge and information, he had shown to the House, as he had shown to the country, that, finding himself unable to defend his own course by any justification of his own conduct, unable to bring forward any grounds to show that he had performed any services to his constituents, he had been driven to the necessity of not only making an attack upon him (Mr. Tupper), but of making that attack upon questions which he must have known, or, if he did not know, he ought to have known, as he had the means of knowing, were utterly baseless and foundationless. He intended to deal as briefly as possible with some of the questions of fact which were at issue between them. He was somewhat surprised on reading the report of the speech of the hon. the Minister of Militia in the Globe newspaper. The gentleman who, he supposed, took charge of the reports and exercised supervision over them, was an adept in debate. He observed that gentleman listening with great attention to the remarks of the hon. Minister, and he was curious to see whether the speech would appear in the Globe. He (Mr. Tupper) was quite certain that, as there were several contradictions in the speech, it would not appear in that journal on the following day. Not a word appeared: it must be subjected to revision, and must be pared and toned down, and its inconsistencies removed. He would direct the attention of the House to a single fact in that connection. The hon. the Minister of Militia made two statements directly opposed to each other. In one part of his speech he stated, in defence of a remark he had made on the floor of the House a year ago, that, if the county of Halifax were open, it would return a supporter of the Government by as large a majority as he had himself received in 1874, namely, 2,147; that the fact of his majority at the late election being little over 200 was due to the gross misstatement and misrepresentation made by him (Mr. Tupper) during the election. That statement was, however, omitted from the report of the Globe, because the hon. the Minister made another statement, that he trusted the hon. member for Cumberland would visit his constituency again, because, in the district which he visited, he (Mr. Jones) obtained an increased majority of ten. It would not answer the purposes of the Globe to publish both statements. He merely drew the attention of the House to those facts to show that the report in the Globe was a revised and even garbled report, in which important statements were omitted. The Ottawa Free Press of Feb. 13th, said:

MR. TUPPER.

“When he (Mr. Jones) made reference to the majority of last year, he had said then, and he said now, that if it had not been for the grossest misrepresentations, if it had not been for the promises the hon. gentleman held out, his majority would have been nearly as large as at the previous election."

In spite of the declaration of the hon. gentleman that the county of Halifax would return a Reform member by a majority of upwards of 2,000, the hon. the Minister had only obtained a majority of a little over 200 at the last election, and yet he ventured to deny that the tide of public opinion was setting strongly against the Government. The hon. gentleman had failed to show that the slightest misrepresentation had been made by him (Mr. Tupper) during that election; he dealt with the questions of the day, and with the position of the hon. gentleman. The hon. the Minister had invited him to visit his constituency at the next election. He accepted the invitation in advance, and, if his life and health were spared, he would visit the constituency, and, if his efforts on the last occasion had been sufficient to reduce the hon. gentleman's majority nearly two thousand votes, the Conservative party might rely on the balance being turned when he had an opportunity to discuss political questions at greater length than on the last occasion. Another matter to which he wished to call the attention of the House was the gross attack made on the Chief Justice of the Province of Nova Scotia, which had also been judiciously suppressed in the Globe. In regard to the defence of the Civil Service made by the hon. gentleman, he maintained that it was absolutely necessary, after what had transpired in respect of the payment of enormous sums of public money, in violation of the statute law of the land, by the Government to various parties, including members of the Government and members of Parliament, that a stricter system of auditing the Public Accounts should be established. The House would be satisfied that such scandals had never before existed as those it had been called upon to deal with in relation to the payment of public moneys in violation of the law.

MR. MILLS: Secret Service money, for instance.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. member ought to know that Secret Service money was not audited, and did not come under that head. The sum of $69,000 was paid over to railway companies during the last general election, having been taken out of the Treasury in violation of the law. That was followed up by the illegal payment of $24,000 to two members of the Government for services for which it was incompetent for them to receive payment, and, when one of those hon. gentlemen resigned his seat and was then indignantly rejected by his constituents, the Government took into the Cabinet that hon. member's partner, who had been equally guilty in those transactions. Hon. members of the Government had better settle those questions among themselves, for the House was satisfied that under those circumstances a change in the system of auditing could not be made at too early a date. The hon. the Minister of Militia, who had made a defence of the Civil Service, no doubt felt greatly for that service when he had illegally obtained $26,000 from the public Treasury in company with his partner, the benefit of which he had now in his pocket. The hon. gentleman had stated that he had made no money out of the transaction, and had been called upon to pay $2,000 as his share of the loss incurred in the Citizen. That being accepted as true, and he would not question that such was the case, it would be interesting to know what increased sum he would have had to pay if he had not been enabled to draw such enormous sums out of the Treasury of the country for the benefit of that company. The amount would probably not have been less than $10,000 except for the moneys received from the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia and the Dominion Government. Such was the qualification the present Government required, to cause them to place a gentleman in a high office and hold him up to the country as one who would maintain its standard of public morality and purity in public transactions. The hon. gentleman had said that he (Mr. Tupper) should be the last man to charge any one with corruption. Why? He had been in public life nearly 24 years, during which time not a dollar of public money had come into his possession by any improper means; and, if such could be proved against him, he pledged himself to resign his seat in Parliament and retire from public life for ever. The hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Young) deprecated the introduction of stale, exploded charges into the debate; but what would he say, when a Minister of the Crown who was charged in an open and straightforward manner, and on broad public grounds, with having improperly and illegally obtained public moneys, had revived the stale Pictou Railway story, which originated in 1865, was subjected to a close examination in the Nova Scotia House of Assembly, and settled. The hon. member had read Mr. Archibald's speech as evidence against him (Mr. Tupper) of corruption. He would like to know whether the hon. the First Minister, ten years hence, would be willing to accept the speeches delivered by the Opposition at the present time, as sufficient evidence of corruption? And yet that was the only evidence which the hon. the Minister of Militia possessed in support of those old, stale, exploded railway slanders. Not only so, but he had the handwriting of Mr. Archibald, the Lieut.-Governor of Nova Scotia, before him, stating that he never implied that he (Mr. Tupper) had been guilty of corruption, or thought of making any such charge. The hon. gentleman had said that out of that railway contract some one had suddenly risen from a state of pauperism to that of a full-blown millionaire. If that was intended to refer to him, it did not apply. At whom, then, was the blow aimed? It was aimed at Mr. Fleming, who, no doubt, made money out of the contract, but made it fairly and legitimately.

MR. JONES: He was not the only one.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman knew that the term used had no more application to him than to himself (Mr. Jones). He had never been in a position to be open to any such insinuation, and he could establish, by just as good evidence, that the hon. the Minister of Militia had grown rich by robbing his commercial partner, as that hon. gentleman could show that he (Mr. Tupper) had made money out of any improper transactions, or by improper means. Yet he had dared, in the presence of the House, to bring forward such a charge, which was not only without a shadow of foundation, but which, if it reflected on any one, reflected on one of the highest, most respectable, and most respected officials to be found in the public service of Canada. That hon. gentleman knew that the contract with Mr. Fleming was drawn by the Hon. W. A. Henry, since appointed to the Supreme Court by the Government of which he was a member, and that by the concurrence of himself and his party. Yet that hon. gentleman, who was his colleague in the Nova Scotia Government, who had drawn the contract and had defended it on the floor of the Legislature as one eminently in the public interest, without any evidence except the criticism which the leader of the Opposition, Mr. Archibald, considered it was his duty to make, was thus assailed by the Government. That was the only evidence the hon. gentleman was able to offer to the House. Why was it that a Minister of the Crown should demean himself by bringing forward an old story, an exploded charge, which was without a shadow of foundation? It was because the hon. gentleman, when attacked, not on private but on broad public grounds, as every independent member had a right to attack any hon. gentleman in the position occupied by the Minister of Militia, had no defence to offer in justification of his position, and was obliged to occupy the time of the House—as he had that of his constituents—by dealing with old questions. He brought the Pictou Railway question up in 1872, over his own signature, and he received his reply. The result was that, instead of being returned to Parliament, he was left at home and the man whom he had assailed was sustained by two members elected for the county of Halifax, and every representative of the Province, with one exception. That ought to have taught him a lesson. In regard to the Spring Hill Mines, he had already explained to the House that the Order in Council was passed while he was absent from the country, and the best evidence that it was a proper transaction was that the preceding Government placed it in the Statute-book. He was 3,000 miles away when Mr. Black, one of the leading merchants in Halifax, went to the office of the mines with the Royal Gazette, and made application for that mining claim. The hon. the Minister of Militia was well aware that this question was made the subject of an exhaustive examination, promoted by his enemies in the Legislature of Nova Scotia. They were unable to produce a tittle of evidence to injure him (Mr. Tupper), because none existed. As he had said before, he had been 3,000 miles away when the application was made by Mr. Black, who, it was said, did not appear when summoned before a committee of the House. He did not know anything about that, whether it was the case or not, but he had Mr. Black's evidence; and he did not think that the Minister of Militia, or any hon. gentleman, would venture to say that Charles H. M. Black was not a gentleman of as high social, commercial and personal standing in the city of Halifax as himself (Mr. Jones). Mr. Black was a member of one of the oldest and most respectable families of Halifax, and a merchant of the highest standing and character, and of great wealth, as were all the family. He was worth, at that time, he supposed, £100,000; and yet this leading merchant was branded as a conspirator by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones), the other night, and as having lent himself to a base and improper intrigue. He held Mr. Black's testimony in his hand, and the hon. gentleman knew that, wherever he (Mr. Jones) and Mr. Black were known, Mr. Black's character for veracity was not inferior to his own, and that his word went as far as that of the hon. gentleman, who would not undertake to say that this was not the case. Mr. Black said:

MR. TUPPER.

"Halifax, 19th December, 1871,

"HONOURABLE CHARLES TUPPER, C. B.,
Ottawa:—

"MY DEAR SIR,— After the repeated attacks upon you by a portion of the city press, touching the Spring Hill Mine, I have thought it but right that I should state the fact that I had no communication with you respecting licenses to search for coal at Spring Hill or elsewhere, previous to the application made by me in June, 1865, and that I received no intimation from you that an Order in Council had passed authorizing the granting of second rights to search.

"In June, 1868, when you were in England, it was thought by the friends interested with me that you could be of essential service to us in bringing the mine to the notice of English capitalists, and I accordingly executed a Power of Attorney, authorizing you to sell the mining rights I had acquired, which was duly transmitted to you; and in 1869 it was determined to convey to you one undivided fifth of three square miles, of which I held leases from Mr. Annand's Government.

"You are aware this explanation was at your service last summer, and you can now make what use of it you please.

"Regretting you should have been the subject of so much unmerited abuse,

"I remain, yours very truly,

(Signed) "C. H. M. BLACK."

It was thus proved that his offer to sell the mine under a Power of Attorney was eleven months after he had ceased to be a member of the Government of Nova Scotia, when he was just as free to speculate in mining as was the hon. the Minister of Militia. There was testimony of the very highest character. The other points raised were met by the affidavit of the Clerk of the Executive Council and utterly disproved. The verdict of the whole Province was taken after a year of the most exhaustive examination by these gentlemen upon it, and this verdict was as he had previously stated. The hon. gentleman said he (Mr. Tupper) had made a very large sum of money out of this transaction, and that he had not spent a cent upon it. Where did the hon. gentleman get his authority for that statement? It was not true. He, with other gentlemen, had expended a large amount of money to explore, develop, and open the mine, which was a valuable one. It had been stocked, if he remembered right, with something like $300,000, and he was happy to say that the parties who purchased the stock had had the pleasure of dividing a seven per cent. dividend on the past year a month ago. As he said before, if ever there was an old and stale slander, it was this transaction of 1865, concerning which, for six years after it took place, neither in the Legislature of Nova Scotia nor anywhere else, was any person found to say a word. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) had not thought it beneath him, or rather he thought that the hon. gentleman did think it beneath him, to bring this charge; but so hard was the hon. gentlemen pressed that he (Mr. Jones) had nothing else to do, and had no other reasons for assailing him the other night on public grounds, except to fall back upon that old and stale slander as a means of vindication. The hon. gentleman said that another charge of his was that he (Mr. Jones) had formerly acted with the Conservative party. He had mentioned to the House that the only qualification, saving the ability the hon. gentleman had shown in getting public money out of the Treasury contrary to law, the hon. gentleman possessed for sitting in the Reform Government, was the fact that, when the great question of the Union of these Provinces was taken up, the hon. gentleman had deserted him (Mr. Tupper) and gone into the ranks of the Anti-Unionists, and had shown the most bitter and undying hostility to that measure. This was the hon. gentleman's sole qualification for sitting alongside of the hon. member for Lambton, whose great claim upon the people of this country existed in the fact that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had taken part in bringing about the Union of these Provinces. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) said this measure had been improperly carried; that it ought to have been fought and abandoned, and that no man should have been sustained who had carried that measure in the way he (Mr. Tupper) did. He was glad to be able to say that the hon. gentleman considered this a minor point too, because this did not prevent the hon. gentleman sitting alongside of the hon. member for Lambton, the Prime Minister, who stood in precisely the same position as himself (Mr. Tupper). Those who took the trouble to read the Confederation Debates which took place at Quebec would find that, when exactly such a resolution was proposed as the hon. the Minister of Militia maintained ought to have been carried, to send this question of Union to the polls, the Hon. George Brown came to the front, and, in a most able and vigorous manner, showed the utter unconstitutionality of the whole proposition. When his hon. friend the member for Chateauguay (Mr. Holton) was fighting for just such a resolution, the Hon. George Brown took up the cudgels and stated that to pass a measure to be submitted to the people would have been a simple insult to the Crown; and who sustained the Hon. George Brown in that position? Why the hon. member for Lambton, and they had the names on the Journals of the Parliament of Canada of those who voted down the resolution for which the hon. the Minister of Militia said he (Mr. Jones) was justified in deserting him (Mr. Tupper), and that this was an act which ought to have driven him (Mr. Tupper) out of public life and kept him out of it for ever. He supposed the hon. gentleman had also discovered that this was a minor point and that, when a portfolio was offered him, this was no reason why he should not sit down under the wing of the hon. member for Lambton, enjoying the sweets of office. No act in the public life of the hon. member for Lambton reflected more credit on him (Mr. Mackenzie), in his judgment, than the stand which he took on that occasion. On constitutional grounds both the hon. the Premier and the Hon. George Brown were not only justified, but they were more than justified, in resisting the invasion then attempted on British institutions, one which formed no part of our Constitution, and which could not be carried out except at very great inconvenience; and, in fact, he knew of no mode by which the public sentiment could have been expressed on that question. He was proud to say that that great organ of public opinion, the Globe, on that occasion, and, subsequently, when he was fighting this battle, did not do as did the hon. the Minister of the Interior, and the hon. the Minister of Militia now—treat this as a ground why he (Mr. Tupper) was undeserving of public confidence. The Globe had also done him the great honour of reproducing the argument he had made in England, and had called the attention of the people of Canada to the fact that the evidence and constitutional authorities he had cited must for ever settle the question as to whether right, proper, and constitutional proceedings had been adopted in connection with Confederation. He had heard the hon. member for Lambton say that the people of Ontario were united on this subject, but he (Mr. Tupper) had had no means of knowing that the hostility of the people of Nova Scotia was as great as it really was to that measure.

MR. MILLS: Did not a majority petition against it?

MR. TUPPER said he would tell the hon. the Minister of the Interior a little anecdote. When Mr. Howe went to England, a gentleman who had been named that evening in the House and who had formerly been Governor of Nova Scotia, was applied to by Mr. Howe with relation to that question. Mr. Howe said to him: "Here are the petitions." "Well," he answered, "I suppose you have not forgotten when I was Governor of Nova Scotia, and when Mr. Tupper came to me with petitions from the majority of the electors of the Province, asking for a dissolution, and you then told me there was nothing easier than to get up petitions by the hundred and thousand, without much reference to what they contained?" He wanted to draw the attention of the Minister of the Interior to this point, and it was an important one, whether he (Mr. Tupper), with two-thirds of the House of Assembly, elected under universal suffrage, and two-thirds of the Legislative Council at his back, had not as much right to assume that the public sentiment of the Province was not so inimical to that measure, as Mr. Brown and Mr. Mackenzie had to assume that the great Province of Quebec, where they had a very small majority, if any at all, supporting it, was in favour of that measure. The evidences of the hostility to that measure of Union were greater the hour it was carried in Canada, as far as the great Province of Quebec was concerned, than they were in the Province of Nova Scotia. The speech which the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Goudge) had made a few moments previously had brought to his mind a rather peculiar circumstance which he might mention to the House. That hon. gentleman seemed to think a great crime had been committed in carrying Union in the way it was carried; but it was wonderful how many little reminiscences would crop up. When the constitutionality of his course was challenged, he thought he would take the best means to place the matter before the public. He was then invited to deliver an address at the town of Windsor, the shire town of that hon. gentleman's county. He went up and called the people together, to hear him deliver an address upon this question of Union, and the propriety of passing it without submitting it to the people at the polls.

AN HON. MEMBER: How long ago?

MR. TUPPER said perhaps a year before; but he would not be positive about the date. At all events, when the subject was being agitated after the Quebec Conference, after the matter was arranged and the whole thing was published to the country, and he was told it was purely and simply in question whether he was bound to refer it to the people at the polls, he had argued the matter in the course of a rather long address before the assembled electors of the shire town of the county of Hants.

MR. JONES: Was that before the election or after?

MR. TUPPER said it was before. He argued the whole question at length, and he had great pleasure in acknowledging his thanks to the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Goudge), for having been good enough to give him valuable suggestions in reference to what it was best to say to the people in the first instance, and for having, when the election was over—

MR. GOUDGE: Let me make an explanation.

MR. TUPPER said the hon. gentleman had better first hear what he had to say, before he made any explanation. It was not to be forgotten that, at the Quebec Conference, they had present four members of the great Reform party of Canada, if he remembered aright, at the Council Board, and every man agreed that it was not only right, but proper, and also their duty, to carry that Act by the existing legislatures.

When he had concluded his address at Windsor, showing why this question should not be referred to the people and why it was strictly right and constitutional for the Legislature to deal with it, the hon. member for Hants moved a vote of thanks, and he believed it passed unanimously. This was the means he had of learning how very hostile the people of Nova Scotia were to that measure. The hon. member for Hants was unmindful of the wise and judicious suggestions of the hon. member for South Waterloo, which commended themselves to the mind of every hon. gentleman in the House, that nothing could more degrade this Legislature than the bringing up of old, stale, and exhausted charges, which had ceased to have any active or operating influence on the public mind. The hon. gentleman could not have heard that statement of the hon. member for South Waterloo, or he would not have read old editorials from the British Colonist newspaper, written fifteen years ago, with relation to that or any other subject; but he had read there some strong language which was used in reference to the course Lord Mulgrave had pursued when Governor of Nova Scotia. He must remind the hon. member for Hants that at the time he was using a two-edged sword, for every blow that he struck him (Mr. Tupper) cut the Minister of Militia too. Down to the time that Judge Johnston retired from public life, and long after, he (Mr. Jones) was a staunch Conservative fighting the battle with Judge Johnston and himself; and he was bound to say he (Mr. Tupper) did not now forget the hearty, enthusiastic and vigorous support which that hon. gentleman had given them against the old Reform party of Nova Scotia. Judge Johnston, at the very time that language was used, was leading the party, and Judge Johnston and himself were acting together with the hearty support of the hon. member for Halifax.

MR. JONES: No.

MR. TUPPER: No? Would the hon. gentleman give him a tittle of evidence to show that he (Mr. Jones) ever entertained the slightest difference of opinion with them? None such existed, and the hon. gentleman knew perfectly well that he took strong ground with Judge Johnston, the then leader of the Opposition, and himself, with relation to the Legislature of Nova Scotia. They had declined Lord Mulgrave's invitation to go, as members of the House of Assembly, to the dockyard to receive His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales; but they went there, and were among the first—Judge Johnston and himself—to be presented to and to greet His Royal Highness. They were presented by Lord Mulgrave when His Royal Highness first landed from the flag-ship at the dockyard at Halifax. And not only so, but they had attended the levee given at Government House, and were presented to His Royal Highness again by Lord Mulgrave. They had dined at Lord Mulgrave's table with His Royal Highness, and he had the honour of escorting His Royal Highness to the point where he left the Province, and yet these hon. gentlemen endeavoured to make capital out of that old, worn-out slander by reviving and bringing it up here on the present occasion. The hon. gentleman was made to say in the Globe, with the astuteness of the person who revised the speech for him, or through his own correction, when he found that what he had said could not be sustained:

MR. TUPPER.

“After referring to Dr. Tupper's misrepresentations with regard to the winter port, the speaker said that the hon. gentleman knew his statement would be looked upon with suspicion.”

This was not what the hon. gentleman had said at all. It was very convenient to leave out what the hon. gentleman had said, and why? Because the statement which the hon. gentleman had made, with reference to the winter port of Halifax, was utterly at variance with the facts, as he would show. But this was not the case with the Free Press, which had not the advantage of having this part specially revised by the hon. the Minister of Militia, or some other kind hand, and what did it say? It contained what was omitted from the Globe's report, which was this:—

“With regard to the winter port question he said that the hon. gentleman had not paid as much attention to the affairs of Halifax as he had of late. If he had read the discussion going on in Halifax for the last two years, he must have known that the question of the winter port had been settled long ago."

The hon. gentleman had said that the winter port question was settled long ago; and then he had qualified this a little by saying, did not the hon. gentleman know that the question of the winter port had been settled for the last two months. Enormous use had been made of this question in the late election; and the hon. gentleman would not now be in this House, if it had not been for that issue, otherwise—notwithstanding that other means were used to bring the hon. gentleman here—he was satisfied that the hon. gentleman would have been defeated. When he had made that statement he had been answered by the declaration that this matter had been settled two years ago, and then that it had been settled two months ago. It was said that Mr. Black had returned to Halifax after having had a perfectly satisfactory interview with the First Minister. Now he would like to draw the attention of the House to what had taken place in connection with this matter. When the matter came up for discussion, the merchants of Halifax, irrespective of party, had met and appointed Mr. Black to come up and see Mr. Brydges, the Prime Minister, and other parties, and ascertain whether such arrangements could be made as to cause Halifax to become the winter freight port. Sir Hugh Allan had attended a public meeting at Halifax, where he stated that, if the Government would carry grain for 1s. 3d. per quarter from Rivière du Loup to Halifax, he would give the same rate from Chicago to Liverpool, that he gave via Portland, so that the whole question lay in the decision of the Government on this point; and every man able to examine this vital question at all, knew that the issue all hung on the decision of the Government. The merchants named a gentleman to visit the Government and the railway manager and ascertain what were the best terms that could be obtained. They came to Mr. Brydges, and he said it was quite a mistake; they could not carry grain for that figure; Mr. Jones had misunderstood him; he (Mr. Brydges) had never said they would do it for 1s. 3d. per quarter; and if he had said so, this would only apply to Canadian produce, and nothing from the United States could be taken at that rate. Then Mr. Black came up with Sir Hugh Allan and had an interview with the hon. the First Minister. What the result was, they might judge when he told the House that both left the hon. the First Minister utterly disappointed. But Mr. Vail was on hand and he learned how the matter stood. He (Mr. Vail) spoke to the hon. the Premier and went back with a message informing Mr. Black that Mr. Mackenzie would like to see him again. Mr. Black then found the hon. the Premier much more practicable, and quite a different man. Mr. Black obtained from the hon. gentleman, (Mr. Mackenzie) a letter which he would read, to show whether this question of a winter freight port was settled two years ago or two months ago. It was not settled the day the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) was declared elected as member for the county of Halifax. This letter was as follows:—

“OFFICE OF THE MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS, CANADA,

“OTTAWA, 13th December, 1877.

“DEAR SIR,—Referring to your conversations with me, respecting the possibility of carrying grain over the Intercolonial Railway from Rivière du Loup to Halifax, I desire to inform you that the Government have considered the representations made by you on behalf of the Halifax merchants, and will give instructions to the General Superintendent of Government Railways on the subject. I need hardly say that the Government are extremely anxious to do everything to encourage any legitimate business that can be done by the railway. I think it is quite clear, from the data at present available, that the prices you suggested, namely, 1s. 3d. sterling per quarter, or about 3½c. per bushel, over 561 miles of railway, cannot pay running expenses. But directions will be given to afford the necessary facilities for taking, say two cargoes at that rate, after which, both the Halifax merchants and ourselves will be in a position to discuss the matter with realized facts before us.

“Yours faithfully,

“(Signed) “A. MACKENZIE.

“GEO. P. BLACK, Esq.”

MR. MILLS: Is that on the question of the winter port?

MR. TUPPER: Yes. If the hon. gentleman would read the Morning Chronicle of Halifax, he would see that nothing was discussed more during the election than this question. This was the principal question which entered into the contest as far as any claims on the part of the Government were concerned. The great argument was this: Vote for Mr. Jones, because the Government is at this moment considering whether the question of the winter port of Canada will be decided against you, for if he is rejected you have no chance whatever of obtaining it. Did any man mean to tell him that the First Minister, with the assistance of Mr. Brydges, one of the ablest men to be found in this or any other country, as far as railway traffic was concerned, and also perhaps better able to tell what wheat grain could be carried for per quarter over 561 miles of railway than any man to be found on this continent, could not have decided this question as well then as now or at any other time? But what did the hon. the First Minister do? He held it over as his trump card which he would not play until he could win the game; and instead of settling the matter then and saying: "I cannot do it; it is impossible; the country cannot afford it"; or instead of saying, what he trusted the hon. gentleman would say, and what he thought the hon. gentleman ought to say: "It is of such vital importance to build up a great Canadian port on Canadian soil with Canadian traffic, that we will do it at this rate; we have got a great public work, and we may as well utilize it"—instead of settling the matter one way or the other, for which he then had just as perfect means as now, he said: "I will carry two cargoes,—that will last over the Halifax election—and then let you know"

MR. MACKENZIE: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say a word? Mr. Black asked me to take two cargoes just in that way. This was his own proposition—not mine.

MR. TUPPER said he was quite certain that Mr. Black, who was elected by men of all parties and classes in Halifax to see about this matter, would never have asked that if he could have got any more. It was perfectly obvious that the matter hung undecided, and, if Mr. Black asked that, it was because it was all he could obtain. And, if this was not using the power of the Crown in the very worst way in order to carry an election, it was difficult to see how this power could be more abused. This question was used actively in the canvass on behalf of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones), the Ministerial candidate; and on his election was made to depend the favourable decision of the Government in the matter. Never had there been, in his judgment, a more scandalous abuse of the power of the Crown; nor could this power be used in a worse manner than had been the case in connection with this election.

MR. MILLS.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. TUPPER said hon. gentlemen might say "hear, hear," but this conferred an enormous advantage on the Ministerial candidate. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) said Mr. Black came back from Ottawa perfectly satisfied, and so reported to the Board; but he would tell the House what was done. Mr. Black returned and made a report as friendly and favourable as he could; and what was the result? Why, the hon. gentleman, then the Ministerial candidate, induced him (Mr. Black) to hold over the report until the hon. the First Minister could be applied to, in order to obtain something more favourable to settle the election. But he would read what was added to his report afterwards, and they would see what was going on. The hon. gentleman was proving to his constituents the value of having a friend at court. This was held over for two or three days until the hon. the Prime Minister could be again approached, and an arrangement made that would secure the Halifax election:—

“SUPPLEMENTARY REPORT.

“I beg leave to render the following Supplementary Report:—

“That now, as, since my return, your Committee has agreed to raise the funds to pay for the balance of expense of bagging grain; and as a late telegram to me from Mr. Mackenzie has withdrawn all restrictions that at first encumbered these two experimental trips, and as the necessary cars for said trips will be furnished, thus meeting all the barriers that at one time opposed our enterprise, I have the pleasure of congratulating you on the successful result of your endeavours in making this start, which, I trust, will eventuate in Halifax becoming permanently the Liverpool of the Dominion.

“GEORGE P. BLACK.

“Jan. 15, 1878.”

Now, what did that prove? It proved that there was not enough in the letter to secure the election, and so the telegraph must to be set to work between the candidate and the Prime Minister, in order to get a further concession; and the Prime Minister telegraphed further concessions in order to accomplish this transaction. Yet, this hon. gentleman, with this state of facts standing out here on the page of the history of this country,—this state of admitted facts, proved beyond controversy, by the most undoubted and indisputable testimony,—stood up on the floor of this House and made that statement—that misstatement—that the question was settled long previously, and had nothing to do with this contest. He thought he had disposed of that issue on a question of fact with the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman joined issue with him on another question of fact. He stated that one of the monstrous misstatements that he (Mr. Tupper) had made, one of the things that had reduced his majority nearly two thousand—for that was the assertion—was that the present Government, and not the late Government, had removed the workshops from Richmond. The town was placarded all over, “Vote against Dr. Tupper, who took away the workshops from Richmond.” That was one of the trump cards of the hon. gentleman in carrying his election. He stated in the most persistent manner on the platform and in the press, morning, noon and night, that Mr. Tupper and the late Government had removed the workshops from Richmond. He said that he (Mr. Tupper) had promised that, if they would defeat him (Mr. Jones), he would take them back. Now, neither the one statement nor the other was correct; the hon. gentleman was mistaken in both these statements. He said that he (Mr. Tupper) had made the misstatement that the late Government had not removed the workshops from Richmond. Now, he would prove that they did not remove the workshops from Richmond. The hon. gentleman, in a speech in the Temperance Hall, when he (Mr. Tupper) was a hundred miles away, called upon the electors of Halifax to elect him (Mr. Jones)—the hon. gentleman had nothing to show as a reason why he should continue to represent them, but he called upon them to elect him because he (Mr. Tupper) had taken away the workshops from Richmond. He (Mr. Tupper) therefore felt bound to deal with the question, and when, in a meeting, the question was asked by one of the hon. gentleman's deluded followers: “Why did you remove the workshops from Richmond?” he said, “I cannot answer the question.” “Why not?” “Because I never did remove them; because the late Government did not remove them; because the present Government removed them.”

MR. GOUDGE: Who built the workshops at Moncton?

MR. TUPPER said the workshops at Moncton were an entirely different question. If hon. gentlemen would possess their souls in patience for a few minutes, he would convince them of that fact. His statement was this: he said that Sir George Cartier named Mr. Brydges as one of four Railroad Commissioners charged with the construction of the Intercolonial Railway between Truro and Rivière du Loup. He said that Mr. Brydges, no doubt, from the great knowledge of the subject and the influence that he possessed with his colleagues, satisfied them that they should have a central station from which the Intercolonial road should be operated at Moncton. He (Mr. Tupper) had not acquaintance with this subject enough to controvert any such proposition as that; and the selection of Moncton was made before he was a member of the Government at all. The site was fixed, the place was arranged, and that policy was decided before he ever entered the Government; and the best evidence of that was that, during the past season, the inhabitants of Moncton presented Mr. Brydges with an address in which they thanked him for having fixed on Moncton as the great central point of the Intercolonial Railway; and Mr. Brydges, instead of saying "You do me too great honour," took the compliment most kindly, and admitted that it was his arrangement, and that he had been able to do it for them. That settled the point of how that came to be chosen as the central station. When Mr. Carvell, who was manager of railways in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, told him (Mr. Tupper) that he had instructions from Mr. Brydges to take the measurement of the machinery at Halifax, in the workshops, he (Mr. Tupper) told him not to measure a machine at his peril. He said the law confined the Intercolonial Commissioners to the line from Rivière du Loup to Truro; they could do nothing but between these two points without the approval of the Government; they could not put a foot outside of that district, and the policy of the Government was to maintain the repairing shops at Richmond in the future as then, and not a particle of machinery should be taken out of these shops, nor should the work be taken away from them. He would put it to the gentlemen in this House who knew something about railway management whether it was a wise policy or an unwise one that, in a railway of 600 miles in length, the workshops and repairing shops were to be found in one point. He maintained in the interest of the country that the true policy was to maintain repairing shops at Richmond, because it was to be a great terminal station of a great Dominion line of railway; and instead of taking all the machines and all the locomotives that were required for repairs, and the working of 250 miles of railways in Nova Scotia away over the whole of this road to Moncton, the true policy, and the most economical policy, in the interest of the country—while, of course, they required repairing shops at Moncton, for 100 miles of railway from St. John on one side to Shediac on the other, and for the line to Rivière du Loup—was to maintain the workshops at Halifax for the purpose of dealing with the work that required to be done for the lines in Nova Scotia. That was the statement he made; what he did was this—he did not say that, if the hon. gentleman was defeated, they would be brought back; he said the same Government that maintained the policy of keeping the workshops at Richmond would soon be in power again, and when they were in power, the policy they had in the past would be the policy of the present, and the workshops would go back to Richmond. He made no reference to whether the hon. gentleman was elected or whether he was defeated; he stated it as a question of public policy, and stated it in reply to the groundless accusations that had been made that the late Government had been the parties who carried away the shops from Richmond. Now, he would give them evidence that would satisfy the House, and the most credulous member of it,—even the hon. member for North York (Mr. Dymond,) who could not wait with patience for the explanation—he would undertake to satisfy that hon. gentleman himself, that the statement he made was strictly correct, and that the statement of the hon. the Minister of Militia had not a jot or tittle of foundation in fact. He would read a letter written by W. Johnson, who was locomotive superintendent and machinist at Richmond, while the late Government were in power, and was as able a man in that department as could be found in the country. He would not read Mr. Taylor's letter, although it was confirmatory of the same thing, as his friend the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) knew; he would read, as it was shorter, Mr. Johnson's testimony upon the point:—

Mr. TUPPER.

“Toronto, Jan. 22nd, 1878.

“HON. DR. TUPPER,—

“MY DEAR SIR,—Your telegram of this date to Mr. G. Taylor, a copy of which was handed to me to read, referring to the removal of machinery and tools from the workshops at Richmond, Halifax, to Moncton. There was no machinery, nor tools, nor any men removed from the workshops while the Sir John A. Macdonald Government was in power in 1873. Nor would there ever have been any, but would have been increased. As a proof of this, the car sheds had been altered and fitted up to receive machinery for working wood, for the purpose of building and repairing cars for the operating the Eastern division of a section of the Intercolonial Railway in Nova Scotia—250 miles. The machinery in the workshops was sufficient for locomotives' repairs, to operate 250 miles, and I had positive orders from headquarters to allow no machinery or tools to be removed. The pay sheets will prove those facts.

"Yours,

"W. JOHNSTON.

"Late Master Machinist, I.C.R."

He asked the hon. the Minister of Militia if that should not be satisfactory to any member of the House. There was the locomotive superintendent's declaration that nothing was removed. He would give the hon. gentleman further information. The Hon. Mr. McLelan was one of the Commissioners of the Intercolonial Railway; he was the Commissioner representing Nova Scotia. He addressed a letter, over his own signature, to the public papers which he (Mr. Tupper) held in his hand. In this letter, which was dated the 24th of January, 1878, Mr. McLelan said:

"I have only to add, in justice to Dr. Tupper, that when a member of the Government, he repeatedly said to me, as Commissioner of the Intercolonial, that the Richmond workshops should not be removed; that, situated at a terminal point, he believed they should be enlarged, not only in the interests of the road, to meet the growing traffic, but that Nova Scotia might have her fair share of the work.

"I am yours, very truly,

"A. W. McLELAN."

So much for the testimony of Mr. McLelan. If that was not sufficient, he had testimony that he thought would set the matter at rest at once and for ever. The late Government went out of power in November, 1873, and one of the first acts that the hon. the Minister of Public Works did was to commission Mr. Brydges to examine the Intercolonial Railway and report upon its whole condition. He (Mr. Tupper) held the report of Mr. Brydges in his hand, laid upon the table of the House by the Minister of Public Works. What did he tell them? That the workshops had been removed to Moncton? No; he spent two pages of the report in trying to convince the Prime Minister that they ought to be removed. This report was dated the 20th of June, 1874—a long period after the late Government had gone out of power; and he would quote briefly from page 45 of this document, which was mainly taken up with an elaborate argument to prove to the Minister of Public Works why he should take the workshops away from Richmond and move them to Moncton. He thought that would satisfy his incredulous friend, who began to droop a little already.

MR. DYMOND: I am getting sleepy.

MR. TUPPER proceeded to read from the report of Mr. Brydges. That gentleman, on page 45, used these words:

"There is no necessity of having repair shops at more than one place."

And on page 26:

"The existing repair shop at Richmond, according to my judgment, is unnecessary, and is causing a useless expenditure of money."

He also said:

"The depot at Richmond, in which the repair shop is situated, is of exceedingly small dimensions, and owing to the nature of the ground, consisting of hard rock, it cannot be increased, even at a very extravagant outlay indeed."

On the rate of wages, he said:

"I have gone carefully over the pay sheets at Richmond and at Moncton, and I find that the rate of wages for mechanics actually paid at Moncton is decidedly lower than at Richmond, and the foreman at Richmond told me that his men were complaining and threatening not to remain unless their wages was increased."

He then gave the prices as tendered for material, and said:

"On the whole, therefore, I have no doubt that the cost of working, both as regards the price of the material supplied and the labour employed in working it up, is cheaper at Moncton than at Halifax."

On the same page (47), he said:

"The mechanical superintendent, Mr. Whitney, although at the head of the entire department, has apparently very little, if any, control over what is going on at Richmond and other places. There are practically two superintendents at work."

He trusted that that was a sufficient answer to the hon. member for Hauts (Mr. Goudge) who wanted to know why they built the workshops at Moncton. Mr. Brydges told them they were intended for the purpose of repairing machinery on the road to Newcastle and up to Rivière du Loup. He trusted that would be satisfactory.

AN HON. MEMBER: What is the date of that?

MR. TUPPER said the date was the 20th of June, 1874. The late Government went out in November, 1873. The hon. gentleman could put two and two together. Mr. Brydges said further:

"The existing repair shop at Richmond, according to my judgment, is unnecessary, and is causing a useless expenditure of money."

He wanted to know, if the late Government had removed these workshops, how they could be causing an unnecessary expenditure of money seven months after they went out of power. After sending in this report to the Minister of Public Works, and this urgent appeal to remove the repairing shops from Richmond to Moncton, the hon. the First Minister gave him his instructions, and ordered him to remove them; and in a supplementary report, dated the 18th day of August, 1874, Mr. Brydges said:—

"I will now proceed to state the course which I pursued in carrying out your instructions:—

"The following resignations have been sent in, viz., Wm. McCann, paymaster, whose health has been bad for some time, and who has consequently been anxious to be relieved of his duties. Mr. George Taylor, the late Assistant Superintendent and Freight Agent, whose office has been abolished.

"The following dismissals have taken place in pursuance of your instructions:—

"Mr. Ryan, Cashier.

"Mr. Sadler, General Storekeeper.

"Mr. Clark, Storekeeper, Richmond.

"Mr. Gray, Assistant Engineer.

"Mr. St. George.

"Mr. Wm. Johnstone, Mechanical Superintendent at Richmond.

"Mr. Blanchard, Fuel Agent.

"Mr. Foster, Station Master, Point du Chêne.

"Mr. Foot, Ticket Agent, Richmond.

"Mr. Faulkner, Trackmaster, Truro."

He trusted that that satisfied the House, that the statement he made in Halifax, that he had never removed the workshops, and the late Government never removed them,—that, when they went out of power these shops were in full blast, and doing more work than had ever been done before,—was correct. He now came to the last and most important question of all, the issue on the question of fact in relation to the flag, and he thought he would be able to give the House quite as conclusive evidence upon that point as he had given upon the others.

MR. TUPPER.

AN HON. MEMBER: It is not old.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman must have forgotten that, although General Doyle's letter had been in his possession since 1871, he had never used it, because it was of no consequence to him, and it was of no consequence to the country, what opinions the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) held. General Sir Hastings Doyle sent it to him, not as a private letter, but he sent it to him for the purpose of informing his friends at Ottawa, that it might be known. He sent it to him two years after the transaction had happened, because he felt it to be necessary, when the hon. gentleman was coming here, that it should be known. He (Mr. Tupper) differed from General Doyle; he did not think it necessary that it should be known; he was ashamed that it should be known that any man in Nova Scotia had uttered such opinions. But when the militia of this country was handed over to a gentleman who had declared that he would take off his hat and cheer when the flag was pulled down on Citadel Hill; to a gentleman who, according to his own explanation, and the explanation of the ambassador he sent—

MR. JONES: I sent no ambassador.

MR. TUPPER: Sent no ambassador? Did the hon. gentleman mean to tell him that Mr. Vail would have ventured to tell General Doyle what Mr. Jones meant, unless Mr. Jones had authorized him? Would he have used Mr. Jones's name without his authority? But what did the Globe report of Mr. Jones's speech say? It said they might judge of the desperation of the hon. gentleman when he had to publish that letter at the last moment in Halifax. He met the hon. gentleman before three thousand of his constituents in the drill-shed and discussed the question out with him. Did he make any allusion to this letter or this question?

Not the least; because the hon. gentleman was seeking to be elected as a private member. But when he found that the gentleman who had been holding such language as he had all the evening to his constituents; who had been exciting and exasperating them against Union with Canada just as bitterly and with as much acrimony as he had done ten years ago; when he found that that gentleman had suddenly changed into a Cabinet Minister, the Minister of Militia in this country, and when he found him giving the lie to the assertion that he had ever made such statements at all as that he would cheer when the flag was hauled down on Citadel Hill, he felt that it was right that the Governor-General of this country should know who was the man that he was making Minister of Militia; and he felt it right that the Parliament should know, and the people of this country should know, into whose hands this office was committed. He was going to put it to the sober, dispassionate judgement, not of gentlemen on his side of the House,—they did not require it,—but he was going to put it to the sober, dispassionate judgment of gentlemen opposite, how this matter stood between the hon. the Minister of Militia and himself. They had, perhaps, heard the story of a culprit arraigned in court for some misdemeanour, and a person on the jury was asked to stand by him. "Now, mind," said he, "stand by me and protect me." "Oh, yes," was the reply, "I will protect you." They found him guilty, and he was sentenced by the Judge. He went to his friend and said, "A pretty way you kept your word; you promised to stand by me, and you found me guilty." "Well," said he, "how could I do anything else? Did you not hear all these witnesses swear, in the most positive manner, that you were guilty? When I found that every man on the jury had not a doubt about it, how could I acquit you; and when the Judge told us there was not the slightest question but what you were guilty?" Says he, "You are a fool; don't you know that all these witnesses were perjured? Don't you know that all those jurymen were prejudiced, and don't you know that that old fool of a judge didn't know what he was talking about?" That was pretty much the position of the hon. the Minister of Militia. Everybody was a liar but himself; he said General Doyle was lied to; he said that to a body of gentlemen sustaining him on the Treasury benches, when he knew that the man who gave General Doyle his information was a man of the highest standing and credibility in this country. He asked those who heard the hon. gentleman read the speech which was made for him, and which was never uttered—

Several HON. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. TUPPER said he was speaking of the speech in the newspaper; and he said the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) never did utter it. He would prove that to the satisfaction of every member of this House. Those who heard the hon. the Minister of Militia read that speech would look in vain for a word or a sentiment or an illusion in it of the kind that would cause the venerable Judge Johnston to put on his hat and walk out of the room. What did he and Chief Justice Young and Mr. Justice Desbarres, and other citizens of Halifax, leave the room for, if that was the speech he made? Did not every gentleman in the House feel that it was an insult to his understanding to be told that that was the speech? If the speech was made that they said was made, everybody could understand why Judge Johnston and Chief Justice Young and Judge Desbarres, all of them men of high character, should instantly leave the room as they did.—Mr. Vail told the Governor that the hon. gentleman did not say all that he intended to say; why? Because he was put down by hisses and hooting. The hon. gentleman knew, and every man of intelligence knew, that there was not a line, or a sentiment, or a word, in the speech, as given by the hon. gentleman from his newspaper, to account for the action that took place. Let him go to his ambassador, to the person who went to explain away this speech to General Doyle, and ask him to reconcile this speech with the statement he made to General Doyle, that what Mr. Jones said was said in the heat of the moment. Was there any heat in the speech of the hon. gentleman, or anything exciting? Not at all; it was as mild, and as tame, and as quiet as possible. Mr. Vail said that he never intended to say what had been attributed to him; that what he meant to say was that he would cheer when the British flag was hauled down from the Citadel, because then Nova Scotia could fight Canada, and throw off her yoke; and the words he did use were proved to a degree that should satisfy every man of intelligence in this country of the accuracy of the proof. There they had Mr. Vail's statement after this transaction occurred, when there had been ample time for the most thorough ventilation of the whole subject; and they had General Doyle's letter written to himself two years after that. The hon. gentleman stated that General Doyle found that he had been lied to, and was very anxious to have a reconciliation; but he would never make any intelligent man in this country believe that the speech he uttered was any other than these eminent judges had declared it to be, and that his friend Mr. Vail admitted, when long afterwards he was trying to appease the just indignation of the Commander-in-Chief. When General Doyle heard Mr. Vail's explanation, what did he say? All satisfactory? Not at all. General Doyle felt that it was almost as great a crime; that next to the crime of wishing to see the flag hauled down, the next greatest crime that a Canadian could commit was that, after the Union had been accomplished, and it was the interest of every man to bury old troubles, a man could be found in the country to stand up and say he would cheer when the flag was hauled down on the Citadel Hill, because it would enable him to fight Canada and break up this Union. He was not surprised at the spirit manifested by the hon. the Minister of Militia, for it was the same spirit which animated him when seeking election, not as a member of the Cabinet, but as an independent member, to declare that he was ready to do what was in the interests of his constituents, irrespective of the Government, and yet incited the public mind by declaring that the only protection required by Nova Scotia was against Ontario and Quebec, and that, if a barrier was built up between them, all would be well. That language, taken in its most qualified sense, was a crime against Canada, and should exclude any gentleman from the Government until he had withdrawn it. Reference had been made to the fact that Sir George Cartier had been a rebel. Many people would, however, be found to justify Sir George Cartier's act in taking up arms. He (Mr. Tupper) was not one of those who did not believe that a man might not be justified in taking up arms against the Government under which he lived, that circumstances might not arise which would warrant a man, not only in using stronger language than the hon. Minister in regard to the British flag, but in taking up arms in support of what he believed to be the interests of the people. But, if Sir George Cartier, in the distant past, did take that position, he had proved to the satisfaction of his Queen, and of the world, that, when justice was done to the people of Canada, no more loyal subject of the Crown, no man more devoted to his country could be found, than the lamented Sir George Cartier, who was ready to shed his blood, if necessary, in defence of Canadian institutions, as we had them to-day. We had now a prosperous, happy and united country, and yet, notwithstanding all that had been done for Nova Scotia, the hon. the Minister of Militia endeavoured to inflame and excite the public mind against the other Provinces. The hon. gentleman had done that for which he was not ashamed, but for which he ought to be ashamed; and any man charged with the high and responsible duty of maintaining and promoting Canadian institutions ought to be ashamed to take into his Cabinet a gentleman who had expressed such opinions and maintained them now. He could not resume his seat without noticing the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax, (Mr. Jones) and the hon. member for Lévis, (Mr. Fréchette) in respect to Mr. Thibault. He (Mr. Tupper) never had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Thibault until the morning of the nomination day in Digby, where he made his acquaintance on the platform. If testimonials went for anything, Mr. Thibault ought to be a respectable man. He was an alderman of the city of Montreal, he possessed a good standing at the bar, and a certificate as to his qualifications had been signed by the leading barristers in Montreal, where he practised his profession, including not only Mr. Kerr, the Batonnier of the Bar, but the present Minister of Justice. Yet the hon. member for Lévis insulted the hon. the Minister of Justice by declaring that he had put his name to a document, vouching for the character and standing of a man who, if the statements of that hon. member were true, ought to be held to be almost beneath the contempt of any respectable man.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. LAFLAMME: Give the date of his certificate.

MR. TUPPER said that Mr. Thibault, whom the hon. the Minister of Justice, in company with Mr. Kerr and all the leading lawyers of Montreal had declared to be a man of high character and standing at the bar, and qualified to perform the duties of Attorney General of the Province of Quebec, was declared by the hon. the member for Lévis (Mr. Fréchette) to be the most notorious scoundrel in Canada. Of Mr. Thibault, he (Mr. Tupper) knew nothing personally, but he could judge somewhat from those evidences of a man's standing and character. He saw Mr. Thibault on a public platform on nomination day at Digby. They went into the largest building that the town afforded, to a meeting, the proceedings of which continued from two to half past nine. Mr. Thibault spoke on that occasion in English, and proved himself to be a man possessing great ability and an acquaintance with public affairs that would do credit to the hon. member for Lévis. That hon. member had read an extract from the Halifax Morning Chronicle. He could not prove that the hon. member had anything to do with that sheet, but it was a curious circumstance that it appeared the morning after the hon. member's arrival from Digby. He (Mr. Tupper) was satisfied that the report of the speech was false. He knew that the Rev. Dr. Walsh, one of the most worthy members of the Catholic clergy of the Province, was present, and that, if any such utterances had been made, he would have denounced Mr. Thibault as unworthy of belief. He therefore advised Mr. Thibault to write to Dr. Walsh, and ask him to state whether such a speech was made. He (Mr. Tupper) had not seen Dr. Walsh's reply, but the hon. the member for Hochelaga had done so; it was there denied that such a speech had been made. Such was the miserable lying slander that the hon. the member for Lévis thought it not beneath his position to bring before the House, in respect to an absent man. From a report in the Quebec Chronicle, it appeared that there had been a meeting of the Quebec bar called yesterday to pass resolutions expressive of their deep regret at the death of His Holiness the Pope, and the first resolution was moved by Mr. C. S. Chevrier, one of the most respectable members at the bar, belonging to the Liberal party, and seconded by Mr. Charles Thibault. The solution of the difficulty respecting the published speech was not that the hon. member for Lévis wrote it, but that it was probably a translation of Mr. Thibault's French speech by Mr. Vail. He was glad, however, to know that the election in Digby was not carried by any of those monstrous misstatements. The hon. the Minister of Militia had stated that, when he (Mr. Tupper) returned to Halifax, he had said that Mr. Vail would be elected, and said he had the proof. He defied the hon. gentleman to prove it. In the presence of Mr. Wade and his committee, after he went with them over the information from all the English sections of the county, he arrived at the conclusion that Mr. Vail's defeat was certain. He met Mr. Vail on the street, in the presence of Mr. Oakes, formerly a member of this House, and now a member of the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia, and said to him, "You are a badly-beaten man." Mr. Vail replied: "I will not only double my majority, but will probably treble it." He (Mr. Tupper) said that, from what he knew, Mr. Vail would not only have no majority, but would be badly beaten. He (Mr. Tupper) returned to Halifax and, before a large number of his friends, stated that, while he had not seen the returns from the French districts, he had seen those from the English sections, and from what he knew of the temper of the people he was satisfied that Mr. Vail was badly beaten, so far as the English vote was concerned, or he knew nothing of elections. There was a gentleman, now within hearing of his voice, present when he made that statement on his return to Halifax. Mr. Vail, at that election, was defeated by nearly 400 votes, which was mainly due to the English vote.

MR. MILLS: Who misled the Mail and Citizen?

MR. TUPPER said he sent no communications to either of those journals respecting the Halifax or Digby elections. He did not go into the streets and proclaim Mr. Vail's probable defeat, because he well knew the great efforts that would be made by the Government under such circumstances, to carry the election. His son, residing at Toronto, telegraphed him asking what were the prospects in Halifax. In reply, he thought it the best policy to use the motto of the Duke of Devonshire, and he telegraphed "Cavendo tutus," and thought he would leave the telegraph operator to make what he pleased of it. Those explanations were due to himself in regard to matters of fact. The hon. the Minister of Militia, had referred to him in the most unhandsome terms. He did not object to the hon. gentleman joining issue with him as to matters of fact, but nothing could be more infamous and dastardly and more calculated to lower the dignity of this House, than general charges of misstatement without there being any foundation for them. He had shown how far he was open to such a charge at the hands of the hon. gentleman, and he defied him to controvert the statements now made by him (Mr. Tupper), and supported by convincing evidence.

MR. DYMOND: Before I claim the indulgence of the House for a moment in regard to a personal matter, I would ask whether, in alluding to a member of the House, whom the hon. gentleman supposed to have garbled or revised his speech, he alluded to me?

MR. TUPPER: I did not quite say so. I said the hon. gentleman was known to be closely connected with the Globe newspaper, and no hon. gentleman had a closer perception than he of the fact that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) was floating through blunders and mistakes. I do not know what the hon. gentleman did, but I thought he did not discharge what he considers his duty to his party unless he would just suggest to the reporter that it would be well to have the speech revised before publication. While the speech I made appeared in the Globe of the next morning, the same compliment was not paid to the hon. the Minister of Militia, and those who know the enterprise of that newspaper can imagine the reason.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. DYMOND: Then it was to me that the hon. gentleman referred? Do I understand that the hon. gentleman referred to me?

MR. TUPPER: I have given the hon. gentleman his answer. I do not want to make any personal or offensive reference.

MR. DYMOND: I appeal to the House whether, through a large portion of his speech, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) did not insinuate that a certain member of this House did advise or control the reporters of the Globe newspaper, and that, by that member's influence, a report of that speech had been curtailed or garbled. No man of sense could draw any other conclusion from the speech of the hon. gentleman. But, when I challenged him, he did what he is in the habit of doing up and down the country—he did not repeat the accusation, but gave a milder statement, in order that he might have a means of escaping from the consequence of his previous allegations. It is an old game of the hon. gentleman; I know him well in that respect, and have only too often had to follow him, in regard to it, with both pen and voice. I rise to give to the House the most unequivocal denial of the statement, that I have in this case or any other case, in the slightest degree, interfered with the reporters of the Globe.

MR. TUPPER: I say frankly, and at once, that I did suspect the hon.

gentleman, and I accept his denial in the fullest sense.

MR. DYMOND: I am sure the hon. gentleman will say so, because, though we have been political opponents ever since I first trod Canadian soil, I have never intentionally done him an injustice, nor has any personal feeling ever intruded itself with our relations to each other. Though I deeply regret to allude to a matter of this personal nature, I feel bound to say that I have no more to do with the duties of reporters of the Globe than the hon. member for Cumberland. My hon. friends around me have frequently, and very naturally, come to me to ask me to see that a correct report appeared of some one or other of their speeches, but I have invariably told them that I have nothing to do with the matter. The Globe reporters are as independent as any hon. member of this House. I never knew a reporter of the paper with which I was connected before I came to this country, who would listen to a suggestion that he should garble the report of anybody's speech, and I can say the same with reference to the Globe. It is an insult to the press to suggest anything else. I say in all courtesy and kindness that I hope the hon. gentleman, in future, will be more careful of the character of his fellow-members in this House. The charge made, or insinuated, is very serious; for the garbling of the speech of a member of Parliament would be a gross breach of the privileges of Parliament, for which anyone who was guilty of it should be called to the bar of this House, and, if a member, be expelled. If the hon. gentleman could have proved his charge, I would resign my seat within five minutes, and shrink away from the sight of my fellow-men. However earnestly I may feel in regard to political questions, I hope the hon. gentleman will always find me a fair opponent, willing to give blow for blow, but never guilty of a dishonourable action. I thank the hon. gentleman for having acquitted me of the act he imputed to me, and I hope I shall never again have occasion to allude to my connection with the Globe newspaper on the floor of Parliament.

Mr. JONES said he regretted that, at this early hour of the morning, he had to allude to the observations of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper). It was evident that the observations he (Mr. Jones) had addressed to the House on a previous occasion, had gone home to the hon. gentleman. It was evident, from the tone of the hon. gentleman to-night, that he felt, perhaps for the first time, that the record of his past public life had been held up and exposed to the people of Canada, that a point had been touched in his past political career, that exposures had been made and matters had come to light affecting him, during the time he was a member of the Government of Nova Scotia, which, coming before the people of Canada, would convey to them all the information which was necessary to enable them to arrive at a just estimation of the hon. gentleman's public career. The hon. gentleman had said that he (Mr. Jones) had indulged in old and stale charges. Did not the hon. member for Cumberland commence on the floor of this House by introducing matters which had been explained before his (Mr. Jones's) own electors time and again—a subject which had been explained, and the explanation accepted by every fair-minded man? But the hon. gentleman had not thought it beneath him to bring up that old story and try to make political capital against him on the ground of his becoming a member of this Government. The hon. gentlemen had said that he had no right to join a Government with which he had such a difference of opinion. He commenced on the sugar question. He (Mr. Jones) stated frankly then that he did differ from the Government on a question of trade. Did the hon. gentleman or any hon. member, suppose that all the members of the Government were agreed on the great question of trade and finance; that all men's minds were cast in one mould; or that what appeared to one Minister plain, was presented in the same light to all his colleagues? This could not be the case. If it was necessary, all independent thought would be stifled by such slavery. There was no sacrifice of principle in connection with this question. Moreover, this question had changed very much since it was before the House on a previous occasion. He understood very well the object of the hon. gentleman in bringing this matter before the House. The hon. gentleman wanted to make and show himself the champion of Halifax interests. He (Mr. Tupper) was endeavouring to show the people of Halifax that he (Mr. Jones) had disregarded their interests in that respect, and that he was the only champion of their views on this occasion. But the hon. gentleman knew very well that this question had changed very much, and the settlement of it was in the future. Very much, in this relation, depended upon the legislation that took place on this subject in the neighbouring country. But what had the hon. gentleman done when his colleagues differed with him (Mr. Tupper), respecting the National Policy? Was it not well known to the country that his colleagues had not agreed with him (Mr. Tupper) on that point, the great National Policy?—and yet they had not seen the hon. gentleman sever his connection with that Cabinet.

MR. TUPPER: No.

MR. JONES: The hon. gentleman says "No."

MR. TUPPER: I was not a member of the Cabinet when it was carried.

MR. DYMOND: When it was voted down?

MR. JONES: When it was repealed?

MR. TUPPER: No.

MR. JONES: The hon. gentleman knows well enough.

MR. TUPPER: Will the hon. gentlemen allow me to make a statement? When the National Policy was carried I was not in the Cabinet; but, when I was in the Cabinet, every member of it united to resist the repeal of the duties, and we stood together, every man of us.

MR. JONES: Every member of the Cabinet was united on that question?

MR. TUPPER: Yes.

MR. JONES.

MR. JONES: Regarding the repeal of the duties, every member of the Cabinet joined in voting it down.

MR. TUPPER: No; we did not.

MR. JONES said the hon. gentleman had brought up the question of the flag, and had endeavoured to give a new turn to it. In the statements made the other night, the hon. gentleman had sought to show to the House that Mr. Vail and others had a year or two afterwards, owing to statements of his (Mr. Jones), had gone to General Doyle to make certain explanations concerning this matter. But he (Mr. Jones) would say here that, if Mr. Vail had ever so said anything on the subject, he did so on his own account, and was no representative or ambassador from him (Mr. Jones). He had never asked Mr. Vail, or anybody else, to convey to General Doyle any expression with regard to the speech which he had made on that occasion. He had read this speech the other night, and the hon. gentleman had not thought it beneath him to say it was not the speech which he (Mr. Jones) had delivered on that occasion. He would ask the hon. gentleman what authority he had for making this statement. How did the hon. gentleman know that this was not the speech in question? Was the hon. gentleman then present? Did the hon. gentleman know anything about it? He would tell the hon. gentleman that General Doyle only got his information concerning this matter second-hand. General Doyle had not heard that speech; he had obtained his information from Sir William Young, and, as he had stated the other night, so he now repeated, Sir William Young was a political partizan, and had been so ever since the question of Union up to the present time. The hon. gentleman spoke of Judge Johnston and others leaving the room at that time. He would tell the hon. gentleman what took place. There was a meeting of citizens to give a dinner to Sir John Young, and those gentlemen had come there thinking that they would overawe the citizens of Halifax, and prevent a free expression of opinion. They came there, as he had stated in his speech on that occasion, to overawe the citizens by their presence as Judges of the Court, and interfere with a free expression of views upon that question. But he was not going to be over-awed by Chief Justice Young, or by any other man—nay, not even by the hon. member for Cumberland himself, and he had spoken then, as now, his honest sentiments. The speech he then delivered was fairly, honestly, and correctly reported; he had had nothing to take back concerning what he had then said, and he had nothing to take back now. He would ask the hon. gentleman why he (Mr. Tupper) had not used that letter when General Doyle was in the country? He (Mr. Tupper) had had that letter in his pocket since 1872, and he dared not use it when General Doyle was in this country after the reconciliation he (Mr. Jones) had mentioned had taken place, because he (Mr. Tupper) knew that General Doyle would, under such circumstance, have at once come down with the frankness which had always characterized him, and explained the whole position of affairs. No; the hon. gentleman had waited until General Doyle was out of the country and until the late election was embittered by his presence; in fact, until the last moment, when he (Mr. Tupper) thought that by publishing it he would injure a political opponent and had then taken upon himself the responsibility which he was happy to believe no other man in this Parliament,—nay, no honourable man in this country,—would have done, of publishing the letter of an absent man to injure a political opponent in an election. He would repeat there—and he was sure that he would be justified by the result—that, when General Doyle came to know what base use the hon. gentleman had made of that letter at that critical moment, no one would be more indignant than the General with reference to the use made of it by the hon. member for Cumberland. He had nothing more to say on this point, save this, that the hon. gentleman and his friends on the other side of the House, in spite of all the explanations which he (Mr. Jones) had made on the subject, went on repeating the old story. They thought that the lie would stick somewhere, and that it would reach some point where it would do harm. He was amazed to hear the hon. gentleman from West Toronto (Mr. Robinson) — but he was not amazed in this connection at the hon. member from North Hastings, because he could not be amazed by anything that came from this hon. gentleman—and other hon. gentlemen opposite who, he knew in social life would frown down such an impropriety, repeat that old story over again as if it was an accepted fact, instead of being a foul slander. The hon. gentleman said he (Mr. Jones) would not meet him at Mr. Richey's meeting. The hon. gentleman knew very well how that arose. Before he (Mr. Jones) knew he (Mr. Tupper) was coming at all, he had addressed a note to his opponent, saying that he would like to have a public meeting and discuss public matters regarding the county. Mr. Richey had not accepted at the moment, and at a meeting of Mr. Richey's friends that night, it was announced that Mr. Tupper was coming down to take part in the meeting. He (Mr. Jones) had then said to Mr. Richey that this meeting was to be between themselves, to show to the people of Halifax why the Government of the day should or should not be sustained; and he wrote a note which was published, saying that when Dr. Tupper arrived he would be only too happy to discuss Dominion matters generally with him (Mr. Tupper). On his return from Digby he was willing to meet the hon. gentleman, and had appointed the earliest day at his disposal for this purpose; the meeting had taken place in the drill-shed, and it had not ended, he thought, to the satisfaction of the hon. gentleman. He (Mr. Tupper) had alluded again to the house in Hollis-street, and had endeavoured to cover up that transaction, by stating that he could explain it away if only afforded the opportunity. The hon. gentleman might explain it as he liked; but he would tell the hon. gentleman that high judicial Courts had looked with great suspicion on transfers of property between relatives which fitted conveniently into political occasions. The hon. gentleman might bring forward what evidence he liked as to the transfer of the house to his son, but every honest man in this Parliament and country would believe that the whole scheme was planned by the hon. gentleman in order that his son might have the advantage of letting that property to the Government, and that, through his son, he might reap the benefit of the income from it. The hon. gentleman said that the house was let for no more than it had been leased for on previous occasions: this he would not dispute; it was immaterial; he did not care whether it was then let for more or less than previously. The hon. gentleman said that this house was subsequently sold for something like $9,000; but did the hon. gentleman say what amount the Government had spent in improving this property when it was let to the Government? He ventured to say that the amount which the Government had expended on it had increased its value very much, and he supposed that this sum could be obtained by reference to the Departments. The hon. gentleman was a member of the Government at the time. Who had negotiated this transaction with Mr. Carvell? Did the hon. gentleman do it, or did the hon. gentleman tell his son to do it? No evidence was apparent concerning any correspondence having passed between the hon. gentleman's son and Mr. Carvell. There was simply sent a letter from Mr. Stewart Tupper enclosing the lease to the Government for three years. Who conducted that negotiation? Who arranged the basis of the lease? The hon. gentleman himself must have done it, or else some correspondence would have passed between Mr. Stewart Tupper and Mr. Carvell. This might yet come to light. The hon. gentleman might explain the matter as he liked, and might prove what he liked; but he (Mr. Jones) would repeat that, in the minds of all honourable men, the hon. gentleman could never escape from the suspicion which attached to him of having placed his son in a position to reap an advantage from the Government which he (Mr. Tupper) could not obtain in the position in which he then stood. The hon. gentleman said that the Globe, reporters or himself had garbled his (Mr.

Jones's) speech. He (Mr. Jones) had certainly nothing to do with it. The hon. gentleman had said that he (Mr. Jones) had been inconsistent in the course of his speech the other evening, in stating in the early part of it that the misrepresentations which he (Mr. Tupper) had made during the late contest in some parts of the country where they could not reach him, had misled the public mind, and that, if it had not been for this his majority would have been larger; and then he said he (Mr. Jones) gave him (Mr. Tupper) credit for having increased it. His speech was perfectly consistent, as he had said that, in one part of the county visited by the hon. gentleman, his (Mr. Jones's) majority was increased. He did not think that there was anything inconsistent in these two statements; at all events, he could not perceive it. If it was the case, surely the hon. gentleman could not complain. The other day the hon. gentleman's organ in Montreal, the Gazette, had entirely held back the reply of the hon. the Postmaster-General to the hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. Bowell). There had been one course of misrepresentation by the hon. gentleman's press throughout the last three or four years, of the views which hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House had placed before Parliament. He had been amused at the hon. gentleman referring to the observation which he (Mr. Jones) had made last year regarding the Pacific Railway. If he judged him (Mr. Tupper) by his own organ, the hon. gentleman would find that he (Mr. Jones) was in perfect accord with the views of the present Government on this point, on which the hon. gentleman thought that he differed with them, because he believed that the Montreal Gazette had on that occasion made him (Mr. Jones) say that the only fault he had to find with the Government was in not having gone on with that railway and built it at once. The hon. gentleman had no doubt felt the force of the remarks which he (Mr. Jones) had made the other day respecting the auditor here; and he (Mr. Tupper) thought that the reference in that speech would afford him the opportunity of backing down. The hon. gentleman had said in a public place that all a Minister of the Crown had to do when an account of his own or of his friends was to be passed, was to touch the auditor on the shoulder, and say: "I am interested in this," or "My friend is interested in this," and it would be all right. He (Mr. Jones) had asked him then, and he repeated it now—whether this was the way in which he (Mr. Tupper) had passed the Fraser-Reynolds account; and was this the way in which the right hon. member for Kingston had drawn $6,000 of Secret Service money, after he had ceased to be a member of the Government? They knew that he (Sir John A. Macdonald) had touched the auditor on the shoulder, and the hon. member for Cumberland, perhaps, had some of the right hon. gentleman's experience in the transaction. The hon. gentleman said he had never taken public money. He (Mr. Jones) had given him Mr. Archibald's opinion on this point the other night, and the hon. gentleman had felt the full force of it; and the tone of the hon. gentleman's observations that night evidently showed that he had felt the full force and damaging character of it still. The hon. gentleman had never taken public money, indeed! They would see what Mr. Archibald had said further on that occasion. Mr. Archibald, while criticising in the same speech the course pursued by the hon. gentleman, said:—

MR. JONES.

"These two gentlemen were like the two heads of the Fenian faction, meditating a raid on the public treasury, and the only strife between them was which should be the first to pocket the plunder."

That was another certificate of character from the Governor of Nova Scotia. When the hon. gentleman found that suspicion had passed into conviction in the public mind—when the hon. member found that Mr. Archibald's letter in reply to his supplication for a certificate of character had only deepened that conviction—then the hon. gentleman tried to turn round and explain it in the way he had done to-night, and throw suspicion on Mr. Fleming. He (Mr. Jones) said then, and he said now, that he did not refer to Mr. Fleming at all. As there was no one other gentleman mentioned in connection with it, the hon. gentleman could make the application. Never took public money? Why, wherever there was public money going, he would venture to say the hon. gentleman had a full share of it during the time he was in public life. He might repeat a story, as the hon. gentleman was fond of telling stories. At the time of the Pacific scandal, there was an old farmer from Cumberland who met a friend in the railway, and he said to him with reference to public matter: "I am a supporter of Mackenzie's Administration; I believe they are able and pure men; I believe they are honestly and economically conducting the affairs of the country; but, for all that, I do not believe in the Pacific scandal." "Don't believe in the Pacific scandal! Why not?" "Why," he replied, "it has been said that there was $350,000 of money floating about at the time of sale of the Pacific charter. It has been said, under the signature of Sir George Cartier, that money was given for the elections, $10,000 here, $20,000 there, and $30,000 in another place; and a last $10,000 for the last time to the right hon. member for Kingston himself, but it has never been proved that Mr. Tupper got one cent of it; and," he added, "from what I know of the antecedents of that hon. gentleman,—I was raised in the same country with him—I know very well that, if that large sum of money had been going, Mr. Tupper got his full share of it." And that was the reason why the old farmer did not believe in the Pacific Scandal. The hon. gentleman had endeavoured to explain away his connection with the Springhill mines. He need not explain them away; he could no more explain that transaction than he could the Pictou road. The Government of which he was the leader passed an Order in Council, which, three days subsequently, was printed in the Royal Gazette. The Royal Gazette was printed usually on Wednesday, and generally reached the public offices on Thursday morning. Mr. Charles H. M. Black appeared at the offices with an application for all those coal areas, with all their metes and bounds described accurately; and, when the Commissioner of Mines expressed his astonishment and said it was illegal, then he gave him the Royal Gazette containing the Order in Council. It had been passed three or four days previously but not made public; and the Commissioner was obliged to give him the property. The hon. gentleman said he had no connection with it. He (Mr. Jones) repeated here what he had said elsewhere on a previous occasion, when he drew from the hon. gentleman an unguarded admission, that out of that transaction he had made $40,000. The hon. gentleman was intimately associated with Mr. Black; he was his political and personal friend; and every man in Halifax knew that, when Mr. Black moved in that transaction, he moved for the hon. member and the ring with which he was connected. When that subject was before the House, Mr. Black might write as many letters as he pleased; he might say he never got that information direct from the hon. gentleman, because he (Mr. Jones) knew, from his experience with this house in Hollis-street, how well the hon. gentleman could cover up his tracks. He said he never got that information from the hon. gentleman himself, but they knew very well that the hon. gentleman had other means of informing Mr. Black of this transaction. It was not necessary that he himself—he took good care that he would not himself—but he must have taken good care that Mr. Black was aware of it, and Mr. Black acted on the suggestion which was so kindly put in his way; and the hon. gentleman, as the result of that transaction, pocketed $40,000. The hon. gentleman said it was a subject of investigation. That was perfectly true. But where was Mr. Black on that occasion? When the character of his friend was aspersed, when the reputation of the hon. gentleman was at stake, when the suspicion of the public mind was so deep that every man believed what was said with regard to this transaction and his connection with it, one would have imagined that, if Mr. Black had been his friend, as he described him to be, he would have taken advantage of the earliest opportunity, that he would have come forward willingly, let alone being summoned, that he would have come before that committee in order to exonerate under oath the hon. gentleman from all connection with that transaction. Did he do so? Not at all. He kept out of the way; he would not attend that committee; and he only made the suspicion deeper in the public mind, because every one knew that, if Mr. Black had one word to say in favour of the hon. gentleman, he would have been only too glad to have come there to give him the benefit of his testimony. The hon. gentleman had again referred to the old question of Union, and had endeavoured to shelter himself behind the actions of men in Ontario and elsewhere, of gentlemen who led public opinion in Ontario and elsewhere. But that did not relieve the hon. member from the position in which he (Mr. Jones) placed him. The hon. member was the head of the Government that was elected in 1863, without any reference to the question of Union at all. The hon. gentleman took upon himself to send a delegation to Prince Edward Island to meet a delegation from Canada, and subsequently that delegation met in Quebec; and at Quebec was originated the first scheme of Union. When the hon. gentleman brought that scheme back to Nova Scotia, there was such an outburst of indignation against the measure that the hon. gentleman was obliged at once to withdraw it. A second scheme was formed in 1865 and 1866; and, from the day that that scheme was mooted up to the time that it was so improperly passed by the Local Legislature, there was one feeling of opposition from one end of Nova Scotia to the other, and the floors of Parliament were flooded with petitions against the passage of the Act without appealing to the people. The hon. gentleman need draw no consolation from the action of hon. gentlemen in Ontario and Quebec. These hon. gentlemen understood the position; they understood the wants, and they were supposed to understand the feelings, of their own people; but, whether they were right or wrong, it was no excuse to the hon. gentleman for having taken an unwarrantable advantage, for having taken an unwarrantable liberty with the people of Nova Scotia—for having changed the constitution of that country, which was equal to a revolution, and denied the people the opportunity of expressing their opinion upon it until the act was consummated. The hon. gentleman said he passed it by a large majority in the House. He (Mr. Jones) was not going to say here, to-night, how that measure was carried. It was known that a large number of gentlemen, who were originally opposed to it, under the management of the hon. gentleman, by seats in the Senate, by seats in the Legislative Council, through means which he knew so well how to employ when they were at his disposal, converted a minority into a majority on that question in the House. It would stand as a lasting disgrace to him as a public man that, on that question of Union, he denied the people of Nova Scotia the right of speaking on their own behalf. He might endeavour to make what explanation he liked with regard to his lectures; he might have his opinion upon that or any other subject; but he had no authority from the people of Nova Scotia—he was never delegated with power from the people of Nova Scotia to make such a radical change in their constitution without first asking the authority of the people from whom that authority was derived. The hon. gentleman said that he (Mr. Jones) was a supporter of his at the time he (Mr. Tupper) refused to go to the dockyard to meet the Prince of Wales. He denied it entirely. At the time the hon. gentleman referred to, he (Mr. Jones) took no interest in politics at all. It was not till 1863, when Mr. Howe, as he thought very improperly, held his position in the Government after he had been appointed Fishery Commissioner, and endeavoured to throw the shield of his popularity over Mr. Archibald and Mr. Wire, and other members who were then leading the Government, that he took an active part for the first time in public matters in Nova Scotia. He did not even know the hon. gentleman. He remembered well the day the hon. gentleman came and saw him in his office, on the dissolution of 1863 taking place, three years after the Prince of Wales visited Halifax; and the hon. gentleman would remember, if he called to his remembrance the circumstance, that he (Mr. Tupper) came and introduced himself to him in his office, the first time he had ever seen him. He was no follower of the hon. gentleman's, and no colleague of his. When he heard that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) had refused to attend the reception of the Prince of Wales, he (Mr. Jones) was as indignant as any one, and it was owing to the pressure of the party outside, through Mr. Johnston, who desired that the hon. gentleman should attend, that he was ultimately compelled to yield to the wishes of his party and meet the Prince at Halifax dockyard on that occasion. He might have been one of the first to receive the Prince, but he was one of the last to consent to receive him; and it was perfectly consistent with the career of the hon. gentleman that, having once taken the step, he would go forward and follow His Royal Highness through Nova Scotia as long as His Royal Highness would permit him. The hon. member for Cumberland had referred to the question of the winter port. When speaking on that point the other night he (Mr. Jones) said the question of the winter port was settled almost twelve months ago; and it was not before the public as a new question at the time of his last election.

MR. JONES.

MR. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear.

MR. JONES said that, when in 1876 the Intercolonial was completed, the Government took the earliest opportunity to direct the mails to be landed at Halifax, which was thus recognized as the winter port of the Dominion. Last winter the mails going to and coming from England were received at and departed from Halifax.

MR. MACKENZIE: And freight.

MR. JONES said the hon. member for Cumberland had alleged that they had sent Mr. Black to the Government. They never did so, and they now found that Mr. Black was playing his own little game. He (Mr. Jones) nominated Mr. Black to proceed to the west and visit the brokers and merchants of the country, and show them that the route by Halifax was the cheapest route to Europe. Afterwards, Mr. Black visited Ottawa, in company with Sir Hugh Allan, and brought to Halifax a letter from Mr. Mackenzie of the most satisfactory character. There was no talk of the winter port question at the time he (Mr. Jones) vacated his seat. That question was one in which the public generally were interested. The Chamber of Commerce, City Council and Importers' Association sent Mr. Black, and on returning to Halifax he informed the committee which had appointed him that the Government had met him fairly on every question. Mr. Mackenzie had given him a letter, stating that the Government would put forth every effort to make Halifax the winter port. Mr. Black subsequently stated that Mr. Mackenzie had inserted a restriction that grain should not come from Chicago. He (Mr. Jones) said that such was quite impossible, that Mr. Mackenzie in his letter laid down no such restriction, and he thereupon sent a telegram to Mr. Mackenzie: "Did you intend any restrictions with Black, or is your letter to be read as you put it." Mr. Mackenzie replied: "I never mentioned to Black any restrictions whatever? I do not care where the grain comes from, as you can see by the letter I gave him on that occasion." That was the whole history. The hon. member for Cumberland declared that he had never threatened Halifax, or brought any improper influence to bear on the electors of Halifax, such as he had charged him (Mr. Jones) with using. At the time of the general election at which he (Mr. Jones) was defeated, the hon. member for Cumberland addressed a letter to the people of Halifax on July 19th, 1872. The hon. member for Cumberland, on the question of the Intercolonial Railway workshops, had made a distinct bribe to the people of Halifax to reject him (Mr. Jones), because in rejecting him they might inflict a blow on the Government and bring the hon. member for Cumberland back to power, thereby leading to the re-establishment of the workshops at Halifax. The hon. gentleman knew he was stating what was untrue in regard to not having used improper influence, for, at a meeting in the Temperance Hall in 1875, that hon. member, when driven to the last extremity of using all influence, proper or improper, made use of a bribe to defeat him (Mr. Jones) and bring the hon. member for Cumberland back to office, by pledging himself that he would bring the Intercolonial Railway works back to Halifax if he ever regained power. The hon. gentleman had adduced the evidence of Mr. Taylor and Mr. Johnson, which would be rightly estimated where he mentioned that those gentlemen were at the head of the workshops, under the régime of the hon. member for Cumberland, and when the famous frauds in connection with Fraser, Reynolds and Company took place, and when the present Government came into office Johnson, the head of the machine shop, was dismissed, and Taylor was placed in a lower position, which he would not accept, and left. The first thing the Government did in 1874, when there were some locomotives being constructed at Halifax, which Mr. Montgomery could not finish, was to complete those to which Mr. Appleton referred, and from that hour to this there had been as many men employed and as much work done as at any previous time. The hon. member for Cumberland had asserted that the workshops were removed from Halifax by the present Government. In the Public Works Department would be found a memorial addressed by his (Mr. Jones's) colleague and himself to the Department when they came to the House in 1874, asking the hon. Minister to bring back to Halifax the workshops. He remembered addressing a meeting in Richmond, and stating that he did not think it was possible to remove the workshops to Richmond, because the Government had incurred a large expenditure at Moncton. He stated, however, that the Government would use all proper and legitimate influence in that direction, but he did not think the removal could be effected. When addressing an audience the other day, a man stood up and said: "I remember your speech respecting workshops. You did not make the promises Mr. Tupper made; I believe you now. I don't believe the promises of that hon. gentleman, because it was only at the last moment, when he thought he would injure you, that he fell back on the promise to re-establish the shops at Halifax, when he has no intention to carry them back." Another election card was a letter sent by the right hon. member for Kingston to his friend the member for Cumberland, in the following terms:—

MR. JONES.

“I feel a personal interest in this matter, as being responsible with my colleagues for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway and its location—for which I was so heartily abused. I am, therefore, naturally anxious to see that railway a success financially and otherwise; and that can only be secured by directing as large a volume of traffic as possible towards and over it, and thus developing and extending the trade of its great terminus at Halifax. I hope the Government won't be blind to this great object, and that they may be induced to make an extra effort for the purpose. If they do not they will fail of their duty, and will be reminded of their failure at the next general elections.”

That letter was no doubt written for the occasion, because it never saw the light of day until it was printed in the hon. gentleman's organ on the 28th January, one day before the Halifax election. Yet, from the hon. gentleman's remarks, it might be imagined that he would scorn any attempt to change the opinions of the electors of Halifax by any such influences. Nevertheless, it appeared from his own organ that he not only made promises publicly and through the press, but, at the last moment before the Halifax election, published a letter from the right hon. member for Kingston, stating that the Government would be derelict in their duty if they did not do everything in their power to develop and extend the trade of the great terminus of Halifax. The House would now be in a position to judge as to what value should be placed on the evidence which the hon. member for Cumberland had quoted on the present occasion. The hon. gentleman had stated that those were old stale charges, and that he (Mr. Jones) had made the charge of mis-stating facts against him and had not proved it. He had not made a single statement in support of which he could not bring ample and sufficient proof. When he referred to that fact, he gave the proofs to the House. Were not Mr. Archibald's letters sufficient proof to the House to force conviction on every fair-minded man? But, when Mr. Archibald was applied to by the hon. gentleman for a certificate of character, he wrote one of the most guarded letters that any man could commit to paper. It might be supposed that he would say: “I did not mean, and I did not say, anything of the kind.” He had the opportunity to do that when the hon. gentleman wrote him that note, because they were friends—an opportunity to say that not only he did not say so, but that he did not believe it then, and he did not believe it now. Did Mr. Archibald say anything of the kind? No; he said: “If you will refer to my speech which was delivered on that occasion you will find that I did not make such a charge.” He (Mr. Jones) thought a great many things occurred in public matters which were similar to trials in the old country in criminal matters, and were said to be “not proven.” But the same conviction rested on the public mind that the man accused in such cases was guilty as if the verdict of guilty had been brought in against him. The hon. gentleman said that he (Mr. Jones) had brought these old stale charges against him; they were not old stale charges in that House at all events; and it was because the hon. gentleman felt that there were true charges, and that they would go throughout the country and stamp him as an unreliable public man, that he had shown so much temper that evening and on previous occasions. If he thought to cow him (Mr. Jones) by such charges as he had made, he had mistaken his man. He was not afraid to meet the hon. gentleman in open discussion, and whatever public record they might have he was willing to discuss in this House or, as he had discussed it lately, before the electors of Halifax, who had given him their verdict. When the hon. gentleman was in Halifax the other day, he (Mr. Jones) referred to some of those matters—to some of them only because they were well understood there—but in this House it was because hon. members were not aware of these matters that it was in the interest of good Government that the public should be made aware of the previous character of the hon. gentleman who was seeking to hold a prominent position in this country in the future. It would be an unfortunate day for the people of Canada if the hon. gentleman should ever be placed in an uncontrollable position. It was a fortunate thing that the Government had introduced a Bill to appoint a public auditor who should be beyond the control of Parliament, because if such a misfortune should happen, at any future time, that the hon. gentleman should be associated with the Government of the country, he would not be able to carry out the practice, which he himself had insinuated that he carried out before, of touching the auditor on the shoulder and asking him to pass his own accounts or the accounts of friends in whom he was interested. He (Mr. Jones) was unwilling to bring these matters before the House, but he would never allow the hon. gentleman to bring those old, stale charges forward and, by repeating them, to get fastened on the public mind a statement which had been proved not to be a fact. General Doyle had it simply repeated to him; he only heard it at second-hand and never knew anything about it himself; and he was the first man to approach him (Mr. Jones) and ask him for a reconciliation, and he was sure General Doyle would be very much annoyed at the use made of his name in that discussion. He (Mr. Jones) did not think the hon. gentlemen need be alarmed about His Excellency the Governor-General being aware of his (Mr. Jones's) position on that or any other matter. His public character or position did not rest upon any such frail basis as the words of the hon. member for Cumberland. He now occupied an office which had been filled by a man on whose head a reward was set.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES said hon. gentlemen might say "hear, hear," but he did not wish to say anything against his predecessor (Sir George Cartier), and he only mentioned it to show the hypocrisy of the men who were making those charges against himself when they had been associated in the Government of Canada with a man of Sir George Cartier's antecedents. Now, at this last moment, those super-loyal gentlemen had discovered that it was not proper that he (Mr. Jones) should be a member of that Government, but the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) was neither a model in loyalty nor in political morality for any hon. member to follow. When he (Mr. Jones) sought a model in either he should take a higher standard than the hon. member for Cumberland, and as long as he occupied a position as a member of the Government he should hold an independent position. He was not going to sink into a position of slavery because he was a member of the Government. He held the same opinions now as he held before, and those opinions would be endorsed by every intelligent voter of Nova Scotia. When the hon. gentleman had nothing new to bring forward, but simply to try and explain away his own inconsistencies, he brought up these old charges; and he (Mr. Jones) had felt bound to show how hard-driven the hon. gentleman must be; how he must have felt the force of the observations made by him (Mr. Jones) the other night; how, in the averted faces of his friends, he must have seen that he was looked upon as having been guilty of transgressions in his own country that would not bear the investigation of Parliament. The hon. gentleman need not be afraid of his (Mr. Jones's) position; he would take care of that; and he warned the hon. gentleman to take care of his own.

MR. JONES.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he felt that he could not properly allow some of the remarks of the hon. gentleman who had just spoken to pass without observation. He had said that he was not afraid of the hon. member for Cumberland, or of discussing matters with him in this House and that he had had discussions with him on the subject in the Province of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) probably still thought he was in Nova Scotia, and carrying on an election contest, because, in his speech on this occasion, he had set aside every parliamentary rule of propriety in the course he had taken. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not hesitate to say that a more unparliament-tary, and, in a parliamentary sense, a more discreditable speech could not possibly have been made by an hon. member than the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Halifax. The hon. member was charged—properly charged, if the hon. the member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) chose to take the responsibility of making the charge—that there were a number of reasons why he ought not, in the opinion of the hon. member for Cumberland, to hold his position as a member of the Cabinet. His hon. friend the member for Cumberland might have been erroneous in his views, and the hon. member (Mr. Jones) might be the most proper person to be one of the confidential advisers of the Crown. The hon. member for Cumberland might be right or wrong in that, but he had a right to hold those views. The hon. the Premier, when he held the position which he (Sir John A. Macdonald) now held, said that it was the duty of the Opposition to criticise the Government either in regard to their administration, their legislation, or their composition. The hon. member for Cumberland had taken the ground that the hon. member for Halifax ought not to be a member of the Government and ought not to be a confidential adviser of the Crown, and he had a right to take that ground. His reasons were parliamentary. There was not a single word or expression used by him that was not parliamentary. He had the right to charge the hon. member, if he thought proper, with being unworthy of a place in the councils of the Sovereign. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) was not arguing for the moment that his hon. friend the member for Cumberland was correct in his conclusions; but, if he had come to those conclusions, he had a right to state them, and then it was the bounden duty of the hon. member for Halifax to answer the attack. Did the hon. gentleman answer that attack? No; he turned round and, in the most unparliamentary way, without any relevancy in the world, said—there was the Pictou Railway, and the Springhill Mines, and the lease by the hon. member for Cumberland of a house in Halifax, and therefore the hon. member for Cumberland was not to attack him or make charges against him. The hon. gentleman tried to divert the attention of the House from the charges which, in a parliamentary way, were brought against him by the hon. member for Cumberland by trying to slang that hon. gentleman.

MR. CASEY: Order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he would assert that the language of the hon. gentleman was slang, and unparliamentary slang; and he had no doubt the Speaker would say that, in using that language, he (Sir John A. Macdonald) was perfectly in order, and that the hon. member for West Elgin was perfectly out of order.

MR. CASEY said the point of order he had raised was that the right hon. gentleman had used the words "unparliamentary slang."

MR. SPEAKER: I hardly understand what it means, I never heard of slang in that way.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones), feeling the lash on his back, and the manner in which he had been punished, had writhed like a toad under the harrow; and, like a sailor when tied at the gangway, had begun to blaspheme and swear at the man who ordered the punishment. They all knew—and the hon. gentleman who came from Halifax, which was a naval port, knew—that, when a sailor was tied up at the gangway under the cat, and was writhing under the punishment, he was allowed, by naval rule, to slang and abuse the captain; and he supposed that under no other principle could Mr. Speaker have permitted the hon. gentleman to have gone on, suffering as he (Mr. Jones) must have been under the deserved punishment inflicted by his hon. friend (Mr. Tupper), and abuse his hon. friend in such a manner. They would take the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) on his own ground. What though every word he said against the hon. gentleman was true; what though every one of these charges was well founded; what though his hon. friend (Mr. Tupper) got from his son for the lease of that house $600; what though he

(Mr. Tupper) had made $40,000 out of the railroad; what though the Springhill Mine charge was true; what though he (Mr. Tupper) had committed every crime in the decalogue; admitting all this, he would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) whether his hon. friend was not a representative of the people in the House, and whether he had not duties and responsibilities, as a member of the House, to fulfil; and so, no matter though his hon. friend had committed every crime in the decalogue and known to criminal law, he would ask the hon. gentleman whether his hon. friend had not a right, as a representative in Parliament of the people, to bring the hon. gentleman to account; and whether it was not his hon. friend's duty, though his own crimes and sins extended from pitch and toss to manslaughter, to do so. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) maintained that his hon. friend had a right to bring up the hon. gentleman on those charges, and it was no answer for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) to say: "Oh, I may have committed all these crimes and sins, but it does not rest in your mouth to say so."

MR. JONES: Did I refer to any point the hon. member for Cumberland did not refer to?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Why, my hon. friend was replying to the argument—the unparliamentary speech which the hon. gentleman made yesterday.

MR. JONES: You will find that he replied before.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: No; he did not reply to that before. The hon. gentleman took good care in his answers to the indictment preferred against him before the House and before the country, and that this country preferred against him, not to give my hon. friend an opportunity to reply; my hon. friend had no such opportunity. He could not, by parliamentary rules, answer those charges. My hon. friend had risen to a personal explanation in which he was limited to a short time. My hon. friend had an opportunity to explain and go into the facts and charges brought by the hon. gentleman. The question brought before the House by my hon. friend was whether the hon. gentleman was fit to be in the Cabinet or not. I am not going over all the ground, and I do not think that the hon. gentleman would like me to do so, and enter into all the points which have been brought up by my hon. friend one after another. There is the question of the flag.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

MR. JONES: Hear, hear.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I hear the laugh, but this is a loyal country.

MR. JONES: Hear, hear.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman may laugh and may attempt to sneer down the charges that have been brought against him.

AN HON. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: But the hon. gentleman did not sneer when this charge was first made. He then got up and said it was a falsehood—"I pronounce it a falsehood"—and he now pronounces it a false slander. But who told this falsehood? Who perpetrated this false slander? I would ask the hon. gentleman.

MR. JONES: Whoever states it states a falsehood, and whoever repeats it.

SOME HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman says it is a foul slander and a base falsehood.

MR. JONES: Yes.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He then repeated it as to an original statement?

MR. JONES: Yes.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The first man who repeated it was that fine loyal old soldier, Sir Hastings Doyle.

MR. JONES: He did not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: He was the first man who repeated it.

MR. JONES: He did not.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The first man who repeated it was that fine old soldier, Sir Hastings Doyle.

MR. JONES: No, no.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes; it was Sir Hastings Doyle.

MR. JONES: No, no.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order, order.

MR. DYMOND: I rise to a point of order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am not out of order.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman rises to a point of order.

MR. DYMOND: It is this: I ask you whether, according to English parliamentary practice—and Canadian parliamentary practice falls under the same precedent, when a gentleman has once given a solemn declaration on the floor of Parliament that a charge is false, it is parliamentary to repeat that charge, unless it is to formulate it against him as an accusation which he must prove or disprove.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I desire to speak to this point of order. The point I am speaking to at this moment is a charge brought by the hon. the Minister of Militia, that the Chief Justice of the Province of Nova Scotia, Judge Desbarres, Sir Hastings Doyle, the Hon. Mr. Vail, and Mr. Thompson, are all liars, and have misrepresented facts.

MR. JONES: I wish to speak to this point of order. The question was this: he (Sir John A. Macdonald) said that Sir Hastings Doyle was the first man who repeated this statement, and this is not the case. Sir William Young was the first man who repeated it to Sir Hastings Doyle.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Oh, no.

MR. SPEAKER: I think there is no violation of order, for this reason: that the hon. member for Kingston, as I understand the matter, was stating that such an assertion was made, and not that it was true. If he said that the assertion was true, he would be entirely out of order; but, as it is, the hon. gentleman is in order.

An HON. MEMBER: Do you believe it?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Well, I cannot say—well, I do believe it, if you want to know.

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. gentleman is now entirely out of order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Well, then, in a parliamentary sense, I do not believe it; but, in the other sense, I do. I say that the hon. gentleman stated that any man who repeated that charge committed a foul slander. He declared that the first man who made that statement was Sir William Young. He did not repeat it, for this was the original statement. The original statement was this: that the hon. the Minister of Militia did make such a statement; he made that statement, and that was the statement made to Sir Hastings Doyle, that old soldier, that man of high honour, that kindly old man, that gallant old soldier, who would never have said such a thing if he did not believe it to be perfectly true. I am glad to count him among my friends. I believe it, and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that he (Sir Hastings Doyle) believed that charge, or he would not have written to my hon. friend (Mr. Tupper) in the way he did.

MR. JONES: It was not true; he was misinformed.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman knows that there is no doubt that, when the news of these proceedings reach Sir Hastings Doyle, he will repeat it and I venture to say that Sir Hastings Doyle will endorse every word contained in the letter which has been published. I have no doubt whatever about it, and I tell you this: I shall make it my business to see that this will be brought before Sir Hastings Doyle, and, if he is alive, I shall be able to lay before Parliament the statement that he does not retract one single word of that charge.

MR. JONES: The papers have gone.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Why did Sir Hastings Doyle write to his hon. friend (Mr. Tupper)? He wrote to him because he believed the charge to be true. Did they think that he would have written a letter like that from Halifax, in his capacity as Governor, to the hon. member for Cumberland in order that he (Mr. Tupper) might convey that information to friends in Ottawa, and to the people of Canada, of the conduct and the language, the disloyal, the improper language of the hon. the Minister of Militia? Was this fine old soldier a promulgator of slanders which he did not believe? Was he going to scrape together slanders and unfounded statements made against any man? Was he likely to spread abroad unfounded, false, slanderous gossip as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) contended? for the hon. gentleman contended that this was a false and slanderous statement, Would he send it up for the purpose, send it up with the intention of being used, in order that the people of Ottawa, in order that the Parliament of Canada, in order that the representatives of the people should not be mistaken about the character of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones)? Sir Hastings Doyle could not have been mistaken; there was no mistake or misapprehension, and the hon. gentleman, who had come up here and taken the oath of allegiance, had said that he would be glad when the British flag was torn down. That gallant old soldier would not have written that letter if he did not believe it to be true; and why did he believe it to be true? Because of the evidence of a man of honour, of high position, and of the statements of a man to whose position the hon. gentleman would never attain if he achieved the highest dreams of his ambition. The hon. gentleman could not hope to equal him for character, for social position, or literary standing.

Some HON. MEMBERS: Order.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I am not impugning the position of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) without witnesses.

MR. JONES: Who?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Judge Desbarres.

MR. JONES: Judge Desbarres' name was not mentioned.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: In the first letter?

MR. JONES: No.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I say it was.

MR. JONES: Where?

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Look at the first letter and you will see.

MR. TUPPER: It is mentioned there.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Yes, it is. The names of Sir William Young, Judge Desbarres, and Mr. Thompson are mentioned.

MR. TUPPER: These three names are certainly mentioned.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that these three names were mentioned in the first letter, or he was greatly mistaken. With respect to the amount of evidence brought to prove it, and the evidence which forced a kindly old gentleman like Sir Hastings Doyle to take the responsibility of making this statement, and hold up that hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) and authorize the hon. member for Cumberland to hold him up to the public as a disloyal man, there was the evidence of those three men, Sir William Young, Justice Desbarres, and Mr. Thompson, and, in the second letter, the name of Mr. Vail was mentioned. Now, the hon. the Minister of Militia said in his speech just now that he had proved beyond a doubt to the mind of every honest man in the country that a job had been committed on the part of the hon. member for Cumberland with respect to the Pictou Railway, because he had produced the words of a speech of Mr. Archibald, delivered in the House of Assembly concerning that matter, and because he read that speech, although the charge was made in the course of an attack on the Government, by the leader of the Opposition against one of the leaders of the Administration; although that was merely made in Parliament, yet that speech did not convey the charge which the hon. gentleman wished to fasten on his hon. friend (Mr. Tupper), of having improperly taken advantage of his position as Minister to put money in his pocket. Although that charge was not contained in it, although no personal dishonour was attached to it, and although, in the letter subsequently written, Mr. Archibald had disavowed the making of any such accusation, yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) said that to the mind of every honest, candid man, the statement of Mr. Archibald, the leader of the Opposition, was convincing. This was the same as if the speeches of the hon. the Premier while he sat in this House opposing him (Sir John A. Macdonald) for the last ten years, were to be kept as final evidence against him (Sir John A. Macdonald), and that any speech which he (Sir John A. Macdonald) was to make against the hon. gentleman in his position of leader of the Opposition could be kept and taken as evidence against him ten years hence. The hon. gentleman would not like that, and yet that was the evidence, the irrefragable evidence, which he brought up against his hon. friend (Mr. Tupper) to show that there was something wrong, and that some jobbery was committed in connection with the Pictou Railway, although Mr. Archibald had afterwards explicitly denied under his hand that he had intended to make a charge of personal dishonour or of personal complicity in this connection on the part of the hon. member for Cumberland. But, supposing that Mr. Archibald used language which reflected upon his hon. friend, must they accept the statement of Mr. Archibald, a political opponent, the leader of the Opposition, a statement made in the hot struggle of Parliament, in parliamentary discussion, as a conclusive evidence of the truth of such a charge? And yet he turned round and declared that Sir William Young was a liar, a foul calumniator, that Judge Desbarres was a liar, a foul calumniator; that Mr. Thompson, Howe's son-in-law, was the same; that the lamented Mr. Vail was a liar and foul calumniator. This was the statement of the hon. gentleman, that these four men had all told lies, and were all guilty of perpetrating a foul slander on the hon. gentleman. Would anybody believe that? He did not believe that the majority, if sworn jurymen, would come to the conclusion to set aside the statement of four men like these because the hon. gentleman said he did not say it, and produced a newspaper in which this portion of his speech was conveniently left out. His hon. friend (Mr. Tupper) had shown how things, in the most marvellous and mysterious way disavowed by everybody, were eliminated from speeches in the public press. Nobody knew how this happened, but yet these eliminations took place when any matters which would be very inconvenient were in question. They saw how this was done. His hon. friend (Mr. Jones) said, on looking back at his speech, that he did not find that he had ever used any such language, and, therefore, that everybody who said the contrary were liars, scoundrels, and calumniators, and that he never done so-and-so. The hon. gentleman had the hardihood to state that the head of the Supreme Court of his own Province, the Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, was a liar and a scoundrel, and that he based this charge on the most improper motive, on the lowest and basest possible motive, because he said that this gentleman, Sir William Young, was politically opposed to him, and on the ground that this gentleman was a warm partisan. And why? Because the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) did not, in his desperation, wish to defend himself against this charge, but Sir William Young said he heard him (Mr. Jones) say it; there could be no mistake about it. The hon. gentleman did use that language, and he did say that he would take off his hat and cheer when the British flag was pulled down. That was vouched for by the Chief Justice, a man who presided at the head of the Courts of law, and who administered the law, both civil and criminal, in the Province of Nova Scotia, and a man on whose judgment he would defend the law, the liberty, the property, and the reputation of every man in the Province of Nova Scotia, including the hon. gentleman himself. He (Mr. Jones) had ventured to say that this gentleman of high standing, of high character, of high position, honoured by the people, honoured by the representatives of the people, honoured by the Crown, the honourable recipient of a title in recognition of his long services, honoured by his own Province as a great and a good and a learned man, and eminent Judge, had lied and foully lied, he had lied in his throat, that he was a calumniator; and that Justice Desbarres was a calumniator, that Justice Desbarres was a liar, because they told Sir Hastings Doyle that that gentleman

(Mr. Jones) did say that he would cheer and wave his hat when the British flag was pulled down from the citadel. Then there was the evidence of Mr. Thompson on this part; but Mr. Thompson, it seemed, was a son-in-law of the great Joseph Howe, and, therefore, unworthy of belief. Although the hon. gentleman had said all this, he asked the House if they were asked to take the statement of a criminal against all these witnesses; the statement of a man on his trial as to the truth of a statement, against the statement of all the witnesses, on his coming before the country and the House to ask them to do so? But the country and the House would not do so. The country and the House and the people of Canada would believe to their dying day that these gentlemen told a true story, and that Sir Hastings Doyle, Governor of the Province of Nova Scotia, and Commander of the Forces, believed that statement. The hon. gentleman said that Sir Hastings Doyle would be shocked at the base use made of his letter; but that gallant old soldier had written that letter to his hon. friend (Mr. Tupper) for the very purpose of making this charge public. When that letter was written it was written to be published and disseminated. His hon. friend had only done what Sir Hastings Doyle had intended should be done. Sir Hastings Doyle had written that letter in order that he might inform Parliament, and show to the country what fashion of a man this was, who was coming up to take the oath of allegiance to his Sovereign, whose flag he would cheer if it were pulled down. Then there was Mr. Vail. Surely the Premier, who had selected him as a man of honour, as a man of integrity, as a man whose word should be believed, would not let Mr. Vail's word be disputed, though they were asked to consider that the Chief Justice, Sir William Young, Judge Desbarres and all these other men were unworthy of belief. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) had supposed that his hon. friend the Minister of Justice would have felt it his duty, when this attack was made upon the character of the Judges of Nova Scotia, to have risen in his place and defended them from such accusations. It seemed to him that it was the duty of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laflamme), when these Judges were branded as liars and scoundrels, to defend Sir William Young and Justice Desbarres from the attack made on their honour, their honesty and their integrity. But the hon. gentleman had sat still. He did not know if the hon. the Premier would allow the same attack to be made on the veracity and the honesty of Mr. Vail. That gentleman was a white Vail when he was a Minister, but he did not know whether he had become a black Vail since the unfortunate affair of Digby. He (Mr. Vail) had retired into private life, but he did not suppose that he had suffered any dishonour—he had been merely unfortunate. It had been the fate of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Vail), to fall at the election. This had very nearly been his (Sir John A. Macdonald's) fate at his last election, and he was told by some hon. gentlemen that it was going to be his fate at the next election. These things would happen; and yet, the day after he had fallen, the day after his misfortune, he was just as honest, just as worthy of belief, and just as veracious, as the day when he held office and was a sworn adviser of the representative of his Sovereign, and the bosom friend and colleague of the hon. gentleman opposite. Notwithstanding this, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) declared that Mr. Vail was a man unworthy of belief. The hon. gentleman said that any man who repeated the statement in question was a foul slanderer. Well, Mr. Vail had repeated that statement, and Sir Hastings Doyle had repeated it.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

MR. JONES: Mr. Vail was not present.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman said that whoever originally made the statement or repeated it was a slanderer and a liar. Then Mr. Vail was a liar. The hon. gentleman had recommended and put Mr. Vail into the Cabinet, because, at that time, it was not convenient for him to take his place in the Cabinet. Mr. Vail was sent there and put into the Ministry in order to keep the seat warm for his hon. friend (Mr. Jones) for fear that the eggs should addle. He (Mr. Vail) sat on the eggs until the hon. gentleman was ready to hatch them. He (Mr. Jones) put Mr. Vail into the Government, and now it appeared there was no one so poor as to do him reverence; and it was strange in what an unceremonious manner the hon. gentleman had been shoved out into the cold. At this time the hon. gentleman (Mr. Jones) took a little journey, and rode a little more, as the hon. the Premier would say, than a Sabbath-day's journey, on his way to Quebec, in order to supply Mr. Vail's place. It looked very like it. Scant courtesy had been shown that gentleman (Mr. Vail). In Ireland, when a criminal was about to be beheaded, after sentence had been passed, he was accustomed to pray to the Lord, to give him a long day. The hon. gentleman had not given Mr. Vail a long day. To be sure, when he first came into the Government, they were told what an able man he was, what a valuable acquisition he was, what additional strength he was to the Government. Among the Ministerial supporters of Nova Scotia, they were told that Mr. Vail's super-eminent abilities, super-eminent qualities, and the claims, the paramount claims, which he had upon the Government, for the position to which he was invited—although he was a perfectly new man in the House, and although, previously, he never sat in the Dominion Parliament. They did not give Mr. Vail much time to think about it, and, although they said that when he came into the Government he would be an additional strength to the Government, it was a relief to the Premier to get rid of him, and it was said that to get rid of him would also additionally strengthen the Government. He evidently had not proved to be so much of a soldier as it was thought he would, and his inability to carry the Militia Estimates, which the Premier had to do for him, did not speak well for his acquaintance with his Department. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not think that the late Minister of Militia should have been appointed, but at the same time he held that he should not be called a liar or a foul slanderer because he happened to repeat the accusation against the member for Halifax, and because he had been unfortunate. It was said that the road to a certain place was paved with good intentions, and it seemed that Mr. Vail had been busy paving. True, it might be, as Mr. Vail said, that Mr. Jones would cheer when the flag was pulled down, but that he (Mr. Jones) said he did not want to fight England, he only wanted to fight Canada. England and the Dominion must be severed in order that Canada and Nova Scotia might fight. But, said the Minister of Militia, if that was a little rebellious, if there was a little treason in it, Sir George Cartier was, at one time, a rebel too. Could such a defence as that be set up in the Parliament of Canada? There was, at the time that Sir George took up arms, a great struggle, and some of those who took up arms paid the penalty of their act by dying on the scaffold or in the field. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) did not believe the hon. gentleman would have been bold enough to take up arms as Sir George Cartier did. The hon. the Minister of Militia was like mine Ancient Pistol, who spoke brave words at the bridge, but who was dismissed for cowardice. He could speak brave words at the bridge, he could say that he would cheer when the flag was pulled down, but he would not take up arms and pull it down. And, in his desperation now, he insulted everybody standing higher than himself, and brought charges against the hon. member for Cumberland which he could not prove. It would not do, and, so long as he was in Parliament, and had anything to do with the affairs of the Dominion, it would be remembered by every loyal man that he was the man who, because the Provinces were united by Confederation, was anxious to set Nova Scotia against Canada, and to sever the connection between the British Crown and the Dominion in order to bring that about. The country must believe the evidence of Sir William Young, Judge Desbarres, Mr. Thompson, and his (Mr. Jones's) friend and colleague, Mr. Vail. The country would say that he had been guilty, and as long as he was in the Cabinet, the country would say: there sits a Minister of Militia who said what was treasonable, and has not repented of it at this moment.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was quite sure that every hon. member who had witnessed the pitiable exhibition which the hon. gentleman had made of himself would feel compassion for the weakness he had displayed. The right hon. member for Kingston had been celebrated throughout his public life for the vigorous coarseness of his abuse of the public men with whom he had come in contact, and he had not scrupled to exercise that kind of abuse towards even those who had been his own colleagues, when he found it necessary to trample them down that he might triumph. The hon. the Minister of Militia had just won a great triumph at Halifax, notwithstanding the tremendous and the improper influences which had been used against him; and his victory was not only a personal one, but he had defeated that which hon. gentlemen opposite had hoped would be a serious embarrassment to the Ministry, at the very time when they thought it was within their grasp. The vigour with which the hon. the Minister of Militia had defended himself, showed that he was not a man to be put down, even by the noise and vituperation of the hon. member for Cumberland; and, for having thus defended himself, that hon. gentleman and his friends would never forgive him. This system of abuse of the Minister of Militia had been initiated by the member for Cumberland, and the House would agree with him that his attempts and those of his friends to put down the member for Halifax had utterly failed. It seemed to be the deliberate purpose of hon. gentlemen opposite to make the political life of those gentlemen who ventured to dispute their dicta as disagreeable as possible. He would ask why the right hon. gentleman from Kingston should parade his loyalty?—He, who had been an associate of the men who burned down the Parliament buildings; who was associated with the men who had hoisted the black flag to insult the Governor-General; who was associated with the men who had formed a league at Kingston to drive the French into the sea,

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

to use their own words; who was associated with the men who pelted the Governor-General with rotten eggs; who was associated with the men who hoisted the black flag of independence at Sandwich,—the man who had as a colleague him who threatened to use the bayonets of Nova Scotia against the people of the Western Provinces. After the explicit denial of the Minister of Militia that he had uttered the sentiments attributed to him, the member for Kingston should be desirous to accept this statement from one who no one could deny was an honourable man. But it was not the object of the hon. gentlemen opposite to get a satisfactory explanation, but to heap as much dirt as they could upon the character of a political opponent—to humble, if they could, the standing of an honourable member of this House. But the country would know the object of this tirade of abuse that had been uttered by the two hon. gentlemen opposite, and would value it precisely as he (Mr. Mackenzie) did, and that was as being worth a little less than nothing.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said that was about the value they would place on the Premier's word.

MR. MACKENZIE said he would venture to assert that his word would pass where the hon. gentleman's would not. Those who were constantly making assertions like the hon. gentleman, and abusing every person else, must be very bad themselves. It was an undoubted evidence of innate depravity. He would not reply to the personal remarks of the hon. gentleman, as he (Mr. Mackenzie) would be willing to have his word go with that of the hon. gentleman before the country, and was quite prepared to accept its judgment between them. The right hon. gentleman spoke about setting aside parliamentary law and order. He himself was out of order a dozen times, and was called to order several times; and then he spoke, to avoid his being out of order, by digressions in a direction by which he reached the same point, but in such a discursive manner as to avoid the direct charge of being out of order. But even with that he was out of order, because no member was permitted to evade the point of order in that way, especially if that evasion was for the purpose of discrediting the word of another gentleman on the floor of the House. When the right hon. gentleman ventured to lecture gentlemen on this side of the House for being out of order, he ought to set a somewhat different example. The right hon. gentleman referred to Mr. Vail. It was very easy to abuse a man behind his back; and that the right hon. gentleman was particularly good at doing. He was much more brave behind a man's back, generally, than he was to his face. Mr. Vail, whatever his faults, or his excellencies, was not now before the House; and should not be made the subject of hostile criticism in this House. Mr. Vail was a gentleman whom every person respected for his private and personal worth, as well as for his political integrity. He might be a defeated man for the moment; he might appear again in political life, and he might never appear; but they were bound, at all events, to show a decent respect in the amenities of life to those who occupied the position that he did. The right hon. gentleman had endeavoured, by every means in his power, to throw discredit alike upon Mr. Vail and upon the Minister of Militia; and, over the head of the Minister of Militia, to vent his ill-feelings towards the other hon. gentleman. The right hon. gentleman had repeatedly said to-night that his hon. friend (Mr. Jones) had called the Chief Justice of the Province of Nova Scotia a liar and a slanderer. No such language was used. What was said was that any one that persisted in making that statement was circulating a slander and telling a falsehood; but, no matter what position the man might occupy in this country, he must not be allowed to use that position to shelter him in statements that were incorrect. If the Chief Justice made the assertion that he heard this statement, when his hon. friend (Mr. Jones) was conscious of not having made the statement, he had no right to do that; and the mere fact that he happened to be Chief Justice must not shield him from a statement which implied that he had been stating what was incorrect, either from hearsay or otherwise. He knew that no one was more ready than the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) to use the very strongest language, no matter to whom it might apply; and they knew, from the language used by the right hon. gentleman's colleague, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper), towards Lord Mulgrave, that he was sinning against the highest person in the Province in the language that he used. It would appear, from remarks that the right hon. gentleman made, that anything that was said on that side of the House was to be believed as a matter of course. It was supposed, also, that gentlemen on that side of the House were to be at liberty to attack hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side in any way they pleased, and they were not to be replied to. He told the right hon. gentleman, once for all, that he could not persist in these tactics with impunity; but that he would be answered as frequently as the attack was made, and answered in a way that perhaps he would not expect. It was just as well that both sides of the House should understand that such tactics as had been pursued in the course of this debate, towards members of the Government and gentlemen on the Government side of the House, were not only outrageous in their character, but were altogether at variance with that parliamentary courtesy which was necessary for the transaction of business. The right hon. gentleman quoted Shakespeare to show that his hon. friend (Mr. Jones) was very brave in words, but not very brave in deeds; that he might speak bravely, but he would fight but little; and that Sir George Cartier backed up his words by his acts, and that he fought. He was afraid the right hon. gentleman's historical memory failed him. If he recollected aright, Sir George had used words, but when it came to the use of weapons, he was the first in the flight, and the others were after him; it was a race, and not a battle.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: You will not, I am sure, slander the dead. Sir George Cartier fought at St. Denis from morning until night.

MR. MACKENZIE: I do not want to slander the dead; I never had a difference in my life with Sir George Cartier, and I have no reason to say an unkind word of him. The right hon. gentleman took up Sir George Cartier's name to suit his purpose; but I must not use it to bring out the truth, it appears—the old story. He can do what he likes, but we must not mention any name.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: You are mistaken.

MR. MACKENZIE: That is the popular rumour; perhaps the right hon. gentleman was there also.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I have the personal testimony of General Wolford Nelson, who told me himself, and who was in command at St. Denis.

MR. LAURIER: It is matter of history that Sir George Cartier left the field of St. Denis before the battle of St. Denis had commenced.

MR. MASSON: Slander; slander.

MR. MACKENZIE said that one of the few occasions on which that hon. member and himself had anything like a warm debate in this House, he recollected very well saying in a jocular way across the House what he had said to-night as a matter of history; and he recollected very well that there was no response, except a little feeling. There was no denial of it at all. However, he was quite willing to accept the statement of any person who said he knew the fact. He wished to point out, however, that gentlemen must not expect to use names, and not have the real facts of the case connected with the person brought out. He had no desire to say anything further in reference to this somewhat painful debate, which had been provoked entirely, as he considered, by the unmerited and extraordinary course pursued by the hon. member for Cumberland in attacking the Minister of Militia. He had only to say, in conclusion, that gentlemen on the opposite side might depend on it that such attacks could not be permitted to be made with impunity.

Motion agreed to.

Motion made and question proposed:

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD.

“3. That we are happy to learn from His Excellency, that the arbitration on the Fishery claims, under the terms of the Washington Treaty, has been concluded, and an award has been made by the Commissioners of $5,500,000 as compensation to Canada and Newfoundland for the use of their fisheries during the term of the present Treaty, and that we feel, with His Excellency, that, although this amount is much less than that claimed by His Excellency's Government, yet that, having assented to the creation of the tribunal for the determination of their value, we are bound loyally to assent to the decision given.

“4. That we are glad to know that the exhibition of Canadian manufactures and products at Sydney, New South Wales, was successfully carried out; that we trust, with His Excellency, that the result will be the opening up of a new market for Canadian goods even in so remote a region as the Australasian colonies, shipments of Canadian productions having already been made; and that, although the expenditure will slightly exceed the estimate, we doubt not the cost to Canada will be amply repaid by the extension of her trade.”

Motions agreed to.

Motion made and question proposed.

“5. That we thank His Excellency for informing us that preparations have been uninterruptedly carried on during the last six months for securing an ample but select exhibition of Canada's products and manufactures at the great exhibition to be held at Paris during the current year; that a further estimate will be required to meet the expenditure, and that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, as Chairman of the British Commissioners, has assigned a most prominent place to Canada in one of the main towers, where a Canadian trophy is now being erected.”

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he wished to impress upon the Premier the importance of helping those who intended to be exhibitors, by the purchase of goods, holding the goods as security; thus, enabling them to transmit their goods to Paris, as was done in the previous Exhibition at Paris in 1867. Unless this were done, he feared the most ingenious, and the best of our manufactures would, for want of means, in these hard times, to raise the money, decline to exhibit. In the last Paris Exhibition, the Government advanced about three-fourths of the value of the goods exhibited, and got some beautiful articles sent in consequence.

MR. MACKENZIE said that the Commissioner, Mr. Keefer, was instructed to secure a fair representation of all the important manufacturers of Canada, if possible, by obtaining a selection from the parties themselves; and, where it was impossible to obtain that, he was to purchase to a limited extent. He was informed by Mr. Keefer, and Mr. Selwyn, who had been assisting him, with Dr. May and Mr. Perrault, that nearly every branch was now fairly represented in the Exhibition. The Government had purchased a few thousand dollars' worth, but not of very serious amount.

MR. MITCHELL asked for information in regard to the subject of the fourth paragraph, as sundry newspaper paragraphs had appeared intimating that the United States did not intend to pay the five and a-half millions, according to the award.

MR. MACKENZIE said it would be inconvenient to answer the question now, but at the proper time he would give the information.

Motion agreed to.

Motion made and question proposed :

"6. That while we are grieved to know that a very disastrous fire occurred in June last in the city of St. John, which caused the destruction of a large portion of the city, including all the public buildings owned by the Dominion Government, we feel that His Excellency's Government were right in deeming it necessary to contribute $20,000 to assist in relieving the immediate wants of the people who were rendered destitute by so appalling a calamity, as His Excellency was in sanctioning the appropriation of some public money with which to commence the erection of new buildings for the public business; and that we shall have pleasure in confirming these acts in the usual way.

"7. That we are much gratified to be informed that, during the last summer, His Excellency's Commissioners made another Treaty with the Blackfeet, Blood and Piegan Indians, by which the Indian title is extinguished over a territory of 51,000 square miles west of Treaty No. 4, and south of Treaty No. 6; that the Treaty has been made on terms nearly the same as those under Treaty No. 6, though somewhat less onerous, and the entire territory west of Lake Superior to the Rocky Mountains, and from the boundary nearly to the 55th degree of north latitude, embracing about 40,000 square miles, has now been acquired by peaceful negotiation with the native tribes, who place implicit faith in the honour and justice of the British Crown."

Motions agreed to.

Motion made and question proposed :

"8. That we learn with much interest, that, early in the past summer, a large body of Indians under Sitting Bull, from the United States, crossed into British territory, to escape from the United States troops, and have since remained on the Canadian side; and that the United States Government made a friendly but unsuccessful attempt to induce these Indians to return to their reservations; and that we agree with His Excellency, in hoping that such arrangements may yet be made as may lead to their permanent and peaceful settlement, and thus relieve Canada of a source of uneasiness and a heavy expenditure."

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD proposed that the paragraph be amended by adding, after the word "settlement," the words "and possible removal."

MR. MACKENZIE explained that by the word "settlement," he meant settlement on the reservations. He reminded the right hon. gentleman that the Address had been agreed to, as it stood, by the Senate, and that it would be awkward to alter it in the House. With this explanation, he hoped that the paragraph would pass.

Resolution, amended by the insertion of the words "or return" after "settlement," agreed to.

Motion made and question proposed :

"9. That we are well pleased to know that the surveys of the Pacific Railway have been pressed to completion during the past season; that a complete instrumental survey of the route, by the Valleys of the North Thompson and Lower Fraser Rivers, has been made with a view to ascertain definitely whether that route presents more favorable features than the routes already surveyed to Dean Inlet and Bute Inlet respectively; and that it is believed that the additional information now obtained will enable His Excellency's Government to determine which route is the most advantageous from Tête Jaune Cache to the sea; and that we thank His Excellency for the promise that full information will be laid before us at an early day of the season's work in this and other directions."

MR. TUPPER asked at what time the hon. the Premier would be able to communicate to Parliament the decision the Government had come to in regard to the Pacific Railway.

MR. MACKENZIE said he could not tell, because the Government had not the information before them yet.

MR. TUPPER said he hoped the hon. gentleman would give an opportunity to have the matter fairly reviewed by Parliament.

MR. MACKENZIE: Certainly.

Motion agreed to.

Motion made and question proposed:

"10. That we receive with much pleasure His Excellency's congratulations on the abundant harvest reaped in all quarters of the Dominion, and that, under this and other influences, there has been some improvement in the Revenue returns, thus indicating, as we trust with His Excellency, that the commercial depression that afflicted Canada, in common with other countries, is passing away."

MR. MASSON said he did not believe the commercial depression was passing away, as expressed in this paragraph, and asked the Premier to alter the construction of it so that it might embody the views of all the members of the House.

MR. MACKENZIE said that one hon. member of the Opposition had objected because stronger terms had not been used in the paragraph, and he had heard no one express the views urged by the hon. gentleman, except the hon. gentleman himself.

MR. MASSON said he was not, perhaps, sufficiently conversant with the English language to distinguish the difference between "trust" and "hope." He was of opinion that the depression was not passing away, that there was no indication that it was passing away, and he did not agree with his hon. friend who said that it was unpatriotic to say that it was passing away. Did the members who lived in the city of Montreal think the depression was passing away? In that city he had been told that men had come to the contractors and had said, "For God's sake, give us work, even at half a dollar per day, if you like." If they passed this resolution, these people would consider it ironical. It did not matter whether the impression was right or wrong, the hon. the Prime Minister had no right to ask the House to take such a position on a matter which they could not be certain of until the Budget Speech was before them. They should follow the English usage, and place in the Address nothing which could cause any difference of opinion. It would be a graceful act on the part of the Government to follow the ordinary rule in this case and amend the clause. About the second year after Confederation, there was an expression in the Address which, lawyers contended, did not mean what was desired to be stated. Mr. Dorion objected that there was a difference of opinion as to the words used in the Address, and the right hon. member for Kingston followed the English precedent, and dropped out of the Address the words objected to, so that it might be the unanimous opinion of the House.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. HOLTON said his hon. friend for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) was quite right in the position he assumed, that the House ought not to be invited to compromise members in regard to what might be brought up at a later stage of the Session; but, if the hon. member looked at this clause carefully he would see that his own canon was fulfilled. They were asked to say this:

"That we receive with much pleasure His Excellency's congratulations on the abundant harvest reaped in all quarters of the Dominion, and that under this and other influences there has been some improvement in the Revenue returns, thus indicating, as we trust with His Excellency, that the commercial depression that afflicted Canada in common with other countries, is passing away."

That was a matter of fact communicated to them officially by the Governor-General. All they were asked to say was that they hoped the bountiful harvest and the improvement in the revenue returns might be taken as ground for trust that the depression was passing away, or had begun to pass away.

MR. MASSON said the words "thus indicating" implied that the state of things referred to did exist. The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Gibbs), and every member who had spoken on the position, had declared that the depression was not passing away. He did not suppose the hon. the Minister of Finance wanted to commit them to the statement that it was passing away.

Motion agreed to.

Motion made and question proposed:

"12. That we thank His Excellency for informing us, that his attention having been called to some imperfections in the existing system of auditing the Public Accounts, a measure providing for a more thorough and effective supervision will be submitted for our consideration.

"13. That we share with His Excellency the conviction that the prospect of obtaining, at an early day, greater facilities for reaching the North-Western Territories and the Province of Manitoba, is sure to attract a larger number of settlers every year, and that, as much of the prosperity of the Dominion depends on the rapid settlement of the fertile lands in those territories, it is desirable and necessary to facilitate such settlement as much as possible; and that we are pleased to learn that, in order to effect this, measures will be submitted for our consideration concerning the registration of titles, the enactment of a Homestead Law, and the promotion of railway enterprise in districts not touched by the Canada Pacific Railway.

"14. That we shall give our best attention to any measure submitted to us for better securing the Independence of Parliament.

"15. That, being informed by His Excellency that experience has shown that certain changes may advantageously be made in the departmental arrangements existing at present, we shall respectfully consider any Bill submitted to us for accomplishing this purpose, without increasing the expenditure or the number of Departments.

"16. That we feel with His Excellency, that it is very desirable there should be uniform legislation in all the Provinces respecting the traffic in spirituous liquors, and being aware that hitherto that trade has been regulated by Provincial laws, or laws existing before the Confederation of the Provinces, although there has been lately a conflict of authority as to the jurisdiction of the local authorities, we shall gladly receive any Bill making the necessary provision which may be submitted for our consideration, as we shall also any other measures found necessary for the amendment of existing laws and submitted for our approval.

"17. That we thank His Excellency for the assurance that the Estimates for the ensuing year will be laid before us at an early day, and that they have been prepared with an anxious desire to provide for all the branches of the public service, and the execution of pressing public works within the limits of the expected revenue, without increasing the burden of taxation; and for having directed that the Public Accounts of the past financial year shall be laid before us."

Motions agreed to.

MR. MACKENZIE moved :

"That the said resolution be, referred to a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. Mackenzie, Smith (Westmoreland), Laflamme, Jones, De St. Georges, and Charlton, to draft an Address pursuant thereto."

Motion agreed to.

MR. MACKENZIE, from the Committee, reported the draft of an Address, and the same, being read a second time, was agreed to.

The said Address was then ordered to be engrossed, and to be presented to His Excellency the Governor-General by such members of this House as are of the Honourable the Privy Council.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

COMMITTEE TO PREPARE LISTS APPOINTED

MR. MACKENZIE moved :

"That a Special Committee of seven be appointed to prepare and report lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by this House on Friday, the 8th inst., said Committee to be composed of Mr. Mackenzie, Sir John A. Macdonald, Messrs. Smith (Westmoreland), Blake, Holton, Tupper and Masson."

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

MR. CARTWRIGHT moved :

"That this House will, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty."

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

MR. CARTWRIGHT moved :

"That this House will, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty."

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS.

MR. MACKENZIE laid before the House the Annual Report of the Minister of Public Works for the fiscal year, 1st July, 1876, to 30th June, 1877, on the works under his control.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) laid before the House the Tenth Annual Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, being for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1877.

MR. MILLS laid before the House the Annual Report of the Department of the Interior for the year ended 30th June, 1877.

MR. CARTWRIGHT laid before the House the Public Accounts of Canada for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1877.

MR. LAFLAMME laid before the House the Report of the Minister of Justice, as to Penitentiaries in Canada, for the six months ended 30th June, 1877.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) laid before the House the Tables of the Trade and Navigation of the Dominion of Canada, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1877; and the Report of the Minister of Agriculture for the Dominion of Canada, for the calendar year 1877.

House adjourned at Twenty minutes to Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 18th Feb., 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS.

MR. HUNTINGTON laid before the House the Report of the Postmaster-General for the year ended 30th June, 1877.

MR. LAURIER laid before the House the Report, Returns and Statistics of the Inland Revenue of the Dominion of Canada, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1877; also, fourth Report on Weights and Measures, being Supplement No. 2 to the Report of the Department of Inland Revenue, 1877; also Supplement No. 1 to the Inland Revenue Report, for the year ended 30th June, 1877; and Report on Adulteration of Food, being Supplement No. 3 to the Report of the Department of Inland Revenue, 1877.

MR. JONES (Halifax) laid before the House, Report on the State of the Militia of the Dominion of Canada for the year 1877.

MR. CARTWRIGHT laid before the House, statements of payments charged to unforeseen expenses under Orders in Council from the 1st July, 1877, to date, in accordance with the Act 40 Victoria, chapter 1, schedule B.; also, statement of Special Warrants of His Excellency the Governor-General, issued in accordance with the Act 31

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

Victoria, chapter 5, section 35, from the 1st of July, 1877, to the 9th of February, 1878, inclusive; and statement of allowances and gratuities under the Act 33 Victoria, chapter 4, entitled an Act for the better securing the efficiency of the Civil Service of Canada, by providing for the superannuation of persons employed therein, in certain cases.

MR. TUPPER asked if the hon. the Minister of Finance would lay upon the table, without a formal motion, all Orders in Council relating to the balances of appropriation which had lapsed and had been carried over to the following year.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he thought the statement was in the Public Accounts; if not, he would have it attended to.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

MR. SPEAKER: I find that, according to a strict interpretation of our rule, no petition can be received after to-day, without special permission of the House. Three petitions have been presented to-day, and it will be necessary to move that the rule be suspended and that the petitions be read and received to-day.

MR. MACKENZIE said he thought it would be necessary to go a little further than that. He would have made a motion to-day to extend the time for a week, but the rule required the recommendation of a Committee. He proposed in a few moments to ask the House to confirm the nomination of the Standing Orders Committee, and he would ask them to make the recommendation, and then he would move accordingly. He thought the three petitions might be received to-day.

The petitions were read and received.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said the statement of the unexpended balances would be found on page 346, Public Accounts, Part II. He fancied that contained all the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tupper) wanted.

PETITIONS FROM FOREIGNERS.

SPEAKER'S RULING.

MR. SPEAKER: The Clerk has drawn my attention to the fact that one of the petitions presented to-day, is from an Association whose meeting was held at Lexington, Kentucky, in a foreign country. Such a petition, according to a recent decision in the House of Commons, in England, cannot be received, as foreigners cannot petition the House of Commons.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

REPORT PRESENTED.

MR. MACKENZIE presented the Report of the Special Committee appointed to prepare and report lists of Members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by the House.

MR. MACKENZIE moved :

“ That the House concur in the Report in so far as it relates to the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.”

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY COMMITTEE.

MR. MACKENZIE moved :

“ That a Select Committee be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Library or Parliament, so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as Members of a Joint Committees of both Houses on the Library; said Committee to be composed of Messrs. Baby, Blake, Blanchet, Brouse, Cartwright, Delorme, Fréchette, Higinbotham, Laurier, Sir John A. Macdonald, Masson, Mills, Roscoe, Tupper, Wright (Ottawa), and Young; and that a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint them therewith.”

Motion agreed to.

INSOLVENT LAW REPEAL BILL.

(Mr. Barthe.)

FIRST READING.

MR. BARTHE introduced a Bill (No. 2) To repeal the Insolvent Laws now in force in the Dominion.

MR. WOOD said it was not usual to oppose the introduction of a Bill, but during the last Session the very fact of a Bill being introduced for the repeal of the Insolvency Law had driven many people into insolvency; and he was convinced that many people would go into insolvency if this Bill was introduced, for fear that if it were passed they would lose the opportunity.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is a good reason for passing the Bill as soon as possible.

Bill read the first time.

EVIDENCE ON COMMON ASSAULTS BILL.

(Mr. Dymond.)

FIRST READING.

MR. DYMOND introduced a Bill (No. 3) Providing that persons charged with common assault shall be competent witnesses in their own behalf.

Bill read the first time.

STAMPS ON PROMISSORY NOTES LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Irving.)

FIRST READING.

MR. IRVING introduced a Bill (No. 4) To amend the law relating to stamps on promissory notes and bills of exchange. He said the Bill was the same as one which he had introduced rather late last Session, which went to a second reading, but had not the opportunity to be fully discussed. The principal object of the Bill was to obviate the inconvenience which was found to exist in complying with the law for dating the cancellation of stamps, on bills which came from a foreign country and were payable in this country, on the day when they were payable. The Courts had decided that, if stamps were not cancelled on the same day as the bills were dated, the bills were invalidated, and it was therefore clear that some amelioration was necessary in the law in cases where the bills were drawn at such a distance from Canada that it could not be complied with. The Bill also provided for one or two minor difficulties.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said perhaps the hon. member had looked into the question whether this Bill, affecting trade or revenue, should not be originated by resolution.

MR. IRVING said he found that a Bill, almost the same in its bearings, had been introduced by the late Mr. Hillyard Cameron without a resolution, and also a few years ago that another Bill of a similar kind was introduced without resolution. He had also consulted an experienced parliamentarian on the subject, and he had assured him that it was not necessary.

Bill read the first time.

RATE OF INTEREST BILL.

(Mr. Barthe.)

FIRST READING.

MR. BARTHE introduced a Bill (No. 5) To fix the rate of interest in Canada.

Bill read the first time.

CHANGES IN THE GOVERNMENT.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.

MR. MACKENZIE: I desire to say a few words to the House in connection with the changes made in the composition of the Cabinet during the recess. During the autumn the Hon. Mr. Cauchon, who was then acting as Minister of Inland Revenue, was offered the appointment of Governor of Manitoba, which appointment he accepted, and Mr. Laurier, the then member for Drummond and Arthabaska, and now member for Eastern Quebec, was offered a seat in the Cabinet as Minister of Inland Revenue, which was accepted by that hon. gentleman. I should now refer to another matter, which gives me a great deal of pain in making the reference. Hon. gentlemen will remember that towards the close of last Session the Minister of Justice was very seriously ill, and, soon after the Session ended, my hon. friend the member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) placed his resignation in my hands. He was induced at the time to withdraw that resignation, in the hope, and, I may say, belief and expectation, on our part at least, that a comparative cessation from the very severe duties of that Department might result in his restoration to his wonted health. I am sorry to say that this hope was not realized, and towards the latter part of the year my hon. friend determined that it was necessary, on account of his health, that he should resign the position which he held in the Government. Of course, for such a reason as that, there is nothing to be said, except to express my extreme regret that I should be compelled to part with a colleague with whom I have acted all my political life, under whom I once served when he acted as Premier of Ontario, and who has acted with the present Administration so cordially since his advent to office. No doubt the loss of the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) was a serious loss to myself especially, a serious loss to the Government, a serious loss to the House, and a loss to the country; and I am sure I but speak the sentiments of everyone on both sides of the House in expressing my own deep regret that such a cause should have necessitated such a step. There was no difference on any matter of policy between my hon. friend and his colleagues, and I have no doubt whatever but that a short respite from the cares and labours of a laborious public life will result in restoring my hon. friend to his wonted health—a result which will cause feelings of rejoicing, I have no doubt, to almost everyone in Canada who takes an interest in the retention of men of great ability and high personal character in the councils of the country. I would desire to say much more on that subject; but I am sure that the House will perfectly comprehend how much it pains me to have to refer to a matter of this kind, and that everyone will join with me in expressing sympathy and regret towards one who so efficiently discharged the public duties entrusted to him by his Sovereign. The defeat of the Minister of Militia in his county caused him immediately to place his resignation in my hands; and I at once offered the position which that hon. gentleman held to my hon. friend the member for Halifax, (Mr. Jones,) who at once accepted the position, and is now present in the House as Minister of Militia. In making these simple announcements to the House, I rejoice to know that I have not to record publicly in this way any cause of disagreement which necessitated the Cabinet changes to which I have referred; and that they were the result of simple and natural causes, such as will attach to every Government which may have power in this country; nor is it necessary that I should dwell any further on a subject of this kind, further than to make the simple announcements that I have made. I will now leave the matter in the hands of the House, and, if it desires any further information as to matters of policy, I am prepared to give them, although the simple statement that no matters of policy have become involved in the changes which I have made, is, I presume, a sufficient answer in anticipation to any questions which may be put.

MR. IRVING.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: From the statements which have been made by the hon. the Premier, I understand that the recent changes have involved no changes of policy; and that the Government stood committed to the same policy and that they will pursue the same policy that they have pursued since their formation, and since the hon gentleman has led the House. I have nothing to say about matters of policy; but, respecting the changes made, and the one that the hon gentleman first alluded to—the transfer of Mr. Cauchon from a seat in the Cabinet to the Governorship of Manitoba,—I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman made that announcement with as great satisfaction to himself as he made the subsequent one with regret. No doubt the hon. gentleman felt that the presence of Mr. Cauchon in the Government was a source of great weakness to him, as was announced by one of his present colleagues, and felt that he was relieved of a great embarrassment by that gentleman ceasing to be a member of the Government, as it enabled him to bring into the Cabinet the hon. gentleman from Quebec East, who, to say the least of it, will fill the duties of his position with as much ability, and more ability, and with more satisfaction to the hon. gentleman, the head of the Government, than the gentleman whom he has succeeded in the Cabinet. I can join, and I have no doubt that the hon. gentlemen sitting on this side of the House will join, in expressing regret that an eminent person like the hon. member for South Bruce, a man of ability, has been compelled to leave the Government for the cause assigned. Public men of ability and standing like that of the hon. gentleman are not so plentiful in Canada that the country can afford, or any party afford, to lose a man of his standing and character and ability, and although I am not in sympathy, politically, with the hon. member for South Bruce, I cordially agree with the hon. gentleman, the head of the Government, in his wish, that rest may restore that hon. gentleman to health, from the want of which he is suffering, and which has deprived the hon. gentleman, the head of the Government, of the great strength which that hon. gentleman gave to him and to his Government while he was a member of it. The last change is one that does not require observation. Mr. Vail, having been defeated, very properly placed his resignation in the hands of the head of the Government. This was late on Saturday night, and I hope that my hon. friend of the head of the Government was not disturbed in his devotions on Sunday by the necessity of having to make new arrangements.

MR. MACKENZIE: I was at church, as usual.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman went to church as usual, and I have no doubt that he paid great attention to the sermon, especially if the sermon impressed upon the hon. gentleman the necessity of resignation. The loss of his position by Mr. Vail, of course necessitated his resignation, and he was replaced by another gentleman of standing, the member for Halifax, who now holds the office. This change is one that does not require any observation, because he is an able man, and a strong supporter of the Government, and his known high claims to fill that position which it was understood was a long time ago at his disposal have enabled him to now actually take it. The only question, Mr. Speaker, to which I would like to call the attention of the House, and on which I would like to have an explanation is: when can the hon. the Premier inform us that the vacancy caused by the retirement of the hon. member for South Bruce will be filled up?

MR. MACKENZIE: That is under consideration.

SUPERIOR COURT JUDGE FOR RICHELIEU DISTRICT.

QUESTION.

MR. BARTHE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint a Judge of the Superior Court, for the Judicial District of Richelieu (Province of Quebec), to reside at Sorel; and when it is proposed to make that appointment?

MR. LAFLAMME: The hon. Judge who sat for the District of Richelieu has obtained leave of absence, which expires on the first of next month. He has not informed the Government of his intention to resign, or to demand retirement; consequently no action can be taken in the matter.

MAILS ON THE MONTREAL AND OCCIDENTAL RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. CHRISTIE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to forward the mails by the Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, and if so when?

MR. HUNTINGTON: The matter to which the hon. gentleman refers is under the consideration of the Government at present.

NORTH-WEST BOUNDARY OF ONTARIO.

QUESTION.

MR. MASSON enquired, What progress had been made in the settlement of the North-Western boundary of the Province of Ontario?

MR. MACKENZIE: The absence of Sir Edward Thornton, who was selected as the third Arbitrator, or umpire, until late in the autumn made it practically impossible for the three gentlemen to meet; but everything has been prepared for their meeting, which will take place immediately after the Session.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Who are the Commissioners? I forget them now.

MR. MACKENZIE: Chief Justice Harrison, Hon. Mr. Wilmot, late Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, and Sir Edward Thornton.

MR. MACKENZIE.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: The Hon. Mr. Wilmot is acting on the part of the Dominion?

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes.

RECIPROCIETY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

QUESTION.

MR. BÉCHARD enquired, Whether a treaty of commercial reciprocity between the United States of America and Canada is at present in question between the Governments interested?

MR. MACKENZIE: There is no such treaty at present in question between the Governments interested. The Government of the United States has made no proposition to us; but, when the Government of the United States makes any such proposition, we will, of course, give it due consideration.

PAYMENT OF LABOURERS ON PUBLIC WORKS.

QUESTION.

MR. FISET enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a measure during the present Session, to secure the payment in coin, "in cash," of the labourers employed on the public works under Government control?

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not the intention of the Government to bring in any such measure, and I am not sure that we could well deal with it in that matter; but the matter has been under the consideration of the Government, with the view of adopting such means in letting out contracts as would secure to the men prompt payment of their wages, and I may say, in this connection, that the Government did take steps to enforce, as far as possible, with what power we had in our hands, the discharge of such duty to the men as seems to be necessitated by fair play and consideration for the workingmen—that is, that they should be paid in the current coin of the country at least every two weeks; and I have no doubt that the measures which the Government have taken will result in that being fairly carried out for the future.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

QUESTION.

MR. CASGRAIN enquired, Whether the Government has taken or intends to take any steps to renew or make a treaty of commercial reciprocity with the United States, under the sanction of the Imperial Government?

MR. MACKENZIE: The answer I gave to my hon. friend from Iberville a moment ago will apply to his question. I may just say, however, as the question is put here categorically, that we have not taken any steps in this relation; but, as I have said, we will be prepared when any steps are desired by the Government on the other side, to take such steps as to carry out our well-known views on the subject.

BANKRUPT LAW AMENDMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. CASGRAIN enquired, Whether the Government intend making any amendments to the Bankrupt Law?

MR. LAFLAMME: The Government have not concluded to make any amendment to the Insolvency Act yet.

ASSIMILATION OF TRADE LAWS.

QUESTION.

MR. CASGRAIN enquired, Whether the Government intend to assimilate the laws of trade all over the Dominion?

MR. MACKENZIE: With regard to the laws affecting trade, I am afraid that the motion of my hon. friend is too general. It is difficult to ascertain what he means.

MR. CASGRAIN: I will read my motion in French. Perhaps it will then be more explicit.

MR. MACKENZIE: There is really no difference. The translation conveys the idea perfectly well. Yet the laws of trade may embrace, for instance, the law respecting public carriers; it may embrace the Insolvency Laws; it may embrace many Statutes in force over the whole Dominion; and, on the other hand, it may embrace some laws such as that which exists for the distribution of insolvent estates in Lower Canada, which would be in force if there were no Insolvency Law—a system which is not in operation in some of the other Provinces; and of course the necessity for such a change as the general introduction of that particular measure would depend to a great extent upon the continued existence of the Insolvency Law; and I am not able to give a more definite answer to this very general question, unless my hon. friend should point out to me specially in another question, or privately, what he particularly desires to obtain information upon.

REVISION OF THE DOMINION STATUTES.

QUESTION.

MR. CASGRAIN enquired, Whether the Government intend to revise and publish the Statutes of the Dominion of Canada.

MR. LAFLAMME: Steps have been taken for the consolidation of the Statutes of Canada, and the gentlemen employed in the performance of this duty are at work; but no report has yet been made.

EXPENSES ON ACCOUNT OF SITTING BULL.

QUESTION.

MR. CASGRAIN enquired, Whether the Government has, or intends to call upon the Imperial Government for the payment of the expenses incurred in relation to the crossing of our frontier by Sitting Bull.

MR. MACKENZIE: It is not the intention of the Government to make any representation on that subject to the Imperial Government at present. We have had an armed force in that territory for the purpose of enforcing order and maintaining the majesty of the law. Sitting Bull has only contributed to the necessity of the concentration of the force on that particular portion of our frontier. He has, no doubt, caused us some additional expense and may cause more, but we do not think that to be a matter of such serious importance as to justify us in making any application of that kind. The Government do not desire in any matters of minor importance to make any demands on the Imperial Government.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: I do not see how a Sitting Bull can cross the frontier.

MR. MACKENZIE: Not unless he rises.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: Then he is not a Sitting Bull.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE RIVER SYDENHAM.

QUESTION.

MR. STEPHENSON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to put in the Estimates for 1878-79 a sum for the improvement of the navigation of the North Branch of the River Sydenham, from Wallaceburg to Wilkesport, in accordance with the surveys and plans already prepared by Government engineers and surveyors?

MR. MACKENZIE: The hon. gentleman will find his curiosity satisfied when the Estimates come down; it is not easy to answer such questions in advance; they will be down within a day or two, and he will then observe what is in the Estimates. I may, however, say there is in them a general vote for dredging, and that this vote will probably comprise and effect—at least we hope it will—what is absolutely necessary in the various ports of this Dominion.

BREAKWATER AT RONDEAU.

QUESTION.

MR. STEPHENSON enquired, Whether the work of constructing, during the past season, a breakwater for the protection of the harbour of refuge at Rondeau was let by tender publicly advertised; and, if so let, whether it was let to the person whose tender was lowest of all those submitted, and the name and residence of the person whose tender was submitted?

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland): I may say to my hon. friend that information, I think in the month of September last—I was in Halifax at the time,—reached the Department that some serious injury had been done, not to the breakwater, as I understood it, but to the foundation of the dwelling-house in which the lighthouse-keeper resides at Rondeau. Upon receipt of this information from the lighthouse-keeper, Mr. Tomlinson was directed to repair to the spot, examine and make a report. Mr. Tomlinson did go the spot, and, while there, finding it necessary to take prompt steps, examined the work, made a report, and prepared specifications. I understand from him, that he there met three gentlemen, named George, Bell and Sopers. He had communication with these gentlemen, and, on his having prepared the specifications, he gave to these gentlemen a copy of them. He then returned to Ottawa and made his report, which was on the 2nd of October, while I was in Halifax; and I find, on reference to the papers, that, on the 5th of October, I telegraphed to my Deputy from Halifax to have the work done at once, under Mr. Tomlinson's report. Mr. Tomlinson, in the meantime, received tenders from those gentlemen with whom he had communicated at Rondeau, and, as these tenders seemed to be much larger than he supposed the work to be worth, he communicated with Mr. Joseph White, of Ottawa, and asked for a tender from him. There seemed to be no time for public notice to be given in the public newspapers, to consult persons who were prepared to do the work, and Mr. White's tender being somewhat less than those of the gentlemen who lived on the spot, consequently, on the recommendation of Mr. Tomlinson, the contract was awarded to him, and he is now proceeding with the work, his being the lowest tender.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MAILS ON THE MONTREAL AND OCCIDENTAL RAILWAY.

QUESTION.

MR. DESJARDINS enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make arrangements for the organization of a regular mail service between Ottawa and Montreal, and the intermediate places, by means of the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, now in operation?

MR. HUNTINGTON: I have already answered this question, put by my hon. friend from Argenteuil. I may say, however, to the hon. gentleman, that the manner of making the arrangements is under the consideration of the Government.

REPEAL OF DUTY ON NATIVE TOBACCO.
QUESTION.

MR. BOLDUC enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to amend, during the present Session, the Act 31st Victoria, chapter 44, and the several Acts amending the same, in such way as to repeal the provisions imposing a duty on tobacco grown in Canada?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I may say to my hon. friend that information of that kind can hardly be given until the Budget statement is made.

EXPRESS FREIGHT ON GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.
QUESTION.

MR. OLIVER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause all Government Railways to carry the freight of all express companies at one uniform rate?

MR. MACKENZIE: The mode which was adopted on the Government Railroads was to ask for tenders and to accept the tender which gave the most money to the Government; and there is no intention to alter that rule for the present.

ABOLITION OF STAMP DUTY ON PROMISSORY NOTES.
QUESTION.

MR. BORDEN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to propose legislation during the present Session to abolish the Stamp Duty on Promissory Notes and Bills of Exchange?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that the state of the finances will not allow us to entertain that proposition at present.

THE DUFFERIN IMPROVEMENTS IN QUEBEC.
QUESTION.

MR. CARON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates an amount of money for the purpose of carrying out, in Quebec, the improvements known as the Dufferin improvements?

MR. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend will not complain if I say that it will be necessary to wait until the Estimates are printed for this information. We never answer these questions in advance.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: There is no improvement in that respect.

LEASING THE PEMBINA BRANCH OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.
QUESTION.

MR. SCHULTZ enquired, Whether any arrangement has been made by the Dominion Government with a view to the leasing of the Pembina Branch of the Canada Pacific Railway to J. J. Hill and N. W. Kittson of St. Paul, and Donald A. Smith and others of Montreal; and if not, whether any promise of such arrangement has been made by the Government?

MR. MACKENZIE: No arrangement has been made and no discussion about such an arrangement has been had with any of the gentlemen mentioned. I have, however, had verbal discussions on this subject with parties interested in finishing the road to the boundary, and the Government will, of course, submit to Parliament any proposal that they may decide upon.

MAILS BETWEEN QUEBEC AND THREE RIVERS.
QUESTION.

MR. DE St. GEORGES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make arrangements for the establishment of a regular mail service between Quebec and Three Rivers and intermediate places, by line of the North Shore Railway?

MR. HUNTINGTON: All I can say, Sir, is that the subject is under consideration—as I said before.

THE GRANT FOR VETERAN MILITIAMEN.
QUESTION.

MR. ROY enquired, Whether the grant of $50,000 voted last Session, for the benefit of the veteran militiamen is expended? If it is not, whether it is the intention of the Government to have the unexpended balance of such grant distributed among the surviving militiamen?

MR. JONES (Halifax): I will merely say in reply to the hon. gentleman that the total amount has not been expended; $7,000 remains unexpended, and this has arisen from the fact that about 240 of those on the list have made no applications this year. I may also say with regard to the second part of the question, that it is under consideration. There are about the same number of persons who made their applications previously, but who were not able to establish their claims in time to participate in the grant of the previous years, and the question under consideration is whether, after having established their claims, and after having drawn the grant since their claims were established, they may not be entitled to the arrearages which would have been paid them under other circumstances.

PUBLIC WORKS CHARGEABLE TO CAPITAL.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. OLIVER moved for a return showing the total amount of money expended for Public Works chargeable to capital since 1st January, 1874; also the amount of money expended, chargeable to capital, on Public Works under progress on the 1st January, 1874.

MR. TUPPER said he would like to ask the hon. gentleman to explain what he proposed to obtain by this motion that was not contained in the Public Accounts. He (Mr. Tupper) was not aware of any information that could be given in response to this motion that was not already before the House in the Public Accounts. The Public Accounts showed all the works which were in progress at the 1st of January, 1874, and all the expenditures on these works. He did not quite understand the hon. gentleman.

MR. OLIVER said he could understand such an objection coming from the Minister of Public Works, but he really could not understand an objection coming from the hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House. However, he might say it was impossible to get the information which he had asked for in this motion from the Public Accounts. They did not show the whole amount of money that had been expended on the Public Works and chargeable to capital since 1874; neither did it distinguish between the works which were commenced after that and which were in progress at that date.

MR. ROY.

MR. TUPPER said he did not quite understand the hon. gentleman taking exception to an hon. gentleman on that side of the House, asking for information to what the object of his motion was. If the hon. gentleman had informed him before or if he had reason to suppose that this was intended as an attack upon the hon. the Minister of Finance for not having presented in the Public Accounts such a statement of the public expenditure as he was bound to present, he did not know that he would have taken any exception to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

PAYMENTS FOR PRINTING.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DYMOND moved for copies of the accounts, vouchers and papers connected with the payments for printing, as entered in the Public Accounts for 1873-4, as made, out of the contingencies of the Department of Justice, to I. B. Taylor, the Citizen Printing Company, and J. G. Moylan. He said that during the last six months an animated discussion had taken place in the press and among our leading men upon the question of Government expenditure; and he was sure that it must have been extremely satisfactory and edifying to observe that the master-minds of the nation had descended into the minutest particulars, and dissected, very ably, that portion of the public expenditure which was denominated Contingencies. Their example had proved, he had no doubt, somewhat catching, and had led others in a more humble sphere to follow it at a respectful distance. For his own part, he was induced to run his eye through the contingencies of the Department of Justice for the year 1873-4, and previous years; and he was astonished, on arriving at the year in question, to find that there had been a sudden and most remarkable increase. For instance, he found that in 1870 the printing contingencies of the Department of Justice amounted to only $340.66; in 1871 they amounted to $222.98; in 1872, to $542.72; in 1873, to $536.52; and in 1874—in all cases, of course, he alluded to the year ending on the 30th of June,—they amounted to $3,320. In 1875, including the item charged to the Queen's Printer for printing, paper and binding, amounting to $573, they amounted only in the aggregate to $611. They were aware that in the year 1873-74 a change of Government took place; and, while a large portion of the expenditure of that year must necessarily have been foreseen and provided for when the Estimates were brought down in April, it was obvious that the contingencies represented items which might arise at any moment, and had been under the control either of the Minister of Justice, who retired in November, 1873, or of his successor who then entered into office. As an Independent member of the House, he was exceedingly desirous of knowing whether this was an item which suddenly arose during the last six months of the late Administration, or whether the incoming Administration were seized with a sudden desire to expend money under this particular head.

Motion agreed to.

PURCHASE OF THE RIVIÈRE DU LOUP BRANCH.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. LANGEVIN moved for a copy of all correspondence and Orders in Council since the first of July, 1876, relating to the leasing or purchasing by the Government of Canada of that portion of the Grand Trunk Railway which extends from Rivière du Loup to the Chaudière Junction or Lévis. He said he had seen, by a report that was published of a meeting in London of the Grand Trunk Railway Company's shareholders, that the President of the Company had said :

“ The Intercolonial Railway was open for through traffic, as you are aware, in July, 1876, and there has since been a steady increase of business over our Rivière du Loup section. This traffic has doubtless been to some extent drawn away from our route to the Lower Canadian Provinces via Portland, but it is difficult to estimate precisely the extent of such transfer on account of the variations in the consumption of breadstuffs and the volume of business during the two periods. Whilst in Canada, I had an interview at Ottawa with the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, the Premier of the Dominion, on the subject of our line from Chaudière Junction to Rivière du Loup. The Intercolonial traffic is worked over that section under an agreement which is not satisfactory to us. It does not yield us sufficient remuneration for the work performed, and we have therefore given notice to the Canadian Government to terminate it, with a view to discussing with them a proposed amendment of it. The Government, on their part, desire that we should relay that section of our line with steel rails, and expend money on it in other ways. This expenditure is not required, however, for our own purposes, but with a view to enabling the Government to run fast mail trains through from Halifax to Montreal. It does not appear reasonable to expect that we should expend money for such an object upon a line which we have for so many years worked at a loss, and for a service for which we receive insufficient remuneration; and I represented to Mr. Mackenzie that I should not be justified in asking you to provide the funds requisite for such a purpose. I further informed him that I was ready to treat with him either for a sale of the line from Chaudière Junction to Rivière du Loup, or for a lease of it, or to admit of the Government spending money on it on such terms as might be agreed upon. The proposition for a lease appeared to be that which most commended itself to his notice, and he undertook to consult with his colleagues on the subject as soon as he could meet them, which would not be for several weeks. I have not yet heard anything from him on the subject. It is expected that within four or five years the Intercolonial Railway will begin to pay working expenses, and obtain some remuneration for the Dominion Government. Meanwhile, the traffic on the Rivière du Loup section of our line will also improve; and that section of line, which actually yielded a profit for the half-year ending last June, will ultimately become a remunerative property, yielding a considerable revenue to the Government, who will, we may hope, before that time, have leased it or acquired possession of it on fair terms.”

He did not wish to make any comments upon this, only that, by this report of the statements of the President of the company, it appeared that they did not intend repairing that portion of their line in such a way as to allow these fast trains to run over that line in the short time they ran over the Intercolonial Railway. Of course it was seen by those who travelled on that line that, when they came from the Lower Provinces to Rivière du Loup, the time taken to bring up passenger trains from Rivière du Loup to Quebec or to Montreal was much greater than it was on the Intercolonial Railway. No doubt this was due to the fact that that portion of the line from Rivière du Loup to Quebec was not kept up on the same footing as that portion which ran, for example, from Montreal to Toronto. It would be very interesting to see what steps the Government had taken on this matter.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was no correspondence, and there were no Orders in Council. It was quite correct, as the President of the Grand Trunk Railway had stated, that he had discussed this matter with him. He had asked for an interview, and discussed everything connected with the working of that branch, and the position of the Government relative to that of the company, and, generally speaking, any matters affecting some arrangement which might be made or anticipated by the company with the Government. Since then, that discussion had been resumed with the manager in this country, with a view to arrive at some arrangement which might be satisfactory to the Government and also to the company. No arrangement had yet been arrived at; but, although there were no papers, he might say that negotiations were proceeding, and he hoped to be in a position to state what conclusion they had arrived at before the House rose, with a view to asking Parliament to endorse whatever course they might desire to take, if indeed they took a course that required the sanction of Parliament. The hon. gentleman was aware that under the Statute law they had the power to enforce an arrangement; at the same time it was tolerably evident that the arrangement which they had had, which they had terminated pro tem., had not been so satisfactory to either party as perhaps was desirable. It was quite true that the trains had run upon that branch much slower than upon their own line. It was, perhaps, due to the fact that they had had a somewhat easier winter, both last year and this year, than usual, that there had not been more interruption of the traffic. There had not been any serious interruption of the traffic, excepting the continuous slowness of the trains from Rivière du Loup to Quebec; on the other hand, the Government had to consider many matters connected with the Grand Trunk, with its line to Portland, its relative length to the line to the Rivière du Loup, and what the effect would be of any arrangement with the company upon the traffic of their own road. He had only to say that it was quite impossible for him to say any more at present. His hon. friend would see that it was not desirable just now to precipitate any discussion on the subject; and, as there were no papers such as he asked for, he presumed he would withdraw the motion.

MR. LANGEVIN

MR. BLANCHET said that, from the explanations given by the hon. the Premier, he might infer that very likely, if the authorities of the Grand Trunk were reasonable, some practicable arrangement would be concluded. If it ever came to a settlement, he presumed the hon. the Premier would not lose sight of the necessity of having a branch constructed from St. Charles, on the Grand Trunk, to Quebec. It was necessary that the Intercolonial Railway should have termini at seaports. One now was at Halifax, and the other must be at Quebec or as near as possible; and something must be done to have that curve of the Chaudière avoided. The only way to have that curve avoided, and the time lost by travellers, was to have that branch constructed. The hon. the Premier, two years ago, expressed the desirability of having such a work done in the interest of the trade of the Maritime Provinces. He hoped that, with his practical eye, when the arrangements were concluded, the hon. the Premier would see that that branch was constructed, not as a local branch, because it was for the interest of the whole Dominion, and, as he said two years ago, in the interest of the Maritime Provinces.

MR. TUPPER said he did not rise for the purpose of prolonging this discussion, but in consequence of the remark made by the First Minister, that whatever arrangements were made, he trusted would be made in time to submit them for the approval or endorsement of Parliament, provided that they required that endorsement. He hoped that no arrangement would be concluded by the Government,—in fact he should very much question the power of the Government to conclude any arrangement, in the sense in which the President of the Grand Trunk Railway Company referred to arrangements,—without submitting them for the consideration of Parliament. He wished to draw the attention of the hon. the First Minister for a moment to a point—that, he dared say, had not escaped his attention, but for fear that sufficient importance might not attach to it,—of providing, in case any such arrangements were made by which the working of the line from Rivière du Loup to Quebec should be placed in the hands of the Government of Canada, definite arrangements in relation to the charges made by the Grand Trunk Railway on all freight for the Intercolonial or over it, and over the other portions of their line. The hon. gentleman's attention, no doubt, had been drawn to the fact that, at present, the interest of the Grand Trunk was comparatively the same in reference to freight passing over the Intercolonial, and over the line to Portland, for the distance was just about the same from Montreal to Rivière du Loup and from Montreal to Portland. The moment, however, that the Intercolonial and the Government acquired, either by lease or otherwise, the line from Rivière du Loup to Quebec, the interest of the Grand Trunk would be enormously increased in sending all its freight and all its business,—passengers, and everything of the kind,—over the Portland line, because they would have a much greater mileage on that line than would remain on the other, and that would necessitate, of course, a provision by which the charges should be quite as favourable to everything coming over the Intercolonial Railway, via that line to Montreal, as to that which came from Portland, in order to avoid the large interest which they would have in the working traffic over the Intercolonial Railway and over the line to Portland. Probably that had not escaped the hon. gentleman's attention; but it struck him as a matter which would be vital in dealing with this question. He trusted that no arrangement would take effect until it had received the approval of Parliament. He might just say, before sitting down, that the importance of having the line so improved between Rivière du Loup and Quebec as to facilitate the transmission of mails, passengers, and everything else over the Intercolonial Railway between Halifax and Montreal was a question of very great importance, and one that naturally had attracted the attention of the Government.

MR. MITCHELL said it had afforded him great gratification to find the position taken by the First Minister in relation to this matter. He thought every one would admit, looking at the geographical and local position of that Intercolonial road, that the absence of any connection between the present terminus of that road and the Quebec system except through the Grand Trunk section of line to Rivière du Loup, made it of the utmost importance that some arrangement should be arrived at. Of course it was very proper in making any arrangement, that the Government should consider carefully the points that the hon. the Premier stated in relation to the future traffic over the Grand Trunk by way of Portland, which might possibly divert a very large portion which now went over the Intercolonial road, in order to have some such arrangement as his hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) suggested made, at the same time as the leasing or purchase of the line. One thing was very clear, that something would have to be done with the road. It was in anything but a respectable condition for fast travel, and sooner or later some accident would occur upon it. Any very heavy snow-storm was sure to result in delays, and it was a subject that ought to, and he was glad to find did, occupy the attention of the First Minister. He was sure that every person in the eastern portion of the Dominion of Canada would give his best support and his best consideration to any fair scheme, —fair in the sense of justice to the Grand Trunk, and fair in the sense of protecting the just interests of the people of Canada. If that could be accomplished, it would no doubt add, by the additional security from the improvements which that road now demanded and which must be made, to the facility of travel, and the security and promptitude of the delivery of mails, and would create a confidence in travellers who might go over that road that was not now possessed in relation to that portion. He, therefore, rose to give his endorsement to any reasonable arrangement that could be made, either to purchase or lease the road, from Rivière du Loup to Quebec, with the view of having it under the control of the Government, and with a view of getting these securities to life and property, — these same improvements which had been made on the Grand Trunk,—added to the portion of the road from Rivière du Loup to Quebec. He was sure every gentleman from the eastern portion of the Dominion would give his best support to any reasonable scheme that could be arrived at.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was obliged to the hon. member for Cumberland for his suggestion, but he might say that that matter had already engaged the attention of the Government. In regard to the remarks of his hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) as to the possible delays by snow in the meantime, he was sure the hon. gentleman must have observed with great pleasure that the Government had prevented much snow falling up to the present time.

MR. MITCHELL said he knew that the Government had taken credit for the disappearance of the grasshoppers, but he did not know that they took credit for the slight fall of snow.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: That is passing away.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

MR. MITCHELL.

ADMISSION OF CANADIAN SHIPS INTO FRENCH PORTS.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. LANGEVIN moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and any party in Canada or elsewhere, and also between the Government of Canada and the Imperial Government, about the admission of Canadian-built ships into French ports at the same rate and on the same conditions as ships from Great Britain and Ireland are admitted in said ports, or on such other conditions as may be therein mentioned. He said he did not intend to take the time of the House by now calling attention to the matter before this correspondence came down. The only thing he wished to say was that he could not too strongly impress upon the First Minister the great importance to the Province from which he came of having this matter followed through. Their ship-builders could build a great many ships for France, but could not build them under the present regulations with France. When they charged 40 francs a ton, $7.50 or so, it was such a heavy duty that their ship-builders said they could not do it. They lost by that more than the profits they could ever expect to have by these ships, and therefore they could not do it. It was a very important matter, because a very large portion, as he was informed, of the French mercantile fleet would certainly require to be rebuilt in a very short time. If this duty were lowered, and they were put in that respect on the same footing with the ships of Great Britain proper, no doubt they could compete with the Old World for building these ships for France; but with the 40 francs duty it was out of the question. He had seen a number of these ship-builders of Quebec, and they said that if there was a reasonable duty they could certainly do it. He would not enter into the question whether the Government had taken the proper means or not; of course, when the correspondence came down, they would see about that; but what he had to say now was that it was of the greatest importance to the other Provinces as well as to the Province of Quebec, and, therefore, he felt that some exertions should be made, and some correspondence should be had, and some means should be taken by which they could obtain from France a change. He knew they said in France, "Well, Canada does nothing for us; they have increased their duties on wines and liqueurs, and other things that come from France, and we cannot send anything through to Canada unless we pay a very high duty; therefore, we must have high duties on our side." He had no doubt that, if a moderate reduction was made in those duties on wines, liqueurs, opium, and other things that came from France, they would obtain a favourable answer from France. Of course, the question was only how to do it—whether they could do it directly or not. The First Minister told them the other day that they were not an independent power, and they could not negotiate a treaty with France; nevertheless, the hon. gentleman knew very well that, when matters of that kind were settled before with France and with the United States, though it was not done in a direct and formal manner, it was done in an informal manner; negotiations took place, and an understanding was come to. He made these remarks without knowing what had been done, because he had no official information before him; and only for the purpose of stating what was said by the people of the Province to which he belonged.

MR. KILLAM said that he had the pleasure of bringing this subject first before the House. He had no idea at that time that it would assume such importance in the eyes of their Quebec friends that it had done. It did not seem to him to be a matter of very great importance. If it would not be considered out of place, he would like to say to the hon. gentleman from Quebec, who took so great an interest in the progress of ship-building in this country, that if, twenty, or thirty, or forty years ago, when shipbuilding was a great industry, as it was at the present time, they had endeavoured to own ships themselves, instead of selling them to people in England and France, and wherever else they sold them, they would be much better off, at the present day, than they were. So long as they continued to build ships and sell them to other countries, at a very small percentage of profit, they would be simply, as it were, labourers for shipowners in England and France. Of course, as a Free-trader, he would like to see Canadian ships sold in France free of duty; but, if the only difficulty in the way was a duty of $8 a ton, placed upon these ships by the French Government, he did not see why they could not cure the evil, by adopting the course recommended by the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, or simply by placing a duty of $8 a ton upon French ships sold in this country. At any rate, he did not consider the matter of such importance that the Government should take any special steps to have this duty removed, because he thought it was much better for the people of this country, where they could build ships cheaply, to be, if possible, the carriers of the world. That was why he had always endeavoured, in this House, to uphold, as far as he could, the principle of Free-trade; because, in this country, they were eminently well situated for building and owning ships; and if the traffic of the world could be carried at a low rate, they were the persons who should carry it, and make money out of it; and the more they endeavoured to own ships for themselves, and the less they built ships for sale to other people, the better off they were likely to be as shipowners.

MR. BLANCHET said he desired to contradict a statement of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) in regard to Quebec. That gentleman's views might suit the ship-building portion of Nova Scotia, but would not suit Quebec. He wished, at the same time, to correct a statement which had been made with reference to the number of vessels built in Canada and sold in France. Some few years ago he remembered that, in Quebec, eight, nine, or ten vessels were constructed yearly by one ship-builder at Lévis; and a statement was made to him (Mr. Blanchet) before leaving for Ottawa that, if the duty was reduced and placed at its former rate, ship-builders would be prepared to undertake the construction of six or eight vessels every winter. The construction of half-a-dozen vessels at the same time might result in reviving the failing industry of ship-building in Quebec. The people of that Province did not occupy the same position as the people of Nova Scotia—the latter were on the coast, while the former were agriculturists, and only a certain number of capitalists invested their money in the construction of vessels, and, unless they found a market for their sale, ship-building in Quebec would continue to decline. It had declined to a great extent since the duty was raised to the present rate, and, if it was reduced, as was asked last year by the ship-builders of Quebec, and by persons interested in shipping, with perhaps the exception of the shipowners in Nova Scotia, he was satisfied that the great industry of ship-building, which was of such importance to Quebec, would regain its old prosperity, and they would see again the time when ship-carpenters would realize a fair and remunerative price for their labour, to enable them to support their families.

Mr. CARON said he entirely concurred in the remarks of the hon. the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Blanchet). Ship-building was one of the most important questions to the people of Quebec, and he was perfectly satisfied that they would desire to have an expression of opinion from the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, who represented Quebec East, and who was aware that during his election this question of the reduction of the duties on French wines was made one of the leading points in the contest. It was well known that the hon. gentleman during that election had promised the ship-carpenters of Quebec to look into that matter as early as possible, and that he would do his utmost to have it settled in the manner which they proposed. It was a subject that could not be looked into too early nor too closely, for it involved a reduction of the present duty of $7.50 per ton on Canadian-built ships, which prevented their being sold in the French market. As the hon. member for Bellechasse had stated, during the time the ship-builders of Quebec endeavoured to introduce their ships into the French market, they all agreed that the new market opened there for ships, promised to be very remunerative, and one which they considered to be likely to increase in importance every year. This was a question which, of course, he had some diffidence in treating, because he had not made it his special study; but he had obtained the opinions of practical men on it, and he hoped to have some opportunity of placing before the House the opinions of men who were well known as the highest authorities on ship-building in Quebec and elsewhere. He believed those gentlemen all agreed upon one point: that it would be a most important gain to the ship-builders of Quebec if the duties on French wines were reduced so as to allow our ships to be sold on the French market on exactly the same conditions as English bottoms. Any person who had the interest of the Province at heart must be desirous of having the question fully discussed and a settlement arrived at as soon as possible. He would like to know whether the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had looked into the matter, and whether he was ready to take it up at the present time.

Mr. BLANCHET.

Mr. LAURIER said that he was not aware that in the city of Quebec the feeling was so unanimous as was represented by the hon. member for the county of Quebec (Mr. Caron). He was quite aware there was a feeling in the direction pointed out, and that one gentleman connected with ship-building had made himself an industrious advocate of the policy of some hon. gentlemen opposite. That ship-builder happened to be on the Conservative side of politics; but he knew there were other ship-builders on the Liberal side who had never made any claim of the nature advocated by the hon. member for Quebec. He had never heard of Mr. Baldwin, for instance, or any of the larger ship-builders of that city, having made any representation in the sense now urged upon the House, notwithstanding that representations had been made by other ship-builders, and especially by the gentleman to whom he had just referred. As a representative of Quebec in the Cabinet, it would have been a matter of satisfaction to him if the Government had been able to open up negotiations with the French Government to ascertain how far the proposed changes in the tariff would influence the ship-building trade of the city of Quebec. Unfortunately, as the matter now stood, it was not in the power of the Government to do so; but it had shown its desire before he was a member of the Cabinet to do everything in its power to facilitate the removal of such restrictions, and that policy it was his intention, as far as possible, as he believed it was also the intention of the Government, to pursue.

MR. MITCHELL said that, as one who probably possessed as much experience in ship-building as any hon. member, he desired to add his quota to the discussion which had taken place on the motion before the House. A few years ago he had seen in Bathurst from 25 to 28 vessels, ranging from 300 to 1,500 tons, on the stocks; and to-day, he regretted to say, there was only one ship being built. The hon. members from Quebec had discussed the subject from a standpoint with which he did not entirely sympathize, while he was in accord with the object they had in view. He endorsed the remarks of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) that the people of that port, Bathurst, and most of the ports in the Maritime Provinces, who had clubbed together to build ships by shares, and either sold or sailed them, had set an example which was worthy of imitation. They had thereby built up not only a valuable property, but had created a powerful interest in the seamen who were almost unequalled for their intelligence and success. They had made ships the savings banks of some portions of the Dominion. The vessels thus built sailed on every sea and were frequently absent from the ports where they were owned for three or four years, during which they were earning large sums. There was no doubt that the Yarmouth ships, for example, made a better return for the money and labour invested in them than almost any industry in the Province. He sympathised with the object of the hon. member for Charlevoix in obtaining a reduction of the duties, so as to allow Canadian-built ships to enter French ports on the same terms as English-built vessels, provided such could be effected without injury to those Provinces which were outside of Quebec. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had failed to take that broad view which should inspire a Minister in dealing with an important question, when he stated that only one ship-builder in Quebec, and he a Conservative, had spoken in the direction advocated, and other ship-builders, Liberals in politics, had not expressed their views. The true way to promote the extension of our shipping interests was, instead of sending our ships to England or France for sale, to encourage our professional men and mechanics to invest their savings in building and sailing ships, and thus raise up, not only an extensive marine, but also a hardy, industrious race of seamen, who might be needed at some time for other than peaceful pursuits.

MR. LANGEVIN said he quite agreed with the hon. member for Northumberland in the remarks he had just offered, and believed it would be a great gain to this country and to Quebec if a large number of our enterprising people could be induced to go into the ship-building business and build, and own, and run vessels. As far as he had been able to influence anyone in that direction, he had done so. He was glad the opportunity had occurred for an expression of the sentiments uttered by the hon. the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam), nevertheless, he must add that both courses might be followed, because, before the duty of forty cents was imposed on shipping in France, we had orders from that country to build vessels, and those vessels were built to order, and were sold, in many instances, before they were built. That, of course, was a profitable transaction, and was done in the same way as lumber and grain and flour were sold to order. He was sure of this: that, if there was to be a reduction of revenue through lowering those duties, the country would be benefitted much more by the larger number of articles that would enter into ships, some of which would pay duty. There would be a large number of people employed, who would be consumers of imported goods, and, therefore the public Treasury would be a gainer, and not a loser, in the long run. He thanked the hon. member for Northumberland for the interest he had taken, and the broad view he had expressed on the subject, which was in great contrast to the view taken by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. Whilst the election for Quebec East was going on, the hon. gentleman would not have so spoken, but now the election was over and the votes had been secured, he had changed his position. What was good when asked for by the ship-owners a year ago was good to-day, and, forsooth, the hon. member told the House that it was only a Conservative ship-builder who asked for a change, and, therefore, he did not mind the request. If it was a matter requiring the attention of the Cabinet of the Dominion, it was not right that a Conservative ship-builder should be treated in that manner, for he was a most respectable man, and an enterprising ship-builder. He was also one of the constituents of the hon. Minister, and might therefore claim to be heard by him. True, the hon. Minister might have received letters from that ship-builder and not have answered them, for he was not bound to answer them unless he chose, even if they were with reference to matters of importance; but this ship-builder was not the only one who was in favour of a reduction of the duties; there were a number of other important citizens of Quebec—Mr. Ross, for instance, one of the wealthiest men in the country, who had himself been interested in ship-building, and was now interested in ship-building, had supported the proposal, and not a single newspaper in Quebec, whether Conservative or Liberal, opposed that policy. He had referred to the fact that Mr. Baldwin had taken action in regard to the matter; that might arise from the fact that Mr. Rosier had the matter in hand and was in communication with the Minister of Inland Revenue, urging the matter on the attention of the Government and publishing letters in the Quebec newspapers in favour of the proposal. He did not find fault with the Government for not arriving at a settlement on the question within a few days, or months, or years, but they should give it their special attention. While concurring with the opinion that we should not only build ships for sale but should own and work them, he would also urge that our vessels should be put on the same footing as English-built vessels when entering French ports, and admitted at two francs per ton. It might be replied that the Canadian tariff was not the same; if it were not, let it be made the same, so that our ships could be admitted into French ports at the lower rates. It was also stated in France that they would not continue that mode of admitting ships of Great Britain, because it was found that the tariff in England on certain articles imported from France was too heavy to facilitate French trade; but, whilst negotiations were going on, it was right that Canada should not be forgotten, and he hoped that the hon. the First Minister, at the proper time, would bring the matter prominently before the French Government, either in an informal way or by the direct channel of the British Government.

MR. LANGEVIN.

MR. MASSON said he was surprised at the statement made by the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue. In Montreal they heard that, during the election in Quebec East, the people had manifested their anxiety to obtain a reduction in the rate of duties charged on Canadian-built ships so as to enable Quebec vessels to enter French ports on the payment of reduced duties. The hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue had stated that the subject was not an important one.

MR. LAURIER: I did not say that. I said the opinion was not so unanimous as was represented on the other side. I also know for certain that those views are not held by some ship-builders in Quebec.

MR. MASSON asked, if public opinion in Quebec was not unanimous on that subject, what was all the cry about? The principal planks in the hon. gentleman's platform, and the chief means of carrying the election in Quebec East, were amnesty for O'Donoghue and the shipping question. An article appeared in the National in July, 1877, stating that we must appeal directly to the French Government. He would read it for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite.

MR. MACKENZIE: Dispense.

MR. MASSON said he was aware that the hon. Premier would be glad to have many Quebec matters dispensed with. It was the time, however, for them to speak. When elections had been carried by putting forward a certain policy when the votes of electors were required, hon. members had the right to submit to the House that policy, which these hon. gentlemen now desired to forsake. The National went so far as to rail against our dependence on England and advocated independence, because the Canadian Government was not allowed to apply to the French Government direct. That was a Quebec Liberal paper, which considered the question of great importance; yet the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue, who owed his seat in this House to the constituency of Quebec East, declared it was not an important question in Quebec, and that only a few persons advocated its settlement in the manner indicated. If that were so, they in Montreal, and people throughout the country were very much mistaken, because they thought it was by the O'Donoghue amnesty and the shipping question that Quebec East was gained.

MR. MACKENZIE said that, two years before the Quebec election took place, the Dominion Government had directed the attention of the English Government to that matter, and they received the reply of the French Government, through the English Government. He had stated at Quebec, what he stated now, and what hon. gentlemen knew, that it was impossible for the Canadian Government to approach the French Government themselves; they must do it in the one constitutional way, and, when the correspondence came down, it would be seen that they had adopted that mode. If any means that might be legitimately used could be adopted to influence the French Government, he had not the slightest objection to it; but to say that they could approach any foreign Government, except through the English Government was to assert what was entirely contrary to every well-known constitutional principle.—

MR. MASSON said that was not his point.

MR. MACKENZIE said he did not know the hon. gentleman had any point. The only point he appeared to have was that a Liberal newspaper had made some remarks on the subject.

MR. MASSON: The whole press had done so.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. member for Terrebonne appeared to think that he (Mr. Mackenzie) had no right to say a word on the subject. Perhaps he would permit him, even though he were an intruder, to conclude his remarks. The Government, he repeated, had taken care to bring the matter before the French Government, when the Duc Decazes explained that the treaty did not cover any of the British Colonies, and that it had been made with the United Kingdom alone. It would be found, when the correspondence was submitted, that a further communication had been made to the English Government, concerning the position in which the matter stood, and he was unable to say, at present, how the matter stood. But it would be impossible for hon. gentlemen to have done more than the present Administration had done with regard to the matter. He took the view taken by his hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Killam), that the most profitable method was to attempt to sail the ships rather than to sell them. It was not the duty levied in France or anywhere else which had first caused the decadence of the ship-building trade in the St. Lawrence, but it was the change to composite or iron vessels, and that would, no doubt, be found to prevail yet to a very large extent, because the trade in shipping had been entirely changed within the last fifteen or twenty years. In considering what changes the Government should make in the tariff they must consider what effect it would have on all other trades and upon the revenue. The proposal of the Government would be submitted to the House in due course, and it was absurd to try to get up political feeling, because, as a matter of fact, action had been taken long before the election in Quebec East.

MR. WOOD said hon. gentlemen from Lower Canada would seem to imagine that there was no part of the country which had an interest in this matter except Quebec. The quid pro quo would be a reduction of the duty on wine, but, as a Protectionist, he had a hesitation in supporting that. They knew that in Western Canada there was a large section of grape-producing and wine-producing country, and they were interested in keeping the duty upon wine as it now stood. He did not see that the members from the Province of Quebec had any right to monopolise this question of the free importation of wine into Canada and ships into France, and he thought the people of Upper Canada would have something to say about the matter when it came before the House.

Motion agreed to.

FORT FRANCES LOCKS.

MOTION FOR REPORT.

MR. MASSON moved for a copy of the Report of the late Mr. Hazlewood, C.E., on the approximate cost of the Fort Frances Locks.

Motion agreed to.

W. B. O'DONOGHUE.

MOTION FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

MR. MASSON moved for copies of all Orders or Minutes of Council and all correspondence between the Imperial and Canadian Governments, and other correspondence not already brought down, relating to any amnesty, partial or complete, to Mr. W. B. O'Donoghue.

Motion agreed to.

PURCHASE OF RIVIERE DU LOUP BRANCH.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. Fiset moved for copies of the correspondence, since the last Session of Parliament, between the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, either on the subject of the purchase by the Government of that part of the railway between Rivière du Loup and Pointe Lévis, or respecting the new arrangement entered into to allow the Intercolonial Railway cars to run over that part of the railway belonging to the Grand Trunk Company.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was no correspondence on the subject moved upon by his hon. friend. The ordinary running arrangement had been made between the Government and the company, which they had given notice to terminate. That was the only paper of any kind which they possessed on the subject.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TERMINUS OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR REPORTS AND CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. DECOSMOS moved for a copy of any reports in possession of the Government made in 1877 by Admiral De Horsey respecting the port or ports most suited for a terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia, with a copy of any correspondence respecting the same with the Imperial Government. He said he was aware that the Admiral in command of Her Majesty's squadron on the Pacific had been invited by the Admiralty, and he did not doubt by the Government of this Dominion, to make a personal enquiry as to the port or ports most suitable for the terminus of the Pacific Railway on the Pacific coast. He (Mr. DeCosmos) had given notice of his motion before the report of the hon. the Minister of Public Works was sent down to the House. He found that in that report no mention whatever was made of any report from Admiral De Horsey. He had reason to believe, before he left the Province of British Columbia, that a copy of that report had been forwarded to this Government. If they turned to the report of Mr. Fleming, Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, issued in the spring or summer of last year, they found that reports had been received and condensed from different officers of Her Majesty's Navy who had been on duty on the North-West coast, but there was not a single mention made of any seaport on Vancouver Island as the terminus. Admiral de Horsey having communicated his report, as he (Mr. DeCosmos) was informed, to the Imperial Government, and to this Government also, he now asked that, before the great question of the Pacific Railway was taken up by this House, they should have laid before them a complete copy of this report, and not as they had last year, an emasculated report, or reports taken from the reports sent by Her Majesty's officers to the Admiralty, in England. The importance of selecting the best place on the Pacific coast was so great that the House required the very best information that could be gathered on the subject, and if it were not so late, he would endeavour to occupy the attention of the House, for half an hour, in showing both the domestic commerce and the foreign commerce of the Pacific Ocean with the American States and territories contiguous to the western terminus of the Central Pacific Railway. But he would reserve his remarks on that subject for a future day, when he hoped the House would have more opportunity to listen to statistical information, as to the trans-Pacific and trans-continental trade which was now being done at San Francisco.

MR. TUPPER said he would take the opportunity to ask the First Minister when the House might hope to receive the report of the Engineer on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman would find that there was a considerable report in the Report of the Public Works Department which had been presented to the House. The report of Mr. Cambie and the Report of Mr. Marcus Smith were there. Mr. Cambie was the officer charged with the survey in British Columbia during the year, and the report of Mr. Smith was a more general report.

MR. TUPPER: Is it intended that we should not receive any further report on the subject before we are called upon to deal with the question of the route of the railway.

MR. MACKENZIE said he was not aware at the moment of any further report until the Government received the complete report of Mr. Cambie, with the maps, etc., and he was not aware if that gentleman would have anything in addition to deal with. If there was anything further that it was possible to bring down, it would be brought down. The paper to which his hon. friend behind him (Mr. DeCosmos) referred, had come in very lately from England as a document communicated to the Government, and it would be brought down as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to.

PROJECTED HARBOUR NEAR MORPETH.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. STEPHENSON moved for returns of all reports, surveys, maps, estimates, correspondence and other details in possession of the Government in connection with the projected harbour on Lake Erie, near the village of Morpeth, in the county of Kent, together with a detailed statement of the expenditure incurred on account of that proposed work since 3rd April, 1876.

Motion agreed to.

RENEWAL OF THE RECIPROCITY TREATY.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. BOURASSA moved for copies of all correspondence and despatches between the Government of Canada and the Government of Great Britain, the English Ambassador at Washington, or any other person in the United States, since the 1st January, 1874, in relation to a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty, together with copies of all Orders in Council in relation to the same subject.

MR. MACKENZIE said there were no new papers. The date the hon. gentleman had given comprised the negotiations which were conducted in the winter of 1874, but there had been no fresh negotiations and no papers of any kind since then. That being the case, he asked his hon. friend to withdraw the motion.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

TRADE AND COMMERCE OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. DECOSMOS moved for a return, showing the receipts for Customs and Excise in British Columbia for the six months ending on December 31st last; also, a return of the Customs and Excise collected on Stickine River for the same period; also, a return of the imports and exports of the said Province for the same period; also, a return showing the imports into the said Province of all merchandise, duty free or subject to Customs or Excise, from the other Provinces of the Dominion, from and including 1871 to 31st December, 1877, setting forth the respective quantities and values the production and growth of Canada. He said the first of these returns would no doubt be very brief, but it was desirable, in some respects, to have before the House. So far as returns in reference to the Stickine, were concerned, he thought it was important that the House should know something about them. He was not aware that they had anything about the trade of that river in the returns before the House. As to the last part of his motion, he thought it would be interesting to have something showing the Interprovincial trade between British Columbia and the other Provinces of the Dominion, and he did not see that any objection could be offered by any member of the Government, or any member of the House.

MR. BURPEE (St. John) said the first part of the return could be supplied to the hon. member quite readily, but he feared the last part could not. There had been no account kept between the different Provinces since Confederation, and there was nothing to show the trade between them.

MR. DECOSMOS said he thought the hon. the Minister of Customs would be able to get the necessary information, from the fact that all merchandize was passed in bond over the Pacific Railway; therefore, the ports through which merchandize was passed to British Columbia would be able to supply the information. He hoped the Government would allow the motion to pass, because he thought it was a matter of great importance.

MR. MACKENZIE.

MR. MACKENZIE: We will try.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at
Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 19th Feb., 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RECEPTION OF PRIVATE BILLS.

MOTION TO EXTEND TIME.

MR. RYMAL moved that, as recommended by the Committee of Standing Orders, the time for receiving the petitions for Private Bills be extended for ten days, and the time for presenting Private Bills for a like period.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

LISTS CONCURRED IN.

MR. MACKENZIE moved concurrence in the report of the Special Committee appointed to prepare and report the list of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of the House, so far as relates to the following Committees:—On Privileges and Elections; on Railways, Canals, and Telegraph Lines; on Miscellaneous Private Bills; on Printing; on Public Accounts; on Banking and Commerce; and on Immigration and Colonization.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING COMMITTEE.

MESSAGE TO THE SENATE.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) moved that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that their Honours will unite with this House in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the printing of Parliament, and to inform their Honours that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing—Messrs. Bourassa, Bowell, Charlton, Church, Delorme, Desjardins, DeVeber, Goudge, Lanthier, Ross (Middlesex), Ross (Prince Edward), Stephenson, Thompson (Halifax), Trow and Wallace (Norfolk), will act as members of said Joint Committee on Printing.

Motion agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 6) To authorize and confirm the scheme of arrangement of the Canada Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Thomson, Wexford.)

Bill (No. 7) Respecting the Ontario Express and Transportation Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

Bill (No. 8) To authorize the National Insurance Company to reduce its capital stock, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Desjardins.)

Bill (No. 9) To amend the Acts incorporating the Brockville and Ottawa Railway Company and the Canada Central Company, and to provide for the amalgamation of the said Companies.—(Mr. Galbraith.)

Bill (No. 10) To authorize the Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company to reduce its capital stock, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Casgrain.)

Bill (No. 11) To reduce the capital stock of the Merchants' Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Jetté.)

Bill (No. 12) To incorporate the Société de Construction Mutuelle under the name of the Société de Prêts et Placements de Québec, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Malouin.)

Bill (No. 15) To give jurisdiction to the Court of Queen's Bench of Ontario, to pay to John Stewart of the city of Kingston, surgeon, one thousand dollars, deposited with his election petition.—(Mr. Haggart.)

Bill (No. 16) To incorporate the Ontario Mutual Life Assurance Company.—(Mr. Bowman.)

PUBLIC WORKS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

(Mr. Mackenzie.)

FIRST READING.

MR. MACKENZIE introduced a Bill (No. 13) Further to amend the Act respecting the Public Works of Canada. He said the object of this small Bill was to enable the evidence to be taken by shorthand by the Dominion arbitrators. It had been found to delay the business very much in the long sittings to have the evidence taken down in longhand and signed in the usual way, and hence he proposed to introduce the stenographical system there as was already the case in the Courts of the country.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT BILL.

(Mr. Laflamme.)

FIRST READING.

MR. LAFLAMME introduced a Bill (No. 14) Further securing the Independence of Parliament. He said the object of the Bill was to remedy the difficulties which were manifest from the application of the former Bill, the clauses of which were to be somewhat extended by applying the disqualification clauses to those who were in public offices under the Provincial Legislatures or the Provincial Governments, and also to those who were in the receipt of retiring allowances. The clauses of the Independence of Parliament Act were also to be made to extend to Senators, who would not be allowed, any more than members of Parliament, to enter into contracts with the Government. These clauses and a better definition of the Independence of Parliament, as stated in the previous Act, comprised the principal features of the Bill that he introduced.

THE CASE OF JUDGE LORANGER.

REMARKS.

MR. MASSON said it was his painful duty to draw the attention of the House to a matter which, in his mind, if it were true, seriously affected the position and standing, as members of the House, of two hon. members, one occupying a seat in the Cabinet, and another having occupied one a few days ago; moreover, implicating two members of the Senate; and, thirdly, implicating the Assistant Clerk of this House, in an unfortunate affair,—the petition against Judge Loranger last year. There were many at that time who thought that there were not sufficient grounds for bringing on that question, and not sufficient grounds for allowing the Committee; and the Committee decided that there were no grounds against Judge Loranger at all.

At the same time, there was a general feeling existing that this whole thing had been brought up by a conspiracy. The report of the evidence showed who was implicated in that conspiracy; it was none of his business to say a word about that; but there had appeared in a newspaper of the previous day a letter supposed to have been written by the Assistant Clerk of this House, containing a most damaging accusation against the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) and against the present Minister of Justice. It went so far as to make them believe that not only were there conspirators, but that the conspirators were on the Treasury benches, and that one of the conspirators was he who was charged with the justice of the country. He need not tell the House that he did not believe a word of that. He would not, for a single moment, believe that the member for South Bruce would lower himself to that position. The high standing of that hon. gentleman would not allow them to have such an opinion of him. Nevertheless, the charge was published; he would read the letter to the House, and the House might judge whether he was right in bringing it before them. He would translate it to the best of his ability. It was from La Minerve, and appeared to have been written by Mr. Piché, the Assistant Clerk.

MR. BLANCHET: When?

MR. MASSON said it was dated the 13th of March, 1876, when the first petition was brought before the House, and was not proceeded with. The writer said:

"We do not find Blake quite vigorous enough, and especially not diligent enough, though we have the certainty that he is determined to turn Loranger out immediately after the Session. He is secret upon that, and does not like to see that any manifestation should be made in the House on this subject; but he has your petition, not as Minister of Justice, but as a political friend of those who have shown it to him. He seems struck with it, and regretted that all these details have not been put in the first petition presented to him. In the absence of Laflamme,—who is always absent, when we have so much want of him, but before leaving for Montreal has authorized us to receive the petition and to do for the best, waiting his return—the Government have finished by thinking with me as follows:—As I said,

MR. MASSON.

Blake seemed to regret not having these details sooner, and he does not like these public manifestations. On the other hand, there is no appearance that the affair makes much progress during the Session. Why should not you propose to him to send him the last petition, on the condition that Loranger does not ask his resignation before the end of the Session, and immediately the Session is over he will grant a Royal Commission and proceed to the trial on all the petitions versus Loranger; which realized, would bring to us more than the presentation of petitions to the House, the Session being so much advanced? This is why it has been telegraphed to you this morning, to ask your permission to address the petition to the Governor in case he would not; your answer in the absence of Laflamme stopping us from acting immediately. I start for Montreal, where I shall be Thursday next for the Court of Appeal, and shall have the pleasure of meeting with you. In the meantime, Dr. Pâquet will see Blake, and you will do well to have two pages of your petition re-copied on the same paper, and by the same hand, and addressed to His Excellency. I have confidence that you will finish by succeeding; but I assure you that it is not a small job to move all these immovables. If you have your miseries, I guarantee you that I have mine: but, courage,—I will not say perseverance or tenacity, but patience and a little tact, and we shall infallibly succeed. The position, you see, is strong, and nobody will be able to resist you. As to me, you do not doubt that I am ever backward,—that my vigilance and my diligence are never at fault, and that I do everything that my embarrassing position allows me to do. Friend:hip and kind regards to ———. Let us not be discouraged; there is one that does and will do almost impossibilities for your deliverance. N.B.—The French find your petition famous and irresistible. Blake seems to find it the same.

(Signed,) "E. U. PICHÉ."

The address of the letter was—"Free. House of Commons. G. Brosseau. Esq., Advocate, Surrey." He did not say that this letter was genuine. He was not to indicate what was the duty of the Government, or what was the duty of the House in the circumstances. He would leave it to the Government and to the House to decide upon the point; he had done his duty.

An HON. MEMBER asked if Mr. Masson knew whether the letter was genuine or not.

MR. MASSON: The hon. gentleman asks me if I know whether the letter is genuine, or not. I have just said I do not. I found it in the paper.

Mr. BLAKE said his hon. friend was good enough to tell him a few moments ago that he was going to bring this letter before the House. He had only to say that he had never had any communication, direct or indirect, verbal or written, with the supposed writer of that letter, Mr. Piché. It was true that, in the course of the discharge of his duty as Minister, he was occasionally the recipient of some letters on the subject of the case against Judge Loranger; and also, in the discharge of his duty, he was the recipient of certain observations with reference to those charges; but it was not true that he ever, at any time, expressed his opinion upon the subject of these charges, except in this sense, that, it having been called to his attention during the Session, at a tolerably late period of the Session of 1876, that a petition was about to be presented, he represented to the hon. members who came to him his opinion of the responsibility which, in his opinion, devolved upon the hon. member who took that step. He stated to them that it was his opinion that the hon. member who took the very grave step of presenting a petition to this House complaining of the conduct of the learned Judge ought to satisfy himself, so far as it was possible for him to satisfy himself, that there was serious cause for the step which was proposed to be taken. He explained, verbally, his notion of the inconveniences to the general administration of justice of such applications, except for the gravest cause. The Government had several applications,—they were pending before he came into office, and they were renewed while he was in office,—applications for procedure by the way of a Royal Commission. These applications were refused. There was a particular branch of the inquiry upon which it was thought not improper to address a communication to the learned Judge himself connected with the receipt of some moneys; but upon that he (Mr. Blake) very fully explained to the House, upon the occasion of the reference of the petition of Mr. Biron and others in the last Session of Parliament, the position of the Government and himself, as their organ, in that matter. He need hardly say that he never expressed, or felt, or entertained any opinion himself upon the subject of these charges. He had felt it his duty, as he had no doubt it was the duty of every hon. member of the House, to keep his mind perfectly unprejudiced with reference to accusations made against any person, and still more against a person occupying the position of the learned Judge, which were to be supported by evidence, when they might be of no weight at all. Nor did he ever express or intimate, or entertain the slightest opinion whether Judge Loranger ought or ought not to be removed. He did not know,—having heard the hon. gentleman (Mr. Masson) read the letter cursorily,—whether he had answered all the expressions contained in it. No doubt a misapprehension of communications of conversations with him had occurred; but he desired to say generally that he had made no statement whatever inconsistent with his duty as a member of Parliament, as a member of the Government, and as Minister of Justice. His own view and wish in the matter was shortly explained by him when it came up before the House, and on the reference to a Committee, when he said it was the hope and belief of every hon. member that the inquiry in this matter would result in the refutation of every charge which might tend to affect the honour, the integrity and the standing of the learned Judge, and the administration of justice in the district. He might add that he never had any communication with his hon. friend, the present Minister of Justice, on the subject at all.

Mr. LAFLAMME said he did not think it necessary for him to say anything, as his learned friend, in the letter, as far as he understood the reading of it, accused him of being continually absent at the time, and that he could not reach him. All he could say was that he heard of the accusations frequently, and they were of a very serious character. He had no connection whatever with the management, with the direction, or with the inspiration of anything connected with this matter.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had only seen the letter the moment before his hon. friend read it. It was rather a startling letter. If it were a genuine one,—if it were not a forgery,—it was a startling letter. Of course he agreed with his hon. friend, who thought it his duty, very properly, to bring the matter before the House. It would be out of the question, of course, to suppose that the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Blake) would be guilty of what was more than insinuated,—he might say asserted,—in that letter, that he was playing a game with the writer of that letter whoever he might be, for the purpose of effecting, clandestinely, the removal of the Judge. He had no doubt that the hon. member for South Bruce could afford to cast aside and disregard that imputation altogether. So far as he remembered the proceedings in the case, it was conducted according to English precedent. It was conducted with all deliberation; it was conducted with a view to protect a high judicial officer, and at the same time, there being solemn specific charges made, to have a full enquiry made. It appeared to him, however, that something must be done, if that letter were real and genuine; but he thought, it having been read, they could leave it for the present in the hands of the hon. gentleman at the head of the Government.

MR. MACKENZIE said he thought the first thing that must occur to any gentleman was that it would be very improper for him to express any opinion, or say anything about it, until he obtained an explanation from the party who seemed to be more or less accused in this matter. They must act fairly towards every person.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD: By all means.

MR. MACKENZIE: And all the more so because the gentleman who was supposed to be implicated was not in a position to say anything here for himself.

A RETURN.

REMARKS.

MR. PLUMB said he wished again to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works to the fact that he had given notice of a motion for a return of iron which had been sold to the Government, and was told that, until the Address was passed, such business could not be attended to.

MR. LAFLANQUE.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had intended, in presenting some papers, to say a word or two about that, but the hon. gentleman was not in his place. His deputy had called his attention to this motion some time during the recess, and to the impossibility almost of obtaining the price, over all the Dominion, of every bit of iron that was bought. He (Mr. Mackenzie) suggested to him to write to the hon. gentleman and ascertain precisely what he wanted and to endeavour to make out a return upon the hon. gentleman's explanation of what he required. That was the reason, he believed, why the hon. gentleman was written to. He would say that the return was prepared as far as it fairly could be done. It would be very difficult to do it, and cover all the iron bought in every part of the Dominion. In the management of the harbours in the Lower Provinces, for instance, they were often obliged to purchase iron in small quantities at different places, and so over all the works which were carried on through the whole Dominion. It took a long time sometimes before they could get the accounts in, and it would take a very long time indeed to transcribe them in the shape of a return.

MR. PLUMB said that, in replying to the letter which came to him, he expressly stated that he did not want any such returns as the First Minister now referred to. He did not want a return of all the iron that had been purchased all over the Dominion; he did not want it in British Columbia, nor did he want it in Nova Scotia; he limited it entirely to a very small portion of the Dominion. He had given the Government a statement of what he wanted; it was not at all extended in its scope; but, if necessary, he would make it more definite.

THE ESTIMATES.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

MR. CARTWRIGHT delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

MR. SPEAKER read the message, and it is as follows:—

"DUFFERIN:

"The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons, Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion, for the year ending the 30th June, 1879; and in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

"OTTAWA, 19th February, 1878."

SUPPLY.

III. CIVIL GOVERNMENT.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

2. The Governor-General's Secretary's Office..... $8,100 House resumed.

IMPROVEMENTS ON THE SAGUENAY.

QUESTION.

MR. CIMON enquired, whether it is the intention of the Government to appropriate a sum of money to carry out the improvements on the River Saguenay at Chicoutimi recommended by the Government Engineers who visited and surveyed that river during the months of October and November last?

MR. MACKENZIE said there was provision made in the Estimates for that work, as there was in the Estimates of last year.

MONEY PAID TO BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. DE COSMOS moved for a return showing the respective sums of money paid to the Government of British Columbia, and at what time paid, in accordance with section 2, chap. 17, Vic. 37, of the Statute of Canada. In doing so, he said he wished to bring before the House the fact that, by the non-performance of their agreement on the part of the Government of the Dominion, there had been entailed upon the Province of British Columbia a loss of some $280,000. In order that the House might follow him in bringing to their notice this equitable claim, he took occasion to state that in 1873 he was the Premier of the Province of British Columbia. He found that the Province was not in a condition to invite immigrants to come and settle in the country. The ordinary and current revenue of the Province was only sufficient to meet the ordinary and current expenditure. In order, therefore, to prepare that country, in the interests of the Dominion, to receive population from abroad, and thereby contribute to the revenues and the building up of the country, it was decided that he should go to the Government of the Dominion, and, if necessary, to the Imperial Government and the capitalists of Great Britain, to raise a loan of some million of dollars to make surveys, and open up colonization roads through the accessible portion of that Province. In the autumn of 1873 he arrived in this Province, some three or four weeks before Parliament met in extra Session. He placed himself in communication with the Government of that day. He told that Government that the Provincial Government wanted a million of dollars or less,—may be $500,000 or $600,000. The Minister of Finance of that day was absent in England, placing the bonds of the Dominion upon the London market. He opened negotiations through the hon. the then Minister of Public Works (Mr. Langevin) with respect to this loan. When the Minister of Finance returned from England,—as the loan could not be concluded with the Dominion Government until he had returned,—it was arranged that the Province of British Columbia should draw on application the sum between the allowed debt and the actual debt of the Province at the date of Union, as increased by the Act increasing the debts of the respective Provinces in 1873. In order that the House might follow him in this matter, he would read the Order in Council that was passed by the Dominion Government of that day, respecting this matter:

"In a memorandum, dated 30th Oct., 1873, from the hon. the Minister of Finance, submitting an application from Mr. DeCosmos on behalf of the Government of British Columbia, asking that the Dominion may advance for local improvements a sum equal to the difference between the actual debt of the Province and the debt allowed at the Union, such advance to be at the rate of 5 per cent, to be secured upon the subsidy, and to be repaid by a Sinking Fund,—

"The Minister states that he considers it inexpedient that the Dominion Government should undertake a loan on the terms specified; but that there is no doubt that if the Province wishes to enter upon local improvements and borrow money for the purpose, it could be done on more favourable terms in the manner proposed than by procuring a loan elsewhere; and he suggests that the same object can be gained in another way, which would be quite legitimate: That the excess of the debt allowed over that outstanding at the date of the Union is in fact a debt of the Dominion, upon which it has to pay five per cent. annually on the subsidy, and that there can be no objection to the Dominion, if it thinks proper, redeeming this debt by paying the money to the Province.

"The Minister, therefore, recommends that authority be given to advance to the Government of British Columbia, for local improvements, such sums, from time to time, as may be applied for, to be charged against the debt of the Province to the extent of the amount by which that debt falls short of the debt allowed. Should the Provincial Government at any time wish to refund any portion of the advances so made, the refund, the Minister observes, would, on the same principle, be credited to the debt.

"The Committee concur in the foregoing recommendations, and submit the same for your Excellency's approval."

He desired to direct the particular attention of the House to the words, "such sum or sums as may from time to time be applied for." There was no promise or suggestion whatever that there would be any influence brought to bear against or any exception taken to any application made by the Province of British Columbia to take over the difference between the actual and the allowed debt. They had, therefore, the fact that, when the late Administration retired from office, there was an arrangement made by the Province of British Columbia with the Dominion, to obtain for surveys, roads, and bridges, &c., the means for opening up that extensive Province, an arrangement by which a large sum of money—nearly a million dollars—might be obtained from the Dominion at a lower rate of interest than the Province could obtain it elsewhere. Shortly after Parliament met, the Ministry of the day resigned. His mission was not merely to the Dominion Government, but it extended also to England, with regard to the Graving-dock. Before proceeding to England, he thought it would be wise on his part to obtain a confirmation, from the present Government, of the arrangements with respect to the advance or loan. He did so, and he (Mr. DeCosmos) had the authority in a letter from the Prime Minister, in which he agreed to make that advance. The letter was as follows:—

MR. DECOSMOS.

"OTTAWA, 4th Nov., 1873.

"MY DEAR SIR,—Your proposal to the Dominion Government respecting the payment to the Local Government of British Columbia of such sums as may be applied for from time to time, to be expended on local improvements to be charged against the debt of the Province, until the sums so advanced will, with the existing debt, reach the amount of the debt allowed by the terms of the Union, is one which will require the sanction of Parliament. This being the case, no absolute promise can be given until Parliament meets. I see no serious objection, however, to the proposal, and we will submit a measure to Parliament to carry it into effect.

"I am, &c., "A. MACKENZIE."

The House had then before it the fact that the late Government and the present Government of the Dominion, with a view, he believed, at that time of advancing the interests of Canada, and the Province of British Columbia in particular, had agreed to advance the money at a lower rate of interest than it could be obtained elsewhere, and in the same way as the Dominion had obtained guarantees for its bonds from the date of Confederation from the Imperial Government. The House had the fact before it that this and the late Government had agreed to advance the difference between the actual and allowed debt. The next question arising was what was the difference between the actual and allowed debt? The actual debt of British Columbia at the time of the Union was $1,000,403; the allowed debt, increased by the Act of 1873, was $1,946,284. The difference between the actual and allowed debt in 1873-4 was $945,878. And the agreement for the advance of money, in the nature of a loan, with a right of repayment of the whole or any portion, covered this amount. The next point was as to the Statute. In order to carry out that agreement, chap. 17, 37 Vic. was enacted, the 2nd section of which read as follows:—

"The Governor in Council may, in his discretion, advance from time to time to any Province of Canada, such sums as may be required, for local improvements in the Province, and not exceeding, in the whole, the amount by which the debt of the Province for which Canada is responsible then falls short of the debt with which the Province was allowed to enter the Union—such advances to be deemed additions to the debt of the Province, with permission to the Province to repay them to Canada, on such notice, in such sums and on such other conditions as the Dominion Government and that of the Province may agree upon; any amount so repaid being deducted from the debt of the province in calculating the subsidy payable to it."

That section was intended not merely to include the Province of British Columbia, but every Province in the Dominion. When he opened these negotiations with the present Dominion Government, for the purpose of taking over the difference between the actual and allowed debt of that Province, the proposal seemed to be a novelty, but on passing it under consideration it was discovered that it might be an advantage, not merely to the Dominion Government, to extend its influence in that manner through the Provinces, but a great advantage to the Provinces themselves. The point to be observed in that matter was this: that, owing to the negotiations between the two Governments, the Dominion and British Columbian, it was agreed that, when the Province applied for the money, it was to be paid over to the Provincial Government, and that without qualification. On enquiry, so far as he was able to gather, the amount paid to the Province of British Columbia, amounted to $189,258 in 1874-5, and a further sum of $150,000 was paid in 1875-6, and charged subsequently against the debt of the Province. When the Provincial Government applied for the money, they were not properly met by the Dominion Government, and there was no prompt fulfilment of the bargain which he (Mr. DeCosmos) had made with the present Government and its predecessor. The first application to the present Government was for the sum of $439,150. $189,000 out of that amount had been expended, and the Province wanted $250,000 more, to meet the additional expenditure on its public works. The Dominion Government refused to advance that amount. Stated briefly, the Province received from the present Government $189,000, and was refused $250,000. The question would naturally arise as to why the Dominion Government, whose word ought to be a word of honour, refused to carry out their agreement. If there were good and sufficient reasons why they should not carry it out, he believed the House and the country would be prepared to endorse their refusal. But, as far as he had examined the facts of the case, he found there was no good and sufficient reason why they should have refused, and particularly so as the Government of British Columbia was engaged in opening up that vast country, and in doing so was opening up a part of the territory of Canada over which it had jurisdiction. But, if they traced the matter to the bottom, he believed the true reason for refusing to honour their pledge would be found to be a desire on the part of the Dominion Government to check-mate the then Government of British Columbia, led by Mr. Walkem; in other words, to embarrass the Provincial Government financially, in order, if possible, to bring them under the influence of the Federal Government. It was open to the Government to explain that statement, and if they could by any possible means explain away the reasons which were popularly given in that Province for the refusal, no one would be happier to accord them full credit and release them from the charge of having attempted to embarrass the Government of that Province than he would be. It must be remembered that the demand for $439,150 was made in April, May or June, 1875. If the Dominion Government had been without funds, or had had large claims coming due which would prevent it from fulfilling that agreement, there might have been some excuse; but, when he turned to the Sessional papers and to the statement of the assets and liabilities of the Dominion in the Public Accounts, he found that, at the end of June, 1875, which was the end of the financial year, there was to the credit of the Dominion, in British and Canadian banks, and other places $10,462,586; in other words, a month or two after the $400,000 and odd were asked for by the Provincial Government, it was found, by a return laid before the House, that $10,462,586 was set down by the Minister of Finance as the money assets of this Dominion. Against that they found liabilities due to other banks amounting to nearly $2,150,752, leaving a surplus to the credit of the Dominion Government, at the banks, of $8,311,834. He put it to the House whether the Government could be justified, from what they knew at present, in refusing to fulfil its obligation to the Province of British Columbia, when the Dominion had nearly nine million dollars to its credit at its bankers? He had called the attention of the House to the fact that the money was to be paid to British Columbia, when applied for. It was to be observed that the money was to be paid from time to time. There was no question that the negotiations which had taken place between himself, on behalf of British Columbia, and the present and the late Governments in regard to the advance of the difference between its actual and allowed debt constituted a bonâ fide agreement between the parties. Remembering that there had been a bonâ fide agreement entered into—for that amount of money had been contracted by the Dominion Government to be paid to the Province, what did they next find? The report of the Committee of the Privy Council, approved on 20th May, 1875, showed the following:

"Upon the application of the Government of British Columbia for the sum of $439,150, whereof $250,000 is asked for on account of the Graving Dock, the remainder for local improvements, the whole to be advanced in accordance with the provisions of Vict. 37, cap. 17.

"The Hon. the Minister of Finance, to whom this application has been referred, observes, in a Report dated 19th May, 1875, that, with respect to the sum asked for the construction of the Graving Dock, certificates of progress of work are required by the Terms of the Act, and that such certificates have not, so far as he is aware, been furnished by the Government of British Columbia.

"With respect to the remaining advances, he further observes that it is entirely optional with the Government of the Dominion to advance any sums on said account; and, inasmuch as inconvenience may arise if expenditure should be undertaken in any of the Provinces, under the impression that the Local Governments or Legislatures are at liberty to draw at pleasure for the balance of debt referred to in said Act, he suggests that the Secretary of State be directed to notify the local authorities of the several Provinces that the consent of the Government of Canada must be expressly obtained before any advance on account of local improvements, as specified in the above Act, is authorized; but that the sum of $189,150 having been spent by the Columbia Government, it is recommended that this sum be paid.

"The Committee concur in the foregoing Report, and submit the same for Your Excellency's approval."

He might remark, with reference to the closing portion of the second section of the report of the Committee of the Privy Council, that the $250,000 referred to was not asked for in aid of the construction of the Graving Dock, but for an entirely different object. From that document they discovered that the present Dominion Government refused to carry out the obligation they had entered into with the Province of British Columbia, and they endeavoured to make British Columbia, when it had entered into a special agreement under two Governments, occupy a similar position to a Province that had made no agreement whatever. In the next place, they found that, on the 4th February, 1876, Mr. Langton, the Auditor-General, wrote as follows:

"I am directed to advise you that the $150,000 was distinctly refused as an advance against debt, but it is granted as an advance against subsidies."

From this they discovered a second refusal on the part of the Government a year later, to do what they agreed to do in the autumn of 1873. Now he presumed that the House might gather some fair information of the state of this case. In the first place, the Provincial Government had agreed with the Dominion Government for an advance equal to the amount between the actual and the allowed debt; that the Provincial Government applied for $439,150 to the Dominion Government, which was refused, and that the Dominion Government had the sum of $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 in its Treasury at its command, some of which was drawing interest and some of which was not drawing interest, and yet they refused to carry out a solemn agreement with that Province. Before he proceeded further to show the loss of money entailed upon that Province by the violation and, as he took it, the deliberate violation of the agreement with that Province by the Dominion Government, he would again call the attention of the House to the fact that this Government had sent its delegate to British Columbia to negotiate a relaxation of the railway section of the terms of union. It so happened that the two Governments could not agree and an appeal was made to England by the Executive of the Provincial Government. He took it, therefore—and he repeated again as he said before—that the whole and sole object of the Dominion Government in refusing to advance the money that it had agreed to was to embarrass the Local Government of British Columbia. They had no other object; and that in the face of the repeated declarations made on the part of the existing Government when a party in Opposition: that they wished to keep the federal distinct from provincial affairs, and that they believed in decentralization, instead of centralization. This was his statement; and this was the view which the people of British Columbia took of it. As he had before remarked, it was open for the Government to explain away this view, and to give them a satisfactory reason for their conduct. Let the House now see what pecuniary loss the Government had entailed on the Province of British Columbia. At the time the latter had large contracts let, and with respect to part of these contracts payment on them had matured, and consequently the Government wanted money to pay the contractors; but the Dominion Government refused to advance the money. The Provincial Government then had to apply to the banks and outside capitalists in order to raise enough money to meet their liabilities, and had to pay as high as eight per cent. per annum for money; and that when the Dominion Government had enough money in its Treasury to spare for that object to fulfil its agreement. The result was simply this: that the Provincial Government, in round numbers, had lost by having to borrow money at eight per cent. the difference between five and eight per cent., and that was three per cent. The loss under that head, placing it at a minimum—and he believed that it was more like 100 per cent. more than that—was at least $10,000. In order then to get rid of their liabilities, they had to place bonds in the local market to the amount of $350,000, and hypothecate them to tide through that year. If it was the object of this Government to embarrass the Provincial Government of British Columbia, the former was successful, as the latter Government was financially embarrassed. The Provincial Opposition having been tutored by agents at Ottawa, or by the present Government at Ottawa, or by writers from Ottawa, the agents of this Government in the Province of British Columbia were the first to communicate the news to the public that the Local Government was embarrassed in its finances, the Dominion Government having refused to advance them anything more. Having tided over the year 1875-6, the existing Government of the Province found it was compelled to pass an Act to enable it to borrow $750,000 in the English money market. That $750,000 was sold in the market of London at 95, and it cost one per cent. for commission. The loss, therefore, sustained in selling at a discount these $750,000, which the Province ought to have received from the Dominion Government at five per cent., was $45,000. These bonds were issued at six per cent. to mature in thirty years; and that is one per cent. more than the rate at which the Dominion Government had agreed to pass this money over to the Province. One per cent. over the five per cent. upon that amount was equal to $7,500; and, hence, during thirty years, the Province would have to pay that $7,500 annually. It would also have paid at the end of thirty years, $225,000; and this amount the Province of British Columbia would have to pay to the parties from whom it borrowed, simply because this Government refused to fulfil its bargain. More than this: the management, he took it, of the Sinking Fund connected with this $750,000 loan, during the coming thirty years, would be at least $10,000. And adding the extra interest over five at eight per cent., the loss by discount on the bonds and the increased interest for thirty years, he found that the manner in which the Dominion had treated the Province in this matter, would entail a loss on the Province of British Columbia of $280,000. In other words, that was the cost to the Province of British Columbia, of having this Federal Government engage in what he might regard as the unholy work of embarrassing a Provincial Government. And not only did they entail a loss of $280,000 on the Province, but the Dominion also, actually and absolutely, lost the sum of $30,302 odd. Allow him to explain:—When this advance was agreed to by the late Government, the Finance Minister had just returned from England where he had sold his bonds. He believed they were five per cent. bonds and commanded a premium of five per cent. Now, paying off the difference between the actual and the allowed debt of the Province, the Dominion Government, by floating its own five per cent. bonds at five per cent. premium, would have made $47,264.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: I may remark to my hon. friend that they were not five per cent. bonds, but bonds raised on the Imperial Government guarantee at four per cent.

MR. DECOSMOS said the hon. gentleman would have his opportunity for replying further on. He, however, thought that the hon. gentleman, if he referred to the money which was obtained on Imperial guarantees and Government guarantees, would find that both went off together. He only spoke from memory on this point and was subject to correction. This Government under pressure had advanced, as he had previously stated, two sums, $189,233 and $150,000; and the money saved by floating the Dominion bonds at five per cent. premium on the amount of money which was advanced by the hon. the Minister of Finance—the profit really made by the Dominion Government in this regard was $16,961. By refusing to advance the further sum of $606,055, the Dominion Government lost the five per cent. premium on that sum, and that was a loss of $30,302. The aggregate loss, therefore, of the Dominion Government and the Provincial Government by the refusal to carry out the agreement made with the Province of British Columbia by the Dominion Government was $310,302; and he again repeated that this loss was made in the face of a surplus in the Treasury of the Dominion, of $8,311,834. And the loss to the Province of British Columbia on this aggregate, the sum of $280,000, would be six per cent. per annum besides the whole amount for ever. Probably his hon. friend the Finance Minister would be able, with his actuary, to find out what the total loss to the Province of British Columbia would be on that $280,000 for ever. The interest on the sum lost by the Province of British Columbia for ever by the refusal of this Government to carry out its contract would be equal to even one-twelfth of the total annual subsidy received to-day by the Province. He appealed to the House if some explanation—if a full explanation was not required and ought to be given to the country to show how this Government could justify the taking away, by its own deliberate act, one-twelfth of the subsidies guaranteed by the Act of Union. He had only one other word to say; and this was that, if there was justice, if the equities of this case were heard by dispassionate gentlemen, and if the case of British Columbia in this matter was heard and understood, the Dominion Government owed a debt—as indemnity—to the Province of British Columbia approximating, in round numbers, to nearly $300,000; and it would be for the present Government, or their successors, in due course of time, to pay over to the Province the penalty of their deliberate violation of the agreement, that was in the interest of both the Province and the Dominion.

MR. DECOSMOS.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said there could be, of course, no objection whatever, to the hon. gentleman obtaining the information he required. The facts connected with it, so far as his memory served him, were briefly these: he believed the hon. gentleman had correctly enough stated that, some time in the Session of October, 1873, he (Mr. DeCosmos) made application to the late Government to have an advance made in the form of which he spoke; and he had no doubt, that the hon.

gentleman had correctly quoted the Order in Council under which the late Government had consented to make that advance. He (Mr. Cartwright) understood, that subsequently, about a week after the present Government assumed office, the hon. gentleman renewed this application. He was not, himself, in Ottawa at that time, being engaged in conducting his election; but he understood that the hon. gentleman had had some communication with the hon. the Premier, who advised him upon that occasion, that in his judgment it was not possible for the Government to entertain any such application without obtaining Parliamentary sanction for such advance, probably in the shape of an Act. He must, however, correct the misapprehension under which the hon. gentleman appeared to labour regarding the letter his hon. friend the First Minister as at all implying what he (Mr. DeCosmos) appeared to conceive it meant. That letter did not, as he understood it, or as his hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) understood it, at all mean that the Province of British Columbia, or any other Province, was to be entitled, at its discretion, without due notice, to draw cheques upon them to the extent of the whole amount of the payment unliquidated. Now, in compliance with what his hon. friend had agreed to do, among the Acts that were passed at the Session of 1874 was the Act to which this hon. gentleman referred. That was cap. 17, 37 Vic., by which, as the House would see, it was expressly provided, and for very excellent and good reasons, that these advances should be made at the discretion of the Government, upon proper notice having been given, and on their being convinced of the expediency of the work. The reason for all this was obvious. It was quite impossible that they should make this advance to one Province without allowing other Provinces to obtain, if they desired it, the same benefit on like conditions. It was also perfectly obvious that in view of the very large engagements which this country had then assumed, it would be the most dangerous thing to allow many millions of money to be drawn at call from the public Treasury to serve the needs of the several Provincial Executives; and it was for that reason, and after full consideration, that the Government introduced the Act entitled Cap. 17, which expressly provided that this advance should be made in their discretion and for local improvements. He regretted that no Hansard appeared to have been preserved for the year 1874, because his recollection was that, at the time this Act was introduced, he (Mr. Cartwright) expressly explained the reasons which had induced the Government to word this particular section in that fashion; and he then had expressly called the attention of the members, among whom, if he remembered aright, was the hon. gentleman himself to the fact that notice must be given—

MR. DECOSMOS: Of what?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: That notice must be given that these moneys were wanted, and also to the fact that it must remain at the discretion of the Government of the Dominion, because it would have been a most dangerous addition to their then existing liabilities to empower the several Governments at their pleasure to come down suddenly upon them for sums amounting, collectively, to several millions of dollars. So much for the reason why this Act was introduced, and for the construction which the Government then and now put upon it. He begged to inform the hon. gentleman and the House that they had had no intention whatever of embarrassing the Government, to which the hon. gentleman had alluded. The reasons which had induced the Government in 1875 to decline to advance a sum amounting to nearly half a million of dollars, although that was subsequently modified by agreeing to refund to the Government of British Columbia the sum of $189,000, were, that in that particular moment, enormous sums were required to be met by the Government of this Dominion, amounting, in the space of two or three months, from the date of which the hon. gentleman had spoken, to, he thought, the sum of twelve or fourteen millions of dollars. Whether the hon. gentleman was correct or not in the statement he (Mr. DeCosmos) made that, in June or July, 1875, a large balance remained with the bankers of the Dominion, he was not sure, but assuming, for the sake of argument, that the hon. gentleman was quite correct, he could tell him (Mr. DeCosmos) that at that moment their engagements required every penny they had in their coffers, and they had had enormous sums to pay; and, further, were obliged, in consequence of the demands made upon them, to antedate the period for the negotiation of the loan in 1875, because the resources at their command were hardly sufficient to enable them to meet their then engagements, which were very large, a considerable portion of them being on the account of British Columbia itself. As to the calculations which the hon. gentleman had made regarding the loss which he stated the Province of British Columbia had sustained in consequence of this, he could only say he very sincerely regretted that the Province of British Columbia should have been exposed to any loss whatever. If he had understood the hon. gentleman aright—if not, he (Mr. DeCosmos) could correct him—the sum total which that Province would have been entitled to would have been $900,000. Of that sum the hon. gent. himself admitted that they received $330,000, which certainly would not leave the sum of $750,000 available; so that, even if they had obtained the full sum which the hon. gentleman had said was promised him, he (Mr. DeCosmos) would not have been able to obtain quite the loan he wanted. However, he (Mr. Cartwright) would only point out as to the calculation the hon. gentleman had made, that he did not see on what principle he (Mr. DeCosmos) assumed that the annual payment of $75,000, ranging over thirty years, was to be treated as a present cash loss to the Province of $225,000. He (Mr. Cartwright) should be inclined to think that it would be much less than one half of that sum.

MR. DECOSMOS: I did not say it was a present cash loss; I said it would entail a loss of $225,000.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said he was glad to be corrected. He had understood the hon. gentleman to add to his other enumerations the damage which he claimed that Province had sustained, about $18,000 or thereabouts, as being the cash interest on this loss, which was the loss of British Columbia from this time out on the $500,000 which the hon. gentleman said the Dominion owed them. As to the little matter in dispute, the guarantee loan, floated in 1873, he could inform the hon. gentleman that it was not Dominion five per cents., but guaranteed Imperial four per cents, which were not properly applicable for a purpose of the kind to which he (Mr. DeCosmos) alluded. Speaking generally, the House would perceive that this Act was passed for a good reason, and he might also say that, if the application of the Province of British Columbia was declined, it was not with a view to embarrass the Government of that Province in any way, but simply because, at that particular time, the Dominion Government had so many and such heavy demands made upon them that it was a matter of very great difficulty, at the moment, to see how they were to meet the current liabilities that came crowding upon them without serious inconvenience to the general public service. He need not remind the House that at that particular time the distress in Canada in commercial circles was very serious, and very great difficulty was then experienced in obtaining from the several places in which money was deposited the sums that the Government really required to meet the wants of the public service. Any other discussion that might be had on this subject he thought would be more fitting when the several papers to which the hon. gentleman had referred were brought down, and they would be brought down at the earliest possible moment.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

MR. DECOSMOS said the last excuse given by the hon. the Minister of Finance for not passing this money over to British Columbia was that distress then existed in Canada. By that, he presumed, he (Mr. Cartwright) meant old Canada; and this made up a large share apparently of the arguments of hon. members of the House who seemed generally, when dealing in their disputes about matters of finance, to refer to old Canada as the Dominion.

forgetting that there were besides the Maritime Provinces, with one million of people, another Maritime Province, which he hoped before long would also have its million of people in this Dominion. Why had not the hon. the Finance Minister, when he was dealing with the distress existing at that time in Canada, remembered that considerable distress would be entailed by his action in the Province of British Columbia as well. He (Mr. DeCosmos) thought that that Province was as much entitled to the hon. gentleman's consideration as this or any other Province, and he, therefore, took it that the hon. gentleman's excuse on that ground was neither full, nor complete, nor satisfactory. The hon. gentleman also said that he (Mr. DeCosmos) had made an error about the $750,000 loan, and that the real difference between the actual and allowed debt not paid over, was some $600,000 odd; but would any one suppose it to be desirable that any Government should go to the British Market, or any foreign money market, to borrow the difference between $600,000 odd and $750,000. If they would not do so, then the reason why this $750,000 was borrowed was to enable the Provincial Government to meet the liabilities which had been incurred. If the Dominion Government had paid this $600,000 odd, there never would have been any earthly necessity to issue bonds for so small an amount as the excess over $600,000; hence the hon. gentleman's allusion in that particular fell to the ground. The hon. gentleman said the Dominion Government had no intention to embarrass the Government of his Province. The Government of that Province was embarrassed, but the hon. gentleman's kindness was shown towards the bankers and others and the commercial people on this side. The hon. gentleman's whole soul was apparently engaged in sympathy with the bankers and the merchants on this side, with whom he (Mr. Cartwright) had previously no obligation, and not with British Columbia, with which the Government had an obligation. The hon. gentleman could not say that this Act cap. 17 was permissive, and could not state here on the floor of the House that the Province of British Columbia had to give notice. He accepted from the hon. gentleman, to a certain extent, the necessity for notice; but not to the extent in which he (Mr. Cartwright) had put it. For the Province of British Columbia had given notice, and had negotiated with the Government of the Dominion for the advance of this money. The hon. the Premier of this Government had agreed with that Province, and the hon. the Finance Minister of the late Government had agreed with that Province to do so. And the hon. gentleman himself (Mr. Cartwright) had stalked through the Privy Council Chamber when the arrangement was made with the present Premier of the Dominion. His hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knew that it was a deliberate and understood thing by the leading members of the Ministry when they came into power, and before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) went to his constituency, that this money should be paid over to the Province of British Columbia; and, if he (Mr. Cartwright) came down to the House to-day, and told it that the Province had to give notice, that the Act was merely permissive, and that the Dominion Government could do as it pleased, he (Mr. DeCosmos) took this occasion to state that the hon. the Minister of Finance either made a very great error in this matter, or that the hon. gentleman's memory was exceedingly treacherous. It was obvious that it would not be proper to allow the other Provinces to draw without notice—and in this he certainly agreed with the hon. gentleman—on the Dominion Treasury, at their will and pleasure, without notifying them; and in this case of the Province of British Columbia, they had given notice, and had a positive agreement, and hence the objection of the hon. gentleman would not come under that head at all. With respect to the hon. the Premier, he knew full well when he brought his resolutions to go into Committee of Supply that the advance was to be made to British Columbia—for he (Mr. DeCosmos) had spoken to him on the subject, where he now sat, several times, and more than that he had written letters to the hon. the Finance Minister, which he (Mr. DeCosmos) had in his possession at the present moment, with respect to this matter—in which he (Mr. DeCosmos) had asked when he was going to bring down his measure—and what for?—to carry out the agreement with British Columbia, not merely with respect to this loan, but also with respect to the graving dock. Hence, the statement that this Bill was introduced into this House, and that British Columbia was placed in the same position as other Provinces, was an error; and that it was an error, he believed, was capable of full and complete proof. The hon. gentleman said he knew nothing about this matter. He would remind the hon. gentleman that, when sitting in the Privy Council Chamber, he himself was there when this matter was understood, with other members of the Government. If it was not brought to the notice of the Finance Minister of this country, he could not conceive why it was not; for it had been discussed over and over again by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and others; and he was told, when he wanted to get the confirmation of this agreement with the late Government, that they saw no difficulty about this matter. He believed it was on his own suggestion to the Premier that this privilege should be extended to all the Provinces, that it was extended in the Act they had before them.

MR. TUPPER said he quite concurred with the remark made by the hon. the Minister of Finance, that it would be more convenient for the House to take a discussion on this question, which was certainly a very important one, as presented by the hon. member, when the papers were all brought down and the facts were all before them.

Motion agreed to.

MAILS BETWEEN QUEBEC AND MURRAY BAY.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. LANGEVIN moved for a copy of all correspondence about the carrying of mails by water from Quebec to Murray Bay, in the County of Charlevoix, for the year 1877; copy of all tenders received for said service for same period; copy of all arrangements for carrying the mail during the same period; together with a statement shewing the total cost of said service for the season of 1877, and a separate statement for the carrying of the same mails for the same period during the season of 1876, including in both instances the cost of carrying the mails to Tadousac, Chicoutimi, Eboulements and Baie St. Paul; also, for a copy of tenders received in 1877 for the carrying by land of the mails from Quebec to Eboulements or Murray Bay; also, a copy of all Orders in Council or Departmental Orders relating to the same, shewing the reasons why one special tender has been accepted; and also a statement showing the name of the late contractor for the carrying of said mails, the amount paid him, and the amount now paid and to whom for the same service, together with a copy of the correspondence on the said subject. In making this motion, he said he wished to call the attention of the hon. the Postmaster-General to this case. During the season of 1876, the mails were carried from Quebec to Eboulements and Murray Bay, in the county of Charlevoix, and thence to Rivière du Loup, on the other side of the river, and thence to Tadousac, and north to Saguenay; and the return mails were also brought. For that service, which was a daily service, the Government paid $1,500. During last season, for a reason which was unknown to him, the Government changed that, and sent the mails from Quebec by the Grand Trunk Railway to St. Denis, and then from the railway by stage to the riverside, and thence by a small steamboat to Murray Bay. Then, when the mails were at Murray Bay, there were couriers or land agents who carried the mails from Murray Bay, first coming back up the St. Lawrence to Baie St. Paul—that is to say, 30 miles by land up the St. Lawrence to Baie St. Paul, and the mails were then distributed as before. Then, from Murray Bay, the mails that were destined for the Saguenay had to go by land by the road from Murray Bay to Chicoutimi, and the result had been, as the hon. the Postmaster General would perceive when he saw the accounts, that the cost of the service had been greatly increased in 1877,—that it had cost a much larger sum than in 1876,—while the service had been very far from being so efficient. The mails, for example, destined for the Saguenay had arrived some twelve, fourteen or sixteen hours after the time at which they used to be received by the ordinary boat. The mails, instead of being at Baie St. Paul and the upper part of the County of Charlevoix at twelve o'clock or eleven o'clock in the morning, had to go down first to Murray Bay, and would arrive there about two o'clock, and then have to travel back up the St. Lawrence 30 miles to reach Baie St. Paul, which, of course, took a number of hours, so that the upper part of the county received their mails only in the evening at six or seven o'clock, instead of receiving them at twelve o'clock. Why all this was he could not conceive; he could not understand the reason of that change. The service was well performed in 1876, and the parties affected by that service did not complain; they were satisfied with the service as then performed. Perhaps the hon. the Postmaster-General would be able to give the reasons that induced his Department to make the change. He was pretty sure, that when he investigated the results of the service as performed in 1877, compared with the service of 1876, not only for the county of Charlevoix, but also for the counties of Saguenay and Chicoutimi, he would find that the service as performed in 1876 was far better than in 1877. He might add that, when His Excellency the Governor-General went to Tadousac, during the season, the mails had to be sent to Tadousac by special boat, which cost another sum of money which might certainly have been saved.

MR. DeCosmos.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he could correct the hon. gentleman in one particular. The hon. gentleman stated that it was a daily service; that was a mistake. The old Gulf Ports Steamboat Company's steamships only went tri-weekly.

MR. LANGEVIN said the hon. gentleman was quite mistaken. The service was not performed by that company; it was performed by the St. Lawrence Steam Navigation Company.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he did not rise to say what particular boat carried the mails, but to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he was mistaken in this respect; that he spoke of the mails to 1876 having been delivered daily, whereas it was only tri-weekly, and the present service by Murray Bay was a daily service.

MR. LANGEVIN said that, if the hon. gentleman inquired, he would find that, during a large portion of the season of 1876, the service was a daily service. Of course, he did not speak of Sunday, but of other days in the week. There was a boat which left Quebec every day for these ports, and that boat every day carried the mails. Then, when the tourists and visitors to the waterside left, for two or three months the service would not be so frequent; it would be three times a week, and further on it would be reduced to once, during that portion of the year; but during the five months of the season it was a daily mail. He assured the hon. gentleman that, if he enquired, he would find that the public service had suffered, and that the population of these counties had suffered on account of this change; while he would find that the service of 1877 had cost a much larger sum than that of 1876, to no purpose whatever, the service having been well performed before. He might tell the hon. gentleman another thing: that he had seen parties coming down to the boats which left Quebec for these ports in 1877, and giving the passengers lots of letters to carry down to Baie St. Paul, Eboulements and Murray Bay, because the boats would reach there long before the mail could reach, and parties in Murray Bay had time to answer their letters and send them back by the boats, so that the Post Office Department lost a large sum of money in that way. These parties could not wait to send back their answers the next day. He was sure the hon. the Postmaster-General must have been misinformed, and must have been deceived about this service.

If he could have seen it himself—if he could have seen what was going on—the hon. gentleman would never have allowed this to be done. He would have seen that the service was well performed in 1876, while in 1877 it was the laughing-stock of all the tourists that were down at the waterside. Besides that, the resident population were suffering in consequence of the change. What influences caused the change he could not say; of course, he knew very well that the Minister could not personally know all the details of his Department.

MR. HUNTINGTON: I will ask the hon. gentleman would he prefer the old service to the Grand Trunk service, by which Murray Bay is served?

MR. LANGEVIN: Of course.

MR. MASSON: There is a boat daily.

MR. LANGEVIN said it was for the public interest that the service should be continued as formerly; first, because the service was well performed, and people had time to answer their letters on the same day; and, secondly, because it cost not one-half or one-third of what it cost in 1877. His hon. friend on his left (Mr. Cimon) could also corroborate him as far as his county was concerned.

MR. CIMON said he thought it his duty to say something on the subject, inasmuch as the hon. the Postmaster-General seemed to have been incorrectly informed respecting it. Great injustice had been done last season with regard to the population of the counties of Chicoutimi and Saguenay; and he was convinced that, as soon as the facts were known by the hon. the Postmaster-General, he would see that such an injustice should cease to exist. He particularly called the attention of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to this matter, as the hon. gentleman was a member for one of the divisions of Quebec city, which, having large commercial interests with the counties in question, was interested in having the mail service properly carried on between it and Chicoutimi. He hoped that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) would use his influence towards obtaining an amelioration of the present condition of things. The facts were as follows: Until last year the mails between Quebec and Chicoutimi, during the season of navigation, were conveyed by the steamers of the St. Lawrence Steam Navigation Company, one of which left Quebec every morning, reached Chicoutimi at five o'clock the next morning, and on returning left Chicoutimi or Ha! Ha! Bay at nine o'clock the same morning, arriving in Quebec on the morning following, thus furnishing a daily mail between these places. Under this system the mails were delivered at Murray Bay, Tadousac, Ha! Ha! Bay and Chicoutimi during the whole season for the small sum of $1,500, while, under the new system, of which complaint was made, the mail left Quebec every morning via the Grand Trunk Railway, and was taken from River Ouelle by ferry over to Murray Bay, whence it was twice a week taken by land to Tadousac, and thrice a week to Chicoutimi. In this manner, a day longer was consumed in conveying the mail to Chicoutimi from Quebec than was the case under the old system. Moreover, the new mode of performing this service had deprived the Saguenay and Tadousac of a daily mail; and, in consequence of this state of affairs, commercial affairs had suffered all last season. He hoped that next season the hon. the Postmaster-General would see that this injustice to the Saguenay would be remedied.

MR. LANGEVIN.

MR. BLAKE said that in his recollection the mail service in summer between the western ports and Murray Bay had not been daily in former years, but about five times a week; the service in force last year had provided for the arrival of the mail between one and two o'clock in the day; and it left at seven or half-past seven o'clock at the soonest. Delivery between Quebec and Murray Bay had taken place five times a week as far as Quebec and Murray Bay were concerned. The old arrangement was not so satisfactory as the new, for to a large number of persons who visited Murray Bay during the summer from the West and the Province of Ontario, the new arrangement was infinitely more satisfactory than the old. As a rule, during the season, the Toronto papers of one day now reached that place at two o'clock the next day, a thing which was never accomplished with anything like this promptitude under the former arrangements; and similar results had taken place with regard to letters from the West, owing to the fact that the railway communication was direct, and that the ferry connected with the railway and brought over the letters as soon as they arrived. He would say nothing at all as to the effect of this change upon the other places of resort, or as to the cost. He was not competent to speak personally on these points. He had merely answered the appeal of the hon. member for Charlevoix by stating his own experience respecting the results of the change which, to Upper Canadians visiting Murray Bay, were highly satisfactory.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the present arrangement answered the purpose of one place, Murray Bay, and the interests in this regard of all the other places—Baie St. Paul, Eboulements, Tadousac and the Saguenay district—were neglected. He thought that the convenience of the tourists at Murray Bay should not deprive the whole of the counties of Charlevoix, Chicoutimi, and Saguenay of the prompt reception of their mails during the season of navigation.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he was not aware that any such inconvenience as that which had been represented was experienced. The Department had been beset to make these changes by persons who, perhaps, were more particularly interested in Murray Bay than any other place in that quarter. He had consented last year to an experimental change by which the steamer would cross to Murray Bay, with such arrangements as to the delivery of the mails to the places below as could be made; and it might be a success or otherwise. The hon. gentleman had heard what the hon. member for South Bruce had said; and the officers of the Department reported to him that the average delivery of the mails there had not been more than three times a week, though his hon. friend (Mr. Blake) said five times a week. He (Mr. Huntington) supposed this discrepancy could be explained by the fact that, as the season waned, delivery was not so prompt. The experiment had been made for one year, and the expense of it was nothing so dreadful as the hon. gentleman anticipated. He believed that they had spent $300 more than during the previous year. The impression in the Department, and the information they had received, was that, while some inconvenience, perhaps, was felt in places lower down, which it might be possible to remedy, the whole service had greatly improved. They had provided a daily mail with a comparatively slight increase of expenditure. He concurred with his hon. friend (Mr. Langevin) that the interests of residents should not be sacrificed to the convenience of visitors. So far as the Department was concerned, it had no motive in the matter, save to serve the public; but he believed that the hon. gentleman's representations in this regard were exaggerated. If the inconveniences were as serious as represented, he did not consider it advisable to adopt a crab-like policy, and go back to a system of mail delivery three or five times a week; it would be better to improve the service all the way down.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the object of calling attention to this matter was this: Malbaie, Baie St. Paul, Eboulements, Tadousac, and other places on the Saguenay and in Chicoutimi county were left last year without the mail service they had in 1874, 1875, and 1876, and the residents of these counties should not be deprived of the regular delivery of their mails during the season only because the mails were sent by the Grand Trunk to Murray Bay, and thence distributed by land to these other different places, thus consuming more time than if it was done by boat, which was possible from Quebec five or six times a week. These districts had no railways; the people lived in the mountains; very little of the public money was spent there; and all they now asked for, at all events, was a regular mail during the season of navigation, and the ordinary mails during the rest of the year.

MR. BLAKE said that at no time in his experience had the steamers from Quebec stopped daily or on their regular trips at Eboulements and Baie St. Paul. This only took place occasionally during the week,—perhaps twice or thrice, but certainly not regularly.

MR. LANGEVIN: That may have been so during last season.

MR. BLAKE: I am speaking not of one season, but of ten or twelve seasons.

MR. LANGEVIN said the places in question were suffering under very great hardships in this regard.

MR. HUNTINGTON said he believed the hon. gentleman had been misled as to the number of trips formerly made to these places. He rested his statement on information furnished by officers of the Department. The papers would be brought down, and it would then be seen whether that was the case or not.

Motion agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. LANGEVIN said he desired to make a personal explanation. Certain statements had been made in his regard by the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Fréchette), and he had not thought proper to answer them until he could obtain the letter which he would now read to the House. That hon. gentleman said he (Mr. Langevin) should have informed his electors how much it cost him to procure the Cross of St. Gregory the Great from His Holiness the Pope; and had afterwards said, in explanation, he (Mr. Fréchette) had merely referred to sacrifices, etc., made on his part. He had since sent for the letter which he had received at the time from the late Archbishop of Quebec, Mgr. Bailargeon, who had forwarded to him this cross from His Holiness the Pope. This letter was as follows:—

“ARCHBISHOPRIC OF QUEBEC, “QUEBEC, 8th July, 1870.

“MONSIEUR LE MINISTRE,

“Compelled by illness to interrupt my visits through my Diocese, and to come and rest in town, I have found on my table, on my return, the accompanying Brief by which it has pleased His Holiness to appoint you Knight Commander of the Order of St.

MR. LANGEVIN.

Gregory the Great in the Civil Order. This distinction has been granted to you at the request of His Lordship Bishop Horan and myself, in acknowledgment of the service rendered by you to Religion as a journalist and as a public man. I am sure that you will receive it with as great a degree of pleasure as you have veneration for the person of the Sovereign Pontiff from whom it comes.

“I have the honour to be,

“Monsieur le Ministre,

“Your humble servant,

“+ C. F. ARCHBISHOP OF QUEBEC.

“The Honourable Hector L. Langevin.”

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 20th Feb., 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. Huntington.

FIRST READING.

MR. HUNTINGTON introduced a Bill (No. 17) To amend the Post Office Act, 1875.

MR. TUPPER asked the hon. the Postmaster-General to explain the nature of the Bill.

MR. HUNTINGTON said there were only two provisions, which were intended to meet certain difficulties in the administration of the Department. The Postmaster-General had certain powers to regulate the transmission of Her Majesty's mails over railways. In consequence of the convention with the United States, it had been considered desirable to extend the provision to the United States mails. The other clause gave the Postmaster-General power to deal with correspondence which related to lotteries or gift concerts of fraudulent intent. In the United States, severe penal legislation had been found necessary in relation to these matters. It seemed now that, being driven out of the United States, those parties had set up their business in this country. One of them had recently advertised; and the letters had been mailed to the St. Stephen Post-office in New Brunswick, and the postage paid to the Department on those letters was, he believed, at least eight thousand dollars. A very large number of letters were transmitted, and it was evident that this was not a desirable practice to encourage.

MR. TUPPER said he thought that some such proposal as this was contained in the present Post Office Act, when it was introduced by the hon. the Postmaster-General of that day, and he thought it was the difficulty of dealing with the subject without violating the privacy of correspondence which passed through the Post Office, which led to its withdrawal; however, it would be time enough to discuss the question on the second reading of the Bill.

MR. HUNTINGTON said the difficulty was one which had been suggested and anticipated, but the evil had not an existence then to the extent it had now. The Government now proposed to legislate for an evil which absolutely existed, and he remembered that, at the time the Post Office Act was discussed, the provision was only intended to meet some possibility of the future.

Bill read the first time.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 18) To authorize certain arrangements between the Dominion Grange Mutual Fire Assurance Association and the Dominion Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry of Canada.—(Mr. Snider.)

Bill (No. 19) Respecting the Port Whitby Harbour.—(Mr. Burk.)

APPOINTMENT OF INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSIONERS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

MR. MACKENZIE delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

MR. SPEAKER read the Message, and it is as follows :—

“DUFFERIN.

“The Governor-General communicates to the House of Commons the appointment of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, Minister of Public Works; the Hon. Isaac Burpee, Minister of Customs; the Hon. Thomas Coffin, Receiver-General, and the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier, Minister of Inland Revenue, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the Act 31st Victoria, Chapter 27, intituled an Act respecting the Internal Economy of the House of Commons and for other purposes.

“GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

“OTTAWA, 20th February, 1878.”

MAIL TO LAKE ST JOHN.

QUESTION.

MR. CIMON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to send the mail to Lake St. John by way of the new Colonization Road opened by the Government of the Province of Quebec last summer, between Quebec and Lake St. John?

MR. HUNTINGTON: In answer to the hon. gentleman, I have to say that a petition asking for this has been received, which has been referred to the Inspector. I can say nothing about it till we get his report.

MAIL TO NOTRE DAME DE LATERRIÈRE.

QUESTION.

MR. CIMON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to send a daily mail directly from Bagotville to Notre Dame de Laterrière, in the county of Chicoutimi, instead of causing it to pass by way of the village of Chicoutimi?

MR. HUNTINGTON: I have only to say, Sir, that in my Department we know nothing about any application such as the hon. gentleman refers to.

COASTING REGULATIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. STEPHENSON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government this Session to introduce any amendments to the existing Canadian Customs Laws and Coasting Regulations, making them approximate more closely in the matter of wrecking, towing and coasting by foreign vessels in Canadian waters than they now are to the laws and regulations relating to these matters in the United States?

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) : The Government do not contemplate, during the present Session, introducing any measure upon the subject.

BREAKWATER AT MAIN-À-DIEU.

QUESTION.

MR. McDONALD (Cape Breton) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place in the Estimate a sum of money for the purpose of building a breakwater at the entrance of the harbour of Main-à-Dieu, in Cape Breton ?

MR. MACKENZIE : The hon. gentleman will see from the Estimates, which are printed, that it is not there.

MAILS TO EBOULEMENTS AND MURRAY BAY.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. LANGEVIN moved for a copy of all tenders received in 1877 for the carrying by land of the mails from Quebec to Éboulements or Murray Bay; also a copy of all Orders in Council or Departmental Orders relating to the same, showing the reasons why one special tender has been accepted, and also a statement showing the name of the late contractor for carrying of said mails, the amount paid him, and the amount now paid, and to whom, for the same services, together with a copy of the correspondence on the said subject.

Motion agreed to.

THE SERVICES OF WILLIAM TAYLOR, OF COTEAU DU LAC.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. LANTHIER moved for all papers, documents, and pay-lists in relation to the services of the late William Taylor, of Coteau du Lac, as master builder for the construction of the Fort at the Coteau, from 1812 to 1822.

Motion agreed to.

REPAIRS TO MILITARY BRIDGES AT LÉVIS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. BLANCHET moved for a return shewing the sums expended for repairs to military bridges at Lévis, since last Session; the names and wages of the workmen, and the amount paid to each of them; the amount of all accounts for materials, and charges for commission, with the names of parties to whom payments have been made; also the amount and description of work given out by contract, with the names of the parties tendering, and of the contractors.

MR. STEPHENSON,

Motion agreed to.

EXPENSES OF SPECIAL COMMITTEES.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. YOUNG moved for a return setting forth the objects and expenses incurred by each of the Special Committees appointed by this House during the past four years, with the names of the persons who received payment, whether as witnesses or otherwise, and the amounts received by each. He said that his object in making the motion was to bring before the House the expenditure that had been incurred by the various Committees appointed during the last few years, the results being, in many cases, in his opinion, not equal to the expense incurred. The outlay had been very large, as he was led to believe, and he thought it was doubtful whether so many Committees ought to be granted except in cases of admitted utility.

MR. TUPPER said he would like to ask the hon. member whether the motion was intended as a censure upon the Government? He could not see how it could be regarded in any other light. He could not, at this moment, charge his mind with any of these Special Committees which had even been moved for upon the Opposition side of the House; at all events, the Government was responsible for allowing these Special Committees to be appointed. If his hon. friend (Mr. Young) wished to put it in the light of a censure on the Government, he (Mr. Tupper) would be glad to afford him the best assistance in his power.

MR. YOUNG said that he was glad to find that his hon. friend was so anxious to shield the Government from any blame in this matter. His (Mr. Young's) chief object was to get at the amount of expenditure, so that hon. members might judge for themselves whether the Committees were of sufficient utility to warrant the expenditure.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE WITH AUSTRALIA

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. YOUNG moved for a return showing the nature and value of all manufactures and other articles exchanged between Canada and the Australian Colonies, from the 1st of July, 1876, up to the latest returns in possession of the Government, together with copies of the tariffs of these colonies, and any other information in possession of the Government which may be useful in promoting the valuable trade spring up between us. He said that they had a certain amount of information in the Trade and Navigation Returns, but he regarded this portion of our trade as so important that he thought it advisable to have details as to the nature and value of the different articles which had been exchanged between Canada and the Australian Colonies during the last two or three years. The experiment of sending our manufactures to the North South Wales Exhibition had undoubtedly been a great success, and it was surprising to see what a large number of orders were being received by our manufacturers for all kinds of goods. There seemed, undoubtedly, to be an opening for an extension of our trade in that direction; but one of the difficulties was the want of regular means of communication between Canada and those distant colonies; and, in view of the success of the action of the Government in having the country properly represented at New South Wales, and the orders which were consequently being received from those colonies, he thought the subject of better communication might very well receive the attention of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

BOUNDARY LINE BETWEEN UPPER AND LOWER CANADA.

MOTION FOR REPORTS.

MR. LANTHIER moved for an address to the Governor-General for—

1st. Copy of the Reports of Alphonso Wells, Deputy Provincial Land Surveyor, dated the 10th November, 1841, with the plans respecting the division line between the two Provinces formerly called Upper and Lower Canada, running between the River Ottawa and the River St. Lawrence.

2nd. Copy of the Report of the Commissioners appointed under the Act 23 Vict., chap. 21, intitled an Act respecting the Line of Division between Upper and Lower Canada. With a statement of all moneys paid for claims and compensation under the provisions of the said Act; the amount paid to each individual claimant; and copies of the plans of the parcels of land to which such payments relate, and to which the receipts given refer; as well as copies of the deeds in the form of instruments under the hand and seal of the Commissioner, issued by him according to the provisions contained in the 1st sub-section of the 4th section of the said Act.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had to ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw this motion; he was asking for papers which were not in the possession of the Government. All papers connected with the survey of lands were transmitted, either to the Government at Quebec or to the Government at Toronto, at the time when Confederation took place, and the Dominion Government could not force these Governments to produce any of the papers, though he had no doubt the hon. gentleman could get them by applying to the proper authorities.

MR. TUPPER said he would like to ask the hon. the First Minister if his attention had been drawn to the fact that this was not a survey in Upper or Lower Canada, but a division or boundary line; and, if these papers were not in the possession of the Government, they ought to be. He considered that all papers referring to boundaries between the Provinces ought to be in the possession of this Government, and he had no doubt that, on application, they would be placed in their hands.

MR. MACKENZIE said there was no reason why, because lands lay on either side of the boundary, the papers respecting them would be in the hands of this Government.

MR. TUPPER said these papers referred to the division line between those two Provinces which were united before Confederation took place, and, therefore, had no relation to boundaries since Confederation. They did not relate to any interpretation of an international treaty or inter-provincial arrangement, but simply to a matter of land surveying.

MR. SPEAKER said he thought the hon. gentleman should have proceeded by an Order from the House.

MR. MASSON: Who will have these papers, the Ontario or the Quebec Government?

MR. LANTHIER said he believed that there was some misunderstanding about this question. In 1860 there was a law passed by which Commissioners were to be appointed to define the line so far as the two Provinces were concerned. The definition of the line confirmed the report made by Mr. St. Germain, but was chiefly founded upon the report of Mr. Wells. That report of Mr. Wells was brought down before the Legislative Assembly of Quebec during the session of 1844-5, in order to have the difficulties taken into consideration as to the division between the two Provinces, and especially between the River St. Lawrence and the River Ottawa. The return was brought down, and was in the Appendix of 1844-5, but the maps and plans were missing. In the library of this Parliament there were two copies of the report in the French language, but there was not a single plan or sketch to which the report referred. The report of Mr. Wells referred to the plans and sketches which he had made, but they were missing. He could not tell whether they had been taken away, as it was more than probable they had, or had not been printed, which was not probable at all, because the motion was that the whole report should be printed, and if it had been thought proper not to print the maps, in the same way it would have been thought proper not to print the report without the maps. He had not proceeded by an Order of the House in this matter, because he knew that the reports were not in the possession of the House; but he had proceeded by an address to the Governor-General, as he knew there was no other way to proceed in order to obtain these papers, and in thus proceeding he was sustained by precedent.

MR. TUPPER.

The papers which were at Toronto referred to documents which were at Quebec, and the documents which were at Quebec could not be understood, and were of no use, unless they had, at the same time, the papers which were at Toronto. The papers had been so divided that the receipts given were deposited at Toronto, while the report of the Commissioner, in virtue of which the sums of money had been paid, was deposited at Quebec. For what reason that division of documents had been made, he, certainly, could not explain, but he supposed it was due to some misunderstanding. If the House desired, he would go into the whole of this question, but it would take him some time, and he believed he had said enough to satisfy the House that he had good grounds for demanding these papers, particularly as it was the only way to prevent litigation in reference to some claims in that part of the country. People had thought this question was settled many years ago, and he supposed the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) remembered the circumstances, because his late father was one of the Commissioners. The old people who took part in the settlement of the question were all dead. Some of the lands were covered by two titles,—one given by the seigneur of the adjoining seignior, while the same land had been covered by patents issued by the Government of Upper Canada. Thus, there were two claims. The line sometimes divided the land into two parts, so that the party had the option of either keeping the land which was to be part of the Province of Quebec, in which case the man having the other title would have to give up possession, or vice versa. If they gave up that part of the land they were to receive compensation for it. He would not detain the House by going into the details, but he believed the whole cost of obtaining these documents would not amount to forty dollars; and he trusted that the hon. the Prime Minister would waive his objection.

MR. MACKENZIE said he had no objection whatever to give any documents which were in the possession of this Government. But he had ascertained that they had none of the documents that the hon. gentleman asked for; and it appeared that they were asked for simply in order to promote private objects, simply because there was or might be some litigation. If there were litigation, the documents which the hon. gentleman himself admitted to exist in the archives at Toronto and Quebec, could be produced in the ordinary way, under the order of a Court; but it was no part of the duty of this House to advance moneys for the purpose of obtaining documents to be used in litigation between individuals. The Government were quite willing to produce any papers in their possession, either on the order of a Court or in return to a motion; but, as they had not these papers and maps, and could not order them to be produced, as a Court might do, and ought not to order them, if they could, in order to promote private objects, he asked the hon. gentleman to withdraw his motion.

MR. TUPPER said he did not see that any question of order could be raised on that ground, because one half of the motions of hon. members might be objected to on the same ground involving an expenditure of public money. The hon. the First Minister could not, therefore, rest his case on that ground. The other point, that the papers were wanted for purposes of private litigation, was a different question. The ground taken, as he understood it, was that this was a report of a public officer on an inter-provincial boundary. If those papers were not in the possession of the Government, they should be. All papers made under any order of the House, when Canada was a Province, in relation to the division line between the two Provinces were papers of public interest, and it was important they should be in possession of the Government. He could not see any objection to the motion passing, and the hon. the First Minister endeavouring, as far as possible, to obtain a public document which was of interest and importance as containing the report of a Commissioner appointed on an interprovincial survey. The question possessed much more importance to-day than at the time when Ontario and Quebec formed a single Province. If laying upon the table of the House a report of the Commissioner would tend to settle a question of litigation, he saw no reason, because it was a question of private litigation, that a public document should not be submitted when moved for by a member of this House, not for the purpose of promoting litigation, but to prevent it.

MR. MACKENZIE said the hon. gentleman mistook his position altogether, and had given the question undue importance. If there was any important boundary matter in question, it came within the province of the two Governments of Ontario and Quebec. They made no representation to the Dominion Government upon difficulties of boundary. The two Local Governments were in possession of those papers, if there were any papers. The Government had no such papers, and if wanted for any suit they could be procured in the ordinary way from the Local Governments. Under those circumstances, he objected to the adoption of the motion.

MR. LANGEVIN said he did not understand the hon. the member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) to say that the papers were in possession of the Government, but that, if those papers were not in the possession of the Government, they should be. He called the attention of the hon. the Premier to the fact that ten or twelve years ago the boundary line between Ontario and Quebec was fixed and determined, a plan and reports had been made, and an Order in Council passed on the subject. The Dominion had certainly an interest in having these documents in the Departments at Ottawa. They had an interest in knowing the exact boundary line between the two Provinces, as having a bearing on the question of representation of the people in Parliament and the census of the different Provinces. If the papers in question were not in possession of the Government, they must have been transferred by error in 1867 when the Departments were transferred to Ontario and Quebec.

MR. MACKENZIE: Not at all.

MR. LANGEVIN said they must have been carried away by the Crown Lands Department with other documents. More than once papers had been asked by Ontario or Quebec, as papers belonging to them, and the Government had refused to part with the originals, but had given copies of them. The Government ought to have on record in the Departments all documents relating to the boundary lines between the different Provinces.

MR. BLAKE said the adoption of the principle advocated by the hon. member for Charlevoix would result in it becoming the duty of the Government to obtain the records and documents connected with the boundaries of all the Provinces of Canada. There might be exceptional reasons why the documents connected with the boundary line between Ontario and Quebec should be at Ottawa, which did not apply to the boundary line between Quebec and New Brunswick, which had had more than one disputed line with a foreign power, and with Canada itself. If Parliament was prepared to instruct the Government to procure all the papers connected with the boundary lines of all the Provinces, the Government would be called upon to consider what should be done. But Parliament had not done that. The hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin) was in power when the archives of the old Province of Canada were distributed between the Governments of Ontario and Quebec, and he was responsible for the distribution which took place; and that distribution involved the proposition not that Canada but the Provinces were entitled to the archives respecting their boundaries. He (Mr. Blake) would have presumed that the proper course would have been that a mutual arrangement should have been made between the Governments, that one should obtain the originals and the others have duplicates. He did not know what arrangement was made, but it was quite clear that at that time the then Dominion Government did not think it right to hold the papers connected with the boundaries. The larger question involved by the proposition of the hon. member for Charlevoix, that the Government should at once proceed to collect the scattered papers connected with the boundaries of the Provinces, might be put aside, for this particular case did not really raise the question. If he rightly understood the hon. member for Soulanges (Mr. Lanthier), this was a case in which some private suitor had got into a quarrel as to the extent of his property, and was desirous of obtaining a public document through the medium of this Parliament, which had not got control of it. But the arm of the law was not so short that a suitor could not obtain the document through the process of the Courts. Therefore, if it was required for private litigation, it could be obtained in that way, and it would be very inconvenient to say that any litigant might obtain, through the intervention of this House, free of expense, papers which could be procured by the ordinary process of the Courts.

MR. LANTHIER said that some of the papers were at Quebec and others at Toronto, and all were necessary to understand the facts of the case. He maintained that this was an interprovincial boundary question and all documents relating thereto should be within the reach of suitors.

MR. POPE (Compton) said it was necessary that the Dominion Government should know where the Provincial boundary lines were drawn, otherwise difficulties would arise. In view of the depression which the Government had brought on the country, it was desirable that only questions of pressing importance should be taken up and dealt with. The present case was an urgent one, and it was proper that the information asked for should be supplied, especially as it might prevent litigation. While he held that the Dominion Government should possess the original documents in connection with Provincial boundaries, and the Provinces have duplicates, it was not necessary to incur that expenditure at the present time; nevertheless, in cases where little expenditure would be incurred, information should be furnished.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

MR. MACKENZIE.

SURVEY OF MATANE HARBOUR.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. FISET moved for copies of Mr. Kingsford's report on the survey of the Harbour of Matane, with the plans and estimates accompanying the said Report.

MR. MACKENZIE said that, whilst the motion might pass, he could not promise when he could furnish the report and survey desired. An exhaustive survey had been made of the harbour of Matane during the past season, but the map of said survey had not yet been completed. The object of making the survey was to ascertain whether that harbour, or the harbour at Bic, or some of the other places which had been more or less examined during the past few years, would be most suitable for a large harbour of refuge, situated as far as possible down the St. Lawrence, with a view to aid the class of vessels which could not now obtain entrance during late fall or early spring with a suitable harbour. The exploration was completed, but the work of plotting it on the map and preparing it in proper form to submit to the House, with the report itself, was not yet completed. It had been found necessary to examine with great detail the shoals in front of that place, the structure of the soil, whether sand or rock, to what extent each existed, and whether it could be removed in the event of the Government finally deciding upon making that the harbour of refuge on the lower part of the St. Lawrence. He could only promise, therefore, that the usual diligence would be shown in preparing the papers and bringing them down as the hon. member for Rimouski desired.

Motion agreed to.

HOUR OF ADJOURNMENT.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

MR. BLAIN moved :

"That it be an Order of the House that if, at the hour of 10 o'clock, P.M., the business of the day be not concluded, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair and the House shall stand adjourned until its next regular meeting, unless it be otherwise resolved by a majority of the Members present at that hour; and, in case there is any desire to continue in Session, Mr. Speaker shall, on being requested by not less than five members, put the question without debate."

He said he thought that the motion which was on the paper in his name had better be discussed when the right hon. member for Kingston was in the House. He knew that right hon. gentleman had opposed the first part, and he had reason to suppose he would also oppose the second part. It would, therefore, be more satisfactory that the motion should stand on the paper and come up the following Monday.

MR. SPEAKER said that the rule adopted last Session and adhered to strictly was that all orders on the paper should be disposed of when called.

MR. BLAIN said that, under the circumstances, he preferred making the motion. With respect to the first part, he was well aware that the views entertained by the right hon. member for Kingston were fully recorded in the Hansard. This was the third year he had brought the matter to the attention of the House. Some two years ago, when a revision of the Rules took place, he had called the attention of the House to the subject, and last Session he brought a motion, somewhat similar to that now submitted, asking the House to adopt some rule which would be more satisfactory than the rule which had heretofore been adopted. At that time it was thought much better that, instead of making a positive rule, to have it generally understood that the House would adjourn at a particular hour. The understanding arrived at worked very satisfactorily until towards the latter part of last Session, when it was set aside, and the old habit of turning night into day became the rule and not the exception. What the House would be forced to do would be to reduce it to a positive order, leaving, of course, as usual, the question of departure from the rule in the hands of the House, to be put without debate. He remarked last Session, when making this motion, that they might make a better distribution of the forces of the House; that, instead of nine Standing Committees there might be thirty, each one of which would really be more efficient than they now were. He thought it would be in the interests of the members themselves that a division of labour with regard to Committees should take place. He had also then stated, as he would now state, that a proposition of that kind must necessarily have the concurrence of the Government. It was not in the power of a single member to rearrange the Committees of this House, and distribute the work which was necessarily cast upon them; therefore he had no option other than to leave this matter over, and bring up his motion in the shape it now was. He had also stated last Session that he was not anxious arbitrarily to fix an hour for adjournment. He himself would prefer ten o'clock, but at the time it was represented that eleven would perhaps be more convenient. He did not know whether it was the opinion of the House that this would be the better hour or not.

MR. BLANCHET: No; say four o'clock in the morning.

MR. BLAIN said he was prepared to say that this subject must necessarily be dealt with. He thought the custom that prevailed at present in this respect was a very unreasonable one, and the sooner it was altered the better. He did not intend to do more than bring the matter before the House and hear what the House had to say on the subject; but he was quite sure that there was a sufficient number of members who felt that the duties of the House would be better performed if some settled rule of this kind existed than by the continuance of the practice which had been in vogue in the past, and more particularly of the course that had been adopted since the present Session opened.

MR. MACKENZIE said he could appreciate the motives of the hon. gentleman from West York in bringing the motion before the House, and he quite concurred in the hon. gentleman's desire to have the House adjourn at a comparatively early hour; and perhaps the hour mentioned, ten, or the hour following, eleven, might be considered, generally speaking, a reasonable hour. When this matter was discussed last Session, a general impression prevailed that it would not be well to tie the hands of the House by a formal resolution, although there might be a very general understanding to the effect that the House should endeavour to adjourn about that time. It might be inconvenient occasionally to do so, if, for instance, the hon. member for Cumberland happened to commence a speech at eight, and was only half-way through at ten; and under such circumstances he would feel very strongly disinclined to break the hon. gentleman's speech in two, and other inconveniences might result from it. Of course, in regard to this matter of internal economy, it was for the House to say what it desired to have done; if it was the general impression that it would be desirable to fix upon a specific hour, the Government would be bound, of course, to consider it; on the other hand, if there was a general understanding that they should adjourn, if possible, when it did not inconvenience any interest in process of being considered, at that particular hour, he would be bound to move the adjournment as closely to that hour as was possible. He would be glad to hear the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, and of those who were generally interested in the management of the business of the House, on this subject.

MR. BLAIN.

MR. TUPPER said he did not rise to oppose the motion on the ground indicated by the hon. the First Minister. He could only say it was quite as painful to him to be obliged to detain the House—and he was happy to say that he did so very rarely—as it could possibly be to the hon. gentleman opposite. He quite agreed with the statement of the hon. the First Minister, that it would be impossible to deal with an abstract resolution of this kind in this way; and, to alter the whole practice of Parliament with relation to so important a matter as this, he thought it would require the very careful consideration of a Committee composed of members sitting on both sides of the House, before they should arrive at any change that might be adopted. It was quite obvious that it would not do to adopt a rule of this kind under all circumstances, as it would be found to be extremely inconvenient, and, instead of promoting the business of the House, he was satisfied that it would retard it very much. There was no doubt a general desire on the part of hon. gentlemen on both sides that the House should rise, under ordinary circumstances, at an early hour, and he thought that the practice which was pursued for a very considerable portion of last Session to a very considerable extent met that desire. There was then an effort made to rise at an earlier hour than usual, and until the latter portion of the Session, when hon. members on both sides found it important to push forward as rapidly as possible the public business, there were very few late sittings. The effect, however, of a resolution of this kind would be, he believed, not to promote the public business; it would rather have a contrary tendency, and he was sure that no Government and no party possessing the support of a majority of the House, would like to see a rule introduced, if a change was made, that would give an arbitrary control to the Government of the day supported by a majority, which control could be used most unfairly in reference to the conduct of the public discussions and the public business of the House; and the effect of the rule proposed would certainly have that tendency. If it was the determination of the House to fix an hour for adjournment, he thought it would be found to be attended with almost insuperable objections; and he saw no alternative but to so fix the hour of adjournment that power of dealing arbitrarily with the rights of members on both sides of the House, which were supposed to be equal, would not be placed in the hands of the Government of the day, to whichever party it might belong. He quite concurred in the remarks of the hon. the First Minister with relation to this question—that, whatever was done regarding it must be taken up very seriously and deliberately by parties who would look at it from every possible standpoint.

Mr. BLAIN said he was not at all convinced that a positive rule of this kind would in any way retard the business of the House. It would, in his opinion, have the opposite effect.

If an order of this kind were made they would be able to dispose of the business in much shorter time than was now the case; and, if there could be any obstruction thrown in the way of the Opposition as to the discussion of motions which might be brought before the House, he thought that the rules of the House might be fairly so altered that the rights of the Opposition would not be infringed upon. He knew that, if they had a motion pending, and the House should determine that this motion should pass from the position in which it stood on the paper, it might be said that if this were in the hands of an Opposition member he might be thereby injured; but there could be no difficulty in altering the rule of the House, and ordering that, in a case of that kind, the motion then pending before the House should remain on the motion paper, and come on first in the list for the following day. He could not see that any other circumstance could arise under the rules of the House whereby the Opposition could be injured in the slightest degree by it. If it was desired, as apparently was the case with the majority of the members, that this motion should not be pressed, he was quite satisfied to withdraw it; but he would do so again on this express understanding, which some day would probably be reduced to an order of the House—that the House, on all occasions when business permitted it, would adjourn not later than eleven o'clock in the evening. Upon that understanding, he was satisfied to withdraw his motion.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

THE "NORTHERN LIGHT."

MOTION FOR ACCOUNTS.

Mr. PERRY moved for copies of accounts and vouchers, showing the amount of expenses incurred in running the steamer Northern Light, between Georgetown and Pictou up to date; also the cost of repairs of said steamer during the summer of 1877. He desired to say that an experience of nearly two winters had been had in connection with the running of the steamer Northern Light, which was built two years ago, between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. Last winter the enterprise had succeeded very well, and the average number of trips then made from the first week of January to the last week of March, was about two per week. This, in his opinion, was a very good exhibit; but this winter, although the weather had been unusually fine, she had not been so successful. On two different occasions she had been caught in the ice, in which, the first time, she stopped for over a week, during which period the people of Prince Edward Island were completely deprived of their mails. The cause of this was as follows:—The old crossing between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine had been partly abandoned by the Government, and the steamer ran between Georgetown and Pictou, N.S.; consequently, during all that time the mails had accumulated on the one side at Pictou and on the other at Georgetown. But, when the Department found that the steamer was likely to remain in the ice for a long time, an order was at last given for the mails to be carried by the old route. And as soon as this was done, the mail had passed daily to and from the Island, to his certain knowledge. Ten or eleven days ago, the steamer was again caught in the ice, and he believed that she was there for nine or ten days before the Department ordered the mails to be taken by the old route; and during all this time the members from the Island were in Ottawa without any mail from the Island, while the people on the Island—and they were anxious to secure their mails promptly, and were very tender on this point, he knew—were without their mails. He did not know that the Government were to blame for the mistake; but they should have seen that the old route was not abandoned before it was evident that the steamer was perfectly successful in making her trips between Georgetown and Pictou. Experience taught that there would always be a time in winter when these crossings must be affected at the old place between Capes Traverse and Tormentine; and he believed that, unless means were taken to use both the route between Capes Traverse and Tormentine, and that between Georgetown and Pictou, as occasion required, they would never have efficient and uninterrupted communication with the mainland in winter. He considered that the only possible way of maintaining such communication would be to keep the steamer on the route between the two Capes, and when it was possible for her to cross, to effect it; at the very time when it was impossible for her to cross, the ice was solid, and then ice-boats crossed without difficulty. One crew could work both the steamer and these ice-boats. It must be apparent to all that the crossing between the Capes must be the shortest and easiest, being only nine miles by water in summer, and seven miles, besides ice, in winter, while the distance between Georgetown and Pictou, or from any other point on the main land, was not less than 35 or 40 miles. It was impossible for him to think that it was not easier to cross seven or eight miles of water or ice than forty miles. His impression, consequently, was, that the Government should concentrate their whole force at one crossing-place. If it was impossible to bring the steamer to ply between the two capes, then she should be used to run between some other place on the Island and the mainland, as late as she possibly could in the fall, to commence again as early as possible in the spring. There would always be a time, in his opinion, in winter, when no steamboat whatever could cross the Straits, and this period would last for, perhaps, two or two-and-a-half months, or six weeks, according to the kind of winter they might have. The great trouble experienced with boats, in crossing, was in connection with floating ice, or weak ice. When such ice was met with on the route, the steamer would have no difficulty in making the passage; and when the ice was solid, the boats could perform the service without difficulty. There was no necessity for forcing the steamer though the ice and wrecking her as she was wrecked last winter, entailing a cost of nearly half as much money to repair her as she cost when built. He believed that, if the steamer was so run during two or three years, she would be past service.

MR. PERRY.

The only way to save her from destruction was to concentrate the force in one place, and then, when the steamer was unable to effect a crossing, the ice boats would perform this service. They knew very well that between Capes Traverse and Tormentine a separation of the tide took place, and, when this was the case, an opening was effected in the solid ice, and the steamer could then effect a crossing. No doubt, the Government's objection to this scheme would relate to the cost of building piers; but a wharf already existed on the Prince Edward Island side, which would be very nearly sufficient for the purpose. He was unable to form an estimate as to what the cost of building a pier on the Nova Scotia side would be; but they had a right to expect from the Government the fulfilment of the terms of union. He was not prepared to say that the Government had not done all they could in this regard. He was well aware that the Government had expended a large amount of money on this service; but he had argued from the first, in common with other representatives from the Island, that the route between the capes was the only one by which crossings could be conveniently effected. Experience had proved this opinion to be correct, and, the sooner the Government drew their attention to that particular point, and adopted this route, the better. This settlement of the matter was only a question of time, and, if this was not done by this Government, it would be done by another Government. He regretted being obliged to make so many representations on this subject to the House, but this was the only way in which they could make their wishes known to the Government. Prince Edward Island had no longer a representative in the Cabinet, and, in order that he might be heard regarding this matter, he was obliged to address the House to inform the Cabinet as to the views of the people whom he had the honour to represent.

Mr. SINCLAIR said he was pretty much of the same opinion as the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Perry). He wished to have this question ventilated in the House, as the regular conveyance of the mails was a matter of great importance to the Province of Prince Edward Island. This question had, from the outset, been brought before the Government, and he, for one, had not changed his views regarding it. He had considered that the trial of the route between Georgetown and Pictou would be a failure in winter, as the distance was too great, as the steamer had to run over a course of between 40 and 45 miles. When this steamer was built, in almost every harbour of the Island the inhabitants maintained that their harbour was the proper place for her to run from. Some said she should run between Souris and Cape George; others, between Georgetown and Pictou; others, between Murray Harbour and Pictou; others, between Pugwash and Victoria; others, between Seacow head and Cape Tormentine; and others, between West Cape and Richibucto. In fact, there was hardly a point on either side of the Straits which had not its supporters in this regard. He was fully convinced that the only proper connecting link for daily communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland during the winter season lay between Capes Traverse and Tormentine. He thought that any person who had a thorough knowledge of the place would agree with him on this point. The Government had done all that could be done, he believed, to secure efficient service on the present route; they had not spared any expense in running the steamer, or repairing her when she was injured; and an express train was placed upon the railway for transmitting mails to and from Georgetown. All this was found to be insufficient to accomplish the object in view. When they looked at the way in which the mails were now carried in winter between the Island and the mainland, they would see what inconvenience it caused—an express leaving Charlottetown for Georgetown, with the mail-bags for the steamer, and she, when perhaps half way across getting fast in the ice, remaining there a week, with the mail-bags on board, while no person could get near her. Business men on the Island, and in other parts of the Dominion, suffered greatly from this state of things, as any one who knew how important it was to receive business correspondence without delay would understand. Mails were thus sometimes detained on the steamer for a week or ten days. While the steamer plied in any other part of the Straits of Northumberland but between the capes the result would be the same. He was positive that, if the steamer, with ice-boats assisting her, was placed upon the route between Capes Traverse and Tormentine, daily mail communication would be secured throughout the whole of the winter, save, perhaps, during a snow-storm, or in consequence of stormy weather; but this would be the case from similar causes at any season of the year. It was not his intention to say much more about this matter, because they had had an interview last year with the Government, whom they had memorialised to show clearly what their views regarding this question were; and he believed that the Government were pretty well aware of the real state of the facts. He would just say that the conveyance of the mails by steamer during the winter was a treaty obligation, and he consequently considered that the Government of the day were bound to accomplish this duty, if at all possible. He believed the steamer would be as successful at the capes as at any other place in the Straits; and when it could not be done there by the steamer it could be effected by means of ice-boats, that was, if the whole force was placed on the route between the capes, and the steamer need not be driven through so much ice under these circumstances as was now the case. She now went out perhaps twenty miles, and there met with heavy ice, through which she could not pass, and became imbedded in it, as had been the case lately when she was crossing. It was then believed that she could work through the field ice, but when she had entered about three miles and a half, still heavier ice was encountered, and she remained fast, the passengers having to be landed a distance of four miles, and driven by sledges to Pictou. The steamer remained there about six days, though the mail-bags were brought ashore; but at times she was caught fast in the ice without being able to land mails or passengers for several days. He considered that the Government should understand that the sooner the route was changed to the capes the better. This was an interprovincial question, and should not be influenced by local partiality. It was no use to talk of conveying the mails from this point or from that point, for the only connecting link for winter communication between the mainland and Prince Edward Island lay between Capes Traverse and Tormentine, and he saw no difficulty in keeping up daily communication between these points, if both the ice-boats and the steamer were placed on the route. The expenditure that this selection would cause would not be very heavy on the Island side. A good pier existed at Cape Traverse, and, if this was repaired and extended into deeper water, with a branch road from the Island Railway to Cape Traverse, it was all that was necessary at present on the Island side. However, this was an interprovincial question and a matter which ought to be settled by the Dominion; and whatever expenditure it might entail he considered that the Government were bound to see that the mails were regularly conveyed between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

MR. SINCLAIR.

MR. TUPPER said he did not rise for the purpose of censuring the Government at all with regard to their efforts to carry out this mail service. It was a part of the terms of union with Prince Edward Island, and the Government of Canada was bound to accomplish, if this were possible, that communication which had been attempted to be made by means of the Northern Light. The fatal mistake which he thought the Government had made in relation to this matter was, not that they had not made the best effort in their power to secure a proper boat for the purpose, but in having undertaken to force that communication between certain points. He quite agreed with the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat, in his judgment, that the time had not arrived when it should be attempted to force communication between any two points, situated on Prince Edward Island and the mainland respectively. He thought the mails should be carried, as formerly was the case, and as they had been regularly carried for a great many years, by means of ice-boats running from Prince Edward Island and crossing to Cape Tormentine. In the meantime, the Northern Light had been constructed to solve the problem because it was an unsolved problem as yet, and the efforts that had been recently made in this regard had proved extremely unsuccessful. This was a very important problem, and the way in which it should be solved, he believed, should be by placing the Northern Light, not between any two points, and by forcing her to ply on such route irrespective of difficulties, but by devoting her exclusively to experimental investigation to discover between what points on Prince Edward Island on the one side, and the mainland on the other, such communication could be kept up. He was informed by parties who had paid attention to this question that, during the whole of last winter—he did not know how it was this winter—there was open water between Crapaud on Prince Edward Island and Oak Island at the mouth of Wallace Harbour on the mainland, and no obstruction to communication during the entire winter to prevent trips being regularly made between them. It was said that the formation of the land on both sides was such as to cause the ice, which jammed in the Gulf, to give way there and thus keep an open passage. He would not undertake to say that this could be done; but he did say that, if it was the intention of the Government to endeavour to accomplish the work of securing such communication by a vessel like the Northern Light, between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, she should be devoted to the one object of finding the best route, and the mails should not be carried as was now the case. She should not take the mails, to be frozen up for weeks together; but she should be devoted to the experimental service of discovering between what points the communication desired could be kept up; and, when it was found that unsurpassable difficulties were met with in connection with one route, she should be devoted to the investigation of another route, to see whether it was not practicable to keep up regular, thorough, and efficient communication; and this was a matter of the greatest importance to the Island as well as to other Provinces. The mistake which had been made—and he thought it would only be continued if it was decided to abandon the route hitherto attempted, and to put her on any other specified route—was caused by using the Northern Light at present for any service but that of discovering the best route. At present, the business in hand was purely experimental and the Government should set to work to discover whether there were any means of keeping up communication by such a vessel between the Island and the mainland, and, if these were found out, where that communication might be kept up.

MR. BLANCHET said he would not discuss the route question, but, as the Northern Light had been built at the expense of the Dominion, he thought he had better say a few words in this relation. The question before them was this: Was that vessel fit for the service she had to perform? Two years ago, the sum of $55,000 had been voted for the construction of this steamer, and she was built at Quebec, on the Lévis side of the river. He had had no practical experience in regard to these matters; but he could say that her machinery and engines were of the first quality. He could not speak with respect to the other portions of the vessel; but he was sure that the Government had obtained all necessary information on that subject, and the Government ought to know what she could do. Last year $16,000 had been voted to repair the Northern Light and these repairs had been executed, he was informed, in Pictou. The sum that had been voted and expended on this steamer had been large, and, if the Government was convinced, from the information it had obtained on the subject, that she was not capable of performing the service required, they ought to adopt some other means of accomplishing this service, because the terms that had been agreed upon between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion, on the entry of the Island into the Confederation, must be carried out under any circumstances. Very probably, the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had received reports and information from competent officers, showing the capacity of this vessel; and if this was the case, perhaps it would be well to have this matter included in the motion, as the House would probably be glad to be informed on this subject. He thought that they were all interested in seeing that this service was well performed, and that the large sums of money which had been expended during the past two years were so spent as to benefit not only our fellow-citizens on the Island but also the whole Dominion.

MR. MCINTYRE said he thought that, last winter, the House had heard the last of this matter at least for some time; but the irregularity with which the Northern Light had during the last few days performed this service had been made the occasion of again re-opening the question of her route. This steamer had made her trips with remarkable regularity up to the last ten or fifteen days, and she had been since detained owing to the prevalence of northerly and north-easterly winds, which had closed up Pictou Harbour to the Island. Of course, it was not surprising that this should occur. It was needless to expect that any boat could be built which could make these trips without interruption during the whole course of the winter. With the best that could be done, there would always be six or seven weeks in mid-winter when this service could not be performed. Georgetown, on the Island side, was never blocked up with ice. He had always been of opinion—and this was also the view taken by the great majority of seafaring men—that Cape George was probably the best place at which to land. There was a good breakwater there, and ample depth of water; and the construction of a short line of railway, about twelve miles in length, from Cape George to the Eastern Extension Railway at Antigonish, would do away with a great many of the difficulties that were now experienced. However, he thought it was rather unfair that it should be expected that one boat in winter should perform the same service that was done by two in summer. They ought to give this matter a fair trial, and two boats should be placed upon the present route. He did not believe that the Northern Light would ever do any service at Cape Tormentine. The place was too much choked up by floating ice during the whole season. She would be about as serviceable there as a birch-bark canoe on the Chaudière Falls. Besides that, it would require an enormous expense to construct immense piers on both sides the Straits, and a railway nothing short of 60 miles in length. There was no doubt about the fact that during six or eight weeks of the winter the boat would have to lay up in any case, and he believed the best thing for the Government to do would be to lay her up for six or eight weeks in dead winter, and let the boats in the meantime carry the mails between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine.

MR. BLANCHET.

MR. POPE (Queen's, P.E.I.) asked the hon. member to amend his motion by adding that a copy of the report which must have been sent to the Department before the repairs were done on this vessel be furnished; also a report of what had been done, and of the present condition of the boat. It was very important to see that, because there were different opinions existing with regard to this boat, and in the first place as to her construction. He had stated last winter in this House that he did not find any particular fault with the Government as regarded the style of the boat, because he believed that the members for Prince Edward Island agreed to accept her offer, having seen the model. If there was any blame to be attached to any persons, that blame was to be attached to the members for Prince Edward Island, who consented to take such a boat. She was a boat which, from her model, was never suited at all for such a purpose; he said so last winter, and he repeated it now, and the experience they had, he thought, had proved it. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Tupper) said he did not rise for the purpose of censuring the Government for their persistence in sending the mails by way of Pictou. He (Mr. Pope) did rise for the purpose of censuring them, and for this reason, that the First Minister was waited upon and remonstrances were sent to him by every member of the Senate from Prince Edward Island, and four out of the six members of this House from Prince Edward Island, as to the way in which the mails should be sent in winter; and they endeavoured in every possible way to impress upon him the necessity of sending them by way of the capes, and also to impress upon his mind that it was the only way in which the mails could be sent or received with any certainty as to their delivery. He was censured the other day for rising in this House and airing grievances in the debate on the Address. He would not have done so on that occasion had it not been that he knew that the detention of the mail in a large mercantile community was a very serious matter. The mails were sent in this steamer, and the very first ice she encountered she stuck in it and remained for days, with every probability of her being there for weeks. An accumulation of mails took place at Pictou and were sent on board, but, after some time, were again landed and forwarded oid the capes, and sent across in the ice-boats; but, so soon as the Northern Light got out of the ice, all communication by the capes was again stopped, and the mails were sent in the steamer on last Saturday week, when she again got caught in the ice; and, for days, no mails were received. No mercantile community could afford to have their letters, and perhaps their business exchanges and remittances, delayed in this way. When he came across here, the Northern Light being fast in the ice, he had to hire an express across and up to Aulac. Senators Haviland and Haythorne went to Georgetown, and, after remaining there two or three days, had to return and come by way of the capes. Senator Howlan, who crossed last week, had also to hire an express across in the same way. The Railway Superintendent and the Inspector of Post Offices, who were on board the Northern Light, had to land in a boat several miles below Pictou and travel about 150 miles to Cape Tormentine, and then take the small boat across. There was no reason why such a state of things should exist. He did not blame the Government because the boat in herself was not a success, but he did censure them for depriving the people of Prince Edward Island of that frequent and direct communication which they ought to have. He supposed an order had been sent down to forward the mails by the way of the capes, for he had received letters, for the first time for nearly a fortnight, from home. Last year he asked for some returns, and they were not furnished as fully as they were promised by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. However, the general accounts were furnished up to January. There then remained a balance of the contract price, when this return was furnished, of some $7,000; the expenses up to the middle of January last year, on that boat, over and above the first cost of the boat, amounted to very nearly $20,000; and it was stated that some $18,000 more would be expended this year,—he believed himself it would be nearly $25,000. He had not seen the papers, but when they came down the House could ascertain what the expense of these repairs had been. While he did not find fault with the Government for the description of boat that was built, there was a great deal of fault to be found with them for accepting a boat in such a condition. She had powerful engines, but, so far as the boat herself went, he never saw, in all his experience,—and he had been ship-building for 25 or 30 years,—so great a fraud imposed upon any people. She was represented as having been well built and strong, and in every way fitted to do the work for which she was intended. She was said to have a strong bulk-head, about 12 feet from the stern, which was supposed to be a great strength to the ship, and, at the same time, to form a water-tight compartment in the event of the ram being broken in. The bulk-head merely consisted of plank, spiked to a small beam of about 10 inches below, and to the beam above, and the seams merely chinks filled with oakum, and not fitted tight below. The whole bows from that forward should have been built in solid with timber, whereas there was really nothing to strengthen her, and altogether her fastenings were put in in such a way as would disgrace any respectable ship-builder.

Altogether, she was a fraud, so far as her construction went, from the very beginning. If she had been properly built, why should a cost of $20,000 to $25,000 for repairs be necessary? He did not name these as the actual figures, but he thought the amount she had cost would approximate to that, and perhaps amount to more. He supposed there had been some representation made as to what, in the opinion of those appointed to inspect and report upon her there, was necessary to be done. They would find that there had been a good deal of strengthening that was not originally put in the vessel that should have been put there. The boat had cost now some $90,000, exclusive of running expenses, and he wanted to know with what result? One reason why he wanted a detailed account last year was to show the farce that was played off at Charlottetown. They had the whole noble army of officials down watching this boat, and she was unable to break through some six or eight inches of ice. They went through the farce of getting a horse and a saw, to saw the ice away before her,—actually to cut her out from the ice. That poor horse was put out on the ice in the morning, and taken in at night and fed, and next morning was put out again; and after the ice was cut, they were drifting about in the gulf for days, sometimes away up to the northward of Charlottetown, and on the next day miles below it. At last, she reached Georgetown, and, as there was but little cold weather the remainder of the season, and not much ice, she performed her work tolerably well. This season was an exceptionally mild one, and until the end of January there was no ice, and up to that time she ran regularly, but the very first ice she encountered she ran into it and could not get out again. For three or four weeks after the close of navigation in Charlottetown, this boat might perform very good service on the Georgetown coast, but, after the winter set in hard, with the north-west winds, the ice drifted from the straits above and filled in the bay off Victoria, and with a few days of north-east winds, the heavy ice was brought down from the Straits of Belle Isle, past the east point of the Island, and filled the whole place. This heavy ice was seldom met with at the capes—the great trouble there generally being the thin ice or lolly;—there, when the winter regularly set in, the ice became solid or fixed for one and a-half miles from the shore on each side of the Straits, and a dock might be cut into this ice where the steamer might lay in safety. When the weather was mild and the crossing bad for the small boats she might run, and during the hard weather the small boats could generally cross in three or four hours—so that the mails in this way would be sure to go daily unless a snow-storm prevented. This arrangement would necessitate the building of a railway from Anzac to Cape Tormentine, a distance of about 35 miles, and on the Island side of about 12 miles. This matter was talked a good deal about, previous to the last general election, and as another election would soon be on, the constituents of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Smith) expected to hear from him again. There was no easier place to be found to build a railroad; there was a fine level track and plenty of timber to be had, and the Government had any quantity of rails, either iron or steel. He would conclude by expressing a hope that, whatever might be done with the Northern Light, the mails would be sent by the capes.

MR. POPE.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he had no objection to furnish the information asked for. The Government had had no other object from the beginning, in this enterprise, than, as far as possible, to fulfil their treaty obligation, because it was a treaty obligation, no doubt, when the Island entered into the Union. No pains had been avoided, but everything was done that was possible to make this service efficient. His hon. friend (Mr. Pope) complained about the defect of this boat. He was not experienced enough in such matters himself, but he knew that the Government had the assistance of experienced men when this vessel was on the stocks, who approved of her model; and the representatives in this House, as well as in the other Chamber, of Prince Edward Island, approved of her model, and were anxious that the Government should enter into the contract with Mr. Sewell, and give the boat a trial. They did so, and had a contract or agreement made and prepared with great care, and specifications prepared by the best engineering skill that they could get from people accustomed to ship-building. They employed not only Lloyd's surveyor, Mr. Coker, but they also employed Mr. Nisbett, who, he understood, had, for the last forty years been a practical ship-builder, a man of character, and a man of great experience and skill, having all the qualifications necessary to enable him to supervise the construction and progress of this vessel which was being built. They got a report from Mr. Nisbett every week, and he was prepared, if his hon. friend (Mr. Pope) wanted it, to submit all the weekly reports they had had from Mr. Nisbett. They also had the certificate of Mr. Coker, Lloyd's surveyor, as to the thorough manner in which the vessel was built. If the vessel was not built as she ought to have been built, at all events the Government were not in fault. He (Mr. Smith) could not be there; the officers of his Department could not be there; they had to trust this matter to Mr. Coker, Lloyd's surveyor—who must be a man of great skill in regard to ship-building, or he would not occupy the position he did—and to Mr. Nisbett, who was also an experienced man in ship-building. Then, after the vessel was built, they sent her down; and his hon. friend (Mr. Pope) had recounted the circumstance of her being caught in the ice at Charlotte town last year. The Government could not be responsible for that. During last winter—no doubt it was an exceptional winter—she performed the service with very considerable regularity, and, he thought, to the satisfaction of the people of the Island generally. Several hon. members came across with her last year, and they all bore testimony to the character and efficiency of the boat, and of her model. They thought that she was a good model; his hon. friend would recollect what he said on that subject last year. The Government found, this spring, that the vessel required a very considerable amount of repairs. He (Mr. Smith), sent Captain

Scott to make an examination—a man of experience in this kind of naval architecture—who made his report, aided by one or two other persons who were present at the time, and the report showed what the vessel required. It turned out, no doubt, that this vessel had some defects; how it had happened he really did not know—how Mr. Coker overlooked it, and how Mr. Nisbett overlooked it, who was there day by day, and every day during the whole time, he could not tell, but such was the fact. The Government found it was necessary to expend a very considerable sum of money on the vessel in order to prepare her for this winter's operations. When the papers were brought down, they would show that she cost a large amount. He regretted that she cost so much, but the Government could not help it; they had to do it. He might say that he agreed with his hon. friend (Mr. Pope) that it was impossible for a vessel to run during the whole winter. That was also his own opinion, but, of course, he had not the experience, and his opinion was not worth as much as that of the hon. member from Prince Edward Island, because he had a great deal of experience. He thought experience had pretty well shown that the only two points where the service could be relied upon were between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine. One of the leading objects of this steamer was to carry the mails regularly across, and she had performed the service with regularity up to the first of February, and did not miss a trip. She crossed to Georgetown in eight or nine hours, and carried the mail with great regularity, but the Postmaster-General, since this occurrence, had sent orders to send the mails by Cape Tormentine.

MR. POPE said that was done after the first interruption, but she had been put back again on the old route.

MR. SMITH said she got rid of the ice, and the Postmaster-General supposed she would get through with as great regularity as she did before. It had turned out otherwise, but the Government were not responsible for that, and, when it was found that the mails could not be carried in this way, they had been sent round by the capes. He had no intimation to make in regard to the course the Government might take in this matter; but the Government was alive to the importance of having this service efficiently performed, and he had no doubt that the necessary steps would be taken in order to that result.

MR. POPE said he would like to ask the hon. gentleman if it was his opinion that the only possible way to send the mail with regularity was by way of Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine? If so, why were they hammering away at that steamer, and having her drifting about the bay for weeks together?

MR. SMITH said he had given his individual opinion, but that was not worth very much. His hon. friend (Mr. Pope) knew very well that there were plenty of people in Prince Edward Island, and in Nova Scotia also, who thought that regular communication could be kept up between Georgetown and Pictou. It was a matter of personal opinion. His hon. friend and himself agreed upon that point, but, still, other people had their own opinions; however, he thought experience pointed to the fact that these were not the best points of communication between the Island and the mainland, but that the two capes were the points which must be ultimately settled upon.

MR. ROBITAILLE said it was quite clear, from what the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had said, that whatever fault might be found with the construction of the steamer Northern Light, must fall upon the shoulders of Lloyd's surveyor, Mr. Coker. He apprehended that such was not the case. Mr. Coker was never consulted as to the model of the ship, and never was consulted as to the specifications for the building of that ship. He never was consulted in any way or form, but, at the last moment, when the Minister of Marine and Fisheries found he could not get that vessel cleared at the port of Quebec without a certificate, he sent these specifications to that gentleman and asked him to go and see whether those specifications had been fulfilled or not. He thought he could assert that Mr. Coker never was consulted as to the specifications for building that ship. It was a great wrong to do a gentleman who could not defend himself on the floor of this House, to come before the people of this Dominion and say that the fault must lie with him for not having looked after the proper construction of that vessel. His reputation was such that, of course, such an assertion could not injure him, but, at the same time, he thought it was not a proper thing to do to cast upon his character such a responsibility. At the very last moment the specifications of that ship were such that it was not even provided that there should be coal bunkers; and it was built in such a way that Lloyd's surveyor did not feel warranted in giving a certificate before the coal bunkers were provided for the ship. That the contractor refused to do, and then they had to apply to the Department of Marine and Fisheries before they could get it done at the expense of that Department. After that, he thought it was very hard that Mr. Coker should bear the brunt of the want of success of this ship. He presumed they could not blame the Minister of Marine and Fisheries nor the Government for this result. The boat had had great difficulties to encounter, but he thought that if that vessel were to take another route,—if, instead of insisting on crossing that channel, she were to cross from Prince Edward Island to Pasbebiac, in the Baie des Chaleurs, and the mails were taken thence to the St. Lawrence, within twenty-four hours they could reach the great Intercolonial Railway and be delivered in good time; and he thought that would be the result eventually.

MR. SMITH.

MR. SMITH (Westmoreland) said he had no personal knowledge of the gentleman in question, but he had always been spoken of as a gentleman, in every sense of the word, and fully capable of performing the duties of the position he occupied. Hon. members were quite mistaken when they had stated that he was called in at the last moment in respect to the construction of the vessel.

MR. POPE (Queen's): According to your specification.

MR. SMITH said that certainly such was the case, but some of the work was defectively done. He did not blame Mr. Coker for that, because he only made an occasional visit to the vessel during its construction; but Mr. Nisbett was there day by day, and he (Mr. Smith) appealed to every hon. member from Prince Edward Island to say whether every officer of the Department was not anxious that the vessel should be well built. Mr. Nisbett was declared to be one of the best men who could be obtained in the Province of Quebec to inspect the building of the vessel; he was liberally paid, and reported to the Department every week. He (Mr. Smith) did not know that he was to blame; he had simply stated the facts. As to the statement that the vessel was defectively built, perhaps such was the case, though the Government had endeavoured to have her thoroughly built. Time and experience in developing the enterprise would, however, suggest improvements.

Mr. POPE (Queen's) asked what Department had management of the vessel.

Mr. SMITH (Westmoreland) said that it was under the control of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, assisted by the Railway Department of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. PLUMB said he found in a report made to the Department, which had been submitted in compliance with a resolution of the Prince Edward Island members, the following statement:—

"About going through fixed ice, she will steam very slow through five inches; any more, she will have to back and run at it; and in heavy ice she will run up on it and stick fast, so that we have to use the jack screw against her stern, and cut the ice round her besides, the engine backing full speed. But I think this could be remedied by sheathing with iron, say from one-third of the way from forward and down to the hull. The action of the ice would keep the iron bright and slippery; so that when the boat got in again she would slip back. The green heart with which the boat is sheathed, stands the chafe very well, but is inclined to stick to the ice."

There was no harmony on board the boat. Mr. Sewell, who was sent down from Ontario to show, as far as possible, that his experiment was successful, and to endeavour to aid the captain and crew seemed to have got into trouble. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries telegraphed on 16th January, 1877:

"Sewell telegraphs that your mate is abusive to him. This must not be tolerated. He should be treated with consideration, and you will advise and consult with him regarding the management and running of the vessel. Sewell says you refuse to go out. Is their good reason for this?"

Of course the hon. the Minister felt that such impropriety should not be tolerated, and telegraphed back that all swearing must be stopped. Then came a telegram:

"Sewell swearing at men. Mate objected. Thick snow storm. Considered it was safe to go to sea. Could not see quarter mile distant. Moved down harbour as far as safe. Sail in morning if clear."

The following day Mr. Sewell telegraphed:

"No use my remaining here to consult. Captain and crew look upon me as an intruder. The work requires that every man in the ship should be with me; otherwise I cannot succeed. Captain refuses to go out. It is positively disgraceful. Mate most impertinent and abusive. You should give me full power or I cannot succeed. Captain has never been instructed to recognize me."

Another telegram read as follows:

"I propose leaving here (Georgetown) on 15th of this month, when the guarantee man (Thomson) leaves for Quebec, as the end of the trial term will then have arrived. I should have remained to see the vessel through the ice season, but feel that the ignorance and prejudice, which will then reign in the engine room of this much-abused vessel, would not justify my remaining by her longer."

Mr. Sewell telegraphed that the men were utterly incapable of doing their work, and, consequently, it was not possible his scheme could succeed. Perhaps the vessel had not received a fair trial, and they had yet to learn that he had been able to procure the removal of any of the officers in the ship or any investigation into the disagreements between the builder, who went down to handle the vessel, and the recalcitrant captain and his disorderly and lame crew. It was evident that a House so divided against itself, as the documents proved the Northern Light, with its builder, mate and crew, to have been, could not go on very well, and he was not surprised at the difficulties which had occurred, even if the steamer could break through ice more than five inches thick; but not being able to do so, she was entirely useless for the service for which she was built. After two years' experience, the Government should be satisfied that the Northern Light, could not perform the service expected from her, and discontinue the expense involved in running her.

Motion agreed to.

ACCIDENTS ON RAILWAYS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. FLEMING moved for a return showing the number of accidents and casualties which have occurred on the Railways of the Dominion during the years 1874, 1875, 1876 and 1877, setting forth: 1st. The causes and natures of such accidents and casualties; 2nd. The points at which they occurred, and whether by night or by day; 3rd. The full extent thereof and all the particulars of the same. He said it was desirable that fuller information should be furnished, relating to the circumstances connected with railway accidents, than had hitherto been given to the public. The Railway Act of 1868 provided that a true and particular return should be made to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council semi-annually, by the railway companies of the Dominion, of the accidents and casualties that might have occurred on their respective roads. All the information, however, that was made public was the simple statement that so many were killed and so many were injured, and they were not even certain that the numbers given were the actual number of casualties that had occurred. In the Report for the year ending 30th June, 1875, it was stated:

"That the following companies have kept no record of the accidents that have occurred:—Canada Southern and Toronto, Grey and Bruce. Several others make no returns, but do not state the reason."

The Report of the year ending 30th June, 1876, did not say whether returns had been received from all the companies or not, but gave the following as the number of killed and injured for the year:—

MR. PLUMB.

| | Killed. | Injured. | Total. |
|---------------|---------|----------|--------|
| Passengers | 5 | 9 | 14 |
| Employés | 48 | 238 | 286 |
| Other persons | 56 | 57 | 113 |
| Total | 109 | 304 | 413 |

Taking for granted that the statement was correct, the large number of accidents to railway employés demanded attention. There were, according to the last census, 2,739 railway servants in the Dominion. Supposing the number should now be increased to 3,000, there would be one person killed to every 62 employed, and one injured to every 12 engaged in the service. The question naturally suggested itself: Why was it that so many men were struck down every year while engaged in an essentially peaceful occupation? It might be of interest to notice, in contrast with those returns, the comparatively small number of casualties which occurred in Great Britain to men engaged in the same kind of service. In the Report of the Railway Commissioners presented to the House of Lords in 1874, it appeared that there were 274,535 engaged in railway service. Casualties amongst them were 788 killed and 2,815 injured, being one killed to every 350 employed, and one injured to every 100 employed. In Canada, therefore, in proportion to the men engaged, there were six killed to one in the United Kingdom, and eight injured to one in the latter country. It might be said that those accidents happened to railway servants through their own carelessness. If this were true, then Canada had a less efficient staff of hands than Great Britain. He did not think that was the case, but that investigation would go to show that other causes were at work. In England, where the subject had received a good deal of attention, it had been found that a number of accidents occurred through the excessive hours of labour which some of the employéd were called upon to perform. Others occurred through the non-enforcement of rules by railway companies, while quite a number were attributable to the want of safety appliances. Railway corporations were very slow to introduce anything of that kind. They were not responsible for the lives of their employés. It cost nothing to kill a man, but it would cost something to make use of a mechanical contrivance that might save his life. Whatever might be the cause, the result was disastrous to the families of the sufferers, and through them, to the public; for it oftentimes happened that, when a railway employé lost his life, his family became a charge on their friends or on the public. He supposed he had stated sufficient facts to justify him in submitting the motion to the House.

MR. MACKENZIE said the Government would be prepared to furnish the return as full as possible, by making a special communication to the railway companies.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 21st Feb., 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced, and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 21) Further to amend the Charter of the Quebec Fire Assurance Company.—(Mr. Taschereau.)

Bill (No. 22) Respecting the Bank of Liverpool.—(Mr. Forbes.)

EMPLOYMENT OF SHORTHAND-WRITERS IN COMMITTEES.

MOTION AND REMARKS.

MR. TROW moved that the Immigration and Colonization Committee be authorised to employ a shorthand-writer to take evidence. He said they desired to obtain the evidence of a gentleman from British Columbia, who happened to be in the city of Ottawa at present.

MR. MACKENZIE said he wished to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the necessity of limiting the expenditure on this service as much as possible. The expenses incurred last Session for reporting had been most excessive. In one case, a gentleman came here from a distance to be employed as a reporter, was only here a little over two weeks, and yet he (Mr. Mackenzie) found that he was paid between $500 and $600. He would not oppose the motion, but he did think he was entitled to ask that the greatest care should be taken not to enter on such expenditure during the current Session.

MR. TROW said the total expenses incurred by the Committee on Immigration and Colonization had been only $94 in 1876. Last year he presumed they were something more, but they had endeavoured, on all occasions, to keep such expenditure down; taking advantage of the presence of persons who were in town on business with the Government to secure evidence they required.

MR. SPEAKER said the remuneration to be received by shorthand-writers had been settled two or three years ago.

MR. DYMOND said that the fees were fixed, but not the work imposed on shorthand-writers by Committees. There was no doubt a great temptation when such writers were employed to protract the proceedings longer than if hon. gentlemen themselves had to take down the evidence, as was the case with one important Committee sometime ago, or to rely upon the clerk's notes. He confessed that, as far as the Committees on which he had been during the last three or four years were concerned, for the evidence to be of any value at all, it was absolutely necessary that a shorthand-writer should be employed. It was quite obvious that, when hon. gentlemen who were not trained lawyers examined witnesses, each from his own point of view, there would naturally be a larger number of repetitions than would otherwise be the case; and that expenses would be incurred, which, if strict economy were practised, might be avoided. He thought that the matter was one which would have to be left to the discretion of the members of Committees.

MR. SPEAKER said it seemed very extraordinary that $500 should be received for two weeks' work.

MR. DYMOND said that this was by no means extraordinary. He could mention cases where shorthand-writers, employed professionally, had received a far larger amount than $500 for a fortnight's work. It must be remembered that this profession required special qualifications, and that it did not afford constant employment. He might add that, the demand for shorthand-writers in this country having largely increased, owing to their employment in the Courts as well as in connection with the Official Reports of the House, their services were not likely by any means to be cheaper, but rather dearer than they were at present.

Motion agreed to.

DUTY ON MALT.

QUESTION.

MR. YOUNG: I have a question I would like to put to the Government, and my reason for asking it is on account of the importance and urgency of the matter to which it refers. It seems that an import duty of 85c. per bushel, a merely nominal duty, was put upon malt entering Canada. This was done, no doubt, with the view of protecting the Excise, or, at least, because it was supposed to be necessary to protect the Excise Department. It appears that this duty, is nominal, as no malt enters Canada, or is likely to be entered, from any foreign country, and that this very heavy duty of 85c. per bushel has been made use of as an argument and lever in the United States on the part of the maltsters there to endeavour to increase the duty, and put on a prohibitive duty or what would be equal to that on Canadian malt entering the United States. The ground upon which they ask this large increase of duty being the very large amount of duty that has apparently been placed upon malt coming into Canada from the other side of the line; and as this duty, as I understand it, is merely nominal, I should like to ask the Government if they see no objection to answer the question—whether they are prepared to agree to the prayer of the petition made by the maltsters of Ontario, who met some three or four weeks ago, and prayed that this nominal duty should be taken off malt coming into Canada from foreign countries.

MR. PLUMB: I would like to ask when this duty was put on.

MR. YOUNG: I am not certain as to the date.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: The question to which the hon. gentleman refers was brought before the attention of the Government not long ago by a deputation composed of prominent brewers and maltsters of this country. The hon. member has correctly stated that this duty was not put on for revenue proposes, but simply for the convenience of the Excise, and as, on consultation with the officers of Excise, it appears that their interests can be sufficiently protected, although that duty be removed, I think that I shall advise the Government, and that they will recommend to the House to remove this duty from the Customs Department, and place imported malt in the same position, substantially, as that made in this country. As to the other question asked by my hon. friend from Niagara, the Customs duty has always existed and has borne a fixed proportion to the Excise duty. The Customs duty was doubled last year, in the ordinary course of things, at the time the Excise duty on malt was also doubled.

MR. PLUMB: We may understand that the 85c. duty, as increased, arises out of the legislation of last year.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Whatever the duty was last year, it was doubled at the time the Excise duty was doubled.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION.

QUESTION.

MR. RYAN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to let, during the present Session, contracts for the construction of those portions of the Canada Pacific Railway between English River and Rat Portage?

MR. MACKENZIE: The intentions of the Government will be announced in the course of a short time, as soon as it is prepared to do so.

MR. SPEAKER.

THE GEORGIAN BAY BRANCH.

QUESTION.

MR. WHITE (North Renfrew) enquired, Whether the Government has, since the 15th February, 1877, entered into any contract or contracts for the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and, if so, whether such contract or contracts will be submitted for the approval of Parliament during the present Session?

MR. MACKENZIE: The Government has not.

OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

COMMITTEE'S REPORT CONCURRED IN.

MR. ROSS (West Middlesex) moved the adoption of the first report of the Committee on the Official Debates. It was important that one clause in this report should be accepted by the House, in order to enable himself, as Chairman of the Committee, or the Committee to take certain action. They would observe that the report this year was simply a repetition of last year's report, with the addition of the 10th clause, which was as follows:—

“That no documents or other matter not read or uttered in the course of the debates, shall appear in the reports.”

This was the only amendment or addition, with the exception of the fact that they were employing this year one more reporter than last year—six instead of five.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Is it to be done by contract.

MR. ROSS: It is done by contract.

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Have the Committee any control over the contractors, in the way of making the volume more portable and convenient in size?

MR. ROSS: We claim to have control over the contractors in all these particulars?

MR. KIRKPATRICK: Then it ought to be exercised.

MR. JONES (South Leeds) said he thought it was understood last Session that the sessional Reports were to be supplied to members at the rate of $2.50 per volume. He had, however, been asked $5 for an extra volume of last year's Hansard, and he wished to know whether this was to be the price of the volume. It was most unwieldy in size, and he thought it reflected no credit on the Committee who had the matter in hand.

MR. ROSS said he was not aware of any understanding existing as to price when any person wished to get more copies than the number assigned him by the Committee. The Committee had considered themselves exceedingly liberal last year when they provided that each member should have five instead of two bound copies, as was the case the year previous. It would be difficult for them—and he thought it would be unreasonable to expect them—to regulate the price of a marketable commodity, printed by an individual who, to a certain extent, was beyond the control of the Committee. It was true that they controlled the printer with regard to a limited number of copies; but, if he chose to print a certain number of copies on speculation or for sale to members, he presumed that he had a right to charge his own price. He was glad that his hon. friend had referred to the unwieldy character of the volume. He hoped that this year such would not be the case. They were anxious that the contractor should condense, as far as he reasonably could, the speeches of members on both sides of the House; and he believed that the contractor was anxious to do so; but it was exceedingly difficult for the reporter, who would like the reports to be somewhat satisfactory to hon. members, to curtail them to a very great extent. But, if they were able to do so, and thus meet the views of his hon. friend, he was sure that this would be a source of very great pleasure to himself.

MR. TUPPER said he was afraid that some of them were not altogether free from blame with regard to the large size of Hansard; and it was just possible that this was a subject which was a good deal under their own control. He rose to call attention to what he believed was a misapprehension on the part of his hon. friend from South Leeds. He had understood that copies were to be supplied to members at the rate of $2 each; but he thought that this referred to the unbound sheets. He had subscribed for two or three such copies and he had been so charged. He did not consider this charge unreasonable.

MR. PLUMB said the binding only cost $1 per volume. It was very evident that the publisher of the Hansard had a monopoly; and there was no doubt that it was quite within the power of the Committee to regulate the price, or, at any rate, control it. He thought that this ought to be done. As to the condensation of speeches, this was an important matter, and he did not think that it could always be very safely left in the hands of the Committee. He supposed that the Hansard was intended to be a faithful transcript of what was said on the floor of the House; and he doubted whether this would be the case if it was left to any irresponsible person to contract, or alter, or modify, or attempt to give the substance of the speeches. It was quite evident that, if this was attempted, they would stand in the same position as they were before the Hansard was adopted. Instead of one bulky volume, it would be more convenient to publish the reports in two volumes. He considered that the gentlemen who had the Hansard in hand would do a great favour to the House if they so arranged matters that the volumes could be procured at a reasonable price.

MR. LANGEVIN said he desired to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the French version of the Hansard was published last year at a very late period—late in the Fall.

MR. MACKENZIE: And so was the English edition.

MR. LANGEVIN said that this year he saw they had copies of the English edition up to page 192, while the French issue had only reached page 16. He could well understand that the French edition could perhaps not keep pace with the English edition, but surely there should not be this difference. If this state of things continued, they might not have the French edition until four or five months after the general elections had taken place; and this certainly could not be the object of the Committee.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. DESJARDINS said that the reason for the delay was that the first numbers had been received very late by the French translators.

Motion agreed to and Report concurred in.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. DECOSMOS moved for a copy of all correspondence in 1877 and 1878, and not now before Parliament, between the Imperial, Dominion, and British Columbia Governments respecting the Canada Pacific Railway; and also a copy of all correspondence in 1877 and 1878 between the said Governments respecting the Graving-dock at Esquimalt. He said that this resolution might have been separated into two parts, but he knew of no good or sufficient reason why the Government should make any objection to it as it was drawn. The House would recollect that last year, notwithstanding the fact that the Governor-General had visited British Columbia, and notwithstanding the fact that despatches had passed between the Government of British Columbia and the Imperial Government—and he presumed that despatches had passed from this Government to the Imperial Government—they had had no copy whatever of the despatches which had passed with regard to the position of the Dominion Government respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway; that was, so far as the settlement of the difficulty relative to British Columbia was concerned. They had had a despatch, however, he believed, from the Imperial Government, which had been communicated to the House, and the hon. the Premier had last Session stated that the Government were in possession of no despatches, leaving the House to infer that His Excellency the Governor-General had taken the business of settling the British Columbia difficulty apparently out of the hands of his responsible advisers, and had done as he thought proper in the matter. In other words, they were to assume that the despatch of His Excellency the Govern-nor-General last year was sent either with or without the consent of his Ministers. Now, there was a point in that connection which might be discussed. It was not his wish, however, to deal with it at the present moment. All he asked for under the first head was that all the despatches between the Imperial, Dominion and Provincial (British Columbia) Governments should be at a very early day placed before the House, in order that the House might intelligently discuss the question of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The next point would occupy a little more of the time of the House, and, in order that he might place it intelligently before the House, he craved its indulgence. He asked, in this regard, for a copy of all the correspondence that had taken place, in 1877 and 1878 between the said Governments, respecting the Graving-dock at Esquimalt. Some correspondence on this subject could be found in the Sessional Papers of this House, and some in the Sessional Papers of the Province of British Columbia. He would state the case briefly, from the commencement. The Government of the Dominion, led by the right hon. gentleman who now led the Opposition, agreed with British Columbia to aid it in the construction of this dock. The hon. gentleman who led the Government of to-day, also confirmed that agreement. The aid was to be given as a bonus by both Governments. The members of the late Government had agreed that it was to be a bonus; and the hon. the leader of the present Government said he would strictly carry out what the late Government had agreed to perform; but, in that respect he (Mr. Mackenzie) had not done so. As he (Mr. DeCosmos) understood it, and as the Province of British Columbia understood it, the hon. the leader of the present Government had violated a plain and distinct bargain. He made this brief statement at present with the view of preparing the House for what he intended to lay before it, and then hon. members would be able to see how this question stood. The first point to which he would draw the attention of the House was that, in the 1873 Session of the Legislature of British Columbia, he moved the following resolutions:—

“Resolved—That Article 12 of the Terms of Union between this Province and the Dominion of Canada provides for the construction of a first-class Graving Dock, in the following words: ‘The Dominion Government shall guarantee the interest for ten years, from the date of the completion of the works, at the rate of five per centum per annum of such sum, not exceeding £100,000 sterling, as may be required for the construction of a first-class Graving Dock at Esquimalt.’

“That the Terms above specified were adopted in the full belief that the proposed guarantee would be sufficient to secure the construction of the dock by private enterprise.

“That although tenders have been publicly invited in England, Canada, and the United States, yet none have been received since the close of last Session of the Legislature.

“That only one tender had been received previous to the close of last Session, and that the Legislature refused to accept.

“That, from trustworthy information, it is certain that the guarantee for the construction of the Graving Dock is not sufficient to induce private enterprise to engage in the undertaking.

“That it is highly desirable, from a naval and mercantile point of view, that the Graving Dock should be constructed without delay.

“That Article 9 of the Terms of Union states—‘That the influence of the Dominion Government will be used to secure the continued maintenance of the naval station at Esquimalt.’

“That the construction of the dock would be a powerful inducement to Her Majesty’s Government to continue Esquimalt as a naval station; and that the continuance of Her Majesty’s ships in the waters of British Columbia would contribute most materially to preserve peace between the white population and Indians, and by that means save to the Dominion Government large sums that might otherwise be expended in suppressing Indian outbreaks.

“That the Graving Dock partakes more of a National and Federal than of a Provincial character. This is especially the case in view of the necessity of a first-class dock for the repair of Her Majesty’s ships in the North Pacific, and also in view of the early construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the consequent development of an extensive trade carried on in steamships and sailing vessels of the largest class, between China, Japan and Australasia on the one side, and British Columbia on the other.

“That, as the true intent and spirit of Section 12 of the Terms of Union was to secure beyond a doubt the construction of the dock, and as the guarantee in Section 12 is insufficient, this House respectfully recommends His Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor to secure its construction without delay, on one of the following conditions:—

"1. To increase the guarantee in £100,000 sterling from five per centum per annum for ten years, to £120,000 sterling at 7½ per centum per annum for twenty-five years.

"2. In lieu of the present or proposed increased guarantee, the Dominion Government to construct the dock.

"3. The Dominion Government to grant to this Province such sum of money in cash, in lieu of the guarantee in Section 12 of the Terms of Union, as may enable the Provincial Government to undertake the construction of the dock."

These resolutions were really the basis of subsequent negotiations with the late and the present Government respecting pecuniary aid for the dock, and they were based on Section 12 of the Terms of Union. Before he proceeded to quote other authorities on the subject, he might state that the present Government refused to give the $250,000 as a bonus to the Province, but had offered to charge it as a debt against the Province. The next point was that there never were any communications with the Dominion Government asking it to loan money for the construction of the dock; but, in every case, after it was found that the guarantee of interest to private enterprise was insufficient, the communications with the Government were that they would grant a certain sum in lieu of the guarantee, or, in other words, pay to the Province a certain sum in lieu of that guarantee. It would be observed that those resolutions were passed before any communication was had with the late or present Government to grant to that Province such sum of money in cash in lieu of the guarantee. It would be observed, from those statements, that they had no intention to ask a loan. In 1873, after the passing of those resolutions, he wrote a letter to the then Minister of Public Works, the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin), in which were these words:—

"The intention of the negotiations of the Terms of Union, as you doubtless well know, was to secure the construction of a dock—first class. The guarantee, however, is insufficient, hence I advise you either to construct the dock at Dominion expense, or pay to us a lump sum of money of not less than $250,000."

That letter, written to the ex-Minister of Public Works, in September, 1873, showed that the question of borrowing money, or taking money as an advance to be charged against the debt of the Province, never was entertained by the Provincial Government. In the autumn of 1873, he came to Ottawa, opened negotiations with the late Government, and, in the absence of the hon. the Minister of Finance, he carried on negotiations with the hon. the member for Charlevoix, then the Minister of Public Works, with respect to this dock. When the hon. the Minister of Finance returned, it was arranged that the sum of $250,000 should be granted to the Province to aid in the construction of the Graving Dock, and that in lieu of the guarantee to which they were entitled under the Terms of Union. He would read for the information of the House a letter of the hon. the ex-Finance Minister, addressed to himself on that subject:—

MR. DECOSMOS.

"OTTAWA, Nov. 3, 1877.

"DEAR SIR,—With respect to the conversation I had with you respecting the Dominion aid towards the Graving Dock, and your application to the Minister of Public Works upon the subject, I have consulted my colleagues, and we are prepared to submit to Parliament a formal proposition to the following effect: That in lieu of the interest of £100,000 for ten years, which was secured by the 12th Section of the Order in Council dated July 1st, 1871, we propose that advances should be made to you from time to time, upon certificates of the progress of the work, not on the whole to exceed £50,000 sterling.

"I have, &c.,

"S. L. TILLEY.

"To Hon. A. DECOSMOS, M.P."

It would be seen from that letter that the Finance Minister of that day understood that the $250,000 as to be paid to the Province from time to time, as a gift or grant, and not charged against the debt of the Province. The Ministry of that day retired, and the hon. gentleman who now led the Government formed the present Administration. As his (Mr. DeCosmos') mission at that time was both to the Dominion and to England with regard to the dock, he considered it his duty, before going to England, to obtain the confirmation of the present Government to the agreement he had made with the late Government. He found, at the outset, that they called in question the nature of the guarantee. He communicated, he believed, first, semi-officially with the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and next, he thought, with the hon. the Premier, and after the question as to whether the Province was bound to pay back any sum of money advanced on that guarantee or not, it was decided, as the House might fairly infer from the following statement in his report, that the guarantee mentioned in the Terms of Union, could not be made a charge against the Province. In his report, drawn up on his return to British Columbia, dated 2nd February, 1874, the words were as follows:—

"As a matter of record, it may here be stated that the nature of the guarantee in Section 12 of the Terms of Union respecting the Graving Dock, was considered during the negotiations with Mr. Mackenzie, and that the decision was that the £50,000 sterling in lieu of the guarantee of interest, in Section 12 of the Terms of Union, should be given to the Province as a grant or bonus, and was not to be charged as a debt against the Province."

In order to go to the Imperial Government with a confirmation from the new Dominion Government, he communicated with the present Premier, and he agreed also to grant the $250,000 in aid of the Esquimalt Graving-dock. The question of the repayment of this money, or of charging it against the debt, was not a part of that agreement in any shape, way, manner or form; and he believed he could conclusively show the House, outside of the letter he now intended to read, that such was the case. He would read the letter from the Premier to himself:—

"OTTAWA, 14th Nov., 1873.

"MY DEAR SIR,—With reference to the proposal you submitted on behalf of the Government of British Columbia, viz., to advance £50,000 to aid in the construction of a Graving Dock at Esquimalt, in lieu of the guarantee of interest at five per centum on £100,000 for ten years, provided by the Terms of Union, I have to say that any change in the mode of aiding in the construction of this work, from that agreed to, will require the sanction of Parliament.

"I can only say, at present, that the Government will submit a measure to Parliament to carry out your proposal, or some scheme equivalent thereto.

"I am, &c.,

"A. MACENZIE.

(Signed),

"Hon. A. DeCosmos."

They had in that letter a statement from the head of the Government that he would submit a measure to Parliament to carry out his (Mr. DeCosmos') proposal. His proposal did not ask for a loan to assist the construction of the Graving Dock. His proposal to the Government, dated 29th October, 1873, stated:—

"It (the Province) proposes therefore to construct the dock if the Dominion Government will pay to the Province the sum of $250,000 in lieu of the guarantee provided under Section twelve of the Terms of Union."

There was nothing whatever in this proposal which authorized the Government to interpret it as an application for a loan. He might go beyond that. Here was another proof that in the negotiations, so far as he was concerned, there was no reference whatever to a loan:—

"OTTAWA, Nov. 11, 1873.

"British Columbia Representatives to the Hon. A. Mackenzie:

"SIR,—We fully agree with the proposal of the late Government to ask Parliament to grant to British Columbia £50,000 sterling, in lieu of the guarantee under the Terms of Union, for the construction of a first-class Graving Dock at Esquimalt, and now have the honour to say that, if the same be submitted by the present Government to Parliament for its sanction, it will receive our undivided support.

"We have, &c.,

(Signed,) "A. DeCosmos,
"E. Dewdney,
"J. S. Thompson,
"R. W. W. Carrall,
"H. Nathan,
"H. Nelson."

This was an additional authority showing the intention of the agent of British Columbia to ask for a grant, and not for an advance. Sometime later he wrote two letters to the Minister of Finance, asking when the Government would be prepared to bring forward a measure in respect to the Graving-dock, and he also had an interview with the Premier on the subject. The latter brought in some resolutions on the subject, but, when these resolutions were before the House, and when the Bill was framed he (Mr. DeCosmos) found there was a clause added by which it was proposed that this money should be charged against the debt of the Province. He immediately remonstrated with the hon. the Premier against putting a new face upon the agreement with the Province, or, in other words, for having violated the agreement; and at last this clause was struck out. It might be well for him to read the exact words, so that the House might clearly see what it was. The first part of the Bill, as introduced, read in this way:—

"1. In lieu of the guarantee of interest at the rate of five per centum per annum for ten years from the completion of the works, on such sum not exceeding £100,000 sterling, as may be required for the construction of a first-class Graving Dock at Esquimalt, as provided by the terms of the Order of the Queen in Council for the admission of British Columbia into the Union, advances may be made from time to time, by the Governor in Council, out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, for the construction of such Graving Dock, upon certificates of the progress of the work; such advances not to exceed, in the whole, $250,000, and to be considered as part of the indebtedness of the Province in calculating the subsidy payable to it."

After making his remonstrance, and after hon. members of British Columbia had also remonstrated against it, the clause: "And be considered part of the indebtedness of the Province in calculating the subsidy payable to it," was struck out, and the Bill was finally passed. But the hon. the Premier had said to the hon. members for British Columbia that he was prepared to carry out what Mr. Tilley had agreed to do. The hon. the Premier stated that Mr. Langton, the Auditor-General, had told him that it was only to be an advance, and not a bonus. He (Mr. DeCosmos) denied the correctness of Mr. Langton's assertion, and it was left to be settled on the basis of what the late Government had agreed to do. Finding that the hon. the Premier was unwilling to do anything in the shape of granting that money as a bonus to the Province, he wrote to the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Langevin), the ex-Minister of Public Works, and also to Governor Tilley, of New Brunswick, who was the ex-Finance Minister, with whom he had negotiated, with the full and firm belief that, if those gentlemen stated the facts to the present Ministry of the agreement, with respect to the Graving-dock made with the late Government, no objection whatever would be taken to the payment of this money from time to time as the dock progressed. He would draw the attention of the House to the reply of Mr. Tilley:—

MR. DECOSMOS.

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

"FREDERICTON, 28th May, 1874.

"DEAR SIR,—In reply to your communication of the 23rd inst, I beg to state that the £50,000 sterling agreed to be advanced to the Government of British Columbia towards the Graving Dock, was in lieu of the facilities secured for that purpose under the Terms of Union. I cannot see how there could be any misunderstanding in the matter, as my letter of the 3rd November, 1873, appears sufficiently definite, and the Act just past cites the conditions in the first section.

"I have the honour to be, dear Sir,
Yours faithfully,

"S. L. TILLEY.

"To Hon. A. DECOSMOS, M.P."

In order to give additional evidence to the present Government that the meaning of the evidence, and the intention of the late Government was to grant the money as a bonus, he sent the following telegram:—

"OTTAWA, 2nd June, 1874.

"Your letter of May 28th and telegram of May 29th, received, and I understand them to mean that the £50,000 sterling, promised to be advanced in aid of the construction of a Graving Dock at Esquimalt, was to be a gift to British Columbia in lieu of Section 12 of the Terms of Union. Is that your meaning?"

(Signed,) "A. DECOSMOS.

"To His Excellency Governor S. L. TILLEY, Fredericton, N.B."

Here was the reply:

"ST. ANDREWS, 3rd June, 1874.

"£50,000 sterling was not to be charged to debt, but given in lieu of guarantee Graving Dock. Thought my letter explicit.

(Signed,) "S. L. TILLEY.

"To Hon. A. DECOSMOS."

This settled the point that so far as the action of the late Government, through the ex-Finance Minister, was concerned, the intention was that this $250,000 should be paid to the Province as a gift, and was not to be charged against the debt of the Province. The next letter he would read, confirming this position, was a letter addressed to himself by the hon. the ex-Minister of Public Works—the member who was now on the floor of this House, the hon. member for Charlevoix:—

"QUEBEC, 1st June, 1874.

"MY DEAR MR. DECOSMOS,—Your letter of the 29th of May has just reached me. In answer, I have no hesitation to say that the Government to which I belonged promised to grant to British Columbia, as a bonus, the sum of £50,000 sterling in lieu of the guarantee contained in the 12th Section of the Terms of Union. We were convinced that British Columbia could not build their Graving Dock with that guarantee; and inasmuch as the intention of both parties to the Terms of Union was to secure that Graving Dock, we thought it but just to replace it by such a sum as would secure it to your Province, British Columbia and Great Britain contributing their share, or British Columbia supplementing the balance. Of course this sum of £50,000 sterling was not to be an advance of money, but a bonus in place of the guarantee. We knew we would have to obtain the sanction of Parliament to such an arrangement, and we told you we would do so. I am very positive about these negotiations, inasmuch as I was conducting them, chiefly, previous to the return of Mr. Tilley from England. I hope the above will prove satisfactory, and remain, my dear Mr. DeCosmos, “HECTOR L. LANGEVIN.

“Yours very truly,

“Hon. A. DeCosmos, M. P.”

If further proof were wanting, he believed that it could be had; but here, on the evidence of two witnesses, he thought he had established conclusively that the agreement of the late Government was to pay $250,000 to the Province of British Columbia to aid in the construction of the Graving-dock. The hon. the Premier having agreed, in the presence of the members of British Columbia, that he would do what Mr. Tilley had agreed to do, afterwards violated that agreement by refusing to pay the money over to the Province to enable it to construct the dock. Five years, nearly, had elapsed since these negotiations were entered into, and had the Government kept faith with the Province, the dock, instead of being only started—a mere coffer-dam only being now in the course of construction—would have been completed, and Her Majesty's ships of war might have been docked there. It might have been used as a implement of defence in case of war between the Imperial Government and Russia or any other country, and as a nucleus for a colony of ship-builders. The money expended would have given employment to a considerable number of men, and thereby raised the revenue derivable from Customs and Excise by this Dominion; but, as it was, this great work, one of the Terms of the Union, was now practically in abeyance. In going a step further, he wished to direct the attention of the House to a report of the Committee of the hon. the Privy Council of 29th May, 1876, in which the Minister of Finance was credited with using the following language:—

“The hon. the Minister of Finance, under these circumstances, advises that the Government of British Columbia be informed that, in the opinion of this Government, the first section of Chapter 17, 37 Victoria, only contemplates an advance of certain moneys, and that it is not in the power of the Government of the Dominion to make a gift of the sum of $250,000, as would appear, from the preceding telegram, to be expected by the Government of British Columbia.”

From this, they found that, in 1876, the Government having in its possession undoubted evidence of the agreement with the late Government, for he sent the letters he received from the hon. member for Charlevoix, and the present Governor of New Brunswick, to the Government, and copies were taken of them—interpreted the first section of Chapter 17, Victoria 37, to mean merely an advance and not a bonus to the Province; again, showing that the hon. the Premier—instead of carrying out his deliberate agreement made on the floor of the House with the hon. members for British Columbia, when the Bill was passed—again concurred in violating the agreement between British Columbia and the Dominion. He had further evidence in his possession as to the views entertained by the Government, with respect to that sum of money. He intended to show what the opinion of the leader of the Government was with respect to that dock in February, 1874, before any difficulty had arisen between the Government of British Columbia and the Dominion with respect to the construction of the railway. He would read to the House a telegram received from the hon. the Minister of Public Works, to whom he had sent a telegram, asking him to telegraph a copy of the ex-Finance Minister Tilley's letter to him (Mr. DeCosmos) respecting the dock, which had been mislaid here at Ottawa, in the hon. gentleman's office he believed, before his return to British Columbia. To that telegram he received the following answer from the Minister of Public Works:—

“OTTAWA 6th, Feb., 1874.

“Your telegram went astray. Government offer is to pay ($25,000) two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, as dock work progresses, in lieu of guarantee provided by Terms of Union.

(Signed) "A. MACKENZIE."

That was final and conclusive evidence as to the understanding existing between the Province of British Columbia and the Dominion on the 6th February, 1874. Having explained this matter, and given to the House a brief narrative of the negotiations respecting the Graving Dock, he considered he had discharged his duty, alike to his constituents, to the Province of British Columbia and to the Dominion. He trusted the hon. the leader of the Government would find occasion to make reparation to the Province of British Columbia for the great wrong he had committed in not carrying out the agreement made with it in November, 1873. He trusted also the Government would consent to bring down the papers called for in this motion.

MR. BUNSTER said he felt it a duty incumbent upon him to second the motion, inasmuch as His Excellency the Governor-General, when he visited British Columbia, promised faithfully, and he supposed His Excellency had the ear of the Government when he made that statement, that railway construction would be commenced, according to the terms of the Carnarvon award. This promise, he might add, had been made in his own presence. The terms of the treaty under which British Columbia had entered the Dominion had not been carried out in that spirit of fair play which would be expected from British statesmen. However, thanks to one of the great natural resources of the Pacific Province, which was being rapidly developed and worked, a change had taken place in the prospects of British Columbia, and the people there did not care so much as formerly whether British statesmen carried out their promises or not, as the future of that great country was now assured. Through their faith in the Dominion, British Columbia had lost a railroad, that would, under similar circumstances, have been built years ago by their American neighbours. The people of British Columbia would have had a railway running past their doors were it not for the way the Canadian Pacific Railway had been villified by one party and ignored by the other. It was the first time in history that anything had been said against British enterprise; but it was owing to the failure of British enterprise that to-day they were without a road. If British Columbia had not entered the Confederacy of Canada, they would have been in a position to make treaties with the Americans to bring their railroads to British Columbia, which had been fully their intention. It was well known the Americans wished to get hold of British Columbia; but, having much British blood in their veins, the people of British Columbia preferred to ally themselves to Canada and stand by the old flag. Had Canada been true to her promises? He could only reply no. Three hundred British citizens had been swept away in a moment through the wreck of a tub of a steamboat, indirectly occasioned by the want of a railroad, for, if the American railroad had been built, there would have been no necessity for a steamboat, and they would not have had widows and orphans left on their hands. The loss of that vessel and so many lives was one which could not be compensated by the building of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, which was a mere myth in comparison. All that was required to build the Pacific Railroad was brains and intelligence. The increase in the value of the public domain would more than cover the cost of building the road. The Government was too cautious, too much afraid of going into debt. That was a mistake. English capitalists loaned money to the South American Republics for railroad speculations in the United States, and never got a cent in return, either in capital or interest. We had a good country; there was plenty of money in England to buy the steel rails, and sufficient labour to build the road, and all that was required was pluck, enterprise, and energy on the part of the Canadian Government to go on with the road. The population would follow. They had had a good example already in some of the Western States of the American Union, where the people were now bringing water to fertilize their lands from thirty to forty miles distance, at an expense of millions of dollars, and yet were well repaid for their labour and expenditure. And they were sending their cereals to Europe from that heretofore barren desert. Canadians would not awake to the advantages they had over and above the Americans, among them being two days and nine hours gain in time from China to Liverpool by the Canadian route. They would not awake to the importance of the country. He declared without fear of contradiction, that they had allowed their neighbours to get ahead of them and they (the Americans) knew it and boasted of it. Had the Dominion developed its own resources, they would not to-day see five hundred thousand Canadians seeking employment in another country, when their own country owned a better domain. In connection with that question, some members had seen fit to state that the members from British Columbia had tried to monopolize the time of the House. That he denied emphatically. He thought the spirit of the members from British Columbia had been to utilize the time of the House in the interests of the Dominion at large, to show the resources of the country, and no one could fail to acknowledge that British Columbia, with her great and enduring resources, was anything less than a jewel of great price to Canada and the Empire. She possessed greater and more valuable resources than the whole of the Dominion combined, whether they considered her lumber, coal, agricultural or mineral resources, her seas teeming with fish, her numerous harbours or her general climate.

MR. DE COSMOS.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: And her members.

Mr. BUNSTER said her members would compare favourably with the members of any Parliament. Her members came here to demand the rights granted to British Columbia under treaty, which remained unfulfilled. If they were pertinacious on that point, it was through a sense of duty, feeling that the treaty with British Columbia had not been carried out according to the spirit or letter of the law, a fact which had grieved the people much. There were many members and others in British Columbia who could argue the case better than the representatives in this House, especially himself. When they had entered into a solemn treaty, and sacrificed thereby their own interests—sacrificed railroads offered them by other countries, the privilege of making treaties with other countries,—they certainly had a right to ask of the Dominion Government that it should carry out a portion of the treaty, at least when the Government had sent steel rails to their shores and piled them up, and then said they were not going to utilize them in the line of railroad for which those rails were intended; when they had reserved lands and thereby excluded immigration to these lands; when emigrants, as good Britishers as ever landed in Canada, were obliged to go to other shores to seek a home,—the people of British Columbia had a right to feel aggrieved. The Dominion had not built the road, and the rails were still lying unused, deteriorating in value more than if laid down on the line. The Government lands would have paid four times over the expense of building the road even according to the prices obtained for the lands at public auction. Emigrants could not settle on the lands reserved by the Dominion Government, under contract; and yet the hon. the Premier did not acknowledge the contract. Nevertheless, the contract existed. Emigrants who had been induced to come to the shores of British Columbia had been obliged to emigrate again to Washington Territory, Oregon, and elsewhere, owing to not being allowed to settle on those reserved lands. Every fair-minded person could not but acknowledge that it was a deplorable state of affairs. The Government should take hold of this national highway, and by it unite Canada from coast to coast. He was satisfied the Government could carry it out, if they would only try, and, if they did not, he could only repeat what he had stated on other occasions, that some else would.

Motion agreed to.

ALASKA BOUNDARY LINE.

MOTION FOR REPORT.

Mr. DECOSMOS moved for a copy of the report, with accompanying map, of the engineer who was employed last year in determining the probable boundary line between British Columbia and Alaska, and also a copy of his instructions, with a copy of the treaty or convention between Great Britain and Russia respecting the said boundary. He said he considered that this information ought to be placed in the Sessional Papers, to give every hon. member of this House a clear idea of our relations with the United States, so far as the boundary line of Alaska was concerned. It was necessary that this boundary should be defined, to prevent a conflict in the civil and criminal jurisdiction of the two countries. There was at this moment a great excitement in British Columbia with respect to mining, and valuable quartz lodes had been found on the Alaska side of the boundary. If, at any time hereafter, quartz lodes were found near the supposed boundary, it might create more or less excitement of an unpleasant character between the two countries. It was necessary that, in connection with the boundary, on the Stickeen River more particularly, an arrangement should be made between the two Governments to determine a certain point as the limit of their respective jurisdictions. He was assured that at the American town of Wrangel, situated opposite the mouth of the Stickeen River in Alaska, sales were made to men employed on the British side of the Stickeen during the year, to the amount, in round numbers, of $100,000 worth of merchandize. When he drew the attention of the Government, and especially of the hon. the Minister of Customs, the other day, to the duties paid at Stickeen, it was with the view of ascertaining whether some evidence could be obtained to corroborate the statement made to him by steamboat captains as to the trade on the Stickeen. By the non-definition of the boundary, even temporarily, by the two Governments, this trade was thrown into American hands instead of into British Columbia hands. He was assured that, if the boundary proposed by Mr. Hunter who was sent there by the Government last year, were adopted, and a Custom-house station placed there, Canadian steamships would proceed there, and the miners who visited them during the winter season, would make their headquarters on the British side of the line. As the matter was now, they were really contributing to build up the American side and to the support of American steamers passing from Portland to Alaska and carrying Oregon produce, instead of British steamers which might pass through the mouth of the Stickeen into British Columbian territory. He hoped the Government would bring down Mr. Hunter's report and maps, and any additional information, which would show the outline of Alaska in front of British territory, the inland included.

MR. BUNSTER, in rising to second this motion, said it would have afforded him much greater pleasure if the motion had been for the purchase of Alaska. Hon. gentlemen might laugh, but looking at the matter from a national point of view, he fully meant what he said, from his knowledge of the country, that the territory of Alaska possessed a more genial climate than Ottawa, notwithstanding its latitude, while its natural resources and capabilities were more valuable than people had any idea of. As early as the months of January and February, gardening operations were commenced. He questioned very much if they could do that in Ottawa. Vegetation was rapid during the summer season, but he must acknowledge not so rapid as here at the Capital. When hon. members of this House sneered at Alaska, he had a right to speak from his own personal knowledge, and tell them they were mistaken; and the day was not far distant when, from the geographical position of this country, they would see the force of his remarks on this subject. They could not but recognize the great fact, that British Columbia was the centre of the British Empire, between Australasia, Europe and Canada. Hence, he felt that that Province occupied a proud position; and that it was the duty of every British Columbian to keep his fellow countrymen here well informed on British Columbia. He remembered when Sir John A. Macdonald brought British Columbia into the Union, much to her detriment, because the contract was not carried out, that it was considered a foolish bargain; but to-day the Americans felt proud of their Alaska bargain. Seven millions in cash were paid for that, but not a dollar was paid for British Columbia. Let the House contrast the difference, and see what a mistake Canada made during the Crimean war, in not laying hold of that country. The lease of Alaska was more than enough to pay one million dollars annually. It was the best investment the United States had ever made.

MR. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, this question raised by the hon. gentleman behind me, is one of a great deal of importance. I would suggest to him that he make his motion a little wider. The motion, as it is framed, simply calls for the report of Mr. Hunter, a civil engineer sent on an exploratory survey, to determine, as far as his intelligence and information enabled him to do so, the true boundary line according to the Russian Convention of 1823; but we have had a good deal of correspondence on this subject, of an official character, with the United States Government, and some questions arose in connection with the navigation of the Stickeen River, which is affected to some extent by the Treaty of Washington. I think it is desirable that the hon. gentleman should widen his motion in this sense, adding the following words: "And also such other papers as relate to the defining of the boundary line between Alaska and British territory, and the navigation of the rivers passing from British Columbia through Alaska to the sea." We will thus be able to place a collection of papers in consecutive order, which will show the position in which this matter stands at the present time. I may say that we have made every effort to get a settlement of this question, and took the necessary means to do so; but there seems to be some difficulty on the part of the United States in obtaining an appropriation from Congress sufficient to accomplish the purpose desired. We then endeavoured to obtain a definition of the boundary at points of common interest, such as the crossing of the Stickeen River; and this we failed in accomplishing in consequence of the difficulty experienced, apparently, in Washington, in obtaining money from Congress to devote to this object. As a matter of public interest, I think it desirable that, if any return at all is made to this motion, the return should be as complete as possible, so as to make the papers, when printed, a work of reference on the subject for the future. If the hon. gentleman will consent to this amendment, I will be very glad to have the papers made as complete as possible.

MR. DECOSMOS said he was perfectly willing to accept the amendment suggested by the hon. the Premier.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

EXPENSE OF THE PHILADELPHIA EXHIBITION.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. POPE (Compton) moved for a return showing the total cost to the Government of Canada of the Philadelphia Exhibition, giving a detailed statement of all money expended or to be expended for that purpose, to whom paid, and for what service.

MR. MACKENZIE said the returns would be made as full as possible.

Motion agreed to.

EXPENSE OF THE SYDNEY EXHIBITION.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. POPE (Compton) moved for a return showing the total cost to the Government of Canada of the Sydney Exhibition, giving detailed statement of all moneys paid or to be paid, to whom paid, and for what service.

MR. MACKENZIE said the accounts had not been closed for this Exhibition. There were a number of items that could not well be closed until the Government had some further correspondence with Australia. Shortly after the goods reached there, and were deposited in the building, a storm of rain and wind occurred, and the building was so defective that serious damage was done to a large quantity of the goods. These goods were in the care of the Government, and the Government were of necessity responsible for their condition; and thus had necessitated some difficulty in settling with the owners of these goods. He might say also that the serious illness of the Government Commissioner had caused some delay in the preparation of his report and the settlement of some accounts; but, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pope) desired, he had no objection to bring down as full a statement as he could to the present time.

Motion agreed to.

THE NUMBER OF MEMBERS IN PARLIAMENT.

RESOLUTION PROPOSED.

MR. BLAIN moved :

“That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she may be graciously pleased to cause a measure to be submitted to the Imperial Parliament for the purpose of amending the British North America Act, so as, while adhering to the principle of representation by population underlying that Act, to confer upon the Parliament of Canada the power of determining the number of members which shall from time to time constitute this House, and, further, so as to confer the power upon the Parliament of Canada of readjusting or reducing the number of Senators in that Chamber.”

He said he desired to call the attention of the House, in moving this motion, to some difficulties that he thought would arise upon the readjustment of the representation after they had taken the census of 1881; and, as it would take some considerable time to prepare to meet these difficulties, he thought it was better that they should be brought to the attention of the House now. By the Imperial Act, section 51, the mode of ascertaining the number of representatives in this House was to take the population of Lower Canada, and the number 65, being the number of members for that Province, was divided into the population, which at present gave a unit of representation of 11,331. At the time this rule was adopted, it was expected that the population of Quebec would not increase as rapidly as the population in the other Provinces; in fact, the rule was adopted chiefly because it was expected that the population of Quebec would be substantially the same as it was at the time the rule was settled upon. The working of the rule since 1867 had given them, by the increase of population in the Province of Ontario, six members; one member for the Province of New Brunswick, and two members for the Province of Nova Scotia. They had had, on account of the Provinces that had been brought into the Union since that time, four from Manitoba, six from British Columbia, and six from Prince Edward Island; making, in all, twenty-five. The rule that was fixed in this Statute was one that must necessarily add very largely to the number of representatives in this House; and his object in moving this motion was to confer the power upon this Parliament to determine from time to time how many members there should be in the House, while they still adhered to the principle underlying this Imperial Statute, the principle of representation in this House by population. He thought it was not necessary to point out the consequences of the probable fluctuation of population in the Province of Quebec; but it must be clear to any one who examined the Act that, if the population of Quebec were to increase comparatively largely, the number of representatives in this House would be very considerably decreased. If, for instance, the population in Quebec were increased to two millions, the number of representatives from the Province of Ontario, assuming the population to be as it was at present, would be about fifty-three; and so it would be with all the other Provinces, if their population remained substantially as they were at present. But that contingency was not by any means likely to arise, and the Statute did not seem to have been drawn upon the supposition that it would so arise. He thought, if an event of that kind should take place, probably in order to carry out the principle of representation by population, there might of necessity have to be an Imperial Statute obtained to alter the Act; but, as that event was not likely to take place, he did not think it necessary to examine the question. Then the next contingency would be this: In case the population of Quebec should remain substantially as it was at present, then, of necessity, all the other Provinces, as they increased in population, and new Provinces, as they might be added to the Dominion, would increase the number of representatives in this House; and one was rather startled to find that, if they had a population equal to the population of the United States,—upon this assumption that he had made, which seemed to be that upon which the Statute was drawn,—they would have no less than 2,291 members in this House.

MR. MACKENZIE.

Several HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

MR. BLAIN said gentlemen might say "hear, hear," but it was said that figures never told an untruth. If gentlemen would only take the trouble of running the question through, they would find that that was the case. Assuming the population of the United States to be forty millions,—he believed it was somewhat in excess of that at present,—and the population of Quebec to remain substantially as it was now, then the number of members they would have in this House would be, as he had stated, 2,291. Gentlemen might say "hear, hear," but there might be those living at this present moment who, perhaps, might find that the Dominion of Canada would have a population equal to forty millions. It was not a very great stretch of imagination to suppose that, when they got the North-West country opened up, when they got proper communication with that country, when they were able to offer a motive to people to settle in that country, and when they were able to bring forward the products of that country to the markets of the world—it was by no means a stretch of imagination to suppose that there might be people living now who would see the population of this Dominion something like forty millions. There was no doubt that this section of the Statute would have to be altered. One could very well see that the House at present was quite large enough. For his own part, he did not approve of very large legislative bodies. He thought they would be able to do the business of this country quite as well with one half the number of members they had now in the House.

Several HON. MEMBERS: No.

MR. BLAIN said yes; they could do the business of the country quite as well, and he thought probably better, if the number of members was 100 instead of 206. He supposed that they ought not to ignore the lessons of history. When the people of the United States formed their Federal Union in 1789, they had a population substantially the same as the Canadian population, and they had sixty-five members in their House of Representatives; and they had, as every one knew, two members in the Senate from each State. At that time they had thirteen States, so that they had twenty-six members in the Senate. They had adopted the rule which he had mentioned in the notice—the Congress of the United States fixed the number, and then they divided that number into the entire population of the United States, which gave them the unit of representation. They had in the House of Representatives of the United States at present 292 members, with a population of over forty millions of people; and in this House we had, with a population of somewhere about four millions, at present 206 members. We had a larger number of men in the Senate than they had in the United States; he thought there were only 76 in the United States Senate, and we had 78. There was no doubt in whatever his mind that there was an absolute necessity for a change of the rule, not only so far as this House was concerned, but also so far as the Senate Chamber was concerned. In addition to the difficulty that arose upon the rule itself, there was also a very considerable difficulty raised upon the Statute, as to how far the present representation of those Provinces that had been brought into the Union since 1867 might be affected by the Act, upon a readjustment of the representation. The intention very clearly was that those Provinces should be brought in upon the principle that had been so long contended for, and that had been finally adopted in this Statute, of representation by population in this House. He did not mention the fact for the purpose of finding fault at present; but they all knew that, when British Columbia was brought into the Union, and also when Manitoba was brought into the Union, they had not a population equal to the representation that they obtained in this House; and, when they took the census again, and readjusted the representation, his impression was that the Imperial Statute would not allow them to carry out the bargain which was made with these Provinces; but that they ought, strictly, under the terms of that Statute, to reduce the representation of those Provinces from the number that they had at present to the number that they would be entitled to according to their population. Then, if that were the case, the Province of British Columbia might not have more than one member in this House. He found, as far as he had been able to ascertain, that the voting population in British Columbia was something like 3,500, taking the island and the mainland; but, if they took the ordinary mode of ascertaining the population, assuming that each one of these voters was the owner of a house, and taking the average number of each household, they would find that somewhere in the neighbourhood of 16,000 or 17,000 would be the utmost of the population of British Columbia, and that would entitle them to only one member in this House. He thought it was clearly the intention, at the time this Statute was passed, that, when these Provinces were brought into the Union, whatever might be the terms of the bargain that might be made with them, these terms should be carried out. He did not by any means say that it would be fair to British Columbia now, that her representation should be reduced. His object in calling the attention of the House to the fact was that he did not think, under the Imperial Act, that they would be permitted to carry out the terms of that contract; and, therefore, there was an additional reason why that Statute should be altered. The other Provinces might find themselves in the same position. He thought, in all probability, Manitoba might not be entitled to the same number of representatives that she had at present; but he was in hopes that the population would increase in that Province, so that by the time they took the next census they would be entitled to the number that they had obtained under the terms of the contract.

MR. BLAIN.

AN HON. MEMBER: And a few more.

MR. BLAIN said he did not know, at this present moment, what might be the population of Prince Edward Island, or how far they might be affected by it; but he found that the population of British Columbia was taken at 60,000 at the time the contract was made and they had a representation based upon that supposition, and the financial arrangement that was made with them was based upon that supposition. It seemed to him that the Statute should be altered, so that, whatever might have been the contract made with British Columbia, the Government might be in a position to confirm it. He found that the contract that was made with Manitoba at the time that it was brought into the Union had been confirmed by the Imperial Statute; but he was by no means certain that they could continue, so far as the representation was concerned, after they had taken the census in 1881, to carry out the terms of that contract, as it was agreed upon. He did not intend to take up the time of the House, but this was a subject that he thought required their consideration, and his proposition at present was that an application should be made to the Imperial authorities requesting that the power should be conferred upon this Parliament to determine, from time to time, the number of members that should be in this House; and also to redistribute, as it were, the number of Senators in the Senate Chamber over the new Provinces that might be brought in,—not to increase the number of Senators, allowing them to remain as they were, but so to readjust the representation when new Provinces were brought in as to reduce the number of Senators in the old Provinces and allow a certain representation to the new ones. The section of the Statute that would have to be amended would be section 51. He might mention that, at the time this Statute was drawn, there seemed to have been in the mind of the draughtsman some intention of increasing the representation. It did not seem to have been in the contemplation of the parties drawing the Act that there ever would be any necessity for reducing it at all; and hence it was that, before they could arrange the matter at all, they would be obliged to have an Imperial Statute.

MR. MASSON said he did not rise to discuss the question brought forward by the hon. member. He thought everybody would agree that it was rather too soon in their existence as a nation to speak about changing the Constitution. They must not transform this House into a debating club; they must wait, before making any changes, until public opinion was so pronounced as to make them really necessary. The people had never spoken of this; the people did not care for it, and did not want it. It was no use discussing whether they would better their position when no one thought their position was bad in itself. He believed in the old English principle of letting well alone. But the hon. gentleman had fallen into a grave error when he said that the reason why the population of the Province of Quebec was taken as the basis for other Provinces was that it was expected that the population of Quebec would not increase for the next ten years. In justice to the members from the Province of Quebec who helped to frame the Act of Confederation, he might say that it never entered into their heads that the population of that Province would not increase. The reason why Quebec was taken was that Quebec, on account of its peculiar situation, would be the Province which would give the fairest average of increase of population, and would not be exposed to those great changes from any decrease or increase; but the population would be more stationary; in fact, it would be like the French, who generally did not go as fast as the others, but when they took a point they kept it. The framers of the Constitution knew that the Province of Quebec would increase, and that, in point of fact, it had increased. It had not increased in the ratio of the other Provinces, perhaps, but it had increased in the ratio of seven per cent. Nova Scotia had increased more than all the other Provinces; it had increased 17 per cent. Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland had increased; and in Ontario the increase was about 16 per cent. of the whole population. The apparent increase of the population of the Province of Quebec would have been seen better if the census of 1861 had been well taken. If it had been taken with as much care and precaution as the census of 1871 was taken, they would have seen that the increase of population in the Province of Quebec was greater than it appeared at the first blush. There was only one principle taken in 1871 for the census, and that was the de facto population; while in the census of 1861 there was a real muddle. The Census Commissioners did not know their duty as they should have done, and some of them went by the de facto system, while others went by the de jure principle; that is to say, some were properly taken on account of their actual residence, and others were taken by what should be their legal residence. In the town which he represented, it appeared, after the census of 1871, that the population of Terrebonne town had decreased. What was the reason? It was because some of the pupils in their College were taken in Terrebonne as being de facto residents there, and were taken again in their residence as being de jure residents. By right they should have been taken in their own place. That was the reason why the census of 1861 appeared greater than it really was, while the census of 1871, having been made properly, all on the same day, at the same moment, if he was not mistaken, showed an apparently less increase in the population, while really the population had increased at a ratio, which, he was sure, if the census had been properly taken, would have shown the same increase as in New Brunswick, which, he thought, was 13 per cent. He would not have risen had it not been for that fact. He thought it was a rather grave attack on his friends from the Province of Quebec, who framed the Constitution, to say that they did not expect the population of the Province of Quebec to increase. They expected the population to increase; they had a large field before them, and before long the hon. gentleman would see that the population of Quebec increased so fast, that he would not be afraid of seeing two thousand members in this House.

MR. MACKENZIE said he presumed that his hon. friend wished to bring this before the House, simply for the discussion of the question. There was, no doubt, something in what the hon. gentleman said, that the power should be, perhaps, of a somewhat different character than was given in the Statute; but, at the same time, he thought the hon. gentleman was wrong in some of the conclusions that he had drawn. The representation, in the first place, was based upon the population by the census of 1861. But, as the population of Quebec had increased very largely,—he forgot the precise increase, but his impression was, between 200,000 and 300,000,—the ratio was increased to very nearly 20,000; in other words, each member represented—according to the first census, about 15,000, and, according to the last census, about 19,000.

MR. BLAIN: Eighteen thousand three hundred and thirty-one.

MR. MACKENZIE said his impression was that it was somewhere near 19,000. He spoke wholly from memory, not having the figures beside him. At the next census, the population of the Province of Quebec would be, in his opinion, judging from what he knew of the increase in the Eastern Townships particularly, and in places where land was still available, as well as the increase in the cities,—the increase would be proportionate to that which took place during the last decade. In that case, each member would represent in Parliament, after the next census, probably 24,000 or 25,000; so that, as the population increased in Quebec, the number represented would also increase, instead of showing the same proportion. The increase, in other words, of members, would be in an inverse ratio to the increase of population to that extent. He thought there was no fear that, in their time, at least, the number of members would very largely exceed what they had at present. After the next census they would probably have an increase of 12 or 15 members—perhaps one or two more than that, but it was not likely that there would be any more than that. Twenty years hence, the members of this House would certainly not reach more than 230 or 235. At the same time, he did not object to the principle that the hon. member laid down: but it would occur to the hon. gentleman himself that, while it was quite proper in the early part of the Session to discuss a question of this kind for the purpose of evoking the opinions of members publicly, and elucidating the subject as much as possible, it was not desirable that any such motion should be pressed to a division; and he was sure his hon. friend had no intention to do that, but had simply placed this notice on the paper for the purpose of discussing it in the way he had done, ably and lucidly. He asked his hon. friend to be content with the discussion, and to withdraw his motion.

MR. MASSON.

MR. MITCHELL said he had listened to the remarks of the hon. the mover of this resolution with a great deal of interest, because, if his propositions were to be carried out it would militate very much against the smaller Provinces. His hon. friend (Mr. Blain) had not been exactly correct in his statement of the reasons why Quebec was taken as the pivot Province for the representation of the different Provinces in the Parliament of Canada. It would be apparent to everybody that there was some difficulty in giving an increase of representation according to population, on the basis of the population as it existed at the time of Confederation, and it was for the purpose of preventing that increase in the representation which the hon. gentleman feared that one Province was taken as a basis, instead of a particular population for each electoral district. If 17,000 or 18,000 people had been accepted as a basis for the return of a member, it was evident that there would have been a larger number of members in this House than the interests of the country required, or than were desirable for the purpose of judicious legislation. Not only the number of members would have been increased, but the expense would also have been largely augmented, and the legislation would have been much more cumbersome and slow. Great consideration was given to that point, and the difficulty was overcome by accepting one Province as a pivot Province, the number of whose members should remain unaltered, while the number representing the other Provinces should increase or decrease as their population increased or decreased in proportion to the population of the pivot Province. He agreed with his hon. friend on the other side of the House, that this motion was premature; that no necessity existed for a great constitutional change such as the resolution of his hon. friend from West York (Mr. Blain) involved. He thought it was very dangerous, in a new country like this, with a comparatively new Constitution, which was still almost on its trial, to introduce changes until they were called for in the public interest. The introduction of changes which the public interest did not call for would tend to shatter that constitution, however good it might be in itself. He (Mr. Mitchell) looked back with satisfaction to the fact that he had something to do with the framing of that Constitution, which was a credit to its framers and was based on sound policy. A principle of right and wrong ran through the whole of it; but the adoption of the change proposed by his hon. friend would have the effect of placing all the smaller Provinces of the Dominion at the mercy of Ontario, and they knew what sort of treatment they would get from that Province. He did not mean that the people of Ontario themselves would ill-treat the smaller Provinces; but he did say that the latter did not receive fair treatment from the gentlemen who now represented the majority of the Province of Ontario in this House. If this motion were adopted the members from the Province of Ontario could out-vote the whole of the members from the Maritime Provinces, and change the Constitution as they pleased, and could take away the rights of those Provinces. He believed in letting well alone, and was opposed to experimenting in the manner suggested. The Premier had said that the object of the resolution was to evoke discussion. He (Mr. Mitchell) deprecated the discussion of abstract questions of this kind. Let them leave well alone, and get along as well as they could under the Constitution which had worked so well, notwithstanding the hard times and bad Government, without instilling ideas of change into the public mind. He hoped his hon friend (Mr. Blain) would withdraw his motion.

MR. BUNSTER said he did not desire to see the motion withdrawn. The out-lying Provinces had an agreement with the Dominion which the Province of Ontario could not change by any resolution of this House, and if the hon. member for West York (Mr. Blain) saw fit to press his resolution, he hoped that he would press it now, so that the question might be at once settled. If the people of this Dominion desired to change the Constitution so as to deceive the smaller Provinces, the sooner they knew it the better, and the sooner they came down to business the better. Probably other Provinces might place their protest before the Imperial Government, with a view to withdrawing from this confederacy, as it had been stated by some hon. members that they would sooner see some of the out-lying Provinces go out of, than remain in, the Dominion. That had been stated in relation to British Columbia. He believed that British Columbia was today a unit in favour of going out of the Dominion, unless the agreement which had been entered into by this Dominion was carried out. They had resources in their own Province that would carry them through; they had mineral resources in the way of quartz which superseded all questions about railroads or questions about Governments, just as the gold excitement when it broke out in Australia had done. At that time there had been great excitement in reference to the Government not doing what was correct, in the same way as there was in British Columbia a few months ago. That feeling was now dead in British Columbia, where they were turning their attention to their own natural resources. They would demand from the Government the fulfilment of pledges it had made to the Pacific Province; and he would ask the Government what the great Dominion of Canada would be without British Columbia? That Province had shown the largest amount of revenue per head of any Province in the Dominion; and, if this motion was meant for British Columbia in any way, in reference to its having more representatives in Parliament than its population would call for, he, for one, would say that the people of that Province cared so little about it, that the sooner it was out of the Dominion the better.

MR. BLAIN said there was not the slightest necessity for any feeling being raised upon this motion, which guarded the rights of all the Provinces as they existed at present. It expressly stated that the principle of representation by population should be adhered to, and he therefore did not think it at all necessary to refer to the argument of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). He hoped the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson) would understand that he (Mr. Blain) had in no sense referred to Lower Canada for the purpose of making it appear that that Province was not increasing as fast as it might be expected to increase. In order that the hon. gentleman might understand what was the intention of the House of Assembly at the time the resolutions were adopted, and when this particular rule was fixed upon, he would refer him to the debates on the subject, and the speech of the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald), who stated that Quebec was selected as a pivot Province distinctly because of the permanent character of its population. The whole argument proceeded on that supposition, that the Province of Quebec would not increase relatively in population, in proportion to the whole Dominion. That was the reason upon which that particular pivot was adopted. But everything round about that pivot seemed to be in motion. Every ten years they were obliged to move the boundary lines of every constituency in the Dominion, except those in the Province of Quebec. There was a practical difficulty in this matter, namely, that they would be sending too many members to this House. He by no means agreed with the statement that it would be very long before the number of members in this House would be substantially increased. He considered it a real danger. They ought not to increase the number they now had; and there was no one who understood the difficulty of dealing with such a question but would agree that, when they got a certain number of members into the House, they could not reduce that number. The tendency of all legislative bodies was to increase the number of their members instead of reducing it. This House was entirely too large. There was no necessity for the number of members in this House to do the business of this country. He did not suppose that on the face of the earth there was another four millions of people who had half the legislative machinery which we had in this country, and, as a rule, the larger the number in a legislative body, the less efficient that body was. If, instead of 206 members, they had 100, the work would be done a great deal better, and in half the time. He was quite satisfied, under the circumstances, to withdraw the motion; but this was a positive difficulty which stood in their way, and he thought the Imperial Statute would have to be altered before the next census was taken, or the Government might not be able to allow more than one member for British Columbia.

MR. BUNSTER.

MR. MACKENZIE said that in his previous remarks he had taken the census of Lower Canada for a previous decade, instead of the census of 1871. In 1861, the population was 1,110,000, and in 1871, 1,191,000, an increase of over 80,000. The number represented by each member, therefore, was something over 17,000 under the one, and nearly 19,000 under the other.

MR. BLANCHET said he supposed the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) did not wish to apply representation by population to the constitution of the Senate.

Motion, with leave of the House, withdrawn.

DEATH OF MILITIA VETERANS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

MR. FISET moved for a return showing the names of the militiamen of 1812 and 1813 who died between the 1st March, 1876, and the 1st January, 1878.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 22nd Feb., 1878.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPLY TO THE ADDRESS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

MR. MACKENZIE delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

MR. SPEAKER read the Message, and it is as follows:—

"DUFFERIN.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

"I thank you for your Address in answer to the Speech, with which I opened the Session, and I rely upon your promised attention to the measures that may be submitted to you.

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

"OTTAWA, 22nd February, 1878."

IMPERIAL EXTRADITION ACT OF 1870.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

MR. MACKENZIE delivered another Message from His Excellency the Governor-General.

MR. SPEAKER read the Message, and it is as follows:—

"DUFFERIN.

"The Governor-General transmits to the House of Commons copy of a Despatch from Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, having reference to the Joint Address of the Senate and House of Commons of the 16th April, last, praying that legislation be had to cause the operation of the Imperial Extradition Act of 1870 to cease in Canada.

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

"OTTAWA, 22nd February, 1878."

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

STATEMENT.

MR. CARTWRIGHT laid before the House, Statement of the Receipts and Expenditure (Consolidated Fund) from the 1st of July, 1877, to the 10th of February, 1878, inclusive.

KEEWATIN MUNICIPALITIES BILL.

(Mr. Mills.)

FIRST READING.

MR. MILLS introduced Bill (No. 23) To establish Township Municipalities in the District of Keewatin. He said the measure was necessitated by the fact that the Icelandic settlers, who resided in the northern part of Manitoba and in the District of Keewatin had voluntarily established municipal institutions there, somewhat similar to those existing in the Province of Ontario. Those municipalities, however, had no legal existence; and he proposed by this Bill to provide for the establishment of township municipalities. The Bill conferred upon them powers somewhat similar to those exercised by the Municipal Councils in the Provinces of Ontario and Manitoba; and also provided for the appointment of assessors, for the uniform assessment of property, for the election of councillors, and for the division of the settlement into school sections, with the power to appoint trustees and employ teachers, and impose taxes for building school-houses and for other school purposes. It also authorized the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to extend the provisions of the Act to other portions of the district as soon as they might become settled.

Bill read the first time.

INSOLVENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Bourassa.)

FIRST READING.

MR. BOURASSA introduced Bill (No. 24) To amend the Insolvent Act of 1875, and the several Acts in amendment thereof.

Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—THE BUDGET.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Mr. Speaker. It is now almost five years since from my place as a private member of this House, I took occasion to point to the then House of Commons in the most emphatic language I could command, the inevitable consequences which must necessarily ensue from the adoption of certain proposals at that time submitted for the consideration of Parliament. It is nearly four years since, as Minister of Finance, it became my unpleasant duty to point out to the House the grave financial difficulties which, in my judgment, beset our position; and the necessity of submitting to considerably increased taxation, if we desired to provide for the liabilities we had incurred. Unhappily grave as were the forebodings I then expressed the re-action which actually took place has decidedly surpassed the extent upon which I had calculated. It is not often, in the commercial history of any country, that we are called upon to chronicle so great a reduction, not merely in the total volume of our trade, but also in the revenue derived therefrom, as we have seen within the last two or three years. Making allowance for the admission of Prince Edward Island into the Union, the total volume of the trade and commerce of Canada has in that short interval been reduced by very nearly $50,000,000, while the revenue derived from Customs alone shows a decrease in that period of something like $3,000,000, the actual figures in round numbers being that our Trade and Commerce collectively has been reduced from $218,000,000 to $168,000,000, while the duties derived from Customs alone have fallen off from $15,351,000 to $12,546,000. Neither would this reduction, enormous as it doubtless is, fairly represent the whole measure of inflation which occurred at that time, or the subsequent reaction. In a country like ours, which is steadily growing in population, and in which a large area of fertile soil is constantly being brought under cultivation, we may fairly calculate, in any ordinary year, that a considerable increase, provided there has, as I have said, been no unreasonable inflation, would always be made by the natural force of circumstances to the general volume of our trade; and, therefore, if the House wish really to measure the extremity of the inflation, or the consequent severity of the reaction, they must add to the $50,000,000 which have been absolutely and definitely ascertained to have been lost, also a very considerable percentage, probably varying from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000, at least, for the natural growth which may be said to have been absorbed or anticipated, which last comparison is only valuable, as affording an index of the extreme character of the inflation, and of the extreme violence of the subsequent reaction. To put the matter before the House in another shape, while during that interval the total volume of our imports has been absolutely reduced by fully one-third, it is probable that our population has increased at least one-ninth, and consequently, whereas a few years ago, with a total population of 3,600,000 souls, we imported something like $127,000,000 worth of goods, we found ourselves, with a population of 4,000,000, importing a little over $94,000,000 worth. In other words, the total imports have fallen from an average of $35.25 per head to something like $23.50 per head. Had the imports continued stationary, as it was at that time supposed they would, the revenue, under our present tariff, would, in all probability, have considerably exceeded $27,000,000, and, had the reduction, which actually took place, not exceeded the amount estimated by myself, it would still have remained at about $24,000,000; while, as the House knows, the actual fact is that our revenue has sunk to a sum very little exceeding $22,000,000. Now, I think, it will be admitted that two facts may be looked upon as clearly established from these circumstances; in the first place, the extreme character of the inflation which existed in 1873, and, in the next place, the fact that if, as I have no doubt is unfortunately the case, the demand for home manufactures produced in this country, has considerably decreased, it is not at all probable that it has decreased in more than equal ratio to the diminished consumption of foreign manufactures. Now, it is not my purpose at present to dwell on the great length of time that this depression has prevailed, nor to waste any unnecessary words in descanting on the unavoidable misfortunes which have exasperated the natural reaction that has ensued. What I desire especially to point out at the present moment, is that the strain on our resources has of necessity been exceedingly great, and that, indeed, it could not have been otherwise, because these misfortunes—these commercial disasters—have not only visited us, but have also visited very heavily those nations who have always been our best customers, and with whom, both then and now, the great bulk of our commercial transactions have taken place. It is, however, very satisfactory to find that at last the tide seems to have turned in some degree, and to be able to inform the House that the results of the receipts from revenue, during the last seven months, are very decidedly in excess of those for the same period of the preceding year. On the 10th day February instant, I find that our receipts from all quarters amounted to $13,434,235, as against receipts to the corresponding period of last year of $12,494,279; that is to say, Mr. Speaker, that the augmentation in these seven months, reached the sum of nearly $1,000,000. Now, although it is true, that a certain proportion of this may perhaps be attributed to the necessity of replacing the mass of goods that were unhappily destroyed in the great fire that desolated the city of St. John, I am glad to be able to tell the House that the increase from that source is not by any means the largest part of the increase I have mentioned; but that every Province, without exception, I believe, shows a large and cheering increase, and as the question has been raised as to the increase being largely due to this merely accidental cause, I think it is not unreasonable to point out to the House that the very remarkable character of the present winter has most assuredly diminished, to a considerable extent, the consumption, and, consequently, the revenue we might otherwise have secured; and that in all probability the $200,000, or thereabouts, which might have been derived from the misfortunes that I have alluded to, are balanced, and, I dare say, more than balanced, by the diminution of consumption arising from that cause. Proceeding now, Mr. Speaker, to the consideration of the general statement for the year which expired on the first of July, 1877, it will be my duty, before making any general observations, to invite the attention of the House to certain special items, particularly in the list known as the ordinary expenditure. The House will observe that for that year our total expenditure for civil Government reached the sum of $812,000; being, I may remark, about $71,000 less than the sum which was expended for that purpose in the year 1173-4, and representing simply the regular statutory increase which, under the ordinary operation of law, would have been made to the expenditure of 1872-3. On the item for superannuation, the House will see that the charge is $104,000 as against $101,000. Now, Sir, I may state, as some questions seem to have arisen as to the mode in which that Act was administered, that the total increased amount during that year was $12,005, against which are to be set off reductions by death to the extent of $11,711. The increased receipts on account of that fund, as the House will see by a comparison with the previous year was $2,414, and the net addition to our annual expenditure, barely $294, without taking into account the fact that several of those superannuations were caused by the abolition of offices by which a considerable saving was effected to the country. Under the head of Immigration the House will observe that a considerable amount has been paid out in the shape of loans to the Mennonites and Icelandic settlers, which, I have every reason to believe, will be returned to us at a comparatively early day. This expenditure amounted, in all, to $79,000, and the sum expended in suppressing a violent outbreak of small-pox in the Icelandic settlement, $21,000. Under the head of railway expenditure, the sum of $90,000 more than was estimated for has been expended. But, on the other hand, I am happy to be able to state that the receipts show an equal augmentation, being very nearly $90,000 more than was expected. Of course, the House will know that estimates cannot always be exact in regard to such matters; if the traffic increases, the expenditure must necessarily be expected to increase also. The House may further observe that, under the head of sinking fund, a certain cross entry has been struck out on both sides of the account. It has been held to be desirable, in the public interest, to devote the whole sinking fund to the purchase of the securities known as the four per cents., and the rough and ready system of book-keeping which had heretofore prevailed, and under which the nominal value and not the sum actually paid was usually entered, has been discontinued. A small excess over our gross estimates has been caused by reason of the negotiation of the loan of 1876, some considerable time before the period at which I had originally designed to negotiate it. I am happy to be in a position to state to the House that the wisdom of the course adopted by the Government on that occasion has been very amply justified by the results. I have obtained a statement of all the loans negotiated in the calendar year 1877 on the London market, which, with your permission, I will briefly read to the House. In the month of April, the Corporation of Birmingham attempted to negotiate a loan of £1,500,000, bearing 3½ per cent. interest, which loan, I am advised, proved a total failure. In the same month, the Metropolitan Board of Works put a loan of £1,250,000 at 3½ per cent. on the market, and of this only one-half was subscribed. The Government of Natal, in the month of June, endeavoured to negotiate a loan of a similar amount, which, I understand, was very tardily subscribed for.

AN HON. MEMBER: What date was that?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: In June.

THE HON. MEMBER: What was the rate?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: 4½ per cent. The Government of Portugal issued a loan of £6,500,000 at 3 per cent., which was offered on the market at £50—that is to say, a rate of interest of 6 per cent., and this was also tardily subscribed. I find also that, in the month of April, which would have been the period—other things being equal—when I should have desired to place our own loan on the market, the price of our securities, deducting accrued interest, was £90 6s. 8d. This price ruled, or rather it was a few shillings less, from May, with slight fluctuations, down to December, at which time it was £91 3s. 6d.—for retail transactions, be it understood. Now, Sir, I think this will satisfy all reasonable men that not only was the price obtained for the securities the highest which could reasonably have been expected, but that parties who purchased them could by no possibility have gained any undue or unfair profit out of the transaction, if, indeed, which in many cases I much doubt, they succeeded in securing themselves from loss at all. But, what is of most moment, and the point that I chiefly desire to press upon the attention of this House is that it is also perfectly clear that the Government of the Dominion would have incurred extreme danger if they had neglected to avail themselves of the opportunity which presented itself in November, 1876, to negotiate that loan. It is very rarely, indeed, that such difficulty has been experienced in placing loans of any kind on the London market, as occurred during the year 1877, and those who are acquainted with the very high position which is held by several of the corporations whose securities I have quoted, and more particularly with the position held by consols of the Metropolitan Board of Works, will know that it is morally impossible that the Government of Canada could, under such circumstances, have successfully floated a loan had it been delayed till that period. Turning to the general statement, if the House will deduct the interest on permanent investments, which did not exist in the year 1873-4, they will perceive that the total gross expenditure for the year which is just closed, exceeded the gross expenditure for the year 1873-4 by barely a few thousand dollars; while, if they turn to that portion of the statement which is headed "Ordinary Expenditure" they will find that, whereas in 1875-6 our expenditure for ordinary purposes amounted to $8,569,774, our expenditure in the last year amounted to $6,835,078; in other words, that the ordinary expenditure was reduced in that year by the sum of $1,734,696. If they prosecute this comparison to 1873-4, they will find that in that year the ordinary expenditure amounted to $8,324,076, our expenditure, of course, being as before, and that our ordinary expenditure, as compared with 1873-4, was less by

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

$1,488,998. Should they prefer to take the year 1872-3, they will find that the ordinary expenditure in that year amounted to $7,062,095; showing that our expenditure for 1876-7 was less than the ordinary expenditure for 1872-3, by $227,017; and that, it is well to remember, in spite of the fact that we have had to provide very large amounts for treaties with the Indian tribes, for the maintenance of the North-West Police, and of law and order in that extensive territory, for the expenditure necessarily involved in the admission of Prince Edward Island, in the creation of the Supreme Court, and also, to some extent, by the increased population of the Dominion. Sir, I think the House will agree with me that that side of the statement, at least, may fairly be looked upon as reasonably satisfactory; and, although it is unhappily true that, in spite of these reductions, the very serious shrinkage which took place in our Customs and Excise revenue, amounting, altogether, to very nearly $1,000,000—although, I say, it is unhappily true, that that has caused a considerable deficit, amounting to no less than $1,460,000, still—

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Do hon. gentlemen consider it a subject of merriment, a subject of rejoicing, that a deficit of $1,500,000 has been incurred?

Mr. MITCHELL: Of regret.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: My ear may be in fault, but I detected no tones of regret in the expressions emanating from the opposite side.

An Hon. MEMBER: Too thin.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: I am willing to believe that my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) expressed, correctly, the feeling of the House on that side, and that the cheers with which they received the announcement of a deficit only indicate that they do, deeply and sincerely, regret that this deficit has not been extinguished; a thing in which I most heartily concur with him. Sir, I need not say that, although it is probable that one cause of the deficiency has been the continued shrinkage in the introduction of imported goods, still, the main cause is necessarily due to the very bad harvest of 1876. Those who have studied the position of this country are well aware that, however important other interests may be, now and for a long time to come the agricultural interest will necessarily continue to be the predominating interest in Canada; and, therefore, that anything which strikes at the prosperity of the agricultural population strikes necessarily at all those classes, those very numerous classes, which are dependent upon them; strikes, I may say, at the foundation of our national prosperity; and, therefore, that it is no cause of wonder that an exceptionally bad harvest should produce such a reduction, or even a larger reduction in the revenue than that to which I have alluded. Proceeding, now, Sir, as, perhaps, the most convenient place to lay before the House the Estimates which I have prepared of the probable receipts of 1878-9, I may take this opportunity of saying that these Estimates, as all Estimates prepared so many months in advance of the time of expenditure necessarily must be, are based on the supposition that we shall enjoy, I do not say an unusual, but, at any rate, a moderately good harvest. Should we be favoured with that, I think, under the present tariff, we may reasonably expect, judging from our returns, to receive from Customs a revenue of about $13,750,000; from Excise, $5,250,000; from Stamps, our ordinary revenue of about $250,000; while, from the Post Office, which, I am glad to say, shows decided signs of improvement, I believe I may safely reckon on $1,200,000, and on $1,900,000 in all from Public Works, together with a revenue from various miscellaneous sources, and from interest on our investments, which as hon. gentlemen know, is continually increasing under the operation of the sinking fund of about $1,500,000; making, in all, $23,850,000. I may remark, as respects the expenditure side, that the House will note that the calamity which overtook St. John has inflicted upon us the necessity of a considerable expenditure for the purpose of repairing the public buildings in that city. At least $200,000 will be required for that purpose, which necessarily increases the Estimates that I would otherwise have had to submit to the House. Having completed this much of my task, it appears to me that it would be advisable, before I proceed to discuss the general policy of the Government, in order that the House may be fully possessed of the necessary facts, to review somewhat briefly the seized and of it to enable them to jue position in which we stand now, as contrasted with the position in which we stood in some five years ago; and mainly with respect to these points—First, as to our past and present liabilities; next, as to the causes of the great increase which has occurred in the expenditure during that period; and, lastly, as to the exact amount and incidence of our present system of taxation, absolutely and comparatively. With respect to the first point, I have had some considerable difficulty in ascertaining the exact extent of our liabilities on the first of July, 1873, partly for this reason, that those liabilities at that period consisted of two totally distinct classes; one being undetermined, and the other reasonably fixed and definite. On the first of July, 1873, we had not by any means definitely ascertained what would be the expense of working the railroad system, of which we had become, or were shortly about to become, possessed. We could not tell exactly what would be the cost of maintaining order in our North-West Territories, nor the ultimate expense of our Indian treaties. Since that time, we have ascertained those amounts with something like moderate precision. For the purpose of working our railroads a sum of about $750,000 will be required. For the purpose of maintaining order in the North-West Territories, $400,000 has been found to be necessary per annum; while the expenditure on our Indian Treaties, as the House is aware, will make necessary a sum of about $400,000 more.

MR. MITCHELL: Is that over and above the receipts?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: From Indian Treaties the receipts are nil.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

MR. MITCHELL: For railways?

MR. CARTWRIGHT: The probable loss on the working of railways is, as nearly as can be ascertained, $600,000 a year. I am now, however, speaking of the additions to the gross expenditure. To resume, however, apart from these sources of expenditure, we had other liabilities definitely fixed on July 1st, 1873, amounting very nearly to $131,000,000. For the construction of our canal system on the scale at that time contemplated, I find, upon reference to the Public Works Department, that, had those designs been carried out in their entirety, a sum of no less than $43,800,000 would have been required, including, of course, the whole system of the Welland, Lachine and St. Lawrence Canals, the deepening of the St. Lawrence itself, and the various canals in Nova Scotia, on the Ottawa River and in New Brunswick, which were at that time contemplated; for the completion of the Intercolonial Railway, $10,000,000; for the Pacific Railway, a sum of $30,000,000 was estimated by the then Minister of Finance; for debts maturing, the sum of $35,000,000; for the necessary expenditure on the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick portion of the Intercolonial Railway, the sum of $2,000,000; for the Prince Edward Island Railway and land grants, the sum of $2,500,000; and for a great variety of minor works, about $4,500,000; for improvements on the St. Lawrence below Montreal, $2,500,000; and for certain advances then contemplated $1,000,000, making in all a sum total, of what I may call liabilities capable of being ascertained, amounting to $131,300,000, all of which had, of necessity, to be provided for by new loans, although it was not all necessarily an addition to our net debt. Now, the House will see the magnitude of the task then imposed, by observing that this sum is as nearly as possible equal to the total net indebtedness of the entire Dominion, upon the 1st of July, 1877, and at least $23,000,000 more than the total net indebtedness on the 1st November, 1873; that it would require, at the rate of discount at which our loans of late have been made, seven successive loans of $20,000,000 each; and lastly, on the estimate submitted by the then Finance Minister, an addition to the interest paid by this country of $3,367,400 per annum. As regards our present liabilities upon 1st July, 1878, my estimate is as follows, taking into account only those works which it is really necessary to prosecute:—For the completion of the Welland and Lachine Canals, $5,500,000; to redeem debts which mature within a reasonable time, $13,500,000; for the purpose of completing necessary portions of the Pacific Railway, a sum of about $6,000,000 may be needed; for a variety of miscellaneous purposes, a sum of about $5,000,000, I think, would suffice, making in all a sum of about $30,000,000 for which I consider it still necessary to make provisions for by fresh loans. After 1881, although there still remains a very considerable amount of debt, which I should desire to reduce, it is to be noted that payment is optional, at the convenience of the borrowers. Coming, now, to the second point to which I desire to call the attention of the House, that is to say, to the causes of the great excess which occurred during this period, I find that the causes of the large excess which marks the year 1873-4 are chiefly due to the following additions to our annual expenditure:—In the first place, to the assumption of the Provincial debts, and the additional subsidy to New Brunswick, amounting to $820,000; in the next place to the additional charges incurred by the admission of Prince Edward Island, $500,000; to the first half-year's interest on Mr. Tilley's loan, $225,000; to the alteration in the mode of keeping the Post-Office accounts, which involved a nominal addition of $300,000; to that variety of increases in the salaries paid to the officials of the Government, amounting to a little over 300,000; to an increase of the expenditure on public works chargeable to income, $500,000; for the Mounted Police, $200,000; the expenses of the extra Session of that year, involving a sum of $200,000; for treaties, about $100,000, and for a considerable number of miscellaneous items, ranging collectively from $850,000 to $900,000; amounting in all to about

$4,000,000, which sufficiently accounts for the increase as between 1873-4 and 1872-3. As, however, at that time there was no doubt considerable difficulty in ascertaining exactly the result of the expenditure which had been incurred under the legislation I have referred to, it will probably interest the House to see how the expenditure for the current year would compare with the expenditure of the year 1872-3. I find that the chief causes of excess in the expenditure of these two years may be described as follows:—The Provincial debt and subsidy as before; Prince Edward Island, with the addition of the railroad and steam ferry, amounting to $820,000; the total interest of loan contracted in 1873, $445,000; the Post-Office increases as before; the increases of salary in Estimates $350,000; for the additional working expenses of the Intercolonial, $500,000, which was not necessary or incurred in 1872-3. The total interest of capital placed in the Public Works up to the end of 1877-8, represents an additional charge of $1,200,000; our Mounted Police, $330,000; and our Indian treaties are additional charge of probably $330,000 more; making a sum total of $5,100,000 of increase as between these years due to the respective items to which I have alluded. Without pausing further to discuss this point at present, I proceed to consider the amount of the absolute taxation now levied on the people of this country, and also the incidence of that taxation. Taking, in the first place, the ordinary standard per capita, the House will observe that on our present population of 4,000,000 of people, we expect to receive in the current year a gross revenue of $23,400,000, less about $250,000 interest accrued on capital since, 1872-3. They will also observe that of that amount $19,150,000 are expected to be derived from what may be called actual taxation, as compared with about $17,616,000 in 1872-3. It will be observed, therefore, that on our gross revenue for the years 1877-8, if it does not exceed the estimated amount our receipts per capita would amount, as nearly as possible, to $5.79 per head, as against $5.86½ in 1872-3; allowing for the nominal addition on account of the Post Office; while the sum actually paid in taxation will amount, if we receive all we expect to get, to $4.79 per head, as against $4.90 actually paid into the Treasury in 1872-3. Now, I am perfectly well aware that the per capita standard is only a very partial test of the actual incidence of taxation. It may doubtless happen—it often does happen—that the taxation may be so levied on a country as to take a very great deal more out of the pockets of the people, than ever finds its way into the public Treasury, and therefore the per capita test can only be looked upon as valuable, all other conditions being the same. We have only to look to the case of the United States to see how grievously a people may be burdened without any considerable portion of the amount of the taxes, levied from the people, coming into the National Treasury, and I will venture to say that, if we were induced to re-adjust our tariff in the direction of the policy pursued by the United States, we would soon experience in our persons how very large an amount of taxes the people of Canada might be called on to pay, without more than a fraction of the sum finding its way into our Treasury. I desire, while on this subject, to remove from the minds of hon. members a misapprehension which I believe exists as to the relative extent of taxation in the periods prior to and after 1873-4. It is quite true that as comparing the present time with the year 1872-3 there has been a considerable addition to the taxation of the people, although I will here pause to observe that undoubtedly the taxes that had been taken off, or their equivalents, ought to have been replaced as a matter of sound ordinary economy in 1872-3. But I beg to state that, if we compare the actual taxation which was levied on the people of Canada in any year from Confederation to 1872, it will be found that the so-called increase has been slight, if indeed it can be said to exist at all. Now, without pausing to take into consideration the effect of some temporary taxes such as the five per cent. addition which was made in 1870 or the so-called national policy of the succeeding year, if we take the actual amount of taxation collected from the people of Canada in 1870-71 or 1871-72, and compare that with the rates now levied, though there is no doubt an addition of two and one-half per cent. on the general list of articles imported into this country, and a considerable addition to the duties levied on whiskeys, brandies, tobaccos, and other such articles; yet, in comparing those two years, so great has been the reduction in the duties on tea and coal oil—both articles of general consumption—that I am inclined to think that the money actually taken out of the pockets of the people of Canada in the one year was quite as great as that now taken out under our apparently increased taxation. In the first place, the actual duties on tea which were levied in the year I have referred to, or from the period of Confederation upward, would have alone yielded a revenue of quite $1,500,000. Now there seems to be reasonable grounds for believing that the people of Canada profited from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000 by the abolition of the Excise duty, and the reduction of the other duties, on coal oil. Upon that, however, I do not insist; though it is obvious that, if you put the two sums together, they represent the total amount of the additional taxation (even if the imports continued at their original figure), which would have been obtained by the taxes I imposed. Neither do I wish to do more than merely glance at the fact that, in all probability, owing to the reduction in the value of articles imported into this country, even the sum we receive from the two and a half per cent. barely equals the amount which would have been collected had the fifteen per cent. been converted to a specific duty in 1874. But, taking the lowest amount—taking only $800,000, which we know positively to have been saved to the consumers of coal oil by the abolition of the Excise and Customs duty; adding that $1,500,000 which, under the old tariff, would have been collected on tea, it will be seen that the actual sum the people of Canada were paying on these two articles was $2,300,000 (although the whole of the latter sum did not come into our Treasury), whereas, admitting that we collected $3,300,000 from the duties imposed, it is clear that the additional taxation we are now obtaining from the people of this country would be at the outside barely $1,000,000 more than was levied in the whole period from Confederation to 1873-4, with the exception of the last year of that period. And it is worthy of the attention of the House that, whereas the new duties have undoubtedly chiefly affected articles of luxury, yet, as regards the two prime articles of necessity above named, the taxes have been very largely reduced indeed. If the House desires to compare our position with that of other countries, I think it will find that, although I cannot pretend to say that our present taxation is light per se, yet at any rate it is light as compared with other countries somewhat similarly circumstanced. Take first the case of the people of the United States, and, in doing this, I may observe that it will be quite impossible to institute any really valuable comparison unless, in doing so, we take into account, not merely the results of their tariff, but also the very great amount of municipal taxation levied in that country. It is well known to those who pay any attention to American affairs that the amount of municipal taxation in the United States has become so great as to constitute a very serious drain on the resources of that country. How great it is will be best understood from the following simple facts: A year or two ago the four great States of New York, Ohio, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, having a total population of 12,000,000, contributed for purposes of local taxation the sum of $151,000,000 a year; while, out of 131 cities whose returns have been published, we find that on a total population of 8,500,000, the taxes levied amount to no less than $112,000,000; and, in the case of the city of New York, with a total population of 1,249,000, and a valuation of $1,111,000,000, no less a sum than $31,000,000 per annum was levied for municipal purposes, being a sum quite equal, I believe, to the total taxation levied from the whole people of Canada. I have called attention to this point because I know there is serious danger lest we ourselves should suffer from this particular evil. No one can have looked carefully at the vast increase which has taken place, and is taking place, in the amount of our municipal taxation, particularly in towns and cities, without being aware that there is very considerable risk that the almost unlimited power for the purposes of direct taxation that has been granted to those bodies will be grievously abused. Sir, I trust it will be no offence to the representatives of the various cities of the Dominion if I say that city populations are especially unfitted to be entrusted with such very large powers. The country populations, so far as I know, do generally manage their affairs with great economy and discretion; but I am sorry to say that neither the experience of the people of the United States, nor our own experience in this country, would warrant us in bestowing any such powers on our civic municipalities at least. If I may be permitted, on a point which, though not under our control, is very closely connected with the question under discussion, to express my own individual opinion, I would say there is urgent need that the power granted to those municipalities should be rigidly restricted, and that I believe it will be found far truer in principle, and far more conducive to their real interests, if they were confined to taxing certain subjects strictly selected, instead of, as at present, permitting them to tax everything less a certain list of exceptions. I urge that restriction, not only in the interest of the property-holders, who are generally well enough able to take care of themselves, but more particularly in the interest of the poorer classes of the population. Always and everywhere when municipal extravagance has occurred, I think it will be found that the poorer classes are those on whom, in the long run, the chief part of the burden inevitably presses, and that they have to pay for the follies of their municipal governors in almost every conceivable way, but notably in bad air, bad light, bad water, bad lodging and increased dearness, not only of food, but of every necessary they require. No one can read the history as revealed by the reports of the State Commissioners and State Courts of the great mismanagement which existed for many years in the city of New York under the Tammany Ring, and the report of the Board of Sanitary Commissioners for the city of New York, without perceiving that the consequences of that civic mismanagement have been directly visited on large portions of their population. I was not aware myself, until I had the opportunity of perusing that report, that, in the city of New York at this moment, the number of people to the square mile is said to be very nearly double that which exists in the most crowded localities of east London, the population in New York being stated to be as nearly as possible 290,000 to the square mile in certain localities as against 179,000, which was the greatest density attained in the city of London. I need not point out to those gentlemen who have visited personally these regions of large cities, what an amount of misery is contained in that simple statement. I would only say that, although there are no doubt particular circumstances in the case of New York, which have brought about that unfortunate result, yet I believe two chief causes will be found in the fiscal policy, or rather in the fiscal impolicy of the United States, and in the grievous mismanagement which has so long disgraced the civic Government of that city. Although it is true that this matter is not directly within our province as a Legislature, yet no consideration of the question of taxation in Canada, or the United States can be held complete without ascertaining the amount of the municipal taxation laid on the people; and, moreover, I believe that it has become time for us in our individual capacities, at all events, to exert ourselves to see that the requisite remedies be applied here, if we would avoid the same mischiefs which have undoubtedly seriously affected the resources of the United States. Sir, I am not going to make any precise estimate as to the effect of the United States tariff. That is a point upon which, I can well understand, many different opinions will be expressed, but allow me briefly to say that it is, at least, three-fold our tariff, and that the revenue certainly did not show any greater receipts per head from Customs duties under its operation, and that I believe that Mr. David Wells, no mean authority on that subject, is within the mark in asserting, as he has done, that the people of the United States are annually paying $400,000,000 or $500,000,000 in taxes under the operation of that tariff, of which scarcely one-third finds its way into the public coffers. I have had difficulty in ascertaining, with sufficient accuracy, at what amount our own local taxation might fairly be put down, but I have succeeded in ascertaining the taxation paid in the Province of Ontario, which appears to amount to $5,500,000, and I think that, even allowing for the taxes imposed by local Assemblies in other Provinces, I shall not be far astray if I put down the local taxation of the rest of the Dominion at a sum not exceeding that amount. In doing this, it will be observed that no account is taken of the receipts from Crown Lands, or for the sums paid by the Dominion Government in the way of subsidy. But, if that computation can be allowed, and I think, without wearying the House with details, it will be found sufficiently accurate for practical purposes, you will have this result, that the taxation for all purposes of the people of the Dominion of Canada, is probably barely one-third of the taxation inflicted on the people of the United States under the operation of their municipal system, and of their tariff, and in any case is barely one-half of the sum which we know to be paid by them in hard cash; while, as compared with the British Islands, which have a present estimated population of about thirty-three millions, who pay, in what are known as the Queen's taxes, about £66,000,000 sterling, our taxation may be fairly computed as barely one-half. And, although it is doubtless true that the wealth of the people of Great Britain is vastly greater than ours, and although their power of raising money by way of loan far exceeds ours, still it ought to be borne in mind that the distribution of property in Canada is very much better than it is in that country, and therefore that the power of our population to bear a fair amount to taxation without serious inconvenience is probably quite as great as that of the people of Great Britain. I think, too, that even in these hard times I am justified in saying that, with the exception perhaps of some portions of our large cities, there is no district of Canada at the present time in which there is any serious risk of any considerable portion of the people being stinted in the absolute necessities of life, and, therefore, I am justified in saying that, although our taxation is rather heavier per se than I would desire to see it, yet that, on comparing it with that imposed in other countries somewhat similarly circumstanced, it may fairly be described as endurable, and even, by comparison, as light. Now, under these circumstances, it may not unnaturally be asked by some members of this House whether it would not be advisable, in view of the fact that we have now had for two years considerable deficits, to adopt such precautions as would render the existence of another deficit practically impossible. Well, Sir, I would say at once that, if we possessed in Canada any tax equivalent to the income tax now in use in England, I would not hesitate to advise the House to have recourse to that means of increasing the revenue, that being a tax which can be raised or lowered with a minimum of disturbance to the commercial interests of the country. But, as the matter stands, I feel it is important to call the attention of the House and the country to the fact that, although we have had, unfortunately, two successive deficits in the last two years, still it is equally true that a very large proportion of those deficits has been composed of the sum annually devoted to the Sinking Fund, which, I think, the House will agree, makes an important difference in considering the situation. In these two years our total deficits have amounted to $3,361,000; but of that sum no less than $1,650,000 has been invested in the reduction of our debt, and the consequence is that the net increase of our indebtedness in those two years is, not $3,361,000, but barely $1,700,000 all told. Apart from this, I think, that the combination of adverse circumstances which sunk our revenue to the extremely low figure of $22,000,000, is one which is not likely to recur; and indeed, that there are reasons for expecting a moderate and steady increase. Under any circumstances, in this country, while the population continues to grow as we know that it is growing, while we continue, from year to year, to add a very considerable amount of virgin territory to the area of arable land, I think there is always ground for expecting, from that source alone, a considerable augmentation of our revenue. Now, so far as it is possible to ascertain a matter of this kind, I am inclined to believe that, one year with another, from 500,000 to 1,000,000 acres of new land are almost always brought into cultivation in this country—an amount which, extending over a period of six or seven years, will, undoubtedly, secure a considerable permanent augmentation to the products of the Dominion. Moreover, the fact is not to be lost sight of, that the great advantages of our position, and in some respects of our climate, are beginning to assert themselves; while, as everybody knows, the enormous improvements which have, of late years, been made in the transportation of freights have reduced the cost of transporting our products from one side of the Atlantic to the other to so low a figure that there appears good ground for expecting a very large and steady advance in our trade in that direction. I believe that I am strictly accurate, in saying that, at this present time, almost every one of the more valuable products of the farm can be transported from the furthest point of Ontario east of Lake Superior, to the city of London, at a cost varying from one farthing to one half-penny sterling per lb. Although it may be, and I daresay is, true that at present a very considerable proportion of the profits is intercepted by the various middlemen engaged in that transportation, still, if that rate of freight can be maintained, and I see no reason why it should not be, it must be obvious to every hon. gentleman that an almost unlimited field is open to the enterprise of our agricultural population, of which there are many cheering signs that they are heartily disposed to avail themselves. It is true, on the other hand, that it is impossible for us, a small people of about four millions of souls, placed along our entire frontier in direct contiguity to the American nation, not to be seriously affected by the fiscal policy they have chosen to pursue. I have never maintained that the Dominion of Canada was not mischievously affected by the policy of the Americans, but at the same time I say not only that I do not see in their folly any reason for imitating them, but that I believe they themselves are beginning to admit that they have made a very grave and serious error, and that there is a very strong disposition to retrieve the mistakes they have committed, and, further, that they have become convinced, as far as Canada is concerned, that their policy has resulted only in driving us to seek other markets, and in depriving themselves of the middlemen's profits they would otherwise have enjoyed. No doubt we have sustained a very grave direct loss from the fact that the United States were formerly one of our very best customers, and that it is impossible for forty-four millions of our best customers to be suffering from prolonged depression without seriously embarrassing a large number of ourselves. It is well known that, wholly apart from the direct loss, we have also sustained serious indirect losses—as, for example, the loss of the profits many of our banks were in the habit of deriving from American trade, and what is perhaps as serious an item, the loss of the large purchases at one time made in Canada by American travellers. There is, in addition to these considerations, one other of considerable moment which I desire to present to the House. There can be no doubt, Sir, that the very serious disproportion which exists between the fixed charges on our revenue and the sum which remains really under our control has become a matter requiring very grave consideration indeed. Out of a total nominal expenditure, in round numbers, of $23,500,000, no less than $11,500,000 is devoted to payment of interest, Sinking Fund, and subsidies to the Provinces, and must be regarded as absolutely a first mortgage. Of the remainder, about $5,500,000 for charges on Revenue must either be regarded as cross-entries, which cannot be removed from one side without blotting them out on the other, or as being to all intents and purposes a practical mortgage also. It will be obvious that the balance of about $7,000,000 which remains at our disposal is not only a very small field in which to exercise any great economy, but is barely sufficient for the purposes we expect it to discharge. At present, even after the various services have been cut down to the lowest point consistent with economy, I see no reasonable ground for expecting that we shall be able to reduce the expenditure on Justice and Penitentiaries below $1,000,000 per annum, or that of Militia and Maintenance of the North-West Police below a like amount or that much less than $1,000,000 can be voted for Public Works, while at least an equal sum is required for Fisheries, Lighthouse and Coast Services and other similar matters. For the service of our Indians a sum of nearly $500,000 is wanted, nor can the Immigration service if maintained at all, be conducted for much less than $250,000 annually, including Quarantine. For Miscellaneous Expenditures about $250,000 is required; making a total of about $3,000,000 out of $6,750,000, which cannot well be reduced, and leaving, for Legislation, Civil Government, Pensions and Superannuation, a sum of $1,750,000 in which possibly some reduction might be effected. I do not say that further economy is absolutely impossible, nor that further taxation might not be borne, but I do say that to push economy further, unless indeed we submit to very important alterations in our present constitutional system, would be both difficult and of doubtful expediency; while increased taxation, if carried to any considerable extent, might defeat its own object, not only by stopping the growth of this country, but also by the well-known fact that, if you raise the taxes above a certain point, you are always sure to defeat yourselves either by diminishing consumption or by encouraging smuggling as we have more than once discovered to our cost. All things considered, therefore, I am disposed to advise that we should delay the consideration of the question whether it is desirable to impose any further taxes on the people or not, and I do this for these several reasons—first, because, in spite of all that is asserted to the contrary, it appears to me that there are signs of improvement in the general revenue, and the general condition of this country; in the next place, because I believe that the receipts for the year 1876-7 were decidedly below the ordinary average; because the deficit, being largely composed of the Sinking Fund, is not nearly so formidable as may appear at first sight; because a very considerable portion of the outlay which we are annually incurring, although properly chargeable to the Consolidated Fund is made for objects which may fairly be regarded as approaching the character of expenditure on capital account; because the liabilities, which it is absolutely necessary for us to meet, have been vastly reduced; and because (which is perhaps even more to the purpose) the issue which is about to be presented to the country by the two political parties of the day would involve, if decided against us, so great and so radical a change in our whole fiscal system and our mode of collecting the revenue, that I desire that the voice of the people should be heard on this question. Now, without desiring to stir up unnecessary controversy, I think, Sir, it is as well that the House should understand clearly and distinctly what that issue is, and how violently our policy and that of the hon. gentlemen opposite is contrasted in this matter. I find that the hon. leader of the Opposition a very few months ago, in descending upon this question, made use of the following words:

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

“Gentlemen, you know that Canada from east to west lies within the same degrees of latitude, and does not produce a great variety of crops. From the Atlantic to the Pacific the country is subject to the same climatic influences; but the United States, extending from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, possesses a variety of climates. In Canada, however, if by an unfavourable season the crops are scanty, we are without such resources, and then the farmers of the United States pour in their produce upon us, and we are defenceless. You (the farmers), who in an ungenial season might get some recompense for scanty crops in the enhanced prices they would bring, find that hope gone from you. Even the little harvest the storms have left you, you find valueless when the products of the Western States are poured into the markets of the Dominion. Shall we suffer in this way? Shall we not say, Canada is for the Canadians, and protect our markets for ourselves? Shall we not say, if we have a short crop our own people shall consume it, and pay us a fair price for it; and if we have a large crop, let us not only have our own markets, but the distant markets of Europe, and let us say to the United States—‘We allow you to send the products of your country into our markets, let us have the same privilege, and send ours to your own.’”

That is the policy of the Opposition; that is the policy which my hon. friends are going to fight to the death. Let us trust that it will not be to the death of any unhappy wretches who may be expected to make good the deficiency of the crops. Now, it is desirable to point out that the doctrines avowed in this speech have been endorsed within a very short period by, at any rate, the Ontario representatives of that party, as I find at a very recent conference certain resolutions were published as indicating the programme of the Opposition in Ontario on that question, which read as follows:—

“1. We are satisfied that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a national policy, which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, and the manufacturing interests of the Dominion;

“2. But no such readjustment will be satisfactory to the interests affected or to the country if adopted as a provisional measure only, to meet a temporary exigency or to supply a temporary deficit, nor unless it is made to be carried out as a national policy, and until reciprocal trade is established with our neighbours, Canada should move in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs so far as her various interests may demand;

“3. That it is the duty of the people of Canada to force upon the attention of the Government and Parliament of the Dominion the necessity of carrying out their views, and to withhold or withdraw their confidence from any Government who may fail from want of will or want of ability to enforce them by legislative enactment.”

Now my object at present is neither to comment on that remarkable speech, nor on those remarkable resolutions; but to draw your attention to the fact that they involve an absolute contradiction of the policy laid down by this Government. The position taken up by the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition, is, as I understand it, this—that it is in the power of the Government to increase the collective wealth of the country by increasing the taxation, and that they can enrich the community collectively by taking money out of their pockets. It may be so. On the other side, our position, equally clear, equally well-defined, for which we are at least equally willing to fight to the death, and which we are determined, so far as we can, to carry out, is this, that all taxation, however disguised, is a loss per se, that it is the duty, and the sacred duty of the Government to take only from the people what is necessary to the proper discharge of the public service; and that taxation in any other mode is simply, in one shape or other, legalized robbery. No doubt, Sir, there is this misfortune in our present position—we are debarred, so long as our revenue continues in its present state from attempting many things which I shall be glad to see attempted. There are valuable improvements which the Government are not able at present to consider. There are valuable suggestions made from time to time, which we would desire, if our circumstances permitted, to carry into effect. We are obliged, no doubt, to abstain from doing these things, but, when we are told, after having had to contend with the difficulties we have met with, that we are wrong for not attempting to do more, I must venture to enter a protest against such censure. Sir, to condemn us in the present state of our finances, because we are unable to undertake new enterprises, is as unreasonable as if the passengers were to rise in mutiny against the captain and crew because they were unable to make progress to port while obliged to lie to in a storm. Now, Sir, the year which has just closed is remarkable for another reason; it completes, as the House knows, the first decade which has elapsed since Confederation, and it may not be altogether amiss for us to spend a few moments in reviewing, generally, the financial history of that period. Looking back to 1867 and looking at our condition at present, I think that all persons will admit that two things are pretty clear. One, that the resources of the Provinces originally confederated were ample to enable them to carry out all that was then undertaken, and perhaps even to engage in considerable additional enterprise. But another thing appears to me equally clear, that we have unfortunately attempted too much and thereby seriously imperilled the existence of our young community, when we undertook risks which no country in our situation ought to have undertaken, and that the consequence has been an increased expenditure so startling and rapid that it may well cause the most inconsiderate amongst us to reflect. Taking a starting point in 1867, we find that, whereas the total outlay amounted in that year to barely $13,500,000, in the course of ten years it has swollen to $23,500,000, being as nearly as possible an increase in the period of $10,000,000; and, what is more important, after making provision for the increased liabilities thrown upon us, we are unable to see any reasonable prospect of reducing it below that limit. It will not by any means be idle for me to point out to the House the main items which have caused that increase from the date of Confederation. In the first place, I find that the interest on the capital expended in constructing the Intercolonial Railway and the expenses of running it appear to represent no less a sum than $2,400,000 of that increase. I find that our total expenditure for the North-West, including Indian Treaties, Mounted Police, and also the interest on the purchase of the Territory—amounted to about $1,000,000 per annum. The interest on the sum expended for the Pacific Railway, and also the charges on account of British Columbia, amount to $1,000,000 more. The interest on the other public works represents a further sum of $1,000,000, while the assumption of Provincial debts, and admission of Prince Edward Island represent $1,640,000. These five items, it will be observed, represent nearly the whole of the increase. Now, allowing for all the receipts which have been obtained, this represents a dead loss, so to speak, of about $5,000,000 per annum, which, if capitalised, would represent an increase to our gross indebtedness of $110,000,000. Of the balance of the increase, no doubt, a certain portion may be fairly set down as a cross entry, which should appear on both sides of our account; and a certain other portion is due to a considerable increase of population since that period; while the remainder is made up of a number of miscellaneous items, to which I shall not now call the attention of the House. Looking at our situation generally, I think we may fairly say that the expenditure has at last been brought within some bounds, and, after allowing for increased population and the increased progress of the country, there is reason to think that the per capita expenditure need not be much increased; still, it is equally clear that our task at this moment is one of a thankless character. Our position presents certain very peculiar features; and, although our absolute taxation, per capita, is probably less than it was, and although the incidence of that taxation is much the same—at any rate has not appreciably increased—and although the general mass of our liabilities is vastly less than a few years ago, I must frankly admit that a very excellent financial position has been flung away; that the margin in which to exercise economy is exceedingly narrow; that the power of imposing fresh taxation is limited within comparatively narrow bounds; that economy has been pushed to the very verge, unless, as I said, we agree to some considerable alteration of our system. And I must also admit that the danger to our future position from any considerable imprudence would be very grave indeed. Now, Sir, as to the question of largely increased taxation, it ought not, I think, to be forgotten by the House, that, in our position, there are serious dangers incident to any largely increased measure of taxation. In the first place, I think it will be found that, unless taxation is imposed for strictly revenue purposes, there will be considerable danger of quarrelling among ourselves. There is no doubt that, in this Confederation, apparent the interests of some portions of the people may appear to diverge, and, if it were seen that the Parliament of Canada was wantonly sacrificing the interests of any portion of the population, I need scarcely point out that it would give rise to serious dissatisfaction. I may also add, that I do not think it wise on political grounds to assimilate our system to that of the United States, even if there were no other objection. I believe that any large measure of taxation would grievously impede true industrial progress, and would have a tendency to divert the people from more productive to less productive occupations. Then there is no doubt that the effect of an increased tariff would grievously demoralize the mercantile community, and probably would lead to extensive smuggling among large numbers of our own people. On the whole, I may say that the general results of the last few years have been fairly good. A large mass of public works have been prosecuted to completion, or are within a short period of completion; a very considerable portion of debt has been refunded, and the expenditure which has hitherto increased by vast and rapid strides, has been brought, let us hope, at last to a halt. Relatively to the increased population, I may add, our expenditure has been considerably decreased. If the House were to deduct from the expenditure of last year the sum accrued on interest-bearing and permanent investments, and also receipts from railways, not heretofore in operation, it would appear that whereas, in 1873-4 with a population of 3,750,000, we were obliged to expend $23,316,000, our present expenditure, deducting these items which do not add to our taxation in the proper sense of the term, cannot be considered as much over $22,500,000; in other words, when measured per capita, our present expenditure is only $5.62 as contrasted with $6.22 in 1873-4 and, therefore, relatively to our population and making those deductions which I think it would be only reasonable to make, that the affairs of Government conducted proportionately, are now being something like $2,000,000 per annum cheaper than they were in the year last named. I repeat, therefore, that in such case it appears to me to be our wisest policy to adhere strictly to a revenue tariff, and to advance steadily, but cautiously, with those important Public Works which cannot be delayed without grave public injury; also to fulfil, so far as we can, all the engagements we have entered into—on this proviso, however, that those engagements most not be allowed to imperil our general position, or to endanger the whole future of the whole population of this country. I do not pretend to say that all risks are past; but I think that I am justified in saying that the risks, at any rate, have been very considerably lessened. I do not look for any sudden expansion; I can hardly say that I desire any very sudden expansion; but I do believe that we may fairly count on a steady and gradual progress, such as we know by past experience has rarely failed to exist in Canada, even under circumstances quite as disadvantageous as those with which we are now confronted. Such, Mr. Speaker, are, as far as I understand them, the questions now before the country. It will be for the country to decide what particular fiscal policy it may please to adopt and it will be for this House, or for their successors, to say whether—

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT: Or for their successors to decide how that particular policy shall be enforced. I would, however, remind the House, and remind the country too, that a very great deal will depend, undoubtedly, on their action now. Our power of refunding our debt, and of thereby diminishing our annual expenditure, will be largely governed by the opinion that foreign capitalists may entertain as to the prudence and economy with which the affairs of this country are being managed. There appear to me to be two courses open: one, the course which I have indicated above, and which the Government intends to pursue; and there is the other course which I would fain hope we will not see adopted,—the course of indulging again in foolish enterprise, the course of again indulging in engagements of which we have not counted the cost, and the course of imposing an undue amount of taxation, in the vain hope that we will thereby be able to give a false stimulus to the present depressed condition of the country. Now, I think that no hon. gentleman who has either attended to my remarks or who has been at the pains to make himself fairly well acquainted with the general position of this country during the past few years, will be disposed to dispute my statement when I say that our position in 1874 was, as we can now see, of a very perilous character, and that, whatever dangers may await us, they are, at any rate, very greatly less than those which we had to encounter then. Sir, at that time, it was well known that the inflation had been considerable; it was well known that a reaction was inevitable; we could not measure its extent—we could not tell how far it would go—but I do not believe that there was one merchant, one manufacturer, or one individual of any ordinary prudence engaged in ordinary commercial transactions in Canada, who did not feel that the expansion had been beyond all reasonable limits, and that there was very considerable danger of a reaction; and I venture to say that, if there had been any delay on the part of the Government in imposing in 1874 the requisite amount of taxation, or if there had been any failure in floating the successive loans which we were obliged to place upon the English market, our position would have been very dangerous indeed. I may invite the attention of the House to the fact that it is rarely that any Government has been called upon to deal with such a convergence of risks, occurring simultaneously, as we had. We had at one and the same moment to face the injury to our credit, necessarily arising from considerable deficits; we had to provide large sums for carrying on important public works in many quarters of this Dominion; and we had to provide for large amounts of debt maturing, which it was absolutely necessary for us to pay. We had to do all that, at a time when, in addition to the special depression which existed in Canada, a great and universal commercial depression had overspread almost the whole world; at a time of grave political disturbances, a time when, for certain reasons, there was a great and unusual distrust of foreign loans, and I may say an aversion to deal with any not previously introduced form of security. Now, Sir, although it is true that we have escaped—although we did succeed in maintaining our credit—although we did succeed in negotiating our loans—still, I am bound to tell the House that our escape was a narrow one; and the House will understand that I have good reasons when I say that I dread rashly entering into any new engagements. Sir, we have had two warnings, which ought to have sufficed, I think, for any people. How it may have been with my friends in the Maritime Provinces I do not know; but I do know that the people of Ontario and Quebec, at any rate, ought to have remembered better than they appear to have done the very grave warning which they should have learnt from the events of 1854 to 1857, and the subsequent depression which ensued. Every one who had studied the commercial history of this country knew that the period of extreme expansion which occurred then was followed by a corresponding period of very prolonged depression, as, indeed, might naturally have been looked for. Almost identically the same results, arising from causes of a very similar character, prevailed between 1870 and 1873; and, although I think we will, on the whole, escape better than we did at that time, I should not be doing my duty here if I did not call attention to the fact that we entirely neglected our former warning, and endeavour as far as in my power lies, to impress on the House and on the country the necessity of being more cautious in the future. I hold that we committed the very common error of grasping at far too much; a pardonable error, perhaps, but none the less a grave error, particularly in a country circumstanced like ours. I would have us recognize and redeem that error, not by idle murmurs at the past, but by submitting as patiently as we may, to the needful and necessary privations which must always follow the reaction from such an extreme expansion. If we are only moderately prudent, I believe that a very short time will see the end of it. I believe that we possess, after all deductions made, in our great western country, a country which, when developed, will tend to add very largely to our national resources. I am willing for one to incur considerable risk; I am even willing to submit to considerable privation for the sake of developing that magnificent heritage. At present, as far as I can see, we still—although the worst of the storm is past—are on the ground swell which remains after it. At present, so far as I am able to understand the situation—although it is perfectly true, a very considerable amount of depression prevails in commercial circles—I do not think the main interests of the country, with the exception of the important interest of lumber, are at all in as depressed a state as it would apparently please some gentlemen in this House to suppose. In all these cases, I think we may lay it down as an invariable consequence that the effect will almost of necessity outlast the cause. Just as in former years the spirit of extravagance which had got possession of our people, and which led them to import vastly more goods than they required, continued to exercise a powerful effect in stimulating consumption, even after the prosperity had departed, I think now the counteracting influence is having its effect, though the cause is beginning to pass away. If, Sir, any excuses were to be made for the expenditure to which I have alluded, I think they might be fairly found in this, that the whole community appeared, to some extent, to have gone mad together. Nobody can look at the enormous expansions which took place in the years I refer to; no one can look at the speculations of every kind and sort which were entered into; without seeing that we had necessarily prepared for ourselves a period of very considerable depression. Unfortunately that madness had become so universal that—as we know to our cost in many portions of the country—while those who deserve to be weeded out have been weeded out the loss falls, at present almost more heavily on prudent and cautious men, who had managed their affairs well, and who have been brought into difficulties, not by their own fault, but in consequence of the insane competition to which they were exposed on the part of persons who ought never to have been entrusted with credit or capital at all. I have no doubt that a great many men of substance are paying in purse and person for the undue facilities with which credit and capital have been obtained by men of straw, and that is, in my opinion, one great cause of the commercial difficulties under which we now labour. I desire to be clearly understood. I do not at all pretend that the present Government have been faultless in their conduct during the last four years. I do not at all pretend to say that they have committed no errors or that their conduct of affairs has been absolutely free from blunders. I do not mean to say that no expenditure has been incurred which could have been avoided. To make such a boast would be to expose myself to the jeers of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not claim that we have been infallible, and far less would I say that they have been infallible. But what I do assert is that, as the Public Accounts show, reasonable diligence, care and prudence have been displayed by this Government. I assert that, taking into account the difficulties with which we have had to contend, those difficulties have been, on the whole, well and fairly met. I say our perseverance in the policy which we chalked out is gradually extricating us from those difficulties—difficulties not of our own making—but difficulties with which we have had to contend from the very outset. I say, too, that that has been done with probably as little hardship to the people of Canada as could possibly be inflicted on them. Their taxes have not been unduly increased, and all reasonable efforts have been made to lighten the burden upon them, so far as it could be done by a re-distribution of taxes. I say, too, that that has been done without having had recourse to any hazardous experiments of any kind whatever. I say that our credit has been maintained, and more than maintained. I say that the rate of interest on our debts has been considerably reduced, that the expenditure, which had increased at the rate of ten millions in seven years, has at last been kept stationary, and that, relatively to our population, and still more, relatively to the services we have been obliged to discharge, it has been very considerably reduced. I say that, under all these circumstances, great works have been carried on, and that those works have been carried on for the first time, I believe, in the history of our country, in such a way that they have not exceeded the estimates originally prepared; and therefore it is, Sir, that in moving that you do now leave the Chair, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of Supply, I venture to say that the record I have submitted on the Public Accounts, is a record of which this Government and their supporters in this House, or in the country have no need to be ashamed.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

MR. CARTWRIGHT.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MR. TUPPER: Mr. Speaker. I believe the hon. the Minister of Finance, in resuming his seat, at all events may feel assured that he has the sympathy of every hon. member on both sides of the House. I can say that he has excited my sympathy in a very lively degree, because I have rarely witnessed any gentleman placed in a more painful and distressing position than the hon. gentleman was on the present occasion. I had long looked forward to this opportunity to deal with some of the statements which that hon. gentleman thought fit to make during the recess of Parliament at various places in the Province of Ontario, but I confess that I am not inclined to adopt that course during the present debate. I feel that we are brought face to face with a question so important in regard to the condition of the country that I should not be discharging my duty to the House and the country if I were to allow any personal, political or party considerations to enter into a discussion of this kind on the present occasion. I confess I was a good deal surprised to find the hon. gentleman laying claim, in the commencement of his speech, to his prophetic accuracy. He reminded the House of the time when, sitting on the Opposition benches, he had indulged in certain gloomy forebodings that never came to pass; that, year after year, when the hon. gentleman predicted disaster, the Government of the day were ready to meet Parliament with evidences, not of disaster which the hon. gentleman had predicted, but with a condition of public affairs which that hon. gentleman, during the time he has held the high office he now fills, has never had the pleasure of presenting to the House. I think the hon. gentleman's recollection of his own Budget speeches ought to be sufficient, if there were nothing else, to prevent him from asking the consideration of the House to the accuracy of his prophecies, or the fulfilment of those which he had ventured to make. I hold in my hand a speech of the hon. gentleman, on the first occasion on which he brought down the Budget to the House, and I find that he told us that, if we would give him three millions of additional taxation, for which he asked the House, it would suffice for all necessities. He was at that time fully possessed of information in regard to all the liabilities that rested on the Government and on the country, and yet he used the following language:—

“As far as it is possible to form a calculation, I am in hopes, if a sufficient amount of taxation is now laid on to meet the present gross annual expenditure, that in view of the gradual growth of the country—though I do not believe it will be to the same extent as we have hitherto seen—we may be able not only to meet the requirements of the current year with a small margin over, but to dispense with the necessity for additional taxation for a considerable period, perhaps altogether.”

The House, very generously, gave the hon. gentleman all he asked. It voted the additional taxation which he proposed, and hon. members were gratified to learn from one of his colleagues at an early day subsequently that that taxation was levied for the purpose of providing for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The latter liability, under the scheme proposed by the late Government and the policy to which they were pledged, and by which they were bound, was proposed to be covered by an annual expenditure of $1,500,000. The House was glad to learn, when it had given the $3,000,000 to the hon. the Finance Minister, that it was sufficient to meet all the necessities of the future, and prevent him from coming back to ask for any additional taxation. Hon. gentlemen will feel that, with that statement on record, he occupies a very untenable position to claim the confidence of the House, in regard either to any predictions made in the past or any calculations he may make in the future. I may direct the attention of the House, also, to the statement he made in the following year. In the second Budget speech he delivered, he again ventured on the dangerous ground of prophecy. He said, with regard to the statement made by himself, that, if the House would consent to grant the supplies for which he asked, he did not think they would require any additional taxation—I will read his remarks on that point.

“I may, however, take this opportunity of stating briefly that so far as we can now judge, I have no reason to believe that the estimates of the probable receipts for 1875 will fall short.” Again, as will be seen by reference to the Budget speech of 1875, page 19, the hon. the Finance Minister said:

“I think we may fairly congratulate ourselves that our financial position has materially improved since last year. All immediate demands (which were considerable) have been fully met; there are no pressing claims upon us with the exception of those for Public Works, for at least a year or two; we have a reasonable surplus on the transactions of last year; and I have every reason to believe we shall also have a reasonable surplus on those of the current year.”

The House will at once perceive that, so far from the hon. gentleman then believing, as he now leads the House to suppose he believed, that he had anticipated at the time the extent of the depression, he led the House to believe then (February, 1875) that he entertained the hope and opinion that the $3,000,000 would more than amply meet the necessities of the country, and that it would furnish him with a very considerable surplus to deal with as occasion might require. The House must have been surprised when they found the hon. gentleman in 1876 coming down with the confession that, instead of having the surplus which he had promised the House, he had to confess that he had a deficit amounting to $1,901,000 to meet. In his last Budget speech there was no necessity to tax the prophetic powers of the hon. gentleman to any very great extent, because he was then dealing with the financial position of the country for the current year, with all the evidence that the experience of years in the high position which the hon. gentleman occupied gave him, and with all the means of judging of the commercial condition of the country, available to any one accustomed to feel the public pulse and watch the fluctuations of commerce. In that Budget speech the hon. gentleman, on pages 2 and 3, said :

“Our expenditure has touched the maximum point, which, so far as we can judge, it is likely to touch for a considerable time to come ; and on the other hand, our income has been reduced to a very low point—I would fain hope to the lowest point it is ever likely to reach. However that may be, the net result is this, that, whereas our expenditure during the year amounted to no less than $24,488,000 in round numbers, our total receipts fell to about $22,587,000, being a total deficit of no less than $1,901,000.”

The hon. gentleman stated, however, that it was due to the extraordinary and abnormal expenditures, and he pointed out what some of these expenditures were, and he referred to this matter as follows :—

“Had there not been an unusual and extraordinary deficiency in the harvest throughout many portions of the country, the calculations on which the Estimates last year were based would have been completely verified, and not only would the deficit have been greatly reduced, but I have no manner of doubt that I would have been able to state to the House, it would have been absolutely extinguished by the end of the current financial year without further exertion on our part.”

The hon. gentleman, however, found that, from these causes, exceptional and extraordinary as they were, he had reached a deficit of $1,901,000, and he again asked the House to submit to the not very agreeable process of imposing further taxation. The hon. gentleman obtained the taxes for which he asked. He asked for some $500,000 of additional taxation, and he stated to the House that his last deficit was due to abnormal expenditure, which would not occur again, and that all was to be made serene by giving him $500,000 of additional taxation. Well, the House is always anxious to meet the necessities of gentlemen in his position, and accordingly it granted him readily—too readily, I think—the additional taxation which the hon. gentleman asked. But, Sir, it did it with the assurance that this was to be the end of the taxation he was likely to require, and, in fact, upon the assurance that if it were granted, no further demands would be made upon the country. If this statement had been well founded, the hon. gentleman would not now be in the position of having to bring down a Budget showing a deficit instead of a surplus. But, what is the result, Sir ? Why, it is found that the hon. gentleman has discovered a still lower deep than that into which he had sunk before ; and, notwithstanding his additional taxation, we have now another deficit amounting in round numbers to one and a-half millions of dollars, or to $1,460,000, at the close of the last financial year, on the 1st of July last. The hon. gentleman said, a year ago, to use his own words :

MR. TUPPER.

“To put the matter briefly, the net result is this : The revenue has certainly gained a considerable sum, probably between $400,000 and $500,000, a sum which, I think, represents sufficient to make good any deficiency that is likely to arise next year, even though the imports remain at the present low figure.”

I draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to this matter, because I feel, Sir, that, with these evidences in the financial statements, with these evidences in the Budget speeches which the hon. gentleman has favoured us with from year to year, the last claim he should now make upon the credulity of this House is to give him credit for his prophetic knowledge, however great his financial knowledge may be. Well, Sir, he ended that speech with the following sentence :—

“Sir, I believe that we are drawing moderately close to clear water, and if it is impossible, as no doubt it is not possible, for us to escape from the position in which we found ourselves without more or less of peril, the damage we have sustained, all things considered, has been very much less than might have been expected, and I hope with some degree of confidence that on the next occasion on which I may be called upon to address this House, I may be able to congratulate it upon seeing the deficit which now exists entirely extinguished, and our Treasury once more restored to the state in which some years ago it was happily maintained.”

Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman shows at the close of this year that we have had deficits for two years, notwithstanding the three and a-half millions of additional taxation which he asked from the House and which he received on the assurance that we were not to be placed in so very unfortunate a position again, and the hon. gentleman is obliged to confess as he has done to-night that he has had $3,361,000 of deficits in two years, and that, in fact, we have had added to the debt of this country over and above all the revenue that the country has afforded him,—three and a half millions—$3,360,000. Well, Sir, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to another fact. It is true that the tone of the hon. gentleman's address to-night was very different from that which the House has been accustomed to listen to—it was very different from the tone of his speech last year, and was in still greater contrast with that of the year before, but, Sir, he does not, I am afraid, appreciate, as far as I can gather from the language he used in his address to the House to-night, the gravity of the situation, and perhaps there are no means by which I can impress on the hon. gentleman the gravity of the position to which he has brought the financial affairs of this country more than by quoting to that hon. gentleman the highest authority he recognizes, and that is, his own. He drew the attention of the House on the 16th February, 1875, to the great importance of the great services he had performed for this country by avoiding a deficit. He drew the attention of the House to the enormous disaster it would be to Canada if a deficit should present itself. He pointed out the fact that we were a borrowing country; that we were carrying on large public works; that the progress and advancement of our country depended upon our ability to obtain money from abroad, and that it was important that, as a borrowing country, the credit of the Dominion should be maintained, and he justified himself for having brought forward a project to tax the people of this country three millions of dollars per annum of additional taxation, on the ground that it was necessary in order to prevent a deficit. The hon. gentleman's words were as follows:—

“Had there been no additional taxation there would have been a clear deficit in 1874 of one and a quarter millions, and in 1875 probably of two millions, and in consequence we would have lost control of the market, and the scenes would have again been repeated—scenes which the people of this country had not forgotten—which we witnessed in 1866, when Sir A. T. Galt was obliged to inform the House that he was forced to borrow money on Canadian bonds at the rate of eight per cent. per annum. He would ask the House if they had forgotten that in 1866-7, our Five per cents. now quoted at 106 and 107, had run down to a ruinous figure. He had only to say to hon. gentlemen that if they desired to see those scenes renewed, they had only to transfer his friend from Cumberland from the other side of the House to this.”

Well, the hon. gentleman has been equal to the task himself. The hon. gentleman has been equal to the task of establishing not one deficit, but two deficits, in the face of three and a half millions of additional taxation imposed upon the people of this country. The hon. gentleman stands here to-night and confesses that he has already laid upon this country that additional debt for the purpose of covering the ordinary expenditure of the country—that additional charge of $3,361,000. But I want now to invite the hon. gentleman's attention to what he has just said. What does he tell the House? He tells the House now that he does not propose any additional taxation; that he proposes to submit no measure by which this great calamity, this great disaster, this ruin to the credit of Canada, shall be averted, although he shows that on the 10th of this month he has a deficit of $617,610. I want to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to his own statement, and to the fact that, in 1874, when, on the 10th February, there was a surplus of $126,000, that year would have closed with one and a quarter millions of deficit if additional taxation had not been imposed immediately. He had a surplus of $126,000 on the 10th of February in that year, but now, on the 10th February just past, he faces a deficit of $617,610, and yet he says that we are to drift, that the Government have no means and no measure to propose by which this increased disaster, which he has pointed out in such glowing and in not too strong terms, may be averted.

Well, Sir, what does the hon. gentleman find as evidence to lead him to suppose that he is going to be in a better position on the last quarter of this year than he was in the last quarter of 1874? Will he say, and will he find anyone to endorse his statement, that the commercial prospects of this country will be better between now and the 1st July next, than they were between the 10th February and the 1st July, 1874. I say there is no person in this House, or in the country, who would hazard such an opinion for a moment. And yet the same hon. gentleman who asked three millions of additional taxation when we had a surplus has nothing to ask from this House now, and no means to propose by which the large deficit now impending is to be met. The hon. gentleman says he thinks the prospects are better, but he does not speak in stronger terms than he did in 1875, and he does not appear to be any more confident—he is not, indeed, so confident—than he was when he concluded his Budget speech a year ago, with the hope that we were now in clear water, and that our dangers were past. I cannot find any evidence from any quarter of the grounds upon which the hon. gentleman seems to buoy himself up on the present occasion. The hon. gentleman had his new taxes to arrest this deficit of nearly a million and a-half, which have not been sufficient for him. The hon. gentleman has had the great disaster, which we all deplore, the St. John fire, which carried into the Treasury at least two or three hundred thousand more of money than would be there if that great disaster had not occurred.

MR. DOMVILLE: $400,000.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman behind me, the hon. member for King's, says the amount has been $400,000. I do not know what the amount was, but we all know that a great quantity of dutiable goods cannot be consumed in a city like St. John, and be replaced, without the country receiving a considerable amount in duty from the goods purchased to replace them.

MR. MITCHELL: The Finance Minister says the mild winter season and its bad effect on trade would counteract that.

MR. TUPPER.

MR. TUPPER: Then the hon. gentleman speaks of a good crop. But there is this to take into consideration, the prices were low. Well, Sir, what has the hon. gentleman to propose in the present disastrous state of affairs? What has he to propose in view of the suffering industries of this country? What has the hon. gentleman to propose by which the present depressed state of things in this country may be changed, or the people inspired with the slightest hope for the better? He has nothing. If I were Bengough; if I had the power to caricature as he has, I would portray the hon. gentleman as General Distress, giving to the people the word of command, "Starve." He tells us that the ship of State is rudderless, that she is drifting, that there are no means of guiding her, that the incompetent crew who are on board of her have abandoned all hope of directing her course and have concluded to let her drift, let it be out to sea or upon the breakers. I took the opportunity, Sir, when the occasion presented itself last year to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the historical fact that the great change which had taken place in the commercial prospects of Canada was not only marked by a change of Government, but by something more important, a change of policy. I took the opportunity of pointing out that the policy which had been pursued by the late Government was in effect a protective policy. I pointed out to the hon. gentleman that, although there was a tariff of but fifteen per cent., yet, owing to the condition of the labour-market of the United States, that tariff gave an enormous protection to the manufacturing interests of this country; that the war had entirely disorganized the labour market of the United States; that the industries that had been brought into existence under Sir A. T. Galt's tariff of 1859 became invigorated by the protection afforded by the condition of the labour-market of the United States, and that, although the tariff was nominally fifteen per cent., we had, as everybody knows, so far as regarded the United States, almost as great a protection as if we had at this moment the tariff which the United States has against us. Everybody knows that the state of things was such as to protect the manufacturing interests of this country completely from the United States markets. As far as England was concerned, it was different, of course; the expense of bringing goods across the Atlantic giving a protection we have not against the United States. Not only was that the case, but everything a Government could do to foster the manufacturing interests of this country was done by the late Government. As the hon. gentleman knows right well, we put the material the manufacturers used on the free list. We protected the manufacturers by relieving the raw material as far as possible from taxation. The hon. gentleman knows we allowed machinery that could not be manufactured in this country to be brought in free of duty, thus assisting those who were engaged in such manufactures. The hon. gentleman knows we protected the great ship-building interest of this country by giving the ship-builder everything that entered into the construction of a ship free; which stimulated, to a very large extent, one of the most important industries of the country, and one to which Canada owes more than to almost any single industry that can be named. Then the hon. gentleman knows that we found ourselves in a different position to that in which he finds himself at present, and that, although carrying on the public service of the country with great liberality, we had more money than we required to use, and we made tea and coffee free, taking that taxation off the people entirely. That was a policy eminently calculated to foster the manufacturing industries of the country. Then we found the fishermen labouring under great difficulties. We found that they wanted protection; and what was our policy? Our policy was to give to Canadian fishermen the Canadian fishing grounds, and we asked Parliament to give them the means of protection that we could afford. Every person knows the way in which we were met by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House with that policy. Everybody knows that we were met with hostility, and that we were told to let our fishermen—

MR. MILLS: No one took that ground except Sir A. T. Galt.

MR. TUPPER: The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken, and I will come to Sir A. T. Galt before I sit down. And I may remind the hon. gentleman of the unhandsome manner in which he tortured the views of Sir A. T. Galt, and of his presentation to this House, as the views of Sir A. T. Galt, views which he had retracted and withdrawn, and concerning which he has said that he now holds sentiments entirely opposite. When the hon. gentleman attempted to defend himself, Sir Alexander Galt wrote a letter to the hon. gentleman, and he allowed the debate to close without having the manliness of character to read it to the House, and giving Sir Alexander Galt an opportunity of showing that the Minister of the Interior was a mere theoretical politician, utterly incapable of grasping the great commercial questions of the country, and that he had, in his absence, ventured to misrepresent him most grossly. I say that that was the way in which we were met; but we went on, and we protected the hardy fishermen of Canada in the enjoyment of their rights; and what was the result? Why, the result was this: that a treaty was negotiated under which these fishermen had the embargo upon their fish taken off, and the great market of the United States opened to their fish, by the duty of a dollar a barrel on herrings and two dollars a barrel on mackerel being removed. I say that was Protection in a very wide sense to the fishermen of this country. While I am on that subject, I may say that I wish to tender my thanks to the Government for one act of administration that I think every person in this country has reason to be gratified with, and that was the nomination of Sir Alexander Galt as Her Majesty's Commissioner in carrying out the provisions of that treaty. What is the result to-day? Why the result of it is, not only that the fish of the fishermen of Canada go into the market of the United States free of duty, but after a most thorough investigation, after the most elaborate testimony has been given before an independent Commission, we have got a judicial decision that the privilege we grant to the Americans of fishing in our waters ought to yield us half a million dollars per annum for ever, over and above all the advantages that are received by us from the Americans taking the duty off fish and allowing our fish to go into their markets, and allowing our fishermen to fish in their waters. I do not say that the amount is sufficient compensation, but I say that I believe we owe a debt of gratitude to the Government for having selected a man of Sir Alexander Galt's high attainments, great ability, and admirable capacity, to discharge that important duty, or the result probably would not have been even as satisfactory as it is at the present moment. Now, we are in this position, that we have that as a lever to use in the future, in connection with the United States. The payment of five and a half million dollars is comparatively a small matter, important as it is, to the fact of having that judicial arbitrament by an independent authority placed on record as to that important question. Then, Sir, we protected the tea trade of this country, when we made tea and coffee free. We protected the tea trade of this country from being swept away from under the feet of Canadians and of the commercial men of our own country. I say we protected the tea trade from being destroyed, by the imposition of ten per cent. duty on the tea coming from the United States, and that was another mode in which we fostered the industry and maintained the commerce of our own country. Then, Sir, the House knows very well that we made a great effort to impose a tax to protect the coal trade of this country, and the salt trade of this country, and the agricultural industries of this country by imposing duties upon coal, upon salt, and upon the wheat and coarse grains coming into Canada, and it was only in consequence of hon. gentlemen opposite uniting in a body with a certain number of gentlemen on our own side of the House, who disapproved of that policy—for we carried it by a small majority—that we were reluctantly compelled to abandon it. But I ask the hon. gentleman whether he does not think it is worth while to consider what the effect of our whole policy was upon the commerce and business of the country? This we do know, that while that policy was pursued, Canada prospered, and there was no indication of the existing condition of things until the hon. gentlemen opposite got possession of the Treasury benches, and until the hon. the Minister of Finance was entrusted with the management of the financial affairs and fiscal policy of the country. Our National Policy, I have said, they destroyed before they obtained power, by acting unitedly and in hostility to that measure. But, Sir, they may say, "We raised the duties to 17½ per cent." Well, there is some small question as to whether they are quite entitled to say that, as that was not the original proposal of the hon. the Minister of Finance; but I may say this—they gave no additional protection to the manufacturing industries of Canada. The addition of 2½ per cent. was utterly insignificant compared with the altered condition of the labour-market of the United States. I may tell the hon. gentleman, further, that what little protection was given to the manufacturing industry of Canada by the imposition of 2½ per cent. additional duty, raising the tariff from 15 to 17½ per cent. was swept away by taking the raw material that our manufacturers consumed out of the free list, and taxing it, so that the policy was as completely a reversal of that which had existed as was possible. Then the hon. gentleman assailed that great industry, which, as I have said, we protected by allowing everything that went into the construction of a ship to go in free. That policy was assailed, and the hon. gentleman came down here, at a time when the shipping interest of the country, hitherto in a flourishing condition, was beginning to be embarrassed—when, owing to the great competition from the large amount of shipping that existed in the world, the profits were being seriously affected, and a good deal of difficulty was being experienced—the hon. gentleman chose that opportunity to strike a serious blow at the great shipping interest of this country. Fortunately, the Opposition in this House, although comparatively weak at that time, were able to excite such an amount of interest on the subject in the country as to compel the hon. gentleman to relinquish his hold, or that industry would have been seriously injured. The duty that the hon. gentleman proposed was something like a dollar a ton on every ton of shipping that was being constructed in the country, or to be constructed; and it was reduced owing to the exertions of those who had fostered that important industry before. The hon. gentleman was compelled to alter his tariff, and it was reduced to something like 20c. a ton. But even that was an action calculated—while it gave a very small amount of revenue—calculated so far as it had any influence, to injure seriously an interest of great importance to this country. The hon. gentleman then taxed tea and coffee. I have stated that the removal of the duties from tea and coffee was eminently in the interest of the manufacturing industries of the country, because it enabled the employes of manufacturers to live at a cheaper rate than they could otherwise live, but the hon. gentleman was determined to reverse all the policy of his predecessors, and consequently he imposed a tax upon tea and coffee, and swept away the protection that the tea trade of Canada enjoyed. The hon. gentleman by one fell stroke swept that away, and transferred the tea market of this country from Canadians to merchants of New York. So, Sir, with reference to sugar refining, the hon. gentleman found, that owing to the action that had taken place in the United States, a great Canadian industry was about to be destroyed; but he looked calmly on and saw it destroyed. He remained true to the policy of helpless inactivity which he proposes still to continue and remained inactive and helpless while an industry in which some $400,000 of capital had been invested was completely destroyed and extinguished, and the machinery in the refineries which had cost some $400,000 was of no more value than scrap iron.

In fact, Sir, the policy of the hon. gentleman was to make Boston and New York, as far as his policy could operate, the commercial capitals of Canada. Now Sir, I am quite prepared to accept the issue which the hon. gentleman has proposed here to-night as between the two parties. I am glad to know, that the time has arrived when we are going to appeal from Pilate to Cæsar, when it will not be in the hon. gentleman's power much longer to defer the great arbitrament of the public sentiment of this country; and it is very important that the legitimate issues between the two parties should be clearly and distinctly placed before the people of Canada. I am willing to allow the hon. gentleman to define his own position and the position of his party; but, Sir, I am not willing to allow him to define our position. As far as his own position goes I accept at once, and without any hesitation, the statement of his own policy, and here it is. I am about to read the exposition the hon. gentleman gives of the policy of the Government at the demonstration at Fergus, when he said:—

“I dare say it will not surprise you to find that the remedies we propose for the depression are still more widely apart than are our several explanations of its causes. It is not our fault that our remedy, like our explanation, is of a very plain and prosaic character. We do not believe that we can obtain prosperity by Acts of Parliament * * * The people of Canada can only grow richer by the exercise of greater frugality and hard work.”

That is just the position of the hon. gentleman and his party. That is the fatal mistake which he and the Government of which he is a member have made in their dealing with the financial and fiscal policy of Canada. They do not believe, and have no confidence, in the power of Acts of Parliament to benefit the country. Why, if the hon. gentleman had even looked across the border, he would have seen that a great nation was saved from being severed in two by an Act of Parliament. The hon. gentleman ought to know that, if Governments are good for anything, they are good to increase the prosperity of a country by Acts of Parliament, or to meet difficulties in which a country is placed from time to time, and which require legislative interference. The fatal mistake which underlies all the hon. gentleman's blunders is this belief that it is beyond the power of Parliament to do anything to help the industries of the country. I will give him an instance in which, I think, he will have to admit that a great deal may be done by an Act of Parliament. I will quote his own words, and out of his own mouth I will prove that an Act of Parliament may do a great deal to enrich the country. I will prove that a measure, originated by the Opposition, pressed upon the Government, and persistently followed up until the Government were compelled to accede to it, has enriched the country to the extent of no less than $2,000,000 per annum. I refer to the Act proposed by my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby).

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Not precisely what he proposed.

MR. TUPPER: The only change was one which sacrificed unnecessarily $200,000 of Excise revenue, and which the hon. gentleman was kind enough to say to the coal-oil manufacturers of Ontario that he would take off their shoulders and place upon the tea consumers of the whole Dominion. I will show him that an Act of Parliament, pressed upon the Government in that way by the Opposition, has enriched the country to the extent of $2,000,000 per annum.

MR. DYMOND: Was that putting on Protection?

MR. TUPPER: I tell the hon. gentleman that he has not mastered the first elements of the principles that the Opposition in this House and in the country hold in relation to the fiscal policy of the country if he has not learnt that one of the fundamental principles we hold is that we can advance the interests of the country by lowering, as well as by raising, the tariff. On the 115th page of this valuable repertory of,—shall I say, Grit speeches?

MR. MACKENZIE: Yes, do.

MR. TUPPER: Of Ministerial addresses would be more polite,—the hon. gentleman says to his constituents:

"Sir, I don't want to exaggerate, but I am told that, in one way with another, about eight millions of gallons of coal oil are now consumed in Canada. I am told further, that, although it is true that we only reduced our taxes about nine cents per gallon, the result was to break up all the rings and monopolies which had been formed, and which controlled the market, and to give you the benefit and more than the benefit of that reduction, and from that day to this the price has been at least twenty-five cents less than it has been on the average during the last two years. I don't make this statement on my own authority, but on the authority of men well conversant with the trade, and if it be true, then the result of our extravagance and incompetence is that, when we put on a tax of $500,000, we, at the same time, made a reduction, which put two millions of dollars into the pockets of the people of Canada."

MR. TUPPER.

I give that to the hon. gentleman as an evidence that sometimes you may benefit the country by an Act of Parliament, and I trust he will admit that in that case I have proved my statement.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: By repealing a bad Act established by the hon. gentleman.

MR. TUPPER: I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to be turned aside from my argument by the hon. gentleman's interruption in order to deal with that question; but, if I did turn aside, I could show that the policy which my hon. friend from Stanstead urged upon the House was perfectly consistent with the duty placed on that article before, taking the relative cost of the article then and now into consideration. I think, however, I am not wrong in saying that the late Government, when they imposed that duty upon petroleum, found hearty support on the other side of the House.

MR. CARTWRIGHT: Not from me.

